- The systemic emasculation of men that coincides with the rise of feminism as men are reduced to the status of drones who work and submit to the gynocentric system while women are made to abandon family duties to work for corporations or the government.
- The advent of globalism—the hallmark of modern society fueled by technology—and its continuing efforts to destroy race, culture, masculinity, and all human relationships so that we will all serve the giant globalist system and its beneficiaries as "equals."
- And many more.

Now, some will argue that the negatives can be mitigated through effort and will defend the great merits of our “civilized” modern world. It is true that there are some things that can be controlled by practicing personal responsibility, but what about the things that are beyond man’s powers? What if the society itself is imposing its will upon us? What good is a “civilization” if it only exists to demean men and control them instead of being the expression of human will?

I can go on and on to list countless examples of how modern society degrades us into submission, but many individuals will continue to defend the modern society and focus on the symptoms of today’s problems rather than deal with the root cause of it all. Meanwhile, all the aforementioned problems are only getting worse and accelerating as technology and free market drives globalism and its degeneracy by removing us farther and farther away from our primal state of being.

As our liberal-democratic-materialist-progressive-globalist “civilization” continues to grow and increases the strain on humans which it uses as its cogs, I believe more and more men will revert back to their primal nature and become increasingly tribalistic in their response. We can already see this happening with the advent of the manosphere teaching men to be strong, healthy, and independent while there are increasing number of grassroots movements and ethno-nationalist groups emerging to defy the system.

Return to the primal

As men start to rage against the modern world, I believe it is time for a new ideology to emerge to meet their demands. This is where my new book, Man’s Fight for Existence, comes in with the idea of Primalism.

I don’t have enough space to go over all the nuances of this new ideology, but it can be summed up as the idea that the surest way to secure our freedom, health, social cohesion, and dignity as human beings is to honor our primal identity. This means the rejection of all the ills forced upon us by the modern society, which includes: processed food, modern sedentary lifestyle, the mass media, electronic entertainments, progressive ideals, corporatism, government control, materialism and consumerism, technological dependency, forced social integration and internationalization, and so on.

So, does this mean that we must go back to the Stone Age? No, not necessarily. It just means that we adapt the best we can given our circumstances. Although you may not be living as a caveman, by working out and eating healthy, by cultivating your masculinity, and by fighting for your own tribal group against the tidal wave of the current degenerate society, you are already halfway there to accepting the ideals of Primalism.

Fighting for Our Existence

This is a book unlike any other. While most men seek 'how to' books to improve certain areas of their lives (usually finance, sex, fitness), this manifesto offers a wake-up call to those who want a fresh perspective of the world. This book is for men who are fed up with the way things are and wish to reject playing by the system's rules just to achieve slightly better living conditions—because at some point, regurgitating the same old and whining about the problems of the world just doesn't cut it. Constantly pushing for self-improvement will not be enough in our rapidly changing world. Men will eventually have to draw a line and say that enough is enough.

This manifesto covers various topics including:

- Man's primal nature as well as his paradoxical tendencies and aspirations.
- The nature of life and existence and how struggle defines all that thrives.
- Human creations as entities that evolve over time with the same existential struggles seen in living beings (ie. competition between different products, ideologies, societies, etc.)
- The nature of the current technological-economic System that dominates our existence and uses humans under its domain to feed its own growth.

- The myriad of social and biological consequences for the humans who are subjugated by this System.
- How to fight back to reclaim our freedom and dignity.
- And more.

If the red pill as we understand it is the process of opening our eyes to the truth regarding the nature of women, think of this manifesto as the red pill that will open your eyes to the true nature of our world. A whole new realization can have the power to completely change a man and that is exactly what this book aims to do. And once enough men wake up, they will demand the world itself to change.

Steps towards resistance

Besides doing our best to honor ourselves and fulfilling our capacity for life, I believe active measures must be taken to secure our existence. These two steps will lay the basic foundation for men to resist regardless of their political beliefs.

The first step is for men to distinguish between politics as a hobby and politics as an activism; you are either doing one or the other. Far too many people are hobbyists who spend inordinate amount of time following politics like a football fan who follows his favorite team, doing nothing more than observing and making commentaries. To be an activist, you must have a specific goal to dedicate yourself to. Vague and unfocused goals like “defend _____” or “defeat _____” will never amount to anything. Instead, if you’re truly interested in change, aim for something tangible and meaningful that you can act upon.

Second, men must group and mobilize for their cause. Without creating tribal groups, whatever you read or say in regards to politics won’t matter. Know that nothing frightens the powers that be more than masculine men with shared beliefs and identity standing united. Formations of groups is a must.

Once these two steps are accomplished, the rest will follow through.

The times are changing fast and we must act now to prepare for the future. Don’t make anymore excuses. This is our moment.

To learn more, click here to buy ‘Man’s Fight for Existence’ on Amazon.

Read More: Your Body Has Not Adapted To Modern Society

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

The 5 Most Decisive Moments In A Man’s Life

January 30, 2017 | by Sylvan Danson | Link | Original Link

There are moments in a man’s life that fundamentally and forever change who he is. Whether for the better or worse, that can be argued. Of these, few are guaranteed to occur. Some of these opportunities you will seek out. Some you will unquestionably avoid. Others lay in the spectrum of in between. They are primal experiences which touch upon the very basis of existence; firmly grounded in the bedrock of Maslow’s Hierarchy. I cannot say these experiences make you a lesser or better man. But you will never be the man you were before they happened.

1. Your first time

If you weren’t blindingly drunk, trust to the truth that you will not forget the first time a woman (or girl) agreed to have sex with you. The fact that in only the past generation this act now lacks the likely chance of procreation is notwithstanding. Instinctually you sense that sex leads to children and you have been proven worthy by the ultimate gatekeeper of fertility that your hereditary gifts are of value enough for her to invest the better part of 20 years.

Modern society and certainly birth control have cheapened the moment to a degree, but only in the intellectual sense. The pleasurable aspect of what has been called a “sweet surrender” (long before Sarah MacLachlan used the phrase) is inexplicably tied to this ages old triumph of man. Depending on circumstances, this act may have incurred not insignificant risk from a protective father or an inquisitive public entity. But you succeeded in your goal and forever will have the knowledge that you have the skillset required to meet the first and most important biological imperative—reproduction.

2. The birth of your first child

Traditionally, men were absent from this moment, and they were lesser men for it. Perhaps it weakens the more aggressive spirit by tying you so closely to both your progeny and the woman who sacrificed (and will sacrifice much more in the future) to bring him into the world. There are few more helpless moments for a man than to watch the woman he hopefully loves in pain and be powerless to ease her suffering.

There is a buildup of emotions as the pain increases the closer the birth comes. And then there is the crescendo of emotions as the child is born, the woman largely released from her pain, and you gaze, for the first moment, upon your child.

A burden is placed immediately upon you (if you retain an ounce of honor) that will remain forever. But with that burden (and what is a man’s life if completely devoid of duty?) comes the knowledge that a part of you will live on far past your own life. Likewise, the woman whom you have supported has repaid you in full and in a way that remains uniquely the domain of the feminine. And in that moment, as surely as the child has passed the birth canal, the man has changed permanently into a different version of himself.

3. Imprisonment

Captivity is, more so than death, arguably the greatest challenge for a man to face. The knowledge that you are restricted in doing anything of value makes a man of intellect challenge his most basic assumptions and philosophies. It is little surprise then that so many philosophers and writers have described imprisonment as the essential catalyst to their thought and writing. Nietzsche, Solzhenitsyn, Dostoyevsky, Stockdale and countless others have used prison to define who they are and what is truly important to them, their society and what it is to retain control of your spirit when all else is in the control of others. Whether the imprisonment is deserved or not, the man who serves hard time is transformed.

As Nietzsche said upon his release from prison, “That which does not kill me makes me stronger.” Some leave prison a broken shell, others leave determined to make up for the time lost forever and, like Nietzsche, stronger for it but, regardless the direction, a different man than before.

4. Close combat

Men are stronger than women. We rejoice in sports, itself a surrogate for war, in a way the fairer sex does not. We are naturally aggressive, competitive and challenging of others. These traits exist because men, ultimately, exist to fight other men. Either in an aggressive attempt to take that which belongs to others or to defend against the predation of other men. As Hobbes correctly observed, primitive man lived a life nasty, brutish and short. And if you wanted to live long enough to take part in some other, more pleasurable, activities a man had to not only be able to fight, but to win.

Today's combat generally bears scant resemblance to the shoulder to shoulder slaughter that existed from pre-historic times to the end of the 19th century. The history of combat until the advent of modern firearms ensured you saw your enemy. Close enough to touch him in most instances. Certainly within the distance to see "the whites of his eyes." Combat was a personal experience. And the odds of victory were fairly even. Your natural abilities, your training, your aggressive spirit and the men to your side were the difference between victory and death.

When you reach that moment and win, it is a primal moment. It brings you instantly back to your vestigial cave man instincts. The varnish of civilization is stripped away and the primordial man stands exposed to the elements. It isn't pretty. But it is pure. Yet again, a moment from which you emerge a different man.

5. Death

There can be no doubt that death changes a man. And how a man faces the moment of his impending, unquestioned demise is the final, ultimate measurement of what kind of man he is. He alone will stand judge at this moment. For who else would matter? Your reputation will live on. Your children, your friends, your comrades will remember your triumph or failure at this ultimate moment but their opinion will remain withheld from you.

This is not meant, of course, to advocate the embrace of death. Indeed, those who fight against their own death are honored. But so too are those who accept it with dignity and, perhaps, a touch of humor. Obviously a sudden death provides little opportunity for introspection. But hand maiden to the aforementioned combat is the requirement to come to grips with, and accept, the possibility of your own demise. You must know the possibility exists that your life will be forfeited to the requirements of the mission and to the lives of your comrades in arms and we, as a nation, rightfully laud those who do so. It is, after all, this ultimate willingness to sacrifice yourself for the collective defense of your family, your community and your country that makes civilization possible.

There may be other moments in a man's life that some feel transform him. But I can think of no others that do so on such an elemental basis touching upon the very essence of our being. There may be moments unique to each man that transform him. Challenges perhaps unknown to others. Recognize these moments. Embrace them. Reflect upon them.

And see every setback, no matter how onerous or painful, as an opportunity to become the better man we must desire to be.

Read More: Stop Worshipping Women On The Internet

Sylvan Danson
Sylvan is a retired Infantry officer who spends his time volunteering, reading, writing and spending time afield with his dog and children. He is active with Scouting, the National Rifle Association and Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America.

Congresswoman Tulsi Gabbard's Syria Trip Causes Neocon Fits Of Hysteria

January 30, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The neocon Syrian "regime change" fanatics are not going to go gently into that dark night, it seems. At least not without flinging a few last bits of bile through the interwebs. The latest focus of their ire has been Congresswoman Tulsi Gabbard, whose recent trip to Damascus on a fact-finding mission about the toll the war has taken on the Syrian people has sent the regime-changers into paroxysms of rage.

Gabbard's courageous trip was something of an achievement among the craven-hearted folk in Washington. For five years, American money, weapons, and diplomatic cover have stoked the fires of the Syrian war and kept them burning brightly. No legislators have been willing to confront the brutal reality of what their policies have produced for the people of the region. And why should they? Their job is to do what John McCain and the lobbyists in Washington tell them to do, not to think independently.

> How do Americans feel about the fact that loads of their tax dollars went on arming the factions to which these gentlemen belong? #Syria pic.twitter.com/PtIdMheULN
>
> — Walid (@walid970721) January 17, 2017

In her trip, Gabbard toured the devastation wrought by the instruments of US policies; she met with President Assad and tweeted her support of Russian attacks on ISIS and other fundamentalist opposition groups. Gabbard's trip was a sign that a sea-change in US policy might be on the horizon; by any measure the trip was successful in bringing the carnage of the war to the attention of the US public. But to the regime-change marionettes in the US media, this was unforgivable.

> The people of Syria are crying for peace, asking the US to stop arming terrorist "rebels" who are destroying Syria. https://t.co/tu0O5ThBvc
>
> — Tulsi Gabbard (@TulsiGabbard) January 25, 2017

Typical of the response was an article by journalist Noah Rothman published under the title "Tulsi Gabbard's Disaster In Damascus." One can almost see the flecks of spittle flying off Rothman's mouth as one reads the piece. The opening paragraph gives a flavor of the whole:

> The simplest way to identify Russian sympathizers is to probe them on the matter of military interventionism. They may appear principled in their suspicion toward American force projection but are nowhere near as apprehensive about Russian muscle-flexing—even in the same theater of operations. That describes the foreign policy views of Hawaii Congresswoman and favorite of the Bernie Sanders wing of the Democratic Party, Tulsi Gabbard. Following an ill-conceived visit to the Syrian capital to meet with the blood-soaked dictator Bashar al-Assad this week, her craven prostration before Russia's vassals may have gone too far. Even Gabbard's erstwhile allies are abandoning her.

Rothman goes on to berate Gabbard for having the temerity to oppose a "no-fly zone" (a favorite tool of regime-change gamers) and other forms of aggression against a sovereign state. He then bewails the uncounted numbers of Syrians killed in the conflict. The hypocrisy and mendacity dripping from the article would be shocking, were they not so routine from the fantasy world of the regime-change gamers. Those who live in the real world know who was responsible for the war and its atrocities.

> Tulsi is so badass. She basically told CNN's Jake Tapper that his opinion on Assad is irrelevant. Only what Syrians think of him matters. pic.twitter.com/YR6XIH6vdH
>
> — Sarah Abdallah (@sahouraxo) January 26, 2017

As Rothman knows very well, it was the United States and its regional allies (Turkey, Israel, and the Gulf States) who launched the Syrian war, kindled its fires, and kept it going for five bloody years. Each actor had a role to play: Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States were to recruit head-chopping fanatics and mercenaries from all over the globe and pay their bills; Turkey would provide the routes of infiltration and lines of supply into Syria from the north; Israel would provide the signals intelligence, surveillance, and occasional airstrikes; and the United States would wring its hands at the UN to gain sympathy for a political "solution" (i.e., regime change through negotiation).

Regime change was the goal, and it was done for the purpose of installing a regional puppet in Syria that would do the bidding of the US and Israel. Assad's crime, of course, was that he and his allies opposed US policies in the region. In the logic of Washington, unless you permit your country to become a Western economic and military vassal, you are an enemy who must be destroyed. Independent nationalism is the real threat; every other pretext for regime change is just window-dressing to this end.

Gabbard is not some out-of-touch peacenik but someone with real-world experience

But, alas, things did not go as planned for the regime-changers. They were outplayed at the game by Assad, who had friends of his own to call in for backup (Iran, Russia, Hizballah) and were not going to allow the foreign conspiracy against Damascus to succeed. The writing on the wall was pretty much clear to everyone after Aleppo was retaken by the Syrian Army in late 2016.

So what can the regime-changers do at this point? Not much besides mudslinging and name-calling. To this end, they have tried to present Gabbard's trip as a boondoggle, when in fact it was nothing of the sort. It was a long-overdue act of political and moral courage from the Washington establishment.

While we will never get a mea culpa from the people who started and sustained the war, Gabbard's trip at least begins the process of recognizing the horrific human cost of the West's regime-change project.

Read More: Terrible Mother Who Took Her Kids To Syria Now Wants To Leave Islamic State

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Are We Witnessing The Downfall Of Scientific Authoritarianism?

January 31, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

It seems social engineers have studied human beings well, as a power mad elite attempt to mold us into androgynous pods (one of the latest pushes is the mass marketing of makeup for men) who benefit their bottom line rather than free and independent men and women who live in pursuit of their own happiness. In the past century, they've learned how to sell us things we don't need by manipulating our base emotions. They've learned how to brainwash millions of women into believing motherhood is oppressive and that being like men is what all women should aspire to.

They've taken lessons from psychologists, anthropologists and scientists about the structure of human societies and used them to aggrandize power rather than to serve the interests of the public. The knowledge gleaned from science is being used not to advance the human condition, but to control the masses in a way that benefits the upper crust of society rather than the individual.

This is an introduction to four of the most important thinkers of the past century. As we examine their ideas, we will see how each of these men's ideas have been subverted by a small minority to manipulate and control the masses of humanity. There is reason to believe the scientific knowledge elucidated below has been systematically used against men and society in general by a clandestine Deep State, i.e. "men behind the curtain" of Western governments.

Sigmund Freud’s ideas have been used to manage the West for over a century

Freud

Sigmund Freud’s ideas have been used to turn Americans into a mindless protoplasm that knows how to do nothing but consume for consumption’s sake.

Many people dismiss Freud’s theories without realizing they became the very foundation of the modern consumer economy when his nephew Edward Bernays decided to adapt them for use by corporations and the government in the then newly formed field of “public relations.” The term public relations is actually a creation of Bernays, who knew “propaganda ministry” wouldn’t sound so good even though that’s exactly what any public relations office is.

Penis Envy is one of the most controversial of Freud’s theories, even though it has been used quite successfully in numerous ad campaigns and social engineering schemes. In fact, the first successful cigarette campaign designed to get women smoking (smoking had always been taboo for women before) was based on the Penis Envy theory. Bernays designed a campaign in which cigarettes became “Torches of Freedom” as he encouraged women to symbolically and subconsciously sport their own penises by lighting up in a garish public display. The campaign was a huge success for Philip Morris, as cigarette sales for women skyrocketed after the “Torches of Freedom” campaign.

One need look no further than feminism to see Freud’s Penis Envy theory in action once again. At its core feminism is about turning women into wannabe men rather than encouraging them to fulfill their natural biological and psychological roles as mothers and wives. An ROK commenter recently offered this excellent assessment as to why women have gone insane as a result of the mass institution of Freud’s theory by feminism in Anglo America.

> She believes childbearing to be oppressive but it isn’t. The ability to create life is a profound and admirable thing. What could woman ever do that could be more important than that? And of course they are miserable, because they aren’t fulfilling their purpose. They aren’t using their most important body part. They pretend they don’t even have a womb and take drugs to stop it from functioning.

> Like a cooped up horse that doesn't use its legs, or a bird that can't use its wings, or a bull or goat that can't use its horns, women who don't use their womb go insane. Women are meant to live in a perpetual cycle of sex-pregnancy-childbirth-suckling. It's their natural life cycle if they don't take birth control drugs to prevent it.

There is no surer sign Penis Envy is the basis of feminism than realizing the truth of that statement. Women have become ashamed of their life-creating capacity and think it's nobler to slave away for an uncaring corporate boss rather than taking an active part in creating and nurturing the next generation of humans.

Freud's scientific theories have been shamelessly used by elites to turn women into wannabe men, and corrupted by Bernays to help the corporate-government complex turn the whole of society into compulsive shoppers and eaters. This benefits the elite at the cost of everyone else in society.

It's important to realize buying things for women will never fulfill them like keeping them barefoot and pregnant, to be uncouth about the issue.

Unwin

Sex and Culture prophesied the destruction feminism would bring to the West

In 1934, Oxford-educated anthropologist J.D. Unwin published Sex and Culture, a scientific study of 6 civilizations and 80 tribes covering a span of 5,000 years of human history. He warned of the consequences of completely abandoning restraints on female sexuality.

> These societies lived in different geographical environments; they belonged to > different racial stocks; but the history of their marriage customs is the same. In the beginning each society had the same ideas in regard to sexual regulations. Then the same struggles took place; the same sentiments were expressed; the same changes were made; the same results ensued. Each society reduced its sexual opportunity to a minimum and displaying great social energy, flourished greatly. Then it extended its sexual opportunity; its energy decreased, and faded away. The one outstanding feature of the whole story is its unrelieved monotony.

This dire warning came a full 30 years before the CIA funded Gloria Steinem and her Ms. Magazine. Any policymaker educated in anthropology would have known of Unwin's groundbreaking revelation. This knowledge was ripe for the picking for those who wanted to break down Western society and redesign it as a New World Order collective in which the state was at the center of family. This of course means men have effectively become enemies of the state.

Aldous Huxley thought highly of Unwin's ideas. He wrote:

> Unwin's conclusions, which are based upon an enormous wealth of carefully sifted evidence, may be summed up as follows. All human societies are in one or another of four cultural conditions: zoistic, manistic, deistic, rationalistic. Of these societies the zoistic displays the least amount of mental and social energy, the rationalistic the most. Investigation shows that the societies exhibiting the least amount of energy are those where pre-nuptial continence is not imposed and where the opportunities for sexual indulgence after marriage are greatest. The cultural condition of a society rises in exact proportion as it imposes pre-nuptial and post-nuptial restraints upon sexual opportunity.

In layman's terms, Huxley warned us human society would regress rather than progress if women were allowed to become degenerate whores and their uncontrolled hypergamous instincts allowed the Pareto Principle to return – a world in which 20% of men dominate the sexuality of 80% of women. The rest of men go without until sex and companionship until they Go Galt and tear the system down.

Again, we see another apparent example of scientific knowledge being used by elites in designing an authoritarian playbook.

Briffault

Almost unknown, Robert Briffault deserves credit for his anthropological research

Social anthropologist Robert Briffault's erudite work entitled The Mothers, released 90 years ago also spelled out what would happen once male utility value was supplanted by the welfare state, a full 40 years before Johnson's Great Society literally became the greatest act of cuckoldry in the history of mankind. Men have been cucked by the very government they are forced to pay taxes into ever since.

Social engineers would have to know the consequences of instituting such a system. From Briffault's book The Mothers:

> The female, not the male, determines all the conditions of the animal family. Where the female can derive no benefit from association with the male, no such association takes place.

That simple statement illustrates why a welfare state weakens men's hand in society. Of course, this is not surprising to those who know women see men as nothing but utility objects. (Then hypocritically chastise men who rightly see them as nothing but sex objects. Even though women literally have nothing else to offer men in the West in modern times.)

There are three important corollaries to Briffault's Law:

> Past benefit provided by the male does not provide for continued or future association.
>
> Any agreement where the male provides a current benefit in return for a promise of future association is null and void as soon as the male has provided the benefit.
>
> A promise of future benefit has limited influence on current/future association, > with the influence inversely proportionate to the length of time until the benefit will be given and directly proportionate to the degree to which the female trusts the male.

In other words, anthropological science has revealed women are consummate users – even predators – of men. Of course, The Anglo-American Matrix used this knowledge to weaken the roles of men in society, replacing his provider role with the almighty state.

Tesla

Nikola Tesla knew women's liberation really meant female superiority

None other than engineering genius Nikola Tesla wrote about what was coming as a result of women trying to compete with and displace men from their roles in society. He wrote:

> This struggle of the human female toward sex equality will end in a new sex order, with the female as superior.

However, while social engineers pushed women out of the home and the kitchen and into roles as corporate cogs and male wannabees, their innate psychological desires to submit to man, have children, and nurture have gone unfulfilled. The result is two generations of women who become increasingly shrill and miserable.

> It seems to me that women are not particularly happy in this newly found freedom, in this new competition which they are waging so persistently against men in business and the professions and even in sport. The question that naturally arises is, whether the women themselves are the gainers or the losers.

What else was the feminist march on Washington a week after Trump's inauguration but a bunch of malcontents, drunk on their own power pushing anti-family and anti-male bile without realizing the cognitive dissonance in the messages they preach. The very reason feminists are so unhappy is they never fulfilled their biological and evolutionary roles in society, and are destined to die with cats or other animals for children rather than human children who would love them and care for them in their old age.

So, feminism definitely makes women losers in society, to answer the question posed by Tesla.

Scientific Dictatorship Crumbling

Elites, including IMF manager Christine Lagarde met at Davos, Switzerland to discuss the crumbling facade they've constructed

It's quite a coincidence that every Western policy instituted in the last century has gone against the prudent course the above knowledge would have dictated for leaders who care about their citizens. The good news is the use of the knowledge outlined above to control, deceive and brainwash millions might be coming to an end.

Thanks to the destruction of the centralized communication model that has dominated the world since the invention of radio and television, and the advent of free and open communication on the Internet, the elite-managed democracy we have been living under is now taking a populist turn. The elites are none too happy about the fact a mass awakening is revealing the control matrix they so carefully crafted, one that will be destroyed once a critical mass of awakened individuals has been reached. Perhaps then, this scientific knowledge can be used to help, rather than hinder humanity.

From their lofty perches at Davos, Switzerland, right after the crowning of Donald Trump the elite revealed just how unhappy they are with the turn away from their management of society. Even Establishment media couldn't deny what was going on as Bloomberg reported: Davos Elite Seeks Fixes to Defend the System From Populists.

It helps to define populism, what the elite are "defending" against: populism is support for the concerns of ordinary people. The importance of that article can't be overstated: A mainstream newspaper just came out and said the elite doesn't give a damn about the concerns of ordinary people if one reads between the lines. That's huge for the establishment to make that admission. In the report, hedge fund billionaire Ray Dalio even went so far as to say:

> We may be at a point where globalization is ending, and provincialization and > nationalization is taking hold.

They know the jig is up.

I hope for a peaceful resolution to the coming conflict between the elites and the rest of us, but elite interests are maniacal. There's never enough money or power for them, while they foist Socialism on the rest of us. The elites at Davos, among others, are the people who really run the world. Our "representatives" in America and Europe only do their bidding.

Expect them to grasp at authoritarian straws to try and force the genie back into the bottle. It seems they are hell-bent on creating a global, authoritarian, Socialist government without telling anyone about it. They nearly succeeded by bastardizing the knowledge of the luminaries referenced above, before the Internet came along and blew a strong wind up their dirty skirts revealing all the treachery underneath.

May this entire crooked facade of scientifically-based authoritarianism based on the corruption of knowledge gleaned by great men crash and burn, and go straight to hell where it belongs.

Read More: A Scientific Review Of ROK's Community Beliefs

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Is Milo Yiannopoulos Becoming A Liberal To Maintain His Celebrity Profile?

January 31, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Free speech advocate Milo Yiannopoulos has told his followers to be "deeply suspicious" of anyone who "gives a shit" about skin color, sexuality, and gender. His comments somewhat resemble past ones he has made, but this time he appears to have been responding to media criticisms that he is a racist, misogynist, and Islamophobe. To maintain his celebrity profile, Return Of Kings believes that Milo Yiannopoulos is meticulously toning down his rhetoric.

> "White pride, white nationalism, white supremacy isn't the way to go," he continued. "The way to go is reminding them and yourselves that you should be aspiring to values and to ideas."
>
> "You should be focusing on what unites people and not what drives them apart," MILO concluded. "You shouldn't give a shit about skin color, a shit about sexuality… You shouldn't give a shit about gender, and you should be deeply suspicious of the people who do."

SJWs have expressed their fury at book publisher Simon & Schuster for backing Milo's new book and paying him a considerable advance. Having not won the election and with stunts like the "women's marches" failing, leftist extremists are becoming more and more rabid.

In his recent address, Milo paid special attention to white nationalist and white identity platforms, saying that they are not solutions for America's current political and social malaise. Remember that Roosh has fought a running battle with white supremacists who despise his Iranian and, to a lesser extent, Armenian parentage. Return Of Kings regards Milo's assessment of white separatist groups as a topic of discussion. That said, he should have noted the deep irony of every non-Western country being able to protect its native ethnic mix whilst America and other European-founded states are expected to let in anyone and everyone.

The Breitbart editor went on to say that the Trump era should be about people trying to "reclaim for America some reason, some logic, some common sense." Return Of Kings hopes this is all just a tactical move by Milo, a strategy he has employed before. For example, to potentially avoid extra criticism about race issues, he often speaks about his preference for black boyfriends.

After all, Milo should know better than most that the modern political scene is plagued by a lack of reason, logic, and common sense. The ascent of Trump might been spectacular. This is still very different from us enjoying a tolerable, let alone beneficial political climate. That will take time and for the foreseeable future we face enemies whose modus operandi is not only to avoid reason, logic, and common sense, but to engage in its exact opposite: infantile emotions, anarchy, and destruction.

Where and why Milo got this wrong

The phantom unity.

There are two significant problems with Milo's call for an end to identity politics. Firstly, emphasizing values in and of themselves has done next to nothing for conservatism and traditionalism. One can look back to Ronald Reagan and even further to Barry Goldwater and find a goldmine of laudable values (and policy objectives to go with them), from freedom and liberty to hard work and generally honoring the best elements of the past. Have these been translated into reality? The answer is a decisive no.

We have faith in Trump to change much of this, but values alone are clearly not enough.

Though men like Reagan and Goldwater look like titans compared to today's cuckservatives, their resort to values was naive. In the case of the former, it won him and George H. W. Bush twelve years in office, but those years are now a memory and did nothing to really arrest America's profound social and economic problems.

A values-centric approach presupposes that one's opponents are rational, reasonable human beings capable of being persuaded by appeals to unity and the best interests of society as a whole. On advocating for free speech, Milo has a superb record. But his own career so far is a testament to the intractability of his enemies' outlooks and even their propensity for violence. There are currently hundreds of thousands of people who want his book banned, and many millions of apolitical types will not bother to lift a finger in support of his right to freedom of expression. As eloquent as Milo can be, identity-less values will not win him—or us—the day.

SJWs and their powerful, wealthy enablers may be a minority of the population, yet they exert disproportionate control over the media and can shame liberal and conservative politicians into oblivion if they don't toe the official or acceptable line. This media bias was particularly evident during the Presidency of George W. Bush and will be during Trump's, but it started decades before. The game is as much about power and resources as values. The magnetism and drive of Trump and those like him aside, our anti-SJW corner—and a very broad corner it is if Milo's words are anything to go by—lacks the logistical power to compete on a number of levels.

Secondly, Milo's distaste for identity politics ignores fundamental and real differences between the sexes, cultures, and, other demographic subsets. Ideals like "gender equality" have brought us to the deleterious state of affairs we experience today. No amount of explaining to feminists and others like them what equality should mean has averted the slide towards an outright preferencing of females in almost all aspects of modern life.

Plus, platitudes about equality fly in the face of what really happens when, for instance, the two sexes try and behave in the same way as one another. In the most telling manifestation of "equality," Return Of Kings is replete with articles about the dire effects of sluttish behavior on females. Likewise, the marriage of women to the government instead of men, even when they are technically married to a male as well, has ruined the majority of families.

The most startling element of Milo's seeming abandonment of identity politics is that it defies the history he claims to champion. Conservatism is supposedly a recognition of the wisdom of the past, but this past was constructed by men in a social context dominated by heterosexual families and societies based on ethnic nationalism. If Milo's conservatism is based on values sans identity politics, it is a made-up philosophy.

Has the alt-right begun consuming itself?

The demise of Hillary Clinton has seen infighting between elements of the alt-right growing.

Milo Yiannopoulos has previously praised the alt-right without wanting to be a member of it. Given Breitbart's heavy involvement with the ideology, we are very concerned that one of its editors would chastize identity politics, just after identity politics, especially in regards to disaffected men, had won Trump the 2016 Presidential election. In hindsight, winning the election was the easy part. Post-November 8, many within the alt-right or those aligned with it, including men like Mike Cernovich and Richard Spencer, have either turned on each other or been attacked by an erstwhile ally.

My own personal feeling is that Milo's move is strategic and largely about his own fame and profile. There's nothing inherently wrong with this, as his quest for recognition and the public spotlight has usually dovetailed nicely with promoting free speech and humorously attacking feminism. Regardless, Return Of Kings considers that Milo is making a blunder. Because of the outrage over his first book, he has given Simon & Schuster or any other publisher carte blanche to make him tone down his image for any subsequent books until he becomes part of the mainstream that he has previously attacked.

Most of all, Yiannopoulos is running the risk of biting the hand that feeds him: young men who might superficially disavow identity politics, but who really crave the essence of conservatism and traditionalism: male-dominated societies based on progress, nationalism (the height of non-destructive identity politics), patriarchy, and strong families.

Read More: DePaul University President Resigns Due To Fallout From Cancelled Milo Yiannopoulos Speech

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

6 Things I Learned From My Excursion To Japan

January 31, 2017 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

A man should do some traveling during his life, and some of us get the benefit of doing it for work and having the company pick up the tab. I recently did a stint in Japan for work, and, noting the recent article on Japanese game, I thought I'd stick with what I know and give you some information on moving around and getting things accomplished in that country, because, like the Marine said, "amateurs talk about tactics, but professionals study logistics." That being said, here's 6 things to know about Japan.

1. Get out of the way

Japan is a tiny country, with medium sized people. Your author stands at 6'4″ and currently a few pounds over his fighting weight of 220, and that's two Japanese women or 1.5 Japanese dudes worth. The country is sized for them, not us, and the urban centers are full of Japanese in a hurry that know, to the step, where they are going.

While some of them are outgoing and friendly, the culture, as a whole, is purely courteous and polite, which means you'll get thought poorly of if you make a nuisance of yourself, but they won't tell you. The absolute best thing to do when in doubt is to get out of the way, step to the side, and figure out what you want to do next. They won't mind if you tuck yourself and bookbag into a corner to consult Google Maps or look at a subway guide of that city, just find a building column or something to stand beside and you're good.

These guys aren’t kidding. Think a really nice, stationary mosh pit.

Subways are a definite example of this. If you score a seat (don’t sit in the priority seats for the elderly, infirm, or with any sort of baby), do not manspread. While I have an issue with our domestic feminist definition of the term being sexist towards men, over there, no one takes up any more space than they have to; it’s a Great Shame, and everyone considers it part of the culture. Take your bag off your back, put your feet and legs together, and take up one spot. Sprawl later when the car is relatively empty.

However, if you know where you’re going, get out there and show some dominance. No need to run anyone over, but you can hold your line and you’ll both move just enough. A note should be made about crosswalks; some work like Western ones, where vehicle traffic and foot traffic can both go in parallel, then both switch to the other way, but some shut the whole vehicle side down, and all crosswalks go green, which allows the time-saving diagonal crossing, should you need it.

Diagonal crosswalk; I walked this one a couple times.

2. Money talks

Japanese currency is the yen, which is functionally equivalent to the US penny, and is usually worth close to that, currently a little less. The 1 yen coin is a dinky little thing of aluminum, which, along with the 5 yen coin (brass, with a hole in it) are not very useful and are mainly used in cash register transactions but not vending machines.

After those two, the coins are a big copper 10 yen, a nickel plated with hole in it 50 yen, a nickel plated 100 yen, and lastly a brass plated 500 yen. When you get a decent pocket pile going, you could easily have the equivalent of 15 bucks or so in coins, so take a little change pouch. Bills are 1000, 5000, and 10000 yen and that's it.

I speak very little Japanese, but there are two great things about money over there. The first is that taxes are included in the price, and tipping is actually considered mildly insulting, as they have a job to do, consider the payment fair, and that's that. The second is that prices are expressed in the same numbers we have, so a 20 ounce Pepsi will have a sticker on it that says ¥135, and that means pull out your coins, get 135 worth or more, and that's how much it will cost.

Put your money on that brown tray.

Transactions are a little formalized. There is small tray the size of an unfolded bill, and you put the money there. Once you're done, the cashier will scoop it up, make change if needed, and hand you it plus a receipt. Accept it with both hands, nod a little exaggeratedly (it's a mini-bow), and say thank you, then move out.

3. Know where you need to go

Map apps are the shit over there, just be sure you get an international data plan. I was happily bouncing around Tokyo doing what interested me and going all over the city with no issues via the subway on one weekend, and then AT&T shut off my phone the next Tuesday. My corporate IT department had not actually done the ticket request of putting an international plan on the phone, and I accrued some 500 bucks worth of charges. Fortunately, a 20 min phone call to AT&T got me on a plan, and the backcharged data usage applied to it.

However, phones don't work so well on hassled cab drivers. Take your common destinations, print them out in English and Japanese, then show the guy the paper, point, and do your best to pronounce it right. Another good thing to do is collect business cards from everywhere you go. Just hold your hands in the shape of a business card, ask "cardo?" and they should give you one. Hand that to a cabby, and back you go to your hotel.

4. Public transport

The Japanese public transport system is amazing, and you can go, easily, to any metropolitan area in the country, on your own, with a little basic research and having to talk to virtually nobody. I haven't quite mastered calling my own cab, but, most hotels can do it for you, and there are also areas where there are cab stands and a queue of them waiting for you.

However, the subway is where it's at. Get a map of the system, and the trains will go where they say they will go. Older trains will have taped audio announcing the stations in Japanese, then briefly in English, "This is Fushimi, please change here for the Tsurumai line," and newer trains will have an LCD screen saying, in many languages, where you are and what's next.

What's really cool is the IC card, and I know the New Yorkers are rolling their eyes right now. Just like any subway card, you get one, put money on it, scan it on the way into the system, and then on the way out, and, if there's enough on the balance, it lets you out and deducts it, or you put more on it on the kiosk right there.

Any card works anywhere.

This thing leaves American subway cards in the dust, though. It will work on any equipped taxi or bus, and they are all linked together, which means your Nagoya card will work in Tokyo or Osaka, which I happily found out.

Taxis and buses are your other modes of transport other than the subway and hoofing it. Taxis, covered a little above, take cash, maybe the IC card, and credit cards. Buses take exact change cash, tickets you buy ahead of time, and sometimes the IC card. The buses will often have a screen with English of what station is next, along with a recording.

Lastly, there's the Shinkansen. Literally "new trunk line," these high speed trains get called "bullet train" for a reason. 100 mph+, these guys go from city to city, and I'm batting about 50% on using the ticket machines on my own and getting it right, as there's the ticket, then the "fare" to leave one metropolitan area for another. Buy a little bento box for lunch next to your platform, and watch the countryside go by damn fast. You can go cheap with an unreserved seat, get a reserved seat for a little more, and splurge on the "green car" (first class), should you want to. I tried the latter two, and found the green car expense to be unjustified.

Goes about as fast as it looks like it should.

I was able to walk from my hotel to the train station, get on the subway, ride into town, change trains, go to the main station, hop on a Shinkansen, ride it to another city, and play tourist all weekend with an overnight stay, then go back, all without having to talk to anyone.

5. Taking a dump

Bathrooms in Japan have some reputation. Presuming we're all dudes here, a Japanese urinal works pretty much the same way as all the rest of them do; they're auto flush, use it and step away.

There are, however, three kinds of toilets. The easiest one is a basic Western style toilet which works exactly like the ones you use at home. The next one is a Western style toilet with a really complicated seat called a Washlet.

Extra controls on the left there. The red button means stop, and the big one in back is flush. Pink one is for chicks only.

Made by TOTO, which is an abbreviation of something translating to Oriental Ceramics, these things have a "smart seat" that will do all sorts of these, including, but not limited to: wash your ass, wash your vagina if you're a girl (or shoot you in the nuts if you're a guy and dumb enough to hit that button), play music to cover the sound of your labors, warm the seat, pre-rinse the bowl, and maybe vibrate. There's a stop button, which is really the only button you need to worry about that will stop everything. Feel free to figure them out, or ignore them. The flush button is usually separate and fairly standard.

Then there is the Eastern toilet; the infamous squat and shit; the dreaded bobsled. Pissing into one of these, for us, is the same as usual, but any girl trying to pee in one, or anyone taking a dump, has to assume the position.

…feel the rhythm, feel the ride; get on up, it’s bobsled time?

These things are essentially a porcelain trough in the ground with nozzle at one end and a large hooded hole at the other. The idea is to put your feet either side of the hood and pop a squat, which puts your butt squarely above the trough area and fire away. Do not shit on your pants, or fall on your ass, and it may help to remove your pants entirely if you have time. There may be toilet paper, and there may be a trash can for it if the plumbing sucks, or there may be a spray nozzle or a ladle and faucet with which to wash your ass.

My recommendation is to shit at your hotel and take some toilet paper just in case. It is my lifetime goal not to ride the bobsled (named as such since they sit sidewise, and you can imagine a row of these things in use having people squatting in a line like Olympic bobsledders.)

6. Shoes

Japan is weird about shoes. People shuffle along, dragging their heels as to prevent from losing their shoes, which are loosely tied as to be easily removable. Many places in Japan, houses, nice restaurants, etc, are shoes off places, and you can typically tell by a small entryway with a cupboard for shoes and tile at the shoe area, but a step up onto wood for the rest of the place. They may even persona non grata your ass if you put shoed feet on tatami mat flooring.

Shoe procedures in an entryway.

Private, or nice public bathrooms in a restaurant, will have “toilet slippers” outside of them. Walk over in your socks, put them on, go in and do the deed, then reverse the process to leave. Don’t take the toilet slippers elsewhere.

Conclusion

Japan is safe, clean, and usually fun. They will tolerate and sometimes even appreciate a Westerner who takes effort to follow their culture. Compliments towards anything Japanese are typically received well. Japanese food is a whole other article, but I managed to eat well enough, and you can find your own balance of adventuresome versus safe eating easily enough. The plane flight is long and the jet lag blows, but you should have fun if you ever have occasion to go.

Read More: Introduction to Japanese Girls

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

How Trump Lost New Hampshire And Won The Presidency

January 31, 2017 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

This is the final installment of a four-part series. You can read the third part here.

I began working for the Trump campaign in NH as a volunteer, working Saturdays through September. My performance was so good they wanted to offer me a full-time position, but they could not give me a spot because of corruption. There was already an affirmative action hire in the spot as a full-time door-knocker, but all she did was fabricate responses in the app used for voter data. She would pretend like she'd be going out to go do her job, and then punch in a bunch of fake data about how many doors she knocked, who people were voting for, etc, while drinking a beer.

It was massive fraud. She'd complete about 1-2K false entries per day and although she'd often get caught, the bosses she worked for liked the fact she inflated the numbers. Her bosses could then report up the GOP chain of command that they had knocked on so many doors to look good for their district.

This fraudulent woman probably cost Mr. Trump about 500 votes. She may have cost Kelly Ayotte, the Republican candidate for the Senate, the election. She was working in a heavy Republican town, Salem, NH, for months and had the important job of building up voter morale, persuading undecideds, and potentially flipping some Dems. Instead, between August and halfway through October, this woman was punching in fraudulent information.

My good friend whom was in charge of the Salem Trump office could not get this woman fired despite telling his higher ups numerous times about the ongoing fraud. He had been complaining for weeks, and he had to continuously delete her data only for her to punch it in fraudulently again the following day. It was an infuriating display of cuckservatism.

So they could only sign me up on a part-time basis at first, but eventually my friend put his foot down and said if they didn't get rid of her and replace her with me, he would no longer care about meeting his quotas of voter turnout for the town and such. They fired her and I got the full time position with about two weeks left to go.

As dedicated as the Trump campaign's team of volunteers who were flooding across Massachusetts were, the Clinton team also had a well-organized, and well-paid ground-game around NH as well. Combined with the media propaganda, the NH campaign was a constant uphill battle. The Dems spent a whopping $48.4 million, the second highest in the country, just on the Senate race alone! I remember on one occasion how an elderly man, after learning I was there on behalf of the Republican party and Trump, said to me, "I SAW ON TV TRUMP WANTS TO GIVE NUKES TO EVERYBODY," and slammed the door in my face. Hilarious but sad at the same time. TV is evil. I tell everyone I know to cancel their cable.

As a result, it was NH that cost Hillary the election. For whatever reason, her team was panicking at the thought of losing NH to Trump, so they pulled out all the stops and devoted a tremendous amount of resources to securing that state. Including many of the coveted and rare Hillary appearances. Trump, being a living machine, was able to make campaign stops everywhere all over the country – including many appearances in NH. Apparently, this caused the Clinton team to over-react and devote disproportional resources in order to secure NH. In hindsight, we know Hillary and her team should have been focusing much more on WI and MI, but because they felt like these states were so reliably blue that all they needed to win was ensure NH stayed blue. And NH did go blue. But it came at a heavy price, a total pyrrhic victory for the Dems.

I would say Trump had a shotgun approach to campaigning – doing around 8-10 rallies a week or so himself, whereas Clinton had a sniper-rifle approach doing 3-5 appearances per week plus her incredible number of surrogates (the celebs, Bernie, the Obamas, etc, just to name a few). But surrogates are no substitute for the actual candidate, so Clinton needed to use her fewer appearances wisely, and she would come up to NH far more than she should have with such a limited schedule. She should have left NH more to her surrogates while she traveled to the rust belt to keep the blue wall secure. She never stepped in Wisconsin once, which anyone can clearly see was a tremendous mistake.

There was also the issue of UNH bussing in 6000 students and registering them at the voter booth in Durham, which reeks of fraud and bullshit as many of the students were from out-of-state. If this did not happen the Republicans would have won every race. But because voter laws are corrupt in NH, it was legal. It’s a rigged system, folks.

Regardless, not only did the enormous effort of the Democratic machine give Hillary the win in NH, but it also barely gave Hassan over Ayotte, Kuster over Lawerence, and many other local races. Ayotte pulled her endorsement of Trump and constantly bashed him, which significantly depressed her voter turnout in Republican towns. Ayotte performed worse than Trump in Republican towns, but better than Trump in Democrat towns.

There was also a third party Independent named Aaron Day, who simply hated Ayotte for personal reasons and ran just to steal her votes. She lost her campaign from many small cuts. Overall, the campaign against Trump was indeed very damaging to the rest of the down-ballot races, but Chris Sununu still managed to win big against heavy odds and secure a comfortable vote margin. So there is still a promising future for the Republican party in NH.

Moreover, there is a very promising future for the Republican party, and the rest of America, with President Donald J. Trump.

Read Next: The Cultural Impact Of A Donald Trump Presidency

Sam Seau

Samseau is a player philosopher psychologist who enjoys a good discussion. You can follow him on Twitter.

Why “Nexting” Unsuitable Women Is Good For Your Sex Life

January 31, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A lot of the time, when people write content on game what they’re doing is telling you how to draw women to you. What is less discussed is when you should push women away, or “next” them. My take is you should do it frequently.

Failure to next women whenever they fall short of your standards—or you of theirs—is a common quagmire you should avoid falling into. Instead, you want to be adding women to your pipeline with such regularity that deleting some girl with whom there are problems from your phone is no big deal.

Frame Is Everything

Last week regular ROK commentator Lolknee wrote the following under my article about abundance:

> If I ever lose frame even for a hot second I leave a woman. I don’t need a woman in my life who isn’t under the delusion that I am totally fucking perfect’

Now, without wishing to blow smoke up Lolknee’s ass, I would recommend that every man reading this tattoos the above quote on an area of his body where it is easily visible immediately. Seriously. Carry on reading this on your iPhone at the tattooist’s, or else pick up where you left off when you return.

Only joking. But you get my point: Lolknee’s comment is important. When guys usually think about nexting, if they do at all, they think of it in terms of the girl’s bad behaviour. If, for example, she is always late, or brings you loads of drama, or is a money-grabber or something else of the kind, then of course it’s going to cross even the most blue-pilled beta guy’s mind that maybe he should dump her ass. What is equally true, though, is that if you lose the frame in any way and her respect for you plummets then you’re also better off cutting your losses and moving on to another prospect.

Why is this? Well, with hypergamy being what it is, as Lolknee says, it’s much better for the women in your life to think you’re ‘totally fucking perfect.’ Frame, and female-to-male respect, is extremely brittle in the early stages of an interaction. Once you've banged a girl a few times, or she's become your girlfriend then yes of course she is going to give you a little more latitude. A little. But early on, especially in big Western cities, if you make one mistake then you're screwed. Once she has you in her sights as a potential beta then it's practically impossible for you to recover the frame. Even if you do end up sleeping with her the sex will most likely be lacklustre and your continued engagement filled with drama.

Mistakes

Am I painting women unreasonably as unforgiving here? Well, the truth is that they can be, particularly in the early stages with men they've just met. When you think about it, this is only natural. She naturally wants to attract the best quality mate that she can (this is the function of hypergamy) and therefore if she perceives that you might not be everything your approach suggested you were, then there's a good chance she's going to drop you, or at least put you into the 'provider' box, one that you might be keen not to inhabit.

The problem is that mistakes happen, even for the best of us. An example. I recently went on a second date with a cute English girl I'd met in London through day game. The first date had gone well—drinks and a visit to Winter Wonderland, the annual Christmas amusement park we have here in Hyde Park. The vibe had been good between us and we'd made out. I'd tried to get her to come back to my place but it was a Sunday night and so not ideal, so I was perfectly happy to wait for our next meeting.

This didn't occur until after Christmas (incidentally, the Christmas break is like a nuclear bomb going off at the end of every year for those into the game. Suddenly cities are wastelands, no-one's around for a fortnight and organising dates is nigh-on impossible). We arranged to meet for drinks on a Friday night but when Friday rolled around I was extremely tired after my week at work and so wasn't particularly on form. I arranged to meet her at a place that was fairly remote, which was a bit of a buzzkill.

Worst of all, though, when she turned she was already drunk, having been out with a crowd of workmates. This meant that the sweet-tempered girl I had met before Christmas was now surly and suspicious. She also expected me to carry the conversation. Being knackered, and annoyed with her for being drunk (I don't drink alcohol, so it was doubly annoying for me) I wasn't inspired and so the talk was stilted and frankly dull.

After we'd finished our drinks I watched her walk off into the night. I then took out my phone and deleted her number.

Just Move On

What mistakes did I make on that date? I probably shouldn't have arranged to meet her on a Friday. I should have chosen a venue that was more central. I should have swallowed my annoyance and made a bit more effort with the chat. Perhaps, having realised she was drunk, I should have excused myself a lot earlier than I did. But I didn't, and a combination of these errors plus a sudden, barely tangible lack of connection between us meant that she—in my assessment—lost respect for me. Suddenly I was no longer the charming guy who'd stopped her on the subway and had been so witty on WhatsApp. Now I was the guy who'd taken her on a rather flat date. Trust me, that is not the guy I want to be for any woman.

Now, would the interaction with her have been salvageable? Possibly, yes. She was attracted to me, that much I knew—we had made out several times over that second evening. It is likely that, had I left things a few days and then contacted her anew I could have reinvigorated her desire and had another shot. But why would I want to do that? Why fight an uphill battle with some girl who turns up drunk to dates when I live in a city with a population of 8.6m, some of them extremely hot?

Even Just A Sense Of Abundance Allows You To Next With Abandon

Years ago, things would have been different. I would have been on the phone to that girl trying to get her out again, justifying the flat night and doing everything I could to get the notch. Today, thankfully, I can't be bothered. Today, if a girl lets me down, or if I mess something up causing her to think less of me, I simply walk away and develop another prospect instead.

There's actually something intensely freeing about clearing the decks, deleting dead phone numbers and looking forward to the future instead. You need to have a modicum of faith to do it—faith in your ability, faith that, yes, you will meet another girl just as hot down the line. But when you acquire that faith then nexting unsuitable girls frees you up for sex and relationships with better ones, clears your mind of drama and shame and gives you back control of your dating life. So why not go through your phone today and get deleting some of those burned-out old numbers?

Want to find out how to attract a steady stream of beautiful girls? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter.

Read More: 5 Things I Learned From My English Friend With Benefits

3 Online Moneymaking Strategies You Should Avoid

February 1, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

The internet is only going to continue to grow over the coming years. Men have dreams and fantasies of just a laptop and a beach full of stunning Brazilian women, with an endless supply of money coming in from passive income to foot the bill.

The problem is that there is a lot of bad information out there. Many people are out to sell their $5,000 online entrepreneur course and will sell every one of your dreams coming true if you invest in them. I'll be the first to admit: I don't know everything. But after three years of trying various endeavors online, I've finally found a system that works well for me. That's not to say it won't work for you, and no—I don't have some super duper course that gives you all my secrets.

With that being said, in addition to what has worked, I've also found many things that haven't. I've also found that there are some ways of making money online that I wouldn't touch with a ten-foot pole. So before you book your apartment on the beaches of Rio, or in the center of Bangkok's nightlife to bounce Thai women home—make sure you read this whole article.

1. Daytrading

In the span of the last two years I've seen no less than three friends undertake this task and end up having to return to the corporate world.

The reason isn't because the trading itself is technical. Far from the opposite, actually. Even the two whom I'd consider to be "non-technical" people said the actual trading itself isn't difficult. The charts look like monstrosities at first, but quickly become manageable. The programs themselves are not much more difficult to learn than your average middle-end to advanced office software.

What seems to get everyone is the emotions involved. Losing $500 suddenly turns into $5,000 because it's not easy to just walk away from losing $500. The end result is continuing to go further down the rabbit hole rather than just walking away (for the day).

The other emotion that's easy to get wrapped up: that you don't need much money. It's easy to think that you can easily make $30 a day and live in a cheap place like Ukraine. However, it only takes one mistimed move to send you into losing $30 instead.

I always had an interest in doing daytrading eventually, but the horror stories I've been hearing have made me want to forget this. I'd much rather put a bit of money in to a mutual fund (or even BitCoin) from time to time rather than dedicating my days to the ups and downs of the market.

2. Blogging

Seems a bit hypocritical considering I'm now making a full-time living off my own site. With that being said, I attribute the financial success of my own work to many things.

1. Dedication—posting every single day, even as a one-man shop.
2. Time—I've been doing it for over three years, and didn't really make any money for the first 2+.
3. Brand—putting my face out there made a huge difference.
4. Luck—simple as that.
5. Stubbornness—I frankly probably should haven given up sooner. I was lucky that I enjoyed doing it for free. Many other bloggers who were "up-and-coming" with me two years ago are now nowhere to be found.

It's just the difficulty of blogging as a whole. The frustration. The days, weeks, months where you get fewer page views than your dog's Instagram.

With that being said, I think everyone should have a website. I think everyone should practice writing. I also think small niche sites are a low time and cost investment that can result in a nice little piece of web real estate. And if they don't pan out, you can at least get the experience of writing, design, and general business sense that will give you a leg up down the road.

3. Freelancing (Long Term)

Here's one I'm torn on. I do think that freelancing is the way to go, starting out. If you have $5,000 in the bank, no job, and want to move abroad—cool. You probably should start by freelancing, and not planning to build a passive income system before you run out of cash. That's a lot of pressure and it may not be realistic in six months.

However, many people leave their corporate hellholes and become freelancers. Sure, they have a much more flexible life, but ultimately nearly everyone I meet who is freelancing has more negative than positive to say about it. I think freelancing is a great way to start and the money is guaranteed. Someday though, it's likely you'll burn out of it or hate it as much as you did your corporate job.

The one huge upside to freelancing: retaining clients. If you can get just a few clients who love you and want to pay you long-term to write, or maintain their website, you're potentially in a great situation. You don't have to take on the biggest time sink (finding the work) of freelancing. And you have guaranteed money. You can use that spare time to build the passive income streams that we all dream of.

Bonus Tip: If you end up going this route and do the conventional UpWork or Fiverr route, keep in mind that the beginning part is going to suck. It's a numbers game, just like online dating. It will likely take you 20-25 proposals to get one measly job. Until you have 5-10 jobs (and feedback) done, you're just going to be working for peanuts. Accept it as getting your foot in the door much like an intern. It will get better after that.

Closing Thoughts

Every time I do a private consultation with someone, many come in to that consultation with a common belief that making money online is really hard. That's because there is truly so much bad information on the internet. It's just information overload, people have no idea where to start. It's not difficult, per se. With that being said, a lot of it is just a matter of putting in the work. If you want to quit your 9-5 because you don't want to work 8 hours a day—forget it.

Making money online, at first, is going to take at least those hours, or more. The nice part about it is that you can do it spurts. Work 14 hours a day for week, and the just a couple the next. It's all up to you. Over time, you can reduce those hours as you have more authority, retainer clients, or passive income. Starting out though, there really is no shortcut to just putting in the work.

To learn more about online business and web design, check out Troublesome Solutions. For more travel and nomadic life, check out my niche site (a good example of an online business I would pursue), Eastern European Travel.

Read More: 5 Lessons I Learned Moving From Offline To Online Business

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

4 Words To Start Fighting The Left's Orwellian Rhetoric

February 1, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Words have tremendous power, especially when it comes to the political landscape. Buzz words are thrown around, opponents are labeled as following a certain ideology, and the second that someone thinks you're a "Conservative," or a "Liberal," they automatically assume a whole host of things about you as a human being.

The Left has been beating us at the semantics game for the past decade or so—they expertly use vague terms and words with multiple meanings so that they can weasel their way around logic by sneakily choosing whichever definition they see fit depending on the situation. Men, I propose that it's time we start taking into consideration just how important words are.

I would like to implore the men of Return Of Kings to start using the following words, for several reasons:

- Using these words will eliminate at least 50% of all conflicts
- Leftists won't be able to twist our meanings anymore
- Our neomasculinity movement will gain more credibility

Just by using a few, well-selected words, I believe that we will drastically increase our ability to convince others of our opinions, and fend off most of the vicious semantics games that Leftists play.

1. "Misandry" in Place of "Feminism"

For far too long, have men in the manosphere used the word “feminism,” when really they’re referring to third wave feminism, or modern college campus feminism. Just this simple little word is, perhaps, the reason why so many women are vehemently against the manosphere.

Upon hearing that we don’t support “feminism,” what does the average American think?

- That we hate women
- That we don’t think women should be allowed to own property
- That we don’t want women to have any rights
- That we want to “oppress” women
- That we’re “manipulative pickup artists“

What they don’t realize is that we’re talking about neo-feminism, which is an entirely different animal. The ideologues and proponents of neo-feminism have consistently shown us that they hate men, and want us to become castrated, weak little boys, who can be thrown into jail over a mere accusation. Most people, upon hearing what we ACTUALLY believe, would probably agree with us, or at least hear us out.

Just by using the term misandry, when it is appropriate, we’re clarifying our opinions. Most people don’t even know that there’s more than one type of feminism, so just by using the word neo-feminism, we’re automatically exposing them to a crucial distinction between actual early 1900’s feminism, and modern day safe-space, “rape culture” feminism.

2. “Regressive Left” in Place of “Liberalism”

It's time that we call the "progressive left," what they really are—regressive. They claim that they want equality, but what they really want is for everyone who disagrees with them to have their rights revoked. Obviously they don't say this, but if you observe the policies that they advocate and put into place, it becomes abundantly clear. The common rhetorical games that the "regressive left" plays, are:

- Calling you a racist, if you like Trump's immigration policies
- Calling you a sexist, for pointing out facts (such as how the wage gap is a myth)
- Calling you hateful, simply because you disagree with them

The problem is, however, plenty of liberals do not in fact use these low-blow tactics—yet any time you say that you don't like "Leftism," you're immediately ostracizing half of the population which tends to vote liberally. By stating the term "regressive left," you're making it very clear that your issue isn't necessarily with moderate liberalism (although it very well may be), but that your main gripe is with hyper-leftism.

This simple distinction will make people more willing to hear our opinions—in a world where being "progressive," is lauded as a virtue, labeling a group as being "regressive," will immediately get social support. By using the term "regressive left," not only are we speaking in a way that's politically correct (because nobody wants to be regressive), but we're calling them out for what they are.

3. "Pro-American" in Place of "Anti-Immigration"

If you ever take some time to look at the prefixes that people use to clarify their opinions, you'll find that there's immense power in simply saying that you're "pro" whatever, and that your opponent is "anti" whatever. Most people are completely retarded, so any time they hear "anti" something, they assume you're a horrible person.

It doesn't matter if what you're against is a bad thing—just the fact that you put "anti" in front of something is like a buzz word. The same goes for pro. When you put the prefix "pro" in front of something, people automatically assume that your cause is just. It's high time that we start using these two little prefixes to our advantage.

From now on, anyone who wants to open the borders to violent immigrants and ISIS members is anti-American. No, they're not pro-immigration, they're anti-American. And us? No, no, we're not anti-immigration. We're pro-American. This subtle difference in framing the discussion entirely changes the outcome, because by saying that we're pro-American (which we are), the debate isn't so much about why we "hate refugees," in the words of our opponents, but rather about why we value American interests first.

We're not anti-neo-feminist, we're pro-masculinity. We're not anti-Hillary, we're pro-Trump. We're not anti-immigration, we're pro-American. We're not anti-gun control, we're pro-gun rights. We're not anti-censorship, we're pro-freedom.

4. "Criminal Aliens" in Place of "Illegal Immigrants"

To be honest, it's completely moronic that the Left would view these things as being different, but alas, the regressive left (see what I did there) is, in fact, completely moronic. Trump has been using the term "Criminal Aliens," in place of "Illegal Immigrants," recently, and for good reason.

As soon as the Left hears the term "illegal immigrants," for some crazy reason, they have some image of a poor, innocent refugee, who's just desperately trying to escape his war-torn home. And while this is often times the case, as we've seen with the "refugee" crisis in Europe, most of these "refugees," are anything, but. Most of them are fighting-aged men who've been raised in a barbaric homeland, where throwing acid on a woman's face is a normal penalty for exposing her ankles.

By saying the term "criminal aliens," we immediately bring up the issue: they've committed the crime of illegal immigration. This is why they should not be allowed to vote, and it's why they should be deported—they have committed a crime. Again, I cannot emphasize how ridiculous it is that we should have to say this, but for some reason the Leftist's brain can't seem to process the idea of illegal immigration. Hopefully, by using slightly different rhetoric, we can get through to them and make a good case for our beliefs.

Read More: Words Like "Man" And "Chairman" Are Being Censored On College Campuses

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

Shia Labeouf's Butthurt Liberal "Performance" Gets Ruined By Shitlords

February 1, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Following Trump's election and the biggest meltdown in Hollywood since Moloch's yearly mass was replaced by the Academy awards, hirsute clown and Hollywood simpleton Shia Labeouf tried to heal his blistered liberal anus by gathering other like-minded bitter snowflakes in order to yell together "he will not divide us" at a wall, while a camera livestreams them 24/7, thinking that it will magically alter the reality of the situation.

Frail zombies reciting five words, lead by Guru China LaBoob. No arguments or solution. All of that autistic screeching while facing a wall. Needless to say, it did not go as planned.

Labeouf, Hollywood's Globalistically Modified Oaf

I am Jack's complete lack of surprise

Discovering quickly that his acting does not draw crowds, our malleable PC figurehead tried for years to get the media's attention at any cost (often resulting in global laughter). Hearing the swan song of his dull career, he decided to play all in and stole the last good idea he saw on TV: building a big wall.

The unhealthy obsession for attention among males is often symptomatic of an attention-deprived, chaotic childhood. I don't have to look far in Labeouf's case. Without research, just by looking at his name (feminine, brutally non-conformist) I knew that his parents were dysfunctional or perhaps did not want a child in the first place.

Further research confirmed my first hypothesis. In Labeouf's words, he was "raised by two broke hippies" a Jewish mother, who was an actress (attention whore) and a "heroin addict" Cajun father that he accompanied to "Anonymous Alcoholics" meetings (irresponsible, dreadful role model). He has been evolving in the acting cesspool since he was 10.

A shitposting anthology

The word spread rapidly on the Internet and shitlords came in droves to crash his livestream. The liberals, with no original ideas and often not having Guru Shia to lead the chorus, left the spot free for any /pol/ boy passing by to claim it as his personal no-filter shitposting station. So far, we have seen them:

[image]
Happily displaying Pepe signs and shirts

- Questioning globalist sacred idols and wanting to educate Labeouf on the Holocaust
- Reading bits of Mein Kampf for the camera

When the triggerers-in-chief rocked up and started playing their music, the lobotomised Daily Beast clientele just danced along catchy tunes like Shadilay and other 4Chan/Alt-right anthems like Serbia Strong (A.K.A "Remove Kebab"), a nationalist song from the Bosnian War period known for its anti-Muslim and anti-NATO undertones.

Non-white /pol/sters Jackie4Chan and Jihadi Jezus organised a satirical "Honorary Aryan Dance Party" before savaging the Left's double standards when it comes to freedom of expression and victim hierarchy regarding "minorities."

[image]
They also attempted to "awaken Kek/Pepe, the Egyptian God of Fitness and Dankness."

Other anti-liberal pranksters turned their soporific mantra into another jewel: "He will nut inside us".

The zombies were too busy to notice that a right-wing octopus turned the place into the

Museum of Kek

One wandering troll made Labeouf believe that he had Down's syndrome, got closer to the camera and even lead the chant, precious snowflakes obviously cheering in the same demented tone.

Among all those "Praise Kek!" and extreme provocations, the shitlords contrary to Jihad Labarf and his assault midgets remained pacific and did not physically threaten anyone.

A poster boy that epitomises the violence of the left

Someone looks divided

Our fragile snowflake was easily baited into using physical violence when a random passer-by casually told him that Hitler did nothing wrong.

It looked more like a toddlers' spasm during a tantrum than a real punch but contrary to the appearances, Shia is a grown man and therefore broke the law. He then plays the victim when he gets nicked.

He thumps his chest and threatens physically guys smaller than him, getting in their faces or sharing messages that sound slightly divisive like "you are surrounded. Now, be nice".

But he is nowhere to be seen when Big Tony and his mate from Astoria, who walk and talk like men that have seen their fair share of action, come and drop more truth in five minutes at Beta HQ than those ephete airheads in a week.

Discovering that his girly love taps were not sufficient to repel the evil Trump supporters, Shia decided that instead of providing valid political arguments, the best way to win the struggle was to kiss and lick the face of his challengers. Probably inspired by Madonna's methods to get votes, he might soon propose to perform fellatio on political opponents, in true cuck fashion.

Quel futur pour cette tête d'ardoise et son "art"?

[image]

A public livestream is by definition uncensored and unedited, which is the opposite of any modern Mainstream media platform. If you go live and want everyone to have access to it, it will get out of hand a one point or the other. Between the clueless Shemale Ladouche's followers and the constant joy of shitlords shattering their safe spaces, we witness the first livestream window into modern politics, half shitlord central, half human zoo for sore losers.

It backfired from the first day and SJWs will eventually get tired, due to their short attention spam and their lack of will. They will just desert Sharia Labumph as soon as Twitter gets bored of him or they find another Hollywood bobblehead that is a hotter topic. Whereas dedicated shitlords will never get bored of triggering manginas to the verge of tears.

The three only positive elements I see in this idiotic initiative:

- Leftists staying there idle instead of burning cars, assaulting citizens or infecting the world with their presence
- Endless laughter with constant real-life shitposting, red pill bombs and liberals triggered
- Shita Labed away from the studios and screens for at least four years

Read More: Trump Presidency Creates Mountains Of Salt From Butthurt Liberals

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Globalists Strike Back Against Trump

February 2, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

During the election, the globalist elites that run the US (and most European nations) threw everything they had to stop Donald Trump. Despite an unprecedented media blitz of every sort of lie, Trump soundly defeated his globalist opponent. It was stunning victory for the American people. But only the naïve believed that the deep state would surrender so easily. We are already seeing the first signs of a plan of the globalist elites to crush Trump and return full control of the United States to their hands.

The "Muslim Ban" that never was

As soon as Trump was sworn in, he quickly moved to fulfill his campaign promises. The number of executive orders he signed in his first week was breathtaking. Anthony Cumia captured the sentiment in a tweet: "In under a week the Trump presidency has me wondering what the fuck we're all those other presidents doing?" Every executive order was criticized, but the real ire was unleashed when Trump signed a temporary travel ban from seven countries.

The Left immediately went into action. Soros-funded protestors clogged up airports in several cities and the media reported that this was a "Muslim ban." Matt Walsh, who writes for the Blaze, explained why calling it a Muslim ban was disingenuous:

> A "Muslim ban" would be a ban on Muslims. A ban on Muslims would be a law that prevents Muslims from entering the United States based solely on the fact that they are Muslim. No such law exists. No such Executive Order was issued. Trump's policy temporarily prevents citizens from only 7 Muslim majority countries from coming into the country, which leaves about 43 Muslim majority countries unaffected.

Trump didn't even name the seven countries in the Executive Order. He merely referenced the Obama Administration's list of "countries of concern." And to put things into perspective, the travel ban only lasts for four months—it is not a perpetual ban. The moderate nature of the travel ban did not stop the globalists from hyperventilating. Of course, their favorite trope is to compare Trump to Hitler, implying that the travel ban was the start of another Holocaust.

> First they came for the Danish archaeologists, and I did not speak out … https://t.co/9I0LAyvza6
>
> — David Frum (@davidfrum) January 31, 2017

> Just posted: How to Build an Autocracy, our latest cover story by @davidfrum https://t.co/4MO161vEEn pic.twitter.com/BjqBdOpchb
>
> — The Atlantic (@TheAtlantic) January 31, 2017

> "Everyone suffered in the Holocaust, including the Jewish people." – Reince Priebus
>
> Prelude to changing school textbooks?
>
> — ian bremmer (@ianbremmer) January 29, 2017

> I've heard language like that before… in the 1930s. https://t.co/RZDP9Y8Svs
>
> — Max Boot (@MaxBoot) January 31, 2017

The outrage that was unleashed at the "Muslim ban" is being used by the globalists as a wedge to attack Trump. The globalists are furious that Trump, in keeping his campaign promises, has issued an Executive Order announcing the end poorly negotiated, multi-country trade deals, and Trump's intention to replace them with trade deals with individual countries. Although this is the big step away from globalization, it is hard to get the public motivated about trade deals. Instead, the globalists have chosen the travel ban because they can manipulate heart strings with photos of dead children or sob stories of people who experienced injury because of Trump's travel ban.

Planning a coup

The news media is deliberately misrepresenting everything Trump does. The news media claimed that Trump's election was illegitimate because of "Russian hacking" although there has never been any solid evidence produced to implicate Russia. With regard to the travel ban, the Washington Post law blog abandoned its usual scholarly, circumscribed approach and went so far as to accuse Trump of putting travel bans on countries where his company does not have business dealings and called it an impeachable offense.

When high ranking State Department offered their resignation after the new President was sworn in—standard operating procedure whenever a new president is elected—the news media reported that it was a protest walk out to make it look like government had no faith in Trump. Trump's appointment of his top advisor, Steve Bannon, to the White House National Security Council—something that is well within the President's power—has been called "Soviet-style political power play." The reporting is so clearly wrong and unhinged it makes one ask: What is going on here?

The answer is that the news media, which is owned by globalists, is trying to de-legitimize President's Trump. Their goal is to lay the ground work for an impeachment, and if that doesn't work, a violent overthrow of Trump. An impeachment is a trial, but unlike a criminal trial, where the judges are supposed to be dispassionate enforcers of the law, the impeachment of a president is a political process. Therefore, it should not be possible to impeach a Republican president if Republicans hold a majority in the Senate. But the Republican Party that Trump heads has traitors within its midst. These traitors, men like Lindsay Graham and John McCain, have put themselves into the service of the globalist elite. These GOP traitors stand at the ready to undermine the democratically elected President and replace him with Vice President Pence, who would be easier to control than Trump.

Still, it would be difficult to remove a popular president using impeachment. And Trump's approval rating currently sits at 60%. As long as the people stand behind Trump, it will be unlikely that a majority of GOP Senators would be willing to risk their cushy positions to remove Trump. That's why the Left, and their GOP allies, have a backup plan—violent overthrow of the Trump administration via a coup. That's why there have been large, well-planned, well-financed protests virtually every day from the moment Trump was inaugurated. And that is the reason why the media has worked so hard to label Trump supporters as "Nazis" and Trump advisor Steve Bannon as a white nationalist—it is all part of a project to make it acceptable to use violence against Trump supporters or even the Trump administration.

In truth, the globalists are in uncharted territory. Their usual methods of control—buying off politicians, guiding the narrative using the news media, and making the public docile with entertainment and fake guilt—all failed when the voters ignored them and voted for Trump. Thus, the globalists are in the process of trying different strategies in regaining power. For them, nothing is off the table.

Conclusion

Trump's power as president comes not from his personal magnetism, but from the fact that he struck a chord with a large group of voters. As long as the voters stick with Trump, he will be able to withstand the globalists. While it is important for us to focus on their own careers, families, and fitness, we can't neglect the political realm. If we do, we cede the ground to the globalists. And by the way, keep in shape, train martial arts, and exercise your 2nd Amendment rights. We could be in for a bumpy ride.

Be sure to check out Michael's book Staying Married in a Degenerate Age.

Read More: 4 Examples That Show The Globalists Are Losing Ground

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Make Fertility Great Again

February 2, 2017 | by Rik Storey | Link | Original Link

Should old ladies be having children outside of divine assistance? Former director of London's Serpentine Galleries, Dame Julia Peyton-Jones, has become a mother via surrogacy, aged 64, prompting the country to question whether such a thing is ethical or even lawful.

As a strong libertarian, I believe an Englishman's home is his castle, but at these late stages of life, nature leaves a woman's womb as nothing but a barren ruin. It makes sense to question how the child will fare when their support network has also come to ruin, if only on behalf of the child's potential estate, let alone for the effect this will have on society.

The real question is not why older women would want another woman to carry their baby to fruition. Perhaps it is just a valedictory pretence of vitality by those who bought the lie that every woman could and should have it all—postmenstrual howling at the moon, long after the biological clock grew silent. Rather, we must ask why we Europeans have '[lost] the will to replace ourselves', as Prof. William Reville recently put it. How can we end this revolt against nature or voluntary 'demographic extinction'? Of course, overpowering nature is how we come to not only survive but dominate and flourish on this planet, but ignoring scientific facts and natural laws in the face of expiration is the direct antithesis; it is simply degenerate.

More women are having their children over 50!

Sadly, Gramsci and Lukacs' theory that Western culture must be destroyed for communism to emerge has been tested by leftists and neocons since the 1960's, when cultural Marxism came to dominate the cultural scene. From political policy to popular writing, half of Western populations have bought the idea that white procreation or even any sense of identity is about the worst thing imaginable. Whilst celebrities increasingly promote having children over the age of fifty, every week, another article is published by some young, damaged goods or other, trying to convince the world (by which I mean herself) that she's just fine without a family. The latest I read, from the ironically named Ms. Chatel, presents the usual platitudes—children will ruin your life—but, apparently of even greater importance, they could increase mankind's carbon footprint.

Yet, the fact is housewives are the happiest women around and I imagine their husbands are happiest too. Furthermore, traditional families are a great benefit to society as well; they are our most powerful bulwark against high crime rates. For a healthy society, we can only conclude that women at Peyton-Jones' age should ideally be grandmothers. Grandparents are a valuable pillar of society – the more time they spend with their grandchildren, the better it is for their development and thus, the greater benefit we all receive. Can we really be surprised that this is the case when this is how we have evolved? (N.B. There's a good reason other familial structures haven't survived.)

So, the closer we get to the natural order, the more sustainable our society becomes. If this were not the case, men would not have evolved to find youth so attractive and women would not have evolved to age sooner and worse than men, focusing our mating habits towards those stronger, healthier eggs. Of course, women age sooner but live longer because they do not readily outlive their usefulness as grandmothers. The reason we have evolved to find Peyton-Jones' act so taboo, however, is that she will readily outlive her usefulness as a mother; to display this as acceptable is a direct threat to the society our children must inherit. The threat cultural Marxism poses must, therefore, be stopped.

The natural order is the goal of all Traditionalists

But, as I said, I'm a libertarian; so, what about individual liberty? Well, of course, if you don't like the natural order of things, that's fine. By all means, go and raise a family of twelve in a highly radioactive environment at the age of 80. I will wish you the very best of luck and, what's more, I will politely disguise the futility I feel in doing so. But don't ask me to value what you do or to remain silent when you set about proselytizing society to your bizarre ideas. In order for my children and grandchildren (if you're capable of thinking that far ahead) to enjoy the liberties I desire for myself, we're going to need a sustainable environment in which they can flourish. And the purposes for which you propose we use our medical advancements don't cut the mustard.

Instead, I propose we use our great scientific advancements to restore and enhance the natural order, for the benefit of us all. But how can we usher in a Spring, rather than the coming demographic Winter?

Could positive screening make child-rearing more popular?

In an interview I conducted with Prof. Richard Lynn, he suggested that states should stop imposing degenerating policies, promoting anything other than the traditional. However, he noted that this has only ever had a negligible effect in swaying the opinions of those Europeans who will not replace themselves. What is needed is neo-eugenics, that is, private services provided by the market, e.g. designer babies.

According to Lynn, such services could provide both an attractive and efficient way to improve demographics and even raise the average IQ of our populations by a standard deviation in just one generation. If the state were so inclined, it could promote the use of such services through subsidies, assistance or tax breaks; thus, encouraging those who were breeding to replacement levels and using these services to select preferable genes for their children, in much the same way that IVF screening currently allows us to avoid relatively undesirable qualities.

So, I ask you again, should grannies be having children? If you like civilization, you won't love this becoming normal, that's for sure. Whether it is through legislation or frowning upon this as a social taboo, this degeneracy must certainly be countered by the promotion and protection of traditional families and the freeing of the market to make the prospect of having children far more attractive to young Westerners. Let's explore every avenue to secure the future of Western civilization with the same vigour that was used to bring it to ruins.

Read More: How Mass Immigration Is Driven By Female Consumerism And Low Fertility

Rik Storey
One Englishman promoting the great libertarian values and sociobiological qualities of the West. Visit my page, That Libertarian Chap, here - https://www.facebook.com/thatlibertarianchap

7 Reasons To Never Date A Girl Who Attends A Protest

February 2, 2017 | by Mark Derian | Link | Original Link

When a girl yearns to lose herself in a crowd, it indicates psychological issues no man wants in a girlfriend. As such, the only usefulness of the Women's March—besides it giving fat girls exercise—is it shows us which girls to never date. Specifically, here's why it's a deal breaker if a girl attends a protest.

1. She's in a bubble

"Thanks. Great political discussion."

A girl who protests is exceedingly angry at the world. This level of anger can only be cultivated in an echo chamber. If she isolates from other people then it's an indicator she isolates her consciousness from her latent emotions, which leads to neuroticism you'd inevitably need to handle at some point. A healthy girl wouldn't be too angry one way or another, and would rather connect with friends than lose herself in a mob.

2. She consumes too much news

We're healthy to the extent we focus on what we can control and put aside that which we don't control. A girl who has a sense of what it means to be happy wouldn't be online reading news, the only purpose of which is to stoke her fear and anger. The most feminine girls I've known have come from different backgrounds, but they all had one thing in common: limited media consumption.

3. She has too much baggage

We attend protests for one reason and one reason only: to cover up psychological issues we cannot manage on our own. We fabricate an impending social change because the real reason for our march is horrifying. In this sense, treat a girl who goes to a protest like a girl who has an addiction to pain killers. To anyone who isn't in pain, vicodin doesn't feel good—it feels like a low-grade death.

4. She doesn't read

I appreciate a girl who reads—not xoJane but books. Reading indicates the ability to have and express thoughts, not opinions. It indicates the desire to learn, not consume. It indicates an interest in museums, not night clubs. It indicates the ability to sit and be okay with yourself, not get a hit from the world's most powerful benzo—the self-righteousness of the mob.

5. She lacks self-awareness

It's only when we begin to understand our issues that we can manage them in pro-social ways like cultivating a skill, being honest, and creating healthy friendships. Therefore, a girl who protests is unable to sit down and think about her psychological issues. Relationships are difficult enough when people have a grasp on who they are and what motivates them.

6. She's anti-social

Part of being a socially-adjusted human is to understand other people have different views and to still be civil. This requires the minimum empathy to walk around in another's shoes. We may indeed be as correct as we think we are, but listening to others quells the urge to act out.

7. She has low-quality friends

A destructive relationship is like two crabs in a bucket, and a million woman march is a million crabs in a bucket. It's a validation station of each other's obesity and loneliness. A girl without healthy friendships is like a man without a purpose—she cannot be trusted, even for a woman.

Conclusion

When one person stomps and screams like a toddler, it's a temper tantrum. When a thousand people stomp and scream, it's a protest. Let's not confuse these tantrums as being intelligent, progressive, or caring. Instead, let's call them what they are: unhappy people who mistake strong emotions for truth.

Read More: 8 Reasons To Date A Former Fat Girl

Mark Derian
Mark Derian is a graduate student in psychology. follow him on Twitter

What The University Of California Berkeley Riot Means For America

February 2, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Antifascists and other leftists shut down Milo's speech on Wednesday night by lighting fires, attacking bystanders with poles, and throwing rocks. I did a video describing what happened and explaining what is likely to come next.

Read Next: Is Milo Yiannopoulos Becoming A Liberal To Maintain His Celebrity Profile?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

It’s Time To Flip The Script On Frivolous Divorce

February 3, 2017 | by Jonathan Castle | Link | Original Link

So, you’ve been frivorced. When you were out slaying dragons, you knew you could always find warm companionship back home in your cozy foxhole with your, ahem, beautiful and loyal wife. ‘It’s you and me babe against the world!’ Right?

But then the unexpected happens. You start taking on fire from inside the foxhole. It’s like a scene in the horror movie when the operator tells you that the homicidal call came from inside your house. Now you’re facing attacks from two sides—from the dragons and your wife who, come to think of it, you haven’t had decent sex with in a year or longer. And actually, she’s not really that beautiful.

She may ambush you with papers, catching you totally off guard to optimize her exit strategy. Or she may passive-aggressively just stop being a wife until you’re forced to drop her dead weight (which, her hamster says, absolves her from any guilt). Either way, you know the next several years are going to be a crap-fest.

Where am I going to live? Can I keep the house? Is she going to ream me financially? Am I going to be on the hook for alimony? For how long? Is she going to accuse me of abuse? Is she going to try to take my kids away? If she does, will I have to pay child support and not even be able to see them? How much is this lawyer costing me?

It's a lot to take on, especially if you mostly believed the gynocentric pile we've been force-fed since forever. But, cheer up. I'm here to tell you that frivorce can be the best thing that ever happened to you.

First Thing First, Survive

Your world was dumped upside down. Know that it will take time for your brain plasticity—your thought patterns and expectations—to reshape to your new reality. So here are some quick pointers to get you through this phase.

First, accept and mourn what you've lost: financial security, a common history with an ex-friend, a lot of wasted sacrifices and an idyllic future with an intact, nuclear family. A proverb says, "weeping may last through the night, but joy comes with the morning." No weeping, no joy.

Two, lift weights. Walk. Run. Bike. Swim. Hike. Whatever! Just get your body moving and occupied. It relives stress and anger and helps you sleep.

Three, if you've neglected male friendships like most married men, it's time to make some. Male companionship is good for the soul. Your posse will support you and show you how to have fun again. And you can return the favor some day as a new soul is born out of the matrix.

Flipping the Script

As you come out of the post-divorce funk, you question everything. You believed so many lies that blew up in your face that you don't believe shit anymore. And that's good, because you have to leave the past behind and grab hold of this opportunity to shift from a blue-pill life in support of the Feminine Imperative to a masculine life that serves your interests.

Time

You will have a lot of free, unmolested time that you never had being married. Use it to build the masculine life you want. But you have to do some real soul-searching here. Ask yourself what really matters to you? What do you really enjoy? What brings you deep fulfillment? And where do you want to be in 10, 20, 30 years?

Your goal is to build a life that is full and balanced, that makes time for work, family, friends, hobbies and especially kids if you've got them. Build relationships with your buds. They will last a lifetime. A woman… maybe not so much.

Tag-teamed by The Man … and The Woman.

Money

Oh Lord! How hard have husbands worked to satisfy ridiculous bitch demands…. bigger diamonds… kitchen upgrades… houses we couldn't afford… expensive cars… and on and on and on. None of this shit matters to us, but we foolishly enslaved ourselves to provide it.

No more! Now, you have total control over your own resources. And believe me, you will have different priorities. For myself, I wanted off the work-work-work, consume-consume-consume treadmill. I wanted less stress, more freedom and an earlier retirement. Win, win, win. This is the path of minimalism whereas wives always and everywhere are expert maximalists. She wants you yoked up for life—bringing her diamonds from the salt mines until your heart gives out.

Yes indeed, Corporate America and your princess were riding you hard. You were a beast of burden enriching them both. Now it's time to turn the table. Do you have a job or role you don't really like, but kept because Princess? Screw it! Take the role that makes you happier. Are you stressed-out and anxious in a job that pays only a tad more? Screw it! Take a less stressful job. You don't have to be a corporate drone anymore because you aren't serving Woman. (See how Corporate America feeds and nourishes feminism to create their biggest and most mindless consumers? And how you were caught in the crossfire?)

I'm not saying abandon fulfillment in work. Far from it. But do it on your terms, brother.

Women

This is tricky and men take many paths here. Depending how blue-pill you were and how long you were married, I recommend taking a lot of time off from women. Women are going to try to suck you right back into their narrative before you can clear your head and build an integrated masculine life. Only after you are living it can you figure out where women fit in.

They will want marriage…you can bet on that. But you don't—at least not now. You just got out of one and it sucked. They will want to dominate your time. But that will eat into other relationships and hobbies that are important to you. They will want your money and support. But you were just financially screwed in the divorce.

No, going forward, women will have to fit into your frame. And more than anyone, you should be loath to ever give one woman power over you through marriage. Dating post-divorce is fantastic because you wield real power for the first time in a long time. It was so palpable to me—and so unlike the last years of a failing marriage. You can walk away from any relationship for any reason without cost. No lawyers! If you were a beta or greater beta in your marriage, you'll find it's a lot easier to be alpha when you have actual power.

And for the love of all that is holy! If you feel yourself falling back into the female script, reminisce a bit on your time in the county court system and with your divorce lawyer. Or look at your alimony and child support check. I've seen recently divorced men lurch right back into marriage as if they required a domineering woman to validate and order their lives.

Yeah, that's more like it.

Conclusion

Life threw you a curve. But you now have a great opportunity to flip the script. It will take some hard work and patience, but when you come out of it, you will be better, stronger and smarter. You will rethink and reorganize your work life. And you will know what you want – and don't want – from women. It all tastes like freedom.

Read More: How The Gender Script Was Flipped

Jonathan Castle
Jonathan swims against the current, deep under the surface of corporate America. A maverick by nature, he instinctively avoids herds - often to his detriment.

The Shame Of President Obama's Legacy

February 3, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

President Obama gave his farewell address in Chicago on January 10, 2016. President Trump took office 10 days later. The following are a few quotes from President Obama's 50 minute speech:

Lack of Vision

> If I had told you 8 years ago that America would reverse a great recession, reboot our auto industry, and unleash the longest stretch of job creation in our history… and secure the right to health insurance to another 20 million of our fellow citizens, if I had told you that, you might have said our sights were set a little too high. But that's what we did.

So, no one could have even IMAGINED a better health care answer than requiring millions to purchase overpriced and often practically useless high deductible policies from private for profit corporations? No one could imagine a system better than the one Mitt Romney and the Heritage Foundation created? We couldn't even "set our sights" at something higher?

You didn't land on the moon for the first time. You told people they had to send Blue Cross $3,500 in premiums every year, and let some 26-year-olds, who are mostly young and healthy, continue to receive the benefits of their parents' health policy. There are a lot of dissenting voices against the ACA even being a positive change, but to call it the best we could have even dreamed of is laughable.

Economic Woes

> Because of you, by almost every measure, America is a better place than when we started.

While it is possible to look at some misleading government data like the U3 unemployment rate or the nominal price of stock exchange indices, (unadjusted for the rampant $40 billion monthly Federal Reserve injections and money creation), real wages for Americans are down from 2009, when Obama took office. The data shows real incomes are around 4% lower than they were in 2009. Which means one could purchase 4% fewer goods and services. Far from improving, we have a ways to go before we reach the levels of the 1990s.

Moral Failure

There are some statistics that show some economic improvement. But even if "the economy" churns out widgets at a rate higher than it did when you took office, that measures only economics. How is the nation morally?

Record drone strikes, presidential extrajudicial kill lists, and continuation of torture, which had been wiped out as a mechanism of the state throughout every modern nation on the planet prior to 2000, all continued or increased.

What about the failing family? More single virginal Americans living with their parents than ever before? The majority of marriages failing? The fact that America has a teen birth rate over double that of Canada's, and 10 times that of some western European nations?

What about the increasing political correctness, the demagoguery of traditional sex roles and the attacks on masculinity? Frankly I don't care if my nation's GDP is 2% higher next year. In fact, I'm strongly considering making the decision that Roosh and many others have, to leave this land for a country with a much lower GDP, but better values, feminine women, and better quality of life.

America has continued to slip morally, and this is even more disturbing than the economic crisis we currently face.

Equal Opportunity

> "Our democracy won't work without a sense that everyone has economic opportunity… wages, incomes, and retirement accounts are rising again. Poverty is falling again."

Concerning wages, real wages are down (see above). Most working age people have economic opportunity. I may have more opportunity than others, because I have good genes, high IQ, chose to pursue college degrees, and made mostly good life decisions, including not knocking up or marrying women, saving a large portion of my income, and working steadily since my high school years.

Of course, we want to encourage those types of behaviors in society, so we should support a system that gives greater opportunities to those who make better decisions. But there is opportunity for all–there are plenty of entry level jobs that give people the opportunity to start from the same place I did.

Health insurance ≠ Health care

"Health care costs are rising at the slowest rate in 50 years."

Someone at the Medicare/Medicaid office didn't get the memo

Health care costs may be slowing (the above chart appears to show otherwise), but health insurance costs are up as much as 100% in a single year, and the IRS forces you to pay for a policy. If the claim of declining costs is true, it's only because many people cannot afford to see the doctor under Obamacare. The typical health insurance plan that taxpayers are forced to buy under Obamacare, has a $6,000+ premium, which means even though they are paying thousands of dollars a year for an insurance policy, it offers zero benefit unless you have a serious medical issue which costs more than around $10,000.

Doctor visits are still expensive, and the sick are likely choosing to forego doctor visits for non-emergency care, thus driving down the total "cost" of health care–doctors and hospitals receive less money because people can't afford to visit them unless the case is urgent. But that doesn't mean we are healthier as a nation.

Plan name	Monthly premium	Deductible	Max out-of-pocket	Total
HealthNet Bronze 60 HSP	$ 308.89	$ 6,000	$6,500	$10,206.68
Sharp Health Plan Bronze 60 HSA HMO Network 1	$ 311.63	$ 4,500	$6,500	$10,239.56
Anthem Blue Cross Bronze 60 HSA PPO	$ 323.17	$ 4,500	$6,500	$10,378.04
HealthNet Silver 70 HMO	$ 378.61	$ 2,250	$6,250	$ 10,793.32
HealthNet Gold 80 HMO	$ 435.62	$ 0	$6,200	$11,427.44
Sharp Health Plan Gold 80 HMO Network 1	$ 483.34	$ 0	$6,200	$12,000.08
Sharp Health Plan Platinum 90 HMO Network 1	$ 529.01	$ 0	$4,000	$10,348.12

Most health insurance plans only benefit a sick person with over $10,000 in annual health expenses

> "If anyone can put together a plan that is demonstrably better than the > improvements we've made to our health care system, that covers more people at less cost, I will publicly support it.

So expect an endorsement of Trump's health care plan by Obama shortly. While there is a lack of brainpower in Congress, and most representatives are bought and paid for, it's not hard for even a typical citizen to imagine a plan that could work better than the current system.

Racism

> "For white Americans, it means acknowledging that the effects of slavery and Jim Crow didn't just disappear in the 60s."

So when will they disappear? If citizens are given equal protection under the law, and have economic opportunity, then at what point does the treatment of their ancestors cease to affect them? I had some powerful and wealthy ancestors over 100 years ago, and can tell you any benefit from wealth, property, or even name recognition from them disappeared far before my parents were born.

If one examines immigrants, typically the language, culture, and customs of their home nation are all but gone by the third generation.

"This is racist and evil and wrong. Its sickening and I want everone to know I stand against such oprressive racism."

"Lol, this is so funny!"

A poor day laborer can begin digging ditches today and in 40 years his grandchildren will be as assimilated and Americanized as anyone else. This is why many such as myself aren't even interested in foreign women unless they were born abroad—if raised in the west, they forget their traditional ways and rapidly adopt the mannerisms, speech, body fat, and feminism of the culture.

Women's suffrage has been around only 100 years, and we are already facing fourth wave feminism. Look at the collective power that women hold in society, the economy, and politics today and reflect that they accomplished all that in only 100 years. Israel, with all its power and wealth, was established in 1948, and many of its founders escaped not slavery but forced evacuation of their homes and narrowly escaped death. And yet the ancient practice by less than 2% of Americans who owned slaves in the early 1800s is still a factor for modern blacks?

Israel built a desert land into one of the most powerful modern nations on the planet in less than 50 years. Women now control over 80% of household spending, and wield enormous political influence, just 100 years after gaining the right to vote, despite living in a violent raping land of microaggressions and triggering green frogs. How long will it take American blacks to overcome slavery, when only 5% of slaves were sent to America, slave importation was ended over 200 years ago, and all American slaves freed 150 years ago?

Military Adventurism

> "We have taken out tens of thousands of terrorists… Coalition against ISIL has taken away about half their territory"

This group, with a dubious history, didn't even exist when Obama took office. So until you take away all their territory, we're in a worse position than 8 years ago. Or by another metric, you created tens of thousands of enemies which were so violent and dangerous you had to kill them. How many more enemies are you leaving for the next administration to deal with?

Be The Change You Want To See

> "Protecting our way of life is not just the job of the military."

This is is spot on. The threat to America will not be from an invading army; indeed America has never faced a serious threat from war in its history since 1812. The problems with America cannot be solved by military troops; I'd argue they can only be exacerbated by more aggression and war. Instead, all our degeneracy and destruction is coming from within. And no organized force is fighting it.

Freedoms Are Great, Even When We Take Them

> "If the scope of freedom and respect for the rule of law shrinks around the world, the likelihood of war within and between nations increases. And our own freedoms will eventually be threatened.

Freedoms for Americans both at home and abroad are far less than they were 15 years ago. This is mostly due to our own governments restricting our rights and imposing additional laws and rules.

Continued Bashing of Russia and China

> "Rivals like Russia or China cannot match our influence around the world, unless we give up what we stand for, and turn ourselves into just a big country that bullies smaller neighbors"

Why must Russia and China be rivals or enemies? My personal view of Russia is that it is a European state with bright scientists, engineers, and a long history in art, music, and ballet, which is seeing a masculine and Christian revival. My personal view of China is that it is a great place to buy lots of things cheaply.

If they are enemies or rivals, it is because politicians make them so. While there are some cultural differences between the west and Asia, the constant verbal badgering of China will only embolden them to battle the west economically, and perhaps one day militarily. By contrast, Trump sees Russia as a strong leader and potential ally, and while being critical of some trade policies, "loves China."

As to the second point, what is America to the world if not a big country that bullies others? If America cared about the well being of its neighbors, perhaps it could assist in structural change with nearby Haiti, one of the poorest nations in the world. Instead, it runs multiple wars on far flung nations, determined to overthrow their political and social order and bring them a "democracy" they don't want, and then is surprised when the result of the popular vote is a Muslim ethnostate.

If America cared about strengthening its image and influence, why doesn't it help end the Syrian civil war, which is sending "refugees" all over Europe, causing multiple mass murders of peaceful European citizens, threatening the very future of these countries as peaceful, independent states? Instead, America came very close to going to war for the radical rebels in Syria that are the root of this problem.

Don't Rely On Politicians

The end of his speech was good, and he encourages people to not sit back and rely on politicians to fix problems, but to confront them ourselves.

> "Not just when there's an election, not just when your interest is at stake… If you disagree with someone on the internet, try talking with them. If something needs fixing, then lace up your shoes… "

Good advice, especially for the manosphere, as Trump is not going to solve all our problems. I'll be impressed if he can just stop things from further declining.

To all the party hacks, remember that criticism of someone who is a Democrat is not support of Republicans. I find distasteful things in some of Trump's speeches, and hope his feet are held to the fire, especially on civil liberties issues. But he will be a fresh change in many areas. Our best hopes?

1. An end to warmongering with Russia
2. Pushing back on politically correct speech
3. A return to reality – an end to invented gender pronouns, rape culture lies, and media lies

January 20th started a new era. Here's to new beginnings!

Read More: How The Washington DC Swamp Is Still A Threat To Donald Trump

Max Roscoe

is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

3 More Groundbreaking Books Written Before 1945

February 3, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

As said in a previous article, when it comes to politics and everything related, books written during the interwar period often stand out as the best reading. Before 1914, most essays tend to prefer prose or erudition to seriously tackling the issues they should ponder. From the 1930s onwards, but especially after the 1945+ purge and the 1960s offensive, the Left managed to take over the cultural life, shattering many interesting and even existential issues in the process.

By contrast, essays written between the two are the most interesting. Anxious about the present and future, the authors show willing to problematize fully the issues they tackle. Their books are polemical, sometimes openly whistleblowing, yet written in an atmosphere still free enough to go straight to the point.

Books mentioned last time approach a wide range of topics through interrogations such as the nature of modern civilization or the degeneration of man in modern times. Those mentioned here address narrower themes, and likely require some background to be fully appreciated.

1. Werner Sombart, The Jews and Modern Capitalism (1911)

OK, this one was published at the end of the Belle Époque and prior to Europe being covered by blood and shrapnel. However, most if not all of its translations, including two in English, reached the public after 1915, and the book is still republished today.

If you went through a liberal arts course, you may have heard about the sociologist Max Weber and his famous thesis on capitalism. “Protestant ethics”, Weber said, valued worldly success, hard work, and a kind of autonomy through the autonomous reading of the Bible that favored entrepreneurship. This mindset led many people to engage in entrepreneurship and work harder, thus unwittingly fostering the ascent of modern capitalism.

Sombart, a contemporary of Weber, agreed with him but looked farther. Namely, “the features of Puritan dogmas that really impacted on the genesis of capitalist spirit were but borrowed to Judaism.” Neither a classical liberal nor a socialist, neither pro- nor anti-Semitic, Sombart was an erudite and penetrating historian whose vision of modernity was truly brilliant.

According to him, there is a sharp contrast between the medieval European world and the world of Judaism. To Christians, the basis of economics and social order was subsistence: everyone had his own “field”, whether as a real parcel of land, trade or social function. Market prices had to be regulated so that each one’s interest could find an outlet in the general equilibrium. Jews, on the other hand, had a double set of standards: they showed mutual solidarity—tribalism—but considered the non-Jewish world as a free market. They also sanctified worldly gains and excelled in moneylending.

Jewish activity during the Middle Ages often caused harm to Christian merchants, peasants, and craftsmen, but was also favorable to someone else’s interests. In the late Middle Ages, Jews became important army suppliers. When power-hungry kings smashed the nobility, destroyed fortresses, curtailed the corporations’ specific prerogatives, and carried on expensive wars, they needed able managers, fresh money and military assets. Jews, thanks to their huge transnational networks and trade abilities, responded to the call—and when the kings fell, thanks to their own hubris, their suppliers and moneylenders stayed.

Meanwhile, as Jews were attracting capital and conquering more and more important positions in society, they soaked the West with their own peculiar mindset. For example, Jews tend to be urbane, to have a high IQ and a lack of sense of concreteness: this set of features helped them to contribute goods as abstract things, through the prism of quantity. Jews then played an important role in turning the economy into a big stock exchange, where actual goods became a support—or a pretext—to trade obligations and financial products. Moneylending went from the outskirts of the economy to its heart.

Just like Evola's Revolt against the modern world, Sombart's book cannot be adequately summed up in a few paragraphs. It gives an impressive big picture of modernity, economics, and Judaism. A major complement to Kevin MacDonald's well-known books on said topic.

2. Eugène Tavernier, 50 Years of Politics: A Work of Irreligion (1925)

I hesitated before mentioning this one. It hasn't been translated in English and speaks mainly about French history. What makes it relevant is the insight it gives into how organized forces of leftward pushing act in general.

A retired journalist, Eugène Tavernier wrote this book as a shrewd testimony of what he had seen for decades. 50 Years of Politics gives both an overview and an analysis of a long-winded, concerted effort from the secularist Left to rip Catholicism from the French.

The effort spanned on decades and spread up on various fields of public life. In law, the Republic—born by ransacking churches, decapitating political opponents and bathing in the blood of faithful peasants—legalized divorce, created harsh conditions for Catholic seminaries and institutions, forcefully secularized schools, and finally claimed the ownership of the cult places in 1905.

In the academia and "high culture", Tavernier portrays various intellectuals who, although some of them were really astute, were all unhinged minds, and all united to scorn Catholicism. Especially interesting is the portrayal of Edgar Quinet (1803-1875), a

Freemason and radical republican who posed as a moderate “man of letters” but showed a relentless hatred of his ancestors’ religion:

> He demanded that laws be secularized; he defined new ideas and used formulas that became the thought, rule, and language of our secular world, both official and private… Eventually, Quinet explained with pleasure what he meant by secularizing the laws: he wanted, “by the means of new laws”, struggle against national beliefs, as to create a new French people uprooted from Catholicism. [In 1850] this prophet of toleration pressured the freethinkers to impose their ideas through force… (pp.98-99)

Under the pretext of erudite exegesis, Quinet greatly contributed to the republishing of an ancient Protestant writer whose main, if not only, quality consisted in attacking “papism” vehemently.

Tavernier also mentions how the Grand Orient de France, the main French masonic obedience, repeatedly contributed to uniting and coordinating the irreligious, pushed for the erasure of religious references from most social institutions, and was constantly implicated in underhanded manipulations such as diverting public money or spying army officers.

The reader does not need to be a Catholic to see the relevance of this book: its topic bears a strange analogy with today’s multiculturalists and SJWs. To better face the beast today, look at how it behaved in the past, at an earlier stage.

3. Francis Delaisi, The European Revolution (1942)

Many contemporary books about the Great Depression are written by Keynesian economists. The view they give is thus biased in favor of a particular managerialism—among many others possible—that insists way too much on spending, justifies unduly authority from pompous academics, and lead to massive inflation and debt.

Francis Delaisi's European Revolution defends economic managerialism, but is by no means Keynesian, and contains very few gibberish. Writing after the "economic renaissance" of 1930s Germany, it compares the failure of the "liberal" economy determined by private banking with National Socialists' rather innovative policies. The success of the latter model, Delaisi confidently adds, can free Europe from the shackles of Wall Street speculation, hence the book title.

After 1918, US bankers found themselves almost overloaded with European gold. Exhilarated by the power between their hands, they started investing in most of the West and beyond. Their massive investments created many employments, production soared both in the US and abroad, giving birth to what would be eventually called the Roaring Twenties. But as time passed, it became clear—to finance initiates at least—that bankers were abusing from the leverage effect to create dollars out of thin air thanks to bookkeeping. Financial economy was slowly drifting away from real production and real consumption possibilities.

A bubble was forming. American government tried to avoid its bust, especially on wheat stocks, this cereal being then overproduced, by investing half a billion dollars on supporting wheat prices in 1929. These efforts failed, Delaisi recounts, mostly because of the short view and cynical opportunism of the main actors. Farmers, instead of reducing their production, increased it: if government was supporting the prices, they could sell more and thus earn more money instead of tightening their belts. Big transportation industry, also, disliked the government intrusion into what they considered their exclusive territory, and they managed to flood the European wheat markets by a sophisticated game of delivering too much on the same markets and toying with their own margins until the stocks crashed.

Here, it seems that capitalism, understood as the will to live thanks to one's capital instead of honest productive work, led both producers and sellers to get out of their place. Each actor tried to squeeze the situation for his own benefit and/or maintain an unwarranted income. Their short-term policies hastened the bursting of the bubble—and many of those who thought they could speculate as well were left naked on the sand.

Beyond the mentality problem, Delaisi sees in nineteenth-century and beyond capitalism a glaring issue: it gives an unreasonable advantage to sellers. Universal gold standard, along with globalization, allow to buy anything in any place where production costs are cheap and sell it where said costs are higher, to the expense of local producers.

> With 100g of gold, an international trust could buy in 1937: 4 weeks of work from an American factory worker, 20 weeks from a French one, 23 weeks from an Italian one, and 37 weeks from a Japanese one… The whole world was astonished when Czechoslovakia received Japanese socks and watches which were sold per > kilo at a cheaper price than those produced nearby. (chap.9, p.142)

Unregulated competition means producers have to lower their prices and life standards to match someone else's slave work. If they can't, they are reduced into joblessness. Sounds familiar?

When Hitler was appointed Chancellor in 1933, Germany had been bled dry and unemployment was rampant. His economic policy was interventionist and high-energy. Germany rejected the gold standard for the "work standard", reopened factories, asserted that the German producer's interest was legitimate against international speculation. Government stabilized the value of money and basic commodities, thus protecting the people from stock jobbing. They borrowed from their own people instead of going to foreign banks… And guess what? It worked. People were rationed at first, but life conditions greatly improved. Too bad the New Deal admirers never talk about this one.

Seems, then, a planned economy can work—if and only if crucial requirements are met. People participating there should identify with the common good, be disciplined and OK with being more or less taught what to do, and should be able to do the required job. Failure to meet these conditions explain why so many socialist attempts broke down.

The European Revolution, of course, explains the workings of both pre-1930 capitalism and National Socialist managerialism with much more detail than I did. A shame that it hasn't (yet?) been translated in English.

As a conclusion

Academic explanations of reality are at best limited by political correctness, at worst bound to spread falsehoods and smears. Weber's thesis about "Protestant ethics" has been so much mentioned it became a trite, classical liberals are still criticized as well, but why is no one speaking about Sombart's work aside from carefully closeted research departments? Possibly, the scope with which it extends outside the "muh persecutions muh Holocaust" narrative makes the average liberal teacher uncomfortable.

Likewise, the historical trend towards secularism and atheism is often casually mentioned as if it had happened spontaneously, whereas a closer look shows that it was the result of a relentless cultural war fought by generations of institutionalized far-Leftists. Many so-called classics of today were yesterday's SJWs.

Understanding where we come from and what really happened requires unplugging from the post-1945 cultural Marxist matrix. Fortunately, thanks to all the free eBooks around and a thriving ancient books market, this has never been easier.

Read Next: How The Global Financial Market Mirrors The Sexual Marketplace

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

How Our Feminized School System Is Crippling Young Boys

February 4, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

When I was around the age of 16, I had somewhat of a rebellious streak—perhaps it was my raging testosterone levels, or perhaps it was my righteous dissatisfaction with our absurd school system. Regardless, I recall an incident that happened between a teacher and I during my Junior year in high school.

I walked into my English class, on the very first day of school—the teacher was a tall man, a couple of inches over six foot, who must have weighed around 230. He was dressed in a pair of khakis, a button down dress shirt, and a tie… and for some reason, I thought it'd be a good idea to mess with him. I can't remember what I said or did, but I vividly recall what happened afterwards.

He immediately pushed me up against the wall, and physically confronted me: "Listen, Bub—if you think you're going to start trouble in my class, you've got another thing coming. Now you're going to sit down in that chair, and show me the respect that I deserve. Do you understand?"

I was completely stunned—up to that point, I hadn't even imagined that one of my teachers could do such a thing. I was used to a decade of female schoolteachers, who may have been able to control me when I was seven, but who could barely do anything to manage a class of rowdy high school boys. This man, for having the balls to confront me on my bullshit, had my respect. I sat down and did as I was told, and from then on it was smooth sailing.

I went on to have one of the best English classes that I've ever had in my entire life. I ended up getting a 99% in the class, and was his star pupil—I recall learning of the nature-loving philosophy of Thoreau, reading the cryptic, darkly poetic writings of Poe, and delving the depths of the human experience with Shakespeare's Hamlet and King Lear. As much as I would've hated to admit it at the time, being physically confronted is what I needed. I needed an actual alpha male, for lack of a better term, to put my rebellious 16 year old dumbass in his place—and he did.

What's The Lesson Here?

The lesson is that boys have a psychological need to be taught by men, plain and simple—and who can blame us? We need male role models, especially during our most formative years, and unfortunately, the epidemic of female teachers isn't cutting it.

I want to make it very clear that I'm not ragging on female teachers here, because I'm not. In fact, the reason that there's so many women in the profession of teaching, is because it's a more social job, which women typically favor. Women enjoy working with children, too, which is why around 90% of elementary school teachers are female.

That being said, though, young boys desperately crave to be accepted into the "world of men," as Robert Bly, founder of the men's mythopoetic movement so passionately conveyed. When boys don't have a proper male role model, they get stuck in a sort of "psychological boyhood," for their entire lives. This is because becoming a man isn't something that just happens naturally, it's something that must be taught—every single society in the past knew this, and yet for some foolish reason, we've completely forgotten this.

Is it any wonder that so many men nowadays are completely lost, in a sea of existential angst? Is it any wonder that the vast majority of men who I coach are terrified of talking to women, and can't seem to get over their severe approach anxiety? Is it any wonder that such a large number of men in our country, completely lack boundaries and a sense of purpose?

Of course not! How can we expect our younger generation of boys to become men, if we don't give them the proper guidance? We can't! It's that simple. If we want to see a change in our country for the better, we need to start advocating for a change in the schooling system. I believe that high school teachers should be at least 50% male, so that teenage boys can have some semblance of a male role model to sculpt themselves after.

Lack Of Masculinity In Schools

Where are the toy swords and shields? The room for rough play?

A proper schooling system should have a balance of the masculine and feminine energies. With too much masculine energy, nobody is free to express their individuality or creativity; yet with too much feminine energy, order and logic are thrown to the wind. An appropriate balance of creativity and nurturing with order and confrontation is necessary to rear a child properly, and unfortunately, our schools are currently experiencing far too little masculine energy.

The scenario which I mentioned before, where a teacher physically confronted me, would now be considered child abuse. That man, had the SJW's gotten their way, would have lost his job and been thrown in jail for child abuse. Admittedly, I'm sure these SJW's think they're doing some sort of good, but really, they're not. Sometimes young boys NEED physical confrontation to learn where they stand in the pack—this is basic evolutionary biology.

Boys need rough play. They need recess and they need male role models. Yes, they need some nurturing, too—this is where the women come in. But too much nurturing is what has created the massive societal problems we're seeing nowadays, because it leads to:

- An entitlement complex, where you expect someone else to always take care of you
- A lack of agency, because you're used to a teacher resolving all of your conflicts
- An unrealistic view of the world, because of "safe space" schools
- …and more

Boys need to be allowed to fight one another—studies have shown that rough play is actually beneficial to a child's development in many ways, and paradoxically, it actually makes them less violent, because they're able to recognize the difference between play fighting and real fighting. Boys should be encouraged to follow a powerlifting routine starting around age 14, should be given an hour and a half of recess every single day, and most importantly should have an ample amount of male teachers to serve as role models.

Simply instituting these three policies would eliminate 85% of the problems we're currently seeing with our political system. With healthy male role models, there would be far less crime, and boys would grow into well-integrated members of society, rather than welfare-leeching degenerates, or cucks ready to sell their country out to the false song of globalism. Frequent exercise would lower obesity rates, which would improve the economy and lessen the cost of our healthcare burden, while simultaneously enhancing brain-development, thus increasing our average IQ level.

The Bilderberg Group Knows This

So with such an obvious solution to so many problems with our schooling system, why is it that they still persist? I'll tell you why—it's because the elite KNOW that changing our school system would lead to a nation-wide revolution, and a loss of power on their part. So, like a den of vipers, they've been hiding in the shadows, pulling the strings to influence public policy and school curricula, in an attempt to deliberately feminize our boys and brainwash our youth.

Is it any wonder that “tolerance” has been spreading all throughout our public schools? Not actual tolerance, but rather a complete surrendering of logic and reason, while simultaneously bending over backwards to cater to mental illnesses and foreign interests? I recall walking to my local public school to vote (for Donald Trump, of course) and seeing a “multi-cultural” wall, where children were encouraged to view all ways of life as being “equal.”

Oh, right, of course! The sexist culture of radical Islam is clearly just as good as traditional Judeo-Christian cultures, right? We should value foreign immigrants over our own US citizens, right? We should give illegal immigrants the right to vote, because we’re all just “equal,” right? Hell no—some cultures are simply better than others, and we need to pass down our own culture to our youth. When a generation neglects to pass down its culture, it is only a matter of time before it dies off.

Why is it that a young Christian man can’t even state his opinion about how transsexualism is a mental disorder (which it is, so that’s not really an opinion), without being sent to the “Title IX” office for discipline? Title IX, in case you men didn’t know, has been the elite’s main attack against masculinity for the last 40 years—they sold it under the guide of “equality,” like they always do, but it’s ended up completely destroying our youth. Here are some things that have happened under Title IX:

- Dozens of male sports teams have been forced to stop
- Mandatory anti-male, “talking to girls is sexual harassment” type training
- Gender neutral language is being pushed
- Unfair sexual assault cases, where ZERO evidence is needed to expel men
- …and more

What started off as a seemingly noble crusade for justice, has been shown to be an absolute NIGHTMARE for our school systems. I believe that, if we want to see a lasting change in our schools, and want to make America great again, we must all do our best to pressure congressmen and President Trump to end this bullshit, bureaucratic, SJW policy.

The Solution

He doesn’t look too happy.

All in all, schools are a battleground for our youth’s future—and we’ve been failing miserably for the last two generations. It’s time that we start taking our schools back, and there’s many different ways to do this. One of the most effective ways is to simply withdraw altogether—home school your children rather than sending them to feminized indoctrination camps.

There are plenty of resources nowadays for parents looking to home school healthy young boys, and what’s even better is that you’ll be able to spend time with your son. Too many fathers neglect spending time with their sons, not realizing that an investment of time is worth far more than any financial investment that you could make in him.

Furthermore, with the Donald in office, completely revamping our school system doesn’t seem like it’s too far out of the realm of possibilities. If you’d like, you can contact your local politicians and pressure them into repealing Title IX, or you can just share this article. Either way, despite the many problems that our school system faces, many men are starting to wake up from the Matrix and fight back. And this, my friends, gives me hope.

Read More: Swedish Boys Demand Apology For Not Being Able To Wear Dresses In School Photo

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

11 Lessons In Leadership From Julius Caesar

February 5, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

I always begin a new year by reading a biography of a great and successful man. Roosh's big ass book challenge of a few years ago was part of my reasoning for this process. Indeed, to be a great man, you have to learn from the other great men that came before you – what they did, how they did it, and the underlying reasons that caused them to be successful.

Julius Caesar always fascinated me because of the massive list of his accomplishments and his palpable charisma that still seems to reach you even 2,000 years later. Usually, Caesar is remembered as a great soldier, but his life was far more complete than that. He was a great entertainer, seducer, statesman, writer, and more.

The noted classical historian Adrian Goldsworthy goes over the unlikely roller coaster career of Julius Caesar in his Caesar: Life of a Colossus. When you read this and other biographies about Julius Caesar, you draw the following lessons on leadership and power.

1. Build Your Talent Stack

If you're familiar with the work of Scott Adams, you'll recall the concept of a "talent stack," where it's better for you to have a B or B+ in a lot of different skills rather than one A and a list of Cs.

When you look at the life of Julius Caesar, it's clear that he had a massive stack of abilities that he was very good in, whether it be rhetoric, soldiering, or tolerance for risk and conflict. There was almost nothing that he wasn't at the very least good in, compared to his rivals like Pompey who had a talent stack that had far less depth.

Julius Caesar decided what talents he needed on his path to domination in his own time. Now think of your own future and where you want to be. Done? Now ask yourself what skills you'll probably need to get there. Now do a little each day to get a solid B in each of them.

2. Get Good At All Avenues of Communication

Julius Caesar's Commentaries on the Gallic (and Civil) War still stand as a classic to students of both Latin and military history. His contemporaries like Cicero marveled at their simplicity and the directness of the action that left the reader without doubt as to what had transpired. The Commentaries weren't simply for posterity's sake, however, they allowed Caesar to build his reputation and keep in touch with his base back in Rome while he was abroad for so many years. By staying in the forefront of the people's minds, his power grew.

3. Choose Notoriety Over Fitting In

Even when he was just starting out and had no power, Julius Caesar found ways to stand out. He was actually one of the noted fashionistas of his era, always dressing more uniquely than those around him:

> Caesar reveled in standing out from the crowd, and dressed in a highly distinctive way. Instead of the normal short-sleeved senator's tunic, which was white with a purple stripe, he wore his own unconventional version. This had long sleeves that reached down to his wrists and ended in a fringe. Although it was not normal to wear a belt or girdle with his tunic, Caesar did so, but perversely kept it very loose. Sulla is supposed to have warned the other senators to keep an eye on that ' loose girded boy.' Caesar dressed so that he was recognizably a member of a senatorial family, but at the same time marked himself out as not quite the same as his peers.

Later on in life, Julius Caesar also made it a priority to stand out in politics as well, bringing cases against noteworthy Roman elites and supporting contrary causes, such as his argument not to execute those men involved in Catiline's conspiracy.

4. Always Be Pleasurable

Julius Caesar went out of his way to be a source of pleasure. He was friendly and charming to everyone that came in contact with him. Even in heated political debates he didn't lose his humor. One of the best examples of his social intuition was this one:

> Socially Caesar entertained and was entertained by the local aristocracy, many of whom had only possessed citizenship for a generation or so. On one occasion in Mediolanum, he dined at the house of one Valerious Meto, and the party was served with asparagus accidentally dressed in bitter myrrh rather than the normal olive oil. Caesar ate it without comment or change of expression, and rebuked his companions when they loudly complained. The patrician from one of Rome's oldest families was the perfect guest and always a lively companion.

This won him many friends that he of course influenced.

5. Associate Yourself With Popular Causes

Julius Caesar was a noted popularis politician, meaning that he was associated with popular causes. In his early career he tried his hardest to support the popular general Pompey (already a marquee name) and staged grand and spectacular entertainments during his time in the post of Aedile which oversaw public infrastructure. In the voting assemblies, he associated himself with a broad range of citizen classes and in the courts he prosecuted unpopular public officials.

6. Keep Your Power Base As Broad As Possible

When he was dictator, Julius Caesar enacted a legislative program that addressed all segments of society. In his youth, he lived in a neighborhood that wasn't exactly prestigious, but it did allow him to converse with the poorer classes that Roman senators often didn't know very well. To give it a modern analogy, Julius Caesar didn't live in a bubble. He knew senators, equestrians, and the poor. He even championed the residents in the provinces abroad, such as those in Cisalpine Gaul who hadn't been given citizenship but wanted it. When he received his Gallic command, this came back to help him, big league.

Always look to cooperate with many people and classes. See if their interests entwine with yours. Don't make enemies unnecessarily.

7. In-Group With Your Subordinates

Famously, he knew the names of all of his centurions, building with them an intimate rapport. He trained alongside the men with equal physical vigor as they exercised. Further:

> When Caesar addressed his troops it was always as 'comrades,' never 'men' or 'soldiers.' He and they were all good Romans, serving the Republic by fighting against its enemies and also winning glory and plunder along the way, which he took to share with them most generously. Mutual trust grew up gradually between the commander, his officers, and soldiers as they came to know and rely on each other. Pride in themselves and their units was also carefully fostered. Decorated weapons, some inlaid with silver or gold, were issued, most probably > as rewards for valor, marking the recipients out as exceptional soldiers and making them feel special. The Roman military system had always sought to encourage boldness in its soldiers, but in Caesar's legions this ideal was taken to an extreme.

8. When Using Rhetoric To Persuade, Never Start With Facts

Julius Caesar knew that facts are of limited value in persuasion. He studied in the best rhetorical school of his time in Rhodes. Although he had many instances of brilliant and persuasive oratory, one of Caesar's best was when he dissuaded mutinous legions, beginning by addressing them as "citizens" instead of "comrades." This shocked them, making them feel less worthy in the eyes of their beloved commander. In this greater state of suggestibility, Julius Caesar got them all to beg him to take them back. The coup de grace was when he said he would indeed take them all back – save the Tenth Legion. Their pride slighted, the Tenth even begged him to decimate them, to show that the unit was worthy of his praises.

The speech had to be cut here for brevity, but you should study it intensely.

9. Disrupt The Strategy Of Your Enemies

One notable instance of this was when Julius Caesar used his brand of clemency against the Pompeians in the civil war, who were envisioning being increasingly punitive even against those who had remained neutral during the hostilities. Caesar's clemency made his enemies grow increasingly unhinged, and as a result, made them lose face with the public and disrupted their strategy in the field.

And that episode was far from the only time he did this.

10. Control The News

One of Julius Caesar's calling cards was that he always took care to dictate the news cycle rather than having it dictate him. His Commentaries of course are the best example of this, but he also did this on the tactical level to rapidly control the flow of information in his favor. In Gaul, for example, a defeat in a skirmish began to be talked of as a major setback for the Romans. Not wanting to embolden his enemies, Caesar mobilized immediately and reversed the situation with swift punishment, not allowing the flow of information to embolden the Gauls who may want to take up arms against him.

11. Your Displays Of Power Must Be Cognizant of Your Time

The mistake that ultimately caused Julius Caesar's undoing was the way that he displayed power as dictator after his victory in the civil war. His typical dress consisted of the following garb:

> Apart from his formal powers Caesar stood out in many ways. His family claimed descent from the kings of Alba Longa, a city that no longer existed since the Romans had absorbed it early on in their history. On formal occasions he now took to wearing what he claimed was the costume of these monarchs, notably calf-length boots in red leather. The reddish-purple tunic and toga of a triumphing general, which he now wore at festivals and formal meetings, also had regal associations. To this he added a laurel wreath – an honor that he is said to have especially relished because of his growing baldness – and in 44 BC this seems to have been replaced with a gold version.

He also refused a crown from Mark Antony, but it only served to associate Caesar with kingship. Though the people loved him, Caesar lost touch with a crucial segment of society – that class of senators who held the old Republican ideals in high esteem. To them, his behavior was a bridge too far. It served too easily as confirmation bias that he aspired to a formal kingly role. This made it easier for people like Cassius and Brutus to persuade themselves and others that killing him was a necessary act of tyrannicide.

Julius Caesar, knowing the republican ethos of Rome, should have made a rare display of modesty and surrendering some of his power (if only in appearance) after attaining the dictatorship to dissolve any rumors of him desiring supreme, un-republican power. He did the opposite and it cost him his life. This was a mistake that his adopted son and heir, Octavian, the future Emperor Augustus, would not make.

And neither should you.

Read More: The 5 Most Decisive Moments In A Man's Life

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

How (And Why) To Climb A Rope

February 5, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Today's article discusses an action that is simultaneously a practical skill and a fantastic strength building exercise that will work a majority of the muscles of the upper body, especially the muscles of the hands and fingers that don't get used much (and you all know how much value I place on grip strength): rope climbing!

A Brief History

In one of his Convict Conditioning books, Paul Wade semi-humorously posits that the pull-up, and the various other pulling motions that we are capable of doing, are the first exercise that humanity invented, as it would highly useful for our arboreal ancestors to be able to pull up their own bodyweight. Rope is believed to have been invented around 30,000 years ago, when some early modern human figured out that braiding strands granted that compilation greater tensile strength than its individual components. And it can be presumed that the act of climbing said ropes started shortly thereafter.

The earliest fitness manuals that you can still find today, such as De Arte Gymnastica by Girolamo Mercuriale, or El Libro de Ejercicio Corporal by Cristobal Mendez, both praise the strength building qualities of climbing exercises such as rope and pole climbing. And for many years climbing exercises were seen as a necessity for the physical man until the decline of physical education that I have discussed in a previous article.

If you have any experience with rope climbing at all, it is likely in your gym class, a faded remnant of better days of physical education training in American public schools. You were likely given no preparatory steps to train your muscles and central nervous system before undertaking this Herculean task. A Herculean task that ended with you falling on your face, possibly tearing the palms of your hands open, and coming nowhere near the top of the rope. Dejected, you probably said something to what Principal Skinner is saying in the featured image, and then vowed to never climb a rope again. Certainly, that was my experience with the exercise for many years.

How to Climb a Rope

I feel there are two facets to the climbing of a rope: strength and technique. To put it simply, using certain techniques can make the climbing of a rope substantially easier than you think it is but you're still going to need a large amount of hand, finger, and latissimus dorsi strength.

To begin with, let's go over the various techniques you can use for climbing a rope:

1. The free climb

This is the climbing technique that most people instinctively know (or rather, instinctively try during their first failed attempts to climb a rope). Leaving your legs dangling in the breeze, pull up with just your arms and climb. As you might imagine, this is pretty tough. As such, it should be a part of your rope climbing repertoire as a way to maximize the effort you will have to exert—ie: if you want to build maximal strength, you're going to have to use this.

But what if you actually need to climb ropes as a means of transportation? At that point, you're going to want to make it a little bit easier, correct? How?

2. The S-Wrap Technique

One of two techniques taught in the military, this climbing technique utilizes the legs to take some of the weight off of the arms and thus make the climb a bit easier.

Grab a hold of the rope, and allow it to pass by your right hip, around your back, between your legs, and down to the feet. Put the rope under your right foot and then hold it in place with the other foot, as shown in the image below.

You should be able to essentially stand on one foot, while only holding it in place with the hands and other foot. Pull up with the hands and hold the position, and then unwrap your legs and reestablish your foot grip and “Stand” on the rope again.

3. The BUDS technique

The other military technique involved in rope climbing, it’s similar to the S-Wrap in that it utilizes the rope as a “platform” to take weight off your arms, but the positioning is different. And personally I find this the easier of the two.

Let the rope fall past your hip and down to your feet. Place the rope under your right foot, and lift it up and pinch it against the right foot with the left foot.

That’s it!. Just pull yourself up with both hands, then lift your feet and reestablish your feet position higher up on the rope, and repeat. Naturally with all these techniques, with repetition comes increased speed and ease.

Those techniques are good, and do work, but they do reduce some of the strain on your arms, thus making them not as effective in terms of building strength. Also, they obviously do not work on pole climbing. This is where grip training comes in:

Grip Training

I have already written several articles on grip training, so rather than me being redundant you can go read those. However, one technique I didn't discuss in those previous articles is the mere act of progressive hanging.

Yes, the mere act of hanging is a great way to train the hands and forearms, as well as the shoulder girdle. And with all exercises worth doing, it can be done in progressions.

From hanging from a bar with two hands, to hanging with one hand, to two hands on a towel, to, ultimately hanging with one hand gripping a towel, I have found that the towel hang is the most relevant exercise specifically for rope climbing. Hold each hang exercise for one minute before progressing further.

Thus you can learn to climb a rope, and develop all the strength associated with it, simply (albeit not necessarily easily)

Read More: How To Get In Shape And Practice Your Fighting Skills

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Why Don’t Americans Declare Independence From One Another?

February 6, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

I was reading Keith Preston’s Attack the System where he made a passing mention of the idea of leftists declaring independence from the rest of the nation which it views as being racist and backward. And I thought to myself, “Yeah, why don’t they?” In fact, why don’t the people of the United States and the rest of the West just push for radical decentralization?

If half of the country literally wants nothing to do with the other half as Bill Maher puts it, why don’t they just go their own ways? I really do think it would solve lot of problems regarding race, culture, and politics in our increasingly dysfunctional world.

The Situation: Metropolitan Leftists vs. Rural Conservatives

2016 Election map. The blue areas that are not progressive, metropolitan centers are areas with black or Hispanic majority.

The current political situation in the US is that of polarization between the metropolitan leftists who are progressive, globalist, technocratic, socialist, multicultural, pansexual, and feminist against the rural areas that tend to be white, Christian, nationalist, conservative, and traditional.

Even in Europe, the political division between urban and rural areas are unmistakable as can be seen in these maps of recent referendum and election:

Brexit vote.

Austrian presidential election of 2016.

Now, these two groups have become increasingly hostile to one another over the recent years and there is no reason to believe that the differences will heal anytime soon. It's clear that the leftists hate Trump supporters to a point of using violence, it's clear that everyone who's not an SJW wants to be left alone by those rabid thugs, it's clear that BLM want segregation from the whites, it's clear that Christians are sick of being harassed for their faith, and so on.

Beyond culture, the struggle over national policy also causes major contentions. For example, people who want stricter gun control live in urban centers with most of the shooting violence while the people who actually own guns legally tend to live away from the big cities. So why should one group impose banning guns on the other?

The sentiment for seccession is clearly there for when Obama was elected for a second term in 2012, six states signed enough petitions to prompt a response from the White House. And more recently, when Trump was elected, his opponents were quick to resort to violent protests using slogans like #NotMyPresident. A seccession movement in California is already gaining momentum.

In case you think the idea of seccession is new, it is not. Libertarians already have a project to create their own communities while Christians have attempted an exodus movement with similar goals in mind. So there is at least some sentiment towards self-determination and self-governance, and there will surely be more to follow if the current political polarization continues. But what is stopping the people from making it happen? The answer is: the belief that society can eventually be steered towards the way each person or group believes it should go; that their vision for the world will gradually be realized through constant effort. But is that a true possibility?

Historical Reality

While those on both Left and Right believe that everything will be corrected and that their enemies will be “defeated” once someone of their own team is running the show (but are they really in control?), this is nothing but a fallacy arising from short-term thinking. The truth is that no side can ever “win” in the long run with our socio-political system.

Consider that in 1950’s, the United States was a very conservative society with model nuclear families that seem like dream now, only to have the culture get hijacked by pot smoking leftist hippies and various other progressive movements including feminism. Then in the 80’s, there was a conservative resurgence with Reagan winning the election with the campaign slogan: Let’s Make America Great Again. This lasted until the 90’s when the leftist came back with the first wave of political correctness movement, touching upon issues of race and homosexuality. Then came Bush the Second’s Neo-con and Christian-Right, then the reign of Obama and the SJW’s, and now the Trump and the Alt-Right backlash. I think you can guess what will eventually come next.

From Cultural Revolution to McDonald's in less than two decades. You had one job Chairman Mao…

Even in brutal dictatorships where the political opponents were persecuted and purged, as in Soviet Russia and Communist China or Franco's Spain and Pinochet's Chile, the other side eventually made their come-back. So if gulags couldn't stop the revival of traditional Christian order in Russia and the Red Guards of the Chinese Cultural Revolution couldn't stop China from adopting Western capitalism, what hope do the Right have in turning America Christian, white, and nationalist when they live in a democracy? If Pinochet's free helicopter rides couldn't quell the leftists for eternity, what chance do the SJW's have in converting the backward "rednecks" they hate so much to be part of their rainbow utopia through elections?

The point here is that no previous efforts have ever made a society become permanently Left or Right. The perpetual tug-of-war between the Left and the Right will continue on while globalism continues to spread along with technology and the consumerist culture—the elites will continue to operate behind closed doors no matter who's supposedly in charge. If anything, the current trend of the world is towards more diversity, more equalism, and more progressivism.

The Fixed Path

Similar generational trends can be observed with many other social and political issues.

No matter what the traditionalists hope for, the United States have been zigzagging towards a more progressive society with globalism paving the way for the future of the West. Consider that on almost every major issue regarding the society and culture, leaps were made with leftists emerging victorious: women were given the right to vote (and we all know about their voting tendencies). Anti-miscengenation laws that were supported by majority of the population were repealed, opening the way for a multi-ethnic society. Atheism is on the rise with record number of Americans converting to Islam and even Sataninsm (in case you think it's a joke, they've already built temples and managed to stop Christian prayers at government meetings).

The feminist movement, along with abortion and the pill, has already turned the entire society upside down with the entire Western culture turning gynocentric (you know the society is feminist because even staunch critics of feminism will balk at the idea of returning back to traditional sex roles). Acceptance of gay marriage is on the rise as you can see below (it's quite telling that many right-wing figures are now openly admitting their homosexuality). And so on.

Deviancy to normalcy in less than a decade. Next in line for normalization are trans "rights" and pedophilia.

Yes, there will be backlash from time to time and right-leaning governments may come in power to slow down the degeneracy for a while, but it's clear that, in the grand scheme of things, the US and the rest of the West is heading towards a more progressive and globalist society. So if you don't like where the train is going, why not just hop off when you can instead of trying to hold it back, only to get dragged by it?

The Practical Solution

No super-state lasts forever.

The above points prove why a radical decentralization for a local autonomy and self-determination will be the best solution for everyone who is forced under a nation that is raging with cultural civil war—war which is quickly boiling towards an open conflict. And to achieve this goal of decentralization, the people only need to give up two things:

1. Patriotism, nationalism, or whatever other word people use to describe their worship of the state (run by a government that clearly does not care for the freedom of its people).
2. The ability to impose your values and beliefs in the form of law and political correctness onto people who don't want them.

That's it. No more forcing Christians to bake wedding cakes for homosexuals, no more being forced to accept Somali immigrants into your communities, no more having the welfare state tax you to death, no more worries about having your guns taken away by federal agents, and so forth. With decentralization or full autonomy, each region, city-state, or a community is allowed to have its own laws and culture without interference from outside influence. Isn't that a much more practical approach than the constant fighting between the Left and the Right where no side will ever achieve final victory? Isn't it preferable to fighting a perpetual cultural war that allows the elites to grow in power while the common people bicker amongst one another?

Heck, if people still insist on having a nation for sentimental value, the federal government can be kept (albeit with much more limited role) along with the military while a president is elected as a figurehead with no real power—much like the Queen of England. The small nation of Switzerland already practices this sort of a decentralized model of governance, so it's not something that's unseen in the world. The only real obstacle would be the monstrous, centralized federal government that refuses to allow people to enjoy true freedom.

Conclusion

I don't expect everyone to accept this proposal outright as it's not an easy thing to absorb for those who've been conditioned from birth to think of the nation-state as a the most fundamental formation of society. But I believe everyone should at least have the chance to be exposed to the idea so as to make a decision for himself.

Read More: Donald Trump Is The Candidate For Americans, Not Special Interests

Corey Savage

Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

You’re Not Free Until You Have “Fuck You Money”

February 6, 2017 | by Max Panzer | Link | Original Link

Live as a free man and make f-you money an absolute in your life. Whether you are an employee or business owner, consider your hair on fire until you have one year’s living expenses cash in the bank. Rise above the daily necessity to trade your time for money and live each day with a new sense of freedom and the pride of self-determination.

Think about it for a moment. How long would your savings last if you lost your job tomorrow? As a business owner or self-employed professional, how long would you survive if you lost your top client? Or what kind of financial hole would you dig for yourself if you went an extended period of time without a salary?

Discover the peace of mind that will accompany the hard fact that you could go a full year without earning a single dollar and still pay your bills and eat your fill every day. If you have dependents that rely on your income for survival, then double your standing and consider yourself a superior man of foresight and intelligent preparedness.

This is standing tall and this is living as a man should; for you are now no longer a slave to your employer or business, but a free man fully in charge of his life. You are now a man with options. And a man with options lives on a higher plane.

Rise each morning with the energy and confidence that comes from a strong measure of financial security. Handle the day’s challenges at work with composure and calm. Endure your superiors with a new resilience. Comport yourself with the coolness of outcome independence. And then continue your steady march toward the eventual goal of true financial independence.

You will begin with the enviable position of being able to say f-you to your employer if you ever needed to and then continue the process toward never having to work for pay again.

The Numerator—One Year's Living Expenses

A man must know where he spends his money and what his bare bone expenses would be to survive for a full year. This is the starting point for f-you money.

Go fully electronic and track your expenses. Use an application such as Quicken, Mint.com or YouNeedABudget.com to download every expense for the last 12 months from your bank account and credit cards. Each expenditure will be categorized and will then allow for a realistic look at where your money was spent by category. If you withdrew and spent cash, create an expense category called "cash" and then track that as well.

From here you can take the time to create a lean, but survivable budget for a full year without pay. This is not how you spend your money right now, but as you would with zero income.

And there you have it, your target one year f-you number. This number will also serve as the numerator in your gold plated formula for true financial independence.

Set your woman straight

Go Minimalist

Execute the blockbuster trade of your life right now. Trade the typical superficial and material Western existence for a life of freedom by embracing minimalism. Take whatever flak you need to, but set your woman straight pull the trigger and get started. When you come out on the other side it will all be worth it.

In the end it is ultimately your responsibility, your health and your well-being on the line. And a man will always benefit those he cares about the most by taking proper care of himself. In today's world this definitely includes developing a deliberate financial framework and accruing the intangible benefits from doing so.

Adjust your financial overhead and lifestyle so that you cash flow every month. Restructure your life so that you can live off of 50% of your salary or a single income in a two income household. Build your f-you savings as fast as you can.

Eventually with your f-you money in hand and a path to financial independence set in stone, there will never be any regret. Even your woman will realize the same.

Plant the seed of freedom

Get A Side Hustle

If going minimalist doesn't get you to where you need to go fast enough, then get a side hustle. Plant the seed of freedom in your mind and you will find a way. You can do more.

A man with the proper motivation has immense inherent capacity. Find your motivation and your purpose. Know deep down why being truly free matters to you and you will find the energy and time to add the necessary incremental income.

Become fed up with living as a slave to your wages. There is no reason to live as such in modern western society. Despite the constant encroachment of government we still live with immense opportunity and tremendous freedom of choice compared to all of history. Why not add some incremental effort and eventually live as a truly free man?

If you are already tired after work then think of it this way: you might as well get paid for it. What are you going to miss, a few television shows? Eat right, lose some weight and quit drinking. You will develop the endurance and make it a way of life. Find something that interests you or perhaps even something simple and easy; whatever works.

If you are a man with a top notch work ethic and good character, eventually you will meet others of the same value system and the good paying work will find you.

Explain to your woman why a few nights a week or time away on the weekends is necessary. Fill her in on your plans and she will take pride in you as a man distinguishing himself and executing each day as the tip of the spear for his loved ones.

You will still have plenty of quality time for your woman and family. Quit lying on the couch, watching other men play sports and get to work.

Unburden your soul

Kill Your Debt

Once you have your one year of f-you money, put out the second fire in your hair and go all out to kill your consumer debt. Yes that is correct, f-you money first and then any balances you carry in revolving credit next. For me, it is survival first and then finesse second.

Since you've been able to save a year's worth of living expenses, you can certainly continue and rid yourself of the life stealing nature of consumer debt. Get this done in a hurry; a mortgage, and perhaps a car payment for now, are acceptable. But if you are stuck in the cycle of minimum payments on credit, you are literally trading your life for what was a temporary material or fleeting gratification.

This is no life for a man. Make the commitment to pay off everything. You will unburden your soul, lower the magic number for a year of financial survival and then eventually add to your monthly cash flow.

And this gentlemen, is when the ride gets good. You are now on your way to financial independence and you now have the formula; it is a simple fractional formula and one for which you already have the numerator. Next up is the denominator for that formula.

Understand the 4% Rule

The Denominator—4%

The 4% denominator is a rule of thumb based on long term investment in the United States stock market, which will allow for a near certainty of 30 years of specified withdrawals adjusted for inflation without running out of funds.

Take your one year living expense figure (the numerator) and divide it by 4% (the denominator). Perhaps a simpler way to look at it is to multiply your yearly expense figure by 25. And this is your magic number for financial independence. These are the funds that you will need invested in an appropriate mix of stocks and bonds that you can draw from for the rest of your life.

For example, up here in western New York a man with no debt, no car payments and no mortgage can live pretty well off of $40,000 per year—especially if he is committed to a minimalist lifestyle. Plugging 40K into the elementary school math formulas above yields $1,000,000.

Is the 4% Rule a guarantee? Of course not, but then there is nothing to stop you from pushing beyond the target savings figure or supplementing your income if necessary. Bottom line is you now have a reasonable target to shoot for. And this is a goal that is attainable to every man who is gainfully employed over his lifetime. How quickly you get there depends on how hard you hit the throttle and pursue it.

Adjust your financial overhead and spending habits so that you can add to your net worth every month. Make every day at work meaningful beyond just getting by and make sure to cash flow for the rest of your life.

Live A Wise Man’s Life

Spend 96 seconds of your time to watch Mr. Collins above, in an adaptation from the movie The Gambler, essentially carve out the perfect plan for financial independence. Like the man says, a wise man’s life is based on f-you. Learn this essential lesson and live a life of financial control, freedom and prosperity.

Read More: 16 Ways To Save More Money

Max Panzer
Max Panzer is the publisher of Becoming a Force of Nature. He is an independent business owner and has been married to the same woman for over 25 years. Max pursues his Life Mission at full throttle and works to cut through each day with a stronger, sharper, gleaming edge.

The Real Legacy Of Chile's Augusto Pinochet

February 6, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Recent incidents of leftist violence in the United States have caused some thoughtful commentators to consider the possibility of a return to 1970s-style leftist terrorism in the West. For most young people today, names like the Red Brigades, the Japanese Red Army, the Baader-Meinhof Organization, and Carlos the Jackal mean little. But in their day these groups caused a considerable amount of damage and subversion in the places they conducted their business. The "student protest" movements of the 1960s were the direct progenitors of such leftist terror groups; and as antiwar activism died down, overt violence—bank robberies, bombings, assassinations, and similar acts—took its place. Even though such groups may be quite small in number, they can contribute to a climate of fear and chaos far out of proportion to their memberships.

With many sectors of the media and some public figures in the United States actually stoking the fires of sedition and treason, it is probably only a matter of time before things happen that make the recent Berkeley riots seem quaint by comparison. It is possible that some of the so-called "protest" groups of today could metastasize into professional terrorist organizations. With funds supplied by interested parties abroad (i.e., state actors or other terror groups), such groups would rise to the level of national security threat that would justify their repression or dismantling. Law and order are a government's most pressing functions; without them nothing of any importance can be accomplished.

It was against this backdrop that I finally took a close look at the record of Chile's former dictator Augusto Pinochet. Pinochet took power in a 1973 coup and ruled the country until 1990. In the conventional "wisdom" peddled by the US media, he was a ruthless authoritarian who violently repressed leftist protesters and ruled Chile with an iron hand. It is true that his government violated human rights, shut down political parties, and dismantled trade unions. But this is not the entire story. A close look at the actual record shows that there was a very real threat of a communist takeover in Chile at the time, and that Pinochet's economic policies laid the groundwork for Chile's economic prosperity today.

In a 1991 interview, finance minister Alejandro Foxley said, "We may not like the government that came before us. But they did many things right. We have inherited an economy that is an asset." Pinochet's government overthrew the leftist regime of Salvador Allende. Eduardo Montalva, who served as Chile's president before Allende, called Allende's regime a "carnival of madness." Leftist violence had become commonplace by 1973; the economy was in tatters; and politics had reached a point of near paralysis. When we read Allende's speeches and policies today, he comes across as a 1970s version of Venezuela's Hugo Chavez. And as everyone knows, Chavez's policies destroyed his country's economy and edged it to the brink of social chaos.

It is beyond question that Allende—before he was overthrown—was trying to transition Chile into a communist political and social system. The country was on the brink of civil conflict in 1973 and was only saved from disaster by the intervention of a military government.

It is against this backdrop that the Pinochet takeover must be seen. Just before Pinochet's coup, Chile's Chamber of Deputies in August 1973 voted 81-47 that Allende had systematically destroyed the rule of law and the institutional structures of the country. Furthermore—and this is never mentioned by the media today—Pinochet's coup was supported by the majority of the Chilean people and by Allende's predecessor Montalva.

What specifically did Pinochet's government do? According to a study conducted by the Hoover Institution:

> Domestic banks were deregulated in the late 1970s but reregulated with vigor in the early 1980s. Poverty had increased enormously during and in the wake of the UP's disastrous economic policies, and it decreased only as a result of the state-led stabilization policies, structural reforms, and targeted social programs of the Pinochet period. Major state expenditures for direct action social programs targeted to the poorest of the poor were initiated in the middle 1980s, not after 1990. Poverty levels, as high as 50 percent in 1984, were reduced to 34 percent by 1989. They continued to fall after 1990 to 15 percent in 2005…[The Pinochet government] created the underlying economic policies and structures in the 1970s and 1980s that [its successor] maintained and that produced jobs for the poor and an economic surplus to enable targeted state antipoverty programs.

The Hoover Institute study, quoted above, goes on to say that Pinochet's authoritarian government actually served as a beacon of innovation around the world that is still followed today. He was able successfully transition his country from a "statist" model to a "market" model long before China or Britain were able to do so. The study concludes:

> At that time the Chilean economic model was considered anathema almost everywhere—partly because of its association with Chile's military regime but also because it was viewed (wrongly, as it turned out) as an unthinkable, reactionary model per se, especially for developing countries. (Of the many military regimes in Latin America in the sixties, seventies, and eighties, the only one to break with state capitalism was Chile's.) But global perceptions of the > Chilean economic model changed, slowly at first, more rapidly and massively after the mid-1980s. By now, the economic policies of most countries of Latin America; North America; Western, Central, and Eastern Europe; China; India; Russia and its former republics; much of Africa; and many other places around the world have followed the Chilean lead rather than fled from it.

Pinochet himself got little thanks for his accomplishments. While the left celebrates men like Hugo Chavez and Fidel Castro, Pinochet is kept locked in the closet of public opinion as a knuckle-dragging dictator. The truth is quite different. Leftist groups successfully petitioned for Pinochet's extradition to Spain in 1988 for trial on alleged human rights abuses; yet they never called for the extradition and trial of Castro. Any objective look today at the economies of Chile, Venezuela, and Cuba leave no room for doubt about whose policies were better for their people. While Pinochet's government certainly arrested and executed political opponents, a strong case can be made that the positive features of his regime outweighed the bad. Recognition of this fact is long overdue.

Read More: What The Berkeley Riot Means For America

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

We Are Seeking A Designer To Help With Re-Designing ROK

February 6, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s time to freshen up the ROK layout. I have constructed a detailed mockup of a design I like (based somewhat on the Metro UK layout), and need some help from a designer to do a finalized mockup for a fully responsive layout (desktop, tablet, and mobile). Once this design is complete, I will then find someone to code it into a WordPress theme.

If you are a qualified designer and would like this job, send me an email at with design examples any other information that would help.

Read Next: Return Of Kings Has Turned Four Years Old

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Ways Anglo Women Have Turned Themselves Into Sex Objects

February 7, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The more globe hopping I do and the more time I spend in different parts of the world, the worse I feel for my American brethren, and the more I know it wasn't me who was to blame for the fiasco that was my dating life until I deserted the Anglobitch once and for all. American women are truly the worst in the entire world, and I can now say that with reassurance and confidence after spending some more time in the States. This isn't just hyperbole from the manosphere. This disturbing realization is palpable every time I come back to The Anglo-American Matrix.

Those who read my material may already know I reside in the Caribbean, but I recently embarked on an extended road trip from coast to coast across the United States (and incidentally, will be hitting four continents this year while writing about my journeys). Sometimes you just have to spend time with buddies and I wanted to challenge myself to see if American women really are that bad, as I had been away from them for a while. Give them a second chance and all that jive.

Was that ever a horrible idea.

The most interesting part of my trip was my visit to the infamous Moonlite Bunny Ranch, a legal whorehouse in Nevada. I came to the conclusion there needs to be a whorehouse like this one in every town in America, for feminism and women's instincts unleashed by liberalism have made them absolutely worthless for anything else except casual sex.

Maybe I'm spoiled by living in Latin America, but I just refuse to deal with American women for very long, refuse to put up with their nonsense, and refuse to put up with their bitching – even those who show interest in me. I'll hit it and quit it, but that's as far as it will go.

It didn't take long before I was aching to leave the dry and dusty snatch of America once again. Here's what I saw.

Obesity. Lord almighty at the obesity. People have transformed themselves into consumption machines, and a recreational eating obsession is taking its toll on American women. They're the most piggish women on the planet.

Bad manners. Talking to women in bars or worse, online, has become an exercise in futility and sadism directed towards oneself. It was PAINFUL to try and carry on a conversation with a girl in America.

Trashy appearance. Chalk it up to slut worship as the media tells women how to dress and act, but it would seem at some point we could have a national conversation explaining to women being covered in tattoos with blue hair and an unhygienic countenance isn't desirable.

And these are only appetizers for the all you can eat buffet of disgust!

Self-Made Sex Objects

With literally nothing else to offer to a man, American women have become self-made sex objects

With nothing to offer men but sex, the truth is modern American women have become self-made sex objects. They've done it to themselves! Let's delve into the cost-benefit analysis and return on investment for today's Anglobitch.

- Cost: Astronomical. Whether it be damaged goods working girls with badly painted on eyebrows asking for up to $1,000 an hour in many cities (that was the quote I got from two hoes in Vegas who stopped me to talk in Caesar's Palace) to women who won't settle for anything less than the Barbie Fun House and a quarter of a million frivorce settlement, expected male investment in even Plain Jane women is sky high.
- Benefit: Are you kidding me? Other than a vagina that's been around the block more times than the UPS man, there's literally nothing American women have to offer a man other than sex. What are they good for? Companionship? Fuck no. Good life partners? Fuck no again. Good mothers? Nope. Entertaining to be around? No. Good conversationalists? Only if you like endless stories about careerism and vacuous banter. Sweet natured? About as sweet as vinegar. Their loyalty? Please, stop already.
- Return on Investment: Negative numbers here, as men pay through the nose for a substandard product.

Here are 5 more points that help prove American women, by stripping themselves of anything of value to a man other than their anatomy, have ironically turned themselves into the very sex objects they supposedly loathe.

5 Strikes Against The Anglobitch

A recent trip home only reinforced the following talking points

Can't Cook Or Clean. It's well known American women know how to stuff their pie holes quite well, as they're literally the fattest women on the planet, but when it comes to actually preparing food they prefer to leave that to kitchen slaves. Cooking is a lost art, as people settle instead for ersatz corporate cuisine that got stamped out of a machine rather than something lovingly cooked by a girlfriend or wife. Would it hurt them to be able to make a decent sandwich, when women from other cultures can serve up culinary delights most gelded American men dare not dream of?

Many if not most American women live in unkempt, messy, and even dirty living spaces. Rather than lift a finger to do some light housework, they spend their days watching daytime TV, playing career girl, and/or drugging themselves with both legal and illegal substances to silence the dying eggs in their wombs.

Statistically Sterile. With a birth rate below even mere replacement fertility for more than 40 years, American women's selfish, ego-driven lifestyles have resulted in a population that is literally dying off. More white people are now dying than being born nationwide. Yet, the Anglobitch still proudly marches around Washington demanding the right to kill her own unborn offspring rather than demanding that women be responsible and use one of the myriad forms of birth control available. I recently listed about a dozen and a half forms of birth control right here on ROK that will prevent pregnancy in the first place, but Anglo women find killing unborn children a sexier topic than using birth control properly.

No Fun to Be Around. Anglo girl's personalities are the interpersonal equivalent of wandering into a dry, dry desert. One realizes just how obtuse the Anglobitch is after he's spent months or years abroad. She is in many ways a miserable human being. In fact, many of them will go out of the way to be boorish and offensive. Beyond those negatives, they have nothing of interest to talk about other than the trite talking points shoved into their silly putty minds by social engineers in the public school system pushing careerism and the mediaites pushing hatred for men.

Have Made Themselves Slave Owners. Slavery never ended in the United States, for potential slaves are exactly what fathers are in modern times. Women can single-handedly turn a free man into a slave who has 18 years of debt servitude and penury on his hands with one call to a filthy lawyer. This is one of the most inhuman ways of treating men in human history, a return to the doleful days of the matriarchy, before society was civilized. We are regressing to a society in which men have no roles, and will become uncivilized as a result. That fact is based on anthropological science, not opinion.

Are Empty Souls Attempting To Fill The Void With Material Things. On my trip around the nation, I noticed just how similar every state and every town is to every other state and town in the country. Thanks to women, who drive four-fifths of the consumption economy, the nation is literally a coast to coast shopping mall built on the female predilection for mindless consumption and Keeping Up With The Joneses. I see women populating these churches of materialism with nothing inside them except the desire to mindlessly buy more and more and more consumer crap, and to make sure her crap is better than her neighbor Becky's crap. This is the be-all, end-all of human existence, and the great victory for women's lib? A world of drones lumbering around the mall and local slop joint?

Pump And Dump, My Friends

Use her for sex before she uses you for utility value

This recent experience – reinforcing knowledge I already knew – only served to take away any remaining guilt I had for looking at women as sex objects. By their own volition, that's the life they've chosen. When they have nothing to offer but sex, they shouldn't be outraged when that's all men want from them. Women did this to themselves, with the assistance of unscrupulous social engineers.

No man should be expected to make an investment in an empty human being, devoid of any qualities that makes her worthwhile to a man except the sex she maneuvers to control and even enslave him with. As many of us know the modern Anglobitch exhibits all the traits of a predator, elucidated by Lawrence Shannon:

> Know your adversary. Know that she IS your adversary. Develop a working understanding of predatory females. Accept what you've learned about predatory females, both emotionally and intellectually. Forget your past presumptions and values concerning females. They were sprinkled into your mind by the matriarchal system. You have to break out. For the risks involved, you'd definitely be better off with a high class prostitute. After all, there are good reasons, most of them very Darwinian, for prostitution being the oldest profession. We're talking survival here. Banned and hunted by the matriarchal society because they threaten the established marital scam, prostitutes are not > only legal in some jurisdictions, but may be the wisest investment for your dating dollar.

In other words, better to pay for the ass up front rather than suffering a balloon payment after a frivorce. Don't let the predator eat your bank account and freedom.

So, next time there's a pang of guilt inside you for using a woman for your pleasure and a good time, purge those feelings from your mind. You got to the predator before she got to you. You tapped it before she could maneuver to use and abuse your utility value. Make out like a bandit, and never feel any remorse for the pump and dump.

American women literally have nothing else to offer men other than sex.

P.S. Legalize prostitution in all 50 states, already. Not just Nevada.

Read More: Why Anglo-American Women Are Terrible Financial Investments

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

5 Superbowl Commercials That Were Made To Subvert American Culture

February 7, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen, I didn't bother to watch the Superbowl. I know, I know—but when you don't care about either of the teams, what's the point?

In addition to not caring about which team won (I'm a Redskins fan and have long given up hope), I also hate the overtly socialist, multi-cultural Superbowl commercials that typically play. If you haven't been living under a rock, you'll have noticed that they've been getting progressively more and more obvious over the past decade or so… and boys, this Superbowl was no exception.

Here's 5 of the most blatantly globalist Superbowl commercials of 2017:

1. Coca Cola

Featured in Coca Cola's super bowl commercial of 2017, is the song "America the Beautiful," being sung in multiple languages. Again, this is just so overtly pro-globalist I'm struggling with what to say.

After all, what can be said? The entire song pictures the "beauty," of all cultures—children are seen playing games, young adults are dancing, it seems like a great time. Of course, they forgot to leave out the fact that most Iraqi citizens vehemently hate Americans, and want us dead.

They forgot the fact that we've been at war with the Middle East for the past 16 years, but oh, no, don't worry about that! Just listen to the pretty music and watch the cool scenery of peaceful individuals loving one another! Coca Cola is directly undermining the security of our nation by pushing this multi-cultural agenda, and it's time to stop drinking their products for good.

2. Audi

Oh, so it's 2017 and we're still pushing the wage gap myth? Despite the fact that Time Magazine and Forbes Magazine literally debunked this YEARS ago, greedy corporate whores and bitter feminazis continue to spit out this lie.

This commercial starts off with a young cute little girl in a race, up against all boys, of course—her father gives a heart-wrenching speech about how women are being oppressed, again, to further this absurd oppressed vs. oppressor cultural Marxist narrative. Here's a full transcript of the video:

> "What do I tell my daughter? Do I tell her that her grandpa's worth more than her grandma? That her dad's worth more than her mom? Do I tell her that, despite her education, her drive, her skills, her intelligence, she will automatically be valued as less than every man she ever meets? Or maybe, I'll be able to tell her something different."

Again, this is blatant anti-male, fourth wave college campus feminist propaganda. Don't buy an Audi.

3. 84 Lumber

Perhaps the most blatantly anti-Trump propaganda piece of all time, this commercial features a long and arduous journey made by a single mother with her young little girl. They journey far and wide, from some South American country, for miles and miles… only to be met by the Donald's wall.

There they stand, staring at said wall, in all hopelessness—they each shed their tears, and hug one another in a very emotional scene. Of course, this is nothing more than emotional propaganda meant to sway your political opinions, though. At the end of the commercial, the mother and her daughter push through the wall's doorway, and the scene ends with the following:

> "The will to succeed is always welcome here."

Okay, so let me get this straight—two ILLEGAL immigrants come up from South America, and they're condoning this? How disgusting is that? Again, the bleeding heart liberals will cry and complain and moan and whine about how "Muh feelings!" but the truth remains that we cannot accept illegal immigrants.

We have a system to help them come here, if they abide by said system. I'm sorry, but it's just not financially possible to continue taking on so many illegal immigrants, with zero education. They're a massive burden to the tax payers, and it needs to end—we need the wall.

4. AirBnB

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5qUTYHnLz2g

As beautiful piano music plays in the background, a collage of different skin colors and ethnicities are overlayed upon one another. Sentences appear, one by one, as the music plays, leaving us with a bunch of “good feels,” and “muh emotions.” Here is what is said in the commercial:

> “We believe no matter who you are, where you’re from, who you love, or who you worship, we all belong. The world is more beautiful the more you accept.”

Okay, so basically they’re saying that being a violent extremist who wants to throw acid on a woman’s face for showing her ankles, is the same as someone who goes to Church every Sunday and donates 10% of his income to charity? Nice try, Soros.

Again, this is riddled with Leftist propaganda—obviously it would be nice if the whole world could get along, but this is CLEARLY not possible, and in fact, trying to do so is often quite dangerous. I don’t know about you guys, but I’m going to stop using AirBnB.

5. Mr. Clean

The video shows a sexy Mr. Clean dancing and flirting with some woman, who is in complete awe over him, as Justin Timberlake’s suggestive music plays in the background. Then, near the end of the commercial, “Sarah,” this girl, snaps out of it. She is greeted by her beta-male, cuck-looking husband who is completely lacking in any and all masculinity.

Despite his unkempt appearance, and chubby belly, she jumps on top of him, ready to make love—the message is, be a good little boy and clean for your wife! It doesn’t matter that the majority of American women don’t cook or clean anymore, because you could get sex if you clean!

The commercial ends by saying: “You gotta love a man who cleans,” urging beta-cuck husbands to take up a traditionally female role. Poor guy. If only he could learn how to be an alpha male.

Read More: How Superbowl Marketing Discredited Feminism

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

3 Reasons Why You Always Need To Be Performing At Your Best

February 7, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Limitless Brain

Life comes at you fast, and if you're not prepared for it, so many opportunities can pass you by. Given how hyper-competitive modern life is—in business, in sports, in dating—it's very easy for you to miss out if you're not performing at your best. While exercising and eating right will put you on the right track to peak performance, there are many other ways you can speed past the competition and achieve your goals. Here's why you need to max out your performance physically, mentally and socially…

1. You'll succeed more at business

Business is a high-pressure, high-risk, high-reward environment that rewards quick thinking, smart planning and courage. If your brain is not working at one hundred percent, you run the risk of missing opportunities to advance in your career. Fortune favors those who spot opportunity and seize it, so you need to be at peak performance on the job in order to succeed in your chosen career field.

For example, nootropics such as those found in Limitless Brain can enhance your mental performance on the job. Limitless Brain includes nootropics and stimulants such as huperzine, which enhances neuroplasticity and memory, enabling you to absorb information more quickly and efficiently. L-tyrosine can reduce your stress levels as well as make you more verbally adept by targeting the portion of your brain responsible for language.

Given how competitive the business world is, you can't afford not to use every advantage available to you. Nootropics and other supplements can give you the edge necessary to succeed and achieve your dreams.

2. You'll perform better in the gym

Working out and eating right is a necessary part of maintaining a healthy lifestyle, but if you're not taking care of your body properly, you might be wasting your time in the gym. Peak performance is a necessity when lifting in order to avoid injuries and make the most of your workouts, so you need to keep your energy levels and physical strength as high as possible without resorting to excessive amounts of caffeine and other potentially harmful stimulants.

For example, supplements such as sulbutiamine can reduce your overall stress levels and lower your fatigue, allowing you to stay alert for longer and lift harder in the gym. Adrafinil can also be used to enhance your energy levels without giving you the jitters and nervousness that come from consuming too much caffeine. The negative effects of caffeine can be mitigated with l-theanine, a nootropic that naturally calms you down and reduces social anxiety. Additionally, l-theanine has been proven to lower both blood pressure and heart rate, enhancing the health of your circulatory system.

Considering that modern life is geared towards making people as fat and unhealthy as possible, you're already facing an uphill battle in maintaining your health and body. You need every advantage that you can get in order to maintain your physical fitness and accomplish your workout goals. Maintaining peak performance in the gym is a necessity for maximizing your lifts.

3. You'll perform better with women

Return Of Kings readers don't need to be reminded that we live in a hypercompetitive sexual market, where bad female attitudes and obesity have driven the egos of attractive women into the stratosphere. We live in an environment where plain Janes get treated like perfect tens and there's always an army of beta orbiters ready to slaver over a girl's MySpace angle selfies on Facebook, Instagram, or wherever.

In this kind of an environment, you can't simply be a good man, you need to be the best man. The only way you can do this is by staying at peak performance. In a world where male thirst has reached epidemic levels, you need to stand out from the pack in every way when it comes to your game, your accomplishments and your looks. By remaining in top physical and mental shape, you can make yourself more socially adept and have an easier time getting girls.

Many of the supplements mentioned above (found in Limitless Brain) reduce your social anxiety, making getting girls easier. For example, l-tyrosine's ability to increase your verbal acuity makes it easier to charm a girl with your wit and wisdom, while l-theanine will lower your stress levels and make you calmer. Huperzine's ability to enhance your memory and senses also makes it easier to deal with girls.

In a world where everything you have has to be earned, there's no excuse for lagging behind when it comes to performance. Using the tricks in this article, you can boost your physical and mental state past the average man, allowing you to dominate in the boardroom, bedroom and the gym. Peak male performance can be yours: you just need to reach out and take it.

Click Here to Learn More about LIMITLESS BRAIN and Shop Now!

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

When Will Homosexuals Take Personal Responsibility For The Spread Of HIV?

February 7, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

What do Elton John and the late George Michael, pictured in the main photo for this article, have in common? They've spent years talking about HIV/AIDS, all without convincing a great many gay men to take responsibility for not contracting it. In fact, gay men with HIV/AIDS are routinely—and falsely portrayed—as the victims of discrimination, to the point of being able to say society itself caused their infection.

Numerous organizations blame "homophobia" on why gay men get the disease, instead of an individual's poor life choices. For example, the stupidly-named Human Rights Campaign says that "[d]ealing with the potential consequences of bias and discrimination—job loss, homelessness, lack of healthcare insurance—often results in LGBTQ people engaging in behaviors that facilitate the spread of HIV." In other words, "I felt horny, decided not to wear a condom, and got HIV/AIDS."

For over two decades, gay men have been aware of the severe risks of HIV/AIDS. Governments and charities pump hundreds of millions of dollars, possibly even billions, into awareness and treatment programs. Yet homosexuals and actively bisexual men, around 2% of the population, still account for 82% of all male HIV/AIDS diagnoses in the United States and 67% of all diagnoses. Clearly bucketloads of gay and bisexual men continue to refuse to take responsibility for their health. But few people can raise this problem without being publicly attacked as "homophobes."

If over one million Americans are living with HIV/AIDS, two thirds of them are gays/male bisexuals, and 2% of American men are gay/bisexual, over 20% of gay/bisexual men suffer from the disease. For every five male partners a gay or bisexual man has, one of them is likely to have HIV/AIDS. This is roughly the same rate as in the general populations of sub-Saharan HIV/AIDS hotspots, including South Africa, Lesotho, Swaziland and Namibia.

Perversely, HIV/AIDS is still seen as a "human rights" issue in the West. Though the health system should certainly treat individuals with the disease, large numbers of people within the gay community are wilfully engaging in behaviors they know will eventually make them contract HIV/AIDS. Instead of holding LGBT individuals to account for their moronic recklessness, HIV/AIDS is perceived through the lens of victimhood and "homophobic" discrimination.

The HIV/AIDS epidemic amongst the LGBT population is also intensely selfish. It takes important government and private resources away from sick people who develop illnesses through no fault of their own. I'm more inclined to feel sorry for a child with leukaemia than a 35-year-old gay man who has brushed aside years of cautionary literature about what can happen when he penetrates another man's asshole without a condom. The same goes for people living on a $1 a day in sub-Saharan Africa–these people can actually be seen as victims.

Why this matters

Homosexuality is a rare topic choice for my articles. Aside from occasional pieces, such as how it is easier to come out as gay or transsexual in Hollywood than as a conservative, I tend to leave the issue alone. Part of the reason is the general futility of trying to "convert" gay people to heterosexuality. Certain Christian conservatives have spent too little time on positively advancing their idea of the nuclear family and too much time concentrating on gay men who aren't going to change their sexual practices anytime soon.

Nonetheless, the HIV/AIDS victim factory raises my ire. We all make mistakes in life, but gay and bisexual men seem to be the only group getting a badge of honor from their stupidity in contracting HIV/AIDS. I will not ever wish this disease on a person, but I also cannot be blind to the pass society gives gay men to infect themselves with such a serious ailment, irrespective of whether treatment options have improved. As you can see from the video above, discussion about HIV/AIDS has gone on since the days of Princess Diana. There is simply no excuse for so many gay men contracting it in the 2010s.

Whilst there's no proof that British singer George Michael died of HIV/AIDS (and I don't believe he did, either), he was instrumental in the "public awareness" campaigns that really took off in the late 1990s. Elton John, who, unlike Michael, does not have the disease, was another key figure in the earlier appeals to gay men. The problem is that these initiatives, however much they claimed to preach "be careful" attitudes, failed to properly portray members of the gay community as agents of their own infection.

Is it a "human rights" issue when a man gets a woman pregnant?

The guy who caused this won't be treated like a victim.

You tempt fate, don't use a condom, get a girl pregnant, and, voila, become a victim. Nope, that never happens. Nor should it. In fact, you get lumped with 18 years of supporting the child directly or government-enforced child support. As a society, we believe in a personal responsibility-centric law of cause and effect for a man getting a woman pregnant. But what about a typically gay disease that will either eventually kill you or cost the health system tens of thousands of dollars per case? Well, that's just bigotry against gay men.

My fellow Return Of Kings columnists and I frequently remark on the need for SJWs and liberals to keep privileged groups as never-ending victims. Whether we focus on urban blacks shooting other blacks at epidemic levels but blaming white police, gays contracting HIV/AIDS at obscene per capita rates, or women turning a man whistling into “sexual assault,” the pity-me factory of victimization is always in overdrive.

Here’s our advice for gay men: if you don’t want HIV/AIDS, don’t do the things that get you HIV/AIDS. But I suppose saying this makes us homophobes, right?

Read More: The Truth About AIDS & Heterosexual Transmission

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Secret To Having A Great Sex Life In The Modern Age

February 7, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Women, it is frequently said, now enjoy almost limitless complimentary sexual attention from men every day of their lives, not only from those who make their desires known in person, but also from the hordes of slack-jawed, wild-eyed, thirsty chumps on social media and Tinder.

Men, too, have many options—it's just that they are not so readily revealed to us. But through the advance of the ever-more refined technologies of daygame men in large cities and towns can also have varied and interesting dating lives if they maximise their exposure to the sexual marketplace. The best way of doing this? Whether you currently have an abundance of options or not, ensure that you approach women every single day.

The Playing Field is Not Even

Lest I am ever lulled into the false sense that the dating market is an equal-opportunity space for both genders, I am frequently presented with a real-life reminder that explodes my naivety, demonstrating precisely how easy women have it, and how adroitly they play the game. Put simply, a women will always ensure that she is equipped with many options.

This week I met a cute Italian girl—an 8 on my scale—through a day game approach in Central London that had been sparky and charged. Let's call her Julia. We'd exchanged a few WhatsApp messages throughout the day and things seemed to be going well.

I messaged her yesterday evening to see what she was doing (and to see whether I could arrange an impromptu meet-up). Here's a transcript of our ensuing conversation:

> Troy: You out partying tonight or behaving yourself?
>
> Julia: On a blind date (that emoticon where the creature is covering its eyes) it's not good lol
>
> Troy: Need rescuing?
>
> Julia: Haha I can't leave yet that's harsh
>
> Troy: Give it another ten then. I'm in Chelsea. You?

> Julia: Greenwich Never been here before. Won't be returning lol
>
> Troy: You definitely need to get an Uber into town
>
> Julia: Come pick me up Disaster.com

Now bear in mind, she's messaging me, a random guy who chatted her up on the street the day before, while actually out on a date with this poor buffoon. Presumably he didn't suspect a thing, happy merely to have been set up with such a cute girl, oblivious to her digital hypergamous treachery.

The truth is that girls are doing this kind of thing all the time and why not? Guys do the same thing too, provided they have sufficient options. This is where the requirement for continual approaching comes into play.

Approach One Girl A Day

Back in 2013 Roosh published what became a seminal post entitled One Approach A Day. You should make the effort to read it in its entirety, but its key message is that, while one approach a day is a harder habit to implement than it might initially sound, its one whose benefits are exponential, including lowered approach anxiety, tighter game, less dependence on alcohol to talk to women and more interactions with women. As with most things in life, a dogged persistence in the face of adversity is necessary:

> Tomorrow when you wake up, I want you to figure out how you're going to do one approach. Just one. Then the day after that, I want you to do another approach. And then keep going. If one day you have a horrible fever, you'll have to do your approach on the way to the pharmacy. If you got a date, you'll have to arrive earlier and do it on the street. There are no exceptions. It's a tough habit, but you'll be more than pleased at the results.

One of the most common objections I get when I tell men that they should always ensure that their pipeline of potential girls is full and healthy at all times is along the lines of "who has the time to do that" or "don't you have anything better to do with you time?" And indeed, as with any task, the thought that loads of time-zapping effort is required to generate an abundance of women is understandably enough to put any guy off.

But Roosh's simply formulation shows that there is no need to worry. One approach should take little more than five minutes out of your day if that. You don't even need to amend your regular routine. They key thing is that you commit to executing the plan and you stick to it.

My Current Day Game Strategy

My current day game strategy, and one which I would recommend other guys looking to widen their net of opportunities try too, is as follows. Inspired by Roosh, during the week when I'm busy with work I adhere to the one approach a day (minimum) rule. At the weekends when I have more time and anyway am committed to engaging in game in order to create meaningful and authentic content around the subject I do ten approaches (minimum) per day.

In an average week, then, by performing the minimum I've committed to I rack up 25 approaches (1 x 5 + 10 + 10 = 25). In a month that will be 100 approaches (25 x 4 = 100). Over the whole year 1200 (100 x 12 = 1200).

Bear in mind that this is based on me working at a lower intensity than I could so that I have time for writing and my other work.

Think about that for a moment, though. On an average month, without much undue adjustment to my already busy strategy, I'm interacting with 100 new girls. Now contrast that with the average Joe you know from the office or the bar. How many new women do you think he's meeting?

The Benefits Of Daily Approaching

There are several distinct benefits to this pattern of approaching. The first is that (in advertising terms) my one-a-day weeks give me frequency of impact while my weekend session give me (relative) mass exposure. Basically, I'm covering a lot of ground. The second is that I am always maintaining momentum, both on a meta and a micro level. That is to say, if I've approached a girl in a coffee shop yesterday I'm going to be more comfortable doing so today, which in my extended weekend sessions I enjoy the build-up in momentum you naturally get over the course of ten approaches.

The third benefit is that I don't get too attached to the outcome of any interaction with an individual girl. Why should I? After all, I know that tomorrow I'm going to hit on another who might be hotter. The surprising thing here is that even if you are getting rejected (and you will be) your overall sense of abundance is still increased as your eyes are opened to the sheer number of girls there are out there.

The final benefit, of course, is that the more you operate this kind of system, the better and smoother your interactions become and the more confident and daring you are. It's a virtuous cycle. After all, with other skills such as writing, music or sports daily practice is also recommended.

Confront Abundance With Abundance

As my WhatsApp conversation with Julia demonstrates, women are playing the game too and they're awash with abundance. Why not give yourself that same advantage? All you have to do is approach at least one woman every day.

So what are you waiting for?

Want to find out how to attract a steady stream of beautiful girls? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter.

Read More: Why Abundance And Ruthlessness Are Needed to Get Hot Girls in 2017

3 Anti-Trump Companies That Men Can Boycott Today

February 8, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Return Of Kings has a massive following—this is our strength. We're not just a rag-tag team of a few thousand men scattered across the globe…we're hundreds of thousands strong, with our message growing more and more every single day. Whether the cucks like it or not, we have the power to significantly impact this country.

One of the best ways to significantly impact our country, in my opinion, is to hit the elites where it hurts: right in their pockets. We already cost J.J. Abrams and his overtly multi-cultural propaganda piece Star Wars: The Force Awakens an estimated 4 million dollars, so why not start doing the same for companies that have vehemently spoken out against Trump?

Do not underestimate the power of your pockets, gentlemen. The collective realization that "news" such as CNN and MSNBC is completely fake, and the consequent refusal to watch their programs, is what's caused them to lose their shit over the past 6 months. We, the men at Return of Kings, as well as our ideological allies all throughout the manosphere, have caused massive changes by simply diverting our attention from elite-owned operations, and giving it to better causes (such as ROK, Breitbart, InfoWars, etc.).

So, with this in mind, here's my top 3 companies that we can boycott TODAY to show support of the resurgence in American traditionalism:

1. Starbucks (Anti-Trump)

As I have covered before, Starcucks is already a degenerate enough company as it is—they support several transsexual activist groups and lobbied hard for Planned Parenthood, but that's not even the worst of it.

Recently, after Trump declared that, for the safety of our nation, he was going to ban refugees from several key terrorist-ridden nations, Starbucks responded by saying that they were going to hire 10,000 refugees. If this isn't the epitome of arrogant and selfish political agendas, I don't know what is. We have veterans in the streets, our African American population has a nearly 25% unemployment rate, oh, but no… let's prioritize foreigners, says Starbucks.

By now, you should realize that Starbucks is a globalist whore, and this isn't going to change any time soon. I'm not asking you to give up coffee—it's by far one of the best nootropics of all time, and it did, in fact, even fuel the age of enlightenment. Instead of going to Starbucks, just get your coffee from Peet's, get an organic roast from your local farmer's market or organic co-op, or make it at home with an Aeropress unit like Roosh does.

It's time we #BoycottStarbucks and refuse to support their globalist agenda with our hard-earned dollars. And besides, not having to speak with a transsexual, plant-identifying, non-cis-non-binary, purple-hair-dyed barista is enough of a reward as it is.

2. Kellogg's (Anti-Trump)

On November 29th, 2016, Kellogg's announced that they would be blacklisting conservative media hub Breitbart, because they don't believe that their 45,000,000 monthly readers are "in line" with the company's views. Okay, that's fine—it's a free country and they have the right to do that.

But, do you know what, Kellogg's? We have a right to refuse to support your bullshit cucking out of the United States of America, and millions of Americans are already doing so. Here's a few of Kellogg's brands, so you know what to avoid:

- Pop Tarts
- Rice Krispies
- Frosted Flakes
- Apple Jacks
- Raisin Bran
- Fruit Loops
- Kashi

3. Welch's (Anti-Trump)

Welch's, the maker of various jams and juices, has followed Kellogg's suit in banning their ads on Breitbart, because, again, somehow the 45 MILLION monthly readers don't align with the company's values (I wonder why). People have already been speaking up, however, because remember—what makes the alt-right strong isn't necessarily how vocal they are, but rather how willing they are to take decisive action.

Sorry Welch's, but conservatives fight back (unlike the crybaby left)

And now, here are three companies you should support who have actively promoted the interests and viewpoints of our commander-in-chief:

1. Yuengling (Pro-Trump)

Be right back boys, I'm going to head to my local gas station and get me a six pack—alright, I'm back. Time to get down to business.

Yuengling, which is America's oldest brewery, was very vocal in their support of Donald Trump. Their CEO, Richard Yuengling Jr., publicly endorsed Donald Trump before he was elected president. In fact, he even gave a tour of the brewery to Donald Trump's son, Eric:

> Thank you to Dick Yuengling for an amazing tour of the oldest brewery in the U.S! @Yuengling_Beer #PottsvillePA #MAGA
>
> — Eric Trump (@EricTrump) October 24, 2016

So, while I usually only recommend drinking alcohol for newbies trying to overcome approach anxiety, seeing that this glorious company supports the return of the greatness of America, I'll make an exception.

2. UFC (Pro-Trump)

Dana White, a part owner of the UFC, has spoken out, calling Donald Trump a "loyal friend," and he even spoke out during the Republican National Convention, claiming that "Donald Trump is a fighter and I know he will fight for this country."

Well, fortunately for our country, he was right. The lib-cucks have tried their best to boycott pro-Trump companies such as UFC, but too bad for them that only about 2% of their audience is made up of liberals, seeing that UFC is one of the most alpha male sports of all time.

3. Hobby Lobby (Pro-Trump)

As if the whole birth control healthcare fiasco of this company wasn't enough, they've also recently decided to place their support with Donald Trump (a wise decision). David Green, who is the CEO of the traditionally conservative company with over 600 stores nation-wide, is extremely Christian and has spoke out against Hillary, claiming that she "…believes that government interests supersede the protection of religious liberty," which she does.

In addition to this, he has also said that "…Donald Trump has been steadfast in expressing his commitment to uphold the Constitution, and his list of possible Supreme Court nominees inspires confidence that there is hope in my future—and in my grandchildren's future—for a country that will value those most fundamental rights."

So if you'd like to get your girlfriend a feminine hobby, such as sewing, painting, knitting, or home-furnishing, Hobby Lobby is now your go-to place.

We've reached a stage in the culture wars where we can financially hurt companies and entities which stand opposed to our values. It may be prudent to take advantage of that, and starve the beasts that are trying to harm us and our society, while helping ones that benefit us.

Read More: 5 Companies To Boycott If You Want The West To Survive

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

Taking The Red Pill Is One Of The Hardest Things A Man Can Do

February 8, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Chances are if you're reading this, you're going through, or have already gone through, a major change in your life. You're clearly not happy with something, but maybe it's hard to quantify exactly what that something is. Frankly, this is the most aggravating thing about the entire process of unplugging. Nothing has turned out how it was supposed to. Hopefully, you've now realized that you're not quite alone in this big and vast world.

Now comes the hardest part, one that many are unable to ever move past: acceptance.

It will be the hardest thing you have ever done in your life, hands-down. Learning to come to terms with everything that you once knew, that has now been shattered, will break you down in ways you cannot even fathom. Many men don't make it out on the other side. Those who do are rewarded greatly. Those who do not are left behind in perpetual angst. They know the truth, are able to grasp straws of it, but cannot take action. They have to live the rest of their life in a constant state of regret.

Regret is the worst thing in the world. You will take it to your grave and it will bury you like dirt. However, having the knowledge to fix your life and not doing it every single day will destroy you. You will have no soul left to take to the grave.

Childhood Got It Wrong

I went to school when I was a small child, and I behaved myself. I didn't pull girls pigtails, I didn't break stuff, and I got good grades. I'll always remember how all the girls loved me because I was so nice. My mom always tells the story about how when I was in first grade, and got invited to a girl's birthday party. There were about twenty girls and I was the only boy. Man, if I could go back in time, I would go punch six-year-old me in the face and tell him to start pulling those pigtails. Six-year-old me was naive and had an excuse. 25-year-old me doesn't have that convenience anymore.

It's important to really sit down and hammer out everything that you've potentially been lied to in your life. Everything is not what it appears, and there is a reason masculinity has become so pathetic in the Western culture. Men have been biologically programmed for thousands of years to desire a high amount of sex, to make decisions, to fight, and to build. Everything that makes the masculine.

The problem is that in the last fifty or so years, we've had a cultural shift of thinking. Unfortunately, people get culture and hardwired biology mixed up. You simply cannot undo thousands of years of biological programming with fifty years of cultural programming. In today's world, men are being told to be sensitive (not fight), be nice (results in no sex), to work for someone else (not building), and to defer to your woman in every possible case (not decisive).

Yes, don't you dare do something without her permission. You know what I'm talking about. Most of you reading it have "those friends"—unable to get up to take a piss without his wife's permission.

Women Are Mixed Up, Too

And rather than being angry at them for going for the bad boys, for rejecting you, and generally making your life tough—you need to let go of that anger. You must feel a bit of empathy for them. You have to understand that they are just confused about the current cultural predicament as you are. To blame them for these faults in a torment of misogyny will not get you where you want. It won't get you more sex, it won't get you a relationship, and you'll only become worse over time. Remember what I said about not having any soul left.

You see, women have been programmed for thousands of years, too. While men were programmed to want sex, make decisions, fight, and build—women were programmed to nurture. To stay at home. To raise babies. To maintain a hearth for her family. Everything that makes the feminine.

Now women are told that not only can they have it all, but they're expected to do it all, too! They're supposed to go to college, get a career in an office job, then find the love of her life and have babies (but after she's lived a full youth). On top of it, they're told they need to be just as analytical as men in the fields of engineering and science, they're told that they should be decisive, and that they should fight and build things, too.

The result is a torment of their souls, too. Sure, there are exceptions to this. There are women who truly do want to be lawyers and doctors working 80 hour weeks. However, these are outliers. The vast majority of women seem to hate their boring office jobs at no cost. They don't get the same satisfaction from work that men do. Men tend to build, and then women tend to nurture what has already been built.

Use a house as a prime example. The majority of construction workers in the world are going to be men. When a home is built, it's a man who puts it all up. It's the woman who then nurtures the home and makes it great. And a home needs that feminine touch, only that type of woman can provide it. Don't kid yourself into thinking you can do it all, either. Men build, women nurture.

Let Go

It's a natural tendency to get really angry at women, the world (even though it's very different in other places), and even your fellow men for a while, when you realize the truth. You become upset at the way that women naturally respond to a powerful man. Then there's the reality—you're not that powerful man. At the same time, it's probably been women your whole life telling you indirectly not to be that powerful man. Be a nice guy and the right girl will pick you—right.

It's absolutely terrifying knowing that you have your entire destiny in your own control now, which is why many men have such a hard time getting over the mountain. They're facing the real world reality and can't handle it. Like I said, they die full of regret. It's a scary thing, having all the tools but no real idea where to start or how to use them. It's far easier to retreat back into the "normal" and just live the life you've been programmed to live. Most can't handle it. And it's fair, because it's the entire worldview that's been instilled within you since birth being flipped upside down.

However, the only way you can build a new world is to just let go.

Letting go is helped a hell of a lot by getting lots of new girls, just like a king. Make sure to visit This Is Trouble for more content hell bent on being the best you can.

Read More: 5 Ways Our Modern World Is A Pale Simulation Of The Past

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Why Chuck Norris Is Worthy Of Praise Rather Than Parody

February 8, 2017 | by M.T. White | Link | Original Link

Chuck Norris is worthy of every man's respect. But you wouldn't know that watching any mainstream media today. These days, he is more an object of playful sneering at best (look at any of the "Chuck Norris Facts") and condescending dismissal at worst (mention his name to any leftist film nerd).

This cultural snubbing is partially understandable. He's a practitioner of a martial art considered lame (Tae Kwon Do), his film and television output—his main claim to fame—was of varying quality with his good product (Lone Wolf McQuade and Code Of Silence) vastly outweighed by the bad (his entire 1990's catalog). Worse yet, his late career embrace of Evangelical Christianity and vocal participation in conservative politics guaranteed him a potential place of scorn with the leftist cultural overlords.

Now, he seems to be a quaint artifact from a bygone era (Karate magazines of the 70s and action movies of the 80s), relegated to late night television infomercials (Total Gym), and Walker, Texas Ranger re-runs on some obscure digital sub-channel. When he does make a "mainstream" appearance in movies or television, he's practically the physical embodiment of a punchline (see Dodgeball or The Expendables 2).

Chuck Norris in Dodgeball

Usually, if an actor or performer embraces anything right of extreme left-wing politics, there are either immediate professional repercussions (witness the cowardice of singers dropping out of Donald Trump's inauguration festivities) or long term smearing of legacies (demeaning John Wayne as a draft dodger, Walt Disney as an anti-Semite etc.). However, fellow Hollywood Republicans (and 80s icons) like Sylvester Stallone, Arnold Schwarzenegger and Bruce Willis have enjoyed lengthy careers. Even strong Catholic Mel Gibson seems to have weathered the storm.

So what's up with Chuck? Why is he the object of cultural derision?

Karate! Karate! Karate!

Norris' first claim to fame was in the martial arts world. With an impressive Karate tournament record and being one of the few in the Hollywood area to actually know an Asian martial art got him a nice gig as a trainer to the stars (like Steve McQueen). Since martial arts was a small niche community at the time, he, along with others like a recent Chinese immigrant named Bruce Lee, trained together and even took bit roles in movies (both participated in 1968 spy parody The Wrecking Crew) to take falls for actors way below their skill level (Dean Martin). When Lee returned to Hong Kong to make movies he called on Norris to fight him in a now classic climax in Way of the Dragon.

Bruce Vs Chuck in Way Of The Dragon

It was exotic to know Karate (Norris actually specialized in the Korean art of Tang Soo Do, a relative of Tae Kwon Do) in 1960s and 1970s. It isn't anymore. With McDojo's in countless shopping centers across America and the rise in popularity of MMA, martial arts have been demystified. In UFC, Karate practitioners (such as Norris contemporary Ron Van Clief) were dispatched with ease. Celebrities now learn Brazilian Jiu-Jitsu from MMA veterans like Bas Rutten. Having a black belt in Karate or Tae Kwon Do carries little prestige in America today.

But that wasn't the case in the 1970s. After the death of Lee, martial arts and martial arts movies became a hot commodity which led to the next phase of Norris' career and add another layer of mockery.

Bad Movies

Norris started in the low budget realm of American independents. Due to the grindhouse success of Kung Fu films and an increased interest in martial arts, film companies tried to capitalize on it with homegrown product. Who better than the American who fought Bruce Lee himself onscreen?

However, the US product lacked the kinetics and cultural cache of its Asian counterparts. Whereas Chinese and Japanese film companies allocated their biggest budgets and best talents behind martial arts fare, Hollywood initially relegated it to the ghetto (literally and figuratively). Similar to other indie-centric genres (horror and porn), novelty, was really the only appeal of American "Karate movies" like Norris'. But his movies had a good return on investment.

As the market demand for Kung Fu flicks transitioned to television, Norris was able to transition to more straight-ahead action fare that would make Stallone and Schwarzenegger household names. But instead of doing it for mainstream studios like Fox or Paramount, he signed on with a notorious mega-indie which would not help his career reputation.

Association With Cannon Pictures

Though moderately successful in the 1980s, Cannon Pictures is more grossly ridiculed today (see the documentary Electric Boogaloo: The Wild, Untold Story of Cannon Films). Ran by Israeli transplants Menaham Golan and Yoram Globus, they are considered as purveyors of schlock, embodying all the negatives of 80s cheese: cheap action thrills featuring Karate, American Ninjas and hysterical Arab villains, all against a backdrop of shrill 'Murica jingoism. This image is not 100% accurate but to every myth there is some truth and Cannon did emphasize quantity over quality for the most part.

Cannon owners Menahem Golan and Yoram Globus

Norris, being their marquee star (along with the other "Chuck"—Charles Bronson) found his career reputation suffer with the negative fortunes of his cinematic benefactors (Cannon filed for bankruptcy; a victim of the junk bond investment schemes of the era). Unlike Bronson, who had a couple decades worth of cinematic goodwill before basically ending his career with Cannon, Norris' main body of work was with the studio. While sneering at Bronson's endless cycle of Death Wish sequels, critics could recall the classics he was a part of (The Magnificent Seven, The Dirty Dozen, the original Death Wish etc.). They experienced no recall with Norris. So they just laughed at Missing In Action, Invasion U.S.A. and Delta Force.

And they probably laughed when Cannon shut down. Unfortunately for Norris, the studio had planned to produce his debut television effort but had to drop out. However, he had enough popularity that CBS agreed to produce his show (networks usually didn't directly produce shows at the time), which became the cherry on top for professional disdain.

Walker, Texas Ranger

Chuck as Walker

Every element of the show embodied cheese: the acting, the writing, the editing and of course it's-so-bad-it's-good theme song. Produced in Dallas—removed from the production center of Hollywood—Walker, Texas Ranger was a lynchpin in that purgatory of network program schedules: Saturday night primetime.

If that wasn't bad enough, a few years after the show started, Norris converted to Evangelical Christianity and didn't shy away from presenting those beliefs on the program. This of course would not endear him to the cultural elites residing in the parenthesis states nor do anything to help ensure his legacy in "official" histories in the annals of Hollywood. His tepid movie output of movies that went straight to video, only seemed to confirm this dismissal.

And Yet…

Though now an object of jest, those poking fun at him do so out of at least mild admiration than any outright hateful motivation. Norris himself is very likable both onscreen and in person. Behind our laughter might be a disguised admiration. Why? Chuck Norris is a self-made man. Really, he embodies the Kaizen ideals of continual self-improvement without regard to the good opinion of others (the elite). He seems comfortable in his own skin, no regrets or insecurities about his career. Better yet, his personal and professional life go against the grain of everything liberals hold dear—mainly victimhood and sucking up to elites. Let's consider his career in reverse:

Walker, Texas Ranger, though pedestrian, was a safe space of sorts for Middle America. Families, home on a Saturday night, desperate for entertainment that would not attack their values found said entertainment in Walker. It's easy to laugh at the innocence of it all but in a way, it was a continuation of the cinematic tradition of actors like Roy Rogers:

Simple fare, with clear cut heroes and villains, giving boys action and adventure without having to face grim reality.

Growing up, Norris admired Rogers and John Wayne—icons to a generation of kids—and wanted to continue their legacy. He succeeded in a way. The show was a solid performer and wasn't intended to be a critical darling. So, when some sneer at Chuck, could it be they are degenerate and don't understand that one does not have to kowtow to critics to make a living?

Though Cannon—with its easy to lampoon immigrant ownership—definitely produced some bottom-of-the-barrel entertainment, people forget that ALL movie studios are guilty of the same thing. Cannon is easy to laugh at because they are out of business—there's no fear of repercussions. Their action movies were puerile entertainment with adult thrills. I would choose to watch a Cannon movie over today's supposed "mature" product with puerile characters, stories and preachy leftist messaging.

Cannon was honest entertainment. Those who grew up in the 80s (myself included) look back on the era with fondness—the apex of the home video era. When I went to the rental store, it was usually Cannon product I was begging my parents to bring home.

Fixtures of every neighborhood video rental store

And Chuck Norris was at the center of this. Adding to the leftist hostility, Norris' Cannon movies, with their strong anti-Communist message, were widely distributed via the black market behind the Iron Curtain. As noted in the documentary, Chuck Norris vs Communism, these movies acted as propaganda to help topple socialist dictatorships. Yes, Chuck Norris helped defeat Communism! So when some sneer at Chuck, could it be he helped destroyed their leftist fantasies?

But most importantly, Chuck Norris represents a masculine ideal that is expressed through martial arts. Yes, Karate and Tae Kwon Do might not work best in a street fight but neither does Brazilian Jiu-Jitsu (you don't want to be on your back on the street). In actuality, along with MMA, Boxing and Greco-Roman Wrestling, they are combat sports with skills that can be appropriated for real life encounters.

And Norris excelled at his respective sport. He learned it in Korea, where the training is more rigorous, with emphasis placed on the mental and spiritual just as much as the physical. He's the first westerner to receive an 8th degree black belt in Tae Kwon Do—a feat that required a lot discipline and self-mastery. And self-discipline is a skill many men are lacking in this modern world.

Looking good in old age

And he did this coming from a background of extreme poverty. Growing up in Oklahoma, he spent his teenage years helping his single mother raise his siblings. So, up from poverty to become a martial arts champion and then a rich movie star; truly an American success story. So maybe when some sneer at Chuck, could it be out of insecurity and weakness?

But all this makes him persona non grata in Hollywood. He didn't beg for handouts, he built himself up, all the while actively participating in movies that literally destroyed leftist shibboleths. In the case of Norris, his "work"—movies and television shows—aren't as important as the force of personality making them. His creative output isn't as strong as his contemporaries but it's really a moot point.

Just as men don't need approval from the feminist left, Norris' fans don't need any cultural stamp of "approval." Chuck Norris is a symbol of what men should aspire to be: Physically and mentally tough as well as self-reliant. He did things his way.

Read More: 4 Reasons Why We Should Praise The Dallas Cowboys Cheerleaders

---

M.T. White

M.T. White is a novelist and blogger. He used to write about MMA, pro-wrestling and movies. He then actually tried MMA and making movies (and had more success in the former). He mainly blogs about media and creativity at Medium. Find him on Twitter or Gab

7 Great Ways For Leftists To Virtue Signal Against Nazism

February 9, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

According to young leftists, “Nazis” seem to be everywhere these days. If you took their (literally Hitler) word for it, you would think they are hidden under your bed, hiding in the trunk of your car, and have implemented a coup d’état of the White House.

Donald Trump and Steve Bannon are almost certainly full-fledged Nazis according to their emotion-driven rhetoric, and lesser Nazis seem to be just about any light-skinned male who does not march lock-step with the progressive agenda.

The fact that a flamboyantly homosexual Jew (Milo Yiannopoulos) has also been dubbed a Nazi shows just how low the bar has been set in order to be grouped with the biggest pop culture villains of the 20th century.

So if Nazis are a resurrected boogeyman in the second half of the 2010’s, how can young progressives impotently fight back against this new-yet-old phantom menace?

Using the original Nazis and how they behaved as a base reference point, we have found seven great ways they can “retaliate” against all these ghost Nazis which seem to be multiplying by the hour.

1. Drink Nothing But Alcohol

Do you drink water? Well guess what… so did Hitler! It is imperative that progressives and SJW's cease drinking water immediately if they want to avoid any association with the king of fascism.

Furthermore, Hitler was a teetotaler for much of his adult life, meaning that he did not consume alcoholic beverages at all. Therefore, you should not only stop consuming water, but you should avoid all non-alcoholic beverages in general.

Drink nothing but beer, wine, moonshine, and spirits all day and every day for breakfast, lunch, and dinner. Your health, finances, employment, and relationships will collapse under the pressures and sickness of being constantly intoxicated, but at least you'll be pulling a direct 180 of what Hitler would be doing.

2. Become A Chain Smoker

Hitler hated smoking, so you must start as early as possible

It might interest you to know that Nazi Germany helped implement the world's first nationwide anti-smoking campaign. That's right, they were well aware of the negative health effects of smoking all the way back in the 1930s, when it was an otherwise debatable phenomenon in most other parts of the world for decades to come.

Hitler himself absolutely despised smoking, and he even called it "the wrath of the Red Man against the White Man, vengeance for having been given hard liquor."

As a progressive social justice advocate, you should find it absolutely horrifying that the Nazis would make such a campaign, and that Hitler personally detested smoking. The only solution for you is to virtue signal and take up smoking without hesitation.

So go spend all of your disposable income on tobacco (if you haven't spent it all on alcohol already) and smoke, smoke, smoke away. Your personal health and finances won't thank you at all, but at least you will be (literally) not-like-Hitler.

3. Get A Giant Neck Tattoo

Sure, the heavily inked Neo-Nazi's are one thing, but sporting tattoos was very rare back in the 1930s and 1940s with the original Nazis. Also taking into consideration their disdain for social degeneracy, you can rest assured that the Nazi's would not have expressed much appreciation for pervasive body ink amongst the German population.

As a progressive, you are well aware that tattoos are like… the coolest thing in the world and stuff. So you've got to get more and more and more in order to virtue signal your anti-fascism.

Smart man and a great role model

More than anything, you need to follow the veiled suggestion from Black Lives Matter advocate DeRay Mckesson (above) and get yourself a nice big neck tattoo if you haven't got one already.

It is very hard to cover and will prevent you from being employed in just about any above-minimum-wage profession outside of the trades (which you almost certainly don't work in), but it's a small price to pay for not being like an old school fascist.

4. Get Fat And Out Of Shape hard at work with armchair activism

The Nazi regime put big emphasis on physical education, especially for young men and boys. However, don't think for a second that slender, fit, and fertile females were highly appreciated too.

An overweight and obese society is a huge social and health care burden, but nonetheless you need to do the direct opposite of what the Nazi's would have preferred for the nation. Get fat.

Thankfully, this is a particularly easy thing to achieve for many SJW-type individuals. They hardly ever set foot in the gym or eat healthy in the first place.

5. Dress Like Shit

(aspiring) Starbucks barista

Wehrmacht officers and senior Nazi officials were immaculately dressed, with handsome tailored suits and decorations which just oozed style, class, and sophistication.

The least thing that a progressive or SJW wants is to have any kind of sense of sophistication, style, and class in their appearance. So please, wear ill-fitting, vulgar, juvenile, or completely outlandish clothing at any and every situation.

For instance, if you have been invited to the opera or have been called in for a prestigious job interview, do not dare show up with a clean suit and dress shoes. That's something the Nazi's would do, so go in flip-flops and a vulgar slogan T-shirt instead. Bonus points for donning an unnatural hair color too.

6. Pursue A Useless Degree And Avoid STEM

where every ghost Nazi-hunting SJW should strive to be

In Nazi Germany's mere 12 years of existence, the regime was an absolute science and technology powerhouse, arguably on a scale the world had never seen before in such a short amount of time.

The world's first practical helicopter came into being, rocketry and submarine technology improved tremendously, the first modern assault rifle was issued, and Nazi Germany spearheaded jet aircraft (a vital component for modern airliners which transport western men to locales with far more desirable and feminine women.)

Therefore, considering all this spectacular technological innovation under the short-lived Nazi's, progressives and SJW's should strive to study useless degrees and avoid all STEM fields.

Taking a make-work job with something like human resources is far more desirable than studying a field which will actually create something of value to society or amount to anything. That would be like something fascists would do.

7. Become Sterile And Avoid Having Children doing her part to be anti-fascist

Finally, Nazi Germany was well aware that demography is destiny, and put considerable emphasis on German women to have large families. Usually, at least four children was preferable, where upon the "Cross Of Honour Of The German Mother" decoration would be awarded along with its accompanying social benefits.

Naturally, as a progressive person, you should do the polar opposite of the Nazi's state ideology and put yourself into voluntary sterility.

Make sure that your genes will not continue into the next generation.

Many segments of society will deeply mourn your genetic dead-end and your great accomplishments in life, like the dozens of impotent “awareness” campaigns you took part in, but it is a small price to pay in order to distance yourself from all those awful Nazis out there.

Read More: 3 Anti-Trump Companies That Men Can Boycott Today

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

How Strong Men Were Transformed Into Beta Males

February 9, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Recently, I was invited to spend some time up at Martha's Vineyard by a couple that we are friends with. At one of the restaurants, I found a peculiar handwritten document that must have been inadvertently left by a previous patron. While I have no clue about the veracity of the document, I found it interesting enough to reproduce for the ROK readers. Here is document. I only inserted pictures and headings for ease of reading, and some links that I thought explained what the author was saying.

The Letter

My dearest nephew, D. Congratulations upon your graduation from Harvard Law. Now, you are ready at last take on the role you were destined for—a ruling member of the globalist elite. All of your training up to this point has been to prepare you for this role. I trust that you will be up to the task.

You had asked me at last October's spirit cooking event about how we keep the masses under our control. I apologize that I have not had a chance to write until now. Here I will discuss only one of the most important aspects of our rule—how we made the men into docile beta males.

The reason that it was necessary to make men passive and submissive is because men are the only thing could possibly pose a threat to our rule. Even a small group of intelligent men working cohesively could pose a grave threat to the current stability which we now enjoy. Therefore, it is of the utmost importance that you understand how we effected this change.

Ending manual labor

One of the first things we did was make manual labor something that is looked down upon. We pushed the message that blue collar work was demeaning. Our effort happily coincided with the increase in automation which eliminated a lot of manual work. Of course, there are still plenty of manual labor jobs to be done, but the men of the first world do not wish to do them. Rather, they import third world immigrants to do the manual labor. This has many benefits for us, but it would take me too far from my present topic to explain.

In any event, the danger of manual labor was that it gave men strong bodies. A medieval peasant was fit. He ate fresh, healthy food and his work was his exercise. By removing men from bodily labor, we've succeeded in creating soft, physically weak men. Weak bodies make for weak, timid minds that are easier to control.

I must warn you that there is a disturbing trend for men to once again build their bodies through weightlifting and martial arts training. It will be up to your generation to put a stop to this before this toxic masculinity begins to cause trouble for us.

Girl Power

You are aware of how many benefits we have derived from the pushing of the feminist message. One of the best ones is that it browbeats men into becoming docile betas. A boy growing up in 2017 will be subjected to millions of subtle messages through the media and education that he is inferior to girls. He is told that girls are better at fighting, raising children, and making scientific discoveries than boys. Girls are better leaders. They are calmer and have more self-control. They will be better mothers—hell, they would even be better fathers—than men could ever be. Girls are perfect and never make mistakes. Despite being superior to boys in all things, girls are downtrodden by the patriarchy.

That's the message of feminism and we make sure that every boy who grows up feels inferior to girls. The result is that they grow to become weak men, unsure of their own abilities. In other words, they grow up to be betas, and that's the way we like it.

Corporate food

We've done an even better job at convincing men to eat garbage. The sugar lobby has performed marvelously convincing Americans that carbs are good and fat is bad. Although that myth is, unfortunately, starting to die, we still have men addicted to corporate food that makes them fat, weak, and compliant.

More distractions

The ancient Roman emperors knew it. The way to placate the masses is through bread and circuses. Not too long ago, the only circuses we offered were sportsball and movies. Thanks to advances in technology we've added porn, social media, and video games. The modern "man" now has abundant ways to waste his time and spend his money (all of which comes back to us).

And we have great plans on this front. Scientists, under our direction, are working on VR sex and sex robots. Once these technologies hit, we predict that about 80% of men will become herbivore men and just drop out of the sexual market altogether. The only people who will reproduce will be us and the few stubborn masculine men out there.

Atomization/Isolation

Man in his natural state is a social creature—spending his time ruling the community, providing for his family, and defending his tribe. But as you know, groups of men getting together in real life is an extraordinarily dangerous threat to our ruling position. That is why we have created a society where men are detached from their families and communities. Men now spend more and more time absorbed in the distractions we've given them. The concept of a tribe is now, thankfully, unheard of in the nations we rule.

There is little threat that men will be able to overcome being atomized. Even when they do try, we are quick to put a stop to them. A couple of years back a men's website called "Game of Kings" or something like that tried to host a meetup. We quickly ran a bunch of media stories accusing them of being rapists. The "Kings" were forced to cancel their meetups and acknowledge that we were their true rulers.

Boiling down morality to economics

One of the biggest obstacles to our rule is that men continued to believe that in morality—the idea that there is a right and a wrong. For example, a man from 1900 would have laughed in our face if we asked him whether he preferred to have a wife or a VR sex machine. He would have chosen a wife because he believed it the right thing was to start a family—not just mere self-gratification.

To counter the obstacle that there are certain things that are inherently right or wrong, we started a multi-decade program to convince people that there is no such thing as morality. Our program has been a smashing success because we have succeeded in convincing most men that the only morality is whether something makes a profit.

- Is it wrong to host a porn site? Not if it turns a profit.
- Is it right to import hordes of third world immigrants? Yes, if it might raise the GDP.
- Is it wrong for Hollywood to push anti-American messages? Not if the movie studios can justify that it will increase international movie sales.
- Is it acceptable for companies to dump toxic chemicals into our drinking water? Yes, if it is good for jobs.

Farewell

Well, I am not accustomed to writing so much and my arm has gotten tired. Of course, this is information that I would never send electronically—there is too much risk, as was painfully clear from the recent hacking of one of our own. I have much more to tell you, but prefer to do so in person. Perhaps at the Spring spirit cooking.

Post script

The letter was unsigned and there was no indication of who the author was. I leave it to ROK readers to judge for themselves whether the document contains anything of value. As for myself, I live by the rule, "if the ruling elites are pushing something, do the exact opposite."

Be sure to check out Michael's book Staying Married in a Degenerate Age*.*

Read More: How To Avoid The 3 Worst Qualities Of The Beta Male

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

How We Can Fix The Problem With Western Marriage

February 9, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Marriage is intended to be a sacred bond between a man and a woman, preferably lasting a lifetime, and a stable platform for them to raise children. This institution dates back to the dawn of civilization. Altogether, it's good for society, and—if things work out—good for individuals.

It's a fact that children raised within a stable marriage tend to have better outcomes. There's a reason why "bastard" is a generic insult, even though it's not the fault of those who literally are bastards. It would be great for our civilization right now if more financially secure couples were having children, rather than letting the government be a surrogate husband while under-parented children all too often run wild.

The consensus position here, though, is that marriage is all too often a sucker deal for men. There's a reason for this. Statistically, it's a coin toss: half the time, nothing bad happens. The other half, you get divorced. Usually for a man, he loses his kids, along with half of everything he's worked for, while having to pay the ex-wife a monthly allowance. There's a word for this: theft.

Let's take a closer look at why this is so, and what can be done to fix the problem.

No-fault divorce

Spreading the unhappiness around

In times past, people could end a marriage if there was a real reason: infidelity, abuse, addiction, mental problems, refusal of relations, and so forth. After no-fault divorce, no real reason was needed; "mutually irreconcilable differences" was the catch-all legal boilerplate. Rather than trying to work things out, they could just split up.

Often, mutually irreconcilable differences are stated as "I'm not happy". There are a couple of problems with that. First, making someone else responsible for one's emotional state is a silly expectation. Further, ups and downs will always happen; that's just the way life works, and it's folly to expect otherwise. Finally, a marriage is carried out either by a judge or at an altar; that's serious business. In earlier times, breaking a vow because of boredom wasn't socially approved. Back in the barbarian days (or even the 1800s), oath-breaking was a foul deed; modern society has lost something vital.

Sometimes the reasons for divorces today are pretty stupid. In two instances, guys I know were divorced because they wouldn't comply when the wives demanded to make changes to their mutual vacation plans at the last minute. One couple had a two year old, and the other had two small children. Way to go, Mom! Happy yet?

These are examples of a frivolous divorce ("frivorce"), also called the YOLO divorce. Actions have consequences; the marriage strike followed the rise of the frivorce. Today, the marriage rates are half of what they once were. Even the Blue Pill public knows it's a sucker deal for men.

Examining the numbers

We have two rather startling statistics about marriage in the USA, likely pretty similar in the rest of the developed world:

- About 50% of marriages end in failure
- About 80% of divorces are initiated by the wives

So, given the above, outcomes for marriage are about the following:

- 10% of marriages are ended by the husbands;
- 40% of marriages are ended by the wives; and
- 50% of marriages endure.

Looking a little closer, there's a category of people who take marriage pretty seriously and won't bail unless there are serious problems. The other category sees marriage as a step beyond "going steady" but doesn't think of it as a lifetime commitment. That's also informed by several factors as well, some of which boil down to a person's character and morals. So, if someone bailed on her last marriage because she "wasn't happy", you might not want to be the next guy to put a ring on her finger!

In any event, we could have a 20% overall divorce rate if women were as seriously committed to marriage as men. That would be pretty cool, because an 80% success rate is a lot more acceptable of a risk than a 50% success rate.

So what accounts for the above statistics? This isn't just a matter of human nature; it's the lack of social restraints that allowed this flakiness to thrive. Society was different in earlier times, which is one piece of the puzzle. Another part accounting for the difference is the cui bono principle: "Who benefits?" So let's follow the money.

Alimony

So she needs him like a fish needs a bicycle, does she?

Although the USA had no-fault divorce everywhere by the 1970s, some aspects of this part of "family law" (the branch of jurisprudence devoted to breaking up families) still go back to a 19th century understandings. The particulars are:

- Women are delicate flowers who can't fend for themselves and need special protection;
- A woman who got divorced was "damaged goods" since she no longer was a virgin; and
- If a divorce happens, it's probably because the man did something bad.

So, back in the 1800s, all this added up to the concept that after a divorce, the man "owed" his former wife an indemnity: alimony. These days, that's a sad joke. Today, women have it drummed into them that they're strong and independent and can pursue any career they want, virgin brides outside of devout religious communities are pretty rare, and—largely lacking the social restraints and male leadership they once had—they even can be praised (rather than criticized) for any sorts of egregious conduct.

The legal justification for alimony is "to support her in the lifestyle to which she has become accustomed". However, this outdated understanding is pretty out of touch with modern times! Further, many divorced men have to drastically downgrade their living conditions, sometimes even getting thrown out of the home he bought—what about his lifestyle?

The other outdated argument for alimony is that the ex-wife is basically owed back wages for all that homemaking. Even in the 1800s, it was baloney; the husband was putting food on the table and keeping a roof over their heads all that time, now wasn't he? Alimony is supposed to be gender-neutral, but in practice, only 4% of alimony recipients are men. That must suck for any female executives and celebrities who got divorced from their boy-toys, and they tend to be pretty furious about it when that happens. All I've got to say is, welcome to our world!

Alimony must be abolished; it's theft. When a relationship ends, its benefits should end too.

Child support

How much of this really will be spent on your kid? Who the hell knows?

What happens to the children is the most depressing aspect of divorces today. We need to fix that. By default, joint custody should be awarded, unless there's a compelling reason otherwise. Unsupported smear tactics (often encouraged by bottom-feeder lawyers, which should be grounds for disbarment for life) don't count.

When child support is awarded, the cost basis should be the same as what the state pays to foster parents. In many cases, inflated child support is being used as back door alimony. Further, DNA testing should be mandatory. If the child isn't the ex-husband's (with the exception of adoptees), he shouldn't be defrauded any further. The cheating ex-wife knows who the real father is; she can go after him instead.

More financial chicanery

Say goodbye to half of it

Property division is another opportunity for a guy to get robbed in court. The idea that a man might have to lose half of everything he worked for is another outdated relic of so-called family law. That needs to end too. Instead, we should let people exit from marriage with whatever assets and property they brought into it. As for what was acquired afterward, division of assets can be calculated proportionally based on what each party earned minus spent on themselves.

Feminists tell us that a woman doesn't need a man, so why do any of them need an ex-husband's money? They should put up or shut up. Since feminists are not clamoring for reform of this area of the law (as well as abolition of alimony) in the name of equality—which they don't really care about these days—then it's yet another example of them wanting to have their cake and eat it. The goal of second-wave feminism was to wreck the family, and they did a fine job of it.

Further, we need to get rid of "heart balm" lawsuits in the jurisdictions where they still exist. When a man proposes marriage, it's an offer, not a contract. It was different back in the Renaissance, but times have changed. I might add that even back in those days, if a woman changed her mind, the man usually had no legal recourse. These archaic measures have no place in modern society. Do guys sue whenever someone flakes on a date? That's a "promise" too, isn't it?

Other factors

Divorce lawyers have an incentive to keep the system as it now exists, and to discourage any clients from having second thoughts; it's their bread and butter. They either get a percentage of whatever they steal from the ex-husband, or they get an hourly rate and have an incentive to drag things out and talk up the bill. It's time we got these lawyers off the gravy train. What other area of the law provides financial rewards for breach of contract?

Divorce is good for real estate and big business too; don't count on their support in helping to reform the system. Every family that splits up will now need two residences, and furnishings for both. The extra demand is one reason why housing costs are crazy high.

Finally, society encourages unrealistic expectations. This includes animated fairy tale movies for kids, bridezilla magazines, romance novels where the guy has a yacht and abdominals like a plate of spaghetti, etc. Feminists also have been guilty of encouraging unrealistic expectations, along with stirring up conflict between the sexes. Finally, there are the bitter divorced friends giving "helpful advice" because misery loves company. Discrediting all the above will be helpful.

Really, today's feminist divorce system hurts women too. For one reason of several, if a woman marries at 25 and divorces at 35, is trading up in terms of mate quality very likely? I think we all know the answer to that one!

In summary

If these proposed reforms are adopted, this will strengthen society greatly. Couples will still be able to get out of dysfunctional marriages. However, if the wife no longer has a financial incentive to leave at the first sign of trouble—she won't be able to rob her husband in court—then she'll make more of an effort to work out any problems that exist, instead of divorcing over things like boredom or vacation plans.

Read More: How To Reduce Your Risk Of Divorce

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

3 Lessons From Political Economist Alberto Alesina

February 9, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Like Dani Rodrik, the Italian Alberto Alesina is one of those Harvard University economists who provide sound arguments and largely unimpeachable data. His articles and books – whether on fiscal policies, country size in relationship to economic growth, ethnic heterogeneity, or a little bit of several inter-related topics – are of course open for rebuttal.

For example, one can criticize him from a Keynesian or national conservative perspective. 2008 Nobel Prize laureate Paul Krugman has criticized Alesina and Silvia Ardagna's article "Large changes in fiscal policy: taxes versus spending" (2009). A nationalist on the other hand, can point out that growth size should be weighted against long-term cultural cohesion.

Nevertheless Alesina's work – often co-authored with other scholars – can inform the reader on a number of crucial sub-topics, related to broader subjects such as economics, politics and demography.

My aim is to briefly present a number of significant arguments and make suggestions on how to complement these ideas with other important aspects of research. Typically, this selection is done from an American perspective, but the reader can contextualize many of these ideas in order to understand other nations as well. Hopefully, it can offer some insights with regard to the overall situation for U.S. citizens, on which state to live in, or even secession.

1. Larger countries are often (but not always) more powerful than smaller ones

There are economic pros from having a large population, such as that per capita costs of public goods are lower (as long as the largest share of the population pays for them, thus forming a large tax base). Additionally, a larger country is less subject to foreign aggression. Furthermore, larger populations often go hand in hand with larger markets. For good and for bad, this does also imply that richer regions or states within a country can cover for less prosperous places.

For that reason, the large size has been crucial in the process of making America great. It is only one main factor but still of great importance.

2. Smaller countries are often (but not always) wealthier than larger ones

However, size has to be weighted against other dimensions such as GDP per capita and the totality of ethnic heterogeneity (racial, ethnic, religious and linguistic) and its implications at the federal, regional and local level.

Generally, a larger population implies larger heterogeneity among different groups and individuals. There are exceptions throughout the world, such as Japan, but in the case of the U.S., the country's population has increased in conjunction with larger heterogeneity, during the last 20 years in particular. Alesina stresses:

> Much more important are the facts that as countries become larger, diversity of preferences, culture, language, "identity" of their population increases. In one word, heterogeneity of preferences increases with size. Being part of the same > country implies agreeing on a set of policies: from redistributive schemes, to public goods to foreign policy; as heterogeneity increases, more and more diverse individuals will have to agree on them. Certain policies can be delegated to localities in order to allow for diversity, but not every policy can be local. As heterogeneity increases, then, more and more individuals or regions will be less satisfied by the central government policies. In fact many harsh domestic conflicts are associated with racial, religious, and linguistic heterogeneity and have threatened the stability of national governments. Easterly and Levine (1997) have documented convincingly how ethnic heterogeneity often interferes with the implementation of good and growth enhancing policies. La Porta et al. (1999), show that various measures of quality of governments in a cross-section of countries are generally inversely related to the degree of ethnic fragmentation. Alesina, Baqir, and Hoxby (2000) document how the preference for racial and income homogeneity contributes to determining the choice of borders of municipalities and school districts in the United States. Alesina and La Ferrara (2000, 2002) relate the extent of participation in social activities and trust (social capital) to the degree of racial fragmentation in American communities.

Plus, most of the richest countries in the world are indeed very small:

> The five largest countries (by population) in the world are China, India, the United States, Indonesia, and Brazil. Among them, only the United States is a rich country. By contrast, many of the richest countries in the world are small. Of the ten richest countries in the world, in terms of GDP per capita, only four have populations above 1 million. They are the United States (260 million people), Switzerland (7 million), Norway (4 million people), and Singapore (3 million people). Of these four, two are below average in terms of population. Singapore experienced the second highest growth rate in the world between 1960 and 1990: 6.3 percent per year. During the same period, the fastest growing economies outside East Asia were Botswana (1 million people), with a growth rate of 5.7 percent per year, and Malta (300,000 inhabitants), which, with 5.4 percent, had the highest growth rate in Europe.

On the other hand, according to Alesina and other economists, smaller countries have to rely on the openness of other markets; they are more inter-dependent. This is an important lesson if one wishes to live in a smaller country. The United States could perhaps be fairly independent if it would allow to cut down on certain material goods and products.

3. Ethnic fragmentation decreases social cohesion and governing

With ethnic heterogeneity one can mean several things, depending on the context. In the U.S. it has the meaning of both racial, linguistic, religious and more subjective and self-defining factors (for instance, blacks and Hispanics tend to be partly or largely of European ancestry). Regardless of exact definitions, ethnic fragmentation and polarization – two terms that Alesina uses in this article – tend to lead to several negative outcomes.

> A large literature on US localities show that in more ethnically fragmented communities, public goods provision is less efficient, participation in social activities and trust is lower, and economic success, measured by growth of city size, is inferior. Evidence that trust does not travel well across racial lines is also supported by experimental evidence.

Of course, people should strive for to make things work as good as possible, but to increase the ethnic diversity even more is indeed only negative. Especially if one takes significant educational as well as cultural differences into account.

Conclusion

Overall, quantity has to be balanced with quality. Specifically the so-called human capital of the country's inhabitants has to be taken into account, but also the values and preferences of presumptive new citizens. In addition, increased ethnic fragmentalization and heterogeneity do likely negatively effect economic growth (GDP per capita size in particular), quality of governance, and social cohesion.

Alesina's work cover many important dimensions of these questions, but I would suggest the German psychologist Heiner Rindermann's work on educational achievement and national IQ differences as a complement. For instance, there are differences between high-skilled and low-skilled Indians. If one is sceptical about to bring in contentious issues such as IQ into the debate, then educational achievement among groups and individuals can function as a proxy.

Read More: 5 Lessons About Building A Nation From Singaporean Political Visionary Lee Kuan Yew

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Some Men Are Fighting Back Against Anti-Male Hostility By Identifying As Women

February 10, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Because SJWs and liberals have encouraged the mentally ill to claim whatever gender or sexual identity they desire, politically sane individuals face numerous hurdles in both their public and professional lives. Not only do people identifying as the latest something-sexual get preferential treatment in the workplace, others, particularly heterosexual, biological males, are expected to cater to all the needs of the LGBTQI-whatever else crowd. This includes everything from uttering "correct" pronouns to special or shared bathrooms. Normal men also must adhere to draconian policies on "diversity," which means never daring to disagree with or criticize the performance of a protected gender or sexual minority.

But has the solution been staring us in the face the whole time? One especially audacious budding politician from the University of Sydney, Alex Fitton, identified as a woman in late 2016 to win one of two student leadership positions. The student body's constitution prohibited two cis-gender males from holding the office. Fitton represented the Liberal Party, which, confusingly for Americans in particular, is Australia's main (nominally) conservative party. "Liberal" in this context means classically liberal, in the mould of the French political theorist Montesquieu and others.

Pictured from left to right: friend of shitlord/probable shitlord, shitlord.

Though I still regard American campuses as being much worse than Australian ones, most notably surrounding “sexual assault” kangaroo courts, the atmosphere at universities Down Under has degraded to the point where conservative and social democratic parties have to collude to prevent SJWs from winning student offices. Alex Fitton’s running mate, student Dylan Williams, actually works for the rightwing faction of the leftwing Labor Party. Their teaming-up was designed to act as a bulwark against the more leftist elements of the Labor Party, the Greens, and other SJWs.

Australian (and American) universities are already employing rampant discrimination against biological males. Affirmative action underwrites the procedures of countless faculties. One university, the Australian National University (ANU), recently announced a policy to employ at least 50% women in its “Futures Scheme” for researchers given grants. Instead of awarding money based on the quality of academic work, ANU will be providing money based on whether you have a real or imaginary vagina, or some other distinguishing minority status. The supreme irony of this development is that this university is headed by Dr. Brian Schmidt, an Australian-American Nobel laureate in physics. He of all people should know the dangers of putting identity before competency.

This begs the question of whether men should tactically identity as women or other categories to progress their careers. When pulled off effectively, it could pay big dividends, both personally and in terms of challenging and unraveling the system.

The irony of SJWs questioning Fitton’s gender and gender identity

But I’m a lady!

> Chair of the SRC standing legal committee, Cameron Caccamo, said Mr Fitton was now in the process of proving his identity, but had thus far fallen short of the legal requirements.

Hilariously, after he (I mean, she) won the ballot, Alex Fitton faced angry student leftists demanding she “prove” that she was a woman. But with between 60 and 6 million pretend genders now recognised by SJWs, proving a gender identity is as meaningless as describing them. Fitton would have had to sign a statutory declaration regarding her gender identity, a sworn document attracting criminal penalties if made fraudulently. But who am I to judge this brave woman?

I went to school or university with three transgender people, two attempted females-to-males and one attempted male-to-female. I say “attempted” because no surgical procedure will change the fact that these three are biologically female and male respectively. All that really probably changed was some carving or chopping off in their nether regions (I didn’t ever ask) and the ingestion of hormones. And because made-up identities like “pansexual” usually don’t involve surgical or other procedures, a wo(man) like Fitton is really able to pigeonhole themselves as they want.

What this strategy would need

Pepe approves of this message.

Identifying as a woman or a member of a sexual minority would not be for the fainthearted. At a minimum, these wannabe shitlords need to have both the consistency to live out their new “identity” (without compromising their core masculinity) and the determination to mow through any outraged SJWs. Categories like “post-toxic masculinity male” or “neo-male” could be adopted to throw off would-be critics but simultaneously rub it in their faces. To be honest, most readers of Return Of Kings do not identify as “normal” men anyway. For a start, we don’t pedestalize women.

When working with others, allies or otherwise, no comments should ever be made about the reasons for the assumption of a different gender identity. Again, this takes a high level of consistency. Any aspiring shitlord would also need to be prepared to take action to enforce their new identity. Various parties, from human resources departments to university legal officers, may try to undermine your choice. So make yourself watertight.

“How in the hell is this a good idea, David?”

You don’t have to look like this to shitlord.

The growth of affirmative action and other disgusting measures to put underqualified women and others in positions of power is, sans some sort of sudden development or revolution, here to stay. The chief calculation in assuming a different gender identity should be whether a man’s career interests and the potential to offset SJW or feminist fuckery outweighs any awkwardness associated with the new label.

For those who say my proposal legitimizes an awful system, I would counter-argue that openly opposing it, most of all in the workplace or on the streets of campuses like UC Berkeley, is a recipe for being fired, maimed, or killed. We need a greater flexibility in pushing our agenda. Sometimes that means doing it through subterfuge. Provided men do not suck from the teat of the system for unacceptably selfish reasons, the sparingly-used tactical ploy of identifying as a made-up gender might be a very useful way for us to fight back.

For the record, I am not saying dress like a woman or act like a woman. The beauty of the gender fluidity concept advocated by braindead SJWs is that we can twist it in whatever fashion we desire.

So who’s up for some shitlording?

Read More: Yet Another Survey Shows That LGBT Domestic Violence Rates Are The Same As Heterosexual Couples

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

American Women Still Have No Idea What Makes Them Happy

February 10, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Lisa Wade, a sociology professor at Occidental College of California, who earned her Ph.D. at U Wisconsin, Madison, recently published an article attacking marriage because women aren't happy and satisfied with it. While she comes to some horribly backwards conclusions, she does raise an interesting point about the paradox of declining female happiness. Why are women unhappier now than at any point in modern history, despite being given more and more?

While this topic has been addressed before, in studies done by University of Pennsylvania researchers Betsey Stevenson and Justin Wolfers, feminists like Wade continue to come to all the wrong conclusions. Wade's recent article "Women are less happy than men in marriage, but society pretends it isn't true" is laden with logical errors and faulty conclusions.

Who is Lisa Wade?

Wade is an associate professor of sociology, focusing on gender studies. She has appeared in Ms Magazine, Jezebel, and MTV, has published articles about American female genital cutting (I have never met an American who had their genitals cut who was not a man), and recently released a book titled American Hookup: The New Culture of Sex on Campus. She earned her Ph.D. at a college with a long history of feminism.

Her book has been described incorrectly as the "best book about sex on campus, bar none" (that would be Bang), and reviews label it as "shin[ing] the bright light of sociology and feminism onto American college sexual culture…reveal[ing] the tableau of racial, class, and gender inequality on which the not-really-so pervasive phenomenon of student hookups is playing out."

Note: If you are interested in this topic: Unhooked: How Young Women Pursue Sex, Delay Love, and Lose at Both by Laura Sessions Stepp is an interesting look into college sex culture from a female perspective. Stepp is a Pulitzer winning author whose 2008 book reveals the eventual heartache, disappointment, and pain hookup culture causes these women.

> Thrilling to be on the same page as some of my sheroes: Arlie Hochschild, @JessicaValenti @peggyorenstein @aelizabethclark @endrapeoncampus, pic.twitter.com/EfQ5iwOiPK
>
> — Lisa Wade (@lisawade) January 11, 2017

Wade's marriage article attempts to answer the question: Why do women have more rights, opportunities, status, power, and privilege than at any time in modern history, but are less happy than ever in both absolute terms and in comparison to men?

Marriage is unequal

Wade's first answer is that marriage is an unequal institution, that women are carrying a heavier weight of the household chores than men, and are more likely to sacrifice their free time and career goals for the marriage. Despite anecdotal evidence from every married man I know that paints the exact opposite picture, we shall analyze this objectively.

I know no man who comes home to a nice, warm dinner made by his wife, or a house that she cleaned herself, or any relationship-building efforts the woman takes the initiative in making for the happiness of her husband or strengthening of the marriage.

Wade, a PhD professor holding unequal power over her students

Of course, there are many unequal institutions. Indeed, equality is rarely if ever encountered, and it's an absurd demand. The arrangement between employee and employer is practically never between equals–a large, wealthy, powerful employer offers a wage to a worker, who is of comparatively minute power and importance to the operation of the firm. And yet this arrangement produces a productive and profitable arrangement for both parties.

An education is not obtained between equal parties. A trained, knowledgeable superior imparts knowledge and experience to a novice learner.

Unequal shitlord assuming his knowledge is more than his students

A religious consultation is between a trained, knowledgeable theologian experienced in helping others through moments of weakness or pain and someone full of doubt or pain or questions. There is typically one religious leader responsible for dozens or hundreds of individuals in a very unequal relationship, yet both parties happily coexist in this arrangement.

Even friendships are rarely “equal.” Some friends offer me greater social access, a nicer home, or are wealthy enough to pick up the tab for nights out, or are simply more dependable and reliable, while others may not have as much to offer, but I still value their loyalty, sense of humor, or other facet which brings value.

Steve Jobs had a massive ego and thought no one was his equal: Result: #1 tech firm

The political philosophy of Western democracy relies on the social contract, where the individual agrees to abide by the laws and rules of a government in return for legal protection. Who do you think holds more power, you or the federal government? It’s an incredibly unequal arrangement.

The bottom line is that equality is a rare occurrence, and the mere fact that two people enter into an agreement unequally is not only irrelevant, but largely expected.

Women are subordinate

Wade's second point is that marriage is a compromise, and that women, moreso than men, make sacrifices of their time and career goals.

Marriage is indeed a compromise, and marriage, while it may be an institution worthy of support, is not for everyone and should be entered into only after strong consideration. However, it has been the bedrock of social interaction, and indeed, of western society itself, if not most cultures throughout the world, for centuries. Throwing marriage out the window because it means the woman may not go to as many girls nights out, or her lifetime output of TPS reports may be slightly lowered, is absurd.

The truth is men and women are opposite, and intrinsically related, as yin and yang, day and night, black and white. Historically, cultures placed the man as the head of the household because men are physically stronger, mentally wiser, more reasoned, logical, and less emotional or irrational. Changing these roles is like a gazelle telling himself he will now become a carnivore, because it's more aggressive. These roles are based in biology, and reinforced through various cultural norms and religions.

Early Judaism and Christianity proscribed these roles thousands of years ago, as a pattern for social behavior. The Bible teaches that woman was created for man "for indeed man was not created for the woman's sake, but woman for the man's sake" and that Adam alone was commanded by God, and punished for Eve's actions. God issued the prohibition to eat from the forbidden fruit only to Adam; it was implied that Adam was to relay this to Eve, who had not yet been created. Although Eve was the sinner who ate from the tree, God rebuked Adam as head of the family for Eve's transgressions.

El Greco's Marriage Of The Virgin

Submission is not always a negative thing. I submit to the moral rules of society and my religion, even when they are against my self interest. I also submit my personal desires and aspirations due to workplace demands. Despite having a flexible, independent job, I am still responsible to others and must generally place my own interests secondary to others during at least part of the work week. And we all subordinate ourselves before the forces of government, whether we believe in what it is doing or not.

That said, submission is a feminine quality; generally men would do well to become more independent and less submissive, while women as a whole benefit from the opposite. The notion of women submitting to their husbands means that their personal wishes or desires should not come before the family. Every group needs a leader, and men have been entrusted with this role.

This is a matter of biology, and outside the scope of this article, but men have throughout history and throughout cultures, been the head of the household. Just as women have been the primary party to rear children. Biologically, women are granted breasts to feed newborn children, and this is why men have an instinctual attraction to breasts. While men have small breasts of their own, women do not have the same attraction to male breasts, because there is no biological reason to.

So women are subordinate in marriage. Is this bad or wrong? Religion, social custom, history says no. And science tells us that altering the natural order of things by making men more feminine and women more masculine ends up making both parties less happy. So subordination is neither shameful, nor bad, nor wrong.

Women sacrifice more

Wade's next claim is that women sacrifice more of their free time and career goals to the family than men. This is mostly a repeat of the first argument: equality. It should matter not so much which party is giving more in creating a family, because that sacrifice is required in order for the family unit to exist, and most arrangements in life are not equal.

Symbiosis: Nature doesn't care which party is giving "more"

Men typically carry the burden of earning the income required to support the wife and children, providing the resources for housing, comfort, clothing, utilities, education, transportation, and entertainment. Where women also contribute to this through working, it is due in large part to overconsumption or the absurdly high cost of living that modern city life entails.

What Feminists Think Women Are Happiest Doing

There are women who have accomplished great things outside the family, and women who are more motivated by art, science, or career than by building a family, but they are the exception to the rule. And since no one is forced to marry in the west, these women are free to abstain from marriage. But as a group, women are much more satisfied when they focus on their family, instead of working in a stressful office. I can think of no career that is more important than the education, upbringing, and instilling of values in my future children, and by that respect, the woman raising them has a far more important job than whatever career I am undertaking to take care of material needs.

What Woman Are Happiest Doing

Pre-modern “feminism” was always about this: uplifting the feminine spirit, celebrating motherhood, and virtue, and beauty. Modern feminism is about rejecting it.

Propaganda lies to women about marriage

Wade’s final argument is that, adding insult to injury, women are fed falsehoods about marriage, which trick them into this institution that then makes them unhappy and destroys their plans at becoming hilarious comedians or CEOs or astronauts.

She claims that “compared to being single, marriage is a bum deal for many women,” and that married women are more unhappy than both single women and married men, and are more likely to file for divorce. Some of this may be true, and indeed in today’s crazy society where women can have their cake and eat it to, marriage does seem to cut in a bit on their dreams of riding the cock carousel endlessly, partying it up at the club and then stumbling in to the HR job hung over, and living without any sort of responsibility.

Of course, if we are talking about the eternal children that many Western women are, marriage is indeed a rather harsh set of restrictions on their unbridled behavior. But if we are talking about a grown woman raising a family, numerous studies have shown that it is universally better to raise children in a marriage rather than outside one.

However, Wade does have a point: there are lies being told to women about marriage, namely:

- That virginity, which was an absolute requirement for marriage throughout 99% of its history, is unimportant
- That it is not a serious, lifetime commitment, but something you can try, and then cancel if you don't like it, and the man may be obligated to give you money for months or years afterwards
- That they can ride the cock carousel through college with no repercussions on the ability to pair bond later, and
- That marriage will be all fun and games with no serious sacrifice.

Nice try, babe

Wade's twisted explanations for why women are unhappy oversimplify and misunderstand the fundamental problem: that women are losing their femininity and virtue–the very ideal that makes them women, and this is causing them fundamental unhappiness. Measuring a woman's happiness by her career performance, salary, number of cats owned, or number of cocktails consumed is a bad metric.

While modern marriage may have serious faults, and indeed I'm hesitant to recommend it, it remains the best option for raising a family, and if women were historically happier under a patriarchy insisting on virgin brides and offering women a stable, safe home in return for her household and childrearing contributions, perhaps they should consider the obvious—returning to that happy system.

Read More: 9 Types Of Feminists And How To Counter Them

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

6 Local Fighting Traditions That You Should Consider Trying

February 10, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

It becomes clear now that Western society cannot tame man's natural need for conflict. Everything remotely violent is almost forbidden now and the Western man has his natural aggressiveness repressed or shamed, while media and video games become increasingly more violent in order to alleviate his primal urges.

It is why century-old, effective fighting traditions must be implanted in the West, in addition to the already existing ones.

1. Calcio Storico Fiorentino

This tradition of a collective martial art dates back to the times of Ancient Rome and its traditional past-time, the “Harpastum.” Popular in the Roman army, it kept legionaries fit in times of peace, channeled their natural aggressiveness and developed a spirit of competition.

The Italian city of Florence is the Mecca of Calcio Storico. The four neighborhoods compete for the title of champion and thousands of fans cheer for the team of their district. The game mixes elements of handball, rugby, MMA and full-on brawl. The fighters must be in top physical shape as injuries are common and blood is drawn in the first few seconds of every game.

2. Musangwe

Musangwe was developed by the herders of the Venda tribe, in South Africa's Transvaal Province. Musangwe, Africa's "Fight Club" is a boxing style practiced bare-fisted, where the guard and the way the fighters flail their arms in wide hooks is said to remind the horns of the tribe's oxen

Starting from an early age, Musangwe fighters mainly try to strike the opponent's head and knock him down in a single blow. It is probably one of the most interesting traditional African martial arts with Senegal traditional wrestling, Laamb.

3. Medieval Martial Arts

Finding a new popularity towards the end of the 20th century with events such as the “Battle of the Nations”, the broad notion of “medieval martial arts” regroups any full-contact sport where historical blunt weapons are used and armour is worn.

Techniques taken from actual medieval manuscripts are used to teach men how to use weapons such as swords an axes. These events are not only a great source of entertainment but also a way to connect with our distant past and pay homage to our ancestors, keeping alive a part of their lifestyle.

Not talking about the LARP epidemic, there are enough fags in drag in Western streets as it is.

This is LARP:

This is medieval combat:

4. Maslenitsa Fist Fights

The Maslenitsa or “Pancake festival” is one of the oldest Russian holidays and is celebrated the last Sunday before Lent, a period characterised by its restrictions. This is why Russians gather to be merry, eat pancakes, dance around bonfires, drink vodka and sock each other in the nose to top that off.

Those fights can go from a handful of fighters to a hundred men a side. Blows are not held back and where in big cities, the fighters don’t usually know each other, villagers cannot wait for the fight to settle some old quarrels instead of calling the fuzz like Homo Progressivus does every time his neighbour is not politically correct.

5. Naadam Festival

Living in the inhospitable steppe with its scorching summers and freezing winters, with a life shared between herding and taking care of the family under the yurt, Mongolian men are taught from birth to master the “Three Manly Skills”: wrestling, horse riding and archery.

The Naadam festival takes place annually in every region of Mongolia and the main event is the wrestling championship. Any wrestler can take part and there is no restriction of age. It is a long awaited occasion to test one’s might and break with the uneventful life in the wild.

6. Dog Brothers System

The martial style hails from California and was created by three friends with a background in Filipino Martial Arts.

This form of fighting its characterized by its no-holds barred matches, usually fighting with rattan sticks and very little protective gear. Fighters can also use staves, whips, shock knives and a wide variety of weapon. The fights end when one participant is knocked out or abandons.

Anyone can fight in the annual “Gathering” so long as they give their name to the organizers and remember that they are responsible for their own safety and that there are “no judges, no referees, no trophies”.

Rien de tel que de se mettre sur la gueule

A glimmer of hope remains. A shift is happening. A natural reaction to the modern softening of masculinity is upon us. Some of our lads sack up and embrace their nature when faced with injustice.

The globalist twats we face are weak as they talk about punching repeatedly but have hardly ever felt one.

With fighting traditions reintroduced in the ethos of the West, financial support by George Soros and police with stand down orders will not help against people that can defend themselves.

Read More: Why Fighting Is Good For Men And Boys

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

What Is Cultural Marxism?

February 11, 2017 | by Johann von Richter | Link | Original Link

Any man who may care to look at history will find it obvious that nations have always been the products of their people, and not once the way around. Therefore, it is just as obvious that the first step in maintaining the status and character of a nation must be to preserve the brand of men who made it that way. While we continue to debate these self-evident truths; our enemies have learned to exploit them as part of their doctrine. The war they wage is no longer fought with guns, artillery, and air support, but rather with information. Their front is cultural and their mission, covert.

Postmodern ideologies have for decades challenged the traditional family structure, faith, and culture of Western society. Thus, replacing the backbone and identity of nations, leaving them susceptible to dramatic changes that were once unfathomable under the traditional values in place. What is important to note is that these changes are not the result of coincidence, but rather the opposite.

A rarity today

Neo-Marxist intellectuals as early as the 1920s understood it was imperative to their cause to put forth an effort to intrinsically change the populaces of the West. As far-fetched and improbable as this approach may seem, keep in mind the only alternative was a military victory. And that would demand nothing short of an act of God.

Where communism failed militarily and economically; it triumphed culturally by entering through the back door. Cultural Marxism can be defined as:

> The gradual process of destroying all traditions, languages, religions, individuality, government, family, law and order in order to re-assemble society in the future as a communist utopia. This utopia will have no notion of gender, traditions, morality, god or even family or the state.

This excerpt provides a more in-depth introduction into cultural Marxism and one of its chief proponents, Antonio Gramsci. During his years as a prisoner, Gramsci filled 32 notebooks with his political and philosophical meditations on how Marxist theory could be applied practically to the conditions of advanced capitalism.

> Gramsci accepted Marx's assertion that perpetual struggle between the ruling class and the subordinate working class was the driving mechanism that ultimately made social progress possible. But he rejected the notion that direct physical coercion by police and armies was the method of choice for achieving and maintaining victory in that struggle. Rather, Gramsci held that if a population at large could, for a period of time, be properly indoctrinated with a new "ideology"—specifically, a set of values, beliefs, and worldviews consistent with Marxist principles — a Marxist system could be sustained indefinitely and without coercion or force. In short, Gramsci held that Marxists needed to focus their efforts on gaining "hegemony" (i.e., control or dominion) over the core beliefs of non-Marxist societies; to change the population's understanding of what constitutes basic "common sense." Such a development, said Gramsci, would never occur naturally as a result of some inexorable, unseen, "historical laws" that Marx had accepted as axiomatic.
>
> Rather, Gramsci asserted that Marxism's potential for transforming society was wholly dependent upon the willful initiative of activists committed to using a "reversal strategy" designed to establish a "counter hegemony"—i.e., an alternative dominant worldview—in opposition to the existing capitalist framework. Specifically, Gramsci called for Marxists to spread their ideology in a gradual, incremental, stealth manner, by infiltrating all existing societal institutions and embedding it, largely without being noticed, in the popular mind.
>
> This, he emphasized, was to be an evolutionary, rather than a revolutionary, process that, over a period of decades, would cause an ever-increasing number of people to embrace Marxist thought, until at last it achieved hegemony. Gramsci described this approach as a "long march through the institutions". Among the key institutions that would need to savage were the cinema and theater, the schools and universities, the seminaries and churches, the > media, the courts, the labor unions, and at least one major political party. According to Gramsci, these institutions constituted society's "superstructure," which, if captured and reshaped by Marxists, could lead the masses to abandon capitalism of their own volition, entirely without resistance or objection.

Arts and Entertainment

The cinema and theater are evident instruments of America's cultural demise. Hollywood is primarily responsible for the loss of innocence in America. We willingly allow our children to be constantly exposed to violent, immoral, and sexually explicit films and TV shows. Popular music is no different. As our tolerance for obscenity increases, what was once unacceptable has now become standard.

Young Minds

American universities are perhaps the most liberal institutions on Earth. Affirmative action has reversed discrimination. Students are now force fed nihilistic, anti-white, anti-male, and anti-religious, propaganda promoting false ideals of equality and acceptance of everyone and everything regardless of how wicked and wretched it may be.

We are coaxed into believing that objective knowledge does not exist and that therefore we should avoid imposing opinions on things that cannot be quantified. Common sense has since been murdered. Mozart is no longer superior to Nicki Minaj. And a culture that follows traditional values is no longer preferable to one that condones drug dealing, excessive materialism, and rap music. Also, I fear being labeled a racist or white supremacist for having these views. There is no bipartisanship in higher education, and the effects are visible in the political leanings of the educated.

Religious Structures

The seminaries and churches are diminishing in prevalence and significance. Materialism has effectively replaced God. Merry Christmas now offends people. Religious tolerance has confused the masses into forgetting that this is first and foremost a Christian nation.

Information and Influence

The mainstream media is exclusively leftist, and the same can be said about modern culture in general. Dozens of celebrities threatened to leave the country in the event of a Trump victory (why you don't give children participation medals), only to learn the countries they wished to immigrate to have rigorous immigration processes.

Don't worry, Hillary will get a participation medal

The Law

The courts have also contributed to our demise, with the legalization of gay marriage being a small stepping stone in what is to come. The issue of transgender bathrooms is now picking up steam. Political correctness inhibits my 1st amendment right to have views contradictory to the left. Facebook now decides what constitutes legitimate news in addition to having 71 gender options. I can lose my job and any legitimacy I may have for publicly making anti-gay comments. I am now forced to think twice about defending my faith, race, and heritage.

Government Policy

The rise of Bernie Sanders is a testament to the influence, reach, and the resurgence of socialist ideology. Millennials supported Bernie Sanders more so than any other candidate. The demise of Christianity and the patriarchal family unit has left an inescapable void in the lives of many. Failed social welfare programs have fostered countless into relying wholeheartedly on the government for support. Increased government dependency naturally cultivates an environment in which communist sentiment can thrive and propagate. The era of Democrats and Republicans is over. The next great power struggle will be between Populists and Socialists. "The long march through the institutions” has entered its final stages.

Although the situation in America is very deranged, it is dwarfed in comparison to the crisis in Europe. We don’t have millions of uncivilized brutes pouring into our borders each year. Our immigrants tend to assimilate much quicker and fuller. According to a study conducted by Oxford Professor David Coleman, Caucasians will be a minority in England by the 2060s. A similar study carried out by the Brookings Institute estimates the same will occur in America by the 2040s. The most tragic component of this Trojan Horse story is the sad truth that the people have lost the will to fight for their existence and that of their cultures. Two possibilities exist: Either they are too distracted by the Kardashians, Snapchat, and Fantasy Football to even know what’s going on, or their drug induced fantasies have replaced their need to care about the real world.

Today, America is nothing more than an economical residence. There is no commonality amongst its people other than finances. A divided people are less inclined to self-sacrifice, and without it, higher existence is unfeasible. In multicultural states, no one cares about the community they live in, but just their place in it. Nationalism must be defeated but once, while globalism can triumph after a million fails.

A dictatorship is as efficient as its leader in the same fashion a democracy is as good as its common man. The modern common man is a testament to our plateau as a people and as a society.

Read More: What’s Worse: Cultural Marxism Or Real Communism?

Johann von Richter Johann is an aspiring politician from Cochem, Germany studying Law in the States. He respects the natural order of things and despises those who do not (communists and over-sensitive millennials).

What Is Virtue Signalling?

February 11, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Virtue signaling is an attempt to get into the good graces of an individual or group by taking a political stance that attempts to show moral superiority. It allows someone to cheaply gain social status—and sometimes money—through comments or displays that are easy to make in place of genuine activism or work.

Such politically correct "holier than thou" empty gestures by ordinary individuals are silly but innocuous. By the powerful, though, this can have real impact on pushing agendas. More disheartening is when it happens by politically notable figures, for instance the "I'm not an extremist, unlike this guy a little to my right" routine. What's quite troubling is how common it is for corporations, celebrities, and the ultra-wealthy to jump on the virtue signalling bandwagon. Many corporations have enthusiastically embraced affirmative action policies, put on gay pride events, ostentatiously celebrate diversity, and so forth—a clear endorsement of these things.

If you've looked at the terms of service for any number of social media companies and content providers, there will be verbiage disallowing politically incorrect speech. These are generally written broadly enough to get anyone banned they don't like, and such bannings are often acts of virtue signalling (i.e. "Their speech is bad and immoral according to our standards").

At first glance

There's a lot more to it than just that.

Virtue-signaling by celebrities tends to resemble groupthink and trendy blather. By corporations, it seems like spineless pandering. It's easy to see how people insulated from the real world by their limousines and gated communities would behave that way. Still, the picture is more complicated than that. The rabbit hole goes pretty deep.

Sam Francis wrote extensively about virtue-signaling before it had a name. (That covered corporate varieties, though celebrities and politicians are a problem too.) He listed several examples; here are a few:

> At the beginning of the twenty-first century, it ought to be obvious that the dominant powers and authorities in the United States and other Western countries are either indifferent to the accelerating racial and cultural dispossession of the historic peoples of America and Europe or are actually in favor of it.

And this:

> In Grutter v. Bollinger, the 2003 Supreme Court ruling that upheld the University of Michigan law school's affirmative action policies, 65 corporations filed amicus curiae briefs endorsing the school's admission policies that discriminate against white applicants.

Further:

> Large businesses, foundations, and universities are in the forefront of mandatory "sensitivity training," multiculturalist indoctrination, and efforts to portray white racial and cultural identity as a source of pathology, extremism, repression, and > violence, and to instill feelings of guilt for white, European, Christian civilization and achievements.

Now this one is just weird:

> Some years ago the Budweiser company sponsored a series of advertisements that helped popularize and legitimize various myths of Afrocentric propaganda, such as the claims that the Semitic Carthaginian general Hannibal, various kings of ancient Egypt, and the last Macedonian queen of Egypt, Cleopatra, were all Negroes—claims known to be preposterously contrary to historical fact.

Why would promoting Afrocentric theory—a screwy academic fad by leftist professors—be in their corporate agenda? Wouldn't a less goofy marketing campaign, like a celebrity endorsement, do just as well to boost sales to Black customers? A more evocative question is, did they consider whether in-your-face distortion of history might turn off their existing customers?

The article then discusses the nature of power structures; it's a lot more than just who won an election. Politics is downstream of culture, and Francis argues that those who hold the reigns of opinion-forming institutions are more powerful than elected officials. Then he discusses motivations, of which I have some further observations.

Some of them really believe it

"Human rights, anti-racism, globalism" – the messages are everywhere, and it's all the same

Let's consider the interesting case of Martine Rothblatt (formerly Martin until transitioning at age 40), CEO of GeoStar and Chairman of the Board of United Therapeutics. According to the Wiki page:

> In 2004, Rothblatt launched the Terasem Movement, a transhumanist school of thought focused on promoting joy, diversity, and the prospect of technological immortality via mind uploading and geoethical nanotechnology. Through a charitable foundation, leaders of this school convene publicly accessible symposia, publish explanatory analyses, conduct demonstration projects, issue grants, and encourage public awareness and adherence to Terasem values and > goals.

>
> Through her blog Mindfiles, Mindware and Mindclones, she writes about “the coming age of our own cyberconsciousness and techno-immortality“ and started a vlog together with Ulrike Reinhard on the same topic. She also created Lifenaut.com as a place where thousands of people could go to backup their minds.
>
> Rothblatt contributed $258,000 to SpacePAC, a super PAC that supported her son, Gabriel, who was running as a Democrat in Florida’s 8th congressional district but lost. Gabriel is a pastor for the Terasem Movement.

Although one might quibble with this individual’s politics and odd hobbies, clearly Rothblatt means it and has a personal stake in it.

For some other examples, several well-known Hollywood figures have gone far beyond the call of duty. Perhaps the Powers That Be require conformity, condoning politicized Oscars speeches and punishing off-message utterances harshly. while giving a free pass to degenerates.

Still, some celebrity antics are difficult to imagine unless personal conviction is involved; method acting only gets you so far. Music industry figures are also well-known for political poses, odd personal choices that ostentatiously display their politics, and the like. In any event, if something goes far beyond perfunctory declarations of solidarity for trendy causes, that’s a good sign they really believe this stuff. When that happens, it’s not merely virtue-signaling, but rather propaganda and—in some cases—social engineering attempts.

How sincere are they, really?

Sam Francis goes on to say:

> One of the major differences between the theory of elites [by Mosca and Pareto] and simpleminded conspiracy theories is that the latter almost always postulate hidden groups of conspirators who do not believe in the ideas they use to gull and manipulate the masses. In elite theory, political formulas tend to become ideologies that take on a life of their own and push behavior of their own accord, without conscious or deliberate fraud or calculation of interests by those who accept them.

Although a good number of champagne Socialists and celebrity airheads really believe their claptrap, I wouldn't so quickly dismiss callous cynicism by many others. The boundless hypocrisy of leftists would make even a televangelist blush. Either way, the practical results for society are the same. For that matter, how much does a celebrity who hasn't tasted tap water in years, or a billionaire CEO, really feel for the common people or relate to them?

Still, Francis was spot-on about ideologies taking on a life of their own. Cultural Marxism did, in fact, start as a Communist conspiracy by the Frankfurt School to weaken American society. This spread through academia and the media, creating the crazy 1960s counterculture. By the 1990s, cultural Marxism memes permeated society and became politically correct orthodoxy, even though Russia was no longer Communist by then. Now, it's taken some very strange directions, going well beyond what the Frankfurt School expected to accomplish in wrecking society.

The culture-destroying agenda

Following a discussion about the transition of power from the old American elite to what James Burnham called the managerial class, Francis describes the type of world the globalists want:

> The culture the managers seek to build places more value on individual achievement and "merit" (defined largely as the ability to acquire and exercise managerial and technical skills) than on family inheritance, on sexual fulfillment than postponement of gratification and the breeding and rearing of children, on social mobility and advancement rather than identification with family, community, race, and nation.
>
> But in addition to the family, the managerial class simply does not need other traditional institutional structures to maintain its power— not the local community, not religion, not traditional cultural and moral codes, not ethnic and racial identities, and not even the nation-state itself. Indeed, such institutions merely get in the way of managerial power. They represent barriers against which the managerial state, corporations, and other mass organizations are always bumping, and the sooner such barriers are leveled, the more reach and power the organizations, and the managerial elites that run them, will acquire.

So this is why they favor rootless cosmopolitanism and anti-family policies. These are goals that they have in common with cultural Marxism, though for their own reasons. This new version of leftist ideology fits their agenda quite well, and (at least in practice) it's not too concerned with vast extremes of wealth, quite unlike old-school Socialism. So globalist plutocrats naturally latch onto something that lets them feel good about themselves and what they're doing.

For some, this may be a strange form of atonement. Those who practice predatory lending, crash economies with funny money stock trading and forex schemes, promote crazy consumerism, and sell products that are unhealthy, overpriced, shoddy, or made with planned obsolescence at least can pat themselves on the back by gestures showing that they care about “social justice”.

After that, Francis details what the globalist agenda involves, a rather chilling picture. Then later:

> [T]he new managerial elite rejects and destroys the mechanisms of the old elite that excluded other ethnic, racial, and religious groups, such groups are often able to permeate the managerial power structure and acquire levels of power unavailable to them in pre-managerial society and to advance their own interests and agendas by means of the managerial instruments of power.

Well, we can see where that one is going. It’s remarkably short sighted of them to wreck the society that brought them unprecedented wealth. Those who do so clearly aren’t as smart as they think they are. It didn’t have to be that way. They can have constructive cooperation, or they can have mutually assured destruction. However, they can’t sink the ship they’re on and expect not to go down with it.

What can be done about it

The only reason elites have gotten away with giving the middle finger to the very population that founded the USA is that we lack the solidarity that has been aggressively promoted to others. (That itself is a greater problem.) Thus, not enough of us have spoken up about it or refused to do business with companies like that.

Everyone should be able to express their opinions freely, but in practice, it doesn’t work that way. Conservative business figures and celebrities are expected to remain silent lest they become targets of wrath. (The effort against Chick-Fil-A backfired spectacularly on the SJWs, but they’ve intimidated the owner and others with similar opinions from expressing their views in the future.) Well, two can play that game. If we send the message that virtue signaling hurts profits and ticket sales, then corporations will go back to focusing on selling products, and celebrities will focus on singing and acting.

Read More: How To Wage Economic Warfare

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How To Train The Splits For Flexibility And Fighting

February 12, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

As I've previously discussed in these hallowed pages, I feel that flexibility is an aspect of physical fitness training that many men ignore, largely due to perceptions of it being "effeminate." In those articles, I sought to debunk that narrow-minded belief, as well as advocating stretches one can do to generally improve one's health and well-being. In my "relax into stretch" article, I discussed how that technique can be used for the ultimate stretch, the alpha and omega and standard bearer of flexibility: the split

Every man should incorporate splits in his workout for a variety of reasons: the increased flexibility and mobility, the training of willpower and tolerance to pain, increased power in striking for martial artists, and last but not least, the sex appeal. But undoubtedly, for the trainee in flexibility, the split seems an impossibly daunting task.

Having taught you how to stretch without literally forcing the muscle fibers to stretch

(and thus risk tearing), I can now teach you a series of “intermediate” stretches that will train those muscles that are stretched in a split. These stretches should be done as a warm-up before actual split training.

First, the front split stretches:

The Kneeling Hip Flexor

When you are training the front split, the two predominant muscles being stretched are the hamstring of the front leg, and the hip flexor and gluteus of the back leg. Thus, it is imperative that you at least warm-up with stretches that specifically target those muscles.

To do the kneeling hip flexor stretch, kneel on the floor with one foot on the ground in front of you, and one knee behind you. Placing your hands at your sides, lean forward, stretching out the hip flexor of the hind leg.

Hold this until the pain subsides, then stop and switch legs. After a few sessions of this, you can increase the stretch by moving the back leg further back.

The Double Hamstring

The one you remember from elementary school. Sit down on the floor with your legs extended. Lock your knees and bend at the waist, touching the fingers to the toes.

Much like all stretches, hold until the pain subsides. After a few sessions, you can increase the stretch by touching the palms of your hands or your wrists to your toes, as I am doing in the picture

The Stretchkick

Common in martial arts curricula, this stretch is useful for both the front split and the side split. Stand approximately three feet from a shelf, Swedish ladder, or something similar (you can use a wall, but preferably use something that has levels, as it has lower rungs that you can utilize if you cannot get your leg all the way up). Keep your feet closed and parallel.

Stand upright and with a “hollow back” (i.e. not rounded), lift your leg up and put your heel on the wall, keeping the leg straight, your feet straight, and your hip parallel to the wall

Grasp the ball of the stretched foot with both hands. Lock both knees and keep your hips low—do NOT raise one hip or the other. Lean forward slightly, but keep the back straight, avoid torso or hip twisting. Pull the tip of the foot down, try to look at the bottom of your foot while keeping your head high and your back straight.

The ultimate goal of this stretch is to have your foot parallel to your head, but most likely you will not be able to do this immediately. This stretch can also be done with your side to the wall. and your foot turned 90 degrees from the other foot

Side Split Stretches

The front split is the easier of the two, which is why I focused on it first. But of course, for the sake of completion, the intimidating side split must be discussed as well.

The Half Side Split

This stretch, sometimes referred to as the Cossack stretch, is a stretch that opens up the hips and targets the muscles of the groin, both of which are predominantly hit in the side split.

Stand with your feet three shoulder widths apart, and bend on one leg. The other leg remains fully extended.

Touch the floor with both hands and press the inside of the thigh of your bent leg away with the corresponding elbow. Keep your back straight

Hold until the pain subsides, and try to open up the hips further by moving your body down. Then do the other side.

Wide Leg Toe Touch

This is not actually a touching of the toes, but the motion is the same. Standing up, spread your legs 2-3 shoulder widths. Lock the knees and bend forward, touching the floor with your hands. The back and arms should be straight. Hold until the pain subsides

Once you do this easily, the way to make it harder is to not move your feet farther apart, but rather to grab the calves and pull the upper body towards the legs. Pull your stomach in towards your hips.

The Scissor Split

Sit on the floor and split the legs at least 90 degrees. Then grab the feet and bend forward, keeping the back straight and the knees locked. Try to touch your stomach to the floor, and then pull yourself forward and widen the split (after you've relaxed into the stretch, of course).

And last but not least, try to do actual splits, remembering your PNF and relaxation techniques. I feel that the length of the hold is more important than forcing the stretch. In other words, doing 75-80% of your maximum stretch and holding that for 20 minutes is better than doing 100% of your maximum and only holding it for 1 minute.

Personally I find that sweatpants and socks make it easier to slide the hind leg back, but whatever works for you.

Conclusion

Using these techniques, I have greatly increased my flexibility, which has for many years been poor.

As you can see I cannot do a full split just yet, but considering that when I started a serious flexibility regimen my split looked more like:

and now I have progressed to the stretch in the second to last picture, I feel I have made a tremendous about of progress in a short time, and by the end of the year I expect to be able to do both types of split, if not sooner.

Read More: Why You Should Be Doing The Twist Stretch

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

7 Tips For Arguing With Women

February 12, 2017 | by Graham Seibert | Link | Original Link

Arguments are inevitable within any relationship. There are many legitimate differences of opinion that need to be resolved. Just as obvious, there is the question of who dominates whom. Men traditionally have the advantages of size, income and perhaps logic. Women, on the other hand, are more verbal. They learn bickering and argument from birth. Arguments will always find you.

She is more often than not the one to initiate an argument. There is a problem and it is your fault. You, you obtuse, oblivious male, did something wrong. You are wrong-footed from the start. She starts the argument. She had time to prepare. And she attempts to force you to fight it in the realm of emotion rather than logic. This leads to rule number one in arguing with women…

1. You Lose

Don’t play by her rules

Women are simply better at arguing. More verbal. They get a lot of practice arguing with their mothers. They play by different rules. They enjoy it more.

When an argument comes your way, duck it if you can. If not, move the argument towards male turf. Acknowledge that differences of opinion are nothing abnormal in a relationship. They are not a sign of trouble, just an indication that the topic needs to be discussed. Make her agree on rules of engagement.

Once you demonstrate that you are not afraid of discussion, but that you will insist on a fair fight, in the realm of logic rather than emotion, some issues will dissolve. If not, go to step two.

2. Recognize What You Argue About

It’s your money – should be your call

Couples argue over major topics and bicker over small ones. Bigger ones may demand a resolution. Where should you live? How much should you spend for a house? Do you need a new car? These are amenable to a logical analysis. Your male strengths will be an asset as you tackle them. Men are usually better at soliciting expert opinions and analyzing options in writing or on a spreadsheet.

Make sure you have laid out the ground rules for arguing so you stay on track. She may be weaker in logic, but she is longer on cunning. Don't get led astray. Assuming that you are the primary breadwinner and it is your money that you are talking about spending, you have the moral authority to lead the argument. Hang tough and fight fair.

The French call the housewife the "Général de l'intérieur," in charge of matters concerning the household. No matter how good you may be in the kitchen, or how much your kids love you, your woman will not readily cede her primacy. Enter fights in these domains with trepidation.

Women feel a congenital compulsion to needle their men. The wise man will deflect the question with a laugh, a gentle non sequitur, or simply by silence. I offer an example:

"Sweetheart, where is the lid to Eddie's lunchbox?"

"I don't know. I left it right there on the counter after I washed it on Friday."

"It wasn't clean."

"Okay – when I didn't wash it Friday night."

You may be the chef, preparing dinner for twelve that evening. Your wife waltzes into the kitchen, grabs one of the pots you have laid out, steps in front of you to get some water as you peel potatoes at the sink, and proceeds to make herself some macaroni and cheese. Do you say anything? Not if you are smart. Let it go.

Be careful when you argue on her turf

3. Be Non-Communicative When It Serves You

No answer can be the best answer

Women accuse us of refusing to talk. Yes! We do it for good and honorable reasons. If you refuse to rise to the bait when they attempt to needle you, it keeps the peace. It benefits the relationship that you simply ignore small barbs.

If she is making a mountain out of molehill—about toilet seats, dribbling on the floor, not wiping up condensation on the windows—force her to escalate the trivial complaint into a major deal, then point out how petty it is.

4. A Man Never Remembers, A Woman Never Forgets

Take notes! Women have selective memories

You need to practice making notes on your little contretemps. Although from the majestic heights of your male perspective they may appear to be nothing, they are. You will have to re-fight these battles over and over. It is good to have a reference. Not to be vicious but simply to protect yourself.

5. You Need A Geneva Convention

Convention
pour l'amélioration du sort des Militaires blessés dans les armées en campagne.

La Confédération Suisse, Son Altesse Royale le Grand-Duc de Bade; Sa Majesté le Roi des Belges; Sa Majesté le Roi de Danemark; Sa Majesté la Reine d'Espagne; Sa Majesté l'Empereur des Français; Son Altesse Royale le Grand-Duc de Hesse; Sa Majesté le Roi d'Italie; Sa Majesté le Roi des Pays-Bas;

The war between the sexes should be fought according to established rules

You, the logical one, need to craft the rules of engagement and enforce them. They are:

- If she wants it done her way, she should do it herself. It is fair to ask the guy to do a task but unfair to tell him how to do it. If she asks you to clean the kitchen, clean the kitchen. Don't let her tell you what a crappy job you did. My ex-wife once came along after I had finished and, as I watched, cleaned the kitchen a second time. That was an insult. If she didn't like my job, she was welcome to do it herself, but she can't have it both ways.
- Another maxim: he who does all the work makes all the mistakes. She should be happy for what you do, not the fact that you do not do it perfectly. You, the male, will probably not criticize her when she does less than a perfect job on something. She will.
- Let her have her way on the little things. Tell her she gets to win 80% of the arguments so long as you get to pick your 20%.
- Both sides renounce ad hominem attacks. It is okay to disagree about whether or not the kid is sick enough to go to the pediatrician. It is not okay for her to imply that you are too stupid to recognize a disease when you see one, you are too lazy to go, or you don't love the kid.
- Cursing and verbal abuse are not allowed. Women love to trot out statistics portraying themselves as victims of domestic violence. Actually, women initiate verbal and even physical abuse more than men. Don't shrug it off. You are bigger and certainly capable of taking crap. That is the wrong answer in today's age. No matter who started it, if it escalates it will be blamed on you. You be the first to call the counselor or cop.

As I was standing there, my former wife talked trash about me with a friend over the telephone. I pinched her bottom and she jumped. When she later accused me of abuse, I said that her verbal abuse was more damaging than my pinch. She never did that again—to my face.

Contempt is a good predictor of divorce. If your woman deplores you, it calls for a Plan B involving lawyers.

6. Recognize That Logic Is A Male Domain

This is illogical – but recognize that battles on her turf often must be graciously conceded

Masculine logic is an asset in the workplace, but you won't buy much in an argument with your wife. Emotion trumps logic. Do not even try to present a logical argument in areas in which there is not something immediate at stake. Her opinions on abortion, immigration, guns and vaccinations may be totally nonsensical. If it doesn't affect you, leave it alone. When the issue is close to home, such as getting the kids vaccinated, get all of your ducks in a row logically, find as many allies as you can that she will respect, and go at it. But don't be surprised if logic does not carry the day. You may just have to grit your teeth and pray that your unvaccinated kid does not come in contact with a TB-carrying refugee.

Women often don't understand systematic things like arranging food in the refrigerator, putting leftovers in containers instead of stuffing the entire bowl in the refrigerator, or taking care of the knives so as not to dull them. Put up with it like you would a puppy that piddles. My dear mother gave my good knife to a door-to-door peddler who butchered it on a grindstone. She simply didn't understand. My dear wife gave my salami, which she never eats, to the cat, on the pretext it was spoiled. She should have asked—but I should not have even brought it up. Women are like that.

7. Don't Be Afraid To Walk Away

Rather than get involved in an argument you can't win—one involving emotion, illogical arguments or physical and verbal abuse, simply walk. Walk away proudly, with your head high. There are a couple of possible outcomes.

Women may take themselves very seriously at the time of the argument, but they can do an absolute turnabout with no embarrassment and not even recognizing that they have done so. A note to the wise—don't point it out to them or you will indeed have an argument on your hands.

If she refuses to let it go, and challenges you for walking away to keep the peace, it may be time for you to reassess the entire relationship. She is unwilling to live together in peace, it is time to leave.

Conclusion

There is no way to avoid argument in a relationship. Recognize that men and women truly are from different planets. We see things differently. Ignore what you can and insist, when argue you must, on mutual respect and a fair fight.

Read More: Arguing With Dumb People

Graham Seibert
I am in the middle of Act III of my American life. Retiring from a career as an overseas adventurer, entrepreneur and computer book author in 1998, I spent a while pursuing a PhD in statistics and then divorced and moved to Ukraine to start a new family. I occupy my time as a top 500 reviewer on Amazon and the father of a five-year-old.

8 Reasons Why American Women Are Terrible Teachers

February 13, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

If you see feminism for the toxic and corrosive ideology that corrupts women and society at large, then we must come to terms with the fact that American women—along with their Canadian, British, Australian, and other counterparts—should not be teachers who are responsible for the developmental years of children's lives. The marriage between today's feminized education system and modern women is ruining entire future generations with their incompetence, contempt, and brainwashing. I don't expect things to change overnight, but the following points must be addressed regarding the nature of today's female teachers.

1. They are lousy role models

Would you like to have a divorced Instragram whore as your child's role model?

With just how low Western women have gone these days, it shouldn't surprise anyone that female teachers are no exceptions—being in a position of teaching doesn't suddenly make them morally upstanding. Really, why would anyone want their children to be taught by these women? Are we to believe that a woman who spent her entire adult life drinking and partying to suddenly become a mentor for our sons and daughters? If you can't turn a whore into a housewife, the same is doubly true for those trying to pass off as educators.

2. They are not serious about teaching

I've met dozens of girls who were either studying or on their way to become teachers and the majority of them tended to be party girls with no real interest in intellectual pursuits.

The truth is that most female teachers don't have any passion for teaching. They just want an easy and secure government job that will elevate their sense of self-importance. If you ever observe them in classrooms, you'll know that they have no standards and enjoy texting and chatting on their phones during their class time. To them, it is the status of being a teacher that matters, not the substance of what that they can deliver to their pupils. These teachers don't encourage independence and free thought and they're not interested in letting students inquire and learn on their own; they're more interested in having them do as they're told as passive subjects in a controlled environment.

3. They hate children (especially boys)

In addition to their lack of passion, the teachers and would-be teachers I've known throughout my life don't seem to like children all. In spite of how much they profess their love of teaching kids, all these females tend to do is bitch non-stop about their "stupid" students while making minimal effort to guide them in their learning.

4. They brainwash children with degenerate progressive ideas

If you think feminist and progressive brainwashing is limited to colleges, you are wrong. Public schools and even kindergarten are now battlegrounds to teach young children about "gender fluidity" and other nightmarish garbage instead of preparing for their futures. And we all know that women are more likely to spread these progressive ideas than men (all the teachers I've had who preached progressivism were females), making them the primary offenders in indoctrinating children.

5. They love to power-trip

Yes, she has to do this in the classroom because she can't signal her status on social media without it.

Teachers are in a delicate position of power to lead their students and women seem to love abusing that power. I've noticed that teaching jobs attract women who are unbearable control-freaks who love to tell others what to do and how to do them. These women care more about asserting their authority than in fostering a healthy learning environment.

As an anecdote, I had a friend who had the misfortune of having a feminist as his English teacher in high school. He told me that she would openly say things like "Why are all the boys so dumb?" and give all the girls bonus marks just for being girls while the boys were constantly graded low. When all the male students went to complain to the principal, the teacher naturally played the victim by claiming that the male students hated her just for being a feminist. The cuck of a principal didn't take any action as a result and she was allowed to continue abusing her power.

I'm sure there are countless more feminist teachers who are denigrating the boys in every way imaginable so that they will not succeed. If this is not a systematic effort to bring down the male population, I don't know what is.

6. They are incapable

What?! The school fired this lady because she refused to teach due to her phobia of children? Fucking misogynists.

It is clear that many women are not capable of handling the slightest stress that comes with teaching and maintaining a class. When I was in high school, I once had a female teacher walk out of the classroom and not return. This didn't happen because the students were being dicks, but because she was getting too stressed and overwhelmed from… grading quizzes. Like most "strong and independent" women usually do, female teachers focus more on maintaining an outside shell and a facade of competence than delivering excellence.

Then there's the recent issue of teachers calling the police because they are incapable of dealing with children themselves. In New Jersey for example, a female teacher called the police on her 3rd grader because the way he said "brownies" was misconstrued as being "racist" by another student (the fact that 3rd graders are even complaining about racism should be an alarm). That single incident is already insane enough, but in that elementary school alone, the police are apparently called as often as five times a day to handle incidents which the female teachers seem incapable of dealing with.

7. They are mentally unstable

Many female teachers I've known all seemed to have varying degrees of emotional issues that should disqualify them as teachers. And as more and more American women are becoming mentally ill, we can expect increasing number of female teachers to be unstable and unreliable in the future. And as they say, crazy people make other people crazy.

8. They are sexual predators

Michelle Preston

Michelle Preston, 27, of Shawnee Mission West High School, Kansas, was charged with three counts of having unlawful sexual relations between September and December 2010. She had sex with three students at her school aged 16 and 17. Naked photos of Preston – who taught psychology and geography as well as freshman cheerleading – were said to have been circulated by the students after the details of the affairs emerged.

The number of female teachers who are having sex with their students are on a dramatic rise, which I suspect is due to laxer punishments and consequences for women as well as the you go, girl! attitude promoted in our culture. But I suppose expecting these young women—who aren't married and don't even have children of their own—to behave in any other way is asking for too much.

Conclusion

This one posted pictures of herself nude and smoking weed on Twitter as well as calling her student "jailbait." How many more women of this quality are passing off as educators today?

Ideally, the public education should be abolished and be replaced by homeschooling or other more effective means of preparing children for their future, but as long as boys are made to go to school, American women need to be screened better or be completely removed from teaching positions lest they do more harm than good. Yes, there are male teachers who are just as bad, but know that early education is almost completely dominated by women and the few men who are teachers are heavily influenced by them.

And as recent studies show, feminism is having a negative impact on boys while eliminating such feminist bias from teachers erased the boys' failing grades, proving that feminism is systematically harming the male population from a young age. As long as these feminism-infected women are in charge of the future generation, don't expect the society to change for the better.

Read More: 6 Reasons Why You Shouldn't Date Teachers

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

The Pitfalls Of Dating Intellectual Women

February 13, 2017 | by Brock Robinson | Link | Original Link

Intellectual curiosity is a trait common in many men. Guys like to figure stuff out and know things. Whether it's learning the mechanics of the internal combustion engine or analyzing events that led to rise and fall of ancient Rome, intellectual curiosity is the hallmark of any successful man.

So one might suspect that a learned man would also seek out intellectual traits in women when it comes time to look for a mate. On some level, the thinking and reading man yearns for a woman who is a deep-thinker like himself whom he can share philosophical discussions with and create a meaningful bond over their enlightened ideas and conversations.

But at the end of the day, we don't actually end up seeking out intellectualism in women. Research continues to show that although men will say they value "being smart" in women, we don't really mean it.

Intellectual Women And Intelligent Women Are Not The Same Thing

An intellectual woman tends to drown herself in progressive ideology, radical liberalism, and feminist dogma. Her young mind is brimming with curiosity at a vulnerable and impressionable age. And like clockwork the education factory and media establishment begin vomiting out propaganda and selling her their false bill of goods.

Taking Salon and Jezebel as the gospel, she describes herself as a “free-spirit” and loathes being objectified for her overt sexuality as she dances topless at EDM festivals in hopes of enticing a famous DJ. She complains to her friends about being viewed as a sexual commodity right before she signs up for her online sugar baby account so can make money as a sexual commodity.

But hey when she’s not slutting it up or filtering through hundreds of DMs on Instagram, maybe she’s watching some interesting documentaries or admiring the prose of her favorite 18th century writer. While she may exceed your wildest expectations in philosophical discussion, the free-spirited thinker likely also has a notch count to exceed your wildest expectations. (And no, it’s not “only” 30 like she says.)

Intellectual women are almost always the sluttiest

When I look back on the women I've had the deepest conversations with, almost all of them turned out to be… well, massive sluts with self-destructive tendencies. It seems intellectualism and promiscuity often go hand in hand.

Does she consider herself to be an activist for liberal pet causes, quick to dole out opinions via social media regarding the latest news story? Then it's probably safe to assume she's "sexually empowered" to the point that any attempts at monogamy are futile. Did you lay on the grass with her at Bonnaroo and talk about the meaning of life while staring up at the stars? You're the third guy she's banged that week while high on molly. So you spent an hour on the first date enthusiastically discussing the wonders of the Cosmos science documentary? You might be getting laid that night but there's a 50/50 chance her vagina is as wide as the Andromeda galaxy.

The "chill" "free-spirited" "down-to-earth" girls might keep your mind stimulated and interest piqued, but enough experience with them will teach you it is all a Siren song. I've seen too many men (myself included) try to turn these women into something they cannot be – loyal committed girlfriends. Enjoy them from an emotional distance if you'd like, but in the end they will be the cause of your greatest suffering if you think they are capable of commitment to one man.

When we say we want a woman who is intelligent, this is not what we had in mind.

Intelligent vs. Intellectual

An intelligent woman is someone who understands her biological nature and on some level, whether conscious or sub-conscious, recognizes the subtle underpinnings of male-female mating dynamics. While she may not be able to articulate it, she has the social intelligence to realize that the more men she gives her sexuality away to, the less value her sexuality commands for winning over a long-term relationship with a high-value self-respecting man.

She sees feminism for the fraud that it is. She doesn't ignore and put off her natural urges to pursue commitment and motherhood even though she's "only 23". And she doesn't care to experience every flavor of man the world has to offer. She just wants to find a good man and knows what she needs to be in order to land him. Class and standards are of the utmost importance to her. This is the kind of intelligence men value in women.

But finding a woman who is able to combine intellectual curiosity with these kinds of relationship-material qualities is quite the struggle, possibly even a myth. It may not always be as black-and-white as what's described above. But in your wife-hunting endeavors, it's much safer and wiser to prioritize discretion, standards, and other wholesome qualities over free-spirited intellectualism.

Read Next: How To Spot The "Nice Girl" For A Potential Relationship

Brock Robinson
Brock Robinson is a 26 year old cubicle drone turned writer slaying his way through America's troubled millennial generation one girl at a time, sometimes two. You can read about his dates, travels, and Game advice at The City Bachelor and also on Twitter

Korean Woman Acquitted Of Defamation For Challenging History Of “Comfort Women”

February 13, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Intellectual bravery can take many forms. Sometimes it manifests itself in the undertaking of a difficult, laborious work of scholarship. At other times it appears in the selection of some controversial topic that challenges conventional wisdom. Conventional wisdom, as we all know, does not appreciate being challenged: its adherents are likely to react blindly, even violently, in their attempts to push the dissenting view back into the shadows.

The field of history—like science, engineering, medicine, and others—has many such sacred cows. Every era develops its own accepted version of the truth. Perhaps things need to be this way; history is such a vast subject, and so rich with examples, that one can prove just about anything through a selective deployment of one handpicked example over another. At some point, a “conventional truth” is established by consensus to impose some intellectual order on the chaos. A cynic might even call this a “mythology.” Once formed, any attempt to deviate from accepted, well-trod lines of inquiry is likely to be greeted with hysterical rage from the guardians of the Sacred Temples of Truth.

But it is good that accepted “truths” are challenged every now and then. Only by doing so can we maintain our sanity and integrity. The law should protect the right to seek the truth, even the right to be mistaken.

This dynamic was on display recently in a notable court case to come out of South Korea.

Professor Park Yu-Ha, a female scholar of Japanese history at Sejong University, was acquitted of “criminal defamation” charges that arose from her 2013 book Comfort Women of the Empire. Her work explored the origin, extent, and nature of the Japanese Imperial Army’s “comfort women” program. As many readers will know, the phrase “comfort women” refers to Asian women coerced or recruited (take your pick of verb) for sexual services in the Japanese Army.

The cover of Dr. Park’s book

This was no minor foray into World War Two arcana. This was—and is—an explosive topic in Korea. Questioning it can set oneself up for criminal charges. The issue has been a sore point for many decades in a region where Second World War history is still very much alive. At issue are very real and practical questions: who will have the moral high ground, and what country will be able to exert leverage over the other. In Korea, the “comfort women” have almost come to symbolize the nation’s suffering during the war years. It is against this backdrop that one must see just how shocking Dr. Park’s book was to many in her country. After researching the issue extensively, her conclusions came to this:

> After extensive research into historical documents and transcripts of former comfort women’s testimonies, Park said she found evidence that some women worked willingly with the Japanese, and that there were Korean collaborators who worked to recruit the women, which meant that not all of them were mobilised by the Japanese military.

Needless to say, this was not the kind of news that many in Korea were likely to welcome. Japan bashing is a sport in China and Korea of ancient lineage, a sentiment frequently exploited by unscrupulous politicians in the region for one reason or another.

Although Japan and Korea signed an agreement in late 2015 finally to put an end to the matter, the “comfort women” issue still lingers in the public mind. There is even a statute of a seated comfort woman sitting across from the Japanese embassy in Seoul. The Japanese government has asked its Korean counterpart to remove the statue, but the latter has put them off, perhaps fearing a negative response from its people.

When Dr. Park’s book appeared, a group of elderly women claiming to be ex-comfort women sued her for damages. Apparently, questioning the official line is a crime in Korea. In 2016, a court found Park guilty of “defaming” the woman and ordered her to pay damages amounting to about $8500. But this was not all. Park herself was subjected to a torrent of harassment and abuse by the Korean media and public. She was accused of being a crank, a traitor, and a pro-Japanese quisling. It is also interesting—and perhaps revealing—that this free-speech story was buried in silence by the Western media, a fact that tells us all we need to know about our own media’s commitment to the principles of academic freedom.

While Park does not deny that comfort women existed or that many suffered grievously along with other civilians in occupied areas, she has questioned the extent of the program and how women came to be part of it. Is Dr. Park right? I do not know. I have not read her book; as far as I know no English translation is available. I doubt any translation will be available. What I do know is that her struggle to publish her findings is a very important event.

If academic freedom is to have any meaning at all, it must be embraced for even the most controversial topics. It is a credit to the Korean legal system that it did the right thing and acquitted Park of the spurious charges against her. South Korea has much to teach the United States on the subject of academic freedom. Somehow, I doubt we would see the same kind of fair outcome if some equivalent drama happened here in the United States.

Read More: Four Colossal Lies Men Have Been Told Since Birth

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How The Manosphere Crushed Feminism

February 13, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Donald Trump's ascendance, aided by masculine men who vehemently deny political correctness, is evidence that the manosphere has had a monumental effect on Western culture. I trace the history of the manosphere from 1999 onward with special guest Samseau, a long-time Return Of Kings contributor, to lay out exactly how the manosphere came to impact the world of men through game, feminist critiques, and political activism, all while affecting other movements like men's rights and the alt right. We discuss how manosphere teachings have become normalized in the minds of those who don't even know what the manosphere is, and also how its power will continue to grow.

If you're enjoying my podcasts and getting value from it, consider making a donation. Click here to learn more about donating.

Listen on Soundcloud or download the MP3:

Listen on Youtube:

Subscribe on iTunes or add the RSS feed to your favorite podcast app. If you like the podcast, please leave a rating and review on iTunes.

Previous Podcast: The Death Of Night Game

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Foreign Women Are Better Than Western Women

February 14, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

My article last week sparked a lively debate with its bold but personally well-researched claim that Western women have become the worst in the world, with some men defending their honor even as they plunge Western nations into sexlessness, fatherlessness, and take beta male provider roles away through careerism, rendering modern men nothing more than sperm donors and utility objects.

To some men the demographic destruction of Western nations, dying populations, hateful femcunt marches demanding the right to kill a father's progeny without consulting him, demands for more gibsmedats from the cuckolding welfare state, a dearth of satisfying sex lives for millions of men – all don't mean Western women are broken.

As the society around them crumbles, and Western women either breed with men conquering America (and Europe) or take cats home rather than bouncing baby boys and girls, some guys insist nothing is wrong. They take a “Walk away, there’s nothing to see here…” approach even as some notice the massive (pun intended) Anglobitch trainwreck unfolding.

No, somewhere in the Midwest or another hidden corner of America there’s a fertile damsel in distress just waiting to save the West if a man “alphas up” and finds her.

This attitude is why Western women suck, and why they’ll never change. There will be 100 white knights defending them for every one asshole that calls them out on the substandard companionship they offer and the destruction their wild woman ways are bringing to society.

While there was some reasonable criticism of the article, predictable boilerplate attacks quickly ensued from white knights and jaded American women who try to defend their sullied reputation with hot air. White knights and Anglobitches laughably say every man who’s not into them is a basement dwelling loser rather than someone who has discovered he doesn’t need or want them or their well used, moist piece of anatomy anymore. It never occurs to these myopics that maybe he’s found a far better deal in life, and is calling a spade a spade.

But there is an important point to be made when comparing and contrasting American vs. foreign women. AWALT still applies – All Women Are Like That. All women have wild and base sexual instincts, and it’s true that foreign women are just as bad as Western women IF their behavior isn’t modified by the culture they’re in.

The crucial difference is as follows: American women have been allowed to return to their wild instincts which quickly cause civilization to become unstable, while foreign women in many countries still have cultural constraints placed upon their sexuality. This crucial difference averts the return to a sexual Law of the Jungle that has descended upon America (and the rest of the West!)

Here’s why Western women suck, and how to fix them.

5,000 Years of Anthropological History

No society on earth that has stayed civilized released inhibitions on female sexuality

When women are left to return to their true nature with no cultural checks and balances on their behavior, we see the post-feminist clusterfuck that is quickly killing the West

ensue. As I frequently point out in my writing, 5,000 years of anthropological history has proven this should come as no surprise, as no society that ever stayed civilized eased inhibitions on female sexuality.

Inhibiting and controlling female sexuality is the price of living in a civilized society. Anglo-America has forgotten this. Across thousands of years of human history, in J.D. Unwin's study of 80 tribes and 6 high cultures, 100% of societies that loosened constraints on female sexuality, opening Pandora's pussy box quickly degenerated and fell apart. Natural female instincts are destructive to civilization as the following happens, elucidated by none other than Unwin and Aldous Huxley and simplified into bullet points by me:

- 20% of men enjoy 80% of female sexuality as the Pareto Principle returns (this fact also explains why harems are so prevalent in human societies cross-culturally and throughout history)
- A large population of disgruntled, sexually disenfranchised men forms
- Humanity returns to a zoistic level of development as men stop making investments in society
- Zoistic societies display the lowest amount of mental and social energy, therefore the civilization dies

Huxley put it like this:

> All human societies are in one or another of four cultural conditions: zoistic, manistic, deistic, rationalistic. Of these societies the zoistic displays the least amount of mental and social energy, the rationalistic the most. Investigation shows that the societies exhibiting the least amount of energy are those where pre-nuptial continence is not imposed and where the opportunities for sexual indulgence after marriage are greatest. The cultural condition of a society rises in exact proportion as it imposes pre-nuptial and post-nuptial restraints upon sexual opportunity.

Controlling female instincts with the proper cultural restraints is how a civilization is built up. Female "sexual liberation" is destined to end in disaster as it tears a civilization down. Other cultures still control female sexuality, and therefore the women in these cultures are superior to the Anglobitch for commitment and companionship.

Checks And Balances On Pussy Power

Women possess an enormous amount of biological power over men; this power is checked by culture in a sane society

Again, this isn't because foreign women are innately better. All women are born the same. But proving that nurture is of utmost importance in the nature vs. nurture debate, foreign women are better options for sane men for three reasons:

- Culture: Women are taught to respect men. Female sexual depravity is constrained by a patriarchal culture and slut shaming. Women with illegitimate (bastard) children are ostracized rather than praised as saintly single moms. Fathers are central to the family and not depicted as sex-hungry oafs and check writers as in the West.
- Pussy Power: Women's enormous biological power over men is checked and balanced by a patriarchal culture. Women can't therefore can't lord this power over men, using nature's credit card to get what they want. Enforced monogamy means no beta thirst allowing low quality women to act like goddesses.
- Hypergamy: Women's instinct to "marry up" in social status means they'll comport themselves better with men they see as useful utilities or who are part of a higher caste, i.e. Western men abroad or the average working man in the States when there is no welfare state sugar daddy.

Take these bulwarks against female depravity away and you will destroy foreign women as well. The reason Western women are so bad is because the West has removed all three of these protections for men with the institution of feminism, female "empowerment" and the resource cuckoldry provided by a beta male robbing welfare state.

When it comes to culture, commenter "David" makes my case very well:

> Personally, I speak enough Spanish and Italian now to see that foreign women have a general respect for men that Americans don't. They look men in the eye when they talk and they don't interrupt when he's speaking. Even with strangers. They love their family and are respectful of their fathers and brothers. Asia was the same. For that reason, those men don't need that weird "clown game" for attention that Roosh refers to. They are given attention as a man.
>
> …Every American girl I know is estranged from her dad. Probably because her > mom divorce raped him and shit talked him.

>
> Women are all the same sure. But those patriarchal societies are happier because the women have less power. No woman in Colombia would win a custody battle against the bread winner, or a rape case against her fucking husband or boyfriend.

A crucial point is made here: Once patriarchy is overthrown, women have almost unlimited power. And as Lord Acton knew, when it comes to human nature, power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely.

Patriarchy Vs. Degeneracy

What's most unreal about the West's woman problems is men who defend Western harlots

Patriarchy is the only counterbalance to the immense amount of power women enjoy by virtue of their biology. It is what made the human species different than the lower animals in the animal kingdom. If there is one constant in biology, it is that the male is disposable.

The Black Widow kills and consumes the male after the mating act, so does the Praying Mantis. In countless species, the male exists to do little more than survive and pass his genes on to the next generation.

Humans were different in that they offered the male a seat at the head of the table of the human family, a role which he has demonstrated an aptitude for as his guidance of the human family led us to the abundance we enjoy today. But, no sooner than the Western male completed his job as a utility object giving the world abundance like it has never seen, are some ready to throw him overboard and reduce him to his former role in animalistic world of the matriarchy as sperm donor and laborer.

That's where the West is headed. It's not going to take me with it.

So, while it's true AWALT/All Women Are Like Tha t, there's no doubt foreign women are superior to Western women where checks and balances are still applied to their biological power and they're shaped and molded by a patriarchal culture rather than a degenerate culture.

This isn't an illusion, it's just an inconvenient fact until the wild women of the West either destroy themselves and their men, or Western culture as a whole grows a set and once again tames the wild beast known as female sexuality.

Read More: Why Western Men Prefer Foreign Women Over Their Own

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

27 Attractive Girls Who Became Ugly Freaks Because Of Feminism

February 14, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previously I have shown how beliefs can affect appearance, particularly with Lindy West Disease, which transforms a female who subscribes to social justice into a sick manifestation of Lindy West. I've also shown the effect of merely becoming fat from lack of self-control. The below pictures indicate that we've only scratched the surface at how damaging leftist ideas are to a woman's beauty. Do not go further if you want to remain in a good mood.

1.

Look at the dead eyes of a feminist gaming journalist. It's as if she's saying, "All the empowerment I've had did not give me meaning in life."

2.

She has transformed into a girl who looks like she has cancer or some other systemic disease.

3.

Even animals groom themselves better than she has.

4.

From a cute girl-next-door who looks like she would be a fine mother to some type of animalistic exhibitionist with smelly hair.

5.

It must be noted that head shaving is a reliable indicator of the feminist sickness.

6.

This one is particularly heartbreaking. She went from elegant and lovely to generic ho.

7.

The forehead tattoo is a sign of advanced sickness, since there is no coming back from that. Also note the armpit hair, which Sigmund Freud, if he were alive, would argue is a form of penis envy.

8.

This girl was already in the danger zone with her mustache piercing, but still rather presentable. She has since grown armpit hair and has mastered the androgynous look so popular with diseased women nowadays.

9.

Short hair may be a warning sign that a full shaving is forthcoming.

10.

Here is a shocking change from a presentation of innocence to one suggesting an AIDS infection.

11.

This pretty Youtuber found some feminist writings, chopped off her head, and became, well, a slut.

12.

I understand that neo-Nazi skinheads accept women, but they do not require you to shave your head and buy leather to join.

13.

Ringling Brothers circus has gone out of business, so her chance of clown employment is exceedingly low.

14.

The septum ring may be another warning sign of future degradation into vulgarity.

15.

It doesn’t take much for a young girl to be pretty: simply be thin and have long hair. All that can be quickly destroyed with weight gain, tattoos, and a shaved head.

16.

It’s hard to believe that this leftist media commentator used to have a feminine essence.

17.

We have to wonder if a woman shaving her head is actually a sign that she wants to withdraw from human society. Even most men don’t shave their heads unless they are going bald (or are black).

18.

Celebrities who were once beautiful are not immune to the sickness.

19.

This is the most frightening of the collection. What’s disturbing is that in my Eastern European city, black lipstick is becoming more popular among “normal” girls.

20.

Ear gauges are an indication that a girl no longer cares about being seen as beautiful.

21.

Look how proudly a girl with the leftist sickness displays her obesity and cellulite.

22.

An upsetting transformation. She could have been a model or actress, but now she is a woman who perverted men would pay money to watch her “feed.”

23.

This classic Brazilian beauty once looked similar to previous Brazilian girls I've dated, but now looks like she's in a mental ward.

24.

Here we have a double whammy of shaved head and extra weight. No good man would marry her.

25.

This leftist victim has adopted a sort of concentration camp “Derelicte” style.

26.

While not strikingly beautiful, the first picture shows a girl who would be seen as attractive to many men. The last picture shows someone with a sickly pallor.

27.

From looking directly at the camera to looking away with an angry snarl, we can easily perceive how she has inner disgust for ruining her appearance.

I don't know about you, but I feel depressed right now to see female beauty being wasted for no benefit to the victim. I hope these pictures clearly show you the damage that leftism is doing to women and society. May we one day eradicate this evil scourge.

Images were sourced from 8chan /pol/, Age Of Shitlords, and Antes Depois Da Federal.

Don't Miss: 35 Pretty Girls Who Became Fat And Ugly

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Cambodia Is The Next Investment Gold Mine

February 14, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Reid Kirchenbauer of InvestAsian

Cambodia probably isn't the first place that comes to mind when thinking about offshore investment. In fact, those who've never been to the Southeast Asian country are surely more likely to create a mental image of poverty and genocide than capital growth.

But the days of the Khmer Rouge have long since ended and Cambodia is now a young democracy with one of the fastest growing economies in the world. Manufacturers, banks and foreign investors of all types are just now starting to see the opportunities to be had.

For years, a growing number of influential investors – such as my friend Andrew Henderson of Nomad Capitalist, seen below – have been focusing on Cambodia as one of the best frontier markets for young investors who want to take advantage of long-term growth trends.

A New Frontier

For investors, a country's economy can be broken down into one of three categories based on their stage of development.

Developed markets, such as the United States and Japan, are generally among the slowest growing. Population growth is often tepid (or even negative), markets are tightly regulated but easily accessible, and there are already large international companies in any industry you can think of.

In emerging markets such as China and Brazil, things are much faster paced. Manufacturing is usually a big part of the economy, foreign investment is at its peak, and local businesses are just beginning to expand globally in order to find their own opportunities abroad.

Beyond those are the frontier markets, which is what Cambodia is. These are the countries where the rapid growth and high potential for returns are just beginning – perfect for long term investors. It's common for businesses which you may take for granted in your home country, such as convenience store chains and drive-thru restaurants, to not even exist yet which can make frontier markets an entrepreneur's paradise.

As a result, frontier markets are less correlated with the rest of the world economy. Cambodia hasn't had a recession in over 20 years. It skipped the Asian Financial Crisis of the 1990s, the tech-bubble of the early 2000s, and the more recent Global Financial Crisis of 2008.

While there's no such thing as a "recession proof" country, frontier markets are as close as it gets. Most of the world is now dependent on each other. McDonalds, 7-Eleven and Walmart can be found almost anywhere and because of this, all the developed and emerging economies get sick too when the United States does. Frontier markets are an exception.

Investing in Cambodia

One of the challenges of frontier markets investment is accessibility, or rather lack thereof. You can't just walk into any bank, set up a brokerage account and start buying shares.

While Cambodia does have actually have a stock market, there are exactly four listed companies and three of them are government institutions such as the port authority and department of water.

Instead, the best way to invest in Cambodia is through real estate. Phnom Penh, the nation's capital, is the center of its growth. Expats are just beginning to rush here, along with the multinational firms, embassies, and forward-thinking startups which employ them, and city center properties are in strong demand.

But when it comes to quality apartments in Phnom Penh, there's a lack of supply. The expats here often have salaries in the six-figure or high-five figure range, but the typical Cambodian accommodation isn't much to look at.

Because of this, there's great potential in buying, renovating, flipping and/or renting out properties. It's common to buy an apartment for around $50,000, put around $15,000 worth of renovation into it, and then have a modern unit with a market value of close to $100,000. Rental yields commonly exceed 10% net.

It's the operational aspect which is the hard part. Knowing a good rental agent, learning about the property market in Phnom Penh, and finding an honest contractor (which can be a difficult task in the US or Europe, let alone Cambodia) are all crucial.

The Khmer Ventures Property Fund has three apartments which achieve a 9.9% net rental yield for our investors, although capital appreciation over the long-term should raise that even higher.

Our properties are all prime city-center pieces of real estate which are strategically positioned. As Phnom Penh starts to look more like Bangkok and Ho Chi Minh City, developers of large malls and skyscrapers will need to go through us first and purchase our assets at a large premium to get the land they need.

We take transparency very seriously. Through our shareholders portal which is updated monthly, title-deeds, bank statements, and more are made available to all investors. The fund is structured as a Cambodian corporation which directly owns our properties. Our investors buy shares in the company, and are therefore the owners of the fund.

If you would like to invest in Cambodia, diversify your portfolio, and benefit from the growth of frontier markets, please use our online form to contact us.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Why Are Women Being Educated?

February 14, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I did a video asking why women are being educated during the most fertile years of their lives.

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them on the blog.

Read Next: Why Are Educated Women More Likely To Be Single?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Is Game Getting Harder Than Ever In 2017?

February 15, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Just recently I met an attractive brunette through daygame. The approach had gone very well. She seemed flattered that I had stopped her and happy to talk to me. There was a lot of direct eye contact and a flirtatious vibe between us. At the end of our brief exchange, when I suggested we meet again for a drink, she agreed enthusiastically and readily gave me her phone number

I messaged her shortly afterwards. She responded quickly (always a good sign) and we had a suggestive little exchange peppered with a prevalence of 'wink face' emoticons.

I then messaged her a few nights later and she told me she was out with friends. I cheekily suggested that she should drop by my place when she was done. Five minutes later and I'd received no response. Five minutes after that and she'd blocked me.

Of course, by any measure my strategy had been a risky one. The truth is that in most cases it is unlikely that a girl who has met a random man in the street for less than five minutes will travel over to his apartment alone in the middle of the night (although such things do happen). Nevertheless, women are generally favourable to men who make explicit—or even just heavily hint at—their sexual desires over those who hide their dicks. A pass is normally given in a sort of "I get it's your job to try but it's my job to resist—try again next time" way.

But more importantly, the timbre of our messages up to that point undoubtedly indicated that I was impertinent and playful and would probably "push my luck" without meaning it all that seriously. Still, this girl, who had no doubt by now designated me a "creep" felt that her best course of action was to summarily break off all contact with me, despite having clearly been attracted before, and despite our having got on very well.

Welcome to the dating market of 2017: make one mistake and you'll be ruthlessly kicked to the curb.

Are Things Worse Than Ever?

The question, though, is whether things really are any worse today than they were ten, fifteen or twenty years ago. Is it harder to meet girls now than it was when I first got into game? My feeling is that on the one hand, yes, it is harder. On the other hand, though, pickup—by which I mean being the chooser—has never been a walk in the park.

I have been interested in PUA for quite some time now, beginning my formal preoccupation with it in 2004. Prior to that I still hit on plenty of girls, albeit in a less informed way. So let's say I have 15 years' worth of game experience, give or take. Certainly on the surface it would seem that things have changed and, as Roosh points out in his in his podcast The Death of Night Game, this is to a large extent driven by the tech explosion we have experienced in the intervening years.

As has been much discussed, the combination of the smartphone with social media apps like Instagram and Snap, where women can and do receive constant validation from thirsty betas liking their pictures, plus the emergence of the dating apps—Tinder, Happn, Bumble etc.—has meant that girls are in receipt of a quantity of positive male attention that is unprecedented in the whole of human history.

It is hard to see how this factor can't have had an effect on the dating market. Throw in the counterculture movement of the sixties with its emphasis on free love plus the emergence of radical feminism and you have quite a heady cocktail.

I've observed elsewhere that sexual market value and ones perception of ones own worth is rather like the financial markets in that it is affected by confidence above all else. If you are confident in your financial standing then you are more likely to spend money than if you're not. In the same way, if a woman is confident that there is an army of hot guys out there clamouring for her attention then there is less incentive for her to take your individual pitch seriously, regardless of how attractive you might be.

Evolutionary Biology

However, let's not get carried away. A few new means of communication over the past decade would be hard-pressed to overturn the evolutionary biology developed over the last 200,000 years. Men are still men, women are still women, The latter will continue to be attracted to men who display power, whether that is via wealth, good genetics (read: good looks), social worth, calibration or dominance and so on. And men will continue to be attracted to women who display signs of fertility through youth, beauty and a healthy body.

The other thing to remember is that when I or any other man makes an assessment on the current state of game he is doing so largely through the prism of his own experience, and that experience is necessarily coloured by whatever changes have taken place in his own life. For a forty year-old guy to say that things are harder than when he was twenty-seven is inherently difficult to interpret. Perhaps he was simply more physically attractive when he was younger. Perhaps his sex drive was stronger, encouraging him to make more and riskier approaches. Perhaps other factors in his life like business have become more important to him, impacting negatively not only on the amount of time he apportions to game but also on the vigour with which he approaches it.

There is no even playing field. Game, as an interpersonal skill, will always be played on shifting sands.

Those Halcyon Days

Finally, in case you were wondering, I should dispel the notion that there was ever a halcyon age when all you had to do was to approach a girl for her to instantly drop her knickers, fuck you and then remain faithful to you for life. Sure, it was perhaps slightly easier to get a girl out on a date fifteen years ago, given there were fewer distractions overall. But women were still hypergamous, they still played games, they still loved the bad boys, they still flaked and they still cheated. If technology has escalated these things then it is my belief that the effect has been lesser than you might imagine.

What's The Way Forward?

Either way, though, the market is what it is and there is little you can do to change that, in the short term at least. What, then, is the optimal strategy to pursue?

As I always say, your only option is to double down and maximize your chance by creating more opportunities for yourself by approaching more girls, whether that be through day game, night game, app game or—perhaps most effectively—through a combination of all three.

Guys will doubtless bitch and moan about having to expend even more energy than before in obtaining intimacy with flaky, narcissistic women, but bear two things in mind. First, approaching one woman a day and swiping a few times on Tinder really takes up very little of your time. Second, whether you admit it or not you need sex and when a needs something her should be prepared to go out and work for it without complaint, no matter how unfair the circumstances might feel.

Want to find out more about how to attract hot girls in today's market? Get hold of a copy of Troy's bestselling book The 7 Laws of Seduction. For daily updates on game follow Troy on Twitter.

Read More: Why 'Nexting' Unsuitable Women is Good for Your Sex Life

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The Public Humiliation Of Mark Zuckerberg’s Sister

February 15, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We’ve gotten a lot of hate over the past year from politicians, C list celebrities, and female typists, but not from the direct relative of one of the most influential billionaires in the world. That seal has been broken by Mark Zuckerberg’s sister, who turns out is obsessed with the manosphere. Her most recent attacks against us have generated enough criticism that it has forced the “classics scholar” to respond by whining about non-existent death threats and anti-semitism (she’s Jewish) while safely encamped in her $2.1 million home.

How she wants you to think she looks like:

How she really looks like:

I vaguely remember an article she wrote a year ago about pickup titled Bang Rome, obviously copying the title format of my Pulitzer worthy sex guides. The article, which does not offer an excerpt worth quoting, tried to compare Ovid to modern pickup. One year later, she decided to try a different tact to get noticed: she directly attacked me, the alt right, and many other thought leaders in a Jezebel piece titled Putting The Neo Back In Neo Nazi, which is a likely reference to neomasculinity.

> Nobody in their right mind would call Return of Kings a bastion of human decency. But when I became a regular (if resistant) reader of the site, most of its vitriol was reserved for predictable targets—especially Muslims and SJWs ("social justice warriors"). While its writers have dabbled in barely-coded anti-Semitism in the past, others have argued against it—though their gradual shift became clear in July with the article "Is Antisemitism Genuine Bigotry Or A Practical Counterdefense Against A Powerful Tribe?" Roosh V, a "neomasculine" man with a poor imitation of a Duck Dynasty beard, has gone from arguing in February that "The Alt Right Is Worse Than Feminism In Attempting To Control Male Sexual Behavior" to saying in August, "While we are not officially an alt right site, we share much overlap with them in the general alternative sphere." (He also refuses to denounce Richard Spencer for his recent forays into blatant Nazi rhetoric.)
>
> […]
>
> Only a few weeks ago, Return of Kings published a predictably horrifying article with the title "11 Tips For Raising Your Daughter on the Red Pill" which advises, among other things, that you should hit on waitresses in front of your children so they can see what game looks like.

In another recent article on her blog, she goes after me and Quintus Curtius, who continues to connect hundreds of men with the classics while she perverts it into a grotesque image of social justice.

> Predictably, Quintus Curtius has an extremely limited understanding of "how things were like in previous eras." His stated goal is "to remind readers of the glories of leadership, character, and masculine virtue that can change their lives"—so of course, his understanding of antiquity is of a world inhabited by only a few extremely elite men. He has no sense of or interest in social history, cultural history, women, slaves, children, and broad historical trends. The ancient world is reduced to a textbook model for leadership, character, and masculine virtue.
>
> […]
>
> Next time you hear either of those arguments made, remember: they are also made by a man who tells stories about raping women in his "Bang" series of "game guides," who believes that "Women Must Have Their Behavior And Decisions Controlled By Men," who recently rejoiced because the election of Donald Trump "automatically legitimizes masculine behaviors that were previously labeled sexist and misogynist"—a man who was rejected by the Alt-Right for being insufficiently white himself.
>
> […]
>
> So why have so many white, male leaders of communities and websites that used to focus on sex and gender shifted in recent months to anti-Semitism, white nationalism, and complaining about "(((the media)))"? In part, of course, because these men were always grossly bigoted and racist.

For living in a multi-million dollar home in a neighborhood with only a 1.7% black population (the national average is 12.6%), she seems terribly concerned about racism. Do you think she has even met a black person during her residence in one of the most expensive zip codes in the United States? It is peculiar why someone who never sees black people would be so concerned about racism, unless of course she is an intolerable hypocrite who hasn't yet checked her billionaire privilege.

I wouldn't want to subject you to any more of her pseudo-intellectual writings, but it's clear from them that she has a serious obsession with masculine writers who have normal testosterone levels, unlike her potato-faced husband, through her admission that she follows badthink sites daily along with the individual personalities behind them. Attacking Quintus Curtius, a man who takes his work seriously, proved to be her greatest mistake. In an article titled When Education Does Not Mean Knowledge: The Case Of Mark Zuckerberg's Sister, he evaporates her entire educational career in one go.

> Character matters in everything, Ms. Zuckerberg, and it affects everything. And this is why I focus on it in my books. If you had a more expansive soul and were possessed of deeper life experiences you might know this.
>
> And this really is the heart of the matter. I emphasize character, morals, and the education of the young because I know how important it is. I am a forty-eight > year old man who has more scars than you will ever have. I have fought more battles than you will ever fight. While you were mincing around the halls of Princeton University, I was leading Marines in Okinawa and East Asia.

>
> While you were bullying people for not adhering to your politically-correct ideology, I was starting a law firm, trying cases in court, fighting for the rights of the common man, and making an honest name for myself. This is the difference between you and me. While you are a spoiled child of privilege, I am a man who has earned his way through life through the sweat of his own brow.
>
> Do you want to know why I write? Because I love the subject matter, and I truly believe in its power to bring back what we have lost from our society. I venerate these classical and Renaissance works because I know how true their lessons are for real life. I use them as a source of moral inspiration, a guide to a better life, and as a vision for the elevation of the human spirit.
>
> You, on the other hand, use them as a punch line. You have no real feel for these works. If you did, you would never be able to miss the role of character and virtue in a great many classical and Renaissance works. In fact, I think that deep down, you despise these books.
>
> […]
>
> Unlike you, I am not a child of privilege. No one ever gave me anything: I made my own way in life as the son of immigrants who did not have the benefit of being royalty like yourself. I earned my love of ancient wisdom with my own effort, and I hold it close to my heart.

Quintus and I also had some laughs at her expense during a recent Culture War chat (starts at 7:30)

Other men have revealed how worthless a PhD from Princeton is these days.

> This is a very glaring and instructive example of the penetration of leftist/SJW ideology into every nook and cranny of society. The entire purpose of studying Classics is that the ideas and values of the Greco-Roman tradition are (sometimes literally) written in stone. They are immutable. They are not open to change and interpretation. They are literally foundational. They are the bedrock of Western Civilization. You don't get to go back and retcon Plato into being an Afro-Caribbean hipster with an interest in women's issues. These people are literally trying to-write history to suit their modern political agenda. As the commenter astutely pointed out, this is gross cultural appropriation of the worst and most damning type – this is outright cultural theft. They are attempting to steal Classical culture and remake it in the image of social justice (their god).
>
> And it's clear this Zuckerberg woman is a real piece of work. Her insecurity comes across in her writing (she is desperately in search of an avenue of self-importance to attach her name to). I can't imagine the sort of psychological strain she must be under. When you're a neurotic striver of the sort that she is, > having to live with the fact that your goofy, Aspergerish brother became a multi-billionaire and culturally significant figure by the age of 25 while you're reduced to pimping the SJW narrative on some shitty website (which your moneybags brother is no doubt paying for) can't be good for one's feeling of self-worth. (Scorpion)

>
> […]
>
> Donna Zuckerberg should be working on her dissertation on Ancient Greek tragedy and comedy, but somehow she always seems to find herself baking scones and then blogging about them. Follow her delicious adventures at sugarmountaintreats.com [her food blog] or on Facebook.
>
> It's unfortunate that Donna does not feel free to devote even more time to what is clearly her true passion — cooking, and baking in particular — and is instead obliged to finish her "dissertation" and produce these worthless whiny texts on "Eidolon". It's an error and a waste of time, and it probably diminishes the quality of the scones (which should have mostly remained unblogged) and prevents them from being as dreamily delicious as they could be. (Lizard Of Oz)
>
> […]
>
> The women's criticism of groups of men who challenge the orthodoxy of our sociopolitical landscape reads like a projection of their own feminine inadequacies and a craving for the male dominance and validation they claim to hate. Tell me a time when either Return Of Kings or the Roosh V Forum praised women like them.
>
> The supreme irony, too, is that Zuckerberg's brother created Facebook from an original concept called Facemash, which rated the attractiveness of Harvard girls and got the budding entrepreneur in hot water. This was all really no different to anything Return Of Kings currently does in rating women. (Return Of Kings)

How do you think the "classics scholar" responded? What do you think the product of Princeton wrote to Quintus, a man who gave countless historical rebuttals of her odious revisionism? She cried liked a big baby.

> I've been fielding anti-Semitic tweets for 24 hours now. Coping mechanisms are key > pictures of my face on a lampshade ARE wrong and evil. They're not comments, they're death threats. Blocking you now.
>
> — Donna Zuckerberg (@donnazuck) December 17, 2016

>
> — Donna Zuckerberg (@donnazuck) December 18, 2016

> So many great anti-Semitic tweets today! New friends: before you tweet pics of me as a lampshade, please tell me – who sent you all my way?

> — Donna Zuckerberg (@donnazuck) December 16, 2016

The Ivy Leaguer has no clothes. She is no different than a high school girl on Tumblr who accuses you of harassment after you make fun of her claim that she spiritually identifies as a deer. Her primary response was to write an article—not to refute any of the rebuttals against her—but to explain to her apathetic readership that they need to do a better job of supporting her against the criticisms of evil men that she attacked first when she called them racists and rapists.

> Do not say any of these to the person receiving the abuse. In fact, you probably shouldn't say them at all.
>
> Do not suggest that they should consider not writing about topics that draw this kind of hatred. This response is terrible for many reasons, but I'll limit myself to two here:
>
> 1) Don't blame the victim. Ever. Nobody is ever "asking" for anti-Semitic death threats, unless they literally tweet "please send me anti-Semitic memes for research purposes!"
>
> 2) A tiny voice in the writer's head is almost certainly saying this exact thing, and that voice doesn't need to be amplified.
>
> Do not assume you know how the writer feels. "You must be curled up in the fetal position right now!" may seem like a sympathetic thing to say, but death threats can provoke a wide range of emotional responses. Instead of assuming, ask, "How are you holding up?"

Even though not one person has said they'd kill her (a lamp shade meme is not a "death threat"), she expects you to accept that the sister of one of the richest men in the world, who is using her education not to breathe life into the classics but to defame men who understand it better than her, and who lives in the top 1% economic bracket nationwide, is a victim of abuse. Her family does not have enough of the pie, and she needs more, so tread carefully and give her support in the exact manner she demands. Bow down you lowly peasant! Rush to her aid! Or maybe not, since it appears she has practically no supporters. Apparently it's tough to accumulate social justice victim points when you have the super-mega-bucks and are Jewish, a group that happens to be the most privileged in the United States. What person wants to help a woman who never has to worry about working again for the rest of her entire life and can simply live out her days baking scones for a food blog?

Maybe one day we will encounter an enemy who is our intellectual equal, but today is not that day. Instead we must endure adult children who shriek out in pain as they strike us, whose blows effortlessly slide off us like water from a seal's fur coat. And if Mark Zuckerberg is reading this right now, and there is a good chance he is because his arrogant sister bit off more than she could chew, I want him to know that she is now our "house ho."

Mark, we have raped your sister's mind with our ideas and our vigor. We have so burrowed a hole into her head that not a day goes by without her thinking of our ideology, our arguments, and our words. You can do your worst on Facebook, and hide reality to your heart's content, but you cannot even begin to stop us from wounding your own family. What goes around comes around—you've manipulated the minds of millions people who use Facebook, censoring the truth from them, and now we own the mind of your sister.

And I'd surely click the like button on that.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: The End Game Of Feminism And Cultural Marxism Is To Eliminate Sex Differences

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

An Introduction To The Combat Shotgun

February 15, 2017 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

Part of a man's arsenal is detailed towards defending his home. The pistol is a good thing to carry while out and about, and it makes a good nightstand decoration. The rifle is for hunting and controlling a field or a street. The shotgun, however, occupies the place in between, and today we are going to talk about the very thing you want to be holding when you yank open your front door to confront whatever hell has deposited itself on your front yard: the combat shotgun.

What is a combat shotgun?

As our readers will no doubt recall from previous articles, the shotgun itself shares common roots with the rifle as both were, at one time, the same weapon. A smooth-bore musket would fire whatever you wanted down the bore, whether that be a single ball, or a pile of shot. Once rifling was developed, the idea of a single projectile took precedence over some shot, and the shotgun stayed smoothbore entirely until much later, with the advent of dedicated slug guns.

Modern shotguns developed alongside rifles with the introduction of cartridges to replace muzzleloading around the end of the Civil War, and smokeless powder to replace black powder. As these technologies evolved, certain shotguns were modified for close-up, non-hunting use.

Externally hammered Winchester side by side double barrel shotgun.

Beginning with the so called “coach gun” and continuing with first and second World War trench guns, a shotgun evolved for use in fighting situations. These had characteristics unique to the idea, and the primary one is that they are short compared to a field wing shooting shotgun. Robust actions, the ability to carry more ammo on and in the gun, rifle or carbine style sights, and some differences in furniture, finish and accessories add together to make a completely different beast.

Winchester 1897 shotgun in “trench gun” configuration. Note the barrel shroud, short barrel, and bayonet system.

Other names for this type of shotgun are the previously mentioned trench gun, riot shotgun, military shotgun, tactical shotgun, LEO (law enforcement officer) shotgun, and I’m sure there’s others, but the idea is to differentiate it from a traditional or hunting shotgun. Let’s talk particulars.

Action

Although it’s arguable that the double barreled break action was the first one that got converted for anti-bandito use, and, while there ARE some double barreled tactical-ed up shotguns out there today, it’s not common. The lever action isn’t used any more in shotguns due to lack of strength, and there's few bolt actions.

There's two ways to go: slide (pump) action, and semi-automatic (of either the recoil driven or gas driven varieties). Both have advantages and disadvantages.

The pump shotgun, in a tactical role, is a very reliable design, provided the operator runs the gun correctly and doesn't stop in between strokes of running the action (some models will drop the shell on the ground if you do that) or "short stroke" and not fully actuate the mechanism. They're generally cheaper, don't care what power shell you run in them, and make that cool noise.

We're a long way from a Wingmaster, but that IS a Remington 870 under all that tactical stuff.

Being lighter, and not using any of the recoil to run the action, they will punish your shoulder more than semi-autos, and you DO have to run the action yourself, which means longer time between shots, and making it harder to re-aim for follow up shots. You can leave them without a round in the chamber for safety, and leave the safety off, thus enabling you to rack and go.

Do not, however, and I repeat DO NOT, think you can sneak up on some home invader and rack the slide and scare him off. Either you have an empty gun to start with, or you chuck good ammo on the ground, while taking your aim off the bad guy. The proper way to scare a home invader off that is in your home is point the gun at him, announce that you have a gun and you'll shoot, and, unless he immediately surrenders and drops weapon, hose him. Or just hose him preemptively; if he's in your house with a weapon, you are legally allowed to do so.

Semi-automatics are the other alternative. Recoil operated, or inertia operated, shotguns are still very popular; they're simple, light, and will hammer you about as hard as a pump, but, making a bit of a generalization here, they are primarily hunting based weapons these days.

Most combat semi-autos are gas driven, and they use the same style system initially pioneered in the M1 Garand where a little bit of gas is bled off through a hole in the barrel to drive a piston which will, in turn, run the bolt for you. They're heavier, and they mitigate recoil through that weight and by eating some of the recoil in the actuation of the action. They do, however, shit where they eat, although not as bad as a direct impingement gun like the AR platform, so you will need to clean them more often.

A Benelli M4, with optic, full length mag tube, pistol grip, and collapsible stock.

One big disadvantage of gas powered semi-auto shotguns (that you don't see in rifles) is that they have to reliably cycle with a variety of loads. Your gun needs to cycle with low brass #8 birdshot 2 and 3/4 shells, but not have a high-speed come apart when you fire 3.5 inch magnum buck through it. Recoil driven shotguns just take it all, there isn't that much difference in recoil between those two examples to matter, but gas systems have to be set up to use all the gas power on low power shells, but meter some of it on high power ones so as to not blow the gun up. This is done via an adjustable gas plug near the gas port in the barrel, or the gas pistons are set up with valves to bleed off the excess automatically.

This is a Saiga. The ringed thing is the piston, and the threaded thing is the gas plug. Note the two slots in it (1 and 2) and the pushpin on the gun. The tapered end is down when the pin is at 2 for full power, and the plug blocks half the gas when it is flipped over at 1, for half power when you are using magnum rounds.

Either is fine for your use in a combat shotgun.

Magazines and shell carriers

Shotgun shells are big. They're not necessarily longer than a lot of rifle rounds, but they are much fatter, which makes stacking them sideways, like most rifles and pistols, to be a bit of a challenge. Some guns, like the Saiga series of Kalashnikov shotguns, just shrug, slam some vodka, and run around with a foot long 10 round box mag hanging out of the bottom of the receiver (or a 12 or 20 round drum), but most shotguns, including combat shotguns, stick with the traditional underhung linear tube mag under the barrel inside the forearm.

That mag holds TEN (10) and only ten rounds. Saigas are some of the only box mag shotguns out there, being Kalashnikovs, and they are the ONLY gun old B-Rock Obama managed to ban from further importing.

One thing that does typically get changed is that your normal shotgun has a 5 round tube mag when you’re using 2 and 3/4 inch shells (less with longer ones) and they come with a plug to limit you to 3 shells total in the gun while hunting (which you can, of course, remove). The combat shotgun runs that tube mag out to the end of the barrel to pick up a couple extra shells. Add to that carrying one in the pipe, and occasionally some creative loading practices like Benelli’s “ghost loading,” and you can get that up to 9 shells in the gun.

Mag extension

The next step is more of an accessory, but it is for ammunition carrying. Shell holders can be mounted to the left side of the receiver (opposite the action's port) and can carry 4-6 rounds. Butt sleeves with loops for shells can be strapped around the buttstock and give you about the same once again. While the tube mags are beneficial in that they can be topped off while still keeping the gun loaded, they do take practice to load quickly and smoothly while staying on target. Practice a lot.

This shotgun has both a receiver shell carrier and a buttstock sleeve shell carrier, and is a good example of tasteful and useful customization, without going full retard.

Sights

Sights on a shotgun are typically a different beast than your typical rifle irons. A single bead at the end of the barrel, sometimes with a pin a little closer in, are all the traditional shotgun has, and one aligns either the top of the barrel's cylinder, or a flat sighting rib, with the center of your eye, and you simply point the bead at your target. Many targets for shotgun sport shooting are moving, and the idea is to instinctively point the gun and punch the trigger as you arc your aim following the flying bird.

Rifle sights, at least classic irons, are set up to give you a little more detail that would normally be blocked out by the barrel underneath the target. This is also why field shotguns will often pattern a little higher than dead center on the bead, it allows you to aim lower and see more. The concept is that, with the front sight higher than the barrel, you can see more of the target, but you also now require a rear sight of some sort.

Benelli “ghost ring.” Note that the rear aperture is almost not there, it’s almost just a suggestion. The white dots line up with one on the front, and are tritium night sights.

A popular combat shotgun sight is the “ghost ring” which is a very wide aperture sight that is a thin ring. It allows you to line the back end of the shotgun with the front sight while allowing your field of view to be unobstructed. On the optic side, red dots, lasers, and small magnification scopes are frequently used. The takeaway is to use sights like a carbine rifle would, while making sure they can handle 12 gauge recoil.

Furniture and accessories

Although the original riot and trench guns had wooden furniture (stock and forearm) on them, often with a simple metal perforated screen for a barrel heat shroud, modern combat shotguns are almost always equipped with black polymer furniture. This helps in a few ways, mainly by being weather resistant and allowing a few more options.

Collapsible, or folding, stocks are common, as well as pistol grips. I don’t see a whole lot of vertical fore ends on combat shotguns, unless someone is doing a classic wood furniture Saiga conversion and wants to use a “donkey dick” fore end. Some will use a “hand stop” style of device that lets your support hand have something to push up against while holding the normal forearm.

The only dick that will ever show up in my articles ever: the classic AK-47 wooden vertical fore-grip; the donkey dick.

Like all close action modern guns, rails are in. Whether you want a shell holder, a light, a laser, the hand assist mentioned previously, an optic that can be quickly taken off, sling attachments, or all of the above, the Picatinny rail system is where it’s at, and you can tune to your taste. Personally, I’m a bit of a minimalist, but having an optic rail is very nice, and a light is the next thing I’d go for, especially if you already have some sort of night sight.

A sling is a must on any sort of working gun, because there will be times you need to stow that thing while doing something else. Rifle sling marksmanship can also apply to the combat shotgun.

This one is getting a little intense, but is usable with enough practice. It has: light, rails, two different ammo stores, foreend hand stop, optic, mag extension, a “door breacher” muzzle attachment, barrel shroud, and customized riser on the stock.

Lastly, a word on chokes. Most modern shotguns come with internal (the tube sits in the barrel) and external (the tube screws onto the end of the barrel) chokes. Do not shoot an internal choke gun without a choke. Do not run around without at least a thread protector on an external choke gun.

Combat chokes are one of two extremes. Run a full, or extra full, choke for buckshot (and do NOT shoot anything less than buck at a human target, bird shot is stupid, and rock salt might get you legally in trouble, as they might say you didn’t think he was scary enough to kill him, but shot him anyway), and run a cylinder (or open cylinder, or “slug”) choke for slugs. You want full choke to keep the buckshot concentrated, and you want an open choke for the slug so it doesn’t bind up passing through the tighter coke, which hurts the gun and the accuracy of the shot.

Choke recap.

Conclusion

Combat shotguns are fun and useful, and they serve a nice niche between your pistol and carbine. You can protect your home, make a statement by really wrecking something, and participate in things like 3 gun for fun. The best book I have seen on running a combat shotgun, although it is a little dated, is Massad Ayoob's Stressfire II: Advanced Combat Shotgun, if you want to learn how. Be safe.

Read More: 5 Firearms A Man Should Own

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

The Best Time To Visit Europe If You Have Strong Romantic Intent

February 15, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I recently spent some time in Dubrovnik, Croatia, and I'm currently writing this from the shores of Montenegro. I needed a couple of places to hang out for about a month in Europe. I was hoping for not-frigid weather, a decent price, and a location I could relax and put the finishing touches on a book.

Well, I'm now ready to declare it a mistake.

While I was hoping for a relatively distraction-free experience, I didn't anticipate being about the only one in town. While it's easy for some of us nomads to complain about certain destinations being completely overrun with Western tourists during the peak travel months, the opposite isn't all that great either. A lonely existance with almost no one to talk to, not much to do, and simply no excitement.

On the bright side, the place is truly beautiful.

With that being said, I've got a few tips I'd like to share that I've learned about traveling around Europe over the last year. You can apply this knowledge whether you're taking vacations for pleasure, trying to meet foreign girls, or just want to see parts of the world.

1. Summers Are Miserable

Kind of obvious, but it's really worth noting. Krakow, Poland was the biggest illustration of this to me. In April of 2016, it was fantastic. I came back in July, and I don't think I saw a single local. All the university girls had run away from the hoards of tourists, back to their village. If you're going to take a summer trip to run game, you should always look for the following criteria:

- How dependent is the city on universities for girls? (For Krakow, very much so)
- What is the general tourism scene like? (For a place like Prague, it gets insane)
- What is the holiday schedule? (For a place like Ukraine, the month of May is one big holiday and all the girls are leaving)

- For places with more mild weather, but that are still big cities—it's not as drastic a change. For example, in Barcelona in the springtime I met a lot of tourists and local Spanish women.

If you're doing the vacation thing, you're going at a time everyone else is going. Attractions will be swarmed, apartment prices will be inflated, and you'll hardly feel like you escaped from your normal office job. You replace co-workers with other tourists, and you'll just get fed up. This is exactly how members of my family felt this summer when they traveled around a bit.

2. Spring Blooms

Come spring time, people have been huddled inside all winter and are ready to go. In 2014 and 2015 I took shorter trips to Europe, and was amazed at how happy people seemed to be just to be outside. I'm seeing the same things here in Kotor. On days when it's been sunny, people are out and about having a blast.

I've definitely come to the conclusion that from a game perspective, spring is the time to be places in Europe. Clothes are being shed—huge coats are replaced with sun dresses. Everyone wants to drink and have a good time.

3. Grey Fall

I spent August through October in Kiev, and the rest of the year in Prague. It's definitely better to go during fall versus summer with everyone else, but fall to me has paled in comparison to spring. Rather than celebrating the sun, it's starting to go away. Some of the cities take on a very drab, grey look when there's nothing but clouds.

In some cases, it's not so bad. Eastern European women are looking for someone to huddle up with for the winter, so if you're somewhere longer-term, you'll have no shortage of dates. For that reason, and because she's getting far less offers from other foreigners passing through for a week.

The other bright side of fall is the return of universities to session, for obvious reasons.

4. Winter

For those of you who can stomach it, it could go either way. The tourists are gone, but it's miserably cold. I had hoped that places like Dubrovnik and Kotor might make for some good "off season" homes, so to speak, because a place like Ukraine isn't it. A place to escape to for a few weeks, or even a month. Where the weather would be "good enough", enjoy some beautiful scenery, and maybe there would be some people out an about.

This European off season experiment was a shot in the dark, but after a few weeks here I'm pretty comfortable in saying that if you want to have "fun", you should absolutely stay away from these types of places during the off season. At the same time, I'm hesitant to recommend them even for summer living. They're so small, and I just know these beautiful Old Towns, so empty right now, are going to be taken over by drunk, stumbling stag parties in the near future.

Conclusion

The more I travel, the more I realize that you maybe can't have it all. Of course, some people will argue:

> But if you're totally location independent, why not just hop around more?

I understand it, but that can get absolutely exhausting. Especially when you're trying to run and build an online business, you need a bit of stability in your life. I know that I personally can't get anything done if I'm not somewhere for at least a month. Anytime I take short trips for a week or so, I get nothing productive done.

I need know that I need the sort of stability of a monthly place, and a continent. And Europe is my favorite. I don't want to have to go from Europe to South America (it's still a 15-20 hour process to get from California to Colombia, for example) in December, and then head to Europe in February.

So maybe you can't have it all, and that's okay. I'll wait out this month, and try another experiment in the future. One thing's for sure though, I'd take this life over a cubicle.

If you want to learn how to break out the rat race, check out Troublesome Solutions to get started. Visit Eastern European Travel for more information about gallivanting around Europe.

Read More: 8 Things That Eastern Europe Girls Have Said To Me That Blew My Mind

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Afro-Islamist Riots Sweep Through Vibrant Suburbs Of Paris

February 16, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

On the afternoon of the 2nd of February 2017, in the town of Aulnay-sous-Bois (suburbs of Paris), 22 year-old Théo Luhaka, following a violent verbal exchange with four police constables, was restrained on the ground and later brought to the police station

Following his arrest, Théo is brought to the hospital where the medical examination reveals that he suffers from a 10cm (4 inches) tear of the anal canal. The 4 policemen are currently suspended.

The IGPN (the "police of the police" inspection service) examined the elements of the case and ruled that it appears to be an accident. The local court has so far charged three of the police constables with gang assault and one of them charged with rape. The affair is in progress. Those are the facts we know.

The two sides of the story

The scene took place in a Paris ghetto, just like this one

Théo asserts that the policemen battered him while on the ground, pulled down his trousers then taunted him with a telescopic baton before penetrating him with it.

He then asserts that the policemen dragged him to their car, macing him with pepper spray while calling him "bamboula" (the closest English translation would be "silly coon"). Théo's family hired Eric Dupont-Moretti, left-wing lawyer famous for defending Mohammed Merah's brother (Islamic terrorist Merah gunned down three soldiers and four Jews, among them 3 children, in 2012).

On the other side, the policemen and their lawyers assert that Luhaka refused to cooperate and comply before kicking, punching the constables and that if the penetration with the baton happened, it was accidental.

This video DOES NOT include the alleged assault:

The riots and the media recuperation

Regardless of the verdict, justice must examine the affair and the policemen are innocent until proven guilty. What matters is the response that we observed in many Afro-Muslim ghettos after the media broadcasted the story:

Rioting nationwide. Local precincts attacked. Police officers, public servants, firemen and reporters injured with Molotov cocktails and stones. Around a hundred arrests. Destruction of private and public property, worth millions of euros. Dozens of cars burnt. Cash machines and shops looted. Systematic assault and robberies on ethnic French and foreign tourists.

In one instance, police officers had to shoot live rounds in the air to deter about fifty rioters that threatened to lynch them. All of this to the joyous sound of "Fucking Gauls, you and your filthy race" and "You sons of whores, we will avenge him."

This Periscope account depicts the crowd movements near Bobigny's courthouse.

The irony lies in the fact that in their effort to get clicks and create sensational news, the biased media (who took the side of the accuser from the start, adding then deleting elements from the "official" version, publishing the names and locations of the accused, before any judicial conclusion) depicted the French police as inherently violent and racist. Leftist partisans at the New York Times lead the way for the English-speaking press.

But they were among the most severely attacked when the youths surrounded them. In a flow of insults, the buses of radio stations RTL and Europe 1 were torched, rocks hurled at them and reporters of BFMTV injured. Who prevented them from being lynched? The cops on the scene.

Weakling and soon-to-be-retired President Hollande a.k.a "Pudding", visited Luhaka in the hospital and the town of Aulnay on the 14th of February, showing where his priorities are.

He was booed and copiously insulted. Other irrelevant celebrities obviously jumped on the bandwagon.

But when in Grande Borne, two policemen are almost burnt alive or when a physician is stabbed 30 times by an Arab man, no one gives a fuck. Nothing from the media or the government

The usual suspects

Let's not beat around the bush. Those events reproduce step by step the chaos caused by the terrorist movement Black Lives Matter in the U.S.A. The Afro-Muslim/BLM/leftist national rioting follows every step of its American predecessor sparked by the deaths of Trayvon Martin or Michael Brown among others.

Last summer, Adama Traoré, a black man with a heavy criminal past, is restrained by the police and transported to the local precinct. He dies later of asphyxiation which the court rules was not the result of external factors such as violence. Cops were cleared of charges. Afro-Muslims refuse to accept the verdict. “Peaceful” protests are organised. Riots and looting follow.

In Traoré’s case, a clique of “anti-racist” (Newspeak for “Anti-white”) like SOS Racisme, the LDH (League for Human Rights), the CRAN (Representative Council of Black Associations), Antifas and more importantly Black Lives Matter France, helped in their campaign of hate against the police and disruption of public order. As in the American case, they are all bankrolled by George Soros’ Open Society. (1, 2, 3, 4)

Like in America, they portrayed the victim(s) as martyr(s). They did not even bother changing the slogans for both movements. Both violent protests for Traoré and Luhaka popularised hashtag campaigns and chants such as “No Justice, No peace” or “Everyone hates the police.”

A similar case, where the death of Afro-Muslim suspects due to their own recklessness gives the perfect pretext to unleash chaos and Anti-French hate, brings us back to the Zyed and Bouna case in 2005 with riots that plagued France for three weeks and showed to the whole world the impotence of the government when faced with immigrant violence and the insufficient means given to the police to counter it, including outdated material, limited number of constables and orders to stand down when directly attacked.

Of course, SOS racisme and their Leftist-Anarchist chicken-legged allies were there again.

"Justice for what's-their-face! Haha! Take that you fucking White males!"

The same scenario has been repeating itself for the last 20 years or so. Packs of predominantly Muslim and Black unemployed youth take advantage of some kid's death that they would have stabbed for a crumb of hash a week before, infiltrate a "relatively peaceful" protest, rob stores, stomp incredulous leftists that see their virtue signalling backfire and try to murder police officers.

Ceux qui la détestent viennent de faire gagner Marine Le Pen

2005 riots. A majority of rioters dream of recreating them.

Adding to the migrant invasion, immigrant delinquency and terrorism risk, these riots help to tank the hopes of France to remain a major tourist destination in the future.

The number of Chinese tourists dropped of 30% this year alone, around 50% for the Japanese. The Koreans follow the same path after the attack of their bus this week, their embassy advising them to avoid France and Paris in particular. Russia issued the same warning to its citizens in 2005 and maintain it to this day. Entire districts die because no investor wants to open a shop there. Those “lost territories of the Republic” keep providing us with homegrown jihadis and domestic murders.

Elites divide and conquer, taking their useful idiots for a free stuff ride while they nip thought crime in the bud. It was the same failed strategy used by the Clinton-Soros-Black Lives Matter Triple Entente last year in the United States, leading to Trump’s election.

Government backed media recuperate these events to fan the flames of division and incite the largely politically inactive Afro-Muslim youth of the ghettos to go to the polls, and vote for the right candidate, which is at the moment, anyone who is not Marine Le Pen, head of the Front National and so far the favourite in the French presidential race of 2017.

Their plan looks like it backfired and gave her what she needed to reach the Elysée palace.

Read More: French Writer Reveals That Army Is Planning To Recapture Muslim No Go Zones

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

How To Attract Women By Flashing An Enormous Stack Of Cash

February 16, 2017 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

We all know that women love money – that's a given. And they love money more than they love anything else in this life. And women are constantly on the lookout for guys who have it. The question is, how do you give women the impression that you have a lot of money (even if you don't), without saying a single word, while you are out on the hunt for hot, willing females?

Well, your old Uncle Bob is about to steer you directly to the Promised Land, in terms of the answer to that particular puzzler, and you don't have to be rich in order to pull this incredibly effective trick off – you just have to make it look like you are.

Cash is the ultimate aphrodisiac

One of my favorite tactics, whenever I am on the prowl for some horizontal refreshment, is to pull out a sizeable wad of cash while paying for the very first drink I order at whatever bar or club I might be visiting. After handling and counting money for many, many years, you become very adept at handling it – just like those guys you see on television, with the huge stacks of poker chips at the World Series of Poker, who are constantly manipulating their chip stacks in an effortless fashion, while they flick-flick-flick their chips, with only one hand and a thumb, as they contemplate their next play.

I'll typically have at least $800 in cash with me, which I fold in half, and carry in the zip-up breast pocket of my vest, whenever I go out looking for horizontal refreshment. And when I pay for my very first beverage, if there are some good-looking female targets in the vicinity, I'll pull out my stack and flick through it very quickly, and locate, and then pull out, just the right bill(s), in about three seconds flat.

As a quick aside, gents, always be sure to tip generously at bars and clubs; I usually tip 40% or better. Why? It engenders a feeling of goodwill in the hearts and minds of your servers, which means the next time you visit, they'll be really glad to see you and they will very likely serve you quickly; it also shows any admiring women in the vicinity that you are very generous with your cash.

Lay out the bait…then kick back and wait

I always make sure to wait at that point, after paying for my very first drink, while still holding my stack, with the bills slightly fanned out in a very precise manner, until the bartender brings the change back (this way my female targets can clearly see the size of the stack). Also, I will never look at any of the women who might be watching me as I do this, nor will I look at the stack. I always maintain frame and act aloof.

When the bartender returns with my change, I'll immediately focus on finishing the transaction, and I'll drop the whole stack on the bar directly in front of me, and spin it, if necessary, to face me, so that the numerals on the bills are right-side-up, and then I'll flick-flick-flick through the stack very rapidly, while deftly inserting each bill into its appropriate slot within the stack – 20s into the $20 bill portion, 10s into the $10 bill portion, 5s into the $5 bill portion, and the 1s into the $1 bill portion. And I'll do all of this very swiftly, very surely, very precisely, very routinely, and very disinterestedly.

Executing this simple maneuver when paying for your first drink will immediately give you a huge advantage over the male competition in the vicinity; most guys never display cash in such an overt manner, and the vast majority use credit cards or debit cards to pay for their drinks. (Bingo, you just sent a very powerful message to any women who happened to be watching you, without saying a single word – while the orbiting chumps said absolutely nothing…)

Get into their heads without saying a word – and they will come running

The psychological effect that this has on women is absolutely staggering. Women are inveterate money-mongers, and their true internal thoughts and motivations are very seldom known, and those thoughts and motivations must be deduced via long-term observation and experimentation. As it turns out, most women keep their eyes peeled for guys with a large stack of cash, in the exact same way that they are habitually on the lookout for guys with large bulges in their jeans. I cannot tell you how many times women have approached me over the years, after realizing I am a guy who not only has money, but is used to carrying large quantities of it while knowing how to handle it.

Only a couple of weeks ago, this hot waitress (easily an 8), who is about 30 years younger than I am, laser-beamed right in on me, at this innocuous little saloon down the street, after she'd caught my act at the bar while I way paying for my first beer. And I know exactly why she did it. It sure as hell wasn't because of my looks (heh). About 30 seconds later, I had her phone number, which she very willingly offered to me, after making the very first move herself, by walking right up to me and asking me my name, shortly before offering hers in return, and then making some sexually overt small talk.

Three killer bill-handling tricks that will make women take notice

As an added effect, while waiting to pay for another drink or get my change back after buying additional drinks, I will take one of the crisper bills (usually a $20, a $50 or a $100 bill), and I'll play with it, in the same way those professional poker players effortlessly do tricks with their chip stacks. I'll hold it firmly at the edges with both hands, lengthwise, and I'll flip it upside-down, and then bow it out in the middle, by bending it and holding it aloft, face-down (it looks exactly like a horseshoe, once you are holding it correctly). Then, I'll slide the bill back and forth, at the edges, by moving my hands up and down, so it appears that the bill is rolling on a pulley system, and I'll do this effortlessly, and in a very disinterested manner.

Another neat trick to use is a little beauty that I call the pinwheel. By folding a bill in half, you can pinch it in the middle between your thumb and middle finger, and then, using your index finger and your ring finger, you can manipulate the bill, and rotate it, at the center, so that it revolves around and around like a pinwheel. If I am paying for additional drinks with a single bill (usually a $20 bill, a $50 bill, or a $100 bill; and remember, always show your entire stack when paying for your very first drink – after that, use one of these additional tricks), I will more often than not use this trick, or the pulley trick that I mentioned above. The more you practice it, the better you will get at it. Eventually, you'll be able to spin the bill with enough speed and dexterity that any woman who is watching will take notice – and her subconscious mind will convince her, very quickly, that you are someone worth keeping an eye on.

An additional skill that you should acquire, involves properly handling the change you get back from a $100 bill. The methodology here is to display to all witnesses that you are flat-out unconcerned with something as ridiculously trivial as a measly $100 bill, and the change it generated for you after you paid for your drink. Generally, after paying for a drink with a $100 bill, I'll get back mostly $20 bills. I will snatch these up from the bar and toss them to the side for just a moment, in a very disinterested manner, as if they had a disease. I won't even look at the bills when I cast them aside. I'll then sort the other bills, quickly and deftly, and place them into my stack within the right slots. Lastly, I'll grab the $20 bills up with one, quick, effortless snatch, and put them into place.

Conclusion

You don't have to be rich to make this work. You might be a college student on spring break, for example, who is carrying a modest amount of cash. The overall dollar amount of the stack is somewhat irrelevant, provided you have a lot of bills to work with. It's all about how you handle the money that will enable you to hook the fish.

As long as you have at least three or four hundred dollars to flash, in mostly $20 bills and $10 bills, it will work. But you have to sell it convincingly. And the only way to sell it convincingly, is to practice handling and sorting and maneuvering the bills around, until it's second nature to you. And this is something you can work on at home, away from prying eyes, until you have it down cold.

This truly is all about practice, and it's something that is definitely worth learning. Eventually, you'll be able to handle the cash so fast and so expertly, that any woman who sees you maneuvering it will receive an overwhelmingly positive psychological impression that works completely to your advantage. Nothing gets a woman's immediate attention more than a guy who tips generously and knows how to handle a huge stack of cash – it screams, "This guy is worth fucking because he has lots of money, he's generous with it, and he's used to handling large sums of it."

I hope you take these tips to heart, my friends, because this is one seriously advanced lesson in game that you are probably not going to read about anywhere else. As usual, good luck with your hunting; and may the best man – who possesses the best overall game – win.

Read Next: 3 Easy Ways To Attract More Women Into Your Life Today

Bob Smith

Bob Smith is a man in search of the truth. His favorite quotes are, "We're all fools on this earth, and I can be no different"; "I know it's true, I read it at the LIE-brary"; and "The truth is not misogynistic, it's just the truth".

Feminists Want To Deprive Casey Affleck Of An Oscar Because Evidence Is For Misogynists

February 16, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

By Hollywood standards, Manchester by the Sea is a spectacular film. The lead, Casey Affleck, gives a spellbinding performance as a tortured man who returns to his hometown after the death of his brother. He had previously fled Manchester-by-the-Sea after his now ex-wife accused him of being involved in the deaths of their three children in a house fire. Affleck's character Lee seeks to navigate a complex relationship with his grieving nephew, for whom he has been awarded guardianship, all while dealing with the memories of being falsely accused of murder.

Though he won a Golden Globe for Best Actor recently, Casey Affleck's chances of winning the Academy Award are possibly very slim thanks to a lawsuit settled with two women. Two female employees on the set of 2010's I'm Still Here, which Affleck directed, claim he sexually harassed them. As would be expected, the lawsuit was settled out of court for a presumably exorbitant sum. Any male actor would recognize the deleterious publicity arising from allegations of sexual misconduct in the age of "rape culture." In addition, Casey Affleck was not charged by the police because any charges, let alone a conviction, might have required the perusal and testing of actual evidence.

After Affleck triumphed at the Golden Globes, a series of virtue-signalers came out of the woodwork. Chief among them was Constance Wu, an Asian actress whose obsession with gender and diversity quotas seems more aimed at her own bank balance than "change" you could call necessary and needed. She called Affleck a "sexual deviant." A series of reports laudatory of Wu, whom people called “brave,” were then issued by media outlets. The Sydney Morning Herald was one of many newspapers that tried to conflate the unfounded allegations against Casey Affleck with the proven pedophilia and rape of Roman Polanski. Such was the bitterness over a man getting an award after never being convicted of a crime.

Here’s some of Constance Wu’s groundbreaking reporting on the matter:

> Men who sexually harass women 4 OSCAR! Bc good acting performance matters more than humanity,human integrity!Bc poor kid rly needs the help!
>
> — Constance Wu (@ConstanceWu) January 24, 2017

And if she loses her job, she can always go back to her pet claims of gender and racial discrimination:

> I've been counseled not to talk about this for career's sake. F my career then, I'm a woman & human first. That's what my craft is built on.
>
> — Constance Wu (@ConstanceWu) January 24, 2017

Why the persecution of Casey Affleck might be good for improving Hollywood

By not singling out his brother, even if the allegations are bogus, Ben Affleck has ruled himself out of attacking other stars accused of sexual harassment, assault, or rape.

As demonstrated in some of his recent media appearances, particularly a diatribe in defense of Islam he made on Real Time with Bill Maher, Affleck’s brother Ben is a key member of Hollywood’s SJW brigades. And when the Hollywood star brother of a man accused of sexual assault, however tenuous the allegations may be, fails to comment on the saga, we should take note. We now have a precedent for the next time a well-known actor is hounded for purported sexual impropriety, whether he has family connections in show business or not.

Of course, perhaps Casey Affleck is partially getting protection because he is Ben Affleck's brother and has other major entanglements within Hollywood (his ex-partner is the sister of Joaquin Phoenix). Yet it doesn't really matter. There is no evidence available to us to suggest that Affleck did what cinematographer Magdalena Gorka and producer Amanda White claim. Plus, as everyone from Ben Affleck to George Clooney to Meryl Streep are saying nothing negative about the issue, commonsense commentators have a new weapon for the next time a man is chased by money-hungry women looking for a small (or large) fortune: "You presumed Casey Affleck's innocence, so why not this guy's?"

Casey Affleck probably won't get the Oscar but his ordeal shows men can triumph over spurious allegations

Magdalena Gorka and Amanda White should never have received money, but Casey Affleck had no choice.

With the "racist Oscars" controversy still fresh from last year, fellow contenders like Denzel Washington's Fences already threatened to steal Casey Affleck's thunder. The dubious claims of Magdalena Gorka and Amanda White, enabled by a man-hating media and certain C-grade celebrities, only add to the hurdles Affleck will face in winning the Oscar for Best Actor.

In the meantime, I recommend Manchester by the Sea to everyone. The way Affleck's character Lee deals with his self-pitying, vindictive ex-wife, for example, is a sight to behold. By no means a comedy, the film nevertheless possesses a deep irony you rarely find in modern, cucked cinema.

In many respects, the way Casey Affleck has dealt with the sexual harassment allegations against him is similar to the way the man he portrays in Manchester by the Sea deals with his tragedies. Others may hurt you for a while, but you can still keep on living, all on your own terms.

Read More: Will Smith's Revolt Against The Oscars Shows That Leftist Celebrity

Solidarity Is Crumbling

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Travel To Taiwan For The First Time

February 16, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

The East Asian region is dominated by economically and geopolitically powerful states such as China and Japan, and tertiary South Korea. Taiwan, often referred to as the the Republic of China, is relatively small in comparison.

However, due its relative wealth, high level of democracy, largely superb infrastructure and beautiful scenery, both younger and older males can find something of value here. In fact, I regard this as one of the most optimal destinations for travel or a more extensive visit. Thus in this article I intend to describe contemporary Taiwan in a nuanced way, and inform the reader about what this country has to offer from the aspect of travel or temporary migration.

The emergence of Taiwan

Taiwan has been colonized since the early 17th century onwards. In earlier phases of the island's history, the only locally dominant group was those who are nowadays collectively labelled Taiwanese aborigines, a population of Austronesian ancestry who managed to chase away earlier Chinese conquerors who stepped their feet on the island. The first successful colonizers were linked to the Dutch East India Company and later the Spanish Empire (northern area), followed by Chinese during the Qing dynasty (1683-1895), Japan until the end of World War II, and eventually Chinese nationalists who fled to the country in 1949 in the aftermath of the Chinese civil war. Basically, a number of sub-groups of Han Chinese migrants are now the locally dominant group which makes up today's Taiwanese people. Aborigines make up only about 2%.

The nationalist party Kuomintang (KMT), formed in 1912 and which even ruled mainland China 1928-1949, has been largely dominant in Taiwan after 1949. Its hegemony, though, has been severely undermined by other parties, not the least the liberal-oriented Democratic Progressive Party – now the country's largest – during the advent of democracy in the mid-80s and forward. The partial americanization of Taiwan is linked to the technocratic and democratic reforms during the last three-four decades.

The contentious relationship with mainland China and The U.S. is a topic that could be further addressed, and the situation is perhaps increasingly tense due to President-elect Donald Trump's capricious (?) greetings after his conversation with the current president of ROC, Tsai Ing-wen. In short, Taiwan is a geopolically significant player on the global chessboard. A pawn, surrounded by larger forces that make it into a symbol for hegemonic struggle. Hopefully the stalemate can continue for the sake of all involved competitors.

The years of fundamental industrialization under Japanese rule and martial law between 1949-1987 now appear distant. Taiwan is currently a high-tech nation with a GDP per capita size which places it as the 22th wealthiest nation in the world, according to IMF.

What modern Taiwan has to offer

Some Portugese explorers who visited Taiwan called it Ilha Formosa, the beautiful Island, and rightly so. Taiwan, both the main island, and various smaller islands along the coastal lines, are indeed very pleasing to the eye. It is a green and mountainous country, with vast areas of unpopulated land. Although being very densely populated in city regions, it is not very difficult to move outside of the urban landscapes and find nature. National parks such as Taroko National Park and Yushan National Park offer beautiful scenery and great opportunities for hiking.

A traveler can of course choose different routes within Taiwan, but I would say that to travel along the east coast is the best choice. If one has more than 10 days, then I would suggest the Penghu Islands as the secondary destination after the east coast. The east coast is not integrated into the bullet train railway system, but the distances are not that extensive and one can go from Taipei to Taitung within 5-6 hours.

Besides from the National Palace Museum, I would suggest several visits to some of the capital city's Taoist and Confucian temples. Remember that these are the true religio-cultural and philosophical systems of the world's greatest civilization (besides the West). I am not a Confucianist or Taoist but I find some ideas interesting, even accurate, and do respect them.

Game and girls

When I stress that this country is a more or less optimal travel destination it is because the relatively low price levels, safety, scenery and well-developed infrastructure, rather than the level of female talent. But with the rise of global-Western culture and the Korean wave spreading across the region, some of all of these thin girls tend to turn hotter and might be pursued as at least short-term flings.

For the game-oriented person, several strategies can work. Perhaps with an overbalance to night game, online game and social connections. A Westerner who works as an English teacher or study overseas have the time and opportunity to meet girls by means of any relevant method.

Since Taiwan is overall a well-educated and status-oriented nation, one's image could be at least slightly adjusted. In the West you play the clown, whereas in the East you are more like a talking and walking CV with humility written all over it to cover the big letters. With the best from a well-groomed look and a good job and/or educational background, East Asians and Southeast Asians will respond well to a balanced world game.

For the traveler who only has a limited amount of time (less than a month), I think that preparatory game through apps such as OkCupid and HelloTalk can be useful in order to obtain more options close to arrival. Focus only on Taipei. This should, of course, be complemented with several night club visits, creating a possible interplay between night time fun and daytime dates. Since club venues in Asian cities come and go, it is wise to keep updated and try to pinpoint the most optimal places with a large degree of cosmopolitan girls but without too much hookers and/or expat male competition.

Just stay at a hostel or hotel and try to get lucky, and if it is worthwhile, try to rent a room for a couple of weeks. If one has zero social connections then hostels can be an option in order to met momentary mates, but since hotels often are so cheap (one can find a 3-star hotel for 25 dollars) it seems generally preferable.

Regarding talent in Taipei, one can expect about the same average levels as in mainland China, Hong Kong, South Korea and Japan. Alternative assertions on the supposed hotness or ugliness of Taiwanese girls are likely exaggerations. With that said, from the totality of information from the Roosh V Forum, other relevant websites, and my own experiences, they are slightly harder to get laid than Japanese girls but easier than Koreans. If to get laid is your sole purpose for travel, then I would suggest Thailand or the Philippines instead.

Trip schedule suggestion:

Taipei day 1: Visit the National Palace Museum. Day game and online game.

Taipei day 2: Visit Yulin village. Day game and online game. Visit Dalongdong Baoan Temple.

Taipei day 3: Check out the metropolitan area and do some night game, forn instance at Elektro (earlier Club Spark 101).

Taroko National Park day 4: After departure early in the morning spend almost the entire day in Taroko National Park. Walk along the Shakadang River Trail. Make sure to digress from the tourist groups after about 2 hours. Then you will have an entire valley for yourself. Meditate or just simply behold the beautiful landscape.

Take the train to the town Yuli and sleep at a budget hotel. Make sure to rent a bike early in the morning.

Walami Trail day 5: Get up early and ride with a mountain bike until the point of departure of the Walami trail. Bring loads of water and snacks. Hike uphill in the rainforest for 4-8 hours. Make sure to not miss the best waterfall. Head to Taitung with train in the evening.

Green Island day 6: While on Green Island the day after, ride with an electronic bike or scooter around the island. Visit the beaches around the lighthouse and eat some fresh seafood.

Green Island day 7: Continue to go around the island. Try snorkeling or scuba diving. Visit the Chaorih Hot Spring in the evening.

Taipei day 8: Take the ferry back to Taitung early and the train back to Taipei. Continue gaming.

Taipei day 9: Explore the city. Do night game.

Taipei day 10: Visit some more temples and parks. Do more night game.

Conclusion

Overall Taiwan is a great destination for travel and perhaps longer visits. It is not the most optimal place for love tourism, but on the other hand one of the best choices if one takes into account culture, price levels, quality of infrastructure, and scenery.

Read More: What Modern South Korea Is Like

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

It’s Time To Revise The 10 Point Scale To Account For Modern Female Obesity

February 17, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Guys, we need to talk. It’s 2017. Many of you are still using an outdated, biased, unattainable scale for grading women based on their physical appearance. Yes, I’m talking about the 10 point scale. Well guess what?

The Current Year is now 2017, and it’s time to throw that old grading scale out the window. If you’re still grading women the same way you always have, you need to check your privilege and check out some facts. Things have changed.

This data is almost a decade old.

One of the most massive changes is weight. 68% of American women are now Plus Sized.

The New "5" — A Size 18

ALL of these are smaller than the AVERAGE woman today

According to a 2016 study, which analyzed data from 1988-2010, the average American woman's clothing size is between 16 and 18. Considering the age of this data, and the fact that weight is trending heavier every year, we are today looking at a size 18+ as average. What does this mean?

Sex, age, race and Hispanic origin[1], and percent of poverty level	Normal weight (BMI from 18.5 to 24.9)[2]
	1988–1994	1999–2002	2003–2006	2007–2010	2011–2014
20 years and over, age-adjusted[3]	Percent of population
Both sexes[4]	41.6	33.0	31.6	29.8	28.9
Male	37.9	30.2	28.6	25.7	26.0
Female	45.0	35.7	33.5	33.7	31.7

Less than a third of women are a healthy weight. Average is now fat.

The average American woman is 5’4″ and has a weight of over 166 pounds. With a 37.5 inch waist. Average. Meaning half weigh more, and half weigh less, but 166 is a pretty typical weight for women.

Normal distribution: a 5 weighs 166 pounds. A 9 now weighs 130 which would be considered a 5 in 1950.

A woman with average face and hair weighing just under 170 pounds and wearing 38″ jeans becomes the new 5 on a 10 point scale. Based on a normal distribution, a 9 would lie two standard deviations from the mean, weighing an average 130 pounds, and comprising around 2% of the population. Let’s examine the new 2017 10 Point Scale.

Spanish actress Soledad Miranda, 105 pounds, is 3 standard deviations from the mean today

One

A one is so physically disturbing that one cannot easily imagine something more ugly; if you could do something to her to make her uglier, she is by definition at least a two. In the interest of publishing standards, no images of ones will be shown.

Two

A two is among the lower tier of women; decidedly ugly but not hideous. These include the old, the obese, the hairless, and the handicapped.

Still possesses teeth and hair = definitely not a 1

Three

Threes are usually over the 166 pound average; 38% of American women are obese, and these include most 3s. Threes and lower are noticeably less attractive than average; they are the opposites of 7s, which are noticeably attractive, in this regard, but they are still seen with regularity. Be wary of considering them easy pickings—they are not good even for practicing game—they typically have cocky attitudes and use lots of sarcasm.

Four – Above Average Weight But Other Redeeming Qualities

A four is only slightly below average; you should be seeing many of these on a daily basis. 4s, 5s and 6s as a whole constitute one standard deviation of the population distribution of all women (2/3 of American women are 4s, 5s, or 6s).

Above avg weight, but with long hair and smiling

Tess Holliday-above average weight but is a working “model”

Five – Average (170 Pounds and 38″ Inch Waist)

Fives are average, which is not to say that they are neither fat nor thin; but that half of the women you see will be either above or below a 5.

Singer Adele has an average body, though skin and hair are above average

Remember, 70% of women are overweight, and clothing sizes have been constantly redefined upwards to fit the ever expanding “normal” which is now a 37.5″ inch waist.

These women have size 16-18 bodies with above average hair and makeup–5 bordering on 6

Meghan Trainor, 9 pounds above avg, but with superior clothing/grooming

A size 16 in 1960 wasn't so bad (though it was still larger than average)

Six – Above Average

Sixes are slightly above average, but still within the range of most typical women you see. This includes women slightly under the average weight of 166.

10 pounds below average

Seven – Some Femininity Visible

Well below average weight and long hair make them a rare catch

This includes girls below average weight, approaching healthy, physically attractive weight but not boner-inducing.

This girl is in the top 15% of all American women

This also includes women of attractive weight who have permanently degraded their physical beauty by graffiti and shrapnel.

Eight

This group will have typically attractive traits. Body weight is not thin, but still below average, and flaws are present, though not immediately seen at first glance. Due to their rareness, they are often former 9s that have aged or gained weight, but are not overweight like 70% of American women.

Bruce Jenner is an 8/10 on the female scale.

Remember that even at level 8+, the physical appearance may be pleasant, but their speech and behaviors are usually boner-killing if they were raised in urban America.

Nine

Elbows slightly pointed, manly hands. A high 9 in America

The nines are the top 2% of women and include the Amish, girls with pleasant smiles, and a body with no visibly drooping fat. A small portion of them (3 standard deviations from the mean, or 0.1% of the population) will be visibly attractive.

While the above is undecidedly attractive, that is what healthy girls in their early 20s are supposed to look like, which is why she would be considered a 5 in many cultures. Average in some cultures is attractive. Average in America is a 38″ waist.

Ten

While women can approach 10, they can never fully reach it. A 10 implies perfection, that there's not anything better. If you think a model or celebrity is a 10, she's likely been boosted a couple of points by airbrushing and makeup. If you find a 22-year-old who you think is a perfect 10, she probably looked better at 21. Or would look better with a breast slightly larger. Or if she lost 5 pounds. It is highly unlikely that you are seeing her at her maximum beauty.

There is no perfection; there is only 9+. Anything 9.5+ has no easily recognizable physical flaws. 9.5 is the highest rating a woman can objectively be given. You can browse some beautiful women here.

Implications

Eights and nines are the top 4% of all women in America. The majority of them will be too young, too old, married, dating politicians, athletes, or sheiks, or living in NYC or L.A while you are wanting to meet them. That leaves a very small number for the rest of men to chase after. If you're not happy dating 7s and below, you may need to consider looking elsewhere.

American women are large, and getting larger all the time. And their attitudes and behavior are becoming less feminine all the time. If your dating options are restricted to American women, you'd better get used to the new normal.

Read More: 42 Things Wrong With American Women

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

7 Research Subjects That Became Taboo After Cultural Marxists Took Over

February 17, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Aristotle said that wonder and astonishment are what lead men to the state of pondering and ratiocinating otherwise known as philosophizing (Metaphysics, 982b12). What seemed at first evident, once interrogated through asking for a precise definition and details, becomes troublesome and unclear. What are justice, morality, duty…? Philosophy starts from common-sensical notions by taking a hard, interrogative stance on them. If maintained and underpinned with the proper methodology, the philosophical attitude can lead to a long path of reflection and to many things to say.

Likewise, out of philosophy in the narrow sense, a particular conundrum or the right question can push us a long way. Red pill is just like that. Years ago, I was thinking, "How can I get a notch?" and "What's our identity?" Today, I got some substantiated answers, but there is still a long path ahead in both thinking and doing.

The left knows the power of question-asking, careful framing and putting forward convenient theories. This is why they methodically chastised several issues, no matter how relevant or legitimate, from the academia, and pushed forth a mixture of Marxism, minoritism and contrived "postmodern" stuff instead. If you cannot ask the right questions, how can you find out the right answers?

Here is a list of such relevant questions I crossed path with in pre-cultural Marxism hegemony era.

1. The destiny of the West and of Western peoples

From the Enlightenment philosopher Nicolas de Condorcet to Rudyard Kipling, one can spot a golden thread. The former, in a "sketch of the future progresses of mankind", claimed that Europeans had a duty to spread the so-called Enlightenment principles to the whole world. Such a claim is often derided by contemporary Leftists as a mere mask for particular interests, yet Condorcet really believed that all inequalities were caused by custom, false beliefs and forgotten abuses: Europeans had to spread lack of religion, free trade and technology everywhere so that everyone could develop, thus ending the "artificial inequalities." A typical secularist optimist, Condorcet thought Western particular interests and other peoples' interests would be immanently reconciled and united through "progress."

Rudyard Kipling, coming one century after, had a more balanced and experienced view of human nature and diversity, nonetheless he still clung to the idea of a global well-being whose Europeans would be responsible: such is, he said, the "white man's burden." A heavy weight, a chore, something that could cost money instead of actually earning it—yet still a calling and an identity.

When easy illusions about the nature of modernity started crumbling, the identity of the Western civilization was also at stake. If "progress" shows unable to play God's role, what should we turn to instead? Can there be a modern civilization without perpetual growth? If the "white man's burden" should be thrown away, does the West still have a higher calling?

2. The destiny of middle classes and the equilibrium of society

While going through some of Lothrop Stoddard's writings, I was warmly surprised to meet with a summing-up of the situation of middle classes in Europe after 1918. "The plight of the middle classes has attracted much attention from students of contemporary affairs", he wrote in 1925. Reading these lines I couldn't help but feel some nostalgia. Academics who cared about the middle classes!

Today, the topic is mostly thought of through Marxist glasses—middle classes are blamed as "bourgeois", egoistic, unduly privileged, philistine… It hasn't always been like that. And the university was not always a den of underhanded Leftists trying to indoctrinate promising children against their own social identity.

Just like many of the contemporary red-pill thought, Stoddard's portrayal shows honest but quite uncomfortable. At the end of the Belle époque, middle classes were slowly getting screwed by a handful of wealthy bankers and industrials who squeezed them from above, and underwent rising taxes from governments who would rather pressure dispersed individuals than well-connected cronies. Their members were amongst the bravest soldiers at war. As a reward, those who survived faced inflation, unemployment, and although many of them had supported social State programs, they were directly threatened by the rise of hateful Bolsheviks.

On a bright note, Stoddard shows how middle class members answered to Bolshevism by developing a class solidarity of their own. It seems, though, that middle-classers being together and strong was a problem to the powerful, for middle class unions got repressed by the States in the name of "antifascism" and denied as "bourgeois" by the new masters of the academia.

Cultural Marxism also leads to consider classes as entities at war with each other. The more classes you split society into, as they have done with any new "minority" that got hyped-up in the media and academia, the more antagonism and mistrust you create. From a Marxist view, and we know that feminism conceives "women" not as a sex but as a class in that sense, classes have irreconcilable interests and must be at war all the time.

Ironically, Marxists never seem to think that their own view may be responsible for class wars, and that one can perceive interpersonal relationships the same way—loaded with irreconcilable interests. It has escaped them that a fine society succeeds at equilibrating the interests, not at dividing them pointlessly.

3. Human biodiversity, races, and the sexes

It seemed rather evident and commonsensical at all times that human individuals and peoples differed from each other. The traditional world knew well about both peoples, or nations, and castes, which reflected the individuals' vocations and peculiarities. The multiplicity of categories one could find in European Middle Ages or pre-British rule India makes most modern thinkers dizzy, yet they were handled casually and did not seem overly problematic.

In fact, problems with categories of people appeared with modernity. Nationalisms developed along with big States, crushing regional differences underfoot, whereas eighteenth-century philosophers such as the aforementioned Condorcet tried to reduce human differences to effects of the environment.

These remarks do not imply that modern thinkers are unable to understand human diversity, biological or not. Empirical approaches showed repeatedly that ingrained differences between the sexes, just like between races, exist. Our own views on hypergamy or, say, women's conformism-prone tendencies stem from rediscovering a socially taboo but persistent wheel.

Human biodiversity was a prime target of ferocious leftist assaults since at least the Boasian trend in anthropology. Centuries of empirical data were rejected, flesh and blood individuals were replaced by abstract units. The "gender" trend is merely another outgrowth of this abstract individual push: sex is disconnected from biology, turned into a kind of psychological sex, chosen out of a mystically undetermined will.

Thanks to genetics, and to evolutionary and comparative psychology, human biodiversity can still be studied in scattered places amongst the academia. Science recovered a bit from the Marxist assault. However, it is powerless at struggling alone against Leftist hegemony, and scientific views on human biodiversity remain enclosed in ivory towers whereas the same universities also breed “studies” department that wield much more cultural influence. Should I add that humanities departments maintain a strict taboo on any empirically—and commonsensically—informed view about races and the sexes?

4. Genetic deterioration and betterment

If you have watched Idiocracy, especially the first minutes of the movie, you know what genetic deterioration is. The problem reached scientists’ awareness in the nineteenth century: as modern technology saved and healed people who would have been selected off on earlier times, wasn’t modern civilization undermining itself?

Individuals and peoples are not equally excellent at creating and maintaining a civilization. When the least able breed more than the excellent, civilization is at risk of being overrun with idiots who will dumb it down to their level if not destroying it altogether. Genetic deterioration can take other forms, such as when people with genetic disease are allowed to breed and, if they do, propagate it through the next generation.

Incidentally, this idea is also relevant when considering various groups inhabiting the same territory: if some groups breed more than others, the latter are at risk of being replaced or swamped down by the former.

This theme became taboo at the same time than eugenics got massively smeared—by the same who would distort and curse the idea of race a few decades later. If interested, take a look at Richard Lynn’s books Dysgenics (1996) and Eugenics, a reassessment (2001) that give a fine introduction to the topic.

5. Jewish power

The biggest elephant in the room. Whether you look at Hollywood, at the academia, at the legal world, at Wall Street or at Leftist stirrers, you will see a lot of Jews. They occupy the institutions, decide on cultural orientations, organize so that such and such a cause is suddenly everywhere in the media and university. The theme has been evoked sometimes, mostly by Jewish individuals—non-Jews are busier avoiding tripping on the carpet.

Those who built the Western civilization are supposed to keep quiet facing the most blatant examples of nepotism and tribalism. As children, we were fed a steady diet of "muh Holocaust muh poor innocent victim" narrative with plenty of pathos, and we grew up in a world where only mentioning the Jewishness of powerful people is enough to be labelled an "anti-Semite."

The topic has become risky since Jews started taking over culture. When the European youth were dying by the thousands every day, in 1915, the Boasians—extreme environmentalists, mostly Jewish—reached absolute power over departments of anthropology. Skeptics like Madison Grant were marginalized in an increasingly Jewish-dominated academia. Later, in the 40s, Jewish journalists would also play a crucial role in demonizing Charles Lindbergh. All these are important metapolitical manipulations, yet if you mention who did what, be careful of the "anti-Semite" smear hanging over your head!

Kevin MacDonald's brilliant trilogy about Jewish communautarism and influence is a shining exception to the general academic taboo. Even Hannah Arendt (herself a Jew) got a lot of heat from her own community after she dared mentioning the existence of Jewish kapos in German concentration camps—that is, how the "all-Jews-are-innocent-and-pure" narrative showed false.

6. Freemasonry

Masonic lodges are less of a taboo, today, than before. They are still shrouded, not in mystery, but in social pressure. If you want to talk about the eighteenth-century Masonic lodges and how they relate to the so-called Enlightenment, fine. However, if you want to pursue the inquiry into how Freemasonry played a crucial role in anticlericalism, secularization, or overlapped with the radical Left in the nineteenth century, most teachers will retreat.

The topic has been clouded by fakes, contradictory theories and cryptobabble. Some hypothesize Masons are the first responsible of this claptrap—nothing better than a chaos of contradictory theories, lies, and a general air of paranormal to daunt wannabe investigators and maintain secrecy.

In truth, one does not need to dabble much in esotericism to uncover influence trafficking, corruption and metapolitical manipulations carried in at least some Masonic lodges. The topic still remains taboo. Studying power relationships and privilege in Leftist academia remains synonymous of crafting an elaborate fiction where “straight-white-males” are thrown into the role of the bad guy.

7. Indo-European history and aryanity

As a friend of mine once said, “identifying as an Aryan may be the ultimate thought crime nowadays.” In the nineteenth century, scholars discovered that Europeans shared a deep brotherhood amongst themselves, with some Asiatic peoples such as the Kalash, and with the upper castes of India.

Linguists unearthed common roots behind Germanic, Latin, and Hindi words. Anthropologists found striking physical similarities between Europeans and some Easterners. Historians like George Dumézil put forth what has been called the Indo-European tripartition, not to mention how the Swastika, among other symbols, has been used on the East and West for thousands of years. National Socialist use of the symbol was merely an attempt at binding the party and its crusade to something much wider.

Now, Indo-European studies still exist, but they are confined in historical departments virtually devoid of cultural influence in the mainstream, and official scholars perpetuate frauds such as pretending that the word “Aryan” merely designated social classes—whereas it clearly had a hereditarian component as well—in order to neuter the potential metapolitical content of their field.

Conclusion

Cultural Marxism is hidden in plain sight, both in how some subjects are treated and in what can hardly be said. We are left with a mutilated anthropology, endless social and metapolitical divisions thanks to aggressive minoritism, unaccountable power-wielders, and an incomplete and twisted view of history that only worsened thanks to libtards’ obsession to tarnish Western history.

Many of our cultural problems come from self-perpetuating Leftist institutional power. By taking the field, they also shaped the norms, and did so without assuming the responsibility of what they did—instead they have put on the shoulders of those they were actually dispossessing and disempowering.

Time has come to take back the academia by asking serious questions and deconstruct the boundaries, double standards, taboos, framings, unsaid beliefs… enforced by these cultural supremacists. Intellectual diversity will make America and the whole West great again.

Read Next: Why College Is A Warzone For Young Men

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

The War Between Donald Trump And The Deep State

February 17, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In the below video, I analyze the implications of Trump's National Security Adviser getting fired because of malicious leaks from the CIA…

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them on the blog.

Read Next: Is The Managerial State Our Enemy?

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Ways Female Travel Bloggers Damage Young Women

February 18, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

As social media has exploded in recent times with the likes of Facebook, Instagram, Snapchat, and Twitter, few other pursuits have been shoved more prominently into the faces of people everywhere than the exciting world of travel. And we all know how women love their social media to death don't we?

Furthermore, since few other types of pictures with gather more "likes" and fawning commentary than presenting yourself in front of a world famous landmark or viewpoint, young women all across the world are ravenous in wanting to spend as much of their twenties as possible traveling and basking in the divine light of digital validation.

All these “likes” are like heroin!

Accordingly, solo female travel blogs have boomed during the 2010s.

While most will achieve incredibly minute readership and eventually give up on their writing hobby, some solo female travel bloggers build up very large followings and can exert great influence on their young and idealistic fans. And it’s often hardly in their best long term interests.

This article will explore four ways that solo female travel bloggers are a nuisance to society, rather than smiling saviors.

1. They Promote Rampant Narcissism

Look at meeeeeeeeeeeee!!

Solo female travel bloggers are absolutely in love with themselves, and completely addicted to the regular discharge of dopamine and serotonin in their brains which is unleashed after a barrage of “likes” and praises of “you’re so inspiring!” flood their comment boxes.

They completely discourage humbleness and introspection with their pursuits, and are ultimately rather selfish bastards to boot. For instance, they claim to want to “empower” and “inspire” you to travel (seriously, are these the two most overused and impotent buzzwords in travel blogs?), but in reality they would prefer you to just live vicariously through their own travels and contribute much desired blog traffic for advertising revenue and marketing referrals.

Social Media brought out the worst narcissistic behavior we have ever seen in young women, and solo female travel bloggers endlessly take that narcissism worldwide.

2. They Promote Sexual Promiscuity

I really hope that hawt tattooed surfer guy will notice me tonight…

To be fair, a lot of the solo female travel bloggers out there keep their travel bangs either incredibly vague or hush-hush altogether. Thus keeping their writing focus almost entirely on their travel exploits and stupid food pictures.

However, some of the biggest names in this niche business love to gloat about all the "hawt" Australian, English, Irish, or Swedish guys they shared hostel beds or sex-on-the-beach with during their walkabouts.

We have tirelessly repeated the notion that a high number of sexual partners in females is a major red flag for long term relationship or mother material, and the sad fact of the matter is that solo female travelers will have a considerably higher notch count than their more grounded compatriots.

For instance, what happens to a 23-year-old American girl who is unleashed upon the planet with plenty of those "hawt" Aussie guys she likes so much? Especially after spending month after month in backpacker hostels?

Loading…

She becomes repeatedly pounded damaged goods, who is unlikely to be able to pair bond well with her (presumably) American beta male partner in the coming years. Why? Because she'll be constantly thinking about all those brazen, loud-mouthed, alpha bad boy Aussie guys she dropped her panties for in the past.

Have your fun, but it's best to steer clear from putting a ring around one of these girls. Divorce, break-ups, and so many other "I'm unhaaaapy" scenarios will inevitably follow.

3. They Promote Spinsterdom And Childlessness

For the solo female travel blogger, settling down and getting married while they still have good sexual market value and fertility (like 25) is absolutely unfathomable. To them, travel is like eating Pringles. "Once you pop, you can't stop".

They just gotta see more and more and more of the world until they genuinely feel like they are satisfied. Satisfaction of course, will not come until they are at least around 33 years old, and for many more it will even be much later than that.

Kate McCulley of 'Adventurous Kate' fame has claimed that while conquering the whole planet is not a realistic goal, she wants to make it to 100 countries by the time she is forty years old.

Wow. Forty years old. Plan on having children while you still can, and avoid a lonely cat-filled spinsters life which follows?

Of course not, and she and many other long term solo female travel bloggers are setting themselves up (and their "inspired" and "empowered" readers) for an empty second half of their life which many will deeply regret.

4. They Espouse SJW And Leftist Talking Points

“Clueless” Kate McCulley, virtue signaling for her ludicrously paranoid leftist readership at the ‘Women’s March’

Finally, solo female travel blogs are cesspits of “social justice” and bullshit feminist mantra.

There are almost no prominent female travel bloggers who espouse more conservative or libertarian viewpoints, and this inflicts serious intellectual damage on the brains of their young and “inspired” and “empowered” female readership. (As if they haven’t had enough cultural Marxist brainwashing already?).

Travel blog ring-leaders like Kate McCulley act like they have to apologize to the whole planet for the election of Donald Trump, continually regurgitate the tired hysterics that he is going to take away the rights of everyone who isn’t a heterosexual white male, and rush to the defense of Islam (ignoring all it’s anti-homosexuality, women’s rights suppression, etc) at any and every opportunity.

It’s tiresome, face-palm worthy, and just plain incorrect. As always, emotion will trump any notion of reason to a female graduate of cultural Marxist university incorporated.

Conclusion / “And That’s All She Wrote”

In closing, what solo female travel bloggers are selling is rubbish. They add nothing to the world of travel which hasn’t been covered 1000 times already, and they are out to infect new generations of young women with their narcissism, promiscuity, voluntary infertility, and social justice disease.

And do you wanna travel regardless of your gender or relationship status? Just make your way to TripAdvisor for your medicinal dose of “inspiration” and “empowerment” to travel for crying out loud.

Read More: 3 Reasons Why Travel Doesn't Make Women More Interesting

John Carver
John Carver is a four year ROK veteran with over fifty articles of SJW-triggering truth bombs on archive. You can follow him on Twitter if you are so inclined.

5 Things Westerners Can Learn From The K-pop Industry

February 18, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

The K-pop industry is an interesting phenomenon. It does largely hinge upon Western and global technology, music genres and producers, but adjusted for East Asian cultural values and business models it manages to produce more than silly tunes.

Westerners—both sexes, but especially androgynized women—can actually learn something substantial from the South Korean pop music industry. If not for other reasons, then because it does remind us of how the U.S. used to be in the 1980s (but updated to current technology) with regard to the sex roles and beauty standards.

1. Heteronormative relationships

The American sociologist John Lie in his book K-pop (2014) describes the multi-directional cultural flows from the West to the East (and a little bit from the East to the West, since Korean dramas and Korean pop music have a significant number of fans in Western countries). From the premise that South Korea is an export-oriented country, he analyzes the K-pop industry's business strategies.

Overall it is of course primarily about to make money for particular companies, and secondarily to improve the national image of South Korea (national branding), but sometimes the process of money-making overlaps interesting cultural phenomena.

As much as one may think that Korean men tend to look feminine—partly because of general physiognomy, partly due to feminized fashion trends—the social conservatism that one finds in the East is in fact being re-produced within the K-pop industry.

Most of the silly songs are about girls who are mad at bad boys, or guys who like girls. It is easy to criticize the, although mannered, betaness of Korean males, the narcissistic entitlement of Korean women (Girls' Generation, Girl's Day etcetera give a hint about the East Asian version of you-go-girl-ism), and the at least partial admiration for Western degenerate consumerist culture. But as long as the moderate modernity in the East is present, it reminds us and other people how things generally ought to be.

2. Dance moves

The way you move is, if not always crucial, then at least potentially favorable or detrimental. As a Machiavellian strategy to get people on your side, learn to move, pose and even dance in a way that makes vaginas wet and manginas mad.

Of course, this perhaps clownish behavior is not only positive, but even traditional masculinity is linked to various dance performances. With the decline of night game, dance floor conduct may become gradually irrelevant, but it is still easy to think of various contexts in which kinaesthetic confidence matters to some extent.

Instead of being reactionary and pessimistic, think in an innovative fashion and use (hyper)modernity in a way that benefits your life and ability to influence others. Some male K-pop groups are particurly skilled in dancing and thus a great source of inspiration.

3. Personality training and education

Several ROK writers, like Roosh, have pointed out the bad personality profile and lack of foreign language skills that American women in general manifest. K-pop stars on the other hand learn to behave well, optimize their beauty potential by means of strict diet programs, and speak foreign languages. All linked to maximize profit of course, but if that can help women to better themselves and be role models for other females, then so be it.

Besides from capitalism, this dimension is partly linked to traditional culture. A K-pop scholar, Swee-Lin Ho, has stressed this in the article ”Fuel for South Korea’s “Global Dreams Factory”: The Desires of Parents Whose Children Dream of Becoming K-pop Stars” (2012):

> The agency also controls how trainees are grouped and groomed, and subjects all trainees to a comprehensive inseong gyoyuk that teaches trainees to inculcate and practice values such as humility, obedience, loyalty and gratitude. The focus of inseong gyoyuk is on family values, the purpose of which was explained to me by several corporate trainers as threefold: to assure parents that their young are being educated properly to develop “proper values,” to teach trainees to display behaviors that are highly regarded as by the wider Korean society and, more importantly, to subordinate trainees to the authority of their respective agencies as dependents are expected to do so to authoritative figures in the family.

4. Hyper-feminine looks

In South Korea and Japan, skinny is the best. Only about 4% of women are obese, and within K-pop one finds many thin and cute girls.

As with the sex roles, hypermodern ideals can sometimes reflect upon how the artists are styled, but overall hyper-feminine looks dominate the appearances of the largest share of female performers. These girls remind one of how things could be (but generally are not, due to self-inflicted ugliness and fatness). What a waste of potential.

5. Traditional corporate ideals

The Korean music companies are, although not completely run, largely run by men and partly based on traditional East Asian (post-Confucian) and Western values (militarism).

These modern males, with a traditional penchant, set the standards for the younger generations with regard to corporate customs and innovative entrepreneurship. Even though female elements and knowledge are required within the business (grooming, song-writing and singing).

Perhaps one could regard it as yin and yang working together in an office environment. But as much as women contribute, focused, determined, logical, responsible and disciplined men are behind these successful companies.

Read More: What Modern South Korea Is Like

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

How To Make Your Chest Muscles Stand Out With Maxalding

February 19, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

I didn’t plan on this, but here’s my 2nd Bloodsport reference in as many weeks. If you ever wanted the iron man boobs of Chong Li, now you can get them! Yes, ladies (LOL) and gentlemen, it is time once again for another article on the subject of the great Maxick and his system of muscle control!

As you will recall from my two previous articles on the man, “muscle control” is a very specific type of training that serves to, essentially, create a greater “connection” between your muscles and your central nervous system, giving you the ability to flex and manipulate many of the muscles that you wouldn’t think were capable of manipulation.

In doing so, you will have greater control over those muscles–and thus greater strength. While I don’t think even Maxick himself would argue that his techniques will turn a manlet into a world-beater, I would argue that using muscle control can give you a little extra “kick” in your lifts, giving you the ability to lift an extra 5-10 pounds when you couldn’t before. Besides, the flexing does look pretty damn cool

In my previous two articles I discussed the beginner's total body flexion to get the feel of loosening and tensing the muscles, and the flexing of the two powerful muscles on the back of the torso: the latissimus dorsi and the trapezius. Now, this series will deal with the next muscle to be controlled: the pectoralis major.

These are, of course, the great, powerful muscles on the front of your torso, the muscles that are utilized in any movement that can be remotely considered "pushing": push-ups, punching, swinging a baseball bat, all of these use the pectoralis major. And today, you'll be learning how to isolate and control them.

Of course, many men that are into physical culture can already flex their pectoral muscles without any specific Maxalding training. In fact, it is likely one of the first muscles that any athlete will inadvertently learn how to control. However, for the sake of completion (and for those who are not so blessed), I will include it in this series.

Before you can flex the pectorals without arm movement, one must of learn how to do so WITH arm movement:

Go in front of a mirror, and bring the arms together as shown in the picture.

Then strain the chest as if you were going to bring your elbows together, whilst simultaneously pulling apart with your arms. You should be able to see the contraction in the mirror. Once you have secured contraction—i.e. the contraction is visible—slowly decrease the pressure of the hands, retaining the muscular contraction in your chest.

After you have been practicing this for a few days, combined with concentration of your will, you will be able to isolate and contract the pectoralis major muscles without any arm or hand movement at all.

Once you have accomplished this, you are almost done with training pectoralis major isolation. There’s just one more exercise you need to practice.

Begin with contracting the pectoralis major muscles without any hand or arm movement or clasping, as you have already practiced doing. Having mastered pectoral s major contraction without any movement of any other limbs, slowly bring the arms up and make them extend horizontally from the shoulders, while still retaining the pectoralis major contraction.

If this is successfully accomplished, then you should notice that not only the does the sternal portion of the pectoralis major flex (that’s the big, fan shaped muscle on your chest that most people simply refer to as the pectoral), but the clavicular portion—which is to say, the smaller part of the pectoralis major that connects to the clavicle, will also notably flex.

Allow Maxick to show you this effect, as his photographs are a lot better than mine would be:

As you can see, the part of his pectorals that connects to the clavicle are noticeably flexing.

I should point out that, unless you have as low a bodyfat percentage as Maxick, the effect will likely not be as pronounced and easily visible. However, being in a well lit room with a mirror should be sufficient enough to see the flexion. And if not, I would recommend slightly bending over at the waist until you can see the effect.

And with that, you have learned to control your pectoral muscles.

Read More: How To Control Your Shoulders With Maxalding

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

How The Sexual Marketplace Can Be Restored To Balance

February 19, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Economics isn't only about money. An economy is a method of distribution of scarce resources, and the sexual marketplace is no exception. It's a strange paradox—since sex is a renewable resource in boundless supply and fun for everyone, why is there any scarcity? Economics in theory and in the real world are two different things!

The sexual revolution brought about a "free for all" environment, but most guys get pretty slim pickings. Among many reasons, the greatest are the deregulation of the sexual marketplace creating unprecedented hypergamy, and sixty years of radical feminists (bless their hearts) polluting society with their hostility and neuroses. Average valuation between the sexes changes over time, similar to the fluctuation of foreign exchange currency rates.

During the late 1960s, the playing field was pretty level, and the libertines took it to the point of excess. In the early 1970s, things were starting to change a bit for the worse, but a dinner date was foreplay, rather than a job interview. In the 1980s, buying a drink still got you a chat at least, another quid pro quo that has fallen by the wayside. Unfortunately, by then the social scene was getting pretty rough for younger guys. Since then, it's become much worse for most men. The cherry on top is online dating, inevitably with a high male to female ratio, and the whole city is your competition.

Today, things are drastically out of balance. Women by far have the upper hand in what was once an even playing field. So how does this affect society?

The results of unbalanced valuation

So classy and friendly – what's there not to love?

Here's what the inflated exchange rate did to our social environment. Do any of the following items sound familiar?

- Unprovoked snotty behavior and disrespect
- Inflated ego and lack of kindness or humility
- Flaking and other inconsiderate actions
- Princess Complex
- Average women believing average men are beneath them
- Rejecting decent, stable men in favor of flashy guys and thugs

In times past, all that would've been considered shocking or even neurotic. I wouldn't say this characterizes all women—only a few of my girlfriends behaved this way, and I screen for attitude now—but surely you know the type. These conditions are worst in certain urban areas and most common with the younger crowd, but it's been a long way down for all of society.

Unrealistic expectations are another big one. Consider the personal ad boilerplate to the effect of "Must be six feet tall, have a six figure income, and six pack abdominals." Despite having a laundry list of near-impossible standards—the "666 formula" might be just the beginning—many don't think they need to bring anything to the table themselves.

Besides the obvious loss of quality and moral fiber—about which far more could be said—the sexual marketplace imbalance provides yet another problem. Today's hypergamy effectively leaves all but the (perceived) top 20% of guys out in the cold. Having good game mitigates a lot of this individually, but the effects on society are terrible. It took me a long time to figure out what worked, and I hardly can imagine what younger guys are going through now that the social environment is worse than ever.

Finally, the distorted marketplace (along with pop culture) encourages many young women to party away their prime years. Not so long ago, they'd be forming stable relationships leading to families. This causes much misery in the end, as well as bringing down the fertility rate to an unsustainable level.

This must not continue, and it won't

CITY EDITION

London Herald

LATE PRICES

FRIDAY 25th OCTOBER 1929

WALL STREET CRASH!

Black Thursday in America

Stocks Plunge and Eleven Commit Suicide

This has brought various reactions from different corners of the Manosphere. MGTOWs withdraw from the social scene. Others say that if society is in the toilet, we should enjoy the ride all the way down the tubes. Some recommend mail order brides or moving abroad. I say we should be the best we can be as individuals, and work together to reverse the decline.

The imbalance in sexual marketplace valuation is socially unsustainable. Things might become worse yet, but this can't continue forever. The tides might be turning now; feminist narratives are slipping. The good news is that the sexual marketplace imbalance is economically unsustainable too, like an overheated stock market ripe for a crash. The question is not if this will happen, but how.

As Bob Smith observed recently, legalized prostitution would deflate the sexual marketplace bubble not much longer than it takes to say "Hello Sailor, looking for a good time?" I do have qualms about opening this safety valve wide open; society is too decadent already. Even so, the analysis is spot-on, and the results might be tolerable.

Here are some other ways the bubble could burst, from the least workable and desirable to the most.

The "Mad Max" scenario

“Babe,do we have any coffee filters left? This ditch water tastes terrible.”

In some gloomier parts of the Manosphere, a few dwell on total societal collapse. Women would need our protection again; “Now that’ll show ’em.” Unfortunately, returning to the Dark Ages would kind of suck. Suppose a major catastrophe happens: no more electricity, fuel, tap water, etc. Looting, food riots, and eventually cannibal gangs would be a bit annoying even for the most hardcore preppers. That’s a steep price for some long-overdue appreciation.

Perhaps World War III breaks out, and millions of male casualties adjust the supply-demand curves of the sexual marketplace. That’s also a bit too grim for my tastes. Further, the possibility of getting nuked, shot in the back while fleeing invaders, or being drafted for the meat grinder might be troubling.

Anyway, disasters aren’t in our best interests, and those causing them are way above our pay grade. There’s no shortage of mismanagement and bad faith by the Powers That Be. Still, the way things are going, civilization is more likely to fizzle out painfully over time than fall dramatically. The playbook of our globalist would-be masters thus far has been to boil the lobster by turning up the heat very slowly. Thus, they know to keep their strategic disasters limited.

We shouldn’t passively wait for Doomsday and hope we’ll come out ahead. Instead, call out those responsible for the decline and take measures to stop it; this we certainly can contribute to individually. They’ve acted irresponsibly and with great hubris. And speaking of groups well-known for going overboard…

The gay agenda wins

Is the dawning of the ac/dc revolution soon to come? Bi the way, that means less competition!

I have moral qualms about this scenario too. I'd prefer they keep private things private. That's not happening, now that the Love That Dare Not Speak Its Name has become the neurosis that doesn't know when to shut up. Thus far, society has bent over to their every demand sooner or later. Since the LGBTTQQIAAOMGWTF agenda is being pushed relentlessly by schools and popular culture—even forcing their way into the Boy Scouts—the next generation might become the fruitiest ever.

Still, there's a silver lining. If male bisexuality becomes commonplace, then their dating pool would double. I wouldn't care to participate, but I'll be laughing by the sidelines if one day the gay bars and bathhouses are overflowing with new clients. In the aftermath, the valuation for today's party girls will crash like the 2007 housing bubble.

What guy would deal with their bad attitudes, if he considered buggery an okay substitute? Already, it's not unheard of for omega males to turn to the Dark Side, but this sexual marketplace safety valve would blow wide open if taboos against gay sex faded away, as it already has with lesbianism. As for the trannies—now recruited from a young age—they'll reduce the male-to-female ratio, becoming like eunuchs in the ancient world.

Men would enjoy greatly reduced competition. After the supply/demand curves settle out, average women would find average men acceptable once again. Further, they'd have to bring more to the table than their looks. (Acting ladylike, pleasant, and classy would be a great start. That's not so difficult, now is it?) Further, they'd lose all the free perks and favors accompanying male courtship. No lonely orbiter would tolerate being strung along for his utility value if he'd hook up at bathhouses instead.

Although I'd have my reservations, it still would be a hilarious reversal of fortune. Now let's have a look at something better.

Societal reform

We could go far toward improving society (and not just the sexual marketplace) if we reintroduced basic virtues like sensibility, honor, respect, honesty, propriety, and personal responsibility. Let people live with their mistakes, instead of enabling idleness or other dysfunctional life choices.

For example, women could eliminate the "deadbeat dad" problem if they'd just quit sleeping with deadbeats. They'd get their priorities in order if the government stopped subsidizing this, or at least made welfare come with some pretty stringent requirements. Also, we could reform "family law"; since we have no-fault divorce, let it be no-theft divorce too. All this would discourage hypergamy. The law is only half the battle. Expectations of virtuous conduct used to go a long way. Let's revive these traditions again; they became traditions because they worked.

First, we'll have to decide what our goals and scope are, and what we want the future to look like. We also should remember that reform movements sometimes go too far. Trading out society's present problems for different ones would be unhelpful, so I recommend moderation and forethought. Coming to a working consensus may be challenging, but it's not insurmountable.

It will take massive public support to make reforms happen. We're not at critical mass yet. In any event, some might object, saying "you can't turn back the clock" or the like. (Perhaps they believe our culture just changed all by itself?) This brings us to the next scenario.

Red Pill the public

The Frankfurt School demonstrated that a few dozen people could completely remake the foundations of our culture. It took decades, and they had help from high places, but it was a proof of concept. They had two methodologies: the “long march through the institutions” (as Gramsci put it) and ideological warfare.

Our job is to undo the damage they caused. The institutions must be retaken; that means “draining the swamp.” Perhaps one day, people like us could lead these institutions sensibly. As for ideological warfare, we must wage our own counteroffensive. We’re doing that here now, but we’ll need more people enlightening the public. This is how to obtain the critical mass needed for the societal reforms described above, and you can help get the word out there.

Directly addressing the sexual marketplace disparity, most especially we must discredit radical feminism. In a healthy society, men and women get along together. Most of the Blue Pill public still thinks that feminism is all about equality, but it’s really about misandry. Feminists have been trash-talking us for decades, telling dreadful lies, indoctrinating through the media and schools, and poisoning the social environment. Let’s mock them and expose who they really are. Do your part to get the truth out there.

Further, much could be improved by publicizing some very basic game principles. For example, men need to be confident, resolute, and act masculine. That’s pretty much the opposite of what guys have been told works, but it’s clear that Blue Pill dating advice gets you nowhere these days. Pedestalization and supplication don’t work. Also, we must make it clear that unseemly behavior is a deal-breaker. As we should be aware, showing some backbone can do wonders to improve attitudes. If the masses realized this, the sexual marketplace (as well as the party girls) would come back down to earth.

Read More: How The Global Financial Market Mirrors Our Sexual Marketplace

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

5 Things Introverts Need To Know About Attracting Women

February 20, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

There's been an interesting discussion going on here at ROK regarding just how much men should change themselves to have sex or get into a relationship with Western women, as well as where to find those women who would make decent companions. I find that there are two general camps in the debate: the "Western women are not worth it" camp and the "Western women aren't that bad if you know where to look and how to get them" camp.

In addition, I think there is a specific group of men who are jaded with the current dating scene who aren't getting the right kind of advice. I will try to go through the issues related to them.

The "Introverts"

First, I think the men who are having a particularly difficult time adapting to the red pill truth tend fall into a specific category. Here, I'm going to deliberately misuse the word "introverted" to describe those men. These are men who are:

- Average in looks, income, and social status.
- Tend to spend bulk of their time alone (usually online or with books).
- Not the most socially engaging as they prefer intellectual discussions over casual chats in a group setting.
- Too proud to reach out to others or face the possibility of a rejection.
- "Boring" as in: not well traveled, haven't done anything exciting with life, don't do anything that women find fun.
- In their own bubble, locked in their own belief system, sometimes with a victim mentality which they themselves fail to recognize.

I know what the actual definition of "introverted" is, but I only use it here as it is because I can't find a good substitute word to describe men with these traits that doesn't sound belittling. And, for the record, I consider myself one of these introverted types.

Now, the main problem with introverts is that their very personality and lifestyle isn't the most conducive in attracting women, which in turn causes frustration that induce negativity and make them even more introverted.

So, with that in mind, let's consider how much these men should sacrifice their true identity to attract women.

1. Women don't care about your intelligence

The first thing you need to acknowledge and accept as an introvert is that women don't give a single damn about your intelligence. In fact, identifying yourself an intellectual or making any attempts to draw attention to your supposed higher mental capacity only turns women off.

Most women are not attracted to intelligence for the same reason most men don't care about a middle-aged woman's salary when deciding if she's worth banging. Women want men who can tell good stories and make them laugh, men who can stir and excite them, men who will ignite their fantasies and bring joy to life.

Maybe back in the day they valued and respected intelligent men who were stoic, wise, and contemplative, but this is the 21st century (I don't think it's a coincidence that many of these introverts have a nostalgia for the past). That's the harsh truth. So, if your knowledge of history, politics, and philosophy is the only thing you bring to the table, you can't complain about the lack of interest you spark in women.

2. Women don't care about your politics

Legend says that she'll fall in love with you once you watch all her videos and click the 'like' button for all of them.

Similarly, some of these introverted men seem to think that women should come to appreciate the fact that they're battling in the cyberworld to preserve their civilization. In case you forgot to take your daily dose of red pills, here it is: WOMEN DON'T CARE. A man's political views are usually far below a woman's list of priorities when she's deciding whether she should sleep with him or not. She's not interested in having sex to advance her race or culture.

Also, even when a woman does share your non-leftist political views, it doesn't mean anything. Women will not stick with their own team for they only care about getting the best man that's out there. Heck, they'll even sleep with the enemy if it means enjoying the novelty experience of having an exotic cock or advancing their own, self-perceived social status.

And even when a woman does decide to date only within her own ideological or racial camp, she's still going to choose based on the man's masculine value rather than his knowledge or dedication to some cause.

3. You must figure out where you draw the line

All men have a different point where they draw the line when it comes to women. On one extreme, we have PUA's who will do just about everything to dance around women to get in their pants, and on the other, we have the MGTOW's who will do absolutely nothing for women. Ideally, women should meet you at the halfway point, but we must accept that that is becoming increasingly more difficult in today's Western world.

Where you draw the line is up to you, but the caveat is that you should make that line very clear for yourself and for the women you meet. For example, I'm willing to work on myself and make enough effort to attract women, but I will absolutely not be some blabbering monkey-boy who lives to amuse the females. Man has his dignity and I'm not going to be a walking entertainment box just to get laid.

4. Understand the difference between Western women and foreign women

This sort of exaggeration doesn’t help anyone.

I don’t even know why there’s even a debate on this. Some of the more bitter debates appear to be rationalization efforts than anything productive. I think the general consensus is that foreign women are less corrupt and more feminine than their Western counterparts, but that the AWALT rule applies when it comes to biology. Besides that, do whatever works for you—no point debating whether women on one side of the Earth are better than the other.

5. Ignore unhelpful help

A few years ago, I read a piece from Mark Manson's Models about being completely honest and open about your feelings and intentions. And there was no advice stupider that I ever took seriously. With how superficial today's Western women are, they just don't care about men being open and honest with them, and they certainly don't care for men's feelings. Unless you're a naturally funny guy, women will actually get freaked out if you display any form of genuine human emotion.

It's no secret that Western women are mainly attracted to a man's entertainment value. If an introverted man decides to be himself and acts all moody like some tragic Byronic hero, women will be repelled by him (and trust me, I've tried). Unless a woman finds him attractive in other ways to begin with, she has no reason to fall for the introverted guy over the more "fun" guys. And that's the thing: Women only care about your feelings if she's already drawn to you, women only want a man to be honest with her when she's already invested in him. But trying to attract women by being upfront from the get-go will not help the introverts at all other than resulting in rejections that only reinforce their negativity.

Next, there seems to be a group of men who give advice from a position of success who are: more outgoing, naturally good-looking and masculine (likely with the guidance of a strong father), financially successful, usually older than the introverts who tend to be under 30, and so on who have all the right intentions, but fail to actually inspire the introverts. If anything, these men almost come across as being patronizing when they offer advice with the way they describe how easy it is to get a line of women begging them for sex. They're simply out of touch with the daily experiences of the introverts who live in a completely different world.

At this point, I would say that having a relatively older, high status man telling the younger, introverted types how to find decent women is as unhelpful as some Hollywood pretty boy telling the commoners that all you need to do is smile and be nice to women. Because the fact is, the introverts are usually too stubborn to change and, even with the best efforts, any advice given is practically useless. Many of the men who struggle in the dating market need some serious personal coaching to start seeing results; the Internet can only do so much.

Three real and practical advice for the “introverts”

“I will eventually find my Aryan princess.”

So what are some real and practical advice for the introverted types who may be stuck in the negativity loop? That should be a subject for a whole new article, so here are some basic pointers to get started with:

1. Decide whether you’re actually serious about finding a suitable woman (or women) for sex and relationship. If you decide to forgo women as a whole, then that’s it, you don’t get to complain anymore about how horrible Western women have become. You can’t say you don’t care for Western (or white) women while secretly hoping to find a unicorn, only to have your negativity repel potential mates, and use that experience as a justification to not make the effort, then to tell everyone else about it.

2. Once you’ve decided that you actually want to attract women, forget about all the pick-up material for now because knowledge is not your problem. Instead, what you need to work on most is being more social and spontaneous. To start, get off the Internet and meet more people, expand your social circle, and start doing more extroverted activities. Merely being able to hold a basic conversation won’t be enough—especially if you live in the West. Your social skills need to be at a level where people enjoy spending their time with you.

3. Consider relocating to find different women from the ones you are used to—it might even be helpful to leave the country. Some may automatically utter some sort of an excuse to reject this option, but if that is the case, then there’s nothing more that can be said. You’re just back to the same old.

Read More: Why Day Game Is The Secret Sauce You Need To Consistently Meet And Attract Women

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Why Are Men Paying “New Car” Prices For Used Women?

February 20, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Twenty-first century feminism teaches women that they are just as valuable (if not more) after every additional man they have sex with. Supposedly these women are like wine and cheese, not the vast majority of other products, from cars to Playstations, that either break down or go out of fashion the longer that they live or the more they are used. Of all the delusions women can have about themselves, this is the worst, aside from ones like “beauty at every size.”

Though many Return Of Kings readers are already practicing a similar, largely unconscious mindset, you should treat your selection of women like a prospective car buyer would. You should think in terms of prices, specifications, warranties, maintenance costs, service history, service requirements, customer reviews, and added extras.

Just as you would not listen to a used car salesman who said that more miles equals higher quality, you should never listen to a woman who implies that she has the same sexual value and potential at 10 or 30 notches as she did when she was a virgin. Sure, some promiscuous women might have lost weight or improved their appearance since their early sexual days, but they are far from the norm. And why not just find a good-looking girl with next to no mileage?

Used women marketing themselves to you often take the role of Danny DeVito's used car salesman in the children's film Matilda.

Saying "used" when describing is a very relative term. It does not necessarily correlate with age. For example, a number of 18 or 21-year-old women, regardless of their looks, can have more sexual mileage and the emotional baggage that goes with it than a woman aged 30 or 35. Whilst the central philosophy of Return Of Kings, including that women are judged on beauty, youth and fertility, stands firm, not every decent-looking young woman is going to be marriageable. Far from it.

Likewise, inasmuch as a virgin should be your first preference, the vast majority of marriageable girls are not going to be virgins. Like-new may not be new, but you will have a better warranty and peace of mind for a like-new girl than for the girl you know is a walking petri dish. Accepting a truly used woman in your life is tantamount to buying the deteriorated car that you know is going to break down and leave you stranded on the highway.

Learn the car-buying and woman-choosing lingo

Will a woman maintain herself willingly or reluctantly? Or will you have to do all the work for her? If so, you have a dud deal.

Price: Every woman has her price. This is what she expects, explicitly and implicitly, in the very first days of courtship. Maybe the price is your wit, your appearance, your attention, your job description, or a combination of all of them. She might expect you to fork out $100 for her cocktails. But this initial price isn't just about the first meeting or the first date. It's whatever it takes for you to establish a one-time or ongoing sexual relationship. Are you paying too much?

Specifications: Specifications are not just what you see the first time. They're about test drives and trying out a girl for the first few weeks. How does her body hold up once her clothes are off? What's her age, bearing in mind that most women suffer rapid physical slides after 30? Can you see cellulite? Do her DD's stand proud in a bra but droop without one? Does a terrible tattoo on her bodywork show you that the inside parts are almost certainly damaged?

Warranties: Looking at her as if another man were dating her, how does her kind of girl usually act? The cover and the book match up 90% of the time and so, too, do the car bonnet and the engine or the girl and her body and mentality. Like with a girl's specification, age is a critical factor. Barring superb genetics and/or a fantastic health regimen, a girl approaching or past 30 will give you few, if any of her best years. Try looking at her mother or other female relatives for a glimpse into the future. Few things are sure in life, so you should usually rely on the law of averages.

Maintenance costs: For new, like-new, and used women alike, the real price men pay is for ongoing maintenance. Whether in time, effort, or cash, sexual relationships cost you well after you've "paid" for the actual product. And if you're putting in more for the upkeep of an asset than what you get out of it, it's not an "asset." Maintenance also refers to her ability to take care of herself, you, and the relationship.

When it comes to women you are fornicating or want to fornicate with, you need to be your own mechanic and run diagnostics on her.

Service history: So a woman is 26, has had eight sexual partners (the ones she's told you about), and a few half-assed long-term relationships. Why didn't she settle down? It may be flattering to think you can be the guy who causes her to take the plunge, but it's unlikely all those previous guys were god-awful. And whilst this is a personal decision, is eight, twelve, fifteen, or even just five sexual partner too much for you to eventually make a married woman out of her?

Service requirements: A woman's emotional stability or lack thereof is the critical component you need to be aware of. Sadly, like a hidden issue with a car, it can pop up at the worst possible time. If the girl you thought you had suddenly stops working for an extended period of time, spewing forth regular tantrums and moods, I'd suggest you might've been sold a clunker from the female car yard. A comparable problem can develop with a woman's looks. Does she fall into a state of disrepair too frequently, her fit and fab body crumbling into pure flab? If so, it might be time for a trade-in.

Customer reviews: An ex-boyfriend or her old classmate could save you a world of trouble. Of course, a savage review of a woman could really just mean an old flame misses her or a guy who wanted her never got her. Nonetheless, it's information to be added to your decision-making process. Equally, you should receptive to but not totally swayed by positive feedback about a girl.

Added extras: Are her friends either sluts or the kind of women who will enable and encourage any bad behavior? Is her family upstanding or traditional and capable of acting as a formal or informal brake on her acting out? Is she someone particularly worried about her social reputation (without needing to Instagram cleavage shots)? Can she cook? Does she offer to help you with no immediate expectation of a reward? These are just some of the positive and negative possibilities a woman has. Be aware of them. They all add up.

Women use a very comparable process with men

She's found an appreciating asset, especially for when he dies.

The primary difference men and women is that men half-expect a mostly depreciating asset (a woman), whereas women hold out for a hopefully appreciating asset (a relationship with a male). A man's evaluations are based on looks and fertility, as contrasted with a woman's choice of earning capacity, physical prowess, and social status. But make no mistake, both men and women are purchasing a product each and every time.

What men outside this site of ours fail to understand is that the biggest used car salesmen in the world are really saleswomen selling themselves for relationships. A used car can either be an unattractive woman talked up as a hottie or a good-looking girl whose nice exterior hides beaten-up, unreliable parts. Yet even those of us who took the red pill long ago can benefit from assessing women like the man buying a car.

When it comes to women, you should only opt for a girl you can safely say is new or like-new. Anything less does not deserve your time, let alone cohabitation or a ring down the track.

Read More: Why Wasn't Elizabeth Sandlin Charged With Rape If The Man She Had Sex With Was "Blind Drunk"?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why The Left Is Suppressing The Truth About Argentina's Military Junta

February 20, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The mainstream media narrative about Argentina in the 1970s goes something like this: (1) Argentina was governed by a brutal, merciless military junta from 1976 to 1983; (2) the dictatorship conducted an unprovoked campaign of extermination against leftists that left tens of thousands dead; (3) the leftists were innocent students. This story—in one form or another—is what has become part of the accepted narrative of this period of Argentinian history.

But the more documentaries I saw on this period, and the more I read about it, the more I was convinced that the entire story was not being told. It seemed to me that the country's recent governments have had a vested interest in fanning the flames of resentment that have been stirred up since the 1990s. I have not been to Argentina, but I have spent much time in Brazil, a country that was also run by military governments in the 1970s and 1980s. The conversations I've had with older people in Brazil about this period track very closely with the interviews of Argentinians I've read about this period in their history.

Chile, as we have seen, also was ruled by a military dictatorship during the same time. So were some other countries in Central and South America. I began to ask myself whether this was pure coincidence, or whether there were good reasons why the countries in the region needed a firm hand at the reins at that time. The more I read, the more I began to see that the conventional wisdom has expunged much that needs to be told.

The first thing that seemed open to question was the alleged number of victims. In Argentina, the press frequently tosses around the number of 30,000. But declassified US documents put the figure at half that, around 15,000. It is true that governments regularly falsify data, but so do lobbying groups and private organizations. No one has yet explained where the number of 30,000 was arrived at. President Mauricio Macri himself seemed to have doubts about the number during a recent interview with Buzzfeed, where he said: "I have no idea [how many were killed]. That's a debate I'm not going to enter, whether they were 9,000 or 30,000."

Part of the problem is that the issue about the so-called "Dirty War" is heavily politicized in Argentina. When President Nestor Kirchner came to power in 2004, he apparently was willing to use the issue to score political points with the leftist press and with international human rights organizations. Kirchner nullified the amnesty laws that had protected military men from prosecution for events that had happened 30 years before.

By this single foolish act, he threw open the gates of political factionalism and vendetta. Amnesty laws have proven to be very effective in enabling societies to move on from civil violence; they have worked wonders in Algeria, allowing that country to move beyond the horrific events of the 1990s.

Flag of the Argentinian communist rebel group "People's Revolutionary Army"

But Kirchner and his successor wife did not stop there. They converted former military interrogation and detention centers into "monuments." They glorified the guerrillas of the 1970s—many of whom were out-and-out terrorists—and gave no thought to the victims of leftist violence. What has been forgotten is that communist and communist-inspired insurgencies were threatening a number of countries in South America during the 1970s.

These groups, funded by interested parties abroad, specifically intended to establish socialist or communist societies, and employed bombings and assassinations to further their goals. There certainly were a large number of innocent students caught up in the excitement of demonstrations and strikes, but behind this were dedicated revolutionaries. And the only way to defeat an insurgency is to hunt down the insurgents and remove them from circulation. This is the hard reality of counter-insurgency warfare.

In a recent article in The Guardian, one professor made this statement about the so-called "denialist" groups:

> Mario Ranaletti, professor of history at Tres de Febrero university, has specialized in the mindset of Argentinian denialist groups. "They consider military repression was a good and morally unquestionable act," he says. "To them the cold war was a religious war." Even today Ranaletti overhears Argentinians who argue that "they should have killed them all."

But Dr. Ranaletti misses the point. It is not so much that people are denying a nasty counter-insurgency war took place, it is that the media is absolutely refusing to acknowledge that the military government had specific reasons for doing what it did, and that—in the final equation—the country was better off in the long run for repressing the guerrillas. No one wants to say this openly, but I encountered the sentiment over and over again when I spoke with older people in Brazil.

Some voices are beginning to speak up. Attorney Victoria Villarruel heads an organization called the Center for Legal Studies on Terrorism and Its Victims (CELTYV). According to her estimates, about 1100 people were killed by leftist guerrillas between 1970 and 1979. But there is a serious double-standard at work. While the victims of government violence are allowed to bring claims in the courts, the victims of leftist violence are not.

"They were not idealists, they were terrorists" says a family member of a victim of leftist violence

Since 2006, about 500 cases have been brought on behalf of government victims. None have come from the other side. Whenever Villarruel has tried to petition the government for recognition that the leftists killed people, her petitions have been denied. She also challenges the narrative that rebels were "fighting a military dictatorship."

In fact, she notes that the majority of the victims of communist violence came in the years before the dictatorship took power. The bottom line is that the military was dealing with an urban insurgency, and had to take severe measures to prevent civil war from breaking out. For her stance, Villarruel now comes under frequent threats and intimidation from leftist sympathizers.

Victoria Villarruel

I've had a few opportunities to talk about the military years with older friends in Brazil who were politically aware in the 1970s. The answers I've received to my questions convince me that the mainstream media's narrative is grossly skewed to favor the leftists. I will say that my friends worked for state-run companies at the time, and I suppose could be seen as favoring the government. But here are the kinds of things they always said:

> Look, the real story of those years is not told in the books. The military never bothered anyone unless they were leftist agitators or were committing violence. Even our president now [Dilma] was detained for participation in making bombs. Why doesn't the media talk about that? They don't, ever. There were demonstrations all the time. One day we woke up and there were tanks in the streets. That's how it was.
>
> But I can tell you one thing: the military in those days were actually less corrupt than the rats we have now. They cared about power and order, not so much about getting rich. And those stories about pregnant women in Argentina in detention centers? Let me tell you that a lot of them deliberately got pregnant because they thought it would get them released. So a lot of it is propaganda.
>
> There was a real war there. To win a war, you have to be ruthless. It's fashionable to hate the junta, to hate Pinochet, and our own dictators, but the economies we have now we owe to them. And that is the reality. The real mistake the junta in Argentina made is that they lost a war to Britain. Nobody has anything good to say about those who lose wars.

Read More: The Real Legacy Of Chile's Augusto Pinochet

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Do Girls Who Wear Chokers Want To Be Treated Like Dogs?

February 20, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I analyze the symbolism of girls wearing tight things around their necks…

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them on the blog.

Read Next: One Man Has Found The Secret To Banging Argentine Girls

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Is Genocide On The Elite Agenda?

February 21, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Those blue-eyed devils. The world would be better off without them, right?

One only need subject themselves to mainstream media for a few short minutes to see white people being labeled racists for everything from looking out for their own self-interest by electing President Trump, to not supplicating enough when they see a person of color on the street. A narrative has been established that white people can be nothing but oppressors, while those of any other ethnic group can only be victims.

The failing but still very powerful mainstream media thrives on sowing racial discord and division. This not only helps the power structure maintain its chokehold over Western politics in a classic divide and conquer strategy, it helps set up the narrative for a much bigger undertaking: making the very existence of white people unacceptable.

With all the race-baiting and scapegoating of whites for all the past, present, and future problems of the world, one has to wonder if soft and slow genocide is an agenda item for diabolical elites. A new Bolshevism based on race has descended on the West in the early 21st century as leftists and their marionettes in the media target Europeans and Americans of European descent in a magnificently diabolical design.

One of the dirtiest tricks in politics is to accuse your opposition of your own crimes. The left incessantly yells “racist” at white people without ever realizing the supreme irony that exists in stereotyping an entire race of people with a pejorative term. In modern times, whites must take sides and be either loathful oppressors or supplicating submissives to other ethnic groups. There is no in between.

The insanity of scapegoating a group of people as villains has precedent, although targeting an entire race certainly is a new twist on an old game.

In 1918, the masses of useful idiots directed mass killings, torture and systematic oppression at the Bourgeoisie. In 2017, forces are at work to direct the same evil at those of European descent. Not since the original Bolsheviks conducted the Red Terror have we seen such a storm gathering, directed squarely at one group of people.

Dr. Evil

Under the guise of an “Open Society” Soros funds far left, Communist groups

One of those at the forefront pushing an agenda of racial scapegoating is Dr. Evil himself, George Soros. Soros has been funding leftist mobs on both sides of the pond in an attempt to spark a new Socialist revolution that has eerie similarities to the conditions leading up to the Red Terror.

Rather than targeting the middle class in general as was the case in Russia a century ago, the mobs Soros funds today are largely aimed at targeting white people.

Reports have surfaced far and wide that Soros funded the race-based riots that took place last summer in cities across America, sending at least $650,000 to the racially motivated group Black Lives Matter. Now, he is now being investigated for funding Socialist groups in Europe under his Open Society front. Fox News reported on his latest alleged misdeeds:

> George Soros’ alleged meddling in European politics has caught the attention of Congress. Concerns about Soros’ involvement most recently were raised by the Hungarian prime minister, who last week lashed out at the Soros “empire” and accused it of deploying “tons of money and international heavy artillery.”

Among this “international heavy artillery” are so-called “rent-a-mobs” or protestors for hire paid for by Soros-linked groups, intended to marginalize Trump and push back against the West’s recent moves against New World Order globalism. According to World Net Daily:

> An ABC News producer tweeted a photo of protesters burning a “Make America Great Again” hat, stolen off the head of a Trump supporter. It turns out [the > woman in the photo,] Maile Hampton was profiled as someone who appears to be professional protester, in a story published in WND two weeks ago.

>
> Hampton, who goes by the name Kwame Kahlo on Twitter, is a self-described "Marxist Leninist." She has been seen and photographed at protests all over California recently, and even in Mexico.
>
> In the span of only 10 days, Hampton appeared at multiple protests.

Of course, the press gives these fake protestors center stage on their heavily propagandized newscasts. The narrative is always the same: black and brown people fighting back against oppression by evil white people – those carrying the banner of what Bertrand Russell called "The Fallacy of the Superior Virtue of the Oppressed." People of color are not to be questioned about their motives, even when they become violent.

This attitude led to the successful destruction of several inner cities in 2016. Soros is not alone. Zuckerberg, Bill Gates and other billionaires actively push an agenda of globalism which is destructive to white communities.

If you think there's no immediate threat to those of European descent, realize how far the agenda has already advanced while the media and globalists push the envelope even further.

BLM

Ask yourself what would happen if a group called "White Lives Matter" did this in cities across America to see how far down the path of Racial Bolshevism we've already gone

Imagine if white nationalists burned cities down nationwide. We all know the groups would be targeted for destruction, in much the same way LaVoy Finicum was mowed down by authorities in Oregon for protesting a government land grab linked to a Clinton family uranium deal with Russia.

The media continue badgering Trump over Russia while developing collective amnesia when it comes to that explosive story.

Additionally, the press would be screaming, flopping on the floor, and foaming at the mouth if billionaires were funding a group called White Lives Matter that called blacks "defects" who should be wiped off the face of the planet. But they haven't brought this bombshell that surfaced last week to the attention of the masses:

> The co-founder of Toronto's Black Lives Matter chapter believes white people are > “recessive genetic defects” who should be “wiped out.”

>
> “Whiteness is not humaness,” Yusra Khogali wrote in a just-discovered Facebook post from December 2015, according to the Toronto Sun. “in fact, white skin is sub-human.” From there, Khogali…made her case against the Caucasian race by arguing that more melanin is better.
>
> After making several similar statements, Khogali concluded that white people “are recessive genetic defects.” She said the Caucasian race “need white supremacy as a mechanism to protect their survival as a people because all they can do is produce themselves.”

This hateful rhetoric predictably likely would never have seen the light of day if it weren’t for the Internet.

Indeed, the prevailing view among mediaites and government policy makers is that every culture deserves to preserve itself except European culture, and every race of people can have pride in itself and its accomplishments except those of European descent.

This is exactly how Cultural Marxism works. Destroy the family, destroy the history of the nation, then destroy the nation itself. Andrew Jackson being removed from the most common denomination of American currency is only the first volley in what will surely be many more moves to destroy Caucasian history and humiliate white people. Look for the Founding Fathers to be targeted soon, as Communists move to rewrite history and collectively lobotomize Westerners with the goal of making them forget their history and shun their culture.

But it won’t be enough to shame and debase white people. That’s not how Communism works. The end goal will be to bring about an end to the very existence of those of European descent, just as the Bolsheviks once attempted to eliminate the “evil” Kulaks. Bolder moves will come. Perhaps one dark day we will see the narrative that white people reproducing with each other is racist.

Or, perhaps we will see another bloodbath resulting from the encroaching insanity of leftists.

History Echoes

21st century Bolshevik-style scapegoating is directed at Caucasians – could we see a new Red Terror in the coming decades?

It's been said history may not repeat itself, but it does echo.

We have entered a dangerous period in history as the current situation in the West echoes the social situation leading up to the Red Terror a century ago.

Looking back to 1918, Trotsky spoke of the Bourgeoisie being estranged from the masses of people. As demographic displacement quickly proceeds as planned in Europe and America with whites going from 92% of the population in the U.S. to about one-third of the population by mid-century, it won't be too many more decades before white people will find themselves estranged in their own lands, echoing these chilling words written by none other than Leon Trotsky:

> The Russian bourgeoisie found itself to such a degree estranged from the masses of the people, so internally helpless, so compromised by the course and the result of the war, so demoralized by the regime of Kerensky, that it scarcely dared show any resistance.

Isn't that the agenda? Demoralize, debase, and dehumanize white people day in and day out until they don't show any resistance? This has already happened in liberal cities across the nation as a man only needs visit these areas to realize how self-loathing most of the white people there have become.

We've already seen sparks of revolution with "virtuous" mobs of color rising up against Whitey nationwide in recent years with the full support of the press and a Socialist government. Always remember, a Socialist is a Communist who doesn't have a gun. Yet.

Meanwhile, globalists continue pushing an agenda of racial division and white marginalization in the West even in the face of populist uprisings on both sides of the pond.

Why are they doing this?

It's not too much of a stretch of the imagination to wonder if genocide is on the elite agenda. The power structure surely is not trying to build white people up, but it is actively trying to tear them down. It would be convenient for social engineers if one group of people who have proven problematic when it comes to elite plans for world domination in the past just up and disappeared.

An amalgamated humanity is easier to manage for central planners than a truly diverse planet, with diverse people and cultures. A world monoculture of people with no identity or beliefs, a mass of compulsive shoppers and eaters is what the elites desire. Is that somewhere you want to be taken?

Read More: Did The New Star Wars Casting Have A Racial Agenda?

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

6 More Tips On Raising Your Daughters On The Red Pill

February 21, 2017 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

My last article made some noise over at Roosh's and ROK (with this as the original reference). So I thought, with one of the comments on Roosh's site encouraging me, that another piece would be a good idea. So, let's get started with more tips on raising your daughter…

1. Develop Critical Thinking

If you didn't know it by now, kids are impressionable. Actually, adults are also impressionable and girls are probably the most. This is why game works. We all know that females are herd creatures. So how can one help "save" his daughter from becoming part of the herd?

By adopting critical thinking and embracing praxeology.

When I teach my daughters something about the nature of the world, I sometime tell them the following line: "Look and see if it is true by yourself".

My favorite example – Debunking "female superiority." Take this show for example – K.C. Undercover

Yes, a female genius that is also athletic and can play basketball. Oh, and she is 16. Her brother is a nerd, and her parents don't acknowledge him. Not to mention that they are blacks (and white folks are usually evil). So with all that BS on screen, what can a father do?

Use critical thinking.

"Girls, do you think that a 16 year old can actually be that good in everything?" They tend to agree with me. "She is good at playing basketball on the show" they tell me. I've been waiting for that. "I use to play division 1 in high school, and was also pro, for some time. I was a straight-A student also. Do you think I would have time to be an undercover spy?"

They get the point.

Use this tactic as often as possible, and you got yourself a critical thinker in the family. This means that she will not follow the herd that easily and will stick to what she knows. Hopefully, if you have been there and done the right thing, it will be traditional views on gender relations and your view of how the world works.

Which brings me to the almost "opposite"…

2. Encourage traditional gender roles

“Dad, it looks like guys have all the fun” You may sometime hear them say. This is where you need to make your frame their frame. Otherwise you might get a critical thinker who believes that being a tomboy is better than being a girl. Next step may be feminism.

This is where you work on their femininity, give meaning and show.

Keep the traditional gender role.
They’ll thank you later

“Do you like being injured?” I ask. “No!” they are appalled, “Dad, why do you want us to get injured?” “I didn’t say that. I asked if you like being injured. You know that boys get injured more than girls. Also boys go to wars to defend us. Do you want to go to war?”

With this dialog one can see how you make being masculine, for a girl, less appealing.

Make sure to be there and show them the actual hardship of being a man. This is where feminists lack – they envy our rewards but don’t want to share the burden. Also remember to encourage the female experience.

3. Make them feel comfortable with their bodies

I know I just lost some of you, but hear me out.

We want to watch their weight, and it is increasingly hard with snacks and puberty. We also want them to have a healthy body image – a chaste one, yet one that feels comfortable in her own skin.

I suggest the following:

Use fewer negative phrases – shaming works, but home is where we need to feel safe. So if she says she feels fat, or is fat, either agree & amplify to make her laugh or look her in the eye and say that looks matter. I have seen fathers tell their daughter that “Yes you are fat” or deny it. That is a beta response. We need a “sympathetic yet constructive” one.

Tell her that “I understand you have strong feelings about it. What do you think we can do about it?” Then discuss with her what to do, and guide her to more vegetables, more drinking of water and less eating.

Hug them – I have read that fathers are afraid to be around their stepdaughters. Funny as that article was, I noticed that as girls mature, the fathers seem to take more space from them.

Don’t do that. At least do not avoid contact all together.

You are still the father, and she is still your daughter. It is acceptable that she needs less physical contact from you, but she still needs it. Hug them, let them kiss you (on the cheek). By avoiding contact, you are depriving her of a need.

On the other hand, don’t force it. Being masculine means understanding the fickle nature of females. Forcing a hug or a kiss is not the way to go. Use frame and habit so she can show her love for you.

See how happy she is?

That way they know that you are comfortable with them growing up and the change of their bodies. Otherwise this intensifies the feeling that their loved one are somehow repelled because they are growing up (female logic).

Do sports activities with them – ride a bike, shoot hoops, go to play grounds and actually play with them. If they move their body and you are encouraging them, they get to feel self-control and power over their body. This is a great feeling that helps them have a healthy body image.

4. Make sure they eat healthy

The growing epidemic of carbs and non-saturated fat is all around. Fight it. You can, but you need to prepare for that in advance. My daughters ask regularly for snacks, as kids do. I always offer vegetables and fruits. I have a hard time with that but they slowly get accustomed to it.

If I'm taking them out for a few hours, I pack vegetables in a box. "Dad, I'm hungry" they say after sometime. "Here are the vegetables" I hand them the box. "Again?" They are disappointed. "Yes. This is what we have." "OK. I'll have the cucumbers and capsicum."

I also insist on calling food by it ingredients. Snacks are carbs. Meet and eggs are protein. Use this when you want to associate food in a way that will help them to remember what is better to eat. I emphasize having protein over carbs and making sure other nutrients are available.

5. Teach them to regulate their emotions

From my experience, and what the red pill teaches us – women are primarily driven by their emotions. Women of the past, by choice or by necessity, knew how to regulate their emotions better and were not all about her feelings.

Quoting Roosh (emphasis is mine):

> ...what she thinks of as morality is actually built upon her feelings. When faced with any type of stress, she will almost always follow the herd or make the wrong decision"

Part of helping your daughter to grow is explaining and exercising her in recognizing her emotions. When my elder has a "hormone serge" I explain (afterwards) about it. Those episodes still happen, but one can help his daughter to regulate it (to some extent).

She has strong emotions, she may cry.
You can help her regulate it. Credit: Alamy.com

Work on it regularly. Teach them to harness their emotions for good, and not to turn it against themselves (I use the TV as examples for it, but one may use books and other people around). A girl who can, to some extent, regulate her emotions will be a great wife and mother.

6. Tell her what you expect from her

So natural, yet so overlooked by, well, most of the people.

I heard moms and dads saying stuff like: “Well, it is up to her.” I almost cringe hearing this. This is being lazy, and not putting the right emphasis on the right things in life. I don’t intend to tell my daughters what occupation to choose, but I am going to tell them how to live their life.

This is done by stories (with morals), and sometimes actually telling them what I expect.

Example 1 – Serving the military

In Israel there is mandatory draft, for guys and girls. My eldest is more pacifist by nature and has strong feeling against war. I told her that she, just like her father (who is on reserve duty regularly) and her mother (who served her time) will have to do it too.

“Can I be a dog trainer or a psychologist?” she asks. “Yes you may” I answer, “There are a lot of options to serve our country. I expect you and your sister to help our nation.” “I don’t want to be a long time in the army” she pouts. “You don’t have to stay more than the time our government has decided upon,” I reassure her.

She knows I expect her to do it, and not some “Daddy Government” or an unknown law which makes less sense to her.

Example 2 – Friends

It is crucial to develop social skills. An old Jewish saying goes like this: “If I am not for myself, who is for me? And if I am only for myself, what am I? And if not now, when?”

So it is important that children will be social. This is what I tell my daughters, they must have some friends (more than one). I, and their mother, make sure that they keep a social circle. They sometimes resent, but I tell them that I expect them to have friends. I also schedule it in advance (at least a day forward).

This means that in the future, I also expect to vet their boyfriends, just like this guy did. I hope I’ll be more successful than him.

Conclusions

This is my second article on the subject (here is the first). I assume that this one will be less controversial. This is my lessons learned from my red pill parent journey of so far. The more I look at it, it just seems a lot like daughters were raised a few decades ago, but with a new flavor.

I want to emphasize again – this does mean I get everything right. However, working by those tips will increase the likelihood of my daughters being better suited for the world, and for growing up. This is part of my legacy.

Read More: 11 Signs You’re Being A Wuss

Dawn Pine

Dawn Pine (aka TheMaleBrain) is an Israeli 40+ divorced father of 2, former casualty of the blue-pill. Since he has taken the red pill his hobbies are: working out, writing, mentoring, harem management and self improvement.

Are Six Pack Abs Really Worth It?

February 21, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Henry Tran

A great body is great. But a set of shredded six pack abs is the pinnacle of aesthetic achievement when it comes to men's fitness; and for good reason.

For starters, a six pack has shown to be the ultimate weapon when it comes to slaying the pick-up game (just ask Connor Murphy). However as we'll uncover in this article, the benefits of having six pack abs go far beyond cracking the code of female attraction.

But let me first make one thing clear; along with great abs, comes great responsibility – If you want to reap the rewards of having a shredded six pack, then you'll have to withstand the inevitable grind that comes along with achieving them.

Cons Of Having Six Pack Abs As A Man

You Can't Eat At McDonald's.

It should come as no surprise that eating off the dollar menu won't get you McShredded. Not only that, but it also super sizes your chances of suffering from long-term health complications that are linked to eating highly modified fast foods – Hint: You'll be McDiabetic before you hit the age of retirement.

Now I'm not saying you have to follow some miserably strict diet in order to get a ripped six pack – But what I am saying is that if you have a fast food habit that involves eating anything deep fried, battered, or artificially sweetened – you need to give it a swift McKick. Instead, choose fast foods that are baked, grilled or prepared fresh; like Chipotle's Burrito Bowl or Chick-Fil-A's Grilled Chicken Wrap.

You Need To Spend Time In The Gym.

Hate to break it to you, but there's no magic wand for your waistline – A hard midsection takes hard work.

So if you're going to make getting ripped six pack abs a priority, you're going to need to manage your free time a bit differently. You'll need to determine which exercises are best for achieving the sculpted six pack you're looking for and also lay out a weekly workout schedule, one that you can commit to.

Otherwise you'll end up like a lot of guys do – aimlessly wandering from machine to machine, hoping that "an honest effort" will pay off (spoiler alert: it never does).

Gym Memberships Ain't Cheap.

The average cost of a standard gym membership these days is between $80 to $220 a month, and that's not including the start-up fee, personal training package or group fitness add-ons. Tally that up with the gas fee from traveling to and from the gym every day, and you're looking at a pretty substantial investment in both money and time – two assets that most guys can't seem to get enough of.

Now the price of getting ripped six pack abs might appear to be pretty steep – but the price of being out of shape can be even more costly down the road. It can cost you your confidence, your self-image and most notably, your chances of getting laid.

It Can Be Hard To Find A Trainer You Trust.

Social media has reshaped the frontier of fitness. Instead of setting up one of those awkward in-person training consultations, you can just kick back and shop around online for fitness advice – but with so many options, it can be difficult to find the advice you need to get into killer shape.

The reality? Any tool bag with a mediocre six pack and an Instagram account is now "accepting clients" in their DM.

Now don't get me wrong, many of these self proclaimed fitness gurus may know a thing or two when it comes to taking a mean selfie, but when it comes to helping other guys attain their own selfie-worthy six pack, well – lighting and Adobe Photoshop skills don't really apply.

It's like this: Asking a ripped guy (whether it's at the gym or on social media) how to get ripped without knowing his training background or credentials is like buying a used car from a salesmen without looking at the vehicle history report.

If you don't get qualified advice that's scientifically validated and suitable to your personal needs, you could potentially be investing in a huge mistake – a mistake that your health may have to pay for. So don't write checks that your six pack can't cash.

Pros Of Having Six Pack Abs As A Man

Six Packs Score Female Attention.

It's true that some women think that the six pack look is "too extreme", which is why so many dudes are shamelessly sporting dad bods these days (and are somehow still pulling chicks, regardless of looking like a sack full of sloppy joes).

In my opinion, women don't actually think dad bods are attractive – Instead, what they really find attractive about the dad bod is the fact that there will be no pressure for her to look a certain way nor will she ever be threatened by other women lusting after him since, well, he's a slob.

That being said, whether a woman thinks that abs are overkill or she's a dedicated dad bod devotee, the bottom line is… A six pack will always make her look. Even if she doesn't consciously mean to, when a girl sees a guy who has ripped six pack abs, she can't help but notice… And in most cases, stare.

Since it's harder for women to achieve the same rock hard midsection that men are capable of building (estrogen being the culprit), they instantly feel a psychological attraction to the level of dedication and discipline required to achieving the physical paramount that is a ripped six pack. This means that by simply taking your shirt off, you'll be the center of attention – can you say confidence boost?

You'll Have More Energy In The Tank.

When you exercise, your body is using energy (calories). If you're on a mission to get a ripped six pack and start exercising on a daily basis, your body will automatically increase the amount of energy it produces because it already knows you'll be burning through tons more energy than normal.

This is the basic science of how your metabolism works.

When we do nothing, our body knows that it won't be needing energy, so it produces very little. This is why when we lay around and bum it up all day we tend to still feel tired – even if all we did was veg out. However, when we start doing ab shredding workouts, we use a lot more energy than usual. As a result, the body increases its energy output in anticipation for the next workout and uses up a ton of energy.

More Abs, More Money.

We already know that getting a ripped six pack is the ultimate conquest for a head-turn worthy appearance, but what most of us fail to grasp is how having six pack abs can actually earn you more money in the workplace.

And no, I'm not talking about Magic Mike-ing your way to a higher income.

In a new study published in the June issue of the Journal of Labor Research, researchers have found that employees who regularly exercise earn 9% more than their lazier counterparts.

Furthermore, guys who work out regularly, as in at least three times per week, are more productive at work than those who don't, according to research published in the Journal of Occupational and Environmental Medicine.

Those who get sufficient exercise also miss fewer workdays (bosses really like), according to the same study. Those absences can translate to lost income and lost opportunities for advancement.

Finally, guys who are in incredible shape live longer, so their nest egg will rack up more interest.

Plain and simple… Being in shape gets you ahead in life.

The Conclusion

So as you are now realizing, having six pack abs can really change your life.

They make it much easier to attract women, contribute to a more energetic lifestyle, and can even help you advance your career and your wallet. But the reality is that six pack abs don't just miraculously appear – For the most part, men have to dedicate time and effort to get abs.

But what if there was a solution that allowed you to get six pack abs, but which did it in the fastest and easiest possible way?

Besides being fast and easy – what if you didn’t need to give up the enjoyment of eating your favorite foods to get ripped?

Plus – can you imagine how shredded you’d be if you could skip through all the trial and error and bypass wasting time on worthless workouts and instead learn the exact training methods for getting six pack abs?

Workouts that only take you 30 minutes or less, just a few days a week? Better yet, workouts that you don’t need a gym membership, personal trainer or any equipment to do but that still give you killer results?

Look no further, the ultimate shortcut to ripped six pack abs already exists – To watch a free video demonstration of how to get abs fast, click below.

VIDEO: See How Easy It Is To Finally Get The Six Pack You’ve Always Wanted

In that video you’ll learn more about the secret to burning fat rapidly – it’s called the Afterburn Effect. Once you understand the simple formula for how to trigger this effect, your body will be able to continue burning calories for up to 48 hours after each of your workouts.

And you can see exactly how to trigger this effect right now. Just watch the video and get started shredding our your six pack today.

VIDEO: The Smart Way To Get Six Pack Abs

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

The Milo Yiannopoulos Scandal Is A Coordinated Hit Job Against An Establishment Dissident (UPDATED)

February 21, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Breitbart writer Milo Yiannopoulos is having a bad week after his older comments were construed as being “pro-pedophilia.” I share how what’s happening to him is nearly identical to the “pro-rape” attack against me.

UPDATE: Milo has resigned from Breitbart. Here is my follow-up video:

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them on the blog.

Read Next: Is Milo Yiannopoulos Becoming A Liberal To Maintain His Celebrity Profile?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Immigrants Who Skipped Work To Support Immigration Became Upset When Subsequently Fired

February 22, 2017 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

In a move of solidarity, the left (those of them with employment, that is) decided to not work last Thursday in something called "A Day Without Immigrants." Purportedly to make the economy take a small hit for a day and make us feel the absence of immigrants, their families, and their sympathizers financially, it was supposed to make us have a higher value in our minds of them.

Problem is, some people got the sack for walking off the job, other people just got pissed off when they had to cover for their activist coworkers, and the rest of us just didn't notice. Today, we're going to talk about why this Day Without Immigrants is not only not the right thinking for the leftists to be having, but why it is precisely the wrong thinking as well.

Skipping work to protest

Among the participants in this day without immigrants were 18 employees of a painting company in Nashville, TN. They informed their supervisors that they would be skipping work to do the protesting, and the company informed them that they were fired. One fired worker was upset that they were not allowed to remain employed and make up the work on a Sunday.

Knowing that the above wishes are not exactly how the business world works, the company responded that, nothing doing with peaceful protesting, the 18 employees decided to not meet their obligations to the business's clients, and, in the interest of fairness to the employees that actually showed up to work, they had to be terminated.

This fundamental lack of common understanding that these people who skipped work to protest, and the left, especially the young left, have showcases a misconception that they have about the rest of us.

No one here has a problem with immigration

The left delights in the use of straw men arguments. I think the reasoning behind it is twofold; firstly, much of the left's arguments make no sense at all, so they have to find something easier to defend, and, secondly, bearing that in mind, it is the party of the intellectually weak.

The straw man at play here is that "the right, the rich, the whites, the Christians, and the men" hate immigrants because they are something different; i.e. liberal, poor, brown, Muslim, or a woman and that ALL immigrants are equally hated regardless of their immigration status.

This is done by focusing on the demographics of the individuals in question at the moment, instead of more important things like their ethics and underlying motivation, and also by blurring the conversation via biased language like "undocumented immigrant," which implies that this person, here illegally, is actually a great person who is immigrating legally; it's just that the paperwork got delayed, instead an "illegal alien," which is what the actual term for the legal status of the person is.

This country was founded on immigrants. My great-grandparents took the boat through Ellis Island and became citizens by not only swearing an oath to the USA, but also against their native country. They came here legally, through due process, wanted to become Americans, did so, and lived law abiding, productive lives afterwards. Millions of Americans have the same stories.

What we do have a problem with is “Dash-Americanism” and Illegal Entry

Ever notice how no one is just an American anymore? African Americans, Islamic Americans, Latin Americans, Asian Americans? Seems like the only actual Americans are white people; the terms Caucasian American and European American never took off, and Appalachian American just translates to redneck.

You don’t need a cool term to be different, anyone can see where you’re from by what you look like, and I thought equality meant that it didn’t matter anyway. The problem with all this is divided loyalty; I’m going to quote Teddy “Big Stick” Roosevelt here:

> There is no room in this country for hyphenated Americanism. When I refer to hyphenated Americans, I do not refer to naturalized Americans. Some of the very best Americans I have ever known were naturalized Americans, Americans born abroad. But a hyphenated American is not an American at all … The one absolutely certain way of bringing this nation to ruin, of preventing all possibility of its continuing to be a nation at all, would be to permit it to become a tangle of squabbling nationalities, an intricate knot of German-Americans, Irish-Americans, English-Americans, French-Americans, Scandinavian-Americans or Italian-Americans, each preserving its separate nationality, each at heart feeling more sympathy with Europeans of that nationality, than with the other citizens of the American Republic … There is no such thing as a hyphenated American who is a good American. The only man who is a good American is the man who is an American and nothing else.

The problem with “dash-Americanism” is that you can’t totally be trusted. This works on a micro- and a macro- scale. Micro- would be when you have a complaint at work and the HR person and the complainer are the same race while you are a different one and the outcome is affected by that. Or when someone is not a permanent citizen and send their paycheck home to their families in their home country. Macro- would be when an entire people start moving here and are united by a common creed or religion and consider you the enemy.

The other problem is illegal entry. If you are already a criminal by breaking laws to come here, even though you may have rationalized it as the right thing to do, what's to stop you from breaking more laws? The citizenship process is not onerous, people have been doing it for years. One must presume that illegals are either hiding criminal backgrounds, have no valuable skills, or don't want to pay taxes.

Missing work shows your true colors

The problem with arbitrarily taking a day off, even if you used a vacation day (and I bet most of them just skipped work) is not that you are showing solidarity with the immigrants, it's that you're showing your ass to your coworkers and employers.

I didn't notice much because I was on a deadline for a technical document, but my employer got hit by people just being "peace, I'm out!" and skipping a day. Building cars is a team activity, and we plan for only a certain percentage to take vacation at a time, plus factor in for people being legitimately ill and out because of it.

The statement that taking off from work and leaving your coworkers to struggle to get the job done says that you care more about "dash-Americans" than Americans en total, and also that you have no problem breaking the rules when you see fit while expecting no consequences to come to you. If that sounds like the problem that the rest of America already has with the "immigrant issue," that I described above; it's because it is. You signed up to do a job; no one cares about your ancestry; you bailed on your people; get fired.

Conclusion

America’s standards haven’t changed. We want good immigrants who will be loyal to the country, law abiding, and productive. It’s cool to hold onto your roots, but you have to leave militant Islam, La Raza, or whatever sort of third world trouble you have behind, because if you don’t, it’s not America not giving you a fair deal—it’s you not giving us one.

Read More: There Is Little Difference Between Immigrants And Invaders

Rufus Winnfield
"You know, walk the earth, meet people... get into adventures."

5 Most Common Types Of Tourists You Will Meet While Traveling

February 22, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

My time out on the road has a nomad has led me to meeting a lot of interesting people. It's also led to me carefully planning my time in certain cities due to over-saturation. And of course, I've learned all about how the stag parties system works. The nights to go out, and nights to avoid. Here are the 5 types of people you're going to meet while traveling, in all their stereotypical glory.

1. Families

You can often find them walking around with selfie sticks, rushing to make sure they hit every tourist attraction, eating at all the overpriced restaurants.

For the most part, they don't have much applicable information to traveling nomads and players, except the congestion and spike in prices they cause during the peak months of the year.

2. The Female ~~Slut~~ Stag Parties

Bringing the disgusting to EE, one party at a time.

I'll never forget when I was walking around Prague last year. A group of five girls was heading directly towards my Ukrainian girl and me. As they approached, I heard the voices. Shrill, loud harpies. Americans.

Of course, the sidewalks of Prague are incredibly narrow. You aren't fitting more than five people wide to them. My girl and I were walking on the right hand side, the American girls were walking five-across in the fear of being left behind and trying to be the alpha female of the group.

When you spend significant time in a tourist town like Prague, you realize if you get out of the way for every dumb and clueless person walking around, you'd spend an hour a day getting out of the way. I thought it'd be far more amusing to let the one closest to me simply crash into me.

It worked a charm, and as she stumbled into her friend closest to her and their nearly fell, they both turned around and shrieked, "Excuse me!!! That was rude!!!"

I simply turned around and said, "You're excused." Cue looks of shock and wet panties.

The point is, the stag parties have been increasingly in numbers for years now. Crappy airline carriers like Ryanair and EasyJet keep adding $30 flights from Western to Eastern countries. The problem is that now the female bachelorette parties are starting to come out in full force, too.

The hope is that the male and female stag parties find each other to act like morons together all night, rather than polluting the rest of the dating pool.

Speaking of, let's talk about the male stag parties.

3. The Male Stag Party

Like I said, all of the cheap flights from western Europe has made these stag parties a weekly ordeal from March to October. Every weekend, from Friday to Sunday, large groups of guys walk around drinking way too much. Sometimes they even have GoPros on their heads.

Pro tip: The majority of them want to get the cheapest possible flights. Those cheap carriers that offer fares in the $30-and-under range have to fly very early. The reason is because the reason they can offer those cheap fares is because they agree to fly out of the airport (and therefore, use up a gate) when no one else is. Therefore, it's common for the stag parties to get on the 5:30am flight from London to Poland or another EE country.

They are often absent on Wednesday and Thursday nights. Many clubs in the stag-infested cities of Europe actually make a point to have things going on Wednesdays and Thursdays so that the locals can come have a good time. Become a regular on those nights. Take Friday and Saturday off.

However, there is one function about these stag parties that you can use to your advantage.

They are desperate for good information about the city. Rarely has any of the guys in the party actually bothered to research some intel about where to go for a good night. They'll be thrilled to meet a "local" like yourself who has good intel.

You can use them to get into a social mood (at the BEGINNING of the night only), and you can tell them to check out places that you don't plan to go to that night. Tell them that you think XYZ Club will be going off—which is the club that is chock-full of these parties every weekend. Let them go off on their merry way (they won't remember anyway), and then hit the good venues yourself.

3. The Fellow Traveling Man

This can be very good, or very bad. You see, the road can and does get lonely sometimes. It's easy to sell the perks and glamour of the life. However, when you've living in a foreign country and don't know many people—yeah, it gets lonely. While men aren't as dependent on socializing as females (more on that below), we do need some social life to be happy, too.

So let's say you meet a fellow single guy on the road. More than likely, he's going to fall into one of two categories:

1. "Living the life"—he understands game, travel, and how life on the road works. He's what we'd call "aware".
2. "Dweeb"—on his two weeks of vacation a year. Wearing New Balance sneakers with a shirt two sizes too big. As blue pill as they get, but hoping to get lucky and score a foreign girl while he's in town.

Number 1 is a no-brainer. You can have him as a wingman, and he'll make the majority of your nights overall a better experience. Of course, there are people you just don't click with, but if he's game-aware, the odds are in your favor.

Number 2 is a bit tougher to analyze. You see, sometimes some company is better than no company. If he is the type of man who is open to becoming unplugged, you might have a winner. If he talks about western girls with distaste, you can start to share a bit of your story. Hopefully, he can see you as something to aspire to be. If he has this open mind, he could make excellent coffee-shop company a few times a week, and maybe even a decent wingman.

The problem is that if he's stubborn to taking the red pill—good luck. More than likely, he is lonely and wants company. The trip has caught him off guard—he probably doesn't know how to be solitary. He's going to want your phone number, he's going to want to hang out every day, and he's going to want to accompany you out to talk to the ladies.

And I promise he won't do anything but scare them away.

5. The Solo Female Traveler

Wearing sunglasses to cover up the cum stuck on her face from the night before.

This is the type of traveler the traveling player gets giddy for. Women can rarely handle being alone for prolonged periods of time. They are social creatures. Whilst she may claim she's taking the trip to explore deep inside herself, it won't be her doing the exploring. It'll be the numerous amounts of cock taking the trip deep inside her.

Tip: It matters where you meet her, too. A girl traveling alone in Rio, or Barcelona? Rest assured she's ready for some hooking up. If a Western girl has taken the time to get a Russian visa, she might have an actual interest in the language and culture.

Despite what they say, female solo travelers very rarely end up actually spending that time alone. They don't do solitary activities to discover who they are or learn about the world. Instead, they typically join the "free hostel-sponsored walks" around old town cities, and go out to every single pub crawl imaginable. Like I said, they need to socialize.

To any men on the road: when a girl tells you she's been traveling solo for more than a week, your radar should be on full blast. She's probably lonely. She wants to have adventure. And best of all, she has the discretion she needs to have a one night stand.

She's all yours.

If you want to learn how to play the field properly abroad, check my course on Tinder and text game. For more insights into the rest of the world, visit KyleTrouble.com.

Read More: 7 Things I Learned On The Road This Year

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

How To Get Over The “Special” Girl Who Doesn’t Want To Be With You

February 22, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A couple of people have reached out to me on Twitter this week asking how to get over one-itis. This is an evergreen topic that deserves serious attention so I decided that I should share my own personal method with you. Be warned though, this is a dark triad approach and not one for the faint-hearted, but if you follow the steps I outline you will undoubtedly free yourself from one-itis more quickly than you would be using any other strategy.

What Is One-itis?

First off, I should define one-itis for anyone who hasn’t come across the term. In essence, one-itis refers to a (blue pill) belief in ‘the one’—that one ‘special girl’ who is perfect above all others.

One-itis can strike in a variety of ways but typically a man will experience it for a woman with whom he is in a relationship (‘she’s the one—I can’t live without her’,) or worse, for a woman that he admires who does not reciprocate his feelings (‘she is so amazing—if only I could be with her then my life would be perfect and I would be complete as a human being’).

Both of these states are extremely damaging. The first because, in putting his girl on a pedestal, the man is ironically more likely to drive her away. The second is perhaps worse—by pedestalising a woman with whom he is not yet intimate (nor likely to be) the man simultaneously makes himself less attractive to his target while wasting his life in pursuit of something that will never materialise.

One-itis is the high watermark of ‘blue pill’ thinking and behaviour and is based in the purity fantasy. Men who believe that there are ‘good girls’ (virgins) and ‘bad girls’ (whores) are prone to it: underlying any one-itis is the notion that this particular girl is different from ‘all the rest’—that her innocence and good qualities make her literally irreplaceable and therefore essential to the guy’s happiness.

Of course, we know this to be illogical—good girls and bad girls are the same girls. The Madonna / Whore complex is a fantasy—that special snowflake who you believe is perfect likely fucked the local dealer at the pool party last summer. Girls are human beings and none of us are perfect. More importantly, with 7.4 billion people on the planet there is no ‘one’ either. The truth is that there are a great many women out there with whom you could form a successful relationship with (or have great sex with)—it’s merely a question of finding them.

The First Step

As with any addictive behaviour pattern, the first step should be admitting that you have a problem. In the case of one-itis, you need to get to a point where you admit to yourself that you actually have it.

By far the best way to accomplish this, in my experience, is to force the girl to stop sitting on the fence and tell you exactly where you stand. This is often easier said than done as she probably has a vested interest in you remaining in thrall to her—she likely gets validation from it, or security if you’re together. But trust me, if you sense that something is amiss and that she isn't feeling you in the way that you'd like then very probably you are right.

if you are obsessed with a girl you haven't slept with yet—maybe you're friends, colleagues, classmates, or you've been dating but haven't got to that stage yet, then what you need to do is sit her down, ask her very pointedly what is going on without allowing her to prevaricate or obfuscate. Say something like 'I'm a man, you're a woman—it's only natural that I'm attracted to you. How do you feel about that?'

(By the way, I'm not recommending this form of directness as a 'pick-up' technique—quite the contrary. The whole point about game is that a flirtatious vibe should be introduced from the start so no ambiguity can exist. Whether it leads to sex or rejection, one of the benefits of game is that eradicates long, drawn-out grey area situations where one-itis can flourish. By burning through prospects quickly at least you know where you are.)

If it's a girl you are dating, in a relationship with, or even married to, but you sense that something is amiss, then you must also find a way to force the issue so that she has no choice but to come clean. If, for example, you're afraid she might be cheating, then you need to confront her about it in a no-bullshit way that encourages her to be honest.

Loading...
Once you're armed with the truth (however painful) then you are in a position to move onto the next phase. And that phase, as much as it may pain the more sensitive among you, is positive anger.

The Righteous Power of Positive Anger

Now, before I get a hail of abuse in the comments, I'm not recommending that you become a basement-dwelling misanthropist, bitter about the world, about women, or about any meta group or structure. No, what I am proposing is that you should get angry about the very profound insult that the individual woman in question has directed towards you.

Because when you think about it, what deeper or more personal insult is possible than a complete repudiation of you as a sexual being?

Look, she's played you for a fool, OK? Face it. Either she strung you along in the friendzone, not bothering to disabuse you of the hope that one day 'something might happen' between the two of you. Or you were actually in a relationship with her, but now she has changed her mind about you and is no longer attracted, maybe fucking someone else into the bargain.

Now of course, no-one is saying that a woman doesn't have the right to change her mind—she does. But you also have the right to choose whether or not to take the slight like a pussy or to use it as an impetus for getting out of a rut.

Now—and this is so important that I must emphasize it very strongly—I am not for one moment recommending that you take any direct action towards your one-itis as a result of this positive anger. To do so would at best look butthurt and at worst be criminal (depending on what you did). Instead, what I am suggesting is that as quickly as possible you skip through the denial stage of the grieving process and get to positive anger, for it is in anger that you will be most empowered and motivated to move on.

Positive anger is all about feeling the energy and motivation that your rage will naturally generate, without allowing it to take you to a negative place of despair and vengeance.

Cut All Contact

Once you are angry, the next stage is to entirely remove yourself from the girl's life. You need to ghost. Immediately. As in, right now. That means no phone calls, no emails, Facebook messages, Snapchat convos, Instagram likes or any other form of contact.

Think about it like this—if it were possible for another man to inflict an equivalent slight on you, do you think for one minute you would have anything to do with him afterwards?

Of course you wouldn't.

Now, cutting off contact can sometimes be hard, but it will be less so in this instance because you're angry, remember? Use that anger as a motivator and, one day at a time, resolve to yourself that you will not, under any circumstances, give your one-itis the satisfaction of having you contact her. Because the smallest indication that you're thinking of her, even a 'like' on social media, will reveal you as the thirsty beta chump that you are.

Far better to disappear. Far better to have her wonder about you rather than you about her. Not that you will see the fruits of your withdrawal, because you won't have any contact with her. But you can be confident that she will be thinking about you, and perhaps wondering if she was a little too hasty in writing off your alpha potential.

Once contact is cut then you must immediately set about putting positive steps in place to improve your life. These will differ depending on the individual but I would recommend going to the gym or running daily, approaching new girls daily, working on a business or side project daily, and speaking with make friends daily. All of these things will make you feel better and improve your medium to long-term prospects.

So there you have it—smash your denial, get angry, cut all contact and take action. I'm not saying it will be easy—it won't—but with a bit of positive anger as your spur you will find that you will get over your one-itis cravings a lot quicker than you'd expect.

Want to find out how to attract a steady stream of beautiful girls? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter.

Read More: Why Abundance And Ruthlessness Are Needed to Get Hot Girls in 2017

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Adored Gay Leftist George Takei Calls Child Molestation “Delightful” & “Delicious” With No Media Outcry

February 23, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Hot on the heels of the liberal hit job directed against Milo Yiannopoulos, footage and audio has emerged of Pizza Hut and Taco Bell spokesman George Takei calling child molestation “delightful” and “delicious.” The actor, most famous for his role in the original Star Trek series and being an unapologetic SJW, is presently one of Hollywood’s biggest haters of Trump.

In three separate interviews, Takei spoke in glowing terms about his molestation at the hands of a California summer camp counselor. He laughed incessantly about it to Howard Stern, on a show called notSam, and with presenters and guests for SiriusXM’s Shade 45. Unlike Milo Yiannopoulos’ generally far more ambiguous comments about relationships involving young and older men (his use “boy” and “girl” being equally applicable to young adults), Takei identified his age at the time of his sexual molestation (13 or 14, depending on the interview).

Return Of Kings will not defend all of Milo’s comments, but George Takei’s are objectively much worse. If Milo deserves to fall on his sword, Takei deserves it ten times over.

George Takei laughed about and even praised his own molestation.

The rise of the #PizzaGate controversy during last year's US Presidential campaign gives George Takei's past comments a "delightful" and "delicious" irony, and not just because he is a Pizza Hut spokesman. The implications of pedophilia being potentially rampant amongst senior liberals and their associates have long been discussed on the Roosh V Forum. I have not been involved in the raising of these concerns, but must admit that the meticulous work of others in exposing the accusations has left me rattled. If true, they would represent a shocking insight into how pedophilia is not only condoned but encouraged by very powerful people.

The hypocrisy of a media that elevates Takei to "hero" status and simultaneously tries to destroy Yiannopoulos should not come as a surprise to anyone. Whilst both men are flamboyantly gay, Takei not only tows the SJW line, but actively tries to expand it. As a result, he will probably escape any sanction for his words. Compare this to the witch-hunted Milo, who actually defended the age of consent laws that make sex with minors statutory rape. Tellingly, George Takei did nothing but laud his encounter with his molester.

Where are you about George Takei, Jake Tapper and Pizza Hut?

Political hack Jake Tapper.

CNN's Jake Tapper, whose credibility has been challenged even more since the Wikileaks revelations about his political bias, has been one of the leaders of the hit job on Milo Yiannopoulos. He excoriated the organizers of the Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) for inviting Yiannopoulos to speak at their event. There is next to no doubt that he will remain silent on George Takei's words, or even defend them if push comes to shove.

The same can be said of the treasure trove of other outlets, from MSNBC to the Huffington Post, who will continue to have a field day at Milo's expense. These outlets had no trouble calling #PizzaGate alt-right propaganda, but will provide no context whatsoever to the former Breitbart editor's comments, most notably his stated support for age of consent laws. The new furor about George Takei will at best be given a very undignified silence by them.

Pizza Hut's position, as well as Taco Bell's, will be harder to maintain than the double standards of the media's favorite journalist hacks. Like McDonald's, KFC, Wendy's, and a host of other fast food chains, these two corporations need to appeal to Middle America, not only the politically correct souls who flock to CNN. And a major target market for these companies, if not the major target market, is children. Still, whether Pizza Hut and Taco Bell abandon George Takei will depend on the traction his past comments get.

The media will always protect those with the correct leftist talking points

George Takei's comments in praise of molestation are much older than those being used against Milo Yiannopoulos. Yet, sans some unexpected development, the former will continue his life without media harassment and a concerted campaign to destroy his career.

The aftermath of the hit job on Milo Yiannopoulos means he has now resigned from Breitbart, lost his book deal with Simon & Schuster, and been dropped from CPAC. If anything, George Takei will be given multiple excuses to say he is a victim of alt-right "abuse" by those criticizing his take on child molestation.

People frequently say liberals and SJWs are grossly inconsistent. On one front, however, I disagree. Let's face it: they will consistently defend their own, no matter what they say.

Read More: The Milo Yiannopoulos Scandal Is A Coordinated Hit Job Against An Establishment Dissident (UPDATED)

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How Girl Power Is Ruining Western Culture

February 23, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Girl Power is ubiquitous. Whenever you watch a commercial, go to see a movie, or enjoy your favorite sitcom, you'll almost certainly be exposed to some form of a Girl Power message. Professionals tell us that it is a harmless way to boost the self-esteem of girls. In reality, it is indoctrinating our children with a feminist message that is undermining our entire culture.

What is girl power?

The Alien series was groundbreaking in that it featured a female heroine. All the males in the series are weak or evil.

Girl power is the feminist message that whatever boys can do, girls can do better. The idea is that women are underrepresented among the ranks of corporate CEOs, soldiers, and scientists because they were oppressed by the patriarchy while growing up. Feminists theorize that if girls could just be told that they were powerful, we'd gradually see patriarchy rolled back.

Now, the idea that women are oppressed by the patriarchy is pure nonsense. The patriarchy has been under attack since the French Revolution. By the 1970s, most of the vestiges of true patriarchy were gone. The fathers of today are not patriarchs, but weak, permissive versions of the real thing.

So if the patriarchy is not keeping women down, what is? In truth, nothing is. Women are inherently different from men. Whereas men are naturally wired to be providers, women are naturally nurturers. The reason there are not more female CEOs is because most women are not willing to sacrifice the good of their families for the good of some globalist corporation or for a fat paycheck. Rather than bemoaning this, feminists should celebrate the fact that women are free to do what really matters to them.

The Programming starts early

Nick Jr.'s show "Princess Knight" involves a princess who is also a knight in shining armor. No need for a hero, the girl can rescue herself.

Girl power programing starts early. I have a four-year-old son who sometimes watches Nick Jr., a network targeted at children ages 2-5. All of the shows carry some girl power content. One of the most popular shows in Nick Jr.'s line up is "Paw Patrol," a show about puppies who go on rescue missions to help people. My son's favorite puppy is Marshall, a Dalmatian puppy who drives a fire truck. Like the other boy puppies, Marshall ends up making a lot of mistakes. He's clumsy and falls often. On the other hand, the girl puppies never make a mistake.

Nick Jr. has shows that are specifically targeted at girls. "Shimmer and Shine" is about a little girl and her two friends who are genies. Male characters play a very minor role in Shimmer and Shine, if they do at all. The show is filled with cutesy things and even the color palette is in pastels—something that would more likely appeal to girls.

On the other hand, there are no shows that specifically target boys that don't also have a huge girl focus. “Blaze and the Monster Machines” is a show that teaches math and science. The main character is a boy, but he has a female side-kick who happens to be a mechanic who can fix anything. How many female auto mechanics do you know? In the popular “Peppa Pig” series, children are taught that fathers are kind but hapless. The “Daddy Pig” figure does something in almost every episode that makes him look stupid. The overarching message of these children’s cartoons is that girls can be anything and they will do a great job. Boys might be good but they will make mistakes, unlike their female peers. And when boys grow up, they can look forward to being bumbling fathers.

The girl power drumbeat increases once children become school age. Schools have programs that have the goal of getting more girls into STEM (Science, Technology, Engineering, and Math). The US soccer organization has a special program called “SheBelieves” intended to “inspire young girls and women and encourage them to accomplish their goals and dreams, athletic or otherwise.”

Do I even need to mention that there is no similar program to encourage young boys? Girl power gets pushed through comic books that are hell bent on turning every male super hero into a woman. Finally, girl power is pushed by Hollywood by such movies as Star Wars: Rogue One. They couldn’t even leave Tolkien’s Hobbit alone. Director Peter Jackson felt compelled to add a girl power elf to the movie that didn’t exist in the book.

Sorry Lefties. Your dream of being ruled by Hillary Stormborn were derailed by the Trump Train.

And girl power messages do not stop once women become adults. Commercials aimed at women frequently have an underlying message that women are “tough.” It is a cliché to see a commercial where a young woman is throwing a punch or a kick to demonstrate how “independent” she is. But the most flagrant example of girl power came during the last season of Game of Thrones. The Game of Thrones writers, being fully aware that Hillary would be the prospective Democrat nominee, crafted their storyline to accustom viewers with a powerful female ruler.

The script had the white-haired queen, Daenerys Stormborn, whose chief advisor is a dwarf, cementing an alliance with a Lesbian princess (Yara Greyjoy), whose servant is an emasculated man (Yara’s brother Theon). Thus we had the ideal girl power utopia: powerful women ruling over weak men who have had their balls cut off rendering them permanently subservient.

What’s wrong with girl power?

The problem with girl power is that it doesn’t actually achieve its goal of turning girls into happy, well-adjusted, confident women. The reverse is true. In reality, girl power hurts girls by making girls feel obliged to do things that are not in line with their natural strengths or interests. Girl power pushes girls towards STEM subjects, but while some girls have a natural aptitude for the sciences, most of them will be more attracted to liberal arts. This is as it should be because in the natural order of things, girls will eventually grow up to become mothers, and mothers are responsible for handing on the culture to the next generation.

Girl power also hurts girls by setting unrealistic expectations. Girl power leads girls to believe that they train hard enough, they can be just as good as boys at sports. Sadly, the vast majority girls will never be able to perform at the same physical level as boys. Even the US Women’s national soccer team, some of the best female players in the world, were easily beaten by a bunch of high school boys.

Girl power also hurts boys. Boys who are growing up today are subjected to a constant barrage of messages telling them that they are not as good as girls. There are no self-esteem programs for boys. Boys are not singled out for awards and honors when they do well in math. Even when boys watch a movie, they realize that they can never be heroes because girls can save themselves.

Encouraging the transgender epidemic

But I can’t help but wonder if girl power is not having an even darker influence on boys. The past few years have seen an explosion in transgenderism: boys wanting to become girls, and girls wanting to become boys. While there are some girl-to-boy transgenders, most of them are boys who want to become girls. What could be driving this disturbing epidemic?

One cause is mentally ill mothers. Our society has created women who care more about virtue signaling than they do having a healthy family. These deranged women begin dressing their sons as girls from a young age. Children are very impressionable. The sick designs of an insane parent can set a healthy boy on a trajectory that will leave him actually believing that he is a girl.

But the other factor that is driving the transgender epidemic is girl power. Imagine being a boy and being told your entire life that you are second rate, but that girls are always special and magical and perfect. Is it possible that some boys, especially boys with weak or absent fathers, begin to wish that they too could become girls?

Conclusion

Girl power is social engineering and it is being done on a scale never seen before in history. But how do we stop it?

The answer to that lies with men. Men must have the courage to raise their sons and daughters in such a way that they can feel comfortable to embrace their natural masculine and feminine roles. For too long, fathers have delegated decisions about raising their children to mothers and "professionals." The result has been a disaster.

Of course, the best way of being a good father is to embrace your own masculinity. Everyone who is reading this has been subjected to massive programming that guides men along the path of weakness and passivity. Dropping these disempowering traits and adopting strength and action will help our own lives and the lives of our children.

Be sure to check out Michael's book Staying Married in a Degenerate Age*.*

Read More: Why You Should Be Thankful For "Girl Power" Songs

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Trump Vs. The Deep State: The War For America's Soul

February 23, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Michael Flynn's recent ouster as National Security Adviser was the first battle in what's shaping up to be a war for the future of America's soul. Unfortunately, Flynn's ouster was a major victory for the darkest, deepest shadows of the swamp. Now it looks as if we're seeing a struggle of the colossi the likes of which we haven't seen perhaps since Theodore Roosevelt took on the monopolies and trusts.

The stakes are likewise colossal. Hinged on the outcome of this war is nothing less than the future of republican governance in the United States of America. It's now clear that the centrality of the 2016 campaign issue is on the table – will the United States of America function as intended: a constitutional republic accountable to the people, or will the country succumb to the rule of an unelected, unaccountable bureaucracy led by the "intelligence community," reporting largely to entrenched oligarchs while public politics remains a largely ceremonial choice between A and B? This had been the case (for the most part) until the Trump phenomenon disrupted the pattern.

Now, just weeks into his presidency, the swamp has tried to suck Donald Trump in. As one astute observer pointed:

> Intel agencies @ war with White House
> Mass demonstrations
> Obstruction in Congress
> This is what a CIA "color revolution" looks like. now b

> — Justin Raimondo (@JustinRaimondo) February 15, 2017

You may remember that I warned in December that swamp elements were setting up a confirmation bias trap against the incoming administration. As I remarked at the time, the trap would be that if Trump or his team didn't tow exactly the line of the foreign policy establishment on Russia, it would look suspicious. The setup saw Michael Flynn tripping the wire and the confirmation bias bomb exploded.

We still have no idea what exactly took place between him and the Russian ambassador (they won't release the transcripts, just hearsay from the "intelligence community"), but because it kind of looked a little suspicious, he was forced out in a firestorm.

This was a colossal mistake on Trump's part because it gave the Deep State and their media sycophants a scalp. This was the first major frame test that I've seen Trump fail and it was the most important one. They'll now be emboldened to take out other people they don't like and disrupt Trump's agenda further, making policy rather than following orders.

This is nothing less than sedition against the lawfully elected president.

The persuasion tactics don't stop with the domination of space on the Russia issue, however. One key reason why the Deep State has been able to be so brazen with its power grab in its assault on General Flynn is because they know that the left is still in a Chernobyl-level meltdown over Donald Trump's election. This puts them in a prime state for suggestion. Trained in persuasion and propaganda, the apparatchiks at the Deep State understand the game.

The Flynn battle was part of an ongoing, deeper persuasion war. If the Deep State is taking somewhat of a risk with their overt sedition, it is a calculated one. They know that their newfound allies on the left are now very easy to hypnotize, and they've been doing it.

To quote myself:

> One of the foremost principles of persuasion and hypnosis is pacing and leading. In Influence, Robert Cialdini says that people are easily influenced by those they like. In hypnotic pacing, you show the person you're attempting to influence that you like them and also get them to like you. You do this by mirroring them – their body language, their speech patterns, their desires, even their breathing. This shows that you are on the same wavelength and understand one another, establishing deep rapport and trust.
>
> Once you've paced, you're ready to lead. Your prospect is now far more open to your suggestions. You can then lead your prospect where you want him to go.
>
> Does this whole alliance between the Deep State and its supposed critics on the left look like pacing and leading to you?
>
> 1. Pacing: Deep State undermines President Trump. This obviously gets them on the "same wavelength." The illiberal left and the lower rungs of the fake news media like this very much.
>
> 2. Leading: Now in their good graces, the Deep State, led by the CIA, can overcome public skepticism and lead their new prospects where they want, whether it's escalation with Russia, continued destabilization of Syria and the wider Middle East, or even, more alarmingly, a de facto overthrow of elected constitutional governance, with a rule of the bureaucracy affirmed and no longer rumored. The resignation of Michael Flynn points to all these things. Poisonous pundits like Bill Kristol cheering it on leaves it in little doubt. Only a relatively few voices that oppose Donald Trump, like Michael Tracey and Glenn Greenwald, see the bigger picture and are alarmed.

The most alarming thing is that the Deep State is pacing those suffering from Trump Derangement Syndrome to eventually lead them into accepting the de facto rule of unelected and unaccountable bureaucrats. This is the long game. That isn't to say that normal political machinery won't function, but that the Deep State will be able to brazenly overrule republican institutions because people have gotten used to and begun to agree with such antics. Another key tenet of hypnosis and persuasion is to get your prospect to agree with you early and often – so that the big agreement you want at the end will be easier to get.

Truly, the left in their meltdown mode is paving a dangerous road in many ways. By agreeing with what's being called "the political assassination of Michael Flynn," the wheels are in motion.

What To Do Next?

The Achilles heel of the Deep State strategy here is that it relies on leaks to the fake news media. As Mike Cernovich said, trust in the media is a social construct. If no one trusted CNN or the Washington Post, they would lose all power. Fortunately, the vast majority of America distrusts the old media. This makes them an easy target and it's why Donald Trump's attacks on them go over so well.

A few years ago, Roosh recommended fireteam tactics against SJW "journalists." I also wrote on the necessity of shaming white knights, of which the media is full of them. Return Of Kings itself has been known for hitting back and putting the names of fake news bloggers and feminist freaks on page one of their respective Google searches. It may be time to use all of these against the authors of these Deep State-fed hit pieces.

A quick reaction force against the "journalists" spreading the fake news to destabilize Trump is warranted. This would be an effort to drag all of their skeletons out of the closet. This imposes a new frame on the conversation and erodes the credibility of the media to cooperate with the Deep State in the future.

Strategic Analysis

Fortunately, under normal circumstances, time is on our side. As the administration goes on, more holdovers will be fired and loyalists put in. Obama holdovers themselves were instrumental in undermining Flynn. The swamp is already being drained at the State Department with Rex Tillerson laying off career bureaucrats. This kind of brazen action by Deep State operatives is largely a sign of weakness, not strength, otherwise they'd never risk it. Their operation normally depends on not being seen. With each such brazen power grab, they reveal themselves and set them up for Donald Trump to respond with his own moves, persuasion and otherwise. Trump will have more time to root out and corral the Deep State over the next few years.

The big X factor is the meltdown of the left and their newfound neoconservative allies. The best display of that is here:

> Hollywood trending toward "pro-coup" pic.twitter.com/QkKh3gjEe4
> — Michael Tracey (@mtracey) February 17, 2017

The Hollywood blowhard, in his cognitive dissonance, obviously doesn't recognize the hypocrisy of calling for a democratically elected president to be overthrown by unelected bureaucrats, as they've done elsewhere many times. This is where the hypnosis of the Deep State is trending.

So we must be on our guard – support the president, destroy the credibility of the media with multiple quick reaction forces, and, if possible, use our powers of persuasion to dissolve the cognitive dissonance of those we can (I've actually done this many times).

We have to be operating at the same level of intensity, or greater, than we did during the campaign. This has ceased to merely be a political issue, but one over the very future of constitutional governance itself. It’s a fight President Trump and those of us who support him can’t afford to lose.

And even if you don’t like Trump, he’s time-limited. The Deep State isn’t.

Read More: 8 Reasons Why Women Are Terrible Teachers

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

CNN Audio Leaks By James O’Keefe Doesn’t Live Up To The Hype

February 23, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

James O’Keefe recently released 119 hours of audio recorded in CNN headquarters. In the below video, I explain why this is no big deal.

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them here.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Do We Push Women To Choose Career Over Family?

February 24, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

On Valentine's Day this year, I heard a man calling in to a radio program to ask how to show his wife love. You see, the man's wife is a career woman in the medical industry, and focuses all her energies on her job as a heart doctor. She's away from the home for long periods, and the husband struggles to find time to spend with her.

Idiocracy: Still not quite ready for a Family

The man stated that while their friends are buying houses and starting families, they aren't even considering a family, because his wife states she can barely take care of herself, much less raise children.

Been there, done that

She's too busy to even enjoy the monthly massage package he purchased her, and she is currently several months behind. This poor cucked man, who obviously isn't getting to touch, much less make love to, his own wife, is married to a career woman who isn't even interested in the indirect pleasure he offers through the transitive purchase of another massaging her body. The husband is relegated to occasionally cooking her a home cooked meal, hoping she has time to enjoy it. What a sad, miserable, lonely life.

Hypergamous Narcissism

I later found the program online: The economy of single women (cucked caller at 41 minute mark). It begins with a Jewish female journalist from Columbia University lamenting that jewelry purchases have traditionally been romantic gifts one partner gives to the other, but now jewelry store Tiffany is also marketing to the "self-purchasing woman."

As the journalist states, women are tired of waiting around for a man to buy her something because she deserves it (earning it) and instead are making these "just because" purchases. In other words, putting forth the effort to attract a man for more than a couple of weeks, or showing him affection and care and devotion, is too difficult for her, so she decides to reward herself with what society has always deemed an outward sign that a woman is successfully pleasing a man—jewelry.

Why so many bags? Just ’cause.

This is primarily made possible by women’s entry into the workforce, and declining marriage rates. The feminist journalists erroneously state that single career women have greater economic power than they did before, so they are able to better afford things like jewelry. In actuality, a single woman, needing her own house or apartment, car, stove, microwave, furniture, etc. spends far more than a married couple does on these expensive items, and the single working girl’s disposable income is far lower.

Female Math

The primary difference is that a man as head of household is going to prioritize household expenses and severely limit the amount of purchases on luxuries like jewelry, where the single woman will spend freely on such low value, high cost items, as long as she has the money in her pocketbook, or more likely, available on credit, “just because.”

Ironically, this removes most of the underlying value of the jewelry itself. Apart from being semi-rare, the main value in jewelry is not in its underlying mineral content, but in the romantic sentiments that go along with said gift. There is both a financial and emotional value attached above and beyond the base value of the metal or stone.

Indirect Social Proof: An obvious gift from a man she’s pleasing

Diamond engagement rings have a far higher markup than other precious stones, because of their emotional connotation to a marriage or engagement. I don’t really care about the silly trinkets women want or use, but the point is, they do, and they are destroying their intrinsic value.

Becoming More Materialistic While Losing All Shame

As the story points out, women 50 years ago would lie if they had bought jewelry for themselves, because they knew it was a meaningless display of vacant emotion and crass commerce, but today women have no such shame. A diamond is moving away from a display of a partner’s love to selfish materialism (which is fine by me).

I’m confused.. is this empowering and brave, or am I a social creature that craves interaction?

More feminists joined, including one who operates the blog Alone In Atlanta, an ironic title considering Atlanta has one of the best demographics for young singles to meet and form relationships in America. They continued with the usual brainwashing that women don’t need a partner, and that women can now do everything that they formerly needed a husband for, including economic needs, sex, and having children. This is certainly true, as I have discussed before, but the main question remains: Why is society pushing this destructive narrative?

Why Are Women Being Educated?

I’ve been considering this question over the past week after Roosh posed the question Why Are Women Being Educated? after encountering a young female in her fertile prime squandering the huge resources society devotes to give her a career in place of a man.

This article reminds me of another controversial idea I read years ago—the chapter on marriage in Harry Browne’s book How I Found Freedom In An Unfree World.

Browne advocated shunning legal marriage, making personal agreements directly with your partner instead of entering into the dangerous three-way marriage contract with the government, and also arguing that lifetime romantic love is unnatural. Much like many readers may feel with ROK, I agreed with almost everything else presented in the book, but this one chapter seemed too different and unconventional. Fast forward a decade, and the idea seems like common sense.

Perhaps you rarely question things that are taken for granted in our culture, but spend some time over the next few weeks pondering why we educate women so highly, and what are the results.

We All Cannot Casually Fornicate Or MGTOW

What happens to a society where men and women no longer want to raise families together? It dies. If it’s not an obvious death, then it evolves into something that resembles the former society in name only. Many would say this has already happened in America. If not, give us a few generations where productive people do not form families, and we are reliant on other cultures to provide children and sustainability to the economy and eventually the original society is gone.

Yale: How much are they really contributing?

Why is career elevated above family? I find myself on a similar path as many here, who after enjoying some short term fun with women, question what I really want from life. While an endless single life of meeting new women, traveling and exploring the world, and using clown game on myself to provide endless fun and enjoyment, can be appealing on an individual level, it is a recipe for cultural extinction.

The life of a promiscuous nomad should be like that of a career girl: an option that is always available, but not one that society pushes and glamorizes.

Propaganda Used to Have Positive Goals

The truth is women in America were always free to have a career if that's what they truly wanted. Most of them just didn't want it. Or changed their mind when they saw how difficult it was. Even today, women are doing this. A 2012 study in the peer reviewed

Journal of Human Capital revealed that most women physicians do not work sufficient hours to break even on the financial investment in medical school.

They choose to work shorter hours, or drop out of the profession after entering it and finding it too demanding. The costs of medical school represent huge societal investments. Besides the financial loss, for every woman that finishes medical school, a man is not educated with the skills to be a physician, depriving society of the benefits of a needed service, and driving up the cost of health care. The study concludes:

> The majority of women physicians do not appear to work enough hours earning the physician-wage premium to amortize that profession's higher upfront investments.

So why are we educating them to be physicians? Can anyone provide a rational answer?

Women Aren't Happy Being Men

The irony is that female doctors are the ones choosing to work part time, because they do not value their career highly. And this is a laudable thing!

While the young propagandized feminist may start out thinking her career will be a source of happiness, she soon finds out that she has other priorities in life, and chooses to work fewer hours in order to give more time to family, hobbies, or other non-career goals. Which is consistent with women's nature. Women are not happiest being career drones. Women are not happiest being highly educated. Women are not happiest being men.

Western women are, and have been for all my life, free to choose whatever life they want for themselves. But we should stop actively encouraging them to make anti-family choices that will make them unhappy, and will destroy our identity and culture. If anything, we should encourage them to nurture their feminine side, to foster beauty and embrace fertility, to recognize they are happiest when they are pleasing and caring for a man who is happy to be with her. This is family. This is future. This is culture.

Read More: Is Genocide On The Elite Agenda?

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

6 Things White Males Should Be Proud Of

February 24, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Attention heterosexual white males! Are you tired of being endlessly browbeaten and derided by universities, human resources, CNN, MSNBC, Buzzfeed, Everyday Feminism, MIC, Alternet, and Huffington Shitpost among countless other media establishments?

Are you tired of being repeatedly told you are "the oppressor" and the descendant of imperialists, rapists, thieves, racists, conquerors, and genocidal maniacs by our cultural Marxist overlords?

(1:33 – 1:55) Way to paint all white people with a broad brush .MIC!

Do you get the funny feeling that all these nefarious forces out there are designed to make you think that the world would be a lot better off without you? That you should just make your way to the nearest cliff and take a stumble over?

Well all that left wing buffalo manure is coming to a stop today.

Tread carefully liberal snowflakes, because here are six damn good reasons why white males should feel good about themselves, their history, and their cultures.

1. Creating And Maintaining The World's Most Prosperous And Desirable Countries (For Everyone Apparently!)

Rank		Country	Score
2015 estimates for 2014 [9]	Change in rank from previous year[5]		2015 estimates for 2014 [9]	Change from previous year [5]
1	—	Norway	0.944	▲ 0.002
2	—	Australia	0.935	▲ 0.002
3	—	Switzerland	0.930	▲ 0.002
4	—	Denmark	0.923	—
5	—	Netherlands	0.922	▲ 0.002
6	—	Germany	0.916	▲ 0.001
8	▲ [2]	Ireland	0.916	▲ 0.004
8	▼ [1]	United States	0.915	▲ 0.002
9	▼ [1]	Canada	0.913	▲ 0.001
9	▲ [1]	New Zealand	0.913	▲ 0.002
11	▼ [2]	Singapore	0.912	▲ 0.003
12	—	Hong Kong	0.910	▲ 0.002
13	—	Liechtenstein	0.908	▲ 0.001
14	—	Sweden	0.907	▲ 0.002
14	▲ [1]	United Kingdom	0.907	▲ 0.005
16	—	Iceland	0.899	—

The 16 most prosperous countries in the world are all predominately populated by Germanic and Celtic Europeans, or city states heavily influenced by the British Empire (Singapore & Hong Kong)

White males (particularly white males of Germanic European extraction) do an absolutely fantastic job at creating and maintaining the world's cleanest, safest, high-income, low-corruption, politically stable, and technologically innovative societies on the planet.

And (surprise surprise!), a huge percentage of the planets population would jump at the first opportunity to come and live in one of these "white supremacies."

There are certainly a few major non-white first world exceptions out there (Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, Singapore, Hong Kong, etc.) but these countries are primarily the way they are through adopting Western technologies and systems of government and laws. Immigration to these countries is also extremely limited, while all the white majority countries are major migration destinations for non-white people around the world seeking a better life.

"White Supremacy"? It's more like white competency than anything else. And competency is a virtue that should cherished and praised. Not derided.

2. Science, Medicine, And Technology

Aaron Clarey is exaggerating with humorous intent in the preceding video, but he is certainly far from incorrect. White males now make up less than 5% of the population of the planet, but have been, and continue to be, at the forefront of the vast majority of the world's scientific, medical, and technological advancements for 500+ years.

Japan, Korea, and China could very well still be lingering in a 13th century standard of living if not for increased contact with the West starting in the 1800's, and western medicine has added decades to the average life expectancy of all races of people across the globe.

Can't live without your smartphone? It might not be here if it wasn't for Scotland (population less than 6 million), as Scotsmen invented both the telephone and television among countless other revolutionary discoveries from just this one small country alone.

Sure, some white man innovations have been created for destruction, but for every V-2 rocket there is a Saturn V, for every attack helicopter there is a rescue helicopter, and for every nuclear bomb there is an asteroid in space which could be obliterated before it has a chance to destroy Earth.

The innovations of white men have brought far more health and happiness to people around the world than their negatives, so cultural Marxists and all the "white privilege" brow-beaters are more than welcome to move to a Madagascar mud hut if they can't stand living around first world white males and their penicillin and techno toys.

3. NOT Being The World's Most Violent Race

List of wars by death toll with over 1,000,000 deaths [edit]

War	Death Range	Geometric Mean	Date	Location
World War II	40,000,000–85,000,000	58,309,519	1939–1945	Worldwide	see World War II casualties
Mongol conquests	40,000,000–70,000,000	52,915,026	1206–1324	Eurasia	[1][2][3][4] – excludes the (up to) 2 Mongol expansion
Taiping Rebellion	20,000,000–100,000,000	44,721,360	1850–1864	China	[5][6]
Three Kingdoms War	36,000,000–40,000,000	37,947,332	184–280	China	[7][8]
Conquest of the Americas	8,400,000–137,750,000	34,016,173	1492–1691	Americas	[9][10][11] See Population history due to lack of consensus as to th some say might never be accura
Second Sino-Japanese War	25,000,000	25,000,000	1937–1945	China	[16] – Part of World War II
Qing dynasty conquest of Ming Dynasty	25,000,000	25,000,000	1616–1662	China	[17]
Spanish conquest of Mexico	24,300,000	24,300,000	1519–1632	Mexico	[18] – Part of Conquest of the Am
An Lushan Rebellion	13,000,000–36,000,000	21,633,308	755–763	China	[19]
World War I/Great War	20,000,000	20,000,000	1914–1918	Worldwide	see World War I casualties
Dungan Revolt	8,000,000–20,770,000	12,880,308	1862–1877	China
Conquests of Tamerlane	8,000,000–20,000,000	12,649,111	1370–1405	Eurasia	[20][21]

8 out of 12 of the world's most destructive conflicts did not feature European oppressors at all!

Cultural Marxists, feminists, and other poorly informed left-wing freaks love to keep espousing that white males have historically been the most "violent" or the most "oppressive" race of men on the planet. However, this is entirely untrue.

It is in fact Asians who have been responsible for the lion's share of the highest death toll conflicts in human history, and the Japanese, Mongols, and Chinese are well represented in the four most deadly.

But when is the leftist media and education system ever going to teach you about the Taiping Rebellion, the conquests of Tamerlane, or the Mongol hordes and the Japanese Empire's rampant "rape culture"?

NEVER. It doesn't fit their white browbeating agenda. They'll just keep "wagging the Nazi" forever and ever, and continue trying to espouse the endless virtues of the pre-Columbian Meso-Americans (who loved child buggery and human sacrifice) at the expense of their European conquerors.

4. NOT Being The World's Most Racist People

The fake news media continues to push garbage claims that whites are uniquely racist above all others. On an even more ridiculous note, they may even claim that non-whites can't be racist at all, because the world is a "white supremacy". This is not true in the slightest (and cue the eye rolling).

White majority countries all across the world are the most tolerant and the most accepting of living amongst people with different cultures and backgrounds, while countries in the Middle East and Southeast Asia are deemed the least accepting.

Furthermore, only white majority countries take in huge numbers of immigrants and refugees, while the wealthy Northeast Asian countries (Japan, South Korea, Taiwan) scoff at such humanitarianism.

Attention Liberals. No other countries on Earth are more accepting, tolerant, altruistic, or humanitarian than countries which are predominately run by white males.

5. Ending Slavery Worldwide

White Christian nations worked hard to end the enslavement of non-Muslims (including countless black Africans) in the 20th century Islamic world

Only white people have been slave owners, and only black Africans were their slaves right? WRONG.

Not only have left wingers and the mainstream media purposefully chosen to avoid any kind of discussion of the Arab slave trade (Muslims who enslaved millions of both whites and blacks well into the 20th century), but white males made more contributions to ending slavery across the world than any other group of people.

Britain abolished slavery throughout the British Empire with the Slavery Abolition Act 1833, the French colonies abolished it in 1848, and the U.S. abolished slavery in 1865 with the 13th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Brazil was the last European colony to do so in 1888.

Compare that to the far East, where chattel slavery was a legal part of Chinese culture until 1910.

Additionally, slavery continued in much of the Islamic world well into the 20th century. It was gradually outlawed and suppressed in Muslim lands largely due to pressure exerted from western nations like Britain and France.

Among the last states to abolish slavery were Saudi Arabia and Yemen, which both abolished slavery in 1962 while under considerable pressure from Britain, in addition to Oman in 1970. Unfortunately, slavery still continues under the radar in some Muslim countries like Mauritania.

Where is 'Black Lives Matter' on that one? Or is it only ok when black Muslims are enslaving other black Muslims?

6. Having A Great Stiff Upper Lip

Finally, despite all the humiliation, browbeating, and derision that white males experience in the 21st century west, they maintain a great 'stiff upper lip'.

The expression describes someone who displays great fortitude in the face of adversity, and exercises restraint in letting their negative emotions get the best of them. And that is exactly what red pilled and non-cuckolded white men do.

Despite knowing that popular culture, hiring practices, and so many different media outlets and national institutions are 100% against our well being, 99.99% of white men do not raise hell or start riots. We do not shoot five black police officers if one of them kills "one of ours". We do not start million strong "White Men's Marches" like idiot feminists (and their beta cucks) who think they're rights are being trampled.

No, we will continue to move forward in life with a stoic pride, with stoicism best described as > the path to happiness for humans is found in accepting that which we have been given in life, by not allowing ourselves to be controlled by our desire for pleasure or our fear of pain, by using our minds to understand the world around us and to do our part in nature's plan, and by working together and treating others in a fair and just manner.

So in closing, I hope this article has given you the much needed motivation to conquer life in the best way you can despite the all-seeing eye of the Frankfurt School working against white-men-who-like-women. Don’t let the bastards knock you down.

Read More: How Girl Power Is Ruining Western Culture

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

10 Potential Attacks That Can Defeat Cultural Marxism In Academia

February 24, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

In a seminal article on the freudo-Marxian origins of current leftist cultural hegemony, paleoconservative William S. Lind asked how we could answer it. He put forth two strategies: either we "retake the existing institutions from cultural Marxists" or we "separate ourselves and our families from the institutions the cultural Marxists control and build new institutions for ourselves." The second strategy, Lind said, was more promising: cultural Marxists can defend their strongholds well, efficiently punishing intellectual dissent and discriminating on ideological grounds whereas new institutions would let us free to pursue our own plans.

This was in 2007. Ten years later, time has passed, masks fell off, some road has been covered. Most of the Republican establishment came across as a bunch of sellouts, running donations campaigns so that they could maintain their lifestyle in NY or

Washington while their fellow citizens were dispossessed and exploited.

A variety of dissenting currents, ranging from the 14/88 to the most moderate MRAs, succeeded at gaining cultural weight and unmasking the so-called progressives and minoritists for the destructive dictators they are. Alternative media became an institution of its own. Mainstream media, in contrast, destroyed their own credibility by melting down hysterically around Trump.

Yet, the media are not enough: treating news entertains our outlook and sharpens our awareness, but academia is a higher institution that controls the back shop of culture. At one moment or another, it has to be retaken. (Or someone creates a red pill version of the Bob Jones University.)

Granted, North American colleges turned into a big scam and SJW factories. But it isn't bound to be always like that. The sheer existence of critical academics, from Nassim Taleb to Kevin MacDonald and Neven Sesardic, the persistence of politically incorrect studies in genetics and psychology, show that openly red-pilled scholars can survive in the academia provided they are based enough.

If you already are in the academia, and manage to find a teacher whose mind is open enough, you could pursue an indirect strategy by orientating your research towards seemingly innocuous but actually relevant topics. This would contribute to get back to the truth, to common sense, and undermine the narrative—which is still possible if done in accordance with the insular scholarly etiquette.

1. The representations or discourses about the middle classes

Marxists historically hate the middle classes. They considered the backbone of the society as "bourgeois", that is, egotistic and "oppressive." Their project of a classless society implicated the destruction of independent, self-owned men.

After the first World War, when Marxism and radical Leftism were one cultural agent among others, many academics were sympathetic to the middle class. An article from 1925, describing how much tradesmen and employees were hurt by inflation, fixed salaries, and Bolshevist unrest, shows open kindness for its matter. Other works quoted in the article do the same.

Now compare this with that stance:

> The great enemy of a genuine revolution is, not capitalism itself, but its by-product, its bastard offspring, the middle class; and as long as the middle class remains intact in Europe, a revolution is not possible. (Gregory Zilboorg, The passing of the old order in Europe, pp.184-6)

The historical hatred of petit bourgeois had a lasting effect upon the Leftist counter-culture and eventually on culture as a whole. As many teachers enjoy working on ideas or representations, these ones could be studied from a distanced point of view. It would give us all some ammunition against the sticky "middle classes are shit" atmosphere.

2. The "little whites"

Once upon a time, only a very tiny minority of whites would live in mobile homes, depend on welfare and spend their free time drinking beer and spitting. These, called derisively "white trash," would not elicit much compassion from the wider public. Today, most whites are undergoing economic dispossession, cultural upheaval against them, demographic replacement, and even physical assaults from non-white thugs and Leftists. You don't need to live in literal trash to now about that.

Good news, some have been giving scholarly attention to the matter and managed to get their effort published in books. Sympathetic authors include Wilmot Robertson (The Dispossessed Majority, 1972), Peter Brimelow (Alien Nation, 1995), Thilo Sarrazin (Germany Is Doing Away With Itself, 2010), and others. Antipathetic ones include J. D. Vance (Hillbilly Elegy: A Memoir of a Family and Culture in Crisis, 2016) and A. R. Hoschild, a Berkeley professor who wrote a condescending book about the small whites (Strangers in Their Own Land: Anger and Mourning on the American Right, 2016). The latter make normal people cringe, but they give an ideal point of departure to any work willing to tackle the issue and criticize the Leftist point of view.

3. “Precarious manhood” and MRA claims

Yes, the MRA often look like the symmetric of feminists. They tend to consider men as a class with particular interests—something akin to the feminist view of women as a class—and ask for “real equality” by pointing female privileges and how the System neglects men. Their tone can seem a bit whiny as they don’t insist much on personal improvement.

Yet, what they do is necessary and completes well our point of view: when we insist on how to improve ourselves and our lot, they put forth issues and a class solidarity we ought to use. We’ll put forth genuine sex roles after feminism is defeated. For now speaking the language of Leftism, through equality, privilege, power dynamics, and so on, will work much better in the academia. So, prepare yourself to speak sympathetically albeit abstractly, and start with J. Vandello’s notion of “precarious manhood”, not to mention some evolutionary psychology and economics, to rebut the misandric narrative.

4. Bourgeois bohemians

Mostly used in France today, the expression appeared in New York and was popularized by the book of a self-claimed bobo, David Brooks. Americans use expressions such as “urban elves” with the same meaning. In France, where the expression secured a sure place, establishment bobos kept shrieking that it was baseless and nebulous: most works published on it come from bobos claiming that “bobo” doesn’t mean anything, or that “bobo” is mostly used by “populists”, or that bobos are victims of undeserved hate. Nonetheless, the very attention they pay to the expression shows it is a thorn in their side.

Providing you substantiate the expression—I did a bit here and it isn’t hard to—, you could use Marxist tools of class analysis and discourse deconstruction to highlight how the bobo identity relates to discriminating against the working class. Using Leftist tools to attack the Leftist establishment class could be efficient and, for sure, ironic. Shouldn’t urban elves be more egalitarian and less discriminant against their hard-working, berated fellows after all?

5. Colonization and slavery

Léopoldville, Belgian Congo, prior to the 1960 separation

These ones have been massively used by cultural Marxists, then by muh race-baiting matters activists. Their very association is biased as it gives a picture linking slavery to white colonization. In truth, slavery has been practised almost universally: Africans have been enslaving each other since the dawn of times, Arabs used their knowledge of the desert to abduct blacks south of the Sahara—and they also enslaved many Europeans—, Mesoamerican empires enslaved smaller tribes, and so on. Europeans were by no means alone to practice slavery, and after they did, they were the first to actually end it.

Colonization is another matter. Motivated partly by the thirst to discover, partly by Enlightenment messianic secularism, and by intra-Western rows, it mostly consisted in developing natural wealth and building tons of infrastructures that bore by themselves no financial benefit. Serious historians showed colonization actually cost a lot to Western countries.

If one studies the matter aright, i.e. goes to real facts and detailed archives instead of pandering to the pathos-loaded pictures of race-baiters, one shall see the falsity of the latter' view. For example, Europeans were not abducting slaves: African tribes were enslaving each other and some tribes would sell their prisoners to shipowners with a huge benefit—African elites were the first to benefit from the Europeans' efforts.

Check Hugh Thomas' The Slave Trade: The Story of the Atlantic Slave Trade (1997), Paul Baepler's White Slaves, African Masters (1999), The Oxford History of the British Empire, the French historians Jacques Marseille and Bernard Lugan, and only later go back to the whiny anti-white literature prepared to dispel its clouds.

6. Politically incorrect thinkers

Think about Otto Weininger, Ernst Jünger, Oswald Spengler, Carl Jung, Carl Schmitt, René Guénon, Julius Evola, and many others. Even if you have to pay lip service to a seemingly negative or overcritical point of view, as to virtue-signal that you are distanced from them, speaking fairly about their thoughts and exploring the issues they raised is always interesting. It can help fostering an alternative to the Frankfurt School, the Foucaults and other far-Leftist current references.

7. Hooliganism

This one may be more appealing to European readers. For a long time, hooliganism, or the peculiar hobby of some soccer supporters, have been despised by the so-called intellectuals as brutish and “uneducated.” There is classism there, as despising hooliganism is a way to come across as more refined and intelligent than the seemingly stupid who fistfight over soccer teams.

But look at that: BDSM, once considered a kind of sick perversion of sexuality that shouldn’t be too publicized, have been picked up by academics. Along with other subcultures orbiting around “alternative” sexualities, sadomasochism became a research or rather overly abstract waffle subject. At a master course, I had to go through a 28-pages text glamorizing and intellectualizing the rather weird practices of Bob Flanagan, self-proclaimed “supermasochist” who hammered a nail into his penis and got literally marked with red iron by his dominative wife.

The same can be done with hooliganism. Time to intellectualize local soccer identification, risk-taking, codified brawls and whatever can be found in the hooligan subculture.

8. Marxism as reductionism

Anti-reductionism has become fashionable since the 2000s. It is mostly applied to science, but one can expand it as a critical tool against whatever thought that tries to boil down a complex world into a rather simplistic or one-sided framework. Economic Marxism tries to reduce history to “exploitation” of a class of individuals by another, reduces individuals into products of economic conjecture, imposes a gratuitous theory of progressive steps on history and negates nature. Cultural Marxism does mostly the same with other groups considered as classes.

These are quite reductionist, as we know when we start seeing the world on sides Marxists deny or reject as non-important. Thus, opposing “reductionism” allows for attacking Leftist theories and upholding the forgotten and irreducible reality.

9. Idols of the Enlightenment

Democracy, parliamentarism, “equality” (that means individuals reduced to abstract unities and thought of as essentially identical), nationhood as destructive of ethnicities and cultures, so-called progress or humanism, pleas for toleration addressed to others… Postmodernism already attacks these, but when it does, it mostly uses these as a proxy to attack Western culture, whites, families and social equilibrium. We can use the desacralization of modern idols to get rid of them: unconditional rights, for example, have only fostered disorders and chaos.

This one can be made through comparing what modern philosophers promised or wanted and what we actually have. For the latter element, take a look at the school of public choices or at works such as Frank Karsten’s critique of parliamentarian cronyism.

10. Intellectual diversity

When you start perceiving a hegemony and long for something different, you can say you want diversity. Leftists used this ploy to make society less and less ours, subvert normalcy, and push for our wholesale replacement. But as now they are hegemonic, in the sense that they decide what can be said and what cannot, and that they impose mainstream views and theories, we are those who long for something else, something non-Marxist, non-globalist, non-anti-white and anti-male.

If antiracism is a codeword for anti-white, intellectual diversity is a ticket to relax the hegemony and admit some genuine diversity of ideas among the academic. More and more people have openly asked for alternatives to stultifying Leftism. Now, intellectual diversity seems to have obtained support from Republican senators. Cases ought to be made in public. We want more alternatives considered in vivo and in journals. As universities pretend to commit to diversity, let's take them at their word and stand against ideological discrimination. Why no affirmative action for conservative scholars?

Conclusion

If you have no money, potential scholarship or opportunity at a college free of charge, doing your own thing apart from the academic system may be better. But if you have a knack for the scholarly world or are already there, consider how you could use your own specialization to push for truer or alternative views. We are the real silenced voices, we are the normal, the substance of civilization, and the most skilled to find out kernels of truths when not bludgeoned by political commissars.

This is, and ought to be, only the beginning.

Read Next: 7 Research Subjects That Became Taboo After Cultural Marxists Took Over

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

3 Disturbing Updates On The Pizzagate Scandal

February 25, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Just before Donald Trump's election, I wrote an article about Hillary Clinton and her circle's alleged involvement in a scandal that could include, but not restricted to, satanic ritual, child abuse, pedophilia, murder and organ trafficking.

It is not because Trump has won that I forgot the unsettling elements of this whole affair. I still believe that this amount of coincidences must be investigated and the authorities and media's stubbornness not to do so motivate me even more to put the pieces of the puzzle together.

This behaviour reminds us previous media and authority cover-ups such as the Jimmy Saville, Marc Durtroux or Rotherham scandals. Regarding Pizzagate, new elements have surfaced in this sordid case of paper-thin lies, Mafia-like exchange of favours and media omertà.

The video on WorldCorpo.net

John Podesta is the public figure with alleged incriminations to this case. Podesta himself attests that being of Greek and Italian descent, he has problems managing his anger, letting out his “evil twin” character “Skippy,” a violent persona through which he expresses his rage.

The Podesta email database released by Wikileaks confirms it, where staff and people surrounding Podesta that Skippy is “kept at bay” most of the time. Leftists outlets such as the Huffington Post confirm this fact.

[image]
One of the Podesta emails of Wikileaks

Mid-February, anons at Voat and 4chan unearthed a sketchy video found on WorldCorpo.net. It depicts a male figure in the dark, beating and abusing a crying child while he tries to escape from a confined space. Voice analysis and comparisons with public recordings lead many to believe that the male figure is John Podesta. We don’t know for sure.

Warning: The following is disturbing. I advise you NOT TO WATCH it if you have a weak stomach. The content will be described below

Podesta’s voice for comparison:

This was uploaded on Worldcorpo.net and left there. The child is being beaten and the adult abusing him forces him to say his name with the answer being “John.” Then he hits him or her again, asking the child to say his other name. The child seems to answer “Skippy.”

The lights on the glass are same colour as the strobe lights used during the concert of the band Heavy Breathing at Comet Ping Pong Pizza (C3P). Heavy Breathing have been involved neck deep in Pizzagate due to their strange art hinting at child abuse, pedophilia and innuendos used by its singer during concerts at C3P.

Was the music of the concert used to muffle the cries of the child?

This is what late Andrew Breitbart wrote about John Podesta. Breitbart died less than a month later

The new elements of the Comet Ping Pong "attack"

Edgar M. Welch, an actor with an IMDB entry, is the gunman that entered C3P on the 4th of December 2016, shot four rounds without aiming at anyone and immediately surrendered to the law. He is currently prosecuted but has surprisingly been offered a plea deal.

Independent researchers suggest that the goal was not to scare the owners and patrons as initially thought but to damage the hard drive of a computer, which allegedly contained incriminating files, while making Comet Ping Pong Pizza (C3P) look like the victim of “fake news” in the process.

Journalist and independent Pizzagate researcher David Seaman confirmed a hacker entered the C3P website which contained protected sections with downloadable files, needing a key to enable access.

He discovered that the files referred to as “cheese pizza” contained child pornography. No matter how incriminating, this element would be rejected in court as it was obtained illegally. It would also be illegal to store those pedo-pornographic images even to show them as evidence to the authorities.

The important is not what you know to be true, but what you can prove.

Jake Tapper, the uber-shill

A few months ago, Jake Tapper was just another biased presenter at CNN. But his peculiar animosity towards anything Pizzagate-related is what made him suspicious in the eyes of independent researchers.

All went head over biscuit when he got in a Twitter row with General Flynn’s son

Michael G Flynn @mflynnJR · 11h

Until #Pizzagate proven to be false, it'll remain a story. The left seems to forget #PodestaEmails and the many "coincidences" tied to it.

Why would Tapper get so angry? Maybe because according to an article his wife has given to the Washingtonian, her "favourite date-night restaurant is Buck's Fishing and Camping" and one of her favourite "family restaurant is Comet Ping Pong," both owned by James Alefantis, a key character in the PizzaGate affair

Alefantis, a friend of the Podestas and the Clintons, was invited a few times to the White House for no reason and is said to be one the fifty most influential persons in Washington D.C. Even if he is a pizza shop owner (do not use Google to find a link to Comet Ping Pong. They are pushing hard so that the first 20+ results shown are from Salon, Snopes, Vox, Buzzfeed all brand the affair as "fake news").

[image]
Extract of the interview that Jennifer Tapper gave to The Washingtonian

Jack Tapper also has a lot of correspondence with John Podesta, the main protagonist in Pizzagate.

[image]
John Podesta and Jack Tapper, fooling around in the mini Oval Office designed for children

Tapper flips his lid and cries conspiracy and thoughtcrime when anyone mentions Pizzagate and the mountain of evidence that should justify a federal investigation. But he suddenly cares for the children when he leads the charge of the MSM on Milo when they used tailored segments of his expressed opinions (words and words only) in order to start a witch hunt and possibly destroy his life.

Milo was one of the most vocal on Pizzagate before pressure from Washington made him cancel his lectures on the subject at the last minute. Funny how double standards always come in handy with liberals.

The silencing of Ben Swann

Ben Swann of CBS is one of the only reporters of the Mainstream Media that had the minerals to tackle and fact check the Pizzagate. Shortly after his famous segment, he was taken off the air by the channel, leaving thousands wondering why he vanished after airing such a viral story.

His employers were compelled to put him back on the air, not to seem too suspicious. It is unclear if he is presently still employed by them. All Swann was guilty of is stating facts available to the public on air. A crime by today's Mainstream Media standard.

That is not all. Swann had to shut down all of his social media platforms after that show. The only he has left is his Facebook page, still closely following the whole situation. The "Tzuday" mocked by MSM and branded as a spelling mistake might be a subtle allusion to Sun Tzu's "Art of War". We may not have seen the last of Ben Swann…

Powerful circles protect them

Do not forget that an animal is most dangerous when cornered. The guys at the top are in full panic mode and are throwing everything they have in the battle.

Heads that have rolled so far: Ben Swann, Milo, Flynns (father and son)

The cogs of this evil machine may squeal but they have very powerful friends to protect them. Remember that the events regarding Pizzagate are almost all concentrated in the Washington area?

This is the D.C Police Chief Peter Newsham (right), publicly supporting turd burglar James Alefantis of C3P, owner of these posts on his Instagram account, which hint at what is going on behind the scene at his pizzeria. Newsham has been accused of "mishandling" the rape case rape of an 11y.o. girl.

Move along, people. Nothing to see here.

On est jamais si bien servi que par soi-même

Voices come from all sides that this must be properly investigated but no one, even at the top, wants to open this can of worms. Trump has got a lot on his plate now. He named Jeff Sessions as Attorney General and we can already witness that all around the country, arrests are being made and things are put in motion. But is the rot in the American political body too deep for it to be saved?

My gut tells me that it is soon about to kick off and time will tell if The Donald will finally release the hounds of war. But in the meantime, it is up to us, citizens, to do the dirty job of seeking truth. Bear in mind that it comes at a price.

Read More: Is Hillary Clinton's Entourage Involved In A Satanic Pedophile Ring?

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Takedown Of Milo Yiannopoulos

February 25, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Milo Yiannopoulos, outrageous Trump supporter and free speech advocate, resigned from his putative job as technology editor for online news site Breitbart, after a flood of suspiciously timed attacks. What's interesting about this story is not the man himself, but the coordinated efforts to attack and silence him. While the man himself is not particularly important to the story, a brief introduction is needed.

Who Is Milo?

Yiannopoulos appeared on the national scene some time last year, and quickly gained notoriety for his controversial views, becoming wildly popular among a certain portion of the American conservative movement. His rapid rise to pseudo-fame and his background are a bit suspicious.

Indeed if it was discovered the half Jewish, flamboyant, gay character was a plant by elites to further accelerate the degeneracy in the culture wars, I would not raise an eyebrow. He's an odd and suspicious public character, reminiscent of Sacha Baron Cohen's Bruno. The fact that college Republicans throughout America cheered this bizarre man who wears flashy jewelry and indoor sunglasses, while making crude references to African male penises, and viewed him as their political hero, is confusing and odd, to say the least.

Milo is no more absurd than Bruno. Is he even real?

Amongst the oddities are that while he was purportedly a “technology editor” for an alt-right political website, I never once heard him speak of technology, or saw any technology articles penned by him or anyone else on the site; if there are any technology articles even present at Breitbart, they are not readily apparent by browsing the front page or any of the “trending now” topics on the site. And the website is known for reporting Republican-leaning news and politics—why someone would turn to them for technology news is anyone’s guess.

Either Sad Desperation or An Obvious Plant

Yiannopoulos is openly gay, in a way that would make even mainstream liberals from 15 years ago wince. He’s not just openly gay, but enjoys public vulgar, perverse, gross descriptions about the type of homosexual acts he enjoys and glorifies promiscuity and his crude sexual preferences. His college tour of 2016 was named the “Dangerous Faggot” tour, and he was somehow able to get college Republicans—the stuck up types who wear LL Bean and sport Richard Spencer haircuts and play polo on the weekends—to cheer and howl at him as he was carried into the room like royalty by bare chested muscular men.

How cucked must one be to carry in a gay man on a throne?

Yiannopoulos first came to my attention in a talk at University Massachusetts Amherst, where he, first wave feminist Christina Sommers, and an angry Steven Crowder gave birth to the wildebeest known as Trigglypuff. When a feminist, a faggot, and a Youtuber who dresses in drag are too right wing for the college kids to handle, you know we have reached peak stupid.

6/10 on 2017 US scale, WNB

Gamergate, Feminism, and Free Speech

Yiannopoulos is intelligent and well spoken, but these two things are not enough to deserve the level of attention and power he received.

He has attacked Gamergate, fourth wave feminism, Islam, social justice, political correctness, the rape culture myth, and has advocated for free speech. He was banned from Twitter last year after aggressively criticizing the female Ghostbusters flop. And in February, 2017, two years after taking a job there, he either resigned or was forced out of his purported real job, as technology editor of Breitbart.

The truth is true regardless who says it.

What's suspicious and disturbing is not that that this man's 15 minutes of fame are up. While I did chuckle at hearing him present the entirety of a speech in 3 words: "Feminism. Is. Cancer." and seeing the rage he would trigger in obese, shrapneled and graffiti-ed husks of SJWs, I'm happy enough if I never see or hear him again. I'm curious who funded all these campus visits, and if the man is even truly gay, or is just using an absurd caricature in order to make even more absurd and degenerate statements. But the real story here is a closely coordinated attack against the man that suddenly hit over President's Day weekend.

I suddenly feel the urge to purge.

The Hammer Comes Down

He had been granted a $250,000 advance for a forthcoming book, had finished his campus tour, and was at the nadir of his fame, when suddenly his book deal was cancelled, his job terminated, his invitation to speak at the American Conservative Union's annual CPAC convention was revoked, and he was accused of being a pedophile. And the reason for this outrage was a typical (for him) comment he made in a youtube video over a year ago. The timing and the faux outrage make little sense.

What $250,000 looks like

How Shocked Could One Really Be?

This is a man who does not hide his perverse and disgusting views. He openly talks about graphic sexual things, that of course are totally inappropriate if one is a straight male, but in this politically correct atmosphere his gay victim card allowed him to regularly discuss his craving of black men's privates, thanking the man who took his virginity for giving him excellent fellatio skills, and advocacy of a hypersexual promiscuous lifestyle of drugs and sex.

He regularly refers to Donald Trump as "Daddy" in a not-so-thinly veiled sexual reference, has an "anti-white bedroom policy," travels to college campuses teaching children about his "Faggotry" and compared Ghostbusters actress Leslie Jones to an ape.

And yet the powers that be suddenly converged over President's Day weekend, right after Yiannopoulos appeared live on HBO's Real Time program with a viewership of over 2 million, to revoke his pussy pass. Was the appearance on mainstream cable TV going too far? Were the powers that be scared that he had been too successful with the media access they had granted him? Was this merely at attack on anyone affiliated with the alt-right, the new enemy of Republicans and Democrats alike?

Speaking truths like this is truly Dangerous

I can't explain his character assassination any more than I can explain his appearance in the first place. But I do know the magical convergence of Simon & Schuster book executives, CPAC convention planners, his bosses at Breitbart, and the mainstream media who coordinated a pedophilia attack piece on him, simultaneously over a 24 hour period, stinks worse than the rear end of a man who does all the sick things Milo advocates.

A Sudden Change Of Heart

The idea that Simon & Schuster execs suddenly decided that this Dangerous Faggot is too sexual for them, and they will just forfeit the quarter million dollars they fronted him because he mentioned some gay perversity that made them uncomfortable, is ridiculous.

The title of his book was "Dangerous" and it came on the heels (or shall we say rumps) of the Dangerous Faggot tour, from a guy who openly praises interracial gay promiscuous sex. But suddenly these execs grew a conscience over President's Day weekend, and decided that their earlier decision to front him a quarter million dollars before he even began his book, was in hindsight a bad idea for an unproven writer, and that they should just scrap the whole project and perhaps start a new policy to be a little less generous on six figure book advances to controversial unproven authors.

The American Conservative Union has already had Milo speak at their CPAC convention before, and had invited him to return in 2017. But again, they had the same epiphany over President's Day weekend, perhaps as they reminisced over President Thomas Jefferson having interracial relations with a slave, or on the accomplishments of our first interracial President Obama, that they simply couldn't take another popular speech from the charismatic interracial-sex advocating Faggot.

And Breitbart, who has exactly one employee that anyone can name (Milo) decided that while they had no problem employing him during his two years of open faggotry and debauchery, that after President's Day it was now bad for their image and they are going to stick to hiring people who more fit the image of a College Republican.

Then I told him we'd have to cancel his book because he's too provocative!

Sexual Preference For Younger Men

What is the absurd reason these groups all give for suddenly having a change of heart? After celebrating their President's Day parade, followed by a humble pie eating contest, they all must have logged on to Youtube at the same moment and looked up a year old video where Yiannopoulos talked about the age of sexual consent laws (16 in the UK and 16-18 in the USA) and how they are "about right" in his mind.

If you're not triggered yet, the outrage is supposed to occur because he is insinuating that many men prefer to have sex with those at the younger range of the legal age. And just as we are attacked at ROK by repeating this biological fact about younger adult women, Milo is attacked when making it about adult gay men.

He's not even stating that he prefers young men! Only that as a whole, younger sexual partners are preferred in many relationships. This is not rocket science.

Yiannopoulos also made some cringe-inducing statements about "men and boys" getting together, but later clarified that he shouldn't have used the word "boys," as that is gay slang that can easily be misinterpreted (when I refer to picking up girls, I don't mean schoolgirls), and reinforced he believes more or less in the current ages of consent.

People are not human, and make mistakes all the time, including in their speech. I'm in favor of giving people the opportunity to explain their ideas, rather than staunchly defend every statement that they have ever made. For example, I do not think for a minute that President Obama believes there are 57 U.S. States.

So one can choose to believe Milo is being honest, and that he prefers adult homo relationships with black gay men. Or one can believe he is lying and secretly wants to diddle children. Or one can not care about this degenerate and his message. But to me, he does come across as rather genuine in his convictions, so I'll go with the former option, with a hearty mix of the latter–not caring about this degenerate and his message.

And anyway, nothing he said was more disturbing as his typical shtick. He said far more disturbing things in his appearance on Joe Rogan Experience #702 in September 2015, which racked up over one million views.

Lena Dunham, WNB

Despite the hypocrisy of Lena Dunham, who falsely accused a man of rape and published a book where she admitted to sexually assaulting and committing incest with her sister, the media says not a word about her but attacks and falsely accuses Milo, a victim of sexual assault who has identified 3 sexual predators to authorities, (as he rightly points out, 3 more than most of his critics) for merely discussing the idea of sexual relations and sexual assault.

Victim Cards Don't Matter

Milo appeared bulletproof. He held so many victim cards. Immigrant. Mixed race background (English/Greek). Single parent upbringing. Gay. Literal (Hitler) victim of sexual assault. And yet in the end he was attacked anyway, and not for plagiarism or fraud or financial crimes. He was attacked for the very thing that anyone who has ever heard of him already knows about him. That he holds some degenerate sexual beliefs.

The fact that Milo advocates for victims of sexual crimes matters not. Roosh could volunteer at a Rape Crisis Center every night and spend his evenings creating pamphlets teaching men how to ask for consent before flirting with women, and it wouldn't have made anyone think twice about creating false rape allegations to attack him. There is no moral center for these people.

In the end, I don't hold much sympathy for the guy himself. If he made money, he made it primarily through this new financial economy where being famous is a career, and one operates at the whims of the powers that be. If he has talent other than being a well educated, well spoken degenerate, then he should have no trouble making a fine life for himself. And he has enough notoriety that he should continue to benefit from the fame game that should allow him to bed whomever it is he likes to bed.

He likely knew this false economy could come crashing down at any moment, and perhaps he saw this and actually resigned of his own accord, before the inevitable firing.

If he has anything interesting to say, other than mocking and deriding SJWs, he can say it without Simon and Schuster. But regardless of what happens to this man, this is a further chapter in the book of crooked and controlled media and power interests. Trust nothing from these charlatans.

Read More: Why Are Men Paying New Car Prices For Used Women?

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

How To Increase Your Willpower

February 26, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Willpower. It's long been alleged that it's something that you either have, or you don't: a few blessed individuals are born with steely determination and indomitable spirits, while the rest of the unwashed masses are willowy, wishy-washy reeds in the wind who will break under the slightest prevarication!

Both of these theses are absolutely wrong. I've said it many times before, and I will undoubtedly say it again: when it comes to training, you can train a hell of a lot more than just your skeletal muscles. And as you could probably figure out, I believe willpower to be one of those attributes that can be trained.

A Few Notes On Willpower

The overall idea I will be conveying to you today is that willpower is, for all intents and purposes, a non-physical "muscle" that can be trained, just as the muscles of your legs and arms can be trained. And much like those corporeal muscles, willpower can be "depleted"—i.e., you can be made to be less willing to do difficult things and endure pain over the course of the day.

People in the past understood that this was something to be trained, but for whatever reason this knowledge was forgotten over time. Some (such as the Art of Manliness) believe that the rise of consumer culture and the whole "follow your bliss" ideal created a culture of people that "go with the flow" and feel that the very act of doing something you don't want to do is "fascist." Whether that is the case or not, one does have to acknowledge that people just seem a lot “flimsier” today—mentally and physically.

So now that we have already established that willpower is a “muscle” that can be trained, the overarching question is: what exercises can be done to train the willpower?

Willpower Training Exercises

To put it very simply, the only way to train willpower is to force yourself into any habit or exercise that demands concentration and self control.

That statement may seem uselessly vague to you, so let me put it another way: By forcing yourself out of your mental and physical “comfort zone,” you will automatically be training your willpower. And by that, I mean doing ANYTHING that forces you out of your comfort zone will strengthen your resolve and willpower!

Before you jump to any conclusions, let me say that: while doing big, life-threatening things will certainly put your willpower to the test, you absolutely do not need to start with them! A newbie in the gym doesn’t slap three plates onto the bar and do an ass to grass squat, correct? So why should you expect some dork who’s never done anything difficult in his life to suddenly pack everything up and go climb a mountain?

Just as the gym novice starts with light weights and builds his strength up to tackle the heavier weights, so too does a willpower novice begin with small, mundane things before truly testing his will.

I find that the easiest exercise to do to train willpower is to change some minor habit. Getting rid of a bad habit is the best, but even changing one behavior to a nigh-identical one trains the willpower. Something such as brushing your teeth with the opposite hand, going out of your way to organize a shelf or take out the garbage when you don’t want to, or deliberately focusing on your posture throughout the day will all serve to make your willpower stronger.

To cite an example of myself, I used to have a problem with biting my nails. Deliberate concentration on the matter led me to stop this bad habit, which I haven’t done since I was in high school. Similarly, through deliberate concentration on it I conquered another bad habit I had, that of “jimmy legs.”

In addition to strengthening your willpower in the short term, these deliberate concentrations of willpower will eventually become rote habits. And since things you do mechanically do not require a deliberate use of willpower, this will free up your “reserves” of willpower to tackle another problem you have.

Subjecting yourself to a small bit of pain every day is also a way to train this nonphysical “muscle”-try listening to music you hate or watching a TV show you don’t like for a few minutes, each day, a little more at a time. If you can endure its inanity, you will have undoubtedly made your will stronger. Or, if you find yourself having an itch somewhere on your body, resisting the urge to scratch it is a great method of training.

Should you desire to set some time aside to deliberately strengthen the willpower, here’s an exercise I devised:

Just stand perfectly still and don't move. Don't scratch any itches or adjust your clothes or anything. Just hold that position and stay stock still, don't even move your eyes from whatever it is they're looking at. Start with a 10 minute hold, and increase the time bit by bit. The best part is, you don't need a recovery period to train this like you do with your muscles—you can do it every day.

Speaking of physical training, the easiest way to train willpower is to train the physical body, as training the physical will automatically train the mental. In particular, static holds are tailor made to train the willpower, as they all involve the repeated addition of greater and greater intervals of time-whether it be the splits, the L-Sit, the horse stance, or other positions I have previously discussed. But truly, just following a set routine of working out every week will do wonders for your will.

Me doing an L-Sit

And don't think that the practice of game won't increase willpower either. Working up the courage to approach that 10/10 girl will force you to exert your will over yourself, and hopefully over her as well. And, just as I've been saying, forcing yourself to repeatedly leave your comfort zone will eventually EXPAND your comfort zone, making those previously scary things a walk in the park and leaving you game to conquer the next beast.

If you're reading this article, I'll assume you're training either your body or your seduction skills. Either way, you're already doing a primitive sort of willpower training. To make your willpower even stronger, get out of your comfort zone at least once a day, attack any of your bad habits and replace them with good ones, and you'll see your mental capacity increase.

Read More: How To Balance Intense Physical Training With Living Life

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

5 Examples Of CNN's "Fake News"

February 26, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Recently there's been a lot of talk about whether or not the media has our best interests at heart, and with more and more men awakening from the feminist matrix, it seems that the mainstream media is going the way of the dinosaur.

Donald Trump has been urging the public not to trust the mainstream media, but I'm sure that if you're a reader of Return Of Kings, you don't need him to tell you that. The modern mainstream media is basically the same thing as the Church was in the 1200's—they control the flow of information, and they don't like it when people disagree with them. In fact, if someone who disagrees with them gets popular enough, they often times resort to smear campaigns (see: smearing Roosh as a manipulative pickup artist, and Milo as a pedophile apologist).

Now, I know what you're thinking—"I know the media doesn't report on things, Jon, but fake news? That's, like, intentionally lying and manipulating information, isn't it?" Yes, sir, it is—and this is what the mainstream media, particularly CNN, has been doing ever since television became popular.

Here's 5 examples of how CNN is, in fact, "fake news":

1. Kicking Bernie Sanders Off-Air

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=BWQcxUlYUcQ

Bernie Sanders, the unofficial leader of the socialist movement in America, recently called CNN "fake news," before being kicked off the air. CNN tried to play this off as a "connection issue," but anyone with a grain of common sense knows better.

> Bernie: "…who is the head of Russia, and now we're learning that there may > have been discussions between Flynn and the Russians, about sanctions, before this administration took power. So this is very, very troubling, and I think the president is going to have to tell us what he's gonna do about it."

>
> CNN Anchor: "So far he hasn't said much…he was asked about Flynn on his flight to Mar-a-Lago late today…here's how he responded:
>
> [plays clip of Donald Trump denying obvious lie directed towards him]
>
> CNN Anchor: "He says he hasn't seen any of these reports. Is that a problem?"
>
> Bernie: "Well, I don't know, maybe he was watching CNN Fake News, what do you think?"
>
> Bernie: [sees her offended look] "It was a joke."
>
> CNN Anchor: "You don't buy what he said, obviously?"
>
> Bernie: "Erin?"
>
> Bernie: "Kevin, I'm not—are we on?"
>
> CNN Anchor: "Umm, it looks like we've lost connection with Senator Sanders…"

Right, of course. You just happened to "lose connection," with Senator Sanders conveniently right after he called you fake news.

2. "Racism" Is Why Adele Won Grammy

After Adele won the song of the year, record of the year, and best solo pop performance awards, it wasn't long before CNN charged in to proclaim that "racism," was the cause. CNN "reports":

> …"but with its racial themes and imagery, some are questioning if the > project was "just too black" for Grammy voters. Kevin Powell, author of the memoir "The Education of Kevin Powell" and a forthcoming biography on rapper Tupac Shakur, thinks so. He told CNN "Beyonce's 'Lemonade' made a lot of people uncomfortable, because it is so political, so spiritual, so unapologetically black, and so brutally honest about love, self-love, trust, betrayal."

Right, because apparently Beyonce, despite being nominated for 62 Grammy awards, and winning a whopping 22 Grammy awards, is being discriminated against. In the Leftist's delusional reality, any time a white person succeeds, it's due to "racism," yet any time a black person succeeds, it's due to "overcoming insurmountable odds."

Give me a break. Adele won the Grammy, because the panel thought her songs were better, period. This has nothing to do with racism, but apparently CNN still thinks it's a good idea to race-bait the hell out of current events in 2017. I don't see this changing anytime soon, either.

3. Venezuela Bans CNN For Lies

According to Fox News World, the president of Venezuela actually asked CNN to leave:

> "CNN, do not get into the affairs of Venezuelans. I want CNN well away from here—outside of Venezuela. Do not put your nose in Venezuela." -Nicolas Maduro …and can you blame him? CNN has repeatedly shown how ridiculously biased they are, and they've shown how willing to lie they are, for the past year after running a gigantic smear campaign against Donald Trump.

Didn't CNN claim that The Donald had a 3% chance of being elected president? What did they do, just poll the gender studies department at UC Berkeley? I wouldn't be surprised if they did, because nobody in their right mind would ever accidentally come to the conclusion that our current president had a 3% chance of winning.

In fact, other independent journalists such as Mike Cernovich actually predicted that Donald would win months before the election day in November—how? Because they saw the trends. They saw that men were tired of being emasculated and having their lives ruined, they saw that we're tired of being shamed for our whiteness, and they saw that the people of America were starting to wake up from their NWO conditioning.

4. "Our Job Is To Control Exactly What People Think."

Yeah, yeah—I know this one isn't CNN, but they're all the same to me. MSNBC, NBC, CBS, ABC, CNN, and even Fox News to an extent…they're all just different heads on the same globalist-controlled hydra. Buckle in though, boys, because this one's pretty bad…and it just happened days ago.

Mika Brzezinski, whose name should automatically create suspicion in the wary citizen, recently stated on MSNBC that it's "our job," to "control exactly what people think." I honestly couldn't even make this stuff up, but if you don't believe me, you can watch it in the video above.

> Mika Brzezinski: "Well, I think the dangerous edges here are that he's trying to undermine the media, trying to make up his own facts, and it could be that while unemployment and the economy worsens, he could have undermined the messaging so much that he could control exactly what people think…and that is our job."

No, Mika, that isn't your job. Your job is to report the facts and let THE PEOPLE decide what to think, but if you can't get that through your thick skull I guess we'll just stop watching your crappy network.

5. Donald Trump Calls CNN "Fake News"

Ah, I saved the best for last—I do love me some Donald burns. After a CNN "news reporter" tried to aggressively ask Donald a question for some odd 20 seconds, repeatedly interrupting him and interjecting his way into the conversation, Donald lost it and called him "fake news."

And who could blame him? They spent the last 8 months doing absolutely everything within their power to completely ruin Donald Trump's chances at winning…and yet, by the grace of God, and by the memes of Pepe, lord of Keks, the Trump train smashed its way through the entire god damn establishment…and won.

> Trump: [to other reporter] "Go ahead."
>
> CNN Fake News: "MR. PRESIDENT SINCE YOU'RE ATTACKING US CAN YOU GIVE US A QUESTION!"
>
> Trump: [to CNN] "No."
>
> Trump: [to other reporter]: "Go ahead."
>
> CNN Fake News: "MR. PRESIDENT ELECT! MR. PRESIDENT ELECT! SINCE YOU ARE > ATTACKING OUR NEWS ORGANIZATION,”

> Trump: [to CNN] “No, not you.”
> Trump: [to other reporter] “Go ahead.”
> CNN Fake News: “CAN YOU GIVE US A QUESTION,”
> Trump: [to CNN] “Not you.”
> CNN Fake News: “GIVE US A CHANCE! MR PRESIDENT”
> Trump: [to CNN] “Your organization’s terrible.”
> CNN Fake News: “CAN YOU GIVE US A CHANCE, JUST LET US ASK…”
> Trump: [to CNN] “Your organization’s terrible.”
> CNN Fake News: “LET US ASK A QUESTION, SIR! SIR!”
> Trump: [to CNN] “Quiet.”

This goes on for literally 25 seconds, before Trump finally becomes visibly angry and proclaims:

> Trump: [to CNN] “You are fake news.”

If the President of the United States of America thinks that CNN is fake news, I think they’re probably fake news.

Summary

In conclusion, if you still watch the mainstream media, don't. Get your news from real news sites, like Return Of Kings, Info Wars, Gateway Pundit, Drudge Report, and Cernovich. The MSM has shown us multiple times in the past that they're globalist whores, selling out the American public to fatten their own pockets.

I recently bought an Info Wars shirt to start wearing around in public, and the results have restored my faith in America. Everywhere I wear it, I've gotten complements—it's not that often, but you'd be surprised how many men are awake, but just don't broadcast it.

The MSM would have you believe that 99% of the American public hates Trump, but it's really only something like 10% who hate him, and maybe 25% more who dislike him.

I usually wear Info Wars, Breitbart, and Trump apparel to the gym, because most guys who have a shredded six pack from lifting heavy ass weights are strong and masculine, and are therefore not subject to stupid social pressures that the media uses to influence you.

Do your part in spreading the good gospel of the manosphere, the alt-news, and the resurgence of America, and we'll reclaim our country for sure. Let's all make America great again.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 10 Recent Examples of Fake News From The "Real News" Media

Jon Anthony

Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

8 Common Misconceptions About Anarchism

February 27, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Few weeks ago, I published an article calling for the political independence of America and I was pleased to see that many people were open to the idea, so I have decided that the readers are ready to explore the source of this philosophy: anarchism.

Ever since I took the black pill of anarchism, I haven't been able to see the political world the same way. All that I've accepted as normal, all the power structures that I saw as both legitimate and inevitable, and my perception of personal freedom and autonomy were all flipped upside down. I realized that it was either anarchism or slavery—there is no other option.

So for those who are curious, here are eight points to guide you through one of the most misunderstood ideology for freedom.

1. Anarchism isn't what you think it is

No, this crazy feminist puke is not an anarchist. She probably doesn't even have a clue what anarchism means.

As soon as the average person hears the word "anarchist," the first image he conjures in his head is that of unemployed losers dressed in black, who are causing trouble for no good reason. This is unfortunately part true as the anarchist ideology has been hijacked by the leftists who turned it into a movement of their own (Ted Kaczynski made a prescient warning about this in his manifesto, Industrial Society and its Future). This was also the reason why I've been reluctant to take anarchism seriously for the longest time.

While I'm not a fan of saying "They're not real _____!," the case must be made against the fake anarchists of today who are giving the entire ideology a bad name. The fact is, while anarchism at its core is about the abolition of state power (and all other forms of rule from above) in favor of total freedom and self-determination, these leftists thugs, like the Antifa, are more interested in combating those whom they consider "fascists."

And who is a fascist? Someone who rejects the ideals of globalism and equalism promoted by the establishment. So what we have with the leftist "anarchists" are bunch of goons who act as the unwitting foot-soldiers of the elites by fighting against the anti-establishment groups who may be more anarchist than they are. These leftists dregs are no more anarchist than some African dictatorship is a "republic."

2. Anarchism is not about total chaos and disorder

The best way to think of anarchism is to see it as a push for a total decentralization and full local autonomy rather than some nightmare scenario Thomas Hobbes liked to imagine. Anarchism is not about no rule, but self rule. This means no government interference, no coercion of any sort by the state, and no policing of your innate freedom.

The only rules you abide by are the ones you and your community decided for yourselves and the rule of nature—you are solely responsible for yourself and your tribe. If you can't protect or support yourselves, or if your system of rule fails in anyway, you're on your own with no government to bail you out.

One of the main argument against anarchism is that everything will cease to function and everyone will suffer in lawless destitution without the government's graceful rule. This notion that people would be completely helpless and lost without the the state is a ridiculous one. Are we to believe that people are incapable of working for themselves and being responsible for their own lives? Are we some helpless children who can't even defend ourselves without the police (as opposed to now where the government restricts weapons for citizens while criminals are free to use them)? Are we to think that the people won't have any clue as to how to build and maintain roads, water supplies, and establish civic order without some incompetent and wasteful government doing it for them?

With anarchism, you're simply cutting out the middleman and manager who mishandles your tax money (which they extorted from you). With anarchism, you get to live without the nanny who's telling you what to think and how to act for the benefit of "progress" and and the good of all.

3. There are many different types of anarchists

Leftist “anarchists” like these fools make the entire ideology look like a joke to everyone else.

There’s an anarchist group for just about any political ideology that isn’t mainstream today. The most popular ones are the various socialist strands and the anarcho-capitalists, but there are also many others including, but not limited to: anarcho-communism, anarcho-primitivism, Christian anarchism, anarcho-feminism (which is a joke), national-anarchism (a form of anti-statist nationalism), and so on. I’ll venture to declare that many other groups and organizations that don’t call themselves anarchists are also anarchist in nature as long as they challenge the current rule in favor of greater autonomy and self-determination.

Now, you don’t have to agree with any of these offshoots. All you have to recognize is that people get to determine their own way of life with anarchism, which contrasts to today’s world where we are forcibly integrated with people who we don’t even want to associate ourselves with while being restricted and having our freedoms eroded in the name of establishing social harmony.

4. The state is the greatest enemy of man

Our greatest enemy is not the feminists, “Muslims,” or SJWs, but the state. The modern state, as represented by the globalist governments of today, is the number one enemy of men and it does not hide its blanket contempt for us. The system that rules over us does everything it can to divide us and control us like cattle.

Think about it: the insane PC culture would not exist if it weren’t for the state, feminism would have remained a lunatic fantasy of mad women if it weren’t for the governments that enable it, there would not be the systemic destruction of human race, culture, and masculinity if we weren’t forcefully herded, engineered, and conditioned. All the social, political, and cultural problems we witness today all have its roots in government control.

All men should remind themselves that the state has absolutely no right over them—none whatsoever. You were already born with all the freedom in the world until the state decided to limit your existence. You don’t need the government, the government needs you.

And if you still think the state has a right to rule over you, watch this video of a man and his family being harassed by government agents for no reason and see if you can still utter support for your masters with a straight face:

5. Statism must be separated from people and culture

The biggest problem I have with nationalism is that most of its proponents fail to separate the statist nature of nationalism from the idea of promoting healthy existence of race and culture. Personally, the issue of blood and “civilization” is very far below the list of my priorities when compared to the need for freedom, privacy, autonomy, and so on. But not only do disturbing number of nationalists and “patriots” overlook these needs, but many seem willing to sacrifice them as part of their flag-worshiping ritual.

One only needs to observe how gladly the people consent to the government’s shift towards a total police state in the name of security against BLM riots and terrorism. But this sort of acquiescence to state control must be rejected. I don’t think it’s radical or impossible to preserve your political, cultural, and racial identity without maintaining a nation. In fact, it could probably be done more effectively without government interference.

6. “Democracy” is not freedom

The main reason why statism continues to persist is because most people are tricked into believing that they live in a society of freedom: the cult of democracy. Because citizens get to vote every few years, they are made to think that they enjoy true freedom because their leash is longer than some poor bastard's in some faraway country—they are deceived into thinking that they don't live in a farm because theirs is free range. But free range farm is still a farm.

You must remember that those who have real power are those who are unelected, often operating behind the curtains. And no matter who's elected and running show, you are still ruled and still unfree. Not only that, more than half of the time, you're ruled by a leader or a party you don't even support.

The election circus and all the drama involved in it are a joke. The only true democracy is the one where you get to rule yourself—there can't be exceptions.

7. Anarchism is the most masculine political expression

I would argue that anarchism, at its core, is the most masculine political expression for the simple reason that it is the only ideology that advocates for total freedom and self-determination for the common man. In addition, anarchism is tribalistic to the core: you either fight for your tribe's existence, or you perish along with it.

And those are exactly the reasons why feminism or any other form of progressivism will never sprout in an anarchist order. Where will the feminist harpies go to cry about "misogyny" when all the gynocentric institutions are gone? How will women extort and imprison their former husbands without the ~~professional white-knights~~ police? How many women will still harp about equality when they don't have a government to lean on for "empowerment"?

Men, on the other hand, will have to be masculine, strong, and honorable (a la Jack Donovan's The Way of Men) to survive and thrive in the new world. Cucks, betas, and other low-T males will be naturally selected one way or the other as their mommy government won't be around to shelter them like it does now. Without governments, men will no longer have an excuse to sit around and hope that some sock puppet will navigate through the democratic mumbo-jumbo and not fuck things up too much.

Last, anarchism is a political ideology that doesn't ask for permission. Anarchists will ask for nothing: no government handouts, no imaginary "rights," and absolutely no permission for anything. Anarchists will do what they want and take what they can. I don't know what more a man can ask for in this world.

8. Anarchism may be inevitable

An anarchist from a century ago once predicted that, in the future, everyone will either be socialists or anarchists. Overlooking the semantics, we can see this polarization forming today as people are increasingly becoming divided into two camps: the progressive, internationalist camp that wants universal equality in a global society where all humans become live in harmony thanks to technological innovations, versus the various resistors of all sorts that want to preserve their identity, beliefs, and way of life from being swallowed in this tidal of globalism.

The latter group includes: nationalists, traditionalists, racialists, anti-establishment movements, Russia and its allies (to an extent), and so on. And as national institutions slowly fade to the background while the people cry out ever louder for freedom and the preservation of their identities, more and more individuals will have to choose between accepting the new global order or resisting against it as anarchists; it will become progressively harder to just sit on the fence.

To learn more

I've only been able to scratch the surface to give you an idea of what anarchism is at its core. For those who want to delve further, and for everyone else with more than a passing interest in politics, I highly recommend Attack the System by Keith Preston to shatter your old worldview.

Remember: It's either freedom or nothing.

Read More: A Brief Introduction To The Country Formally Known As Sweden

Corey Savage

Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Woman Has Online Meltdown After Being Rejected By A Man For Being Too Muscular

February 27, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> I wasn't offended that he wasn't into me. I don't expect everyone to be into how I look… I wasn't trying to be a social-justice warrior [by posting on Instagram] or anything like that, but enough is enough, and I wanted him to be accountable for what he said.
>
> — Emily Abbott, saying she doesn't care but proving she really does care, to the point where she wanted thousands of people to rebuke a guy called Dave

Everyone has been romantically or sexually rejected at some point in their life. Yet a growing number of women seem to think that their rejection by a man warrants a wide dissemination on social media or in the media proper. The clear intention of this dissemination is to prop up their own flagging self-esteem and create widespread vitriol against the men rejecting them. One such case last month was CrossFit girl Emily Abbott, a 27-year-old Canadian told on a dating website that her muscular physique was not womanly enough.

Here's Abbott's initial attempt to garner sympathy from thousands of people online after what Dave said to her:

Note the use of the originally lesbian separatist and now Hillary Clinton slogan "#futureisfemale." How should a man with actual testicles respond to that?

Having looked at what Dave said to her, I believe it was unnecessary. Whilst he would appear to at least partly share Return Of Kings' beliefs about true female beauty, some things are just a waste of time to say. The man's biggest mistake was presuming she would ever take to heart what he wrote. That said, Emily Abbott posting the exchange on Instagram, complete with a fairly identifiable photo of Dave, speaks volumes about the current state of female entitlement.

We also have no proof about how the interaction started. Abbott claimed that he messaged her after they were matched together, suggesting a spontaneous rejection, but I'm more open to believing that she unleashed an account of how amazing men should find her. It's likely that Dave found her distinctly uninteresting and annoying, not just unattractive, and Abbott became infuriated. This is really not that hard to believe, as she was upset enough to share the interaction with thousands of people.

When do men do this?

In the dating market, it’s (often) No Country for Short Men. But when women fall short of a man’s desires, the girl can always go to social media to vent.

When was the last time you can recall a man whining about being rejected and getting a thunderously positive set of responses for it? “This girl Laura rejected me for being ‘too skinny'” or “The girl at the bar said I was too short” are the kinds of gripes you will almost never hear on social media from men. And when these pleas do get attention, it is usually of the very pitying kind.

Men fall into three main categories when it comes to handling rejection. Many, if not the majority fume quietly (for a very long time) or talk bitterly about it with their friends, but still recognize that speaking out about it would be far worse. Other more proactive men, including those still moderately singed by the rejection, move forward. This second group accepts that either a) they themselves did something to cause their rejection and/or b) you cannot appeal to every woman out there. They then look at improving how they present to or interact with women, or reframe the rejection as an acceptable “loss.”

A third category, including the truly wallowing kind of male, deals with rejection even more destructively than the first category. By publicizing their rejection and the low self-esteem accompanying it, they rule themselves out to even greater numbers of women. They also set in motion the poor habits and mindset that will ensure further rejections for years to come.

The difficulty in explaining women like Emily Abbott is that they engage in an almost identical kind of self-pity as the third male category, but can normally expect to be validated by the crowd. “The problem is never you” is the message they receive from their admirers, making these girls immune to any further self-reflection.

So why are women like Emily Abbott single?

Hamsters gonna hamster.

I took an extended look at the Instagram comments made after Abbott's first post about her rejection (where's that ROK writer health insurance, Roosh?). The responses were overwhelmingly sycophantic and in praise of her. So, with all this positive attention and support, why was Abbott still single at the time? After all, her social media presence began long before her encounter with Dave, which only increased an already large following of pliant male supporters. Why doesn't she just choose from amongst them?

Just as she has tried to cultivate a "strong," "the future is female" lifestyle, she seems to refuse to date so many of the men who follow her. She will bang on about Dave not accepting her and wanting a traditional beauty, but won't opt for the regular joes who salivate over her physique. It's pretty clear that Abbott admonishes those men who want a slim hottie, the archetype of femininity, all while hunting for her own elusive alpha.

And although the muscular men she hangs around may play nice for the camera, they don't seem to be asking her out on dates:

It’s not just CrossFit girls getting a platform when they’re rejected

Late last year, The Daily Mail decided to publish the photo of an Australian man living in Scotland. His crime? Calling a woman too overweight and old for him. Dating website Plenty of Fish promptly banned him. Again, though “Ash” calling this woman overweight was superfluous (just “next” or block her, guys), putting his photo on the internet turned a startlingly regular occurrence–rejection, whether romantic, social or professional–into a witch-hunt.

As Return Of Kings has long described, women expect men to find them attractive purely because they are women. Many men have unfortunately swallowed the feminist diktats and now find their groins stirring at anything with two X chromosomes (or even “women” without them).

Mass female hamstering, and its attendant validation by thirsty males, will undoubtedly continue. In the meantime, what men with standards must do is never compromise them. We will never apologize for desiring particular kinds of women for sex and excluding the rest.

Read More: What To Do When You’ve Been Rejected So Many Times That You’re Ready To Give Up

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Who Determines What Will Be “Forgotten” On The Internet?

February 27, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Readers may have heard of the strange, tragic story of a thirty-one year old Italian woman named Tiziana Cantone. According to media reports, she made sex videos with a current boyfriend and then sent the video to several other people, among them one of her ex-boyfriends. At some point in the spring of 2015, the videos were uploaded to various porn sites. From this point, Cantone became the target of ridicule and mockery. She changed her name and moved to a different part of Italy. But everywhere she went, people eventually recognized her.

Cantone, now desperate to have the videos removed, found out that it was not an easy thing to do. Unfortunately for her, at least one of the videos appeared to show her consenting to having the sex filmed. It has also been alleged that she was involved in several “swinging” relationships. She finally took legal action against some of the porn sites, but it turned out to be a laborious process and she incurred about 20,000 Euros in court costs. In despair, she hanged herself.

The case brought into the spotlight the so-called "right to be forgotten" on the internet. The right has been recognized in Europe, and permits people to have things about themselves removed from internet search engines unless there are "particular reasons" not to do so. Basically, a balancing test is done to decide if the public interest in having the information is outweighed by the individual's privacy interest in removing it. Not surprisingly, this cutting-edge legal concept has attracted fierce debate. On one side are the privacy advocates, who justifiably emphasize that a person should not continue to be plagued forever by personal information that sits in search engines for years. On the other side are the "censorship" opponents who claim that allowing this sort of internet sanitizing would eventually degrade the value of search engines as a whole.

Both sides, of course, have valid points. The internet has become a vast dumping ground of stale, outdated, and irrelevant personal information. At some point, people should have the right to get on with their lives and not have to be worried about those drunken photos of themselves that they posted on Instagram, or that traffic court case from 1998. But the search engines see it differently, at least to some extent. They argue that a "free society" demands unrestricted access to historical information. In a recent article about the matter in the New York Times, one commented stated:

"When we're talking about a broadly scoped right to be forgotten that's about altering the historical record or making information that was lawfully public no longer accessible to people, I don't see a way to square that with a fundamental right to access to information," said Emma Llansó, a free expression scholar at the Center for Democracy and Technology, a tech-focused think tank that is funded in part by corporations, including Google.

Not surprisingly, big business, governments, and some globalist voices are not happy about giving individuals the ability to control what is available about them online. They know that information is money and power, and fear the removal of data that might affect their bottom line. Delinking, as it is called, will supposedly have the net effect of scrubbing the internet free of useful information.

Governments are also worried. They know that the internet and social media is one of their primary ways to gather intelligence in real-time. In fact, a conference in London in November of 2016 highlighted the growing use of social media as intelligence mines for governments. Militaries and governments (as well as non-state actors) are tripping over themselves to use social media for their own ends. According to the article linked to in the preceding sentence:

> According to a description of the project on the Thales website, the partners have created a demonstrator tool that is currently being tested with users from security organisations. They said the “Initial feedback is very positive.”
>
> The tool is all about “real-time surveillance”: social media information coming into the system is “immediately analysed” using Big Data algorithms and techniques “to detect changes, trends or anomalies” and “identify potentially dangerous entities”. The tool is already so powerful, claims Thales, that it takes just 5 to 10 seconds for new information appearing on the web “to show up in the system, so intelligence analysts have up-to-the minute insights into situations as they evolve.” The current dataset has some 70 million documents, with 25,000 new documents added daily, and search results delivered in less than 5 seconds.
>
> Media Miser extracts and filters data on a particular topic as soon as it is posted online. Tools developed by the NRC process this content in real time by translating and summarising the data. The information is then assigned various ratings and descriptions: a tone rating (positive, negative, neutral); signs of emotion (anger, fear, etc.); the geographic location of the source; and the identities of the individuals or groups involved in the making and distributing the content.

We can surmise that big business and governments are not going to take the lead in protecting the privacy of the average citizen. In addition, privacy advocates note that the fear-mongering claims of governments and big business about delinking rules are overblown. They note that Google already practices worldwide deletion and delinking in cases of copyright infringement or piracy. Since they are already doing it now for big business, why can’t they do it for individuals?

The answer, of course, lies in balancing the legitimate need for privacy rights with the public’s need for access to information free of undue restrictions. When the information is of such a personal nature that it should fall within the scope of privacy, then the individual should be able to control it. One possible practical way to implement the “right to be forgotten” is to use something like the software tool Oblivion.

It is possible to construct something that positively balances personal with public rights. But who will make these decisions? Who will decide whether something belongs more in the public or the private domain? If it is to be the search engines themselves, then there must be some other authority to appeal to in cases where wrong decisions are made. No single entity should have veto power over what appears online; that would be placing too much power in too few hands.

Read More: My Experience Building A Computer

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

The Danger Of Hedonic Adaptation

February 27, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This podcast explores the hedonic treadmill, which states that people will adapt to pleasure over time, making its pursuit a marginal endeavor. Through four life examples, I show how this adaptation affects your perceptions of both pleasure and pain, before discussing the implication that we will eventually adapt to anything encountered in the material world. I share my thoughts on how to deal with this awareness and how I used it to make a recent decision that came after a negative event in my life.

If you're enjoying my podcasts and getting value from it, consider making a donation. Click here to learn more about donating.

Listen on Soundcloud or download the MP3:

Listen on Youtube:

Subscribe on iTunes or add the RSS feed to your favorite podcast app. If you like the podcast, please leave a rating and review on iTunes.

Previous Podcast: How The Manosphere Crushed Feminism

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Trump Derangement Syndrome Hits The Oscars

February 28, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

I try to watch the Oscars every year because it is a good bellwether of what the globalist elites want Americans to think. In past years the Oscars have pushed global warming, gayness, and diversity. This year, the irrational hatred of Donald Trump caused the entire Hollywood establishment to lose all connection to reality. But Trump, and all the Americans who supported him, got the last laugh.

The Ceremony

The Oscars got off to an inoffensive start with a performance by Justin Timberlake. I've always found Timberlake's voice annoying so I turned the sound down for this. Next, Jimmy Kimmel, the host of this year's Oscars, delivered a bland monologue. While I expected a few Trump jokes, Kimmel kept lobbing jokes at Trump the entire night. It is almost as if SJWs are not able to laugh at anything but politics.

Predictably, some of the award winners used their acceptance speech as a time to criticize Trump and the "evil, mouth-breathing hicks" who supported him and who pay to watch Hollywood's lousy movies.

Mexican actor Gael Garcia Bernal had this self-righteous quote:

I wonder if Bernal has ever criticized Israel's wall? Or Mexico's policy on illegal immigrants, which is more harshly enforced that the US's?

Asghar Farhadi, director of the Best Foreign Language film delivered the harshest rebuke of Trump's travel ban via a woman who read a statement on his behalf. I wonder if Iran lets just anyone waltz into their country?

Corporations are part of the globalist elite and they hate you

Jeff Bezos, CEO of Amazon and owner of the Washington Post attended the Oscars.

I've met fans of Ayn Rand who attribute nearly god-like status to corporate CEOs. In her books, CEOs are strong, independent men who drive innovation. They are the few who carry all of civilization on their shoulders. There may be a tiny handful of CEOs who are genuinely like this, but most of them fall far short of the Randian ideal. The average CEO is a Social Justice Warrior (SJW) who believes it is his duty to promote leftwing causes. This is nowhere more evident than in the SJW political ads at this year's Oscars.

Cadillac had an ad called "Carry" that starts off with the line that "We are a nation divided." This is obviously a reference to Trump, who leftists view as a divider. To combat this dividedness, Cadillac's ad posits that "we carry each other forward." It seems innocuous, but the ad is really promoting diversity—the very thing that voters rejected when they voted for Trump.

This is an odd ad for the Cadillac because its customer base is the very group of people who voted for Trump. Nothing like insulting your customers. This ad made me want to (1) Never buy a Cadillac, and (2) Shut down all immigration. By the way, was that the music from The Mission in the ad? How lame.

Hyatt had a similar ad set to the Burt Bacharach tune, "What the world needs now is love." There is a scene where a attractive woman in a hijab picks up something for a white woman sitting across from her. Of course, this is a response to Trump's temporary travel ban. Let me just say that there is no other country on earth that determines its immigration policy on "love, sweet love."

Audible, which is owned by Jeff Bezos, sponsored an ad that featured gay actor Zachary Quinto reading a quote from George Orwell's 1984:

> If he were allowed contact with foreigners he would discover that they are creatures similar to himself and that most of what he has been told about them is lies. The sealed world in which he lives would be broken, and the fear, hatred, and self-righteousness on which his morale depends might evaporate.

The implication is that Trump, and the 63 million people who voted for him, are stupid, hateful xenophobes because they don't want open borders. It also plays to leftist fantasies that Trump is a totalitarian.

The New York Times ran an ad trying to defend itself against Trump's charge that they are fake news. My thought on the Times and the rest of the anti-Trump media is that they would be a more believable if they gave Trump credit for the good things he is doing while criticizing the bad. By attacking Trump non-stop, they are actually undermining their own credibility because it makes their bias plain to everyone.

It ended in disaster

While the Oscar ceremony, some actors, and the corporate sponsors all tried to attack Trump, it backfired when the Oscars closed with the worst disaster of Oscar history. Apparently the wrong envelope for Best Picture was given to Faye Dunaway and Warren Beatty. Instead of announcing Moonlight as the Best Picture, Dunaway read La La Land to be the winner.

The cast of La La Land streamed the stage and began reading their acceptance speeches when it was announced that there had been a mistake. It was enormously embarrassing for all involved, but it was good to see the sanctimonious Hollywood types looking like fools. It is almost as if some divine force is battling on behalf of Trump and his supporters.

Conclusion

Most men avoid watching the Oscars because it is always liberal SJW drivel. This year was no exception but the extra dash of Trump derangement was worth the watch. I look forward to eight more years of Hollywood meltdowns.

Read More: The 2016 Oscars Showed Us Which Lies The Hollywood Elite Wants Us To Believe

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Why I Decided To Become A Big Rig Truck Driver

February 28, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

I may be the only Emmy-award winning newscaster who also holds a Class A Commercial Driver's License and speaks Spanish fluently in the United States. Hot off big daddy government's press, I just got my CDL.

Earning my CDL was one of the most difficult endeavors I have attempted in my life, far more intense than the college degree I earned that I now loathe. The three-week courses aimed at finding fresh meat for the corporate meat grinder aren't sufficient to train a man to drive a big rig with authority.

But I held on. I suffered training pay and all the growing pains. And now I feel like I can manage an 80,000 lb driving machine.

In any case, I'm back in The Matrix until June (other than taking March off to travel internationally) to investigate the practicality of a new lifestyle design for men that would allow them to work 6 months a year while traveling abroad 6 months, enjoying libertine cultures and women who have not yet been taught to hate men.

Sure I could stay on my island and enjoy life to the fullest. But there's a lot of life to be lived and world to be seen. And this is about much more than just me. It's about taking a stand and showing men how to live a life of financial and sexual freedom. Women had their liberation, now it's time for ours.

English scholar Rookh Kshatriya eloquently detailed why modern men must learn to live for themselves and their own pleasure, until the "reset" button is pressed on male-female relations in the West, and especially Anglo-America – the mother of feminism:

> For normal men, Anglo-Saxon culture is an inherently flawed creation. Everything about it from the ground up is designed to exalt women and denigrate men. There is nothing male-friendly in the existing Anglosphere; it has declared war on men politically, economically, conceptually and legally. There is nothing there of interest to men at all. The situation has deteriorated beyond tinkering with minutiae or putting the clock back – only complete rejection of pan-Anglosphere civilization and all its institutions, root and branch, can now serve the enlightened man effectively.

I've always been one to put my money where my mouth is. Before recommending this design to other men who want to escape a hateful Anglo culture but don't know how, I want to live the life I'm going to be recommending to other men.

I can use my mental powers for the good of my masters or for my own good. I was so shit on by the great system everybody is supposed to worship I turned on it. In many ways, I am pumping and dumping the United States economy, since it no longer serves men's interests.

Goal 1: $20,000 A Year, Earned in Only 4-6 Months

Make fat stacks fast with NO LIVING EXPENSES when you become an OTR trucker

By American standards, $20,000 a year may sound like a paltry sum. But I know from experience living expenses abroad are most often $500 a month or less for a comfortable lifestyle. I've been living abroad in the Caribbean for nearly a year and a half, living a swinging, sexually fulfilled, dancing, drinking, happy existence with housing, food, Internet, utilities, and phone all covered by that amount.

Beyond that, anything I have leftover means its party time.

But why just $20,000? Because this is the point at which a man can both avoid paying a lot of income taxes and if he chooses, get on IBD (income-based deferment) for student loans he got ripped off on so he doesn't have to pay them back. Moreover, $20,000 a year is enough that a man could live very well abroad on $10,000 for 6 months, invest the other $10,000 in growth stock mutual funds, and come back to The Matrix the following year to earn $20,000 more.

Don't let anyone convince you a life of sex, drugs, and Salsa music won't leave you fulfilled. Contrasted with the life of a run of the mill Beta male slave, it's a fantastic way to enjoy one's prime.

Goal 2: Travel The World the Other 6 Months

Any money you earn in the U.S. is multiplied 2x or 3x abroad

A slave never dreams to be FREE, a slave only dreams to be king of the ant hill most people spend their lives trying to climb. Stop being a slave and start living the life of a free man.

With $20,000 I will have more than enough money to travel to four continents this year. This is above and beyond visiting virtually every major American city in my big rig, enjoying everything from the Bunny Ranch to random (and free!) hookups with strippers that I use PUA techniques on. (Oh, and before the haters pile on, I dated daughters of executives, daughters of well-connected families and the like when I was a mainstream media guy back in the day. I was so horrified of the "good girls" and the slavery they expected of me by virtue of their association with me I defected and decided to live a life as a free man until the cultural situation changes.)

How does a man live an awesome life on that amount? First off, any money you make in the states can be multiplied by taking it abroad. Second, once a man purges his mind of the materialism and consumerism he has been indoctrinated with from childhood and instead chooses to live a life of minimalism, he will discover the fact his money buys freedom.

Most of the world lives on a fraction of what Americans live on. A little money extracted from here goes a long way somewhere else. Corporations aren't the only entities that can outsource. I just consider this my way of evening the score.

Goal 3: Survey The Ship

Surveying the cultural Titanic as it sinks is another goal of this venture

Captains of sailing vessels in the past used to survey the ship before a hopeless battle. In many ways, my trek across America is my way of surveying nearly every state and every major city to make sure I haven't missed anything when it comes to women and the Anglo cultural obsessions with shopping and eating out.

So far, in the 40+ states I've visited while driving and while working with the media, I've seen only fleeting, exceedingly rare exceptions to the poor relations between the sexes. Most of the time, women adhere to the feminist script we discuss in the manosphere.

As an example for what passes as a "date" these days, I am in and out of Utah hauling freight and recently stopped by a SWPL restaurant. I was treated to this episode going on at the table beside me. I saw one of the "good Mormon girls" thoroughly de-balling her dinner date as she talked to him in a condescending manner, as if he was a job applicant rather than a potential boyfriend or husband. I felt bad for the guy, and would have refused to pay for this woman's dinner as I walked out the door and left her sitting there. But he paid for it, took the verbal badgering, and walked out with a defeated look on his face. Why in HELL do men put up with this? This guy is well on his way to frivorce rape by virtue of his association with this harridan.

When I dated the "high class" girls I always felt like a pawn in their stupid little games. So I learned to bypass all the ridiculous sophistry and go straight for the red (or is it pink? – heh) meat of the matter.

Lifestyle Design

Teaching others to fly the coop of misandry and sexual repression is a worthy aim

Beyond the personal goals of fattening my bank account, traveling the world, and surveying the ship, the core purpose of this venture is to help design a solid plan for men who want to work part time and travel part time.

Men often give up and resign to the fact they'll always be doing someone else's bidding rather than living a personally fulfilling lifestyle. I nearly succumbed to this myopia myself in my late 20s, before I got angry and decided to extricate myself from a system that was abusing me at any cost. The goal is to allow men to give the finger to a system that hates them and villainizes them in all its narratives.

Becoming a part-time trucker ticks a number of check marks on the lifestyle design page.

- A near perfect lifestyle for the single man who wants to be a roaming nomad instead of a nester
- Avoids paying excessive income taxes into the beast
- Allows men to dodge student loans if they wish
- Provides an excellent income if spent abroad
- Allows a man to work half the time and live half the time
- CDL drivers are in such demand a driver with a clean record can fall ass backwards into a job
- A man doesn't need to pay rent or other expenses beyond what he eats as he can live in the sleeper of the truck
- A man becomes in effect, a migrant worker who only comes to the U.S. to earn cash

I've personally found this move to be much more personally rewarding than being a "TV star" ever was, as I know I'm doing this for me and I know it keeps me out of the system.

For now, that's the latest from Relampago on the road. I'll be in the air the second half of the year enjoying myself. This is a cause much greater than oneself. This is a project in creating a Renaissance of male freedom.

Read More: 6 Things I Learned From Living The Nomad Lifestyle For Months

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

How To Boost Your Libido With Food

February 28, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Henry Tran

As a guy, you know that getting in the mood (and staying in the mood) will take more than playing Marvin Gaye's "Let's Get It On" on repeat from your bedside bluetooth speakers.

But just as certain songs are famed for flipping your sexy time switch on, there are also certain foods that are known to improve your sexual desire and even boost your bedroom performance.

The good news is that you don't need to seek out any foreign foods from faraway lands; these foods can all be found at your local grocery store and will all but ensure you a successful session between the sheets.

To get a head start, I created a complete video guide to naturally boosting testosterone and libido through nutrition that explains everything. If you want to skip ahead to the video guide now, click the link below:

VIDEO: How To Boost Libido With Food

Dark Chocolate

Every time you eat dark chocolate, your brain levels up the release of serotonin and dopamine (your feel good hormones). Both mood boosters contribute to lowering your stress levels and increasing feelings of happiness and affection – The perfect conditions for sparking a little action. More so, cocoa has also been shown to increase blood flow through the arteries and relax blood vessels allowing for an easier lift off for your lap rocket.

Spinach

Eating spinach puts you in the mood by increasing blood flow to the lands below your equator (er, belt). More blood flow forces blood to the extremities, which, like the little blue pill, can increase arousal and make sex more pleasurable. But it’s not just a bonus for you – this also works for her. While men will find that erections come more naturally, women will also find it easier to have full blown orgasms.

Avocados

Avocados are a killer source of monounsaturated fats which are known to contribute to increasing testosterone production – the holy grail to a robust libido. Along with their T-boosting benefits, avocados also offer heart-health perks. Anything that helps your heart and circulation is also critical for a healthy sex life. In fact, men with heart disease are twice as likely to have erectile dysfunction because both conditions can result from artery damage.

Ginseng

Researchers found that those who took a ginseng supplement significantly upped their libido in a month, and 68 percent also said their overall sex life improved dramatically. Try a ginseng tea but be sure to find one that is natural, and free from added sugars that will cause you to store belly fat – which is the most powerful libido killer known to man.

Figs

Figs are considered excellent stimulants of fertility and are also known to enhance the secretion of pheromones. Pheromones are airborne compounds that send signals about your mood and your sexual attraction to others – so next time you're looking to get jiggy with it, be sure to get figgy first.

Green Tea

Green tea is rich in compounds called catechins which do a few things for your sex life. First, they are known to boost sexual desire by promoting blood flow to your nether regions. They also trigger the release of nitric oxide – increasing the size of your blood vessels… And with more blood, comes more erections. Last but not least, catechins have also been shown to torch belly fat and rev up the liver's ability to turn fat into energy. That means that you won't just be harder, but you'll also be leaner – a winning combination for a libido layup if you ask me.

So there you have it – the top 6 natural libido boosting foods. If you're seeking a full on libido reboot, then you need to check out the first ever meal plan designed to up a man's testosterone and supercharge sex drive.

The virtual guide to increasing your test couldn't be easier – just click and watch the video demonstration below now:

VIDEO: Enhance Your Libido And Sex Life With These Foods

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

The Psychology Of Beta Male Sexual Frustration

February 28, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I did a video showing how sexual frustration can leak out from beta males and be displayed as something resembling hate. I used the spat between Youtubers iDubbbzTV and Tana Mongeau as an example.

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them on the blog.

Previous Video: The Milo Scandal Is A Coordinated Hit Job Against A Dissident

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Trump Rolls Back Obama-Era “Trannies In The Bathroom” Madness

March 1, 2017 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

This past week, the Trump administration rolled back an Obama-era federal order at schools that directed them to allow transgender students to use whatever bathroom they pleased; the so-called “Trannies in the Bathrooms” issue of last year. Citing the complexity of the issues involved, the Trump admin offered no replacement for the guideline, and today we are going to talk about why that was precisely the right thing to do and set some guidelines of our own.

The Fed versus the States

Any Constitutionalist worth his salt, and I know we have more than a few here, knows that the answer to “Should the Federal Government do/be involved with X?” is almost always “no.” The USA was not conceived as a monarchy or a centralized government; it was a collection of colonies, started by different countries and commercial ventures, that, after a couple attempts, made a Constitution that preserved the rights of self-governance that the states already had. Basically, if it’s not interstate commerce, money, or military, the Federal government should have no say in the matter.

The Civil Rights Act, among others, has been used to short circuit the states' rights idea of this nation's government and has allowed the Federal government to harshly come down on areas of the country that have not fit the definition of proper civil rights treatment as seen by the country as a whole. This has been seen mainly for the benefit of black people after the Civil War and during the 1960s, and later, the gays.

However, the gay rights fight has been fought and is done; now we're onto the fight for transsexual rights. The typical method for legitimization of an oppressed sex-related group is to politically pressure the psychiatrists to remove your disorder from the next version of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM), and then you can cite that as your approval to "be that thing." This happened in the 70s for gays, and a couple years ago for transsexuals, but the jury is still very much out on the latter, both in medicine, and in society.

This is why there should not be a Federal edict on the issue. The USA is large, and we do not need liberal, urban power centers dictating what parts of the country, thousands of miles away physically, and millions of miles away philosophically, should be doing. This is an issue you leave to the states to decide.

Why different governments in the states are important

I think we, unfortunately, have passed the point of learning from our opponents, and them from us. Nobody wants to change their views on anything, and you usually fall into the conservative, religious, small government, individualist camp, or the progressive, atheist, statist, collectivist camp and nothing anyone can say can change that.

While that is disappointing, one of the many safeguards we have in the American government is that there are 50 states to choose from; if you don't like the laws of the one you are in, you can move to one that is more to your liking. The states with the really big cities, the ones furthest removed from their frontier roots, and the ones noted for their progressivism have become the gathering places for those with leftist views, and, judging by the electoral map of the last year, everywhere else is on the right.

Progressivism , with its big-government, high-taxes, many laws regulation on peoples' lives, is causing economic issues in the blue states as people and corporations leave. Similar to a bad workplace, if you cannot make your voice heard and you cannot abide the culture, you pack up and head to greener fields.

The difficulty with this, obviously, lies in when the left short-circuits the natural ways of the American system and claims that civil rights or something else allows them to strong-arm the Federal government into enforcing an edict on the states. You cannot leave the Federal government behind and still remain on American soil, and this is key to liberal politics. You cannot get someone to willingly accept something they know is shit; you have to spring it on everyone at once before they know it is shit by seeing it in a neighboring state.

And it IS shit

Being a transsexual, or a transgender, screws up society for the rest of us. I can get someone being gay. A gay man may like other men, and that's not the natural way of things, and it may or may not be sometimes linked to being a pedophile, but he and the rest of us can agree that he is a man. I've got gay friends; we're cool with it, and it's not a big deal.

However, a transsexual who was a man, had surgery, or is intending to have surgery, to become a woman will always actually be a man. All his DNA will be male, and every bit of his body, including the parts he had surgery done on, will be male. So, what you end up with is a surgically altered man taking part in a woman's role in society, and there are a whole lot more trans-women (meaning dudes that have a dong-ectomy, to coin a term) than trans-men.

Why that is depends on your philosophical views. The progs over at Quora state everything from male gender bias to being easier for a women to play being a man without surgery, and other reasons, while we here at Return Of Kings have posited that, with the cash and prizes available to women in today's society, who the hell would voluntarily want to become a guy and get, according to Tim Allen, the same two choices we have always had: work or prison.

The real problem is that it is fucking things up. Men, including penis-less men, are going to be better at sports than women, and if you let a man be a trans-woman and compete, he/she/it is going to win. If society regards a penis-less man as a woman, which is does, you're going to run into them on the dating scene, and they may not tell you what they are. Since the Bangkok Handshake, in additional to being politically incorrect, only works on transvestites and not post-surgery transsexuals, we even wrote our own guide on this a few years ago.

We need to stop enabling this Rarely is a solution black and white. I'm an engineer, not a shrink, but I know, in my trade, there is a certain "middle" you take in things. Do you need some precision to make a machine? Sure. Does a hammer need to be as precisely machined as a nuclear reactor? No; there's a middle ground. Does a machine need some periodic maintenance so it does not die a spectacular death someday soon? Yes. Do you need to daily buff polish, touch up its paint and tell it nice things so it doesn't die on you? Of course not, there's a middle ground.

I would posit that the same is true for mental disorders, that there's a middle ground.

Starting with monogamous marriage, we can go to sex outside of marriage, then polygamy. After that, there's being gay, being bi, and being transgender and all the 87 Facebook genders. Moving further along, there's pedophilia, bestiality, robot love, and even necrophilia. Where precisely does one draw the line on what is a legit sexual preference and what is a mental illness?

My personal take on it is that you are what your hardware is, and you use that bathroom. It is all too easy to claim that you're a pre-op tranny and get a free pass into the girls' room; if you're serious about it, go get your dick cut off so we don't have to worry about you raping any little girls, and then you can go use the girls' room all you want.

Conclusion

Like many progressive ideals, sensible people need to simply hold up their hand, let out a "whoa, there, Skippy," like you're stopping a kid on a runaway Big Wheel, and let the leftists that want to let anyone be whatever they feel like that day know that not all ideas are good ideas, and they might just want to assume all of theirs are bad until proven otherwise.

Read More: Allowing Transsexuals To Pick Which Bathroom To Use Is Pure Madness

Rufus Winnfield

"You know, walk the earth, meet people... get into adventures."

Why It Is Essential You Adopt An “Always On” Strategy For Game

March 1, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

The state of the current sexual marketplace means two things: competition is fierce and you must maximise your exposure to your target market (the girls you are interested in) in order to be successful. A buzzword that has been popular in the marketing and advertising industry for a number of years is “always on.” It is my belief that if you want to beat the current market and pick up the hottest girls it is imperative that you too develop an “always on” approach.

What Does “Always On” Mean?

First, let's look at a definition of the term. Here's one from a blog written by Dave Chaffey of smartinsights.com in 2014:

> Dynamic personalisation and structured testing and improvement of digital experiences is a key feature of always on marketing, a term which has emerged to show a change in emphasis from burst marketing campaigns to generate awareness and response to investment in marketing activities which continuously drive and meet changing demand. This is what Google has called the Zero Moment of Truth. For always-on marketing to be effective, efforts should be made to increase the effectiveness of different [digital] channels through testing, review and optimisation.

Now, clearly this refers to digital marketing efforts and is more than a little wanky. But if you cut through the excess verbiage, what Chaffey is saying is that contemporary marketing has moved away from big, discrete ad campaigns to continuous activity across many different channels that is constantly tested and then tweaked to achieve the best results.

As girls today are bombarded with sexual opportunities through their social circle and approaches in real life as well as through the omnipresent digital titans Facebook, Snap, Instagram, Tinder and so on, achieving cut-through in the market is increasingly difficult for men, just as it is for advertisers trying to sell to increasingly fragmented audiences.

In this way, given the challenges you face on the dating scene are analogous to those faced by brands trying to shift product then it makes perfect sense that you should adopt a marketing strategy that is popular with these same huge corporations.

Polarised

Since the days of The Game by Neil Strauss and Mystery Method, the study of pickup has become increasingly polarized, with specialists popping up claiming expertise in many niche areas. Broadly, these include night game (pulling in clubs and bars), day game (meeting girls during the day in the street, coffee shops, galleries, public transport etc.) and online game (dating sites and apps). There are also strands concerning social media game, social circle game and so-called entourage game.

In actual fact these disciplines aren't as wildly different as their exponents claim. In the end game in any context simply comes down to the key elements of attraction, vibing, hook point (female to male), comfort and escalation. That's it. Whether you're in a hot night club in Miami or a library in Huddersfield the fundamentals of attraction remain the same. While of course there are differences in how you should operate in both of those milieu they are not as great as you might think. Indeed, the main reason that day game and online game gurus have sprung up is that it is somewhat easier to establish and sell to a niche than it is to be a generalist.

My contention, though, is that in today's market you have to be a generalist—a renaissance man of seduction, if you like. The only way to achieve the best results is to be generating leads during the day, through day game, online and via apps, in the evening through night game and through social circle or entourage interactions. As a modern man you simply don't have the luxury of being able to eschew one form of game for another.

In other word, you need to be always on.

How to Develop Your Own Always On Strategy

To demonstrate how you can develop your always on strategy effectively, I discuss four pillars revealed in an article on marketing blog warc.com here:

> 1. Understand the context. In always-on marketing, context is everything. Locations, rhythms, competition, locations, emotion all have an impact.

This is vitally important—basically, you need to be socially calibrated. As I said before, there are clear differences in how you would approach a girl in a nightclub as opposed to a bookshop (although the fundamental structure remains the same). I, for example, have approached in art galleries, Vegas nightclubs and on the London Underground and in each of these the manner of my interactions has been different.

In the nightclub, for example, energy, emotions and drama run high, compelling you to be larger than life and flamboyant. Chatting to the girl in the queue opposite you at the coffee store is going to be different. Don't, whatever you do make the mistake that many guys make of having one 'pick up' persona that you use in all circumstances. By agile, flexible and adaptable.

> 2. Understand the consumer. Always-on marketing is the ultimate extent of consumer-centric marketing. It requires a deep understanding of the patterns, motivations, considerations and analysis of consumer behaviour.

In terms of seduction, this really involves understanding women and their dual sexual strategy (beta bucks and alpha fucks) as much as possible. For this you need to become a student of human nature. There are many great books, blogs and articles written on this subject (many of which can be found here at ROK), but also be observant, keep your eyes open and draw your own conclusions. Stay in tune with popular culture. Listen to song lyrics and watch TV shows.

The great American playwright Edward Albee once said 'we are animals, are we not? . . . I'm interested in the fact that so much of what I think is wrong with the world is to do with the fact that Man's nature is so close to the bestial. And we had better be a little more aware of it.' Pretty lies may cloud the truth, but human beings in the main are out for themselves. Understand your target market (women) inside out so that you can position yourself accordingly.

> 3. Understand the data. Always-on marketing is ultimately data-driven; and without using both your own data – and the exhaust data from the broad digital world – you will not be able to understand and know enough to deliver true always-on marketing.

Data is king these days, in advertising and many other fields, and so it is with pick-up. If you are not keeping some kind of record of your approaches, failures and successes then you are a fool, because it is only through tracking the data and then tweaking your approach that you will be able to better your results.

Say, for example, you approached 100 girls in a shopping mall, asked them straight up for sex and you were rejected 100 times. Then say you tried ten indirect approaches (asking where the pet shop is) and got three phone numbers. In that instance the data would clearly show that the first technique was flawed and the second fruitful.

Obviously this is an extreme example, but you take my point—it is only by tracking your progress and analyzing your results that you can improve.

> 4. Become Service & Product driven. Always-on is not advertising, it requires a view of brands and businesses being of service to consumers, practically and or emotionally useful. Understanding consumer requirements is being able to predict, create and deliver services & products that they might want. Providing the vehicle for them to 'pull' your business into their daily world.

This is really about how you position yourself in light of the data (both your own and that of other guys—and there are plenty of websites, blogs and forums where you can find that). In the past a lot of men would approach women emphasizing their 'good' points to try to demonstrate that they would make 'great boyfriend material'. As we now know, though, this was a flawed strategy, as more often than not the nice guy gets rejected.

This is because women have a dual mating strategy that compels them to seek out alphas (cads) for short term mating opportunities (fast sex), and nice guys (dads) for paternity and long-term investment.

Now, if you can successfully present yourself as a quick, discreet and pleasurable sex partner, then you are providing something that is 'practically and . . . emotionally useful' to a hell of a lot of women (because they want sex too, remember).

Once you have had sex then you can, if you wish, transition into a relationship. The important thing to know is that you will certainly have a lot more success by presenting yourself as a lover upfront rather than a needy beta provider.

Be Always On—Always

In summary, in today's dating market you need to be always on. That means you must always be approaching via multiple means—day game, night game, online game, social circle game and so on.

You must develop a full understanding of the context of each, along with a deep understanding of women and what makes them tick in 2017.

You must experiment with different techniques (direct, indirect, sexual, suave, charming etc.) and tweak when the data shows that something isn't working.

You must then position your product (yourself) as something that will be practically or emotionally useful to the woman you're seducing. Today, that often means being the sexy cad rather than the provider figure, at least at first.

Finally, you must be agile and adaptable, having the energy and persistence to maximize your exposure on the market while at the same time learning from and correcting your mistakes.

Want to find out how to attract a steady stream of beautiful girls? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter.

Read More: Why Abundance And Ruthlessness Are Needed to Get Hot Girls in 2017

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The Rising Epidemic Of Men Falsely Claiming To Be Military Veterans

March 1, 2017 | by FitzRoy Sommerset | Link | Original Link

Return Of Kings has more than a few veterans among its readership. Many of you are probably familiar with the crime that is a cardinal sin among anyone who actually wore a uniform with honor: Stolen Valor.

Stolen Valor is the crime of claiming military medals, awards or accomplishments that one has not legitimately earned. There was an act passed in 2005 that made Stolen Valor a crime. However, this was struck down by the Supreme Court on the grounds of free speech. Honestly, they were probably correct in doing so: making a lie (while not under oath) a crime is a slippery slope that could be utilized by the Social Justice Warriors. Thankfully, Congress passed another act in 2013 making Stolen Valor a crime 'if used for material gain.'

Semper Fries! This fake marine was caught by a local police sergeant. The investigation later revealed he was a drug addict.

It is considered something of an epidemic within the veterans community. Stolen Valor investigator (and legit Navy SEAL) Don Shipley has estimated that there is only one genuine Navy SEAL for every 300 people claiming to be a Navy SEAL.

The crime of Stolen Valor is considered by many leftists to be a “victim-less” crime. However, Stolen Valor is typically accompanied by a host of other crimes: fraud, embezzlement and even murder. Check out Jonn Lilyea’s thisainthell.us blog for a large listing of Stolen Valor investigations, and you’ll find that the vast majority of them involve numerous other criminal behaviors.

Some leftists claim that Stolen Valor is free speech. As their hypocrisy knows no limits, they go after Milo for exercising his right to free speech.

What This Says About Society Today

In 2017, we live under the ravages of feminism, SJW’s and a liberal ‘fake news’ media. The American Man, as an ideal concept, has been destroyed by years of feminist indoctrination at school and at home: it has become generational, as parents teach the same toxic values to their boys that they learned as children.

As much as the SJW’s would hate to admit it, you cannot fight biology: men have a desire to be warriors and receive glorious accolades for their toughness and courage in battle. Part of the damage done by Cultural Marxism is that in the past, Victoria Crosses and Medals of Honor were earned, whereas today most beta men feel that they are entitled to the honors and accolades without earning them.

All of this culminates to create a society of men who feel the temptation to seek honor and status without actually doing the things to gain (or be worthy of) such accolades and feel completely okay about it. They only show remorse when they get caught: the whole time they were deceiving people at the bar, they were okay with it.

In fact, one of the causes of Stolen Valor might be the general slut culture western women have embraced: when female 5s and 6s think they can get male 9s and 10s, many betas who have not been introduced to game may claim military accolades in order to compete.

The Next Move for Social Justice Warriors

In the spirit of participation trophies and gender "identity," I expect the Social Justice Warriors to start standing behind those guilty of Stolen Valor. Why? Because if you "identify" as a Navy SEAL or decorated Combat Infantryman, you should be able to call yourself one.

In the name of equality, I see the standard for non-white soldiers receiving the Medal of Honor, Silver Star and Bronze Star w/V to decrease significantly in order to make sure that the recipients are "ethnically diverse" and "properly representative" of their proportion of the population.

In fact, I already saw this happen in Iraq: The award of the coveted Combat Infantryman Badge (and the Combat Action Badge for non-Infantry soldiers) to soldiers in the U.S. Army was seriously de-legitimized. For those who do not know, the Combat Infantryman Badge and Combat Action Badge is awarded to soldiers for actually being in combat. It is generally expected that one must have fired their weapon in anger, had weapons fired at them in anger, or been close enough to indirect fire (such as artillery or mortars) to have been plausibly injured by it.

By 2008 in Iraq, soldiers were getting the award for being as far as 1km away from a mortar round hitting the FOB (Forward Operating Base). At this range, they had no chance of being injured.

Why Men Commit Stolen Valor

Having read numerous cases posted at thisainthell.us and other Stolen Valor investigation sites, I've found that both alphas and betas commit this crime.

For betas, it is usually insufficiency, and the desire to get something without earning it. Many of them are failures in life, and desire praise for their made-up accomplishments. In some cases, betas who have actually served inflate their record because they didn't live up to their own expectations.

Your average cucked beta with no accomplishments.

For alphas, it is almost always because they are good enough liars to fool people. Some alphas that have committed Stolen Valor have even tricked some real Navy SEALs or U.S. Marines. They often use these made-up awards to commit fraud to steal money from sympathetic audiences.

Stolen Valor and the Red Pill

Most men who commit Stolen Valor are the fat slobs we all abhor.

I would put it to the ROK readership that the manosphere should take a general stance against Stolen Valor. Not only does Stolen Valor represent the degeneracy of the entitlement culture we have today, but it genuinely does harm to those who did honorably serve as Navy SEALs or Army Rangers. Often times, these phony heroes are the obnoxious asshole at the bar who drinks too much and starts unnecessary fights.

There may be some among the readership here who feel that if someone claims to be a Navy SEAL to get laid, so what? Women lie all the time in the sexual marketplace, so why can’t we?

I would first point out that if your game is solid and your frame is where it should be, you do not need to claim to be a war hero to have casual sex. I believe such claims (even if legitimate) are a crutch that prevents men from developing their skill at game. In fact, I don't even bring up the fact that I served in the U.S. Army and did two deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan when speaking with women anymore. The only exception is if the woman I am approaching was in the military as well, as it can be a good platform to open with.

Secondly, lying about military accolades can easily backfire. As I will discuss in the next section, it generally quite easy for any legitimate veteran to sniff out Stolen Valor. Given the large influx of "Stolen Valor call-outs" on YouTube in the past year or two, there is a good chance a legitimate veteran will call you out and make you "internet infamous." And probably embarrass you in front of any potential approaches within earshot.

Lastly, and most importantly, Stolen Valor is an inherently beta male act. Even when con-men alphas are doing it. It shows a lack of self-respect and self-confidence in one's own real accomplishments. It is a sign of the general laziness that parallels the "free college" Bernie Sanders fanatics. If your frame is tight, and you are confident in yourself as a man, lies are not going to help you. In fact, they are probably working against you by building up a false sense of security about yourself. I would recommend using kratom over committing Stolen Valor.

Identifying Stolen Valor

Here are a few "tells" that should raise your eyebrows if you hear them at the bar or a local event. You will often see these phonies wearing hats with pins or biker cuts with numerous patches. Some are brazen enough to (badly) wear Army or Marine Corps uniforms in public.

1. They claim their record and awards are "classified." No awards are classified. Although in some limited circumstances the mission surrounding the record may be classified, awards always show up on a DD-214 (the discharge paperwork every veteran has.)

2. They claim to have been a Navy SEAL. Given the excellent self-promotion of the Navy SEALs, everyone seems to want to claim to be one. As previously mentioned, Stolen Valor investigator Don Shipley has estimated that only 1 in 300 of claimed Navy SEALs are actually worthy of the title. Always ask them what their BUD/S (Basic Underwater Demolition School) Class Number was. If they can't immediately say it, they are almost certainly not a Navy SEAL.

3. If they are claiming they were in the Army and served in Iraq or Afghanistan, make some joke about reflective PT belts. If they laugh, they are probably legit. Don't ask why.

Believe it or not, this is probably a real U.S. Army Soldier.

4. Ask anyone claiming Army or Marine Corps service since the late 1980s "Where do they keep the keys to the HumVees?" If their answer is anything other than "HumVees do not have keys," they are almost certainly lying.

5. If they are acting loud, obnoxious or bragging about how they were Special Forces or a Navy SEAL, they are almost certainly not Army Special Forces or a Navy SEAL. I've seen a lot of these guys around during my time in, and spoken with them. They never break frame and have enormous amounts of self-discipline. They are tough badasses, and they know it. And they don't need to tell the world how awesome they are.

Unfortunately, I expect cases of stolen valor to continue increasing as competition for women and resources get tougher.

Read More: 5 Tips To Raise A Strong Son

FitzRoy Sommerset
FitzRoy is a British and American Nationalist who refuses to apologize for the British Empire. As a young man, he "took a President's shilling" and served in the U.S. Army. In his free time, he enjoys studying history and destroying the SJW revisionist narrative.

5 Thoughts On Publishing Your First eBook

March 1, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Writing your own eBook is all the rage these days. For better or worse, the digital publishing market has exploded in recent years. The ease of use of some of the tools by digital publishers like Amazon have essentially removed any and all barriers to entry to publishing a book.

Sure, said traditional publishers are still on the market but they are ultimately no longer needed. Any Average Joe can now bring his work and sell it on the internet. On one hand, this is great. Many self published authors who traditional companies never would, or didn't, put their weight behind now have a platform. The world is better with their work out there. Plus, it sure as hell beats freelancing.

On the flip side, like I said—every Average Joe can put a book out. As a modestly successful author these days I thought I'd share my thoughts on how one could get started.

1. Write More

This is the biggest point—you've got to actually create something. I've gone into great detail about how to accomplish writing 10,000 words in a day in this post, but here they are in a nutshell:

- Type faster. The majority of your reading this are probably above-average intelligence men. You probably have a quick-thinking mind. Your fingers need to be able to keep up with it. Note: some people really do well writing slowly, even with a pen and paper. I find they are mostly few and far between.
- Avoid distractions. Turn off your WiFi switch. Use full screen mode. Do 25-minute Pomodoros. Whatever it takes.
- Use the proper tools to avoid burning out, *physically. Computers are rough on our bodies. We're not meant to be sedimentary all day. Get a standing desk. Use a program to dim your computer monitor. Use a font that is easy to read. Make sure you're ergonomically comfortable. Walk around a beautiful city whenever possible and talk to some cute girls.
- Do it every day.

2. Pick a Platform

Digital delivery companies such as DPD and E-Junkie make it very easy to deliver the content yourself. I've seen borderline computer-illiterate folks figure it out in a couple of hours.

You don't need to muck around with installing an SSL certificate on your site, or figuring out how to take a credit card payment. You just link your PayPal and credit card processor of choice (Stripe is the rage these days) to your DPD/e-Junkie account, and you're off to the races.

3. But Where's The Audience?

THAT is the key question you just ask yourself. If you're going to sell the product directly, you can obviously take a larger cut and therefore take more money. Putting your book on Amazon results in them taking a 30% cut if the book is more than $2.99. Anything under that and you're making literally cents on every book you sell.

So it would seem that selling direct is the way to go, right?

Not so fast. Where do you plan to get the audience who is going to buy your masterpiece? Do you have a website to begin with? Cool, what about an email list? Do you get organic SEO hits every day in considerable number, or are you just driving crappy traffic from irrelevant social media sources? Do you have the budget and expertise to dabble in paid traffic if none of the above are true?

Yes, there are a lot of questions. I'm not trying to be a buzzkill or make it sound impossible, but you need something that you own, with an audience, if you want to sell a product. This goes true for any product, not just eBooks. Of course, having the budget to pay for advertising completely makes this point moot.

All of these should factor into your decision. A platform like Amazon can get your book in front of the relevant people.

4. One Big Advantage

When you sell directly, someone either had to get out their credit card and type the numbers in, or log into their PayPal account and verify the purchase.

On Amazon, its way easier. Most people have one-click payment on. They get it downloaded to their device of choice on the spot. Amazon basically eliminates multiple steps from the buying process. It's part of the reason their platform has become so successful. With every step you make someone take to make a purchase, the higher chance you have of losing them.

5. You're At Their Mercy

Some of us write in an edgy style. If Amazon and their social justice warriors decide to go after you, that's it. Just like that your audience to sell to can be snapped out from under your fingers.

In addition, you're at the mercy of the review system. Which is an absolute sham given that anyone can just log in and write an anonymous and untrue review—without even having purchased the product.

Conclusion

If you're up and coming, I personally think it'd best to leverage the big guys for what they're worth. Otherwise you'll need to produce lots of free (and good) content on your own websites to see any sales.

If you're established, try both. Much of online business is just experimenting, as I've learned the hard way. Trends change. People evolved. But if your work is good, the people will find it.

Working on a book takes a lot of effort, but a balanced life is important. Master the technology aspect of dating with Tinder and Texting University (on sale this week). For more advice about making the most out of your dollar while traveling, visit Eastern European Travel.

Read More: 18 Self-Publishing Tips That Have Helped Me Sell Over 25,000 Books

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Why Beauty Is Not As Subjective As Feminists Insist

March 2, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Roosh's article 27 Attractive Girls Who Became Ugly Freaks Because Of Feminism has sparked a heated debate. One of the premises of Return Of Kings and neomasculinity is that female beauty is at least largely objective and a real biological phenomenon, linked to fertility. But many people, at least in public, regard beauty as being merely in the eyes of the beholder.

It is important to explore why this is not the case. Furthermore, it is important to have an open mind and realize that things may not always be black or white. Moreover, the outlook on male beauty can also be further addressed, at least to the extent to which it is linked to game and the notion that a man's character reflect upon his appearance (at least in part).

Philosophical, cultural and biological dimensions have to be taken into account. Therefore I have used Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy's article on beauty, the Italian semiologian Umberto Eco's twin work History of Beauty (2004) and On Ugliness (2007), David Buss' article, and Margaret F. Braun and Angela Bryan's article as points of reference.

The history of beauty

As Eco asserts, "Beauty has never been absolute and immutable but has taken on different aspects depending on the historical period and the country." There is always a cultural and historical context in which beauty is understood. The Greeks, at least some of them, regarded beauty and the good as closely intertwined, but Plato and Aristotle could not agree on what beauty exactly is.

However they both agreed that beauty, often in relationship to art but also including human appearance, is objective in that sense that it conforms more or less to natural proportions and symmetrical relationships. Throughout Western history, as Eco's collection of pictures shows, there has been much geographical and cultural variation with regard to beauty. Since people are different, cultures may differ over time and space, and so will the notions on beauty.

What is striking, however, is that although historical variation is palpable and that cultural relativism and "postmodernist" subjectivism have influenced people's ways of thinking, the objective proportions have remained or been reinvigorated within the frames of Western popular culture. As much as we might complain about for example Ariana Grande's ethical and intellectual flaws, she indeed has a beautiful face and body.

With the rise of wellness culture, fashion and cosmetics it has never been easier for the naturally beautiful to optimize their potential (and to ruin the same by means of fast food and various anti-beauty measures). Popular culture capitalizes on evolutionary biology (and as paradoxical as it may seem also on people's penchant for the gruesome).

Ugliness is the obvious opposite of beauty and has correspondingly changed throughout history, as Eco's collection manifests. But even the hideous is objective in that sense that is often linked to death, disease or sometimes malign human behavior. Death and disease may signify twisted proportions. A good illustration of how beauty and ugliness can sometimes merge, are depictions of destructive female goddesses such as Lilith. A combination of opposites requires objective components.

Female fertility as a sign of beauty

David Buss mentions smooth skin, lustrous hair and full lips as manifestations of high female fertility potential. Does that mean that body composition is irrelevant and merely subjective? Overweight is indeed not an indicator of high level of health, and hides the facial and physical features of females. Partly it might be a particular cultural phenomenon rather than a universal characteristic, but in the West and the East slender-limbed bodies dominate both the past and the present.

Margaret F. Braun and Angela Bryan stress the significance of a healthy look:

> Due to increased estrogen, healthy premenopausal women display a gynoid fat pattern, with more fat deposited on the lower body, including the hips, thighs, and buttocks. This gynoid pattern is considered a characteristically healthy, feminine body shape (Singh, 1994). Singh found that body shapes could be accurately differentiated by calculating a waist-to-hip ratio. A smaller ratio results in a more curvaceous, hourglass figure (Markey, Tinsley, Ericksen, Ozer, & Markey, 2002; Singh, 1993a, 1994). It is believed that to increase their own inclusive fitness, men have evolved mechanisms that allow the detection of reproductive health in women (…) In a series of studies, male participants consistently rated line drawings of female figures that represented a normal weight and a healthy waist-to-hip ratio of 0.7 as most physically attractive (Singh, 1993a, 1993b, 1994; Singh & Suwardi, 1995). These findings have been successfully replicated by several researchers (Furnham et al., 2002; Henss, 2000; Markey et al., 2002) and do not seem to be significantly affected by ethnicity, gender, or age (Singh & Suwardi, 1995; Markey et al., 2002).

Perhaps it is only in certain settings, such as when women show their legs on the catwalk, that the really thin is considered prettier than a somewhat higher body weight. The last picture below, as it seem to me, gives a clear hint of a quite optimal height/weight ratio.

Male beauty as a manifestation of character

As Eco notes, Karl Marx asserted that money can compensate for ugliness. That is partly true even now, at least in developing countries, but male beauty has become more important in more equal societies. Male beauty optimization can likewise be accomplished with the help from physical exercise, dieting and grooming.

Also for males there are cultural overlaps as well differences. For instance, in East Asia males look more or less feminine compared to other racial groups, and that is what females in those regions have to work with, so to speak. Margaret F. Braun and Angela Bryan point to the relative importance of a generically masculine physique:

> There are specific reproductively relevant physical characteristics that ought to influence women's evaluations of male attractiveness. First, both sexes (not just > men) ought to value high genetic quality, and an individual's physical attractiveness is considered to be an honest advertisement of their reproductive capabilities and gene quality (Buss, 1989; Buss, Shackelford, Kirkpatrick, & Larsen, 2001). Second, there is some evidence that women focus on male physical cues as well as traits indicative of dominance and ability to provide. For example, women prefer taller men (e.g., Ellis, 1992) and value 'attractiveness' in self-report contexts (e.g., Buss, 1989). Third, women report finding physically symmetric men more attractive and in fact symmetric men tend to have higher numbers of female sexual partners (e.g., Little, Burt, Penton-Voak, & Perrett, 2001; Gangestad & Thornhill, 2003).

Money, social status and personality can sometimes compensate for a lack of physical resources but there is no reason to look in a way that signals low character. Even though this does not include the typical ROK reader, American males are actually more obese than females. Most men will not look like the guy above even after all the proper measures, but still do your best. To call someone a fag for being prettier is a defense mechanism, akin to how fat feminists respond to the harsh truth of their own shortcomings.

Conclusion

Given the above description there clearly exist various objective standards with regard to beauty for both sexes. Some are culturally and some are biologically conditioned (and the biological is linked to the cultural rather than being complete opposites). We have not yet answered the question to which extent that media indoctrinates people into thinking that beauty is more objective and universal than it actually is, but there is obviously a cultural and psychological dimension involved.

Humans obviously have a variety of different tastes with regard to height, weight, hair color, skin tone and facial features, but things such as facial symmetry and hourglass figures are objective measures of beauty that transcend cultural programming—this cannot be argued, but our politically correct overlords continue to deny this point to fit their goal of oppressive cultural Marxism. We must continue to point out their lies and fight to preserve what is truly beautiful in the world.

Read More: The Pursuit Of Truth, Goodness, And Beauty

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

6 Types Of People Who Deserve The Cucking Stool

March 2, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Dating back to the 13th and 14th centuries, "cucking stools" were specially made chairs used to punish disorderly women and dishonest tradesmen in medieval Britain.

Large crowds would gather to watch and ridicule the recipient, who would be repeatedly plunged into water for a set number of submersions that were predetermined by the local magistrate.

Should have shut her big yap: a woman accused of excessive arguing being punished in a cucking stool

The practice did not cause any physical injuries or entail any lengthy incarceration (in accordance with the less-than-capital nature of the accused crimes), but the high level of public humiliation and ridicule often had a profound long term effect on the recipient, which would help to minimize repeat offenses.

The last recorded case of a British woman getting “cucked” by the stool was in 1817, but there are a number of different neer-do-wells in the 21st century west which are rightfully deserving of having the cucking stool reinstated for their transgressions.

This article will identify six of them.

1. False Rape Accusers

Have another drink you lying bitch!

A false rape accusation is the intentional reporting of a rape when no rape has occurred. The number of women who have falsely accused men of rape or sexual assault has increased substantially in the 21st century, as these women have figured out that a rape accusation will garner them a significant amount of media attention and public sympathy, at the complete expense of her accused man's life which is being completely ruined because of the ordeal.

The Duke lacrosse team case and the falsified "A Rape On Campus" story by Sabrina Rubin Erdely (who essentially went unpunished for the malevolent mishap) are prime examples of how innocent mens' lives can quickly be turned upside down due to the emotional whims of modern women.

All people who have been caught out for false rape accusations deserve a very long cucking stool session, with a large and spiteful audience present to witness it. Teenage girls and university students are particularly recommended to attend a cucking, to serve as a stern warning and future deterrent.

2. Race Baiters

Shaun King (left) and DeRay Mckesson (right). Along with Tim Wise and Al Sharpton (not pictured), are prime candidates to get acquainted with the cucking stool for race baiting

Race baiters are influencial people who repeatedly make groundless accusations of racism to the point of acting like a one-note broken record. They have a unique, deliberate, and hypocritical focus on racial issues, and specialize in making malicious use out of news stories to negatively influence the actions and attitudes of one particular group of people against another.

In the 21st century, the current mission objective of professional race baiters is to turn everyone who is not a non-Jewish heterosexual white male against non-Jewish heterosexual white males, with particular focus on pitting black men against white men who are employed in law enforcement, politics, or are simply deemed to have too much money, property, or success for their jealous taste.

Race baiters are like St. Bernard manure on the shoes of society, and a cucking stool session down at the local "spa" (river or lake) should do the trick in wiping the indignant and cunty looking scowls of Al Sharpton, Shaun King, DeRay Mckesson, and Tim Wise off their face.

3. Fake News Propagandists

Everyone who works here (Cancer Inc.) deserves a session with the cucking stool

Webopedia defines fake news as: “false information or propaganda published under the guise of being authentic news. Fake news websites and channels push their fake news content in an attempt to mislead consumers of the content and spread misinformation via social networks and word-of-mouth.”

Buzzfeed, Gawker, MIC, MTV News, Al Jazeera Plus, Alternet, Everyday Feminism, CNN, MSNBC, Huffington Post, Salon, and a legion of other media portals are all fake news outlets which seek to cause discord in society through a combination of their lowest-common-denominator and divide-and-conquer typist work.

All of these fake news outlets continuously lie non-stop despite their repeatedly debunked “gender wage gap” and “rape culture” awareness campaigns, among many others. In addition, they all have a relentless bias in favor of left wing degeneracy, anti-white male hatred, and open borders globalism.

Every typist who works for these fake news organizations has huge dirt on their hands, and a wash basin is simply not enough to get it all off. Only a thorough cleansing with the cucking stool will suffice.

4. Modern Day “Common Scolds”

(0:46 to 1:10 is sufficient grounds for Big Red to get a nice little cucking for common scolding)

In the common law of crime in England and Wales (until 1967), a “common scold” was a troublesome and angry woman who had a reputation for being a public nuisance and for habitually arguing with her neighbors.

Being a common scold was the most common offense for which the cucking stool was administered as punishment during the Middle Ages, and considering how degenerate feminists and social justice warriors are profanity spewing public nuisances in the present day, wouldn't the cucking stool serve as a good way to clean up their act a bit?

Ana Kasparian – another unhinged common scold in need of cucking

I mean how many times did women in the Middle Ages have to repeatedly be subjected to this punishment?

In modern day fairness, men should be held accountable to receive the stool for being a common scold as well. However, since men tend to far more often be driven by logic and reason rather than profanity laced emotional fervor, women like "Big Red" and Ana Kasparian will be on the receiving end of a cucking far more frequently than the "you're a fucking white male!" guy.

5. Internet Doxxers And Witch Hunters

And what do you cuck, apart from witch hunters? More witch hunters!

An internet witch hunt is a malicious campaign which targets a specific person or group, whose "crime" is often nothing more than holding unorthodox or dissenting views on a topic that does not march lock-step with the current (almost exclusively left wing) social zeitgeist.

Meanwhile, a "doxxer" is a person who publishes private information about these falsely accused people or organizations, which opens them up to large scale abuse, being removed from their primary source of income (fired from their jobs), and even being exposed to physical danger.

Doxxers and Internet Witch Hunters are malevolent cowards who often avoid all manner of retributive punishment for their unwarranted and over-the-top behavior. They are fully deserving of the cucking stool should they be caught out.

(Note: Retributive doxxing for being doxxed is perfectly acceptable and understandable behavior, which acts in accordance with human nature's natural desire to seek revenge and restitution.)

6. Actual Male Cucks

Finally, modern day cucks deserve the cucking stool.

How pathetic are men who have been so brainwashed and browbeaten into believing that feminism is fantastic (hello Justin Trudeau), Donald Trump is "literally Hitler", transgenderism is "normal" and "brave", learning game is akin to "rape tactics," and that letting military-age Syrian refugees stay at home with your girlfriend all day is supposed to be some sort of civic virtue?

'Carl The Cuck' and his merry band of SJW's probably think it does, so it's time to dust off the good ol’ cucking stool and get medieval on these sorry excuses for “men” along with the preceding five other culprits.

Read More: How To Increase Your Willpower

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

How The Deep State Operates

March 2, 2017 | by Michael Davidson | Link | Original Link

When looking at the state of the world that we live in today, it is sobering to think that not so long ago, many people thought that it would take a vastly different course. The beginning of the 21st century was supposed to herald the coming of a new dawn for humanity. The United States, having just managed to defeat the Soviet bloc in the Cold War, was the sole remaining superpower left on the planet. It had at its fingertips a level of geopolitical, financial/economic, and cultural power unparallelled in modern history.

The spirit of the 1990's can perhaps best be typified by Francis Fukuyama's 1992 book The End of History and the Last Man, where he argued that humanity had reached an end-state of ideological development, and that socially liberal, economically capitalist democracy would become the final form of human civilization. Multilateral organizations were supposed to guarantee global cooperation and harmony between citizens, supplanting the provincialist thinking of the nation-state concept and creating the concept of a global citizenry.

How times have changed.

In the fifteen years since the turn of the millennium, we have seen this thesis turned completely on its head. The fallout from the events of 9/11, the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the global financial crisis of 2008 have severely battered the Western democracies in general and the United States in particular.

America is widely perceived as an imperial power in decline, seemingly powerless to stop the ascendancy of newly-rising powers such as Russia or China. The idea of a global citizenry has been completely vitiated, replaced with the rise of nationalist and exclusionist sentiment across much of the Western world – as typified best by the twin rise of Donald Trump and the simultaneous success of the Brexit movement.

The European Union, a supranational organization that was supposed to become a world power in its own right to rival the other great powers, instead lies on the verge of complete disintegration. And the tremors of potential disintegration are starting to rattle a weakened America riven by racial division, gender division, cultural division, and a wealth inequality that surpasses the worst years of the Great Depression.

What is causing this?

Ultimately, many in the middle classes of the Western world are starting to come to the realization that the structures that govern the Western democracies are not working in their benefit. They are starting to realize that things like free trade or multiculturalism do mean economic growth – but not for them. Or that the announcement that the United States and its NATO partners are starting a bombing campaign in yet another impoverished Third-World nation does mean political security – but not for them.

As many begin to realize that corporate control of the Western political process has rendered distinctions between left and right increasingly irrelevant, the growing awareness of the globalism-nationalism divide is shining light upon the structures that govern us.

What these structures are, and how they operate, is the topic of this datasheet. This thread is inspired in large part by my synthesis of ideas generated from two seemingly disparate books. The first is Roosh's Free Speech Isn't Free, where he outlines his understanding of Globalist ideology in the course of conducting his State of Man speech whilst dealing with attempts by the Degenerate Left to shut down his work.

The second is a book by a former Republican congressional staffer by the name of Mike Lofgren, entitled The Deep State: The Fall of the Constitution and the Rise of a Shadow Government. This book details the organization of the modern American national security state, and how this structure, which integrates the major organs of America's military-industrial complex, its intelligence community, and its financial and corporate institutions, has essentially created a parallel government that decides the conduct of the United States' foreign, military and economic policy with little, if any, input or consent by the American people. I cannot recommend this book enough to everyone on the forum if you wish to truly understand how globalism works.

So with that – let's begin.

The Origins of Globalism and the Deep State

The ideology of Globalism and the structures of the Deep State, in their modern forms, were birthed out of the crucible of the United States' involvement in World War II. Americans have lived with the modern national security state and seemingly permanent peacetime military mobilization for so long that it is jarring to remember that prior to the Second World War, America had a smaller standing peacetime army than Sweden, and virtually no intelligence apparatus to speak of. Isolationist sentiment and the idea of avoiding entangling foreign alliances – a sentiment virtually unthinkable today – were common political opinions deeply rooted in the vision that the Founding Fathers held for the United States.

World War II changed all that. The United States found itself thrust into the global struggle to defeat the fascist nations of Germany, Italy, and Japan. By the end of the war, it had created the single greatest military machine in the history of human warfare, able to project military power virtually anywhere on the planet, and backed by a seemingly limitless industrial and financial capacity. It ended the war as the foremost military and economic superpower on the planet. Every other great power had suffered the complete devastation of their economic industry, bar the United States, which now represented close to one-third of global GDP.

In the years that followed 1945, the thinking of the American ruling class would shift dramatically due to three distinct yet interrelated ideas. Firstly, that the Second World War had happened in large part because of the weakness of the international institutions that existed (primarily the League of Nations) to regulate the conduct of the great powers in affairs of foreign and defence policy.

Secondly, that America's now dominant position amongst the Western powers necessitated the permanent assumption by the United States of a position of global leadership in order to prevent another such war – and the existential threat to humanity that would entail.

Finally, that Soviet Communism was an aggressive and expansionist ideology that could easily overrun the weakened Western European states, leaving the United States as the sole bastion of freedom in a Communist-dominated world – and that an interlocking series of military and economic alliances and institutions were necessary to ward off the threat of Communism. It was from these ideas that the modern structures and institutions of Globalism and the Deep State were created.

The creation of the Deep State itself can be traced to two events. Firstly, there was the Manhattan Project – the massive effort by the United States to develop the atomic bomb before the Axis Powers. It was the largest industrial project the United States had ever undertaken up to that point, and was the first example of what would become the hallmarks of the Deep State: a penchant for intense secrecy, coordination of the military and major industrial corporations (Kellex and DuPont were vital in developing the required methods for uranium and plutonium extraction, respectively), the close yet subordinate contributions of American allies like Canada and the United Kingdom, and a virtually limitless budget outlay.

The second event was the passage of a single piece of legislation, the National Security Act of 1947. This act would unify the Departments of the Army, Navy, and newly created Air Force into a single structure that would eventually (in 1949) become the Department of Defence. It also created the Central Intelligence Agency, which would become the preeminent institution in the growing American intelligence structure, as well as the National Security Council, the primary instrument by which the White House would coordinate the arms of the newly-developed permanent national security state.

Yet the institutions that would be created in the years following WWII would not be limited to internal reorganizations of the United States government. These years would see the creation of such organizations as; the Bretton Woods system of international monetary coordination, as well as the World Bank (both formed in July 1944 as a result of the Bretton Woods conference), the United Nations (formed in June 1945), the International Monetary Fund (formed in December 1945), the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (formed in October 1947, which would later become the World Trade Organization in January 1995), and NATO (formed in April 1949).

Each of these institutions operated in a separate sphere of economic, military, or diplomatic influence, but all with a common goal – to administer and stabilize a global military and economic order that placed the United States, and thus the ruling American political class, as the permanent primus inter pares of a system designed to ensure permanent American hegemony.

What can we determine from all of this?

Firstly, and most importantly, that Globalism is the bipartisan governing ideology of the United States. While it may have global influence, and adherence amongst the ruling classes of many countries, it is a specifically American ideology that is created, designed, and sustained to maintain the hegemonic status of the United States, or, rather, the permanent ruling class of America. For all of the supposed differences between the Republican and Democratic parties on any number of topics, both of their party establishments (at least, up until the rise of Donald Trump) pay fealty to this ideology.

Its precepts are simple:

- The maintenance of world peace and global prosperity requires that as much of the world as possible be permanently integrated into an American-operated economic, geopolitical and cultural order.
- In the economic sphere, the countries of the world are to adhere to the neoliberal precepts of the Washington Consensus: free trade, deregulation, wide-ranging privatization, economic financialization, and privately-controlled "independent" central banks.
- In the military sphere, the permanent superiority of the United States over all over potential adversaries is to be maintained with gargantuan yearly outlays in military and intelligence spending, coupled with a constellation of over 800 separate military installations in 70 countries that gives the American military a global reach, at an astronomical cost.
- In the cultural sphere, libertine, anything-goes egalitarianism is the universal standard/ideal with which all countries are to be judged. Local cultures and mores are to be systematically dismantled and replaced with individualism, societal atomization, and the destruction of traditional values and their replacement with the cultural Marxist ideals of feminism, homosexual advocacy, and multiculturalism/'diversity.'

Secondly, that the American Deep State constitutes the primary mechanism by which the ideology of American Globalism both administers its worldwide hegemony, seeks new countries to re-align under its control, and further integrates those countries already in its grip. With little to no public recourse amongst the citizenry of the United States (in whose service it supposedly toils), and operating as a parallel government to the rapidly ossifying yet "legitimate" institutions of the American Republic, it administers the American Hegemony and maintains the global dominance of the American political elite over the rest of the planet.

The Security Deep State

While the Globalist Deep State has multiple axes by which it sustains American Hegemony over the planet, its centrally important tools are the institutional arms of the permanent American national security state. We can identify the core institutions of the Security Deep State as the following:

1. The National Security Council, as the bureaucratic co-ordinator of the Deep State

2. The Department of Defence

3. The Department of State

4. The Department of Homeland Security

5. The agencies that make up the US Intelligence Community, within which the two most important agencies are:

—The Central Intelligence Agency, responsible for foreign HUMINT and paramilitary operations, and —The National Security Agency, responsible for cryptanalysis, signals intelligence, and (increasingly) cyberwarfare.

6. The Department of Justice, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation

7. Certain federal courts tasked with handling sensitive cases involving national security, including —The Southern District of New York,

—The Eastern District of Virginia,
—And the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court;

8. Large defence contractors, including companies like Boeing and Lockheed-Martin, as well as intelligence contractors such as Booz Allen Hamilton (the company that employed NSA leaker Edward Snowden)

9. A kind of mini-Congress, consisting of —The Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate,

—The Majority and Minority Leaders of the House and Senate, —And the Chairman and Ranking Members of the House and Senate Armed Services and Intelligence Committees.

All well and good, you might say. But how exactly, and by what mechanisms, are these institutions able to operate virtually as a shadow government? How are they able to exist in parallel to, and in many cases more powerful than, the constitutional structures of the American Republic?

There are two simple answers to this: money and expertise.

The first is the most obvious one. Money is the lubricant that keeps the machinery of the Deep State running. It permeates every facet of its operations in any of a multitude of ways. For example – if a defence contractor desires that Congress should mandate that the armed services buy X number of a high-tech yet high-maintenance and seriously overpriced weapons platform, why would it work to cut the cost and improve the efficiency of its items when instead, it can just offer campaign contributions to strategically-selected members of Congress, who in turn can assert that said platform is what is needed to maintain America's military dominance for the next 50 years?

This is how the American armed forces can be saddled with a purchase like the F-35, which at a looming program cost of over $1.5 trillion dollars for all the roughly 2,500 units that the US armed forces will buy, will be the most expensive weapon platform in American history – despite the fact that it is considered by many to be under-powered, under-armed, and with a stealth capability that will likely soon be rendered obsolete by rapid advancements in radar computing technology.

Given the cost-plus structure of many governmental defence contracts, where the companies will be reimbursed for their costs as well as being guaranteed a certain profit percentage, defence contractors have no incentive to reduce costs – and in many cases have every incentive to wildly inflate them. One can also observe the extremely disturbing tendency of defence contractors to offer campaign contributions to members of Congress who are willing to push for foreign and defence policies that help enrich the bottom lines of those companies. A classic example occurred in the wake of the Russian annexation of Crimea, when the debate raging in Washington was whether or not the United States should offer lethal military equipment to the newly-installed Ukrainian forces. Mike Lofgren recounts how:

> at a fundraiser for Representative Mike Rogers (R-MI), the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, the atmosphere among contractors in the room was "borderline euphoric." By coincidence (or not) the following Sunday, Congressman Rogers, appearing on Meet the Press, became one of the first major political figures to advocate arming Ukraine.

Needless to say, corporate control of American foreign and defence policy for profit is something that is, at the very least, extremely disturbing, and at worst an outright subversion of Constitutional government.

We can also look at the dynamic of expertise. The Deep State hews to an ideology that (as described above) is neither really Republican or Democratic, but attempts to present itself as both non-partisan and bi-partisan, above the mud of traditional party politics. The operatives of the Deep State, rather, attempt to present themselves as the politically neutral technocrat, merely offering their "expert opinion and advice" to those elected to office. Yet such advice carries with it a huge institutional weight, and it is rare indeed for any elected politician to be seen rejecting such advice – especially in a country where military members, especially senior generals, are often regarded with something akin to superhero status.

A perfect example in this regard can be shown by the debate about the War in Afghanistan that took place in 2010-2011. Generals David Petraeus and Stanley McChrystal, who had recently been selected by President Obama to right the sinking American war effort against the Taliban, offered the institutional plan for success in Afghanistan – a massive surge of over 40,000 US troops.

When Obama offered resistance to the idea that the only acceptable option was more ground troops, anonymous leaks began to appear in the Washington press from "senior government sources" suggesting that Obama's reluctance was threatening the success of the mission. Both Democratic and Republican members of Congress pilloried Obama for not "supporting the generals", and he would eventually accede to the institutional pressure, authorizing the deployment of a further 30,000 troops. Another excellent demonstration of this power can be seen in another quote from Lofgren:

> Perhaps the most telling example of the relationship between President Obama and the Deep State comes from a March 2015 interview of John Brennan, his frequently embattled CIA director. Obama has shown Brennan great loyalty through two presidential terms. How did Brennan repay that loyalty – with a humble demonstration of gratitude and respect, perhaps? Obama, he said, did not "have an appreciation" of national security when he came into office, but with tutelage by himself and other experts "he has gone to school and understands the complexities." The tone of headmasterly condescension is unmistakeable, giving the listener ample grounds to wonder who is really in charge, the president or his national security complex.

A presidential candidate having little to no experience in national security affairs is not something that the Deep State fears – quite the contrary; that is something that they prefer, for a president without any such experience can offer little in the way of resistance to the experts offering whatever ideologies and ideas they render as 'reasoned advice.'

That is how President Obama, a candidate who was originally elected on ending wars in the Middle East and mass surveillance at home, has now become a President governing over a Deep State waging an even-greater number of wars abroad and conducting even more warrantless surveillance. Incidentally, it is why many within the former and current senior leadership of the Deep State have come out so strongly against the presidential campaign of Donald Trump. It is not because he is uniquely unqualified – then Senator Obama had exactly as much experience as Trump does now – but because his non-interventionist, "America First" ideals represent the single greatest internal threat to the Globalist ideology of American Hegemony that the Deep State requires to maintain its veneer of legitimacy to rule.

In contrast, Hillary Clinton is one of the foremost operatives of Globalism today. Her presidency would represent the final victory of American Hegemony over the constitutional American Republic.

The Economic Deep State

Second only to the Security Deep State in its importance, the Economic Deep State is the structure dedicated to protecting America's economic pre-eminence in, and control of, the levers of the global economy. Yet as we have witnessed previously, America's leading position in the global economy has not served to benefit its population, by and large. Income and wealth inequality have exploded upwards in the years since the 1970s – to the point where the United States has a greater relative degree of wealth/income disparity than it did in the years leading up to the Great Depression.

Today, the 400 richest Americans own more in wealth and income than the bottom 150 million Americans. For the first time in nearly a half-century, the American middle class has been so squeezed that it now represents a minority of American citizens – the upper and lower economic classes now make up over 51% of the country. It is increasingly clear that the Economic Deep State has been deliberately engineered as a form of economic parasite – to strip-mine the wealth of the American middle class and suck it upwards, in ever increasing numbers, towards the 1% and the 0.1%.

How has it done so? And by what mechanisms does the Economic Deep State create its wealth for the American political and economic elite?

The first, and most important mechanism of American economic hegemony, is the petrodollar. Widely discussed though often misunderstood, it is the tool that allows the United States dollar to retain its status as the global reserve currency. Its history stretches back to the 1970s, when Richard Nixon unilaterally ended the convertibility of the US dollar to gold, ending the fixed exchange-rate era of the Bretton Woods system. In order to maintain the status of the US dollar as the global reserve currency (since the US was running massive current account and trade deficits for spending on welfare and the Vietnam War) the US government struck a deal with the Gulf oil-producing states, whose monarchies at the time were responsible for well over half of all global oil production.

The method itself can be relatively simplified to the following system:

- The United States prints US dollars, which make their way into the global marketplace to be snatched up by other states.
- Those states then buy oil – denominated in US dollars – from the Gulf oil-producing states, who have a prior agreement with the United States to only accept payment for their oil in US dollars.
- The Gulf oil producing states, holding more US dollars than they can reasonably invest in their own economies, reinvest their dollar holdings into the United States, generally in the form of stock and real estate purchases, US Treasury bonds, and multi-billion dollar weapons purchases from American defence contractors.

This system is what allows the United States to run massive trade and current account deficits yet still retain the primacy of the US dollar as the global reserve currency. It allows the United States to set a fiscal policy that is predicated on massive military and welfare spending coupled with budget-busting tax cuts without ever having to worry about hyperinflation from printing so many dollars. For any other nation on the planet, in order to obtain $100 USD, they must generate enough economic goods and services to obtain $100 USD. The United States government, on the other hand, need merely print a $100 USD bill.

There also exists other mechanisms by which the Economic Deep State enriches the American ruling class, such as deregulation, mass immigration, outsourcing of manufacturing jobs, and the growing financialization and de-industrialization of the American economy.

However, these all can be tied back to the ability of the 1% to essentially buy its politics – to flood the American political system with such gargantuan amounts of money in the form of campaign contributions that it drowns out the voices of the less well-off, and turns American politics into an enrichment game for the already super-rich. In exchange for voting for legislation that enriches large corporations and wealthy donors at the expense of the American middle class, American politicians can expect to find well-paid careers waiting for them at the end of their service, in the form of any number of chairmanship positions or consulting firms.

A prime example to demonstrate the above is the case of Robert Rubin, who was plucked from a co-chairmanship at Goldman Sachs to serve as Secretary of the Treasury under President Bill Clinton. In his time as Treasury Secretary, Rubin managed to win two massive victories for Wall Street – the repeal of the Glass-Steagall Act, which mandated the separation of commercial and investment banking, and the passing of the Commodity Futures Modernization Act of 2000, which banned the regulation of most forms of financial derivatives.

For his loyal service to Wall Street, Rubin was rewarded upon his retirement from "public service" with the chairmanship of Citigroup – a bank that was only able to be formed because of his work in pushing for the repeal of Glass-Steagall. Both the above legislative acts would prove key contributors to the Global Financial Crisis of 2008.

The Cultural Deep State

Culture is the third major arm of the Globalist Deep State, and though it may represent a form of 'softer' power to the 'hard' power of geopolitics or global economics, it is no less important than either of the preceding in sustaining Globalist ideology. I do not think it is necessary to point out here the methods by which degeneracies like feminism, normalization of homosexuality/transsexuality, and multiculturalism have been utilized by the Globalist Deep State to further enrich itself in money and power – far more capable writers than myself have done so at length.

Admittedly, I have had problems before reconciling the relationship between SJWs and Globalists. Most SJWs would proclaim themselves resolutely opposed to many of the actions of the Globalist Deep State, such as its financialization of the American economy and its propensity for engaging in useless wars abroad. I think that the past few years have demonstrated, however, that the Globalists are more than willing to tolerate SJW activism when it is directed in ways that do not threaten their interests. An excellent example in this regard is the differences in treatment between the Black Lives Matter and Occupy Wall Street.

Black Lives Matter is a movement that has received an insane amount of coddling and support from globalist-supporting institutions. It has coverage in corporate media that is favourable to the point of outright deception; it has been allowed by government and police forces to wreak riots and havoc across multiple American cities, seemingly without consequence; and it has been funded to the tune of millions of dollars by super-wealthy supporters seemingly interested in social justice for some reason – including everyone's globalist you love to hate, George Soros. This is because globalists have an interest in the continual division of society between black and white Americans – they have created a narrative that is indisputably and provably false by mere reference to crime data, and have used it to incite a low-level race war across America for the purposes of pushing for federalization of policing, and ever-greater control by the federal government.

In contrast, the treatment of the Occupy Wall Street movement – a movement that at its zenith could have posed little threat to the institutional power of Wall Street – was markedly different. There exist redacted FBI documents released under FOIA request showing that multiple US intelligence and law enforcement agencies coordinated with major financial firms and banks to infiltrate, monitor and eventually subvert OWS – to the point where an FBI counterterrorism data fusion centre in Virginia was utilizing intelligence gathered by the private security arm of the Richmond Federal Reserve Bank. Here again, we see the virtual fusion of governmental agencies and corporate interests to protect the Globalist Deep State.

Another arm of the Cultural Deep State – one that often does not receive much in the way of mention – is the key importance of non-governmental organizations in pushing Globalist ideals onto other states. These organizations, such as the National Endowment for Democracy, receive millions of dollars from globalist-backed sources, usually either the United States Government, the governments of its allies, or wealthy philanthropists, to spread globalist ideals and ideology into other states in order to create a 'civil society' amenable to financial, economic and cultural penetration by the US-led international order.

Here the example that we can use is that of Russia, and its legislative acts requiring foreign-funded NGOs to register as foreign agents, as well as requiring the disbanding of NGOs that threaten the constitutional order of the Russian Federation. The passage of such legislation, as well as legislation that prevented homosexual advocacy to youth in order to preserve traditional family values, inspired outrage in many Western nations and has led to an international effort to demonize Russia for its stand for traditionalist

Christian patriarchal culture. Here again, we see the hand of George Soros and his foundation, the Open Society Initiative – a NGO that ended up being banned from operating in Russia under its Law on Undesirable Organizations.

Conclusion

In the years since 9/11 and the 2008 GFC, we have seen an unprecedented weakening in the global power and influence of the American Hegemony. Nationalist movements across both Europe and the United States have been able to overcome institutional pressure and score victories against the Globalist ideology. The American Deep State itself has been battered by the growing dysfunction of the constitutional structures of the American Republic – whereas before it was often able to smoothly operate without fear of disorder, it has had to deal recently with congressional gridlock, budget mayhem, and repeated crises with both the Congressional debt limit saga as well as governmental shutdowns. The Globalist Deep State has been unable to prevent the winning success of the Brexit movement, as well as the rise of Donald Trump. The rise of Trump, in particular, represents the single greatest threat that the Globalist Deep State has ever faced in its 70-year existence.

What is the future of globalism, and of the Globalist Deep State? Regardless of whether or not it is able to defeat Donald Trump, and coronate Hillary Clinton, one of its foremost operatives, to the Presidency, it will still have to deal with the seemingly terminal decline of the American Republic. For all of its corporate parasitism, the Globalist Deep State, and Globalist ideology as a whole, still requires its host – the United States of America – to survive. And as time goes on, it is becoming increasingly clear that the United States is coming apart at the seams, as all multinational empires eventually do.

Signed,
– A low-level dissident insider of the Globalist Deep State.

Read More: The War Between Donald Trump And The Deep State

Michael Davidson
Michael Davidson is the pseudonym of an active-duty officer in a NATO military.

5 Ugly Framing Tactics Leftists Use To Insult Dissenters

March 3, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Against the liberal propensity to push leftwards constantly, conservatives have spent decades emphasizing common sense and "values." They derided liberal intellectuals for fetishizing language, thus losing track of seemingly evident realities and boundaries.

It may be true that at least a non-negligible proportion of liberals give an excessive importance to words, to the point where key concepts of life are considered as arbitrary "social constructions." Yet, so far, the liberal approach has been more powerful. Libtards may be wrong on their explanations but they know how to manipulate, pressure, enforce boundaries, twist language, and further their own narrative in the process.

You likely already heard about frames: when approaching a girl, you may want to come across as playful and funny, and if she doesn't turn you off, you will start escalating and sexualize the interaction. If you never sexualize, be it only through talking about relationships and sex, the girl will likely perceive you as asexual or shy—or of a low value—and put you into the dreaded friendzone. Bantering, negging, sexualizing are ways to frame the interaction so that you can lead it to a notch.

Frames matter in social life. They also matter in politics. Frames structure the thoughts and interaction. They draw attention on some aspects of life while letting other aspects ignored. If unconscious, and they are never more efficient than when unfelt, they lead to bias and implicit assumptions. Leftists know this, and this is why their whole school-media-culture machine is loaded with biased descriptions, unsaid taboos and hysterical denials.

This piece is the first of a series about concepts often used by Leftism to frame public consciousness and acceptable discourse and that need, as their own vocabulary says, some deconstruction. We're starting with the insults.

1. "Far right"

According to them, that's us. The manosphere is supposed to belong to the "far right." Schematically, we are supposedly more on the right than the "standard right." Said right has shown spineless, ideologically weak, ready to do various lobbies' biddings and back down when SJWs attack. When you are aware of this, you can deduce that being considered more on the right is perhaps a sign of integrity—but the left eagerly denies the RINO's mainstream "right"'s weakness in order to pretend they had an adversary.

The mainstream, that is, cucked culture, paints the "far right" through a rather negative light. The label is associated with Hitler, the Holocaust, and various sensations such as marching boots sounds and the sight of ugly skinheads, not to mention scary music. A lot of priming is going on here: when we were children, we could barely understand a thing about politics, but the teachers already ingrained us with what retrospectively seems crude war propaganda.

Indeed, the very Left that says any acknowledgment of human biodiversity is essentialist entertains itself an essentialist conception of the "far right." The label denotes a kind of quintessential negative in politics, a perpetual villain that always threatens to swamp "democracy" or other positive buzzwords but is also defeated by heroic liberals—or cuckservatives if the "far right" appears embodied by foreigners.

In a blue-pilled mind, the "far right" label sparks a psychology of cleanliness. It is seen as ritually unclean, like a moral equivalent of feces, something dirty or infectious one would rather put aside than even try to understand. In 2002, when the National Front president Jean-Marie Le Pen reached the second round of the president election, journalists hysterically shouted: “Quarantine them off!” As if a legal political party embodied a kind of disease. Of course, when such a negativity is ascribed without reflection to someone, the “normal” have no problem throwing on him any negative epithet. Hence the conflation of anything the Left would shriek at with the arch-villainous Hitler. Doubts about feminism or immigration? That’s “far right”, and if it is “far right”, then Hitler!

When one enters the actual social or cultural milieu beyond the label, one quickly sees the falsehood of the leftist-essentialist view. Ideologies that were deemed progressive and left-leaning on their time, such as classical liberalism, end up labelled “far right” after the political mainstream kept drifting leftwards, thus abandoning those who wouldn’t drift. This is why the place is loaded with ideological diversity: everything labelled “far right” doesn’t share a common essence but have all been dumped there by the left. The enduring use of the expression among liberals merely shows how much they need to craft a bogey enemy to legitimate their own perpetual discontent and play on fears.

2. Extremism

Everywhere there is a continuum, things or categories span from average to extreme depending on their relative position. Extremes tend to be more visible because of their sheer difference from the average or center. In politics, extremes are always relative to a particular Overton window and associated range of acceptability.

The so-called progressives have had their extremists. After 1789, secularist revolutionaries in France quickly drifted towards terror, massively using the guillotine against anyone straying out of their ideological path, massacring hundreds of thousands of peasants in Vendée. Likewise, Bolshevists gruesomely killed an untold number of people to build a “classless” society in Russia, before Maoists in China did the same at an even greater scale during the “Great Leap Forward.”

When confronted to noticeable extremists of its own, the left uses a variety of strategies. One of them is sheer self-complacent progressivism: what appeared extremist at moment

A became normal at B and C because it was part of an intrinsic “progress.” The mainstream at A was simply less evolved than the mainstream at B and C, and the seemingly extremist became normal because it ought to.

Another strategy is the sophistication, mainstreaming, and de-responsabilization of Leftist extremism. The radical left—“radical” sounding better than “far”—is deemed interesting to study with high standards of charity and detail. It then becomes an object of culture, and turns mainstream. At the same time, so-called researchers start to deny the responsibility of extremists, blaming it on external circumstances, or flat-out denying that extremists come from the Left in spite of their paths and practices. For example, “Stalin was not a leftist” or “John Money’s experiences have nothing to do with gender feminism.”

Both of these positive reinforcement strategies have a reversal with negative ones geared against us. We are supposedly conservative or reactionary—categories deemed uncool, unfashionable, barely tolerated at the wrong side of the system—and aren’t considered through an intellectual charity principle but rather as metapolitical scoundrels who can be freely amalgamated with other intellectual scoundrels, be them Margaret Thatcher or Hitler, without possibility to appeal.

We are “extremists” when seen through the lenses of a distorted, degenerated standard. What is the legitimacy of a cultural world that deems Maoists scholars “normal”, immigrant rapists “victims”, and shrieking obese women heroic, whereas patriots, fathers and blond families are labelled extremists?

3. “Supremacism”

According to the accusatory Leftist narrative, we, straight-white-males—it is supposed to be a social identity—are alleged to have been dominating the world through “oppression.” Incidentally, “the world” quickly becomes synonymous with “minorities”, a concept used to create class identities from very different and previously unsuspecting social categories.

Women, although they are more numerous than men, are deemed a “minority.” Patriarchy is understood as “male supremacy” over women. Is that really so? Actually, a patriarchy means complementarity and natural harmony: men and women, having different abilities and different needs, also have different social roles and sets of responsibilities. This existed in all civilizations for thousands of years. The very late charge of “male supremacy” aims at making women willing to be men and dissatisfied with their natural condition.

The “supremacist” label also appears associated with “white.” Then, I ask, supremacy on what? If “white supremacism” denotes wanting to remain the majority and in control of the lands of our ancestors, in a civilization built by our ancestors, then “white supremacism” is exactly what the left supported for other peoples: a right to self-determination and autonomy, emancipation from invaders and unwanted immigration, the recovering of sovereignty.

More than often, the desire for holding again the reins of our own civilization is associated with the defence of reciprocity—which contradicts “supremacism.” Most of us, I think, would be OK with Muslims practicing their religion on their own lands and refraining from invading ours. Respect entails reciprocity. The Left constantly ignores this and pushes baseless accusations in order to paint us as perpetual villains. Also, the left’s very intolerance to intellectual diversity allows to speak fairly of its only too real ideological supremacism.

4. Privilege

One of the main totem poles in colleges these days is the “X privilege.” White privilege! Male privilege! Check your privilege! I’m miserable because I’m oppressed by you! I may be a millionaire actress, I'm still oppressed by the mere existence of cishets!

Two things ought to be noticed. First, the notion of privilege as used by leftists opposes both merit and fair inheritance. Merit stems from ability, work, choices. Someone who worked hard and skillfully to answer a particular need deserves his reward. Likewise, inheritance is what maintains an identity beyond generations and motivates to work. For example, I want to hand down at least some of my books to my children at a later age, and I haven't been "privileged" to get them—I scanned the market and pondered before buying this one and letting that one to someone else.

"Privilege" implies that individuals are all equal, all the same. They were simply born in different situations. They would have no merit, no right to inheritance, no genuine identity or vocation. They only live in a situation painted as unfair. Thus, those who are lucky enough to be recognized as "underprivileged" are not to be judged according to their peculiar abilities or choices—everything is blamed on the environment and then on us, even though we have already been much dispossessed for decades.

Second, the Leftist narrative and corollary accusations ignore actual privilege. I mean, pseudo-rights that are undeserved, untied to deep identity, wholly created by Leftist managers such as being handed a job from affirmative action, pussy pass, or having a high sexual market value with scant or no effort.

5. "Troll!"

This one is mostly used as an imputation of intention. If you are labelled a troll, you are accused of willfully trying to disrupt a previously equilibrated and peaceful social exchange. It is highly ironical when media and liberals accuse us of trolling whereas they have been playing on emotional rhetoric and pushing for disruptive "causes" for decades.

Some researchers tried to psychologize and essentialize the “trolls” as Dark Triads, a maneuver implying a clear double standard, as we can be deemed psychopaths through a biased and uncontextualized study while noticing the lower IQ or impulse control of a well-known ethnic group is deemed unacceptable. Of course, we’ve got no excuse for trolling (if we are really trolling once), it is all our fault with no external cause—the exact opposite of the minority-are-responsible-for-nothing view.

Trolling is real and complex. It can be interpreted as art. It can also be explained by political correctness—some of us needed to troll because they couldn’t identify with what the social world had become, or clumsily tried to rid themselves of ingrained Leftism. I suspect some people became real trolls because they were labelled as such and unduly punished by Leftist with authority positions.

Conclusion

Everything proper to the Cathedral’s narrative and viewpoints ought to be sifted. A neotraditional or neomasculine perspective associated with the use of a critical viewpoint is a winning combination.

Negative buzzwords crafted against us, beside their immediate relevance, give a window into the wider conceptual universe of libtards. Some of the suspicious concepts raised here along the way will be considered later. Stay tuned.

Read Next: Two Major Media Outlets That Defamed ROK As Pro-Rape Are Laying Off Hundreds Of Journalists

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

The Decline Of National Public Radio (NPR)

March 3, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Over the Christmas holidays I turned on my radio, and NPR was playing a story about a mother who was on a quest to let her young toddler become a transvestite.

I heard a similar story a year ago, and reacted with shock and anger. This time, I merely laughed. Partly because I have become acclimated to hearing of such degeneracy, and partly because I can see so clearly how media is being used as a propaganda tool.

Tumblr Mania!

Sadly, this has thoroughly infected the American National Public Radio network, which used to be a good source of entertainment and information, free from commercial interests and able to explore unique ideas and topics without regard to their ability to sell advertising revenue. I can pinpoint exactly when this change began: 2004, and when it became overwhelming: 2016.

The starting point was the firing of Peabody Award winning Morning Edition host Bob Edwards in 2004. Edwards had joined the network in 1974, and just shy of his 25th anniversary with the popular morning news show, he was abruptly fired, with executives wanting a “younger, hipper” image (oddly enough, the 56 year old Edwards was quite popular among younger listeners).

Edwards with his wife Windsor Johnston

Controversial Firing Of A Man In His Prime

The network received over 50,000 letters in protest, more feedback than they had ever received on a single topic, presumably even more than the number who have written in to complain about transvestite toddler children stories. But nevertheless, Edwards was replaced.

What I remember about Edwards was his incredible talent as an interviewer, crafting intelligent and interesting questions, a skill that I find in no major media journalist I could name today; podcaster Joe Rogan comes close. He has a great skill of touching on a topic his guest is knowledgeable in, and drawing out interesting information that they would not otherwise discuss.

Edwards plays a vital part in his interviews, but is never the star. Unlike the long-winded modern reporters who love to hear the sound of their own voice, Edwards prefers to let his guest tell an interesting story, but draws out important points and seizes on new ideas that spring up in the conversation. He's always educated and informed about his guest and the topic at hand.

Idiots Promoted To White House Press Corps

Listening to Edward's intelligent and curious questions is a sharp and painful contrast to the modern American press corps. Even when there is a major story at hand, the modern press will ask the most absurd, ridiculous, and self-evident questions.

I think you could take a stranger off the street, place them on the podium at a White House briefing, and they would be able to answer many of the poor questions the press poses.

Now, don't get me wrong, the answers given by these PR schmucks are worse than the questions, and any press secretary of the past 20 years needs to be punched in the face and made to work in an outsourced substandard meat packing plant for the rest of his days.

In the most recent White House press conference, the journalists started off by asking the important question of what Donald Trump plans to do about a tranny bathroom in the White House. Yes, the national media who is charged with informing and spurring discussion amongst the 300 million Americans is concerned about the five trannies who may visit the White House this year and be confused about where to urinate. I'm sorry but I couldn't continue watching. This is not a question an intelligent man would ever ask.

Edwards hosted an XM radio show for about a decade before finally retiring in 2015. After his departure, the staff and content of NPR gradually changed over the next decade, replacing career journalists with a passion for education and radio with millennial social justice warriors fresh out of college.

The Merits Of Radio

The old joke is that those who choose radio over television do so for a lack good looks– a "face for radio." But in reality, radio hosts have an entirely different set of skills, the most important being voice quality. ROK has featured multiple articles on speaking deeply, and well, and the art of conversation. For decades, those who wanted to enter radio needed to develop excellent speaking skills. This includes a slow, clear, deep voice, with strong enunciation, articulate and precise speech patterns and vocabulary, and vocal range.

Listen to any popular radio host, and you will find this. The hosts speak clearly, slowly, and are easy to understand. Howard Stern has a deep voice and speaks carefully and clearly. So does Rush Limbaugh. The voice of Christian financial host Dave Ramsey is a bit more high pitched and nasal, but very easy to understand, and he speaks slowly and clearly. Put briefly, not everyone can make it in radio.

Equality Trumps Quality

Until recently, one could tune in to most any program, and expect to hear a professional host, well-trained by a speech coach, who is skilled at communicating an idea auditorially. However, as the skin color, age, and sexual preference of the speaker became more important than their skills, standards have been thrown out the window and we have seen not only breaking of speech rules, but outright acceptance of poor speech patterns.

Vocal Fry

Vocal Fry is a low-pitched croaking sound made where the voice breaks or cracks during speech. It's a speaking disorder, according to speech pathologists, but those who publicly criticize it can be labeled "attacking women." Vocal fry is the opposite of femininity. Howard Stern discusses the phenomenon here.

Uptalk AKA Valley Girl Talk

Another extremely disturbing trend is the prevalence of sing-song speaking including ending the sentence with a higher pitch? As if the speaker is asking a question? When instead they are just making a statement? An example of vocal fry and uptalk is here. These speaking disorders are not only permitted, but they seem to be accepted, at least by radio producers. Listeners have reacted harshly, but criticism of poor speaking voices is seen as "female shaming" and shut down.

While females do seem to exhibit more of these annoying traits then men, I would posit that feminism has taught females they should be accepted for how they are, instead of working to improve themselves or develop a skill, and therefore most of these examples involve women.

Listening to a radio host with a speaking disorder is the equivalent of working out with a physically handicapped trainer.

Bias

Today, it is fairly common to hear anti-family, socially disruptive stories on the network, and the degree of unprofessionalism and emotion on behalf of some of the younger female hosts is unbearable.

What is the goal of these stories? Agitprop, or agitation propaganda, is a form of news or entertainment which exists primarily to spread a political or social message. In this case, a direct attack on masculinity, femininity, gender roles, authority, religion, and the family. In other words, an attack on the very heart of Western civilization. What do two thousand years of European history stand for, if not these values?

Attacking Western Values

A story sexualizing pre-pubescent children perverts social norms and attacks religious values. A story reinforcing the idea that sex is a mental state, and not a biological fact perverts gender roles, and weakens both masculinity and femininity. A story that a mother should make an emotional decision about sex concerning her pre-sexual child is a direct attack on authority and family. And the entire story desensitizes us to degeneracy.

At Home And Abroad

And what message are we giving new immigrants, tourists, and the rest of the world, who tune in to our national radio network and hear stories promoting gender reassignment surgery for children? Thankfully, most first generation immigrants are repulsed by this degeneracy, but their children typically accept it.

Molding The Next Generation

This is how a culture is shaped, and this is what we must target for change if we are to have a sane society in the future. Because a President Trump can last for only 8 years, and the next generation who don't even know his name, is already growing up in a degenerate, agitprop atmosphere of social programming and third wave feminism.

If we don't change that, the name Trump will just be another dead white guy in the history books to them. Return Of Kings and sites like it are leading the charge of combating this propaganda, and we have plans for much more in the future.

Read More: 5 Examples Of CNN's "Fake News"

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

If You Can Only Lose Weight To Get Revenge, Something Is Wrong With You

March 3, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Have you noticed the rise in "revenge body" stories recently? Google Trends certainly has. Formerly overweight or plain obese women have been flocking to news outlets, bragging about how they managed to finally get rid of the pounds after their boyfriend, fiancé, or husband dumped or criticized them. The male exes are then routinely lambasted for being "mean" and not "deserving" the newly transformed women they used to have.

Here is some of the tripe that has graced newspapers and computer screens of late:

- 'I was dumped for being fat… look at my revenge body'
- Woman loses 45kg after boyfriend breaks up with her, now says being dumped is 'the best thing that ever happened' to her
- 'BEING DUMPED IS THE BEST THING THAT EVER HAPPENED TO ME' Obese 19st lass sheds SEVEN STONE to get the perfect revenge body after boyfriend ditched her on a romantic weekend
- Jess' revenge body! Dumped MAFS bride shows off her enviable new figure… and puts it down to 'cutting the negative people out of my life'

On the one hand, these women losing weight might seem like the exact thing Return Of Kings has been preaching for years—stopping the proliferation of human whales. Conversely, however, it demonstrates a kind of toxic self-absorption. Yes, the women may look a whole lot better, some of them even being hot. But you end up asking yourself why they didn't bother losing weight in the first place. Why couldn't they have done it for their partner, to show him their best self? Or for their children?

If a woman's definition of transformation and self-improvement depends on making the man she kept herself fat for jealous, the problem is almost certainly with her. In nearly all these cases where a man left an overweight or obese woman, he had better options and chose to take them. Any self-respecting man would, too. In addition, it is doubtful, perhaps even impossible that these women would have lost weight out of love or consideration for their boyfriend, fiancé, or husband. Everything depended on the rage that developed after they were rejected.

This article should serve as a warning to anyone who dates or wants to date a former fatty. Whilst the superficial package may seem fine, you're potentially dealing with a powder-keg of female victimhood. If revenge, not a self-directed effort at improvement, has been the driving force behind her changes in life, you may have a hard time with this girl in many other areas.

Social and mainstream media will always reward this female narcissism

Did you really need thoughts of revenge to lose weight?

One thing I did not know before researching for this article was that Khloe Kardashian (the mannish Kardashian sister) hosts a show called Revenge Body. This shining light of television consists of women, with a gay man also thrown in, getting "revenge" on their exes by finally exercising and eating right. The shifting of responsibility engaged in by this show mirrors the very perverse social media validation women get for losing weight only after being dumped.

At no point do even small numbers of people appear to say things like, “Maybe he dumped you because you didn’t respect him enough to take care of yourself.” Worse still are the attempts of the former fatties to blame “toxic” people, especially the ex-partner, for them originally being overweight or obese. Again, while many of these women may now be bangable, their supreme lack of personal responsibility (remember, all their changes depended on someone else’s actions) may make them about as suitable for a long-term relationship as they were when they weighed 100 pounds more.

A man should never regret dumping a woman who falls below his expectations

Losing weight is only one part of restoring women.

You are going to meet exes who have improved themselves (or seem to have improved themselves) since you dumped them. If it’s not a law or fact of life, it’s close to it. In my life, most of the positive changes I have seen in my ex-girlfriends have been oriented around their personalities, whether an apparent return to the personality that once attracted me or sometimes even a vibe I had never seen in them before.

Though I might briefly ponder what could have been, I quickly snap myself out of that thought pattern. The causal factors behind a girl’s potential self-improvement during and after a relationship are usually very different. In fact, in the case of the “during” part, these factors frequently don’t exist. She likely wouldn’t have bettered herself without a man leaving her, so moving on was the right choice.

The same goes for a man whose girlfriend has physically improved since he dumped her. Given the truly poisonous presence of modern-day feminism, it is highly unlikely that a woman you dumped after she gained weight was going to exercise and eat right for you. This is not to say that you and I cannot improve our chances of preventing women from sliding down physically and emotionally. But just as an overweight woman can regard herself as a victim during her relationship ("Why can't he accept me for who I am?"), that same woman can regard herself as a victim of rejection when she loses weight to spite her ex-partner.

By all means bang a girl who has shed her excess pounds. Just be careful and judicious about dating her.

Read More: 35 Pretty Girls Who Became Fat And Ugly

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

6 Benefits Of Hitting The Gym That May Surprise You

March 4, 2017 | by Sterling Graham | Link | Original Link

We all know that going to the gym all the time will cause you to get in better shape, that is of course if you're actually putting in work while you're there.

That's pretty much the only benefit, right? Because what else could being at the gym actually offer you? Well it's more than you might think and I'll be breaking down each one in this article for you.

1. You Could Be Making Job Connections Without Knowing It

A buddy and I always would hit the gym together around the same time and would see the same people in there. That same buddy was also running into an employment issue after recently being laid off.

Hearing us talk about it, one of the other members in the gym, who'd we had seen pretty much every day had offered him a job in a semi-similar field that he was just laid off from.

One of the main reasons he said offered him the job was, "I see you show up here every day at the same time and put in a solid workout each day. This shows to me that you at least are consistent on sticking to something which is where I'm having some issues with on some current employees". So you may be interviewing for a job every day without even knowing it.

2. More Opportunities To Get Laid With Better Looking Women

The gym can be a great place to pull some great looking women. I've spoken with quite a few girls that say they have friends that actually go to the gym so "to try an hook up with hot guys."

This isn't to say you should try to hit on every girl you see at the gym, but if a good looking girl is throwing you some signals then more power to you!

3. Changes The Way Women Look At You

Obviously when you start lifting weights and packing on some muscle, the ladies are going to start looking at you in a better way.

This doesn't do much though if you don't know how to talk to women, or does it? Here's a scenario for you: You have a guy who is very shy and is also on the average to smaller range in terms of his body build.

Most women would look at him as awkward. Take that same guy and throw some muscle on him, that awkward guy now becomes “mysterious” rather than shy and awkward. Don’t underestimate how much power having some muscle actually has on the female mind.

4. Spend Less Time Being Sick

Of course working out helps you stay in better overall shape but there are also studies showing how it can assist in your overall immune system.

That means less time with a crappy throat, and less money being spent on meds and doctor visits. Use those sick days ‘cough’ for doing better things than having to recover.

5. Get More Work Done Outside Of The Gym

Most people think if they skip the gym that they'll have more time to get others tasks done which is understandable. Newtons first law of motion fits perfectly here, which states that a body in motion stays in motion.

I notice if I ever take some time off from the gym and go straight home after work then all I want to do is just lay around and watch TV, or heck even take a nap.

However, when I hit the gym after work, I find myself coming home and starting to work my website or playing with my dog. Give it a shot for at least a week and let your body adjust, don't go one day and expect to have some superhuman energy after, be realistic here.

6. Meeting Some Pretty Cool People

Making friends can be somewhat difficult once you get out of school, this is more so for guys than girls from what I've gathered. If you do find someone who seems pretty cool, then they may not be into the same type of hobbies that you are.

Well when you meet someone at the gym, then you at least have a general idea that the two of you have something in common. The gym is the one of the ultimate bro hangouts, very much so how barbershops use to be for guys. Of course you're actually getting a workout in but in-between sets but you can still shoot the shit with other gym goers, which has led me to meeting some really cool people who have turned into strong friendships.

So don't be too focused on your workout to take your music out of your ears every once in a while to chat with other people in the gym.

Conclusion

Being in better shape and better overall health is enough of a benefit to get to the gym anyways, but there are also some bonuses that you never expect like the ones I've listed in this article.

Someone of these you may have already noticed but really didn't think much of it until after reading this.

Overall, though, I would say don't try to force any of these to happen—just hit the gym, do your workout, and a lot of this stuff will just happen naturally over time.

Read More: How To Get Up In The Morning Without Hitting Snooze

Save

Sterling Graham
Sterling is a writer, fitness junkie and loves all things technology. Sterling is the owner of ChainsToGains.com, which is where you can get in touch with him if you have any questions/comments.

3 Feminists Who Caused The Most Harm To The World

March 4, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Most blue pill people think that feminism is only about equality. We know that's baloney. Further, the big-name feminists are quite often kooky, man-hating extremists, influenced by Marxism, or all the above. Some people endlessly deny that any of them are like that, but the following characters prove otherwise. Here are three of them who were so far out in the deep end that it would take a Coast Guard search and rescue team to reel them back in.

Despite their considerable issues (to say the least), they all hold a prominent place in "herstory". Untold numbers of feminist professors laud them as heroines in women's studies classes, poisoning the minds of young students each semester.

Andrea Dworkin

Apparently it was a bad hair day.

This charming lass was pretty big (if you'll pardon the expression) in the feminist movement. Born to two radical parents, she endeavored to be a writer and an activist. Later, she married a Dutch anarchist. By her account, he abused her severely. This was quite unfortunate, but like so many feminists, she projected her bad experiences onto all men.

She was one of the ones who popularized the "all sex is rape" meme—she didn't say so exactly, but close enough, for example: "Intercourse is the pure, sterile, formal expression of men's contempt for women." Also, "intercourse itself may be immune to reform." Actually, she did figure out a way to reform the primordial dance of ecstasy, but I'm a little skeptical that this would be much of an improvement:

> For men I suspect that this transformation begins in the place they most dread—that is, in a limp penis. I think that men will have to give up their precious erections and begin to make love as women do together.

It's a little too much to imagine even some male feminist following this edict; "Honey, let's scissor, and I'll try not to get hard."

Likewise, she fueled the "all pornography is violence against women" meme. She got into a very public spat with the porn industry. Unfortunately for her, one of them dug up the following from her 1974 book Woman Hating:

> The parent-child relationship is primarily erotic because all human relationships are primarily erotic.

Paging Dr. Freud… If that wasn't bad enough:

> The incest taboo, because it denies us essential fulfillment with the parents whom we love with our primary energy, forces us to internalize those parents and constantly seek them. The incest taboo does the worst work of the culture… The destruction of the incest taboo is essential to the development of cooperative human community based on the free-flow of natural androgynous > eroticism.

That's interesting, shall we say.

After she died at age 58 from a cheeseburger overdose, she was glowingly lauded by feminists, despite her being a whack job. As Gloria Steinem Herself put it, "In every century, there are a handful of writers who help the human race to evolve. Andrea is one of them."

A small selection of more kooky quotes:

> Under patriarchy, every woman's son is her betrayer and also the inevitable rapist or exploiter of another woman.

Welcome to Feminist Demagoguery 101. The next one is mind-boggling:

> Childbearing is glorified in part because women die from it.

Quite fortunately, that's pretty rare these days, thanks to modern medicine. As it happens, all that was overwhelmingly developed by men—how about a little credit where it's due?

> Pregnancy is confirmation that the woman has been fucked: it is confirmation that she has a cunt… The display marks her as a whore… Her belly is proof that she has been used. Her belly is his phallic triumph… The pregnancy is punishment for her participation in sex. She will get sick, her body will go wrong in a thousand different ways, she will die. The sexual excitement is in her possible death… And now, the doctors have added more sex–to birth itself… They cut directly into the uterus with a knife—a surgical fuck.

Apparently she was unaware that a caesarean section is meant to be a lifesaving procedure. I wonder if she ever shared her potty-mouthed misconceptions about mammalian biology with her mother? On second thought, not even Sigmund Freud could have cured her.

Shulamith Firestone

Some feminists actually do have good hair, who knew?

Born in Ottawa as Shulamith Bath Shmuel Ben Ari Feuerstein, she grew up in Kansas City and St. Louis. She was raised in a highly religious background, and later got a degree in painting from the School of the Art Institute of Chicago. Then she went to New York City and got heavily into radical feminist activism. In 1970, she wrote The Dialectic of Sex: The Case for Feminist Revolution (full text here), basically wrapping feminism and Marxism into an ideological burrito. Like I've been telling you, Second Wave feminism was inspired by Communism. These days, the cultural Marxism burrito has gotten a lot bigger with the "intersectionality" business, but all that's another story.

Loading...

Naturally, she described traditional family life as oppression. This is despite the fact that a husband and wife are a team supporting each other, and by far the best environment for raising children.

Later, she retired from politics and took up painting again. Her mental health declined, and her second and final book described repeated hospitalizations for paranoid schizophrenia. In 2012, her decomposing body was found in her New York apartment, possibly dead from starvation. Although she was beholden to two noxious ideologies, still I can't help but feel a twinge of sorrow at this sad fate.

As a glowing tribute put it:

> Firestone… did not have sex. In fact, she was a political celibate. She encouraged other women to become celibate. Some of them did.
>
> […]
>
> Firestone wanted to eliminate the following things: sex roles, procreative sex, gender, childhood, monogamy, mothering, the family unit, capitalism, the government, and especially the physiological phenomena of pregnancy and childbirth. She wanted to mechanize reproduction—gestating fetuses in artificial wombs—and raise the offspring communally, treating them no differently from adults at the earliest possible age.
>
> […]
>
> When parents choose to raise their children gender-neutral, a lot of that's Firestone. When we hail advances in artificial reproduction, we're seeing developments that Firestone championed decades ago. When writers theorize about the end of men, they're tearing whole pages out of Firestone's book.
>
> […]
>
> Firestone was a radical biological materialist, but in her fervor she at times resembled a martyr or a saint.

Did her oncoming problems influence her ideology? If so, she couldn't help it, but one need not take people with screws loose very seriously.

Kooky quotes:

> Natural reproduction is neither in women's best interests nor in those of the children so reproduced. The joy of giving birth—invoked so frequently in this > society—is a patriarchal myth. In fact, pregnancy is barbaric, and natural childbirth is at best necessary and tolerable and at worst it is like shitting a pumpkin.

Was that considerable hyperbole, or some misconceptions about basic anatomy? Your call.

> And just as the end goal of socialist revolution was not only the elimination of the economic class privilege but of the economic class distinction itself, so the end goal of feminist revolution must be, unlike that of the first feminist movement, not just the elimination of male privilege but of the sex distinction itself: genital differences between human beings would no longer matter culturally.

What is it with feminists being upset about humans being a sexually dimorphic species? There's no sense in getting mad about things you can't control, like basic biology.

> It is only the failure of my plots I fear.

I take the opposite view. Anyway, she was a nut, but at least she didn't shoot anyone…

Valerie Solanas

The law takes a dim view of attempted murder.

This sweetie comes in as the number one bunny boiler here. She grew up with horrific abuse, though for some odd reason remained close to her father. Despite being a lesbian, she was a hooker, an occupation which doesn't always bring out the best in people. However, you have to take her word with a pretty big grain of salt given her mental problems. Even so, she had it together enough in her early days to get a degree (in psychology, of course).

Her history with Andy Warhol is a bit convoluted, but things went downhill after he lost the manuscript of her play called Up Your Ass. (That's not a piece likely to win a Tony award, though the manuscript was rediscovered much later and someone actually put it on.) Since she happened to be a paranoid schizophrenic, naturally she drew the wrong conclusions about the lost manuscript. Then she shot Andy Warhol, severely injuring him—a hell of a way to get her fifteen minutes of fame.

She got a three year prison sentence for attempted murder, illegal gun charges, and assault. She got one year off as time served for her pre-trial stay in the loony bin. After her release, she continued to stalk Warhol.

Kooky quote:

> Life in this society being, at best, an utter bore and no aspect of society being at all relevant to women, there remains to civic-minded, responsible, thrill-seeking females only to overthrow the government, eliminate the money system, institute complete automation and destroy the male sex.

This is the opening sentence of a well-named rant called the SCUM Manifesto (SCUM is an abbreviation for "Society for Cutting Up Men", full text here). After that line, it only gets worse. So she wanted a Communist revolution, Skynet to become self-aware, and death to all men. Yes, she meant it, and she said so.

Wiping out half the world's population seems just a wee bit extremist, of course. Still, despite being a paranoid schizophrenic and a violent criminal, her lovely rant is included in several feminist anthologies.

In summary

If Second Wave feminists had access to decent psych meds back in the day, their movement might have been considerably less toxic. Well, maybe not. Are other feminists denouncing any of these nut-jobs? You'll hear scarcely a peep from them. The silence is deafening.

Read More: 5 Modern Day Social Justice Warriors Who Would Have Been Institutionalized In The Past

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

5 Pieces Of Gym Paraphernalia That You Don’t Need

March 5, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

After going to the gym for a few months, a newbie lifter will likely become more serious and dedicated to the sport. Shortly thereafter, that lifter will begin seeking an edge, to make himself stronger and more able than his fellow gymgoers.

Seeing as I generally assume that my readers are decent, law-abiding citizens, the “edge” that I am referring to is not the advantage one gets from performance enhancing drugs. Instead, I am referring to an edge that you can obtain from various accessory paraphernalia you buy from an external source, and then use in the gym to either immediately improve your lifts, or make the lift more difficult and thus make you stronger in the long term.

This paraphernalia, much like any other category of things you can buy, runs the gamut from essential (not many), kind of useful but unnecessary (most), and complete crap (some). But seeing as we here at Return Of Kings are very much against the consumer culture that is modernity, I’m largely going to tell you not to buy things. So without further ado, here are five pieces of gym paraphernalia that you don’t need.

1. Elevation Masks

Let’s get the big one out of the way right off the bat. In any gym nowadays, you can walk in and see some guy running on a treadmill or doing some other cardio exercise while wearing one of these, the idea of which is to restrict breathing and thus force the body to produce more red blood cells to oxygenate itself, simulating the effects of cardio training in high altitude environments. Sounds good, right?

Unfortunately, the effects of living and training in alpine environments—i.e., increased hemoglobin content and greater lung capacity, all of which are documented for you HBD enthusiasts—are something the body gradually adapts to over many weeks or months—adaptations which the body will lose after living at sea level for a few months, and thus have to be regained. Which is why actual professional athletes, when desiring high altitude training…will live in a high altitude environment for weeks before the event.

Your body is not going to adapt after 30 minutes of running on a treadmill at sea level. You might as well just run while holding your breath.

As if that wasn’t dumb enough, sometimes you’ll see guys wearing this altitude mask while weightlifting, which is even more pointless. Unless, of course, you were planning on going to the San Diego Comic Convention to cosplay as Bane…or you happen to be an overcompensating manlet who wants to cosplay as Bane in his daily life.

2. Treadmills

Yeah, I said it—I've always preferred running on actual ground to running on treadmills, and thus I see treadmills as the epitome of gym equipment that technically works, but is completely superfluous.

Treadmills will certainly give you a good cardio workout, but I just can't find myself getting enthused by the prospect of running in place for 30 minutes. Not when there's an actual world outside the gym full of fresh air and Vitamin D-imparting sunshine instead. And don't give me any crap about "Oh it's too cold/hot, I can't run outside." Hydrate properly, wear temperature appropriate clothing, and suck it up.

3. Fat Grips and Similar Items

Before anyone jumps down my throat, let me say: these are very useful, and will work to blast your forearms. My antipathy towards them is strictly a financial one. Seeing as I'm against the whole idea of spending money on things beyond the essentials, I would recommend improvising a training device that works exactly like the Fat Grips, but for cheap.

Just take a hand towel, and wrap it around the bar until it's sufficiently thick to impede your forearms. Then do whatever exercise it is you were planning on doing. The best part about this is that it has an adjustable level of thickness, which the commercial grip items don't have.

If the hand towel becomes too easy, try a bath towel instead.

4. Weight Belts And Wrist Wraps

Much like the fat grips, these are not so much useless as they are unnecessary for your average fitness hobbyist. A lot of hobbyists see professional powerlifters and World's Strongest Man competitors wearing these belts and using these wraps, and come to the conclusion that they will make you stronger.

However, what they don't understand is that the belts are used to brace the core through pressure on the abdomen, and are merely a safety device for these men lifting enormous weights that could cripple them if they move incorrectly.

What they are not for is being used by some scrawny nerd who's overhead pressing 100 pounds. In fact, having an external girding pressure on the core nullifies the development of the obliques and other muscles of the abdomen, which can lead to injury down the road.

I myself could overhead press 215 pounds before my car accident, and I have still never worn a belt. Proper form should be mastered, rather than relying on a tool.

On that note, my opinion of wrist wraps is the same. A useful safety device for the man deadlifting 900 pounds, completely pointless for the man deadlifting 200 pounds. Develop your hands and forearms without relying on wraps to bolster your weak hands. And finally…

5. Gloves

Vaguely similar to my opinions on wrist wraps, I feel that gloves actually hinder my grip on some exercises, hence why I stopped using them years ago. Besides, gloves take calluses away from your hands, and I have found that women love to feel the calluses on a man's hands.

Conclusion

When you get down to it, you don't really need to buy anything to enhance your gym going experience. Useful paraphernalia such as chalk and fat grips can be improvised at home, and everything else can be eschewed.

Read More: 5 Old School Tips For Getting Ripped

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

The Dysfunction Of Modern Society Is Proof That Cultural Marxism "Works"

March 5, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The social and political climate took a very sharp left turn during the mid-1960s, seemingly overnight. By the 1990s, political correctness began stifling free speech. Today, urban riots are back in style. California still had a conservative majority in the early 1980s, but today there's serious talk of secession since the last Presidential election. Why did things change so much?

This cultural revolution wasn't a spontaneous trend occurring from the normal ebb and flow of politics. The Frankfurt School started cultural Marxism; better known to the public today as progressivism. They were a think tank of Marxist professors and top-level psychologists, with significant inspiration from Communist theoreticians Antonio Gramsci and Gyorgy Lukacs. They wanted to wreck the foundations of traditional societies (the USA in particular) that made them strong; weakening social ties to make them ripe for Communist takeover. Their students became professors, educating the young Baby Boomers in the 1960s and creating the Counterculture. Today, the aging Boomers are holding the levers of power.

Today, progressivism—"Communism Lite"—is the leading ideology among Washington careerists, the media, academia, and ultra-wealthy managerial elites. Whether or not it's really progress is an evocative question. Still, ultimately this ideology is inherently dysfunctional. The only more dysfunctional thing imaginable would be a brigade of Californian hipsters attempting a second Pickett's Charge.

The 1960s political buffet

Man, I wouldn't believe half this stuff if I wasn't stoned all the time, dig?

This multifaceted strategy became several movements:

- Second-wave feminism was sold as equality. It was really about abortion, wrecking families, and driving a wedge between women and men.
- The LGBT movement was sold as respecting personal lifestyle choices. That was a blow to traditional morality.
- Minority identity politics was sold as civil rights. The reality wasn't always quite so lofty, and the result was inflaming grievances. Another result was promoting guilt trips, and expressions of majority identity politics got shrill condemnation.
- Mass immigration was sold as multiculturalism. This was a long-term population replacement strategy.
- Secularism was sold as religious neutrality. The result was diminished respect for this part of tradition, as well as later attempts (such as Atheism+) to push the SJW agenda. In practice, some religions are exempt from criticism.
- The sexual revolution was sold as liberation ("if it feels good, do it"). This other blow to morality unleashed a Pandora's Box of social ills: single motherhood becoming normalized, runaway welfare (a sociopolitical battering ram), and the deregulation of the sexual marketplace.

These viewpoints did exist in far more moderate forms previously, and every society does have its tensions. However, things were much more peaceful before all the demagoguery kicked into high gear during the crazy "kill your parents" 1960s. Society's acquiescence to their initial demands didn't placate them; it emboldened them, and they kept turning up the heat. By the 1990s, these movements had become politically correct orthodoxies. Questioning their premises openly could get you ridiculed, shouted down, or even targeted for a witch hunt.

Lately, the results have been far in excess of what the Frankfurt School ever imagined. Today's generation of cultural Marxists have developed elaborate rationalizations: privilege rhetoric, microaggression, "the personal is political", etc. Lately, the push is to erase all meaningful social distinctions:

- Women are encouraged to be unladylike (making them unattractive); men are encouraged to be wimps (which ruins the social life of anyone who believes that)
- The differences between the sexes are being blurred, which is picking up speed with the transsexuality fad
- Not only are meaningful distinctions between diverse population groups denied, there's been a long-term effort to dissolve humanity into a biological stir-fry, which would destroy diversity in the name of diversity

Individuals differ by biology and personal choices, so differences in outcomes are inevitable. Thus, their quest to make everyone the same is impossible, but they're doing a lot of damage in the attempt. Other than that, there's a general hostility toward any sorts of standards. Effectively, this has turned society on its head. Abnormal is the new normal. Fair is foul and foul is fair. Still, it gets worse yet.

Suicidalism

Figure 3

The article "Gramscian Damage" (worth a read in its entirety) further describes some items promoted by other pointy-headed leftist intellectuals. For starters:

> [I]n the 1930s members of CPUSA (the Communist Party of the USA) got instructions from Moscow to promote non-representational art so that the US's public spaces would become arid and ugly.
>
> Americans hearing that last one tend to laugh. But the Soviets, following the lead of Marxist theoreticians like Antonio Gramsci, took very seriously the idea that by blighting the U.S.'s intellectual and esthetic life, they could sap Americans' will to resist Communist ideology and an eventual Communist takeover. The explicit goal was to erode the confidence of America's ruling class and create an ideological vacuum to be filled by Marxism-Leninism.

What's truly remarkable is that the CIA got promoted this too (along with feminism); how brilliant! And then, a damning bill of particulars:

- There is no truth, only competing agendas.
- All Western (and especially American) claims to moral superiority over Communism/Fascism/Islam are vitiated by the West's history of racism and colonialism.

- There are no objective standards by which we may judge one culture to be better than another. Anyone who claims that there are such standards is an evil oppressor.
- The prosperity of the West is built on ruthless exploitation of the Third World; therefore Westerners actually deserve to be impoverished and miserable.
- Crime is the fault of society, not the individual criminal. Poor criminals are entitled to what they take. Submitting to criminal predation is more virtuous than resisting it.
- The poor are victims. Criminals are victims. And only victims are virtuous. Therefore only the poor and criminals are virtuous. (Rich people can borrow some virtue by identifying with poor people and criminals.)
- For a virtuous person, violence and war are never justified. It is always better to be a victim than to fight, or even to defend oneself. But 'oppressed' people are allowed to use violence anyway; they are merely reflecting the evil of their oppressors.
- When confronted with terror, the only moral course for a Westerner is to apologize for past sins, understand the terrorist's point of view, and make concessions.

These memes have far-reaching effects. Naive pacifism is an obvious one. (In fact, Herbert Marcuse of the Frankfurt School came up with the slogan "Make love, not war".) Suicidalism also inspired the liberal 1960s-1970s "soft on crime" approach which backfired badly and took far too long to start fixing. Gun control is another obvious one, a dead horse the left still hasn't abandoned. (Light sentences along with a disarmed public—what were they thinking?) This victim mentality is even why Social Justice Warriors brag about their mental problems to one-up each other about who is "least privileged". The article continues:

> As I previously observed, if you trace any of these back far enough, you'll find a Stalinist intellectual at the bottom. (The last two items on the list, for example, came to us courtesy of Frantz Fanon. The fourth item is the Baran-Wallerstein "world system" thesis.) Most were staples of Soviet propaganda at the same time they were being promoted by "progressives" (read: Marxists and the dupes of Marxists) within the Western intelligentsia.

I might add that the first item is heavily promoted by postmodernism and deconstructionism, big fads in academia. (Plato shot that down already; see Gorgias or the Republic.) Later:

> [M]ost of us no longer think of these memes as Communist propaganda. It takes a significant amount of digging and rethinking and remembering… to realize that there was a time… when all of these ideas would have seemed alien, absurd, and repulsive to most people—at best, the beliefs of a nutty left-wing fringe, and at worst instruments of deliberate subversion intended to destroy the American way of life.

And that's exactly what they were. The article also describes the KGB's "active measures" campaign, disinformation as well as useful idiots spreading their propaganda.

This is what KGB insider Yuri Bezmenov called ideological subversion.

Constructive or destructive?

I have to give credit where it's due.

Note well, the Soviet version of feminism was a token effort compared to ours. They left out the part about turning women against men, or trying to make people unisex. The USSR had a very diverse population, but promoted unity, and certainly didn't tolerate agitation against the Russian majority. Gay rights didn't exist; they got put in mental institutions. (Leftists today conveniently forget this, along with many other items of the USSR's less than stellar human rights record.) They were officially atheist, though largely co-opted the Russian Orthodox Church rather than stamping it out. The USSR exported revolution to impoverished nations, but didn't welcome in tens of millions them. They were prudish, rather than libertine. Although they spoke of pacifism, they didn't practice what they preached.

All the same was generally true for other Warsaw Pact nations. Also note well, Communist countries promoted high culture and didn't dumb down their educational system. Despite a token fuzzy internationalism, they promoted national pride, rather than guilt trips. They weren't soft on crime, to say the least.

Although they (and especially their sympathizers abroad in education and the media) were pushing cultural Marxism in the USA and other NATO countries, the Soviets weren't implementing that stuff themselves! Anyone there who proposed any of that would've been in serious trouble for deviationism. The reason is simple; "Communism Lite" was the "for export" version, meant to subvert Western countries and pave the way for the real deal.

So this is why progressivism is dysfunctional: it was designed that way. It wasn't about addressing inequities in society; they keep moving the goalposts as soon as their demands are met, now well beyond the point of absurdity. It wasn't about peace and love, but rather agitation. It wasn't even about social justice. It was all about ripping society apart at the seams to make the public angry and discontented. To put it bluntly, they wanted to make society suck as much as possible, to stir up revolutionary ferment. The ultimate goal was totalitarian power and control. Actually, it still is, but who benefits now?

Cultural Marxism deconstructed itself

One might ask: if the USSR is gone, why does cultural Marxism still exist? By the 1990s, a strange event had happened: mutual subversion. Russia ended up with a dysfunctional form of capitalism, while "Communism Lite" became the Western world's ruling ideology. The remaining Frankfurt School members were elderly and no longer at the forefront, but those they influenced had made Gramsci's "long march through the institutions." It's like one of those Star Trek plots where a powerful robot carries out orders it doesn't understand issued by its long-dead builder.

Cultural Marxism became a decentralized memeplex, spread by the media. Even those unenthusiastic about it wouldn't threaten their livelihoods by going against the grain. Educational bureaucrats are also deep in it, like ticks on a shaggy dog. "Inside the Beltway" politicians have taken it up wholeheartedly, even co-opting establishment Republicans into a controlled opposition. For all these types, it's their bread and butter.

Then there's a hive of professional activists and others implementing cultural Marxism, memebots still on orders from dead Soviet dictators. This includes foundation heads and staffers, community agitators, civil rights lawyers, petty bureaucrats, advertisers using their company's money to push sneaky social messages, diversity consultants hired by your HR department, and so forth. Social Justice Warriors are at the bottom of the barrel.

Some activists are genuine idealists believing they're saving the world. Others profiteer from it. Regardless, all think they're fighting the Establishment, not realizing they're part of it. These tools are exploited by those at the top, and they'd all be in for a big surprise if Communism ever emerged.

Other than that, champagne socialists enthusiastically support cultural Marxism. They live like kings in their gated communities, safe from street crime and engineered riots, making ridiculous amounts of wealth in cushy jobs. They have little in common with ordinary people, seldom interacting with them except for their servants.

Now wait a minute – aren't those the very types that the original Marxists bitterly opposed? That's as clear a sign as any that cultural Marxism has outlived its usefulness! If all they wanted was to make more money, it would be understandable, but they really should quit rocking the boat they're on. They too might one day be in for a big surprise if their hubris goes too far.

Read More: How Feminism Led Us To Demographic Annihilation

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

10 Methods You Can Use To Overcome Insomnia

March 6, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

I've suffered from insomnia due to various reasons ever since I was a boy. It was especially tough to go through the day during my high school and university days trying to focus in classes and study without energy while doing all I can to avoid dozing off. As a result of my insomnia, my grades suffered, I felt depressed most of the time, and I swear I would've grown at least three inches taller had I gotten proper sleep during my developmental years.

You don't realize just how important sleep is until you suffer from its loss. As strange as it may sound, as a basic bodily function responsible for your growth, recovery, and testosterone production that leads to better focus and productivity, I think it's safe to say that maintaining a healthy sleep hygiene is the most masculine thing you can do for your body besides lifting weights.

The following is a collection of my knowledge based on around a decade of personal experience, research, trial and error, and working in a sleep clinic. My sleep is still not perfect, but I have made vast improvements by following these methods.

1. Make sure you're not suffering from sleep apnea

If you suffer from poor sleep regardless of how long you pass out during the night, the first thing you should do is to rule out the possibility of a sleep apnea. Without getting too technical, sleep apnea is an obstruction of your airway during sleep that reduces the oxygen flow to your brain and causes many small wake ups throughout the night as your body tries to get you to breathe properly again. The sufferer may wake up fully during the night or will never reach a prolonged state of deep sleep without even being aware of it.

The signs and symptoms are:

- You wake up feeling groggy and tired like you didn’t sleep at all.
- You are known to snore loudly during the night.
- You frequently wake up (usually in panic) during dream episodes (sleep apneas usually occur during REM sleep).

You are also more likely to suffer from an apnea if you are obese or happen to be an Asian male.

If you suspect that you suffer from a sleep apnea, the best thing to do is to go to a sleep clinic to get yourself tested and go from there. But you can still apply the other principles here to improve your overall sleep hygiene.

2. Don’t touch your bed unless you are sleeping (or having sex)

Surest way to have a lousy sleep.

It’s really simple: You want your mind and body to associate your bed only with sleeping. This means no working, eating, reading, watching television, or going on your mobile device while you’re on your bed. The bed is only for sleeping and the other type of “sleeping.” And considering how our brain processes a room as one environment, I’ll go as far as to say that you should avoid doing anything other than sleeping in your bedroom. So, if you have a computer in the same space as your bed, move it out. If you have a desk in your bedroom for reading or studying, move it out. Do all non-essential activities outside of your bedroom.

Now, some people swear that reading or watching television in bed helps them fall asleep, but I highly discourage it for it could lead to poor sleeping habits.

3. Control your diet

For me, this was the biggest issue which even the doctors couldn’t figure out. I suffered from a severe insomnia due to thirst and a burning sensation that would hit me in middle of the night. It seems idiotically obvious now, but I finally realized that the problem had come from the fact that I was in the habit of eating spicy food for dinner.

If you're sensitive to spicy or salty food like I am, it's best to avoid those types of food for the evening along with other heavy food that are high in fat and protein. In fact, it's best not to eat anything so close to bed time as your stomach will be busy working while you're trying to sleep. My sleep improved drastically when I started going to bed with an empty stomach by avoid eating anything past 6pm.

4. Stop consuming stuff that affects your sleep

It's tempting to drink coffee or even an energy drink when you're sleepy, but if you're an insomniac, you must resist the urge to escape the the cycle of misery. I would also avoid anything loaded with sugar (it's bad for you anyway) and avoid alcohol as well. A glass of wine may help you fall asleep, but the quality of your deep sleep will suffer without you knowing it.

5. Sleep and wake up on regular times

Your mind and body has a clock of its own and it likes to stick to a schedule. Always try to go to bed at the same time and wake up at the same time to maintain optimal sleep hygiene. It is especially important to get up at the same time every morning to train your body to maintain sleep discipline. If you happen to have trouble falling asleep or staying asleep, you can start tweaking your sleep time by shortening your sleep schedule and going to bed an hour later than usual. It might be painful and take some time to adapt to, but your brain will eventually learn to make the most out of the hours you allot it.

6. Get more sunlight

The more your body can differentiate day and night, the more active you'll feel during the day while being able to sleep better during the night. This is the work of your sleep hormone, melatonin, as it is produced in dark while suppressed in light, and why it's very important to get enough sunlight throughout the day—and especially in the morning. You should always try expose your eyes to light as soon as you wake up (sunlight was the natural alarm clock for our ancestors). As an added bonus, exposing your eyes to light early in the morning will also boost your testosterone and sex drive.

If you live somewhere north with lack of natural sunlight, it's well worth the investment to purchase a sun lamp for light therapy. In comparison, the average lights we use indoors are pitiful, so it does little to nothing to help maintain our sleep hygiene.

7. Be physically active

This must be the most important point of all as sleep only seems to happen naturally when you give your body a reason to rest. I've seen documentaries of African tribes that sleep on dirt floor in a mud hut shared by the entire family. They sleep like they passed out even with insects crawling all over them because they walk and labor all day. If you want a better sleep, you must be physically active throughout the day.

For those who think hitting the gym is enough, lifting weights is great and all, but if you want to improve your sleep and, therefore, your overall health, you must add regular cardio workout to your routine. Running and swimming are both excellent as they pump your heart and really force you to work on your breathing. That said, you don't even have to do some major cardio session on a daily basis just to get a decent sleep. Even going out for a walk can make all the difference. For example, if I spend more than 5 hours in my home reading, writing, and surfing the Internet, the chance of having an insomnia that night is around 30%; but if I spend three hours walking outside in the sun, it gets reduced to less than 10%. Sedentary lifestyle really is a disease.

8. Mind the temperature

Most people in the northern hemisphere tend to sleep too warm for their own good. This is usually a problem during cold winters when some people jack up the heater without knowing that it can have an adverse effect on their sleep (as well as causing you to get sick). Your body tends to adapt to the season, so if your room is too warm, your body won't feel comfortable enough to get a good sleep. In addition, heaters will cause your home to get too dry, which will negatively affect your breathing. It's best to keep your heater use to the minimum and just use extra thick blankets instead. If you're in doubt, err on the side of sleeping too cold rather than too warm.

9. Be careful with naps

I'm not against taking naps (in fact, they're great as long as it doesn't affect your ability to sleep at night), but if you suffer from chronic insomnia, it might be worth to resist the temptation to sleep during the day so that you can sleep better at night. But if you insist on taking naps, try not go for more than an hour; 20 to 30 minutes sometime in the early afternoon is optimal.

10. Shut down your thoughts before going to bed

When you've decided that you're going to hit the bed, you need to empty your mind of all thoughts to prepare for sleep. You should not be thinking at all and just bask in the glory of how great it feels to be in bed for your slumber.

To do this, some people meditate just before going to bed, few write down a list things they'll do the next day so that they won't think about it in bed, and others simply tell themselves (some verbally) that they're going to sleep and that they're shutting down their minds for rest. Once you're in bed, short of a life-threatening emergency, there's nothing urgent enough that it should bother you from within—let it wait until the next day.

Other Tips

1. Take magnesium supplements before sleep to lower stress and to clam your body.
2. Use white noise (or rain sound) to drown out outside noise.
3. Get in the habit of sleeping on your side as it promotes better breathing.
4. If you can't sleep soundly because you experience severe itching at a specific area on your body in the middle of the night, you might have a pinworm infection. Just know that it's a lot more common than you think.

Read More: How Boredom Kills Your Workouts And How To Overcome It

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

France’s Cucked Presidential Frontrunner Is Married To A Woman 24 Years Older Than Him

March 6, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A 39-year-old former Rothschild banker walks into a bar (and the French Presidential race) with his 63-year-old wife. No, this isn’t a joke, except for maybe the bar part. “Centrist” Emmanuel Macron has been catapulted to frontrunner status in the lead-up to the April 23 vote. France is thus at serious risk of electing a globalist, pro-open borders SJW to its highest political office.

Support for perennial dark horse Marine Le Pen remains steady, but poll after poll shows Macron will easily defeat her if both make it to the second round. Despite all of us supporting Le Pen, opinion at Return Of Kings is divided on whether she will actually win. I for one believe that if both Macron and Le Pen make it to the second round, the latter will lose. Should that happen, fellow ROK columnist Jean-Batave Poqueliche will owe me five beers next time I am in France.

The previous frontrunner, Les Républicains’ François Fillon, is embroiled in allegations of corruption and will have to meet French investigators soon. For practical and political reasons (he is about as rightwing as a centre-right politician will go), I think it is better that Fillon, not Le Pen, wins the first round and perhaps even the Presidency. The two-round nature of French Presidential elections (unless a candidate wins a majority of votes the first time) means that a preliminary victory for Le Pen could still result in a loss to Emmanuel Macron in the second round.

Macron’s marriage is a perfect advertisement for France’s non-existent birthrate

No words.

France faces an existential crisis, with its flagging birthrate and surging numbers of ethnic “minorities” threatening to turn it into a majority-Muslim state within a few generations. Macron’s marriage to the geriatric Brigitte Trogneux is a microcosm of this demographic disaster. Though she already has children (whom she conveniently uprooted to pursue Macron), the couple are pursuing catastrophic political policies, like open borders à la Angela Merkel, that do nothing to preserve French identity and culture and actually destroy them.

Sadly, it would seem that other very thirsty French men are following the Presidential candidate’s lead. A number are now opting for older women, further reducing the chances of plugging the gap in numbers between older generations and the young. We’ve all heard the stories of French capitulation and helplessness in World War II and, to a lesser extent, World War I, but 21st century France is falling over like never before. This is unfortunate, as post-war French leaders in particular had a reputation for being tireless crusaders against leftist terror tactics. President Charles de Gaulle, for example, famously stared down millions of radical leftists in 1968.

Emmanuel Macron is simply a rebranded leftist globalist

Emmanuel Macron worked for the most virtue-signaling and cucked President in history (a title he may soon steal), but tells us he's a centrist now.

Part of Macron's appeal to French voters is that he pretends to be a centrist, whatever that means. Yet this charlatan is a former member of the Socialist Party, whose allegiance to corporations goes hand-in-hand with his appallingly cucked positions on excessive immigration, "refugees," and other social malaises. He infamously claimed this year that Angela Merkel's open door policy saved Europe's "dignity." He has also attacked Donald Trump, who, unlike Macron, would not respond to terror attacks like those in Paris and Nice by maintaining and increasing the number of migrants refusing to assimilate.

Macron's economic credentials are laughable, too. Having been a member of the Hollande Socialist government, he publicly supported the bloated French welfare system for too long. Now he insists that he is the man to reduce public spending. More and more, Emmanuel Macron comes across as a political chameleon whose party, En Marche!, serves more as a personal vehicle than a cohesive ideological organization. One thing that has remained perfectly consistent, however, is his devotion to sucking France's ethnic base and cultural history dry.

And so the protracted, gurgling death of France continues

Just when you thought things couldn't get worse for France, after five years of François Hollande, Emmanuel Macron may make it even worse. I am happy to be corrected, yet I think Macron will soon live in the Élysée Palace. I would be thrilled to lose my bet with Jean-Batave Poqueliche, just as I was thrilled to see Donald Trump defy my prediction for most of the election cycle that Hillary Clinton would win in 2016.

Nonetheless, even if both Le Pen and Fillon lose, France at least has some organizational potential to fight back against Macron. The problem is that time is of the essence. Waiting until 2022 to rectify five years of Emmanuel Macron is not the road France needs. What it also does not need is a cucked President married to a woman old enough to be his mother.

Read More: 80+ Killed In New French Attack, Police Don't Want Video Uploads To Compromise Narrative

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Underreported Epidemic Of Firefighter Suicide

March 6, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Every now and then you come across a story that cries out for more recognition. I recently had that feeling when I began to read more about the epidemic of firefighter suicides, which is part of the larger problem of untreated firefighter PTSD and depression nationwide. Like many traditionally masculine professions, firefighters and their health problems do not get the same level of attention from the media that is devoted to female, child, and reproductive health issues.

But by any standard, there is a serious problem with untreated depression and suicide among firefighters. The public does not often realize that firefighters deal with the absolute worst kinds of situations every day: the job is not just about putting out fires. They deal with gruesome car accidents, shootings, drownings, and all manner of human catastrophes. Former firefighter Jeff Dill, who runs the Firefighter Behavioral Health Alliance, believes that in 2014 alone, the total number of firefighters who committed suicide nationwide stood at about 350.

They are three times more likely to die by suicide than in the performance of their jobs. The problem is somewhat similar to the issues facing military veterans. But where the military has a relatively extensive and established support system to deal with PTSD issues (the Veterans' Administration has gotten much better since the 1990s), firefighters have little or nothing.

When I say "stood at about" I mean that we actually don't know what the real number is. At the time of writing, there is no national database to track firefighter suicides. Why? Because—and I was not that surprised to find this out—the federal government is not interested in keeping track of this data. It is not important enough for them to make the effort. What other explanation could possibly suffice? The National Fallen Firefighters Foundation (NFFF) was created in the 1990s, and one would think that this would be the organization to track this sort of information. But it is just another one of Congress's unfunded mandates; they do not have a budget. The NFFF handles public relations issues like memorials for fallen firefighters, but they do not recognize firefighter suicides. According to Jeff Dill, only about 30 percent of such suicides are even reported to any agency.

What does this tell us? It tells us that society does not consider such information important. We can see it as part of the current social trends that seek to devalue, denigrate, or ignore legitimate male health issues. Firefighters, policemen, factory workers, fishermen, lumberjacks, cooks, cab drivers, and a hundred other traditionally male occupations suffer in silence, their legitimate voices ignored or suppressed in favor of other "health priorities." There still is a pervasive stigma in talking about the depression and mental health issues of firemen (am I even allowed to use the word "fireman" any more?). Many such deaths are classified by their own departments as "deaths in the line of duty" or put into the "other" category.

Part of the problem may also be due to the tight nature of the firefighter profession. Even when they do try to get help from mental health professionals, they quickly realize that the "counselor" may not be familiar (or want to become familiar) with their terminology, occupational hazards, or organizational culture. So they may abandon treatment after a few sessions. Many firefighters may not wish to talk to their peers about their anxiety and depression, for fear of appearing unstable and not "up to the job." So problems fester without resolution. Problems are "treated" with a combination of alcohol, gambling, or other forms of high-risk behavior. Guilt can also factor into the equation. Some commanders simply cannot deal with losing men on the job. Jeff Dill, in one of his interviews, talked about an incident where an officer left behind a suicide note explaining that he could not deal with the loss of two men that happened under his command.

What can be done to solve the problem? The first step needs to be governmental recognition of the problem. Just as reproductive health and women's health issues are given lavish attention by the media, there need to be at least some financial resources focused on the firefighter suicide problem. Firemen don't ask for much, but they do deserve recognition for their sacrifices. Of all the billions of dollars doled out by the federal government to big business, defense contractors, and hundreds of other special interest groups, could it not find a tiny bit of funding for those who protect local communities?

It all comes down to priorities. And by deciding who to fund and who to defund, governments tell their people what they value and who they value. With some funding, local firefighters could establish better employee assistance programs, set up psychological counseling networks, look into chaplaincy programs. Firefighting schools could also devote more time to teaching students how to deal with the psychological pressures of the job. For too long, the public has been led to believe that "supporting" firefighters consists of watching myth-making movies about them, wearing their t-shirts, and then walking away and doing nothing else. Such token public relations gestures do nothing to solve the real problems of mental health and suicide prevention: what is needed is allocation of governmental resources and the taking of real action.

Read More: The Rising Epidemic Of Men Falsely Claiming To Be Veterans

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

The Sterile Behavior Of Girls Who Party At Night

March 6, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I did a video pointing out the “anti-evolutionary” behavior or girls who display their infertility at bars and clubs.

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them on the blog.

Previous Video: The Psychology Of Beta Male Sexual Frustration

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Orange Bus In Spain Causes Political And Social Outrage For Stating There Are Two Sexes

March 7, 2017 | by Juan Sanchez Villalobos | Link | Original Link

A bright orange bus appeared in public on Monday in the city of Madrid with several phrases written on its sides stating blatant biological facts: “Boys have a penis, girls have a vagina. Don’t let them fool you. If you are born a man, you are a man. If you are a woman, you’ll keep being one”.

The vehicle was commissioned by a Catholic organization called Hazte Oir (Make Yourself Heard), which has campaigned against abortion in the past. The bus is allegedly a response to a campaign displayed across northern Spain by a Basque organization which exhibited drawings of nude children holding hands and stating that some boys have vulvas and some girls penises. Their campaign was funded by an anonymous donor from New York who’s goal was to “raise social awareness about transgender children.”

It didn’t take long for the government officials to spring into action. Madrid’s City Council, which is ruled by liberals, promised to take the “necessary measures” to stop the bus from touring the city saying the vehicle did not comply with local traffic ordinances. The regional government, ruled by cuckservatives, said that it was consulting with the Attorney General over whether the bus broke any “hate crime” laws. The cities of Barcelona and Valencia, both with progressive governments, announced penalties up to 3,000 Euros if the bus dares to come to their cities.

At any case their complaints have been successful and the bus was impounded by the police and taken off the road. The judge said the bus would remain immobilized until the slogans were removed, adding that the messages went beyond simply advertising the group’s ideology and attacked the dignity of certain people by denying their sexual orientation.

The orange bus has also sparked a furious backlash and hundreds of threats on Twitter by SJWs. “Less tweets and more burning and stoning the bus.” They incite him to burn it, paint it, throw eggs or use artifacts like a a bazooka to destroy it.

The left has gotten so sick that even simple biological facts are considered “hate crime”

Hazte Oir, for its part, insists that the advertisement isn’t against anyone. “The bus is not trying to discriminate or offend anyone. It’s simply recognizing a biological fact, one that is studied in school.” Hazte Oir says that a ban would infringe on their right to protest against “sexual indoctrination laws in the schools” and free speech, and that such rights are increasingly threatened by the LGTBI lobby in Spain.

We have to mention that Spain has long been established as a feminist stronghold and as a result the country has been dragged further and further in the mud of political correctness and progressivism. In the year 2004 the government of José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero approved Europe’s first law specifically cracking down on gender-based violence. The law called for public education in gender equality, improved assistance to victims, stiffer sentences for aggressors, the creation of special courts, and a series of procedures aimed at protecting women under threat, bringing the full force of the state to bear on eradicating what they called “Sexist Terrorism”.

Even though this law is already harsh enough on men undermining one of the most important constitutional rights, the presumption of innocence, Spain’s ruling Progressive Party announced that this year 2017 the law will be enhanced to be applied beyond the boundaries of relationships. This means that if you have any discussion with a random female in Spain and she is rub in the wrong way, she only needs to make a phonecall and you will be thrown in jail for 72 hours without charge, that is without any reason for detention.

As some sort of karma joke, the Spanish gender law was applied to the very same person who founded it, Juan Fernando Lopez Aguilar, a former Spanish justice minister of the time of Zapatero. Lopez Aguilar however, never faced prosecution over allegations that he repeatedly abused his estranged wife.

In a time of universal deceit, telling the truth is a revolutionary act

This is where progressive liberal values are taking us. The concept of freedom of speech has never been more debated and challenged than today, being refined to only allow what is not deemed offensive by those who hold the authority to punish. It seems that only applies to the liberals and their pushy propaganda. With all this "gender identity," "gender-neutral pronouns" and gender propaganda filling the Western media 24/7 and being forced on children, it is not surprising that the British NSPCC has recorded a huge increase in confused children questioning their gender.

It is interesting to note that when LGBT groups exhibit their lifestyles they have police protection and a positive mainstream coverage. But someone disagreeing is labeled immediately as a "hate group", "radicals", "ultras", etc with an emphasis on some kind of phobia. In fact, the vehicle was quickly dubbed in the mainstream media as 'the transphobic bus of hate'.

If things continue to go south with these gender laws, soon they will say that it is hateful to point out that the sky is blue. This madness must stop before it's too late.

Read More: Cervantes And The Grandeur Of Spain

Juan Sanchez Villalobos is a Spanish world traveller and tough fiber adventurer currently living in a Feminist country.

4 Situations You'll See On "Walking Street" In Pattaya, Thailand

March 7, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

I'm on the road for the month of March, and after driving all over the United States since January I decided it was time for some relaxation outside The Matrix. So, I booked a cheap flight to Thailand, and hooked up with an awesome $15 a night room for a month.

When one visits Thailand, a pilgrimage to Walking Street is a must. Walking Street in Pattaya is like Bourbon Street in New Orleans, only better. Consider it nightlife without the Anglo cultural and sexual repression you'll find in the West.

After some busy days riding all up and down the East Coast of the Gulf of Thailand on a Honda scooter, I made my way down to this infamous slice of paradise for some well-deserved rest and relaxation after driving around 3,000 miles a week to build up this year's cash reserve.

One night as I was people watching I noticed several interesting situations going on which are pertinent to the themes we discuss in the manosphere. Here are four alternately interesting and hilarious situations I made mental bookmarks about as I saw them unfolding, so I could tell you about them.

4. White Man Accompanied By Land Whale

A land whale tried to swim away with her meal ticket before her newly awakened man slave traded her in

This poor bastard.

I saw the look in his eyes as this dude realized he made a huge (pun intended) mistake bringing along his hog for an Asian vacation, as he saw countless tight and taut Thai chicks in skimpy clothing walking by. He looked deeply troubled as the Anglo (or European, didn't hear which language they used) hog pulled him around by the arm, perhaps because he wanted to stop and look at different bars and peruse the sexy ladies inhabiting them.

The hog looked quite worried about having wound up on Walking Street because she knew she was way out of her league. There's fat, and then there's sloppy fat. This chick was sloppy fat, but her man seemed to be at least average to fit in build.

This couple illustrates everything wrong with the relations between the sexes in America (or Europe). Man, works his ass off and finances a fabulous vacation with his beta bucks while the land hog lords over him like a domineering tyrant, steering dollars from his wallet into her mouth while cockblocking him from upgrading to the female companionship he deserves.

The timer on that relationship no doubt started that night, as along with the pain I also saw an awakening in that man's eyes. He now no doubt knows he got a shitty deal and can do better than the hog.

3. Older White Man Being Pulled Around By Worried Wife

Nature provides the irony as women's sexual power over men evaporates as they age

This one was hilarious to watch from the sidelines as I sipped Chang beer, and illustrates the fact older women intuitively know they can't compete with younger women. It also proved the men age like wine and women age like milk theory correct once again.

This woman's milk expired years ago. However, this decent looking older gentlemen would have had no trouble pulling some quality tail and his woman knew it deep down in her hamster brain. She was almost as worried as the hog.

It was as if this older couple had accidentally wandered into a parallel universe in which the constant manipulation and abuse of men Western women profit from was turned upside down, if only for the time a short walk takes.

The post-expiration date granny knew she was well over her credit line on Nature's Credit Card and that her husband might have just figured out she's not worth the high level of investment and low level of return she commands.

Owning an expired golden vagina meant nothing, the way it once did in her prime. She was totally powerless on Walking Street. Nature, it seems has a sense of humor about male-female relations after all.

2. The Gleeful, Single Middle-Aged White Man

This dude might as well have been Rico Suave as he partied on at the club

This dude was dancing it up solo at the bar we were in, and didn't seem to give a fuck who was watching him. He was shaking hands and glad handing people as if he was a politician up for re-election. It's as if his ex-bitch had just died or something, saving him from a round of frivorce rape.

There's no doubt this man is getting laid on the regular, unlike the often miserable men back in the States who aren't getting laid so often. He was the perfect illustration of the glee life as a runaway slave from the Anglobitch plantation brings.

One could feel the liberation this man knows, and there's no doubt life inside the frigid borders of a sexless, decadent empire is no longer something he will be willing to accept.

The master pickup artist never needs to pay for premium tail, either. I regularly bang SMV 7-9 women in a place like this with minimum effort. It's amazing how far a well-dressed man with a cocky, funny attitude can go in a place that doesn't hate men as in the West.

That night, I met other expats from Norway, Scotland, and Russia. They also seemed unwilling to return to life as a beta male tax slave who is rewarded with scorn rather than respect for their sacrifices for society.

1. The Pursed Lips Anglobitch

Nothing like having your pussy power canceled out in your prime by taut Thai women

Knowing no men were going to be interested in her that night with premium Thai tail everywhere, an Anglobitch with pursed lips was walking around giving men (including me as I sat with a dime piece) evil eyes and dirty looks. Similar to the portlier women above, this thinner chick's powers were also useless here as the cultural tightrope she and her sisters in the feminist claven keep men on sexually was thousands of miles of away.

She was a fish out of water. And it was delightful to watch.

I imagine her insulting the men from Europe and America who were there having a good time with the typical boilerplate angry feminists like to throw at men who have discovered a bigger, better deal than she could ever offer.

- "Couldn't get another woman so he had to come here."
- "Can't handle a Strong, Independent Woman™."
- "A sexual pervert." (For having normal male sexual desires, of course.)

As we all know, the truth is none of the above. Anglobitches don't like runaway slaves from the Beta male plantation they've created. And Walking Street is brimming with runaway slaves from Western culture.

All the more reason to smile ear to ear as you look them in the eye, while pulling your exotic hottie just a little bit closer to you and giving her a big, wet kiss. Revenge is sweet.

My adventures in the Land of a Million Smiles are worth every penny. I've never felt more whole as an individual or happier inside since throwing off the chains of a Puritan culture and visiting cultures that aren't so uptight and prudish.

Won't you join me soon outside The Matrix?

Read More: An Easy Technique to Be Incredibly Interesting to Women

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

The Top 15 Male Foods You Need To Increase Your Test And Get Ripped

March 7, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Henry Tran

Despite what conventional fitness wisdom will tell you, your ability to get ripped isn't determined by how strict your diet is or how many hours you spend slaving away at the gym… It's actually dictated by how much testosterone you have in your body.

That's right, the big "T" does much more than regulate your sex drive. In fact, this master male hormone helps build muscle, enhances your bone strength, your heart, your memory, and most notably, helps get you the ripped six pack abs you've always wanted.

However for some younger men, their T-levels are in dire need of attention and here's a simple explanation for why:

Statistics now show that men who are ages 19-35 have an average of 36% less testosterone than men of this age group did three decades ago.

And the reason for this should come as no surprise. These days, young men are indoors more, they sleep less, and they eat far more junk. These lifestyle factors all contribute to the massive dump the average guy's T levels are taking and in some cases, result in early symptoms of low-T (a serious problem that men over 40 are prone to).

So if you've been struggling with excess body fat that just won't seem to go away, you can be sure that it's got something to do with your master male hormone – which is why I created a video presentation that shows men exactly what they need to eat to naturally boost their testosterone. To skip ahead to the video guide to boosting testosterone, click the link below now:

VIDEO: What Men Need To Eat To Boost Testosterone

But before you raid GNC's test-booster aisle, you should know that you can summon all of the hormone-boosting power you need to get the ripped six pack abs you've always wanted through food.

Eating a diet composed of key test-boosting nutrients won't just unlock your ability to get a rock hard body – but it will also give you the edge to maintaining amped up test levels through your 30's, 40's and beyond.

1. Raw Honey

This sticky stuff contains boron, a mineral associated with high testosterone levels, and nitric oxide, which opens up blood vessels to improve the strength of your erection.

2. Cabbage

This cruciferous vegetable is contains indole-3-carbinol, which blocks and even reduces levels of the female hormone estrogen, making testosterone more effective.

3. Asparagus

A known aphrodisiac, asparagus contains folic acid, potassium and vitamin E, which are all essential for healthy testosterone production.

4. Wild Caught Salmon

Aside from containing high levels of magnesium, vitamin B and omega-3s for healthy testosterone production, this fatty fish has been researched for it's ability to drop kick Sex Hormone Binding Globulin (SHBG) – a sneaky hormone that renders your testosterone useless.

5. Pumpkin Seeds

When you're reaching for a salty snack, reach for pumpkin seeds instead of the potato chips. Not only are these seeds inexpensive, but their high levels of zinc can help push your testosterone levels up. Try the Magnesium Man Bowl recipe for a fresh and filling salad that is loaded with these male hormone making morsels.

6. Avocado

It’s long been proven that men with high intakes of monounsaturated fat – found in foods like avocado, nuts and plant based oils – had lower LDL cholesterol (the bad cholesterol) and more testosterone.

7. Peanut Butter

Full of zinc, B vitamins, and protein, nut butters provide the vitamins, minerals and essential compounds necessary to create testosterone. If you’re a sucker for peanut butter and chocolate, then you’ve got to try this T-Nut Butter Cup recipe that you can whip up using just your microwave for a killer test-boosting snack.

8. Tuna

According to what research has shown us, Vitamin D can help boost testosterone levels by up to 90%. If you’re a guy who doesn’t get much sunshine (which is the most effective way to absorb Vitamin D) then you need to be sure you’re getting more tuna in your diet.

9. Beef

Cut or ground, beef offers an excellent dietary source of protein, fatty acids and zinc which are necessary for testosterone and hormone production and maintenance. But most important to note is that beef packs the most important fatty acid of all when it comes to boosting your T: Saturated fats. Get started beefing up your test levels with Man Maker Chili.

10. Garlic

The allicin compound found in garlic lowers levels of the stress hormone cortisol, in turn allowing testosterone to be produced in greater amounts. Mince it up raw and add it to your meats and/or veggies for best effects.

11. Whey Protein

In research from Finland, scientists gave men 15 grams of whey protein both before and after resistance exercises. Muscle biopsy showed an increase in testosterone production of up to 25 percent, which was maintained for 48 hours. If you’re looking for the most pure form of whey for upping your test levels, then you need to use this grass fed protein powder.

12. Whole Free-Range Eggs

Cholesterol is the precursor to testosterone and if you're under the impression that you should be avoiding it, then you better believe that your T is suffering. But the good news is, two eggs pack the daily cholesterol count you need for optimal test health. It's like your doctor never told you: 2 eggs a day keeps the low-T away.

13. Leafy Greens

Dark leafy greens like spinach and kale are proven to lower estrogen levels, and are also rich in magnesium and vitamins C and E – all of which are essential testosterone building blocks. You can make kale appeal to your taste buds with this simple Portuguese Kale Soup recipe.

14. Shrimp

Seafood in general has a variety of health benefits, but shrimp in particular contains high levels of vitamin D – one of the most crucial vitamins for your T. Get your fill of Vitamin D with this Shrimp Ceviche recipe.

15. Citrus Fruits

Oranges and grapefruit are two of the best known citrus fruits for lowering the stress hormone cortisol, which is good news for your T. They are also loaded with vitamin A, yet another crucial element required for testosterone production.

So there you have it – The top 15 best foods for enhancing your natural test production. Now that you know what types of foods you need to be eating to jack your test levels up, you'll definitely want to explore the complete recipe guide that's custom tailored for a man's needs. This recipe guide not only shows you how to make 30 minute man-meals, but you'll also be able to prep an entire week's worth of pro-testosterone meals that will help you drop fat and get the ripped body you've always wanted.

VIDEO: Watch Your First Test-Boosting Recipe Video Here Now

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

The 4 Most Feminist Songs Of All Time Were Written By Men

March 7, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Feminists may claim to be strong and independent, but the "girl power" songs they have used for years are mostly or exclusively written by male musicians and songwriters. In most cases, the women just contributed their voices and the ideas and concepts were the domain of men.

Many Return Of Kings readers are familiar with the reality that Victor Svyatski built the supposedly all-female feminist extremist group Femen. We also know that mentally ill (or supreme shitlord) Bruce Jenner won Woman of the Year. The preponderance of men writing feminist songs is simply another addition to the very thick book of "Men just do it better."

I have based the selection of these four super-feminist songs on two criteria: a) the airtime I remember they were given, particularly when I was a child, and b) their use by feminists and SJWs in spreading their message. At best (or worst, depending on your perspective), these songs were co-written by a man and woman.

Respect – Otis Redding

Respect is almost universally associated with Aretha Franklin, but her version only added the chorus, most notably "R.E.S.P.E.C.T.," and elements like "Sock it to me" (sung by the backup singers, her sisters). Yet Otis Redding really deserves the credit for what Rolling Stone called the fifth greatest song of all time. The Library of Congress even went so far as to put Franklin's version in the prestigious National Recording Registry.

The feel of the two versions may differ, yet Franklin merely piggybacked off of Redding's work, "achieving" 1,000 times the acclaim. This is more than ironic given that the song presents her as a strong, confident woman who not only demands respect from men but doesn't need them. Well, Aretha Franklin clearly needed Otis Redding for the song that made her career.

It's Raining Men – Paul Jabara and Paul Shaffer

In retrospect, this song seems like a prelude to slut culture. And it was actually written by Paul Jabara and Paul Shaffer, despite being sung by The Weather Girls (who seem like a prelude to the modern worshipping of obesity). Jabara was gay, so this is not entirely a case of men writing songs that have nothing to do with them. Many will remember Shaffer as David Letterman's longstanding comedic and musical sidekick on both Late Night with David Letterman and Late Show with David Letterman.

With lyrics like "I'm gonna go out to run and let myself get… Absolutely soaking wet," It's Raining Men acted as an exhortation for second wave feminists, not to mention women in general, to go out and spread their legs for cock after cock. Former Spice Girl Geri Halliwell's cover of the song in the 2000s only obscured Jabara and Shaffer's authorship further.

I Am Woman – Ray Burton and (sort of) Helen Reddy

> She gave me lyrics scribbled down on a piece of paper and I went home that Sunday night and wrote the whole song in about three hours. Her lyrics were more in prose or poetic form, so I rewrote a few bits of it.
>
> — Ray Burton recounting how he wrote at least the entire music for I Am Woman, if not a chunk of the lyrics

All Helen Reddy seems to have contributed to I Am Woman are the words. The man who wrote the music, Ray Burton, claims he actually penned a decent part of the lyrics, too. Of course, Reddy would have none of this, saying she wrote all the lyrics. Still, I hope you can see the humor of the matter. With lines like "If I have to, I can do anything… I am strong (strong)… I am invincible (invincible)… I am woman," why couldn't Reddy just write the music herself?

The story behind I Am Woman is perhaps the funniest of all of these songs. It had a particular resonance with the "women's liberation movement," whereas songs like Franklin's version of Respect and It's Raining Men exerted a more common appeal. That the more rabid feminists of the 1970s and 1980s gravitated to this male-written song more than basically any other is a testament to their cluelessness.

I Will Survive – Freddie Perren and Dino Fekaris

Gloria Gaynor made something of a career out of taking Dino Fekaris' work and singing it. For I Will Survive, Fekaris and co-writer Freddie Perren gave an excuse for every maladjusted, dumped woman to fume for months and then pretend that this experience made their character better. "But then I spent so many nights thinking how you did me wrong… And I grew strong" is the perfect encapsulation of what many women both try to do and delude themselves over doing.

But it gets worse. "I've got all my life to live… And I've got all my love to give" from I Will Survive is essentially the paraphrasing of the online dating profiles of every girl who says something like "Men, not boys!", "If you can't handle me at my worst, you don't deserve me at my best," or other solipsisms. Of the four songs I have explored in this article, this one is the worst. It gives a voice to childish and hamstering female behaviors like no other piece of music has or probably ever will.

The men behind these songs are just more talented white knights

I have avoided direct criticism of the men behind these über-feminist songs until the very end. Just as we can point to the vital role of men in every feminist campaign from suffrage demands to tampon-less marches, the songs that make up feminist “musical culture” usually owe their existence to men. Some, like Otis Redding, who died around the time Aretha Franklin used his song, may be harder to excoriate, but others, like Ray Burton, were not only complicit but also overzealous in their support of feminism.

So next time some braindead girls in your vicinity want to play a feminist tune or simply find “girl power” enjoyment in one of them, maybe you should ask, “Hey, wasn’t this song written by a man?”

Read More: Why You Should Be Thankful For “Girl Power” Songs

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Emma Watson’s Boobs Show How Modern Feminism Is Lost

March 8, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

“Men, I would like to take this opportunity to extend your formal invitation. Gender equality is your issue, too.”

– Emma Watson, 20 September 2014—HeForShe Campaign, United Nations Headquarters

Well, Emma Watson recently extended a formal invitation to the entire world to view her boobs in Vanity Fair.

But she's not too happy about the fact that people are taking it as a sexual invitation to see her boobs. She's far more upset that people are saying that it's a bad choice for her feminist image.

Of course, Watson has a notable history of being a hardcore feminist. For better or worse, she's always thrown herself right into the thick of things when it comes to campaigning for women's rights. To her credit, she also has said that feminism is not about hating men:

> The more I spoke about feminism, the more I realized that fighting for women's rights has too often become synonymous with man-hating. If there is one thing I know for certain, it is that this has to stop.

For the most part, other feminists and females as a whole have backed her. However, this latest photo shoot has put them all up in arm's regarding Watson. People are saying she can't be a feminist and take those kind of photos.

Watson only real counterpoint to her critics has been: "I can't be a feminist and have boobs?"

The Photo Itself

Whether or not you think this photo of her is attractive or not is beyond the point. I'd wager that most heterosexual men would say no (or that there are far better photos of her out there), but the photo itself is well done. I think many would agree that the photography aspect of it is solid. If not for showing the underboobs, many would consider it a nice piece of art and not a sexual image.

Watson's counterpoint to her critics has been that women should be allowed to be sexual beings. Just like men. Feminism is all about how women should have the same sex drives, should be able to be sexually ~~slutty~~ liberated like men, and that men and women in the dating scene should all be equal.

Great, but you simply cannot preach "women should be sexually liberated" and "don't objectify" me in the same sentence.

It doesn't work. If you want to be sexually liberated as a woman, this means that you are free to be as sexual as you want with whomever you wish. It also gives anyone and everyone the right to judge you as a sexual creature.

What does this photo do? It screams that women are in fact sexually liberated. But by posing in a sexual photo, Watson opens herself up to being sexually objectified. Imagine that.

The Issues

Many people have waged war since the photo was released, saying that Watson is going against any and all feminist ideas by posing the way she did. Watson's response is the following:

> It just always reveals to me how many misconceptions and what a misunderstanding there is about what feminism is.
>
> Feminism is about giving women choice. Feminism is not a stick with which to beat other women with. It's about freedom, it's about liberation, it's about equality. I really don't know what my tits have to do with it. It's very confusing.
>
> I'm confused. Most people are confused. No, I'm just always just quietly stunned.

This is the attitude of a starlet who has had everything handed to her since she was given a wand in her hand to play Hermione Granger when she was eleven years old. Watson's views of what is tough in the world and what is not is greatly skewed. She's never been through the Soviet suburbs of Ukraine, or seen the ghettos of Colombia—instead she travels by private plane. She simply cannot relate to the every day person.

Nobody feels bad for Watson because she got paid less millions than Daniel Radcliffe in Harry Potter. Even the most vile, disgusting feminist out there can not relate to Watson, despite what comes out of her mouth. She lives on a different planet. A planet where she thinks she should never be wrong (because of feminism, star power, and more), but her general role in the spotlight makes her a prime target for everyone. Not just feminists.

It's this inability to grasp a simple concept—that non-famous, middle class folk never feel bad for stars or successful businessmen—that makes Watson look stupid when she's giving her response interview.

Emma Watson Cannot Grasp Basic Human Biology

For better or worse, we're just animals at our core. You can glitz and glam all you want in the covers of Vanity Fair, but you remove the "Emma Watson" from that photo. Say that you have no idea who she is, her past history, or anything.

If you show that photo to any person, their immediate thought is going to be something along the lines of, "THAT is a sexual photo."

There is simply no way around it. It doesn't matter how talented the photographer is, how beautiful the photographs turn out, nothing. Any sane person's first thought is going to jump to the fact that the picture is sexual. And Watson seems very out of touch with the fact that sex sells.

Sugar dating websites have become a popular way for players to meet new girls. Rich guys take one look at girl's photos and offer to buy them cars, apartments, and fly them around the world. The fact that Emma Watson thinks that her photo should not be taken in a sexual light shows just how out of touch she is with the rest of the world.

Making It Worse

Watson just pours fuel on the fire with her comments. Watson stated in this video that "Feminism is about giving women choice."

Okay, deal. Emma Watson, you, as a woman, have the choice. You, yourself, in all of your glorious womanhood, CHOSE to go on the cover of Vanity Fair and pose like you did. You chose to show nearly all of your breasts on a major magazine, while at the same time preaching that women should not be treated as sex objects (for many years).

You have also repeatedly said that feminism is about choice. Well, newsflash—that means that people have the choice to feel a certain way about you, your photo shoot, and overall views.

If you want to be taken seriously, start by putting a shirt on.

Conclusion

When I started writing this article, I felt mostly annoyed about the whole situation. But now, as I've watched her interview a few times, I've started to feel a little bad for Watson. She is a prime result of feminism gone bad. She holds to herself a victim complex that no "normal" person can possibly relate to. Nor does she understand why people don't. In her world, she can do no wrong (because feminism/starlet), but when she does, and people criticize—it hurts her. You can see it in her eyes.

Emma Watson seems to me like a lost girl, unable to figure out why she can say and do all the right things that she's supposed to say—but still be criticized. She wants to be sexually liberated because she's been told that's what she's supposed to be. And that as a feminist icon, it is who she must be. She also believes she somehow must be sexually liberated and yet not be a symbol to sex.

It's a shame that she'll probably never be able to grasp the why behind any of it. The reality of the situation is that modern-day feminism simply has no logical basis for many of their points. And until it gets put in check, girls like Emma Watson will continue to be the scapegoats.

Instead of dating feminists, turn modern dating into your personal playground. Find out how in my book, Cracking OkCupid. For more articles, visit my blog This Is Trouble.

Read More: 20 Things Women Should Be Shamed For, Not Celebrated

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

4 Key Elements For Great Day Game Interactions With Beautiful Girls

March 8, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

This week I was fortunate enough to witness two day game “sets” (or interactions) in central London. While I have no idea who the men or women involved were, I saw enough to draw out some observations about what makes a great piece of day game stand out from a so-so one.

It is an interesting consequence of gaming that the more you do it, the easier it is to spot others doing it. What might to the uninitiated look like an innocent conversation between friends on the street appears to the experienced man precisely what it is—a covert bid for secret society sex.

Two Day Gamers

It’s worth me giving you a description of both sets, so you can visualise them.

The first took place on New Oxford Street, the road that becomes Oxford Street, the busiest in London. Here I saw a trim, well-dressed man in dark jeans and a black leather jacket chatting to a cute girl in a trench coat, who must have been in her early to mid-twenties. As spring slowly insinuates itself into London and the evenings are getting lighter, this set took place in the twilight, as delicate waning light bounced off the tall, white houses that line the streets there.

The second took place further up into Oxford Street. A guy with poorly-styled hair and a slight paunch, dressed in chinos, a business shirt and a North Face-type jacket was chatting to a very thin, cute girl (probably a 7.5 in make-up) who I believe was Eastern European. This was in a much busier area, in front of a row of busy clothes shops. The guy was chatting animatedly, using his hands to emphasise each point, while the girl was watching him, largely silent.

You’ve probably guessed already that the first set was significantly better than the second and you’re right. Indeed, that first couple transmitted overt sexual chemistry. It was shamelessly palpable, apparent to anyone who paused to watch them for more than a moment.

The second set was more difficult. I watched it for some time. On the one hand the guy did very well in stopping the girl and keeping the conversation going for at least ten minutes.

But on the other hand. Well, something was off. I could totally buy that that first pair would end up having sex, and probably sooner than later, with these two I just couldn’t see it. This guy was just too frumpy, too avuncular, too mediocre-looking to inspire interest in that girl.

Sure enough, my sixth sense for effective game proved to be accurate. The first man easily number-closed his keen-to-the-point-of-moist girl. The second, after what was an undeniably valiant effort, was rewarded with the classic ‘I’m-sorry-but-I-have-a-boyfriend’ speech.

Now look, I don’t want to be overly-critical. I’ve been told by more girls that they have boyfriends than there are men in London, and as I’ve always said, rejection is a central part of the game.

Nevertheless, if I were a betting man I would have put money on the first man getting his girl over the second. And you really want to be the kind of guy who at least looks like a plausible sex partner for the girl he’s approached rather than an unkempt but hopeful interloper pumped up on internet feel-good advice.

With that in mind, I’ll now outline four key elements that made the first set so impressive compared with the second.

1. Sexualise the Interaction

As I have always said, you should aim to sexualise your interactions with girls as quickly as possible. The first set telegraphed erotic intrigue from across the street. The second—not so much.

The snippets of conversation I overheard bore this out. The first guy was asking his girl about her type, indicating that their dialogue had touched on sex, however obliquely.

The second man was talking about his favourite fantasy movie. Now, there is absolutely nothing wrong with vibing about what interests you, but if, after ten minutes, you are still chatting about films without having engaged her on a sexual level then I'm sorry, but you are on a hiding to nothing.

The best sets are those in which a strong sexual vibe felt by both parties is rapidly established. If you don't have that then carry on conversing for practice by all means, but don't hold out too much hope for a conversion.

2. Have Strong Body Language

Body language is important—damned important. In the first set the guy was standing up strong, his legs wide apart, his chin raised, as though he was simultaneously sizing up the girl and about to bang her. They were very close together. He looked dominant. He looked as though he could bend her over and give her a very good seeing too at any moment. And it looked as though this were likely to happen.

The second guy was standing some way from his girl. His shoulders were hunched and he was gesticulating as though appealing to her, as though he feared that without him providing sufficient entertainment she might simply walk away.

This is a weak position and not one to emulate. Whenever you are talking to a girl you must maintain dominant posture and a strong, upright frame—at least if you want her to be attracted to you.

3. Don’t Be Nice, Be Challenging

The problem with the second guy was that everything about him screamed ‘nice’. He was wearing nice boy clothes, he was smiling too much (compared with the first guy’s arrogant smirk) and he was too keen to ingratiate himself with the girl.

In other words, he wasn’t enough of a challenge.

To the untrained eye it might have looked as though he was doing quite well. After all, the girl was hooked, but—and this is key—she was socially hooked. And without female-to-male sexual attraction (created when the man is challenging) then a polite, interesting chat is just that—a chat, which will soon be followed up by an ‘OK, well it was nice to meet you, but I have to go and have sex with some alpha dude now’-type response.

4. Look The Part

This final point is so obvious you would hardly think it requires repeating, but unfortunately it does. You really do everything you can to ensure that you look the part when you approach girls.

The simple question you should ask yourself, and you should try to answer as objectively as possible, is this: 'Do I look like the kind of guy who could plausibly be having sex with her?'

If the answer to that question is 'no', then you need to take a step back and reassess your style and grooming.

Guys seriously come into this thinking that 'game' (in the very narrow sense of knowing how to talk to a girl) is a panacea that will get them laid no matter how they look. Perhaps they've watched scammy pick-up videos online, or read the sales material of unscrupulous companies promising them access to premier league pussy if they just purchase this video course or attend that seminar.

The truth, as all ROK readers should know by now, is that 'game' is an umbrella term for a whole host of tools, habits and techniques, some of them related to engaging girls, but more that pertain to self-improvement, both in terms of your mental state (inner game) and your appearance (body, clothes, hair, general grooming).

Too many guys still ask me what 'line' they should use in a particular scenario, without considering that improvements in these fundamentals would seriously impact on their results.

In summary, day game (and game in general) is about a lot more than having a pleasant chat. Whether you go indirect or direct, you need to position yourself as a plausible sexual partner, a man who is dominant, sexy and not afraid to go for what he wants. A sexual threat, in other words. Without doing so you will likely enjoy a lot of polite conversations and brush-offs, but little actual sex.

Want to find out more about how to approach and seduce sexy girls? Buy Troy's bestselling book, The Seven Laws of Seduction. Follow Troy on Twitter.

Read More: Why Abundance and Ruthlessness Are Needed to Get Hot Girls in 2017

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How To Maim An Attacker When Your Life Is On The Line

March 8, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

Just as every man needs to know how to fight, every man needs to know how to fight as if his life depended on it, for one day, it just might. Indeed, for while every man should know the basics of "bar-room brawling", much more importantly, every man should also know the basics of 'my-bloodly-life-is-on-the-line-and-I-will-win-no-matter-what-the-cost' combat as well. And when it comes to life-or-death combat, a critical aspect of such a struggle is not only knowing which targets to aim for on a human body, and it is not only about knowing which targets to aim for first, but it is also about knowing which targets are literally indefensible no matter who your opponent is. And it is precisely these latter types of targets which this article will address.

Now, in providing you with this information, the onus is obviously on you to know how local self-defense laws apply to your situation. So, let's be clear: I am just providing you with some knowledge, but you are responsible for how you use it. At the same time, I want it to be understood that these tactics should never be used except when you are under threat of death or serious bodily harm.

So, having said the above, let us now address the three indefensible targets that every man should know about. And in saying that these bodily targets are indefensible, what is meant is not that an opponent cannot actively protect these areas, but rather that no matter what a person's bodily composition is—fat, skinny, muscular, etc.—there is almost nothing that a person can do to passively defend these areas. Whereas, for example, throwing a rib shot at an obese man or a trained Muay Thai fighter would be largely ineffective due to the passive armor that these two individuals possess—layers of fat in the former case and hardened ribs in the latter case—with the three targets under discussion, no such passive protection is possible. So what then are these targets? Well, they can be remembered with the acronym 'ETC', which stands for 'Eyes, Throat, and Crotch'. Now, let's look at each of these in order.

E is for Eyes

Just search 'eye-gouging' to see what really happens when you do this move.

In most life-or-death conflicts that a civilian might find himself in, the ultimate goal is to survive and escape. Indeed, the goal is to break contact with the attacker and get away as quickly as possible. And with this point in mind, it is key to remember that any attacker who cannot see you, cannot chase you. Not only this, but in nearly all cases, any attacker who cannot see you, cannot coherently attack you either. And to add to all this, an attacker's eyes are also one of the areas that he cannot passively defend no matter what he does and no matter how muscled or fat he is.

As such, an attacker's eyes are a prime target for attack in a life-or-death situation. Now when I imply that you should attack an opponent's eyes, I am not talking about some minor eye fleck or eye scratch—although such moves have a place in less dire circumstances—but rather, in the life-or-death struggle, I am talking about driving your thumbs into an opponent's eye sockets and literally ripping his eyeballs out. This is brutal, I know. But in a serious struggle, when it is your life or his, it must be your life, and so you must do whatever is necessary to survive, even if that means putting your fingers so far into a man's skull that you start tickling his grey matter!

T is for Throat

Two for the price of one!

If a man's eyes are the first body part to aim for given that this target is easy to get to, and does not do fatal damage, and also allows you a chance to escape, then this second target is no less important, for this target can be used when gouging the eyes is no longer an option and escape has been taken off the table. Indeed, when that happens, target the throat.

Now notice that I did not say the neck, for the neck, though an excellent target, is nevertheless one which can still be reinforced and strengthened, thereby making it difficult to attack in some people. Thus the throat is the target, and it is the target in two ways.

First, target the fleshy part under the Adam's Apple where the trachea lies underneath the skin. Grab the neck like a vice grip, then drive the thumbs inwards until they are literally touching the attacker's spine; with the trachea between your thumbs and the spine, bad things happen to your attacker! And the second way to attack this target is to grab the Adam's Apple in a compact vice grip—just the Adam's Apple, not the whole neck—and then squeeze until your hand forms back into a fist, thereby crushing the throat. Again, this is only to be used in a life-or-death self-defense struggle, but if you are in such a struggle, there are few moves more effective than this one.

C is for Crotch

Now crush, twist, and tear!

Although targeting the crotch is applicable to both males and females, for obvious reasons, it is used mainly in the case of males. But since a male will most likely be your opponent in a life-threatening encounter, then this limitation does not pose too much of a problem. Now, although the groin is not a fatal target, if attacked properly, it is a horrendously painful one, and one which will stop a person in their tracks. But again, I am not talking about some “snap-kick” to the crotch or a groin “strike”; rather, I am talking about grabbing the opponent’s junk, twisting it, then crushing it, and then pulling it off. Either that, or stomping and/or kneeing it into oblivion. That is what I mean.

Bonus E is for Ears

Not a good day!

Finally, as a bonus, I would also invite you to consider the ears. They are a non-lethal target but, like the three targets above, they are also a target which cannot be passively strengthened or protected. At the same time, a good number of individuals wear earrings, which make grabbing the ear and tearing it that much easier (or at least tearing out the earring itself). And so the ears present another target which can be readily grasped in a firm crawl-like fist, and then, with adrenaline flowing, pulled and ripped off.

And so, the long and short of it is this: real blood combat is an ugly business, and one which you want to avoid at all costs. But if violence is pushed onto you, the only answer is to respond with the aggression of a tiger and the brutality of a sociopath. Show no mercy until the threat is gone. And so, know the areas to target first—the eyes, the throat, the crotch, and sometimes the ears—and target them ferociously. Remembering this might very well mean the difference between life and death if you ever find yourself faced with that choice.

Read More: 4 Effective Fighting Techniques That Every Man Should Know

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

How Complex Systems Science Affects The Manosphere

March 8, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Ever since I read Niall Ferguson's book Civilization (2011), I have wanted to get a closer look at Melanie Mitchell's book Complexity: A Guided Tour (2011), which the Scottish Harvard University historian refers to in an engaging discussion about how civilizations, like the West, are constituted.

Ferguson and other historians analyze civilizations at a level where many people can connect the dots, about for instance demographic and economic data, but the deeper connections require a closer investigation. If one urges to grasp how the underlying patterns are formed and why they "behave" in such and such ways, one has to look into various complex systems of our world. Such as cell DNA and data computation among other sub-fields within emerging multidisciplinary science.

Mitchell's book provides relevant information in that respect and can help the reader to increase his ability to make social and cultural analysis. It can also help us understand new and sometimes alarming trends in our current digital world.

Complex systems science as a cumulative process

Discoveries within various fields of science can be described as a cumulative process. Some make discoveries and then some other modify and clarify these a bit later. Even though individual genius is important for scientific progress, genuises working over time and space are seemingly even more significant.

We don’t have to reiterate that most prominent scientists are males, and in this book names such as John von Neumann (principles of self-reproduction), John Holland (balancing exploitation and exploration), Robert Axelrod (evolutionary cooperation), Stephen Wolfram (computional equivalence), and Albert-László Barabási and Réka Albert (preferential attachment related to social networks theory) pass by throughout Mitchell’s guided tour.

Their ideas hinge upon those of for instance Ludwig Boltzmann, Charles Darwin, Alan Turing and James Watson. But what can we more specifically actually learn from them?

Which complex systems are relevant?

Much of this book is basically history of science. If you know the basics of physics, mathematics, genetics and computer science then at least 1/3 is known stuff. In this regard this book is as good as any, although particularly well-written. But there are some dimensions that could actually benefit writers and readers (or theorists and practitioners for that matter) of the manosphere.

The strength of the manosphere is the empirical angle: people collect data from real life experiences and observations rather than speculative abstract theories, and are not afraid of realtalk on contentious topics. But the scientific reliability of this or that argument is sometimes questionable, to say the least. It is not like everything has to be scientific anyway, but some of the more sophisticated analyses have to be that in order to actually say something substantial about the world.

Additionally, the dissident angle represents a potential threat to the American globalist establishment, and new algorithms and other measures can negatively affect even those well-articulated voices who just wish to express their opinions online.

Here are some areas – largely inter-related – that can be improved or at least understood by the means of complex systems science:

1. Computional science

2. Network theory

3. Information processing

Before I carry on and explain which specific areas that an improved knowledge can be useful within, I will quote a passage from the book that gives a hint about some of the underlying principles discussed in Complexity (pp. 180-81).

> One consequence of encoding information as statistical and time-varying patterns of low level components is that no individual component of the system can perceive or communicate the ”bic picture” of the state of the system. Instead, information must be communicated via spatial and temporary sampling.
>
> In the immune system, for example, lymphocytes sample their environment via receptors for both antigens and signals from other immune systems cells in the form of cytokines. It is the results of the lymphocytes’ samples of the spatial and temporal concentration of these molecular signals that cause lymphocytes to become active or stay dormant. Other cells are in turn affected by the samples they take of the concentration and type of active lymphocytes, which can lead pathogen-killer cells to particular areas in the body. In ant colonies, an individual ant samples pheromone signals via the receptors.
>
> It bases its decisions on which way to move on the results of these sampled patterns of concentration of pheromones in the environment. As I described above, individual ants also use sampling of concentration-based information – via random encounters with other ants – to decide when to adopt a particular task. In cellular metabolism, feedback in metabolic pathways arises from bindings between enzymes and particular molecules as enzymes sample spatial and time-varying concentrations of molecules.

Computational science, network theory and information processing

Much like complex systems theories in general, network theory is interdisciplinary and can be applied to many fields, such as economics and medicine (metabolical networks and mapping of sexually transmitted diseases). For instance, some network scientists came up with this simple yet pragmatic solution regarding STD:

> …choose a set of random people from the at-risk population and ask each to name a partner. Then vaccinate that partner. People with many partners will be more likely to be named, and thus vaccinated, under this scheme.

Scale-free networks, such as the Internet, are dependent on the interplay between internal hyperlinks and external hyperlinks, often via Google and various social media websites that can create more traffic through posting, sharing and search optimization.

Using network terminology, Return of Kings is the hub within the manosphere, with other discussion boards, articles, books, websites, blogs and social media channels as interconnected dots. If some dots disappear, like peripheral individuals, blogs and comments, it is not particularly important for the entire network, but if hubs do then it will affect the network in its totality.

The problem is not necessarily the lack of competence of readers and writers, but the Google hegemony on the Internet. If for example Google, YouTube, Facebook and WordPress came up with a solution, based on algorithms and computer simulation, to block dissent and trolling it could (arbitrarily) imply a severe curtailment of free speech online. In that case are there any hopes for substantial parallel alternatives to Google and the largest social media platforms? Things that people in general can use without being a computer expert?

Apart from that, interplay between online and offline networks could certainly be approved by means of talking to at least 10 prospects within your own network, spreading ideas in a chain-like system. Or to use the vaccination example in another way: try to “vaccinate” one influential person in your network (with many partners, whatever that means) from the ideas of the Matrix.

These strategies are also used, more or less, by other spheres so perhaps it is the content rather than the strategies that makes the difference. But that requires that the content is available.

Read More: Game Does Not Need Science

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Le Favori De L’Élection Présidentielle Française, Cette Couille Molle Marié À Une Femme De 25 Ans Son Aînée

March 9, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

C’est l’histoire d’un mec de 39 ans, ex-banquier de chez Rothschild, qui rentre dans un bar (et dans la course à l’Élysée) avec sa femme de 63 ans. Non, ce n’est pas une blague, sauf peut-être la partie avec le bar. Le «centriste» Emmanuel Macron vient de se voir catapulté en tête du peloton dans la campagne menant au vote du 23 avril. La France se trouve ainsi exposée au risque de voir un mondialiste, un SJW («guerrier de la justice sociale») favorable à l’ouverture des frontières occuper la fonction suprême.

Le soutien pour l’éternel outsider Marine Le Pen reste constant, mais sondage après sondage, il semble que Macron lui volerait facilement la victoire s’ils parvenaient tous les deux au second tour. Malgré le fait que nous soutenions tous Le Pen, l’opinion à Return Of Kings reste divisée sur sa possible victoire. Je suis d’avis que si Macron et Le Pen atteignent le second tour, c’est Macron qui l’emporterait. Si cela arrive, mon collègue chroniqueur Jean-Batave Poqueliche me devra une tournée de cinq bières à mon prochain passage en France.

Le favori précédent, François Fillon (Les Républicains) est impliqué dans des soupçons de corruption et sera bientôt entendu par les enquêteurs. Pour des raisons pratiques et politiques (il est aussi à droite qu’un politicien de centre-droit peut l’être), je pense qu’il est préférable que Fillon, et non Le Pen, remporte le premier tour et même la victoire finale. Le fait que l’élection présidentielle française (sauf si un candidat l’emporte à la majorité absolue) se compose de deux tours, signifie que même une victoire préliminaire de Le Pen peut quand même se solder par une défaite face à Emmanuel Macron au second tour.

Le mariage de Macron est la publicité parfaite pour un taux de natalité non existant en France

Sans commentaire

La France fait face à une crise existentielle, avec son taux de natalité en chute libre et le nombre grandissant de «minorités» ethniques qui menace de la transformer en une nation à majorité musulmane en l'espace de quelques générations. Le mariage de Macron avec ce vieux croûton de Brigitte Trogneux est un microcosme de ce désastre démographique. Bien qu'elle ait déjà des enfants (qu'elle a, comme par hasard, abandonné pour suivre Macron), le couple continue sur sa lancée de décisions politiques catastrophiques, comme l'ouverture des frontières à la sauce Angela Merkel, qui n'aide en rien à la sauvegarde de l'identité et de la culture française et participe plutôt à leur destruction.

Il est triste de constater que d'autres Français désespérés sont en train de suivre l'exemple du candidat à la présidence. Bon nombre d'entre eux se mettent en couple avec des femmes plus âgées, réduisant encore davantage les chances de combler l'écart entre la vieille génération et la nouvelle. On a tous entendu parler de la capitulation française et de leurs débâcles pendant la Seconde Guerre Mondiale, et dans une moindre mesure pendant la Première Guerre Mondiale, mais la France du XXIème siècle n'est jamais tombée aussi bas. C'est tout de même malheureux car les dirigeants français d'après-guerre étaient particulièrement connus pour mener une croisade inlassable contre les tactiques terroristes gauchistes. On retiendra le bras de fer que le président

Charles de Gaulle engagea contre les millions de gauchistes de Mai 68.

Emmanuel Macron est simplement le gauchiste mondialiste que l'on ne nomme pas

Emmanuel Macron a travaillé pour la plus grosse couille molle démagogue qui ait jamais souillé l'histoire présidentielle (un titre qu'il pourrait bientôt revendiquer) mais il nous affirme qu'il est centriste maintenant.

L'un des aspects de Macron qui attire le vote des Français est le fait qu'il prétende être centriste, quoi que cela puisse vouloir dire. Et pourtant, ce charlatan était bien un membre du Parti Socialiste, avec son serment d'allégeance aux grosses sociétés allant main dans la main avec ces ignobles idées de couille molle concernant l'immigration, les «réfugiés» et autres malaises sociaux. Cette année, il a même eu le culot d'affirmer que la politique d'ouverture des frontières d'Angela Merkel avait préservé la «dignité» de l'Europe. Il a aussi personnellement attaqué Trump, qui, contrairement à Macron, ne répondrait pas à des attentats terroristes comme ceux de Paris ou de Nice en maintenant et en multipliant les hordes de migrants qui refusent de s'assimiler.

Les références économiques de Macron sont, elles aussi, risibles. Lorsqu'il était un membre du gouvernement socialiste d'Hollande, il a publiquement soutenu le système saturé des aides sociales françaises pendant bien trop longtemps. Et il insiste maintenant pour se faire l'homme qui va réduire les dépenses publiques. Emmanuel Macron se dévoile de plus en plus comme un caméléon politique dont le parti, En Marche !, semble plus apparenté à un véhicule personnel dans son avancement politique qu'à une organisation de cohésion idéologique. Une tendance semble pourtant rester constante: sa volonté implacable de saigner la souche ethnique et l'histoire culturelle de la France.

Ainsi, le calvaire d’une France à l’agonie se poursuit

Alors qu’on pensait que cela ne pouvait pas empirer pour la France après le quinquennat de François Hollande, il est possible que Macron réussisse à aggraver la situation. J’aimerais beaucoup me tromper mais je pense que Macron emménagera bientôt à l’Élysée. Je serais ravi de perdre mon pari avec Jean-Batave Poqueliche, comme j’ai été ravi de voir Donald Trump me donner tort après avoir prédit qu’Hillary Clinton allait gagner pendant une grande partie de l’élection de 2016.

Cependant, même si Le Pen et Fillon échouent, la France a au moins un potentiel décisionnel pour faire face à Macron. Le problème est que le temps presse et il faut agir sans tarder. La France ne doit pas faire le choix d’attendre 2022 pour rectifier le quinquennat de Macron. Elle n’a aussi vraiment pas besoin d’un président marié à une femme qui est assez vieille pour être sa mère.

En savoir plus (en anglais): Plus De 80 Morts Dans Un Nouvel Attentat En France, La Police Incite À Ne Pas Mettre En Ligne Des Vidéos Qui Contredisent La Version Officielle

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Hidden Agenda Behind Interracial Pornography

March 9, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

With so much winning for the anti-globalists and patriots lately, it is easy to observe delicious amounts of salt on social media. Add to that the riots in Charlotte, Baltimore, Ferguson or Milwaukee and you have the ideal recipe for impotent anti-white rage.

The left and their zombies observed that following their defeats, calling “racist” anyone who disagrees with them stopped working. So they decided that it was time to change targets. The evil white won’t bow in mind so they will attack his flesh.

They sent more hate than usual on social media focusing on graphic images of black-on-white gang rapes (not depicted in the present article) that was extracted from pornographic films with lines along the “Your girls all dream about the black cock. They will fuck us instead and we will breed you out of history.”

It is a rhetoric that is used quite extensively by other radical anti-white groups such as Muslim fundamentalists, constantly repeating that white girls will be their weapon in the war against us and their seed will triumph, Allah willing.

Who creates this type of imagery?

Who’s that Pokémon?

As I detailed in a previous article, “every man has the sacred right to prefer one woman over another based on what attracts him.” But the fact that the media fuels the anti-white sentiment is where I draw the line.

Any man hates the idea that his right to breed will be stolen by another. There is a very primal dimension in this hate. But the over-representation of black men on white girls in the media is fairly recent, especially in porn. Jews have a disproportionate role in the production of pornography in general.

Here's a list of Jews who own the main pornographic networks :

- VIVID, the largest porn site in the world, ran by Steve Hirsch and Bill Asher
- AVN Media – Paul Fishbein, Irv Slifkin, Barry Rosenblatt
- PMG Inc/ Private – Charles Prast
- Spiegler Girls, owned by Mark Spiegler (also owner of the paedophile website NAMBLA.ORG)

But it is interesting to observe that almost ALL the distributors and creators of interracial porn are Jewish:

- Dogfart, owned by Cable Rosenberg – site that proposes scenes of "cuckold sessions", "watching my daughter go black" and "interracial blowbang"
- Skweezme, the "Netflix of porn" owned by Mike Kulich (Kulich offers "racist" celebs the chance to star in his interracial porn)
- Blacked, owned by Greg Lansky, from France

How does it work? The Lansky case

The list goes on but the case of Lansky (second from the left) is revealing.

He made a fortune through his three websites :

- Blacked: Focuses on black-on-white cuckolding, cheating and calling white men lame and inferior. An emphasis is also made on humiliating "Aryan stereotype" girls, by choosing them especially young, with small frames and breasts while dressing them in school uniforms so they look as underage as possible.

- Tushy: Focuses on anal sex. Normalises marginal non-reproductive sex, depicts it as arty and trendy. The audience is incited to reproduce it, leading to a decrease of fertility and ultimately, control of the target population.
- Vixen: Focuses on visually adult men having sex with girls that are legal but look underage, by picking them especially skinny, petite or with small breasts. They dress them like little girls and pick the ones that are the smallest or children-like and make them fuck men twice their size. This is a legal way to indirectly suggest that it's OK for grown men to fuck little girls.

Lansky is unsurprisingly in cahoots with leftist Fake News outlet The Daily Beast, who celebrates his work through "writer" Aurora Snow (a pornstar who apparently built her career on interracial porn as her sub-par looks made her do the scenes that the other girls could decline). It tells you the care The Daily Hambeast takes into choosing who writes their articles.

Lansky explains how he will infiltrate every electronic device to reach even the youngest viewers

> Adult companies need to learn to have a digestible social media presence—one that is safe for work, safe for the audience that wants to enjoy the brand. If they want to cross that border for graphic 18+ content they can click a link

Lansky brands people that diss his "elegant art", "haters" or "racist". The profile would not be complete without the overweight "Dan Bilzerian of the Poor" Instagram and "U mad, witebro?" message.

What do the Jews have to say about these accusations?

More than a long hypothesis, let's hear it straight from the horse's mouth:

Creating this imagery, the shills pretend there is "racism" from girls that don't want to fuck black men. The most vocal about this supposed racism in porn are always Jews.

Case in point, James Deen.

In an interview to Vice-owned Broadly, Deen declares:

> Female performers frequently agree to do a scene and then back away when > they discover that he plans to have them on camera with a person of colour.

>
> “It’s irritating and disgusting and annoying. And It creates a huge problem with casting,” he says. “I end up in these situations with agents where I’m trying to plan a scene and I have to say, ‘Okay, one girl will be having sex with all the men and one girl will only have sex with the white men,’ because there are women who have never had sex with a black man on camera and want to be paid $500 extra for it, as if it’s a chore. It’s racist and it’s belittling and it’s keeping me from making a good product and it’s hurting good performers like Mickey Mod.

In an interview with Israeli newspaper Haaretz, James Deen said about Jews in porn:

> Haaretz: Do you happen to have any Jewish role models or figures in the industry?
>
> Deen: I don’t go into a place and think, “I’m Jewish. Who else is Jewish? I need to work with them.”
>
> Respect goes universally across all races, creeds, colours, religions, everything. The Jews know we’re better than everyone else. That’s all that matters.
>
> Haaretz: That’s going to be the blow-up quote in the article.
>
> Deen: (Laughs) It’s true. We’re the Chosen People. (Laughs) It’s a fact.

Nathan Abrams

Nathan Abrams, Jewish professor at the university of Aberdeen in Scotland narrows down the rule of the Jews in pornography (emphasis mine) :

> Jews are the driving force behind the modern pornographic industry and their motivation is, in part, to destroy gentile morals.

> […]
>
> Pornography thus becomes a way of defiling Christian culture and, as it penetrates to the very heart of the American mainstream (and is no doubt consumed by those very same WASPs), its subversive character becomes more charged. … Extending the subversive thesis, Jewish involvement in the X-rated industry can be seen as a proverbial two fingers (Middle finger for American readers) to the entire WASP establishment in America.
>
> […]
>
> Jewish involvement in porn, by this argument, is the result of an atavistic hatred of Christian authority: they are trying to weaken the dominant culture in America by moral subversion."

The "industry" has already taken a side

If it was the other way around, they would call the National guard. Found on Twitter. Note the New World Order nod Complains have been filed about videos that appear on popular porn sites that depict "the black master race", attacking "whiteboyz", "little crackers" and throwing around racial slurs directed at whites. The content revolves around fucking white "daughters, mothers" and insisting on the fact that it will cleanse our race through interracial breeding.

These videos are anonymously uploaded, vetted by host websites and remain online despite their illegal nature.

One might argue that a large majority of girls doing porn are damaged and that is why they do it. Coming from single mother or abusive households, they often got molested as children, collect mental issues and substance abuse or are in it for the money or just want to slut it up and feed their need for self-destruction. So interracial pornography is just one more tool in their (rancid) box. But is that what the people want?

IR porn is not profitable, it is political

“Black” is at the bottom and interracial does not even appear. It simply does not sell

This pretend racism can’t escape the reality of things, even with their masters telling them to comply. Many white girls in the business ask for extra money to perform with black men, mixed Latinas or otherwise are registered as whites in many of the productions they star in or can flat out refuse to have sex with black people on camera. When they state their preferences or choose what seems the best for their (short and sore) career, they are automatically branded as racist.

One of the unfortunate things for porn producers trying to push the (((weak white cuckold agenda))) is that apart from low T balding white Men (it would be interesting to search the browser history of male democrats that voted Hillary), (((interracial porn))) is not popular among a majority of young men and women, white or not.

The large part of these interracial movies have no interest in the act of black man fucking a white woman per se. The psyop only consists at getting back at Whitey for being so evil in the past, His daughter, sister… his future must pay.

Typical double standards, Schlomo!

Evil Whites! Serves them right!

Funny how if tomorrow someone creates a “Whitened” website, with all the elements of Blacked with video such as “White Master Impregnates Girl With His Big White Cock In Front Of Her Sissy Black Boyfriend,” SJWs would have epileptic fits and the surviving ones would try to torch the studios.

Mainstream media controlled by the elite work together as we know and even try to peddle their pornography on Youtube “because it is art.” Take the example of a cuckold pornographic video that was accessible by children (initiated by a Norwegian who studied photography with Jewish Richard Avedon) called “Interracial Naked Art Photography,” that remained uncensored by Youtube even if vaginas and a penis were exposed (I added the black squares, it was full frontal nudity). Why?

Following the Youtube law of Double Standard, if it was a White couple depicted, it would be instantly banned. Because it is interracial, it is “artsy and progressive” breaking the vile taboos of the White-hetero patriarchy. The video was only removed by Youtube after the thousands of dislikes and messages of outrage all over the Internet. Meanwhile, states such as Israel lead heavy campaigns to denounce miscegenation between Jews and the Goyim.

This propaganda hurts regular black men too

Does that seem appropriate?

Whereas white porn actors can work with average penises, it is simply not an option for blacks. Recruiters will go through hundreds of thousands of applicants, narrowing down their selection like cattle before parading a handful of “performers” like circus animals. All of that to create profit and force the debunked bigger black dick myth.

“Studies” that show a longer average length among blacks are always self-reported. So do “maps of penis sizes”, created on websites where anyone can upload anything and no one gives sources. Here are two scientific, reliable measurement studies:

- Penile measurements on rural Tanzanian males

- Condomania's List of States by Penis Size based on sales: Highest average size : North Dakota (1.08% black population) / Lowest average size: Mississippi (37.6% black population)

If I were a black man, this scenario used to sell garbage would not make me happy either. If those films suggested that the only way I can fuck a blonde skank is by being a rapist, a poolboy, a convict or sneaking in the house of my white prey while her parents are gone and that the act is defiling in nature, I'd be pissed.

Imagine your girlfriend leaving you because your dick is not as big as what she saw in porn or only owing your success to the porn fable of "muh dick" and not to your game or how smooth or attractive you are.

But it comes back to bite them in the ass

What has history told us about a brand or an industry pushing a political agenda, ignoring the basic laws of money making or promoting a product that customers do not buy?

It fails and has a limited lifespan, as we saw with various regular brands such as Starbucks or Kellogs that endorsed anti-white policies, just for the feelz. Customers flee and the firm's worth plummets.

These pernicious ideas remind us of some usual liberal mercenaries in the media such as National Geographic with its globalist piece "The Changing Faces Of America". Its authors Lisa Funderburgh and Martin Schoeller showing, through digitally modified mugshots, that America will eventually blend into brown-skinned people with curly hair and light eyes. And that there is nothing you can do or say about it, raycis'!

What they want to you to believe versus what that child really looks like

Public television channels get in there too. With the taxpayer's money. Look at CBC's Beige power gang, evil goy. And quake with fear witnessing their might.

La pornographie comme arme psychologique

Some communities already took steps to tackle the problem. Russia recently banned access to a wide array of pornographic sites due to its harmful effect on the youth and told the Russian to "go meet someone in real life instead." And to the great rage of masturbating liberals, Trump has promised to crack down on that type of porn.

Compulsive masturbation fucks with your brain. It is a verified fact. It incites our young men to engage in endless wanking sessions, satisfying their urges and preventing them to pursue real girls. It digitally neuters our youth who does not need more enemies with the terrorist third wave feminism and the anti-masculinity media.

Porn is the ideal tool as it is, in a way, non-violent and tempting. It is understandable: If you needed to release your sexual urges, what seems the easiest?

Spending hours learning game, working out, approaching tens, hundreds of girls and getting rejected in many instances before finally managing to bed a 6? Or access to endless supplies of 9s in all the scenarios imaginable at the click of a button, get unlimited orgasms and get on with your day?

These elements just confirm us that porn is a waste of time and an additional medium to promote degeneracy and globalist poison. Game and masculinity are the counter-measures that will short circuit the elite's plans. Stop watching porn. Approach girls. Live a happier life.

Read More: Why Is There A Prolific Jewish Presence In The American Feminist Movement?

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Decline In Testosterone Is Destroying The Basis Of Masculinity

March 9, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Testosterone levels in men are declining worldwide alongside sperm counts. The hormone that makes men men is disappearing from the human world. As a result, men are becoming more feminine and choosing the paths of weakness, homosexuality, and cuckoldry. While it's necessary to look at the ideological causes of leftism in men, the biological reasons must not be ignored, and that starts with an understanding of the testosterone crisis.

Cultural programming alone cannot explain why Western men are becoming so womanly and fragile. A man who receives blue pill and feminist propaganda through university education, the media, or entertainment will not fully accept that propaganda unless his biochemistry is compatible to it, in part from having low testosterone. His mind accepts more feminine ideas because he is more feminine. You cannot accept masculine truths if your biology lacks a healthy level of testosterone, the chemical building block of masculinity.

Whether or not you accept my proposition that a man with a low testosterone level is more likely to be receptive to liberal ideas, the facts bear out that testosterone levels are declining every year (alternate link).

> ...testosterone concentrations dropped about 1.2% per year, or about 17% overall, from 1987 to 2004. The downward trend was seen in both the population and in individuals over time.
>
> The decline is consistent with other long-term trends in male reproductive health, including decreases in sperm quality and increases in testicular cancer, hypospadias and cryptorchidism.
>
> The strongest association was observed in same-aged men from different sampling years. For example, a 65-year-old in 2002 had lower testosterone levels > than a 65-year-old in 1987.

Approximately 1 in 4 men have low testosterone, but the scientific bodies that set the numerical standards, particularly the United Nation's World Health Organization, have a blatant interest in promoting "toxic masculinity" and downplaying the testosterone crisis. This interest is made bare with the execution of an agenda to feminize defenseless boys, their promotion of the world's most rabid man-haters, and their multi-million dollar sponsorship of vagina-worship through UN Women, which aims to make every man a collared dog of an empowered female office worker.

Sperm counts are dropping

The decrease is testosterone is coinciding with a decrease in sperm concentration. A French study showed that they are decreasing 1.9% per year.

> Among a sample of 26 609 partners of totally infertile women undergoing an assisted reproductive technology (ART) procedures in the whole of France over a 17-year period, there was a continuous decrease in semen concentration of about 1.9% per year and a significant decrease in the percentage with morphologically normal forms but no global trend for motility.

Another study points to a worldwide decline.

> In 1992, Carlsen et al. reported a large, global decline in sperm count for the period 1938-1990 based on 61 reports of sperm count from different countries around the world during that period. In 1997, Swan et al. reanalyzed the same data set using multivariate statistics. This reanalysis confirmed Carlsen et al., subject to constraints inherent in retrospective longitudinal studies of sperm count.

Testosterone is declining, sperm counts are declining, men are becoming infertile, and if a walk through my home town of Washington D.C. recently is a reliable indicator, they're rapidly embracing homosexuality and transsexuality as normal lifestyles to live hopelessly sterile existences that are disconnected from their natural biological role, and one where they vote for feminist politicians like Hillary Clinton that want to usher us all into an androgynous hell where sex differences are eradicated.

Sperm counts are getting so bad that the anti-testosterone globalists at the World Health Organization have already lowered the normal standard. Otherwise, perhaps as many as 50% of Western men would be labeled clinically infertile. Imagine the news headline on that story.

> Sperm count, or sperm concentration to avoid confusion with total sperm count, measures the concentration of sperm in a man's ejaculate, distinguished from total sperm count, which is the sperm count multiplied with volume.[5] Over 15 million sperm per milliliter is considered normal, according to the WHO in 2010.[6] Older definitions state 20 million.[2][3]

Testosterone should not decline in healthy men

If you believe that testosterone should decrease as you age, you have been taught a falsehood. If you're healthy, it should remain stubbornly constant, even into your elderly years.

> Handelsman and his team, however, found that serum (blood) testosterone levels did not decline with increasing age in older men who reported being in excellent health with no symptoms to complain of.
>
> "We had originally expected age to have an effect on serum testosterone, so the findings were a bit of a surprise," Handelsman said.

If we can conclude from the above studies that testosterone is declining independent of age, it's worth investigating the cause. Most of the current science points to endocrine disrupting agents.

> EDCs are everywhere. They lurk inside your house, leaching from human products such as personal hygiene products, chemical cleansers, or contraceptive drugs. They also end up in your food and drinking water, causing > you to unknowingly ingest them.

>
> EDCs pose a threat to men's health as they interfere with testosterone production, causing men to take on more feminine characteristics.
>
> Here's one proof: in a number of British rivers, 50 percent of male fish were found to produce eggs in their testes. According to EurekAlert, 3 EDCs have been entering rivers and other waterways through sewage systems for years, altering the biology of male fish. It was also found that fish species affected by EDCs had 76 percent reduction in their reproductive function.

Endocrine disrupting agents are mostly found in plastic products and cleaning chemicals. Considering that your home is essentially bathed in these agents, and that most of your food is prepared on them, you can see how pernicious this problem is, affecting both boys and men.

> Animal and cellular studies have found that some phthalates block the effects of testosterone on the body's organs and tissues. Researchers set out to examine whether these chemicals, which are widely used in flexible PVC plastics and personal care products, had a similar effect in humans.
>
> "We found evidence reduced levels of circulating testosterone were associated with increased phthalate exposure in several key populations, including boys ages 6-12, and men and women ages 40-60," said one of the study's authors, John D. Meeker, MS, ScD, of the University of Michigan School of Public Health in Ann Arbor, MI. "This may have important public health implications, since low testosterone levels in young boys can negatively impact reproductive development, and in middle age can impair sexual function, libido, energy, cognitive function and bone health in men and women."

It's important to know the signs of low testosterone. If you're being exposed to harmful chemicals, your testosterone will likely see a chronic decrease over several years instead of experiencing a sudden drop that you can perceive. This is why it's a good idea to get your testosterone level checked right now to establish a baseline count that can be compared to a future reading.

One of the most telling clinical symptoms of low testosterone is emotional changes that make you more moody, irritable, and depressed. In other words, having lot T turns you into a menstruating woman. Not only does the physiognomy of a male feminist degenerate into that of a soft, punchable mass of tissue, but he acts more like a woman, too. This is exactly why I believe that the increase in feminine behavior among men in the West is as due to biology as much as to culture. We simply cannot explain the rise of the cuckold through CNN, Hollywood, and universities alone.

Conclusion

The fact that testosterone is declining worldwide, and that it's contributing to the rise of femininity in men, both in appearance and ideology, tells us that counter-propaganda and spreading red pills will not alone solve society's leftward march. We can take over all major institutions today, and shower men with the truth, but their biology simply won't be able to accept it because they have become more like women: cooperative, egalitarian, emotional, and socialist.

The next step we must take is to launch a scientific crusade to test the effects of all commercially used plastics on male testosterone levels, and to enact a ban of their use if a negative effect is found. If we can do it to the pesticide DDT, we can surely do it for any chemical that is destroying the very biological basis of masculinity.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: The Origins Of Neomasculinity

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Ways To Combat Body Odor

March 9, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by Fresh Fragrance

During a late evening college classroom session, I was sitting with students, who like me already had a very long day. A cute girl, who was sitting behind me, took away my attention from how extremely boring the class was. I decided to muster up the courage to talk to her. But the moment I turned around to put my arm on her desk, she spoke out saying

”What’s that raw smell? Oh my god, someone smells like onions.”

She looked at me, apparently wondering if the awful scent had reached my nose as well. Since the room was packed with people, she didn’t realize the smell was coming from me as I found out later on. Of course you can imagine the extreme agitation that was running through every cell of my body as I was praying for class to end as soon as possible. I definitely wasn’t going to get any success getting her number at this point. However, had I applied these steps that I’m about to share with you now, I would have been placed in a better situation in that classroom.

We’ve all experienced similar situations to this. It can take a huge shot to your confidence and keep you almost fearful of interacting with people. It’s not a good feeling at all, trust me I know. That’s why I’ve put together a few steps, which have personally worked for me, that will bring back your confidence in any situation, remove the fear of interacting with people, and safely and effectively combat body odor.

1. Wash your armpits daily

This one is quite obvious out of the list, but still becomes the most forgettable when it comes to the importance of it. Washing is essential. Yet still there are those who may skip a shower or two from time to time. This should be avoided, especially if you want to feel and smell clean.
Another thing worth mentioning is how many times one should wash. You should wash no more than two times per day. Ideally, you only need one morning shower daily, especially if you do all your physical activity in the morning. But if you work outdoors in the mud during the daytime or you workout in the evening, then you should take a second shower to avoid transferring mud or body sweat to your bed. Whether you decide to shower once or twice, you should have no raw body odor during all your daily activities between the time you shower in the morning until the time you shower the next day. If you still happen to have even a small raw developing scent coming from your body during the day, then the following steps are essential for you.

I knew a guy who would take more than two showers a day to avoid this problem showering up to four times a day at times. What he failed to understand was that showering multiple times a day does not get rid of body odor problems. Although It's worth showering at least once daily to wash off your dead skin cells and general accumulated odor, you will still have the same body odor problem after every shower which is why you will need to follow the next step.

2. Shave your armpit hair

If you're a guy and your friend tells you that if you shave your arm pits, then you're less of a man; you ought to knock some sense into him. Not literally. But seriously, you might as well tell him that shaving your beard or being clean shaven makes you less of a man as well. Obviously, this is neither the case for both scenarios.

The difference between facial hair and armpit hair is that facial hair is out in the open air, making it easier to clean and maintain fresh as opposed to armpit hair. Armpit hair is not only impractical to maintain as you do with a beard, but it is the most closed off part of your body that grows the most hair.

Supposing that you are not a werewolf, your armpit, out of the hairs on your head and pubic hairs, is the only part of your body that has a second layer of separation from the air. This results in more bacteria buildup and odor that is easily developed more than any other section of your body. When you keep the bush growing under your armpit, it can easily get sweaty under there even after you shower.

Not to mention that the more hair there is, the easier it is for bacteria to make a permanent lodge; because of all the sweat mixed with your deodorant that it's attracted to. This creates a never ending breeding ground for bad odor. So do yourself a favor and shave your armpits regularly. At least you will be on your way of winning half the battle. This step is paramount to the next step.

3. Replace all your undershirts and T-shirts more often than you regularly do.

A general rule that I follow is to replace my T-shirts every summer. You should not be that guy or girl who is wearing the same T-shirt worn all last summer. Your T-shirt is associated with summer days, sweaty days, work days, and a washing cycle and there is a buildup that happens over time which wears away the durability and freshness of the shirt's fabric. Every time you wash a shirt, the detergent that you use embeds itself inside the fabric. This results in a buildup that will result in another breeding ground for bad odor. Like the detergent, your current deodorant will do the same thing but at a faster rate. You may notice that when you may buy a brand new T-shirt, it later gets a deodorant stain after the first day of it being worn.

Sadly it is an irreversible stain which is tightly imbedded into the fabric. It, along with any detergent soap you use, will be embedded into the fabric of your T-shirt creating breeding grounds for bad odor. You may notice this when you iron near the armpit side of the shirt, a raw smell comes out in the form of steam. This is why I recommend that you replace your shirts frequently.

T-shirts should be replaced every 6 months, but no longer than a year. Undershirts should be replaced every 4 months, however no longer than 6 months. If you don't wear undershirts, than you will want to change your T-shirt as much as you would an undershirt as recommended.

4. Use some specialized knowledge

All of these highly beneficial steps will reduce your chances of bad odor.

However, if you want to learn how to completely eliminate bad body odor for good and not have to worry about it every day, then you're going to want to click here to check out my ebook on eliminating body odor. Contrary to alternative solutions to antiperspirants (that usually don't work at all) ending up as failures, which you cannot afford to have happen, whether at work, at an important event or on a date, the information and methods laid out in my ebook Fresh Fragrance will give you superior results from everything that you have been using beforehand.

To learn about eliminating body odor for good without the use of harmful antiperspirants, or failed alternative solutions, click here to find out more.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Why Returning To The Pagan Mindset Could Bring Back Masculinity

March 9, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Sometimes a crisis can force you to do things you never would have agreed to before. My step-father was 40 years when he had a heart attack. Up until that point he had been a two-pack-a-day smoker. No amount of pleading could make him quit, but after his heart attack he quit cold turkey and never looked back. It's the same thing on a societal level—a crisis can change the course of a civilization forever.

We've reached such a crisis in Western civilization. Decades of leftist social engineering and replacement levels of immigration have turned Western man into atomized units devoid of spiritual purpose. But this crisis has caused a reaction within Western society. Men are starting to become aware of our dire situation and the events that led up to this point. We are also taking the first halting steps toward reversing the disease. One of these steps may be the return of the pagan mindset of our pre-Christian ancestors.

Christianity before the 20th Century

Christianity today has a reputation for being namby-pamby. Modern Christianity fights for feminism, egalitarianism, and third world immigration with the same ferocity as a Social Justice Warrior (SJW). It wasn't always this way. When Christianity was at its height during the Middle Ages, the society that it created was hierarchical, not egalitarian. There was a threefold social order that consisted of the clergy, the nobility, and the people. Husbands and wives each had well-defined roles and divorce was forbidden. Medieval Christians would be shocked at modern Christians' embrace of feminism and egalitarianism.

Medieval Christianity did not share the modern belief that everyone is good. Cities were built with walls and strong defenses, not because their inhabitants hated the people on the outside, but because they wanted to protect themselves and their posterity. The idea that Christians are obligated to take in hordes of Muslim immigrants would have been ridiculed by Christians of the past.

Even as late as the 20th Century, Christian leaders still recognized that peoples have a legitimate desire to guard their heritage.

Modern Christianity is pacifist in nature. Many churchmen oppose capital punishment and even modest means of self-defense. On the other hand, the Christians of the Middle Ages knew that the government bore the sword as an agent of God's justice. Thus, they had no problem with administering capital punishment to those who deserved it. And when Christians in the Holy Land were consistently harassed by Muslims, the pope himself called for a crusade to seize back the land from the enemy.

There is such a big difference between modern Christians and Christians of the past that one has to ask, Which one of these was right? Which one represented true Christianity?

What is the pagan mindset?

When I say pagan mindset, I don't necessarily mean a return to pagan religions. To be sure there are some men who have rejected modern Christianity in favor of a more masculine paganism. The most common is adoption of some form of Germanic paganism. While I've seen some movement in that direction, I don't expect the mass of Christians, nominal or fervent, to start worshiping Odin anytime soon. Rather, it is more likely that people will reject Christianity as being impractical for the forces that confront us.

The adoption of the pagan mindset will happen when people begin to realize that feminism, egalitarianism, and neoliberalism are not conducive to creating a healthy society. At that point, they will see that modern Christianity, which has adopted these "isms," is not a solution but an obstacle preventing these problems from being resolved.

Modern Christianity has bought into feminist philosophy. While it doesn't advocate for blue-haired harpies, it still pushes a leveling of husband and wife. It gives lip service to honoring motherhood but really embraces the idea of careerism for women. And modern Christian leaders would fight the return of patriarchy with as much vigor as the most extreme intersectional feminist.

When it comes to immigration from the third world, modern Christianity is even worse. Rather than calling for sane immigration policy where nations are permitted to have sovereign borders, it calls for Western nations to drop all border controls and admit everyone, even if they harbor an intense hatred of the West. Minor measures, like deporting criminal illegals, are stridently resisted. This opens up the citizens of Western nations to being the victims of unnecessary violence.

The viable pagan mindset would be a rejection of the forces that have brought us to this point. In place of egalitarianism and feminism, it would posit hierarchy and patriarchy. It would reject promiscuity for both men and women and re-embrace married life. In place of neoliberalism, that makes profit the only morality, it would value family and tribe above pure financial gain. Most importantly, the pagan mindset would sweep away the collective guilt that has prevented men from acting in their own best interest.

The downside of a pagan mindset is that it would be unchecked by Christian morality. This would open the door to the potential for ruthlessness.

Conclusion

As a Christian, my hope is that church leaders will stop trying to chase the secular culture, which is moving farther and farther to the left, and return to a healthy sense of justice and a well-ordered society. A Christian answer to the problems that face us would ensure any solutions that are implemented are done justly and, insofar as possible, mercifully. The ironic thing is that the right mindset is already part of the Christian tradition. All Christians would have to do is to reclaim their Medieval heritage.

But, barring some divine intervention, I don't see that happening. While more and more people have been waking up to the grave problems that are besetting our culture, most Christian leaders continue to peddle cuckservatism or outright leftism. It is likely is that church leaders will continue to try to win over leftists until it is too late. Worse, church leaders, will probably continue to block even mild reforms thus making the final reaction much worse than it would need to be. If the pagan mindset does return, the blame for it will lie squarely with all the church leaders that made it a necessity.

Read More: Why Is Modern Christianity So Wimpy?

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Wikileaks' "Vault 7" Revelations Prove That We Are Already In Orwell's 1984

March 10, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Smart TVs that spy on your every action and word, hijacked vehicles used to assassinate dissidents, operating systems deliberately altered to track all you do on a computer or smartphone. Seems like science fiction, right? In fact, these are merely the daily tools of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), as revealed this month by Wikileaks.

Locked in a desperate tussle with its chief rival, the National Security Agency (NSA), the CIA has been developing clandestine ways to monitor and even assassinate its targets. In many capacities, especially those pertaining to cyber warfare, the CIA's Langley, Virginia headquarters often had to rely on the NSA for technical expertise. It would appear that an extreme desire for independence, mixed with a massive injection of taxpayer funds, pushed the CIA to cultivate its own hacker methods and computer specialist armies to carry them out.

Whilst this may seem logical to some, the problem facing the CIA–and by extension the US government and America itself–is that the blueprints, if not all the details of this cyber warfare build-up have been widely disseminated by current and former employees, to the point that they have ended up right in the lap of Wikileaks.

Here are some of the key–and shocking–revelations coming from the so-called Vault 7 leaks, which make you wonder whether the fears of George Orwell in 1984 have been directly transplanted into 2017:

The CIA is now able to hack other countries and make it look like a foreign government (Russia?) did it

"ZOMG! The Russians are trying to hack us!"

The existence of Project Umbrage threatens to blow the "Russia hacked us" narrative out of the water, if it hasn't already. Umbrage involves the CIA meticulously studying the hacking methods of foreign powers and then copying them, leaving digital "fingerprints" that enable it and other US agencies (who may or may not be in the loop) to blame a cyber attack on, say, Russia or China. The possibility for going after Russia is spectacularly relevant given the regular insistences of Hillary Clinton and almost every other Democrat that Kremlin-funded computer hackers handed Donald Trump the 2016 election. Other than mostly unconfirmed and extremely vague reports from the CIA, FBI, and NSA, precious little evidence has been proffered to prove any of these allegations.

Thanks to the Vault 7 leaks, false flag incidents involving sophisticated hacking attempts have gone from theoretical brain exercises to a genuine means of forcing the US into war. Breaking with at least half of his party in December 2016, former Republican Presidential nominee and Senator John McCain called the alleged "Russian" hackings before the recent election "an act of war." Chillingly, an Umbrage-style doctoring of a hacking attempt could easily lead to another situation where multiple senior politicians call for immediate military action against a foreign, nuclear-armed power. And because the relationship between cyber attacks and acts of war are so vague, a future President might inadvertently use an Umbrage-inspired cyber attack as a pretext for a most catastrophic war.

Telegram, WhatsApp and other “encrypted” messaging applications are worthless if the CIA has access to your phone or computer

“Hello, is it me that’s not secure anymore?”

Much has been made in recent times about the relative cyber safety of different messaging applications. Skype, like Facebook’s Messenger service, is widely acknowledged as one of the least secure major platforms. Attention has consequently turned to alternatives like Telegram and WhatsApp. But the Vault 7 leaks conclusively disprove the notion that they are “safe.” The issue is not with the apps themselves but rather the CIA’s capability to intercept messages before they are encrypted. Custom-made malware for iOS (Apple) and Android operating systems, the latter of which runs Samsung devices, ensures that Langley and its operatives, or any other party with the same capabilities, can mine whatever you type and record.

Because the phone and computer markets are very oligopolistic in nature, with less than a dozen companies in each industry controlling 90+% of production, the CIA only needs the same number of basic procedures to keep almost the world’s entire digital population within its reach. A new iPhone or Samsung Galaxy may come out, yet the odds are that the hackers at Langley and elsewhere will only need to add a few tweaks to exercise the same pervasive surveillance powers that they had with previous models. So next time you feel the need to research “safer” applications, remember that the biggest problem will be with your phone and its operating system.

The CIA has sidestepped the US government’s promise to inform companies about security flaws

The CIA moved around Obama's promise, so which other agencies are doing the same. And why?

Particularly in a climate of corporate espionage, mostly perpetrated by Chinese firms, and rampant consumer concerns over privacy, Western companies stand to lose billions from security flaws in their products. To this end, the Obama Administration committed itself to approaching companies about these problems if they became known to arms of the US government. The CIA has clearly sidestepped this requirement, although the exact legal implications of this non-disclosure are contestable.

Going back to Samsung devices, the CIA used these "zero-day vulnerabilities" to turn the South Korean company's smart TVs into spying devices–even when they were turned "off." In a sign that these activities go far beyond one agency, British intelligence services were also intricately involved in creating the "Weeping Angel" technique. The owner of this kind of hacked television is unable to detect the outside interference and anything they do or say in the vicinity of the device can be picked up and transmitted back to the hacker.

Death by hacked car, anyone?

The recent Wikileaks revelations will only embolden those who claim that investigative journalist Michael Hastings was murdered by the CIA.

Leaks that date from 2014 show the CIA's intense interest in learning to hijack the vehicle control systems of cars. The rise of smart cars and the impending rise of driverless cars means that the vast majority of vehicles on our roads are now exposed to some risk of third-party sabotage from afar. The interconnectedness of more sophisticated entertainment systems with the nuts-and-bolts components like brakes and suspensions means that a potential hacker may not even need to target the more essential elements of a vehicle to kill someone. For instance, just as Samsung phones were recently recalled after their batteries exploded, the CIA could exploit an otherwise unknown electrical flaw in a car entertainment system to drive it off the road.

This month's dumping of files will do nothing but galvanize those who say that the CIA murders those who look into or try to expose its more secretive activities. One name you are likely to hear is that of Michael Hastings, who died in a car accident several years ago. I am sure that some people with a huge interest in the Wikileaks CIA files will start adding more names of those possibly killed in order to silence them. The specter of "undetectable assassinations" is a very real one and, whatever reservations you can have about whether a certain individual was killed off, it is now unfair to immediately call others "conspiracy theorists" for making such suggestions.

The CIA can indefinitely spy on you, but it can't keep tabs on which of its operatives and contractors are leaking Snowden's leaks were not even the tip of the iceberg.

Maybe the CIA will track down those responsible for the most damaging leaks in its history. Maybe not. But what cannot be refuted right now is that, for all its technological sophistication and massive insights into the lives of anyone it chooses to target, this agency is thoroughly unable to police its own workers. And that portends very badly for the security of both the United States and its citizens. A foreign government or criminal organization, for example, could offer a US government employee a tiny fraction of its wealth, perhaps $1 million, in return for secrets potentially endangering the lives of millions.

CIA computer and other experts, whether employed directly or as contractors, do earn very respectable incomes, but not enough to make them immune to the bribes of outside forces. There was some debate over just how much Edward Snowden was earning before he became America's most wanted man, with the whistleblower himself saying $200,000 per annum and another source claiming a more moderate $122,000. Snowden, you will remember, worked as both a direct employee and contractor for the CIA and NSA respectively. Nevertheless, his unprecedented revelations about the American government's surveillance capabilities might easily have come from another, paid-off colleague if they hadn't come from him.

At this stage, it is hard to say whether the original leakers behind Vault 7 did the world a great service or a terrible injustice. What we know for sure, however, is that next to nothing in this world is truly private anymore.

Read More: 7 Wikileaks Revelations About Hillary Clinton That The Media Is Completely Ignoring

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

5 Buzzwords Liberals Use To Smear Dissidents

March 10, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

When we were blue pills, some words would elicit in us Pavlovian answers. We would crawl at anything that appeared "racist" or tied to skin color. Anything deemed "Nazi" would immediately remind us of the infamous gas chambers. Getting thus determined in political thinking, with a negative conditioning on the right and a positive conditioning on the left—equality, diversity, democracy, such and such are good—, most of us would "spontaneously" lean leftwards… until reality started clashing with the expectations we were fed on.

The red pill metaphor means stepping outside an illusory world. Subconscious frames and conditioning, nevertheless, can efficiently prevent us from taking any way out. And the de-conditioning is not easy. Haven't you ever been tempted to retort leftist categories against leftists, by claiming that "dems are the real fascists"—implying fascism is bad—or that "white urban elves are the real racists and privileged"—implying white racism and privilege are still the problem? Such arguments actually never step out of the left's frames.

Here I step out of these frames to apply what the left did to our identities and culture: deconstruction. Nature is not a "social construction," masculinity hasn't been invented by men, but the Cathedral's system has. Last week, I went through some of the smears they use against us, and here are some more.

1. "Racism"

Since the beginning of its negative use, this notion has had a rather convoluted path. The word “racism” appeared in print at end of the nineteenth century. It could, then, be used positively or negatively, depending on the user’s own view: a French anarchist called “racists” ethnocultural alliances, such as pan-latinism or pan-slavism, based on belonging to a particular breed we would hardly call a race nowadays, whereas a pro-identitarian review used the word positively some years later:

> I express my best wishes for the success of your projects, because I am convinced that, in the federation of the peoples of Langue d’Oc fighting for their interests and the emancipation of their racist thought, the prestige of Toulouse will benefit. (Here, p.101)

Eventually, the notion would be used on a mass scale by heavily biased activists, such as the biology-denying anthropologist Franz Boas or Leon Trotsky. Its association with Hitler and the “Nazis”, then with a white colonization smeared as “oppression” and “exploitation”, achieved to bind it to an overly negative connotation, turning the word into a powerful instrument of ideological bludgeoning. The race card became a potent threat: if a white person dared to criticize the actions of some aggressive “person of color”, the latter would just have to mention the r-word for the former to waive.

In the most basic sense, the notion of racism means mostly a denial of human biodiversity. “We’re one humanity, noticing differences means constructing them, that’s reyciss!” But then some minoritist groups have been opposing the race-blind, one-humanity mindset under the guide of opposing “oppression”: “no, we’re not all the same, whites are denying us a proper identity!” This is of course a double bind. If we notice race differences, we’re racists, if we pretend they don’t exist or deny them, we’re also racists.

Two examples show what is really at stake here. First, remember the 90s, when whites were supposed to go colorblind and race became a taboo? In the mid-2000s the Left did a U-turn, and "race" was spread on many media and academic works. They were free to use the notion. We were not. Second, in 2015, NAACP manager Rachel Dolezal was outed as a white woman pretending to be black. The media wavered between mocking and blaming her. But if race is purely a social construction, why cannot anyone be white or black by choice? Blacks who shouted "Dolezal isn't black!" clearly implied one is intrinsically black and not made so. In other words, they were race realists. Does that make them "racists"?

The word "racist" got a blurred, broad sense, to the point where interracial porn can be deemed so because a masculine white guy showing dominance over a black chick would be intrinsically "oppressive", without the least hint of any biological theory of HBD. In truth, it is an instrument of Leftist bludgeoning, mainly if not only used against whites, and the polymorphous uses of the word only make it a more potent Damocles sword.

2. "Discrimination"

Michael Derrick Hudson had to pose as Yi-Fen Chou to bypass a genuinely questionable discrimination

Initially a legitimate word, "discrimination" has been widely appropriated by cultural Marxists as well. The Latin word discriminis originally meant discernment, that is, the ability to notice or properly assess differences and boundaries. Modern English kept this root in expressions such as "indiscriminately", which refers to blindness, rashness, and the lack of consideration. In the classic sense, discrimination meant a sound judgment, based on the awareness of differences and determinations.

In the midst of the twentieth century, the rising Big Left appropriated the word and turned it upside down. "Discrimination" became synonymous with "deciding from abusive generalities" or "distinguishing from unfair criteria." Combined with the demonization of "racism", the so-called anti-discriminatory stance meant denying whites the right to protection from miscegenation and collective sovereignty.

Of course, there is a consummate hypocrisy at work here, as the Left constantly practices ideological and class discrimination. If you come from the Midwest and want to succeed in humanities, you'd better hide the social codes of your original milieu and mimic urban hipsterism. Likewise, being a conservative, nationalist, traditionalist, pro-white… in the milieus cornered by the leftist establishment can have you mistreated and barred from employment. Only 6 to 11 per cent of college teachers refer to themselves as conservatives. People on the right, though, are not less intelligent or able: they are just barred from institutions the left monopolized, including social networks moderation.

In the name of opposing "discriminations", liberals actually discriminate through affirmative action and "diversity", which mean dispossessing whites by handing out employments to less able people on the basis of their purported victimhood—which itself implies an anti-white, anti-male charge. What we have here is another tool of ideological bludgeoning. Those who control the institutions will shriek against "unfair criteria" of discernment while applying their own. The real victim and charged is always the same.

3. Phobia

This one has been used to medicalize and psychiatrize the debate. Instead of evaluating what someone says, for example when someone makes a warning about the potentially deleterious effects of mass immigration, liberals will attack the speaker by deeming him to be disordered or irrational. In ancient Greece, φόβος (phobos) or φόβια referred to aversion or negative proclivities towards something. The word was picked up by psychiatrists to refer to an irrational or excessive fear of something—with some fine-grained distinctions: fear of snakes in an environment full of poisonous ones isn't a disorder, obsession over venomous snakes in a snakeless environment is.

Only later, of course, it was appropriated by you-know-who to smear conservatives and normal people who showed reluctant to leftward pushes. When we see how much those who warned about upsetting the Western racial equilibrium were actually right in their predictions—from Lothrop Stoddard to the 60s republicans—it becomes clear that speaking of "phobia" here is a mere slur.

Interestingly, Wikipedia warns us on the behalf of psychiatrists that "phobia" has a precise clinical meaning and should not be used too easily:

> [Xenophobia and homophobia] are not phobias. They are derogatory terms for negative attitudes towards certain categories of people or other things, used in an invalid analogy with the medical usage of the term. These terms were coined with the purpose of shedding a negative light on the people within these opposing groups, by suggesting that everyone within has an irrational fear towards the objects of the terms.

Beyond the departments of psychology, it seems like the establishment dwellers didn't get the memo. Some "scholars" tried to push forth a new buzzword, "multicultiphobia", in a pathetic attempt to pathologize criticism of the multiculturalist ideology. Others got more success in demonizing any social restraint on gluttonous women as "fatphobia", because steering them to be healthy is obviously a disorder.

The split between legitimate, clinic uses of the word "phobia"—with a precise meaning attached—and fuzzy bludgeoning uses everywhere else bears analogy with another case: for long, someone like Stephen Jay Gould has been considered by non-specialists as an eminent specialist of evolutionary theories, thanks to the cooperation of media machine and New York intellectuals, whereas any real specialist knew he had no legitimacy and spread misinformation. Shut up, researcher, Big Left took your stuff.

4. Populism

The very concept of populism shows how much the establishment separated from any loyalty or care to the ordinary people. Blaming "populism" is a way to reject people wholesomely: people ought to lose sovereignty because, y'know, managers know it all better than you and democracy could lead to bad events—understand: people freeing themselves from globalism—; people are no more the people of a country but a boundless mass with no inheritance and no ethnocultural identity; people are no more a being endowed with particular rights…

What has been dubbed populism is nothing else than supporting the concerns of ordinary people. Now, the very existence of peoples is denied through postmodernist deconstructionism, and at least white peoples have no right to owning their territory, their countries, or to even protect themselves from unwanted arrivals. Yesterday, you were an American and I was French, but now we're just random atoms floating along the channels of Big Market.

Peoples were never treated so badly through history. In the Middle Ages, so much smeared by complacent modern historians, the Third Estate was integrated into a cast system, free peasants were sovereigns of their fields, prices and selling rights were regulated so that each productive agent could make ends meets. Skilled craftsmen belonged to guilds, not to mention fraternities. Most people weren't that rich, but at least they were acknowledged as the people of the country and were part of the social edifice.

Today, most of us are more or less disintegrated, thanks to massive outsourcing of jobs, legal and illegal immigration blurring all boundaries and taking the resources, unrestrained female hypergamy meaning no more trustworthy mate for the average Joe… up to the denial of our condition of autochthons bearer of rights. "Populism" is about becoming acknowledged, integrated to our own societies, and endowed with dignity again.

5. Fascism

This word has become associated with military marches, scary music, and virtually synonymous with oppression, violence, no thought and no freedom of speech. Retrospectively, I don't understand neither the hate of the military nor its amalgamation with a particular form of government. The military field has always been a masculine institution, part of our life experiences and initiation rituals, and now, we've got a militarized police without much courage.

According to a smart contemporary, actual fascism rose mostly as an answer to the hostile attitude of workers and Bolshevism against the middle classes. Downgraded, numbed, dispersed and threatened by wannabe Red Guards, middle class people organized as well and struggled to maintain the social edifice. Eventually the fascisti leaders would seize the power, and then, create a working society, based at least in part on a healthy recognition of differences in abilities and vocations.

It can be said that fascisti were often defiant towards "phrase-worshipping": they were realistic enough to go beyond the smokescreen of "Democracy", "Representation" and so on and see who was using these. But even then, thinkers such as Julius Evola were able to publish under the Fascist regime almost completely freely—before getting outcast by left-leaning decision-makers after 1945.

What liberals call "fascism" can be spotted mostly in Leftism itself. SJW violence destroying careers and personal lives, subtle repression through political correctness, are far more oppressive to any healthy and legitimate citizen than historical fascism was.

Conclusion

Leon Trotsky theorized about the "permanent revolution" his political family should aim to push. Leftism, indeed, is all about perpetual discontent and pushing. It lives only through perpetually waging a metapolitical war. Conservatism may be stultifying, but at least it cannot be honestly accused to foster social division or cultural conflicts.

Identifying and rejecting the very thought structure of liberal bias will free us of being vulnerable to bludgeoning or ideological conditioning. Next time a mangina calls you a "fascist", asks him about why he thinks fascism was actually bad. Failing a satisfactory response, I'm sure he will at least show a priceless expression.

Read Next: 5 Ugly Framing Tactics Leftists Use To Smear Dissenters

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

How To Use The “Agree And Amplify” Tactic To Combat Degenerate Leftists

March 10, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

Let’s be honest: it is a fact that Western leftists, progressives, and SJWs harbor a particular hatred towards orthodox Christian believers as well as other traditionalists. Furthermore, such leftists consider orthodox believers and members of the hard political right to be their enemy. They are, in fact, correct in this regard, for traditionalists are indeed a political threat to them and their ideology. Such leftists are a threat to traditionalists in the West, and so this threat is one which traditionalists must deal with if they are to survive in any significant way in the Western world.

In light of these points, it behooves traditionalists to have powerful rhetorical and political tactics at their disposal with which to fight against the left. And one of these tactics is to take leftist lunacy, and then amplify it a hundred-fold; indeed, it is the strategy of embracing the left’s absurdities and then magnifying them to the point where the absurdity is made plain for all to see.

This is in essence, a reductio ad absurdum in rhetorical format. And note that this is a tactic which is, at least in part, inspired by Rule 4 and 5 of Saul Alinsky’s book Rules for Radicals, which argues that a radical should make the enemy live up to their own rulebook and also that ridicule is man’s most potent weapon.

Time to use this bastard's own ideas against his present-day SJW acolytes.

Now, to see what is meant by this tactic of "Embrace, then Amplify," let us consider the newest item that SJWs and progressives are pushing in the West: namely, the idea that everyone must call individuals by the gender pronoun or designation that the person in question feels that they are, not by the pronoun which relates to their biological sex and objective reality.

It is obvious why they are pushing for this change: controlling language, and being able to potentially convict people for "hate speech," gives leftists and progressives immense power and control over the general populace. In fact, for many on the left, this "pronoun" issue is not even about the so-called transgendered people that they are claiming to care about, but rather it is about having one more state-sponsored cudgel available to beat traditionalists with.

And so it is clear why this whole topic is a major concern. Thus, the key question becomes: How can the right embrace and then amplify this particular issue? Well, here are three ways to do so (and note that these three ways can also obviously be used for other subjects as well).

Embrace, maintain, then amplify in frequency

The look you might get from an SJW who just got a taste of her own medicine.

The first method of embracing leftist absurdity and then amplifying it to the point of ridicule is to maintain whatever idea the left is offering, but then amplify it in frequency. So, for example, some leftists and progressives claim that there are upwards of fifty to a hundred different genders, which, remember, a person can be simply by feeling that he is that gender. Well, why only fifty genders? Why not fifteen hundred? Or five thousand? Surely there are many more genders than we currently think there are, so take the options that we presently have and amplify them exponentially.

At the same time, since all that is required to be a certain gender is to feel that way, then why cannot you feel like you are a different gender every day, or even every hour? Indeed, perhaps you need to create a schedule to inform your leftist friends what gender pronoun they should call you on Monday morning, Monday afternoon, Monday evening, and so on and so forth. In fact, maybe you should tell your leftist friends to check-in with you after every conversation just so that they can be sure that they are referring to you with the proper gender pronoun that you feel like you are at that particular moment.

Anyway, you get the idea: embrace the leftist lunacy, maintain it in its current form, but then amplify it in frequency, duration, and so on.

Embrace, shift, then amplify the shift

Being a different gender is so 2016! Time to be a new species!

The second method in this vein is to embrace the absurdity, but then slightly shift the focus of it in a direction that the leftist will not accept. So, for example, if the leftist asks you what gender pronoun you wish him to use for you, recoil in disgust at the fact that the leftist would assume to use a human pronoun for you; after all, that is showing human favoritism, and you actually feel like you are a cat.

Or maybe you feel like an alien, and need to be referred to by your alien designation. Or maybe you feel divine, and thus feel the need to be called 'O Divine One'. Or maybe you feel like you are of a different race, or age, or height, or whatever. In essence, use the leftist's own ideals against him by forcing him to call you something which even he knows you are not, but which he cannot object to given his own principles. And if the leftist objects to doing so, then immediately start firing out the standard leftist epithets of 'racist, bigot, hater, etc.' Either way, the leftist loses, at least in the rhetorical sense.

Embrace, reverse, then amplify the reversal

How can I be a shitlord today?

The final method to consider is one where the leftist's own principles are used against him directly. So, for example, the next time a leftist demands that you address him through the gender pronoun of his choice, simply tell him that you cannot. When he asks why, advise him that your gender is as a child of God which necessarily only recognizes two genders, and so it would be a betrayal of your gender to call him by his chosen gender.

And again, remember to be immediately ready to play the 'bigot' and/or 'intolerant hater' card against the leftist the minute that he tries to denigrate your chosen gender. So embrace the left's ideas, but then reverse them on the leftist in a way that the leftist cannot object to without blatant hypocrisy and inconsistency

And so the long and short of it is this: embracing and amplifying leftist absurdities are an excellent tactic to counter progressives and SJWs, and three of the ways to embrace and amplify are through increasing the frequency of the embraced absurdity, shifting it slightly to something the leftist finds unacceptable, and/or reversing it on the leftist.

Now, will this tactic work on the leftists themselves? Likely not, for their worldview can only survive on incoherence and absurdity, and so they are used to it—although, in fairness, you may convince the odd leftist to change his mind. However, convincing leftists and progressives is not the point. Rather, the point is to rhetorically neuter the leftists while at the same time helping to sway the fence-sitters to be against the leftists, not for them.

And for the purposes of achieving that particular objective, embracing then amplifying leftist absurdities is a good tactic to use.

Read More: US Government Goes Full Retard And Backs War Draft For Women

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

The Stories Of Two Domestic Terrorist Groups That Were Dropped In The Memory Hole

March 11, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

We often remember the late 1960s and early 1970s as a time of peace and love. Despite that, there was an undercurrent of violence. Street crime was skyrocketing, thanks to the judicial leniency back then. This was inspired by the "criminals are victims of society" meme, and it took a couple of decades even to begin to repair the damage. Further, the climate of agitation caused the summers to flare up with inner city race riots.

Political violence rose, reaching epidemic proportions. It would take a thick book to document all of it in the USA alone, but I'll focus on two well-known radical organizations. The lessons of the past are especially relevant today, with the recent upsurge in rioting orchestrated by very wealthy and well-connected groups and individuals; a problem also faced abroad. Likewise troubling are gangs numbering tens of thousands each, sometimes crossing state (or even national) lines, effectively paramilitary criminal organizations.

The Weathermen

The Weathermen (also called the Weather Underground) were a militant splinter group originating from Students for a Democratic Society. They numbered a few dozen active members, and I'll highlight some of the most notable ones. Some considered them as basically Robin Hood's Merry Weathermen (and some still do), but more thoughtful leftists realize that wasn't so.

Diana Oughton, the daughter of a wealthy and prominent banker, grew up in the picturesque small town of Dwight, Illinois. In her youth, she played piano and the flute and frequently enjoyed family trips to the Chicago opera.

Then she enrolled in Bryn Mawr, exposed to radicalism for the first time. At the age of nineteen, she attended her junior year at the University of Munich. There, a guy named Peter (who was either a boyfriend, or neck deep in the Friend Zone) steered her further away from her family's conservatism. Upon returning to the USA, she got hip to social justice, well-intentioned at the time. After reading Black Like Me, she tutored inner-city residents in Philadelphia. Then she went to rural Guatemala for humanitarian work, and became increasingly radicalized as she became ashamed of the USA's wealth and her upper-class background. This too seems odd, since spending two years improving the lives of the villagers wasn't a mere symbolic effort.

She later met her future boyfriend Bill Ayers. During college, he became involved with the peace movement, leading to other things. They joined the SDS (in which my father attained prominence and a humorous bit of notoriety). Oughton established her feminist creds there. According to the Wiki page:

> In March 1968, Oughton helped create a women's liberation group at a time when the issues were just beginning to emerge among radicals. The group met every week or so, wherever the women could find room. Most of the talk seemed > to center on the subordinate role of women in the radical movement and on the sexual oppression of women by the "macho" tendency of males to regard sex as conquest. During these meetings Oughton often discussed the role that women played in the SDS, which was a combination of being a sexual object, an office clerk, and a housekeeper.

From the SDS emerged the Weathermen, largely alienating the moderates. My uncle recalls the split: "I left when they went commie." Their beliefs were a hodgepodge of leftist stuff (including an unusually toxic overdose of White guilt), with a staggering number of radical and Communist alliances both in the USA and abroad, but their major contention was the Vietnam War.

They went underground, experimenting with countercultural living in fashion then, including kinky sex (to purge themselves of their bourgeois tendencies, of course). Despite that, it was a fairly miserable existence, crowded in filthy hideouts and working themselves into a revolutionary lather with nonstop political rhetoric and samokritika sessions.

On the fateful day of March 6, 1970, Diana was at a Greenwich Village safe house where they had a cache of 100 pounds of dynamite. She was assembling a nail bomb, meant to be used at an upcoming dance at Fort Dix. This is clearly at odds with the notion that the Weathermen only wished to cause property damage. After a mistake, she met the fate intended for a roomful of NCOs and their dates. There wasn't much left of her, and she took two Weathermen comrades—Ted Gold and Terry Wilkerson—with her. Some regarded her as a heroine or a martyr, though I won't name names because I respect a couple of them despite their staggering naivety.

Some of their fellow Weathermen fared much better. As for Bill Ayers, he was on the lam for a while, but charges were dropped. Later he became a professor at the University of Illinois. He also has connections to Obama, and—according to some—was a co-writer of one of The Lightworker's autobiographies, with a shout-out to Diana. As for Bernadine Dohrn—a law graduate and from a comfortably well-off family, and now Bill's wife—she had a fairly mild legal scrape from refusal to testify. Later, she became an adjunct professor at the Northwestern University School of Law.

As for Kathy Boudin, born to a left-leaning family and another Bryn Mawr graduate, she was also at the Greenwich Village explosion but survived. She got busted after a 1981 armored car heist, working in conjunction with a militant Black group, that turned fatal. (It's better to get out while the getting is good. For that matter, the end of the Vietnam War would have been as good a time as any for the remaining Weathermen to cut it out.) After being released from prison, she became an adjunct professor at the Columbia University School of Social Work.

Interestingly, that's the alma mater for several other Weathermen, as well as Richard Cloward, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Eric Holder, Barack Obama, and Mattress Girl. What's up with Columbia, anyway? Since it was also the refuge of the Frankfurt School, perhaps Columbia ended up a little ahead of the campus radicalism curve.

Kooky quotes:

> He [Peter in Germany] said something which made sense. He said the trouble with America was it had lost its pioneer spirit… it put women in the wrong place and they were becoming neuter. Hurrah for socialism!

These were the words which converted Diana Oughton decisively to radicalism. Come on, even Bernie Sanders could come up with something more inspiring than that!

> Dig it. First they killed those pigs, then they ate dinner in the same room with them, then they even shoved a fork into a victim's stomach! Wild!

That was Bernadine Dohrn, commenting on the Manson murders. The silly things kids say…

The Symbionese Liberation Army

Patricia Soltysik, alias Mizmoon, was from the pretty town of Goleta, California. She was the daughter of a pharmacist in a large family, and a promising student. Mizmoon's descent into moonbattery began when she enrolled in Berkeley in 1968. Quickly she turned into a radical feminist and self-described revolutionary.

She became a lesbian, and began a relationship with her future accomplice Camilla Hall (alias Gabi), five years her senior. Camilla's parents were the daughter of a Lutheran minister and the founder and head of the art department of Gustavus College. This Minnesotan became a social worker and activist even before moving to California.

Things really went off the deep end when these lesbian lovebirds met Donald DeFreeze (alias Field Marshal Cinque Mtume), basically the Black version of Charles Manson. He had been radicalized by a couple of prison outreach programs before escaping. He soon became their boyfriend (so much for being lesbians); thug game is especially effective with naive liberals conditioned to believe career criminals are victims of an unjust society. This trio became the nucleus of a gang, the Symbionese Liberation Army. They were Communist militants with a feminist and "social justice" slant, so far out in left field that they made Chairman Mao seem pretty reasonable. What is it about bourgeois misguided youths in the Bay Area, anyway?

The SLA's debut act was fatally shooting school superintendent Marcus Foster, a Black liberal and by all accounts a decent guy. This was spurred by a "fascist" proposal for student ID cards, intended to keep dope pushers off campuses. Robert Blackburn, his deputy, was seriously injured by the gunfire. Other than shooting people who didn't deserve it, the SLA was known for a string of bank heists.

Their most famous act was kidnapping Patty Hearst. After a couple of weeks of loathsome brutality, Stockholm Syndrome was setting in. (Aren't feminists supposed to oppose violence against women?) A few weeks later, they got Hearst (now alias Tania) to participate in a bank holdup. Needless to say, robbing banks was rather out of character for her; communists know a thing or two about brainwashing.

The SLA's luck ran out, though. On May 17, 1974, there was a police raid on their hideout leading to a massive shootout, and the building caught fire. DeFreeze, Soltysik, Hall, and three other oxygen-wasters died. There was another murder and another bank robbery by their remaining members, but almost all were eventually rounded up and imprisoned. As for Patty Hearst, after six months with the gang, she was arrested; emaciated and clearly unhinged by the experience.

Kooky quote:

> Therefore, we of the Symbionese Federation and The S.L.A. do not under the rights of human beings submit to the murder, oppression and exploitation of our children and people and do under the rights granted to the people under The Declaration of Independence of The United States, do now by the rights of our children and people and by Force of Arms and with every drop of our blood, Declare Revolutionary War against The Fascist Capitalist Class, and all their agents of murder, oppression and exploitation.

It's not clear who wrote their "Declaration of Revolutionary War," part of which is quoted above. Some believe that DeFreeze wrote it. Since he was a ninth-grade dropout and a mental case, I'm assuming that Soltysik—their "chief theoretician"—was the brains of the operation. Her tedious run-on sentences were the least of her problems.

In summary

With only a few exceptions—DeFreeze in particular—the Weathermen and SLA members started out as good kids. They fit a profile: Baby Boomers young at the time, from middle class to quite wealthy, almost all raised in good homes, many with religious upbringing (typically Protestant or Jewish), mild and well-intentioned.

Still, after being exposed to the radical scene—almost all on campus—they became urban guerrillas. If not for that, they would've become regular, law-abiding citizens. It's gruesome even to imagine the psychological process by which a gentle youth who wants to do good in the world becomes a self-hating SJW type, and finally a militant rebel at war with society.

Most students at the time didn't take it that far, of course, but many did (and still do) absorb radical ideas from the maelstrom of propaganda they received in college. Young people these days are told that a college degree is a ticket to the middle class (with mixed results), and must endure hefty student loans and four years of indoctrination efforts. Breaking the leftist stranglehold on the educational system and the “mainstream” media will be a key effort in draining the swamp.

Read More: The Real Legacy Of Chile’s Augusto Pinochet

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How To Construct A 10-Year Plan For Financial Independence

March 11, 2017 | by Max Panzer | Link | Original Link

You can add tremendous meaning to each workday by having a 10 year plan for financial independence. Knowing that after each day, week and month of work you are that much closer to being a truly free man will add a significant layer of peace of mind and enjoyment to your life. It will provide you with the additional motivation and direction to go full throttle as a professional and create a new resilience in your bearing as you go about your business.

Definition Of Financial Independence

As you will see, this is a goal that is achievable by every man that is gainfully employed earning a middle, to upper middle class paycheck. Financial Independence, however, is not to be confused with being rich. It is a financial state of achievement that will allow you to cover your bills indefinitely at a defined annual budget, without having to go to work for pay.

For the purposes of our discussion we will assume a debt free budget of $40,000 per year for a couple and $25,000 for a single man. With no mortgage, no car payments and no consumer debt these numbers will allow for a fine standard of living in my neck of the woods in upstate New York. Adjust as necessary for your own locale.

The 4% Rule

The first metric to understand is the 4% Rule. Four percent is the divisor you will apply to your target budget number. The resultant total is a very reliable estimate of the savings that will set you free from having to sell your time and labor for a paycheck. For example, dividing $40,000 by 4% equals $1,000.000. And dividing $25,000 by 4% equals $625,000. These are the magic numbers to strive for in your quest for financial Independence.

Thus we have the 4% Rule as a guideline for our purposes. It is certainly not a guarantee, but does provide us with an intelligent total to shoot for. Personally, I will continue with some form of earned income once my target number has been reached so that I can blow by my minimum needs and never have to worry about running out of funds; but to each his own.

Work only when it pleases you

The Monthly Savings Multiplier

So how much money does one need to save on a monthly basis over the span of 10 years to get to the lofty totals of $625K or $1000K? To answer this question we have our second metric called the Savings Multiplier. This number is the factor with which you will multiply a monthly investment contribution at an expected average rate of return that will add up to $625K or $1000K in 10 years.

The key assumption here is the expected rate of return. I am going to use 8%. This is a straight rate of return not adjusted for inflation. In the twentieth century the United States stock market returned an average of 10.4%. From 1975 to 2015 the market retuned 11.9%. And apparently, Warren Buffet expects an inflation adjusted return of 7% over the long term.

The Savings Multiplier for 8% is 183 and for 7% it is 173. If you want to be optimistic 10% is 205. Doing some grade 6 arithmetic and dividing $1,000,000 by 183 equals $5465. The monthly figure for $625,000 is $3415. These are the monthly contributions necessary to attain financial Independence in 10 years at an average rate of return of 8%.

Own every morning

How To Achieve The Desired Monthly Savings

Now it’s time to consider our Western mode of thinking regarding status and lifestyle. There is no doubt we live in an age unparalleled in history. We are indeed rich beyond measure in historical terms. The shelter, education, food and medical care available to the average citizen are a miracle, even compared to 100 years ago.

With this in mind and assuming your household income is at the middle to upper middle class level, it is time to consider the steps necessary to live off of 50% or less of your income. Putting off the mechanics here for a minute, let’s discuss what’s at stake.

We are talking about becoming free from the need to work for pay in the reasonable time period of 10 years. Imagine yourself back 10 years ago from today and consider whether it would have been worth it to permanently walk away from your job tomorrow. And if you think about it, the only real skill required for an eventual life of financial freedom is spending less money.

Live each day as a free man

Core Living Expenses

The two major expenses to consider in your quest for financial independence are home and automobile. Get serious right out of the gate and if you own a home consider selling and renting instead. Put an absolute cap on your monthly costs for shelter and move into a modern construction apartment or condominium. Rent for less, eliminate all maintenance costs and pay less for utilities and insurance. And then take whatever equity you have in your home and invest it in a total market index fund. Making this change can easily add up to $1000-$2000 per month in savings. Multiplying $1500 times our 10 year factor of 183 equals $274,500.

According to AAA here in the United States, the average cost per mile to drive a car this past year was about 57 cents per mile or $8600 per year. Consider moving as close as possible to your place of employment to cut down on mileage or even eliminate the need for 1 car in a two car household. If you cut back from 30,000 household miles a year to 15,000 miles, the per mile calculation produces a monthly savings of $712.50. Our Savings Multiplier of 183 applied to the monthly figure of $712.50 equals a 10 year result of $130,387.

Other Lifestyle Expenses

The same basic math applies to many other common expenses. Consider areas such as clothing, vacation, recreational vehicles, cable, grocery, restaurants, alcohol and the petty cash burned day to day through sheer carelessness. For a professional couple living the good life this can easily add up to $1,500-$3,000 per month. The product of $2,250 times 183 is $411,750.

The bottom line is that as a household earning $120,000 per year or a bachelor earning $60,000, if you sell out to the desire for financial Independence you can certainly live off of half your pay and invest the rest. Consider your bank account and a future of freedom your new status symbols instead the standard path of material possession. With some intelligent application, living more modestly can certainly be done with class and enjoyment.

Be a man with a plan

The Panzer Model

The example figures outlined above basically parallel the Panzer household. We have cut our breakeven point from $90,000 to $45,000 per year following the above model. We live in a luxurious 1700 square foot brand new condominium (with a 3 mile commute to work) and want for nothing. Our current yearly take home pay is about 90K and the difference in cash flow is now being invested on a monthly basis.

Our business also realizes gains of about $3K per month through debt service and additional cash flow. In combining our personal and business interests, we realize a steady gain of about 6K per month. Doing some quick math using the Savings Multiplier, added to our current investment totals, leads to an excellent financial future for the Panzers.

Was moving out of our beautiful home and downsizing our lifestyle a big hassle? To be honest, it did wound the pride a little bit. But working 60 hours per week with limited financial progress was much more of a hassle. Working that much without steady monthly gains over the long term was not smart.

Perhaps this is the question you need to ask yourself. Is having to work to survive for the next 25-35 years a bigger hassle than bearing down for a decade to become financially independent for the rest of your life? If yes, then pull the trigger and get started. A life of financial control, freedom and prosperity awaits you.

Read More: The Quest For Financial Independence In A Welfare State

Max Panzer

Max Panzer is the publisher of Becoming a Force of Nature. He is an independent business owner and has been married to the same woman for over 25 years. Max pursues his Life Mission at full throttle and works to cut through each day with a stronger, sharper, gleaming edge.

Why Women Are The Unfairer Sex

March 12, 2017 | by Rik Storey | Link | Original Link

A recent study by the well-known Professor Robert Dunbar has shown 'a very striking sex difference between male and female friendships.' In the few days since Dunbar gave a talk on the results, a number of articles have written of the superficiality of male relationships; rather, they focused on Dunbar's view that 'women clearly have much more intense close friendships…very like romantic relationships…if they break, they break catastrophically.' Whereas men are painted as superficial – 'With guys it is out of sight out of mind. They just find four more guys to go drinking with.' But, do the findings really indicate that women are friendlier or more sociable than men?

Now, of course, feminists will tell you that masculinity is inevitably oppressive and abusive, especially of the more supposedly feminine qualities of love, gentility and empathy. But, this misconception is totally unfair. As Moore and Gillette point out, in King, Warrior, Magician, Lover: Rediscovering the Archetypes of the Mature Masculine, oppressive forms of patriarchy are simply based on the same juvenile fear of Lord of the Flies; the 'mature masculine' psychology, however, is 'marked by calm, compassion, clarity of vision, and generativity.'

Indeed, science seems to agree, not only that hell hath no fury like a woman scorned, but also that women seem predisposed to scorning. For instance, women tend to dominate the judgmental and feelings-based personality types in Myers-Briggs Type Indicator tests. Naturally, when it comes to maternity, evolution has favoured those women with greater maternal instincts but this doesn't mean women are necessarily the more sociable sex; nor does it mean that men are cold, superficial loners.

Whilst men had to go out hunting and patrolling, working together and trusting each other, women did not. This explains why Dunbar found that men can readily welcome and be welcomed into new groups of males—'What held up their friendships was doing stuff together.' Women, however, had to compete with other women over the loyalty of the alphas to their brood. It is easy, therefore, to see how being 'bitchy' or 'catty' evolved to try to lower the reputation of other women in the group and, thus, level the playing field. Furthermore, it also explains Dunbar's finding that long-distance female relationships can be maintained simply by gossiping on the phone.

In the real world, oft forgotten by the left, men love spending time with their 'honour group', yet the actresses of Sex and the City could barely stand each other's company long enough to create a fictional replica for women. Certainly, the reason women have such intimate relationships built on deep trust and loyalty has nothing to do with being friendlier or less superficial than men. This doesn't make one sex better than the other, it just helps us understand what we are and why Emily Blunt calling women to just be less judgmental of each other is ignorant.

Another study has concluded that women are 'more sensitive than men to social exclusion, and when they feel threatened by the prospect of being left out, a woman's first response may be to socially exclude a third party.' So, because ostracism of any kind would have meant certain doom for oneself and one's progeny, females have evolved to be more cliquey and those alliances they do form are very high trust and with strong expectations of loyalty. Thus, Dunbar's conclusion regarding their relationships' intensity—'if they break, they break catastrophically.'

Now, I love women—the best relationships in my life have been with women—my grandmother, my mother, my wife, my daughter. I don't want to imagine a world without mothers and daughters. But, equally, I love men—really manly men! We face such a dearth of true masculinity in our time, twisting the findings of Dunbar's study to suit commonplace misandry in the mainstream media and academia is beyond unhelpful.

I think the time for apologizing about and even concealing biological trends must end immediately and the time for celebrating alpha males must commence. Men are the more social animal and the friendlier sex but feminists want women to take all the credit, imagining a world of sugar and spice vs. slugs and snails and puppy dogs' tails.

The fact is that the masculinity deficit we face in the West is due in no short part to mischaracterizing men. Feminists have denigrated masculinity for decades and, ironically, produced a generation of men full of fear and shame, readily descending into the very angry and abusive, Lord of the Flies-esque behaviour the feminists claim to oppose.

Julius Evola had it right, we need a return of kings, a return of honourable masculinity; we should be celebrating masculinity and femininity for what they are and pursuing their ideal forms. Bashing male relationships and exaggerating female ones is completely unfair, especially if you want a reputation as the fairer sex.

Read More: US Government Goes Full Retard And Backs War Draft For Women

Rik Storey
One Englishman promoting the great libertarian values and sociobiological qualities of the West. Visit my page, That Libertarian Chap, here - https://www.facebook.com/thatlibertarianchap

5 More Kama Sutra Positions

March 12, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Recall a few months ago that I wrote an article introducing Return Of Kings readers to that classic of Indian eroticism, the Kama Sutra, and enumerated four sexual positions contained within that text. The response to that article was, for the most part, positive, notwithstanding a few commenters questioning how I could possibly learn anything from a barely civilized nation of street soilers!

Yes, I'm being sarcastic.

Ignoring India's massive and memetic problems with open defecation, the Kama Sutra is still a masterwork of erotica, and should be studied by all.

Indeed, Vatsyayana's magnum opus was the first Indian literature to be studied by both myself and Harry Flashman, and likely many other Western rakes as well. And so, handing the torch to a new generation of cads, let us learn another five positions from this text.

1. The Belly to Belly

Each partner stands with their legs planted on the floor (or the woman can wrap one leg around the man's thigh should she desire). This allows the woman to either thrust or move up and down as the man thrusts as well.

Personally, I prefer the supported congress I discussed in the last article (because of the psychological sense of feeling like a barbarian), but this position is alright if you want the woman to do more of the work.

Playing this album is not required

2. The Top Position

Or, as I like to call it, the “literal spinner” position. Perhaps you’ve used the term “spinner” to refer to tiny, petite women, a term that refers to the potential for them to literally spin on the vertical axis represented by an erect penis.

Well, this is no longer mere hypothesis!

In this position, the woman gets on top and then “swivels 360 degrees.” And in case you were under the impression that this was merely a swiveling of the hips, the text continues to state that: “This position is for novelty only—the woman should be careful to avoid injury to herself or the man”.

Presumably what this position is named for

3. The Swing Position

Another woman on top position, this one manages the dual feats of feeling good for both partners and conveying a pretty clear psychological implication.

The woman places her back to the man and straddles his waist, mounting the penis. It facilitates the female orgasm, as most woman-on-top positions do, and the fact that the two partners never see each other’s faces makes it clear to both partners that this arrangement is purely a physical relationship, and that there is no longer-lasting affection. Should that be the message you want to convey, I would recommend using this position, and thus it is a useful position in your repertoire.

4. The Snake Trap

The name comes from how, in this position, there is no escape.

Anyway, the woman mounts the man in the usual way, but with her legs on either side of the man's hips while the man outstretches his legs. Holding onto each other's feet, both begin to thrust. A bit less intimate than the standard cowgirl position, but fun once in a while.

It doesn't quite resemble an actual snake trap

5. The Bridge Position

And finally, we end with a position where the man gets on top, but with a bit of a twist. With the man on his knees, the woman does a back bridge, where the man then begins penetration.

This one is not one of my favorites, mainly because it's apparently less pleasurable to the woman than a standard missionary—and yes, keyboard alpha males, I do concern myself with pleasing my women in bed. With all that being said, it does feel pretty good for the man, so I do not totally eschew it.

Reading my two Kama Sutra articles, you have a nice library of sexual positions. But there's plenty more, and those will perhaps be another article some day in the future.

Read More: An Introduction To Kama Sutra Positions

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric

Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Academic Finds 84 Serious Threats Of Violence Directed At Roosh And Return Of Kings Readers

March 13, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

An Australian academic has found that at least 84 serious threats of violence and "fantasies of violence" were directed against Roosh and Return Of Kings readers in early 2016. Shockingly, these 84 instances come from posts, comments, and replies in only three Australian-based Facebook event groups, two in Sydney and one in Melbourne. These SJW events, like others around the world, were planned in response to Roosh's announcement of ROK meet-ups. The meet-ups were later called off after a massive escalation in very credible violent threats against both Roosh and his fans.

In his analysis, Dr. Stuart Bender of Western Australia's Curtin University paid special attention to my article about Phoebe Moloney's biased reporting on our planned meet-ups and the knife attack group that this bias spawned. I was pleasantly surprised with Dr. Bender's rather even-handed approach to both my writing and Roosh's, even if I did not agree with all his conclusions. The 84 serious threats of violence and fantasies of violence catalogued by Dr. Bender do not include the oftentimes more outrageous threats of violence on Laura-Rose Freeman's "The mutilation of 'legal rape' supporters genitalia" Facebook event (archive). The "legal rape" accusation against Return Of Kings has been conclusively debunked, as Roosh's satire drew very heavily from the Jonathan Swift classic A Modest Proposal.

It is a pity that Dr. Bender chose to refer to Laura-Rose Freeman as "L.R." to partially preserve her anonymity. Nonetheless, his quoting of her various violent threats is on point:

> This teams goal is to (in a humane a way as possible) dismember or mutilate the genitals of the men who support this atrocious movement (L.R. (female) in the Mutilation of “Legal Rape” Supporters Genitalia, 2016). [6]
>
> Anyone wanting to join me in the dismemberment of any male attending this radically misogynistic meeting? Happy to provide the knives […] If your gonna go to jail it may as well be for this (cited in Brown, 2016). [7]

Might I add that this is a deeply disturbed young lady.

Before SJW knife group:

After SJW knife group:

I take no pleasure in saying that this girl needs psychiatric help, particularly when you take into account her seeming obsession with knives, blood, and genital mutilation.

So how many more threats of violence were out there and are still out there?

Roosh at his press conference in February 2016. He had to hire private security after threats against both himself and his family.

Once again, Dr. Bender's approach was much more balanced than I expected. In addition to the public threats on the four Facebook groups (the original 84 plus the ones from Laura-Rose Freeman's group), he gave credence to the very serious private message threats that Roosh received. But remember, this is just four locations on one social media platform.

As one of the people included in the organizational structure for the meet-ups, I distinctly remember serious threats of violence erupting in the Facebook comments for major Australian media outlets, such as Fairfax Media and Channel Seven News. There were also particularly nasty responses from cities across the other side of the world, Glasgow and Toronto chief among them.

It is fair to say that Bender's analysis, as important as it is, touches on less than 1% of all the very violent threats and related commentary one could still find on Facebook against Roosh and Return Of Kings. In my article on Phoebe Moloney's bias, I mentioned a few of these, including from a former New Zealander contestant on The Amazing Race.

Our claims of bias against Fairfax Media and other media outlets have been thoroughly vindicated

Say no more.

Because Fairfax media and its two mastheads, The Sydney Morning Herald and Melbourne's The Age, were the first participants in trying to inflame potential violence against Roosh and the rest of us, I contacted the organization for clarification. In response, Phoebe Moloney cried, as I have previously recounted, and Managing Editor Stuart Washington steadfastly refused to admit the coverage had been one-sided.

The only time Fairfax really conceded the prospect of violence against us was when they reported on Roosh's announcement that the meet-ups were being called off. Even so, this amounted to a simple regurgitation of Roosh's words, rather than a proper journalistic attempt to confirm that the violent threats were real, which indeed they were.

Media outlets, if they intend to do their job, have a responsibility for fair reporting on peaceful matters, let alone on those occasions when people are receiving violent threats.

Thanks go to the Curtin University student, "John," for bringing Dr. Bender's paper to my attention.

Read More: Phoebe Moloney's False Reporting On The ROK Meetup Incited A Knife Wielding Mob

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

An Introduction To The Greatest Masculine Epic Ever Written

March 13, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

The Romance Of Three Kingdoms is a historical novel written in the 14th century by Luo Guanzhong that chronicles the fall of Han dynasty and the rise of three kingdoms that vie in an epic struggle to rule all of China. Not only is this classic a literary masterpiece of the East, this is one of the greatest epic that demonstrates the true potential and the greatness of men.

The Premise

The story features hundreds of characters and numerous secondary stories that spans a century from the Yellow Turban Rebellion to the eventual re-unification of China. The main characters are: Liu Bei, the honorable and compassionate descendant of the founder of Han dynasty who rises to prominence with the help of his sworn brothers, Zhang Fei and Guan Yu, in spite of his humble background; Caocao, the villainous hero whose combined brilliance and ruthlessness puts Machiavelli to utter shame and would eventually become the arch rival of Liu Bei; and the Sun family who are said to be direct the descendants of the famous author of the Art of War, Sun Tzu. Of course, those are just the few men who represent the three kingdoms, Shu, Wei, and Wu. There are dozens of more memorable characters of importance throughout this epic.

In spite of the title, we don't see the three kingdoms established until about halfway point in the story. Up until then, we witness numerous factions of warlords and nobles fight one another to expand their own influence as the emperor no longer possesses any real authority. You see men rise and fall with their strengths, weaknesses, ambitions, duty, and fortune.

Lessons In Life And Masculinity

Throughout the book, we see countless acts of honor and loyalty, treachery and betrayal, bravery and cowardice, as well as stories of brotherhood, triumph, and revenge. But above all, power struggle is the main theme that perpetuates throughout the novel. Whether it be the sheer force of strength and determination on the battlefield or the use of coy traps, intrigues, and deception to manipulate the enemy, all that seems to matter is that one should come out victorious no matter the cost (and this is why Liu Bei is respected by other men in the story as being the most noble leader of all). It's no surprise then that Robert Greene's 48 Laws of Power features numerous anecdotes from the Three Kingdoms.

The use of military tactics and strategies are also one of the great features of this novel that has no other match. The way the characters penetrate each other's minds for psychological warfare as well as the way human nature, the elements, terrain and weather, and various arsenals all come into play is simply sublime. Centuries after the book was published, Mao Zedong, a peasant with no formal military training, manged to lead his army of Communist guerillas to victory against the much larger and better equipped Nationalist forces. He did this not by reading the Art of War, but by drawing upon lessons he learned from reading the Three Kingdoms (as another bit of trivia, Caocao was his favorite character).

Also, notable in absence in the story are strong female characters we're used to seeing in our modern times. In fact, there are only a handful of females throughout the entire novel who only play minor roles as mothers, consorts, and daughters offered for marriage. If anything, women are seen as distractions that detract men from achieving greater deeds if not outright baits to lure men into traps.

The Cult Status In East Asia

Statue of Guan Yu in Jingzhou.

One thing you must understand about the Three Kingdoms is its everlasting mythological influence on not just the Chinese culture, but also that of the other nations surrounding China.

The vast majority of Chinese, Koreans, and Japanese have read the book and are familiar with the story, and it continues to remain popular among these nations with people of all ages. Besides the novel itself, the story has spawned plays, movies, television series, dozens of video games, comics, anime series, action figures, collectible cards, and so on. Combine the cultural influence of Greek mythology to the modern fandom of Star Wars and you'll start to get an idea of just how popular and enduring the love for Three Kingdoms is in East Asia—not bad for a novel written more than 600 years ago about historical events that happened in the 3rd century.

As recently as last year, a gigantic 1,320 ton statue of Guan Yu, one of the main protagonists, was completed in China (pictured above). Obviously, people in that region are still enthusiastic about the legends of the Three Kingdoms. So it's safe to say that the legacy of this work will continue on to be an essential part of Chinese cultural consciousness for as long as China exists.

A Key To Understanding China

By reading the Three Kingdoms, you can start to appreciate why China, both as a nation and government, obsessively pursues the One China policy no matter how much criticism they face for being repressive and dictatorial. Ever since the first unification by the Qin Emperor, China has always valued strong central authority that allowed the nation to prosper. Whenever that central authority failed and the nation became divided, there had been nothing but chaos, rebellion, bloody civil wars, foreign invasion, and misery for the people until a new authority came about to reunite the nation once again to bring peace and harmony. The brutal internal strife depicted in this novel shows why the Chinese people are so determined to keep their nation together as one regardless of the cost.

Second, the Yellow Turban Rebellion depicted in the beginning of the story also explains why the Chinese government is intolerant of religious groups that may threaten its rule. It's only understandable why the government so harshly cracks down on groups like the Falun Gong when you realize that such mass religious cults were what brought down dynasties and sowed chaos and disorder throughout the nation's history. The more recent Taiping Rebellion, for example, was a civil war started by a man claiming to be the brother of Jesus that lasted for fourteen years with casualties that rivaled the First World War—if not higher. It's no surprise then that a cult-like movement or a religious group that threatens the central authority of the current Chinese regime are targeted for persecution (I don't justify the Chinese government's actions, but only attempt to explain their motives).

Conclusion

Personally, I can say with ease that I learned more about life, manhood, and the nature of the world with the Three Kingdoms than all other works of fiction I've read combined. It is also one of the very few books that I've read more than once. In fact, I got so worked up by the thought of writing this article that I started reading it again for the fourth time. It's just one of those rare works you must read and re-read again.

For those who are interested in taking the plunge, the best English version is generally accepted as the one translated by Robert Moss (be sure to get the unabriged edition). And for those who want a Kindle version (there doesn't seem to be a digital version of Moss's translation), newer translation by Ron Iverson is also well-received. There is also an entire manga series available for free here which could be better for those who want a lighter reading and may have difficulty visualizing ancient China.

Read More: The Most Sincere Autobiography Ever Written

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

How To Make Beef Jerky

March 13, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I was watching a documentary on Netflix the other day about how our species (homo sapiens) spread out over the globe. One point made by the narrators was that the human brain was able to grow larger by the availability of high-energy (i.e., high-calorie) foods. Meat, fats, and bone marrow was an essential part of man's intellectual development. I believe it still is. If you want your body and mind to be operating at peak performance, I believe you should be consuming meat at least occasionally.

One of the most efficient and inexpensive ways of consuming meat is by preparing your own dried meat (jerky). You may be surprised at how easy this is to do. Once made, jerky can be used for almost any occasion: taken to the field for hikes or hunts, for cooking at home, for taking to work in lunches, or for general snacking. You do not need to buy expensive cuts of meat, and you do not have to spend a large amount of time in preparation. And you will save yourself a large amount of money.

To convince yourself of this, go into any food store and see how expensive commercially-prepared jerky is. Even worse, these commercial preparations are often packed with nitrates and nitrites that both ruin the flavor of the meat and can impair the health.

Step One: Getting the Meat

The first step is to go to the supermarket and get your meat. Some writers say you should use sirloin or flank steak, but I am firmly against this idea. You simply don't need this quality of cut. The whole idea here is to get ahead of the game: to take the cheaper cuts and then to turn them into something edible and useful. Any decent meat will do. I suggest you try top round or eye round or London broil. It doesn't matter if these cuts are not known for their texture or quality. Jerky is heavily seasoned anyway; the idea here is to get meat for meat's sake. Aim for long, thin strips of meat.

Wild game here also works wonderfully. If you are a hunter or know someone who hunts, try to get your hands on some wild meat if you can. Eating the freshest, most gamey meats available has a testosterone-elevating appeal that is impossible for words to describe. It is something that rings deep chords in our primal psyches. How much meat to you need? That depends, of course. For most purposes, a few pounds per batch will do well enough. You can always make more later.

Step Two: Cutting

Cut the meat against the grain into long strips. I think the ideal thickness is the same as what you would use when preparing stir-fried meat strips. Try to remove as much fat as possible from the meat. It should be against the grain so that when chewed, the eater does not have to contend with long, tough meat fibers in the mouth. Slicing can be done more easily when the meat is semi-frozen. Once this is done, put all the strips of sliced meat into a large bowl.

Step Three: Marinating

The next step is to marinate the meat. This is going to be one of the most important steps, so put some thought into this. My favorite marinade consists of a blend of the following ingredients: teriyaki or soy sauce, Worcestershire sauce, powdered onion, liquid smoke, and red pepper flake. Some people like to add more spices but this is all going to come down to personal preference. Some people like to use cloves, chili powder, cumin, nutmeg, oregano, or any number of other spices. With salty marinades like soy sauce or teriyaki sauce, it's best not to let the marinade process go more than 6 hours or so. Any longer than this can make the meat too salty.

Step Four: Dehydrating

Remove the meat strips and gently pat dry with paper towels. You will be salivating at this point, but control your urges. There are some people who advocate that you should dry the meat using commercially-available dehydrators or even ovens. I am not a fan of this method, and I'll tell you why. Ovens or dehydrators usually end up cooking the meat, rather than dehydrating it. It just not the way jerky should be made.

When American Indians made pemmican or South Africans make traditional biltong, they would let the meat air dry, often for days. One biltong recipe I read called for drying the meat in the open air for at least three days. While this may not be easy for most people living in the city, the idea is a sound one: the drying should be done free of artificial heat sources.

In the modern era, it is not practical for most people to hang meat out to dry for days. But there is a better way, and it is something I learned from watching one of those cooking shows many years ago: a large fan. All you need to do is lay your marinated meat strips on a few cooling racks (used for cooling cookies or other baked goods). Then place them in a place them near a fan in some part of the house, so that air is blowing over the meat continuously. You will be surprised at just how fast the meat dries up. Make sure you keep any household pets away from the meat.

Step Five: Storage

After a few hours of continuous air blowing, the meat should be ready. You can store it in zip-top plastic bags, plastic containers, or even paper bags. The key thing is to give the meat room to move around and to "breathe" so that it does not attract moisture. The meat can then be use for nearly anything:

- Take it on hikes. There is nothing more satisfying than dried meat eaten with cold, weak tea as a field beverage.
- Cut it into pieces with a kitchen shears and use it to cook with
- Add to soups or stews
- Take it to work at eat it for lunch

You get the idea. Cheers.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why You Should Build Your Own House

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

9 Immutable Laws Of Game

March 13, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In this podcast, I share nine laws of game that apply to most of your sexual interactions. Understanding these laws is essential to a higher success rate when it comes to getting laid and having intimate relationships. The laws include discussion on screening girls for sex, the phenomenon of flaking, game work ethic, and choosing optimal venues.

If you're enjoying my podcasts and getting value from it, consider making a donation. Click here to learn more about donating.

Listen on Soundcloud or download the MP3:

Listen on Youtube:

Subscribe on iTunes or add the RSS feed to your favorite podcast app. If you like the podcast, please leave a rating and review on iTunes.

Previous Podcast: The Danger Of Hedonic Adaptation

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Modern Men Need To Develop A Passion For Living

March 14, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

I see them every time I go out. Men who look as though they've been defeated by life and who are just going through the motions. This is the case for men even in their 20s in America. There is anger and despair in the eyes of these men, who have the countenance of a slave when I look into their faces. They're quite common in all the business ventures I've pursued in life, from the average Joe truck driver to the lofty heights of the crumbling mass media ivory tower.

I know the look because I was once one of those men.

You see them online as well. Dripping with sarcasm, contempt, and bitterness as they attack anyone or anything that doesn't conform to their myopic ideals.

Stefan Molyneux has accurately described what we're living on as a human farm, full of human livestock. From The Handbook of Human Ownership:

> The reality of political power is very simple: bad farmers own crops and livestock – good farmers own human beings.

So how does it work?

> Anyhoo, the basic reality of human ownership is this:
>
> 1. First, you must first subdue the masses through force
> 2. Then, you maintain that subjugation through the psychological power of ethics.

> People think that ethics were invented to make people good, but that's like saying that chastity belts were invented to spread STDs. No, no – ethics were invented to bind the minds of the slaves, and to create the only true shackles we rulers need: guilt, self-attack and a fear of the tyranny of ethics. Whoever teaches ethics rules the herd, because everyone is afraid of bad opinions, mostly from themselves. If you do it right, no judgment will be as evil or endless as the one coming from the mirror.

What happens when people are treated like livestock? They get fat, listless, and bitter. Take a look around America and tell me that's not the case.

The life is sucked right out of them, because their souls have already been consumed by a vicious cycle of debt servitude and corporate drudgery. They willingly put themselves into massive amounts of debt for car payments, giant houses, and tons of things they don't really need to fill the empty space.

Mass Brainwashing

The human farm is no place for the man who must have autonomy

Seldom do men ever ask this simple question: Why are we doing what we're doing?

The truth is a century of mass marketing, propaganda, and thought control have yielded a populace enslaved by their own materialistic desires. Starting with Freud a century ago, and using principles refined by his nephew Edward Bernays people are locked in a cycle of competitive consumption but don't know why they're living lives in which they would slit someone's throat for a new iPhone.

Today, marketing gurus such as Clotaire Rapaille, who works for many Fortune 500 companies know the American mind set well as men like him push men to give up their lives, sacrificing to power the female Hedonic Treadmill:

> My experience is that most of the time, people have no idea why they're doing what they're doing. They have no idea, so they're going to try to make up something that makes sense. Why do you need a Hummer to go shopping? "Well, you see, because in case there is a snowstorm." No. Why do you buy four wheel drive? "Well, you know, in case I need to go off-road." Well, you live in Manhattan; why do you need four wheel drive in Manhattan? "Well, you know, > sometimes I go out, and I go—" You don't need to be a rocket scientist to understand that this is disconnected. This is nothing to do with what the real reason is for people to do what they do.

Long story short, marketers learned to exploit people's subconscious sexual desires, turning them into an orgy of consumerism a century ago.

Realizing this truth was an absolute horror as I began the process of awakening in my late 20s. I was at the intersection of what George Carlin called Bullshit Central: the intersection of advertising, Hollywood, and the news media. Even though I was a media spinmeister, I also had found myself enslaved by the very messages of fear and consumption we doled out on our airwaves each day.

It was a hell like no other for a man whose personality type demands autonomy and independence. Money came in and money went out each month, and I was the rat in the wheel making it all spin around.

What a difference a not giving a fuck anymore makes.

Feeling Alive

Make the leap, my friends

Oscar Wilde, Irish playwright and novelist sums up the transition I made from another animal on the farm to an "empowered" man, to borrow a phrase from the feminists:

> To live is the rarest thing in the world. Most people exist, that is all.

Alive is exactly how I would summarize what has been the happiest period of my entire life, the period since I quit my job and struck out on my own.

To be honest, there are times not having the security of a Joe job scares the living daylights out of me. But that is the impetus to make me accomplish new things in life. It leads to some of the most breathtaking moments in this man's life, when he looks back and realizes, "It's already been that long since I left it all behind? Damn. I'm not doing so bad after all."

I'm now closing in on my two-year anniversary since walking away from everything I spent my entire life building. Not many people would just walk away from a cushy (if cutthroat) job reading news headlines each day. And I've never felt more alive. It is amazing what a man is capable of when he takes control of his own destiny, rather than living the prescribed plan his masters have laid out for him.

Without the pressure to find something constructive to do with all the time I had since leaving the workaday world, I would have never come to write for Return of Kings and started building my blog and writing career. I would have never been one of only two men out of a class of 15 who earned their CDL in the barn burner three-week "trucker boot camp" I attended. (Yes, CDL school was that hard. People were dropping out like flies and failing the school. But I had a fire in my belly because trucking was so central to my financial plan to travel the world.)

I would have never had the freedom to spend a full year in the Caribbean and now be writing this to you from my month-long sojourn in Thailand, where I just woke up beside one of the sexiest, sweetest, and most feminine women I've ever met in my life.

There is still beauty in this world if you look for it.

Plus, badass travel stories and risk taking behavior make women moist in their nether regions. The legs spread easier with my stories about what I'm doing with my life than they ever did when I was another predictable, reliable Beta male slave.

I used to pass out at night dreading the next day, consistently exhausted from waking up at 3:30 a.m. each day, rushing down to the news station to deliver the daily propaganda with a vacuous, forced smile. Now, I sometimes have trouble sleeping at night because I am daydreaming about all the possibilities of what I could do with my newfound freedom.

I knew there had to be a way out. Turns out it was simpler than I ever imagined. All it took was walking away. Making the leap. Stop giving a fuck.

Men, if the corporate-government complex has given you such a shabby deal, why deal with it? Formulate a plan to get yourself out of debt and free from the other shackles, mental and financial, that have been placed upon you.

Maybe it's time to come out and play – or LIVE – a little. This is my message for you. Rediscover a passion for living. Live life on your terms. It will be the best thing you've ever done. It's okay to live for yourselves in a day in age in which society has thrown you overboard.

Read More: Should You Quit Your Job And Follow Your Passion?

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a

Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

An Introduction To Rifle And Pistol Ammunition

March 14, 2017 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

I've written a good many firearms articles for Return Of Kings, and I've gotten a couple comments regarding ammunition selection. As a gun is useless without proper skills, so it is without proper ammunition, and that implies having some knowledge of the ammunition itself. As there are many subjects under the umbrella of "ammo," we'll start this series of articles today with talking about rifle and pistol ammunition.

The cartridge

Modern centerfire rifle ammo (and centerfire pistol ammo, as well) are composed of four separate components which we will discuss in turn. The term "cartridge" or "round" refers to the assembly of the primer, the case, the powder charge, and the projectile (the bullet itself). It is colloquial, though not correct, to refer to the whole cartridge as a bullet, i.e. "I only have ten bullets left for my AR!" which is an erroneous statement, as an AR-15 can do nothing with a bullet by itself. Don't bother correcting people on it, lest you be considered a "well, technically….." dweeb, but simply know what's up.

The bullet

Although each component is critical to accurate, reliable shooting (not to mention the gun itself), the bullet has many attributes that affect its performance of which you should be informed. Weight, shape, material, and composition or construction are the important ones to know.

Bullet weight is measured in grains, just like powder weight is. The first thing to understand is that a given rifle is chambered for a given caliber, and that means the width of the bullet is fixed for that gun. A rifle chambered in 7mm Remington needs to shoot bullets that are 7mm in diameter, otherwise it will blow up or not shoot accurately, depending on whether the bullet is too wide or too narrow.

A bullet that is a heavier grain weight than another, in the same caliber, will be longer in a proportional amount. Likewise, due to caliber restrictions, one can see that a range of weights is available for each caliber.

The upshot of bullet weight is twofold. Firstly, a heavier bullet will fly slower with the same amount of powder behind it as a lighter bullet, but it will be deflected and slowed down less by wind. Secondly, a longer bullet takes up more room, so you can run into chambering problems if the bullet sits out too far from the mouth of the case, or space problems with the amount of powder if it is set too far back into the case.

Bullet shape is primarily concerned with how long the bullet is (see the weight discussion above) and the shape of the tail of the bullet. Most of the front ends of bullets of a given caliber are exactly the same shape. You're looking for accuracy here in your given weapon.

Material is usually lead, with some pure copper bullets out there. What you will usually run into is copper jacketed lead bullets. Communist surplus ammo is often cheaper copper-washed steel jacketed bullets, and these trade cost of manufacturer for increased wear on the barrel. Western manufactured ammo is better for your rifle, but costs more because of better components; your call.

Lastly is tip construction. A solid lead round is simply that. Enclose it in a complete copper jacket, and you have “Full Metal Jacket” or “ball” ammo. Leave a bit of lead showing at the end, and you have a “soft point.” Put a hole in the end, and you have “hollow point.” Put a plastic tip on it to aid flight stabilization and expansion upon impact, and you have “ballistic tip” bullets.

You have FMJ on the left three, then soft points, then hollow points, and lastly the red and green are polymer tips, while the metal one one the far right is a steel core armor piercer.

“Bonded” bullets have the copper jacket better attached to the lead core so that the round expands well (doing damage) but also retains mass for better penetration to vital areas. “Monolithic” bullets are one material only, usually copper. “Armor piercing” rounds have a steel core inside them designed to punch through armor and metal, instead of going splat and deforming like a lead only bullet does when hitting plate.

Lastly, “incendiary” rounds have some phosphorous inside them to burn on impact, and “tracers” have a coating of it on the round just to make a light so you can “trace” your bullet’s path and bring the stream of fire onto target (think a machine gun or anti-aircraft.)

The case

The case, commonly called “the brass,” is a usually brass, metal can with a hole on the back for the primer and a hole on the front for the bullet. One seats a primer, fills the case with a predetermined amount of powder, then seats, and often crimps, the bullet into place so it does not move until fired.

The case is the only reusable component in ammunition as the powder is burned, the primer is spent, and the bullet, in addition to being gone, is usually deformed due to hitting the target wherever it is stopped. Many folks will melt down and recast salvaged bullets from target backstops, but the primary collectable is to save your brass. Always save it in case you want to reload, or you can sell it. Mind “brass whores” at ranges; don’t let them take your brass, and don’t tolerate them picking around for other brass while you are shooting; they can do their shameful whoring later when the range is empty. That being said, there’s nothing wrong with YOU picking up other good brass, just be discreet.

Save your brass, even if you don't reload, as it can be sold to those that do.

Steel cases, on the other hand, like found in Communist surplus ammo, are not reloadable, and can be discarded. Rimfire cases, like in .22s, are very hard and cost prohibitive to reload, so you probably shouldn't bother with them either.

Finally, cases are sometimes externally the same, but different on the inside. A civilian .223 case will look the same as a military 5.56×45 case, and will often shoot just as well as the other in a rifle, but the military brass is thicker, with less volume on the inside, which results in higher pressure for the same powder load. This is important to reloaders; the average shooter simply needs to make sure he gets the right ammo for his gun (read the headstamp on the back of the case, it needs to say the same thing as the gun does.)

The powder

Modern smokeless powder comes from a variety of manufacturers and has a variety of things it can do. Powder used in pistol bullets burns faster than powder meant for bullets in rifle barrels since the barrels are shorter. This is also why short barreled pistols make a fireball and a louder report than longer barrels; all that flash and fury was meant to be done in the last bit of the barrel.

Without getting too much into reloading science, ammo manufacturers and reloaders pick a powder that will make the bullet fly the fastest and most stably in an anticipated barrel length and will physically fill the case to an acceptable degree (over half.) It's ok to have some airspace in a cartridge, but you want to minimize that as long as you can fully seat your bullet. You absolutely want to have powder loads that cannot be double filled inside the case's volume so you don't blow up the gun and you.

Different powders.

From a factory ammo purchaser’s viewpoint, powder loads in a given brand and a given line are usually standard. I have run into budget ammo by major manufacturers that differs from one brand to another on how hot it is loaded; some brands will not cycle a semi-auto that requires a lot of recoil to run, although that is usually more pistol ammo.

Black powder, which is rare to see in a cartridge, is corrosive once fired. Black powder substitutes, and modern smokeless powder is not. If you shoot corrosive powder, flush your rifle out with ammonia solution, like Windex, as soon as possible, then clean normally.

The primer

Lastly, we have primers. Primers are one use only, typically come in magnum and regular varieties, pistol and rifle sizes, and some are harder than others. Military rifles typically like harder primers as a lot of them have floating firing pins that will ding the primer with their inertia upon chambering, which can cause a slam fire (the rifle goes off upon chambering.)

Boxer pistol primers, seen in cartridges, and loose. The trefoil looking thing is the anvil, and it is what the primer compound is smooshed against by the firing pin, and the blast goes out around it into the powder

For reloading purposes, primers are either of the Boxer variety, or the Berdan variety, and that has to do with the firing channels in the case, and whether or not you can push the primer out with a reloading tool. Most US ammo is Boxer, and reloadable, and you see Berdan primers, which are harder to reload, more in European ammo.

Surplus Soviet ammo, like 7.62x54R, have primers that let loose corrosive salts. See the above note about Windex.

Conclusion

Ammo selection is an important tool to use in maximizing a gun's potential. Many people will only own one or two guns, and it is a good thing to be able to do as much as you can with what you've got. We'll reference this article in future discussions about reloading. Be safe.

Overloaded ammo can do this.

Read More: What To Do In An Ammo Panic

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

The Redstockings Manifesto Was The Blueprint For Contemporary Feminism

March 14, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

In many ways, 1969 was a pretty cool year, but it was also during a wave of crazy radicalism that made today's upsurge of rent-a-mobs seen like a croquet match. During that year, a group of New York feminists dropped a bomb on civilization. They called themselves the Redstockings; the color red was a reference to Communism.

They're a bit obscure these days, but back then, they were big enough to have a few chapters around the USA. Ellen Willis and Shulamith Firestone co-founded it; the latter having been a co-founder of New York Radical Women a year and a half previously. Soon after, some lesser lights (or dimmer bulbs) of the Sisterhood joined them. Firestone was one of the co-authors of their Redstockings Manifesto, before abandoning ship later that year to co-found yet another outfit.

This document became quite influential. For example, it's in a list of essential feminist manifestos, along with other items by Valerie Solanas (number one, bless her heart), Andrea Dworkin, and another by Firestone herself. Since the Terrible Trio wrote four items on that top ten list, consider them a fair sampling of what feminism is all about. Remember that if anyone tries to tell you that those types don't represent at least a significant part of feminism.

Despite their influence, this is not to say the Redstockings started it all singlehandedly. Still, their manifesto gives a capsule summary of what radical feminism was at the time and would morph into later. Although it's a Second Wave document, it contains kernels of the ideology by other varieties in recent times. This foundational text begins with a preamble about the “final liberation from male supremacy”. (Okie dokie…) Then:

Item 2 – Class consciousness

Co-opting one crazypants ideology for another

> Women are an oppressed class. Our oppression is total, affecting every facet of our lives.

This whopper shows Firestone’s inclination—one shared with many others—for taking Communist rhetoric and adapting it to feminism. This makes it—big surprise—an instance of cultural Marxism. The considerations of economics and actual social class that orthodox Communists were concerned with get left behind. This was, in fact, one of the reasons for the schisms in New York’s feminist scene.

No argument supporting the notion that all women are oppressed is made. We’re just supposed to take it as a given that this article of faith is true, one of several extreme and unsupported assertions in the manifesto. By this peculiar form of logic, a female celebrity is oppressed, and a male Peace Corps volunteer is an oppressor because he has a dick. Are all of us really that bad?

Item 3 – All men are oppressors

Only with the “Superior Virtue of the Oppressed” can you get your victim card

Leftists talk a great game about treating others as individuals, yet make sweeping generalizations about groups of people they don’t like. Here we have the kernel of the “patriarchy” conspiracy theory, and today’s privilege rhetoric rationalizes this. It begins:

> We identify the agents of our oppression as men.

After this is more Communist-flavored rhetoric, stating basically that men have always run the world. Likewise, all institutions are controlled by men. Oh really? “All institutions” includes countless ones run by and for females: NOW, the League of Women Voters, foundations for women-only scholarships, convents, the Girl Scouts, and so forth, even Redstockings itself. How are dudes running all those? Actually, most organizations include both sexes, and male-only institutions have fallen out of fashion.

As for men being in absolute control of the political system, that conveniently leaves out all of history’s ruling queens, beginning about 5000 years ago with Pharaoh Merneith. (The Redstockings were as bad at history as they were at logic.) Feminists still won’t let go of it, even now that there have been several female Prime Ministers worldwide.

As for the US Presidency, Eleanor Roosevelt was basically running the show while FDR was recovering from a stroke; normally the Vice President’s job. Pharaoh Hillary was a serious contender, but lost the election in good part because of considerable baggage. For that matter, she would’ve won the 2008 Democratic nomination if the media hadn’t anointed The Lightworker as our great savior.

In reality, the American political process is inclusive; the 19th Amendment was passed in 1920. Did the Redstockings forget about that one? Thus, the assertion that women are deprived of political power was baloney. Those who still say that are handing us a 97 year old slice of baloney.

This item concludes with the following:

> All men receive economic, sexual, and psychological benefits from male supremacy. All men have oppressed women.

This assertion is invalidated by the fact that I (part of the “all men” category) have never done stuff like that. I can’t think of any friends of mine who go around oppressing women either, or lord their alleged male privilege over anyone.

Again, none of this patriarchy stuff is explained or backed up by facts. If they're putting forth a conspiracy theory, where's the damn theory? I'll give them one—the patriarchs must have a secret tree fort where they decide how they're going to be a bunch of dicks.

Item 4 – Shifting the burden of guilt

Guilty guilty GUILTY!!!!

> Attempts have been made to shift the burden of responsibility from men to institutions or to women themselves. We condemn these arguments as evasions. Institutions alone do not oppress; they are merely tools of the oppressor.

This is invoked in today's arguments that all men are responsible for X, even the vast majority never did X and strongly disapprove of X. Note well that "collective guilt" is a leftist narrative so worn out that it's threadbare, but is still endlessly used to browbeat the opposition. It's rhetorically dishonest, since it's unjust to hold people responsible for things they didn't do.

Evasions of responsibility and due diligence have become commonplace today; to name just one example, after hooking up drunk results in morning-after regret. (If you're responsible for your actions if you drive drunk, you're responsible for your actions if you have sex drunk.) The same goes for hooking up with random strangers.

> The most slanderous evasion of all is that women can oppress men.

Tell that one to any guy who's lost a job from office backstabbing by a spiteful female colleague. I've had that happen twice, from a manager and someone who thought she was my manager. I'd say that depriving someone of his livelihood without due cause is oppressive. Also, ask any guy who had a bad relationship with a BPD case or other Cluster B type. That's happened to me twice too, before I knew the signs. I realize that all the above were nuts, and I do not project a few bad experiences onto the entire opposite sex.

Item 5 – Projecting bad experiences onto the entire opposite sex

No need to mince words, tell us what you really think.

> We regard our personal experience, and our feelings about that experience, as the basis for an analysis of our common situation.

This is more fully developed by the slogan "the personal is political". Carol Hanisch wrote the essay for that about the same time. The original document did mean something specific. In present usages, though, it approximately means that society is a toxic miasma and anything bad happening to an individual woman (dandruff too, I suppose) is the patriarchy's fault.

Item 6 – Identifying with all women

Apparently they think female genital mutilation means getting too many piercings down there.

This is an early precursor of the intersectionality idea. Basically that means that all oppression is bad and originates from the same "hegemony". In practice, that reifies several more personal attributes into Marxist-type classes. This includes the "essential characteristics" often referenced in leftist academia—race, sex (see item 2), sexual preference, and socioeconomic status (what social class really means).

Lately, this privilege/oppression rhetoric has been expanded far beyond that. For just one example, if you weigh 400 pounds, it's society's fault you can't get laid. Worse, this took the far-overblown claims of oppression at face value and weaponized them. So really, intersectionality amounts to an elaborate justification for more cultural Marxism, giving it rhetorical ammo and encouraging them to keep their rifles pointed the same direction (at people like me).

In the manifesto, that did sound a lot more well-meaning:

> We identify with all women. We define our best interest as that of the poorest, most brutally exploited woman.
>
> We repudiate all economic, racial, educational or status privileges that divide us from other women.

Unfortunately, this is one item where today's feminists fall short. In certain cultures far abroad, some truly horrible things really are commonplace and really are tolerated, well beyond having to wear a burqa in extreme heat or not being allowed to drive. It makes me sick even thinking about these atrocities, but they seldom get any mention from most big-name feminists. They could use their media access to publicize these problems, which might actually do some good for women abroad who really are oppressed, but all that only gets a tiny fraction of attention by feminists.

What are they doing instead? Feminists find ever tinier things to get enraged about over here: "manspreading" (stop looking at our crotches), video games (play something else), and "zOMG someone tried to talk to me!" (it's called free speech). Still, there's another reason for this. If feminists campaigned against real outrages happening abroad, they'd look awfully silly complaining about their own First World problems. Also, telling the truth about their oddly-chosen allies would contradict their "Western culture is evil" meme. So they choke on a gnat but swallow a camel whole.

Item 7 – Call to struggle

After we burn society down to cinders, everything's going to be super duper awesome!

> We call on all our sisters to unite with us in struggle.
>
> We call on all men to give up their male privilege and support women's liberation in the interest of our humanity and their own.
>
> In fighting for our liberation we will always take the side of women against their oppressors.

Sorry, but "The Patriarchy" forgot to send me my privilege card, so I can't turn it in. Anyway, I'm not really down for this revolution. A male feminist is basically like a chicken voting for Colonel Sanders.

Logic time again. Regarding the quote's last sentence, recall that the manifesto explicitly defines all men as oppressors. That's bullshit, of course. Still, this means that all women should side with all other women against men—no matter what the issues or circumstances—because all of us are allegedly oppressors. So what's this about feminism being against sexism?

In summary

What was going through their minds?

I have to wonder what kind of people would come up with a rant like this, and why. Just the “all men are oppressors” line alone tells us everything we need to know about the Redstockings and the ideology they helped unleash. From this assertion lacking a scintilla of moderation, you’d think not a one of them had ever met a guy they considered at least okay. I pity anyone with a social life that pathetic. Even so, compared to some other feminist writings I’ve seen, this manifesto actually isn’t so bad.

Another explanation is that this hyperbole is exactly what you’d expect a group of Communist-influenced feminists to write. The purpose of cultural Marxism is to stir up as much division as possible within society. Turning women against men is a pretty efficient way of doing that. So they stabbed society in the heart in the name of their cultural revolution.

Finally, Shulamith Firestone’s own troubles might have played a role. In 1970, she wrote a book which expanded on the patriarchy conspiracy theory, advocated the abolition of the family, and endorsed Brave New World style artificial reproduction. Soon after, she dropped out of politics and took up painting. Several years later, she was institutionalized for paranoid schizophrenia and wrote her final book about the experience. If her attitudes reflected an early onset of the characteristic delusions, then the Redstockings Manifesto qualifies as tinfoil hat stuff. The early stages begin like this:

> Before any acute symptoms are apparent, people with schizophrenia habitually become bad-tempered, anxious, and unfocussed.

Consider this speculative, but make of it what you will.

So the Redstockings Manifesto laid out the major foundations of radical feminism, the only variety getting much attention. Unfortunately for them, these talking points are largely illogical or just plain wrong. Since today’s feminism is intellectually bankrupt, its followers should just cut it out and find something constructive to do. Society would be far better if men and women could just get along again.

Read More: The End Game Of Feminism And Cultural Marxism Is To Eliminate Sex Differences

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How To Pass The Bliss Test In Long Term Relationships

March 15, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

There is an important phenomenon out there that I think many of my fellow men can relate to. For simplicity's sake, I'm simply calling it…

The Bliss Test.

It occurs during a period that otherwise seems great when you're in a relationship with a girl. So good, in fact, that you as the man do something "big." This could be one of many things that signify a reasonably significant step forward in the relationship. The key point is that it's also reasonably far off into the future.

Some examples of this are, in order from least to most significant:

- Planning a trip together to a foreign country
- Moving in together
- Getting engaged
- Actually going through with the engagement and get married

Because it's going to hit home with the most amount of people, let's stick with the first one—planning a trip together. Let's say it's your first ever trip as a couple. If you're stuck in the 9-5 rat race, you obviously have to plan it in advance. If you live in the United States you can't just hop on a plane and head to the Mediterranean on a whim.

Let's say you plan it three months in advance, which is probably a bit on the short end. So you book the trip. You tell her. You're both excited and looking forward to it.

Then The Bliss Test Starts

Despite you doing something nice, and everything seeming quite harmonious, her shit tests for you rise into the stratosphere.

All of a sudden, nagging becomes a daily occurrence instead of weekly. If she didn't nag before, you can rest assured she's now going to start. She becomes more moody and irritable. She's testing you. Even if you're still holding frame, and nothing has really changed, she has this unrelenting desire to test you now that she has a firm commitment of something reasonably far off in the future.

I have no idea why women do this. I simply understand that they do it. Every. Single. Time.

My best guess is that it's simply to see how strong you are as a man. How much crap you will tolerate to remain in harmony given that you have made a commitment well into the future and dropped significant coin on said endeavor? The Med is not generally a cheap region, ya know.

From a biological standpoint, I understand why women test men. To see if you are strong enough to withstand their hurricane of emotions, moods, and the general turmoil of their life. You must be able to deflect it and stand strong. But, looking at pure biology—I don't get it. The resources are already there, provisioned for her. Clearly if you booked the trip, you are a man who can provide to an extent. It should be a lot of fun, and a new adventure.

So why all the tests? She shouldn't be trying to bait you into un-provisioning those resources for her. But that's exactly what she's doing. Effectively shooting herself in the foot. Even if you know how to handle all these tests and swat them away like the annoying insects they are, it's still going to change things. In the back of your mind, you're always going to have this rooted feeling that she's a bit unappreciative. These tests do nothing for her but make you lose respect for her.

Again, I don't have all the answers. Please, do leave a comment below if you have a deeper understanding of this than I do.

Looking Forward

While I've used a reasonably simple trip to Europe as an example of this issue men face, let's look deeper. I've seen quite a few of my friends get married in recent years (most older than me). While it's fairly well established that marriage is a raw deal for most men in Western countries, many men still take the plunge. That's because the relationship up until marriage is relatively blissful.

It's after the vows that things start to come unraveled. The tests increase in intensity and frequency. Of course, at that point a man is locked in.

What this comes down to is that you can never truly let up and "stop" gaming. This is reasonably well-known game knowledge. However, many people believe that it's their specific girl. That's she's a bitch, and you should just dump her. But, I'd like to offer up a slightly different theory.

Even when you give a woman what she desires (trip, engagement, marriage), she is going to continue to test you because that is what she is as a biological specimen.

What I'm saying is that yes—All Woman Are Like That. Even in more remote parts of the world.

It has nothing to do with her personality, albeit if she's a bitch it'll be even worse. No, from significant amounts of my own experience as well as observation, I think it's a reasonable conclusion. If you give them what they want they turn around and make life more difficult as a result of you doing something nice for them.

It doesn't matter how good your game is or how you have the relationship set up. That does impact the result as she does test you, but no matter what she is going to test you after you make a major commitment.

What Comes Next

Nuke the tests into the stratosphere. There is only one thing to do. That is to truly not care. Do not let her emotions and swings effect you. Laugh the tests off the face of the planet. Just do you. Trust me, plenty of girls out there in the world would love to go to Italy.

If needed, you can absolutely revoke the major commitment. All the way up to divorce. Most men simply don't have the balls to stop the marriage from happening in the first place. And once "I do" has been said, it's all over because the courts are involved.

From experience, it seems The Bliss Test is something every girl does. So you just play the cards you're given. Sometimes you just have to accept the world for how it is.

The best way to tackle modern dating is to take the power back—The Harem Handbook will teach you how. For more advice about dating, travel, and entrepreneurship, visit This Is Trouble.

Read More: 7 Criteria A Girl Should Pass To Enter A Relationship With You

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at

This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

How To Run Game And Go On Dates Without Alcohol

March 15, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Today I want to explore a topic that guys often ask me about on ROK and Twitter—namely, how the hell is it possible for you to game girls and go out on dates with them without drinking alcohol? The answer is that it is not only possible, but actually beneficial in several ways to do both of these things without drinking a drop. You will save money, retain clarity, remain sharper and more in control of your actions, while also staying in better shape and becoming more confident.

To Drink Or Not To Drink?

First off, I want to put to bed any notion that this article might come from a prescriptive or moralising place. Personally, I couldn't care less whether anyone drinks alcohol or not—that is entirely up to them. Nor am I suggesting—as some pick-up coaches have done over the years—that game without drink is somehow superior or is likely to yield better results. None of this is the case, and indeed, most guys I know who have success with women drink in a healthy way and it doesn't affect them in the slightest.

My story, though, is a little different. Because I have a very compulsive, addictive personality, my relationship to alcohol was never a good one and culminated in lots of trouble followed by rehab some fifteen years ago. Through the support of others and some great mentors I have never touched alcohol again since. I don't miss it at all and have enjoyed a great life without it since.

What this has meant, though, is that I am in the interesting position of having seen out the majority of my pick-up days to date completely stone-cold sober. So from my early days of night game six times a week in Manchester bars and clubs, to parties in London, Vegas and New York, to day game in many cities across the world, I have had to step up to the plate and approach and date without the benefit of drink as a stimulant or a crutch.

Was this good or bad for the success of my game? Impossible to say, since of course there's no way of running a controlled comparison. What I can say, though, is this—my results certainly got significantly better after I put the cork back in the bottle.

When guys discover that I no longer drink they tend to ask me questions around two distinct areas, namely: how do you approach when you're sober, and how do you go on dates? Since these are arguably the two most significant peaks that the every pick-up artist must bypass in his journey to the sexual summit, I will deal with each in turn.

Approaching

Would you approach them without a couple of drinks first?

Before giving up alcohol, my strategy for approaching girls was as follows: drink as much as possible in the shortest time possible, summon up that dutch courage, shamble around thew bar or club walking up to girls and hoping for the best. My approach to dating was similar: take the girl out to a bar, get both of us as drunk as possible, and hope that sex happened as a consequence.

Imagine my apprehension, then, when the option of drinking was removed from me and I walked into a raucous nightclub to make advances on pretty young girls with no chemical shield whatsoever.

I won't lie and say that it was easy. In actual fact, it was hard for a while to get used to these new circumstances. You know what really got me through, though? A vast, unconquerable need to get laid. A young man in his twenties just out of a pretty toxic relationship, at a time when online dating was in its infancy and apps didn't exist, literally the only route open for me to reach my sex goals was through cold approach, and so somehow or another I simply had to pluck up the courage.

If you would also like to try this there are two very helpful tools I can recommend. The first is what you might call the 'gun to the head' method. By that, what I mean is, imagine someone came up to you, put a gun to your head and told you, you have to approach and you have to get laid before the end of this evening otherwise I'll blow your brains out. Well, you would just get on with it, wouldn't you? You would have no other choice but to open every girl in the place and try every trick in your arsenal to get laid regardless of approach anxiety, rejections, cockblocks and so on What that should tell you is something very significant: you have the capability within you to approach and get laid without drink already. If you are not doing so it is only you who is holding you back.

The second tool I can recommend is to reward yourself for actions rather than results. What I mean by that is, don't set the bar too high. As I have said before, even by just approaching sober you are doing something that 97% of other men are too afraid to do. That in itself is worth of celebration. So do it and feel good about yourself. If you get a bad reaction then so what? At least you are in the game.

Right now I should put in an honourable mention for day game. Of course, the reality is that day gamers all over the world are cold approaching sober every single day. This, however, is a relatively new phenomenon since day game as a discipline was very niche over a decade ago. It should also be recognised that daytime situations are often a lot less intimidating than nighttime ones.

Still, one thing that has really helped my night game in the past has been combining it with day game to achieve an overall halo effect. What I mean by that is, if I've done a number of low-pressure daytime approaches before entering a club or bar then my confidence levels and vibe are much higher and it is much easier for me to approach in the drinking environment with gusto.

Dating

I have been on hundreds—thousands—of dates in the last fifteen years and I have been sober for all of them while in almost all cases the girls I have been with have drunk alcohol. Has that impeded my success as all? No. Has it occasionally raised awkward questions? Yes. Are these easy to overcome? Usually, yes.

Here's what I've learned about not drinking on dates. The very best strategy is not to make an issue of your sober status if at all possible until after you have had sex.

I'm not advocating being misleading or even manipulative for the sake of it. However, what I've found is that going into a long conversations about the reasons that I don't drink tends to derail the date, making it more into a kind of therapy session or AA meeting rather than what it should be—a sexy rendezvous.

Now, this might be different if you choose not to drink because you are a health nut, or training for a triathlon, or something of the sort. But even then you risk putting yourself in the 'square, boring' box. The fact is that most women—and most men—like to have a drink in a social situation as it relaxes them and makes them more sociable. The last thing you want to do, therefore, is to make your date feel awkward about the fact that she is drinking in front of you, or worse, suspect that you are trying to get her drunk while you remain straight in order to take advantage of her.

My strategy, then, is to order the drinks myself and try to avoid the conversation about what I'm drinking. My usual routine is to take the girl to a cocktail bar and stay for one or two rounds at the most. I will order whatever she wants and a soda and lime for myself. Served in a tall glass this can easily pass for a vodka or gin-based drink and most girls don't even think to ask. If they do press me on it I will either change the subject or deflect with a joke ('why do you care—are you trying to get me drunk?') If she persists then I will tell her that I'm drinking soda water but I'll then change topics quickly so we don't get bogged down in the reasons for my choice.

Pluses and Minuses

A non-drinking warrior, yesterday.

I don't mean to suggest that there are no downsides to not drinking—of course there are. There are certain things that I can't do—like drink shots by the bar, toast with champagne and so on—that without a doubt help a certain style of player to get his wicked way with many ladies. I also have some difficulty pulling off a line like 'Let's go back to my place and polish off a bottle of wine'—although I tend to suggest it anyway and then just drink water myself and there's never been an issue. But there can be a certain suspicion of non-drinkers from drinkers, especially female drinkers, and so I make an effort not to draw attention to this at least until after we've banged. For at that point she will backwards rationalise that everything about you is favourable in order to justify her decision to reward you with sex.

In the main, though, not drinking has not affected my game one jot, and I hope this article has shown you that it is eminently possible to pull off successfully should you wish to forgo booze yourself.

Want to find out more about how to approach and seduce sexy girls every day? Buy Troy's bestselling book, The Seven Laws of Seduction. Follow Troy on Twitter

Read More: Why You Don't Deserve That Perfect 10

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How To Avoid Gaining Belly Fat While Traveling

March 15, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Henry Tran

Whether it's for work or pleasure, when you're on the road it's all too easy to abandon everything you know about eating healthy. As a result, many men tend find themselves struggling to button up their pants by the time they get home. But weight loss experts have confirmed that the following micro modifications will not only allow you to avoid belly fat gain while you're on the go – but also, help you shed unwanted weight.

Plan to walk

Packing a pair of walking shoes could be the easiest way to ensure you stay on track with your weight loss goals. If you're traveling for vacation, walking will let you sneak in a calorie burn without sacrificing precious relaxation time.

A quick way to rev up a leisurely stroll is with bouts of brisk walking. This could be as simple as picking a landmark and walking briskly until you reach your target, walking at a relaxed pace until you recover and then repeating. If there is a hilly landscape, go for it.

If you're traveling for business, the same rules apply – If you get to choose your hotel, choose one that is within walking distance to your business destination so that you can kick start your calorie burning furnace.

Pro Tip: Plan a 15-25 minute walk each morning before breakfast. This will ignite your fat-burning metabolism which will allow your body to handle the influx of calories you'll be taking in while you're out of your normal routine.

Skip Elevators – Take The Stairs

While you're traveling, every bit of exercise will go a long way – especially if you're a guy who is used to being active during your normal weekly routine at home. Opting out of the elevator every time you get a chance and choosing the stairs instead is a simple way to knock out compound exercise – the type of exercise that just so happens to be the best for increasing testosterone and burning belly fat.

Pro-tip: If you really want to take advantage of the t-boosting compound exercise benefits, try taking steps that clear two stairs at a time, instead of one. This simple adjustment requires more force, which means more muscle activation, which means more test will be released into your bloodstream – enhancing fat burn.

Try To Avoid Booze

You've already come to terms that you won't be following a normal eating schedule, and that's ok – As long as you've committed yourself to making small accommodations to your schedule to allow for exercise using the tips above, there's no problem with enjoying a more relaxed diet while you're on the go. But when you combine alcohol with junk food, you can almost guarantee that you'll be traveling home with some extra baggage in your belly compartment. This is because alcohol slows the metabolism down big time – so if you're slowing your metabolism and also eating unhealthy choices at the same time, you can almost guarantee that these calories won't be burned but instead, stored as body fat.

Pro-Tip: Statistically, anything more than 2 drinks will begin to have a negative effect on your fat-burning metabolism. So if you must drink, try to drink vodka with sugar free mixers such as sugar free RedBull or diet soda and be sure to void sugary cocktails and margaritas.

Pick Out Restaurants In Advance

When you pick a restaurant just based on convenience, accessibility or how close it is to you on your smart phone GPS, you might find yourself sitting down to a plateful of junk food. Not only should you research restaurants and make an eating-out plan ahead of time, but you can also check out the menu to any chow spot you want online so you can see if they have menu options that won't blow out your waistline.

Pro-Tip: There are tons of food apps that you can use that will help you choose healthy choices that don't just taste great, but that are also incredibly satisfying – Try the free "Zomato" app on your smartphone and check out all of the filters.

Bring A Reusable Water Bottle

Research has shown that over 50% of "hunger cravings" that people experience are actually misinterpreted signals from the brain – The majority of these starvation signals are actually trying to tell you is that your body is dehydrated.

When you're dehydrated, you're more likely to confuse thirst as hunger, leading you to overeat. To overcome this, aim to follow the 8×8 rule while traveling: Drink 8 glasses of 8oz water a day.

Pro-Tip: When choosing a reusable water bottle, avoid plastics. Plastic bottles contain estrogen-like chemicals that can disrupt your testosterone production, skew your hormones and lead to weight gain. Grab a glass or stainless steel option instead.

Don’t Skimp On Sleep

Travel is already taxing on the body, but losing sleep is even more so.

When you miss out on your Z’s, you are setting your body and brain up to be fatigued. If your body and brain are fatigued, it’ll feel impossible to muster up the energy to get active. More so, the later you stay up, the greater chance there is of you making poor decisions when it comes to late night snacking or last call drinks. Getting an adequate amount of sleep—around 7-8 hours a night—will help you feel rested, energized, and it can help keep you strong so you can stay healthy on your trip.

Pro-Tip: If you have trouble falling asleep while traveling, you can try playing peaceful sound scapes or try a relaxing stretching routine through your smart phone right before bed.

Remember To Eat Breakfast

Just because your hotel continental breakfast is a carb-carnival doesn’t mean that you can’t make it work.

Based on decades of diet research, one variable remained constant: eating breakfast is a habit for successful long term weight loss. One study that examined data on dieters who dropped more than 30 pounds and kept if off showed that more than two-thirds of those participants ate breakfast everyday.

Pro-Tip: If you’re going the complimentary breakfast route, many hotels offer these clean eats: hard boiled eggs, whole grain cereal, oatmeal, fresh fruit, and yogurt. Stick with these options instead of the bagels or muffins.

Take Advantage Of Hotel Amenities, Or Better Yet – Your Hotel Room.

In this day and age, it’s a rare find to stay in a hotel that doesn’t include some sort of gym or exercise amenity. Even if it’s just dumbbells and a couple treadmills, you can get a killer sweat session in fast and be ready to take on your day.

Pro-Tip: If you really want to make sure you win the battle against belly fat while traveling, you can do these short full body 15 minute workouts without any equipment at all. You can do these right from your own hotel room and be burning calories for up to 48 hours after each quick session.

The 15 Minute Travel Workout App I Personally Use

If you ask me, nothing beats Fit In 15 workout app when you’re traveling. These workouts are only 15 minutes in length and require no equipment at all. That means you can get a killer fat-burning session whether you’re inside your hotel hotel room or outside on the beach – all you need is a smartphone or tablet device and you’re good to go. The other game-changing feature is that each workout session of the Fit In 15 training app is customizable to your current fitness level. So even if you have little workout experience or you’re a gym pro – these workouts will torch calories and allow you to return home from your travels more ripped than before.

Click Here To Download The Fit In 15 App For FREE And Shed Fat Anytime, Anywhere.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Men Who Cold Approach Women Should Be Proud Of Themselves

March 15, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I made a video explaining why approaching women is a commendable task…

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them on the blog.

Previous Video: The Sterile Behavior Of Girls Who Party At Night

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Is The Black Nationalist “Hotep” Movement An Ally In The War Against Globalist Elites?

March 16, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Over the past several months on Twitter I started to notice tweets from black men that echoed many of the idea you will find in the manosphere. I quickly noticed that these men all identified themselves as “Hoteps.” Recently, one of these Hotep accounts announced an alliance with the Alt Right. But should the ROK community also welcome Hoteps as allies or is the group suspect?

Who are the Hoteps?

“Hotep Jesus” Ali Shakur

The Hoteps are a movement of black men such as “Hotep Jesus” @VibeHi), “Uncle Hotep” (@handymayhem), and “ædonis | hotep” @lordaedonis) who are all associated with the website Hotep Nation. Hoteps are regarded as pariahs by the mainstream black community because of their “homophobic” and “misogynist” views. From the outside, the Hotep movement looks like a mildly black nationalist movement.

The Hoteps were also the focus of attack from the Alt Right for a long time because Hoteps have a penchant for ascribing the achievements of Ancient Egypt to sub-Saharan Africans. The most common Alt Right attack was tweeting the phrase, “WE WUZ KANGZ” along with a picture of the rocket-powered pyramids at the head of this article. That’s why it was shocking to me when Hotep Jesus, Ali Shakur, started to indicate that he did not harbor animosity toward whites, but that he felt that whites and blacks are both being used by globalists, specifically globalist Jews.

> When you start doing there googles on people in power is always (((them))).
> Rarely whites or blacks.
>
> — Hotep Jesus (@VibeHi) February 9, 2017

Later, when Shakur announced an alliance with the Alt Right, I decided to give the Hotep movement a deeper look.

Hotep Beliefs

Hoteps have a lot of beliefs that mirror those found on ROK. First, Hoteps oppose feminism because they can see the terrible effects feminism the black community, specifically black families. On the flip side, they also oppose the attention-whoring that so many women engage in on social media. The Hoteps I follow on Twitter don’t seem to mind a tasteful photo of an attractive black woman, but they would disapprove of a woman twerking or doing some other salacious thing on social media.

Hoteps believe in taking care of their children. Hoteps are critical of men and women in the black community who father bastards. This is controversial as about 70% of all black children born today are born out of wedlock. Hotep opposition is not based so much on morality as it is on observation. Hoteps know that children raised by single moms are at much greater risk than children who come from a healthy, two-parent home. In one Tweet, Hotep Jesus even speculated that the high rate of homosexuality in the black community may be tied to the fact that men need a strong, loving father. The Hotep opposition to feminism and their support of strong families puts Hoteps solidly in the camp that favors patriarchy.

Hoteps also aspire to become masters of personal finance. A capitalist economy rewards producers, not employees. Thus, Hoteps seek to become business owners. In addition to encouraging entrepreneurship, Hoteps also believe in becoming experts in investing. Hotep beliefs fly in direct contradiction to the handout programs that liberals advocate. Hoteps do not want welfare, and they do not blame their financial condition on white racism. They have no time for being victims. They believe that individual excellence can more than compensate for present day racism or past events, such as slavery.

Not surprisingly, if you ask a Hotep for investment advice, he will point you to black finance experts. Hoteps believe in supporting the black community. They don't seek inclusion into white culture. Rather they prefer building a separate black culture. For example, Hotep Jesus tweeted out that he did not care whether or not some quota of black actors won an Oscar. This is just another example of how Hoteps want to foster independence.

I found agreement with these Hotep ideas, but there are also ideas that I found dubious. Hoteps seem to have a mystical, slightly new age spirituality that talks about manifesting things. While not ideal, these beliefs are no worse than the teachings of someone like Pastor Joel Osteen. They are also prone to conspiracy theories, but as we have seen in the past election cycle, some conspiracy theories are actually true.

Criticism

There are a lot of good aspects to the Hotep movement but the movement is in danger of diluting its message in a quest for wider acceptance. One of the biggest features of Hotepism is that it seeks independence. That means that Hoteps seek to extricate themselves from government handouts and the entire social engineering edifice that has been erected by the Democrats.

Also, in their quest for independence the Hoteps want to move away from the racial animus that characterizes the Black Lives Matter movement that is basically asking whites to cease to exist. Instead, Hoteps want to leave behind the victim culture that has characterized the black community for the last 50 years. Yet, the Democrats push racial division as a cynical strategy to get black voters to vote for vile candidates such as Hillary Clinton. But despite the Democrat policy being completely incompatible with the ideals of the Hotep movement, a recent Hotep statement states:

> Are Hoteps Democratic or Republican? Neither and both. Hoteps are not monolithic. You will have many who side with a particular party for various reasons and you will have many who side with neither.

Another point where the Hoteps may be broadening out too far is with regard to gays. While not a carte blanch endorsement of homosexuality, the Hotep movement now accepts gay members. But as the wider population found out in the 1990s, once you accept the open practice of homosexuality, the next step is normalization of those relationships, and that includes gay marriage.

The bottom line is that the leaders of the Hotep movement will have to avoid selling out. This is especially important because if the Hotep message gets adopted by the black community, it could spell the end of blacks acting as pawns for leftists to manipulate. There would be enormous pushback from the globalist/leftist camp who have used blacks as a tool to enact social engineering and extend their control over the entire population. Hotep leaders should expect to be offered financial rewards to moderate their message. If they refuse to sell out, those leaders will then be attacked in the press.

Conclusion

While we may not like it, the manosphere, the Alt Right, and the Alt Lite have all been identified as threats to the globalist order. I believe Hoteps will soon join the ranks of groups that are deemed enemies by the globalists. The Hotep message is obviously not for everyone, but I view them as allies in the wider war we are fighting to regain control of our countries—and in this war, we need every ally we can get. My only hope is that the Hotep leaders have the strength to resist the temptations and attacks that are certainly coming their way.

Read More: How Black America Was Created

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

9 Tips To Maximize Your Effort With Day Game

March 16, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

With the time spent in our society working, seeking self-improvement, sleeping, training, developing personal projects or learning, one soon realises that days go by fast. The more you become aware of the many things you need to improve in your life, the busier your timetable and the more cluttered your mind gets.

Day game has a few core principles but everyone will agree that regularity is one of the first that you have to master. You cannot reach acceptable results if your time devoted to day game is being replaced by other pressing.

I am still not as efficient as I would to but I have done great progress in the last few years and applying the following rules helped me approach more girls or of a better quality even if I devoted less time to it.

1. Know where you are going

Be the man with a battle plan. Stick to the areas that you know are populated and will have girls strolling around. I have usually two areas of choice: a square or a park with exits where a huge crowd can pass through in just a few minutes and a shopping center if I feel that there is something off with the previous place or it starts raining.

Do not get too adventurous trying to explore new areas constantly. Use thoroughly the few areas that you know before replacing them by new ones, if you feel that the crowd has changed with time or you have spent enough time at your regular hangouts and you feel that venturing into a new territory is the thing to do.

2. Do not go out when you are full

You just had a nice big meal, you'll take "just a few minutes to digest" and finally you will never go out. I know it all too well. The combo gym + big post workout meal, AKA the Motivation Destroyer, is a sure way to ruin both day and night game.

You feel heavy and lazy because all the blood and energy you have is used to process the food instead of making your brain more efficient or your legs walk faster.

Have a light snack before going out or eat on the way. I feel that going for a day game session on an empty stomach is sometimes better than eating at all, as it keeps your mind sharp and makes you interrupt the activity in order to have a break, resume or do something else.

3. Game less but more often

Let’s say that you want to spent 3 hours of your weekend doing day game. You work all week then Saturday comes so you go out, ready to smash it. It starts raining. You are not in a good day or maybe the girls are not receptive. You get angry after 2 hours and empty-handed, you decide to call it a day. Your week’s worth of game is wasted.

Hence dividing the same amount of time into smaller chunks, let’s say four sessions of 45 minutes or three sessions of an hour each. I don’t think that “resting days” in between make much of a difference.

4. Be efficient when you number close

There are two elements that I make sure to use when I take a girl’s number:

- Call her right away: With a line like “I will give you a call now so you have mine too.” They rarely object to it and you see immediately if she gave you a fake number.

Better knowing it on the spot. It also allows you to have her number in your log if you delete her details accidentally.
- Write down her name (if you care), add a physical trait or the place you met her with a number (how much do you want her on a scale of one to five) or the day's date. That way you will not confuse "Daniela Tram Stop 4" with "Daniela Big Tits 11.3" and it is particularly useful in countries with a traditional culture where 80% of the local girls will have the same seven or eight names.

5. Respect your program religiously

DECIDE AND COMMIT! Know when and how long you will go for some day game and STICK TO IT.

No "OK, it's 14.33, I will go at 15.00". It is the worst move where you are just being tempted by the devil of procrastination. And it hurts your efficiency in game just like it hurts a day's work or a gym session. Procrastination is perhaps the worst enemy of game, before modern feminism and cockblocking.

I am still not perfect but it helped me a lot to realise that I, just like everyone else, live on borrowed time. It is important to take the same decision in that field as if it was health or work related. We are talking about your physical well-being here.

6. Find your "always on" mindset

Every opportunity must be converted. It cannot be stressed enough: in game, mathematics are on your side. Transform all occasions into approaches. Limit distractions: turn off the mobile data on your phone. Don't browse the Internet. Do not sit down and day dream. Read a magazine in a shop only to wait for the cute blonde to finish her phone call before you catch her on her way to the exit.

Even if you are hungover, go hunt. The walk will improve your mood and the post-alcohol buzz will give the careless attitude you need. All or nothing, push every interaction until you succeed or the girl leaves.

But as pugnacious as you must be, know when it is over. Don't cling to a dead prospect. Do not waste your time trying to repair a mistake or save a lost cause. It is more efficient to create a new opportunity instead.

My colleague Troy Francis wrote an accurate article on the key principles of that mindset.

7. Avoid the "cruise mode"

The “always on” (where your mind is sharp and you focus on the task at hand) must contrast with the “cruise mode”, where your mind starts to fill up with thoughts that trouble you and have nothing to do with approaching girls. Your brain imagines thousands of scenarios and solutions and you suddenly find yourself a half a mile further than you were and you can’t remember walking that distance.

Exactly like driving for a while on a familiar road then your mind drifts away while your body just follows the road without thinking about it. Your waste the time that you were suppose to spend day gaming.

Without paying attention or being aware of your environment, you could miss that sexy girl passing in front of you. You could also miss someone stealing your wallet or a speeding car while crossing the road.

8. Develop the habit of the “little stroll”

It seems counter-intuitive for a man that supposedly “has no time” to go for a walk. But on the contrary, this “day game stroll” will be greatly beneficial.

Walking will clear your chaotic mind, give you some of your daily dose of Vitamin D and will calm you down if you are under stress. 30 to 45 minutes (This is why it is called a stroll and not a trek) can easily rake in four to five “good” approaches (number/instadate close once the peak of the interaction is reached).

It is not a surprise to discover that Aristotle allegedly founded the Peripatetic school of thought (from the ancient Greek peripatêtikos, which means “given to walking about”) through talking and debating with his students while walking at the same time.

If you are still watching TV (you should not), intend to browse funny and uninformative videos on Youtube or just stay indoors and do nothing because you think you deserve it, go for a stroll instead

9. Reach “peak performance” fast

Game is comparable to sports in the fact that you need to warm up before going full force, especially if you are rusty and you have not done it for a while. Perhaps your “game muscles” are cold or you have spent your day at work staring at a computer screen and not talked to anyone for hours. Not everyone can go from this to chatting up a cute girl five minutes later.

Use what you need to reach that mood. Meditate, lift some weights or watch some comedy to develop a pleasant social mood. Then get out there. Get a few approaches out of the way or start some small talk with shopkeepers. Get your mind right and you will feel it. The words flow effortlessly, you are smooth, your posture is better and you escalate with the girl physically like it is nothing.

You have reached “peak performance”, you ARE more attractive and now you must maximise that effect in our time frame.

L’efficacité est une question d’équilibre et d’engagement

Set your priorities straight. It is important to sit down and decide of the importance of day gaming in one’s life. It is crucial to have realistic expectations and find a balance. You cannot let the physical need of sex impact the quality of your life. If it pollutes your thoughts and slows you down then you must act.

You also cannot lose sight of the other goals in your life by chasing girls more than you should. Forfeiting hours of profitable work, delaying progress in your personal projects or not achieving better results in the gym by procrastinating through hours of loitering and calling it game is not a viable solution

Each man has to do this himself. Each man must take an honest decision and make every hour count.

Read More: 5 Ways To Improve Your Online Game

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

BBW Meghan Trainor's New Song "No" Shames Men For Talking To Women

March 16, 2017 | by Johan Le Roux | Link | Original Link

The infamous Meghan Trainor, known for her feminist-inspired lyrics ("All About That Bass", "Lips Are Moving" and "Dear Future Husband" to name a few) has struck again with another song to dissuade any aspiring masculine men our there.

Meghan needs a personal "Trainor"

Her new song "No" sounds as if it was especially written for men out there (as are most of her songs) to dissuade them from approaching women that they like and thereby also encouraging girls out there to reject such guys who approach them. Let's take a look at the lyrics of this delirious song:

1. Intro

> I think it's so cute and I think it's so sweet
> How you let your friends encourage you to try and talk to me
> But let me stop you there, oh, before you speak
> "Nah" to the "Ah" to the "No", "No", "No"

Okay, so here she is basically rejecting an interested guy before he has even opened his mouth to deliver his opener. She clearly doesn't take into account the amount of anxiety the guy must be feeling, needing encouragement from his friends to go and talk to her. Sure, he is most likely an unattractive dude or whatever, but is such insensitivity really necessary?

2. Chorus

> My name is "No"
> My sign is "No"
> My number is "No"
> You need to let it go
> You need to let it go
> Need to let it go
> "Nah" to the "Ah" to the "No", "No", "No"

In the chorus, she is clearly demonstrating her unwillingness to be approached by stating that she won't even provide basic details to the man approaching her. Talking about her astrological sign is clearly female projection, since men don't care about this and haven't used it as an opener in roughly 20 years.

3. Verse

> First you gonna say
> You ain't runnin' game,
> Thinkin' I'm believing every word
> Call me beautiful,
> So original,
> Telling me I'm not like other girls

Okay, so here she is repeating what many guys (betas) would say, I guess, that they're not "running game," complimenting girls on their beauty and saying they're different, etc. As any ROK reader knows, these are common mistakes that men are encouraged to avoid.

4. Verse

> I was in my zone
> Before you came along,
> Now I'm thinking maybe you should go
> Blah, blah, blah,
> I be like "Nah" to the "Ah" to the "No", "No", "No"

She mentions being "in her zone" before the guy approached her, and thinking that he "should go." In other words, she didn't want to be disturbed by this loser, she wanted to just be left alone. Meanwhile, she is still basking in the attention she's receiving, regardless of its undesirable source.

5. Bridge

> All my ladies, listen up
> If that boy ain't giving up
> Lick your lips and swing your hips
> Girl, all you gotta say is…

Here she is once again encouraging girls to just flat out reject guys who are brave enough to approach them, while rubbing their forbidden sexuality in the faces of the rejected men.

6. Outro

> I'm feeling untouchable, untouchable
> I'm feeling untouchable, untouchable
> I'm feeling untouchable, untouchable
> I'm feeling…

This just reinforces feminist ideas of women being independent and "untouchable" by all but the most desirable of men in the sexual marketplace. Ironically, this ersatz proclamation of value is often espoused most strongly by those who lack it (e.g. a bleached blonde 4.5 who could stand to lose 30 pounds).

Conclusion

I will end by saying that I don't want men out there to feel discouraged by the lyrics. Remember, don't observe what women say, but rather pay attention to what they do. Despite the increasingly hostile climate for men in the West, we know that game's principles still hold, and that the only way to be successful with women is to put yourself out there and risk rejection, even from low quality women like Meghan Trainor.

The bitch shield described in the above song is just another method used by feminists to weed out any potential beta males from their environment, so that the guys who do not feel intimidated by the supposed rejection are left for them to choose from. Make sure that you occupy that group.

Read More: Men Who Cold Approach Women Should Be Proud Of Themselves

Johan Le Roux
Johan Le Roux is a born-again Red Piller from Pretoria, South Africa. Loves to spend his free time lifting, learning new skills, expanding his business, and reading. Doesn't have a website yet, but will soon...

The Story Behind The 2008 Financial Crisis

March 16, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The subprime mortgage crisis emerged in 2007, driving down the stock market late in the year. 2008 began with the economy in freefall, the stock market finally hitting rock bottom in early 2009. By then, the world economy was in turmoil from the shock waves. How did the troubles in one sector of the US economy touch off such a global financial meltdown?

The prelude

President Niceguy standing for the Cuban national anthem by his pal Fidel

In 1977, President Carter signed the Community Reinvestment Act, intended to help low-income borrowers and end discriminatory practices. This has been modified several times over the years, notably during the Clinton years. These changes gave it some real teeth. The first warnings were unheeded. For example, as the New York Times put it even as early as 1999, while the economy was roaring:

> In a move that could help increase home ownership rates among minorities and low-income consumers, the Fannie Mae Corporation is easing the credit requirements on loans that it will purchase from banks and other lenders. […]
>
> These borrowers whose incomes, credit ratings and savings are not good enough > to qualify for conventional loans, can only get loans from finance companies that charge much higher interest rates—anywhere from three to four percentage points higher than conventional loans. […]

>
> In moving, even tentatively, into this new area of lending, Fannie Mae is taking on significantly more risk, which may not pose any difficulties during flush economic times. But the government-subsidized corporation may run into trouble in an economic downturn, prompting a government rescue similar to that of the savings and loan industry in the 1980's.
>
> "From the perspective of many people, including me, this is another thrift industry growing up around us," said Peter Wallison a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. "If they fail, the government will have to step up and bail them out the way it stepped up and bailed out the thrift industry."

So the government pressured the financial industry to accept loans from people whose credit ratings made them bad risks—what's the worst thing that possibly could happen…? Carter and Clinton might have had the best intentions in mind, to help more people achieve the "American dream" of home ownership. However, this turned out to be a mistake; feel-good politics isn't always good business.

Also during this time, the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act gutted the Glass-Steagall Act of 1933. During the aftermath of the Great Depression, it mandated separation between commercial banking and investment banking, a protective firewall to help prevent another similar financial disaster. Again, what's the worst thing that possibly could happen…?

Thwarted efforts at reform

They were warned, but…

By 2003, the White House proposed measures to fix this unstable situation in the works.

Again per the New York Times:

> The Bush administration today recommended the most significant regulatory overhaul in the housing finance industry since the savings and loan crisis a decade ago. […]
>
> Significant details must still be worked out before Congress can approve a bill. Among the groups denouncing the proposal today were the National Association of Home Builders and Congressional Democrats who fear that tighter regulation of the companies could sharply reduce their commitment to financing low-income and affordable housing.
>
> "These two entities — Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac — are not facing any kind of financial crisis," said Representative Barney Frank of Massachusetts, the ranking Democrat on the Financial Services Committee. "The more people exaggerate these problems, the more pressure there is on these companies, the less we will see in terms of affordable housing."

Further warnings went unheeded. In 2005, Federal Reserve chief Alan Greenspan warned:

> "[If Fannie and Freddie] continue to grow, continue to have the low capital that they have, continue to engage in the dynamic hedging of their portfolios, which they need to do for interest rate risk aversion, they potentially create ever-growing potential systemic risk down the road," he said. "We are placing the total financial system of the future at a substantial risk."

Meanwhile, Democratic Senator Chuck Schumer was saying:

> I think Fannie and Freddie over the years have done an incredibly good job and are an intrinsic part of making America the best-housed people in the world… if you look over the last 20 or whatever years, they've done a very, very good job.

Problem? What problem?

Because of this political resistance, the regulatory reforms over Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac never came to pass. In 2006, Senator John McCain co-sponsored a reform bill, the Federal Housing Enterprise Regulatory Reform Act of 2005, which got blocked in committee by all its Democratic members.

How it all went down

The “new normal”, coming right up

Also, the banks were also under pressure from lawsuits. This included Buycks-Roberson v. Citibank Federal Savings Bank in 1994, a racial discrimination suit. As it happens, Obama (then an attorney) represented ACORN. Following all this, acceptance standards and fact-checking became quite lax, leading to the term “liar loans.”

So the banks, under pressure from both the government and civil rights lawsuits to issue loans to anyone with a pulse, came up with creative ways to offset the losses. Predatory lending practices began, such as zero principal loans, which never get paid off (might as well just rent). Also, they turned bundles of mortgages into investment securities, which they had the power to do with the Glass-Steagall firewall gone. These became the hot, new investment in the USA and abroad.

These securities got re-packaged into others, sometimes well over a dozen times; thus it was pretty hard for an investor to make an informed decision. There were credit rating agencies, but their criteria were pretty lax too; they weren’t getting paid to call investments crappy. The subject of derivatives is a bit complex, but credit default swaps are basically investment insurance policies. In good times, it’s gravy for the issuers, but when the investment loses money, the issuer covers the loss.

A prime rate interest hike touched off the powderkeg. Many borrowers were on adjustable rate mortgages, which was (and still is) another sucker deal. So the borrowers—many of whom could barely afford their house notes—got their mortgage payments jacked way up, and they defaulted in droves. The glut of houses now for sale drove the prices way down. That put many borrowers underwater, unable to get out without incurring a loss. As for the bundled investments, their value plummeted. AIG (which issued most of the credit default swaps) got clobbered into insolvency.

Then the stock market tanked. Panicked investors sold at a loss, driving the market further down. The banksters turned to the government like hungry piglets wanting some milk from mama sow. “Too big to fail” was the watchword. The government responded with the Troubled Asset Relief Program. The TARP beneficiaries included AIG and fifteen other financial institutions, along with GM and Chrysler (the only companies among them that actually produce anything). One could argue that it was necessary; on the other hand, rewarding people for making bad decisions sets a lousy precedent.

I haven’t followed all of them, but as I’ve mentioned previously, one of the megalo-banks used the bailout money to buy out a failing competitor and invest in the stock market when it hit bottom, massively profiting from the move. The financial industry has a cute abbreviation—OPM—which means “Other People’s Money”. In that case, the leverage came from the taxpayers. Awesome gravy! Some years later, they got their fingers burnt to the tune of a few billion on credit default swaps, proving that they hadn’t learnt a thing from that escapade of casino capitalism.

The political aftermath

Turning lemons into lemonade

The public largely held the Republicans responsible for the mess—Bush the Younger in particular—though the previous administration's overenthusiastic policies set the groundwork. I wouldn't lay the blame solely on Slick Willie either; the President is important, but isn't the only figure shaping policy. Congress passes bills, and the President either signs or vetoes them.

Administration figures play a role too. Those encouraging the removal of the Glass-Steagall firewall included Robert Rubin and John Podesta. For those not familiar with them, Podesta is quite a colorful figure, filling a number of duties in the Clinton administration, a counselor under the Obama administration, and most lately as Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman. Washington is a pretty tightly-knit family.

Rubin worked for Goldman-Sachs from 1966 until 1992. He joined the Clinton administration in 1993, serving as Secretary of the Treasury from 1995 through 1999. While in office, Rubin also opposed regulation of derivatives such as credit default swaps and collateralized debt obligations. In 1997, he became a co-chairman of the Council on Foreign Relations and still holds the position. After leaving the Clinton administration, he joined the Board of Directors of Citigroup. Wall Street seems to be the kissing cousin of Washington.

During the Presidential campaign under way, the Democrats benefited greatly from the public's perception that the Republicans were at fault, carrying The Lightworker across the finish line. I recall Obama accusing McCain during one of the debates of wrecking the economy. How's that for audacity?

The financial aftermath

Where did all that wealth go that had been built up for years?

Quantitative easing was another measure the government used to prop up the economy. In the first round, the government ended up buying over two trillion in treasury bills, bank debt, and those toxic mortgage securities. Round two included buying up $600 billion more T-bills. During 2012, round three began, in which the government started buying $40 billion in mortgage-backed securities every month. That finally tapered down and ended in 2014.

It did artificially prop up the economy, but was an inflationary pressure. Due to fuzzy math, official inflation figures don't reflect the full impact of rising prices on the public. (One of the tricks is that some categories don't count, like food, fuel, insurance, construction materials, etc.; it's not like anybody actually needs those, right?) All the bailouts and buying up of assets drove the national debt sky-high, as if it wasn't bad enough previously. That may yet be the next catastrophe in the works; something that famously came to pass for Greece.

Years later, Wall Street did recover, and the stock market is reaching new highs. However, Main Street still hasn't recovered. Jobs did come back, but mostly in other countries, thanks to globalism and "offshoring."

As has happened so many times, the government instituted feel-good policies and the general public had to suffer the consequences of the social engineering. As for the banksters, once again they made some bad decisions, yet came out ahead after they crashed the economy, while effectively strip-mining the middle class. (I have to wonder how the Founding Fathers of the American Revolution would've responded.) Part of draining the swamp must include breaking up the Washington-Wall Street puppy pile fueled by connections and campaign contributions.

Read More: How The Deep State Operates

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Anti-Fascist Mob Attacks Professor At Predominately White Middlebury College

March 17, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Charles Murray, author of the 1994 book The Bell Curve, which analyzes IQ distributions among different subgroups of humans, and through various cultures, was met by a violent mob when he accepted an invitation to speak on March 2, 2017, at Middlebury College, a small private liberal arts school in rural Vermont. Inside, a group of students drowned out the speaker, and when he was escorted from campus, a group of masked agitators outside attacked one of the Middlebury professors, sending her to the hospital.

Who Is Charles Murray?

`

Murray is an author, political scientist, and associate from the libertarian wing of the American Enterprise Institute, a public policy think tank founded in 1938 closely associated with neoconservatism. Murray is most well known for his 1994 book The Bell Curve, a best seller written with Harvard behaviorist Richard Herrnstein that discusses the economic, social, and genetic factors affecting IQ. The book concludes that intelligence is a better predictor of success than education, parental economic status, or upbringing, and that differences in genes affect differences in intelligence. Basically a nature versus nurture analysis.

> Predicting the course of society is chancy, but certain tendencies seem strong enough to worry about:
>
> - An increasingly isolated cognitive elite.
> - A merging of the cognitive elite with the affluent.
> - A deteriorating quality of life for people at the bottom end of the cognitive distribution.
>
> Unchecked, these trends will lead the U.S. toward something resembling a caste society, with the underclass mired ever more firmly at the bottom and the cognitive elite ever more firmly anchored at the top, restructuring the rules of society so that it becomes harder and harder for them to lose. [p. 509].

Murray's summary of The Bell Curve – Sounds liberal to me!

Murray's warning in the book was that those with high intelligence are separating from the general population of average and below-average intelligence, and that this was a dangerous trend. Robert Reich examined a similar phenomenon in his 2013 film Inequality For All, which warns of the widening economic and social class gap in America, but was met with little protest as he is a former Clinton Labor Secretary, and therefore not seen as a racist, sexist misogynist.

Murray states that IQ follows a bell-shaped pattern, where a large number of people have average IQs, followed by roughly equal above and below average IQ levels which taper off in a predictable statistical manner known as a "normal distribution" where 1 standard deviation = 15 IQ points. Much of the controversy comes from a chapter on race where the authors state "The debate about whether and how much genes and environment have to do with ethnic differences remains unresolved," and "It seems highly likely to us that both genes and the environment have something to do with racial differences."

Hardly controversial. And written before most of these students were born. In 1996, the APA assembled a taskforce to analyze the ideas presented in The Bell Curve. It concluded that indeed heritability was responsible for around 50% of intelligence, confirming Murray's work. It also confirmed Murray's assertation that black IQ was approximately 1 standard deviation below white IQ. For this, he was labeled a white nationalist.

> 1/ @nytimes @wapo Ask SPLC for page reference for anything I've ever written that remotely says I'm a white nationalist.
>
> — Charles Murray (@charlesmurray) March 5, 2017

Humans Are Not Equal

Of course the beauty of humanity is that we are NOT all equal. One could also do a similar study on athletic ability and find that certain demographic groups (particularly east Africans) perform better than other demographic groups at physical sport.

For example, Kenyans make up 0.06% of the world population but dominate almost all long distance running, even when they lack the professional training and diet given to runners from first world nations. It's all a matter of genetics, and being angry at simple facts explained by science never changes the underlying truths.

What's Different?

We have seen a number of incidents with politically correct, snowflake children acting out against perceived verbal threats to their "safe spaces," particularly at universities such as Yale, UMass, Berkeley, and others.

We have seen students protest white males by preventing them from crossing bridges or attending class (blocking a bridge established by a white male who was instrumental in expanding education for women), institute programs attacking masculinity, and overall creating an unwelcome environment for men, ignoring the fact that men built, funded, and instituted higher education, and opened it to women in the first place.

I am Pansexual; hear me roar!

But while these tantrums, thought policing, and mob actions have passed without repercussions, this time there is hope for pushback.

Over 100 Middlebury professors have signed a document titled Free Inquiry On Campus, upholding the virtues of knowledge, thought, and free speech. The American Political Science Association, representing 13,000 professors and students, issued a statement condemning "Violence at Middlebury College." The Huffington Post even published an article attacking the student protestors, calling them intolerant and violent. Middlebury professor, author, and environmentalist Bill McKibben, authored a piece in the Guardian urging students to "resist, not silence" their foes.

The Event

The college prepared students for Murray's visit, reminding them of the principles of free and open debate, exposure to a variety of ideas, and that college is a place to explore new and different ideas. I've personally found that I can take something positive away from even the groups with which I most strongly disagree, and indeed college is precisely the place to expose yourself to new and interesting ideas, people, and cultures. Students were also reminded to respect the speaker and uphold the Middlebury tradition of respect and honor.

When you're mad as hell, but don't have any clue why

Many students ignored this, and met Murray on campus with a loud mob, blocking interested students from attending, and drowning out Murray's voice with unoriginal chants of "Racist, Sexist Anti-gay, Charles Murray Go Away!" as they turned their backs to him on stage.

As one of the Middlebury staff addressed students, instructing them to respect the speaker, and warning "If an event is disrupted by a group or individual, a representative of the college may request the action to stop or ask the person or group to leave the event. Violations of college policy may result in college discipline up to and including suspension," the crowd yelled profanities and demanded to "shut it down!"

As the President attempted to introduce the speaker, she reminded the audience that listening to ideas is different than endorsing them, and that “The very premise of free speech on this campus is that the speaker has a right to be heard.” While the crowd applauded loudly at this statement, Murray uttered less than 10 words before he was drowned out by boos and chants.

Correct. There was no white supremacy here.

After about 20 minutes of protests by at least 400 students, Murray was taken to another room, under a contingency plan, to be interviewed for a livestream Q&A by Middlebury professor Allison Stanger. Protestors responded by pulling several fire alarms in a desperate attempt at preventing this man from sharing his thoughts with the school who invited him. Murray was able to complete this interview, although it was not readily available at the time of publication. A Reason TV interview of him discussing his most recent book can be found here.

Middlebury faculty member Allison Stanger, a liberal Professor of International Politics and Economics with graduate degrees from Harvard and the London School of Economics, attempted to escort Murray from this violent mob when she was physically assaulted by a masked mob waiting outdoors. As Stanger and Murray entered a school administrator's car, protestors began rocking, pounding, and jumping on the vehicle.

They removed and threw a large traffic sign in front of the car, blocking its path, and someone grabbed Stanger by the hair and neck, resulting in a trip to the hospital and treatment for neck and spinal injuries. The next day Stanger was wearing a neck brace. Ironically, it appears that Stanger opposed many of Murray's ideas, and was hoping to engage him in academic debate, but such mobs will quickly turn on their own, as we have seen before.

> Fucking wannabe Red Guards put a professor in a neck brace.
> https://t.co/CSKK3chLHx
>
> — Bennett Murray (@BDMurray) March 4, 2017

The college reportedly has names of at least some attendees, identified by student ID cards, and the Middlebury College President has promised an investigation and possible punitive action against students. After the event, president Patton issued a milquetoast but important apology to attendees saying "Today our community begins the process of addressing the deep and troubling divisions that were on display last night. [We] failed to live up to our core values."

Outside Agitators = Antifa (Anti Fascists)

The group that was waiting for Murray outside the event was a masked, violent mob. In almost every recent instance, this means the loosely organized underground group "Antifa," a supposed anti-fascist group that often resorts to violent means in attempts to stifle ideas they view as dangerous. Antifa is far more prominent in Europe, where they regularly use violence and intimidation against those they see as an enemy. However, they are increasingly present in America. You can see their aggressive and profane response when pleasantly confronted by an attractive female Infowars reporter in this 2016 clip.

Administrators noted that while some students did participate in the protest, there were also a number of outside agitators. College spokesman Bill Burger described the attacks as "scary, violent mob action."

Coming Apart: The State of White America 1960-2010

Murray, whose daughter graduated from Middlebury in 2007, was invited to campus by a student group interested in hearing his thoughts after the recent US presidential election, in light of his recent book Coming Apart, which examines the white working class, who was instrumental in electing Donald Trump president. Coming Apart is largely a critique on the institutional changes which are negatively affecting the lower classes.

Correct. No Eugenics was being discussed.

Coming Apart blames social and economic decline on a worsening moral character. I suspect that the title alone is what triggered most students, as anything with "white" in its title must automatically and harshly be hated and attacked.

> I wasn't always an old white nationalist eugenicist anti-gay pseudoscientist. And my wife was a knockout. https://t.co/3OjVLk449E
>
> — Charles Murray (@charlesmurray) March 12, 2017

The New York Times published an article criticizing the protestors, but also calling Murray a "white nationalist" because he dares speak scientific truths. I suppose technically this should make one an "Asian nationalist" as Asians have the highest overall IQ as a group, but Murray is stuck with the moniker White Nationalist because reasons.

The Aftermath

> 2/ Allison Stanger. She's on the left. And fearless, funny, smart as can be, and as devoted to academic freedom as anyone I've ever met.
>
> — Charles Murray (@charlesmurray) March 4, 2017

The NY Times labeled Murray a white nationalist, the Washington Post makes the story about Murray, not the violent students, and Murray praised the faculty and administration while condemning the violent thugs. Along the way, more leftists, such as Stanger, are now disillusioned and Murray has made a new friend with his liberal counterpart Stanger.

The Eyes! Look at the eyes!

The faculty stand together in unison and pen a strong set of principles supporting the pursuit of knowledge and freedom of expression.

Meanwhile, the Middlebury students write a completely inverted Orwellian story of how the injured professor Stanger and Murray attempted to attack students from inside their getaway car, and the SGA proposes limits on speech for controversial speakers.

> So the reaction of the @middlebury SGA to the @charlesmurray is to propose limits on controversial speakers in the future? I can't even. pic.twitter.com/p8Mn2tJNex
>
> — Samantha Harris (@SamatFIRE) March 6, 2017

Hopefully, the backlash will continue, and the violent thugs responsible for hospitalizing one of their professors will be punished. And in the end, they cannot win. Murray was able to present his views as planned, and receives national attention drawing more to his message. Stanger, who planned to challenge his ideas, is demonized and attacked, and becomes a defender of Murray. As student Kate Reinmuth stated:

> The only way to guarantee that your voice is never heard is to remove yourself from the conversation entirely and, unfortunately, this group of protesters did that on behalf of everyone today by shutting the discussion down.

Read More: Why Women Are The Unfairer Sex

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

6 Leftist Concepts That Pretend To Be Positive But Are Not

March 17, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

The left is intrinsically conflict-mongering. It always existed against a particular state of thing, whether real or fantasized. Early on, though, it dissimulated its conflictive essence by posing as positive or "progressive." To this end, generations of leftists twisted language to give themselves a good appearance whereas the enemy-of-the-day looked to everyone like something really bad.

Eighteenth century libertines claimed to defend "freedom" while faith became "fanaticism" and "superstition." Later ones came across as "intellectuals" or siding with "the people." Some manipulated the proclivity to empathy to pretend they were "oppressed" and thus entitled to sympathy when they were actually hateful, anti-middle-class Marxist or deviant family-hating lesbians.

The whole theory of "progress" as one can find it in Marx—society ought to go from capitalism to an ideal communist society—is little more than wishful thinking, yet it worked tremendously for leftists eager to cast themselves into a self-favoring view of history. Marxist "progress" has been used to kill millions of innocent people, just like globalist or cultural Marxist "progress" serves to destroy white homelands. As long as people are entrapped into positive words masquerading and fostering grim realities, Leftism retains its grip over their minds.

Here are some pseudo-positive concepts or buzzwords that are actual ploys for sinister projects.

1. Equality

Perhaps the most massive totem pole of it all. Written, shouted, used as a talisman an indefinite number of times, “equality” has been put forth to justify various mass killings from eighteenth century terror to twentieth century Bolshevism, and closer to us served to unleash female hypergamy and alien millions of young straight-white-males from the societies they should belong in.

Equality exists in mathematics. A number can be equal to another because an abstract unit can be replaced with another abstract unit without change. Mathematical equality exists because abstract units are identical with each other. Outside from the realm of pure quantity, qualitative differences emerge, and thus equality ought to be defined negatively as the absence of difference both in quantity and quality.

It is easy to see that equality between individual beings—not numbers—is a fiction, an attempt to perceive individuals as abstractions or numbers, void of any quality, personality or specificity. Equalitarianism stems from a rather incomplete view of the beings it pretends to apply to, and gets quickly used as a mask for envy or the will to grab something or exert power over someone.

Although equality can enter into the definition of true justice as equanimity—see Aristotle’s Nicomachean Ethics, quote—, more than often, the word is used to foster particular interests at the expense of the wider social equilibrium, to fan the flames of division and sedition, and later, to deny vocations, human biodiversity, complementarity as it implies differences in nature and functions, not to mention ugly tradeoffs where some manipulative group plays the victim or claims rights to what doesn’t belong to them.

2. “Social” “justice”

Are you a victim? Are you victim of a particular inequality? Then you are living an injustice, and this wrong ought to be compensated. This simple framing has been widely used by anti-white, anti-male, anti-Western leftists to create a feeling of victimhood among various social categories. They used this powerful feeling to mount new social identities, inspired from Marxist classes—feminism isn’t about femininity but about women identifying as a separate, adversarial group, whose interests would be antagonistic to men’s—, and perpetual charges hung over the majority’s heads—reyciss! Sexiss! And so on.

“Social justice” covers a blending of several features: an accusatory, anti-white, anti-male, anti-Western narrative, that taints and darkens past history; a feeling of victimhood and class identity for so-called “minorities” integrated into the wider narrative; the systematic, and very real, disenfranchisement and displacement of the majority that finds itself condemned to play the role of the bad guy—and hence charged—in said narrative. In this sense, “social justice” is deeply divisive, defamatory, aggressive, and amounts to a Moloch that eats families, nationhood, and most men.

Actual justice, call it social or not, is of course far from such a terrible conception. Methinks true justice should acknowledge the fact that we are the sons of the Western civilizations, its human substance and legitimate heirs, and that we have a prime right over it. We should have jobs, freedom of speech, protection over violent crowds, a right to fair judgment instead of getting screwed over by HR, “minority” impunity and pussy pass, a right to chances to thick relationships with at least some women instead of clowning our ways through hypergamy… Don’t forget we need to formalize at least some of our intuitions about what’s fair or not to replace the wicked theory of “justice” the Left shatters us with.

3. “Progress” (and the “reactionaries”)

This overrated buzzword has been straightforward long ago. Its Latin root, progressus, stems from the root verb gradior (walk, advance) and was mostly used in a military context, as in the sentence “the army is progressing into enemy territory.” Since then, it has been used analogically to qualify any advancement, even purely relative or fantasised ones.

The Left, following pompous Philosophes and Marx, enshrined its own notion of progress into a general theory of history, thus making it absolute rather than relative. When various strands of modernity clash—for example, individual freedom and collective well-being—, which one is “progressive”? Each can be used to fulfill a particular notion of progress. Aside perhaps from blatant technological breakthroughs, “progress” is deeply relative. Even the most shining realizations of genius imply the sacrifice of thousands of potential choices that have been discarded during the process. The Left chose to forget this truth in order to judge everything and everyone from its own authoritarian, pedestalized perspective.

If you do some research about such characters as, say, Ayn Rand and Lothrop Stoddard, you’ll notice they have been widely labelled “reactionary.” Yet each of them was a progressive in his own right. Rand considered industrial development and individual freedom as obvious landmarks of progress: she opposed vehemently to the environmentalist and collectivist—that is, anti-industrial, anti-economic growth, anti-conservative rights—as a “return of the primitive.”

As for Lothrop Stoddard, he rebuffed Bolshevism and environmentalism as pre-scientific ratiocinations that willingly ignored human differences and the proper value of civilization. These “mistakes”, he said, are older than biological discoveries and stem from “degenerate” elements who would rather destroy civilization than letting it progress without them.

> The only new thing about Bolshevism is its ” rationalizing ” of rebellious emotions into an exceedingly insidious and persuasive philosophy of revolt which has not merely welded all the real social rebels, but has also deluded many misguided dupes, blind to what Bolshevism implies. (Stoddard, Revolt Against Civilization, chap.8)

I also remember an old-fashioned Marxist who claimed feminism was “reactionary” because, he said, it comes from the wealthy and urbanized bourgeoisie, and hijacks the attention and care given to working classes for the benefit of actual exploiters. This guy’s progressivism has fallen out of grace, likely because it showed unable to destroy Western countries, but he is no less right according to his own logic.

Now, of course, we could say that MRAs are the real progressives as men’s rights are a progress, or that asserting our identities and associated rights are a progress, perhaps more so than SJW savagery and unrestrained hypergamy.

4. Openness or open-mindedness

We all heard about how being “open to new ideas” and possibilities, or being “open-minded” was good. In practice, what the liberals mean when they talk about openness or open-minded is “be a Leftist and believe in our notion of progress.” You have to be uncritical, hyper-sympathetic towards the last tranny or BLM activist that whines about how mistreated and misunderstood he is—and if you are “open” to wasting your money on the latest trendy fashion, it is even better.

But try being open-minded towards what the Left tags as “far right” or “extreme”, for example men’s right, race realism, skepticism on their dogmas such as anthropogenic global warming, or tradition… and it won’t be long before they shriek at you, in a typical display of rather irrational dirtiness psychology. “These ideas are impure! They are contagious!”

Open-mindedness along their lines means being gullible to media and college propaganda. You have to let the managers and social engineers fabric your consent, as Chomsky would put it. They want your mind to be open so they can fulfill it with self-hate and garbage. When it comes to better things libtards suspend open-mindedness, to the point of refusing any objective inquiry and hiding behind their biased, accusatory rhetoric.

In itself, openness or open-mindedness is a double-edged sword. It can, and should be used by those who are intelligent or morally structured enough to toy with potentially dangerous ideas. As to the others, those who are too easily tempted or misdirect by demagogues, especially women—who by their vote always favoured an anti-family, economy-devouring Big State—, the low-IQ and the unhinged, I think they should follow the lead of more qualified individuals.

5. Modern nationhood and citizenship

Since time immemorial peoples have been ethnocultural groups. Romans used the term natio to refer to a particular people, say, the Gaul, the Goths or the Basque. They also used the term civis to refer to a man as a member of his city, thus belonging to it.

Both words have been emptied of their substantial meaning. “Nation” is now mostly used to denote an abstract, bureaucratized State whom anyone can be a national if the bureaucrats hand him a stamped piece of paper. “Citizenship” refers to the pretense to identify with a particular public responsibility or to a world under globalist power: Leftists often claim to be “just citizens” or speak “in the name of the citizens of X place” when they are actually carrying cultural warfare. Remember when a bunch of hateful swindlers tried to rob Sherry Spencer, Richard Spencer’s mom, of her real estate by forcing her to sell it at a cheap price? Complacent media said they were just citizens, or that “the town” was doing it. Yeah, sure.

Citizenship today is a mean to virtue-signal when you are an urban elf. It has become empty, fictitious—it refers to a world of nowhere and more subtly to belonging to a globalist class that abandoned its actual fellow citizens or ethnic brothers long ago.

6. “Social struggles” and “achievements”

When they referred to actually good causes, such as trade unions maintaining a high standard of living for most workers and fostering a meritocratic middle-class, these words ringed well. Today, they seem to refer more to the unwarranted privileges of State officers—when theft through taxes and economic rent are presented as something “social.”

The heroic epic of “social achievements”, which conveniently forgets that there is no free lunch and that if a particular segment of population benefits much from them it must be at the expense of the others, covers a host of barely examined ill effects. When it is used to glorify the welfare State, it forgets how such a State tends to disintegrate organic social life by taking away charity or generosity, how it fosters a big parasitic and paternalist State, how it allows females to destroy their families, or how it attracts immigrants eager to get a check and imposes unfair burdens on the productive citizens—I’m thinking about, say, the middle classes who paid for Obamacare, not about cutting taxes for Monsanto.

Conclusion

From fake smiles and cute façades to seemingly innocuous buzzwords such as “you go girl”, “sex positivity” or “self-acceptance”—which sounds better than complacency—, the culture conflict-mongerers managed to push their disruptions and degeneration into normality. One step at a time, from actual normalcy to an alien nation, all this believing they were cool or on the good side of history.

Shatter the illusion by explaining what stands behind and unveil the inner vacuity or potentially polymorphous use of the word. May progress not be “progress” and may the mainstream view of justice not be the anti-white, misandric “social justice.” They aren’t smarter than we are, just more manipulative.

Read Next: 4 Leftist Propaganda Videos That Had Their False Narrative Called Out

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Women Skipping Work For A Day Taught Everyone How Important Men Are

March 17, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

On the 8th of March, 2017, a large number of Western women played hookie; indeed, in connection with the protests that were taken by women against President Donald Trump in January of 2017, the organizers of those protests called on women to skip work on the 8th of March in order to show their strength and influence in society.

And so, the 8th of March came, and passed, and do you know what happened? Nothing. Or at least nothing significant. Indeed, Donald Trump stayed President, businesses kept running, and the United States still exists. Now, it is granted that, in all likelihood, relatively few women participated in this joke-of-a-protest, because a decent number of women are—thank God!—still intelligent enough to see through such a farce. Nevertheless, this whole event is still instructive as it offers us a chance to reflect on what would really happen if such an event were taken seriously.

Women DO deserve better…better than the lies that feminists feed them.

Imagine, for a moment, that all women in the Western world really did take a day off work; all they did was stay home and watch their children (if they had any). What would happen? Oh, there would be major disruptions no doubt. Young children might lack some of their teachers. Doctors might have to take blood for the absent nurses and jerry-rig a few operations. The one lone male in human resources might get overwhelmed. And a number of men might have to get called in for some overtime.

Ironically, a lot of women might also find out that they are happier in the home rather than being a corporate drone. But nevertheless, on this imaginary 'women-less' day, civilization would continue moving forward; a few people would seriously suffer here and there, but society as we know it would continue chugging along. Food would still be in the fridge. Traffic and deliveries would continue. And life would go on. In fact, if we knew in advance when this "Day Without Women" would be, then men could largely mitigate the effects that this would have on society. So there would be pain, but this pain would be temporary, and soon things would be back to normal.

What happens when civilized men aren't there to keep a lid on disorder and violence.

But now imagine, just for a second, that society experienced a "Day Without Men". Indeed, imagine that all the men in the Western world, all at the same time, truly decided not to work for a day no matter what happened. All men stopped working for one full day. And imagine that this was known in advance.

You know what would happen? Well, think of what has happened in the past when the police—a largely male profession, especially on the front lines—went on strike. There would be riots, civil unrest, looting, and a serious increase in criminality. People would die in fires and car accidents due to the lack of firefighters; in fact, fires that might normally get contained would spread and cause much more devastation than normal. Deliveries of food and essentially services would cease to a trickle. Power outages and other major mechanical and electrical concerns would have almost no one to address them.

Terrorist attacks would likely sky-rocket given the lack of any serious armed response to the terrorist threat. And worst of all, the Western world would likely be invaded and destroyed. Seriously! If the enemies of the West knew that men—who comprise the bulk of all fighting forces for Western militaries—were taking the day off, would they not seize the opportunity to strike. After all, who would be manning the guns on the gates of a military camp or on an aircraft carrier? Who would be piloting the fighters to repel an enemy air attack? Who would be guarding our embassies and responding to any threats? Who would be manning the command posts to launch our nuclear arsenal in case of an attack?

Would not, for example, North Korea sweep through the South if it knew for sure that all the men in South Korea and Japan had taken the day off? Of course it would! Now, for sure, there are women in the military, and many of them would no doubt do a fine job trying to compensate for the lack of men, but a female soldier in a support trade is no front-line marine, and in nearly all military contests, a group of well-trained men will defeat a group of well-trained women any day of the week. So the fact remains that without men for a day, the West would be vulnerable in a potentially civilization-ending way.

Not going to be stopped by Western feminists!

So, what do these little thought-experiments show us? Well, they give us a glimpse of reality; a reality that cannot be concealed no matter how much modern feminists wish to hide it. And that reality is the following: in terms of their immediate importance, women are not indispensable to society, for everything that a woman does outside the home, a man can do as well. A man can be a nurse; he can be a teacher; he can be a day-care worker.

On the other hand, men—given their greater physical strength and aggression—fill most of the roles that are needed to maintain the stability and protection of society on a day-to-day basis, and so men are indispensable to society in an immediate sense. Indeed, society could relatively easily survive a day without women, but it might not survive a day without men, for whereas the former situation would be like getting kicked in the balls, the latter would be like getting shot—you might survive, but you might also die.

The one thing that men cannot do…and the most critical thing to the maintenance of civilization too.

Now, does all this mean that women are not indispensable to Western civilization? Of course not. Women, being supremely well-suited to the birthing and nurturing of children, are indispensable to civilization, for children—meaning future citizens—are the fuel that keeps a civilization running. And since, without women, there would be no children, and hence no future civilization, then obviously, women are critical to the maintenance and survival of a civilization.

However, unlike men, and unlike the message that the organizers of the "Day Without Women" want to convey, women are indispensable in the long-term sense, whereas men are indispensable in the short-term. And so this is the key point: men and women are both indispensable to society, but they are indispensable in complementary ways, not in the same way. So feminists need to stop trying to pretend that women are men or that women are vital to a civilization in the same way that men are. They are not, and that is just reality.

And the sooner that we accept that reality, the better it will be for all of us.

Read More: Why Shaming Men (And Women) Is Important and Necessary

Damian Michael

R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal.

Books.

5 Things Inherently Wrong With “Love Trumps Hate”

March 18, 2017 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

After Donald Trump was elected the 45th President of the United States, dismayed leftists, professional protesters, and useful idiots alike (many of whom did not even vote) fled to the streets to protest the supposedly unjust election results and the racist, sexist, xenophobe™ who reigned victorious. Hoisting placards, waving posters, shining spotlights, and holding neon signs etched with and radiating “LOVE TRUMPS HATE” became this crestfallen group’s form of “resistance” to an alleged authoritarian.

“Love Trumps Hate” is one of the feel-good slogans passed down from former presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton’s 1.2 billion-dollar failed campaign. The slogan is based on the notion that having the globalist darling in the Oval Office would have continued the era of peace, love and tolerance under the Obama Administration, whereas one with The Donald—as it is now—would produce fear and bigotry.

The separation was clear: Trump represents hate, Clinton love. You hear “Love Trumps Hate” repeated ad nauseam across social media to the point you would think a lie told this frequently would eventually take on some semblance of truth—Goebbels style. Fortunately, as more and more people wake up to the scourge of globalism, recognize and finally reject the propaganda of the political and media establishment, they have started to tune into disingenuous messages like “Love Trumps Hate”.

You're invited.

Following the establishment narrative that paints all nationalism as "scary" or "bigoted", you can understand what these protesters in their own twisted world are advocating for when they scribble "Love Trumps Hate" onto their demonstration tool of choice. But for the uninitiated—or the initiated seeking clarification—let us unpack five crucial, inherent flaws with the "Love Trumps Hate" rhetoric, and why it will always lose to "Make America Great Again".

1. It politicizes feelings

This is "Love Trumps Hate"'s most obvious flaw. Neither love nor hate necessarily signal good politics, and when you attempt to conflate the two the results can be catastrophic. There are studies that show how using empathy to take government action distorts our reasoning capacity and ability to implement policies or pass laws that benefit the broader public (ex. citizens) over a chosen, protected minority (ex. illegal immigrants).

By politicizing feelings, "Love Trumps Hate" appeals both to emotion and partisanship: it presupposes that Clinton was about love and Trump is about hate, which opens up a vast field for debate on specific policy that few, if any of those protesters will want or be able to have.

2. It's hypocritical

The irony is that those who chant and tweet "Love Trumps Hate" are not standard-bearers of that first emotion. Was the Women's March, organized by a pro-sharia law activist, about love? Was the UC Berkeley riot about love? Were the Antifa brats swinging their fists at "Nazis" done in the name of love? Did Snoop Dogg recently shoot a mock Donald Trump in a music video out of pure love? Think not.

For these leftist insurgents, hate boils down to any views that oppose their own. Their version of hate trivializes the real hatred of, say, deceptive state propaganda ("MTV New Years Resolutions For White People", anyone?). Love, on the other hand, is their excuse to smash windows, set fires, and call for martial law while claiming you are on the right end of the moral spectrum.

For the left, "love" means burning the American flag (the country that gave them the freedom to protest in the first place) in effigy.

3. It's a straw man

The "Love Trumps Hate" idea is based on a sham argument. This bizarre idea that Trump is a KKK-enabling racist who is conspiring to rollback civil rights is a leftist canard used by the MSM to discredit the surge in nationalism brought on by Trump's election. Trump's era of "hate" is manufactured out of constant misinformation about his actual views, done deliberately to mislead the impressionable.

"A Day Without Immigrants" is not the same as deporting illegal aliens who have committed crimes on American soil. Temporarily suspending the travel of foreign nationals from a list of terror-linked, Muslim-majority countries is not "racist", but a tough first gesture toward securing the nation's border and deterring the homegrown threat of Radical Islam.

Dropping a federal directive that pressured public schools into letting boys who think they are the opposite gender into girls bathrooms is not a violation of civil rights—it is about handing states back the right to rule in favor of (or not) common-sense biology and respecting roughly 98.5% of children's sense of privacy.

"Love Trumps Hate" is a calculated way of undercutting genuine political views on immigration, religious extremism, and social policy. After all, for this slogan to retain any power it has to misrepresent its opposition's stance, which is the very definition of a classic straw man argument.

Proof Trump is one hateful, homophobic president…

4. It's based on a gimmick

The best writers understand that when your sentences rely heavily on puns it is often an admission of your writing lacking substance. It shows you are unable to elaborate on a premise; you are only capable of being cute with it. Puns—especially bad puns—look desperate. When Hillary Clinton tried to push "Trump-ed up trickle down economics" in last year's Presidential Debates, it showed she had no real retort to Trump's "America First" views on the economy and trade.

Likewise, sandwiching the US President's surname between two liberal buzzwords shows you are not in this for the truth. You want to virtue-signal. You want to appease your vengeful goddess that is HRC. Of course, when it comes to life and relationships, love does trump hate. But when you capitalize that 'T' and rebrand it with a partisan spin, you will always lose in the political arena.

All this photo's missing is one more play on words.

5. It’s code for open borders

This is key. So key, in fact, it almost negates the previous four points. Ultimately, this slogan is not about love or hate—or Trump. It is a rallying cry for open borders. “Love” signifies the breaking down of boundaries that separate countries, nations, provinces, states, counties, and municipalities governed by their own set of laws. “Hate”, in actuality, signifies the upholding of that sovereignty, implying that it is somehow cruel to prioritize the livelihood of law-abiding, tax-paying citizens living in your land.

Is it any coincidence that the king of open borders—George Soros—funds many of these marches and protests through his partnerships and charitable foundations? Of course not. “Love Trumps Hate” is one more lousy attempt to discredit this wave of nationalism that is spreading across the United States and many European countries.

Pro-open borders billionaire George Soros, who collaborated with Nazis and helped break the British pound in the ’90s, must be all about love, right?

The call for ordinary Trump Supporters and conservatives (or “neo-Nazis”, in the myopic eyes of radical leftists) to open their hearts is really about opening the borders and encouraging the flow of “refugees” and “undocumented immigrants” into your country without careful vetting or rule of law.

Most importantly, when a political protest’s main argument sounds like a Hallmark card (or most of Justin Trudeau’s public speeches), do not buy into it. After all, Hallmark outsources its jobs to China.

Read More: Why You Should Not Have Sex With Girls Who Hate Donald Trump

Harry Lime
Writer. Filmmaker. Lover of cuckoo clocks. Email: harrylimerok @gmail.com.

Barbarian Christians: Why Islam May Want To Rethink Taking Over Europe

March 18, 2017 | by Maximus Decimus Meridius | Link | Original Link

The main crisis of The West today is one of identity. I watched a good video series on this dilemma recently and the thrust of the argument presented was this – "race" (i.e. white/European) is no basis for identity that unifies. What matters is values, morals and world view. This is what makes a tribe a tribe and binds men together in it. Christianity was the world view that once bound all of Europe's tribes in common, but it was not always this way. Before Christ there was Rome, an empire whose collapse was caused by a very different barbarian invasion.

The funny thing I learned watching this History series, and never really thought about or made the connection before, was that the barbarians that destroyed Rome… were us!

Europeans – destroying arrogant and hypocritical empires since the dawn of Man.

The Western Roman empire collapsed because of its inability to properly assimilate the "barbarian" Germans, Brits, Celts and other conquered tribes of western Europe. Of note as well is that these barbarians were 100% pagan; a world view getting increasing interest and research within the ROK community as a possible solution to problems The West faces today.

For all their faults, Romans were the civilized peoples of the age because they were staunch patriarchal pagans, far more so than Greece ever was. In the end, Rome was overrun and destroyed by violent and unrelenting goddess worshiping warriors. A sweeping generalization of the times and its peoples to be sure, but one I feel will stand up with research and honest appraisal of the anthropological evidence. (See the Druids in pre-Roman Britain.)

I start with this short historical introduction in order to explain why Christianity appealed to the barbarian, that is the European, mind and how its adoption transformed Europe into the powerhouse it eventually became.

For the 2nd time in history, Western Europe finds itself beset by outside barbarians from a completely foreign culture and on the verge of collapse. Like Rome, very few men in The West have any interest in saving it because "the empire" simply no longer works for them. The difference is back then, Christianity was a new cult, just one of many possible answers to metaphysical questions on the nature of the universe and Man. Today, Christianity is 2000 years old and the current Catholic Pope made a historic first in allowing prayer readings from the Quran.

Where faith, politics and cultural change meet, a new radical destiny undreamed of before is born.

Christianity won in Europe when Constantine chose it in the dying days of the Western Roman empire to unify his subjects. By all accounts, it was as much a choice of true belief and conviction as of politics. The choice of Christianity would not have won over the masses however if it did not offer something of value; something true to believe in that made better sense to a pagan, and patriarchal, tribal/Roman mind. I believe this is precisely what Red Pill men are doing right now. Paganism, Neomasculinity, MGTOW, all of these are belief systems based on logic and intelligence that provide answers. Answers to a quest for a worldview that is true, that works and, most importantly, binds men in common with one another to make a unified tribe, an identity.

The failure of the Western Roman empire and why it collapsed forms the first lengthy chapters of St. Augustine's City of God. In short, the pagan view of the world made no sense. If worshiping and sacrificing to "the gods" was what supported and gave power to Rome, why did these same gods not intervene to save Rome when it was collapsing? Augustine's answer is a brilliant philosophical refutation of the fundamental beliefs about the pagan view of the world.

- Many competing gods/truths
- High gods have great esteem (Zeus), but no practical power (Hestia seemed to rule all.)
- The gods are highly immoral and behave in ways no self respecting person would want to behave, yet we are told to hold these characters in high esteem and worship/venerate them
- With so many goddesses and gods, how can one know which is the right one to pray to and to what end. What if you are wrong?!?!?
- The gods/goddesses also seem to not care at all about the fate of humans and in fact, do all they can to bring strife and conflict upon them, not peace and harmony

These and many other reasons Augustine outlines as the faults, and thus the lies and falsehoods, of pagan religious belief. Christianity, on the other hand, offered:

- One true God, the only power/creator over Man and his world
- Salvation in heaven (an escape from the suffering of life) with righteous living and worship to the true, and thus operative/effective, God
- A moral code that enshrined the family, Man (patriarchy) and belief in one absolute truth (paganism = relativism)

With Christ made as a living incarnation of God, born of a virgin, who sacrificed himself for Man's sins, and who frees us with each communal eating and drinking of his sacrificial body and blood, there is very, very, very little intellectual effort required of a pagan mind – and this is key, a PAGAN MIND – to rationalize and accept Jesus as "saviour and Lord." It is impossible to not see the parallels to pagan god/goddess worship and practice.

I would also add that because Christianity focused on the patriarchal interpretation of the pagan world view (The Father and The Son), it made itself stand that much more apart from what was up to then, a purely goddess dominated human religious history. Goddess worship of Isis was one competitor to Christianity. Another was worship of Dionysus the transvestite. If that sounds familiar, you are not alone.

If you ever wanted a clear explanation for why many men are cucks and how feminism could take such deep root and hold in The West, look to 10,000 plus years of ancestral, female butt worshipping. For some men, kissing female ass is genetic.

Without the adoption of pagan practices/views, Christianity may have become just another Jewish cult. In fact, a well written book by a Jew on why they rejected Jesus as Messiah suggests just that. What if… Jews had accepted Jesus? Would Paul have turned to the gentiles? The author's conclusion is as stunning as it is simple; Jesus and his Nazarene followers would still be around today as an offshoot of a small, insignificant sect of a wider Jewish religious identity. But that is not what happened.

By adapting, Christianity become the ultimate syncretization of matriarchal (goddess) paganism and patriarchal (god) monotheism

The result was the creation of a powerful and long lasting patriarchal world view that bound men in common cause. This matriarchal pagan synthesis with patriarchal monotheism created a highly unique culture that did not exist anywhere else in the world. It re-birthed and united the best of Greece and Rome (philosophy and democracy) with the total triumph of patriarchy (man as head of house and state), now divinely sanctioned based on the absolute truth of reality: God is one and clearly male/masculine.

Which brings us to the present.

The Christian concept of God is now increasingly abandoned by Europeans because of its fundamental pagan formulation as an intellectual argument. A God-man? A virgin birth? Consumption of flesh and blood? What worked intellectually for Augustine to argue to pagans in the 4th century fails completely in the scientific 21st. While Christianity is not a pagan religion, you cannot deny its pagan formulation to appeal to a pagan mind. Christianity got a lot right and guided Europe well for centuries. What it got wrong has now brought about its collapse and coming take over by Islam.

Christianity had enough of the truth (one true God) to appeal and succeed, but enough falsehood (pagan intellectual formulation and rites) that in time made it bound to fail once again and for the same reasons paganism did back in the days of Rome's collapse.

What can we make of all the above historical context?

What does Islam have to fear from barbarian Christians?

Here is something to contemplate about any future "victory" for Islam in The West: just like Christianity taking up pagan concepts to become widespread after the collapse of Rome, Islam will be forced take up Western concepts (secularism, democracy, separation of church and state) as it becomes more widespread and adopted over the course of The West's (i.e Rome's) continuing collapse.

Remember: Christianity too was once seen as an invading cult by another long lived and glorious empire with a centuries old religious tradition and world view. Many Roman emperors tried to eradicate it, some more zealous than others. The parallels to Trump's ban on Muslims and the increasing backlash against Islam in The West should be pretty easy to see to those with an unbiased view of history. I am not betting that history will suddenly change course and chalk up a win for underdog Christianity against invading and militant Islam this time round. It is possible, but the history bookies are placing some very high odds against it.

Islam, for all its claims to be unbending and unyielding to change or reform, is not a monolith. It is a living religion like any other in the past. Islam WILL change with it's likely take over of the formerly Christian West. How is this possible you ask? The same way it did under Constantine. Once the dust settled and Christianity was accepted as the new religion of the fading empire.

If a pagan barbarian – today a secular European – wanted to succeed in life, his best option was to become a Christian

While true faith drove many into the arms of the Church, many others were driven purely by pragmatism and the daily grind of living and surviving in a social world undergoing cataclysmic change. With widespread adoption by both the masses and the political class, top to bottom, Christianity was forced to accommodate and include the majority world view of conquered pagan tribes of the day if it wanted broad acceptance. Also of note is that Christianity's adoption was not overnight. Paganism still persisted for many centuries until the states we know now as Europe came together and barbarian Kings like Charlemagne made a bloody push to rid Europe of all pagans.

Given this context from history, what is the majority world view of European barbarians that Islam might have to contend with, like Christianity did with the pagans? Answer: secular separation of church and state within a republican/constitutional democracy governed by the rule of law, not religious texts.

This is the fate of Islam in The West, whether it wants to admit it or not. For the sake of argument, let's assume the following:

- ISIS, radical Islam and 9/11 will be investigated
- the real masters behind this "radical Islamic terror" will be shown to not be Muslims nor represent true Islam at all
- Saudi Arabia and the Wahabbi/Takfiri CIA sponsored "Islam" will be wiped out (as Putin did in Chechyna).

If you hold these assumptions to be true, we can try projecting 50 to 100 years into the future, looking to the fall of Rome and the Rise of Christian Europe as a guide.

Islam in The West will be seen, as Christianity was, as a possible system that might be a good replacement for Christianity when The West finally collapses. Women, feminists being the first, will convert to Islam because of its complete intolerance for the feminine imperative and denial of gynocentrism. Feminists and SJWs will don hijabs and bow to pray to Allah not because they are virtue signalling but because a woman unconsciously knows her happiness lies in submission.

> Women are like Pokemon—they are designed to flourish most when taking orders from the ones they love. And like with Pokemon, the order-giver must prove his worthiness to the order-taker before wholehearted obedience is yielded.
>
> Why "Docility" Is The Best Word To Describe Femininity

This is Red Pill 101 basic knowledge. There is a lot, and I do mean a lot, of rage and cries of hypocrisy on our side of the culture war that just cannot understand or fathom how feminists are embracing Islam. It's a no-brainer for me: Islam is uncompromising when it comes to who is the boss in the house – the man. Are ROK readers really that shocked feminists are the first to submit to Islam in The West?

Women led the conversion to Christianity. Many young women are waking up to the lie that is feminism, the outright destruction of their own happiness, and are walking away from feminism in droves. Young women will see value in modesty and dignity and respect because the marketed alternative is Miley Cyrus or Lady Gaga. They will also see the reality of Red Pill men today that they cannot ignore – using them either for sex only or replacing them with artificial wombs. Lastly, I am betting just as many women as men can't or won't return to Christianity for the very same reasons I have listed above, but who want something, something, that is moral, true and of value to becoming a respectable and good human being.

Which brings me to a final question.

What would happen if the entirety of Europe's barbarian, "infidel" whites were to become Muslim?

Would all of us suddenly sport Roosh power beards and yell Alla hu akbar? No. In fact, as of right now, the first and most immediate benefit to us as marginalized and attacked European, heterosexual white men would be that we become a protected group, 100% beyond criticism by liberals, feminists and the left. The best advantage for white women would be Muslims can no longer rape them, since they are no longer "whores."

With widespread adoption and conversion to Islam by Europeans, as happened with Christianity during and after the collapse of Rome, our way of life would begin to take root WITHIN Islam and change it. Just like pagan views of a virgin mother and God-son found their way into Christianity, secular ethics and republican democracy will take root in Islam. In fact, this is the very schism taking place within the wider Islamic community and why you see "radical" Islam in Wahhabi and Takfiri form.

Radical Islam IS the response to the inevitability of change many Muslims fear will happen to their religion as it becomes mainstream in The West

Change and reform is coming to Islam, whether Muslims want it or not. Islam's contact and confrontation with The West this time round is not with Christianity in another Crusade as defenders, but with western secular philosophy and democracy as invaders themselves.

It is possible, by a slim but not insignificant margin, that Islam could save The West. But Islam will not be what it is today. The wide scale adoption of Islam by the mass of Europeans will have a cultural affect on its expression. This is why much of the ugly aspects of cultural Islam (rape culture, pedophilia, dogmatic radical holy text interpretations) are going to fall away. Fall away because they do not work for a European mind (and technically not a Muslim one, but I understand the anger and skepticism of such a claim), and it is in Europe that Muslims and Islam are attempting to take over.

One only needs to look to Russia, Chechnya and Team Putin/Kadyrov to see what Islam and Christianity, living together and not corrupted, can look like.

Conclusion

This essay is a speculative exercise to look back to history in order to glean lessons and facts that might help predict the future. I understand and respect many who fear Islam and Sharia law. If Europeans as a race completely disappear, the chances of Islam adapting and changing/reforming are greatly decreased. That said, us cis-white Europeans are not going anywhere anytime soon, and certainly not in the next 24 hrs historically speaking.

Trump's election, and very likely Le Pen's in France this spring, is now an unstoppable force for change and a return to national and cultural traditions and values of Europeans. But I would ask you, sans Christianity, what are these "values" Le Pen and Europe hope to return to? This is the question no one in The West seems to be able to answer in the face of Islam charging at it's gates.

As much as Westerners are fearing Islam's takeover, I can guarantee you that Muslims are far, far, far more afraid of us backward barbarians changing Islam. Can you imagine the shock in mosques around Europe and America if they were to be flooded with white faces seeking to take the shahadah? If the European race conquered the whole of the world under a false, pagan interpretation of the One True God that was Christianity, what would Europeans be capable of if they converted to, by Islam's own admission and call to faith, the true and final revelation of the One True God we already know and have a long historical relationship with?

I leave you with the following quandary I don't think I am alone in contemplating some nights before bed. If you had only two possible futures to choose from living in The West, (1) forced submission to the goddess and her leftist matriarchy, which includes feminism, LGBTism and the politics of race, identity and gender, or (2) voluntary submission to the patriarchal God of Islam and his Prophet (PBUH), which is a return to an Abrahamic faith that includes recognition of Jesus, the heterosexual family unit and traditional gender roles where man is once again respected, which one would you choose.

Read Next: The Newfound Alliance Between Feminism, Marxism, And Radical Islam

Maximus Decimus Meridius
Maximus is a Man, capital M, period. Love. Truth. Justice. Liberty. Respect. These are the lodestones pointing true to magnetic masculinity in a polarized feminist west. His goal for writing on ROK is to be the gadfly that provokes thought and counters groupthink. You can find more of his writing at A Dream That Was Rome . Com

5 Talents That Help Men In The Modern Age

March 19, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

As winter is about to come to an end, I hope you guys have all been working hard. Much as we may detest the cold, there's really no better time to get the bulk of your year's projects done, because warm weather always beckons us with playful distractions. But this brings us to something of a crossroads. It's very easy to think about what we want to do and the grand finale of our success, but creating a detailed plan of how to get there is another matter entirely.

This is where the concept of a talent stack comes into play. If you look at some of the most successful men in history, you'll see that they may not necessarily have been the best at any one particular thing, but they were really good in almost everything they did.

You can apply the same concept to yourself, relative to your ambitions. Scott Adams, who coined terminology to describe the concept, explains that goals are for losers. Winners develop systems instead. Systems work better because they can adapt and succeed in a wide variety of circumstances. This, he explains, gives you better odds of success in the long run. Your original idea might not work out, but you'll have gotten good at something you can take with you in your next attempt. That something you learned from your failure can become part of your system that will be there for you when success is easier to find.

Each of you will have different ambitions than I do, as well as different natural talents. The following, however, is a general set of skills that I think will be beneficial on every man's journey. They'll come in handy to taking every protagonist to his own happy ending.

1. Persuasion

No matter what you do, there's going to be some kind of persuasion involved.

Fortunately, Return Of Kings already sent you down this road by incentivizing you to get in the game and get good with women. By doing this, you're already getting confident, used to leading, suggesting, closing, and so on. The game will give you a better interactive and more enjoyable lesson in persuasion than any course you take or book you read.

Yet, because of the central importance of this skill, it's always best to learn as much as you can about it, because there always seems to be something new to learn. I recently read one of the best books I've ever seen on the subject, Unlimited Selling Power.

Unlimited Selling Power is a book that goes into great detail about hypnotic language patterns and conversational techniques that has already greatly improved my own persuasive technique, and I can't want to try them out when the day gaming season opens up again in a few weeks. Whether you're writing or speaking, the techniques work. I recommend you read this book as soon as possible.

2. SEO

Yes, it's true that the most important part of SEO is creating good content that people want to share. But it's also true that there's a lot out there that people tend to miss. Even if your content is good, you won't get much attention unless you put it through the SEO filters. In this, there's a lot of little tricks you need to know if you're going to be selling anything or building a brand online.

SEO is a needed skill, but the problem is it's somewhat hard to get good advice because the field is littered with "experts" that don't know anything. Be careful and don't hire these people. You can get good enough on the cheap, so don't even consider going to some expensive class or hiring some "expert."

For instance, one common mistake people make is with image files. Instead of uploading a file with a name relating to the title and content, they upload something like “4qMB37E.jpg.” Safe to say, this isn’t conducive in telling search engines what your image is about, so people will miss it. You may as well have never released your content.

You can get good enough at SEO with a simple book. SEO Step by Step is one I read recently like. It tells you a lot of things you probably overlooked. You can get it for less than $10.

3. Rhetoric

A subset of persuasion, its central importance is that, even in the digital age, you’ll likely still be doing most of your communicating and persuasion through the spoken word. The ancients considered rhetoric to be of central importance to a young man’s education, and if they could afford it, families would send their sons to study under the masters of the art, most famously at Rhodes, where Cicero and Caesar learned. This is but one more thing that modern systems of education are severely lacking in.

Again, getting good with women will go a long way in improving your rhetorical ability, as will learning the conversational techniques in Unlimited Selling Power. Podcasting and video making will as well. I’ll be reading Verbal Judo later this year for a specific book on the subject.

Here’s where I also ask you for help. 2017 is a year where I want to improve my rhetorical skill more than any other. Do you have a resource of your own? I’d love to see it.

4. Business Writing

This is a skill Scott Adams highly suggests adding to your own talent stack. The idea of business writing is to eliminate anything unnecessary and to get straight to the point. Too many people leave their compositions cluttered with unnecessary points and passive voices, which grow tiring to the reader.

Consider the following sentence:

“The item was purchased by the man.”

Compare it to:

“The man purchased the item.”

The second is far easier for the mind to comprehend. You may think you know that, but it’s actually too easy to wind up getting caught in passive voices or long-winded babble, and it won’t look good in anything you write, especially in your work.

Notice also that the word “may” was unnecessary in the last sentence. “You think you know that” does the exact same job.

These little things add up.

One book on the subject I’m planning to read later this year to improve this skill is Writing Without Bullshit. I’ll let you know how it is.

5. Web Design

You should know how to make a website look good and how to install the proper plugins and extensions. Sometimes this may require a rudimentary knowledge of HTML. As always, the idea isn't necessarily to become a pro, but to just know enough. For instance, at one of my web sites, I installed a chat box that greatly increased engagement and interaction with the site, keeping visitors there longer. I needed to know where to put the code for this in the HTML site template. It didn't take me long to learn, but the key thing is to familiarize yourself with it. A lot of people tend to think this kind of thing is "over their head," which means you can lend a helping hand – and win you more allies in the process.

Conclusion

These are only a few skills to add to your talent stack and your overall system. Having an eye for fashion, a system to improve your appearance generally, developing an appetite for risk, and developing knacks to sell a particular product are all important, but brevity requires me to stop here. This talent stack is only the beginning. If you have other vital things to add, skills that have improved your own odds, be sure to let us all know.

Read More: Why Women Are The Unfairer Sex

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

5 More Ancient Tactics For Modern Combat

March 19, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

As the political situation in the United States (and really the Western world on the whole) continues to deteriorate, and street fighting paramilitary groups have begun to affect political change through violence, I feel that it is prudent for all of us to learn how to fight, not only individually but in hand to hand units as well. And, several months ago, I did give you an introduction to a few tactics for street fighting.

But, as any classicist knows, our forefathers had just as much tactical diversity as the military strategists of today. And so, bearing in mind that I do not condone using these tactics for purposes of aggression, here are a few more hand-to-hand tactics that were used by ancient warriors, and still are used by riot police today:

1. The Inverted Wedge

The flying wedge discussed in the first article, of course, is a formation in which the unit forms a metaphorical "spearhead" to penetrate into the enemy's lines. The inverted wedge is essentially the exact opposite of that: two units stand abreast from each other, and successive units extend from behind those first two, culminating in a point—in other words, you march as V with the "opening" of the V going towards the enemy.

This formation is very useful for encircling some sort of tactical objective ie: enemy combatants, as famously shown at the Battle of Cannae.

You can combine the inverted wedge with…

2. Kettling

Kettling, also known as corraling, is a tactic often used by police to control large crowds. Essentially, it involves a large cordon of officers who surround the enemy combatant, and then move towards each other or in a given direction, pushing the crowd to whatever place the police want them to go.

Bear in mind that this tactic requires you to have a large manpower advantage over your opponents—but also remember that a mere manpower advantage does not guarantee victory if you are all running about willy-nilly

3. The Testudo

Recalling the shield wall from the first article as the most basic ancient infantry tactic, the testudo, created by our friends in Ancient Rome, represents the inevitable evolution of it.

Begin by forming a shield wall (tower shields work best), and then have a back rank of people place their shields over the heads of themselves and the people in front of them.

As you can imagine, this is largely a defensive formation—the positions of both ranks makes movement slow and cumbersome, and as I highly advise NOT to use spears, none of the ranks can really attack the enemy either.

I would recommend training this in conjunction with the shield wall: train to form this formation quickly to protect yourselves from projectiles, and then decamp to go on the attack. A failure to do this quickly led the Romans to several defeats, most notably the Battle of Carrhae in which they were pinned down by a combination of cavalry and archers in this formation and gradually worn down.

4. The Hollow Square

The hollow square is, again, vaguely similar to the shield wall and the testudo, with the main difference being that ranks of fighters form the shield wall in all directions, forming a square with an empty space in the middle.

This may be a bit difficult to visualize, so here is a picture:

The Battle of Waterloo. Note the bottom left corner, the British have formed a hollow square.

The hollow square in the middle can be utilized for a variety of purposes, such as auxiliary fighters, reserves, or logistical support—i.e.: medical providers, or people you are seeking to protect. And of course, you can combine the hollow square with the shield wall for added protection.

This tactic was on the cutting edge of military strategy from the Classical Era until the American Civil War, so it would behoove you to learn it.

5. The Human Wave

And of course, when all else fails, you can just form all of your men into a great thundering herd of humanity and point them at the enemy, with naught but elan and whatever weapons they're armed with, in the hopes of overwhelming the enemy before they have time to hunker down and prepare for you.

As you might have elucidated from that paragraph, I wince whenever I hear of some military commander referring to "elan" or "esprit de corps", because it's inevitably being used in the context of “tactics, logistics, and strategy being REPLACED by elan”. Many who have read military histories feel the same way, and from what I have gathered, those who are or have been in the military are likely to feel even stronger about this than I do.

Indeed, it seems more likely that doing a human wave attack will get you commemorated as a noble, valiant failure. Or at least that’s the impression I get from Kipling

But, when I studied martial arts, my master told me that spinning hook kicks and other fancy moves were taught not necessarily for us to use, but for us to know how they worked so we could defend ourselves from OTHER people using them against us. Similarly, I feel that this cloddish tactic should be fully understood so it can be defended against. I’d recommend the tried and true shield wall.

And, most importantly, you must practice these formations repeatedly, just like anything else in life. As some commenters in the first tactics article pointed out, your average group of schlubs may not cotton to pseudo-military discipline, which is why somebody really ought to write an article on how to instill discipline—oh wait, somebody did.

Read More: 4 Ancient Tactics For Modern Streetfighting

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

20 Reasons Why Modern Women Are So Unstable And Miserable

March 20, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

By all measures that feminists like to tout, Western women today have more rights, more freedom, more choices, and more privilege than any other time in human history. Considering how women are favored to be CEOs to meet "gender diversity" quotas, have much greater hiring preference over men in STEM field, are able to divorce and extort men using the state, and can ruin any man with false accusations, we can even say that women are now the new privileged class.

But in spite of it all, women today are actually less happy than their ancestors whom the feminists perceive as having been "oppressed," and furthermore, many are becoming increasingly unstable, violent, and toxic as they poison themselves with the toxic ideology that is feminism.

The following points will show how feminism actually damages today's women rather than help them.

1. They hold onto so much anger and hate

If feminism is so great, why are most feminists so angry and miserable?

Women infected by feminism hold so much anger that it is etched onto their faces. In fact, spewing hatred for men seems to be the only thing that makes them feel good about their own empty lives. It’s no wonder they like to come to our website to spew some of the most hideous insults, violent threats, and rampant sexist verbal abuse for merely having different opinions.

2. They blame men for all their problems

Women are strong and independent according to feminists. But that’s until when it’s time to blame men for all their personal and social problems. Since they feel entitled to have men behave the way they want them to and cater to all their needs, it's natural that the "misogynists" should be scapegoated if anything goes wrong their own lives. Feminism, not so ironically, seems to erase women's sense of internal locus of control.

3. They don't respect themselves

Modern women barely even respect themselves. They are careless with their life choices, indulge in destructive hedonism of alcohol and sex, go out of their way to purposely destroy their looks, and so on. Yet, they expect men to offer them unconditional respect just because they're born women. You don't deserve respect because you're a loud-mouthed feminist, you have to earn it like everyone else.

4. They embrace being disgusting

Feminism teaches women that femininity is sexist and oppressive, so it’s no surprise that many young women today are purposely making themselves look ugly and behave in a disgusting manner just to shock and offend people to get a reaction. It seems that even though they want to avoid whatever misogynistic standards that they perceive as being forced on them, they still can’t help but to engage in the female hobby of attention-whoring.

5. They try too hard to act like men

Women today are confused as they are pressured to go against their feminine nature to behave as men do. Instead of embracing the gift of their feminine qualities and their roles as wives and mothers, women today are trying too hard to usurp the male roles in the name of equality. Of course, this play-acting can only lead to inner suffering as their deviancy corrodes their emotional health.

6. They love outrage reading

Feminists are vain and insecure as well as loving drama. This is why they must constantly engage in outrage reading to entertain themselves. The more they read “misogynistic” stories and articles, the more vindicated they feel about their own miserable lives. They need a scapegoat to dump their emotional baggage on after being swindled by the lies of feminism.

7. They live a life of contradictions

Women are strong and capable, but they are perpetual victims who need government protection. Women want to be beautiful and garner attention, but they want to avoid being “objectified.” They preach about equality for women, but they still want all the privileges that come with being a women. These are just few of many contradictions that women must juggle with as ideology battles biology for dominance in their fickle minds. It’s no wonder they’re so crazy.

8. They don’t have children

It’s women’s biological function to have children. The fact that many women today are barren because they sold their souls to education and career makes them miserable as they are fighting their biology to live a life that is unnatural. And with every criticism, they'll scream louder and louder to drown out the ticking sound of their biological clock.

9. They spend their entire lives pretending

Modern women pretend to be capable, they pretend to be strong, they pretend that they're not offended, they pretend they're happy, they pretend they're in control, they pretend they're not sluts, they pretend they're a good person, they pretend they know what they're doing with their lives, and this goes on and on. All this pretending is taking on toll on their lives and the only way they know how to cover it is by pretending even more.

10. They don't have any standards

In a feminist world, all women are “beautiful” no matter what. So it begs the question: is there actually such thing as an ugly woman or is calling every single woman “beautiful” a way of living in a pretend world to preserve their egos? If a person told me that a hangover vomit was just as delicious as a cheese cake and that I shouldn’t be so judgmental, I would declare that person severely ill in the head. But this is exactly how thousands of feminism-infected women go about with their lives, describing fat, short-haired, tattooed girls who look deranged as “beautiful.”

11. They do too much alcohol and drugs

With women today drinking just as much as men while doing other drugs both prescription and illicit, it's no wonder that more and more of them are becoming unstable and crazy. Are we really to believe that a cocktail of vodka, birth control pills, antidepressants, and other chemicals will not lead to devastating hormonal and mental health consequences for today's women?

12. Their egos are bloated

A privileged Western feminist in essence.

With the society inflating their egos far beyond their true value, it’s no surprise to see women with extremely entitled and bratty attitudes who expect the world to deliver whatever it is that they cry for. This is why you’ll see grown up women throwing tantrums like children when they don’t get things their way.

13. They have unrealistic life expectations

Women are bombarded with lavish lifestyles shown on television and magazines that they seem to expect them as being normal. All women want the perfect man, the perfect career, the perfect combination of clothes, the perfect house, the perfect wedding, the perfect life. And if you ask them what they’ll do to achieve all that, they’ll give you a dumbfounded look. They’re women—they expect all of it to be delivered to them on a silver platter. They’re not supposed to make the effort.

14. They are short-sighted

Feminism fused with consumerism to tell women that they can have it all and right now. Women today rarely think ahead and seem to believe that they'll perpetually live the life they had in their peak years of teens and early 20's. They sun tan obsessively because it signals status, but they don't care that it will make them look a decade older in the future. They slut around thinking that they should have all the fun they can have, but they end up destroying their ability to pair-bond. They spend all their money on frivolous objects like their 20th pair of shoes, but they never save up. Women never think ahead because they expect everything to work out and be saved from consequences.

15. They are vain

Modern women drown in their own vanity with depth that has no end. Women constantly post pictures of themselves on Facebook, Instagram, and Tinder to fish for ‘Like’s and compliments. They are absolute whores who can’t get enough of the attention they are given by all the desperate simps. Their vanity distorts their perception about themselves and turns them into narcissistic demons.

16. They are too pampered

Western women grow up with such privileged conditions that they suck off their daddy’s money to live lavishly while criticizing men for oppressing them at the same time. The disease of feminism has made them blind to their own paradoxes. This is also why you have so many adult women acting like spoiled children.

17. They’ve been conditioned to seek bad boys

Women today are never happy with their relationship with men because they constantly seek bad boys with dark triad traits only to get hurt and take their anger out on other ordinary men. This is what happens when you allow women to have sexual freedom in a feminist culture. How many children are growing up without a father because of bad decisions made by their lousy mothers?

18. Male feminists and white knights give them unconditional support

Loser male feminists and white knights constantly defend women no matter what and end up warping the worldview of those said women. These pathetic men are the enablers of women's worst behaviors who encourage women to show even greater contempt for men.

19. They are slaves to corporations and governments

You can tell the feminists millions times that women are happier at home raising children and they'll just snap at you in anger to deny the truth. No matter how stressed and miserable they are, women will always defend their corporate and government jobs like how some abused women defend their domineering husbands. This is the power of feminist indoctrination.

20. They don't know what to do with their "freedom"

They tried drinking and partying until blacking out, they blew cash to go shopping every weekend, they tried traveling to exotic locations to take photos for everyone to see on Facebook, they fucked various men they barely know and cheated on their boyfriends for fun, they got their useless diploma by taking out a loan they'll never be able to pay off, they bought their Lululemon outfit and tried hot yoga, they decided to hop on the feminist wagon to feel empowered and to hate on men.

But no matter what, they still feel miserable and still feel like they need to "find" themselves. It's as if the more freedom women are given, the unhappier they get. They jump here and there for momentary pleasures, but they can't seem to find any meaning in life because they simply refuse to live like a woman. They bought into the feminist lies and now they are hollow beings drifting around in our modern world, constantly searching, constantly blaming, constantly dissatisfied.

Conclusion

None of the above wouldn't be so bad if it were just these women who are facing the consequences brought upon by their actions. But no. We as a society must all pay—especially us, the men. Men must work like mules to finance women's frivolous lifestyles, men must try their best to normalize sex relationships to start and maintain stable families, men must pay taxes so that women can live off of government benefits, men must modify their behaviors so that women don't feel "offended" or "harassed" in any way, and should our society fail, it will again be the men who will have to defend women and rebuild everything.

Feminism is destroying womanhood, and therefore, family and society, and it is only the men who are capable of putting a stop to this rabid sickness.

Read More: 10 Reasons Why Foreign Women Are Better Than American Women

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Why You Should Make Meals With A Slow-Cooker

March 20, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

If you're single and living alone, it's important to know how to cook nutritious meals for yourself on a consistent basis. Like practically everything else in today's world, you need to learn this skill yourself: no one is going to spoon-feed you. What I want to talk about today is an efficient cooking strategy that can optimize the time, cost, and nutritive value of your home cooking. What I'm talking about here is the crock-pot (or slow-cooker). Using a slow-cooker will save you a huge amount of time and money.

A crock-pot is a stand-alone "slow-cooking" appliance that is used to cook or heat meals prepared in one vessel. Think of it as the modern version of the cast-iron Dutch oven that could be filled with food and set by the hearth in colonial times. You may have seen these appliances at your local mega-store like Walmart or Target. Let me explain first why I think these devices are an important addition to your kitchen arsenal, and why you need to get one now. There is no real difference between a crock-pot and a slow-cooker.

The word “crock-pot” is actually a brand name, but has been used so often that it has become synonymous with slow-cooker.

Price

You can buy a good, reliable slow-cooker for under $20. Mine was only about $15. Considering how useful and efficient these machines are, this to me is a decision that should be an easy one. I can’t think of any other regularly-used kitchen appliance that is this inexpensive.

Lifestyle Convenience

The whole idea of a slow-cooker is that you can load it with meats, vegetables, or other edibles, set the selector switch, and then leave it to do its work. That’s all you need to do. There is no monitoring or checking involved. In fact, since many recipes call for cooking times of 6 to 8 hours (set on “low”) you can load it up in the morning and then have a meal waiting for you when you come home. This can save you a lot of time. Cooking is fun, but sometimes when we get home after a hard day, we don’t want to have to deal with food preparation. The crock pot gives you this freedom.

Another great thing about the crock pot is that it doesn’t just give you one meal: it can feed you for two or three days. So when you make a batch of food, you won’t have to cook for the next few days. You just store the leftovers in the refrigerator and then heat them up the next day. This can save you a lot of time and energy during the week.

Variety

The great thing about crock pots or slow-cookers is that they always come with little recipe books. The one I bought came with a book that had dozens of recipes for stews and soups of all kinds. There will be recipes in these books that you would never have thought of. And it’s nice to have everything in one place.

Another good thing about slow-cookers is that they encourage you to eat vegetables and beans. I am not exactly the world’s biggest vegetable fan, but I do like eating them if they are cooked as part of an entire dish, and if they are flavored and seasoned. Cooking with a slow-cooker relieves you of the task of cooking vegetables separately.

Preparation

Of all the kinds of meals you will make at home, I doubt you will encounter any that are as easy to prepare as meals made in slow-cookers. Pretty much all you need to do is put the meats and vegetables in the crock pot, add your seasonings and stock, and then set the selector switch to “low” or “high” depending on the recipe. That is all.

Choosing a Slow-Cooker

Choosing a slow cooker should not be a bewildering task. I’m going to give you my opinion on the things you should look for, and what has served me well. Each person, of course, will have to make his own decision on what works best for him.

When you go to the appliances section of your local megastore, you’re going to see a large number of slow-cooker options. These can range in price from $15 to over $150. Some look very sophisticated, and some do not. This my advice:

- Don’t bother getting a slow-cooker with a timer. You don’t need a timer. It’s just a marketing gimmick and is one more thing that can break or malfunction. When in doubt, the simpler or less complicated machine is usually better.
- Your slow-cooker should have a thick removable insert (preferably ceramic or other suitable material) that you can clean separately
- Your slow-cooker only needs to settings: low and high. That is all. Anything more than this is needlessly complicated. I am not a fan of these programmable controls on cooking appliances. All they do is break after a few uses and add to the cost of the appliance. Again, when it comes to machines, simpler is usually better.
- Your slow-cooker should have “legs” of some kind so that it is elevated when set down on a counter. These things get hot, and you don’t want something that comes into too close contact with countertops that might become discolored from heat exposure. Even if it does have legs, you should set the crock-pot on some kind of (wooden) cutting board when it is being used, so that any ambient heat is absorbed.

- Your slow-cooker should have a glass lid so you can see inside it when it is cooking. This is important, obviously.
- Slow-cookers are available in various sizes, from 2 quarts to about 8 quarts capacity. A single person living alone probably does not need one greater than 4 quarts.

So there it is. For a minimum of investment, you can improve the quality of your meals, save money, and free up a lot of time during the week. I think you'll be glad you bought one.

Read More: How To Make Beef Jerky

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Feminism Is Literally Killing Women By Telling Them That 3rd World Countries Are Safer Than The West

March 20, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> The night before she died, Danielle had met some British tourists at Palolem.
>
> One of them, Dave Woodruff, 37, said she was 'free-spirited' and 'really interesting' but that a group of about five [Indian] men 'would pull her back and say, "You're with us, remember?".'
>
> He told The Guardian that Danielle shrugged off the instructions…
>
> — The Daily Mail, reporting on the events preceding Danielle McLaughlin murder in India

Feminism kills. And for Australian Elly Warren and dual British-Irish national Danielle McLaughlin it literally killed them. Years of cultural indoctrination have taught Western women that they are supposedly in constant danger at places like American college campuses, but can "find themselves" Eat, Pray, Love-style in perilous Third World countries. Even with the hazier statistics-gathering employed in poorer societies, we can easily tell that this is an unabashed lie.

Compare this happiness and safety of Danielle McLaughlin in Third World countries to the sheer terror of the History major who fears being raped by one of her male classmates during a 200-person lecture at the University of Vermont.

Danielle McLaughlin's rape and death by strangulation in India is the most recent high-profile example of a white girl enabled by a self-infatuated professional feminist clique. Because the white male lower middle-class accountant back home, whether in North America, the United Kingdom, Europe, or Australia, is the true embodiment of all evil, women like McLaughlin are encouraged to spread their time in far-flung, poverty-stricken countries where tourists, who live like kings compared to the locals, are prime targets for petty robbery, let alone more painful crimes like mutilation, rape, or homicide.

In a development that will shock no one, McLaughlin was travelling alone. She certainly met people along the way, including the British tourists she saw shortly before she died, but for the most part did her own thing. This is quite remarkable. Here in the West, however, even a woman walking to her dorm at the University of Texas (or any other institution of higher learning) seemingly requires a SWAT team to protect her from fellow students in "rape culture" infested campuses:

In a similarly preventable tragedy, Elly Warren was raped and murdered in Mozambique, which even the leftist Guardian admits has a homicide rate around double that of the United States. And this is based on what we know, as public officials in Third World countries tend to be much less accountable and more corrupt than their Western counterparts. Plus, as I have already mentioned, statistical measurements are far less reliable and crime is probably grossly underestimated in these more indigent states. Authorities actually have an incentive to fudge the numbers, as desperately needed foreign investment, tourism, and aid often depends on the perception that public safety is improving. And far more cashed-up tourists are lucrative sources of income for local criminals of modest means.

Inexplicably, Warren's body was found in a public change room at a location popular with backpackers. Yes, that's right, in sub-Saharan Africa. The mind boggles at both the personal thought processes and the cultural conditioning back home in Australia that led her to this incredibly stupid life—and death—decision. Meanwhile, colleges in her native land, like the University of Melbourne, teach female students that an insidious rape culture on campus threatens to take them at any moment.

Who goes backpacking in Mozambique? We should feel for the family of Elly Warren, who was working as a volunteer for a scientific organization, but she threw herself into danger.

Thank you, Eat, Pray, Love!

Elizabeth Gilbert.

The film Eat, Pray, Love, starring Julia Roberts, is both a reflection of and a further impetus for women leaving their "stifling" homes in the West for so-called spiritually-fulfilling adventures in the Third World. It is the embodiment of what Danielle McLaughlin in particular appeared to be seeking. Ironically, if you look at Roberts' character Elizabeth

Gilbert, a stereotypical career-obsessed woman, she blames her American life—and, by extension, an implicit patriarchy—for her unhappiness at the film's beginning, rather than the feminist dogma really behind her "empowered" but miserable existence as a corporate cog.

The Roosh V Forum has duly noted that Elizabeth Gilbert recently secured a second divorce. She is childless at nearly 50 and now in a lesbian relationship, having spoken of her previous addiction to finding multitudes of men and sleeping with them:

> Seduction was never a casual sport for me; it was more like a heist, adrenalizing and urgent. I would plan the heist for months, scouting out the target, looking for unguarded entries. Then I would break into his deepest vault, steal all his emotional currency and spend it on myself.

And Gilbert can add yet another job description to divorcee, late-blooming lesbian, and self-obsessed cultural appropriator: peddler of doom for women who follow her example. Not every woman can come back and write a vapid account of how she became even more narcissistic overseas than when she originally left the West. Just ask the families of Elly Warren and Danielle McLaughlin.

The "Nazi!" effect

Who wore the title of probable "rape culture location" better? This shanty office in Calcutta or the library at the University of Minnesota?

The rise of Donald Trump in the Republican primaries and caucuses, the general election campaign, and now the White House has been greeted with calls of "Nazi!," "deplorable!," and "racist!" towards both him and millions of his supporters. And what's the effect, aside from leftists getting sore throats and beating up people, including from behind and the side like against Richard Spencer? For a start, these epithets become hopeless abstractions because they can be applied to pretty much anything or anyone someone doesn't like. Still, leftists' obsession with overgeneralizations has a much longer history, one that intersects heavily with the deaths of Elly Warren and Danielle McLaughlin.

The advent of radical feminism and the idea that all Western men are potential rapists or plain rapists has desensitized women to the true dangers both at home and in the wider world. Through SJWs linking things like a man looking at pornography to "rape culture," actual rape, where proper evidence shows an egregious crime, becomes rapidly devoid of its true meaning. Such madness has deleterious consequences, like men approaching women in some British metropolitan areas being called "hate criminals."

Nevertheless, the results of this mind-warping also hit women–and very badly. After being repeatedly told they have more to fear in the First World than the Third, they are primed to meet the sort of grisly ends that found Elly Warren and Danielle McLaughlin.

Read More: Western Feminists Continue To Exploit Women In Developing Countries For Their Own Gain

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The One Girl You Absolutely Must Approach Every Day

March 21, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Regular readers of this column will be aware that I subscribe to Roosh's formulation for making one solid approach to a girl that I have never met before. As Roosh states, approaching once a day is a 'keystone' habit that will inevitably lead to benefits beyond just sex.

What I want to explore today, though, is exactly which girl it is you should be approaching. If you only have one bullet in the gun, so to speak, then you want to ensure that it's not wasted. On that basis, my recommendation is that the girl you should approach today is the one who tugs on your DNA most strongly.

When 'That One Special Girl' Is a Concept That Actually Works For You

If you have read any game writing at all then you will be aware that the concept of ‘that one special girl’ is an anathema to seasoned players and is a mindset that you must avoid at all costs. But when we speak of ‘special girls’ we usually mean those females who men have put on a pedestal and coveted for a long time, ending up in the dreaded friend zone along the way.

So to absolutely clear, what I’m not advocating here is that you approach that girl who works in the marketing department at your office every day. That would be weird and very probably illegal. As I stated up top, this is about cold-approaching NEW girls who you’ve never met before.

Nor am I in any way implying that these DNA-tugging girls are any more ‘special’ objectively than any other girl. All of us are human, all of us are flawed. A girl is just a girl and we shouldn’t fall into old, bad habits of thinking otherwise. With those caveats out the way, let’s dive into what I mean here.

Troy’s Daily Hottie

Here’s how it is for me. I live in London, a huge sprawling city filled with a multitude of girls in their peak years (20s to early 30s) studying, working, acting, dancing, blagging their way into nightclubs, posting selfies onto Instagram and doing everything else girls in that demographic do.

Every day I walk to my nearest subway station and take three trains to the central district where my office is located. During that journey (and the equivalent journey home in the evening) I probably see several hundred girls. I work near London’s Oxford Street, which, as any day gamer worth his salt who’s been to the UK’s capital knows is the predominant locale for pussy panhandlers here.

Of those, let’s say 500 girls who register with me on some level, how many of them do I find bangable? Probably a great many. How many do I find hot? A much, much lesser number—perhaps five or six at most. And how many really move me on a base, DNA level?

Usually, one.

That’s right.

One.

That’s Her

Now, broadly-speaking I like pretty, skinny girls with long dark hair. However, within that designation there is room for a great many different flavours. As such I like Italian girls, Polish girls, Spanish girls, Lithuanian girls, African girls, Colombian girls, and a whole host of others in between.

But also like girls with very distinct facial features—high cheekbones, large eyes, a look that combines hauteur with a touch of naiveté.

I like long legs, cute butts and small breasts. But sometimes I like big breasts too. I also like the way that certain girls carry themselves—and this is where it all gets rather opaque and hard to quantify. I sometimes like girls who stride along confidently, but I also like girls with a certain extroverted diffidence.

Basically, what I'm attempting to express is in effect inexpressible, because try as you might to explain it rationally to another man, the actual reasons for your strong attraction to this girl over that girl are mysterious and probably not even fully apparent to you.

Nevertheless, I hope you understand what I'm getting at here. While I pass many girls every day who are undeniably attractive (or 'fit' as we say in the UK) there are actually comparatively few who really get to me. Normally, it's just one a day. It is that girl that I must absolutely 100% approach.

When I Fail To Approach Her

Now, for a number of reasons I don't always approach my hottie of the day. Why not? Well, perhaps I am too busy. Perhaps we are headed in different directions and I don't have time to deviate from my planned route. Perhaps I am with someone else (a work colleague, say). Perhaps I only catch a glimpse of her before it is too late. Perhaps I bottle out.

Whatever the reason, when ever I fail to approach one of these girls I will almost always experience a strong sense of regret afterwards.

Men's regret over missed sexual opportunities has been written about a lot over the years. It is something that we experience and women don't, by-and-large. After all, sperm is cheap, men are expendable and women are genetically more valuable than us, so why would a girl get too upset about missing out with some random dude?

But there are girls who I wish I'd approached from years ago who I still remember to this day. That is how powerful this stuff is. Not because I imagine they were special snowflakes or somehow 'better' than any other girl, just that I was drawn to them by a deep, biological urge to bang.

When I Do Approach Her

When I do approach 'her', the results are often surprising. It's worth noting that the approaches in which we are most invested (because of our strong attraction to the girl) tend to be the most nerve-wracking, even for the experienced player, simply because it feels like there is more to lose. Now, consistent daily approaching will reduce this anxiety, without a doubt, but still, let's acknowledge it as a 'thing', since it is.

If you can overcome your fear, though, and approach this particular chick you think is especially hot, you will be amazed at how many times the response you get will be more positive that that from an average girl who've you've only walked up to for the practice.

Without getting woo-woo about it, I believe that we are particularly attracted to certain girls for a reason. Our psychological antennae is powerful and we tend to be drawn most toward those with whom we have the greatest synergy. As such, some of the sparkiest, most sexual day game approaches I've ever had have been with the girls who I would consider to be the hottest.

I also believe that my strong sexual desire for this particular girl somehow insinuates itself into the interaction. She can feel it, she gets turned on by it, and the whole thing is exciting for both of us. When I'm doing a 'by-numbers' approach the girl can sense it and it isn't very much fun for either of us. OK it's great to be cool when hitting on chicks, but you'd be surprised how far a little genuine desire, vulnerability and even nerves can go in grounding your approach in real emotion.

What you have to do, then, is simply feel the fear and do it anyway. Don't bother yourself with 5s and 6s 'for the practice'. Instead, go up to your 8.5s and 9s. For one thing you don't really have anything to lose (a rejection is just a rejection, whether it comes from the Queen or a chambermaid) and I guarantee that you will frequently be pleasantly surprised by the responses you receive. And for another thing, the incremental benefits I've observed from hitting on the girls you want the most are well worth any temporary nervousness.

Want to find out more about how to approach and seduce sexy girls? Buy Troy's bestselling book, The Seven Laws of Seduction. Follow Troy on Twitter.

Read More: Why Abundance and Ruthlessness Are Needed to Get Hot Girls in 2017

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Female Police Officers And Soldiers Reduce Everyone's Safety

March 21, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

When the police and military are subjected to the gender diversity madness of the civilian world, we know something is wrong. And for a long time, the feminists have been getting their way in the security forces. Another good representation of this may be events that occurred this week in France, where a self-proclaimed terrorist successfully disarmed a female soldier at Paris's Orly Airport and put a gun to her head. He was then shot dead by the woman's colleagues.

Let's remember that this latest attack has come despite huge security efforts after the major Paris nightclub gun massacre, accompanied by supplementary suicide bombings, and the Nice truck carnage. Ziyed Ben Belgacem's father does claim his son was mentally ill. But the 39-year-old was clearly not mentally ill enough to target male soldiers instead of a normally weaker and less capable female soldier.

With France being potentially the most cucked nation in Europe outside Sweden, the nightmare this week begs the question as to whether politicians, policymakers, and rabid academics are grossly endangering public safety by not only pushing for more female police officers and soldiers, but also lowering physical and other requirements for them.

It is worth adding here that I have concerns about a number of men employed to defend our borders, police our streets, and respond to other emergencies. During a geological field trip to the small city of Grafton in Australia, I remember being struck by how unfit many of the dining male prison guards were. As you can guess, they were at McDonald's.

They may have had access to guns in the facility, but I fancied the chances of the inmates if any tried to escape.

Notwithstanding the lax physical fitness of some men, the unfortunate reality is that even many of these overweight chaps would fare better in their jobs than the petite women joining the police and enlisting in the military in record numbers.

Endangerments to public safety, anyone?

How to Fail Your Fitness Test and Still Graduate: The Rebecca Wax Story.

The events in France occurred against of global backdrop of police departments and military arms surrendering to the squawking complaints of aggrieved women. Want some examples? In 2015, Colorado Springs Police Department caved into the demands of 12 female officers after they insisted fitness tests were sexist. The requirement for any fitness test was promptly removed after the empowered women threatened to sue. In 2013, a male feminist academic said it was "unfair" and "sexist" that British male police officers were passing fitness tests more than their female colleagues. Hilariously, he jeered at the fact that overweight men were more likely to pass the test than healthy women.

Still, it gets worse. The Australian Army only insists on female applicants being able to do just eight push-ups, while the Navy and Air Force girls need only six and four respectively. And perhaps most bizarrely of all, a dainty UK police officer received a massive compensation package, worth £35,000, because she had hurt feelings because her hands were too small to hold her gun. By contrast, a UK soldier killed in Afghanistan would receive a pathetic £13,750 if a high-powered bullet fractured his pelvis.

Beyond those with weapons, the standards are being thrown out, too. A long time ago I reported on the bizarre antics of firefighter departments in America, where female rejects are now able to graduate after failing fitness tests. The funny thing is that we're told that women get their positions based on merit and not simply in fields that traditionally need fitness, like police work, soldiering, or firefighting. To what extent can we say that the worlds of banking and finance, law, bureaucracy, and corporate governance are really promoting women on the basis of expertise and value? If raw numbers like fitness tests are already being fudged, less immediately stark measures like job temperament and dedication are obviously being skewed in favour of women as well.

I could go on and on with these snippets. Together they create a much larger tapestry of neglect and willful endangerment of public safety. Feminists will prattle on about the criminality of men and the soaring numbers of male terrorists, yet they do nothing but heighten this danger by expecting female recruits into both the police and military to have a quarter of the fitness of average men who play social games of football on the weekend. We are already in risky times and the progressive (pardon the pun) cucking of our security forces is going to have terrible repercussions down the track.

When the shit hits the fan, will women finally want men to step up?

Inasmuch as the political and social climates of Western countries, Germany, Sweden, and the United States most of all, have stooped to new lows, things are bound to get worse with the present generation of progressivism. If public order truly collapses, it is fair to say that women may finally rue the "empowering" policies put in place to make their careers much easier–and to give them those careers in the first place.

Moreover, the civilian women who acquiesced to these SJW projects will soon be screaming for men to help them, realizing that many of the women tasked with protecting them are ill-equipped for the job.

Read More: Why Are Female Firefighters Allowed To Graduate After Failing Physical Exams?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Important Works Of French Author Michel Houellebecq

March 21, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Few authors who write good fiction say something real, substantial and relevant about Western society and culture. However, the Frenchman Michel Houellebecq (1958-) is an exception. Ever since his first novel, translated into English as Whatever (published 1998, 1994 in French), he has generated, although somewhat repetitive in terms of style and main characters, splendid, multilayered novels.

Even when he sometimes touches upon subjects that are even "controversial" (i.e. do not conform to general ideas) for people within the manosphere, he often makes good points and either creates laughter or encourages reflection. While his novels mainly take place in France, many of the discourses can be contextualized so that an American can draw the same conclusions with regard to his native country.

In this article I will describe and explain some of the core ideas that Houellebecq has written about in Whatever, The Elementary Particles (2000), Platform (2002), The Possibility of an Island (2005), The Map and the Territory (2012), and Submission (2015). I have also read some of his material in French, such as Lanzarote (2000), but focus solely on the English translations of the novels. Secondarily I will also make value judgments about the overall quality of each novel.

The sexual marketplace

As ROK writer Troy Francis emphasizes in his terrific article, Houellebecq was one of the first thinkers to analyze the sexual marketplace. This angle was mainly used in Whatever, in which the unnamed protagonist and his ugly virgin co-worker Raphael face the reality of contemporary Western social-liberal culture.

The semi-depressed and cynical protagonist has had sex, although it was about two years ago since the last time, and is thus not a total lost case, but prefers to jerk off rather than to compete for the meat while in a nightclub. His friend, on the other hand, is simply too ugly to bang and even considers to kill a more sexually successful black guy in resentment. It is misanthropic and not very uplifting, although the reality for some people.

> "Economic liberalism is an extension of the domain of the struggle, its extension to all ages and all classes of society. Sexual liberalism is likewise an extension of the domain of the struggle, its extension to all ages and all classes of society."

Whatever is not as well-written and multi-faceted as Houellebecq's later works, but quite entertaining and makes good points about for instance the significance of material wealth vis-a-vis emotional well-being.

Cloning and aging

The Elementary Particles and The Possibility of an Island focus on futuristic scenarios, cloning in particular. But whereas the former only has genetic programming as a frame, the plot in The Possibility of an Island alternately is about Daniel and his two clones, living as hermits in post-apocalyptic environments.

The real Daniel is an aging yet still successful comedian who manages to bang young hotties up to a point where even he becomes too old for his girlfriend. His hedonistic lifestyle can be looked upon as empty, but at least he is not miserable until he gets cuckolded. It is quite depressing to read about this process but also very realistic.

The controversy, especially spelled out at the end of The Elementary Particles, is that Houellebecq suggests that a world without men would be better and safer. I would leave it up to the readers to reflect on that.

Apart from this dimension, though, it is brimming with real-talk and sharp observations:

> "The terrible predicament of a beautiful girl is that only an experienced womanizer, someone cynical and without scruple, feels up to the challenge. More often than not, she will lose her virginity to some filthy lowlife in what proves to be the first step in an irrevocable decline."

Overall The Elementary Particles is better and perhaps his strongest novel up to this date. It features all of the main strengths of Houllebecq's particular writing formula, such as dark humour, sharp political and philosophical commentary, social analysis and human relationships (both regarding love and lust).

Sex tourism and hedonism

In Platform, Houellebecq deals with hedonism in parallel with sex tourism in more depth. The protagonist is a 40-year old sex tourist, who, together with his much younger and hotter French girlfriend Valérie, starts to reflect upon the ideal modern world: a place in which less prosperous people, not only Thai (although a large share of the plot occurs in Thailand), can serve the needs of the global middle and upper classes. Only aggressive traditional religions/ideologies like Islam can stand in its way.

About 17 years later we know that this type of world has not been realized, although in part it is still the case that men go to places like Pattaya to have sex with prostitutes. In fact, Matrix-like phenomena such as virtual reality and human-like sex dolls and robots appear to be where things are heading.

Platform is still an entertaining and engaging novel. Some of the characters, Robert in particular, remind one about ROK contributors and commentators.

Islamization and traditional resurgence

The conservative and traditional angle can fragmentarily be found within Houellebecq's earliest works, but in The Map and the Territory one finds a more distinctive penchant for pre-modern ideas such as Ferdinand Tönnies' Gemeinschaft (community preferred over society). For French people, a quiet life on the countryside might be preferable to the urban landscape.

There is also a connection between this and his succeeding book Submission, since the French traditionalist philosopher René Guénon is briefly mentioned in The Map and the Territory. In Submission his writings play a more explicit role in the realm of ideas.

Overall, though, the Islamization of France, is the core idea that Submission hinges upon. It is full of interesting observations:

> Hidden all day in impenetrable black burkas, rich Saudi women transformed themselves by night into birds of paradise with their corsets, their see-through bras, their G-strings with multicolored lace and rhinestones. They were exactly the opposite of Western women, who spent their days dressed up and looking sexy to maintain their social status, then collapsed in exhaustion once they got home, abandoning all hope of seduction in favor of clothes that were loose and shapeless.

Style-wise The Map and the Territory might be Houellebecq's strongest novel, which granted him the Goncourt prize, but idea-wise Submission is more worthwhile.

In summary

Even if many of these ideas have been covered by ROK over the years, and sometimes in more depth, Houellebecq is a great novelist and his books are worth reading only for the sake of pleasure (or for the sake of ideas). It can also be a way to red pill blue pill readers since he, despite the controversy that his books has led to, is a well regarded and award winning author. Strongly recommended.

Read More: Why Michel Houellebecq's "Submission" Is The Most Important Novel Of 2015

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Two Prime Spots To Meet Girls In Cebu (Philippines)

March 21, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

The Philippines is often mentioned as one of the most optimal destinations for love tourism and rightly so. The obesity rates are low (although slowly increasing due to easy access to cheap crap food) and the culture can be described as a representation of moderate modernity, meaning that some traditional and conservative elements play a key role (such as heteronormativity and femininity), while modern manifestations such as nightclubs, pop music and hookup culture also are visible.

The downsides are for example bad infrastructure, pros and semi-pros disguised as normal girls (if that is not your thing), and pretty bad food in relationship to price levels.

Filipina girls and the Philippines as a travel destination have been discussed numerous times on ROK and Roosh V forum, hence I will go directly to more practical details regarding meeting girls in one of the most optimal places besides Manila, namely Cebu.

Ayala Center Shopping Mall

Cebu is an island in the region the Central Visayas, and Cebu City together with the more middle class-oriented Mandaue City, form the urban centre with almost 3 million inhabitants.

Typically a person goes there to experience nature, such as the whale sharks in Oslob, but one can also spend some time in Cebu City and Mandaue City. Cebu City is poor and pretty depressing, much like the country in general, but just in the middle there is a spacious shopping mall called Ayala Center Shopping Mall.

This is a quite optimal spot for day game. Of course there will be lot of girls who are only there for shopping, and pros that approach or smile at you due to their very ends, but a person with some degree of sound cynicism and life experience can often distinguish these categories from another. Observe, make a quick judgment, and approach.

Ayala can also be combined with online game, and every wise traveler will do some prepartory efforts upon arrival, such as HelloTalk, FilipinoCupid or Pina Love. A couple of chats can lead to a date in Ayala, or perhaps you meet the cute girl that you chatted with in the very same place a couple of days after. Since Cebu is much smaller than Metro Manila, the number and share of normal 7s, 8s and 9s are obviously more limited but some sort of online game could still be fruitful, I think. The Philippines might be poor but almost every girl between 18-30 still owns a smartphone.

[image]

Liv Super Club

Depending on the extent of the stay in Cebu, a person can have zero up to dozens of friends, girls and acquaintances in his social network. Regardless of you only go for a couple of short flings or intend to stay longer – preferably renting a place in Mandaue City – you should definitely try night game.

There is basically one major nightclub in the Cebu metropolitan area, Liv Super Club in Mandaue City, and a few less good bars and clubs in Cebu City where you can head after closing, such as Mango Square. Thus head to Liv Super Club on the weekend.

The clientele is partly Chinese, who are quite numerous in Mandaue City. They behave well yet stick mainly to themselves, while Filipina girls are more open. One can meet the whole spectrum from relatively well-educated to poor girls (although not necessarily pros or semi-pros). With the same level of game as in Western countries a good man can likely meet better looking and more decent girls than at home.

My strategy in East Asia and Southeast Asia is linked to what Roosh calls world game (mentioned in my post about Taiwan), combining alpha looks and confidence with good education, money and sometimes gentle manners. Girls will hopefully see you as a catch and by means of a cynical, realist mindset you will not have to use your wallet to get their legs spread.

Basically have fun, approach, and meet new people. First time I went there all by myself, bought some alcoholic beverages in 7-Eleven, approached some attractive girls who bought me drinks just after entering the club, started chatting with a young cute girl, ignored some pros, met some guys who I hung out with, flirted with multiple girls, and then brought the catch to my 4-star hotel in Cebu City. She was wild and we had a good time.

In summary

Using a combination of online game, day game and night game, in conjunction with a tight world game approach, a Westerner can be successful. Thus I recommend a stay in Cebu, and if you figure out logistics you could definitely stay longer and experience much more. It is not a paradise but as far as my vast experience indicates still one of the best places for love tourism.

Read More: 7 Things You Need To Know About Filipina Girls

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

5 Things You'll Notice About Online Dating In 2017

March 22, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

You can debate the merits of online, day, or night game for all of eternity. Regardless of what your personal preference is, the technology aspect of dating is here to stay. Probably forever, to be frank.

Unfortunately, this does remove a lot of control from men and places it squarely in the hands of women. Of course, women can't be trusted with this—as evidenced by the ever declining nuclear family unit. At the same time, there isn't much we as men can do it, short of continuing our movement. It's one of those "play the hand you've been given" situations.

So whether you love or hate the technology aspect of dating, you might as well take advantage of it for the fast and easy sex. Here are a few thoughts on the state of online dating in 2017.

1. The Attitude Shift

In some Asian countries, online dating has been incredibly popular for years. For example, sex dolls are so realistic in Japan, that people are losing their social skills at alarming rates. Online dating has been all the rage—it's the "common" way to meet people.

This has started to also reach the West. No longer is it "weird" if you've met someone from online dating. Quite the opposite now, in fact. Telling someone you met your partner on the internet is just no big deal. It's the norm.

Whilst online dating used to be reserved for the weirdos, it's now completely socially acceptable. This is alarming in it's own right, because of how quickly this attitude changed. I think it was "weird" to meet via online dating as recently as 2012 or 2013. Just five years later it's cool. It just goes to show how many women have taken the follow the herd mentality throughout their entire life.

How it impacts you: On one hand, you don't have to worry about being judged by any women for using online dating. At the same time, any girl you are meeting online has met dozens of guys before you, no doubt about it. She might make up some story about this being "the first time she's tried online dating"—but I wouldn't believe a word of that.

2. The Tactics Change Constantly

It used to be that showing a good shirtless picture would actually increase your matches, response rates, and number of dates. But then every guy started doing it. Once the floodgates were open on that, it became a turn-off.

It seems that sans-clothes photos are okay under a few circumstances:

- It's not in front of a mirror

- It’s got some physical activity involved—playing volleyball on the beach with some hotties is much more attractive than you standing in your bathroom with a large turd in the background

How it impacts you: The game is simply always changing. What worked for night game many years ago doesn’t work today, and the same holds true for online game. Hell, this is the same case in entire countries—where men can observe all sorts of cultural changes in just a matter of years.

If you get out of the game for a consistent period of time (i.e. get in a relationship), then you can expect the next time you fire up your dating profile that the same tactics may not work. New platforms are introduced, someone posts their successful opener on a major forum, etc. You must continue to try new tactics to stay on top of the game.

3. The Platforms Are Constantly Changing

Remember when Plenty of Fish was the biggest and best dating site (okay, maybe not the best) out on the market? Think about how many different platforms have passed through since then. In addition to the traditional dating sites, there are now plenty of new "alternative" methods.

- Sugar dating—"exaggerating" your lifestyle on sugar dating sites to get the hottest girls. Then have sex with them without paying.
- Instagram—growing a large following and just sliding into those DMs.
- Other social media platforms (Snapchat, Twitter, etc.)—same tactics as Instagram.

There are always going to be new platforms popping up. You owe it to yourself to try most of them, simply because you don't know what will and won't take off. A year or so ago, I predicted that Bumble would be a catastrophic fail—because it requires women to make the first move. Most of you would agree that typically, if we put women in charge of the reproduction of our species, we would die out pretty quick.

However, it seems empowered 2017 girls are all on board the train of making the first move. I know several people who are having smashing success on the Bumble app.

4. Do Lines Still Work?

Almost every line has been used to the moon and back these days. If you Google "online dating pickup lines" and start copy-pasting to everyone in your radius, she'll have heard it before. Much like the classic PUA nightgame that was rampant in clubs years ago, girls used to respond simply for the novelty factor. These days, they tend to be constructed as weird, bizarre, and every girl's favorite word for a guy she doesn't like—"creepy".

Lines are the quick fix to actually testing different profiles, openers, etc. Yes, it's a grind—just like any type of game. With that being said, it's important to note…

5. Now, The "Normal" Wins

If there's anything I've learned in the last few years, it's that being genuinely "normal" and confident actually does work very well. Specific lines only work so long until they become played out. I think it's a reason you see many PUAs ultimately being distraught with the life. When you put your long-term happiness, stability, and mood based off of your results with women—guess what—you're destined to become miserable. Can women really be relied on for anything? Hardly.

Genuine time, effort, and hardship is required to make long term changes in your life. In regards to online dating, it means this: if you take the time to build a cool life for yourself, it will show through in your profile. This means you'll get more responses. This means you will have more success on dates. This means you will have more harem members easily accessible. All of this comes down to not having to treat online dating as a job—but as fun. And that's what girls are looking for these days.

They want to be unplugged from their drab day-to-day life office work, and the cool guy off an app is the way to make it happen.

Therefore, if you take the time to build yourself up, it's going to show. Online dating and other forms of game will all become much, much easier for you. You'll have the cool photos of your travels on your profile, and speak a second language fluently. You insightful things to say from years of experience in the game, and you'll know exactly what buttons to press when you've got her out on a date.

But most importantly, you have to remember that it's all just a game.

If you want to understand the underlying core concepts of online dating, you need to read Cracking OkCupid. For more advice about dating, check out my blog This Is Trouble.

Read More: Why Major Metropolitan Cities Are Hell For Dating

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

How Margaret Mead’s Bad Science Set Anthropology Back By A Century

March 22, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Margaret Mead was an academic celebrity; basically the Madonna of anthropology. She’s best known for utopian tales of life in the South Seas, depicting pacifism, matriarchal societies, and free love. Her cultural impact in the Western world is easy to underestimate (particularly as one of the voices leading to the Sexual Revolution), though there’s more to her story than that.

She got her master’s degree and Ph.D. at Columbia, home of many other interesting students and faculty over the years. She was married and divorced three times. Today, that’s still in the “you’re doing it wrong” range, but back then, even one divorce was a bit scandalous; likewise her bisexuality. However, she contributed significantly toward remaking society in her own image with the help of the right circumstances and connections. Specifically, she was studying under Professor Franz Boas, a man with an agenda.

The myth

No awkward adolescence, not much hierarchy, little religion, no jealousy, not a single luxury…

Mead's literary debut in 1928 was Coming of Age in Samoa. The year before she got her doctorate degree, she described village life on Ta'u Island, focusing on adolescence. As she told it, basically it was a carefree tropical paradise, lacking our uptightness thanks to free love. Here's a telling excerpt from chapter 3:

> And so the boy is faced by a far more difficult dilemma than the girl… [I]f he would win a sweetheart, he must have prestige among his fellows. And conversely, his social prestige is increased by his amorous exploits.
>
> So while the girl rests upon her "pass" proficiency, the boy is spurred to greater efforts. A boy is shy of a girl who does not have these proofs of efficiency and is known to be stupid and unskilled; he is afraid he may come to want to marry her. Marrying a girl without proficiency would be a most imprudent step and involve an endless amount of wrangling with his family. So the girl who is notoriously inept must take her lovers from among the casual, the jaded, and the married who are no longer afraid that their senses will betray them into an imprudent marriage.
>
> But the seventeen-year-old girl does not wish to marry—not yet. It is better to live as a girl with no responsibility, and a rich variety of emotional experience. This is the best period of her life… She has very little baby-tending to do. Her eyes do not ache from weaving nor does her back break from bending all day over the tapa board. The long expeditions after fish and food and weaving materials give ample opportunities for rendezvous. Proficiency would mean more work, more confining work, and earlier marriage, and marriage is the inevitable to be deferred as long as possible.

So for a Samoan guy to get taken seriously, he had to have real accomplishments (and social proof) under his belt. However, for a girl, lacking adult skills is no barrier to carousel-riding; continued “as long as possible”. This utopian social model seems rather one-sided to me! Now how does this seem so familiar?

At the time, it was rather groundbreaking for an anthropologist to hang out with the locals for several months to learn about their society. Unfortunately, she got most of it wrong. On the whole, her observations may well suffer from anecdotal generalizations; further, they seem colored by her own wishful thinking; but the worst part of it started out as a joke.

The reality

Anthropology: You’re doing it wrong.

Actually, the Samoans were puritanical, and she got several other details wrong too. As for the girls she got the information about their free love customs from, they responded to her probing questions by telling her what she wanted to hear, finding it deliciously funny to mess with this cub scientist from afar.

Derek Freeman, an anthropologist from New Zealand, moved to Samoa in 1940 to become a teacher. He stayed for three and a half years, learning the language, and becoming part of their local community. He’d read Mead’s book, but found society there much different. An irascible sort, he criticized Mead and clashed with her at a conference. She asked why he hadn’t brought his thesis over to her house the day before; he replied:

> Because I was afraid you might ask me to stay the night.

Ooh, burn! That quip brought down the house. Still, the worst was yet to come.

In 1965, he returned to Samoa for two years. He did some fact-checking, visiting the island where Mead had stayed. Word got around about her book, and the people there didn't care for her descriptions. Worse, she had hooked up with one of the locals, giving herself a very bad reputation. So she offended their morals, cheated on her husband, engaged in pretty questionable professional ethics, and then misrepresented their society to the world. Freeman was floored by this.

The revelation

When the three hour tour doesn't go so well…

When Freeman returned to academia, he spilled the beans on Mead's "research". That led to a three decade long tempest within the anthropological community. So controversial was his takedown of their great celebrity that at times he had difficulty finding a publisher. Mead's many defenders accused him of being the one making up stuff. However, since Freeman was a lot more familiar with Samoan society (she stayed perhaps eight months), the evidence speaks for itself. If that's not enough, take it from one of the locals:

> We girls would pinch each other and tell her we were out with the boys. We were only joking but she took it seriously. As you know, Samoan girls are terrific liars and love making fun of people but Margaret thought it was all true.

So it was all for the lulz. Mead herself noted how hard it was to get a straight answer out of anyone there; more caution and less wishful thinking might have done wonders. As a scathing article concludes:

> How could Mead get it so wrong? Simply put, it appears her desire to eliminate restrictions upon her own sexuality determined her conclusions about that of the > Samoans. For Mead, science was a form of autobiography, as is clear from her own life. She was married and divorced three times, apparently with the ease which she falsely claimed was characteristic of the Samoans; she engaged in numerous affairs with the same casualness of the fictional youth slipping off to the palm trees at dusk; and she was also bisexual as were the Samoans in her fantasy work Coming of Age.

>
> How ironic that Margaret Mead's anthropological myth, masquerading as science, could help to bring about a real sexual revolution, leading the west not only to casual sex and casual divorce, but the scourge of abortion. Such are the ways of the culture of death.

Mead's agendas

Academic types aren't always dispassionate, objective observers of the human condition? Say it isn't so!

That wasn't all. After the Samoan adventure, Mead wrote several more books in the tribal gender studies genre. One was Sex and Temperament in Three Primitive Societies, which had a pacifist angle. She said she discovered a female-dominated tribe in Papua New Guinea. That one became a big feminist hit for obvious reasons, though once again another anthropologist visited later and found things much different. Still, many took these idyllic yarns as the truth, concluding that this is how we should model our own societies.

Her greatest legacy was the Samoan fairy tales of free love. This book had a good bit of influence on young Baby Boomers, especially since it was all the rage on campuses. The same was true for Eros and Civilization by Herbert Marcuse, who later came to Columbia along with his Frankfurt School buddies. These two books, the latest hits in American academia back then (and still considered classics) contributed to the 1960s counterculture getting as wild as it did. That, in turn, led to today's deregulation of the sexual marketplace, unleashing a host of other social ills.

Mead's books generally push the social environment-cultural determinism line in opposition to hereditarian-biological determinism ideas. This puts full emphasis on upbringing in the “nature versus nurture” debate, denying that biology has anything to do with national character. (An off-the-wall example might be that ants act like ants because they grow up in an anthill.) This follows Rousseau’s “blank slate” idea, stating that people are whatever their society makes them. Thus, genetic influences count for little to nothing.

“Society is a social construct”

This is what happens when you tell your professor that people aren’t all the same.

Nature versus nurture might seem like a dry, scholarly debate, but it has far-reaching implications. Cultural determinism is a cornerstone of liberalism, more so for Communism. It implies that social engineering is good, and human nature presents no barrier to that. It also is a pat explanation to brush aside facts inconveniently contradicting their ideology.

Further, extreme cultural determinism means an individual’s woes are all society’s fault; personal choices are irrelevant. Therefore, dysfunctional societies cause crime, not criminal behavior. That illogical notion contradicts free will; a rather robotic conception of the human mind. It can’t explain why there are honest poor people or rich crooks. Much money has been spent sprucing up bad neighborhoods, with little effect. Handout programs don’t work either. The only thing that helped was getting tough on crime beginning in the 1990s. Holding people accountable for their behavior works.

Also, extreme cultural determinism reinforces the idea that immigrants from anywhere in the world will easily adapt to their host societies. (If a cat has kittens in a stable, are the kittens horses?) Some foreign communities do fit in, if they’re compatible with the people already living there, but others turn into an imported underclass. Whenever that happens, society is blamed for being intolerant. When the facts don’t fit the theory, they double down with the theory and break out the guilt stick. Thus, haphazard mass immigration proceeds at full speed, all according to plan.

Franz Boas, Mead’s consigliere at Columbia, also pushed the “societal influence is everything” line, as did some of his other front-men. (Further, he was one of the pioneers of the “race is only a social construct” meme.) Like Mead, it was later discovered he faked his research. Another proponent of extreme cultural determinism was Soviet biologist Trofim Lysenko, who put the USSR’s biology research far behind. Later, it was discovered he faked his research. Are we seeing a pattern yet?

Analogy and conclusion

"Hey, about your TPS reports…"

Suppose an American visits the remote jungle and meets a local tribesman, and they discuss their lives. The tribesman talks about stalking game for hours, and an unsuccessful hunt means they go hungry. Then the American describes working forty hours a week in a cubicle, enduring a traffic jam both ways. He must kiss up to the petty tyrant of a boss, lest he lose his job, which might happen anyway if the bean counters "offshore" his division. All this is so the rent, car loan, credit cards, and other bills get paid on time.

The American is grateful the constant risk of starvation doesn't haunt him; he can just go to the grocery store! The tribesman wonders how in the hell anyone would want to live like Americans. In any event, introducing ISO-9001 standards for spearing gazelles won't be helpful for the tribesman. Likewise, bringing a spear to work and praying to the voodoo gods won't help the American fill out TPS reports, though it might liven things up at the office.

It's good to study other cultures and learn from them. However, it doesn't follow that features of one society's way of life (even real ones) will always work just as well if you transplant them elsewhere. There indeed have been cultures with free love in various times and places, even if Mead's Samoa wasn't one of them. Because Western civilization is highly K-selected, libertinism is unnatural to us. Problems arise if you haphazardly throw out all of society's moral rules.

A culture includes a constellation of folkways and traditions that work together and basically make sense to the people accustomed to them. Even aspects that people might dislike are at least familiar and a known quantity, unlike the unforeseen consequences of implementing exotic concepts haphazardly. Changes have to be carefully considered, and Plato would have agreed.

Finally, Mead once said:

> Never doubt that a small group of committed people can change the world. Indeed, it is the only thing that ever has.

She was right about that one. Now it's our turn.

Read More: How Social Justice Warriors Have Been Infecting Science For Half A Century

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

10 Things I Learned At A Run ‘N Gun 5k Race

March 22, 2017 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

There is a whole lot of various training that can be had for firearms usage in the US, and one type that is growing in popularity is simulated exercises of tactical situations using a military rifle and a sidearm involving rapid movement, reloading, and multiple targets. Styled somewhat after today’s military tactics and adding a shotgun makes up the most popular version called 3 Gun. I was able to attend a rifle and pistol only 5k race, shoot, and obstacle course event this past weekend, so here are 10 things I learned while taking part in a Run N Gun 5k.

1. Running is not the same when you’re loaded up.

I had been running a few times a week, fairly slowly, doing some six miles or so at a time. Add in my 28 pounds of rifle, pistol, magazines, water, miscellaneous stuff and belt and chest rig to hold it all, as well as poor terrain with a lot of hills and mud, and my endurance was pretty close to zero. I managed a good jog over level ground, and barely above walking on hills.

This dude hauled 140 lbs of extra ruck weight with him just to be a badass and win the mule award.

Although this event had five shooting stages and a few obstacles, all the rest of the time, with the exception of a little bit of easy cave climbing, was spent moving outdoors. There was 3.5 miles of running that I could have gone much faster on, so there will definitely be much more running, with gear, up hills, and over broken terrain when I train for another one of these.

2. Bring the right footwear

I committed a cardinal sin and strapped on an old pair of sneakers that I had previously left at my dad’s house to fish in, and brought them back home last year. Although I do like my New Balance sneakers, and I had run some on gravel at my gun range, I noticed immediately running on pavement the first time that these guys were flat and dead.

However, the worst was yet to come. After the mudpits and tube-climb before the first stage, I noticed that both sneakers were blowing out and losing their soles. This turned into a full on separation (I shot stage two missing a sole) that had to be corrected with Gorilla Tape before I could continue. Due to the broken terrain, a good set of boots, while they may be heavier, is the right way to go.

Your author’s dead footwear, held together by duct tape and some dread game.

3. The loop sling is outdated

My only real expertise, other than hunting and shooting all my life, is that I teach three position field shooting with a couple organizations. Those use the USGI nylon loop sling, which is what I brought. Although you can do some nastily accurate shooting in field conditions with one, a loop sling does not allow any sort of carrying other than over your shoulder.

Pistol in the baggie was a good, but unneeded, idea for the mud pit. Loop sling is great for 3 position field shooting, but not so much 3 miles of running.

Most everyone at this event was running some form of multiple attachment two or three point sling that allowed your rifle to either hang over your back, or across your front, or both, without hands. Although I was rocking the Vietnam era iron sights with carrying handle (and that was how I carried the rifle, other than port-arms with both hands in front of me), I slung the rifle for carrying it all of twice.

4. So are iron sights

I was running a Colt Law Enforcement Carbine model AR-15, a M4 semi-automatic that has been out of production a few years as it has been replaced by newer models, with the only modification being moving the front sling mount to under the barrel. It has the M4 iron aperture sighting system, and is reasonably accurate.

A few problems arose, the worst of which being that I simply could not find a steel target at 50 yards because it was shaded. I nailed it doing an X drill with one shot right handed standing (I'm right handed and right dominant eyed), got the left handed kneeling in one shot oddly enough, did fine with the right handed kneeling, but lost it left handed standing. I had to shoot multiple times to hit it once, and timed out of the stage.

Irons are classic, rugged, and work well for accurate shooting, but sometimes you want or need a little extra edge.

While I do need much more practice shooting weak handed / weak eyed, most people run optics these days for a good reason. Considering that there was a somewhat ranged stage (300 yards, and at least I DID clear that one), I am not sure that a red dot optic is perfect for this, but it is better than irons. I think a variable power, low magnification, wide eye relief scope might be best.

5. Bring the right stuff

My thinking, after a very small amount of training for this where I realized how awful my shooting was, was to bring a LOT of ammo surmising that I would just shoot until I hit something. Problem is, these stages had 3 minute time limits, and there was simply no way I could shoot that much ammo in three minutes. I went with 120 rounds of 5.56 and ended up shooting about 80 of them. Pistol wise, I had 87 rounds with me and shot 51 or so of them. I did clear both pistol stages.

I brought those with me to the event, and took 7 of the 9 pistol mags with me (used 5), and the three 30 round AR mags, 2 20s, and left the 10 behind. I used 2 30s and 2 20s.

I did bring some water, a pen and notepad I did not use, and a headlight and spare, of which I did not use the latter, but the vast majority of my stuff was ammo.

6. Have the right carrying system

Future articles will get into chest rigs versus plate carriers versus battle belts, but, suffice to say I knew jack and shit about all that, and went with a cheap-ass chest rig off MidwayUSA and the inner belt without the big pad of a battle belt that I cocked up with some mag pouches and a Bianchi holster.

Ghetto as all hell, but the damn things actually gave me no issue at all. I did not need my dump bag, which is a pouch you unroll and drop your empty mags into as our stages were small and we had to run unloaded, which meant you could simply put your empty mag back from whence it came.

This guy chose a chest rig and a couple items on his belt to go mudding in.

I did not care for the chest rig thumping up and down as I ran, but it surely carried everything nicely. My friend had a nice belt system with an H harness suspender setup, so I may go that way in the future.

7. Wear the right clothing

Other than shoes, I almost got this one right. Nothing beats your basic military tactical rip stop pants, but a lot beats the shirt of the same style. Most of the dudes running had an UnderArmor style long sleeve shirt with a t shirt over it, and that is what I should have done.

This guy had good clothing choices, and I think this is where my shoes started to die.

I did start with a hat and a cheapie Walmart synthetic thermal top under the Army field shirt, but I overheated and ditched those fast. The debate was over overheating while running, or getting chilled while waiting to shoot if there was a line. I went for the latter as a concern, but should have gone for the former.

8. Be fast in everything

I ran slow. I shot slow. I got my gear ready slow. My run time was bad, and I did not complete the first two shooting stages in time, with the first one being because of the sights, and the second being because it was tough.

One way that you can see proficiency is being able to do something complicated fast and instinctively. I can do most of the tasks that my company's car builders do on the line, but I can't do them fast enough to keep up with the line. Same with this Run N Gun; I was able to DO all the things required, but had not practiced enough to do them within the time allocated.

9. Be humble and learn

This event was great for me; I learned a lot. Part of what I learned is that there are whole levels of this stuff that I do not know and that I can improve upon for the next time. I was woefully unprepared, although I did finish, and had a few moments of respectable performance.

The rope on the left was coiled near the top when I got there. Humbling indeed.

Part of what helped is I did not talk a big game. I joked about my shoes even before they blew up, and I calmly admitted knowing very little about gear carrying systems or the various tactical rifle slings out there. I did get some props coming across the finish line, two handing my rifle, with duct-taped shoes still (barely) functional.

10. These things are a lot of fun

I got to stay at the Park Mammoth Resort's Rockcastle Shooting Center, which is an old lodge in a side park to Mammoth Cave that was bought and turned into a shooting facility. You can, and I did, walk straight out the lobby door with a bunch of firepower strapped on, and they have good food.

I got to shoot in a fucking cave! One of the pistol stages involved running in an underground dry creek bed and double tapping IDPA targets as you go by. I even one handed gangsta style sideways shot a target since it was right there while in the middle of a tactical reload with my other hand.

Stage 3, the cave.

I had a wonderful time in spite of doing badly at it, and I will do other events of this kind in the future.

Conclusion

Main thing I learned is that this type of shooting requires its own skills (including a LOT of cardio) and its own type of gun and accessories as well as its own gear and clothing selection. I think, if I practice a lot more, upgrade my rifle with some bolt on goodies, and get some damn boots, I shall do much better next time. I'll be sure to put down what I learn in future articles so you can learn from my mistakes. Until then, be safe.

Read More: 5 Firearms A Man Should Own

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

4 Ways That Western Women Are Ruining Themselves

March 23, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Women are the foundation of any successful civilization because culture passes from mother to child. But in the name of "liberation," Western women have adopted a number of traits that make them utterly unsuitable for handing on Western civilization. Here are four ways they are ruining themselves.

1. Promiscuity

Western women ruin themselves through sleeping with a lot of different men before they get married. This means the average girl that you meet while dating has already had sex with several different men before meeting you, and given the wide availability of porn, you can bet that this sex was not limited to the missionary position. It is also safe to assume that there are compromising photos and videos of her on the phones of various men.

This is a gigantic problem because exclusivity is the foundation of a man's love for a woman. This is especially true for young men who have not been married before. There has to be an element of, "this girl is mine and no one else's." Female promiscuity before marriage robs men of this certainty. This is why one reason so many men are unwilling to get married. Why risk a potentially expensive divorce for a woman who has slept with the entire roster of her college football team?

But even apart from promiscuity's effect on bonding between a man and a woman, prior sexual partners can wreak havoc on a marriage in very practical ways. Once a woman has been with a particular man, it is very easy for her to fall back into a physical relationship with him. How many marriages have been destroyed by old flames rekindling a physical relationship through social media?

Don't expect the promiscuity to be reversed any time soon. From an early age, girls are taught that promiscuity is empowering. One glance at the Cosmopolitan website, a magazine read primarily by young, unmarried women, will demonstrate that their articles presuppose that women will slut it up.

2. Tattoos

As a man, one of the most beautiful things in the world is fair, unblemished skin of an attractive woman. There's a good biological reason for this: Skin color and tone is a good indicator of health. If a person has blotchy skin or lots of blemishes, it is a sign that they are not healthy and therefore not a good person to reproduce with. Tattoos interfere with this natural signaling of reproductive fitness. By putting artificial blemishes on her skin, an otherwise healthy woman is inadvertently telling men that she is not a suitable wife and mother.

Like promiscuity, a man can sometimes look beyond a woman's tattoos, but it takes some effort.

3. Careerism

> I am officially coining the term PINKPILLED: when you finally see the garbage in rah-rah lean-in corporate feminism https://t.co/L3n3ph8LB9
>
> — Katie Notopoulos (@katienotopoulos) March 17, 2017

A woman's natural role is to be a wife and a mother. A man's natural role is to be a husband, father, and provider. This is not some artificial norm foisted upon us by some imaginary patriarchy, this is the natural order of things. In the modern day, men still carry forward the idea of being husbands and fathers, but something terrible has happened to our women. Young women are now subjected to years of indoctrination that teaches them to regard motherhood as something demeaning. Instead, women are led to believe that true fulfillment can only be found through a career.

This has led many modern women to distrust their own desires. They may secretly want a domestic life but feel obliged to get a degree followed by years of slaving away in a corporate cubicle farm. This chews up a woman's prime childbearing years. By the time women start having children, their hope of having a large family is already over. They've already become addicted to their salary so they are never able to break themselves free from their corporate drone status. This means the very best people in our society do not reproduce at replacement rates.

Loading…

I am happy to report that there is a glimmer of hope that things may change. An editor at Buzzfeed recently noted that "rah-rah lean in corporate feminism" is "garbage." Is it possible that young women will finally realize that they have been tricked by corporations to exchange the best years of their lives improving the stock values of a handful of wealthy men? If they do, I will feel vindicated.

4. Ghettofication

Ghettofication poster child Iggy Azalea. Her music is rap. She only seems to date black guys. And her butt is strangely enormous on an otherwise normal girl.

There was a time when Americans aspired to high culture. In the early years of the US, even the coarsest Americans tried to engage the best literature. French writer Alexis de Tocqueville remarked on this amazing phenomenon:

> There is hardly a pioneer's hut that does not contain a few odd volumes of Shakespeare. I remember that I read the feudal drama of Henry V for the first time in a log cabin.

During first half of the 20th Century, the thirst that average Americans had to learn about the world around them gave rise to the great general news magazines, such as Time. Walt Disney pumped out cartoons that introduced audiences to classical music and European culture. And early television programming would mix in highbrow theatre along with the more popular fare. Americans wanted to better themselves not just financially, but culturally.

What a change in the last 50 years! Americans have gone from seeking the best to chasing after the most degraded culture. Young women in particular have adopted the worst of black culture. They listen exclusively hip hop music and social media is now filled with pictures of white women with preternaturally large butts. But it is not just whites who are being hurt by ghettofication, blacks too have been pulled down.

The ghettofication of American women is an alarming trend because it promotes promiscuity, having children out of wedlock, and poor life habits. Unfortunately, these ghettofied young women are also reproducing which means they will pass a trash culture to their offspring.

Conclusion

It's easy to blame women for all of this but it is not that simple. Most people are natural followers. They will obediently follow any dictates that their leaders put forth. This is a good thing because not everyone can be a leader. It would result in chaos. And, in a well-ordered society, it works: Benevolent leaders guide their people with the same care that a father guides his child. The problem is that we do not live in a well-ordered society so both women and men end up following the wrong types of people.

We live in a culture where all the institutions are firmly under the control of progressives who are gradually phasing out every aspect of traditional society and replacing it with degeneracy. Children who are brought up in this environment will adopt the teachings that have been drummed into them by years of school and media indoctrination. Some males, for whatever reason, have the ability to "wake up" from the progressive delusion. This is what the red pill is. Still, the majority of men stay asleep and blindly parrot the teachings that have been instilled in them by their globalist masters. Count yourself lucky if you are in the red pill minority.

Some women also demonstrate the ability to overcome their programming, but it seems like there are a lot fewer of them are awake to what is going on. While everyone is responsible for their own actions, it is not a surprise that many young women follow the advice they've received and end up ruining themselves in the process. That doesn't make it any less devastating to single men who are looking for a suitable wife, but it helps us understand how we got into this mess and how we can stop it from happening in the future.

Read More: How Girl Power Is Ruining Western Culture

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

5 Painfully Annoying Types Of Backpacker Girls

March 23, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Travel is arguably one of the most pleasant experiences in a mans life, especially when it's an opportunity to cut loose from the expensive, feminist, and over-regulated western world.

Outside of "The Matrix," a greater sense of adventure and higher quality women inevitably await those who have some decent social skills and game. Particularly in places like Southeast Asia, South America, or Eastern Europe.

However, the west also sends some of the dregs of their females along for the ride, which you are inevitably going to have to put up with on a semi-regular basis while backpacking. This article will explore five of the most glaringly obvious.

1. The Obnoxious Aussie Girl

> A lot of Australian girls are like skunks. Some of them can be pretty cute, but I probably wouldn't take one home to show Mom and Dad anyway.

Women from all western countries tend to get a lil' cray-cray on the drinky-drink while they are on their travels, but Australian girls often take it to such an over-the-top level that they are worthy of their own alliterative title.

Along with their culturally similar New Zealand counterparts (who have less than 1/5th the comparative population), Australian girls probably consume more booze, and loudly spew more profanity and stomach lining than pretty much all others when overseas.

Additionally, as others have pointed out, young Australian women also tend to be very aloof and interpret kindness, rationality, good manners, and calm dispositions as big weaknesses in the sexual marketplace.

Only Alpha males, and to a smaller extent Sigma males, will have any measure of success with them. But when you are in one of the global you-know-what paradises of Southeast Asia, South America, or Eastern Europe, why would you even bother with C(unt)-grade Kangaroo meat?

2. The "Semester Abroad" American Girl

Daddy is paying for me to fuck Aussies in Europe!

To be fair, a lot of these girls can be really nice, particularly if they are from less SJWey parts of the country like the South or Midwest, but the general sentiment is almost always the same. There is just something uniquely irritating about this sub-category of backpacker girls.

Usually white (but highly disproportionately Asian-American as well), these young women should be the poster child of global privilege and over-nurturing.

Often coming from upper middle-class or even moderately wealthy backgrounds, they have never had to struggle for essentially anything in their lives, and in the event of poor decision-making, their gender has ensured that white knight orbiters and sympathizers will relieve them of any personal responsibility.

They can often be found in groups of at least three or four, wandering old streets speaking in an irritating vocal fry tone at least five decibels louder than the next loudest person, and are like soooooo amazed that they can drink in bars and clubs before they are 21!

The semester abroad girl can almost exclusively be found in an almost hassle-free first world country like Australia, New Zealand, United Kingdom, Spain, Italy, or Japan. Black or Brown areas of the world like South Africa or Latin America are simply too dangerous for daddy's precious little girl.

3. The Donald Trump Apologist American Girl

Like, oh my gawwwwd you guys! We are soooooo sorry about him! Not my President!

Often shares a great deal of similarity with the "semester abroad" American girl, though is not necessarily a university student. The Donald Trump apologist takes their liberal sensibilities to such a self-conscious level, that they feel compelled to completely hide their nationality or immediately apologize to any non-American for whatever Republican has been elected the new commander-in-chief.

She is prone to say things like "not my President!" or "I'm one of the good ones. I promise!" or "In San Francisco/Austin/Portland we are really cool. Not like the racist Trump parts of the country!". You get the idea.

This girl has a special affinity for sewing a Canadian flag on her backpack (where she wishes she was either born or desires-to-move-but-won't) and also takes a particular liking for the Scandinavian countries with all their "tolerance" and social democracy.

An overall vapid and air-headed specimen who has nothing positive to say about her country, and will socially and sexually ostracize any man who speaks anything complementary about the Donald or agrees with any right-wing talking points.

4. The Spinster-In-Training

Still downing those buckets ay?

High probability “Mother Merkels” and cat collectors of the not-too-distant future, these are single traveling women who have exceeded their 33rd birthday but have not quite reached 40. They are not yet middle aged, but any resemblance of youth, vitality, healthy fertility, and general SMV is now fading fast.

The spinster-in-training has been riding the carousel for 13+ years, and somehow failed to latch onto a nice beta-male provider husband during her epiphany phase (late 20s). Accordingly, the best thing to do is just keep peter-paning around the world and partying.

Some of these women are delusional enough to think that similarly aged backpacker men might even fall in love with them, and finally get offered a rock (diamond). However, they are blissfully unaware that high value 30-something backpacker men are almost exclusively chasing women the greater part of 10 or even 15 years younger than them, especially for any potential long-term attachment.

Lucky for them, due to pervasive male thirst they will still be able to get dicked on the regular if they desire. The only catch is it will increasingly come via dating apps like Tinder, where they are clearly treated as a 2nd or 3rd tier choice for many men who only set their age dial above 30 when their options with younger women are exhausted.

The spinster-in-training can otherwise be quite a pleasant lady (politeness and humility often being a result of a woman’s lower value hierarchy in the sexual marketplace), but her mere existence is incredibly irritating for the good of the traveller community and western civilization as a whole. They “inspire” and act as an enabler for younger backpacker girls to eventually become just like them.

5. The ‘Social Justice’ Degenerate

Glad she lives in Canada or New Zealand (because Donald Trump reasons)

Finally, we have the social justice degenerate. You don’t immediately know what country she is from, but it’s highly likely to be an overly feminist English-speaking country like Canada or New Zealand, and you will definitely see her when you see her.

Blue hair, rampant tattooing, bull rings, or hipster glasses are dead giveaways visually, while her abundance of profanity or drunken mantras about “equality” and “racism” will be like sand grinding in your ears.

She’s also probably the chubbiest girl in the hostel too, who acts as the highly unwanted photo-bomber in more bikini-friendly travelers destinations.

The one saving grace of the social justice degenerate is that you don’t even have to speak with them in order to figure out they aren’t worth your breath (or your game plan).

Read More: Why Do Feminists And Social Justice Warriors Use So Much Profanity?

John Carver

John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

The 5 Stages Of The Voodoo Economy

March 24, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

After the two world wars ended, the European nations which molded the very civilization the world enjoys today, retreated in prominence, as America rose in wealth and power.

The New Economy

In the post-war period, a new economic model emerged. One based on debt, not savings and wealth. America in 1960 was the world's largest creditor, became a debtor nation in 1985, and is now the world's largest debtor.

Central banks manufacture credit, which is then lent to the public through various means (in the US, this is done by the Federal Reserve issuing Treasury Notes, which must be repaid with interest).

The interest used to repay these obligations will be created by future treasury notes, as the total amount of currency today does not exist to extinguish the issued debt. In order to sustain this system, an implicit requirement is perpetual growth.

While there are still comparatively many economic opportunities in America today, and indeed I consider its economic opportunities the #1 benefit of living in America, real wages peaked in the 1960s. We are experiencing a gradual decline.

The direct effects of this new economic system are (1) decreasing real wages (2) societal upheaval and (3) globalism.

Prioritization Of Greed

The modern globalist capitalist economic model values sales and revenue above all, no matter the consequences. The goal is to earn more and more wealth and power for the international elitists, at the expense of everyone else, no matter the financial, social, or moral cost to everyone else.

In America, the economy must grow by at least 3% every year, or the system breaks down.

While America is the wealthiest nation in the world by raw income figures, the average worker struggles to meet basic needs, is lucky to have 2 weeks of vacation a year, and struggles to save even 5% of his income. Indeed, almost 70% of Americans have less than $1,000 in savings. And this worker must push to increase profits for his corporation every year.

The Debt Based Economy – A Tool For Transferring Wealth

The most obvious side effect of this system was that prices, which fluctuated by less than 10% per year for the entirety of American history, suddenly exploded. In a debt based model, the banking class controls ever-growing amounts of credit, and debtors are obligated to transfer more and more of their wealth to the banking sector, whether through explicit interest or implicit inflation.

The above graph is clearly artificial and unsustainable. When one considers that real wages are lower today than they were in 1960, the obvious question is how such a huge increase in prices was achieved. The system was effectively juiced over four major phases.

Phase One – Women In The Workplace 1960s

The first and most drastic step was to essentially double the number of wage earners. This phase alone deserves an article in itself, as it is the foundation for so much: Wages declined as the supply of labor skyrocketed, women and men were now adversaries competing for the same labor, which led to conflict and radical feminism, at the expense of harmony and cooperation.

WTF Am I Doing Here?

Sexual norms and customs went out the window. Women were traditionally slut shamed by men, but now men lost a large part of their power, as they were now directly competing with women for the same wages, and women no longer needed a man to provide for her basic needs. A man become an option, and many opted out of forming families.

Wives entered the workforce and no longer cooked and cared for their men which drove demands for home cleaning services, education and daycare, restaurant and tv dinner sales, and eventually increased medical expenditures when families became sick from lack of healthy food.

Is this REALLY society's most valuable use of its women?

Food became commoditized and lead to factory farming with hormone treatment to create as much meat as possible at the lowest price. The population became overweight, which created demands for diet and exercise services, gyms, psychologists, pharmaceutical companies, lawyers to sue said companies when drugs like phen-phen were found to be dangerous, and doctors, nurses, and mobile scooter manufacturers to care for an obese, aging population who was perpetually sick due to poor diet and lack of nutritious, home cooked meals.

Honey, look at all the stuff we need to buy to replace me!

The result was twofold: a significant drop in wages, and a huge increase in the demand for more products and services that corporations could sell – TV dinners, maid services, and tutors which provided generally inferior services than a wife would, at higher prices. Yet the goal of increasing the overall size of the economy (at great expense to social costs) was achieved.

Most of us have grown up with women always in the workforce, but consider a world where men worked and women supported their husbands physically (in the home), emotionally, and sexually. Does society need them in the office? What do we sacrifice by sending them there? A woman's natural skills of raising families are laudable and honorable, and Childcare Corporation USA, Inc and Swanson's are doing a comparatively poor job of replacing her.

Phase Two – Credit Cards And Debt 1970s

When the entirety of the dual wages of working wives and husbands was exhausted, the rules were changed to allow consumers to spend money they didn't yet have. The Master Charge was issued in 1969, and Visa in 1976. People could now spend virtual money that they would pay, theoretically, at some point in their future lives.

Selling to ego-validating narcissists

While debt may be more convenient, allowing us to purchase things earlier than we would have if we had to save to buy them ourselves, realize that it doesn't increase the amount of goods or services one can buy. It actually shrinks them in two important ways.

First, a person's wages do not change if he uses credit, meaning any dollar he spends on interest payments is one less dollar he has for consumption or savings, meaning the overall pie of disposable income is smaller, and the amount of the economy going to the international banking class is larger.

15% reduction in disposable income, due to credit cards

Second, debt causes prices to rise, as it increases demand (demand being the desire AND ability to purchase something), further shrinking disposable income.

Phase Three – Globalization 1980s

Factories moved abroad where production costs were lower. This had the effect of further lowering wages in America, as workers were now essentially competing with foreigners who worked below the legal minimum wage in America, and costs of products went down, which allowed higher sales and more profits for the capitalists.

At the same time, men lost the ability to support families on a single income, and more importantly, lost the work that gave them meaning and purpose. They were told to retool for the “new” economy, sitting in front of a video machine pressing buttons.

As a commenter to ROK recently put it,

> We no longer repair and keep. We replace and upgrade. This applies to people, not just objects. Loyalty is dead and greed killed it.

Phase Four – The Mortgage Industry 1990s

Goal is to target all green areas

While many cannot imagine buying a house without a mortgage, realize that mortgages barely existed for most of American history. Indeed America is one of the few nations in the world so heavily reliant on mortgage lending.

Prior to the government intervention in 1970 when the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation was created, mortgages were rarely used in home purchases, and were negotiated by banks deciding what return they would like to receive in exchange for lending you their assets.

Terms were far shorter than today's 30 years, and rates were higher, reflecting real risks. Can you imagine choosing to lend someone $1,000 for 30 years and accepting only $40 each year in return for making this risky investment, and tying up use of your funds for a large portion of your life?

No, and bank loans never looked the way they do today until the federal government guaranteed banks money they could lend out for long terms at low rates, with guarantees of repayment. The result was huge increases in the price of housing, and a lifetime of paying debt to the international capitalist interests.

Typically a man will buy a home at age 35, paying interest his entire working life until retirement at age 65, when the mortgage debt is finally extinguished. Never before did men have to work their entire lives just to afford a place to live.

Phase Five – No Bullets Left In The Chamber?

Since the 1990s, the economy has been stagnant. Realize that all of the phases above are singular emergency tactics. While they provide a temporary one time boost at the time they are implemented, there are no continuing benefits thereafter.

Having credit cards today does not allow any further growth in the economy; it merely allowed consumption to go up from one rate in the 1970s to a higher rate, at the expense of lifetime income.

Giving someone a home equity loan provides a one time boost when it closes, giving the borrower a big pool of money he can buy things with, but his overall long term disposable income is lower, as a significant portion of his wages will be diverted to bank interest payments.

The US debt clock reports that we owe foreign debtors almost $6 trillion dollars at present, with total government debt of over $200,000 per citizen. The median personal income in the US is $30,240. Simple math tells you this will never be repaid. If taxes were raised by $10,000 per person every year (assuming one could possibly confiscate 1/3 of wages), it would take 20 years to merely eliminate existing debt (at that point we would have accumulated 20 years of new debt, since the US has been a debtor nation for 30 years, and requires higher borrowing every year merely to continue).

Will there be a new magical trick like one of the above? Will we see huge tax increases? Will we see new immigrants enter to pay down the bills? The latter seems most likely to me, but we shall see.

Some argue that this is a planned scheme to consolidate power among the elites that control the debt economy. Others that this is a globalist plan to force mass immigration, as the only alternative is impossible levels of taxation. Whatever the reason, there will be a serious change in the future economic and social condition in the west.

Read More: The Story Behind The 2008 Financial Crisis

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

British Government Bans Female Rape Accusers From Being Cross-Examined In Court

March 24, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The feminization of the justice system has continued unabated, with the nominally Conservative British government of Theresa May pledging to ban courtroom cross-examinations of alleged rape victims. The practice of prerecording rape complainant evidence is already in place for children, which poses the irony that women, who make up the vast majority of rape accusers, will be treated like children are.

UK Justice Secretary Liz Truss believes that the plan "will not reduce the right to a fair trial, but will ensure victims of these crimes are protected." This shows a shocking ignorance of the nature of the British system and history of law. Unlike on the European continent, England and Wales' court procedures are adversarial. Unless changes to courtroom procedure involve something neutral like painting the walls beige instead of white, an advantage given to one side, in this instance the prosecution and obliquely the accuser, naturally disadvantages the other (here, the accused).

Ideas about a more impartial and even-handed conception of justice in Britain date back to the Magna Carta and the noble agitations that prompted it. Over the centuries, this evolved into more ironclad protections against judicial errors in the form of carefully selected juries and the testing of evidence in open court. Theresa May and Liz Truss' efforts in the Prisons and Courts Bill represent an egregious dismantling of this time-honored legacy. Relative to its size, Britain has often been the most respected country in the world when it comes to legal matters. A direct outcome of this stability and fairness is the continued flourishing of its economy and society over the course of the 20th century. This reputation as a bastion of common sense, though under attack for some time, is presently being strangled like never before.

To appease a few SJWs, May and Truss are undermining the right to a fair trial. There is no guarantee that video evidence will not be tampered with or that multiple takes will not be done, giving the "best" one to the court for viewing by the judge and jury. Compare this to the situation of the accused, who cannot ask for a "redo" of his statement to police, except if he wants to be branded as a liar who changes his story. The accused has a lot more to lose from a trial, yet will be expected to front court with the public, if not the entire country knowing his name and every detail of his past being trawled over. By contrast, rape accusers in the United Kingdom are granted perpetual anonymity.

A perfect storm

Yes, this is the woman who worked to classify men approaching women as "hate criminals."

In all three major aspects of the criminal legal system, investigation, the laying of charges, and prosecution in a court, the standards for evaluating men as "rapists" have been deleteriously lowered in Britain. Readers will remember how Nottingham Police, in a move being followed by other UK police forces, decided to regard men approaching women as perpetrators of "hate crimes." This is despite proponents freely admitting that such behavior was not actually criminal in many ways (and nor should it be).

Likewise, the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) pursued innocent man Mark Pearson for an eternity over a "rape" allegation by Game of Thrones actress Souad Faress. CCTV footage was deliberately slowed down by the CPS to make it look like Pearson could have (rather than did) digitally assault Faress as it would have otherwise been impossible. After all, Liz Truss and CPS head Alison Saunders have publicly made it their mission to increase the number of rape convictions, rather than seeking sound and properly proven rape convictions.

Rape isn't the only traumatic crime

Feminists falsely portray court cross-examinations as an abuse towards (female) accusers, when, in fact, there is usually next to no hard evidence to support allegations of rape.

Like me, you may have family members who have gone through terrible criminal ordeals. One of my closest family members was caught up in an armed robbery and had a high-powered weapon aimed right at her face. In addition, an acquaintance of mine was so badly beaten in an unprovoked attack that he went through months of excruciating physical rehabilitation, to the point where simple functions like eating and walking had to be thoroughly remastered. Neither he nor my family member were spared cross-examination in court.

Consequently, the move to ban courtroom cross-examinations of rape complainants reeks of unwarranted exceptionalism. Time and again, the alleged or plain obvious suffering of other victims of crime is minimized in favor of the narrative that rape claims are the only cases ever deserving of special consideration. Did someone carve up your father with a knife and kill him in front of you after both of you were taken hostage? Well, you have to give evidence in court. Were you attacked by a mob, causing you to spend five weeks in a coma? If so, chances are you'll have to be cross-examined once you're physically able to be, irrespective of any lingering mental and emotional trauma you will have.

More importantly, the two violent crime examples I just mentioned are almost universally accompanied by a plethora of hard evidence, as opposed to the invariably flimsy and vague corroboration we see with allegations of rape. Because of the huge delay in many rape accusers coming forward, the need for cross-examination is even more pronounced than for most other serious alleged crimes.

So many things could go wrong

Exceptions for rape accusers are being pushed by people like this.

If courtroom cross-examinations are supposedly too traumatic, what's to stop accusers and feminists from saying prerecorded cross-examinations are as well? Remember, we live in the political and social climate of "listen and believe," where questioning a woman's story of rape is equated with misogyny. What's more is that the public focus has been entirely on the efficacy of courtroom cross-examinations versus prerecorded evidence, not what robust form the prerecorded evidence-gathering should be taking and how open to revision it will be. And, of course, anything is up for revision in the UK, including due process, as it lacks a powerful constitution and Parliament at Westminster has what is called parliamentary supremacy.

Sadly, the atmosphere of man-hating in the legal system is going to roll on well into the future. The range of false rape stories out there, from Emma Sulkowicz's lies to the Duke lacrosse case to Ched Evans' cock carousel accuser, has led to SJWs and others openly trying to subvert due process to secure Stalinist-style conviction quotas.

So, the million-dollar question is this: are you currently protecting yourself from false accusations? If not, you need to be.

Read More: British Soccer Star Ched Evans Found Not Guilty Of Rape After Years Of Abuse From Feminists

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

7 More Misleading Leftist Concepts That Pretend To Be Positive But Are Not

March 24, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Years ago, when I struggled to get rid of my own leftist conditioning—such as automatically considering "equality" as good and such-and-such-"isms" as bad—I noticed a rather peculiar phenomena: every time a SJW talks, he or she always uses the same words and repeats the same catchphrases like mantra.

"As we live under masculine domination…" or "machismo kills, feminism doesn't"—which, by the way, are both untrue—appear every time in their posts, at the beginning of everything they say. Post after post, they always use the same semantic gear. "Patriarchy", "privilege", "gender", "heteronormative"… Those people seem completely locked up inside their own discourse.

For a moment I almost pitied them. Then I realized how much they foster and are responsible for degeneracy.

A motivated, organized, intolerant clique among a disorganized and divided society is a timebomb. Members of the wimpy majority will rather negotiate and surrender, especially over small things, than risk getting bullied by the aggressive clique with no one around daring to defend them. History of the last decades follows closely the maneuvers of these vanguards in a permissive environment. Muslims managed to make everyone eat halal, as the slaughterhouses would rather do everything halal than two separate slaughter tracks. The same way, SJWs pushed their crazes and framings in the mainstream: they may be locked inside their own perspective but also succeed at locking us in it, too.

To stop aggressive leftists from helicopter guiding people and culture, we have to not only show the falsehood of their pretended issues or the reality and legitimacy of ours, but to dismantle the very frames they brainwashed us with to condition our views. Last week, I briefly did this with “equality”, “social justice” and “open-mindedness”—the way they use it—, and now we’re tackling some more.

1. “Tolerance” or “toleration”

Initially, tolerance means the capacity or habit to put up with something unpleasant or unlikable. One tolerates something on the grounds that one cannot act on said thing without creating greater problems, so tolerating is the least bad outcome available, or that one cannot act on said thing at all. In other words, tolerance means resignation.

When it comes to religion, culture, or politics, a plea for tolerance is an intimation of passivity. When X asks Y to be more “tolerant”, he is asking Y to let him do more while also implicitly accusing him to be “intolerant.” If Y falls into the trap, Y will defend himself from the accusation despite the fact that he hasn’t actually done a thing, will remain passive and insecure, whereas the one who pretended to be victim of “intolerance” and asked for “tolerance” will have more room to further his own interests.

Historically, Y is the one who loses. In the course of the eighteenth century, so-called Enlightenment intellectuals repeatedly asked for more tolerance from the Catholic Church whereas they were promoting irreligious ideas that rejected both the throne and altar. The cultural bath they created allowed for the emergence of a violent upheaval, the Revolution of 1789. Thus was the “tolerant” and weak Ancien régime shattered in blood by aggressive, noble- and divine-hating Sans-culottes. In all likelihood, had the Catholic Inquisition been a real thing, the secularist Revolution would have never happened—it would never have gathered the forces and opportunities to topple the social edifice.

Dispossession, passivity, and being bludgeoned into “toleration” all go together. No one asked the feminists or BLM activists to be “tolerant.” In the name of fighting intolerance, Leftists have always been the most aggressive and intolerant of all political factions. It is a perverse game where the one who holds, so the speak, the sword of “tolerance” can do anything while accusing his victim of “intolerance.”

2. “Antiracism” and “diversity”

When Boasians and other biology-denying leftists took over the colleges, whites got punished for having gathered a thorough, scientific anthropology. Boasians demonized relevant issues around heredity and screamed “racist!” at anyone thinking there is more than environmental effects in men’s nature. “Racism”, then, was attributed to whites only, making the race card a purely anti-white thing. Conservatives have so much internalized this they sometimes still talk about “reverse racism” when they notice blacks attacking white people on the grounds of their skin color.

“Antiracism” is, basically, anti-whiteness. It does not exist outside the Western world. Africans can be Afrocentric, Asians are allowed to identify with their countries, and only the West is condemned to the melting-pot boil. “Antiracist” leagues and personalities constantly ignored anti-white prejudice, attacked those who denounced anti-white racism, supported race-baiters and sometimes openly gloated about the population replacement we are undergoing.

Of course, like most other leftist framings, “antiracism” covers a consummate hypocrisy: if whites are so “oppressive”, why insisting to live in white countries? And what is the problem with whites having their own interests? Everyone has. We have legitimate interests and rights too. Isn’t deeming our interests intrinsically “oppressive” the kind of essentialism that leftists pretend to reject in the name of antiracism? Pseudo-antiracists stay because they are only too happy to steal and destroy what we built while also nourishing their own wicked righteousness.

3. “Minority”

Just as “equality”, this one originally had a quantitative meaning. When citizens choose between two candidates at an election, their choices pile into two sets, and the candidate with the greater set wins. The more numerous are a majority, the less so are a minority. Nothing more. Some thinkers, from David Hume to Simone Veil, noticed that the enshrining of divisions into permanent political parties cut at the very root of sociability, as parties tend to muster activists, thus dividing the population into rival factions.

Nowadays, a “minority” refers to an identity built on the model of the Marxist class: a “minority” is a purportedly dominated or “oppressed” group with specific interests. The minoritarian identities have been mostly built by skilled agitators: women did not think of themselves as a separate, not to say antagonist group before mentally sick lesbians and other misfits spun it to them. It is crucial to distinguish between minoritists—seditious agitators who pretend to speak in the name of a particular social category—and purported “minorities”—that mostly existed in the imagination of minorists before they were engineered at a mass scale.

Minoritarian identity is inherently accusatory and conflict-prone, as it is based on purported wrongs that ought to be avenged repaid. No “minority” can exist without dividing society as a whole and harming general sociability, the same way than a class in the specifically Marxist sense finds its identity into asserting a separate interest at the expense of the other members of society. Does it not speak for itself that Have-It-All™ fat, overrated, pampered women in power suits complain about bogus issues or invent a “rape culture” out of thin air when more and more men struggle for less and less?

4. “Youth”

When the baby-boomers were young, they celebrated themselves as different from and cooler than what had been before. Now, the baby-boomers are quite old, but the mainstream culture keeps reflecting their views. One of the strains of said culture seems to follow a “youth cult”, and if you look closely, the cult is rather strange: “young” is the thuggish, pro-graffiti, hip-hop culture, “young” are leftists even when they are actually old, “young” are the cougars. Only conservatives and former nice guys are not young.

“Youth” is for the baby-boomers and their appointed ideological heirs. “Youth” is what they define as such, not what is actually young in age. “Youth” cultists have indeed no problem deriding the young who don’t fit their warped definition of youth. 15-year-old 4chaners are “losers” without age and 35-year old hipsters are fresh.

I have noticed a related phenomenon: cunning old men doing a big show of exhibiting signs of youth, such as sporting a leather jacket and tattoos, conversing about rap and video games, then either using their own superior sexual market value to pick up millennial girls—at the expense of millennial guys—or remembering they are older to justify lecturing us about the life conditions of today that they mostly don’t know.

5. “Undocumented” immigrants, “refugees”, “cultural enrichment”

These are all positive words whitewashing people whose presence is at best an embarrassment, at worst an act of aggression. Illegal immigrants are so because, by coming or staying without authorization, they disrespect the law and commit a crime. Eventually they try to get rewarded for their crime by getting regularized. Then, they

- commit other crimes, especially theft and rape
- take much more jobs than they could ever create, and accept a low wage, thus lowering most people's wages and increasing the competition to jobs, just as they do with the European women they try to notch
- earn welfare, either directly as money, food, shelter… or indirectly through free subsidized services, of course paid by the legal citizen
- become a cultural and demographic threat, replace the native population with the help of traitorous urban elves who despise their genuine and legitimate co-citizens.

All this is put aside or downright denied by wishful thinking. I suggest we push for the truth by simply calling them what they are—invaders, criminals, unfair competition, illegitimate replacement.

6. "Inclusiveness"

Another buzzword that covers at the same time an immature, pathological view of reality and a lot of hypocrisy. First, the existence of limitations is normal and consubstantial to the world we are living in. Limitations suppose differences, exteriority, and ultimately exclusiveness: only a finite set of beings are inside, the rest is outside. The problem came with modernity refusing boundaries as if they were evil, either through a capitalism that would force reluctant countries into globalized trade or through a socialism that pretended to convert everyone to its own notion of "justice."

The rejection of all boundaries, the desire to blend everything with everything, shows a child-like view. Mature adults accept the existence of limitations, if only so that they can focus on the interests of their own instead of balancing between ruthless selfishness and self-identification with some fashionable "cause" from the other end of the world.

Second, when the Left argues for inclusiveness, they are as hypocritical as when they ask for tolerance. Their notion of inclusiveness means including shades of Leftism, urban groups, professional victims, celebrities… and do as if it was "inclusive" when the majority of Westerners are actually pushed aside, thanks to globalization and anti-white charges. Ultimately, the pseudo-inclusive Left excludes swiftly and silently its non-members while accusing them of being responsible of their own exclusion, so that it can maintain its pretense at "inclusiveness."

7. "Emancipation"

In the aftermath of the 1789 Revolution, the German philosopher Immanuel Kant came up with the word “Enlightenment” to sell the loose intellectual fermentation of the eighteenth century as a positive phenomenon. “Enlightenment”, Kant said, is about emancipating oneself from higher supervision. Following the usual eighteenth century narrative, this meant freeing the merchants and bourgeois from spirituality and nobility. Of course it wasn’t long before later thinkers like Karl Marx took up the idea and applied it, not to the third caste—the free, self-owned producers—but to the fourth—the servants unable to be trusted with owning their livelihood.

“Emancipation” in the early Leftist thought was the rejection of a traditional caste order, the desire to smash down all boundaries. “Emancipationists” pretended they acted in the name of “justice”, “progress” and other feel-good words, but in truth their views ushered in a jumble impossible hopes, tyrannies—as one’s boundaries are his neighbours’ landmarks—, passes for envy and greed, self-complacency, utter disrespect for traditions and cultural identities, professional victimhood and blackmailing, not to forget the Have-It-All™ lifestyle.

Conclusion

Judging by the comments under some of my former critical pieces, it seems like all of us do not tackle the problem from the same point of view. Some are unwilling to recognize the importance of such or such actor in the chaotic metapolitical struggle of the twentieth century. Some seem uncomfortable with the traditional point of view as it is associated with castes groups. Whatever our disagreements, I think the main if not only enemy is cultural Marxism, and we ought to focus on dismantling it, here, on social networks, on the media, in mainstream culture… in other words, everywhere, until it collapses under the weight of its own past credibility.

Read Next: 6 Leftist Concepts That Pretend To Be Positive But Are Not

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

The Three Principles Of Great Leadership

March 25, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

Every man is a leader. Whether he is simply leading his own children or whether he is leading a multinational corporation, at some point in his life, every man will be a leader. Furthermore, the leadership of men—the good leadership of men—is a primary component for the maintenance of civilization; in fact, the lack of strong male patriarchal leadership in the West is, arguably, one of the main culprits for the decline of Western civilization over the last generation.

So, given that leadership will be a critical component of every man's life at some point in time, and given that leadership is also a critical component of civilization itself, it behooves each man to know what it takes for an outstanding leader to be outstanding. And having led soldiers, police officers, and others in the past, I thus want to share with you the critical aspects of leadership that I have observed through my own experiences.

In my view, when boiled down to its essentials, strong leadership is composed of three main principles. And if you put just these three principles into serious practice, it is almost guaranteed to make you a solid leader regardless of the field that you are in (although note that this is assuming that you already possess a natural physical presence borne from being fit, confident, and well-kept, as well as assuming that you have decent communication skills).

1. Lead By Example

Sometimes leading by example sucks…but it has to be done.

It is a standard cliché that a real leader leads by example. But the reason that this idea is a cliché is because it is true. Indeed, as a leader, always by prepared to do whatever you ask your men to do, and whenever possible, do what your men are doing. If your men have to dig trenches, then, if you have time, dig trenches alongside them. If your men have to do a round of sentry duty, then you do one too. If your men have to come in on the weekend to finish up extra paperwork, then you be in the first one there and the last one to leave.

The fact is that men have great respect for a leader who is willing to do everything and anything that he asks his men to do, and who actually shows that this is the case by doing these things whenever possible. Now, granted, as a leader, you will be unable to always do the things that your men do, but that is not the point; the point is that by doing what your men do whenever you can, your men will see that this is the case, then internalize this fact, and then they will never resent you when you ask them to do some shitty job, because they will know that if you could do the job yourself, you would.

2. Treat Your Subordinates Like Sons

A family. A band of brothers. A true team.

Although this may sound strange to some, the fact is that a true leader is like a patriarchal father to his subordinates. He is the authority figure. He dispenses justice and resolves disputes. He cares for and loves his men, but he is not afraid to challenge them or demand great sacrifices of them either. And so, if you want to be an excellent leader, become their “father.”

Indeed, just like a good father would be the first to rise and the last one to go to bed, when it comes to work, be the first one at work and the last one to leave. Look after your men’s welfare, makes sure they are fed and rested, know their problems, take genuine interest in their lives, and develop their character. A father pushes his children to their limits so that they can grow, exposes them to controlled danger, drives them to overcome their fears, and helps pick them back up when they fall down, and a true leader needs to do the same. And just as, sometimes, a father is willing to sacrifice his sons if the situation calls for it, a leader must be ready to do that too.

So think of how a true patriarchal father would treat his sons, and emulate that; doing so will indeed help turn you into an excellent leader. In fact, a leader who truly treats his subordinates like his sons, will soon have his subordinates treating that leader as a father, and as we all know from experience, sons will often do just about anything to please their fathers.

3. Be Competent

At a common-sense level, this principle is self-explanatory. If you are going to lead men in a certain situation, you need to have the knowledge and skills to do so effectively in your particular circumstances. Indeed, even if you practice the other two principles, but you do not have a solid level of competence, then, at best, you will be looked at as a “good guy who tries hard”, but not as a leader. So you do need to be competent at your job; this does not mean you have to be perfect—and many mistakes will be forgiven if you practice the other two principles—but it does mean that you have to know what you are doing the majority of the time.

Additionally, note that competence extends beyond your own specific role. Indeed, for while you should be an expert in whatever job is specifically assigned to you, as a leader, you also need to be generally competent in the roles that your subordinates do as well. So, for example, as an infantry platoon commander, you need to be excellent at giving orders and providing direction under fire, but you also need to have a competent grasp of how to stripe and assembly the platoon’s heavy machine gun, how to fire the mortar, and so (and note how this ties into leading by example). So being competent is a principle that extends to all the tasks that you and your subordinates have to deal with.

Conclusion

Sometimes, this is all that leadership is. And yet, in many respects, it is also the most important form of leadership imaginable.

In the end, real leadership comes from loving your men in the true sense, for when you love your men you will naturally treat them like sons, and you will naturally want to be competent for their sake, and you will naturally lead by example in order to show them the way. And we see this ideal represented in numerous films and books, such as in the movies Gladiator or Master and Commander, or in the series Band of Brothers, where the intense bonds of brotherhood and affection that the men have with their leader can be felt through the screen.

And so, if you want to be the best leader that you can be—and why would you settle for anything less—than remember to lead by example, treat your subordinates like sons, and be competent. Do these three things, and other men will follow you anywhere!

Read More: The 10 Most Important Principles of Leadership

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

A Beginner’s Guide To Dressing Well

March 26, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Just so we get this out of the way, I am absolutely not going to tell you to “peacock” or “pick an accessory that carries your outfit” or “wear a beaver cock around your neck”, or any of that Mystery Method crap that most intelligent people have realized is a scam.

There are no “ONE SIMPLE TRICK”s in life, and dressing well is no exception. Instead, what I’m going to do is give you a broad framework of how you can choose your own accoutrements to dress well. And yes, “choosing your own” is very important:

The key is to figure out what colors, patterns, and fits are best for YOU. In the long run, this will save you money, since well fitting clothes will never stop fitting you (unless your body drastically changes, which it shouldn’t if you read my other articles on fitness and nutrition).

A man’s style is influenced by three things:

1. His physical person
2. Color and fabric matching and contrasting
3. His personal preferences, the setting he’s going to, etc.

To go into more detail…

Cut And Fit Are The Most Important

Nothing is more important in dress than having the clothes be cut right, and fit properly. You can have the most expensive designer clothes in the world, but if it’s cut too big you’ll look like a child wearing his daddy’s clothes, and if they’re too small you’ll look like a walking package of hot dogs.

Proper fit is defined as clothes that are comfortable but not loose and baggy. Using the men’s suit as the starting point of men’s style, we see that the goal for all men and body types is to create a streamlined silhouette from head to toe, enhancing the masculine traits (namely chest and shoulders) to a proportional extent, while minimizing the belly and legs—again to a proportional extent. You want to avoid looking like Steve Reeves wearing a suit, and muscular men can have their “drop”—which is to say, the difference in chest and waist circumference—downplayed.

Different body types need different cuts, patterns, and fabrics to accent and downplay various traits:

- Tall, thin people want to wear checked patterns to give the illusion of “meat”, thick “chalk stripes” also work, and wear large pants cuffs.
- Short and stout men want to wear thin vertical lines and avoid patterns.
- Large and fat men—defined as a waist bigger than the chest and shoulders—want to wear a jacket that drapes and has padded shoulders, as well as choosing suspenders over a belt as the latter creates a big horizontal line that draws attention to the gut.
- Muscular men, defined as having a chest that is 10 inches or more than the waist, should downplay their musculature by having minimal shoulder padding, and large lapels to counterbalance the large chest. The waist should not be suppressed, and a jacket can be slightly longer than usual, to hide the thin waist.

And that’s just scratching the surface!

Complexion

You should take care to dress in a way that enhances your natural complexion. Beyond the old reliable white dress shirt, a man’s skin tone and hair color affect what shirts he should wear. Eye color is a “wild card”, if it contrasts the hair and skin it can introduce shirt colors that otherwise wouldn’t work. It is the relationship between these three factors that determines whether a man is high, low, or medium contrast.

High contrast: Pale skin and dark hair/eyes, or dark skin and light hair/eyes. This color difference should be matched in the clothing, such as the classic black suit and white dress shirt, or a grey suit and blue dress shirt. Dark shirts and white suits can also work.

Low contrast: men with muted appearance: dark skin and dark hair, or light skin and light hair. Also bald men. They should seek a muted color spectrum, such as light gray or tan suits, with light shirts—earth tones are great!

Medium contrast: Swarthy men with dark hair, and white men with grey hair. Most men are not strong medium contrasts, they tend to a high or low. To put it simply, swarthy and dark hair can be outfitted like the high contrast man, and the greying pale man should tend to low contrast.

Color Matching

There’s a lot that can be said about it, and I’ll save that for another time. For now, realize that you can be quite successful with only a rudimentary understanding of color theory:

You want to avoid having all matching colors—i.e., do not wear a blue suit, blue shirt, and blue tie. The key is to choose COMPLIMENTARY colors. Black-white-black works fine.

Similarly, don’t wear all matching fabrics—don’t wear a silk suit, shirt, and tie. Contrast smooth and rough fabrics.

The Setting

Simply put, you have to dress for the occasion—if you’re partying on some guy’s yacht, you don’t wear a tuxedo. And if you’re going to a funeral, you have to dress in a subdued manner. I hope I don’t have to tell you that you shouldn’t rock an orange pocket square when you’re paying your respects to your dead Grandma. Color choices also change depending on the season—darker colors are best worn in cold weather, and lighter colors for warm weather.

Conclusion

Clothes are an issue that can be solved with common sense in most cases, but only to the level of “decent”. This article achieves that, but to truly be well-dressed requires more in-depth study of tailoring, fabric type, color theory, and of course your own body. And those articles will undoubtedly come in the future.

Read More: 8 Solid Day Game Tips For Beginners

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

7 Ways To Optimize Your Energy To Attract Other People

March 27, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Whether you are trying to pick up women, networking for business, taking upon the role of a leader, or simply want to improve your overall social connections and life itself, your vibrational energy is a critical factor of your entity that you should try to cultivate. By simply focusing on improving your vibe, you'll become healthier, happier, and more successful along the way.

What is vibrational energy?

I had my doubts as to whether this energy (which has many names depending on who you ask) really exists or not, but I am becoming more and more aware of it with time and I can say for a fact that it is real. For example, we all know how the atmosphere feels different depending on if you're at a party, a temple, a funeral, or by the ocean. We also know what it's like being around someone who is full of joy and life as opposed to someone who just sucks all the energy out of the room. Women are especially adept at picking up this energy as their emotional state changes dramatically when being with a "fun" guy as opposed to the "creepy" guy.

Positivity and power

Without making things too complicated, the two scales you should be aware of are the positive and negative energies as well as the level of power.

Positive energy refers to anything that gives off life enhancing vibe. People with positive energy make others around them feel comfortable, excited, and inspired. People want to be around those who are positive because they are attracted to the positive aura. On the other hand, people with negative energy are those who drain the positive energy. They sulk, they complain, they make others feel at unease, and their combined pessimism and bitterness makes people want to disassociate with them. Their insecurity and anger is apparent to all those around them even if they try their best to hide it.

Power is unrelated to the positive and negative energies and it refers to a person's perceived status, capability, and the impact they can make in this world. In the manosphere, we are all familiar with the alpha/beta divide and that's one example of how power applies to a man. Man of power exudes real confidence (not faked boasts), demands rightful respect, and possesses a strong will. He displays his power through his actions, his voice, his body language, and mentality. He often has abilities and status to prove his worth.

Everyone in the world, without exception, are defined mostly by these two factors alone. It only takes few seconds for a person to judge you based on your energy and power level upon meeting you for the first time, so it's well worth the trouble of going through a bit of self-reflection to optimize these two vibrational energies. Follow the tips below to be the best version of yourself.

1. Take care of the basics

This gentleman exudes more energy and confidence than the latte-sipping, smartphone-addicted hipsters in their 20's.

Considering the readers here it's probably redundant to say this, but things like eating healthy, working out, sleeping well, not jerking off everyday, and having a balanced and fulfilling lifestyle will all elevate your energy levels. But above all, those who may be introverted and otherwise be running on low energy should try to go out more and spend more time in the sun. It's always obvious when I meet someone who just seems to be drifting through life instead of living it. I don't even have to ask to find out that that he spends most of his time on his computer while locked in his room by himself.

2. Improve your posture

Not only does improved posture give you an appearance of confidence and power, but studies have shown that it will also lower your stress while boosting your testosterone.

For more information, watch this enlightening video on Alpha male body language:

3. Manage your face

Not the face you want to walk around with.

Along with your overall posture, your face is the most important visual cue that signals who you are. You should look comfortable and secure with a slight smile to convey confidence and warmth, and maybe even a bit of cockiness (think of Arnold Schwarzenegger during his bodybuilding days). Although tempting, looking fierce and tough will only work if you've already achieved a certain level of status or have an imposing body like Dwayne Johnson. And even if you can pull it off, too much of it will make you appear unapproachable, which isn't a good thing.

4. Use your best voice

People can tell more about you by feeling the energy behind your voice than by the actual words that are being spoken. Voice projects power and confidence as well as honesty, compassion, and authenticity. While many seem to focus on trying to maintain a low voice to sound masculine, I would say that it's far more important to focus on speaking from your stomach, and speaking clearly without the rising inflection that makes you sound unsure of yourself (something that is starting to become normalized among men). Embrace your natural voice and make the best of it.

5. Mind what you consume

You are what you consume and the same is true for your mind. For example, we all know that music has a way of influencing our mood. Regularly listening to certain types of music will change your mood and even how you think about the world. It's well worth reviewing your track list to weed out any music that may be bringing your energy level down. I admit with great shame that I used to listen to Creep by Radiohead along with many other melancholic songs during my blue-pill years. But no more. The music you listen to should either be uplifting and energizing or relaxing and sublime. There are far too many mainstream love songs by men that only traps men into blue-pill mindset.

Besides music, it's also best to avoid all news media and social commentaries that do nothing but show you how shitty the world is. Yeah, it may be true, but the only thing matters is whether you're going to do something about it or not. There's no need to stoke the fire of your negativity if you're not willing to take any action to fight the injustices of the world.

6. Note who and what you attach yourself to Same idea as the things you consume: if you surround yourself with negative people, work in a lousy environment, live in a dysfunctional culture, and so on, your energy vibrations will suffer. It's best to remember that negativity is contagious. The same goes for everything that you attach yourself to: if you have attachment to griefs that make you sad or angry, or have a belief system and attitude towards the world that leaves you perpetually bitter, you're going to emit nothing but negativity that repels people. Fight if you must, but don't let that energy bottle up inside you, corroding you from within.

7. Feel, don't think

People of modern society are absolutely addicted to their thoughts. It's not that thinking in itself is unhealthy, but people just do it too much and in the worst ways possible. For an illustration, imagine a man who sees an attractive girl. Instead of just approaching her to say something, stream of thoughts run through his mind: What should I say to not appear weird? What if she doesn't like me because I'm _____? What if she freaks out? She looks busy texting on her phone, I better not bother her. I'll probably seem creepy if I approach her from behind. She's not even that hot (common male hamstering). She's probably just another man-hating bitch. I'll just approach another girl next chance I get.

During this whole time, the man is looking nervous while staring at the girl, giving off the uncomfortable "creep" vibe that he's trying so hard to avoid. Of course, this is just one example. The same could be applied to just about any other situation where people think too much for their own good.

The best cure for excessive thinking is to scan your body and note how you feel. Don't judge, don't rationalize, don't try to explain anything, but just observe. Instead of letting your thoughts run amok and trigger all sorts of unwanted emotions, it's better to be grounded in your body. Become aware of your physical state and act upon what you desire. This obviously doesn't mean that you become completely thoughtless and reckless, it just means that you are taking control of your being from where it matters. And with mastery of your self, you give off the optimal energy vibrations of life and self-assurance.

Read More: 3 Ways To Optimize Your Return On Investment

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

The Failure Of Ryancare Is A Win For Trump

March 27, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

The fake news media and the Democrats are gleefully gloating about the failure of the Republicans to live up to one of their key campaign promises: repealing and replacing Obamacare. As a matter of fact, this is the best thing that ever could have happened to Donald Trump and the Republican Party, and he knew it from the start.

The healthcare battle was at its root a question of branding. One of the major reasons why the Democratic party has been crushed so badly since Obamacare's passage was because the Republicans, in a rare moment of persuasive prowess, branded it as such. As a consequence, even the fake news media refers to the Affordable Care Act as "Obamacare." That means that every time your premium or deductible went up, you saw Obama's snickering face. Identity, as Scott Adams often writes, is the strongest form of persuasion, and Obamacare was his and the Democrats' identity. They rode it to final defeat in 2016.

Clearly, this was something that would need to be handled delicately. Aside from the vulnerability that would go with branding a face on a new healthcare bill (as the Democrats surely would), healthcare is a very personal subject. While taxes, foreign policy, and even immigration are more abstract issues, healthcare is something you live with every day and pay for every month. Moreover, it's something you feel physically.

Combine its proximity to you with a face on how it's done and healthcare is perhaps the most volatile of all issues. Any tweaking on this issue would have to be handled with the most extreme delicacy, and it's the very reason why I warned that starting with healthcare was a potentially catastrophic, presidency-killing idea.

Enter Paul Ryan.

Whether through ignorance of people and persuasion (Paul Ryan lives in the world of numbers, not people) or some kind of nefarious intent, Paul Ryan was always best positioned to destroy Donald Trump. By trying to do healthcare first, my nerves were rattled that Trump would get dragged into a quagmire not entirely of his own making. In the end, perhaps I feared too much. Paul Ryan was too incompetent to damage Donald Trump.

Blunder 1: Planning to Fail

The old adage is that failure to plan is planning to fail, and the Republican leadership in Congress showed this in spades. For seven years, they campaigned on "repealing and replacing Obamacare." In the end, we learned that this was more of a meme than a promise, a useful rhetorical point for engagement, not a plan of action.

There was no plan, so they had to stitch one together hastily to keep up with Paul Ryan's vaunted "200 day schedule." It shouldn't surprise anyone that what came was a slapstick pile of garbage.

Blunder 2: Talk to No One

Paul Ryan drafted this abomination in total secrecy, without any input from the various factions in his conference. Anyone familiar with basic selling psychology will tell you that trust and rapport is essential for your persuasion to be successful. By keeping the bill under lock and key, but making a show that something was coming, he did exactly the opposite. It seemed shady, and people had bad feelings as a first impression. Rand Paul exploited this fully and threw more tar on during his marketing campaign when it was being drafted.

Instead of building rapport, Paul Ryan broke it, then tried to ram the bill down everyone's throat.

Blunder 3: Be a Corporate Whore

The thing we were promised was that Obamacare would be replaced with a competitive health care system. That meant drug imports, negotiating on drug prices, the end to mandated insurance plans (such as forcing men to buy maternity coverage or women to buy prostate care), and the ability to purchase insurance across state lines. All of these things would have lowered the cost of care.

What we got was…I'm still not even sure. None of those things were in the bill. The only thing that definitively was was a tax break for the very rich. Meanwhile, the voters that put Trump over the top in the Rust Belt would have been hurt the most. The optics of this, to say the least, were terrible. Ann Coulter put it better than I could have:

> GOP response to Trump's victory has been to double-down on all the ugly unpopular policies that make GOP hated.
>
> — Ann Coulter (@AnnCoulter) March 22, 2017

> GOP has to get working class votes, or they're just handing it to social justice warriors.
>
> — Ann Coulter (@AnnCoulter) March 22, 2017

We were promised one thing, but we were being sold a bill of goods. Trump's base hated the bill as much as the Democrats did. The only one that seemed to like it was Paul Ryan.

Blunder 4: 3 Phases to Hell

Most of us know by now that whenever the government makes a promise, assume the opposite. "This bill will not radically alter the ethnic mix of the country," the backers of the 1965 Hart Celler act said. "If you like your plan, you can keep your plan. If you like your doctor, you can keep your doctor," we were told in more recent times. The Paul Ryan plan, we were told, would have multiple phases.

Phase 1 was supposed to be this piece of shit, then we'd get to the good stuff in phase 3. Phase 2 would be deregulation by HHS Secretary Tom Price.

We were told that because phase 3 would require 60 votes in the Senate, we could only do phase 1 now. But if all the good stuff, the real reforms, were in phase 3, it begged the question: what was the point of going through phase 1?

All you would do is swap ownership of the health care problem that was a key reason why the Democrats were blasted to pieces over Obama's term, when they should have been in a position to dominate government for decades. And it would've stayed that way, because phase 3 would never have happened. Ted Cruz and others knew it.

Blunder 5: Persuasive Misfire

Here's arguably the biggest blunder of all. If you were going to need 60 votes in the Senate to get the real reforms, why wouldn't you just try for that anyway? If you needed the 60 votes to get the real reforms, then there was no point in trying anything different.

Want to talk about The Art of the Deal? By putting the real reforms in the bill, the Republicans would have had real leverage to beat Democrats over the head with. How could they reasonably say they're against importing drugs, or for the government to be negotiating prices for entitlement programs, or to bust up the insurance monopolies and create a competitive national marketplace? They'd have been in a bind. They would look like corporate shills and whores. Imagine those soundbites and headlines? Even the fake news media wouldn't be able to twist and contort that truth.

Instead, Paul Ryan thought small. He insisted on going through "budget reconciliation" to keep it a narrow, Republican bill that only swapped ownership of the problem. He simply lacked the imagination or the framing of a persuader to do something worthwhile. If he wanted to have a big healthcare fight, he had the weapons to wage it.

Instead, he chose to fight with puny weapons and got crushed.

Conclusion

The failure of this bill is a boon for Trump. Whatever importance it seems to have now is only because we put more weight on things that happen recently. At the end of the year it will just be a footnote for Trump, while confidence in Ryan has taken a big hit (though there's no real movement to oust him as Speaker yet).

Trump avoids a prolonged healthcare battle while getting to claim that he tried to do something when Obamacare explodes. The Democrats reinforced their ownership of Obamacare by fighting for it so hard. The weaselly Ryan is damaged, and Trump doesn't have his face on a terrible healthcare bill. The fact that he nuked this bill by declaring that he was done negotiating just before it was put up for a vote is telling that he understood this.

He can thus move on to an easier part of his agenda (tax reform and building the wall) as part of serving the ends he was promising – ending open borders and bringing back jobs. All's well that ends well.

Read Next: How The Washington D.C. Swamp Is Still A Threat To Donald Trump's Administration

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

Russia’s New Encyclopedia Helps Fight Online Noise And Disinformation

March 27, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

We are living in an age in which everything electronic is praised as newer, better, and more advanced. The internet, we are constantly told, is the new oracle, is able to dispense absolute truth at the push of a few keyboard keys. This attitude has seeped into the arena of book publishing, where many observers have given electronic books unqualified praise as “better” and more “convenient” than print books.

This was why it was something of a relief to read about Russia’s decision to issue the latest version of the Great Russian Encycopedia (GRE) in hard copy. The entire thirty-six volume set will be available within the coming weeks. The GRE is the successor to the venerable Great Soviet Encyclopedia that existed before 1990. If you ask why this event is important, you should consider the reasons behind it.

The old Soviet Encyclopedia

Sergei Kravets, the editor of the GRE, has pointed to one of the disturbing truths of our times: that we live in a “post-truth” (as he calls it) era in which factual information can be easily manipulated. He might also have added another disturbing fact: information itself in the electronic age is more perishable than ever. Computer technicians tell us that we can barely even read emails written twenty-five years ago. How will our descendants, three hundred or four hundred years from now, ever know about our history, if everything has evaporated into an electronic nothingness?

Kravets made this point:

> Russia needed a new encyclopedia that reflects modern society and consciousness, so this one is not a continuation of its Soviet predecessor. When we began, we lived in the epoch where 'truth' was valued. Now we seem to be going through a time of 'post-truth,' where all sorts of marketing, PR, and other kinds of dark information are circulating. We regard our encyclopedia as the territory of truth and objective assessment. It's where people can go to check their information, and balance their views.

In an age of shifting and transitory reality, we need physical documents to touch and hold on to more than ever. Physical books have saved civilization in the past, and they will do so again in the future. Some of the most precious literary treasures of antiquity survived the Middle Ages on only a handful of manuscripts; for some authors (e.g., Tacitus) there was literally only one codex.

Before the age of the printed book, the vellum manuscript book was king, but such books were extremely costly and time-consuming to produce. Yet they did have one advantage: they literally could last many hundreds of years. I have seen vellum manuscripts from the thirteenth century that look like they will last, with proper care, for many more hundreds of years. Can we say the same thing about our electronic era? How many websites will even be around in ten, twenty, or fifty years?

A medieval Book of Hours from 1260. It will last many more hundreds of years.

When the age of the first encyclopedias dawned during the French Enlightenment, the philosophes (especially Diderot) imagined that such books would serve as both anchor and bulwark. They would provide an anchor for knowledge to prevent its deliberate corruption by the enemies of truth; and they would serve as a bulwark against ignorance and superstition. Modern encyclopedias in the West have lost sight—if they ever cared in the first place—of this mission. Encyclopedia Britannica stopped publishing a printed version of its books in 2010. Everywhere we go, we hear companies being praised for abandoning print. But the perishability of electronic information remains troubling. Without some sort of physical existence, knowledge has no permanence, no independent "reality."

Perhaps the future is not online, despite what everyone says. Perhaps our descendants will become weary with the endless “choices” and “options” offered by the internet and instead opt for the simpler, more comforting choice of opening up a book. Printed books have a proven track record of many hundreds of years. Electronic books have no track record at all. Time will tell which form will outlast the other. Remember that the people living through the so-called “Dark Ages” also had no idea that they were mired in ignorance. It is true that the internet has helped disseminate knowledge, but it has also helped disseminate an extraordinary amount of mindless bilge.

Does this look secure, permanent, and reliable?

But if you were raised in an era before the internet, you will understand the value that a heavy, rich, printed encyclopedia has. As a boy I remember my father bought a used set of the Encyclopedia Americana at the annual Quaker book fair in our town for only about twenty dollars. It got a huge amount of use and, looking back, helped generate an interest in the wider world. The old Soviet Encyclopedia was published in sumptuous leather volumes, and can still be found here and there in Russia today.

But even the GRE’s future is online. Kravets makes it clear that “this will be the very last paper encyclopedia we ever produce. The future is online.” He is surely right, at least for the foreseeable future. But the GRE still has a role to play: it will serve as the launching point for a Russia version of Wikipedia. If this can help reduce the amount of marketing, propaganda, and “dark information” online, then it will be a welcome addition to the arena of knowledge.

Read More: The Criterion Of Certitude

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

The Girls Of Poland And Ukraine

March 27, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I invite Eastern European travel expert Kyle Trouble for a comprehensive discussion on Polish and Ukrainian girls, in addition to examining each country's culture and living standard. We focus on sharing the ideal type of game that is necessary to succeed for both casual encounters and long-term relationships that could lead to marriage and family creation. For Western men who are dissatisfied with their women, Poland and Ukraine may offer a viable path to more fulfilling intimate relationships.

If you're enjoying my podcasts and getting value from it, consider making a donation. Click here to learn more about donating.

Listen on Soundcloud or download the MP3:

Listen on Youtube:

Subscribe on iTunes or add the RSS feed to your favorite podcast app. If you like the podcast, please leave a rating and review on iTunes.

Previous Podcast: The Danger Of Hedonic Adaptation

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Ridiculous “Crimes” British Police Investigated Instead Of Preventing The Westminster Terrorist Attack

March 28, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

From Britain to the United States and beyond, police resources are stretched like never before. But instead of deciding to then use the means they have at their disposal in wiser ways, politicians and politically correct (or politically intimidated) police chiefs are opting to go after what amounts to little more than “thought crimes.” Jokes about “women in the kitchen” posted in Canada are even receiving considerable police attention in the United Kingdom, all while true, violent crimes like burglaries are being openly neglected by police leaders.

The tragedy this week at Westminster in London, which led to scores of people being mowed by an Islamic terrorist named Khalid Masood, is an example of incidents that the police should be trying to prevent more. And although the police do devote significant time to tracking terror suspects, their other “priorities,” motivated by SJW and feminist agitations, suggest they could be exerting themselves more in trying to stop real crimes, not the pet ideological projects of leftist extremists.

This perverted fascination with non-crimes, which at best can be called having bad manners, also endangers police themselves. The issuing of instructions to give violent offenders like robbers a wide berth in favor of prosecuting “online trolls” only encourages those with actual malice to offend further. British beat cops, most of whom are unarmed, are therefore exposed to greater threats than they should be, as is the general public.

So here are four categories of purported British crime that should not be warranting any investigation by police whatsoever:

1. Saying women are fat or suggesting they should be in the kitchen

Criticizing someone's appearance is not something I usually recommend, especially if they cannot control it through disease or disability. Whilst there is nothing wrong with wanting to sleep with attractive women at the expense of unattractive women, going out of your way to mock someone's bodily features is ill-advised. Return Of Kings, however, has rightfully drawn a line when it comes to the promotion of obesity by choice and demands that healthy heterosexual men find fat girls sexually appealing. The problem is that police in the UK are enforcing unofficial politeness laws, which only seem to protect people like offended feminist women, and digitally tracking down "offenders" so they can visit them in person.

Around the time of the "women's marches," Facebook critics of attention-seeking female SJWs pointed out that disproportionate numbers of the marchers rallying against "rape" were overweight and amongst the least likely to arouse anyone's sexual interest, whether criminal or model citizen. This mirrors a number of other situations where women portray themselves as being attractive by pretending they are at a high risk of sexually-inspired violence. Meanwhile, other anti-feminist shitlords on Facebook said women were better off in the kitchen, an observation at least partially supported by happiness surveys showing females felt better in the age of the housewife.

The result? Triggered Canadian women contacted British police, who then tracked some men down and went to their doorsteps. The irony here is that if a man is ever called "ugly" or "a loser," the state will not zealously prosecute the "offender" on his behalf. In fact, as you will see below, if a man is perceived as unattractive or not successful (or a woman just isn't interested in small talk), the police can now label his approach a "hate crime." Whereas local UK burglaries are now routinely ignored, despite the high risk that a thief will return to intimidate or re-victimize a homeowner, law enforcement has decided to go after men who have a 99.99% chance of never meeting those they criticize, let alone physically or sexually attacking them. I guess they temporarily forgot about terrorist sympathizers like Khalid Masood.

2. Men approaching women (with no threats or violence) being called "hate criminals"

Hate criminal!

Did you approach a woman in England recently and she didn't like what you offered with your appearance and/or conversation? Chances are you can be described as a "hate criminal" by local police. Particularly in Nottingham, where this pathetic program was piloted, imagine how much time has been diverted from burglaries, serious assaults, and the investigation of terror suspects to cataloguing and rebuking men who simply try to talk to women. Paradoxically, British authorities weren't so keen to publicly label Khalid Masood a hate criminal in recent years after he was deemed to be an Islamic radical, well before he killed innocent people.

In two months after the introduction of this policy, Nottingham police had arrested a grand total of two men for "public order offences and actual bodily harm" designated as "misogynistic" acts. The city itself numbers over 300,000 and attracts more people still as commuters to work, tourists, and students. Consequently, this is a ridiculously small number of people, though politicized directives from above will lead to the expansion of what constitutes so-called sexism against women on the streets.

3. Walking past women who accuse you of rape with absolutely zero evidence

"Rape" because a geriatric woman wants to feel sexually sought after.

Some time ago I brought you the story of Mark Pearson, who was falsely accused by actress Souad Faress over an alleged rape that was physically impossible for him to have committed. It turns out, in a development I did not cover in my original article, that Pearson was not shown the CCTV "evidence" against him until six months after his arrest. The Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) bears significant responsibility for this debacle, too, but think about the general law enforcement resources unacceptably and absolutely wasted in this case.

Yet Pearson's plight is not the only one. Though I am for police listening to complaints of rape, there is no doubt that most allegations involve nothing but the testimony of an accuser, sometimes many years after the claimed attack. Compare this to the information police accumulated about the Westminster terrorist Khalid Masood. MI5, Britain's version of the FBI, had previously investigated Masood. There was always much more evidence that he was a potential terrorist than there is evidence suggesting that a man accused of rape is actually a rapist. But try telling that to the upper echelons of British law enforcement!

4. Criticizing open border policies or mass immigration

Let them in or you're a racist!

Early last year Scottish police arrested a man for "offensive" comments about Syrian refugees. They used the spectacularly amorphous Communications Act and declined to elaborate on what he actually said. The Scottish legal system operates separately from England and Wales, but shares many features and, importantly, many of the saddening trends that elevate political correctness above common sense. The ability of British citizens to express concerns about rapidly declining social cohesion is not only significantly curtailed in modern times, but liable to get them imprisoned.

Another British man was arrested for asking a Muslim woman to "explain Brussels" (the terrorist attack of 2016). Notwithstanding that this is a more combative strategy for debating a topic, how this man found himself in the hands of law enforcement is a disgrace, especially as police termed his behavior "racial hatred" when Islam is, in fact, a religion. By that standard, a person criticizing Roman Catholicism should be prosecuted for anti-Irish, anti-Italian, or anti-Polish racism. I wonder how many would-be Khalid Masoods could have been looked at in the time it took to chase down and interrogate this man?

If the police can't protect us, who will?

Wow, terrorism defeated!

No one should expect the police to counter every threat in society, including the specter of terrorist attacks. But when law enforcement is being consistently pushed to stop rather harmless social infractions or stifle freedom of expression, we have a problem. In addition to the run-of-the-mill criminals who benefit from such a focus, even more bloodthirsty terrorists greatly appreciate the lessened attention they get from the powers that be.

If the West is really serious about preventing mass fatalities and injuries from terrorist attacks, rather than just using them as an opportunity to change Facebook profile photos, the time is ripe for police forces to stop going after people who have done nothing warranting an official investigation.

Read More: British Police: Men Who Try To Get Laid Are Guilty Of Misogynistic "Hate Crimes"

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Critical Rules To Build A Physique That Turns On Women

March 28, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

It’s no secret that learning game is harder than it ever was before—with Soros “1 in 4 women are raped” propaganda on every corner, anti-male sentiment emanating from the hordes of social justice warriors, and women’s general lack of femininity, attracting and seducing hot girls without encountering numerous obstacles is a seemingly impossible challenge.

Shit tests, friends cock blocking you, and poor logistics… it seems that we must do everything within our power to level the playing field. You can try building your wealth, you can try learning game, and you can try working on your personality, but in my experience, one thing works best: game combined with a killer physique.

Having a killer physique is the most immediate thing that a girl sees about you. Not your bank account, not your game, not your personality but your physical body. Yes, obviously everything else is important, but developing a shredded, lean physique that turns heads is an incredibly powerful asset.

Learning Game With A Killer Physique

I don’t want to exaggerate here, but it’s hard not to. When I first started working out around the age of 13, I didn’t think it would have much of an effect. Yeah, maybe I’d get a few IOI’s here and there, but I figured it was something you just did for health.

Oh my god, was I wrong—fast forward 10 years, and I can’t believe the power that it commands, not only in terms of respect from your peers, but in attraction from women. Despite the SJW’s harping on men for being shallow, it turns out that women are actually just as shallow… they just hide it better.

I recall the first time that I really started to understand how powerful an aesthetic physique really was. I was 18, and had just graduated high school—I’d been lifting pretty seriously for about a year, but at the time still really had no idea what I was doing.

I decided to go to the pool with some buddies. I’d been hitting the gym extra hard over the past year, because I wanted to look like a total stud when I went to college, but it turns out I didn’t even have to wait that long. We got to the pool, and immediately 3 hot girls caught my eye. They were absolutely gorgeous, and I could barely contain my testosterone.

I subtly pointed them out, so my buddies could see, and we all sat down next to them. Immediately, one of them who was lying on her stomach, tanning, turned towards me and asked: “What’s your name?”

Holy hell—did she just open ME? From there the whole conversation was smooth sailing. She immediately gave me a ton of IOI’s, playing with her hair, biting her lip; pretty much acting like a complete school girl around me.

The conversation ended with her asking for my number, and she texted me the next day wanting to hang out.

Ever since then I’ve never underestimated the power of an aesthetic physique. A chiseled, sexy V-Taper signals confidence, vitality, strength, and most importantly, alpha male status. In all seriousness, when you're jacked, gaming women is like shooting fish in a barrel.

1. Utilize P.H.A.T. Training

Imagine learning game when you look like this

When most guys start working out, they fall for the classic "bro split" vs. powerlifting routine dichotomy. A "bro-split," as it's aptly named, is the routine that most douchebag mustang drivers, college chads, and curl bros follow. It essentially divides your workout routine up into 3 separate days: chest and arms, shoulders and back, and legs.

There's different variations, but the idea is that you cycle the days—for example, you may do something like this:

- Monday: Chest and Arms
- Tuesday: Legs
- Wednesday: Back and Shoulders
- Thursday: Rest

Then, you'd just repeat this over and over until the end of eternity. The benefits of this are that you'll train mass, and will certainly get a proportional physique. The negative side, however, is that it's extremely difficult to build strength since most of the bro-splits consist of higher repetition exercises.

In stark contrast, is the typical powerlifting routine, which is usually either Starting Strength or some 5×5 variation. These consist of Days "A," and "B," each of which usually contains 3-4 exercises.

So, a typical powerlifting routine, may look something like this:

- Day A: Squats, Bench, Barbell Row
- Day B: Squats, Overhead Press, Deadlift

Then, you would just alternate with a rest day in between. So, in other words, you might do Day A on Monday, Day B on Wednesday, and Day A on Friday. Then, the next week, you'd pick up where you left off: do Day B on Monday, Day A on Wednesday, and so on and so forth.

The main benefit of a powerlifting routine is that you'll gain a ton of strength, and it'll be functional, too. The major downside, however, is that you'll often end up looking like a T-Rex: huge legs and giant pecs, but scrawny arms from a lack of direct exercises.

Most guys are stuck choosing between either massive strength and little aesthetics, or massive aesthetics and paltry strength, but I propose, there's a way you can get both.

After nearly 7 years of lifting, oscillating between various bro-splits and powerlifting routines, I discovered a principle called "Power Hypertrophy Adaptive Training," or P.H.A.T. for short. The idea behind PHAT is that you combine both strength and mass training…into one routine.

I won't go too in depth here, since I cover this all in my latest book, but here is a sample template that you can use to design your own routine:

- Day 1: Upper Body Strength
- Day 2: Lower Body Strength
- Day 3: Rest
- Day 4: Back and Shoulders Hypertrophy
- Day 5: Cardio, HIIT, or Legs Hypertrophy
- Day 6: Chest and Arms Hypertrophy
- Day 7: Rest

The strength days will build rock solid, dense muscle—your bench, squat, deadlift, and other compound lifts will sky-rocket. The mass days will build huge, aesthetic biceps, triceps, and shoulders—in other words, it works the auxiliary muscles and makes them gigantic, in a way that strength training can't do.

Simply switching to a PHAT based workout routine will astound you—you'll get stronger and stronger every week, as the mass and strength training both work together synergistically. I do not exaggerate when I say that following a PHAT routine will make your progress in the gym triple.

2. Choose The Proper Diet For YOU

How you'll feel knowing every girl in a 2 mile radius wants you

Intermittent Fasting, the Paleo Diet, the Bulletproof Diet, the Atkins Diet, the South Beach diet, Slow-Carb, High-Carb…when you first get into the world of fitness, and even after several years, it can be incredibly confusing. It seems that every single "expert," out there has an opinion. I'm here to tell you that a good 75% of it is total bullshit.

Here's what you need to realize: there is no one size fits all. Different diets suit different needs and different goals, so I'm going to simplify it for you. First, ask yourself, what is your body type:

- Hard-Gainer (very skinny, have a difficult time putting on weight)
- Obese (30+ pounds overweight)
- Average (Between 15-20% body fat)

Okay, now, let's simplify. If you're a hard-gainer, and you're trying to gain a lot of muscle mass, here's what you need to do. First things first, don't do any of that intermittent fasting, paleo, or Atkins garbage—it's meant for losing weight. You're going on the "high-carb" diet. Eat a medium to large sized meal every 3-4 hours, ideally having some carbohydrates, fats, and proteins.

If you're obese, I recommend you use the paleo diet. Low-carb diets put your body into a mild state of ketosis—AKA your body burns fat for energy, and not carbohydrates.

Don't worry so much about how much you eat, just eat foods that only cavemen would have access to. Nothing processed, nothing artificial, no grains or wheat, just the Neanderthal foods: farm fresh meat, organic vegetables, and nuts. Keep fruit and berries to an absolute minimum (maybe one serving post-workout).

Do this until you're around 12% and if you like, you can then switch over to a more carbohydrate based diet to build muscle (carbohydrates make building muscle so much easier). Consume the majority of your daily carbohydrates before and after your workout, however, to maximize muscle-gain and minimize fat loss.

If you're average, consider following the "recomposition," protocol. Work out every day on an empty stomach, ideally early in the morning. Consume 5 grams of BCAA's to prevent muscle wasting, and then eat a carbohydrate heavy meal post-workout. Calculate your calories, eat roughly 200 less than maintenance, and you'll melt fat and build muscle at the same time.

Do you see why most diets are total bullshit now? They act as if there's a one-size fits all approach, but there's not. The reality is that you'll have to approach your diet like you approach your health: it depends on the individual.

3. Aim for the "Golden Ratio"

Girls will regularly ask to feel your abs when you go out clubbing

Statistically, do you know what women find most attractive physically? No, it isn't height—it's something called the "golden ratio," or a man's shoulder to waist ratio.

Studies have shown that when a man's shoulder to waist ratio is roughly 1.618, women consistently rank him as being the most attractive among his peer group. Yup, that's right. You can out train your poor height genetics, your poor face genetics, and whatever minority skin color you think hurts your chances.

The question, then, is how? How do you train to get that V-Taper that women absolutely adore? Well, I propose two things:

- Utilize weighted and un-weighted back exercises
- Do sets to failure

That's it. Most guys don't combine un-weighted back exercises like pull ups, with weighted back exercises like Pendlay rows or lat pull downs—they typically do one or the other, and their piss poor results show it. I propose that you do BOTH.

My workout routine (for Back and Shoulders day) consists first of the typical weighted back exercises, but then, I do 3 sets of pull ups to absolute failure. I'll do as many pull ups as I can, and then go over to the pull up machine, and do as many as I can with 20 pounds of assistance. Then 40 pounds, then 60 pounds, all the way until I can't do anymore.

Then, I do this two more times. If you think you've ever experienced a burn from back day, but haven't done this, you're in for a surprise. Your back will be BURNING in agony after just 1 set, but hey, if you want an aesthetic physique, in the words of Arnold: "No pain, no gain."

In other words, the more pain you feel on a hypertrophy day, the more you'll gain—so aim to combine weighted and un-weighted back exercises, to get the best of both worlds. The weighted exercises will train for strength and build dense muscle, and the unweighted will build mass and endurance muscle.

Want More?

If you're interested in building a strong, healthy, Greek-god-like physique, then consider checking out my eBook. For a limited time only, I'm giving Return of Kings readers 25% off, plus two FREE eBook bonuses. In addition to this, you'll also get "Priority Coaching," where I respond to your emails within 48 hours, so that you have absolutely no questions about how to get jacked as hell.

In Body of an Alpha, I cover damn near everything you need to know about getting shredded, melting away fat, and packing on slabs of muscle. Here's some of the benefits that you'll get when you decide to purchase my guide to building the body that women desire:

- The “Principles of Lifting,” which most guys violate, destroying any chance at muscle gain
- Recovery hacks, to minimize cortisol, and boost growth hormone, so that you can double your recovery speed
- A guide to myofascial release and stretching to prevent injury, ensuring you never have to skip a day at the gym
- The official “Body of an Alpha,” routine, meant to transform your body into a statue of Zeus
- BONUS #1 – “Alpha Supplements,” my guide to legal steroids, the best pre-workouts, and more
- BONUS #2 – A reader requested FAQ, including how to shop for a fit body, how to blunt hunger, and more
- BONUS #3 – My “Exercise Demonstration Guide,” so that there’s not a single doubt in your mind about how to do the Body of an Alpha routine
- BONUS #4 – Priority Coaching! Just email me and ask me whatever questions you have, I’ll get back to you within 48 hours.
- And more! Body of an Alpha is 150+ pages of all-killer no-filler material, PACKED with knowledge from nearly 10 years of experience and nearly $10,000 spent trying different routines, supplements, and techniques

So if you want to take it to the next level, and get that aesthetic, ripped physique that’ll get you laid in record time, click here and take advantage of my 25% discount and bonuses while they still last!

Read Next: 10 Reasons You Can’t Build Muscle

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

The Tyranny Of Technological Control Is Becoming A Reality

March 28, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

There's little doubt the ultimate goal of globalists is to roll out a Global Technological Control grid, in which everything and everybody is connected – and monitored – by a computer network spanning the entire globe. Essentially, the dream of the elite is to unfurl a system of electronically enforced Communism via subcutaneous microchips. Of course, the elite and their cronies who possess what Aaron Russo called the "KMA chip" or the "Kiss My Ass chip" will be exempt from the micromanagement of daily life everyone else is forced to adhere to.

The elites' dream and commoners' nightmare of a "Prison Planet" is being done in degree. That chip in your new credit card that's supposed to enhance security? A rudimentary step towards getting a chip placed into your hand for all purchases as cash is eliminated. Incidentally, I noticed a fast food restaurant I recently visited inside The Matrix is now scanning all money because of supposed "fraud" but one can envision a system in which even cash itself is electronically monitored with paper-size chips in order to track how you're spending it.

That Big Brother sensor Progressive insurance has been attaching modest discounts to in order to get people to start welcoming second by second monitoring of their driving habits? Another piece of the puzzle. (Incidentally, many trucking companies already have cameras that monitor drivers' behavior 24 hours a day. How long before cameras are mandated inside passenger vehicles?)

Google and Facebook monitoring and storing every keystroke you ever make online? Yet another piece of the puzzle. Here's how a couple more emerging technologies play into the scheme.

5G, Global WiFi, and RFID

Once scoffed at, RFID is already emerging in everything from credit cards to Passports – the next step is putting the chip in your hand

Expected to be online by around 2020, 5G is the next generation of communications that will facilitate the coming Internet of Things.

Beyond the terrestrial cell networks which will be able to monitor tens of millions of electronic "brains" inside everything from our wallets to our cars to the products we buy, there are plans being hatched by billionaire Elon Musk to make WiFi ubiquitous worldwide via satellite. Newsweek hailed the announcement as yet another undeniable consequence of the all-important word "progress" without detailing any of the inherent risks:

> Musk announced the scheme to launch a network of geosynchronous satellites, allowing high-speed internet access all over the globe. Musk told Businessweek: "The long-term potential is to be the primary means of long-distance internet traffic and to serve people in sparsely populated areas." It would not only provide internet for the millions of people without it in remote or impoverished areas of the world, but, in theory, also make current connection speeds quicker as light travels faster in space than it does in the fibre optic cables used now.

Translation: There will soon be no escaping the reach of the central planners and micromanagers in the corporate-government complex. As everything humans do shifts from physical reality to being mediated by an electronic "middleman" the potential for abuse of power becomes an enormous concern.

Nobody listened when Aaron Russo sounded the alarm about the RFID agenda a decade ago:

> The ultimate goal that these people have in mind is the goal to create a one-world government, run by the banking industry. Run by the bankers. And the whole agenda is to create a one-world government where everybody has an RFID chip implanted in them. All money is to be in those chips — there'll be no more cash. And this is given me straight from Rockefeller himself; this is what they want to accomplish. And all money will be in your chips. And so, instead of having cash, any time you have money in your chip, they can take out whatever they want to take out whenever they want to. If they say "you owe us this much > money in taxes," they just deduct it out of your chip, digitally. And, if you're like me or you, and you're protesting what they're doing, they can just turn off your chip. And you have nothing. You can't buy food. You can't do anything. It's total control of the people.

Those who went along with Russo's frightful vision of the future were called nuts, crackpots, and cranks. However, even those who once scoffed at these warnings are now being forced to take a second look as globalist designs become more obvious by the year.

Internet Of Things

Progressive car insurance will give you a modest discount if you'll let them monitor everything you do on the road

These emerging communications technologies will be the backbone for what is the truly threatening risk to the freedom an autonomy of mankind: the Internet of Things.

> The Internet of things is the inter-networking of physical devices, vehicles (also referred to as "connected devices" and "smart devices"), buildings, and other items—embedded with electronics, software, sensors, actuators, and network connectivity that enable these objects to collect and exchange data.

It sounds harmless, right? Except when one sees one of the goals is to take human decision making out of something as benign as driving to work. As revealed by WIRED:

> If there's ice on the bridge, the same sensors in the concrete will detect it and communicate the information via the wireless internet to your car. Once your car knows there's a hazard ahead, it will instruct the driver to slow down, and if the driver doesn't, then the car will slow down for him.

But it goes deeper than that. Facebook and Google can already predict consumer behavior by monitoring your behavior online. Imagine when there are sensors that track everything you purchase, everywhere you go, and even everything you say with voice recognition technology. The control grid assumes even more power over our lives. The Waking Times gives us another piece of the puzzle:

> The deeper level is really about the construction of a total technological control grid whose ultimate purpose is to know what you're thinking and feeling, and then be able to change what you're thinking and feeling so as to control your > actions. In other words, complete technological slavery. Like many aspects of the worldwide conspiracy, most people who push forward their particular aspect of the overall agenda have no idea of the deeper ramifications or where the whole thing is headed.

Ultimately, the Internet of Things will be a world-size robot. Bruce Schneier writes for Forbes:

> You can think of the sensors as the eyes and ears of the internet. You can think of the actuators as the hands and feet of the internet. And you can think of the stuff in the middle as the brain. We are building an internet that senses, thinks, and acts.
>
> This is the classic definition of a robot. We're building a world-size robot, and we don't even realize it.
>
> This world-size robot is actually more than the Internet of Things. It's a combination of … mobile computing, cloud computing, always-on computing, huge databases of personal information, the Internet of Things … autonomy, and artificial intelligence … It'll get more powerful and more capable through all the interconnections we're building.
>
> It'll also get much more dangerous.

Some would say that's been the plan all along. To take individual human decision making out of the equation and let all decisions be made – and electronically enforced – by the collective. We are closer to realizing this dystopia than most people understand. To the elites, Ayn Rand's freedom, reason, and individualism are so passé.

Read More: How We Arrived At The State Of Total Globalization

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

The Orthodox Church Is The Answer To Reviving Christianity In Europe And Saving The West

March 28, 2017 | by Maximus Decimus Meridius | Link | Original Link

First let us take a look at a Christian faith that is strong, vibrant and alive.

Christianity is a beautiful faith. For all my previous criticism of its intellectual formulation, the one thing it gets 100% correct is that it actually enshrines the nuclear family unit – Father, Son and virgin Mother. In that respect, it is more patriarchal than Islam in overtly formulating The Father as divine authority, The Son as heir to that authority, and the virgin Mary as model all women should aspire to be as wife and mother. The video above is a 26 minute silent reflection on life inside a men's Orthodox Christian monastery in Abkhazia. The power of the documentary is palpable for its very lack of speech and thus quiet testimony to the essence of Christian truth – the worship of God through Jesus Christ.

After the passionate response to my last essay, I went on YouTube to look up what I could find on the Eastern Orthodox faith. Here is a great video series I would like to share with you all.

For Christianity to return and thrive in Europe & The West, there must be unity.

The single biggest advantage of the Orthodox faith is its unity. There is simply too much division and conflict in almost all flavours of Christianity outside the Roman Catholic Church. Historically, the Orthodox faith does not have a real history of theology (per se).

That is, the Orthodox don't think too much or question too deeply about their faith. They accept. They believe. They practice. Most importantly, they do not allow any change – none – to what they believe is the original church handed down to humanity from St. Paul.

For the Orthodox, it is not about the intellectual foundations (i.e. theology) so much as the community of worshipers and keeping to past traditions. They keep to what their ancestors practiced and see no need to change anything. Doing so would be a grave break and violation of the past, a complete insult to the body of Christ and the family tradition that has been passed down for generations to preserve the faith.

Eastern Orthodox Christianity has kept the original Byzantine rituals and formulations for worship. A good example of its seriousness and unwillingness to change is the fact that they will not let anyone who is not Orthodox to take part in communion. They see communion as a serious ritual, the true taking in of the body and life of Christ, His word, and His salvation. To allow just anyone to partake without proper preparation, proper orientation, and proper intention, is dangerous. The liturgy and hymns are also old. They go back all the way to the original church over 1000 years ago and more. The swinging incense pots is not some ornate flashy thing they do, there is real spiritual purpose and foundation to everything in an Orthodox liturgical mass.

What I have just described is practiced by all Orthodox churches which may strike many American Protestants and Evangelicals as odd. The different designations (Greek, Ukrainian, Russian, etc.) are nothing more than jurisdictional boundaries. If you are Russian, you want to go to mass in your language and with your people. Each church is local and loosely affiliated with the others, but there is no over arching official hierarchy, no Pope as it were for the ENTIRE faith. What unites them as Orthodox is not a single authority ON doctrine (per se), but common faith IN practice (de rigueur).

In many ways, Martin Luther was a revolt against the Pope having authority over how to worship by the local community. His opposition to Indulgences and a paper titled "The Pagan Servitude To The Church" are reminiscent of my own intellectual wrestling trying to understand Christianity. For Luther, it was ultimately about a return of faith to the followers of Christ, not blind obedience to papal authority for which he saw no authority given to it.

> His theology challenged the authority and office of the Pope by teaching that the Bible is the only source of divinely revealed knowledge from God[3] and opposed sacerdotalism by considering all baptized Christians to be a holy priesthood.
>
> Martin Luther ~ Wikipedia

Ironically, in Eastern Orthodox, the power of the church rests in the local faithful and has forever been this way. In one video, a story is told about an Orthodox priest who was invited to a world religions syncretic type seminar where he was quoted at the end of the conference as saying "Yes, there are many paths to God and all are valid." When he returned to his local church and went to put the key in the door, the local church members had already changed the locks!!! How many Catholics would like to do that to the current Pope?!?! This is why the East rejected authority of Rome over THEIR religion. Christ belongs to the people, from God, and the Eastern Orthodox have protected this faith and non-hierarchical organization since the beginning of Christianity.

> Why is it that Eastern Christians are agreeable about this? Why don't they clamour and agitate for new stuff, for revision, for updating? The reason is that in the East, we expect the faith to actually do something. It isn't just a matter of having the right institution, or having the right theology, though I believe the Orthodox church does have those things. That's not what does it, really. It's that we expect that practicing this faith will change people. And you know what? We see that it actually does. We see it over and over again. We see it in contemporary lives. We see people actually transformed. [Video]

To an Orthodox, they practice because it works, not just because it is right.

This… that single statement… would unite all Christianity. Gone would be the divisions, the arguments, the 1000s of flavours of Christ by each Protestant wanting to be a Pope.

If I ever become Christian, it will be in the Orthodox faith. This single video series has proved to me beyond a shadow of doubt that what the Orthodox has works. It works because…

Even after over 70 plus years of Communist oppression & outright murder, the faith has rebounded Russians are Orthodox because faith in Christ works, not just because it is right. If you have ever known a Russian, you know how much they value what works and not what is bullshit. My intellectualization and analysis of Christianity is precisely the problem in The West. No single Christian tradition in The West, outside of the Catholic faith, can truly claim that what they have works, but they have ALL argued and warred for centuries about being right.

If Western Christianity did work, people would not have left. Leaving aside the massive hurdle of getting Westerners to actually stop being atheists or completely ignoring God, a Christian faith that can actually claim to work is precisely what will get someone like me back in the church. A claim I must repeat, that is actually backed up by evidence, not rhetoric.

The final video I want to close off with is an Orthodox explanation of salvation.

This… brought tears to my eyes. It actually answered one, if not THE, core complaint Westerners have about Christianity as they know it – you are condemned to hell if you reject Christ, and no amount of good works or deeds or repentance can save you if you do not accept Christ, the end. Of importance to note, this priest refers to God only when explaining the Orthodox version of salvation; it is God, not Jesus that is the focus of Eastern Orthodox faith. I suspect this is why the Protestants split from The Vatican and we can see it in their further splintering right up to today; Protestants wanted more Jesus and less God talk from the Pope because it was Jesus that truly saves. (Once again, you can see why a non-Christian starts to scratch his head in puzzlement.)

This Orthodox version of salvation is one I have never heard from any Christian priest or pastor in The West. If Europe, if America, were to hear the message of God in the Orthodox faith, I think you would have a revival like none we have ever witnessed in the past. In fact, the whole Theoria YouTube channel is, I suspect, a production created for just that reason. Thousands of disillusioned Protestants and other long lost former Christians are filling the Orthodox churches. The Theoria video series was created to help orient and guide the newly faithful. Is their any other church outside Catholicism that is seeing this kind of resurgence? (Assuming Catholicism is seeing an influx, I do not know and just speculating because it too has a good history of unity in faith and would be The West's oldest incarnation of Christianity.)

Conclusion

Putin is demonized in the West for many things, but the one reason "they" hate him the most? Putin and Russia are a walking, talking, living reminder of a faith they thought was all but extinct by their design and command. Putin's Christian message is not just reaching America, but the entirety of Europe. Note as well that Putin is an astounding example of the claim to proof that the Orthodox faith works.

He has single-handedly inserted himself in Syria and reversed what was not just the holocaust of Syrian Christians, but the globalist plan to balkanize the region with Iran being the last Muslim nation standing in their way. For all those who claim Islam is favored by the elites and want it to take over Europe, just look to Muslim lands where, regardless of how you feel about Islam as a religion, the homeland of Muslim faith is being literally bombed into oblivion in a way Christian "Muslim invasion" Europe is not.

Make no mistake, after Islam's "victory" in Europe, it will be up next for targeted wholesale destruction by they who hate God more than they hate humanity.

I have no doubt that if Europe and The West can find its way back to Christianity, our future will look as bright as Russia's. From even this most minimal and cursory review of the Eastern Orthodox faith, it is the only path back to Christ in Europe and The West that I can see actually working.

What Christianity needs is unity of faith, unity of belief, unity of practice and unity in God. All of this is found in the Eastern Orthodox church and nowhere else.

Read More: ROK Undercover: What It's Like To Attend An Eastern Orthodox Church Service

Maximus Decimus Meridius
Maximus is a Man, capital M, period. Love. Truth. Justice. Liberty. Respect. These are the lodestones pointing true to magnetic masculinity in a polarized feminist west. His goal for writing on ROK is to be the gadfly that provokes thought and counters groupthink. You can find more of his writing at A Dream That Was Rome . Com

Talk Show Radio Host Michael Savage Attacked On Street, Mainstream Media Says Nothing

March 29, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Michael Savage, the popular talk radio host of the Michael Savage show, was assaulted by a man at a San Francisco restaurant this month. According to reports, the tall man knocked away Savage's ten pound pet poodle, Teddy, and knocked the 74-year-old Savage to the ground. A Good Samaritan arrived to help, but was also met with the ground from the violent attacker. The man fled and police are still investigating.

Thankfully, Savage sustained minor injuries. However, it is appalling how this coward attacker wasn't charged for assaulting a senior citizen and animal abuse for his actions. On Savage's show, he expressed his frustration at how someone could get away with this and why there was little to no mass media coverage.

Savage had his attorney, Daniel Horowitz, on air detailing how California's laws has loopholes allowing the attacker to possibly get away, and because Savage was not bleeding in a hospital bed, this coward is using the law to escape. Savage is going to pursue however, until justice is served as he has a case being a victim of assault. What is odd is how and why this happened.

Trump's War Is Real

It is ironic that this attack happened just after Savage released his brand new book, Trump's War, which officially hit the book shelves just before the attack where Savage reveals how the Media, along with corrupt international globalists like George Soros, are waging a real war against the Trump administration by funneling money to lobbyists and third party groups like Black Lives Matter.

Savage also lists the names of organizations funded by Soros and spills the beans on other corrupt activities by CNN, and other media. The book contains names in a truly tell like it is fashion. So, it is very suspicious how this attack occurred right after the release of the book.

This isn't the first time however, that Savage has been scrutinized for his words. He has been banned from entering Britain, being placed on a list with international terrorists for simply speaking against the corrupt political machine.

"Liberalism is a Mental Disorder"

Savage coined this term a while ago, and has spoken out against Angela Merkel's actions in Germany of allowing obscene amounts of refugees to enter leading to the rampant rapes and assaults of German people.

Although Trump's message has won him the votes of millions, Savage has been exposing the enemy globalists within the United States, and that Radical Islamic terrorism must be stopped before they hijack the entire planet.

BORDERS, LANGUAGE, CULTURE

Being in the radio business for over sixteen years, his message has always been the same – BORDERS, LANGUAGE, and CULTURE. When Trump officially announced his run for the presidency, Savage was the first to support him from the beginning to the very end as he saw Trump as the only candidate son capable of beating Hilary. Although an imperfect man, Trump far exceeded the competition with his charisma and straightforward honesty as unlike other politicians, he couldn't be bought.

Savage is an outspoken supporter of Trump, calling out liberal frauds by name such as Nancy Pelosi, Barbara Boxer, and billionaire manipulators like George Soros and Mark Zuckerberg. Could this be why he was assaulted? If it was a paid hit job, it won't be a surprise. Glenn Beck admitted to being attacked when speaking out against Soros. Many others have also been subject to the "treatment" for blowing the whistle too loud too often. So is this what happens now?

It seems that the law favors criminals allowing them to get away with violence and even murder. Countless incidents have occurred in California by illegal immigrants and "protestors" against Trump supporters or even just innocent people minding their own business.

Not Likely A Random Attack

This man knew what he was doing he had an agenda as if on a mission. It was as if he was waiting for Savage outside of the restaurant waiting to strike.

Whatever your political views are, you may strongly dislike or hate someone, and may even think about punching them. However, thinking and doing is a big difference. For a person to go out of their way to track someone solely for beating them up must have a big motivation. Anger and hatred is one, but most won't do it fearing the law. However, if given a lump sum as well as legal support the incentive becomes too tempting.

It has already been revealed that so called "protestors" have received funds from unknown sources to cause trouble. With all the attacks done to Trump supporters lately, it could be possible this was a paid attacker. The question is by whom.

What we do know is that Savage is a powerful force for the Trump campaign. Even Donald Trump himself said he was put in office thanks to The Savage Nation. Both men have met on multiple occasions and dined together. Savage's show is number one in online radio yet he's never mentioned on mainstream media.

Regardless, this behavior is unacceptable and must stop. Trump supporters, famous or not, are not to be subject to violence without punishment.

Savage Stays Strong

Despite the cowardly attack from this unknown assailant, Savage is back on air and continues to tell it like it is. Whether this was a paid thug by the dark government is irrelevant. The media tries to relate Trump supporters in the same category as criminals, but Savage is more determined than ever and Americans should never be intimidated by the progressive left for their political views.

Read More: Talk Radio Host Michael Savage Is The Latest Casualty Of Leftist Censorship

G.S. Luthra

Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

Two Black Women Start A White Guilt Atonement Fund That Becomes Extremely Profitable

March 29, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

A March 17 article in NYMag, "These Women Started a Company to Teach White People How to Be Less Racist," reports on a new foundation called Safety Pin Box. The founders, Marissa Jenae Johnson and Leslie Mac, believe that the recent trend of wearing a safety pin to show you're concerned about—well, whatever it's supposed to mean—simply doesn't go far enough. As the article puts it:

> The monthly subscription service challenges its users to do more with their outrage than display it, and in exchange for $50-$100 a month (depending on the program) receive not a pin, not a pussy hat, but a lesson about racial bias and a task to tackle it.

So what do they do?

Apparently these two used to be 18th Century Portuguese slave ship captains, or did something bad like that.

The article continues:

> Plus, their cash contributions fund black-women activists, in an attempt at reparations. Three months later, Safety Pin Box has 800 subscribers and has contributed nearly $21,000 to Black Women Being. Both Johnson and Mac have quit their jobs to focus on the project full time.

Then it explains that the two founders have quit their day jobs to become professional activists. They developed the concept while vacationing together in Jamaica and mulling over current events. They considered the safety pin thing to be an empty gesture (I agree). Then they noticed the trend being commercialized. About that, they stated:

> [T]hese things are most likely just going to [benefit] privileged white people. And that's what brought us to say, if people want to actually do something useful, they can pay us reparations. And we can literally tell them what to do even though we've already been telling them, and they haven't been listening.

What will the penitents receive for their monthly payments? $25 gets you "an electronic form of solidarity, with one emailed task per month and exclusive calls to action." $50 will allow you to correspond with another penitent and work together toward the monthly atonement activity. But wait! There's more! "Our $100/month subscription is a premium box and you get three full tasks, access to our biweekly podcast, and quarterly webinars with high-profile black women."

So December was Radical Compassion month (with a focus on senior citizens, so far so good), January was Not my President month (I'm guessing this isn't a nonpartisan outfit), February was Black History Month (quite naturally), and March is "to raise funds for the new Marsha P. Johnson institute that will provide awareness of her prominence as a black transgender woman activist."

Who receives the "reparations"?

As for the funding, it's not specified what their operating costs are (apparently executive salaries and a website), but the remainder "goes to Black Women Being, that gives straight cash to black women activists. We do fund some other group projects and activist groups on the side, but our main giving every month is through Black Women Being."

Will any of the guilt money be used to improve the lives of the impoverished in the Black community? Since the article states that it's going to selected activists, apparently that means executive salaries and more propaganda. It's not clear what the "group projects" involve, but I have a suggestion: how about entrepreneurship workshops, anti-drug education, or programs to encourage kids to stay in school?

Think that's a pretty good hustle if you can get it? Well, the good news is that you too can apply to be a beneficiary. If you're not female, that's no barrier; transsexuals are notably included. As today's sociopolitical rhetoric goes, the only criterion is saying you feel like a woman. If you're not Black, no problem. Like gender, race is only a social construct, right? Just do what Rachel Dolezal did.

A modest proposal

Union soldiers killed in action at Gettysburg. What have today's "community organizers" done compared to these guys?

I must say, these ladies have inspired me. White people are an underappreciated demographic, because of fifty years of leftist propaganda demonizing us. My own family history inspired me on how we can help fix this problem.

Most of my ancestors came to the USA in the 1880s. However, two were here before then. Both fought in the Civil War under Abraham Lincoln's banner. One of them didn't come back; he died of starvation in a POW camp called Andersonville, which made the Hanoi Hilton seem like an actual Hilton.

Did his death affect his family? Quite surely it did. Even the one who survived experienced the horrors of the worst war the USA has endured. Could my life have been affected (and all others on that branch of my extended family) because of that? Well, because of the lingering effects of what happened a century and a half ago… well, you've heard all that sort of rhetoric before, so surely you have no need of convincing.

Their efforts, and those of other Union Army soldiers, resulted in the emancipation of all the slaves in the Confederacy. Granted, only 2% of Southerners actually owned any slaves. Even so, the Union Army did a lot more for the Black community than does giving money to random activists. So how about a little payback in recognition of their sacrifice? I can set up a Patreon fund called "Sons of the Liberators". Any Black person can show his or her gratitude for the Emancipation Proclamation—which came at the price of hundreds of thousands of lives—by donating to this fund.

A $25/month commitment will get the base level membership, including a "Thank You White America" bumper sticker and lapel button. For $50 a month, I'll send a genuine coin with Abraham Lincoln's portrait embossed on the front. But wait! There's more! For $100 a month, I'll send some YouTube videos for them explaining all the good things Whites did and counteracting false White guilt. I might also create a random annual drawing for a plane ticket to Haiti, for the lucky winner to get some intercultural perspectives on how life in America compares.

As for the rest of the funds, I won't quit my day job or even keep any of it for myself. Instead, I'll pick a White activist who will help counter all the negative publicity that our community has been getting. I bet some of the folks over at VDARE have ancestors who were Yankee soldiers.

A better idea (this time seriously)

Those who nurture resentments about things that happened long ago, instead they should pursue improving their present-day lives. Those who wallow in guilt about things they had no part of, instead they should embrace their own people and educate themselves about their culture's unique accomplishments. For those feeling charitable, they can donate to a fund countering the effects of poverty no matter what the recipients look like.

Read More: Female Police Officers And Soldiers Reduce Everyone's Safety

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How Flipping The Script Can Help You Meet Hot Girls

March 29, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Coming into game and understanding inter-gender dynamics is an eye-opener for many men, and it takes some longer than others to understand what the best strategies available are to those who want to improve their success with women. When people find out that I write about game for a living they will often ask what my best 'chat up' line is, failing to understand that the 'opener' is really just that, an opener. No single line is ever strong enough to get a woman into bed immediately (unless that line is 'I am Justin Bieber').

But if they asked me what my best overall strategy for meeting women was, I would say that it is flipping the script. In fact, it is only by learning to flip the scrip proficiently that you will start to see incremental gains in your success with girls over time as well as in your social standing.

What Is The Script?

Think about how social interactions between men and women are usually calibrated for a moment. As you will be aware, the whole set up in Western society positions the woman as the dominant actor with the man a kind of underdog who must kow-tow to her, bring her gifts and entertain her in order to be in with a chance of vaginal access with her.

The concept of courtly love, which was identified by writers and historian in the 19th century but was actually operational from 1099 or so in France, was a highly stylised form of courtship where knights were encouraged to undertake acts of extreme bravery in order to win the hearts of the ladies they were enamoured of. Unbelievably, poets actually declared themselves 'vassals' of their lady, even addressing her as maidens, or 'my lord.' So subjugated were men at this point that they actually referred to women in the masculine. And you thought guys being cucked was something new!

This notion of the female as a superior being whose affections can only be obtained through male supplication has infused literature, art, music and film ever since. It is so deep-rooted in our culture as to be almost indomitable. And today, in the age of selfies and Instagram, with thirsty men liking each and every attention-whoring post that gets put up, day or night, you might reasonably argue that its fever pitch has only increased. It is for this reason that flipping the script is more important than ever for gaining cut-through in a competitive sexual marketplace.

What Is Flipping The Script?

Flipping the Script is defined like this:

> Reversing the usual or existing positions in a situation; doing something unexpected or revolutionary.

It has been part of pick-up phraseology for many years now, along with another, related concept: ‘You are the prize.’ Basically, when it comes to dealing with women, the idea is simply that you must refuse to except the frame of the underdog and instead go into every interaction with the unstated assumption that you as the guy are the dominant party, and she should be the one who proves herself worthy of you.

Of course, this sounds very simple in outline, but how do you actually go about putting it into practice? It’s not easy, especially since you are effectively pushing back against centuries of social conditioning and the conventional operating system that scaffolds our culture.

Why It Works

But it is precisely for these reasons that flipping the script works so well. Think about this for a moment. Who are the guys who are walking around now who are naturally unintimidated by hot girls, and who are naturally uncowed by them? Very rich, very handsome, very high-value alpha males. Pop stars, billionaire playboys, members of the Saudi royal family, rappers, actors. You get the idea.

Now if a hot girl is treated in an offhand manner by one of the above, do you think she's going to be surprised or mad? No, of course she isn't. Recognising that such a man is higher value than her, she will naturally expect him to be off-hand with her, perhaps even rude. Why? Because he's special and unique and she isn't. You think a really hot girl, a 9, expects Justin Bieber to be nice to her off the bat? No she doesn't, because she knows that, however hot she is, his social capital as a world-famous celebrity is infinitely higher than hers. So when he is rude to her at the stage door after a concert she will only try harder to impress him, so much so she'll actually be grateful if he finally deigns to have sex with her.

The Power Of Flipping The Script

Here's the thing. The social convention of guys having to be supplicating to girls in order to get into their pants is actually extremely useful to women. Not only does it mean they get free drinks, dinners, cars, holidays to Dubai and so on, but it also means that they are able to discern the real high-value men from the fake.

A really high value man, like Bieber, might choose to lavish a girl with gifts, but he wouldn't have to in order to sleep with her. In fact, most girls would think it weird if he did. Can you imagine? 'Hi, it's Justin. I bought you these flowers because I think you're really nice.' It would be entirely incongruent. All Justin has to say is three words—'Room 1895 now'—in order to get girls in his bed: and they know it.

Now, we can take advantage of this phenomenon to our benefit, because when you start acting with the imperious disdain of a rock star then girls are naturally going to be curious. OK, a few might laugh and call into question your right to be so cocky. But even so, they will wonder. 'How come this guy is acting so dismissive of me? There must be something about him.' As I have said before, you don't necessarily have to be a high-value stone cold alpha off the bat. If you can take on some of the habits and attitudes of the alpha then you will find yourself being put into that category by default, since girls by-and-large just aren't used to low value guys acting like that,

How Do You Flip The Script

How to do it? That could be the subject of a whole book. The most obvious tool at your disposal is 'fake it 'til you make it'. To misquote the acting professor Stanislavsky, you should 'act as if'. Try to imagine what Bieber (or whoever else you'd like to emulate) would do as he walked down this street or came into contact with girls in this club. How would he look at them? How would he speak to them? What would he say? What would his tonality be like? What would his body language look like? How would his eye contact and gestures be?

If you want to get specific, go on to YouTube and study whoever it is you're thinking of for some tips. Then practice acting just like that. Another tool that has been very useful to me over the years is defiance. I was a classic hard-case beta who simply refused to live my life in that way. Years ago I used to shrink into the corner in nightclubs afraid to make eye contact. Now, friends and colleagues tease me for my walk, which they call a strut—they say I walk around like I own the place, which I do.

My voice is a loud and strong, my eye contact is good and if anything I have to tone down my natural ebullience and confidence when I meet people in order not to dominate proceedings. This is not to big myself up, but merely to indicate that you can change and adopt high-value behaviours—and a great way to spark that process off is by getting angry with yourself and refusing to behave like a little bitch any longer.

A Note Of Caution

One note of caution: if you are at a less than optimal stage in other areas of your life, then simply flipping the script on its own may not deliver you miraculous results. What I mean is this. If you walk around the club acting like a rock star when actually you're broke, overweight and dressed badly then of course people are going to see through that. Now, perhaps Jack Black walks around the club like that and still gets laid (although of course he's not broke) but he also has a ton of social proof backing him up.

So my message, as always, is that as with any game tool, as you use it you must also simultaneously look to raise your real sexual market value in all other areas. You should be reading books, you should be going to the gym, you should be eating right, dressing well and so on. But simply by adopting the mental and behavioural habit of flipping the script, I promise you will start to see positive changes in the ways girls react to you.

Want to find out more about how to attract hot girls in today's market? Get hold of a copy of Troy's bestselling book The 7 Laws of Seduction. For daily updates on game follow Troy on Twitter.

Read More: Why 'Nexting' Unsuitable Women is Good for Your Sex Life

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

6 Tips To Stay Fit On The Road While Traveling

March 29, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

One of the most aggravating things about being on the road is not always having access to a high-quality gym. Sure, most digital nomads settle down for a month at a time in places. But what about those periods where you're seeing several different cities over ten days?

You'll be walking a lot, but getting to the gym consistently is naturally going to be a bit of a challenge. Here are six tips that any digital nomad or world traveler can use as a bit of a guideline to stay fit while traveling.

1. Understand That You Want To Try New Things

Let me get one thing clear: you definitely can stay leaned out while traveling if you work at it. But it's definitely difficult to get into significantly better shape when you're hopping all over the place.

If you go to a new country, you're naturally going to want to try all of the new things. Beer. Hard liquor. Wine. The local delicacies. You're not going to want to eat grilled chicken and brown rice when you're exploring a new city or country for the first time. And don't lie to yourself and say that you will eat those things, all the time.

So be realistic with yourself from the get-go. Understand that you can moderate and control things, but if you truly want to get in ripped it's probably going to take settling down, cooking food at home, and having a consistent gym schedule and diet.

Don't kid yourself and say that you can get ripped while you hop to a new country every two weeks, boozing, picking up girls, and trying new cuisines all at once. It's just not reasonable to have it all at once—for most people. There are certain people that could accomplish this, but I'm not one of them. And I suspect your average person falls into the same boat as me with this.

2. Everywhere Has Free Trials

Even if you're staying in a spot for a very short amount of time, you can still get to the gym. Many places offer you a free trial. Just check all of the gym websites, and also check the local hotels. Many of them will let you go and take a trial for a day—though I don't understand why anyone would want to work out at a hotel gym full-time.

On top of it, a lot of places will offer you a week, ten day, or two week pass. Sure, it comes at a premium—but it's usually not more than $25-$40 in South America or Eastern Europe. I can't imagine it's too much more expensive in Southeast Asia, either $25 is absolutely worth it to keep a fitness routine going. Even if you're only there temporarily, going to the gym will resemble some normalcy of being home, which will improve your overall mood and make you more likely to be successful if your goal is to sleep with some cute foreign girls.

3. Online Programs

Every fitness guru on the planet now has online programs available in digital download format. While you'll be constricted to bodyweight-only exercises in many cases, programs like P90X, Insanity, and more do offer a good, quick way to get a workout. They make you move at a fast pace, so if you don't have heavy weights you'll at least get your heart up and going.

You don't even need to invest in an expensive program. There are hundreds of free apps that are out there on the market that do the same thing. I've lately been using Sworkit and it's been a good experience overall.

Bonus: Long haul flights, lugging bags around cities, and general travel can really have an effect on your body. Try to supplement with a bit of yoga—it's easy enough to fit a small yoga mat in a carry-on backpack. The same principles apply—use an online program or app, and help keep yourself limber. I've been using the Down Dog app on my iPad lately.

4. Stand Whenever Possible

I'll never understand the people who are flying in economy and rush to get on the plane before everybody else. They're usually the people who are trying to cram their entire life into a carry-on, and then take all of the carry-on space in the plane instead of just checking the bag.

But why would you want to rush to get into the big metal tube before everybody else? So you can sit down before the rest of the passengers before you have to sit through an entire 10 hour flight? Silly.

When you're on the road and left in limbo, make every effort to stand when possible. If you're trying to get some work done in the airport, try to find a bar or cafe that has a table with higher stools. They can make excellent makeshift standing desks. The more time you can spend on your feet, the better you will feel overall.

The last thing you want is to be so stiff from sitting in planes and airports that you feel unable to work out once you reach your destination. Standing and walking around the airports or other transit hubs will keep the blood flowing and make you less likely to feel like a wood board.

5. Walk Everywhere You Can

This one is fairly obvious, but it's worth mentioning. If you're doing some touristic stuff, don't take Ubers, cabs, or public transit if you can help it. You never know what you might uncover by walking to your destination. You might find a local's watering hole or a beautiful cafe. All sorts of neat things can be found when you stop rushing and take your time to take in the sights.

So if where you're trying to go is less than a mile or two away—do it by foot. Avoid taking the easy route by calling an Uber or walking into the metro.

6. Eat Out In Moderation

I know that I mentioned in #1 that you'd be wanting to eat out. But it doesn't mean you need to eat out every meal. Typically, breakfasts around the world are not that unique to a country's specific cuisine, so you won't miss much there. You should go out and see what breakfast is like—but once or twice is enough.

What I'm saying is, don't make eating out three times a day a staple of your diet. No matter where you are in the world, it's a challenge to eat healthy every time if you never cook.

These days, renting an apartment is very affordable. Plus, it's often a much better experience than in a hotel. So rent an apartment and commit to cooking at least once a day. Your wallet and waistline will both thank you over the long term.

If you're looking to improve your ability to travel and want to build a business, check out Troublesome Solutions—where I offer free consultations. Make sure to check out my niche site, Eastern European Travel, for more travel tips and tricks around Europe.

Read More: 7 Things I Learned On The Road This Year

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

9 Cultural Elements To Consider Before Travelling Or Moving To Russia

March 30, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

The more degenerate Europe and the Anglosphere get, the more Russia pops up in conversations around Western men, as a possible destination for a long term stay.

Writing those lines as my plane lands home, concluding two weeks spent in provincial Russia, I realise that I was prone to idealise this country in my teens but after taking the red pill and visiting it a few times, I am much more objective about it and will now share notions that must be known before considering settling there.

1. Seeing many beautiful women is the norm

Women as a whole are just more numerous within Russian borders because they do not destroy themselves as much as they do in the USA. Girls in Russia take better care of themselves, are slimmer, and want to be genuinely beautiful according to universal standards (thin, long hair, nice skin with no tattoos etc). After the two world wars and its millions of young men dead, the Great Purge and criminality, alcoholism and drug abuse from the nineties onwards helped in creating a visible majority of women compared to men.

I also found out that Russian women generally age better, especially in their thirties and forties. Everywhere you look you see mothers that stay slim even after having children, as they did the intelligent choice of having them earlier than their Western counterparts. The savage concurrence of younger girls also keep wives and girlfriends on their toes as they can be replaced in eye blink.

2. Russians have their own notion of politeness

Educated Anglos say “Thank You” 24/7 while Russians only say it when their interlocutor did something genuinely nice. It seems that there is absolutely no need to be polite to someone you do not know.

Where the Englishman would apologise profusely and wait for you to move out of his path, the Russian would just say “Razreshajtje” (Allow me) and shove you out of his way. In the lift going to a club, I saw a French beta being elbowed in the ribs by a tiny girl in high heels because he did not move out of the way fast enough.

This roughness is also a trademark among the old, bitter babushkas. Asking about anything in an official building, the harpy will just point at a board and yell “You know how to read, don’t you?” Or when you want to buy something and ask “Excuse me, How much does it cost?”, she will tell you “Do I look like a shop clerk?” The three meanest creatures in Russian cities: cops in a bad mood, babushkas and stray dogs.

People also rarely smile, it’s normal. Smiling to strangers is seen as a sign of insincerity. If an unknown Russian girl maintains eye contact or smile at you, approach. It is a green light

But Russians have a better sense of punctuality. Meeting at 18.00 means everyone is present at 17.45. It’s “18.00, last call. 18.01 we are gone, son.” What I like is that everyone take their shoes off when entering one’s home and guests never show up without gifts and flowers.

3. Without money, you are nothing

A Russian mate told me that in the West, it is virtually impossible to die of hunger with all the governmental help that you can find, even without a penny. Folks at home have now idea how lucky they are and should be thankful every time their plate is full.

The cost of life there is ridiculous compared to the local salaries. The minimum wage in the third tier city I was in flirted with the 180 USD monthly while the prices for fruit, vegetables or meat could be the same as in the US or Western Europe. Only alcohol, tobacco products, petrol and rent were cheaper than in the West. When the cab driver charges you 2 dollars for a regular fare and that a kilo of cucumbers costs the same price, it makes you think.

Everything must be paid for. No healthcare, no help from the state, no concept of middle class. Either you are wealthy or you are destitute. People that contract cancer and do not have the means to pay for the drugs or chemo are left to die. In the grey Soviet blocks of flats, you can find both the wealthy man with his Mercedes and the couple of chronic alcoholics that survive on potatoes and have to shit in a bucket because the town hall cut the water in their flat.

Human life is cheap. The recent phenomenon of the “golden youth” (Золотая молодёжь) appears in large Russian cities. Sons and daughters of oligarchs, driving the latest sport cars, run over people while drunk. Daddy dearest usually pays off judges in millions of dollars for three or four homicides and his little treasure gets 60 hours of community service, cleaning the city’s public fountains. I heard many stories where you can off someone by paying the local police the sufficient amount of money

4. Of game, corruption and distrust

Game works there. With girls, officials or strangers. You can never have to much of it.

An acquaintance of mine was caught parking illegally. Angry old passers by called the cops after writing insults on his windshield. He had no insurance, it was not his car and he had only a French driver's license. Cops got him for 10,000 RUB (175 USD at the time of my visit) to let him go but he had a written fine of 200 roubles for a invented infraction. The rest stayed in the cops' pocket.

A friend gifted me with a taser flashlight. They spotted it at the metal detector in my luggage on the way to the plane. They reminded me that it was a weapon and that I should follow for investigation at the local precinct. We showed no emotions, saying that we did not know of the specific law being tourists and gave the taser and a thousand roubles. We went our way as I heard them playing with the taser in the distance. The cop's son will have a nice gift but I did not give him the plug.

Everything can be bought and is negotiable. Wolf skins, mink furs, caviar, German cars, better exchange rate. If you know someone, can haggle and know game, you will live well.

When you are in your twenties or thirties and well dressed, girls will keep their guard up and will ask you why you are not married. They will sometimes suspect you of being married and lying about it. They will ask where you live, how long you are staying and cross check with what you said previously. Women there are master at analysing body language, frame, sense of style and the weight of a wallet. It is understandable in that environment.

Even young girls can give it all or test you and take you for a ride to enjoy your resources and give you nothing, if they feel that you will be easily plucked.

5. Russia is for the Russians

A majority of Russians seem to be very supportive of their government and president. It is unusual to observe both grandmas with portraits of Putin in their living room and teenage girls with Putin on the phone case of their last iPhone.

The television has at least three shows a day saying that Crimea is Russia, the radio says that gays are degenerates, calling out their propaganda and agenda sent from the West and pushing for it to be destroyed on the spot and everyone is on board.

At the same level of game, wealth, status or fitness, local men will always be chosen by Russian girls over foreigners. If you want to become Russian, you must assimilate. Foreigners and migrants have no organizations or programs to help them blend in. They must do it on their own if they want recognition.

Immigrants of a lower to normal social status, from Central Asia or the Caucasus, will always adopt a low profile in the street preventing the local Slavs to lash at them or attack them physically.

6. Extreme disparity between men and women

Local older men with zero game, shitty fashion style and zero fitness can bang the highest quality if they flaunt their money . You can be a pitukh (a “rooster”, slang for a drunk or a loser) as long as people feel that you have cash.

Not even ugly, but plain girls are almost invisible to the local men, like furniture. Beautiful women understand that they are legion in Russia and that age or a bit of attitude can get them nexted so they are kept in line. You will spot men looking like root vegetables walking with a stylish beauty queen with a flawless figure on their arm.

A well dressed foreigner with a good level of fitness, that speaks fluent Russian and has a normal (and upper) financial status would absolutely trample the bulk of the Russian male population any day of the week. In smaller cities, day game is something unheard of.

7. On sports

It is not a culture but a cult. Sport has a special status of prestige and almost every one takes interest in it. Old Soviet habits die hard. There is no better way to start a social circle than signing up at the local sports club. Gyms are a relatively new fashion, people can rarely afford them and prefer to train outside or compete a living opponent. Old school sportsmen are highly hostile to supplements and protein shakes.

People that teach sports are authorities in the matter and must have been “MasterSport” of the Soviet Union or Russia or have won a few World titles to have any credibility to teach. The idea of a McDojo would not last long there.

I had the luck of attending a few sessions at a local Sambo club. Where everywhere in the West, I would have to show my ID, prove that I am insured and have a written note from my physician, the Russian instructor asked my name, shook my hand and told me to start warming up.

He was 69 years old, four times World Champion and had a grip that could bend iron. He taught us his favourite techniques, slapping us on the head when we were not doing it properly and had a “no bullshit” approach aimed at efficiency in combat. His son was also a World Champion and so were a few of his students.

8. Difference between the family sphere and strangers

In the olden days when the State, institutions or your common man could absolutely not be trusted, the only circle you could count on was the immediate family. Russians kept this trait in their ethos to this day. Strangers, neighbors will always be suspicious when they do not know you and would be the first to hold your head under the water if they can profit from it.

But if you are accepted in the intimate circle of friendship, they would give you their last crumb of bread and you will make friends for life. My local friend's uncle would give me everything because I am known and in the circle but would roll over slow pedestrians crossing the road with his Gelik if he was late. This is the same with your landlord or the plumber.

The quality of the work is rarely checked when it comes to the normal standard of life and you must pay to get acceptable service.

9. Work ethic

Some people just do not give a shit. Cops smoke on the job, bus drivers are drunk, clerks sleep everywhere at their desk or are on the phone even if you are here to buy them things.

The workers will paint lines on a dirty road, over stones and garbage. It will be gone after the next rain but no one cares. Their job here is done. Customer satisfaction for the general public is a foreign notion and the minimum effort and service is what they look for. To get acceptable service, you must upgrade and pay for it.

Every space designed for the population is rusty, painted in a hurry, peppered with holes. Ceilings are leaking, naked electric cables show everywhere. Flower pots are made of empty oil barrels cut in half or buried tire trucks painted in yellow or blue mark the limit of the children's playground.

It is an architect's nightmare. The state of roads, curbs and buildings are often a joking matter among the locals. It will affect your everyday live and is worth considering if you like a cosy lifestyle or think about raising children there.

La Russie est une autre planète

With its long-legged girls, traditional values and endless stretches of land, it would sound like a great base for those who believe in the concepts of masculinity. But this place is another universe with its own rules.

You can not do what you want and thinking about your future or the future of a hypothetical family in Russia, you must understand that you might give up a safe, comfortable life accessible to everyone for a world with a radically different mindset and a lower standard of comfort that only large amounts of money can buy.

Think hard and choose wisely.

Read More: Why Russia Is Becoming A More Attractive Place For Neomasculine Men To Call Home

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Women Now Want Upfront Payment To Talk To Them On Tinder

March 30, 2017 | by Brock Robinson | Link | Original Link

In spring 2017, a new shameless method of micro wealth-extraction has surfaced on swipe-based dating apps such as Tinder.

Screenshots of various female Tinder profiles along with their account information from Venmo, a payment app, have recently spread through the internet like wildfire. I've seen a lot gold-digging in my day, but I have to say even I was a little shocked at just how brazen and transparent many women have become with turning men into docile doormats and personal ATMs. It used to be something they knew was bad and would try to hide it, or if you were lucky they just didn't do it at all.

Welcome to the 21st century

Some of the Tinder e-begging you'll encounter will be from automated scambots.

But you know it's for real if she posts her actual social media accounts and financial accounts directly in her bio:

Preying on the well-intentioned but grossly naive generosity of weak men with no better options, these girls make a hobby of shaking down simps for small amounts of cash. It may not seem like a lot of money on the surface, but what happens when you're a cute girl in the digital marketplace surrounded by an endless swarm of sniveling beta males who will eagerly shell out the bucks for a virtual e-hug?

Those micro-deposits add up when you're selling bottled water in a thirsty desert. The end result is that the girls laugh their way to the bank after taking advantage of the misguided nice guy.

> Pro tip: Work it ladies, guys will do anything for your number….. > pic.twitter.com/6eBJiCxbNA
>
> — ashran (@ashnrandall) March 25, 2017

The concerning factor here is not that a few random or troubled girls are doing things like this; it's the growing trend that we all are witnessing, encouraged in pop culture and female role models. And worst of all, it's being tolerated by men. You get what you put up with.

The sheer quantity of "normal" girls in America who are opting into casual prostitution with sugar daddies just because they can is astonishing. They either hide these types of things from the men they are interested in dating, or the men tolerate it, turn a blind eye and get what they put up with.

When you hear about some random theoretical girl prostituting herself it's not really a big deal. But what if I told you that a growing majority of your generation's dating pool is cashing in without you even realizing it? The women you know? The women you chase after? Your sisters and cousins? Your girlfriends and wives?

I wish I was joking but this is the new norm

It’s just not on the mainstream radar yet. Pay to play is law of the land in the modern American dating scene. Yes, you can search for exceptions and find them but the general trend is growing rapidly and that fact remains.

As a man who’s interested in talking to millennial women without her trying to profit from you, the best solution might be to head for the greener pastures of developing countries where the epidemic has yet to spread. Or you can remain in America where its scam or be scammed.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Brock Robinson
Brock Robinson is a 26 year old cubicle drone turned writer slaying his way through America's troubled millennial generation one girl at a time, sometimes two. You can read about his dates, travels, and Game advice at The City Bachelor and also on Twitter

How Anime Is Programming Men To Be Weak And Submissive

March 30, 2017 | by Ryan Ashville | Link | Original Link

Last year, I decided to stay over at an old friend's apartment, who had been my roommate back in college. A couple of weeks of residing there, every time I moved in and out of his room, my old buddy would be watching anime on his laptop. His door had a poster of his favorite anime, 'Sword Art Online'.

He wasn't an otaku or a dumb weeb, rather to simply put it, it was his pass time or a hobby, to relax from the stress that men face in the modern day world. I remember watching anime as a kid, and I admit, I enjoyed it…

But not anymore.

When he watched anime, he stared at the screen with fascination, as if he was a scientist waiting for the rocket to land on the moon. I was curious, so I asked him to recommend me some anime that he enjoyed. This is where I realized the ugly, misandric nature of anime that teens are exposed to.

The first anime I chose from the list, was about a teenage girl named Misaki, who joined an all boys school which recently opened to girls. She works as a maid to support her family as her father had abandoned them.

The "Does Not Like Men" Female Protagonist

A female protagonist that openly hates men

Misaki never trusts her male counterparts, and beats them up if they tried something she didn't approve of. The whole show is centered on how girls can be better than boys, where she terrorizes men, and how these men are portrayed as nothing but pervs, violent, thirsty mindless jerks.

Usui, the male character, after being yelled at for no reason, is strangely drawn to her, and so are the other boys of the school. This hyper misandric woman deemed 'attractive' in the eyes of both anime characters and the male fans. This show is targeted towards girls who call it "one of the most romantic anime".

I was extremely disgusted and had to quit watching within 10 episodes. I couldn't have a place in my mind to understand how men watch shows like this and enjoy it.

This is a common formula used by anime and manga creators to depict a strong independent woman who doesn't need a man. Female superiority is rising within anime, and young may become some of those 'nice guys' who get used by women.

The common genre for anime girls called "tsundere", which refers to a stubborn woman who is abusive to the man she likes, is very popular, shows like Sword Art Online, Bleach, Toradora, DBZ, etc. I could name a hundred more, but that would mean I would include almost every anime. And not just any people are influenced, but the most desperate men across the world. Men who have never had any luck with women are always attempting to fulfill a woman's most dangerous desires just to keep her.

These shows are not only designed to destroy the male image and present it as inferior, but also to ruin their self confidence as human beings for being male. In dozens of anime, males are portrayed as either weak, or stupid, similar to how Daddy pig in the cartoon Peppa Pig is simply made to be laughed at, or how the main male cast of the Simpsons slowly degraded into ambition-less couch potatoes and the women becoming political figures.

Go-Girl-ism And Male Bashing

If you grew up watching TV in the 1990s, there is no way you escaped seeing at least a few episodes of Sailor Moon. It redefined the "magical girl" genre in its native Japan and its overseas influence has shown up in girl-power shows like The Powerpuff Girls and is the definition of a feminist anime. Haruka and Michiru, the series' Sailor Uranus and Neptune, were a lesbian couple who helped girls around the world come to terms with their sexuality. The series also makes a point of commenting on how the less traditionally feminine girls have trouble coping with gender roles, like how Makoto learned to cook because she was teased for being a tomboy.

One of the most notable feminist anime works

The “girl power” concept is counter productive, but unfortunately it’s an inescapable void of entertainment, Charlies Angles, Steven Universe (where the male character is a boy who learns from women), Taylor Swift videos, etc. Australia’s national women’s soccer team the Matildas lose 7-0 to an under FIFTEENS boys’ side, we know that story.

I decided to look up on the internet for further research. Apparently many men have the same opinion. As I’ve read on an MGTOW (anti-feminist, red pill) site:

> “…my friend’s been watching this anime called great teacher onizuka and it makes me fucking cringe. The women in that anime do terrible things to the main character. for instance, there’s a girl who lures him into a laundry mat promising sexual favors, but instead, she takes off her clothes, takes his shirt, puts in on, tears it up a bit, and makes him wear all these kinky things only to scream and call for the police claiming sexual assault. The teacher eventually just acts like it wasn’t a big deal. Also, there’s an episode where a female student of his runs into a building she knows is going to be bombed because she wanted to save a fucking piano.
>
> “…today i witnessed something really disgusting in that anime. The students are on a field trip to a tropical island and one of the boys is kidnapped by three other female students. He’s a small, submissive type so he doesn’t fight back. They tie him up and blind fold him before leading him deep into the jungle. Basically, the leader of the three females wanted to leave him there to die because she hated how much of a loser/crybaby he is. She expressed disdain for how he just listened to whatever people told him to do (sounds familiar). Eventually, the girls realize they’re lost and start blaming the boy for everything. They tell him to man up and get them out of the situation and when he starts to take authority by telling them to remain calm… “

Male disposability in anime was the right word I was looking for. Naruto has plenty of scenes where he is beaten up by women. Not to forget, where I thought Gintama would be free of male bashing, where Shimura Tae, a smiley woman constantly beats up a 'hairy' man – simply for asking her out.

Is this supposed to be comedy?

There's plenty of hentai anime, like Girls Bravo for example, a blue haired boy who is mocked for being short by his female school mates, he is bullied to the point where he's even 'allergic' to women. (Imagine an anime where a girl was treated like trash because she was fat). In one scene of the first episode, the boy accident walks into the bathroom where his female neighbour was taking a shower. She screams and throws a tantrum, she brutally beats him up, where his nose begins to bleed, until he falls into a tub, where he is eventually woken up in a planet where there are only women, however, since he was the only male on the planet, he is sexually harassed constantly through out the episodes and women molest him.

Being an Hentai (porn/pervert/sexual) anime, aimed for men, abusing boys seems to be normalized. In most households of Japan, women control all the finances. I wonder if Japanese men get domestically violated by women the same way as in anime.

Low Birth Rates In Japan

Feminization of men is also an issue, perhaps the decline in population is simply because of this hidden feminism in Japan. In Btoom!, a hunger games styled anime, Himiko always carries a stun gun whenever she goes because she is afraid of being touched by men. Her fear of men stems her past experiences with men who attempted to rape her. Her trauma is so severe that she announces to Ryōta that every man on the island is her enemy. On two separate occasions when she is about to lose to a man, who is usually attempting to sexually assault her, she was willing to kill herself along with the enemy using a bomb. Almost every man in the anime attempts to assault her. The male protagonist of the story is a 'wussy' who simply allows her to treat him with distaste (yet another stereotypical main male character in anime).

While I was on my final anime, which I watched for research, Mirai Nikki, the female character Yuno will resort to cruel and usually violent methods, most of the time coming out of nowhere, that generally end in bloody deaths of anyone who tries to get in the path of the boy she likes, even if they are his close relatives, effectively making her a "Yandere". The young girl seems to be having the "othello syndrome", a type of delusional jealousy, marked by suspecting a faithful partner of infidelity, with accompanying jealousy, attempts at monitoring and control, and even violence. Many men often suffer when their wives who are extremely jealous, where as this "yandere" genre is particular that of a girl who stalks her lover, keeps him away from everyone he loves simply because she wants him as her property.

Is this the world's most jealous woman? Debbi, 42, forces 30-year-old fiancé to take a lie detector test every time he leaves house - and bans him from watching TV in case he's attracted to another girl

- Debbi Wood checks Steve Wood's phone, email and bank statements
- He is even forbidden from looking at pictures of women in magazines
- She suffers from Othello Syndrome which causes delusional jealousy

I also stumbled upon an incomplete game, about a playable Yandere girl, which had many references to Mirai Nikki, on starting the game I had a picture on what it was about. Your character is simply an emotionless teenage girl who harbors feelings for a guy who doesn't even know she exists. Your mission is to stalk him, and try to eliminate "rivals", so that she has him for herself. By eliminate meaning, to kill. The game would even include your crush's sister, who has a chance of being a rival. (Think of a scenario where a boy would be stalking a girl, taking her belongings, sniffing or licking them to gain arousal, where he tries to keep her friends away from her, there would be a different response)

In the basement of the game, one would come across tape recording, when played, it reveals that your character's mother (I assume) murdered everyone close to her crush, and tied him down onto a chair, forcing him to give in to her requests.

A wonderful game that encourages young girls to stalk and manipulate their crushes

Recently, I was informed that the developing team had added a tsundere character and a perverted teacher into the game, who would seduce him perhaps, I don't feel the need to talk anymore about it.

A perverted female teacher who preys on a teenage boy's sexuality. There's plenty of harem (a anime with one guy and many female characters) where he is eventually mistreated by his female counterparts. Even many of Hayao Miyazaki's films are centered on young “strong empowered” girls. When asked about it, he said:

> “When we compare a man in action and a girl in action, I feel girls are more gallant. If a boy is walking with a long stride, I don’t think anything particular, but if a girl is walking gallantly, I feel ‘that’s cool’. Maybe that’s because I’m a man, and women may think it’s cool when they see a young man striding. At first, I thought ‘this is no longer the era of men‘.But after ten years, I grew tired of saying that. I just say ‘cause I like women’. They are more reality.”

All these point out why there are sites entirely dedicated to feminism in anime.

Yesterday, I decided to get in touch with my friend, to ask him about his life and job. He’s a stereotypical “nice guy” who remains friend zoned. He lets women pinch his cheeks and push him, when he just laughs it off. If a woman does something unfair to him, he simply sweeps it under the rug.

“I’m not interested in dating currently” he said when I asked him if he had a girlfriend. Either anime had terrorized him to protecting his virginity, or he’s simply happy being treated like a loser in a tsundere anime by his female co-workers, just like the great teacher Onizuka.

Read More: How Working At Comic-Con Showed Me That America Is A Nation Of Cucks

Ryan Ashville
I'm a heterosexual anti-feminist and a conservative male. A frequent news watcher and I dedicate my findings to various MRA sites and anti-feminist authors. I enjoy swimming, hiking, observing mainstream entertainment and masculine literature.

How Privileged Urban Liberals Profit From Poverty

March 31, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Remember the 90's media icon Mother Teresa? I was young when she still enjoyed a wide media coverage, and still I can remember a shrewd saying on her career: "She liked the poor so much she wanted them to multiply." The motto encapsulates something important about high-status caretakers. Namely, they have to justify their social existence and status with the need to take care of some "inferiors." Were there no poor, they would be in dire need of a new fashionable cause to virtue-signal about.

Urban liberals are just like that. They love championing "the poor" or "the oppressed"—abstract people defined by their purported position in society, not by what they are. As we say in France, their heart leans Left and their wallet leans Right, which is an euphemistic way to notice the gap between their claimed values and their actual ruthless behaviour. Indeed, behind the false positivity of their self-promoting communication, urban liberals screwed the working and most middle classes, used the "poor" and "oppressed" as a pretext to expand a Big Brother governance network, and yell at billionaire Trump but not at billionaire Soros or at the Rothschilds.

When I was younger, I had the opportunity to go to the United Arab Emirates (UAE) as an exchange student. My alma mater passed a contract with the petro-monarchy, committing to create a French-speaking ancillary university there in exchange for big bucks. As I would soon discover, the attached college was to become a prized source of well-paid employments, Western teachers going there to give easier courses for higher wages.

On the material plane, I wanted for nothing, most of my expenses being covered by a scholarship agreement. The Emirati have lots of money, and they spend it lavishly on, for example, well-maintained green lawns or cypress edges in a full desert climate. Nearly all luxury companies have a retail counter there. The result is a shopping center culture, where all you have to do is stroll around neat malls with wealthy Arabs. On the bright side, the UAE are void of crime and insecurity: you can let your phone on a restaurant table, go to the bathroom, and when you come back the phone is still there. On the other side, alcohol is hard to find, the majority age of 21 is strictly enforced, and don't even think about dating one of these Burberry silk veil-sporting girls.

The UAE are mostly an artificial country. Emirates were petty Bedouin fiefs before Anglo-American foreign diplomacy convinced them to sign an agreement, along with the powerful Saudi neighbour. When the first petrodollars started pouring in, the newly created "nation" looked like what happens when you play Sim City with cheat codes enabled: highways, six-ways avenues, skyscrapers and expensive desalination systems mushroomed out of the desert. Today, bathing on Abu Dhabi beaches still gives a front view of oil rigs, reminding the source of this seemingly fantastic, almost unlimited wealth.

Abu Dhabi in the 1950s and in 2000

Beyond its cultural want, the UAE have not only a shallow but a dark side as well. Does money build skyscrapers? Granted, money funds them, but even Bill Gates would fail to plant even one steel beam with his own hands. Actually, the brand new ultramodern Emirati metropolis have been built by millions of near-slaves for decades.

Although I did barely mingle with them, I quickly noticed their ubiquitous presence. On the supermarket, most if not all cashiers were Philippine women. On campus and office buildings, janitors were from Pakistan, Kazakhstan and other countries of the same zone. That is, poor, non-oil blessed countries. Most were Muslims, and in spite of them supposingly sharing the Emirati's religion, they were doing all the jobs no Emirati wanted to do, worked a lot, earned almost nothing and lived in corrugated iron shacks far from the city centers. In the supermarkets, they would buy big rice packages, a bucket of oil, and nothing else.

Behind the college residence I lived in was a strip of desert some affluent people appropriated. Divided in plots, the strip already sported some nice villas, including one that featured a hedgerow of potted trees—imagine how much clean water has to be spent daily for maintaining green plants completely out of place in the desert. Unfinished villas were cared of by dozens of Paki hands: at night, the works continued, and heavy spots would shed lights on rapidly moving silhouettes.

Westerners who live in the UAE know about who gets their hands dirty. However, they pretend not to notice, simply letting the topic out of public conversations. It must be said that most upper class employments there are very well paid, and many Westerners are financially more than happy to eat at the Emirati plate. Even in our countries, lots of people and goods have been bought by petrodollars: first-rate football clubs, massive amounts of US farm land, many London Victorian houses, or the New York Chrystler Building are now owned by Gulf investment funds.

Former French prime minister Manuel Valls, a notorious sellout to both Jews and Gulf Arabs, openly rejoiced about 10 billion euros worth contracts with Saudi Arabia, hinting that this was inevitable to "save [French] economy and employments." After the Charlie Hebdo attacks, the same man told us to "get accustomed to living with terrorism", as if Muslims brutally murdering European civilians were a normal and somehow unavoidable phenomena. Of course, one should not get accustomed to the "far right": the Left uses psychological conditioning to push emotional buttons as it wants, and here, we can notice how a prime seller to Gulf Arabians is also one of the terrorists' best friends. Better white genocide and selling the country than recovering sovereignty with Marine Le Pen!

As I wondered how hypocritical the urban liberals could be—slave work is acceptable in the UAE, but Europe invaders should be granted free healthcare and welfare, just because—I started seeking for someone who would mention the dark side of Emirati "vibrant" cities, and found a series of articles on the left-leaning Guardian. This media outlet is at the heart of the system. A den of smug "social liberals", the Guardian has an intimate relationship with the infamous George Soros and is notorious for having allowed rabid feminist Jessica Valenti to show her madness off . Still, they are almost the only mainstream media to mention the topic.

Are they powerful enough to stick their tongues at the nouveaux riches and their innumerable puppets? Well, not exactly.

On the surface, the outlet denounces the sheer exploitation and terrible working conditions of UAE imported blue collars. On a deeper level, the outlet's point of view is limited and panders to very specific interests.

First, all pieces heavily borrow from NGO reports and praise said organizations, at such a degree that it looks like the poor workers' conditions are a sheer pretext for urban liberal self-promotion. The fact that only some NGOs and some mainstream outlets mention the topic suggests a common agreement: poverty is but a market for professional bleeding hearts. This NGO can cover the UAE near-slaves, this other NGO can cover, say, "undocumented immigrants", and so on, just as two companies would be allowed this and that part of the market.

Pieces authors themselves belong to the NGO they quote. The Guardian and NGOs are linked by revolving doors: all are actors of the same global governance and members of the same liberal establishment. Denunciating the poor working conditions of Paki or Kazakh workers is a sheer pretext to exist publicly and entertain a typically liberal self-satisfaction. NGO/NPO bureaucrats do not look for eliminating poverty—they are busy making a living and a show out of someone else's poverty while getting good paychecks and a cozy job inside the System.

Second, what is exactly pointed out in the Guardian's series? Life conditions, "exploitation", small wages… but who is doing that? Either the outlet mentions these phenomena as if they happened on their own, with no perpetrator, or it mentions a singled-out custom, some employers, about whom it is immediately said that they are "a minority", or unnamed enterprises.

The Guardian never denounces the Emirati managerial State, never mentions the typically Arab slavery culture and how the merciless Emirati exploitation maintains a trend that already existed centuries ago. It does not mention how near-slavery played an essential role, not only in some building sites or wealthy homes but in the whole construction of Dubai, Abu Dhabi or Riyadh. Of course, the outlet does not mention the vast passive complicity of these globalized Westerners who live in slave built air-conditioned skyscrapers.

Even when the Guardian mentions particular yards, it conveniently forgets to mention who exactly is running these. Are powerful liberals keeping by their sides stinky records to exert untold pressures—and if this is the case, on the behalf of whom exactly? Globalists' business is definitely a Machiavellian playground.

Finally, absolutely nothing substantial is done to improve the condition of UAE near-slave workers. This would disturb Saudi and Emirati nationals, who are buddy-buddy with globalist sellouts, and cut at the root of the bleeding hearts' means of subsistence. Everyone in the system is complicit with this. Even the pseudo-rebellious journalist will eat at the petro-monarchy plate and own a child-labour made iPhone. Speak a bit about poverty, enough for liberals to run structures that receive huge sums of money in the name of war on indigence, a bit more to mount an emotional attack on the average Westerner who does not participate into global governance network, and that's it.

BUSINESS INSIDER YOUR MONEY

How one 31-year-old paid off $220,000 in student loans in 3 years

Back home in Joliet, Illinois, Horton took a job as an operations manager at the nonprofit her mother runs. The salary was comparable to what she made in DC, but the cost of living was drastically less. She increased her student-loan payments, setting the lofty goal of paying them off entirely in a year.

Horton and her boyfriend tied the knot soon after the move. Horton's mother gave the couple a condo that she had purchased at an auction as a wedding gift. It became crucial in wiping away the hefty student-loan tab.

Horton and her husband lived in the condo for three months, but then they decided to move in with her grandparents down the street and started renting out the condo to bring in extra income.

To anyone who feels overwhelmed by the prospect of taking on student loans — or paying back any debt they've incurred — Horton has a simple message: "I just want them to feel empowered that they can pay it off. If I can do it, anybody can."

This unmentioned non-profit organization yielded huge profit for the matriarchs running it. Note the self-satisfied conclusion, completely oblivious to how most people do not benefit from such networks.

Neither the Guardian nor the self-claimed radicals actually do anything that could disturb Big Corp. For all their babble about these-poor-exploited-workers-out-there—which always fail to address the issue of crumbling Western middle classes and how whites are the first pushed aside—they never attack globalism, thus letting free rein to the very condition of the international cutthroat competition they pretend to denounce.

In all likelihood, most NGOs, NPOs, foundations, associations and other legal structures that keep working in synergy with each other objectively serve to:

- give another platform and another career opportunity to liberals—we don't deserve opportunities of course
- launder money, pay less taxes
- force upon society the Leftist narrative, together with other thousands organizations of the same type, i.e. governing society through norms and beliefs while never really threatening the global companies or banks
- reproduce the self-serving Leftist discourse, touted as a "reference" from "experts" whereas it looks more like a dogma uphold by coordinated thugs
- justify perpetually Left-drifting policies, as any of these organisms can push for a new pretext to be offended or another cause to support such as mandatory gay marriage, hence pushing SJWism without end or limit
- as for the far-Left, enlarging the political market offer of the system, reaching the disgruntled or the contrarian, luring them to a pseudo-rebellious cause that is actually well tolerated and enshrined into institutions such as colleges.

Middle or average whites who venture to the colleges will be brainwashed into attacking their own race, their own class, and free entrepreneurship—but not Big Corp. If they say stay, they may get a low-paid career in fashionable media outlets or be used as cannon fodder in demonstrations whereas the privileged liberals will remain in their comfortable media-NPO-NGO-bureaucracy-BigCorp—revolving doors also open on private companies—networks. Trotskyists know well about this.

The only true opposition is the one persecuted by the establishment. Un-globalizing, dismantling both Big Corp and Big State, is the only way to free and save the drowning Westerners. This is exactly what Walmart, MacDonald's and Wall Street do not want, and this is also why these love controlled opposition over the red pilled who are a real threat to their power.

Read Next: How The Deep State Operates

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

What I Learned From Oliver Stone’s Movie On Edward Snowden

March 31, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Oliver Stone’s bio of Edward Snowden is now available on video. While most people are aware of the vast spy network that Snowden revealed, this film focuses more on the background of the man, his motivations and evolving thoughts.

I found the film hard to watch in a single sitting. Although I was aware of most of the spy activities that Snowden revealed, seeing them compressed in a 2 hour film paints the picture of an oppressive police state that most of us do not want to accept. It’s rather easy, as a white skinned non-Muslim male, to pretend that nothing’s wrong, and that the American government is different from other oppressive, totalitarian regimes around the world, and has good intentions. I had to stop the film half way through and continue a few days later, as it was just too damn depressing.

Snowden taught us that there are no limits to the depravity of the American security state, and although stories like this one still shock me, truly nothing is too deplorable for the deep state.

The film begins with Snowden’s famed meeting with western journalists Glenn Greenwald and Laura Poitras in a Hong Kong hotel June 3, 2013. They place their cell phones in a microwave, to shield their signals, and the 29 year old Snowden begins telling his story, which will soon be revealed to the entire world.

Snowden came from a military family, and in 2004 at age 20, enrolled in the Special Forces and began his basic training. Snowden has a smaller physical frame, and one day his legs collapse as he jumps down from his bunk. He is taken to a doctor and told that he has been running around on broken legs for weeks. He developed small fractures carrying the heavy backpacks in training and he is no longer able to continue training.

2006 CIA Training

In 2006, he joins the CIA. He lacks a high school diploma, although he displays extremely high intelligence. As he's speaking with one of the training instructors, he tells them he doesn't drink or smoke. He is asked "What is your sin of choice?" and responds "Computers." "Well, then, Snowden," the instructor replies, "you've come to the right little whorehouse."

In an interview he is asked who are his heroes or role models. He responds Joseph Campbell, Star Wars, Henry David Thoreau and Ayn Rand. Clearly, Snowden is a gifted and creative thinker.

Early in training, the cadets are given a programming and hacking test to complete within 8 hours. Snowden finishes in 38 minutes. The instructor can't believe it. He asks, "What should I do now?" Reply: "Whatever you want!"

Snowden The TradCon

Snowden is very much a traditional—my country right or wrong—conservative. He puts almost blind faith in his government and his commander in chief. An early scene shows him walking past a group of war protestors, who he sees as "bashing his country."

It's normal for a 20 something to be rather naïve, and Snowden's experiences over the next several years open his eyes to the truth, and the euphemistic red pill.

Snowden meets his hot stripper girlfriend online. She grew up around the D.C. area and can tell that Snowden is some type of spy, although she doesn't know exactly where he works or what he does.

POLITICS

Bush Lets U.S. Spy on Callers Without Courts

By JAMES RISEN and ERIC LICHTBLAU DEC. 16, 2005

Correction Appended

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15 - Months after the Sept. 11 attacks, President Bush secretly authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on Americans and others inside the United States to search for evidence of terrorist activity without the court-approved warrants ordinarily required for domestic spying, according to government officials.

During training, Snowden's instructor discusses a story in the news about the Bush administration being caught illegally wiretapping. The instructor tells the cadets that sometimes we have to issue warrants in secret court proceedings so that "the enemy" is not tipped off.

How quickly the nation changed in a few short decades. This is in sharp contrast to JFK's famous speech on secrecy in 1961, which he opened stating that

> The very word "secrecy" is repugnant in a free and open society. and we are as a people inherently and historically opposed to secret societies, to secret oaths and to secret proceedings. We decided long ago that the dangers of excessive and unwarranted concealment of pertinent facts far outweighed the dangers which are cited to justify it.

Money + Power = Wasteful Inefficiency

Snowden observes government repurposing of programs designed with good intentions for more sinister uses. He befriends a cryptographer who has been sent to the cadet school as punishment. He had developed a $3 million surveillance program that automated monitoring, sorting foreign from domestic signals, encrypting the domestic signals so they were protected, and sorting and monitoring the foreign signals. The government rejects this program, but later purchases a $4 BILLION program modeled after his, (without credit), which has all filters and automation removed, so it simply records everything.

From a public point of view, one could view this as totalitarian, wasteful, and oppressive. From a cryptographer or spy point of view, it was useless. As the man stated "The more you look at, the less you see." Under the new program, they were drowning in data, and it was useless. At least for security surveillance purposes. If you wanted to "get the goods" on a famous politician, celebrity, business leader, or enemy, or perform corporate espionage, it was incredibly useful. Snowden would later find one of his own programs repurposed for nefarious means.

Snowden asks his lead instructor, Corbin, about this, “Are all of our [signals intelligence] programs specifically targeted?” “Of course,” Corbin responds. “What good would they be if they weren’t?”

2007: Geneva, Switzerland

Snowden’s first assignment is Geneva, Switzerland in 2007. He is working at a spy facility under the pseudonym Dave when a young hacker kid from the NSA introduces him to a search interface known as X-Keyscore.

X-Keyscore is a search interface for the huge troves of internet data that is collected worldwide. Much of the data comes from the PRISM, an agreement with all major US internet providers to share the data off the internet backbone. PRISM is the #1 source of raw data, with some estimates claiming over 90% of NSA data comes from this program. But wait, isn’t the NSA supposed to spy on foreign bad guys? How could almost all their data be domestic? That’s exactly what Snowden thought.

The Boundless Informant documents revealed that the main target of spying was not China, Russia, or the Middle East, but within the USA and Europe (for reciprocal spy agreements with allied governments).

As the NSA worker explains to Snowden, “Think of X-Keyscore as a google search, except instead of searching only what people make public, we’re also looking at everything they don’t, so, emails, chats, SMS, whatever.” “Yeah, but which people?” asks Snowden. “The whole kingdom, Snow White.”

One of Snowdens first assignments in Switzerland is given at a party where he is instructed to go spy on a banker. Which banker? That doesn't matter. There's no specific target, other than running a dragnet to see if anyone with possible illegal action can be found. Snowden, or "Dave" befriends a banker.

XKeyscore allows them to immediately pull up LIVE information on not just this banker, but any of his primary or secondary contacts. Once you are looking at someone's secondary contacts, you're talking about somewhere in the neighborhood of 2.5 million people. So let's say you go to school with a girl whose dad used to work with a man who is now a banker who has committed no crime. One day, you ask her for her number after class. You are now 3 hops from the target, and your emails, chats, phone calls, video chats, and web history can be viewed, and you can be spied on live by activating your phone's microphone and camera with the click of a mouse.

Snowden is shocked to see that the camera on a laptop, cell phone, or other internet connected device can be remotely activated live, even with the device powered off, to spy on not just the target (who again, is not suspected of any crime) but any of his primary or secondary contacts.

The CIA wants to blackmail the banker, to see if he has any criminal connections. They look into his 15 year old daughter's Facebook account and pry inter her personal life. They interfere with the boyfriend, who they find is also seeing another girl, and the hysterical teenage daughter takes a bunch of sleeping pills and almost dies. The banker is very upset, and Snowden and his handler encourage him to become highly intoxicated at a bar, and then tell him to drive home, planning to call the police and report him for drunk driving, so they can blackmail him.

Snowden is incredulous. "What the fuck's going on! What if his daughter had died?" "We could have used that, too," the handler responds. "In the morning, when he's facing a week in jail, we're going to offer him a deal, and he won't turn it down." Snowden refuses to go along. "Hey, he's not driving right now. Look at him! He'll kill himself. He's not driving."

2008 Resignation from CIA

If pressed, I'm sure we could all incriminate a friend or acquaintance for breaking any number of laws. It's one thing to manipulate and lie to criminals, but to go on a fishing expedition and carelessly destroy others' lives just because you have power is sociopathic. The next day Snowden resigns from the CIA. He comes home and has sex with his girl, staring at her open laptop with camera lens exposed.

Snowden is becoming more cynical. He is optimistic of the Obama presidency in 2008. He hears campaign promises from candidate Obama promising no more illegal wiretapping of American citizens, mass tracking, or ignoring the law, and is hopeful that things will change. He takes a job in Japan as a NSA/Dell Computers contractor. As Snowden explains:

> Because of the money, and because I wanted to live in Japan. And because of Obama, actually. I thought things would get better with him. I was wrong.

His team attempted to convince the Japanese government to help them spy on Japanese citizens. The Japanese were not thrilled, responding that it was against their laws. So the NSA tapped the whole country anyway, and installed sleeper programs into civilian computers at hospitals, power companies, dams, and important infrastructure, with the idea that if one day, the Japanese were no longer allies, they could be sabotaged. The same was done all over the world, in Mexico, Germany, Brazil, Austria.

Soon it became clear to Snowden that the spying wasn't done for security, or even military reasons. The targets are world leaders, heads of industry, and corporate espionage. As Snowden states,

> Ultimately the truth sinks in, that no matter what justification you're selling yourself, this is not about terrorism . Terrorism is the excuse. This is about economic and social control. and the only thing you're really protecting is the supremacy of your government.

In 2012, the deputy director of the NSA offers Snowden a job in Hawaii. It's sold to him as his ticket to the top, with the implication that one day Snowden himself could be running the NSA. He observes a drone attack on a desert building which obliterates a boy standing on a rooftop. He is told that a cell phone on a list is being targeted. He asks how they know that the target is present, just because the phone is, and is given a weak answer. Then he finds out the program behind all this is his "Epic Shelter" backup program he wrote as a cadet, repurposed.

James Clapper's Big Lie: The Final Straw

Snowden and a group are watching James Clapper's infamous unprosecuted perjury before Congress where he claims the NSA does "not wittingly" spy on Americans.

At this point, Snowden decides to go public, contacts journalists, sets up a meeting, and leaves traces in the system so that the government knows it was him, and leaves for Hong Kong.

> If you were in my position, living in Hawaii in paradise, making a ton of money, what would it take to make you leave everything behind? The fear I have most is that nothing will change. In the coming months and coming years it will get worse. And then eventually at some point some new leader will be elected who flips the switch, and people won't be able to do anything at that point to oppose it, and it will be turnkey tyranny.

What Changed?

N.S.A. Collection of Bulk Call Data Is Ruled Illegal

By CHARLIE SAVAGE and JONATHAN WEISMAN MAY 7, 2015

The entrance to a National Security Agency data collection center in Bluffdale, Utah. George Frey/Getty Images

These guys are the real "Illegals"

Sadly, despite governments of the world retracting from American alliances, shunning American products, and building their own networks, little has changed in America.

The so-called "reforms" of the Obama administration are utterly meaningless. Now it is private multinational communications firms such as Vodafone/Verizon, Deutshe Telekom/T-Mobile, Sprint/Nextel/Virgin who are doing the spying, and providing it upon request to the government. Doesn't that make you feel so much better? It's the libertarian fantasy that a bad thing is only bad if government is doing it to you.

And in practice, the same spying can be done under these reforms. The reason is the CIA shares access to its spy databases with several other nations (admittedly at least Australia, Canada, New Zealand, Britain, and Germany). As the US Constitution has evolved from being a list of rules or prohibitions on government action, to a list of "rights" that "citizens" have, a government need only place a request with a foreign entity to spy on its citizens, and then share the results, and this is deemed legal and acceptable.

It is now 100% legal for the NSA to ask, say, British GCHQ, to log on to the NSA's own XKeyscore database, spy on you, or Donald Trump, or top executives of Apple Computer, or Jennifer Lawrence, and then forward its results back to the American government.

While there are almost weekly protests because Muh Feminism after we elected President Shitlord, nothing was done when the last 2 administrations broke the law and spied on American citizens. And now, it's become legal to do so.

A Bright Side?

Snowden's revelations are at the very least an enormous wakeup call. A huge red pill was shoved down the throats of many, who may now go on to question other false narratives about girls, society, and culture.

Money is a huge motivator. It was money that drew Snowden to the career of spying for 9 years, and it's largely money that encourages major ISPs and internet companies to spy on their users. The money to the surveillance state must be cut.

Donald Trump has been on the wrong side of the Snowden debate (which should be a debate about freedom and surveillance, not about one man who was a part of said surveillance). While recent news indicates he was spied on for years, Trump is still reluctant to attack the surveillance state. And while he cheers Wikileaks and attacks those who spied on him as "bad and sick," he has called for the death of Snowden and has done little to dismantle the Deep State. Here's hoping he will see the truth.

What is gained by "defeating" others at all costs? The schoolyard bully, or corrupt cheater is not the kid I wanted to grow up and be. America used to be the hard working, well-liked, well rounded kid, who may not always earn the top score on every test, may not be the star quarterback, but was still a great friend, a good athlete and team player, and had loyal girlfriend. If nationalism is the future for America, it must first be a nation that its citizens love and support. The conspiratorial side of me wonders if this is all a planned implosion, destroying our values, breaking bonds and allegiances, and removing the moral spine from our culture with the false fear of terrorism. As Kennedy concluded:

> Even today, there is little value in opposing the threat of a closed society by imitating its arbitrary restrictions. Even today, there is little value in insuring the survival of our nation if our traditions do not survive with it. And there is very grave danger that an announced need for increased security will be seized upon by those anxious to expand its meaning to the very limits of official censorship and concealment.

Read More: 4 Colossal Lies That Men Have Been Told Since Birth

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

10 Quotes Regarding Women By Oscar Wilde That Are Still Relevant Today

March 31, 2017 | by SANS SOUCI | Link | Original Link

Oscar Wilde, the original Dangerous Faggot. I know, I know, what could a gay overweight dandy from the late 1800's who was imprisoned for sodomy have to do with the ROK philosophy? Well hold on young grasshopper. You will see that his aphorisms are just as relevant today as during the Fin de Siècle.

1. "Half the women in London smoke cigarettes. Personally I prefer the other half"

I’m sure nowadays, one could substitute bad tattoos, multiple piercings, half shaved head, odd colored hair as well. Don’t choose a woman who is going to abuse her body. The neurotic woman with the flame at her fingertips symbolically keeping people at arms length with her flare. Even if 50% are tainted by the feminist scourge, that means there are still many traditional women to choose from.

2. “Women…inspire us to do masterpieces, but always prevent us from carrying them out”

Don’t get hung up on a woman so much that you let your dreams and yourself go. You stop creating music, art, writing, learning a new language, taking care of your body, and even stop seeing your best friends. Always take a step back and put it in perspective.

3. “There is always something ridiculous about the emotions of people whom one has ceased to love”

Did you get dumped and she won't return your calls? And you think "But if I show her how I really feel or cry or get angry that things will change". It's cliché, but there are so many people out there. Move on. Life is never kind.

4. "There is only one thing in the world worse than being talked about, and that is not being talked about"

Be the Alpha, strut your stuff, and let the chips fall where they may. One thing about The Donald, even if people hate him, they talk about him everyday (see CNN).

5. "Women spoil every romance by trying to make it last forever"

This one needs no explanation. Pure genius. Still the same 130 years later.

6. "No woman is a genius. Women are a decorative sex. They have nothing to say, but they say it charmingly"

Savage! Sure every now and again humanity will stumble across a Madame Curie. But some of these soft guys are hanging on every word of the resident indie rock slut like she’s the next Krishnamurti.

7. “The people who love only once in their lives are really the shallow people. What they call their loyalty, and their fidelity, I call either the lethargy of custom or their lack of imagination. There are many things that we would throw away if we were not afraid that others might pick them up”

There will be a time to settle down, be respectable, and raise a family (with the right woman, of course). But for now, don’t get Oneitis!. People that mean so much to you now, will probably mean nothing later in life.

8. “The one charm of the past is that it is the past. But women never know when the curtain has fallen. They always want a sixth act.”

Stop obsessing on things that are done and you can’t control. That’s for dramatic women, not a strong man. Maybe you were beta and incel for years. It’s done. “The past was yours, but the future’s mine.”

9. “I’m afraid that women appreciate cruelty, downright cruelty more than anything else…We have emancipated them, but they remain slaves looking for their masters, all the same. They love being dominated.”

My whole life I never wanted to believe this. But then I took the red pill. It’s not in my nature to be cruel, but for God’s sake, at least man up and call the shots. Make decisions and don’t be wishy-washy. Be confident and decisive. Grow a pair.

10. “It is only the sacred things that are worth touching”

Are you going to put women on a pedestal, thinking how she’s pure and angelic? In reality, she’s seen more cocks than a chicken in a hen house.

In Conclusion

Always keep learning. One can find inspiration at all points in life from various sources. Better your mind, better your body, and continue to be the best man you can be.

Read More: 59 Powerful Quotes That Reveal The True Nature Of Women

SANS SOUCI

Sam Souci has lived in the ass of the world yet dined with royalty. It's not dirty, it's just the way it is. Easy to get his attention...hard to keep it.

3 Pieces Of KGB Propaganda Americans Still Believe Today

April 1, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The Sword and the Shield by KGB insider Vasili Mitrokhin provides a fascinating look from the other side of the Cold War's espionage efforts. All told, we have confirmation of many suspected and disputed items, along with some new surprises.

For instance, Julius Rosenberg (codename ANTENNA and LIBERAL—yes, really) was guilty as hell of spying during the Manhattan Project. So was his wife Ethel, as well as David Greenglass (BUMBLEBEE and CALIBRE) and Klaus Fuchs (CHARLES). However, the big fish was Theodore Hall (MLAD, formerly Ted Holtzberg), a kid who wasn't recruited by the KGB but came to the Soviets on his own initiative.

Also, MLK really did have Communist contacts (such as his consigliere Stanley Levison). However, when he wouldn't denounce American imperialism as they suggested, the KGB cleverly portrayed him first as a sellout and later as a martyr.

The revelations we'll focus on here were about rumors spread by the KGB's "active measures" disinformation program; many of which are believed to this day.

The USA invented AIDS

Puppets don't actually get AIDS.

The motive:

Operation INFEKTION was to make the USA look bad, especially among the Third World, and to draw heat off of the Soviet biological weapons program

The story:

> Probably the most successful anti-American active measure of the Gorbachev era, promoted by a mixture of overt propaganda and covert action by Service A, was the story that the AIDS virus had been "manufactured" by American biological warfare specialists at Fort Detrick in Maryland. An East German, Russian-born physicist, Professor Jacob Segal, claimed on the basis of "circumstantial evidence" (later wholly discredited) that AIDS had been artificially synthesized at Fort Detrick from two natural viruses, VISNA and HTLV-1. Thus fortified by spurious scientific jargon, the AIDS fabrication not merely swept through the Third World, but took in some of the Western media as well. In October 1986 the conservative British Sunday Express made it its main front-page story. During the first six months of 1987 alone, the story received major news coverage in over forty Third World countries.

The Kremlin backed off of Operation INFEKTION later, but useful idiots abroad embellished it with propaganda efforts of their own:

> The AIDS fabrication, however, was swiftly followed by other, equally scurriious anti-American active measures in the Third World, some of which also seduced sections of the Western media. Among the most successful was the "baby parts" story, alleging that rich Americans were butchering Third World children in order to use their bodies for organ transplants in the United States. In September 1988 a motion in the European Parliament condemning the alleged trafficking in "baby parts," proposed by a French Communist MEP, passed on a show of hands in a > poorly attended session.

The truth:

HIV—the AIDS virus—mutates at a regular rate. Scientists have traced it backwards, determining that the first of four major strains likely entered the human population around the 1920s. Randy Shilts documented the early stages of the AIDS epidemic in And the Band Played On. He speculated that the American phase of the epidemic may have begun in 1976, during a large, international bicentennial party in New York. Then it spread like wildfire through gay hookup culture, particularly the bathhouses. Still, he describes a few known cases in the 1960s, even in the USA.

Nixon cancelled the American bio-weapons program, something which would've made him a much better Nobel Peace Prize candidate than Jimmy Carter, Al Gore, and The Lightworker, who won for not being George W. bush. Advanced gene-splicing technology didn't exist until the 1990s. Only agribusiness has done much with it lately, or at least as far as we know.

Olympic athletes threatened

Great gymnastics routine, but not an actual Olympic athlete

The motive:

As Mitrokhin put it, "The attempt to stir up racial tensions in the United States remained part of Service A's stock-in-trade for the remainder of the Cold War." Well now, who would've guessed? Unfortunately, it remains the stock in trade of cultural Marxism even now.

The story:

> Before the Los Angeles Olympics in 1984, for example, Line PR officers in the Washington residency mailed bogus communications from the Ku Klux Klan to the Olympic committees of African and Asian countries. Among the racial taunts devised by Service A for inclusion in the mailings was the following:
>
> THE OLYMPICS—FOR THE WHITES ONLY!
> African monkeys!
> A grand reception awaits you in Los Angeles!
> We are preparing for the Olympic games by shooting at black moving targets. In > Los Angeles our own Olympic flames are ready to incinerate you. The highest award for a true American patriot would be the lynching of an African monkey. Blacks, Welcome to the Olympic games in Los Angeles!

> We'll give you a reception you'll never forget!
>
> This and other active measures on the same theme made front-page news in many countries. When Attorney-General William French Smith denounced the letters as KGB forgeries, Moscow predictably feigned righteous indignation at Washington's anti-Soviet slanders.

The truth:

Despite a stilted style that doesn't quite seem characteristic of Fraternity Tri-Kappa, some believed it was real, and a few countries didn't send their teams. That one was also a "take that" for the previous American boycott of the Olympics in Moscow, a symbolic effort spurred by their invasion of Afghanistan. Eventually, we were making a real effort by supplying arms to Afghan rebels. Even so, given recent history, we should've just told the Afghans to deal with it themselves.

J. Edgar Hoover was gay

No FBI officials pictured here

The motive:

To discredit FBI director J. Edgar Hoover in the eyes of the public

The story:

The introduction states:

> The KGB was among the first to spread stories that Hoover was a predatory homosexual.

The chapter "Political Warfare" provides the dirty details. Other than forging documents to make him look bad, we have the following item:

> A third line of attack deployed by Service A against Hoover was to accuse him of being a homosexual. The truth about Hoover's probably severely repressed sexuality is unlikely ever to be known. Later, much-publicized claims that he was > a gay cross-dresser whose wardrobe included a red dress and boa, which made him look like “an old flapper,” and a black dress, “very fluffy, with flounces, and lace stockings,” which he wore with a black curly wig, rest on little more than the discredited testimony of a convicted perjurer, Susan Rosenstiel, who claimed to have seen Hoover so attired. Nor is there any reliable evidence that Hoover and his deputy, Clyde Tolson, who shared his house, ever had a homosexual relationship. […]

>
> The later commercial success, admittedly in a more prurient period, of fanciful stories of Hoover at gay transvestite parties suggests that in fabricating stories of his homosexual affairs in the late 1960s Service A had hit upon a potentially promising active measures theme. DeLoach was later depressed to discover how readily such stories were accepted as “undeniable truth:”
>
> “Tell us about Hoover and Tolson,” people would say.
> “Was it obvious?”
> “Did everyone know what was going on?”

The truth:

This might actually be true. Whether or not he and Clyde Tolson were roommates and co-workers, or something more, has been the subject of much speculation. One item (as mentioned) was from the wife of liquor magnate Lewis Rosenstiel, featuring J. Edgar getting a handjob in drag. Another was by journalist Pete Hammill, relating some Mafia gossip; the buzz was that they were using compromising pictures of him to get him to back off.

So that’s interesting, but pretty much hearsay; not the sort of evidence that would stick in court. Still, the KGB certainly added fuel to the fire. It matters little now, but it’s still a debate similar to the “confirmed bachelor” status of Ernie and Bert on Sesame Street.

The moon landing was a hoax

Hollywood’s idea of what the moon would look like

The motive:

The Soviets did have a first-rate space program, and quite possibly could have landed on the moon first if not for top-level personality clashes and engineering problems with the N1 launch vehicle. So, they tried to make the public think that American astronauts never landed on the moon and all the funding was diverted to the CIA. This makes the Soviets epic sore losers, almost as bad as Al Gore.

The story:

This one isn't documented in The Sword and the Shield, but the KGB is considered the source of some of the moon landing hoax rumors. The basic concept is found in a 1960 memo:

> If necessary, the necessary documents should be forged using the existing samples… To work out and implement measures on blowing the cover of several scientific, commercial and other institutions, used by the CIA for its spy activities. In particular, to carry out such measures with regard to the "National Aeronautics and Space Administration" [NASA] and the "Informational Agency" of the USA [U.S. Information Agency (USIA)].

Whatever role the KGB had, lots of people in the tinfoil hat crowd ran with the story and elaborated on it. Capricorn One, a fictional movie about a faked Mars mission, added to the speculation too.

The truth:

I don't have the space (if you'll pardon the expression) to go into all the reasons why the Apollo footage was not a special effects job, but I'll leave you with one of them for now. For that to happen, hundreds—if not thousands—of people would've had to be in on the secret: the astronauts themselves, filmmakers, people to feed Mission Control fake data, and so forth. The launches were seen by the public. Aside from Mission Control, the Apollo missions were monitored carefully by both the Soviets and amateur radio enthusiasts, following the voice and telemetry all the way to the moon and back.

Remember that this was during a Presidential administration that couldn't cover up a third-rate burglary. Thus far, there's no real evidence that the USA didn't land on the moon, not even a deathbed confession.

Conclusion

The phrase "Fake News" gets lots of mentions just after "Pizzagate" emerges: coincidence or counter-narrative? Nothing to see here…

All told, getting the truth for once is like a breath of fresh air. It would be great if all the major powers, in the interests of history, would declassify everything (with the exception of weapons programs) prior to 1960 or at least 1950. Until then, we have to rely on insider accounts like this, as well as leaked documents, to fill in the missing pieces of history.

I would've liked to see Mitrokhin describe more about ideological subversion efforts; it's there, but not in great detail. Fortunately, we have the revelations of Yuri Bezmenov, another KGB insider, to give us a better look at that.

The USSR was a powerful government talking a great game about peace and progress, while spinning events and even resorting to outright lies. I wish I could say that Western governments never did anything like that, but that wouldn't quite be true. As we can see, it's quite surprising how easily these propaganda efforts were launched into in the public memespace and took on a life of their own. In some cases, the so-called mainstream media bought into it and even embellished it.

The MSM themselves have been as guilty as hell of their own "active measures". Quite recently, they came out with the "fake news" anti-concept; that's quite a case of psychological projection! Let us not forget as well that individuals, private organizations, and other groups with great wealth and power also make similar efforts to conceal their wrongdoing and keep the public in the dark.

Read More: Soviet Defector Yuri Bezmenov Accurately Predicted How America Would Decline

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

The Problem Of False Rape Accusations Is Not Going Away

April 1, 2017 | by Christopher Leonid | Link | Original Link

Once again, a young man with perfect credentials for opportunistic women stands accused of rape. Urbane, expensively educated, and probably a little too trusting of the world beyond the milieu of a civilised upbringing, Bartholomeo Joly de Lotbiniere slept with a girl at his university in 2014. It wasn't until the following year, after he had made a celebrated TV appearance and was touted the most eligible bachelor on campus that his anonymous accuser finally decided that she had been raped by him.

8 / 10

"It took a while to, sort of, sink in, what he did," she said. "Then, basically, he was on University Challenge and it was all over social media and certain tweets."

Given the facts, the jury were unable to decide whether Joly de Lotbiniere was guilty or not, so the trail has stalled until this September. Until then, his freedom hangs in the balance as the media broadcast his distinctive name across a society which sincerely believes in ‘toxic masculinity’ and ‘rape culture.’

This is not the first case of its kind and neither will it be the last. Last year, the leader of Durham University’s debating society (and member of the Champagne society), Louis Richardson, was acquitted of raping a fellow student who made her claim only after her real boyfriend discovered she had been cheating on him. She also admitted to months of consensual sex and slutty texting with Richardson after the incident on which she claimed to have been raped by him. But Richardson was still dragged thorough the courts in an ordeal described by his family as ‘fifteen months of hell.’ To men of honour, this type of public accusation is itself a conviction worse than jail time.

8.5 / 10

Writing in The Daily Telegraph, Radhika Sanghani – a mediocre hack who revels in female sexuality while vilifying men for doing the same – used Richardson’s case (and photograph) to describe the ‘problem’ of ‘ingrained sexism’ and ‘lad banter.’

> The case does bring up the recurring issue of rape culture on British university campuses.

Of course, what her article really shows is that a general presumption of male guilt can now be published in a leading national newspaper and illustrated with the case of a man whose trial is still active and whose female accuser remains anonymous. The fact that The Daily Telegraph neither sacked nor apologised for the author of this diatribe moves me to wonder how far radhikal feminists might be going to curry favour with their bosses.

always seeking outrage. I wonder what’s gone so wrong in her life?

Even when the courts acquit an innocent man, his accuser will retain her legal cloak of anonymity; a device which clearly allows her to become a serial offender. So thank God for very rich men who, once found innocent, are able to do us the public service of outing their accusers.

Alexander Economou, the London-based son of a Greek shipping tycoon was accused of rape and, although the case was dismissed by police, he had to spend £200,000 to initiate a private claim to out his accuser. His move was widely condemned in the press and, tragically, the girl hung herself before her trial for the perversion of justice could begin. Economou then resorted to desperate measures to clear the doubt which hung over his reputation, broadcasting evidence that his accuser had previously been a sex worker.

Economou's revelations were described by a court as 'cruel' and by the girl's father as 'extraneous.' 'Cruel' maybe, but 'extraneous' certainly not, like the report that Richardson's accuser described her house as a 'slut hut,' this information serves to illustrate exactly what a culture of female sexual liberation must encourage us to ignore: promiscuity in a woman makes her a hazard to any high value man.

If a woman has ever put a price on her body which is less than marriage, sex becomes a contract on her own variable terms; terms on which a man can always be accused of short-changing her. The slut is not broken by the men who she can control through sex, but by the man who she can't. And, all too often, this means 'the one who got away.'

Failure to Comply

The West has gaslighted itself into the assumption that the female sexual strategy is infallible. This means that, when a woman can't use sex to secure the ideal outcome she envisioned, it must be the man's fault. This is how a legal process was allowed to develop which hands women a carte blanche to condemn any man who frustrated her.

The Huffington Post's handy chart to vindicate slutty women who can't accept that there's #nosuchthingasaperfectlover

If a man enters a sexual relationship on his terms rather than those of the woman, it is called ‘rape,’ and it is rightly considered a crime. This means that, in order for sex to be legal, it must be conducted on terms to which the woman agrees. So far so good.

But what about when a man decides to exit a relationship on his own terms rather than hers? Has he then violated the terms that the woman thought she had set? Perhaps not, so long as she can continue to trade up but, in practice, it seems that this male right to autonomy is being eroded under the guise of ‘preventing rape culture.’ In order to give women as long as they like to hedge their bets between casual relationships, they are told they can take months, or years, before they decide what their terms really were, and who broke them.

The law standing behind women scorned was already bad enough, but feminine contingency plans to guarantee women’s à la carte mate selection strategy doesn’t stop there. Maximising male demand to shore up the comparative value of the sexual intimacy they can supply, feminists now shame men who show any sign of sexual agency, discernment, judgement, restraint, or lack of thirst to serve women as required.

exactly the sort of Beta who might one day be picky enough to ‘next’ an Alpha Widow… rapey!

Such is the social and political pressure to accommodate the unprecedented wave of fury from women scorned in the wake of their own sexual liberation that the legal system has buckled in the most terrifying way.

Mattress-girl style claims have now risen in frequency to a low background hum (Lewis Tappenden crops up as this month’s latest victim from Joly de Lotbinier’s same university). However, the emerging sub-species of accusation that is made substantially after the supposed event points to a much more dangerous problem than the simple lie of rape culture.

What we are beginning to see now is the legal attempt to assuage women’s failure to have previously consolidated relationships with men who later rose to become worthy of their inflated, pussy-endorsed, sense self-worth.

Sexual Cronyism

Having an accusation or two to your name is gradually becoming a standard rite of passage for any man of worth. As an advocate of chastity, I would normally call it 'blackmail.' But because I know at least two men of faith (and high net worth), who have fallen victim to this in spite of never having slept with anybody, I shall call it extortion by fraud in which the law is complicit. What these cases show is that we have reached beyond the stage of petty abuse and into the realm of complete destruction of the legal process. A women's sexual whim now carries a de facto force of law even when applied retroactively and her testimony is exposed as a lie.

The problem isn't simply that justice isn't being done, it's that the fundamental principles on which justice is founded have been waived in order that the highest source of legal authority – the constitution of our society itself – is the word of women. Such is the Orwellian perfection of this tyranny that people still sincerely believe that we live in a 'Patriarchy.'

People will generally see what they look for and hear what they listen for. If The Daily Telegraph provides an indication of how twelve of my right-minded countrymen think, then men like Joly de Lotbiniere do not face trial by jury. They face trial by mob.

We can't fix this immediately but, by drawing public attention to what is truly going on, we can at least stand as a beacon of reason and truth within a dark, Kafkaesque, nightmare.

Regardless of whether he is guilty or not, a severe and lawless punishment has already been served upon Bartholomeo Joly de Lotbiniere. Atticus Finch wept.

Read More: Say Hello To The New Definition Of Rape

Christopher Leonid
Defining male agency during the collapse of the Sexual Revolution.

How To Start Training The Front Lever For Strength And Flexibility

April 2, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Today we'll be learning the first few steps of another fundamental static position in gymnastics. That of the front lever, defined as an exercise in which the body is held stock straight and horizontal while hanging from a bar, in which the head looks up towards the ceiling and the feet extend forward.

As you might expect, the front lever fundamentally differs from the back lever in that it attacks different muscle groups. More specifically, it targets the powerful muscles of the front of the torso: the abdominals, the hip flexors, the shoulders, the forearms, and the chest. In addition to these, the lower back and latissimus dorsi muscles will flex tremendously to keep the straight body posture.

And, as with the back lever article, there are incremental steps to achieving the front body lever. And also as with the back lever, the key is to "lower" yourself into the pose, rather than "lift" yourself into the pose; the former is much easier.

The first step is the tuck lever, which is the simplest one to do. Just lift yourself up on the pull-up bar to the point where your torso is horizontal and your knees are tucked hard into your chest. You back will be bent here, but don't worry about that for now. When you can hold this pose for 10 seconds, move onto the next one.

The second step is the flat-back tuck lever, similar to the first one but a little more difficult because you exert muscular effort to keep your back straight and flat.

To keep the back straight, I find that pushing down on the bar with the hands while hanging in the tuck position helps a lot, as does deliberately flexing the latissimus dorsi muscles. Again, hold for 10 seconds

Third has been dubbed the advance tuck level, perhaps due to the fact that this is the first step where your legs begin to advance from the pure tuck position.

To do this, start in the tuck position, and then continue rotating back until your knees are close to touching the bar that you are using. Being vertical is also acceptable. Either way, once you have judged what a good "lowering" position is, push your knees forward until they are against the bar.

Anyway, once you have gotten into the proper position, move your legs out from under the bar and lower yourself into the proper position. As usual, go for a ten second hold before you advance.

The next step is the half one leg front lever, an intermediary step that will prove itself to be the mos difficult of all the steps discussed here thus far.

Starting in the tuck position, rotate back like you're about do to the vertical body hold. Now, open up one of your hips, and allow one leg to extend to its fullest length, while still leaving the knee bent. This sounds very confusing, so here is a picture

This exercise forces the hip flexors and abdominals of one side of the body to contract very hard, while allowing the other to work a comparatively relaxing pose. As you might expect, this pose has to be done with alternating legs-when one leg is forward and "unfurled", the other is high back and tucked back towards the body. This will train both parts of the body and thus allow you to move on.

And finally, the last step is the one leg front lever. To achieve this pose, you must first master the vertical bar hold, which the back lever article showed you.

Then, bend one leg high and back and the other still fully extended. Then, slowly lower yourself into a position in which the body and one leg are out straight, flexing in coordination with the muscles of the abdomen, lower back, and latissimus Dorsi. Alternatively, you can try assuming the bent leg position and then extending your tibia. Either way, this is another exercise where the difficulty curve greatly increases from the previous one.

In conclusion, these five exercises will give you a great amount of core strength and flexibility, and its low impact nature makes it particularly invaluable to those injured in one way or another. And you will find that training in one type of lever can only help the other. Also note that the vertical hold is used in both. But there's more in the way of body levers to learn, and those will be another day

Read More: How The Back Lever Can Increase Your Strength And Flexibility

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

4 Important Lessons For American Women From Pai Mei

April 2, 2017 | by Pai Mei | Link | Original Link

> He hates Caucasians, despises Americans, and has nothing but contempt for women. – Bill

I am master Pai Mei. You might remember me from the Quentin Tarantino double film "Kill Bill" which was released in the 2000s. In that film I helped this petulant yellow-haired white woman from the United States become a contract killer. Her time with me was most irritating, like 95% of women who hail from that country, but I was able to make her somewhat agreeable due to months of a highly active and regimented schedule where degenerate western female behaviors are severely curtailed and restricted.

Having seen firsthand how far American women have fallen as worthy domestic partners due to rampant obesity, bitchiness, man-hating propaganda, and culinary retardation, I have developed a program for the masses which will make females from the United States into potentially marriageable ladies again.

I call it the "Cruel Tutelage Of Pai Mei", and the following article will address four ways that the program will be most beneficial.

1. They Will Get Off Their Fat Ass And Lose Weight

"Just looking at those steps makes me ache. You're gonna have plenty of fun carrying buckets of water up and down that fucker." – Bill

Per head of population, among any westerners I have witnessed, American women have got to be the fattest and most slovenly looking females my poor old eyes have ever seen. They are like gazing upon an enormous factory farm animal, who should be harvested for her whale blubber (to make something useful like soap) rather than sitting on her bloated behind in some useless "marketing" or "human resources" job they love so much.

Even worse, their idea of after-work relaxation is not going to the gym or learning how to make a healthy new recipe, but curling up under the covers to "Netflix and chill" and gorge themselves on high calorie sweets like some morbidly obese pig. Observe an American woman in her natural habitat…

Disgusting.

At the cruel tutelage of Pai Mei, I will teach these "HR" (or whatever they call themselves) swamp donkeys how to get into shape and to stay in shape through rigorous and unrelenting physical training, discipline, and repetition. Weeks on end of carrying buckets of water up and down temple steps in 30-something degree weather will help shed that whale blubber and (hopefully) instill a regimen that will keep that weight off for life.

2. They Will Learn Humility And Respect For Men

Too many American women think they are “just as good as any man”

At the cruel tutelage of Pai Mei, we understand that young American women have absolutely no humility and that their arrogant egos have spiraled completely out of control.

Social media has given very average looking women the impression that they are “goddesses”, and that their impotent non-profit venture or virtue signaling is supposed to “change the world” somehow. Furthermore, this thing called “feminism” in the west is infecting women with the crazy idea that they are either equal or even superior to men in most facets of life, and should be able to do exactly the same things that men do.

Well under my tutelage, American women are quickly going to come to the realization that men are far stronger physically, and have much greater capacity for accepting sound logic and reason, rather than what simply “feels” right about society. They will also learn to respect men, rather than treating them as disposable utilities, and learn to take full responsibility for their malevolent actions and face the consequences of such actions.

So do you think American women can attempt to strike a man and he’s supposed to do nothing about it? Or that some white knight chump is going to jump in and save his “mi’lady” when that man exercises his natural right to self-defense and suitable retaliation? WRONG.

If you attempt any physical altercation with a man under my tutelage, you can expect to be painfully struck back and subdued using the full weight and force under that man’s disposal, which is going to be a LOT more than what a comparable woman can muster.

Respect men, and they will respect you. Far too many American women think they are immune to retaliation for being physically aggressive with men, and thanks to master Pai Mei, we are going to forever wipe that psychotic idea from their feeble yankee brains.

3. They Will Learn Discipline And Understand Real Suffering

Timeless Eastern Wisdom

American women have got to be the most sheltered, protected, and coddled women on planet Earth. No other type of female inhabiting this blue marble floating in space has their hand held longer, and has their problems magically disappear via financial contribution, public forgiveness, or an “empowerment” narrative, than a national of the stars and bars.

Under my cruel tutelage, bogus yankee 1st world “problems” like the gender pay gap lie or a mythical “rape culture” will be forever removed from their feeble female minds.

Long days of carrying heavy buckets of water up and down steps, rigid military-style kung fu routines, and repeatedly smashing their knuckles against heavy wooden boards will also teach them about the stress and suffering that billions of less fortunate people around the world endure on a daily basis.

So there’s no Iphone’s, Instagram, All-Night Happy Hour and In-N-Out Burger where you’ll be going young lady! But when it’s all said and done, your newfound rudimentary Kung Fu skills will be able to help fend off those storybook “rapists” that you are so concerned about.

4. They Will Learn To Cook Healthy Meals And Eat Properly

"If you want to eat like a human being….PICK UP THOSE STICKS"

Finally, there was a man on this stupid piece of western communications technology called 'Twitter' who once mentioned "If you walk up to a western Millennial girl with a cast iron skillet, 97% would rather take a beating than use it to cook dinner".

I had my obligatory laugh, followed by the emotionally painful realization that his Confucius-like wisdom is hardly very separate from reality. Young American women just cannot cook anymore, and compound that problem by consuming awful and fattening pre-packaged diets.

Along with these American female tubs of lard shedding massive amounts of weight via the water-and-steps routine, my tutelage will include basic home cooking skills and mealtime etiquette. Rest assured they are going to use that cast iron skillet dammit.

Foods high in carbohydrates, fats, sugars, salts, and flour will be neither prepared nor consumed. This is pretty much epitomized by obese Americans' obsession with these nutritionally bankrupt monstrosities called doughnuts, or as I like to call them "crumbly cunt cakes".

Conclusion

When it is all said and done, American women will finally be of an agreeable weight, have adequate cooking skills, stop acting like spoiled and petulant children, and have a much greater appreciation for western men, due to their greater understanding of the high quality of life that their workmanship and sacrifice provides for them.

Maybe, just maybe, the tide of men looking towards Brazil, Colombia, Russia, Ukraine, Japan, or Vietnam as places to find an agreeable life partner can be reversed if these obese land whales from North America follow my teachings.

Read Next: 10 Reasons Why Foreign Women Are Better Than American Women

Pai Mei

Pai Mei is an elderly Kung Fu master who resides in rural China. He hates Caucasians, despises Americans, and has nothing but contempt for women.

Are Globalism And Progressivism Inevitable?

April 3, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

As our world is becoming increasingly polarized between the forces of globalism and progressivism on one side and those who oppose it for whatever reasons on the other, it is critical to understand the machinations that we are facing up against and its implication for the future of all things we cherish and believe in.

The trend towards unification

Once upon a time in ancient China, there was no unified Middle Kingdom that we are familiar with. China was divided among several warring states similar to how things were in Medieval Europe. The different states were in a constant state of war until the Qin state annexed all others to establish the first Chinese empire under the rule of Emperor Qin Shi Huang. To allow the nation to be governed more efficiently, the Emperor standardized the currency, units and measurements, the writing system, and even the lengths of cart axles. As a result, the idea of one unified China has persisted to this date and most Chinese (or at least the Han Chinese in mainland) identify themselves as people of China.

Similar things can be said about the eventual Arab-Muslim domination of the Middle East as well as the rise of European nation states and the more modern concepts of European and Western identity. If you think about it, it's actually quite amazing that European nations of today are more or less in a peaceful and cooperative state after centuries of brutal conflicts based on religion, nationalism, and ideology. And they will most likely continue to remain harmonious even if the EU disintegrates tomorrow. Think about it: a hardcore British nationalist of today probably doesn't hold any animosity towards Germans unlike his great-grandfather who would have been cursing the Krauts from the trenches.

So what am I getting at? The point here is that, our world, ever since the dawn of civilization, seems to be trending towards historical unification and formation of larger bodies of societies with shared values and social systems. The bloody struggles of ancient Chinese states who did their best to defend their culture against Qin domination (or the much later anti-Qing resistance by the Han Chinese) now all seem quaint and meaningless to the people of China today who now see themselves as one. Will the same be true in the distant future if and when the people of Earth ever become united?

What are we progressing towards?

Yeah, we have better technology now, but exactly what "progress" have we made as people and culture since the ancient times? Can we really say that we are better than the Romans in spirit and vitality during their zenith?

"Progress" is a funny word. The word has a strong connotation as a process of becoming something new and better. But what exactly are we progressing towards? We're not progressing towards greater health as more and more people are becoming afflicted with obesity, heart problems, cancer, and various mental illnesses (which are all good business for big pharma). We're not progressing towards greater spiritual awakening as the world is becoming more materialistic where all that matters is money and consumption. In fact, religion is slowly fading away in much of the Western world. And, considering the reader demographic here, I don't even have to mention that all the "progress" that are being made towards normalizing hedonism and degeneracy, leading to the moral decay of our societies.

So, what are we progressing towards then? To put simply, we are turning into a world where people are standardized (under the codename "equality") like livestock to be exploited by the elites. The world is becoming more polarized with those on the top getting richer and more powerful with each passing day. A healthy middle class, along with all the old identities and traditional values are being destroyed so that all humans beings become economic units without race, culture, and beliefs getting in the way. Corporations have increasingly larger control over our lives and so do the governments with all their technology and submissive population. Our so-called progress is nothing but anti-human and anti-life.

What is the drive behind globalism and progressivism?

The spread of consumerism is the first step towards globalization.

Many people seem to have an immaterialist view of the world where competing ideologies fight for a space on the blank slate that is people and societies. In this version of the world, Leftist ideas such as equality, feminism, multiculturalism, and so on are spread like a virus through educational institutions, the media, Hollywood films, and whatnot. These ideas are seen as pushing out and attacking the traditional—but healthy—ideals of the past. This is why you have anti-Leftists raging about Cultural Marxism like it's the root of all evil. That said, while I don't think this immaterialist perspective is entirely wrong, it is not the complete picture. To account for what's happening in today's world, materialist factors must be recognized as the primary drive behind globalism and progressivism. And not only that, I would go as far as to say that materialism drives the immaterialist thoughts and ideologies.

Consider, for example, that a proletarian revolution would never crop up in today's Switzerland due to the country's stability and high standard of living (materialist conditions). No amount of Communist propaganda (immaterialist force) would change that fact. Communist revolutions only succeeded in countries like Russia, China, and Cuba due to instability (and wars), gross inequality, foreign or domestic subjugation, and a large population of poor people living in wretched conditions. The lesson here is that the material conditions need to be set in place before congruent ideas can spread (of course there are historical exceptions, but they haven't happened recently).

So, in today's world, the materialist force behind globalism and progressivism is technological progress and the development of consumerist economies towards greater efficiency. Multiculturalism, feminism, expanding government, the decimation of nuclear families, and more are all symptoms of our technological world and ways of securing greater materialist output.

You must remember that technology sees no boundaries, that profit is blind to color. For example, women were flooded into offices (jobs that are only possible thanks to modern technology) to facilitate greater economic productivity. The technological society doesn't care that it destroys families and lowers birthrate; it can always import cheap labor from developing countries. In fact, the technological society actually welcomes it, for these women now have the freedom to go shopping, facilitating the consumerist economy. In contrast, you'll never see feminism infecting societies that still live with primitive technology where different sex roles are established.

Technology + Economic Demands = "Progress" and Feminism

Immigration, multiculturalism, and equality are also all advanced by the technological society as they facilitate greater harmony and efficiency for societies to grow. Immigrants lower wage while replacing the native population that's become sterile thanks to lifestyle that's only possible due to modern technology. In addition, trading and mixing of cultures also flourishes the consumerist economy with more diverse things for people to buy and experience.

Technology that allows us to communicate and share faster, produce and trade globally, move from one part of the world to another safely, are all contributing to the globalization of the world whether people like it or not. And the reason why the West is being globalized faster than the rest is because of their historic openness, tolerance, and love for freedom, all things that facilitate faster scientific and technological process as well as economic growth.

It is also not a coincidence that the great majority of international corporations and tech companies of today, such as Google, Facebook, Coca-Cola, Disney, Starbucks, and so on are the biggest pushers of globalism and progressivism. Openness and tolerance lead to greater profit while divisions and cultural chauvinism hampers business.

Not only a Western phenomenon

Korean ~~propaganda~~ family film promoting multiculturalism.

While the common theme is that the Western nations are the only places where globalism and progressivism are being enforced upon, it is not entirely true. Yes, the West leads the world in mass-immigration and PC culture, but that's only because it also leads the world in economy and technology (as well as having a subversive group of influential minority). If we take a look at non-Western nations that are technologically developed with relatively high living standards, we also see globalism and progressivism that rivals those of Western nations.

For example, although not exactly the most developed, much of Latin America has always been open to immigration while ideas of feminism and gay rights are spreading rapidly. In East Asia, Singapore is a major hub of internationals with almost half of the population being foreign-born, South Korea has openly embraced multiculturalism for some time now, and it looks like Taiwan is also looking to go on the same path as well.

Japan and its anti-immigration policy seems to be an exception rather than the rule due to their contempt for other Asians whom they consider as inferiors. But that still hasn't salvaged them from declining birthrate and masculinity, not to mention that there is a large support for homophilia in a country that's supposedly not having enough sex:

Although acceptance of homosexuality isn't the only measure of progressivism, I think it's a good indicator of how rapidly things are changing in the so-called traditional cultures of the East (both Korea and Japan have very high levels of pro-gay sentiment among the youth). Simply put, there is almost a direct relationship between social "progress" and the level of technological advancement. Comfortable living conditions afforded by developed economy and technology almost always leads to more progressivism and more globalism. Technology and materialism will penetrate all societies with systemic racial and cultural integration following suit.

Backlash?

I believe the so-called right-wing, nationalist backlash we're witnessing is due to the efforts of technocrats to speed up globalism and progressivism with their immigration plan and PC culture. Had the elites took the time to allow things to develop more naturally, I doubt opposition to globalism and progressivism would have mounted to anything more than futile cries of fringe groups.

But is the backlash for real? We must remember that there has always been opposition to social progress and that they usually fail. The success of women's suffrage and the abolition of segregation against the failed anti-miscegenation, anti-abortion, and anti-gay marriage efforts come to mind.

Besides, opposition alone does not mean that the tide is turning or that there will be an eventual reversal. Let's take Brexit as an example. Yes, the UK now gained its independence from the EU and its Brussels technocrats, but will that really lead to fundamental changes? Will feminism be curbed in the British Isle? Will there be a halt to immigration that coincides with increased reproduction rate for native Brits? Will the British government stop its globalist military adventures abroad? Are the ridiculous hate crime laws and the the march towards total PC police-state be reversed? On all counts: most likely not. There is no capable traditionalist or nationalist party in the UK that even has a chance of getting elected. The slow and steady march of progressivism will continue on unless a massive black swan event were to happen.

Also, we should be prudent and remember that progress is not linear. Sometimes, a society can take 10 steps forward towards Leftist ideals only to take three steps back due to backlash, but it will take another 10 steps forward a decade later when the opposition quiets down, and this continues on.

Conclusion

Reversing the tide against feminism? Trump signs a bill to increase the number of women in STEM fields. There is no backlash against globalism and progressvism in the real world.

Regardless of whether I agree or disagree with them, I believe many people who are against the globalist-progressivist tidal wave are wasting time fuming and getting outraged over symptoms of our technological society instead of addressing the root cause of it all. It's far easier to vent out anger over Muslim immigrants or take comfort in telling yourself that some nutty feminist is going to die amongst her fourteen cats than it is to do something about the state of the world. The cancer will continue to spread regardless.

It seems too many men still hold to the immaterialist view that constantly pushing anti-Leftist ideology will one day lead to final victory, that things will gradually change with all the wrongs reversed even though it has never happened in the past, that they can have their cake and eat it too by keeping their modern technology while preserving whatever ideals that they wish to preserve. The way I see it, we either have to hop off the train of globalism and progressivism or stop that train from moving forward. The technological system cannot be convinced to backtrack from its glorious "progress" for the same reason why we can't return to slavery and feudalism.

To learn more about how our world works, read 'Man's Fight for Existence'.

Read More: John Lennon's "Imagine" Programmed You To Accept The Globalism Nightmare

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

When Will Women And Gay Men Apologize For All The Anorexic Fashion Models?

April 3, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Even when women and gay men run the show, any bad things happening to other women is the fault of straight men reinforcing the patriarchy. In perhaps no arena is this blame game more apparent than the fashion industry. Here, veritable armies of females and homosexuals vastly outnumber straight men, but straight men still get the blame when girl skeletons start parading up and down at Paris or Milan Fashion week.

Here’s an example below, a look promoted and defended by gay man Karl Lagerfeldt:

Similar things can be observed about fashion models employed by female designers and company heads. Nonetheless, we could say the problem is most acute with out-of-their-depth homosexual designers, who pretend they know what constitutes a healthy, attractive woman. Lagerfeldt is joined by gay men like Alexander McQueen (now deceased), Calvin Klein, John Galliano, and others in having a penchant for pushing emaciated girls into the public spotlight. If you added together their individual market shares and industry clout, they effectively control well over half and perhaps three-quarters of the industry.

Yet when we take a look at the kinds of girls straight men prefer, as evidenced by them purchasing publications like Sports Illustrated, models tend to look, even at their thinnest, like Kate Upton:

Consequently, there are two reasons why we find so many anorexic models in the female and gay-dominated fashion industry: a) of any group, straight men know best what an attractive female looks like and b) our culture only considers starving a woman as abuse when it is perpetrated by straight men. And because men are genetically programmed to appreciate healthy women, this slow death by anorexia is almost exclusively the domain of controlling gays and women.

Just don't tell the feminist typists all this. And, surprise, surprise, one of the lone voices that has challenged the use of anorexic models is Giorgio Armani, who, while he has slept with men, has also slept with women. By contrast, for gay men in the fashion industry in particular, their delusions know no bounds. They honestly believe they have their fingers on the pulse of what makes a woman attractive, which is very closely correlated with what makes her healthy. The results speak for themselves.

Just look at what models themselves have said about these women and gay men

> She describes designer Miuccia Prada as a “witch” and tells how her 32A boobs were deemed too big by Chanel’s Karl Lagerfeld.
>
> — Catwalk model Victoire Dauxerre lambasting Miuccia Prada (a woman) and Karl Lagerfeld (a gay).

Though many models have to shut up in the interest of keeping their careers (or avoiding a law suit), enough have come out to attack their former employers. And the overwhelming majority of the people these girls criticize, especially over things like their anorexia or other eating disorders, are gay men, straight women, or fashion companies run by gay men and/or straight women. If the straight male is anywhere, he must be behind the scenes, pulling the puppet strings of the well-intentioned gays and females, right?

The case of model Victoire Dauxerre above is very run-of-the-mill. The New York Post relates how she worked for Prada, headed by the founder’s allegedly terrible granddaughter Miuccia, Alexander McQueen (a gay man whose brand was known as being pro-anorexic both before and after he died) and Céline, a label founded by a woman and whose current “creative director”, Phoebe Philo, is a woman.

What land whales and skeletons have in common

Both human blimps and human sticks are the result of sustained attempts by feminists, gay men, and leftists to redefine what society—and straight men—should find attractive. Much of the time, especially in the fashion industry, the interventions of gay men are not so much political, like with feminists, as misguided attempts to determine what will make them the most money and to portray themselves as female beauty “experts.” Yet with bonafide SJWs, the intention is much more sinister. They may rail against thin models, to the point of attacking healthy but slim, jealousy-inducing girls, rather than anorexic women, but they simultaneously sell the idea that females like Tess Munster/Holliday are gorgeous:

The irony is that if women simply conformed to the preferences of men, they would be much healthier and much happier. Still, this is supremely unlikely to happen. Doing so would require SJWs to admit that straight men are actually right and force them to concede that the real misogyny when it comes to endangering female health and beauty is committed by the women and gay men of the fashion world.

Read More: Is Obese "Model" Tess Holliday Stealing Money From Domestic Violence Charities?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why You Should Read “Nuremberg: Infamy On Trial”

April 3, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

We live in an age of power without responsibility, an age where ambition and hubris are too often to run roughshod over institutional controls and the dictates of common decency. We are too often made to feel helpless in the face of power exercised so far beyond the reach of accountability that many of us have simply given up, and abandoned hope at calling to account those who abuse the trust of the people they were tasked with serving. Does Nuremberg offer us any lessons for our own time? If so, what are they? Is there any hope in the modern era of holding criminal leaders to account for crimes committed in their names? It was with these thoughts in mind that I recently finished Joseph E. Persico’s excellently researched account of the Nuremberg Trials in Germany after the end of the Second World War. The book is entitled Nuremberg: Infamy On Trial.

Even to this day, the trials remain controversial. Persico acknowledges this openly in his introduction:

> Was it [the trial] victors’ vengeance or the authentic pursuit of justice? Indeed can a just court be created to try acts which have not been defined as crimes until after the fact? The charge of ex post facto law was to haunt the IMT [International Military Tribunal] from its first day to its last. How valid is the jurisdiction of a court that permits a British prosecutor to try a German national before a Soviet judge for crimes committed in Poland? If aggression was on trial at Nuremberg, then what were Soviet judges doing on the bench? Their nation had invaded Finland and conspired with Germany to divide up Poland. And, granted that Nazi atrocities dwarfed the misdeeds of other belligerents, had not > war crimes been committed on all sides? Why were only those on the losing side tried?

There are, of course, no easy answers to these questions. It is a credit to Persico's intellectual honesty that he is willing to acknowledge that, to a great extent, the trials were a form of victors' justice; but, he is quick to remind us, that does not mean the trials were a meaningless exercise in revenge. They provided a model for future generations on what an international trial should look like, a model that has been followed in trying participants in conflicts around the world since the 1950s.

Whatever one may think of the trials–and I urge readers not to reach their own judgments until reading the book–they were first-rate drama. What is so fascinating about Persico's book is that he focuses mainly on the human drama behind the legal proceedings. To be blunt, a good deal of the trial was a tedious bore to those forced to sit through it. But behind the scenes, there were poignant scenes being played out nearly every night.

Persico focuses on the individual stories behind each of the defendants: Sauckel, Jodl, Von Papen, Seyss-Inquart, Goering, Keitel, and all the others. We follow each of these men as they enter prison, as they talk to their psychiatrists (who dutifully recorded everything discussed), as they eat, walk the yard, and reflect on their fates. This is the real drama of the trial, not really what happened in court; that outcome was a foregone conclusion.

Persico spends a good deal of time telling us just how the trials came to be had in the first place. Many did not want them, especially Churchill and Stalin. There was no legal precedent to them, and the technology to conduct simultaneous translations in multiple languages had to be invented specifically for the trials. There was jockeying for position to see who would get the roles of prosecutors and judges (a US Supreme Court judge, Robert Jackson played a role as prosecutor).

Some of the defendants emerge as defiant; some resigned and apathetic; some evasive and slithery; and some completely detached from reality. This is the kind of book that should be a treasure trove for those seeking material for psychological analyses. Nothing quite focuses a man's attention like the prospect of death, as the saying goes, and as each of the defendants came closer to his own appointment with the reaper, he became more and more frank as he reflected on his past.

It would be very easy—too easy, in fact—for a smug commenter to moralize on the depravity of the defendants. They were depraved, to be sure; but one wonders just how other world leaders would have fared, then or now, if they themselves had lost a war and been called to account. The disturbing conclusion that the reader is left with is that almost anyone, under the right circumstances, can be capable of supreme evil. The right environment, the right conditioning, and the right incentives can exert nearly irresistible pressures on certain types of minds. The reader will have to decide for himself.

There are some moments of great trial drama. Chief among these was the cross-examination of Hermann Goering by US prosecutor Robert Jackson. The transcript of this verbal joust is fascinating to read, especially since it is generally accepted that Goering got the better of the exchange. Goering emerges in Persico's book as a complex, ruthless, and unrepentant figure. He could be extremely charming when he wanted to be, but this charm masked a complete lack of moral compass. On the stand, Goering–it must be said–humiliated Jackson on point after point, exposing the American's poor trial preparation and embarrassing lack of knowledge of recent history.

Goering was a formidable witness: determined, aggressive, and with nothing to lose

Goering even elicited some grudging admiration from his captors for his blunt honesty. When asked if he conspired to overthrow the Weimar government, his answer was, "That was our intention…we found it no longer necessary." Jackson further undermined his own effectiveness by asking aimless and meandering questions that Goering pounced on to expose the prosecutor's ineptitude. Goering was eventually reined in, but the blow to the tribunal's prestige had been not insignificant.

Perhaps the most fascinating question to come up from the entire trial was the matter of Goering's suicide. For those unfamiliar with the facts, Goering committed suicide just before he was about to be hanged by swallowing a cyanide capsule. The affair was a huge scandal that had, to the chagrin of the Allied powers, deflected attention away from the executions of the other defendants, most of which had been found guilty. Even now, many decades after the event, Goering's suicide remains a puzzle; his cell had been searched on a nearly daily basis and nothing had ever been found in it. But Persico makes a compelling case that Goering had the unwitting assistance of an American army officer named Tex Wheelis, whom Goering had befriended during the course of the trial. Goering may have groomed Wheelis to retrieve personal items for Goering (a practice that was strictly prohibited) from the baggage room. Some of these items may have concealed one or more cyanide capsules.

Nuremberg: Infamy on Trial will be enjoyed by students of Second World War history, enthusiasts of trial drama, and anyone seeking to know how men facing death behave. This is a fascinating look at an event whose private face has been hidden for many decades. Persico pulls back this veil, and shows us just how it all happened. In the end, every reader will have to render his own verdict on the ultimate meaning of the Nuremberg trials.

Read More: The Tyranny Of Technological Control Is Becoming A Reality

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Why Men Murder

April 3, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

One of the most fascinating, but also troublesome phenomenon in the American society and on a global scale, are high murder rates and the factors that underlie both gang violence and killing among ”normal” people.

In this article I intend to explain both the high murder rates and the reasons why people, men in particular, sometimes murder. In order to analyze some of the underlying factors, I have used David Buss’ book The Murderer Next Door (2005), Steven Pinker’s The Better Angels of our Nature (2011), this book, and various relevant additional sources.

Murder among so-called normal people

The evolutionary psychologist David Buss and his team did research on murder for many years, results which were compiled in the book The Murderer Next Door. Buss et al showed that 91 percent of men and 84 percent of women had fantasized about killing someone, and many of the interviewees stressed that they almost carried through their deadly deeds (estimated to 60–80 percent in many cases). Although the murder fantasy sex disparity is small, males murder to a much larger extent than females, likely due to greater physical strength and different personality profiles.

Generally speaking, jealousy, revenge, greed and prestige might be reasons which lead to deadly violence. Take cuckolds as an example, meaning the husbands of adulterous wives. It seems irrational to kill one’s own, cheating wife (or girlfriend) since the options appear better: she’s a damn whore and should be left on her own with as little support or left-overs as possible, but to just get on with one’s own life in some kind of way appears wiser.

From an evolutionary point of view the explanation in this case is that men, who have been living in tribes throughout large part of human history, have earned more (or lost less) in-group social status after killing a cheating woman rather than to continue to live as a cuckold amongst his brethren.

Therefore this cuckold rage has been adaptive and is sometimes, although less often under current circumstances, visible even today. Personality can of course increase the likelihood of murder, but according to Buss someone's personality profile is not directly linked to murder. Most murderers are not psychopaths or even gangsters.

When it comes to inter-tribal deadly violence, there are several reasons why some from tribe A want to kill someone from tribe B: a dead enemy cannot pass his genes on, a real or potential foe has been eliminated, this individual cannot appropriate one's own mate, it helps to cultivate a fierce reputation to deter the encroachment of enemies, and so on.

However, there are many risks involved in killing and humans have developed multiple anti-homicide self-defense mechanisms. When many calculate the costs in more civilized societies, in conjunction with cultural programming which points in a more humane direction, people tend to avoid these deeds. But these types of murder do still occur every now and then.

Gang violence

With that said, gang violence is a wide-spread phenomenon in parts of the U.S. and Latin America in particular. The murder rates in crime-ridden cities like San Pedro Sula (Honduras), Caracas (Venezuela) and San Salvador have surpassed 100 per 100 000 inhabitants during recent years.

This can be compared to supposedly crime-ridden Swedish cities like Malmo, with a murder rate around 3.4 per 100 000 (which is considered moderate to high in a European context). Even the worst places in Southeast Asia, like Manila and Kuala Lumpur, are not anywhere near these figures (often around 20–30). Muslims from Africa, the Middle East and South Asia are more prone to rape but they do not kill to a significant extent at this point.

The U.S. is somewhere in between, looked upon in a larger lens, but cities like St. Louis, Baltimore and Detroit have murder rates at about 40–60 per 100 000 inhabitants and thus they are not that far from places like Cape Town (South Africa) and Cali (Colombia), and even less safe than Mexican cities such as Tijuana.

THE 50 MOST DANGEROUS CITIES IN THE WORLD - BY HOMICIDES PER 100,000 INHABITANTS IN 2015

1. Caracas, Venezuela – 119.87
2. San Pedro Sula, Honduras – 111.03
3. San Salvador, El Salvador – 108.54
4. Acapulco, Mexico – 104.73
5. Maturin, Venezuela – 86.45
6. Distrito Central, Honduras – 73.51
7. Valencia, Venezuela – 72.31
8. Palmira, Colombia – 70.88
9. Cape Town, South Africa – 65.53
10. Cali, Colombia – 64.27
11. Ciudad Guayana, Venezuela – 62.33
12. Fortaleza, Brazil – 60.77
13. Natal, Brazil – 60.66
14. Salvador, Brazil – 60.63
15. St Louis, Missouri, U.S. – 59.23
16. Joao Pessoa, Brazil – 58.40
17. Culiacan, Mexico – 56.09
18. Maceio, Brazil – 55.63
19. Baltimore, Maryland, U.S. – 54.98
20. Barquisimeto, Venezuela – 54.96
21. Sao Luis, Brazil – 53.06
22. Cuiaba, Brazil – 48.52
23. Manaus, Brazil – 47.87
24. Cumana, Venezuela – 47.77
25. Guatemala City, Guatemala – 47.17
26. Belem, Brazil – 46.83
27. Feira de Santana, Brazil – 45.5
28. Detroit, Michigan, U.S. – 43.89
29. Goiania, Brazil – 43.38
30. Teresina, Brazil – 42.64
31. Vitoria, Brazil – 41.99
32. New Orleans, Louisiana, U.S. – 41.44
33. Kingston, Jamaica – 41.14
34. Gran Barcelona, Venezuela – 40.08
35. Tijuana, Mexico – 39.09
36. Vitoria da Conquista, Brazil – 38.46
37. Recife, Brazil – 38.12
38. Aracaju, Brazil – 37.7
39. Campos dos Goytacazes, Brazil – 36.16
40. Campina Grande, Brazil – 36.04
41. Durban, South Africa – 35.93
42. Nelson Mandela Bay, South Africa – 35.85
43. Porto Alegre, Brazil – 34.73
44. Curitiba, Brazil – 34.71
45. Pereira, Colombia – 32.58
46. Victoria, Mexico – 30.50
47. Johannesburg, South Africa – 30.31
48. Macapa, Brazil – 30.25
49. Maracaibo, Venezuela – 28.85
50. Obregon, Mexico – 28.29

So why is this the case? Actually there is a historical parallel between the European Middle Age and the current situation in our modern world. When a Leviathan, a centralized state who rules (a king or a government), was absent on European soil, regional powers reigned their respective principalities or vassal ”states”.

Very simplified, this in turn lead to rival battles between various powerful landlords who often killed their enemies’ peasants. The consequence was numerous killing sprees in a revenge-like pattern. This problem was largely solved after the advent of centralized states, often ruled by kings, in the 16th and 17th centuries onward.

When today's reckless gangs kill, they often focus on their rivals and their members, often in what Steven Pinker refers to as failed states. These cycles of retaliation can continue for a long period until a truce or some other event eventually initiates a, often temporary, decline.

Additionally, witnesses, cops and civilians can get killed as collateral damage or to manifest strength and ruthlessness. Sometimes it looks more like a civil war than general gang violence, and the military is often used to try to deal with escalating problems in Latin American countries. Since the U.S. has more resources, the police force can handle the situation, although often under hard pressure.

Underlying factors

If one look at this topic from a historical, cultural and biological perspective, various factors can be suggested as explanatory variables: low IQ, impulse control and empathy (or conversely high psychopathy), ethnic fragmentalization, alongside gangster culture values (supported by mainstream media in the U.S.), may all be underlying and sometimes overlapping and inter-related factors. Also globalization plays a key role, since many gangs are transnational and operate in the U.S. and other countries and regions simulataneously.

For instance, individuals and groups with lower IQ levels are more prone to violence, both at the micro and macro level. For example, an individual who is not that bright might view criminality as a way to find his way in life. Moreover, an individual with very low level of empathy might be particularly prone to multiple killings and will feel little if any regret afterwards. Group psychology is another contextual factor that plays a huge role for gangs and gang members. They create their own value systems, initiations and control mechanisms.

From a larger perspective, less competent groups create less functional societies, which in turn affects its inhabitants in a negative feedback-loop relationship. This might create fertile soil for gangster culture. However, this does not explain why so many European states, like Italy, were dysfunctional in the not too distant past. Rather the combination of poverty, income inequality and blood symbolism have played a more prominent role with regard to the emergence of mafia groups.

Regardless, I think that severly crime-ridden Latin American countries and U.S. cities can do better. Maybe there are underlying evolutionary factors that cannot be completely changed, but some agency and room to maneuver definitely exist. Otherwise crime in Columbia might not have decreased.

Conclusion

I have far from looked at every angle on this matter, but some perspectives and main factors nevertheless have been discerned. Historical, cultural, biological and various contextual factors do all matter, and it is difficult to disentangle the root causes of deadly violence. Rather many things seem inter-related in chain-like events and patterns.

And to paraphrase David Buss, all of us are potential murderers. It is part of every man's evolutionary framework to have the ability to use deadly violence under specific circumstances, some of which go beyond self-defense and war. Hopefully we do not have to use it throughout our lives. And we all can agree that a cheating slut is not worth killing, since she is metaphorically dead to us anyway.

Read More: Gun Violence Cut In Half Despite Twice As Many People Owning Guns

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

4 Items On The Elite’s Population Control Wish List

April 4, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

As the designs of the New World Order become less fuzzy and come into focus with time, a frightening and uttterly anti-human array of agenda items appear. Those who wish to shed some light on the looming visions of sociopathic madmen glaring down with contempt on the commoners should look no further than Ecoscience, a sprawling, 1051 page book by radical environmentalists Paul Ehrlich and John Holdren, the latter of which who served on the White House Council on Science and Technology in the outgoing, Communist administration of Barack Hussein Obama.

But just because leftist elites and their environmentalist puppets have temporarily taken a back seat doesn’t mean they’ve gone away. Nor has their agenda. As you well know the enemies of Trump’s populism are chomping at the bit to regain power and institute such insanity as the agenda items you’re about to see.

Looking at four agenda items on the leftist elite’s wish list is enough to raise the hair on a man’s neck, and gives us insight as to what’s really happening when power brokers get together and have meetings. Meantime, as their bidding is done Western economies are crippled by financiers and humans are managed like cows by encroaching electronic tyranny.

Here’s four ways they want to impact your life.

1. Government Control Over Air, Water, And Soil

Tax the air we breathe, control how much water we use, and control the soil we grow crops on is the goal of leftist authoritarians

If you ever felt like you were not a person but a number on a spreadsheet at your corporate office and in the government's database, you are correct in that assumption. In the view of elites and leftists, humans are nothing more than a cancer on the planet. Ehrlich and Holdren detail their dream of having the government control land, sea, and sky.

Their dream is to have anything involving air, water, or soil under world government control. Hence, the doubling down on the global warming agenda in media and elsewhere since Trump's EPA man started gutting some of the most intrusive policies.

The goals are taxing the air we breathe, carving up water resources and ceding them them out to corporate-government control, and intrusive measures that keep people from growing their own food and "living off the land." The air your breathe, the water you have in your well, and the crops you grow on your land will all be subject to control.

None will be free, and all will be subject to micromanagement. One can envision a world in which oxygen is taxed, drinking water is rationed, and it's illegal to grow your own food.

2. Limit Science And Technology

Government control of science and technology is another agenda item

As detailed in Ecoscience, leftist authoritarians want a science court, which will decide which inventions will be accepted and which will be banned by a small cabal of elitists who will run the entire world.

Science and technology will be co-opted to suit their agendas. Elitists want to micromanage everything from the temperature in your living room, to the amount of food you get to eat, to the kind of car your drive and how many miles you get to drive it. If this sounds beyond the reach of central planners in government, bear in mind that's exactly what 5G, Global WiFi, and RFID are being designed to do, as last week's article touched on.

Centralized control of science and technology is intended to reduce world population. The bottom line is elites and their government employees want less people on Earth and more authoritarian control over the people that remain. As Holdren says in one of his presentations:

> Lower [population] is better for lots of reasons: 8 billion people in 2100 is preferable by far to 10 billion.

But, as we will see in a moment the ultimate goal is to de-populate the planet even further than that.

3. Stopping World Economic Development

Governments want to manage the lives of people like farmers manages those of livestock

As Africa, China and Latin America imitate Western economic development, the agenda is to stop them from developing, and in fact reverse development in already industrialized Western nations. Environmentalists like Erhlich and Holdren are pushing to roll back progress to bring humans back to a state of living equaling that of pre-industrial civilization: lifespans of 30-35 years which are both short and brutish.

Incidentally, the aforementioned global warming agenda also ties into stopping economic development in other countries. The agenda is tantamount to telling other nations not to do what America and Europe did to pull themselves out of poverty and provide a better life for their people.

Additionally, the authors of Ecoscience says nations like India and Bangladesh need to be placed into what they call triage – cutting off all food aid and extending no credit to them from the world government. In essence, the design of the world government will literally be to let hundreds of millions starve to death. And that's only the beginning.

4. Optimum Population of Earth: 1 Billion

The Georgia Guidestones call for limiting world population to 500 million

This is where things really get hairy with the assembling planetary regime. Going by "optimum population" numbers detailed in Ecoscience, around 6 billion people need to die. The effect this would have on modern economies is unimaginable, as population growth is correlated with economic prosperity and population decline is correlated with economic decline and depression. The Georgia Guidestones take this ideology a step further, claiming 500 million people is the "optimum population." Is this why World War III seems to draw nigh every time the Neocons speak, as they constantly court war with Russia and Iran?

What are some other ways the eco nuts – doing the bidding of the elite, make no mistake – want to accomplish their goal of population decline?

There are plans to draw up "Population Laws." Effectively, this means people will have to get licensed to give birth. A couple will literally need government permission to get pregnant. Don't get the license and blessing of your rulers? You will face forced adoption and government-mandated abortions. Abortions, already responsible for 45 million deaths since 1973 will become even more commonplace. From Ecoscience:

> It has been concluded that compulsory population-control laws, even including laws requiring compulsory abortion, could be sustained under the existing Constitution if the population crisis became sufficiently severe to endanger the society.

But why stop there? There are plans to overthrow the "existing Constitution" and replace it with world government. From there, the NWO can start sterilizing people through drinking water. From Ecoscience:

> Adding a sterilant to drinking water or staple foods is a suggestion that seems to horrify people more than most proposals for involuntary fertility control. Indeed, this would pose some very difficult political, legal, and social questions, to say nothing of the technical problems. No such sterilant exists today, nor does one appear to be under development. To be acceptable, such a substance would have to meet some rather stiff requirements: it must be uniformly effective, despite widely varying doses received by individuals, and despite varying degrees of fertility and sensitivity among individuals; it must be free of dangerous or unpleasant side effects; and it must have no effect on members of > the opposite sex, children, old people, pets, or livestock.

And of course, it would have to be socially engineered into the silly putty minds of the sheeple who would be subject to being sterilized by drinking water. Or food.

Insanity

Leftoid crazies want complete control over your life

Predictably, those who wish to institute this Draconian control over human life demand world government, enforced by a police and surveillance state which will supersede national sovereignty:

> If this could be accomplished, security might be provided by an armed international organization, a global analogue of a police force. Many people have recognized this as a goal, but the way to reach it remains obscure in a world where factionalism seems, if anything, to be increasing. The first step necessarily involves partial surrender of sovereignty to an international organization.

Obviously, this agenda item is already well underway with the dissolution of national sovereignty in America and Europe. Once the most powerful nations on earth are sufficiently homogenized, weaker nations will follow, tumbling like a house of cards into the New World Order.

Many of these policies are rooted in radical 1960s/1970s leftist ideology such as that written in The Population Bomb by Ehrlich, which predicted overpopulation would ruin many countries, when in fact the exact opposite has happened. Europe, Japan, Russia and many other nations are experiencing population decline, and that is ruining them. Not overpopulation. Which means, these goals are as outdated as other leftist agenda items, and they threaten mankind in incalculable ways.

If instituted, these policies add a new dimension to the already dystopian world unfolding all around us. George Orwell said it best:

> "If you want a vision of the future, imagine a boot stamping on a human face – forever.

Indeed, that is the world currently being foisted upon mankind in the early 21st century.

Read More: US Government Goes Full Retard And Backs War Draft For Women

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Open Letter To President Donald J. Trump

April 4, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

President Trump, now that you are firmly in power and have vigorously begun fulfilling your campaign promises, I expect you to have extra time to fix other problems that weren't at the forefront of your election campaign, particularly ones that resulted from a society that has normalized hatred of men and masculinity.

Sadly, the average man today is looked upon with contempt and the source of all problems that women complain about (both real and imagined), even though they are the most privileged class of female that exists in the world today. As you already know, once a woman successfully nags you into correcting what she perceives as a problem, she immediately begins work on correcting another, and then another, until you wake up to find yourself completely submissive to a woman whose behavior now matches that of a radical Islamic terrorist. Thanks to the leftist pet causes of feminism and social justice, which were enabled by the globalists who sought to defeat you, the matriarchal reign of terror has culminated with all men presumed to be rapists and oppressors, and who need to be "taught" how not to abuse women, as if it's a natural-born instinct of ours like eating or sleeping.

Once the culture has accepted the lie that all living men are active oppressors, it was easy to push other lies that men are unfairly stealing money from women by earning more than them for the same labor. The next step in correcting this "wrong" is for women who are less skilled than men to get hired and promoted over men. Relentless propaganda in the media and academia has so infected the workforce and female-dominated Human Resources departments that a productive man is one bogus accusation away from destitution. If his workplace has at least one woman, he can no longer share his opinions without fear of causing offense and getting fired.

The situation is even worse outside of work. Unless a man is prepared to wear a bodycam 24 hours a day, he is at risk for false accusations of harassment or rape. It takes thousands of dollars to defend against such accusations within a culture that refuses to grasp the fact that women are highly eager to lie for personal or financial gain. So many men have dropped out from relationships, work, and even educating themselves in university, simply because they realize how badly the system is rigged against them. Men have become second class citizens, expected to bow down to women simply because they lack a vagina. While women shriek of their safe spaces, stocked with coloring books and crayons, men are subject to attack from any space they enter, because of laws and institutional rules that have been changed to their detriment.

But enough with the victimhood. Men have pride, and even when we are wronged, we don't like to ask for help or say that we are being attacked. The men who follow me rather take it on the chin and solve their problems than complain about their plight, but we still can't ignore the reality that relations between men and women are the worst it's ever been thank to a multi-decade push by globalists to invert the natural order and lift women above men. We now live in a culture where women want to replace the role of men in employment, positions of power, and even within relationships as they gleefully brag about the “end of men” and how the world would just be better if we didn’t exist.

Authored by Jewish feminist Hanna Rosin

To solve this problem, we don’t need more regulations, policies, or even money. All that’s needed is for you to stop using Federal law and funding to feed feminist pigs so that nature can reassert itself. In other words, stop the government from acting as a daddy and husband to women.

Halt any program that performs a function that a father or husband could perform. This means no free money, no welfare, and no “reproductive health services.” Private charities can pick up the slack for widows and women who weren’t pleasing enough to land a husband. I also urge you to stop any program that attempts to turn women into men, such as university sports funding or scholarship programs that push unqualified women into science. As a masculine man yourself, do you see any point in having programs that encourage a woman to leech off of free help instead of falling into the arms of a man she must open her heart to in order to receive material benefits?

If you thought Hillary Clinton was a nasty woman, I wish you could see the attitude of a basic run-of-the-mill middle class American girl who knows that there will be no consequences for her actions because she will be saved by a culture that thinks she’s a victim and a government that actively competes with men to be her husband. It’s become so bad that there are now male movements which dedicate themselves to not interacting with women at all.

My vote for you was just one of many millions, so I hope I don’t sound too pushy, but as a man who has had a front-row seat in this horror show of cultural decline, I see in you someone who would genuinely care about how American men have been spit on by the elites, both economically and spiritually. Thankfully, even if you do nothing that I kindly suggest, your existence alone is a great help to men, who will now feel that it's okay to proudly display their masculinity without feeling shame for having the natural urges to compete, achieve, conquer, and grow. Even the presence of your European wife may inspire women to rediscover their feminine instincts, of standing by their man as he climbs the ladder of success. If more American men are rewarded for emulating you, and more American women feel less of a need to attack men, we have already taken the first step to fixing the damage that has been brought through the deliberate globalist effort to divide and conquer us as a people.

At risk of getting too greedy, I make one more request. There is something going on in the environment where plastics and other industrial chemicals are lowering both testosterone and sperm counts. It's turning men into women. It will be harder to make America great again if the men are weak, frail, and gay, so please get the FDA to commission animal studies that research the most common household plastics and their effects on the mammalian endocrine system. If the studies show a harmful effect, ban them. This will certainly cost large corporations billions of dollars, and may even hit the consumer in the pocketbook as well, but maintaining healthy testosterone among men is a matter of public health and state survival. If we ever want to wean ourselves off immigration, we need a sustainable population. This cannot be done if American men are practically infertile and racing to become cuckolds instead of fathers.

President Trump, I hope this letter shed light on the social and health problems that men are facing today. If you merely starve the feminist beast, allow men to be men, and ensure their bodies are not being poisoned by endocrine disruptors in the environment, you will aid in the revival of masculinity to the days of tradition when men were looked upon as leaders and husbands instead of oppressors and rapists. Whatever you choose, I will pray for you. May you have the strength and will to do what you know in your heart is right.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: The Path Men Took To Trump

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

15 Actions British Men Can Take To Protect Themselves Against Feminism

April 4, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Jim Johnson

The British government continues to march down the dark path of Cultural Marxism. Today, it's ruled almost entirely by closet radical feminists that are determined to strike blow after blow against men and the family unit. Since 2010, Theresa May, formerly the head of the Home office and now the unelected Prime Minister, and Alison Saunders, the head of the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS), have changed the laws so that women's claims of abuse and victimization at the hands of men are always assumed true by the police. Men can be arrested and held in custody for 24 hours without being told why. Women's statements alone can deny a man the right to see his children. There are no definitive civil rights guarantees for men given the family courts' right to determine what is considered to be a threat to a woman or the family. The Crown Prosecution Service has a de-facto policy of prosecuting all allegations made by women against men, without proper regard to their plausibility.

London Metropolitan Police

This newfound power that hijacks the legal system and overrides due process and fundamental human rights gives women the ability to make false claims and exert extreme leverage over men for any reason they choose. Many men are having their lives ruined before they have had a chance to prove their innocence. We have all seen the news stories about the actions and policies of the Home Office, the Police and the Crown Prosecution Service since 2010, when Theresa May and Alison Saunders took over and applied radical feminist policies. Absurd allegations of rape, domestic violence, and discrimination ruined the lives of men, and many of these allegations were later proven to be false or exaggerated beyond recognition.

Alison Saunders – Head of Crown Prosecution Service

This problem, regrettably, will get worse. As unelected Prime Minister, Theresa May will increase her assault on human rights for men – she wants to repeal the Human Rights Act, which provides human rights for all, but retain the Equality Act 2010, which de-facto defends human rights for women and protected minorities. The net result will be that only men lose their human rights. She will increase state surveillance of men – she has driven through passage of the Investigatory Powers Act, which retains 12 months of your website data and makes it available to local police forces and social services without a warrant.

Theresa May – Unelected Prime Minister

She will continue her doublespeak – a prime example is Violence Against Women and Girls (VAWG), which is a set of male-hate policies using the front of domestic abuse for criminalising men and putting hundreds millions of pounds annually into the pockets of feminists. She will intensify politicised justice – for example, she appointed feminist Liz Truss as Justice Secretary despite her complete lack of legal experience. She will fuel the gender war through lies and statistics – she manipulates facts, e.g. she defines gender pay gap as the difference between the median salary of men vs the median salary of women without adjusting for line of work, seniority, experience, education, hours worked, performance, time spent away from home, risky working environment, etc.. No economist takes this fabricated gender wage gap seriously.

Feminism isn't about equal rights for women. It's about criminalising, humiliating and emasculating men. It is about taking everything men have worked for – their homes, families and careers, away from them at any opportunity. Protect yourself.

1. Recognise that women have become weaponised

The world has changed. Since 2010, new laws, amended laws and new application of old laws have radically widened the definitions of domestic abuse, sexual assault, discrimination, harassment, stalking, and hate crime to such an extent that just about anything a man does can now be classed as a crime. Subjective interpretation is a key enabling feature. Under Home Office guidance, the police must now accept everything a woman says, believe everything a woman says and check very little. All female complainants are referred to as "victims." Under the 2014 Positive Action Policy of the police YOU WILL be arrested. Under the Zero Tolerance policies of the Home Office and Alison Saunders at the Crown Prosecution Service YOU WILL be prosecuted. YOU WILL be treated as guilty until proven innocent and YOU WILL have to prove your innocence. Women have not been empowered. They have become unwittingly weaponised by feminists to destroy men and families. They want women to hate the ones they love. Feminists and vindictive psychos like to pull the trigger.

2. Shun feminists and psychos

Avoid feminists, whether or not they're married. A false or exaggerated claim can be made by any woman against any man and feminists are far more likely than non-feminists to do this. Avoid women who have degrees in gender studies, use the word "victim," or think the solution to their problems is to report pettiness to the police (or anyone for that matter). Assume all women are feminists until proven to be anti-feminists. Vindictive psychos are more difficult to avoid – you never know until it's too late. Men have always had to deal with psychos, usually by gently walking away, but these days they can come back with a vengeance with false claims and with the police and CPS by their side. Try screening them out by only proceeding with dating if they sign a statutory declaration under penalty of perjury that they have never made an allegation of rape, harassment, stalking, domestic abuse, bullying or trolling. You can both sign one to be fair about it. Never have sex with them if they've had more than two drinks – they lack legal capacity to consent and they or their feminist friend can later accuse you of rape (but they will still be held legally responsible if they drive drunk).

3. Insure yourself against false accusations

If you are a man and falsely accused and charged by the police or the CPS you will need money to defend yourself. Check your home insurance, which may cover legal defence. Alternatively, keep £20,000 in a bank account as a legal defence fund. This account cannot be a joint account and your partner must be unaware of its existence. The British justice system de-facto presumes men are guilty until proven innocent and innocence may be expensive to prove.

4. Protect yourself with technology

Theresa May drove through the Investigatory Powers Act 2016, which compels all ISPs to log every website you and your family have visited over the past 12 months and make this information available to local police and social workers without warrant. She claims this is to fight terrorism but she will re-purpose it to fight men. Fight back. Encrypt all of your hard drives. Use VPNs for your internet connection. Send messages only on encrypted platforms such as WhatsApp and iMessage. Keep every message and email a woman has ever sent to you and record any sexual activity. You will need this in court to prove your innocence.

5. Stick together as a family

Family breakdown in the UK is now the highest in Europe thanks to state policy and the court system. You, your wife and your children are the best defence against a male-hating, family-hating state. Be united in your defence of your children, your property, your religion and your family values against the state's attack on families. Spend time with your family building love and trust with each other. Stick up for one another.

6. Distrust police and civil servants

Meet them with a wall of silence. Teach your children NEVER to speak to these people without you or a solicitor present. This is especially true for your teenage or older boys. Don't be naïve – NHS staff and state school teachers are now social services informants. 20% of all children in the UK under the age of five have been reported to social services. Don't engage in conversation – tell them the minimum information needed to conclude whatever transaction it is you have with them. Do not cooperate with the police, especially the Community Service Unit (the relationship police). They will lie, twist and exaggerate to create a case against you. Video or voice record every conversation or encounter you have with the police, social services, parking wardens, NHS staff or any other state worker. Your iPhone is your best weapon and your best defence.

7. Embrace women with strong father figures and common sense

If you are single, seek out women who admire their fathers and brothers. Find those who have experienced real life, who have known hardship, who grew up in well-adjusted social households with fathers and brothers. Seek women who know life is filled with ups and downs. Do not date women who demonstrate a sense of entitlement, victimization or extreme emotional instability. Be particularly aware of women who threaten you when jealous or make up or exaggerate stories about other men they have dated. Reduce your risk by vetting all women you date with a background check, searches on their social media websites such as Facebook, questions about previous relationships and how they ended. If necessary, hire a private detective to ensure they don't have a record of making false or petty allegations against previous partners.

8. Avoid non-committal Northern European, British, and American women

Two-thirds of divorces in the US and UKare now initiated by women, not men. Domestic violence allegations is their weapon of choice in getting custody of your children and your money. Don't be conned by these feminist-inspired women. Date family-orientated women. Sign prenuptial agreements with a view to keeping your wife honest through sickness and in health, but be aware that British courts are not currently legally bound by these agreements.

9. Minimise your taxes

75% of income tax in the UK is paid by men. This is in addition to spousal support and child support payments paid by men, many of whom are blocked by state bodies such as CAFCASS or the family courts from seeing their children. Taxes paid by men are then used against them by a feminist-controlled state to fund its war against men and families. Tax is theft. Practice legal tax avoidance and stop funding the state's war on men.

10. Stay out of the system

State schools are failing boys. Boys now make up only 40% of university students. The heavily feminised state education system is hostile to boys and teaches feminism and political correctness, not critical thinking. Normal boy behaviour is no longer tolerated and is often classed as ADHD. So is Dad Deficit Disorder. Ritalin and Concerta prescriptions for boys are at an all-time high. Send your children to private school if you can.

11. Ditch your TV license and stop funding the BBC

Broadcast television media, most notably the BBC, have become rabidly anti-male. Men are depicted as bumbling idiots and worse. There are almost no male news presenters anymore. Witness Women's Hour (Women Sour) on BBC radio. Declare you do not watch live TV and stop paying your TV Licence. You can still stream Netflix and watch DVDs. Your mental health will improve tenfold.

12. Be resilient

Suicide is now the leading cause of death of males aged between 15-49 in the UK. Men are killing themselves at a rate more than three times higher than women. When a man loses his children, his family and his rights in a system stacked against him it is easy to lose all hope. Be resilient.

13. Be great at what you do

Don't let the feminists drag you down. Be great at your sport, your business, your intellectual pursuits, or whatever it is you choose to do. Men have a unique ability to compartmentalise and focus without distraction on achieving success. Don't let feminists stop you.

14. Stay human

Don't turn into a politically-correct male automaton. Don't shut down your emotions, your masculinity or your sex drive. Simply find safe locations and trusted friends to express your humanity. Exercise every day. Men especially need it. Feel the testosterone and endorphins. Be physically alive.

15. Fight back and defend your rights

Most men in the UK are unaware of how their rights have been assaulted by the state's actions and changed over the past years. Get informed and stay informed. Know your rights under the European Convention on Human Rights. Exercise and stand up for your rights and family values. Recognise the laws are wrong, Police and CPS application of the law is wrong and the justice system has become politicised. Engage in non-violent civil disobedience. Rational debate and free speech no longer exist. Be prepared to risk getting arrested.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

4 Unorthodox Workouts You Need to Try

April 4, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

If you are a gym-rat, then there is no doubt that you have spent a great deal of time trying different workouts and different lifting routines. And after a good amount of time, you have probably settled in to a routine that works well for you. However, even for the seasoned gym-junkie—and also for the newbie who simply wants to try something new—there is a certain pleasure that comes from attempting an unusual lifting session.

Furthermore, when you are having an off-day and just don't feel like working out, trying an unorthodox routine just for one bout at the gym can help push you into the weight room when you otherwise might not have gone in. And so, to that end, here are four unorthodox lifting-routines that you may not have tried before, but which make for great single session lifts when you want to experience something new.

1. The One-Minute Set

Try one max-out set of this weight every single minute…and do it for ten to fifteen minutes.

The One-Minute Set is a good routine to use when you are relatively pressed for time but you want to get in a solid work-out on a number of different muscle groups. In essence, decide which exercises you want to do for your lifting session. Then, for whatever exercise you are planning on doing, put about 50% to 70% of your maximum lifting weight on the bar. Once you are ready, watch the clock and when a new minute starts, begin the exercise and max out.

The moment you are done, rest, but watch the clock. The second the clock changes to the next minute, do another max-out set. Repeat this one time each minute so that you are doing a set every minute. This does not mean that you are resting for a minute between sets, but rather, that once every minute, you are doing a full max-out set. So, in ten minutes you will have done ten sets; and in just a thirty-minute workout, you will have potentially done thirty max-out sets. And the next day, you will hurt. And that is a good thing!

2. The Super-Heavy Negative

Super-Heavy…or Too Heavy to Handle.

The Super-Heavy Negative workout is for those days when you want to lift really heavy, but your energy is not there for some reason. So, in light of that fact, this workout makes you lift heavy, but there is a lot of down-time in-between if you want it.

To get started, decide what exercise you want to do and then put yourself in a lifting cage or other location where there is something that can definitely catch the weight for you. Make sure everything is safe and the weight will not drop on you! Then, on the bar, put on from one-and-a-half to two times your one-rep max; the weight should be low enough that you can get it off the bar yourself at full extension but heavy enough that you could not even do a single full rep with that weight (and note that due to the strain on your joints that this workout causes, it should only be done by experienced lifters).

Once the bar is off, slowly lower it down until it eventually catches on whatever safety device you are using; note that lowering the bar should take as long as possible, even upwards of a minute if you can do so. Finally, once the bar is down, then, if you have a partner, lift it back into the starting position, or, if you are working alone, then take off the weight until you can do a normal set, do the normal set, put the bar back up, and then reload the bar with the super-heavy weight for your next negative.

Note as well that while this type of set works well for bench-press and shoulder-press, etc., it likely seems harder to do for any pulling exercises, such as for your back. So, if you want to do super-heavy negatives for your back, you can do something like the following: if you are on the back-row cable machine, for instance, then choose a weight that you can do with both hands but not with just one, which will thus allow you to pull the weight into position with both hands, but then do the super-heavy negative back-row with just one hand. If fact, you can do a super-heavy negative in each hand, then max out with a regular set of back-rows.

So this kind of lifting, whether pushing or pulling, will make you work.

3. Random Lifts

Sometimes, you just have to embrace the batshit crazy exercises!

This is more of a fun routine that is ideal when you are feeling a bit mischievous and want to be free of having a set routine for the day. So, for this routine, just go into the weight-room, then randomly decide what area of the room you will walk to. Once there, randomly decide what exercise you will do, and then randomly decide the weight you are going to lift (within your reasonable limits, of course). Essentially, the goal here is to make everything you do in the weight-room random.

And if you are the type of person who simply cannot make random-like choices by yourself, then pick two different exercises and fill a coin to decide which one to do (or use a dice-throwing app on your phone or something similar to make the decision for you). And use this same procedure for how much weight you will lift, how many sets you do, etc. In the end, the point is to let chaos take its course and have a good time.

4. Death By Dumb-Bell

These things can kill you!

The final type of routine is for when you are really pressed for time in the gym but you feel like your whole body needs work. Indeed, this is the routine to do if you only have ten or fifteen minutes to workout but you still want to hit all the major muscle groups.

So, once in the gym, find yourself an adjustable bench and grab a set of dumb-bells which might be on the light-side for compound lifts, and heavier for individual lifts, but which you can lift for almost all exercises. Then, with the bench there, start hammering out a single set of a certain exercise until you max out, and then immediately switch to another exercise and max-out, and then repeat this sequence until your workout is done. So, for example, do a shoulder press, then front shoulder-flyes, then shrugs, then bicep curls, then dumb-bell squats, then lunges, and so on. The point is to cover your whole body in a short amount of time, and to do it in a way which also gives you some cardio benefits. And this workout achieves exactly that.

Conclusion

So, these a just a few of the unorthodox workouts that you can do on the odd day that you do not feel like doing your regular routine. These unusual routines are enjoyable and likely quite different from your regular workout. And so, hopefully trying one of them will motivate you to head to the gym even on a day when you really just don't feel like it.

Read More: How to Work Out The Lower Half Of Your Body Using Isometric Exercises

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

Men Should Train 18-Year-Old Girls In Feminine Grace Before They Are Ruined By College

April 5, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Due to the three to four years of cultural indoctrination known as college, men of all ages would do well to bed, train, and tie down 18 and 19-year-old girls before they are ruined. Even girls who do not attend institutions of "higher" education are liable to be infected by college-like forces of moral and feminine corruption. It is therefore incumbent upon every man in the manosphere to attempt to create a new generation of girls who openly reject the decadence of women who are five or ten years older.

The sad story of girls in the modern world often starts with this:

[image]

…and tragically finishes with this, most of all in moral terms:

[image]

Whilst game offers something of a solution for men battling against powerful sociocultural factors, a 25-year-old girl poisoned by four years of college and three years of conditioning by a feminist-dominated HR department at her first job is in many cases a lost cause. Game is not a panacea. Any effort you expend striving to attune many 25-year-old girls back to their biological imperative is likely to be either fully wasted or fall well short of your expectations.

And if you have found a girl beyond her very early 20s who is marriageable and amenable to time-honored practices of male dominance and female submission, good for you. But in some respects you should consider yourself the beneficiary of extreme luck, including from a girl's traditional parents, cultural background, her childhood religion, or to the happenstance of her attending a less left-wing campus.

Because I am in my 20s, I am speaking from the perspective of a young man. I do not claim to know first-hand the difficulties of older men in attracting more nubile women. That said, older men stand a better chance of pursuing a long-term, mutually gratifying relationship if they select women who are yet to be adulterated by a pernicious feminist culture. Despite some troubling developments in our high schools, these places are still far less exposed to SJW thinking than universities. All the more reason for men from multiple age brackets to concentrate on younger women who have just hit 18 years of age and are about to enter college or have recently done so.

Take one for the team – adopt a precocious 18-year-old to bang and wife-up

[image]
The moral fall comes quickly, so jump in with her while you can.

So far I have given you a perfectly selfish reason to find an 18 or 19-year-old girl (or 20 to 22-year-old girl for smaller towns, more conservative states, or traditional countries like Slovakia and Poland). Get these purer college-age girls and keep them, before they contract a socially-reinforced mental illness called feminism. To boot, they are almost always more attractive than older girls, due to both the natural aging process and the hideous outcomes of SJW indoctrination.

Also, think of this exercise as a very valuable contribution to the local community, country, and world in which you reside. By catching women before they would otherwise descend into the abyss, you provide a net benefit to society. You maintain a young woman's feminine energies and are part of a movement that deals with the roots of the problem instead of merely snapping off decaying twigs or branches, which represent older and largely unsalvageable girls. And "older," as I said before, can still refer to a woman just past her early twenties.

Because the number of truly red-pilled men is not at the level we desire, competition for these 18 to 19-year-old will be less than you expect. Many of us have opted for quality foreign women anyway, who are far more plentiful outside the SJW metropolises and the West in general. And putting your dick in a woman who is either physically or morally below what you deserve is just a recipe for self-loathing and only rewards bad female behavior.

Note that I mentioned "an 18-year-old to… wife-up" earlier. This doesn't mean you have to marry her. Young girls can change, and not just because they become unmarriageable. They may very well end up not being right for you, especially for a commitment of more than five years. The idea here, rather, is to inculcate or partially inculcate in a girl resistance to the socially communicable disease of feminism. You should leave her in a much better moral state for the next man who gets her than she would otherwise enjoy.

Continue with girls above the age of 22, but be careful

[image]
'Tis a lost cause, this one.

There are sensible exceptions to what I am encouraging you to do. True enough, younger girls can already be poisoned by the time they hit 18 and, particularly in more traditional communities, decent, feminine, and marriageable girls can be found in their mid to late-twenties in very good numbers.

Nonetheless, because ROK has always preached against proverbial one-itis, selecting a girl aged 25 or 30 with much higher chances of feminist (and physical) wear-and-tear is ill-advised when younger options are available. Rely on your own judgment, but the chances of a girl older than 25 being the right one for you are smaller than you would expect.

Cutting off the heads of SJW influences and taking girls who have their innocence preserved will deliver us much better outcomes, whether personally or society-wide, than dealing with used goods.

Read More: Reflections On My Freshman Year Of College

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why SJWs Will Never Get The World They Want

April 5, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

What does Social Justice, as it's construed today, have to do with an ancient Greek myth? As it happens, everything. In the words of Diodorus of Sicily:

> [Theseus] put to death Procrustes, as he was called, who dwelt in what was known as Corydallus in Attica; this man compelled the travelers who passed by to lie down upon a bed, and if any were too long for the bed he cut of the parts of their body which protruded, while in the case of such as were too short for it he stretched their legs…

Life imitates art in the Scandinavian (particularly Danish) Jante Law. Roosh noted that this hyper-equality made Danish society unbearably drab. Further, it's weaponized by modern feminism and perhaps soon coming to a country near you. The social justice "privilege" rhetoric is all this on steroids. The effects are pretty far-reaching. Here's how it got started.

Radical egalitarianism

The philosophical basis, in the earliest form, began as a fine Age of Enlightenment principle. As the Declaration of Independence put it, "all men are created equal". Citizens “are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights” and “Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed”. It’s not too much of a stretch to say the idea implies that hereditary distinctions between citizens (noblemen and commoners) as existed in British society are artificial. Further, the law should work the same for everyone, rich or poor. So far, so good.

So this means that citizens have equal rights under the law, including determining their form of government. It doesn’t mean that everyone really is the same; that would be absurd. Some are tall, others short; some are good looking, others plain; some are strong, others are weak; and so forth. That’s just the way things are, and getting upset about things you can’t control is a waste of time.

When cultural Marxism enters the picture, things indeed become absurd. As an ideology calculated to stir up grievances and turn society into a bunch of squabbling factions, it was bad enough. Social justice is a late development of cultural Marxism, tapping into the leftist core principles of radical egalitarianism and reality denial. They believe that differences between people don’t really exist, or they do exist but shouldn’t. Social justice considers any natural advantages (as they perceive them) to be wrong, resulting in undeserved “privilege.”

What makes someone privileged?

The book Women’s Voices, Feminist Visions: Classic and Contemporary Readings graphically represents several characteristics of “domination” and “privilege”:

- Male and masculine, Female and feminine (what’s called “cisgendered” these days)
- Male
- White
- European in origin (kind of redundant)
- Heterosexual
- Able bodied
- Credentialed, highly literate (professors, for example)
- Young
- Attractive
- Upper and middle class
- Anglophones
- Light, pale

- Gentile, non-Jew
- Fertile

Accompanying this list are terms ending in "-ism" or "bias", a convenient verbal arsenal of devil words. Opponents on target include anyone stating that these characteristics actually are good, believing someone can succeed despite lacking one of these traits, or refusing to wallow in guilt on command.

In the Social Justice religion, "privilege" is their version of original sin. It's a very convenient way to manipulate people through guilt about being some kind of oppressor. It's been that way long before they even came up with privilege rhetoric

> Oh, you don't support such-and-so policy because it opposes your interests or it will wreck your country? Well, then you must be a (insert devil word)!

Denying it or making a logical counter-argument only makes them shriek louder; you've been deemed a sinner. This is how they've delegitimized entire policy arguments. This is how they've shamed lukewarm conservatives into letting them get away with pathological altruism.

That was only the tip of the iceberg

The late Rabbi Ovadia Yosef tried to create a long-neglected Social Justice cause

The above is far from an exhaustive list of the things the Social Justice Warriors blather about. For example, being "neurotypical" (not being crazy, neurotic, or a sperg) is a form of "privilege," and it's discrimination to disagree with them. So if someone believes he's a cat, there's not a damn thing wrong with him; it's the people thinking he's a weirdo (or even disbelieving that he's a cat) who have a problem. I'm not being facetious, as many SJWs believe they're not human. The Current Year's greatest cause-du-jour is on behalf of neurotic men who think they're women. If you don't believe they belong in the women's bathroom (or locker room) then you're a "transphobe".

For another one, "heightism" is a form of discrimination. So if you're tall, you have an unfair advantage; you're privileged, and that means you're a bad person. Start feeling guilty now! This recalls a passage from Ayn Rand's Anthem:

> We are six feet tall, and this is a burden, for there are not many men who are six feet tall. Ever have the Teachers and the Leaders pointed to us and frowned and said: "There is evil in your bones, Equality 7-2521, for your body has grown beyond the bodies of your brothers." But we cannot change our bones nor our body.

That one is a subset of "lookism." If unattractive people can't get laid, it's an injustice. I'm not making this up. I'm sure it sucks for people who got hit by the ugly stick, but you can't really fault someone for not having sex with people who don't turn them on. As I recommend in Righteous Seduction, maximize appearance where possible, while emphasizing already existing positive traits; basically making the best of things. Expecting other people to change their tastes is futile.

All animals are equal, but some animals are more equal than others

The remedy for supposed privilege is to penalize those who hold it. So here we are, measured against the iron bed of Procrustes. A classic fictional example is Kurt Vonnegut's short story "Harrison Bergeron". Everyone above mediocrity in some way gets a penalty. Those too strong are weighted down, those too good looking have to cover their faces, and those too intelligent must listen to a constant distracting noise. This is the kind of world the SJWs want.

As for practical implications, the most visible and the first to emerge were hiring quotas and set-asides by race and sex, now sometimes extended to other protected groups. This gives them real privilege, backed by government power and the threat of lawsuits by activist organizations. This now applies to other things, such as college admissions. Equality of opportunity is fairness, but expecting equality of results is Procrustean.

Another angle of attack is propaganda. Documenting all this would exceed the New York City yellow pages, but here's a snippet from Herbert Marcuse, a prominent member of the Frankfurt School, the Communist think tank that started cultural Marxism:

> The West is guilty of genocidal crimes against every civilization it has > encountered. American and Western Civilization are the world's greatest repositories for racism, sexism, xenophobia, Antisemitism, Fascism, and Nazism. American society is oppressive, evil, and undeserving of loyalty.

That's rather faint praise for the country that gave him and his accomplices refuge from the Third Reich. If you've been to college, often you've had that kind of overblown, one-sided indoctrination shoved down your throat. This is what leftist professors taught tens of millions of impressionable students for over half a century. It's quite a hustle: a cushy, well-paying job to poison young minds with guilt trips.

The media also pushes this propaganda. Not only is their news coverage biased, they've been sneaking cultural Marxist messages into entertainment programming for ages. It's even piggybacked into advertisements too. That's a good reason not to watch crappy television or Hollywood movies; a lot of it is meant to demoralize you. For another reason to unplug from the media, getting their propaganda needle out of your arm deprives them of your cash.

Finally, the legal system is abused to impose leftist morality. Suppose you're a baker who doesn't want to make a cake for a gay wedding. Rather than find a different baker, or bake it themselves, they'll rob you in court and terrorize other business owners into compliance. For that matter, gay marriage didn't happen because the people wanted it. Instead, they lawyered it all the way up to the Supreme Court, where they "discovered" what they wanted to find in the Constitution, as always.

Why the social justice paradise is impossible to achieve

Narcissism? Now it's called social justice and gender equality!

Procrustes could chop off feet from the tall, or stretch the short on the rack, but SJWs have a much more difficult task. The quest of these would-be revolutionaries is ultimately futile. For example, they can dumb down education, preventing intelligent students from flourishing (and then drug them when they get bored and rebellious). However, throwing billions at educating morons won't bring them up to average standards. You can feed junk food to someone who would naturally be a great athlete and keep him out of the gym, but no amount of nutrition and training will make an Olympic athlete out of someone who just doesn't have the body for it.

They're pushing to blur differences between men and women, because they think sexual dimorphism is bad, but they're fighting biology. Some will rebel against their edicts, and others will take notice. After men were lied to by feminists and outdated pop culture about what women want, some guys ignored all that and got great results. Others noticed this and started telling the truth to the public; for instance, things like supplication, pedestalization, and acting like a cuddly teddy bear don't work. That's how the seduction community got started. Sooner or later, women will discover that acting unladylike and having a nasty attitude will leave them lonely.

The drive to make the public unisex has picked up speed lately. Among many items, this includes pushing transsexuality on the public, including our kids. Anyone who buys into it will suffer dreadful consequences to their personal lives. In the aftermath, those who have pushed this nonsense will be discredited, perhaps with tar and feathers. It's rather strange; if SJWs feel that differences between the sexes are only "social constructs", then why this quest to get rid of something they don't believe exists?

In their concern over "racism"—their most potent devil word—they wish to destroy races. They use mass immigration (against the public's will) and propaganda to attack ethnic solidarity, with the goal to create a global biological stir-fry. Only Western countries are on target for population replacement policies, which should tell you everything you need to know about their true motivations. Also, their proposed multicultural paradise wouldn't have any unique cultures, or any of the diversity they say they like so much. Really, this is more likely to create dozens of new half-caste ethnicities, rather than reducing populations to homogenous mush. Countries will be ungovernable, except by brute force, as the conflicting agendas increase exponentially. Even if diversity is fully exterminated, evolution will re-create it after tens of thousands of years.

Fixing income inequality—their most neglected agenda, and what "social justice" actually used to mean—is impossible to realize fully. Communism just doesn't work, and SJWs would be in for a big surprise too. Communist revolution was the true end goal of cultural Marxism, until it got co-opted by the ultra-wealthy. Much more preferably, if we got an improved form of capitalism focusing on individually-owned small businesses, there would still be people who are more ambitious and talented than others, leading to differing outcomes.

Absolute equality doesn't exist in the real world, and attempting to create it leads to ruin. SJWs have never accomplished anything positive. These people are losers. They need to put down their protest signs, quit trying to wreck society, and get a life.

Read More: 5 Ugly Framing Tactics Leftists Use To Insult Dissenters

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Stop Worrying About Specific Game Tactics And Learn To Be “That Guy” Hot Girls Love

April 5, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Too many guys are obsessed with becoming great at day game, or brilliant at night game, or amazing at Tinder game, forgetting that it is not the method but the results that really count. Rather than wasting valuable energy focussing on perfecting a particular game “craft,” men should instead simply focus on becoming “that guy”—the man who is “sexworthy” as a result of his being prepared to hit on women under any and all circumstances.

The Cult Of Day Game

As most readers will be aware, game is a discipline that is really as old as time, but which has been documented and studied seriously by men since Eric Weber's How to Pick Up Girls, and then some two decades later, Neil Strauss's The Game. Since then there has been a whole plethora of game material released, some of fine quality (such as Roosh's Bang and Day Bang guides), and some less so. Nevertheless, it is fair to say that game has become a legitimate area of intellectual inquiry.

Most early game books focused on ways to talk to women in traditional pick up environments such as nightclubs and bars. What we've seen in the last few years, though, is a schism within the pick-up cognoscenti, with some men producing content largely related to night game, while others concentrate solely on day game. I am not sure that this is wholly of benefit to men learning pickup.

Does day game work? Yes, absolutely. Are there techniques and tactics to be considered that you wouldn't use in a night game situation. Again, yes. Is day game therefore worthy of books and articles dedicated to it solely? Yes.

An issue arises, however, when guys begin to fetishize classic street day game above all other types of game, and treat is almost as something religious, where to run any other type of game feels sacrilegious. For there are day game writers and content creators out there who disdain online and app game, and will sometimes disparage night game as though it were little more than a matter of securing the best table in the club and buying the most champagne.

These men have websites, You Tube channels, books and other products all solely dedicated to day game. Some of it is of a very high quality. But there is a danger that guys who are impressionable will come away with the idea that day game is the only way to meet girls.

Day game, we are led to believe, is somehow purer than other forms of game, more authentic. Simply a superior way to get laid.

Now, if you are pulling 1+ new young, hot girls a month consistently through day game alone than good luck to you. If you're not, though—and a great many guys, even those who go out a lot, aren't—then perhaps you might be well-advised to supplement your day game with other methods.

The overarching problem with the cult of day game is that it encourages a fan base of guys to run around the streets of major European and US cities attempting to out-do one another in imitating their YouTube heroes. In London when the sun comes out you will see loads of guys in their identikit black leather jackets and tight jeans and boots—some of them well-groomed, many not—hitting on young women out buying terrible clothes in Primark. In many cases these men would be far better advised to keep in mind the endgame—actually getting laid, rather than imitating YouTube videos—and working up an efficient strategy for accomplishing this.

Far better to practice "always on" game. Far better to simply become "that guy" who always hits on women regardless of his surroundings.

Who Is “That Guy”?

It is often observed that alpha males get away with far more than their beta male counterparts when dealing with women. This is because when a women meets you she will automatically, within a few short minutes, put you into a box, or category, in her mind. Once you’re in this box then it’s very hard to climb out, and if she sees you behaving in a way that suggests you’re trying to then she will get freaked out.

If she sees you—like most men she comes into contact with—as a pleasant but unchallenging beta—then you will soon be consigned to the friendzone box. What that means is that while she may like you, find you funny and enjoy your company, she will never, ever have sex with you.

If, though, when you first meet she finds you cocky, arrogant, funny, challenging and a little inappropriate then she will put you into the ‘potential lover’ box. Once you’re in this latter box you’ll be able to get away with a lot more—rude comments and jokes, sexually suggestive lines and so on—even if you never end up hooking up with her.

As an example, there is a guy at my workplace who I’ll call Jamie. Jamie has reality TV show looks and dress-sense, is a lad who likes a drink, a football game and a joke with the guys, and is loved by a bunch of the girls we work with. He’s what you might call a natural at game.

To my knowledge he has only actually had sex with one girl in the office (the prettiest “good girl,” funnily enough), but because he is “that guy” he is able to get away with the most outrageous flirty banter with the others, even in an environment ruled over with the iron fist of a a female-led HR department

Does “That Guy” Care Where He Meets Girls?

The teacher at my weekend physics class

Do you seriously think a natural like Jamie cares where he meets the girls he sleeps with? Of course he doesn't. The office, the street, the pub, the club, Tinder, Bumble—it's all the same to him. Girls are girls and he is 'that guy' who flirts with girls wherever he finds them.

In fact, I suspect if you told Jamie that there are men who make it their business to meet girls only by approaching them while out shopping during the day he'd find it more than a little odd. After all, where is the sense in limiting yourself to only one source when there are so many other there.

How To Become "That Guy"

'That guy', yesterday

It is possible to learn a hell of a lot from naturals simply by watching the way that they operate in the sexual marketplace. While there is absolutely nothing wrong with learning game, if there are men out there, who—like child prodigies expert at playing the piano at an extremely young age—"just get" how it should be between men and women then why not emulate them?

So how do you become "that guy." Well, a whole book could be written on that subject (in fact, I've already written it) but in short, that, the first thing you need to do is to start viewing women everywhere as potential conquests and approaching them as such.

As with most forms of behaviour, if you start "doing" first then the "becoming" will follow on quite naturally afterwards. So why not pick out a natural like Jamie that you know and start copying some of his behaviours. As you now view girls as potential sex partners rather than "that girl in the bookstore," or "that girl in the lift in my building" or "that girl standing by the cigarette machine in the restaurant or hotel lobby," then when you speak to them this will communicate itself naturally, and you will find that these interactions are more sparky and flirtatious.

Because the thing you need to understand is this: it's not just girls who put guys in boxes, guys put girls in boxes too. Think about it for a second. "She's a shop assistant—I couldn't approach her," "She's working, selling programmes at this theatre—I won't approach her," "She's working on the cloakroom at this restaurant I've come to with my client—I won't approach her."

For a gender who supposedly wants to get laid all of the time, men pass up a hell of a lot of opportunities. It's almost as if we don't really want to have sex, given the number of women we will mentally label as off-limits.

From today, then, stop thinking in terms of day game, night game, Tinder game or whatever. Instead, keep your eyes open and remember that every woman you come into contact with could equally be moaning with pleasure in your bed and behave accordingly towards her. Limiting yourself to one type of game makes no sense. Becoming "that guy" and creating opportunities everywhere will give your sex life a much-needed boost, though—so stop shooting yourself in the foot.

Want to find out more about how to become 'that guy'? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter.

Read More: The One Girl You Absolutely Must Approach Every Day

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

5 Easy Ways To Earn Free Travel

April 5, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

A huge part that helped me break free of the corporate grind was having a large stash (>500,000) airline miles saved. Knowing that I could get around the world for free as opposed to paying for $1,000 flights made the jump a lot less scary.

Here are five things you probably do in your day to day life that could easily help you stash some miles.

1. Eating Out

You eat out, right? How do you usually pay for it?

If your answer is cash, you’re doing it wrong. (There are exceptions to this: on a date with a girl. Don’t let the time it takes to use a credit card ruin the vibe.) Plenty of airline cards allow you 2 or 3x points for every dollar spent.

Spending $100 at a restaurant would equate to 300 points. Most of my one way tickets from California to Eastern Europe cost me about 20,000. As you can see, that would add up fast if you spend $100 a week eating out. And that $100 is probably not far off what your average person DOES spend in a week.

2. Buying Clothes

No matter if you buy from Amazon or a fancy retailer, many cards offer bonuses. Sometimes they do online promotions through their portals.

Can you imagine earning points with a 10x multiplier when buying shoes—things you need anyway?

The point is, if you’re looking for a new watch or new kicks—you can probably maximize it to ways you couldn’t imagine.

3. Paying Rent

Many apartment landlords now have credit card payment processors online. That's a very easy way to hit the lucrative bonuses that credit cards offer (it's usually spend $2-3k in 3 months and get 30-50k points)

If your apartment costs $1,000 a month, you could get 50,000 points just by using a credit card. That's a round trip plus a bit more to almost everywhere in the world from the continental US. If your landlord doesn't, consider using a service that does. You'll pay a 2-3% fee, but in our example that's only $30. For three months it would cost you $90. You might ask if it's worth it.

Is a round trip ticket from Spain worth more than $90? There's your answer.

PS: If you live mostly out of AirBNBs as a nomad, you get 2 or 3x the cost of the apartment by using a travel credit card.

4. Paid Dating Sites (Sometimes)

Certain dating sites have huge promotions that they sometimes run with airlines. Recently, Match.com did a 150x points promotion with British Airways. That means if you signed up for a month of that dating site at $70, you'd have earned over 10,000 miles. The jury is still out whether or not British Airways and Match.com actually honor this over the long-term. There's been doubts about it.

While a 150x promotion is definitely not the norm, there are typically offers that are quite good. Some of these premium, paid dating sites are worth looking at once in a while. The usual problem with them is that they don't have enough members to justify the cost. But, there are enough members that signing up every three months is worth it.

And even more so if you can get a free flight or two out of it.

5. Office And Household Supplies

This is especially true to you guys who run businesses, especially true if it's of the brick and mortar type.

Because most small businesses spend a small fortune in office supplies. Pens, paper, and other organization materials. Quite a few of the very good credit cards offer 5x on these purchases. A business that spent a measly $1k a month on office supplies (nothing in the scheme of things) could easily net 5k points.

Home improvement type stores often run great specials on points, too—2 or 3x. If you've got a home project that's going to cost a few grand, those points add up quick.

Do that for a year and again—you're flying round-trip just about anywhere in the world. Always wanted to see Japan? Great, now you can just from buying printer ink. Crazy.

Final Thoughts

There are a lot of other ways to go about this, but you'll notice I've left all the bells and whistles off this list; i.e. some of the really absurd and crazy ways to rack up miles. That's for a reason.

I'm of the belief that you should use these kind of "life hacks" as a way to help yourself get ahead, but not let it define you. There's little point in spending countless hours a week researching every in and out of the miles and points came so that you can get a few extra cents worth of miles.

It's the same as the crazy nuts who show up to the cash register with 100 coupons in their hand.

You're better off developing a mindset of a winner. Make more money, and don't pinch pennies. Don't be the dude who goes to Thailand so he can live off of $1,200. Be the guy who goes to Thailand and makes $1,200 a day.

With that being said, some of these are incredibly easy to implement in your life. In fact, I would wager that for most of you, doing these things would add no more than a couple of hours a month to your schedule (probably not even that). And the results are tangible, real, and allow you to see the world. Combine a huge stash of miles with a modest online income can be a lethal combination.

The possibilities? Well, they're endless.

If you're looking to start a business that lets you travel, here is the solution. For more great content about traveling in Europe, make sure to check out my niche site Eastern European Travel.

Read More: 5 Truths About Using Credit Card Points For Your Benefit

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Pepsi Ad Celebrating Social Justice Warriors Backfires Spectacularly

April 6, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

On the third of April 2017, the PepsiCo brand released an ad focused on the core values of Social Justice, depicting a demonstration of its usual defenders. The video reaches its climax when ultra-rich SJW Kendall Jenner saves the day and hands a can of Pepsi to an oppressive-looking White police officer. Everyone cheers.

The liquid sugar merchant's goal was to convince their customers to buy their product, surfing on the legacy media trend of SJW celebration, while showing their support for the dogmas of the left. Let's just say that it did not go as planned. The right and the left join forces for once, taking to social media to despise and ridicule the cringe-worthy video clip.

Rarely have I seen leftists depicted so accurately

It is simple, they are all here: the Low T beta white knight, the peaceful Muslim with a nose ring, the White woman looking for enrichment, The Asian hipster antifa that plays cello, the racist cis White male…This video is a goldmine of SJW archetypes. It is hard to think that is is not a satire.

[image]
America's tolerant and peaceful (((youth))) demonstrating

[image]
Fedora-sporting M'Lady tosser, Religion of peace and Triggered feminist unite!

[image]
“As a successful feminist and follower of the religion of peace, I drink Pepsi and wear my hijab which empowers me!”

[image]
“There I am, Kendall Jenner, multi-millionaire and privileged because I put a blond wig on”

[image]
“I wish I could join the struggle but my White privilege prevents me from doing so”

[image]
“As a cello-playing Asian antifa with a beanie and ear gauges, I like to drink Pepsi between two chapters of the Communist Manifesto”

[image]
Pepsi : official sponsor of blue-haired false rape accusers and carousel riders

[image]
“By Allah! I can’t focus with my itchy nose ring and all these pictures of kuffars. What kind of inspirational beverage could help me?”

[image]
Not to worry. Dancing while sporting berets and military fatigues is the way we protest. Breaking windows and looting shops is so the Previous Year.

[image]
“Say, Chang Guevara, may I join your rio… harmless gathering?”

[image]
“You are privileged cis White scum, but you are a woman, just like Hillary (All Hail the Most High) so I guess we can give you a chance”

[image]
“Thank you, O wise Asian antifa, for seeing past my privilege and allowing me to join. Fuck Whiteness!”

[image]
“As an entirely White, racist police force, it is our duty to oppress these peaceful protesters”

[image]
“Us trannys are here too, with our plastic smiles and stubble poking through our foundation. Statistics proving that we are committing suicide in the thousands are hate speech!”

[image]
“I am blue eyed and blonde but it is all good because those black men, one of them wearing traditional Muslim garb, will soon enrich me”

[image]
“You have no more distinctively White attributes. So progressive! Welcome, sister!”

[image]
“By Muhammad’s (Peace Be Upon Him) nine year-old lover Aisha, here is the moment I must capture!”

[image]

“Would you stop being such a racist sexist pig for a minute and taste that sugary Marxist goodness?”

[image]

“Yes. Let the Equality and Antiracism flow through you…”

[image]

“All right, kids. Pepsi showed me the light! Now carry on burning cars, pepper-spraying senior citizens and whacking unarmed women on the back of the skull with flag poles”

[image]

“They let us march! Quick, to the train station, before all the Refugees are welcomed!”

[image]

#Hillary2016 #Unemployed

Remember that the champion of moral adequacy that stars in this masterpiece is also a Kardashian harlot:

Would Bang But Would Not Give My Seed

[image]

No doubt that the executives of PepsiCo think they did the right choice when they chose her to carry the flag of Goodthink

But… but… muh virtue signalling!

With this stereotypes galore, the reaction did not take long. From the left fustigating the ad for portraying accurately their fellow degenerates or culturally appropriating “peaceful” domestic terrorist organisations like Black Lives Matter to the right ridiculing Pepsi’s demagogy and calling out its obvious agenda, every one hates the cringey stint and Pepsi should soon feel the sting of their foolish attempt at pleasing SJW, who by definition, are offended by everything and never happy.

Many commenters try to remind Pepsi that this is what a SJW demonstration usually looks like…

Berkeley riots last February

The Youtube comment sections of the PepsiCo clip is, as usual when a pro-Left brand plays with political fire, hilarious:

[image]

[image]

[image] [image]

Enjoy the shitstorm before PepsiCo sees that deleting comments does not help and applies the usual “failed partisan campaign” protocol and disables the comment section.

Tu baisses ton froc, tu payes

Pepsi Cola, just like fellow globalist beverage Coca-Cola, is extremely unhealthy and participates to the global obesity epidemic in addition of being sold by degenerates. Don’t buy it, drink water.

Taking the risky bet of shilling for the left costs millions to corporations whose goal is generating profit. Examples are legion but you would think that they would have learnt by now.

Here are the poor choices of those brands expressed in financial loss:

[image]

Impact of that ad on Pepsi’s share (5 days scale). Red circle represents the day when the Social Justice ad was released

[image]

Impact of the “Gender Paygap” Super Bowl ad on Audi’s share (3 months scale). Red circle represents the day when the ad was released

[image]
Impact of the transgender bathroom scandal on Target’s share (1 year scale). Red circle represents the beginning of Target’s pro-trans policy

[image]
Impact of that ad on ABInBev’s stock market value after airing Bud Light “Gender Pay Gap” controversial ad (1 year scale). Red circle represents the day when the Social Justice ad was released

Social Justice is a giant shit test and must be treated accordingly. Trying to make SJW happy is always bound to failure as there “Ain’t no rest for the triggered.”

UPDATE: Well, colour me surprised. Pepsi just did the courageous choice of taking down this video. What a display of bravery from the Liquid Cancer brand. Somebody could use a safe space.

[image]
Defeat. Jenner got free publicity, her money, and this time did not have to be put in a position where her knees are near her ears

Here is the link to the video on Jenner’s account. And here is another backup if the trollop’s masters tell her to “shut it down.”

Read More: Social Justice Warriors’ Updated Version Of The Seven Deadly Sins

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Softcore Pornography Has Become Completely Normalized In Western Society

April 6, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

It's no secret that pornography has severe consequences when consumed in excess. Now however, it has cleverly infiltrated the world, popping up its ugly head where it doesn't belong.

It's On The News

Is that a skirt or underwear?

It’s being shown to you even though you don’t realize it. It seems every time you see the news, the skirts get higher and higher. How do they get away with this? Simple, the Hollywood and media complex. Remember, sex sells and whatever brings the almighty dollar.

Yes, you need four leg crossing girls to figure it out

Try to pay attention to what she says

Real intellectual discussion here

It’s In Hollywood (big surprise)

Hollywood has brought this in places where they don’t belong on channels like HBO, Showtime, and more stations like TBS easily seen on basic cable television. Even commercials these days are featuring very suggestive themes.

They don’t belong on afternoon TV—it’s borderline pornographic. These messages’ very presence puts children at risk. No sane parent wants their kids exposed to this warped twisted perverted programming.

It’s Being Mailed To Your Home

One hot summer day I came home to find the mail on the table. After quickly browsing through, my eye caught this particular ad.

Pizza has never been so hot!

Guess some businesses are getting desperate these days. Look, I know times are tough, but come on! How do you think this would affect a child?

It's At Your Dentist

During high school, my friend and I used found this hilarious while driving by. It's amazing it's still there.

We don't have anesthesia sir, but here's some porn to numb the pain. Do you want to watch Asians or blondes while I fill that cavity?

Remember son, keep your eyes shut until we get to the office

It’s By Your Favorite Donut Shop

Grab yourself a coffee and while you’re at it, stop by the Love Shack.

It’s All Over The Internet

To further prove this invasion while attending college, I did a test that I’ve been wanting to release. I simply would browse the internet for a week as I normally would to do my work, and took screen captures every time I was exposed to inappropriate material. What I found was astonishing—there was so much that I had to stop, enough to make a picture book. Mind you I conducted this experiment exclusively on the school's computers which automatically deletes your history and resets after each log out. Here's what I came across:

A popular new site reveals the truth about anyone's past. Simply enter name and state

Here's Why You Should Stop Googling Names

These Photos Are Hilarious

The Cheater ad was from the NY Post

From "higher perspectives"

From YouTube

From the NY Post

Some of these "ads" feature semi to flat out blatant pornographic images directly cut, cropped, and pasted from Playboy.

Things haven't changed

It's been a while since I tested this, so I went on some mainstream news site last week and found the same thing. Thankfully, however, it seems it has decreased due to Trump as the media is now frantically trying to find ways to attack him.

Gordon reveals secret dislike

Why boob jobs are hazardous

Which porn sites are safe?

Major cruise ship lost?

Russia missile goes hypersonic

Don't do this in bed

Fox News is trying to help viewers watch "safe porn", how conservative of them

What else do you expect from Buzzfeed?

Porn Can Ruin Your Life

And here's the proof. And that's just one of many examples of how damaging it is on the brain.

Some scientists hold the view that porn-induced masturbation is as addicting as heroin. Displaying beautiful bodies is one thing, but today's films are making a mockery out of marriage, insulting women and men alike. The funny thing is, some people think it accurately depicts reality.

On Fetishes

Biological factors come into play in attraction, but culture plays a big part. Back in the day, men would comment a woman's ankles, calves, and derriere. Now it's been downsized to two things – breasts and butts.

Jacque Fresco made an interesting observation during his trip to the Tahiti islands when he was 21. He noticed that all the people were nude and there were no fetishes. Men never stared at a woman's body. When they made love, the man stroked the woman's whole body. Fresco tried showing the men some girly magazines, but they didn't understand it.

How Porn Affects Society

Japan is a great example of what happens when you have too much porn. Men have gone from fearless samurai to video game addicts too scared of touching a woman.

Amsterdam and Japan are what happens when you open the Pandora's box of porn and prostitution.

Most don't know this, but Pakistan and other Muslim countries are the biggest users of porn. Is it any wonder why these "refugees" brought into Germany are on a rape rampage? They are acting out what they've seen on internet porn, it doesn't take a genius to figure it out. Mexico has also been found to be the biggest user of child pornography.

Personally, I'm tired of all this forced soft core pornography infecting mainstream media. Everywhere you go, this filth is being shoved in your face. Now, if you want to watch it on your own, that's your business, but porn doesn't belong in our every normal life.

What Can Be Done?

Russia, who stood up against this billion dollar industry, put it best – go find someone real. They banned popular porn sites from their country, and there was a time in America when porn was illegal, and now since it's been pardoned, it's gone out of control.

Many think that legalizing prostitution is the answer, but look at what it's done to Amsterdam. Russia seems to be the only one of the few that understands the value of protecting and preserving their homeland from foreign invaders which jeopardizes future generations.

So reclaim and protect your dignity and manhood. Find someone in the real world or stay celibate if you prefer waiting till marriage. Stay sober so your t-levels replenish. You'll become a much better man in the long run.

Read More: The Hidden Agenda Behind Interracial Pornography

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

How Modern Masculine Men Can Bring Back The Era Of The Gentleman

April 6, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Gentleman's Alley

> "I would rather prove my self to be a Gentleman, by being learned and humble, valiant and inoffensive, virtuous, and communicable, than by a fond ostentation of riches."
>
> – Walton, The Angler (1653)

When people hear the word "Gentleman" today, they seem to have a sort of misconception about what it means to be one. Now, we don't mean to imply that the following paragraphs are the correct and only interpretation of the word, as everyone has their own opinions; we are merely trying to bring the light back to where it once shone, as time has been moving the lamp bit by bit from the original predecessor. Today, when "Gentleman" is heard during conversation, a manifestation of a well-groomed male donning the finest brand name attire and driving a luxurious vehicle comes about. This man is courteous, says please and thank you and lets the lady go first. This, we can all agree, are the qualities that a gentleman should possess—but if this is it, can we also agree that almost every adult male we know is this said gentleman? With this being the case, is being a "gentleman" simply being ordinary and compliant?

Let's go back in time for a little lesson in etymology. The prefix of the word gentleman, "gentle", was given to male kin that were born into aristocratic families. The status of these families allowed these boys to acquire an education resulting in the ability to speak multiple languages, most notably Latin and Greek, and be very well versed in numerous amounts of subjects. In a nutshell, these boys grew up to be intellectual, interesting and mannered-“gentle”. As time continued on and the social classes grew less divided, male children from lower classes were also able to partake in the path to becoming a gentleman.

Manners were taught at a young age and knowledge became more readily available. This was needed, in our opinion, because the more gentlemen there are in the world the better off we are as a society. The only downfall to the art of the gentleman being so easily accessible was that it led to less of an exquisite status in being one and therefore less of a desire to be one, hence the decline in gentlemen nowadays. According to a recent London Survey taken by the Daily Mail in the United Kingdom, the era of the gentleman peaked in the 1950’s! So where does the modern male stand now? Is he not interesting enough? Not smart enough? Did he forget his manners?

We at Gentleman’s Alley pride ourselves in agreeing with the 365-year-old quote you read at the beginning of this article, however, like all other gentlemen, we put our own spin on it as well. On top of possessing all of those traits, we believe one should also be a foundation to be built upon. As our Latin-learning gentlemen of the past would say- scio me nihil scire, or “I know that I know nothing”. Never stop learning, never stop growing, never stop saying please and thank you. Respect goes a long way- further than most, actually. Respect that. A gentleman should be intelligent, mysterious, interesting, well-read and cultured. Being rich does not automatically make one a gentleman- being a gentleman is about emanating traits and skills that money cannot buy.

How do we, and our products, tie into this whole universe of the gentleman? We are new but we are constantly growing. Constantly learning. Sharing our knowledge with whomever is interested- just read a blog on our website and learn a little something new today on a plethora of subjects. How about our products? They may seem random, but they all have a purpose. We want your appearance to scream “put-together and cultured” when you’re at the airport for yet another international flight by using our classy passport wallets which hold everything the modern gentleman needs including, most importantly, a pen.

We want you to show efficiency when you’re out and about in a foreign city by using our stick on wallets—much less of a chance of being pick-pocketed or losing anything when all you have is some folded up cash, an ID and credit card attached to your phone! Can’t bring cologne with you, or need to smell good quickly while on the go? Our cologne wipes in four amazing scents will take care of that. At home thinking of your next big idea? Light up one of our amazing candles and relax at the beautiful scent of a wooden fireplace, Asian jungle or many more. Company coming to join you? Wow your guests by using our wine bottle tool kit, which they would've thought was a regular bottle of wine, to open up a real one. Pass out our coasters, which were kept together by being in their useful coaster holder.

Finished the wine? Pour your aged cocktail out of your aging-barrel (which looks as beautiful as it is interesting) and wow your guests yet again. All of this, and we're just beginning. Our goal is to equip you with all of the tools you need to be that mysterious, interesting and cultured man that everyone looks up to and we will keep coming out with new items to further this agenda. On top of that, we want to offer all of the readers a 20% discount off the total purchase by using the discount code KINGS at checkout.

Have a product that may fit the bill or interested in collaborating? Any suggestions, praise or criticism? Contact us at . Check out our website at www.gentlemansalley.com and join us as we re-introduce the gentleman to the 21st century; don't forget to use KINGS at checkout for 20% off your total purchase!

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

We Are Re-Opening The ROK Shirt Store

April 6, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After getting shut down by Shopify back in November, we have built a new store at Red Kings Shop using our own platform. We're going to do a soft launch on our email list first and then open to everyone in about a month. This is the first shirt we'll be offering for sale:

Hired model with amazing mullah beard

If you want to be among the first in line to get your shirt, visit Red Kings Shop and enter your first name and email address on the main screen pop-up (the form will be removed in 48-72 hours). The beta launch will take place next week.

Read Next: Shopify Review: They Erased Our Store From The Internet While I Was Fulfilling 55 Orders

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Donald Trump Orders Launch Of 59 Tomahawk Missiles Against Syria

April 6, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via CNBC:

The U.S. military has launched more than 50 missiles aimed at Syria, NBC News reported.

A U.S. military official told NBC that 59 tomahawks had been fired, which hit an airfield near Homs.

Earlier Thursday, Reuters reported that a British diplomat had said the United Nations Security Council would not vote on Thursday on a draft resolution to condemn a deadly gas attack on Tuesday in a rebel-held area of northern Syria, but will continue negotiations.

Russia's deputy U.N. envoy, Vladimir Safronkov, warned that day of "negative consequences" if the U.S. carried out military strikes on Syria over the attack.

"We have to think about negative consequences, negative consequences, and all the responsibility if military action occurred will be on shoulders of those who initiated such doubtful and tragic enterprise," Safronkov told reporters when asked about possible U.S. strikes, adding that such consequences could be seen in Iraq and Libya.

Western countries have blamed President Bashar al-Assad's armed forces for Tuesday's attack in the town of Khan Sheikhoun in a rebel-held area of northern Syria hit by government air strikes. Syria's government has denied responsibility.

Read the entire article

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

5 Cultural Milestones Where Leftists Assume Zero Responsibility For Their Choices

April 7, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Being red-pilled and pushing on the world means that, sooner or later, libtards get mad and try to push us back. This happened to me, of course, and at least twice educated conformists tried to shut me up by appealing to "consensus."

The first time was on Wikipedia. An article over a controversial historical fact mostly, if not only, relied on a single version of what supposedly happened, and the only historians quoted came from the left. I wanted to mention that one of these "experts" was an unrepentant Maoist—leftists never forget to mention that this or that guy was a member of a "far right" party even if this was decades ago, why don't we have the same with them?—and add a reference to a politically incorrect albeit impeccably credentialed historian, Bernard Lugan. Two libtards opposed me, systematically reverting my improvements, and argued that their sheer number was "consensus" worth. Are two over one unanimous? Obviously not. Eventually, these two rounded up other leftists to pressure me and others into not editing the article.

The second time was here on ROK. A venturing leftist revealed himself through shrilling comments about how feminism and babbling star Michel Foucault are beyond legitimate criticism—because "consensus." Of who? "Scholars" and "scientists." Whom exactly, it is never said. The hypocrisy runs rampant here as SJWs have been hysterically anti-science about biology, but also claim that we should bow down to the latest invention from "humanities" and global warming departments, which are dens of well-paid narrative crafters pretending to do science. Facts tagged “from the right” are not acknowledged as facts, when “facts” created by leftists are shouted at dissenters as if certain.

The point is, those who pretend to embody unanimity appeal to something extrinsic to themselves to justify their ideological dictatorship and space seizure. They never admit how much they construct illusions of reality. Instead, they constantly refer to these illusions as something obvious or natural, which allows them to be never held responsible for their choices, their arguments, their attacks, or how much they “changed the world” for the worst.

Liberals are strong because they manage to wield a tremendous power while never being blameable for the consequences of their choices. White, masculine guilt is the other side of the “minority” and liberal pass. Even when faced with evidence that they are wrong, SJWs will always double down, shriek more, attack more, and put the blame on those not represented in the media-academia system and not blessed with mainstream hype. They are so accustomed into straining the others’ shoulders they are not even aware of their doing it. Here are some examples of how the really powerful escape their responsibilities.

1. Feminism, sex wars, and the breakup of families

“Sexual liberation” caused the rise of the hookup culture. Women being naturally hypergamous and now able to put men into a SMV hierarchy, men had to adapt to women’s preferences through learning game. Without manly solidarity, game merely increases intra-masculine competition and the women’s value. Divorce rates soared, women became party animals, let free rein to their attraction to antisocial types, and feminism ensured that their choices were beyond criticism no matter the consequences. 80% of divorces are initiated by women, many reconstructed families are hell on Earth as step-parents have no desire to care about children who are not theirs, and, guess what? Feminists have been on the forefront to whitewash divorces and reconstituted households.

As Tyler Durden said, “we’re a generation of men raised by women.” We have been too much influenced by our mothers, with many of us being exposed to the “strong womyn” and the “men who pick up are pigs” memes, have had no real father figure, and many friends among girls but only to realize later than being “friend” meant getting locked up in the friendzone and despised.

Feminism bears an embarrassing responsibility here. Millennials were born well after it took over the mainstream. Why such a partial, unsatisfying, potentialities-denying education? Why shaming guys who want to get laid, which is quite natural and healthy, while praising the “freedom” of girls to slut around? Because the Andrea Dworkins of this world willed it. And yet, when we get frustrated or unfit to their world, because of their education, they put the blame on us.

2. Allochton trash

In Europe, a racaille (“trash”) culture of scorching the national language, exploiting the host country, attacking white autochthons (natives) in the streets, replacing the native population, promoting crime and gangsta rap… has grown out of large strips of immigrant populations, mostly North African and Sub-Saharan. This culture has been constantly apologized for by Leftists, because these “young” guys are victims of “racism”, y’know, promoted by mainstream music labels and MTV, and benefited from police impunity. Many suburban whites have been converting to the racaille style and sometimes to Islam instead of the other way around. Integration has been a failure: allochtons remained wilfully defiant and hostile. The American reader can easily draw the analogy with black ghettos.

As the car-burning, drug-dealing, normal people-beating racailles have been let off the hook by Leftists, white victims were constantly ignored or blamed. If a white person mentions having been harassed or assaulted by immigrant thugs, the typical libtard will answer something like “well you likely deserved it because otherwise you wouldn’t complain or it wouldn't have happened." Victim blaming, anyone?

Leftists constantly say immigrant hostility comes from a "social problem." How exactly? Non-white suburbs in Europe have received a lavish attention from urban elves, billions in public money, and an unofficial toleration for drug trafficking. Many North Africans go seek their welfare check in luxurious cars. The real victims here are the outskirts-pushed whites who must live under the double domination of smug liberals occupying the institutions and racailles occupying the streets.

In truth, leftists bear a huge responsibility in the gangsta culture: they have told non-whites how "oppressed" they were and how they should hate Whitey instead of being good citizens. They have constantly suppressed incentives for good behaviour and made immigrant crime taboo. Had Leftists not created race wars and an excuse culture, non-whites would not stand out as a problem.

3. The rise of the red pill, alt-right, and other brands of dissenting

Liberals love to hate us. They have a very essentialist view of whom they call the "far right", as if it was a kind of autonomous enduring species rather than a place where they dump pre-existing points of view once they don't want them to be mainstream anymore. By doing so, they blind themselves to the obvious responsibility they have in our uprising. Their culture, their choices, their environment is depriving and frustrating—and it is primarily from them we have been seeking to free ourselves.

We appeared as dissenters primarily because we were denied or forced into playing inauthentic roles to subsist inside the system. Many millenials have to bear blue pilled baby-boomers parents who live inside a narrative and shrillingly refuse to step one foot aside from. We can't speak about what really matters with such parents. Chronic joblessness, minoritist hostility, the toughness of the seduction market—or even the very existence of a seduction market—are topics we mostly debate amongst ourselves, because old Leftists keep cutting us off when we try explaining it to them. They cling to the 60s myths and legacy and deny, of course, all responsibility in the shortcomings of the world they hand us over, thus ignoring how their feminism, minoritism, pro-immigration stances caused and whitewashed what have been coming back at us.

4. The 2008 subprime crisis

As this piece explained well, "the [American] government pressured the financial industry to accept loans from people whose credit ratings made them bad risks." Threated by accusations of "racism", steered by State-engineered policies that wanted to democratize mortgages with someone else's money (obviously), banks have been building a house of cards with commodified loans. The end result is well known, but the responsibilities behind have been carefully tamped down.

Indeed, blaming the banks amounts to telling only one half of the story. The other half, constantly unmentioned by the mainstream media, features Bill Clinton repelling the Glass-Steagal act, the Federal Reserve smearing and blackmailing (quote) banks into lending risky borrowers, Democrat senator Barney Frank denying in 2003 that Freddie Mae and Fanny Mac were undergoing a potential crisis, Democrat senator Chuck Schumer defending the financial status quo because "they have done a very good job" at housing people (who exactly?). In 2005, some Republicans who had listened to the warnings tried to regularize the house of cards: Democrats unanimously blocked the effort.

> Claiming to desire an end to "racism" and operating on the premise of racial egalitarianism, [house activists] put into place the very policies that wrecked the global economy—and then took control of the narrative to shift the blame onto their victims (which included both the banks and the poor individuals who subsequently took out bad loans that the banks were forced by government policy to extend).

5. The Théo Luhaka case

On February 2nd, a “French” black guy was apprehended by policemen after he tried to prevent them from apprehending another black who was an alleged dealer. Another criminal incident, with one particular feature: word spread that one policeman had rammed his police stick between the thug’s cheeks. Immediately, the French mainstream media stood up as one man for the “cause” of this alleged poor victim, forgetting presumption of innocence or even any investigation report. Théo, only designated by his first name, ignited a storm of leftist hysteria that lumped together the police, “racism”, and repeated the minority-victimhood narrative. “A black guy got raped by a white policeman!” Following the media trend, President Hollande visited Théo at the hospital—something he never did for any policeman or assaulted bystander.

Then, more information popped out, and the media quietly forgot the subject of their weeks-long hysteria. After investing the case, the general inspection of police forces reached the conclusion that no policeman raped the apprehended that day and that security cameras recordings corroborated the policemen’s version, who denied the whole rape story and had been conspicuously ignored by the media. It was also revealed that the apprehended’s family had diverted almost 700.000 euros through a publicly funded association, a case far from exceptional. Finally, the criminal-turned-victim retracted his testimony, and it seems that he got raped by another black drug dealer before he had been apprehended.

No mainstream media did apologize for having spread fake news fuelling anti-white, anti-police hysteria, and complacency for criminals. Instead, they passed to other topics as if nothing had happened, in a blatant display of shameless irresponsibility. The example is French, but once again, the analogy is easy to draw: American or international mainstream media have spread fake news about President Trump not shaking hands with Angela Merkel (he did shake hands), wrongly accused our own Matthew Forney of having shot Muslims in Montreal, and numerous other ones.

Conclusion

At best the fake news media tell half of the story while ignoring or normalizing the other half, and at worst they outright lie and smear. Leftists don't care much about truth. What matters to them is having the upper hand over what can be said or not. How many times did I see Leftists go from "there is no correlation between immigration and crime" to "okay there is but… [pick your choice:] it is caused by the environment, it has been caused by white reycism, non-whites are poor and lack self-trust, the CIA gave guns to the initially non-violent Blood and Crisps gang" and so on?

Great power should go along with a great sense of responsibility. The left turns this principle on its head: the more power one has in their system, the less accountable he is, and the more those not in power—the average dispossessed, the middle class, the conservative who has no cultural power, the "far right"-tagged dissenter—are blamed instead. Better be the powerful and greedy Clintons than a 15 years-old 4chaner.

A healthy society considers people accountable for their behaviours and choices. The first cause of dissension, low trust and perpetual wars is how those who mess up at a grand scale are allowed to go away untainted while the affected must bear everything in silence. All currently privileged categories lack accountability—and we carry the weight of their poor choices and their blame instead. Time to set the records straight.

Read Next: Feminists Attack Lincoln University President For Saying Women Should Be Responsible For Their Actions

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

The Evolution Of Policing Makes Modern Cities Look Like They're Under Military Occupation

April 7, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

The British Special Air Service, or SAS, the nation's elite military corps, founded in 1941 as a crack commando unit to fight the Nazis, has been permanently deployed to the streets of London as of late March, 2017.

British SAS in North Africa, shortly after creation

The first SAS mission was Operation Crusader, a parachute drop into North Africa (modern Libya and Egypt). Although over a third of unit were killed or captured, the battle was the first British victory against German forces. The SAS was disbanded in 1945, as an elite military squad was not seen as necessary during times of peace. But Churchill didn't know London, 2017.

British SAS, today

The past 50 years have seen some (debatable) positive developments in technology and the internet, but in the social realm, unless one is a three toed mixed race transsexual lesbian, the changes have been overwhelmingly negative. The basic human decency of the average citizen has been declining since the Great War, and has seen an especially sharp decline over the past decades.

Stonehenge

$50 says she can’t name this place in 6 months

This is harshly apparent to anyone above the age of 30. All Western nations have seen an increasingly violent police force, combined with an increasingly degenerate and dumbed down populace. Stonehenge, which survived for 4,000 to 5,000 years, had to be roped off in the 1970s, because it was too tempting for Generation Idiocracy to destroy or graffiti the site. So bars are needed to keep the modern Homo sapien away from this prehistoric rock structure, because it would be too tempting to destroy or deface it for a laugh.

Evolution of the British Bobby

British Bobby smiling and conversing with fellow Londoner, 1960s

The British Bobby has seen a rapid change. Just 200 years ago, most areas of Britain had no organized police force, but were overseen by local constables and administered by a Justice of the Peace. The importance of words and imagery cannot be overstated, and the image that modern police forces today is far from peaceful.

Primary tools for maintaining order: A whistle, a uniform, and a truncheon.

The first professional police force in Britain was the City of Glasgow Police, created in 1800.

An English policeman wielding a truncheon.

The Metropolitan Police were established in 1829, and London, despite having 1.5 million residents and being home to the most powerful empire in the world, was policed by only 450 constables and 4,500 night watchmen (today around 50,000). Government intentionally created uniforms that were dissimilar to military uniforms, and police were unarmed, as it was to be made clear these were not troops of occupation or armament, but enforcers of law and order, indeed those with the intent to “protect and serve” the people.

When was the last time you saw a smiling police officer?

In 1991, Armed Response Vehicles were introduced in London, patrolling armed forces which regular street patrolmen can summon in case extra firepower is needed. Over the next 25 years, militarization gradually increased. As of 2017, while the majority of individual patrolmen are not armed:

- Armed police are now common
- Over 400,000 security cameras film Londoners multiple times per day
- A bottle of water, the element which constitutes over 70% of planet earth, is banned from air transport
- Barricades and security fences are installed around public areas, and
- SAS commandos in ski masks and assault weapons permanently patrol the streets

Calm down, citizen. These are the Good Guys.

Any comparisons to Hitler, or being Orwellian, or a Nazi, or “Gestapo tactics” can no longer be used to describe western police forces, as the terms are insufficiently harsh. As we can see in these photos, the armaments, imagery, and presence of the modern police force is more aggressive, more highly armed, and more imposing than the Gestapo.

A Lose – Lose Proposition

The current military occupation of western cities is a double edged sword of evil. On the one hand, western liberal democracies, which were an unquestioning force of progress and civilization for hundreds of years, have now become so unstable and dangerous that they do require a more violent and aggressive police presence to maintain order.

Clearing the beaches of Normandy? Nah, just observing the local soccer match.

At the same time, the force used is absurdly out of proportion to the need, so we see federal governments drastically increasing their powers and becoming exceedingly tyrannical and violent. This increase in both crime levels and police aggression is a brutal combo that may knock out the west from its dominance permanently.

The image above is not one we will ever see again in Western civilization. The modern policeman has been trained to prosecute lawbreakers (whether they be violent criminals or inadvertent rulebreakers), not to help the public. The public has been taught to fear and obey authority unquestioningly, and will not expect a policeman to aid him peacefully. And the man would probably be accused of pedophilia or other degeneracy for wanting to help a child.

An Advanced Civilization Is Easily Governed

On the one hand, it is true that as Britain and America transform from areas of highly educated, cultured, homogeneous Europeans, to a mix of more primitive and violent populations, a more powerful police force is needed. A policeman has never needed to use ballistic weapons to get me to comply with his questions or commands. And that is typically the case in civilized society.

Police were not afraid to turn their backs to docile crowds of peaceful Europeans

But as we import more refugees from war torn areas that have been under violent siege for decades, these rebellious warriors that only know aggressive violence and war will continue their aggression in the west.

Why Is Society So Dangerous?

There is a dual answer. Firstly, by and large it is not. Life in the west is mostly peaceful, even when including violent mass attacks against crowds. And secondly, to the degree that there are individuals desiring death, destruction, and harm to strangers, one must look behind the simple conclusion to see enormous complicity from western governments.

The mass murders of the Paris nightclub and Nice cargo truck ramming were only possible because French officials encouraged and allowed violent fighters from Syria to leave the battlefield and settle in Paris.

It’s not even a matter of “immigration good” versus “immigration bad.” Allowing warriors from Syria to leave the war and enter the very Western nations that have funded and encouraged destruction and warfare in Syria, is insane. It’s the equivalent of the US encouraging immigration from Afghanistan to New York City in 2002.

There is a reason these fighters want to cause extreme harm to British, French, and Americans, but not to Swiss, Canadians, or Russians. It’s not hatred of whites or Christians (Russia is probably the whitest and most Christian), it’s war against those who are fomenting physical and cultural invasion in their nations.

Remember that there has always been war, oppression, and violence. But why today must we fear traveling from one place to another, for fear of a stranger murdering us? Firearms, bombs, and poisons have existed for hundreds of years, and passport controls and borders that restrict travel are only a few decades old. Why are we suddenly facing this paralyzing fear of strangers? How much of it is manufactured?

The frog boiling analogy cannot be exaggerated, and youth who grow up today seeing black uniformed police with facemasks will come to accept armed occupying troops as a way of life. Muh 6th Amendment indeed. More incidents like this 2014 murder of a camper in a park by police will happen. And the world will grow even more dangerous.

Literally Surpassing Hitler

When the police are more menacing than The Empire and Waffen SS, you have a problem

Sadly, Hitler and Gestapo analogies may no longer be used, as to call police “Gestapos” today, would be a nostalgic call for disarmament.

Which of these images is a peacetime police force and which an invading army?

The result of this militarization will be further growth of the twin evils of crime and government oppression, and further breakdown of civilization. Police forces and government surveillance will become even more aggressive, and violent attacks, while still rare, will be more deadly and dangerous.

The world has been in turmoil and at war throughout almost any point in its history. But never before have the top civilizations been in such fear and disarray in times of peace. The SAS did not even patrol London during the threat of Nazi invasion. And yet now it's needed for the common Londoner to go about his day? To those who reach for the simple answers of "immigrants are dangerous" I would suggest that to the degree that may be true, that is precisely the tool of the dialectic being used to implement further disarray and increase state control.

Read More: 4 Items On The Elite's Population Control Wishlist

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

How To Remain Exceptionally Fit For Life

April 7, 2017 | by Max Panzer | Link | Original Link

Once you are no longer in the thick of a competitive athletic pursuit, a new philosophy for long term sustainable fitness is worth consideration. High level competitive sport will only be viable for so long in a man's life. At some point a change in thinking about one's physical development is warranted. Moving from a peak specialized nature to a more functional and well-rounded level of conditioning is necessary to become a complete man.

After all, the vast majority of a man's life will be spent outside of those glorious years when he is at his absolute physical prime. And of course, there is much more to a complete life than sport and physical bearing. Eventually family, career, finances, education, faith and fulfillment will pervade your character and require significant attention.

However, physical conditioning should always play a significant role in the foundation for pursuing and becoming the very best you can be over your lifetime. To that end, developing and maintaining power, explosiveness, speed and endurance will pay tremendous dividends. These qualities will bleed into every aspect of your long term success. They will provide you with exceptional energy and the capacity for going all out mentally, physically and spiritually when necessary.

Follow a year round sustainable regimen

Here are the 5 considerations required to maintain a high level of physical conditioning over the long term, critical to maximizing your potential:

1. Sustainability

It always seems like such a shame to see the former greats in sport many years later, physically falling apart. Perhaps this is the price that has to be paid sometimes for athletic glory. Even for the rest of us who are not elite level athletes, the same fate of physical deterioration will result if we are not smart.

Consider your physical conditioning as a long term endeavor. Your training and practice should be viable for years, even decades. Employing improper form, overtraining or allowing your short term ego to drive your efforts can result in eventual breakdown and permanent injury. The overriding goal should be a sustainable year round regimen so that you can maintain the mental and physical momentum of exercise—and stay healthy, strong and fit for your whole life.

To start, always warm up properly and make the proper form in your workouts an obsession. Don’t ever subordinate form to performance as you might have as a competitor in the heat of battle. Second, resist the temptation to over train by making sure to recover properly between workouts; as such you will need to be smart about your training schedule. And finally, take the time to heal if you start realizing an injury or breakdown. Be patient and willing to recalibrate your progress so that you can avoid serious debilitating setbacks.

Eat masculine food

2. Nutrition

Underlying all the mechanics and scheduling of your training regimen is what you eat each and every day. Consider your nutrition as the fuel for all that you do both physically and mentally. Eating a typically rich modern diet will drain your immediate energy and sabotage your health in the long run.

Eat as a superior man with purpose and precision. Keep it simple by eating whole foods. Eliminate wheat and refined sugar and minimize the consumption of alcohol. Eat your fill of beef, chicken, fish, eggs, dairy, vegetables, nuts and fruits. Restrict your beverages to water, coffee and tea.

Our evolutionary heritage will favor these types of foods. And as a man you will avoid the estrogenic nature of processed foods and consume the proper macro and micro nutrients to promote high levels of testosterone, growth hormone and insulin sensitivity. Eliminating wheat and the excess of other simple carbohydrates prevalent in modern consumption will also help to minimize inflammation and prevent injury.

If you happen to be overweight, go hardcore and cut weight like a man. Consume the same foods above, but at a 25% caloric deficit. There is no excuse for an intelligent masculine man to carry around excess body fat. Of special note is that excess visceral or belly fat will lead to increased estrogen levels. In contrast, maintaining a lean and muscular frame will minimize estrogen production and keep your testosterone and energy levels naturally elevated.

Recuperate properly and outlast them all

3. Schedule

In the prime of your youth, it is natural to push yourself to the limit. The competitive nature of year round training for excelling as an athlete encourages extreme levels of physical and skill development. As elite competitors many men will indeed go all out for many hours, five to six days a week. If you are a collegiate or professional athlete or have the opportunity to become one, then this type of commitment is certainly necessary and worthwhile.

For the long term, however, a more moderate and healthy program should be employed. When physical fitness becomes part of your complete character rather than necessary for a game, it is time to take the long view. Your goal should be to develop and maintain high levels of physical conditioning and “outlast them all.” It will do you no good to peak after several years and then start falling apart because of overtraining.

My philosophy is to schedule workouts every other day, alternating between High Intensity Interval Training and Resistance Training. This will give you 48 hours between each session and 4 days between each type of workout. You can go full throttle every other day and come back fully recuperated each time.

Make sure to work your abdominals every day to maintain focus and a rock solid core. Fifty to one hundred sit-ups or crunches will do. But giving yourself a day off between workouts will allow you to train hard for years, perhaps your whole life.

Besides the benefits from sufficient recuperation, this schedule is sustainable in terms of time management and mental fatigue as well. You will fresh and chomping at the bit, looking to forward to each workout for years.

Develop your explosiveness and recovery with HIIT

4. High Intensity Interval Training (HIIT)

As discussed above, as a man develops other priorities during his lifetime there are only so many hours to spend in the gym, at the track or on the road. So budget your time wisely to attain superior results by using High Intensity Interval Training.

With an appropriate warm up to avoid injury, you will realize superior life benefits by setting a time limit to your workouts and focusing on HIIT as opposed to traditional time intensive cardiovascular programs. Plus you are likely to be more consistent over the long term through a more modest time commitment.

Get in, get it done and get out. Lift, sprint and spar intensely. Increase your power, explosiveness and capacity. Add some muscle mass to your frame, look and feel great. This type of training will imbue you with energy and high levels of testosterone. Long durations of endurance exercise will reduce muscle mass, lower your testosterone, steal your valuable time and drain your energy.

In terms of HIIT there is nothing like carrying your own body weight to develop functional conditioning and explosiveness. Two of the simplest and easiest ways to do so at the “home gym” are through wind sprints and bag work. No expensive membership or fancy equipment necessary. Concentrate on these two training methods and you will distinguish yourself physically among men. You will develop and maintain the ability to go all out and recover quickly, a fine addition to your persona as you walk around day to day.

Invest in yourself

5. Resistance Training

In line with the home gym sprinting and bag work, get yourself 300 or more pounds of weights, a barbell and a weight bench or squat rack. Spend a few hundred dollars that will last you a lifetime and pay you back many times over.

By having a weight set at home to go along with your heavy bag, you will make it quick and easy to get 20 to 40 minutes of lifting or sparring in every other day. No drive out to the gym necessary, no membership dues, no waiting around for availability and no numbskulls. Get in and get out, no excuses.

Concentrate on compound barbell lifts. Put your frame under the duress of heavy weights and force it to adapt. Your body will do so by producing additional testosterone and adding muscle mass. The goal is not to be a bodybuilder or power lifter, but to add and maintain functional body strength throughout your lifetime.

Distinguish Yourself

Be smart about how you exercise to stay fit for the long term. Learn what to eat and avoid the seduction of wheat, sugar and alcohol. Create and follow a sustainable workout regimen designed for optimal masculine health, functional physical conditioning and proper recuperation. Combine the power from compound lifting with the explosiveness and aerobic recovery from High Intensity Interval Training. Follow this simple program and you will develop a formidable physical presence. You will distinguish yourself from the masses and maintain a rare physical prowess well into your later years.

Read Next: How To Balance Intense Physical Training With Living Life

Max Panzer

Max Panzer is the publisher of Becoming a Force of Nature. He is an independent business owner and has been married to the same woman for over 25 years. Max pursues his Life Mission at full throttle and works to cut through each day with a stronger, sharper, gleaming edge.

Disney Will Make A Film About You If You're Black, Female, And Ranked 90,000th In Your Craft

April 8, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Did you come 83rd in your last triathlon in the "cities under 200,000 people" category? Get 2nd place at the county fair for breeding one of the best local pigs? Great! Chances are that Disney Corporation will now make an inspirational film about your wonderful life, just as it did about female chess "prodigy" Phiona Mutesi. Around the time The Queen of Katwe came out in cinemas, she was ranked a lowly 91,051st in the world.

Of course, no one will make a film about your triathlon feats or the beautiful big pig you fed to magnificent fatness. But because Mutesi is a woman (and a black person from Africa), she received a star-like media reception from journalists representing publications like usual offender Jezebel and somewhat less crazy mastheads, including The Los Angeles Times.

Mutesi's ranking in chess has improved ever so slightly since the second half of 2016 and she's presently the 90,895th best active player in the world. Among women, that jumps to a positively amazing 5,291st. So does that mean we get another 5,290 films about strong, independent female chess players, none of whom rank in the top 100 (China's Hou Yifan is the best woman at 115th in the world)?

Women expect praise simply for turning up

Unless the player is from your team, would you really know much about the 200th highest-paid player in the NFL, let alone the 500th? They get next to no attention in a sport actively followed and paid for by tens of millions of fans. And they certainly don't get a movie made about them, irrespective of whether they built themselves up from crime-ridden Detroit or faced other very significant hardships growing up.

Even if Phiona Mutesi is from Africa, I cannot see what really differentiates her from journeymen in professional sports leagues. In fact, we have more evidence in many cases that their lives are harder and more grueling than hers, particularly for those players paid only pocket money and unsure if they will make the various cuts during the NFL (or MLB or NHL) preseason. Luckily for women such as Mutesi, they can always fall on their gender, race, or ethnicity for extra (and undeserved) support, attention, and even money.

The comparison between chess and physical sports is even starker when soccer is examined. In the United Kingdom alone, tens of thousands of players, many of them poorly paid or not paid at all, put in full-time hours or more every week for a dream that will come true for only 1% of them. Even amongst that 1%, most will earn the kind of money that still requires them to get a normal job after retirement. Some of the professional and semi-professional footballers I have known in Europe should start pitching autobiographical film ideas to studios! Perhaps Phiona Mutesi could lend them some advice?

The irony of women supposedly being as good as men is that they get 10-100 times more attention for doing very little

Disney probably bought the rights for the film the moment they figured out she could actually play chess, however badly.

> "Girls are always overlooked, even in chess," said Mutesi. "But I don't think there's any reason why a girl cannot beat a boy. It comes from believing in yourself."
>
> — Phiona Mutesi talking about beating boys, whom she doesn't usually beat, unless they're poorly-ranked like her

For all the bizarre fanfare being lavished upon Phiona Mutesi, at least she competes in a "sport" where the results are clear. This clarity at the end of games makes her hubris more astounding still. She claimed that girls are "overlooked" in chess at the same time news publications like The Guardian were flocking to her for interviews. Yes, to the 91,051st best player in the world. I almost had to put quotation marks around "best" because literally thousands of part-time suburban chess club players were and still are far ahead of her in the rankings. Aside from the person ranked number one in the world, Magnus Carlsen, Phiona Mutesi has been given the most attention of any player in recent years. And it is thoroughly unwarranted.

We are constantly fed a media diet of "women are just as good as men," but when a woman "achieves" something that would not even warrant the Encouragement or Participation Award for a man, dozens of sycophantic journalists and activists will be at the ready to praise her. SJWs, whether on college campuses or in the "professional" world, know that they need to inflate many women with trumped-up accolades and special advantages in order to have even 10% of their narrative accepted. Hence we find the emphasis on female-only engineering and other STEM scholarships, which often benefit the daughters of wealthier families, or profit-driven corporations being forced to have a certain number of female executives.

Lauding women who don’t deserve to be lauded is the real fake news

The number of publications calling Phiona Mutesi a “prodigy” beggars belief. Plus, The Daily Caller pointed out that Mutesi “achieved” at least one of her “expert” titles with a rating of only 1686, well below the conventional requirement of 2000. In the meantime, by late last year Mutesi was only the third best female chess player in Uganda, which is akin to being the best alpine skier in Saudi Arabia.

When “Eric the Eel,” the Equatorial Guinean swimmer at the 2000 Sydney Olympics, graced the pool with his presence, people freely admitted he was a physically poor competitor. They could admire his participation without imagining that he was actually within a hundred miles of good. And remember, this was a man who had never even practiced in a full-length pool, unlike the normal chess practice and competition environments Phiona Mutesi has had access to. Because Mutesi is a woman, there’s a rampant urge in the media and elsewhere to portray her as some sort of serious force in chess.

So if you needed your fake news fix for this week, Phiona Mutesi’s “stellar” career so far as a chess player should satisfy you.

Read More: 7 Things I’ve Learned About Life From Playing Chess

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Fault Lines In Progressive Paradise

April 8, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Dark forces have been working for decades to put together an unholy alliance opposed to Western civilization. They may seem at times like a monolithic menace, but it's really a hive-mind with the wealthy, powerful, and influential forming a center of gravity. For example, the Open Society Foundation has countless front groups worldwide, as well as others it funds to do their bidding. Many also get lavish funding from like-minded "philanthropic" funds. Still, that doesn't mean that everyone down to each activist on campus (or in Mom's basement) is taking orders directly from Doctor Evil himself.

All the little servile bugs crawling around in The Hive actually have their own agendas, and generally act in a coalition of convenience. But—hard as it may be to believe—occasionally the drones will dare to start thinking for themselves. That's quite perilous for them individually, as they could get swarmed and stung by their comrades.

Sometimes today's horde eats its children. It's not surprising that an ideology specifically designed to create disunity has managed to do so within its own ranks. It's always been that way—even before cultural Marxism existed—from the French Revolution onward.

Leftists versus each other

Oh, did that icepick hurt, Comrade Trotsky?

Despite general agreement by the Granola Coalition on several major items, it's the differences that can turn into real sticking points. Communists have no use for liberals, and many liberals consider Communists to be kooky fanatics barking up the wrong tree (and for good reason). The further left you get, the more quarrelsome things become.

Communism has several schools of thought; the major ones include the garden-variety Marxist-Leninists, the Maoists, and the Trotskyists (nobody can stand them). Cultural Marxism is the "Communism Lite" strain, with an iron grip on the educational system, the media, Hollywood and big corporations, and many other institutions that they infiltrated. The Marxist-Leninists consider "deviationism" from Communist orthodoxy a pretty serious matter; people have been shot for that.

During the surreal chaos of the Spanish Civil War, the leftist coalition apparently had much trouble keeping their rifles all pointed in the same direction, fighting each other almost as much as they were fighting their opponents. The pro-USSR faction was the most aggressive with the "my way or the highway" approach. Rival Communist groups (such as POUM) got thrown under the bus. There was little mercy for the anarchists and moderate Socialists, just as happened in the Russian Revolution.

In China, Mao Zedong cleverly manipulated a minor ideological quibble to stir up the Jacobin-like fury of the Cultural Revolution. That brought him back to power after he got sidelined for killing tens of millions with his half-baked Great Leap Forward scheme. On a broader scale, while the USA was pursuing a containment strategy against Communism, the Communists themselves were busy containing each other in Asia. Elsewhere in the developing world, many countries had two rival terrorist movements representing both the Maoist and Marxist-Leninist flavors.

Today, leftists aren't shooting each other over these matters; instead, various factions of keyboard Red Guards bitch at each other online. (In a way, I miss the old days. If they'd have a Thunderdome-style reality show with Antifags versus critical theory professors, I'd gladly pirate the episodes.) These days, the feminist flavor of cultural Marxism is the goofiest.

Feminists versus women who don't agree with them

Someone's triggered.

Feminists are all about female empowerment, right? So in the 2008 Presidential election, when Sarah Palin had a shot at being the first female Vice President of the USA, were the feminists pleased? Au contraire, mon frère. They were caterwauling and saying filthy things about her. Ann Coulter also receives much immoderate screeching from feminists, as well as liberals for whom feminism is part of the package deal. She's also far better-looking than any big-name feminist out there, which surely contributes to their hate-on more than any ideological disagreement.

Sure, Coulter and Palin are outspoken conservatives and you'd expect this from leftists. Even so, liberal women who step away from the Party Line can get thrown under the bus. For example, Camille Paglia is one of those exceedingly rare feminists who makes sense most of the time. For this reason, the Sisterhood treats her as a heretic. As she put it:

> Feminism is dead. The movement is absolutely dead. The women's movement tried to suppress dissident voices for way too long. There's no room for dissent. It's just like Mean Girls. If they had listened to me they could have gotten the ship steered in the right direction. My wing of feminism—the pro-sex wing—was silenced. I was practically lynched for endorsing The Rolling Stones. Susan Faludi is still saying I'm not a feminist. Who made her pope? Feminist ideology is like a new religion for a lot of neurotic women. You can't talk to them about anything.

Well spoken! Feminist solidarity for all women goes right out the window for anyone disagreeing with them. Even weirder, some soi-disant women's advocates don't even understand what a woman is.

Trannies and their enablers versus radical feminists

A member of the latest designated victim group, who became Vanity Fair's "cover girl" and Glamour's "Woman of the Year".

Typically, feminists have severe problems coming to terms with basic biology. Some can't comprehend that humans are sexually dimorphic (like all advanced species); others do get it but believe this is unjust somehow. Strangely, there are even those who take the side of delusional men who think they're women.

Feminists smart enough to know what a woman is are called "trans-exclusionary radical feminists" (TERFs) by those who are clueless about basic biology, or who believe reality conforms to our wishes. Note also that actual lesbians don't bang men who think they're women—I wonder why? Back in 1979, Janice G. Raymond wrote:

> All transsexuals rape women's bodies by reducing the real female form to an artifact, appropriating this body for themselves.

So here we have an early example of the "everything we don't like is some kind of rape" trope. (Must they keep trivializing this loathsome felony?) To be more accurate about it, trannies are neurotic men mutilating their own bodies; trying to become something they're not.

Gloria Steinem objected to transsexuality back in the days when she was a little more sensible and personable. In 2013, when questioned about it, she flip-flopped. Had she reasserted her former views, she would have received torrents of criticism from those who once regarded her as a heroine. Whenever the collective hive-mind decides something, anyone who dissents is in danger of attack. The "TERF wars" get pretty heated indeed. As Sheila Jeffreys noted:

> Whatever the topic of my presentation, and whether in Australia, the UK or the US, transgender activists bombard the organising group and the venue with emails accusing me of transhate, transphobia, hate speech, and seek to have me banned. On blogs, Facebook and Twitter they accuse me of wanting to "eliminate" transgendered persons, and they wish me dead.

Sounds like some Social Justice Warriors got triggered there. We understand, Sheila. SJWs get pretty kooky indeed. As we shall see, they've ventured into some strange new territories.

Palestinians versus Israelis

Oy veh, what a day!

Israel has treated the Palestinians pretty badly; many leftists have noticed, considering them an oppressed group. As indelicate as it might be to mention, a disproportionate number of leading leftist figures—past and present—are Jewish. Occasionally this makes for a pretty sour note.

Surprisingly, there is a small overlap between pro-Palestinian activists and left-leaning Jews, with interesting results. Sometimes it's principled, but not always. For example, Gilad Atzmon described how entryism led to parts of the Palestinian movement becoming a watered-down controlled opposition, a proxy in a conflict between differing Israeli interests. Further:

> In the last six decades the working people have been plundered repeatedly. The people who used to be called the working class are now the workless class, and many of them are underclass by now. But why?
>
> Unlike the (imaginary) "old good labor-oriented Left" that promised to unite us all against capital and the Empire, the neo-Marxists and the Frankfurt Yeshiva enthusiasts invested a huge effort breaking the cohesiveness of the working people and Western society in general.

I don't have a dog in the Palestinian-Israeli fight, but it's refreshing to hear some straight talk for once. He goes further describing the effects of the Palestinian movement being shoehorned into the "social justice" tar-ball, and concludes:

> While the liberal Zionist George Soros's Open Society funded a BDS LGBT tour in America, young Hamas engineers were digging tunnels and building rockets in Gaza. I am convinced that Palestinian Muslim leaders in Gaza grasped at a certain stage that the struggle for Palestinian queer politics may not be the definitive path toward Palestinian liberation.

Is that a recipe for unity and solidarity? Those who are genuinely concerned about the Palestinian situation are right to be annoyed that their movement has been co-opted. It goes both ways too; Jewisn NGOs can get infiltrated by pro-Palestinian elements. Still, this has spilled far beyond the Levantine misunderstanding. As the legend goes, the golem turns against its creator.

Muslims and their enablers versus Jews

Res ipse loquitur.

Privilege rhetoric is the great yardstick of "social justice" arguments; whichever group is deemed most privileged is considered wrong, regardless of actual facts. Some leftists have drawn conclusions about Jewish wealth and influence in politics, and past persecutions only go so far to offset this picture. Privilege rhetoric led to anti-White sentiment (as designed). However, it turned into anti-Semitism too, and has the potential to get much worse. Today, many SJWs are in bed with radical Islam, despite Muslim fundamentalism opposing just about everything that liberalism is supposed to stand for: pacifism, religious tolerance, women's rights, GLBT interests, and the list goes on.

This "social justice" stuff is a recent development of cultural Marxism. That in turn got started by the Frankfurt School, a Communist revolutionary dream team of professors and psychologists, and almost all of them were Jewish. Well, that's a little embarrassing! Their actions besmirched their community's reputation, destabilized the countries where they prospered, and ultimately gave their opponents rhetorical ammunition.

This caused considerable blowback, an error continuing today. Worse, Jewish elites and their supporters have been pushing for mass immigration into Europe and the USA. Not only do the common citizens suffer, the Jewish community themselves have experienced a great deal of anti-Semitism from Muslim new arrivals.

Really, elites of all backgrounds need to knock it off with their social engineering, or they're going to go down with the ship. And speaking of population displacement…

Urban turf wars in the USA

Detroit was once a bustling industrial center, considered the city of the future.

The struggle for control over neighborhoods is quite a long one, and is still ongoing. In the 1950s, Blacks began flooding into many new neighborhoods. After that, Whites left, selling their homes at a loss. Many real estate scamsters encouraged this and turned a tidy profit from “block busting”. Government meddling and outright hostility by neocons have made it worse. Sure, the residents could choose to stay, but by the 1960s the ghettos were no longer the safe places they used to be, and the schools weren’t looking too good either. To a degree, ghettos are still “no go zones” for outsiders.

More recently, it goes the other direction too. Developers buy up land in the ghettos, get the property taxes jacked up, and the residents can’t afford to stay. The houses are bulldozed to put up McMansions and condos for trendy haut-bourgeois types and hipsters. Thus, one left-leaning demographic displaces another. Urban gentrification has become a big sore point. Blacks don’t like being displaced by yuppies and urban elves any more than the Whites liked being forced into the suburbs.

Conflicts between minority groups are also on the rise. This featured during the Los Angeles riots, where Korean-owned stores got looted and burnt, I guess for the hell of it. Lately for Los Angeles, Hispanics are ethnically cleansing Blacks out of neighborhoods they’d been in for quite some time. Competition for jobs is also an issue. With a rising Hispanic population, things could get interesting. People promoting multiculturalism as the neatest thing since sliced bread don’t realize that more cultures inside a country means more conflicts.

In summary

Hint to leftists: this isn’t the best way to win hearts and minds..

So what are we to make of all this leftist illogic and inconsistency? Saul Alinsky, the granddaddy of the community agitators, advised to “Make the enemy live up to their own book of rules.” Well, that one is a two-way street! Another Alinsky tactic was “Wherever possible go outside of the experience of the enemy.” Given how intellectually bankrupt they are, framing the debate in terms of logic and consistency will yield interesting results.

Finally, disputes on the left aren’t just fine entertainment; these are opportunities.

Read More: If SJWs Were Comic Book Characters

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How To Complete The Back Lever

April 9, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Rounding off my series of articles on the fundamental gymnastic static holds, this article will deal with the last few progressive steps of the back lever. Recall that several months ago I introduced you to this exercise, and last week I showed you the first few steps of the front lever progression. I fully intend for you to train in both of these exercises simultaneously, as strengthening one can only aid and assist the other (as I said in last week's article, many muscle groups are utilized in these exercises, and thus it is an outstanding exercise for both gymnastics and strength training on the whole).

By this point, I will assume that you have mastered the back lever up until the inverted vertical hang. From here, you will, essentially, be rotating on your horizontal axis and opening up your hips and extending your legs out further and further in each progressive step, until your body is straight and horizontal. Having mastered the inverted vertical hang is essential here, as it is from this position that you will be lowering yourself into the horizontal progressions. If you cannot do the vertical hang, work on the exercises in the first article until you are capable of doing so.

And without further ado:

1. The straddle back lever

Assume the inverted straight hang position. While holding that position, begin bending at the knees, similar to how one would do the butterfly position. Your hips should be semi bent, and your knees fully bent—it also helps to put the bottoms of your feet together.

Then, slowly lower yourself into a horizontal hold where your stomach is parallel to the floor. You will find that this is much more difficult than any of the horizontal positions you have held before.

When you are capable of holding this position for 10 seconds, you are ready to move on.

2. The Half Back Lever

Once again, take the inverted straight hang position. Making sure to keep the hips locked in the vertical position, bend the knees. Your legs should form a right angle. I understand this might be somewhat confusing, so observe the picture for a visual aid that will explain the position you are supposed to take much better.

Once you have secured this position, lower yourself into a horizontal hold. You will immediately notice that this position is much more difficult to hold than even the straddle back lever—your abdominal muscles and lower back will have to be firing at all cylinders to do this position properly. Once again, when you are capable of holding this position for 10 seconds, you are ready to continue

3. Two Possible Progressions

The next step actually gives you an option, as there are two possible progressions you can use. Some gymnastic coaches will advocate one or the other, and I figure that certain people (or certain body types) will respond better to one or the other, so I'd just detail both of them.

The first is the split leg back lever, which begins with the inverted straight hang as usual. Then, keeping the hips vertical, you split the legs as wide as possible. Then lower into the horizontal hang—it is said that the wider you split your legs apart, the easier it is to go horizontal.

However, the circumstances of my surroundings (namely, where my pull-up bar is located) means that it’s not really possible for me to spread my legs wide. And, as luck would have it, another gymnastics text I looked into suggested another progression for the front lever: the one-leg back lever!

The basic premise is similar to the one-leg front lever, but the way you get into this position is different. As you might expect, the one legged back lever starts in the inverted straight hang, and then has one leg bend as much as possible while the other is straight. Then lower into a horizontal hang. Be sure to switch legs for each “repetition”.

4. The back lever

And finally, the back lever: Hit the inverted straight hang, tense all the muscles, and lower yourself down. Much easier said than done, of course!

Conclusion

Bear in mind that I myself cannot yet do the back lever, I am on the one leg front lever, the step just before the back lever. My research tells me there are no steps between the one-leg back lever and the true back lever, and also that it can take many months, if not a year or more, to master this gymnastic position.

As I have recently begun to go back to the gym after a year of recuperating from my car accident, I have already noticed an increase in strength (or rather, less atrophy than would be typical of injury rehabilitation) thanks to these gymnastic positions. Thus, I expect to achieve the true back lever within the next couple of months.

Read More: How To Learn the Back Lever

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

The Anti-White Racism Of “Moderate” Muslims

April 9, 2017 | by JD McGuigan | Link | Original Link

It is no secret that anti-white racism is a growing trend and a default position in leftist circles nowadays, whether it is promoted by SJW types or white leftists themselves who, after 60 years of incessant propaganda, have bought into the guilt and now espouse self-hate in the name of “tolerance” brownie points.

It is also no secret that one of the primary targets of radical Islamic terrorists is the Western infidel. Who is “the west” exactly? That would be North America, Europe, and Australia—three predominantly white continents where radical Islam is a growing problem. The “refugee” invasion of countries with a high density of whites is all well established. However, there is a disturbing trend gone largely under the radar coming from the “moderate” Muslim crowd. It is the propensity to constantly bring up “white terrorism” immediately after an Islamic terrorist attack anywhere in the world. This comparison makes no logical sense, unless you understand the motive behind this underhanded tactic.

The comparison between whites and Muslims is a non-sequitir with no context. This is of course due to the fact that whites are a race while Muslims are not. There is no universal doctrine associated with being white, nor does one choose to be white. Contrary to Islam, which despite cultural differences within it, does subscribe universally to central doctrines. Being a Muslim is also a choice.

Much like Nazism, Islam is an oppressive political ideology, and much like Scientology, Islam is a religion that makes very large claims for itself. That means when one calls himself a Muslim, he is making a bold statement about his views on the nature of reality

(the religious aspect), and the way in which the infidels should be treated under the Sharia (the political aspect.) Islam is not an inherent trait. In that sense, one cannot be bigoted against Muslims any more than one can be bigoted against Nazis or Scientologists.

Thus, until the "Islamophobia" crowd is prepared to condemn anti-Nazi bigotry or anti-Scientologist bigotry, there is no leg to stand on with this "Islamophobia" ploy. But this is not about Islamophobia, as it has already been fully debunked as a propaganda word used to deter infidels from criticizing Islam.

Latinos vs. Buddhists; Gang Violence

What we are now seeing by mainstream "moderate" Muslims is the constant comparison between whites and Muslims in terms of domestic terrorist attacks. Mainstream Muslim-American voices like those at the The Young Turks, pseudo-scholars like Reza Aslan, and the Hamas-affiliates at CAIR constantly take to Twitter after an Islamic terrorist attack to remind us of a grossly misleading FBI study from a few years ago. It essentially maintains the statistics show that the majority of terrorism in America is committed by white supremacists, so profiling Muslims under any circumstances is racist or bigoted. It states that "since 9/11", white nationalists have killed more people on American soil than Jihadists have.

This is scandalous intellectual dishonesty that appears to be borne out of a deep-seated anti-white racism. That is the only explanation for this patently absurd apples to oranges comparison, which makes about as much sense as comparing Latinos to Buddhists in a study on gang violence. Nobody would accept a so-called study comparing those two demographics as credible, and a more logical comparison would be between Latinos and blacks (two races) on the topic of gang violence, or between Muslims and Buddhists (two religions) on the topic of terrorism. However, comparing a race to an ideology only makes sense if there is an inherent confirmation bias against one of the two demographics.

This tactic is simply another way for Islamists and radical leftists to "get at" white people, hoping that the white guilt narrative will continue to be an effective deterrent to speaking rationally about Islamic terrorism. However, for the sake of argument, let's take this comparison between white supremacists and Muslims at face value, because it still does not bode well for the other side if you possess even nominal critical thinking skills.

In the first place, “since 9/11” is obviously a ridiculous phrase. 9/11 was the worst terrorist attack in American history, and it should count towards the total number of casualties. Omitting the casualties of 9/11 for the purposes of this study is akin to stating “if you don’t count the Armenian Genocide, then no Armenians died during the first World War” or “*if you don’t count the Iraq War, then Americans haven’t killed many Iraqis recently.” (*Coincidentally, one of the purveyors of the constant “white vs. Muslim” comparison, Cenk Uygur, is an Armenian Genocide denier himself.) If we are conducting a study, but outliers can be omitted at will for any or no reason simply to fit the agenda, then there is no end to the potential obscurantism and moving of the goalposts. The next time someone wants to have a discussion about right-wing terrorism, simply omit the Timothy McVeigh bombing and see if you are not accused of deploying a logical fallacy.

Let’s digress. The study found that “since 9/11”, white supremacists had killed 48 people on American soil compared to 26 killed by Muslims, as of 2015. Not withstanding 9/11/01, the study was clearly done before Pulse nightclub shooting in Orlando, where a Jihadist killed 49 people and Muslims instantly ran away with the lead. When you correctly include the Jihadist attack, and roll back the clock one day so as to include 9/11, it looks a bit more like this as of 2017:

Jihadists >3,200 deaths caused by terrorism since 9/10/01

White supremacists +/- 100-150 deaths caused by terrorism since 9/10/01

Per Capita

Finally, let’s also point out that 63% of the US population is white, and 1% of the US population is Muslim. As such, one has to stretch, skew, omit, and selectively edit a study to get 1% of the population’s terrorism offenses under that of the 63% majority, and they are still easily debunked. Note that all of a sudden the same intellectuals who claim blacks are “disproportionately” shot by police forget what per capita means on the topic of Islamic terrorism. Muslims should only be committing 1% of the total terrorism taking place on American soil – not 80%, 20%, or even 5%. Unfortunately, there is no amount of lying one could do to make their terrorism resume as bare as it should be.

The public figures who refer to this comparison most often are not stupid men, but they are vehemently dishonest. Reza Aslan is a PhD, Cenk Uygur is an attorney, and so are most of the Hamas-affiliates at CAIR. They know what per capita means, and they know that comparing whites to Muslims is a logical fallacy. One has to wonder if they are doing it primarily to advance the Islamist cause while pretending to be secularists, as a means to merely denigrate white people, or both.

A Silver Lining

The good news is there are earnest Muslims (or former Muslims) out there that place their allegiance to secularism, democracy, and western values before their allegiance to Islam, and who understand there is a unique problem with their faith at this moment in history. People like Maajid Nawaz and Aayan Hirsi Ali, who have both been classified as “anti-Muslim extremists” by the left wing hate group known as The Southern Poverty Law Center, are doing great work exposing Islamic extremism all over the world.

These are very brave people, but it is important to note they are not typically those who the mainstream media brands “moderate Muslims”, who are often just Islamists in disguise. They usually carry another moniker like “reformer”, and can usually be identified as those who are viciously demonized as sellouts and Uncle Toms by those same “moderate” Muslims that exhibit virulent anti-white racism.

Read More: Why Does The Left Support Radical Muslims?

JD McGuigan

JD is a 27 year old travel bum who jumps from job to job recklessly usually just before getting fired. He is also the author of a short e-book called The Pink Doughnut Phenomenon, which is a thesis on masculinity in the 9-5 workforce.

Is Technology Our Friend Or Foe?

April 9, 2017 | by Stewart Brendan | Link | Original Link

Browsing the archives of the ROK, I was struck on the generally negative view of men regarding modern technology. Of course, there are some exceptions to that rule but the majority is ranging from indifferent (thinking that technology will impede their game and social life) to downright phobic (thinking “Snowden” and the like).

I will try to shed some light on the good, the bad, the ugly and the powerful when it comes to the dragon of our age.

The Bad

Young woman wielding her wand of Narcissus

When it comes to the world of technology, a disturbingly high number of people regard social media as the greatest or (at the very least) among the most important inventions and technological achievements of our age. While this is highly debatable, what it does do is give a platform to girls for self-validation, online sluttery, and spreading of irrational and toxic ideology posed as “rights”, “freedoms” and the like. Women’s egos inflated rapidly under the anonymous praise of countless faceless males, while making some temporary “friendships” with other women. Online prostitution abounds, further encouraging young women to pursue this path to depression and isolation, thinking that they will remain anonymous and/or without any repercussions or consequences.

Of course, many young men also fell under this spell, forgoing the very basics of human interaction in favor of praising a bunch of women in the vain hopes that their non-felt responses to their affection will actually lead somewhere. Also, with the ever-exploding use and abuse of mobile devices, both men and women can delude themselves with claims of social and mental health while carrying their connection and live stream of digital cocaine in their pockets.

The Ugly

Of course, the bad can turn to ugly as well, given enough time to fester. Several studies (Google Scholar and some others – links taken on March 2017) have shown a clear link between excessive use of social networking and behavioral problems, while older studies have shown the same regarding internet usage in general. Most addicts of social networks actually deny even that (denial is a typical addict behaviour).

“The world wants to be deceived, so let it be deceived”

And, of course, who can leave scammers out of this? Most scammers pose as girls (with the bait material being both plentiful and multifaceted enough to be extremely difficult to detect as such) as this is the easiest market to get into; most young men barely use any hint of rational thought when white-knighting, let alone the effort and skills needed to detect a scam. Women can be (and are) approached by a different vector, usually modeling or talent scouts.

Another facet of the ugly side of technology is espionage and lack of information security. After Snowden’s and Wikileaks’ revelations of massive spying and information intercept, one can be afraid of their phone, their PC, and their smartwatch. We often see stories of hacked individuals having personal information exposed or destroyed. The widespread use of technology has created the dilemma of security versus privacy.

Technology seems like a bad deal after all those, doesn’t it? Well, if you look closely, you can find the common missing element of those cases? I’ll tell you at the end, after I list the things that technology can achieve if this element is present.

The Good

The power of technology can be harnessed for your benefit

And now the positive part of technology, namely information exchange and research. This very site demonstrates that power, showing that men can come together and share knowledge due to this new age on communication. Also, research on various topics can be achieved in seconds with the right queries, when it used to take days, even weeks of shuffling through books and old newspapers and magazines.

Friendships can be made across the world, between like-minded fellows and people of common interests, something inconceivable a few years ago. There are quite a lot of people actually making an honest living off this brave new world, something that is even depicted in articles at Return Of Kings (like some here courtesy of Mr. Kyle Trouble). We also can't forget the increased-size dating market, should you decide to try it.

The Powerful

The true potential of technology is yet to be harnessed

The above uses show the power of technology, but its true potential is yet not reached. So, it came to me as a surprise when I found this article. While many men would argue that surveillance devices is kind of pushing it, it can only show the tip of the iceberg that is technology's potential. If they can do it, so can you. Another thing is anonymity software, and simple low-tech solutions like covering the camera on your laptop. Open source software can make you sure of what you run on your PC, free of charge. The list could be a whole site all in itself, and well beyond the scope of this article, but you can do your research and find out for yourself.

The Element

So what is the element missing from the bad and the Ugly, and present in the Good and the Powerful sides of technology? The answer is hidden in its obviousness: knowledge. Knowledge of technology can turn it to your greatest ally, lack of knowledge can turn it to your worst nightmare.

> "But I don't wanna be a nerd!" – Some intellectually lazy slob

Tough.

Most men wouldn't drive a car without learning even the most basic of mechanics, yet most people (and women tend to have somewhat less of the pie cut when it comes to PCs) use something that can spy them, impersonate and incriminate them, without the faintest idea of even the basic mechanics behind that. It is also ironic that the most vulnerable people are the ones that know nothing, yet expose everything (from personal info to financial statements and credit card numbers).

Knowledge of technology is seldom hidden, as the tech community is in its very origin a researcher's society, and is typically open of its gained knowledge – as long as you put in effort and don't expect to be spoon-fed.

> Know your tools, or stay away from them; never try to use something you don't know what it does and how to use it.

That's some great advice my grandfather gave me after I cut myself with a woodworking scalpel. So, to any aspiring tech-savvy man, let me tell you this: don't be "tech-savvy". Know your shit. Know it really well. You can check if a girl is a slut within 5 minutes. You can check if your girlfriend tries to expand her inner world with the help of another "friend." You can make money without joining the cubicle matrix farm, and use your free time to your own benefit.

But you can get spied upon, cheated and scammed, or even worse, turned into a mindless white-knight for some airheaded bimbo. The choice is in your hands. The narrow path is harder, but the payoff is worth investing in.

Read More: 5 Ways Our Modern World Is A Pale Simulation Of The Past

Stewart Brendan
Stewart Brendan is a guy that recently realized that many things around him did not make sense, and after serious logical deduction found his way to the manosphere.

10 Facts Regarding The US Strike On Syria

April 10, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

With the US strike against Syrian airbase last week, there are endless speculations on what's happening and what more is to come in the near future. At the moment, the biggest concern is whether the US will escalate their military involvement in an effort to overthrow Assad or not, risking a confrontation with Russia that could spark a major war.

With so much confusion and misunderstanding of what's happening, I decided to compile number of facts to allow the readers to better understand the situation and the implications of Trump's decision.

1. You must see the bigger picture

First, you'll never get to the truth if you think this attack was merely a response to an alleged chemical attack, or if you think this is an issue of whether the US should get involved in another Middle East conflict or not. This is only a single episode in a long process the US and its allies have been taking to destroy stable Arab states for Israel while containing and trying to defeat Russia and its allies. Expansion of NATO to the East; Installation of missile defense system in Europe; CIA coup in Ukraine that knocked out a pro-Russian government while almost cutting off Russia's naval access to the Black Sea, and therefore, the Mediterranean (which is why Russia took Crimea); sanctions against Russia; sanctions against Iran (Russia's main ally and the main enemy of Israel and Saudi Arabia); and the attempt to destroy Syria, which is another ally of Russia that provides them with a naval base in the Mediterranean; the recent build up of NATO military presence in Eastern Europe; and so on, are all connected.

We are in the midst of a globalist war efforts against Russia and its allies. And it is with this context in mind that we should view the situation in the Middle East and elsewhere.

We should also remind ourselves that Syria was already chosen for destruction a decade ago. So, whether it is a step towards defeating Iran and Russia or simply doing the bids of Israel, it is clear that the US and its NATO and Middle Eastern allies will oppose Assad's Syria no matter what even if it means supporting Islamic militants there who are the progeny of Al-Qaeda. With this view, it becomes clear that the decision to attack the Syrian airbase was not some moral decision made by Trump himself or an issue of showing off America's strength, but a mere continuation of the neocon program that's been going on for many years.

2. Western media bias and support for the Jihadists

The picture of the boy on the left was circulated all around the world by the MSM to get people outraged against Assad. The boy on the right was ignored because the Jihadists who dragged him out of a hospital to behead him were the "moderate" rebels (AKA the good guys).

Continuing on with the first point, part of seeing at the bigger picture is to understand the bias and the psy-op the Western governments and the mainstream media has been engaging in to manipulate public opinion.

I'm appalled that people from the West from both the Left and the Right seem completely unfazed that their governments are giving diplomatic and military support to Al-Queda affiliated Jihadist groups in Syria. The same individuals who get outraged over some knife attack seem to have no shame that their nation is complicit in supporting Islamic militants who engage in beheadings and suicide bombings in Syria. This ignorance can be attributed to the work of the mainstream media that constantly shows Assad as the butcher who constantly kills children while the rebels are freedom fighters who just want peace and democracy. This war cannot, and should not, be judged by what the MSM tells us.

3. Trump and the US don't care about civilian deaths

Nobody in the West sheds crocodile tears over the atrocities against civilians if the moderate beheaders do it.

There are many people defending Trump's decision to launch the attack on the basis that the US needs to show it will not tolerate Assad gassing his own people. There are two problems with this.

First, there is no evidence that Assad attacked civilians with sarin gas. And considering the West was just starting to accept Assad's stay in power and that Syrian government forces are on their path to victory, it makes no logical sense for Assad to start using chemical weapons to incur the ire of the international community. The more likely scenario is that the Syrian airforce targeted a weapons storage depot without knowing that the Jihadists were stockpiling sarin gas there. There's even a possibility that the Jihadists killed their own civilians to troll the US into the war (the doctor who reported the sarin gas attack is a Jihadist), which is exactly what they did back in 2013 according to this UN inspector. All in all, it's too soon to jump to conclusions, but obviously at least one person thought he had enough information to take immediate action.

When will president Trump do anything to save the Yemeni children who are being bombed and facing mass starvation? Oh wait, America is helping the Saudis slaughter them. Never mind.

Second, it's impossible to believe that the West is concerned about civilian lives considering how they selectively choose which civilians to defend. Poor children? There was no outrage when the "rebels" killed children by shelling their school in Aleppo; the US didn't launch Tomahawk missiles towards Saudi airbase when they bombed a Yemeni funeral that killed more than 100 people (if anything, the US is bombing Yemen and helping the Saudis with their starvation strategy), and there was no condemnation from the West when the "moderate" rebels killed 31 people in Damascus with suicide bombings just few weeks ago.

The issue isn't even about chemical weapons either as another rebel group admitted to using them against the Kurds without incurring any sort of response from the West that pretends to hold a moral high ground. The entire notion that Trump or anyone else in the West cares about the poor children suffering the hands of evil Assadists would be laughable if it wasn't so serious.

Since this is clearly not an issue of preventing civilian deaths or stopping the use of chemical weapons, it can only be concluded that the US and the rest of the West is only interested in destroying the Syrian nation just for the crime of being a stable and strong Arab state that won't bow to globalists and Zionists.

4. Is Assad a butcher?

Assad visiting a church. Of course, in the midst of all the propaganda about sectarian violence in Syria, there is no mention in the Western media about how Assad is the only one who protects all religious and ethnic minorities within Syria.

There are people who insist that any and all action is necessary to stop Assad from killing his own people, but is it true that he is a genocidal maniac? Before all else, we must understand that this is a civil war, and civil wars usually have a much higher civilian deaths from collateral damages than other types of wars. The US, more than anyone else, should know how difficult it is to prevent civilian casualties since they've killed hundreds of thousands of civilians in Afghanistan, Pakistan, Iraq, and Yemen.

Heck, just few weeks ago, an American airstrike killed 200 civilians in Mosul. In comparison, as the battle for Aleppo was coming to a close, the Syrian government forces allowed the Jihadists and their family to evacuate safely instead of finishing them off. There's no reason to believe that Assad deliberately kills civilians like the so-called rebels like to do. So, if Assad is a butcher, then so is America and the terrorists they support, and tens time more so.

When the West is joining forces with Islamic terrorists to destroy your country, you have no one else to turn to but your leader.

Besides, if Assad is so horrible, why is it that the overwhelming majority of Syrians support him? Even a NATO study few years ago revealed that Syrians' support for their president saw a sharp increase with the war at 70% while only 10% supported the rebels. This is because the people of Syria know that the only other alternative to Assad is the complete destruction of their country and watching Islamic extremists takeover their lands.

5. The US strike helped ISIS

Note how the ISIS force that launched the attack were the ones closest to the bombed airbase.

It should be noted that the airbase that was bombed by Trump was specifically the one fighting against ISIS. Without missing a beat, the ISIS troops in the same area launched an offensive even before the smoke from the Tomahawk missiles started to clear.

Also, the strike on Syrian airbase was also not the first time the US targeted Syrian government forces. Last September, American airforce bombed 62 Syrian soldiers to death in Deir ez-Zor in an apparent "error," allowing ISIS to later launch an offensive that would split the besieged city in half. Would the US ever tolerate such "error" if it was done by Iran or North Korea?

6. Who’s happy with the strike?

Jihadists celebrating the bombing of Syrian airbase the next day.

It’s quite telling who celebrated the bombing of the Syrian airbase: the Neocons, Democrats like Hillary and Nancy Pelosi, other globalist leaders like Merkel and Hollande, autocratic Sunni states like Turkey and Saudi Arabia, and of course, the various Islamist factions within Syria. And along with the globalists and the Jihadists, no one is happier than Netanyahu who’s been calling for the US to do more to destroy Syria and Iran for Israel’s own interests. It should be noted that this is the same Israel that’s been helping out the Islamic militants fighting in Syria. Yes, the country that’s been crying about being a victim of Islamic terrorism for decades is now supporting them in Syria.

7. This strike signals a new approach by the Military Complex

The US government and its military lost all credibility when they lied about WMD prior to the invasion of Iraq. Knowing this, it seems that they have now adopted a new approach to military actions by bombing first and justifying it later (or not). They know that spending too much time trying to get the public on their side will only lead to growing opposition, so it appears they have decided to take swift action while the supposed chemical attack was still fresh in people's minds. And unlike Obama who at least sought the approval of Congress back in 2013, Trump ordered the attack without any approval, making his action illegal. All American citizens should be concerned that their government can decide to start a major war at will without their consent.

8. Steve Bannon and Jared Kushner

Just before the missile strike, there seemed to have been a drama between Steve Bannon and Jared Kushner with the former arguing that a strike against Syria would be a deviation from 'America First' principle while the (((latter))) was in favor of it, eventually convincing Trump that it was the right decision. It's also telling that Bannon was removed from Trump's National Security Council just couple of days before the strike. Is this a sign of complete globalist takeover of Trump's cabinet?

9. So why did Trump order the attack?

Interesting analysis…

Trump's poll numbers:

Embroiled in the Russian connection scandal, failing to follow through with his big promises, and his support starting to get shaky, it's likely that Trump needed a distraction that would take the public attention away from domestic affairs. The chemical attack incident provided him with just that chance, while also enabling him to prove that he will be tough on the international stage (unlike Obama).

The other, more simpler—but disturbing—explanation is that Trump was trolled into taking immediate military action by the establishment and the same fake news media he's been raging against. Many Trump supporters believed him when he had said during the election campaign that the US should no longer police the world. It was seen as a sign that the US would avoid getting tangled in foreign conflicts to focus on building America, which is what many Americans saw as a better alternative to the hawkish Hillary Clinton who seemingly wanted an all-out confrontation with Russia.

But it's now clear that Trump will do whatever he feels is right in the moment and change his position as he sees fit. Watching this statement of his right after the bombing, it's clear that he either has no idea what he's talking about or he's lying through his teeth:

Either way, one thing is clear: Trump has been compromised by the globalists. He is either impulsive and easily influenced by those within his circle or he's no different from the previous presidents who's been playing along with the agenda of the military-industrial complex.

10. What to expect

The bear's been poked enough times…

Now, this is the important part: What now?

Putin has already made it very clear that he stands against the (((globalists))) when he told Israeli PM back in March that Russia has no interest in turning their back against their ally, Iran. Russia is now the primary target of the US led globalist forces and Syria is just one battlefield. On that note, Secretary of State Rex Tillerson will be visiting Russia in the coming days and my guess is that he'll try to negotiate with Russians into to withdraw its support for Syria in a deal that might include lifting of sanctions and accepting Russia's claim over Crimea. But both out of honor and the recognition that the globalists will not stop at Syria, Russia is unlikely to throw their ally under the bus just to buy time and save themselves.

As a response to the strike on the airbase, Russia has suspended military communication line with the US in Syria and has sent warships with advanced anti-air capability to the area. And together with Iran—a country that knows that they're next in line for destruction—Russia has expressed that they will continue with their military support for Syria. This is not the first time Russia has been provoked by the US and its allies and we can be sure that they no longer trust Trump to be any different from his predecessors. Both Russia and Iran has now made it very clear that any further attack will be responded with force.

And while many Trump supporters are claiming that this was just a demonstration of strength or some sophisticated maneuver that will not escalate beyond show, the actions and rhetoric just don't match the speculation. For example, the US ambassador to the UN, Nikki Haley has stated that Assad's removal is now the priority of Washington. Rex Tillerson, too, has stated in an interview after the airbase bombing that a coalition was being formed to oust Assad. And any Americans horrified by the idea of having American boots on Syria should know that there already are American boots on the grounds of Syria (illegally, without invitation) operating since last year. At this point, it is all up to the Americans to decide whether they are willing to escalate the conflict by targeting Assad, and directly confronting Russia and Iran in the process.

Conclusion

Although the overall situation has gotten severe with the prospect of a global war inching towards reality, I was encouraged that many Trump supporters spoke out against the bombing. Although I doubt that Trump cares about his supporters' thoughts and opinions more than that of his own daughter's, I do believe that his support base has the power to give him second thoughts about escalating the conflict any further if they were to make their opposition loud and clear in large numbers. But if Trump ignore those who voted for him and turns out to be just another Neocon-Zionist-globalist stooge, he just might accomplish what no other president has ever done: unite the Left and the Right against the elites.

Read More: Congresswoman Tulsi Gabbard's Syria Trip Causes Neocon Fits Of Hysteria

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

5 Ways To Become More Persuasive

April 10, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

My first real foray into the world of sales, selling, and persuasion (outside of game) came a few years ago at a seminar from one of the most successful real estate salesmen in the world, Craig Proctor. One thing that was made very clear at the start of the event was that if you're in any kind of business for yourself, you are also a marketer. This is non-negotiable. So I devoted myself to learning the tricks of the trade.

After some time of trial and error, I've learned a few things about using language to persuade.

1. Pace Before You Lead

One of the biggest mistakes a lot of people make is coming on too strong. Unless your prospect needs what you're offering quickly, this isn't likely to go over well. We all know this from game, but it's true in sales also. A relationship of trust and likability is integral to persuasion and beginning your push too quickly doesn't allow you to establish that. The best book I ever read about persuasion, Unlimited Selling Power, shows in detail how to build trust and rapport fast. One of the most powerful and simple ways is through pacing and leading.

People trust people that are like them. People also can't resist themselves or their own actions. Arguing that someone is wrong rarely persuades them that you're right, but reframe something through that person's lens and suddenly it becomes a lot more persuasive. This is the psychological underpinning of pacing and leading.

When you pace and lead, you mirror your prospect. You speak his language. You share his values. If you're persuading in person, you might even try to mirror his body language or breathing patterns. Yet, the simplest way to do this is to say things that are impossible to disagree with.

Start your conversation by talking about things that are undeniably true and guards come down. You've gotten your prospect used to agreeing with you.

From here, you can begin to "lead" your prospect, or "pick up the pace" as Unlimited Selling Power calls it. It's from here that you begin to make your suggestions and lead the sale along. Now that trust and rapport have been established, your prospect is far warmer to your leads. The authors of Unlimited Selling Power studied the most successful salespeople and orators in politics for years before writing the book, and found that they all used forms of pacing and leading. In March, I implemented this on the lead-in page to my book on my blog. Sales increased significantly. I'm not sure if this was precisely the reason, but it's peaks apart from the previous copy on the page.

2. Provide A Reason

Astute readers will also recognize this as being the narcissist's mirror from The 48 Laws of Power

There's a funny thing about the word "because." If any word can be described as a magical one, "because" is it. Web Copy that Sells, written by Maria Veloso, one of the most successful web copywriters in the world, describes at length the psychological phenomenon of people loving to have a reason for doing something, even if that reason makes no sense.

"Because" is the shortcut word for a reason why. One notorious study famously found that people would let their co-workers cut in front of them in line at the Xerox machine "because they needed to make copies." The breakthrough finding of this is that people will do things for a fake reason far in excess over no reason given at all.

So embed in your sales (or frankly seduction) pitch one reason, any reason, for your prospect to take further action, and the easiest word to use this with is "because."

You can also use this with yourself. If you find yourself unfocused for instance, try using the word "because" to hack your own brain into doing what you should be doing instead of more frivolous pursuits.

3. Use Presuppositions

Another trick I learned from Web Copy that Sells. This is a great way to command action without ever looking like you're being overbearing. It's also a great way to lead your prospect without looking pushy. I've used this extensively in my email signup forms, and conversions increased rapidly after I implemented it.

For instance, to promote a free ebook, my signup form asks the question "what will you do with your new power?" The hook here is the assumption that the prospect will have new power, and the body copy is the lead in following that question.

Asking these questions can go a long way to increasing your conversion rate. They are especially potent in building a large email list.

4. Use Action Words

Action words flow better and are more easily comprehensible than passive voices. They also, to quote Unlimited Selling Power, make your prospect an active participant in the sales pitch rather than a passive observer. For instance:

> Notice the difference between the first sentence and this passive equivalent:

> “Does this make sense to you?’ This passive sentence fails to deeply involve the client. Compare the third sentence with its more passive equivalent: “Can you make a decision today?’ When you use passively-worded sentences, you get minimal customer involvement and you risk boring your prospect. Pace the customer with action words to call him or her into action!

Contrast Donald Trump’s slogan, “make America great again” to Hillary Clinton’s “stronger together.”

There are many reasons why MAGA was a much more powerful slogan, and this was one of them. “Make” is a call to action, a call to be a participant. “Stronger together” is entirely passive. It was telling of the basic psychology of the Clinton campaign from its start – “I’m with her.” It was all about her.

Hillary Clinton should’ve known this before running, but no one ever accused her of being good with people.

Unlimited Selling Power continues:

> There are literally thousands of action words in the English language. When you analyze the speeches of powerful orators such as Ronald Reagan or Reverend Robert Schuller, you will see that they use these action-based words much more frequently than less-successful politicians and less-successful religious leaders. To acquire the power of great speakers, use the same verbal techniques they utilize.

Powerful persuaders create a team and then involve everyone as a participant in that team with action words. My favorite example was the famous speech in Henry V. Even if it probably wasn’t real, it was a fantastic piece of perfect oratory. Henry created an in-group, then called it to action with the appropriate words, then referred to it in the past tense, presupposing that great action had already taken place.

That’s some powerful stuff.

5. Beware The Zeigarnik Effect (And Potentially Use It)

I haven't tried this one out very much to date, but I am looking into it.

The Zeigarnik Effect is the phenomenon that human beings tend to put greater weight on uncompleted tasks than on completed ones. They stick out like a sore thumb. This means that during your sales pitch, you should take heed to minimize any distractions that might call for action other than yours. For instance, if you have a lead-in page, eliminate anything that can beckon your reader's attention elsewhere.

You can also use this to end your own procrastination. Starting a task will make you more likely to complete it.

There is also the possibility of using the Zeigarnik Effect "offensively." Give your prospect something to complete mentally, continue on, then get back to it at the end of your sales pitch. Say, for instance, you have to settle for a phone number with a girl. Having her start a task, then pitching that you have some surprise in store later related to its completion could potentially make her less likely to flake. However, I haven't tested this yet, so it's just speculation for now.

If any of you have tested something like this, I'd love to hear from you.

Read More: How I Launch My Books For Amazon And Direct Sales

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

The Fascinating Linguistic Journey Of J.R.R. Tolkien

April 10, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

We have often discussed language-related subjects here. Readers interested in language acquisition may find it beneficial to hear something about the language ideas of one of the twentieth century's most influential fiction authors, J.R.R. Tolkien. Everyone knows him as a founder (perhaps the founder) of modern fantasy writing; few, however, are aware of the depth and breadth of his linguistic knowledge. Tolkien himself once said that he considered his books as little more than vehicles for the expression of his language interests: meaning that for him language was far more important than storytelling.

He did not really develop a "complete" theory of language in the conventional sense. What we know of his ideas comes through in his interviews, lectures, and articles. But there is enough left behind for us to summarize some major points and draw some conclusions. Before we get into these details, we should review a bit of his background.

Tolkien was born in 1892 and showed a facility for language acquisition at an early age. He tried his hand at creating fictional languages several times, learned Esperanto (a popular pursuit at the turn of the century), and learned several real ones. He graduated from Exeter College, Oxford, in 1915 with a degree in English language and literature; he was particularly enamored with Old English, or Anglo-Saxon. The first world war intervened, but he was able to escape the meat grinder unscathed, and was demobilized in 1920.

He immediately returned to his philological and literary pursuits, perhaps grateful that the Reaper had spared him. He soon produced a wonderful and quite influential translation of Beowulf which has remained a vital text in Anglo-Saxon studies. It must be remembered that in Tolkien's day the poem was still looked upon as a quaint but immature product of a primitive past. Tolkien, using his knowledge of Old English, was able to demonstrate that the work was actually a sophisticated literary work, deserving of serious study. No one had really tried to argue this before, and Tolkien's contributions to this field soon became legendary.

In his spare time, when he was not lecturing or doing research, he worked on his fictional stories. His active and probing mind could not remain idle for long; he always needed to be working on some linguistic puzzle. Two foreign languages captivated his mind: Welsh and Finnish. Readers who have some knowledge of these languages may discern, here and there, their substratal influence in his "Middle-Earth" books. Tolkien spent considerable time inventing fictional languages as part of his fantasy stories. We should note that these were not just a few sentences tossed together, but logically consistent and grammatically expanded structures.

But with so many real languages to be learned or studied, why would a man like Tolkien devote so much time and effort to inventing fictional ones? To answer this question, we must appreciate the fact that some people enjoy puzzles and cryptograms for their own sake. For this kind of mind, the reward is simply the joy of creating and designing, just as the artist gets joy out of sculpting from a lump of inert clay. I personally would never bother with such an exercise, since time is precious and for me is better spent with real languages.

But I do recognize that such fictional pursuits have real value: there is no better way to know how an engine works than by building your own. On an airplane flight recently I had a chance to see the recent film “Arrival,” directed by Denis Villenueve. In the movie, a linguistics professor, along with some other specialists, is asked to try to decipher the alien speech of some extraterrestrial visitors. As I watched the film, it became apparent to me that someone who had played with synthetic languages would be well-suited to this task. The exercise is also useful for behavioral analysis, code-breaking, psychology, and speech therapy.

Tolkien’s ideas on language “creation” are worth noting:

1. Language creators should focus on words and phrases that sound beautiful. This idea, called phonoaesthetics, Tolkien believed was deeply embedded in real languages and should be reproduced in fictional ones.
2. Rules of grammar and construction need to go hand-in-hand with the creation of the synthetic languages. Such rules need to be logical and consistent.
3. Fictional languages should (or might) create a mythos around them. That is, such languages could inherently generate their own mythologies and cultural accoutrements.

But what were his thoughts on real languages? Some of these ideas are discussed in a famous lecture he delivered on English and Welsh. It is here that Tolkien departs from the conventional wisdom of our own day, and for this reason alone his ideas are worth reflecting on. Our conventional wisdom today commands that a person should learn a language that affords him “practical” benefits for commerce, travel, trade, or what not. Under this view, perceived practicality trumps all else.

But Tolkien dissented from this view. As he saw it, the first guiding principle of language learning should be passion. In other words, a person should choose a language with absolutely no regard for its “practical” value; he should choose it for its own sake. Since learning a new tongue was a huge amount of effort, the only way a person would be able to sustain himself through the grind would be through the assistance of love.

So for Tolkien, love trumped practicality. It is easy to scoff at this idea, but the more one thinks about it, the more one realizes that he has a point. Learning a new language is a tremendous undertaking; and to embark on it for utilitarian reasons alone means that for most people it will be quickly abandoned once the going becomes tough. The passionate lover, however, is not so easily deterred. He will stick with his stubborn mistress though thick and thin, because he is following the desires of his innermost heart.

The debate between practicality versus personal interest is an unending one, and will not be settled here; but we should at least recognize that Tolkien has something important to add to the debate on language acquisition.

Read More: The Dangers Of Romantic Love

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

The Death Of Western Culture

April 10, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A healthy culture allows people to create families, pursue prosperity, and experience fulfillment. A culture that is in the process of collapsing promotes sterility, hedonism, materialism, degeneracy, and mental insanity. In this podcast, I trace the seven steps of how a culture can decline, applying each step to what we see in the Western world. Because it's so difficult to reverse a culture's descent into sterility, our best option is to identity seeds of resistance and allow them to grow into a new healthy culture that brushes the broken culture aside.

If you're enjoying my podcasts and getting value from it, consider making a donation. Click here to learn more about donating.

Listen on Soundcloud or download the MP3:

Listen on Youtube:

Subscribe on iTunes or add the RSS feed to your favorite podcast app. If you like the podcast, please leave a rating and review on iTunes.

Previous Podcast: The Girls Of Poland And Ukraine

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Has Trump Been Bamboozled By The Neocons?

April 11, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

By now you are aware that on April 4th a gas attack took place, purportedly launched by Syrian president Bashar Assad. Gruesome pictures and videos of dead children were played non-stop by the US media. Two days later, Trump launched 59 Tomahawk missiles against Syrian military positions in retaliation for the attack.

The military response came as a shock to Trump supporters as it was a direct repudiation of Trump's previous position of putting American interests before those of other countries. It was even a reversal of a position that Trump had taken just a few days before. Was his decision the result of deep strategic thinking or is it an indication that the neocon deep state has managed to trick Trump to achieving their goals?

Trump's old position on neocon wars

After the September 11 terrorist attacks, the US embarked on a series of long wars in the Middle East. The charge to invade Iraq was led by a group of war hawks called neoconservatives. Their theory was that the reason Islamic terror exists is because Muslim countries are led by dictators. If only Muslims had an opportunity to embrace liberal democracy and capitalism, they would stop raging and become peaceful consumers.

In hindsight we know things didn't play out that way. Our interventions turned out to be costly boondoggles that sent the dollars of hardworking American tax payers to rebuild countries we had destroyed. We found out that the inhabitants of the countries we invaded and destabilized were not interested in our "gift" of liberal democracy. The order of those nations broke down resulting in chaos. The dictators were not replaced by constitutional republics but by jihadists.

Before last week, Trump was consistently against military interventions where the US interests were minimal. He opposed the Iraq War and he was strongly opposed to intervention in Syria as the tweets above show.

What turned Trump?

What would turn a man who has opposed unnecessary military interventions for the better part of 20 years? Some accounts have Trump being swayed by his daughter Ivanka. She tweeted, "Heartbroken and outraged by the images coming out of Syria following the atrocious chemical attack." Trump authorized the missile strike less than 24 hours after that tweet.

But I'd like to think that a man of Trump's caliber would not be swayed by his 35 year old daughter's reaction to some sad photos. Other accounts posit a 4-dimensional chess theory. They argue that Trump is several steps ahead of everyone in strategy. One of the proponents of the 4D chess, Scott Adams, argues that Trump killed multiple birds with his Syria attack, including the silencing of the "Trump is in league with the Russians" faction in Washington. Another explanation came from Ivan Throne who suggested that the Syria strike was Trump putting into effect the fundamental principle that regime change requires military validation.

While I hope that these rationales for Trump's actions turn out to be true, I fear the reality is more disconcerting. Is it possible that the neocon-run deep state has tricked him into jettisoning his isolationist views and adopt the interventionist military policies of George W. Bush and Hillary Clinton?

The evidence points in that direction. A New York Magazine article sheds light on a battle that has been raging between the nationalist Steve Bannon, who opposes military escapades that do not advance Trump's "America First" agenda, and Jared Kushner, Ivanka Trump's husband, who favors a more conventional, neocon approach. All signs point to Bannon being the loser in this power struggle. He was removed from his role on the National Security Council while Kushner seems to have his hand in everything from orchestrating relations with China to inspecting US troops in Iraq.

On Saturday night, Mike Cernovich added a new wrinkle: His sources are reporting that Trump's National Security Council Adviser General McMaster has been manipulating intelligence reports to convince the president to start a ground war to depose Assad. If Cernovich's source is correct, both Kushner and Bannon opposed the strike. McMaster's role introduces another potential beneficiary of a war between the US and Syria: The Military Industrial Complex that President Eisenhower warned us against. War means that profit levels will be high for military contractors.

What do the neoconservatives want?

Neocon Bill Kristol was pretty pleased that McMaster was chosen—This should have served as a warning.

But what is motivating the war hawks? Syria poses no threat to the US but it does pose a threat to two US allies in the region: Israel and Saudi Arabia. Although they are unlikely friends, the current interests of these two countries are the same. Israel wants to get rid of Assad because he supports Hezbollah in Lebanon. The Saudis want to get rid of Assad because he is aligned with their sectarian enemy, Iran. Both Israel and Saudi Arabia play a big role in US foreign policy through lobbying dollars. Saudi Arabia also leverages its status as the world's largest oil producer. Israel, on the other had, has an advantage Saudi Arabia does not—it's interests are advanced by the many neocons within the US government.

The mission of the neocons is to carve out a Sunni state out of parts of Iraq and Syria. This would benefit both Israel and the Saudis by countering the influence of Iran. Neocon Max Boot writes:

> In Iraq, Sunnis need to be offered a Sunni regional government, akin to the Kurdish regional government, with its autonomy protected by its own militia and ultimately guaranteed by the United States. If Baghdad won't go along, the U.S. should bypass Baghdad and directly arm and train the Sunni tribes. In Syria, Sunnis need to be offered a future in which they won't be terrorized by Assad and > Shiite militias.

Of course, Boot tries to sell intervention in Syria (and Iraq) as a way of stopping ISIS, but he is well aware that toppling Assad will more than likely result in jihadists rushing in to fill the void just as they did after the fall of Hussein in Iraq and Kaddafi in Libya. Given that ISIS is the strongest Sunni force in the region, getting rid of Assad will almost certainly result in ISIS taking control of Syria. The neocons will not care because it is in Israel's interest to depose an enemy and replace him with chaos. A country engaged in civil war will pose no threat to Israel.

Conclusion

Israel and Saudi Arabia are free to pursue their own interests but if they want to rearrange their backyard, they should do it together and stop relying on American men to do their dirty work. It is an injustice that American soldiers have lost their lives and limbs fighting in the desert while Israelis soak up the sun on a Tel Aviv beach or Saudis party with Instagram girls in Dubai.

As for Trump, it is possible that he is executing a brilliant strategic plan that the 4D chess theorists posit. But as Occam's razor would have it, the simplest explanation is usually the correct one. It is more likely that Trump has been bamboozled by the McMaster and the other neocons in his cabinet.

Read More: Donald Trump Orders Launch Of 59 Tomahawk Missiles Against Syria

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Your Internet Friends Can't Duplicate Real-Life Human Connection

April 11, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Most of the knowledge you have is due to the internet. Public education in the West has failed to give you a proper understanding of the world or skills that would be useful for navigating through life, forcing you to educate yourself at your own pace and on your own terms. Through that, you have created bonds with other men in ad-hoc communities online. While the knowledge you have will be forever useful to you, the communities that sprout from these knowledge centers pale in comparison to real communities of the past. We can instantly access the minds of men through the internet, but we're losing the ability to connect with them in person.

I came to understand how pervasive the internet is in my life when I imagined it going offline. What would happen if there were no more web pages, social networking, connected smartphones, or video-on-demand? Back to the "stone age" of programmed television and paper books. Perhaps more severe is that I'd lose touch with nearly every man I know. Outside of a couple dozen men whose phone numbers I have, my social world would collapse, and it would only be replaced by men who live in my city. No more trading advice, knowledge, and tips with men halfway around the world on a daily basis.

If the internet went offline, which thought leader would I follow to make me feel like I'm gaining critical value? How would I participate in online activism and meme wars with fellow e-warriors? How would I bathe in the glory of liberal tears with my online friends after angering feminists with a viral article? Where would I share a crazy piece of news with hundreds of men who share a similar belief system as I do? An audience of potentially tens of thousands would be reduced to three or four in my town, and it's this realization that tells me it's not friendships I'm developing online as much as the gratification that I'm a somebody who is making a difference, when really I'm just a communications node, a replaceable unit in a messenger chain.

I have used an app called Periscope, which allows me to broadcast live video from my smartphone. The biggest broadcast I've done had over 1,000 simultaneous viewers. Here's what a room of 1,000 people look like.

During that broadcast, I was in my room, alone, talking at an screen to a faceless mass of people who I couldn't see or touch. There was no genuine human connection, and if I wanted it at that moment, I would have found it easier to knock on my neighbor's door, a man who I've seen but never properly met. If there was an external camera in the room filming me without sound, it would reveal a strange man talking to himself in front of a rectangle of plastic and glass.

Return Of Kings regularly gets 1 million unique visitors a month, a number that is greater than than the population of several dozen countries, but I don't know exactly who those people are, and if you told me there was a mistake in the statistics, and that the site actually receives 1 billion unique visitors a month, I can't fathom what difference that would make besides more advertising revenue.

No matter how many followers you have, how far your meme spreads, how many upvotes your comment gets, or how many pats on the back you get from the internet mob, you will remain deeply unsatisfied that these huge numbers—this powerful influence—is not human connection but merely a simulation of connection. Ultimately, you're interacting with pixels and avatars, mere representations of real community, but never real itself. I'll give you a million followers tomorrow, and within one month you will feel as disconnected as ever, because your true need is not a simulation of community but real community. A group of real friends in your town, who care about your safety and interests as deeply as you care about theirs, is worth more than millions of simulated friends, fans, or admirers on the internet.

Maintaining real communities and friends in person is hard. You can't just "log off" when you want. You can't shitpost or troll without repercussions. You have to sacrifice and accommodate to their needs. You have to be respectful to their feelings and particular insecurities, because you'd expect the same from them. One genuine friendship is harder to maintain than satisfying one thousand followers online where expectations and standards are lower, and where little is asked of you but to provide entertainment and sporadic insight.

The internet has given us much, but also made us reluctant to put in the work for real-life connections and to adapt to another person's flaws and weaknesses, but we must try. As a man who has amassed thousands of internet followers, it's the face-to-face interactions with those followers I love the most, because it transcends from the simulated to the real. Without them, I'm afraid I'd slowly lose my humanity in an online sea of a billions avatars that are human-like, but still far from it.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: Are We Living In A Computer Simulation?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Powerful Quotes From The Professor Who Stood Up Against Deranged Leftists

April 11, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

There's a man by the name of Jordan B. Peterson who everyone here should know of. He is currently a professor at the University of Toronto, one of the most liberal colleges on the face of the earth.

He's been the center of a controversy over the past year, due to his refusal to use the ridiculous "Xim/Xer" pronouns. The university board threatened to fire him, but he stood strong—and so far, it seems that he's won the battle. He's kept his job and students of his have proclaimed that he's changed their lives for the better.

But the impact of Dr. Peterson goes far deeper than most realize—his refusal to bend over to politically-correct leftist ideology has cemented his place as a leader in this new crusade against language-policing. Most importantly, however, he has given us hope.

I have watched countless hours of his lectures (they're all on YouTube), and I can say, without a doubt, that he is red-pilling the new generation. For every student that he un-brainwashes, a small, yet integral battle has been won in this massive culture war.

I was first exposed to him on Joe Rogan's podcast, the Joe Rogan Experience #877, and was completely blown away, not only by his profound knowledge of psychology, culture, and spirituality, but by his incredible command of the English language, and his ability to communicate complex ideas.

If you haven't watched the interview already, I highly urge you to do so—it's nearly 3 hours long, and every single one of these quotes will be pulled from this masterpiece. Here we go:

1. How Things Get To Terrible Places

> "Things get to terrible places, one tiny step at a time. If I encroach on you, and I'm sophisticated about it, I'm going to encroach 2 millimeters. I'm going to encroach right to the point where you start to protest, then I'm going to stop. Then I'm going to wait. Then you're going to calm down. Then I'm going to encroach again, right to the point where you protest, then I'm going to stop. Then I'm going to wait..and I'm just going to keep doing this, and before you know it, you're going to be back 3 miles from where you started."

This is, in its essence, how the left operates, and it's why Dr. Peterson has decided to take a stand against the encroachment of their language policing. He understands that terrible things do not happen over night—they take years to happen, but like slowly boiling a frog in a pot of water, by the time people wake up, it's too late.

First it's "hate speech," because nobody wants to be mean, right? Then it's calling people by their made up pronouns, because you don't want to be mean, right? Then, before you know it, you can't even critique the "Religion of Peace," even if they're bombing your bloody city.

This is how the left operates, and we must understand this—men need to take a stand, and stop acting like little bitches. Who cares if people call you mean names? Do you have any idea how much WORSE the alternative is? The alternative is we live in an Orwellian nightmare, where every thought is subject to censorship and imprisonment, and we desperately do not want this to happen.

2. Religion As The Foundation Of Society

> "Even the fundamentalists have the wrong idea about religious truth. Religious truth is not scientific truth. The stories in Genesis, which are very old stories, maybe tens of thousands of years old—they're obviously not scientific theories, because the people who wrote them weren't scientists…these stories, they come up everywhere, there's no avoiding them, and it's because they're true, but they're not true like scientific truths. They're a behavioral truth, or a pragmatic truth, or a dramatic truth—and part of the reason why our society is so damn unstable now, and part of the reason why all of this weird chaos is emerging…this is a consequence of Nietzsche's observation back in the late 1800's about the death of God. We blew the metaphysical foundations out from underneath our culture, and the whole thing is shaking and twisting."

As a philosophy major, and a well-educated one at that, nothing irritates me more than these pseudo-intellectuals who try to attack religion as if they're an 8th grader who just discovered Richard Dawkins.

The damn fools treat religion as if it's some sort of scientific truth, but it's not. Rather, it's a collection of stories that resonate on a deeply profound level—stories that transcend culture and time, and that speak to us on the level of the soul, or the collective unconscious.

This is why you see the same damn stories appear, everywhere you go—the evil snake, the redemptive phoenix, going down into the underworld…they're all archetypes that portray critical aspects of the human experience, similar to the Hero's Journey of Modern Men.

The reason why we're experiencing such an incredible amount of chaos and insanity nowadays, is because the foundations of our culture have been blown to smithereens. Previously the church taught us culture—it taught us morals, it taught us the value of family life, it taught us how to act, and what virtues to aspire towards. It gave meaning to a meaningless existence.

But now? Religion has been replaced with "critical theory," the dangerous Marxist tenet that everything is equal and that no truth is objective… and we're paying the price for it.

3. Why People Buy Into Leftist Ideology

> "The advantage to me being an ideologue, is that I can explain everything, I can feel morally superior, and I know who my enemies are…ideologies give you a one bit answer to everything. Why do men and women's salaries differ? Oppression—it's always the same thing, and it makes you feel like you know something, and people like that. They don't like the feeling that there's something they don't know."

As any man of ROK knows, education is a lifelong process. It is not something that you can attain by simply reading a book and watching a few documentaries—finding the truth, or building a "high resolution map," of reality, as Jordan B. Peterson calls it, takes an incredible amount of time and effort.

This is why leftist ideology is so attractive to the uneducated… they don't want to think that they're uneducated! They don't want to actually do the work, and read the books, and pour through the statistics, they'd rather have a drastically over-simplified answer to EVERYTHING, because it saves them time and effort.

Why are more men in power? Oppression. Why do African Americans commit crime at a rate that's 25x higher than Caucasians? Racism. Why do women earn less than men? Sexism.

Discovering the truth is an incredibly difficult process. Hell, I've read more profound, life-changing books than probably 95% of people out there, and I still don't feel like I have a good grasp on the vast majority of issues. Leftists don't like that, though.

At the root of their ideology is arrogance—they want to believe that they know everything, and can explain everything. Leftism is, therefore, a pathological disorder more so than it is a political stance. It's an extremist, dogmatic ideology, rather than a logical opinion.

4. Colleges Are Saturated With Leftism

> "Even with the free speech debate that the University of Toronto hosted…they did 3 politically correct things during the debate. The University opened up by noting that the land on which we were having the debate was once property owned by the original Native Americans…the next thing that happened was they announced that there would be counselors waiting outside for anyone who was too traumatized by the contents of the discussion. They closed by announcing the trans day of remembrance…and the reason I'm pointing this out, is it just shows you that the fact that these things happened…that's how saturated the Universities are with this kind of thinking."

Anyone who's been to a college, or has been keeping up with Milo or Ben Shapiro's tours lately, is aware of just how saturated the Universities are with this type of thinking. I was recently at a relatively large college with 25,000 people on the East Coast, and I was stunned at how loaded the entire environment was.

Everywhere I went, there were propaganda posters about toxic masculinity, consensual sex is rape, white men are oppressing everyone…it's absolutely mind-boggling to me that more people haven't spoken up or dropped out altogether.

What's crazy too, is that the damn kooks in charge of things don't even realize what they're doing is insane—they're so used to living in their gated communities, studying in their ivory towers, and only associating with Leftists, that they actually think it's normal to view reality this way.

This is how delusional our so called "teachers," have become and, as Mr. Peterson, an ex-Harvard professor said, the Universities now do more harm than they do good.

Summary

I hope that the men of ROK have gleaned some gems of wisdom from this article—if you're interested, you can watch the whole interview above. I can personally think of no better way to spend your afternoon, than to listen to this podcast.

If you're interested in further supporting this man, which I highly urge you to do so that the left realizes what they're up against, you can subscribe to his YouTube channel or take one of his online self-improvement courses. I've personally taken his "Past Authoring," and "Future Authoring," courses, and found both to be highly elucidating.

All in all, there's a reason why people call leftism cancer—because it spreads and grows, unless you do something to stop it. It encroaches, step by step, inch by inch, until it's too late to be undone…and I hope, for the sake of the West, that it isn't too late to be undone.

Read More: Florida Medical Students To Receive Important Training In LGBT Pronouns

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

Valor Of Rhodesia’s Selous Scouts

April 11, 2017 | by Kiron Solari | Link | Original Link

The Rhodesian Bush War is among the most poorly documented conflicts of the 20th century. Not because of lousy record-keeping, but due to sheer amount of media lies and obfuscation surrounding it. The truth is buried under fake photos, fake stories, distortion and denial of facts due to how acutely politicized the conflict was. But like any other war, this one had its heroes. While all members of Rhodesian Security Forces deserve recognition for their bravery in facing overwhelming odds, I would like to tell you a tale of the most efficient counter-terrorist unit in the world—an example in tenacity and professionalism for men everywhere.

Welcome to Africa. Bring a rifle.

Contrary to popular opinion, the end of the colonial age has marked the decline of Africa. Unable to cope with the responsibilities that come with independence, nascent African countries were immediately consumed by tribal warfare, becoming blood-stained wastelands almost overnight. The UN alternated between maintaining silence and applauding atrocities committed by the natives as birth pangs of statehood. USSR and China quickly got involved, providing warlords with arms in exchange for political allegiance. Unsurprisingly, African Whites became the first targets of black “freedom fighters”: Belgians in Zaire were massacred en masse before they could meaningfully react, and Portuguese settlers could muster only feeble resistance.

The tide of blood met its first breaker in Ian Smith, Prime Minister of Rhodesia. Rhodesia was a rich agrarian nation inhabited by both blacks and Whites; while originally a British territory, it attained self-governance as early as 1923. After a split with what would later become Zambia, Southern Rhodesia petitioned Britain for sovereignty, but instead received an ultimatum: no independence before majority (black) rule. This meant giving unrestricted political power to terrorist leaders and UN darlings Robert Mugabe and Joshua Nkomo, essentially letting the country plunge into chaos. On November 11, 1965, Ian Smith declared a sovereign Republic of Rhodesia—appalling the UN and infuriating the Brits—as well as merciless war on Marxist terrorism.

A Cornered Tiger

Ian Smith, Prime Minister of Rhodesia

Unrecognized, surrounded by enemies and under a Western economic blockade, Rhodesia had very limited resources for war. Bush warfare is unlike any other, as most conventional tactics are useless; mobility, reconnaissance and rapid response are what counts. Thankfully, Rhodesian military was no stranger to this style of waging war.

While Rhodesian Light Infantry and Rhodesian African Rifles were quite efficient at hunting down terrorists invading from Zambia and Mozambique, they still proved an elusive enemy, blending in with the locals and recruiting them at gunpoint. Initially, Rhodesian SAS was used to deal with this problem, but Rhodesian command was displeased with how thin the unit was spreading itself, deciding instead to create a separate force that would prevent terrorist attacks rather than react to them.

This task was entrusted to General Peter Walls, who asked his old friend, a retired SAS veteran Ron Reid-Daly, for help. Together, they decided that the new unit would be a small infantry regiment recruited from lower ranks of RLI, RAR and SAS, possessing teamwork of the former two, survival skills of the latter and trained better than all of them combined. The regiment was named after Frederick Selous, a legendary hunter.

The Hatchlings

Membership in the Scouts was purely voluntary, although first recruits had no idea what they were signing up for. Volunteers were given one day's rations, rounded up, loaded into trucks and taken to Kariba Gorge. Some twenty-five kilometers away from the destination the trucks stopped, the recruits were kicked out and told to run the remaining distance without stopping. Two instructors in a car moved behind the group, disqualifying stragglers.

The boot camp itself was named Wafa Wafa Wasara Wasara ("Who dies – dies, who survives – remains" in Shona) and boasted only a few straw hovels. No food was provided to fatigued recruits, who had by that time consumed their rations. Immediately upon arrival, they were subjected to a session of intense physical training. Instructors deliberately found faults in their performance to punish them with more exercise, waiting for the hungry, angry and confused soldiers to lash out or collapse.

For the next five days, the future Scouts would be awakened before dawn and forced to exercise till 7 in the morning; this was followed by shooting practice in the bush. Recruits were taught to pay attention to objects in their firing zones – boulders, large roots, thick vegetation – and quickly fire short bursts at them to hit potential enemy hiding spots. This seemingly chaotic and wasteful fire was actually extremely effective in combat, and Scouts quickly reached sufficient automatism to strike several probable targets in quick succession without even looking at them.

The day was topped off by obstacle courses no sane man would even think of running. At night, the recruits were trained in navigation in utter darkness, silent movement and laying ambushes. In what little free time they had, they were expected to venture outside the camp and forage, as no food was provided still. Every day, the instructors encouraged the recruits to quit and return to their old regiments. Quite a few took the advice, unable to cope with the torture.

On the sixth day, the recruits were treated to a meal of boiled baboon in early stages of decomposition. According to Reid-Daly, "the smell alone was enough to make a hyena throw up", but soldiers devoured it without hesitation. While semi-rotten meat retains nutrients and is safe to consume if boiled properly, Reid-Daly knew that in the field, his recruits might face a choice between eating carrion or starving to death, so "if they know it's edible only in theory, they will never eat it". The first stage of training was thus passed, weeding out the weakest.

The Breaking

On the fifteenth day, recruits in full gear were split into small groups accompanied by instructors and given 30kg backpacks filled with stones. The stones were dyed an unnatural color and backpacks carefully weighed to prevent cheating. Would-be Scouts were then given three days to reach a rendezvous point located 100 kilometers away. The last 20 kilometers had to be covered in two and a half hours.

Kariba Gorge boasts abysmal terrain, afternoon heat that can cook eggs and abundance of tsetse flies—that's not counting mosquitoes, mopane bees that are attracted to sweat and plenty of dangerous predators. For the duration of the march, the recruits were given 125g of canned meat, 250g of maize flour and a small amount of water. It is hardly surprising that the march was nicknamed "highway to hell".

Reid-Daly always made sure to be present at the finish line. When laughing instructors emerged from tall grass to congratulate the exhausted recruits on becoming Selous Scouts, this was taken as yet another trick to make them give up. Red-faced, panting soldiers cursed and spat at the instructors, breaking into tears when realization of getting accepted finally dawned on them.

After three days of rest and a two-week lecture course on tracking and survival, the new Scouts were taken to a perfect copy of a terrorist camp, where actual terrorist turncoats instructed them in their languages, songs and mannerisms to make their infiltration absolute. Then the Scouts took a three-week course in parachuting. On average, the training took half a year.

Unorthodox Ways

Selous Scouts did not care much about regulations on materiel and decorum, preferring to wear, carry and use whatever worked best for them, including trophy weapons and gear.

Seeing as ZANLA, ZIPRA, FRELIMO and other terrorist groups preferred quantity over quality, Rhodesians responded with the opposite. Operating in groups of 5 to 10 men, the Scouts masterfully wielded fear and demoralization, essentially terrorizing the terrorists. If Danny Roxo pioneered this tactic, the Scouts wrote the book – bodies of their victims were almost exclusively found with expressions of extreme surprise and fear on their faces. Joining forces with "terrs" only to later turn guns on them was another day in the office. Marxist cannon fodder in Mozambique and Zambia could not catch a moment of sleep without nightmares about the Scouts.

The new unit was utilized to its fullest, both in solo operations and jointly with RLI and SAS. Selous Scouts embodied the "high risk, high reward" principle, taking up missions in "frozen" areas considered too dangerous for other regiments and emerging victorious. Imitate a FRELIMO officer to lead a gang of terrs into a pre-designated airstrike zone? Easy. Find and rescue a whole village of abductees who were taken beyond the border? No problem. Assist RLI from behind enemy lines in sieging a fortified terr camp? Piece of cake. Once, a Scout got separated from his team in a firefight. It took him 18 days to cross back into Rhodesia on foot, subsiding on whatever he could catch; upon returning, he called the ordeal "a minor bother".

While the vast majority of Rhodesia's population, both White and black, supported the incumbent government, terrorists still managed to find informants – mostly elders in border villages, recruited through bribes or coercion. Using mujibas (child spies), the elders kept an eye on suspicious movements nearby. The Scouts' cross-border sorties were frequent and their disguise was not perfect – a black soldier's unfamiliar accent or a hastily donned blackface with a tight cap to hide blonde hair could fool a tired sentry, but not the attentive eyes and ears of a mujiba.

A moment of carelessness could cost the Scouts dearly, but they had their ways of dealing with informants. The most common was to send black Scouts posing as terrs to publicly accuse an elder of working for the police, thus destroying his credibility. The more insidous tactic was to "accidentally" expose themselves as Scouts during a visit to the village; this was followed by dropping clues to whereabouts of their encampment or a large weapons cache in casual chat while loitering (with mujibas eavesdropping). Laughing at the Scouts' idiocy, the elder delivered valuable information to terrorists, unaware that he was leading them into a deathtrap.

Another interesting feature of the Scouts was "conversion" of terrorists to their cause, largely due to the fact that bushcraft came naturally to natives. A wounded and captured terr would be flown to a hospital where he got the best medical treatment and excellent food, creating stark contrast to stories about the evil mabunu (pejorative for Whites) that he was raised on. This was followed by visits from an already "converted" terr who told him about benefits of fighting for Rhodesia: good conditions and pay as well as safety for his family. The alternative – a gibbet – was also made known. As a final test, the ex-terr would get his weapons back and asked to lure his former friends into a Scout ambush. In case he turned on his new allies, he would discover that live ammo had been replaced with blanks.

Political Games

While Rhodesia suffered from economic sanctions unjustly imposed upon it by the West, South Africa held a large enough share of its foreign trade to keep the country running, while also providing it with military aid. However, at that time South Africa itself balanced on the verge of becoming a pariah state due to apartheid, so it helped Rhodesia secretly. Prime Minister Balthazar Vorster kept warning Ian Smith against escalating the conflict in order to avoid tempting Cubans in Angola into aiding Mugabe and his goons, thus creating another headache for the South African Defense Force. Vorster was also contemplating the words of U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who hinted at softening of American policy towards South Africa if its support for Rhodesia ended.

An unintended benefit of being an unrecognized country was not having to care about Geneva Conventions and rules of engagement. Even though Western press screeched day and night about atrocities committed by the Rhodesian military against "freedom fighters", Western leaders preferred not to intervene, as public opinion was overwhelmingly against them for essentially allying themselves with communists in order to throw a peaceful country to the wolves.

This allowed Selous Scouts to operate in ways that no "civilized" army would be caught dead using. Against enemies that left behind nothing but mutilated and violated bodies, there was no other choice. Still, there was one mission that ended in a complete PR nightmare, and despite the Scouts' triumph, its political consequences have essentially cost Rhodesia the war.

Operation Eland

Selous Scouts were tasked with destroying a large ZANLA/FRELIMO camp close to the Mozambican border that served as a staging ground for raids into Rhodesian territory. Located at the merging of two rivers, it had previously been visited by UN suits, who were fooled into thinking it was a refugee camp (terrs simply withdrew to nearby camps during the visit, leaving women and children behind), so the mission could not be tied to Rhodesia in any way. This meant no air support.

In the morning of August 10, an armored column of 72 Scouts in FRELIMO uniforms reached the camp. Recons sent forward discovered that the sizeable square in its middle was occupied by a mob of over 5000 terrorists, trying futilely to maintain formation. Astonished, the Scouts decided on a plan: the column splits, with one part encircling the camp and the other rolling right in, flashing high-ranking FRELIMO insignia and giving the mob a speech on traitors within their ranks. Those known to possess important intelligence would be called out, handcuffed and packed into vehicles. After that, the column would open fire.

The plan did not survive contact with reality, however. Terrorists reacted to arrival of their “commanders” by swarming the vehicles in a gleeful tide, yelling slogans and singing songs. All pretense of discipline was abandoned in an instant. The day was very sunny, and this allowed one terr who got too close to catch a flash of blue eyes from inside one of the vehicles – right above a twinned machine gun trained on the crowd. Screaming “Mabunu!” at the top of his voice, the terr reached for his weapon. The Scouts had no choice but to squeeze the triggers.

What followed was pure slaughter. Volleys hammered into the howling mob, mowing down dozens in an instant. After the initial shock, the terrs scattered, running towards riverbanks where they were met with more fire from the Scouts that had surrounded the camp. Driven to insanity by fear, terrs thrashed back and forth under a hail of bullets; some simply jumped into water, hoping to save themselves that way.

Curtain Falls

Tired Scouts after a successful sortie.

Operation Eland ended in total success: 1026 terrorists killed, over 2000 wounded, another 1000 drowned. The Scouts, who suffered no casualties, made a quiet exit. However, it was not long before journalists and the UN were all over the destroyed camp, shedding tears over the dead "refugees". Eager to pin the blame on someone, the press opted for their favorite whipping boys – South African commandos. The next day, newspapers around the world were brimming with stories about blonde, blue-eyed Afrikaner soldiers gunning down black women and children. In mere 24 hours, Balthazar Vorster became Public Enemy #1. Furious at Smith, he accepted Kissinger's proposition and cut aid to Rhodesia.

Rhodesia, now completely isolated, bravely fought on for four more years until Ian Smith was eventually forced to acquiesce to the Black majority rule. Kissinger, who eagerly meddled in Rhodesian affairs as well, made sure that Abel Muzorewa's moderate government was immediately toppled by that of Marxist terrorist Robert Mugabe. Vorster, of course, ended up used and cheated: the U.S. did not soften its treatment of South Africa one bit.

So ends the story of Rhodesia and Selous Scouts—real men among men.

Special thanks to Sergey "Tiomkin" Karamaev for providing data and historical context for this article.

Read More: An Unsung Hero: The Legend Of Danny Roxo

Kiron Solari
Kiron is a somber European man who devotes most of his time to making money, reading, working out and plotting revenge against the people who turned the world upside down.

5 Ways That Game Will Improve Your Life

April 12, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

There are two common misconceptions about game that come up time and again. The first is that game is simply a collection of cheap tricks, chat-up lines and 'negs' rather than an holistic set of self-development principles that includes—but is by no means limited to—advice on how to talk to girls. The second is that game is a waste of time and that those who engage in it are doing little more than subjugating themselves to already entitled women.

It probably comes as no surprise to you that I refute both of these positions strongly, but in this article I wanted to provide a slightly different perspective on game, namely that engaging in it will improve many key areas of your life as a natural side-effect alongside your success with women. To that end I discuss below five ways in which game has improved my life and will undoubtedly improve yours too.

1. Vastly Improved Confidence

Let's be completely honest for a moment: cold approaching women one has never met before in the street or in clubs and bars is perhaps one of the most nerve-wracking things a man can do. Fear of rejection is hardwired into us as in prehistoric times it could mean ostracization from the tribe or even death at the hands of a jealous alpha male.

While these eventualities are remote in 2017, the vestiges of our primordial terror remain. We've all heard stories of ex-military men, marines and the like who have faced incredible danger on the battlefield, but who nevertheless are daunted by the prospect of having to approach some skinny 23-year-old girl in Starbucks. So the struggle is real for all of us.

However, the upsides of this are enormous. If you are able to marshal your fear and approach anyway, then soon you will find that your confidence skyrockets. Not only are you doing something that perhaps 95% of the rest of the male population lacks the balls to do, but also you are exposing yourself to way more social situations than the average person.

As a result of this you will find that ordinary, everyday situations like socialising at a party or dealing with people generally will no longer faze you. After all, since you're doing something that would terrify the majority of your peers everything else is going to see pretty much easy in comparison. Certainly I personally find that after a good day game session there is really very little that can intimidate me in the rest of my social life.

2. Better storytelling ability

Let me tell you, if you go out into a busy city centre and stop 100 girls to talk to them you'd damn well better have something to say, either prepared or off the cuff. When you're standing there before her gaze like a rabbit in the headlights it's very easy to dry up and run out of conversational fuel. The great thing, though, is that if you approach regularly you will naturally get better at improvisation and storytelling, simply because you will have to.

The thing to understand about so-called storytelling in the context of game, business and socialising (and it is crucial for all three) is that you don't have to be JK Rowling or Steven King. No, storytelling in the context of regular social interactions really means making a very little go a very long way. So you can make a story about how you had to take some shirts back to the dry cleaners fascinating and suspenseful with enough skill and practice.

Storytelling ability is a wonderful ability to cultivate, since most social and business scenarios are energised by it. If you can tell a story engagingly and captivate your listener then you will be considered intelligent, creative, likable and interesting, all very much plus points in whatever sphere you're concentrating.

3. Improved business skills

Storytelling is only one of several key transferable business skills you will see improve if you get seriously into game. Because your confidence will improve you will also find that your public speaking will get immeasurably better. You will find recording podcasts or videos a lot easier. You will become naturally better with clients and suppliers.

If you are cold-approaching regularly and keeping a record of your progress you will have nurtured both discipline and accountability. You will have interacted with a large number of people which will mean your insights into current consumers will be improved. And you will likely be less phased by tough negotiations or having to deal with difficult people. As I said above, given how intimidating cold-approaching can be when you start, if you can do that then you can sure as hell handle a difficult customer or boss.

4. Sharper fashion and grooming

Many guys wonder if they should improve their dress sense, grooming and physique before they go out to approach girls. My advice is start approaching today and you will find that you will naturally begin to improve your overall look anyway. After all, how can you not? Once you start getting immediate, live feedback from the marketplace by interacting directly with your customers (girls) you will naturally want to improve your product (yourself) to the best of your ability.

When I started doing game many years ago I developed a whole new level of interest around my grooming, fashion and physique. After all, why wouldn't I? As someone who continually going up to new, sexy girls, it was absolutely in my best interests to ensure that I looked as sharp as possible at all times. This is an example of how the practice of game itself will naturally lead you to improve your standards in other areas.

5. A gateway to a whole new world of learning

In a related point to the above, getting into meeting and attracting girls opened up a whole new world of learning for me for which I will always be indebted.

Largely as a consequence of the emergence of the internet, which was developing in tandem with the modern study of game as we know it, men began sharing stories, tips, techniques and advice with one another online. In time, this advice broadened from simply being about girls to encompassing a huge range of topics that include weight training, nutrition, fashion, business, finance, politics and even philosophy. A great example of this is Return Of Kings itself, an institution which probably wouldn't have existed without the game movement but which now incorporates so much more.

Without a doubt my interest in game has meant that I have been exposed to wisdom shared by other men on a whole range of topics that has entirely changed the direction of my life, an incredible and unforeseen outcome.

In summary, you should by all means get into game because you have a strong desire to get good with women. That is a natural and laudable goal in itself. But realise that it is a path strewn with many other rich fruits and keep your eyes and your mind open. Game has significantly improved my life in a multitude of ways and it will yours too if you let it.

Want to find out more about how to get great at game? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter.

Read More: The One Girl You Absolutely Must Approach Every Day

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The Doctor Who Was Dragged Off The United Airlines Flight Reacted In The Worst Way Possible

April 12, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

It's very close to Easter and it seems that America needs a Christ-like martyr. He came this week in the form of a doctor "dragged" off a United Airlines flight before it departed Chicago for Louisville, Kentucky. In classic US airline style, the flight had been overbooked and United sought four volunteers to vacate their seats in favor of extra staff members. When these could not be found, the man and three others were asked to leave.

What ensued in the cabin was a complete farce. The Asian man claimed he was a doctor and that he needed to be at work the following morning. Whilst I would sympathize with him if he didn't have the past I will describe below, airlines can legally coerce randomly-selected passengers to leave overbooked planes. Before this happens, they typically try offering flight vouchers, hotel stays, and cold hard cash to secure volunteers. Even if through some technicality they did not have such a right this time, the man resisting Chicago Department of Aviation security officers was an incredibly dumb decision:

When the man refused to get up and walk off the plane, the officers intervened and pulled him from his seat. He had no intention of complying and positioned his body in such a way that he ended up bloodied, before being dragged off the plane. Bizarrely, he returned and started clinging to the cabin, asking if someone would "kill" him. The public reaction, as far as I can tell, has been overwhelmingly negative and vehemently against United Airlines and law enforcement. Yet more attention should be paid to the man's choice to go limp, exactly the sort of behavior that leads to physical pain.

The reasons behind his erratic behavior onboard also need to be explored. It turns out the man, David Dao, is a previously disbarred medical practitioner who nearly went to jail for giving prescription drugs to a man in return for gay sex. Some have suggested he is now only allowed to practice medicine sparingly, perhaps indicating why he was so desperate to stay in the cabin. It is hard to feel sympathy for a man who has acted like this during his professional history and then complains that a probably perfectly legal decision to remove him is "unfair." Had he not traded prescription drugs for sex and gotten into such disrepute, in all likelihood the ejection from the plane would have affected him minimally. I also question his state of mind and whether the level of inconvenience alleged is real.

Whatever your opinion on United's (or the authorities') handling of the matter, this man represents yet another person who decides to place themselves at a risk of injury and then complains when the likely or inevitable injury follows. Any grievance he had with the airline or the powers that be should have been followed up once he exited the plane. If an instruction you receive is unfair but apparently legal, deliberately injuring yourself by refusing to comply is immature and unnecessary.

A good way to illustrate the avoidable nature of this saga is by comparing it to scenarios where a passenger, whilst feeling a decision is unfair, respects it anyway. This anti-Trump woman may have behaved appallingly, but, to her credit, at least she eventually complied with both the airline staff and police and left the plane:

If everyone behaved like this when they didn't get their way on planes or at airports, the police and security would be occupied 24/7

Planes, airports, and airlines often cause massive inconveniences. I've been diverted to different continents or been burned by hot drinks, missing important meetings, assessment dates, and other deadlines (or having an area perilously close to my genitals seething with pain for hours). Time and again I have observed people overreacting to their own situations, including to the point of, like the man in the United video, inflicting injury on themselves by resisting officials. I may have been angry in my own circumstances, but never have I felt the desire to disobey legal commands from those who can enforce them or get others to.

There is no doubt that overbooking is a much more common phenomenon in the United States than Europe or Australia. I am far from a fan of any American airline and most of the time will simply refuse to fly with them. But the contracts through which airline tickets are bought explicitly give airlines the right to bump customers from flights. And again, even if the right to eject passengers from overbooked flights does not exist here, physical resistance only aggravates the circumstances.

For the sake of good customer relations and common courtesy, I agree that United should have bumped passengers before boarding took place. Nonetheless, this does not condone the man's resistance and the rather juvenile (mentally ill?) way he returned to the cabin. No airline in their right mind would allow a man saying "please kill me" to remain on an aircraft waiting to depart.

Some of the law enforcement taking him off were black and Hispanic

Allegations of "racism" have attached themselves to this airline incident. But from what I saw in the video, some security officers were black or Hispanic, indicating if any racism existed it would be minority-on-minority. With 30% of Americans being minorities, and an even higher percentage of tourists flying to and within America being minorities, the chances of a non-white being randomly bumped off a flight are probably around three or four in ten. If an Asian man being asked to leave an overbooked plane is the litmus test for racism, with zero evidence proffered that race was actually a factor, I have great concerns for how people will deal with such events in the future.

Another part of the problem is that the actions of police and security officers are viewed as “illegitimate” and “oppressive” far too often, encouraged by a biased media that takes one snippet of video from something like a police shooting and then generalizes an accusation across all manner of other unrelated incidents that take place later. When people refuse to follow instructions and physically resist, they and others see the case as one of martyrdom. “It’s unfair, I don’t like it, so I will not obey” is the mantra of many a person who could prevent their own victimization simply by backing off, complying, and seeking legal remedies through the appropriate channels afterwards.

Why didn’t other people—non-doctors—volunteer to leave?

If we assume that the reports of the man being a doctor who needed to perform surgery are true, why didn’t someone else volunteer to leave? People gladly whipped out their phones to record the spectacle and then virtue-signal online, but none seemingly had the foresight to realize that their own non-essential business could wait when United were calling for volunteers.

In addition to the man’s antics, his fellow passengers were not selfless enough to get out of their seats but suddenly became Good Samaritans when the chance to visually record things and speak to newspapers presented itself. I may believe that airline overbooking should be made illegal, but deciding to get yourself injured over it is nothing short of moronic.

Read More: Why Airlines Will Join The War On Fatties

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Ways To Find Out What Your True Passion Is

April 12, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

Motivational speakers and others like them often advise us to “follow our passion”, sometimes telling us to do so as a full-time vocation and sometimes just as a hobby. Indeed, such individuals routinely claim that we should do whatever we can to work toward our life’s main purpose and ultimate goal. And while for a man, the general purpose of life is the same as that of any other man—namely, to seek out truth, to strive for greatness, and to do our part for the maintenance of our family, our nation, and our civilization—it is also true that each of us, as individuals, do have particular gifts and capabilities which allow us to fulfill this general purpose in unique ways. So the idea of following our personal passion is a sound one. And indeed, great joy can be had when the activities that we perform on a daily basis are also the activities that we truly enjoy performing.

But while many people tell us to follow our passion, one thing that I have often found lacking is any advice concerning how to find out what our passion might be. And while, in most cases, a person’s passion is simply intuitively known to him, the fact remains that for some people—and perhaps especially for younger people still uncertain of their future—having a means to help determine what your passion is, would be a great asset. And having had some experience in this field, and also just in case you have not done so yet, let me thus offer you three strategies for finding your particular passion and purpose in life.

Strategy 1—Refusing A Billion Dollars

Is there something that you would be willing to refuse a billion dollars for? Then that 'thing' is your passion and purpose!

First, imagine an activity that you engage in for which you would be willing to forego a billion dollars. Indeed, imagine that someone was willing to offer you a billion dollars right now but to get it you had to completely stop doing a certain activity for the rest of your life, and you, loving that activity so much, would literally be willing to turn down a billion dollars just to keep doing that particular activity. Now, whatever that specific activity would be, it is most likely your life's passion, and so doing that activity is your purpose. For me, for example, my passion is apologetics and philosophy, and one of the ways that I realized this was when I came to understand that I would truly refuse even a billion dollars if it meant that I could never write on philosophy or apologetics again.

Now some might think this insane, but that is besides the point, for it is my passion, not yours. After all, I would consider it insane, for example, to refuse a billion dollars just so that I could keep practicing and playing music, and yet I think that there are a good number of people who love music so much that they would refuse even a billion dollars to keep playing. And so, whatever the answer might be, the "Billion-Dollar" test is one of the ways to help you find what your passion is.

Strategy 2—Death And Regret

At the end of your life, what is the one thing that you will truly reject not having done? That ‘thing’ is your passion and purpose!

For the second strategy, imagine that you have just been diagnosed with a fatal form of cancer; in fact, you are going to die tomorrow—morbid, I know, but death helps clarify one’s thinking. Now ask yourself: What is the one thing that you would really regret not accomplishing in life? I am not talking about spending more time with your family or visiting a country that you always wanted to visit; I am, rather, talking about what is the one task, linked as it is to a specific activity, that you would truly, genuinely, and primarily regret not having completed in your life at that point.

Again, whatever that task is and whatever activity it stems from, that is a good indication of where your passion is. And note that this particular “test” can work for you at any point in your life. Thus, even if you have accomplished a great deal of what you had previously taken to be your passion, this test can still help you determine what your current passion is going forward.

Strategy 3—Early to Rise

What is the one thing that you would be willing to seriously suffer for? That 'thing' is your passion and purpose!

Now, finally, imagine that you are in a situation where you have to work the entire day, at a job that you don't exactly enjoy (and pretend that, at this time, you have no family). In fact, for work, you have to rise at five in the morning and you work until you go to bed at ten in the evening. Thus, the only free time that you could even possibly have comes from sacrificing sleep, rising two hours early, and working on some personal activity from three in the morning until it is time to get ready for work at five. Now, in such a situation, is there any activity that you feel so strongly about doing that you would indeed get up and work on it from three in the morning until five?

If so, then again, that is a solid indication of where your fundamental interest in life lies. Truly, if you would really be willing to forego sleep and work on something from three in the morning until five, even though you had a full day of work ahead, then this would indeed be an indication of what activity your passion and purpose in life was. I, personally, would not be willing to get up so early to play video games or to practice cooking, but I would be willing to do so to write on apologetics and philosophy, and I have actually done so for real. Thus, again, this was a good indication of where my true passion was.

And so, the long and short of it is this: it is indeed valuable to pursue what you are passionate about, but to do that, you must first find out what you are genuinely passionate about, and the best way to do this is to imagine yourself—or even really place yourself—in situations where great sacrifice and suffering are involved in order to do a certain activity, and yet, even so, you determine to do the particular activity anyway. For if you are genuinely willing to make great sacrifices, and thus forego certain pleasures, in order to complete some activity that you simply cannot live without doing, then you will have found what your passion is and what your life purpose is too.

Read More: Should You Quit Your Job and Follow Your Passion?

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

9 Things That Geek Feminism Ruined

April 12, 2017 | by Ryan Ashville | Link | Original Link

From comics, movies, anime, gaming, and now the more recent kids shows, feminists will use any kind of tactic to promote their evil. Stories like Rapunzel or The Sleeping Beauty have been a part of our childhood, teaching us about gender roles and the importance of them. Now they have been changed in various ways to suit modern women, giving them unrealistic expectations of what they can be. Here are nine characters that show how they have infiltrated entertainment.

Steven Universe

The show deals with an entire species that is genderless but has feminine traits (female human forms), Steven is a male protagonist that is not masculine in a lot of ways. Rather than being the strong fighter type, he acts through femininity despite being male. He cries for help from women rather than helping himself. The show contains trans, queer and homosexual characters which is typical for a show like this. They have women of different sizes and has quite a dark story line for a show aimed for children. Cartoon Network is now giving a way for brainwashing, glorifying obese women and unhealthy diets.

They even place the emphasis on disguised leftist concepts like:

- Tolerance – Praising of everything non-white, non-male and non-heterosexual
- Minority – non-whites, non-male and degenerates
- Inclusiveness – Accepting everything non-white and degenerate
- Emancipation – Disregarding rules made by conservative males

But despite all these teachings, SJWs bullied a Steven Universe artist to attempt suicide because she drew Rose (an obese female character) too thin. Hypocritical? Yes. It certainly has one of the most cancerous fanbases, consisting of bronies and white knights.

Wonder Woman

> Not even girls want to be girls so long as our feminine archetype lacks force, strength, and power. Not wanting to be girls, they don't want to be tender, submissive, peace-loving as good women are. Women's strong qualities have become despised because of their weakness. The obvious remedy is to create a feminine character with all the strength of Superman plus all the allure of a good and beautiful woman."
>
> – William Moulton Marston, in a 1943 issue of The American Scholar.

Comics publisher Max Gaines asked him to create a new superhero for their comics, to fill the void he felt existed with something new. The creator knew that he wanted his hero to embrace love over violence, and to value peace over war. He assumed that women value love and peace. He valued independent, educated, and unconventional women.

Wonder Woman remains a feminist icon 75 years after her creation, because she symbolizes the idea of female domination. According to NY Post, Wonder Woman was not 'feminist' enough for Social Justice Warriors, because SJWs and feminists are never happy with anything in society until white men are silenced. Most wonder woman comics were terrible, but the media keeps pushing it on readers that they HAVE to give in.

BatGirl

Buffy the Vampire Slayer creator Joss Whedon is allegedly a woke male feminist ally. He's a mangina allegedly known for directing "strong female characters". His characters are unrealistic as women simply can never be tough. He cares about fake women's issues like the pay gap and the alleged success of lady Ghostbusters. Joss is directing Batgirl, the story about a super heroine who is basically Batman but a woman. Currently he's facing back-lash on Twitter, but in smaller amounts due to more and more people accepting these kind of reboots.

Overwatch

This game is tainted by women who blame their problems on men. Basically, every character in Overwatch has different victory pose animations that a player can unlock and choose from. And for the time-traveling character Tracer (one of the female characters in the game), her victory pose gives players a wonderful view of her buttocks, clad in skin-tight leggings. Obviously, if men are enjoying something there must be feminist intervention, so Blizzard changed her appearance and stated:

> We'll replace the pose. We want everyone to feel strong and heroic in our community. The last thing we want to do is make someone feel uncomfortable, under-appreciated or misrepresented. Apologies and we'll continue to try to do better.

Women expose themselves to men in conventions, and when they are assaulted they complain that "men should respect women," even when their own clothes were designed to attract men. But when a character in a video game wears skimpy clothing, there is an outright backlash against it. Overwatch is even taking strides to be LGBT inclusive. This marks the end of straight white man in entertainment.

Wandering Son

Wandering Son follows two fifth graders who do not identify with the genders they were assigned at birth. Shuichi Nitori identifies as a girl, and Yoshino Takatsuki identifies as a boy. This series marks the end of an era, modern anime has come to suit feminist tastes. The rest is pretty self explanatory.

Splash

The 80s film, starring Tom Hanks and Daryl Hannah, is set for a reboot with Channing Tatum starring as the “merman”. The original Splash was about a man, Allen Bauer (Hanks), who falls in love with the mermaid (Daryl Hannah) who rescued him when he was a boy. Their relationship is hampered somewhat by the fact that the mermaid (who later names herself Madison) has to return to the sea after just a few short days, and also by the deranged scientist determined to prove that merpeople are real by throwing water at her.

Since the announcement, many feminists have been celebrating the gender swap on social media – particularly Tatum’s casting as a merman as some kind of feminist victory… but why? Because of the casting of a white, straight male in a role that was originally held by a woman. Hollywood’s content has become more man-hating than ever before. Seeing men in feminine roles is a way of brainwashing men to be submissive and less masculine.

Gender swapping is fast becoming a fail-safe way for Hollywood to shut up anyone who kicks off about equality without actually having to write anything new: Cinderella, Beauty and the Beast, Sleeping Beauty, 101 Dalmatians, Ghostbusters. All these films have either been made or are in the works and all of them have some kind of “feminist twist”. I’ve seen these gender bends in anime too, although no one seems to notice because anime gender bending is normalized.

Undertale

Your character is non-ambiguous (genderless) and non-white, which one could assume it is Asian or Mexican. They never refer to you as “him” or “her”. Despite having a small amount of characters, it managed to include homosexual relationships and a transgender robot. There are more homosexual couples than their opposite counterparts, and both the prominent female characters break out of gender roles. Undyne being the best fighter in the underground, another unrealistic feminist expectation that women can be better than men.

Do you see where “progressiveness” in gaming is really heading? Because the game pushes “progressive propaganda”. One of the major themes of the game that people have been gloating about is the notion that gay relationships are wonderful and perfect, straight relationships are doomed, diversity is strength, promoting inter-species romantic relationships, and it’s primarily because of this thematic content that the game gets praised. That is why Tumblr is spamming the votes, and the media is circle-jerking over the game. Nearing the end of the game I dawned upon the similarities of this game and Steven Universe. There’s nothing particularly special about the game except for discreetly lecturing you about homosexuality and political correctness.

Sailor Moon

Cross-dressing degenrate

It redefined the “magical girl” genre in its native Japan and its overseas influence has shown up in girl-power shows like The Powerpuff Girls and is the definition of a feminist anime. Haruka and Michiru, the series’ Sailor Uranus and Neptune, were a lesbian couple who helped girls around the world come to terms with their sexuality (lesbian propaganda). The series also makes a point of looking down on femininity, by showing how the less feminine girls have trouble coping with gender roles, like how Makoto learned to cook because she was teased for being a tomboy.
Though, I somewhat find it astonishing that the creator of the site anime feminist doesn’t care about “fanservice”, which is short softcore porn scenes, it occured to me because they know about the female supremacy in anime.

Life Is Strange

The creators of the game met with resistance to make the protagonist female. It’s a story about a girl named Max who learns that she can time travel. Life is Strange are some of the few games that are telling women's untold stories in ways that make it seem as if women have it harder.

It's simply a game made to exaggerate and show how cruel men can be to women (almost every man in the game is either a loser or a woman beating trash). It attempts to lecture you and say things like "these men need to be in check" whenever it finds the chance to. This game was published by SQUARE ENIX who also published Tomb Raider. Why is it that those people who push equality so much then decide to make a game where it's about the girl, never around the male?

Conclusion

Modern entertainment is becoming more about social justice than hardware, software, story, gameplay, or animation, while we get to endure feminists complain about everything they don't like, ruining entertainments we were once able to enjoy.

Read Next: How Feminism Is Ruining "Game of Thrones"

Ryan Ashville
I'm a heterosexual anti-feminist and a conservative male. A frequent news watcher and I dedicate my findings to various MRA sites and anti-feminist authors. I enjoy swimming, hiking, observing mainstream entertainment and masculine literature.

40 Images Of The Grand National's "Ladies Day" That Show How Low Western Women Have Sunk

April 13, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

The Grand National horse race took place last weekend in England and apart from what I heard about it, being in the horse racing community myself, I paid little attention to the event.

That is until I saw the pictures of their "Ladies day", a pathetic mix of binge drinking, lower tier women thinking that they are 10s and a total absence of self-restraint and public decency.

It takes place at Aintree Racecourse every year in Liverpool, probably the vainest city in the UK, with more fake tan use and sun tanning salons than anywhere else in the country. So it already does not start too well.

The 2017 Ladies Day of the Grand National, gents:

1.

“Oi, Keith! Give us a hand with those, will ya?”

2.

One must know when the party is over.

3.

The “no bra + nascent beer gut” combo

4.

“Better fix my makeup before I sit in someone’s piss”

5.

The lifeless abyss and cold emptiness of the thousand cock stare

6.

7.

“It says here that it is because of our genetics”

8.

9.

I am at a loss for words

10.

11.

Let’s destroy those healthy eggs and that nice, homely face

12.

13.

14.

15.

You go, grrrrl!

16.

Stay classy.

17.

18.

19.

20.

England’s favourite feminine footwear after the first hundred yards

21.

Thousand cock stare: Exhibit 2

22.

Kebab Woman, the worst superhero of our time

23.

Probably wondering why those horses are running in circles

24.

Every inch of cleavage is needed to distract from “The Chin”

25.

Personal champagne bottle : eliminate the middle man and be classy on the cheap

26.

27.

28.

The Anglo plague of hen dos

29.

Tramp stamp and ankle tattoo: read the warning signs

30.

They should breathalyse them before letting anyone near the horses

31.

32.

33.

34.

Do not trip or we are all doomed.

35.

Posing in rubbish. Says it all.

36.

37.

Six more or six less seeing it, who cares?

38.

Who needs a glass when you have class?

39.

[image]

40.

[image]

Failed feminism at its finest

[image]

You would expect that with the price of the entrance (tickets around 25 £ quickly sell out so forty quid is the minimum to get in), the tradition of dressing well for the event and the price of the drinks would spare you the sight of the rabble.

But they found the trick, dividing a 70 £ bottle of champagne between four or five female cheap skates and sneaking drinks in. A few hours later the women, rarely under thirty, are rolling drunk in the grass and pissing everywhere when they don't stumble away after abandoning their shoes.

A full-frontal display of wrinkled eyes, ankle tattoos and boob jobs that are the only way their saggy tits stay parallel to the ground. Droves of lower 6s and 7s bounce around, tarted up as if they were about to be auctioned to some fat-fetish brothel in downtown Istanbul.

This is what happens when you tell women that they can drink freely, dress the way they want and still be princesses. As soon as you give women their own money and no man is here to keep them in line, debauchery ensues. The Ladies Day is the closest thing a pump and dump and strong, independent women convention would look like.

But with thousands and thousands of attendees, it could not be ALL bad:

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

Note that this was only a fraction of the girls present BEFORE the races started.

[image]

On their side, the lads still seem to have a good time. Dressed well, they bond with friends while laughing at silly slags and might even be able to secure a random gobby behind the portaloos between the fourth and the fifth race.

[image]

A visible change

[image]
The early days of the Grand National

The world of races used to be classy when women only had access to it under the supervision of their men. The race and meeting friends were the sole focus. Now both sexes enter separately and the only goal is getting blind drunk and taking selfies while dressed in a forty pound pink dress while sprawled in the mud among empty bottles.

The sad part is that white knight MSM media celebrates that decadence with titles like "Our Girls Are Doing Us Proud" and "Liverpool, Capital Of Style" while being delusional on the objective value of these women. Probably the only time of the year their beta writers see female underwear. Nothing exists in our society to chastise them for being so indecent

The race course reflects the decline of civilisation

[image]
The Queen at the Gold Cup… and the rest

Those women ruining a sport that symbolised high standards and class in Britain is just another symptom of modern feminism tainting everything it touches. Some men will say that skanks will be skanks, whether you doll them up and put them in a classy environment or not.

But Liverpool is not the only demonstration of that decline. One just has to take a look at the pictures of low SMW women showing their tits at every Kentucky Derby or drunk slags falling in the flower beds after every Melbourne Cup, Derby Stakes or Ascot to see a common pattern.

The Ascot Gold Cup is where you can observe both ends of the spectrum with the Queen of England greeting the crowd in one tribune while at the other end of the racecourse, Kelly pukes her guts out in a purse after her ninth glass of plonk.

This was the Melbourne Cup in the early 1960s:

[image]

[image]

The Melbourne Cup in the late seventies and 1982:

[image] [image]

The Melbourne Cup now:

[image] [image]

We can observe it going downhill right after the sexual revolution at the end of the sixties. The same happened to the Kentucky Derby:

[image]

[image]

It is a good barometer to realise the extent of today's "Overton Window of dressing like a slut", but here no one objects or kicks you out for dressing like a prostitute.

Wherever you let modern Western women run free, they will ruin the place just like any English street on a weekend night, spewing between two bins and passing out on the first bench they find.

Un des derniers bastions de la classe à l'occidentale?

I am not a saint and had my share of piss-ups and falling in hedgerows during my student days. But I always kept it on campus without ruining other people's day-out or putting on a suit on and pretend that I was the dog's bollocks while having photographers immortalising my crotch. And that stayed in my twenties.

[image]
I bet these guys don't hear much about the evils of patriarchy

It is a parody to let bush pigs and tattooed post-Wall spinsters in on the pretext that they put heels and hats on but still behave like forest animals. Putting fancy hats on plebs do not turn them into acceptable people.

One can wonder if races would be a good place to game. I would agree but only during the regular races and with access to the more restricted areas of the racecourse. Also, as Aintree shows it, the bulk of the quality is very low compared to the few attractive girls and the competition is high. I would also not recommend those days as the quiet spots are rare (though their shame threshold is high) and STDs are rampant in the general public's enclosure.

Read More: The Death Of Ladies Night In America

[image]

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

What It’s Like To Be A College Student In 2017

April 13, 2017 | by Zeke Elwood | Link | Original Link

As the readers of ROK know, this country is sick. It’s a sickness that exhibits symptoms such as feminism, with its destruction of healthy gender roles, feigned racism, which gives people a reason to riot and distract the rest of us from real issues, and mainstream trends, not being mainstream because of quality but because of strategic placement for the purposes of mind control. Now I could continue this list of bullshit the left feeds us forever but it would be wiser to find the root of the problem.

Where are these idiots getting all their ideas from? If it is so utterly clear to us that all this crap is a lie to further some agenda, then how are so many becoming brainwashed? The answer is they aren’t living in the real world. They are living in a bubble held outside of reality—a bubble called college.

Why college?

The ages of 18 to 24 are extremely important years in any man or woman’s life. Unlike what popular knowledge tells us, we are really still in an adolescent stage in our early 20s. This final step of maturation is extremely important because it is the time when most people finalize their internal values and beliefs, meaning what they learn to be true in this stage of life will often be the basis for the rest of their lives. Now what, my friends, is so strategically placed in this time period of a person’s life? College.

The red region, the frontal cortex, is the last area of the brain to develop and is responsible for personal values and reasoning.

How it happened

Universities were not always designed to turn us into mindless zombies reliant on the state, but at some point (I imagine early 20th century) liberals invaded the college system and methodically removed all other professors and officials with differing viewpoints. They did this because they knew that if they pushed their agenda in this particular time portion of a person's life they would have a lot more people voting for them, and their ideals would eventually become mainstream. They achieved this victory in the 1960s with the counterculture movement.

What is college like today?

A common gathering in 2017.

College is hell for anyone with a strong mind that can see through the indoctrination. I don't know how many relationships I have ruined with women for not agreeing with their nonsense feminist ideals. Every class I go to, there is at least one statement a week about racial and gender inequality (even math). At this point it is basically a religion with the most devout believers receiving A's while the students less knowledgeable about the liberal propaganda receiving C's and D's.

Of course, the upside to this is that since I understand their propaganda I can just bullshit all of my papers and get easy A's. I once wrote an 8-page paper in my East Asian Civilizations class in two hours with few sources to back up my claims and a crap ton of misspellings, and still received an A because it was about the "treacherous" patriarchy. The unfortunate and truly sad part of all of this is that most people in college just want to make the world a better place.

After high school, in this day and age, very few people receive any life experiences that would shape who they are in any way. Therefore, most kids enter college looking for something to believe in and something to fight against so that they can feel that they did their part in making the world a better place. Well, they find the fight they're looking for, but they are increasing hatred in this world rather than defeating it.

The greatest example of degeneracy—the cuckternity

Now let me give an example of instance in which these dumbasses have hurt lives. I use to be in a fraternity, a place I thought would be a solace of true masculinity. But no, even these once strong and powerful pillars of masculinity in college have been corrupted. I can name at least five different frats on my campus that have a quota for gay members. Now I really don't care if someone is gay, but having gay men in a fraternity completely defeats the purpose of one.

Anyway, my fraternity was the leader in total degeneracy as we had five gays, one person considering a sex change, and everyone else, besides me and my close group of friends, were hardcore SJWs. Suffice to say I dubbed my fraternity a cuckternity. Now my cuckternity wasn't always like this. In fact, my freshman year, we only had a few weirdos and the rest of us were chill guys who helped each other get laid and encouraged each other to become stronger men. All of that went to hell when one of the SJWs in the frat became recruitment chair.

I know what you're thinking. Why the hell did you guys vote him in? Well, we didn't. He got the other candidate kicked out by sending a picture of him smoking weed to the national board. We were outraged that he did that to our friend, but there was little we could do. We also didn't really understand the nature of SJWs and their extreme degeneracy back then. But suffice to say, since we were heavy on seniors, in one year's time the majority of the fraternity was made up of these weirdos.

Don’t worry milady we’ll save you from all that toxic testosterone!

At that point, there was a new election and they used their degenerate brethren to take all the power. They then passed out resignation letters to our remaining normal members, saying that we weren’t a good fit for the image of the cuckternity. Of course, we tossed them and started planning how to take back our organization, but it was too late. They then started accusing members of bullshit claims like sexual harassment and “mantalk.” Yes, they literally kicked some of my friends out for talking about girls’ asses.

Their claims of “sexual harassment” were usually about guys that came back to the house drunk with their girl. They called it “bordering on statutory rape.” They eventually accused me of this, and since it had happened to my friends, I was ready—I’d already had a lot of girls I know leave videos on my phone saying that it was completely voluntary on their part. I think that just pissed them off more, because with these kind of people a lot of their motivation comes from jealousy. They never get laid so they rationalize that I am a horrible person who forces girls into it.

After several such incidents, they eventually kicked me out for “mantalk,” at which point I became homeless for two weeks as I was living in the house. In total, they kicked 11 members out of the fraternity, 5 of whom had to become homeless or go live with their family. After the incident 20 people decided to just drop the fraternity and they went from 104 members to 72. At least now they are screwed financially.

Conclusion

This story was not to inform you of a series of unfortunate events that happened to just one unlucky fraternity. No, this was to illustrate how fucked up the current state of the United States college system is. In fact, this shouldn’t even surprise you. Even South Park did an episode on PC frats.

What we should learn from all of this is that college is no longer what it used to be. Now I am a believer in higher education, so I don’t think we should stop going en masse, but what we should do is use capitalism to our advantage. Start looking into vocational schools. Start going to private colleges and conservative colleges. Take from them their ultimate source of power—money.

The only reason anyone should go to college today is for engineering, medical school, any kind of scientific research, and skill-based professions. Anything else you learn in college you can learn just as easily on the internet. And as employers begin to figure this out, college as an entire unit will become obsolete.

Read More: Reflections On My Freshman Year Of College

Zeke Elwood

I'm a 21 year old guy lucky enough to take the red pill at such a young age. I'm fed up with the cesspool of degenerate culture held in America. I hope to spread logic and ideas to wake people up from the cultural narrative they are plugged into so that a better one can take its place.

8 Reasons Tennis Can Improve Your Game On And Off The Court

April 13, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

What was once a very popular sport now is primarily for a focused crowd. However, in this day and age, tennis may very well be the best sport for masculinity, prestige, and respect. For aspiring players, it offers many additional benefits whether you're a pro or play for recreation.

1. You Get Fit, Sharp And Fast

Rafael Nadal, one of fittest players on tour.

The sport requires strength, speed, and a strong will. Half the game is mental. Fat guys get blown off the court, as they should.

At the pro level you see wiry ripped guys with low body fat and abs. Girls prefer that look over the dumbbell bodybuilder posterior, smart girls that is. It’s evolved from the old school days and so today the top guys are incredibly fit. Just check out Nada’s arms. Andre Agassi was benching over 300lbs at the end of his career and players today continue to push the fitness level.

Even in college, the clubs have tall fit guys. One guy I knew could double curl 70 pound dumbbells for five reps. Tell me how many jocks can do that? He had a mean serve and wicked forehand.

Some think it’s a wimpy sport for skinny guys, but you see that in every sport at the amateur level. A lot of pro players previously played or simultaneously played other “manly” sports like football (soccer), cricket, baseball, and alike. Since everybody views Russia as the top manufacturer of men, you should know that many Russians, Serbians, and other Eastern Europeans are on the pro tour. The number of American, Australian, and other western nationalities on tour has drastically declined, and is almost non-existent these days, at least on the men’s side.

2. You Get Girls

Players at my school’s club were muscular, which naturally attracted attention. The club’s treasurer got a lot of girls of all kinds, and he was Asian. There were others who were into anime, but because they were fit, it didn’t matter. There was even a skinny kid who got girls.

Most clubs or tennis communities also have mixed doubles which pair you up. It works well for dates, as girls usually are more open to trying tennis compared to other sports and it helps to break the ice.

Generally speaking, professional players get QUALITY girls while cage fighters and ballers hook up with pornstars and gold diggers.

3. Carries Over To Career

Learning to be aggressive on court carries over to everything else. One guy I knew moved up in a big-name bank, and now is in a high position in government and married. Another became an engineer. This is not to say all who wield a racquet are destined to become professionals, but it’s not uncommon to encounter such people in the tennis world.

4. Forces You to Take Responsibility for Your Actions

Unlike other sports, tennis truly is the independent man’s sport. If you lose, you have no one to blame but yourself. You learn how to keep it together during tough matches, and to grind it out when you’re down which is useful in life. It really tests the will and what you’re made of. You’re on your own and there’s no one to save you. If you’re on the pro tour, you have to earn every dollar you get. No twenty million dollar contracts in this sport.

5. Better Associations And Prestige

It’s a classy sport well loved by powerful and successful people. Donald Trump and others have been spotted at the crowds. Roger Federer is known to roll out in style, as do many others.

Every now and then you see a football idiot punch out his girl or some drug bust. Not common in tennis players. Sure, there were a few incidents, but usually the worst you'll see is John McEnroe's anger tantrums, but even that's changed. If there are any girlfriend or divorce troubles, it's usually incognito without much attention, which brings us to the next point.

6. Relative Freedom From Liberal Politics

Pro Tennis players deal with media much unless they want to compared to other sports. Nikolay Davydenko rose up to the top 10 inconspicuous without a peep. The men and women pretty much do their own thing.

7. Perfect For Nomads

Players travel extensively, competing in exotic places all over. From New York, Miami, Dubai, Indian Wells, Melbourne, and Rome, players tour the best. You don't even have to be a top player. Many low scale pro league tournaments exist year round, although they are not covered on mainstream television. They may not pay millions, but winning multiple events the prize money adds up. You also get paid for just making the higher rounds.

8. Reduced Injury

You'll live longer, happier, and with minor bruises. There's this obsession in society today with proving yourself a man by mindlessly getting into fights or reckless behavior. What does that prove?

Civilization evolved to preserve peace and men fought so they could get away from violence. Nobody likes fighting, at least not for long. The British had the best military with real men at one point in time and created tennis for peaceful recreation. Rugby was about as dirty as they'd get.

Give it a Try

While you don't have become a pro, taking up tennis can be a fun complement to your fitness routine. Even famous muscle builder Charles Atlas integrated it as part of his exercise regime. You'll get some sun, breathe the fresh air, and get out of the house.

Read More: Women's Tennis Demands Heat Breaks Not Given To Men At Wimbledon Championships

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

How British Men Are Ruining Eastern Europe

April 13, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

In Eastern Europe, there's a special occasion that happens every year when spring rolls around. No, it's not flowers blooming, or the beautiful girls shedding their winter coats in favor of sundresses and high heels. It's not a festival, holiday, or anything like that. What am I referring to then?

None other than the British Stag Party.

Not familiar with the term? Let me catch you up. You see, for the guys get married in the UK, there is the need for a "final celebration" of freedom. Much more like a funeral, but substitute suits for bizarre costumes and mourning for drunkenness, and it's really the same thing. The groom is kissing goodbye to his freedom in favor for marriage, and all his buddies come to celebrate with him.

For those of you who live in the US, it's like a bachelor party—except much, much worse. Whilst bachelor parties are often drunken shit shows and rarely end well for the groom, the Brits take it a step farther. They dress the sucker up in a bizarre costume, and they make it their true mission to wreck any chance of anyone else running game in whatever venue they're frequenting that evening.

Unfortunately, these parties do their best (albeit it's not their intention) to make sure that nobody in an entire city has a chance in hell of getting any action on any weekend night from April to September. In the last week alone, I've witnessed fifteen guys in smurf costumes, ten guys walking around in neon pink underwear, and a waterfight inside a pub.

British guys are absolutely tainting game in Eastern Europe for the rest of us. Here are just a few of my thoughts on them.

It’s Nothing Like The Ads

Many Eastern European tour countries have hopped on the bandwagon. For a low price of XXX, you can have all your stag party fun taken care of for the weekend! I don’t blame the tour companies—they’re taking advantage of the market given to them. But rest assured, the stag parties are paying the price. If they’re not too drunk to just completely forget how much they actually spent, they’re still paying ridiculous marked up charges everywhere the “tour” takes them.

And the tour gets a nice cutback for every single crappy low-end beer they purchase. Needless to say, you won’t see any stag parties seeing any action like this:

The sad reality is that it’s seen as a “necessary” for your mate getting married, and it’s just another absurd wedding cost in the grand scheme of things. As if weddings weren’t elaborate and expensive enough as is!

Pro Tip: Avoid flying budget airlines (WizzAir, RyanAir, EasyJet) on Thursday nights and Friday mornings. The drinking and general rowdiness starts early—even on the 5:30am flight from London Luton. You’re much safer on Sunday evening or Monday morning when they’re all nursing hangovers. Or better yet—don’t fly those carriers at all. After all the BS fees tacked on, you can take a real airline for just a few bucks more, or for free.

Bad Games On Levels You Haven’t Seen

Everybody has seen “those guys” before. The ones who run around an entire bar, trying to mack on anything with a pair of tits. The interactions are forced, painfully awkward, and are a general buzzkill for both parties.

Unfortunately, the stag parties tend to up the level of bad games in that bar, and like I said—an entire city. The reason for this is the absurd amount of alcohol consumed on these parties. Don’t get me wrong—it’s Europe, after all. Beer is cheaper than water, and vodka cheaper than wine. And it’s a party, so you expect people to drink.

But then you see groups of guys stumbling through town, each of them holding a bottle of Jack Daniel’s, and you wonder—what exactly is so miserable with their lives home that they need to drink so much while they’re on holiday?

Well, the answer to that is:

A Symbol Of Western Marriage

Now that I've thought about it a bit more, I realize the entire concept of these stag parties is simply symbolic for how Western society treats marriage as a whole. Look, I get it—it's cause for celebration. But what happened to going out and having a nice whiskeys, smoking a cigar, and maybe hitting a strip club with your buddies the night before the wedding? I know that's what my older friends, uncles, etc. did. And yes, granted, I'm from America, not the UK.

But regardless, the people I know who got married long ago didn't see a need to make an entire weekend of blacking out in preparation for getting married. It's getting worse in America, too—except at least we just ruin Vegas instead of pristine Eastern European locations.

Maybe it's because once, long ago, it actually meant something to get married. It was something to be proud of, look forward to, and recognized your growth as a man. And it was a worthwhile endeavor, because you were likely marrying a girl who was worth it. These days, that's questionable.

Sadly, it seems that the concept of these stag parties are just trending upward.

> The UK stag do industry is expected to grow further in 2017, with 3 million lads expected to party the night away, celebrating their mate getting married. While most will still be remaining in the UK for the big send off, the number of EU bookings does seem to be increasing, despite the brexit vote.

This is my official plea to the Brits reading this site: Stop the madness.

I know many of you reading would prefer to disown your stag-party kin, and I do realize there is not much else you can do. The next time you're invited to a stag party—just make sure the smurf costumes are left at home.

If you'd prefer not to be one of the chumps at a stag party, make sure you get my course on how to keep multiple women: The Harem Handbook. For more advice about an Eastern European country stag parties haven't infected (yet), check out Ukraine Living.

Read More: 8 Things That Eastern Europe Girls Have Said To Me That Blew My Mind

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

6 Questions The Media Is Afraid To Ask About Syria

April 14, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Hours after the April 4, 2017 incident at Khan Sheikhoun in Syria, western media began publishing stories that the Syrian military had used chemical weapons in an attack on civilians. The rapid conclusion by (((foreign))) media that immediately determined what weapons were used, where, and why, should be an immediate red flag that truth has been sacrificed for politics. We shall examine 6 questions about Syria, after a brief introduction.

Syria was established in 1946, and was governed by a group of well connected elites. A middle class political movement of Ba'athism grew, until it seized power in both Iraq and Syria in a military coup in 1963.

Hafez al-Assad (1970-2000)

A number of coups occurred over the 1960s, and in 1970, Hafez al-Assad, father of the current president, became president of Syria. He eased government repression, purged the security services, transferred some military power to civilian police, ended civil asset forfeiture, eased international trade and travel, encouraged private sector growth, modernized agriculture and industry, constructed one of the world's largest dams, rejected EU demands to allow private or international banks and put down Islamic uprisings in the 1970s.

He also increased the power of the presidency, removing checks and balances, and the presidency became a powerful office with a cult of personality. Political reforms stalled, and the economy faltered, partly due to military involvement in wars with Israel, and the Lebanese civil war in 1976, supporting Christians. He died in 2000, leaving the country to his son.

Bashar al-Assad (2000-present)

When Assad and his wife visit Paris (Christmas, 2010)

Bashar al-Assad is the legally elected president of Syria, holding office since July, 2000. He was born in Damascus, graduated medical school, worked as a doctor in the Syrian Army, and attended postgraduate studies at the Western Eye Hospital in London. He was elected to three seven-year terms as president in 2000, 2007, and 2014. In the most recent election, which occurred during civil war, he received 88.7% of the votes, and under terms of the 2012 constitution, is in his final term as president.

When ISIS visits Paris (November 2015)

With that in mind, here are 6 questions the controlled media refuse to discuss.

1. Is it legitimate to criticize Assad's leadership?

Syrians are ethnically Levantine Arabs and Palestinians, and are majority Muslim. Assad governs as a secular ruler, protecting the Christian minority population, which include Assyrians and native Aramaic speakers that go back to the time of Christ. The 2.5 million Christians in Syria are a major target for torture, kidnapping, and execution by Islamic armed forces, and have seen disproportional death and extermination.

While Syria's government is one of an Arab strongman, with all the unpleasant "dear leader" monikers and lack of checks and balances, it is moving in the direction of reform, especially with the new constitution of 2012, and is a relatively stable and functioning government in the region.

Intelligent, rational, European educated

Is the Syrian government ideal by western standards? No. Is it a successful government in the region, moving in a positive direction? Maybe. Are there any reasonable alternatives to the current Syrian government? Hell no.

If we are ranking governments by their legitimacy and efficacy, there are dozens of governments that are more valid candidates for "regime change" than Syria. I would name them, but it would only encourage neocons to add more to their running list. The last NATO survey shows 70% of Syrians support their government. Until the US elects a leader with over 70% of the vote, it must refrain from hypocritical regime change abroad.

2. Who are the Syrian rebels?

Red = Assad, Green = Al Queda/Al-Nusra/FSA, Grey = ISIS

1. The initial rebels were the Free Syrian Army, Al-Nusra jihadists, and Al-Qaeda. While one can argue about the barbarism of using chemical weapons, there have been gross atrocities committed by these groups, including a rebel commander cutting out and eating a human heart in Syria, and their track record in Iraq speaks for itself. This is the group receiving US weapons and aid.

2, Soon the Islamic State spread to Syria, after taking vast areas to the east in Iraq. This group now controls the largest parts of the nation. Thanks W!

3. Finally, the Kurds, represented in yellow, lie along the northern border of Syria and Iraq. Kurds are probably the most moderate of the rebels, but they are not interested in running Syria; just self governance for their regions in northern Iraq and Syria.

3. Is there a just cause for the Syrian rebels?

The current Syrian Civil War erupted when the Arab Spring, a pro-democracy movement throughout the region, was repressed by Syrian military forces. The merits of democracy are debatable; certainly they are not worth the death and destruction that is its byproduct.

While one could argue that democracy worked in America for a while, the American experiment cost around 50,000 casualties, and less than 7,000 deaths from battle in the Revolutionary War. The Syrian Civil War has seen at least 450,000 deaths in Syria, as well as thousands of murdered or raped European civilians, all in the hope that Syria can elect some Wahhabi theocrats to run its government.

Let's consider what a democratic Syria would look like. Muslims, who are in the majority, and are currently massacring Christians in Syria, would either exterminate or expel Christians under a majority elected Muslim theocracy. Progress and secularism would end.

Al Qaeda and ISIS military leaders would be given political and economic power. Does anyone believe they would obey international rule of law or restrictions against chemical or nuclear weaponry? For how many more years does the west expect to have a monopoly on nuclear technology? Do we want that in the hands of secular, western educated doctors, or Islamic radicals?

Arab Spring revolutions were successful in Iraq, Libya, and Egypt. Will anyone other than neocon shills like (((Paul Wolfowitz))) dare defend these as shining examples for the Mideast to emulate?

4. What is the evidence for the chemical weapon accusations?

Mainstream media absolutely refuses to answer this question. I heard a piece on NPR this week that had not a single fact–merely comparisons to JFK assassination, 9-11 inside job, and alien abduction theories, implying that anyone who doesn't fully believe that Assad gassed his own civilians, is a crazy person. The entire story was just shaming people who questioned the narrative, without a single fact backing up said narrative. Ironically, it is western media, who aren't even present in Khan Sheikhoun, and are only repeating rumor and innuendo, who are acting like nutters.

Syria had chemical weapons stockpiles in the past. According to secretary of state John Kerry, under international supervision, 100% of Syria's chemical weapons were removed in 2013. US intelligence has denied any intelligence failure in Syria. There are 3 possibilities: (1)The US and international community lied when they said all chemical weapons were destroyed, (2) US intelligence is lying now and DID fail to locate additional chemical weapons or (3) new weapons were created or transported to Syria. The obvious implication of #3 is by whom?

ISIS Used Chemical Arms at Least 52 Times in Syria and Iraq, Report Says

But this time it wasn't them, we promise!

While there is no evidence of Assad's use of chemical weapons, the NYTimes reported that ISIS used chemical weapons at least 52 times in Syria and Iraq, two cylinders of sarin were taken from rebels in 2014, who captured a chemical warehouse in 2013, and Islamic rebels admitted to having used chemical weapons in Aleppo in 2016. How exactly did western governments and media rule out these numerous rebel groups who have been caught possessing and using sarin gas so rapidly, when they are not even present? Maybe it was remote viewing.

Videos of dead bodies are disturbing, but militia groups have faked them before, and some are already questioning if videos from this attack were staged.

On April 1, days before the attack, Dr. Shajul Islam received a shipment of gas masks. Why would these be necessary for even military soldiers, much less civilians? The implication is that rebels knew of a gas attack days before it occurred.

Mail Online

Home | U.K. Home | News | Sport | U.S. Showbiz | Femail | Health | Science | Money

U.S. 'backed plan to launch chemical weapon attack on Syria and blame it on Assad's regime'

- Leaked emails from defense contractor refers to chemical weapons saying 'the idea is approved by Washington'
- Obama issued warning to Syrian president Bashar al-Assad last month that use of chemical warfare was 'totally unacceptable'

By LOUISE BOYLE

But we didn't do it! Trust us! It was just a "thought experiment"

Finally, the US reportedly had a plan in 2013 to fake a chemical weapons attack in coordination with UK war contractor Britam Defence and blame it on Syria. It doesn't take Jack McCoy to put Syria at the bottom of the list of suspects.

5. Isn't the Syrian Civil War Destroying Europe?

The UN has estimated over 4.8 million Syrians have left Syria due to the civil war. Most Christians have left, as their death is certain if more territory falls to rebel groups. Every major random attack on European civilians, from the Cologne New Year rapes, to the Bataclan concert hall to the Christmas Paris market attacks to German machete attacks were committed either by Syrian rebels, or violent criminals blending in with the other millions who fled to Europe.

Every day that the Syrian Civil War continues, European lives are at risk. And every day Assad and Russia push back ISIS and Al-Qaeda forces, is a step towards safety and security for Europeans.

6. If these claims are true, then what?

Almost half a million have died in Syria's civil war, with millions more displaced. Most of these people will never see their homes or neighborhoods again. But let's assume one day, the government, despite taking back Aleppo, and making big gains with Russian help, decides to use chemical warfare, not against a concentration of enemy troops, but in a civilian area far from the front line, killing children who are not even its enemy.

Are the hundreds of thousands of dead, including Christians, including European civilians, and including countless innocent Syrian children, perfectly disposable, but 70 to 80 deaths in a single incident require western intervention? The western government's answers of aiding ISIS and Al-Qaeda to victory will spell the deaths of countless more. Even if all these claims are true, they call for a debate and discussion of the situation, not for illegal war.

Both Sides Could Be Wrong

Bonus Question: Why is the Israel-Syria border controlled by Al-Queda/Al-Nusra? And they haven't bothered attacking westward?

It’s very possible that we are being told lies AND that Syria acted poorly. For example, if Syrian jets bombed a chemical weapons store in proximity to civilians which caused their death, that would be a pox on both their houses. No one is defending an evil regime simply because they ask questions.

In life, things rarely are clearly black or white. Anyone who is passionate about war because they KNOW Assad is a bad guy, but has never lived in Syria, and came to this conclusion by watching some western media clip, is not to be trusted. Anyone who insists Russia should just nuke the whole occupied territories, is likewise wrong. Be are open to the truth, wherever it lies. But demand it.

Demand answers. Reject media parroting and name calling. And remember, with every further lie, the mainstream media becomes more irrelevant.

Read More: 10 Facts Regarding the US Strike On Syria

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Canada Gives Up On Freedom And Passes Anti-Islamophobia Motion

April 14, 2017 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

In late March, Canada's federal government decisively passed a controversial Liberal-backed motion "condemning Islamophobia and all forms of systemic racism and religious discrimination." This motion, coined M-103, purports to "quell the increasing climate of hate and fear" in the country, yet neglects to define the broad terminology behind this supposed hatred. Nonetheless, the House of Commons approved M-103 by a staggering 201 votes against an opposition's measly 91.

The motion was introduced in the wake of the Quebec mosque attack, which resulted in the deaths of six Muslims by a Dylann Roof-styled gunman. While the brazen event was horrific in itself and the alleged shooter has been duly brought to justice, Justin Trudeau and his sitting Liberals refused to let this crisis go to waste.

The feminist Prime Minister assured the citizenry to "make no mistake, this was an act of terror", even though no charges of terrorism were laid against the assailant. Soon after, M-103, which had been tabled by Liberal MP Iqra Khalid last fall, entered the fold of parliamentary debate. Backing the motion was a petition of seventy thousand signatures postulating that "extremist individuals do not represent the religion of Islam".

On the glossiest of surfaces and without a moment of faint scrutiny, the motion seems perfectly reasonable. A horrible attack occurred against a religious group, so the government wants to investigate the potential rise in hate crimes against that group to determine if there is a pattern of bigotry against that group to, finally, promote the rights of said group.

Liberal MP Iqra Khalid, who used to lead the anti-Semitic Muslim Student Association, is, fittingly, the standard-bearer of M-103.

But that is where any justification for this motion ends. Digging deeper, you immediately detect careless flaws in the motion, such as: What does it define as "Islamophobia" and how do you determine "all forms" of it and systemic racism without a comprehensive definition? Why prioritize the term "Islamophobia" and not other types of "religious discrimination", especially when, as of 2016, most hate crimes in Canada are anti-Semitic in nature?

Why compel a committee to "contextualize hate crime reports" when the motion is already convinced of "an increasing climate of hate and fear" in the country? If hate crimes are on the rise (and without assuming many of them are hoaxes), what does the motion intend to solve when the Criminal Code already legislates against "public incitement of hatred" and the Canadian Human Rights Act prohibits such discrimination?

The reason: there is none. Like with Bill C-16 (the gender pronouns piece of legislation), M-103 uses vaguely defined verbiage that gets votes in parliament by seeming to uphold a protected group's civil rights, while embellishing their victimhood in the whole of Canadian society. While not a proposed law, M-103 is undoubtedly an attempt to legitimize "Islamophobia" through gathering government-backed data on hate crimes in an effort to influence future public policies.

