Beyond the politics, M-103 is also an apparent effort to mainstream "Islamophobia" into the culture—to not only legitimize the term for political impetus but for censuring public and private conversations on the hot and deeply relevant topic of Islamic extremism.

The nebulousness of "Islamophobia" purposely makes it a catch-all term for ideologues to apply impulsively as a silencing tactic against both informed and uninformed dissent. As University of Toronto Professor Jordan B. Peterson observed, "manipulation is built into its structure" (or lack of structure, really). "Islamophobia" is only "defined" according to its utility, which is to say its meaning is produced from the intent of its usage. It means whatever its spokesperson says it means.

Is it "irrational" to hate or fear a politicized religious ideology that has carried out more than 30,000 terrorist attacks since 9/11?

We know this to be true based on the phrase's arbitrary etymology: Islam is a religious doctrine; whereas, phobia is an actual anxiety disorder based on an irrational fear of something. For the two to correlate, all fear of Islam would have to be irrational and all of one's criticisms of Islam would have to be motivated by that type of fear. Ultimately, "Islamophobia" is a postmodern, Orwellian definition that scrambles and distorts proper language use for political gain, which explains why the term collapses under basic rational examination.

Unlike agoraphobia or social phobias, "Islamophobia" has no prescribed treatment or method of self-help offered at diagnoses. According to M-103, the solution should be complete condemnation of the ailment; in Islamic theocracies like Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and Iran, "Islamophobia" comes in the form of blasphemy laws, where criticism of Islam or other recognized religions of the state result in penalties ranging from monetary fines to death.

Left-leaning publications Huff Post and Vice predictably dismissed this resemblance to theocratic blasphemy laws as a right-wing "attack" and "conspiracy theory" on the motion, emphasizing that M-103 is not a bill and bears no relationship to blasphemy laws or any form of Sharia.

An M-103 protester outside of Toronto's City Hall.

However, none of these outlets mentioned that Canada already has a blasphemy law, one derived from English common law. Section 296 of the Criminal Code defines a "blasphemous libel" as "an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years". This law includes a provision excluding published opinions on a religion that are "used in good faith and conveyed in decent language".

But "libel" is not actionable toward an accused's temperament of speech, but toward a false claim. Since Section 296 fails to define "blasphemous libel", is it then legal to make a false claim about a religion calmly, but illegal to make a truthful claim angrily? Is it even possible to lie about someone or something's character in good faith?

What he said.

The danger here is that M-103 is a critically vague motion on religious discrimination that alludes to an equally vague blasphemy law that is currently a part of Canada's legal code. Sure, few Canadians like M-103, but how far will their voices be heard?

With political correctness infesting the Canadian legislature, Islam creeping into its public schools, and the contemporary Islamification of Canada's European counterparts, what is to say—with enough cultural accommodation and political capitulation—a blasphemy law targeting "Islamophobia" could come to pass, or an amendment to Section 296 that includes "Islamophobia" as grounds for prosecution.

Canadians must heed the late Christopher Hitchens warning on Islamification: "resist it while you can". The now-passed motion of M-103 represents yet another example of the political correctness and national cuckoldry capturing the once-Great White North.

Read More: Islamophobia Is Perfectly Natural

Harry Lime
Writer. Filmmaker. Lover of cuckoo clocks. Email: harrylimerok @gmail.com.

Are There Too Many People On Earth?

April 14, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Western birth rates have been falling below replacement rates since the 1970-1980s. For more than forty years, Westerners in general and Whites in particular failed to produce enough children to maintain their own population. In all likelihood, this demographic collapse stems from an agenda of the globalist elite. Feminism, sex wars, the breakup of the family unit, promotion of childless "alternative" lifestyles, focus on consumerism and career instead of home building… All these trends have long been supported by the elite through its media and "culture," and all lead people to sterility.

So far this agenda has been successful. Europe is in a demographic free-fall, childless German Chancellor Gerhard Schröder passed the power to childless German Chancellor Angela Merkel—and a titled Rabbi claims Europeans should accept their own disappearance. North America follows the same course. Interestingly, China, Japan, and even Thailand are undergoing what has been euphemistically called a "demographic contraction." A friend of mine who recently toured the last of these countries told me that many Thai women seek an income supplement by casually selling their body to tourists—which is handy for Western travelers but disastrous for Thai men who want to run a family.

White peoples are the most directly affected by the elite agenda. Only we are constantly assaulted and invaded by non-whites "minorities"—who are actually more numerous than whites on a global scale—bombarded with adverse propaganda for anti-man hostility and race mixing, yet on a global scale we are not the only ones targeted. North Africans, for example are invaded by sub-Saharan blacks and Chinese, and their women either have much less children than their grandmothers or get notched by blacks who impregnate them quick and run away. If whites disappear, North Africans will too.

Because of what the current depopulation agenda is doing to us, we may be tempted to perceive depopulation as intrinsically evil. Yet, just as with managerialism, the current elite and agenda are not a fatality, and we could have another managerialism as well as another "population regulation" agenda without the harm of today. In my opinion, such an agenda would be justified—the current agenda and global elite methods are evil but not all possible versions of demographic vigilance are.

The rise of Big Population

Before Big Corp, Big State, McChurches and Big Pharma came Big Population. For most recorded history, the whole world went through with less than 500 million human people, and most of these were either peasants or pastors. Cities were small, meat was cheap—sparse population density means lots of free land to graze flocks—and although the world was full of economic growth potentialities, these were deemed less important than living according to a higher Law. Then came modernity, featuring both the discovery of uncharted big lands and greedy appetites. It was not such a problem then, as there were so much possibility for growth.

As the appetites grew, reflections on economics boomed as well, and many "important" people started to resent the medieval limitations on trade. In France, the eighteenth century physiocratic school laid a lot of the ground Adam Smith built upon. One of the physiocrates, Victor Riquetti de Mirabeau, published between 1756 and 1762 a long-winded essay, L'ami des hommes ("The Friend of Men"), where he argued that wealth lied in working force and consequently that governments should pursue pro-birth policies among agricultural workers.

Behind the “look at all this potential growth!” pose, Mirabeau’s essay showed a milestone on what later authors dubbed the reign of quantity—less land for animals, more space restricted to wheat and potatoes, more proletarians toiling the soil for someone else. Interestingly, Mirabeau insinuated that this numerous workforce could also be mobilized for war, thus tossing aside his own caste’s vocation and replacing the nobility of the sword with future bloodbaths. Although he devoted a lot of written space on moralizing his bidding, for example by idolizing the agricultural life or by confusing between more people and better people or life conditions, Mirabeau couldn’t help that his perspective led to consider workers and work as abstract commodities, void of qualitative value.

Then came the Industrial Revolution. Perfected along the eighteenth century, the steam engine became effective enough to turn into a powerhouse with a variety of uses, mostly in transportation and factory production. At the dawn of the nineteenth century, wealthy bankers were able to fund massive industrial projects: bigger and bigger factories opened their doors, while big steam-powered boats and trains sent the produced goods around the whole world. Of course, many manual workers were needed to run all these machines, and those whom Mirabeau wanted to see toil the land toiled at steel engines instead.

During the nineteenth century, the growth of factories was correlated with a demographic boom: Great Britain, then the most industrialized and wealthy country of the world, had its population jumping from roughly 7.750.000 in 1801 to 30.070.000 one century after—a fourfold increase in population—while Germans went to 22.000.000 to 56.000.000 during the same time lapse. People grew, and the economy did, too, as factory workers saw their standards of living increase during most of the century. The nineteenth century really looked like modernity was working, fulfilling its promises of “progress.”

An artificial, fragile, and polluting system

The industrial and geopolitical whirlwind of this convoluted time made people oblivious to an important thing: before the Industrial Revolution, European countries were self-feeding. National agriculture was enough to guarantee no one would starve. After the factory and population boom, however, not so sure: the agriculture actually went backwards because of rural exodus and a widespread despise of the peasant, deemed much less fashionable than the factory worker; and the proletarian masses actually depended from international trade for the outlets and food imports guaranteeing their subsistence. If the "delicate fabric of international finance and commercial exchange" got hampered, the factory workers and urban white collars would suffer.

This is exactly what happened with the First World War. The trade system was shattered into pieces by the reallocation of wealth to war effort, Allied blockade and sheer destruction of people and capital. In the aftermath of the war, millions of men found themselves jobless and existentially threatened.

> Crippled by war-losses and cursed by persistent internecine rivalries, Europe has not recovered its pre-war industrial prosperity. But unless it does so recover, a large proportion of Europe's urban population simply cannot make a living and will ultimately be doomed to disappear by death, emigration, or a return to the soil…
> [T]he fate of Europe's tens of millions of urban workers is absolutely bound up with the fate of Europe's industrial system. It was this system which called them into being and which alone permits their continued existence. Should Europe's industry decline, the urban masses will inevitably wither; should it collapse, they will quickly vanish away. (Lothrop Stoddard, Social Classes in Post-War Europe, 1925, pp.38 and 45-6)

Timid solutions, then, solve one part of the problem only to worsen it elsewhere. From the 20s onwards, European agriculture got “modernized” under the thumb of State managers and crony capitalists, intensive farming improved crop productivity and dropped food prices. Did it allow for better feeding? For sure, there is more food on the market. This food, though, is loaded with gluten, refined sugars, trans fats and other health-destroying components. Most peasants lost their lands, as they couldn’t rival against large scale holdings and were consequently forced to sell theirs, and most of them now have no employment anyway.

Likewise, economies of scale may allow to produce more cheaply and for a wider number of people, but those can only obtain by proletarizing most people, forcing them to slave work at McDonalds or Walmart instead of owning their means of subsistence, and the shattering of industry inside Western countries only worsened the situation.

If the primary and secondary sector need less people, what do we do with all these who were born thanks to the numerous employments these sectors brought on? Even worse, when non-Western countries want to undergo the same modern process for the sake of “development” and let their demographics loose, what do we gain beyond more pollution and potential substitute for white peoples?

Retrospectively, the blind growth of the past two centuries gave us a cumbersome inheritance. Both inside the West and outside, many people have become useless in a world where the “real” production sectors do barely offer any worthy, income-yielding employment—and where so many of us were born in an urban, pampered environment, shielded from any contact with ploughs and wrenches. Even if we forced Big Corp to un-automatize some processes and pushed an agrarian reform giving back the lands to small-scale owners instead of Monsanto soldouts, there would still be far too many people around. Imagine for a second that the managerial State and the self-serving, mostly parasitic service industry recede: that would be good news for real producers… but what about the millions of petty officials, bureaucrats, and even tertiary employees who’d get sidelined?

Whatever the solution, it seems that a world where the West is great and the middle class thriving again needs to hurt the undeserved livelihood of many parasites and raise the price of food and goods. Even if we manage to reduce the margins of the wealthy globalists, renouncing to scale economies by breaking down big factories and holdings will necessarily raise the prices of what they sell. You cannot both buy cheap frankenfood—instead of going to the farmers’ market—and support independent producers.

To put it more bluntly, I would appreciate far more a world where worthy Westerners are independent middle class or above, where women are women, where ideas are free, and where we can eat fine meat without breaking the bank, instead of a bloated planet full of two-digits IQs, masses of idiots addicted to tittytainment, and a cutting-throat competition for even unpaid jobs.

A depopulation agenda may be fine—the one currently in power, though, is deeply disturbing

What I would object to the elite's agenda, then, is not depopulation per se but who is targeted and how. It is possible to practice birth control without violence, to make a careful and considerate use of negative eugenics on a legitimate segment of the population, such as natural born criminals, very low IQs, or peoples who are irresponsible enough to breed dozens of children without the least resource planning—just look at Africa. It is also possible to direct technological development for something else than pure bucks-hunting, and this would bring back many, many jobs, thus allowing millions to go back from the dreadful status of chronic employment-seeker to stable producer and pater familias.

Alas, the globalists tend to think otherwise. Pushing for world-scale managerialism through a network of global governance, they want to play God, control everything, micromanage the lives of most people and reduce almost everyone to the condition either of a prole—doing menial work for a small wage—or of a useless, do-nothing tittytainment addict. Instead of frankly putting forth the problem and accepting a democratic discussion, they have resorted to underhanded manipulation, pushing trends and issue that superficially seem unrelated but all result in making people unable to find a suitable partner or unwilling to reproduce. They also engaged in the most cynical cultural manipulations to wage a sex war, destroy the family unit, blast any trust between man and woman, and distorted the very "gender roles" normal peoples from all cultures always strove to realize. More profit, more individual atomization, more flexibility, more dependence from their power networks—such are the aims that the arrogant elite pursues at the same time than depopulation.

Moreover, their agenda seem to feature a part of Talmudic hatred against Christians and whites, for we are the first targeted and the hardest hit by an array of incredibly violent policies ranging from rewriting our history and pushing anti-white, anti-man hostility to downright mass invasion and population replacement. Other current targets, such as the North Africans or the South Asians, seem merely collateral damage on the side of what we are going through.

Population regulation can be a good thing, provided it is done carefully and with, if I might say, lawful—dharmic—discernment. The power-hungry, cynical, family- and culture-destroying, anti-Western civilization agenda pursued by the globalists is not.

Read Next: The End Goal Of Western Progressivism Is Depopulation

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

3 Ways I Make Money Online

April 15, 2017 | by Greg Freeman | Link | Original Link

It’s probably a fair guess that many ROK readers are interested in making money online. It’s a dream that most people have, especially men who are interested in running their own affairs and being in control of their lives.

Making money on the web appeals specifically because of the level of freedom involved. The dream is to make enough to be comfortable, or maybe even rich, without someone breathing down your neck all day, and having some sense of security that if your job gets outsourced to China you will still have a means to pay the bills.

About two years ago I lost my job due to changes in the economy. I decided to start trying to make a living on the internet. I’ve now crossed the two year mark and decided to take inventory of how things have gone in the last year or so.

This is an account of the various ways I make money online. Hopefully, it will serve as a guide and help you make some decisions if you decide to follow the same path.

1. The Blog And Product

One of the best ways to make money online is by starting your own blog or website and selling a product to your audience. I have had some success with this through my blog on men's self-development, selling a mini-course teaching people how to get started making money online.

This requires a fair amount of traffic to be successful. You will be converting roughly 0.5% of people, in my experience, so you need at least 100-200 visits a day before you start shifting anything on a reasonably regular basis. Even then, I can tell you from honest experience that I go weeks without a sale, then several come in a cluster, then it dries up again for a while.

That is probably a pretty low conversion rate, and to be honest I no longer put a lot of effort into this site. It maintains itself at a steady 100 or so visits a day, converting a few meager sales here and there.

I'd say this site makes me roughly $3,000 annually. That's not a lot, and certainly not enough to live on, but if you think about it that could pay for a comfortable month backpacking in Asia or South America, or could probably cover the car payments on a reasonably priced vehicle or service some debt.

I could probably make a lot more from this site if I put in the effort, but I'm not that bothered about it right now. That's because my energy is focused on…

2. Affiliate Marketing

Affiliate marketing is when you promote someone else's product or service, and in exchange, you get a slice of any sales. The obvious advantage here is there is no upfront cost or effort involved in research and development or production. Someone else has done the legwork, and you are acting as a marketer on their behalf. The downside here is that literally EVERYONE is doing it if there is money to be made. Distinguishing yourself and standing out is a major battle, and one which (in a competitive enough niche) will actually be tougher than a day job.

You will need to pick a niche and work on it like crazy. I picked online casino reviews, which is one of the toughest markets you could possibly enter, and it has taken over a year just to yield results. That said, this is a market where the average affiliate makes $10,000 + per month, and super affiliates can earn $100,000+.

I'll let you in on the fact that I am nowhere near either level, but I am seeing an upward trend in my traffic and after a long and drawn out schooling period, am hopeful that things are going to become profitable soon. Whatever you decide to get into with regards affiliate marketing, my experience so far has taught me – the more niche you can make your site, the better. A broad, general site covering a vast array of general topics will not cut the mustard. Too many people are doing it. If you want to make money, you are going to have to specialize.

Tip: If you are in an extremely competitive niche and can't get your site ranked on Google, don't forget that real-world marketing techniques like flyering, mail advertising, and cold calling can also work for online business.

3. Online Services

If you have a skill like website design, writing, programming, or sales, there is absolutely no need for you to ever enter an office environment again.

It took me roughly 8-9 months to build a big enough business that I could live off the income I was generating, but after a couple of years I can now clear roughly $4,000 per month, and that's working around 25-30 hours per week. I realize this isn't a huge amount of money by any means, but it's a start, and there are many people willing to put in more hours who clear $10k per month easily doing freelance work online.

This is something I do not recommend getting involved in unless you a) have about one year's money stashed away or b) are willing to work to build a reputation on some of the big freelancing platforms alongside your day job which pays the bills. It will be tough to start, but with a little perseverance and good work ethic, you will begin to make money.

Service businesses are not passive income in any way, shape, or form, and you will end up having to work at this like you would a normal job. The difference is you can do so from your couch, or a cafe, or wherever you want as long as there is an internet connection and you can upload files.

I've personally met someone who makes $150 on average per day researching keywords for firms which want to make their online presence known, and conducting competitor analysis. He spends his time traveling around Thailand and Southeast Asia having a whale of a time meeting hot ladies and visiting beautiful places, and does about three hours of work per day.

Much more is available if you put your back into it. The sky is the limit as far as I can see, and the only thing which stops me from making more money is my insistence on taking lots of time to read, lift weights, and travel.

Summary

So, in summary, year two has been good for me. I have built my online revenue streams up to the point where I am making $4000-$5000 per month profit, and I feel that this can easily double, then double again in the coming years.

What can you take from this? Whatever you wish. I just wanted to report my experiences.

I have no doubt some people will be inspired, some will dismiss what I am saying, and some won’t give a damn. Either way, I hope you have enjoyed this article on making cash online. If you are interested or have any questions, drop a comment and I’ll do my best to answer.

Read More: 3 Online Moneymaking Strategies You Should Avoid

Greg Freeman
G-Freedom is an oilfield technician, writer and explorer. When not off somewhere new he's thinking, in the gym, or writing on www.artofselfhood.com

Antifa Gets Destroyed By Right Wing Safety Squads In Berkeley

April 16, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On Saturday in Berkeley, California there was an alt-lite gathering that was counter-protested by antifag communists. Supporters on the right showed up in armor and proceeded to beat up the antifags, sending them running for safety. Here is the surreal footage:

At 30 seconds in, a female antifag got knocked out, sending her doo-doo dreadlocks in multiple directions. The punch went viral.

Before getting knocked out, she boasted that she was going to take “100 nazi scalps”:

She failed in her mission, and is now a meme:

> "Hit Me With Your Best Shot" (BERKELEY BEATDOWN EDITION) pic.twitter.com/pMOkISPqzJ
>
> — The Swog Blog (@TheSwogBlog) April 16, 2017

To add insult to injury, 4chan uncovered that she does hairy vagina porn (NSFW link). What's especially shocking is that she was attractive before infection with leftism, a phenomenon we have highlighted here in the past.

There were casualties on the right wing side, but field medics were quick to respond.

> VIDEO: Pro-Rally attendee pepper sprayed in Berkeley pic.twitter.com/7J2JNevwP3
>
> — Tim Pool (@Timcast) April 15, 2017

Berkeley police stood down, perhaps to allow antifa to attack Trump supporters, but instead the enemy had to run away from the field of battle in a panic.

> Trump supporters take downtown Berkley from ANTIFA. #BerkleyRiots pic.twitter.com/LqPEiso3Z3
>
> — Based Monitored □□ (@BasedMonitored) April 15, 2017

Antifa did not bring their best:

Antifa soldier

Pepsi did not halt the violence

It’s clear from what happened at Berkeley that antifa is not prepared for their violence to be met with an equal response. If you plan to attend one of these conflicts in person, be sure to shield up.

Read Next: Anti-fascist Protesters Try To Shut Down Neo-Nazi Rally In California, Get Stabbed

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Traditional West Is Man’s Best Civilization

April 16, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

Today, in some corners of our modern society, denigrating and diminishing the glories of traditional Western civilization has almost become a cultural past-time. Indeed, in academia, the media, and the entertainment industry, traditional Western civilization and its history are now routinely portrayed as being something uniquely evil and as being something which Western people should feel overwhelmingly guilty about.

But the fact is, the West, its culture, its traditions, and its civilization, is, from a perspective of human achievement and flourishing, the very best civilization that has ever existed in the history of man. And there is one easy argument that can be made to show that this is the case. So what then is this argument that purports to show that traditional Western culture and civilization—a culture born out of Greco-Roman traditions and institutions, molded by Christian philosophy and morality, and hardened by humanist ideas—is the best that the world has seen to date?

Just one of the glories of the West!

The argument, ultimately, is as simple as it is common. In fact, we use the reasoning inherent in this argument all the time, such as when we pick the best politician from an undesirable lot or when we choose the best alternative from a group of options. And so the argument is simply this: for every type of sin that the West is allegedly guilty of—racism, colonialism, war, oppression, and so on—and for every vile act that Western society has committed, every single other culture, both past and present, has done the very same things, and often to a worse degree, as the West has done; and yet, at the same time, no other culture, overall, has given humanity the benefits and gifts that traditional Western civilization has given it.

Therefore, when a relative cultural and civilizational comparison is made as to which culture has been best at the promotion and advancement of general human flourishing in the wide swath of human fields—such as medicine, law, philosophy, technology, economics, liberty, governance, and so on—traditional Western culture is undeniably the best culture that this world has ever been graced with.

Mongols…not exactly the peaceful type.

After all, and as stated earlier, the fact is that every relatively large non-Western socio-cultural group, regardless of whether it was just a small tribe or a large nation, has historically engaged in brutality, war, discrimination, slavery, racism, murder, exploitation, violence, oppression, and so on, at a scale that was commensurate with its level of sophistication and technological advancement. For example, slave-traders on the African coast received black slaves for purchase from other black Africans. And Arabs and other Middle-Easterners had a thriving slave-trade as bad or worse than that of the West (and there is still on-going de facto slavery in parts of the Middle East today).

Or consider that the brutal Mongol hordes that swept over Asia had a world war going on, as well as a colonizing empire of epic proportions, well before the West had started its own imperial march across the globe. And note that the Turkish Ottoman Empire was one of the greatest colonizers and invaders of the past few hundred years, and Turkey still occupies Cyprus to this day. Furthermore, Japanese atrocities against other Asians before and during World War 2 were as horrid as anything that the West had perpetrated; yet even the Japanese were matched by the horrors committed by Chinese communists against both their own people and other cultures. Or note that the Indian caste system was and is the height of discrimination and oppression. And never forget that the Indians of the Americas were killing themselves and taking each other as captives long before any European ever arrived on their shores.

Thus, we see that everything deplorable that the West has allegedly done, other cultures have done as well. Indeed, the West bears no greater guilt in terms of committing immoral acts than any other culture bears. And so it is utterly clear that the West has absolutely no monopoly on civilizational evil.

The Arab Slave Trade…something not often talked about when the issue of slavery is brought up.

Furthermore, it also needs to be considered that several of the supposed crimes of the West—such as some of the Crusades or the Reconquista—were, in fact, quite justified strategic defensive actions against centuries of aggression and attack from other cultures and civilizations, and so it is hard to blame the West for them.

But now consider that while the West has done nothing worse than what every other civilization has done, it is also disproportionally traditional Western and European culture that the entire world has to thank for myriad cultural innovations. Among these are the rise of empiricism and science, the deep use of reason and philosophical reflection in thinking, technological and medicinal achievements that no other culture can match, ethical and humanistic reflections that gave rise to the idea of human rights, the creation and spread of universities and other centers of learning and knowledge, beautiful art and literature, profound saints and mystics, a humanitarian impulse to help other groups and other cultures, the boon that was capitalism, strong and relatively just legal systems and courts, powerful forms of government that protect individual liberties and which created the world's most prosperous societies, more respect and rights for women and minorities than other cultures, a culture that is self-reflective and self-critical—in fact, overly self-critical—and so on and so forth.

A book no one wants you to read, for it shows that most accomplishments that have made the world a more prosperous place, have come from Western men.

Now we can debate the reason for why all these good things largely came from the West, but what we cannot deny is that when it comes to creating a society and a culture that has maximized human flourishing to a level that no other culture has, the West, quite simply, is the best.

And so, the long and short of it is this: the traditional West is the best because by almost any objective metric related to human flourishing, human achievement, and moral behavior, traditional Western culture and civilization fares no worse than any other culture, and yet it is, in many respects, substantially better than other cultures. That is why the West is the best, and that is a fact that is hard to dispute. The irony, however, is that the West has arguably made things so good and comfortable for itself, that it may have actually sowed the seeds of it own destruction through its present embrace of suicidal cultural policies and its fostering of effeminate regressive progressives.

Let us thus hope that the West can right its present regressive course in order to stay the best, for if it does not, then the world will soon become a much darker and harsher place.

Read More: How To Restore Civilization By Following St. Benedict's Example

Damian Michael

R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal.

Books.

The Thrust Is A Must (The Importance Of Core Strength)

April 16, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Yes, gentle reader, you have read the article title correctly. But bear in mind that this is not another of my several articles on human sexuality, and how you can bang like a champ. I think I have been quite instructive in that regard.

No, when I say that the thrust is a must, I use it in a purely non-sexual context. I use it to refer one of the fundamental links in the chain of your physical well being, a chain of muscles that is used in essentially all sports and most actions in your daily life. Those are the muscles of your core and hips.

An Anatomy Lesson

A lot of physical trainers, athletes, and sports broadcasting talking heads will talk about “the core” in only the vaguest of terms, leaving the uninitiated to the conclusion that it is some mythical muscle in the center of the body. That same uninitiated person will likely be confused about how to train this illusory muscle in his torso.

The core (or rather, the torso) contains an enormous amount of muscles, but the ones that are colloquially thought of as “the core” consist of:

The Rectus Abdominus, what the common man thinks of as the “abdominal” muscle

The external and internal obliques

The transverse abdominus

The various small muscles of the spine (collectively called the erector spinae)

And the muscles of the hips (gluteus maximus and minimus, the femoral abductors and adductors, and etc.)

Why Train Them?

For the very simple reason that if you wish to do ANYTHING physical, you're going to need to train the core, and train it good and hard.

Of course, there's the aesthetic benefits of having a defined abdomen, obliques, and the lean "V-Tapered" hips that the women love. But as it is a common tenet of the 'sphere that only a whore trains purely to look good to the opposite sex , we will eschew that—although training the core in the way you will learn here will indeed make you look good.

Instead, analyzing the benefits of core training will reveal many ways that a strong torso will bring "Great honor upon your house".

Martial artists have long been aware of the benefits of core training—why do you think so many styles demand that their students perform kiais as they strike? The sudden clenching and tensing of the abdomen adds power to the blows. Beyond that, proper punching and kicking form requires a muscular snapping of the waist, shoulders and/or hips. And for grappling based martial arts such as judo, jiu-jitsu both traditional and Brazilian, and all the myriad types of wrestling, you're going to need a strong torso to pick up, throw, and subdue your opponents. Simply put, if you're not training the core, you're not going to fight well.

Competitive weightlifters too need to develop tremendous torso strength, as those muscles will essentially bolster and protect the entire body—especially the vulnerable spine and internal organs—under the pressure of enormous weight.

Any sport that requires upper body techniques, be it baseball, football, basketball, golf, rowing, and so on, can only be enhanced with proper core development. And go to back to the double entendre that is the title… yeah, having a strong core will make your sex life better.

How To Train the Core

So, having convinced you of the necessity of core training, you are now likely asking how it can be done. There are of course a million glamour exercises you can do to train the core, but you all know that I eschew those. Like most things, the best way to train the core is with heavy compound exercises, both weighted and calisthenic.

Of course, the calisthenic techniques I have already taught you will come in handy: the bridge, the L-Sit, the hanging leg raise, and the gymnastic static poses.

Perhaps the ultimate calisthenic core exercise is the human flag, an exercise that I have not actually trained yet, but I'll be sure to teach you about once I've mastered it.

Ironheads are certainly not neglected in core training either: The overhead press can be very easily converted into a core training method with the overhead farmer's walk:

To perform this exercise, first do the overhead press as detailed in this article. Then, keep the back straight and avoid further bending, look straight ahead, and begin walking. Your core muscles will tense tremendously in order to keep the weight stable and the back straight.

Two of the other "core four" lifts will inherently train the core, those being the squat and the deadlift. More detailed explanations of these lifts will come in the future, but for now…

The squat is performed by resting the bar on the flexed trapezius muscles. Keeping the feet shoulder width apart, and the feet pointing naturally (ie: what feels good and natural to the individual), squat down, making sure that your back is "locked"—ie: not bent over— your knees are not turned in, and your hips are at least parallel with the knees. Preferably, you should go "ass to grass", but make sure you keep your back tight.

The deadlift is done by “standing at attention”:, making sure the bar is touching your shins, lock the tension in your lower back—in other words, keep it hollow—, and look your eyes up to the sky while keeping the head straight (this ensures proper spinal alignment). Maintaining that back tension, bend down with the legs, but keep the torso straight, and grab the bar without looking.

While grabbing onto the bar, lift with the legs until they are straight, then clench the buttocks and then lift with the hips, lifting the back straight. Make sure to “feel” the push through the floor, and keep the abdomen tight.

Beyond that, just practicing whatever athletic movement you’re interested in will train the core: throwing punches, swinging a golf club, and so forth.

Conclusion

In reading this, you might have noticed how so many fundamental maneuvers target the core. There are two things you should take away from that: 1) That the core is highly important to basic human function and 2) There’s no need to do any specific isolation exercises for it, as doing those basic lifts and calisthenics will sufficiently hit the core.

If “weak hands make a weak man”—and they do—then “the thrust is a must” can be another fitness aphorism for all physical culturists.

Read More: Why You Should Skip Crunches And Do These Ab Exercises Instead

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

6 Ways To Free Yourself From A Cycle Of Weakness

April 17, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

With our society doing everything it can to keep men down and prevent us from reaching our full potentials, it has become more imperative than ever to learn how to overcome this detrimental influence. The modern world that we live in needs men to be domesticated, weak, and controlled so that women, the state, and the elites can gain in power and wealth at our expense. Towards realizing this project, it induces learned helplessness using social institutions, the media, and the cultural currents to crush men's spirit and decimate any sign of masculinity. Here are practical methods you can use to fight back against the forces that undermine you as a man.

1. Understand the nature of learned helplessness

First thing you need to do is to understand the psychology behind learned helplessness. Learned helplessness happens when you are trapped in a situation where all your efforts to escape from it has resulted in failure. Those repeated failures will discourage you from taking any future actions as an evolutionary response to help you preserve energy for a better opportunity that may come in the future (or for someone to come and rescue you). The thing is, while this psychological mechanism may be helpful in nature, our modern society has a way of triggering learned helplessness through artificial means. For example, experiments have shown that dogs who have been conditioned to feel hopeless about their chances of escaping electric shocks in a cage will not even make the attempt even when they are physically capable of doing so.

The same happens to the average man in Western society, where he is made to sit down and obey in a controlled environment starting from his childhood. He is to do as he's told and submit his masculinity to service the interests of women and the state. He is shamed, belittled, and attacked by the society around him to feel guilty about being a man. His very existence must be discouraged to allow the engineered society to flourish while he suffers.

It’s a deadly cycle.

The consequences of learned helplessness are that you stop trying, you start rationalizing and blaming to preserve your ego, you find scapegoats to take out your frustrations on, you numb yourself with distractions, you fall into a cycle of negativity, and you start to feel angry and depressed about your life situation. The worst part is, most men who are inflicted with this syndrome are completely unaware of it and are in denial. It takes a real man to admit that he’s stuck in a rut and that he needs to kick himself in the ass to get going again.

2. Identify your area of weakness

Now that you know what learned helplessness is, the next step is for you to uncover the source of your problem. Identifying your weakness alone isn't going to solve the issue on its own, but it will help you deal with it. Try to be as specific as possible in identifying exactly what makes you feel so powerless and why. Discover your root fear, investigate why you feel angry, decipher your thought process, and recognize the self-fulfilling cycle of defeatism that you trap yourself in. There is no judgment here. This is simply a chance for you to become aware of your motivations and inner workings in the face of your situation.

At this stage, it's important to notice how addictive it is to justify your position as being unchangeable. By telling yourself that you're in the situation you're in now because of the injustice of the world can make you feel righteous. It starts to become intoxicating as you see yourself as a tragic hero who endures the wrongs thrown at you. Taken too far, you'll start to come up with justifications as to why you don't try to change things anymore. You'll start to feel comfortable in the negativity. You must snap out of this.

3. Practice letting go

Before you motivate yourself into making an effort again, it's important to take care of your internal state first. You must learn to let go. Let go of all the anxious longings and desperate wants that will only leave you fragile.

Know that you don't need desire to gain success; success comes with action. The thing is, desire can either help you with that action or hamper it. If you are inexperienced and suffer from learned helplessness, it usually hampers you more than it helps you. So what should you do, you ask? You must let go of that desire from within. One technique I recently learned for letting go is to simply take a deep breath to release any tension so that you'll be grounded in the present moment—no fancy mantras required. Just be aware of your inner desire and make the conscious decision to let go for your own sake.

You can also try using a technique by Napoleon Hill who suggests imagining yourself already having achieved whatever it is that you desire. He doesn't really explain the psychology behind it, but I am confident that it is a way of reducing the anxiety that comes with scarcity that obstructs your ability to take decisive action.

Now, some of you may become resistant to the idea of letting go of desire. You may wonder if surrendering your want is the same thing as giving up and conceding defeat, which is what I used to believe as well. But to the contrary, learning to let go will actually help you. To understand, know that your desire is not the same as your passion. And that to succeed, what you need are discipline, dedication, and organization, not mere wants and wishes. Millions of people who merely dream and hope without any accomplishment are a proof to this fact.

4. Create small victories

With learned helplessness, it's critical that you gain your sense of power back by doing things that restores your belief in your own abilities. You may be inclined to tackle that big goal you have in mind that you've been putting off since forever, but your best bet is actually to start with something small. You've been procrastinating precisely because the thing you want to accomplish is too large for you to tackle, so either break it down into manageable chunks or do something easier to get you into a momentum. Once you are able to accomplish the smaller objective, you'll have the confidence and the motivation to go for a larger goal. You can continue on and build on your success to do greater and greater things.

5. Stop saying that you can’t

When you suffer from learned helplessness, you’re much more likely to blame others, make excuses, and give up without even putting in any real effort. And the most visible symptom of this condition is just how often you tell yourself and others that you “can’t.” But behind every can’t there is fear, insecurity, poor planning, a lack of will, and endless excuses.

If you were to closely investigate your can’ts, you’ll discover that it is usually a matter of “I won’t” rather than “I can’t.” Lack of action is a choice you make on your part, not a physical restriction. Try it yourself by countering all your can’ts by asking yourself “why?” over and over again until you get to the bottom of the issue that will uncover the harsh truth. And if you ever encounter an obstacle that is too big and seemingly impossible, follow the previous advice about breaking down your goal into a manageable chunk or focus on something smaller that you can manage. As for matters you have absolutely no power over, you’ll have to develop the wisdom to recognize them and forget about them.

6. Ignore other men who disparage you

“Why are you losers making such a big fuss? I don’t even have to make an effort to get a line of women begging for a chance to suck my dick.”

Any man who brags about his exploits, social status, or material wealth is not interested helping fellow man and is only interested in feeding his own ego at your expense. It’s not like they’re obligated to help you out for nothing, but if they’re not offering anything useful and is mocking your efforts in any way, you don’t have any reason to take their shit.

You’ll often hear them say things like, “men today are such pussies” (meaning they’re so much better than the other men) and say generally disparaging remarks about men in general, or casually mention how it’s so easy for them to attract gorgeous women (because they’re such alphas). This is nothing but their attempts at alpha-signalling much like how modern women use the social media to attention-whore. Instead of paying attention to these men who are begging for your recognition, it’s best to take advice from those who have been in similar circumstances as you and have overcome it. Those are the men who can give you practical and actionable advice to help you escape your trap and improve yourself.

Now, on the flip side, you have men who will hate you for trying because they aren’t—it reminds them of their own shortcomings and the fact that they have essentially given up. The obvious example here are the loser men who insult others for trying to form relationship with women by calling them “pussy beggars.” Because the men who make the effort and become successful remind them of their own failures, the only thing these losers can do is to attack others and hope that they fail too. Ignore these men and let them stew in their own misery.

Conclusion

Trying to flip the script on learned helplessness is not an easy task and it will take many failures and trying to start seeing results. As I’ve said, try to focus on the smaller victories to get the momentum going and don’t ever give up. If you need a bit of motivation, imagine meeting your future self face to face. How will you answer to him? Put in the effort now to make him proud that you gave your best when you had the chance; don’t disappoint him that you didn’t start taking action now. You owe it yourself.

To learn more about the ways in which men struggle against the current of our modern world, read ‘Man’s Fight for Existence‘, the ultimate manifesto for our times’

Read More: Powerful Men Who Were Undone By Weakness

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

How Wealthy Americans Dodge Taxes

April 17, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The American tax system is graduated, with the wealthier paying a higher amount. Whether or not this should be so is debatable. Arguments in favor are that they have a greater ability to pay and that they receive the most benefits from the system. Still, some very wealthy individuals end up paying a smaller proportion of their income in taxes than most working stiffs. How does this happen?

A closer look at the tax table

Taxation, Dutch style

Currently, adjusted gross income less deductions and exemptions is taxed at increasing brackets. For a single filer (2017 figures), it looks like this:

- $0-9325: 10%
- $9325-37,950: 15%

- $37,950-91,900: 25%
- $91,900-191,650: 28%
- $191,650-416,700: 33%
- $416,700-418,400: 35%
- $418,400 and up: 39.6%

So the first $9325 anyone makes, no matter how wealthy, gets taxed at 10%; the rest up to $37,950 at 15%; and so forth. (In case you're wondering about the weird $416,700-418,400 bracket, it resulted from a compromise following a budget impasse in 2012. Bush the Younger's tax cuts were extended permanently to them and below; those above reverted to the Clinton rate.) The 39.6% tax rate—once you get there—is pretty punishing, but there are ways to soften the blow.

A great way to do that is with investment income. It's a complicated subject, but the short version is that if you sell property or a stock position after holding it for over a year, it's taxed at 15%; otherwise, it's 30% (still not too bad for high rollers). Note that CEO salaries are only part of their income; they often get stock options too. Also, losses offset gains; that helped me out once. At the best company I ever worked for, Superboy the CEO got hired on with a multi-million dollar salary, wrecked the company, and escaped on a golden parachute, but not before my job was "offshored". At least I got a modest writeoff on my company stock that he trashed.

All told, that seems a bit weird—why are investment gains treated differently? Why isn't investment income just income? This is to incentivize long term holds, reducing casino-style churn in the stock market. Following that 2012 compromise, Congress did impose a 3.8% increase for single filers with incomes at $200K or joint filers at $250K. Still, paying 18.8% on a long-term investment is considerably better than paying at the higher brackets. There are macroeconomic effects; this is a boost for Wall Street, at the expense of federal revenue.

Also, workers are dinged for FICA tax. As of 2017, this includes 6.2% of gross income for Social Security (the employer contributes the same amount too), and 1.45% for Medicare. If you're self-employed, it's 12.4% and 2.9%. However, Social Security tax is capped at incomes of $127,200; you pay nothing more after reaching that limit. Also, FICA isn't imposed on investment income.

Legal tax breaks

Most of the good stuff is in Schedule A and Schedule D

Retirement accounts, such as traditional and Roth 401K and IRA plans, are tax-deferred. Also, you can make all the short-term trades you want, and the only consequence is pissing off the plan's administrators. There are modest annual contribution limits, but most people don't max them out, because they've got bills to pay. There's another tax-advantaged program to save for a child's education; though it's not quite what it used to be.

Home ownership provides modest tax advantages. Interest, property taxes, and PMI can be counted on the 1040 Schedule A. (Above a certain income limit, interest deductions taper out.) You also can count other things on Schedule A, such as charitable contributions, medical expenses above a certain amount, local taxes, and so forth. All told, itemizing could get you a better deal than your standard deduction. This is generally considered a middle class tax break, though it must be pretty cool to write off the property taxes on a mansion too.

Corporations also get a number of breaks. They can set up foreign shell corporations and move their operations to whichever country provides the best tax breaks and cheapest labor. For example, one automobile company in particular has a scheme whereby they move parts several times between the US and Mexican border, finishing the parts a little further at each step. That was engineered to maximize tax advantages. Is that an art or a science?

Also, a corporation can file bankruptcy without getting the officers a ten year blot on their personal credit rating. They even can run the company straight into the ground while pocketing a big salary, if they choose. Likewise, they can do a leveraged buyout and plunder another corporation.

The tax system is pretty screwy, and the government is aware of this. The Alternative Minimum Tax (line 45 on your 1040 form) was an attempt to deal with the loophole problem. I passed engineering calculus in college, but still I can't wrap my little mind around this one. In response, the financial industry has created a number of AMT-free funds, so there are loopholes for that one too.

Funny money

Creative accountants can work miracles

There's nothing wrong with taking advantage of tax breaks, if you're following the letter and spirit of the law, but not everyone plays by the rules. For the wealthy, the possibilities for fudging the numbers increase, such as fake business expenses. One boss I worked for, a former millionaire, wrote off his Mercedes as a "company vehicle". (A used rice burner simply won't do for someone with narcissistic personality disorder.) There are rules about fleet vehicles, but it's pretty much a matter of not getting caught with your hand in the cookie jar. Another former boss, a multi-billionaire, had a private resort in Vail, Colorado that he disguised as a fictitious corporate branch office. Awesome gravy!

Charitable contributions are a way to contribute to one's favorite nonprofits and get a writeoff. Hopefully it's for an actual humanitarian effort rather than a nasty leftist activism outfit, but yanno… Other than that, lying about the value of donated goods is as easy as saying "I didn't inhale." All that is theoretically subject to scrutiny. Still, someone could fudge the numbers so long as one doesn't get greedy enough with it to get audited.

Again, offshore operations can help too. The government has cracked down on Swiss bank accounts, but the Cayman Islands refuses to cooperate. One attorney I knew, who had a very colorful history, used to fly there with suitcases full of money—about a million on each weekly trip. Everyone thought she was a rich tourist out for scuba diving, rather than a money launderer for a drug operation.

Scams on the low end of the income spectrum

Illegal aliens going to the USA, Uncle Sugar Land

Interestingly, the very poor have opportunities for tax fraud too. Earned Income Credit is a weird reverse income tax intended to help the working poor, but the system can be abused. Setting up a fictitious small business and claiming just enough income from that (but not too much) gets a decent payback. Having at least three minor children maximizes this. Not having a man in the house to help raise the kids is beneficial, since filing "head of household" gets better rates. Friendly tax consultants will help with the paperwork as needed. April 15 is basically a national holiday in many bad neighborhoods.

Other than that, working for cash only (like day laborers) avoids income taxes and FICA. You're supposed to declare that, but yanno… On paper, they're still poor enough to mooch off of several programs paid for by everyone else. Here's something I found online a few years back:

John vs. Juan

You have two families: “John Legal” and “Juan Illegal”. Both families have two parents, two children, and live in Arizona. John Legal works in construction, has a Social Security Number and makes $25.00 per hour with taxes deducted. Juan Illegal also works in construction, has NO Social Security Number, and gets paid $15.00 in cash “under the table”. Ready? Now pay attention…

- John Legal: $25.00 per hour x 40 hours = $1000.00 per week, or $52,000.00 per year. Now take 30% away for state and federal tax; John Legal now has $31,231.00.
- Juan Illegal: $15.00 per hour x 40 hours = $600.00 per week, or $31,200 per year. Juan Illegal pays no taxes. Juan Illegal now has $31,200.00.
- John Legal pays medical and dental insurance with limited coverage for his family at $600.00 per month, or $7,200.00 per year. John Legal now has $24,031.00.
- Juan Illegal has full medical and dental coverage through the state and local clinics and emergency hospitals at a cost of $0.00 per year. Juan Illegal still has $31,200.00.
- John Legal makes too much money and is not eligible for food stamps or welfare. John Legal pays $500.00 per month for food, or $6,000.00 per year. John Legal now has $18,031.00.
- Juan Illegal has no documented income and is eligible for food stamps, WIC and welfare. Juan Illegal still has $31,200.00.
- John Legal pays rent of $1,200.00 per month, or $14,400.00 per year. John Legal now has 9,631.00.
- Juan Illegal receives a $500.00 per month Federal Rent Subsidy. Juan Illegal pays out that $500.00 per month, or $6,000.00 per year. Juan Illegal still has $ 31,200.00.
- John Legal pays $200.00 per month, or $2,400.00 for car insurance. Some of that is uninsured motorist insurance. John Legal now has $7,231.00.
- Juan Illegal says, “We don’t need no stinkin’ insurance!” and still has $31,200.00.
- John Legal has to make his $7,231.00 stretch to pay utilities, gasoline, etc.
- Juan Illegal has to make his $31,200.00 stretch to pay utilities, gasoline, and what he sends out of the country every month.
- John Legal now works overtime on Saturdays or gets a part time job after work.
- Juan Illegal has nights and weekends off to enjoy with his family.
- John Legal’s and Juan Illegal’s children both attend the same elementary school. John Legal pays for his children’s lunches, while Juan Illegal’s children get a government sponsored lunch. Juan Illegal’s children have an after school ESL program. John Legal’s children go home.
- Now, when they reach college age, John Legal’s kids may not get into a State School and may not qualify for scholarships, grants or other tuition help, even though John has been paying for state schools through his taxes, while Juan Illegal’s kids “go to the head of the class" because they are a minority.

- John Legal and Juan Illegal both enjoy the same police and fire services, but John paid for them and Juan did not pay.

If you vote for or support any politician that supports illegal aliens… You are part of the problem!

How it was and how things are now

Long term budget outlook, actual figures as of 2017 with future projections of national debt to GDP. It's time to fix this before we go the way of Greece.

The federal government used to fund itself pretty much exclusively on tariffs. This incentivized American companies to keep factory operations within the USA, a benefit for working people here. Income tax started as a modest tax on the very wealthy. It expanded greatly in WWI, and went sky-high in WWII, far beyond what we have today. Also, the New Deal created the FICA tax. Today, that's a pretty hefty chunk of federal revenue and likely to grow larger in the future. After the "free trade" gold fever, tariffs are now a tiny sliver of revenue.

Even all that doesn't cover the government's spending. The USA has had a problem with budget deficits since the Spanish-American War. WWI (the "war to end all wars") didn't help; the USA should've stayed out of that one, but all that's another discussion. We also made very generous loans to other countries then, and only Finland paid everything back. WWII (the "war to make the world safe for democracy") drove the national debt through the roof. Later, the arms race with the Soviet Union, and several spit-in-your-eye wars against Communist regimes and Middle Eastern despots, added to the millstone of debt.

Only during the 1990s tech boom has the USA been able to make much effort toward paying it down. This unsustainable spending is enabled by the Federal Reserve, a private banking consortium. All that will have to be repaid, with interest. I'm not a big Ross Perot fan, but he got it right about fiscal responsibility. We need to get serious about things like government waste, pork barrel spending, unsustainable social programs, and misguided foreign aid.

Now I really get political (you knew I would)

Taxation, Russian style

The existence of champagne Socialists is a strange paradox. They're wealthy, yet support economically leftist policies. Marxists say that rightist proletarians are class enemies who exhibit false consciousness; in these terms, champagne Socialists are all this in drag. More troubling is their support for socially leftist policies, but all that's another story.

So then, why do they support things like higher taxes for themselves and social programs that act as income redistribution schemes? Is it because they're so gosh darn generous? Think again. Whatever their political persuasion, the rich aren't burdened by high taxes as much as you might expect, if they play their cards right.

Wealthy liberals actually are very generous—with other people's money. Middle class working stiffs who play by the rules get the least amount of breaks from the system. Washington legislates costly social programs, and Middle America pays a pretty big part of the bill. We also suffer other effects of their social engineering, of course. Further, government dependency creates other problems, but once again, all that's another story.

Read More: How The Government Is Robbing Men Of Good Wives

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Permanent Irritation: Why Nothing Will Change With North Korea

April 17, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

There has been much talk in the news of possible military action of some sort on the Korean peninsula. Western observers—the United States in particular—suspect that the North Korean government is planning shortly to test a nuclear device. Before, US officials have repeatedly expressed their dissatisfaction to their Chinese counterparts regarding North Korea's refusal to abide by its previous treaty obligations. Compounding the confusion are recent statements by President Trump that he plans "solve" the North Korean problem one way or another.

Despite all the hype and all the talk, however, all sides know that little is going to change in the region. The permanent state of irritation in the region will continue. Everyone involved simply has too much too lose; only a suicidal fool would launch an unprovoked act of aggression in the area. We will explain here why this is so.

China's posture in Northeast Asia has traditionally been to keep competitive foreign powers at a distance. South Korea and Japan are China's rivals in the region, and Beijing has absolutely no desire to see either of them engaged in a war along its northern border. From the Chinese perspective, North Korea is an ideal neighbor: it is essentially like having one's own pit bull at the front door, keeping away any unwanted intruders. Pyongyang is hostile, xenophobic, and militant, all qualities to be valued in a guard-dog. China is not about to jeopardize its security by doing anything meaningful to "rein in" its depraved border gargoyle.

China has every reason historically to fear foreign incursions in the region. There were a series of invasions of Korea from Japan from 1592 to 1598. The Chinese intervened to support their vassal state and repelled the Japanese invaders, and a truce was reached roughly where the North-South border stands today. Another incursion into Korea from Japan came in the 1890s. Again, China tried to repel the invaders, but was not successful; Korea became a Japanese protectorate.

In the Korean War of 1950-1953, the United States' attempt to occupy the entire peninsula was met with a massive Chinese intervention that saved its North Korean ally from destruction. These interventions by China were not based on altruism, but on security considerations. No matter what, China does not want to see powerful foreign states on its doorstep. This is entirely logical and no one can blame them for it; we need only remember the Cuban Missile Crisis to see how the US acted when a foreign power attempted to intrude on its own sphere of influence. We mention these historical events to make the point that China sees North Korea as vital to its security. It will not do anything meaningful to undermine its own security interests. This seems to be lost on US planners, who keep trying vainly to pressure Beijing to do things it will never do.

This is not to say that Beijing is entirely happy with the situation. It does not like North Korea's insistence on conducting nuclear tests. While Pyongyang is contemptuous of the world's judgment, Beijing cares very much about how it is perceived by the world. Being associated with a state that counterfeits currency, deals drugs, and kidnaps people is hardly good for public relations. But the cold, hard reality is that Beijing is willing to swallow its neighbor's uglier side to preserve its larger purposes.

So China will confine itself to cosmetic measures designed to appease the Americans but which in reality do nothing: it will suspend flights between itself and North Korea, shuffle some troops around on its borders, issue meaningless platitudes about peace, and every now and then shut the lights off in North Korea. There may come a time when Beijing racks up its abacus and decides that the cost of keeping the pit bull outweighs the benefit the dog is providing. But that time is a long way off.

North Korea, South Korea and Japan have their own security considerations; none of them want war, either. For all its bluster and bombast, the reality is that Kim Jong-Un is more interested in consolidating his hold on his people than engaging in reckless military adventures. His recent purges have ensured that his position is now unchallenged. For him, nuclear weapons are an insurance policy: insurance against both the West and China. From his perspective, he wants to make himself such a thorn in everyone's side that the big players will conclude that it is simply too much trouble to get rid of him. He wants to engineer a situation where he is more valuable on the throne than off it. Keeping his people and his military in a permanent state of frenzy and crisis suits his purposes; this is right out of the Basic Dictator Handbook.

From Japan's perspective, it wants no trouble, either. It knows its military is in no position (yet) to mount a challenge to regional rivals. It will need at least another 5 to 10 years to modernize its military and try to overcome decades of pacifist stagnation. South Korea, of course, has absolutely no desire to see any trouble break out. It knows that it will be the battleground in any conflict and that the entire society would be laid waste. The United States must also realize that the status quo is certainly much better than anything else. It has lived with a nuclear North Korea for a while and has no choice but to continue to do so. Of course, it must keep a close watch on the situation, since North Korea has never abandoned its goal of conquering the entire peninsula by force. But if any aggression were to happen, it knows that North Korea must take the international blame as the aggressor, as it did in 1950. Only in this way can it preserve any moral high ground in a conflict.

When all is said and done, nothing will change. The media hysteria means very little. The situation will continue to be what it has been for many decades: a state of permanent irritation. All the actors have done their calculations, and everyone realizes that the status quo—while not perfect—is far better than any alternative.

Read More: 10 Facts Regarding The US Strike On Syria

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Bob Dylan’s “The Times They Are A-Changin’” Is Our Song Now

April 18, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The music industry, alongside the movie industry, has been at the forefront of leftist causes, promoting their agenda through the pop stars of the day. This included Bob Dylan, who was actively involved in the black Civil Rights movement. He produced a song called “The Times They Are A-Changing'” to persuade white people and Congressmen to adopt a far-left agenda to institutionalize white guilt more effectively. While the song was intended as an admonishment to conservatives to get with the times, it can now be re-imagined as a boastful screed against modern liberals.

> Come gather ’round people
> Wherever you roam
> And admit that the waters
> Around you have grown
> And accept it that soon
> You’ll be drenched to the bone
> If your time to you
> Is worth savin’
> Then you better start swimmin’
> Or you’ll sink like a stone
> For the times they are a-changin’.

Admit that multiculturalism and globalism has failed. These ideologies are not compatible with the nature of humanity, and so it must be discarded before it leads to the ruin of you and your loved ones. There are only two sexes, all races are different, and borders are essential for nations. We gave neo-liberalism a chance, but it has put the world on the precipice of civilizational collapse, after already destroying our souls, and now you must accept that the times are a changing.

> Come writers and critics
> Who prophesize with your pen
> And keep your eyes wide
> The chance won't come again
> And don't speak too soon
> For the wheel's still in spin
> And there's no tellin' who
> That it's namin'
> For the loser now
> Will be later to win
> For the times they are a-changin'.

For those of you who work in the controlled mainstream media, who betray your nation with every word you type, all for a measly salary, you must accept the will of the American people. Present them with the truth instead of acting as the communist opposition party. In the past, your content controlled the collective minds of the nation, but it has become impotent and ineffective, a laughing stock that makes your job on par with that of being a cocktail waitress. Your power is fading, so raise you right hand to your temple and salute the great flag of America, because the times are a changing.

> Come senators, congressmen
> Please heed the call
> Don't stand in the doorway
> Don't block up the hall
> For he that gets hurt
> Will be he who has stalled
> There's a battle outside
> And it is ragin'
> It'll soon shake your windows
> And rattle your walls
> For the times they are a-changin'.

If you're a Congressman, tell your billionaire sponsor that you don't fear their blackmail, because now you must aid in passing Trump's agenda. If not, you will be steamrolled by him and your disgruntled constituency. Quit the cuckold behavior and execute the needed measures that defeat globalism. We don't want to hear excuses and we don't want to see you plug your fingers in your ears. Either represent us or we'll find someone who does, because the times are a changing.

> Come mothers and fathers
> Throughout the land
> And don't criticize
> What you can't understand
> Your sons and your daughters

> Are beyond your command
> Your old road is > Rapidly agin'
> Please get out of the new one
> If you can't lend your hand
> For the times they are a-changin'.

Boomer parents, you have failed in the raising of your millennial sons and daughters. You are sending them to universities as children and they're coming back to you after four years as infants, saddled with tens of thousands of dollars in debt while you suck away the remaining wealth of the nation. This is your failing as much as it is theirs. You have not taught them to be adults, not taught them the ways of tradition, not taught them how to succeed in American society. You have created the biggest class of mentally ill individuals the world has seen, so we demand you make way for those who have been raised right, who know the truth, and whose righteous speech has been heard in spite of you children's efforts to censor them. Grab your insolent spawn and step aside, because the times are a changing.

> The line it is drawn
> The curse it is cast
> The slow one now
> Will later be fast
> As the present now
> Will later be past
> The order is > Rapidly fadin'
> And the first one now
> Will later be last
> For the times they are a-changin'.

While you were crowing about 'the end of history' during the Obama era, and salivating at the prospect of a permanent progressive state, we were sharpening our swords and tongues. Your new world order is dead, and the new one will fix the grievous harm you've done to society in the false name of virtue and progress. Get on board now or be left in the dust, because the times are a changing, and we're not going back to how things were.

Thank you Bob Dylan for writing our theme song, and if that wasn't your intention, too bad, because it's our song now.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: John Lennon's "Imagine" Programmed You To Accept The Globalism Nightmare

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Myths In America That Cry Out For Realtalk

April 18, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The more wisdom a thinking man gleans as he walks through this cosmic joke known as life, he begins to see lies everywhere. Lies and myths designed to make men pliable for other men to exploit. Most men never figure out the mental and literal prison they've been placed into as social engineers and PR flacks tirelessly cheer the mantra of "Freedom!" while the average man knows nothing of what it is to move through life of his own volition and decision making.

Just as with fashion, people ridicule the myths of other societies while slavishly following the myths of their own society. It is verboten to call into question common wisdom and worse, negate it with logic and reason. These are thought crimes beyond measure for most.

But we are men who decided to swallow the Red Pill. So, here are 5 of the most insidious myths of modern times.

5. The American Dream is alive and well

The humble home, decent wife, and two loving kids are a pipe dream, not The American Dream

Ah, the white picket fence. An attractive, loyal wife. 2.1 children. You know, the traditional American Dream that kept men motivated to produce and build up society. Here's the official definition of what the dream was in The Golden Age of our nation:

> The ideal that everyone should have an equal opportunity to achieve success and prosperity through hard work, determination, and initiative.

It hasn't quite worked out that way. George Carlin put what it has become in modern times more succinctly and accurately:

> It's called the American Dream because you have to be asleep to believe it.

Want some statistics to back this claim up? These numbers come from the Economic Policy Institute. Before you poo-poo the source, realize the whole left-right paradigm is designed to keep people fighting amongst each other. Neither side is totally correct or wrong. The left, as wrong as it is on so many issues, actually makes some good points on labor issues. Such as:

- The U.S. middle class had $17,867 less income in 2007 than in 1979, when adjusted for inflation.
- From 1973 to 2013, hourly compensation of a typical (production/nonsupervisory) worker rose just 9% while productivity increased 74%.
- Top 1% wages grew 138%, while wages of the bottom 90% grew just 15%. If the wages of the bottom 90% had grown at the average pace over this period—meaning that wages grew equally across-the-board—then the bottom 90%'s wages would have grown by 32%, more than double the actual growth.
- Over the entire 34-year period between 1979 and 2013, the hourly wages of middle-wage workers were stagnant, rising just 6%. The wages of middle-wage workers were totally flat or in decline over the 1980s, 1990s and 2000s, except for the late 1990s. The wages of low-wage workers fared even worse, falling 5% from 1979 to 2013. In contrast, the hourly wages of high-wage workers rose 41%
- In 2013, inflation-adjusted hourly wages of young college graduates were lower than they were in the late 1990s, a trend that held for both young male and female college graduates.

Translation, people are working harder than ever, producing more (in stark contrast to the “lazy American worker” trope promulgated by the media) and yet taking home less. This means fewer people can buy homes, cars, and live prosperous lives. Not to mention the destruction of all things feminine brought on by feminism make The American Dream a pipe dream.

4. Women are systematically oppressed

American women may be many things, like decadent and solipsistic, but oppressed they are not

One only need catch an episode of The Real Housewives of Whatever City to see the decadent lives of totally wasteful materialism and consumerism modern women lead. Half of these worthless bags of protoplasm don’t just buy plastic merchandise for their homes, they graft it onto their bodies with face, ass, and boob jobs.

That’s just the upper crust of society. Down here on the bottom, one only need walk into a grocery store to see women with fatherless children paying for their haul of free food with an EBT card, free dairy with WIC, on top of collecting child support from daddy who’s now an economic slave with the lash of the child support system bearing down on him.

The reality is American women are the most spoiled, entitled class of people to ever walk this earth. They have more power than men ever will. This duality of American women’s behavior – claiming to be victims while living like queens – dates back to the Puritan foundations of the nation, a topic I recently wrote about.

Here’s more proof women aren’t oppressed. Females make 80% of all purchasing decisions in the economy and they spend 90% more than they earn over the course of a lifetime. That sounds like royalty, not victimhood.

3. The drug war is about public safety

The war on a plant is really part of the War on You

Bottom line, the drug war is about eliminating economic competition. Drug dealers run on a cash economy the government has a hard time taxing and are their own bosses. They're not subjected to the growing, total micromanagement of their lives corporate drones are. In many ways, as Walter White showed us, they're their own men. The government doesn't want that. It wants subjects to rule and terrorize. (The Drug War goes hand in hand with the War on Sex.)

The reason there's violence is not because drug dealers are innately evil. Drugs are readily available all around me, but because law enforcement is lax, there is very little violence where I live part-time on the island of Hispaniola. Violence happens every time a Prohibition is passed. When the Prohibition on alcohol was passed, booze immediately shifted to the black market and we saw everything from Al Capone to Bonnie and Clyde. From the Ganzel Group:

> Because of Prohibition, organized crime increased, especially in major cities. Gangsters got richer and more violent as they fought over control of liquor sales and other illegal activities such as prostitution and gambling, which also grew during the 1930s. The public was fascinated by big-city mob bosses who became the subject of newspaper stories and movies. Although they were far from urban speakeasies and gangland crime, rural residents also were fascinated by the underworld activities of mobsters. Gangs and outlaws with names like "Pretty Boy Floyd," "Baby Face" Nelson, Ma and Fred Barker, and Bonnie and Clyde grabbed newspaper headlines. John Dillinger's armed robberies took place mostly in the Midwest, and he was named "Public Enemy Number One."

H.L. Mencken wrote:

> Prohibition has not only failed in its promises but actually created additional serious and disturbing social problems throughout society. There is not less drunkenness in the Republic but more. There is not less crime, but more. … The cost of government is not smaller, but vastly greater. Respect for law has not increased, but diminished.

Sound familiar? It's because that's exactly what's playing out today, except with marijuana and cocaine. Has the 40-year War on Drugs yielded any results? A trillion dollars has been spent and rates of drug usage remain constant. There are slight ticks up and down but overall there hasn't been any change in the number of recreational users and addicts.

What has changed is America has become the biggest prison state on the planet since the Drug War started back in the days of Nixon, with more of a percentage of its populace in prison than any other nation on earth. Most of those in prison are there for drug crimes.

2. New diseases threaten your safety

Diseases named after chickens and pigs are supposed to terrify you

Plague terror is what its opponents refer to it as. The fear mongering over “your safety” covers many areas of life, but medical issues are one of the most insidious ways the media and government instill fear in the hearts of men. Here’s an example of some of the things that were supposed to “kill us all” in the last 15 years:

- 2002, the media said West Nile will kill us all
- 2004, SARS will kill us all
- 2005, Bird Flu will kill us all
- 2009, Swine Flu will kill us all
- 2014, Ebola will kill us all
- 2016, Zika will kill us all

We’ll see what they dredge up this year.

Incidentally, HIV/AIDS has been one of the most successful campaigns of plague terror ever foisted on the populace by government overlords. It literally made people scared to have sex, and even when they did a condom was a must. (Was it all just another population reduction measure? In other words, scare the masses so bad everybody starts using condoms so as to reduce pregnancies.)

The bottom line is, you are NOT going to contract HIV from having straight, heterosexual vaginal intercourse. The Centers for Disease Control’s own statistics state there is a 4 in 10,000 chance for a man to contract HIV from having sex with a woman. Don’t believe me? Here’s the link. The average person has sex once a week. Let’s say they fuck from age 18 to age 75 once a week. That’s roughly 3,000 sexual encounters in an entire lifetime. A man would literally have to have sex for 3 lifetimes in order to be guaranteed to contract the disease through heterosexual intercourse. And that’s unprotected sex every single time with an infected person!

Some journalists are questioning if the disease called HIV/AIDS even exists in the capacity we have been led to believe it does. Joan Shenton has been one of the most vocal, and attacked, critics of plague terror of the last two generations. Brent Leung, who produced the film House of Numbers is another.

To this day, it remains confined to risk groups (gays and IV drug users) and has never spread to become the heterosexual epidemic we were scared out of our wits about in the 1980s and 1990s.

The least personal freedom I have experienced thus far has been right here at home

1. America is a free country

Of all the places this author has been, without a doubt America offers the least freedom. By far. All the important decisions are already made for a person, and if they step out of line there are police everywhere ready to arrest you for everything from renting a sexual encounter to smoking a joint to driving too fast to not tithing your masters enough money each April 15th.

Obey your masters is drilled into the minds of children from kindergarten. A boy's decisions are already made for him from age 5 to age 18. Go to school and listen to what we want you to hear, or your parents will go to jail. After 13 years of brainwashing, he then goes on to college to chase the promises he was made only to find he is saddled with an average of $30,000 in debt that isn't dischargeable even in bankruptcy and is trapped in a job he can't escape because of "life debt" i.e. needing food to eat, clothes to wear, and a roof over his head.

The entire society is geared towards turning people into what Herbert Hoover called "Happiness Machines" or consummate consumers who work themselves to death from cradle to grave so they can mindlessly consume. Shopping and eating out are the national religions. There's never time to stop and smell the roses, contemplate life, or take a nice, long break from it all.

More, more, more is the mantra.

In truth, while abject slavery was abolished the new model is economic slavery. Try as a man might, there is almost no escape from this system. Nearly every avenue of escape has been closed off.

Revealing words from the patriarch of a prominent political family show us the mythmakers' mentality

The Mythmakers

All this mythmaking does pose some risk for those making the myth. George H.W. Bush or "Pappy" as he's known in the Bush circle reportedly made this revealing statement back in 1991:

> If the American people knew what we have done, they would string us up from the lamp posts.

Indeed, if there wasn't so much propaganda and a totally controlled and compliant corporate media shoveling manure into the eyes and ears of the masses on a daily basis, there might be a threat to the power structure. Perhaps those making the myth learned a lesson from a former foe they vanquished in their game of world domination.

> How fortunate for leaders that men do not think… Make the lie big, make it simple, keep saying it, and eventually they will believe it.

Words spoken by Hitler that still ring true today.

Read More: Prohibition In America: The Intersection Of Women And Capitalists

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

The Battle Of Berkeley Signals The Arrival Of A True Right-Wing Movement

April 18, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

This past weekend, antifascist "antifa" groups attacked a peaceful Trump rally in Berkeley California. The goal of the antifa attack was to deprive these Trump supporters of their constitutional right of assembly. In the past, conservatives relied exclusively on law enforcement to protect them. For whatever reason, the Berkeley police did nothing. That left the Trump supporters with an option—turn tail and run, or fight against the antifa. Unlike their conservative predecessors who would have retreated, the young men of a new nationalist movement took the fight back to the antifa, and scored a historic victory.

But what is the significance of the Battle of Berkeley, and what is coming in the future?

1. The US now has a real right-wing movement

> Militias, alt-right, nazis etc won today in Berkeley. They outnumbered the opposition, pushed it back, and held downtown. Today's America. pic.twitter.com/0l0lcOn822
>
> — Shane Bauer (@shane_bauer) April 15, 2017

Up until recently, the US didn't have a true right-wing movement. Yes, we had the Conservative Movement, but this movement is more accurately described as a more moderate version of the progressive movement. The conservatism of today is the liberalism of ten years ago. A true right-wing movement aims not just to preserve what still remains, but to rollback progressivism.

The Berkeley protest demonstrates that a right-wing movement has formed and that it is large enough to muster a significant force to takeover a city that has been a Leftist stronghold for decades. Those who want to downplay this movement in the hope that it will quietly dissipate are engaging in dangerous wishful thinking.

2. Men are now willing to stand up—literally—for what they believe

> Charlie from Castro Valley: "I hope that the left realizes it doesn't have a stranglehold" on Berkeley. "They used to. Now pic.twitter.com/7YrUfEQTHH
>
> — Shane Bauer (@shane_bauer) April 15, 2017

Old school conservatives like to pride themselves on how they've stood "athwart history" but everything has been done from a distance. Yes, conservatives are willing to attend patriotic speeches, listen to talk radio, and even donate to all-talk, no-action "true conservatives," but they've been unwilling to stand up to Leftists in reality.

A recent example of conservative impotence transpired at Middlebury College. Dr. Charles Murray, author of The Bell Curve, was invited to speak by a small group of students. As a concession to their liberal classmates, the students even invited a liberal professor to grill Dr. Murray—a concession the Left never makes to conservatives. Despite the concession, Leftist students shouted Murray down so that he had to flee. Murray's conservative supporters have no recourse but to sputter in rage on social media.

Sputtering impotence is nothing new to conservatives. Think about it: the Conservative Movement let all of Western civilization get destroyed in the last 50 years. Can you think of one time that conservatives physically stood up for their beliefs? Can you name one time when conservatives shut down a Leftist protest?

The new Right, whatever its other weaknesses may be, is made up of young men who are willing to stand up for what they believe, even if that means literally fighting for it.

3. The Right can match Leftist organizing

> Someone should look into who paid for the small organized rallies yesterday. The election is over!
>
> — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) April 16, 2017

The Left in the US has always been well-funded and organized. The role of Soros and other big donors in fomenting Leftist dissension is legendary. Even back in the 60s and 70s, groups such as the Weathermen were financed by wealthy liberals. While the conservative movement is well-funded, the new right-wing is not. Yet, dozens of right-wing groups ranging from the alt-Right, militia groups, veterans, and Gavin McInnes' Proud Boys were able to mobilize quickly and counter the best that the Left had to offer.

4. The right wing is not dependent on Trump

While the reason for the protest was in support of Trump, it's apparent that the Right is bigger than Trump. The Never Trump crowd was fueled by the fantasy that if they could just defeat Trump, the alt Right would disappear and its members would go back to voting for do-nothing conservatives like Marco Rubio. This idea was always wrong. Trump galvanized the Right, but he didn't create it. It formed naturally as a reaction to stagnant wages, poor job market, and replacement level immigration. The real core of the Right is nationalism.

The Right has no single leader. This is a strength for the time being because the movement cannot be squashed by taking away the platform of a single person. This is what the elite attempted by booting Milo from Twitter and attacking Richard Spencer in the press. Neither did anything to stop the rise of the Right.

5. The Antifa and the Right have dehumanized each other

The hippie girl who was punched at the battle of Berkeley posted in her Facebook that she was looking forward to taking "100 Nazi scalps." To her, the nationalists are not fellow Americans who are entitled to an opinion. They are subhumans who don't deserve to exist.

On the flipside, there is no love for the antifa on the Right. A young man who was stabbed by the antifa wrote: "At long last I fulfilled my dream of beating the st out of Communists." The polarization between the Left and Right has reached a fever pitch. This is not going to be resolved by a compromise. Something will have to give.

6. Expect increasing violence

> Berkeley today sounds like the Weimar Republic.
>
> — Bill Kristol (@BillKristol) April 15, 2017

It is important to state that the instigators of the violence were the antifa. The Trump march would have remained a peaceful protest if the antifa had not attacked. The only difference was that the Right was ready to defend.

The antifa are not going to give up so easily. They will be back. They've already resorted to pepper spray and stabbing. There is no reason to believe they will not escalate the violence in future clashes. If you plan to go to a pro-Trump march or support a right-wing speaker, realize that you may be putting your health or life on the line.

By the way gents, I am certain the antifa will want to take vengeance upon nationalist women for the punching of the antifa hippie girl. Best to leave your wife or girlfriend at home.

Conclusion

> The future belongs to those who are willing to fight for it. —@faith_heritage

I've never been an advocate of political violence but the Left is making peaceful assembly impossible. In this case, we have a right—even an obligation—to defend ourselves. There is risk but those who live through it will be able to tell their grandchildren how they defeated the antifa.

Read More: The Rise Of The Anti-Cuckservative

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Southern Poverty Law Center Sues “Anti-Semitic” Blogger In Federal Court For $300,000

April 18, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Andrew Anglin, publisher of far-right site Daily Stormer, has been sued in Federal Court today for $300,000, stemming from his reporting about Tanya Gersh, a Montana real estate agent who he accused of attempting to extort Richard Spencer’s mother into selling a Whitefish, Montana property. In the lawsuit, Anglin is accused of creating a “troll storm” against Gersh that caused her emotional distress and anxiety.

Here is the announcement from the SPLC:

> The Southern Poverty Law Center, along with its Montana co-counsel, filed suit in federal court today against the founder of a major neo-Nazi website who orchestrated a harassment campaign that has relentlessly terrorized a Jewish woman and her family with anti-Semitic threats and messages.
>
> The lawsuit describes how Andrew Anglin used his web forum, the Daily Stormer – the leading extremist website in the country – to publish 30 articles urging his followers to launch a “troll storm” against Tanya Gersh, a real estate agent in Whitefish, Montana. Gersh, her husband and 12-year-old son have received more than 700 harassing messages since December.
>
> The intimidation began after Anglin accused Gersh of attempting to extort money from the mother of Richard Spencer. The younger Spencer heads the National Policy Institute, a white nationalist organization.
>
> Anglin and Spencer are both prominent leaders of the “alt-right” movement that rallied white nationalists behind President Donald Trump’s campaign.
>
> “Andrew Anglin knew he had an online army primed to attack with the click of a > mouse," said SPLC President Richard Cohen. "We intend to hold him accountable for the suffering he has caused Ms. Gersh and to send a strong message to those who use their online platforms as weapons of intimidation."

>
> The lawsuit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Montana, Missoula Division, seeks compensatory and punitive damages. It accuses Anglin of invading Gersh's privacy and intentionally inflicting emotional distress. It also outlines how his campaign violated the Montana Anti-Intimidation Act.

A copy of the lawsuit:

Richard Spencer's mom described in a blog post how Gersh pressured her to sell her property:

> I had no intention of selling . . . until I started receiving terrible threats in the last couple of weeks.
>
> These threats came from Tanya Gersh, a local realtor with links to "human rights" organizations Love Lives Here and the Montana Human Rights Network.
>
> On November 22, Gersh and I spoke on the phone. She relayed to me that if I did not sell my building, 200 protesters and national media would show up outside—which would drive down the property value—until I complied. Gersh's other conditions included that I make a public denunciation of my son in a statement written by the Montana Human Rights Network and that I make a donation to this organization from the sale of the property. As Gersh announced on Facebook, she was "spear heading" the campaign.

Anglin urged his readers to "take action" against Gersh:

> So Then – Let's Hit Em Up
>
> Are y'all ready for an old fashioned Troll Storm?
>
> Because AYO – it's that time, fam.
>
> And as always: NO VIOLENCE OR THREATS OF VIOLENCE OR ANYTHING EVEN CLOSE TO THAT.
>
> Just make your opinions known. Tell them you are sickened by their Jew agenda to attack and harm the mother of someone whom they disagree with.
>
> First things first: the Jew terrorist group Love Lives Here.
>
> Please call them
>
> Phone: [removed] (international callers add 001 to the beginning)
>
> They also have a form you can fill with your complaints.
>
> […]
>
> Please call her and tell her what you think. And hey – if you're in the area, maybe you should stop by and tell her in person what you think of her actions,.
>
> Address: [removed]

> Phone: [removed]
>
> You can also leave a review of her business on Google, and perhaps note that it is front for an extortion racket.

Anglin has not been charged with any crime against Gersh, meaning that this lawsuit may set a precedent where a site publisher is responsible for the behavior of his readers. Even if the lawsuit fails, defending against it will involve substantial amounts of money and have the intended effect of stifling Anglin's speech. On the flip side, SJWs and leftists who engage in doxing and online harassment, as they have been prone to do against us, may now be on the hook for their actions if the SPLC prevails.

As for prudent measures to protect yourself, I recommend not criticizing or speaking against individual Jews in the United States, who can reach out to multiple organizations with deep pockets. Jews are a privileged group that can not be criticized like heterosexual men or white people can by the media or organizations like the SPLC, which came after me in 2012. This lawsuit proves that even a middle class Jewish woman in the middle of Montana has the full backing of the powerful Jewish lobby—with tens of millions of dollars in the bank—to attack her enemies.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: Man Who Sucker Punched Alt-Right Leader Richard Spencer May Literally Be A Shit-Eating Cuckold

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What Questions Do You Want Answered In The 3rd Edition Of Bang?

April 18, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Before I release my new game book, I want to put out a 10-year anniversary edition of Bang with a new foreword and appendix (I will not modify the original text). The foreword will give a general update on the state of game and the appendix will answer big picture questions that you have.

So what questions do you have for me that you would like to see answered in print? Focus more on general strategy and technique instead of specific situations that don't happen often. Leave your question in the comments below.

I'd like to release the 3rd edition of Bang towards the end of the year. The new game book I'm working on will be released next year.

Don't Miss: How To Meet Girls During The Daytime (Free Mini-Course)

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Childless Feminist Journalist Tries To Secretly "Breastfeed" A Cucked Politician's Child

April 19, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Journalist and previously childless feminist Leah McLaren published an article recently about how she tried to "breastfeed" the infant son of "conservative" Canadian politician Michael Chong. The incident occurred some years ago when she was at a house party and alone in a room with the child. Very bizarrely, she knew neither Chong nor even whose baby it was. Because she was not lactating, the very notion that she had attempted to breastfeed is a fabulist claim.

An unsuspecting Michael Chong interrupted the pretend mother, who appears to have been close to 30 when the event took place. According to the article, her dreams of being a pseudo-wet nurse were denied just as she was in the process of taking her clothes off. What a bummer, Leah!

The newspaper McLaren writes for, The Globe and Mail, suspended her for a week, but apparently only in secret. A rival of the publication, The Star, reported that McLaren has been prohibited from either talking about the article or her purported suspension. Because she has strong family links to The Globe and Mail, firing her seems never to have been an option on the table.

I am all for recognizing the innate differences between men and women. Women breastfeed, men cannot. But McLaren's actions–and the self-righteousness way in with which she revealed them–fits most definitions of assault and perhaps perilously strays into a form of self-gratifying sexual assault. Bear in mind that we are hearing her justifications for what occurred.

I believe we need to separate Return Of Kings' usual advice that women should be traditional and raise children from a self-entitled woman deciding to try and "breastfeed" a complete stranger's child. Whatever unconscious desire McLaren had at the time to abandon her feminism and become a run-of-the-mill mother, wanting, let alone attempting to place your nipple in someone else's child's mouth is intolerable. You or I may want to fuck an attractive female, but it doesn't mean we do it without permission.

This should be considered a form of attempted sexual assault

What's the difference between a mentally depraved feminist trying to "breastfeed" a stranger's child when she's not lactating and what Mary Kay Letourneau did with a then 12-year-old boy?

A breast is a secondary sexual organ. Feminists love to complain about the fetishization of breasts, but support charging a man for touching them when a woman claims he did not have consent to do so. They cannot have it both ways. A non-lactating (and I would also argue a lactating) stranger has zero business trying to put their nipple in the mouth of someone else's child. Aside from the health risks involved, a pacifier would usually suffice.

Moreover, McLaren claimed in her article, which was subsequently deleted by her employer, that she "wanted to give him what he wanted." This kind of rationalization is the exact sort we hear from child abusers who can actually be charged. Because an infant seemed to have "enjoyed" or merely did not protest something, a person defending inexcusable actions will justify themselves by stating there was no adverse impact on the child.

The father of the kid is trying to become Canada's "conservative" leader

Conservative or cucked?

> "This incident happened over 10 years ago. It was odd, no doubt, but not of any real consequence," Chong said in an emailed statement Monday.
>
> — The Star reporting on Michael Chong's response to Leah McLaren's article

What baffles me even more than McLaren's behavior is Michael Chong's dismissal of it. He called it "odd… but not of any real consequence." Even a second or third glance at the context of this remark forces one to think about spineless, cucked pseudo-conservatives who talk a great game about traditional values, but immediately buckle whenever the pressure of holding onto them comes along.

There is a possibility that Chong was seething in private about Leah McLaren, but felt a stronger reaction would jeopardize his chances of winning the leadership contest. The place of Conservatives in Canada is tenuous at the best of times, despite the party being more to the left than the Republican Party in the US (and with no countervailing rightwing force to steal votes from it, like in France or the UK). Even former Prime Minister Stephen Harper, a very capable and thankfully more traditional Conservative politician, only won one majority government from the three elections in which his party triumphed.

On balance, however, I would say that Michael Chong really does believe what he said. He was, after all, for the deplorable "anti-Islamophobia" motion passed by the Canadian Parliament, which adds yet another plank to Canada's abolishment of common sense. Rather than debating the clear and present danger that Islamic immigration poses to Canada, leftwing politicians and "rightwing" ones keen to appease SJWs have acquiesced to the same delusions of the crowd changing Facebook profile photos after serious terrorist attacks. Chong's silence on issues like the persecution of Gregory Alan Elliott by rabid feminists also does not bode well for any future role he has in the upper echelons of the Conservative Party, either as a leader (which is unlikely) or a senior spokesman.

Though I can understand the fact that Michael Chong's son is still a child and drawing more attention to this could be detrimental for the young lad, I am left disappointed by the candidate's response. I have next to no faith he will offer any serious defense of conservatism if he cannot even defend his son more forcefully, or at least provide a better criticism of someone like Leah McLaren.

Meanwhile, men are demonized as would-be pedophiles for no reason

Guy takes Star Wars photo for his kids, gets called a pedophile by tens of thousands of people.

Some readers may criticize my stance and say what Leah McLaren did was not really "that bad." I think the problem with such an assessment is that it offers no real solution to the growing numbers of men stigmatized for doing literally nothing around children, all while women like McLaren receive a pathetic one-week sabbatical for far more obscene actions which they admit to. This is just one example, but in my native Australia a man was shamed for taking a selfie for his children in a crowded mall, as if he were some kind of would-be pedophile. In another more recent case, Fairfax Media, a tireless critic of ROK, decided to publish a woman's diatribe about how all men are potential pedophiles wishing to violate her daughter.

Once society reflects the mores we condone, we can decide to split hairs over what women secretly longing for children can and can't do without a serious backlash. Yet for now, our only choice is to come down hard on such behavior. After all, if a man even talks to a child to say hello in the modern world, he's liable for an accusation of being a creep or dangerous sexual predator. But it seems that the response when a woman tries to put her breast in the mouth of a child she does not even know is nothing more than a whisper.

If feminists and others wish to create an environment of “stranger danger” against men, we should do exactly the same thing against them, especially about much more serious matters like Leah McLaren’s antics.

Read More: 5 Ways To Profit Bigly From Miserable, Childless, And Career-Obsessed Feminists

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How The Paradox Of Ego Both Helps And Hurts Your Game

April 19, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

There is a paradox at the heart of game and it is this: in order to get really good with women a man must simultaneously foster a huge, unstoppable ego while also practising humility. How can this be the case and what should you do about it to improve your sex life?

The Need For Ego

We live in a world where increasingly, due to the rise of the internet and the dating apps, you are but a speck on most girls' consciousnesses—if you're lucky. Even in those dim, distant pre-web days this was the case to some extent, but in 2017 things are a lot worse.

Think about it like this. It is well-known that women are hypergamous in nature: that is, all things being equal they are attracted to men who are more powerful than them. She will seek to find, attract and have sex with the most powerful (read: alpha) man that she can. She will then stay with him (unless he pumps and dumps her) until another, even more powerful man comes along. Then she will dump the first guy's ass in favour of the second, or at least cheat with him. This phenomenon is often called "branch-swinging."

By the way, I make no judgement when I write this and bear no ill will towards women who do this. It just seems to be a common occurrence, not merely in my own experience but also in that of many thousands of other men. That being the case I don't support anyone who takes against women as a result: rather, I think you should be aware of the probabilities and play them to your advantage.

Anyway, how can you break through this paradigm so that you are the guy who is reaping the rewards rather than getting played? Well, the first and most obvious thing to say is that you should improve your value so that you become the alpha with whom she is inclined to cheat. In order to do this you must sort out your finances so that you have more money, go to the gym to achieve bigger muscles, improve your looks by dressing better. And so on.

All well and good, and whatever you do I would most certainly advise that you attend to all of the above as a matter of course. However, here's the thing: loads of guys have their money sorted and are better off than you. Loads of guys have bigger muscles. Loads of guys dress well and have better clothes. I could just tell you to ace it and beat them all at their own game but how realistic is that, really? And how much time would it take?

Attraction Is Intangible

Look, the actual truth about game is that while all of those things help, we've all seen the douchebag skinny guy with no money walking out of the club with the hottest girl there (hell, I've even been that douchebag skinny guy!)

How does that happen?

It happens because attraction is intangible. Yes, external things like money, style and muscles help but real attraction is sparked somewhere else, somewhere beneath all of that, somewhere in the mass of subcommunications that are transmitted between a man and a woman when they interact. This is a deep concept and one that is not easy to get across in writing, so I'll say it as simply and crudely as I can: women are most attracted to those men who think they are the shit and don't give a fuck.

How, then, do you become one of those men? Simply, you must develop a huge ego.

When I look back on it now, the reason that I was successful with girls in my pre-game pickup days was simply that in my "party years" I had a huge ego that was entirely disproportionate to my actual value.

I remember clearly being in clubs chatting to girls and becoming genuinely surprised if they threw me over for a taller, better-looking guy (which sometimes happened, of course.) I really had no sense of my own value relative to others: I was deluded enough to be certain beyond all question that I was the best of the bunch.

As I say, this didn't always end well. Of course, sometimes I would get passed over for the better-looking, richer guy. But more often than not I won out and go the girl. Why? Because if you believe in something strongly enough then other people will too. That is why a huge, delusional ego is one of the best attributes you can develop if you want to improve your game.

Today my ego is a little more in check and I am more aware of my shortcomings in comparison with the strengths of those around me. While my view of myself is more balanced and realistic today I can say unreservedly that this has done me little or no favours as far as my game is concerned. In fact, today I actually use affirmations and visualisations in an effort to positively distort my perception of my own worth.

As odd and egotistical a strategy as this might appear I can tell you with certainty that you will get more girls if you walk around thinking you are God's gift to the world than you will being humble. Look, advertising works, marketing works, the power of suggestion works: a huge ego will ensure that you break through the noise and chatter and register on even the most jaded girl's consciousness.

But You Need To Be Humble Too

The paradox, though, is this: you also need to be humble at the same time. Why? Because reality has an irritating way of asserting itself when you least expect it. While perception is perhaps 80% of any social transaction the truth is that hard reality is the other 20%.

If you walk around the club bossing it when your value is in fact subpar then the unfortunate truth is that you will get called out. You will get rejected. You will get girls giving you the "you're not all that" speech. You will get thrown over for bigger, taller, hotter, and richer guys. It will happen. Because that's just how life is.

But it is absolutely crucial that you don't avoid social interactions, that you don't avoid approaching girls in order to protect yourself from this. Reality will assert itself. When you approach the market with goods to sell (yourself, in this case, to hot girls) then the market will respond and in many cases it won't be a favourable response. Many guys, seeking to avoid their own disproportionate assessment of themselves being savaged by some spoiled princess will avoid going out and approaching. Or they will post-rationalise. 'She wasn't that hot anyway.' 'I wouldn't have gone with her even if she'd said yes.'

Don't fall into that trap. On a baseline level you need to be humble enough to accept that you're not going to win every time, you're not going to get every girl. In fact, the likelihood is you're going to get more "no"s than "yes"es. You need to accept that and keep going out anyway, keep putting yourself on the line, keep taking the punches.

On the other hand, your ego and self-belief also need to be resilient enough to withstand this battering. OK, so she turned you down. So what? There are a hundred other girls in this club and you're hot stuff. Without a doubt one or more of them are going to agree with your own self-assessment.

It's a tricky balance, having an ego and simultaneously bring humble. Not easy to pull off. But bear in mind that when it comes down to it game is really about diverse narratives—yours and hers. Often these narratives will conflict (you think you're the shit, she disagrees) and sometimes they will align (you both think you're the shit and so you have sex).

But in either case it's worth remembering that there is no objective reality as such, only opinions. Ensuring that your narrative—your frame—-is the dominant one will see you win out more than you lose.

Want to find out more about how to get great at game? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter.

Read More: The One Girl You Absolutely Must Approach Every Day

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How To Make Money Online By Going Offline

April 19, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

If there's one thing I've learned since leaving my corporate gig for greener pastures, it's this: online, people can be really, really cheap.

I mean this in the sense of trying to sell products, especially certain niches. For example, who is more likely to make an impulse buy—a male mathematician or a female makeup artist? In most cases, the math guy has had a life of critical and analytical thinking, backed by his generally higher male standards of logic. On the contrast, a makeup artist is much more of a "free spirit"; likely to make decisions based off of emotions and feelings.

This kind of logic is pretty obvious on the surface: women are easier to sell to than men. If you need proof, look no further than at the household spending by gender demographics. But what if we take it a step farther, and look at it in terms of online versus offline business. Is one niche even easier to sell to than the other?

Brick And Mortar

Generally speaking, those who run online businesses like myself have less of a budget for expenses than a brick and mortar shop. For example, if I'm hiring a freelance writer to round off some articles on one of my small sales sites, I'm looking for some sort of middle ground between quality and price.

If I can find a greater writer from a place in Eastern Europe, who has a grasp on English that is 80% as good as a native speaker—I'm going to take that. Sure, it's going to require more edits (I'm picky), but the Eastern European writer's price is also going to probably be a third of what a native speaker living in the west would charge.

So I take the 80% quality for the third of the price. Nothing is probably ever going to change that, simply because of the nature of the business that I'm in.

However, let's take a brick and mortar type of business—a pizza shop. The owner has little knowledge of anything about the internet—he doesn't know how to tweet, use Facebook, or design his own website. He's naturally hesitant of hiring things out to people abroad because of several factors.

1. Time zones—his brick and mortar hours are set and fixed to his local times
2. Horror stories—lots of his fellow entrepreneurs probably have told him horror stories about hiring people abroad
3. Simple efficiency—he doesn't want to have to clean up mistakes, he just wants to hand the reins off to somebody and have them be "the guy" who handles everything

Therefore, a brick and mortar guy is far more likely to take the reverse of what I would do. He'll take the higher quality at the higher price rather than a majority of the quality at a much lower price.

Maybe Nomads Do It Wrong?

Throughout my time living abroad, I've built my online business, but I've also worked with a few clients in a more offline space. I am making a full-time income and living off of my blog as I've shown, but I still take on the occasional consulting or design client if it suits me. Having a little extra money in the bank is never a bad thing. It has been amazing how much more they are willing to pay, how much easier they can be to work with, and how much more pleasant the experience has been.

Now, I will admit that my sample size is small. But it's enough by now that I'm starting to see some trends to it. In addition, I also should mention that the majority of these clients more or less fell into my lap—I didn't have to go out and actively hunt from them. Instead, they came to me on recommendations. So that is a huge time consideration that would come into play.

With that being said, when people come to me and ask now, "How do I make money online?", I'm tempted to start saying they should go offline to do so.

Find brick and mortar clients who are in need of work online. Clients who don't care where you are in the world—as long as you pick up the phone, do a good job, and they're satisfied with the price you charge.

For some small shops, paying someone a thousand dollars a month to run the website, post to social media, and handle everything with their online presence is a good deal. Find one or two of these clients and you're looking at a great salary for a place like Southeast Asia or Eastern Europe.

It Doesn't Have To Be Web Design, Either!

There are plenty of other fields that could benefit from someone keeping an employee on a monthly retaining contract.

Plenty of businesses need a consistent source of content—if you were tasked with writing a handful of articles a week and posting them to a blog, that could pay well. I pay my own staff for anywhere between 3 and 10 articles a week, for example.

Perhaps a local business runs a large Facebook group or forum, and needs someone to moderate it every day—something they don't have the time or energy for.

Or finally, perhaps a business wants something as simple as some cool Instagram graphics to be posted daily (which can be done in a matter of minutes with the right tools), and is willing to pay someone to make them and auto-schedule them out for a month.

The point is, the more the internet grows, the more that smaller businesses are being forced into having an online presence. This has never really been part of the job for these small business, but their hand has now been forced. The internet is not going away, and not having an internet presence is hurting their credibility. The thing is, it's not like the day-to-day tasks of running a brick and mortar type of business have gone away. The internet is just a forced addition—one with a steep learning curve and requiring a massive time investment.

Closing Thoughts

I will be the first to say that this article does not come based on massive amounts of experience. Just a small sample size that has shown some potential. But perhaps many people who as aspiring to live abroad and make money on the internet are over-complicating things.

Maybe there's no need for snazzy opt-ins, sales funnels, A/B testing, and all of the other gadgets and gizmos that come with the territory of internet business. Perhaps the real answer to your problems is something as simple as walking into the pizza shop down the street and meeting the owner, or striking up your conversation with your dentist about his web presence.

It's definitely not "easy", but if there's one thing I've learned from business, it's this: it doesn't always work, and sometimes, it's just a matter of trying things until something finally sticks.

If you're looking to free up more time to pursue business, read my book King's Code. For more advice about living in Eastern Europe, check out my blog.

Read More: 7 Things I Learned On The Road This Year

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

10 Things To Remember About Writing

April 19, 2017 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

In this increasingly electronic and remote society we have, much of our communication is done online. Everything from texts to emails to the words right here are written on a keyboard and sent through Ted Steven's "series of tubes" to the recipient, and, while it makes us arguably more narcissistic and less endowed with social skills, it behooves one to express himself online, so, today, we'll talk about 10 ways to write well online.

1. Know your spelling

It's a serious dick move to call someone on their spelling in order to win your argument, but when someone on the left (which is who we here usually face, either culturally or politically) gets desperate, they are going to reach for anything they can to tear you down, especially if it's relevant to the topic at hand.

One of my favorites is "Marshall Law." Although Chief Justice John Marshall was extremely influential in the Supreme Court's development, and a great American to boot, the term that people usually mean is "martial law," which is when a standing military is placed in control of law and order as temporary police and judicial systems. This typically happens in times of disaster and invasion.

This includes using the wrong word; unless the property owner really meant to whore out anyone he caught.

The solution to this one is to look up words you do not typically use and make sure you are using them correctly. No one looks more ignorant than someone operating outside of their skill level, and that counts for writing as well. What is insidious here is that the spell checker, if you misspell into a correctly spelled, but inappropriate, word, will not say anything. Watch your homonyms (there, they're, their; to, too; who's, whose; your, you're; etc.)

2. Know your grammar

You're not going to get gigged on grammar as much as you are on your spelling. It's a human phenomenon I have noticed from everything to gaming, to industry, to writing, that the person of average skill will talk down to the neophyte, but the person of superlative skill will remain professional and polite. What I mean by this is that the average English speaker has mediocre written grammar, so he or she, while they might want to, cannot correct people on grammar due to lack of their own skill, but will be skilled enough to correct people on spelling alone.

However, despite the fact that you will not be as likely to be criticized, your errors will be noticed by some, so it helps to know grammar and punctuation. I write some damn long sentences in these articles, but even though I try to maintain proper use of commas, conjunctions, and semicolons, I am sure that I have married some subordinate clauses together in a way that would not be received well in Heaven.

It's outside the scope of this article to provide grammar lessons, but a decent English textbook and good style manual will go a long way. The latter of those two is a work explaining how people writing for an institution (like the Associated Press) should write, and it would cover topics such as how to refer to the publication itself (Return Of Kings, Return Of Kings, ROK, RoK, R of K, etc.)

3. Know your audience and your arena

Return Of Kings (and that's how I write it from the above discussion) is a small staffed, low overhead business that reaches more people than we should be honestly expected to because of the self-reliance of the authors. Roosh's philosophy is that you should write about what you know. My gig here is loosely defined as writing about masculine hobbies but, other than that, I can write about what I want, and I try to only write about things in which I have some expertise as do the rest of the staff.

Point being, Winston and Roosh bust their humps to get out multiple articles every day, so they have to edit for content, not spelling or grammar, which is why the occasional error will get through, even, most probably, in this article on the very subject.

This does not matter, as ROK (shortened version, as I referred to it earlier in full name, in italics) is an informal space where we (both writers and the readership) are more concerned about the content over the total correctness of the verbiage. Our writers can use all words of the English, and sometimes French, languages, including slurs and vulgarities, provided they are on topic and relevant, and no one gets upset, as we are all men here. We also write in a colloquial, modern tone, as if we were speaking in person.

However, you do not want to write that way in the workplace, or for professional publication. I've got a graduate thesis that is dry as a bone, but it is not meant for entertainment. As you enter more professional writing spheres, you should drop contractions, slang, superfluous modifiers, any controversial references, as well as anything unnecessary.

4. Proofread

Read what you have written multiple times before sending it off. Check for things like repeated words; the paragraph two above this one began with “however,” but I decided I wanted the next paragraph to begin with that word, as I was introducing a contradicting point, and it was removed so I would not begin two paragraphs in a row with the same word.

Check for misspellings, including the ones that the spellchecker did not find, and grammatical errors. Also check for simply using the wrong word in the sentence than the one you meant. Lastly, check to make sure you are not using a “big word” more than once, or, at the most, twice, in your article.

5. Self-edit for clarity and length

While you are proofreading, check for unnecessary fluff. The word count limit here at ROK does me well, as I have to trim some of excess (I’d use superfluous here, but I used it once already in this article) garnishment to get down to a sane length before I destroy attention spans with my verbosity.

Some of my very first articles had better content than my more recent ones, as I spent more time on them before I went weekly in my contributions. They were bigger articles that were aggressively pruned down to two thousand words, as opposed to some that get finished at under the limit and are not edited for length.

6. Know when to stop and come back to it later

I rarely write an article in one sitting. I tend to write better when I am enthusiastic about something, and, when the passion wanes, I will stop and head off to other activities before returning, later, to finish. Still later, I will upload it to the site, then go find relevant and entertaining pictures off Google to finish it, and review it once more how it will look on its webpage before submitting it.

A business analog to this is to never send an email while angry. Always write it (don't put in the address, as some programs like to send drafts for you, in case you "forgot") and come back later to review it. You may find that you don't want to say everything you had written previously, and you now have an opportunity to revise what you will say that you would not have had if you had sent it earlier.

That being said, on this Saturday morning as I write this, I will now go off to do other tasks, and get back to the last four points later.

7. Write from knowledge and thinking, not emotion

Everyone likes to go on a tirade occasionally; they feel good, and maybe entertain some people. But, these rants typically do not have much lasting value, and the writer often wishes he'd made better points.

Even more importantly, someone who is an expert will inevitably come along and trip you up on your facts and reasoning if you did not do your homework and figured everything out first. An English Composition college professor could, no doubt, rip me up on the occasional error on this article, but I know I write fairly decently, so hopefully he'd be forgiving and agree with the general gist of the piece.

The left does this, and it's a large part of why they look so stupid.

Write what you know. If you don't know it, learn it before you write it. Don't base your writings on feelings alone, even strong feelings. Feel strongly about the facts if you want, but ground yourself in reasoning, not emotion.

8. Get a vocabulary

The English language (and I know none other, so this may be true in other languages as well) has a delightful amount of words that are fun to use, but never seem to GET used by the general public. Granted, words that are out of style will mark you as odd, but there is a gray area in there that, if you pull a word from it, your target will be on lesser footing because you used a word that he didn't know, but should.

Don’t call someone an illiterate idiot; call them something like an nonerudite troglodyte, or a catachrestic philistine, and, not only will you have insulted them, but it will take a while for them to figure it out. That’s just insults, though; if you paw through a good thesaurus, you will learn synonyms and antonyms that will help your writing be fresh and vivid.

Be careful, however, to not get too ornate with your writing for your purpose; remember, know your audience. Also, the English language is odd, no two words, even though they may be synonyms, mean exactly the same thing; they’re close, but not exact. Knowing this difference is, to quote a character in a favorite novel of mine, not the difference between lightning and the lightning bug, but the difference between the lightning bug and being STRUCK by lightning.

9. Use wit and humor to your advantage

In this sphere of the internet, a good pop culture reference or wry commentary will help set the stage for the tone of your piece, although I will admit listening to the Series of Tubes video above made me realize how far the net has moved on in ten years, so maybe it’s a little dated.

Funny stories will also help make your point. I refer you to my colleagues Mr. Sharpe and Mr. Yader for what I consider to be the most hilarious articles on this site.

10. Cite other works

You want to cite other works for at least three reasons. Firstly, you are not going to have the space (and your readers will not have the time) to read everything you would want to say on the subject. This is why we pepper links through these articles so you can read more if you like (especially the big one saying “Read More” at the bottom of each piece).

Secondly, you want to borrow the thunder of previous works to help make your point. I’m not feeling particularly hilarious at the moment, but, since I pointed you at some good articles above, the point was made for me, and we could move on as I crash through 1850 words here on my way to 2000.

Lastly, as your stuff is fact based, and we're not in a bubble chamber, you should link to the work of others to provide legitimacy. It's exactly an evolved, informal way of listing your references, just like a more formal work would do theirs.

Conclusion

Writing is important in this digital age, and it follows that doing it well is also important. Know the language, know your audience and your subject, take a couple passes at writing it and a few more for proofreading and editing, adjust for the tone of the piece, and, finally, add in some references so your audience knows that what you're saying is backed up by other people and not just hot air.

Read More: My 3 Greatest Mistakes Writing For Return Of Kings

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

We Should Thank Emily Rose Nauert For Scaring Women From Becoming SJWs

April 20, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

During the recent Berkeley fighting between free speech advocates and antifa, Emily Rose Nauert (or Emily Rose Marshall) tried to strike white nationalist Nathan Damigo with a weighted glove. But Damigo quickly falcon-punched her. Her literal downfall after the Berkeley free speech rally, which was attacked by hordes of masked antifa, led to an outcry from white knights everywhere, including Captain America actor Chris Evans.

After she started trying to raise $80,000 on GoFundMe for "hospital bills" and "a new life," many people across the internet have complained about how Nauert, who goes under the political name Louise Rosealma and pornographic name Venus Rosales, is profiting from being a hypocritical antifa and SJW.

Here's a quick, glorious recap:

I say we let Emily Rose Nauert (or Marshall) keep whatever money she "earns" through GoFundMe or any other sob story ventures of hers. We should also let her milk any psychological sympathy she can from fellow antifa and SJWs, plus any media outlets brave or dumb enough to support a woman who said she wanted to "scalp" 100 "Nazis" prior to participating in the antifa attempts at troublemaking:

And here's my reasoning. Have you ever noticed how fats and other oils rise to the top of a pan or pot filled with water? The same can be said of SJWs and their moronic actions. Even with a sympathetic media that would otherwise try to hide their poor choices, mistakes, and crimes, many of these SJWs cannot help but expose their depravity and violence to the world. Their quest for attention and validation undermines them entirely, and has the unintended effect of undermining the causes they fight for. Outlets like CBS San Francisco, which effusively praised Nauert, have nonetheless been excoriated for not talking about her suspected participation in throwing firework devices encased in glass bottles:

In order for us to counteract the pernicious agenda of these cretins, we need examples that serve as a warning to the general public, especially impressionable women. We got it with the Duke lacrosse case, which marked the beginning of the modern rape hysteria. We got it with Mattress Girl, another instance of a false rape accusation. We got it with the Berkeley riots earlier this year against Milo Yiannopoulos' speaking appearance. And now we have got it again with the patriots vs. antifa incidents in Berkeley in the last week.

Emily Rose Nauert/Marshall has done more for our cause than anything she could ever do for her own side. She is almost the perfect microcosm of everything that is wrong with both the social justice warrior ideology and women infected with feminism. All she really lacks is obesity, blue hair (though she has dreadlocks), and a track record of false rape accusations.

In a world where women supposedly find their bodies objectified by "patriarchy," Nauert has objectified herself to the hilt, selling her hairy vagina pictures for quick bucks on the internet. She has bragged about effectively wanting to kill 100 "Nazis," having watched too many Joss Whedon "women can kick ass" films, then had her own ass handed to her. We could go on and on, including about her apparently sheltered, luxurious upbringing in Thousand Oaks, California, a million miles away from anything resembling the proletariat she holds so dear.

We should thank Emily Rose Nauert because her example proves again the following presuppositions:

Almost every victim of "crime" put forward by SJWs commits criminal acts themselves

Why was Emily Rose Nauert pictured holding the sorts of bottles that antifa were throwing at their opponents at Berkeley? Worse still, these bottles like had M80s in them, which is a concentration of dynamite. Take a look:

MOLDYLOCKS THE ANTIFA GIRL LOOKING TO "SCALP NAZIS" AT BERKELEY WAS THROWING GLASS BOTTLES AT INNOCENT PEOPLE ALL DAY SHE IS NO VICTIM

After the confrontations at Berkeley, Emily Rose Nauert complained to CBS that she nearly had her skull "cracked open.' What she won't admit is that the first time we know she was floored (by another man, not Nathan Damigo), she was swinging a glass bottle at people. The punishment she received for that behavior of hers was, in fact, ridiculously light.

That's count one against Nauert. Count two would be her Facebook comments about wanting to "scalp Nazis," which is both a serious, violent threat itself and constitutes an incitement to violence. The third count would be her possession of a weighted/studded glove, one she used to strike at Nathan Damigo. This weapon, and it is a weapon, is illegal in the state of California. Finally, Nauert was armed when Damigo hit her. He had even reason to expect an assault from her, either against him or others, and I would argue she committed assault merely by brandishing the bottle. Plus, there's the battery of her going at Damigo's throat:

Click here to support Ice for Nathan Damigo's hand organized by Casey Dufrene

Due to the bone density of the sjw neanderthals skull, we r asking that u donate to help provide a steady supply of ice for this true American Heros hand as well as his...

GOFUNDME.COM

Women know that being a slut or camwhore goes against their true nature and is something they need to hide

"Stop it before it lays eggs!"

For matters of taste (and keeping your last meal in your stomach), I will not be posting the vulgar images and videos that constitute Emily Rose Nauert's "body of work." But, as we usually expect, this arch-feminist and opponent of capitalist patriarchy works as a cam girl.

When her friend set up the GoFundMe page for her, he cited the need for Nauert to get a new identity and employment. This had more to do with her being exposed as a slut for hire than what happened at Berkeley. Women intrinsically know that any man who values himself will not settle for used goods, especially if those used goods have paraded themselves on the internet for any lonely man wishing to purchase some obscure webcam currency.

She has every reason to portray herself as a victim of violence at Berkeley, as it sidesteps the shame she has inflicted upon what seems to be her wealthy family and tricky questions about how a woman opposed to capitalism can partake in its most "misogynistic" industry.

Even leftists think leftist gender ideology is moronic when push comes to shove (or falcon punch)

"Was becoming an Internet meme part of your plan?"

Oh, the misogyny! A SJW who preaches gender equality (read: female supremacy) gets punched by a mere man. She then stands around doing nothing as everyone else (all men) get punched and kicked or dish out punches and kicks. In a matter of seconds, everything Emily Rose Nauert preached or thought about feminism, bar its advantages for women, flew out the window.

I have some questions that the SJWs quite plainly aren't answering:

- How could Nathan Damigo know Emily Rose Nauert was a woman? Did she have an identification badge on, one that stipulated her designated identity, orientation, and pronoun?
- Haven't SJWs seen the latest Joss Whedon film starring Scarlett Johansson? We all know women can dispatch six or seven muscled, heavily armed men much better than a trained male martial artist.
- Where were the other Xena Warrior Princesses to come to her aid?

Every sobbing leftist response to Emily Rose Nauert being punched has mirrored what a traditional conservative would have said about restaurant etiquette towards women in 1950. Unsurprisingly, they have also implicitly dismissed non-binary genders and focused on how a man struck a woman. Isn't Nauert a self-identified "fluid" queer according to her internet presence?

"I was doxxed" is just Newspeak for "I put shit of myself on the internet and don't want to take responsibility for it"

Many of you have read 1984 multiple times and know about Newspeak, the paradoxical IngSoc (English Socialism) language created by the regime of Big Brother to stifle critical debate and even make it impossible to develop it in cognitive terms. Well, feminists have created a less nefarious version of it to describe the consequences of their poor choices. They put highly sensitive images or videos of themselves on the internet, with nothing but a crude name change to hide it, and then complain when people later connect that media to them. Or they make threats in the mould of wanting to "scalp" others and whinge afterwards that they're being harassed.

Emily Rose Nauert was hardly doxxed. Her intention to "scalp" 100 "Nazis" was either available to all of Facebook or viewed by at least one disgruntled "friend" who rightfully found her threat offensive and then distributed it. We know Nauert's real name partially because her poor grandmother, who thought Emily would always be her angel, used to have a sweet creature she could paint a portrait of. A number of other loose ends tied Nauert to her publicly available portfolio of porn.

I would feel sorry for someone who finds their private health history published because of a burglar breaking into their doctor's office. I would feel sorry for someone whose address is published after they are stalked for months. I do not feel sorry for a woman like Emily Rose Nauert, who desired a quick buck from porn and quick thrills from being a violent antifa activist, only to do almost everything in the public domain. This is not doxxing.

Cheer up, lads!

You have the tools you need to succeed now.

Emily Rose Nauert, like those who have gone before her in the pantheon of deluded SJWs, will have a good number of supporters who will shield her from reality. Yet eventually that reality comes back to bite. It has for Rachel Dolezal, the “transracial” white girl now on food stamps and with such great job offers as doing porn. The same can be predicted for Nauert. Post-Berkeley, she will think her star is soaring, before she falls back to Earth again.

In utilitarian terms, Nauert has done us a great service. Many women will see through her lying facade and even those who do not will think twice about trying to rush Trump supporters at violent rallies. Literally hundreds of thousands of people have eviscerated the media for taking her side, a collective rebuke that is perhaps the best example of “fake news” post-November 2016.

On a more personal note for our readers, you do not have vaginas used to unlock all manner of special privileges in life, from female-only university scholarships to rapid promotion on account of gender quotas. But you have an important knowledge about how the world really works. For all the advantages snowflakes like Emily Rose Nauert may appear to have, they believe their special treatment will continue ad infinitum.

Use what you know to your own benefit. You may not be able to get a CBS news crew to hide any crimes you are accused of. Whats counts for you, however, is that you largely know the rules of the game. You know women respond to status, achievement, social proof, and that even with these, having certain political views can be dangerous in modern times. Additionally, you realize that defending yourself in a similar fashion to Nathan Damigo will still result in you being portrayed as the villain, irrespective of whether you hold white nationalist views or not.

You are more than capable of exploiting, avoiding, or maximizing the circumstances in which you find yourself. Your success depends on a healthy mix of wise self-preservation and the audacity to act when you need to. In a world that seems unfair, count your blessings.

Most often, you will not be in the middle of a Berkeley-style riot, where you and your comrades are attacked by antifa. Nevertheless, you have opportunities every day to operate effectively in a world almost everyone else finds confusing and contradictory.

Read More: A Rose By Any Other Name Still Reeks of Women's Entitlement

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Be More Dominant In The Bedroom

April 20, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Pleasure achieved through sexual domination and consensual pain goes a long way back in time. But it became even more acceptable for society following the recent popularity of Fifty Shades Of Grey. It is not a surprise that women love the storyline as the roles of dominance and submission follow the natural order.

Fresco found in an Etruscan tomb depicting two men flogging a woman while she performs fellatio.

In this age of low morals and endless supplies of sluts, knowledge of BDSM is a useful skill to reach a higher spot in the sexual hierarchy. In an environment that contributes to plummeting levels of testosterone and the war on masculine men, a new way to assert your dominance is always welcome.

If the tools that I will detail are already know to you and come as common sense, carry on with what you were doing.

Why BDSM?

Assuming the submissive role for a man believing in the principles of masculinity is shameful and absolutely unacceptable. This is a symptom of budding effeminacy, which puts one on the same level as the three main categories of passive individuals: women, gays and cucks.

By being in charge, you fuck on your own terms and rhythm. You can pace yourself, make it last or end it when you choose. If a girl proposes or imposes to be the dominant one, refuse. It is a shit test to gauge your worth as a man.

The more feminine the woman, the more she wants to be dominated. This goes against the SJW agenda but one can not go against biological realities. Using this type of techniques and frame immediately puts you in a different box, clearly separating you from the manlet that implores sexual favours with “Please!” or “Can I…?”, drying up every vagina in a five kilometre radius, instead of taking what is his.

But domination has to remain under control, it cannot derive into degeneracy. Take the best elements of it and leave the perverted, pointless stuff out. Totally dominating a woman (her mind more than her body) leaves a lasting impression and she will crave more. Women want to be dominated and lose control. The girl will remember you forever.

Elicit the idea

There is a certain way to initiate it. You should only brush the subject at first, asking her what are her views on the matter and keeping it a surprise until you have her in the bedroom.

It is necessary to establish ground rules : safe word, safety first, good knowledge of the material, being able to gauge the threshold between light pain and total discomfort that can ruin the experience… There must be a verbal confirmation of mutual consent to cover you legally, since unfuckable feminists decided to ruin the fun for everyone.

A good frame and dominant body language is capital. A nice custom suit can be a nice addition. The worst way would be to start with "Can we …" or "I'd like to do… if you agree, of course!". It puts you in the supplicant beta position. You should introduce the session with "We will do X and Y. "Watermelon" is your safe word. If it gets too painful or intense, use it. Is it clear? Let's go."

This agreement protects you, in our era of fake rape accusations, and covers you as the sub gives you her verbal confirmation that she agrees to be objectified (still, standard precautions apply).

1. Hair pulling and similar techniques

This is one of the basics of domination as the gesture is a cornerstone of the symbolic physical power of man over woman. Since the dawn of times, men grabbed the most feminine attribute of the woman (long hair) and used their strength to restrain her and take her. Just like lions and other animals who sink their teeth in the neck of their female to hold her still during copulation. You should grab the hair as close to the skull as possible.

The bondage collar or choker (a glorified dog leash) is also a handy domination tool considering the constant female projection around it. If you do not possess one, you can always use a leather belt strapped around her neck, loose enough not to strangle her. The remaining length can be used to flog her. The only inconvenient is the sweat stains on the leather. Do not use your favourite one.

Both techniques are used to build momentum and thrust full force with your pelvis to provoke vibrations and stimulate the female genital organs in addition to penetration. But be careful when thrusting full force. The risk of penile fracture is very real.

2. Spanking and flogging

A majority of women enjoy being spanked during sex. The slap on the bottom is usually their favourite, with the face coming as a close second. The slap on the arse is the most depicted in modern media and the most “socially acceptable” and might be one of the least intense BDSM techniques described here. You can use it as a test to gauge the reaction of the girl, as it can be a gateway into dirtier stuff.

The interest of crops and whips do not come from the pain they deliver but from the arousal created by the whole symbolism behind those objects. Those were tools specifically designed to control domestic animals through punishment. It subconsciously brings your girl to the rank of a pet, ready to submit to your will.

The strikes need to be delivered gradually according to the pain threshold to avoid damaging the skin.

3. Blindfolds and gags

The blindfold is probably one of the first steps into bondage as it is painless and easy to find. Its interest resides in the sensory depravation it creates. The basic reaction is that the other senses are heightened, making the woman feel more intensely any sound or touch.

The ball gag, one of the greatest invention known to man, helps reduce the noise of even the chattiest of girls. It combines the pleasure of sex, some well deserved silence and the possibility of speaking without being interrupted. Some duct tape with her knickers inside the girl’s mouth works too.

4. Bondage

It is the ultimate female fantasy, as when girls are tied up and defenceless, they surrender themselves completely to men and lose any form of control. The ultimate form of arousal for them as it fits perfectly their biological mindset of being submissive.

A good pair of handcuffs is fairly cheap and guarantees you good control, but it allows some movement for the girl. I recommend the ones with padding to prevent bruises and nosy questions from her circle the following days.

Cheap material like electric cable or nylon ropes have the tendency to cut into the skin or damage it if too tight or pulled in the wrong direction. The best option is a cotton rope, which does not burn the skin. I have not used jute rope so far.

Cotton rope. 35 ft (10 meters) is a good length.

I used to improvise when tying up a girl but I recently learnt how to do this kind of shibari box-tie. The whole process takes a bit longer but it arouses the girl as you make her turn on herself and listen to your command. It is also aesthetically pleasing to look at when it is well done. The position is fairly comfortable while preventing the knots from being undone during the bang.

Always leave enough space to pass one finger (especially on nerves) between the rope and the skin and have scissors nearby in case of emergency.

The risk of Pandora's box

The enjoyment of being dominated is a good indicator of femininity. Women that are repulsed by the idea of being exclusively submissive (not by the kinky image of BDSM) are usually the unattractive girls that have been brainwashed by SJW propaganda, such as likely STD-ridden caravel Laci Green.

A girl enjoying a bit of rough love does not necessarily mean that she is a slut. But the fact that she has done it for a while, with various partners or if she initiates it without you prompting does.

Girls keep their taste for BDSM low key as it is a red flag of slutiness. If it was mainstream and "normal", every girl would publicly advertise her love for it (although some lost sluts regularly do it).

This kind of sex must be used sparingly and not become the norm. It should be reserved for casual sex. It may not be a sound idea for a couple to implement these routines into a LTR. It would become a rabbit hole that shows your girl's deepest, unavowed fantasies you would wish you never heard about.

Nice, normal sex is always fine.

Voilà, amusez-vous bien

Those are the main elements you will need. Gimp suits, pussy pumps, foot fetishes, electric punishment and other similar practices should stay where they belong and that is in the cesspool of degenerate modern pornography.

Some girls with a more traditional mindset might still think, with reason, that it is too much of a sexual niche and the taste for certain elements of BDSM might be the indication of psychological problems, as their experience is most likely based on those fat freaks in leather boxers that front the deviant “prides” that plague the Western world. Hence the importance of assessing correctly the kind of girl she is before using these tools.

For inspiration, I would direct you towards better books than Fifty Shades Of Grey (inaccurate and poorly written as it came from a low SMV woman) like the Story of O or the Marquis de Sade’s works.

Read More: 4 Key Elements For Great Day Game Interactions With Beautiful Girls

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

4 Steps To Getting A Shredded Summer Physique

April 20, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

It’s no secret that Western women have been raising their expectations of men for the past several decades. Dozens of Disney movies portraying men as princes, reality TV shows with men groveling at the feet of a “potential bride,” and general access to large quantities of men via Tinder and other dating applications, have made many women very picky.

One of the easiest ways for you to differentiate yourself, is to build a shredded, chiseled physique. Will it take some work? Yes, it will. But is it worth it? Absolutely.

Learning game, and getting girl’s numbers when you’re shredded, is like shooting fish in a barrel…especially if you’re over the age of 35. Even if you’re younger, however, most men are weak and scrawny, or largely overweight. Getting a head start on your summer body is a great way to ensure that you’ll stand out, and be able to game scantily-clad beach girls with ease.

1. Use 16-8 The Model of Intermittent Fasting

Whenever I have clients that are overweight and trying to cut down some pounds, I always recommend that they do intermittent fasting, for several reasons. First, however, what is intermittent fasting?

Intermittent fasting is the idea that you only eat during a certain time frame. There's various versions of it, some advocate fasting for 8 hours a day, and others advocate only having one meal a day. Personally, I recommend that you use the 16-8 model.

What this means is that you wake up, and fast for the next 8 hours. So, if you wake up at 6AM, you don't eat until 2PM, and you finish eating at or before 10PM. This is beneficial for numerous reasons:

- You'll be able to focus on work for many uninterrupted hours
- It's easy to diet, seeing you'll have to fit your calories into a smaller window
- Intermittent fasting improves hormonal profile, boosting testosterone and growth hormone

You will be absolutely amazed at how fast you burn fat when you utilize intermittent fasting—losing 30 pounds a month isn't unheard of, and in fact, some people that I've put on this diet (in conjunction with ketosis) have lost 45 pounds in just a month.

2. Utilize P.H.A.T. Training

I've discussed this before on Return of Kings, but it's worth mentioning again, because it's the best workout structure I'm currently aware of. P.H.A.T. training stands for Power Hypertrophy Adaptive Training, or in other words, combining strength and mass training into one routine.

My current routine, and the routine I recommend if you're trying to look phenomenal for summer, follows this layout:

- Day 1: Upper Body Strength
- Day 2: Lower Body Strength
- Day 3: Rest
- Day 4: Back and Shoulders Mass
- Day 5: Legs Mass
- Day 6: Chest and Arms Mass
- Day 7: Rest

This routine is definitely on the more advanced side, but with adequate focus and recovery, any man with normal levels of testosterone can benefit tremendously from it. Days 1 and 2 should be focused on the big compound lifts: bench press, squat, deadlift, overhead press, and the barbell row. This will allow you to shatter any and all previous strength plateaus.

Days 4-6 should be focused on hypertrophy, or in layman's terms, building mass. This equates to higher repetitions with lower weight. Do plenty of auxiliary exercises to train each specific muscle. I generally aim for 3-4 different exercises for each muscle group.

So, for example, on Day 6, I do 3 variations of chest exercises, 3 variations of bicep exercises, and 3 variations of tricep exercises, all ranging from 8-20 repetitions. This ensures that I not only get a chiseled, shredded physique, but also put on mass and build endurance.

3. Do Weighted and Non-Weighted Ab Exercises

One of the biggest mistakes I see guys making when they're trying to get a six pack, is they only focus on doing non-weighted ab exercises. You know, the typical ones you learn in gym class, like sit ups, planks, and leg raises?

Those are great and all, but if you want to build those deep, thick ab muscles that really pop, you'll have to add some weight into your routine. Opt for weighted sit ups on a decline bench press—start out with 25 pounds, then do as many as you can. Drop down to 10, then 5, and finish it off with as many repetitions as you can do with no weight.

Another phenomenal exercise, that is a part of my personal routine, is the rope crunch. You know that rope that people attach onto the cable machine, and usually use to hit their triceps? Well, you can also use it to hit your abs. What you do is you get down on your knees, facing away from the rope.

Then, pull it down so that it's touching your neck. Slowly move your head down until it touches the ground—you should feel an incredible burn in your abs, because if you're doing it right, they'll be doing 90% of the work. Aim to start off with heavier weight, and slowly decrease the weight until you can't do anymore repetitions.

4. Utilize No-Bullshit Supplements

As someone who worked at a supplement store in college, I'm very aware that 90% of supplements are total garbage. They promise you ridiculous gains, like 30 pounds of rock solid muscle in a week "for the low, low price of $89.99!"

Ignore 90% of supplements, and stick to the basics:

- A high-quality pre-workout, with key ingredients
- A good whey protein powder
- Creatine monohydrate
- Bodybuilder's multivitamin

If you want to get fancy there's plenty of supplements that you can use beyond these, but in terms of being "natural," (AKA avoiding legal steroids), and bang for your buck, these are the best ones to go with. I have test-tried literally hundreds of supplements before, and have compiled a list of the most meth-like pre-workouts.

I recommend you take one of these 15-20 minutes before hitting the gym, because there's scientific evidence proving their effectiveness. When choosing a pre-workout, aim for caffeine, beta-alanine, vinpocetine, and l-taurine. There's plenty more ingredients that will improve your workout, but these are some key ones.

As for the whey protein, Optimum Nutrition's Gold Standard is the best fundamental whey protein. Take 2 scoops post-workout with some dried mangoes, dried pineapple rings, and/or rice cakes. These contain fast-digesting carbohydrates that will jump start the muscle-growth process.

Take 3-5 grams of creatine with your pre-workout (if it doesn't already have creatine in it), and 3-5 grams afterwards. On off days, aim to take 5 grams with a carbohydrate heavy meal. Just this alone will drastically improve your strength and endurance, because it enhances ATP synthesis (your body's energy mechanism).

As for a bodybuilder's multivitamin, I recommend Animal Pak—yes, it's got a ton of pills in it, but that's because it's jam-packed with so many high quality ingredients. You'll notice an increase in your energy within a few days, and it'll provide you with all of the nutrients you need to build rock-solid muscle and melt away pounds of fat.

Summary

Imagine these girls complementing your abs

As the men of ROK are very aware, learning game is becoming increasingly difficult. Yes, having a strong frame is important, and yes learning to develop confidence is key, but it's also important to look your best. If you want to pull the hottest of the hot, you MUST actively work on your physique.

Gone are the days where a man could get a sexy wife from merely being a "good guy," with a good job. Unfortunately, you need more than that now…but don't worry, because getting a chiseled physique is far easier than you'd think. Simply utilize my advice, and you're good to go.

Do intermittent fasting, preferably the 16-8 model. Design your routine based around the P.H.A.T. principle, in order to build lean, dense, strong muscle, and get huge at the same time. Do weighted and non-weighted ab exercises, to get those deep ab grooves that turn women on.

And for the love of God, ignore that GNC salesman. Stick to creatine, pre-workouts, whey protein, and a multivitamin, and you'll be pulling beach chicks in no time.

Want the definitive guide to building a shredded, sexy physique that drives women crazy? Check out Jon's "Body of an Alpha" blueprint.

Read More: 3 Critical Rules To Build A Physique That Turns On Women

Jon Anthony

Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

4 Reasons You Should Visit The Island Of Malta

April 20, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

The week around Easter I spent in the south of Europe, more specifically the small mediterranean island country Malta. With roughly 415,000 inhabitants it is not one of Europe's most prominent and well-known, but if one takes into account geographic location, architecture, language (English is official language in parallel with Maltese), scenery and modern versus traditional layers of culture, then it is indeed one of the best locations that the Western hemisphere has to offer. My four main observations may indicate why I make that assertion.

1. It is beautiful and aesthetically pleasing

After visiting around 45 countries around the world (including more than 20 in Europe) I have seen a lot, and it does not take much of an effort to compare hard data, talk to several locals, and keep your eyes open and digest your impressions before you make value judgments about a particular location's general quality. Especially if it is a smaller one.

Overall Malta is visually speaking quite impressive, and at the same level as the better parts of France, Italy and Spain in that regard. From the baroque-esque Old Town (Medina and Rabat are closely intertwined), to the capital Valletta's imposing framing and manifold Catholic churches, viewpoints and gardens, to the Blue lagoon on Comino Island, and the majestic cliffs of Gozo, a variety of archaic eye candy manifests itself. The cloudless sky and temperatures well above 20 degrees Celsius, which emerge in April, serve to magnify this effect.

It is not hard to understand why the producers behind Game of Thrones chose Malta as one of the main shooting spots for the first season. Unfortunately the famous Azure Window has recently fallen, but the area in its entirety is nevertheless as impressive as ever before.

2. It is cheap for being a wealthy European country

Just as there are palpable differences between countries, there are also striking ditto within them. For being a first-world country—Malta's economy has grown rapidly since the early 1990's and it has been part of the Eurozone since 2008—overall it has fairly low price levels in a European context. Prices are roughly 50 percent of those of Norway and Switzerland, and about 60 percent in comparison to for instance UK, France, Spain, Italy, Germany and Sweden. Perhaps Poland is its closest equivalent in this respect.

These differences will be mostly emphasized in transportation, accommodation, price of clothes and shoes, and consumption of local foodstuffs.

For example, a Tallinja card costs only 21 Euros for one week of bus travel, which is a very reasonable price, although of course many other countries or cities likewise offer reduced prices for seven days of local transportation. To travel with bus is not as pleasant as in Sweden or Germany, but overall it is safe and largely reliable.

3. The girls are beautiful

During my four days in Malta, I could not walk for more than 10 minutes before I saw 8s, and occasionally 9s, walking down the street or whatever location they popped up at. Anecdotal evidence is what it is but I still saw what I saw.

It could be that slim olive-skinned Sicilian waitress at the pizza restaurant, the 20-something Spanish girl who looked like a younger version of Scarlett Johansson swimming in the Blue lagoon, the stunningly beautiful young Maltese girl with dark long hair, the busty Arab in her late teens, the married ones with an elegant conservative aura, and occasionally some Scandinavian talent as well. The rare combination of a slim body and big breasts was particularly widespread.

Whether local or not, Malta is seriously brimming with hotties between 18–30 years old. Here one finds the quintessence of the Euro girl (90 percent of people, whether local or visitor, are European, while the rest consists mainly of Middle Eastern, Asian and black people).

Only better, being a moderately modern country (or in other words a hybrid of traditional and modern elements), it is one of those places where you see both younger and older men with better looking women at their side. The same short and out of shape 40 or 50-something guy, but likely with a good income, who struggles to land a 6 in the U.S. or UK, is calmly sauntering around with his hard 8 of a wife or girlfriend in the streets of Valletta or St. Julians.

4. Christianity is a living tradition

Both historically and currently, Malta is a country in which the Roman Catholic tradition is very distinctive and salient. 95 percent of Maltese people belong to the Roman Catholic church and about 53 percent attend Sunday services regularly.

During Easter, the celebration of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ took place as most shops and stores were closing down. Both older and younger people assembled in the beatific, even ethereal St. Paul's cathedral, and watched the recurrent Via Dolorosa parade along the narrow streets of the capital.

If one is a Christian, Roman Catholic in particular, Malta could be a place to raise a more traditional family, while at the same time using the fertile soil for worldly success too. Regardless, just for the sake of cultural experience it is worth a visit around this time of the year.

In summary

Overall Malta appears to be a quite good country in many significant ways. Like with all locations there are upsides and downsides, but if one makes a list of them the totality will convey an overall message. Whether you are a young or experienced player, or an older male who disregards game, one should seriously consider a temporary or permanent relocation here.

Read More: 6 Things To Know About Prague (Czech Republic)

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

10 Essential Tips For Attending An Antifa Riot

April 21, 2017 | by Davis M.J. Aurini | Link | Original Link

The recent success of the Fourth Battle of Berkeley is a palpable sign of the shift which is underway in Western politics. Since the election of Donald Trump, the peaceful men and women of the right have finally started standing up for themselves when leftist thugs try and disrupt their events through rioting and violence. While Return Of Kings continues to advocate for peaceful assembly rather than political violence, it's become abundantly clear that the modern-day left has no respect for rule of law, and that police forces are frequently failing in their duty to maintain order.

Should you choose to exercise your right to free speech, it is becoming increasingly likely that you'll be subjected to a violent onslaught by the home-grown terrorist organization known as Antifa. It is incumbent on you to prepare for this inevitability, so that you can protect yourself and others. The following ten points will help keep you safe, while ensuring that the Antifa thugs scatter into the winds.

1. Do not initiate

It is absolutely critical that we maintain the moral and legal high-ground. This does not mean pulling your punches, or bending over whenever somebody whines about hurt feelings – but it does mean that we eschew the barbaric tactics which our leftist enemies embrace. This is the fight for civilization, and if we stoop to our enemy's level then even if the battle is won, the war will be lost. Let them be the initiators, let them be the vandals; if you simply stand your ground, and maintain a confident composure, it is all but guaranteed that they will lash out.

Remember: these are the infantilized refuse of a collapsing civilization. There's no need for you to initiate anything; the mere fact that you're carrying yourself with confidence and giving voice to 'hate facts' will be more than enough to throw them into a frenzy.

2. Do not carry bladed weapons

From a legal standpoint, you have a right to defend yourself from assault: laws will vary from place to place, and in some areas you may be required to respond with proportionate force, but when we're discussing a group of lunatics who are hurling bricks and throwing M-80s, it would be reasonable to assume that some of them have a blade or a firearm hidden about their person. Legally speaking you would most likely be within your rights to defend yourself with blade or gun.

At the same time, your choice to carry a bladed weapon would speak to your mens rea; it suggests an intent on your part beyond peaceful assembly, a desire upon your part to maim or kill.

The reason men should carry a sidearm during peacetime is not so that they can use it in some sort of Action Hero fantasy; it's primary purpose is to serve as a deterrent. Open carrying wards off predators, who will seek out softer targets. Concealed carrying protects even those who don't carry at all, turning every potential victim into a potential threat. A sidearm carried during an Antifa riot fails to provide this deterrence, since brandishing when threatened is no longer an option.

The mob will continue to race forward, carried on by their own momentum, and you will be forced to either drop your gun or knife (and risk having one of the Antifa turn it on you) or to employ it, and take on the responsibility of having used lethal force against a mentally-ill soy addict. Stick to batons, tasers, and other such weapons (after consulting your local laws). Your goal should be to defend yourself and others as effectively as possible, not rack up a body count.

The one exception to this is if the organizers specifically encourage everyone to open carry. This goes back to deterrence, and you can be reasonably certain that the Antifa won't attack.

3. Do wear a helmet

Protect your brain box. The Antifas are in the habit of throwing rocks into the crowd, and your head is extremely vulnerable. Don't underestimate the effectiveness of modern protective gear. The following video by Skallgrim demonstrates how even a motorcycle helmet can protect you against mauls and swords. A batter's helmet or a construction worker's helmet will also offer you significant protection.

4. Do wear armor, gloves, and boots

Once your head is protected, the next three areas you need to worry about are feet, hands, and chest, in that order. Boots will protect you from sprained ankles or other injuries (during the chaos of a riot this is a major possibility – and failing to protect against it could lead to you being trampled). Your hands will be the next to get injured, and a pair of leather gloves will go a long way in ensuring that you don't contract whatever new and strange viruses are leaking out of the bloodied Antifas. Your chest is the the least likely area to sustain injury, but injuries there are potentially quite deadly, second only to the head. There's no need to visit your local SCA event to buy chainmail; any leather jacket, and motorcycle leather in particular, will keep you safe during this zombie apocalypse.

5. Don't be a hero; work with your companions

The battlefields of the 100 Years War had an interesting dynamic. The French soldiers were still following the romantic tradition of having a highly-trained warrior aristocracy, while the British were experimenting with mass, regimented militaries. The battles would swing both ways, sometimes the French knights would win through their individual feats of heroism, while in other battles the organization and discipline of the British would overwhelm the heroism of the French.

The Antifas are the detritus of society, who've made themselves ill through veganism, self-abuse, and sloth. Our side is superior in individual combat prowess and heroism, however the Antifas benefit from their mental illness and cowardice. They'll think nothing of abandoning an injured companion, and will inflame themselves with autistic rage during the attack like a smellier version of a Viking Berserker. By ensuring that our side stays organized – by eschewing individual acts of heroism for organization and discipline – the injuries we suffer can be reduced to a minimum.

6. Do employ maximum speed and aggression

The left has been conditioned to believe that they can act out however they want, and that civilized men won't offer any resistance. For far too long they've needed neither organization nor planning, since they've been able to simply swarm and destroy any and all targets of their ire. They do not follow any sort of Marquess of Queensberry rules; their methodology is to start spreading chaos, and to up the ante bit by bit as they're emboldened by their peers.

Once they initiate, do not give them the chance to ramp things up. Exploit their disorganization with swift and decisive action. Maintain momentum, and capitalize on your victories.

7. Use the wedge formation

One of the methods which has proven effective during the previous clashes is the wedge formation; penetrate their crowd while protecting the flanks of the men to your sides. If this is your first time attending a rally, find out who has experience and follow their guidance.

8. Go after their leaders

Your goal is not to beat the Antifa into submission; it's to scatter and demoralize them, while maintaining your legal right to peaceful assembly and free speech. The best way to do this is to find the individuals at the back of the crowd who are inciting the violence. Penetrate with the wedge formation and confront their leaders, who will flee as their shame runs down their legs. Once you have ensured that it is not just a tactical retreat, cease all pursuit; observe and ridicule. The remnants of the mob will quickly grow placid as they submit to defeat.

Severely injuring Antifas allows them to reaffirm their victim narrative; the goal is not to injure, but to defend yourselves, and to expose them as the sickly human vermin that they are, both to themselves and others.

9. Carry a first aid kit

Their will likely be medics on hand for more severe injuries, but there's no need to waste their time with minor scrapes and bruises. Purchase a small first aid kit which fits on your belt to treat yourself and your compatriots.

10. If Pepsi doesn't work, try Coke.

While the Pepsi Corporation has bravely attempted to quell the childish violence of today's liberal scum, the field tests thus far have proven to be a failure. Instead of Pepsi, try Coke, or perhaps Fanta.

Conclusion

It should go without saying that none of this is legal advice. Any lawyer worth his salt would advise you to avoid any rallies where the Antifa plan to riot. Remember that something as simple as an ill-timed punch can potentially result in the death of the hipster who receives it, as he falls and cracks his skull open on the cement, and that this will result in you being charged with manslaughter, or worse.

Be prepared for these violent cretins, but do not revel in the violence itself. These are, after all, our fellow citizens; misguided children who need to be put in their place, not a mortal enemy to be killed with extreme prejudice.

It is imperative that we take back our civilization from the subversive elements that would destroy it, and that we stand prepared to defend our rights, but we must also remember the responsibilities that go along with those rights. Your responsibility to administer first aid to all of the fallen once the melee is past. Your responsibility not to maim or kill when subduing will suffice. And your responsibility to stand for something higher than 'Might Makes Right'.

Go out there courageously, and go out there righteously, men of the West. Stay calm, collected, and cool, and stay faithful to your brothers in arms. The times they are a-changing.

Read More: Antifa Gets Destroyed By Right Wing Safety Squads In Berkeley

Davis M.J. Aurini
Davis was trained as a Historian at McMaster University, and as an Infantry soldier in the Canadian Forces. An author, strategist, Catholic medievalist, and an entrepreneur, his writing can be found at Stares at the World.

How Your City Is Killing You With Ugliness

April 21, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

The modern world attempts to shun beauty. Pause and think for a moment of something (not someone) beautiful. Chances are you were thinking of something old.

Perhaps the Grand Canyon, or a similar beautiful and peaceful pastoral site formed millions of years ago. Perhaps a sunrise on a beach far from the concrete jungle. Perhaps a religious symbol or beautiful house of worship. Perhaps a work of art or a classical masterwork of music.

One thing I can almost guarantee: If you were thinking of a city or building, you were thinking of the ancient world.

Prague, Czechoslovakia

American intellectual Joseph Campbell stated

> If you want to see what a society really believes in, look at what the biggest buildings on the horizon are dedicated to.

I recently returned from a two week trip to Mexico filled with churches and beautiful buildings constructed almost 500 years ago, which was far more beautiful than my 20th century American city. The world of the 1500s seems so ancient and primitive, and yet paradoxically life was superior in many ways to The Current Year.

Florence, Italy

Of course, a mosquito carrying malaria could quickly end your life, as modern antibiotics and medicines did not exist, and a family would need to have several offspring to ensure that a couple of them survived childhood, as the infant mortality rate was much higher, but there was a solid framework built around a patriarchal family, who dined on fresh, local, farm raised food, as men toiled at physical work, which kept them strong and mentally focused, while women played to their strengths of being nurturing mothers and caregivers.

Public Life on Display in Vienna, Austria

These families lived in beautiful cities that were planned and designed with a purpose in mind. Indeed, many cities today exist in their current form only because we are still appreciating their ancient architecture.

The city of Florence holds less than 400,000 residents, and, without its incredible art and architecture, would be a typical small city in the interior of Italy. And yet it receives 13 million tourists a year, primarily due to the wise decisions by past leaders that created a stimulating city filled with beautiful sights at every turn.

Design

Design is the fundamental component of culture.

Detailed plans for the construction of the Palace and Gardens at Versailles

Whether one is speaking of a city, a song, an iPhone, or a website, the central question is what type of thing do I want to create, beyond its mere function? Do I want a website that is filled with changing content, so people return to it? Do I want a phone with a large screen that is easy to use and feels good in the hand or pocket?

Do I want a city that upholds beauty and ideals, reinforces structure and order, and makes people happy? All of these questions begin with design. And so much of the modern world is not designed at all.

The SJW has not planned or designed her life. She is studying wymen's studies because she is a brave, strong, and independent multisexual, and she will figure out how to earn a living later. The perpetual drunk has not planned anything besides at which bar or pub to spend the rest of this week's paycheck. Whether on an individual, national, or global level, design is the fundamental concept of culture.

Successful people and successful civilizations have something in common: Planning

Indeed, despite evidence of individual conspiracies, I don't believe the main problem with the modern world is that a secret society is executing a planned program of evil, but that there is simply no plan at all.

What we are seeing is not a coordinated plan of evil; it is what happens when there is no coordinated plan at all.

The Old World Order, held together by monarchs, patriarchy, religion, and philosophy, and reinforced by art, song, music, and architecture, is giving way to a new world where we just turn civilization over to the popularity contest of democracy, letting the masses take control of important ideas, whether they be creating fake outrage about non-problems, twerking, disfiguring your body and mind, or engaging in the twelve deadly sins.

What Is Beauty?

To some degree, the saying "beauty is in the eye of the beholder" is true. However, there are objective standards of beauty. We could all agree that Jessica Alba is more attractive than Rosie O'Donnell. Angkor Wat is more beautiful than your DMV. Throughout cultures and time, while beauty standards have changed, we all know what is beautiful and what is not.

Wat is the reason you have so many ugly buildings, America ?

So we know what is beautiful. But what is beauty itself? Why is it important?

Beauty represents an ideal. A goal. Goodness. We seek pleasure and avoid pain, and we are drawn to the beautiful. Humans are emotional beings and we are drawn to beautiful sights, beautiful sounds, and beautiful feelings.

In other words, beauty is NOT skin deep, but is fundamental to civilization.

The Importance Of Beautiful Design

Most of the modern world is not well designed. I recently read a fascinating profile of Norwegian billionaire Fred Olsen, and he still wears a pair of wool pants he bought in the 1940s because they were well designed and well constructed. Imagine if that same level of design and quality was applied to every article of clothing you've purchased.

Now imagine if that same level of design, quality, and beauty was applied to the city you live in. If builders today took considered the effects their cities or buildings would have 100 years from now, instead of designing for planned obsolescence after a couple of decades.

Louis XIV had a more beautiful home than you

Architecture Is Civilization

In 1890 French writer (and outspoken critic of the Eiffel Tower) Guy de Maupassant wrote about architecture:

> It is the least understood and the most forgotten of the arts today is perhaps also the most aesthetic, the most mysterious and the most nourished with ideas. It has had the privilege, across the centuries, of symbolizing as it were each age, of summarizing in a very small number of typical monuments a race and a civilization's way of thinking, feeling and dreaming. A few temples and churches, palaces and châteaux contain more or less the world's entire history of art, and express visually, better than books, through the harmony of lines and the charm of ornamentation all the grace and grandeur of an epoch.

Architecture is the visual public expression of a culture's achievements, values, and outlook.

Modern Cities Are Bad

While production methods and technology have improved dramatically, the vast majority of beautiful, functional cities are old. Why aren't modern cities better than older ones? Today, city life is more important than ever for employment. Chances are, if you earned a college degree, you will need to live in a city in order to use it. And yet the quality of modern cities is abysmally poor.

This feels like the model for many modern cities

A friend of mine recently left Austin, Texas, because the city of 200,000 at the time he was born has now grown to almost a million people, living, working, and parking in the same shrinking space. Modern cities lack public spaces, good transportation, beauty, and order.

A Good City Conveys Order, Resiliency and Timelessness

Living, commuting, walking, and working in a modern city has a profound impact on one's mind and thought patterns. There is a reason Henry David Thoreau escaped to nature in order to organize his thoughts for not only his famous book Walden, but also for his treatise on Civil Disobedience.

New York City balances order and symmetry with beauty

Most major European cities were designed with a balance between order and beauty. A well designed city begins with prioritizing major monuments and public squares, positioned strategically so they are visible from any point, combined with a symmetrical grid system. Balance and symmetry are used to convey order and stability.

NOLA: "Oops I Did It Again, for-go-ot to plan"

New Orleans is a badly planned American city. Not only does it have typical modern ugly buildings outside the historic center, its lack of planning causes great havoc every few decades when living areas below sea level flood and are then rebuilt. Its lack of symmetry and order conveys the idea of chaos. And it is a chaotic place. Most friends I know there have abandoned NOLA and commute from adjacent Jefferson Parrish.

Disorder conveys chaos and makes one feel that no one is in charge.

Too much symmetry without balance is unpleasant

Beauty Makes Us Feel Connected

Loneliness is a huge problem in the independent west, with one in eight people saying they have no real friends. Beauty, and in particular beautiful architecture, helps one feel connected, integrated, important, and part of a larger whole. The creation of well designed, beautiful buildings like the Great Pyramids or the Palace at Versailles, took the coordinated efforts of thousands of men, who certainly felt a sense of accomplishment and pride and sacrifice. And the result of their combined efforts last centuries, and give future generations a sense of place and connection.

Telc, Prague: An example of balancing order with variety to create beauty

This sense of community comes from a public display of life. Any great city has a large public space where people congregate. In modern life, we often commute along sprawling highways to confined cubicles where we stare at tiny screens before returning back to our homes, with little public interaction. We don't see what other people are doing, or even know they are there.

The Piazza San Marco is a giant Living Room of Venice

We intrinsically crave public life, even if only to observe it from a distance. I can make a cup of coffee at home for a fraction of the cost that Starbucks sells them for, but Starbucks is a highly successful business because it provides a tiny public space where people can congregate and be around others.

Beauty Gives Us Identity

Beauty stands as a stark contrast between the irrational whims of the age. What is genuinely worth appreciating? A timeless building that existed at the time of my grandfather gives me a sense of place and identity. This identity gives us hope for the future. We are the people that created this, because we are a good people who value beauty.

Versailles is a celebration of French ingenuity and culture

What does it say when we are only creating lifeless Amazon warehouses and ugly, nondescript buildings?

One More Crack In The Wall

The general decline and disorder in society combines with poorly designed and ugly cities to convey a sense of “We don’t really know who we are, what we stand for, or where we are headed” which is why so many men feel disconnected, confused, and don’t stand up to defend their culture, and explains the rise of globalism.

While there have been some advances in civilization, many truths discovered centuries ago have been forgotten. Beauty should be honored and idealized, whether through city planning, architecture, art, literature, or through fat shaming and shunning of tattoos, multiple body piercings and promiscuity. It’s time for beauty to be glorified and revered again.

Read More: How Modern Architecture Destroys Your Relationships

Max Roscoe

is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Are Proles The Useful Idiots Of A Two Centuries Old Elite Plan?

April 21, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Our parents were taught at school that the world split up between capitalism and communism. For some, capitalism was to be equated with freedom and Western civilization—and it ominously slipped towards Big Corp and tax cuts for billionaires—whereas communism was an absolute threat. For others, communism was cool, generous, and one had to be a Leftist to be a good guy because being on the Right meant to be either a greedy abuser or a pathetic hillbilly.

When faced with such a worldview, especially when one realizes how it fails to address many issues, one can ask: is there a third way? The official answer has been rather nefarious: no, there is only one way, capitalism and communism have fused into the end of history, global governance, and "social liberalism" or social democracy. Under the guise of overcoming contradictions and negativity, this "end of history", as Francis Fukuyama had said, was a direct denial of autonomy and free-will. In the end, we can be grateful that the wannabe global managers' mask has slipped, revealing raw lust for power and hysteria.

Actually, there has been a third way all along. It appeared recurrently in the margins of the mainstream and was more or less subtly, but always harshly, repressed by the System. Sometimes it has been allegedly endorsed by individuals such as Hakim Bey, who marketed himself as an anarchist and sold many books by babbling about "autonomous zones", which in practice amounted to smoking pot in abandoned buildings while endorsing globalism. In truth, the third way has been embodied by defenders of middle class capitalism, such as those who were purged from the Republicans or either recuperated or evilized by the Left.

The dualist, capitalism-versus-communism, then social-democracy-versus-neoconservatism choice, is merely a pick between two strands of globalistic managerialism. The former leans more towards public bureaucracy, the latter is more in tune with private shareholders—although both are— and this makes absolutely no difference for the average downsized. Both destroy the citizens' ability to self-determination, and if you look closely, the managerial "dream" has constantly used proletarians while pushing the independent producers aside.

Independent farmers and dependent proles

Capitalism and communism, just as social democracy and neoconservatism, all have one thing in common: they are urban ideologies, made and spread in towns among town-dwellers. We are oblivious to this fact because living in an urban environment looks too obvious, too ordinary, for us to notice. Yet consider the following: from immemorial times, the wide majority of people have been peasants. Traditional civilizations, including medieval Europe, were mostly made of husbandmen, able to grow crops, make tools and raise animals. Those who did this work were either gentry and independent farmers or serfs, reflecting the traditional caste division between Vaishya—free makers, tradesmen—and Shudra—dependent individuals who couldn't manage themselves and could only serve the higher castes.

Only a few towns existed, and compared with today, they were quite small:

> In the year 1800 Europe was still overwhelmingly rural, the vast majority of its > inhabitants (thus numbering only 150.000.000) living in the country. This was even true of those nations today most thoroughly urbanized. In England and Wales, for example, where four-fifths of the population are now townsfolk, five-sixths of the population then lived in the country. In the year 1800 only two [European] cities, London and Paris, contained more than 500.000 inhabitants, while Berlin had fewer than 200.000. (Lothrop Stoddard, Social Classes in Post-War Europe, 1925, pp.6-7)

These towns were on the path of trading routes, between business and political power.

Then came the industrial revolution. As the steam engine was mastered and perfected, mass transport became available and cheap. Big banks invested in industrial projects, huge factories were built close to the cities. As all these machines needed arms to work on them, the population grew enormously, massive amounts of goods were mass-produced, and Europe imported lots of food from the whole world to feed these workers.

This situation had (almost?) no historical precedent. The cities turned into production centers, each connected with other ones through transportation means of enormous capacities. Most importantly, the majority of the new city-dwellers did not own their means of production, and more often than not their homes as well: they were proletarians, forced to sell their manual abilities to make a living. Far from nature, depending from a complex system they did not own and often did not understand, proles were very different from the self-owned, independent, food-producing peasants.

More numerous than Middle Ages serfs, more gregarious and prone to group identitarianism, the proletarians soon clashed with the peasants. Indeed, the proletarians' interests coincided with the wealthy merchants'. When free trade began to soar, farmers knew that importing food from all continents would mean a lot of competition and the need for them to produce more while earning less: at the beginning of the nineteenth century, they were influential enough to push for regulation. But later, as the cities—proles and bourgeois—gained power, the power equilibrium was disrupted, and in Great Britain a motivated lobby managed to repeal the regulating Corn Laws in 1846.

The effects were disastrous to the peasants and gentry alike, as well as to national autonomy:

> In 1877 the price of British-grown wheat averaged 56 shillings and 9 pence a quarter and for the rest of the nineteenth century it never reached within 10 shillings of that figure. In 1878 the price fell to 46 shillings and 5 pence. In 1886 the wheat price decreased to 31 shillings a quarter. By 1885 wheat-growing land declined by a million acres (4,000 km²) (28½%) and the barley area had dwindled greatly also. Britain's dependence on imported grain during the 1830s was 2%; during the 1860s it was 24%; during the 1880s it was 45%, (for wheat alone during the 1880s it was 65%.) (Source)

The split did not run between capitalists and communists, or between owners and non-owners, but between the urban and the countrymen. Proletarians did not care about independence, as they had already lost even the sense of it. They only cared about having cheaper food, improved material life conditions, and work—and all this was favoured by “free” global trade.

The First World War and the Red international

On the beginning of the twentieth century, the countryside had lost much of its weight and significance. The metropolis mastered market prices through importation and exportation of mass quantities. At the side of blue collars were the intellectuals, who more often than not perceived the urban life, fashions and “progress” as much cooler than toiling the land. Congested cities were full of men who had lost the sense of nature, who were often dependent from a tight elite of wealthy bankers, and it made the autonomous farmers miserable.

Then came the Great War. Then many people realized that towns do not grow food. As the war raged, the international transportation system mostly stopped working; all importations were cut down, and the urban population found itself deprived of nourishment. The governments reacted by rationing food, but even then, a black market formed and many farmers were able to sell some of their harvest at a huge price. Alas, the artificial cosmopolitan system was rocking to its foundations! And the nature-despising, “progressive” town-dwellers were forced to acknowledge at least tacitly that “the town cannot live without the country, but the country can live without the town” (Stoddard, Social Classes…, p.40).

In 1918, the farmers who had survived the war had become important and powerful again. Some who had turned poor used their profits to buy up the land they were working. Shrewd and realistic, the farmers knew that factory workers did not give a damn about them and favoured a world where international trade would be restricted, so that their relative autonomy could be maintained, and never shattered by the international merchants.

In spite of the war, farmers from all Europe, mostly on the East, managed to network with each other. In 1921, four political parties, then seventeen joined to create the International Agrarian Bureau or first Green International, a confederation of self-owned middle classers willing to fight for their independence.

Bolshevism were raging, and communists tried to recuperate the movement. In 1923, they created the Red Peasant International. In vain:

> The peasant had one simple, tangible objective—the land. Once possessed of the land, he desired to settle down and enjoy it for his own individual profit. He realized the value of his produce, and he expected the townsman—capitalist, bourgeois, or proletarian—to pay him his price… Why should [the farmer] socialize his land?… What was [collectivization] but a new form of urban predominance—a predominance no less hateful to the peasant because exercised by factory workers instead of by aristocrats and bourgeois, as in former days? (Stoddard, Social Classes…, pp.18-9)

This is a key point. During the nineteenth century, urban proles were OK with gauging farmers or forcing them into a cutting throat competition so that they could eat for a cheaper price. Later, when the same proles had converted to Communism, they would ask for seizing the land and having it cultivated by proletarized farmers. No one would be allowed to remain independent or self-owned, the wealthy global elite aside. Later again, the factory workers would see no problem in the "modernization" plan destroying independent farmers and tradesmen by building State-funded large-scale estates along with hypermarkets, both reducing prices thanks to scale economies: as long as they could keep masturbating on the "dictatorship of the proletariat", these masses actually supported the proletarization of the whole world.

Once again, the fault line does not stand between capitalists and communists. It stands between a third caste of farmers, craftsmen, shopkeepers who struggles to remain self-owned—middle class—and a conglomerate of town-dwellers who push for everyone to be under the sway of almighty managers. The private or public status of said managers is irrelevant: a civil servant and a Big Corp CEO think alike, especially if the latter is deemed "too big to fail." It will be worthwhile to notice that defenders of an independent third caste, such as Pierre Poujade, have been constantly demonized and expelled from mainstream politics: they are a real opposition to a managerialism that wants to crush any opposition it does not control.

How the Green International got crushed

During the 20s, when Bolsheviks attempted coups in European countries, the free armies—Freikorps—who defeated them and saved civilization were mostly composed of countrymen and middle classes. It briefly looked like the Green International could win. Unfortunately, the globalists showed a malignancy no farmer wisdom could foresee: "Russian" Bolsheviks preferred mass starvation to any hint of a powerful country side, and this is how millions of peasants were wilfully starved.

On the West, things underwent a subtler but identical course of dispossession. The European Union pushed for intensive farming and large, mechanized estates, so that the small farmer would have no choice but to sell his land and become a factory prole. (This happened to my grandfather.) The same happened to shopkeepers who competed with low-price supermarkets. On the one hand, all these dispossessed were incited to go the cities and become blue- or white-collars, thus turning dependent and fragile.

On the other hand, those who attempted to defend local autonomy were quickly repressed: after Soviet-funded Communists failed to recuperate Pierre Poujade, they called him "Poujadolf", hinting that any criticism of mass proletarization would be tagged "nazi." And once again we can see Communists working in synergy with "capitalistic" globalists to support Big Corp and destroy people's ability to self-determination.

Also, after the Green international was driven in exile by USSR takeover in Eastern Europe and failed to prevent the rise of Big Corp, its name was stolen by urban bourgeois bohemians. The "Green" parties of various Western countries confiscated a genuine country movement, turning it into a pretext for globalist influence trafficking—from the juicy "green energies" contracts to the equally lucrative business of "rights to pollute"—and despising hunters, fishermen, i.e. those who really lived within nature. Even now, siding with the truly "green" may have you tagged a "fascist" and a hillbilly, because problem glasses-wearing babbling about "sustainable development" in an air-conditioned office know more about nature than those who harvest and care for animals, y’know.

What now?

Global governance actors wear many outfits, yet they are easy to recognize when you look at who funds them and what they promote. Big Corp, Big State, transnational bureaucratic monstrosities such as the European Union, para-public NGOs and NPOs, think-tanks, deep State… are all connected together through revolving doors. Under a thousand “causes” and pretexts, they all aim at excluding most people from self-ownership. How can you create a business when every sector has been taken over by the State or Monsanto—and when any successful startup gets bought off or sank through an array of offensive methods?

From the start, the factory workers have been the footsoldiers of a one, single overriding aim: the destruction of most of the third caste or true middle class through forced proletarization. Walmart and Carrefour succeeded where the reds failed. This explains how the pseudo-opposing trends of Leftist “counterculture” and entrepreneurship could fuse into hipsterism and bobo culture: both agreed in scorning the “stupid” countryman, the “idiotic” shopkeeper… and as the proles stopped doing their bidding, they were promptly despised as well, to the benefit of “minorities” who would take on the anti-autonomy, anti-civilization cause.

Farmers of yesterday knew how to grow every plant, raise animals, build and fix houses, understand the markets and sometimes even spoke various languages if only to communicate with customers. They had enough wisdom to see degeneracy and lust for power behind the “progressive” pretensions of their various foes, in contrast with the rootless factory proles who fell for demagoguery. May the red pilled turn more and more like these autonomous agrarian, who would really deserve a rehabilitation in mainstream culture.

Read Next: How To Be More Dominant In The Bedroom

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Bill O’Reilly’s Firing Shows That You Don’t Need Any Evidence Whatsoever To Destroy A Man

April 22, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The firing of Bill O’Reilly, who for years headed cable news’ most popular show, The O’Reilly Factor, should highlight to any man that his job can quickly disappear via unsubstantiated and/or made-up accusations of sexual harassment. I am yet to see a single shred of evidence that O’Reilly has done anything sexually untoward to any women. Fox News nonetheless terminated him after advertisers in their droves pulled their money from The O’Reilly Factor.

It is ironic that liberals and SJWs have hated O’Reilly for two decades for what he has actually said and done, but what undid him were things we don’t even know happened. In fact, they almost certainly did not happen, otherwise the women accusing him would have resort to hard evidence. Only if Bill O’Reilly were some kind of superstar spy, rather than a political commentator, could he have successfully “sexually harassed” so many women, with still more now “coming forward,” without any trail.

The New York Times reported that in the years before this, Fox and O’Reilly paid a collective $13 million to five women claiming some form of sexual harassment. Considering the substantial revenues O’Reilly and his show brought to Fox, this would have been something of a pittance. It also reflects the way companies regularly operate, a situation in which settling even the most slanderous cases is the best way to minimize damage from those many would regard as extortionists.

Tellingly, almost every mainstream media organization reporting on the matter has refrained from saying O’Reilly sexually harassed the women. “Accusations” and “alleged” have been the order of the day, making the lack of considered commentary about whether he should have ever been fired all the more unusual.

Make no mistake: Bill O'Reilly was fired for being ACCUSED of sexual harassment, not because he sexually harassed anyone. Even the liberal mainstream media's interpretations have had to accommodate this reality.

Take, for example, the first paragraph of a summary by Time:

> Longtime Fox News host Bill O'Reilly will not return to the network following multiple accusations of sexual harassment against him, parent company 21st Century Fox announced Wednesday.

The Sydney Morning Herald, which falsely accused ROK of promoting rape, couldn't even bring itself to say that O'Reilly did anything wrong:

> The latest allegations come after an explosive report in The New York Times revealed Fox News' parent company had paid settlements totalling $13 million to keep five women quiet about alleged mistreatment at the hands of O'Reilly.

I understand that Fox News was hemorrhaging money after The New York Times story broke and it needed to arrest and reverse the exodus of advertisers. But there is no evidence available, other than the claims of two sides, that Bill O'Reilly sexually harassed anyone. And because five women were paid an average of $2.6 million to settle their claims, serious questions need to be asked about the massive incentives for women to make accusations and then be paid off. It seems that these evidence-light accusations will never will be seriously tested, instead being decided in the court of public opinion, which is itself shaped by the sensationalism of a handful of liberal-leaning media outlets.

Why have the accusations leaked, but not any evidence?

How convenient that liberals don't like O'Reilly's close relationship with Trump. He is happy to critique The Donald when he wants to, too.

Despite the confidential settlements Bill O'Reilly and Fox News made with the five women, The New York Times became aware of them. So why then have they not become aware also of any smoking gun evidence, pieces of information that would presumably blow O'Reilly and his protestations of innocence out of the water? Well, these pieces almost certainly do not exist.

The hit job by The New York Times amounts to nothing but a scoop without the ice cream. Because of the ability of millions of people, plus many advertisers, to believe hearsay, paying some people to keep quiet is both good business practice and invariably the lesser of two bad scenarios. Resisting a lawsuit spearheaded by an ambulance-chasing lawyer in the mould of Gloria Allred can be deleterious, costing a company like Fox News tens of millions even without a payout to an accuser.

In addition, the involvement of Lachlan and James Murdoch in the firing of O'Reilly is worrying. These two middle-aged sons of billionaire Rupert Murdoch, both key players at Fox, have apparently come out on the side of political correctness. They could have instead encouraged Fox News to adhere to its purported beliefs in reason and fighting precious, self-righteous liberals' calls for turning around the burden of proof both legally and non-legally.

The Daily Mail reports that Lachlan's wife Sarah, best known for her role in screwing up the reading out of the winner of Australia's Next Top Model, was pivotal in convincing her husband that O'Reilly needed to be fired. You could say that a wife is always going to have influence, for better or for worse, but if this story is true, Fox faces a very difficult future once Rupert dies and even now. Decisions like this should avoid "the feels" factor and a woman whose qualifications on the subject seem to amount to this:

Is being told some words really worth millions of dollars?

…Gloria Allred says so.

Though I have pointed to the serious problems with O'Reilly losing his job over "sexual harassment" accusations, there's another issue of how women can be paid so much often for so little. Like you, I have been told either "unfortunate" or "bad" words over the years. I use inverted commas because much of what I hear in news stories is treated like the aftermath of a hurricane when it should really be considered under the rubric of "absolutely no big deal." Or at least a deal not worth $x, y, or z million.

Some of this talk coming my way at work or elsewhere has been sexually suggestive. People would make sexual jokes about a range of people. But whereas I have been accused of "whoring" around with other women by two or three female coworkers, none of whom I had sex with, and could not (and did not want to) sue, other people, almost always women, are trigger-happy about litigation or new forms of HR warfare.

And why are we fencing off alleged sexual harassment from other harassment claims? I would think that someone being denied promotion, or being otherwise "discriminated" against, happens a lot more in relation to someone's looks or personality than over sexual matters. In the end, however, all these claimed workplace and other mishaps need to compete with life-or-death situations, including industrial workers who frequently get far less for losing a limb, being confined to a wheelchair, or other serious emergencies.

Plus, the context of sexual harassment allegations matters. If (and that's a very big if), a man makes a sexually suggestive comment, there's a very good chance he has said it in a general conversational thread where the woman is bantering back. But later, sometimes years later, the woman can come forward and claim she was "harassed." The problem is that if the man admits he engaged in the discussion, which O'Reilly, by the way, has vehemently denied, he is prima facie guilty.

Any office romance is a sexual harassment suit waiting to happen

As I have said, there is no evidence Bill O'Reilly did anything. What prompted his removal was a loss of advertisers, not any proof (far from it) that he harassed these women. O'Reilly's sheer presence in political circles, having fended off many powerful haters for years, should cause every normal man to seriously consider the consequences of office and other liaisons. Like the fired newsman's plight, even claims of an attempted workplace pick-up can torpedo a career.

Because there has been no adjudication by a court, O'Reilly's downfall has been largely adjudicated by the same media outlets who have a vested interest in portraying Fox News as a protected space for "sexual harassers." The idea that CNN, The Huffington Post, or other publications can handle this impartially is beyond fanciful.

And guess what? The woman accusing you, like those women accusing Bill O'Reilly, doesn't need to prove anything. If she kicks up a big enough stink, in all likelihood you are gone. Something as "positive" for your situation as keeping your job is still a very poisoned chalice, as anything from an expected promotion to the respect of your colleagues and clients will all be in jeopardy.

Proving that men have done something wrong is now part of a bygone era. Be prepared and have a back-up plan stronger than Bill O'Reilly's, or potentially face the same fate as him.

Read More: Sexual Harassment "Expert" Claims She Was Harassed By Military Cadets During A Conference On Harassment

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Is North Korea Really A Threat To The United States?

April 22, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

With an eventual armed conflict between North Korea and the U.S. and some of its regional allies like South Korea and Japan waiting around the corner, it is relevant to look at this country from a cultural and historical point of view in order to understand more of one of America's arch enemies (besides Russia and Iran, at least according to the Deep state and neocons).

Typically people in general know that it is an isolated socialist country that was divided in the aftermath of World War II and the Korean War (1950–53), but there is of course much more to it. Therefore I intend to shed light on some fundamental aspects of culture, history and politics with regard to North Korea.

I have used Donald Goldstein and Harry Maihafer's book The Korean War (2001), Donald Baker's Korean Spirituality (2008), The World Factbook, and various additional sources in order to describe and analyze some of the core features and tenets of North Korean culture and political capacity. Obviously, people know much less about North Korea than South Korea, so I have tried to be careful and only stressed unimpeachable facts.

The formation of North Korea

Korea has a history which stretches thousands of year, and a written language based on the Chinese script which was invented by King Sejong in the 15th century. The military and political strength of Korea has differed over time, but generally the Kingdom (or kingdoms) has been caught between China and other larger powers. Unlike many other nations and kingdoms throughout Eurasia, the Kingdom of Guryeo managed to withstand the Mongol invasions (1231–1259).

[image]

Much culture, including religion and philosophy, stems from China, such as Schamanism, Confucianism and Buddhism. Even Catholicism is a result of Koreans who temporarily migrated to China in the late 18th century and brought it back on a micro scale.

In the 19th century and forward, Korea was supported and largely controlled by China until Japan rose as a regional superpower and formally annexed the entire peninsula between 1910–1945. During that time Koreans had to bow before the Japanese Shinto gods. This has left Koreans in general with resentment against the Japanese, even though they have cooperated economic-wise (South Korea in particular but also North Korea in the first decades following World War II).

In the aftermath of World War II, and the general liberal West versus Communist East global dichotomy, Korea was divided along the 38th parallel. Something that could have been only temporary became permanent, and so also the war which lasted 1950–53, during which the northern part fought with the Communists from Soviet and China and the South with the United States (partly similar to the Vietnam conflict).

Even though there has been an official armistice since then, the war is still ongoing although dormant. The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DRK) still wants to usurp the Republic of Korea (ROK) and vice versa, and various provocations have taken place throughout modern history.

Juche as a paradoxical ideology

Juche (self-reliance) is the unthreatened hegemonic ideology in DRK and is largely based on Marxist-Leninst ideas and hinges on an industrialized plan economy. It is also puristic in that sense that it does not allow loan words or any other form of influences from the West (only some from the Soviet Union), and conservative with regard to the use of formal speech style. Hasipsio-che is used between pretty much all adults in public, whereas in South Korea Haeyo-che and various intimate and informal speech styles are common in many contexts.

As the scholar Charles Armstrong notes, however, it has not been as isolationist as it is now (although DRK is still dependent on China). In the 1960s and 70s, Kim Il-Sung, DRK:s indisputed leader, wanted to show the world that North Korea was a role model for post-colonial nations in general.

The largest focus was on Southeast Asia (Vietnam and Indonesia in particular), Africa, the Middle East and Central America, but the Pyonyang administration also had diplomatic relations with European countries like Norway, Sweden and Yugoslavia. Kim Il-Sung had particularly close ties to socialists in Ethiopia, but whom in the end did not feel that Juche ”translated” to them.

Paradoxically, DRK was more globalist during that time than it is now – with the intent to disseminate the gospel of Juche – and was overall wealthier than the ROK until the late 1960s. In parallel with worsening economic status in the mid-1980s and onwards, DRK had lost whatever global political-economic influence it had, and during the reign of Kim Jung-Il and his son Kim Jong-un things have become worse.

At that time and forward the material and economic gap between North Korea and South Korea has grown larger, in conjunction with ROK improving their diplomatic relations with pretty much the rest of the world while DRK has become more isolated.

Due to both environmental (for example floods and crop failures) and man-made factors (for instance that the former Soviet Union cut off subsidies and the failure of the economic-distributive system), between 1994–1998 North Korea experienced a severe famine, and as far as anecdotal evidence from defectors such as Yeonmi Park (whose lecture I have attended and to whom I have asked several questions about culture) goes, the general living conditions for the people are pretty bad. For instance children are forced to watch public shooting executions with intestines splattered all over the place.

The cult of the Kim dynasty as quasi-religious manifestation

Typically, Marxist-Leninism is an atheistic ideology, and indeed religions are not nearly as wide-spread in North Korea as in South Korea, where Buddhism and Christianity have many followers (about 23 percent Buddhists and 29 percent Christian).

However, since Korea overall historically has been largely influenced by Confucianism and to some extent still is, a cult-like worship of its leaders—akin to that of Mao Zedong in China—can be identified.

It is not just the current leader in DRK that receives imposed worship, but the Kim dynasty in general. Kim is the most common surname (or first name, depending on how you see it) in all of Korea, but it is the particular Kim family—the foundation of North Korea—that is the focal point of veneration.

Apart from that there is some evidence of a small rise of Shamanism, such as fortune tellers, and Evangelical Christianity in North Korea. According to the World Factbook, the government sponsors religious groups in order to create an illusion of religious freedom. Therefore most real denominations are probably clandestine.

The North Korean military strength

Another important aspect, and perhaps the most significant from an American and Western point of view, is that historically North Korea has produced a significant amount of weapons and exported them to other nations, socialist countries in particular.

As scholar Andrea Berger stresses:

> North Korea's contemporary defence-export catalogue is larger than most international-security analysts appreciate, and it appears willing to sell anything surplus to its own requirements. Its offerings include off-the-shelf weapons systems, supporting infrastructure and 'knock-down kits'; spare parts and munitions; weapons designs and technology; complete arms-production lines and factories; maintenance, repair and upgrade services; military and police training in a variety of disciplines; and logistical and procurement services. North Korea has successfully negotiated foreign contracts in all of these categories since the arms embargo was put in place in 2006.

According to Global Fire Power, North Korea is ranked 25th in the world in terms of military capacity. About 10 million are fit for service, whereas the actual military force (which includes women) are about 1.3 million and thus in fact larger than the United States army. This can be compared to South Korea, which is ranked 11th. Its allies, the United States and Japan, are ranked 1 and 7. I am far from a military expert but North Korea is actually not a serious threat compared to Russia, ranked 2 in the world.

If a World War III is going to happen it will in all likelihood mainly be between the U.S. and Russia. With that said the emerging nuclear-armed intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) program is far from unthreatening and some sort of more constructive diplomacy (push–pull strategies) ought to be implemented.

Hopefully, the stalemate can continue for the sake of all involved parties, until any Kim leader eventually will allow a re-unification with South Korea. Only a cultural relativist without lack of objective reasoning skills can claim that North Korea is as good as South Korea, despite its flaws.

In summary

Overall we know much less about what North Korea is like than South Korea. However, it is undisputedly a largely isolated and poor socialist country with a rather strong military force and arsenal at its disposal. Hence its capacity should not be easily underestimated, especially its nuclear program, although neither exaggerated.

Culturally it is more conservative than South Korea, with close to zero influences from the West in terms of popular culture and loan words. The imposed cult of the Kim dynasty has somewhat religious overtones, whereas religious pluralism is not nearly as large as in its democratic and free-market based southern neighbor.

Read More: What Modern South Korea Is Like

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

A Regimen For Recovering Injuries To Your Core

April 23, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

A couple of weeks ago, I was perusing the comments section of an article, when a reader made a request of me. He stated that he had suffered a severe injury to his back: two ruptured lumbar discs which are well on their way towards healing. However, the real bane of his experience was the soft-tissue damage—muscle spasms and a massive loss of strength and flexibility in his core, back, glutes, and hamstrings.

He then asked me, your fitness trainer, for some advice on how to recover from this. Being that I have only recently recovered from an injury myself (albeit to my foot rather than my core), and I emphasize core training as second only to training the forearms and hands, I feel that I might be able to give some insight on how to gradually regain your strength and mobility.

1. Get Medical Permission First

This goes without saying, but you shouldn't train the injured area until you have explicit medical permission from a doctor. I understand that muscular and joint atrophy are a very depressing phenomenon, and you want to get back into the fray and build up your strength as soon as possible, but it would behoove you to be safe so that you prevent re-injury.

2. Calisthenics

To begin with, I would recommend working through the entire bridge series, which I have long held is the best thing you can possibly do for your back, if not your core in general. Begin with training the short bridges, which will do much to "unlock" your hips. Then move into the half bridge, full bridge, and, eventually when you get stronger and in better shape, begin doing the stand to stand bridges.

Some of the other fundamental calisthenic exercises will serve to strengthen the core, such as the push-up, squat, hanging leg raise and pull-up (the handstand doesn't work the core much against the wall, but the free handstand does. I would not recommend doing a free handstand until you've worked your way back up to a decent standard of fitness), which give some auxiliary work to the core in addition to the chest, back, and shoulders that most would think would be targeted in those exercises.

As with the bridge, the man recovering from injury should start at the very first of these exercises, no matter how embarrassing it may seem to him. In other words, even if you were capable of doing a one-handed push-up before the injury, you should start with the knee push-ups and work your way back up to the one-handed pushup. Not only have your muscles atrophied, but the neural connections and motor units have also atrophied as well, and need to be gradually renewed. The same applies to the pull-up, squat, and hanging leg raise—start with the easiest steps in the chain of progressions, and then work your way back up to your former greatness.

Once you've obtained medical permission, gradually begin increasing the difficulty and length of your workouts. The exercises given in this article should be done with the same "rules" that you would do with any other exercise: resistance training and heavy stretching should be done on separate days, and calisthenics and weights should also be done on separate days.

3. Stretches

Beyond the strength-related calisthenics, there are several stretches that can be done to heal core injury. Notably, several of the ones that I have already taught you for posture and mobility will serve to heal wounds.

The twist stretch has been noted to be a stretch that helps nagging back injury, but of course you should start with the easiest variations of the stretch before you move into the harder steps of this progression.

Another stretch that targets the back for purposes of mobility, but will likely make nagging pain feel better as well, is the static back stretch: Lie on the floor and place your legs on top of a bed, chair, or ottoman. Your knees should bend at a 90-degree angle. Get your hips as close to the object as possible. Lay your arms on the ground at your side. Hold for 5-10 minutes.

4. Weights

I would not do weights until you have gotten “back into the groove” with calisthenics, and until your doctor has cleared you to do so. Once you have gotten the OK, you should perform the compound exercises that target the core:

Deadlifts, squats, and overhead presses are the best for the core; proper form is of the utmost importance, as usual.

5. Conclusion

For those who are suffering from core-related injuries, I hope this information helps. And for those who aren’t, this will still serve as a solid core workout.

Read More: The Thrust Is A Must (The Importance Of Core Strength)

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

7 Mainstream Movies With Subversive Themes That Slipped Under The Radar

April 23, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Many movies (and TV shows, of course) have been larded up with propaganda to demoralize us and indoctrinate the public in politically correct thinking. The efforts range from fairly subliminal to annoyingly preachy. Sometimes classic Soviet films (such as Battleship Potemkin and Alexander Nevsky) are more fun to watch, despite being openly Communist. The key is the "openly" part, as they weren't trying to hide it. Better yet, they weren't trying to manipulate the audience with guilt and make them feel bad.

The shifts in Hollywood's ideological leanings—from the beginning, to getting taken out to the woodshed in the 1950s, and to the present day—is a long story. As things are now, it's likely to stay on the leftist tangent indefinitely. This won't change until some filmmaker figures out that there's a lot of money in movies that make the audience feel good, rather than insult it in one way or another. Given Hollywood's cultural Marxist lineup and tight control, this will have to be from an indie effort or a foreign studio. Another possibility is that they'll shrivel up and die from low interest, but that seems unlikely now. The suckers keep buying tickets.

Movies, like any creative effort, mean different things to different people. Sometimes films do convey a partially positive ideological message without intending to do so. The following either weren't very political to begin with, or had a leftist subtext yet backfired to some degree.

1. The Matrix (1999)

The film: This one is a science fiction action movie as well as a kick flick. It covered new territory, a rarity these days now that Hollywood is running out of original ideas. It's also the pioneer of spinning the camera around while someone jumps up and delivers a martial arts blow in slow motion. Overall, the sequels weren't bad, but didn't quite have the same sparkle as the first and left too many unanswered questions.

This modern classic introduces the idea of a world where things aren't as they seem. The concept isn't entirely new; certain religions (mainly Eastern) teach that the universe as we know it is an illusion, a small subset of a total reality we couldn't make sense of in its entirety, or a dream of the Creator. All that's interesting, but other than a measure of solace, it's not too helpful to help us get by in our day-to-day lives. In any event, it opens up questions about the nature of reality; a bit like Plato's allegories in The Republic.

The good stuff: The movie's premise is that robots keep us ignorant throughout our lives while exploiting us as an energy source. (The latter part is a bit hokey; Hollywood needs some decent science consultants.) Anyway, our world isn't like that, but there are indeed some disturbing trends about which the public is kept in the dark: finance, globalism, shadowy billionaire clubs influencing politics, democracy turned into a show resembling professional wrestling, and the like.

Notably for us, the movie gave us the red pill / blue pill terms representing the way of knowledge and the way of ignorance. It also gave us the "Matrix" metaphor for the unreal-reality image of the world as seen through the lenses of cultural Marxism, consumerism, and so forth.

This brings us to another matter: is it better to accept the ugly truth about things, or go on in blissful ignorance? I know what my choice is, but far too many people don't want to listen to things that might challenge their comfortable world view. However, someone who avoids the truth simply lies to himself. The good news is that when an idea subversive to the orthodoxy gains critical mass, getting the truth out to the public has much less resistance from the barrier of willful ignorance.

The leftist reaction: Occasionally a lefty will note that it's ironic that a movie with a largely non-White cast and created by a couple of transsexuals would be a source of inspiration for deplorables like us. To that, I say, so what? Those aren't the reasons why we watched it, or anyone else for that matter.

2. They Live (1988)

They Live (1988) was another film decades ahead of its time

The film: A drifter puts on some special glasses and discovers a shocking truth: the world is being controlled by ugly aliens. Further, they're exploiters keeping the world in a state of ignorance. It's not exactly a big-budget whiz-bang science fiction epic, but that doesn't get in the way of delivering the premise.

The good stuff: The subversive elements are basically the same as in The Matrix, but it strikes considerably closer to home. We don't actually have skull-faced aliens—or space lizards, for that matter—running the show, of course. However, there are indeed a number of insanely wealthy figures acting behind the scenes. They throw their money around to subvert democracy by buying politicians, to push globalist policies with their secretive billionaire clubs (such as David Rockefeller's Trilateral Commission, Council on Foreign Relations, and Bilderberg Group), to stir up trouble, and to wreck Western civilization.

Indeed, the movie's image of plutocratic extraterrestrials exploiting humanity and controlling us through subliminal messages seems rather like champagne Socialists and the media establishment. It does also lend itself to (((politically incorrect))) interpretations for similar reasons. John Carpenter, the director and screenwriter, denies that's what he meant. He says it was about crass commercialism and money-grubbing corporate culture, and I'm inclined to take his words at face value. Indeed, the subtext is moderately leftist, with obvious themes of class struggle and colonialism. Sometimes liberals are on the right track.

The leftist reaction: They occasionally get a little squirmy over this one.

3. The Fellowship of the Ring (2001), The Two Towers (2002), The Return of the King (2003)

The films: This was a great high fantasy series, with good acting and lots of landscape porn. A rich cultural tapestry is woven by the loose correlation between the Hobbits and the early Victorian British, Rohan and the Saxons, Gondor and the Byzantines, the elves and the Norse ljossalfar, and the dwarves and the svartalfar. The story is close enough to the books to satisfy (most of) Tolkien's fan base, but appealing to the general public too.

The series features themes of good versus evil, struggle and sacrifice, perseverance and triumph, as well as a subtle public service announcement about the dangers of meth addiction. What's there not to like? Indeed, the series is morally uplifting in a way that few movies are today. Finally, it's pretty hard to get three films in a row with consistent results, but they knocked it out of the ballpark.

The good stuff: Parallels to today's situation are hard to escape. Some evil and very powerful figures plan an invasion of the civilized realms by hordes exhibiting extremely bad manners. If the homelands are overrun, they'll be extinguished and darkness will fall forever. Few know what's really at stake, and motivating their apathetic leaders to start protecting their own people (which is any government's first duty) is a very arduous task. Other than that, Wormtongue would make quite a Washington lobbyist or a Eurocrat, now wouldn't he?

The leftist reaction: There's been a bit of frosty grumbling. Still, they can't really say too much about it. A few notes by Tolkien were a bit politically incorrect by today's standards, but he pointedly stated that he wasn't writing allegory.

4. The Phantom Menace (1999)

Now that we're wrapping things up with the Milky Way, it's time we planned our leveraged buyout in the Andromeda Galaxy.

The film: Here we have the first of the Star Wars prequels, anticipated by the fanbase for a generation. There are some things to be said for it, such as the underwater scenes and the part-Byzantine, part-Romanesque architectural style on Naboo. Natalie Portman does an okay job as the teenage Queen, with her main superpower being her ever-changing wardrobe.

Even so, the screenplay was mediocre, with many WTF elements; you can't really blame the actors for the results. It's basically a turkey: too much deliberate kiddie appeal, the major characters don't really shine, the midichlorian thing was unnecessary, slavery in a high-tech society with lots of robots doesn't make sense, and of course JarJar. (In the sequel, if that retarded amphibian had been the one blown to bits by the bomb, the audience would've stood up and cheered.) Even despite all that, it's a cinematic epic compared to the Star Wars Holiday Special.

The good stuff: The galactic council scene was quite a circus, a reminder of Washington political farce with all the bloviating, hot air, babbling lobbyists, and refusal to act sensibly. (As for the EU, Nigel Farage and a few others like him do an effective job of speaking the truth, but still the Eurocrats can't be bothered to attend to their government's first duty.) As for Palpatine—the Phantom Menace himself—it turns out that he's both running the revolution as well as positioning himself for leadership in the government. Playing both halves against the middle—sounds familiar?

The leftist reaction: JarJar was criticized for seeming too Jamaican, and Watto was criticized for seeming too Jewish. Myself, I think they were just too dorky.

5. Crash (2004)

The film: This one is a tear-jerking drama set in Los Angeles. Ethnic conflicts are at the forefront, though some of the characters mellow out a little toward the end. One damn thing after another happens because everyone's so raaaacist. Overall, the movie reeks of moralism more than a televangelist's used underwear.

The good stuff: Even despite all the preachiness, this illustrates one of the main problems with multiculturalism: many cultures means many conflicts. The more the film went on, the more dysfunctional everything seemed. What else is going to happen when you pack people from all around the world, who have differing values and little in common, into the same space? Leftists believe the answer is doubling down on their suicidal population replacement policies while singing "Kumbayah".

The audience, of course, is supposed to think "this conflict wouldn't be happening if everyone wasn't so raaaacist." Well, it also wouldn't be happening if Los Angeles (like many big cities today) wasn't a multicultural pressure cooker. It wasn't always that way, and it didn't happen all by itself.

The leftist reaction: It won three Oscars. In fact, it was chosen for Best Picture over Brokeback Mountain, but not without some cattiness about the decision.

6. Blazing Saddles (1974)

The film: This one is a little different, from before Hollywood got so pozzed out. It's a comedy Western with something in it to offend everyone, which is pretty much the point, and the results are hilarious. Liberals actually used to have a sense of humor—whatever happened to that? It would be damn near impossible to get a movie like this greenlit these days. Although Hollywood is running out of ideas and rebooting old movies (all too often not an improvement), don't expect a remake of this one any time soon.

The good stuff: The point here isn't all the up-to-eleven political incorrectness. Rather, it's the realization of how much things have changed. Conservative viewers weren't standing up and shouting "Amen" about the stereotypes; liberal viewers weren't spazzing out with rage. Everyone just took it for what it was. When you watch it now, you realize that there was once a time when people could just laugh it all off.

The leftist reaction: Back then, it got three Oscars nominations. These days, it would send hordes of triggered SJWs running for the nearest safe space.

7. The Last Samurai (2003)

The film: This one is set following the Meiji Restoration when Japan transformed from feudalism to the Industrial Age in a single generation. Undoubtedly it was a bumpy ride, and the movie has parallels to real events. An American military advisor is captured after an ill-fated battle and comes to see that he'd been fighting on the wrong side. The combat scenes pull no punches. When the Gatling guns come out against the cavalry for the final battle, it's the end of chivalry. This was a foretaste of the insane carnage of the First World War, the beginning of our society's century-long roller coaster ride to hell.

The good stuff: Aside from a few minor sour notes, it's a deeply conservative film. On one side are some rather decadent opportunists who want to transform Japanese society haphazardly, all in the name of "progress" and of course lots of money. On the other side are very traditionalist warriors bound by a strict code of honor who call bullshit on that. And so the tragedy unfolds. There's something to be said for dying righteously, though I prefer victory.

If you liked this one, Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters is worth a look too.

The leftist reaction: Mostly it was babble about the "White savior" trope and whether or not a non-Asian film studio had any right to depict Japanese society. The good stuff went straight over their heads.

Honorable mention

Office Space (1999): It's a fine satire about corporate bullshit. Some people have quit their cube farm jobs after seeing this one.

Invasion of the Body Snatchers (1956 and they keep doing remakes): It's not political, despite claims from both sides. Still, if you've ever had friends whose brains got hijacked by the cultural Marxism mind-virus, you totally can relate to the pod people scenario.

The Wizard of Oz (1939): "Pay no attention to the man behind the curtain!"

Read More: 10 Hollywood Films For Men That Leave Today's SJW Movies In The Dust

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

8 Cultural Practices That Men Must Restore

April 24, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

With our society turning men into domesticated economic units, and with new technological gadgets turning us more and more into mere subjects who respond to machines rather than control them, we as men and people are becoming dull and cultureless. Against this materialist force, I think it's imperative that we rediscover and restore some of our past cultural practices so that we can preserve our sophistication as human beings and as independent men.

1. Handwriting

With computers, smartphones, and other electronic communication devices becoming universal tools in our age, hand-written words have become the casualty to pave the way for utility and efficiency. Stringing words together is becoming less of an art and more of a task—a mere means to an end. You can tell just how sloppy writing has become today as the dependence on auto-correct allows the typer to never think about his use of words and letters. The use of language and the written words themselves are becoming uglier with each passing day as less and less people use a pen for anything more than filling out forms and signing documents.

To counter this trend, I propose writing as much as possible by hand whenever the opportunity allows for it. I've recently re-discovered the joy of writing longhand through my language studies, prompting me to buy my first fountain pen (yes, it really is worth it). You start to feel like you're in a different world when you use a plain old pen and paper with nothing else to distract you. And unlike using a word processor on your computer, writing by hand makes you focus and be conscious of every word you write. With each and every letter requiring your patience and dedication, the process of writing itself becomes an art much like painting or sculpting.

2. Recitation

Long before movies, television, radio, and even books, epic tales were recited and passed down the generations through the word of mouth. And these weren't just stories for entertainment, but were profound practices that instilled the cultural spirit of people along with their shared identity. Think of the epic poems of the past including the Iliad, Beowulf, Shahnameh, and more. If you ever listen to the Quran being recited, you can start to understand how profoundly its words affect the believers of Islam. Words become the soul of people.

You can start practicing now by choosing a work that speaks to your heart to memorize and make it yours. Recitation takes patience—especially with epic works—but it will challenge and develop your ability to concentrate, visualize, and use your passion to guide your words. In our world where everything is being dumbed down to be attention-grabbing, being able to memorize and recall long passages will make you stand out from the rest. You will have a superior ability to remember things in all other areas and it will transform you as a man of culture in a world where all forms of art are being swallowed up by consumerism.

3. Rhetoric

Rhetoric is also another lost art form that's forgotten by our generation that prefers to send rapid text messages and memes while slouched over an electronic screen. The great men of ancient Rome valued this skill very much and so should we. Oratory is one of the more sophisticated arts that involve much more than just the spoken words themselves. Rhetoric is based on knowledge and logic, and it involves your body language as well as the passion of your voice. It's a form of art where the way you speak the words matter just as much (if not more) than their actual meaning. And as a force of persuasion, it is the sword of man's political power.

Any man serious about politics or wishing to improve his charisma for better social standing should prioritize this art above all else.

4. Handcrafting and other skills

It’s no secret that men love working with their hands. Like our propensity for hunting, it is an ingrained trait of all men necessary for our roles as creators. It’s quite something just watching a modern day blacksmith like Ric Furrer take his time to forge a sword as masterfully as the blacksmiths did centuries ago. The total focus and dedication to the work is something all men can admire. Unfortunately, with everything now made in third world factories, prisons, or 3D printers, handcrafting is becoming another lost art in our modern society.

It is my opinion that all men should possess a skill or a profession that involves the skillful use of hands, be it repairing machines, carving woods, constructing, playing the piano, being able to handle weapons, and so on. If you don’t have anything yet, find something and start practicing now, and keep at it. You will be rewarded handsomely in your journey.

5. Survival

Some may wonder why we should even bother with survival skills, but I believe it is an essential skill to have in our uncertain times. I think it's quite appalling that we've been so conditioned by our society that most of us don't even know the basic thing about purifying and storing water or making fire, let alone how to hunt animals. We've been domesticated like cattle in the farm we call cities to rely on wage slavery, grocery stores, and magical water taps to ensure our own survival.

Learning how to survive outside the comforts of modern society will also strengthen you as it tests your resolve and wits. It is not a surprise that this skill is one of the primary area of focus in training elite soldiers around the world. In the end, you can define your independence by how much money you have saved up or you can define it by your ability to survive in whatever conditions you may find yourself in without relying on the state. I think I know which will be more important in the future.

6. Duels

Why they decided to get rid of duels, I don't know (actually, I do: the government doesn't want us to be independent). But I think allowing men to duke it out in an honor based system (without facing consequences imposed by a third party) can solve lot of problems in this world. It doesn't even have to be with swords and pistols, just let men sort out issues on their own using their fists as long as both parties agree to it. They already allow it in NHL, why not everywhere else?

7. Retreats

From the pious to the intellectual, retreats allowed greater men to seek wisdom and spiritual enlightenment away from the petty distractions of the material world. But today, in a world as busy as ours that is more connected than ever before in history, it is becoming progressively more difficult to find peace necessary to discover ourselves.

Instead, we are perpetually distracted, constantly seeking the most superficial information to stimulate our shallow minds. Where is the deep level of thinking that our ancestors used to practice?

Although I don't think seeking retreat should necessarily be a permanent way of life, I believe most men will benefit from a regular or a prolonged refuge into their own souls. Even if you don't need anything but your own mind and the volition to seek enlightenment from within, I strongly suggest men take some time away from our so-called civilization at least once in their lifetime.

8. Male initiation rituals

Male initiation rituals existed almost universally in the past because of its symbolic significance in transforming boys into men. It was important for tribal societies to know that they could place their trust on these prospective men to protect and provide for their societies, which is why many of these rituals involve testing strength, skills, courage, and endurance to pain. This process created clear distinction between those who are men and those who are not, strengthening the foundation of the tribe.

I don't think it's a coincidence that many "men" today are weak and effeminate as there is no official standard from which to declare someone a "man" other than his age. This is also why many teenagers and those in their early 20's are either hopelessly lost and helpless as they've been abandoned by the society, with others going the opposite route to engage in high-risk behaviours that are seemingly foolish as they try to prove their manhood before the modern world that does not care. No, our modern society is only interested in whether men today are capable of following the rules, obediently doing what they're told, and whether they can fulfill their roles as drones. Without guidance, without a masculine purpose, and without a world that allows them to simply be themselves, men will continue to be lost and exploited.

To learn more about the nature of masculinity and how our modern world contradicts it, read 'Man's Fight for Existence.' Also follow me on my new blog, primalexistence.com.

Read More: How To Restore Civilization By Following St. Benedict's Example

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

How Did Venezuela Become Such A Total Disaster?

April 24, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

You've probably read or heard a great deal about the incipient chaos in Venezuela. There are serious food shortages, rampant crime, seething unrest, and the threat of a violent government crackdown. And yet Venezuela has untold riches in oil. Most people are unaware that it was one of the major driving forces behind the founding of OPEC many decades ago. It used to be a stable, prosperous, and reasonably efficient state structure. How could a country with so many natural resources be unable to feed its people? What happened? How did it all unravel? And what lessons can we draw from the drama?

To blame it all on abstractions like "socialism" is too simple. We need a comprehensive, nuanced explanation of how the country was plunged into its present state. These are the major reasons:

Falling Oil Prices

Venezuela derived most of its income from oil exports. When things were good in the early 2000s, and oil was well over $100 per barrel, the money was rolling in. When a lot of money is sloshing around in a system, it tends to cover up problems. No one listens to critics in good times. Oil was at rock bottom during the 1990s, and then prices began to take off in the early 2000s. It's hard to remember now, but oil actually reached $152 per barrel in 2008. Those days are now long gone.

Like the economies of some Middle Eastern countries, Venezuela was never able—or willing—to convert its oil revenues to economic diversification. A prudent leader would have seen lean times coming amidst the boom, and would have laid the foundations for economic adaptation. Natural resources never last forever. Unfortunately, none of that was done. The oil profits were squandered on Hugo Chavez's pet projects: donating money to Cuba, giving it to his cronies and friends, or doling it out to the disenfranchised.

Corruption

It's the same old story here. Corruption is a way of life in many countries around the world: often it is just a matter of degree. But when money is rolling in, it tends to exacerbate preexisting structural weaknesses. By any measure, Hugo Chavez headed a regime that was deeply corrupt. An ex-sergeant in the Army, he staffed the key offices of the government with cronies, flunkies, yes-men, and assorted stooges who would do his bidding. Ability mattered not at all. The list of state institutions implicated in corruption is long: Corpolec (the state electricity company), CANTV (national telephone company), SENIAT (the tax authority), CADIVI (the currency control agency), and SIDOR (the steel manufacturer) are the most prominent.

Chavez was never interested in "solving" the corruption problem because he himself was the problem. This was a man who attempted to seize power unlawfully in a coup and was then sent to prison. Such men are uninterested in the rule of law and order: what matters to them is their own power and aggrandizement. The rot of corruption was so extensive that third-rate men were filling positions who had absolutely no qualifications for their posts. The results were predictable.

Economic Mismanagement

Working hand-in-hand with corruption was economic mismanagement. There were actually three different co-existing exchange rates in Venezuela. There was the official rate (called DiPro) used for basic imports; there was the "managed float" rate called DiCom; and then there was the underground black market rate. Experienced finance people will generally tell you that in any managed economy, the black market rate is the most honest and accurate. And when the gap between the "official rate" and the black market rate is huge, it tells people that the government is lying about the exchange rates and can't be trusted.

How does this destroy and economy? When the black market rates are high, it encourages government officials to engage in hoarding basic foodstuffs and to trade on the black market. This sharpens food shortages and undermines faith in the economy. Businesses feel no incentive to work, since they will realize little profit. Inflation begins to creep up, and then takes off like a rocket.

Chavez foolishly left currency controls in place since the early 2000s; this caused huge gaps between the “official” exchange rates and what the average person knew was going on in the black market. If he had permitted rates to float, things might have been somewhat better, but this course of action was never considered. So why won’t the Venezuelan authorities under Maduro allow the currency to float?

The answer is simple: because too many people have too much to lose from doing so. Maduro is Chavez’s hand-picked successor. All of Chavez’s people are still embedded like parasites in the positions that matter. They have all become hugely wealthy from siphoning off the country’s oil wealth, and they are not about to change the rules of the game now. It is a depressing picture of greed and venality triumphing over public duty and moral rectitude.

Foreign Tensions

Nicolas Maduro likes to blame the country’s problems on “foreign economic warfare.” By this he means the United States’s “hostile” policy towards his country. The reality is something very different. This is one case where the United States is blameless for the current crisis. It is true that President Obama in March 2015 declared that the situation in Venezuela posed an “extraordinary threat” to the security of the United States. This was hyperbole, of course, but can anyone blame the US? Chavez made a career out of pissing in Uncle Sam’s face and hugging and kissing Fidel Castro. What could he expect from the US in return? Flowers and garlands?

So when the US blackballed him from the economic system, and did all those other little things that great powers do when they want to put the screws to small countries, Chavez had only himself to blame. This is how the game is played, and bad leadership has consequences. So when Caracas whines about “economic warfare,” they are not telling the whole story. The US is certainly not doing Venezuela any favors; but then again, why should it? When you stick your finger in the eye of the cyclops, you should not expect a warm response.

A final factor in the current crisis is the opposition’s protracted battles to oust Maduro. Although it is understandable that they would want to be rid of the Chavez-era parasites, the long battle between the government and the opposition has given the government the excuse it needs to maintain a system of martial law. What will the future hold? The opinion of this writer is that things do not look good. Unless the government takes concrete steps for political and economic reform, escalating social unrest will the country’s inevitable future.

Read More: How To Maim An Attacker When Your Life Is On The Line

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Meet And Date Mormon Girls

April 24, 2017 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

Men search the world for women that they can stand to be around with long-term. Narcissism, androgyny, obsession with pop culture—the problems with Western women go on and on.

Is there some place, a secluded land untouched by time, where women still make good wives?

Mormons are one of the few remaining groups with healthy women. Because Mormons retain old-fashioned values, Mormon girls are raised in a traditional environment by good fathers. They value femininity, motherhood, and masculinity in men. This makes them overwhelmingly successful wives and mothers.

How To Approach Mormon Girls

Where do you find Mormon girls? Not Starbucks but at traditional venues, like bowling and movies. Lok for certain things: sleeved shirts, a subdued character, long pants or dresses, and different mannerisms. Spend some time with a few and you will know what to look for.

Cold approaches on Mormon girls are challenging. She will be happy to chat with you, but unless you are Mormon yourself or make a huge impression, you won't get her number. Overt sexuality and teasing are too much, due to Mormon girls' high insecurity. But daytime game is the key. The standard principles of day game apply.

These girls are nervous around non-Mormons. Seclusion has served to preserve their desirable traits, but it also makes it difficult to gain rapport. A grandpa sense of humor and occasional clever line from an old movie go a long way. In many ways, these girls are stuck in the 1950's.

Something that will help you stand out is a strong masculine frame. Be open and talk about your ideals. She will be surprised that a non-Mormon holds the same values she does and respect you.

Mormons have separate congregations for young single adults, which is very convenient. This is why you don't see many 18-30 year olds in typical LDS congregations. But it is luck of the draw. A "single's ward" may be full of great girls or totally empty. Single's wards also become filled with weak guys, so a unique masculine impression and well-dressed presentation really stand out.

Social Awkwardness

Many Mormons stick to a small group of friends within the church. At parties, they drink soda and play board games. Their values and the values of popular western culture are wildly disparate, which can be tough for them to navigate early in life. This lack of inclusion within the general society makes them socially awkward, especially around men.

I didn't date Mormon girls for a long time because of their social awkwardness, even though I am Mormon myself. Then I discovered that Mormons were a welcome exception to the degeneracy that pervades American women. As I grew and became confident, I learned how to deal with social awkwardness.

It is tempting for Mormon girls to become lazy because they have such a high standard compared to typical girls. They know that they are the best. Imagine if all the men in the world weighed over 300 pounds and acted like slobs. How would that motivate you to work out every day to get a girl?

Some Mormon girls succumb to worldly laziness. I knew a Mormon girl who got rides from her Mormon friends for casual sex dates with men she met on Tinder.

Other lazy Mormon girls turn feminist, many thousands of them. The Mormon university BYU is quickly falling due to these feminists. BYU was once the perfect place to find a great young woman and get married. But those days may be gone. The pressure is mounting for Mormon women to cave in to Western degeneracy, and men are at a loss for what to do about it.

With such high standards of perfection, Mormon girls want a man who validates their efforts and confidently provides direction—a man who expects them to be beautiful. They want a man who has navigated the stormy seas of the world, who has just a little bit of history, and has overcome the degenerate worldly culture, a man who has discovered for himself where peace and happiness lie.

Be A Patriarchal Leader

Since a very young age, these girls have gazed at handsome paintings of Jesus and prophets, and learned to respect men who have spiritual confidence in their eyes. They were taught that bold sincerity of purpose and a charitable attitude is what makes a man.

I knew a guy who joined the Mormon church because he thought it would help him date a certain Mormon girl, a girl who refused to date non-Mormons. This guy was orbiting so strongly that he changed his religion before they were even dating! Then the girl decided still not to date him after all. I wasn't surprised.

Even if you don't become Mormon, you can become desirable to the girls with spiritual leadership and confidence. Patriarchal leadership is something that most women in the world valued until recently, but it is still a chief value with Mormons. She wants the captain of a ship who can direct all aspects of a relationship, including spiritual direction.

What made the patriarchs of the Old Testament—Abraham, Isaac, Jacob—masculine?

Propagandists in the media throw around the word patriarchy as if it is synonymous with anything male. But what does it really mean to be a patriarch, to lead your tribe? In Mormon theology, leadership as a man takes you directly to godhood. She views patriarchy as a quality of God.

Princess Syndrome

Mormon girls are taught that they have a divine nature. There is a heavenly Mother as well as a Father, though we don't know anything about her—Heavenly Father is the one we worship. In the Garden of Eden, Eve may have introduced sin into the world, but ultimately her actions worked out for good because it allowed all of us to be born and tested in this telestial state. Such beliefs make the girls confident about being women.

Typical American girls have the government to make them feel secure. They have heavy-handed laws, free handouts, unfair advantages for getting jobs—a loud feminist illusion spoon fed to them.

Due to their seclusion from popular culture, Mormon girls don't have all this. They therefore have a high standard to work toward. They are stuck with a woman's natural state of insecurity.

This insecurity is at the root of the princess syndrome. With so much pervasive degeneracy in the media, Mormon parents think they are safe showing their kids Disney movies. Unfortunately, this has led to a culture of Mormon girls who are absolutely obsessed with Disney and even as adults dream of being Disney princesses.

Disney gives them the fantasy where they can easily achieve a standard of perfection with low risk. Girls then struggle to reconcile degenerate popular culture with Mormon expectations. It will be up to you, her man, to support the positive expectations.

Many Mormon girls place the cart before the horse. They talk about having an idealistic family but don't consider how to make it happen. As the patriarchal leader, it will be up to you to figure it out and to dispel her unrealistic fantasies. You will have to bring her down to reality.

Nurture Her Virtues

Usually, when Mormon girls marry non-Mormon men, these women forsake their religion and revert to ordinary American woman. It is like Cinderella's carriage which transforms back to a normal pumpkin at the stroke of midnight. After twenty years, her behavior will be on the same level as any above-average American woman.

This is because they gave up the structure of what made them desirable in the first place. Those things don't last if they aren't nurtured.

I know a non-Mormon guy who married a Mormon woman and has kept her beautiful and desirable, by encouraging her religious involvement, even though he avoided Mormonism himself. He led the family as patriarch and actively supported his children's spiritual growth.

This can be done. Mormon women greatly value sincerity of purpose. Beyond religious structure, it is important to recognize the peculiarities that make the Mormon women special or not special, and to encourage their growth.

One red flag I have for Mormon girls is if they drink coffee. It seems like a minor point, but I have noticed that every Mormon girl who disobeys the Mormon direction to avoid coffee has something majorly wrong with her. It would be foolish to acquiesce a Mormon girl to drink coffee. That would only encourage her to give up other standards that really are serious and to become like the typical Western degenerate.

As for her beliefs, the history of polygamy makes it easy for Leftists and feminists to weave sick sex fantasies into their narrative about Mormons. Mormon theology is peculiar, yes, but the media frequently takes things out of context and misrepresents the religion. Maybe there is wisdom behind some of the peculiarities.

Neomasculinity Works

Not long ago, I came across Roosh's program for self-improvement and decided to apply it to myself. I also studied his advice for approaching and dating women.

I was skeptical whether this would work with Mormon girls– sheltered girls who would never step inside a dance club or be wooed by pickup artists. But what I discovered surprised me. I found that it worked just as well.

Game isn't really taught in the Mormon community, and I think this has led to weaker and more unsuccessful men. This opens opportunities for all strong and successful masculine men to gain access to these women. Mormon girls are thirsting for strong, confident, masculine men.

I was not surprised to see Return Of Kings explore personal virtue with the neomasculinity movement. Patriarchal attributes are best for gaming women, so it is natural that this effort lead to other traditional principles of men's success.

These same principles have helped build strong, successful religious communities for thousands of years. Masculine attributes attract healthy, beautiful women, no matter where they come from. It is fundamental that we focus foremost on developing ourselves as suitably strong men.

Read More: ROK Undercover: What It Was Like To Spend A Day At A Mormon Church

Amasa M. Lyman

Amasa enjoys art, music, and traveling. Some day he hopes to make it to Romania and settle down.

Warning Signs That A Girl Isn’t Worth Your Time

April 24, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This podcast contains more than a dozen warning signs when a girl is damaged goods or is not worth pursuing. The warning signs are categorized according to appearance, day game approaches, night game approaches, setting dates, going on dates, and relationships. They have held true for me across multiple continents to help save both time and energy while focusing on girls who are more likely to please me in short-term and long-term relationships.

If you’re enjoying my podcasts and getting value from it, consider making a donation. Click here to learn more about donating.

Listen on Soundcloud or download the MP3:

Listen on Youtube:

Subscribe on iTunes or add the RSS feed to your favorite podcast app. If you like the podcast, please leave a rating and review on iTunes.

Previous Podcast: The Death Of Western Culture

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

In A Broken America, Only The Dishonorable Are Rewarded

April 25, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

John Edwards, the disgraced, slack-jawed lawyer turned Senator was fond of telling his populist "Two Americas" story before his life imploded with – you guessed it – another classically Anglo-American sex scandal. Squeamish about all things sex as this overly repressed culture is, and as worshipful as it is of women, how many men have we seen brought down in the last generation by sex scandals? That's a story in and of itself, but we'll discuss that another time.

Edwards' story did have some merit to it:

> During the campaign, I spoke often of the two Americas: the America of the privileged and the wealthy, and the America of those who lived from paycheck to paycheck. I spoke of the difference in the schools, the difference in the loan rates, the difference in opportunity.

It needs to be revised, however.

Let's tell a tale of two Americas. A story that is never told in the lamestream media and by lying politicians. The story of what happens to a man who makes a solid effort to pull himself up by the bootstraps and earn himself a slot in the middle class, and the story of a guy who mooches or government dibsmedat programs, fucks hoes and enjoys recreational drugs. (Not that there's anything wrong with that if you can pay for it yourself!)

Beta Provider Guy

New blood joins this earth, and quickly he's subdued. Through constant pained disgrace, the young boy learns their rules…

Meet Contestant #1. He was instilled with a solid work ethic from youth. He's worked since he was old enough to be of use to anyone, and started "official" employment at age 16. All while earning top grades in school and prepping himself for college. Totally ignored by women in his teens, he is assured that if he "does the right thing" there will be a reward waiting for him at the end of his long road.

He endures liberalism in the public education system and suppresses all his natural male instincts to fit into the female-favoring education environment. He spends the best years of his life studying rather than partying, staying out of trouble rather than enjoying the rowdy lives boys want to live, and graduates college 4 years later with a rubber stamp and an average of $30,000 in debt. Not to worry, with his newfound credentials, he'll be able to pay off his debt and earn his place in the middle class.

Well, not so fast. The industrious, give 100% go-getter WILL BE punished with today's Socialist schemes.

The more he earns, the less he gets to keep thanks to a progressive income tax scheme. Even with his median $43,000 a year salary, he finds himself nothing more than an indebted rat in a wheel, spinning as fast as he can only to watch money come in and money go out each pay period. Knock, knock. Who's there? Your student loan guarantor. It's time to start making $300 a month student loan payments. He soon discovers he is trapped by rather than freed by his education and J-O-B.

He still can't get laid without making Herculean efforts since women find him BORING because he works 70 hours a week and has no free time on the side to do anything except sleep. Bitches don't realize Betas are boring because they have to be to keep the world they enjoy functioning.

It doesn't take too many years before he has a Walter White moment, realizing the system he faithfully supported has fucked him, and at the same time turned him into a villain because of his "success" in the economy. His job is soon off-shored to India and he finds himself filing bankruptcy.

Total Loser Guy

Who’s smarter? The hard worker who works in vain or the layabout who milks the system?

Meet Contestant #2. Total loser guy does whatever the fuck he wants from boyhood through adolescence into adulthood. Of course, women find this irresistible. Total loser guy spends his teens in and out of trouble with the law. He can’t keep women off him because every girl loves a bad boy. He knocks one up. Then another. Then another.

He can’t pay his child support, though. That’s okay, the tax money from the try-hard dupe will cover his kids’ expenses. And his exes don’t pursue him for back child support in the court system because he doesn’t have any money for them to take. He’s in and out of different jobs until he “gets injured” on the job, sues, and then fakes a disability and goes on Social Security Disability.

Even though he does nothing but lay around and smoke weed, he doesn’t go without women because they come offer and offer themselves to him to get into some of his stash. He scams tax-free money on the side selling dope, paying no taxes on what he earns.

This guy gets taken care of for life, because he’s “disabled.” It’s not his fault the system failed him.

More than Hyperbole

This is why we can’t have nice things

This is exactly how our government works in America. People who are industrious, give 110% go-getters are punished for their industriousness while those who contribute nothing to society are rewarded with free money. Well, as we all know, nothing is truly free as the government steals tax dollars from the contributors to society and "redistributes" it to those who are "less fortunate."

This story might sound like a farce but it's about half autobiographical. I've personally lived and seen much of what is written here.

It goes without saying women also avail themselves of the industriousness of Contestant #1 as most government spending benefits women. This system is unsupportable, and an abomination on free men. Politicians do not care that the oblivious Beta Provider Guy is being screwed over by their system, because his tax money is how they maintain their power. As long as they can buy Total Loser Guy's vote, and Beta Provider Guy stays quiet, politicians and other miscreants can continue to ride the gravy train.

That is, until a man gets fed up and decides to work only to support himself and his interests, to starve the beast of the lifeblood it needs – his industriousness and tax dollars. Here's a revelation: It's doesn't take much for a man to live on. Through the evangel of minimalism, men can turn this system on its ear. Find yourself enslaved by the economic system? Take a page from the corporate playbook and downsize what they're selling out of your life. You don't need ANY of what they're selling beyond food to eat, clothes on your back, and a modest roof over your head.

All it takes is a critical mass of John Galts and Walter Whites to emerge and it's Game Over for abusing the productive men in society.

Read More: The Truth About Black Slavery In The Americas

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Teenage Girl Receives Slap On The Wrist After Her “Prank” Led To Boy’s Suicide

April 25, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

An eleven year old boy named Tysen Benz of Marquette, Michigan, hanged himself on March 14, after seeing an online prank from his thirteen year old girlfriend. He died after three weeks of life support at the University of Michigan Hospital in Ann Arbor. Many attended his funeral and classmates were left heartbroken.

Katrina Goss, Benz’s mother, said that the girl faked her death on social media with the help of some friends. She claimed that the girl manipulated her son with this sick twisted prank.

The girl remains anonymous from the public due to being a minor and is being charged by police for telecommunications fraud and malicious use of a computer.

The Boy

Tysen Benz was described as an athlete, comedian, friend, brother and well loved child. He played soccer, hockey and golf. Everyone in the neighborhood liked him as he had an air of likability.

He was the the middle child of three brothers and life seemed to be going well for him until he met her.

How Did This Happen?

Somehow Benz got himself a phone, even though his mother said “I would never buy my kids phones.” That’s a little strange, but regardless Tysen came into contact with this 13 year old girl as they attended the same school.

Benz mother did not approve of him seeing an older girl. She requested the girl to stop contacting him several times, and even contacted her parents. “She was mean to him, controlled him, and took advantage of him, even after I repeatedly told her to leave him alone,” Goss said. “I even messaged the parent and aunt to no avail,”

Due to this, the parents/guardians of the girl should be accountable for this incident, because their failure to respond to Gross’s request is irresponsible.
The girl allegedly had a prank text message sent to Tysen leading him to believe that she committed suicide with the help of her friends. That same day, Benz’s mother found him hanging by his neck in his room after receiving the prank.

Female Cruelty Has No Limit

Avery Mitchell, a friend of the manipulative girl, said she did it to find out if Tysen “really loved her and he took it the wrong way.” “She didn’t mean to hurt him, because they loved each other.” Tysen posted he was going to kill himself after seeing the hoax, but nobody told an adult. All of the girl’s friends who were in on it never bothered to inform the boy’s mother or anyone’s parents.

Male Inequality

Imagine now if it were the other way around—a 13-year-old boy fakes his death online causing his 11-year-old girlfriend to commit suicide. There would be an earthquake of uproars from everyone, especially women. Media would name the boy, list family members along with their age, income, address, and shoe size. In other words, they wouldn't be as lenient as they are with this unnamed girl.

This goes to show you how cruel girls can be even at such a young age. Girls are always playing mind games and testing you. Is it any wonder why ancient wisdom cautions young men to be careful with the company of women?

The Dangers Of Social Media

This is yet another case where social media is off the hook. Every time a crime or similar incident occurs, social media never gets any heat always being immune from liability. When people are putting such things online, they should be more proactive with prevention and should notify or at least assist police with investigations.

The social platform the girl used is not mentioned, again another example of cover up. Full disclosure of the boy and family is given, yet nothing on the girl or whether she used Facebook or another platform. Gross did report however, that Benz used Snapchat a lot.

Why do minors need to be on social media anyway? When I was growing up, we played outside. We got together by knocking on each others doors, the old fashion way. The only technology we used later were phones. Then the internet came, and everything went downhill from there.

There's no reason for kids to be on social media or even the internet for that matter.

What are they getting that they can't in the real world?

Benz's mother feels it's foolish to buy phones for kids and parents must be more firm with regulating their children's online activity stating it is not an invasion of privacy. Mark Zuckerberg, owner of Facebook, announced plans of using AI for suicide prevention, but it smells fishy. It looks it's an excuse to extract more info form their users the easy way for funneling it to the big brother government.

What Are Police Going To Do?

Apparently, not much. The prosecutor, Matt Wiese, told news media that they were unable to provide further information, but the Marquette police department are charging the girl with malicious use of telecommunication services and using a computer to commit a crime.

However, these are misdemeanor charges, so the maximum she could get is around a year of juvenile detention. Goss feels there should be stronger charges as she claims it was a purposeful calculated act. However, the prosecutor said such charges wouldn't "fit the facts."

The Big Takeaway

Let’s be clear—this is a very sad incident that could have been prevented if the girl’s friends and parents took responsibility.

There are some lessons to be learned from this, the biggest being to protect your kids from social media and executing more proactive care of whom they associate with. It is unacceptable for kid, male or female to run around like a dog without a leash bullying others and using technology to manipulate younger kids.

Let the media society preach diversity and equality all they want, the fact is their kids do not interact with everyone. They don’t live what they preach.

Benz’s mother is now focused on spreading the message of social media dangers. She hopes her son’s example will cause parents to take more responsibility in their children’s digital activity.

Read More: Is Rosie Batty Using Her Child’s Death For Her Own Fame And Fortune?

G.S. Luthra

Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

Why Communism Doesn’t Work

April 25, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

An economy is a method of distribution of scarce resources. I should make it clear that an economic system is basically a Platonic ideal form existing in the realm of pure theory; real-world results will differ. Theories grounded in reality get fairly good results; others will be disastrous. Further, corruption happens in any sort of system and drags it down. If tolerated and extensive, corruption eventually reaches the government and alters the system.

Although no system is perfect, we should strive to improve what we have and reduce corruption. That being said, we’ll explore why Communism failed to fulfill its glowing promises.

Marx’s fairy tales

“Hey, man, got any spare change?”

With socialism, the means of production—factories, farms, and other workplaces—are partially or fully publicly owned. At the most extreme, everyone works for the government. In some varieties, private land doesn’t exist. In some cases, no private property exists; everyone owns everything. Communism is a hardline variety with the goal of worldwide revolution.

As the theory goes, the workers of the world (“have-nots”) would unite and overthrow the aristocrats (“haves”) and bourgeoisie (“have a little, want more” as Saul Alinsky put it). Bourgeois means middle class; for some reason, Marx hated them more, even though they weren’t exploiters running sweat shops. After “spreading the wealth around” (as The Lightworker put it), the formula “from each according to his ability, to each according to his needs” would settle who works what jobs and who benefits from other people’s labor.

After the dust settles, socialism will—so the theory goes—transform into “true Communism”. Then, everyone would share everything, and whatever you need would be available as easy as breathing. Eventually, the apparatus of the state would wither away, leaving basically a global utopia without a government.

A few problems appear already. Having your material needs fulfilled effortlessly seems like something from a South Pacific cargo cult. Their notorious dictatorial police states certainly didn’t fade away. Further, despite similar end goals, Communists and anarchists didn’t get along so well.

The rejoinder by the True Believers is that “Communism has never been implemented properly”. That’s like saying a pyramid scheme is a great idea but it’s never been done right. It seems rather odd that dozens of Communist regimes across the globe, many lasting decades, never made it work. All of them sucked; it was simply a matter of how much they sucked.

How Communism really works (not)

Polish citizens standing in line for toilet paper rations

The economic planners tasked with implementing Marx's goofy theories faced some problems. They had to devise explanations fitting the theory, such as "We must build more industry before our society will be at the correct stage to start transitioning to true Communism." Trying to make it all work was trickier yet.

In a capitalist economy, scarcity is moderated by price. The rarer a product is (and the more in demand), the costlier it becomes; those who can't afford it must find a cheaper substitute or do without. In a socialist economy, scarcity is moderated by rationing. That might sound attractive in theory to some. Those who've lived the experience know better. Waiting in a toilet paper ration line for a couple hours (and hopefully supplies don't run out by the time it's your turn) is pretty instructive. If you want more than what your ration allows, tough luck. I might add that people spending hours in line to get basic supplies isn't a productive use of their time. Despite Marx's wishful thinking, there's no avoiding scarcity.

Industries had quotas to fulfill, or else. Shoddy Soviet manufacturing standards were legendary, from workers rushing to meet monthly goals. Still, production often didn't meet quota, so they had to doctor the statistics. When failure was admitted, sabotage and careless low-level management was blamed, but never the system itself. Other than that, if products were inferior, there weren't many alternatives.

In societies with market economies, we pursue our jobs diligently so that we might one day be rich. In socialist countries, they're told to pursue their jobs diligently for the good of the country. Guess what will be a better motivator? Pay was low, and finding goods was often difficult from frequent shortages. As the joke went, "They pretend to pay us, and we pretend to work."

All told, the command economy was a big mess. Central planning was cumbersome and worked badly, even for small countries. They emphasized full employment for the public, but labor was allocated inefficiently, often make-work situations such as several people assigned to a job easily handled by one. A market economy's "invisible hand" corrects prices and employment. Even despite some flaws, self-regulation works better than micromanagement.

Science was sluggish in many areas. Capitalism incentivizes technological development, as companies want consumers to keep buying new products. (That's actually taken a bit too far; for example, people don't really need to upgrade their cell phones every year and throw away perfectly good ones, even though the manufacturers sure want us to do that.) In Communism, central planning manages research too, coming down to a matter of priorities. The USSR pushed military development and had a top-notch space program. However, their biology program suffered badly because of Lysenko's theories pushing the politically correct "social construction" line.

Finally, Communist Party members made themselves a privileged class, with better employment and better access to rationed goods. Hedrick Smith estimated that only ten percent of Soviet Communist Party members really believed in it; the rest were in it for the perks. It doesn't bode well for an ideology when most of the ruling party knows it's bullshit.

Inefficiency

Bloated bureaucracy was one drain on the system, and inventory shrinkage was another. If Communism means that everyone owns everything, why not steal? Here, pilfering office supplies makes for a good Dilbert cartoon, but in the USSR, that sort of thing was normal despite being strictly forbidden. For example, sides of beef from Siberia destined for Moscow would get whittled down at each train station. Padlocking the boxcars didn't seem to help; the keys got around. Even Brezhnev acknowledged that petty corruption was how people got by.

Their emphasis on hyper-preparedness and exporting revolution turned out to be detrimental. They could have done better without all that. A large chunk of American national debt has been due to wasteful spending on behalf of the military-industrial complex for the arms race and fighting spit-in-your-eye wars. Still, the Soviet economy got it far worse, with a much higher ratio of defense to gross domestic production. The arms race ultimately drove the first nail into the USSR's coffin.

Grandiose projects became huge boondoggles. The "Virgin Lands" project was a massive effort to cultivate wilderness areas. Unfortunately, the weather didn't cooperate. Mao Zedong's "Great Leap Forward" effort promised to turn farming villages into steel mills, though the peasants didn't have the supplies or experience. Tens of millions starved because they relied on goofy new agricultural ideas to boost farm production, which didn't work. They could've avoided trouble with small test projects to document accurately how well things worked and what problems they might encounter. Later, Khrushchev and Chairman Mao had to admit they were wrong. That's much more honest than today's leftists who deny that their social engineering policies failed and then double down on them.

The Ryugyong Hotel's construction ate up 2% of North Korea's GDP while the people were dying of starvation. Shoddy cement work made the building unsafe, becoming an uninhabited, half-finished eyesore towering over Pyongyang. An Egyptian company later added windows and antennas; now it's the world's most expensive cell phone tower. The concept was half-baked anyway; they expected foreigners to book huge business conferences there, but who the hell would do that in North Korea? Silly Norks!

In practice, compromises sometimes were necessary, such as allowing limited private enterprise. That worked in Yugoslavia, but one guy I know left there because he was sick of paying 90% taxes. Another example is Lenin's New Economic Policy. It worked better than complete Communism (which caused dreadful food shortages) but was plagued with corruption, considerably worse than what the Communists were complaining about before the Russian Revolution. (Ayn Rand's We, the Living illustrated how dysfunctional both systems turned out.) Later, the "NEPmen" got thrown under the bus. So it was back to collective farming and grain quotas, but the weather doesn't always agree, leading to further consequences.

Repression

Dissent must be suppressed to prevent a counterrevolution. Thus, Communist countries have a rather lousy human rights record. The usual double standard applies: leftists (even moderates) are notorious for overlooking Communist repression, while magnifying atrocities of rightist regimes. A prime example was useful idiot journalist Walter Duranty's reporting on the planned starvation in Ukraine, dismissing it as a "big scare story". The estimated death toll was seven to ten million, but you don't hear much about them these days.

Heavy-handed propaganda (milieu control) keeps the citizens in line, giving them a skewed view of the rest of the world. It was very difficult to emigrate or just travel abroad. In the USSR, even travel between the regions was controlled, leaving many to believe that lousy conditions were only a local problem. North Korea tells its citizens that they're the happiest country in the world. They say Americans are starving and survive on snow and pheasants, quite unaware of our obesity problem. North Korea's only obesity problem is their tin-pot dictator, whose appetite singlehandedly causes food shortages.

Communism metes out draconian penalties for dissent, even for getting caught telling a political joke. Large networks of informers rat out others for bad attitudes, and people don't know who to trust. Quite remarkably, in East Germany, a third of the population participated in this. When Stasi archives were made public, it created some rather frosty relations; many discovered that one of their "friends" or neighbors had snitched on them, the smallest penalty being denial of job opportunities. Dissent is a good thing; it lets the leaders know when they're making mistakes.

Can Communism ever work?

The only time that communal ownership of property proved workable is in religious orders and low-tech tribes. In practice, there likely would be consequences for grabbing items from another monk's cell, or taking away another warrior's spear. Also, neither monasteries nor primitive tribes had much use for slackers. It's a proof of concept, but only in very limited circumstances; still far from fulfilling Marx's hare-brained dreams.

Note that all these were small, very tightly-knit societies. If your job was chipping flint into spearheads, you gladly did so because this contributed to your survival as well as that of your tribe; your extended family. However, if you're in a factory making toilet paper for everyone from Leningrad to Vladivostok—getting paid shit wages, and you can't buy shit with it anyway—you might not really give a shit.

In fact, Americans tried it before. There were a couple of experiments in early colonial times, but the hard-working farmers were resentful that they got the same reward as the lazy ones, and so the project was abandoned. The United Order by early Mormon pioneers fizzled out. Hippie communes tended not to last long. If those little communities with shared values couldn't get it to work, there's no way it would really produce universal prosperity in a modern country, much less globally.

The end (not)

Would you buy a used car from this bozo?

Gorbachev introduced restructuring and openness, attempting to reform the system. The legislature was no longer a rubber stamp for the Politburo, and the expansive rights guaranteed by the Soviet constitution were finally granted for real. As soon as the citizens could speak their minds and vote themselves out of Communism, they did so. When the dysfunctional narrative collapsed, it wasn't long before the Lenin statues came down; a hopeful sign for our situation today.

The story isn't over yet. Just as the USSR was collapsing, cultural Marxism was taking over elsewhere. Political correctness seemed merely petty language policing and silly hypersensitivity. Unchecked, it became much more than that, and "Communism Lite" is now a totalitarian orthodoxy.

The Western world prides itself on freedom, but we've fallen backward. The American domestic spying program, enjoying the collusion of many countries abroad, would've made Comrade Andropov weep with envy. Today, people are ostracized or harassed for expressing politically incorrect opinions. In many "free" countries, you can be jailed for that, or for discussing forbidden historical narratives. Huge corporations enthusiastically participate in the spying, along with online censorship.

It may well end up worse. The Communists were trying to develop their countries constructively, though stuck within a dysfunctional economic system's parameters. Cultural Marxism, on the other hand, was intended to wreck society, and it's doing so. The only good news is that it isn't as heavy-handed with the repression (yet).

The KGB stopped pushing ideological subversion, but a group of powerful, ultra-wealthy champagne Socialists co-opted the leftist narrative. They manipulate a hive of useful idiots to implement progressive "Communism Lite" policies. They live like sultans, intending the rest of us to be their docile peasants. They want capitalism for themselves (with the utmost results), and want socialism for the rest of us (and not the fairy tale version).

Ultimately, that's what Marx's theories led to, empowering the aristocrats he opposed. The moral of the story is, never believe the economic theories of some pseudo-intellectual drunken bum who never worked a day in his life. Communism is for the broadly overlapping categories of rabbit people, those who are ignorant of history, and rebels without a clue.

Read More: It's Time To Go Beyond The "Capitalism Vs. Socialism" Dichotomy

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How A Corporate Detox Can Benefit Your Mental Health

April 25, 2017 | by JD McGuigan | Link | Original Link

Freedom is defined as "the power or right to act, speak, or think as one wants without hindrance or restraint." In a first world, 21st century context, I define freedom simply as "the ability to navigate one's entire day at a leisurely pace."

Despite the undeniable evolution of the labor market that is fundamentally changing the standards of productivity, we continue to willingly enslave ourselves in corporate America – a sort of soft slavery without the whips, centered around unchecked consumerism. And because of the all consuming nature of capitalism, where work is the dominant occupier of our time (in a country where up to 75% of people despise their jobs), it is likely a leading cause of depression, obesity, and a dependence on anti-depressants that are used to place the mind in a sort of autopilot mode. For many, this is necessary to keep at this daily grind without breaking down.

The Myth Of Work-Life Balance

Everybody has a passion, hobby, or objective that brings purpose to one's life, unlocking the potential for great creativity and insight. However, without the time to pursue these ends, we are slaves waking up to the brutal sound of an alarm and miserably dragging ourselves about – not aware and not in the present moment, but simply festering in misery like a rat on a wheel as our life flies by.

A weathered skeptic from a bygone era (dating back to when the American Dream actually was a plausible life model) may grandstand with cliches; "you work your 40 hours a week to support yourself and in your spare time pursue your dream!" Of course, the gaping flaw in this argument is that there is a total absence of balance in terms of time management within the current system.

It is safe to assume that for most the work week is closer to 50 hours than 40, between commuting in rush hour traffic plus unpaid lunches, "voluntary" conference calls, and answering emails from home on your "company phone". What is left over is 50% of the hours in a week, but humans are most healthy sleeping 30% of the time. This leaves approximately 20% of the week left to pursue one's personal goals, after spending half the week pursuing someone else's.

Humans do not have an unlimited supply of energy. After 50 hours per week spent on menial tasks, or simply killing time in fluorescent-lit office buildings, the will to pursue creative goals is drained by the time those 5 leisure hours per day actually come. In other words, you are not likely to be anywhere near a peak performance during your 20% leftover leisure time.

Family men have it even worse, likely dealing with overlap, which is to say sub-zero time during the week – both the boss and the wife/kids want more while he has literally zero time to himself. For some strange reason, both men and your hardened corporate woman wear this "busy" label as a badge of honor, and even deploy it as a humblebrag. But is the perception of being important really worth all of this?

Corporate Detox

I would be remiss not to mention the effects of The Pink Doughnut Phenomenon, office politics, forced socialization, diversity training modules, among many other things that extend beyond the job description imposed during those 10 hours that are designed to break down your creativity such that, even absent all distractions, those 5 hours you have to yourself are unproductive, because your spirit is broken due to this endless cycle of compliance tests at work. All of this perpetuates the ever-increasing ego investment in your 9-5, which has become your entire identity.

We are all players in the petrodollar system whether we like it or not. Most of us are not going to pull a "Walden" and drop out of society, move to the woods, and live on fruit that we grow and fish that we catch ourselves. For as long as we require money to buy food, clothing, and shelter, we have to labor for money. From a personal perspective, what has worked to change my mindset is a conscious detox from the concept of the rat race. There are several ways this can be done – either through intense meditation, philosophical podcasts, solo travel, or some old fashioned reading. I have combined the practice of all four and have made a lot of progress.

It took hundreds of hours listening to the works of Joe Rogan, Alan Watts, and watching those cheesy motivational videos on YouTube to start to internalize opposition to this concept of the rat race. Meditation specifically helped to curtail the anger that I experienced during this daily grind, particularly helping to mitigate road rage during rush hour traffic. Now, even with more stints in corporate America seemingly likely for me, I am in a better position to deal with the stress going forward. I estimate that if everyone meditated for 20 minutes every morning before leaving for work, there would be a lot less noise pollution at 8 am and 5 pm.

Travel was an even greater form of detox, as I learned more about myself during 30 days backpacking Europe than I did during 5 years of college and 6 years in corporate America since. Solo travel is not easy and creates great challenges for a masculine man to overcome. It virtually obliterates your comfort zone. Getting ill with the flu in Spain and getting lost in rural France in the middle of the night, hungry, with no money, and a language barrier in place will humble a man more than any diversity training ever could. Naturally, I also noticed a heightened awareness that I had as I navigated those strange lands by day. I still remember thousands of tiny details from that trip.

How Much For Your Soul?

You might be asking yourself if the concept of a “detox” is melodramatic and really necessary, but it certainly is when I am advocating people leave their cushy $60,000 office job to potentially get a $12 an hour front desk job. The caveat is that of course this only applies if you have minimal liabilities, hate your job in corporate America and have no interest in climbing the ladder for the next 20-30 years, as therein lies the trap.

There is a stigma that better salaries and more promotions leads to an easier workload with less dirty work, because shit rolls downhill after all. However, many who have purged the 9-5 from their routine will tell you that the higher up that ladder you climb the more stressful it is, because the trap never really ends until you’re the owner and there are no more ways to move up. Since there will always be someone who makes more money, has a nicer lawn, or drives a nicer car, you will always be chasing that next carrot and you are not likely to achieve financial independence, because your expense spreadsheets and debts will continue to trend with your salary. This is the way consumerism and mass advertising works.

Understanding that until I am financially independent I still have to work to sustain food, clothing, and shelter, I have drawn up a budget and am seeking out lower stress, lower responsibility jobs that will pay me just enough to live, and am studying different ways to invest and possible entrepreneurial pursuits with all that free time regained.

The "detox" aspect is necessary because it takes conscious effort to undue these paradigms that have been hammered into people's brains for decades. In the same way New Years Resolutions typically fade in about a week, a cubicle drone could have a momentary epiphany, but unless he builds on it then the adage that old habits die hard usually reigns supreme.

Read More: You'll Never Find A "Good" Corporate Job Like Your Parents Did

JD McGuigan

JD is a 27 year old travel bum who jumps from job to job recklessly usually just before getting fired. He is also the author of a short e-book called The Pink Doughnut Phenomenon, which is a thesis on masculinity in the 9-5 workforce.

5 Consistent Benefits Of Night Game

April 26, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Those readers who listen to Roosh's excellent Kingmaker podcast will remember an episode from a couple of months back, The Death of Night Game. Here Roosh discussed the current state of night game in detail, concluding that conditions are significantly worse for guys going to meet girls at bars and clubs today than they were in the early 2000's when he first started out. The reasons for this decline are varied, but certainly the rise of the Smartphone and various apps like Instagram, Facebook and Tinder have played a part by making real-life approaches somewhat less necessary to satisfy a girl's overall desire for attention.

While I agree with many of Roosh's conclusions in the podcast, it has long been my opinion that in order to extract the best possible results from the sexual marketplace men are well-advised to employ holistic game—that is, a mixture of day game, night game, social circle game and a little app game. In doing so, rather than relying on one "revenue stream"—day game, say—but instead having many you will see exponential benefits in your results.

That being said, I had personally been doing a little less night game just recently due to work commitments and so on. But in the last few weeks I've been going out to clubs and bars regularly, and so I wanted to share some general thoughts on night game from my own perspective.

1. There are a lot of targets in one place

The first point is an obvious one but also an important one. Walk into a good night venue and, rather like Charlie walking into Willy Wonka's chocolate factory your eyes will widen and gleam with delight at all of the wonderful temptations on display.

Now, this is not to say that a day game session in a large city like London or New York doesn't afford the same opportunities—or theoretically a greater number of opportunities. However, the issue is that outside your targets will be spread far and wide over a large geographical area, rather than contained within one specially-designed, restricted area

An average day game session in London will see me do ten approaches over two hours. Certainly it would be possible for me to do more, or to take less time over it, but a very real issue is finding enough girls that I actually want to approach. In the club on Saturday night I was able to work through twenty approaches in less than an hour, simply because there were that many more hotties within a relatively small radius.

2. Doing day game in tandem strengthens your night game

Hardcore day gamers who eschew night game entirely are missing a trick. Why? Because one of the huge peripheral benefits of day game that is not discussed as much as it should be is that it will massively improve your ability to approach and interact with girls in a nighttime environment.

The reason is simple. Cold approaching on the street on the daytime without alcohol is hard. Harder still is it to maintain a conversation for more than two minutes once you have stopped that girl. So if you can do that—or if you've done that 500 or 1000 times—then how much easier are you going to find approaching a girl in a club where there is at least some level of social expectation for you to do so.

It's like this. In day game you not only have to get the girl to like you but you also have to get ground the interaction in such a way that she forgets that strangers meeting and hooking up in the daytime is—and let's be honest here—not usual for the great majority of people. In night game you still have to get the girl to like you, but you are not going against any social grain in doing so since it's very well established for men and women to meet in bars and clubs.

3. Girls can be more receptive to being approached

Which leads me onto my next, related point. While I think some guys are intimidated by bar and clubs because of the bright lights, loud music, cockblocks and bitchy girls, nevertheless in my experience girls can, on balance, be more receptive to being approached at night than in the daytime.

This isn't to say that you're not going to get the occasional bitch who holds her hand up dismissively when you tap her on the shoulder, but in general, if you have your shit together, are confident and well-dressed then girls will be friendlier to you, and less suspicious, than on the streets. The reason? Because you are not going against the grain of social norms like you are in day game. In this regard day game's greatest plus point—the element of surprise it affords—is also its greatest flaw.

4. You can get sexual immediately, in the venue

Yes, day gamers will argue that you can get sexual in the daytime with girls you've just met in public toilets and so on, and you can and will pull same-day lays from the street, but in general with day game you are looking at a two-stage approach: get her phone number, set up a date for another time.

With night game it's different. Again, because of the well-established and commonly-understood truth that part of the purpose of nightclubs is for hooking up, and because of the involvement of alcohol and sexy clothes, all things being equal it is far, far more likely that you will achieve quick and easy sex with a girl in or from a club that you will in the daytime. After all, sex in nightclub toilets is almost as common as one-night stands being pulled from clubs. Again, you are not going against the grain since sex is written into the very DNA of the nightclub experience.

5. It's a fallacy that phone numbers from clubs are flakier than those from day game

There is an idea now prevalent in the community that it is a complete waste of time to ever get a girl's phone numbers in a nightclub since unless you pull and sleep with her that same night then you will never see her again.

While it is doubtless true that your first course of action should always be to try to close the deal that same night there will be times when for whatever reason this is not possible. Perhaps she is getting a flight very early in the morning, or sharing a room with a friend, or otherwise has certain logistical issues that are not compatible with going home with you for sex that night. In a case like this you should absolutely get her number and follow up afterwards as normal.

In my experience phone numbers obtained from girls in clubs and bars can be flakey, yes—but probably less flakey than the majority of numbers taken during day game.

Again, I believe that this is because you are going with, rather than working against the girl's societal programming. After all, there is nothing unusual about a girl meeting a man at a club and then hooking up with him at a later date. It may not be many girls' preferred methods, but there is certainly nothing unusual about it. Plus, meeting in a venue that she likes will somewhat ground the interaction—'It's Troy from that cool club I love, Pacha'—in a way that just doesn't apply with day game ('It's Troy from outside that Taco Bell near Union Square')

Remember, in pulling context and narrative are very significant for the girl. Even for a one-off lay there has to be a narrative about how you and she met that she can tell herself that makes sense. In general creating that narrative around a random day game approach can be more of a stretch unless you really pull off the romantic Hollywood 'cute meet' thing with aplomb.

Inevitably this list has involved me pitting of night game against day game to some degree. I'm not trying to argue that one is inherently better than the other for pulling. That said, I do feel that day game has been afforded an almost mythical status recently in some quarters, as though it is the only valid form of game, whereas in fact the ROI it offers is not always that good. In truth, the most effective and balanced way for me to get great results with girls is to combine several forms of game concurrently. As I said at the start of this article, you likely wouldn't rely on one revenue stream for your business, so why would you for your sex life?

Want to find out more about how to get great at game? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter.

Read More: The One Girl You Absolutely Must Approach Every Day

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The Expectations Of Modern Women Have Lost Touch With Reality And Common Decency

April 26, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I remember my first girlfriend, but not so fondly. I dated her when I was 18 and 19 years old. She was the classic "LA girl"—whiny attitude, demanding, and overall just a bit psychotic. I'll never forget how she used to put little gold stars in my calendar on nights that she would "gift" me with some action (after the flames died out after the first few months).

Thankfully, I've come a long way since those days and can look back and chuckle. But that's not the point of this article. When I was reading Roosh's latest article about how it's perfectly normal and acceptable for girls to do porn now, I remembered her friend.

I came to know her by "The Disneyland Bitch". Let me tell you why.

The Disneyland Marriage Proposal

This friend of my girlfriend wanted to get married to her Prince Charming one day—if she ever found him. Of course, if poor bastard was “lucky” enough to find her, there were some absolutely insane requirements that he would have to meet before she agreed to take her hand in marriage.

Basically, she wanted her fairytale wedding, and fairytale proposal, too. In this case, the fairytale proposal was quite literally required to take place in front of the Disneyland castle. While my memory is a bit foggy, the general requirements for her to even consider his proposal were:

- The proposal MUST occur in front of the Disneyland castle.
- It MUST be on a specific day of the summer (not coincidentally, when she would have the biggest audience of strangers to clap and cheer for her spectacle)—perhaps her birthday.
- Her ENTIRE family had to be present—he was expected to foot the bill for all of them. This wasn’t just close family, either—she had a list of 20 aunts, cousins, and BFFs that HAD to be present.
- The proposal must happen at night, at a specific moment in the fireworks/music cue.
- He must have the proper arraignment of flowers and other gifts, in addition to the proper ring.
- To top it off, she had actually written a speech for her own proposal. Apparently her father had it locked away. Upon the princess’ groom-to-be asking her father’s permission to propose, the father was supposed to inform the lucky guy of all these insane requirements, and give him the proposal speech (there were a few parts where he had creative freedom).

If he did all of this, he might be lucky to get her consideration for marriage. Man, her father must be so proud to have raised such a strong and empowered woman—who is fearless with her demands! Meanwhile, Southeast Asian girls won't let you leave bed if you get sick.

Of course, any chump who falls for that spectacle deserves what's coming to him. While I obviously don't keep in touch with that girl as I've more than moved on, it occurred to me: is this now normal in America?

Expectations Start Young

I've got enough young cousins who are still in high school, and let me tell you—those poor guys don't have it easy these days. Just a few decades ago, a proposal was a private and special moment between man and woman. Now, as evidenced by the Disneyland Bitch, it's become a public spectacle. A chance for women to show off to people who don't matter. It's all status—a way to garner Instagram likes and Facebook comments, just like traveling abroad to exotic locations.

That's one thing—because the entire marriage industry is mostly just a spectacle, and has been for quite a while now. But have you seen how young men now are expected to ask a girl out to prom?

If you're not in the loop, they're now referred to as "Promposals". Desperate high school boys now ride horses to school, make elaborate food concoctions, or do other silly stunts—all in the name of trying to get a girl to show some pity and go to prom with him (and maybe get to first base).

Remember when you had to try to isolate a girl to ask her out to prom? It was just the respectful, normal thing to do. It was a chance to share a moment of youth with someone whom you had a crush on. It was intimate in a PG way. In some ways, it was one of the final moments of youthful innocence for both guys and girls.

These days? It's just another stunt to make men into pussies, jumping through hoops for the insane demands of women. Let me tell you—the girl who gets a horse to get asked to prom is the same girl who is making demands like the Disneyland Bitch. You almost can't blame her—she's human. If the 18-year-old guy got her a horse for prom, surely a castle is within reason for a marriage proposal?

What's Next?

Clearly, this cheesy, desperate begging is continuing to trend upward. From elaborate and expensive weddings that no one can afford, to proposals, and now all the way down to prom—the insanity continues.

The only question is—what comes next? Are young men in middle school (ages 12-14) going to have to start doing these kind of stunts to get girls to go to a dance with them? Eventually, the bubble is going to burst. The expectations are going to become so insane for girls, at such a young age, that no boy will ever be able to meet up to them.

Instead of waiting until much later in life to go their own way, young men in high school are going to say, "Enough is enough, I'm not going to bother." At the absolute peak of their libidos, they're going to get so fed up with the entire process that porn will sound like a superior alternative.

As Roosh detailed in his article—the girls will fly out of their small towns to do porn—all for a plane ticket and a few hundred bucks. They'll spread their legs, get gang-banged, and dream of their elaborate proposals, while saying that they're just "finding themselves". They'll say that it will make them a better person for their future husband.

And when no man is left to pick up the pieces, guess who will get the blame? You and I both know. The question is—do they?

If you want to learn how to keep a harem of women, check out my book King's Code. For advice about escaping American women for greener pastures, check out Ukraine Living.

Read More: How To Pass The Bliss Test

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

How The Song “Scars To Your Beautiful” Fuels Our Culture Of Entitlement

April 26, 2017 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

A song rampant on the radio recently caught my ear for its troubling thematics. Its lyrics perfectly encapsulate the mindset of today’s Me Culture of Entitlement. The pop number currently clogs up the FM channels, exposing radio listeners to a misguided take-home message about “self-love”. We all know about the deficiencies of modern music, but this tune tapped into something specifically wrong about this generation.

The piece is called “Scars To Your Beautiful” and is performed by Canadian pop singer Alessia Cara. In it, the 20 year-old wunderkind intones an anthem ostensibly about self-love and acceptance and the importance of rejecting the haters who criticize you. On the surface, this sounds like a perfectly healthy message for her listeners, which I would speculate are mostly adolescent females (and single women in their late twenties-early thirties).

The song encourages young girls entering womanhood and insecure about their social identity to accept that it is okay to be different and to realize that the bubble you presently live in and how you fit in to it is only temporary and not indicative of the larger world out there.

Fair enough. Building your self-esteem and having “big picture” thinking is important when you become an independent adult and are trying to seek out a job, a new-and-improved social circle, or even your own family. But as “Scars To Your Beautiful” continues and Cara’s voice starts to assert itself, the underlying message twists into one—intended or not—that actually does a disservice to both jaded Millennials and their juniors.

The devolution of “Scars To Your Beautiful” from hopeful anthem to toxic screed interestingly resembles the regressiveness of left-wing political buzzwords. “Refugees Welcome”, “Love Trumps Hate”, “Black Lives Matter” all seem just at first glance because they appeal to your emotions and make you feel like a morally good person for believing in them. However, once put into context and scrutinized for what they stand for, these mantras reveal themselves as harmful and vapid.

Similarly, “Scars To Your Beautiful” overcompensates with its You-Go-Girl™ message and feel-good platitudes meant to placate self-centred and overly sensitive youth. Beginning with the reasonable belief that beauty can be skin-deep or, as sung, “deeper than the eyes can find it”, the song’s chorus then leaps to the assumption that all things that go unnoticed about you are inherently beautiful:

“You should know you’re beautiful just the way you are
And you don’t have to change a thing
The world could change its heart”

While these lyrics may resonate with an everyday ingenue, those out in the real world who have broken out of their respective bubbles, are trying to make a name for themselves, and gaining incremental victories against regular crushing setbacks, will know immediately that the above is a complete sham. A mere idyll for the idle-minded.

The real world is The Myth of Sisyphus. The steep hill’s incline won’t change, the rock’s weight won’t change, you have to change by pushing harder.

In reality, “the world” has its own natural laws and modus operandi that only people in the highest positions of wealth and power are capable of tweaking to the nth of a degree. As an aspiring individual and one of seven billion participating in the human experiment that is life, your source of power is in your ability to change, to adapt to your environment, improve your flaws, and recalibrate your errors to attain success and happiness. “You don’t have to change”, you need to change. Your body’s evolutionary instincts demand you do.

This much is true: if you are a genuine individual (not a nameless follower) with unique talents and have an eccentric or shy personality, you will likely be criticized, mistreated or excluded by others. Cliques and echo chambers reject individuals because they threaten their means of existence—enforcing uniformity of appearance and thought within the group. Real individuals resist that, which is why they get targeted.

The problem with "Scars To Your Beautiful" is it pushes life advice akin to cultural relativism—this fallacious idea that all "different" people (or cultures) are inherently unique in a good and healthy way and, therefore, it is "the world" that is wrong and needs to change if it treats them unfairly.

This notion fuels our 'me, me, me' entitlement culture by insisting that regardless of what others say or think or how the world treats you, you are a super special snowflake and do not have to improve yourself one teensy bit…because you're special ("we're stars and we're beautiful"). And if the world rejects you or judges you or seems to discriminate against you, congratulations here is your certified Victim Card, you special person.

Got your Victim Card?

All you have to do is watch the music video (see above) to grasp the inherent flaws and contradictions in Cara's lyrics. The video plays up diversity™ by profiling various women and men (the question of why men are included when the song is addressed to a young girl goes unanswered) of different colour, age, size, and…gender. The problem with this type of diversity™ is it assumes these different groups to have separate but equal values, virtues, and hardships.

Suddenly, the woes of eyelashes and hair extensions hold a candle to a child suffering from cancer. A fat woman passively looking for acceptance is now equal to a woman who goes to the gym and gets ripped. But cancer is a real struggle; cosmetic concerns are not. Committing to getting in shape is not the equal to being obese, but the solution.

Further, the music video glorifies a man with gender identity disorder embracing his delusion, even though the song later advises against giving in to eating disorders:

"She has dreams to be an envy, so she's starving […]
She don't see her perfect, she don't understand she's worth it"

So, what is the consistent philosophy to "Scars To Your Beautiful"? There is none, just so long as you feel good about yourself no matter what, you special person.

The woefully misguided will watch this video and shriek, "Harry, are you trying to say a little girl fighting cancer isn't brave?". To spare informed readers of the obvious, I will answer that question by adding that I am not criticizing the individuals Cara's video exhibits. Some of them, like the children with cancer, are real victims with real struggles. I am criticizing the underlying message of the video and how it misleads impressionable listeners into abandoning personal responsibility and shifting their sense of dislocation onto the fault of society alone.

This is what "Scars To Your Beautiful" ultimately panders to.

I am sure Cara is a decent and talented young person worthy of her success. Some of her music is catchy, too, and some of its lyrics I can agree with. It is clear from her music that, like Lady Gaga, she was picked on for her appearances, but embraced her true self, broke free of her bubble, and went on to achieve international recognition and success for her musical abilities. Kudos to her. All of us at Return of Kings can respect that resilience and fortitude.

Unfortunately, it appears Cara has misinterpreted her own virtues and projected that misinterpretation on many of Western culture's vices. The butt-hurt tone in her music conveys a tone of bitterness reflective of an entitled teenager who just had her iPhone taken away for overuse.

Generally, female-oriented pop music tends to be highly idealistic and feel-good (maternal). It nurtures the listener and reassures her without the force of paternalistic tough love. While uplifting in a superficial, in-the-moment kind of way, “Scars To Your Beautiful” is another example of how popular culture’s subliminal messages are grooming a next generation of spoiled, jobless, victimized narcissists incapable of self-reflection and obsessed with “self-expression”.

Read More: How The “Baby It’s Cold Outside” Controversy Proves There Is No Rape Culture In The West

Harry Lime
Writer. Filmmaker. Lover of cuckoo clocks. Email: harrylimerok @gmail.com.

The Root Cause Of Our Problems With Government Is Tight Centralization

April 27, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Have you ever wondered why leftists can push their agendas in government even when they're flagrantly against the will of the majority? How do they get away with this? In a representative democracy, it shouldn't work that way, but "shouldn't" and five bucks gets you a cheeseburger. Excessive centralization helps them impose their will on the public.

Entryism

The birthplace of the Frankfurt School, the Communist think tank that subverted the American universities

Infiltrating organizations has long been a leftist strategy, most famously with the "long march through the institutions" concept. Not only have they used this tactic to absorb rival factions, they've used it to subvert cultural institutions and even governments. When they get appointed to prominent positions, they'll fight tooth and nail to get their like-thinking buddies in at all levels. Once critical mass is achieved, anyone with a different ideology can forget about getting a job there.

This is also why conservatives in social sciences faculty departments are pretty rare. After the indoctrinated Baby Boomers became professors, they promoted their comrades and excluded everyone with other viewpoints. (The only way for others to get in is to hide their views throughout their academic career until achieving tenure, which takes years of method-acting.) That's also how leftists got control over Boards of Directors of huge businesses and imposed a left-leaning corporate culture. Quite likely, this is how they took over philanthropic foundations, while their Gilded Age founders are turning in their graves about the way their money is being spent.

What can be done about it? As for government agencies, the bureau certainly won't reform itself. With painstaking effort, those who abused their power could be rooted out, as Joseph McCarthy tried to until the media shut him down. The simpler way is to abolish the agency. As for corporations, the best that can be done is to get the word out and stop buying their products. As for universities, we should send our children only to the few that haven't been pozzed out yet. Also, we can set up parallel institutions, as I proposed with the art scene, though that's obviously a long-term effort. We can stage our own Long March, though that will require much time, effort, and organizing.

If an institution is retaken, will the apparatchiks find themselves in the same position as all those Rust Belt factory workers who were shit out of luck after their jobs were sent overseas? Quite likely, it won't be hard to find another cushy gig where they can push their politics. They can scurry off to find another agency to infest, or find themselves a high-placed position in some activism outfit, or get into another leftist racket like journalism; in either case, they'll benefit from all the connections they've made.

Surely there must be a better way. Pinochet had his methods, though as for the USA, returning things to the way they were designed would go far.

Federalism

Thomas Jefferson, President and architect of the US Constitution

The USA was designed as a federal republic, with the states retaining considerable autonomy. Even in the early days, there was tension between the Federalists, desiring more autonomy by the states, and the Anti-Federalists desiring greater centralization. The Federalist position prevailed for nearly a century.

The states are nominally sovereign, with the potential to act as countries of their own; thus they're called states rather than provinces. This consideration was a major factor for why the former colonies, newly independent, agreed to enter the USA's federal government in the first place. The Tenth Amendment says:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The Supreme Court, though, hasn't been taking it too seriously. For example, the United States v. Darby Lumber decision pretty much treats it as a nonentity:

> The amendment states but a truism that all is retained which has not been surrendered.

Subsidiarity

Pope Pius XI, author of the Quadragesimo Anno encyclical

The Catholic doctrine of subsidiarity is a good idea, whether or not it's your brand of religion. The basic principle is that a function should be handled by the smallest body competent to handle it. The only exception is when the designated body runs into trouble and needs assistance from a higher body. Otherwise, greater authorities take a back seat and leave well enough alone.

Thus, if education can be handled at the state level, then the federal government should let them take care of it. Note that states always provided for education—this was what they did all by themselves traditionally—and centralization came in with the Department of Education. Also, since families are capable of raising children, then the government should butt out unless a family runs into trouble. Government dependency is an abnormal condition, but has become a way of life for a large part of the public.

Big government opposes this concept, of course. A funny example is when Al Gore proposed a government agency to provide news on traffic flow. Then a commentator pointed out that private business already does that, which Gore would know if he turned on the radio in his chauffeured limousine instead of listening to whale noises.

Benefits of local control

Capitol building in Topeka, Kansas

When power is held at the local level, the people are more involved in public life. You're still one fish in a very large bowl, but on a national level, you're one fish in an ocean of hundreds of millions. It's a lot easier to get an audience with a mayor or city councilman than with the President or a Congressman. Also, public morale benefits when people have more accessibility and input to a local government that wields the actual power.

It's been said "you can't fight City Hall"—more accurately, it's an uphill battle. Even so, it's practically impossible for an individual to stand up to Washington, short of having millions for lobbyists, lawyer fees, or "campaign contributions". Decentralization means that people are more in control.

Further, greater power for local government allows things to be run according to the sensibilities of people living there. The Northeast and the Left Coast can have liberal policies, and "Flyover Country" can have conservative policies, and everyone is happier that way. Those who don't like it where they are can move to another state, which is a lot easier than moving to another country. Also, federal social programs should be brought back to state level, as the Constitution doesn't provide for things like Obamacare (despite what the Supreme Court said), AFDC, etc.

Each state will represent a unique experiment; the one providing the best societal outcome, the greatest responsiveness to the public, and the greatest efficiency will be a model that other states can copy. This should be more efficient, since huge bureaucracies suffer from diseconomies of scale (more layers of top-level highly-paid administrators, more difficulty coordinating meetings, etc.) Other than that, Washington waste is legendary: sweetheart deals, huge stockpiles of spare inventory they don't need, and so forth.

All this is how federalism was supposed to work. Finally, decentralization takes power away from unaccountable Washington bureaucrats. SJW types can take over a federal agency, but they'll have a much tougher time infiltrating fifty state capitals. If they try, citizens will have an easier time opposing them.

How federalism was abrogated

The beginning of the end for federalism. Next stop on the way was the FDR administration and the Supreme Court from Warren onward.

The Civil War set the ball rolling for further centralization. The Fourteenth Amendment, a Reconstruction-era measure, includes the "equal protection" clause. Its intention was to prevent Southern lawmen from turning a blind eye to crimes committed against freedmen. Successive judicial "interpretations" of this effectively gutted autonomy by states. The Fourteenth Amendment also allows for anchor babies to be US citizens, whereupon their illegal alien families can get welfare benefits. Other than that, the Constitution's interstate commerce clause has been abused as a catch-all means for Federal power-grabbing.

Liberal Supreme Court members get away with this stuff through the "living document" doctrine. (Note the clever framing tactic.) Although the Constitution does have some gray areas intended to be filled in by precedent, they took it much further. Early on in the Marbury v. Madison decision, the Supreme Court declared itself the final authority on what the Constitution says.

Since the Warren court, time and again they've abused their power to legislate their politics from the bench and rationalize it after the fact. The "living document" concept means the Constitution is whatever they say. The tortured word-salad of the infamous Roe v. Wade decision is Exhibit A here, which abrogated the laws of all fifty states about a matter not mentioned by the Constitution. A series of 1970s decisions allowed pornography to flourish. These are two examples of many that profoundly transformed the American political landscape.

Up through the 1950s, the government more or less still paid lip service to the Federalist principles of the Constitution. For example, the interstate highway system was sold as a defense project. Congress didn't have the authority to set up a national road system only for public use, but defense projects are covered as a delegated power under the Constitution. Much more recently, the threat of withholding Federal highway funds was used to blackmail states into accepting laws (such as the former 55 MPH speed limit) which normally would be a matter of state law.

The effects of leftist bureaucratic control

Generally speaking, if the people working at an agency like you, are indifferent to you, or don't like you makes the difference as to whether your request is handled immediately, you go through the normal gauntlet of red tape, or you're given an endless run-around. If you're well-connected, that significantly greases the wheels of bureaucracy. This is pretty important for businesses needing licensing and permits to operate. Major operators that make heavy political contributions will have doors opened to them; small businesses trying to break into the game are in unfamiliar territory and have to play "hurry up and wait". It shouldn't work this way, but remember what I said earlier about "should".

A pretty flagrant example was the IRS scandal during the Obama administration. Conservative groups applying for 501(c) nonprofit certification got stalled for years; other groups got their requests handled promptly. There was a Congressional investigation of that, surely at great effort to obtain. The results, though, were that the IRS top dogs all clammed up, and nobody confessed. Abuse of IRS powers was one item in Nixon's Articles of Impeachment, but The Lightworker got no consequences. The only fallout was one IRS official quitting and two others retiring. Other than that, Donald Trump's taxes have been audited every year—coincidence?

Whether or not the bureaucrats like you makes a big difference with social services too. One of my girlfriends fell on hard times and tried to apply for government aid. She got the runaround for being White. All animals are equal, but some animals are more equal than others.

Leftist effects on education

An actual handout in some schools

Centralized control of education has had profound effects. It's pretty disgusting that educrats would use their position to indoctrinate students, especially those who are too young to make up their own minds. My first exposure to political propaganda in school was when I was in second grade. My third grade social studies text was full of bias, though I didn't realize it then. No doubt those were innocent times, as indoctrination happens in kindergarten these days.

The worst example is evangelizing transsexuality in schools. Some of these kids will be persuaded to screw up their bodies with puberty-blocking drugs, and even get surgery, before they really know what they're doing to themselves. Note that when Gyorgy Lucaks instituted an in-your-face sex education program in Hungary to attack traditional morality (he actually called it "cultural terrorism"), the Hungarians rose up and overthrew Bela Kun's Communist regime. I guess they've done a better job of "boiling the frog slowly" here.

Title IX forbade sex discrimination in federally funded institutions. It's an example of a law that sounds like basic fairness, but got used for other purposes that the public didn't anticipate. Funding for athletic programs must be equal for both men and women. Since men are more interested in sports (including participation) than women, this means that many men's programs ended up getting cut while women's programs (even in fairly obscure sports) flourished. It also worked that way for high schools, even though they don't receive direct federal funding.

More recently, the Obama administration used Title IX to institute extrajudicial tribunals to adjudicate sex on campus. Any noncompliant college will lose federal funding. It's little wonder that false accusations have become a big problem lately. Whenever a crime really occurs, it should be handled by the municipal police; that's their job. These tribunals don't have the legitimate authority to administer law, or (as designed) have due process protections.

So this is what happens when the government places strings attached to billions in funding. The Common Core curriculum also got lots of criticism. This wouldn't have happened if the Department of Education didn't exist.

In summary

Centralization is how unelected bureaucrats hijack government functions. For this reason, putting things back to the federalist design by the Founding Fathers must be a key step in draining the swamp. This won't be easily, especially since Antonin Scalia—one of the Supreme Court Justices worthy of the title—got the Breitbart treatment, but it must be done.

Read More: The Battle Of Berkeley Signals The Arrival Of A True Right-Wing Movement

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Are You On A Treadmill Of Materialism That Goes Nowhere?

April 27, 2017 | by Max Panzer | Link | Original Link

Prepare yourself because it is only going to get worse. The giant marketing machine that is the modern media will become even more pervasive and insidious as technology continues to evolve. There will be nowhere to go and nowhere to hide. If you live at all in the digital world the drumbeat for material consumption and accumulation will never stop. Through electronic tracking and sophisticated algorithms you will be increasingly targeted. The goal, of course, is to forever separate you from your hard earned money by keeping you on the Hedonic Treadmill.

In terms of materialism, the Hedonic Treadmill means that "enough will never be enough." In other words, corporations are well aware that it is human nature to become accustomed to higher and higher levels of material existence and wealth. The tendency then, is to then seek out further improvements and upgrades to maintain a certain level of satisfaction and enjoyment. As if on a treadmill, anyone who assesses their identity through material means will never really get further ahead in this regard; one's self-worth will always spring back to par, thus the need for constant consumption to maintain worthiness, status and pride.

It will behoove all men who value their independence and freedom to become aware of the nonstop marketing campaign attempting to program them to consume and accumulate. They are depending on the conditioned belief that you will base your success on the status associated with material possession and display. And they are specifically targeting our women even more intensely.

The marketers are aware of and willfully leverage the fact that women in the west and many other cultures are responsible for the vast majority of consumer spending. These same women for whom many of us naturally aim to please through our earning power and the display of status and prestige.

Mass media is pervasive and insidious

Indicator #1 That You Are On The Hedonic Treadmill

There is certainly nothing wrong with material possession in and of itself. A nice home, a performance automobile, fine clothing, gourmet dining, vacations and live entertainment can certainly add the quality of our existence. However, as with many aspects of life it is the context within which we purchase and enjoy these things that determine their appropriateness.

If you are living in your dream home and driving your dream vehicle, but do not have a year's expenses in the bank this is indicator number one that you are on the Hedonic Treadmill. You have sold out your financial security and perhaps your financial solvency for material possession. In this globalist world of corporate consolidation, buyouts and downsizing you are one stroke of the pen away from a world of hurt.

And if you have a woman or a family that is dependent on you, you have sold them out for the immediate pride of material status as well. Despite the best of intentions, you have put the ownership of material things above the financial security of your loved ones. If this is the case, step off the Treadmill and employ the appropriate financial restraint to get yourself to the point of having a solid one year of f-you money in the bank.

Indicator #2 That You Are On The Hedonic Treadmill

The second indicator that you are on the Hedonic Treadmill is if your net worth does not improve every month. By definition then you are spending up to and perhaps beyond your income. In other words, you have failed to control your standard of living so that you make consistent financial gains in exchange for your labor.

Choose health over accumulation

No matter your level of income, it is simply a matter of financial propriety to adjust one's overhead and expenses so that improvement is made on a consistent basis. A wise man that wishes to remain independent and in control of his life will make sure he gets to keep a portion of every paycheck. Every penny earned should not go right back out the door to pay the bills.

The effort to cash flow on a monthly basis is the foundation for all that ails you financially. If you are in debt, you've now got the means to free yourself. Then, once you are relieved of consumer debt you can make a run for your f-you stash. And from there you can invest perpetually until you achieve financial independence.

Costs Of The Hedonic Treadmill

Living your life on the Hedonic Treadmill will take its toll over the years. Likely to be negatively affected are your health, values and the limited time we all have in this life for what really matters.

Living a highly leveraged financial life will create stress that will add up and manifest itself in many unhealthy ways. Many will spend too much of their time working for and worrying about feeding the beast that is the Treadmill.

How many men have you seen that have luxurious homes and cars, but couldn't lightly bound up a couple of flights of stairs without gasping for air? Looking at them, it is obvious they have sold out their health in pursuit of career and the impressive display of success. One wonders sometimes, what else has been sacrificed for this material gain if something as important as basic health has been shortchanged.

Be wary, because if the Hedonic Treadmill has become your master it will always push aside anything else that threatens its rule. Ultimately men will do many things to maintain appearances if they are without a solid core of principles. Avoid this trap by focusing on implicit values rather than explicit consumption and it will be much easier to do the right thing when difficulties arise.

And no matter who you are on this planet, the one limited commodity we all possess is time. Spend your time wisely. Work hard and work smart to provide for yourself and your family. Put in all the long hours necessary. After all, a man needs to provide food, shelter and a measure of financial security for his loved ones. But beware of burning the clock simply for material benefit. Remember, enough will never be enough. Make quality of life a priority over the Hedonic Treadmill.

Pursue meaning values and experience

Quality Of Life Alternatives To The Hedonic Treadmill

Put material accumulation and consumption aside for more meaningful and enduring pursuits. Focus on accomplishment, experience and financial independence instead. These are not mutually exclusive to owning and experiencing some of the finer things in life, but should simply take precedence.

Create a life mission to guide you each day and pursue accomplishment and meaningful experience. Add some value to the world by setting goals and getting things done. Some of these things might even end up financing the luxuries that appeal to you, but this is simply an aside to a substantive life as a man.

Accumulation for its own sake is an empty pursuit. Reward for accomplishment, however, will have lasting value and represent more than just empty status and pride. Anyone can buy themselves a trophy; earning one on the other hand will make it a representation of integrity, performance and character.

And if you are to pursue the almighty dollar, do it for financial independence. Focus on freedom and opportunity rather than the ostentatious display of material wealth. Have the courage to live below your means and improve your net worth. In the long run, you may indeed be able to afford the luxuries you desire. But will be done in the right order and for the right reasons.

Focus on accomplishment and financial independence

Beware Of The Seduction

It is very easy and seductive to fall for the lure of measuring one's self-worth through material means. All it takes is a simple transaction and there can be immediate gratification. Every man qualifies as long as he has the cash in hand or available credit.

Be very careful here, even if you don't consider yourself a materialistic person. Ubiquitous credit along with the natural desire to please your woman can slyly ease you into suffocating debt and a never ending cycle on the Hedonic Treadmill.

No matter who you are you can dress, drive and live in luxury if the bank is willing to finance it. After all, if you've got the credit you've earned the right to these things say a life's worth of advertisements. This is what we are told every day as we are bombarded by the corporate marketers. Everything around you validates this kind of thinking. Why should you deny yourself?

Primarily, you should deny yourself because of the soul stealing nature of the Hedonic Treadmill. If you value who you are through material means, it will mean an empty life in the long run. You will have sold out your independence, health and values to a lifestyle that will never really satisfy you. And you will become a slave to your employer, the next greatest purchase and the debt that it creates.

Instead, play the long game and be smart. Separate yourself from the masses by pursuing intrinsic wealth. Have the character to brush aside the superficial path. Focus on accomplishment and experience and adjust your financial overhead and expenses so that you're a man in control of his life. Do not become a slave to debt and the display of status. Beware of the Hedonic Treadmill.

Read More: The Danger Of Hedonic Adaptation

Max Panzer

Max Panzer is the publisher of Becoming a Force of Nature. He is an independent business owner and has been married to the same woman for over 25 years. Max pursues his Life Mission at full throttle and works to cut through each day with a stronger, sharper, gleaming edge.

A Divine Culture Is Our Only Hope For The Future

April 27, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by the editor at Expandourmind

In Part 2 we showed the satanic origins of our modern Western rulers and now we turn to the practical implementation of their ideas.

In 1946 a document called "Rules for Communist Revolutionaries" was published in the US. In the document there are ten rules outlined on how to subvert western society and turn people into coarse, beast like, contentious and materialistic humans who are obsessed with trivial desires such as sports and pornography. The goal is to make them despise their own leaders and implement communist dictatorship as fast as possible while preaching democracy to the masses. Register all guns and then confiscate them. The real goal of the Marxists has always been turning upright, traditional men into wretches who have no idea about human life.

Evolution? Humans Become Enslaved Robots

Communist Rules For Revolution

"Cause the registration of all firearms on some pretext, with a view to confiscating them and leaving the population helpless."

(Captured in Dusseldorf May 1919 By The Allied Forces)

A. Corrupt the young, get them away from religion. Get them interested in sex. Make them superficial, destroy their ruggedness.

B. Get control of all means of publicity and thereby:
1. Get people's minds off their government by focusing their attention on athletics, sexy books and plays and other trivialities.
2. Divide the people into hostile groups by constantly harping on controversial matters of no importance.
3. Destroy the people's faith in their natural leaders by holding the latter up to contempt, ridicule and obloquy.
4. Always preach true democracy, but seize power as fast and as ruthlessly as possible.
5. By encouraging government extravagance, destroy its credit, produce fear of inflation with rising prices and general discontent.
6. Foment unnecessary strikes in vital industries, encourage civil disorders and foster a lenient and soft attitude on the part of government toward such disorders.
7. By specious argument cause the breakdown of the old moral virtues, honesty, sobriety, continence, faith in the pledged word, ruggedness.

C. CAUSE THE REGISTRATION OF ALL FIREARMS ON SOME PRETEXT, WITH A VIEW TO CONFISCATING THEM AND LEAVING THE POPULATION HELPLESS.

*"NOTE: The above "Rules for Revolution were secured by the State Attorney's Office from a known member of the Communist Party, who acknowledged it to be still a part of the Communist program for overthrowing our Government."

Communist Rules for Revolution

1. Corrupt the young, get them away from religion. Get them interested in sex. Make them superficial. Destroy their ruggedness.
2. Get control of all means of publicity.
3. Get people's minds off their government by focusing their attention on athletics, sexy books and other trivialities.
4. Divide the people into hostile groups by constantly harping on controversial matters of no importance.
5. Destroy the people's faith in their natural leaders by holding the latter up to contempt, ridicule and obloquy.
6. Always preach true democracy, but seize power as fast and as ruthlessly as possible.
7. By encouraging government extravagance, destroy its credit and produce fear of inflation with rising prices and general discontent.
8. Foment unnecessary strikes in vital industries, encourage civil disorders, and foster a lenient and soft attitude on the part of government toward such disorders.
9. By specious argument cause the breakdown of the old moral virtues, honesty, sobriety, continence, faith in the pledged word, ruggedness.
10. Cause the registration of all firearms on some pretext, with a view to confiscating them and leaving the populace helpless.

By just taking a quick glance at the communist rules above we know how the rulers abuse modern people´s minds and we also know that their plan succeeded by looking at today´s society. Only the last step remains: seize dictatorial power and implement a world theocracy where our hidden rulers want to be worshipped as absolute Gods – just like Lucifer the devil did in the Bible.

Dalai Lama On Top Of The Jews – Our World Rulers Spill The Beans

Jews And Muslims Want "Buddhist" Dalai Lama As World Leader – Jerusalem Post 2006

In 2006 Jerusalem Post published an article about putting Dalai Lama as the world leader of all religions seated in Jerusalem – the installment of the prophecied Antichrist. According to MSM Tibet is a place full of kindhearted spiritual people who suffer from the evil Chinese Communist Party (CCP).

Is there another story? Why were the first Westerners who introduced Tibetan Lamaism to the west Satanists? How could Dalai Lama have an open door to all the Western leaders for 50 years while being the disputed ruler of a microscopic population of 6 million Tibetans in China? Why is he called the "God-King" or "His Holiness" by the Marxist MSM? After researching Dalai Lama and the history of Tibet we see the Asian origins of the Luciferian conspiracy against mankind clearly. The end goal is that our state officials want to be worshipped as living Gods just like Lucifer did in the Bible.

Speaking of fake news and the MSM conflict between Tibet and the CCP we read a quote from Mao Zedong in 1954 and immediately understand his puppet status:

> Dalai Lama is a living Buddha. He is a living God. He was not elected by the people… They believe in the Dalai Lama and its local chief much more than they believe in us. It is impossible to shake his position…

To see the picture in the west we first note that President FD Roosevelt sent a Rolex watch in 1942 at the peak of WW II to 7 year old Dalai Lama – at a time when Tibet had no conflict with China. Then we read German General Ludendorff who said in the 1930s that the Tibetan Lamas had emplaced themselves at the head of all Jewish and Christian secret societies. ("Europa den Asiatenpriestern" – "Europe belongs to the Asian priests").

Soviet Army Swastika Symbol After The Bolsheviks Seized Power

It might sound unbelievable after watching MSM for decades but you will find that the Lamas cooperated closely with the Bolsheviks, the Nazis, the Catholics and the secret societies in the west. The Lamas had an infamous reputation of being master sorcerers which attracted bad people from the west.

Tibet information: Tibet – The Hidden History Of The 20th Century World Rulers

Tibetan Serfs Begging

The old Tibetan feudal serf society is the real model of the NWO that the Nazis and Bolsheviks adored. A society where 95% of people have no rights whatsoever and there is an absolute despot in both temporal and spiritual matters. Theodor Illion, a German researcher who travelled disguised to the top secret underground city(and survived) in Tibet stated in the 1930s:

”the Lamas…are more dangerous than all their cold and hot hells put together.”

A Spiritual Practice Is The Prime Enemy Of The CCP

China (Zhongguo) means “Center Of The World” in Chinese. The CCP named the spiritual practice of Falun Gong their prime enemy in 1999. Falun Gong quickly spread to 100 million Chinese people in the 1990s. Chinese leader Jiang Zemin became jealous of Falun Gong and wanted to wipe it out in three months. Falun Gong has been illegally outlawed and persecuted in China since 1999 with mass scale live organ harvesting being perhaps the most atrocious crime ever heard of. Despite intense persecution for almost 18 years Falun Gong has spread across the world to more than 100 countries and it still thrives secretly in China.

Religions have not been a challenge to Marxists in modern times since they are easy to infiltrate and destroy from within. Falun Gong only has a Master, no membership, no money, no priests, all information online for free and it supports traditional culture. The focus in Falun Gong is on improving one´s mind and body in daily life by following the principles of “Truth-Compassion-Tolerance” in addition to doing physical exercises. That kind of faith is impossible to control and it´s a nightmare for the Marxists. It has never occurred anything similar with such a wide spread across the world in such a short time.

Shen Yun – Traditional Dance Company Persecuted Around The World By The CCP

Shen Yun Dancers Express Traditional Chinese Femininity (www.shenyun.com)

We have seen the darkness and now we look for hope. The real hope is a new divinely inspired, traditional and beautiful culture, that's the only thing that can make people kindhearted, humane and happy again. If there has been complete evil and deception in the world for at least 100 years there must be time for a change soon since nature changes cyclically.

We have found a divinely inspired dance troupe that scares the wits out of the CCP. It´s called Shen Yun and Shen means divine being and represents the myriad of divine figures in Chinese history. Yun means rhytm and and conveys a person's entire bearing. Shen Yun means the beauty of divine beings dancing in the heavens. That´s something which has never been displayed before.

Introduction of Shen Yun: Shen Yun Trailer(Youtube 30 secs)

Shen Yun has become the largest classical Chinese dance company in the world touring about 150 cities every year with five dance companies and selling out their shows in most places. Since its beginnings the CCP has done everything in its power to stop these Shen Yun shows including threatening theatre directors across the world, slashing tires on touring buses, sending threatening letters to MPs and putting pressure on foreign departments etc. It´s a global persecution in many democratic countries. This year they slander Shen Yun with advertorials in large MSM outlets such as Washington Post, The Age,The Telegraph etc. This is a unique case of a world power attacking a US based dance troupe. This shows us that divine culture is what the Marxists fear most of all and that China does whatever it wants across the world.

Why Shen Yun Scares The CCP

True, positive, inner and outer human beauty – a lethal danger to Marxists

The first reason is that Shen Yun was founded by Chinese-American Falun Gong practitioners. The very same people that they imprison in China spreads traditional culture in the west through dance and music.

The second reason is that Shen Yun tries to revive the brilliant and divinely inspired 5000-year old Chinese culture with all its different dynasties, legends, faiths and traditions spanning the whole of China. The female artists express true femininity and beauty in movements and costumes while the male ones are powerful and masculine. The CCP has distorted everything of traditional Chinese culture and turned it into a dark and gloomy Marxist version of human struggle with our fellow man, nature and the Gods.

People across the world are starving for spiritual food, inspiration and beautiful traditional culture. They go to see Shen Yun because they get a unique blend of divinely inspired culture, hope, spirituality and beauty. Shen Yun comes with a message that human beings are fundamentally divine beings that came down to earth with the hope to do some good things before returning to their divine realm. Society has reached its bottom and that is when the divine needs to step in and help good people. This message is indeed powerful, inclusive and beautiful and it´s a message people won´t hear in other dance shows.

Part 4: Dr. Day disclosed our falsified science in 1969. We investigate the Marxist purpose and frauds of the Evolution Theory. Finally a few words from prophecies about our predestined Marxist era and the unknown but magical and cataclysmic year of 2017. Finally real men will get their chance to fight the battle of all ages against the evil forces trying to enslave them.

Appendix:

Dalai Lama Meets Chief Rabbis And Imams

Magic As A Political Instrument

Dalai Lama – Antichrist Of Christan And Buddhist Prophecies

Oracles And Demons Of Tibet

Who´s Afraid Of Shen Yun?

Shen Yun Trailers(30 secs)

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Bizarre Science Fiction Novel Sheds Light On What The Technological Singularity Will Be Like

April 27, 2017 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Having read (and also written) quite a lot of science fiction it took me a surprisingly long time to read Charles Stross' landmark book Accelerando. Originally written in sections from 2000-2005, the book has already proven remarkably prescient with the spread of the global internet and the collapse of old social norms. Although we won't know for sometime, I have already come to suspect that Accelerando may very well be the most prophetic book yet written about the future history of the 21st century.

Nearly all science fiction, even of the harder variety, tends to envisage a future where humans are still basically in charge. We may have robots, spacecraft, AI and all manner of future technologies, but humans still dominate society. This has held true all the way from Star Trek to The Expanse.

Charles Stross takes a completely different approach. He looks at Moore's Law – the basic rule that computing power has doubled every 24 months since the 1960s, and decides to keep following it all the way to the hypothetical point known as a 'technological singularity' when computers overtake humans and are better able to make improvements to their own operating systems. Beyond this point, your typical, run-of-the-mill biological humans like you and me become mere observers to what follows, as our digital spawn overtake us in every way imaginable.

Rise in human intellect could be driven by integrating with machines in the future

The resulting novel is in three parts, each spanning the early, mid and late 21st century respectively and following three generations of a single family (major spoilers to follow).

A Rapidly Changing World

The first part of the novel depicts a world only slightly evolved from our own, though with the internet growing in influence all the time. In the second decade of the 21st century, headlines include – 'a marginally intelligent voicemail virus masquerading as an IRS auditor has caused havoc throughout America, garnishing an estimated eighty billion dollars in confiscatory tax withholdings into a numbered Swiss bank account' and 'a different virus is busy hijacking people's bank accounts, sending ten percent of their assets to the previous victim, then mailing itself to everyone in the current mark's address book: a self- propelled pyramid scheme in action. Oddly, nobody is complaining much…'

Our first protagonist, Manfred Macx, is a 'venture altruist'. His profession is 'essentially coming up with whacky but workable ideas and giving them to people who will make fortunes with them'. In return, Manfred never has to pay for anything, allowing him to live off the grid beyond the tyranny of money or governments.

He is contacted by what turn out to be recently uploaded brain scans of the California spiny lobster seeking asylum from human influence (it gets weirder). Manfred helps them, and in the process creates a new legal precedent on the rights of AIs and uploaded minds. Other plot points include Manfred getting divorced from his wife Pamela who keeps their daughter (frozen as a newly fertilized embryo) and a mugging in which Manfred's digital memories are stolen, causing him temporary amnesia.

Part two focuses on Macx's daughter – Amber, now in her early teens. Wishing to get away from her overbearing mother, she and Manfred hatch a complicated legal scheme. A shell company is set up in Yemen – one of the few countries to permit both limited liability companies and legal slavery. Amber then sells herself into slavery for a company which she technically owns, legally freeing herself from her mother.

On the advice of Manfred's talking robotic cat (which by this point, is secretly the smartest member of the whole family), she decides not to go live with him (he and his new partner being hedonistic swingers) and instead takes up with a new space company which is staging an expedition to Jupiter (children making better astronauts due to their smaller size – and this generation has already grown fiercely intelligent).

A few years later, in orbit around Jupiter, Amber runs into further legal trouble. She is still not 18 and Yemen is about to outlaw slavery. Meanwhile, her mother has converted to Islam. Due to a series of legal quirks, this makes Amber a Muslim as well and puts her under the influence of the local Imam – the first one of which has just arrived in Jupiter space. He begins to consider her case, but before he can come to a decision Amber enlists the help of the other members of the expedition to set up a new settlement on Jupiter's moon Amalthea and declare herself sovereign, becoming queen of the new 'Ring Imperium'.

All of this takes place so she can get away from her mother.

The story gets more and more outrageous from there. Around mid-century, the solar system begins to feel the full effects of a technological singularity. Starting with the asteroids, before moving to the inner planets, more and more mass is harvested and turned into orbiting bits of computronium. It is the beginnings of a Matrioshka brain, a giant computer network powered by the output of our home star.

A Startling Vision

The scariest part of the novel is that no matter how bizarre it gets, every action in the sequence of events seems to make basic sense given what came before. There's almost no use of 'phlebotinum' here, no mysterious warp drive or 'tri-lithium crystals' whose inner workings remain a mystery to the reader. Everything is described in intimate, logical detail. This is speculative fiction, not your typical sci-fi.

I will grant some criticisms of the novel. It was originally compiled as a series of short stories, making the plot a little jarring at times. The characters are not written in great depth, and sometimes seem as little more than blank figures Stross can use to navigate the rapidly changing world he creates. It can be rather hard to read, and the story takes a while to truly build. I noticed a fair few one-star ratings on Goodreads by people who seemed to get lost in the complex world Stross builds.

But if you're remotely interested in the theory of the singularity and how our world might dramatically change in the coming decades, 'Accelerando' is essential reading. I was born in the 1990s and consider myself a fairly rational person. Reading the novel honestly has me wondering whether we'll start to see the asteroids, Mercury and Venus being dismantled and turned into computer chips in my lifetime.

The idea of the singularity is finally starting to enter the public consciousness. This article by blogger Tim Urban goes into it in great detail. While a growing body of fiction is being devoted to it. Hollywood has been exploring (usually in very broad brushstrokes) the idea of a 'robot revolt' of some kind for quite a while, but written fiction has explored well beyond this point. Very likely, we're not talking about some coming human-machine war. We're talking about a future where AI has progressed to the point that human beings are simply obsolete. Its a very real economic reality that we're already starting to see.

Top stories

Even twenty years ago the idea of the singularity still seemed as far-fetched as the Tooth Fairy. At that point we had just seen the first AI which could beat the best human chess grand champions – now they're translating languages, driving cars and landing rockets by themselves. In another twenty or thirty years – who knows where we'll be?

There are of course, still legions of skeptics. The singularity has been described by one critic as 'intelligent design for IQ 140 people'. Maybe the whole idea is rooted in wishful thinking? Maybe, absent religion, our fear of death has refocused on the idle hope that our technology may soon allow us to break our biological limits and remain young forever?

Regardless, it seems a very real and emerging answer to the human condition – the crippling realization we all face on occasion that we are 'immortal souls trapped in an animal's body'. Either our souls go somewhere else after we die, or we simply decide to upgrade the body. The latter at least seems a testable hypothesis.

Even if the theory of the singularity is wrong, and the world in 2050 or 2100 is only as different as 1950 or 1900 is to us (meaning technology has continued to advance but humans are largely unchanged) Charles Stross paints a fascinating and, quite frankly, terrifying vision of the future. He has taken Ray Kurzweil's dry theories and created a rich story out of it, almost making you feel like you've lived through a singularity yourself and survived to tell the tale. You finish the book feeling a bit like a time traveler who's suddenly returned from the 23rd century – and may feel a sudden urge to start running around warning your friends and family about what's going to happen to the world.

To date, very few authors have dared write about a universe where us puny humans really do become just that, though Iain M. Banks would be another exception with his excellent 'Culture' series of novels.

So keep living your life of course, and keep improving yourself. Keep lifting weights, accumulating money and banging bitches, but there's a decent chance in a few decades that everything we consider meaningful will have suddenly become obsolete, like a caveman wondering why he can no longer go hunting in a paved suburb.

That’s when the adventure will really begin. To both those enthusiastic about the idea of the Singularity and highly skeptical, I recommend giving Accelerando a read to decide for yourself. You can find the full text of the novel for free here.

Read More: Charles Bukowski: Literature And Poetry For Men

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

6 Ways The Globalist Establishment Has Achieved Worldwide Supremacy

April 28, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

No one reaches power by chance. When men were pater familias, thus having power and responsibility at home, they could only reach this position after having grown beyond the boyish, parents-dependent position. Just as small children develop the ability—or power—to walk by wavering on feet, boys of before learned to be men, before a rite of passage made them so.

Those who occupy positions of power manage to keep these because they satisfy particular and, more often than not, untold conditions. Some of these may seem obvious: the strong man who can lift a lot and brawl without being at immediate risk of serious injury can also put himself in a variety of situations that scrawnier individuals will rather avoid. Other times the domination is subtler, as in the case of women toying with male desire, managing to keep men unsure but still hoping and willing to pursue them. Likewise, a particularly wealthy individual may seem obviously "powerful" when he buys what you can't, yet an opaque administration that hides who decides to pay for what and how much is far more dangerous.

This piece is about how the current elite manages to dominate us and maintain its position. A variety of factors is involved, which makes any simplistic explanation deceptive and illusory. Nonetheless, and even if they have to be smart, they are not that smart. Behind the smokescreen of "it's too complex for you" and other showbiz society deception are stuff you can find in mainstream history or personal improvement books.

1. A shrewd mindset

The globalists may be genuinely convinced they will make the world better, enjoy views of people eating other people, or both. It doesn't matter as much as one may think. What matters first and foremost is being shrewd, knowledgeable about an array of fields that matter in human life—say, money, seduction, procedures, how to build this or that—and the ability to perceive opportunities to act and seize them.

How do you become shrewd? Here we see a combination of factors: having shrewd parents or family who teach by example and being free from mental blocks that prevent realistic observation or the identification of possibility matters. Experience matters as well, but having the proper concepts and rules of thumb to make sense out of it is important, too…

I gained shrewdness by reading Robert Greene's (in?)famous 48 Laws of Power, picking up girls and looking at people less innocent than my younger self. Some become shrewd through navigating the political swamp or office politics. The most important example, though, can be found in one of the most powerful communities of our times: the Jews.

Historically, Jews were first and foremost merchants. When the Roman Empire crumbled, they already had centuries of experience in buying low, selling high, taking risks, spotting potential employees and everything else. Many rabbis have also been experts in bookkeeping. At the dawn of modernity, Jewish merchants were shrewd enough to introduce propaganda in a world where it was perceived as encroaching on your neighbour's subsistence. They could also sell used or cheaper goods for better margins, living like paupers from very low margins to sell at the cheapest price and outcompete everyone else. Then, as soon as the ghetto barriers were raised, they took over the economy, making it more abstract and global in the process.

What matters here is that Jews took over because they had spotted the opportunity to do so. They have waited for centuries, and when the Western civilization started shaking, their sly mindset allowed them to appropriate it eagerly. Today, many Jews carefully hone their semantics-and-banking edge: I remember of a banker who claimed to study the Talmud every morning for at least two hours before going to work, and the former International Monetary Fund director Dominique Strauss-Kahn—yes, the alleged maid rapist—is said to have taught his sons to pilpul while taking their breakfast.

2. Capital

Since at least the end of the eighteenth century, modernity went hand in hand with the commodification of everything. That is, everything is part of a market, has a market value, and can be traded. Political favours, deputy votes, prestige or reputation, exclusive access to opportunities, up to public attention have become transactional, any type of capital being more or less convertible into another type. Girls who manage their looks, Tinder options and career opportunities are administering their non-financial capital.

Not incidentally, the rise of "capitalism" in this extended sense went along with an escalation of crookedness. The economy has been made opaque and complicated so that we let it to unknown, shadowy bureaucrats. Money has been reduced to currency paper, coinages have been debased, major market actors often gauged the economy by either hoarding a resource or flooding everyone with it in order to increase or decrease its price.

Once again, "capitalism" is a mindset: a true capitalist can have much of his wealth confiscated and still manage to dissimulate it or get it back. Jews often did so, by entrusting Christian front men to guard it when they were under fire, or occupying particular niches or spotting opportunities to recover if they had really lost it.

The ability to manage capital supersedes it. Inert raw materials, fleeting reputations, abilities without the appropriate context, are not much per se, and will quickly flee from whoever fails to use them. Africa will never be autonomous, because it has always needed and will always need non-Africans to set its value off—Arabs trading "ebony wood", whites developing pretty much everything agricultural and industrial, and now the Chinese doing the same.

Perhaps mastering the Jewish mentality has become a necessary condition for succeeding today. Of course, mastering it does not equate with being converted into or limiting oneself to it, but rather with riding capital better than the original capitalists themselves.

3. Networks

When you are shrewd enough to spot opportunities and have something to put on the table, who will you visit? Do you know people who are "interesting" and share good values? Notice that multiculturalism, Leftist witch-hunts, and likely an individualism gone wild—too many individuals trying to take advantage from the closest neighbour—have driven trust to a historical low. Instead of showing a united front to others, whites have historically rebuffed each other more than anyone else on Earth, from the two World Wars to ideological rows. As we got alienated from a murky, rash and seemingly hopeless world, fleeing in MGTOWism was tempting… and when it meant not networking, it meant isolation, weakness, and dependence from Big State and Big Corp instead of family and friends.

The networking imperative may seem a trite. It isn't: when sensitive information, precise know-how or expensive goods are concerned, people rely on people they know and can trust. Communities succeed over individuals, whether in warfare or free markets. The most interesting investments are debated and shared among reputed individuals far from the stock exchanges, which imply the existence of a network and/or a world where reputation matters. Likewise, say you want to invest in a skyscraper under construction: the minimum investment threshold is probably beyond your wealth—yet if there were five of you knowing how to create the appropriate structure, you could pool your money and invest without getting screwed by a remote mutual funds manager.

The current elite wants us to be lonely, atomized, deprived of autonomy, forced to trade with and depend from assholes, and following fads instead of making proper choices. It is up to us to be more like the globalists and less like the globalists want us to be.

4. Institutional power

The university, media, schools, political parties, Fortune 500 corporations and many other structures are institutions as they all determine social organization, what succeeds, what fails and who is accepted or not. Heading institutions means power over society, wielding advantages and rents, promoting some while discriminating others. Far-left Jewish activists did just that: charismatic patriarchs Boas and Freud paved the way for thousands of "little grey men of the world" to erode the foundations of society and take it over by whatever power leverage they could grab.

The "long march through the institutions" is not an end in itself. The endgame of whoever takes the institutions is to mold them according to his own character or ethos. The commodification of the world, the rise of finance and "capitalism" in the wide sense, emanate from the Jews'—whether "truly Jewish" or "Jewified" through Protestantism—peculiar way of being. People with a different character tend to complain about how so many ignore honour today, or how generosity and disinterested actions get systematically exploited. Different elites relied on different institutions. But even then, remember than one elite replaces another by "swallowing" it and its needs—Jewish merchants were efficient, grand scale army suppliers and money lenders to European kings before the 1789 revolution could happen.

5. Psychological conditioning

This one has been well-researched during the twentieth century. Pavlovian associations, strategic use of symbols, subtle propaganda through “culture”, infomercials, fashions and media spins rather than overt advertisements, steering norms and deciding what is acceptable or not or what are the appropriate framings and unsaid premises. As the naive progressives were discovering new medicine or perfecting architecture, more cunning ones were working on the dark arts of psychology. This is how we got the blue pill conditioning, as well as the always-criticize-the-right, save-a-ho or holiness-lies-in-leftism outlooks.

Why is being conservative a taboo? Why is it “normal” to use negative stereotypes about conservatism? Why do women and liberals have a right to put people into a hierarchy as they want while still yelling about “equality”? None of these is logical or obvious. All of these are a product of the conditioning we had under the guise of education or (post-60s) normality.

Of course, freeing ourselves from leftist, anti-white, anti-male, anti-Western conditionings does not mean rejecting all conditionings: the majority will always need some Brahmans to give them values and a proper outlook. Autonomy is a path for the few who can assume the responsibilities going along with it. Thus, even if we manage to grasp the world beyond semantic frames and smokescreens, ideals like neomasculinity, sovereignty, a complete and truthful anthropology, or a strong middle class should provide new premises and landmarks.

6. Peculiar stuff

All the above are, I think, the fundamental and necessary trunk of how to take over—as they did it and as we could do. Here are some shorter-lived points that they pushed forward according to their particular character and interests. I do not see us replicating these. Rather, the following should be undone, yet they still appear as clear power moves once we got used to look at these like that:

- Distorting people's desires: replacing the quest for virtue, masculinity, holiness… with lust and material desires
- Replacing rooted identities with notions of class or abstract individual identities
- Emphasizing fashions, cultural volatility, thus giving themselves more opportunities to reshape culture
- Displacing people into cities, either by the lure of a "better life" or by altering agriculture, so that they lose touch with nature, become dependent from international trade and live in a world of artificial constructions and appearances
- Turning the political power and private companies into managed Big State and Big Corp, that in turn start meddling more and more with personal life, to the point of destroying families
- Splitting society into antagonistic groups—Marx was doing it rudimentarily, today "minority"-makers are doing the same much more efficiently
- Limiting official debates through a dialectic between controlled viewpoints, so that any actual third way fades away from public discussion

And how do they undo themselves?

Of course, they are not exempt from defects, and the more they lose control, the more their shortcomings become apparent. In a nutshell, I would say an elite is at risk of undoing itself when it lets itself go to arrogance, hubris and greed.

Arrogance blinds them to reality, thus undoing what shrewdness had realized and unveiling a haughtiness that everyone resents. The still powerful has shown a lot of it lately: in the US, and now in France, they absolutely insist to impose their favourite puppet candidate at the expense of other less favorite but better equipped sellouts, and their media feverishly run idle. Likewise, SJWs keep doubling down and lecturing us even when they are caught red-handed into lying or manipulating, which makes them quite irritating even to the average blue pilled.

Their power plays also tend to turn against them, as those whom they promoted become their enemies—from the Muslim brotherhood to anti-white activists, or Trump, the seeming buffoon who managed to outsmart the whole establishment.

Expose them, discredit them, make yourself independent and crafty, and if we manage to do it well, their oversized Babel towers and "All-Seeing Eye" will burn in Agni's rekindled fires.

Read Next: Does The Hollywood Elite Use Rituals And Sexual Blackmail To Keep Its Stars In Line?

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

“Frank And Lola” Shows A Portrait Of The Modern American Woman That We Know All Too Well

April 28, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

First, let me say that this film is no masterpiece; it is an enjoyable Hollywood film made in the Current Year, of which there are very few, and it displays male and female behavior honestly, which is astounding, and is well acted. Of course, being a mainstream Hollywood film, it has its flaws. But I found a rather compelling story here in how it represented the typical American woman that we all have to deal with.

Michael Shannon plays Frank, a middle aged chef in France who is in a new relationship with the young and impulsive Lola. Amongst a fury of red flags, we see a relationship start, falter, and crumble. But Frank’s bad judgment expands what should be a 20 minute film version of a ROK game article into a full length film.

Lola, well acted by the ridiculously named Imogen Poots (who appears topless), is your typical early 20s girl, and has the baggage one would expect of a single, attractive American student able to afford transatlantic travel with no apparent source of income.

Frank is the most interesting character. The film begins on a first date, as Frank makes a remark about how quickly he was able to bed Lola, and seems a bit disappointed that he’ll have to put this new girl in the bang-and-release category.

Signs This Ain’t Her First Rodeo

In this common purple pill scenario, Frank says, “Hey, maybe we should wait,” to which Lola laughs and asks “Wait for what?” “Until the next time we see each other,” replies Frank. Lola honestly can’t imagine a reason to delay gratification, and finds the question itself laughable. She’s never stopped herself from having sex with guys she’s just met before, and it would be absurd to start now.

Is This All She Can Offer?

Frank is at the point in life where many men are seriously considering marriage. “I’m not playing games,” Frank says, in bed with the topless Lola. Whether Frank has some naïve image of Lola as a sweet, innocent, honest girl, or he’s simply tired of endless one night stands that don’t go anywhere, he’s clearly a bit frustrated with Lola’s childish response “Well, sometimes, games can be fun.”

Cuts like a knife, but it feels so right, na na na, na na na na na

For a moment, it appears the mood is spoiled, and Frank may lose out completely, as Lola's emotions change like the wind and she agrees they should just wait, and that's a great idea. Until a few moments later when her mood changes again, as she likely thinks about the last rough sex she had with a stranger, and she adds, "Or maybe you could hold me down while you do it."

Red Flag No. 1 Porn Star Sex on the First Date

Rough sex with a girl you just met is a sign of poor judgment and a long sexual history. The first time I pushed things with a girl I met just a couple of hours earlier, I was shocked at what I could get away with. Choking, slapping, calling you daddy, spanking, no-limits dirty talk, all of this is not only possible, but fairly common on first date bangs these days. This should have been a signal that the girl had an expiration date of lunchtime tomorrow, yet just 10 minutes into the film we are at red flag #2.

2. Birds Of A Feather

Frank meets Lola's mom, who wears a low-cut top revealing most of her breasts, as she orders tequila shots for the table. The shameless mom openly flirts with Frank in front of Lola, asking him when he started cooking. "Young? How young. 16? Mmmm that's quite an image." Of course, we'll ignore the fact that any late 50s man who made a remark about a teenage girl his son was dating would be seen as "creepy" and "rapey", and just point out that this is a huge red flag, and Frank should have cut things off immediately after this meeting. There's no mention of any father, of course, and every indication that Lola is following in the footsteps of her mother.

3. Openly Drinking and Flirting With A Douchebag

Your boyfriend's a scrow!

Lola graduates college. One night after work, Frank walks over to a bar to meet her for a drink. He finds her drinking with a rich, sleazy smooth talker (Dr. Lexus from Idiocracy) who offers her a job. Women, despite their vaunted high emotional intelligence, never seem to pick up on the absurdity of a stranger wanting to offer a college graduate with no real world skills a job opportunity, without any ulterior motives. Frank immediately calls her on it, but again, the relationship is not ended. If your girl is flirting and drinking with another guy, and they exchange contact info, that is game over.

4. Getting Favors From Another Man

Frank comes home to hear Lola excitedly asking someone out for drinks on the phone. It turns out this is for her new job that the douchebag offered her. One thing that makes the film so engaging is the attention to detail. Realistic tiny lies and manipulations are built in to every scene. There are the all-too-common little word games that women will play like when Lola claims, “Oh, no I’m not working for that douchebag, it’s for this woman.” When pressed further she finally admits he owns the company, which she would have never volunteered because, hey, “He doesn’t work there!”

5. Friendly And Well Known By Men

When one of the kitchen staff immediately recognizes her as “Lolita” and gives her a kiss on the cheek, Frank just blows it off, but she’s clearly banged the dishwasher. There’s also a point where another man calls Frank from Lola’s phone. When other men have nicknames and unexplained histories with your girl, she should no longer be your girl.

6. Accidental Sex

One night Lola shows up late in tears, and she’s really sorry, but she made a mistake and totally didn’t mean to fuck this other guy but stuff happened and feelings! This is a powerful scene for Frank. He’s a complex character because he’s obviously showing terrible judgment in keeping this girl around, but here he manages to have strong frame, keeps calm, speaks slowly and deliberately, and even cooly states “Oh yeah, that hotel? I used to pick up cougars there who really taught me how to fuck, so I like that place.”

He tells her he has fucked a lot of beautiful women, and mature ones that aren’t afraid their mommy is going to steal him away from them. He cooly calls her out as the kind of weak slut that can't be without a man for more than 24 hours, then he walks out the fucking door and I'm ready to applaud and go home, but we are only 25 minutes into the movie, and Frank just can't let it go.

7. The Unreported Rape Allegation

I'm so sorry you cheated on me baby, I know you didn't mean it!

Frank comes back because he wants to know the truth, have closure, know what really happened, and all those other pointless answers that blue pill men need. The script, while not boring, is rather rote, and in this respect very honest in terms of the modern woman and her nature. I wasn't surprised at all when Lola comes out with the sob story that she was raped by her mom's boyfriend, and that's what drove her to have sex with a stranger and cheat on Frank.

Of course, she's "never told anyone this," not even her mom. I've had several women that I hadn't known long tell me rape stories that supposedly no one knows about but for some reason she's telling Max all about it after two beers.

Frank believes every word of the story, without evidence, and develops one-itis for this girl who has little to offer other than a nice body. The story gets a bit extreme at times, but the true value in this film is its honest portrayal of female dynamics, and the uncomfortable, painful, but honest portrayal of the beta male.

Great, Subtle Acting

Michael Shannon has an ability to convey considerable emotion from small eye movements and body language. There were several scenes where you could observe him react to the bullshit he was hearing from Lola, his eyes narrowing a mere millimeter as he reacts to the lies and explanations and stories he's hearing, but yet his heart somehow gets the best of him and tells him to hang in there and protect this woman. Of course, that is the nature of man, to protect and provide for women, but it is nevertheless painful to watch Lola manipulate him.

I wish I had seen this film in the theater, as I found myself laughing out loud at what the general movie-going audience would consider very inappropriate points such as…

> I didn't have any intention of fucking him. I think I just kind of shut down and it happened.

The final shot includes one last manipulation by Lola. There's nothing groundbreaking here, but it's definitely the type of film that can help wake up brainwashed men struggling to maintain unhealthy relationships with damaged women, and it's a breath of fresh air to see a woman portrayed realistically and not slaying dragons and kicking ass while earning 4 PhDs online and running a Fortune 500 startup and publishing a book on French poetry.

The moral of this story is two-fold. First, women are like Lola, and second, don't be like Frank.

Read More: Portrait Of A Modern Career Woman

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

4 Reasons You Should Make A Trip To The Country Of Georgia

April 28, 2017 | by Nicholas Strelka | Link | Original Link

Georgia and The Caucasus are still quite an unknown travel destination, but are slowly beginning to gain more recognition as more and more tourists make their way to this up and coming destination. Untouched nature, wine and cuisine that rivals the likes of Italian, Spanish, and French cuisine, along with a large population of young women who still have their femininity intact are only a few of the reasons Georgia tops the charts. Below are the top reasons why you should include Georgia in your next travel itinerary:

1. Costs Of Living Remains Low

After the collapse of the Soviet Union, Georgia's GDP fell sharply, as with the rest of the FSU countries. Recovery started in the early 2000's, and GDP has continue to grow each year since economic reforms have been brought in to place. Prices for goods inside of Georgia's capital, Tbilisi, remain low for foreigners, and monthly rentals with great logistics can be had for only a few hundred dollars per month.

Local markets offer fresh produce at extremely low prices, and fresh local baked goods such as chachapuri (fresh bread with cheese baked inside) can be had a euro or less. There are a few large supermarkets that will contain many products imported from Germany and Europe, and of course since Russia is its largest trade partner, you won't have any issue finding imported goods from The Motherland.

Once you get outside of the capital, prices are even cheaper, and taxis can be rented to drive long distances for as cheap as $40 to $50 a day (roughly 460km – 300mi miles), depending on your bargaining skills. Public transportation is even cheaper, and you can the true local experience by jumping in a marshutka (public van) and drive long distances for as cheap as a few dollars per ride.

Overall, you don't even need to really watch your wallet too much while in Georgia. It's pretty easy to keep spending low, while seeing the country and taking everything in it has to offer.

2. A Variety Of Vast And Untouched Nature

Georgian nature is some of the most raw and pristine that you will find left on earth. In the West you'll have access to the Black Sea by visiting Batumi and other close cities. This is a great summer spot, where Georgian, Russians and other tourists flock to bask in the warm summer sun, swim in the warm sea, and take part in local festivals and music events that take place.

In the North and the East, you'll find very mountainous regions to hike and explore, with cathedrals spread throughout dating back to as early as the 6th century. Visiting the Georgian Military highway along with hiking or driving to the top of Kazbegi, combined with a tour of the Tusheti region compares to no other trip you can take. Tbilisi itself boasts unique architecture that you will not find in any other place in the world, combined with excellent and easy to reach mountaintop views via the cities funicular (going back to price—less than $1 roundtrip!).

In the South, you have access to both Armenia and Azerbaijan where your exploration of The Caucasus can continue.

3. Traditional Women And Family Values Are Alive And Well

Over 80 percent of the Georgian population practices Eastern Orthodox Christianity. The women of Georgia are very traditional in their thinking, in that they want to raise a family, cook, clean and take care of their man—the same thinking that you will find throughout all of the FSU countries. It’s not uncommon for women in their mid to late twenties to still live at home with their family, only to move out once they get married.

Overall, the women are much more casually dressed when compared to other countries located in the Caucasus, especially in comparison with Armenia. Public affection in the form of kissing and hand holding doesn’t seem to be all that big, and you’ll normally find local parks loaded up with young couples hiding under the private coverage of foliage, being more intimate with one another.

Ratios in the nightclubs are generally not great, and those are not the type of women you’ll most likely be after in most cases anyway. Day game is the way to go, especially in Tbilisi, and most women have probably never been approached before in their lives. Younger generations are quite educated, interested in Western culture somewhat and can speak some English, while still maintaining their traditional values. The women of Georgia are most definitely more geared towards LTRs, making Georgia a great location to find quality women who have the highly sought after traditional mindset.

4. Food And Wine That Rivals Western Countries

Georgia is the oldest wine making country in the world, and its production dates back as far as 8,000 years. Georgians take a deep pride in their wine production, and a tasting of the many varieties of grapes that each region offers is a must. Tbilisi offers a selection of wine bars, offering wines from all over the country including hard to get bottles from smaller wineries. The best way to experience Georgian wine is to either get invited to a Georgian’s home and experience homemade wine along with a supra (literally meaning feast), or stop along your way while driving throughout the country to visit one of the many small roadside huts offering tastings and the option to purchase wine to go.

To go with the wine, Georgians have an extensive cuisines that focuses around baked goods as well as meat dishes paired with different herbs and spices. Being located at the crossroads of the ancient trade routes between the East and the West, Georgian cuisine takes a large influence from both spheres of the world. Walnuts, pomegranates, kidney beans, and cilantro are all staples that are blended in to the local dishes. Khachapuri Adjaruli (baked dough with a large stick of butter and an egg on top), Khinkhali (dumplings with meat, mushrooms, cheese, among other varieties), and Kharcho (a stew, with beef falling off the bone, combined with cilantro) are just a few of the many choices you'll have.

The food is hearty, original, and will leave you coming back for more. Really, there's not much of a reason to even cook at home while in Georgia, with the selection of great food at hand and the relatively cheap prices to boot.

Conclusion

Georgia is a combination of many unique factors that are hard to find in today's world. The strong culture, nature and feminine women are a strong selling point for visiting this former Soviet republic, and are certainly the reasons that keep me coming back for more.

Read More: 5 Things I Learned After My First Trip To Japan

Nicholas Strelka
A location-independent expat, with vast experience in adventure trip planning and the dating marketplace in both Central and Eastern Europe. Keen on travelling off the beaten track, strongly passionate about entrepreneurship, and improving the lives of others. For more on international dating and travel adventure, check out The Masculine Traveler

6 Myths About Human Psychology That Most People Believe

April 29, 2017 | by Mark Derian | Link | Original Link

Psychology as a field was planted by the broken philosophy of the 19th century, and now it grows through a broken system of grants and tenure. As such, it perpetuates myths that psychologists neither see nor care to see. Here are six of them:

1. Impulsiveness needs an outlet

This myth permeates one of the greatest genres to grace the silver screen—buddy cop movies. If the uptight member of the duo doesn't learn to loosen up and be more impulsive like the fun one, then he's headed for an early grave of suppressed stress. Yet impulsiveness, or acting without thinking, doesn't relieve stress, it increases stress.

Like obsessive thoughts or compulsive behaviors, impulsiveness is an avoidant behavior in that it's a distraction from the pain of latent anxiety. Avoidance only makes the anxiety worse because when we avoid anxiety it confirms in our mind the possible threat of the anxiety. The suppressed archetype and the impulsive archetype are two sides of the same coin—both represent an immature way of managing anxiety.

2. A single, traumatic event in childhood causes neuroses in adulthood

It's possible that a traumatic event can shape our lives, but it's rarely one event. And if we can pinpoint one event, it's not the event but how our family and friends reacted to the supposed cataclysm. Let's say our twin brother died when we were in grade school. If we're still subconsciously, negatively influenced by this years later, it's not because of Billy's death but how our mother became grief-stricken and unemotional. Trauma is often diffused over many years. It comes from a long series or either abandonment or indulgences—either too little attention or too much—as a result of the alleged trauma. Single, inciting incidents make for a great story to tell ourselves, but they are seldom more than a scapegoat for insecure attachments.

3. Uncovering the cause of a neurosis cures the neurosis

It makes for a Hitchcockian plot when a man delves deep in his subconscious to figure out the root of his behavior, understands the cause, and in an instant is able to move on with a new sense of psychological freedom. Except real life doesn't make for an economical hero's journey. If we have an anxiety disorder, there's rarely one cause but even if there is only one cause, uncovering what it is does little to lessen the anxiety. We may see the tin can from which the worms have crawled, but this doesn't clean up the worms. Until we do the work no one wants to do by confronting our perceived threats—which usually involve parental relationships—no single "aha" moment will make much of a difference.

4. Victim blaming blames the victim

I'm probably preaching to the choir here, but it's worth repeating: "Victim blaming" is a phrase that inhibits more clear thought than a political rally. No one has ever blamed the victim—not in the West and not in the past three centuries. "Victim blaming" merely lets a victim know his part in perpetuating his circumstances. It's called being a responsible adult by uncovering increasingly expansive layers of awareness, which has nothing to do with blaming anyone.

5. We can replace bad habits with good habits

An idea—or hope, rather—that became popular during the mid 20th Century, with the rise of cognitive psychology, is we can merely exchange a bad habit by partaking in a good habit instead. It's the rationale behind replacing negative thoughts with positive thoughts, or chewing gum instead of smoking. This only works if the good habit diminishes the psychological issue that causes the bad habit. Attending a 12-step meeting instead of drinking could take the rage out of our alcoholism if the relationships formed in the meeting relieve the anxiety that caused the drinking. But the bad habit cannot simply be covered up or retrained. Whatever is causing the bad habit must first be managed on its own, which creates a space for a good habit to fill, potentially.

6. Reason and emotion are inherently at odds

These are two different modes of processing information and evaluating the world, but this doesn't mean they're inherently at odds. They can be at odds, and they are in most people, but this doesn't mean it's necessarily so. Our emotions are approximate insights based on our many beliefs and perceptions about us and the world. These beliefs and perceptions that undergird the emotion may be correct, but when they're incorrect, then they will contradict reason.

We may know rationally it's good to leave our girlfriend because she became fat, but we may not feel like it's the right thing emotionally because back of our emotion is the belief that we don't deserve to have a girlfriend who takes care of herself. When we have a conflict between our reason and emotions, let's not take that as a sign we're inherently flawed as men but rather that we're flawed as a man. Instead of stewing in our supposed helplessness, let's take on the responsibility of understanding the source of our inner conflicts.

Conclusion

The myths presented here represent only a few of the issues with psychology. To fix the field, we need to correct them all. But to fix our psychology, correcting even one of these errors sets us up for a life of ease and success.

Read More: Are You On A Treadmill Of Materialism That Goes Nowhere?

Mark Derian
Mark Derian is a graduate student in psychology. follow him on Twitter

The Ancient Egyptian Story That Planted The Seed Of "Social Justice"

April 29, 2017 | by Narmer Bull | Link | Original Link

History has weaved great men into our lives and we do our best to imitate them when circumstance requires us to do so. The Social Justice Warrior (SJW) also imitates an ancient form. Regardless of what we define as intellectual, moral and technological progress the official political protest seems to be an atavism. But when, where and why did the SJW first make use of his method for achieving affluence and power? Is victim-hood a high virtue or praiseworthy method? And what is the limitation of this method?

A model figure to direct a man rightly on the ways of life and make him prosper on earth.

The original victim of the higher-born

The Tale of the Eloquent Peasant is a story of social justice thought to have been composed in Middle Kingdom Ancient Egypt, around the Twelfth Dynasty (1991 – 1783 BC). It is significant for one reason: it marks civilized man's first awakening to social justice. A peasant named Khun-Anup lives with his family on the fringes of Egyptian high society making a meager living trading salt, an important commodity, thus he holds himself and his work in high esteem. Occasionally he travels to the more affluent parts of Egypt to trade his product.

In order to do this, he must pass the estates which are owned by nobles and managed by overseers. Since the land is private, he respectfully uses a path between the river and the cultivated fields. A typically middle class estate manager has an irrational prejudice against Khun-Anup. He covers the path, forcing the peasant to commit a crime against the noble by passing through the fields.

When Khun-Anup does this, his donkey eats some of the grain, amounting to theft. This is reason enough for the overseer to impound the peasant's donkey and goods, as well as have him beaten. The higher-born overseer taunts and teases the peasant, insisting that nobody will hear his complaint about this treatment as injustices of this sort are a regular occurrence between the classes.

A degrading and repetitive method

Khun-Anup holds a grudge and vows that he will be heard by a superior. Through eloquent speech he makes his case. He manages to get the ear of the noble (basically he loiters around the private property shouting his protest every time the noble passes) and by appeal to his humanity and sense of fairness Khun-Anup wins him over. The noble however, has his own agenda and wants to win the favour of the Pharaoh.

He informs the Egyptian king about this eloquent peasant and the two collude to make Khun-Anup continue protesting by denying him his justice. Each time the peasant protests he is denied in order to have him improve the quality of his argument. Each protest is recorded by a scribe and heard by the king. This is done nine times with each protest a more convincing complaint about mistreatment and disadvantage against privilege and entitlement. In the end the peasant is pardoned, he gets his restitution and most significantly, he is elevated to the position of overseer while the unjust overseer himself becomes a peasant.

Circumstance and cosmic justice

What needs to be understood about circumstance in this case is that the Middle Kingdom was a period of reunification of the state, after having suffered from civil wars caused by the democratization of power. The kings of this period needed to cultivate loyalty to the central political authority, and since there was never any set of codified laws laid out to govern social behaviour in ancient Egypt, people enjoyed a freedom quite unique for the world at that time. Social justice therefore was based on a religious belief in cosmic or universal justice called maat , which was maintained by the divine Egyptian king.

Good speech is a hidden gem.

Equal and interchangeable

So what can we learn from this ancient parallel in order to gain some depth of knowledge regarding the contemporary SJW issue? First, it was reasoned that a political solution is required for any trivial infringement of personal rights, even when those personal rights do not exist. The implication here is that the central authority, government or pharaoh enjoys omnipotent power. Middle management simply doing their job protecting the interests of their superiors in a private matter is not exempt from central power goals and as far as the highest office in the state is concerned, the peasant and the overseer are completely interchangeable—or absolutely equal.

Second, regarding the psychology of the SJW, the outcome of the tale suggests that the goal was always the acquisition of individual power and wealth. Khun-Anup always had a self-important disposition through his commodity. What he eventually showed he wanted was the privileged position of the overseer and to witness the downfall of the one he thought privileged.

Third is the matter of virtue. Nine episodes of improving an argument of victim-hood and unjust treatment made the peasant progressively more qualified to take the overseers position, without the overseer getting a chance at self-defense. During the period of political protest and improved complaining the peasant’s family was compensated by the central authority for his absence. So his aspiration to be the supreme victim certainly was profitable, and subsequently can be deemed a lofty virtue by a specifically predisposed individual.

The rich man of last year will be the vagabond of this year.

The divinity of political authority

Khun-Anup had no other option but to continuously debase himself. There was no social mobility in his society, his only chance to achieve affluence and power was to persistently complain about injustice. In our society central government is not divine and certainly can't rearrange the universal order to move a protester from poverty to power. The significant limitation is on the part of the political authority so pointing accusing fingers at historical villains can't work because it only serves to further delegitimize the political role.

Conclusion

Thousands of years after the initial rise, we should have evolved beyond this enchanted idea of justice. When we aim to imitate ancient successes and rival the achievements of famous men we are not compelled to be the most eloquent vulnerable victim. Feeling included in a trend or movement may be one of life's great joys, but consider the ancient form you are imitating and the type of character you want to weave into the lives of future generations.

Read the entire tale in: Lichtheim, M 1973. Ancient Egyptian Literature Volume 1: The Old and Middle Kingdoms. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Read More: The Most Important Way You Can Fight The "Social Justice" Collective

Narmer Bull
A coloured South African, and student of the ancient near east.

How Robert Cialdini's Book "Pre-Suasion" Improved My Game

April 30, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Countless words have been written about the role of attention whoring in the game today. While this is considerable, it's worth paying attention to the concept of attention itself. Specifically, it's worth noting how you can use it to your advantage. Channeling your attention correctly is perhaps the most powerful thing you can do, especially for your inner game.

For starters, the brain evolved to place extreme importance on those things it focuses on. Robert Cialdini, the "Godfather of Influence," says in his new book Pre-Suasion:

> Why do we typically assume that whatever we are focusing on in the moment is especially important? One reason is that whatever we are focusing on is especially important in the moment. It's only reasonable to give heightened attention to those factors that have the most significance and utility for us in a particular situation: a strange noise in the dark, the smell of smoke in a theater, a CEO standing to speak.
>
> This sensible system of focusing our limited attention resources on what does indeed possess special import has an imperfection, though: we can be brought to the mistaken belief that something is important merely because we have been led by some irrelevant factor to give it our narrowed attention. All too often, people believe that if they have paid attention to an idea or event or group, it must be important enough to warrant the consideration. That's not true.

This is something known as the “focusing illusion.” Being aware of and compensating for this can make you a lot more confident, productive, and resilient. Though I’ve stumbled onto this in my experiences, Cialdini’s words crystallized them for me, making the distillation of experience into a productive system possible. Here are a few things I’ve learned about channeling attention to maximize your life and for our purposes, your game. Specifically, I’m going to talk about approaching in this column.

The Approach

For starters, I don’t rate girls on the 1-10 scale. It always seemed like a roundabout, unnecessary exercise to me, but more important than that, it might actively harm you. Why? Because rating a girl on the scale puts your focus on that rating. In Pre-Suasion’s second chapter, Cialdini discusses the concept of “target chuting.”

Suppose, for instance, that I have the thankless job of trying to get your signature and information for something on the street. You know how this goes, you almost never stop. Yet, that’s often because the people vying for your time are priming you in the wrong way. One group of people I encounter a lot in my neighborhood (by the nearby campus, of course) asks me “do you have time for LGBT rights?” Note the value-taking opener here. But, what if they were to ask me if “I was a helpful person?” Cialdini shows us that this is what a couple of communication scientists did when experimenting to see what lines of questioning to get people to stop and comply with survey requests in a mall. They found that asking their prospects: “do you consider yourself a helpful person?” resulted in 77% of the people they asked stopping and cooperating with them.

Why was this? The answer is that the scientists elevated attention to the concept of being helpful instead of asking for their prospects’ precious time. Most people want to think of themselves as helpful, and most people will have memories of being helpful. In effect, by asking the question, you've sent your prospect down a targeted "chute" and focused on that person's experiences. In this moment, that person will be much more receptive to aligned requests (in this case, helping out with a survey or even giving out personal information), hence the title Pre-Suasion.

That was an admittedly roundabout explanation of "target chuting," but there you have it. Getting back to my decision not to rate girls on the 10 scale, you might now see why. By rating, you elevate your attention (and thus the perceived importance) to that rating, rather than your own game or more helpful cues in the environment, and by doing so, you've gone down a chute that isn't really focused on your purpose. You may begin to grow anxious, pumping yourself with worry because you're "approaching a 9." That isn't to say that some girls aren't hotter or much hotter than others of course, but I try to focus my attention on those things that can assist my game, rather than, at best, present me with redundancies.

Generally speaking, half the game is overcoming your anxieties with women. Having too many things to focus on will tend to increase those anxieties. The more things you have to think about, the more imaginary fears you can create as a result of them, and now elevated in your attention, you assign undue importance to them. That's why I try to take an approach that's focused as narrowly as possible.

But now that we've focused on something that I don't think you shouldn't focus on, what are those things that you should to make yourself more formidable?

I first look for signs that she's receptive to an approach. I'm a big believer in proper target selection, so, aside from her actually being a girl I desire, that's what I pay attention to first. I never had the inclination to mass approach, though in some ways that style is better suited to the "channeled attention" system, as Cialdini might call it, because approaching any girl gives you one thing less to think about. Nevertheless, those indicators of receptivity are generally reliable, and my mass approacher friends have as many blow offs as hooks, so I focus on receptivity first.

Once you've established that you want her and you think she's receptive, you must stop everything you're doing and move toward her immediately. If you pay attention to anything else, you're likely to lose the approach.

Something odd developed after my initial phase in the game where I was ecstatic at overcoming my approach anxiety. My approach rate slowed. It's not necessarily that there was less girls I was interested in, it's just that I wasn't following through as often, for reasons that were often more indifference than fear. Why?

As it turns out, after that initial period of excitement created by doing something I never thought I could do before, I began to realize that I actually got more work done outside than inside. It was an environment that allowed me to focus more. So I started going outside to read good books and get more writing projects done. Day game wasn't my sole focus anymore. Lo and behold, my attention was thus divided. With two things competing for it, I would more often take the path of least resistance. When I understood this, I began to put a higher priority on approaching girls I was genuinely attracted to. When I saw a girl I liked, I would put my stuff down and focus only on her, what I liked about her, and putting one foot in front of the other. This ordering or sorting of my attention solved for this.

Understand that people can only focus on one thing at a time. Multitasking doesn't exist. To maximize your productivity, you have to make sure to sort and narrow the tasks before you. When it comes to approaching, your focus should be channeled as much as possible on your girl and nothing else.

The simple system can go like this:

1. Do you want her or not? As Troy said in his excellent article, if she tugs your DNA, the answer is yes.
2. Does she look receptive?
3. Stop everything else you're doing or even thinking except conjuring your opener and putting one foot in front of the other. The only exception to this is if for some reason you can't approach at that moment.

There are many more applications to this Pre-Suasion channeled attention approach to your game that I intended on going into (particularly its applicability in opening, conversation, and texting), but I'm butted up against my limits. Look for more to come.

Read More: How To Meet And Date Mormon Girls

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

5 Mysterious Workout Devices You May Have Encountered In The Gym

April 30, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Many fitness acolytes, after getting good results in the first few months of their training, will seek the use of new exercises and equipments to gain a competitive edge over their fellow gym goers. Or alternatively, some of our younger readers have gone foraging through the storage rooms of their high school gymnasiums seeking that some goal. Either way, at some point in a physical culturist's "career", they'll find many mysterious exercise devices that are completely obtuse to them, boggling the mind as to how they are supposed to be used, and for what purpose.

You likely don't need me to tell you this, but the majority of exercise devices that are out on the market today are completely worthless—in fact I have told you that! However, there are a few devices that are somewhat obscure and rarely used, but are great tools for your strength, endurance, and flexibility training, tools that without exception are 100 years old at their youngest and that have sadly been forgotten by the masses for a variety of completely inane reasons (marketing, for the most part, but we here at Return of Kings are already against consumer culture so marketing has no effect upon me). And so without further ado…

1. The Swedish Ladder

Most likely a device that you've seen bolted to the back wall of your high school gym class, the Swedish ladder at first glance seems to be more akin to some sort of torture device than a piece of exercise equipment (insert hacky joke about “derp all exercise is a torture device” here). And indeed, upon trying it, it doesn’t seem to be useful for much more than using it in the manner of a ladder.

However, a bit of ingenuity will show that it is useful for any calisthenic exercise that requires some degree of verticality. You can put your stomach to the bar to stretch your back, or put your back to the bars to do pull-ups and L-Sits. The regular gradations of the rungs make it a must for graduated stretches such as the wushu stretchkick and belly-to-wall handstands, and it can also be used in training free-hanging exercises such as the back lever and the human flag.

2. Indian Clubs

For better or for worse associated with the Gilded Age, they are, as the name implies, an import from the subcontinent. Essentially, they are a dumbbell that is stretched out, forcing the wrists and shoulders to act as a lever to support the weight. In practice, this make the shield casts and other exercises you do with the clubs much more difficult than they would be with a standard dumbbell.

There are a variety of exercises that are done solely with the Indian club, and all of them are great ways to build strength and joint health in the upper body (and will be the subject of articles should I ever get my hands on a set). I personally like them more than kettlebells, which is unfortunate because the latter are much more prevalent. Should you find a set of Indian clubs, be sure to use them.

3. Medicine Balls

Let's make something clear: I am NOT referring to the big bouncy inflatable "Exercise balls" that middle aged ladies use to exercise. Instead, I'm talking about the medicine ball, a ball that weighs anywhere between 2-50 pounds and can be used for a variety of purposes, ranging from an unstable support for transitional calisthenic progressions, to tossing and catching it off the wall to train the chest and abdominal muscles to brace for impact. It can also be used as a weight in moves such as the weighted sit-up, should you not want to risk damaging your floor.

This piece of equipment has been around for the better part of three millennia, and has served all from gladiators to the 19th century pioneers of physical culture. It would be worth adding to your repertoire.

4. Gymnastic Rings

Most people probably have some sort of conception of how these work, if only from watching the Olympics every four years. However, the lay person can use these difficult, but rewarding, tools for their own fitness.

The mere act of doing standard calisthenic exercises (L-Sit, pull-up, etc.) is made exponentially more difficult by the act of doing these on the unstable surface of the rings. And the open space between the rings facilitates more complex maneuvers like the ring handstand, which leads to even more difficult calisthenic techniques like the ring handstand pushup, all of which train the entire body to an enormous degree and eventually lead one to the monstrously difficult maneuvers such as the iron cross.

5. Parallettes

Likely the simplest of these obscure workout devices, the parallettes are merely a bar and platform placed on the floor. However, they are integral to gymnastics training due to elevating the body off the floor, making them an essential for l-sits, v-sits, true handstand pushups (the elevation allows you to dip deeper than you would off the floor), and other maneuvers. Boxes or chairs can be substituted for these, although grasping the bar does work different hand and forearm muscles than a flat hand.

So the next time you see one of these, give them a try, it just might give you that edge you’re looking for.

Read More: 5 Pre-Workout Tips For Consistently Better Workouts

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

You Must Be Prepared To Die For The Fourth Amendment

May 1, 2017 | by FitzRoy Sommerset | Link | Original Link

We live in a digital age of mass surveillance. This should come as no surprise to any of the red-pilled readership here at Return of Kings. From Edward Snowden's revelations about the National Security Agency's metadata gathering program to cameras on every street corner, it is very easy to lose sight of what is truly important in this national debate: All arguments, debates and discussions boil down to one question:

Are you prepared to die for the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States?

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The Fourth Amendment has been interpreted as a right to privacy, and has its origins in English Law whereas there were certain places that the King could not go. "A man's home is his castle" as was found in English legal texts dating to the 17th century.

In this age of the threat of terrorism, certain liberties are under siege by many well-meaning individuals and policymakers. Many (if not most) have the usually-laudable goal of preventing people from dying in terrorist attacks. Some (probably a minority) support mass surveillance to further dishonorable means. I can respect those individuals who are truly well-meaning, even if they are wrong.

They are wrong because the Fourth Amendment is very important, and worth risking our lives for. Sacrificing the Fourth Amendment upon the altar of saving our lives is the wrong choice: Benjamin Franklin put it perfectly when he said, “Those who would sacrifice freedom for security deserve neither.”

South Park, Hypocrisy and the Great River

Americans, since their beginning in 1775, have always made lofty statements about their rights. However, making lofty statements is easy: defending those rights is difficult, and men could die. Although I am well-known for my theoretical support for Great Britain in the American Revolution (were I alive in 1775), I have the utmost respect for those Founding Fathers who not only made lofty statements about individual rights, but were also willing to sacrifice their lives to protect/preserve them. I have little to no respect for any man who claims to believe in something, yet retreats as a coward when facing adversity in defending those beliefs.

There was a controversy a few years ago regarding an episode of South Park where an image of Mohammed was to be shown. Although Trey Parker and Matt Stone fought hard to have the image of Mohammed included in the episode, Comedy Central censored the poorly-animated image of Mohammed out. In a deliberate irony, Parker and Stone called out the cowardice of Comedy Central in the very same episode: The character Stephen Stoch (Butter’s father) gives a South Park soliloquy on the difference between believing in something and merely giving lip service.

For those that watch South Park, Butter’s dad had the unusual role of giving the episode’s political message.

In short, if you are willing to risk death for yourself and your children in a terrorist attack to preserve the Fourth Amendment, I laud you as an intellectually honest individual who truly believes in the concept of privacy. I do this in a way similar to how Roosh respects all men who risk humiliation and actually attempt to have sex with attractive women.

But if you support dismantling the National Security Agency’s metadata program, but would re-instate it if your own life, or the lives of your children, were at stake then I must brand you a coward and hypocrite. Supporting true civil liberties (not in the way SJW’s think of them) is hard: standing up for your rights can get you killed. Horribly. In a hail of rusty nails and ball bearings.

Is Nothing Worth Dying For?

In 1964, a man named Ronald Reagan gave a speech at the Republican National Convention titled “A Time for Choosing.” Aptly named, future-President Reagan would put the following to the American people:

> If nothing in life is worth dying for, when did this begin — just in the face of this enemy (communism)? Or should Moses have told the children of Israel to live in slavery under the pharaohs? Should Christ have refused the cross? Should the patriots at Concord Bridge have thrown down their guns and refused to fire the shot heard ’round the world? The martyrs of history were not fools, and our honored dead who gave their lives to stop the advance of the Nazis didn’t die in vain.

As a people, Americans must decide that it would be preferable to die on their feet as free men whose privacy rights have not been violated than to live as slaves whose lives have been laid bare to the government. As Reagan said, the martyrs of history were not fools. We have everything to lose when we allow the fear of physical violence to convince us to give up our rights. In the Cold War, this was self-evident to the West when tens of millions were starving to death under Mao or being sent to survival courses in Siberia under the Soviet Union.

What This Means For Us Today

We must not allow the threat or fear of violence silence the truth. Ann Coulter and Milo Yiannopolis were wrong to cancel their speaking appearances at Berkeley under threat of violence from “antifa” and other SJW organizations. I assume both Ann and Milo support the right to free speech: if they are truly dedicated, I would put it to them that they should stand up at the podium even if they know for sure that a left-wing terrorist will shoot them dead. The moment we silence our voices to avoid violence from SJW's is the moment we surrender our moral authority: we of the red pill are brave warriors, and the SJW's the cowards.

Neither should have backed down in the face of SJW violence.

A Rendezvous With Destiny

Last month, I took a vacation to Hawaii while I was between jobs. While enjoying the free booze served in first class I had the opportunity to really think about the issues of privacy and what was really worth risking one's life. I realized that if I am prepared to die for the Fourth Amendment, I cannot support the NSA's metadata program even with the best of intentions (saving lives).

When a sudden jolt of fear hit me at the prospect of being blown to pieces by a suicide bomber, I remembered I had felt that same fear before: in Iraq and Afghanistan while serving in the United States Army. As undesirable as the prospect is, to this day I am still willing to risk death or severe maiming in the name of the rights enumerated in the Constitution as was originally written and intended, not the perversions of subsequent Supreme Courts (excepting slavery).

“A man who has nothing for which he is willing to fight, nothing which is more important than his own personal safety, is a miserable creature…” -John Stuart Mill

Edward Snowden is no hero: heroes don’t run off to even more tyrannical nations than the ones they are ostensibly protesting. Yet I am glad he leaked the information about the NSA’s metadata program and he was right to do so. We, as red-pilled men, must decide that our freedom is more important than our lives, and that there are some things greater than our desire to go on living, banging beautiful women and improving ourselves. We should fight like hell to annihilate those who wish us harm, we should secure our borders (which would reduce the chances of having to risk our lives in the name of the Fourth Amendment), but most importantly of all we should remain intellectually consistent with our beliefs and summon the courage to to stand up for them in the face of danger.

Read More: The Power Of Conscience: Oliver Stone’s “Snowden”

FitzRoy Sommerset
FitzRoy is a British and American Nationalist who refuses to apologize for the British Empire. As a young man, he "took a President's shilling" and served in the U.S. Army. In his free time, he enjoys studying history and destroying the SJW revisionist narrative.

How ISIS Plans To Conquer And Manage Infidel "Savages"

May 1, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Observers of political and military events in the Middle East cannot fail to notice the extreme violence of ISIS's methods. Whether they are seeking to control a local population, or engaging in combat operations against an armed foe, ISIS members do not hesitate for an instant to adopt the most brutal tactics. In the cultural sphere the militant group has been similarly ruthless: it thinks nothing of obliterating the historical and cultural treasures of the regions it has occupied. Is there a method to this madness? Is it part of some coordinated strategic vision, or is it the blind ignorance of a group of nameless savages?

It would be a serious mistake to underestimate ISIS or its ideology. Any group that can attract members willing to fight to the death should have our undivided attention. Beyond this fact, ISIS's own words show that there is indeed a consistent—if demented—logic in everything they do. Military planners must never forget this, just as they must never forget that everything North Korea does is done for a purpose.

It turns out that ISIS has done the world a favor by broadcasting its theories in a book called Managing Savagery: The Most Critical Stage Through Which The Umma Will Pass. This manifesto, published by Abu Bakr Naji and translated two years later by William McCants, lays out a detailed program on how to create the conditions necessary for the Islamic State.

We should understand that the word “savagery” used in this context does not refer to “terror.” It refers to non-Muslims and those Muslims to who not accept ISIS. In other words, ISIS considers itself “pure” and the rest of the world as “savages” that need to be tamed and civilized. No doubt every fringe group or collection of lunatics believes this, but the difference is that ISIS still controls considerable stretches of territory and can field fighters who are willing to fight to the last bullet.

First Phase

What are the essentials of this doctrine of taming “savages”? It can be broken down into a three-step program. The first phase consists of frustrating and exhausting the enemy. ISIS recognizes that it can never contend with the full force of the world’s modern militaries in a face-to-face engagement. It therefore seeks to draw its opponents into long, drawn-out attrition wars that will sap the strength of their opponents. ISIS calls this the “power of vexation and exhaustion.”

There is nothing new in this: guerrilla forces have been doing this for centuries. The difference seems to be the depressing readiness of the US and its allies to take the bait. Here, for example, the author describes some of the reasons why the Soviet Union was defeated in Afghanistan:

> This is exactly what happened to the Communist superpower when it was put in a military confrontation with a power weaker than itself by several degrees; it was not even comparable. However, (the weaker power) succeeded in exhausting it militarily and, even more important, it activated the elements of cultural annihilation in (the superpower’s) homeland:
>
> – The dogma of atheism versus belief systems that believe in the next life and a God.
>
> – Love of the world, worldly pleasures, and opulence versus individuals who had nothing to lose.
>
> – Moral corruption, the least manifestation of which was that Russian soldiers or officers returned (home) — if they returned — and found that their wives had a child or relationship with someone else.
>
> – Social iniquities clearly floated to the surface when the economic situation weakened because of the war. Then when money becomes scarce and monetary crises begin, the major thieves appear, especially if accurate accounting begins. [Text, p. 19]

Second Phase

The second phase of the ISIS strategy consists of establishing its own parallel governance structure in the areas it controls. What does this mean? It forces businesses and markets to stay open, it sets up Islamic courts and schools, and it “educates” the local population in the principles of Salafist Islam. Several years ago it even began issuing its own coinage and passports.

Even if these initiatives never achieved widespread acceptance, the point was made: We, the Islamic State, are an alternative to the existing corrupt governments. We can do better. Sadly, this sales pitch is not without its attractions in areas that were decimated by years of sanctions, war, and chaos.

Third Phase

The third phase of the ISIS program involves a consideration of how to expand the radical message into other countries. The idea is that bold, radical, and violent action by ISIS in the Middle East will trigger "spinoff" franchises in other parts of the world. This idea is not as ludicrous as it seems. Just as communist movements were attractive at one time in many parts of the Third World, so other forms of radicalism are now available to fill the void once occupied by communist insurgencies. These are some of the factors to be considered in "selecting countries" for insurgency:

> Factors Considered When Selecting Countries:
>
> With regard to the common links between states in which the regions of savagery can come into being, we notice that some or all of the (following) factors pertain to them:
>
> – The presence of geographical depth and topography permits, in each separate state, the establishment of regions in it which are managed by the regime of the administration of savagery.
>
> – The weakness of the ruling regime and the weakness of the centralization of its power in the peripheries of the borders of its state and sometimes in internal regions, particularly those that are overcrowded.
>
> – The presence of jihadi, Islamic expansion being propagated in these regions.
>
> – The nature of the people in these regions. This is a matter in which God has given preference to one place over another.
>
> – Likewise, the distribution of weapons by people who are in those regions. [Text, p. 38]

All in all, there is a coherent program here amid much religious cant. It is organized, logical, and has been fanatically implemented where its members have been able to do so. Some international powers believe that they can use ISIS on a for-hire basis as a kind of battering-ram to take down secular regimes which they do not like (e.g., Syria). Those who believe this are deluding themselves. ISIS can be rented, but never owned; and once it is finished taking money from one hand, it will promptly devour that same hand. This must never be forgotten.

Read More: Is Pope Francis Destroying The Catholic Church?

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

5 Important Insights From Red Pilled British Economist Peter Bauer

May 1, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Overall, ROK leans towards an anti-socialist, anti-globalist, and anti-egalitarian position. One can add pro-Western, although there is no consensus regarding the extent to which traditional culture is preferred over modern or vice versa.

As I see it, it is crucial to disentangle the constructive components from the destructive, whether traditional or not, and that includes protectionism contra free trade. Furthermore, it is of chief importance to update things to current circumstances, while hold on to almost perpetual principles if some have proven worthy and withstood the test of time.

These positions do not come from nowhere, based on caprice and sentiment, but are based on facts, logic and historical realities. However, a significant share of academics appear to distort reality rather than to explain – or at least selectively only describe certain parts of it, while ignoring that which does not fit into their ideological framework – but some have accurately managed to describe how things are constituted and connected.

The British, Budapest-born economist Péter Tamás Bauer (1915-2002) is one such figure, who throughout his active years swallowed the red pill and decided to explain economic and material realities beyond philantrophic positivity, wishful thinking, as well as irrational fears of the future.

In his work Equality, the Third World, and Economic Delusion (1981), many of his core ideas related to egalitarianism, economic freedom and growth, foreign aid and trade policies are discussed in depth. While some are partly outdated, many are true even now and I have focused on those that still conform to the real world. However, I have completed a few areas which have been developed since Bauer's work was written, linked to for instance developmental and personality psychology, as well as economics.

1. Egalitarianism is based on false assumptions

The reason why egalitarianism is a bad societal point of departure is that is based on false assumptions. The ability to create wealth is largely related to aptitude and work ethic. Bauer understood this and stressed that these are some of the main factors which underlie economic success, whether on the individual or group level.

> People differ in economic aptitude as they do in artistic, intellectual, musical and athletic abilities. In particular they differ in their ability to perceive and utilize economic opportunities. Readiness to take advantage of economic opportunities is of great significance in explaining economic differences in open societies.

Distinguished psychologists such as Arthur Jensen, not the least in his book The G Factor (1998), have shown that economic success strongly correlates with IQ, but traits such as conscientiousness and Machiavellianism are indeed also crucial factors with regard to taking advantage of opportunities.

Donald Trump is one example of how such an industrious and cunning person has managed to be a successful entrepreneur. Or Ingvar Kamprad, the Swede who founded IKEA, for that matter.

But the fact that many left-leaning liberals and globalists have equated equality with equity is problematic, according to Bauer. After all, due to the above-mentioned differences equal opportunities will often create unequal outcomes, materially and economically, but is it really unfair that some people will earn much more than other?

Decades after the publication of Bauer's book, a discursive focus within the left has shifted from opportunities in relationship to equity, towards the notion that people born in poor countries tend to lack opportunities and therefore inevitably will suffer from unequity.

That is indeed a real obstacle for any universalist, but becomes quite misguiding when the left looks at the issue. Chinese people were not happy under pure Communist rule, and it was only until Deng Xiaoping's reforms in the late 1970s and forward that things have improved for them. Ironically leftist social engineering has never been particularly successful in dealing with inequalities or creating better societies, as Bauer shows. Failed states such as Venezuela and North Korea can only be, at least in part, healed by means of stable economic policies such as market economy, enabled by a fairly uncorrupt ruling class.

With that said, one can ask if it is fair that ultra-wealthy American entrepreneurs, regardless of their merits, earn as much as they do. But let's say a Scandinavian social democratic model is not an option if one tries to cure this either, since it is essentially anti-entrepreneurial, creates dysgenic welfare problems, and can even lead to more economic inequalities due to a new imported lower class.

2. The big daddy government treats people like children

Another important aspect that Bauer discusses is that the managerial state, or whatever one prefers to call it, treats adults like children. Bauer finds a striking resemblance between post-taxation income and pocket money:

> Old age, ill-health, the bringing-up of children and interruption of earnings, these are contingencies of life to be paid for out of one's income, and for which adults can be expected to provide by saving or insurance. In many Western countries provision for these contingencies has come to be taken over largely by the state. Because the provision cannot be adjusted to the widely differing circumstances of individuals and families, it is apt to be both expensive and unsatisfactory. Such provision is necessarily financed by taxation. As a result many people's post-tax income becomes like pocket money which is not required for major necessities and hazards of life because these are paid for by taxes largely levied on themselves. This redistribution of responsibilities implied in the operation of the welfare state means the reduction of the status of adults to that of children.

Since people differ in aptitudes they likewise do so regarding the ability to make proper decisions, but if the state "deprives" them of welfare they are forced to take responsibility and act like adults.

It is not always an easy balance and some will be treated unfair in ways that are not results of individual shortcomings, but if one also considers the fact that taxes are high whereas the actual quality of social security does not match the tax rate, then it is reasonable to significantly decrease the size of the welfare state.

3. The fear of population growth has historically been misguided

Bauer stresses, with examples both from the West and parts of Asia, that population growth has been a misguided fear. In fact, many nations have prospered in conjunction with population growth. The Malthusian trap of having too many mouths to feed and too many bodies to shelter, has been solved by improved agrarian and industrial techniques, communications and science. It is in fact sparsely populated nations that have suffered the most, predominantly due to poor communications and ineffective storage facilities.

With that said, living conditions for the largest share of people in places such as Nigeria, Bangladesh, Pakistan, Indonesia and Brazil are pretty bad and food shortages are or could be a real obstacle for them. Especially if one takes the nexus between wealth and IQ into account. If modern development is a part of the equation, these problems may escalate. Therefore family planning, somewhat akin to that of China, might be a good thing in some national contexts. If the state could create incentives for the small share of educated people to have more children, while simultaneously creating incentives for the lower classes to have fewer children, it could be beneficial for these countries in their entireties.

Additionally, Bauer does neglect the well-being of animals, such as that unimpeded extreme anthropocentrism have lead to the extinction of animal species in the aftermath of economic development. It is likely that this trend will continue until improved techniques eventually enable less environmentally damaging patterns of growth.

As for unemployment I think it is difficult to even make tentative suggestions about the future, but robots which partly or largely replace a human workforce are of course part of the equation.

4. Aid to the third world is largely based on false assumptions

Another significant topic which Bauer addresses is aid to the third world, and much like equality the notion is based on false assumptions. When wishful thinking economists and do good-ists make plans for the third world, it is based on extrapolating models which imply that as long as the rich nations give a certain share of their total GDP each year, then poor countries will prosper.

The problem is that extrapolations have to be based on reality, and each step fulfilled outside of the philanthropic matrix. Infrastructure has to actually be developed, bridges have to be built, violence has to be dealt with and so on, and that have far from happened in most Sub-Saharan African nations.

Instead many first-world nations have sponsored what the Ghanaian economist George Ayittey refers to as black neo-colonialism, i.e. cleptocratic African leaders who rather fill their own pockets than building their post-colonial nations. For instance, my home country, Sweden, has supported dictatorships such as Uganda.

5. The West has made the rest of the world prosperous rather than the opposite

One of the most absurd notions from the left, including academics, is that the Western world is rich at the expense of various developing countries. Things are not black or white and there is some empirical support for Immanuel Wallerstein's world-systems theory, but Bauer, Michael Chisholm, Niall Ferguson, Charles Murray among others have shown that overall that is indeed not the case.

In fact, one just need to know of some basic contemporary East Asian history to realize that countries such as South Korea, Singapore and Taiwan are wealthy largely due to the West, the United States in particular, rather than the opposite.

While the work of Bauer may seem dated, he has given us many thought-provoking conclusions about how we can deal with our modern problems.

Read More: 3 Lessons From Political Economist Alberto Alesina

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

5 Ways We Are Foolishly Trading Our Freedom For "Safety"

May 2, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Ben Franklin said it best.

> Those who would give up essential Liberty, to purchase a little temporary Safety, deserve neither Liberty nor Safety.

But socially engineered Americans have no idea the safety-obsessed culture they live in is not only depriving them of living a full life, it's also making them evermore beholden to a nanny and police state.

The corporate-government complex and their marionettes in the media constantly create nebulous security and safety issues so that a legislature which no longer represents you can pass law after law to "protect" you when it's actually putting you in a legal cage.

Here are 5 ways the corporate-government complex uses concerns over safety to take advantage of the people.

5. Weather

Carbon taxes will end bad weather, say government propagandists

Bad weather has been with mankind since the beginning. It's never going away.

But, the media now makes out totally normal, if devastating, weather events as though they're something unusual. That tornado that struck the Midwest was spun up by the tailpipe of your car. Never mind that the tornado count has been at record lows in recent years and that we are in the midst of a hurricane drought.

Every year the headlines grow more strident that everything from wind, to fire, to drought is caused by you. Be afraid, because Mother Nature is angry.

How do you appease her? By giving up your car and paying taxes on the air you breathe to your omnipotent overlords in government who will use them to end tornadoes, floods, and hailstorms.

Well, not quite. Al Gore was just out in recent weeks calling for $15 trillion of your money. Once they steal it from you, the power structure will use global carbon taxes to institute global governance since a body that has the power to tax the world is by default a world government.

4. Sex

Fear over sex allows government control of this "commodity" as well

Government propagandists have taken the child's game of cooties to a new level. As I've pointed out before, using the government's own statistics, it is next to impossible to contract HIV/AIDS by heterosexual, vaginal intercourse and blowjobs. Its critics have called this plague terror, as the government regularly terrorizes its citizens with fear campaigns like this one.

That's not enough. Your masters want sex to terrify you in new and creative ways.

New, creative ways of creating problems that don't exist to create profit are being devised. Now, a vague human trafficking line has been invented by the spinmeisters as a way of eliminating prostitution worldwide. The program is in its infancy, but make no mistake that's what its aims are. Even law enforcement officers admit, this is a phantom enemy in many ways.

We've got to protect sex by letting the government control every avenue of it. We've got to protect the womyns since they're Strong and Independent but are so weak they can't make decisions about whether they want to screw after a beer.

3. TSA

As you take your pants off for the TSA agent, remember it's to protect your freedom

People are naturally scared of flying. The government takes advantage of this fear by manipulating a terror threat, that many think it is the root cause of in the first place, and turns you into the equivalent someone entering prison rather than someone getting ready to fly the friendly skies at your local airport.

TSA has never caught a terrorist. This, even though they regularly sexually assault people at airports, feeling up your Irish aunt's breasts while whisking someone in a burqa right through the security gate, no questions asked.

Two legs good, four legs bad on the Animal Farm.

There's also psychological manipulation, as the government now has scanners that make citizens stand with their hands up like a criminal each time they pass through them. White hot rage runs through me each time I have to pose like a felon and be X-rayed (the spinmeisters now call this millimeter wave scanning – did you notice that turn of phrase at the airport?) just to get my seat on the next outbound flight.

TSA is a prime example of the government fucking with people.

Loading...

2. Illegal Immigration

Illegal immigration is the gift that keeps on giving as one freedom after another is attacked while the problem is never solved

The government loves the illegal immigration problem. They don't want it to go away.

"Solving the illegal immigration problem" line of malarkey is a prime example of how the government has stripped Americans of fundamental liberties while letting the hordes continue to stream across the border.

Examples? There are many. Just a few short years ago, Americans used to be able to walk or drive across the border and return to America with a driver's license. Now, you have to send bureaucrats about $150 and multiple documents to secure a passport. Then you get asked "What were you doing in Mexico?" like it's any of the government's fucking business what you were doing.

Marco Rubio, former Presidential candidate, revealed another piece of the elite's plan to milk the immigration problem, and strip more of your fundamental liberties away. Here's what TNMM wrote during the campaign:

> Rubio once again said we need an Orwellian visa tracking system to make sure people don't overstay when they come to America. This will be in addition to other Draconian Police State measures at the border which always end up punishing people who follow the law more than people who break it. But, a database that tracks every entry and when someone's "time runs out" we take Draconian measures to expel them or fine them? I realize conservatives probably love this idea as they continue to wall themselves into the police state, but my concern is what happens when this measure spreads all over the world? We then won't be able to escape our human farm any longer.

This visa tracking system would be the first step to turning off your cash and other resources if you overstayed in another country, or were outside the United States longer than your masters felt was appropriate.

It seems the only people who aren't required to have excessive amounts of identification are the illegals themselves.

1. Guns

The Second Amendment will be nullified by default, not by direct repeal

Without the Second Amendment, the United States would already be under abject tyranny rather than the soft and fuzzy tyranny we now have. Even though Toyota Prius kills people at a higher rate per 100,000 than guns do, the government is using the "death by 1,000 slashes" method to gut the Second Amendment.

They don't have to repeal it. All they have to do is create fear about guns, and then they're illegal in so many places it becomes totally impractical to own them.

Media propagandists stir up the Eddies out there in public who righteously say, "From my cold, dead hands!" when it comes to the Second Amendment, while never noticing the Amendment, like so many others on the Bill of Rights has been gutted and is more a symbol rather than anything else.

Sure, you can still buy and own guns and Americans are thankfully armed to the teeth. But each year, another straw is added to the camel's back with this law, and that ordinance, and that policy. The ultimate goal is nullifying the Second Amendment by default, without ever actually repealing it.

Dangerous Freedom

What freedoms do we have left other than deciding where to shop and what high calorie meal to eat at a restaurant

Once the government gives Americans a completely "safe" world to live in, by not only invading people's lives through all of the above means but micromanaging their driving with front and rear dash cams (already being considered for legislation in the trucking industry, then in your car – a camera watching you every time your drive) we will all be living in our own The Truman Show.

As Dwight Eisenhower put it:

> If you want total security, go to prison. There you're fed, clothed, given medical care and so on. The only thing lacking… is freedom.

Remember that next time some government bureaucrat wants to "protect" you. Meantime, Americans continue to eat cake while their public servants turn the public into servants rather than themselves.

Read More: The Fundamentals of Gun Safety

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

I Just Found Out That A Girl I Grew Up With Is An “Instagram Model”

May 2, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I had another moment of enlightenment this week, and the timing couldn’t be better. Just days after I penned the article about how women have lost touch with any realistic expectations in the dating scene, my eyes were forced open again.

I’d recently heard about one of my mom’s friends, who had lost touch with her daughter. My mom used to actually babysit said daughter. I grew up with her coming to my house every week, eating pancakes and playing on the playground. I wasn’t friends with her outside of that, but I knew the girl as early as when she was 7 or 8 (I’m a couple years older). It’s quite cliché, but imagine my reaction this week when my mom told me that she appeared in Playboy.

She’s All Grown Up

None of the photos on this page are of the actual girl herself, but rather illustrate the prominent thirst that is currently sweeping through Instagram.

Fortunately (or unfortunately, depending on how you look at it), my mom was incorrect on the Playboy statement. It turns out she's just done some photo shoots involving the Playboy logo with some amateur photographers. She's definitely not a Playboy model, but just another one of the "Instagram models" out there on the Internet. The girls with large followings, and with it the typical inflated egos, a very limited shelf life, and in many cases, a soul completely broken.

Some highlights from the profile include:

- A photo saying "Girls don't like boys… we like cats and money."
- Numerous photos of raves, with little stickers of stars substituted for bras.
- A variety of hair colors—blonde, brunette, redhead, neon pink, neon green, and neon blue. And my favorite—half pink, half purple.
- A couple of very suspicious shots in what appear to be high-end boats or private planes that make me suspect she might have participated in a bit of Dubai Porta Potty action.

My first thought was just, "Wow."

This is a girl who I basically grew up with, plastering naked photos of herself all over Instagram. Slurping up the attention of thousands of thirsty guys, and living the high life. Like I said, it's cliché. Obviously, I know lots about how far American culture as a whole has fallen.

But it's a completely different situation to see something like this happening to someone you knew growing up. It's also incredibly depressing—because growing up, she was at least a reasonably nice girl. Her mom and dad were awesome (though I now suspect her father was a complete wuss). She grew up in a good neighborhood, went to a good school, and was seemingly on the right track. Goes to show that almost nobody is able to resist the allure of receiving so much attention on the Internet. Because the entire

Western culture is built around instant gratification.

This leads me to my next point.

Looking Towards This Girl's Future

That's what hit me next: what the hell is this girl going to do next with her life?

Let's face it, "Instagram model" is a pretty short career. The barrier to entry is basically zero—any good looking girl can start posting pictures of herself, say she's a model, and get offers to get money for ads, get pooped on, and God-knows-what-else.

So what happens when these models hit the wall? Well, they will already have a built-in audience. But what happens when younger and hotter girls start to grow accounts bigger than theirs? Just like any model, the career shelf life is incredibly short.

In this case, the girl is almost 24. She only has 10k followers—really not much by the Instagram world standards. If we consider the fact that women's physical prime begins at 18 and ends at 25 (and that may be generous)—her career is basically already over! And yes, it's only the physical aspect that matters in the modeling world—for obvious reasons.

While you can put money on the fact that feminism as a whole would encourage her to pursue a "real career" after the Instagram show is over, she doesn't have a college degree. She doesn't have any trade, language or any applicable skills that would translate to a real world job.

The question becomes—what's next for her?

Cash Her Chips

Many people here would say that she should cash in her chips NOW—find a chump willing to foot the bill for her life and future offspring. A chump willing to look past the behind-the-scenes life of an "Instagram model", and still put a ring on it. She should do this all while she's still young and beautiful with the most value she will ever have in terms of the sexual market.

Of course, we all know that will never happen.

To step out of the spotlight in your prime is something that humans are never good at. She will think that the attention, sponsorship offers, and free gifts are never going to end. Feminism will tell her to keep going with it, to not cash her chips. After all, she has her 30s to find a good man and have children, right?

She has at least another decade of Instagram ~~whoring~~ modeling before she even has to consider her declining looks and start looking towards the future.

But it doesn't work like that. Many of these Instagram models are all lighting, makeup, and angles. They don't have the genuine beauty that (some) paid models have. Nor do they have the personality and charm of foreign girls. So even then, you must consider the fact that many of these girls certainly don't look as good in-person as they do online. Therefore, their market value for marriage is even lower than it appears in the digital space.

And to top it all off, the Instagram modeling lifestyle is certainly going to age girls quicker than normal. It seems all of them participate in raves, music festivals, and extreme parties. With all of these territories often comes a high use of drugs, casual sex, and an overall hedonistic lifestyle that permanently tattoos the infamous 1,000-Cock-Stare deep within their eyes.

Men are desperate enough. If this girl were to start soon enough, she'd find someone to permanently commit to her fading looks. Willing to overlook all of the drugs, all of the sex, and to never question any further because he's scared to know. But, she probably won't.

She'll continue on this train until the money dries up, the attention stops, and she's left with nothing left to do in life except collect cats. Unfortunately, unlike her photo about cats and money—she probably won't have any money in the bank. Come on, do you really think she'll save anything?

Instead, she'll be left with nothing but memories of the good days, an ever-lasting pining for Alpha dick, and the loneliness from knowing that her best days are never coming back.

Meanwhile, a cute, wholesome 18-year-old girl will take a selfie and upload it to Instagram. She'll have her lips pursed, mimicking a duck. She'll get hundreds of comments and feel good about herself. She'll live the high life—all the parties, drugs, and booze she could ever want.

She might even get a free trip to Dubai. Life will be be a blur, with all of the fun parties, high-living, and money she makes. And before she blinks, it'll all be over.

If you want to learn how to take advantage of dating in the digital world, check out my book Cracking OkCupid. For advice about escaping American women for greener pastures, check out Eastern European Travel.

Read More: How To Meet Women Through Sugar Daddy Dating Sites

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

What The Western World Would Look Like If Women Were Never Granted The Right To Vote

May 2, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Pax Masculina.

Fellow ROK fans, tired of every new film having a militant feminist theme? Want to see a universe on video in which men create a paradise on earth with their wise rule, and insolent women causing trouble are given their just reward? My short film (18 minutes) is called Pax Masculina (Latin for Peace of Men) and is an alternate history science fiction movie.

It all started when I posed the question "What would the United States be like today if women had never received the right to vote?" Check out the two minute trailer below. I think you will love the PAX universe.

In Pax Masculina, a theocratic totalitarian regime takes over the United States in 1910. Under this government, women have few rights like in Old Testament or Victorian England culture. The suffragettes were defeated and women never got the vote.

Uninhibited by the influence of women, what follows is a century of peace and prosperity, known as the Pax Masculina. Out of disgruntled suffragettes evolved the Women's Resistance Movement (WRM) which violently opposes the regime. The movie takes place in 2016 when the WRM has increased aggression in its opposition to the governing patriarchy in their fight for equality of the sexes.

The Women's Resistance Movement uses assassinations and bombings to create terror and kill without mercy. Seduction and murder of policemen and government officials are common tactics. The government induces its own terror with televised torture and execution of captured women soldiers. The movie's Facebook site gives more details and many behind-the-scenes photos from the film.

The following photos represent the philosophy of the regime:

The conflict between the regime and WRM is really a battle for the hearts and minds of young women who might join the WRM. When a girl turns 16, she is eligible to be married. Husbands pay the father a dowry and there is a transfer of property. There is an all-girls high school where harsh teachers use ruler and paddle freely to discipline unruly females.

Girls are forced to watch public hangings of captured WRM soldiers on classroom televisions. In the photographed scene below, one girl jokes around about the threat of hanging beside a victim she has just had to watch.

A symbol on the wall of all classrooms remind them of the consequences of having a bad attitude. Gentlemen, how many times have you wanted to tell a woman to “lose the attitude”? In this universe, it is official policy!

The beautiful women of the WRM wear steampunk inspired uniforms designed for combat and seduction as they engage in hand-to-hand combat with police. Authorities have better weapons but hesitate to use them since they want to capture these arrogant women alive for public display.

Captured WRM soldiers are hanged publicly with a worldwide TV broadcast of the event as if it was the World Cup or Superbowl. There is no drop and a large diameter rope is used to haul them up into the air so they slowly strangle, preventing permanent damage to necks or windpipes. There is a good possibility that they will be half hanged (let down before dead) to be made a sex-slave to a deserving man. This discourages young women from joining the WRM while entertaining the populace.

As for the status of the film, the cut is finished and being submitted to film festivals. To stay up to date about its release, follow the Facebook page. The world premier of Pax Masculina will be at Comicpalooza in Houston May 12-14. The exact screening time and date will be posted on the aforementioned Facebook page.

I made this film to express my view and to share my artistic vision, not to make money. Eventually it will just be posted on YouTube or Vimeo to be viewed for free. But for now, festival rules prevent that to retain eligibility. My goal is to make a full length feature film which expands the story line of the PAX universe. But that is a year or two away. Now, I just want to share the vision with like-minded individuals such as ROK readers. I hope the trailer whets your appetite andI would love to hear feedback. My best estimate for release of the short film for public viewing is six months.

I admire Roosh more than I can say after having experienced similar harassment by the social justice warriors against me. Maybe he will agree to be a consultant on the feature film? I made this movie with a balanced perspective instead of the expected female empowerment manifesto. But the mere hint that a government which excludes women might be successful has led to an effort to silence my creative voice.

Instead of reasoned debate, some think I shouldn’t be permitted to express my artistic opinion. In addition, I have openly promoted the men’s right movement (posted links to ROK articles for example), and I have dared to say some positive things about President Trump. I have been vilified and my reputation decimated with lies.

Having practiced engineering for over 40 years, I am used to dealing with truth and facts. I have learned that the artistic community is in general close-minded and truth means nothing to them. I am astonished at their ability to lie without hesitation, without guilt, without apology. Some “artists” show a total lack of character and honor. Any deviation from political correctness is not tolerated. That will be the focus of a future post. For now, I plan to continue to make movies that tell the truth and present an alternative viewpoint.

To learn more about the movie and follow its journey to completion, visit Pax Masculina.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Mel Gibson’s Hacksaw Ridge Was The Most Masculine Film Of 2016

May 2, 2017 | by Damian Black | Link | Original Link

Directed by Mel Gibson, Hacksaw Ridge is an intense biographical war film authentically depicting the pacifist actions of WWII combat medic Desmond Doss, the first man to be awarded with the Medal of Honor without firing a single shot.

There are no bars held in capturing the true terrors of war, the nauseating grotesqueness of decaying bodies and the soul-numbing entropy of sudden death and horrific injury through industrialized weaponry.

However, even more valuable than the reality of warfare and military action are the genuine, virtuous ideals and loyal, reasoned adherence to them presented in Doss's life.

From a traumatic childhood incident and faithfully religious background, he refuses to take another life. The traditional, honest relationships of the mid-1900s in both wartime and peacetime strike out at the viewer's conscience in the current world of deceit and disloyalty.

Brilliant acting, vividly accurate cinematography, a powerful score, and deep philosophical themes make Hacksaw Ridge a breath of fresh air amongst the vague, vapid, and illogical liberal films of Hollywood (Avengers series, Suicide Squad, The Secret Life of Pets, etc).

Desmond's Game

Unexpectedly, *Hacksaw Ridge p*rovides an invigoratingly enjoyable demonstration of classic American game. After helping save a wounded man's life with fundamental medical knowledge and carrying him to a hospital, he looks around while waiting, gazing upon an attractive nurse.

As the camera focused on her, the classic cinematic tell of love at first sight, I was eager to see what the real-life protagonist would do in the hurried hustle of a hospital.

He walks straight up and starts a conversation. Absolutely no hesitation. Though the nurse explained to him she was for blood donation, Doss practiced the game rule of literally saying anything, with the opener being that the blood all over his shirt wasn't his.

After a brief talk, he donates his blood and goes on his merry way. The next day, cornily dressed his best, he states a gushy love confession that neomasculinity would shake its head at.

One would expect a simpleton beta from his seemingly innocuous Southern background and goofy smile, but he then goes straight for the close of the time: the movie date. She eagerly accepts, graciously rewarding him for his immediate courage and charming innocence.

After the date, in the most impressive and feminist rage-inducing moment, he kisses her without her permission. And it wasn't a weak peck; it was seconds long until broken off by the girl. Shocked, she slaps and chastises him.

> "You didn't ask!"
>
> "I thought you might've liked it."
>
> "Well I might've if you'd asked!"

Won over by his daring and charisma, she easily answers the later marriage proposal, but with unease. Doss asked directly after telling her he'd enlisted.

The Training

Similar to the hilarious yelling and name-giving scene in Full Metal Jacket, Hacksaw Ridge gives an insultingly comedic homage with its own sergeant's introduction.

Later however, the mood deepens as Desmond's pacifist tendency to not kill causes serious dissension amongst the ranks. All his senior officials do everything they can to throw the misplaced conscientious objector out of their army.

Even after he is brutally hazed, given incredibly unfair treatment, and accused of being a sanctimonious coward, he still firmly and truly believes in his duty to save life in his nation's war all while remaining respectful. After grueling resistance, he is finally legally accepted as a combat medic.

“Private Doss, you are free to run under the hellfire of battle without a single weapon to protect yourself.”

War

Against all odds he finally climbs the heights to arrive on the battlefield with the rest of his squad, and it is there that his actions demonstrate true valor and faith. As grenades blast men apart, bullets smash through flesh and bone, and flamethrowers roast alive in stunning graphics, he is one of three medics frantically and decisively working to salvage lives from the brutal trench warfare.

Overrun by the Japanese, when a retreat is ordered before a friendly naval artillery strike, Doss carries his wounded friend only to realize he has died. In this pivotal moment, he is helpless and confused at God’s wishes of him. Then he hears the screams of the dying, crying out for someone to save them, a divine sign. Doss rushes back into the hell, demonstrating heroism amidst heroes.

Hacksaw Ridge demonstrates the epitome of masculinity in all its aspects: love, war, abuse, death, family, camaraderie, leadership, and the impact of the individual.

Read More: A Politically Incorrect Film That Offers A Ringside Seat To A Futile War

Damian Black
Damian Black is an American nationalist deploring the decline and seeking to rid the scourge of oblivion. Visit his nascent personal interest: The Black Decree

There Can Be No Patriarchy Without Patriarchs

May 3, 2017 | by Ryan Landry | Link | Original Link

This article first appeared on Social Matter and is syndicated here with full permission.

An observer of the Western world sees weekly reminders of the folly of women's liberation. There are parades of women wearing vagina hats. There are women in vagina costumes protesting for no reason besides their party losing. Older women who passed on having children seek the mother experience by welcoming in and working with migrants from the Third World–migrants who are illiterate, prone to rape, and sometimes beat or kill their hosts.

As is often the case with European news reports, people ask, "Where are the men?"

These tragic news blurbs also inspire murmurs from men about the need for patriarchy. This grumbling calls out for its return as if some sort of mystical, ethereal entity will install it. If that is the longing, it's easy to convert to Mormonism or Islam and enjoy the structural patriarchy enforced by those systems. Exactly how patriarchal does one have to be if the entire community is there to support and enforce one's side in any argument? And yet, Islam still is not performing eternal vigilance if hymenoplasty clinics keep popping up in France.

To solve these problems, one must restore patriarchy. Not just the shell, but the entire cultural feeling. To summon the patriarchy requires patriarchs. We must admit that modern man is degraded and has shirked duties of leadership, in addition to being a target of the superstructure. As if building concentric circles, one has to first work on oneself, one's family, one's männerbund, one's community, and one's civilization. There must be a steady drive towards the Restoration because in the absence of a king, there is no power to secure one's status as patriarch. As the king has responsibilities down the chain, so does a patriarch have responsibilities and duties up and down the chain.

To bring about the return of patriarchy and stop delegating the management of homelife and the means of reproduction to some progressive-controlled central authority, one has to discuss a subject that is often times a status eraser. To call for patriarchy's return is presently a demerit. In this era of progressive dominance, voicing a return to patriarchy results in a deduction of total status.

As such, one must improve oneself. There must be no chink in the armor, no chip in the stone, and no weakness. View the idea of status as not simply the accumulation of status points, but the idea of a status indifference curve. In economics, an indifference curve shows how consumers will select different amounts of goods but will derive equal satisfaction from the combinations. If you voice contingently low status ideas, you must appear and exude high status to make up for the loss in them agreeing with you.

The Left has been relying on this for decades. They embrace the most wicked of ideas, the most disgusting, and most alien, but these ideas end up high status because the most educated, the wealthiest, or the youngest individuals mouth them. Because money, education, and youth are all elevated as prime status and the Left controls media framing, strange beliefs like gay marrying, Muslims being relocated to Michigan, or abortion on demand are considered superior or higher status beliefs. The hilarious manufactured meme of #SwoleLeft was the elite on the Left realizing that their side was the side of weakness in an increasingly dangerous time.

Become the man everyone turns to in times of need

Embodying The Patriarch Concept

This all starts with you. Working on the qualities of a patriarch is your first task. Employment and having one's finances in order is a must. How can one support a family or provide shelter as a patriarch, if one is a debt slave? Wealth grants status in our society, so achieving a comfortable level of living is desirable. Reactionary values from the classes of people that the Left derides on late night comedy is to be expected. To hear reactionary values from individuals from higher socioeconomic classes is jarring to the average person. It is a class rebellion.

Primacy is in the marketing of one's messaging; physical packaging of the messenger matters for ideas. This means lifting weights and taking care of one's appearance. In our degraded age, the molded bodybuilding aesthetic is a reaction against modernity. Training one's body fills out the male form as it was intended and designed for: physical activity, manual work, fighting, etc. This is so antithetical to the progressive mindset that the mere sight of muscles is problematic. A male body with muscle is a body that is not taking the coward's path or the modern path of least resistance. This matters in messaging. No one will listen to a doughy schlub calling for a return of male leadership or honoring and supporting male virtue.

Similar to developing physical strength, one must cultivate one's mind. One does not need be a fully engaged researcher but a wise man eager to learn. The search for truth and wisdom of the ages. It is not simply reading old books, but absorbing and interpreting the knowledge, obvious and esoteric, within old books for practical application. This flows to another important trait to develop, namely that of good judgment.

As patriarchs will be granted authority, they will have to be good decision makers. This is not just for decisions made, but in decisions to delegate. This does not just involve being a learned or wise man. Patriarchs must be good judges of other men. Having a wide breadth of knowledge will make one a better decision maker and allow for quicker decisions. This will grant status within social circles. Someone who can be trusted is someone who can be granted powers, duties, and privilege. Intelligence is considered high status in our age, but the spread of credentialism has made people unsure who to trust. Demonstrating intelligence and wisdom can earn status as well as make you an anchor for others.

Gods valued not just victory but passion and thumos

The monastic life is not what we seek here, as patriarchs must be men of their community. To steal from the Greeks, patriarchs should not only cultivate wisdom but also cunning or crafty thought. Modern readers may know Athena as a goddess of wisdom, but this is not quite the truth. Athena was the goddess of cunning. Greeks hammered the point home by making Athena the goddess of craftwork. As the daughter of Metis, she inherited that crafty intelligence.

Channeling this concept, one should not just be book smart but street smart, that is, understanding human nature and all its permutations. Thinking fast on one's feet is a goal to strive for, as it grants status as a man to have in a pinch or a friend in the foxhole. In the practical realm, having hobbies and skills that people can call upon or that one could share and pass on is key to becoming a patriarch. Odysseus was not simply smart, but crafty enough to outwit the Greek gods and mythical challenges on his way home. One becomes not just another man, but an indispensable man to the community.

A patriarch is not a stone-faced man in the home or in public. A leader can harness his emotions. As the West has more broken homes with boys being raised by women, these boys model behavior after what they see: the feminine approach to emotions. Whether raised with a father or not, men must learn to control their emotions and express them appropriately. The patriarch is the rock for his family, his männerbund, his community.

There is another trait from the Greeks that we could consider: thumos

Thumos was the idea of the passion or spirit in the blood. There could be debate about a warrior's thumos. He may win or lose, but did he fight with thumos? Even in American history, one recognizes the behavior, the gallantry, and the spirit that Confederate soldiers fought with against poor odds. In our modern era, how many men float as if icebergs in the sea of society? The drive for life is sorely missing in the comatose, zombified, and atomized men we see walking our streets.

Build a reliable mannerbund

No Patriarch Exists Alone

Fostering and developing these traits builds one's family. A man who strives for development and exudes these virtues will attract women. Not just women in general, but the type of women who seek male leadership and will value it in the home. Women want a man they not only respect, but that their social circle respects. A man calling for patriarchy who has a wife leading around by the nose is a false prophet. The community will instinctively recognize this and tune him out.

What this also speaks to is the need for refining rhetorical skills. Not everyone needs to be Al Pacino or Alec Baldwin in Glengarry Glen Ross, but being able to effectively communicate and persuade matters when exploring illiberalism and other ideas unwelcome in Modernity. Speaking confidently comes natural to some, but public speaking is a skill that can be developed. Consistent practice of even the smallest things can make one a more effective presence. Pacing, elegant use of hands, target engagement, and controlled, measured tones can all convey even the most ridiculous of messages in a method and manner that is high status.

To deny that rhetorical skill matters is to deny that we live in a society that overvalues verbal skills. Former President Barack Obama's entire political career rests on that fact that he was a black politician who spoke so well. President Trump would not be in the Oval Office right now if not for his unique way to message to the masses. Simply yelling 'cuck' at people will not do. Darkly enlightened ideas such as patriarchy will pierce initial defenses if spoken in a confident, calm tone. Delivered from a frame molded by lifting and a mind refined by reading, one's message will become much more persuasive.

It is also important to see these traits in others and reinforce their development. As part of the trait of good judgment, seeing these traits and encouraging their development creates a virtuous cycle. Debating the levels or even existence of agency is a pastime in our circles, so how important can the smallest of encouragements be for anyone attempting to walk the path that society mocks and derides? Simply picking up a barbell and caring about how one looks is a rebellion. Small compliments and story swapping will push a man to return to the gym, pick up a book, or pushback against the high priests of the nation.

Finding allies and seeing friends develop or even turning strangers into friends is important not just for them or you, but for your community. The age of irony is partially built on the fear of being vulnerable and sincere in enjoying something. People constantly fear the loss of status anywhere. While small circles, especially circles with the presence of progressives, may chide one another for seeking wisdom, reading old books or developing a skill, one can blaze a path to Restoration by simply approving another man's small quest. Nudging an atomized male out of his dazed sleepwalk is a small step in forming a männerbund.

A man who exemplifies these virtues will be the type of man capable of building a männerbund or being useful to men who already have formed one. To build a männerbund involves having the wisdom to be an excellent judge of men. It also requires the ability to carefully cultivate a circle of men to strengthen a community and harden it against outside influence. At each infiltration of progressive ideas into a community, there was someone with the courage to open the front gate. A community that works together under male leadership will find a man with these traits useful. This is the type of community that will hear a man speak the truth and rather than object or cry out 'hate!' will approve.

From here, the goal of striving towards the Restoration and the return of kings is a logical extension. There can be no patriarchy without the king, and no king without the patriarchy to model. As one is a steward of one's home, so will one be a steward of one's civilization. Proper care and leadership within one's home will demand proper care and leadership in one's community and civilization.

Read Next: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Ryan Landry

Can A Man Who Has Slept With Hundreds Of Girls Still Be Considered A Good Person?

May 3, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

If there is a secret sauce to game, something close to what the shysters and the scam artists promise when they talk of making you irresistible to women, then it is closely affiliated with the dark triad characteristics (narcissism, Machiavellianism and psychopathy) and the consequent state they beget, that of drama.

The very best players that I have observed, those whose actions have moistened panties from London to Las Vegas and back again, have all had these characteristics in spades. And just look at famous examples of criminals like Jeremy Meeks who women flock to.

As such—-and because we are by now all more than aware that 'nice guys finish last'—-an important ethical question stands out, namely, is it actually possible to be a good guy who is also supremely good with women? I believe that one can maintain a strong set of core principles while acting in ways that are effective if ruthless, but that this approach requires very careful vigilance and is also not without its risks.

My Own Experience

Having been writing about game for some time now, I find myself sometimes questioning the rights and wrongs of what I am doing, as more and more I seem to be advising readers to use more Machiavellian or ‘dark triad’ tactics to achieve their goals. Is that because I am a cruel and heartless individual who doesn’t care a toss for the feelings of others? No, it is simply because, having studied pickup and male-female sexual dynamics for many years, both from my own perspective and by observing others, I have a pretty good idea of what works and what doesn’t.

My own personal experience is not atypical for a pick-up writer. While I would argue that I was never entirely ‘blue pill’ (it is hard to live through your parents’ divorce and then observe your stepmother’s’ mistreatment and eventual divorcing of your father and hold all your dreams of the wonders of romance intact), I was nonetheless a basic nice guy who didn’t see any action with girls all the way through to age 20.

When I did eventually get laid with that first girl (a decent blonde who has since been marred by the birth of her two children, divorce and a Botox addiction), it was because I developed a strongly cocky funny sense of humour almost combative in its intensity. I would like to say that it was because I had suddenly become game-aware and had figured out for myself what worked. In fact it was by default, a by-product of strong antidepressant medication that sent me off the charts loopy for a while swigged down with a liberal dose of alcohol.

While this is certainly not a method that I would recommend to anyone reading this at home, the physiological ravages that were taking place in my mind as a result of various battling chemicals had one pant-wettingly happy consequence: they made me really not give a fuck what anyone thought of me. And even more than that, they spurred me on to flaunt my quirks at others in a bid to provoke them.

Loading...
Having always been somewhat analytical and therefore possessing a propensity towards Machiavellianism, I was now, through no conscious strategy of my own, ticking the 'narcissistic' and 'psychopathic' boxes as well. Perhaps unsurprisingly, this bonfire of my vanities presaged what was to be the most sexually bountiful season of my life.

I should underline the point that all of this was entirely untutored and unplanned. It was before the manosphere, the red pill, even before I'd read a single book on pickup. Things turned out the way they did due to my somewhat liberal doctors and my burgeoning taste for hard liquor, and I was fortunate enough to reap the benefits of a righteous pussy harvest.

Of course, things soon calmed down. My medication was changed, and I later gave up drinking as well. But due to a narcotic interval that likely most men do not experience I was able to see for myself the way in which unbridled arrogance, rudeness, sottishness and bad behaviour, far from repulsing women in fact turned them into quivering and grateful recipients of the errant manboy's love gloop.

My experiences at this time stayed with me and became elemental in the framework that was only strengthened and bolstered by my subsequent study of manosphere texts and my adventures in the field of pickup.

My Thoughts On The Dark Triad Now

Many years later and I am an infinitely more responsible, together and organised person than at that time. But the lessons I learned back them about the effectiveness of the dark triad have not gone to waste since I can now playact them at will. They are simply different colours on my pickup artists palette that I employ to colour my interactions with as and when the time is right.

Wherever you are in the game, whether a newbie or an experienced player I recommend that you do the same. You don't have to kick down the doors of perception to alter your behaviours around women. These days there are a great many helpful resources out there that discuss the dark triad characteristics in great detail, and show how their application can be beneficial to the committed poon hound.

While it can be tempting for a guy new to red pill thinking to want to go full on dark triad in a kind of 'fuck bitches, I'll show them' manner, not only is this supremely butthurt but it is also effectively impossible as you can't just acquire these traits, particularly psychopathy which is clearly a very distinct mental condition.

Far better for the average guy to be aware of the impact that these characteristics can have on his game and sprinkle them liberally on his interactions where appropriate, but retaining enough self-control to pull back when they no longer serve his purposes. As with most things in life you want to find balance, that sweet spot where equilibrium supports rather than destabilises your dreams.

Want to find out more about how to get great at game? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter.

Read More: The One Girl You Absolutely Must Approach Every Day

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Women Are Not Capable Of Objectively Arguing Their Support For Abortion

May 3, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

It has been sometimes said that men should not have a say concerning the issue of abortion given that they are not directly affected by it. Indeed, since men cannot suffer the direct consequences of pregnancy, many feminists have claimed that men should thus keep their mouths shut about the whole abortion issue. And you just have to Google this general theme to find several articles from feminists which argue for this point-of-view.

However, in opposition to this idea, what I wish to argue is that far from men needing to be silent about assessing the morality and legality of abortion, it is, in fact, women who should butt out of the abortion debate. And while such an idea, given the times that we live in, might seem radical, there is actually a very good reason for it.

Does this chick look like she could give you a coherent argument for abortion? I don't think so.

So, to understand why women should stay out of the debate about the moral and/or legal permissibility of abortion, consider the issue of jury selection during a criminal or civil trial. First, note the fact that a jury's goal and purpose is to seek the truth and follow the evidence presented to it in the most objective manner possible. Now, with this in mind, imagine that we have a criminal trial where a male defendant has been accused of raping a woman.

In such a situation—and given that, as mentioned, the goal of a jury is to seek the truth as objectively as possible—we all understand that it would be unsound and unjust to allow a woman on the jury for that trial if the woman in question had also previously been raped by a man in the same way that is alleged to have happened in the trial presently under consideration. And why do we all know that this would be a bad and irrational idea? Because the potential female juror who had been previously raped, due to her past history, would obviously not be as objective and impartial as would be required to properly serve on such a jury.

Indeed, we all understand that the woman's emotional and psychological proximity to the type of trial under consideration would cloud her objectivity and render her a partial, rather than an impartial jury member. Furthermore, we all understand why such a woman would not be as objective as was needed for jury duty: namely, because an emotionally and psychologically clouded mind is a mind that is more susceptible to motivated reasoning and cognitive biases. And so that is why such a woman could not be trusted to fairly assess such a rape case.

But even more examples can be given. For instance, we all also understand that a jury member would not be allowed to be a family member of an accused individual given that no one would expect or could sufficiently guarantee that a family member would be objective in their assessment of the evidence against their relative. In fact, even the trial judge would have to recuse himself if he had a conflict of interest with the case under consideration due to the potential biases and motivated reasoning that trying such a case might raise.

And so we can see, via all these examples, how a person's emotional and psychological proximity to a certain situation actually renders them less objective about the arguments that they are considering; furthermore, such close proximity actually gives us a solid reason to be more leery of such a person's assessment concerning a certain issue rather than being more trusting of their assessment.

Note as well that social science also supports the above illustrations. For example, in his book The Righteous Mind, and specifically in his chapter "Vote for Me (Here's Why)", popular social psychologist Johnathan Haidt notes that when self-interest and/or reputational concerns are in play, people are very good at finding evidence which supports a position that they already hold, most likely for intuitive reasons. What this means is that when self-interest is involved, as well as when discussing emotionally charged topics, people are very good at confirmation bias and motivated reasoning.

Now, with the above points in mind, the connection with the abortion issue should be clear. In the debate over abortion, we are seeking to objectively and fairly assess the status of the unborn human being, both in a moral and a legal sense. We are also seeking to assess, as objectively as possible, whether abortion is murder, thus establishing whether it is permissible or not. We are even assessing whether abortion is a social good or not. So these are damn serious issues—just as serious as weighing the evidence during a murder trial.

Consequently, we should all wish that the individuals assessing these topics concerning abortion be as objective as possible. But, in all these debates, a woman is like a compromised juror who would be rejected as a jury member precisely because she could not be counted on to be as objective as possible about the evidence under consideration; indeed, for it is the woman's very emotional, psychological, and self-interested proximity to these abortion issues which makes her assessment of them less trustworthy rather than more trustworthy. And this is because there would be a very good chance that a woman would be suffering from serious cognitive biases in her assessment of the evidence concerning abortion and the status of the unborn.

After all, women themselves admit that they are the ones who are directly influenced by the emotional, psychological, and physical effects of pregnancy and abortion. And so, whether knowingly or not, they themselves are the ones who are tacitly acknowledging that they would have an increased susceptibility to cognitive bias and motivated reasoning concerning the topic of abortion.

By contrast to women, men are not directly affected by the issue of abortion. Men are also less emotionally, psychologically, and personally invested in it, as many women themselves admit; after all, that is often why women argue that men should have no say about abortion to begin with. But because of all this, a very strong case can be made that men are actually more objective evidence assessors concerning the issue of abortion and its potential immorality than women are. Indeed, men, given their ability to remain more detached about the issue of abortion, can actually be more trusted to give an impartial assessment of the evidence concerning the humanity of the unborn. And thus men can give a fairer assessment of whether abortion is murder or not.

Exactly…which means that men are less biased and less prone to motivated reasoning about the abortion issue.

And so, the long and short of it is this: although men are sometimes told that their views about abortion should not count because they are not directly affected by pregnancy and abortion, it is actually a woman's very emotional and psychological proximity to the issue of abortion which makes her cognitive-bias-prone opinion about abortion less objective and less trustworthy than that of a man. And so, if anyone should be ignored concerning the matter of abortion, it is women. But if women should be listened to about the abortion issue—and, in the end, they actually should be—then no one should dare say that the abortion arguments from men should not be listened to as well.

Read More: Are Women Careless With Contraception Because They Love The Attention From Getting An Abortion?

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

Bill Nye The Degenerate Guy Promotes Perverted Tranny Music For Children

May 3, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Bill Nye recently had comedian Rachel Bloom on his Netflix show Bill Nye Saves the World. She performed a song titled "My Sex Junk," which included lyrics like:

> This world of ours is so full of choice, but must I choose between only John or Joyce? Are my options only hard or moist? My vagina has its own voice.

Bloom and other females proceeded to do sexually offensive gestures which are provocative and inappropriate for a show that parents are likely to show their children. Later, a dorky Eastern-looking man then enters the scene and removes his pants at 1:57 to participate in the degeneracy.

The Song

Nye tops it off by saying, "That's exactly the right message, Rachel, nice job!"

To be honest, I couldn't watch the whole thing. The utter filth and disgust is just too unbearable. This is a perfect classic example of why extraterrestrials avoid visiting earth.

Who is Rachel Bloom?

She’s the actress from productions such as Crazy Ex-Girlfriend, Gay of Thrones, Heavy Boobs, You Can Touch My Boobies, Pictures of Your , and *F^k Me, Ray Bradbury. In other words, she is a useful idiot who caters to the Hollywood anti-traditional agenda.

Bill Nye is a Science Guy?

You may have seen the show, Bill Nye the Science Guy, a program aimed at young kids to educate them on various topics in biology, physics, chemistry, and other life sciences. Many grew up watching his show and identify him as being an authority, however his recent actions have just spoken louder than his five years on TV.

“Doctor” Nye is now subliminally telling kids that it’s okay to be transgendered, and sexuality is a choice. The indirect message presented was basically saying, hey, if you’re a boy who’s interested in girly things, it could mean you’re actually a girl! The same theme was being thrown at girls.

Apparently he has a BS in mechanical engineering from Cornell which is a red flag in itself being that it is part of the Poison-Ivy League of Lower Education. Later, Nye received an honorary doctorate from number one Dump Trump school, Rutgers University, who paid him $35,000 to speak at the ceremony.

He outspokenly stated that global warming or rather climate change is real, and that those who are skeptics may be suffering from cognitive dissonance. Nye states that it is “not an open question, it’s a settled question.”

Nye takes the side that transgenderism is part of genetic evolution even though it goes against a century of genetic research. He believes in the “we’re all one species” ideology.

He has also stated, “We in the science community are looking for information why climate change deniers, or extreme skeptics, do not accept the overwhelming scientific evidence on climate change.”

Kids are kids

Growing up, kids do a lot of silly things. There are some boys who like playing with dolls, makeup, or are just more feminine than others. HOWEVER, that doesn't mean they should become a girl!

Vice versa, there are girls who grow up as tomboys or who are interested in masculine things. It doesn't mean that deep down they are man. There was a time when boys threw spiders at girls to scare them, but now girls in science collect them. The world is different, but just because a person's behavior deviants from the norm, that doesn't mean changing one's sexuality is the answer. The problem with this is the danger for children.

The creepy song was downvoted into oblivion

As the time I typed this, the YouTube video received over 80,000 dislikes compared with just over 1000 likes who were most likely paid off henchmen by the dark forces in the media. Still, the response is very clear, parents are fed up with this kind of garbage being shown to their kids. This man should be charged with fraud science and endangering children by exposing them to pornographic content on a kids' show.

The Verdict

By now it's crystal clear that this man is controlled by the globalist establishment. If this was a sane world, he would have been arrested immediately and thrown in a mental hospital for immediate psychiatric therapy. The fact that a man like this can get away with such an act proves that we're truly living in a lawless degenerate world.

Read More: NAACP President Rachel Dolezal Outed As White Woman

G.S. Luthra

Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

Should You “Man Up” And Get Married?

May 4, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

It’s a question that I still often see on social media: Should men, given the degenerate state of modern society, get married? Let’s start with the case against getting marriage, which seems to be getting stronger by the day.

The case against marriage

Those who argue that men should avoid marriage generally make the following points:

1. Women are hypergamous

Hypergamy is the concept of marrying someone with a higher social status. This has always been the case. In the Middle Ages, the nobility tried to marry their daughters to nobles who were equal or higher in rank. In the Mad Men era, secretaries would marry their bosses. Men are also hypergamous but it manifests differently. While women tend to look for wealthier or higher class men, men gravitate toward the most attractive girl they are able date and marry.

There is a good reason why women are hypergamous: When it works it enables women to secure the best provider for their future children. The offspring of a handsome, wealthy man will start life with a leg up over their competitors while the children of poor men are going to face more adversity. Hypergamy is a built-in feature of women. Some of them may not even be aware that they are being hypergamous. They are just fulfilling their natural inclination. As such, hypergamy is a good thing. A hypergamous woman has higher standards. Would you really want to marry someone who has low standards?

The problem arises when hypergamy doesn't end when a couple pronounces their marriage vows. At that point, hypergamy should end because the couple has vowed to be faithful to one another but modern divorce laws make it easy for women to divorce their husbands to fulfill the fantasy of marrying up. However, it is rare that a divorcee will truly find her Prince Charming, which explains why there are so many bitter women out there.

2. Easy divorce

While hypergamy isn't new, easy divorce is. The first no-fault divorce law was signed by cuckservative icon Ronald Reagan back in 1969. It was introduced on the premise that it would make divorce more merciful on the parties. Instead, it has caused the divorce rate to skyrocket, weakened society, and helped lead us into the colossal mess we are in. No-fault divorce means that there doesn't have to be adultery, physical abuse, or abandonment for a couple to get a divorce. All you need is the desire to not be together anymore.

The problem is exacerbated because pop culture has instilled in us that a marriage is only valid so long as you are "in love." But any marriage is going to have points where you might not have warm feelings about your spouse. Our ancestors understood this and so they made the vows the foundation of the marriage, but modern day women, raised on degenerate Hollywood movies and D grade chick-lit, are trained to think the marriage is over the moment they learn their husband is not as exciting as Christian Grey of the 50 Shades series.

3. Divorce rape

Courts used to award alimony in the cases where there is a big income disparity between the earning power of the spouses. This happens a lot less now that women have earning power just about equal to men, but if you are in the NBA and divorce your wife, you might find out that you'll need to pay your ex for several years. However, I don't think most men need to worry about this scenario.

The whole game changes if you have kids. Courts put the needs of the children first. That usually means the mother will get custody of the children along with child support payments. These can be quite steep. And if you fail to pay your child support, you will find yourself in jail until you manage to cough up the funds. The divorced men I've talked to tell me that they don't have a problem spending money for the good of their children but they don't want to benefit the woman who ultimately destroyed the marriage. Women know this and actually rub salt in their ex-husband's wounds. I've seen women on Instagram boast about how they spent their child support check on new shoes.

Child support can be an onerous and, at times, an unfair burden on men. But you don't need to get married to feel the pain of child support. You only need to father a child, so this is not really an argument against marriage.

4. Not enough high quality women remain

Now we come to what I consider the most compelling reason to avoid getting married: You lack choice. This has become a real problem in the modern age.

There have always been men and women who are unmarriageable. Perhaps they are ugly, stupid, or have a grating personality. For the sake of argument, let's assume that in the 1950s, 10% of men and women were unmarriageable. That left about 90% of men chasing the same number of women—as a man your odds were pretty good.

The situation has changed. The immoral climate has lowered the standards for both men and women, but quality of women has been hit disproportionally through obesity, adopting SJW beliefs, and becoming sluts. It's obviously not scientific, but we now have more men chasing fewer women.

Because women are hypergamous, they will seek out the highest quality males. This means that the men who have a lower sexual market value will have to choose: Wife up a fat carousel rider or stay unmarried. As in the animal kingdom, alpha males win this game while the lower betas end up being losers.

Reasons in favor of marriage

While there are some reasons why you might avoid marriage in our post-modern age, there are still lots of reasons why getting hitched still makes good sense.

1. It is the best environment for raising children

Bruce Lee teaching his son martial arts.

Yes, you could have children out of wedlock with your live-in girlfriend but you'll eventually have to explain to your children why you didn't think highly enough of their mother to put a ring on it. Simply living together also makes it easier to leave when the going gets tough—and it inevitably does in every relationship. But if the couple splits, you are back to single motherhood which all research indicates is terrible for the children's future.

2. It's the only way to build a dynasty

Throughout history, dynastic succession was counted only through legitimate heirs. Bastard sons were excluded. This is because men have a low standard for who they will bang, but a high standard for who they will marry. The children you father with your wife will bear your name. More importantly, they will be raised by you and your wife, allowing you to make the greatest impression on your kids. You don't have the same effect with the various bastards you might sire.

3. Being married is good for men

Despite what you may have heard, married men usually have more sex than single men. It's always easier to have sex with the woman you sleep next to every night than to go out to the bar a few nights a week in search of a one-night stand. And sex aside, good wives genuinely love and care for their husbands. The love a good woman is a thing to be cherished.

Conclusion

Marriage is the foundation of civilization. Without it, chaos will eventually overcome society. Therefore, men should still aim to get married even though modern society has made that difficult by corrupting our women. The trick to winning in this difficult marriage market is to be a high quality man. The best way to do that is to commit to ongoing self-improvement and by holding yourself to high standards.

Read More: Why Would A PUA Get Married? An Interview With Paul Janka

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Why Liberals Are So Physically Monstrous And Repulsive

May 4, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

No one wants to hear that they are ugly. It is a physical manifestation that one is not attractive enough for the opposite sex to pass on their genes. By nature, humans want to have access to the highest value mate available. It is one of the simplest insults yet one of the most effective, unless the target knows, basing his reasoning on facts, that according to criteria that have not changed since the dawn of time, he or she is not ugly but more attractive than a large portion of the population.

We have observed extensively how feminism and other leftist principles can ruin someone's appearance in mere years. Even the science that those liberals love so much confirms it. But by dissecting what causes these extreme changes, we can call out its supporters and give them the dose of truth that could help them see the light if they did not refuse to ingest it.

What is voluntary ugliness?

We will not include here cases of disfigurement due to birth defects, accidents or diseases. We will focus on manageable physical beauty. Universal and eternal beauty standards exist: men should be tall, muscular, visually successful etc. Women should be young, fertile, have long hair, feminine faces, big breasts, balanced, round buttocks among other things. Optimum beauty can be synthetically engineered as we know what are its key elements.

Liberals are not born uglier. They voluntarily remain ugly or become uglier to fit a narrative. "Appearance is ideology". It takes a special kind of hypocrisy to call something that is universally seen as ugly "beautiful" and vice-versa. Now let's get to the roots of liberal ugliness.

Absence of hardships

Socially privileged people or those born with no deformity won't have to work as hard to reach attractiveness as they know that they have a safety net. They can spend more time at university, listening for hours to liberal professors who never worked a day in their life and believe in social justice. They will let themselves go and become ugly if they believe that "beauty is what is inside".

They also have a weaker bond with their peers. Their school of thought neglects the notions of realism or adversity, left-leaning voters tend to see human relationships, such as friendship, as granted. They dehumanize their fellow activists and see them more like tools to reach their goals. This is why they care less about each other's appearance, are less objective when they call something beautiful and can so easily turn on one another.

Where are the friends that should tell her the truth?

Whereas those who had to be dedicated to reach beauty know what hard work means. Conservatives understand the sexual market even if they can think that it is unfair and translate it through their conservative political opinion.

Laziness

Staying attractive requires work. I rarely, among the younger generations, came across an obese person that is naturally conservative. Laziness in health reflects itself in politics with the obvious choice of gibs me dat, junk food and claiming that being a sad sack of lard is equivalent to being a cancer patient.

Good looking people tend to earn more money, either through their ability to convince or the inner strength they needed to reach this level of beauty (principle applied to their work ethic that leads to results), hence are more hostile to see their hard-earned wealth redistributed, through welfare for example. That phenomenon could explain why they tend to be conservatives.

It is much harder to work out and watch what you eat than become a fat sod and claim that you are attractive and attack people that still think normally and state the fact that you are ugly.

This is where the “snowflake” moniker comes from: “I am special, look at me” or “I don’t fit the mold, check out my new tattoo”. They see that they do not reach the universal standards of beauty so they want to change its definition and punish those who challenge them. Like a sport where you can reach the top only through hard work and dedication, but someone decides to change the rules at the last minute then accuses the others of cheating.

Absence of realism

Right-wing people, because they decide to accept life as it is (even if they hate it), know that nothing comes for free and that effort is always needed.

One of the core values of the Left could be summed up with “I do not have to make any sacrifices, things will be given to me and people will accept me as I am.” Due to biology and reality, we know that this is impossible.

Quite often, liberals justify their failure to succeed in the current system because of someone else holding them down. They have no one else to blame but themselves and still try to bring others down to their level. The people that call for change are almost always the ones that fail in the already existing order.

The Left made the refusal of reality their standard. Looks matter, money doesn’t make you happy but is still essential, not everyone is equal, one cannot help the whole world, etc. Those truths can not be accepted as it would crush social warrior’s very existence

This study (like anyone with a pair of eyes) confirms that conservative female politicians tend to display ultra-feminine attributes (long hair, dresses, softer body language) to attract or convince higher value men from the same political tribe. Liberal female politicians always seem more masculine (read “ugly”)

Mental Gymnastics

Liberals can call a morbidly obese woman with a shaved head and large tattoos "beautiful" or "inspirational", just like an onlooker will pretend to find modern art beautiful just to be part of the circle of smug liberals when that "art" is often nothing more than an actual pile of shit.

Equality is a false god.They cannot admit they are wrong or the narrative would collapse. Effeminate men with perceived low social status are not attractive to women just like masculine women obsessed with being strong and independent are unattractive to men.

Leftists are also guilty when they accept media lies. Either they do not have the ability or choose not to see through the ideological manure the Mainstream media feeds them (I would believe the latter). This is also why Liberals want to control the language and redefine what words mean in order to support their dogma.

Virtue signaling

By advertising their ugliness as beauty and showing media support to ugly people, liberals convey the message that ” they can see past the physical aspect and be SO progressive”. Nothing could be further from the truth, especially in their private life. But they must sing their false song when they are broadcasted. Following the laws of the sexual market, if their survival depended on it, ugly feminist land-whales would quickly learn that it is an advantage to look good.

There are genuinely attractive Liberals, those who are exposed in the media or have some degree of elite-approved fame. They are attractive because it is needed to sell what the people in charge push for, because beauty and sexual attraction sell. Ugliness does not.

Those famous left-wingers are what French author and ideologist Alain Soral calls the “thought police auxiliaries”, who enforce the Elite’s agenda and are rewarded through their zeal.

“Liberal” beautiful celebrities only act liberal. They do not want to share their wealth with the poor, open their house to refugees or go for a walk with bodyguards that advocate for gun control by remaining unarmed. They only follow what they are told to do, to get attention and surf the wave of political correctness. Or their bosses will blacklist them and destroy their careers.

La laideur, monopole de la gauche?

I am the first to agree that they are also ugly, fat conservatives. What is unacceptable is if they are happy with their situation and do nothing to change it.

In our age of cultural collapse, it is undeniable that a person that intentionally becomes ugly tends to vote left where the majority of beautiful people among the general public think towards the right.

Must See: 27 Attractive Girls Who Became Ugly Freaks Because Of Feminism

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Story Of The Man Behind The Phrase “Pyrrhic Victory”

May 4, 2017 | by Damian Black | Link | Original Link

Most learned men know of the term “Pyrrhic victory”, an achievement against so brutal a force that the success both advances and ruins oneself. Derived from Pyrrhus of Epirus, the voracious king of the most powerful state in the Greek world. This is his story, of the man who seized every opportunity and lost everything.

The Battle of Heraclea

It was the year 280 BC. The Greek colony of Tarentum in southern Italy was soon to face definite defeat from the hostile and powerful early Roman Empire.

The most famous soldier of his time, Pyrrhus accepted an offer to protect the city. In this endeavor though, as in others, he actually only played the field to dominate for himself.

Outnumbered 40,000 to 30,000, Pyrrhus’s army consisted of Thessalian cavalry, the best of all Greece; twenty catastrophically disruptive war elephants; and Alexander’s devastatingly effective Macedonian phalanx, as well as many archers and slingers.

As cavalry collided and ranged units rained fire, the renowned infantry lines met. Seven offenses from the phalanxes could not break past the Roman legionaries, the strongest opponents they had ever faced. The battle remained unsettled.

During the vicious battle, Pyrrhus knew if he faltered in combat his soldiers would lose the morale to continue. He wisely switched armor with a bodyguard, who was later swarmed and killed.

As word spread, his men wavered while the Romans roared in success at what they thought was a decisive turning point. Realizing the gravity of the situation, Pyrrhus took off his helm, and in a display of pure courage and leadership, fearlessly rode along his frenzied front lines to reveal himself. Now his army returned the cheer in their own massive uproar. The heated battle flamed onward.

Realizing they were equally matched, Pyrrhus finally deployed his elephants to surprise the flanking Roman cavalry. The frightened horses fled at the sight of the bizarre, jagged gargantuans and caused chaos among the Romans.

Finally he launched the Thessalians to secure victory. Augmented by surrounding tribes after his victory at Heraclea and emboldened by the success, he marched forward to invade the heart of the empire, Rome herself.

The Battle of Asculum

Pyrrhus met opposition at Asculum, both sides double their previous number and nearly equivalent at 70,000 infantry, 8,000 cavalry, and others, with 300 Roman wagons of various ingenious designs created to counter the triumphant war elephants.

This is where he would state his famed comment of Pyrrhic victory. The Battle of Asculum was so vast and disastrous that three accounts exist that claim completely different strategies and even victors: that of Plutarch, Cassius Dio, and Dionysius.

What is undeniable is that through coordinated maneuvers and routing, the armies engaged in colossal pandemonium as Roman swords slashed against the thrusts of Macedonian sarissas.

Plutarch’s account determined that Pyrrhus had defeated the Roman commander, but his personal Epirot army, amongst mercenaries and allies, was nearly decimated. Though Rome lost 6,000 men, Pyrrhus lost 3,500 as well as many commanding officers.

> If we are victorious in one more battle with the Romans, we shall be utterly ruined.

A majority of his men, especially his leadership, had been lost. His Italian allies had no more interest to battle the Romans, and against the home field advantage of swift replenishment and supplies, he knew he could not win a war without such reinforcements.

Against Carthage and Sparta

Pyrrhus turned his sights to other conquests, but his fortunes had fallen. Asked to become ruler of Macedonia after his ally King Ptolemy Keraunos had been killed, he chose instead to campaign in Sicily against Carthage, the other most powerful state of the western Mediterranean beside Rome, for greater gain.

Though militarily successful, he acted tyrannically to the Sicilians in an attempt to gather the manpower and resources he required, soon falling out of their favor. He returned to southern Italy to defend against Rome once more in the Battle of Beneventum, but the outcome was inconclusive.

Exhausted, he took his spent army and funds back to his homeland of Epirus, allowing Rome to dominate the Greek colonies in southern Italia and thus forfeiting all the gains of his Italian campaign except for Tarentum.

After easily seizing the disordered Macedonia against King Antigonus II Gonatas, Pyrrhus hounded him down to secure the throne. Taking Antigonus’s mercenaries, Pyrrhus then directly called out the names of the demoralized Macedonian officers at his next meeting with Antigonus’s army, convincing the entire infantry to desert.

However, instead of finishing off the escaped Antigonus, Pyrrhus restlessly looked to Sparta and Argos, the two most valuable Peloponnesian cities. His offense on Sparta was blocked off in unexpected force, and when he looked again, Antigonus had now sided with allies in Argos.

The Battle of Argos

Pyrrhus sent his Gallic forces into the city, gaining the marketplace, but his elephants had trouble entering past Argos's unaccommodating gates. Argive and Macedonian forces flooded the narrow city streets.

Seeing the Gauls surrounded, he advanced into the city and sent a messenger to his son Helenus so that the main body of his army would break down Argos's walls for his troops to exit. However, a miscommunication occurred and Helenus instead entered with the rest of the elephants and soldiers.

In the stark environment, he gave one last fight amidst immense confusion. As soldiers both left and entered the city, the elephants so useful in battles past panicked and blocked the gateway. Chaos erupted.

While in combat against an Argive, the soldier's old mother, watching from a rooftop, threw a tile that knocked Pyrrhus from his mount. The fall paralyzed him, and confirmation of death was given through a Macedonian decapitation.

Alcyoneus, one of Antigonus's sons, took Pyrrhus's head and rode to throw it at his father's feet. Instead of expressing pride as expected, in a heartfelt rage Antigonus struck Alcyoneus and enragedly called him a barbarian.

He burst into tears as he remembered the fates of his ancestry. His father, his grandfather; both had suffered the same dishonorable misfortune. Cremated in ceremony and full honors, Pyrrhus was respected by his foes and Helenus sent safely back to Epirus.

Reconstruction of Argos

Aftermath

Upon news of Pyrrhus's death, Tarentum surrendered to Rome. Italy's peninsula was subsequently divided and conquered, the Greek colonies becoming a vital region of the empire. The Pyrrhic War internationally demonstrated that Rome could dance with the dominant Mediterranean military powers. In the only possibility to halt its expansion, the Hellenistic world foolishly remained content with a failed invasion.

As for the fate of Epirus, his daughter was murdered as the last of Epirote royalty. An inept federal republic sprung, split in advocacy during the Third Macedonian War and ending in Roman enslavement. Antigonus's line continued until Macedonia fell too to Roman rule.

The Roman Empire had seized supreme dominance.

Pyrrhus of Epirus, renowned for his bravery, insatiability, and vain clashes against the major powers of the time: Rome, Carthage, Sparta, Argos; was laughably ended by the hand of an old woman and a segment of her roofing. He is immortalized as the ferocious, daring leader who lost everything he gained in life and everything he loved in death. A true Pyrrhic victory: the price of a forlorn existence for a valiant eternity in history.

Read more: The Roots Of Masculinity In Ancient Rome

Damian Black

Damian Black is an American nationalist deploring the decline and seeking to rid the scourge of oblivion. Visit his nascent personal interest: The Black Decree

Thousands Of Innocent Men Were Wrongly Imprisoned Because Of One Lying Woman

May 5, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Up to 23,000 current prisoners are expected to be released from the Massachusetts State Prison system because the female lab chemist handling evidence in their cases lied, forged colleague's signatures, and purposefully contaminated evidence. Here is the story of Annie Dookhan, nicknamed "Superwoman" for her record productivity at the state crime lab.

EDUCATION:

Sep 2002 to Present	University of Massachusetts-Boston Master of Science in Chemistry
Jan 1999 to Jun 2001	University of Massachusetts-Boston Cum Laude Major: Biochemistry Minor: Economics
Sep 1996 to Dec 1998	Regis College
1990 - 1996	Boston Latin Academy Magna Cum Laude

EXPERIENCE:

Dec 2002 Present	Quality Control Analyst 1 (Material Contr UMMS-Massachusetts Biologic Laboratory

Dookhan (then Annie Khan) in a 2001 photo. The Master's degree claim was a lie.

Annie Dookhan, a female born in Trinidad & Tobago in 1977, moved to the United States as a child, became a chemist, and took a job at the state crime lab in Massachusetts, where she earned the nickname "Superwoman" due to her speed and efficiency running lab tests, primarily on criminal drug cases. Her productivity was so high, she was processing four times the work of the average government lab worker. Or was she?

Annie's secret was to not test the samples at all, but to take the short cut by lying and confirming that whatever substance police told her to check for was present, or to contaminate evidence, or forge co-worker's signatures guaranteeing the chain of custody of evidence.

In the aftermath, a state crime lab was shuttered, 5 workers were fired for failure to properly supervise this rogue employee, up to 23,000 prisoners are expected to be released from prison, and Annie plead guilty to falsifying drug tests.

This is the largest dismissal of convictions in U.S. history. But have you heard anything about this story?

Annie's arrest at her home in Massachusetts

What was her motive?

While it is usually futile to ascribe logical rationale to a woman's actions, one can make a few observations. Annie was described by classmates and colleagues as "an overachieving sort of kid," "normal, sort of nerdy student," "wasn't really noticed," and "hardworking, quiet, smart and determined." The only motive authorities have concluded is that she wanted positive attention from others. In other words, she just wanted to be liked. She wanted the same thing Instagram models, Dubai portopotty girls, and attention whores want: male attention and validation.

Also, was there a total weight with these? I need to show in trafficking, over 50 lbs.....

Any help would be GREATLY appreciated!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

Thank you!!!!!!!!

GP

George N. Papachristos
Assistant District Attorney
Norfolk County District Attorney
45 Shawmut Road
Canton, MA 02021

OK ... definitely Trafficking, over 80 lbs. And NO!!, I did not test all the bags. Your favorite phrase .. . Representative Sampling.

When I get back to the Lab in the AM, I will take a look at my notes and give u a more accurate answer. (At least one bag from each Lab# was tested.)

AK

Annie
Drug Analysis Lab

Proof of her collusion with prosecutors and quid pro quo

Another twist is that Annie suffered a miscarriage in 2009, and later stated she was going through a "long divorce." There are signs of impropriety between Annie and the court prosecutor, Norfolk A.D.A. George Papachristos, who was forced to resign for his direct phone and email contact with the state lab worker. Though state police could not find evidence of an affair, Annie's husband suspects she was cheating, and police found emails complaining to the D.A. that she was unhappy in her marriage. Annie unethically performed professional (if not personal) favors for the D.A. Her husband warned prosecutors that Annie was a chronic liar and not to believe anything she said.

How Was She Caught?

In 2009, the US Supreme Court ruled that defendants had a right to cross examine chemists who helped prosecute them. Annie now had to testify in court, and the following year she was caught lying about her qualifications when she claimed a Master's education in Chemistry, when in fact she had never taken any master's level courses.

Due to the time required in courtroom testimony, sample testing volume by other workers in the lab dropped from around 400 to 200 tests per month. But during this same time, Annie was testing over 800 samples a month.

Once Annie was found to have lied about her background during courtroom testimony, she was investigated more closely. The fact that her productivity was double the most productive chemist's, and roughly 4 times the typical workers should have raised red flags.

While the shoddy oversight of her supervisors took a couple more years to reveal her gross incompetence and criminality, finally Annie's "work" at the state crime lab was revealed, and she was sentenced to 3-5 years of prison for altering lab records (to say nothing of perjury, prosecutorial misconduct, or deprivation of due process of her tens of thousands of victims). She was paroled after serving only 2 years.

Note the soulless eyes

What is the cost to society in man-hours spent prosecuting, investigating, jailing, housing, feeding, and processing 23,000 people? What is the human cost to the thousands of innocent people jailed by this woman's deeds? What is the cost to society by releasing dangerous criminals early? What is the cost of shuttering an 8 story state crime lab indefinitely? The forced resignations of the state director of Bureau of Laboratory Sciences and the Public Health Commissioner? On top of all this, there are the state expenditures of "hundreds of millions of dollars" in dealing with the aftermath of these cases.

It's difficult to quantify, but the costs are certainly more than the punishment Annie received: two years in prison. In fact, while many of her victims still sit in prison, waiting to be released, Annie has already served her time and been released on parole.

Annie facing reporters outside the courthouse

The Many Victims

As many as 23,000 prisoners incarcerated during Annie's 9 years at the state crime lab will soon be released. These were almost all low-level drug offenses. Most prisoners fit into one of two categories:

1. The Innocent. Thousands of these victims were likely innocent. Indeed, while governor Deval Patrick appointed a new cabinet member to see which, if any, cases the state would attempt to prosecute again, it came up with a list of 117 out of tens of thousands. There are thousands of innocent men sitting in jail today because this woman lied about evidence.

2. The Hard Criminal. Often when a suspicious person is found, say, canvassing a neighborhood late at night with a group of thugs, there is little he can be charged with, prior to catching him in the act of a violent crime. But many of these types of serious criminals are known to carry drugs. So police officers search them, and book them for drug crimes. Regardless of one's position on drug laws, it is a fact that they are easy way of getting dangerous criminals off the streets.

Is it wrong to blame Annie for the murder of Charles Evals?

Many of the tens of thousands set to be released are undoubtedly violent criminals, and the public is now at great risk as these thugs are released back into our neighborhoods.

One example is Donta Hood (pictured above), a man Annie helped convict in 2009, who was released from prison in 2012 when the state was forced to drop charges due to Annie's incompetence. Eight months after being released, Hood was arrested for the murder of Charles Evals. A murder that would never have happened had his drug sentence been carried out fairly.

How many more people will be robbed, raped, or murdered by criminals released due to Annie's lying?

A Pattern?

Is Annie an isolated incident?

Joyce Gilchrist Dindu Nuffin.

Joyce Gilchrist was a chemist in Oklahoma City who earned the nickname “Black Magic” for her ability to match DNA samples that other crime lab experts could not. Joyce simply lied and claimed DNA matched, when it did not, which led to thousands being unjustly imprisoned, and the execution of 11 men.

One of her victims, Jeffry Todd Pierce, a husband and father of two children with no criminal record, was falsely convicted of rape in 1986, and later freed in 2001 after spending 15 of his best years in prison. The city paid a multimillion dollar settlement to Pierce, but his life is forever altered.

Many of Joyce’s victims have received no compensation. After Joyce was fired, she claimed she was terminated for sexual harassment. Despite causing 11 men to die, Joyce was not charged with any crime.

Sonja Farak, a true drug expert

Sonja Farak was a Massachusetts crime lab chemist who smoked crack every day at work, occasionally throwing in some meth, ketamine, ecstasy and LSD. Because why not? She didn't have to pay for it. She just took it from the high quality stash that the police provided her with as "evidence." In addition to using the evidence, Sonja also began smoking and snorting the "standard samples" that the lab kept on hand to compare with seized street evidence.

She did her damage for 8 years before being convicted in 2013. Sonja worked at a different crime lab from Annie, showing the problem is systematic. Sonja was mainly viewed with sympathy. She was a "victim of drug abuse," not a criminal who corrupted the system of justice.

Four Points

1. These stories are huge cases of injustice that many media outlets are sweeping under the rug. Thousands of innocent lives were seriously affected, and people died. All because of the lies these women sought in order to seek attention. While a stubborn man being forced off an airplane is deemed national news, chances are, you have never heard of the stories of these women.

2. Be wary of 'official' claims. I take the conclusion of a government panel, official crime lab, or investigatory agency with a grain of salt. I do not believe stories about chemical weapons (see: Saddam, Assad) just because my government says so. I do not believe media or government or even most major institutions today. It pains me to say so, but this is simply the world we live in. The state crime lab, where workers are free to indulge themselves in as many free drugs as they like, while they lie and distort crime lab reports for a decade with impunity, is not some magical place of truth or justice.

3. Women will attention whore, to incredible degrees. Women crave attention and as they leave their 20s if they do not have a happy family and a lifestyle that is in harmony with their feminine side, the outcome can be extreme.

4. The pussy pass is as strong as ever. Frankly, even in The Current Year, I would expect a woman responsible for the deaths of innocent men to at least receive a token prosecution, and I would expect the woman responsible for the largest release of prisoners in U.S. history to receive a serious punishment. But they are not. Because patriarchy or something.

For a comprehensive investigation of this case, see WBUR's Special Report: Bad Chemistry.

Read Next: Disfiguring A Man's Face To The Bone Is Not Considered A Serious Crime If You Have A Vagina

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

How The Perception Of Disgust Is Manipulated Over Time To Break The Human Spirit

May 5, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Psychology matters. Just like politics, if you don't care about it, someone else will take it over for you. Having at least some basic wisdom about how our own minds works allows for self-mastery, through getting distanced from subconscious automatisms, gaining the ability to make explicit ingrained or initially implicit beliefs, and turning aware of our emotions instead of being directly determined by them. This is consistent with the traditional mission of men: someone who masters himself is fit to rule his home and bypass shit tests.

From at least the beginning of the twentieth century, Leftists and some strongly identified Jews slowly took over the humanities. Psychology did not escape their grip, as comparative psychologists can tell about. The Gramscis investigated culture, the Bernays—Freud's nephew—laid the foundations of "public relations." Not incidentally, one of Bernays' first advertisement campaign used powerful symbols of fire and freedom, to lure women into heavy smoking and taking prostitutes as their role models.

Since then, the Left sharpened its weapons, gaining a decisive advantage over the less Machiavellian and generally spineless conservatives. Now, as they use a wide range of psychological determinations such as operant conditioning or bestowing coolness and fashionability on whatever they want to shovel down our throats, they go as far as reverse accusations. Conservative voters are put under extra psychological scrutiny, analyzed much less charitably, more criticized and sneered at, whereas liberals allow themselves many passes and fancy names like "public relations", "management sciences", "human resources", "social justice" or "affirmative actions" to act as manipulation-covering memes.

As Alex Jones says, “there’s a war for your mind”, and here we will cover one of the battlegrounds: the psychology of dirtiness and taboo. Basically, the dirty is what carries risks of contamination, tainting, impurity, and consequently should be avoided or handled with special attention.

The Scriptures have a long list of impure stuff, whether we talk about the Leviticus or the Manu Laws, and many unrelated primitive tribes used to isolate women during their period because of the dirty blood getting away. As for the taboo, it bears a relation with the sense of dirt: if the mere mention of a topic or pronouncing certain words carry a risk, then it is better not to mention these—or follow particular rules when handling them, such as tackling the topic only through a particular framing or in a well-marked context.

Leftists often enjoy deriding whatever sense of purity conservatives still have. They perceive it as “outdated”, not to be compared with, say, a modern surgeon’s sense of hygiene. Yet, far from “emancipating” from that often derided part of the human mind, contemporary libtards have their own sense purity which they have imposed on everyone. Just as the puritan of yesterday would not dare to mention sex without relating it to sin, the problem-glasses wearer of now would not allow xieself to jest while speaking of “Nazism.”

The psychology in itself

Disgust is a universal human emotion. Aside from toddlers and those who got accustomed to certain objects, everyone feels repulsion from, say, cockroaches or eating feces. As psychologist Stephen Pinker sums up,

> Though disgust is universal, the list of nondisgusting animals differs from culture to culture, and that implies a learning process… [Disgust] is a straightforward adaptation to a basic fact about the living world: germs multiply… A single, invisible, untestable germ can multiply and quickly saturate a substance of any size. Since germs are, of course, transmittable by contact, it is no surprise that > anything touches a yucky substance is itself forever yucky, even if it looks and tastes the same. Disgust is intuitive microbiology. (How The Mind Works, chap.6, "Food for thought")

Just like some instinctive phobia—people are innately phobic to cockroaches, hairy spiders, or snakes—, disgust can be easily explained from an evolutionary point of view. Phobia of the dangerous has a preventive role. Disgust of what could bear disease prevent from eating or getting in close contact with it. It is better to sometimes have false positives, i.e. be disgusted by something actually not dangerous, than miss the mark and ingest a fatal poison.

It is possible to overcome disgust and phobias, just as it is possible to overcome fear and act courageously in spite of it. Some are able to live in close contact with scorpions or snakes, two animals that are well-known as instinctively feared of. Likewise, throwing oneself in an obviously risky situation or bungee-jumping from a bridge are behaviors that go beyond instinct—not exactly the same one, perhaps, but still an atavistic and usually useful limitation.

In traditional societies, many rites of passage meant confronting one's own fear: a young boy let alone in the dark for hours had to ride his own fear of loneliness or obscurity. Sometimes, going beyond the fear of something was deemed enough of an achievement for the "vanquisher" to adopt or use the object of his former fear. Bruce Wayne's "batmanism" is merely an embodiment of this ancient practice. (Tangentially, the object of fear can be overturned into a positive, while the object of disgust appears essentially disgusting and thus to be forever casted out.)

Of course, disgust can go well beyond the actually dangerous for us as living beings, and its objects can vary culturally. A Muslim typically feels disgust at the idea of eating pork, although a well-cooked ham shank has every chance of being healthier than some dirty street kebab. Here Pinker claims that many forbidden foods are so as to exclude the neighbor's favorite food, and thus maintain each tribe separated by its own dietary customs.

Taboos are the social covering of what raises shared disgust. It could be argued that at least some traditional taboos were socially useful. The Victorian touchiness on sex prevented girls from letting free rein to their hypergamy. Similarly, in the medieval era, heresy was met with horror. Only priests had a right to read heretic texts and consider potentially heretical viewpoints, for example during the disputations (contradictory oral examinations): they had to be intelligent and endowed with a sufficient sense of the good to be able to consider, weigh, and dispel heresies.

The illiterate, on the other hand, could not have such a sense and were liable to "contamination" by bad ideas. This may seem elitist, but if you look at how the European oecumena was really torn apart by Protestantism and how so many shades of anti-tradition were able to find themselves a supporting public after the Church lost ground, the anti-heresy taboo seems retrospectively quite justified to me.

How the psychology was overturned

The cultural, rewritable aspect of the taboo psychology has metapolitical implications. Campaigns to sensitize to X aim at shifting the public attention to X, push for a particular framing, and most importantly raising disgust or tamping it down. In 2015, a feminist successfully attention-whored by allegedly running a marathon during her periods and showing the blood off. While the look-at-me dimension of her act cannot be ignored, the running and media campaign around it aimed at de-sensitizing people so that we would lose any disgust towards menstrual blood or the plain show of it.

Today, the mainstream media are campaigning to trivialize paedophilia. One of their thrusts consists in painting pedophiles as humane, sympathetic people who just happen to feel sexual arousal towards children: the predatory aspect is downplayed, and the impression they create generates much less disgust than the usual. At bottom, all societal progressivism is about manipulating the norms and layman's feelings. Do you remember that sodomy was deemed disgusting before it was turned into a mean for superior arousal?

Raising and tampering disgust down, erasing taboos and creating new ones, are part of the social engineer's toolbox. The more we let our autonomy behind in the name of "progress"—or just because consuming the elite's shows is much easier than pushing ourselves—the more gullible and blank-slateish we become. Journalists and experts are paid to rewrite our brains on the behalf of the elite managers.

The 70s witnessed several Leftist experiments in taboo transgression and desensitization on screen. In 1972, the movie Pink Flamingos exhibited the adventures of a tranny performing all sorts of disgusting acts, from stuffing a pork tenderloin between xis legs to eating dog poo in a non-simulated scene, and of other degenerates who would dwell in human trafficking, prostitution and friendship with gays.

Two years later, a French director released a movie of the same vein although more subtle: Going Places showed two anti-heroes living a nomad live, committing petty crimes and running away, sometimes having sex with random girls. One of the main scenes features a teenage girl who flees her "boring" bourgeois, middle-class parents and prefers giving her virginity to the protagonists. Back in the US, 1975 saw the release of the Rocky Horror Picture Show, a four-hour piece mixing theatre with cinema and featuring tranny characters as heroes.

All these movies willfully violated the normal taboo around trannyism and trivialized degeneracy. Not incidentally, all three are considered "cult" and of high artistic value by baby-boomers. Of course, what the Left and its degenerate "artists" did is something only they have a right to do: if I claim that Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will (1936) is beautiful and cult, and if I share doubts about the truth of the official version of the Holocaust, a swarm of Leftists will likely call me a "Nazi sympathizer" or a nasty troll. Indeed, by doing so, I would be violating the taboo they created around "Nazism"—but why can't I go beyond taboos and display disgust as well as they did? Because, according to their scenario, only they have a right to shape culture and rewrite norms.

As Leftists desensitized, trivialized and pretended to "emancipate" from the old taboos, they also created disgust and awkwardness around things that were normal before. Post-1945 common French language features a variety of expressions such as "sulphurous position" or "sulphurous people", "smelling like fir", "foul", all applied to so-called far-right positions or politics. Why these statements referring to smell or dirt whereas immaterial ideas clearly cannot have any? Well, because they activate and reinforce a peculiar psycho-social conditioning.

Communist writer Bertol Brecht framed European traditions and their defenders as a "foul beast", and since then, the expression has been widely re-used by globalists. Nothing to do with reason of course—this is a purely emotional, framing, and custom-related conditioning, and that works. Before you took the red pill, wasn't the dirtiness of “Nazism” seemingly obvious? If you are truly red pilled, it should be much less obvious now.

How we can use it as well

Shakti, a Hindu personification of indefinite possibilities. A thousand arms can achieve a lot

The first step is to free ourselves from the Leftist conditioning. This consists into distancing ourselves from, identifying clearly and deconstructing the framings, concepts and other reflexes we have been “educated” with. Some of these can be used, thus turning into tools into our hands instead of outwardly imposed limitations, some ought to be simply rejected.

The second step consists in crafting our own cultural content and concepts. This means, of course, re-inverting what had already been inverted, and venturing into “forbidden territory.” The Alt-Right has done a good job at inverting the stigma against “fascism” by turning it into something fashy, which looks like fashionable and takes up some coolness instead of vegetating at the wrong side of the system.

This also means we have to push for healthier norms. Fat-shaming is good. Disgusting, complacent obese girls are unhealthy and unclean on all points of view—they should be ashamed. The same goes with pedophiles and race-destroying miscegenation. Make a healthier and truer common sense great again.

Before that, we have to troll a bit—and what is trolling after all if not our own version of the Left and baby-boomer’s “revolution” and “emancipation”?

To conclude, I would like to share the following suggestion made by a former liberal:

> When an artist submerges a crucifix in a jar of his own urine, or smears elephant dung on an image of the Virgin Mary, do these works belong in art museums? Can the artist simply tell religious Christians, “If you don’t want to see it, don’t go to the museum”? Or does the mere existence of such works make the world dirtier, more profane, and more degraded?
>
> If you can’t see anything wrong here, try reversing the politics. Imagine that a conservative artist had created these works using images of Martin Luther King Jr. and Nelson Mandela instead of Jesus and Mary. Imagine that his intent was to mock the quasi-deification by the left of so many black leaders. Could such works be displayed in museums in New York or Paris without triggering angry demonstrations? Might some on the left feel that the museum itself had been polluted by racism, even after the paintings were removed? (Jonathan Haidt, The Righteous Mind, chap.5)

If one believes that “Nazism” and defending one’s country are somehow dirty, but sees nothing wrong with trannyism and being aroused by children, one deserves being “triggered.” Let’s shape the unspoken rules of the acceptable and unacceptable, no matter the hysterical reactions we meet with, until they are just as they ought to be.

Read Next: How Irrational Fear Is Being Used To Control Your Behavior

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

10 Lessons That Ancient Egyptian Wisdom Taught Its Young Men

May 5, 2017 | by Narmer Bull | Link | Original Link

Work, pass on your genes, then die. The formula for civilized man is simple. The things to do in between are the confusing parts. How should you behave? When should you marry and have kids? What should you do when your boss is angry? Are your friends bad for you?

The load has always been particularly heavy on the middle class man, mostly because what is required for him to be successful and socially respectable forces him to conquer his inherent pride. This may seem impossible, but as far back as New Kingdom Ancient Egypt (1550-1070 BC), the task had already been broken down into easily digestible memes, ready for sharing with one's social equals.

The Instruction of Any is a father's advice to his son. It was intended to teach average young men the habits that would ensure their success in a stratified society. What's unique about this instructional text is that the audience is free to be critical of these habits. However, more than 3000 years later I can't pretend that they aren't still effective.

1. Marry young

> Take a wife while you're young, That she make a son for you; She should bare for you while you're youthful, It is proper to make people. Happy the man whose people are many, He is saluted on account of his progeny.

We can't all be pyramid building ubermensch, but we do all have the natural capacity to triumph over our own mortality.

2. Repeat proper observances

> Observe the feast of your god, And repeat its season, God is angry if it is neglected.

Whether you believe in Osiris, Jesus or Superman — you do have an option to exercise some sort of control over the many things that seem beyond your influence. Follow the behaviour pattern, try to imitate your supernatural ideal, and you will avoid a life of chaos.

3. Avoid women of disrepute

> Beware of a woman who is a stranger, One not known in her town; Don’t stare at her when she goes by, Do not know her carnally. A deep water whose course is unknown, Such is a woman away from her husband. “I am pretty,” she tells you daily,” When she has no witnesses; She is ready to ensnare you, A great deadly crime when it is heard.

The nature of this woman was elucidated millennia before her profile picture matched with you on Tinder. That’s millions of men who have had their egos inflated to stupidity by the same feminine archetype — an undignified level of responsiveness.

4. Don’t argue

> In a quarrel do not speak, Your silence will serve you well.

Has a person ever thanked you for correcting them because they enjoyed that learning experience and admire the scale of your knowledge? People don’t want you to surprise them, and certainly do not want you to make them feel ignorant.

5. Do not take to drink

> Don’t indulge in drinking beer, Lest you utter evil speech And don’t know what you’re saying.

That cool calming throat lotion was an essential form of nutrition for the average Egyptian slave. There is no need for you to debase yourself any further than middle class.

6. Use friendship as an opportunity to improve your character

> Keep away from a hostile man, Do not let him be your comrade; Befriend one who is straight and true, One whose actions you have seen. If your rightness > matches his, The friendship will be balanced.

The high-school friend who told you about that time he stabbed a guy in the head with a ballpoint pen may have entertained you, but it was your Nietzsche-quoting-ROK–reading gym friend who improved you.

7. Save selfishly

> Let your hand preserve what is in your house, Wealth accrues to him who guards it; Let your hand not scatter it to strangers, Lest it turn to loss for you. If wealth is placed where it bears interest, It comes back to you redoubled; Make a storehouse for your own wealth, Your people will find it on your way.

Poverty in the developing world is always blamed on the "selfish middle class man". Indeed selfishness is not a characteristic of the poor, who are unwise with their money.

8. Work the soil

> Learn about the way of a man Who undertakes to found his household. Make a garden, enclose a patch, In addition to your plowland; Set out trees within it, As shelter about your house. Fill your hand with all the flowers That your eye can see; One has need of all of them, It is good fortune not to lose them.

Ancient near-eastern literature has a common tradition of idealizing man as a gardener or caretaker of the natural world. There may be some value in this hobby that would be worth indulging in.

9. Stay away from the herd

> Do not enter a crowd, If you find it in an uproar, And about to come to blows. Don't pass anywhere near by, Keep away from their tumult, Lest you be brought before the court, When an inquiry is made.

Much like the reason joining a gang doesn't appeal to the thinking man, if a group of people can reduce the idea motivating their behaviour to a colour, item of clothing or slogan; it's probably a poorly conceived, error riddled idea.

10. Charm your superiors

> Do not talk back to an angry superior, Let him have his way; Speak sweetly when he speaks sourly, It's the remedy that clams the heart. Fighting answers carry sticks, And your strength collapses; Do not vex your heart. He will return to praise you soon, When his hour of rage has passed.

The ancient Egyptian couldn't lose his job or be promoted but you can. Common sense should dictate that you control your temper and quietly climb the ladder.

Conclusion

Any's instructions are easier to keep in mind than they are to habituate. That's because they were not intended to flatter. Common people share common experiences regardless of which country or period of human history they live in. His intention, I imagine, was to alleviate the burden of middle class existence on those capable of learning.

Read the Instruction of Any in Lichtheim, M 1976. Ancient Egyptian Literature Volume 2: The New Kingdom. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Read More: The Ancient Egyptian Story That Planted The Seed Of "Social Justice”

Narmer Bull

A coloured South African, and student of the ancient near east.

Today Is The Final Vote Of The 2017 French Presidential Election

May 7, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

UPDATE: Emmanuel Macron has won the election. Click here for our post-election coverage.

Right now the French are voting on their next president, which will either be Emmanuel Macron, a man who we wrote about in the past for marrying a woman who is as old as his mother, or nationalist figure Marine Le Pen. The vote will take place just days after allegations surface of Macron having an offshore banking account for the purpose of evading French taxes. Feel free to share results in the comments below.

French media goes all-in for Macron

What some Frenchmen may do if their candidate loses

More French propaganda for the globohomo candidate

France today

Is Le Pen going to follow through on her promises if she wins?

Obligatory Deus Vult

Don't Miss: France's Cucked Presidential Frontrunner Is Married To A Woman 24 Years Older Than Him

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Wikipedia Is A Dire Warning Of What Happens When You Let Social Justice Freaks Take Over

May 7, 2017 | by Jean Valjean | Link | Original Link

Since I first began editing Wikipedia in 2004, I've observed its devolution (paralleling that of RationalWiki) from a rapidly-growing collaboration run by slightly left-of-center secular humanists, who at least attempted to allow their critics' viewpoints some semblance of fair coverage, into a much more blatantly and unapologetically SJW-dominated platform that stifles dissent.

Events like the Manning naming dispute decision, and the rise of radically feminist administrators like Alison (NSFW), not to mention the egregiously unjustified decision at Wikipedia:Miscellany for deletion/Wikipedia:WikiProject Seduction to "friend zone this project, without even a number close", pretty much told us the writing was on the wall.

Wikipedia has always had its critics and malcontents, many of whom have made it onto the list of banned users. What I see now, though, is that even those in charge of Wikipedia don't take the project seriously anymore. The more thoughtful, reasonable, unbiased users have been driven away from the project, so that there are few left but a handful of aspergic monomanics who mostly toil away unnoticed on obscure topics, while leftist ideologues document every new development in the evolution of rape culture. Meanwhile, trolls who don't seem to actually have any sincere ideological ax to grind are the most actively involved in the day-to-day management of the project. High-ranking Wikipedians even admit that they toy with users for the lulz.

Probably the most honest, straightforward, and succinct guidebook to how Wikipedia actually works is Wikipedia:WikiSpeak. It notes that on Wikipedia, "conflict of interest" refers to "Editing an article on any subject that you actually understand. Uncommon, and sanctionable, expertise."

Adding content to Wikipedia has always has been a frustrating, disappointing experience. It's always been a challenge to make even high-quality content stick. And there have always been dickheads around whose attitudes have made the experience less pleasant. Yet, in recent years, it seems to have gotten worse.

The Rise of Paid Wikipedia Editing

As the number of volunteers willing to edit Wikipedia has been declining, there's been increased interest in paid editing. If you build up a reputation for quality work, you can make hundreds or thousands of dollars per article writing on behalf of companies, organizations, people, etc. who want you to handle their Wikipedia reputation management. You just write the article, have one of your many on-call meatpuppets post it to Wikipedia for you, and collect your payment.

Plus you can have the client sign up to pay you an annual fee for continuing to edit the article on their behalf as needed. The reason the pay is so high is that only a few people are familiar enough with the labyrinthine complexities of Wikipedia rules and culture to be able to successfully navigate the process. There's an alphabet soup of obscure Wikipedia policies, guidelines, and essays, each with its own acronym, that Wikipedians make reference to in discussions.

Theoretically, if you're a paid editor, you're supposed to publicly disclose your clients, your connection to them, and the edits you make on their behalf. But that's sort of like accepting a girl's invitation to tell her about your emotional vulnerabilities. It's not going to end well. Just like she'll lose respect, Wikipedia's vigilantes will treat you with disrespect too.

A lot of Wikipedia administrators and their friends have made a hobby, or at least an amusing pastime, out of griefing those paid editors who diligently followed the rules by revealing their "conflicts of interest." Some of their trolling techniques are straight out of the SJW playbook. For example, consider the action by perpetual drama instigator Jytdog, which I present as a case study.

Jytdog v. Janweh64: Armageddon Over an Imaginary Breach of Protocol

Like a whiny girlfriend, Wikipedia's SJW-style trolls distract from civilization-building by picking fights over nothing.

Paid editor Janweh64 has been reported to Administrators Noticeboard/Incidents for following Wikipedia's exhortations to "be bold" and "ignore all rules" by moving to the mainspace an article draft that pretty much everyone agrees doesn't contain anything objectionable. The beef people have with him is more procedural than substantive, making Janweh64 arguably in the right since supposedly "Wikipedia is not a bureaucracy".

The wiki way is that if you have a problem with someone's actions, you simply revert them with an edit summary explaining why, and then he can open a discussion if he wants to reinstate the changes he made. This tried-and-true method of wiki interaction, called the BOLD, revert, discuss cycle, allows problems to be fixed quickly and with minimal drama. It was by empowering individual users in this way that Wikipedia was able to leap ahead of Encyclopedia Britannica to become the most comprehensive encyclopedia in the world.

But SJWs, and those who take inspiration from their techniques, can never let a mistake (or a perceived mistake) go so easily. They're like the women Sean Connery described who "can't leave it alone. They want to have the last word. Then you give them the last word, but they're not happy with the last word. They want to say it again and get into a really provocative situation." Now that the "point and shriek" stage of the SJW-style attack is complete, Jytdog seeks to elicit an apology:

> This path of acting aggressively in order to support your paid editing and then arguing fiercely to defend your aggressiveness is just going to lead to an indefinite block per NOTHERE. None of the volunteers here want to waste time > any time at all dealing with this, which is just about you making money. Don't you get that? What little patience people have, you exhaust by doing this. There are some paid editors who disclose what they are doing, and who "get it" and create no drama and they add value to WP. You could have been one of them, perhaps. Not what you are choosing… so be it. . . . .

>
> The way out of this particular hole is just to say "Hey, I get it. I am sorry. I will not move my own paid articles to main space anymore, but will appeal through normal channels if I feel an AfC review was unfair. Again, my apologies for creating drama. It is important to me that I remain in good standing with everybody. " Something like that. but mean it, and do it, and don't do stuff that causes people to drag you here.

In response to this, Janweh64 actually bends over and gives him the apology:

> In light of the new changes/clarification here by Jydog on March 13 to WP:COI, I will not move my own paid articles to main space anymore, but will appeal through normal channels if I feel an AfC review was unfair. My apologies for creating drama, again. It is important to me that I remain in good standing with everybody. I was truly unaware and not informed of these changes to this guideline specifically made after just a mere 20 days from my previous ANI, which was archived unclosed.

Janweh64 is making the exact statement that Jytdog just suggested he make, almost verbatim, while also pointing out in his own defense that Jytdog recently made a change to the rules without notifying him. Jytdog continues the attack, using the SJW "Reject and Transform" strategy in which the apology is promptly rejected because it is not the action, but the actor, that is the real target:

> Janweh your response promises that this particular problem will end, which is a good thing but the rest of what you write there is argumentative and… horrible. The prior ANI thread from only two months ago was also called "Paid editor moving own drafts to mainspace" and in that thread several editors told you the same thing you have been told here.
>
> In other words, every single editor who commented there and here wasted their time. That is what you just communicated. That you are going to treat WP guidelines and policies like "rulebooks" that you will exploit as hard as you can in order to make money here, and you will ignore community feedback.
>
> That is nothing like what I advised you to write. You can let your comment stand or strike it, but you should be aware of how bad for you, your post was.

Endercase Rectifies The Situation

Finally, Endercase, a user who currently is under remedial "mentorship" (aka wiki-probation) and probably will end up getting banned at some point for fraternizing with unpersons and being too much of an outspoken wiki-dissident, chimes in and flips the script:

> @Jytdog: This user is nothing like you appear to portray them in your above statement. "You can let your comment stand or strike it, but you should be aware of how bad for you, your post was." They have declared COI and they are following policy/consensus to the best of their understanding. You have "won" here, I do not understand your apparent hostility nor your apparent failure to AGF. IMO this should have never been brought to AN/I (where it wastes our time) clearly (IMO) just having a discussion on the user's talk page would have sufficed… I agree with your sentiment, just not the methods that have been used and are suggested to be used here.

Having been called out, Jytdog decides to back away rather than risk overreaching and exposing himself to counterattack. But of course, he doesn't apologize for his own personal attacks (since that would just draw attention to the fact that he arguably broke the civility rules), and he gets in a few final digs before leaving, in keeping with the SJW principle that "They always double down when confronted with their lies":

> …this issue of moving their own paid articles to mainspace has arisen again. The first instance was semi-understandable. That this 2nd thread exists at all is hard to understand, as is the slipping back into the fierce arguing to justify marginal behavior. That this 2nd thread ended with with them making a wikilawyering argument half-justifying that this happened again, is bad for them. It is on the path where they lose.
>
> I do agree that this thread should be closed. I still hope that Janweh has the good sense to strike and make a more clueful statement before that happens, but if they choose to let it stand, so be it.

Janweh64 is thus being once again blamed for provoking “drama,” and is being extended one last invitation to engage in some more ritual self-abasement that can later be used against him, in the vein of, “Janweh64 even admitted last time that he was in the wrong, but instead of changing his behavior after being warned twice, now he has made it necessary to open up a third thread. When will we finally say, enough is enough?”

Wiki-Vigilantes Encourage Paid Editors to Turn to the Dark Side

Hire some meatpuppets, and do some undisclosed paid Wikipedia editing, and your journey toward the dark side will be complete.

What may eventually happen is that Janweh64 will get fed up and become an undisclosed paid editor (as he should have done from the beginning). His growing awareness of the inequity is evident in his comment, “you are punishing me for declaring my COI religiously when 1000s of others are right now editing with no declaration.” He’s beginning to unplug and take the wiki-red pill, as he sees how counterproductive it is to be the nice guy who follows the rules. How long before he tires of seeing the bad boys get all the wiki-pussy while he wiki-masturbates?

Jytdog has been called out before for, interestingly enough, “trying to own the discussion at Talk:Jews” and a cursory review of the archives reveals that the same group of defenders shows up whenever he gets accused of anything. This is part of a larger pattern in which users who are members of the same clique as the administrators get forgiven for their “innocent mistakes,” while others get banned however abjectly they apologize for their trivial (or imaginary) transgressions.

Like prosecutors, the administrators interpret the rules broadly to proscribe their adversaries’ behavior, and interpret rules narrowly that contain exceptions the accused might cite in their defense. They demand strict application of rules when doing so favors their side; but call for flexibility to depart from the rules when that would suit their purpose instead. Meanwhile, in accordance with the SJW tactic “Isolate and Swarm”, users like Endercase who have an inconvenient habit of pointing out that the emperor wears no clothes get marked for elimination.

It used to be that, despite Wikipedia’s flaws, it was still a place where you could have some useful accomplishments as a content creator. But now, while spergs continue to quietly build about 90 percent of Wikipedia’s useful content, outside of areas like biology, science, medicine, the War of 1812, etc., Wikipedia has mostly devolved into a playground for entryist SJW trolls. Meanwhile, the donations continue rolling in from well-meaning chumps.

Nonetheless, Wikipedia has a lot of useful infrastructure, built up by many unsung heroes in the MediaWiki development community. So I would say, the best strategy is that (1) if you want to make money as a paid editor, go ahead and take advantage of this “enjoy the decline” situation through undisclosed conflict-of-interest editing; and (2) if you like creating content and have nothing better to do, go ahead and add articles to Wikipedia, but save copies of your content for reposting to Infogalactic, Kings Wiki, or whatever other niche wiki would be appropriate, in the event of deletion. And of course, (3) munch popcorn and enjoy watching the lulzfest that is Wikipedia’s kafkaesque online dystopia, if you’re sick enough to be into that kind of thing.

Read More: Introducing Kings Wiki, A Wikipedia For Us

Jean Valjean
Jean Valjean is a MediaWiki developer and co-founder of Kings Wiki.

How To Maxald Your Abdominals For Better Digestion And Neurological Control

May 7, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

We all love Maxick here on Return of Kings, don't we? Or at the very least, I and my other gilded age aficianados love the rural Austrian's techniques of flexing various muscles that nobody could imagine were capable of being flexed.

By this point we've already learned how to do the latissimus dorsi, the trapezii, and the pectoral muscles, but there's a lot more to do on the upper body. One of the biggest, most notable and, indeed, most important to do are those of the abdomen.

Of course, you are likely already capable of flexing the abdominal muscles if you've been working out a little bit and you've ever felt the need to pick up a girl by asking her to punch you in the stomach (trust me, it works—after you've steered the conversation towards fitness of course, don't just say it as an opener like some sperg). But there is a lot more that you can do with your abdominal muscles than just tense them. Indeed, tensing them is by far the easiest thing you'll do—and I say that because I found this to be the most difficult of all of the exercises in the Maxick program.

Abdominal Relaxation

Before you can begin flexing and controlling the abdominal muscles, you must know how to completely relax them. In other words a body pose must be adopted that removes all strain from the abdominal muscle. And as you can imagine, where there is abdominal relaxation, the abdominal wall is soft and can be depressed with the finger.

Abdominal relaxation, or abdominal depression, is an exercise that is affected by external air pressure but it is the key to control of the double and single abdominal isolations.

So for the depression, you breathe all the air out, relax the abdomen, then thrust the chest forwards BUT NOT upwards. If you've done it right your abdominals should depress ala the picture below.

If you lift the chest UP, then it won't work there's not enough air pressure. The key is not to exert your abdominal muscles at all. When he says "not upwards", he means don't lean back. Push your chest forward until you feel that tightness, then do it. You should see the abdominals notably depress. And of course, as with most things Maxick, the more body fat you have the less visible this will be.

Double Perpendicular Isolation

Once you have done the depression properly, raise the arms. From here you will begin swaying the body backwards and forwards until you get the contraction.

If that sounds uselessly vague, I apologize, but there really isn't a better way of describing what you are supposed to do here. There is no explicit rule of how to move the body, you have to find it for yourself. In the book, Herr Maxick advocates that his students either go forward or backward. The contraction should be involuntary, or else the whole abdominal wall gets involved, and you only want to involve the rectus abdominus.

Central Single Perpendicular Isolation

Do the depression, and then without inhaling, press the hands in towards and slightly downwards the body, and you should see the effect of Figure 18. The hands should be at the base of the abdominal muscles, palms upwards, one hand resting in the other for convenience as in the picture. The wrist can be against the pelvis to start with, but you want to reduce hand pressure eventually. It is a question of correct position and movement.

Lean slightly forward when performing this exercise, to give increased abdominal play.

One Sided Perpendicular Isolation

This is exactly like the last one, except you only exert pressure with one hand on one side only. The simplest way to exercise this is to gradually change pressure from the center perpendicular to one side and then back, and then the other side. The lungs must remain deflated at all times.

Abdominal Rolling

This is accomplished by securing by contraction a depression in any part of the abdominal wall but bear in mind all other abdominal muscles must remain completely relaxed.

The position of the depression should change, working from the top to bottom. You can use your hands, but of course you should eventually do it hands free. When you do this properly it looks like a wave.

Sound difficult? It is, but doing so will not only strengthen and give you deeper neurological control over the abdominal muscles, but according to Maxick it'll help with digestion as well. And who doesn't want better digestion?

Read More: How To Control Your Shoulders With Maxalding

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

The French Have Elected Globocuck Emmanuel Macron And His Pro-Islamic Platform

May 7, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Globalist Emmanuel Macron, who favors open borders and is backed by Rothschild bankers, has won a resounding victory in the run-off election for the French Presidency. Current estimates project that he will win around two-thirds of the vote. Marine Le Pen, his nationalist challenger, has unsurprisingly conceded.

Yet is there a much bigger story looming? Against the backdrop of this very sad day, which will probably seal France's fate as an Islamized colony of Arabia and North Africa, the French media was banned from publishing news about a very embarrassing set of email leaks.

Rebel Media's Jack Posobiec became the first well-known figure to tweet about supposed Macron revelations from 4chan's /pol/ forum. These revelations include that the new President is gay, gets drugs bought for him by aides, and has offshore bank accounts for the purposes of tax evasion.

"We can't talk about the hacking details, but Russia certainly did the hacking"

A number of media outlets have quoted ex-Hillary Clinton campaign manager Robby Mook to try and push the narrative that Russia hacked Macron. Mook is a partisan hack whose professional reputation depends on claiming that he would have won Hillary the White House if the “Russians” hadn’t gotten involved.

The most common response by the mainstream media about the leaked emails, if you exclude the French outlets prohibited by law from discussing them, has been to blame Russia directly or insinuate that it is responsible. Accompanying this has been an extreme unwillingness to talk about what the emails actually say.

NPR, for example, has continued its woeful record as a biased source. It was quick to carry the leftist torch with this article. Yet despite having easy access to 4chan’s /pol/ section, it mentioned none of the damaging allegations against Macron discussed in the forum, let alone covered the in-depth analysis undertaken by contributors there.

Even far less unreliable outlets like Britain’s The Telegraph have somewhat jumped on the bandwagon, quoting such disgraced “sources” as Hillary Clinton’s 2016 campaign manager, Robby Mook. Having been beaten by Donald Trump, who never had the powerful support of the media, Wall Street, or academics, cronies like Mook have every reason to say that Russia heads a global conspiracy to discredit leftist Western politicians. Again, this article and others like it lacked any consideration of the substance of the leaked emails.

Surprise, surprise… one of the allegations is that Emmanuel Macron is gay

Gay?

GotNews, whose founder Chuck Johnson was instrumental in unveiling the UVA rape hoax, has seized upon news that the new French President may be on a gay dating email list. Called Vestiaire Gay, the website appeared in the trove of leaked messages. If authentic, Macron's homosexuality would prove correct the insistence of many of his detractors that his marriage to a woman a quarter of a century older than him is a sham.

Macron possibly lying about his sexual orientation and the reason for his marriage would also raise serious questions about both his character and integrity. France faces close to insurmountable problems, especially of the Islamic and demographic varieties. A candidate already supported to the hilt by high finance who can't even be open about which orifice he likes the most is one everyday Frenchmen and women not only do not need but should greatly fear.

Macron has taken legal action to counter claims he has offshore bank accounts, but the leaks suggest otherwise

The Cayman Islands, where many are saying Macron has an offshore account.

Just prior to the dumping of emails, Emmanuel Macron initiated legal action against Marine Le Pen for her comments about others' allegations he has an offshore bank account in the Bahamas. Le Pen, however, did not come close to accusing him of this.

Weirdly enough, one of Jack Posobiec's key disclosures has been 4chan's work on suspected offshore financial assets held by Macron at, you guessed it, a Cayman Islands bank in the Caribbean:

> /pol/ – Verification of Macron Cayman Bank Accounthttps://t.co/AneQmuHsmZ pic.twitter.com/11sZjqgbU4
>
> — Jack Posobiec □□ (@JackPosobiec) May 5, 2017

If verified fully by the authorities (presuming they are even interested), this would be a supreme irony. Why? Because until he started his own movement, Macron was a key architect of the superficially anti-corporate Socialist government.

Why did the French people vote for more of the same?

The future.

After the Paris nightclub massacre and the Nice truck rampage, Return Of Kings hoped that a more sensible man than François Hollande (or even a woman in the form of Le Pen) would become the next President of France. But, alas, the French people have voted in an establishment figure, a globalist who up until recently was one of the top advisors to the Hollande regime.

While the Macron emails purportedly show top aides buying criminalized narcotics online and references to getting the boss some "c.." (cocaine?), it seems the French people have their own drug of choice: denial. Only this can explain the turn of events unfolding in France over the weekend.

Let's face it: France is in for a tough five years–five years which in all likelihood will lead to a very miserable half-century. Be warned.

Read More: France's Cucked Presidential Frontrunner Is Married To A Woman 24 Years Older Than Him

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

There Are Only Two Sexes: Male And Female

May 8, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The biological principle of sexual dimorphism means that there are two differing forms for males and females. This is a characteristic of advanced species, including humans. It's a lot more than the feathers of a peacock or a lion's mane; these are far-reaching genetically-encoded differences. This contradicts the classical liberal "blank slate" idea and the modern liberal "social construct" argument that includes dozens of possible gender identifications.

Men evolved to be hunters and warriors; women evolved to be gatherers and nurturers of children. This has profound effects even for today's society. The weight of hundreds of thousands of years of evolution won't disappear by wishing it away. There are many differences, but I'll describe a few important ones.

Body type

First of all, men tend to be half a foot taller than women. Yes, statistical outliers do exist, such as six foot tall women and 5’6″ tall men. I will be discussing averages, including this. I point this out because those who argue against human differences will muddy the waters by citing exceptions, but outliers don’t invalidate the general average.

Other than that, men tend to be stronger than women, most pronounced with upper body strength. It makes sense that men should be adapted for greater physical strength, since we were the hunters and warriors for ages. Just as estrogen makes breasts grow, testosterone helps muscles grow. That’s why anabolic steroids work. This is why there are different sports teams and Olympic events for women. It’s not unheard of for trannies to get into women’s sports, where they have an unfair advantage; the officials haven’t taken the politically incorrect move of calling bullshit on that.

Overall, male aesthetics are linear and female aesthetics are curvy. The fat distribution patterns are different; a chubby guy will have a big gut, and a chubby woman will have a big butt, breasts and thighs. I don’t mind voluptuous women, but a woman with a male fat distribution pattern looks a bit strange. That tends to be associated with metabolic syndrome and PCOS, which is why it’s hard-wired as a turn-off.

There are even some remarkably obtuse feminists who say that these physical characteristics are only a social construct, and the reason these differences exist is because boys and girls are fed differently. In the real world, one meal is cooked for the entire family, and everyone eats what they want. People raid the refrigerator at will. Do girls today really look underfed?

This sexual dimorphism is reflected in the first two elements of the “666 formula” in personal ads by many women. This is “Must be six feet tall, must have six-pack abdominals, must have a six-figure income”, usually beginning a long laundry list of desired characteristics. The few guys qualifying don’t have to look for personals on Craigslist, but all that’s another story.

Psychological differences

The Rationalization Hamster generating an excuse

Psychology is a much fuzzier science than biology, but differences here can be observed too. In many ways, men and women are remarkably alike. (Dysfunctional female behavior doesn't happen because women are bad, but because today's screwed-up society encourages it.) Still, in many other ways it seems as if we're from different planets. In context, though, there's an internal consistency to some of it.

For one example, women tend to think men are too obsessed with sports, while men don't understand why women consider shopping fun. Granted, becoming too emotionally attached to games is irrational, and two hours of shouting at the TV while guzzling chips and beer makes you a couch potato. Still, as natural warriors, this sort of toned-down combat appeals to us. As natural gatherers, women instinctively provision for future needs. Rather than looking for berries and digging for edible roots, today's endless abundance provides supermarkets and malls. All that's fine and dandy until it takes a crowbar to get another blouse into the closet.

Women are pretty good at detecting social cues, which involves determining what people are feeling. This is a valuable skill for caring for very young children who can't talk. Unfortunately, it makes them believe that guys should be telepathic—"I shouldn't have to explain why I'm upset!" and all that.

Women tend to be more compassionate; that's also valuable to mothers. However, that's not so valuable to a hunter or warrior who might decide not to shoot an innocent animal or might spare a dangerous foe. Note that I'm speaking of women in a natural and healthy environment. In today's conditions corrupted by decades of feminism, compassion in women is at an all-time low.

Other than that, men tend to be more practical. I've observed this myself time and again. Part of this is from laxity in current social standards; past generations were far more practical. However, even today, a guy wouldn't be able to get much mileage by acting like a damsel in distress.

It's a broad generalization that men are more logical and women are more emotional. There seems to be a biological basis for this stereotype. Maybe one of these days, brain scans will discover the Rationalization Hamster.

Natural sex roles and careers

Lunch break hundreds of feet above ground

The truth is that men and women are naturally suited to different jobs. This is why you don't see too many women in coal mines, drilling rigs, and construction sites. Modern technology eases labor somewhat, but it can never do so completely.

Males are more interested in technology. It goes all the way back to day one. In baby studies, both boys and girls pay attention to faces, but boys pay attention to objects too. In the end, this is one reason why guys are more interested in science and technology. There are exceptions, of course, but programs to get more women into STEM fields won't do much because few are interested in nerdy stuff.

In the past, women did the spinning and weaving and clothing production. Most cultures in the world had beautiful peasant dresses for the women and traditional costume for the men. Mechanization is more labor-efficient, and during the Industrial Age, women became the garment workers, but were no longer the designers. International standards then were set in Paris every year. Now that gay guys took over the fashion industry, the results aren't an improvement. Needlework is a dying art. In the past, old clothes would be repaired, re-purposed, cut up for quilts, or used as rags. Today, clothing is disposable, which is rather inefficient.

Combat is best suited for men, notwithstanding the semi-legendary amazons. Today, many "grrrl power" movies show waifs defeating several larger opponents, but that's just not how it works in the real world. Even martial arts skills (which most people don't have) only get you so far. This does today's women a grave disservice by giving them unrealistic expectations. The Antifag activist who boasted that she would take "100 Nazi scalps" discovered reality within seconds. Lowering military standards for political correctness is obviously a very bad move.

On that note, it certainly is right for a woman to defend herself and her children to her utmost ability whenever in danger. However, it's irrational for anyone to be overconfident and take careless risks. Unfortunately, militant forms of feminism promote aggressive confrontation, as seen with specimens like Big Red. Does a rational man start cursing in another man's face? He doesn't, because that's a good way to get into a senseless fight, resulting in potential injury and legal consequences. Guys never act like that unless they're drunk or stupid.

Are there some things that women are better at than men? Absolutely! To mention a couple of obvious ones, men are absolutely no good at bearing children or breastfeeding them. We couldn't do that if our lives depended on it. (We do help get things started, of course.) The ability to create life could be considered a delegated divine power. It's too bad that the feminists, as out of touch with their own feminine nature as they are, think so little of their unique ability.

All that being said, it's not wrong for women to pursue careers, but family must come first. Future generations depend on it. Wasting their prime years on partying and pointless consumerism isn't a good life plan.

In conclusion

Actually, quite a bit.

Men and women are just different. This isn't a bad thing; in a healthy society, we complement each other. In fact, differences are a good thing. Although today's leftists have an unnatural desire to make everyone the same (human differences scare the daylights out of them), a unisex world would be dreadfully boring.

Unfortunately, feminism tries to explain away sex differences, usually blaming it all on us. They're all too often neurotic and unable to cope with reality, yet try to dictate terms to society. Since they're unwilling to embrace their own femininity, they shouldn't corrupt other women. It's even more ridiculous when they try to tell men how to be men. The feminists and other would-be social engineers should just let it be.

Read More: The End Game Of Feminism And Cultural Marxism Is To Eliminate Sex Differences

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Germany Takes First Step Towards Legalizing Rape Committed By Muslim Men

May 8, 2017 | by Damian Black | Link | Original Link

Recently, a German judge has acquitted a Turkish drug dealer, fully understanding that he forcibly and undeniably violated a woman for four hours to the point of incapacitation. The reason for lack of conviction was that the perpetrator was presumed to not culturally understand what rape was. As described, due to the "mentality of the Turkish cultural circle" (note Turkey is more than 95% Muslim), the Turk was simply participating, in his opinion, "wild sex". In the justice's words, "A conviction is not possible, because no intention is demonstrable."

The defendant maintained that he would never do such a thing because he himself had female relatives. The victim herself, who personally described her direct refusal and the subsequent brutality, when asked "Could it be that the defendant thought you were in agreement?", agreed. Acknowledged as a "heavy blow" for the injured party, the violent sex was not considered rape and the charge dropped..

Europe’s Rape Crisis

This is not a unique event. Rape waves have been reported everywhere Muslim refugees have been allowed, and mainstream media always remains silent, if not attempting to defend or falsify the offenses when forced to. However, the particular incident is notable as an official declaration of the German, and likely all Western European, government.

Let them come, and let them rape without consequence.

The leftist narrative has indoctrinated German natives so strongly that their inclusive multicultural respect and bureaucratic conformism is even able to warp what is beyond doubt rape into an offensive cultural question, a question both a legal authority and the sexually assaulted woman answered yes to.

Nothing was hidden, nothing concealed; all evidence was confirmed and understood, only to be disregarded as an ethnic misunderstanding.

After importing real rape culture into their societies, the people of Germany are rarely successful at reporting cases against Muslim miscreants, and even more rarely at winning them.

Police would rather cover up these crimes, including rapes of their own women, than risk their careers and income, for fear of being branded an Islamophobe in a multicultural society.. One national study showed that less than ten percent of men that are accused of rape are convicted (expectedly, religious and ethnic background were not distinguished)

Where is the national outcry?

Despite the liberal media's best efforts to eliminate accusations and convictions of migrant crime, the engines of truth render such information indestructible and available to all those who search for it. Those who do know, though they may personally defend their friends and family, lack the political influence and population to change their crumbling society. Some leave, knowing they are unable to eliminate the newfound threats of their ancestral home, becoming refugees themselves of their invaded nation.

Enraged German men protest against police for their incompetency against combatting Muslim rape

As the Islamic state is given free reign to accomplish cultural dominance, the useful majority continue with their lives, unconcerned about the very existence of their people. The harsh fact remains that the patients offered the red pill have always been in the minority. There is no outcry because the people who are capable of action, the men, have been raised from birth along with their women in pacifist, draining environments, and indoctrinated in multicultural acceptance and enthusiasm.

How does the liberal institution portray these events?

The issue with promoting a narrative of lies is that you must handle the flagrant inconsistencies your followers see.

Silence is a simple tactic to to allow your pawns to never even notice events they would otherwise be outraged at. It is for those who lived pampered lives and would never deign to search for anything beyond their popular “news”, who would readily deny and attack the existence of anything beyond the institution’s instruction.

However, hiding the violent realities of multiculturalism is impossible. There is one far more powerful strategy, one heavily evident in this case: distortion. Warp the mind of the culture, and you are able to do anything, even the most heinous acts out in the open and in front of the faces of those you control.

Leftist schooling appears to explain away all events as ludicrous, an exceptionally rare accident, a racist misunderstanding, or a complete fabrication entirely. Few escape the system, and most who do are directly scarred from personal attacks.

The culture war is a fight for truth, and the innately arduous conversion process takes decades to enlighten a significant portion of men. But as the years pass in decline, does the process hasten in immediate realization or stagnate as the nation falls deeper into institutionalized ignorance? The choice is yours, Germany.

Read more: Congratulations To Feminists For Helping Import Actual Rape Culture To Germany

Damian Black

Damian Black is an American nationalist deploring the decline and seeking to rid the scourge of oblivion. Visit his nascent personal interest: The Black Decree

The Digitization Of Classic Books May Lead To A Dangerous Form Of Censorship

May 8, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

In most situations it is not technology itself that is the problem, but rather how that technology is used. Motivations and objectives of the users matter far more than the medium. Consider the so-called “digitization” of books: we can say that it has the potential both for good and evil. On the hand, its proponents can praise the fact that the digitization of old or rare books has made them available to more people than ever before. There is merit to this view.

Consider the project to make available the brilliantly illuminated Book of Kells, a masterpiece of medieval artistry. Digital databases now make available a tremendous number of old books to more people than ever before. On the surface, this sounds like an unqualified success; only a fool, proponents of digitization would say, would object to this kind of progress in the dissemination of knowledge. Yet we should always be mindful of the fact that technology is not—or should not—be seen as “good” for its own sake. Unless it is employed to serve a good end, it can only be seen as a neutral tool. In the wrong hands it can be an unqualified evil.

These were some of the thoughts that came to mind when I recently read an article about how some universities are abandoning book collections in favor of completely online digital databases. The article relates how the University of California at Berkeley is seeking to "meet the needs of the 21st century student" by slowly phasing out physical copies of books. One student interviewed even said he had never checked out a book from the library. Of course, this shift was presented like a step in the right direction, a bold leap into the modern world where everything would be at everyone's fingertips.

Of course it was. Every time institutions or authorities seek to curtail our freedom or access to information, such moves are portrayed as advances that are "helping" us or that are giving us more "freedom." The author of the article notes that most of the best materials are not digitized. Not only this, but online databases can contain a large amount of low-grade information. Perhaps most chilling of all is the fact that converting everything to a digital format makes it far easier for authorities to control the historical record. The Berkeley library article, cited above, made this chilling observation:

> Ignoring these older physical media, Dixon argues, is "erasing the past," until every scrap of information is online. And even then, there are other potential problems. The removal of 60 percent of the physical collection at the science library of the University of California, Santa Cruz, for instance, caused an uproar after it was reported that many of the books removed had been destroyed. A campus spokesman said that nothing had been lost from the scholarly record, since duplicates were retained in other libraries or available online. Given the short timeframe and seeming lack of consultation of the faculty, however, many critics expressed doubts that this was actually the case.

There it is: many of the books removed had been destroyed. So here we see the other big problem in digitization: the lack of accountability that the alleged work is being done. How can we be sure that these institutions are actually scanning the books that they claim to be scanning? Who is monitoring them? Are we willing to trust them for this task? I for one am not.

Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that they actually do what they say they will do. Suppose they do scan or digitize entire libraries. What then? Will it not be far, far easier for systems of authority to control or manipulate access to historical information? How can we be sure that the University of California will not one day decide to prevent access to all works written before 1950 as being "offensive" or not in tune with political correctness? You may laugh at this, or call me an alarmist, but I am not so sure. When it comes to our precious cultural heritage, we cannot place our faith in the same institutions that have been betraying that same heritage for the past forty years.

Seen from this perspective, digitization becomes a stealth technique of censorship. In the future, systems of power and control will not physically throw books into the bonfire; such symbolism would not suit the overlords of political correctness. But they will try to consign our heritage to oblivion in subtler, more devious ways. One can imagine a scenario like this unfolding:

1. Libraries and universities announce that they need to "free up more space" and make libraries "more accessible and welcoming" to a dumbed-down population too addicted to smart phones to know or care about anything beyond them. As in the assault on privacy, this will be done in a way that make the authorities look like they are trying to help us.

2. Political "leaders" mouth platitudes about expanding our "right to choose" and our "freedom of choice" and link this to the push to digitize all physical books they can get their hands on. No agencies or independent monitors are put in place to see that the books are being properly digitized. No one is checking to see what actually becomes of the old books once they are digitized.

3. The modern "library" now becomes a recreational space populated by homeless vagrants, gamers, and screaming young children. (Recall that the Roman forum in classical times was the scene of political debate but became in the Middle Ages a place for grazing cows). The only "books" available on the shelves are those in tune with political correctness. Older books—known to contain dangerous ideas—have been "digitized" and are (in theory) able to be accessed. But the fact that they are so squirreled away makes it unlikely that anyone can find them or easily use them.

4. The gatekeepers of the digital databases now begin to do the unforgivable: they start, in subtle ways, to tamper with the digital databases. Sentences vanish from books. Pages vanish from books. Some books become "illegible" slowly and surely. Rogue librarians take it upon themselves to purge or condense books they don't like. As the years go by, it becomes harder and harder to locate titles that are deemed “triggering” or “distasteful.” All of this, of course, is done under the guise of “helping” you or making life “easier” for you.

5. The keepers of the databases being to monitor and restrict access to their data. Roadblocks are put in place to deter seekers of knowledge about certain periods of history. Passwords and other forms of “authentication” are slowly put into place to restrict access. Your passwords can be revoked at any time, and thus your ability to learn can be monitored and revoked at any time.

6. Even if there is no overt tampering with data, digital databases are subject to easy destruction by weather, fire, electromagnetic fields, or human error. Physical books, by contrast, are much more difficult to destroy.

If all of this seems farfetched or absurd, think again. Some of the great classics of antiquity survived only in a few neglected manuscripts. In the case of the historians Tacitus or Velleius Paterculus, there was only one single manuscript that survived. When people no longer care about preserving their cultural heritage, it will inevitably be neglected. Monks in the Middle Ages used precious manuscript leaves for prayer-books because they did not care about what was written on the vellum or parchment. In the same way, some of the monuments of ancient Rome were cannibalized to build churches. The point is that someone has to stand guard over knowledge and information and prevent its destruction through neglect or malice. We have been far too willing to accept digitization of physical books without thinking of the inevitable consequences.

For me there is no substitute for a physical book. One of the older books I own is a history of New England published in 1798 in Boston. It was dedicated to president John Adams. Even after 220 years, it is still in good condition. The paper used in those days was high-quality, acid-free rag paper. When you hold it up to the light, you can see how strong it is; books published today just can’t compare to the beauty and durability of very old books. After all these years, it has not faded much, and the paper is not very yellowed.

Does anyone have confidence that our digital databases will still be around in 200 years? We can’t even read emails written 20 years ago. We should be very suspicious of digitization. I understand that we can’t stop the flow of technology; but we can hold our institutions to account. We must be willing to sound the alarm when the inevitable attack on the historical record begins. And make no mistake: the attack is coming. In some ways it is already here, as the article cited above demonstrates. In the meantime, buy physical books, and marvel at their beauty.

Read More: Relentless Media Censorship Is Bringing Us A Fate Worse Than Big Brother

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

The Girls Of Brazil

May 8, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Quintus Curtius joins me to discuss Brazilian girls and what they can offer men. We describe their general appearance, their demeanor, and what type of game will lead to successful intimacy with them. We share what you can reasonably expect from a 1-2 week trip there, including how much you will spend per day and how to stay safe in a country that has become more dangerous over the past decade. We also discuss if Brazilian girls are worthy for long-term relationships and marriage. Lastly, we analyze the direction Brazilian culture is headed, and if we expect a future decline in the women that puts them on par with American girls.

If you're enjoying my podcasts and getting value from it, consider making a donation. Click here to learn more about donating.

Listen on Soundcloud or download the MP3:

Listen on Youtube:

Subscribe on iTunes or add the RSS feed to your favorite podcast app. If you like the podcast, please leave a rating and review on iTunes.

Previous Podcast: Warning Signs That A Girl Isn't Worth Your Time

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Les Français Ont Élu La Couille Molle Mondialiste Emmanuel Macron Et Ses Positions Pro-Islamistes

May 9, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Emmanuel Macron le mondialiste, partisan des frontières ouvertes et appuyé par les banquiers Rothschild, vient de remporter une victoire écrasante à l'élection présidentielle française. Les estimations actuelles prédisent qu'il remportera aux environs des deux tiers de l'ensemble des votes. Marine Le Pen, son adversaire nationaliste, a été battue sans grande surprise.

Mais n'y aurait-il pas une bien plus grosse affaire qui se profile ? En marge de cette bien triste journée, qui scellera probablement le destin de la France en tant que colonie islamisée d'Arabie et d'Afrique du Nord, les médias français avaient reçu l'interdiction formelle de divulguer les informations concernant une série de mails fuités extrêmement embarrassants.

Jack Posobiec, du groupe Rebel Media, est devenu la première personnalité ayant partagé un tweet à propos des révélations sur Macron provenant du forum /pol/ de 4chan. Ces révélations affirment que le nouveau Président est homosexuel, a accès à des stupéfiants que lui fournissent ses assistants et possèdent des comptes bancaires offshore, ce qui le rendrait coupable d'évasion fiscale.

« On ne peut pas vous donner de détails sur la fuite, mais c'est sûrement la faute de la Russie »

Certains groupes médiatiques se sont penchés sur les déclarations de Robby Mook, ex-directeur de campagne d'Hillary Clinton, qui essaye de vendre l'idée selon laquelle ce sont les Russes qui ont piraté les mails de Macron. Mook est un médiocre propagandiste dont la réputation professionnelle dépend de sa capacité à faire croire qu'il aurait propulsé Hillary à la Maison Blanche si les « Russes » ne s'en étaient pas mêlé.

La réponse aux mails piratés la plus populaire parmi les médias traditionnels, ne tenant pas en compte les médias français qui avaient reçu l'injonction légale de ne pas en parler, est d'accuser la Russie ouvertement ou d'insinuer qu'elle est la coupable. On peut rajouter à cela une attention particulière de leur part à ne jamais parler de ce que contiennent réellement ces emails.

À titre d'exemple, NPR a renchéri dans son rôle de source sectaire et n'a pas mis beaucoup de temps avant d'afficher ses sympathies gauchistes dans cet article. Mais même avec un accès facile à la section /pol/ de 4chan, aucune mention ne fut faite des lourdes allégations concernant Macron que le forum mentionnait, et encore moins de l'analyse méticuleuse faite par ses membres.

Au rayon des sources encore moins fiables, nous trouvons le Telegraph britannique qui, comme les autres, n'a fait que se joindre au peloton pour aller relayer des « sources » peu crédibles comme Robby Mook, le directeur de la campagne 2016 d'Hillary Clinton. Après la déculottée que leur a administré Trump, qui n'a jamais bénéficié du soutien puissant des médias, de Wall Street ou des universitaires, Mook et ses acolytes ont tout intérêt à clamer que la Russie chapeaute une conspiration mondiale qui vise à discréditer les politiciens de gauche occidentaux. Une fois encore, cet article et ceux qui lui ressemblent ont totalement omis de se pencher sur le contenu des emails fuités.

Tiens donc… l’une des allégations est qu’Emmanuel Macron est homosexuel

Homo ?

GotNews, dont le créateur Chuck Johnson fut déterminant dans la révélation de l’affaire du faux viol d’UVA, (Université de Virgine) a sauté sur la nouvelle selon laquelle le nouveau Président français pourrait être enregistré dans la liste d’envoi d’un site de rencontres homosexuelles. Appelé Vestiaire Gay, cette anomalie a émergé de cette foule de messages fuités. Si elle est avérée, l’homosexualité de Macron justifierait l’insistance de ses nombreux détracteurs à soutenir que son mariage avec une femme d’un quart de siècle son aînée est bel et bien une mascarade.

Le fait que Macron mente à propos de son orientation sexuelle et des raisons qui l’ont poussé à se marier soulève aussi de graves questions quant à sa personnalité et son intégrité. La France va au-devant de problèmes insurmontables, particulièrement à tendance islamique et démographique. Un candidat qui est soutenu coûte que coûte par les hautes sphères de la finance et qui ne peut également pas dire quel type d’orifice il affectionne est un candidat dont les Français et Françaises de tout bord n’ont pas besoin et devraient grandement se méfier.

Macron a saisi la justice pour réfuter les accusations concernant ses comptes bancaires offshore, mais les emails lui donnent tort.

Les Îles Caïman, un des endroits où beaucoup accusent Macron de cacher un compte offshore.

Juste avant la publication des emails, Emmanuel Macron avait entamé une procédure judiciaire contre Marine Le Pen pour ses commentaires durant le débat sur les allégations d'autres sources à propos de comptes offshore aux Bahamas. Le Pen, pourtant, n'a fait que relayer les propos de sources extérieures.

En parlant d'étrange, l'une des découvertes clés de Jack Posobiec fut le travail de fond de 4chan sur les capitaux financiers suspects de Macron qui se trouvent, vous l'avez deviné, rattachés à une banque des Îles Caïman aux Caraïbes (Note du traducteur : certaines versions citent aussi l'île de Niévès).

> /pol/ – Verification of Macron Cayman Bank Accounthttps://t.co/AneQmuHsmZ pic.twitter.com/11sZjqgbU4
>
> — Jack Posobiec □□ (@JackPosobiec) 5 mai 2017

Si cette source vient à être vérifiée par les autorités, (si tant est qu'elles y portent un quelconque intérêt), cela tiendrait de l'ironie la plus totale. Pourquoi ? Eh bien parce que jusqu'à ce qu'il crée son propre mouvement, Macron était un élément déterminant du gouvernement socialiste soi-disant anti-puissances financières.

Pourquoi les Français ont élu les mêmes pour recommencer ?

Après les attentats du Bataclan et l'attaque au camion-bélier de Nice, Return Of Kings espérait qu'un homme plus sensé que François Hollande (ou même une femme dans le style de Le Pen) deviendrait le prochain Président de la République française. Mais hélas, le peuple de France a bien voté pour un représentant du système, un mondialiste qui, jusqu'à maintenant, étaient un des consultants les plus haut placés du gouvernement Hollande.

Alors que les emails de Macron laissent à penser que ses assistants directs lui achètent des stupéfiants illégaux en ligne et font référence à des "achats de c… (cocaïne ?) pour le boss", on dirait bien que les Français ont eux aussi leur drogue de prédilection: refuser de voir la vérité en face. Il n'y a que ça pour expliquer la suite d'évènements qui se sont déroulés en France ce weekend.

Disons-le franchement : la France va en baver pendant cinq ans – cinq ans qui ont de grandes chances d'annoncer un demi-siècle de malheurs sans précédent. On vous aura prévenu.

En Savoir Plus: Le Favori De L'Élection Présidentielle Française, Cette Couille Molle Marié À Une Femme De 25 Ans Son Aînée

---

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

7 Ways Short Men Can Achieve Higher Success With Women

May 9, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

After dozens of attractive girls have fallen into my athletic arms in Europe, Asia, and elsewhere, it appears reasonable to manifest that I am not short (!) of seduction ability and hence want to share my experiences and ideas on how to metaphorically rise to higher grounds, despite of being only 5 foot 6 inches.

Many of the game characteristics, such as being confident, approach, and optimize looks are likewise linked to shorter males. Still, there are some specific points to consider in this regard.

1. Embrace the Napoleon complex

In psychology there is a concept called the Napoleon complex, connected to the French military conqueror Napoleon Bonaparte, which implies that a short man feels an inner lack and consequently a need to compensate for his shortage of stature in various ways. Academics squabble about if the historical Napoleon was actually short or average for his time, and if there is any real evidence that confirms this hypothesis.

Regardless, the point is that there is some underlying truth in it. After all, girls generally prefer taller than shorter men. Therefore it is wise to embrace the Napoleon complex, real or not, in a constructive manner.

Realize that you have to work extra hard to improve your physique, style, career, confidence and social status. Be a thick-skinned little shitlord, but in a positive sense.

2. Maximize your strengths

Short but jacked

In addition to your height, you shouldn’t also fall short of other items on a girl’s list such as hair, clothes, body composition, face, confidence and social skills. Hopefully, you have already some of those and should maximize whatever area where you have potential.

Further, with regard to male–female polarity, fitness tends to be an important element for the little man. For example, part of my equation (more on that below) is to look for girls who are not necessarily shorter, but weighs 50-70 pounds less than me. When they compare their tiny shoulders and arms with mine (or yours), they feel like girls. A large share of normal females wants to feel feminine.

Thus don’t be the short guy. Instead be the short, athletic, good-looking and confident guy who gets girls. Or the ”cute guy” for that matter.

3. Be aware of your disadvantage but do not internalize it

Facebook inspirational quote

Studies, common sense, and observations show that being short is a real disadvantage. There is no point trying to deny it. You will see all kinds of good-looking girls who are let's say 5'8″ or 5'9″ but who will not consider you as an option (perhaps they might not even notice you down there), whereas a taller guy potentially can have both tall, average, or short girls. Also somewhat shorter girls can specifically prefer taller men in many cases.

However, do not internalize it, because if you do then it will be almost like a self-fulfilling prophecy. It is a pathetic loser-dom akin to how SJWs and other degenerates think and behave. Just go with the flow and do not over-analyze things. Everything you do comes from the mind.

4. Do not lower your standards

It might very well be the case that you will struggle to get a 7 and often, literally fall short, even if you have the other positive traits. Still that is not a reason to lower your standards.

Instead do the opposite. Like Machiavelli said in The Prince, aim for a high mark up in the sky and you will bang more 7s and 8s, even some 9s. It will also be easier to get 6s.

5. Enjoy the challenge

It is generally more of a challenge for a short guy, but once you are on the right path you will work hard and be thick-skinned in order to improve yourself (not just for the sake of girls, of course), and will not let anyone pin you down.

Sometimes you will also land comparatively taller girls and I bet it feels more like an accomplishment for the small male creatures than the larges ones.

6. Find your optimal girl spectrum

She will date a short man

Instead of thinking that girls might not want you, you should think about what kind of girls that you want. Select girls not based on resentment or fear of failure but on your particular preferences.

Typically your spectrum includes girls who are about 5′ to 5’7″ and who weigh significantly lower than you in order to create the often important sex dynamics and polarity mentioned above. In this way you will sort of zoom in your focal point.

It seems that online dating has become worse these days, but between 2011–2016 there was a free dating website called Happy Pancake in Sweden where you could filter your search results with regard to height and weight (or body type). In this way I knew that the girls were fit, cute and not too tall, and that I was not too short for them, and I had a significant number of notches due to this common sense strategy (in tandem with a fruitful profile presentation and favorable pictures). Obviously this is even easier to scan in real life.

7. Seek out fertile soil

My fellow American friends, it seems that unfortunately you have more fatties in your country (whereas Western Europe is probably equal with regard to other facets of self-inflicting ugliness, as well as social justice warriorism and feminism), which make things more troublesome. If America wants to be metaphorically great again, then it has to literally become smaller.

But even a Swede, not just shorter ones like me, may have to consider other destinations which offer a larger share of more petite girls. South America, East Asia and Southeast Asia may be good choices in that respect, but make sure that you can bang some of your cute local girls too, because otherwise it might be a sign of your own low status.

Read More: Lazy Fat Women Screech About Beauty Standards While Rejecting Men For Being Short

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Welcome To Political Correctness 2.0

May 9, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The truth cannot be concealed for long, especially in the internet age. A portion of the elite has recognized this and allowed discourse to move from political correctness version 1.0 to an upgraded 2.0 version where more real-talk is allowed. This permits them to build trust with an increasing percentage of the Western population that hates the heavy-handedness of the existing program.

Political correctness 1.0 was so strict and sniffling that it promoted a reaction which is currently threatening the entire globalist establishment. Here are tenets of the 1.0 program:

1. All races are equal
2. All sexes are equal
3. Homosexuals are just like heterosexuals
4. Islam can and should co-exist in democratic societies
5. Western civilization is the main cause of evil to minorities

6. Nation borders sacrifice human rights
7. Critique of Jews is anti-Semitic, and we must encourage Israel's existence

When I or other commentators refer to "globalism," we're generally describing a system of power that has built itself atop the 1.0 program since World War 2. The reaction to this program has gotten so intense that anti-globalism is now a broad-based movement that aims to bring down both the useful idiots and the puppet masters who control it.

I'm not entirely certain if existing globalists are deciding to move to a 2.0 program to retain their control, or if entirely new billionaires, such as Peter Thiel, are attempting a power grab for their own ends. Whatever the reality, and it's probably a combination of the two, some members of the elite are now using the upgraded political correctness program to appeal to those who reject the 1.0 version. Here is what we have in version 2.0:

1. Not all races are equal, but all races deserve equality
2. The sexes aren't equal, but both sexes deserve equality
3. Homosexuals are just like heterosexuals
4. Islam cannot co-exist in democratic societies
5. Western civilization should be praised
6. Nation borders are essential
7. Critique of Jews is anti-Semitic, and we must encourage Israel's existence

First let's describe what hasn't changed from 1.0 (points 3 and 7). Gays and Jews are still a protected class because they are the highest members orchestrating 2.0 (Peter Thiel happens to be gay). Egalitarianism in terms of sex and race (1 and 2) haven't been completely tossed aside, since "equality" is still seen as an ideal, but purple and red pill thoughts in those areas are more accepted. It's okay for media outlets operating on version 2.0 to state that black people are more prone to criminality followed by articles mocking feminism and other social justice insanities.

Three points have been completely reversed. First is Islam. Attacking the religion, its customs, and the terrorists it breeds is fair game, and perhaps the most consistent element of the 2.0 program that is even exhibited by liberals like Bill Maher. The second reversal is the praise of "Western civilization" with a focus on civic nationalism, which essentially means that people have to follow existing immigration laws. Lacking, however, is addressing how laws can be changed or what the specific racial demographic of a nation like the USA should be. The final reversal is the praise of national borders as a feature that can improve the safety and well-being of existing citizens.

When I refer to political correctness 2.0, I'm not referring to 4chan, the alt right, or other edgelord movements that don't place limits on their speech, but the rising power structures that include new media, pundit thots like Tomi Lahren, Twitter e-celebrities, and government politicians, especially the ones that exist in Trump's shadow.

The best examples of political correctness 2.0 right now are represented by Breitbart, Rebel Media, and the alt lite, who produce ideas and content that have wide reach because of the large number of people who reject the 1.0 program but who are not ready to completely throw away egalitarianism, discuss the Jewish Question, or embrace tradition. The low-hanging fruits of the 1.0 program were the KKK, racists who use the n-word, and caveman misogynists. For the 2.0 program, the low-hanging fruits are low IQ Islamists, fat feminists with green hair, and the mainstream media.

The 2.0 version is a step in the right direction, and will make my ideas of patriarchy slightly more accepting, but ultimately will fail just like 1.0 did, because it is counting on deliberate concealment of truths that simply can not be concealed in the internet age. I therefore predict that 2.0 will have a much shorter run than 1.0, and not stop a reactionary push where no lie can be successfully hoisted upon the public, and where no secret stays secret for long.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: Is Western Civilization Worth Saving?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Feminism Is Still Here Because Men Are Allowing It To Survive

May 9, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

In our day and age, there exists one very important red-pill truth which most people sub-consciously accept but which is unmentionable in polite society: namely, that women, ultimately, are entirely dependent on men. Indeed, it is arguably the greatest irony of the entire feminist movement that that movement is an undertaking which is fundamentally at the mercy of the very patriarchy that it despises, and it always will be. And so, all the women in Western society demanding equality, protesting about sexism, and screaming about the patriarchy, are only able to do so because they are tacitly permitted to engage in such behavior by the very men that they rail against.

Screaming against the very patriarchy that she is, in fact, ultimately dependent on.

First, note the obvious fact that men are naturally stronger, more aggressive, and more capable of serious violence than women. And lest you disagree, note that prisons are filled with a hell-of-a-lot more men than women; also note that an average male UFC fighter, for example, could easily beat even the very best female fighter in a one-on-one contest. So the fact that men, on average, are physically stronger and more proficient in the realm of violence and war is not really in dispute. And this is the first point to note.

Second, from a philosophical perspective, note that while we in the West talk quaintly about the idea of human rights, the fact is that while 'might does not make right', might does, in fact, make the rules. Indeed, human "rights" only have force because men with guns stand ready to enforce those rights. But without those men, it would take no more than a moment for those rights to be suppressed by whoever had the power to do so.

Indeed, just look at some third-world hell-holes to see who makes the rules there: warlords and other men with guns, who readily kill anyone who does not follow their rules, human rights be damned. Thus, the fact is that, in reality, might does indeed make the rules, regardless of whether we want it to or not.

Human rights or not, in their corner of the world, these are the guys who make the rules.

So, with the two aforementioned points in mind, now note the obvious conclusion that those points lead to: since men, on average, have more physical power and might than women do, and since might makes the rules, then men could, if desired, easily take the reins of power and thus make the rules for Western society once again. Indeed, since Western men have previously used their power in society to give women some power—think female suffrage, for example—then there is nothing theoretically preventing men from using force to take that power back on a whim.

What this means is that the freedoms, the rights, and the "equality" that Western women enjoy today only exist because Western men have permitted Western women to have these things. Thus, without either the tacit or overt the permission of men, women would, in practice, have none of the freedoms and rights that they currently enjoy.

Furthermore, even in today's modern society, where the disparity in physical power between the sexes has somewhat diminished due to the advent of technological equalizers, women are still dependent on men in an ultimate sense. After all, when some strapping 250-pound man starts beating his wife, the only thing, in the end, that will stop him is either another man or a women with a weapon most likely invented by a man. So again, women, in this respect, are still dependent on men.

Even when women can defend themselves against men through the use of technology, the fact is that the very technologies that women are using to give themselves physical parity with men were nevertheless largely invented by men, meaning that even in this respect, women's safety and freedom is still directly dependent on the will and knowledge of men. So even the technology that women can use to escape the need for men shows their ultimate dependence on the male gender.

Still using something that men invented…the dependence never ends.

In contradistinction to the main thrust of this essay, a woman might object that a man is utterly dependent on a woman in the sense that only a woman can give birth to a man and give him life. And in this respect, women are entirely correct. But even here, the value of women is dependent on the kindness of men.

For make no mistake, if men, as a collective, wished to do so—and, obviously, no one is condoning this, but the point is to make clear that it could theoretically be done—men could enslave all women in such a manner that they could do nothing but give birth at the whim of men. Indeed, a society where reproduction was achieved through near total female subjugation would be an abhorrent one, but the fact is that such a society could survive and even thrive to some degree, as it does in Afghanistan, for example.

Might makes the rules, and the only reason that such an absolute female oppressing society has not been created in the West—as it has in other parts of the world—is because Western men do not allow it, not because women could stop it. After all, men still make up most the 'fighting' professions, such as the police and the military, and so even with modern technology, women would not stand a chance in Western society if men ever decided to rise up as a collective against female freedoms and "equality". And while this truth may be harsh to hear for women, it is the truth nonetheless.

The reason that Western women ultimately have rights: because men like this allowed it.

Both now and in the future, the only reason that Western women enjoy any rights is because, ultimately, men have tacitly allowed women to enjoy those rights. And while certain men readily allow women to have these rights because doing so grants those men greater power in other areas—think politicians and the female vote—the fact remains that, in the end, the gains of Western feminism only exist because Western men have implicitly granted permission for those gains to exist.

If men, collectively, decided to change their minds about feminism tomorrow, and forcibly remove all the rights from women on a whim, there is, in fact, little that women could do to stop them. And Western women should not forget this fact. Nor should they forget that their existence in the West is arguably the best that they could ask for, and that to push men too far may ultimately lead to a backlash that women might rather not wish to experience.

Read More: The Power of Feminism

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

How Subversive KGB Tactics From The Past Are Being Used Today To Destroy America

May 9, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The Soviet Union made exporting revolution a high priority. Although the USSR is gone, the effects of their subversion campaign linger to this day.

The script for Communist takeover

KGB defector Yuri Bezmenov gave an in-depth look.

> [O]nly about fifteen percent of time, money and manpower is spent on espionage as such. The other eighty-five percent is a slow process which we call either ideological subversion or active measures, or psychological warfare.

He described how they recruited journalists and prominent figures to spread the Party line. Further, they compiled hit lists, including Communist sympathizers likely to outlive their usefulness after the Revolution.

Bezmenov described the revolutionary script as demoralization, destabilization, crisis, and normalization. After coming to the USA, he was horrified to see this process well in development. Let's see how his predictions from 1984 turned out.

Demoralization

> It takes from fifteen to twenty years to demoralize a nation… Because this is the > minimum number of years required to educate one generation of students… exposed to the ideology of the enemy. In other words, Marxism-Leninism ideology is being pumped into the soft heads of at least three generations of American students, without being challenged or contra-balanced by the basic values of Americanism, American patriotism.

This has been the standard brainwashing for college students since the 1960s. This is why subverting education was instrumental.

Getting the media on board—our other opinion-forming institution—surely was much easier, given all the fellow travelers and such-like already running the show.

> Most of the people who graduated in the sixties, drop outs or half-baked intellectuals, are now occupying the positions of power in the government, civil service, business, mass media, educational system. You are stuck with them. You cannot get rid of them. They are contaminated. They are programmed to think and react to certain stimuli in a certain pattern.

This is what the leftist "Long March through the institutions" did. The educational system is thoroughly pozzed out. Even the K-12 public schools have become indoctrination centers, with sickening results.

Propaganda saturates journalism, Hollyweird, television, the literary establishment, the music industry, and a great many magazines. It's even seeping into mindless entertainment like comic books and pornography. Many other institutions have been subverted, of course: government, big corporations, several nonprofits, even many religions.

> The demoralization process in the United States is basically completed already. For the last twenty-five years, actually it's over-fulfilled because the demoralization now reaches such areas where previously not even comrade Andropov and all his experts would even dream of such a tremendous success. Most of it is done by Americans to Americans thanks to lack of moral standards.

Destabilization

After society has been softened up, then the plan is to create chaos leading to a revolutionary ferment.

> This time, and it takes only two to five years to destabilize a nation, what matters is essentials. Economy, foreign relations, defense systems. And you can see it quite clearly that in some areas, in such sensitive areas as defense and economy, the influence of Marxist-Leninist ideas in the United States is absolutely fantastic. I could never believe it fourteen years ago when I landed in this part of the world that the process will go that fast.

The Age of Aquarius had a violent undercurrent. This included angry demonstrations that sometimes got out of hand, terrorism by leftist whack-jobs, and race riots. As G. Gordon

Liddy, an FBI agent and Watergate burglar, described:

> [W]e were involved in an exterior war in Vietnam, but they tend to forget that we were also embroiled in an undeclared civil war at home. And unless you can understand the nature of that struggle and the issues it posed for the administration in Washington, you'll never be able to understand my motives or the motives of my associates in undertaking the actions and running the risks we did. We were up against a formidable constellation of forces in those days, an alliance of influential elements of the media with a so-called counterculture that represented a Weltanschauung and lifestyle that were utterly repugnant to me. […]
>
> We didn't have a crystal ball at our disposal in those days that would inform us that mass student opposition to the war would peter out after the end of the draft, or that the racial cauldron in the big cities would eventually simmer down. We had to act on our best intelligence assessment of the forces arrayed against us, and that assessment was far from encouraging, particularly when you consider the revolutionaries.

As Vasili Mitrokhin, another KGB insider, said:

> The attempt to stir up racial tensions in the United States remained part of Service A's stock-in-trade for the remainder of the Cold War.

Actually, Communists have been up to that since the 1930s. Besides inner city riots, most other havoc was from the not-always-peaceful peace movement; it would be an obvious priority for the Soviets to hamstring the Vietnam War effort. This doesn't mean that all the protesters were taking orders from the KGB; most just didn't want to get drafted. Still, Soviet "active measures" (even when indirect) had their effect.

During the 1960s, chaos reached a fever pitch. Then during the Reagan years, things got almost as calm as during the 1950s. Afterward, disorder returned to approximately the late 1970s level and stayed that way.

Then during the Obama administration, angry demonstrations and riots against the police became relatively frequent. Often the participants included paid protesters bused in from out of state. Worse, on-duty police officers started getting assassinated. The agitation groups haven't been linked to that, though their rhetoric didn't quite promote tranquility.

Finally, 2016 saw rioting reminiscent of the 1960s. Was someone trying to start something? Is it merely a coincidence that was an election year?

Crisis

Occupy Wall Street protesters gather in Duarte Square in New York

The flash point begins:

> The next stage of course is crisis. It may take only up to six weeks to bring a country to the verge of crisis. You can see it in Central America now.

In the wake of the 2008 economic meltdown, Obama was elected, promising to fix the economy. He was also supposed to heal America's racial divisions, halve the deficit within his first term, get us out of war within a year, and give everyone a pony for Christmas. Somehow The Lightworker managed to get re-elected, proving conclusively that the masses have a short memory.

Surely there are those who can hardly wait to exploit (or engineer) some new crisis. What form this might take, and whether it might be more successful, is anyone's guess.

Normalization

> And after crisis with a violent change of power structure and economy you have so called the period of normalization… This is what will happen in the United > States if you allow all the schmucks to bring the country to crisis, to promise people all kind of goodies and the paradise on Earth, to destabilize your economy, to eliminate the principle of free market competition and to put big brother government in Washington DC…

In the end, they had to settle for the legal route, which means they didn't get everything they wanted. Therefore, it was a remarkably half-assed revolution. Rather than a radical Gleichschaltung, they got a dysfunctional healthcare law.

So the leftists got their mediocre "community organizer" elected. After that, they placed their hopes with Hillary, expected to run against some lukewarm Republican nominee.

Analysis

Items per year (all root causes) listed at:
https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_incidents_of_civil_unrest_in_the_United_States
This only lists incidents where an article exists, thus consider it unofficial.

*The "Long Hot Summer of 1967" actually included 159 race riots, only 8 listed

How much of the revolutionary activities beginning in the 1960s were caused by the KGB's "active measures" campaign? The circumstantial case is pretty compelling, but the full story hasn't yet been told. It's easy to underestimate how well-networked the radical left was.

I'll concur with Bezmenov that the demoralization process has been over-fulfilled. Leftists are still pushing psychological warfare. (In 1984, today's degradation would've been unimaginable.) Destabilization was very promising at first, but they failed to keep the ball rolling. Thus, they never got to the point where a violent overthrow was possible.

Then in 1991, the USSR dissolved. Thus, the KGB was no longer in control. Still, this was far from the end of the story. Their dysfunctional "for export" ideology—cultural Marxism, better known as progressivism—is still shoved down our throats by the schools and the media. Certain elements have embraced it, from SJW losers to petty bureaucrats to the ultra-wealthy (quite ironically) who find it useful for their purposes.

Cultural Marxism lost something vital after it was co-opted by a clique of decadent billionaires with a God complex. Although their shadow government (usually) can anoint the candidates for both parties, they still have to operate through figureheads. Their New World Order dictatorship isn't ready for prime time. They overplayed their hand. The public is getting wise to their games, and they lost their chance for Queen Hillary to finish the job on us.

We now have a fighting chance to restore national self-determination. The future is what we make it.

Read More: Soviet Defector Yuri Bezmenov Accurately Predicted How America Would Decline

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Samantha Bee And Other Globocuck Comedians Are Leading The Rise In Fake Comedy

May 10, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Comedian Samantha Bee did a parody of the White House Correspondents Dinner on TBS last weekend featuring actors roasting the president. As expected, it turned out to be dedicated to attacking the President while appearing to be smart comedy. She represents a new generation of comedians who share globalist talking points under the false guise of comedy.

Bee started the Correspondents show by joking about Ivanka Trump as the "Executive vice president of the American Revolution, the assistance to the President of the America Revolution," and this was followed by uproars of laughter. Bee later said "I know it looks like we have a cash bar tonight, but as I promised you in the invitation at a later date I will get Mexico to pay for all your drinks."

Bee played the act of calling the media out for fake news, but then offered condolences for having a hard job of fact checking the President. Somehow, all of these "jokes" were uproariously funny to the audience.

Fake comedians attack Trump without being funny

In segment two, Bee brought in no name comedians, one of whom showed Teen Vogue's article, "Donald Trump is Gas-lighting America" and then called for Teen Maxim to be published so boys don't have to go to 4chan and become "assholes." Bee followed with, "We are living in a golden age of journalism, unfortunately that's partly due to a golden President whose rumored to enjoy golden showers." She then jokingly put down CNN, and yet praised BuzzFeed for showing a Trump pee-tape picture of a woman urinating on him. Ha ha, so funny.

The fourth segment featured actors who all took turns insulting the President while congratulating him. Most of the jokes were directly or indirectly aimed at the president personally. The audience found all this hilarious.

Bee is a fake comedian

Girls, for the love of God, don't ever end up like this Full Frontal with Samantha Bee is a show that airs at prime time and seems to have surged high enough in the ratings to outperform her fellow comrade Trevor Noah from the Daily Show.

Much like Tucker Carlson, Bee rose quickly and now has an hour long show on a popular network. How she pulled this off without a track record of laughs is strange. She was a contributor on The Daily Show and has no big movies to her name, but since she caters to the liberal demigods, she's received their blessings of having her own show.

Like her predecessors, Bee is trying to be funny and cute by pretending to be the sharp reasonable comedian, but this failed approach has been tried by others like Stephen Colbert and Trevor Noah who all act tough with slick remarks and dirty insults. They're quick to praise the "achievements" of Obama, yet have nothing but hate for the new president.

While Bee tries to act objective, all of her jokes are unsurprisingly one-sided against the enemies of the globalist establishment. No jokes of the terrible Iran deal done by Obama or anything that has to do with liberalism or feminism. Just look at the pro-feminist band who performs on the show…

Bee has criticized Christians for being racist, yet never uttered word against the cruelty Islamic fanatics inflict on women. She called Justice Antonin Scalia an "obstructionist ass", Mitch McConnel "a chinless dildo", and Donald Trump "pint of flat orange Fanta."

Bee even insulted cancer patient Kyle Coddington of his haircut looking like a Nazi, but it's okay because she apologized and contributed a thousand dollars to his fund.

Other "comedians" such as Trevor Noah previously called Trump a racist without any proof, yet says nothing when Obama brought in Muslim refugees while leaving out Christians. Noah made millions of dollars in the very same country (America) whose culture he mocks as part of his comedy act.

The Correspondents dinner is part of a pattern

Hasan Minhaj of The Daily Show with Trevor Noah referred to the President as the elephant not in the room, stating "the leader of our country is not here, and that's because he lives in Moscow." He said Donald looked like he's been roasting long enough over the past seventy years, and that he would be better off golfing as it would prevent him from doing presidential things like starting wars.

Ben Stein found this non-funny comedian “sickening”, a nobody, a capitalist stooge, and a joke. This so-called roast featured political attacks against the President with scripted lines and it only proves that not only is the news fake, but now comedy is fake. Attacking the President repeatedly with paid laughter makes no comedy, but rather only reveals the true colors of these dark entities.

Donald Trump may not be perfect, nor his actions free from imperfection, but for a person to stand up and deliver insult after insult is cheap, petty, and is lowering the already low cultural standard of the country.

The best we can do is ignore these puppets—they’re only fulfilling their roles. Keep an eye on the dark shadows pulling their strings behind the curtains. There’s fake news, fake actors, and now we have fake comedians, who yell globalist talking points to a laugh track.

Read More: SJWs Pile On Daily Show’s Trevor Noah Over “Offensive” Tweets

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

How To Approach A Really Hot Girl When Other People Are Watching

May 10, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

The clarion call for would-be player and pick up artists is a familiar one— 'approach, approach, approach!' This is all very well in theory and it sounds good, but what about those situations that are particularly socially awkward? Say a girl is surrounded by other guys at the club. Or say you spot her on a busy subway carriage. Or maybe she is out shopping with her mother. In such situations even the most committed poon pirate is liable to take a step back, doubting his ability to stride forward confidently and do what needs to be done. So what factors should you consider when this happens and what are the best steps for you to take?

Evaluate

Firstly, it's very important to calculate the solution to this very simple equation—to what factor does the girl's hotness outweigh any potentially negative social consequences? If the girl is really hot, then yes of course you must go for it. If she's somewhat homely, though, and the social conditions really do conspire against you, then you might decide that an approach is really not worth the effort.

I think this is fair. Apart from as practice on a 'bootcamp' or something like that, I wouldn't expect anyone in their right mind to walk into a group of scowling motorcycle thugs at the bar just to have a shot at their less-than-stellar younger sister. Why would you bother?

That being said, you must also man up and be honest with yourself. If you are a little intimidated by the approach then your evaluation of the girl is likely to be somewhat coloured by this. 'She's not that hot really. Why approach her? There's sure to be better in the next bar.'

If you follow this line of reasoning then all you will do is disqualify yourself. If she is bangable—that is, if she was sitting on your bed naked then you would have sex with her—then you should be true to yourself and make a move.

The other problem with evaluation is paradoxical in that the hotter she is, the less likely you may be inclined to approach her anyway, regardless of the social situation. So if you see a 9.5 blonde surrounded by buff guys in tuxedos at a swish celebrity party, even though you are extremely attracted to her you are likely to bottle it unless you have mentally prepared and fortified yourself first.

Evade

One way around this problem is evasion. By circumventing the problem you will still approach but you will wait until a more convenient moment, perhaps when the girl goes to the bathroom, leaves her friends, goes for a cigarette or whatever.

Again, the key here is really self-honesty. Only you will know if you are pussying out (which you shouldn't be) or simply awaiting a more optimal window to deliver your game.

There's no shame in waiting for a good moment. I've done it many times and it's worked. There are drawbacks though. One is that you don't know if that good moment will ever arise. Perhaps she will stand talking to her friends for an hour and then they'll all leave together, in which case your opportunity will be gone for good. The other drawback is that the longer you wait to speak to her the bigger a deal you will make it in your mind until in the end you may find yourself to intimidated to actually do it anyway.

Go for it

The third option is simply to say to hell with the consequences and go for the approach anyway. While you should always use your common sense and weigh up risk versus potential reward, nevertheless, it behooves all of us to embrace the red pill mindset and go for what we want without apology. In order to do this, though, you're going to have to get your mindset sorted first. To do that you will have to drill down into what it is specifically about approaching in front of others that really scares you and confront it head on.

The most important thing you must keep in mind, and which has really helped me get over my own approach anxiety, is simply that there is no such thing as consensus. Let's face it, whenever you do anything in front of a group of people your greatest fear is rejection. Of course, this goes back to primordial concerns about the potentially life-threatening consequences of being pushed out by the tribe.

Realise this, though: 'the tribe' existed a long, long time ago in a much simpler era. These days there is no tribe, or, more accurately, there are a myriad of tribes, each with competing concerns, ideologies and desires. For that reason any group of people you come upon will be radically different to one another and will think different things from each other. So, when you approach that cute girl in front a bunch of guys, they will have a variety of very different reactions.

Some simply won't care. Others, yes, may be white knights, simmering and incensed at your temerity. But others still will be would-be players who are secretly impressed. So the idea that really frightens you—that this whole mass of people will turn against you just for approaching, is inaccurate

The second thing to understand is that even if people do object in some way to your having approached, the likelihood of them doing anything or saying anything is exceptionally small. Most people have their own 'approach anxiety' and don't like to draw attention to themselves by getting involved in any public situation they don't have to.

That being the case, all you're really going to get is perhaps few people joking under their breath. But the majority aren't going to step in and mess up your interaction.

To further guard against this you should to create a bubble between you and the girl when you approach. The way you do this is actually pretty simple. When you walk up to her, imagine that you have tunnel vision so all that you can see if her, and it is only you and her in the vicinity, and in the whole universe. Ruthlessly shut out or disregard anything to the contrary. Outside distractions are irrelevant. All that's important is you and her.

Be disciplined. Don't let anything else interfere. Walk up to her and talk. You deserve your moment with her and you will have it if you reach out and take it. Trust me, the very fact that you have had the courage to approach like that will improve her perception of you exponentially.

If it doesn't work, if she rejects you, what then? It really doesn't matter. No one will say anything, you will move away and soon you will no longer be there at all, and those people who observed you will be nothing more than a memory. You will never know what they really thought and it won't matter anyway, since you will never see them again. But you could be a reasonable amount of money that more than one them will have been secretly impressed by your chutzpah and courage.

Want to find out more about how to get great at game? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter.

Read More: The One Girl You Absolutely Must Approach Every Day

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Why The 2007 Remake Of Beowulf Was A Powerful Slap To The Ideals Of Liberal Hollywood

May 10, 2017 | by Damian Black | Link | Original Link

In 2007, leftist Hollywood, through some miraculous oversight, released an epic fantasy film naturally presenting traditional gender dynamics and demonstrating the heroism, responsibility, and downfall of masculine men. More than half the film's scenes are able to set a thousand hamsters ablaze in an inferno of "sexism" and "indecency". Amongst the heated heap of sizzling rodents lies a burning question…

How was this possibly allowed through the mandatory masculinity culling process?

The answer: It is an adaptation of an immensely valuable ancient work of literature.

Beowulf, named after its valiant protagonist, is renowned as the most important Old English epic poem, used to teach generations of men the masculine virtues of true loyalty, undying courage, and the power of action. In the tale, Beowulf comes to the faithful assistance of his father's friend King Hrothgar, one he is indebted to. He slays a giant, hellish creature named Grendel that plagued the kingdom, and when its monstrous mother desires vengeance he kills her as well, though many of his men are slaughtered.

The honorable, exemplary hero of Scandinavia, a wistful far cry from today's conformist Jante egalitarians

Later, as an honored legend, Beowulf is granted the Danish throne upon Hrothgar's death, and at his final battle succumbs to his injuries after defeating a classic gigantic fire-breathing dragon.

One would think that Hollywood would attempt to warp the ultra-masculine storyline, to simplify or ruin the manliness of Beowulf and his allies. But no, the creators completely stayed true to the heart and ideas of the epic. Impressively for modern times, the concept of gender equality is not even slightly introduced, and the film's comically realistic CGI depicts man's truths and values from start to end.

Courageous, violent action and insightful dialogue revolving around responsibility and honor are combined in a brilliant portrayal of red-blooded men. They are hearty and strong, and, furtively passing through Hollywood's blind spot, able to sing the most hilariously offensive song about raunchy sex you've ever heard (2:40).

Though this version of Grendel is nightmarishly hideous for children, and many incredibly graphic fights and barely indirect sexual innuendos are shown, the movie inexplicably but wondrously maintains a PG-13 rating, perhaps due its being made through Polar Express animation style.

However, there is one provocative and striking modification, one that changed the entire foundation and relationships between main characters: the identity of Grendel's mother.

Instead of battling Beowulf and directly killing people as described in the text, she is instead a demonic seductress who is the mother of, through irresistible relations with Hrothgar and Beowulf, respectively, Grendel and the dragon.

Angelina Jolie, a difficult demon to resist

Even though her appearance is never described in the epic, most men of words would at least be able to know a being that clutches an entire man in her grip would not be of womanly size (even BBW aren't that B). It is almost as if someone told the screenwriters they had to at least include a major female character in the name of equal representation, but were given full freedom to do whatever they damned pleased as long as they met that requirement.

Grendel's sexy mother represents the destructive modern woman

Hit it at your own peril

While one would generally roll eyes at the sexual bastardization of one of mankind's best writings, using an attractive all-powerful denmon woman to play great men to her self-empowering whim, the geniuses behind Beowulf managed to pull off an even greater offense to feminists by actually using Grendel's mother as a hidden reference to the dangers of associating with modern women and the consequences of childrearing under a psychopathic single mother.

Grendel's mother acts out the dark side of femininity used purely to extract resources from men for personal gain, then raises her children alone, perfectly matching the profile of a single woman.

She convinces her children, through indirect behavior and direct communication, to become violent, rebellious individuals, and to act as if they are of the rulers of the world. Without strong father figures, these undisciplined beasts are never taught any masculine virtues, such as loyalty, sacrifice, or self-control; traits a woman is almost never able to explain. They consequentially become the aimless, destructive trash of society.

Get off my back Dad, Mom told me I could do whatever I want

The fathers who unknowingly trust a deceitful Western woman are later haunted by alimony and the inability to be a meaningful part of their children's lives. In the worst case, as demonstrated with Hrothgar and Beowulf, they aren't even told about the existence of their child until years later in a recklessly ruinous surprise. At their return, the fathers personally face immense, soul-rending shame due to their innate sense of responsibility at allowing themselves to be tricked intro producing monsters.

What would initially be thought of as a disrespectfully shameful change is truly a much more frightening portrayal, a veiled view of women and their ability to manipulate children into dangerous criminals and freaks.

It presents an evil much more terrible, and much more real, than the literary original.

At least he didn’t have to pay child support

Beowulf (2007) was an astounding victory for red pill cinema. It’s friendly PG-13 allowed children to experience a true man’s personality and accomplishments while traditionally displaying men as men and women as women at a young age. Passing under the guide of a shallowly introduced naked Jolie, Grendel’s mother further showed audiences the horrors of the single mother. Though it is a brilliant literary adaptation of the past, hopefully similar jewels shall be allowed in the future as we continue to become more politically and societally influential.

Read More: Beowulf Is A Mystical Red Pill Bible

Damian Black

Damian Black is an American nationalist deploring the decline and seeking to rid the scourge of oblivion. Visit his nascent personal interest: The Black Decree

What It’s Like To Visit The Ruins Of Chernobyl In Ukraine

May 10, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

While many men from the west spend their days in Kiev daygaming on Khreshchatyk Street and Shevchenko Park, or popping bottles in some of the city’s highest end clubs—there is a whole separate part of the city that many foreigners never see. And if you venture even further out of the actual city itself, there’s even more eye-opening and unique things to experience.

One of those things is Chernobyl.

Now, many are familiar with Chernobyl from the absolutely epic Call of Duty: Modern Warfare levels. Many who play the game probably aren’t even aware that it’s a real city, with a real dire story to tell. Throughout all my travels, Chernobyl still stands out as one of the most eye-opening and surreal experiences.

With that being said, I’d highly recommend going if you are in Ukraine and have the chance. Here are some random tips, experiences, and thoughts from when I visited Chernobyl (May of 2016).

It’s The September 11th Equivalent, But…

Abandoned amusement park.

There is a very large difference between the two events. You see, September 11th was horrible, but eventually the country “moved on”, in a way. While certainly the family and friends of those who passed will never have that leave them, on a physical and surface level, things have changed.

The 9/11 Memorial in New York City stands on the former ruins of the two towers. It’s stunning (I’d highly recommend visiting it if you have the chance). Obviously, the new One World Trade Center has been built, and is also stunning.

The point is, the former ruins that devastated America have now been rebuilt into memorials. There at least has been some closure on the tragedy, and they’ve been honored appropriately. However, that’s not the case with Chernobyl.

Chernobyl’s devastation is shoved right in your face. You simply cannot look away. And you know that it will never be improved. There will be no clearing of the debris and construction of a beautiful monument. There will not be a phoenix that rises from the ashes.

It is what it is, and likely will be for a very long time to come.

Ukrainians As Children And Chernobyl

The sign welcoming you to Pripyat, a town which is close to the reactor itself.

I actually took my Ukrainian girl with me to Chernobyl (you can listen to her on my podcast here). To say she was nervous, shocked, and terrified out of her mind would be an understatement.

To compare to 9/11 again, do you remember exactly where you were when you first heard the news? I do. I was in a fifth grade classroom. The teacher sat the whole class down, explained that something very bad had happened in New York, and that parents would be coming to pick us up very soon.

I didn't understand the magnitude of it at the time, but that memory of sitting down in that classroom is permanently burned into my brain.

While my girlfriend was born years after the events of Chernobyl, the Ukrainian culture burns it into their brain at a young age—Chernobyl is bad, scary, and to be avoided at all costs. Her friends jaws dropped to the floor in shock when she told them. She still won't tell her parents (though it's probably only a matter of time before I spill the beans).

I have no doubts that her parents know exactly where they were that day that it happened. That memory is probably burned into their head, as well. And it's passed on to the younger generations, who all think it is insane that people actually go to Chernobyl as a form of tourism.

The Long-Term Effects

The Chernobyl radar on part of the tour.

I'd need far more than this article to sum up the economic and political impacts that Chernobyl had on Ukraine and Belarus. The Soviet Union basically had to go bankrupt in an attempt to contain and decontaminate the area. Of course, it disbanded just five years later in 1991.

The spending on the issue continues to today. A new sarcophagus was just installed that should prevent any radioactive leaking for a hundred years. It's absolutely massive, and crazy to witness in-person.

The reactor and old sarcophagus.

Of course, Ukraine is a bit of an economic disaster right now. If you have access to any currency but the local one, your money will go very far.

While, in my humble opinion, it would be wise to place the blame on the current crisis on Chernobyl, undoubtedly there are still some effects. It seems to be a place that just can't seem to quite break out of the economic slump and truly prosper.

Closing Thoughts And Advice

If you're in Kiev, it's definitely worth going to Chernobyl. It's a long day, a bit depressing, and eye-opening. Here are a few tips I'd recommend.

Book a shorter tour.

The company I booked with was an all-day event. We left the Kiev bus station at 7:15am and didn't arrive back until nearly 9:00pm. It takes nearly two hours each way via bus. On top of it, this tour stopped every ten minutes in the outskirt towns. We'd walk around and see the ghost towns. There were just too many of them. After the first two they all began to look the same.

We didn't arrive at the reactor and Pripyat until well into the afternoon. Given the benefit of hindsight, I would have preferred to take one of the shorter tours that promised to have us home at 6:00pm. They likely would have done less of the outskirt tours and had a more straightforward path to the bigger items.

The language situation, pricing, etc.

The tour guides all seem to speak excellent English. If money matters and you speak Russian, you can take a tour for 30-40% of the cost they charge for the English tour. If you bring a local or student along, there's further discounts.

For the record, my cost was $119 as a non-student, non-citizen, English speaker.

Come prepared.

Make sure you're well stocked with water and snacks. Our bus stopped at a convenience store on the way, but no guarantees they all do. The meal they serve in the Chernobyl cafeteria is pretty lackluster, so come prepared.

Oh, and don't forget your passport—the security and process at Chernobyl is far more extreme than any airport.

To learn how to built a profitable business that allows you to see the world, check out Troublesome Solutions. For more information about Ukraine, visit my blog at Ukraine Living.

Read More: 6 Things You Should Know If You Want To Visit Ukraine

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

How The Legacy Media Polices Speech From Within

May 11, 2017 | by M.T. White | Link | Original Link

The recent dismissal of Bill O'Reilly from Fox News confirms that no man has a secure job in the media—especially if they don't conform to leftist ideology. The fact that he had a long career in TV news, the highest rated news show on cable, bestselling books and was practically the face of a network wasn't enough to protect him from allegations of sexual misconduct. O'Reilly's name could be replaced with that of countless other media personalities targeted with negative coverage resulting in career damage. Both the means and the reasons for this targeting is a combination of snobbery, greed and an establishment trying to protect itself and its ideology.

Working in the media (journalism/Hollywood etc.) is like any corporate job. Many care more for the prestige of the position and the perks it brings rather than the actual job itself. As Nassim Taleb wrote, journalists, "worry considerably more about the opinion of other journalists than that of the general public." Once in, they will do anything to protect their position, even it means sucking up to those in power and embracing its ideology (leftist/globalist). For those who have put in the time and made whatever compromise to ingratiate themselves, it is almost natural to want to discredit those trying to encroach on perceived territory or those refusing to comply with accepted practices and ideological dictates.

They Aren't One Of "Us"

Hostility, suspicion, and condescension towards perceived outsiders are common in any field or social group and so it is with media. Before the 2016 Presidential election, Alex

Jones was considered a curiosity to the mainstream. He hosted a niche independent radio show out of Austin, Texas, appealing to fans of Ron Paul and those interested in conspiracies—a slightly more political version of Art Bell. He even appeared in two movies directed by leftie (and fellow Austinite) Richard Linklater.

But with his support of Donald Trump in the 2016 Presidential election he got more influential. His YouTube views surpassed many of the legacy media outlets and he even bragged about his personal conversations with then President-elect Trump. When Wikileaks released the CIA "Vault 7" documents, his some of his conspiracy theories became fact. He was now a rival of legacy media. And that meant they would use any opportunity to discredit him.

So, when a gunman fired shots at Comet Pizza in Washington DC, the center of the "Pizzagate" pedophile ring, Jones was one of those blamed for propagating the story and "Fake News" in general. Lawsuits were threatened and Jones had to denounce "Pizzagate" on air whilst firing some reporters.

> The yogurt company Chobani is suing Alex Jones and InfoWars https://t.co/7ApmXl1r8u
>
> — The New York Times (@nytimes) April 26, 2017

His Infowars' operation in general was also affected when YouTube demonetized all content they deemed "controversial". Facebook went after sites propagating "Fake News" with Infowars' as a clear target. Vendors for Google had them ranked as a "low-quality" site. And when a custody battle between him and his ex-wife went to court, the media pounced, reporting on every lurid detail—especially when he stated that he plays a "character" on his show.

> Infowars' @RealAlexJones Claims He's a Fake 'Character' on Air – to Win Custody of Kids https://t.co/uMHdpgcWta
>
> — TheWrap (@TheWrap) April 18, 2017

Mike Cernovich, another person covering stories outside the system, is a current target. After tweets of support from both Donald Trump Jr. and Kellyanne Conway for breaking the story of Susan Rice ordering Trump associates wiretaps "unmasked", it was only natural to arouse the establishment media's jealousy. Immediately, articles appeared in mainstream publications (like The Washington Post and The New York Times) critical of him, publicizing his "misogynist" tweets. In The Weekly Standard, Eli Lake of Bloomberg called Cernovich a "fake news artist,"—even though Cernovich broke the Rice story before Lake "confirmed" it.

TRUTHINESS

Why the White House Is Boosting Mike Cernovich

By Jesse Singal

Headline From New York Magazine

Recently, Jack Posobiec, who works for The Rebel Media, came under fire for publicizing the release of leaked email documents of then French Presidential candidate Emmanuel Macron. Almost verbatim, news outlets cited the Atlantic Council's Digital Forensic Research Lab findings: "#MacronLeaks reached 47,000 tweets in three and a half hours after it was first used by Jack Posobiec, a writer in Washington for the far-right news organization The Rebel." Did these articles mention that the Atlantic Council was a globalist think tank with donors like the European Commission, NATO, Saudi Arabia and United Arab Emirates? No. The more important story was "far-right activists"—not journalists—were trying to influence an important election in France.

NEWS DESK

THE FAR-RIGHT AMERICAN NATIONALIST WHO TWEETED #MACRONLEAKS

By Andrew Marantz May 7, 2017

Jack Posobiec's profile in The New Yorker stressed activism NOT journalism

In the legacy media's eyes, the above can have their niche audiences but they can't be stealing praise from those in power nor have influence. It's why the whole "Fake News" meme was started: Only "real" journalists can report "real" news. If a story influences an election, a "real" journalist is just "reporting". If it's done by an "outsider", it's "activism" at best, "fake news" at worst. If an opportunity arises, if there is a third party with dirt or embarrassing anecdotes or tweets, an enterprising establishment reporter will exploit the opportunity to discredit an outsider.

What of the likes of Edgar Snow, Walter Duranty, Stephen Glass, Judith Miller and Dan Rather—those who pedaled actual fake news (writing apologia for mass murdering dictators and helping start wars on false premises no less)? They get a pass. Their legacies are kept intact; sometimes with a movie made sympathetic to their plight. Why? They're "real" journalists. They're one of US.

Support our mission in a new way.

Truth. It's more important now than ever.

Inspire a future generation.

SUPPORT NOW

The New York Times

The New York Times pleads for donations while stressing they are the purveyors of “truth”

There’s Reputations (And Profits) At Stake

It’s attractive to write off legacy media companies as dinosaurs lumbering towards extinction. However, many of the companies still have deep pockets (with billionaire benefactors like Carlos Slim and Jeff Bezos) and the ear of the cultural and political establishment. And since there is a slight profit motive, there’s occasionally someone willing to try and make some money on opinion that might be a little dissenting.

This is especially the case in terrestrial radio, an industry that is desperately fighting for relevance in the digital age. Rush Limbaugh, the most successful conservative radio talk show host in the US, was credited with “saving” the AM Band when it was dying out in the late 80s. But this success did not ingratiate him to the media elite.

Rush Limbaugh on cover of Time magazine accompanied by hyperventilating headline

When Limbaugh tried to branch out in to other avenues, he was met with varying degrees of resistance. His first pass at television in 1990—guest hosting a late-night CBS talk show—resulted in disaster. In 2003, his stint on ESPN’s NFL Pre-game show ended quickly when he made a statement deemed “racist”. In 2006, when he was being investigated for prescription drug abuse by law enforcement, news outlet covered it sensationally like he was El Chapo. In 2009, his attempt at owning an NFL franchise was stillborn when dubious “racist” comments were publicized by the media. Outside of talk radio and publishing, media companies and sports organizations didn’t want to risk bad press for being associated with him.

Nationalist radio host Michael Savage met immediate backlash when he got a show on MSNBC in 2003. It was only on little more than a month when he made a comment that upset GLAAD. The network quickly canceled the program, not wanting bad press and decided to go in a full-on leftie direction.

Since then, Savage (who Donald Trump borrowed many talking points from) has been relegated to radio and publishing—rarely appearing on mainstream news shows. However, some of his criticisms towards Islam were publicized to such a degree and deemed so "hateful" he was banned from visiting Great Britain in 2009.

John Derbyshire wasn't banned from his native Britain but in 2012 he lost his job as a columnist for National Review when wrote a frank politically incorrect piece on race relations for Takimag. Since it provoked outcry from the likes of Ta-Nehesi Coates and Forbes' Josh Barro, Review editor Rich Lowry kowtowed to leftist outcry and said the piece, "lurches from the politically incorrect to the nasty and indefensible." Derbyshire, who had both fiction and non-fiction books published by mainstream outlets (and even appeared in a Bruce Lee movie), found himself exiled from the establishment press.

Forbes' Josh Barro not being an activist, just "taking a stand"

This type of leftwing media outcry towards successful, established ideological opponents has a two-pronged effect: First, it creates a self-policing of speech. By knowing that certain speech can be punished, it forces non-leftists to act like controlled opposition. Secondly, it forces companies to terminate deals and contracts because they don't want the bad press due to threat of losing advertisers and other revenue (as happened with O'Reilly).

Media corporations only stand on principle when they know it will earn them establishment brownie points and (maybe) increase advertiser revenue. There's scant publicity of CNN's racial discrimination lawsuit that has a potential 175 plaintiffs. Robert Downey Jr, had very public battles with cocaine addiction—even going to prison—but still got to play Iron Man. David Letterman had his sexual proclivities publicized but got to keep his job as talk show host. Bill Maher can allegedly pussy grab with the best of them and criticize Islam all he wants. Stephen Colbert can pejoratively accuse President Trump of giving Vladimir Putin fellatio without impunity. Why? Because they think "correctly."

> Fox Insiders 'Impressed and Proud' After Bill O'Reilly Banishment
> https://t.co/uLzWKA3DDE pic.twitter.com/PXCLsMIQol
>
> — TheWrap (@TheWrap) April 20, 2017

Shifting The Goal Posts

Publicly virtue signaling will only get one so far in this age of SJW's becoming more like Mao's Red Guards. The goal posts are continually shifting and no one seems to be free of scrutiny. In 2014, when chic feminism became all the rage, Bill Cosby, once a symbol of racial egalitarianism in the media, had his entire legacy besmirched due to a host of rape accusations. Story after story suddenly appeared with women making allegations—most from years before. Maybe he did the deeds, maybe he didn't, but why didn't those women press charges then? Why wasn't that question even asked?

Nate Parker also experienced this media 180. His film Birth Of A Nation, about Nat Turner's slave rebellion, was met with a standing ovation at the Sundance Film Festival (before the movie started no less!) and sold for a record sum. But the film's release imploded due to a rape charge from years before—that Parker had been acquitted of. That didn't stop public outcry from Hollywood celebs like Lena Dunham. All of the sudden, in 2016, rape hysteria trumped race.

'Birth of a Nation' Filmmaker Nate Parker Struggles to Take Responsibility for Past Rape Allegations

Headline from "Variety" after Parker interviewed on "60 Minutes"

And what of convicted rapists like Roman Polanski, or Woody Allen's sleeping with his adopted daughter and alleged molestation of another daughter? No punishment. Why? They aren't (publicly) against feminism and globalism, right? They agree with US. They think like US. They are one of US, until the goalposts shift again and until a new accepted establishment cause reassessments of careers and personalities once thought untouchable (maybe being an alpha male will be a crime in itself).

For those "outside the system", maybe negative media coverage will result in certain channels or platforms being shut down (as PayPal did to Roosh, Occidental Dissent and Bare Naked Islam). Maybe any dissenting opinion or (controlled) opposition won't be tolerated inside corporate media at all. Or maybe the left will cannibalize itself; it's uncertain at the moment. But until then, it's best for outsiders to treat legacy media as a no-go zone and for those inside to move towards building their own platforms.

Read More: Talk Show Radio Host Michael Savage Attacked On Street, Mainstream Media Says Nothing

M.T. White

M.T. White is a novelist and blogger. He used to write about MMA, pro-wrestling and movies. He then actually tried MMA and making movies (and had more success in the former). He mainly blogs about media and creativity at Medium. Find him on Twitter or Gab

The Myth That Jesus Christ Was Not Masculine

May 11, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

One of the travesties of modern feel-good Christianity—and a travesty which alienates a lot of non-Christian men—is the fact that Jesus Christ is routinely portrayed as an individual who is meek, mild, and submissive. Indeed, Churchians often make Christ seem to be some type of go-along-to-get-along hippie who just wanted peace, tolerance, and "love", man! But nothing could be further from the truth. The fact is that Jesus Christ was a tough, red-pilled individual, and his strength and grit manifested itself in several ways that masculine men can learn from and appreciate. And if you don't believe me, well then, just consider the following three points.

Physical Grit

Jesus knew how to work with his hands.

First, there is the physical form of fortitude, which is a type of toughness that Jesus clearly demonstrated. After all, there are good grounds to believe that Jesus was a builder of some type (Matthew 13:55 and Mark 6:3) and so he likely had the natural physical strength and hardness that comes from working in manual labor. But there is also another incident that clearly shows Jesus's physical prowess: namely, the clearing of the temple.

In the temple he found those who were selling oxen and sheep and pigeons, and the money-changers sitting there. And making a whip of cords, he drove them all out of the temple, with the sheep and oxen. And he poured out the coins of the money-changers and overturned their tables. (John 2:14-15, ESV)

Clearing out a room single-handedly takes balls….balls that most men today do not have.

So here we have Jesus making himself a weapon and then using that weapon to clear out a temple full of merchants and animals. And although we are not told the exact number of people who were in the temple at the time, it nevertheless takes some serious balls to single-handedly eject a room full of men and chase them away from their money and their livestock.

Indeed, regardless of whether you think that Jesus was right or wrong in what he did, the fact is that there are few men alive today who would have the intestinal fortitude to man-up and clear out a group of degenerates with nothing but their hands, a bit of cord, and some righteous fury.

Intellectual, Emotional, and Social Fortitude

Not afraid to call people out when the situation warrants it.

Now, while the above example demonstrates Christ's physical toughness, the fact is that Jesus was also intellectually, socially, and emotionally masculine and strong. What do I mean by this? I mean that in his words and actions, Christ did not bow to the politically-correct platitudes of his day, nor did he sacrifice the truth for niceness, nor did he care about the approval of his followers if doing so meant sacrificing his integrity or jeopardizing his mission.

After all, when you (1) call out a group of powerful people as being sons of the Devil (John 8:39-47), and when you (2) boldly preach the truth in a manner that leads to people wanting to kill you afterwards (Luke 4:16-30, John 8:58-59), and when you (3) hold fast to a teaching regardless of the fact that it leads to large numbers of your followers abandoning you (John 6:60-71), you know that Christ had intellectual and emotional strength. In fact, Christ was strong enough to even call out his close friend when it was required (Matthew 16:22-23). And this is not even to mention the iron mental will that it would have taken to fast for forty days and forty nights (Matthew 4:2, Luke 4:1-2).

We see the strength of Christ manifest itself not only physically, but only intellectually and socially. This was a man who had masculine energy and who routinely handled situations in a masculine way. He was emotionally and mentally tough. He had a mission, and he would let no man—neither friend nor foe—stop him from achieving it.

Mission-Oriented Toughness

Finally, we can note that Christ had the type of fortitude that men admire most: a self-sacrificial mission-oriented grit that few men exhibit in their lives. Indeed, in his final days, Christ—in order to fulfill his mission of redemption against the forces of evil that control this Earth (John 12:31, 2 Corinthians 4:4)—allowed himself to be whipped, beaten, and hung on a cross.

Now many people might consider such an outcome to be a sign of weakness. After all, Jesus did nothing to defend himself from his attackers and oppressors, and so his apparent submission to a painful death seems pathetic, not bold or strong. But this has the issue entirely backwards, for true strength and toughness is demonstrated via the endurance of pain and suffering to accomplish a mission, not necessarily through the specific way in which that mission is accomplished.

Think, for example, of the platoon commander whose cowering platoon is pinned down by enemy fire and blocked from advancing due to a barbed wire barrier. In order to save his men and ensure that his mission is completed, the platoon commander charges the wire under heavy enemy fire and throws himself upon it, thereby allowing his platoon to break through and complete their mission. Is this platoon commander a coward? Is he weak? Is the soldier who throws himself on top of a grenade to save his friends and ensure their survival pathetic? Was Arnold Winkelried gutless when, in 1386 at the Battle of Sempach, he sacrificially threw himself against a spear wall in order to make the critical opening for his Swiss comrades to break the Austrian lines and ultimately gain their freedom?

And so, such men as those mentioned above are not weak, but rather, they have the most courage of all, for they willingly and freely take on the pain and suffering from countless foes in order to save their friends and ultimately accomplish their mission by doing so. And the same is true for Christ: he freely and willingly endured unbearable pain to ensure the completion of his mission, which was the salvation of mankind.

When looked at from a theological perspective, Christ's sacrifice can be seen as being even more incredible. Why? Because a plausible understanding of the crucifixion holds that Christ literally experienced and endured the punishment for all the sins of all mankind during his death. This would be an experience which would create a level of pain that would be utterly unimaginable to us. And yet he took on that pain freely, a deed that few others—if any—would ever do.

While Jesus Christ, the founder of Christianity, was obviously kind and gentle with many individuals, he was also incredibly tough. Furthermore, his fortitude and red-pilled attitude showed itself in many different ways which masculine men can learn from. Consequently, it always needs to be remembered that Christ was not a weak or feminine man. He was, in fact, one of the toughest men to have ever lived, and we need to remember him as such.

Read More: What A Cult Leader Who Think He's Jesus Can Teach Us About Humility

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

What The Victory Of Freemason Puppet Emmanuel Macron Means For Western Patriots

May 11, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Everything went according to plan. The effete bank clerk, the corporate love child between François Mitterand and Léon Blum put together by the complacent media and the powerful elite in a bit more than a year is now President. A frail cuckold with an post-Wall granny as First Lady, lapdog of the European Union and the cosmopolitan decision makers. Already a subject of jokes, modern France is now the laughing stock of the red pill world, trying to take Sweden's lead as the most self-destructive nation on the planet.

The alternative was there but France could not be saved. The rot is too deep. The clock is ticking now before the complete mutation of our country into an unrecognizable multicultural hell. For outside observers, France is now a test subject of what a Hillary Clinton presidency would have looked like.

The ones pulling the strings were not shy about it

Macron’s celebration at the Louvre museum (with its glass pyramid composed of 666 pieces and built under Socialist president François Mitterand) for his victory depicted numerous Masonic symbols.

[image]
The lawn near the pyramid where supporters flocked for Macron’s victory.

He also addressed his supporters and the media with his head aligned with the top of the pyramid, which was lit, and with his arms repeatedly raised in a V shape, a clear nod to the square, compass and all-seeing eye of the Masonic tradition. Just to show us, little people, who has always been in charge of choosing the French President.

Jacques Attali

Jacques Attali was one of the first to congratulate himself on air for Macron's victory (Macron is his brainchild and headed his Economical Liberal Commission) and all the powerful Liberal Jews like Pierre Moscovici (head of the Junker commission) and Bernard Henry Levy gloated as soon as their victory was known.

An invitation printed by the Grand Orient de France Masonic Lodge to Emmanuel Macron's conference titled "Can globalisation be a synonym of progress?"

The only first was that the mason brotherhoods, the Bilderberg group, the UOIF (Union of Islamic Organisations in France) all colluded, putting their respective hatred behind to make their pawn win.

Serge Moati

In a Ouest France interview (newspaper part of the media group with which Google and Facebook was working with to tell voters “what and who to trust” during the election), Serge Moati (real name Henry Haïm Moati, former media advisor to President François Mitterand and high-ranked mason) described Macron’s ceremony at the Louvre pyramid a “necessary rite”. The choice of words leaves no doubt

> Here is wisdom. Let him that has understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred three score and six. Revelation 13:18

Macron’s victory was also aired as being of 66.06% of the vote (the number 666 is known to symbolize the Beast) before being rounded to 66.1%. The French press unanimously labelled the thousands of people that pointed out at these facts “conspiracy theorists”, “pro-Trump trolls” or “Russian agents”.

During the post-result show, packs of rabid politicians (almost entirely avowed Masons) who backstabbed their followers and parties to join Macron, vociferated and spat their bile at each other on the air to claim their right for the crumbs and a spot in the new President’s government. Rats fighting on the top of a rubbish bin would be less repulsive.

Propaganda will continue and alternative media will be gagged

Macron's has vowed to "fight terrorism on the Internet through police intelligence" and to cleanse "hate speech" and "risky content" online instead of fighting terrorists on the ground. Nationalist political views that do not fit the agenda can also be branded as hate speech, and those who share anti-narrative ideas will be prosecuted and found guilty. They are free to apply every weapon they have to suppress the voices of their political opponents.

The shills shall be handsomely rewarded. The corrupt media channel TF1 shot a documentary for two hundred days to follow his campaign. No such attention was given to any other candidate and they named it before Macron's triumph "Macron, victory from behind the scenes" five months before the election. He was the designated next president by the establishment, period.

Let's see what the emails of the MacronLeaks have to reveal in the next few weeks.
I followed the email affair in real time since Friday the 5th of May. Macron fans, in true beta fashion, kept spamming tweets about the Macron Leaks with images of historical monuments and kittens on Twitter to prevent the pictures of compromising documents from trending.

But seeing the apathy of the French after the various scandals and terrorist attacks that struck our country this year, I think that even if the emails show a picture of a corpse in Macron's bathroom (not talking about his wife), I am convinced that his supporters will find a reason to justify it.

Gay and beta is the new norm

There are strong suspicions that Macron is as gay as a three pound note. He was a household name for it in the sewer that is the Parisian nightlife. I also heard from a few sources including RG insiders (Renseignements Généraux, the French Intelligence Agency) that it is not a rumour but a well protected fact.

For anyone that has even the slightest notion of game, the whole story where a powerful childless man in his thirties chooses a derelict wife smelt fishy from the start. She is just his beard. He will keep it low key for a while then they should announce their divorce in the next few months so he can order escort boys freely for the Elysée palace.

Macron's support base is composed of bitter single women and feminine cosmopolitan men with pursed lips, high-pitched voices, and homosexual lisps. Just seeing the manlets in his ranks with their puffy faces with no chins and their skinny-fat frame of fragile tax inspectors convinces me they have less testosterone than a kitchen sponge.

The only people that voted for Le Pen in droves were young nationalist men, fire-fighters, police officers and soldiers. Because they know the kind of gifts multiculturalism bring to one's front door.

French identity will continue being deconstructed

Macron has his whole program lined up in order to integrate Islam further into our future education and daily life.

Rédiger un manuel d'Histoire équitable

Faire un ouvrage d'Histoire scolaire commun avec l'Italie, l'Espagne, le Maroc, l'Algérie et la Tunisie (3 + 3) afin de mettre en perspective historique les apports mutuels et les convergences religieuses entre les deux rives méditerranéennes.

Dans le cadre du 3+3, nous recommandons la création d'une commission d'historiens chargée d'élaborer un manuel scolaire commun. Cet ouvrage aurait pour objectif:
- de créer un socle commun de connaissances historiques objectives fondé sur une logique d'un « match nul » historique.
- de développer un sentiment d'appartenance à une historique commune
- de réduire les fantasmes de victimisation d'une part ainsi que de supériorité civilisationnelle de l'autre

Modalités d'application :
- Dates d'application : 2017-2027
- Responsables en France : MAEE et Min. Education

Avantages et opportunités

- Forte symbolique d'Histoire et de destin communs entre chrétiens, musulmans et juifs dans le bassin méditerranéen.
- Renforcer les échanges scolaires et intellectuels entre tous les pays du 3+3.
- Réduire le sentiment rétro-colonial développé chez des enfants nés en France et n'ayant jamais connu le Maghreb.
- Apporter des connaissances aux écoliers français sur les civilisations maghrébines.

Risques et inconvénients

- Risque de crispations idéologiques sur certains événements historiques clivants
- Risque de faible diffusion du manuel scolaire dans les établissements scolaires de tous les pays concernés

This document is part of the ten pages found in the Macron Leaks that details how a new "Equalist History Manual" should be redacted and aim at displaying a historical "draw" between Christianity and Islam, to "reduce the anti-colonial feeling" among French children of Arab descent.

But Macron does not have plans for France alone. He is pro-refugee and already wants sanctions for countries such as Poland or Hungary for using their sovereignty and closing their borders to hordes of Muslims migrants.

What it means for me

A couple of months ago, after chatting with an old buddy of mine that works in the military, I thought about a possible career in uniform. I always wanted to serve after hearing about my granddad's adventures when he was deployed.

I am in good shape, I fit the profile, and I thought more than once about trading my present job for a military life. At the recruiting station, I got propositions for entering the intelligence department or start as an officer in a combat unit. I shook hands with the recruiter and after he called me to know about my decision whether to go ahead or not with my application, I answered that I will wait for the result of the election before making my final decision.

I now know that I will not call him back. Why should I put my life on the line for this? :

TUE

Crif
Crif

“Let’s mix up. White is filthy”

Background story

Et maintenant?

Contrary to liberals, we don't cry, piss ourselves and roll in it like witnessed during Hillary's defeat. We regroup, fight and keep pushing forward and exposing their lies. Those two candidates are politicians like all the others. You can only count on yourself.

I will tell you who I will fight for: my family, my friends and my inner tribe. The rest can croak with their tolerance. Maybe some will get red pilled like Benjamin Cazenoves when they will encounter the religion of peace directly.

Read More: The French Have Elected Globocuck Emmanuel Macron And His Pro-

Islamic Platform

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Billions Of Egos Dance For Your Attention

May 11, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I wake up every day around noon. Instead of leaving bed, like many normal people have to do, I grab a book and lay under the covers. I read twenty pages of a work that took some man hundreds of hours to complete, and possibly thousands if you account for the expertise he had to develop in order to write it. Why did he write the book? For money? For fame? Just to share knowledge out of good will?

A man writes a book because he thinks he possess something that other people don't possess. His labor comes from a position of superiority, however righteous, that is verified in physical form once the book is complete and achieves positive reviews and sales. A man's ego toiled and strained himself to complete a book that brings me entertainment and knowledge, and I thank his ego for that, for wanting to prove that he could provide value to the world.

I make a cup of coffee and then sit at my desk. I check Twitter first, and am greeted by a backlog of tweets from individuals who are desperate for followers and retweets, who are competing with millions of others to be heard in the sea of social media. I appreciate their futile efforts, one that has measly rewards, and quickly update myself on the news, which includes checking Google News to see what will be the lies of the day, written by journalists who hope to transform their liberal degrees into soft power by massaging their egalitarianism into a palliative narrative. Behold how hard they work for your attention! All for my clicks, for the chance to affect my perception of reality.

As the world grows in population, the heights to which people strain themselves to be noticed and to feel special borders on the insane. Women sell their vaginas to perform in porn, men spend over 12 hours a day in front of a computer screen to break a story 30 seconds before someone else, and leftists rush to destroy their own country through displays of virtual signalling in a pathetic attempt to prove to others that they are as moral as Jesus. The persistent need to be superior is played constantly around the world, as egos battle it out for fame, money, recognition, and pats on the back that increasingly aren't even physical but existing as pixels on little screens.

"Great article!"
"Sharp comment!"
"You predicted this!"
"Good job!"

The ego is stroked, it feels good, and then quickly that sensation fades and you are back into the grind, with a new idea to craft the perfect selfie that hides your flaws or an expertly crafted tweet that is sure to be spread far, all to prove that you're a somebody, that you're special, and as I relish how so many egos are fighting for my attention, I realize that I am no different from them. The web sites I've constructed, the books I've written, the thousands of articles I've published to mold the world into my version of "correct" reality points to an ego that must be in the top 1% of all egos, that is so massive in took the outrage of the entire world to finally check it.

Other egos dance for me and I respond by sitting in front of my laptop for several hours a day, writing articles such as this one, to dance right back. Your comments, praise, and shares give me moments of euphoria, no matter how fleeting, and I will do a jig for you to notice me as you do a jig for me to notice you. We all want to feel like we're special, that we have accomplished something more than billions of other humans who crowd this planet, and yet we never quite make it to being that somebody, or else there would be a point where we get up and yell That's it, I'm done! Our ego won't allow that. So we continue to preen for others, produce for others, compete with others, and after years of doing this, of decades to dancing this jig, a question may force itself to the surface, despite your best attempts to bury it, a question that comes from the deepest of your being as you're hungover from yet another ego high. The question of what exactly are we living for.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: The Biggest Hindrance To Success With Women Is Ego

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

White Liberals Love Getting Robbed By Black Men

May 12, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

As the proverb goes, a conservative is a liberal who's been mugged, but now we're seeing liberals using their mugging as an opportunity to preach for social justice. Not long ago, Oliver Friedfeld wrote an article for The Hoya (Georgetown University's student newspaper) called "I Was Mugged, and I Understand Why". If a couple of the article's many scathing commenters are correct, he was a sociology major.

Here's what happened

> Last weekend, my housemate and I were mugged at gunpoint while walking home from Dupont Circle. The entire incident lasted under a minute, as I was forced to the floor, handed over my phone and was patted down.

The "understanding why" part begins right after:

> And yet, when a reporter asked whether I was surprised that this happened in > Georgetown, I immediately answered: “Not at all.” It was so clear to me that we live in the most privileged neighborhood within a city that has historically been, and continues to be, harshly unequal. While we aren’t often confronted by this stark reality west of Rock Creek Park, the economic inequality is very real.

I too am alarmed about increasing disparities of wealth in today’s society, but that’s not a good reason to stick a gun in someone’s face. More followed concerning income inequality, and then…

Dude, they could’ve shot you

His evening might have been ruined even more.

> What has been most startling to me, even more so than the incident itself, have been the reactions I’ve gotten. I kept hearing “thugs,” “criminals” and “bad people.” While I understand why one might jump to that conclusion, I don’t think this is fair.
>
> Not once did I consider our attackers to be “bad people.” I trust that they weren’t trying to hurt me. In fact, if they knew me, I bet they’d think I was okay. They wanted my stuff, not me.

I’ll concur with Will Rogers that a stranger is a friend you haven’t met yet (well, usually). Still, robbing people who might otherwise be your friends—or at least okay—is way not cool. More likely, they considered him and his housemate prey. In any event, the thieves certainly weren’t concerned about what was fair for their victims.

This illustrates an unfortunately common blind spot. Liberals (particularly moderates) tend to be gentle people and strongly prefer to associate with others like them. Thus, confirmation bias leads them to believe everyone is pretty much just like them. Regarding exceptions, they believe that damaged people must be caused by a damaged society.

As item 22 in Hammurabi’s Code puts it:

> If any one is committing a robbery and is caught, then he shall be put to death.

One could argue that the traditional penalty from the 18th century BC through the 18th century AD was a bit harsh. Still, the point is that theft has been illegal since forever. It made it into the Ten Commandments too. Thus, a thief is by definition a criminal. Committing armed robbery does, in fact, make someone a bad person. That involves the threat of lethal force, which will be more than just a threat if things turn ugly.

It gets better (well)…

> While I don't know what exactly they needed the money for, I do know that I've never once had to think about going out on a Saturday night to mug people.

Being familiar with many dope fiends and the extremes they go to for their insatiable cravings, I have some ideas.

> I had never before seen a gun, let alone known where to get one. The fact that these two kids, who appeared younger than I, have even had to entertain these questions suggests their universes are light years away from mine.

Pro tip: there are stores where you can buy guns, quite helpful for self-defense. Anyway, it all comes down to choices. Mr. Friedfeld chose to pursue higher education; the punks who robbed him chose crime. So different universes is about right. Then after some hand-wringing over his background versus their assumed lack of privilege:

> When I walk around at 2 a.m., nobody looks at me suspiciously, and police don't ask me any questions. I wonder if our attackers could say the same.

Well, anyone regarding the two thieves suspiciously is correct. And then:

> Who am I to stand from my perch of privilege, surrounded by million-dollar homes and paying for a $60,000 education, to condemn these young men as "thugs?" It's precisely this kind of "otherization" that fuels the problem.

Thug is as thug does. If those kids are concerned with "otherization", they can find an honest way to make money. Finally, I'm afraid Mr. Friedfeld wasted $60K.

> While speaking with a D.C. police officer after the incident, he explained that he too had come from difficult circumstances, and yet had made the decision not to > get involved in crime. This is a very fair point—we all make decisions. Yet I've never had to decide whether or not to steal from people.

Here he's close to making an epiphany, but it slips from his grasp. I've faced starvation before, first at 22 and again after the Superboy the CEO incident. I never stole groceries, but if death came too close, I might've swallowed my pride and applied for food stamps.

The conclusion, just when you thought it couldn't get worse:

> The millennial generation is taking over the reins of the world, and thus we are presented with a wonderful opportunity to right some of the wrongs of the past. As young people, we need to devote real energy to solving what are collective challenges. Until we do so, we should get comfortable with sporadic muggings and break-ins. I can hardly blame them. The cards are all in our hands, and we're not playing them.

I'll just say one thing here. The words that freed my mind from liberalism so long ago were: "It's not your fault."

Now for something more sensible

As Theodore Dalrymple put it:

> The language of prisoners in particular teaches much about the dishonest fatalism with which people seek to explain themselves to others, especially when those others are in a position to help them in some way. As a doctor who sees patients in a prison once or twice a week, I am fascinated by prisoners' use of the passive mood and other modes of speech that are supposed to indicate their helplessness. They describe themselves as the marionettes of happenstance. […]
>
> As it happens, there are three stabbers (two of them unto death) at present in the prison who used precisely the same expression when describing to me what happened. "The knife went in," they said when pressed to recover their allegedly lost memories of the deed.
>
> The knife went in—unguided by human hand, apparently. That the long-hated victims were sought out, and the knives carried to the scene of the crimes, was as nothing compared with the willpower possessed by the inanimate knives themselves, which determined the unfortunate outcome.

Their evasions aren't too different from the hamster logic that society (not criminal behavior) causes crime. The sociological rationalization removes free will and moral agency, regarding people as automatons.

We can choose good over evil—and indeed we should—but we'd better be aware that the world can be a harsh and unforgiving place. The instinct to defend ourselves and our kin is hard-wired into us biologically. If we've been attacked, it's perfectly natural to feel anger, not guilt or bleeding-heart concern for the attackers. It's difficult to imagine that ideology can short-circuit all this, but as we can see, it happens. The sociology professors are wrong: suicidalism is not righteousness, and they need to stop enabling criminals with these excuses.

Despite our different perspectives, I wish Mr. Friedfeld well, and earnestly hope that further reflection will clarify things and bring enlightenment.

Read More: How Our Government Is Sanctioning A New Kind Of Tyranny

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

MTV Doubles Down On Degeneracy By Granting "Gender Neutral" Award To Emma Watson

May 12, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> I'm so proud to be part of a film that celebrates diversity, literacy, inclusion, joy and love the way this one does.
>
> — Emma Watson praising the film

Seeking to make the most of the professional uncertainty of her post-Harry Potter life, British actress and SJW Emma Watson has praised a brand new "gender-neutral" MTV acting award for the horrible live-action remake of Beauty and the Beast. Of course, Watson praised the award after winning it and received pats on the back from seemingly all those fellow celebrities in attendance. No one should be shocked that the first person to win this title is an infamous gender activist as well, rather than simply being a professional entertainer who does their job and leaves political commentary to others.

To the merriment of Return Of Kings, Beauty and the Beast is a pastiche of the patriarchy that feminists loathe with a random interspersing of SJW pet causes like homosexuality (in the form of a plot-irrelevant gay scene). We may not find Watson attractive, but her character Belle is clearly valued for her perceived beauty and she dutifully falls in love with the man, the Beast, who imprisoned her. Even with the clumsy leftist angle inserted into the film, it reads as a somewhat classic example of Stockholm Syndrome. Like it or not, the whole reason as to why Belle and the Beast end up in a relationship is because of a series of acts that SJWs would describe as misogynistic and indicative of "rape culture."

The MTV Movie Awards have a reputation for bestowing accolades on trashy blockbusters and the fawning attention given to Emma Watson merely continues this trend. What is of more concern, however, is the very self-contained buzz Watson's award has generated. SJWs are not demanding, for example, that companies do away with binary gender quotas, such as Norway's requirement that 40% of boardroom positions are filled by "women," without any measures for "androgyne" or "bigender" representation. Or that the Olympics should become either a gender-neutral competition or expand to 60 different sexual and gender categories to allow “two-spirit gender” and “pansexual” athletes to win gold medals, too.

The logic for SJW gender identity politics was pathetic to begin with. It is now unraveling further still. Furthermore, once again the pontificating of celebrities and their media sycophants has isolated them from the general population. Even many readers on “news” websites such as The Guardian are lambasting the pseudo-human rights activism of these multimillionaire professional victims.

At first glance, this gender-neutral acting award might seem to be another nail in the coffin of commonsense. Yet I, for one, welcome it as a case of significant overextension. So should you. Caught up in their own ideology, celebrity SJWs are progressively (pardon the pun) undermining the notion of feminism itself.

By insisting that the male-female divide is intersected by a billion other gender identities, they poke massive holes in their own previous arguments that women deserve special privileges, such as separate sporting competitions, which are presently denied to those claiming to be from other genders. Consequently, many of the programs feminists spent years yelling for can now be described as discriminatory and pernicious using SJWs’ own belief systems.

Gender-neutral acting awards, so why not gender-neutral sports?

Isn’t this just a spinoff of lesbian?

The woman who presented Emma Watson with her coveted gender-neutral MTV Award claims that she is gender-neutral (or she simply has a mental illness). Her name is Asia Kate Dillon and she is best known for her roles in Billions and Orange is the New Black. Earlier on, she had written a self-righteous letter to the Television Academy, insisting that its binary Best Actor-Best Actress awards discriminated against people like her. Here's the best part of her diatribe:

The reason I'm hoping to engage you in a conversation about this is because if the categories of 'actor' and 'actress' are in fact supposed to represent 'best performance by a person who identifies as a woman' and 'best performance by a person who identifies as a man' then there is no room for my identity within that award system binary. Furthermore, if the categories of 'actor' and 'actress' are meant to denote assigned sex I ask, respectfully, why is that necessary?

The funny thing is, there is no room for Dillon's "identity" in professional or even most amateur sports, either. So where is Emma Watson's outrage? Dillon, after all, wouldn't feel at home in men's OR women's athletics, basketball, or tennis, so surely this binary system needs to be dismantled as well. Considering that New York City's Commission on Human Rights and other quack organizations presently recognize dozens of different genders, the only sensible choice for SJWs is to make all competitive environments, whether in acting, sports, or another arena, "gender-neutral."

American colleges, rightfully perceived as some of the most radically feminist and anti-male institutions in the world, are also paradoxically falling afoul of SJW demands for non-binary gender recognition. The Education Amendments Act of 1972 created the infamous Title IX system, which prohibits federally-funded universities from engaging in educational program "discrimination," including for sports, on the basis of sex. Because feminists have used Title IX to insist on equal funding and attention for women's sports, as opposed to "equality" for all the genders that SJWS say exist, they participate in exactly the sort of discrimination that celebrities like Asia Kate Dillon have railed against in the world of entertainment awards. You can't make this up.

Yet another reason to not take celebrities seriously

Man-beast kidnaps woman who wears dresses, woman falls in love with him, actress portraying woman wins “gender-neutral” acting award.

Let’s remember that for all her supposed activism on behalf of “victims,” whether fake refugees or very wealthy, non-binary fellow entertainers, Emma Watson is a multimillionaire out of touch with the everyday needs of those watching her films. While her employer Disney has benefited from this age of globalization, countless millions in Watson’s native Britain are laboring under the burden of a new form of middle-class relative poverty. The sorts of fake causes that she advocates for are exactly the ones that people without material concerns can indulge in.

And, to repeat, Watson refuses to take her crusading to its logical extent. She won’t argue for gender-neutral sports because that would wipe women–and other non-male gender categories–from the athletic map. She won’t endorse transgender boardroom quotas because feminism’s greatest beneficiaries–wealthy upper middle and upper-class daughters–will lose out from any change.

Instead, Watson will restrict herself to the activism that suits her well–anything and everything that increases her own profile.

Read More: Emma Watson’s Boobs Show How Modern Feminism Is Lost

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The 3 Most Powerful Weapons Of The Globalist Establishment

May 12, 2017 | by Damian Black | Link | Original Link

Baaa, baaa. King Shepherd, we've globally killed over 20 million men in our most successful slaughter ever! What should we do next?

Excellent, this world war was better than the last! Begin Operation Domestic. I want my shepherds to use these three tactics…

Illogic

The issue with promoting a narrative of lies is that you must somehow explain the horrors everyone sees. In the decades to come, as our educational system and political machines come into greater fruition, the broken female population we create must have something for their insanity to cling on to.

- For lonely obese women, their lack of good partners is due to those around them not respecting the truth that every girl is indisputably, innately beautiful.
- For depressed single mothers, their solemn struggle is a commendable form of independence, female empowerment in resistance against the male savages.
- For self-scarring freaks, their uniqueness is worth more than any number of healthy relationships.
- For decaying, unhappy spinsters, their rigid acceptance of the doctrine of independence and materialism is necessary for them to not break down in horrid realization of ruined lives.

Flawed, illogical reasons are comfort enough for their failures. They are conformist creatures who aren't even capable of mentally comprehending why the sources they've trusted since birth would want to lie to them. But they do still retain some amount of that disgusting spark of life called conscience, so we must block out anything too extreme, ahem, progressive. That is why we must use…

Concealment

Baaaa, sir, I thought we were dominating the world. What could we want to hide?

Silence, sheep. There is a powerful minority of men we must crush first, and even though we shall become the most known force on the planet, there are still many sickeningly content people in First World nations that would be appalled at your, ahem, o*ur* practices and beliefs. How am I supposed to get their money and minds if—eh, never mind. As we grow we must still keep the most radical things out of the knowledge of our herds till we are at our final stages.

But maaaaass media reports on everything, doesn't it, sir?

No, it reports on what I want it to! For example, in the Black Lives Matter movement I intend to create, if a white cop shoots a black man (even better, a teen who had so much to live for!) we need to raise a SHITSTORM.

[image]
Do you know what to do if a black cop shoots a black angelic savior?

Baaa, report on it because we objectively believe in equality?

NO! We don't even think about it! It's so simple, simply don't talk about it and nobody knows about it. If you ever even suggest admitting to something like Muslim migrant rape without it being ABSOLUTELY necessary and not defending or attempting to cover-up or falsify it, I will turn your children into veal.

Baaa, sorry sir!

Now then, onto our final weapon, to use only when a culture has completely collapsed.

Distortion

After a while, once we've achieved mental dominance through indoctrination of the majority of entire nations in our systems since birth, all we have to do is release constant confirmation distorting the truth.

Sir, about those Islamic domination plans for Europe, the Muslims have a real rape culture don't they? Do you expect the people to not even be able to see rape for rape*? Is that even possible?*

Of course it is, silly sheep. It's just wild sex in their culture. Hell, I don't even have to directly tell them that. By that point they'd believe in multiculturalism so much they'll do it themselves.

We will be able to shit on your faces, ahem, their faces, and teach them to not even bat an eye. As our majority swells, I shall become the supreme master of the world, able to do absolutely anything with my corruption after I destroy the expected resistance. My methods are unstoppable and shall grant me complete, pure power, as they have for generations of my ancestors. This time though, it shall be forever and over the entire world.

Sir, I don't think we're intelligent enough to understand these kinds of strategies!

Of course you aren't! That's the entire point! You sure do talk a lot for a stupid damned sheep! Now get out of my sight!

Baaaa, yessir!

—

I attempted to persuade the mad King to stop, but I couldn't. By the way, this sheepskin is becoming somewhat worn. May I have another?

Absolutely. So, what did you learn?

He said their three weapons were ill logic, concealment, and distortion.

Three? Hell, all we have is truth. All we need is truth. Tell our brothers there is nothing new under the Sun. Tell them to continue to spread the light.

Read more: Liberals Are Not The Enemy… But Liberalism Is

Damian Black
Damian Black is an American nationalist deploring the decline and seeking to rid the scourge of oblivion. Visit his nascent personal interest: The Black Decree

I Found A Woman's Magazine That Has Better Fitness Advice Than A Men's Magazine

May 14, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

If you will recall, a few months ago I did an analysis of Men's Health magazine to judge the tips on fitness and masculine behavior they were giving to men. If you will again recall, I judged them and found them severely wanting.

It so happened that at the doctor's office the other day, I happened to get my hands on another mass market publication, one targeted towards the fair sex, that being Us Magazine. With nothing else to read, I thumbed through it and was genuinely surprised:

For while it had all of the pop culture flotsam and celebrity gossip that most of us would associate with women's publications, I was surprised at the 20 diet and fitness tips it gave for weight loss. Namely, I couldn't believe how much better the fitness tips in a woman's magazine were than a magazine purporting to be for the edification of men's health.

We can see that Us Magazine's readers are properly instructed in the following…

1. Do heavy lifting exercises

Regardless of your opinions on whether or not women ought to be lifting weights (personally I feel calisthenics and gymnastics are both more attuned to a woman's natural attributes and are more likely to give women the figure they desire), the idea of doing strenuous physical activity is always a good idea, albeit that Us Magazine's idea of "heavy lifting" is not what you or I would call heavy lifting. The core concept is still valid, and once again I would point out that magazines such as Men's Health don't even discuss heavy lifting at all.

2. Avoid food that is labeled “lite”

I have absolutely no objections to this, advertisers have long ago learned of the legal loophole that enables them to use “weasel words” that don’t mean anything to fool the consumers into thinking it’s something else. I’ve said it before and I’ll say it again: don’t eat anything that somebody in 1900 wouldn’t recognize.

Half of the words on this label aren’t actual words.

3. Work the Core

You are all aware of the importance I place on core workouts, and that demand remains. Granted, their core workout is crappy and ineffectual, but again, the concept remains valid. In neither the mainstream men’s or women’s magazine will you see the core training I advocate, such as the L-Sit or the overhead farmer’s walk, but again the women’s magazine narrowly pulls ahead because it at least raises the question.

4. Do “Informal” Exercise

They call it “find the fun,” but it’s essentially the concept of “informal exercise,” of going dancing, swimming, or walking. Just find some form of unintentional exercise throughout your day in addition to actual structured exercise regimens. It is an effective weight loss technique which makes it all the more annoying that it’s not discussed at all in men’s publications (presumably because we need to hawk more dude-bro merchandise).

5. Judge Yourself With Scales Every Day

Like I said in the willpower article, you always need some concrete metric to give you a kick in the ass. This sort of “tough love” is inherently masculine—the sort of advice that a father should properly give his son—and yet, it’s found in a magazine intended for the fair sex and not in a magazine for men.

6. Balance The Plate

Something that is true in theory, but the magazine recommends 50% carbs, 20% protein, 30% fat, when in fact, both men and women ought to be doing something close to the exact opposite of that for weight loss and general well being. Admittedly, this is advice I have seen in men’s magazine, so in one regard the two publications are equal.

7. Weightlifting

While I did say I’d prefer women to do calisthenics/gymnastics, weights are not so bad for women, and it even recommends compound lifts like squats and deadlifts—presumably targeting the anatomical regions that women will have more of a biomechanical advantage in due to the natural breadth of their hips. And once again, information on these fundamental compound lifts were completely lacking from a comparable men's magazine, which is the most shocking thing of all.

Conclusion

While some of this may not be the best for women (deadlifting?), the fact remains that a woman's fashion magazine is giving objectively better advice FOR MEN, then a men's fitness magazine. This article was thus written didactically, but not necessarily for purposes of training. If you need any proof of how the powers that be are trying to restructure gender roles, here it is.

Read More: When It's Okay To Listen To Fat People For Fitness Advice

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

9 Ideas From Julius Evola's "Ride The Tiger" That Are Still Valid Today

May 14, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

The Italian religious philosopher and cultural analyst Julius Evola (1898–1974) is one of the most engaging writers of the 20th century. Both his texts on various esoteric religious topics and the more politically oriented such are generally worth consideration.

My favorite is Ride the Tiger (1961, translated into English in 2003), which covers many of the existential, cultural and social implications of the modern world, characterized by gradual spiritual dissolution. Although Evola's preferred audience – in line with his essentialist traditional philosophy – is a differentiated priest or warrior type, many intelligent non-conformist Westerners can find something insightful and valuable in this book.

I have discerned 9 aspects that are useful in order to understand oneself and the world and still are tenable.

1. Divine despotism is a fantasy

One of the main tenets of the Abrahamic religions, Judaism and Islam in particular, is divine despotism, the idea that an omnipotent god controls mankind and the events of our world.

Although this is not a scientific topic in that sense that it can be verified or falsified through such theories and methods, it nevertheless has implications for the way which we regard ourselves and the universe.

This belief leads to—and Evola emphasizes this tenet in his book—a renouncement of individual responsibility. It is actually anti-Christian in that sense that it neglects the ”free will”.

2. Atheism versus theism is a false dichotomy

Theism simply means the belief in the existence of deities, especially an omnipotent creator god, and its negation is atheism. In a way this is a question of either or: either a god or several gods exist, or the one or them do not.

But given the above premise, spirituality can go beyond these two types. Many traditions, esoteric ones in particular, are rather linked to the individual's character, knowledge and predisposition, than the belief in a singular deity or several deities.

It is obvious that Evola thought less of monotheistic and polytheistic religiosity than aristocratic "Tradition", but it is important to be aware of that the entire span of traditional spirituality is much broader than atheism versus theism. One does only have to look at Theravada Buddhism, discussed by Evola in his work The Doctrine of Awakening, to make such a notion. As such this scheme is a false dichotomy.

3. Lucid inebriation goes beyond mere animal instincts

In a rather intricate discourse on the Apollonian and Dionysian myths – linked to the writings of a recurrent figure within this book, Friedrich Nietzsche – and how they correspond to modern civilization, Evola discusses a state of mind which goes beyond the mere ”Dionysian” instincts that have become predominant in our time (such as to eat, sleep, drink, fuck and listen to modern music).

He calls it a ”lucid inebriation”, a state of intellectual clarity which can emerge in certain situations, while pursuing particular activities:

> Detachment coexists with a fully lived experience; a calm “being” is constantly wedded to the substance of life. The consequence of this union, existentially speaking, is a most particular kind of lucid inebriation, one might almost say intellectualized and magnetic, which is the absolute opposite of what comes from the ecstatic opening to the world of elementary forces, instinct, and “nature”.

Even though it is a bit unclear what this specifically means, a reader can imagine a state of mind which occurs when one is living completely in the moment and makes a significant realization of some sort. Such moments are more valuable than animalistic intoxication.

4. Act without desire from the premise of causal laws

In a consecutive chapter, Evola looks into how a differentiated person can partake in various activities without desire. This frame of mind is akin to both Buddhism and Stoicism (both discussed in the last chapter, linked to a discussion on suicide), and also Taoism.

Basically, while one engages in them, remain unattached, but be aware of the causal laws that underlie them. In this way he can live in the modern world and partake in whatever field, for instance game or work, he feels like. In other words, make a good job but do not fool yourself into thinking that it represents a higher meaning or purpose.

5. The modern personality is different from the traditional

In the modern world, all individuals are equal in dignity and rights. Although this certainly is a sympathetic position (here I disagree with the vehemently anti-democratic Evola), people are still different in terms of personality and behavior. One does only have to look at IQ or the Big Five to realize this.

However, the traditional personality – as it is perceived by Evola – is very different from the modern, whether one takes into account biology or not. Many traditional ones were linked to a divine role (person means mask in Latin) in a metaphysical act, rather than any Renaissance genius or modern ”fascinating”, contingent personality.

In this regard one can agree with Evola or not, but this descriptive characterization is nevertheless quite enlightening. The American merchant culture – including most non-conformists as they appear – is linked to the ”personal trademark” rather than a supra-personal essence or function.

The traditional personality has become hidden under a new mask, that of self-indulgence and self-gratification.

6. Our world is characterized by dissolution

In Evola's principle work, Revolt Against The Modern World (1934), he analyzes the dissolution of the traditional world. Although it is hard to take this work very seriously from a strict historical point of view, as it is linked to a very selective interpretation of the past rather than extensive historiography, it still points out some indeed real currents and patterns. Ride the Tiger builds on that.

Just look at how traditional cultures have dissolved, and how the modern world, via middle-class Christianity, nationalism and capitalism, emerged with all its nihilism, hedonism and relativism; processes which have been accelerated under the aegis of post-modernist subjectivism, "equality", and an overtly sexualized consumerist society.

One always wonders if things can become even worse and when it is going to stop.

7. Modern politics does not reflect any higher ideals

Evola was particularly anti-American and regarded it as only better than the Soviet Union in terms of degree (a war between vaishyas versus sudras with Dharma terminology).

Realpolitik should partly or largely be hinged upon a rational and pragmatic approach, but it becomes empty if it is not linked to any higher ethics or values.

Besides perhaps philanthropy and prosperity, it is hard to see that American politics – or any politics in the modern world for that matter – represent any ideals whatsoever.

Therefore Evola emphasized apoliteia, which implicates that one should stay out of politics (or be involved but remain unattached). He asserted:

> The present world of party politics consists only of the regime of the petty politicians, who, whatever their party affiliations, are often figureheads at the service of financial, industrial, or corporate interests. The situation has gone so far that even if parties or movements of a different type existed, they would have almost no following among the rootless masses who respond only to those who promise material advantages and "social conquests".

Evola also quotes José Ortega y Gasset in this regard.

In America, only the freedom from and freedom to (to some extent), as they are integral parts of some dimensions of the American constitution, appear relevant since they enable men to choose to live their own lives according to their "personal equations".

8. Sexual intoxication is an integral part of the American society

Various modern currents, such as existentialism philosophy and popular art and music, are scrutinized in Ride the Tiger. Several chapters, two in particular, deal with the sex roles and sex as such. Even though Evola, of course, does not look into late-modern tendencies such as homosexuality and gender-fluidity which had not yet emerged, he was still very foreseeable in this respect. For instance he wrote:

> I must emphasize above all the direction of the processes at work toward a freeing of sex, but in no way a freeing from sex. Sex and women are instead becoming dominant forces in present society, an evident fact that is also part of the general phenomenology of every terminal phase of a civilization's cycle. One > might speak of a chronic sexual intoxication that is profusely manifested in public life, conduct, and art.

Sexual intoxication has become an integral part of the American society, basically post-World War II onwards, processes which likewise have accelerated. Capitalism in tandem with Cultural Marxism defeated the Christian moralistic bourgeois.

9. A ”greater morality” transcends the sign of times

When one lives in the current world, and is involved in various trivial activities, it is easy to feel “inauthentic” and hard to hold on to ideals, virtues and principles. But according to Evola, there are such which transcend the contingency of history and represent a “higher morality” which goes beyond petty moralism:

> I have already indicated the principles of a “greater morality” that, being dependent on a kind of interior race, cannot be damaged by nihilistic dissolutions: these include truth, justice, loyalty, inner courage, the authentic, socially unconditioned sentiment of honor and shame, control over oneself. These are what are meant by “virtue”; sexual acts have no part in it except indirectly, and only when they lead to a behavior that deviates from these values.

What is Arête?

In summary

Overall Ride the Tiger is a book worth to read in its entirety. Many facets of a higher individualism and the current culture which are discussed are still relevant. Julius Evola was indeed an anti-modernist with an anti-democratic inclination, but nevertheless he used logic to analyze the state of affairs in our world, in many ways different from the traditional.

Read More: 5 Ground-Breaking Books Written Between 1918 And 1945

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

5 Ways To Meet Women That Absolutely Do Not Work

May 15, 2017 | by Liam O'Connor | Link | Original Link

I can be considered a game newbie, as I discovered Roosh and Bang a year ago. I used to think that creating attraction from scratch in any setting was something that couldn't be done. The cold approach was not even on my radar, and the only times I thought you would "get" a girl would be in an environment where it was "expected" to, like at parties, concerts, and social events where alcohol and drugs were flowing.

We all go through periods of experimentation—especially when starting out. Roosh said in his book that he would try anything to get a good conversation going with women, even drawing stick figures on napkins. I too have tried many methods to get the bang. It's incredibly fun. The ones that work, I analyze and elaborate on for future success. If what I try doesn't work, then I reframe and try again. If it still fails, I totally scrap it.

Some would think that the following methods are too outrageous to work, but I have used other equally or more outrageous methods that have worked. These ones have failed. So without further ado, here are some of the most ineffective game techniques that will not work..

Retarded Game

I have to admit, this one was a little tedious, and I had to compose myself and practice in front of a mirror a few times before hitting the streets. At first I just looked like I normally did, with modifications to my appearance in the form of headgear or protective clothing coming later. I would put on the best act of autism that I could. Exaggerating yourself to act like a dope is pretty easy, and I gotta say, it did show promise at times. I want to share an anecdote that perfectly encapsulates my experience with this.

I went with a friend to shop for shoes with him posing as my guardian. I was pretending to look for shoes that would be easy for someone of my “mental capacity” to put on securely. This particular shoe store was stacked to the brim with hotties working there who were in their teens and early 20s.

I laid my trap. I went to a display shelf and knocked it over, all the while letting out a loud “DUH HUH” and sent it crashing to the floor. One of the employees came over and helped me up. It was on. She was very sympathetic, and after a few words to her, she knew I was a dummy. My guardian came over and explained the situation and she offered to help.

We searched for shoes, all the while keeping her talking to mostly me. She laughed at my jokes and dopey ticks as I tried to maintain the retard frame while steering the conversation to where I desired it to go. Touching her was not a problem, as she thought I was “cute” for being the kind of person the ancient Spartans would throw off a cliff. At the end of it all, I asked her for the number, and she responded with, “Awwww you’re the cutest thing! But I have a boyfriend. I would totally go out with you if I wasn’t taken!” She said this in the nicest voice ever.

I learned that this wouldn’t work because no girl would ever sleep with someone who they think is lower than them. And anyone who rides the short bus is pretty close to the bottom of the sexual food chain.

One more thing I tried after reframing was pretending to be a retard-wrangler who drove a short bus. Long story short, that didn't work because nearly all the girls would get disgusted by me trying to use handicapped kids to get laid. C'est la vie I guess.

Funeral Game

p-p-p-please h-h-h-have s-s-s-sex w-w-w-with muh-muh-me?

Pretending that one of your family members died yesterday doesn't give off good vibes. Conversation threads never escalated beyond initial pseudo-flirtatious banter, as my state of grief was too heavy to get her excited in any way. The girls were usually sympathetic, and that was the biggest problem. Sympathy is an attraction killer, and appearing vulnerable only makes her see you as a lost dog who needs to lick his wounds by himself—without her.

Homosexual Game

This guy might be able to pull it off (phrasing!)

This one is just pretending to be gay to make the girl feel comfortable being around you and then admitting you lied later on. No, I would never suck a cock to convince her of my act. All it took was a wardrobe adjustment, and a higher lispy voice. Breaking the touch barrier was easy-peasy, and she felt extremely comfortable talking about everything and anything—including sex.

This one is a bit of a time waster though, because you have to listen to the girl talk and talk and talk and talk and talk and talk and talk. No wonder why girls hate each other so much! After I thought I was in a good position, I either lied about being a fudge packer, or most commonly, said I was bisexual (side note: no such thing as bi. If you like cock, you're a homosexual) and tried to get the bang from there. It never worked. They were either horrified at my level of manipulation and ran away, or they promptly refused and suggested we stay BFFs.

I would strongly advise against doing this though. It goes against everything about being masculine and alpha. As degenerate as the gays are, they do attract a lot of female friends.

Disease Game

"It's not contagious!"

This one was a bit morbid I will admit, but it was worth a shot since pity-sex is a real thing. Remember the movie 50/50? In it, the protagonist gets cancer and manages to get laid because of it. This one required no extra adjustments other than a frame reset. There is a technique to all this, as you need to ease the conversation in the direction where she either picks up that you have cancer, or you can safely tell her without it sounding weird. You don't just go "Hi, nice to meet you I HAVE CANCER AND GONNA DIE NEXT WEEK LET'S FUCK."

To be honest, I thought this would at least get me a few bangs, but the girls weren't having it. The emotions conveyed by a guy who is about to die are not conducive to the wetting of panties. I wouldn't say this is completely off the table yet, but if anyone has found a way to make it work, let me know.

Dead Lover Game

Feels bad man

The fact of the matter is that this had the same effect as Disease Game did. Not only were the girls not interested in someone who just lost their soulmate, they we're very off put by the prospect of being in the same house as someone who just recently died. There is no easy way to bring up death into the conversation. Worst case scenario, she suspects you had something to do with your "lover's" death. Best case scenario, she smiles, gives you a hug, and gives you her best wishes for recovering.

On the contrary though, a girl who had someone close to her die is ripe for the picking and bedding.

Conclusion

This might sound all fake, but the truth is that I have tried many things to get her to the bedroom. When you no longer have that crippling primal fear that would stop you from approaching, the feeling of liberation unleashes a beast that cannot be contained.

Learn to have fun once in a while. See every girl as an object that can be goaded into sex, and you will have no qualms trying ridiculous shit. Learning game and turning on different switches is extremely fun. Even if this amount of fibbing is not your cup of tea, you will learn how to think on your feet and sharpen your wits. There are billions of girls out there, and it would be a crime to stick to only one way and not be creative once in a while.

Read More: 4 Strategies For Teaching Game To Autistic Men

Liam O'Connor
Liam's predisposition to shattering delusions brought him to the Red Pill. After getting the last of his delusions destroyed, he refuses to apologize for telling the truth. When he's not improving himself, he is counting the friends he is slowly losing. The confines of his mind can be accessed at neverslavery.com and on Twitter @never_a_slave

The Assassination Of Communist Leon Trotsky

May 15, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

For a time in the 1920s Leon Trotsky was second in importance in Soviet Russia only to Lenin himself. Many believed him to be the natural choice to succeed Lenin. But it was not to be; in the Byzantine power struggles that characterized Soviet politics, Trotsky would prove to be an amateur. His personality—arrogant, dismissive, and lacking in tact and forbearance—would ensure that few voices were raised in his defense as Stalin slowly put him in a vice. Trotsky was eventually stripped of his posts and forced into internal exile; he would eventually have to flee the country.

It was a stunning reversal. Trotsky found his way to Mexico City and tried—pathetically, as it turned out—to lead an opposition movement in exile against Stalin. The Communist world in the 1930s was fractured into two camps: those who followed the party line from Moscow, and those "Trotskyists" who placed their sympathies with the exile in Mexico City. And as the shadow of world war loomed in the late 1930s, this situation became intolerable for Joseph Stalin. As the Kremlin saw it, Trotsky was dividing the socialist camp at a time when it faced existential threats (i.e., Germany, Japan, and the West in general). When the secretive Stalin also learned that Trotsky was writing a biography of him, he was enraged and became obsessed with eliminating him.

This dirty job was assigned to Pavel A. Sudoplatov, the intelligence specialist who worked with Levrenti Beria in a secret division called the "Administration for Special Tasks." Sudoplatov would later write a memoir called Special Tasks, which served as the primary source of this article. One day in March 1939, he was summoned to see Stalin and Beria in the Kremlin. Stalin made it clear to him that it would be his job to eliminate Trotsky:

> "There are no important political figures in the Trotskyite movement except Trotsky himself. If Trotsky is finished the threat will be eliminated," Stalin said, and returned to his seat opposite us. Then slowly he began to speak of his dissatisfaction with the present state of our intelligence operations, which he said were not active enough. Stalin stressed that the elimination of Trotsky had first been assigned to [another operative] in 1937, but he had failed to fulfill this important government mission.

Sudoplatov thus had his marching orders; he was not sure he was the right man for the job, as he spoke no Spanish and knew nothing about Mexico. But Stalin waved his concerns aside. "It is your job and party duty to find and select suitable and reliable personnel to carry out the assignment. You will be provided with whatever assistance and support you need. Report directly to Comrade Beria and nobody else, but the full responsibility for carrying out the mission remains with you." On this ominous note, the meeting ended.

Sudoplatov assembled a team of agents, many of whom were former communist fighters of the Spanish Civil War. An earlier clumsy attempt to kill Trotsky by raking his villa with gunfire had failed, and had made him exceedingly cautious in his dealings with anyone he was not familiar with. The assassin finally selected was a charming and good-looking businessman named Ramon Mercader; his mother was also a devoted communist who had fought in Spain. Mercader slowly infiltrated himself into Trotsky's inner circle by posing as an eccentric who liked being around excitement and danger. He also had a romantic involvement with a woman named Sylvia Ageloff, who was well-known in Trotsky's circle. In this way he was able to gain access to his residence.

Ramon Mercader

On August 20, 1940, Mercader was able to arrange a private meeting with Trotsky. Under his coat he had secreted a mountain-climbing ice axe for use as the murder weapon. As Trotsky was bent over his desk studying a document Mercader showed him, the assassin pulled out the axe and brought it down on Trotsky's head. According to Sudoplatov (who heard Mercader's story in person in the 1960s), Trotsky moved his head at the last moment and the blow was slightly deflected. Seriously wounded, he began to scream for help and tried to wrestle the assassin to the ground.

The murder weapon

Guards poured into the room and immobilized Mercader; he was nearly killed by the guards but Trotsky told them to spare his life. The assassin's mother, Caridad Mercader, was waiting for her son in the getaway car outside the villa; when he did not appear, she fled the country. Trotsky died the next day after sustaining severe head injuries. Mercader was arrested by Mexican police under a false name (Frank Jacson); his real identity would not be known for another six years. The only reason his real name became known was because one of Mercader's relatives defected to the West from the Soviet Union and revealed the information (his mother Caridad had actually revealed it to the relative, believing the secret was safe).

Mercader claimed that Mexican police beat him nearly every day for years; yet he kept to his cover story, which was that he had killed Trotsky as the result of a personal dispute. The Mexican authorities would eventually sentence him to 20 years in prison, almost all of which he served. On his release in 1960 he first went to Cuba and from there to the Soviet Union, where he would be honored with the country's highest decoration, the Hero of the Soviet Union.

Here ends the grisly story. While no one celebrates the death of another, it is difficult to find much sympathy for a man like Trotsky, who bore much responsibility for unleashing communism on Russia and then the world. Stalin himself was certainly no hero. But perhaps there is crude justice in the fact that Trotsky was done to death by the same types of fanatics that he himself had created and nurtured during his long and bloody tenure as head of the Red Army in the 1920s.

Read More: What We Must Learn From The Hungarian Communist Revolution Of 1919

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How Modern Feminists Are Not That Different From Michael Jackson

May 15, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

I'll go out on a limb and say most feminists aren't that bad. This means the Blue Pill types who believe it's only about fairness and equality. They simply need a remedial education about what feminism really means.

The ones who are rotten to the core are the radical feminists. Mostly these fruitcakes include SJWs, the professors who brainwashed those kids, and the whack-job feminist theoreticians. They claim to speak for all women, but how qualified are they? Let's compare these fruitcakes to Michael Jackson—one of the most eccentric recent celebrities—and see who better resembles ordinary people.

Appearance

At least overdosing on Propofol is faster than overdosing on cheeseburgers.

The Gloved One: The stage outfits were pretty flashy, and I have to wonder what he was thinking with the drum major outfit. Still, the rhinestone overload was understandable, given his profession. The major question is, what's the deal with just one glove?

MJ started out looking pretty normal. Later, he hit it too hard with the skin bleaching and especially the plastic surgery. By the end, he looked far different from his natural appearance.

Radical feminists: First of all, a large—if you'll pardon the expression—number of them tend to be a pudgy. (I don't mind big gals, up to a certain point, but being snotty is always a deal-breaker. It's ridiculous when a huge ego accompanies a huge body.) Other than that, they dress frumpily, while normal women are semi-obsessed with looking sharp. And what's with the problem glasses?

Hair dyed unnatural colors is common, as are Whitey-dreads or shaving off half their heads, etc. This puts them outside the range of normal human appearance. Still, it's not the worst thing in the world; with time, they can start over.

Tattoos, also common among them, are really getting into iffy territory. They're permanent, and frequently low-quality. This is also why facial piercings and—even worse—other "body modifications" are way beyond the pale. That's symptomatic of profound carelessness or even self-loathing.

Verdict: Michael Jackson looked like a Martian, and so do most fruitcake feminists. At least he was slimmer and better dressed than them.

Sexuality

Not exactly grabbing ’em by the pussy.

The Gloved One: Michael Jackson was known for projecting sexuality, but in what direction was the big mystery. From the stroke material inventoried at Neverland Ranch, he likely was a switch hitter leaning a bit more toward the gay side. Bisexuality (whether open or hinted at) wasn’t all that uncommon in the music scene back then. Whether he ever had gay sex is questionable, as is whether he ever had straight sex.

The real scandal was the allegation that he was into kids. Some believed there was too much smoke for there not to be any fire; others believed it was just bottom-feeder lawyers out to get a deep-pockets celebrity whose eccentricities made him vulnerable. There were many things that seemed pretty odd, but nothing damning enough to stick in court. All told, it’s sort of like today’s Pizzagate; the difference being that the authorities back then investigated and took action.

Radical feminists: Their sexuality is all over the place. Several have said “feminism is the theory, lesbianism is the practice” or other words to that effect. Bisexuality is pretty common too. Believe it or not, some are even straight, though you sort of pity their partners. Some fruitcake feminists are “all aboard the Cock Carousel” types; others are pickled prunes. Some embrace the dozens of new gender identities invented recently; others call bullshit on that.

I say that sex with kids is absolutely wrong, but not all feminists would agree. Andrea Dworkin once thought parent-child incest was good; later she considered all sex bad. Eve Ensler’s Vagina Monologues includes an item called “The Little Coochie Snorcher That Could” (I’m not making this up). The original version features a 13 year old character seduced into lesbian sex by a 24 year old, concluding “If it was rape, it was a good rape”. Later, that embarrassing line got deleted and her age was changed to 16; still jailbait in most places.

Verdict: For MJ and fruitcake feminists, the picture is way too confused to draw definitive conclusions, but pretty weird overall.

Mental issues

Res ipse loquitur.

The Gloved One: MJ suffered from arrested development, which he attributed to overwork during the Jackson Five days. Further, suddenly being thrust into stardom and wealth often changes people, not always for the better. At first, he proudly paraded his eccentricities, but later came to regret it, bitterly complaining about tabloids calling him "Wacko Jacko". On the positive side, his song "Man in the Mirror" strikes a hopeful note about fixing one's life. Like his father-in-law, prescription drugs were ultimately his undoing.

Radical feminists: They have arrested development too, unable to handle disagreements without becoming "triggered" (enraged). Earlier I've noted that two big-name feminists (Firestone and Solanas) were paranoid schizophrenics, and another (Dworkin) was deeply neurotic. I haven't exhaustively documented all the fruitcakes, mooncalves, and psych med junkies amongst the Sisterhood's leading lights, but overall, do they sound like well-adjusted people?

It's sort of understandable; their mission is to spread discord and screw up the social environment, and their incessant negativity rubs off on them. Their failure to come to terms with basic biology is a form of reality denial. The SJWs are the absolute worst, who consider their mental problems a badge of honor.

Verdict: MJ and the feminists weren't so different; lots of loose screws all around. Interestingly, he had it together better than some prominent feminists. It averages out pretty evenly.

Ethnicity

Just cut it out with this stuff; you're ruining your reputation

The Gloved One: MJ was a Black pop star wildly successful with White audiences, sort of a unifying figure. Still, he appears to have had a troubled relationship with his own identity, as his changes in appearance show. Calling his fellow Blacks "spabooks" is further evidence.

Radical feminists: Feminism is predominantly Jewish, one of several troubling phenomena as Roosh noted. In my personal experience, most Jews are decent folks, and I have no problem with those ones. Unfortunately, some others are still stuck in 17th century us-versus-them mentality, a blight on their own community. Those ones often have a love-hate relationship with their own culture, and an even more troubled relationship with broader society. They consider themselves as outsiders, despite many climbing to high echelons of power and influence. Those types started modern feminism.

Some are from other backgrounds, of course. Notably, there are a smaller number of Black feminists, who started the "intersectionality" business. These ones aren't exactly about everyone getting along together. For example, there was endless crabbing about how the "Day Without A Woman" protest would be all a bunch of privileged White feminists who could afford to play hooky from their jobs. Nevertheless, these same White feminists were basically told by the organizers to sit down and shut up. So much for inclusiveness!

Verdict: Neither Michael Jackson nor most feminists represent majority demographics. Still, MJ's Black heritage wasn't a barrier to bringing together fans of all backgrounds. The ethnic group contributing the most to feminism is far closer related to the USA's founding population, yet those (((fruitcakes))) irrationally hang onto ancient grudges.

Ideology

The Gloved One: He loosely embodied warm, fuzzy universalism, part of bringing people together. I may be deplorable, but I can't fault him for that. I'd be on board with it too, if multiculturalism wasn't a disaster. He created the Heal the World Foundation. He also was deeply concerned about the environment, and made some good points.

Radical feminists: Modern feminism (like other expressions of cultural Marxism) is about creating divisiveness, so it's no surprise that cracks are appearing in their coalition. Most people are unaware that second-wave feminism was heavily influenced by Communism, with the goal of wrecking families to disrupt society. As the saying goes:

> The issue is never the issue. The issue is always the revolution.

At least they had a conscious goal. More recent brands of feminism are a little worse, more about resentment and aimless nihilism.

Verdict: MJ's politics amounted to a vague, feel-good liberalism, pretty innocuous unlike many celebrities then and especially now. Fruitcake feminists, though, hate their own society and are hell-bent on wrecking it.

In summary

Time to have a chat with the man in the mirror

Radical feminists claim to speak for all women, while being no more representative of real women than Michael Jackson was a typical guy. On average, they have some other things in common with MJ: they look weird, and entirely by choice; they have an odd, androgynous sexuality; and they have more issues than National Geographic.

However, MJ built bridges to the majority, while feminists nurture old resentments. Also, his politics were pretty inoffensive, but feminists are crabby would-be revolutionaries. Finally, the Gloved One had cool moments, but feminists are tedious and argumentative. All told, those fruitcakes are more wacko than Jacko.

Read more: 9 Types Of Feminists And How To Counter Them

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

History Is Full Of Climate Change Myths That Were Used To Control Human Behavior

May 15, 2017 | by Narmer Bull | Link | Original Link

This is the most important issue of our time. Our world's climate is at urgent breaking point! The planet is warming, the oceans are rising and the flood is inevitable! Civilized man is the villain knowingly committing this crime! His carbon footprint is his greatest sin and his mythological worldview compels him to expect the planets retribution! But hope exists in the form of a culture hero. Leonardo DiCaprio is not only warning people of their impending doom, he is also the champion of the crusade against it.

Before the Flood is documentary about man-made climate change currently making waves in South Africa. It was produced, narrated and elucidated by DiCaprio who presents this myth as though his voice is the first to do so. About 300 deluge narratives can be counted throughout the world. Five of them are significant for Western civilization because they contain the same formula used by the modern disseminator of this propagandistic tale.

The flood myth is basically this: the gods decide to wipe us out because we've degraded and destroyed paradise. The great flood is their preferred method though they do occasionally use plagues and droughts. Under divine, or inspirational instruction, the righteous hero mitigates mankind's course in time. He is divinely rewarded for his achievement.

Conceptualizing the mythic narrative.

The Israelite Flood

The Genesis 6.5 – 8.22 version is certainly the most well-known. Our modern conception of sin is derived from an education in Biblical, and therefore Hebrew history and morality. So it's worth noting the wickedness of man, and how every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. There is no ambiguity, man and all that he has done in the process of living on earth is deemed corrupt and violent. So all life has to end with the exception of the perfect man who walks with God—Noah.

The Greek Deluge

The human race renewed by the bones of Gaea.

In the Greek tradition, the degenerate age of mankind is described as a period when men respect neither their vows, nor justice, nor virtue. Zeus wants to annihilate the human race, but Prometheus warns his son Deucalion. He and his wife Pyrrha survive the flood and change mankind's course by appeasing Zeus. The descendants of Deucalion, the Hellenes, become humanity's new perfect form.

The Gilgamesh Epic

I will say hidden things to you and make known a secret of the gods.

The eleventh tablet of the Akkadian epic of Gilgamesh was inserted into The Epic of Gilgamesh around 1200 BC. In this famous work of cuneiform literature, Ut-napishtim is the hero concerned with ensuring life under the threat of god-controlled climate change. No reason is given for the gods decision to drown humanity but one of them Ea, warns Ut-napishtim, thereby preventing total destruction. The gods show remorse and gift the hero with immortality.

The Atrahasis Epic

Hearken to the message that he shall make known to you.

In an earlier copy, from around 1600 BC, the all-wise and pious king Atrahasis is warned to build the ark and prep for the deluge. Here the weather god Enlil wants to eradicate city-dwelling man. He apparently does this every 1200 years—alternating between plagues, droughts and floods. But on this occasion it's our dense urban overpopulation and the associated noise pollution that triggered him.

The Sumerian Flood

All the devastating winds and storms came, and the flood storm swept over the great cities.

The Sumerian myth, copied around 1900 BC, has Ziusudra as the original form of the Noah character. The gods grow hostile to mankind for the perceived noise and general disturbance we cause. The divine solution is a cleansing by water. The humble and obedient hero is warned by the god Enki, he builds a ship, saves the seed of mankind and is ultimately given life like a god in the new phase of human moral evolution.

Why Some Are Inclined To Believe The Myth

Flood narratives are the result of folk memory. Various local disasters were experienced by some societies who then transmitted their story to others. For instance local flooding was frequent in Mesopotamia but there just aren't any rivers capable of it in the Canaanite region. So it must have been borrowed by the Israelite tradition from a particularly authoritative disseminator of culture.

Politicizing the myth.

The purpose of these myths was to regulate human behaviour by convincing people that successful urban life is contemptible and annoys the planet to the extent that divine retribution should be expected. Moralized climate change is understandable for the ancients. These were religious texts after all. People believed the dogma because they had faith in its authoritative source.

Moralizing the narrative.

Today, the disseminator of the new version expects you to dogmatically believe it based on his faith in the people who told him about modern science, the scientific method, and empirical truths. An actor was enlisted to spread these “truths,” hoping to convince you based on personal authority.

Feed scrap to dogs and they'll wag their tails.

Conclusion

Western culture has a long and interconnected literary tradition of the climate change narrative, and all versions are better than Before the Flood. Fossil fuel emissions, greenhouse gases, CFC's, overpopulation and deforestation are just recent echoes of the same familiar themes we've always associated with the success of civilized life. Climate change and its apparently inevitable floods are simply a part of the experience. But maybe our sanctimonious Hollywood hero, with his concern for all life, is aware of some great truth that has managed to escape the minds of all history's greatest thinkers.

Read more on the three Mesopotamian Flood Myths in: Beyerlin, W (ed) 1975. Near Eastern Religious Texts Relating to the Old Testament. Philadelphia: The Westminster Press.

Read More: 60 Myths On Memory, Learning, Sleep, And Creativity

Narmer Bull
A coloured South African, and student of the ancient near east.

How The Globalist Establishment Is Smartly Adapting To The Rise Of Populism

May 16, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

We can safely say that the establishment is learning and adapting from their stupendous losses in 2016, so they're adapting their messaging and persuasion attempts accordingly. Initial A/B tests like the panic over "fake news" flopped, but they quickly bounced back on their feet. The recent election in France, which saw a technocratic banker very competently astroturfed as a change-agent outsider, was the biggest signal that their field tests have been quite successful. What sort of persuasion tactics are now being used?

Linguistic Kill Shots

These are likely still in beta testing, but they were used to great effect in the French campaign. Notice that every time Marine Le Pen was mentioned, she was preceded by the term "far right." Meanwhile, Emmanuel Macron's name was accompanied by the "centrist" tag. Even in America, even on Fox News, these tags accompanied their names without fail every time I heard them in the media.

These labels, which Scott Adams calls "linguistic kill shots," can serve a variety of purposes, but the overarching one is that they channel attention to a certain attribute. It's a form of Pre-Suasion, where directing attention to favorable concepts creates "privileged moments" that increase receptivity to your major message. In this case, always calling Le Pen "far right" and Macron "centrist" planted the seeds to make it easier to dismiss the former as dangerous while increasing the credibility of the latter. The facts that economically, Le Pen's program is quite far to the left, while Macron has signaled significant belligerence to European countries not towing the EU line, were immaterial.

These linguistic kill shots weren't as advanced as the ones Donald Trump was using in his own campaign, which involved more sensual cues that were also more open to confirmation bias, but it is worth noting that the establishment seems to be testing these out.

Censorship and Selective Reporting

When the media tried to accuse its opponents of spreading "fake news," the label quickly backfired because they engaged in selective reporting or outright hoaxes far too many times, a tendency that certainly hasn't diminished since Trump's inauguration. While this effort turned against them on the hot battlefield of persuasive language, the victory has only been partial, because it was the springboard from which they got their pretext to start censoring social media, which proved crucial in bypassing the fake news media to create favorable news cycles of our own while undercutting the establishment narrative.

Increasingly, the "fake news" excuse has been used by the big social networks to censor or demote information they don't like. Self-appointed, so-called independent "fact checking" sites are now being used in Facebook's algorithm. Google has made some noise about changing its own algorithm to filter what it calls "fake news." Twitter, in the meantime, has (allegedly) throttled tweets they don't like. Replies to Donald Trump get filtered so that only negative ones show up first. Trending tags are almost always hysteria that shores up the establishment's narrative.

Who determines "fake news?" Who decides what you should get to see? Some unaccountable technocrat? You see where this is going. It's a dangerous road which dovetails neatly with the next aspect of this, the heavily selective reporting.

In France, a couple of days before the election, emails from the Macron campaign were leaked. They were quickly authenticated, or most of them, anyway. Wikileaks didn't find any false ones (last I checked). The fake news did everything it could to conceal the contents of the emails. The law in France prohibiting any kind of campaigning information in the 48 hours before an election complicated things, but you had American pundits and presstitutes openly calling for the concealment of this newsworthy information from the public because it would negatively affect their team.

Predictably, this was given the fig leaf of the “because muh Russia” excuse, with little or no evidence. Let’s also be honest – if Le Pen was looking strong and damaging emails were leaked, would the campaigning law be adhered to so strenuously by the media in France? Somehow, I doubt it.

The “free” press is a figment of the imaginations of “journalists” who envision themselves as sacrosanct guardians of the public good, but in truth, they will do whatever their masters tell them. Their job is to propagate the narrative, not report the truth. Therefore, we will increasingly see the media simply refuse to report on anything that undermines the establishment narrative, all the while, social media will be censored, as we saw a major crackdown on Facebook and Twitter accounts, blacking out many that were sharing the contents of the Macron emails. Jack Posobiec was singled out in particular in a torrent of hit jobs because he was one of the first prominent people sharing them.

How do we adapt to this? Roosh posited a while ago that Facebook and Twitter passed their peak of importance for information warfare and that new mediums would arise in the years before the next American election. The creation and boosting of new platforms like Gab and Minds seems to be the first answer. Monetization for counter culture figures and journalists may become increasingly difficult also, as the YouTube apocalypse is well underway, Return of Kings was shut out of PayPal, and even Dave Rubin, a relatively uncontroversial figure who is nevertheless a skeptic of the current cultural zeitgeist, had problems with his Amazon Affiliate account. This will be an ongoing battle that will demand constant innovation and adaptation.

Astroturfed Candidates

During the Brexit campaign, the pro-EU Remain side ran on something they called "Project Fear." The key message was that leaving the European Union would be a disaster and really, really scary. The same was largely true of the Hillary Clinton campaign, which ran more on fear of Trump than on any benefit that she was offering. Both campaigns lost. Partly this was because they weren't running their fear-based messaging as well as they could have, but partly also it was because people want to vote for something, rather than just vote against something.

The Leave and Trump campaigns offered aspirational messages with clear benefits, while all the way to Election Day I still couldn't figure out why the Democrats wanted me to vote for Hillary Clinton rather than just against Donald Trump. Meanwhile, the Leave campaign offered Britons to "take back control of their country."

In France, the story was different. Emmanuel Macron was elevated and celebrated. Recall from Pre-Suasion that what's elevated in our attention is what we think is most important in that moment. While Le Pen was dismissed as "far right" and Francois Fillon, who would have likely won ordinarily, was destroyed by massive attention paid to allegations of underhanded financial transactions (when attention was paid to him at all), the media gushed about how awesome Macron was.

He was being billed as a change agent, an outsider who would shake things up, in complete contrast to his history… and it worked.

Macron's youth was also an advantage to him. One of the French regulars on the forum theorizes that there will soon be a trend of running Macron-like figures—young, good-looking men, particularly to shore up the middle-aged white women vote. Recall that the single biggest predictor of whether someone would vote for Donald Trump last November was whether he or she married (as is general for rightist candidates). It is possible the establishment could start running younger, more attractive men to peel off the married women vote.

It is well known that more attractive candidates get more votes than less attractive ones, which up to now has more often benefited right wing candidates than left wing ones, as it is also well known that conservatives are typically more attractive than liberals. Will there be a program of sorts to groom and elevate young, somewhat attractive candidates by the establishment going forward?

It's too soon to say for sure, and for the time being, the Democratic Party in America is as heavily committed to identity politics as ever, so I don't see any of these kinds of Macron-like candidates for President in the Democratic Party's near future. One race is worth noting though, the runoff for the seat previously held in Georgia by HHS Secretary Tom Price. There you have a candidate that was heavily invested in by the party establishment, Jon Ossof, who at 30 years old, seems to fit the bill. He came within a hair's breadth of winning the seat outright. A special election will soon be held.

We'll see where it all goes, but I agree with the guys on the forum. We likely won't be seeing any more Hillarys in the future. Instead, we'll be seeing astroturfed candidates to try and capture the populist energy, but who are wolves in sheep's clothing.

Out-Grouping and Conclusion

The establishment knows it needs to innovate its tactics. The old paradigm is collapsing. As I warned in December, the Russia hysteria is highly engineered and has successfully turned every mundane thing into a constitutional crisis. The fake news media is working on overdrive to pay no attention to anything else. It's also given the establishment a pretext to easily censor bad news for them, as seen in France.

Since calling people "racist" doesn't work as well as it used to, they're moving to something else, ironically playing on man's tribal nature (what Cialdini would call the principle of unity in Pre-Suasion) and accusing their opponents of favoring an enemy out-group. In fact, Roosh warned some time ago that the globalist establishment would use nationalistic patriotism to favor their own cause, and to therefore not take it too far. Beware, they say: "the Russians are coming!"

I'm not sure how long this tactic will work, but it is new and has been effective, a sure sign of adaptation. Don't assume the rules of 2016 will be the rules going forward. The last war is the last war.

Keep your eyes open in the years and elections to come. The chess game never ends.

Read Next: John Lennon's "Imagine" Programmed You To Accept The Globalism Nightmare

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

The Official ROK Shirt Is Now Here!

May 16, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After much delay, I'm happy to announce that the Red Kings Shop is open for business with a debut flagship t-shirt that features the iconic ROK logo printed on a high-quality 100% cotton cranberry red American Apparel chemise that is made in the USA.

By wearing the official ROK shirt, you will experience these benefits:

- Testosterone increase of 300% (more than what Kratom provides)*
- Induce mental breakdown of any liberal who sees your shirt*
- Rapid 3-inch elongation of your penis*
- Immediate 50-pound gain in your bench press*
- More ravenous attention from beautiful women of suitable breeding stock*
- Reduction of body fat by at least 10%*

* The above claims have not been independently verified, and may be an attempt by Roosh to sell more shirts

We've had two robust beta tests that have put our small size out of stock and medium size in limited stock. If you're enjoying the articles on ROK and want to support our operation, visit Red Kings Shop and buy your shirt today. Your shirt will be shipped out within one week from when you place your order.

This is the best way to donate to the masculine cause while receiving a handsome shirt in return, especially on the heels of Paypal shutting us down in April for political reasons. Your support is much appreciated.

Click Here To Visit Red Kings Shop

After you receive your shirt, use our form to send me a picture, review, or story from wearing the shirt and get a 20% off discount code by the time we launch our second item.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What The Media Wont Tell You About The Aaron Hernandez Tragedy

May 16, 2017 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Most people in the free world, sports fans or not, are familiar with the Aaron Hernandez saga. The reader's digest version is that he, Hernandez, was convicted in '15 for the murder of Odin Lloyd, a semi-professional football player and was sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole.

Hernandez was later indicted on double homicide charges stemming from a double murder in 2012 but was acquitted last month. Five days after he beat those charges, however, the former New England Patriots tight end took his own life in his Massachusetts prison cell at just 27 years old, leaving behind his fiancee (Shayanna Jenkins) and 4 year old daughter.

Shayanna Jenkins

The main question that's been echoed throughout the media since his arrest back in '13 for the Lloyd murder was how could a man who had achieved ultimate success by becoming a professional athlete and acquiring generational wealth turn cold-blooded killer? How could a man who had everything, financial security, a fiancee, a daughter, along with fame and fortune throw it all away over a misunderstanding at a night club?

How it started

Any man with red pill awareness knows that fathers play a huge role in the successful upbringing of strong masculine sons, both physically and mentally. Hernandez obviously had elite physical traits but his mental state was severely lacking.

A few months after his arrest for the Odin Lloyd murder Rolling Stone published an article entitled The Gangster In The Huddle which chronicled the life and times of Aaron Hernandez from his childhood to his seemingly inevitable first degree murder conviction.

I read the article intently before coming up on this paragraph about Aaron's father, Dennis:

> …in January 2006, Dennis checked himself in for a hernia repair at a local hospital. Something happened on the table, though, and he contracted an infection; two days later, he was dead. He was 49, in otherwise splendid health, and beloved by virtually everyone in town.

Hernandez was just 16 when he lost his father. According to the article, Aaron was "shocked beyond tears" and sat expressionless at the funeral while his older brother, D.J., sobbed uncontrollably over the casket.

Young Hernandez and older brother D.J.

By all accounts, Dennis was a good father to the Hernandez brothers. He built them a make shift gym in the family basement so they could train (he recognized both of his sons were athletically gifted from a young age), made sure their homework was completed on time and quizzed them on picking up blitz's or offensive assignments. He also made sure his sons weren't subjected to the perils of the streets that plagued his own childhood:

> Dennis sheltered them from that life with all his might," says Gary Fortier. "He was the perfect dad: He went to every scrimmage, and got 'em up at dawn to work out,"

D.J. was like a second father to Aaron

Losing his father at an age where boys need them the most nearly damaged Hernandez beyond repair. He still had his older brother, who was much like their father as far as discipline and work ethic went, but a series of events that occurred before and after Dennis' death put the finishing touches on Aaron's transformation from a kid who was a happy-go-lucky goofball into a man with homicidal (and later suicidal) tendencies and an insatiable need for violence.

His mother was not a good influence

As good a father as Dennis was, their mother, Terri was the polar opposite. People who knew the family said she brought a lot of drama into the Hernandez household. In 2001 she was busted for running an illegal sports book when Aaron was just 12. She didn't do any time but that event was the start of a a rift between her and Aaron. Her subsequent affair with a drug dealer put the nail in the coffin:

> Friends say Terri had begun cheating on Dennis with a physically abusive coke dealer named Jeffrey Cummings, who was married to Dennis' niece, Tanya Cummings.
>
> Terri's relationship with Cummings, whose nickname is Meathead, was a bottomless source of grief for the sons. There was an ugly spectacle in the stands at a UConn game, says a family friend. Terri, on hand to watch DJ play, was angrily confronted by her niece and slapped in the face. The aftermath, says the friend, "hurt Aaron bad and broke his heart."
>
> He might have held it together, or handled the fallout better, if Dennis had been around to see him through it. But in January 2006, Dennis checked himself in for a hernia repair at a local hospital…

As stated earlier, Dennis died just two days later.

Terri (left), D.J. (center) at Hernandez's murder trial

But it doesn't end there:

> Heartsick and furious, Aaron seemed to implode. "He would rebel," Terri told USA Today in an interview three years later. "He wasn't the same kid, the way he spoke to me. The shock of losing his dad, there was so much anger." Small wonder there: She moved Cummings into the house she shared with Aaron, and married him when his divorce from Tanya was final.
>
> To no one's great surprise, cops soon fielded phone calls that Cummings was abusing Terri. "We responded to that address on more than one occasion," says Detective Lt. Kevin Morrell of the Bristol P.D. In June 2010, Cummings got drunk one night and flew into a rage. Grabbing a knife from the kitchen, he slashed Terri's face and body before she fled to her neighbors next door. Cops arrested Cummings in the yard and charged him with assault and sent him to prison for two years. Terri divorced him that year, but took him back, say friends, when he was released in 2012.

A bad father negatively affects the lives and mental well being of both boys and girls. An absentee father sometimes magnifies those problems.

A bad mother can also negatively affect children in a negative way but those affects can be mitigated and sometimes even eliminated by a good father. Same thing applies with an absentee mother.

Hernandez is arrested for the murder of Odin Lloyd

But a good father who is lost too soon combined with an unfaithful mother who acts selfishly and clearly has no regard for the psyche of her sons as a result of her actions has deadly consequences. The multiple victims Aaron Hernandez left in his wake, Odin Lloyd, Shayanna Jenkins, her daughter Avielle, and Hernandez himself all suffered will continue to suffer those consequences for the rest of their lives.

Am I absolving Hernandez?

Of course not. Regardless of our upbringing and experiences, we're all born with a fundamental understanding of the difference between right and wrong. Aaron Hernandez was wrong for killing Odin Lloyd and deserved the sentence he received.

What was lost in the narrative, however, was the effect his poor excuse of a mother had on him at a young age what with her illegal exploits and affair with a violent drug dealer whom she eventually married and moved into the home she shared with her sons. The media speculated and analyzed his life ad nauseam searching for possible explanations for his metamorphosis into a cold blooded killer.

But men here know how and why bad mothers ruin their children for life as the proof is all around us every day. And as usual the left leaning media conveniently leaves out the female's role and responsibility in any tragedy. The saga of Aaron Hernandez was no different.

Check out Donovan's podcast The Sharpe Reality on thesharpereality.com or his YouTube channel

Read Next: How Professional Athletes Show Us The Importance Of Fathers

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

What Is Fascism?

May 16, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The word “fascism” has come out of nowhere to describe Donald Trump, as shown by search engine frequency that is ten times higher than what it was in 2014. After researching what fascism really means, I’ve concluded that it is being used as a weapon to shut down dissident thought after previous attack labels like “sexist” and “racist” lost their power.

The problem with the word fascism is that it never had a clear definition. Every single resource I found that tried to define fascism has used a different set of standards and rules, meaning that no objective definition exists. It describes nothing and everything at the same time, meaning that it has no function in discourse but that of a rhetorical weapon, simply because of the World War 2 Axis Power connotation that is associated with it.

Let’s start with the simplest definition, offered by historian R.J.B. Bosworth.

> …it might be argued that the quest for definition of fascism has become absurdly laboured. Why opt for a long list of factors or paragraph of rococo ornateness when Mussolini, on a number of occasions, informed people he regarded as converted to his cause that Fascism was a simple matter? All that was needed was a single party, a dopolavoro [“after work”, a social leisure time organization], and, he did not have to add, a Duce (with a Bocchini to repress dissent) and a will to exclude the foe (somehow defined). To be still more succinct, as Mussolini told Franco in October 1936, what the Spaniard should aim at was a regime that was simultaneously ‘authoritarian’, ‘social’, and ‘popular’. That amalgam, the Duce advised, was the basis of universal fascism.”

Donald Trump does not advocate for a single party, does not have a social leisure organization, and initially tried to reach across the aisle to include the foe (Democratic party) in advancing his pro-America agenda. From the mouth of Mussolini himself, the progenitor of fascism, we can easily conclude that Trump is not one.

This would seem like an open-and-shut case, but instead of taking Mussolini's word for it, historians insist on endlessly analyzing the qualities and nature of his regime to produce an expanded definition of fascism. This is where we get into trouble, because their analysis becomes more subjective and mired in problems of definition.

> All three authors agree that statism, nationalism, unity, authoritarianism, and vigor are essential elements of fascism.

Immediately you may be struck by how terms like "unity" and "vigor" are vague descriptors, especially the latter, which can be used to merely describe an alpha male. I've also seen the word "vitality" being used to describe fascism, as if the opposite is more preferable. These authors will also have different definitions of statism, nationalism, and authoritarianism, and those definitions will shift over time, becoming vague enough that they can be used as a means of attack on nearly anyone. "Fascism" becomes a system that is defined upon other systems, all of which have definitions that can be changed at a moment's notice by any competent propaganda machine to make fascist what previously was not fascist.

For sake of historical accuracy, it should be noted that Jews were disproportionately represented in Italy's fascist regime, just like they were in communism and Cultural Marxism.

> [The authors] also note that the role of anti-Semitism in the rise of fascist movements was minor. In the Italian case, it played no role at all in the early days. Jews, indeed, were disproportionately likely to be party members: it is estimated that in the early 30's, 25% of adult Jews were Fascist party members, compared to about 10% for the entire adult population.

George Orwell, author of Animal Farm and 1984, wrote an essay that points out the bendability of fascism.

> Catholics: Outside its own ranks, the Catholic Church is almost universally regarded as pro-Fascist, both objectively and subjectively.
>
> War resisters: Pacifists and others who are anti-war are frequently accused not only of making things easier for the Axis, but of becoming tinged with pro-Fascist feeling.
>
> Nationalists: Nationalism is universally regarded as inherently Fascist, but this is held only to apply to such national movements as the speaker happens to disapprove of. Arab nationalism, Polish nationalism, Finnish nationalism, the Indian Congress Party, the Muslim League, Zionism, and the I.R.A. are all described as Fascist but not by the same people.

Even in 1944, in the fresh aftermath of Mussolini, the term was already being abused.

> It will be seen that, as used, the word 'Fascism' is almost entirely meaningless. In conversation, of course, it is used even more wildly than in print. I have heard it applied to farmers, shopkeepers, Social Credit, corporal punishment, fox-hunting, bull-fighting, the 1922 Committee, the 1941 Committee, Kipling, Gandhi, Chiang Kai-Shek, homosexuality, Priestley's broadcasts, Youth Hostels, astrology, women, dogs and I do not know what else.

He concludes his piece by stating that "fascist" is merely an insult to mean "bully."

> …even the people who recklessly fling the word 'Fascist' in every direction attach at any rate an emotional significance to it. By 'Fascism' they mean, roughly speaking, something cruel, unscrupulous, arrogant, obscurantist, anti-liberal and anti-working-class. Except for the relatively small number of Fascist sympathizers, almost any English person would accept 'bully' as a synonym for 'Fascist'. That is about as near to a definition as this much-abused word has come.

Even the word "bully" has had its definition change over the years, and has now come to mean anyone who is strong, capable, and mighty. In other words, an alpha male. In a society that actually believes masculinity is "toxic" and any man who pursues sex with women as a likely "rapist," we've endured a full decade of relentless propaganda attacking anything that is male, meaning even a man of average assertiveness becomes a "bully." Within ten years, any man who is not a cuckold will also be called a bully. Real bullies who prey on the weak do exist, and that should be discouraged, but the mainstream establishment has used the word bully to define anyone and anything with an essential masculine quality.

From the above analysis, we can now create a definition of fascism for modern usage: anyone to the right of me who possesses strength. If your political views are to the right of someone, and you believe that strength in leadership is necessary, and the year is current, you will be called a fascist. If you are a "conservative" who is fearful of strength because it is literally Hitler, you will not be called a fascist. If you are on the far left but use strength to assert your position, like militant Black Lives Matter groups, you will not be called a fascist. If you are a moderate homosexual Jew like Milo, who has leftist views but is still right of where most leftists reside, you will be called a fascist, and your supporters will be beaten with pipes. The term is therefore relative and emotional—it's a feeling that someone who is more conservative than you believes in strength to aid in upholding societal stability and cultural values.

Since the nebulous textbook definition of fascism uses various other systems to define it, mostly for the use of labeling by historians to write books that justify their positions and salaries, anyone who genuinely fears fascism should instead levy specific accusations of wrongdoing if they intend to carry on an intellectual debate. For example, what specific feature of Trump's nationalism is wrong on logical terms? What specific authoritarian act that does not follow due process has he encouraged?

I do not expect the fascist labelers to drill down to such a level of logic, so we must endure their endless use of the term, mostly because their previous labels of sexist, racist, and rapist have lost steam and are no longer effective at shutting down conversations and ideas that they view as dangerous to their globalist platform. Behold the era of the fascist bot, who utters a term merely out of emotion for a need to assert power, and nothing more.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: What Donald Trump's Victory Means For Men

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How To Get Through The First Two Critical Minutes Of Talking To A Hot Girl

May 16, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

This is it. You've done it. You've plucked up the courage. Perhaps you've even followed the '3 second' rule and gone up to her as soon as you spotted her. Whatever. You've made a direct approach. You've said 'Hi, I think you're kinda cute, I'm Troy.' You've got over the very first hurdle that 95% of other guys wouldn't even contemplate attempting. So here you are, standing in front of her. Now what?

If you break down approach anxiety, if you really analyse its constituent parts then it becomes apparent that it's not actually the approach itself that guys are scared of. Of, to be more accurate, if we are scared of the approach it is because of our uncertainty around what comes immediately afterwards. After all, we know what we're going to say when we open our mouths. It's not too difficult to decide on a line, memorise it and then go and deliver it.

(Okay, I get that some guys are hyper-shy and find even that difficult, but you know what I mean. In principle we can all decide to say a particular thing then open our mouths and say it).

What guys are most intimidated about when they approach is what happens directly afterwards. We've delivered our perfect line in all it's glory. If things stopped here, if all you had to do was walk up and say 'Hey, you're cute' for her to say 'Cool, let's go have sex' then no man would have any problem doing it and all game writing would be unnecessary. But it's not like that. The trouble is, you went and spoke to a sentient human being. A stranger you know nothing about. And the ways in which she could conceivably react to you are in theory infinite.

That's what makes approaching scary and exhilarating. We have no real idea what's going to happen before we do it. The girl could be a complete loon. She could start shouting the place down, call the cops, throw a pint of water over your head, anything. On a more prosaic level, (and more realistically) she might rebuff your advance, say something cruel about you, laugh, or simply ignore you.

These things are unpalatable for most men because of our egos. We don't like the idea of being seen to be shunned by a woman in public. However, if you are to become proficient at meeting and attracting women then you need to become resilient.

The most likely thing to happen when you cold-approach a girl you don't know, in particular if you do a direct approach where you lay your cards on the table and tell her you like her straight-off, is that she will be somewhat skeptical, perhaps even cold, for the first couple of minutes of the conversation. It is here that you need a strategy. The worst thing you can do is simply walk off. Too many men give up too early and lose out on opportunities that could have paid off. No: what you need to do in a situation such as this is to plow.

Plowing

If this dude thinks that's hard he should try talking to a 8.5 in the VIP at Pacha

'Plowing' is an old-school term dating back to Mystery method which describes the process of pushing through what might be an initially awkward interaction. If you do it proficiently then what often happens is that the girl will eventually loosen up and become friendly, chatty and generally open to you.

On Friday I approached a cute girl in a restaurant. She was sitting at a table alone, but right next to her were her two friends. Effectively it was three-set then. To add a little additional social pressure I asked my friend to film the encounter on my iPhone for me.

I decided to go direct. Going indirect in a restaurant in my view stretches believability a little too much ('Hey, I couldn't help notice you have the linguine. What sauce have they given you with that?'). I opted for a high-cheese strategy, basically satirising chodey romantic comedy films.

'Hi guys,' I said, addressing all three girls. 'I'm sorry to intrude like this while you're eating but I had to come over because I've just fallen madly in love with your friend.'

This was divisive. The girl I liked blushed and laughed and put a hand to her mouth. The two friends looked distinctly unimpressed and smiled weakly.

'But I'm in a restaurant. I'm eating,' said the girl.

Now, having had time to compose herself and no doubt to observe the demeanor of her friends, she was looking at me challengingly, as though I had committed some social faux pas. Which technically of course I had.

It's Plow Or Die

In a moment such as this it really is plow or die. I'd already made an unusually flamboyant social gesture. Now the girl was testing me in front of her friends (and the other diners) to see what I was made of.

Put on the spot it might have been tempting to have backed down. 'I'm sorry. Well, have a lovely dinner. It was nice to meet you.' But had I done that I would have achieved precisely nothing.

Instead, I used another old-school game technique. I agreed and amplified.

'Yes. It was incredibly rude of me. I don't know what's come over me. I'm not normally like this. You know us British men [the girls were Russian]. We tend to be very formal and afraid of our emotions. But when I saw you sitting there something in the universe paused, just for a moment. It was as though the planets stopped moving. As though all of the birds in the trees stopped singing, just for a second. As though all traffic stopped, all conversations, all the fish in the sea. And I knew at this moment that it was real love, love that could not be contained by the normal petty, empty social conventions that exist to hold us back, to tether us, to prevent us from expressing our true feelings . . . '

Etc. etc. etc.

I continued with this bullshit for a minute or so, until the girl started laughing and even her friends were cracking smiles. Of course, it's all in the delivery, and with mocking eyes I made it clear that it was all ironic. It worked.

'I'm a lucky girl,' my target said. The ice had been broken. I pulled up the chair in front of her and we began talking normally. Now there was no resistance from her or the friends, who chatted amongst themselves. After ten minutes or so I left with her phone number.

How To Plow

The above is an example of a very particular form of game that I sometimes use—fake romanticism. If you haven't done it yourself it's worth a try—it's a lot of fun. But the key thing I want you to take away about plowing is that i*t doesn't really matter too much what you say, you just need to keep talking.*

The most important thing about the speech I made in the restaurant wasn't its content, but the fact that I made it at all. Let's think about the subcommunications for a second. For one, I wasn't intimidated by either the girls' slightly frosty reception of me, or of the wider social situation. Two, I was able to talk fluently and at some length (even though what I was saying was bullshit). Three, I was humourous. Four, I had balls. Five [bonus point on content] I was socially savvy enough to parody stereotypical romantic conventions. In other words, just by continuing to talk I was able to raise my value in the eyes of this girl.

I am not recommending that you too should use 'fake romanticism' if it doesn't suit you. I am recommending that you plow when you approach a girl that you like and she is standoffish. If you can just keep talking for a minute or so without her having to say anything then you will be surprised how likely she is to warm to you.

Want to find out more about how to get great at game? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter and at realtroyfrancis.com

Read More: The One Girl You Absolutely Must Approach Every Day

Why White People Are Dying Off

May 17, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

White people are declining around the world. They're watching their nations demographically transform before their very eyes and their political power evaporate. More white people are now dying than being born in 17 states, and as demographic trends progress that statistic will soon include all 50 states.

They just don't know what is causing them to lose everything. Scapegoats abound. Them Messicans. Them Muslims. But did white people ever think of looking in the mirror and questioning what their masters have made them into?

Unfortunately, the truth is a very bitter pill to swallow and whites have already wandered too far down the primrose path of social engineering hell to make a painless escape or to vote their way to change. What brought about the ongoing decline and possible genocide of the white race?

Feminism

Behold, the hairy armpit that is feminism

Feminism rendered the wombs of white women statistically sterile, and is literally attempting to turn them into bad copies of men. It ruined male/female relations in Anglo America. It made women and men compete for scraps off the corporate table rather than cooperate. It transformed women into common laborers rather than moms. It's creating a massive spinster bubble that will descend upon the land and break the already bankrupt state even further in the coming generations as old women need government care that in the past a family would have provided.

Still, due to 50 years of media propaganda, it is verboten to criticize this hateful ideology. Dresden James, writer, sums up what has happened with this timeless quotation:

> When a well-packaged web of lies has been sold gradually to the masses over generations, the truth will seem utterly preposterous and its speaker a raving lunatic.

Indeed, social engineers attempt to label truth tellers in the manosphere as raving lunatics. Or slander them with accusations that our brigade is composed of everything from rapists to terrorists. And most whites still have no clue the Trojan Horse that is feminism.

That's just how well government propaganda has worked. Yet, there are those on the libertarian side who think the government is ineffectual. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Corporate-government complex social engineering schemes have succeeded beyond the elite's wildest dreams.

Materialism

The slow, spiritual death of materialism has a firm grip on the West

Materialism killed white culture. Caucasian activity in modern times can be summed up succinctly in the West. It goes like this: People mindlessly work and consume like zombies. There no room for cultural or spiritual pursuits in nations that only measure the whole of the human condition in terms of dollars and cents.

Here's how selling out your culture works. There is no monetary benefit to solving any of society's problems, only in creating more of them. Two maxims rule in the female-driven materialistic economy of today: You have to create problems to create profit, and you have to pass endless laws to create new businesses.

Examples? The government manipulated the nation's diet in the 1970s, substituting carbohydrate for fat. An obesity epidemic resulted, which made gross national product go up as more people became diabetic. Ironically, heart disease also went up, even though that's what government meddling with the human diet was supposed to prevent. Anyone who has studied the matter knows humans have been eating fat since we lived on the savannas of Africa, but have never eaten carbohydrate in the quantities we are now eating.

It was quite a sleight of hand, worsening human health in order to make more money flow into the economy. Yet, all whites ever talk about is more money and selling out more of their lives.

An example of passing endless laws is the government passing laws to strip rights from you, and then sell them back in the form of licensing. But that's not enough. The more the government micromanages (and fines or charges fees for) the lives of the sheeple, the more money can be made to buy more useless crap.

Ironically, the more money a nation produces the worse condition it is culturally in as one can argue materialism and culture are inversely proportional. As one goes up, the other must come down. Or, put more simply: There's a lot of poverty in the rich neighborhood and a lot of richness in the poor neighborhood.

All of these schemes are hatched so that more money can be generated out of the ether, so people can buy things they don't need with money they don't have to impress people they don't like. Unfortunately, when people dedicate their lives to extrinsic goals like materialism rather than intrinsic goals like raising a family, nations die. What we are seeing today is not without precedent.

Loading...
Greek historian Polybius wrote this during the Hellenistic period:

> In our own time the whole of Greece has been subject to a low birth rate and a general decrease of the population, owing to which cities have become deserted and the land has ceased to yield fruit, although there have neither been continuous wars nor epidemics…For as men had fallen into such a state of pretentiousness, avarice, and indolence that they did not wish to marry, or if they married to rear the children born to them, or at most as a rule but one or two of > them, so as to leave these in affluence and bring them up to waste their substance, the evil rapidly and insensibly grew.

It seems greed really is one of the seven deadly sins.

Liberalism

Once a subject of SNL sketches featuring Julia Sweeney, androgyny is becoming the norm in traditionally white countries

Put succinctly, liberalism made white people hate themselves, their culture, and their very existence.

Liberalism also made whites weak and apologetic, to the point where some of them are now utterly suicidal. Go to any major city in America and look on in horror at how browbeaten and pathetic many white men have become as a result of liberal indoctrination in the education system and the media.

Not to mention the success the elite have had at using liberalism to confuse men and women about sex roles, biology, and rendering them both increasingly androgynous. The result? A barren ethnic group, rendered that way by a doxy pumped into at least two generations' minds by presstitutes, Hollywood marionettes, and pliable public school teachers.

Oscar Wilde knew human nature quite well.

> Most people are other people. Their thoughts are someone else's opinions, their lives a mimicry, their passions a quotation.

Most people attempt to make their lives look just like the illusionary confections from media and Hollyweird. The illusion sold to the masses on most mainstream sitcoms and movies is of characters who live easy lives in which one would need to earn $100,000 a year to maintain the standard of living on the screen. The median income in America is now $43,000 a year, and stagnant. They also try to mimic the freak show they see on TV.

More than anything, liberalism is debasing all the foundations of European culture on both sides of the pond. This will prove fatal to both the culture and its founding ethnic group.

The Carlin Approach

George Carlin offers two solutions to the ongoing decline of the white race, which incidentally, he spoke of just before his death

One can become upset at what's happening, or can separate themselves from this death cult and watch it implode of its own volition. This is what one might call the George Carlin approach:

> When you're born you get a ticket to the freak show. When you're born in America, you get a front row seat.

Carlin knew the freak show—which this author believes is made worse by feminism, materialism, and liberalism—was going to consume a once mighty ethnic group. When speaking of what material he was working on just before his death, Carlin told interviewers he was writing about:

> The rise of Russia, the rise of China, the Islamization of Europe, the decline of the white race. It's going to be an amazing story as it develops and I just wish I could see it all. I'm 70 now. I'll probably live between 90 and 100 I think and I'll get to see some of it but it is an interesting, exciting thing to watch if you can detach yourself emotionally. And that's the end of that.

Unfortunately, he died before we could hear his prognostications on the ongoing demise of white people.

Adopting the Carlin philosophy basically means standing by, watching the tragicomedy unfold, and documenting the demise while trying to turn your own life to the fullest. In my case, it was abandoning a sinking ship for a more fulfilling life abroad.

In case that doesn't satisfy you, Carlin also serves up the only alternative, more pertinent now than ever before now that Trump has apparently abandoned his base as he lauded the passing of Obamacare Lite and the border wall remains in limbo with the newly passed $1 trillion Republican budget.

> If I had to say to you what is the answer I would say massive bloodshed. I really would. I don't really, honestly, deep down believe in political action. I think the system contracts and expands as it wants to. It accommodates these changes. I think the civil rights movement was an accommodation on the part of those who own the country. I think they see where their self interest lies, they see a certain amount of freedom seems good. An illusion of liberty, give these people a voting day every year so that they'll have the illusion of meaningless choice.

> Meaningless choice that we go like slaves and say: “Joe I voted!”
>
> The limits of debate in this country are established before the debate even begins. And everyone else is marginalized and made to seem to be either communist or some sort of disloyal person…a kook…there’s a word. And now it’s conspiracy… see? They’ve made that something that should not be entertained for even a minute. That powerful people might get together and have a plan… Doesn’t happen! You’re a kook! You’re a conspiracy buff! So… the only way you cure that… death, bloodshed… I don’t advocate it… but I see that it’s really the only answer.

What do you think the answer is?

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Is Democracy Dying?

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

I Made A German Man Cry Because I Criticized Globalism And Muslim Refugees

May 17, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Recently, for the first time in my life, I made a man cry. It was a baffling and odd experience that happened in the basement of a bar, with an acquaintance I was comfortable spending time with. I want to tell this story because the story itself is telling. It shows how far Germany and other parts of Western Europe have fallen—how they are happy to be invaded, raped, and pillaged. It shows how brainwashed the people truly are.

It Started Innocently Enough

I live in Eastern Europe, and generally speaking, I try to avoid any and all political talks with the locals. Many of them have grown up with far less than I have. This means that many of them automatically assume that I will preach down to them, by simple nature of being American. In addition, many of them also think they know much about the political scheme of the Western world than they do.

The combination of these two usually results in me wasting my breath. The reason for this is that when you add people's general stubborn belief about politics, and add in the fact that some feel they have had it bad their whole life (and I don't blame the ones who grew up post-Soviet Union fall), it's clear they don't want to listen to me simply because of where I come from.

And that's fine and all—I just don't talk about it. The problems start when people become insistent on talking about it. You'd be amazed how many people will simply not let you out of a conversation about Donald Trump.

Back to the story. A few months ago, I met this German fella at a language exchange. He was cool, and we swapped numbers. A week or so later him, another girl we'd met, my girlfriend, and I all met for some beers.

It Goes Political

The conversation went political at one point, and I tried to bow out of it gracefully. I already knew that he was fully plugged in to the "Angela Merkel is great, all refugees should be given a chance, we are all one world" matrix. I kept trying to change the topic, and he just wouldn't. It kept going back to Trump and how horrible he was. He wouldn't take no for an answer.

Finally, I engaged. I laid out everything, and three or so odd minutes later he was literally in tears at the bar. While that was bad enough, it was what he told me next that truly shocked me. He said:

> I am ashamed of being German. Many of my friends feel the same. Since World War II, we feel like we must accept everybody for who they are. We may never say bad things, because we did horrible things. This is why we MUST allow all refugees in, and whoever else needs help. They deserve a chance at life.

This post also goes into great depth about it:

> People here have been brainwashed with a guilt complex since World War 2 ….. guilt, guilt, guilt is written all over them. In schools the smaller children have to watch the concentration camp victim videos and are already traumatized at a young age. That is why so many hold their tongue when it comes to saying anything against foreigners. Apart from that it is against the law to say anything against certain racial groups and you can go to jail because of it. This is reality pure even though many of the Germans remain oblivious of this.

Never mind the fact that he's making barely $1,000 a month working for a German company in Eastern Europe. This does not come from a position of having too much and being generous. Never mind the fact that Germany economically, and culturally, cannot handle it's overflow of refugees (they let unskilled, young men in instead of importing hot girls). None of that mattered. In some ways, I almost admired him. He seemingly doesn't have a selfish bone in his body (unlike me).

Respect

I was raised in California, where we welcome everybody. I take heat from family all the time, because I fully support building the wall. But this young German man opened my eyes greatly.

It comes down to people feeling they must be unselfish. Am I really a bad person because I want the wall built, so that I can stop paying hundreds of thousands of dollars in taxes (speaking in terms of over my lifetime) funding education and healthcare for illegal immigrants?

Is it so bad if a German wants him or her self and their offspring to be able to live in a safe society, without the real risks that come in by taking on insane amounts of political refugees? Why is it so bad to look out for your own kin?

These were the questions that I was left scratching my head over, because they make no sense to me. Humans are, and always have been, inherently selfish. We always have our own best interests at heart, but sometimes it's subconsciously. In the case of this German fella, his selfishness comes from societal shame. Society shames him if he is anything but selfless, so selfishly he preaches for acceptance so that he can feel good—despite what he truly thinks, deep down.

I suspect this is what brought him to tears. Perhaps at his deepest core, he believes and knows he is preaching for a movement he doesn't fully believe in. Perhaps he does believe his homeland will fall at some point. Maybe he is a bit ashamed of what he has become.

Closing Thoughts

I realize that if you want to truly live in today's world, it usually means pissing a lot of people off. The confidence to do that comes from living in such a place of despair that anything is better. I've been at that point before, too. I had nothing to live for—I couldn't get girls, felt like I was going nowhere in life, and more. Now, I care far less who I offend because I have been in darker places.

Unfortunately, many German men are being raised in a dark place. They are afraid, and unable, to speak out. They fear the consequences of their action. They feel that no girls will want them if they do speak out—but hell, they already seem to prefer the refugees. It is not until these men find themselves in truly dark places that they will derive the confidence to selfishly state what they really think.

Little do these German men know that their own women would have far more respect for them if they actually did stand up for what they believed in, no matter the consequences. This recent conversation with one German guy showed real insight into how many of them currently think. Unfortunately, that thought process will not get them individually, or their country as a whole, into a safer space—no pun intended.

Want to go on meet more girls and have more sex? Check out my book, Cracking OkCupid. For more posts about life in Eastern Europe, check out EasternEuropeanTravel.com.

Read More: How British Men Are Ruining Eastern Europe

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

The Deep State Now Has The Upper Hand Against Donald Trump

May 17, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein installed George W. Bush-appointed ex-FBI Director Robert Mueller as special counsel Wednesday to oversee the FBI's investigation of Russian interference in the 2016 presidential election.

Because Attorney General Jeff Sessions previously recused himself from the investigation, Rosenstein is acting Attorney General, with all the powers that entails, for purposes of the Russia probe. As such, Rosenstein has full authority to unilaterally pass responsibility off to Mueller, who will continue the already months-long investigation without reporting through the normal FBI and DOJ chain-of-command.

Rosenstein's decision came after Washington exploded into speculation Tuesday over the New York Times report that a "Comey Memo" showed that President Donald Trump had suggested in a private conversation that now-ex-FBI Director James Comey "let it go" with regard to now-fired National Security Advisor Michael Flynn.

Rosenstein explained in the press release accompanying the appointment that "unique circumstances" led to his determination that the appointment of a special counsel was in the public interest:

> My decision is not a finding that crimes have been committed or that any prosecution is warranted. I have made no such determination. What I have determined is that based upon the unique circumstances, the public interest requires me to place this investigation under the authority of a person who exercises a degree of independence from the normal chain of command.

Mueller served a full 10 year term as head of the FBI under both Presidents Bush and Barack Obama, in the immediate aftermath of the September 11th attacks. Click here to read the entire article.

Via McClatchyDC:

Democratic strategists are racing to figure out whether it's politically wise to call for President Donald Trump's impeachment, as one bombshell revelation after another about his ties to Russia is forcing candidates for the Senate and House of Representatives to consider the question far sooner than anyone had expected.

In a significant development, party operatives say they expect Democrats to poll-test the public's views on impeachment, trying to acquire hard data about an issue that until now has not been seriously analyzed. Other strategists say that candidates and party organizations will begin conducting focus groups on the question.

These operatives acknowledge they've been caught off guard by the speed with which impeachment has become a relevant issue – and are wary of the political damage it could cause if not handled correctly.

Even 10 days ago, before Trump fired FBI Director James Comey, few party officials had even considered such a dramatic move, which has happened only twice in American history.

"I mean, Jesus, it's not even Memorial Day!" said one Democratic operative.

Only after testing the question with voters will the party have a firmer sense of how it should act. Click here to read the entire article.

Don't Miss: Trump Vs. The Deep State: The War For America's Soul

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Why Leftists Tend To Have Offensive Body Odor

May 18, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

We've analyzed leftist ideology nine ways from Sunday here, trying to figure out why they're so consistently wrong most of the time, and more importantly how we can stop them from wrecking society. However, the olfactory factor thus far hasn't been explored yet: why do so many of them smell like used cat litter? B.O. doesn't only stand for Barack Obama, after all. So what's up with leftist hygiene deficiency?

As an example, a former college roommate (who I endured for mercifully less than a semester) was a Social Justice Warrior. He sold drugs from our room, and eventually flunked out after frying his brains on the merchandise. I could write an entire article of anecdotes concerning him, but for now one thing comes to mind. He got a bad cut on his knee, probably from a skateboarding accident. Rather than clean it up, he let the blood dribble down his leg and get all crusty.

Not every leftist looks (and smells) like Pigpen, of course. Some of them are tidy and, to their credit, maintain a normal appearance. Still, there seems to be an odd correlation going on, as we'll examine. Are they allergic to water or something? Why would someone want to be habitually grungy?

Dirty hippies

My fast-paced lifestyle doesn't give me enough time to shower, man!

The hippies of old were notoriously fragrant. There's only so much that patchouli can do to cover up unwashed body funk. As Ronald Reagan put it:

> Hippies act like Tarzan, look like Jane, and smell like Cheetah.

Was their soap-free aroma simply a result of itinerant lifestyles, communes lacking plumbing, and all the rest of it? Tom Wolfe paints a fuller picture here, giving us the first clues to the matter at hand. In Hooking Up, he wrote:

> In 1968, in San Francisco, I came across a curious footnote to the hippie movement. At the Haight-Ashbury free clinic there were doctors who were treating diseases no living doctor had ever encountered before, diseases that had disappeared so long ago they had never even picked up Latin names, diseases such as the mange, the grunge, the itch, the twitch, the thrush, the scroff, the rot. And how was it that they had returned? It had to do with the fact that hundreds of young men and women had migrated to San Francisco to live communally in what I think history will record as one of the most extraordinary religious fevers of all time.
>
> The hippies sought nothing less than to sweep aside all codes and restraints of the past and start out from zero.

Part of the discarded rules included:

> …those that said you shouldn't use other people's toothbrushes or sleep on other people's mattresses without changing the sheets or, as was more likely, without using any sheets at all, or that you and five other people shouldn't drink from the same bottle of Shasta or take tokes from the same cigarette.

Since the germ theory of medicine was common knowledge by the 1960s, they should've known better than to trade infections. As an illustration of the problem, Dennis Wilson of the Beach Boys had the Manson Family camping out at his place in 1968. Their mooching cost him $100K (about $700K in 2017 dollars), and part of that included an epic doctor bill for treating their venereal diseases. Still, the worst was later to come with the AIDS epidemic.

Indeed, what leftists still don't get is that throwing out all of society's "outmoded" rules is a pretty efficient way of discovering why they existed in the first place. The most radical elements of the counterculture took this up to eleven:

> One Weatherman would later tell me that in order to rid the members of their bourgeois habits, the collectives forced couples to separate, required homosexuality, drugtaking and round-the-clock sessions of self-criticism. One time, they skinned and ate an alley cat. My contact, thin, trembling and glassyeyed, said that the houses were full of dirty dishes, rancid food and stinking toilets.

Other than that, coordinated public urination was a feature of some 1960s civil rights demonstrations. Of course, official accounts usually leave that out. Naturally, irritating the Establishment like this wasn't exactly a good way to win hearts and minds for the Cause. "Shit-ins" weren't unheard of either, and not the last time this creative form of protest has been used.

Still, I have to give credit where it's due; hippie fashion was kind of cool. I'm okay with sandals, tie dye shirts, headbands, and love beads. When I was a little brat, I found those guys a bit fascinating. They've made a comeback lately, reinvented with their original name: hipsters. Unfortunately, today's hipsters dress funny; it's their uniform. Worse, they frequently disfigure themselves with piercings and low-quality tattoos, which the 1960s Flower Children generally had the good sense not to do.

I can't hate on the Occupy Wall Street folks too much, as they did have some valid points about the state of modern globalist finance. However, they diminished the impact of their message by creating public nuisances with their months-long sit-ins. Part of that included leaving piles of trash for other people to clean up, and there's an iconic photo of one of them pooping on a police car.

Dirty big-name leftists

Quite a few of the best-known leftists also had little use for the rudiments of personal hygiene:

- Diogenes: Not a leftist in the modern sense, rather a kooky philosopher who specialized in defying social norms; if the shoe fits, wear it. He started out as a banker, kicked out of his home city for debasing the currency, though his sins are picayune compared to the Federal Reserve. To describe himself, he invented the word "cosmopolitan", though at least he didn't take cosmopolitanism to destructive extremes like Coudenhove-Kalergi. By choice, he lived like a bum, dwelling inside a large cask; basically Oscar the Grouch of ancient Greece.
- Jean Paul Marat: This revolutionary fruitcake was a demagogue who exhorted the public to go on a rampage: the French Revolution. Other than that, he had epic body odor because of a skin disease he caught hiding in the sewers. After the point of no return, baths could only alleviate the itching, which is exactly where Charlotte Corday put him out of his misery.
- Karl Marx: He lived in a filthy apartment, and carbuncles covered his body. He could afford booze, but apparently not a bar of soap, or for that matter food for his family.
- Che Guevara: This murderer of hundreds (at least) avoided bathing and washed his shirt once a week. Since he had a medical degree, he should've known better. He didn't mind that his friends called him Chancho (pig).
- Fidel Castro: Like his pal Saint Che, Uncle Fidel didn't care for baths or fresh clothes, earning him the name Bola de Churre (grease ball). Surely the smelly cigars didn't help either.
- Mao Zedong: Chairman Mao didn't bathe, though of course killing tens of millions through malice and incompetence was a smidge worse. He didn't brush his teeth either, causing them to turn green and leak pus from the gums. He suffered from fleas and lice, which would make any normal person get hip to cleanliness. Despite the protestations of his doctor, he didn't get his venereal diseases treated. Still, he managed to get laid like a rock star, truly a testament to the power of power and fame. Other than that, he crapped in the garden.
- Jean-Paul Sartre: This drip of a philosopher considered hygiene and grooming a waste of time. Simone de Beauvoir, in a polyamorous relationship with him, was notoriously stinky too.
- Many of today's celebrities could stand a little more acquaintance with soap and water.

Needless to say, if you were on a long flight, you wouldn't want to be sitting next to anyone like these characters. Did they think they were too important to be bothered with things like bathing? Were they taking the phrase "unwashed masses" a bit too literally?

I can't think of any comparable rightists notable for being grungy. I just don't understand. If I'm not freshly showered and in clean clothes, I feel impure and then clean myself up.

Pourquoi vivent-ils comme ça?

I’m hard pressed to find an answer to the great riddle of leftist squalor. Rebellion for its own sake seems to be a contributing factor. Still, likely the best explanation is the same as why they make themselves ugly by choice, sometimes with horrifying results. Staying neat and maintaining your appearance isn’t just good for your love life; let it be an act of defiance too.

Read More: Western Society Has Become Completely Inverted

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Is Lauren Southern A Brave Culture Warrior Or Merely Profiting Off Male Thirst?

May 18, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Female pundits, what my colleague Michael Sebastian describe as "pundithots," have appeared recently in alternative media. By showcasing attractive women, men in charge of alternative news companies applied basic corporate logic: more cleavage = more viewers = more money. Examples of this strategy include Tomi Lahren and Faith Goldy, though none have gotten as much coverage in our neck of the woods as Lauren Southern.

Lauren and the migrant boat in Sicily

Before the event on the Sicilian Coast.

Southern is a live action reporter and was present during numerous feminist rallies and events such as the "Battle of Berkeley" and the Paris' Mayday antifa protests. Her last video created a bit of a racket as she joined Génération Identitaire in their trip to Sicily where NGOs illegally bring in thousands of African migrants by boat.

Génération Identitaire used a smaller boat to approach one of those freighters and attempted to block their way in the port, lighting flares to be seen in the night.

The mainstream media and their allies were once more dishonest and attacked Southern by saying that because they used a flare at night, they tried to torch the boat (with its keel made of metal) and the "children" inside, when we all know that those migrants are almost entirely composed of military-age Muslim men.

Southern and members of G.I. were arrested by the Italian coast guards and quickly released. The migrant freighter still reached the port. My question is this: what was the goal of Lauren Southern apart from publicity?

The reason for her earlier success

Yes, that reason.

With her normal frame (not obese) and feminine body and face (would give her a high 7 with makeup), the Alt Right base was an untapped reservoir of male attention and profit for females like her. When you see what the average American woman looks like today, you can see why some betas would elevate Southern to the status of living goddess.

She started working for Ezra Levant's The Rebel about two years ago. With the recruitment of Faith Goldy and Lauren Southern, Ezra Levant was aiming at bringing around more viewers from the general public in the alternative media spectrum.

Lauren left in March 2017 to go independent. She wanted her reporting to remain "unfiltered" (disagreement with her boss on how to report on certain questions and topics?), and continue to do what "she loves to do for her audience".

She might also have noticed that showing a bit more flesh and receiving direct financial contribution through Patreon or Paypal by men on the Internet is more lucrative than working longer hours for the middle man Rebel Media.

[image]

Where the rubber hits the road

She has been able to garner so much male attention through her constant presence online, particularly on Twitter and on Instagram, gathering hundreds of thousands of male followers. She never misses an occasion to show herself in suggestive poses and revealing clothing.

She has been fairly candid about her enjoyment of the thirst and the attention her followers gave her.

> If there was a moment in the 2016 U.S. election that epitomized this newfound hate for the young on the right, it was Republican consultant Rick Wilson's infamous… declaration that Trump supporters were "childless, single losers who masturbate to anime." Guilty as charged. Well, except I don't masturbate to anime characters. I dress up like them *and guys masturbate to me. (source)

But she stopped being tender with some of her viewers when the harder Alt Right saw past the attention-seeking and starting asking questions, especially on themes that revolved around race realism, white genocide, and Jews.

Once she saw the niche, she applied her female logic to it and marketed herself by surfing on her target audience's specific references: cosplay pictures in tight clothing, anime enthusiasm, running in wheat fields, Deus Vult, Pepe, etc. She saw an opportunity to make money from the momentum and seized it.

[image]

While she has some fair arguments and has been honest about her own objectification, she is not as receptive as before when people point out that particular issue.

On ne peut pas tout avoir

[image]

I cannot blame her for making money out of male attention if she is honest about it. She has shown so far that she is on our side against the cultural decline—there is no question about that matter. But it must be seared in everyone's mind that this struggle is a man's world and change will be brought by men.

No matter how honest her heart and her intentions, Lauren is a woman and will therefore act as such. They are brought on board or invite themselves through their physical appeal and stay if there is a constant supply of attention. Adding my own two cents, I would encourage movements like Génération Identitaire to do a bit less Lauren Southern and more openings of identitarian fitness and boxing clubs like this awesome one in Lyon:

Read More: Stop Worshipping Women On The Internet

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Why The Globalist Establishment Is Doomed To Fail

May 18, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

It's easy to get despondent over the current political situation. The progressive, globalist elites appear to be firmly entrenched in their positions of power. Even the election of Trump hasn't moved the needle very much. But the appearance of being in control is a ruse. The end of the globalist neoliberal order and the elites is now inevitable.

The elite want to appear invincible

The great Chinese military strategist, Sun Tzu, tells us that "All warfare is based on deception." One such deception is for an army to give the appearance of great strength even if its real strength is much less. A castle might not be sufficiently manned to mount a good defense, but invaders will think twice about attacking if the fortress itself looks impregnable.

The elite use a similar tactic. They only comprise about 1% of the population so they are aware that they must keep the 99% placated if they are to maintain their lock on wealth and power. They do this in several ways: welfare keeps the lower class satisfied, Hollywood and sports distract the middle class from reality, and the managerial state keeps the brightest vying for the highest paying jobs. From the moment we enter kindergarten until we graduate from college, we are taught that the neoliberal system is the best system for making people happy and prosperous and that all other systems would be steps backwards.

The system looks strong… but it's not.

The reason the elite are trying so hard to keep you from asking questions is because the neoliberal system is cracking. The whole selling point of the neoliberal system is that it was supposed to create wealth: There would be more to go around for everyone. But the actual results are much different from what we were sold. Only last week, the Washington Post ran the results of study that determined that while the elite are getting wealthier, the middle class is not:

> America is getting richer every year. The American worker is not.
>
> Far from it: On average, workers born in 1942 earned as much or more over their careers than workers born in any year since, according to new research — and workers on the job today shouldn't expect to catch up with their predecessors in their remaining years of employment.
>
> Stagnant or falling earnings have put a squeeze on working- and middle-class households. The trend has also widened the gap between the rich and everyone else as, overall, the economy has continued to grow overall but the bulk of those gains have ended up in the pockets of the affluent.

It's not just middle-class Americans who are suffering under the neoliberal order—a brilliant article published in the City Journal describes how globalization has affected France:

> A process [called] métropolisation has cut French society in two. In 16 dynamic > urban areas (Paris, Lyon, Marseille, Aix-en-Provence, Toulouse, Lille, Bordeaux, Nice, Nantes, Strasbourg, Grenoble, Rennes, Rouen, Toulon, Douai-Lens, and Montpellier), the world's resources have proved a profitable complement to those found in France. These urban areas are home to all the country's educational and financial institutions, as well as almost all its corporations and the many well-paying jobs that go with them… Cheap labor, tariff-free consumer goods, and new markets of billions of people have made globalization a windfall for such prosperous places. But globalization has had no such galvanizing effect on the rest of France. Cities that were lively for hundreds of years—Tarbes, Agen, Albi, Béziers—are now… "desertified," haunted by the empty storefronts and blighted downtowns that Rust Belt Americans know well.

But globalization is doing more than just enriching certain cities while impoverishing others. It is also forcing the middle class to leave the cities that their ancestors built:

> [There is no place] in France's new economy for working people as we've traditionally understood them. Paris offers the most striking case. As it has prospered, the City of Light has stratified, resembling, in this regard, London or American cities such as New York and San Francisco. It's a place for millionaires, immigrants, tourists, and the young, with no room for the median Frenchman. Paris now drives out the people once thought of as synonymous with the city.

All those wealthy people need services but those service jobs don't go to native French workers, rather France imports a third world underclass to the necessary work. These workers are kept in public housing at taxpayer expense:

> Public housing is now used primarily for billeting not native French workers, as once was the case, but immigrants and their descendants… In the rough northern suburb of Aubervilliers, for instance, three-quarters of the young people are of immigrant background. Again, Paris's future seems visible in contemporary London. Between 2001 and 2011, the population of white Londoners fell by 600,000, even as the city grew by 1 million people: from 58 percent white British at the turn of the century, London is currently 45 percent white.

If it were only a matter of a small number of economic winners and a large number of economic losers, that alone could be enough to spark a revolution. But globalization has also created diversity at levels never seen in history apart from military invasions, and that is creating its own problems. The new immigrants feel more solidarity with members of their home country rather than their new country. Every ethnic group is permitted to desire the good of its own tribe, except for native Europeans or Americans. The animosity between ethnic groups simmers just below the surface wherever the native population comes into contact with the new immigrants. This can be seen in French public housing:

> [Public housing] is getting fought over tribally. An ethnic Frenchman moving into a heavily North African housing project finds himself threatening a piece of > property that members of “the community” think of as theirs. Guilluy speaks of a “battle of the eyes” fought in the lobbies of apartment buildings across France every day, in which one person or the other—the ethnic Frenchman or the immigrant’s son—will drop his gaze to the floor first.

The Elites are ignoring the evidence

There have been numerous signs that the natives of Europe and the US are getting fed up with globalization. In the UK, the Brexit vote caught all the prognosticators off guard. Trump’s victory in the US and Le Pen’s near victory in France tell us that the native populations of these countries are very unhappy. You don’t need to be a divinely inspired prophet to see that this is a power keg.

Yet despite these clear signals, most of the elites are fully invested in opposing even minor democratic reforms. Emmanuel Macron, the winner of the French presidential election, dismissed the rise of the French nationalists by saying, “There is no such thing as French culture. There is culture in France and it is diverse.” British leaders are dragging their feet at implementing Brexit. And in the US, the “conservative” Republican-controlled Congress managed to fund Planned Parenthood abortions but not the border wall with Mexico.

To be sure, there are some of the wealthier elite who do realize how precarious their situation is and are taking steps to protect themselves. Moguls like Larry Ellison, Peter Thiel, and Steve Huffman are buying islands or vast compounds in New Zealand that they can escape to in the event of a revolution.

Conclusion

Nothing lasts forever. The Egyptian, Greek, and Roman civilizations came to an end. The current neoliberal order is no exception. It has become unsustainable so while we can’t be sure when the dismantling of the globalist order will begin, we can be sure that its days are numbered.

Read More: 12 Methods America Is Using To Turn France Into A Globalist Nightmare

---

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

A Motorcycle Will Help You Attract More Women

May 18, 2017 | by Liam O'Connor | Link | Original Link

Despite my other failed game endeavors, I have some techniques that have proven themselves to be perennial. Throughout time, men have acquired accessories to woo and seduce women. Anything that helps a man reach poosy paradise is considered a good buy (barring chloroform). Whether it be an article of clothing, jewelry, or even a dog, these things take on a whole new level of value to them. Sometimes, things don't appear like they will help you with girls, but do. Other times, all you can think about is how this potential possession could help you. If you are looking for a new angle to take your game to the next level, fear not for I have the answer: a motorcycle.

Riding a bike is incredibly fun in itself. Every man who has two wheels thoroughly enjoys it and feels a part of a larger community of riders who love the open air and freedom. A road that evokes hatred from someone who commutes there daily suddenly becomes a fulfilling journey when the helmet is on and the throttle is being twisted.

But there are other perks to riding that deserve special attention: The effect it has on women.

Anyone can call this "Biker Game," but calling it that does it the disservice of removing it as an ingrained part of your life which you carry with you forever. If you take it to 11 and tattoo your whole body, run drugs and guns, and buy yourself a clubhouse, then you may call it Biker Game. For me, and the majority of people who own a bike, that is not necessary.

If you don't already own a motorcycle, then you need to do some searching. Mine is a

Harley with 1200CC's. Anything above 600CC's will do, because the bike needs enough power to be able to do its magic. Instead of being overwhelmed with the wide selection of variants, stick to one brand and go from there.

For the sake of comfort for you and your passenger, as well as masculine appeal, a cruiser or touring bike is ideal with their large displacement V-twin engines. Stay away from the cuck-scooters like sport bikes and mopeds. Once you have selected which bike you like, taken the necessary riding courses and received your license, you are ready to break the levee of Snatchtown.

The Vibes

"I just looove someone who rides"

A biker cultivates an air of mystery. What comes immediately to mind when you think of "biker" is an aloof free-spirited man who traverses the country. He rides because he wants to, and likes to be in control over his machine. Without the motorcycle, the biker loses his identity, and with it—his allure.

Aside from the ultra delusional feminist who lives in her own bubble, bikers are thought of as being entirely male. That is a good thing, because an activity that is exclusive to men will carry with it the "penis monopoly" effect, where the activity/hobby by default oozes testosterone. The same effect can be seen with American football, Rock n' Roll, and working construction. Riding a motorcycle is as masculine as fighting a bear shirtless.

It doesn't stop there. What you wear when riding is just as important as having the bike itself. Leather jackets and denim pants work in tandem to create an aura of manliness that surrounds you both on and off the bike. Leather is mainly worn by riders for its protective properties, but the added aesthetic appeal is certainly a bonus. Not only that, but the smell of leather only further adds to your masculine presence.

Sometimes when upping the level of her attraction for you, all that's needed is you smoothly riding up to her place, dismounting, taking your helmet off and placing it under your arm, walking up to her slowly, pulling her close with one arm while letting her get a whiff of you, and saying in a low voice "lets go for a ride." That's it. Tingle city.

Carry yourself as if you are imposing your will on the world around you. The earth doesn't rotate under your bike by itself, your bike's back wheel is what makes it spin.

Physical Stimulation

She's definitely warmed up

What if I told you that the motorcycle itself can build attraction in your girl without you saying anything? Does it game her as you sleep? Does it tell her how cool of a guy you are when you're not around? No, it massages her nether regions.

Think of the motorcycle as a means of foreplay. Even if she is in no sexual mood, sex will be on her mind after hopping on the back with you taking the helm. Girls love the vibration the bike causes to their clitoris and all the while this is happening, a pavlovian association in her mind is connecting you with her vibrating vagina—essentially making her biology betray her by whispering in her ear and saying, "feels good doesn't it? You should totally breed with this guy!"

This is the reason I was suggesting before that your motorcycle be at least 600CC's. 600 is good, but more power equals more arousal.

Logistics

As with any foray into the bedding of girls, having bad logistics can be a serious cockblock if not managed carefully. Picking up a girl in public and taking her for a ride is thrilling, but going from bike-ride to cock-ride can leave some questions.

Here's an example: My routine when employing biker game was to go into the approach with the goal of setting up a riding date where you pick her up and take her somewhere, whether it be an ice cream stand, or whatever. I used this as the date to increase attraction, while riding on the bike biologically made her frothing to begin with in order to always keeps her in the mood. Then, I offer to take her back to my hot tub with a few drinks, and segue into the bedroom. Rinse, repeat.

At the bare minimum, you should be using the bike's power to guarantee you sex on the second date. Both dates should include riding, with the first always ending in a kiss attempt. If you cannot go for the bang by bringing her back to your house, you should aim to do it at her place. All roads must lead to sex, or her riding privileges end.

Conclusion

Do not doubt the poon-harpooning power of the humble motorcycle. Lifting weights, learning a martial art, making money, and improving your style all give you a better hand to play in seduction. While all these are imperative for any man who reads any of these types of sites, something as simple as getting on two wheels can be easily overlooked in your arsenal.

Read More: 3 Reasons Why You should Ride A Motorcycle

How Our Current Society Functions Like A Panopticon Prison

May 19, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Have you ever wondered how much you control yourself due to the risk that others might monitor you? That you almost feel like a ”free prisoner” in the sense that you are not physically incapacitated but in practice mentally deprived of some of your basic freedoms, such as the First Amendment (or equivalent constitutions in Europe), and that some things that you might say or write would have dire consequences for your career and private life?

In any case, welcome to the ”mental prison” that is the panopticon version of 2017. I will guide you through some of its historical tenets and current features.

Panopticon as concrete way to monitor people

The panopticon model was designed by the British utilitarian philosopher Jeremy Bentham in the late 18th century. The construction implies that all (pan) prison inmates can be watched (opticon) by a single officer.

As the French left-leaning scholar Michel Foucault stresses in one chapter of his book Discipline and Punish (1975), the process was linked to economic and material effectiveness. It is less expensive if a single person almost simultaneously can monitor all inmates instead of having multiple guards on duty.

Thus the model was indeed a very concrete prison building with concrete dimensions of surveillance, but few prisons have actually been constructed in this particular way. It has rather been the case that a significant share of modern prisons, as well as mental institutions, have been influenced by the pantopicon model to some extent, but most have been built without a circular center in a horizontal and “decentralized” fashion with symmetrical corridors where inmates dwell.

But some have indeed more or less copied Bentham’s outlines and do still remain (whereas others have been demolished). Koepelgevangenis [cupola prison] at Arnhem, the Netherlands, was constructed in 1886. An American example is Stateville Penitentiary, near Joliet, Illinois, built between 1916-24.

Panopticon as a symbol for real monitoring and self-control

After the birth of more complex monitor systems, such as surveillance cameras, the physical dimension of the panopticon has become more obsolete. Instead we can talk about a general trend of ”panopticism” in the modern Western society. This has happened in parallel with the birth of so-called biopolitics, the will to control a population’s way of thinking and acting to a greater extent than in earlier times. This is not because human nature has changed but due to that modernity comes with improved technology, in conjunction with faster information processing and more rapid human migration.

The modern man is indeed more free in some regards. He can travel to another country and start a new business and even become a citizen overseas. With more disposable income and increased standards of living he has a lot of real agency.

However, he is also really or potentially controlled by others, as well as himself, to a greater extent. Modern ideologies like Fascism and Communism, which severely curtailed individual freedoms (at least in times of war), have vanished, whereas the proponents of liberalism, neoconservatism and cultural Marxism have continued to control people by means of digital surveillance and subtle self-controlling mechanisms in the late-modern era.

Therefore one may say that control is manifested in three major ways: state surveillance (police and military), establishment power, and self-control by the individual citizen himself.

If you are a real threat, then the state will intervene (and that is often a good thing). As the German professor of law, Carl Schmitt, describes in his work Politische Theologie (1922), and the Italian philosopher Giorgio Agamben in his book State of Exception (2005), a truly sovereign state dictates the exception from common law in times of political crisis. The term ”legal civil war” encompasses this particular dimension of law and politics.

After the USA Patriot Act was implemented October 26, 2001, any general attorney has the lawful right to ”take into custody” anyone who appears to endanger the security of the United States.

If you are not a real existential threat, and thus a real enemy according to Carl Schmitt's political distinction and terminology, but has said or written something that goes against the current ideology, then media, social media or their helpers among the populace will step in do the work.

Thus the "panopticon" of today is not necessarily a centralized unit but rather a fragmentary way of supervision (yet more or less linked to the establishment), which uses digital platforms in order to discipline and punish their political opponents.

As ROK has covered in many articles, verbal dissent can result in what I refer to as quasi-ostracism, meaning that people are deprived of their livelihoods, at least in medium to high-status occupations such as law, journalism, academia and teaching, for being "racists," "sexists" or even anti-globalists. Even smaller private businesses can take a hit after the Pavlov's watchdogs have responded to their masters rhetorical conditioned learning.

It is like a soft totalitarian ideology. Instead of sending them to Gulags or expelling citizens (i.e. real ostracism), the fear of being deprived of income and/or social status are the main incentives to keep oneself in check.

For that reason the wise man knows not to say everything he has on his mind in “public” (the distinction between public and private are indeed blurry in current times). Self-control is generally a good thing, but when it becomes a tool for serving an ideology that one does not necessarily agree with then it serves a bad end and is problematic in itself and in blatant opposition to the First Amendment. It is a question of evaluating the consequences but regardless of how you choose to act, you are still a “free prisoner” within the global, or at least national panopticon.

Conclusion

Surveillance and self-control can be good things in many ways, and I do not encourage anyone to say, write or do something stupid just to make a point, but these processes have taken a stronghold over a significant part of the West.

Read More: Beware Of The Coming Surveillance State

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

How To Dress Stylishly In Hot Weather

May 21, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Summer is coming upon us, which means those who are students will be let out of school, those who work will likely be able to use their vacation time, women will wear progressively skimpier clothing, and all in all there will be barbecues and pool parties and all sorts of social endeavors you can participate in.

And when you are interacting with people, you of course must dress for success. And here in lies the confusion: many of the clothes that we associate with fashion are comparatively bulky and useless for the heat of the summer. While that is the case, don't think that your fashion choices for the summer are limited to t-shirts, shorts, and flip-flops. You can dress cool, comfortable, and rakishly in the hottest of weather, to impress men and women alike.

The Standbys

The general rules of fashion that I discussed previously will apply as always. You've got to have the clothes fit well, complement each other in fabric make, pattern and colors, and match the occasion that you're going to. Those rules apply whether it's the hottest summer or the coldest winter, a night of jovial debauchery or the most somber of funerals. I will assume that you have already incorporated some of those into your wardrobe choices.

With that out of the way, let's discuss the specifics of how you can look your best in the summer heat.

Fabrics

As you might expect, the first priority in dressing for the heat is to somehow nullify the weather's effects on you…and as luck would have it there are several types of light, breathable fabrics you can wear!

Cotton is of course the lightweight fabric you are most likely familiar with, and most of your summer wear will be some sort of cotton weave, whether they be plain cotton (typically in the case of shirts) or some sort of heat-wicking cotton weave such as Seersucker (more commonly found in odd jackets and trousers).

Linen, made of flax, is the most formal summer fabric, being typically seen in white suits and odd trousers/jackets of similar light colors. Yours truly has been known to rock a white linen suit on occasion

A somewhat more unusual summer fabric is silk—more specifically, certain types of silk that are woven to be thin.

With all of these, bear in mind that they wrinkle and stain quite easily, so caution is the key.

Colors

The season surrounds you with bright ambient colors, and those same colors also dissipate the heat and humidity surrounding you. It is here in the summer, when concerns are light and fun is more of a prerogative than usual, that you can experiment with bolder colors and patterns. Try some pastels—light blue shirts, or gold, or patterns such as the aforementioned seersucker. As always be sure not to completely match all of your colors.

Jackets

If you're going to be out "painting the town red", you've got to dress like it. As usual, the sports coat is the interchangeable key (interchangeable meaning pieces that go with many other pieces, I could do a whole article just on interchangeability, watch for that in the future). Summer jackets are often unlined to reduce layers and thus reduce heat. However, the lack of a lining also means they are less formal than a lined jacket, and are best worn in semi-casual or business casual settings.

Another alternative are half lined jackets, which are just where they remove multiple layers of lining but leave one. These must be tailored very well, as a lack of lining means weird edges can be exposed. Due to their uniform navy blue color, I would avoid the blazer—if you need more formality, just get a white suit.

For the stickler, you can change your buttons as well. Light buttons such as horn or mother of pearl are fitting for the season.

Shirts

If you must be formal, a white cotton dress shirt will keep you relatively cool. However, if possible I would recommend a nice polo shirt or button down work-shirt (both of which are made of light, breathable cotton). These are formal enough for social functions, while not being so stiff that you can't get physical should you need to.

Trousers

Seeing as you're not giving off so much heat from your lower extremities, you can be a little more creative here. Black pants are a great contrast to the light colors of your jacket, or you can go with khakis/chinos or linens. Just make sure they don't clash with your torso's accouterments, and you'll be fine.

Shoes

As usual, the shoes depend on what you are wearing elsewhere. Since you'll likely be wearing light fabrics, try saddle shoes, boat shoes, or some other sort of brown leather casual shoe.

And lastly, dress for the occasion—if the occasion calls for swim trunks and nothing else, by all means go for that.

Read More: If You Dress Like An Attention Whore At Work, Expect To Be Treated Like One

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

6 Best Quotes From The Novel “Siddhartha” By Hermann Hesse

May 21, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Siddhartha is one of the first novels that introduced Buddhism to Western audiences. Written in 1922 by Hermann Hesse, it is a fast read about a man who seeks enlightenment through alternating paths of asceticism and hedonism.

Man imitates, but does not understand

> A thousand disciples hear his teachings every day, and follow his regulations every hour, but they are all falling leaves; they do not possess the doctrine and the law within themselves.

Your current situation is transitory

> Where is Siddhartha the Brahman? Where is Siddhartha the samana [ascetic]? Where is Siddhartha the rich man? Transitory things change swiftly, Govinda, as you know.

Wisdom cannot be learned, only experienced

> Wisdom cannot be imparted. Wisdom that a wise man attempts to impart always sounds like foolishness.

You are but a small part of the whole

> I learned from my body and my soul that I was in great need of sin; I needed sensual pleasures, the ambition for possessions, vanity, and I needed the most humiliating despair in order to learn how to give up my resistance, in order to learn how to love the world, in order to cease comparing it with some world of my wishes or my imagination, with some type of perfection that I had concocted, but to leave it the way it is, to love it, and to be a part of it gladly.

Life is meant to be lived

> Words do no good to the secret meaning; everything always immediately becomes a little different when you express it, a little falsified, a little foolish.

A man must enjoy his own treasure

> I am also perfectly contented that one person's treasure of wisdom always sounds like foolishness to someone else.

Siddhartha was a pleasant book that put many Buddhist practices into story form. I recommend it if you're interested in Eastern philosophy.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: "Siddhartha" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How To Reduce Drama In Your Long-Term Relationships

May 21, 2017 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

Ah, a long-term relationship (LTR), where you have a women by your side who loves you (at least in the way women are capable of). The red pill teaches us that even if one locks down that unicorn or special snowflake, it is not the end of the game. One thing that a LTR brings with it is DRAMA. From my own experience of being in LTRs, while having red pill knowledge and mindset, I wish to share some of my tactics to handle and contain drama.

Lesson 1: Drama is inevitable

As the great CH noted:

> …it's only women who feel happier when drama reassures them that they are loved. Men do not need drama to feel loved.

So first thing is to know that there will be drama. Now that we know that there will be drama, it is time to see how we can reduce it. There is no nullifying it. Accept the inevitable.

Lesson 2: Good sex

I call this one "Preventive Medicine". Maybe obvious, but still a good point to consider. Good sex reduces the drama, but what does good sex really mean? It's when she releases emotions.

Make her feel extreme happiness, sadness or whatever. I highly recommend a good cry. A women who drains herself emotionally will not give you drama, as she still “recovers” from the release of her emotions. Orgasm is a bonus, but in order to reduce drama you need to make her cry or have any sort of emotional release. My method includes a combination of verbally encouraging her to let her emotions out, and spanking her.

Drama reduction technique that you didn’t consider

After the combination of pain, followed by emotional release, she needs a few days (48 hours at least) to come back to her “normal” state (i.e., regular chance of drama).

Lesson 3: Initiate drama

I call this one “Fighting fire with fire”. Chicks crave drama? Let’s give her some, on your own terms. Although it seems counterproductive, it is very efficient. My method is to choose a topic, which is meaningful to me, and initiate drama by starting a “semi-fight”. My preconditions are:

1. Don’t start a fight on a big event that I’m invested in on in the very near future (e.g., going to a show which I was waiting for).
2. I must be feeling well (well rested, relaxed and replete).
3. There has been no drama for a while.

If those are met, and a trigger is pulled, I initiate drama. I may get tactically angry, call her on her behavior and even bring up patterns of her actions from the past. Yes, I flip the script. By doing this, you give her the drama she was craving, but on your own terms. Bonus is make up sex and re-establishing your hand.

Lesson 4: Be clam

I call this “Fighting fire with water”. The purpose of drama for girls is to make you lose control, or test your alphaness. So let’s stay calm, and let the storm pass. You still need to handle it, but it must be done from a place of confidence. What is the worst thing that could happen? She’ll leave? So what?

Being calm does not mean being indifferent. She may have a point to her drama. In this case you will need to address it. Just say “my bad” and fix it (if possible). But if it is not your fault, don’t reward the behavior. Tell her that there are better way to discuss it and do one of the following:

1. Walk away or go ghost
2. Look her in the eyes and don’t flinch
3. Explain, using a combination of male and female logic (referring to her emotions) that it is uncalled for.

Whatever you do, don’t get caught in her emotional turmoil. If you feel that you are losing it, either get out or tell her “You have too much negative emotions, I can’t be here right now”. Even in the middle of a tantrum, those words hit hard and will make her start thinking about her “negative emotions”.

Lesson 5: Analyze

I call this “Mind over emotions”. You are a man. You have superior analytical powers. It is time to use them. The way to use them is to listen: is it a repeating pattern? What is she actually talking about? What was the drama trigger?

You acknowledge the problem and repeat it in your words. This shows her you “are making an effort”. Once you pass that, you start to apply your logic and guide her out. You always acknowledge her emotions, but maintain your frame about the problem, its origins and the solutions. By maintain frame, you start to pull her in to your frame. This is the place she wants to be, under your masculine guidance.

By analyzing it, with her, you move from the path of emotions to the path of logic. Also, by shifting the focus to logic, she cannot “dispute” your claims. I’ve been called “a swindle” or “a con man” for that. Good. This is exactly what you want to be.

Lesson 6: Make her part of the solution

I know that I’m tasked with leading the LTR, but that doesn’t mean that she doesn’t have to do something. Some women are genuinely surprised when I tell them I want them to work for the relationship. Women just expect to show up. So by using the equality BS you can move them to do some actual work, in your favor.

This is done by pointing out her pattern and asking her why does she thinks it happens, and what can SHE DO ABOUT IT. This is a topic that has been covered before. Once you pass that initial: “What do you mean I have to do something? I’m here” and maintain your frame, she’ll find out the joy of doing things for her men (other than sexual things). Now that she is doing things for you, and focusing on that, the drama tends to wither down. This is one of the trickier parts. You will be faced with massive indignation and probably resentment at first. You must have “alpha credit” to pull this off.

Lesson 7: Be proactive

Drama is sometimes a sign of boredom. Even though your life is interesting enough, hers might not be. And who is that lightning rod that all emotions are turned to? YOU. In that case one should make some countermeasures in advance.

This is not about initiating drama, but about making the relationship interesting. If you have a schedule with your girlfriend, change it at least once a month (or more). You always hang out at the same places and do the same things? Don't. Make a pool of hangout options and steer her towards trying new things. An 90-10 ratio is usually optimal—90% of the time you do the "routine" LTR activities, and in 10% of the time you "experiment". Ratios may vary from girl to girl. Here are a few examples:

- If you usually sleep at her place, once a month sleep at your place.
- If you go to bars, go to a coffee shop.
- If you hang out with the same friends, try meeting new people.

Some activities will turn out to be lame or worse. Frame it as an experience that failed and next time try other activities. For example, with one of my current LTRs, I once slept at her place. Big mistake. The bed was uncomfortable and this affected me the following day. Never again. But the girl was happy that we did something "new" and the drama was down for almost a month.

Conclusions

Drama is one of the downsides of a LTR. It is a sign that one needs to manage his woman in a more masculine way. From my experience, and I believe that the manosphere shares that view, drama is inevitable but can be reduced. I don't like drama as much as the next guy, but I hope those lessons may be helpful. Be proactive, fight fire with fire and don't be afraid to stand your ground.

Read Next: Don't Stop Running Game In Long-Term Relationships

How To Gain Serious Muscle Mass As A Vegetarian Without Going To The Gym

May 22, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Depending on your situation, going to the gym may not be feasible for time or financial reasons. That's no excuse however, for not getting fit. Since ancient times, men have trained without weights outside in nature and were in much better shape than today's keyboard pusher.

Pushups, squats, and pull ups are the powerful trio that have been historically used for overall muscular development. In many cases, this type of training is superior to weights, because most lift improperly, and the strength gained from calisthenics carries over to weights anyway. This challenge is multiplied by not eating any meat products.

How to gain fast

Training should be quick and focused. Experienced lifters are in and out of gyms without indulging in distractions. There are three rules to follow for results if you want big gains as a vegetarian body builder…

Intense brief training. Two sets at most should be performed for high reps, ideally ten or more. You'll want to use a variation you can do at least 15-20 times. Rest five minutes or longer in between sets. You'll also reduce training frequency for recovery.

Nutritious food. You should be more meticulous about eating high-quality food products, since you can't just eat a big steak and call it a day. I'll explain more on this below.

Rest. Many neglect adequate quality sleep. You need 8-10 hours of sleep with odd naps here and there. Go to bed early, it'll work like steroids. Reduce cardio to just 10-30 second sprints 1-2x a week. Rest for two days minimum.

One of the hardest tasks professional coaches have when dealing with top athletes is preventing them from doing too much. We’re not mutant freaks, we’re human beings. It doesn’t take much to exhaust the muscles for growth.

Physiques built without weights

Charles Atlas became the most perfectly developed man without weights and even today, Indian wrestlers in the jungles of India still train mostly with yoga and calisthenics. You can quickly build a foundation with floor exercises alone.

Gymnasts are in wonderful shape, and their physiques look like Greek statues. So there’s no shame in training exclusively with calisthenics.

Achieving massive gains while vegetarian

Yes, I’m vegetarian, but I don’t necessarily advocate it to others. Many mistakenly believe getting off meat somehow makes you more healthy and spiritual, but I don’t concur to this false sense of superiority.

For those of you who want to switch or at least want to have more options other than meat as a protein source, you can consume the following:

Nuts – almonds, cashews, and walnuts increase free testosterone and supply healthy fat. They’re also good for the brain.

Diary – milk, cheese, cottage cheese, and yogurt. And for all those vegan nuts who think it is wrong, one of the first things I learned in genetics class was that all lactating mammalian species have the biological instinct to nurture the young of even different mammalian species.

Beans – chickpeas, kidney beans, black beans, and chana are all packed with protein and combine well with rice.

Seeds – flax, chia, and sesame are great and can be mixed with nuts.

Peas – contains protein and combines well with rice or noodles.

Other important foods like spinach, kale, and quinoa, are equally important as they supply iron, vitamins, and minerals. Combining foods such as rice/quinoa with beans, nuts and seeds, and topping cheese on dishes are very effective ways to easily get enough protein.

Every morning, India's vegetarian wrestlers work hard by performing various calisthenics and following strict principles. While the rest of the world binges on trash TV, alcohol, and drugs, these guys are getting stronger and maintain spiritual practice.

Personally, I favor calisthenics, because it's faster and can be done anywhere. I get it done in the time it takes me to travel to the gym, and I get better results. After hitting the weights again, the barbell flew off the floor and I felt I wasn't even getting a workout from my old poundage. That's the effectiveness of body weight training.

Why I don't go to gyms

For starters…

- Increasingly feminized – a body builder was thrown out of a gym for grunting while benching 500lbs.
- For insecure people – girls pull their shorts butt high for attention, and guys scramble to look buff in front of them, sometimes begging on their knees for companionship.

- Hijacked by big business – Planet Fitness has grown big and fast and design their gyms for Average Americans. Squat racks have been taken out in favor of less intimidating and friendlier looking machines. How are you supposed to get strong when free weights are hard to come by?
- Swarmed by stupid people – if you're lucky enough to find a squat rack, get ready for guys hogging it to do bicep curls.

This is not to say all gyms are bad, especially the old school ones. If you can get the same, if not better, results with calisthenics without having to leave your house, why bother with a gym? You save time, money, and headache.

Where did all the barbells go?

Whenever I enter a gym, I'm always displeased with lack of free weights/barbells. Everything is all machines, cables, and exercise bikes. I can't train seriously next to treadmills or step climbers.

Most guys are there desperately trying to show off, struggling to heave heavy weights to impress babes while they themselves are there to boost their ego. That combined with the pop music, the smell, the dirty sweat-infested equipment, the giant fans blowing dust in your face because people can't take the heat, the air conditioning, and the big screen TVs, all make it not for me. I simply can't take it.

That’s what I’m talking about, Vasily Alexeev cleaning and jerking in water, that’s real training!

Visible results that impress

While I was in Florida some years ago, I built up to a solid 180lbs using nothing but pushups, squats, and door pull-ups (wouldn’t advise unless yours is study). A guy I knew there at the time referred to me as “Mr. Muscle”. I didn’t have much to eat either, a diet consisting of peanut butter banana, rice with beans, and the occasional pizza.

Later, I saw a long lost acquaintance in Hawaii. He commented on my physique and asked if I had been lifting weights even though I hadn’t touched a single one. So you see, anyone can build muscle mass without going to gym on a vegetarian diet as it’s been done in the past.

Over the years, I’ve refined techniques ave the best results and found that two sets of high reps does the trick, the first being a little over 50% of your max and the second less challenging set to avoid failure. Rest two days, and then add a rep on your sets next training day and continue progressing. It starts slow, but quickly becomes challenging. You can read more about it in my book.

Summer is here, so now is the perfect time to get into beach body shape.

Read More: The Most Efficient Rep Range To Build Muscle

G.S. Luthra

Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

It Only Takes A Few Men To Change The Course Of History

May 22, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

With the proper motivation and preparation, small numbers of men can do great things. Numeric limitation is but one part of the equation. This fact will be illustrated by a story that appears in Cornelius Nepos's brief biography of a Theban commander named Pelopidas.

In 382 B.C. the Spartan commander Phoebidas took possession of a Theban stronghold called the Cadmea. The Spartans were actually invited to do so by a political faction in Thebes that wanted to gain leverage over its opponents; bringing in a foreign military force seemed an expedient way to accomplish this goal. Phoebidas was happy to oblige; generals welcome opportunities to occupy forts. But the Spartan government had not authorized him to do this and, when they discovered he had exceeded his commission, stripped him of his command. They did not, however, return the fortress of the Cadmea to Thebes; in fact, they accelerated their efforts to set up a Theban puppet government.

The reason for this was that Sparta had begun to see Thebes as its future rival. Now that Athens had been brought under Spartan control in the Peloponnesian War, Sparta faced no other serious rivals in the Greek-speaking world. So Sparta stacked the Theban government with sympathizers and tools that would do its bidding. Those Thebans who were unwilling to align themselves with the new order of things were either exiled or assassinated. One of the exiled men was Pelopidas; and he, along with many others, relocated to Athens and began to plan a way to free Thebes from Spartan domination.

They kept communication with sympathetic Thebans back home using a variety of means. When the time for action came, they made their move. The day they chose was a feast day called the Festival of the Aphrodisia; it was a day when the local magistrates were to meet at a large banquet. Apparently Pelopidas had only about twelve men with him; yet, according to Nepos, “never has so shaky a start produced such a complete overturning of so much power.” But under the right circumstances, even very small numbers of men can set in motion a chain of events that can reshape history. Arrogant, bullying powers that seem to be invincible may, in fact, be more vulnerable than they appear. Much of power rests on perception; and when the myth is shattered, so is the power.

Pelopidas knew that his first task was to reach Thebes itself. So he and his dozen men left Athens in disguise; to move freely through the Greek countryside, they pretended they were domestic hunters. They dressed as country-dwellers brought hunting dogs, nets, and other equipment of this sort. When they reached Thebes they hid in the house of a sympathizer named Charon.

It was not long before news of the return of Pelopidas circulated around the city. This information even reached the ears of the magistrates who ran the Spartan collaborationist government; but since they were thinking more of preparing for the upcoming festival, they gave the report little notice. Arrogant and confident in their perceived security, they took no action to search for Pelopidas and have him arrested. Even more amazingly, they were provided written intelligence that betrayed the details of Pelopidas’s plans to overthrow the puppet regime.

We are told that the chief magistrate—an arrogant fool named Archias—was, while absorbed in his banquet, handed a sealed letter that contained the details of Pelopidas's plot. But he took no action; he did not even condescend to read the letter. "I will put off this important issue until tomorrow (In crastinum differo res severas)," he said. He then stuffed the letter into his tunic and continued with his revelry. His blithe dismissal of the approaching danger is incredible, but nevertheless attested to by the facts.

Archias's lack of action proved to be a fatal mistake. For Pelopidas's coup was slated to begin that very night; he had picked a festival day on the assumption that the magistrates would have their guards lowered at that time. During the night, Archias and all his associates were seized and put to death. A signal was then given for a general uprising to take place across the city; taken off guard, the Spartan garrison was disarmed and ejected from Thebes. Once this had been accomplished, Pelopidas and his men took their revenge on those who had sold out their city to the foreigners: some were exiled, and others were executed.

This is the story as told by the Latin historian Cornelius Nepos. Under the right circumstances, small groups of dedicated men can become the vanguard for momentous change. Paucity in numbers can never serve as a crutch for inaction.

Read More: How The Legacy Media Polices Speech From Within

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Communist Leon Trotsky Had A Detailed Plan For Creating A Soviet America

May 22, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Within an archive documenting Communist history and subversion efforts, I found an interesting item from Leon Trotsky called "If America Should Go Communist". This was written in 1934, when he was living in Mexico, having made himself persona non grata everywhere else in the world because of his incessant meddling. At the time, the USA was going through the Great Depression. As the preface explains (though in nicer words), he thought it would make a fine opportunity to peddle his brand of Communism to a desperate public over here. Let's see what Comrade Trotsky promised, and if today's leftists have learned anything.

"We goofed up everything in Russia, but give us another chance in the USA"

"Peace and freedom in Sovdepya" with Trotsky butt naked over a pile of skulls

> Should America go communist as a result of the difficulties and problems that your capitalist social order is unable to solve, it will discover that communism, far from being an intolerable bureaucratic tyranny and individual regimentation, will be the means of greater individual liberty and shared abundance.

Sure thing! Then he lists several reasons why Americans are skeptical of Communism, given its track record thus far. Actually, it's a pretty damning bill of particulars, though the USSR's worst days were still far from over.

Just one minute here. Trotsky was a Communist since 1896, back when he was still calling himself Lev Davidovich Bronstein. He was quite influential in the Party establishment even before the Revolution, and became Lenin's second in command. Later he got sidelined, and eventually got himself booted out of the country, but before that he had plenty of opportunities to move the USSR in a positive direction. Does he claim any responsibility? What things did he fix while still in power? For that matter, how often do leftists own up to their mistakes?

He explains that it will be all different here because of historical factors:

> Actually American soviets will be as different from the Russian soviets as the United States of President Roosevelt differs from the Russian Empire of Czar Nicholas II. Yet communism can come in America only through revolution, just as independence and democracy came in America.

Then he explains that revolution is a fine American tradition. Shall we break out the fife, drums, and Roman candles now, Comrade Trotsky? He goes on to say that everyone below the top 5-10% of the public "is already economically prepared for communism." So how was that translating to popular support? In the 1932 election, the Communist candidate got 0.26% of the popular vote; in 1936, 0.17%; the Revolution is coming! This stunning miscalculation was even more ridiculous than last year's estimates that Donald Trump only had a 1% chance of winning the Presidency.

Promises, promises

"Bolshevik freedom" – Trotsky wasn't too popular in Poland either

Trotsky paints a wondrous picture of how much better the manufacturing sector will be. Afterward, "Costs of production will be cut to 20 percent, or less, of their present figure." Uh, how exactly? Which industries have 80% unnecessary overhead? That's even better than telling us Obamacare will give free healthcare to millions while not raising prices for the people who do pay for their doctors. Then this zinger:

> To be sure, the American soviets would establish their own gigantic farm enterprises, as schools of voluntary collectivization. Your farmers could easily calculate whether it was to their individual advantage to remain as isolated links or to join the public chain.

So how did that "voluntary collectivization" work out for the Ukrainians back then? Further, he explains how small businesses will be sovietized:

> Without compulsion! The American soviets would not need to resort to the drastic measures that circumstances have often imposed upon the Russians. In the United States, through the science of publicity and advertising, you have means for winning the support of your middle class that were beyond the reach of the soviets of backward Russia with its vast majority of pauperized and illiterate > peasants.

We get it about all the propaganda. At least he's starting to come close to telling the truth, at last.

> Even the intensity and devotion of religious sentiment in America will not prove an obstacle to the revolution. If one assumes the perspective of soviets in America, none of the psychological brakes will prove firm enough to retard the pressure of the social crisis.

Where do I even begin?

> Japan will probably have joined the communistic ranks even before the establishment of the American soviets. The same is true of Great Britain.

What a great prophet Comrade Trotsky was. He's really established his credibility here.

Does any of this sound familiar?

The residence of Diego Rivera and his wife Frieda Kahlo. Trotsky couch surfed here for a couple years and boinked his friend's wife.

> The governments of Central and South America would be pulled into your federation like iron filings to a magnet. So would Canada. The popular movements in these countries would be so strong that they would force this great unifying process within a short period and at insignificant costs. I am ready to bet that the first anniversary of the American soviets would find the Western Hemisphere transformed into the Soviet United States of North, Central and South America, with its capital at Panama.

So all this was going to be with the permission of the people in the countries involved, right?

Later he says prosperity would be assured because the USA already has lots of developed industry, unlike the USSR which had to build things from the ground up. Just one little problem—the USA did, in fact, build itself from the ground up; so why mess with something that works? Capitalism isn't perfect, but it's a hell of a lot better than Communism. And apparently Trotsky was unaware that Latin America wasn't nearly as industrialized, which he would've known if he'd set foot outside of the posh neighborhood where he was staying in Mexico City.

According to Trotsky, Communism didn't work in the USSR because of paper money. So the USA first should implement Communism with the gold standard, later "money will become ordinary paper slips, like trolley or theater tickets" (uh, like paper money?), and eventually money goes away because everyone gets everything they want for free. Pull my other leg; it plays Jingle Bells. Then this:

> You can thus avoid growth of bureaucratism by the practice of soviets, that is to say, democracy – the most flexible form of government yet developed. Soviet organization cannot achieve miracles but must simply reflect the will of the people.

Here, by "soviets" he means the multi-level council system that was supposed to hold power in the USSR, though it was actually a dictatorship. Trotsky's claims are a smidge hard to swallow; if the USA was going to remain democratic, why would revolution be necessary in the first place? If that's what the people wanted, they could just form a Constitutional convention.

> Soviet America will have to find a new solution for the question of how the power of the press is to function in a socialist regime. It might be done on the basis of proportional representation for the votes in each soviet election.
>
> Thus the right of each group of citizens to use the power of the press would depend on their numerical strength – the same principle being applied to the use of meeting halls, allotment of time on the air and so forth.

And I have a bridge for sale in Brooklyn.

> While the romantic numskulls of Nazi Germany are dreaming of restoring the old race of Europe's Dark Forest to its original purity, or rather its original filth, you Americans, after taking a firm grip on your economic machinery and your culture, will apply genuine scientific methods to the problem of eugenics. Within a century, out of your melting pot of races there will come a new breed of men – the first worthy of the name of Man.

A few items here. First, all political considerations aside, the ancient Germans were actually pretty respectable, as Tacitus noted. Second, his plan to destroy genetic uniqueness would've gotten him tarred and feathered if he'd come to the USA to preach it back in 1934. They had the guts to fight back, before decades of propaganda to convince the public that their heritage isn't worth preserving. Even now, most people aren't enthusiastic about crossbreeding ourselves into "New Soviet Man", though not for lack of trying by fruitcake leftist social engineers. Third, mentioning eugenics now makes leftists scream like little girls on a roller coaster. That's right, Comrade Trotsky advocated eugenics, how about that!

In summary

Oh, did that icepick hurt?

Some leftists remember Trotsky fondly, thinking that Communism would've worked if only he'd been in charge. As we've seen here, it's all the same bullshit. Much more likely, a Soviet America would turn out just the same as all the other countries the Communists have wrecked.

Other than that, Trotsky clearly was incompetent; not quite the brightest bulb in the chandelier. This was pretty obvious with his final act. He survived a couple of attempts to whack him, knowing full well his enemies were out to get him. Fortunately, he wasn't smart enough to find somewhere else to hide out, and so they finally finished the job on this lying weasel.

Read More: Why Communism Doesn't Work

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

At Least 20 Dead After Explosion At Ariana Grande Concert In Manchester UK

May 22, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via NBC News:

At least 20 people were killed and possibly "hundreds" of others were injures after one or more loud bangs were heard Monday night at an Ariana Grande concert at Manchester Arena in England, multiple law enforcement told NBC News.

> DashCam records Moment of explosion. At 0:07 sec left side. Definitely not a balloon#manchester #ManchesterArena pic.twitter.com/XkW5IbsSkH
>
> — □□ AdorableJoe□□ (@US_Citizen_Joe) May 22, 2017

Law enforcement sources in both Britain and the United States told NBC News there were possibly two explosions. There was no immediate information on what kind of explosions occurred, and the sources stressed that the information was preliminary and subject to change.

Greater Manchester Police said only that there were "a number of confirmed fatalities and injuries" as hundreds of fans fled the arena. Emergency crews rushed to the scene after the possible blasts, which were first reported about 10:40 p.m. (5:40 p.m. ET).

> BREAKING: Video shows an injured woman with both legs nail bombed at #Manchester arena!
> [GRAPHIC] pic.twitter.com/dwPmr9l2Rk

> — Tennessee (@TEN_GOP) May 22, 2017

Multiple senior U.S. intelligence officials who are monitoring British authorities told NBC News that preliminary reports indicate that a single explosion took place outside the arena on the southwest side opposite the train station. The explosion occurred as the concert ended, catching people as they exited.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: How ISIS Plans To Conquer And Manage Infidel "Savages"

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

How To Save Western Civilization

May 23, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've had a front-row seat in the culture war for over a decade, but I haven't made any big policy declarations like other movements. Men's rights activists their "family law reform" platform. The MGTOW group has "legalize prostitution and invent realistic sex bots." The alt right has "white ethno-state." The alt lite has "civic nationalism." When it comes to policy, I've been quiet, solely focusing on fostering truth and masculinity. Only now am I ready to make the commitment to a policy platform which nips the essential problem in the bud in a way that other movements do not. We must repeal women's suffrage, starting with the 19th Amendment in the United States. Once this is accomplished, no other planned or conscious action must be taken to solve nearly all our societal ills.

The origin of our problems

Today's problems are all branches of a radical leftist root that has been normalized through feminism, social justice, and socialism. Allowing women to vote has made it effortless to elect leftist politicians who hate the family unit, men, and healthy market competition, while simultaneously weakening society by pushing women into work and giving them generous welfare in the form of handouts to single moms and the able-bodied along with make-work jobs for females in bloated government bureaucracies.

Thanks to leftism, we have seen the rise of a techno-matriarchy with an agenda of male disempowerment and persecution that transfers resources and soft power from men to women while solidifying hard power among elite globalists who control it all to uphold their own high-level aims. Individual globalists work together as an oligarchy to enact a divide-and-conquer strategy among races and sexes to fund leftist causes, politicians, and NGOs. The group with the most money to influence "democratic" politics and public opinion implants their useful idiots and political puppets to maintain control.

These puppets, whether on the "right" or "left," have a true center on the left end of the spectrum for the sheer reason that votes from women must be gained. The manosphere cannon has shown that women have special mental faculties that operate almost exclusively on emotion, submission, and social conflict more than logic, dominance, and merit. Western countries have transformed into a national representation of the female psyche.

Appeasing women leads to civilizational destruction

To appease female voters and their destructive nature of promiscuity and drama, a symptom of which is collectively propelling a book about a woman being brutally dominated by a man (50 Shades Of Grey) to one of the best selling books of all time, society has veered so far to the left that it is crumbling at its base through declining birth rates and collapse of the family unit. Because we have given women suffrage, it has become necessary to gain their votes by promising whatever they want in the moment, including the removal of all gates to the sexual market so they can engage in the great game of "alpha male hunting," which has led to such unbridled chaos and sterility that we have to import third-world people as these empowered female voters abort nearly 60 million American babies. The demographic crisis the West faces today is primarily due to allowing women to do as they please instead of imposing healthy standards on their behavior and choices. The direct cause of this horror movie is giving women the vote.

I haven't even touched the surface of the problems we have today that stem from having to appeal to the female vote: lowering of academic standards in universities to allow them to "excel," promotion of degeneracy in media, invention of apps and technology to allow frictionless casual sex with bad boys, promotion of sex change operations among children, re-defining fat women as "beautiful at any size," legalization of gay marriage, use of murder (abortion) as birth control, maligning normal masculinity as "toxic masculinity," and elevation of damaging myths such as "rape culture" and the "wage gap" to foment gender fear and confusion. The culture has degraded because women have been at the forefront of degrading it. Their true nature, once unimpaired by societal limits, embarks on an tragic mission of destruction to recreate reality in a way to make them appear more attractive to high status men, no matter the consequence.

Loading…

The problems I mentioned above would take thousands of local and Federal laws to address individually, and it would meet intense opposition from globalists who would fund the sort of antifascist protests and Deep State interference that we have seen thwarting Donald Trump. And even if those thousands of laws are passed, there is no guarantee that a renewed leftward push, thanks to ongoing demographic changes, wouldn't roll them back. Is there a way to solve the problems while being assured that they couldn't be repealed over the course of several generations? I've thought about this dilemma for years, after scratching the surface with previous thought experiments, and can only come to one conclusion: the problems in society can only be solved, and remain solved beyond one generation, by repealing women's suffrage.

The ultimate solution

Take away the power of women to vote, and the degradation stops. The paltry population of male feminists, who are likely suffering from low testosterone due to environmental plastics, would offer no barrier in stopping the return to patriarchal normalcy. Women, helpless at enacting political change, would just whine and nag endlessly, and when they tire themselves out, they'd complete their protest by buying dildos or cats. Consider that no Democratic candidate for President since Jimmy Carter would have likely won if women were not allowed to vote. Upon repeal of women's suffrage, a new party to the right of Republicans would be created as conservative men seek true conservatism and tradition.

Remove a woman's right to vote and within just one national election, every single leftist party would be crushed. Within two elections, politicians would speak directly to men and their innate interest for patriarchy, economic success, stable families, and an equitable distribution of females among society. More than half of the candidates running for office would already be more conservative than Donald Trump, who is still liberal on social issues like equality and gay marriage.

Within three elections, the entirely of the liberal platform of the past 50 years would be rolled back, and the only living audience a woman can gain for her political opinions is from her feline friends. Within four elections, the global elite would be forced to retrench while sitting on billions of capital with no direct path of influence except sponsoring color revolutions and coups that can be defeated in the name of patriotic national defense. By then, the power of NGOs, media outlets, and day care universities will have declined. Within five elections, cultural standards would have tamed the sexual marketplace, and birth rates would rise once more as both women and men see the incentive in spending their free time building families instead of endlessly trying to secure a sex partner for the fleeting moment.

Repealing women's suffrage would also diminish other dissident movements whose solutions can only bring temporary success as long as women have the right to vote. Men will automatically push laws that account for men's rights. They will automatically regulate the sexual marketplace to make it more fair, diminishing MGTOW. They will automatically regulate immigration and replace it with a policy of natalism, diminishing the alt right. And they will automatically have high standards for citizenship, diminishing the alt lite.

Even the concept of masculinity will be built into the crust of society where only men have a political voice and not women. My game guides would no longer be needed, allowing me to buy land and operate a real farm instead of a content farm where most of my life has been spent pushing back the harmful effects that were unleashed after allowing women to vote. There will be no need for counter-cultural movements of men when those in charge of national politics only need to cater to male votes. If women's suffrage is repealed, the most reviled dissident today would even be able to easily attain political office.

Conclusion

It should be clear to you that women will always use their votes to destroy themselves and their nations, to invite invaders with open legs, to persecute their own men, and to ravage their economies with socialism. Because they don't operate on logic like men do, you will always have this destructive element within the political ranks of your nation as long as women have the right to vote. Giving them this right was a terrible mistake. I can now claim to have one political dream, and that is to repeal women's suffrage. I will vote only for politicians who put me closer to realizing this necessary reality. Within my lifetime, I'm certain that at least one country, in an attempt to save itself, will elevate a barbarous and ferocious strongman to fulfill this task, and he will have my full support, because repealing women's suffrage is the only issue of our day that can single-handedly solve all the others.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: Women Must Have Their Behavior And Decisions Controlled By Men

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

It’s Essential For Men To Create A Tightly-Knit Crew Of Red Pill Men

May 23, 2017 | by Stig Eriksen | Link | Original Link

More men should step up and claim their rightful throne as strong, fierce yet righteous beings. I personally took the red pill a long time ago. If not, I too would’ve pursued the road of conformity that has led so many men astray. At some point I figured out that if I had a team in my back I could do so much more—I could start winning more at life.

Man Hunt

Search for suitable members.

Firstly, scout for men who are not corrupted by society. The problem is, within the vast array of men, there will only be a handful or less who have swallowed the red pill. They are certainly hard to find. What I did was wait for them to find me. I kept striving for improvement and success while I welcomed similar men to join my path. Whilst you head for defiance, like-minded men will start to follow your lead. This is a very convenient situation for you to build your crew in a slow, steady manner.

However, life is too short. Ideally you'd want your crew set up before you reach your early twenties. Perhaps you are older already, but you must realize that it's never too late. As long as you have ambitions, with a team you will prosper. Therefore, I have made some simple techniques to help you find the right comrades at a faster rate.

1. Be clever

Drop red pill views discretely during conversations to sort out red pill men from blue pill men. This allows better control of who you should befriend. If the man you are talking to sounds like a "consumer" and not a "creator," you should stop paying attention to him. Remember, blue pill men only consume that which is presented by society and religiously neglect the truth. In a sense, they do not create their own reality, it is created for them.

2. Look at their life situation

If they follow the typical, normative 9-5 lifestyle and waste a lot of time on social media or other time-consuming frills, assume that they are not suitable for your crew. In addition, you should take in consideration what their ambitions are. Do they want to serve society or themselves? If they serve society they are more or less blinded by it, thus decreasing their potential and worth. Remember, a man's worth should be partly evaluated by his ambitions for the future, not where he stands in present time. So, think about whether he has such a drive for accomplishments, and make sure his soul is not a spark, but rather fully afire.

3. Analyze their surroundings

> You are the average of the five people you spend the most time with.

The saying has truth to it, as we choose our friends based on who we are ourselves. It would be wise to choose your crew members in the same manner. So, ask yourself whether they surround themselves with the right type of people. Who are they spending their time with?

I recommend having at least two members except yourself. This way you will be a golden trio that are practically unstoppable. I have always found a trio to be the best, as you will be few enough to work in a high quality manner, yet also having the ability to shift your perspective if needed. Let's say two of you end up arguing, there will always be a third guy ready to intervene and save the day.

Deus Vulting

Amp up the courage and rise from the bottom to the top.

With feminists, leftists and a general corruption of the Western society, it is harder to grow as individuals. We have to connect with like-minded people to rise from the ashes. By now, you know how to find these people. But to embark on a journey with them is something entirely different. You would need a set of wisely thought out principles you can apply to your “crew mindset.”

1. Capability

There are no limits among a group of men who are red pilled. In fact, I am going out on a limb here and say; you’re capable of changing history. You can reach the highest of highs while working together with men that worship the same values. So let it be a rule of thumb that you are practically limitless.

2. Loyalty

Loyalty can make or break your journey as a crew. Out of all the principles that make for a long lasting team, loyalty always triumphs. It speaks for itself, since without loyal members there is no way in hell you can achieve anything worth mentioning.

3. Freedom

Understand that when your crew has let go of what most people believe to be reality, you accelerate your growth rate exponentially. From now on you are witnessing the “snowball effect” having its way. Generally speaking, when you overcome the initial limitations you may have, you are basically free to roll. Just like a snowball.

Beware Of Blue Pill Saboteurs

Need I say more?

We exist in the midst of a culturally imposed world where most men are completely unaware of what is really going on. These people will drag you down with them (if you let them).

More importantly, do not try to change a blue pill man into taking the red pill. For a man to take the red pill, he must choose to find the truth himself, as it is the rage that manifests itself on his mind that leads to real revelation. For that reason, I highly recommend that you steer clear of blue pill men.

I believe the red pill is for men who are contemplative. They are the skeptics who see beyond the horizon. Therefore, it is only natural that ROK readers find themselves a crew so that they can snap out of society's devious grip and create a society for their own. So go out there and seek hustlers to hustle with, and demand society to treat you with the respect you rightfully deserve as a masculine man.

Read More: You've Already Seen One Of The Greatest Red Pill Movies Ever Made

Stig Eriksen
Stig is the creator of a website suitable for those who want to strengthen their presence as men, live like kings and build their bodies. If you are such a man, you may go to Enhance Masculinity.

5 Tips To Maintaining A Beard That Will Get You More Women

May 23, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

Growing a beard is one of the easiest ways to make yourself more attractive to women. Beards are a quintessential aspects of physical masculinity: a lush carpet of hair on your face will make you stand out from clean-shaved men and give you an advantage in the mating dance. However, there's a right way and a wrong way to maintain a beard, and if you do it wrong, you'll look like a dork instead of like a man. Here's how to maintain your beard the right way…

1. Grow Your Beard Out Before You Start Shaping It

Many men make the mistake of trying to sculpt their beard before it's fully grown out. This is a major error. It takes time for a beard to reach a length where sculpting it is possible, and doing it too soon will make you look awkward and weird. Think of your beard as a canvass: it needs to be treated gingerly if you want to develop it. To spare yourself these problems, grow your beard out for at least two months before you begin shaping it.

2. Clean Up Any Straggling Hairs

This is the second stage of beard maintenance. Beards that are thick and dense look more masculine and powerful, so you want to keep your beard as orderly and neat as possible. The thicker the beard, the better: thin beards make you look weak and project vulnerability instead of strength, hurting your attractiveness to women.

Because hairs grow at different rates, you'll want to trim runaway hairs at the bottom that are growing too quickly in order to give the appearance that your beard is as thick as possible. Do this on a regular basis.

3. Regularly Shave The Neck And Upper Cheeks

The absolute last thing you want is a neckbeard. Men with neckbeards get mocked on the Internet for a reason: they're gross, messy, and make you look like a homeless person. If you grow a neckbeard, you might as well just forget about women and buy yourself a fedora and a lifetime supply of Cheetos.

To avoid looking like a euphoric atheist, regularly shave your neck and upper cheeks so that your beard looks neat. You'll want to walk a line between being too fussy and being too lax. Try and make it so that you don't look like you're trimming your beard every day even when you are. You want your beard to look as effortless as possible, like it just magically sprouted from your face in an organized pattern and maintains an even length.

4. Keep Your Beard Symmetrical

Scientific studies have shown that people with symmetrical facial features are considered more attractive. This goes for beards as well: asymmetrical beards look weird and off-putting. To this end, you'll want to keep your beard as symmetrical as possible. This can be somewhat difficult with traditional beard grooming products, as these pictures show…

5. Use A Beard Trimmer Like Pride Grooming’s Beard Shaping Tool

The best way to keep your beard symmetrical and fresh is to use professional beard trimming product, such as Pride Grooming’s Beard Shaping Tool.

Traditional methods of cutting and trimming beards, such as scissors or beards, are risky and inefficient. You’ll want to use the Beard Shaping Tool because it allows you to expertly sculpt your neckline, cheekline, and jawline with the precision of a professional barber. Indeed, both amateur beard owners and barbers can make use of the Beard Shaping Tool in their work.

The Beard Shaping Tool is so versatile that it can even be used to shape your sideburns and forehead/temple lines. To help you out with the process of trimming, the tool also includes symmetry lines to guide your grooming.

The men who've purchased the Beard Shaping Tool are happy to have found a product that makes beard grooming an absolute cinch. By using this tool, you can make the process of maintaining your beard painless and easy, and also make yourself more attractive to girls. Enter the code "ROK" at checkout for any Pride Grooming order to receive a 10% discount.

If you're going to grow a beard, you need to do it right. Indeed, if you don't do it right, you might as well not even do it at all. By following these beard maintenance tips and investing in a professional Beard Shaping Tool, you can make the process of having a beard pain-free and easy, and also increase your attractiveness to women while you're at it. Click here to visit the Pride Grooming Store.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

3 Things I've Learned From Dating A Ukrainian Girl For One Year

May 24, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I've been dating a Ukrainian girl for about one year now. Throughout this time, I've learned a lot. Things that I assumed about relationships have been proven false. Issues that arose from my relationships with Western girls have been absent with the Ukrainian. Overall, my outlook has changed drastically.

This is for many reasons. The overall attitudes and mannerisms of women in Eastern Europe are drastically different. In some areas my expectations have been exceeded, but I keep myself grounded. But probably the biggest thing is that they're actually pleasant and intelligent (you can listen to her on my podcast to get an idea of what I mean). With that being said, here are three things I've learned and observed from dating a Ukrainian girl for the last year.

1. Relationships Are Valued

If there's one thing I learned from all the trouble of dating in Los Angeles, it's this: even if a girl really likes you, you're not going to be in good shape if you agree to any sort of relationship before six or so months.

You really have to string them along and make her beg and plead for you to be an exclusive couple. If you broach the topic, or even cave to her desires too quickly—she'll simply lose respect for you. But the pride of Western girls prevents them from asking you for at least a few months. Why?

Simple. The sex and the city lifestyle. The fact is that she has options (even if they aren't high-quality, they are numerous). And that matters, because she can brag about it to her friends to feel valued. Never underestimate the value of attention. Attention to girls is what sex is to guys. All we really do is trade them.

The point is, relationships with an Eastern European girl are valued. An Eastern European girl isn't going to get shamed because she got into a committed relationship with a guy after dating him for two months. She isn't going to hide you from her friends as long as possible—she's going to want you to meet them and see if they approve. Same goes for parents (albeit that seems to come later).

2. A Curiosity To Learn

When I was living in the west, my first few dates with girls were always 100% on autopilot. I look back and remember very few things, simply because many dates were very, very similar. I've often thought to myself: is it my fault they were this way? Could I have made them more "exciting"?

After much pondering, my answer is no.

Because I did what worked. Getting into deeper intellectual or philosophical conversations was a surefire way to make sure she wouldn't have sex with me. Instead, my routine followed something more like this:

1. Meet at the same bar, every time.
2. Buy the first round, and tell her she'd be buying the second.
3. Chit-chat about general stuff for 15 minutes.
4. Turn the topics sexual by using the questions game. The same questions, every single time.
5. Have her buy the second round.
6. I buy the third round, in cash and make sure we're ready to go at a moment's notice.
7. As the third round (sometimes not even this) of drinks conclude, mention something "cool" at my apartment that came up in the questions game.
8. Walk home from the bar.
9. Crack open bottle of wine.
10. BS with her for 30 minutes, then bang.

It was all just lifeless. Now, I'm not saying you should go on a date with a foreign girl and start trying to discuss Keynesian economics with her, but in most cases foreign girls just have more going on in their head than the Western counterparts. There is an innate curiosity about the world. A desire to learn and to broaden her intellectual capacity.

A perfect example is this: I've recently been assigning her weekly articles to write about for my small niche website about Ukraine. Last week, she made her first ever sale from online business—a whopping $2.30. Despite the low number, the look of elevation and accomplishment is just something I never saw on the face of a Western girl. They all seemed far more interested in just watching reality television.

3. A Desire To Please, But…

Simply put, girls in Eastern Europe want to please their guy. However, they manage to do this while still being reasonably independent.

I don't mean this in the "strong-independent-look-at-me-roar" way that Western feminism pushes the agenda. I simply mean that over the last year, I have found her to be a strong person more than capable of handling her own issues without my assistance.

But despite that, she still wants to make me happy. She manages to be strong and independent and yet feminine at the same time. This is a skill and balance that definitely seems to escape most of the girls in the west—even if they are deeply in love with you. She manages to make me feel needed, and yet not needed at the same time. It's a delicate balance.

Closing Thoughts

I don't want to say that everything is perfect. Nothing ever is. It can be difficult at time dating someone from a drastically different culture (language, anyone?). But the pros absolutely outweigh the cons. She has added tremendous value to my life, and even has taught me a few things about the world.

Throughout my time abroad, I've come to appreciate some things that are available Stateside (Amazon Prime, customer service, etc.), but there is one thing I just can't seem to miss. Dating. Undoubtedly, I've been spoiled rotten by my experiences in Eastern Europe. I wonder how things will continue to go in the longer-term with her. I guess I'll let you know at this time next year.

If you're looking to come to grips with dating in the western world, check out my books. For more information about Ukraine and it's girls and culture, read Ukraine Living.

Read More: 8 Things Eastern European Girls Have Said That Blew My Mind

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

It’s Time You Get A Proper Folding Knife

May 24, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

Since the dawn of Man, our ancestors have used knives for a myriad of vital tasks, from hunting to self-defense. And today is no different. After all, manual cutting tasks still need to get done, and even self-defense remains a live possibility which every modern man must be prepared for. Consequently, just as our ancestors carried knives, we too should arm ourselves in a similar manner.

In modern times, what this means is that we should own a quality folding knife. Indeed, in our present time, a folding knife is the most versatile bladed tool that a man can carry, and so every man should have one. However, given the numerous options that are available, it is hard to know which features to look for when choosing such a knife. That is why this article will give you some tips concerning the type of folder that you should purchase.

He might be able to take a 7-inch bowie to work, but you likely can't…so let's just focus on folders.

As mentioned, this article will only deal with folding knives. The reason for this is simple. This article is meant for everyone, and it is rather hard to attend most modern workplaces with a seven-inch fixed blade hanging from your belt. By contrast, every man—even the most den-dwelling computer techie—can carry a solid folder in his pocket.

Additionally, folders are still fast enough to open that they can be effectively used for personal defense, and they are also versatile enough to use for other purposes as well. Consequently, folders are the best all-around knife to discuss for the widest audience of men, which is why this article will focus solely on them.

The General Points

Now, the first piece of advice to remember when buying a folding knife is obvious: do not be cheap! This is especially important if this is going to be your sole knife. After all, you do not want your only knife to fail you when you need it most. So quality counts. Now, this does not mean that price equals quality, but a $10 folder is not going to cut it. However, also remember that it is always better to have a knife than no knife at all, so just get the highest quality folder that you can afford.

Additionally, focus on functionality over fanciness. If a particular knife looks like it was designed based on the fevered dreams of a sci-fi geek hoping to impress the ladies with his mad knife-designing "skills", then it probably is not the knife for you.

This is not the folding knife that you want

Finally, fit the knife to your life. This means that if you are an office-worker, then the folder that you choose might have to be slightly thinner and more concealable than the folding knife used by a trucker. So keep your lifestyle in mind when picking your folder.

The Blade

When it comes to the blade, the critical point is to pick a blade that has an optimal balance for your specific needs of toughness, hardness, corrosion-resistance and edge-retention. Now, since this is a very detailed topic, and since there are several different blade steels to choose from depending on your needs, I would thus recommend that you read such webpages as Knife Informer's 'Guide to the Best Knife Steel' article for further information on choosing the best blade metal for you.

Concerning length, the blade should be anywhere from two-to-five inches long; anything shorter will seriously reduce the knife's functionality while anything longer will make the knife way too bulky for your pocket. The blade should also be of sufficient depth and width so that it is sturdy and can clearly handle a great deal of use. Essentially, you should be able to stab and/or cut things repeatedly without the knife breaking or becoming compromised.

Next, a half-serrated blade is recommended. Not only does a serrated edge often cut certain things better than a straight blade, but the possession of such a "utility" function on your knife will give you plausible deniability if you are ever stopped and questioned as to why you are carrying a knife.

Now, as far as the blade tip is concerned, so long as the tip is solid and sharp, feel free to choose whatever tip you like, be it a tanto-style tip or not.

Additionally, make sure that whatever mechanism or stud that is used to open the blade is both solid and allows for rapid opening. It should also be ambidextrous. There are many options, so play around with them until you find the right one for you. However, remember that the key is that the opening mechanism needs to easily and quickly work whenever its needed, but it should not be so big and bulky that it jams up your handling of the knife.

Finally, I would recommend a black matte finish to the blade to reduce any reflections off the blade; after all, no reason to give away the fact that you have a knife if you can avoid it.

The Handle

The handle should obviously fit your hand comfortably and firmly, it should have an anti-slip grip, and it should also be a black matte finish to prevent any unnecessary shine.

At the same time, it is critical to have a very strong locking mechanism for your blade within the handler, so that there is no chance of the blade collapsing when you are using the knife. Additionally, the locking mechanism needs to be quickly and easily accessible with one hand so that you can rapidly fold the blade back in if you need to conceal it.

The handle should have a clip which, once put in your pocket, will be tight enough to ensure that the knife does not slip out or move. But the clip should also be loose enough that it will not restrict the knife from being pulled out of your pocket in one smooth motion. Furthermore, the clip's ending should be as close to the end of the handle as possible, which will allow the knife to sit deeper in your pocket and thereby be better concealed. The clip should also be mountable on either side of the handle, as well as reversible, which means that it can cause the knife to be situated blade up or blade down in your pocket.

Finally, make sure that the knife contains a window-breaking spike as well as a seat-belt cutter within the handle. Not only are these useful tools in their own right, but again, they give you plausible deniability about why you are carrying your knife.

An Example

Although this is by no means an endorsement, in light of all of the above, I want to show everyone the folder that I carry:

This one has treated me well for years!

This knife has nearly all the features described above and it has served me well for years. I recommend something similar for you.

Conclusion

Remember, while any folding knife is better than no knife at all, if you can carry a high-quality folder with the features described above, then you will be well set to meet whatever challenges come your way, so long as you know how to use it, that is! But that is a topic for another article.

Read More: 14 Self-Defense Tools To Use Where Weapons Are Banned

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

ROK Gear Has Achieved Penetration Into Society

May 24, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Many readers have received their ROK t-shirt from last week's launch and two prior beta tests. By sending a photo to , they receive 20% off any future order once our second shirt is released. Let's take a look at the pictures…

Big man

This ROK reader is not one you'd like to get into physical combat with.

Big gun

Donald Trump hat: check
Massive rifle: check
ROK shirt: check
Massive triggering: achieved!

Seaside chill

Thanks to its 100% cotton construction, ROK shirts are great to take with you on your summer vacation

Secret female fan

This industrious female reader actually altered her ROK shirt to fit her pleasant frame. We love our female readers, don’t we guys? (As long as they don’t comment much.)

Grappling

This man’s ROK shirt gave him extra powers to defeat his enemies during MMA class.

Man in a car

Your ROK shirt will look great even if you’re just sitting in an automobile.

Jacked

Your muscles will bulge against the sleeves if you take your recommended hourly dose of Kratom.

One-arm pull up

The testosterone-jacking effects of an ROK shirt has been well established by (((science))).

Ukraine is our friend

The Adidas section of your local retailer is an excellent opportunity to show the cranberry red color contrast of your ROK shirt.

If you've already received your shirt, send me a photo at to receive a 20% discount off any future order. Your identity will be concealed. Feel free to infiltrate enemy territory to take your photo.

We are currently sold out of small and x-large but hope to receive more in June. The other sizes are getting tight on supply, so if you want to order your shirt in this first wave, head on over to Red Kings Shop. Thanks to everyone who bought a shirt so far!

Don't Miss: The Official ROK Shirt Is Now Here!

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Number One Reason Why Men Sabotage Their Interactions With Girls

May 24, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Picking up girls is never easy, particularly if you're doing it through through cold-approach day game or night game. That said, a great many guys will self-sabotage in an interaction in order to hang on to the misconceived sense that 'things are going really well.' This is a mistake and something that you must avoid at all costs.

Have you ever found yourself in this situation? Say you are out at a lounge bar. It's midway through the evening and you bump into an attractive young lady by the bar. She smiles at you, her eyes light up and you begin a conversation. Fifteen minutes later you are still there, chatting away as if you'd known one another for years.

To add an extra element of pressure to the situation, perhaps a group of your male friends are watching you from a nearby table. Maybe they are raising their glasses at you, congratulating you for the great progress that you seem to be making.

Naturally this makes you feel good. However stone-cold alpha, most guys have an Achilles heel: they like to bask in other men's approval of their sexual successes. There's a famous joke about a man being stranded on a desert island with Claudia Schiffer and having sex with her. When they're finished he asks her to put on his suit and tie. She's confused by does so. Once she's dressed up like a guy her turns to her and says 'You'll never guess who I just had sex with . . . ?!'

So you enjoy the approval of your friends. And you enjoy talking to the girl. She's pretty, sexy and intelligent too. Finally, after all these bimbos you keep meeting, here's a real ‘quality girl’.

Now all of a sudden your mind starts going off at a tangent. This girl is cool. What if we started dating? I could take her to that cool restaurant that’s just opened. We could talk about books and philosophy. This is going to be so great.

What happens is this: a combination of social pressure from onlookers and internal pressure from yourself, having built up this girl you just met to be something that perhaps she’s not, effectively freezes you and prevents you from taking the right actions. In other words you won’t spike up your conversation, you won’t be flirtatious and you certainly won’t try to escalate.

A Quality Girl

Under other circumstances perhaps you’d ask a girl to meet you elsewhere for drinks later once she’d finished with her friends. But you don’t want to do that this time because you want to do things ‘properly’. After all, she’s a ‘quality girl’. Also, you don’t want to risk rejection in front of your friends. That would be humiliating.

But most of all, you don’t want to risk rejection in front of yourself. This conversation has gone so well, but there’s a tiny part of you that is uncertain whether or not she actually ‘likes’ you in that way. You assume that she must because she’s spent such a long time talking with you. But you don’t know for sure. Better to simply take her number and contact her another time. That way if it does turn out to be a rejection then at least you can hear it in private.

Unfortunately it is precisely this approach that will lose you more girls than it will win you. It’s been a maxim in pick-up for a long time that you should approach every pickup in the same way regardless of how hot the girl is. If she’s a 10 then treat her like a 5, in other words.

This is very easy to pay lip-service to, but unfortunately in the heat of the moment it's easy to forget. The stakes just feel higher when we are talking to a girl we really like. It seems more significant, like there is more to lose.

The reality of course is that all pick-up is binary. You either get the girl or you don't. D either enters V or it doesn't. There is no credible middle ground. But too many of us would rather linger in a grey area where we can hope that something might happen rather than pushing the interaction in front of us as far as we can to test whether something actually will happen.

When you think about it, these are the exact same bars that the friend zone prison is fashioned from. When a man is in the friend zone he is essentially saying to himself, 'OK, I recognise that things aren't as I'd like them to be between me and this girl right now. But I'm hoping that things will change. That she will wake up one morning and realise that she wants to be with me. That she can't live without me.'

On a micro-level this is what you are doing when you talk to that girl in the bar or club or street but you fail to escalate. Because you are getting a modicum of positive feedback you would rather continue to hear that than to ask her on a date directly and risk her turning you down.

None of us like to see our dreams shattered, and yet we must be prepared to watch pick-up after pick-up come to nothing if we are ever to hope to have an abundant sex life.

Make It Plain What You Want

When you are having any kind of interaction with a girl you must make it absolutely plain what it is that you want. I'm not saying you should be crude, but even if you go indirect I would advise that she should know through your eye contact body language and vibe that you are a sexual guy and you're interested in her in that way.

At the end of the interaction you must either escalate sexually (by, say, asking her to come back to your place) or you must propose a date. Again, it must be very clear that you are talking about a date as opposed to a friendly meetup for coffee.

If she says no then she says no. That's her prerogative. But a lot of game is actually just about getting girls off of the fence. She may like sitting on that fence, and she might value the attention that you give her while she does, but it's not doing you any favours. In fact, it's doing you harm and the longer it goes on for the more harmful it will become.

It's always far better to go for what you want quickly and unapologetically. If things don't go your way then at least you tried and were true to yourself. But as they say, fortune favours the bold and you're much more likely to get good results by being upfront that you are by biding your time and losing momentum.

Want to find out more about how to get great at game? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter and at realtroyfrancis.com

Read More: The One Girl You Absolutely Must Approach Every Day

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How American Christians Were Manipulated Into Loving Israel

May 25, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Americans love Israel. While it is not unusual to find people of Irish or Polish descent who love Ireland or Poland, there are millions of Americans who love Israel even though they have no connection to the small, Middle Eastern country. Why is this the case?

Israel is a country with a clear purpose

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu as a young man in the Israeli special forces

There are things to admire about Israel. The most important is its clarity of purpose. The primary goal of Israel is to protect the country and its citizens. Israelis take attacks against their people personally. In 2015, when a terrorist stabbed two people in Jerusalem, civilians and even a police officer beat and kicked the terrorist who had already been shot. But Americans and Europeans have been conditioned to think as atomized units, not as a single people. Terrorism, which is an act of war against a nation, is treated merely has a crime.

Israel's ability to put its own interests first has enabled it to undertake efficient action in defending itself. In 2010, Mossad assassinated a Hamas official in a Dubai hotel. The assassination, which involved nine agents, is like something out of a James Bond movie. When Israeli citizens were hijacked in Entebbe Airport in Uganda, the Israeli Defense Forces undertook a daring overnight raid to free the Israelis. And while weak Western leaders hold hands and mouth platitudes after each terrorist attack, Israeli leaders like Benjamin Netanyahu are strong, confident, and unabashedly pro-Israel. For many Americans, cheering for Israel is like supporting a winning team, while their own country's actions give them little reason to get excited.

Disordered love

The feeling that millions of Americans have about Israel is much deeper than mere admiration. It is better described as idolization. There are several reasons this idolization exists.

First, Israel has a powerful political lobby, AIPAC. American Jews are generally very successful and they use their money to support their politics, and this includes Israel. American politicians from both sides of the aisle, anxious to get donations, make the most boot-licking speeches at the annual AIPAC conference. Thus, it doesn't really matter whether you elect a Republican or a Democrat. You can rest assured that they will be ardently pro-Israel.

Dispensationalism

The biggest reason why so Americans love Israel, even more than their own country, is not due to the work of AIPAC. Rather, it is the result of a peculiar Christian heresy—the heresy of Dispensationalism.

Dispensationalism originated with John Nelson Darby, an English Christian preacher who lived in the 1800s. It only received wide popularity, though, through the influence of the Scofield Bible. The Scofield Bible contains Dispensationalist commentary by Cyrus I. Scofield (1843-1921).

There are allegations that Scofield was influenced by Jewish Zionists. Though Scofield was a fundamentalist preacher, he was admitted as a member of the Lotus Club, an elite NYC men's club. One of the club's committee members was Wall Street lawyer Samuel Untermeyer. Author David Lutz suggests that it may have been Untermeyer who encouraged Scofield to write his commentary:

> Untermeyer used Scofield… to inject Zionist ideas into American Protestantism. Untermeyer and other wealthy and influential Zionists whom he introduced to Scofield promoted and funded the latter's career, including travel in Europe.

What's wrong with Dispensationalism

To understand why Dispensationalism is so perverted, it's necessary to explain what Christians believed before Dispensationalism came on the scene. Traditional Christian theology teaches that the Christian covenant is the "new and eternal covenant" that fulfills all the past covenants including God's covenant with Israel.

In Second Corinthians, St. Paul says that the old covenant has “faded away.” The Epistle to the Romans says that Christ is “the end of the law” meaning he was both the goal and the termination of the old covenant. Traditional theology also teaches that the Christian Church is the true continuation of Israel: Jesus is Israel’s true Messiah and the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy. Therefore, the Church, which includes gentiles and Christians Jews, is “the Israel of God” (Gal. 6:16), not Jews by physical descent. Let me say it again for emphasis: the traditional Christian belief is that the Church is the true continuation of Israel.

Thus, for 1800 years, Christians did not believe the re-establishment of a Jewish state or modern day Israel. They played no role in the biblical prophecy. Dispensationalism changed that. Dispensationalists believe that the Christian Church is God’s “Plan B.” With the Church, God is merely taking a temporary break before getting to what He really cares about—Israel according to the flesh. This can be seen in the picture at the head of this section which portrays three horses—two large Jewish ones (don’t ask me why there are two) and one small Christian one. The Church that Christ died for is an afterthought.

Dispensationalism is largely a Protestant phenomenon. Most Baptist and non-denominational churches subscribe to it, which means that most Evangelical Christians are also dispensationalists. While the Catholic Church does not teach dispensationalism, some Catholics have also succumbed. I had one Catholic on Twitter block me after I told him that the modern state of Israel plays no special role in Christian theology.

Dispensationalism in action

Dispensationalism has practical impacts on how its adherents behave in the real world. Dispensationalist Christians have applied the following verse to Israel and Jews in general: “I will bless those who bless you, and whoever curses you I will curse; and all peoples on earth will be blessed through you” (Gen 12:3). In context, the verse refers to Abraham the patriarch, but Dispensationalist Christians take it to mean that whoever supports Jews and Israel, will be personally blessed.

This type of thinking is extremely powerful form of conditioning. Everyone wants to be personally blessed by God and here is a passage that Evangelicals believe guarantee them blessings. More realistically, it guarantees Israel a large block of voters who will consistently and unquestioningly support pro-Israel policies. No other countries, including staunch US allies France and Great Britain, have such a solid base of support.

Evangelical Christians are a potent force in American politics so US politicians go out of their way to appeal to this fervor. During one of the GOP debates in 2015, each of the 16 candidates mentioned the security of Israel in their closing statement. This blatant pandering caused Ann Coulter to tweet: “How many f—ing Jews do these people think there are in the United States?” But the candidates were not just targeting wealthy Jewish donors, but all those Evangelical voters who have been programmed to support Israel.

This disordered love of Israel is not harmless. It has helped lead the United States into dubious wars in the Middle East in support of Israel. It has also spurred the development of Islamic fundamentalism and Islamic terrorism. ISIS came about due to US support of “moderate rebels” to depose Syrian president Assad, an enemy of Israel. And blind support of Israel may eventually lead us into a war with Iran—a country that poses no military threat to the US.

Conclusion

I am a political realist who believes in an America First policy. As a super power, the US will always have a complicated foreign policy. There may be times where the interests of Israel and the US align. In those cases, I don’t see a problem with pursuing a mutually beneficial alliance. But basing foreign policy on a heretical Christian doctrine is not justifiable.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why Israel Is One Of The World’s Most Successful States

---

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Why China Is Winning The Game Of Civilization

May 25, 2017 | by Subetei Gur | Link | Original Link

While the West is on its death throes, China is growing ever more ascendant. What factors allow China to be resistant to the leftist degeneracy and third-world immigration that the West so readily accepts?

The Biological Role

Within the human species are myriad permutations of culture and levels of cultural achievement. Not all cultures are equal, and some cultures enable those that practice it to gradually conquer and displace other cultures by either having a greater drive to expand or by converting members of other cultures due to cultural attractiveness. We have seen this happen many times in history.

The general trend we observe is that K-selective populations tend to produce cultures that are most geared towards long term survival and family unity, and these cultures achieve higher levels of human development. These cultures, in turn, conquer, assimilate, or displace cultures that are less K-selective.

As we all know, a cold climate places selective pressures in the direction of K-selection, and agriculture places selective pressures in the direction of higher IQ. In fact, it is often postulated that a minimum IQ of 70 is necessary for the invention of agriculture. This explains why some parts of Africa and the entire Australian continent never invented agriculture, and remained hunters and gatherers until colonization.

This also explains the well-known hierarchy of intelligence with certain Sub-Saharan African groups and Australian Aboriginals at the bottom, Caucasians of Asia Minor and Eastern Europe in the middle, Northern Europeans near the top, and East Asians dominating the highest position with a 5-8 IQ point gap. One can argue the validity of this info out of ego, but I assure you conclusive studies have proven this to be the rule, not the exception.

The Eternal Civilization

In a world of many industrialized nations cucking themselves out of existence, Chinese culture stands tall. No, this is not a praise of Chinese culture. This is a simple acknowledgement of the fact that Chinese culture has stood for 5000 continuous years to this day, and is still steaming along with seeming impunity. It assimilated foreign conquerors, conquered lesser peoples, formed tributary states that adopted their script, and ushered in scientific achievements that changed the world.

This culture saw its birth in roughly the same era as many of the ancient cultures we know of today, such as the Sumerians, the Greeks, the Persians, the Romans, and the Egyptians. But while the founding origins of those cultures are today politically insignificant nations that have succumbed to Islamic barbarism or have become r-selective debt traps or war-torn shit holes, China stands strong.

China is not without its problems (as any country), but it stands strong, unified, and in recognition of its ancient greatness. It does not cower in the face of multiculturalism or political correctness. It does not run from the challenge of sovereignty. More importantly, even beyond the geographical confines of China itself, Chinese culture remains vibrant across the globe.

Chinese communities rarely give up their culture in other nations, and places with large East Asian populations tend to counteract the negative impact of r-selective, third world migration. In places like Australia, affluent East Asian populations displace lower achieving populations by driving up property prices, be these populations native whites or otherwise. Those less able to perform in a competitive free market are pushed to further and further fringes of the cities, leaving the city center relatively crime free.

But what is it that sets Chinese culture apart from that of Europe, and why is it that while Europe is a mere decades away from The Islamic Republic of Eurostan, Chinese culture is experiencing a resurgence?

The Cultural Pillar Hypothesis

The reason for the resilience of Chinese culture to corruption via technology, ideology, or demographics lies in the very fact that the foundation of Chinese culture is the family, rather than a particular religion. While Christian Europe achieved immense levels of K-selective cultural traits such as family values, monogamy, and a strong patriarchy, these were never organic. In fact, prior to the adoption of Abrahamic religions in Europe en mass, indigenous European cultures, while still fairly K-selective, never developed the memetic habituations that match the high level of civilization achieved under Christianity.

However, this clever use of an external religion to stabilize indigenous societies is fundamentally unstable precisely because it is mythology. The inevitable advent of scientific thought dooms any religion to eventual irrelevance, as the divine force in the ether becomes less and less relatable to the common man.

Much more relevant to him, then, is the great renaissance of ideas that may benefit his immediate situation, whatever his station in life. This in and of itself would have been relatively harmless had it not been for the fact that almost the entirety of European civilization is based upon this one Abrahamic religion. The gradual debunking of this religion, thus, ultimately saw the dismantling of European culture itself.

It is no wonder, then, that Europeans seem indifferent towards hostile Islamic migrants. No European deep down wishes to see Islamic dominance or convert to Islam, but when the key pillar of European culture is now relegated to the realms of abstraction and comedy, what is there left to defend? Why remain monogamous, why adhere to rationality and reason, why bar women from their own terrible decisions, why maintain division of labor, why uphold a patriarchal society, and why defend your borders when the one cultural incentive for you to do so has crumpled beneath your feet?

Well meaning men may as well grant women and those without property the vote, set in employment quotas, and cower under the heels of feminists if it means getting a lick of vagina.

Chinese culture, on the other hand, took a very different approach. My hypothesis is that because East Asians are even more K-selected than Europeans, there were sufficient indigenous selective pressures to develop a culture that entirely transcends the need for divine punishment in order to encourage society to behave in the most optimal manner for the benefit of long-term survival. Thus an organic family oriented society emerged, and as an added result, eliminated the opportunity for dogmatic religions to ever become popular.

Throughout the 5000 years of Chinese civilization, no one religion ever held much sway over its people, and any religious practice is performed merely out of a sense of honor, politeness, and elaborate lip service. Many of us confuse Confucianism for some sort of religion. But the Chinese and their Korean, Japanese, and Vietnamese brethren most certainly do not. No one worships Confucius, and no one calls him a god.

Confucianism, if understood from a broader and more rational perspective, is merely one wandering scholar's idea of a society that elevated the family unit above all else. Its lasting legacy is no more than its mass acceptance by a receptive Chinese society. A slightly less K-selective society may well have rejected it.

Civilizations can't survive without elevating the family unit

A culture based on the pillar of family unity is very difficult to corrupt. It provides nothing mystical for technological advancement to debunk, and while political ideologies may seem grand and their respective despots may seem larger than life with their cult of personalities, their relevance to the common man does not dispel the importance of a family unit.

Indeed, it is no wonder why the preposterous Western invention of Marxism ultimately lost in its war against Chinese culture, with the latter coming out on top, guns blazing and trousers down, defecating on the charred corpse of leftist bullshit. Feminism is also unpopular in East Asian societies (unless they have been forcibly Westernized, and even then it is hardly the fashion of the day) because men, and especially fathers, are far less likely to cave to the irrational whims of women just to keep them happy for an instant at the cost of civilization.

Men and fathers are much more likely to swallow the discomfort of seeing a woman not getting her way in order to save her and society from greater suffering down the track. Even in the business world we observe that most Chinese people refer to businesses by the term "家" (pronounced "jia") which is literally translated as "family". A common colloquial trope, for example, is "the food from this 家 tastes better than the food from that 家", meaning "the food from this restaurant tastes better than the food from that restaurant".

Conclusion

I've noticed that in the face of white male cuckoldry, white females often diverge on two paths in the alternative mating market. Most go for r-selective men of darker backgrounds. But a minority end up going for shitlord East Asians. The latter often display traits so starkly contrasted with their more r-selected sisters that you can tell them apart from a mile away.

Firstly, they tend to be better educated in proper areas such as hard sciences. Secondly, they are far less promiscuous and far more feminine, with higher estrogen production. Finally, they defer to the man in a relationship, never seeking to hold power, and always appreciating the man's capacity to lead.

I believe in the larger context of biology, these females (and also the males that genuinely get into East Asian cultures) are the most k-selective of the white group, and in the past would have been handsomely rewarded both sexually and economically in European societies due to their higher productivity and civility. In the modern day and age, however, their sexual market value plummets, as they no longer represent what is in fashion.

Whatever new degeneracy the West happens to invent, and it always seems to come from the West, rest assured that the Chinese elevation of the family will have some built-in resistance to it. The white race is in trouble, and until they mimic the Chinese and their worship of family, they will be replaced by Muslims or other third-world races sooner than you think.

Read Next: Is Western Civilization Worth Saving?

Subetei Gur

Gur is a disillusioned descendant of Genghis Khan with too much testosterone for society's good. Women hate him. Women love him. Men admire him. The establishment wants him dead. However, he is not dead, for his alleles do not shorten upon each successive cell division, rendering his acquisition of slippery vaginal abysses ad infinitum.

How To Gain Access To Hot Girls By Becoming A Photographer

May 25, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

During my last trip to Ukraine, I met my friend's childhood friend. He knew Kiev and showed us around. He struck me as a total beta male from the first encounter—limp fish handshake, frail constitution, almost no eye contact, and a quiet voice as if he was running out of air every time he spoke.

Think of a prison bitch body with Cuck Rogen's face

Our discussion soon gravitated around hobbies and he told us about his passion for photography that helped him supplement his income. He focused on glamorous portraits of girls. When he showed us his portfolio, I was in awe at the quality of the models and that the majority of them where only wearing g-strings. Nothing under an 8 by Eastern European standards.

Wasted resources

Hundreds of photos with girls of the same level as this one.

I showed my joy at the perspective that I perhaps misjudged him:

> Me: Those are insanely good looking girls. I bet the shooting gets out of hand half the time and you end up banging the model on the table, you dog!
>
> Photographer: No. I can't do that! I have to be professional! I never landed a finger on them.
>
> Me : How long have you been doing that?
>
> Photographer: Almost six years now.

I was gobsmacked that he never tried to escalate or exploit that amount of beauty constantly gravitating around him. The man regularly takes pictures of amazing girls in lingerie or naked and never made a move or banged one.

He has no idea of his potential worth and does not feel that he is entitled to plow those girls. That is why his dick stays parked in his boxers when he photographs naked beautiful women. What a waste of material and a hopeless beta attitude.

He does photography only as a hobby but has had 180,000 views on just one photographic platform (and it was not the likes of Facebook or Instagram). His audience reach in the city was tremendous. And although he met those girls through social circles, a lot of them contacted HIM. This is an example of a man that is handling gold every day and has no idea what to do with it.

The tools

This plan came up to me last month and let me tell you that I have no extensive knowledge of photography apart from snapping nudes of the girls I just bedded. But that didn't stop me from executing my plan. I know that I will apply the following steps and I will be successful because the camera is to a woman what a flame is to a moth: irresistible. It appeals naturally to her constant need for attention and narcissistic nature. This is how you can exploit it:

- Get a second-hand camera with a lens on Craigslist or Gumtree. It needs to be digital as it is too time-consuming to print the photos if you don't enjoy it. SD cards transfer easily to PCs to be enhanced manually. Before the face-to-face purchase, check its autonomy, the control screen, if the SD cards works, etc. You do not need a professional one that costs a large amount of money. You only need it to "look" professional.

[image]
Perfect for what you need to do with it

- Get business cards printed on websites like this one. Costs around $10 for a hundred of them. That will get you started. You don't even have to put your real name, you can just use your platform's name.

- Dress well so it sends a “wealthy but casual” look: nice shoes and watch but dressed for the weather. You have to distance yourself from the “creep” image by being outrageously confident.
- Hang out where the hot girls are.

The portfolio

This is perhaps as important as your camera and confidence. It is your resume to gain access to her panties.

You need to be on a platform for them to find you and see your work. Use Pinterest, Facebook or the most popular local social network if you are travelling. Choose an attractive profile pic in your bio by applying the same methods used for online dating (here’s a useful guide by 20Nation). Having a well-designed logo doesn’t hurt.

Include “photo”, “photography”, “pictures”, “art” or “models” when you create the name of your platform. You will be addressing the dumbest fringes of the population. Your plan needs to be idiot proof.

Create a personal portfolio that you will use on all the platforms with a few of your own pictures (landscapes or anything with an artistic vibe to start with) plus attractive but REALISTIC girls that are beautiful but still have flaws.

Add a few glamour shoots from websites like Shutterstock or Pixabay. Change the angle and colours or mirror it. Use those for now and once you have gained the sufficient amount of personal material and followers, remove them.

And of course there’s Instagram, where all modern Babylonian whores come sell themselves for the clicks of love-starved betas. Shoot three of four girls to start with, even if you don’t have sex with them, before opening an account. I am a neophyte with Instagram (I would use this to start with) and despise the whole concept, but we have to keep up with the times if we want attractive sluts to keep deflating our balls.

Don’t forget to tag her in it and tell the harlot to like and comment as she will rarely have something more important to do. The more tags and shares, the higher the value displayed.

I wonder if adding monuments or neutral pictures would have a positive or negative effect with my targets. On the one hand, adding photos without girls give them plausible deniability as I am “not only doing that to get girls”. On the other hand, photos with girls only would increase value as I show clearly that I am not here to play around, screening against girls for which sex is not an option.

The opener

Approach the hottest girls in your area. Girls who know they are unattractive will not get their picture taken by a pro (those who would still accept are leftists and should be discarded). Tell her that she has an interesting outfit, unusual body frame, or severe nose. Do it in a way that is unusual and could be interpreted as a subtle neg. No direct compliment of her beauty—it only lowers your value compared to hers.

If she has questions, say that you try to capture the spirit of the local people for your portfolio or that you are preparing a project for an art exhibition back home. Another option is to say that you are a talent scout for a clothing brand or an agency with juicy contracts for motivated models.

You are lying. And? Women lie all the time, about their looks, their sexual past, why they went to Dubai, their attraction to status and money, or their promiscuous dating to sort out which suitor has the highest income or status. You want to play fair and be sure to get results? Then stop gaming girls and grow turnips.

First type of photoshoot

Take a few pictures right after the approach. When it’s time to part, give her your card, take her number and then contact her later. If both of you are not in a hurry, take her for one quick drink, build rapport, then propose a photoshoot in a park near a monument or at a nearby beach. Give her the business card with the website where she can check out your portfolio.

If I plan the first photoshoot with a shy girl, I would bring her in some isolated natural spot with drinks, document the encounter, have fun, and try to bang her. Bonus if it is in a wheat field with pagan imagery and fresh air.

You will quickly know exactly how slutty she is when she starts moving and choosing poses. I will then try to lead her to my apartment to watch the photos and try to have sex with her

You can try to take her out on a date after that with no photos involved to test the waters and run usual game if you did not succeed.

Second type of photoshoot

The sluttier the girl, the less you will have to build rapport. Tell her that you specialize in glamour shoots and that she needs to get a photoshoot with you. Be flirty; she must guess your intentions.

Tell her that she can bring only two outfits, one for glamour and one for elegant lingerie. Test her compliance on arrival. Tell her she can change in front of you, that you are used to it. If she is reluctant, tell her that you need to see her to know what you are working with and that you want to see her “true self” (cue artistic gaze).

Fix her a drink and get to work. Focus on making her take pictures on the bed, kitchen counter, or against the wall, places that are erotically charged.

It is not incredible quality that we aim at—we only need to isolate the girl at your place or hers. The camera could be empty for all we care because as soon as it goes “click,” she will start getting wet.

Direct her during the session. Tell her to stand where you point and then correct her pose. No “please”, no “would you…”—be in charge. The more feminine the woman, the more she wants to submit to a dominant man.

Make the poses more and more sexual but take your time to get there. Tell her to take of her underwear inch by inch. If you lack inspiration type “glamour photography” in Duckduckgo and use that.

Touch her neck, her hips. Create the sexual tension by making her expose herself on her own. If she refuses one of your commands, reframe it with: “I thought you were more professional than that. What a shame.” Or “You would look more feminine of you listen to what I say”. Try to avoid crude language if she seems shy. If she reacts positively to your touch, get closer, kiss her and bang her.

Where you have the power

The key of photographer game is that “the pictures are never ready”. They always need more light, one more shoot, some editing, the light was not good, or she needs to come over with her flashdrive as the HD photos can’t be sent online. Any excuse for an additional meeting.

You have an edge. She keeps chasing you because you have something she wants. Once you give it to her, you have no leverage.

Keep telling her that the photos are not ready until you bang her and be firm. They all want them so bad, they will comply. Use their vanity and curiosity to your advantage. Rinse and repeat.

About intellectual property

Are you legally bound to give her the pictures? If the lead is not going anywhere and she thinks that she will get away with free photos without sex, tell her you deleted them as they were not of a sufficient quality. You owe her nothing as she did not pay you. She gave you her approval to take the photos and they were made in a public space (for the public photoshoots).

Nevertheless, you must not underestimate how crafty women are with local laws. Check the local legal requirements regarding copyright and intellectual property. Play it safe by applying these measures.

Protect your own work too. Use an option that disables the "Save image" feature on your portfolio pages. You can also watermark you images. Other options are available to limit the risks.

Pas de problème de concurrence… pour l'instant

This is a specialized niche as you need to have have some knowledge of game, a decent camera, and a social media platform/portfolio. When I think "photographer", I always picture wallflower betas, flamboyant gays with lisps, and insufferable hipsters with a moustache and a "Feel the Bern" sticker on their unicycle.

If you are dressed well, in good shape, and game-savvy, you will stand out because the competition is usually art majors built like tooth picks. Betas get into that hobby (or similar ones like painting artistic nudes) to get near inaccessible women. They do it for free and get no sex while the girls use them like tools. Don't be a tool. Cash or ass, no one gets a picture for free.

Photography is the ideal hobby to combine with day game. Even as a beginner, you can look it up online, watch tutorials on Youtube and get better. Fake it till you make it.

Success won't come by itself, it will be built by momentum. You could bring a whole new dimension to your arsenal. Reach girls you could only dream about before. Who knows? You might even be good enough to make it a marketable skill.

Read more: The 25 Hottest Girls Of Ok Cupid Los Angeles

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

3 More Mainstream Movies With Subversive Themes That Slipped Under The Radar

May 25, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The following explores three films challenging the leftist narrative, deliberately or otherwise.

District 9

Vikus, after exposure to bug juice

The premise: A flying saucer hovers over Johannesburg in 1982. After nothing happens for three months, a team drills into the hull, finding a million starving and miserable space bugs. The aliens are moved to a camp called District 9, staying for nearly three decades. The alien "Prawns" are mercenaries, but who their bosses are (and why they stopped on Earth) is unknown. Many questions are left unanswered, though a sequel may yet be made.

The Prawns are routinely dealt with harshly. Because of friction with the locals, the now 1.8 million aliens are to be moved to a more remote location, allegedly better but basically a concentration camp. One of the mean bureaucrats accidentally sprays himself with bug juice and starts turning into a Prawn (recalling The Fly). His attitude changes as an evil corporation plot line quickly unfolds.

These days, they could get paid for doing this.

The spin: This has obvious parallels to South Africa's former apartheid policies. Even Star Trek's ham-fisted political messages were usually more subtle. The aliens are depicted as victims. The medical experiments are especially unconscionable.

The squalid internment camp was a real shanty town about to be shut down and its residents moved to another government housing project. Basically it's like what was happening in the plot, although the new location actually was better. The filmmakers changed little about the shanty town's appearance. Surely this horrified many upon learning this background information—this much was real!

The final take: The only Prawns displaying intelligence and ambition are Christopher (surely their leader) and his son (about as cute as a little space bug can get). The others are dull and aimless. They're hive-like, suggesting extreme r-selection. By the end, their population is up to 2.5 million; they breed like, well, bugs. How will that work out in the long term?

Besides Christopher and his son, they aren't seen improving their collective situation, doing anything with their individual lives, or engaging in cultural exchange. All told, they just aren't fitting into earthly society, apparently unmotivated to do so. They're not working, starting local businesses, building better residences, or even cleaning up their neighborhood. The Prawns just loiter and cause trouble, which is why they're walled off and to be evicted from District 9. There aren't any good solutions.

Life imitates art

The MNU corporation clearly goes too far. Even so, chronically aggressive populations—idle and unassimilable refugees particularly—inevitably require a certain degree of what Mussolini called educational severity. Why let them in, especially if firmness necessary to manage them seems morally unpalatable? This science fiction story unintentionally highlights a real-world problem. Letting in hordes of hard-luck cases, incompatible with the host society and a net drain upon it, creates an imported lumpenproletariat. How does society benefit?

As for the depressing shanty town in the film—again, a real settlement—it was trashed out because the people there weren't cleaning it up. Otherwise it would've been threadbare but tidy. They did this to themselves; nobody forbade them to pick up their own garbage. Oh, and wasn't ANC rule supposed to bring harmony to South Africa and end poverty? It didn't quite work that way. Looks like the film's metaphor went further than expected. From that perspective, District 9 unintentionally was 2009's most politically incorrect film.

Falling Down

Continually irritating the wrong person is a bad idea.

The premise: A man who wants to attend his daughter's birthday gets stuck in an epic Los Angeles traffic jam. "D-FENS", a victim of the divorce industry and recently unemployed, snaps from stress. He walks away from his car and suffers one indignity after another. Instead of taking it, he fights back. Naturally, the police get involved, and the stage is set for the final tragedy.

It's a decent look at the quiet desperation of the early 1990s. A recession was going on, though small potatoes compared to the latest. The LA riots were in recent memory. Other destructive trends were afoot, the final results only a few could begin to predict.

The spin: This did strike a chord for those disliking these trends, being put down constantly by the leftist establishment, and being told the country our forefathers built doesn't belong to us. (These days, even establishment conservatives tell us to go to hell, just like sneering leftists.) Liberal reviewers noted the "angry White male" theme with displeasure.

Unfortunately, the message is that we indeed must take one indignity after another, and we'd better sit down and shut up about it:

> D-FENS: I'm the bad guy?
>
> Policeman: Yeah.
>
> D-FENS: How'd that happen? I did everything they told me to. Did you know I build missiles? I helped to protect America. You should be rewarded for that, but instead they give it to the plastic surgeons. You know they lied to me.
>
> Policeman: Is that what this is about? You're angry because you got lied to? Is that why my chicken dinner is drying out in the oven? Hey, they lie to everyone. They lie to the fish. But that doesn't give you any special right to do what you did today.

The one bright spot is that the policeman defers retirement, contrary to his overbearing wife's wishes. He stands up for what's important, and succeeds. Still, it's not enough to redeem the movie.

Dude, the ham and cheese womlette and whammy fries ain't that important!

The final take: Unfortunately, the filmmakers depicted D-FENS as a nut, rather than a rational person badgered too far. Most of the things D-FENS gets aggro about are unimportant, such as inflated prices and the breakfast menu ending.

Further ensuring it didn't encourage those with "wrong" beliefs, the filmmakers inserted a scene with a whacky military surplus store owner, straight from the Central Casting department specializing in rednecks with green teeth. (I can imagine the wheels turning in their heads—"We don't want to give 'those types' encouragement, do we? If we don't fix this, we'll never get invited to another Oscars celebration!") Every cause has its oddballs, and I've known a good number both on the left and the right (actually, the left is nuttier, and smelly), but not quite like the caricatured store owner.

The resistance theme is there, but it's pretty thin gruel. You can't leave it to Hollyweird to play this sort of movie straight. Aspiring independent filmmakers should take note.

Demolition Man

Cops in 2032 are literally pushovers. This bad guy's got style!

The premise: After a hostage situation goes dreadfully wrong, a cop is convicted of manslaughter and placed into a cryo-penitentiary where—while in deep freeze—he's subjected to subliminal propaganda to reprogram his mind. In 2032—thirty six years later—the bad guy escapes and the cop is thawed out to deal with him. The present-day police are too inept; they haven't had a "murder death kill" in ages.

Culture shock is a big element; everything is tranquil, but dreadfully boring. For a few examples: the oldies station just plays old commercials; sex is telepathic interactive cyber-porn; profanity is fined with robotic efficiency similar to traffic cameras; foods that are "bad for you" (including salt, meat, chocolate, and spicy foods) are illegal. Other than that, cameras everywhere monitor the citizens.

The spin: This one was quite intentionally satirical. Showing a disgustingly nice world was a big "take that" to those complaining about violent movies. It's a brilliant send-up of nanny state political correctness run amok.

The film made its point quite effectively. It included many shout-outs to Brave New World, which everyone should read. Orwell's 1984 depicted a future of unremitting brutality, but Huxley's classic currently describes better where we're headed. It's a shallow existence of mindless hedonism with the "bread and circuses" approach to control the public. With a few advances in biotechnology, Brave New World is entirely possible.

The final take: The subversive theme is played 100% straight. Demolition Man's society would look awesome to all the tofu-addicted, genderfluid, psych med munching crybabies graduating from collegiate Social Justice Warrior indoctrination centers every year. However, that describes merely a fraction of what they think the world should be; only scratching the surface of the SJW agenda.

Much science fiction, as well as dystopian literature, extrapolates present-day trends into the future. It often—but not always—seems dated later on. (It's 2017; where's my damn hovercar? I've had fun with this concept in my own stories.) Fifteen years from now, how much will our society resemble Demolition Man? Most people in 2002 would've found today's degradation hard to imagine. If the public in 1987 knew what was in store and who was behind it, they would've taken decisive measures.

Accurately extrapolating trends is difficult. The current trajectory is 80% Brave New World and 20% 1984, though the "carrot to stick" ratio could reverse. Perhaps by 2032, civilization might hang by a thread. Alternatively, a massive backlash will emerge and depose the society-wrecking regressive left. Like I keep saying, the future is what we make it.

Read More: 7 Mainstream Movies With Subversive Themes That Slipped Under The Radar

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Journalists Ask Stupid Questions To Push Their Narrative And Conceal The Truth

May 26, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

The other day, I was going about my business in the gym when I heard something on the TV that stuck in my ears like a sharp knife: I heard a journalist ask an intelligent question to Donald Trump. I paused for a moment to hear his answer, as it was something I was actually curious about. I quickly discovered the source of my confusion. This reporter was a foreign journalist, not the White House press corps.

I made it a rule years ago to get my domestic news from foreign sources. While it does not rule out bias, and there is the ever-present problem of unreported news, or lies of omission and distortion, the foreign press has little skin in the game, and far less of a reason to lie than the local press does. Of course, globalism is changing all that, but for the time being it remains true.

The converse is also true. I hold CNN International in high regard, and if I am outside America, would turn to them to find out what is going on around the world. CNN still has the most news bureau stations worldwide, and the international edition is a completely separate network from its domestic propaganda arm.

Case in point: I was abroad when US General Stanley McChrystal was fired for speaking his mind and making critical comments about his bosses, including President Obama. The foreign CNN International reported this as a "sacking," but when I returned home, domestic media including CNN all said the general had resigned. You know, to spend more time with his family.

Foreign publications such as The Guardian have published exposes on fraud and political malfeasance by Greg Palast (American investigative journalist living in the UK) as well as being instrumental in the Edward Snowden revelations. Russia Today has revealed important facts about Syria and the Ukraine that the domestic press does not want to discuss. And Justin D Martin, a journalist currently working in Qatar, regularly publishes interesting stories not covered by the domestic press.

The White House Press Corps: Fools In Action

For years, I have been unable to watch a White House Press briefing without becoming angered at the level of stupidity and wasted opportunities to question the powerful. The journalists typically ask questions whose answers are self-evident and only serve as softball setups for the propagandist press secretary to answer with a mouth full of blabbery nothingness.

A cab driver could both ask and answer questions more honestly and genuinely than either party at a press briefing. One need only look at the presidential town hall debates, where the audience members asked relevant questions, as compared to the formal debates where journalists had crafted questions for the candidates. This begs the question: If you can't ask a better question than Ken Bone, why are you a professional journalist?

The domestic press's main tool of distortion is not outright lying, but distortion and omission. And they do so not just in their reporting, failing to cover stories entirely, as detailed in the 2004 book Into The Buzzsaw, which documents spiked stories and censorship, but by reporting only pieces without the crucial context or explanation.

A great example is how the media NEVER asks WHY are there so many refugees in the wake of the Syrian war (Lauren Southern investigates and has trouble finding any actual Syrians in a refugee camp). Instead, time after time, as violent crimes are committed by outsiders, the answer is a vague "Islam is responsible" instead of tracing the problem back to the ongoing Syrian war and the West's complicity in supporting the violent extremist rebels, a common theme of US foreign policy which results in mayhem and destruction on all sides.

Journalists regularly squander the opportunity to ask important questions to powerful figures. I have theorized that the American public would be better served by replacing the entire press corps with a random array of men off the street. The quality of questions would be higher, and the off-topic rambling answers would not be tolerated by your typical plain spoken, ~~working~~ unemployed American.

Testing The Theory: Roosh's 2016 Press Conference

When the unwashed masses ask more intelligent questions than trained professional journalists, there is a serious problem. To test this theory, I reviewed Roosh's press conference from one year ago, where journalists who had chosen to come to the Washington D.C. press conference to cover the story of the meetups that were labeled by the mainstream media as "rape clubs" had the opportunity to ask questions of Roosh directly. Let's look at the 35 choice questions they wasted everyone's time with.

Before we begin, think of ONE question you would ask Roosh, off the top of your head, and see how it compares to the quality of questions asked.

“Why do you think people think of you as a rapist?”

Really? We’re here at a press conference about the media calling the meetups “rape events,” and you JUST sat through Roosh’s speech dressing down the media for lying and slandering. And THIS is the question you still have?

Obviously, people believe this only because YOU in the media TOLD them so! Could anyone still be unclear about this? Kudos for Roosh maintaining frame after this idiotic question.

“Do you acknowledge that some of your writing is offensive?”

Almost any intelligent piece of writing can be found offensive by someone. The obvious answer is yes, some people probably are offended at something. What a stupid question.

“Do you consider yourself a victim?”

Who really cares what word is used to label the target of a media assassination? This is the typical media gotcha question. It sounds important, but ultimately it’s utterly meaningless as one can draw no important conclusions from any possible answer. If Roosh thought he was a victim, or didn’t, what implication at all does that have on the story?

“Do you have any regrets about your publishing?”

Semi-interesting question. Hindsight is always 20/20, and so one can wonder if, knowing what we know now, one would take a different action. But of course it’s an utterly meaningless question because no one is omnipotent. What’s done is done—you live and learn.

Even if one made a mistake and later regretted it, or didn’t, how does that matter to anyone, outside the self-improvement for that person himself? Roosh does address this later, stating simply “You have taken me from here [and raised me higher], based on a lie. I’d rather you not have done that, but it happened, and that is life.”

There are no takebacks. Life 101.

“Why did you write it originally?”

That’s fairly obvious if one read the article in question. Stupid question.

“If a woman got raped, did she do something wrong?”

Well, that would depend entirely on the woman and the circumstances, wouldn’t it? In some circumstances, this would be true, and in others false. Stupid question.

And one can do right or wrong things, without justifying extreme consequences happening to them. If I forget to turn off the gas on my stove, I did something wrong. That doesn't mean I deserve for my apartment to explode in flames. But it's a potential result of my negligence.

"What was the thought experiment specifically?"

Again, obvious if one took five minutes to read the article. These journalists took hours out of their day to cover this story, and physically traveled to the press conference in a hotel, but apparently failed to read the subject they were writing about.

"Can you break down the crux of your argument?"

Ha ha ha. Can you read?

"You made a suggestion in this article that was what?"

It's obvious in the title alone, if the article is too difficult to read. How can you be a journalist if you can't report on things without having them explained to you?

"Is this like a multi-year point though? What about Return of Kings?"

What about it? There are many ideas presented here. They are presented by different authors and in different contexts to provide arguments and ideas. What the hell are you asking? This is the kind of pseudo-psychological thinking the press likes to practice. Let's assume all the writers here agreed we were cooperating like the Borg to make a larger hive-mind point about society. What is the implication of that? It's an open-ended question without a conclusion.

Is the mainstream press making a multi-year point? Why do so many of your articles talk about (((feminism)))?

"The outrage isn't only about that one article. A lot of people find it offensive that you write about women being submissive. Is that something you believe?"

Compound questions are a linguistic tool used to distort the other party's answer. This one gets bonus points for at least displaying nominal skill. Are you asking if people are making an opportunistic attack based on preconceived hatred of Roosh, and that this "rape" story is only a ruse to attack him?

Or are you asking if Roosh believes women are submissive?

Or are you asking if women should be submissive?

The journalist can spin the answer in whichever way is most condemning. And all three of those questions are pointless. What Roosh thinks about the motivations of a mass group of journalists is his subjective reaction to a bunch of individuals with different motivations, all spreading the same lie.

You are the media, why don't you tell us where the outrage originated, or why you personally felt outraged enough to copy and paste a hateful article, instead of asking Roosh to speculate on your motivations?

"What's your justification for why you believe women should be submissive?"

Here we have a second halfway decent question, but a wild tangent from the topic at hand, and not a question that can be adequately addressed in this forum (that's what this site and this one are for).

"People reading your works would say that you raped a woman if you had sex with her when she was drunk. You literally say they were too intoxicated to consent."

Not a question. I know no one who believes that having sex with a drunk woman is akin to raping her. There are people who believe that. They are crazy. What is the question?

"Some absurd unintelligible question about a golf course."

Roosh has no idea what he is talking about, and no one has any idea how this is an insightful question.

"What are your personal politics?"

Mildly interesting, but I generally don't care about the politics of non-politicians. ROK is including more political content so this could be justified. Of course, many prefer to keep their politics to themselves, and I wouldn't tell any journalist what my politics are. In a two party system, there are only imperfect answers, anyway.

"Do you regret threatening to dox protestors?"

Typical framing of falsehoods in question form. Do you regret beating your wife? It's also a ridiculous question, even if the premise were true. Can anyone imagine an answer other than yes? It's absurd.

Do you regret distorting the facts about our meetup groups as pro-rape events? That's an answer I'd actually like to hear! Are you sorry you got it wrong and labeled thousands of men rapists?

"Some stupid questions about whether Roosh lives with his mom and who owns the house he was doxxed at."

How any of this is relevant is beyond me. Here you have the opportunity to talk about a man with interesting and different ideas and you want to talk about where he is sleeping.

"What else has happened lately? Did you receive dozens of pizzas? Are your parents home? Where do you office out of?"

Office is not a verb. And seriously. What is the journalistic content of any of this? You people should be interviewing the Kardashians for the Hollywood Reporter. This is not a gossip column or a discussion of what Roosh's favorite coffee is.

“Can you confirm that you had to upgrade your website security?”

Boring. As. Fuck. No one cares about this. Can you imagine pitching a story based on this to your editor? Hey this guy we accused of starting a pro-rape group had to improve his internet servers to handle increased traffic lately. Isn’t that fascinating? Maybe we can bring in a technical writer to talk about how many web pages per second the average server can deliver, and have an artist sketch up a rendering of the path internet traffic takes to a viewer’s PC.

I hope you’re now convinced that the quality of journalism can easily be measured from the quality of questioning that takes place. Without asking the right questions, how can you begin to uncover the facts, which is supposed to be what journalism is about? Whether you want to attribute the cause to hiring retards or a deliberate plan of obfuscation, it’s clear that the American media is no longer fulfilling its duty of informing the public.

Read Next: Australian Media That Defamed Roosh Inks Landmark Deal With Chinese Ministry Of Propaganda

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

The 21 Theses Of Alt Christianity

May 26, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

In recent years, the Alt-Right—along with the Alt-West, Alt-Lite, and the Hard Right—has come to the forefront of the political scene. This has been due in large part because right-leaning individuals have come to realize just how ineffective standard "conservatives" are at battling the Left. And given the left-leaning socio-cultural changes that have swept the West under the guardianship of standard conservatives, it is quite understandable that many young traditionalists have gravitated to a political alternative like the Alt-Right.

But just as with modern conservativism, the same sorts of problems exist for modern Christianity. Indeed, under the "watchful" eye of standard conservative Christians, Christianity in the West has become more liberal, more feminized, more Churchian, and entirely less Christian! As such, is it any wonder that many Christian men are leaving Christian churches and are searching for an alternative to the weak-kneed Churchianity that they see around them. Of course not. But is there any Christian alternative to be had? Indeed there is, and it is called Alt-Christianity.

What is Alt-Christianity? In one sense, Alt-Christianity is a new way of looking at Christianity; it is a new Christian mindset, if you will. And as we know from fitness and game, changing one's mindset is often the key change that needs to be made for exponential personal development and growth. At the same time, Alt-Christianity also aims to be a means by which orthodox Christianity could be revived amongst men in the West. And since traditional Christianity is a pillar of Western Civilization, the importance of this goal can be overstated.

Now, in terms of its general tenets, Alt-Christianity can be summarized by the following 21 points (and note that these points were largely inspired by Vox Day's 16 Points concerning the Alt-Right):

1. Both theologically and morally, Alt-Christianity is traditionalist and right-leaning. It is also more focused on shared morality and mere-Christianity than on denominational differences. However, Progressive-Christianity, Liberal-Christianity, and Feminist-Christianity are not Alt-Christianity.

2. Alt-Christianity is an alternative to the mainstream Christian conservative movement in the West which has, whether wittingly or not, been largely infected with strains of progressivism, materialism, feminism, SJWism, over-ecumenism, and Churchianism. Alt-Christianity has seen the socio-cultural results of these infections on the Christian faith and thus pro-actively and overtly fights against them, rather than ignoring, accommodating, or even indulging them, which many modern Christian movements do. And the fight against these problems is done first within the church, and then against them outside of the church.

3. Alt-Christianity is not defensive in nature and, just like Christ, it rejects the elevation of niceness, tolerance, and likeability over Christian truth. It holds an "initiative-maintaining" mindset and believes in victory through persistence, sacrifice, materialistic minimalism, and remaining in harmony with objective reality, historical truths, and psychological/biological facts about human nature.

4. Alt-Christianity firmly believes in the use of reason; however, since Alt-Christianity knows that men are not usually moved by dry arguments, it is also willing to use truth-focused polemics, biting rhetoric, humorous memes, and imaginative narratives to make it points.

5. Concerning faith and morals, Alt-Christianity is skeptical of any attempts to redefine the clear sayings, implications, and example of Christ and the rest of the New Testament, or Christian tradition, in order to accommodate modern sensibilities.

6. Alt-Christianity recognizes that all men are made in the image of God and that all men will be judged, but beyond this, Alt-Christianity rejects the idea of earthly equality for all practical purposes given the observable lack of anything like natural equality existing or possibly existing amongst men. For the same reason, Alt-Christianity denies human perfectibility and earthly utopianism.

7. Alt-Christianity believes traditional Western Civilization is the best civilization that Man has ever created. It also holds that traditional Christianity is a key pillar of that civilization. As such, Alt-Christianity supports the roots of traditionalist Christianity: namely, the traditional family, patriarchy, “red-pill” knowledge, Christian education, and apologetics in the full and broadest sense.

8. Given the above, Alt-Christianity wishes to see traditional Western Civilization maintained, and is thus open to whatever political system shows itself best suited to the maintenance of that civilization. At the same time, Alt-Christianity realizes that civilizations and nations are maintained by people, and that not all people are created equal. As such, Alt-Christianity supports the implementation of whatever specific political and cultural practices are best suited to allow a particular people to maintain traditional Western Civilization. Simultaneously, Alt-Christianity supports restricting whatever specific political and cultural practices undermine a particular people's ability to maintain traditional Western Civilization.

9. Alt-Christianity is nationalistic. It supports the right of all distinct ethno-ideological/religious groups to exist as distinct groups, and to defend their existence. Alt-Christianity is also anti-globalist in the political sense, but believes in unity amongst nations through a shared Christian faith. Ultimately, Alt-Christianity remembers the lesson of the Tower of Babel and realizes that ethno-states are a lesser threat to Christianity than a global political entity is.

10. Alt-Christianity see no conflict between science and Christianity, but it is not naïve enough to ignore the fact that there is a difference between certain scientific claims and the interpretation of scientists—many of them actively anti-Christian—concerning those claims. Thus, Alt-Christianity takes an attitude of tentative acceptance, coupled with skepticism, concerning the findings of modern science, especially those of a historical rather than an experimental nature.

11. Alt-Christianity believes that identity—both in the ethnic and the religious sense—is the catalyst for culture, which is itself more important than politics. As such, the Alt-Christian is both verbally and non-verbally overt in his Christian identity.

12. Alt-Christianity is opposed to the unrequested rule, domination, or excessive influence (by any means) of any ethnic and/or religious group or Christian denomination over another; as such, Alt-Christianity supports the right of de facto or de jure self-determination / segregation for ethnic and/or religious reasons.

13. Alt-Christianity is more interested in the approval of God than of men; it knows that the Prince of this World is its enemy and that, as Jesus warned, the world will hate it. Thus, the Alt-Christian is not interested in being “respectable” in the eyes of non-Christians, nor does the Alt-Christian care about the negative labels that non-Christians will inevitability place on him.

14. Alt-Christianity is opposed to the separation of church and state in an absolute sense, for Alt-Christianity understands that the absolute separation of church and state always leads to the state, and/or the enemies of the church, using the resources and laws of the state to undermine the church.

15. Alt-Christianity is more interested in the Faith than in earthly charity, although it strongly encourages the latter because it is mandated by, and supports, the former. However, the Alt-Christian knows that charity begins first at home, and only then extends outward. Furthermore, virtue-signaling charity is a vice, and so whoever allows his own family, his nation, and the Faith itself to be undermined for the sake of virtue-signaling charity is worse than an unbeliever.

LET THE CRUSADE BEGIN

16. Alt-Christianity is pro-“capitalism” in terms of policy, but pro-socialist in terms of personal charity; it holds that a man who freely does not work, but can, shall not eat, but a man who wishes to work but cannot, shall not be hungry.

17. Alt-Christianity believes that we must secure the existence of Christians in general, but that we must also specifically secure the existence of Christians in countries of European heritage and ancestry, for as Belloc said: “Europe is the Faith, and the Faith is Europe”.

18. Alt-Christianity believes that Christianity is true, but it also sees truth and value in other religions. As such, while holding Christianity as the best and most complete faith, and boldly proclaiming it as such, Alt-Christianity does not, in principle, ignore or reject the insights of non-Christian religious or cultural traditions.

19. Alt-Christianity believes in evangelism. However, the Alt-Christian remembers to wipe the dust off his feet from those who, in full knowledge and Godly-freedom, reject Christianity. Thus, Alt-Christianity rejects the non-evangelism of liberal-Christianity as well as any imperialist attempts at the imposition of Christianity by force or coercion.

20. Alt-Christianity values personal strength, intellectual boldness, masculinity, and the Christ who overturned tables. Indeed, Alt-Christianity realizes that Christ was not followed because He allowed Himself to die, but rather because He was the ultimate alpha male who conquered Man's greatest enemy: namely, death.

21. Finally, just as the man Jesus Christ and his male Apostles led the first Christians, so too is Alt-Christianity meant to be led by men. After all, the failures of the West ultimately fall on the heads of its men, and so it is men that must lead the West back to its traditional roots.

Now, will embracing these 21 tenets of Alt-Christianity reverse the slide of orthodox Christianity in the West? Frankly, I do not know. But I do know that making the mindset change to Alt-Christianity is surely better than continuing the ineffective tactics of the past few generations.

Read More: Why You Should Avoid The Cucked Interpretations Of Modern Christianity

Damian Michael

R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

As Western Democracy Descends Into Tyranny, Plato's Republic Becomes More Relevant Than Ever

May 26, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

It is sometimes said that originality is overrated. Many of those who claim to be original are actually borrowing someone else's ideas or, at best, developing what has been "in the air" for a while. Or, more often than not, "original" thinkers develop ideas from premises they are not fully aware of and seem strangely surprised when they reach a logical yet unsettling conclusion.

Joseph de Maistre, a contemporary critic of the French Revolution, claimed that we were blinded by a "gross sophism": being only able to see effects or to reach causes with difficulty, we would judge by such standards men of antique times "who saw effects into their causes." Indeed, when one reads the works of antique thinkers, whether politicians or philosophers, one cannot believe for long in the antique-times-is-man's-childhood narrative, which seem to have appeared between the eighteenth and nineteenth century and is consistent with the progressive view but should be considered, to say it politely, highly doubtful.

Plato's Republic, a ten-book block of dense text, stands out as one of the classic works that are so rich they never seem to lose their relevance. Reading some of it anew, I was surprised to find a resemblance of the mentality many how-to-get-rich books foster, of modern individualism and of what seems unbearably like Marxist class struggle. Did Plato "see the effects in their causes"? Whatever the answer, he delineated a process moderns did not learn from.

How even a “perfect city” turns into an oligarchy

The bulk of the Republic deals with the “perfect constitution” or “perfect city.” As a pre-Hellenic Greek, Plato thought in terms of free cities rather than country, kingdom or empire, and his view of perfection remains local-scaled—which, as we will see, hardly changes a thing. The perfect city has a caste order that follows the priests-warriors-producers tripartition and is led by philosopher-kings, who are also able to contemplate eternal truths and master a wide range of knowledge including astrology.

After Plato went through the features of his ideal order, he asks through his mouthpiece Socrates how the city or political being may decay. “Clearly,” he says, “all political changes originate in divisions of the actual governing power; a government which is united, however small, cannot be moved.” (545d)

Corruption, and perhaps change in general, can only arise through discord between at least two factions. This will happen because of a mixture between the “races” of different castes—say, of the “golden race” of philosophers with the “bronze race” of merchants—that will create confusion, lack of sound judgment, and antagonisms. These will creep in and unfold progressively.

Aristocracy, the government of the best in the etymological sense, and the initially legitimate caste organization, degenerates in timocracy. The products of a mixture, timocrats are men who look for honours, recognition, and also wealth. They appreciate art and respect other free men, but are excessively harsh against slaves and inferior castes. Close from aristocrats, still virtuous and able to carry on many hardships, timocrats “lack purity” (549b). After they show great courage and military sense in their youth, they turn into wealth-hoarders with age. Dominated by their desires, creating envy and resentment because of their private hoarding, timocrats end up forgetting virtue and fostering enemies.

Timocracy, this close surrogate of aristocracy and equilibrated caste system, may triumph against all external foes thanks to the virile tendencies of its upper class. Still, it shows unable to deal with the internal enemy. An able man who takes the lead of a perilous expedition, even if he wins, may be hauled off to trial, berated by cowardly and envious sycophants who will take advantage of the least shortcoming to attack him (553a-b). The city starts punishing virtue and rewarding its soft underbelly. When sycophants win, the able and virtuous back away, not unlike the potential wealth creators under a State that punishes success.

Plato also mentions the role of women fanning the flames of rivalry. A virtuous man fulfills his own vocation, thus quietly benefiting the whole city, far from the noisy political show. This man has a wife and a son: the wife, always wanting for a "better" or higher-status mate—Plato knew about hypergamy—keeps complaining that her husband is not part of the governing group or of the top wealth bracket.

> Further, when she sees her husband not very eager about money, and instead of battling and railing in the law courts or assembly, taking whatever happens to him quietly; and when she observes that his thoughts always centre in himself… she is annoyed, and says to her son that his father is only half a man and far too easy-going: adding all the other complaints about her own ill-treatment which women are so fond of rehearsing. Yes, said Adeimantus, they give us plenty of them, and their complaints are so like themselves. (549d-e)

Interestingly, the stimulation of rivalry by women is part of a wider trend. People admire those who succeed in a ruthless political competition, especially when they meddle with other people's legitimate business, whereas those who mind with their own are looked down upon (550a). Growing under such circumstances, more stimulated by these rows than by contemplating the higher levels of being the original aristocracy knew, the youth become busy running after honours or money—and here come hypocrisy, treachery, Machiavellianism and a loss of identification between the individual and the city.

When timocrats see how badly treated they are when they show brave and collective-minded actions, they fall back on their private wealth hoarding.

> The accumulation of gold in the treasury of private individuals is the ruin of timocracy; they invent illegal modes of expenditure; for what do they or their wives care about the law? And then one, seeing another grow rich, seeks to rival him, and thus the great mass of the citizens become lovers of money. (550d-e)

This looks very much like Frédéric Bastiat's famous "everyone wants to live off the State and the State lives off everyone." Classical liberals want to believe the problem comes from the State, but in truth, it is just a means; the deeper root comes from the will to live off others, whether through usury, exploitation, rent-seeking or public funding.

Plato's remarks about oligarchs also seem to be echoed by works like Robert Kiyosaki's Rich dad, poor dad. The latter advises individuals who want to get rich to be frugal, aware of short-term passions, bias and desires so that they don't get dominated by them, and industrious—all this so that they can have at other people wasting their money, then buying real estate and living off someone else's rent.

> And so they grow richer and richer, and the more they think of making a fortune the less they think of virtue; for when riches and virtue are placed together in the scales of the balance, the one always rises as the other falls. (550e)

Your money works, as Kiyosaki says, because other people work it, other people pay for your capital, and if you want to get rich, you'd better spot the opportunities to grow a capital and make some pay for it.

This predatory policy makes some people richer and richer and the rest, poorer. "In an oligarchic city, almost everyone but the upper class is a beggar" (552e). The so-called middle class, today, is made of such beggars who depend from a big company and SJW-managed reputation for their income.

Furthering their interests, seasoned oligarchs are hypocrites who maintain an austere, focused, mostly self-mastered life but encourage others, especially the young, to spend foolishly and drown into debt. "They want to lend with a heavy interest so that [if the creditor defaults] they can seize their goods, be even richer and even more appreciated." (555c) Ah, the sweet perfume of foreclosures!

From oligarchy to democracy… and tyranny

By monopolizing many assets and turning the majority of their fellows into proles, the oligarchs create a major split. "Such a city won't be one, but two: a city of poor and a city of rich, living in the same place and constantly conspiring against each other" (551d). The exploited youth, who awake to the grim reality of their own poverty, indebtedness, and lack of perspective, deeply resent the rich—especially those who feel they have a vocation but can't realize it because all opportunities waned out.

The analogy between the two-city divide and the Marxist class struggle is too close to happen for chance, especially considering how classical liberalism and the industrial revolution happened first in modern times. We can see in passing that class opposition, far from being “the motor of history”, is the pathological product of an advanced stage in a degeneracy process.

Plato’s times weren’t ripe for hard-Left classism. Where a modern Marxist would have seen the “last stage of capitalism” before a classless society, Plato foresees the advent of democracy. The latter come when the oligarchs fail to repress or control a resentful majority: close wars, especially, are a good situation for exploited citizens, who notice how numerous and powerful they are against a few fat cats who sweat under the expensive armor.

Once they are able to unite, the exploited will take away the power, dispossess and banish the oligarchs, and establish an elective democracy. Here Plato refers implicitly to his own city, Athens, where many of the responsibilities were not voted but drawn by lot (557a).

Plato’s democracy looks strangely modern, not to say libertarian, whether in the right or the left sense. “In the democratic city, people can do whatever they want… everyone can arrange his own lifestyle at will.” (557b) To a superficial onlooker, this city is the most vibrant and the coolest: it looks like an “embroidered robe”, is full of individuals from various places, and works like a “bazaar” where political constitutions are on sale. People there do not need to assume any responsibility, can avoid draft, are free to pursue pleasure in their private setups, and so on. “Is this not a supremely delightful way of life, at least as long as it stands?” (558a)

Living an easy, luxurious life, the democratic people will lack any sense of discipline. Those who should not be equal—say, the immature students, the slaves, the women—will start fancying themselves so, behaving like responsible grownups, and jostle. Doesn’t that remind you the apparently puzzling evolution of 60s-70s “sexual emancipation” into the repressive, grievous, perpetually offended mindset of today SJWs?

At least timocracy and oligarchy were led by able, disciplined, competent men. Timocrats and oligarchs were clearly imperfect, yet they retained some greatness in them. Democrat men, in contrast, are mostly mediocre gratification-seekers and coward conformists. 60s-70s democracy becomes tyranny, the last form of government to spring up, thanks to the individuals’ self-chosen isolation and cowardice. Clearly, Plato would not be much surprised that the “tolerant” “free speech” apologists of the 60s led to a rigid Leftist dictatorship.

So what?

Nowadays, Plato's Republic is taught every year in philosophy and political sciences classes. Even then, it looks like most students fail to glean any lessons from it, much less meditate it. Upper middle class female students likely prefer to "study" flattering material or dumb courses that mostly reflect contemporary entertainment "culture" than potentially ego-shattering truths.

What Plato describes here is a slippery slope. Each step leads to the following one because it fulfills specific conditions and creates a particular context where the latter can spring up. If Plato's oligarchs were able to limit their own greed, perhaps the city would never degenerate into an anomic democracy (pleonasm?). If democrats didn't spoil their youth by letting them turn into safe space-seeking crybullies, perhaps SJWness and tyranny would never appear.

Many lessons can be gleaned from the Republic. For now, I would say that the first one is we ought to struggle to become the aristocracy. Not merely in the superficial sense of a high status, but of building solid characters, virtues, abilities, and good habits. Money matters too, of course, but then we should look for it for personal independence and taking away the globalists' power—not as a mean for idiotic pleasures that actually lead to dependence. Plato's own example of the future oligarch's self-mastery retains much relevance. As the author of another Republic titled book, Jean Bodin, would say, "true wealth lies in men." The rest is secondary.

Read Next: What Plato's Allegory Of The Cave Teaches Men

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Why The Manchester Terrorist Attack Will Change Nothing

May 27, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I did a video discussing the recent terrorist attack in Manchester, UK…

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them on the blog.

Previous Video: Men Who Cold Approach Women Should Be Proud Of Themselves

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Just Another Day In The Life Of An Aging Modern Woman

May 28, 2017 | by Frederick Barbarossa | Link | Original Link

Lonely Lara sat on her hands in the middle of August, watching the couples with their babies and carriages stroll by. Toddlers chased each other in innocent bliss, a blissfulness that was but a blurry image in her mind, so that it more resembled a mirage. She looked at a father holding the hand of his daughter. She hated him.

Lara came to this park alone, as a sort of tribute to her misery. For almost a year, she would sit on this bench and indulge in masochistic envy and self-loathing. She brought a bag from work along filled with fresh paperwork to be completed in the coming week and clutched it to her bosom.

Once, two little girls had sat beside Lonely Lara for a brief respite. The smaller of the two was eating ice cream and looking intently at her. After a good bit of time, Lara finally returned her gaze and smiled, but the little girl only continued to look curiously, as if at a foreign object. Lara's eyes had to hold back tears, and she hurried away to find a different bench. She always wore sunglasses to the park after that day.

Lara liked to put herself in the shoes of the mothers passing by and humor the thought of raising her own children with a man. There was an undeniable romanticism about it, but she would quickly scold herself for imagining it was anything less than capitulation. What did those women really achieve? How fulfilling is a life subordinate to a husband?

Lara watched in disgust as a man kissed his wife and donned a lazy smile. His wife looked back with admiration. She is no better than cattle. There is no freedom in a marriage. What would I be without my work? The same headlines filled Lonely Lara's head when sitting on this bench – headlines printed on the narrative of her life beginning in college.

Loading…

Lonely Lara told herself she wasn't lonely. She had her work friends and a reading club she enjoyed every Wednesday. Her home wasn't so empty thanks to two feline companions. Of course, things had been better when her parents were alive. It provided an excuse to see her sister, who seemed to only have enough time for her own children these days. She could visit, but being in her home with loud kids frustrated Lara. The only communication she had with her sister now was the occasional chat on the phone.

When the sun begins to set, Lara strolls back to her apartment only a few blocks away. When she arrives, Simon, the favorite of her two cats, greets her and demands food. Perry only comes running once he hears the jingle of the food bag. Lonely Lara then sits beside a large window in the living room which overseas the city. The ant-like people walking below give her a vague sense of company. Virginia Woolf, one of her favorite authors, had become a popular topic of discussion in her reading club, and she was excited by the opportunity to read her books a third time through.

Lonely Lara found that reading Woolf novels brought her back to her college days, when her worldview was shaped and made robust by inspiring female professors whom she kept in touch with long after exiting university. When she graduated with a sociology degree, her ideas about the patriarchal environment surrounding her were further cemented by the fact that work was nowhere to be had. This economy was designed to suit men alone. Her gravest concerns were vindicated when she applied for a marketing position only to be rejected in favor of a man whom she viewed as far less qualified than herself. Everything is a battle for a woman in this society. There are no freebies unless you are a man.

No bout of nostalgia was ever unaccompanied by memories of her time in the social scene around campus, where Lonely Lara used her female allure to make men yield to her whims. I owned them. All of her escapades blended into a singular event by which she was the master and men the desperate subordinates. However, Lara never felt a greater sense of conflict between shame and pride when these memories arose, and this juxtaposition of apparent triumph and inescapable humiliation made her dwelling on this period very short.

Lonely Lara went to bed more awake than she was in the day, lying on her back as if the ceiling was a powerful fixation. She twiddled her thumbs and took a deep breath that fizzled into a soft whimper. The alarm was set for the following workday, where she would resume her fulfilling career.

“Goodnight, Simon. Goodnight, Perry,” Lonely Lara said.

I am a strong, independent woman. I am a strong, independent woman. I am a strong, independent woman…

Read More: Don’t Be A Host For Parasitic Women

Frederick Barbarossa

Frederick Barbarossa did not die according to legend, but went into a prolonged slumber so that he could one day restore Germany to its former glory. Upon awakening, however, he has seen that his efforts cannot be reserved for Germany alone, and has set out to bring tradition and identity back to Western civilization.

Nelson Mandela Has Left A Legacy Of Utter Failure In South Africa

May 28, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Most people believe Nelson Mandela was jailed simply for being a dissident. Actually, he orchestrated a full-scale bombing campaign. The music scene brought him to international celebrity status; a testament to the effectiveness of media power. The government offered to release him if he renounced violence, but he refused.

Despite all this, he received an obscene number of awards and honors because of obsequious virtue signaling. (Did Ted Kaczynski ever get an honorary degree or have a street named after him? How about Timothy McVeigh?) If all that wasn't enough, the Robben Island prison where Mandela stayed became a World Heritage Site.

Mandela's Communist beliefs

Winnie and Nelson Mandela by their friend Joe Slovo, South African Communist Party leader

It's well known that Mandela was a leader of the African National Congress, ostensibly a social democratic party advocating peaceful change. It's less well known that the ANC is allied with the South African Communist Party and the Congress of South African Trade Unions, and its paramilitary arm was Mandela's terrorist organization Umkhonto we Sizwe. Few are aware even now that this avuncular teddy bear, later to become the President of South Africa, was a closet Communist. Mandela passed the "duck test" with flying colors, but that's not all.

Recently I discovered a treasure trove of documentation about Communism, and in it is a manuscript called "How to be a good Communist". Much like Antonio Gramsci, Mandela made use of his prison time to write in support of his cause. Here's what Mandela promised:

> Communists fight for a world where there will be no unemployment, no poverty and starvation, disease and ignorance. […]
>
> Under a Communist Party Government South Africa will become a land of milk and honey. Political, economic and social rights will cease to be enjoyed by Whites only. They will be shared equally by Whites and Non-Whites. There will be enough land and houses for all. There will be no unemployment, starvation and disease.
>
> Workers will earn decent wages; transport will be cheap and education free. There will be no pass laws, no influx control, no Police raids for passes and poll tax, and Africans, Europeans, Coloureds and Indians will live in racial peace and perfect equality.
>
> The victory of Socialism in the U.S.S.R., in the Peoples Republic of China, in Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland and Rumania, where the living conditions of the people were in many respects similar and even worse than ours, proves that we too can achieve this important goal.

Actually, I found it to be a pretty good primer on Communist theory, at least from their perspective. However, Mandela's knowledge of actual conditions in Warsaw Pact nations and Mao's China was a bit sketchy. Let's see how things worked out after Mandela became President in 1994 and had the opportunity to implement his ideas.

First, a very brief history

Most victims of the modern educational system believe the evil Dutch and British conquered South Africa and took away all the farms, roads, mines, hospitals, factories, and skyscrapers from the peace-loving Zulus. Then they implemented apartheid to be a bunch of dicks. The truth is a little different.

The Dutch Cape Colony was established in 1652. Upon arrival, they found a very sparsely populated land. The few inhabitants were the San and Khoikhoi (then called Bushmen and Hottentots). The various Bantu-speaking tribes arriving later from the north were as genetically different from them as American Indians and East Asians. So, the now-majority Zulu, Ndebele, Xhosa, and kindred peoples were not there first, contrary to popular opinion. The first Bantu contact with the Dutch-descended Afrikaners occurred around 1770.

South Africa became a pretty rough neighborhood. The Bantu presence greatly expanded over the years. In 1816, Shaka Zulu assumed rule over his tribe and became the African version of Genghis Khan. That certainly wasn't the last of intertribal warfare. Eventually most of the original Khoisan population was slaughtered or absorbed. Blacks and Whites fought too, most famously with the British-Zulu conflict. During the early days, British colonial interests clashed with the Afrikaners, eventually leading to the Boer Wars, the second ending in 1902. After that, open warfare ceased, though low-level conflicts still occurred.

The Black population increased dramatically, thanks to cessation of constant warfare and access to Western medicine. During the 1940s, Blacks became a majority, eventually greatly surpassing the White population. The British instituted apartheid, involving segregation. Less well known is that it also promoted sovereignty for tribal homelands, which would've been a positive development if carried to fruition.

Colonialism gradually ended; the European powers were exhausted by WWII, and the ideological climate was changing. Many African governments became brutal kleptocratic regimes, often with Marxist leanings. Infrastructure began crumbling, and Western aid often fattened the bank accounts of the dictators, or was misused (most notably with Ethiopia). This is one reason why Africa is still a mess. Immigrants flooded South Africa; they considered living under apartheid better than kleptocratic misrule. It was Africa's only First World country, and its best ordered, despite its unpopular regime.

South Africa declared independence from Britain in 1960, but still under White control. In 1965, Rhodesia followed suit, but granted voting rights to everyone following guerrilla warfare and international sanctions. Then Rhodesia, renamed Zimbabwe, became another Marxist-flavored kleptocracy, led by terrorist Robert Mugabe since 1980. In 1991,

South Africa abolished apartheid. In 1993, they held a referendum, and the Whites (apparently suffering from a short memory) extended voting rights to a hostile majority population.

The ANC's rise and the failure of Mandela

Res ipse loquitur.

Unsurprisingly, Nelson Mandela won the 1994 election, as practically demanded by "international opinion". Afterward, the ANC won every election since then. Let's see how Mandela's predictions of eradicating social problems turned out, after he assumed power and the ANC (still allied with the Communist Party) got a permanent tenure.

Unemployment:* During the early 1990s, unemployment was a steady 16%. That would've been lower without international sanctions; that hurt the common people. In 1996, unemployment spiked up, reaching 29% in 2003. Official figures are about 25% for the last few years. This wasn't an improvement. Inflation is way up too, worse than Carter's or Obama's stagflation.

Other than that, racial preferences in employment didn't end with apartheid; rather, they switched direction. (Who would've ever guessed that?) This duplicity is the same racial spoils system as America's Affirmative Action, though far worse in South Africa.

Poverty:* Now, large numbers of Whites who had been capably running things are unemployable (see above) and reduced to shocking poverty. As for the Blacks, a small number have become wealthy, but most are no better off than before.

Starvation:* South Africa exports grain to the continent's hungry masses, but perhaps not for long. One aspect of the horrifying post-apartheid crime wave is attacks on White farmers. Exactly the same thing happened after Rhodesia, once considered the "breadbasket of Africa", elected Robert Mugabe. Other than that, because of the dysfunctional economy (see above), one in four South Africans are chronically hungry.

Disease:* South Africa suffers terribly from the AIDS epidemic. It didn't help that Mandela, and some other highly-placed officials, didn't believe the long-established fact that AIDS is a communicable disease caused by HIV. This is one reason why South Africa's life expectancy fell by seven years. Many believe that having sex with a virgin cures AIDS; the obvious results of this superstition are too disgusting to describe.

Other than that, the world's second largest hospital is in Soweto—Mandela's old neighborhood—built by those evil British. In 1997, it was renamed the Chris Hani Baragwanath Hospital, after a martyred South African Communist Party leader.

Ignorance:* Things are going badly with the educational system:

> For example, the 2007 South and Eastern Africa Consortium for Monitoring Educational Quality showed that only 32% of Grade 6 maths teachers in South Africa had desirable subject knowledge…

Further, schools are horrifically violent.

In summary

Mandela didn't attempt to create a Socialist paradise—perhaps getting sensible in old age—but he certainly adopted the race-baiting features of cultural Marxism and its subversion script. This is quite dangerous for all citizens where the group having by far the best track record of running an orderly country has become a minority. He had his chance to deliver on his golden promises, but instead made everything worse. Further ANC rule continued worsening everything. Some believe an engineered crisis and mass slaughter might happen soon.

Let's stop the madness. Since the presence of Whites in Africa is so intolerable, and Africans in Europe aren't getting along so well, they can trade populations. Whites in South Africa (and Rhodesian holdouts) must no longer be presented with barriers to emigrating to Europe, and Blacks in Europe (chiefly Britain and France) will go to South Africa where they can live in peace and harmony with their brethren.

Unfortunately, this is too sensible for politicians to consider. If warfare erupts, will European governments let in Afrikaners and British South Africans like they are doing with Syrian refugees? I think we all know the answer to that one.

Read More: The Traditional West Is Man's Best Civilization

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How To Complete The Front Lever Maneuver

May 28, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

In learning the fundamental gymnastic holds, you have already learned the complete progression of the back lever, and half of the front lever progression. And now, you will learn to complete the front lever. As usual, the progressive steps will involve gradually lengthening the legs until you have fully extended in the manner of the featured image.

And so without further ado…the last three steps.

The Advanced One Leg Tuck Lever

Recalling that the last step you should have mastered was the one leg front lever (in which one leg was straight and fully extended from the hip and the other leg was tucked to the torso), this similar step involves extending the "tucked" leg a little bit further.

So begin with the inverted straight hang, and lower yourself down as you did with the previous step. Extend one leg fully, straightening out the hip as you did before. However, instead of tucking the back leg as far back as it can possibly go, place the foot parallel with the extended leg's knee, and then lower yourself into the hold position. I find it helpful to actually put the back foot on the knee, but be sure not to force that extended leg and hip downwards!

Of course, you alternate legs, and when you can do both legs for 10 seconds, move on.

The Front Straddle Lever

If you will recall the back lever progression, there was an optional step you could do called the straddle lever, in which you took some of the pressure off your muscles by splitting the legs as wide as possible while doing the back lever.

This is similar, but unlike the back lever I feel the front lever is benefited more with a straddle step. As usual, hit the inverted straight hang (perhaps you're noticing how important it is for all these progressions), but then split your legs as wide as you possibly can, and lower yourself into it. You will feel that there is more strain upon you than the previous step, but the straddle posture reduces some of the stress, and thus it is a good intermediate for the more difficult steps.

The Half Front Lever

Another front lever progressive step that is similar to an equivalent back lever progression, the half front lever is the next to last step in the front lever series. As the name of this step implies, it involves the hips and thighs being fully extended, but the knees being bent.

Hit the inverted straight hang, keep the back, hips and thighs straight, but bend at the knees, making sure to keep the legs tight and together. Then lower yourself into that position. For many trainees, the half front lever marks the spot of an enormous jump in difficulty. This makes sense, as it is the step immediately before the front lever. From here, the trainee straightens out his legs a little more each time, gradually increasing the difficulty of this movement.

The True Front Lever

And here it is, the nigh-mythical front lever. As you can imagine, this technique is very difficult—I myself am still in between the half front lever and the true front lever.

Presumably, there are two ways to go about doing this: either you can hit the half front lever (with straight hips and legs, but bent knees) and then “open” your knees and straighten out into a front lever, or you can hit the inverted straight hang and then lower yourself into a front lever. Whichever one you choose will depend on a number of factors, notably what sort of apparatus you are utilizing. For example, my pull-up bar is built over a door frame, and thus it’s a bit difficult to lower from an inverted straight hang due to the door jamb getting in the way.

However you do it, realize that this is very difficult, and much like the true back lever, it will take you a while to accomplish. In doing so, you will make your core both much more aesthetically pleasing, and much more functionally strong, than the core and abdomen of your average gymgoer.

From here, you can attempt even more difficult variations of the front lever such as the “ice cream maker” or even the one-handed front lever. But considering how long it took me to get this far, don’t expect to see those for a while.

Read More: How To Complete The Back Lever

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

5 Reasons Why You Should Ditch Your Smartphone

May 29, 2017 | by Antonio Alessandro | Link | Original Link

I recently ditched my fancy Samsung smartphone for a basic Alcatel that performs calls, texts and would essentially survive a 100ft fall off a building. But why? Smartphones make things easier, improve our lives, and give us instant access to pretty much everything we want and need. There are actually quite a few benefits to ditching your smarthphone…

1. You become more efficient

Making The Most Of Your Time

I regularly notice at work the vast number of colleagues whipping their phones out to look at the latest notification and engage in pointless small talk on WhatsApp or Facebook

Messenger. They could instead be working better, harder, and more efficiently on the current project or promotion they are chasing.

Let us also consider the entrepreneur, or business man. How can anyone run the best business possible by wasting our time scrolling through rubbish on our smartphones? Simply put, smartphones steal our efficiency, our attention, and our time, which could be spent more productively on our work, our business, or our general life goals.

Now instead of reaching habitually for my pocket, I have zero interruptions other than important texts or calls. If I want to access Facebook or email, I do so from my own laptop which doesn't update me constantly and rob my attention on a moments basis

2. You quit a serious addiction

A Commonly Seen Gathering Of Zombies

As you may notice just walking down the street, at work, in the family home, or out to dinner (this is my least favorite), people can't seem to put their smartphones down. It seems to be an extra limb for them that they can't let go. They reach obsessively for their pocket and mentally drooling at the thought of any new notifications or news.

There is plenty of evidence that tools like the smartphone affect the levels of dopamine in the brain – a key neurotransmitter which is involved in addiction formation. In addition to this, one process which makes addiction even stronger is the phenomenon known as "intermittent rewards". Rats (which have remarkably similar brain structures to us) enjoyed random different rewards vastly more than the exact same big reward every time – in other words they enjoyed the stimulation from novelty. This explains why gambling, gaming, and pornography can be so addictive. Smartphones aren't much different.

If you don't think you are addicted, you're not alone. I never thought I was. This is because we are contact users and never stop. How can you know if you are addicted or not if you never try to stop? See how your brain reacts if you spend a day without it.

3. You improve your social skills

Giving Her The Right Eye Contact

When people use their smartphones constantly, they are unwittingly training their neuroplastic brains to become less socially effective. By avoiding daily interactions face to face and increasingly using text and a screen to communicate, we become weaker socially and even experience heightened social anxiety when we do have to communicate.

Now that I'm without a smartphone, I'm naturally more confident and welcome in-person social interaction. I've become smoother and wittier in my conversations with men and girls I want to flirt with. I can longer turn to the addictive familiarity of my electronic screen whenever I feel bored or uncertain in public. Which leads me onto reason four…

4. You patience and focus improves

Winning At Work

When I had my old smartphone, I used to pull it out and read something, anything, whenever I felt uncertain, bored or uneasy in public. It was my go to drug – a filler to plug my time.

Whilst this one was tough to get used to, it has undoubtedly been very beneficial for me. In ditching my smartphone my attention span has improved exponentially. Indeed I don't believe I would have ever written an article for Return Of Kings despite loving the site and its material. Just sitting here and voluntarily spending my time thinking hard to write an article of value would have been too much for me. Why work on anything when you can browse your smartphone? Why be patient when you can look at want you want NOW on demand.

The smartphone breeds an expectation for instant gratification which, while great in the moment, spills over into the rest of your life and diminishes the amount of patience and focus you have for other things.

5. You'll be pushed into positive activities

I used to spend a great deal of my time sitting at home and flicking through my smartphone. It was easy, fun and satisfying. So why give that up, you might ask?

Since throwing my smartphone in a public trash can, I have been forced to come up with positive ways to entertain myself and fill my time. Whether that is going to the gym, going out to social events, being productive, playing guitar or simply heading out of the house, I now cannot fall back on my smartphone as a boredom cushion. This is doing wonders for my life, I am getting better at all of the activities I mentioned and feel as if I am rising above the average person on the street in improving myself as a man.

As you might've thought already, this has actually helped me meet women in person. Being without a smartphone has got me talking to women than ever before.

Conclusion

Smartphones have their place in the world, but if you want to maximize your chances of being productive, effective, happy, and the best version of yourself, I believe those chances are massively increased when you ditch the vampire that is your smartphone.

If you don't want to be as extreme as me then why not just ditch it for a shorter period so you can see some of the positive benefits yourself? If anything, it will confirm how addicted (or not) you are, so you can evaluate for yourself how beneficial it would be to quit or at least greatly reduce your usage.

I have been asked by my friends why I didn't just reduce my own usage instead of throwing away my entire handset. My answer is that discipline does not have to sit on the edge of temptation. I was heavily addicted to my smartphone, but no longer.

Read More: Is Your Smartphone Cock Blocking You?

Antonio Alessandro
Young traditionalist, nationalist sick to death of our modern degenerate, feminist, gynocentric culture. Huge fan of neomasculinity, self-improvement and self reliance.

Feminists Are Fighting Masculinity With Masculinity

May 29, 2017 | by Narmer Bull | Link | Original Link

Over the past two weeks random crimes were weaved into an already established media narrative and a new social media campaign was born: #Men are Trash. It's now shameful to be a man. We look like sex crazed maniacs, and we should feel bad. That's the latest feminist siren song enslaving schools of South Africans.

> #MenAreTrash has been gaining huge traction on local social media over the last few weeks, at one point it was even trending number 1 on South African twitter. So what is this #? "Men are Trash", for some it's easy to read that phrase and label it an "attack on all men". But one has to then ask themselves, what is a personal attack and what's a necessary wake-up call.

According to the idea motivating this movement, man is the manifestation of villainy and violence. But if we are all that this tag suggests, why does feminist identity and behaviour involve blatant attempts to enter the masculine sphere of identity? If their cause is so anti-male, why can they only express their ideas through borrowed masculine traits? Are they trying to become the men they are so averse to?

Answer: They are trying to look powerful. They are trying to display wisdom. They are trying to appear strong and aggressive. They they doing this because power, or their conception of it, happens to be apprehended in masculine iconography. To understand their conception of power, I examined a few ancient figures who have become iconic vehicles for feminist cultural expression.

They Have A Phallocentric Conceptual Ideal

The revival of She who Consecrates a Phallus.

Their rhetoric bypasses Jesus's ladylike mother in favour of her pagan predecessor, Horus's mother, Isis. Today, this ancient goddess is synonymous with feminist branding and ideology. As an icon of girl-power, she is superficially inspiring but Isis has more influence on their identity than they would want to openly acknowledge.

It’s generally accepted that, unlike other cultures of the ancient near east, Egyptian women occupied a social role of complete equality with men. So it’s strange that the power of this mother goddess could only be imagined through a man’s role in a phallocentric myth.

Her story is this: her husband is emasculated through castration. Her intensely obsessive attachment to his manhood compels her to commit acts of fetishism and necrophilia. That is to say, she creates and magically animates a replica of his phallus which she proceeds to mount in order to conceive. Diodorus of Sicily (80-20 BC) wrote: “fashioning a likeness of it, she set it up in the temples, commanded that it be honoured, and made it the object of the highest regard and reverence in the mystic rites and sacrifices accorded to the gods.”

Having performed the sexual act on her own, Isis’s power is expressed by her playing the dominant role of a man in the sacred union. This, she proudly states in the Glorification of Osiris: “I have played the part of a man though I am a woman.”

Isis as a kite in union with a dead Osiris.

They Have A Masculine Historical Ideal

Nefertiti in her influential role as a wife and mother.

The queens of the 18th Dynasty — Tiye, Hatshepsut and Nefertiti — are the most frequently referenced in feminist rhetoric, especially when African heritage needs to be validated and profited from. These three women reigned during Egypt's age of empire. The state was wealthy, cosmopolitan and characterized by the abandoning of its old ways.

Tiye and Nefertiti were women of influence and recent theories contend that they were co-regents. Hatshepsut did rule, spending most of her reign extracting resources from the soft target that was Nubia. All three derived their power and influence from their roles as the mothers and wives of kings. But at various points they decided to supplement their public image by representing themselves in masculine form and roles. This was done to legitimize their leadership capabilities.

So even though these feminist antecedents were among the wealthiest and most powerful people in their country's most prosperous period, they still found their feminine form restrictive, most likely because an ancient ruler's physical appearance would have to meet the public's expectation of safety and security. Smiting the enemy or agents of chaos is the most familiar Egyptian iconographic motif. It's a traditionally male military activity, thereby making the title of pharaoh a traditionally male title.

The Bearded form of Hatshepsut trying to placate national security concerns.

The mighty smiting queen is not just an idea of limited scope, it's also based entirely on deception. These three had no significant military successes. They were basically imitations of a core foundational element of Egyptian culture. In the case of Tiye and Nefertiti, one would expect the mother and wife of the great religious and artistic revolutionary, Akhenaten, to at least be more creative with a lie than this heavy dependence on an established masculine tradition.

In resorting to masculine depictions and war motifs for the sake of a social equality that already existed, all three only reduced the inherent power they had as wives and mothers.

Conclusion

Men may be cast as the violent villain of the feminist narrative, but the reason why power seems inherent to masculine imagery is that significant cultural achievements exist to validate these symbols.

The image of a leader who took a small population to high culture in a short period of time.

Negative campaigns like Men are Trash, and the conveniently coincidental Hollywood release of Wonder Woman this summer are just dramatic overcompensations for a glaring lack of significant achievement, a fact that feminists are painfully aware of. This is not a value judgment, it's just women's history, where the best is always yet to come.

The image of having usurped Bombaata's position in Conan the Destroyer.

In their effort to recreate the feminine form as a masculine phenotype, there is the sincere acknowledgment that power can only exist in broad-shouldered and warlike imagery. They are thoughtlessly going back in the direction of patriarchy while trying to cast themselves in their villain's role.

A redundant accessory to her power, but wonder woman's phallic symbol is required for her to usurp the Man of Steel's position in the DC pantheon.

As it has before, the pendulum will swing back from its current extreme. In the meantime, display the confidence that only your original form can possess in a world that is now full of poor imitations.

Read More: 5 Huge Problems That 50 Years Of Feminism Created

Narmer Bull
A coloured South African, and student of the ancient near east.

The Life And Work Of Horror Writer H.P. Lovecraft

May 29, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

H.P. Lovecraft is now recognized as perhaps the most influential horror writer of the twentieth century. Yet this recognition was a long time in coming. During his life he labored away in near complete obscurity, his work appearing only in obscure pulp horror magazines, to be consumed by only the most ardent fans of the genre. His death at the age of 46 was nearly unnoticed; but his devoted fans kept alive the spirit of his works, and he would eventually be recognized as a titan of horror.

A psychologist reviewing the facts of his early life would find fertile ground for analysis. He was born in Rhode Island in 1890, the son of parents who could trace their ancestry in New England back to the colonial era. Yet this genealogy had seen better days; the family was not poor, but neither were they especially well-heeled. Mental illness seems to have hovered over the household, and this likely formed the source of Lovecraft's later fascination with decadence, decay, and insanity. His father was confined to a mental institution in 1893 for an apparent psychotic breakdown.

The boy found escape in reading and the delights of imaginative thought. He showed a budding literary ability from an early age, but he seems to have been developmentally crippled by his overbearing and domineering mother, who never encouraged him to take risks.

Youthful illnesses did little to help the situation, providing his mother with excuses to keep him firmly under her control. A series of family and personal problems meant he never officially graduated from high school: his mother suffered chronic shortages of money, and he himself endured an unspecified nervous breakdown in 1908. His mother was eventually committed to a mental institution in 1919. It is not difficult to understand the later preoccupations with madness and decay that appear in his stories.

In appearance he was pale, gaunt, and socially awkward. Yet in his mind were growing ideas that would revolutionize not just horror fiction, but fiction as a whole. His first story was published in 1916, and this would be followed by years of submissions to pulp horror magazines.

His first efforts were somewhat derivative, and little more than imitations of Poe. But gradually he would find his own distinctive voice. It is not a simple matter to describe H.P. Lovecraft to those unfamiliar with his work; but there are certain recurring themes. These are: ancient evils lurking below the surfaces of things; decay and ruin hovering over old New England towns; ancient extraterrestrial beings hidden in obscure parts of the world; and the idea that humanity is utterly insignificant when placed against the vast cosmic forces arrayed against him.

In a letter written to the editor of Weird Tales magazine in 1927, Lovecraft described how he saw his writing:

> Now all my tales are based on the fundamental premise that common human laws and interests and emotions have no validity or significance in the vast cosmos-at-large…To achieve the essence of real externality, whether of time or space or dimension, one must forget that such things as organic life, good and evil, love and hate, and all such local attributes of a negligent and temporary race called mankind, have any existence at all.

With a succession of brilliantly imaginative tales that mixed horror, science fiction, and fantasy (e.g., “The Call of Cthulhu,” “The Colour Out of Space,” “The Dunwich Horror,” “The Shadow Out of Time”), Lovecraft created a weird cosmology that had its own logic and followed its own laws. Central to this mythos was the idea that a race of monstrous extraterrestrial beings had once visited the Earth and ruled over it in remote antiquity. Eventually, this race would return to bring the world once again under its sway.

Lovecraft had a distinctive style that cannot be mistaken for anyone else. Proud of his old New England heritage, he made a point of using British archaisms in spelling (even going so far as to prefer “publick” to “public”). His language was frequently florid (“eldritch” was a favorite word); but it could be argued that his style was suitable for the atmosphere of horror that he sought to create. Many of his stories featured frenzied narrators (with whom the reader was meant to identify) who find themselves bewildered by the events transpiring around them. The horrific “payoff” would always come at the very end of the tale, when the narrator (and reader) would be hit with some shocking revelation. The technique is a time-tested one, and it works.

Lovecraft’s adult life was as dogged by tragedy as was his youth. He married a reasonably wealthy divorcee named in 1924 named Sonia Greene, and the couple moved to New York City. He continued his literary activities, but was never able to achieve financial security with writing. Perhaps as result of his childhood traumas, he lacked the discipline and willpower to promote his work as much as he could have. During his life only one book of his fiction was published, and even this was a very limited printing. But he was generous and kind, frequently corresponding with many young writers and offering them valuable suggestions on how to improve their skills.

His final years were characterized by financial decline and isolation. In the early 1930s he was divorced, a fact that cut off his primary means of support. A small inheritance from his mother was also gradually depleted; unable or unwilling to take up any other work besides writing, he became increasingly pressed by hardships. He developed intestinal cancer in 1937 and died that same year. The literary world took no notice of his death, just as the death of Herman Melville had had been ignored.

It was his readers who kept his memory alive. Despite his complete obscurity outside of the horror fiction “community,” he had earned a devoted cadre of admirers. They understood the literary merit of his work and constantly promoted it by republishing his stories or imitating his distinctive themes.

In Lovecraft’s day, literary critics did not believe that horror fiction could be a serious vehicle of literary expression; but as the decades passed, this view would change. It is now recognized that Lovecraft was an extremely influential voice who was, perhaps, so far ahead of his time that his contemporaries lost sight of him. Stephen King has called him the greatest horror writer of the twentieth century; even French writer Michel Houellebecq wrote a book of literary criticism about him.

The best way to experience Lovecraft is to buy a collection of his tales and read them. Savor the weird imagery, the fantastic sounding names ("Yog-Sothoth," "Cthulhu," etc.), and the oppressive sense of dread. And remember that despite his crossed and unhappy life, Lovecraft found his own way to use his literary talents to transcend his limitations and his environment, and achieve immortality. He found liberation in horror, and his sufferings were redeemed by his art.

Read More: The Genesis Of Dracula

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

This Fundamental Assumption Helps You Succeed With More Women

May 29, 2017 | by Avery Hayden | Link | Original Link

Men who have enviable dating lives all share a fundamental assumption about women. These men assume most women want to sleep with them. Unfortunately, although they wouldn't admit it (even to themselves), most men believe the opposite; that women do not find them sexually attractive. This unconscious belief makes men feel unentitled to take the risks necessary to have success with women.

Put bluntly, you might be preventing yourself from having success with women because of a belief you don't know you have. This article is going to help you realize whether you have this toxic belief, and show you how to replace it with its opposite: the fundamental assumption that will get you laid.

Awareness is the cure

Changing your beliefs about yourself isn't easy because a negative mindset is the psychological equivalent to cancer: the host doesn't know it's destroying itself. Becoming aware of this is intrinsically difficult because you'd have to admit that a part of you isn't really you, but a cancer. To change your mindset, you must notice your own negative thinking, question your insecurities, and doubt your own self-doubt.

If your body were to become aware that it had cancer, your immune system would easily snuff it out, the same is true for a negative mindset. Awareness of your own self-destructive beliefs is the cure.

Many men just don't believe that girls want to fuck them, and this causes them to shoot themselves in the foot whenever they have an opportunity with a woman.

The 'She Doesn't Want Me' Treadmill

The outcome I expected the first time I leaned into kiss a girl.

Take me for example. A few years ago, I went on several dates with a girl who I thought was way out of my league. On the third date, I made a romantic gesture to win her over. At the end of our date, I hesitated, and took a deep breath before pulling out a bouquet of flowers from the trunk of my car.

I said, "I thought you might like these" (thinking I was being smooth). There was a long, awkward pause. She said, "Oh that's really sweet, thank you. But I have to go now." She then briskly walked away from me and into her home. I never saw her again.

A few months later, a girl I worked with asked me on a date. We went out five or six times; we went to the park, the library, got high together, and on one fateful night she suggested that we watch a movie at my place. I enthusiastically agreed.
We were watching a movie in my bed, and she started massaging me. She had me lie down and kneaded my entire body, eventually, she had me turn over so that she was on top of me in a cowgirl position. At this moment, I said, "Let's get back to the movie." She gave up at this point and we ended up sleeping, fully clothed, side-by-side. The morning after she said, "Well, that's not what I expected. See ya."

These are both stories of last dates because I was on the 'she doesn't want me' treadmill, I kept going on dates and putting in effort to getting more success with women, but because I didn't believe these women were interested in me sexually, I didn't get anywhere. No matter how many dates I went on.

I had a fundamental assumption that women shouldn't be attracted to me (without knowing it). I was insecure enough that I didn't make a move on these dates because I needed undeniable proof that they wanted me to.

Even when a girl massaged my entire body I wasn't convinced she wanted me to make something happen, there was still room for doubt, so I kept waiting for further proof of her interest. In hindsight, it's obvious these girls were attracted to me, but they needed me to be a man and take a risk.

Pragmatic Narcissism

Men who are successful with women fundamentally assume women find them attractive. This may seem narcissistic and delusional, but it's a useful delusion that leaves room for risk taking (and by extension, results). On the other hand, delusionally believing you're unattractive is negative in a way that leaves room only for self-sabotage.

(As a side-note, expecting girls to be attracted to you doesn't mean that you can't take no for an answer, it means that you are willing to take the risks that could lead to a no.)

The first step to developing this positive narcissism is counterintuitive: you must confront the possibility that you have negative beliefs that are holding you back. Accepting the possibility that you have beliefs about your attractiveness that may be negatively affecting your actions and results is difficult. But once you do, the problem finally becomes something you can control, and therefore, overcome.

The only way out is through. To change your beliefs you must proactively take risks that normally only a man who assumes he is fundamentally attractive to women would take. This means putting yourself directly at risk for rejection by women (leaning in for the kiss, asking for the number, attempting the pull).

This is the first crucial step, yet most men never take it because their beliefs about their lack of attractiveness feel so real. If you think that you don't have enough money, the right body, or the right personality type to attract women, it's easy to see this perceived disadvantage as an insurmountable obstacle (women aren't going to start making moves on you anytime soon after all). By default, you will maintain your negative beliefs about yourself indefinitely.

You can easily shoot yourself in the foot when you have opportunities with women if you don't believe you are fundamentally attractive (like I did in the above anecdotes), then you will reinforce this belief because you didn't end up getting the girl. You can easily interpret these missed opportunities as further evidence that you are in fact correct about your self-evaluation that you are not sexually desirable to attractive women. It's a nasty self-fulfilling prophecy that happens outside of our conscious awareness.

The Power of Doubt

In your dating life (or any part of your social life), there is a sort of breadcrumb trail of neurotic and insecure emotions that you can follow. Your negative emotions feel like they're telling you to avoid something, but in reality, they're telling you exactly what you need to do. This means that if the notion of going out to meet women on a regular basis provokes anxiety, then do it: if getting rejected frightens you, then ask women out: pain points to the way forward.

The hardest part of this process is admitting that you're holding yourself back and avoiding taking the right actions. It's so easy to come up with excuses; you can tell yourself that you need to build more social skills before approaching more women, or that you need to wait to get your career handled, or you need to finish sculpting that six pack (don't get me wrong, those things definitely help, a lot, but they can easily turn into procrastination).

It's never going to be easy to admit that your emotional resistance is due to very real insecurities that you have. Understand this: changing your results is impossible without facing doubt and emotional resistance.

Wherever you experience resistance, you must question your assumptions about what that resistance means, this opens up room for you to doubt your current beliefs, which then entitles you to take risks that will disprove your negative mindset. Once you're aware of what's holding you back, your excuses lose their meaning. Therefore, you empower yourself to change.

The further you lean into your emotional resistance through risk-taking, the more you will find experiential proof that the resistance was based on unnecessary beliefs you had about yourself, not objective reality.

Within the context of success with women, the more you put yourself at a real risk of rejection (as a rule, to count as a rejection, she has to actually tell you no. Otherwise, you didn't really get rejected, you just rejected yourself), the more you will get evidence that a good number of women would very much enjoy the opportunity to fuck you.

Although you will find it hard to believe at first, over time, you will develop the fundamental assumption that women do find you attractive. This new assumption will entitle you to take more risks, which will then get you more results with women, which will then lead you to believe women find you even more sexually attractive. It's a powerful self-fulfilling prophecy that will take place outside of your conscious awareness.

With that said, go forth, chat up some stunners, get rejected a lot, succeed occasionally; and in so doing let go of and replace the unnecessary beliefs that were holding you back.

Read More: 8 Tips For Getting Laid More By Developing Your Sexual Presence

Avery Hayden
After years of video game addiction Avery decided he'd replace Night Elves with living, breathing women. After approaching thousands of women and getting a degree in psychology, he put both skillsets to use with his website, Red Pill Theory , which offers dating advice with a scientific edge. You can also check out his books Zero Fucks Givenand The Trial: Transform Your Dating Life in Eight Weeks on Amazon with the above links.

8 Ways To Live A Virtuous Life In The Modern Age

May 30, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

If there is anything in philosophy that can unite Western men, whether they worship God or not, it is the classic virtues found in the writings of Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and in Christianity (many of these do also overlap Oriental philosophy, such as Confucianism, Taoism and Buddhism).

Although there is no complete consensus with regard to what the main cardinal virtues are, and where to draw the line between the greater and lesser ones, many can agree that prudence (or wisdom), diligence, patience, temperance, courage, justice and magnanimity are at the top of the list.

With these virtues as a point of departure, I intend to inspire both younger and older men, regardless of specific beliefs, by discussing some ways to concretize and incarnate these under current circumstances. Although some may be less relevant for a number of readers, I sincerely hope that at least half of them conform to everyone who reads this article. It can also be regarded as a complement to my earlier take on holistic lifestyle advice.

1. Natural bodybuilding (prudence, diligence, patience, and temperance)

Natural bodybuilding signifies a lifestyle characterized by diligence, patience, temperance, and—believe it or not—prudence. After the initial two years of remarkable results, one has to fight long and hard in the gym to gradually improve one's physique, in conjunction with proper nutrition and recovery.

Therefore in order to gain progress it is significant to keep grinding, be patient, and not expect any large results. During a cutting phase it is also of chief importance to eat a moderate amount of calories, and decrease carbohydrates and energy-dense foods.

Additionally, one does also need prudence to understand physiological and metabolic processes linked to this pursuit. It does not require any deeper scientific knowledge, but wisdom is still important. That includes the balance between training, eating and recovery.

2. Traveling (courage, patience, prudence, and temperance)

Is travel only linked to hedonistic pleasure and mindless self-indulgence? I believe there is more to it. Firstly, to go on a trip on your own, for weeks or months, implies that one needs to be somewhat courageous. With high-quality infrastructure put in place in manifold locations around the globe, it has become easier and safer than ever to go around, but if one really wants to push the limits, whether physically or mentally, it often requires that one takes risks.

For instance, one should probably aim for to make some new acquaintances and/or hook-up with girls from completely different cultures, and pass through some danger zones here and there. With regard to the latter, calculation of risk is often involved, which requires prudence.

Additionally, the process which underlies traveling, namely to save money, hinges upon patience and temperance. To have the private economy in check is alpha and (not) omega in this respect.

3. Cold approaching (courage and magnanimity)

As Roosh correctly has emphasized, men who cold approach females should be proud of themselves. Obviously there is seldom any physical risk involved in running game of this sort, but mentally it requires a certain degree of inner courage.

Furthermore the process is linked to another classic virtue, magnanimity. Since the risk of getting rejected is involved in pretty much all approaches, it takes a great man and a great mind to handle the defeat, move on, not be put down, and try again (or to be too excited after success).

If one takes this crucial dimension into account, it is fair to say that game has got an undeserved bad reputation. Actually in some ways it can be quite virtuous.

4. Reading (diligence and patience)

In a digitalized society, attention spans get shorter and people read few books, especially ones that are extensive and demanding. For the sake of obtaining valuable information and knowledge, books are nevertheless a necessary tool to educate oneself.

Additionally, to read is to put one's diligence and patience to the test. To read hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of pages takes time and requires hard work.

5. Charity (generosity, prudence, magnanimity and justice)

Charity today can be linked to real or potentially negative phenomena such as globalist philanthropy, mass migration, leftist equality religion, and misguided foreign aid.

Nevertheless, the wise man knows how to disentangle proper from improper charity, starting from the basis of self, family, tribe, nation, Western civilization, other friendly civilizations, and the world within a framework of concentric circles, and also taking justice into account. Not everyone deserves charity.

From an appropriate position, charity is a concrete and excellent means to contribute to society and to manifest magnanimity.

6. Self-defense (prudence, courage and justice)

Concentric circles can also be linked to how to properly defend oneself from enemies and intruders. Without being the least belligerent at heart, any real man must take into account the sword of Damocles which is civil unrest and various criminal activities and take action to make necessary precautions.

Thus he needs to learn self-defense without a gun, as well as to learn how to use a gun. Like charity, not everyone deserves one's self-sacrificing inclination, but those who do must be able to count on you, so that at least you do everything that is within your might to prevent bad things from happening.

In this regard, courage, prudence, and justice are the main virtues to be considered. Correspondingly, not everyone deserves to get shot so make sure to direct eventual violence at those who are real threats.

7. Make an escape plan (prudence, diligence and patience)

If things become too bad in one’s home country, or at least at the particular place where one dwells, then international or intranational migration may be the only choice.

To make a historical parallel to my home country, Sweden, many bachelors left for America when severe crop failures occurred in the 1860s. Perhaps American and Swedes (alongside Frenchmen and Brits) may have to join each other and move to Australia if militant Jihadists encroach to the extent that it becomes difficult to protect one’s family.

To really carry through with an escape plan one needs both wisdom, savings, and an idea of where to go. Thus prudence, patience and diligence underlie such an effort.

8. Have children (prudence, patience, diligence, courage and generosity)

Demography can be tricky and it is far from easy to find a balance between quality and quantity. Under current circumstances, however, like wise and frequent ROK commenter GhostOfJefferson recently stressed, every good man should have multiple kids and change society from the basis of oneself and family rather than to hope for particular politics and policies.

At this point I only know very well how to make babies, not how to actually raise them. Still it appears as if it requires prudence, courage, diligence and patience. It also is an act of generosity to grant society with one's descendants who contribute to a larger cause.

Conclusion

The problem with virtues is that they tend to be abstract. Therefore it is crucial to concretize these and connect them to one's general lifestyle. Althought these do not conform to every man in every stage of his life, several are still applicable throughout large parts of it.

Read More: The Four Cardinal Virtues

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

What Does The Globalist Establishment Have In Store For The Human Species?

May 30, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Once a mighty wolf, canis familiaris now performs tricks and begs for his master only 10,000 years after selective breeding began. How many generations will it take to domesticate man for his masters?

There's little doubt social engineering is taking place in the Western world. The elite, using their government servants and the power of their infinitely deep pockets are attempting to mold mankind to fit their vision of the future.

Using B.F. Skinner's principles of reinforcement and punishment, a micromanaged world is being developed in which almost no part of a human's life is not controlled by corporate or government policy from cradle to grave. The parts of human lives that aren't managed on the corporate plantation will be managed by the nanny state via an oppressive government.

Part and parcel of this plan is stripping men of their wives and children, a process already well advanced in America and Europe. The next steps will include taking control of human reproduction altogether through the "vaccine" narrative and soon, licensing to have children. (This is why the news media constantly rail on moms and dads with "bad parenting" stories.)

Astonishingly, I saw an ex-Navy veteran calling for licensing Americans to become parents of his own volition as he linked to a "bad parenting" story last week. I had long expected to see this happen, but was astonished to actually see what I had long predicted come up on my Facebook News Feed.

Just as wolves were domesticated into dogs, the elite are attempting to “break” mankind and turn men into their personal servants. This has been the aim of those in power since time immemorial, molding the masses to serve them, but never before did they have the scientific and psychological knowledge to manipulate mankind into loving its own slavery. As Skinner wrote:

> If freedom is a requisite for human happiness, then all that’s necessary is to provide the illusion of freedom.

One only need drive around America, as I did for Memorial Day weekend, to see what a police state this nation has become and what a mirage freedom is. As I made my way down from New England to the Midwest, it was truly shocking to see both civilians and truckers pulled over left and right by police, filching pocketbooks.

It seems modern Americans love their freedom, as long as their freedom isn’t breaking any laws. What a contradiction.

What freedoms do we have left?

Shopping, eating out, and football. The illusion of choice – meaningless choice at that. So, just as wolves became Chihuahuas through selective breeding, it’s becoming clear the goals of the elite are 1) to blend all ethnic differences out of mankind and 2) to make us more docile and pliable to their commands through endless rules, regulations, and policies at school, work, and in daily life.

This process of using reinforcement and punishment will create “standardized” human beings:

> When one looks at what world governments are doing to the human population in the modern age, pushing “diversity” as a means of mixing out differences in our species to ultimately only destroy true diversity in the human genome, one must wonder what other agendas are being pushed. The problem goes well beyond creating a “standardized” human being through sheer sexual force.
>
> Modern Western governments also use B.F. Skinner’s principles of operant conditioning to help transform man into the equivalent of docile human livestock existing only to produce profit on the corporate plantation and government tax farm.
>
> So, what is operant conditioning? Simply, it’s any procedure that delivers reinforcement to an organism according to some well-defined rule. It is what The Matrix refers to as “a prison for your mind.” The almighty state which creates the prison for our minds operates on two simple principles: reinforcement and punishment.

There are two distinct possibilities for what will happen to mankind once this process advances. The first is extinction.

Extinction

Once humans have been purged of sexual emotion, will we follow over 99% of other species to extinction?

Personally, I feel extinction is the most likely scenario. The odds are already set against us in that well over 99% of all species that have ever lived on earth have gone extinct. We could easily become the next evolutionary cul-de-sac.

Once the human species is crippled by enough successive generations of social engineering it will not breed well and the psychopathic greed of the elite will completely destroy humanity. There will never be enough money or power for those who run the world, no matter how many compromises we make.

Look at where their schemes have already led us in the West. A dying, weakened white race. Androgynous men and women who increasingly look like each other rather than exhibiting sexual dimorphism. Increasingly miserable people who drug themselves with both illegal and legal substances to try and fill the psychological void created by a society in which the nuclear family is a distant relic and people are taught to compete rather than cooperate with each other in order to climb higher on some meaningless socioeconomic pyramid. Childless, manly women. Weak, supplicating men. A humanity that slavishly follows an infinitely growing number of ridiculous rules rather that doing what's right. A spiritual and cultural deadness.

Additionally, it seems George Orwell's 1984 world is already here as Civil War monuments are removed in many American cities. Got to pick the low-hanging fruit before lobotomizing people of the rest of their history.

> Every record has been destroyed or falsified, every book rewritten, every picture has been repainted, every statue and street building has been renamed, every date has been altered. And the process is continuing day by day and minute by minute. History has stopped. Nothing exists except an endless present in which the Party is always right.

And this party is just getting started.

There's little doubt the elite want to use the energy of human sexuality to power the economy without actually letting men and women get off with each other. By pitting the sexes against each other in educational and media narratives and labeling men who desire sexual gratification miscreants, deviants, and predators, the goal is to make sex unattainable for most men, but to use the energy of men trying to get laid to power the consumption economy.

Since the sexual market is the granddaddy of all other human markets, fiddling with this biological drive is a recipe for disaster.

A Life Not Worth Living

It's not slavery if people don't realize they're slaves, right?

It's not hard to see that quality of life is already well-compromised for the freedom-loving individual in the West. There's a lot of freedom to choose professions (and become saddled with crippling debt in order to land a job) and buy lots and lots of worthless crap. But true freedom, like becoming independent of the system designed to rule humanity is increasingly difficult to obtain. Who wants to live a sexless life with no children and no family and no true mobility to live lives we see fit?

Using the juxtaposition of the life I have abroad versus the life I have in America when I'm working here part of the year, I'm truly mortified at the direction the nation is headed. It's astonishing that more people either don't see where we're headed or don't care as long as there are lots of bread and circuses to go around.

When it comes to being turned into a serf living in a Gilded Cage, Emiliano Zapata's wise words come to mind:

> If there is no justice for the people, let there be no peace for the government. It is better to die on your feet than to live a lifetime on your knees.

Perhaps this sentiment has already been engineered out of people. It seems we'll stumble our way into the New World Order without much resistance at all. Or will we mount a last-minute comeback?

Read More: The Incomplete And Flawed History Of The Human Species

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

5 Mistakes That Most Guys Make When Trying To Text Message A Girl

May 30, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

Meeting and attracting women is a challenging process. Not only do you have to summon up the courage to approach a girl in the first place, but you also need to make sure that you have interesting things to say, that you are funny and a little bit cocky, and that you pass all the numerous little tests she's sure to throw your way.

Even if you manage to get through all of that and successfully get her phone number, the game is really only just beginning, for now you need to maintain the same level of attraction you've created so that you can set up a date over text.

The texting part of the puzzle is often forgotten by overzealous guys who jump for joy just because they got a number, not realizing that the real work is only just beginning. Because even if she liked you face-to-face in the moment when you met, you still have to use the right strategies to ensure that she stays interested until you meet again. It is at this point that a great many guys lose girls that should otherwise have been a sure thing.

Here are five of the key mistakes that men make when texting girls and why you should avoid them…

1. Not Using Call Back Humor

Let’s say that when you first met a girl she had this cute look about her and you told her she reminded you of a little puppy dog your aunt once had. If you start texting her and you don’t make reference to the cute puppy dog joke then you are seriously missing an opportunity to spike her emotions.

Call back humor of this kind will take her back to the moment you first connected, rekindling the attraction. Having little shared jokes of this kind between really helps to cement your bond and makes it feel as though you’ve known each other for longer than you have.

2. Not Keeping The Ball In Your Court

If there’s one thing absolutely necessary to learn and internalize in game, it is that women love to be led. This means not sending her lame questions like ‘How’s it going?’ or ‘What are you up to?’ Use a bit of imagination and make statements instead. Something jokey like, ‘Hey, I just saw a cat that looks just like you’ will get a better response. Avoid the usual dull, mundane chat that she gets from so many other guys.

3. Introducing Explicit Sexual Topics

You need to be introducing subtle sexual spikes into your texts, and this is where your interactions start getting fun. Watch out though: don't go too crazy and crude. It's far better to keep it subtle with things like 'You're bad news, I knew it,' or 'Cool, that's my fetish.' Another one is 'You're definitely going to get me into trouble.' These examples make your messages a little naughty and suggestive without pushing things so far over the line that she gets scared off.

4. Not Striking While The Iron's Hot

This one is absolutely key—text game is great up to a point, but when the time is right you need to push the button and get her out on a date. If you don't then you run a very real chance of allowing the whole thing to go flat, causing you to lose the girl altogether. Knowing precisely when she is ready isn't always easy and definitely comes with practice, but if her messages are coming through quickly and she seems interested then you need to go ahead and tell her you want to meet up. If you don't then she's liable to get bored and turned off pretty quickly.

5. Not Using Humor and Mass Texts To Rekindle Flaky Numbers

All of those old numbers in your phone that went nowhere are not necessarily dead—they're lying dormant. What you need to do is send out the odd humorous mass text to all of them to see if any girls bite. Try something like 'Hey, just making sure you're attending my screening tonight. My new film 'Penis' starts at 8pm – hope to see you there!' Or simply send out a picture of a flower with dog poo behind it saying how much you miss her. As stupid as these tricks may sound, you'd be surprised how much interest you can rekindle with a cheeky mass text like this.

Given how important the texting side of game is, it's truly surprising how many men leave it entirely to chance and hope that just by sending out a few poorly-thought out messages they're going to score. Luckily, Love Systems has produced an incredibly powerful product available to solve just this issue.

The Ultimate Guide To Phone And Text Game is a 290-page digital book, compiled by instructor Nick Braddock after ten years of research. It tells you everything you need to know about text game. Here's a small sample of what it includes…

- A thorough grounding in the reason for texting in the first place so you don't waste time staring at your phone instead of going out on dates
- How to get a phone number of a girl who is interested in you
- How to avoid the fatal error that 60% of men make over text so you don't lose solid prospects
- How to seed interest before you text or call so she responds with excitement

This guide has everything to bridge the gap from meeting a girl to dating her. Wave goodbye to flakes and phone numbers going cold by getting a copy of this fantastic, comprehensive resource today. Click here for more details. And if you are seeking a more advanced training course, check out Charisma Decoded, created by our veteran instructor Derek Cajun.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

How To Become A More Persuasive Writer By Channeling Homer

May 30, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

There are two ways to become a better writer: write more and read more. I first read the Odyssey at the age of 14 and The Iliad at 17. I return to them each year. Why have these two epic poems some 2,700 years old (with traditions stretching back even earlier, to the Bronze Age) lasted so long and proven so influential?

It's not just their age. It isn't even that the stories are so truthful to the human condition that they're still relevant today. It's that Homer (whoever he was) is a storyteller of nearly unsurpassed skill, a true master of language. But his language and writing style isn't merely a beautiful thing to read, it's something you can start using to become a more powerful and persuasive writer or speaker yourself.

In Media Res

Most famously, both the Iliad and Odyssey begin in media res ("in the middle of things"). The Iliad doesn't begin with the Judgment of Paris and his elopement with Helen, but covers only a few weeks in the final year of the Trojan War. The Odyssey, meanwhile, begins not with the sack of Troy, but at the point Odysseus is about to return home, ten years later. This actually allows Homer to show us action first, and then fill in the missing details later, which the reader is probably wondering about.

Aside from skipping a slower build, a staple of most of modern fiction, beginning your message in media res actually takes advantage of a Pre-Suasive principle: that of "the unfinished." This relates to the Zeigarnik effect which I spoke about a month or so ago, that people pay more attention to and remember things that aren't complete.

In addition to allowing Homer to begin with memorable action, the device of in media res captivates attention because his audience wants to know what was the cause of this action (though in his own time the story was far more familiar on immediate recall than it is today). As you're transfixed, he slowly solves the unanswered questions, partly with the Catalogue of Ships in book two of the Iliad, partly by the duel between Paris and Menelaus in book 3, and partly by the meeting of Achilles and Priam in book 24. In the Odyssey, books 9-12 tie up the loose ends. Yet, the main story of both epics is still unsolved even so, and he can smoothly move his audience's attention back to the action at Troy or Odysseus' homecoming.

If you have trouble building up your story or message, choosing to begin in media res at an opportune moment might save you some headaches.

Despite its fame, the Trojan Horse is never actually seen directly. It's only described in passing in the Odyssey.

Trance, Directness, and Simile

One of Homer's most famous hallmarks is his use of simile, but there's more to it than that. There is actually a particular hypnotic pattern that these similes often use. Unlimited Selling Power explains:

> Ideosensory trance is another form of hypnosis we experience daily. It is based on our innate abilities to create in our minds visual images, feelings, voices, sounds, and even tastes and smells. When did you engage in ideosensory activities today? When you vividly experienced something that was not going on > in “real time.” Some examples: When you imagined what you might have for lunch or dinner, when you imagined what you might do at home tonight, or when you imagined a sales call, or mentally rehearsed what you might say to someone else in the office today. Did you see the expression on his face? Could you hear his words and feel yourself reacting? You were in an ideosensory trance.

>
> Very persuasive individuals can orchestrate vivid images that influence both the perception and mood of the listener. Highly-skilled salespeople use “word magic” to bring their prospects and customers to other worlds of sights and sounds and feelings.

This is what Homer does constantly:

> Here Asius flogged his team and chariot hard, nor did he find the gates shut, the bolt shot home, not yet, the men still held them wide, hoping to save some comrade fleeing the onset, racing for the ships. Straight at the gates he lashed his team, hell-bent, his troops crowding behind him shouting war cries, never thinking the Argive line could still hold out – they’d all be hurled back on their blackened hulls. Idiots. There in the gates they found two men, a brace of two great fighters, lionhearted sons of the Lapith spearmen, one Pirithous’ offspring, rugged Polypoetes, the other Leonteus, a match for murderous Ares. Both warriors planted there before the towering gates rose like oaks that that rear their crests on a mountain ridge, standing up to the gales and driving rains, day in, day out, their giant roots branching, gripping deep in the earth: so these two, trusting all to their arms, their power, stood up to Asius’ headlong charge and never shrank. (Iliad 12.142-60)

Notice two other aspects of this that make the simile/trance even more powerful. The first is obviously the natural element involved. People have always respected and feared nature, which Robert Greene highlights in The 48 Laws of Power. You also know nature. It doesn’t need to be explained to you. The second element is the repeated use of action words (“standing,” “driving,” “branching,” “gripping”), which anchors the text and makes it more impactful (recall that more persuasive speakers use action words while less persuasive ones use passive words).

Here’s another of the same kind:

> When the Trojans saw Ideomeneus fierce as fire, him and his aides-in-arms in handsome blazoned gear, they all cried out and charged them through the press and a sudden, pitched battle broke at the ships’ sterns. As gale winds swirl and shatter under the shrilling gusts on days when drifts of dust lie piled thick on the roads and winds whip up the dirt in a dense whirling cloud – so the battle broke, storming chaos, troops inflamed, slashing each other with bronze, carnage mounting, manslaughtering combat bristling with rangy spears, the honed lances brandished in hand and ripping flesh and the eyes dazzled now, blind with the glare of bronze, glittering helmets flashing, fighters plowing on in a mass. Only a > veteran steeled at heart could watch that struggle and still thrill with joy and never feel the terror. (Iliad 13.384-99)

And how about when men actually go down?

> Under his ear the son of Telamon stabbed with a heavy lance, wrenched the weapon out and down he went like a tall ash on a landmark mountain ridge that glistens far and wide – chopped down by an axe, its leaves running with sap, strewn across the earth…so Imbrius fell, the fine bronze armor clashing against him hard. (Iliad 13.211-16)

Finally, just to crystallize the point, I'll leave with one of my favorite passages that centers on another sense – sound.

> But over against them glorious Hector ranged his Trojans…and now they stretched the line of battle strangling tight, the blue-haired god of the sea and Hector fired in arms, he driving the Trojans, the god driving the Argives – and a wild surf pounded the ships and shelters, squadrons clashed with shattering war cries rising. Not so loud the breakers bellowing out against the shore, driven in from open sea by the North Wind's brutal blast, not so loud the roar of fire whipped to a crackling blaze rampaging into a mountain gorge, raging up through timber, not so loud the gale that howls in the leafy crowns of oaks when it hits its pitch of fury tearing branches down – nothing so loud as cries of Trojans, cries of Achaeans, terrible war cries, armies storming against each other. (Iliad 14.461-74)

There's no arguing with these passages, no parsing their meaning in your analytical mind. They hit your senses directly. With Homer, you see the glare of the bronze of clashing warriors burning bright as fire, you hear their cries as you hear the howling winds, and when men die, they go down like trees or bellowing bulls. The extraordinary is given an ordinary experience that you know. If you're explaining, you're losing in persuasive gravitas. Homer never explains. He also never uses passive language. When using his similes or not, his language is always direct and potent.

Conclusion

Understand: people mostly live in stories. Scott Adams likes to call it “different movies on the same screen.” Facts by themselves are mostly boring. They need to be centered on a narrative that’s moving. The best way you can sharpen your technique, whether you want to write a great story or simply craft a persuasive message, the machinery is usually the same. The best way to improve is to “write more and read more.” In this and many other areas in life, Homer still stands as a titan, 27 centuries later.

Read Next: 5 Things You Don’t Know About The Devices That Control Your Brain

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

Societies That Fail To Judge Its Citizens Lose All Moral Standards

May 31, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The demand for refraining from judgment is commonplace today. It's even elevated to a cardinal virtue, one of the few still remaining. As Aristotle said:

> Tolerance and apathy are the last virtues of a dying society.

These things now feature centrally in today's political rhetoric. This stifles debate, and demands us not to notice things that are bad for society, or especially do anything about them.

There's a difference between liberty and license. The freedom to act toward one's best interests, guided by the power of reason, is a good thing. Doing whatever the hell you want doesn't always work so well. Expecting people not to pass judgment on negative consequences, be they potential or evident, is silly. The demand for radical personal autonomy, and the lack of social pressure to enforce morality, has had many negative effects.

The case against judgment

Making the case for mercy and compassion. Still, remember that this ends with “Go and sin no more.”

The following Biblical passage is well known:

> Judge not, lest ye be judged.

As a heathen, I’m not qualified to deliver an authoritative theological opinion, but the way I read this is that you’d better have your house in order before pointing fingers. Another interpretation is as an absolute prohibition, though I recognize limits in its applicability since my patience is not infinite. My capacity for forgiveness has practical limits too; I’ll concur with Edmund Burke:

> There is, however, a limit at which forbearance ceases to be a virtue.

John Stuart Mill’s On Liberty argues powerfully in the second chapter for freedom of thought and freedom of speech. In the third, he advocated personal autonomy:

> Acts of whatever kind, which, without justifiable cause, do harm to others, may be, and in the more important cases absolutely require to be, controlled by the unfavourable sentiments, and, when needful, by the active interference of mankind. The liberty of the individual must be thus far limited; he must not make himself a nuisance to other people. But if he refrains from molesting others in what concerns them, and merely acts according to his own inclination and judgment in things which concern himself, the same reasons which show that opinion should be free, prove also that he should be allowed, without molestation, to carry his opinions into practice at his own cost.

Theodore Dalrymple, in classic Aristotelian debate form, lays out the thesis before arguing the antithesis:

> A man who judges others will sometimes condemn them and therefore deny them aid and assistance: whereas the man who refuses to judge excludes no one from his all-embracing compassion. He never asks where his fellowman's suffering comes from, whether it be self-inflicted or no: for whatever its source, he sympathizes with it and succors the sufferer.

However, none of that is all to be said on the subject.

The case for judgment

Jesus never said "Anything goes."

The Bible tells us not to judge, though Jesus certainly calls out others for wrongdoing. (One certainly could argue that being a deity grants the required street cred.) In any case, compassion is granted—quite touchingly, in some passages—for those who repent from sin. Still, hypocrites and the unrepentant don't get excused from judgment. Righteous conduct is expected, though it's understood that human fallibility means everyone misses the mark from time to time. It's fair to say that the Gospel message doesn't give license to be a rotten scoundrel six days a week so long as one apologizes on Sunday.

Mill's classic On Liberty argues for personal autonomy, but recognizes practical limits. The basic idea, particularly spelled out in the fourth chapter, is that things which can affect society are legitimate matters of public notice. Thus, where necessary, such things may be prohibited by legislation. It seems strange to imagine these days, but liberals actually used to make sense, at least back in the 19th century.

Theodore Dalrymple's article describes how the attitude of non-judgmentalism leads to a reckless form of apathy by society. Without outside encouragement to steer the right course, people won't even examine their own lives (as Socrates strongly recommended) and learn from their mistakes. He describes several instances where women hook up at a bar with violent losers, and then after their Stockholm Syndrome relationship ends, they immediately find another guy just like him.

Although glaringly irrational, this is hardly a surprise to us. What is surprising is that Dalrymple actually was able to talk sense into some of them. Naturally, daring to point out the obvious is a critical first step.

The political angle

This used to be discouraged.

The demand for non-judgmentalism often supports an agenda, particularly to chip away at the established political, cultural, or moral order. This usually is phrased in terms of personal autonomy, doing your own thing, and all the rest of it. Declaring something to be a right, when no legal basis exists for it, is a common rhetorical trick. They'll state "I have the right to X" rather than "I should be granted the special right to do X"; then the legal system's nonrecognition of X is spun as an atrocity equivalent to the Mongols wiping out Baghdad. In Rights Talk, Mary Ann Glendon notes that this isn't constructive:

> Discourse about rights has become the principal language that we use in public settings to discuss weighty questions of both right and wrong, but time and again it proves inadequate, or leads to a standoff of one right against another. The problem is not, however, as some contend, with the very notion of rights, or with our strong rights tradition. It is with a new version of rights discourse that has achieved dominance over the past thirty years.

Pat Buchanan, in Right From the Beginning, points out that such demands on society aren't about neutrality, but rather to promote an agenda:

> Traditionalists and conservatives have as much right as secularists to see our values written into law, to have our beliefs serve as the basis for federal legislation… [We must not stop fighting] until we have re-created a government and an America that conforms, as close as possible, to our image of the Good Society, if you will, a Godly country… Someone's values are going to prevail. Why not ours? Whose country is it, anyway? Whose moral code says we may interfere with a man's right to be a practicing bigot, but must respect and protect his right > to be a practicing sodomite?

Jonah Goldberg argues that society needs to promote its values, rather than maintain a wishy-washy posture of neutrality:

> Look, the libertarian critique of the state is useful, valuable, important, and much needed. But, in my humble opinion, the libertarian critique of the culture—"established authority"—tends to be exactly what I've always said it was: a celebration of personal liberty over everything else, and in many (but certainly not all) respects indistinguishable from the more asinine prattle we hear from the Left. […]
>
> Without character-forming institutions which softly coerce (persuade) kids—and remind adults—to revere our open, free, and tolerant culture over others, we run the risk of having them embrace any old creed or ideology that they find most rewarding or exciting, including some value systems which take it on blind faith that America is evil and, say, Cuba or Osama bin Laden is wonderful. That's precisely why campuses today are infested with so many silly radicals, and why libertarians in their own way encourage the dismantling of the soapboxes they stand on.

Finally, Theodore Dalrymple argues elsewhere against drug legalization:

> The philosophic argument is that, in a free society, adults should be permitted to do whatever they please, always provided that they are prepared to take the consequences of their own choices and that they cause no direct harm to others. […]
>
> In practice, of course, it is exceedingly difficult to make people take all the consequences of their own actions… Addiction to, or regular use of, most currently prohibited drugs cannot affect only the person who takes them—and not his spouse, children, neighbors, or employers.

Indeed, making people deal with the repercussions of their mistakes is quite a vexing problem. This is especially so when society continually bails people out after they screw up their lives, and a social taboo (non-judgmentalism) exists against warning them of future consequences.

Et enfin

Time to get the roots touched up, I suppose.

Those who demand that we refrain from judgment often refer to it as “shaming”. The unstated assumption is that this is always a bad thing. However, if it makes people think twice about making bad choices and messing up their lives, it’s actually a good thing. The tension between individual desires and what’s necessary for society to function properly is difficult to resolve; ultimately, these are legitimate matters to be resolved by public debate and the legislative process.

Where does judgment come from? It’s the product of the rational mind. When someone advocates refraining from judgment, it’s a demand to turn off part of your brain. To hell with that!

Read More: Why Shaming Men (And Women) Is Important And Necessary

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

The Game Principles I Used When I Picked Up A South Korean Girl

May 31, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Naturally, a great many men are interested in casual sex. So too are a lot of girls. Why then does it seem to be such a problem for guys to get it? It is because they are failing to recognise the subtle cues that girls give out indicating that they're keen to get frisky, and they are not acting even if they do.

It's something of a truism that men think about sex all the time. Perhaps they do, but the reality is that women do as well. And if anything, girls can be more sex-obsessed than guys. The big difference, though, is that girls generally don't go around telegraphing this to the world for fear of slut-shaming. A pity, really, because if they did then the players' job would be that much easier. As it is, we need to learn to be hypersensitive to the small signs that girls give out, and be ready to act on them by escalating things to the next stage.

In my pickup career, counting from before I got into 'formal' game and was just going to clubs all the time hitting on girls right up until now, I've probably lost more girls through a failure to act than anything else.

It's funny. Many men—myself included—get into game from a position of low self-esteem. They believe—erroneously—that the reason they have not been successful in the past is because they weren't (physically) attractive enough to snag quality pussy. Of course, this is a mistake. In a most cases they have simply failed to deliver their value to enough girls through the medium of game to achieve optimal results. And in a majority of cases it is because they have not escalated when the opportunity presented itself.

It’s less to do with whether you were a hot enough guy for her, in other words, and more to do with whether you had the balls to pull the trigger when the time was right.

Korean Sex

I recently enjoyed a same-day lay with a cute 22 year-old Korean girl who I met in a grocery store. OK, more a second-day lay I suppose. I met her on Thursday, we banged on the Friday, during our first ‘date’.

I pulled her through some pretty rudimentary day game. London’s been experiencing a heatwave recently. I was buying some sweet potatoes when I saw this cute, slender chick breeze past in hotpants and a vest. She paused in front of a display of batteries and spent ages staring at them.

‘You look like you’re choosing a special gift,’ I said, sidling up beside her.

‘Eh?’

She pointed at a battery in her basket, as though answering a question I’d posed.

‘Look, I think you’re cute. I’m busy now with friends but another time I’d like to take you for a drink.’

‘Oh. Right. I thought you just ask me about battery.’

I handed her my phone and told her to put in my number. As she did so, I asked where she was from.

‘South Korea.’

‘Well, at least it’s not North Korea,’ I said. She laughed and we parted company.

This whole inauspicious set took only a few minutes to complete. I was unconvinced that it would lead to anything, but I messaged her on WhatsApp nevertheless and so began a volley of vaguely flirtatious banter that went on throughout the evening.

The next day was glorious again and she told me that because it was so hot she was going to go to the park again. I had no particular plans for that afternoon so I hit her back with this.

‘Cool – meet me there for ice creams.’

‘Sounds great,’ she said, with a flourish of incomprehensible emojis.

We met by an ice cream van at the park. I bought two cones and then took her over to a nice position on the grass overlooking the main playing field, where there was a game of rounders going on.

Her English wasn’t brilliant (and of course my Korean is non-existent) so the conversation was slightly stilted. I pressed on, though, trying to spike things up where I could by dropping in sexy remarks with some cheeky kino here and there—we played thumb wars, an old-school kino technique and personal favourite of mine. In the main though the chat was limited to pretty boring chode stuff about why she was in London, where she lived in Korea and so on.

Following thumb wars I leaned in to kiss her. The first time she turned her head. The second time and we were making out happily.

After we’d finished our ice creams I took her for a walk over to the pond to show her the ducks. Then we walked over the grass for a while, chatting innocuously before stopping to watch some people practicing tightrope walking (there’s a nice metaphor there somewhere). Then I walked her out of the park and in the direction of my nearby apartment.

‘I haven’t been this way before,’ she said, looking around.

‘I just wanted to show you where I live,’ I said.

‘OK’

We got back to my place. I poured her a drink (some lemon-flavoured Malibu my ex left) and we found some funky house tunes on YouTube. A few minutes later and we were both naked, and I enjoyed her exquisitely-proportioned body.

How Did This Happen?

Clearly I had happened upon what many London day gamers call a ‘yes’ girl—that is, a girl who just happened to like me and was up for sex. Nevertheless, as I said on Twitter recently, it’s actually pretty easy to mess things up even with a girl who is into you if you don’t take the correct steps. I have done so many times before.

So what did I do right? Well, first of all I approached her in the first place. Had I not spoken to her at the battery stand then none of this would have happened. To be honest I was 50/50 about doing it, so it’s good that I did.

Second, I followed up even though I was uncertain that the outcome would be positive. Whenever you get a number or Facebook details or whatever you really must follow up. It only takes a few seconds and you never know what will come of it.

Third, I was flexible. Generally speaking I don’t like daytime dates, and I have a pretty strict dating model where I always take the girl to a lounge in the evening and buy her a couple of cocktails before whisking her home. But in this case I calculated that the park would be a good bet. For a start she was sure to be not wearing much given the heat. And also the location was ideal—right next to my apartment. I had already mentally mapped out the possible sequence of events before we’d met up.

Fourth, I got the sense through her compliance that she might be up for sex and so I went with it and escalated. If you read through my account of the afternoon again you will see that I led the whole thing, and the fact that she was willing to be led told its own story.

Also of course, we had made out, which made tangible to me her attraction. Some guys say not to do this—not to make out in public before the sex since it can break the tension. They have a point. For me, though, it a useful barometer for establishing whether or not something is ‘on’.

Fifth, I led her back to my apartment without asking her permission first. This might not seem like much but it’s actually huge. Working on the hunch that the date could develop into a fast lay I proceeded to escalate.

Again, you've got to be flexible in these situations. Actually, I had plans to meet friends later in the evening that I didn't want to cancel. In the past I might have suggested to the girl that we take a rain check and meet up again at the weekend. Bad mistake. Whenever I've done that in the past I've never seen the girl again.

It's also a colossal mistake to think that you have to wait for the 'right' time for sex, e.g. at night after you've been out for drinks. Sounds stupid, perhaps, but many years ago as an AFC I was dating this cute blonde girl. We used to spend many hours on a Saturday walking around the shops in Manchester together. Why the hell did I never bring her back to my apartment?! I still kick myself over that to this day. It wasn't like we didn't have the time to have sex, it was just that I was too much of a pussy, or too concerned with doing things 'the right way' to pull the trigger.

If anything afternoon sex is hotter than nighttime sex. Also, girls tend to have their evenings booked up in advance. In the case of the Korean girl she had plans for Friday and Saturday nights, and probably into the following week as well. So you need to strike when the opportunity is there.

Finally, I fully believed that same day sex with this girl was not only possible, but likely. Actually, if I showed you her Facebook photos you'd likely think she was a 'good girl'—young, studious, sensible, conservative etc. There's even some of her in traditional Korean dress. Fortunately I've been out with enough Asian girls to know that beneath the cute exterior they can be pretty wild.

In the case of the blonde girl from Manchester, the main reason that I didn't go for a daytime bang was because I naively thought that she wouldn't go for it, that girls didn't do that sort of thing. How wrong I was.

It's been said before in many different ways, but it's well worth repeating—it's much better going into every situation assuming that she's a sex crazed nymphomaniac than not. Even if you're wrong it will encourage you to escalate. And you may well be right.

Want to find out more about how to get great at game? Check out Troy's book The 7 Laws of Seduction and follow him on Twitter.

Read More: The One Girl You Absolutely Must Approach Every Day

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

4 Books That I Believe Increased My IQ By Ten Points

May 31, 2017 | by Mark Derian | Link | Original Link

Intelligence is the extent to which we can abstract from particulars to create principles, and then apply these principles to new particulars. In other words, IQ measures pattern recognition and pattern application.

Though IQ is mostly determined by genetics, we can increase it with a concerted effort. Inadvertently, I concerted this effort. At least I think I did. Using corroborating evidence from the SATs, GREs, and the WAIS, I liberally estimate my IQ has increased by ten points over the past ten years.

Given the nature of intelligence, I think it's the below books that contributed most to my encephalic enhancement. They don't teach facts or theories as much as they teach the processes behind learning facts and forming theories. As a result, they offer the reader the ability to penetrate subjects that even smart people can only dance around through rote and repetition.

1. A History of Philosophy

In A History Of Philosophy, Windelband considers the main epistemological schools that shaped philosophy before he considers philosophers. These two schools, empiricism and rationalism—which manifest today as liberals and conservatives, respectively—are the gears behind every turn of philosophy and so politics. When we understand culture as thought process and its axioms, as Windelband instructs, we inevitably think abstractly and apply abstractions—that is, we become smarter.

Instead of criticizing the SJWs as ugly morons, we say they're rehashing the strict materialism of the early 19th Century—which was a revolt against the growing idealism—in a tribal framework and carrying it to its natural conclusions. It's not only more correct, it's more helpful.

2. The Discovery Of The Unconscious

A History of Philosophy may present the philosophy of belief, but Ellenberger presents the psychology of belief. It hurt my brain to read this book because in addition to thinking of an idea in terms of its truth, I began to think of an idea in terms of what it's true of. This shift made me question myself more than ever before. Communism makes sense from a certain perspective; drug addiction makes sense from a certain perspective; changing your gender identity to work through childhood trauma makes sense from a certain perspective. It isn't subjectivism, rather perspectivism.

This book has been criticized for not offering an original viewpoint on psychology but the originality of this book is its excellence in unifying themes throughout psychology's development. As intelligence is abstraction, this book is intelligence with a seamless application.

3. Introduction to Objectivist Epistemology

Most people only know Rand for her ethical defense of the free market. Though these are sometimes stellar points, her genius isn't fully palpable until she delves into epistemology. In Introduction to Objectivist Epistemology, Rand articulates the precise steps behind the crux of intelligence—the derivation of concepts from experience—thereby bridging the gap between the aforementioned rationalism and empiricism. It would be a big-deal idea if she's correct, and she may not be, but every study about human vision and information processing since this book was written validates most of her points. Few know this because most of the people who study vision and processing have only read bits of Rand, and only with the intent to scoff.

Even though her solution to the problem of concepts may be lacking, it doesn't matter. The intimate way in which she parses her intelligence invariably makes the reader more intelligent.

4. The Hero With A Thousand Faces

Intelligence is indeed pattern recognition and application, but to put this more practically, it's the extent to which we can get what we want. This means understanding what it takes to navigate the basic challenges of the world, which requires we understand myths, the vehicles for this instruction.

Campbell's book demonstrates that every myth—from every corner of the globe and from every era—is the same. They're composed of a few, interchangeable parts. This is because our psychologies are the same, so how a man advances through the hierarchy of society is the same. Every man we would ever want to be is St. George slaying the dragon while protecting his fair maiden. Therefore, it's good to know what the sword, dragon, and maiden represent. This blueprint makes us more intelligent by keeping us focused on what's important when wading through the inevitable trivialities of life.

There are some honorable mentions. First is Beyond Good and Evil by Nietzsche, a distillation of the plight of 19th Century man, which inadvertently reveals a timeless plight. Second is The Undiscovered Self by Jung. Everyone is religious, so it's important to question what our religion is and to what extent it's useful. Last is Man's Guide to Psychology, written by me. Writing it made me smarter, so maybe reading it will make you smarter too.

Read More: 5 Ground-Breaking Books Written Between 1918 and 1945.

Mark Derian

Mark Derian is a graduate student in psychology. follow him on Twitter

5 Reasons You Should Maybe Visit Sri Lanka

May 31, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

In the poor and largely underdeveloped region South Asia (India, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Nepal, Bhutan and Sri Lanka), Sri Lanka stands out as perhaps the least materially and culturally repulsive of them all. However, even though this is the case if one looks at these countries in their entirety, it is still a relatively poor emerging market. Monthly gross income is roughly 84 700 Rupee, about 593 US dollar.

This implies that the average Lankese person can never afford to travel and often ends up working either in agriculture (tea, spices, grainseed, sugarcane, rubber and so forth) or simple industries (telecommunications, insurance, banking, tourism and so on).

From a tourist perspective, another consequence is a low level of infrastructure. Sri Lanka is not a big island and a distance that would have taken less than two hours in Western Europe or East Asia takes 4-6 hours there. Some trains which travel across mountainous areas are incredibly slow. This leads to a lot of wasted time on crowded trains, busses and taxis.

However, the southwest coast, where places such as Galle, Hikkaduwa, and Mirissa Beach are located, have faster trains, and if one can afford to hire a driver for a couple of days, some distances can be dealt with at a somewhat faster pace.

Another negative thing about Sri Lanka is that there are pretty much zero attractive girls within the Lankese population. I always keep my eyes open but could still not see a single local hottie during two weeks. They are not particularly fat, but that is pretty much their only advantage. Therefore one must go to more touristic spots in order to meet

Western or other Asian women instead. For instance, in Hikkaduwa I met an attractive German girl, of partially Serbic descent, whom I number closed after five minutes of chat in a local gym.

Thus this place is obviously not a high-tech poosy paradise, but if one keeps that in mind and find ways to work around the logistic and even hedonistic obstacles, then a number of other advantages will manifest themselves.

1. Stunning scenery

The scenery is stunning in many places in Sri Lanka. For instance, one early morning me and a friendly guy who worked at my guest house went to the top of the Lion Rock in Sigiriya to catch sight of a view I will never forget.

Ella, Dambulla Cave Temple, Galle, Mirissa and Yala National Park do likewise offer majestic views.

2. Breathtaking beaches

One of the best beaches I have visited is located in Grand Bahama, Bahamas, so an American who only wants to relax in a pleasant environment might want to go there instead. Many of the beaches along the southwest coast of Sri Lanka cannot be considered prettier, although generally of high standard.

However, Mirissa Beach is breathtakingly beautiful, especially around sunset and at night. So it might actually be worth to go there on a more exotic honeymoon if one has the chance. I was there alone and did not meet anyone, and albeit it was much pleasant to contemplate while walking along the stretches of sand numerous times, I wish I could have spent that time with a girl.

3. A diverse and fascinating fauna

In Mirissa Beach, a traveler can also do whale watching, which is a fascinating experience since one can likely see a significant number of blue whales. I was particularly lucky at this time and saw multiple giant whales, as well as dolphins and other marine animals.

Within just one or two weeks, one can spot blue whales, Sri Lankan leopards, Indian elephants, monkeys (Tuffed grey langur), mongoose, Indian crested porcupine, as well as numerous fish species while snorkeling or scuba diving.

My best experience in this respect was when my expedition car was hunted down by an elephant mother which vehemently protected her offspring near Sigiriya.

4. Theravada Buddhism

Historically and presently, Sri Lanka is an important place for Theravada Buddhism. Around 250 BCE the only surviving school of Buddhism arrived on Ceylon, and eventually this branch spread to Burma in the eleventh century, and later also to Thailand, Laos and Cambodia. Therevada is more conservative than Mahayana Buddhism, and this influences the larger society as well.

For historical sites, Dambulla Cave Temple is an excellent point of departure. Here some of the most impressive Buddha statues in the world are located.

5. Genuinely kind people

One meets kind people pretty much everywhere around the globe, but this often comes with an even greater number of annoying opportunists or worse. Often a nice person within the tourism industry, whether it be Malta or Indonesia, sooner or later tends to convey a message of at least semi-imposed recommendation. In other words, they make you feel obliged to support their family which happens to be willing to take you on a trip, or recommend their particular guest house, hostel or hotel. Not that it is a big thing but it signifies a transition to a Gesellschaft society with merely rational mutual agreements and transactions rather than genuine altruism involved.

In Sri Lanka one finds very little of that, though it often lean towards a traditional Gemainschaft, to the extent to which Ferdinand Tönnies' concept conforms to non-European cultures. If you prefer to travel in a more expensive way then you will of course pay accordingly, but as long as you travel in a budget style, no one will bother you with drugs, hoes or knick-knacks. Street vendors are pretty much absent in all of the country, and if some offer anything they will likely act very nice and polite. For instance, I was convinced to go on a traditional show, with Hindu elements, in the small city of Kandy, which did not cost much.

As a young married Lankese man told me when he explained why he wanted very little if anything in return for driving me with motorbike to the starting point, as well as following me all the way to the top of Lion Rock in Sigiriya: “As a Buddhist I believe in Karma and compassion. I have no desire for your money.”

With the government’s 26-year conflict with the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam and the fact that human nature is pretty much the same regardless of place kept in mind, I am not suggesting that Lankese people necessarily are better than others. Still ethics do matter.

In summary

Like I stressed in the preamble of this article, there are palpable flaws in Sri Lanka with regard to infrastructure and female talent in particular. If one also takes flight distances into account it could be questionable for an American to go all the way there at all, but those who come across will experience a beautiful tradition-leaning country which offers great scenery, beaches and wildlife.

Read More: 4 Reasons You Should Make A Trip To The Country Of Georgia

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

5 Signs That The Apocalypse Is Upon Us

June 1, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

It’s easy to get so caught up in daily life that you miss the bigger picture of what is happening around you. But while our first priority has to be self-improvement and caring for our own, we can’t turn a blind eye to the serious signs that our society is unraveling.

1. Rape pants for women

It is the first duty of nation to protect its women and children. This is why ancient cities were surrounded by walls. Conquering invaders would rape the women of vanquished cities and put the children to the sword or sell them into slavery. The men of a nation were always at the ready to protect their own heritage.

Not so in the current year. Men are more concerned with their pension or 401k than they are with their heritage. The degenerate “elite” have taken advantage of this situation to import a new batch of invaders, not as conquering armies but as welfare cases. These new conquerors act like those of old. They rape our women and, as the Manchester bombing sadly shows, kill our children.

What is the response from our governments? Nothing. But entrepreneurs are there to make a buck. Recently, one enterprising outfit started selling anti-rape pants to women as the new barbarism spreads over the diseased corpse of what was once Western civilization.

2. Third world immigration into Europe

> A new shipload of African men arrives in Italy, picked up from right outside Libya.
> This destruction of Europe is well planned… ✡ pic.twitter.com/79BYof21Eo
> — Viva Europa (@BakedNorwegian) May 28, 2017

When I said that Western governments were not doing anything to prevent their citizens from being raped and killed, I wasn’t telling the whole truth. In reality, they are actually working overtime to accelerate the process of our destruction. Western governments are continuing to let in hordes of migrants, most of whom are single males in their 20s and 30s. Initially, the excuse given was the Syrian civil war, but that doesn’t explain why African Muslims are swarming into Europe.

3. Coarse, slutty women

Loading…

Fifty years of radical feminism has ruined modern women. Modernity has destroyed most young women by encouraging them to embrace their worst qualities. Being a good wife and mother is denigrated. Working in a cubicle, drinking too much, being messy, and sleeping around is extolled. Modern women are willing to submit to degrading sex acts that would make prostitutes of 100 years ago blush. And rather than being feminine, modern women are as coarse as sailors.

Once you marry these women, they don't want to reproduce, and if they do it is with a mind to getting child support after the inevitable divorce. No sign bodes as ill for our current civilization as the low quality of our women.

4. Hillary almost won the presidency

The Democrat party is currently in shambles. The GOP controls the Congress and the presidency. Most state houses are also controlled by the GOP. Conservatives would like to believe that the GOP is embarking on a long period of control. But that is a deeply misguided belief.

The truth is that over half of people thought Hillary Clinton—one of the most corrupt individuals that has ever sought the presidency—was actually a viable candidate. The reality is that as demographics continue to tilt in a leftist direction, the US will become permanently leftist. Enjoy conservatism's last hurrah while you can.

5. Transgender Children

Just five years ago, transgenderism was considered a novelty reserved to a handful of mentally ill adults. Now, the news is filled with feel good stories of transgender children. The picture above is of Jazz Jennings, a 16-year-old boy who is passing himself off as a girl. Some of these stories concern very young children. I could not bear to post their pictures.

Clearly, this is being driven by insane parents, especially insane mothers. A society that turns its boys into girls and girls into boys can’t survive for long.

Conclusion

Are we living in the biblical end times? Possibly, but the Antichrist has not yet come on to the world stage. It is more likely that we are simply watching the death of a civilization. In this case, the globalist neoliberal civilization that replaced Christendom after the last vestiges of that civilization were crushed during World War I. The fool will look at these signs and say, “it has always been this way.” The wise man will read the signs of the times and prepare accordingly. Train, discipline yourself, and keep your powder dry.

Read More: 4 Signs That Modern Women Have Become Petulant Children

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Judge: Female Medical Student Who Stabbed Man Is "Too Intelligent and Pretty" For Jail

June 1, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A "brilliant" and "pretty" female Oxford University student who stabbed her boyfriend with a bread knife, punched him in the face, and threw a laptop, glass, and jar at him will almost certainly be spared jail. So says Oxford Crown Court Judge Ian Pringle, whose comments about Lavinia Woodward read more like a positive character reference from a family member than a ruling on a serious crime. Judge Pringle claimed that jailing Woodward would unfairly destroy her aspiration of becoming a heart surgeon.

Woodward, a medical student, often lives in Milan with her mother, who owns a luxurious villa. Her father is a senior oil company executive who sent her to the Sir James Henderson British School of Milan, where fees cost upwards of £16,000 (US$20,000) each year. Judge Pringle moved Woodward's sentencing to September and allowed her the opportunity to seek treatment for a chronic drug problem.

Of any case you will probably ever see, this is the perfect intersection of a pussy pass and completely different standards being applied to the children of the extremely wealthy. Woodward has already been given a number of chances rarely given to others, especially in relation to her consumption of hard drugs. The Telegraph reports, extraordinarily, that prior to attacking her boyfriend she "had been required to submit to regular drug testing" by Christ Church College at Oxford and been "threatened" with expulsion for any further drug-taking. Oxford Crown Court has also demanded that she stay drug-free as part of a restraining order protecting her male victim.

Lavinia Woodward's extremely privileged lifestyle has included attending Oxford classes with a £1,000 Chanel handbag. That money would have been better spent on kicking her cocaine habit.

Why should we feel more sorry for a rich girl drug addict than a normal drug addict?

> She consumed an obscene amount of cocaine…
>
> — A former friend of Lavinia Woodward, quoted by The Daily Mail

Even most female drug addicts, who typically get far shorter sentences for crimes than men, will garner a lot less sympathy than a spoiled rich girl like Lavinia Woodward.

Firstly, how can a drug addict study medicine, let alone become a doctor? There is a reason why we entrust tasks to doctors, lawyers, and engineers that are often illegal when performed by others. A run-of-the-mill doctor often has the life of his or her patient in their hands and this is even more true with a specialist like a heart surgeon.

Lavinia Woodward's history of drug abuse, which is being used in her defense, should immediately disqualify her from the practice of medicine in all its forms. Not only is the consumption of drugs a crime that would get anyone else in trouble, it raises serious concerns about Woodward's mental stability now and her potential for using drugs again.

Plus, the vast majority of people in England or similar countries, more than 99%, come from far less prosperous families than hers. If we are going to have discussions about sympathy and leniency for drug addicts, these discussions need to benefit the truly needy and indigent. I am far more inclined to think that a drug addict whose family lacks the money for proper rehabilitation needs a helping hand, not a girl whose life consists of jetting between a villa in Milan and Oxford University's most socially prestigious college, Christ Church.

"An ex-boyfriend abused me" – same old, same old

“I only did it because a previous man “abused” me!”

Lavinia Woodward’s defense team claimed that the poor toiler at Oxford has had a “very troubled life” and was “abused” by an ex-boyfriend. Short of her producing evidence of this so-called abuse, or citing a criminal conviction against her former partner (which is very easy to get in today’s anti-male world), belief in Woodward’s story would be a textbook example of gullibility. Still, “listen and believe” probably won’t stop a sentencing judge from feeling sorry for this woman.

The issue of her “troubled” life is similarly underwhelming. For example, about an eighth or more of people living in the United Kingdom and United States fall below the poverty line. It is much easier for individuals in these circumstances to prove that their life or background impacted on their commission of a criminal offense. But they are rarely given the time of day and jail populations are typically dominated by people from the working or middling classes.

Oxford is so very desperate for women in STEM

We should consider Oxford University's ambivalence about expelling Lavinia Woodward as part of higher education's obsession with promoting women in STEM and related fields like medicine. After the furor about her really erupted in mid-May, speculation that she would be expelled increased. Only a few days ago, however, only potential expulsion was still being discussed.

This is a woman who has been found guilty by a court of a serious domestic violence offense, complete with irrefutable proof of physical injury and property destruction. Meanwhile, countless men, almost always from far poorer backgrounds than Lavinia Woodward, have been expelled from colleges in the United States and elsewhere for "rape" sans any objective evidence, all without even being charged. Others, like the former student president of the Oxford University Union, Ben Sullivan, have been hounded and defamed on campus over rape allegations that are provably false.

But it is the humble male readers of sites like Return Of Kings, especially the white Anglo-Saxon ones, who are supposedly the only depositories of privilege in our world. Go figure.

Read More: Female Ex-Employee Tried To Get $20 Million From Ashley Madison Over "Medical Condition"

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed: A Guide For The Modern Casanova

June 1, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

The following article is brought to you by How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

If you want to learn how to get hot girls into bed—and let's fact it, who doesn't—then I have some great news for you. My new book, called 'How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed – A Guide For The Modern Casanova' will be released on Amazon on Friday June 2nd (tomorrow). You can pre-order your copy now.

This book has been over three years in the making. Three years of grinding it out in the trenches, approaching, dating, banging—and writing. If you're a regular reader of my articles on Return of Kings over the years then you'll be familiar with my game style. This book is basically a download directly from my brain to yours of all my very most effective game, pickup and relationship techniques. Everything you need to know is in here, from how to approach her, to what to do on a date, to how to pull her home, to how to seduce her once she's there.

If you want everything collected in one easy-to-read resource—red pill, day game, night game, Tinder, social circle game, texting, dating advice, laser-sharp insights into the current sexual marketplace plus how you can beat the system to bang the hottest girls—then this is the book for you.

Beginnings

How To Pull Hot Girls is divided into three sections. The first is called 'Beginnings'. Here you can read all my freshest insights into the dating market. This is precisely the background you need—the red pill secrets that all the top players know that stop them getting eaten up and spat out by sexy girls.

Why is dating so hard in the modern world? Is night game dead? Is Tinder worth it? What are the pitfalls of getting into a long-term relationship? What do girls these days want? Should you risk getting married, or commit to the life of a player?

All of these questions and more are answered.

Inner Game

The second section is all about 'Inner Game.' What exact personality traits and inner mental attitudes do you need to pull the hottest girls and what precisely to do you need to do to acquire them? It's all very well going out and approaching 1000 girls, but if you're not mentally prepared then it will be obvious to the women you interact with and you will get more blowouts than you do blowjobs. This section will give you all the tools that I use and that many of the best players in the world employ with great success.

Outer Game

The third section, by far the longest, is all about 'Outer Game'. These are all the techniques that I use regularly when out and about picking up girls. In this section I really get down to the nitty-gritty on what you should say, where you should take her, how to lead with confidence, how to give off a sexual vibe without even opening your mouth and much more.

If you want an edge on the market then these are the insights you need.

A Compilation of Red Pill Essays

How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed is a compilation of essays on red pill, inner game and pickup. It is not a step-by-step guide and nor is it aimed at complete beginners. If you want that you should get my first book The 7 Laws of Seduction.

How To Get Hot Girls takes my concepts to the next level with really in-depth reflections on what it is to be a player and how to be truly successful as a pick-up artist.

A lot of the content on this book originally appeared in some form either on Return of Kings and or my site realtroyfrancis.com so you may recognise elements. However, everything has been edited and reworked to make is super-fresh and actionable.

Also, the material has been carefully arranged to take you on a journey that will teach you everything you need to know about game. Finally, the book brings into one place a lot of diverse material, meaning that it's easily accessible and you don't have to hunt all over the internet for it.

How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed will be released all over the world on Friday June 2nd. It is available for pre-order now.

The book will be available as an Amazon Kindle ebook initially with a paperback edition following shortly afterwards.

Free Books!

In order to celebrate the publication of How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed I have made my two previous books The 7 Laws of Seduction and Text Game Mastery free until June 2nd. If you haven't already read them this is a great opportunity to do so without having to pay for them

Once you've read the books I would love it if you could leave me a rating and review on Amazon, because it really helps me to spread the word, attract new readers and continue to create what I hope is useful, actionable content for you.

One final note. I have a very limited number of advance copies available so if you have a website about game, or if you are a red pill or manosphere blogger and you'd like to review the book then please drop me an email at Troy's new book 'How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed – A Guide For The Modern Casanova' is released on Amazon on Friday June 2nd (tomorrow). You can pre-order your copy now.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Billionaires Are Buying Bunkers In New Zealand Because They Fear You May Kill Them

June 1, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The popular image of survivalists is that of right-wing preppers from "Flyover Country"; basically the most hardcore fraction of what those Comrade Obama, bless his heart, described in the following way:

> It's not surprising, then, they get bitter, they cling to guns or religion or antipathy to people who aren't like them or anti-immigrant sentiment or anti-trade sentiment as a way to explain their frustrations.

Therefore, it may come as a surprise that the oligarch class has its share of survivalists, a trend dramatically on the rise. New Zealand is a very popular location lately. Maybe some are motivated by vague, unspecific safety concerns ("just in case"), or want extremely durable vacation homes, but there seems more to it than that. A Daily Mail article from February describes this:

> Attracted by a remote First World country that has the potential to be self-sufficient and is on no one's list of nuclear targets, the super-rich kings of Silicon Valley and Wall Street are buying up vast tracts of its land—in anticipation of the day when they may need to live there. […]
>
> What the catastrophe will precisely be remains unclear, but possibilities include a devastating asteroid impact, giant earthquake, nuclear war, civil war, pandemic, zombie invasion and the Second Coming.
>
> Tellingly, the geeks of Silicon Valley appear to be most worried that it will be a struggle between rich and poor in a world economy turned upside down by new technology—with them as the main targets.

What do they fear?

Is this what's on their minds – or something else?

I concur with the analysis that class warfare targeting the oligarchs may well occur if all hell breaks loose. It's considerably more probable than asteroids (bunkers probably won't help), earthquakes (Mother Nature gives no warning), pandemics (far more modest shelters will suffice), zombies (seriously?), or the Second Coming (if Judgment Day is the real deal, they're going to hell anyway). So we're left with nuclear war or civil war as reasons justifying spending huge sums on extensive fortifications.

The article speculates that citizens could be angered about new inventions by tech billionaires—as it suggests further down, this could include robotics. However, anti-robot demonstrations haven't been too common lately, and there are no groundbreaking advances just on the horizon (like actual artificial intelligence) that suddenly could put millions out of work. That scenario doesn't explain why Wall Street types are buying hideouts in New Zealand too. So, the public becoming angry merely about disruptive technologies seems pretty improbable.

Are they afraid of political instability? As the article states further:

> Local estate agents say their U.S. clients rarely intend to live in New Zealand, but cite reasons for their purchases such as the toxic presidential election and the spate of mass shootings in America.
>
> In the first ten months of last year, foreigners—mainly Australians and Americans—bought nearly 1,400 square miles of land there, more than four times what they bought in the same period the previous year.

Indeed, 2016 was the most turbulent year since the engineered agitation of the 1960s; apparently some interesting things were afoot. Now here's some more food for thought:

> All this panic among the super-rich begs an obvious question: what do they know that the rest of us don't?
>
> Certainly, preparing for the Apocalypse has been a multi-billion dollar business > for many years.

>
> Polls have shown around 22 per cent of Americans believe the world will 'end' in their lifetime. Many right-wingers were convinced that Barack Obama would start a civil war by trying to seize citizens' guns.
>
> Now, there's the unpredictable Donald Trump to disturb their dreams. More than 13,000 Americans registered to buy a home in New Zealand—17 times the usual rate—in the week after he was elected president.

That's a very interesting statistical anomaly! A few lefty celebs promised to move to Canada if Trump got elected, but still won't leave even though they could just drive there in a moving van. Unlike them, these guys—apparently over twelve thousand beyond the usual number of applicants—actually got serious about taking the plunge the following week. Did they get an unusually powerful case of the jitters after the election, or could there be something more—possibly even inside information—compelling them to seek a hideout in a remote part of the world?

Did they fear President Trump might push the button? That's pretty improbable. He wishes to pursue friendly relations with Russia, the USA's most credible potential nuclear threat. It was Hillary who was antagonizing the Russians. The sore losers are still at it with the malarkey that Putin supposedly "hacked the election". (On that note, if it's possible to hack an election, why aren't they demanding a return to paper ballots before 2020?) How about other potentially hostile nuclear powers? China wouldn't go to war over a tariff increase; besides, they'd blow up too many WalMarts. North Korea's arsenal and delivery capabilities are still inferior to what the USA had in 1945.

Maybe they're worried about more than The Donald himself. The groundswell that got him elected—even despite the Republican bosses trying to hamstring their own top candidate every step of the way—was spearheaded by the very same people who are calling out globalist oligarchs on their manipulations. The potentates precipitously perceived that they're not as powerful as they presumed, and they're panicking about what this perhaps portends. Probably the plutocratic preppers are pondering the possibilities. I certainly see why that scares the snot out of them.

A friendly word to the wise

Public relations for Louis XVI went downhill until things eventually came to a head

The monarchs of old—even tyrants—usually acted toward what they considered the best long-term interests of their countries. The Robber Barons of the Gilded Age were notoriously cheap, but certainly realized where their wealth came from and had civic-minded moments. Today's aristocrats are often globalists with little loyalty to their countries, acting in the best short-term interests of the next quarterly financial statement.

Every day, more people are waking up to the fact that this is a problem. If unchecked, today's trajectory eventually will lead to international feudalism characterized by Third World conditions across the planet, immense extremes of wealth, and annihilation of unique nationalities and cultures. As time goes on, this will become increasingly obvious and unpopular.

Peace is good, so let's keep things peaceful. Rather than buying hideouts where their supplies eventually will run out if things end badly, I have a better idea for oligarchs who have nightmares involving torches and pitchforks. They can start repairing their image. Their actions have created some public relations problems.

Sam Francis wrote an article about managerial elites selling out their people. It's quite extensive, and I've provided my own take on it. The short version is that the oligarch class is happy to send the public down the primrose path. Really, that's not a very good way to earn admiration and respect. Maybe it's time for them to reconsider doing things like that. It's a win-win for everyone.

As Pat Buchanan put it:

> Undeniably, Americans cherish their economic freedom and respect the men who helped make America great, inventors such as Alexander Graham Bell and Thomas Edison and industrialists such as Henry Ford.
>
> But they do not revere the men who make millions and billions at the big casinos of capitalism. They do not admire a George Soros for winning his billion-dollar bet shorting the British pound.

If their actions are so unpopular that they fear a public uprising, then they need to realize that they're doing something wrong. If they want to mend fences, those who got rich from American consumers should start showing some loyalty. They should stop bringing in H1-B workers to drive down wages, sending factories to Third World sweatshops, encouraging population replacement immigration, and the like. Another token of good faith would be to stop virtue signaling and stop promoting and funding crazy leftist causes.

It might be a lot to ask for, but it would be in their best interests to start acting prudently, while they still have a chance.

Read More: Is Genocide On The Elite Agenda?

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Russia Embarrasses Ukraine In The Latest Propaganda Battle Of East Versus West

June 2, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

On 29 May, 2017, a brief Twitter feud happened between Ukraine and Russia. The two powers' official and non-official accounts skirmished through light punchlines and pictures.

The Ukrainian account posted first, apparently as a reply to Vladimir Putin's late remark on the same day. Meeting with French banker escort boy President Emmanuel Macron at Versailles, the historical residence of French kings, Putin was faced with an attempt to display some rhetorical ability. Macron indeed mixed up a reference to French history and a sneer at past European knights, before saying that France and Russia had had a relationship for three centuries, "since Peter the Great."

Putin, more at ease amongst the majestic surroundings, replied playfully that relations between the two countries were much older and deeper, as they would have started with the eleventh century princess Anne of Kiev or Anna of Rus—the very wording of the princess', then queen's, name has become controversial.

In a matter of hours, Ukraine's official Twitter account started the feud with the following picture, which claims to "remind a sequence of events" but seems more like a trollish comparison:

> When @Russia says Anne de Kiev established Russia-France relations, let us remind the sequence of events pic.twitter.com/nBKhQdyKql
>
> — Ukraine / Україна (@Ukraine) 30 mai 2017

And then it started.

Two interpretations of Russian (and Ukrainian) history

Beyond the trolling, baiting, and impression management, two questions are at stake here:

- When did Russia come into being? Did Russia appear with the Kievan Rus principality, which came with the city, or later? Did Russia start within a place which would eventually become independent, or only when the capital was transferred into Moscow, thus letting Kiev belong to a separate nation?
- Was the Princess Ann Russian, Ukrainian, or both, provided that the question makes sense?

What the Ukraine communicators suggest here is a version of history where Ukraine is essentially a nation, clearly identified with a specific territory centered around Kiev. Those who defend this view emphasize how the Ukrainian language differs from current Russian and trace contemporary Russia to a history that mostly took place around Moscow.

On the other hand, Russia emphasizes its own continuity from the Kievan Rus principality and how the place nowadays called Ukraine is bonded to her through a common history. For at least a century, Ukraine has entertained a nationalistic and separatist overview whereas Russia, following its long history of czardom and tumultuous annexations, sees itself as a fateful empire whose very name comes from the Kievan Rus.

What does history say?

Unsurprisingly, the fake news media commented the meeting by making the Rotschild employee Macron look good. The HuffPo said Macron "recalled" the very version of history Putin finds polemical and short-sighted, Le Monde mused on Putin's supposed "ego" and hammered that the current Ukrainian government—which was violently put in place by well-trained, well-funded rioters—had been "freely elected", while Numerama pretended to ignore that Ukraine, not Russia, started the Internet feud and kept fanning on the flames. All these outlets conspicuously avoided the historical issue of when Russia came into existence, either by lack of knowledge or interest, or so that they could keep their veneer of objectivity.

The Kievan Rus principality was founded during the ninth century by Vikings called the Varangians. First small, the principality was able to expand and become the guardian of a trade route expanding from Scandinavia to the Byzantine Empire thanks to the efforts of its chiefs, the Rurik dynasty. At its peak, in 1054, the Kievan Rus reigned on territories now split between Ukraine, Belarus, Lithuania and Russia:

The Kievan Rus principality from 1054 to 1132.

> Don’t be jealous, @Ukraine. In 1051 Kiev was capital of the united #Rus which included territories of modern □□, □□ and □□. pic.twitter.com/TMX5KiGAPl
>
> — MFA Russia □□ (@mfa_russia) 30 mai 2017

Between 1024 and 1032, Rurik king Yaroslav “the Wise” sired a girl, Anna Yaroslavna. According to the custom, her family name derived from the first name of her father. Her signature, recorded on a diploma, was spelled in Early Cyrillic alphabet albeit with a particular handwriting style that reminds of the Futhark alphabet:

ANA REGINA

In 1051, Anna went to the distant realm of France to marry the king Henry I. According to Wikipedia, she would then sign documents in Old Slavic, as Ана Рьина (“Anna Regina”). The French would call her Anne.

Back to the story of Kievan Rus, the principality was constantly facing both external threats, as warlike peoples of Turkish-Mongol origins were coveting the mastery of trade routes, and internal threats from bloody succession wars between Rurik princes. One of them, Alexander Nevski (1220-1263), managed to unite the Rus again, at the price of becoming a vassal of the Mongol invaders.

In the meanwhile, Kievan subjects began to colonize Moskovia, a cold-weathered yet more peaceful place. During the 12th century, a fortress would be built there: it would be eventually designated as the Kremlin.

The key moment happened when prince Daniel Aleksandrovich (1261-1303, Nevski's son and heir) transferred the power from Kiev to Moscow. The latter gained political influence and, in 1299, the metropolitan bishop from Kiev would relocate too near Moscow.

Thus, there is a clear continuity between the Kievan Rus principality and the Czarist State that formed near Moscow. The relationship also stands out when we consider how the first czar, Ivan III Vasilyevich—who was also a Rurik—managed to finally kick the Mongols out and, by marrying the last Byzantine emperor's niece, established Moscow as the "third Rome."

However, the continuity here outlined is a bit weaving. From a purely geographical and linguistic point of view, one can rather perceive a discontinuity: the city of Kiev and its surroundings were on the outer circle of Moscow, and the country's children have been isolated enough to draw from old Slavic their own dialect.

The area has been shared between the Poles and Lithuanian at north and the Turks and Mongols for centuries. Only later was it taken back by Russia, then by catholic Cossacks from Ruthenia, who during the 16th and 17th centuries created the Sloboda Ukraine, literally frontier districts free from taxes ("Sloboda" meaning "free", and "U-kraine", "on the march"). Czarina Catherine the Great took the zone again in the middle of the 18th century.

Only during the 19th century did the word "Ukraine" make a major comeback. Intellectuals picked up Karl Marx' virulent classism, suited it to their aims—they did their rabble-rousing amongst peasants instead of factory workers—and worked on both politics and culture to create a nationalist-separatist "Ukrainian" feeling.

The neocons behind present-day Ukraine

Should we conclude that Russia is right to claim legacy from Anna Yaroslavna, and consequently, perhaps, from Kiev? Things are not so simple. The answer depends on one's interpretation of history and of what is right.

If one perceives historical continuity as the most important aspect, and I stressed this aspect by mentioning the Rurik heredity from the Varangian founders to Czar Ivan III, then la reine Anne belonged to the family who sprawled both the Kievan Rus principality and the Moscow-centered czardom. This is a historical fact that so far has not been denied by mainstream outlets. Yet, if one privileges nation-states, or even more, regionalistic impulses over the weight of long history, Kiev can be seen as Ukrainian in the sense that it would not be Russian.

In any case, I find anachronistic how current Ukraine pretends to appropriate the princess Anna in a manner that excludes current Russia from its legacy, as the very Ukrainian nation simply did not exist at this time—and it must be remembered that Anna Yaroslavna was primarily identified by the bloodline she belonged to rather than by a particular place. "Ann of Kiev, the Ukrainian" seems mostly an artificial creation promoted to support a made-up identity.

As to the question of when Russia started—did it start with the Varangian king Rurik, or with its distant progeny in Moscow? It is difficult to give a straightforward answer. The same is true when it comes to the question of the Ukrainian right to be independent from Russia. After all, the founders of the United States came from England, and that does not give the US a particular right over England. To a non-specialist, these questions are too faraway and intricate. Which is exactly why the fake news media can spin their narrative: they've got the "experts", y'know, who know details you don't and will pound whatever version is convenient to the powerful interests of today.

No matter what right Ukraine has, no matter the properness of Ukrainian identity, what we know for sure is that the current Ukrainian government is little more than a globalist puppet. President elected Victor Ianukovich, who had already faced a lot of pressure as well as the well-backed Orange Revolution even before his election, was brutally chased of power after he announced his intention to strengthen ties with Russia. Is the right to self-determination acknowledged only when those supposed to have it follow a globalist agenda? When Ianukovich was driven out, he was replaced by Peter Porochenko, a sellout working in tandem with globalists and NATO.

Of course none of this was mentioned by Ukraine communicators. When the official Russian Twitter account replied by evoking the city of Veliky Novgorod, which was part of the Kievan Rus during the 11th century, Ukraine replied with an animated picture from the Simpsons accusing Russia of being "really" the Soviet Union. Recall (((who))) created the Simpsons, and notice how hawkish and cuckservative the muh-USSR rhetoric sounds…

> You really don't change, do you? pic.twitter.com/HDfS9A8jWZ
>
> — Ukraine / Україна (@Ukraine) 30 mai 2017

Ukraine then jumped from the 11th century to the 20th by invoking "international law":

> Kyivan Rus stretched to modern-day areas of □□ □□ □□ □□ □□ □□ too. Don't give the "triune nation" nonsense pls and comply with int law pic.twitter.com/DVO9NToZiP
>
> — Ukraine / Україна (@Ukraine) 30 mai 2017

Wait a minute. Current-day Ukraine is using a stylized version of the Rurik coat of arms as its own and started this troll feud by a rather controversial comparison between Kiev and Moscow on the 11th century. Why, then, did Ukraine communicators jump from the 11th century to the 20th? What they did is a flagrant anachronism—the orthodox cathedrals of Kiev bear no relationship with an abstract 20th century invention. Luckily, they posted a few "funny" animated pictures along and some idiots keep comparing Kiev and Moscow on the 11th century as if these places then had any relevance in what is right "now."

Russian outlets such as RT or Sputnik News are, for sure, less than perfect. Both have repeatedly supported the "refugee" invasion of Europe under the pretense of reporting on it, just as the fake news mainstream did, and Sputnik often posts puzzling "news" about aliens. Yet, all in all, Russian communication does not use the aforementioned tricks and seems more honest than the globalists' useful idiots.

I don't mind about Russia recovering its previous empire on the extreme east of Europe. But I do definitely mind how globalists use numberless masks and alias to maintain their fake narrative. Russia does not oppress or kill us, no matter the extent of their possible links with Julian Assange—who has a reputation for not having ever falsified any document. The globalists do.

Read Next: Why The Ukraine Crisis Is A Red Pill Vs Blue Pill Superpower Clash

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

NY Mag Attacks Return Of Kings For “Radicalizing” Men Yet Remains Silent On Islamic Extremism

June 2, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

It seems that reading articles about how to sleep with more girls or how to become a stronger, more masculine, or successful man is the same as doing the Muslim profession of faith before stealing a truck and running over Christian pedestrians. That’s the ridiculous conclusion of NY Mag after publishing their article “The Online Radicalization We’re Not Talking About” based on their own report.

Christ, what a runt. Can physiognomy be more real?

For their web site report, they used two girls under forty, (((Alice Marwick))) and Rebecca Lewis, who have apparently no knowledge on Islam, terrorism, the red pill, neomasculinity, or any of the subjects contained in the article. Alice Marwick, a researcher for Harvard's (((Berkman Klein Center))), become especially happy when she found a way to conceal her Jewishness, for reasons that we can only speculate on.

> @allimooney @jcn just realized I've gotten zero remarks from randos about being Jewish since I lightened my hair! #fakejewsince99
>
> — alicetiara (@alicetiara) December 23, 2011

The report is quite entertaining due to its blatant dishonesty and intellectual shortcuts. Here is a link to see the full extent of their lunacy. It starts well by using the title "The Radicalization That No One Talks About". That is because no one cares and no red-pilled man goes setting off bombs in crowds of children at some slut's concert. I could stop my argumentation there but let's dive in.

So why are our writers and readers the worst villains since Pol Pot?

[image]
An autobiographical article by NY Magazine

Here are some extracts on the article:

> When you hear the word radicalization, what usually comes to mind is young people turning to Islamic fundamentalism. But the far right is doing virtually the same thing — and possibly even more effectively. (…)

In their pseudo-hierarchy of evil, posters that do politically incorrect jokes on the Internet, post frog memes, talk about bedding girls or laugh at feminists deserve the same treatment as Muslims setting off nail bombs, throwing gays off buildings, or burning little girls in cages while alive.

We have now become the equivalent of ISIS. Calling us "radicalized" shows that the lying, good-for-nothing MSM has gone full circle. They have nothing left but redefining what words mean and accusing us of "thoughtcrime".

It continues:

> What the red pill actually reveals depends on who's offering it. To men's-rights activists, being red-pilled means throwing off the yoke of popular feminism and recognizing that men, not women, are the oppressed group. To the alt-right, it means revealing the lies behind multiculturalism and globalism, and realizing the truth of isolationist nationalism. To conspiracy theorists, it may mean accepting the influence of the New World Order on society. To white supremacists, it means acknowledging that Jewish elites control the culture and are accelerating the destruction of the white race.

I am afraid that the authors already became red-pilled by writing those truths and are probably getting further radicalised, buying ROK t-shirts as we speak. The fact that we don't buy into their narrative and expose them seems to be the main component of our "radicalisation".

> It helps that the extremists are also extremely adept at making their ideas palatable, by using irony and humor. (…) Actual hate groups can draw people in using humor, while also normalizing their most extreme ideas.
>
> However, given the similarities between far-right and Islamic radicalization, it's worth examining the efforts by political scientists and counterterrorism experts to combat the latter.

I have yet to witness the website Return of Caliphs or the goat memes of the Islamist board 4sharia. This is an attempt at a witch hunt where we are targeted because we won't bow to the narrative and want our common man to open his eyes.

They attempt to paint us as thought criminals in the eyes of the authorities instead of focusing on factual crimes. They want us arrested, imprisoned, and our lives destroyed because we challenge their power by our defiant thoughts. This is the reality of the situation.

The female writers seem to have a crush on us as Roosh, Matt Forney and Return of Kings are mentioned about twenty times in that report alone.

> But recently, the pick-up artist Roosh described his first book as "an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility," and his blog Return of Kings has recently posted rants about interracial pornography and other favorite annoyances of the alt-right

Looks like I rattled someone's cage by calling out who is behind their favourite category of porn.

> If you've read this week's conspiracy-mongering stories about the supposedly suspicious death of DNC employee Seth Rich — or if you've read in the past about the rise of White Student Unions on college campuses, or "Pizzagate" — you've seen the fruits of their efforts.
>
> As internet and media scholars, we began this project focused on media manipulation and the spread of misinformation. But as we delved into these spaces, we noticed that one of the biggest trends taking place had been flying under the radar. And that is far-right radicalization. (…)
>
> They don't call it radicalization, of course. They call it "taking the red pill."

"I will have you know that I was promoted to the rank of internet and media scholar, you nazi. So watch out."

We are winning at the game of truth seeking. And they can't stand it. We know the vicious techniques they can use against us and our readers and how low they will stoop. Hence our need to keep our guard up.

Truth will triumph

Muslims that kill apostates are not “radicalized” as the MSM would like us to believe. They just become more zealous and apply the principles of conquest and forced conversion that their Holy book teaches, a fact that has been proven and keeps being ignored because “that would be racist”, even if Islam is not a race.

The MSM is grasping at straws trying to show that the cause is everything but Islam in its nature. They are deeply hurt as their ratings are plummeting compared to alternative media, who have no one to answer to but their readers and viewers. They have ran out of methods to fight us.

Calling us Nazis or racists did not work. Trying to cut by cancelling ads did not work. So they need to portray us as the twin brother of the paroxysm of evil: Islamic terrorism.

One can only distance himself from the media machinery and defuse their influence once it is understood that they have no interest in information or truth. They are performing dogs rewarded by their masters when they do tricks. I like this quote by Soral that sums up the MSM :

Des menteurs qui crient de douleur quand ils vous poignardent

This article follows Saul Alinsky's "Rules for Radicals" handbook: accusing others of your crimes. The same method that girls use when they test you: projection.

They need to turn the tables and channel the concern of the common people on us. It is more important to save the narrative than seeing more people die at the hands of Islamic terrorists.

By these declarations, they confirm a sole fact. That what we do harms their business and the dishonest elites. We gnaw at their tower of lies by exposing who holds the reins of their mental manipulation and open the eyes of the people who will stop giving them clicks and shekels.

Read More: Why Do People Hate Return Of Kings?

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Journalists Are Less Capable Of Asking Proper Questions Than The General Public

June 2, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

This week we continue the analysis of last year's press conference Roosh held after the meetups were cancelled. We left off analyzing the brain-dead questions that journalists ask that should make you question their intelligence. Click here to read part one.

Would you say that media misinterpretations is the best thing that ever happened to you?

Go home you narcissistic cunt. This is not about you. Your job is to spread interesting or important news. You are not the news. The fact that you affected someone's life in a positive or negative way should never be news. Go home, go directly home, do not pass go, do not collect $200, go straight to your closet, and hang yourself you lying piece of garbage.

How many bodyguards do you have?

Seriously? Unless you're interviewing MC Hammer about his entourage, how could this be interesting to anyone, unless you plan on sharing information so the guy could be attacked?

What are you doing the next couple of days?

This is the type of bad question I cringe after asking a girl when I run out of anything interesting to say. You're asking it during a live press conference? Do you even elderly game?

How often do you return for your mom's meatloaf?

I'll give this guy the benefit of the doubt that he is just trying to be friendly. But inappropriate for a press conference.

Have you had any trouble travelling internationally yet? Do you plan on trying to go to Australia?

I'm considering stopping this article if the questions don't improve. How many different ways can I say "This question was irrelevant and boring?" Guys, read up on some day game openers and conversation skills.

What does your mom think about all this?

DING DING DING! We have a winner! Someone asked an interesting question! Now, she shouldn't be part of the story at all, and only is, because of the media lying and doxxing, but this, under the circumstances, is something people might actually be interested in knowing. Answer: She's angry at YOU, media!

Do you agree that if a girl is too drunk to consent to sex, and you have sex with her, that is legally defined as rape?
(Reporters begin arguing amongst each other about what the legal definition of rape is.)

The legal definition of rape is a factual thing, that can be verified by consulting local codes. The definition does vary from place to place. The legal definition has no bearing on what an individual person thinks about labeling of a certain behavior. Roosh doesn't even live in the legal jurisdiction the journalists do, and his opinion on law is not relevant to what the law of a certain place objectively states. Stupid question. As your fellow journalists agreed.

What's your opinion on Bill Cosby?

What's your favorite flavor of ice cream? Roosh doesn't even know Bill Cosby. I generally don't care about someone's opinion of someone they haven't met and don't know.

How did this become your issue?

That is not a question. What is "this"? The implication is rape, but the journalist doesn't want to say it, because he doesn't want it to be as obvious that HE is the one obsessed with rape. And again, it's obvious to anyone out there, rape became an issue because the media lied about it and made it an issue. Just as Milo Yiannopoulos is now stuck discussing homosexual underage sex, the media is what made it an issue, and is the only reason it is being discussed.

Are you happy?

This was more a forced question. This girl couldn't think of anything to say, but Roosh called on her. We'll chalk this up to friendly curiosity.

How much did this cost you?

Why do you want to know? Are you interested in quantifying the damage of your lies? Or are you just being a dick?

What's your vision for the future for male/female relations?

And here we have our second interesting question! And the first one that with any sort of journalistic merit that a reporter could develop into an interesting article.

Some dumbass in the back when pressed for a question says, "These guys have already asked most of the questions that I would have asked."

REALLY!??????? I would ask more interesting questions of a homeless stranger!

Besides anti-PC stuff, what do you like about Donald Trump?

This is a personal background question that might be somewhat interesting in a sit-down interview, so we'll give it half a point.

Why did you cancel the meetups?

And my faith is briefly restored, as we get a third real question, and the second one that has journalistic merit. What would have happened if the meetups were cancelled? How did you weigh that decision? Someone give this girl a gold star.

Why do the meetings in secret?

This is what I mean when I talk about absurd, self-evident questions. You could take a goat herder from Afghanistan, briefly explain to him that a men's meetup group was labeled as a rapists club by the media, and they had to cancel their meetings, and HE would be able to tell you why any meetings must take place privately (actually, he probably would be confused at a group of journalists having power over what men do in their private time together, but you get my point). If you can't figure this one out, turn in your journalism credentials immediately, if you haven't already lost your job yet.

Kudos to Roosh for being able to calmly and honestly answer this question. I have not the patience.

How many girls have you had sex with?

Making Lemonade from Yellow Crayons

I must congratulate Roosh for having the patience to sit through these inane, ridiculous questions from "professional" "journalists." To the dispassionate observer, they were boring and stupid. To someone personally affected by their lies, it must be enraging to have them treat the issue so trivially and amateurish.

Congratulations are in order for masterfully taking advantage of these absurd questions, and making a point when there was none in the question itself. Almost every absurd or self evident question was met not with the simple obvious answer, but used strategically to expound on an idea and attack the media for their buffoonery.

Results

Here we have 35 questions, 33 of which have no journalistic merit, indicating a 5.7% chance that if one is in a press conference, one will be asked an interesting, legitimate question. In total there were 3 decent questions and 3 half questions, so if one really stretched, around 12.9% of the questions were not absurd. How does this compare to the general public?

Fortunately we have just the data needed for such an experiment. We can look to the 131 questions Roosh answered from the general public late last year. Anyone with internet access who wished to pose a question could do so, and they were answered in a series of video chats on Youtube. Without examining all questions, I took a sample of 5 per each topic area. Here are the results followed by how many questions I deemed "good" or of universal appeal to a general audience.

Lifestyle / Health: 5/5. All were interesting questions. Example: What skills do you think 18-30 year olds should develop? Does it change after 30?

American Politics: 2/5. There were many "What would you do if given incredible political power" hypotheticals, which are not that interesting to me, but perhaps something cool for Roosh to dream about at night.

Religion / Spirituality: 4/5. Example: How can one prepare for the end / death?

Game / Travel: 5/5. No surprise here, as this is Roosh's core area of expertise, and there were many curious, thoughtful questions. Example: If you could live in one city for the next 5 years, what would it be?

Personal: 4/5. I didn't want to include this section, as personal questions are less likely to be of broad interest, but surprisingly the results were far above the journalist's rate of 5.7%. Example: If you do not marry and have children, how will you spend your remaining years?

Globalism / Politics: 3/5. Most of the questions here were still interesting. Example: Why do you care about what happens to Western civilization?

Patriarchy / Tradition: 5/5. Plenty of excellent, thoughtful questions here as well. Example: Do you conclude it is not the nation but urban vs rural ideals?

Conclusion

The total random sample from the Roosh questions: 28/35 good, thoughtful, interesting questions, or a ratio of 80%. Compared to the professional journalists rate of 5.7%. In other words, for every 14 press conferences held, journalists could ask as many good questions as one group of strangers.

Which set of questions would you rather have answered by Roosh: the full list of media questions presented in bold text, or the five sample questions above I drew from the general public? Which paint a picture of Roosh, provide interesting ideas worthy of discussion, or stimulate your thinking? Which have broader implications for society, or could impact your life? Personally, I'd take the worst question from the public list of 131 over the best of the journalists ("Why did you cancel the meetups?").

The media has proven themselves completely useless. Take your news from alternate sources, and consider looking abroad for a foreign media viewpoint. Do not trust the dishonest mainstream media, or clickbait publications like Buzzfeed. Their power is waning. The average age of a Fox news viewer is 68, and no mainstream news program comes even near the audience size of The Talking Dead, where people gossip about the episode of the zombie series the Walking Dead that just aired the prior hour.

The irony is that while sites like Infowars may dwarf CNN in audience size, the mainstream media still has huge influence and power. This is because the institution of the press is an important and valuable one, and it takes more than a few years of mismanagement to completely destroy it. If journalism schools keep teaching the same garbage that has created the current media mess, and average people off the street continue to do better jobs of asking and answering questions, one must wonder how long their power will continue.

Filling the Void

The continuing growth of ROK is proof that crowdsourced media will fill the void caused by the press. As major institutions have abandoned the values that Western civilization built up over centuries through patriarchy, moral codes, and religion, we are seeing a backlash directly from the people that see the decline in our society, our families, and our culture. We will not go quietly into the night.

(My personal sources of news include: CS Monitor, Steve Lendman Blog, Justin D Martin, Vineyard of the Saker, Non-Intervention, This Can't Be Happening, ZeroHedge, Infowars, and various international publications.)

Read Next: How To Incite Human Beings To Violence Through False Headlines

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

At Least 7 Dead In London After Fresh Terrorist Attacks During Ramadan's Bombathon

June 3, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Sun:

A GANG of five terrorists wearing stab-proof vests drove a B&Q van into pedestrians at 50mph on London Bridge before attacking revellers with hunting knives.

Up to seven people were feared dead and 20 hurt in the 10pm attack – amid a second incident at nearby Borough Market which armed police are responding to.

Two explosions have been heard outside The Sun offices in London Bridge at 1:23am and 1:25am.

A third huge explosion was heard at 1:28am near The Shard in London Bridge as multiple fire engines are parked outside.

Witness Erick Siguenza told BBC News that one of the gang screamed "This is for Allah" as he went on his stabbing rampage.

Staff at a packed pub in London Bridge locked the doors as the gang tried to smash their way in. Witnesses saw one man stabbed in the chest five times.

The gang had metal canisters strapped to their chests and two were gunned down – believe killed – by armed police, witnesses said.

Another three were thought to be still on the run as the police have confirmed that the attacks in London Bridge and Borough Market are "terror incidents."

One bystander is believed to have been shot in the head by crossfire.

The Metropolitan Police confirmed a third incident in the Vauxhall area, after tweeting “you must run, hide and tell,” which later turned out to be an unrelated stabbing.

Fifty armed police have stormed Monument station with police dogs and have told people to run. The travel hub along with nearby Bank station, both across the river from London Bridge, have been closed.

Prime Minister Theresa May has said the “terrible incident” is being treated as a “potential act of terrorism”.

Paul Clarke filmed the reported stabbing in a restaurant, with police since confiscating his phone for evidence.

He said he heard gunfire unleashed in the restaurant, with a man appearing to be a chef injured.

He said: “I saw three people coming in.

“I don’t know what he had in his hand, it looked like a big long weapon.

“There was a man, one of the kitchen staff, on the floor, and the man was doing a stabbing motion.

“I just thought, we’ve got to get out of here.”

He said he and his friends then ran from the scene.

Alex Shellum, a witness at Mudlark pub under London Bridge, described a horrifying attack in which a woman had her throat slit.

He said: “At around 10pm an injured woman came into the pub seeking assistance.

“She was bleeding heavily from the neck – it appeared that her throat had been cut.

“People sought to stem the bleeding and the pub was closed.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: 9 Measures To Prevent Future Terrorist Attacks

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Kathy Griffin’s Beheading Stunt Shows The Limits Of What The Public Can Stomach From The Left

June 4, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Washed up comedian Kathy Griffin thought it would be funny to take a picture of herself holding a fake bloody head of the president. Imitating ISIS-like terrorist acts somehow qualifies as comedy to the breed of fake comedians who are nothing more than abrasive political commentators. Griffin’s stunt didn’t go as she planned and now she is paying the consequences.

What Griffin did qualifies her for psychological therapy. If America wasn't infected with the social justice mind virus, the police would have checked her into the nearest psycho ward, not solely because of her actions, but due to the fact that she thinks it was a harmless bad joke that, according to her press conference, was the fault of the white man.

Her fake comedy frightened 11-year-old Barron Trump

According to reports, the president's youngest son Barron Trump was terrified of the picture, believing it to be real. Claiming that her actions were a mistake is a cop-out because just last December she declared that going after Barron was fair game.

> .@kathygriffin admitted in December that she was going after Barron Trump. Now she's crying misogyny at the direction of @LisaBloom. Moron. pic.twitter.com/UBY3ueb9Zc
>
> — John Cardillo (@johncardillo) June 2, 2017

Her claims of it being an accident has no merit what so ever. This was a clear attack against President Trump and his family.

The fake apology

> I am sorry. I went too far. I was wrong. pic.twitter.com/LBKvqf9xFB
>
> — Kathy Griffin (@kathygriffin) May 30, 2017

Griffin tried apologizing at first, stating, "I beg for your forgiveness. I went too far. I made a mistake and I was wrong." Then she hired liberal lawyer Lisa Bloom and quickly changed her position to blaming Trump and white men (forward to 22:40 in the below video). At first she brags how she will stand up to the “bully” Trump and then she breaks down in tears saying Trump “broke” her.

No one buys Griffin’s bullshit

CNN let her go. All her scheduled “comedic” events were cancelled. This sends a powerful message to elites who think everybody is on board with their hate mongering against decent Americans. The time when liberals could get away with these stunts are over, and from this point on they will be increasingly held responsible for their actions. In the case of Griffin, it appears to mean the end of her career.

Don’t Miss: Samantha Bee And Other Globocuck Comedians Are Leading The Rise In Fake Comedy

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

The Ugly Reality Of Online Dating

June 4, 2017 | by Adrian Braxton | Link | Original Link

Online dating used to be reserved for single parents and the washed up spinsters who had an easy way to lock down a beta provider as they would be the only men on there, but today things have changed and basically anyone who owns a smartphone is in the game.

Apps such as Tinder provide an easier outlet to engage in online dating for the younger generation, with an abundance of talent under the age of 35. With easy access to a variety of girls all with the swipe of a thumb, it would appear as though we have hit the jackpot, but for the majority of average guys out there, the harsh reality tells a different story.

Its not what it seems

It does seem like we have an easy and convenient option of meeting new girls, compared to the standard nightclub grind. Now you don't have to wait till the weekend in hopes that your friends might be keen on a night on the town to hit on women when it's more than likely you will be ending the night getting smashed and stuffing your face with a kebab while waiting for an Uber big enough to fit your blue balls in.

The new age of online dating has basically eliminated the need to rely on such endeavors as you can now hit on an unlimited amount of girls from your smartphone. However, we are paying the ultimate price for this convenience as it allows the majority of females the opportunity to fulfill their sexual desires at the detriment of the average bloke.

A tool to fuel the female ego

The rise of social media and online dating apps such as Tinder give females a platform for endless attention and validation. These reasons alone provide girls with leverage over most males in the sexual marketplace. Back in the day, girls would have to dress to the nines and smash a few bottles of cheap wine with their girlfriends while pre-drinking to pop music ready to get even less attention than they do now.

In a nightclub, girls may get hit on a few times by the more alpha or drunk guys, and maybe receive a few glances from some other guys, but not everyone in the spot will act on their urges. Tinder and social media provide all girls with an endless source of validation, because any guy can show their interest much easier than real life. The validation may come in the form of a like on social media or a right swipe on Tinder, which over time will cause an inflated ego and sense of self worth.

Set yourself apart to even the playing field

Most of my successes have been in real life situations based and my willingness to approach and the way I presented myself. If I'm in a nightclub and I'm one of the few guys to approach and make a good impression, there is more urgency for the girl to act on my advancements, since there is a chance she might not see me again. On Tinder, however, there is no urgency for a girl to see a guy who she finds attractive compared to a real life situation.

In the digital world, I am just one of many hundred other guys who could have approached her in a given week. It's hard to set yourself apart and gain the same attention compared to real life when any guy can easily approach online.

The ease of entry for any guy to get in the online game causes an increase in competition for the same girls. For instance, a Tinder profile can be set up quite easily—all you need is a few photos and your mum to take some cool muscle pictures of you while your flexing into the camera.

It's quite easy to become complacent and rely solely on online game as you can technically approach girls until you get thumb cramp, but with every other guy adopting the same strategy, girls will soon become saturated with unlimited options. This is because most guys are keen to pursue these girls.

Girls who receive attention from a large pool of guys have a false sense of their own value. And if provided with a large selection of potential candidates, girls will only chose the top value men, who may not want a relationship with these girls, but are still willing to sleep with them one or two times.

Things that earn the average guy points in real life like having the balls to cold approached in public along with the confidence and charisma that follows have a limited value in the online world. So while you're killing your pool workout at the gym and right swiping in-between sets, it will be that tall good-looking meathead with the shit tattoos that will be best served on Tinder.

Conclusion

Many of the average males are left with limited options, as girls who are less attractive than they are manage to secure intimacy with higher value males. Girls who have the option to sleep with higher value males will be reluctant to settle for guys of the same or lower level of attractiveness.

The result is a high number of guys who are not getting any action but are still helping validate these girls online. Due to the large amount of thirsty guys, girls are now in a position of power as they can control the sexual marketplace.

In a time where such harsh conditions are dictating the sexual marketplace, it is more important now to consider other alternatives, as only relying on Tinder will be a poor strategy. As previously highlighted in the manosphere, both day and night game can yield good results, especially if you commute into the city everyday on public transport. It also helps if you live in a city where you have strong social connections.

It is important for guys to realize the current state of dating in the modern digital society in order to be aware of the disadvantages they face, so appropriate steps can be taken in spite of the adversity.

Read More: 6 Reasons Why Online Dating Can Never Be As Good As Real Life

Adrian Braxton

You Can’t Reach Advanced Fitness Goals Without A Timer

June 4, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

“A timer?” You might find yourself asking. Yes, the humble stopwatch or timer is one of the most underrated tools you can use in your physical training. “Why?” you might ask yourself. There’s really two reasons.

The first is that timing yourself gives you a concrete goal to work for, and studies have shown that when there is a quantitative, measurable goal that is targeted (not just in fitness, but in anything that can be quantified, be it business or studies or hobbies), it is easier to reach that target.

The second is, admittedly, pretty related to the first one: Namely that, as I have discussed before, willpower is a virtual “muscle” that can be trained just as the actual skeletal muscles can be trained. Therefore, doing timed exercises and increasing the time for each exercise can train the willpower in addition to training whatever muscles are being trained during said exercise.

“Well, that sounds pretty good, Larsen!” you might say to yourself, “how do I use the timer in regards to exercise?”

You can use it either as a stop watch to adjudicate your speed—ie: running the time down to 0—or you can use it to measure a maximal amount of time, to see how long you can do a certain exercise.

Having used timers for both goals, I can say that it doesn’t exactly take a genius to figure out one exercise you use a stop watch for–running, both in terms of sprinting and distance running. However, there's really not much instruction you can give for running—at least, not as much as there is for resistance training, so I doubt you need me to tell you to put one foot in front of the other.

Instead, I will give you three resistance exercises that are typically done as static holds, that can be timed for purposes of training both muscular endurance and mental endurance (and another term for the latter is, of course, willpower).

The Horse Stance

One of the fundamentals of kung fu practice, the horse stance is also used as a judge of hip flexibility and, in certain occasions, as a method of corporal punishment in Asian countries for one simple reason—it's painful!

Keeping the back straight and the arms fully extended in front of the chest, bend the legs down so that the knees and hips are equal, and the thighs are parallel. The key is to keep the chest high and the arms straight out, bending at the waist takes some of the pressure off the legs and can be used to cheat.

Weighted rings, tea cups, and a bamboo spike under your ass are not required

The L-Sit

An old reliable abdominal exercise, this technique will hit all of the muscles of the abdomen, the hip flexors, and the shoulders and forearms as stabilizers. As a static hold, it too can be held for time, and doing so for a minute is one of the minimum requirements for entry onto the United States men's Olympic gymnastics team. Once a minute has been held, you can continue holding the L-Sit for even longer times, or contract the hip flexors even further and attempt a V-Sit

The Split

As I detailed in this article, the split is an exercise that almost demands long static holds to increase flexibility. So in essence you'll be training your willpower without even meaning to do so, just by the nature of increasing your flexibility

Overhead Press Hold

The only weighted exercise in this article, the overhead press can be held for extended periods of time to strengthen the endurance of the shoulders. You can combine this with a farmer's walk to strengthen the core as well. Be careful that you don't do this with the same weight that your maximum overhead press is done with, as that might risk injury.

Neck bridge

You all know my love of bridging, and the neck bridge is no exception. Doing so is a very uncomfortable position, which makes it optimal for training your willpower. In addition, strengthening the neck makes you less susceptible to blows to the head, as illustrated by how many boxers and martial artists do neck bridging to strengthen their “chins”.

All of these exercises can be done with a timer, and these elements can be combined to improve your overall fitness.

Read Next: How To Increase Your Willpower

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Women Want To Ban Men From Approaching Them While Still Insisting Men Make The First Move

June 5, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

How do relationships form? First, two people must talk to each other, but men are culturally expected to initiate. Therefore, stigmatizing conversation in the form of "street harassment" laws will end up removing attention from women, who value it far more than men. Feminism already has criminalized flirting at work, but now they want to ruin it everywhere.

The goal of second wave feminism was to destroy families. The resulting sexual revolution brought about a chaotic free-for-all, but lately that's not enough for them. These twisted souls are trying to prevent men from starting conversations. In some places, they even have made it a crime. If they get their way everywhere, you could get arrested for conducting a perfectly normal human activity. You might even get busted for a non-flirtatious conversation if someone takes it the wrong way.

Women have absolute control over how far an interaction (or a relationship) goes; that's understood. However, feminists now want to abrogate your freedom of speech.

The feminist spin

Never try to chat up Diana, especially if she's hungry.

Like so much newly made up leftist terminology, "street harassment" is a framing tactic loaded with unstated assumptions. The foremost is equating normal conversation with harassment. Note well, they don't differentiate polite approaches from being a sleazebag. Feminists conflate regular behavior with wrongdoing, try to frighten the public (sounds familiar?), and label it a pseudo-crime.

Furthermore, only straight guys are stigmatized. Women talking to men, or each other, isn't "street harassment". Neither do feminists condemn guy-on-guy approaches, because that would be "homophobia". Another unstated assumption follows the "all men are oppressors" meme. Finally, standards are subjective. Since they get to decide what's improper, you're never safe from the self-appointed morality police.

This prudery is really about demonizing all types of male sexuality. If they'd just say "don't be a sleazebag", they'd have a point. However, their bias is showing more than some tease's cleavage.

That video (you know which one)

The narrative kicked into high gear with the video "10 Hours of Walking in NYC as a Woman", which ends with a request for donations. Our pals at HuffPo explained:

> Rob Bliss of Rob Bliss Creative makes viral videos for a living and decided to use his craft to shine a light on street harassment, a pervasive issue affecting females around the world. Partnering with actress Shoshana B. Roberts and Hollaback, a nonprofit movement launched by activists to end street harassment, Bliss packaged his production as a PSA and offers viewers a different perspective > on the problem. […]

>
> His intent, he said, was to offer an "unbiased" look at what many women experience on a daily basis.

The actress received 108 incidents of alleged street harassment. That sounds pretty awful! Some items indeed transgressed good taste, things I'd certainly recommend not doing. I get it—being a sleazebag is bad.

However, some of it wasn't objectively offensive, like "How are you doing?" or "God bless". Perhaps some were just being friendly and no more. The video was edited from ten hours of walking in a form-fitting outfit through some sketchy parts of the Big Apple. The cherry-picking was pretty obvious, and the racial and class implications displeased many leftist commentators. Clashes of narratives can be quite entertaining! All that aside, one of the dudes actually had a pretty good point:

> Somebody's acknowledging you for being beautiful. You should say thank you more.

Much discussion and other videos followed. For instance, it was demonstrated that men get "harassed" too. Also, wearing Muslim garb stops all attention. The best responses were the Austin hipster, the kosher version (oy veh!). and especially the Princess Leia video.

The feminists are wrong

Surely that outfit was chosen completely at random, right???

Although the feminists have been trying to forbid even polite approaches, as usual they're out of touch with what normal women want and need. We've heard quite enough from the blue-haired harpies. Now let's come back to reality and examine what normal women think.

Do women want attention? Of course they do! If they wanted zero attention, they'd all wear burqas. Instead, dressing sharp is an art form. That's why the cosmetics industry exists. Some of them get breast implants. When they show cleavage, it's for a reason. All this is to maximize their erotic capital, far beyond what men do. Now take a wild guess why. If it were forbidden for us to give women attention, not only would it wreck their social lives, that would disempower them greatly.

Anyone who disbelieves that men are socially expected to approach needs look no further than The Rules, one of the most popular dating guides for women. Right at the beginning is the chapter "Don't Talk to a Man First (and Don't Ask Him to Dance)" They make it very clear that it's the man's job to open the conversation. Further, although men and women interact a lot in work contexts, it's still on us guys to escalate.

The introduction indicates that the book is traditional advice passed down through generations; in that case, its millions of readers certainly aren't the only ones thinking that way. Obviously its authors have a much better position to speak for women's cultural opinion than the feminist fruitcakes.

The dating coach Tony D wrote an eye-opening piece about how feminism has wrecked the social environment in Vancouver. Men are shamed if they approach. However, many guys complied and now women ask "where did all the good men go?" He heavily cites female perspectives from mainstream news sources; for one telling example:

> I mean, how many months of interactions do we have to have before you balls up and ask me out? Oh wait…you won't.

The harpies have ruined it for everyone. Tony summarizes:

> Women complain that they aren't being approached, but then they complain when we approach you. What Do You Want? You want the guy you're attracted to to approach you. Unfortunately, we don't know if you'll find us attractive, until we approach you.

We're damned if we do, damned if we don't. This is what happens when feminists are allowed to dictate the rules of social interactions.

Don't listen to feminists

Triggered much?

Take a wild guess what will happen if you obey the feminists. That's right—if you won't open any conversations, then you won't get results, but all the guys who disobey will be light years ahead of you. What makes them think they can dictate to us, anyway?

Don't let these crabby tranquilizer addicts ruin our social environment worse than they already have. If they get their way with forbidding men from opening conversations, they'll move the goalposts like they always do. Expect them to set their sights on the "male gaze" and try to forbid you from noticing anyone. They're already calling it "eye rape". So women can express their sexuality to great extremes, but appreciating it is conflated with a felony, and disapproving of it is "slut shaming". Meanwhile, it's reprehensible for men to express their sexuality. Who the hell do these feminists think they are?

The final word is that being a sleazebag is obviously bad, but there's nothing wrong with starting a polite conversation. Anyone who can't handle that without having a meltdown is terminally immature and unworthy of your companionship. Their neuroses are not your problem.

If you liked this, then don't miss The Adventures of MP0werdW0myn and OmegaMan: Mission 1 – Operation Cockblock

Read More: Men Who Cold Approach Women Should Be Proud Of Themselves

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

What Happens When You Combine The Best Parts Of Direct And Indirect Day Game

June 5, 2017 | by Jon Connor Castaway | Link | Original Link

Let me start by declaring, one of the most exciting and dynamic discussions in the progression of day game is the utility of direct versus indirect approach styles. More or less it is the difference between you openly asserting your sexuo-romantic desires at the beginning or doing so at a later time.

Indirect allows for more passive or stress-free socialization because it does not foist a sudden ultimatum upon the ladyfriend (i.e. either reciprocate the sexual intentionality or reject it), although at the same time it leaves you more exposed to social stagnation. In opposition, direct affords you the opportunity to foster an attractively confident portrait of yourself in the woman's mind, but can also leave you open to the unfavorable situation of coming off aggressively arrogant, and thus losing in the short term what you may have otherwise acquired.

To properly describe the optimal day game 'technique,' we must make a finer distinction about the way direct/indirect approaches appear when practiced in everyday life. Therefore, we must conceptually separate, and individually evaluate, the two primary forms of human communication i.e. verbal language vs. body language, and specifically in relation to their direct and indirect manifestations in the world at large.

When dealing with the intricacy of these types of human interactions, it is imperative that we keep in mind the social context in which they occur. And for day game in casual settings such as class, or the coffee shop, or just on the plain old side-walk, it is necessary to tailor the specifics of one's game to complement the circumstance at hand.

It breaks down like this. If your game is lacking or “unidimensional” (i.e all direct or all indirect), you are very likely to get caught losing chicks by falling into one of two pussy-repelling extremes, Wussiness or Douchebaggery. On the whole, if the girl thinks you are either weak (physically, fiscally, or socially) or conversely an unpleasantly rude or crude person to talk to, you probably ain’t getting laid. So, the question is how do we synthesize a softer (but at the same time) commanding strategy to the proverbial cold approach, which can be confidently applied, in full sun, during a majority of routine interactions?

After a very great deal of thought and an even greater amount of in the field, placebo controlled, single-blind studies spread among the 25,000 women age 17-25 who inhabit my university, I have come to the see quite clearly that employing a bipartisan policy of direct body language coupled with indirect verbal language provides the world’s most effective day game tactic*. Now, you may ask why I am so confident in this particular means of attack, well, the logic goes like this…

Direct Body Language

Let me begin with the “undertones” you use to communicate, the subtle yet powerful physical actions and attributes you use to tell a women you’re ready, able, and interested. This is the bedrock of your game and therefore extremely important because it can either solidify the smooth and sultry move you just made, or it can fidget and sweat you into a lake that promptly downs all change of vaginal acquisition.

Therefore the first thing to keep in mind can be best captured from a Samuel L. Jackson line in the ending scene of Pulp Fiction, “…and when you do it, you do it cool.” Staying loose and relaxed is the starting point for all well composed communication. It shows that you are someone who is well within his comfort zone beginning, and being in conversation with new and attractive women. Without this chill you will soon be fried, but being calm, cool, and collected is not the end of the story if what you’re really seeking is maximum results.

I buy the saying, ‘add a little edge’. That is, besides standing tall, with good posture, smiling comfortably, making strong and confident eye contact, and not appearing overly excited, you should to take it one step further. That little step my friends, is the touch barrier.

It has been addressed by many before me and is a very effective means for directly confirming your physical intentions without saying a word. Of course, above all, be tactful. You need the act to communicate safety, security, and masculinity, not sleaziness (not yet anyway). Remember that first touch should be strong but mostly platonic in nature. Depending on the environment even a solid handshake is better than no touch at all. If you are overly weak or distinctly aggressive you will very likely lose the white-tail.

In short, you need to routinely hold a strong physical presence, you need to literally put yourself out there with a solid foundation of confidence and hold your ground with pride and determination, this is the first half of building yourself an optimal day game.

Indirect Verbal Language

Once again, as with game in general, and with day game in particular, it is absolutely essential to keep in mind the kind of environment in which you are operating. Let me paint the scene. You've out for a quick lunch at a local coffee and sandwich shop eating a BLT with delicious San Francisco sourdough, creamy Mayo, crisp lettuce, and cuts of hickory smoked bacon so thick they might as well be mini pork-chops, when you notice a knock-out. I mean a goddamn knock-out. Like, damn.

Now, sadly, your first impulse may be to launch an all out social assault on her, complete with a few overzealous comments about how astoundingly beautiful she is, how you've never seen anyone like her before, and how you would be beyond honored to waste your hard earned money paying for her nightly booze induced debauchery. Or, you may enter the road from the other ditch. That is, sadly, your first impulse is more or less 'shut down', start sweating, and never get your ass up out of that seat in the first place. It does not take a prodigy of social navigation to see that both of these extremes leave you in a piss poor position to take her out.

Here is where indirect verbal language really shines. Here is where the middle way (as the Buddha would say) can reach its full potential. Now what exactly do I mean by indirect language? I mean this, probably initiating, and mostly leading, a light but interesting conversation concerning almost any topic besides your physical desire for the women at hand. Simple as that. This conversation could center around the building you're in, the food you had, the happenings of the town, local sports teams or artists, interesting hobbies and social activities, or a hodgepodge mix of all of the above.

This last part is hard, but all you have to do is try. It's like my old man used to say "Look where you wanna go." It's the same with women as with driving, as with life in general.

Just take her for the ride.

Read More: Indirect Vs. Direct Game: Which Is Really Better When You Approach A Beautiful Girl?

Jon Connor Castaway
Jon C. Castaway "strives on untiringly" towards evenhanded thought, word, and action. With a degree in Cognitive Neuroscience he writes regularly for Driftwood Fish Press and Gold Coast Diversity, on topics from social issues and biology to economics and the arts. For contact: @JoCoCastaway

Why Men Should Read The Works Of Sallust

June 5, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Men read historical works for many reasons. Sometimes they want to be instructed; at other times, they prefer entertainment. But when a work can combine both of these things in a compelling and evocative style, the reward is that much greater. Caius Sallustius Crispus, known simply as Sallust, is one of those rare historians whose works have achieved a timeless relevance through their matchless balance of entertainment and instruction.

Who Was Sallust?

Caius Sallustius Crispus was born in 86 B.C. at the town of Amiternum, which was located northeast of Rome. His family seems to have been of modest means, and he was able to receive a decent education in Rome. We know very little about his early life; but his non-aristocratic origins may provide a clue in explaining the historian's seething antagonism towards the nobility.

Judging from the accusations of moral looseness made against him by his political enemies, we may guess that he enjoyed himself as a youth. He was fully embroiled in the turbulent—and brutal—factional politics of his era. The end result of his forays into politics was that Sallust was expelled from the senate in 50 B.C. for alleged moral turpitude.

Cicero denounces Catiline in the Roman senate

His star rose with Julius Caesar's. In 47 B.C.—after the Battle of Pharsalia, the event that clinched Caesar's victory in the civil war—Sallust was able to return to the senate. From this point his loyal service to Caesar continued to the very end. He went with him to Africa in 46 B.C. to mop up the remnants of Pompey's forces. Sallust remained there as governor of Numidia when Caesar left. Nevertheless, Sallust's time in Numidia was marred by controversy; he is said to have engaged in corruption and extortion.

When he returned to Rome about 45 B.C., formal charges were filed against him; the intervention of his patron Caesar apparently saved him from conviction. He retired from public life in 44 B.C. and thereafter devoted himself to literary pursuits. His only completed surviving works are the two historical monographs The Conspiracy of Catiline and The War of Jugurtha.

What Did He Write About?

The Conspiracy of Catiline tells the story of a failed coup d'état by a renegade senator named Lucius Catiline. While we cannot be certain of the year of its composition, a date sometime between 44 and 40 B.C. is probably correct. It is likely that the work was intended for a popular audience that would have hungered for a racy, lurid account of the events leading up to the attempted takeover. But like every great historian, Sallust manages to take a relatively minor episode and elevate it to supreme moral significance. Catiline manages to be both an exciting drama and a supremely relevant study of the pathology of moral corruption.

The War of Jugurtha (Bellum Jugurthinum) is a longer, more complex, and richly layered work. It was probably composed in 41 B.C., but Sallust must have begun collecting source material for the book during his time in Numidia. The work describes the origin and conduct of Rome's war against the wily Numidian king Jugurtha. Jugurtha is, in some ways, also a sorely neglected manual of counter-insurgency in a North African setting.

What are Sallust's themes?

The opening passages of both works brilliantly set the tone in a way that really must be read to be believed. Three Sallustian motifs appear repeatedly in his works: moral corruption, fortune, and virtue. He is passionately concerned with the moral decay brought on by excessive wealth. As the prologue to Catiline makes very clear (X-XIII), Sallust believed that the expanding Roman empire's military acquisitions had set in motion a process of moral corruption and political decay.

But this process of decay could be reversed by implementing the mores and virtues of "our ancestors" (mos maiorum). While fortune seems to have the final say in human affairs (Cat. VIII), it can still be very much influenced by a man's virtue (virtus). Virtus for Sallust meant manliness, valor, or strength of character. For Sallust, an adverse change in fortune is usually the result of degenerate behavior caused by corrupted morals. If so, then the reverse was also true: a man could turn fortune to his favor by exercising his masculine virtue.

His anger and sorrow at the failure of his countrymen to preserve the character and moral qualities of their ancestors are expressed in the opening chapters of Jugurtha (I—IV). For Sallust, character is everything. Without it, a man is of no consequence; he will forever remain a useful pawn in the service of the rich and powerful.

"Jugurtha's Table" in Tunisia

His writing style is bold, masculine, rhetorically luminous, and brief. Every sentence, every clause, has a purpose. He does not waste time giving too much background information in his narratives. The rudimentary ethnographic information he gives about North Africa in Jugurtha (XVII—XIX) is only as long as it has to be, and no more. He does not fulminate against or denounce the characters in his histories; he lays out his own value system, describes the actions of the principals, and expects his readers to draw their own conclusions from what they read.

What remain are historical accounts of stark but surpassing beauty. Among the many unforgettable passages in Sallust, the following stand out: the opening paragraphs of both works; the indictment of Roman corruption in Cat. XXXVI et. seq.; the fearsome description of the blood-soaked battlefield in Jug. CI; the fighting death of Catiline and the lamentation of the survivors in Cat. LXI; the brilliant speeches of Caesar, Cato, and Marius; the gyrating spectators of the cavalry battle in Jug. LX; the slaughter of the trapped Roman garrison at Vaga in Jug. LXVII; the fall of Capsa and its brutal aftermath in Jug. XCI; and the strange legend of the Philaeni brothers in Jug. LXXIX. Once read, these passages are never forgotten.

Why Is Sallust So Relevant Today?

Central to Sallust's worldview was the idea that a man's character would ultimately determine his fate. Small flaws, over time, could very much become large flaws. He had seen and experienced first-hand how greed, corruption, and self-delusion could prove to be the ruin of men, armies, and nations. Who today, looking at the landscape of current events, can doubt that our culture has paid far too little attention to this eternal truth?

Sallust's lessons resonate more powerfully today than they ever have, precisely because our culture is literally drowning in hubris, arrogance, and corruption. This was one of the driving forces that let me to publish a new translation of his works that was specifically designed for the modern reader, one that would include detailed footnotes, maps, diagrams, tables, topical charts, and other special features. Unless we wish to follow the same roads to ruin laid out by men like Catiline and Jugurtha, Sallust warns us, we must do our best to master and discipline ourselves. The choice is up to us. Click here to learn more about the book.

Read More: How To Spot Pop Culture Indoctrination

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

As It Becomes Clear That Donald Trump Cannot Save The West, Only One Outcome Becomes Inevitable

June 6, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Donald Trump symbolizes the West's outrage with a totally corrupt political structure that is rotting out society from within. There is little doubt among both the right and the left that public opinion matters very little when it comes to decision making in the halls of power. What does matter is who bankrolls the legislative prostitutes who call themselves "representatives" when bills are crafted and passed in the slimy Beltway and other crumbling capitals of the West.

It's always interesting and important to put what is happening on the small scale of history we are living day to day into a larger historical scheme. There's an important work that does just that. As reported here at ROK in the past, Oswald Spengler's Decline Of The West made some stunningly accurate predictions for the world of today when it was published a century ago.

It's important to revisit this work in greater detail as it is more relevant now than ever with what's happening in American politics.

The Predictions

Democracy ultimately fails because economic powers corrupt it and gridlock forms as both sides become polarized

As evidence we are playing out the string of events predicted by Spengler, all of the following predictions for the ongoing decline of Europe and its spin-off civilization of Anglo America (the U.S. and Canada—and lets not forget Australia) have come true. Here are the events we are living through as predicted a century ago in his civilization model:

- Domination of Money. Economic powers permeating the political forms and authorities. This is plain to see as economic powers now rule both sides of the pond and down under rather than "representatives" who are supposed to represent the Will of the People and not economic interests.
- Transition from constitutional order to informal sway of individuals. This is also plain to see, as the Constitution of the U.S. is being scrapped by the Patriot Act, NDAA, TSA, and all sorts of insidious legislation designed to gut the Bill of Rights. Personality is beginning to matter more than principle as we are seeing with the recent elections of Obama and Trump.
- Imperialism. America now has military bases in 130 out of 196 nations on the planet and its foreign and military policy usually involves imposing the ideals of American business interests abroad.

The above bullet points are where we find ourselves today. The below is what is predicted to come this century.

- Formation of Caesarism. Victory of force-politics over money. Increasing primitiveness of political forms. Inward decline of the nations into a formless population, and constitution thereof as an Imperium of gradually-increasing crudity of despotism. Once again, we can already see this happening in the West. Political forms are becoming more primitive and tribal in nature. Western nations are becoming demographic polyglot boarding houses. The government is becoming increasingly autocratic and unresponsive to the needs and wishes of its people. All that's left is the victory of force-politics over money.

Spengler thought blood was the only force that could overcome the power of money, and indeed, as one politician after another make lofty promises that go unfulfilled once they assume the reigns of power, more and more people are beginning to realize voting is doing nothing to change their lot in life. As user "Dan" recently put it on my comments thread: The people who actually have the power to change things simply won't. Why? Because the system worked for them.

The formation of Caesarism is an idea we have touched on previously, but never has it been so plain that's where the West is headed than with the election of Donald Trump and what he represents in the minds of his supporters.

Trump is Only the Beginning

Trump reflects only the beginning of the desire of the people to have a strong, resolute leader

While Trump reflects the desire of the Silent Majority to finally have their voices heard, it appears they'll have to wait for a future strongman to actually implement their demands. Unfortunately, it seems Trump won't be the savior many had hoped for as he has proven he is least partly compromised by lauding the passing of Obamacare Lite by a RINO Congress, and by creating a sideshow about taking America out of the global warming scam when the very next day his Vice President said the deal would merely be renegotiated and is not dead on arrival.

In effect, the global warming flap amounts to much ado about nothing once again, the typical Washington playbook. This playbook says to bait the public with a false narrative and let the two sides of the political aisle fight it out until they're exhausted. The false narrative – which both sides bought hook, line and sinker – is that global taxation via global warming was stopped by Trump. This narrative is the shadow in Plato's cave. However, looking beyond the shadow, the truth is renegotiation changes little more than details of which globalists get your tax money and how much they get to fight an element on the periodic table that all life cannot live without – carbon. Even Trump once famously said the global warming narrative is a hoax designed to rob the taxpayer. Why would he renegotiate a deal based on a hoax?

Chalk this one up as yet another issue Trump has pivoted away from his base on, including his astonishing remarks that he was a nationalist and a globalist a month ago. The two ideals are incompatible. Obama shafted the left with broken promises and soaring rhetoric. Will Trump shaft the right?

Look beyond the shadows in Plato's cave to see the truth

Putting political game playing aside, the important point is what Trump represents in the minds of his followers. People want a resolute leader, and are sick of squabbling Demicans and Republicrats who exist only to rule them, fool them, and rob them. If Trump doesn't deliver tangible change, and it appears he will offer little more than window dressing and platitudes, the masses will become increasingly disgusted with and disinterested in political promises in the future.

There are additional issues that will exacerbate the fatigue with politics as usual in the West. As immigrants displace natives from the West, there will be increasing conflict rendering democracy unworkable. This relates to the "formless population" ideal elucidated above. There is little doubt that whites and other immigrant groups have very different ways of life. Once whites become minorities in their native lands, displaced by other ethnic groups, tension will mount. Democracy will become unworkable as the different factions vie for control and political supremacy.

As we've seen, Spengler's predictions tell us when the time comes the people will demand a resolute leader and discard gridlocked, ineffective government in which their demands fall on deaf ears. They will welcome a man of decision, who brings order to the chaos caused by democracy.

The question that remains is once democracy breaks down, will we get a good Caesar or a bad one? If the new strongman is blessed by the elite, the masses can expect unrelenting torment as only a fraction of the elite's ultimate aims are being felt because the remains of democracy provide a buffer against total abuse of the populace – for the time being. If the new strongman ascends the throne from below, there's at least a decent chance he'll begin to dismantle the control matrix being devised by the corporate-government complex.

Do you think the end of democracy would be a good thing? Would a good or bad Caesar assume power? It's interesting to think about, since Spengler's predictions thus far have been spot-on for the declining Western world.

Read More: The Peak Of Democracy And The Death Of Feminism

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

6 Influential Men Who Body-Slammed Feminism

June 6, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

We all know the tricks and trades of feminists. Now they're using scripted claims and follow-up answers to force their ideology down your throat. Many normal men and women who come across these talking points may find themselves at a loss for words against these feminists as they refuse to accept facts like 70%+ of divorce cases being initiated by women.

Men living in the West may feel unsure of how to handle feminists without having to stoop to their level. However, here are some men who have defeated the dark illusions of feminism by using reason and logic. Let's see how they did it.

Marc Rudov

Rudov is an investment banker who decided to stop accepting the prefabricated notions of "equality" between men and women. He argues against the societal norm that men must pay for women all the time in exchange for their company. He defines chivalry as BS—benevolent sexism, where women are put on a pedestal that creates a generation where women feel entitled to all the comforts of life generously provided by the inferior man.

Marc also argues that most women are more than able to pay for men, but don't because they feel they are entitled to being served. Watch him shed light on what feminism really is, and how he deals with angry feminists.

One woman in the audience said men don't know the pain women go through when pregnant and menstruating, a common tactic used. What they fail to acknowledge is the pain, sacrifice, and struggle men go through to take care of their wives and children.

Ben Shapiro

A religious Jew, Shapiro goes head to head with a pro abortion feminist. Transgenderism is trying to be pushed as normal, even though the media ignores the cold hard fact that the transgender population has one of the highest suicide rates. The feminist in the video argues for pro choice and Planned Parenthood, even though they profit off of killing babies and the founder herself, Margaret Sanger, called for the elimination of the black race.

> "We do not want word to go out that we want to exterminate the Negro population, and the minister is the man who can straighten out that idea if it ever occurs to any of their more rebellious members." – Margaret Sanger

Sanger was also one of the first promoters of eugenics, the idea of controlling population by only allowing those deemed worthy to reproduce. She even spoke at a Klu Klux Klan rally.

The fact that nearly 80% of all Planned Parenthood abortion clinics are conveniently located near Black and Hispanic neighborhoods is another under reported truth feminists don't want to accept.

Sadhguru

The world famous Eastern guru was put on the spot when asked the question, "if we have more women leaders, would we have a more peaceful world?" Sadhguru turned it around by explaining the yin and yang concept, and that women are brought up to identify with a perverted form of masculinity only.

He put it so elegantly that he even got Huffington herself to agree that the excessive masculinity forced on women is dangerous. Got to give the guru props for his boldness. Sadhguru even shared that who he is today is mainly due to his mother's femininity.

Thomas Sowell

A graduate of Harvard before affirmative action was put into place, Sowell is a perfect example of what a minority can become when they stop blaming the white man for all their failures. When presented with the idea that men are ruling the world and suppressing women, his answer was the same as with everything else: show me the evidence.

Again, through common sense and cold hard facts, Sowell revealed that the opposite was actually true. Women are the ones who are attending college, making more money, moving up in career, and are getting more opportunities than men when you analyze equal variables.

Michael Savage

The popular talk radio host is known for his hard style tell it like it is fashion, and so when a caller tries to push the view that women can do everything men can do, Savage enlightens her with comparing a woman on battlefield to a male soldier.

For biological reasons, most women will find the situation unbearable and this can negatively impact the morale of troops. Of course, there are exceptions, but the vast cases are undeniably clear: most women are not cut out for military combat. Sure, it looks good in Hollywood, but the reality is the physical fitness standard in the U.S. armed forces have gone downhill in order to recruit females.

If you're going to have women in the military, they should adhere to the same standard as everyone else and not be given a free pass.

Gavin McInnes

The loud, outspoken, and sometimes hilarious author made Sean Hannity laugh on air with his brutally honest speech. Watch him go head to head with a Fox News contributor advising her to get married and have kids instead of being miserable endlessly pursuing career success.

The light reveals the truth

Both men and women have been subject to lies and manipulation when it comes to the sexes. This is why you have sky-high divorce rates and the creation of alternative online spaces like ROK help educate each other and protect themselves.

Feminist lies can only continue for so long, because eventually the light will sweep the darkness away.

Read More: Feminism Comes Full Circle Into Embracing Aristotle's "Natural Slavery"

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

Hard Lessons From The Life Of Extraordinary Ballet Dancer Sergei Polunin

June 6, 2017 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

I went to see to the movie "Dancer" a few days ago. This is a documentary on a (relatively) unknown legendary ballet dancer, Sergei Polunin. The movie was released in 2016, but only recently has made it to Israel. The film sneaks under the radar several red-pill truths that are less obvious if one is unaware. I went to see it with a Russian girl, and she confirmed that the movie is true, and that the story is not fabricated.

The movie starts with Polunin sitting in an awkward position, breathing heavily. We do not know what is going on, as this will become clear later in the movie.

Background and story

The movie tells the story of Sergei Polunin by showing footage and interviewing friends, relatives, and Sergei himself. He was born in 1989 at the town of Kherson, an only child to his parents. He was identified in an early age by the local sports authorities as a great gymnastics before switching to ballet. It seems that he also possessed great flexibility.

When he was 9, his family decided to make sure he will not suffer their fate of poverty. So he moved with his mother to Kiev in order to become part of the Choreographic Academy, while his father and grandmother moved abroad in order to provide the necessary means for his academy tuition.

His mother was a major force in his life, pushing him to excel and train hard. At the age of 13 he moved to London, as his mother assessed the situation and decided that this would be the best way to advance his career. However, his family could not join him there so he had to live alone in a new country with no knowledge of its language or culture. He was considered a ballet genius and at the age of 18 became the youngest principal performer ever for the London Royal Ballet. He was compared to Rudolf Nureyev, the great Soviet dancer who defected to the West.

After two years of immense success, Polunin started to “lose it”. He suffered from depression, started to party and use drugs and eventually quit at the age of 22. He could not stand the pressure and just wanted to “rest”. He soon became aware that he needed to dance, but his reputation as a “loose cannon” did not help.

Eventually he participated in a Russian reality show (“Big Ballet”) and then joined The Stanislavsky Music Theatre and Novosibirsk State Academic Opera and Ballet Theatre. It is mentioned that Igor Zelensky, a former ballet dancer and artistic director, became some sort of father figure for him. That did not work out well, as he quit after less than a year there.

Then we finally understand the beginning of the movie. Polunin decided to quit dancing completely. In order to do so he reached out to his friend Jade Hale-Christofi to create a final dance to the sound of Hozier’s song “Take me to church”. Before dancing that part he actually cried for nine hours. After dancing, and the clip became viral, he actually decided to keep on dancing and even made peace with his family.

Red-Pill lessons from the movie

To achieve greatness you need to work harder than everyone

That was covered by the manosphere endlessly (my favorite example). You can see how much effort and training were poured into his life. At one point in the movie, he says that during his teens, he practiced twice as much as the other kids. We are talking about the 1% ballet dancers in the world, and he practiced harder than them! The guy had talent, no doubt, but he still worked harder than everyone.

Balance is crucial

Polunin, to my understanding, burned himself up. He was doing ballet all day long. In one part of the movie he says that the body is so used to hard work that if he takes a day off it aches. I'm not sure if this is true, but even if it is – rest is required.

Partying all night and working hard all day will get you both mentally and physically exhausted. I don't care if you are the world leading ballet dancer, you still need to rest. Other commentators in the movie said that being a principal requires a hermit way of life. If this is true, one must make sure to factor that in as well. It seems that Polunin could not, or did not want to have that. Which brings me to the next lesson…

A father figure is critical for personal development

"Deprived" of his father since the age of 9, Polunin did not see his father for years. The result: depression, partying, substance abuse, and, in my belief, an inability to relax and balance one's life. As beta as his father is portrayed in the movie, he was still a good influence on him as a child (they both tell how they did stuff together like a typical father and son). No one took his father's place as a role model until it was too late.

Dominating mother creates lack of masculine maturity

By the end of the movie, we witness Polunin and his mother converse. He says to her that she dominated his life as a child, and she corrects him – she controlled his life. It is not sure if she is proud of it.

The result of four years with a domineering mother was that he lacked the masculine stability to not only reach the top, but to stay there. It becomes clear as he states that he asked his family not to come see him in all the years he has been on stage. He had the feeling that he is not good enough for his mother. That is not a sign of healthy relationship. Which brings me to the next point…

One needs a ritual to move from childhood to adulthood

Also covered extensively by the manosphere (One of my favorite examples). In order to move from boy/teen to adult we all know that a ritual or ceremony is needed. Otherwise a boy does not become a man. Hardships are also part of it.

Polunin decided to dance once last time. He had to confront his inner self and drop the major part of his identity. By doing that, he was able to understand that: 1) dancing is part of him, 2) he could make peace with his family. That is my interpretation. I bet others may have a completely different outlook on that event.

That is one possible ritual

Conclusion

I recommend seeing the movie, as it is an interesting tale of an extraordinary person. What the movie lacked is any glimpse to his romantic life. I took the time to look it up and found that our protagonist is not gay, but dates an older ballerina.

Apart from that, the director did a very good job in portraying a complex person with an interesting life story. Notice also that he had his body tattooed with eleven different tattoos – some childish and some meaningful. In any case, red-pill lessons are “hidden” in the movie. One just needs to open one’s eyes to notice them. Watch the video of him dance; it is inspiring…

Read Next: 5 Reasons Why Every Man Needs Partner Dancing

Dawn Pine

Dawn Pine (aka TheMaleBrain) is an Israeli 40+ divorced father of 2, former casualty of the blue-pill. Since he has taken the red pill his hobbies are: working out, writing, mentoring, harem management and self improvement.

How To Be Persistent Without Being Needy

June 6, 2017 | by Marcus Awakuni | Link | Original Link

In the show Californication, Hank Moody is a womanizing author who always has his heart with his ex-wife, Karen. Whenever they see each other, he always tries to kiss her, flirt with her, and get her back. No matter how many times she declines, he always gives it another shot. Sounds needy, right?

Taken at face value, Hank Moody sounds like a needy, borderline sociopathic stalker who won't let his ex-love go. But somehow when you watch his attempts to rekindle his romance with Karen on the show, he doesn't appear to be needy at all.

How is this possible?

A paradox in dating and relationships is that the last man standing usually gets the girl, but when he contacts her too often, he's being needy. Remember Mikey from the movie Swingers when he leaves 6 messages on Nikki's voicemail in a span of 10 minutes?

So what's the difference between Mikey and Hank Moody?

Playful indifference. It's the kind of vibe that guys who are naturally good with women have. They exude a lightheartedness about them, and it seems like even if things don't go their way, they don't really care.

If you ever notice someone who is naturally good with women, and naturally good with people in general, he is able to have a good time with anyone. He doesn't discriminate between old or young, male or female.

Many guys are worried about approach anxiety, but if you have this vibe throughout your daily life, you'll know how to approach a girl you don't know with ease. In fact, you'll find that many women will want to have conversations with you without you having to elicit it. Thus, a guy with playful indifference can start conversations and make multiple sexual advances without creeping a girl out. In fact, she'll often laugh and be charmed by his audacity.

The reason guys with this vibe can get away with so much is because they build up social capital. To explain social capital, imagine if one of your best friends from school tells you, "Hey, I need $10 for lunch, can you help me out?" Most likely, you'd be more than willing to spot him.

Now imagine if you come across a homeless man on the street who asks you for $10. All of the sudden, you become Ebenezer Scrooge. Why?

Well, you've known your best friend for years, but the homeless man is just a raggedy stranger to you. Basically, your friend has built up lots of social capital with you, and the homeless man has none.

You can think of social capital as a bank account for trust. Whenever you share a laugh or an experience with someone, you're making deposits into each other's social bank accounts. And when you have enough trust built up in the account, the other person is more likely to comply with your requests.

So if the homeless person cracks a few jokes that you find funny and you start engaging in a witty back-and-forth conversation that you enjoy, you're more likely to give up the $10.

What does this have to do with neediness and persistence?

A guy who is fun and outgoing is skilled at building social capital quickly because people enjoy his company. Thus, a girl is more likely to jump on board with his plans because he's flooding her social bank with trust. But if that guy were to suddenly lose his charisma and started chasing a girl with repeated requests to go on a date, then he'd be spending social capital that he doesn't have. When this happens, he comes across and needy, desperate, and creepy.

So neediness comes into play when your social bank account is at zero, but you're still trying to move things forward with a girl that doesn't want anything to do with you.

So the next question is, how do you become the kind of guy who has an endless supply of social capital? How do you become Hank Moody?

Detach.

When you learn to accept things as they are, and, especially, accept that the worst possible outcome might occur and you're OK with that, then you'll be living with a sense of levity about you. This is why people who survive cancer usually have the brightest outlook on life. It's because they've accepted death, so everything that they experience in life is done without expectations.

People who take life for granted forget that it can be taken away in an instant. Likewise, people who are in relationships forget that a breakup could be just around the corner, and someone who is pursuing a girl refuses to accept life without her in it.

However, if you come to realize and accept that life, relationships, and romances are ephemeral, then you'll move through these events with a playful indifference—you don't know what the outcome will be, but you're OK with that, so you're just going to enjoy the ride along the way.

So if you want to be Hank Moody, then let go of your expectations and realize that the only way to press forward is by keeping yourself amused.

Read Next: 11 Fundamental Guidelines For Solid Game

Marcus Awakuni
Marcus was a shy, introverted nerd turned dating coach. He studied mathematics as an undergrad at BYU and planned to attend grad school, but after his father passed away shortly after graduating, he had a change of heart. He moved to Las Vegas and became a dating coach, and is now dedicated to revolutionizing the dating advice industry with his new age approach. You can find him at AGL Lifestyles, or send him an email at

Do Not Follow In The Footsteps Of Norway's Crown Prince By Marrying A Single Mom

June 7, 2017 | by Christopher Leonid | Link | Original Link

If proof were ever needed that marrying a commoner with a 'colourful past' is an extremely dangerous undertaking, look no further than the antics of the Norwegian royal family on their balcony in Oslo.

Princess Mette-Marit, a former tart, and her dweeb husband stand with the gauche reverence of nouveau riche parents at a posh prep-school sports day while the children betray their true stock under the glare of the nation's cameras.

Their son, Prince Sverre Magnus, has the mannerisms of a rascal groundsman while his cousin – a mere suckling in SJW problem-glasses – already effects a matronly authority over his antics. Doubtless it is a rôle she has learned from observing the interactions of the adults in her family. A tenner says she'll be photographed topless before she's twenty.

This pubic appearance of the Norwegian royals was reported by the Daily Mail as part of King Harald's birthday celebrations. At the banquet, 'prankster' Crown Prince Haakon shaved off his beard between courses (Good grief! Sneak the hip flask under the table Haakkers – this party's about to hit a new level!).

The Daily Mail's choice of words is depressingly apt. A 'prankster' is someone who is trying to be funny. But it's not the pranks which indicate the social decline of this family so much as their desire to be liked. If you are royal, you can afford to behave like a social wrecking ball provided that you are imposing your precepts upon those beneath you.

Alarmingly, however, this family have adopted the suburban escapism and celebrity worship of those they are supposed to lead.

Why this has happened

In 2001, the waiting room magazines in every nail salon and sexual health clinic from Stavanger to Skjervøy indulged readers with a tiresomely predictable 21st Century fairy tale: a slag was marrying the crown prince.

Allegedly from a disadvantaged background, Mette-Marit learned to sail, studied in Australia, found very good lodgings and an enviable job in London (Cockspur Street apparently). She seems to have led a very international lifestyle – and all before managing to graduate after several extra years of study. Any alarm bells ringing yet?

By the time she won the heart of Norway's Crown Prince, she was a single mother by another man.

Their union was endorsed with the 'love conquers all' narrative, in which both male lust and female opportunism are rationalised as 'love.' This neatly disguises a scenario all too common in the wake of the sexual revolution: beta male demand for physical intimacy outstrips female supply, causing men to submit to lesser women.

Fast-forward to 2017, and we see that Mette-Marit's Alpha Fux Beta Bux strategy has come into conflict with itself, because nobody can seriously square her colourful past with her pretensions of being a dignified wife. So the last card her family can play to distract from the conflict at its core is to act progressive by pandering to the tropes of the sanctimonious egalitarianism of those below the social mean.

Attempts to dismiss regal protocol as stuffy and passé from a balcony of a royal palace will prove disastrous. The only people who genuinely applaud such familiarity do so out of a desire to destroy the social hierarchy. Thus, the fairytale ends with the decline of the prince, not the elevation of the slag.

Bring a Ho to Heel

The advice that a wealthy friend of mine received from his elderly father was:

> Never marry with a woman who has opened her legs to another man. If you do, I don't want to know about it, and if your marriage breaks down, don't you dare come to cry on my shoulder about it.

That’s certainly a good start, but the faults with this approach are obvious:

- It drastically limits your pool of potential women
- It vests too much power in female behaviour
- It would lead to the extinction of the Western family if everyone were to follow it

If we are going to save families from feminism, we have to equip porn-addled white knights and supplicating incel rookies to tackle the expectations of women who have been joyridden through their primes and expect investment into their old age.

Set your standards

A man who puts his purpose at the centre of his life will attract a woman who puts him at the centre of her life. But if she gets the idea that it’s one rule for ‘special her’ and another for everyone else, you’re going to be screwed.

Look at Melania Trump, for instance. She has a colourful past but, unlike the wives of beta men, she has the invigorated look of a woman whose heterosexual husband fires anyone who displeases him.

Loading…

Likewise, the wife of a man who aspires to godliness has little option but to do the same, provided that he isn’t the sort of pussified protestant whose faith exists to excuse the sins of women and impress obligations on men. Here is the Spanish royal family at their daughters’ first holy communion.

Now have a look at ‘couldn’t have done it without my amazing wife’ Michelle Obama. She neither dresses for her man nor covers herself in church, preferring to impress her go-grrrl friends by wandering around dressed like some Boko Haram hostage.

You don’t have to be Donald Trump to lay down the law, but you do have to have a modicum of self discipline, because a man’s double standards present a diabolical way for a woman to destroy him (diabállō, from the Greek: ‘διά’ and ‘βάλλω’ literally: to get between and throw apart).

Stick to your game

Much of the purpose of Game is to create the impression that you are someone whose life’s purpose comes above the woman of the moment. However, an LTR will quickly collapse into a blue pill frame if you can’t continually demonstrate that you really are the less needy partner in the relationship. A good way to achieve this is to discipline your own carnal appetites.

Practicing #nofaps is good, as is practicing chastity for a while. If you remove sex as an immediate personal need, you remove the only bargaining chip that hot women have and present them with a choice which they have often never faced: woman up or be rejected.

Having conquered yourself, you can make your asceticism a part of a broader structure of religious discipline, pushing things further and demanding more. Be ruthless in your scrutiny. Would you want this woman on your arm at a party? Is she going to try to sabotage her husband's successes because she fears that he will be as fickle in his prime as she was in her own? Does she meet even the most basic cultural standards required in the mother of your children?

I'll leave you to decide what you are after, but my own approach can broadly be summarised as:

LIBERATED GIRL: "I'll become a good Christian when I'm married."

LIBERATED ME: "That's nice. I'll marry someone I consider already to be a good Christian."

I have turned at least half a dozen girls back to altar-rail in this way; most of whom still had some milage on the clock before wall-time; a few of them even stuck to it despite me not marrying them (so genuine conversions, I guess). I'm not a handsome Scandinavian prince nor the president of the USA. My only leverage is a refusal to be pussy-whipped and an ability to set the boundaries from the outset of a relationship (because its very hard to set them later).

If 'liberated' women are unable to set the moral standards of the West, conservative men will instead. Welcome to the patriarchy.

Read More: Why We Need To Fight For The Patriarchy

Christopher Leonid
Defining men's agency during the collapse of the Sexual Revolution.

How The Globalist Establishment Came Into Being

June 7, 2017 | by L.T. Smash | Link | Original Link

We are witnessing the United States and Europe become increasingly tumultuous. What we are not being told is a similar tumultuousness is building in China. While a number of us are aware that this is caused by the global establishment, we need to be aware of a few things about them.

Communism and fascism

Anyone can be a member of the global establishment. They little from whence members of their group originate. No global establishment insider has ever turned in another insider. The global establishment orchestrated the rise of communism, fascism, feminism and other ideologies. The books The Rise of the Fourth Reich by Jim Marrs and Wall Street and the Bolshevik Revolution by Anthony Sutton discuss how the Russian Revolution at the beginning of the 20th century was financed by American capitalists.

The authors of The Nazi Hydra in America, Glen Yeadon and John Hawkins, discuss how the rise of Adolf Hitler was financed by British and American Capitalists through various subsidiaries. Auschwitz was built with the understanding of American and British Capitalists that Auschwitz would be a slave labor camp for the making of products to be sold to the public and to world governments. The pinning of events and conspiracies upon certain groups or persons (Jews, whites, free masons, etc.) is also an act of the global establishment.

The global establishment is old. In his book The Creature From Jeykll Island, G. Edward Griffin discussed how they immediately tried to insert itself into the United States, at its inception, but the attempt was thwarted. Their efforts in the 18th and much of the 19th centuries was a struggle for the economic and political control of the United States government and the United States. That battle was ultimately lost with the passage of the Federal Reserve Act in 1913 that established the Federal Reserve System.

Fear keeps you from acting against the global establishment.

After World War II, many communists in the United States would seek direction from Moscow. Dr. Bella Dodd was a member of the National Committee of the Communist Party in the U.S., and later stated to W. Cleon Skousen, which he documents in his book, The Naked Capitalist, “I think the Communist conspiracy is merely a branch of a much bigger conspiracy!”

Dr. Dodd was confused because when asking for direction from Moscow, the American Communist Party was told to contact one of three people in the Waldorf Towers in New York. Dr. Todd found it interesting that these men were neither Russian nor Communist, but were wealthy American capitalist and whatever direction they gave the American Communist Party, Moscow always supported and ratified it. In his book, The Making of America, W. Cleon Skousen documents how the ideas of Communism were tried before Karl Marx was even born.

Several authors, such as W. Cleon Skousen, who was opposed to the global establishment in his books The Naked Communist and The Naked Capitalist, have documented how Moscow and Beijing are under the control of a higher entity. Carol Quigley, author of Tragedy and Hope, documents how this elite group has been behind major world events. Professor Quigley, an insider that supported the global establishment, writes of how the global establishment seeks to control the entire world. Professor Quigley also boasts that the tide cannot be turned and anyone that goes along with the tide will eventually find themselves in a period of man-made peace and prosperity (under their control, of course).

Agents of the global establishment were the ones to advocate trade with Communist China during the Nixon era. There are few governments at this time which are not under their control or influence.

The wealthy advocate socialist

Yanis Varoufakis, a former Greek Minister of Finance, referred to the global establishment as ruling insiders. Yanis was told that no insider has ever turned in another insider, insiders are not allowed to make any significant changes, and outsiders are vilified and thrown out. This is why the global establishment hates Julian Assange. Forward to 01:02:00:

Why is it that men such as Bill Gates, Warren Buffett, and James Dimon (CEO of JPMorgan Chase) advocate socialism? These men, among other wealthy people, are part of the global establishment agenda, whether directly or indirectly is irrelevant. The super wealthy hide their money behind layers of trusts, foundations, companies, and other legal organizations. They wish to remain hidden.

Their foundations are legal ways of shielding their wealth from taxation, not because they have benevolent hearts. They always advocate help be offered through government via more control andmore taxation of people such as you and me.

What you can do

The global establishment hates the idea of private property, for you and me. They would secretly own the whole world and make us work until we are no longer deemed of worth. They hate the U.S. Constitution and have been trying to overthrow it for over 200 years. No other nation on earth is offered the protections the U.S. Constitution gives to the people. The global establishment wants to break down national borders and implement economic zones.

The current system cannot be saved; too many laws and court rulings would have to be overturned. We must return to our foundation. We begin that move to the foundation by first becoming aware of our current situation. Most readers of Return of Kings are at least somewhat aware of our current situation. We know that feminism, political correctness, and various other ideologies are ways to convince the world population to accept the prison and eventual extermination of themselves and their neighbors.

Masculine men are a threat to the global establishment because those in power are more likely to be challenged by men. Hence the programs and other directives to feminize men. Most women are inclined to simply go along what is perceived as the established authority.

The global establishment frequently works both sides of an issue, for their own gain. It is time to stop thinking linearly. Trump is currently being worked. The global establishment considers Trump an aberration, hence the media is attempting to discredit and make Trump appear to be incompetent. While we are aware of some of the methods of the global establishment, be aware the opposite of something is not always what it seems. The opposite of war is not peace, and the opposite of slavery is not freedom.

Read More: The Establishment's Narrative Is In Shambles

L.T.Smash

L.T. Smash is a long student of history and various historical methods for war, economics, law, propaganda, journalism, ancient civilizations and various other subjects. He is interested in how all these things come together to impact our world and us individually.

How To Deal With Intense Male Competition In The Sexual Marketplace

June 7, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

You will always face competition in the sexual marketplace—that is inevitable. What is important is that you improve yourself to the best of your ability to raise your inherent value while employing game principles to do the best for yourself that you can within that market.

Hot Women

Make no mistake about it, the sexual marketplace is extremely competitive. Hot young women, particularly those aged between 18 and 23 or so are prized beyond belief in Western societies. If you are a thin, attractive girl in her early-twenties with an Instagram account then you can make a fortune just by putting out daily pictures of yourself in swimwear.

Offers of money, travel, handbags, clothes and other luxury goods come flooding in. Trips to Dubai and other glamourous international destinations are thrown at these girls like confetti. London in particular is filled with sexy young things who don't work but instead spend all of their time trailing around Selfridges, Harrods and Harvey Nichols buying the latest designer clothes with money given to them by their 'sponsors'.

In game terms we might decry such male tactics as mere 'beta provisioning'. After all, if you have to shower a girl with gifts to get her into bed then that's not 'proper' game right? And in any case, she's not really into you, she's only after you for your money anyway.

Well, yes and no. While I would never advocate that men lavish money on women whom they haven't slept with yet (or any women come to that), nevertheless it is important to realise the the guys who do this kind of thing are not all simpering chodes. Quite the opposite. In London (as in other international cities) the guys who park their £350,000 Lamborghini Murcielagos outside Harrods are far closer to the Dan Bilzerian model of international playboys than not. Many of these men are not only very wealthy, they're also good-looking, jacked and not lacking in self-confidence.

Does all of this mean that you should find a way to join the billionaire's jet set club yourself, or else give up all hope of meeting hot women? No, of course not. But it does mean that you should be aware of the competition. The old adage may say that there's always someone worse off than you, but the converse is also true: there's always someone better off than you, too.

There's Always Competition For Her

This is why guys who do day game 'because there's less competition' are way off beam. There is competition, it's just you can't see it. In the club your competitors are instantly discernible. They are physically present after all, trying to AMOG their way into your sets, disrupt things or steal your girl by some other means.

But don't imagine that 8 you just stopped outside Topshop is any less sought after. Just because you can't see them, don't imagine for one moment that there aren't other men waiting in the wings, on Instagram or Tinder or Snapchat or in the club on Friday night who are also aiming to bang her (or are banging her already).

As I said at the start, you will always face competition in the marketplace: markets, after all, are predicated on competition. So what should you do in order to give yourself the best possible chance? Three things. Improve yourself to the best of your ability, learn game and have realistic expectations.

Give Yourself A Chance

Enough has been written about self-improvement here and on many other websites, so you don't need me reminding you about the importance of lifting once again. But for god's sake be the best version of yourself you can possibly be. You'd think this didn't need saying anymore but it does, since guys contact me all the time asking for solutions to their 'game' problems when they've got shitty haircuts and clothes, bad posture and skinny-fat bodies.

The truth is that you're never going to be as hot as that Calvin Klein model or the dude on the cover of Men's Health, but you need to make a start. Put yourself in the right ballpark. At least be a contender.

The next thing you need to do is to learn game. By that I mean both game principles (approaching, vibing, cocky funny, leading, being dominant, escalation and closing). But you also need to internalise important game attitudes that have come to the fore in the community in the last decade or so, in particular abundance mentality and persistence.

Which leads me on to my final point about realistic expectations. Here's the reality: game isn't, and never was a magic trick. No one is promising that you'll pull a supermodel from the arms of a Russian oligarch just by learning a few lines off the internet (although such things can and do happen). Game simply provides you with hacks that cut to the heart of female attraction obviating (to some extent) the need for riches or a six-pack of a Maserati.

If you are persistent with your game, approach a lot of women, are philosophical about rejection and hold onto an awareness that there are billions of girls out there for you to choose from, then in time you will get results. But don't fall into the trap of believing that the competition will just fall away, because that dude on the Rich Kids of London Instagram feed wants to get laid too, and he's fishing from the same pool you are.

A more realistic and healthy way to approach game (and any competitive endeavor) is to compete only against yourself. Think of the girls you slept with last year. How hot were they? How does that compare to your performance this year? If your results have dipped for whatever reason then it's time to tweak your game. But if they're improved then that's cause for celebration.

Yes, there is strong sexual competition out there and no, you are not immune to it just because you watched a few game videos on YouTube. That said, there is an abundance of women out there for you to approach, and when you realise it is only really your prior performance that you are up against then that makes the whole project suddenly seem a lot more manageable.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed

Read Next: The Deregulation Of The Sexual Marketplace

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

4 Lessons We Can Learn About Customer Service From British Airway's Recent Fiasco

June 7, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Last Saturday, I got stuck in London with roughly 100,000 other people because British Airways somehow managed to knock out power to their entire data center.

As someone who used to run a data center, it was laughable. First it was told that they were hacked. Then it was sabotage (they'd recently laid off a good chunk of their Information Technology staff). Then it came out that some dork accidentally pulled the plug and they somehow didn't have a backup.

However, the point of this post isn't a technical geekout. With any corporation, customer service is key. A business and it's entire lifeline goes back to the customer—and if they are or aren't willing to spend their money with the business. A business that has a major crisis like the British Airways IT meltdown is a business on a lifeline.

They must give their customers a reason to return to them. What is done is done, but it's what customers choose to do after the incident that makes or breaks a business over the long-term. And, in my humble opinion, British Airways did a pretty poor job at that.

With that being said, here are five customer service lessons any business could utilize that British Airways is learning the hard way.

1. Don't Make A Bad Situation Worse

In this case, the power went out and people were stranded. That's bad enough as is, right? In my case, I was outbound from Warsaw, Poland to London. My flight in Warsaw was delayed several hours because the systems were down. They told us that in Poland, and told me personally that it was very likely that my second flight from London to Phoenix would be delayed, too.

Inconvenient, but no big deal. Until I got to London.

As it turns out, British Airways flew everybody from outlying cities into London where the root of the problem was. It was mind-boggling. Why not just leave the hundreds of other flights inbound to London from other European countries where they were? I would have much rather been stuck in Poland for an extra night, albeit inconvenient, than get flown into the firestorm in London. Many other passengers on my flight (and other flights) felt the same way.

The lesson: If your business has a fire, put the fire out. Don't dump thousands of dollars of jetliner fuel on to the fire—that's basically what BA did in this case.

2. Take Care Of People, Don't Nickel And Dime

The real kick in the nuts for BA was that this was on the Bank Holiday Weekend—one of the Heathrow's biggest travel days of the entire year. Not to mention, lots of people come into London.

It was nearly impossible to get a hotel during the whole fiasco. And with BA's computers being 100% down, they were unable to book people into hotels, offer vouchers, or do anything. All they could do was stand around and do customer service the old-school way—by handing out flyers.

The flyers said that we would be compensated £200 for hotel rooms, £50 for a taxi round-trip, and £25/day for food.

I literally watched on my phone while waiting in the hour-long taxi queue as the prices for the hotels jumped from £200 to £700 in a matter of minutes.

BA is refusing to cover my entire costs, which ended up being £219 for a hotel, £75 for a taxi one way (I took the Underground back the next morning), and £33 for food.

Now, at the end of the day the difference is not even £50. I'm not going to bother to continue to fight them, but it doesn't make sense to nickel and dime people. Sure, thousands of people each wanting to claim and extra £50 can and will add up quickly. However, covering that extra little bit would put goodwill in people instead of anger.

The lesson: Try to make things right, no matter the cost. Nickel and diming may save you a good chunk of change in the short term but will bring ever-lasting anger to customers that will hurt your bottom line in the long run. That extra £50 might be the difference between them flying BA or not next time. Speaking of next time…

3. Don't Follow Up With Another Disaster

Even as BA tries to recover from this, there's now going to be a strike coming up later this month. I don't know the full details, but apparently a good majority of their flight attendant staffing will be striking for four days sometime in June.

Can you imagine the uproar that will occur if people are caught in a 24 hour+ delay a second time? It'll be an entire new week of bad press, social media fury, and general distaste toward's Britain's most well-known (and formerly most prestigious) airline.

The lesson: You're going to screw up in life. It's inevitable. It's how you bounce back from those mistakes that will determine how you (or a company) turn out. At this point, BA should pay those flight attendants whatever they want so that a strike doesn't occur.

4. Take Heed To The Fact That Everyone Has A Voice These Days

Typical consumer

As we've seen repeatedly in the last few months, much of mainstream news is fake. They have a set agenda, and the entire network is scripted around said agenda. But, as we've also seen—individual journalism and media is rising.

I saw dozens of people Periscoping and streaming on YouTube while they were waiting for their flights, hotels, or just trying to figure out what the hell was going on. All it takes is a "somebody" sharing the story of a "nobody" and things can get viral and spiraled out of control.

The new age of technology has now given everybody the questionable ability to be a reporter by birthright. I don't envy the big corporations that have to deal with it, including BA. If you scroll through their Twitter feed though, BA has just given generic answers to everyone—to much outrage.

The lesson, and closing thoughts: Sometimes, all it takes is a little bit of personal touch to make someone happy. "We're working on this as fast as we can." is not a good answer. A far better one is, "I'm personally going to make a note of this and try to get it moved up, but that's all I can do." Otherwise, your brand will suffer such a high amount of damage that it could drive the company to the ground.

Are you a fellow traveler who wants to meet lots of hot foreign girls while abroad? Check out my free guide—Trouble. Travel. Tinder. For more travel tips, check out my blog This Is Trouble.

Read Next: 5 Lessons I Learned Moving From Offline To Online Business

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Bill Maher Is Being Attacked By The Deranged Leftist Cult He Helped Create

June 8, 2017 | by Jimbo Jones | Link | Original Link

For those of you who somehow missed it, on the June 2, 2017, edition of Real Time with Bill Maher, the HBO host dropped the dreaded "n-word" during an interview with Nebraska Sen. Ben Sasse.

It is not without some Schadenfreudist relish that I greet the great Bill Maher "house nigger" debacle. After all, Maher has long been one of the most irritating ambassadors of Hollywood ultra-leftism, complete with a weekly television program that's effectively an hour-long, Orwellian anti-Trump circle jerk interspersed with weed jokes.

And considering Maher—the person responsible for 2008's vehement anti-theism agitprop Religulous—as an atheist, his public crucifixion (at the hands of his leftist brethren, no less) can't be considered anything less than divinely poetic.

He thinks that dating black women will give him a pass

That a militant progressivist culture warrior and Obama financier like Maher can be cannibalized by the new wave left as a “racist” lends further credence to the hypothesis that today’s embodiment of liberalism has indeed stopped being a political ideology and transformed into a genuine religious orthodoxy. The hydra of multiculturalism, feminism and political correctness has fused into a syncretic moral dogma that leaves no room for ideological deviation of any kind. To refuse one plank of the Church of the Left’s holy doctrines is to betray the whole faith, and it was only a matter of time until a heretic like Maher was going to be excommunicated.

Heretical views

Yes, Maher has been a champion for gay marriage and globalization and socialism and climate change regulation, but on the issues of Islam and identity politics, he has long refused to toe the party line. He's been one of the few mainstream liberal icons to pick up on the inherent hypocrisy of feminists and Islamists breaking bread, and rather than loudly and proudly support the theatrical hyperbole of today's campus social justice warriors, he's called them out on their hysterical childishness.

But today's liberalism is not a'la carte. If you're going to go all in, you have to agree with the entirety of the progressivist Tao. You have to think white privilege exists, that illegal immigration is good for society and that carbon taxes are essential to save the environment. You have to think policemen are nothing more than black child-slaying Nazis, that abortion should be publicly subsidized and that Islamic refugees should be embraced instead of shunned. You have to think marijuana should be legal and hate speech punishable by imprisonment and honestly, genuinely believe that more than 50 genders exist.

In the eyes of today's hyper-liberals, to reject one holy pillar is to reject the entire canon. Perhaps Maher should have suspected the rest of the flock would turn on him sooner or later. After all, he did represent—in most regards—the embodiment of the New Left's sworn enemy: the white, wealthy, and successful heterosexual male.

Frankenstein's (liberal) monster

BLM has been given carte blanche to destroy cities and attack police, like they did in this scene in Baltimore

How ironic is it that the same people Maher stood beside as ideological bedmates are now the ones leading the charge to destroy him? The poetic justice of Maher's career being derailed at the behest of Black Lives Matter figureheads like Deray McKesson—and not the sundry right-of-center groups Maher has made millions of dollars vilifying and demonizing over the years—is almost beautiful, and in some ways, rather befitting.

Maher should have seen it coming. For years, they've been preaching a self-deriding gospel that posits the straight, Caucasian male as the nefarious source of all inequalities throughout history. They've labeled themselves as undeserving beneficiaries of the system and, at their own expense, supported policies and programs to "level the playing field" for women, minorities and LGBT individuals. They've spent their whole lifetimes preaching to others that THEY are the big problem with society, with the hopes that minorities, gays and women would do the "social justice" dirty work for them while they lived lives of hedonistic leisure and conflict-free comfort.

Of course, Maher and his kindred wanted their pawns to only equate white privilege with those who fostered conservative and libertarian ideologies. However, alike Dr. Frankenstein, Maher and his ilk now have to watch the monster they created rampage against them. They inspired an entire generation of young people to despise whiteness, maleness and heterosexuality as symbols of oppression, and now the protective talisman of liberalism is no longer enough to ward off their Creature's bloodlust. The New Left wants fresh meat, and sacrificial offerings like Maher are now a necessity.

The sin of simply existing

Not even disavowed whiteness or ashamed maleness is tolerated by today's progressivist horde. The party of FDR and Kennedy has come to hate everything about their ideology's most important founders, instead embracing a bizarre, open-borders socialist jihad that demands the straight white male fade into the background to usher in the next era of liberal idealism.

Perhaps Maher's career will recover from his notorious gaffe. More than likely, however, he will not, and public pressure—or to be a little bit more accurate, party pressure—will eventually lead to his ouster from the airwaves. All it takes is one six-lettered word to derail his career, his profession and livelihood, sending him into the abyss of obscurity heretics like Michael Richards, Dog the Bounty Hunter and Anthony Cumia, who have likewise been sentenced.

Even if Maher does rebound, he's destined to spend the rest of his life apologizing for his sin. Every positive thing he's done for the liberal cause and culture war has been erased in the blink of an eye. His entire existence is now destined to become nothing more than a lifelong effort to make amends for that one regrettable second of live television.

Of course, secular-progressivist types like Maher are well aware the price they must pay for blasphemy. "For the wages of sin is death," Romans 6:23 famously states. Unfortunately for Bill, his political orthodoxy isn't as merciful – under the decree of the Cult of Modern Liberalism, his punishment will be nothing less than a lifetime of perpetual atonement for simply being himself.

Read more: Bill Maher Courageously Compares Donald Trump To Hitler, Pledges To Vote For "Dead Hillary"

Jimbo Jones

Jimbo Jones is a nihilist ... but he's the nicest nihilist you'll ever meet.

Professional Female Fighting Is Grotesque And Must Be Banned

June 8, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Why do female fighters still exists? That's what I asked myself after clicking on the below video that appeared in Youtube's invasive "Recommended for you" list. I was surprised that the fragile cucks at VICE have any interest in a masculine environment.

Why are butch dykes trading punches still a thing? Their level is abysmal and the female UFC's ratings are a fraction of what the male equivalent creates. Then it hit me. It is because men softened up and allowed it.

Those women are severely damaged. They are foul in shape and soul. They talk, walk like men and spit. But their attitude is uglier with their trash talking, hypersexual image or regular promotion of homosexuality.

How did it happen

It is a recent phenomenon. Female Olympic categories were introduced for wrestling in 2004, judo in 1992 and boxing in 2012. Female MMA only appeared in the late 2000s. No one wanted this before.

Men of all cultures have always encouraged martial arts, an essential part of their identity, but no society considered women able to fight unarmed as a positive thing. Women being celebrated for fighting now is symptomatic of a diseased society and the men finding it attractive suffer from a malfunctioning, feminised sexuality.

Now that women imposed themselves in that male universe, modern weak men accept it to give special treatment for women to fit in. Examples include allowing them to wear Islamic veils while fighting or letting a woman be injected with testosterone to “become” a man compete in wrestling.

The teachers that let the doors of their gym open for women are also at fault for this.

An ugly trend that reflects our times

The promoters of this vile circus want it popularised to make a quick buck while it helps deconstruct femininity. Young girls start to think that it is normal to get their face kicked in and like monkeys, will reproduce what they have seen. There must also be a demand from beta males that have emasculating fantasies about modern Amazons choking them into erotic asphyxiation.

Men don't watch women in the UFC for the physical prowess or the technique. Those who watch it want to see girls in little clothing to perform skills they lack.

A woman who fights is void of female attributes. Grace, deference, feminine shapes… it's all gone. I find interesting that female martial arts are forced on our screens in the same time frame as "E-sports" which have to be the most beta activity to date since complimenting pornstars on Instagram.

Ronda Rousey spearheaded that degeneracy, because contrary to the others, her facial features were normal and she wore heels sometimes. But the feminine attire does not slow her down when she needs to commit factual domestic abuse and admit it without being charged.

The physical and cultural toll

My face when I see girls trying to fight like men.

That case of blatant penis envy does not serve anyone. Fighting produces testosterone so women become like men when they fight. They tend to have a thin frame but the muscular aspect quickly makes it hideous. Their breasts shrink as well as their healthy fat levels and their jaws become even more defined and masculine. They become nasty and insolent.

Contrary to what O.J. Simpson might tell you, women are not biologically designed to receive copious amounts of punches. The case has not been studied yet but with women being weaker, there is little doubt that the repeated impacts on their fragile skull promise to create advanced cases of head traumas such as severe neuronal loss, concussions or chronic traumatic encephalopathy.

CTE caused by repeated hits to the skull. Impacts in rotation, common in MMA and boxing, are the most dangerous.

Testosterone also makes women more sexually promiscuous, a major factor in cultural decline. Professional and amateur female martial artists tend to display a high number of slut tells (their tattoos, always near erogenous zones, is one of the most obvious).

For her part, Rousey goes in the opposite direction because she's a woman.

"For girls, it raises your testosterone, so I try to have as much sex as possible before I fight, actually. Not with like everybody. I don't put out like a Craigslist ad or anything, but if I got a steady I'm going to be like 'yo, fight time's coming up,'" Rousey said with a laugh.

Ipso facto

I can remember three girls that I bedded and who were martial artists, from different countries and backgrounds. They were all selfish, raging sluts with an enormous problem of attitude quickly leading to their trial period ending abruptly once they serviced me.

Why it matters

The detractors will be quick to rush to the case of Paige VanZant or Michelle Waterson when I declare that an overwhelming majority of fighting women are ugly. I don't want to fall into a "pointy elbows would not bang" perspective but those two reasonably bangable women are the minuscule emerged part of the iceberg. The rest look like cauliflower-eared foul-mouthed teenage boys.

What they sell you (Michelle Waterson)

How it really is (Cris Cyborg)

I am not against women in sports. On the contrary, I am favourable to them doing soft exercise like running, gymnastics or attend segregated gyms in moderation. But fighting raises their testosterone (like many other competitive sports) and turns them into men with long hair (when they don't shave it off). They should not fight.

The biological realities are there. Women are weaker and not good fighters, who can't even make it worth watching. But some lost souls believing in the tankkk grrrl myth started to speculate that some UFC female fighters could last more than a few seconds against a man.

The mental gymnastics reach a new level. To think of a comparison, you could even take a skilled boxer but grappling beginner like Vasyl Lomachenko (130 lbs) and make him fight Ronda Rousey (same weight) who can also use her kicks and grappling and the man would still win without breaking a sweat. Just observe the sheer speed and impact force and compare that to Rousey's love taps.

Problem is more women sign up at dojos, influenced by that nonsense and the number of high-testosterone ugly masculine women grows, something that the West clearly does not need.

Comment inverser la tendance?

This all can be stopped if men fight more and apply the rules to become more masculine on a large scale while morally punishing women who take part in any form of physical confrontation. These measures should naturally restore the balance. Also, telling them that they hit like girls always works.

Read More: HBO's "Girls" Heralds The Cultural Decline Of American Women

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Is Your Penis Responsible For Global Warming?

June 8, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Recently, a couple of pranksters published a paper in Cogent social Sciences, an academic journal. Their monograph is called "The conceptual penis as a social construct".

What the hell is this?

Priapus, who invented both the coal furnace and the internal combustion engine

The eye-catching title sort of makes sense; if there did indeed exist a conceptual form of the penis (one residing in the realm of thought, as opposed to the real thing residing in underwear), then it would be fair to describe the imaginary shlong as a social construct.

After that, the article is nonsense. In fact, that was by design. They created much of the text using a postmodernism generator, which spits out a new academic-sounding paper every time you refresh the page. (All college students running into deadlines, take note.) Then they carefully read it over—I've got to admire the patience of these jokers—and obfuscated anything that accidentally made sense.

It begins with typical cringe-worthy gender studies drivel:

> The androcentric scientific and meta-scientific evidence that the penis is the male reproductive organ is considered overwhelming and largely uncontroversial. It is true that nearly all male-gendered persons who were also male at birth have a genital organ that, among other purposes, carries the duct for the transfer of sperm during copulation. This organ is usually identified as the penis, and for many "males" it serves the role of their reproductive organ. There are, however, many examples of persons with penises who will not reproduce, including those who have sustained injury, are unable to coerce a mate, are uninterested in producing offspring, are medically infertile, or identify as asexual. While these examples may still constitute "males," it is distinctly fallacious to identify their penises as reproductive organs. Furthermore, there are many women who have penises.

Just imagine—when you were a baby, the first time you peeked under your diaper, you though you saw something real. When you got the "birds and the bees" talk, you learned what else you could do with it besides take a leak. Or so you thought!

As these academics just showed, the wiener isn't necessarily a reproductive organ after all, and it's kinda sorta not real to begin with. Indeed, these wiseacres did a pretty good send-up of how lefty academics use obscurantist language to make something rigidly definable and pointing to the highest form of truth seem like a limp and squishy abstraction that does nothing.

After erecting a description of the fallacy that the phallus is anything real, the thrust is to prove the point with the "conceptual penis" concept. Following that, it slides into a discussion of "machismo braggadocio", coupling it with the feminist concept of (you guessed it) "toxic hypermasculinity". As for the global warming angle, I'll let the opening paragraph of section 2.2 drive into the meat of the argument:

> Nowhere are the consequences of hypermasculine machismo braggadocio isomorphic identification with the conceptual penis more problematic than concerning the issue of climate change. Climate change is driven by nothing more than it is by certain damaging themes in hypermasculinity that can be best understood via the dominant rapacious approach to climate ecology identifiable with the conceptual penis. Our planet is rapidly approaching the much-warned-about 2°C climate change threshold, and due to patriarchal power dynamics that maintain present capitalist structures, especially with regard to the fossil fuel industry, the connection between hypermasculine dominance of scientific, > political, and economic discourses and the irreparable damage to our ecosystem is made clear.

A few more paragraphs of penetrating prose follow, indicating that—yes indeed—your dick causes global warming. You already knew you're personally responsible for all the world's problems; now we can conclude your conceptual cock is confirmed as the cause.

So what the hell does this really mean?

They didn't really prove that tallywhackers (conceptual or otherwise) cause global warming, of course. What they did prove was that postmodernism is mental masturbation by the types who George Wallace described as "pointy-headed intellectuals who can't park their bicycles straight". As their website's blurb says:

> Cogent Social Sciences is a multidisciplinary open access journal offering high quality peer review across the social sciences: from law to sociology, politics to geography, and sport to communication studies. Connect your research with a global audience for maximum readership and impact.

In that case, one or more academic types gave the "conceptual penis" article the high quality peer review, and then they thought it was an important enough contribution to human knowledge to publish it.

The fact that the references were fake didn't bother them (which they would've discovered if they'd done a little checking), though they did ask for a few more scholarly citations before it went to press. The provocative language didn't dissuade them. The premise being entirely ridiculous didn't cause them to reject the paper either, of course.

And what the hell is postmodernism?

This isn't the first time that someone hoaxed the academic establishment like this. As Breitbart's writeup indicates:

> They were hoping to emulate probably the most famous academic hoax in recent years: the Sokal Hoax—named after NYU and UCL physics professor Alan Sokal—who in 1996 persuaded an academic journal called Social Text to accept a paper titled "Transgressing the Boundaries: Towards a Transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity".
>
> Sokal's paper—comprising pages of impressive-sounding but meaningless pseudo-academic jargon—was written in part to demonstrate that humanities journals will publish pretty much anything so long as it sounds like "proper leftist thought;" and partly in order to send up the absurdity of so much post-modernist social science.

Alan Sokal is an honest liberal who felt that postmodernism was a distraction from real issues. As he put it, you can't talk about pollution if you can't agree that air exists. So, he wrote a paper basically stating that (if I follow the argument correctly) the constants of physics could adjust themselves as needed in pursuit of social justice. That, of course, is baloney, but they published it anyway. Rather than learning a lesson about the virtues of relevance (and clarity of writing), the academic community squealed like a piglet when they got punked. Seriously, I'd buy the guy a beer.

I first encountered this kind of crap in an English class. Much of the required reading included glowing references to people like Comrade Lukacs, the leading lights of the Frankfurt School (then, I had no idea who they were), and postmodern drips like Derrida, Lacan, and Foucault. Worse was trying to wade through a pile of leftist jargon, mostly Greek-based, in which I had no experience. I tried very hard, but the texts brushed off my every effort to penetrate them. Actually, my required readings made the "conceptual penis" article seem like Hemingway. It was one of the last two classes I had to finish in order to graduate, so it was particularly frustrating. Since deciphering their floating abstractions was the final hurdle between me and a diploma, I think I'd buy Professor Sokal two beers. I'll buy a couple rounds for the "conceptual penis" jokers too.

Somehow I passed and graduated, though for the life of me, I couldn't figure out what the hell the stuff I was required to read actually meant. Now I know a little better. The whole point of postmodernism (and its bastard child, deconstructionism) is basically that nothing is real and nothing makes sense. They write this way in the attempt to prove these points. It's all about saying nothing using a large pile of words.

This is what happens when mediocre minds are educated far beyond their capability of understanding. The "conceptual penis" article was a joke on them, but really the joke is on the public for paying the big salaries of these professors for playing pretentious word games.

Read More: 10 Potential Attacks That Can Defeat Cultural Marxism In Academia

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Canadian Government Passes Law That Defines “Abuse” As Not Encouraging A Child’s Transsexualism

June 9, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

The Canadian province of Ontario, which includes around 40% of Canada’s population, and includes the capital city of Ottawa and Toronto, ground zero for slutwalks and feminism, has now passed a law encouraging children as young as 5 years old to become transvestites.

A Brave Slutwalk Message: I didn't realize this was ever in question

The Supporting Children, Youth, and Families Act, 2017 (Bill 89), was passed in June of the Current Year and is a reform to the existing child care laws codified in the old Child and Family Services Act of 1990 (the last sane period in the west). The new law is comprehensive, with 352 sections. Rewriting a child welfare law is a major endeavor, and this law was done with specific nefarious intentions.

The Ministry administers child aid, foster care, and adoption services for the millions of children living in Ontario. It aids children who are abandoned or deemed to be at risk, and in need of public support due to lack of adequate parenting by natural parents or other legal guardians.

Two examples would be a child whose parents die without a named godparent or a child of a single mother who is arrested and sent to prison. In 2016 Ontario provided social services to over 113,000 families with children (approximately 5% of the 2,285,450 families with children in the 2011 Census). The Ministry provides care via to children up to the age of 16. Let's take a look at what the new law entails.

1. Increase child age from 16 to 18

The age of protection is raised from 16 to 18 under the new law. This is the most reasonable provision. Public school typically terminates around age 18, and it is difficult to be self sufficient in modern society prior to this age, even if our ancestors were starting families and running businesses in their early teens. However, it is notable that the ages 16-18 are when many children go through puberty, and become sexually active in some form. This provision is key when combined with the tranny provisions outlined below.

2. More racism against whites

Government will be required to collect racial information on the children that it is helping. While race is a factor that private firms and individuals are often prohibited from even discussing or collecting, the government will be required to collect racial data and analyze and assist people on the basis of race. The old government was already required to provide services to all children, regardless of their race, so this component serves no other purpose than further demonizing whites, especially white straight males.

3. Elimination of religion as a factor for placement

The religious background of the child has traditionally been considered in formulating a plan for assistance. A Catholic girl whose parents were killed in an auto accident would likely be referred to a Catholic adoption service run by a local convent, who would try to find parents that would continue raising the child with similar morals and values as her parents. A Jewish boy whose mother was arrested for assaulting a stranger would likely be referred to someone in the Jewish community so that he could continue to be raised in that culture.

But under the new law, the child's religion is no longer a factor in making decisions for his placement or care. And religious protections which specifically protected a parent's right to direct the child's education and religious upbringing are gone. In its place, the Ministry must now consider the child's…

> …race, ancestry, place of origin, colour, ethnic origin, citizenship, family diversity, disability, creed, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity and gender expression.

Courts, which were required to determine the religious faith of the child as soon as possible, will not determine the child's faith at all. So the child's faith and beliefs are unimportant, but his race, family diversity (whatever that is), sexual orientation, and gender flavor of the day, must be considered in assisting him. Got it.

Will they exist after this law?

Religious groups have warned that while the word "creed" does appear in the new law, asking a child if he has a creed is far different from determining what religion he was raised in. Language in legal documents is strictly interpreted (hence why "sex, sexual orientation, gender identity, gender expression, and family diversity," which all mean basically the same thing, are explicitly included in the text, but religion or ordained faith is not).

4. Importance of gender or tranny feelings

In place of religion, we have several gender identity feelings that must be considered when aiding the child. Since these are codified in law, it means that social workers must discuss sexual matters with children, in order to determine their placement on the spectrum of 72 genders, or if they like to dress as a member of the opposite sex, which would indicate that they are a potential tranny, and therefore must be raised in a manner which encourages trannyism.

1	2	3	4	5
(f)ae	(f)aer	(f)aer	(f)aers	(f)aerself
e/ey	em	eir	eirs	eirself
he	him	his	his	himself
per	per	pers	pers	perself
she	her	her	hers	herself
they	them	their	theirs	themself
ve	ver	vis	vis	verself
xe	xem	xyr	xyrs	xemself
ze/zie	hir	hir	hirs	hirself

These questions will be posed to children as young as 5, who are not sexual in any way, other than possessing a nonfunctioning penis or vagina, as well as teens in the newly-expanded age bracket of 16-18, when hormones are at their strongest, and youthful brains are at their most susceptible. The mere introduction of ideas of gender fluidity or questioning the sexual diversity of a child's desires can be enough to trigger young minds to have nontraditional sexual thoughts, which would be fully reinforced and encouraged by the government, schools, and peer group.

5. Government can seize children from families who don't believe in gender theory

The danger is not limited to the innocent children whose parents either actively or accidentally are no longer able to care for their children. The new law expands the scope of intervention to any Ontario family with children. The old law was written to require "the least disruptive course of action" available, with removal from a willing parent as a final resort only.

The new law modifies the phrase "least disruptive course of action, including the provision of prevention services," which encourages the Ministry to apply preventive measures to existing families, which are not deemed to be disruptive, and therefore can be applied broadly.

Canadian Dad About to Lose His Kids

What this means, according to Ontario Minister of Children and Youth Services and Minister Responsible for Anti-Racism Michael Coteau, is that if a child has certain gender feelings that are not supported or actively opposed by one's parents (which could potentially mean telling your 13 year old that no, you are not a pansexual attack helicopter), this could be considered…

> …a form of abuse, when a child identifies one way and a caregiver is saying no, you need to do this differently… If it's abuse, and if it's within the definition, a child can be removed from that environment and placed into protection where the abuse stops.

Sacrificing society's most vulnerable for sexual degeneracy

Citizen: In the name of Family Diversity, you are being reassigned a new Brave and Stunning Wife

The Minister of Children is charged with the important task of protecting the most vulnerable in society—children that are left without a viable option for a good caregiver. This vital service is being turned into a political tool to further weaken religion and expand tranny and homosexual beliefs. What is the purpose of encourage more sexual degeneracy? Why are Western governments advocating for these types of behaviors while trying to silence or attack those who promote normal, healthy civilized values?

Will raising a traditional family could soon be illegal

Men attempting marriage in the West are already playing a dangerous game, and that's if they find a conservative, traditional, foreign bride and try to raise a family under the same traditional principles and beliefs of their ancestors. This new Canadian law further stacks the deck against men trying to have a traditional family life. More and more, the solution looks like not just finding a foreign bride, but relocating to a foreign environment.

Even if America goes a few years without passing a similar law, the mindset behind it already exists strongly in this country. In Canada, will it soon be a thought-crime to have a straight hetero family, and governments will force-place some tranny in your home to encourage "familial diversity" and "gender expression"?

(Canadian outlet Rebel Media summarizes some of the changes in this law in a video.)

Read More: A Modern Day Horror Story On The Origin Of The Transgender Movement

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

5 Essential Life Lessons From The Hindu Law Code Of Manu

June 9, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

According to official academics, the Law Code of Manu is a legal document produced around the second or third century BC in India. It has been created in a context of discord between castes, mostly used so that the first two castes of the Hindu four-castes order would keep cooperating with an advantage for the Brahmin—clerics, priests, teachers—over the Kshatriya—warriors, administrators, royalty—in a peculiar caste-ordered civilization.

If one follows such a historicist, everything-comes-from-human-whims view, the Law Code of Manu can only be relevant to nerdy Sanskrit scholars who made themselves a niche in the academic market and perhaps to jurists looking for some exotic literature within their field. To any other, it is just a culturally alien, dusty, and uninteresting pile of words. You'd better follow what is going on during The Current Year from mainstream, establishment-approved sources.

Of course, my approach here is quite different, otherwise I wouldn't have written this piece. Ancient India is one of the oldest civilized societies known and features a religion perhaps closer to the "source" of them all than the later ones we are more familiar with. Hinduism, far from being limited to a children tales-like mythology, superstition, or New Age feel-good bullshit, features rich concepts such as the dharma—to which I devoted a ROK piece—that bear analogy with later ones, like the Greek dikē or cosmos, or the Jewish tsedek (loosely, "justice").

This is what the Law Code of Manu stems from: a traditional society, crossed with a spiritual and perhaps intellectual vivacity that isn't ours anymore, that stood the test of time, and that features a rather refreshing point of view compared to the floating fashions of today. Precise and wide, the Code covers a wide range of areas with minimal jargon and, as you will see, has few if anything in common with the strange tribes that disproportionately enticed matriarchy or exoticism-seeking anthropologists. In my opinion, it can be compared to the Jewish mitsvot ("commandments"), in that most of these cannot be applied anymore in modern societies, but remain an important source of landmarks and inspiration.

1. Initiation rites matter

After a brief account of the Creation of the world and humans, the Code starts by stating the roots of the Law in general and tackling the consecratory rites. These topics go hand in hand, as only someone properly initiated—along with other conditions—appears qualified to understand and tell what has to be. Yet they also reach far beyond the world of jurists: in a traditional society, everyone had rites of passage to go through according to one's specific identity.

It has been noticed here that a society lacking initiatory rites produces immature, incomplete, frail and jaded people. Many men from the 60s and the 70s are cowards and conformists who keep themselves subjugated by cultural Leftism. We, millenials, never had the security, wealth and access to sex they enjoyed, still we may be better off as we have at least our own initiatory rites. Taking the red pill stands as one, game practice as another. These "rites" of ours make us abler, stronger, more in touch with "disturbing" but highly important reality than grey-headed wimps. As the Manu Code states clearly, those who were able to stand the rite are actualized by it, to the point that some are "twice-born."

2. Purity matters, too

A recurring theme in the Law Code is purity. Before performing a rite or formal prayer, one should take an ablution and clear one's mind of random thoughts and negative emotions. Eating inappropriate food, associating with criminals or outcasts is considered tainting. When one "sins", one should undergo a penance, not because he has been forced to do so but as to get "clean" for the taint.

We were told most past taboos were "oppressive" and bound to be superseded. The Victorian taboo on sex would be of an "inferior" society compared to our "emancipated" one. Thus, the only purity acceptable would be the medical one—wash your hands before eating—as all else would be ultimately ungrounded.

In an irony of history, the Leftist establishment has become incredibly puritan in its own right: believe in Gender Equality, Progress, Rape Culture, Global Warming and other idols; avoid –isms and –phobias; buy Fair Trade; eat organic… Behind their veneer of hipsterism, bourgeois bohemians are incredibly prudish and obsessed with purity, especially on the ideological plane. To us, such puritanism looks like a big matrix, a false setting where norms and judgments take us away from reality and instill us with wrong fears and judgment criteria.

Where the Leftist "puritan" sees sacrilege ("WHAT? WOMEN ARE HYPERGAMIC? OMFG THIS IS CISHET MANSPLAINING SEXIST SEXISM!"), we see awareness. This does not mean that caring about purity is always bad. The question is, whether this or that can be rightly considered pure or not, and if we are in touch with a proper sense of cleanliness inside ourselves.

Girls who made themselves ugly and get their holes rammed by massive amounts of dick are entitled to elicit repulsion. Likewise, many of whom we call racailles ("scum") in French are dirty in various senses—they smoke bad weed, are drug addicts, seem unable to speak without shouting or scorching the French language through an ugly, repulsive accent; they deal with illegal trades which entail selling unhealthy products, defrauding customers, robbing, they act like parasites and are proud of it, they often feel bad emotions against almost everything, and even lack basic hygiene. Do considering such people dirty and tainted make us “bigoted”?

Of course, the purity mentioned in the Code is genuine in the sense that it is not about virtue-signaling or displaying signs of purity whereas one would be “unclean” or messes up inside. A true Brahmin is by no means a Pharisaic, and no one else should be.

3. Too much hypocrisy is damaging and should be shunned

The Bible devotes at least two chapters (Mathew, 6-7) to exposing those who turn their virtuous acts into a public show and values actions made without testimony. People ought to seek the good for itself, not for getting social rewards or participating into a play. Just like the Bible—actually, a bit less, perhaps because hypocrisy was less rampant in ancient India than in first century Judea—the Manu Law condemns social dishonesty:

> A man who always displays the banner of righteousness and yet is greedy and deceitful, who deludes the world, who is given to violence, and who beguiles everybody should be viewed as one who observes the ‘cat-vow’. A twice-born who goes around with downcast eyes but is cruel, given to furthering his own ends, crooked, and being falsely sanctimonious, is a man who is observing the ‘heron-vow’… After committing a sin, [one] must never perform a penitential observance under the pretext that [one] is doing a meritorious act, thus covering up his sin with his observance and deceiving women and Shudra. (4.195-8)

If being polite with people you loathe is hypocrisy, then so be it. Dissimulating one’s feelings and thoughts is often necessary for social life, although one could argue that this necessity alone is a sign of degeneracy. However, being committed to one's interests at the expense of everyone else's and posing as generous, as socialists typically do, should be deemed unacceptable and clearly denounced. Doubtlessly, the massive hypocrisy of the currently powerful bears an important relation with the present state of the West.

4. Vocations matter, and they can't be reduced to a flat chart

The Hindu society, just like other Indo-European societies up to medieval Europe, is organized upon superimposed castes. The Brahmin have the highest authority by virtue of their "primogeniture" and superior learning, the Kshatriya are the ones who risk their life over the battlefield and are fit to political power out, the Vaishya are these free men who deal in trade, agriculture and craftsmanship, and the Shudra mostly serve the three other castes.

On an individual level, these castes are justified by the vocation or proper dharma of every individual: one is made, say, a Vaisya or a Kshatriya from the start, and could not change his caste without turning into another person. Some vocations are higher than others and should be acknowledged as such.

Most ROK readers should find the idea of vocation intuitive. Women have purposes specific to their sex and should not attempt to steal or destroy manly places. However, the caste hierarchy and relative levelling of vocations may seem extraneous to American readers: the US were founded over the idea that neither a centralized Church nor a nobility should exist. Did not the Founding Fathers reject the caste system from the start? Indeed—but I am neither American nor conservative enough to put them on the same footing than sacred texts.

5. Hierarchy per se is not a problem, poor hierarchy is

A hierarchy where manly men have authority over feminine women works well. Each one has a role fit to its nature and can realize one's own purposes with the help of the other. An inverted, matriarchal hierarchy where women would rule, on the other hand, is dissatisfying: women would look like caricatures of men by being bossy, let their defects such as conformism and group-thinking tendency express, and turn men into slaves or short-term driven pleasure-seekers. None of the parts would be able to realize its better tendencies, such as loving and caring for women, or meeting with challenges for men.

Likewise, the four-caste hierarchy is supposed to be the better or fairer one. A society following it and having proper individuals at each level would be the most harmonious one, even in poverty. When the regular order gets messed up, so does the whole society: Kshatriya pretending to spiritual authority start subordinating it to political interests, just as the Protestant princes of Europe did in the sixteenth century; Vaishya pretending to power end up commercializing everything, turning politics into a marketplace where lobbyists and sellouts abound. "Inferior" castes cannot help but bring their essential ethos with them no matter where they go or what they pretend to be.

The lesson, here, could be that modernity has been mostly synonymous with a "vaishya-ization" of society: universities have turned into an academic niche market, politics have become a market as well, and the process have been aggravated by women trying to play men—especially upper bourgeois women pretending to political power. Each "inferior" caste denying the "superior" ones their rights and special prerogatives have made the world poorer.

As for myself, I have no problem with the idea that some, even men, should not be entitled to financial independence: libertarianism may work well among members of Mensa, but 70-IQ people clearly need some paternalist management not to drown into their own stupidity.

“Even a capable Shudra must not accumulate wealth, for when a Shudra becomes wealthy, he harasses Brahmins.” (10.129) Some wealthy people fund seditious, divisive groups such as BLM, some who enjoy a small authority act like power-tripping assholes, some women get beta orbiters and management power… A fair hierarchy is not one with equal chances or opportunities to get promoted, but one where each one can reach his rightful place.

Conclusion

Alt-Right blogger Lawrence Murray contrasted Buddhism, which enjoys some cultural status and association with the upper classes in the West, with an “intensely alien Hinduism.” Practicing yoga, reciting a handful of mantra and mingling with other bourgeois bohemian while sipping fair trade green tea seems indeed easier than vindicating such a frankly non-modern order.

Modernity in general and the so-called American Dream in particular entertain a deep trend of anti-traditional, anti-dharmic thinking which promotes an abstract and formally autonomous individual able to do has he wants. “Gender” or the negation of biological sex in the name of a chosen or psychological sex is but the last product of the trend.

If you could choose between a society where Hillary Clinton had won the election and a society with castes and sacred fires, would you have the guts to choose the second option—knowing that women would be women but also that you may be, say, a Vaishya and thus not entitled to (for example) give a scholarly opinion about what the Bible says?

Whatever your answer, remember that modern ethical theories come and go with the Zeitgeist, whereas dharmic cultures still exist today side by side with modern technology. I could bet anything that in a hundred years the Law Code of Manu will still be studied while Anita Sarkeesian’s name will be forgotten.

Read Next: The Dysfunction Of Modern Society Is Proof That Cultural Marxism “Works”

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Welcome To The New ROK Design

June 10, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s been two and a half years since ROK had a re-design. I decided to go with a minor cosmetic update that is similar to the old design.

There are a few bugs we’re working on. The most urgent is the comment link showing up as an empty box on the main page and below each article’s headline (until that is fixed, click the box to be sent directly to the comments).

There may also be incompatibilities with the multitude of devices being used today. If you’re experiencing a problem, let us know so we can troubleshoot. You can also leave a comment below.

Read Next: 14 Essential Subjects That We’ll Teach Children At The ROK International School

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

3 Things I Learned From Dating A Latina For One Year

June 11, 2017 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

In keeping with Kyle Trouble's recent post, this article will look at three key observations I've gathered from dating a Latina for over a year. Prior to this relationship, I never seriously dated any Latin American women and only heard secondhand what this breed of dames were like—in and outside the bedroom.

With a year of experience under my belt, I really haven't looked back to the emotionless, tired, bland and masculinized (feminist translation: strong, independent) pool of women that lurch limply around my city, Toronto, like zombified worker bees. After you go Latina, there is really no need to look back.

As Toronto is virtually ground zero for non-feminine women, I was very fortunate to meet and hook up with a real lady here—one who embraces her femininity, believes in God, and cherishes traditional family values (naturally, she wasn't raised in Toronto, but El Salvador). While those three qualities of Latinas were discussed in this ROK article, there are some other things I've learned from dating a Latina that, like with Mr. Trouble, have modified my overall views of male-female relationships.

1. It's okay to put her on a pedestal—if she's earned it

Only if Sofia's earned it…

Rightfully, red-pill men believe that putting a girl on a pedestal is a bad decision and will eventually lead to her taking advantage of this freebie chivalry. This is certainly true with Western women because, despite their feminist facade, deep-down they know they are not behaving in a way that deserves male courtly love. In a progressive society, all things being equality™, women see themselves as men after given the ability to game the system by manipulating their other half's chivalrous impulses that have been warped and suppressed by our anti-male culture.

In turn, red-pill men have rejected the pedestal and regard it as a man's willingness to be exploited by Western women. This essentially boils down to the idea if women don't act like women, why should we treat them like women? But Latinas do act like women and actually view the pedestal as a very masculine gesture. It shows that you care—that you respect and appreciate their feminine gifts.

However, the pedestal is not to be hoisted up indiscriminately. Latinas are not perfect and can lapse into bad female habits (lateness, attention-seeking behaviour, jealousy traps, annoying shit tests), at which point you drop the pedestal immediately and hold frame. Latinas are very intuitive creatures and will detect your display of discipline and self-respect. Once she realizes your pedestal is conditional, this will only strengthen the relationship and ensure you both cherish each other according to your own masculine/feminine principles.

Loading…

2. They reject feminism, value motherhood

Motherhood first is the Latina mantra.

Let's put it this way: there have been times when I, a writer at Return of Kings, have to cool down my Latina girlfriend after she powers through an anti-feminist rant. She endorses my standing at ROK and I constantly catch her reading articles on the site and snickering in response by saying "this is sooooo true." Regularly, she comes home from her job, slams down her bags, and bickers, "I honestly don't know how men survive here." (The answer: they don't, they just leave).

After my Latina girlfriend took up her 9-5 corporate gig, she now comes home, crashes to the bed with exhaustion, and admits that this job makes her want to become a mother even more. She sees all the sour women around her, riddled with penis envy and bitchy attitudes, and fears the prospect of becoming "that". She rues the degenerateness of a gender neutral-equal society where non-traditional lifestyles are celebrated over nuclear families.

Further, when I audited one of Jordan Peterson's lectures, she insisted on attending with me. When we heard the University of Toronto professor explain in-person what women can do about receiving better pay, she went out and bought a book on how to become a better negotiator.

The rare thing about Latinas is they are sort of, almost a little… accountable. While wild in the sack, they are not promiscuous if held in check by a strong, protective man. They are truly independent, as they value themselves but also understand the role of a man in their life and admit that there are times when they want and need a man—her novio.

3. They have a healthy "daddy complex"

Latinas tend to have strong, alpha, masculine fathers — which informs their expectations of men.

It's true that all women view men as a reflection of their father (or lack of one). A weak or absent father generally produces a woman with poor expectations of men. A strong or involved father generally produces a woman with high expectations of men. For the latter, she dates up the dominance hierarchy and expects her man to treat her with the same level of reverence and love given by papi.

In turn, you are expected to fulfill your role as the alpha male, be a provider, and make decisions on your and her behalf. You must lead unapologetically. Latinas love men who stand by what they say, even if that stance enrages them. With a Latina: YOU MUST ALWAYS HOLD FRAME. They can be firecrackers—real vixens—but that passion is just them testing their man's boundaries—to see if he can take them and if he really cares about the relationship.

Since Latinas tend to hold their fathers in very high regard, they hold their men to that same standard. In turn, you will find you grow as a man because you constantly have to stay sharp, firm, and honorable if you want to keep her. In return, you will have her committed loyalty.

Dating a Latina is built on a productive exchange of your most masculine virtues in return for hers. It is a rewards-based arrangement that brings out the best in your manhood—because that is what the relationship demands of you for it to last. While there are always exceptions to the rule, there is a good reason why Latinas are in such high demand in Toronto for men. They are part of a dying breed of strong, genuinely feminine group of women.

Read More: 3 Things I've Learned From Dating A Ukrainian Girl For One Year

Harry Lime
Writer. Filmmaker. Lover of cuckoo clocks. Email: harrylimerok @gmail.com.

How To Present A Strong And Masculine Face

June 11, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

You don’t need me to tell you how important communication is every single day of your life. Those who are capable of communicating succinctly and schmoozing effectively are generally the people who are capable of succeeding in their respective fields, while those who cannot communicate effectively are going to, at best, be busy little bees that make a decent (but not great) living wage technically and skillfully serving those skilled communicators.

Knowing that, you should also bear in mind that day to day communication can roughly be split 50-50 between verbal language and body language cues. And seeing as body language by definition involves alignment and proprioception of the human body, that is something I am qualified to talk about.

The movements of your body can reveal how you feel about yourself and others, and what you’re planning on doing. A person who understands body language holds all the advantages in interpersonal communication. Most importantly, they can convey the message and image of yourself that you want to convey to others, and on some occasions force you to take on a certain mood.

There’s enough to write an entire book just on body language (and in fact, many people have), but of course, seeing as you are a man, you undoubtedly want to create body language that is strong and masculine and dominant, and to avoid the submissive and shrinking body language that you’re probably doing.

The first thing to remember with body language is that no one gesture, pose, or facial expression alone conveys a message. It has to be taken in context with all the other body parts. Practice them in the mirror slowly and with control, so you can speed them up when you need to use them in interpersonal communication.

Since we want to establish dominance 24/7, this article will be the first of several looking at each region of the body and analyzing how you can present strong body language for it.

The Head

The position of your head is very important to conveying emotion. It can reveal attitudes that replace the spoken word, and support or challenge what your mouth is saying. You likely know this already (indeed, you intuitively have a basic grasp of body language).

If you tilt your head a bit backward (think of the expression “nose in the air”) it seems arrogant. If you thrust your chin forward, it looks pugnacious. When your name is announced in praise, you naturally lift your head up. When you want people to pay attention to you, your head rises. So if you want to look strong, you want to avoid having a downward chin and a drooping head, while at the same time avoiding the upward nose and thrust outward jaw of the arrogant man.

A steady, level head looks assertive and strong without being snobbish and “try-hard”. Avoid turning your head (in other words, maintain eye contact) and looking towards the shoulder, since that has been shown to be a sign of somebody FAKING strength and confidence. The key is to maintain eye contact, levelness, and symmetry to portray that sort of “cool confidence”.

Essentially, you want to do the exact opposite of this

The Face

Probably the most important part of body language, the face must be focused upon, particularly the eyes and the lips. “Look into a man’s eyes, he cannot hide in there”, and all that.

As a side note, looking at the face is also a pretty reliable way to know if a woman is attracted to you, but for now we want to deal with masculine body language, and how the various orifices of the face can affect it.

Eye contact is usually good, but sometimes it’s uncomfortable when the other person is dishonest or angry. The comfort of the eye contact depends on how they look or don’t look at you. Keep that in mind should you need to make somebody uncomfortable. Realize that “interest” eye contact has nice big dilated pupils, and “angry” eye contact has dilated pupils. You cannot control this (unless you’re a 16th century hooker with belladonna in an eye dropper), so just bear that in mind.

Also bear in mind that in some countries, prolonged eye contact is seen as rude. As a rule of thumb, whenever you are speaking to them, or they are speaking to you, maintain eye contact. When they look away at something, you do the same.

Eye contact can of course be used to show dominance. Dominant eye movements are sustained, slow, and smooth. Those in control of the interaction demonstrate their dominance by choosing when and how to look at the audience, and the easiest way to be perceived as strong and dominant is to slightly narrow the eyes and give a long, sustained gaze.

Paradoxically, removing eye contact in controlled bouts can really reinforce dominance. Example: if reprimanding someone, take your eye contact away for a little bit, to get their anxiety levels up, and then give them the stare. Looking away from someone, combined with a strong voice and posture, gives the idea of “You’re not worthy of me.” And of course, if you really want to unnerve somebody, just stare into their soul, directly into the eye without flinching.

Lips

The masculine man does not give a smile away constantly like a goof. He keeps a stone face throughout most of his day. The eyes are neutrally open or semi-squinted and the mouth is a straight line.

I am NOT saying that you should constantly be dour and unhappy. By all means, be ebullient on the inside, just don't LOOK constantly happy. A smile is worth more if it's given sparingly instead of given to everyone.

Two types of smile. On the left a real smile that crinkles the eye, on the right a fake smile that is merely a movement of the mouth

Conclusion

In general, the idea you want to be reaching for is to not be too "open" with your facial expression", stay tight and in control, but not too tight as that shows anger or the restraint of anger. Should you feel the need to smile, realize that a real smile crinkles the eyes, whereas a fake smile doesn't. Use your smiles sparingly, and give an earnest one when it's necessary to do so. That makes you much more endearing than being a typical fake-smiling corporate douchebag.

Sound complicated? It is a bit, the only way to learn it is from practicing in the mirror, and making a conscious effort to observe it in your daily dealings. But once you've mastered facial body language, the actual body can be undertaken.

Read More: The Strong & Independent Woman Translator

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

What The Hell Is Wrong With Sweden?

June 12, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Two years ago, Prince Prospero wrote about the wreckage of his homeland. His description of the Swedish political scene seems like a nation run by sociology and women's studies professors. Worse, hordes of unassimilable migrants caused a horrific crime wave. He concludes:

> The image I hope to paint is not that of a changing, or even failing state, but that of an already dead society. If you get the image of a struggling people making a last stand against an oppressive elite, I have failed as a writer. Study it, observe it, for it is your future should you choose the same path as Sweden.

He identifies feminism as the root cause of this mess. Although feminism certainly plays a role—and far be it from me to let those darlings off the hook—I'd also consider other varieties of cultural Marxism as contributing factors, and especially the closely related current of suicidalism. Let's examine how this came to be.

Highlights of Swedish history

A scene from the Battle of Warsaw

The Roman historian Tacitus noted two Scandinavian tribes with some unusual peculiarities:

> Arms are not with [the Suiones], as with the other Germans, at the general disposal, but are in the charge of a keeper, who is actually a slave; for the ocean forbids the sudden inroad of enemies, and, besides, an idle multitude of armed men is easily demoralized. […]
>
> Closely bordering on the Suiones are the tribes of the Sitones, which, resembling them in all else, differ only in being ruled by a woman. So low have they fallen, not merely from freedom, but even from slavery itself.

Still, that's not all to be told of ancient Sweden. To the south were the bold Geats, featured prominently in Beowulf. The island of Gotland was the ancestral homeland of the fierce Goths who conquered their way across Eastern and Southern Europe. In later times, Swedes were among the Vikings. The problems besetting their descendants today are not caused by defective genetics, but rather by ideology.

By the 17th Century, Sweden had an impressive empire centering on the Baltic Sea, even with toeholds in Germany. However, it was not to last. King Charles XII took on Russia. To make a long story short, unusually harsh weather took its toll, giving the Russians time to rebuild their strength and stage a successful counteroffensive; the same scenario occurring twice later in history.

Sweden in the 20th Century luckily escaped the carnage of both World Wars. They didn't incur the suicidalist guilt trip still poisoning German minds.

Sweden today

John Hydenius also has painted a very grim picture; I'll go over a few items. Aside from feminism and their crazy policies and demands, he's written quite often about Muslim colonization of Sweden, and the crimes the invaders commit, basically overlooked by the authorities.

It's a little anticlimactic given the above, but today's Swedish culture seems mired in decadence. Then there's the "mansplaining" hotline:

> Unionen said the phone line, which will be staffed by a gender expert and a group of feminist politicians, comedians and scientists, is “about equality”.

While their ship of state is sinking, feminists busily scrub a smudge on the deck.

So how did the Swedes revert to the feminism and complacent pacifism that Tacitus found so absurd? The Vikings, Goths, and Varangians of the days of yore certainly wouldn’t have tolerated this nonsense, not for a minute. The real problem is ideology. Still, there’s a little more to the story.

The push for multiculturalism

Was the present disaster caused by feminism, other forms of cultural Marxism, or suicidalism? Are socialist rabbit people responsible? Could it be Sweden’s conformist culture, similar to Danish Jante Law? Perhaps a cucked interpretation of Christianity is to blame, as it apparently is for their relatives in Minnesota who rolled out the red carpet for tens of thousands of Somalis? All that poured gasoline on the logs, though ultimately influence behind the scenes struck the match.

And a disaster it is. They are inundated by aggressive outsiders who have nothing in common with their culture, attracted by Sweden’s lavish welfare benefits and lax law enforcement. Women are protecting themselves with modern-day chastity belts (an item in great demand), because the police can’t protect them from the hordes of violent, unassimilable migrants that the government let in. This is anarcho-tyranny at its very foulest.

Even leftist municipal authorities are taking notice; truly a sign that things are dreadfully wrong. It hasn’t led to a reversal of these suicidal policies, or even public discussion; in fact, criticizing this is forbidden.

60 year old man mugged at train station

Despite that, Ingrid Carlqvist is speaking out, and taking the even bolder step of naming names. When she researched it, she really got an education; the rabbit hole goes very deep. Carlqvist found that the impetus was brought about by David Schwartz, a holocaust survivor who moved to Sweden. He believed that implementing multiculturalism would neutralize the Swedish threat. This was pure paranoia as the Swedes had no quarrel with his small community, nor had any reason to resent them (before then).

Later, Barbara Specter came in from Israel and headed Paidea. This foundation pushed the multicultural agenda and pressured the Swedish government for funding. These efforts were unknown to the public, until they were featured on a TV show meant for an Israeli audience. So those are two influential individuals we know about, among untold others working behind the scenes.

This strategy backfired badly. Those who actually do have a grudge against their small community are the Muslim migrants flooding in; their anti-Semitic feelings are considerably more intense than their ungrateful hostility against the native Swedes. The paranoia motivating David Schwartz (and the others who followed) to push for multiculturalism became their tragedy. Their common folk suffered from the decisions made by their community's leaders. What a lousy survival strategy!

The greater tragedy is that the native Swedes themselves may well lose their country, and obviously they can't pack up and move to Israel if things get worse. This sort of sabotage in many Western nations isn't very endearing, greatly damaging the Jewish reputation. Note that I don't hold all the Jewish population responsible for this. I will say that they can do themselves a lot of good (and the rest of us) by prevailing upon their community's leaders to stop doing things like this.

Who is the most blameworthy? Is it short-sighted manipulators behind the scenes, the unassimilable migrants, or even the naive Swedes (who sadly are more "unaware and compliant" than Americans)? Most deserving to go to hell is the Swedish government for selling out their own people. Protecting their citizens is their number one job, and they have failed. Perhaps their treachery might send them to hell sooner than they expect.

In the end

What cultural enrichment means

In the world's incarnadine history, there are many instances of invading hordes conquering a civilization, preying on the helpless public, and exacting a heavy tribute.

Today, warfare is no longer necessary. Treasonous politicians invite them in and tax their own public to give tribute in the form of welfare checks to the invaders who prey on the public. One might perhaps consider that a sign that the government isn't working for the people.

Two results are possible. In time, the Swedes might indeed vanish from the face of the earth. On the other hand, there's still the chance—perhaps remote—that they might wake up and resurrect their nation. The people of the West are patient and slow to anger, but there's only so far that we can be provoked. Time and again, those who've taken our forbearance as a sign of weakness have come to regret it.

What about the politicians, and the powerful figures pulling their strings? As a Chateau Heartiste article on problems inherent in diversity concludes:

> Historically, what was done to ruling elites who displayed such open, traitorous contempt for their people? I'll leave the imaginative answer to this question as an exercise for the readers.

I could hardly put it any better.

Read More: Is Western Civilization Worth Saving?

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

5 Ways The Left Lies To You

June 12, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

As nearly everyone who is red-pilled knows, SJWs, progressives, and leftists in general are all too often liars and twisters of the truth. Indeed, the Left not only thrives on inconsistency and double-standards, but also on deception, obfuscation, and misdirection. And this claim holds true whether the progressive-leftists in question are professionals, such as media personalities and politicians, or merely progressive morons on the internet.

In light of this truth, it is imperative for individuals on the political-right—especially for those who are new to the culture wars—to understand how this sort of lying can be done. After all, to be forewarned is to be forearmed.

Now, in my experience in law enforcement, there exist five main types of lies. In fact, all the lies that people tell can be fit into one of these five categories, or a combination thereof, and progressive-leftists are not unique in this regard. So let us thus examine these five types of lies in order to better understand how they are used against the political-right on a day-to-day basis by the leftwing media, academia, and politicians.

Lies of Fabrication

Lies of fabrication—also called lies of deceit—are self-explanatory. These are the lies that are completely fake. They are the stories made out of whole cloth. They are the lies of black propaganda. And they are also the lies that are the very hardest to use given that their complete falsehood can be relatively easily discovered—especially in the age of the internet.

Now, in fairness to progressives and SJWs, lies of fabrication are also the lies that are least used by them. And this especially true in the case of professional progressives, such as the media, because if they were caught in a lie of fabrication, then an almost fatal amount of their credibility would be lost—and they actually are smart enough to know this.

However, while lies of deceit are not normally used by such progressive groups as the leftwing media directly, it is nevertheless true that there are indirect ways for professional progressives to use such lies.

For example, when the leftwing media reports what an "anonymous" source says, it is patently obvious that the anonymous source could very well be fabricating his entire story, but the media has plausible deniability when they report the story through the filter of such a "source". So while direct lies of fabrication might not be used by such left-leaning outlets as the mainstream media, they are often used in an indirect fashion by such groups. Consequently, anytime a progressive has even a fig-leaf of plausible deniability, then know that there is a very real possibility that you are being potentially fed with an indirect lie of fabrication.

Lies of Denial

If only it was this easy to recognize.

This is the type of lie where a person simply claims that they were not involved in a certain event or incident, even though they were. In the political arena, this type of lie is most often used to deny a past statement or claim. And that is how many progressives and SJWs employ this lie.

For example, if you are having a discussion with a SJW, and the SJW suddenly moves the goal-posts of the discussion, do not be surprised if the SJW outright denies that he has shifted the goal-posts or changed the subject when you call him out on this maneuver.

Even if the SJW's maneuver is obvious, not only will the SJW often deny that he has employed such a move, but the SJW might even double-down on his denial, thus making it an even more shocking kind of lie than it normally would be. In the end, though, this is not as shocking as it seems; after all, as the saying goes, SJWs always lie.

Lies of Minimization

Within the last few years, everyone no doubt remembers reading some media article, and immediately noticing that a very relevant fact concerning that article—perhaps the ethnicity of an assailant or the fact that the article is based on unconfirmed anonymous sources—is buried in the last few paragraphs of the article. Or maybe the article is fully transparent, but the article itself is buried on page fifteen of the newspaper when it should be on page one. This is lying by minimization.

In this type of lie, the offender takes some relevant fact or point, and then tries to make that fact seem as unimportant as possible. It is not omitting the fact, but it is trying to undermine the fact's importance or relevance through the way that the fact is framed, or articulated, or presented.

For example, did a Muslim slash someone's throat? Well, if such an incident is reported as a mere "assault", then such a report is not actually false, nor is it an omission, but it is a lie of minimization. And unlike lies of fabrication, lies of minimization are used by progressive-leftists all the time, especially when reporting on negative things which other progressive-leftists have done or when reporting on facts which harm the progressive narrative. As such, this is one type of lie to always watch out for when reading or listening to any SJW or progressive discuss his side's own follies.

Lies of Exaggeration

The opposite of minimizing a fact is exaggerating a fact, and lies of exaggeration are the left's primary form of lie when speaking about anyone on the right of the political spectrum.

For example, did some no-name skinhead white supremacist murder his girlfriend in a domestic dispute? Well, don't be surprised if some leftist think-tank suddenly counts such an incident as an example of right-wing terrorism. Is some right-wing personality merely a libertarian or even a centrist? Well, don't be surprised if that person is labeled by the progressive-left as 'extremely far-right' or a 'neo-Nazi'. Of course, all these leftist claims are absurd, but that is the point. The leftist is exaggerating for effect.

Such exaggerations are a clear form of lying when done deliberately. And apart from the progressive true-believers who are forty paces to the left of Marx, many forked-tongue progressive-leftists know exactly what they are doing when they exaggerate their claims against the political-right.

Lies of Omission

Here is, arguably, the type of lie that the progressive-left uses the most in general situations. For example, every day on the internet you will find some progressive-Christian providing a short scriptural verse to support his point, but "strangely", the progressive-Christian leaves out the greater context of the whole chapter. Of course, once the whole scriptural chapter is read, it completely undermines the progressive-Christian's selective quoting. And so, this is just plain old lying by omission.

Furthermore, we all know how often such lying happens in the media when they, for example, neglect to report—at least until it can no longer be avoided—that some terrorist attacker is a Muslim or a recently arrived refugee. After all, it is almost a humorous truism that when the Western European media, for example, reports that a gang of "Asian youths" assaulted someone, what they actually mean is that a bunch of Muslims caused yet another riot, but they are trying to omit that fact by covering it up with more acceptable terminology.

Or when some progressive-leftist claims that more Americans have been killed by right-wing terrorists than by Islamists—a claim that is false—these progressive-leftists often omit to mention that they start counting their statistics one day after 9/11, or that their statistics fail to take into account the most recent terrorist attacks committing by Islamists in America, or so on and so forth. Again, all lies by omission.

In fact, lies by omission are so often used by the progressive-left that whenever reading or listening to some leftwing media source, always watch for what is not being said. Often, what is being omitted will speak louder than what is actually being stated.

Conclusion

So, these are the five main types of lies. They can, of course, be combined. They can also be used by anyone, but they are very often used—in a deliberate manner—by those on the political-left. Remember these types of lies. Know how to spot them. And always be on your guard for them whenever you are receiving information from anyone on the progressive-left.

Read More: How The Media Lies Through Omission And Distortion

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

How A Tsunami Of Molasses Killed 21 People In America’s Weirdest Tragedy

June 12, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Molasses has been an important commodity for much of American history. Besides its use in candy and confections, it is also distilled into alcohol. But even apparently harmless substances can cause tremendous damage in the right circumstances; and this point was compellingly made in 1919 when a huge tank of molasses exploded in Boston’s North End. The disaster is little-known today outside of New England, but the lesson is clear: even seemingly “harmless” substances must be treated with the care they deserve.

A company called the United States Industrial Alcohol Company owned a huge molasses tank in the North End that stood 52 feet high and had a diameter of 91 feet. The tank contained about 2.3 million gallons of dark, raw molasses. The month of January 1919 had been an unusually mild one, and local residents were hopeful that the rest of the winter months would be about the same. The weather was so good, in fact, that people were able to venture outdoors without having to wear coats for days on end.

But this period of tranquility was cut short by a tremendous explosion that took place around noon of January 15. Witnesses described it as sounding like the report of a “thousand machine guns” going off at the same time; the metal storage tank burst into numerous fragments; and a tidal wave of molasses pushed its way out in every direction.

Small houses, railroad cars, and trees were ripped from their emplacements and carried forward like twigs in a stream. Horses (still commonly used for labor and transportation in those days) and men were crushed or submerged under the black tide. Fragments of the tank flew off in every direction like shrapnel, crashing into surrounding bridges, buildings, and railway cars.

The Boston Daily Globe EXTRA

MOLASSES TANK EXPLOSION INJURES 50 AND KILLS 11

SCENE OF RUIN AND DESOLATION IN NORTH END AFTER DESTRUCTION OF PURITY DISTILLING COMPANY TANK AND NEARBY STRUCTURES

Death and Devastation In Wake of North End Disaster

Buildings Demolished, Sticky Mass Floods Streets—Loss $500,000

Red Cross Women, Firemen and Sailors Do Heroic Work In Aiding Victims

LIST OF DEAD

The entire building that housed Boston Fire Station No. 31 was lifted off its foundation and hurled against the wooden pilings along the waterfront, killing several men in the process. The initial explosion was followed by a massive sucking sound as the vacuum created by the blast was filled again by air. Those buildings near the blast that were not destroyed by the shock wave were ripped apart when the vacuum effect followed directly after the initial explosion.

As the dark sludge spread out, it began to lose speed as its viscosity increased. In large quantities in the open air, raw molasses is very different from the stuff found in a bottle in a household pantry; it is not the benign syrup that cooks drizzle into their baking confections. The molasses that burst on the North End waterfront in 1919 was more like the natural tar found in tar pits: it could freeze a man in his tracks, pinning him down, and preventing him from getting up unless he was exceptionally strong. Witnesses said that Commercial Street (the center of the disaster) was filled with molasses to a depth of four feet.

Attention immediately focused on what had caused the explosion. The corporate attorney for US Industrial Alcohol, Harry F. Dolan, denied that the cause had been due to the tank's construction. The company would eventually try to blame the explosion on sabotage by anarchists. However, a state explosives expert named W.L. Wedger was not so sure. Noting that the tank was heated in the winter months to prevent the tank's contents from freezing, he speculated that the unusually warm weather and inadequate ventilation inside the tank had caused it to burst. The company's only employee assigned to monitor the tank—a man named William White—had been away at lunch when the explosion occurred.

The sheer weirdness of the whole spectacle captivated the rest of the city; in the vicinity of the disaster, molasses was hanging from trees, poles, and coated entire buildings. It would take months, perhaps years, for it to be fully removed. The thick smell of the substance hovered like a cloud over the North End and beyond.

Trying to clean up the area was extremely difficult. The sludge had settled in basements and cellars, and it had clogged sewage lines and drains. Workers found that the only way to make any progress was simply to do it the back-breaking old-fashioned way: by shovel and bucket. More bodies of horses and men were discovered as the molasses was gradually cleared away. The human death toll stood at 21; the number of injured was about 150.

Federal officials were called in to assist in the investigation. Chemical and metallurgical examination soon revealed the following facts: (1) the tank had been filled to capacity; (2) the molasses had begun to ferment, giving off alcoholic fumes; (3) the sun had warmed the tank to an unsafe degree. The lack of sufficient ventilation for the tank's contents had further endangered the situation.

Why had no one noticed this before? Under the building codes of the day, the tank was not classified as a "building," but as a "receptacle." What this meant was that it fell outside any kind of regulation or inspection regime. The chief of the Boston Fire Department, J.H. Plunkett, said this about the disaster:

> [T]he molasses in the tank had to be heated in order to keep it at a temperature which would allow it to be drawn easily from the tank. The heating was done by means of steam pipes run into the tank. In heating such tanks, great care must be used to prevent overheating. Molasses when fermenting, or when heated, throws off an alcoholic gas which has a tremendous pressure…There is no regulation over the construction and use of such tanks. In my opinion there > should be.

The inevitable lawsuits erupted with nearly the same force that had burst the molasses tank. They were not fully settled until 1926. What came out of the litigation was that the tank manufacturer had used substandard materials in its construction; worse still, no comprehensive inspection of any kind had ever been made. The damages that the U.S. Industrial Alcohol Company had to pay in a class-action suit eventually came close to one million dollars. When we consider that 21 people died, this seems a very low number; but this was the age before adequate compensation for wrongful death negligence.

Read More: How One Of The Most Successful Armed Robberies In History Took Place

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How Feminism Wrecked The Social Contract Between The Sexes

June 13, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Since the beginning, there has been a semi-formal social contract between the sexes which worked for the good of men, women, and their children especially. This existed is because men and women are different. These differences aren't social constructs; they're based in biology. In a healthy society, these differences complement each other.

Feminists generally deny all this. They start from the belief that everyone is supposed to be the same, then use privilege rhetoric to press for advantages. In so doing, they've disrupted the social contract and made things worse for everyone. Let's examine a few particulars.

Men and women should respect each other

In times past, guys were taught to treat all women with respect. As I've heard it said, "You even tip your hat to the town hooker." In return, women respected them back. Men were gentlemanly; women were ladylike. After the mid-1960s, men were still expected to act gentlemanly, but women could act however they want. Although most women still have pleasant personalities, many act in ways that before would've been considered verging on madness.

Why this used to work: Mutual respect was great while it lasted, making society happy and harmonious.

Why this stopped working: Feminists, wanting an unhappy and disharmonious society, declared us the enemy and started lying about us. We're still expected to uphold our end of the bargain (though paradoxically, giving too much respect can cause guys not to be taken seriously). Meanwhile, women infected with the feminism mind-virus believe they have license to act as nasty as they want. (It doesn't help that hordes of thirsty guys have enabled them to think they can get away with anything and still be desired.) This is a major reason why the social environment sucks. However, individual beauty is fleeting, and the sexual marketplace is overdue for a correction.

What can be done: Give default social respect to the deserving. Feel free to call out those who act snotty. Calmly explain that unprovoked rudeness is very unattractive to any self-respecting guy. If all men refused to tolerate the intolerable, attitudes would begin to change.

Men and women don't fight each other

This is a very difficult and ugly topic. Initiating force is wrong, no matter who does it. Those who disregard this should be prepared to accept the consequences of their actions.

Violence between men—fistfights and even duels—was once tolerated by the law. That now seems a bit savage, like animals fighting for pack hierarchy. (Today, delivering badly-needed attitude adjustments, literally fighting for your honor, or even legitimate self-defense could get you a criminal record. Settling disputes through lawyers is far from perfect, but all that's another story.) However, even during those rougher times, hitting women was considered a foul deed. Offenders got subjected to shunning, charivari (basically a jeering crowd), or even mob justice. The law took action too, and flogging posts were once considered.

Why this used to work: Civilized men don't use their natural advantage of strength to lord it over their wives and girlfriends. Civilized women don't take advantage of this prohibition to strike us with impunity.

Men were expected to exercise self-restraint, and women likewise in their own way. Both parties acting civilized benefited everyone. Also, women in earlier times could be quite spirited, but provoking us to the limits of our patience was abnormal. That wasn't ladylike, and reputation mattered. Further, chronic "scolds" got their own penalties, such as the ducking stool.

Why this stopped working: Violence by men against women is still strongly discouraged (though paradoxically, it's not exactly a turn-off for some women). However, violence by women against men is considered far more acceptable. On TV or in a movie, it's dreadful when a man slaps a woman, but a woman kicking a man in the nuts is depicted as funny. Too much "you-go-girlism" is doing a great disservice. Think of the Antifag member who set out to take "100 Nazi scalps", but when she tried to choke a guy, she got decked in two seconds.

In any event, it's a myth that women are never violent. Some of them even think it's cute enough to admit online. A Jezebel article "Have You Ever Beat Up A Boyfriend? Cause, Uh, We Have" says:

> According to a study of relationships that engage in nonreciprocal violence, a whopping 70% are perpetrated by women. So basically that means that girls are beating up their BFs and husbands and the dudes aren't fighting back. With Amy Winehouse busting open a can of whupass on her husband last week, we decided to conduct an informal survey of the Jezebels to see who's gotten violent with their men. After reviewing the answers, let's just say that it'd be wise to never ever fuck with us.

Four specific anecdotes follow. Let's just say that it'd be wise to never ever pick fights with people who are stronger than you. In any case, contrary to the stereotype, apparently lots of men are showing incredible self-restraint.

What can be done: I've had two past girlfriends who hit me. I never retaliated, or even shook my fist. Eventually I dumped them, though for other sub-par behaviors. Today, I have less tolerance. If a girlfriend hits you, I recommend one warning, at the very most; after that, she's out the door. Without going into a long legal discussion, you're always "wrong", and it doesn't matter that you were legitimately defending yourself. You might think (as I once did) that it doesn't matter because she hits like a girl, but that's still an intolerable level of disrespect. It's even better to bail before things get that toxic. Who wants to deal with a bunny boiler anyway?

Men should be masculine and women should be feminine

I swear I wasn't the one who recommended this.

Blurring the distinctions between the sexes was one of the first goals of cultural Marxism. Today, this has succeeded beyond Comrade Marcuse's wildest dreams. However, all that's unnatural. It's another reason why today's social environment sucks.

Why this used to work: Straight men are hard-wired to desire feminine traits, and straight women like masculine guys. It doesn't take an evolutionary biologist to understand why. This includes both appearance and behavior.

Why this stopped working: Beginning in the mid-1950s, second wave feminism started denigrating male traits, and they're still at it with this "toxic masculinity" baloney. Through their rhetoric, they convinced a lot of guys that women don't like masculinity; take a wild guess how that worked out for guys who believed it!

Feminists also tricked millions into believing that femininity was beneath them. The way they told it, the “patriarchy” somehow made them take on these natural and endearing attributes. However, we don’t like unfeminine, unladylike women any more than women like wimpy guys.

Earlier I mentioned women who blow you off if you show too much respect, and those who go for violent guys. One could chalk up these paradoxes to irrationality, self-esteem problems, Daddy issues, or confusing obnoxious behavior with confidence. Still, surely this is made worse by the shortage of decent guys unafraid to act like real men.

What can be done: On our part, men must ignore feminists when they tell us that masculine traits are bad. One of the best things the Manosphere has done is to show how absurd that is and prevent men from further sabotaging their love lives. There are also ways we can encourage femininity too. For example, once I talked a pretty girl out of getting a piercing through the bridge of her nose. I might be deplorable, but I’m capable of the occasional good deed.

Conclusion

Hit the SJWs where it hurts, their credibility

Feminists want to keep all the privileges that chivalrous treatment gave them. Meanwhile, in the name of equality (which they already had under the law by the early 1960s), they keep pushing for preferential treatment. Could it be time to bring back the ducking stool?

Read More: 8 Factors That Are Destroying Healthy Relationships Between Men And Women

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

America Has Become So Spirtually Dead That More People Than Ever Are Killing Themselves With Drugs

June 13, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

You know you're living in a suicidal culture when more Americans now die annually from drug overdoses than died during the entirety of the Vietnam War. What's more, another grim side of this statistic is more people under age 50 now die of drug overdoses than any other cause of death in America.

But why?

One might argue it's because the nation has long been spiritually dead and the country runs on people trying to fill the void in their lives with novel shopping and eating out experiences. But nothing they can buy or eat ever quite does it the way having basic human relationships and close knit families once did.

Living in a deeply sexually repressed culture also takes its toll on the human psyche, in which Anglo America has deemed it okay for gays and lesbians (1-3% of the population) to have fulfilling sex lives but frowns upon straight men pursuing sexual satisfaction with straight women both culturally and legally.

As a result of a culture that literally sold out its intrinsic happiness for extrinsic life goals like more consumer junk and McMansions and shinier boxes on wheels, and in which no man is "good enough" for a screw from today's obese, wannabe goddesses, more people are dying annually by trying to chemically escape today's modern dystopia than ever before. Anywhere from 59,000 to 65,000 people died of drug overdoses just last year.

Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein detailed the grim statistics last week, which prove modern Anglo culture is also deadlier than terrorism. Breitbart reports:

> To grasp the enormity of the epidemic he claimed that if three mass-shootings as deadly as the Pulse Nightclub Attack occurred three times every day for 365 days, then the death toll would roughly reach that of drug overdoses in 2015.

Once again, clueless leaders address the problem of people being so miserable from Anglo culture they are literally dropping like flies – seeking an escape through drugs until they overdose – by incorrectly diagnosing the problem and applying the wrong remedies, as Groucho Marx famously stated politicians always do. They see it as a law enforcement problem. It's not a law enforcement problem, it's a cultural problem.

It's called working people like slaves, taking their youth, families and free time away, treating them like children on the job and in daily life, creating a materialistic society bereft of culture, and making it the metaphorical equivalent of a moon shot for the masses of Beta male laborers to fulfill their physical and psychological sexual needs. Drugs have become a way to ease the pain caused by the spiritual deadness in modern America and of course, the loneliness brought on by a society that has molded its citizens (and men and women) into each other's enemy and competitor rather than each other's neighbor and lover.

Of course, this new drug abuse narrative will be used to impose even more Draconian government intervention into the lives of the average person rather than to give people some of their lives back and let them return to intrinsically fulfilling life goals.

Even More Power For Law Enforcement

What ever happened to Protect and Serve? Not Oppress and Subjugate

At last week's press conference, Rosenstein set up his agency and its oppressive DEA, which have both colossally failed in their 40-year old Drug War, to aggrandize more power.

> Some people say we should be more permissive, more tolerant, more understanding about drug use. I say we should be more honest and forthcoming with the American people on the clear and present danger that we know face.

In other words, more Prohibition, not less, and more jack-booted thugs, not fewer are coming our way. And more importantly, don't expect a government and its masters in the corporate world to lessen human suffering by breaking some of the chains they've placed around their peons' legs, because both sides of the coin are profiting enormously from the status quo.

People being so miserable that they're offing themselves with drugs in astonishing numbers is profitable. They buy material things like palliatives to ease their existential suffering and eat until they're obese, trying to buy their way to happiness. The corporate-government complex makes a lot of money by turning people into consumption machines this way.

When that doesn't work and the shop-and-eat lifestyle fails to bring a sense of fulfillment into the lives of the serfs, increasing numbers move on to drugs to try and find an escape from the daily hell of the sleep-work-spend cycle. Oppressive law enforcement then lobbies for even more power and more money for themselves to "fight" a problem that can't be won through force.

The one constant, and the important question to ask is: Who is profiting from this situation? Why, the Establishment is profiting, of course. That's why the DOJ and DEA want even more power. This is a defining moment for them to profit even more off what is a cultural and spiritual problem, not a drug problem.

This is America in the early 21st century. A truly frightening place for those with the mental horsepower to see what's going on. How many more deaths and ruined lives will it take before the masses realize clinging to the "leadership" of the Establishment and their goons in law enforcement isn't working? You're asking for help from the very people tasked with turning you into what Herbert Hoover called another "happiness machine." As it turns out, selling out human lives, turning people into profit-producing "machines" for dollars and cents is having disastrous results for humanity but it provides cushy lives for those in power.

We have reached a crescendo of this insanity in modern Anglo society, in which people want to go on doing what they've been doing, living vain, materialistic lives while hoping to get different results each time they swipe out at the local strip mall. That's the root of the drug problem – it has nothing to do with law enforcement not having the citizens even more firmly under its thumb.

I don't know about you, but I'm not following the masses into destruction. When will we stop listening to those whose lives and finances are based on continuing, and worsening, the current corporate-government (and law enforcement goon) paradigm?

To end the drug addiction/mass drug abuse death issue, treat the root causes rather than the symptoms. That won't be as profitable, though. So it will never happen.

Read More: How Brave New World Author Aldous Huxley Foresaw Modern America In 1958

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

How To Use Individual Kratom Strains To Crush Your Goals

June 13, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

Return Of Kings readers are probably already aware of Kratom and all of the amazing benefits this magical plant provides. With all of the different types and strains of Kratom available on the market, it's important to know which ones to purchase in order to treat specific symptoms, or to achieve specific goals.

What's most confusing about finding the correct strains for your needs is the fact that there are no established or standardized naming conventions for the different strains. To further complicate matters, many vendors give their own Kratom products and blends branded names, so there are sometimes dozens of different names for the same products.

The easiest and most common way to differentiate strains is using the naming system the farmers and plantations in southeast Asia typically use: color of vein + area of origin.

Three types of Kratom

All Kratom can be broken down into three types, based on the color of the vein on the leaves: red, white, and green. There are also horn varieties, yellows, and golds, but these are marketing tricks or variations on drying methods for the main three.

- Red vein strains are effective for relieving pain, anxiety, and insomnia.
- White vein strains are great for treating depression, increasing productivity, and increased energy and focus. Many use white vein strains first thing in the morning as a healthy substitute for coffee.
- Green vein strains are the mid-range, providing a milder boost in energy, focus and mood. Much like you wouldn't take espresso shots late in the day, green strains are better than white strains for daily use in the afternoon and evening.

Though there are now myriad hybrid and exotic strains of Kratom and it is now grown in many different countries, all Kratom plant genetics trace back to three countries: Malaysia (aka Malay), Thailand (aka Thai), and Indonesia (aka Indo).

- Malay strains are good for focus
- Thai strains are good for energy
- Indonesian strains are sometimes labeled as Indo, or sometimes further broken down by the area of Indonesia where they originated. Their unique regional genetics come with different relative levels of different alkaloids, and thus they have different properties. Examples include Sumatra and Riau strains from Western Indonesia, and Borneo/Bali and Kalimantan strains from Eastern Indonesia.

Maeng Da strains are said to originate from a specific plantation in Indonesia that marketed their product as "genetically grown," manipulating plant DNA to create the perfect Thai strain. The strain itself was lost, but through hybrid crossbreeding, the higher potency genes have survived and are frequently crossed with local varieties to create a "Maeng Da" (literally, "pimp grade") potency. These days, Maeng Da isn't a strain so much as a marker of a very powerful Kratom strain.

Now we can discuss the best Kratom strains for specific symptoms you may be experiencing…

Pain relief strains (most potent to weakest)

1. Bliss Blend
2. Red Bentuangie Borneo
3. Red Vein Bali / Red Vein Borneo

Amount to burn: moderate (2-4.5 grams) to high (4.5-8 grams)

Relaxation strains (most sedative to least)

These are useful for unwinding after a long day of work, or for helping you sleep.

1. Red Vein Bali
2. Mellow Bali Blend
3. Red Vein Borneo

Amount to burn: moderate (2-4.5 grams) to high (4.5-8 grams)

Anxiety relief strains

1. Red Vein Bali / Red Vein Borneo
2. Pride Blend
3. Karma Blend

Amount to burn: moderate (2-4.5 grams)

Energy strains (most stimulation to least)

1. White Vein Maeng Da Thai
2. Monkey Business Blend
3. Green Vein Malaysian

Amount to burn: moderate (2-4.5 grams) to high (4.5-8 grams)

Mood strains (most mood-boosting to least)

1. Mind's Eye Blend
2. Green Maeng Da Borneo
3. Green Vein Malaysian

Amount to burn: moderate (2-4.5 grams)

Depression strains (most euphoric to least)

1. Bali Espresso Blend
2. White Vein Borneo
3. White Vein Malaysian

Amount to burn: moderate (2-4.5 grams) to high (4.5-8 grams)

Immune system stimulation strains

For the flu or a cold, many take kratom at the first sign of symptoms to dramatically reduce their downtime.

1. Green Vein Malaysian
2. Green Vein Borneo

Amount to burn: low (1-2 grams) to moderate (2-4.5 grams)

If you want to crush your obstacles and achieve your goals, make sure you enhance your body and mind in equal amounts, and as naturally as possible. Kratom is one of those hidden jewels that make the difference between a good man and a great one. Much like anything else, it's a tool, not a toy, and should be treated with respect. That's why it's important to make sure you have the right tool for the job, and the right Kratom for the symptoms you're hoping to overcome. With the right strains, the sky really is the limit.

Island Lion Herbals offers sophisticated relaxation for upscale clientele. All of our premium Kratom powder is imported directly from the source in southeast Asia and is organic, lab-tested, and contaminant-free.

To celebrate our grand opening, Island Lion Herbals is offering a special discount code for Return Of Kings readers. Just input coupon code: ROK15 for 15% off your purchase at our online store. Click here to visit our online store.

Follow @ILHerbals on Twitter or like our Facebook fan page for exclusive giveaways and discounts. You can also add us as a friend on add us as a friend on Facebook.

Disclaimer: These statements have not been evaluated by the FDA. These products are not intended to diagnose, treat, cure, or prevent any disease. Kratom is not meant for human consumption. Click here to visit Island Lion Herbals.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Rash Of “Pregnant Man” Stories From Mainstream Media Confirm You Need A Vagina To Have Children

June 14, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

There is a recent news article under the headline ‘“My body is awesome’: Trans man expecting first child“, about a couple in Portland, Oregon who are having a baby in July. The noteworthy (well, sort of) part of the story is that—according to the article, anyway—both parents are men.

A dude got pregnant?

No, this isn't from the Weekly World News. Neither is it from The Onion. It's from CNN. It's not just the Clinton News Network either, because several other mainstream media sources are covering the same story, all with the same glowing tone. The article indicates that the expectant mother…

> …who was assigned the female gender at birth and says he kept his "original parts," adds that he never wanted to change his body.
>
> "I think my body is awesome. I feel like it's a gift to have been born with the body that I did, and I made the necessary changes so that I could keep living in it, both through hormones and through other body modifications…

Okay, the first sentence has two framing tactics in it; I understand that much. What I don't understand is how the second sentence makes any sense in light of the first.

Clearly the reporter covered nothing but softball questions. I would've asked: "If you never wanted to change your body, then why take steroids and get body modifications?" After that, "How is it possible for two males to conceive a baby together?" I might also ask how they plan to explain this to the kid later on, or if they feel there's a risk the child or his peers will be confused. The interviewer clearly didn't have the balls for that, any more than the mother does. Given the state of today's journalism, though, any reporter asking questions like that would be looking for a new job.

Anyway, it continues:

> I'm OK with my body being a trans body. I'm OK being a man who has a uterus and has the capacity and capability of carrying a baby. I don't feel like it makes me any less of a man. I just happen to be a man who is able to carry a baby.

Hold that thought for a moment; we'll be getting back to that line of argumentation shortly. The second half of the article is stuff about gastric symptoms, food cravings, and telling their two adopted kids that another little one is on the way. That would have questionable relevance even if they were covering a big celebrity's pregnancy. Perhaps there's some real information in the couple's linked Facebook video, but I don't feel like watching it for fear of getting gastric symptoms.

According to another puff piece:

> The partners say that the Portland community has been "incredibly supportive"… partly because it's not uncommon there for a transgender man to carry a baby.
>
> "We know dozens of transgender men who have gone through this exact same process, and there is now quite a bit of medical evidence that shows that this would be a safe and healthy thing for us to engage in, medically speaking…"

Interesting. What's up with Portland, anyway?

Leftists don't get biology

Those who are perplexed can have a look at the dictionary definition of female. In the context of animal biology, this means:

> …of, relating to, or being the sex that typically has the capacity to bear young or produce eggs

That's right. Getting pregnant—or simply being born with the required body parts to do so—is proof of being female.

Leftists tend to look down their nose at creationists for denying the theory of evolution, considering them to be superstitious sixth grade dropouts or the like. Fine, I've read Richard Dawkins too; I get it about natural selection and survival of the fittest. In my heathen opinion, that there's nothing wrong with believing that Providence set things in motion, though that's beside the point.

Now here's the thing. If creationists can be criticized for denying Darwinism then leftists who believe in this gender-bending stuff can be criticized for denying basic biology. Even the most diehard fundamentalist knows what a man or a woman is. These aren't some blurry, undefinable categories either. Actually, it's right there in the beginning of their creation story:

> So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.

Now who understands this aspect of basic biology better: Bible thumpers, or leftists who proclaim that there are dozens of genders (but only one race, of course)? Even when I was a very small child, I understood that boys and girls are different; further, they act different and are interested in different things. So what's with all these journalists (and professors) who can't figure it out?

Despite all that, I'm convinced that deep down, even the looniest SJWs actually know what male and female mean, but their ideology blinds them to reality. They know the truth, but avoid cognitive dissonance by putting up a mental shield ("crimestop" in Orwell's Newspeak) or create elaborate rationalizations to avoid thoughtcrime. Even leftists who recognize that the narrative is bullshit might not dare to speak up, because they'd risk getting shouted down and ostracized.

Really, it's pretty sad. The ability to create life is an awesome and unique part of being female, although radical feminists tend to have some strange complexes about that. Now the MSM pushes the line that this isn't even a uniquely female characteristic. Who do they think they're trying to fool, anyway? Their increasingly transparent propaganda contrary to the public's values and sensibility is why they're losing readership. They've blown their credibility, and their audience is starting to tune them out.

The truth is that a "trans man" is a confused stone butch who might take lots of steroids or get her breasts removed, but none of that turns her into a man. An actual man can go to gay bathhouses and take a thousand loads from other dudes without the slightest chance of pregnancy. (I wouldn't care to observe it, but you know what I mean.) In any event, people should respect their bodies.

More logic

Can we call reductio ad absurdum on this gender bending stuff now? Something can't be true and not true at the same time. If an argument leads to this kind of contradiction, then it's wrong. You can't reconcile "women are the sex that can give birth" with "a man can get pregnant". As Ayn Rand wrote:

> Contradictions do not exist. Whenever you find yourself facing an apparent contradiction, check your premises. You will find that one of them is wrong.

Aside from that, these "man gets pregnant" articles—lacking any difficult questions, not balancing it with alternative perspectives, and uncritically accepting a very bizarre narrative—is a clear sign of how low modern journalism has fallen. Consider it a good indication of the MSM's reliability.

I miss the Weekly World News. If they wrote about a man getting pregnant, they'd make it entertaining, and they wouldn't pretend it was real. Fake news was a lot better when it was fun.

Read More: Bill Nye The Degenerate Guy Promotes Perverted Tranny Music For Children

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How Being Tired At Night Gives Off An I-Don't-Care Attitude That Girls Love

June 14, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

One of the many reasons that guys avoid night game is that they are tired after a hard day's work. While this makes absolute sense it should be understood that fatigue is not in itself a barrier to creating attraction and getting laid with hot girls. In fact, it can sometimes actually help your cause.

The key to all game, and night game in particular, is not caring too much. To put it crudely, the more you care, the less likely you are to get laid. Why? Because when you actually give a damn what happens with a particular interaction, you unconsciously telegraph this to the girl, who will then view you as needy or desperate.

Another key challenge with night game is timing. If you meet a girl that you have great chemistry with too early on in the evening then it can be a boost to your confidence. You might get a little excited, thinking that your work is almost done. In fact you now have a problem: do you stick to this girl like glue for the rest of the night and risk looking like a chode without any other options; or do you leave her, telling her you guys will meet up again later, and risk her getting pulled by some other guy in the meantime?

There's no definitive answer. Of course, you can try to pull her out of the club there and then, but often this won't fly as she may be with friends, or she's paid a cover charge and wants to see a particular DJ or whatever. You can try taking her to the bathrooms, but again that won't always work.

In the end, the best way around this is to chat to girls casually throughout the night, but to only fix on a particular target towards the end when you will both likely be leaving before too long anyway. That way the attraction will be at its height right at the moment when it's hometime. Then your casual suggestion of "how about we share a taxi" will likely go down a lot better than had you tried it earlier.

This is where tiredness can play in your favour, because if you are at your least needy right at the very same moment when she is most ready to be pulled then it's much more likely that you're going to achieve the result you want.

A Night Out In Berlin

When you go out to do night game then your evening will go through a number of predictable phases. Here's how it was for me when I visited a spot in Berlin the other night.

When I first arrive at the club it's likely I'll be a little socially inhibited. Certainly that was the case in Berlin. I hadn't been out for a while and I hadn't even been doing much day game (which will really help your nighttime interactions by the way), so I was rusty.

To overcome this I decided to walk around and just say 'hello' to all girls that came into my path. Nothing more or less, just 'hello.'

At first my voice was quiet and I didn't get a great deal of traction. But as I wandered around and spoke to more and more people (including a few of the guys), and as the music started to build in the background, I found myself relaxing and gaining in confidence.

Now my interactions with girls lasted longer. I progressed from just saying hello to introducing myself, and then spieling off my usual crap: "You look dangerous", "My mum warned me about girls like you", "I'm just an innocent English gentleman", and so on. Generally accusing them of being sexual predators looking to devour me.

The thing about night game is that it doesn't really matter too much what you say as long as (a) it's not deep or serious, (b) it's teasing and funny and (c) you are careful to always lead the interaction in a sexual direction.

My strategy worked. I got a lot of IOIs from girls, some longer interactions and a few makeouts (including with one very cute Austrian girl wearing just red lingerie. Don't ask—this is Berlin we're talking about).

The Magic Sweet Spot

From there, as the night progressed, two things were happening. First, my confidence was growing all the time as a result of the positive feedback I was getting. Second, as I became more tired I was less concerned with what I said, filtered myself less and just said the first thing that came into my head when I spoke to a girl.

This is the magic sweet spot that you want to get to on a night out in a club. It's hard to describe precisely, but basically you should feel completely at one with the craziness of your surroundings: you should feel entirely comfortable with allowing that same craziness to infuse your own behaviour and interactions.

You should also be outcome-independent. You don't care whether you get the girl or not because you'd just as happily go home and sleep. As such you really don't give a damn what you say to her. It doesn't even have to make sense.

And when you think about it, this mirrors precisely the default setting of the alpha douchebag who has infinite options. He doesn't give a damn whether he gets the girl or not. And he doesn't filter himself when he talks to her.

Remember: all success in game comes about as a result of non-neediness. All failure in game comes about as a result of too much concern about the outcome.

At the end of my night in Berlin I got talking to another cute Austrian girl. By now I was out of my mind with tiredness and I really didn't give a shit.

"Why do you travel to Berlin so often?" she asked me.

"It's . . . I dunno, it's complicated", I said. I didn't have the mental capacity or inclination to think up anything cocky-funny.

"Then sort it out," she said. And then she leaned forward, grabbed me by the neck and started making out with me.

'Tight game' and clever conversation have their place, but they can also look try-hard. The counterintuitive truth is that in a nightclub environment tiredness, not giving a damn and semi-literate utterances can work wonders in getting you laid with hot girls.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed

Read Next: The Game Principles I Used When I Picked Up A South Korean Girl

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The Documentary “Hot Girls Wanted” Shows The Destructiveness Of Porn

June 14, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I recently watched Hot Girls Wanted, a documentary about how easily girls are recruited into porn, mostly from the Midwestern parts of the United States. The fact that there is now so little stigma for girls to get banged on camera for money shows how broken American culture has become.

The documentary focuses on a male recruiter based in Miami who puts up ads for “erotic models” on Craigslist. A complimentary air ticket, the promise of fun and fame, and a few hundred dollars per sex scene is all it takes for girls to sign up, usually when they are right out of high school and at a crossroads of what to do with their lives. The film intended to show how difficult life is for these girls, but instead it shows how incredibly entitled and spoiled they are.

Many of the girls come from middle class families, with no obvious signs of abuse or dysfunction. So why go into porn? They want to party, they don't want to work a real job, they want to be adored by fans, and most commonly, they want "freedom," because having the opportunity to go to university and work hard for their bread is simply too constricting or boring, and even worse is becoming a housewife, a "slave." The girls who enter porn are not facing a do-or-die situation where they have to do porn to eat—they're doing it because they want money and the easy life of opening their legs and laying there. In one case, I get the impression the girl entered porn just because she always wanted to visit Miami.

In terms of the sexual market place, these girls are subconsciously maximizing the value of their vaginas, especially when considering that on average, they are no higher than a hard 6 (without excessive makeup). In a Midwestern town, the best a 6 can do is get pumped and dumped by a handful of bad boys before having to settle down with a normal man and take care of the family home, but that simply isn't enough for a girl who was taught to believe that she's capable of anything. The alternative is for her to live in Miami, have thousands of followers online, and become used as sex meat.

With no constraints on female behavior and choice, it's not hard to see why there is an endless line of cute girls choosing the "magic bullet" of porn instead of working on their wife skills to satisfy a man who doesn't look like Ryan Gosling. The main flaw in their strategy is that they don't do the research beforehand: most girls who enter porn wash out within a year after spending all their earnings, thanks in part to unexpected expenses like medical care where infected cysts and boils grow on their labia. Let's just say that they don't go into the endeavor with a business plan, and the documentary shows how idealistic they are with yells of "Whooo… I'm so glad I'm here to party away from my parents!!"

The parents of one of the girls were especially heartbroken. Their daughter was given every opportunity to have a good life, but unfortunately they did not understand female nature and how it demands boundaries and control from a strong male figure. The father, even when he knew his daughter was doing porn, said that he supported her in whatever she did because he loved her. He was raised in an era where people did the right thing, and only “love” was needed, but those days are gone.

In an age where the social constructs have melted away, we see how he failed to keep his daughter from appearing in bondage porn that roughly simulated her rape spliced in between interviews of her colleagues crying while recounting their “facial abuse” scenes. Within every girl is a seed of self-destruction, and unless that is restrained, either by a male in her tribe or by societal forces, she will destroy herself, while tens of thousands of men can wank to it.

A part of my heart wanted to be sympathetic towards the girls, since we can’t expect the lesser sex to make prudent decisions, but on the other hand, their reasoning for getting into porn is so idiotic, the failure of their parents so great, and the feminist beliefs of everyone involved have been so debunked, that I don’t have any sympathy to spare. I actually laughed when the girls complained that the male owners of porn studios they shoot for, who are almost entirely Jewish, are making “like so much money.” No matter how empowered they think they are, this is still a man’s world, and the only reason they were given “empowerment” is so they can be legally prostituted by the pimp producers or enslaved in a rat race to earn corporate owners trillions of dollars in wages thanks to a massive increase in the work force supply that feminism allowed.

Welcome to America, where a small group of rich men vacuum fertile girls from middle America to monetize their pussies, and where parents, cuckold boyfriends, and society as a whole cheer along as it happens. What kind of country do we have where this has become so normalized? A country that is on the decline, that deserves to be ravaged because of the decadence it eagerly accepts.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: How To Quit Your Porn Addiction And Improve Your Game At The Same Time

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Reasons To Hit Up Language Exchanges If You Travel Abroad

June 14, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

In the last year and a half that I've live abroad, I've learned one thing over and over again—it sucks having to leave people behind. Good friends are hard to come by, and I've met quite a few of them during my nomadic time.

The problem is that when you're moving every month, you're inevitably going to be meeting, making, and then losing friends. Constantly. It's enough to wear most people down, and in turn I think it results in more "permanent expats" rather than 24/7/365 nomadic travelers.

However, even if you settle into a place on at least a somewhat permanent basis, you run into another problem—often times, the people you want to meet (Red Pill aware and have their life together) are currently living that nomadic life.

You might meet a great wingman in your city, go out a half dozen times, then he packs his bags and leaves. This process gets rinsed and repeated constantly, depending on where you are in the world, the weather, etc.

Why Language Exchanges Are A Great Alternative

Over the last few months, I've been sporadically attending language exchanges in my "home base" city. Not because I have a huge work ethic to improve my Russian, but mostly just to socialize and have a good time.

I've found that it's a fantastic avenue for socializing in multiple ways. I'd highly recommend it to anyone who lives abroad or spends considerable time in a country where English isn't the native language spoken.

Without further ado, here are five reasons you ought to check out a language exchange.

1. Instant Social Proof For Game

Short of becoming a rock star, I've been hard-pressed to find a quicker way to gain instant, alpha-of-the-group social status compared to a language exchange.

If you're a native speaker, you are instantly going to be the highest value person in the world simply because you can communicate better than anyone else there (other than other native speakers).

Girls and guys are both going to try to engage you—be prepared to be talking and communicating the whole time. If you're the only native speaker in a group of 10, you are never going to get a break.

Simply put, you have the most value of everyone in the room—so the girls are going to flock to you. Granted, it's not a "seduction" environment. It's going to require some finesse and game to get the girls from the exchanges on a 1-on-1 date.

Bonus: If you are actually living in the city on a somewhat permanent basis, this works even better in your favor. You won't see the Stag parties overflowing a language exchange when they are only there for a weekend. Generally speaking, most people who attend these exchanges are staying for at least a little while.

2. Easy Flag Hunting

If you're interested in adding a few new flags to your notch collection, you'd be hard pressed to find a better opportunity to meet your pick of new opportunities.

As long as you are in a reasonably sized and international city, there is one common thing most girls living there have in common—they want to improve their English. It's usually the only language they can all communicate in.

I've never seen a wider range of girls from different countries all put together in one room, and easily approachable. Of course, this does come at a downside—there's often quite the diversity of guys with bad game stinking up the joint.

However, this point is pretty much moot—as I mentioned above, if you're a native speaker, you are the biggest prize there.

3. Making Friends

Last year, I got lonely at times. When I was constantly moving, there were times I didn't have any guys to hang out with. No one to just go play pool or grab a beer with. This wears on you over time. Sometimes, it's just the simple things in life.

Well, the language exchanges are also a great environment to meet some new buddies. Just screen carefully for the ones who have their lives together and aren't spending their weekends marching in parades.

By nature, these nature exchanges promote a sense of "openness and accepting", so there are plenty of Libtards waiting in the wings to attack you about Donald Trump.

Generally speaking, you'll have something in common with the other native English speakers. They likely made the move from their home country abroad—so there's common ground right there.

If you make buddies with some local foreign guys, even more doors can be opened in regards to local girls you might not normally have had access to.

4. Free Drinks (And A Warning)

Most hosts of language exchanges buy you a drink if you are a native speaker and go to the group where your native tongue is spoken. And they won't be the only one who buy you a drink.

I'm not kidding—you can pretty much expect to drink for free as long as you are being a charmer and engaging everybody. They'll make sure your glass is never empty.

5. It's Simply Good Fun

It gets exhausting, and I wouldn't recommend going every week—but I've found language exchanges to simply be good fun. It's a good reason to get out of the house on a random night, a good way to meet both buddies and girls, and it's fun to be the most desired person in the world.

I wouldn’t hesitate to recommend it to any nomads living in reasonably large foreign cities. Start by browsing MeetUp, Facebook, and other social sites to find the best information. Find the best ones, and have fun.

To learn more about how to get these girls out on dates, check out my program on texting. For more information about living abroad, read Eastern European Travel.

Read More: 4 Moments Of Shock Upon Returning To America

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

European Union Plants Seed Of War By Preparing Sanctions Against Visegrad Nations That Reject Migrants

June 15, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

In June 2017, The European authorities released a statement announcing legal action against three European nations, Poland, Hungary and Czech Republic for not taking "the necessary action" in accepting migrants and refugees.

Visegrad nations

Merkel wanted her step-children to go and invade Eastern Europe to teach them tolerance. The three nationalist beer-drinking musketeers told her to fuck off. Now the lapdog Macron joins in with the threats. This will be one hell of a ride.

Why them and not others?

Contrary to Bulgaria for instance, who is as anti-migrant as our incriminated nations, Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic (with Slovakia) stood together, governments and people, against the """refugee""" quotas imposed on them from the start, setting an uncomfortable example of resistance against Merkel's plan to convert Europe to Islam.

In cahoots with Merkel, globocuck Macron, being on the same (((payroll))) as his German colleague, announced before his presidential victory that he would support sanctions against countries of the Visegrad group if they refused to take in migrants in the foreseeable future.

This is exactly why childless people should not govern under any circumstances. They have no loyalty, no love towards their forefathers or notion of legacy.

Europe Is Being Governed By Childless Baby Haters

France	Emmanuel Macron	No kids
United Kingdom	Theresa May	No kids
Scotland	Nicola Sturgeon	No kids
Italy	Paolo Gentiloni	No kids
Germany	Angela Merkel	No kids
Luxembourg	Xavier Bettel	No kids
Sweden	Stefan Lofven	No kids
Netherlands	Mark Rutte	No kids
European Commission	Jean-Claude Juncker	No kids

The poisoned European apple

The Visegrad Group can be seen as the last chance of patriots in Western Europe to guarantee a stable power challenging the globalist authority of Brussels' bureaucrats.

Make no mistake, the goal of the European Union, as dreamt by Kalergi, is division, replacement and the destruction of any kind of self-preserving government. Any renegade refusing to take in the Muslim hordes is a dissenter and will be attacked in one way or the other by the globalist death cult.

The likes of low T open borders advocate Martin Schultz are the ones tailoring those sanctions. The trees that hide the forest.

We yet have to see the side Ukraine will choose and if it will be on board with these policies as they are now almost in the pocket of the EU, after the big step taken in granting them visa-free travel in Europe while feeding their anti-Russian narrative.

In Poland, risks are that the decision of relocating migrants might fall on local mayors or voivodeship authorities (many of them from Platforma Obywatelska, center pro EU) instead of being lead by the PiS (conservative ruling party).

Their borders are still manned for now

First the Mohammedan hordes have to cross the border. They cannot do it without documents and a valid reason to enter. Visegrad nations' border patrols are not as soft as Western Europe.

If globalist-controlled governments like France or Germany decide to give the migrants they host a Schengen visa, Poland would have no legal ground to refuse them. But that would challenge national sovereignty, something the Polish, Hungarian and Czech identity are riveted to and shit would hit the fan.

As Hungarian PM Viktor Orban declared…

> EU is on the side of terrorists (…) As long as I am the Prime Minister of Hungary and stand here, so will the border fence on the southern border.

Orban has been painted as one of Brussels' number one enemies after he reinforced his nationalist, anti-migrant stance and named the concealed maneuvers of Soros in Hungary and his screen societies supported by Brussels cucks, aiming at destroying national identity in Europe.

Migrants are not welcome there

Hope remains, counting on the ethnocentrism of Poles and the powerful presence of its anti-migrant and nationalist groups as we witnessed during the 2016 Warsaw Anti-Migrant Rally.

The decision of applying sanctions should take a few years at least to be organised (it is an unprecedented situation) and the cucks initiating it might hopefully be replaced. Poland and Hungary are much less “progressive” than the West. Welfare does not exist there, the locals possess a deeply rooted hate towards Muslims and violence is very likely to occur if Europe imposes migrants on those nations. Economic leeches would also be tempted to reach gibsmedat benefit havens such as Germany or Sweden instead.

The kind of benefits Germany gives MONTHLY to migrants just for turning up and doing fuck all

A large majority of people in the Visegrad area have all agreed to keep the same stance on that particular issue and will refuse categorically to let in any unvetted Muslim opportunists and so will their governments. If Europe uses threats or actual force, it will be a direct violation of the people’s right to enforce their national laws and things would kick off.

The bond of Visegrad, especially between Poland and Hungary is strong and has been tested by time. They are probably the closest allies in that part of the world. If one is attacked, the other will intervene. The saying goes…

> Pole and Hungarian brothers be, > good for fight and good for party.
> Both are valiant, both are lively,
> Upon them may God's blessings be

There is also a vivid hostility towards Muslims in all those nations that stems from history and the centuries of warfare they needed to free themselves of Middle Eastern expansion.

They also remember well the Soviet era and what it was like to leave under an authoritarian power that dictates your everyday life and wants to blend in your unique culture into a global ideology. Finally, they witnessed diversity, the gift that keeps on giving, with its trucks of peace and bombathons that blessed London, Paris or Brussels with self-inflicted enrichment.

Some examples from Hungarians, Poles and Czechs about their view of migrants:

After all my years there, I have yet to meet a Pole or a Magyar who would agree to let them in apart from a handful of anemic antifas and a few unfuckable strong and independent "women" from Warsaw (who fantasize about Abdul's enrichment as it it the ideal way to get back at the Barteks who dumped them once they announced that they did not want children).

The kind of female anti-racist I am talking about. (Source Al-Jazeera)

If Visegrad does not cave in, the EU can't really do anything apart from fines and economic sanctions. They would all rather have that a hundredfold than an Allah-worshipping human tide. We all remember the sanctions that the European Union imposed to Russia. The effect? Nothing. They carried on as they were. They need to apply the same mindset.

I think the freshest batch of cucks in charge of Brussels do not realise who they are dealing with here. Here is what the Polish PM had to say after the Manchester bombings and EU's resolve to keep its gates open.

The press in those countries have not as much filters and censors trying to blame them for not respecting political correctness so people have the chance to stay informed.

Inhabitants of Visegrad countries have not been duped as much as their Western neighbours and see the approaching hordes as invaders, just like the ones they defeated in the past.

Un soutien de taille venu de l’Ouest

But Poles, Magyars and Czech might find and unexpected and valuable ally in the person of President Trump. Donald has a visit planned in Poland in July, where the possibility of Intermarium (a union project between Eastern European and Baltic nations spreading between three seas, started by the living nightmare of nationless Leftists, Jozef Pilsudski) will be discussed, with Andrzej Duda and Viktor Orbàn present.

Trump despises Merkel, Macron and their pro-migrant leanings, even if he has to remain courteous when meeting them. It does not start well for Macron’s policy to be approved by the U.S after the botched demonstration of “force” the globocuck tried on Trump by greeting him last at a recent summit…

Then, the manlet thought he was hardcore by using all his strength and crushing the hand of a 71 y.o man with a clenched jaw

The Don does not forget. His help will be useful in giving more credence to the Visegrad position.

Read More: 5 Things America Can Learn From Hungary's Resistance Against The Migrant Masses

---

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Where To Travel In East Asia To Experience Bountiful And Fleeting Pleasures From Women

June 15, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

After extensive traveling throughout pretty much all of East Asia, in conjunction with in depth cultural studies, it is my intent to occasionally shed light on the region and what it has to offer. ROK readers may have noticed my articles on South Korea, North Korea, Singapore, Taiwan, Japan, and the Philippines, of which the largest share have specifically concentrated on game and culture.

The current article is no different, but in this piece I will offer a regional overview and add a number of locations, such as Hong Kong and Indonesia, as well as some more recent insights. Although there is no consensus in this regard, I have left out a number of countries such as China, Vietnam, Thailand, and Malaysia. I think that all these are pretty great travel destinations but one has to make a selection. Furthermore, there is some evidence to suggest that China and Vietnam are a bit too conservative (in this context meaning harder to get easy lays), Thailand too exploited, and Malaysia too Islamic. In any case I think that the included destinations are better if one takes into account the totality of experience.

I have also added a number of specific clubs and apps that will make a person with limited time cut to the chase. The aim is to inspire a male to make the more or less optimal East Asian trip, hopefully already this summer. Although I am a strong proponent of "Apollonian" culture, this lean towards "Dionysian" stuff like having fun – drinking, meeting girls and so on. To avoid any kind of misunderstanding, the tips are all related to sex without prostitution. Everyone has to keep their eyes open for pros, semi-pros, amateur hookers, or whichever proper category they belong to, but I have mentioned locations that overall generally have much less so.

Geographically it is reasonable to distinguish between Northeast and Southeast Asia. Yet culturally, due to large overlaps between countries, it is relevant to call the larger region East Asia. Flight distances range from one hour up to five hours, obviously depending on destination, so it is wise to check out Air Asia or some other proper airline in order to prebook most or all flights.

Preparatory pipelining and online game

A key component in current times is to make preparatory online game, often called pipelining. By using different apps and websites one can make matches and go on several dates upon arrival. Perhaps three dates per day in each city make up a reasonable guideline, but some spontaneity and variation can of course also be valuable.

While most of these tools hinge on picture-related matches and brief text messages before meeting, it is wise to use a computer camera in order to screen at least a number of girls before departure. Additionally, a language learning app such as HelloTalk offers a decent complement, and increases the get-to-know factor. If you want to be a generalist and create a positive feedback loop between online game, social circle game and night game, that is one way to do it. If you pay a small amount to HelloTalk, you can write messages to all nationalities, regardless of which language you and they prefer to learn or conversate in.

If you chat with let's say 25-50 girls simultaneously and inform them about your arrival, then you can select the best-looking and have a number of dates or meetings. One or two initially platonic encounters, can easily turn into sex if one pushes the biomechanical lever in the right order. That is exactly what happened to me in Seoul last year.

Needless to say, the more language you can speak (more or less) the better, but in all locations listed below English will take you far with girls who have a cosmopolitan mindset (which most tend to have these days). As long as you strive for to absorb new words and phrases in the respective native tongue and positively stand out from the typical tourist crowd, things will generally not be to your disadvantage.

Hongdae and Gangnam in Seoul, South Korea

Most males who travel extensively tend to agree that Seoul is one of the best cities in the world in this respect. Although far from the most optimal place for picking up hot girls, who can be flaky or simply not worth the time and effort, the city has a nice vibe and is just great to spend time in, especially in June. For instance, I love to hang out at the major entertainment offices in Gangnam where you can often run into female K-pop artists. From Cheongdam Station (exit 6) one can reach S.M. Entertainment's head office building.

Drinking-wise, Hongdae is perfect on Thursdays in particular. Go meet people at the Hongdae Playground, drink some soju, and then head to Thursday Party. Keep approaching and eventually you should end up in a packed club like M2.

The more fancy Gangnam on the other hand is better on weekends, although it is reasonable to go there on most weekdays too. Club Octagon (Hakdong Station), Arena and Answer are worthwhile for the high quality, although it might be difficult to pick up the hottest chicks. But a 7 or 8 is not bad either.

Apps: Kakoa Talk, HelloTalk, Tinder

Tokyo and Osaka in Japan

Although smaller cities in Japan may have their charm, it is safe to say that Tokyo and Osaka rule the land of the rising sun. Specifically the areas Shibuya and Roppongi in Tokyo offer the best clubs, such as Womb and V2. There you will find a proper balance between foreigners and locals. Also make sure to visit Shibuya 109 and have a chitchat with the pretty female staff. Osaka has for instance Ghost Ultra Lounge in its much smaller city pocket.

If time is limited, skip Osaka and go all in for Tokyo. Try to go no later than early July, since you do not want to experience seasonal sky fall.

Apps: HelloTalk, Tinder

Lan Kwai Fong in Hong Kong

Hong Kong is nice to spend time in, for example in July, and if you have a couple of days you can also go to one of the city's beaches or even to Macau and investigate the latest lavish casino building. Why not go to the beach with one of the girls whom you met online?

Party-wise, the street Lan Kwai Fong is great for male travelers. Although packed with drunk Brits and mate-guarding Chinese betas, it is definitely worthwhile, even on a weekday. If you just have some game, looks and/or social connection it is relatively easy to make out with or bang a local 6 or 7. If a girl was truly socially conservative she would not go out and get drunk.

Apps: Happn, Bumble, HelloTalk, Tinder

Taipei in Taiwan

As previously asserted, Taiwan is a great country for scenery and culture, but the capital Taipei nevertheless offers a significant number and share of 6-8s who tend to show up in clubs such as Elektro, located at the front of Taipei 101 Tower. Be sure to be there on a Friday and Saturday.

Apps: Praktor, HelloTalk, Tinder

Singapore

[image]

As an expensive city-state, Singapore is best to make a quick stop in. Besides from online connections, go and meet some Sarong Party Girls at Zouk, ranked 4 in the world in DJ Mag.

Apps: Happn, HelloTalk, Tinder

Jakarta and Bali in Indonesia

Jakarta is much dirtier and poorer than the above-mentioned locations. Hence expect a major negative contrast with regard to material welfare. However, with about 20 million inhabitants you will also have an enormous pool of feminine locals at your disposal, of which far from all, or even most, are conservative Muslims.

In fact, from the totality of evidence from the Roosh V Forum, my own and other travelers' experiences, it is likely that a Western male will hack all the way through to willing girls' middle regions. Apart from online hustling, X2 might be worth a visit. Online game and night game will likely be more than enough.

In Bali it is perhaps even easier, on average, to get laid with local chicks. Bounty Discotheque and Skygarden in Kuta are two good options. The only real obstacle is the hotel guards who are often hesitant to let your temporary light-brown lover in.

Apps: Indonesian Cupid, HelloTalk, Tinder

Cebu in the Philippines

Since I have already dealt with Cebu in the Philippines in a previous article, I will just briefly add that before you focus on local girls, be sure to swim next to the whale sharks in Oslob. That is perhaps even better than to fool around in clubs. With regard to the latter, Liv Super Club in Mandaue City is a proper night spot.

Apps: Filipono Cupid, Pina Love, HelloTalk, Tinder

In summary

Overall East Asia is a great region for male pleasure, whether solely focused on meeting females or just having a good time, alone or with friends. If time is limited I would suggest Seoul, Tokyo, Cebu and Jakarta, whereas Osaka, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Singapore and Bali can be regarded as secondary destinations.

Read More: 5 Types Of Malaysian Girls Found In Kuala Lumpur

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Turkish Leader Ataturk Proved That A Nation's Terminal Decline Can Be Reversed

June 15, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

There are times in history when a man of humble birth rises to the occasion when his nation is in mortal danger. Mustafa Kemal Atatürk was one of them.

A very brief historical background

The Battle of Lepanto demonstrated that the Ottomans were not unstoppable

During the 16th Century, Europe was awakening from its long medieval slumber. However, the Ottoman Turks also were on the rise. They expanded their territory in the Balkans, overrunning the region entirely. They made inroads into Eastern Europe, and even threatened Central Europe. If Vienna hadn't held out, the region would've been in grave peril. They further expanded elsewhere, taking over North Africa, making further gains in significant parts of the Middle East, and building a powerful navy.

However, after the death of Suleiman the Magnificent, the Turks were bereft of effective leadership for centuries. Succeeding sultans typically were either embarrassingly incompetent or hopelessly decadent. Like so many empires, they coasted along for a good while on initial successes, but became stagnant. Eventually they slipped into a period of decay and corruption. Sounds familiar?

The Ottoman Empire began to crumble, eventually becoming the “Sick Man of Europe”. Nationalist sentiment was on the rise, and revolts occurred in the Balkans. Further, the Ottomans began to lose their grip on North Africa. Russia was ascending, assuming control of territory on their side of the Black Sea and aiding independence in the Balkans.

By the early 20th Century, they had lost nearly all their holdings in Europe, and much of their gains elsewhere were lost. They were rocked by political instability. Their far-flung empire—one of the largest the world had seen—was in deep decline. Turkey itself was very multicultural, and without a strong government to suppress by force the inevitable tensions, fissures in their core homeland became evident.

Following the outcome of WWI, the Ottoman Empire’s extraterritorial holdings were eliminated, mostly to be incorporated into the British and French empires. Further than that, the Treaty of Sèvres would’ve formalized foreign occupation zones deep into their homeland. The treaty never got ratified, because the British went one step further and took over their government.

For the Turks, surely all this was a profound humiliation. It was much like the victors had done to Germany, but worse. The only good news for the Turks was that they were spared a Versailles Treaty style shakedown that devastated the German economy.

Note that it’s not my intention to whitewash the past. (Neither am I going to delve into current events.) Any major country has its share of dirty laundry, and Turkey’s history certainly had its gruesome moments, to say the least. The point is that their nation’s heartland was about to be dismembered; the Turks had every right to resist, just as we must preserve our own nations.

Mustafa Kemal Atatürk’s military career

They came loaded for bear, but resistance was fiercer than expected

The “War to End All Wars” was a great catastrophe setting the stage for the “War to Make the World Safe For Democracy”, which in turn led to the Cold War. This was further the beginning of the (thus far) decline of the West. On the Turkish front, the British sought to clear a shipping lane to their Russian allies through the Dardanelles and eventually to the Black Sea. Winston Churchill, then a naval commander, proposed to take the straits with battleships and ground troops. Overconfidence (a bad habit of his) led him to believe the “Sick Man of Europe” could offer little resistance.

The following campaign became the Battle of Gallipoli. The Turkish commander who repelled the British invasion was none other than Mustafa Kemal. Losses were heavy on both sides, particularly devastating for Australian forces. As the Anzac Cove memorial touchingly declares:

> Those heroes that shed their blood and lost their lives…
>
> You are now lying in the soil of a friendly country. Therefore rest in peace. There is no difference between the Johnnies and the Mehmets to us where they lie side by side here in this country of ours…
>
> You, the mothers, who sent their sons from faraway countries wipe away your tears; your sons are now lying in our bosom and are in peace, after having lost their lives on this land they have become our sons as well.
>
> Ataturk, 1934

The British also carried out a campaign in the Ottoman Empire’s remaining Middle Eastern holdings, during which an actual Battle of Armageddon (Megiddo) took place. With great effort, Mustafa Kemal got a handle on the chaotic situation and stopped the British advance at Aleppo.

After the war, foreign troops occupied Istanbul. The victors, poised to divide Turkey, demanded disarmament. Following the Ottoman surrender, Mustafa Kemal became active in nationalist politics. He refused to disband the forces under his command, as ordered by the government at behest of the occupying British. Instead, he worked behind the scenes to encourage resistance.

When the British found out in 1920, they demanded his arrest. While on the run, he got a death warrant. Failure was not an option! This set in motion a chain of events leading to the British dissolving the Ottoman government.

Before long, Turkish resistance led to armed conflict, with Mustafa Kemal soon commanding the military. Fighting erupted on several fronts. Often it was quite gruesome on both sides, though not equaling the horrendous excesses during WWI. The Turks regained control of their homeland, and by October 1922, Turkey was at peace. Thenceforth the policy was reconciliation, not revenge.

Turkey reborn

Education was a major feature of the national renewal

Soon after, the provisional government abolished the Sultanate. The following January, Greece and Turkey agreed to a population transfer. Creating territorial integrity is the best way to alleviate smoldering tensions between diverse populations with long historical grievances. Later in 1923, the Republic of Turkey was born. Mustafa Kemal—who in 1934 was officially dubbed Atatürk, “Father of the Turks”—became its first President, serving until his death in 1938. The 1920s and 1930s were a tumultuous time of grim struggle and energizing rebirth throughout many nations, and Turkey was one of them.

Atatürk steered a strongly secular course. (It’s hard to say how deeply he felt religion; he kept his personal views to himself.) He soon abolished the Caliphate, banned religious garb, and mandated the Turkish language Quran. He banned polygamy and instituted women’s rights—not the crazy feminism we have here, of course, but simply equality under the law.

Other than that, he looked to Western success for inspiration to modernize Turkey. He abolished Sharia law (as well as other religious codes) and instituted one legal system for all, borrowed from elements of European systems. He began standardizing the language and switched to a modified Roman alphabet. He reformed education as well, and did much to remedy the terrible illiteracy problem.

The Great Depression was devastating the world’s economy. On the economic front, Atatürk instituted a plan to pay down the national debt that Turkey had inherited. Agrarian land reforms were implemented, a national bank was established, industry was promoted, and the railroad network grew quickly.

Although not without controversy, Atatürk's legacy is that of an enlightened reformer who recovered Turkey from a fate of near-oblivion, then bringing his nation out of despotic theocratic backwardness and moving forward into modern civilization. His economic legacy is that Turkey remains the most prosperous Middle Eastern country with the exception of Israel and oil-rich states in the Arabian Peninsula. Turks would do well to keep following his vision, and their labor will further develop their homeland's economy. Other nations in the region would benefit from Atatürk's example.

Conclusion

The Turks once were a great world power, but lost their empire that had fattened them on the spoils of conquest. The major problem was that the victors of WWI abrogated their national sovereignty, and their homeland where they were a majority was about to be divided up and reduced to obscurity. They didn't submit to defeatism; they restored their nation.

As we can see, a course of decline leading to utter ruin can be reversed if the right actions are taken (obviously the sooner the better). With the people's solidarity—and exceptional individuals—a nation can be reborn. Perhaps this story beginning a century ago may inspire us today.

Read More: 5 Lessons About Building A Nation From Singaporean Political Visionary Lee Kuan Yew

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

4 Flagrant Lies About The American Confederacy

June 16, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

If you have been paying attention to the news lately, left wing groups are taking down monuments to Confederate leaders like Robert E. Lee (a pro-constitution, anti-slavery, non-drinking, non-smoking, no-profanity pious Christian) faster than they are putting up new gender affiliations.

Why? Because two years since the murder of nine African-Americans in a Charleston church (which the left still just cannot shut up about), there has been a powerful SJW-dominated domestic jihad on any public memorials to the Confederate States of America. All because the white male perpetrator was seen holding Confederate memorabilia in a few pre-rampage photographs, most notably the “Confederate Flag” (more on this later).

Return of Triggers

SJW's insist that the flag represents slavery, oppression, white supremacy, terrorism, Nazism, and a laundry list of other naughty buzzwords which are 100% unsuitable for our enlightened 'social justice' conscious nation.

However, just like Vox Day and his book have pointed out, SJWs Always Lie. This article will address four prominent examples of how left wing groups lie about the former Confederacy to try and achieve the moral high ground (virtue signal) and legitimize their desired destruction of Confederate memorials. Objects which countless European-Americans in southern states hold dear to their history and sense of regional identity.

1. "If The South Won, We Would Still Have Slavery"

Brazil was the last western territory to abolish slavery in 1888, but virtue signaling leftists want to pretend we would “still have slavery” in 2017 if the Confederacy won.

Of all the most retarded claims against the Confederacy, and of all the most lame virtue signaling efforts to try and fully legitimize the Union war effort from a contemporary perspective, is the “we’d still have slavery” argument. That is, assuming the Confederacy won the war and a hypothetical C.S.A. was alive and kicking in 2017.

However, did anybody in social justice la-la land get the memo that Brazil was the last Western country on Earth to abolish slavery in 1888? That’s just one human generation beyond the Emancipation Proclamation of 1863, and almost a full 130 years ago from this time of writing.

In the mid 19th century, slavery was going the way of the Dodo around the world, due to both rapid technological advancements in industrial societies rendering the cost-to-benefit analysis impractical, as well as it simply being the current moral zeitgeist of the age.

Yes, admittedly there was some damning rhetoric from some Confederate leaders supporting slavery in the 1860’s, but do pea-brained leftists and SJW’s truly believe that black slaves would still be purchased or sold via smartphone apps in a 1st world Atlanta of 2017 yet still developing and semi-dysfunctional Brazil would have otherwise been the last western territory to stop such nonsense 130 years prior?

Confederate Atlanta, Georgia in a retarded SJW dreamworld of 2017. A blonde "Buckhead Betty" is giddy and excited at purchasing a new well-built black slave on a Tinder-like auction app with her husband's money. (The husband just told her to get a gardener, but when he's away she has more "domestic chores" in mind).

Here is the truth that an emotion-driven leftist simply cannot comprehend. Chattel slavery would not have lived to the see the first day of the 20th century in a hypothetical and intact Confederate States of America. Assuming even the worst case scenario where Brazil actually beat the C.S.A. to abolition in the late 1880's, by that point slavery would not only have been rendered completely irrelevant by industrial technology, but the international pressure for emancipation would be incredibly severe.

Beyond the industrial north, the powerful British and French colonial empires (the biggest world powers of the late 19th century) would likely have threatened or acted upon bottom-line bleeding trade sanctions and other isolating penalties. Inevitably, Confederate slavery would soon throw in the towel for good, and the modern C.S.A. (if it existed) would be incredibly apologetic for some aspects of it's distant past. Much like any other browbeaten white-majority country in the 2010's.

By the way, the world does indeed "still have slavery". Except it's almost entirely black African Muslims enslaving other black African Muslims in countries like Mauritania, which SJW's and 'Black Lives Matter' don't really seem to concern themselves with for obvious reasons.

2. "The Confederate Flag Represents Slavery And White Supremacy"

This has had to repeated so many times, generation after generation, that the sheer level of willful ignorance on all sides of the debate should be on the verge of legendary.

The “Confederate flag” at it is popularly known today has absolutely no direct political affiliation whatsoever, unlike say…. the Nazi flag that modern day SJW’s are always trying to compare the flag with. It is a battle flag which was utilized primarily by Robert E. Lee’s Army of Northern Virginia, and upon careful observation it hardly “represents slavery” and certainly not “white supremacy”.

95% of Confederate soldiers did not own slaves, and I’m sure that the maintenance of “white supremacy” over their non-existent slaves was the number one thing on their minds as a 6-figure sum of southern white men (compared to a negligible amount of black soldiers on both sides) met their maker as a result of kissing some hot lead from a battlefield musket.

Furthermore, here are some quotes from the battle flag’s top general, Robert E. Lee himself.

> In this enlightened age, there are few I believe, but what will acknowledge, that slavery as an institution is a moral & political evil in any country. It is useless to expatiate on its disadvantages.
>
> While we see the course of the final abolition of human slavery is onward, & we give it the aid of our prayers & all justifiable means in our power, we must leave the progress as well as the result in his hands who sees the end; who chooses to work by slow influences; & with whom two thousand years are but as a single day.
>
> So far from engaging in a war to perpetuate slavery, I am rejoiced that slavery is abolished. I believe it will be greatly for the interests of the South. So fully am I satisfied of this, as regards Virginia especially, that I would cheerfully have lost all I have lost by the war, and have suffered all I have suffered, to have this object attained.

Sound like the talking points of a pro-slavery and “white supremacist” bigot to you?

3. “The Confederates Were Traitors”

Southern states in 1861 follow the nations most revered document and peacefully convene to form new government. Get called "traitors" by 21st century SJWs.

This is one you'll find in the comment sections of prominent left wing (lie wing) blogs and websites such as Washington Post, Salon, or Alternet when a Civil War related article is posted. The Confederacy was just full of "traitors" and all those evil white men deserved everything that was coming to them.

However, if any of them simply stopped being driven by virtue-signaling emotional rhetoric, and actually bothered to read a history book or two, their argument would be filled with bigger holes than Swiss cheese.

All the evidence clearly points out the Confederacy was peacefully following principles laid out by the founding fathers, the declaration of independence, and the 12 amendments of the U.S. constitution which were in place as of 1861. "Patriots" the Confederates may or may not have been. But "traitors" definitely not.

> I am with the South in life or in death, in victory or defeat. I never owned a negro and care nothing for them, but these people have been my friends and have stood up to me on all occasions. In addition to this, I believe the North is about to wage a brutal and unholy war on a people who have done them no wrong, in violation of the Constitution and the fundamental principles of the government…We propose no invasion of the North, no attack on them, and only ask to be let alone. – Patrick R. Cleburne

4. "The Confederates Were Terrorists"

(SJW Thom Hartmann's spiel on Confederate "terrorists" at 21:24 – 22:52)

This preposterous label is a more recent attack on the history of the Confederacy, and almost as retarded as the SJW idea that the south would "still have slavery" in modern times if they won the mid 19th century conflict.

As you may already know, the left is currently obsessed with using a combination of fact omission, subterfuge, and red herring tactics to try and divert attention away from Islamic terrorism (a genuine problem), and instead tell you that "white terrorism" is the real scourge.

Of course, the politically incorrect (real life correct) statistics do not indicate that "white terrorism" is a major issue in the United States, considering that whites make up over 60% of the nations population while Muslims are barely 1%. So why not loosen the definition of a "white terrorist" to essentially include any Christian white man who has held a firearm against somebody before? With the Confederacy in mind, the SJW's are granted their wish to demonize Christian, 2nd amendment-friendly, southern white males on a mass scale.

As for the true definition of terrorism, Hartmann and the rest of the SJW's have a lot of nerve to act like the Union army never raped, pillaged, or terrorized the southern people via the policies of number 16 (Abraham Lincoln) and his wild lap dogs like General Sherman.

William Tecumseh Sherman. Union General, terrorist, and all-round mega bastard

> My aim, then, was to whip the rebels, to humble their pride, to follow them to their inmost recesses, and make them fear and dread us. Fear is the beginning of wisdom.
>
> War is cruelty. There is no use trying to reform it. The crueler it is, the sooner it will be over.
>
> This war differs from other wars, in this particular. We are not fighting armies but a hostile people, and must make old and young, rich and poor, feel the hard hand of war.
>
> I would make this war as severe as possible, and show no symptoms of tiring till the South begs for mercy. – William T. Sherman

Sound like the talking points and actions of someone who is anything but a terrorist to you?

Finally, here is a well made and researched video showing number 16's cruel war of subjugation and terror against the south. (He is on the five dollar bill and has a giant monument in Washington D.C. which, unlike statues of the pro-abolitionist and pro-constitution Robert E. Lee, is unlikely to ever be removed.)

Conclusion

It is undeniable and unfortunate that the Confederate government (not Lee's army) fought for the maintenance of slavery as one of it's core objectives, despite it's inevitably short-lived continuation in the event of victory.

It really does hamper and limit the amount of praise which can be given to this short-lived nation from a contemporary viewpoint. Because otherwise, many of their reasons for seeking secession from the federal government were sound, understandable, and above all legal.

However, I will also not stand idly by and watch SJW's use slavery or "white supremacy" or "white terrorism" as a crutch to lie profusely about the Confederacy for political brownie points and agendas which are designed to further browbeat and humiliate 21st century southern Whites. The Union side of the conflict got their hands really dirty on plenty of things as well.

Pun intended, the history of the Civil War is not as 'black and white' as the left wants to make it out to be.

Read Next: Reflections On Neo-Confederacy During A Visit To Ole Miss

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

What Is Alt-Christianity?

June 16, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

On the 26th of May, Return of Kings published my article The 21 Theses of Alt-Christianity. In that article, I presented the case for an idea called Alt-Christianity, a new Christian mindset which focuses on several core concepts that are all too often ignored by this generation of Christians.

First, Alt-Christianity is a traditionalist movement of the political right, and it is an alternative to the corrupt Churchianism which shrouds much of modern Christianity. Alt-Christianity is also offensive both in nature and initiative; it is proud of Christianity and does not back down from a fight, even as it uses all the resources at its disposal for that fight.

Next, Alt-Christianity believes that traditional Western Civilization is the best civilization that Man has ever created, and Alt-Christianity also holds that orthodox Christianity is an integral part of that civilization. As such, and in the interests of supporting Western Civilization, Alt-Christianity supports the foundations of Christianity itself, which are the patriarchy, the family, Christian apologetics, and a face-value acceptance of the morals and teachings of the New Testament.

Alt-Christianity is also anti-globalist and nationalistic, as well as a movement that recognizes the value and primacy of identity. Furthermore, Alt-Christianity supports the right of self-determination to all ethno-ideological/religious groups, and it promotes secession as a means to ease tensions between groups. Additionally, Alt-Christianity rejects the idea that Church and State should be separated; it also rejects the false myth of human equality or human perfectibility.

Finally, Alt-Christianity is a masculine movement, which is to be led by men, and in so doing, Alt-Christianity values the masculine nature of the Christ who overturned tables and was intellectually bold against his enemies and detractors.

Now, the details of each of the various theses of Alt-Christianity can be read in the previous article. However, in that past article, a good deal of interesting questions and comments were generated. And those thought-provoking questions, as well as the thought-provoking questions implied in various comments, all deserve an answer, which is the purpose of this current article. So, let's get started.

Question 1: Is Alt-Christianity a New Type of Christianity?

One of the main issues raised against the idea of Alt-Christianity was that Christianity does not need any further divisions, which is something that embracing Alt-Christianity could cause. And to a large extent, it is true that Christianity would not benefit from further divisions. However, Alt-Christianity is not a new form of Christianity; it is not a new denominational sect. In fact, if anything, Alt-Christianity seeks to return Christians to their orthodox cultural and political positions, as articulated and demonstrated throughout hundreds of years of past Christian history.

At most, Alt-Christianity is a new Christian mindset. It is a new way for modern Christians to think. It asks Christians to focus on Christian ideas which have been undermined in the current social era, but it does not ask Christians to form a new set of beliefs. After all, everything that the Alt-Christian believes can be justified and supported through scriptural passages and 2000 years of Christian tradition.

In the end, the best way to view Alt-Christianity is as an informal organization of denominationally-diverse but politically and culturally like-minded Christians who find unity through their embrace of nationalism, traditional morality, and right-leaning politics. And this type of political and cultural unity among modern traditionalist Christians—as opposed to theological unity—is what is sorely needed today.

After all, unlike hundreds of years ago, the disputes in the West are now moral, not theological, and as such, the traditionalist Protestant and traditionalist Catholic (and even the traditionalist unbeliever) have a greater reason to unify together rather than each separately unifying with the liberal portions of their denominations.

Question 2: Why 'Alt' Christianity?

Ultimately, there is no absolute need for Alt-Christianity to be called Alt-Christianity. It could, for example, be called Hard-Christianity, or Masculine-Christianity, or Neo-Christianity, or Reactionary-Christianity, or even Followers of the Way (Acts 9:2 & 22:4). But, in this present age, there are good pragmatic reasons to call this set of ideas 'Alt-Christianity'.

First, Alt-Christianity is meant to be an alternative to many modern manifestations of Christianity, and so the 'alt' prefix clearly articulates the fact that this new Christian mindset is an alternative to the cucked, Churchian, and progressive mindset which pervades many self-described Christians today.

Second, Alt-Christianity is also a solid label because the ‘alt’ prefix links this new Christian mindset to the Alt-Right, the Alt-West, and the Alt-Lite; this is precisely the type of link that Alt-Christianity wants to make, for it wishes to show itself to be as different from mainstream Christianity as the Alt-Right is different from mainstream conservativism.

Question 3: Is Alt-Christianity Just a Re-Branding of Christianity?

Yes and no. In a way, slapping the ‘alt’ label onto Christianity does “re-brand” it. However, the main reason for attaching the ‘alt’ prefix to the term Christianity is to reinvigorate interest in Christianity. For example, consider a young person on the Right who may have already dismissed modern Christianity as not helping in the fight for Western Civilization; when that young person hears the term Alt-Christianity, he may take a second look at this “type” of Christianity and may then realize that Christianity is much more supportive of Western Civilization than he originally thought.

And so, if “branding” Christianity as Alt-Christianity can merely do that—meaning, if it can just get a number of people to reconsider Christianity who might have otherwise dismissed it—then the ‘Alt-Christianity’ label will have been a success.

At the same time, branding a certain Christian mindset as ‘Alt-Christianity’ also gives a proper name to the general ideas that many traditionalist and reactionary Christians already hold, but which have not yet been properly labeled. Thus, Alt-Christianity can serve that purpose as well.

Question 4: Is Christianity Incompatible with the Red-Pill?

Some commentators argued that Christianity and the “red-pill” are incompatible, and thus Alt-Christianity is undermined by the fact that it endorses the red-pill. Now, if being red-pilled is defined in a certain way, then it could be claimed that Christianity and the red-pill are incompatible. But at its fundamental level, being ‘red-pilled’ is simply the description of a person who has accepted truth over illusions, not just concerning sexual dynamics, but concerning all of reality. And when understood in this way, not only is Christianity fully compatible with the red-pill, but Christianity is a red-pill!

After all, to be a Christian is to accept the harsh truths that Satan is the ruler of this world, that the world will hate you and persecute you, that you might have to separate from your own family to be a Christian, and so on and so forth.

So, when the red-pill is simply understood as a willingness to accept the truth about reality no matter how hard that truth might be, then it is utterly clear that there is no issue between Christianity and the red-pill. After all, as a very important Christian once said: “You will know the truth, and the truth will set you free.” (John 8:32)

Question 5: What About the Separation of Church and State?

Another issue that was raised concerning the tenets of Alt-Christianity was its rejection of an ultimate separation of Church and State. But is this tenet, in fact, a negative?

First, note that Alt-Christianity does not necessitate the creation of a theocracy, but it does reject an ultimate separation of Church and State. For example, removing religious symbols and practices from political and social institutions is an ultimate separation of Church and State, and Alt-Christianity rejects such maneuvers; but that does not mean that Alt-Christianity necessarily endorses or requires that religious clergy have some type of formal political power. So, this distinction needs to be kept in mind.

Second, the idea that there is such a thing as a genuine separation of Church and State is a myth. After all, a Church—or a specific religion, in other words—is fundamentally just a worldview which answers life's most critical questions and which dictates the way that people look at the world. Consequently, no one is without such a guiding worldview, not even a State, and definitely not the State's functionaries.

In reality, Church and State are not separate; the only question is which 'Church' is informing the State. At present, the worldview largely guiding Western States is a sort of liberal secularism which directs the way in which a State makes its decisions and acts.

Thus, the idea of an ultimate separation of Church and State is rejected because it is a myth, just as the idea of genuine religious freedom is a myth; after all, in our religiously "free" state, religious Aztecs, for example, are obviously not free to sacrifice other human beings, nor can Mormons or Muslims be polygamous, and so their religious freedom is evidently being curtailed to a certain degree. So, Alt-Christianity rejects an ultimate separation of Church and State, along with religious "freedom", because these things are as much of a myth as equality and utopianism are.

Furthermore, the idea that unity between Church and State is a bad thing is itself questionable, at least in cases where the people of the nation are dependably religious. Note, for example, that the current governments of Poland and Hungary strongly assert their Christian identity, and yet these two countries have arguably the sanest governments in all of Europe, at least when it comes to nationalism, Islam, immigration, and so on.

Finally, also note that a further reason not to separate Church and State in the case of Christianity is due to what we might call Christ's First Law, which is that the world hates Christians, and so wherever Christians are not culturally and socially dominant, they will be persecuted and discriminated against.

History bears this out: after all, the Roman Empire persecuted Christians; Jews persecuted Christians; Muslims persecuted (and still persecute) Christians; Communists persecuted (and still persecute) Christians; Hindus persecute Christians; Asian cultural groups persecuted Christians, and so on and so forth. Consequently, it is for the very protection of Christians that we must reject the false concept of a separation of Church and State.

Question 6: Why Not Secular-Humanism?

Alongside all the other comments about Alt-Christianity, there were a number of remarks essentially arguing that the best way forward would be to actually drop Christianity and simply adopt secular-humanism as the way forward for the West. But there are numerous reasons why this idea is inadvisable.

First, secular-humanism is false, and Christianity is not, which is a critical reason in and of itself to accept Christianity over secular-humanism. Second, many of the principles of secular-humanism are largely incoherent, and thus cannot form the foundation for a solid worldview. Third, modern secular-humanism is as cucked, if not even more cucked, than modern Christianity is.

For example, many secular atheists and agnostics are heavily left-leaning, so even just in practical terms, secularists are opponents of the Right and of Alt-Christianity; there may even be something to the secularist mindset that predisposes the secularist towards progressivism and State-worship as a God substitute.

Furthermore, if you examine some of the past manifestos of the secular-humanists, you immediately notice that they contain both implicit and explicit appeals to progressivism, globalism, and so on. Again, these ideas are not of the Right, and they are the very ideas that we are fighting against. So adopting secular-humanism is like adopting the enemy's ideology while trying to defeat that very same enemy. It's absurd.

Finally, look at many highly secular / non-religious countries in the West: how are Sweden, Britain, Germany, and France doing when it comes to making sound decisions about Islam, immigration, and so on? Not too well, and definitely worse than religious countries like Poland and Hungry are doing. Maybe this will change, but at present, this fact is a strong indication that secular-humanism is not the answer to the West's problems. And, quite frankly, given the religious nature of human beings, secular-humanism will very likely never be the answer to a nation's cultural problems.

Question 7: What About Israel?

Finally, some questions were raised concerning Alt-Christianity's position on Israel and on people of Jewish ethnicity/heritage. To this, I would simply reiterate Alt-Christianity's theses 9 and 12, which explain that Alt-Christianity supports the right of all ethno-ideological and/or religious groups to exist as distinct groups, but Alt-Christianity is opposed to the unrequested rule, domination, or excessive influence (by any means) of any ethnic and/or religious group over another.

What this means is that Alt-Christianity is entirely in favor of a Jewish state for Jews, just as it is entirely in favor of ensuring that Jews do not have undue influence over non-Jewish nation states. And this, I contend, is an entirely sound position.

So hopefully this article has answered a number of further questions about Alt-Christianity. And while I know that I did not address all the questions and concerns which were raised concerning the concept of Alt-Christianity, I hope that I answered enough of them to provide everyone a better understanding of what Alt-Christianity is.

Read More: The 21 Theses of Alt-Christianity

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

5 Bonus Life Lessons From The Law Code Of Manu

June 16, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

A good thing about not being a conservative lies in having a wider range of possibilities and references available. Over the years, the same red pill I got by reading someone like Kevin MacDonald led me to explore what, as a teenager, I would have probably rejected as hippie or new-agey: Hinduism.

Beyond the strange imagery and snake oil open-your-chakras sellers that often pop in mind when we think about it, this spiritual form is considered a reference by first-rate critics of modernity. The Hindu concept of dharma may be a way to restore some balance in a West that lost all sense of a general equilibrium, and, as I could confess, roots that trace much beyond the official history of both Christianity and modern secularism seem to hold something we lost the sight of long ago.

It is with this state of mind that I started reading a venerable legal code, the Law of Manu. It attracted me because it entails detailed answers to the timeless question of how society should be organized or regulated—remember that the lack of regulation of female choices, even coupled with an excess of regulation of men's action, caused the oligopoly of some high-value guys over most decent value women and the disgruntling of deserving but despised millenials—with no qualms for this or that group's feelings.

Initially, I found there some interesting material about women and relations between the sexes. Then, enough “else” content stroke me as still relevant enough for gleaning valuable lessons from it. Some of this “else” was published last week, and here is the rest.

1. A normal society has castes

Not to beat around the bush: a highly interesting and, from a modern point of view, potentially alienating feature of the Hindu society is that it has castes. Today, we mostly think of castes as a primitive and stiffer equivalent of social classes, with pampered royalty looming over meritorious but lower-caste trapped individuals. This is, actually, a caricature of castes.

Whereas social classes are mostly measured by one's capital—even being an establishment Leftist implies "cultural" and relational capital—no matter what or who one "really" is, castes in the original sense are primarily inner and vocational, and only secondarily social. Some Westerners, seeing that contemporary India has thousands of sub-castes, often conclude that the whole system is an elaborate construction, not thinking that this diversity may come from repeated interbreeding between principles that were much purer at the beginning.

But, it might be said, what if someone whose vocation is to deal with letters spawns in a family of illiterate craftsmen, or if someone with a natural sense of business opportunities was born in a family of soldiers? More often than not, castes follow the lines of heredity, but this is so because the same produces the same, so that spontaneous aims and proclivities meet with an appropriate environment. Problem appear when castes mix up, or when higher castes lose the sight of their own reasons to be, show hubris, split up… and degenerate or crumble.

Just as men and women are different, so are, say, a Brahmin—priest, chief performer of rites, in charge of the sacred knowledge—and a Vaishya—merchant, free farmer and craftsman. Each have different affinities, capacities, responsibilities, and their roles are not to be equated. If the idea that "a parasite turning a prayer wheel", as a hardcore secularist once said on TV, ought to be considered beyond a guy who makes millions, seems repulsive, consider that societies that dutifully followed the law of castes, without letting them interbreed or degenerate too easily, lasted for thousands of years, while our "equalitarian" and "progressive" modern ones have always been in crisis.

2. Better be third caste than a dumbed-down beta

It seems like, over the centuries, most European Brahmins (I am talking here of the inner caste rather than the social one) disappeared, which might be the result of priestly celibacy. The typically Western action-oriented mindset likely stems from a prevalence of people from the two intermediary castes, Kshatriya—warrior, administrator, royalty—and Vaishya. Likewise, it seems a safe bet to consider that Return of Kings is mostly read by individuals belonging to intermediary castes, as Brahmins are negligible in quantity, and the Shudra or fourth caste, have neither the strive for autonomy or dignity nor the patience to meditate the red pill for years.

So, to confront the elephant in the room: let's say you have no inclination for military career and glory and rather recognize yourself as a member of the third caste—le tiers état. It may feel revolting to think about handling the power to two other castes beneath and think you cannot join them, as one could not change one's inner caste without turning into another person. Does it?

> A Vaishya shall acquaint himself with the relative values of gems, pearls, coral, metals, threads, perfumes, and condiments. He should be knowledgeable about sowing seeds, the good and bad qualities of farmland, all the various ways of weighting and measuring, the desirable and undesirable properties of goods, the good and bad aspect of regions, the probable profit and loss of merchandise, and how best to raise farm animals. He should be well informed about the wages to be paid to servants, the different languages of people, the manner of storing goods, and the procedures of buying and selling. (9.329-33)

Add to this being a pater familias and this lets ample room for growing, personal improvement, knowing the market and trade like your pocket, and being worthy of respect. I would say it seems much better than being a cubicle monkey who rents his flat and attempts to please an overweight Anglobitch for both sex and salary.

Today, most members of the third caste are being exploited by a handful of them who take advantage of cheap labour and market volatility. Definitely, most of those who belong here would be better off in a fair caste system, even reasoning from pure personal interest.

Also, I have noticed repeatedly that individuals who seem to inwardly belong to the Vaishya caste may deny the two upper ones, but are quite touchy if threatened to be reduced to the state of the fourth caste—the Shudra. A true Vaishya hates the idea of being turned into a prole, wholly dependent from a meager paycheck or State assistance, and robbed from the ability—should I say birthright?—to self-determination, which can happen when fourth caste apologists like Bolshevists want to destroy private property and deny their upper neighbours, but would not in a traditional world.

Even serfs or shudra, the fourth caste, had it better than now

3. Self-mastery matters for everyone

Entertainment culture, self-complacency, addiction, propaganda and other factors accustom us to lose personal control. The blue pill is exactly that: having our behavior controlled by rules we are not aware of, believing in what the media tells us, and being complacent enough to develop addictions and get into debt.

Being red-pilled is about regaining awareness, not only of a hidden reality, but also of what intervenes between reality and us to curb our outlook and behavior—and about determining ourselves anew. Being able to life on half your wage, free of debt, and to take rejections from girls or insults from Leftists without getting affected are demonstrations of self-mastery.

The Law Code of Manu expects everyone, including the fourth caste, to develop self-mastery, to the point of "clearing" one's mind of negative thoughts and emotions at particular moments. Several sections are devoted to commanding one's mind, body and speech, and the Code acknowledges who reaches complete self-mastery as deserving bliss and the highest salvation.

This makes much sense. If everyone strives minimally to develop virtues and be polite, society as a whole becomes much more harmonious than if everyone thinks of muh rights and muh opportunities. Also, if the first castes are expected to be almost exemplary, the other ones do not benefit from a culture of victimhood or "I'm underprivileged so I can do this and that as I want", and this is especially important to prevent abuses.

> Abstention from injuring, truthfulness, refraining from anger, purification, and mastering the organs—this, Manu has declared, is the gist of the Law for the four classes. (10.63)

4. Independence is for some, not for all

Vaishya individuals resent an adverse economy where Big Corp tries to reduce them to low-wage workers, and men resent being turned into chumps or clowns who depend from a girl's caprice for a bang. The modern pretense to make everyone potentially independent, or with an equal right to independence, turned natural-born independents into dependents and natural-born dependents into alleged independents.

In case of adversity, women can work (see for example 7.125) in specific employments and Shudra can live from craftsmanship (10.99-100). Otherwise, in easier or more regular times, one should live according to his own dharma—thus accepting to dependency which goes with said dharma. Note that higher castes do not automatically imply more independence at all levels: Brahmins have a right to beg for food and shelter, which was not despised, but are forbidden from lending money on interest (10.117) or from selling some kinds of food, whereas the Vaishya can without prejudice. In general, "it is far better to carry out one's own Law imperfectly than that of someone else perfectly" (10.97).

After all, much of the modern social chaos can be explained by a failure to do so: wealthy Vaishya pretending to political power fund the worst Leftist initiatives, Shudra enjoying a bit of authority turn into petty power-tripping chiefs, "emancipated" women show hungry of beta orbiters and management power. The degeneracy or hubris of late upper caste individuals is no excuse for handling their responsibilities to individuals of a lower caste.

5. Democracy and mandatory school system are crap

Common sense may lie in numbers, but knowledge on the highest sense does not, and analogically, convention is to be found on the social marketplace, but the Law is not:

> [T]housands of men who fail to follow the observances, who are unacquainted with the Veda [Scriptures], and who merely use their caste to earn a living, come together, and do not constitute a legal assembly. Fools enveloped by Darkness [cannot] declare something as the Law when they are ignorant of it… (12.114-5)

The classic Athens, so often quoted as a model of democracy, was ran by a confederation of masculine, experienced free men, who shared a collective identity and sense of self-determination that can hardly be find in millions of media-addicted, diversion-seeking contemporary voters. Athenians also recognized the difference between Law—dikē, akin to Hindu dharma—and the legal or conventional.

Note that this one is not a justification for absolute power or greedy, pompous managerialism hidden under a veneer of “progress” or “management sciences”: the Law Code specifically warns against grabbing positions one is not qualified to assume or forgetting one’s vocation.

Also, the modern mandatory school policy that forces any child into a take-it-all System is groundless: a teacher “must never impart instruction to anyone who has not requested it or who has requested it in an improper way.” (2.110) Children or apprentices ought to value and want for what they have to learn, not getting their heads filled up, and perhaps some would not be worst off if they remained far from written texts.

Conclusion

Among the prolific Hindu literature, the law treatises are perhaps the most accessible due to their practical orientation. Earlier than most others, more focused than these on the essential, the Law Code of Manu is quite readable although precise. It provides a good way to perceive what a traditional, cosmos-wise—if I can say so—and still highly civilized society looks like.

Furthermore, if you take a glance at the twentieth century Indian “nationalist” literature, you may be surprised to see a total lack of references to the castes system, as if nationalism and the “rights of Indian people” had been but a pretext to deny the landmarks of a time immemorial.

Perhaps the way out of Leftism must pass at one moment by the severe figure of the ascetic.

Read Next: 5 Essential Life Lessons From The Hindu Law Code Of Manu

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

The Endgame Of Multiculturalism Is Race Segregation

June 17, 2017 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

As multiculturalism continues to fail in Europe, we must begin to understand the inevitable outcome of "pluralistic" societies, and how and why this inevitable outcome has occurred in many parts of the European Union and North America.

While there are geographic, demographic, and socio-political differences between North America and Europe that must be put into context, the end result of both continent's multicultural experiment is interestingly similar: the many cultures this system purports to cohere are unable to coexist and ultimately seek to become or end up separate from each other—agitated and unintegrated—lacking a communal whole.

As of late, what distinguishes the multicultural makeup of North America and Europe is the way they have been impacted by the recent migration crisis. While North America to its east has the vast Atlantic Ocean as a buffer to mass migration, Europe to its south has the Mediterranean Sea—only 2 percent of the former's size—which serves more as a pathway.

You have a better chance finding Waldo than women or children here.

This reason, along with the EU's lax open border policy, has allowed economic migrants and "refugees" to pour into Europe en masse, even illegally via NGO-related smuggler boats. Countries like Sweden, German, Spain, and Italy are taking in hundreds of thousands of refugees on the taxpayer dime at a rate that exceeds the nation's ability to integrate them.

These migrants—primarily Muslim military-aged men—are lumped into small towns and municipalities, which then become little enclaves reinforcing their own way of life. Some of these religions and cultures, like Islam, hold values not compatible with the nation's, thus creating friction within these communities. Crime spikes, educational opportunities decline, and these areas get designated "no-go zones", where law enforcement and the native population are afraid to enter and Sharia Law becomes the de facto law of the land.

New arrivals are not spread evenly throughout the countries, but concentrated in middle and working class neighbourhoods. They live outside of wealthy enclaves, city centres, and government establishments, where their large numbers and higher birth rates create a noticeable demographic shift. No longer able to recognize their communities, most of the original inhabitants get fed up and leave, creating a vacuum of isolated, unassimilated foreigners in—what's to them—a foreign land.

Feeling the enrichment?

At the top rung of society, however, elite politicians and virtue-signalling celebrities living very comfortable lifestyles in their gated, homogenous communities lecture the unwashed masses on “tolerance” and “diversity” (no, Trudeau, diversity is not a “strength”). They sing sweet songs about “open society” without walking through these broken neighbourhoods to witness their self-proclaimed “cultural enrichment” in action.

These aristocrats project their facile idealistic view of multiculturalism in UN speeches, over social media, and catered press junkets at a safe distance from the harsh reality. To preserve their multicultural narrative, they blame any perceived failures of the system, such as terrorist attacks, on any sort of “bigotry” towards a protected minority group.

This leads to more polarization—a group of conflicting political identities get created, not to find mutual solutions to their society’s woes, but to solely shut down the others in some fruitless, circular ideological war about tolerance vs. intolerance.

In particular, three types of politicized, disparate identities are formed: one, dissenters (of all colours and creeds) who quietly or vocally criticize and reject the effects of multiculturalism; two, “minority” groups that use victimhood and their minority status to leverage the courts and liberal governments; and three, people from the majority population who blame all domestic unrest on their own society.

22 dead in Manchester… all because of our intolerance.

Multiculturalism in North America has created this same sort of fracturing. Similarly first, unassimilated immigrants are distributed on the fringes of urban centres in their own cultural microcosm. Here they are uncompelled to integrate into the national culture and instead participate in a "culture of consumerism", which provides little incentive to actively engage with the public.

However, the key difference of how multiculturalism functions in these parts of the world is this: while European societies have disintegrated from mass Muslim migration, multiculturalism in North America—not influenced to the same degree by this crisis—is disintegrating due to identity politics. Here, "oppressed" minority groups do their damnedest to remain separate from the oppressive, "privileged" ones.

Social justice factions like Black Lives Matter, LGBTQ, Antifa, and the Women's March push for inclusion by the larger society, while at the same time participate in the same type of exclusion they rally against. Now, you have blacks-only graduation ceremonies; police-free Pride events; feminist marches that shut out pro-lifers; Muslim-only safe spaces and all these forms of social and ideological segregation cropping up… yet these same groups want the genders—and those "identifying" as the opposite gender—in one space urinating next to each other. What?

We’re so spoiled in North America we are segregating ourselves before the migrants can.

Currently, North America has the luxury of no longer being a place where segregation is legislated or the refugee crisis has (yet) compromised its national culture. In a depraved act of wanting what you don’t have, many of its inhabitants are—by their own volition—segregating themselves out of spite. In response to the failures of multiculturalism, they are willingly beta-testing this type of social dislocation that’s been taken to its extreme (and logical end?) in many parts of Europe due to failed integration.

The question remains: does the West have a suicidal death wish or is this just where multiculturalism leads us? Perhaps it is both.

Multiculturalism is the fanciful, highly politicized notion of bringing all cultures into one living space. But its unintended effect produces, in fact, the opposite: a weak and divided social fabric fraught with competitive, incompatible groups that prefer to be left separate—and, ultimately, controlled.

Read More: The Truth About Multiculturalism And Third-World Immigration

Harry Lime
Writer. Filmmaker. Lover of cuckoo clocks. Email: harrylimerok @gmail.com.

3 Reasons Why You Should Stop Masturbating

June 18, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Masturbation. Probably the most common vice of modernity, and the one that almost all neomasculinist websites are concerned with eradicating from the human condition. And why shouldn't that be the case? After all, the "sin of Onan" has been linked to several legitimate physiological problems.

1. It makes you less receptive to actual sex.

The chemical structure of an endorphin

Despite all the pornography that floods the realms of cyberspace, the current generation has less sex than any generation of the past 100 years. While it's likely that the proliferation of porn is not the only reason for this (frankly, it's my opinion that people today, or at least most of the people around me, are just plain unattractive, both physically and emotionally), the fact that doctors are reporting surging numbers of 20 and 30 year old men coming to them with erectile dysfunction would seem to suggest that it is part of the problem.

Further complicating matters is the fact that, according to some research, one is capable of becoming addicted to pornography, with each fap serving as an endorphin "hit" similar to that released by certain types of drugs—a response that, much like drug use, will eventually wear off and require a stronger “hit”.

2. It lowers your testosterone levels

This is probably related to number 1, but it bears repeating: testosterone is good for men. Having a high natural testosterone level has been correlated to many positive health benefits such as increased energy, increased metabolism (which means less adipose tissue), higher sex drive and sexual function, increased muscle mass, increased bone density/lower risk of arthritis, and emotional stability.

Related to this, studies have shown that baseline testosterone levels in the bloodstream steadily increase after the onset of sexual abstinence, peaking at 7-10 days, a point at which they plateau and continue to do so until ejaculation. Knowing the benefits of increased testosterone, why would you waste it?

3. It makes you less attractive to women.

This occurs in ways both macro and micro. The macro, simply put, comes from the fact that, in addition to the frequent masturbator not taking advantage of the physical benefits increased testosterone gives (see number 2), women are just not attracted to buttery soft, womanly hands. In my personal experience, women love to feel the calluses upon a man's hands, and just one lotion-soaked fap session a week will take away from the sexy, alligator-like roughness of your palms.

Beyond the purely physical, some research indicates that they may be capable of directly sensing pheromone signals related to your hormonal levels, and, of course, react positively to it (that same research indicates that males react with more arousal to women that are in the midst of ovulation)

So knowing all that, you're probably going to want to quit masturbating as soon as possible, if you haven't started doing so already. But, of course, it's not so easy to kick an addiction, as perhaps some of those in the audience might know. So what can you do?

How to kick the habit

It is here that you can utilize the Baumeister willpower training devices (detailed in this link) to a specific affect, rather than just generally training your "willpower" in an ambiguous sense.

Recall that the program does not require you to go cold turkey immediately, as long as you make some sort of progress and concerted effort every day in your goal of kicking your bad habits and establishing good ones.

And speaking from my own experience with kicking the porn habit, I will give you the techniques that I used.

Step 1: Separate yourself from the substance. In other words, delete all your pornography from your hard drive, clear your browsing history so you don't have the websites anymore. Seems pretty obvious to me that removing the source of your addiction from your presence is the fastest way to get unattached emotionally.

Step 2: Find some other hobbies to fill your time with. "Idle Hands are the devil's tool" and all. I won't tell you what activity you should partake in, just make it something constructive.

Step 3: Take it slow. Rather than trying to go cold turkey all at once, go gradually. For example, if you masturbate twice a day, try cutting down to only one a day for a week. And then once you can do that for a couple of weeks, cut down to once every two days. And so forth, as much as you want to reduce it.

If you start now, by the end of the year, you can comfortably wean yourself off the habit, and these techniques work on any other habit as well. Its just masturbation is such a bad vice, it would behoove you to get rid of it first.

Read More: My One Year Of Not Masturbating

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

How Decadent And Depraved Is The Ruling Class?

June 18, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

In recent times, the "one percenters" have received considerable criticism. The USA's top 1% is estimated to own 40% of its wealth, and it wasn't like this a few decades ago. There's much to be said about the negative effects of vast extremes of wealth (observe any Third World country for the end result) and how this developed, but here we'll set the sights higher and examine the oligarch class: the international coterie making mere millionaires seem like middle class suburbanites. Some are famous, but the public is quite unaware about many others.

Actually, some are okay folks. I've worked for two multi-billionaires. Besides cheapness and some prima donna moments (both come with the territory), those two were pretty normal. They were self-made; likely that helps. I did a week-long installation job for the daughter of one; a really great lady. On a shorter installation job, I've met the wife of the CEO of one of the world's largest companies. We didn't talk long, but she seemed pretty nice.

Unfortunately, others are quite decadent and suffer from a God complex, throwing around money to impose their will on many ostensibly democratic nations. Many Arab oil barons are notoriously dissolute and meddle with politics. The same can be said for upper tier Wall Street types, secretive globalist foundations, richer-than-God bankers, and international financiers.

Weird Ways of the Elite

An interesting documentary called Weird Ways of the Elite contains some pretty shocking charges. If even half of it's true, that's pretty disturbing. Actually, some is verifiable.

First we'll consider what seems improbable. I'm pretty skeptical about some of it. David Icke makes a few appearances; he's pretty "out there"; and I don't buy his space lizard idea, which was hinted at. They're just people, who have the unfortunate habit of acting like space lizards.

Concerning Illuminati bloodlines, as it describes, some families listed became rich relatively recently in the 19th and 20th centuries. Thus, connections to the 18th century's Bavarian Illuminati are pretty unlikely. Really, we needn't trace an org chart back to a defunct group of nihilistic whack-jobs who, at most, inspire some today. Modern covert power structures, though, are another matter entirely. In fact, hunting for improbable Illuminati ties is a good smokescreen for present-day globalist foundations and other meddlesome sorts. Babylonian lineages (if the oligarchs really believe it themselves) are even more fanciful.

How about the Satanism angle? The spirit cooking stuff is the real deal, and the Bohemian Grove certainly does exist, though this could be basically entertainment for bored plutocrats; a spookier version of frat parties. Aleister Crowley (pictured a few times) isn't really a Satanist, despite his considerably eldritch symbolism. He kind of played with it, much like many 1980s rock stars. Other than that, I'm quite familiar with his OTO organization; there's no overlap with the oligarch class, although they'd be tickled pink by several passages in Liber AL Vel Legis. Finally, we've covered the Shabbatai Zvi hypothesis, based on an actual antinomian oddball, though it's a bit flimsy. So all that seems somewhat overblown.

How much is verifiable?

Twins separated at birth?

The documentary opens describing child abuse. This does happen in some wealthy families. (Whether it's psychological conditioning—or merely because their parents are sick bastards—is debatable.) As for the featured twins, heirs to the Doris Duke fortune, our buddies at HuffPo wrote about them:

> The teens say they grew up in misery, despite fabulous wealth that allowed them to own a pet lion and bring diamonds to school for show-and-tell. In a Rolling Stone interview published Tuesday, they detailed horrific abuse inflicted on them by their father at their South Carolina mansion before he died of a meth overdose > in 2010.

Apparently some oligarchs act like the stereotype of “trailer trash”.

This goes way back. Sigmund Freud’s wealthy patients often were victims of childhood sexual abuse. Eventually he rationalized it away as them only having a complex. Perhaps overlooking incestuous skeletons in prominent closets avoided career damage. Freud was a sharp cookie, but really dropped the ball there.

Then there’s the strange case of the serial pedophile Jimmy Savile. He even schmoozed his way into the good graces of the British royal family. Despite likely hundreds of victims, he wasn’t prosecuted. Further, he was protected by his fellow media figures until his death. Need we mention Hollyweird and especially Roman Polanski? There are even more shocking speculations about what might have happened in Washington itself.

The documentary correctly describes the wealthy spending enormous sums on art, some of pretty dubious quality. (However, none of the several wealthy homes I’ve been in had anything like that. Actually, some do have good taste in art.) The featured painting of Saturn devouring his son was acquired by a baron, but later he donated that Francisco Goya collection to Spain’s museums. What about the really weird stuff depicting cannibalism, jars of maggots, and all that? Apparently some really like that garbage. One particularly disturbing featured item—among several others in that collection not shown—is the real deal; let’s just say I know someone who knows someone.

Buying organs for transplant is illegal as hell in most places, but not everywhere. Stories about waking up in a hotel bathtub full of ice are pretty far-fetched, but abductions for organ harvesting have happened.

What about blood consumption for life extension? If that occurs, it won’t help, since red blood cells only last a month on average, two at most. Still, Elizabeth Bathory did exactly that, if the stories are credible. Despite a certain prominence in cultural references, adrenochrome probably isn’t the real deal; sniffing coke is the drug of choice for the wealthy. Having known many cokeheads, I’ll stick to beer even if I win Powerball.

Finally, just as featured, many oligarchs are indeed buying disaster-proof luxury bunkers.

Conclusion

https://twitter.com/LdeRothschild/status/834293947690262528

Lynn de Rothschild @LdeRothschild

@johnpodesta this is pathetic;HRC lost because you ran an arrogant out of touch campaign;you have destroyed a great family and are a loser https://twitter.com/jheil/status/834186409938415616

Twitter | Feb 22nd at 12:49 AM

> John Heilemann @jheil
>
> Folks asking abt my intv w/ @johnpodesta (his first post election) at @NewCo #ShiftForum—the whole thing is here: https://shift.newco.co/still-angry-john-podestas-first-interview-since-the-hacked-election-b3a9e63161d2#.nghsrmabr
>
> Twitter | Feb 21st at 5:41 PM

Ooh burn!

The ultra-rich aren't demigods as they're portrayed by tabloids; they're just people. Even so, the oligarch class inhabits a rather different universe. Their isolation from the public is problematic even when they believe they're acting benevolently. Celebrity airheads and champagne socialists live in gated communities, avoiding street crime and other ill effects of soft-on-crime policies, population replacement immigration, and other reckless leftist policies. Therefore, they wipe their feet on the common people while thinking they're doing the Lord's work.

The main problem is that they consider themselves "beyond good and evil", as per Nietzsche. It's always been this way. From my considerable research into King Henry VIII—actually an early forerunner of modern asshole dictators—he very much considered himself above the law. Indeed, he was the law. Still, he was a saint compared to some other nobles, such as Ivan the Terrible, Vlad the Impaler, Gilles de Rais, and again Elizabeth Bathory.

It's still a problem in modern countries ostensibly based on the rule of law. The very wealthy can get away with quite a bit. For example, Ted Kennedy drove off a bridge in Chappaquiddick (probably while drunk) and left his passenger to die, but the judge let him off because poor Teddy had suffered enough.

The full range of behavior can be found among the ultra-wealthy. However, there are some psychological effects of being kissed up to all their lives, seldom being told "no", and being exempt from the common man's daily struggles. This leads to "trust fund kid syndrome", irrationality, and hubris. However, they're not as smart as they think; their miscalculations can be counterproductive or cause embarrassing revelations.

The oligarchs certainly have their share of sociopathy. Middle-class crooks are usually smart enough to maintain appearances and not take unnecessary risks. However, sociopaths who are effectively above the law know no such restraints. That's where the problem is. Unaccountable plutocrats and "king-makers" have no business meddling with our ostensibly democratic countries anyway, especially with their irresponsible track record. They're not demon spawn, but still, they can take their Feudalism 2.0 and go to hell.

Read More: Is Genocide On The Elite Agenda?

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

4 Pursuits That Men Surprisingly Dominate Over Women

June 19, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

To emphasize the fact that men are more or less superior in science, inventions, jobs which require physical strength, and almost all sports, is too obvious, even though the equalists twist, turn and make intricate intellectual sommersaults in futile attempts to disprove these contentions.

Thus it is more interesting to look at less obvious areas, those that one may even associate with typically female qualities such as nurturing, empathy and dexterity, and which require only minimal physical strength.

I have listed four types of pursuit where men are, somewhat surprisingly, more or less better than women. Since I have focused on current times, these differences cannot be explained by lack of female opportunity.

1. Cooking

The housewife ideal is, needless to say, partly linked to the ability to cook. A significant share of men have complained that less women want to be good housewives these days and that cooking skills have worsened in the last decades. Manifold females present themselves as “foodies”, yet they do have little if any desire to make their own efforts into mastering the gastronomic art.

Nevertheless, whether or not one considers this a significant quality, one should not expect women to make better high-quality meals than men. Males are actually better at cooking. The most famous chefs in current times are pretty much all men. The picture just above clearly illustrates this.

2. Equestrian sports

Equestrian sports do not constitute a monolithic phenomenon. Thus there are, not surprisingly, overlaps and palpable sex differences within and between show jumping, dressage, eventing, as well as other less prestigious categories.

But given how many girls who are into horse riding as a hobby in comparison to males, for example about 78 percent in France, it is conspicuous that men often perform better competition-wise. Horse riding is of particular interest since it is one of few areas in which the two sexes compete on equal terms.

For instance, as expected there are more females in the world top of dressage, while there is a clear male dominance in show jumping and eventing. However, with regard to the last-mentioned category, many females place themselves just outside of the top ten.

Show jumping and eventing require particular skills, courage and assertiveness that enables more men to excel. Kent Farrington, Peter Thomsen, Abdullah bin Mutaib, Andreas Dibowski, Frank Ostholt, John Whitaker, Ludger Beerbaum, Marcus Ehning and Rodrigo Pessoa are but a few of the best men in these two fields.

Furthermore, albeit I would hesitate to call equestrian sports a form of art, there is actually some types of horse riding which can be regarded as such, advanced dressage in particular. The Spanish Riding School in Vienna, Austria, is largely dominated by males. I would highly recommend a visit there.

3. Ceramics

Ceramics might be associated with female pastime activity, but like other pursuits it can sometimes be viewed as a serious occupation or cultural manifestation. Is it really the case that the soft female hand is better to sculpt than that of the unfairer sex?

According to this list of contemporary ceramic artists the sexes are equal in excellence, whereas on this one six out of the top ten are males. Who could have guessed?

4. Songwriting

Males almost completely dominate the list over best modern popular music songwriters. Just by mentioning Swedish male pop songwriters such as Denniz Pop, Max Martin and Andreas Carlsson one can witness a considerable male dominance.

This becomes even more striking when one considers the richest songwriters of all time, and more contemporary individuals like for example Babyface, Ed Sheeran and Savan Cotecha.

Underlying factors

Although one can win an argument by stressing that males are on average smarter than women, IQ has little to do with differences in achievement in these non-physical pursuits.

Instead personaliy traits such as higher narcissism and slightly higher industriousness and assertiveness can partly explain these in equal societies. Further, higher levels of testosterone can perhaps directly or indirectly be part of the explanation as well, since it enables greater effort.

Men know that they have to work extra hard in order to become someone in the world and thus put in those extra hours of practice and energy in order to excel. There might be women who feel that they want to compensate for their lack of beauty – servus, Angela Merkel! – by means of being successful in other areas, such as medicine, art or politics. Nevertheless, generally speaking a woman can just be a woman and still find her place in society. Of course there are a lot of men who completely lack these personality traits and abilities, but it is the top talents and/or personality profiles that interest us here.

Moreover, many of these activities hinge on historical realities, such as art, music, and pre-modern equestrianism, where men likewise have excelled. However, that is no reason why females cannot succeed now.

Conclusion

Whenever something becomes a form of art, or at least more profound skill that requires focus, dedication and industriousness, men will likely excel. If Olympics in diaper changing existed I could bet that men would rule there as well.

The point is not assert that there are no overlaps between the sexes and that females are worthless outside of the stereotypical female activities such as basic child rearing and housekeeping, but rather that men often tend to perform better even in those fields which one tends to associate with the fairer sex.

Read More: Anything Women Can Do, Men Can Do Better

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Why Michelle Carter Was Properly Found Guilty Of Helping Her Male Friend Commit Suicide

June 19, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

A Massachusetts judge recently found 20-year old defendant Michelle Carter guilty of involuntary manslaughter in the death of her "boyfriend" Conrad Roy III. The case had attracted national attention due to the unusual circumstances surrounding Roy's death. Media commentary focused on the fact that Carter's role in Roy's death revolved around the huge volume of text messages she sent him before and during his suicide. Many voices wrongly saw this case as some sort of "free speech" issue; but closer examination of the facts paints the case in a very different light. This was the act of a malevolent puppetmaster who manipulated a sick man right into his own grave.

Although Carter had used electronic communications to push Roy into suicide, the fact remains that the communications still constituted an egregious and utterly callous disregard for the safety of a man with significant mental health issues. In the opinion of this writer, Carter's behavior displayed a level of malice conscious premeditation that would have–and perhaps should have–justified a murder charge.

The Facts

On July 13 of 2014, Roy was found dead in the parking lot of a K-Mart store. He was 20 years old at the time; Carter was 17. Investigators quickly focused their attention to large volume of text messages that had been exchanged between the two. According to the prosecutors, between July 6 and July 12, Carter pestered Roy more than 40 times with text messages, asking when he planned to kill himself. She knew that Roy had a history of depression and illness (he had made a previous suicide attempt in 2012). It is important to note that these messages were not just questions: they were insistent, strident calls for him to end his life. She directed him to carbon monoxide poisoning as the most efficient way to end his life. “It’s no big deal,” she told him.

Carter displayed a shocking level of malice and cruelty

Roy made his last phone call to Carter as he was carrying out his suicide plans; this call lasted about 43 minutes. Carter than called Roy back; this call lasted 47 minutes. At one point, Roy broke off his plan; he exited the car and told her that he could not go through with it. “Get back in the fucking car,” was her response. Roy did, and he died soon after. In a text to a friend after Roy’s death, Carter bluntly stated,

> His death is my fault…Like, honestly I could have stopped it. I was the one on the phone with him and he got out of the car because [it] was working and he got scared and I fucken told him to get back in … because I knew that he would do it all over again the next day and I couldn’t have him live the way he was living anymore.

“She used Conrad as a pawn in her sick game of death,” said the prosecutor to the court. Carter’s defense attorney, Joseph Cataldo, tried to paint a different picture of what happened. Introducing the victim’s psychiatric records, he argued that Roy was already prepared to commit suicide, with or without any outside help.

The defense further argued that Carter’s own emotional problems were a mitigating factor in the case. Her use of antidepressant medications, according to her attorney, may have impaired her judgment. Cataldo also tried to cast his client as a passive bystander, claiming that “There’s no action. He took his own life. He took all the actions necessary to cause his own death.” The court, however, was not persuaded by these arguments. Carter was judged guilty of involuntary manslaughter.

Commentary

Legal and social pundits immediately honed in on the text-messaging nature of the case. With its usual talent for missing the point, the American Civil Liberties Union thundered that the case “imperils free speech,” as if this case were anything about protected speech. It is not.

Any criminal attorney can confirm the fact that many crimes can be committed with words alone: felony criminal threat, solicitation, extortion, and even conspiracy. Under the right circumstances, all of these crimes can be consummated by the emission of words alone. It is irrelevant whether the words take place orally, in a text message, through a written letter, or through carrier pigeon.

Attempts to cast this case as some sort of “free speech” issue thus are completely misplaced. Furthermore, it cannot be said that Carter’s role was one of a passive bystander. Quite the contrary is true. The evidence shows that Carter took an active and commanding role in the Roy’s death. She helped him plan it, she hounded him to carry it out, and–most shockingly–she ordered him back into the carbon monoxide filled car when he had withdrawn from his plan. Her role in Roy’s death was one of proximate causation; that is, “but for” her actions, the suicide as it happened would not have taken place.

Conrad Roy

Under the legal doctrine of proximate cause, something can be said to “cause” something else when it is sufficiently close in time and space to make a certain outcome “foreseeable” from a certain action. Even if Carter had not ordered Roy back into the jaws of death (the poisoned car), there was probably sufficient evidence from all her other text messages to sustain a conviction for manslaughter.

It must be said that, as far as the defendant’s conduct is concerned, there are no mitigating factors in this case. In essentially orchestrating Roy’s death, Carter displayed a level of malice and cruelty that is nothing less than shocking. This is someone with no moral compass, a person for whom the normal feelings of compassion and kindness are utterly alien. It no doubt weighed heavily on the court’s ruling.

The expression says it all: a callous contempt for the safety and lives of others

She clearly derived some sort of sick satisfaction from acting as Roy’s angel of death. Hovering around him constantly, she exploited a confused, vulnerable, and impaired man to make herself feel a sense of power. Some people are warped enough to find pleasure in playing God with other people's lives, and this case was a perfect illustration of that.

Her conduct after his death make it clear that she planned to exploit the tragedy (that she herself had engineered) for her own attention-seeking purposes. This was behavior that was pure evil, involving a level of planning and wickedness that go beyond an accidental manslaughter scenario.

The case was properly decided. At sentencing, the court must take note of the unmitigated nature of the defendant's conduct, and hand down an appropriate sentence. Probation is not appropriate in this case.

Read More: Why Modern Men Need To Develop A Passion For Living

---

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Seduce Women Using Masculine Authority

June 19, 2017 | by Avery Hayden | Link | Original Link

When a woman considers you to be a figure of authority, she will be far more likely to comply to your requests, she will have greater respect for you, and she will be more sexually attracted to you.

Authority may be the single most powerful psychological influence on human behavior; we spend our developmental years being trained to submit to authority. When we're young, we have no choice but to do what our teachers, parents, and authority figures tell us. Through years of being conditioned to obey, we develop a deep predisposition to do what authorities tell us to.

For women, this effect is doubly powerful. Women are sexually attracted to men with authority because females evolved to desire leaders who can provide them with the best genes.

Milgram’s Chilling Discovery

Most people probably wouldn’t admit how much power authority has over them, yet it’s easy to see the power authority has over others. You can see it every day when people follow stupid trends (the male romper) or defend their point of view by parroting the opinions of authority figures (religious texts). But the evidence for the power of authority isn’t limited to your day-to-day experience; it has been scientifically proven.

The infamous Milgram experiments provided us with chilling proof that humans are dangerously vulnerable to the power of authority. The studies were designed to test how much pain people would inflict on others when instructed to do so by an authority figure. The results were sobering, to say the least:

In Milgram’s studies , participants were split into two groups, teachers and learners. Each teacher was paired off with a learner. The teacher was given the task of asking the learner questions. If the learner answered a question incorrectly, the teacher was instructed to flip a switch that would send a mild electric shock to the learner (secretly, the learner was a trained actor).

The participants (teachers) were told that they were helping with a study about pain and memory. Although they were uncomfortable with inflicting pain on a stranger, they all administered the first low-voltage shocks without much hesitation.

Each time the learner got a question wrong, the teacher administered a higher voltage shock than for the previous incorrect answer. Eventually, the shocks the teachers administered were so intense that the learner would scream in agony, ask to be let out, and mention that he was experiencing chest pain because of his heart condition.

You would imagine that at this point participants would refuse to administer any further shocks. You would be wrong. When the teacher would tell the researcher (authority) they wanted to stop, the researcher would suggest they keep going with simple phrases like, “Continue, please.”

These perfectly normal people thought they were inflicting traumatic levels of pain on the learners, yet a sentence or two from an authority figure was enough to get them to continue inflicting severe pain. In fact, 65% of participants administered even the very last shock (by which point the learner seemed to be in grave danger).

The Milgram experiments have been successfully replicated numerous times with numerous variations and are considered by the scientific community to be well designed and reliable.

The power of authority is incredible. When you leverage it in your favor, it will exponentially increase your ability to influence women.

How do you create the effect? Simply go out wearing a police uniform and tell women they need to be punished for their bad behavior. (Hopefully you caught the irony there and didn’t stop reading to go find a police uniform.)

Truthfully, the long-term strategy to make women see you as an authority is three-fold:

1. Become an actual authority figure in your career.
2. Live a life in which you make your own decisions instead of bending to the will of others (define your own values and spend your time pursuing those values).
3. Develop a strong frame by meeting many women and taking risks with them.

Although invaluable long-term, these strategies won't produce notable results in the short-term. Fortunately, there's an effective short-term strategy as well: establish yourself as an authority figure with women by creating compliance.

Compliance

Who leads? Who follows?

If someone is considered an authority, people will agree to their requests. You can reverse engineer authority by making assertive (but reasonable) requests that will make a woman feel that you must be an authority.

Authority is usually thought of symbolically (teachers, police, politicians), but at its root it's emotional. Old school pickup artists used this understanding to create the complicated machinations known as compliance ladders; and although the theory behind them is solid, the implementation is too elaborate to be practical. There's an easier strategy.

Your goal to create a sense of authority is simple: always be leading. This can be easy, say things like, "Let's go to the dance floor," "Let's get some fresh air," or "Let's sit down over there." It doesn't need to be anything complicated, the point is simply to lead as much as possible. So long as the girls feel you have some value, they will generally acquiesce to these requests. (If women aren't agreeing to small requests, read this article.)

You can also lead conversationally. Whenever a woman brings up a topic that you are uninterested in, assert your authority by changing it. If she makes an awkward statement, call her out on it. The vast majority of women will go along with this if they don't, it usually means you're too needy and reactive. The more often a woman follows your lead, the more she will feel (unconsciously) that you are an authority figure.

At some point in the interaction, you'll want to lead the girl to somewhere that sex can happen. The more she has followed your lead up to that point, the more likely she is to agree to go to your place.

There's no need to overcomplicate this with compliance ladders; that requires way too much analytical thinking. Simply make a point to attempt to lead each interaction as much as possible, then when you make a big ask you're rate of success will be much higher.

Decisive Language

Authority is also communicated through your choice of language and tone of voice. The more assertive and decisive your language, the better. Imagine you're in bed with a girl, she's naked, and you said, "Um, can I have sex with you now?" Do you think that will get her hot and bothered? Fuck no. Imagine instead, you said, "I'm going to fuck you so hard right now. I'm going to make you cum for me again and again." That's more like it. (Sidenote: Telling a girl she's about to cum can actually make her cum.)

Indecisiveness makes you look like this guy in a woman's eyes. Weak.

So many men use qualifiers and ask for way too much permission. Assume permission until you're told no. Which is better? Asking a girl, "Would you like to go to the dance floor?" OR grabbing a girl by the hand and saying, "Come with me."

Men hesitate to be authoritative because they're afraid it will get them rejected. The bitter irony here is that more often than not, pussyfooting around is what gets you rejected. Women are turned off by a man who doesn't have the balls to take what he wants. Even if a girl is initially attracted to you, if you act doubtful in any way, she will either assume you're not interested in her or she will lose interest

Now, it's true that if you act too authoritatively some women will reject you. But more often than not, those women would have rejected you anyway. And many other times, when a woman rejects your lead, the interaction isn't over. This just means you either asked for too much or she doesn't see you as an authority yet. You can still change her mind so long as you don't give a fuck, hold your frame, and try to lead again afterwards.

Of course, even if acting with authority did get you rejected, that’s just more reason to do it. The more you get rejected, the more you are able to build your skillset. Use these strategies and your results with women will drastically improve. Women desire a leader, a man with authority literally makes them horny, it’s hardwired in their DNA.

With that said, use authority responsibly. Once you develop your ability to project authority you can easily get people to do things they don’t really want to do. If you are morally opposed to that thought, use caution.

Read More: How To Speak Deeply With Confidence And Authority

Avery Hayden
After years of video game addiction Avery decided he'd replace Night Elves with living, breathing women. After approaching thousands of women and getting a degree in psychology, he put both skillsets to use with his website, Red Pill Theory , which offers dating advice with a scientific edge. You can also check out his books Zero Fucks Givenand The Trial: Transform Your Dating Life in Eight Weeks on Amazon with the above links.

Republican Congressman ‘Felt The Bern’ Of Leftist Shooting Rampage

June 20, 2017 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

On last Wednesday, June 14th, James Hodgkinson, a leftist, opened fire on a recreational baseball game of Republican Congressmen in which they were training for a charity event. He shot four, and two of those were hospitalized. Hodgkinson was shot in return by police on-site, apprehended, then died of his wounds. Today we are going to cover some interesting points of this act of terrorism and why the left is so desperate to have it be ignored.

The shooter was a hard-core, Bernie-loving leftist

Despite the left’s attempts to appear as the party of “peace and tolerance,” Hodgkinson was one of them. Although Facebook, in a move of questionable bias, has removed his profile, and one of identical nature put up “in memorial” by like-minded seditionists, anything on the internet of interest is permanent, and certain parts were archived.

Banners of Bernie Sanders don't lie. I voted for Trump, but, with the little I use Facebook myself, the man does not appear on any of my pictures, let alone my timeline's banner. Add to that the typical leftist's cry of removing a sitting President and Vice-President from office for treason when their only crime is winning the election while not being their candidate of choice.

The scary thing is that his Facebook page looks basically identical to thousands of progressives out there. Makes you wonder how many more crazies are going to jump the fence from activism to terrorism now that all their candidates lost and they're irrelevant for at least a few years.

He had a target list

Since no one has died, the left, in an attempt at damage control, are hoping that this shooting can be ignored and will go away. They are even abandoning their traditional “someone got shot, holy shit, GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION NOW!” platform, like they did with the last Congressman shot, Gabby Giffords, since it was one of theirs who did it.

Congressmen on the “kill list”

However, there’s a kill list. While a sane person might realize that they could probably remember something as important to them as a vendetta, and keep it in their minds and away from police evidence, Hodgkinson, in a typical liberal “muh feelz,” star-of-your-own-movie, Kill Bill style venting of emotional angst, had a list of whom he wanted to kill, and they were all not only Republicans, but members of the Freedom Caucus, a right-wing sub group of Congress much reviled by Democrats and their statist ilk.

He used a crappy gun

Hodgkinson used a SKS in the shooting, a gun which CNN, no stranger to in-poor-taste pushing of agendas, noted is “widely available in the US and used in the Dallas shooting of last year,” even though that last bit is untrue (Micah Johnson used a Saiga AK).

Putting on the gun writer hat for a moment, the Samozaryadny Karabin Sistemy Simonova (Semiautomatic Carbine System of Simonov, SKS) is not an awesome weapon. They’re kind of neat looking, and they are cheap, and any gun collector just wanting a plinking gun to hand to newbies that won’t hurt them and they won’t hurt it in turn should have one, but the AK-47 is a superior weapon in every aspect with the exception of the safety (the SKS has a neat little trigger-obstructor like a Garand, but it’s off to the side, as opposed to the giant stamped handle of the AK.)

Accuracy is not a strong suit of this weapon. Depending on whether or not the rifle specifically in question was actually a Russian gun, or was one of the many Commie knockoffs (like the Chinese Norinco), the accuracy of these things should be measured in whether or not you can hit the side of a barn (and for some of them, shooting from the inside of said barn.)

SKS. Note the limited, clip fed internal magazine and poor sighting system.

While I would not care to be shot by one, the 7.62×39 Soviet cartridge (native to the SKS and AK-47) is not a powerful cartridge. Lacking the superior aerodynamics of smaller caliber cartridges like the 5.56×45 of US and NATO forces, the 7.62×39 flies in the inefficient manner of its .30 caliber brethren of the day, and is why the Soviets went to the 5.45×39 round in the AK-74 model. Making matters worse, the bullet is not pushed by much powder for its caliber; the cartridge, being 39mm overall length, is much shorter than the .308 Winchester's 51mm, or the 30-06's 63mm, even though they all shoot roughly the same bullet.

The SKS has horrible iron sights, and, being a Soviet style rifle, has the gas system on top along with the removable service cover, so there is no real good way to mount better optics. The magazine, with the exception of a select few rifles made to take AK detachable mags, is a very good internal, ten shot magazine, but it is slow to load manually, even with stripper clips, and holds limited ammo.

All in all, this is a cheap rifle that someone who is passionate about their beliefs, but kind of stupid about everything else, would use in this sort of thing. The only good sides about it is that the rifle limited Hodgkinson's damage in terms of accuracy, volume, and magnitude of firepower even more than his probably lackluster shooting skills, and that, if any news source were to report on the amount of ammunition he had with him, they would actually get it right, as the SKS is indeed fed by clips, not magazines.

Own it

There's no walking away from this one. Guy shows up to a political event with a rifle, opens fire, hits a few people and is then shot dead, and a list of his desired targets is found on his body. The left is trying to ignore this one, as there really is no other option for them, and this highlights a crucial difference between them and the right.

Left Wing Domestic Terrorist

Conservatives, libertarians, and Constitutionalists believe in the idea of rule by the existing law. If you want to do something, you must do it legally. Since you believe in preserving the system, the system is generally on your side except for new laws introduced by progressives, and you fight those laws, and those that push them, legally.

Liberals and progressives believe that current laws are wrong, and, due to the religious fervor of their movement, believe that those laws do not apply to anyone who is doing the work of the progressive agenda (but they still apply to everyone else). The reason the left is not decrying Hodgkinson is they not only see nothing wrong with what he did, or attempted to do, but they wish they could do it themselves.

Just because we all know you can't do it doesn't make it ok for you to say it.

Remember this leftist shooter the next time the progressives trot out the "Islamic terrorism is not the problem; right-wing terrorism is the problem" screed, and throw it back at them.

Conclusion

This is the danger we, and everyone who is not a leftist progressive, face. In their turmoil that their cause/religion lost the majority of Federal and state elections last fall in a mandate of the people against the failed policies of the Obama regime, the progressives are increasingly turning to violence to enact their will on the people of the USA.

Fortunately, like most things, they are not very good at it, and any concealed weapon carrier who is proficient should have no issue stopping one of these lunatics. Two in the chest, one in the problem glasses. Be safe.

Read More: As It Becomes Clear That Donald Trump Cannot Save The West, Only One Outcome Becomes Inevitable

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

Montreal Celebrates 8-Year-Old Drag Queen And The Perverted Sexualization Of Boys

June 20, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Montreal, the Canadian city that desperately tried to intimidate, assault, and perhaps even kill Roosh, has a new "hero": an eight-year-old "drag queen" going by the name "Lactatia" (real name Nemis Quinn Mélançon Golden). Hundreds of members of the city's gay, lesbian, and transsexual population have lauded the poor youngster as being "adorable" and as a role model for kids everywhere.

Despite the left's ongoing minimization of children being sexualized, including through a series of now deleted pro-pedophile articles by Salon, Nemis Quinn Mélançon Golden's plight represents a worrying new chapter of socially sanctioned child abuse.

Let's start with the name "Lactatia." The clearly troubled Nemis says that the moniker was the invention of his older sister Kashmyr. Nonetheless, why the child's parents would allow him to run around on the internet with a name used to describe a biological process for sexually mature females is beyond me. Unlike some parents dealing with a seriously confused child, Nemis' mother and father actively encourage his performances.

For anyone who doubts, if they could even do so, that the boy is being flagrantly sexualized for the entertainment of gays, lesbians, and transsexuals, take a look at the following clip:

What the confused boy displays with his dancing from 3:00 is simply a watered-down and certainly more eclectic version of the common pole dancer or other sexual performer.

A creep who says these things on the internet to 8-year-olds would be be arrested, so why can they be said about a child drag queen?

Absolutely no words.

> ...the younger queen charmed the dress off the older queen...
>
> — "Journalist" Neal Broverman describing 8-year-old Nemis Quinn Mélançon Golden's "performance" with Bianca del Rio.

In my native Australia, and also in the United States, Canada, and Britain, entire police units are devoted to monitoring those who look to chat with or make unsuitable comments about prepubescent children online. But even more real-world sexualization like the kind being directed at Nemis Golden is conveniently forgotten.

A man typing about lingerie to an 8 or even 14-year-old girl (and not even talking about sex) would be rightfully tracked, but it is highly likely that at least one journalist writing about Lactatia will be getting a pass for his bizarre description of the child's interactions with an adult drag queen, Bianca del Rio.

Gay magazine The Advocate's Neal Broverman said that "the younger queen charmed the dress off the older queen." How is this ever acceptable language when describing an 8-year-old boy? If someone talks about charming the dress off a woman or the pants off a man it often means they're about to have or have had sex, regardless of any other non-sexual meanings the phrase can have. I'm no prude, but this is hardly the sort of commentary even a third-party observer of this situation should be writing.

One fairly balanced take on the matter points out that Bianca del Rio called Nemis a "bitch" and talked about giving him a "shot." This mirrors the sexually provocative, catty banter drag queens normally engage in ad nauseam. It also exacerbates the already flirtacious, promiscuous demeanor of Nemis, which is far more like that of an adult gay man on the prowl for sex than an eight-year-old who should be focused on playing outside with friends and doing his homework.

Gays have enough problems of their own to deal with

Maybe focus on issues like HIV/AIDS, guys.

As I wrote earlier this year, gay men account for a truly shocking percentage of HIV/AIDS infections. Instead of focusing on their own substantial issues, and HIV/AIDS is just one of them, a number of gays and others from the LGBT scene are simply adding to society's woes. Clearly demarcated divisions between adults who can be sexualized and children who cannot are being persistently ignored.

Though poor Nemis Golden may seem like the archetypal social engineering experiment for notoriously leftist Montreal, we need to look at the exploitation of him through a wider lens. Drag queens are already being rolled out in New York public libraries and bogus concepts such as gender fluidity are being progressively (pardon the pun) taught in schools to mere five-year-olds.

Perhaps the most chilling aspect of Nemis' story is that he is coached to say that a child whose parents don't let them become a drag queen "need[s] new parents." And if the present efforts of the left are anything to go by, a lot more indoctrinated and vulnerable young children are going to be screaming for new parents.

Read More: Sweden Continues To Fund Bizarre And Inappropriate Sex Education For Young Children

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The American Cold Civil War

June 20, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The left has decided that they no longer want to live among people who share different views than them. They are plugging their fingers in their ears while yelling racist, fascist, Nazi, and Hitler. They are refusing to yield, compromise, debate, or even accept that their political positions are starting to lose in democratic elections despite suspected cheating that aids them. This has put us squarely in the middle of a cold civil war where both sides of the political spectrum are warming to the idea of killing each other.

A confirmation of the left's defeat is apparent when you see how their maniacal behavior converts more people, especially moderates, against them. The biggest recruiting tool against the left has become the left. Every time they protest, riot, screech against white people, or show their vulgarity, the remaining mentally sane of America realize that the left's platform has become so out-of-touch that it no longer represents the basic ideals of the country. The non-cucked right needs to merely show up after temper tantrums and say "Look how crazy they are" for the converts to come pouring in.

The left is out of options

Many people are wondering why the left has become a recruiting agent for the right by promoting or engaging in violence. First, they simply don't know what else to do. When a parent tells a child that he can't eat candy for every meal, and the child doesn't have a logical argument about the merits of eating that candy, what does he do? He cries, stomps his feet, threatens to run away, throws out insults like "meanie" and "jerk," and may even hit his parent to get his way. Donald Trump and his supporters are the parents who won't yield to an emotional child.

The second reason why the left is hurting their cause with violence is because its billionaire controllers, particularly George Soros, want to divide America to such an irreparable extent that a hot Civil War is forced, giving them an opportunity to increase their power. Soros wants to create so much hate, animosity, and chaos that any resulting conflict has a chance of him holding absolute power, compared to the current situation where he has "only" a moderate amount. In other words, he rather take the chance of war to solidify his grip further.

The leftists that Soros sponsors in the Woman's Marches and the antifa outbursts may also want a Civil War, but a quick look at their physiognomy shows they would struggle to even go one day without electricity, and that they possess the same psychological directive as the child who is angry that he can't have candy. Soros is the creepy old neighbor who promises them the candy they crave because he wants to build their trust and get them alone. The child, naive about the extreme danger that lurks behind the likes of Soros, decides to follow him into a van parked in the alley to spite its own parents and their righteous authority.

The reason the right has been reluctant to respond with violence is because they're winning. Violence comes not from a position of strength, but desperation, when every other option has been extinguished, and should serve as a signal to you of what the real score between the left and right really is. Without violence, the left currently has a 100% chance of losing, continuously and humiliatingly, for at least the next eight years. All the gains that took them decades to achieve will be lost if we ravage and rape their power structures.

With a hot civil war, the left has a 25% chance to win, a bet they are willing to take even though there is a high chance they will be among the first to die in the conflict. A logical person would ask why they would push for a conflict that is sure to destroy the infrastructure of the urban centers they live in, and one where food, water, and other basic necessities would be lacking. The answer comes upon realizing that a child does not realize that eating candy every day will make him sick. The child must therefore be commanded for its own good, because it does not have the capability to take care of itself or understand the consequences of its actions.

We all lose in a hot war

Before the warrior in you gets excited at the prospect of crushing the left in a hot war and killing antifa members with high-powered weapons as they wield sharpened mop handles at you, understand that any war in the United States would quickly become a proxy war involving all major military powers, particularly China and Russia, who would rush to spend billions of dollars to have ultimate control of the country. It would be protracted and match the first civil war in terms of brutality, where 2% of the population died.

With the current population, a 2% death rate would result in over 6 million deaths. Compared to the 3,000 that died on 9/11, which was seen as the greatest national tragedy of modern times, a hot war would effect every single American in a profoundly negative way. No sane person with a family would wish for this outcome, which further highlights the insanity of much of the left in pushing for this very result. They rather see millions of people dead and the country ruined than accept a democratic process where their crazy ideas lost.

Even if we avoid a hot war, the underlying problems are not solved. The left will constantly subvert against the country in hopes of achieving a hot war, use both economic and physical violence against those on the right whom they disagree with, and inevitably descend into terroristic violence that rivals ISIS. It's intolerable for things to proceed as they are, but if we remove a hot war from the table, what option is left?

1-800-DIVORCE

I recommend the long divorce option, which has three components. The first is extreme law and order. Starting with the Federal government, every single instance of leftist threats, intimidation, and violence must be investigated, prosecuted to the maximize allowable by law, and publicized. The left have been getting away with their illegal acts for too long, to the point where violent protesters don't even fear arrest, thanks to Democratic mayors and police chiefs who allow it. The FBI must uphold the law and punish those who break it, and municipalities or universities that allow illegal acts must be punished through withholding of Federal funds. This will immediately shrink the number of violent agitators on the left and limit the power of their institutions.

The second component of the long divorce option is to excise the left from all centers of cultural power so that they cannot actively convert the youth. The fake news, already on its last legs, must be replaced by organizations that are not so vehemently anti-American, academia must be purged, and all globalist traitors working in government, both on the Federal and state level, must be removed from positions of power.

The media is hemorrhaging money and viewers, millions of citizens are getting red pilled to the subversiveness of the academic system (particularly its anti-male and anti-white agenda), and Trump has begun to right the ship in the Federal government, which will certainly trickle down to the local levels. Because the leftist establishment is losing control over their narrative, the younger Generation Z is already showing signs of rightward thinking thanks to being raised on 4chan memes more than TV programming. This means that we simply need to remove millennials from power and wait for them to die of old age or AIDS while preventing them from causing further damage to American institutions.

Halting immigration is the third component of the long divorce option. The left has not been able to show how immigrants benefit American citizens besides more diverse restaurant options, and emotional pleas of “human rights” and “compassion” is not sufficient enough to turn the United States into a big welfare office. Open-borders immigration is hurting existing citizens, serving as a cynical means for leftists to gain more votes in elections while browbeating their enemies with “hate speech” codes that demand you love non-Americans more than Americans.

We must also advocate for a white population that increases from where it currently stands, because America is no longer America if that number dips below 50%, and will instead look something like an international airport. Once immigration is stopped, and illegal citizens are deported, it will become monumentally more difficult for open-borders politicians to win nationally again. This can be absolutely ensured if woman’s suffrage is repealed, a proposition that I know many find unpalatable, but one that would usher in an era of permanent winning.

For us to win without a hot civil war, we have to retake the reins of power and peacefully co-exist with bitter leftists over the next fifty years while the culture slowly heals itself. Once institutions are purged of anti-American leftists, the new left will exist in more of a classical liberal form and believe in nominally nationalist ideas while accepting cultural values that are shy of traditional. The long divorce option will not excite you because of the length it takes to see a resolution, but it’s one that will preserve life and the existing infrastructure of the United States.

Four future outcomes

There are four outcomes that can proceed from the juncture of which we stand. The first is a globalist resurgence at the polls thanks to demographic changes that push the vote far to the left, starting in 2024. If this happens, we will have a president that is more authoritarian than Hillary Clinton. The boot will come down on all facets of American life, especially speech, and we will essentially be living in an open-air prison.

The second outcome is a hot war where we win. The country will be ravaged and millions will die, but at least most of the deaths will be leftists.

The third option is a hot war where we lose because of foreign involvement. Not only are we much more likely to die in this engagement, but the globalist boot will come down with such a viciousness that those on the right who survive may hope that they had died in the war.

And the fourth option is the long divorce, one that we will easily win if the recommendations I made above are taken. Very few people die and life can proceed with high stability and prosperity for the majority of the country.

The globalist left has so damaged the country from the decades they've been in power that there is no quick fix, and those of us who are alive today will likely not see a resolution that can be argued as "complete victory" during our lifetimes. I understand the frustration that many on the right have, and the desire they have to be immediately cured of poisons that the left has unleashed, but we must carefully analyze any outcome that results in the deaths of our loved ones and even ourselves. There is a time and place to die for what you believe in, but I hope I have convinced you that we have not yet reached that critical moment and that we can avoid the downsides of a hot civil war and the globalist boot by taking on the option of the long divorce to still win in the end.

The laws we have on the books are enough—let's enforce those and allow the country to focus on itself instead of empire building and policing while the media and universities collapse upon the weight of their own lies and degeneracy. Besides, the entertainment value in watching the left screech and yell for the next several decades is sure to bring us reams of pleasure. That's a better outcome than outright war.

This article was originally published On Roosh V.

Read Next: How To Save Western Civilization

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why You Should Consider Investing In Crypto-Currencies

June 20, 2017 | by Tal Weinstein | Link | Original Link

There has been a lot of talk about crypto-currencies in the mainstream media (lately, among RVF forum members) and I want to explain how it relates to men in a life altering way. But first, what is a crypto-currency?

Crypto-currencies are digital forms of money you trade in your fiat (paper) currency for but with a twist, it's decentralised, which means it isn't stored on a giant server computer somewhere.

Do you remember Napster and Mega Upload? Their headquarters were both raided and shut down by the government. Torrents or peer-to-peer file sharing are still around because it's decentralised, this is also the case with crypto-currencies. Crypto-currencies are also encrypted which means the best hackers on the planet can't get access to them. You can convert your fiat currency into crypto and convert it back when you need cash on hand.

Why crypto-currencies are so useful

Crypto-currencies touted in the media like Bitcoin and Ethereum represent a convenient way for men to tuck away their savings where the hands of government can't reach. It's possible to squirrel away your savings so virtually nobody but yourself knows about or can access it. Family courts cannot audit your crypto-currencies and see how much you have nor can they retrieve any of it without your password authentication.

This gives you real power over them. They don't know where your money is, how much you have, what you purchase with it and they will be unable to touch it. I suspect many men will discover ways to avoid various forms of taxation and begin starving the welfare state which cock-blocks men from their own women.

The benefits for men are numerous. Your money is protected from inflation and likely to gain value because the demand for it is increasing each day. You can protect your money in a virtual location thieves and money-hungry women cannot reach. It will be safer and more accessible to you than any vault.

Crypto-currencies are not going away

In less than a decade it will be used by everyone just like credit cards are today. I know this might be difficult to imagine but in a few years you will see cards that pay using crypto-currency. You will witness home and car purchasing done via e-mail without any bank officials or lawyers, just crypto-currency with built-in smart contracts. The applications of this new programmable currency are still unknown.

Recently it came to my attention that PayPal shut down Roosh's account. A group of SJW's complained that his insensitive words hurt their feelings. With crypto-currency you can get around this effortlessly. It takes seconds to transfer money and all you need is a virtual wallet address and you can transmit the internet currency. With third parties we all know transfers can take days and are subject to their whims and political machinations.

Like everything there are obvious drawbacks to using crypto-currencies:

Price volatility — your Bitcoin (BTC) might be worth 2694USD right now but could be up or down 200 dollars three minutes later. Less volatile crypto-currencies such as the USDt that are pegged to USD exist to address this. At the time of writing this, crypto-currencies tethered to the Russian Ruble and Singapore dollar are being rolled out.

Liquidity — Most retailers do not accept crypto-currency as a payment but it is slowly being adopted. Furthermore, only 2 or 3 crypto-currencies are readily convertible to cash at the moment. Crypto-cards and smart phone apps that convert your digital assets to fiat before paying are also on the horizon.

Abundance of alt-coins — There are now several hundred virtual currencies ranging from Bitcoins to meme coins flooding the market. I believe the free market and government legislation will both curb the number of circulating alt-coins.

Crypto-bubble — This is actually the biggest fear of crypto-holders and cannot be addressed within the scope of this article. All I can say is that historically bubble bursts have been followed by recovery and stronger resurgence as was the case with Bitcoin.

As more masculine men realise the benefits of this new technology, they are being converted and are taking the steps to mitigate risk, protect themselves, and occasionally turn a huge profit.

How you can acquire crypto-currency

You must first go to “gateways” where you can send fiat currency from your credit card or bank and convert it crypto-currencies such as Bitcoin or Ethereum. Here are some websites that do this:

- Coinbase
- Gemini
- Gdax
- Independent Reserve

You can then store your Bitcoins/Ethereum there (not recommended) or withdraw them to your wallet address for safe keeping. Here are examples of free wallet apps that would allow you to store your crypto on your computer or smartphone:

- Blockchain.info Wallet
- Parity
- My Ether Wallet (online wallet)

You can send your crypto-currency to other people or purchase items where accepted. You can also send your money to online exchanges to trade crypto-currencies. Here are some examples:

- Liqui.io
- Poloniex
- Ether Delta

Many manosphere issues can now be addressed with crypto-currencies and I’m certain I am only scratching the surface of its potential.

Don’t be cowed into believing the frame that the mainstream media puts on crypto-currencies. It’s all too common to hear them refer it as a tool of drug dealers, thieves, and terrorists. They say it so the elite can deny opportunity and protection for the men that build and maintain civilisation as we know it. They know this is a game changer, something that can destroy the corrupt establishment of governments and banks that keep men poor and enslaved with debt.

Crypto-currencies represent a new hope for men everywhere and the future looks brighter each day. I hope you will reflect on this and consider exploring it.

Read Next: 11 Reasons Men Should Use Bitcoin

Tal Weinstein

The Counter-Intuitive Method To Closing The Deal In Tough Night Game Pickups

June 21, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Having recently travelled from Berlin to Ibiza, the two great party centres of Europe, I have as you might expect been doing quite a bit of night game. This has newly underlined for me the importance of a very simple but very important night game tactic: hanging in there.

You see, creating attraction through night game is actually pretty straightforward. The challenging part is to make something happen as a result of that attraction. In most cases it is the man who is able to stay up long enough and hang in there until the end of the night who is most likely to get laid.

The Pros and Cons of Night Game

Night game gets a lot of negative press in these parts and with good reason. You will probably be familiar with the problems it faces, but let me list a few for you here anyway:

clubs are loud, noisy, and expensive. They are filled with girls who, already validated by thousands of Tinder and Instagram fans, have no real interest in hooking up. Also, girls' 'bitch shields' are high, there is intense competition from other men and cockblocks abound.

All of this is true. However, in my opinion we shouldn't entirely write night game off just yet (although you should practice it in combination with day game and other forms of pickup). Because the reality is that a lot of very attractive women go to clubs and a lot of guys get laid through them. These are simply facts, and that being the case it's worth thinking a little more deeply about what techniques are actually most effective in a night time environment.

Actually, despite Tinder, girls still feel sexy in clubs and they will still hook up or go home with a man if he demonstrates enough value. So of course, it goes without saying that you must work on your value as hard as possible, which includes lifting, dressing well, style, being interesting, and all of those things that we talk about so frequently here at ROK. You must also be socially adept and learn the rudiments of game.

But once you've done those things it's not really that hard to spark attraction in a club environment. Because night game has one massive advantage over day game—-approaching and hooking up is not only normal, it's expected, and often welcomed. With day game you have the added challenge of communicating "Hey, this is normal! People meet in the Fish Oils aisle at Whole Foods all the time!" But with night game you are just doing what people have done for decades.

Once you've created that attraction though—or once you've picked up on an indicator of interest (IOI) from a girl—the real challenge is then to convert that into something tangible, like sex.

Here in Ibiza there is a massive problem with logistics. It's not that there aren't thousands of hot girls and it's not that they're not horny, it's just that making something happen is a bitch. This is because (a) girls are paying upwards of €50 for a ticket to a club—they're not just going to walk out with you at 2am, (b) most girls are with groups of friends, which means that they don't want to look slutty by leaving with a random guy, plus they feel a sense of responsibility to the others, (c) everyone goes to clubs all night and then is pretty much comatose during the day, so it's hard to organise a daytime meet and (d) it's hot as hell which makes everyone lethargic and removes any sense of urgency.

Note that I'm not saying that hook-ups don't happen in Ibiza—that would be ridiculous. I'm just saying that these are some of the downsides of night game here, and they mirror similar issues you'll find everywhere else.

Last night, for example, I met two girls in Pacha (separately and both Canadian, coincidentally) who were interested in me. I took phone numbers from both and they have been messaging me today, but because of a combination of the above I haven't been able to seal the deal with either yet

Hanging In There

This is where the noble art of hanging in there really comes into its own. What I mean by this is when you meet a girl in a club and there's mutual attraction, and it's late enough in the night (you can't pull this off at 9pm!) then you have to be prepared to hang in there and stay with her until the end, no matter what.

It can be awkward, it can be boring, it can be uncertain and it can be frustrating, but doing it will give you the best possible chance of sleeping with that particular girl.

What hanging in there means in practice is pretty self-explanatory. I slept with a Lithuanian girl the other night by using this method. We met, then she wanted to go to a friend's bar, so we went. Then she wanted to go to another bar so we went there too. Then she came back to my place but she wanted to sit up for hours drinking and talking about philosophy, so we did that too. Then at about 6am she agreed to go to bed 'but only to sleep'. So we did that too. Finally, a few hours later we came to and had sex. But it was only because I was prepared to go with the flow and hang in there that this result was achieved.

Critics might say that you are effectively just dancing to the girl's tune, playing the clown. And to some extent they're right. But if you want to get results from night game then you have to recognise that it is a game and play the hand that you are dealt.

The evening with the Lithuanian girl required me to be patient and also to have faith that things would go my way (which was by no means certain.) It helps if you actually like hanging out with girls. I enjoyed myself and was able to put the outcome out of my mind for most of the time.

If you think hanging in there is a waste of time then don't do it, but consider the alternatives you have. The probability of anything coming of those phone numbers I took in Pacha is small. The truth of the matter is that in night game—for naturals as well as for players—it is usually the last man standing who accrues the sexual rewards that so many desire.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: The Game Principles I Used When I Picked Up A South Korean Girl

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Is Agribusiness Making You Sick?

June 21, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Many people now suffer from gluten intolerance, a constellation of conditions including celiac disease, dermatitis herpetiformis, and others. Gluten-free products are now appearing on supermarket shelves, and many restaurants offer gluten-free choices. Celiac disease—just one of these conditions—causes loose, greasy, and especially foul-smelling stool; which would ruin anyone's day.

It seems this trend has been on the rise. Gluten intolerance used to be pretty rare, and I never heard about it until about twenty years ago, and seldom back then. Now, it seems as much of a growing trend as the epidemic of narrow angle glaucoma afflicting young adults from states allowing medical marijuana.

People began eating wild grain around 20,000 BC, and began cultivating it around 9500 BC. Agriculture is so ingrained (if you'll pardon the expression) into our culture that it's even part of a number of religions. Ishtar's descent into the underworld symbolized a mythological origin, the Eleusinian Mysteries featured agricultural elements, Holy Communion in Christianity includes consecrated bread, and the Jews make a bigger deal about hardtack than even the British Navy.

So then, after tens of thousands of years, why is it that so many people suddenly are getting strange dietary problems? Is it just food allergies, or could there be something more to it? In short, could something be going on with our food supply?

Artificial chemicals

Back in the old days, farmers would pull up weeds and kill bugs. However, with availability of huge, GPS-guided combines, labor-intensive techniques aren't as cost-effective. This is especially so with the rise of corporate farming with acreage second only to Soviet collective farms. Pesticides and herbicides have brought down the cost of food, but these can leave residues in the final product. Washing fruits and vegetables is highly recommended, but that doesn't get rid of anything that was soaked up by plants in rainwater. The overuse of chemicals may present health risks for the public.

One very common herbicide that's received some controversy is glyphosate, sold by Monsanto as Roundup. Like other herbicides, you wouldn't want to drink this stuff. As for the possible effects of glyphosate residue, a recent study notes the following:

> Negative impact on the body is insidious and manifests slowly over time as inflammation damages cellular systems throughout the body. Here, we show how interference with CYP enzymes acts synergistically with disruption of the biosynthesis of aromatic amino acids by gut bacteria, as well as impairment in serum sulfate transport. Consequences are most of the diseases and conditions associated with a Western diet, which include gastrointestinal disorders, obesity, diabetes, heart disease, depression, autism, infertility, cancer and Alzheimer's disease. We explain the documented effects of glyphosate and its ability to induce disease, and we show that glyphosate is the "textbook example" of exogenous semiotic entropy: the disruption of homeostasis by environmental toxins.

If the study is right, then glyphosate could be worsening risks of things we've always feared, and lots of conditions that were pretty rare before the 1990s. So this is just one chemical out there—who knows what others might be doing?

Other than that, genetically modified wheat that can tolerate glyphosate isn't ready for prime time, but they're working on it. In fact, some of this experimental stuff was found by chance on a farm in Oregon. Perhaps seeds from one of the many test projects blew around.

Genetically modified corn

Even aliens don't like this stuff.

People with gluten intolerance often switch to corn, but that can have problems of its own. There are many varieties of genetically modified corn, which might be contributing to the problem itself. With plants producing their own pesticides, washing it prior to cooking might not do very much.

Previous studies on rats fed GMO diets were highly controversial, and one was retracted. However, late last year, it was discovered that delta endotoxins aren't broken down normally by the digestive system as previously assumed. This is produced by Monsanto's GMO corn containing bacillus thuringiensis genes. As the abstract describes the effects on the digestive system of rats:

> Specimens from GM-corn fed group showed different forms of structural changes. Focal destruction and loss of the villi leaving denuded mucosal surface alternating with stratified areas were observed, while some crypts appeared totally disrupted. Congested blood capillaries and focal infiltration with mononuclear cells were detected. Significant upregulation of PCNA expression, increase in number of goblet cells and a significant increase in both villous height and crypt depth were detected. Marked ultrastructural changes of some enterocytes with focal loss of the microvillous border were observed. Some enterocytes had vacuolated cytoplasm, swollen mitochondria with disrupted cristae and dilated rough endoplasmic reticulum (rER). Some cells had dark irregular nuclei with abnormally clumped chromatin. It could be concluded that consumption of GM-corn profoundly alters the jejunal histological structure.

Again, this was a rodent study, and maybe human guts can take this better. Ultimately, time will tell; the big experiment is what happens to the public. It's possible this stuff isn't so good for us. Even health food consumers might not be aware of what they're getting.

How bad can GMOs get?

News flash: some bacteria can be harmful

Previously, I thought the controversy about GMOs was overstated. However, my views have changed. It turns out that a genetically modified version of the bacterium klebsiella planticola was close to production. Its purpose was to produce alcohol from agricultural waste, and the leftovers would be used for fertilizer.

Then a team of independent researchers led by Dr. Elaine Ingham ran a safety check, discovering that this GMO bug goes after living plants too and destroys them by producing toxic levels of alcohol. Fortunately, they figured it out before this stuff got released into the biosphere. Why didn't the company's own research department figure this out themselves?

This was pretty basic lab research, comparing a control group of wheat to a batch infused with the natural variety of klebsiella planticola (no problems), and another infused with the GMO version (which all wilted). You'd think that averting a potential global extinction event would be pretty big news, but most people haven't heard about it.

I'm not saying that all GMO products are bad—some might be okay—but this episode demonstrates that problems can happen and better research should be done. When billions in profits are involved, the potential exists for a company's researchers being pressured not to put the brakes on money-making projects.

Tampering with food is older than you think

A hundred years ago, everything was organic. Then in the 1920s, researchers came up with a new food additive: hydrogenated and partially hydrogenated oils, also called trans fats. The benefit was to make liquid oils semi-solid at room temperature. This new vegetable shortening was once considered a healthy alternative to lard. They tested it on pigs to see if they could be fattened on it, but large quantities killed them. It's also considered a preservative, since bacteria can't live on it either, and so it became widely used in junk food. Apparently they thought it was good enough for people.

Eventually, doctors were scratching their heads about a new health problem they hadn't seen before: adult-onset diabetes, which they called "type 2". The original child-onset version (type 1) happens when the pancreas stops producing insulin. Type 2 involves insulin resistance—there's plenty of it, but the body becomes less responsive. This is a common feature in metabolic syndrome.

It took them long enough, but researchers finally started making the connection. Partially hydrogenated oil molecules don't fit into cell membranes well, and it's been implicated in a number of problems including insulin resistance. We might consider obesity as a problem caused by gluttony and lack of discipline, but the crap in our food might be playing a major role. I've had my own struggles, but fortunately I researched it, got wise, and did something about it.

Et enfin

Not what I mean by trans fats, but I'd give this a miss too

"You are what you eat" might be a corny expression, but it's literally true. We might think of the health food fanatics as a bit silly and hipsterish, but they might well have a point.

Read More: Bayer Acquires Most Evil Corporation In The World, Now Has Monopoly On Food Market

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

6 Rules All Expats Should Live By

June 21, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

There are many people, in many parts of the world, living life on their own terms. Away from The Man. Unhitched to a mortgage, career track, or any real obligations.

I'm not saying to uproot your life and move. If you have family, debt, and more—a corporate job will give you the stability you likely need to succeed. That doesn't mean you can't reconsider becoming an American expat down the road.

If you decide this is the life for you, here are six rules you should abide by to make the most of it.

1. Be Realistic With Yourself

To expect to make a million dollars within 6 months while working on a sandy beach in Vietnam is absurd. Be realistic with yourself, depending on where you are coming from.

If you have an established and respected online business, aim to double it's revenue within one year of making it your full-time endeavor. If you have nothing and are going to live off savings, make it your goal to make your expenses within a year—to avoid dipping into those crucial savings.

2. Do A Little, Every Day

Abstract, long-term goals rarely get done. Saying you want to make $10 million dollars is too far out there, most cannot deal with that. That is a huge mountain to climb. Not to mention, no one ever writes how they will do it.

"GOAL: Make $1 million."

Is it ever followed with a plan or a blueprint? Rarely.

But what about making ONE, SINGLE dollar? Far more realistic.

3. Learn To Live With The Haters

There are always going to be people who don't approve of what you're doing. Some of them think it's bad that you like dating abroad versus marrying into the slut culture you've given domestically.

Other people think the finances of the expat are stupid. The only way to wealth is a 401k, a mortgage, and more, they say. While I think office work and 401ks have their places (people with families), to say that it is the only path to success is simply ludicrous.

People will project their own image upon you. Anything that is not their norm is not something that is acceptable to them. Haters will flood your personal life, online persona, and everything in between.

Ignore it all or be dragged into it. There is rarely an in-between.

4. Stop Thinking So Much

Roosh and I mentioned this several times in the podcast we did. Don't think yourself to death over the trivial things..

- Healthcare — get some emergency care and pay cash elsewhere
- ATMs — get a Charles Schwab checking account (they don't charge foreign withdrawal fees and reimburse you if the international bank charges them)
- Visas — do the paperwork, don't break any laws, and you'll be just fine
- Dating — come on, how much worse could it get than Stateside?

There are so many situations, ideas, and crazy things that stop people from setting out what they want to do. This isn't just about travel or the nomad life.

Almost any situation where action is not taken can be derived to a root cause that is probably over-thought. Get out of your own head. Learn to funnel that over-thinking into action-based energy, and you'll be be amazed at the things you can accomplish.

5. Let Things Come To You

You may learn on your travels that what you are able to do for two weeks is not possible for two months and into the future.

Even if you have past travel experience partying and going hard for weeks on end, this may not be sustainable to you over the true long term. It is one thing to go out and party hard for two weeks. In this case, you know you are returning to the corporate world, which is often drab and grey.

It lacks color and character.

Therefore, it is easy to "get it all out" during those two weeks of traveling. When you're an expat, the overseas life is now your new, real life. Forever. To think that you can party every night of the week until the end of time is crazy.

When and how are you going to make money? When are you going to build friendships? When are you going to improve yourself in other aspects?

By all means, have your fun. You should, and need to. See the best nightclubs the world has to offer. Drink a bit too much, and have some nasty hangovers. Nurse them away by drinking more, if you so wish. Date lots and lots of girls.

But don't think that it can go forever. Recognize the differences between the two. After all, if this is "forever"—you've "made it".

6. Give Your Fellow Expats A Chance

Do not think that you do not need them. You need people who are in your actual new home country, who speak the same language fluently, and understand where you are coming from.

If you're an American expat, don't write off fellow Americans just because they are American. Do not think that they are the same people you wanted to escape from when you made the leap in the first place.

In fact, they are often just like you—in many ways. And they can relate to why you did what you did on a much better level than those aforementioned haters.

Yes, you need to also make local friends. People who know the language, have the right connections, and can give you an insight into the culture that you are now coming in to.

But don't disqualify your fellow American expats as friends on the notion that they are American.

If you want to learn how to take advantage of dating in the digital world, check out my book Cracking OkCupid. For advice about escaping American women for greener pastures, check out Eastern European Travel.

Read More: 5 Easy Ways To Earn Free Travel

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

3 Reasons Why Copywriting Is The Perfect Red-Pill Career

June 21, 2017 | by Michael Witcoff | Link | Original Link

If you're still stuck in the 9-5 Slave World that the modern corporatocracy has become for most normal men, you've probably dreamed of a way out of the intolerable mess that most of us are expected to stomach as a "career."

You know what I mean. The world where merit makes no difference, where the most skilled liar and politician gets the promotion… the world where half the people you work with are only there because they fit the right "victim group" to be included in your company's latest "Diversity And Inclusiveness Initiative."

It's a world where even a hint of a joke or comment that might even POTENTIALLY make someone "uncomfortable" gets you called into the office for a chat with the purple-haired HR Manager (who's been itching to fire you since the day you were hired).

“Success” in Slave World means a complete shutdown of your own sense of humor, your own sense of truth, your mind, your soul and your spirit. You must either submit to the prevailing narratives, or be stamped with a Mindcrime and cast onto the streets without a second thought (by people who’ve never even had a first one).

It’s enough to make any man miserable, and the more “awake” he is to the truths of our culture and its intricately fabricated narrative, the more painful the experience will be for him.

In just a moment, I’m going to explain to you the three major reasons why a freelance copywriting career is the “way out“ you’ve been looking for—if you’ve got the will to strike out on your own and the will to hone your craft.

But before I do, I’d like to come clean about something…

This isn’t my first article on Return of Kings. I’ve submitted—and had published—a number of articles on this site (under various pseudonyms) tackling topics everywhere from foreign culture wars to the root of Marxist infestation right here at home.

I then went “underground” for a couple years, stopped writing anything for anyone, and focused entirely on building my own business as a copywriter and internet marketer.

Now that I’ve arrived at my destination, allow me to “send the elevator” back down and give you the three biggest reasons why I encourage you to follow in my footsteps and rediscover what it means to be happy and free in this profoundly disturbed society of ours.

1. It’s A Complete Meritocracy

It doesn't matter what your last name is, it doesn't matter how much money you were born into, it doesn't matter what "certifications" you have, and it doesn't matter where you went to college (if you went at all). My very first copywriting mentor—who spends his time traveling the world and giving workshops—never even made it past 8th grade.

It doesn't matter what your skin color is, it doesn't matter what gender you are, and there are no free bonus points for whining the loudest or being part of any particular demographic.

The one and only thing that matters is whether you can actually write copy that converts. That means either the ads you write turn prospects into customers, or you don't even get the scraps that fall off the table's edge.

You have the "skills that pay the bills" or you don't. It's a loser's nightmare and a winner's dream come true.

Even better, every company on Earth needs effective advertising. You are surrounded by the products and services of various companies right now as you read this—and without effective advertising, you wouldn't have a single one of those things.

I've had clients ranging from dirt-poor (at the beginning of my career) to the multimillionaires I now prefer to work with—and they all need advertising that sells for their companies.

Good ads are the key difference between a company that fails or succeeds—so when you learn to become the provider of the one thing they need most, you become very valuable very quickly… and to a whole lot of people.

That means endless opportunities that are not limited by geography. Just in the past two weeks, I've gotten clients from Canada and the United Kingdom—all while networking with guys in Asia to make money as a team on various projects.

There is no limit to what you can accomplish with the will to achieve and access to the internet.

2. I Make My Own Schedule

Another of my favorite things about copywriting is that there is not one human being on this Earth who gets to dictate how I spend a single second of my day.

I used to hate waking up earlier than I wanted to, spending 20 minutes in traffic to get somewhere I didn't want to be in the first place, and then be told by another man how much of MY time I could spend eating lunch.

I always felt like a slave. It made me depressed, hopeless, and endlessly pessimistic about my own future happiness.

I know there are people who like to have their lives measured out by someone else simply because it makes things easier for them. Most people are like that. But I'm not one of them, and I don't think most ROK readers are either.

Most of the time, I wake up when my body feels ready to wake up. Unless I have a client call scheduled for the morning—which I usually avoid doing—I don't use an alarm clock at all.

I then go to the gym or use my awesome bike-desk for 30-60 minutes, make a healthy smoothie, and start working precisely when I feel like it. Then I work and take breaks according to the schedule which best suits me and my own internal rhythm.

Sometimes I'm still up working at 4 in the morning—so I just wake up at noon the next day to make sure I get 8 hours of sleep. It doesn't matter.

I can't be late for anything, because no man besides myself decides my schedule.

3. I Have As Much Time As I Want To Pursue My Hobbies

I'm not one of those people who's going to work 16 hour days for a decade just to "get rich."

I'm far more interested in spiritual growth and the expansion of my mind than fancy cars, and so most of my free time is spent studying theology and philosophy. Since being Saved last year from a decade of debauchery and hedonism, I've found no worldly task more fulfilling than contemplating (and deepening) my relationship with God.

I never had time to pursue this line of thought back when I was numbing myself with drugs and sex just to make it another day in Slave World, and it's added irreplaceable value and comfort to my life.

I can read books, write articles for my blog, finish client projects, pray, and advance my career all in a comfortable rhythm every day. I have tasted the fruits of freedom, and I will never go back.

I gave myself three years to build this freedom lifestyle, and I did it in just over two. If I could do it, you can too. But only if you choose to join me.

Read More: 5 Reasons Not To Make Retail Your Career

Michael Witcoff
Michael is a Christian, a copywriter, an author, and a marketing consultant. He believes the West is experiencing divine wrath for turning our backs on God, and that the only hope for salvation is to unite under one faithful banner as our enemies have under theirs.

6 Examples Of How Disney Is Brainwashing Young Girls To Be Feminist Slaves

June 22, 2017 | by Ryan Ashville | Link | Original Link

In 1937, the Walt Disney Studios released its first fully animated film, Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, and pioneered a new form of family entertainment. Disney didn't have a reputation for being feminism friendly; what with all the waiting for Prince Charming in their earlier movies. But recently they have been more open about feminism and made sure to remove traditional elements into their movies.

The release of Snow White came on February 4, 1938. Then Cinderella in the 1950's, where a kind, obedient, well-disciplined woman wanted to marry the prince of her dreams. They had made a movie on Robin Hood, a man that followed masculine roles, which wouldn't be remade in the same way today.

Traditional gender roles are what nature assigned to humans, but breaking that provides excitement to women, despite them not being able to do well as men in many fields of work. The media has blasted a heavy image of "girl power" into young girls minds, and are programming them to believe in this fantasy. Here are a few prominent examples of Disney's brainwashing efforts…

Mulan

Mulan did not want to be a pretty geisha, nor did she want to have a “skinny waist and obedience that men like”, so she chopped her hair short and joined the military

One of the very first feminist Disney movie I watched was Mulan, a 1998 animated film produced by Walt Disney Feature Animation based on the Chinese legend of Hua Mulan. The plot takes place during the Han dynasty, where Fa Mulan, the tomboy daughter of aged warrior Fa Zhou, impersonates a man to take her father’s place during a general conscription to counter a Hun invasion.

In its earliest stages, the story was originally conceived as a cute romantic comedy film where Mulan, who was a daughter that loves her father, is betrothed to Shang, whom she has not met. On her betrothal day, her father Fa Zhou carves her destiny on a stone tablet in the family temple, which she shatters in anger, running away to forge her own destiny. Disney changed the original to make Mulan more feminist and empowered.

When I first saw the movie as a child, I couldn’t wrap my mind around how a woman who quit the most important position in her life had a movie based on her. They put her up on a pedestal for having a vagina? I don’t think that it should be considered “progressive” at all.

Rotten Tomatoes gives it a rating of 86%, with an average rating of 7.5/10. The site’s consensus reads, “Exploring themes of family duty and honor, Mulan breaks new ground as a Disney film.”

Frozen

Frozen took over a billion dollars at the global box office, and is the most successful animated movie of all time, winning a Golden Globe for the best animated film.

Disney's animated smash hit Frozen has been accused of spreading anti-male propaganda by a US news host. Steve Doocy slammed the film for its lack of strong male characters during an early morning talk show. He claimed that the movie empowered its female fans by turning men into 'fools and villains.'

The show reportedly showed a clip from the movie of good guy Kristoff discussing picking his nose and another of villain Prince Hans confessing his evil plan.

'They depict men as evil and cold and bumblers," Ms Young Nance said on the show KSDK,com reported.

"It's not just Disney. It's Hollywood in general that has often sent the message that men are superfluous, they're stupid, they're in the way, if they contribute anything to the family, it's a paycheck."

As much as you may hate to believe, these accusations are correct. Men are depicted as ATM machines and nothing more.

Brave

Merida does not want to get married and perfers to remain a tomboy

Brave premiered on June 10, 2012, at the Seattle International Film Festival, and was released in North America on June 22, 2012, to both positive reviews and box office success. The film won the Academy Award, the Golden Globe, and the BAFTA Award for Best Animated Feature Film. Preceding the feature theatrically was a short film entitled La Luna, directed by Enrico Casarosa.

Brave is a story about Merida, a young princess who doesn't fit in with the world around her. Her passion is to fight and she's incredibly good at archery, while her mother wants her to get married and follow traditional gender roles.

The movie received critics from A Voice For Men and MRA Reddit. The only real male character, her father, was portrayed decently, considering he was given the "stodgy old guard" ball to hold, but he checked off the feminist wishlist by stopping his "control" over his daughter so she can take on the behavior of males.

Moana

The film tells the story of Moana, the strong-willed daughter of the chief in a Polynesian tribe, who is chosen by the ocean itself to reunite a mystical relic with a goddess. When a blight strikes her island, Moana sets sail in search of Maui, a legendary demigod, in the hope of saving her people.

Variety proclaimed that Moana, which grossed $300 million to date, "Is Just the Latest Feminist, Progressive Disney Hit' to reflect "the changing face of the moviegoing public."

"In another feminist twist, Moana is one of the first animated films not to feature a love story. Her journey is about finding herself, not landing a husband."
Bustle describes Moana as "The Hero That Every Little Girl Deserves For Generations to Come."

The only male characters in the movie are the father and Maui. The father again, is the overbearing, controlling dad who will not let Moana get in the ocean water or go past a certain part. Maui, the demigod, is impulsive, crazy, initially mean, and thinks only of himself and how others can praise him.

He slowly comes around to trying to sacrifice for humanity, but he doesn't save the world, Moana does. His actions are just a small help to her and she could probably have done it all without him. His only contribution is to show her how to sail. Then he leaves and sometimes flies over her as she sails with her family. The males take a backseat of modern Disney again to this "strong" female character.

The Princess and the Frog

The movie is the story of a young, African-American woman, Tiana, who lives in New Orleans. She dreamed about owning her own restaurant named Tiana's Palace. She works multiple jobs and saves money in cans in order to buy the old sugar mill in her neighborhood and turn it into her beloved restaurant.

Unfortunately, she is told that another man has put in a higher bid and she is given only a couple more days to come up with extra money in order to outbid the unknown gentleman. The now depressed Tiana showed up to a ball and ends up kissing a talking frog that claims to be Prince Naveen, who was turned into a frog by an evil voodoo man. Instead of turning the frog back into the Prince, Tiana is turned into a frog herself.

Tiana's father performs the more feminine role and her mother, even though she is a seamstress, is shown performing the more masculine role. At six-years-old, Tiana shows her dislike for fairy tales and stories where a man saves the woman. She's a close friend of a blonde white princess who has more traditional views of femininity and female roles, but who is ultimately portrayed as stupid because she believes a woman should want marriage.

While Tiana and the prince are in frog form, Prince Naveen is constantly shown to be much weaker and incredibly stupider than Tiana. It is Tiana who saves Prince Naveen from being eaten by alligators. She also makes a raft for them to escape down a river.

Beauty and the Beast (2017)

New Beauty and the Beast with a feminist twist

Disney has announced that the new “Beauty and the Beast” film will add a subplot that definitely was not in the original. Specifically, one of the male characters will “explore his sexuality” throughout the movie, leading to, as the director describes it, a “delicious payoff” where the character will engage in an “exclusively gay moment.”

The director says that the gay character, LeFou, develops a crush on another male character, leading to a dynamic where “one day LeFou wants to be Gaston and on another day wants to kiss Gaston.” That’s weird and perverse on several levels for a kids movie. The director of “Beauty and the Beast” has been clear that one of his intentions is to normalize homosexuality.

As I’ve read on A Voice For Men:

> If we remove the fantasy and the characters, and look at it purely in terms of actions, then we are met with this path of characterization.
>
> 1: Horrible, evil masculine male who cannot control himself (Villain)
>
> After meeting a woman he becomes:
>
> 2: Possibly a redeemable person, he has a few feminine traits
>
> After changing to suit a woman he is:
>
> 3: A victim in need of love and affection to limit his masculine traits and become a feminized person, thus entering the stage of being worthy of society.

A man is only acceptable when he gives up his masculinity. When a woman enters his life, it makes him ashamed about his manliness, and thus again, another one of those feminist propaganda. This is a very common theme even in so-called masculine movies like Thor.

Conclusion

Any animated film made within the past 25 years with a female protagonist is going to reinforce modern female opinions and prejudices:

- Men = evil, stupid
- Women = human and intelligent
- Adults = clueless
- Pretty princesses = breaks rules
- Non-white Princess = more empowered than pretty white princesses around her

As time has passed, Disney has gotten much more pressured with their portrayals of women. Long gone are the beautiful realistic women of the Cinderellas and Auroras, who lack any agency and must depend on men to get them out of trouble.

Today's Disney female characters are, however subconsciously, instilling in young girls the idea that you can be empowered, fight your own battles, and create your own happy ending without the help of a man. They also teach girls that men should believe that their life is complete only with a woman. We cannot discount the effect this propaganda is having on today's girls, and how it is sure to lead to more feminist degeneracy in the future.

Read Next: The New Star Wars Movie Spinoff Reaffirms Disney's Hatred Of White Males

Ryan Ashville
I'm a heterosexual anti-feminist and a conservative male. A frequent news watcher and I dedicate my findings to various MRA sites and anti-feminist authors. I enjoy swimming, hiking, observing mainstream entertainment and masculine literature.

How White Europeans Contributed To African Cultural Identity And Dignity

June 22, 2017 | by Narmer Bull | Link | Original Link

It may seem a characteristic of modern times, but not all of our experiences as historical beings needs to be reduced to a good guy bad guy narrative. Facts can be accepted for what they are, without the intention to profit from their ideological utility. On 16 March 2017, Hellen Zille, a white South African politician, publicly shared her personal opinion on colonization.

According to local media, Black South Africans were offended by the protean politician's myopic inner thoughts. It's difficult not to acknowledge her opinion as fact based. Those migrants who left Europe to find a new home in Africa didn't coincidentally arrive at the exact time indigenous people were about to start building modern urban infrastructure. They brought that aspect of their culture with them.

But it's not the apparent positives of that fact that has, by consensus, offended our majority. It's the ideological implication of that cultural enrichment. That is, we would have to accept that the big bad white man made a positive contribution to black cultural identity and dignity.

I'm not going to consider the beneficence of facts for any agenda. I will however elucidate the most significant cultural contribution European migration made to human dignity.

Contrived Black African Identity, Dignity and Power

Archaeology confirms that there were farmers, states and civilizations in Africa before colonization. In southern Africa we had Mapungubwe and Great Zimbabwe. In West Africa there was Jenne-Jeno and Kuombi Saleh. In East Africa, Manda and Kilwa. In the North there was ancient Egypt and in the Northeast Kush, Meroe and Aksum. All were complex and well organized urban centers to be proud of. But since we are inclined to manipulate historical facts for ideological benefit, Egypt took pride of place.

A while back, the Black Athena Hypothesis provided a new story about ancient Egypt. Basically it contended that black Africa inspired the development of the state, and by extension, the whole of Western civilization. This hypothesis along with its derivative ideas, movements and memes doesn't even attempt to conceal prejudice in an argument and blatantly stereotyped European societies as cultural appropriators. But despite obvious historical flaws, it continues to provide a cultural identity that anyone of black African descent can be proud of.

African dignity for sale.

The fundamental contribution that Egypt makes to African dignity is its long tradition of intellectual inquiry. It proves that long before the Greeks and Romans, Africa had already progressed beyond a primitive lifestyle. With the contention that white European thinkers may have been influenced by an African intellectual tradition, the cultural appropriation stereotype is validated and manifests as political gold for the Afrocentric will to power.

Factual Pre-Colonial African Civilization

If one were to hold ancient Egypt as the crown jewel of African pride we must acknowledge a few idiosyncrasies. Egyptian civilization was an indigenous development restricted to the confines of the Nile valley. There is very little reason to believe they were anything other than of Mediterranean stock.

They did have occasional contact with black African Kingdoms but, as evidenced by the chronology of those sites, contact was late and mostly commercial. Their conservative intellect also did not produce much regarding speculations on nature and the universe. So despite their 3000-year history they had an imagination that was ossified in a rigid universe.

A static universe arranged according to personal desires and moral ideals.

Rigid orthodoxy meant that Egyptian — and by extension, early African thought — was enslaved by religious, economic and political dogma for thousands of years before the arrival of Europeans. Clever and prosperous as they were, early African societies just could not break out of the intellectual inhibitions their enchanted worldview had created.

For instance, if the ancient African erudite were presented with a mathematical problem when building, he would refer to previously documented rules of thumb for solutions. Over millennia, theoretical generalizations for universal application never occurred to them.

European societies didn’t invent the ideas and cultural patterns on which civilization is built. They developed a taste for these from the ancient near east with a major contribution from Egypt. But they were also not limited to appropriation or subjugation. In fact, they are responsible for the opposite. They invented intellectual freedom.

Releasing the mind from rigid orthodoxy.

European Contact and Influence

Afrocentrists are eager to declare that Thales of Melitus was influenced by Egyptian priests — the intellectuals of their culture. This is not improbable as he is thought to have traveled and visited Egypt. Consequently, one could make the case that the Milesian school was created by Egyptian contact with the Greek mind.

However, the ideas about the universe from the Milesian school show very little intrusion of anthropomorphic desires and moral ideas, two elements that characterized Egyptian thought. That is to say, the Milesian thinkers were the first to attempt to disenchant the natural world. There is no evidence of this tendency in pre-Greek influenced Egyptian speculations and they certainly were not just about to invent it when Thales showed up.

For the first scientific hypotheses and the subsequent evolution of philosophy to have come from the Greek mind rather than Egyptian is not unusual. Unlike the Egyptians, Greeks conceived of capricious gods. The random blessing and cursing would have created the need to intellectually empower humanity against such a volatile status-quo. The settled, stable and mystically manipulated supernatural universe of the African state provided no stimulus to release humanity from the comforts of orthodoxy.

Conclusion

The European contribution to African dignity was much more impactful than colonialism, and cannot be exaggerated enough. It was a contribution to humanity. It was freedom from the shackles of dogma and propaganda. This intellectual freedom gave us the ability to think about our world beyond the limits of learned responses. It provided the opportunity to solve old problems with new solutions and the possibility to be factual and rational when we are emotionally inclined to be offended.

Scarred or enriched?We won't know until we open our eyes.

African identity and dignity was formed by multiple contributors. When we consider the European contribution to be a scar, it has to be deep, one that has inextricably linked us to the complete human experience through a mechanistic universe which ultimately provided the social media platforms we now have to express our modern self-centered opinions.

Read More: Black Or African-American?

Narmer Bull
A coloured South African, and student of the ancient near east.

4 Ways To Boost Your Physical And Mental Well-Being

June 22, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Biology Boost.

Sometimes, the simple things in life work. While there are plenty of fancy products of both the physical and informational variety out there, all designed to better your life—the fact of the matter is that humans have survived for thousands of years without them.

While everyone is on a quest (well, except fat and ugly feminists) to become the best they can be from a physical and mental state, sometimes it's easy to get overwhelmed with information. Sometimes you just need to get back to the basics.

Instead of relying on all of the fancy things to improve yourself, go back to the basics and then use the newer methods to boost yourself even further.

Here are 4 simple ways to improve both your physical and mental well-being that are easy to implement in your everyday life.

1. Move, Even If A Little

A refreshing morning walk, even if it's only for 10 or 15 minutes, can wake you up and provide mental clarity for the remainder of your day. Doing 100 push-ups or a dozen pull-ups upon waking up will give you a great boost of energy.

Would a coffee company tell you this? Absolutely not.

Now, before I throw coffee under the bus, let me be clear—I love the stuff and drink it often. However, there are alternative methods.

Small amounts of exercise can give you the jump-start your day needs instead of relying on consumer products to get you going. Use those products to give you an additional boost on top of what nature has given you, instead of being 100% dependent on them.

2. Give Yoga Or Simple Stretching A Chance For Chronic Pain

If you're suffering from chronic pain, simple stretches, taking up yoga can absolutely improve your life. Human beings were not meant to spend the majority of their days in front of a screen, sitting down and immobile.

It's terrible for your neck, wrists, back, eyes, etc.—just about every part of your body. Hell, plenty of companies actually employ "ergonomic specialists" who come around and measure your desk height, wrist placement, and more. If you're lucky, the company will pay for some nicer equipment (good chair, standing desk, etc.).

If you're unlucky, you may be stuck dealing with the stiffness and/or pain on your own. I've known so many people who are just in an endless feedback loop with chronic pain, even if they're totally healthy otherwise. They see multiple doctors and specialists, and yet nothing ever seems to get solved.

Of course, no professional medical provider would ever tell you something like this—they'd rather bill you for three sessions with a chiropractor every week. They're the same people who recommend you buy the expensive, padded shoes instead of trying something minimalist.

Try downloading any random yoga or stretching app on your phone (or just browse YouTube).

3. Don't Listen To Any Ads

The other day, I saw a commercial for Cheerios Protein and how good it was for you. I couldn't help but chuckle. Here you have processed food, shoved into a box where it will last for longer than I'd care to know—and it's recommended by all sorts of people as a healthy breakfast alternative.

Meanwhile, in recent years it's been made to seem that your basic egg breakfast sound like the devil.

> Cholesterol will kill you! Eggs cause cholesterol! Don't eat them!

While the general message on eggs seems to be backtracking, almost anything can be spun to seem like a healthy alternative. You can apply this logic to just about any product on the market. It's all in the ads.

A good rule of thumb to follow is this: does it come from the Earth, or from a factory?

It sounds hippy-ish, but it's true. Look, if the workers in the plant have to wear a mask during production…

4. Recognize That One Size Does Not Fit All

The fitness and general self-improvement community goes through phases, depending on what's new and of course—what's actually putting money into people's pockets.

Some fitness gurus, Instagram models, etc. change their diet, programs, and complete way of life on a month-to-month basis—depending on which company is paying their rent that month.

If you want to truly hit high levels of both athletic and mental performance, you're going to have to try things out and see what works for you.

Some people love zero carb diets because it melts the fat away and they feel great. Other people on the same program end up lacking any punch in the gym from a lack of carbs.

Many entrepreneurs are huge fans of intermittent fasting combined with cognitive enhancers you see in the movies. Other people are conked out by 10am if they don't get some breakfast into them.

The point is, you're going to have to try things on your own, log the results, and experiment. The same applies to almost any walk of life—no two businesses are built the same—are they?

Or you could just ignore all of this and buy a ton of Kratom. (Couldn't resist.)

Jokes aside, it's going to mean being uncomfortable at points as you fine-tune both your body and mind. Accept it for what it is—part of the journey. Try some of these more "natural" methods of improving yourself, and then boost up with the help of supplements, nootropics, and higher-end programs. Click here if you'd like to boost your life.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

How To Deploy Your Folding Knife During A Life-Threatening Attack

June 22, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

Note: The following information is provided for your knowledge only. Although everyone has a right to self-defense, it is incumbent on you to know the self-defense laws in your area if you ever have to physically protect yourself or others. Furthermore, a knife should only be used in self-defense when you, or someone else, is at risk of death or serious bodily harm. As such, use this information at your own risk.

In my last article "It's Time You Get a Proper Folding Knife", the various attributes and characteristics of an ideal folding knife were discussed. In this present article, it is now time to articulate when to use a folding knife. And by this, I do not mean the obvious idea of when to use a folder for standard cutting tasks, but rather, I am speaking of when to use a folding knife for your own personal protection.

After all, when life and limb are on the line, it is critical to know when to deploy that blade in your pocket; otherwise, it's just a glorified paperweight. So, let's get started.

Not a Fantasy Knife-Fight

A knife fight will not be like this.

The first thing to understand about using a knife for self-defense is that doing so will not be a pretty thing. Whether you are the one doing the cutting, or the one getting cut—or most likely both—any altercation with a blade will be brutal, bloody, and bestial.

This is not some fantasy duel where you are tossing your knife from hand-to-hand as you parry and jab with your opponent, just waiting for the perfect moment to execute that Jet Li triple-strike. No, instead, any real knife-fight will likely involve shock, surprise, and serious unpleasantness. You likely won't even see your opponent's knife until you have been stabbed with it a few times. This won't be like the movies; instead, it will be a life-and-death struggle the likes of which few modern humans have ever been involved in.

So, given all of the above, please realize that the very first rule of knife-fighting is this: avoid any knife-fight if you can. Run, swim, or jump if you have to, but in the end, do whatever you can to avoid battling a blade. And if you cannot avoid some guy with a knife then shoot the prick. That is the second rule of knife-fighting. However, if you have no gun, then the third rule of knife-fighting is to know when to use your own folder. And, ultimately, there are only two ways to deploy your folding knife: reactively and proactively.

Reactive Knife Deployment

Know that if you are faced with a knife-wielding opponent who has already deployed his own blade and is coming after you, then it will be quite difficult to have the time to deploy your own folder in response. However, while this will be difficult, it is not impossible, for there are a number of circumstances where reacting with your own blade is a perfectly reasonable response.

First, consider that there are individuals who have become so quick with deploying their own folding knife that they can draw it and open it as fast as they could draw a pistol. Now, doing so takes a great deal of practice, but nevertheless, if you are a knife enthusiast, and if you practice so much that you could draw your folder in a split second, it might be entirely appropriate for you to draw and use your own knife if you are suddenly faced with a close-range blade-wielding opponent.

For other people, empty-handed self-defense techniques might be preferable in such circumstances given that you will likely get stabbed repeatedly while fumbling about for your own knife. So, know your own level of skill and only reactively deploy your folder if you know that you can do so.

Second, if you are attacked by a knife-wielding individual, and if you are able to turn and run from the assailant for a short period of time, this will give you the few precious moments that you need to draw and ready your own folder just in case you cannot run far or fast enough. After all, when facing a knife, better to have your own knife then to have no knife at all.

Third, if you happen to be fighting against an enemy with a knife (or another lethal weapon), and if—God forbid—you happen to find yourself grappling and wrestling with such an opponent, then this might give you a moment to react and draw your own folder to end the struggle while in that grappling situation. Again, this won't be pretty, but better that he is stabbed than you.

Not a bad time to grab your blade and stick it in his leg.

So, even when faced with a knife-wielding opponent, there are certain circumstances when you can effectively react with your own knife, even if doing so might be difficult under such conditions.

Proactive Knife Deployment

Although it is possible to effectively react with your folder, the fact is that a folding knife is even better in a proactive role. By this I mean that, in certain situations, it is possible to preemptively deploy your folding knife in preparation for use in a self defense scenario.

For example, if you ever find yourself in the wrong part of a city, suddenly being approached by a gang of rather feral-looking youths, then it is perfectly sensible, in such a situation, to preemptively deploy your folder in preparation for a confrontation. Of course, you will conceal your folder and not let them know that you have it deployed, but it will be ready nonetheless.

If the gang leaves you alone, then so much the better, but at least you were prepared. Note as well that this course of action would be quite legal because if the gang attacks you, then it would be easy to articulate why you felt the need to use your folding knife to protect yourself in this drastically outnumbered situation given that your life was arguably at risk. Note as well that such reasoning would also apply if a very small (or elderly) man was facing a much larger and more youthful opponent.

Second, and similar to the first scenario, if you are on the wrong side of the tracks and are facing one unarmed individual who looks like he is going to cause you some trouble, feel free to get your knife ready as well. However, don't open it, as using the blade could be construed as using lethal force in a situation that did not warrant it.

Instead, just have the knife in a tight grip with the bottom of the knife just slightly beyond the bottom of your closed fist. Then, if attacked, feel free to rain hammer blows down on your assailant with the bottom end of the knife giving your blows a little extra "bite". This way, you stay within the bounds of the law, but you nevertheless gain an advantage over your unarmed attacker.

Finally, in countries where gun ownership is difficult, having a knife for proactive home-defense is also a must—although, in the case of home-defense, I would recommend a short sword or kukri, not just a knife. Either way though, when you hear that bump in the night, never get out of bed until your hand has closed around the grip of your bedside folder.

A little something for home defense when your handgun misfires.

Conclusion

In the end, knife-fighting is not a game, nor is it something that you want to engage in. Avoid a knife-fight if at all possible and shoot the bastard if you can't. But when all else fails, better to know when to reactively or proactively use your own folder if circumstances force you to do so. So be ready. Fight like a beast. And win.

Read More: It's Time You Get a Proper Folding Knife

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

8 Essential Tips For Girls Who Are Fat

June 23, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

The other day I received news about one of my beta friend's girlfriend, a nasty, spiteful, ignorant woman who convinced my friend to blacklist me because I was "evil" (read: telling my friend in her presence that he could score prettier girls and should dump her) and a "rapist" (read: I was not shy about my taste for bedding attractive, feminine, submissive girls using aggressive game).

That girl was obese but her face was quite homely and she would have been cute if she did not look like a flesh balloon. The bitterness of her obesity made her a hag, so she got a gastric bypass (sport and a good diet were really too much to ask) and finally lost the extra pounds.

But it appears that she still has the same terrible attitude and even after I and the taxpayer paid for her operation, not an ounce of humility came out of it. She is slimmer now but she will always remain a fat bitch in my eyes.

I am convinced that she would have been humbled if she actually had to work hard to lose weight. So here are my two cents on how fat girls can avoid this situation and transition into a slimmer, happier life.

1. Compensate with other qualities

Being nice is paramount. In the same given situation, people will be less patient and understanding if you are fat. They might give you a pass if you are attractive.

Stop arguing, stop being defiant or snarky. Be normal, humble and patient. Make it a priority to be genuinely kind. Without being stupidly friendly, don’t let the rage created by your ugliness translate to other people.

Be a good homemaker. Know how to cook and receive guests. Take care of yourself and your home. Be reasonably clever and well-behaved in society. Be helpful and do good around you.

2. Be realistic about the situation

Get your goals in order about how much weight you want to lose and be disciplined about it. Know that if you are beyond a certain point of obesity, even heavy surgery and extreme diet and exercise won't give you back the body you were given before you chose to destroy it.

Scars, excess skin, and squishy flesh might be your future if you don't do it right. For desperate cases, progressive fat loss over the years should be the solution so skin has the time to shrink.

3. Do more exercise and eat better

Practice physical activity aimed at fat loss while keeping a reasonable amount of muscle. Start high-intensity training involving compound exercises and cardio at least three times a week while following a low-carb, low-sugar and high protein diet such as the Keto or Paleo diet.

While I despise people who are overweight and do nothing about it, I respect those who make the effort and genuinely want to change, so don't get into a gym class if you can't stick to it. There's no point doing five minutes of elliptic trainer if forty minutes are spent talking to other girls around the machine. Make fitness an essential part of your lifestyle so exercise becomes natural.

4. Stop consuming the mainstream media

The MSM is not your friend or here to help. It is here to make you feel good despite your situation and consume even more. Get off social media where random people on the Internet and your liberal friends will tell you that you are beautiful so they can have their little buzz of virtue signalling before going back to mocking you. You need to be in a mental state of isolation to focus on what you have to do.

Stop reading feminist blogs and believing in fables like the "fat acceptance" or "body positive" trends. Men want pretty, thin women. It has always and always will be true.

If you need, use alternative media and inspirational stories for your motivation, within reason.

5. Accept that it is your fault if you are fat.

Beauty standards have not changed. It is not your bad genetics or the patriarchy that force you to eat more calories than you spend. You alone are guilty of stuffing your face while having a sedentary lifestyle and not exercising enough.

Despite what Cosmo and Dove might tell you, you are not beautiful. You send an image of poor health, lack of will and laziness. You are destroying the body that was given to you, an amazingly complex and effective machine that was forged out of millions of years of evolution, and you bear sole responsibility for destroying it.

6. Stop being sluts

By the way that is the fat girl known as Trigglypuff

I slept with a few fat girls in my blue pill days. Never sober or with ones fatter than Amy Schumer, but I felt great shame the next morning. They probably felt all right as they had the confirmation that they could score despite their fatness. It did not do a service to anyone, her or me. Betas just see overweight girls as low hanging fruits or the promise of a sexual release that would save them of their incel misery.

If you are single, focus on the issue at hand. If you are with a man, stay with him. If he leaves, let him go but don't look for another one. When you are slim, find one good man, marry him and have children.

7. Prevent further damage

We might want to have sex with a fitness model even if she has blue hair and tattoos (even if the law of red flags specifically remind us not to), because her body and face match universal beauty standards but a fat girl can't pull that off.

Do not get any shitty tattoos, body modifications or a short haircut. You are already unattractive as it is. Get rid of your tattoos, remove piercings not located in your ear lobe and grow you hair below shoulder length at the very least and keep on growing it.

About the haircut, go for something nice and classic. No shaving or experimental stuff. If you did a stupid choice and dyed your hair in any other colour than something that exists in nature, dye it back to a natural shade.

8. Stop eating or drinking out

Cook in. It is cheaper and will teach you a useful skill. If you miss social interaction, invite your friends for dinner or visit them at their place. Stop drinking alcohol or go out at night where they serve alcohol. The only liquid that you should ingest is water. You have a mission, don't get tempted to relapse.

Il n'y a plus qu'à s'y mettre

I sincerely hope that this article will spread and give some needed tough truth for heavy girls in denial. I am just putting it out there even if I know that reason and facts are not appealing to women.

As much of the heathen bastard that I can be, I still wish healthier relationships between men and women and even if only one girl successfully slims down and lives a happier life after reading this, I reached my goal. Some may ask me if I have similar advice for fat men. I do: you are an adult man. Deal with it alone.

Read More: 10 Steps To Stop Being A Fatass

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Liberal Reign Of Terror Is Coming To An End

June 23, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Liberals like to prance around like they're large and in charge of modern American society. Since long before the long, hot summer of 2016 when they burned down cities, to the early days of the Trump presidency in which they've been doing their best to create a modern witch trial with the Much Ado About Russia narrative, shitlibs have been figuratively poking a tiger in the eye with a stick and getting away with it. They've had incredible luck so far. But could that luck be about to run out?

Radical libs instigating the populace who live outside major cities never take the time to look in the mirror and realize they aren't ready for a duel, as they are not the tigers they consider themselves to be. They're nothing more than paper tigers playing with gasoline and fire. Let's analyze modern liberalism as we size up our hammer and sickle wielding enemies.

Intolerance

Ironically, Tim Allen had his popular ABC series canceled after discussing liberal tolerance

in Hollywood. CMT could soon revive it

Modern shitlibs are a case study in psychological projection. Liberals project onto conservatives everything they hate but have become, only in reverse. They're intolerant Christophobes. They're anti-male. They're anti-white. They're anti-family. In other words, they're little more than a hate group for traditional American and European men and tradition.

They're the inverse of everything they see wrong with the world, but every bit as intolerant as the boogeymen they scorn. Liberals are no longer live and let live, they're live and try to kill anyone that doesn't want to live like us.

What's particularly hilarious about the mental illness known as liberalism is watching their hypocrisy in action. For example, I passed through a New York restaurant over the weekend. I watched a white girl with technicolor hair bend over backwards to kiss the behind of a female Muslim wearing a head scarf as if she was a sacred cow. What? Doesn't this "oppressed" woman represent everything the pink-haired freak is supposed to hate? Aren't white girls like her supposed to be against patriarchy? Oh, that's right: it's only bad if the evil white boogeyman does it. Brown people can still be patriarchal.

Beyond liberals failing to realize the duplicity of their own narratives, Tim Allen spoke out about what it's like living in "tolerant" Hollyweird and later, appropriately enough, had his popular comedy series unexpectedly cancelled by ABC. He told court jester Jimmy Kimmel:

> You've gotta be real careful around here. You get beat up if you don't believe what everybody believes. This is like '30s Germany. I don't know what happened. If you're not part of the group, you know, "What we believe is right…"

Allen followed with:

> I go, well I go I might have a problem with that.

Allen was shit-canned soon after for not adhering to the doxy of uber-liberal, politically correct ABC.

Liberals use political correctness to put conservatives into a straitjacket, one the right is increasingly refusing to be on as Tim Allen illustrates. These neo-fascists believe their worldview is the only correct worldview, and are becoming increasingly hostile to those who refuse to go along with their Utopian, Socialist fantasies.

They are the fascists they accuse the right of being, as elucidated by Jonah Goldberg in his book Liberal Fascism. Since they have no God to worship, they worship the state. Goldberg gives us insight into leftist myopia:

> Fascism is a religion of the state. It assumes the organic unity of the body politic and longs for a national leader attuned to the will of the people. It is totalitarian in that it views everything as political and holds that any action by the state is justified to achieve the common good. It takes responsibility for all aspects of life, including our health and well-being, and seeks to impose uniformity of thought > and action, whether by force or through regulation and social pressure.

>
> Everything, including the economy and religion, must be aligned with its objectives. Any rival identity is part of the "problem" and therefore defined as the enemy. Contemporary American liberalism embodies all of these aspects of fascism.

Intolerant liberals want to use the power of the state to crush every ideal they don't agree with. They also want to turn the state into the legislative and executive branches of government into a figurative mommy and daddy.

Weakness and degeneracy

A shitlib protester receiving a wedgie on the Berkeley campus is only the beginning of what's to come if libs continue riling conservatives

Make no mistake, modern liberalism is a creed based almost entirely on weakness. It derives from an r-selected human environment, one created by K-selected conservatives. The biological r/K selection process morphing into the modern political process is detailed in the book The Evolutionary Psychology Behind Politics.

> The r-strategy is designed to exploit an environment where resources are freely available, everywhere.

A clusterfuck ensues once resources become available to unfit members of society who can obtain them from the producers by using the force of the state.

> In r-selection, [the fittest members of society] will be out-reproduced by pacifists, who simply focus upon eating, and reproducing… This environment will favor a tendency towards conflict avoidance, and tend to cull the aggressive and competitive. It will also evolve tendencies towards mating as early as possible, as often as possible, with as many mates as possible, while investing as little effort as possible rearing offspring. Here, there are unlimited resources just waiting to be utilized, and even the most unfit can acquire them.

Now we know why there are fat slobs, cock-carouseling women, single moms, and sorry asses everywhere in modern America. They're r-selected humans taking advantage of a free ride as they swipe out with their EBT card and take it home to their Section 8 housing.

Of course, when resources are freely available, the weakest members of society begin to overpopulate and crowd out the stronger members of society. We can witness this with the current maker vs. taker paradigm in the American economy, in which makers are worked up to 70 hours a week in increasingly shittier jobs with lower pay and vanishing benefits (often sacrificing forming their own families) to support the welfare class and women with five kids by five different dads.

One might ask: How does America still have negative population growth if r-selection leads to people breeding like rabbits? The answer is sickeningly simple. Abortion. Today, and every day, roughly the same number of deaths that occurred in the World Trade Center on 9/11 will happen in abortion clinics.

Over 43 million children have been aborted since Roe v. Wade in 1973, which is the equivalent to the population of Spain, South Korea, or Colombia disappearing from the face of the earth in just two generations. Abortion deaths also eclipse the 1.1 million war deaths of all American soldiers since the nation was founded in 1776. So, while liberals are indeed breeding like rabbits, they're killing their offspring just as quickly thanks to the deft and bloody hand of social engineers who saw this juggernaut coming.

Cleaning house

When the time to clean house arrives, liberals will know it

They've had a nice run. But there are signals the liberal reign of terror will be coming to an end. Conservatives are increasingly taking a "don't give a fuck" stance when it comes to liberal labeling, name-calling, and other games they play to try and keep the right in line. The election of Donald Trump to office (as much of a disappointment he is turning out to be to many) was the first sign that liberal narratives and media manlets have lost their influence.

Another, amusing sign the tables are beginning to turn happened on the campus of the University of California at Berkeley, where the scarf-wearing Antifa group was humiliated by a group of Trump supporters. Heatstreet wrote:

> In Berkeley a pro-Trump "free speech" protest was also held by members of various factions like Proud Boys and the alt-right. The two rallies quickly > converged and turned into a bloody street brawl between anti fascist leftists and Trump supporters, which resulted in 23 arrests.

>
> The Trump supporters are declaring victory after they managed to push the Antifas back and bust some heads in.

When the time comes, the leftists who think they have run of the place are in for some more unpleasant surprises. It takes a long time to rile the true, K-selected tigers on the right. But when the claws finally reach out at them, the paper tigers will quickly realize it wasn't such a good idea to provoke the men who are the backbone of society.

Read More: Liberals Are Not The Enemy…But Liberalism Is

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

6 Lessons About Women And Relationships From The Law Code Of Manu

June 23, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Considered from a long memory point of view, feminism is quite recent, owing its exponential development to a very specific modern historical context. The matriarchal tribes Leftist anthropologists have been crazy about are but a historical aberration. All civilizations and peoples who were able to go beyond the small tribe stage and erect kingdoms or empires were patriarchal.

The irony of modernity lies in men having invented most of what exist out there, toiled in steaming factories, dug up dark mine drifts, fought in bloody wars, and managed to produce an incredible wealth—for the result of work to be taken away by entitled, ungraceful womyn.

If you look closely, the suffragettes and their ilk did not revolt because "oppression of women", but to the contrary, in a context where men were already weak and womanly ways were already dominant. Nineteenth century American prostitutes had many things wives did not—like money, glamour, the ability to travel and fuck many wealthy guys, and even men's attention—and they have set a precedent.

Likewise, if you look at the Belle Époque (roughly 1870-1914) art, it overflows with sensual, bewitching beautiful women, accompanied by high-status or wealthy men orbiting around. Men of these times had already turned into weaklings, proud to be mesmerized by some lipstick-wearing bitch. Far from being "oppressive", these men were dependent, and spoiled women could easily gauge money and power from them.

This trend of female takeover, be it through seduction, subtle social power-grabbing or direct threats against men, has shaped many of last century changes. Our masculine potentialities were buried in taboo and oblivion by the blue pill, and now that we are developing ourselves again, it is becoming increasingly obvious that we have to roll back the degeneracy and illegitimate powers we were taught to take for granted. With this is mind, we need a traditional, extra-modern perspective from which to stand and strike hard at the Libtard Church.

The Law Code of Manu, an ancient Hindu legal code, is exactly the kind of content that can feed a "neo-traditional" perspective. Its rich contents led me to write on it twice on ROK, and now is a third and last Law of Manu piece specifically about relations between the sexes. What did an allegedly supra-human lawmaker say on women—and that allowed for a civilization standing the test of time?

1. Mating is transactional in character

This is something modernity wanted us to forgive. "Amour, amour!", cries the nineteenth century bourgeois literature, full of romantic tales and of men penning out long pages about their passion for this or that girl. Novels and poetry from this time are sometimes so full or marshmallow, of one-itis and of pompous prose they are almost disgusting.

Were these infatuated men "free to love whom they wanted"—especially when they were, not incidentally, high-status guys willing to marry down? Of course not: lacking mastery of themselves, they were ensnared and led to believe that their bizarre state of obsession over that-girl-I-am-loving-oh-so-passionately was superior to pondered marriages. Behind the artsy celebration of "progress", "freedom" and "love" loomed pure seduction power.

Such trends did not exist in Ancient India. There, law enforcers at least were aware of the transactional nature of mating and of the necessity to pair a man and a woman of a relatively equal status. Although men of a higher caste could marry down in case of a shortage (3.13), the practice is disregarded, and Manu explicitly warns that “by contracting aberrant marriages… respectable families quickly come to ruin” (3.63).

The Code is made so that men are more or less limited, but also acknowledged and protected reasonably. Men’s right to sexual and romantic gratification is stated (3.45). A man, the Code says, should seek for a spouse of his own caste and with the “right bodily characteristics” (3.4). Families are encouraged to behave in a respectable manner, which allows them to uphold a fine sociability and offer good girls to marry.

Thus, as everyone strives for virtue and offering quality—instead of predatorily taking away—a decent man has serious chances to find a decent girl. As men strove to be able to “buy” the woman they deserved and women at least maintained their capital, the latter did not wield too much power, could not impose its seduction games, and men could focus on building value properly instead of painfully adapting to the ways of the HR/nightclub sororities.

2. Young women are valuable (and ought not to be squandered or squander themselves)

At the peak of their beauty, sexiness and fertility, women are of a higher value. Our reptilian brain knows about it, which gives a 18-25 years old woman a high sexual market value in a “free sexual marketplace” society, and so did the Code, that also knew about how girls could easily be spoiled if allowed to party down their prime years and get creamed in by massive amounts of dick.

To regulate the market and prevent an unholy alliance between party girls and notches-racking assholes, the Code states that a man must be older than the girl he woos: “a 30 year old man should marry a charming girl of 12 years, or an 18 year old, a girl of 8 years or sooner” (9.94). In other words, instead of giving way to the temptation and throwing themselves in a cutting-throat competition for notches, young men have to master their own desires while getting a betrothal with younger girls. Then, as a well-deserved reward, they get a good spouse, each of them peaks at the same time, each can naturally enjoy the other—the 30 year old enjoys the young female who enjoys an older, dominant male—and build a home.

This is akin to what Aristotle wrote about marriage: “women should marry when they are about 18 years of age, and men at 37; then they are in the prime of life, and the decline in the powers of both will coincide.” (Politics, 1335a25)

3. Women ought to be made dependent for their own good

The Code states:

> Even in her own home, a female—whether she is a child, a young woman, or an old lady—should never carry out any task independently. As a child, she must remain under her father’s control; as a young woman, under her husband’s; and when her husband is dead, under her sons’. She must never seek to live independently. (5.147-8)

If women depend from their families and ought to be traded or cared of by men, this makes pairing easier and more straightforward. Being traded, women can focus on their own value and avoid being damaged by their own foolish choices. Also, as they are hypergamic, women ought to be made socially inferior for their own satisfaction: if they get equal to men, they will despise men of equal value and want for a higher value one at the expense of whom they should pair with.

Women belonging to their families are limited in their ability to lure any male into their traps: if they do, they will likely get the wrath of their responsible relatives.

> Day and night men should keep their women from acting independently; for, attached as they are to sensual pleasures, men should keep them under their control. (9.2)

> Drinking, associating with bad people, living away from the husband; travelling, sleeping, and staying in the houses of others—these are the six things that corrupt women… Lechery, fickleness of mind, and hard-heartedness are innate in them… Recognizing this, a man should make the utmost effort at guarding them. (9.13-6)

4. Hypergamy is a true peril to society and should be vigilantly monitored

Even then, it seems that hubristic hypergamy had already started to rear its ugly head at the time when the Law Code was written down, for it explicitly warns against the temptation to abandon one's husband for a man of higher social status:

> When a woman abandons her own husband of lower rank and unites with a man of higher rank, she only brings disgrace upon herself in the world and is called 'a woman who has had a man before.' By being unfaithful to her husband, a woman becomes disgraced in the world. (5.163-4)

The Ancients knew well about the conditions necessary for a marriage to be auspicious, and the relative equality of status as well as the stability of the union were doubtlessly necessary. Some women, at least, had let their burning desire unravel the social fabric and betrayed their home to get the "higher" man, for if it had not been so the Code would not warn against it.

5. Husband and wife do not have to be "equal"

Some things ought to be checked as relatively equal between a husband and a wife, such as the caste, social value, or being in one's prime, for the marriage to work well, with the exception of "times of adversity" when higher caste men can marry down. Everything, though, does not have to be the same.

A woman realizes herself and flourishes through her place in the family. She ought to be dutiful to have her proper center and dignity. Therefore,

> Though he may be bereft of virtue, given to lust, and totally devoid of good qualities, a good woman should always worship her husband like a god. For women, there is no independent sacrifice, vow, or fast; a woman will be exalted in heaven by the mere fact that she obediently served her husband. (5.154-6)

On the other hand, a husband can go away for years on which his wife ought to maintain the home, provided he secures some resource for her to live on (9.74-6). He is also free to repudiate his wife if she loathes him without a proper reason. Specific reasons are specified by the Code, such as if he turns into an unrepentant alcoholic, or becomes "foul-mouthed" (9.81).

Men and women's respective roles and different, complementary, and unequal. Modernists should get over it instead of wrecking social life in the name of an equality between non-existent abstract individuals.

A man's striving expresses mostly on the public scene, outside from the house, while the man's quest finds its center in himself and larger projects. A man ought to be able to thrive outside, whereas his wife, by being supportive, realizes herself at the same time that she helps him. Also note that risks are properly shared here, as the woman may seem in a more risky situation at home, when the husband meets with the risks outside.

6. Women have proper qualities to develop

Just as social castes are supposed to expand and enshrine inner vocations, names have to say something about their bearer. For girls, names act as a sort of tutor or landmark:

> Girls' names should be easy to pronounce and without fierce connotations, have a clear meaning, be charming and auspicious, end in a long final syllable, and contain a word for blessing. (2.33)

Also, dependence from family and husband do not mean lack of self-agency: women too have quests to pursue—which makes self-improvement as relevant to them as it is to us.

> A woman who controls her mind, speech, and body and is never unfaithful to her husband attains the worlds of her husband, and virtuous people call her a 'good woman.' (5.163)
>
> [Wives should be employed] in the collection and the disbursement of his wealth, in cleaning, in meritorious activity, in cooking food, and in looking after household goods. When they are kept confined within the house by trusted men, they are not truly guarded; only when they guard themselves by themselves are they truly well-guarded. (9.11-2, emphasis mine)

This is consistent with the three purposes Roosh identified.

Conclusion

That the modern trends of "emancipation" of women would actually unravel into a catastrophe for most men, not to mention our civilization as a whole, could have been predicted by the wise men living millennia ago. Particular vocations, social equilibrium, good chances and fair trade were ensured by the wisdom and fidelity of traditional men.

As we toil for taking back our institutions, countries and civilization, it is also necessary to glean discernment from (almost) timeless Scriptures. Odds are, the most familiar we become with antique wisdom, the more specifically modern trends will look like blind or monstrous deviations. This may be unsettling. I could bet my last penny, though, that in the long run it will be understood as a necessary step for getting outside the rotten world we were born in and avoid falling for the same mistakes again and again.

Read Next: Modern Marriage Is Rent-Seeking Hell

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

The Argument For Adopting Leftist Tactics To Defeat The Left

June 24, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

On Friday, the 16th of June 2017, in New York City, Laura Loomer of The Rebel Media raided the stage of the controversial quasi-Trump-killing 'Shakespeare in the Park' recreation of Julius Caeser. Once on stage, Loomer interrupted the play and yelled about the violent rhetoric that the play was implicitly portraying against Donald Trump and the political-right.

Moments after Loomer got on stage, another protestor named Jack Posobiec rose in the midst of the crowd and started comparing them to Nazi propagandists. In essence, it was an excellent use of the left's own tactics against them, and it gave the left a taste of its own medicine. And, on Saturday, other protesters once again interrupted the play protesting the same issues.

Of course, in response to these events, the standard “respectable” conservatives responded with disgust. David French of National Review tweeted that “Anyone on the ‘right’ who defends the BS that went down at the play tonight (16 June 2017) is showing themselves to be tribalist, not conservative.”

Ben Shapiro, writing at the Daily Wire, called the incident “idiotic snowflake-ism” and argued that “…the right was in serious danger of capitulating to the left’s ‘hate speech’ argument by reversing it on the left.”

Reading statements like this, it soon becomes apparent why standard conservatives have failed to conserve much of anything—they are like France during World War II, or, at best, maybe Italy. In fact, when reading comments like those from Shapiro and French, one has to wonder whether these two conservatives, or other conservatives like them, have ever found themselves in a real physical confrontation.

The reason why this is doubtful is because anyone who has been in a one-of-one fight knows that when you are confronted with an existential threat, and if you fight by Queensbury rules while your enemy does not, then the chances are very good that you will lose that battle. Indeed, if a punk comes at you with a jagged bottle after throwing dirt in your eyes, and you are worried about hitting him below the belt with your gentlemanly “fisticuffs”, then you will likely leave that fight in a body bag, and he won’t.

Well, the left is a punk, and they have been coming at the right with a jagged bottle for some time now, so is it any surprise that some on the right have decided to start fighting dirty, just like the left does.

You don’t worry about boxing rules when this guy is coming at you!

Note as well that there is nothing necessarily immoral about escalating and fighting dirty if the situation calls for it. After all, even cops are allowed to use whatever tactics and force are necessary to subdue an attacker and keep the public safe so long as the force is proportionate to the attack and so long as the force used is in response to an attack.

Thus, if talking fails and a gangbanger pulls a gun on a cop, then it is completely moral for that cop to stop that threat using whatever type of lethal force tactic is necessary, be it shooting, stabbing, batoning, choking, or whatever. The key point is that the cop must stop the threat.

Jack Posobiec denouncing the play as work of Goebbels

Even in larger-scale conflicts this idea of mutual escalation and proportionate tactical reaction has been understood as necessary. For example, in World War I, when the Germans started using large-scale chemical warfare, the Allies did not merely buck-up and carry-on as if the old rules still applied. No, they too started using chemical warfare until the other side learned from painful experience that enough was enough, and that the use of chemical warfare simply was not worth the cost.

Indeed, appeals to Germany's better nature did not stop them from using chemical weapons. And principled arguments did not sway them either. No, only the pain and harm received from experiencing the same tactics that they used was sufficient to teach the Germans not to use chemical weapons again after the end of the First World War. Well, the same is true for the left today.

Principled appeals and rational arguments do not work with the left, as has been evidenced for years. But painful experience can change a leftist's mind quite quickly; consider, for example, the fact that the Antifa thugs are not all that eager anymore to attack the right after receiving a thrashing in return for their troubles.

In World War 1, both sides used gas, but one side only did so in a self-defense response to the other, and that is a difference that makes all the difference.

At the same time, we should not be surprised by the fact that many leftists only learn from painful experience rather than from rational arguments. After all, over two thousand years ago, Aristotle, in his book Rhetoric, told us that some people are simply immune to rational argumentation and instruction, and that such people only learn by swaying their emotions and experiences.

Do we really think that so much has changed in human nature since Aristotle's time that his point no longer holds true? Of course not. And not only was Aristotle correct, but the left actually epitomizes the type of individual that Aristotle was speaking of (although leftists will no doubt think the same of the right).

So, the point is that when in a war, and the culture war is a war (just a war that has avoided large-scale violence so far), you will almost certainly lose that war if you are unwilling to engage in the use of certain tactics that seem unpleasant and even dangerous to you when not in such a conflict. This is especially the case if those are the very tactics that the enemy finds most painful and effective against them.

And since the left loves to project, then this means that the tactics they use against the right are the ones most likely to be highly effective against them. Hence the need to use the left's tactics against them.

It must also be remembered that the goal of using the enemy's own tactics against them is not to rejoice at the damage that doing so causes to them, but rather to educate them through the only means that they learn from: namely, emotional pain. And this harsh education is meant to teach them that using the very tactics that they endorse is ultimately to no one's benefit.

Thus, if the left stops its illiberal attacks, then so will the right. But if the left does not stop using such tactics, then neither will the right, and so there will be Mutually Assured Destruction (MAD). However, better the madness of MAD—as well as the subsequent convulsing break-up of the United States into two different countries—then losing to the left.

After all, if the left does not backdown, even when faced with their own tactics being used against them in a trajectory of mutual destruction, then it is best to know this fact early, so that other measures, such as a push for secession, can get started in earnest.

In the end, it is true that sometimes, responding in kind to extreme brutality can be too heinous to contemplate, but losing a war to someone willing to be so brutal is even worse. For example, just consider what would have happened to the whole world had the United States, in the face of a Soviet nuclear arms race, decided to unilaterally disarm themselves of nuclear weapons after seeing the damage that nuclear weapons caused. Had this happened, North America would likely be a nuclear wasteland today, and everyone in Europe would be calling each other "comrade".

Well, the left are the Soviets, and their tactics are the cultural nukes of today. Either the right starts to use those tactics in order to bring about a detente based on an understanding of mutually assured cultural and social destruction or else the right will lose. After all, the left has a grip on large swaths of the media, academia, corporations, the judiciary, and the government bureaucracy, not to mention a large voting base, so it is not as if the right has any major advantages in other areas.

Furthermore, as history attests, and as the last generation or so in the United States affirms, the large masses within the country will likely just sway and move with the cultural currents, simply absorbing and largely accepting the cultural changes that come their way from whichever side is stronger. As such, the masses, and the standard conservatives, will not be much help to the right on a day-to-day basis.

Had the West decided not to stockpile "evil" nukes, then Soviet soldiers would likely have marched right through Europe. So sometimes, MAD is the only way to go.

So, in light of all of the above, the right has a choice to make: either act like a "respectable" conservative and most likely lose the culture anyway—as they have been doing for the last few decades—or else fight in a manner that actually teaches the left the hard lesson that maybe we all need to stop such behaviors before we all destroy ourselves and our freedoms.

Read More: Two Powerful Tactics For Winning The Culture War

Damian Michael

R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

7 Ways To Stay Interested In Your Girlfriend

June 24, 2017 | by Mark Derian | Link | Original Link

It’s important to know when to break up with your girlfriend. Follow these seven guidelines so you’ll be able to trust your judgement when doing so. Otherwise, you may think you’re sick of our girlfriend when really you’re just sick of yourself.

1. Find your girlfriend

To stay interested in our girlfriend, we need to be careful who we make a girlfriend. One way to develop a screening system is to date at least 12 girls over 12 months, then use the experience to make a list of seven qualities that you want in a girlfriend. The next girl you date after the initial 12 should have those seven qualities.

If you do this and then begin to feel doubt that you can do better, rest assured that your anxiety is only coming up with reasons to break up with her to avoid long-term intimacy.

2. Have your own space

Of course we need a purpose that’s prioritized before our relationship. But this principle can only be put into practice when we have a space in our home away from the girlfriend. For the sake of symbolism, put your space on the top floor. Without such a retreat you become enmeshed with the battiness of the female mind and invariably grow to resent it.

3. Keep secrets

I used to run a therapy group in which one of the patients didn't tell his wife he was at therapy every Thursday night. He told her he was staying late at work. Everybody else in the group thought he needed to come clean but I defended him. It's healthy to keep secrets as long as you're not pretending to be someone you're not.

This is especially true if what you're keeping secret is something your girlfriend would appreciate. Besides, you're going to keep secrets anyway so you might as well keep the process conscious.

Familiarity breeds contempt, yes, but even worse is disinterest. Keep a few projects and adventures to yourself and it'll feel like you're still in the dating phase.

4. See your friends

This one is worth repeating. When I don't hang out with my guy friends for a while, I end up treating my girlfriend like she's a guy. I challenge her in ways I would only challenge another man and when she responds by looking at me sideways I resent her.

It's helpful to remember your girlfriend is a female and only flourishes in comfort. I've known this for years but I can only act as through it's true after I spend a few hours riffing with a buddy in a cigar room.

5. Have children

We've all heard guys say something like, "I dated my ex for six years but we broke up because the magic left the relationship." Yeah, no kidding. The magic is supposed to leave the relationship. This indicates something we have a difficult time coming to terms with as the culture becomes more transfixed by instant gratification: relationships aren't for you—they're for taking care of things, namely children. Even with a dog you'll see the true purpose of the relationship isn't to go out to dinner but to direct and nurture the next generation.

It's like starting a business. We do it to provide a service and make money, but it runs the risk of becoming meaningless if we don't help employees become better people. Relationships and companies without a contribution have neither soul nor intrigue.

6. Replace cold approaching

My favorite part about being single was the cold approaching. It’s a challenge that refined my psychology and it’s how I eventually met my girlfriend. Then I settled down and resented my girlfriend for wanting me to herself.

Thankfully I discovered cold calling, an outlet for my need to take social risks and reach out and engage with others. Whenever I begin to feel the urges of the season I come up with a reason to call someone in a related field with either a request or an offer. I thought I needed to babe hound but it turns out I only needed a way to challenge myself in the modern duel that is salesmanship.

7. Tie yourself to the mast

Never trust yourself enough to not watch porn or go to strip clubs. You’re a dude so you’re going to compare your girlfriend with other girls and it has nothing to do with the attractiveness of your girlfriend. My girlfriend’s butt smells awesome but whenever I go to a strip club and smell a butt that’s mellifluous in a different way, I unconsciously begin to think, “Maybe it’s time to break up.”

Odysseus tied himself to the mast of his ship when passing the sirens because he knows he wouldn’t be able to control himself. Like Odysseus, we may be capable of heroism but that doesn’t mean we cannot burn seven years of our life hanging out with a nymph when what we ultimately want is to get home to our Penelope.

Conclusion

If a girl loses interest in her boyfriend, of course it’s his fault. But if a man loses interest in his girlfriend, it’s his fault too. That’s the price men must pay for the privilege of not being a girl.

Read More: How To Make Her Your Girlfriend

Mark Derian
Mark Derian is a graduate student in psychology. follow him on Twitter

Pushing Women Into Leadership Roles Is Ushering The West To Its Doom

June 25, 2017 | by Lux Gaetano | Link | Original Link

‘Lo and behold’, I thought to myself, yet another self-proclaimed feminist vaingloriously flashing her bits to thousands of adoring fans online. That was my reaction to the semi-nude picture of Amber Rose circulating on social media.

The celebrity fawning was more excessive than what I had anticipated and to be honest, I was desensitized to the whole thing. As a regular user of the internet, seeing partially or fully naked women online had left me inured, to the point where I had begun to rationalize such degenerate behaviour. One would think that feminism would get rid of these ugly depictions of female sexuality, but no, feminists fail at logical reasoning.

As a former feminist, my red pill moment happened recently. I believe in the lofty rationality, unparalleled pragmatism of those intelligent individuals who take it upon themselves, who make it a personal goal to escape the social engineering being forced upon them, whether they are male or female. Masquerading feminism as equality, as some sort of legitimately virtuous movement is an affront to human dignity. Whilst screaming how utterly sexist it is to sexualize the female body, they quite odiously profit off the very same thing.

Almost every young woman nowadays is being taught to embrace their leadership skills, to fashion themselves as bossy, rational leaders, all the while ignoring the very fact that most women are idiotic, uncultured and, if made powerful, potentially sociopathic. The fact is, most women distinctly lack the ability and prowess to become great minds. Let’s look at the current state of affairs. How many noteworthy economists have been women? How many philosophers have been women?

So philosophical. So powerful. Derp derp.

How many praiseworthy writers have been women? Literally zero. In the latter category, sure there are many who excelled in the craft of producing subpar, commercial drivel, such as J.K Rowling or Agatha Christie but none of the female writers have been able to produce masterpieces that could rival Hemingway's or even Bukowski's. That is because female writers notoriously lack the imagination and creativity to segue into unknown realms, to broach new ideas in their work.

Writers aside, how many good female directors have made films worth watching? The truth is, very few and when they did make a decent movie, it was at the expense of a robust screenplay written by a male writer.

The simple point I'm making is that, not only does feminism lack the tenacity of a good movement, it sure as hell contradicts itself a lot. With prominent figureheads like Lena Dunham or Emma Watson, the feminist movement has transformed into a cause celebre for rich, uneducated airheads who do not realize that their movement is corrupting the minds of millions, spawning bossy girls whose stupidity should be banned from the leadership ranks, but who in their vain thirst for power and fame, marginalize smart, disenfranchised young men.

It is about time that this reality be reckoned with. Women in power are revolting, because they lack the backbone and intellectual integrity to spearhead game changing movements. Hilary Clinton is a prime example of that.

Moreover, Hollywood liberals keep peddling the image of a young, empowered female lead overcoming obstacles, none of which can compare to the real struggles of the young men of our generation, who are increasingly silenced and forced into submission by arrogant women who've been sold the myth that they deserve the same things as men with far less effort or skill.

How many more lies will the feminist movement belt out until people finally realize how they're being conned? There's something sinister about a young Hollywood starlet advocating for women's rights and equal pay, all the while sucking dick or worse for the opportunity to get an advance read. There's something remarkably appalling about selling this sex positive myth to women, who are exploited and dehumanized and led to believe that it's all about empowerment.

A woman in her thirties who sleeps around and obviously lacks stability is not empowered, she’s broken. How long will it take for liberals to wake up and realize that their very values put civilized society at risk of extinction, that their nihilistic proclivities are being advertised to gullible human beings who will be the ones affected the most by this drastic change in social construct? Yes, you’ve guessed it. The truth is they don’t care.

It is startling that people with no values can advertise themselves as the righteous, enlightened ones in this debate. If they get their way, we will be faced with social scourges of epic proportions to say the least, and society will be doomed as our norms will favour the idiots instead of the truly qualified men, prompting widespread intellectual decline.

As a young 22-year-old woman, I stand in solidarity with all the men in the world who are vilified beyond description, for the simple crime of daring to exist in a world that’s being slowly overtaken by over-zealous, entitled, unqualified women.

Read More: Why The Female “Anti-Feminist” Is A Feminist In Disguise

Lux Gaetano
Lux doesn't like the ham-fisted ideals of the dominant movements of this era. She is guilty of thought-crime, empathizing with the manosphere and airing her controversial views, among other things.

The United Nations' Push For "Children's Liberation" Is A Ploy To Reduce Parental Authority

June 25, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The international community has taken a serious approach to "children's liberation," now enshrined in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. Only a handful of tiny countries aren't yet signatories. Bill Clinton signed the UNCRC, but the Senate never officially ratified it. This is for the better, as we'll see.

Advocates portray its non-ratification as some kind of profound embarrassment. Until fairly recently, the only other major holdouts were Somalia (a government which barely exists) and South Sudan (a newly seceded country and not in the greatest shape). That's hardly a flattering group in which to be included, and now the USA appears even less "progressive" than them.

The devil's in the details

No, Hillary, it takes a family to raise a child.

Many provisions are decent and sensible, which civilized nations already had long ago. However, some others are debatable. Even when the road to progress is paved with good intentions, problems can happen when vague and open-ended statements attain the force of law. This enables heavy-handed control and micromanagement.

Dictating agendas through international law is an increasing trend; the UNCRC could be the next legal frontier. The treaty is sort of considered a "living document", and you know what that means. The following are some questionable items.

> 3.1: In all actions concerning children, whether undertaken by public or private social welfare institutions, courts of law, administrative authorities or legislative bodies, the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration.

Who gets to determine "best interests", and by what standard? The next two lines provide more information, but all told, it's missing key details. Clearly there's a compelling interest in cases of abuse or neglect, which laws already address. However, outside of that, the door is still wide open to bureaucrats empowered to override parental authority and judgment.

> 13.1: The child shall have the right to freedom of expression; this right shall include freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media of the child's choice.

This is pretty open-ended. Mouthing off to authority figures without consequences could be considered a human right.

> 14.1: States Parties shall respect the right of the child to freedom of thought, conscience and religion.

Although I can sympathize with kids who don't want to be dragged to church every Sunday, this provision is too expansive. It also means that a child can join a cult, and the parents have no say in the matter.

> 15.1: States Parties recognize the rights of the child to freedom of association and to freedom of peaceful assembly.

Parents would lose control over who their kids associate with, other than (per 15.2) forbidding contact with known criminals.

> 16.1: No child shall be subjected to arbitrary or unlawful interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to unlawful attacks on his or her honour and reputation.
>
> 16.2: The child has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

No need to hide the bong any more.

> 28.1.2: Encourage the development of different forms of secondary education, including general and vocational education, make them available and accessible to every child, and take appropriate measures such as the introduction of free education and offering financial assistance in case of need;

This makes free college a right. The UN presumably gets to determine who qualifies, and taxpayers will pick up the huge tab.

> 28.2: States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that school discipline is administered in a manner consistent with the child's human dignity and in conformity with the present Convention.

My eight year old self is cackling with glee at that one. "Kid-lib" is great!

> 31.1: States Parties recognize the right of the child to rest and leisure, to engage in play and recreational activities appropriate to the age of the child and to participate freely in cultural life and the arts.

Again, it's too open-ended. Is ten hours a day of video games a human right? The UN gets to decide that one.

> 37.1: No child shall be subjected to torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Neither capital punishment nor life imprisonment without possibility of release shall be imposed for offences committed by persons below eighteen years of age;

This sounds good at first glance. However, this would've meant that Dylan and Klebold (had they survived) would've walked eventually.

Some positive changes we'll never get

This kind of brainwashing could be made illegal, but don't count on it.

Potentially, some of the provisions could be improvements over the status quo.

> 6.1: States Parties recognize that every child has the inherent right to life.

The treaty defines a child as anyone under 18, though there's no lower limit, so a baby exists from conception. Feminists who've fought tooth and nail for partial birth abortion won't like this!

> 7.1: The child shall be registered immediately after birth and shall have the right from birth to a name, the right to acquire a nationality and, as far as possible, the right to know and be cared for by his or her parents.

So after a frivolous divorce, a mother couldn't deprive the father of contact with their children. However, article 9 basically contradicts this, leaving things up to judges and bureaucrats. Then article 10 waters down article 9. However, article 18 bolsters article 7. Confused yet?

> 17: States Parties recognize the important function performed by the mass media and shall ensure that the child has access to information and material from a diversity of national and international sources, especially those aimed at the promotion of his or her social, spiritual and moral well-being and physical and mental health.

Looking at it one way, this would forbid censorware blocking controversial political content to "protect children". Online censorship is bad enough already.

> 29.1.3: [States Parties agree that the education of the child shall be directed to…] The development of respect for the child's parents, his or her own cultural identity, language and values, for the national values of the country in which the child is living, the country from which he or she may originate, and for civilizations different from his or her own;

This effectively prohibits forms of cultural Marxism meant to drive a wedge between the generations, make young people ashamed of their own countries, indoctrinate kids with White guilt, or turn them away from their society's traditional morals. Everyone would be allowed pride in their heritage.

Unfortunately, all this is too sensible to be implemented this way. Selective enforcement at the will of the governing body is generally how it goes for "living documents".

It gets worse yet

Future UN kiddie “inspector”?

Despite good intentions, the UNCRC has a basic underlying assumption that kids are just little adults. By definition, children are immature. By adult standards, teenagers act neurotic, and younger kids are completely clueless. This is why they need guidance by responsible parents and teachers. This shouldn’t be abrogated, even potentially, without compelling circumstances.

Putting the UN’s bunglers—our wannabe world government— in charge of children’s welfare defies the subsidiarity principle. If a family fails in its primary function of raising children, it’s the state government’s responsibility to intervene, not international bureaucrats unaccountable to the public. Keep in mind also that if the USA ratifies the treaty, it becomes the law of the land, superseding national and state law. Further, treaties can’t get repealed if it turns out they’re not serving the public’s interests.

Finally, the UN is notoriously corrupt. As protectors of human rights, they’ve become a sad joke. Is the treaty helping kids in hellhole countries that ratified the UNCRC? For a few other items, UN deployments often fail to protect embattled populations. They brought cholera to Haiti; that country didn’t need more problems. The worst is the UN’s frequent sex crimes. This is why we don’t need incompetent, scandal-plagued UN cookie-pushers implementing “kid-lib”.

Read More: The End Goal Of Western Progressivism Is Depopulation

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Alt Lite and Alt Right Hold Dueling Free Speech Rallies, Alt Right Wins

June 25, 2017 | by George Green | Link | Original Link

As our dedicated readers already know, Return of Kings has remained neutral in the cat fights between the New Right/alt lite and the alt right. ROK and the #RooshRight have carved an independent path rooted in the principles of neomasculinity and the explicit banning of thots and homosexuals from our platforms.

Nonetheless, it behooves us to know what our neighbors are up to, if for no other reason than because they keep banging on the walls and blasting loud music at two in the morning. This afternoon, the alt lite and the alt right held competing "free speech" rallies in Washington, D.C., bringing their subtly different messages to the American public. While the dust is still clearing, it looks like the alt right won a huge victory.

Here's our take…

"You're Gay!" "No, You're Gay!"

Baked Alaska™ @bakedalaska

Et tu, Brute?

The recent slapfight between the alt lite and alt right began nearly two weeks ago. On June 16, Laura Loomer and Jack Posobiec, two journalists from Jewish-funded Rebel Media, disrupted a performance of William Shakespeare's Julius Caesar in New York City that featured President Donald Trump as a stand-in for Caesar.

Posobiec and Loomer charged that the play was promoting the assassination of President Trump and compared the play's cast and crew to the Nazis and Joseph Goebbels as they were ejected from the theater.

Self-appointed alt-right leader Richard Spencer, aghast that someone was getting more attention than him, quickly joined with the fake news media in condemning Loomer and Posobiec. Not long after, Loomer, who is Jewish (despite her shiksa-sexy looks), immediately revealed herself as an entryist, referring to the alt right as "neo-Nazis" and demanding that others "condemn" anti-Semitism.

It also came out that she and Posobiec had registered "FreeLaura.com" several hours before launching their stunt.

> Wow. I'm calling on @bakedalaska to fully condemn anti-Semitism after posting this pic of me inside a gas chamber. https://t.co/hmBDMgXCtM
>
> — Laura Loomer (@LauraLoomer) June 18, 2017

The battle of witlessness escalated when Gateway Pundit White House correspondent Lucian Wintrich—best known for the homoerotic "Twinks for Trump" photoshoot he did at the Republican National Convention last year—began asserting that Richard Spencer was a homosexual based on trollish comments from YouTube personality James Allsup.

This was further compounded by the release of the "Third Jimpact" podcast, which alleged that homosexuals were using alt right site The Right Stuff's pool parties (real life meetups) to groom teenage boys for anal sex, with former TRS admin Ghoul named as a culprit.

Further fanning the flames is the fact that for the past month, Spencer's AltRight.com colleague Daniel Friberg has been at war with Greg Johnson, head of the rival alt-right site Counter-Currents Publishing. Johnson, best known for his assertion that "intolerance of homosexuality is Jewish" (as well as falsely accusing ROK publisher Roosh V of being a rapist), has been deemed a little too implicit for the fashy goys of the alt-right and been summarily drummed out.

The final straw came when Posobiec and Loomer both withdrew from the Freedom of Speech Rally that was to be held on June 25 at the Lincoln Memorial, because Richard Spencer would also be appearing there and they didn't want any of his "racist" cooties. Instead, they set up their own rally, the Rally Against Political Violence, to be held at the same time a few blocks away.

The stage was set for an epic showdown. Who would win: the undercut-sporting goose-steppers of the alt right or the hysterical e-book merchants of the alt lite?

The Alt Right Brings The Fight

It's clear from footage of both events that the Freedom of Speech Rally won out in terms of turnout and media coverage. Recordings from Infowars and Red Ice show that the alt-right rally had over twice the attendance of the Rally Against Political Violence, with most fake news media coverage ignoring the latter. Antifas were also focused on the Freedom of Speech Rally, attempting to disrupt it but failing.

> Sorry #AltLite but yes, hate speech- although we may dislike it- is ABSOLUTELY > free speech. pic.twitter.com/StGDzkRzVa

>
> — James Allsup (@realJamesAllsup) June 25, 2017

> #RallyForPeace @Cernovich the weapon for peace is using your camera, the ability to record the truth pic.twitter.com/eXyxm5pJhL
>
> — V.P.LdyNj1 (@LdyNJ1) June 25, 2017

Not only that, the energy was clearly on the alt right's side. In addition to Richard Spencer and James Allsup, the Freedom of Speech Rally featured appearances from Milo Yiannopoulos' ex-friend Baked Alaska, Daily Shoah host and confirmed race-mixer Mike Enoch, journalist Jason Kessler, Radical Agenda host Christopher Cantwell and many others.

Conversely, despite the Rally Against Political Violence's speakers being more popular (going by Twitter follower counts) than the Freedom of Speech Rally's speakers, energy at that rally was at Jeb-like levels. In addition to Posobiec, Loomer, and Wintrich, Mike Cernovich, Roger Stone, and Virginia gubernatorial candidate Corey Stewart made appearances, but their speeches were limp and phoned-in in comparison.

> The Alt-Lite rally was far more pathetic than I expected. Dozens of people. Roger Stone bails. Wintrich creeps out the crowd. Really Sad.
>
> — Richard Spencer (@RichardBSpencer) June 25, 2017

> #RallyForPeace #KeepAmericaGreat #WashingtonDC pic.twitter.com/HUrYpRQqLV
>
> — #KeepAmericaGreat (@RWPropagandist) June 25, 2017

It's possible that at least part of the reason why the Freedom of Speech Rally outpaced the Rally for Political Violence is the fact that the former was the "original" event, with the latter only created because Posobiec and Loomer didn't want to get upstaged by Richard Spencer and his million-dollar smile. N onetheless, this is a huge propaganda win for the alt-right, and will further hurt the New Right/alt lite as they seek to form an independent identity outside of both mainstream cuckservatism and the alt-right.

> #AltRightDC pic.twitter.com/9XSXtKciGE
>
> — Richard Spencer (@RichardBSpencer) June 25, 2017

> Alt lite needs to transform into a parallel media institution that fights the mainstream media instead of alt right https://t.co/fpcKV83PKn
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) June 25, 2017

Return of Kings will continue monitoring the antics of the alt lite and the alt right, with an eye to remain critical of but fair to both sides.

Read Next: The Ugly Divorce Between The Alt Right And The Alt Lite

George Green

George Green, aka "Goylent Green," is a former alt-right activist. You can follow him on Twitter here.

5 Things I Hate About Banging Women Over 30

June 26, 2017 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

There’s no escaping the stampede of fat, bitchy, American women. They’re everywhere you look, and everywhere you’re trying not to look. They’re at the grocery store, the mall, the workplace, the bar. They have become so common at this point, I would start a business selling them out of giant gumball machines if it weren’t for the fact that nobody would pay a fucking quarter for them. And worst of all, this fat is generally piled onto a very sizable portion of the single women out there who are available to date.

Over 160 million out of the 320 million people who make up the population of the United States are enormous blobs of bloated shit, and some estimates are showing that three out of every four Americans will be overweight by the year 2020—an overwhelming 75 percent.

One of the most common thoughts that will pop into your head when you’re out and about is, “If that chick would just drop 20-30 pounds, she would be a total smoke show.” It’s one of the saddest things to witness because you can really see the potential hiding beneath the blubber on so many of these women.

Such a waste.

So, what does a man do when he's surrounded by a bunch of waddling fat-fucks and things aren't looking up? He looks down, and what does he find when he looks down? The dreaded single female over the age of 30. As a rule, I typically view the vast majority of single women over 30 in the same way I view those little gnats that fly around horse cocks when it's hot outside: they're annoying, worthless, and probably have dick-breath.

However, exceptions can and will be made for the better pecker gnats among us. A woman over 30 who goes the extra mile to take care of herself and possesses a physique that resembles a female human being certainly scores more points than some 250-pound warthog in her early to mid-twenties. But dating these older women is a depressing concession to make because they are—without question—the most fucked-up group of people you'll ever have the misfortune of interacting with:

Mental illness with an emphasis on Cluster B Personality Disorders? Check—and they've got the prescriptions and dead, soulless eyes to prove it.

Alcoholism? Double check—but don't worry, "It's only wine, and I only have a couple of glasses to help me sleep and 'take the edge off' after a hard day." (Everyday is a hard day spent on the razor's edge, apparently.)

Grotesque, degenerate pasts that would make prostitutes from previous generations seem like wife material? Check—Jimmy Dean hasn't seen as much sausage as these beat to hell, cock snot receptacles.

Pathological lying? Big check—these women don't have a clue as to who the hell they truly are or what they're all about. And since they don't know, neither will you.

Delusional or completely oblivious to all of these things and still think a jacked and shredded, six-foot-five space shuttle commander who moonlights as a hedge fund manager and has the magical ability to shoot two-month-long yachting excursions to the

Côte d'Azur out of his 11-inch cock is waiting just around the corner to sweep them off their tatted-up, 30-year-old, dick-stained asses? Check—in La La Land, only the absolute best will do.

But it's not all bad news: at least they're easy to get into bed. Not that you should be excited about that, because you shouldn't. And based off my sampling of single women over 30 in recent months—all of whom were white, I will add—here are the top five reasons why you should check your enthusiasm at the door when pounding out these societal dregs.

5. They Say Distracting Try-Hard Bullshit That Ruins The Mood

"Get it, Daddy!"

"Fuck that pussy good!"

"Oh my God, that feels soooooooo fucking AMAZING!"

"Yes! Yes! Yes! Ah! Ah! Don't stop, Daddy!"

Jesus Christ—shut up. Women over 30 have called me "daddy" so many damn times that I'm beginning to wonder if I owe back child support to the single mothers who raised them so poorly. But it's not just what they say that gets on my nerves: it's the trite theatrics that is the most irritating.

I'm sure some guys get off when a woman howls like a strangled cat in the bedroom, but experience has shown this to be salesmanship more than anything else. They're trying to inflate your ego, to make you feel like you're "the man," and that none of the other two dozen "daddies" who came before you fucked with such dick-wielding precision. The idea is if they can get you to buy into their bullshit, then you're much more likely to commit and stick around.

But the truth comes to the surface when you end things. Once you send the "I think this little thing of ours has run its course and it's time to move on" text, you suddenly morph from a master cock slinger into a guy who can't fuck for shit and has no idea how to "satisfy a woman." Just a week ago you were an orgasm dispensing machine of vaginal destruction, but now you're an impotent no-dick-having loser who doesn't know what the hell you're doing—it's hilarious. You'll seldom see younger women behaving this way when a relationship ends.

Now, despite the obnoxious sounds and transparent platitudes that come out of these aging creatures, the sex itself will be decent to above average in many cases—they're trying to reel you in, after all. But it's important not to conflate good mechanical sex skills with passion, desire, or—God forbid—love, because those things aren't truly there. You're only getting the illusion of those things, and it's all by design.

It's just good pussy: it was good for all of those other motherfuckers, too. You're not getting anything that everyone else hasn't gotten already. These women didn't spend their late teens and early twenties learning how to cook or developing the skills that would make them good wives and mothers: they were learning how to suck a mean dick and becoming top-tier leg spreaders.

When the only thing you have going for you is sex, it stands to reason that you would be pretty good at it. So use these women for that one thing while disregarding their loudmouthed, ego stroking bedroom antics, and save your commitment for a younger, less tainted woman who will display genuine passion and affection during your intimate times together (if you can find one, of course).

4. The Dissipating Scent Of Youth

Women in their twenties, especially early twenties, have a certain scent to them. It's the scent of fertility and youthful exuberance; it's the scent of a woman in her prime. A woman over 30 has a smell that says, "Knock this one up, and the kid will pop out with a nipple where one of his eyeballs should be." All of the soaps, perfumes, and lotions in the world cannot change this—it's the natural scent of the "seasoned" woman, and it's not a bug, it's a feature.

This is one of nature's ways of telling a man when a woman is over the hill. The chances of miscarriage go up drastically once a woman passes 30. The chances for birth defects—autism especially—all go up significantly as well. All pregnancies past the age of 35 are considered "high risk," and that's if these women can conceive children at all.

Hard living is normal living for the vast majority of women nowadays. A body that has consumed massive quantities of alcohol, recreational/prescription drugs, birth control pills and cocks, all combined with father time, is a body that is completely corrupted and polluted; it's a body that is not suitable for motherhood. Your olfactory receptors can pick up on all of this, and you'll more than likely notice yourself being slightly turned off whenever you catch a whiff of a woman whose better days are behind her.

3. They Feel "Different"

Not only do these women smell different, but they feel different as well. They are squishier, softer, and less firm due to their advancing age, but harder at the same time; it's a strange sensation. Sluts always seem to have a rigid, inflexible feel to them. This is true regardless of age, but it gets worse with time and "experience."

It sort of resembles a permanent "clinched" feeling, as if the muscles are constantly contracted or flexed—a case of rigor mortis in the undead, so to speak. Some may argue that perhaps this hardness is due to an inability on my part to make these women feel comfortable or relaxed, but I contest it's due to their inability to feel comfortable or relaxed with themselves.

Imagine making life decisions that always result in unnecessary drama, calamity, and hardship as opposed to ones that would be ideal for you, your family, and your community. Imagine having an abortion or two after sleeping with a string of men whose first names you can't remember, and whose last names you never knew. Imagine always taking the road most traveled: the road that leads to Xanax bars and empty bottles of cheap pinot noir.

Imagine doing all of these things from the time you're a teenager all the way up until you're on the wrong side of 30, and then try to come away from it all as a soft, lovable, well-adjusted human being who's comfortable in your own skin—good fucking luck. These women feel hardened for a reason, and that reason is them.

If you were to describe the “thousand cock stare” or sociopathic/Cluster B gaze, you would typically use words like “empty” or “dead inside.” But if you really look at these women, you can see the tension stemming from their inner turmoil. You can see the pent-up contempt and self-loathing that consumes them. The aggression, the anger, the malice—it’s all lurking just beneath the surface, ready to unleash itself once the thin threads of sanity and civility snap for whatever reason.

All of this is not only present in the eyes, it’s on the body as well. You can truly feel the damage, antipathy, and tension when you’re in physical contact with these women. It’s not a pleasant experience, and it’s not something you should ignore. We have instincts for a reason, and one of the perils of living in a modern liberal society is that we’ve been brainwashed from a young age to ignore these instincts.

Women over 30 prey upon this brainwashing by using words like “judgmental” or “paranoid” in an attempt to elicit shame, which is why these words should always viewed as unofficial synonyms for “gut feelings” and “intuition.” Pay attention to these gut feelings—they will be amplified when you’re in the hardened, unloving embrace of a declining older woman who has been through far too much to retain her humanity.

2. Tattoos That Look Like A Freeway Overpass In A Bad Neighborhood

Tried to kill yourself? Advertise it to the world know with a semicolon tattoo.

Are you a fan of boat anchors, punctuation marks, or winged insects? Does your dick get hard when you see a raccoon’s footprints, a horoscope sign, or Eeyore from Winnie the Pooh? If so, then I’ve got some news that will make your day: on single women over 30, you’ll get to look at these things constantly, seeing as most of them have deemed it prudent to have some high school dropout with shaky hands and a drug problem permanently scrawl this kind of retarded shit all over their bodies.

And to make matters worse, looking at this “artwork” is just the tip of the iceberg, because if you’ve made it to the point where you’re looking at it, then at least you’ve made it on to phase two in most cases: the point where you’re getting laid. Phase one is much worse. This is when you get to sit, listen, and pretend like you could give two shits and a greasy fart about the stories that come along with their perma-doodles. An example:

> Girl: “Yeah, so I decided to get a lion tattoo because I’m a Leo, and, I’m like, pretty ferocious, too.” (Lifts shirt to reveal jailhouse quality lion tattoo.)
>
> Me: “That’s a male lion, though.”
>
> Girl: “Yeah… so?”
>
> Me: “You’d think you would have gone with a female. If I got a lion tattoo, it would be a male, not a female, you know, because I’m a dude.”
>
> Girl: “What? Why not? What’s wrong with female lions? Besides, the Leo sign is a male.”
>
> Me: “The females are total pussies compared to the males.”
>
> Girl: “What? You can’t be serious! The females do all the hunting while the males just sit around all day!”
>
> Me: “Sounds like a great gig if you can get it. If things work out between us I’ll quit my job and hang out at home all day while you do all the money hunting, deal?”
>
> Loading…
> Girl: “Ha! Dream on!”
>
> Me: “Why not? I’ll give you an allowance. The male lion shares his food with the females. I don’t see a problem with giving you a small cut of the money you earn. But really, though, you should be ashamed of that tattoo—just sayin’.”
>
> Girl: “What? Never! Why?”
>
> Me: “Because when a male lion takes over a new pride, he kills the cubs of his predecessor. The king of the jungle doesn’t date single moms and he ain’t no cuck. You have a child murderer tattooed on your body. You’re a terrible person, and you’re going to hell.”
>
> Girl: “You’re fucking ridiculous! Haha, oh my god…”

As you can see, it’s a painful experience conversing with these empty-headed morons. And this was actually one of the more pleasant interactions because at least she knew something about lions, which was kind of nice. The worst one I’ve encountered so far was a chick with a semicolon tattoo, which, come to find out, represents when somebody has attempted suicide in the past. She was a real bundle of fucking joy to be around.

Look, here’s the deal with women and their tattoos: whatever reason they give you for having one, that reason exists just the same as it would without it. That idiot in the above exchange was born between July 23rd and August 22nd—she’s a Leo with or without the king of the jungle etched into her skin. If a relative or close friend has passed away, then getting a tattoo doesn’t somehow intensify one’s love for that individual, and it certainly doesn’t change the fact that they’re gone. If someone has accomplished something that makes them proud, a tattoo won’t make the accomplishment any more—or any less—significant.

When a woman gets a tattoo to serve as a reminder to be “strong” or to “persevere,” what’s she’s truly conveying is that she’s a weak-willed, simple-minded dumbass. Every human being who has ever existed has had to be strong and persevere on some level, and well over 99 percent of them managed to pull it off without some lame-ass motivational quote or Bible verse (Leviticus 19:28, anyone?) scrawled all over their bodies.

“But-but-but tattoos are common in many cultures and have been for centuries!” argues the 32-year-old strumpet who got a meaningless butterfly tramp stamp back in ’04 during one of her many alcohol and pecker fueled evenings at college, but says it’s to honor the dead grandma that she never called or visited at the nursing home located just down the street from her house. Correct, whore, tattoos are common in many cultures: savage, third world, haven’t-accomplished-shit cultures.

Heard of any groundbreaking technological breakthroughs or feats of engineering coming out of Western Samoa or Papua New Guinea recently? Yeah, me neither, but I’m sure they’ll get around to it—as soon as they’re done building houses out of doo-doo, and chucking rocks at coconut trees to knock down their fucking dinner.

Primitive people do primitive shit, which is why tatted up women have become so common in degenerate modern America. They’re doing what feral, uncivilized people have been doing all along: going backwards, not forward, and this is the direction things will continue heading for the foreseeable future.

Living the good life in Tattoodistan.

A single woman over 30—or any woman, for that matter—with tattoos is showcasing the fact that she makes bad decisions. Not only are these rapidly fading out symbols of sucking at life an eyesore, they’re also a clear and definitive indicator of when a woman is to serve strictly as a warm slab of meat for a man to temporarily stick his dick inside. As for any single women over 30 who are thinking about getting a new tattoo, allow me to make a recommendation:

"I Will Never Marry A Man Who Makes Good Money"

Unlike all of your other tattoos, at least that one wouldn't be bullshit.

1. Really Dark Buttholes

If you were to look through Ray Charles' eyes at a piece of sunburnt licorice trapped inside a smoke-filled car with tinted windows at midnight, then you would be well on your way to replicating the pitch black abyss that is the dookie dispenser of the average white woman over 30. It's absolutely disgusting.

You're probably wondering, "How the hell did you find out this information, A.V. Yader?" The fucking hard way—that's how. Now, I always practice safe sex with aging skanks: with the lights out, or, worse case scenario, very dim. This is so I don't see something I don't want to see. Taking this precaution has served me well for the most part, and has gone a long way in concealing all of the unsavory features that unfortunately exist in stronger lighting.

However, one day I met up with one of the chicks I was seeing for an afternoon sex session. She was acting a bit insecure and even said that she didn't want me to see her naked in the light. I took her hand and placed it on my semi-hard dick so she could feel it through my pants. I find doing this coupled with saying something like, "See what you do to me?" really diffuses these kinds of insecure moments when older females come to the realization that there are no Instagram filters or angle tricks to disguise the fact that they pretty much suck in real life.

Anyway, we started going at it. Everything is moving along as expected and I decided to finish things up doggy-style. I get her flipped over and start doing the "pronated two-handed grabber" on the ass-cheeks and spread 'em open a bit as I'm nailing her. And that's when I saw it for the first time: The Darkness. I slammed her ass-cheeks shut like they were my front door when a battalion of Watchtower wielding Jehovah's Witnesses show up looking for a new convert.

"Dear God… that wasn't shit, was it? Please tell me that wasn't shit," I thought as I closed my eyes while continuing to pound away. I did a few quick sniffs but didn't smell anything other than number four on this list in the air. At this point, I had to take a few seconds and calm down because I knew I would lose it if I looked again and discovered this woman hadn't showered or at least wiped her ass before inviting me over. After about a minute had passed, and after some additional mental preparation and feeling sorry for myself, I decided to take another peak at The Darkness.

I slowly parted her ass-cheeks again, my thrusting now reduced to a snail's pace…

"What are you doing back there?" inquired the owner of The Darkness.

"Uh, nothing, just fucking you…" I replied while staring in bewilderment at her diesel smoke tinted anus.

"You're looking at my ass aren't you… Mmmmm… it's all yours if you want it," she said while cocking her head to the side so she could see me through her peripheral vision. A mischievous looking grin emanated from her face.

"Not right now," I said while attempting to look like I would love the opportunity to bang her char-grilled, chewed-up bubble gum looking asshole at some point in the future.

"Mmmmm, well, whenever you want it, you got it, Daddy."

"Well that's just fucking great," I thought. I gave her a slightly sardonic grin in response, closed her ass-cheeks, and continued banging her with severely diminished avidity. Eventually, I finished. Afterward, we chilled on the bed and discussed the possibility of doing something together in the evening, but I was distracted: I just couldn't stop thinking about The Darkness…

> "What the hell was going on there?"
>
> "Well, it wasn't shit, so that was a plus… I guess."
>
> "I can't believe she wanted me to stick my dick in there… Bitch is out of her mind."
>
> "God… there's no way that was normal."
>
> "How is something like that even possible?"

As you can see, I had a lot of questions, and, at the time, no real answers. But later on in the evening, it hit me: all the anal sex this woman experienced throughout the years had more than likely darkened her sphincter. After all, she thought nothing of letting me just "stick it in" if I wanted to, so it certainly wasn't her first rodeo.

In Closing

The type of women discussed in this article all think they're "great catches." Don't believe me? Just ask them—they'll be more than happy to tell you how great they are. And you know what? The truth is they'll all end up married if that's what they want. They'll all end up with men who truly love them and worship the ground they walk on. This is the case for any marginally attractive female over 30, not just the ones I've dealt with directly. So, in reality, I guess they really are great catches because the majority of men out there are willing to prove them right.

This isn't to say these men will be dreams come true (they won't be), but if you're clinging to the notion that these women will hit "the wall"—that there will be abject loneliness, cats, and dildos with (really dark) butthole ticklers serving as the only things keeping them company, then I'm afraid you're mistaken. The wall is nothing more than a chain-link fence at this point, and there are desperate and clueless men sitting at the ready with bolt cutters in hand, just waiting for the opportunity to cut out a nice hole for these low-rent skanks to pass through.

This can be extremely frustrating. If men won't hold these women to any kind of standards, then what incentive is there for them to become something that resembles decent human beings? Things will never get better until men collectively tell these women that they're straight-up not fucking good enough—because they're not. When I see men rewarding these women with committed relationships, or, worse yet, moving in together and marrying them, I often find myself thinking of this quote from Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four:

> He wondered, as he had many times wondered before, whether he himself was a lunatic. Perhaps a lunatic was simply a minority of one… But the thought of being a lunatic did not greatly trouble him; the horror was that he might also be > wrong…

Chances are this will strike a chord with you because often, out in the real world, you'll be the only person you know who actually thinks about anything beyond the topical and the frivolous. You'll see men shacking up with society's unflushable turds and find that you're the only one saying, "What the hell is wrong with all of these guys, what are they thinking?"

The fact of the matter is they aren't thinking. Much like Winston Smith lamented how he was possibly the only man to see the Party for the sham it truly was—that only he possessed the common sense and clairvoyance necessary to see deep into the truth of things—you may also find yourself feeling similarly isolated and disillusioned. You'll be "a minority of one," an army you, and you alone.

This is not something that should cause consternation, however; it's something that should be cherished and held dear. I used to be of the opinion that happiness was an emotional luxury afforded only to those with an inability to cogitate—that the more a man thinks, the less happy he will be. This is not the case at all, provided you equate truth with happiness. It can be easy to assume a negative outlook when you're the only man not playing the game. But take solace in the fact that all of those other guys aren't playing the game, either—it's playing them, and there are very few winners when it's all said and done.

The men who marry these degenerate women and prop them up don't have the truth, and, therefore, they don't have true happiness. They're living through a carefully constructed ruse, an act where the female is the star and director, and only she decides when, where, and how the curtain will fall—and fall it will. Never covet the lie, and never feel despondent when observing those men who buy into the lie displaying their mock happiness: their emotional currency is counterfeit, and their time is borrowed.

You will never be one of those men so long as you choose the truth. The truth serves as a shield against the machinations of the malefactors and the interlopers: you can't be fucked with when the truth is in your corner. And a man who can’t be with fucked is a man who has all he needs to make it through this hell called the modern dating scene while still living a happy, fulfilling life. Whether he’s perceived as a lunatic by the bystanders doesn’t mean shit—because the bystanders don’t mean shit. And that’s the truth.

Read More: Never Date A Woman Who Takes One Of These Prescription Drugs

A.V. Yader

A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

The Boy Scouts Is No Longer A Place For Young Males

June 26, 2017 | by Wayne Star | Link | Original Link

Back in the 1970s, my big brother was a cub scout and our mom was den leader. We put paper bags on our heads and beat each other with rolled up newspapers and went to the state capitol in Salem but that is about all I remember. Never once did I think, “How can my mom teach boys to be men?” The scouts have rapidly changed for the worse since then.

My experiences hiking near scouts

At sixteen years old, after a lifetime of my super dad teaching my brother and I to hunt, fish, shoot, fight, hike and swim, I took a seven-day hike alone in the Alpine Lakes Wilderness prior to my senior year in high school.

There, one afternoon, as I set down my lightweight, streamlined pack to set up my small tent, a scout troop of pudgy kids my age showed up. The entire twenty-boy group showed up in a delicate pristine alpine lake meadow and dutifully began attacking every tree in sight with the hatchets they had carried in their clunky, falling apart ancient-ass backpacks.

After thoroughly destroying the meadow full of trees that took a hundred years to grow ten feet tall in order to build a bundle of sticks they called a “raft,” they all tried to light the remaining trees they had cut down on fire to cook the cans of beans they had brought.

Eagle Scout material

Since I had been hiking alone for a week I hung out with them and learned that they were all Mormon boys from the same “ward.” The ones who could swim jumped off some cliffs with me into the lake. One ran off because there was a bee chasing him (recall that we were all about sixteen). Out of the twenty, maybe two were interesting.

All of them had no idea how I was hiking the Alpine Lakes Wilderness at sixteen alone for seven days. Their minds were blown. Most hoped that, someday, their moms might allow them to camp alone overnight someplace near their homes. Most had never killed anything larger than a fish and, though all had dozens of merit badges, not a single one had any practical outdoor skills.

As night came so did an amazing thunderstorm. As I enjoyed it in the comfort of my tent, two of the boys who thought it would be cool to “sleep under the stars” came to my tent asking for shelter. I let them in because I wasn’t an asshole yet back then. A moment later their leader came and took them back to his tent because they weren’t allowed to share tents with strangers. No doubt those boys learned a lot that night.

I hike and climb a lot and the scene I just played out, in one form or another, repeats itself everywhere I go. Fat leaders hiking with shitty, Walmart gear lead equally clueless kids with full garbage bags over their shoulders, miserable and breathless after three flat miles on easy trails. They camp in groups larger than the sites can support and proceed to trash the place, leaving shit everywhere.

The new and improved boy scouts

Welcome to scouting in the 21st century. A white-knight factory of political correctness where odd-ball omega boys are sent by their uninvolved parents to learn “scouty things.” If the boys are lucky they will get trained by a merit badge counselor who learned the task they are teaching from YouTube the previous week using the most outdated methods and gear possible. This five-minute exposure to a task earns them a little patch for their sash.

It wasn't always like that. At one time, scouting represented traditional American values of dignity and honor, so the left decided it must die. They won. Not only are your boys being taught by the nice old man down the street who just so happens to have a lot of extra boy-sized backpacks (child molester?), but today's boy scouts can also be mentally ill girls who think they are boys or they can be gay boys who want to touch other boys' naughty parts.

"Daddy, why don't we do scouts?"

Once, one of my five kids asked why we didn't do scouting and I said it would interfere too much with our mountaineering, hiking, hunting, and fishing trips.

My kids and I have climbed the highest volcanoes in the Pacific Northwest, skied down them, caught salmon, killed deer, ducks and pheasants and at eleven they begin belaying each other as we rock climb. We built our damn tree house together and they all received their own pocket knives at age eight. My boys can fold an American Flag and my girls cook better than most twenty somethings. The LAST thing my kids need is some pansy, milksop chi-mo scout leader teaching them to become the fat kid from the movie UP.

Most of my acquaintances who have odd-ball, nerdy kids send them to Boy Scouts meetings (after karate practice, we'll talk about THAT joke another day) where they learn things like how to tie a sheepshank (a knot that can get you killed) or how to start a fire using anything and everything EXCEPT the way we all do it with—a $0.99 Bic lighter.

Craig knows how masculine men father their boys and he is missing a leg. What is your excuse?

A sampling of what scouting has become can be seen in their rule books: “Water guns and rubber band guns must only be used to shoot at targets, and eye protection must be worn.” And, “For water balloons, use small, biodegradable balloons, and fill them no larger than a ping pong ball.” We used to beat kids up who said faggoty shit like that.

Conclusion

If I could design a factory to produce beta losers, I could do no better than the Boy Scouts of America. So if you need babysitting once a month and you are worried that your son isn’t becoming enough of a mamma’s boy you can send him to scout meetings and sleep peacefully knowing he will never see female genitalia without supplying his credit card number first.

Read More: 15 Ways Masculine Schools Can Turn Boys Into Men

Wayne Star

After work, when Wayne isn't climbing in the mountains he is brewing beer, making music, skiing, hunting, working out, or dating girls who can keep up. Teacher, firefighter, cop, mountain guide and florist are all hats that Wayne has worn with pride.

Trapped On The Ocean Floor: A Stunning Tale Of Maritime Survival

June 26, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Cape Sable in Nova Scotia has been the scene of many hundreds of shipwrecks over the centuries. According to one reliable chronicler of the days of sail, that number is close to 340. I remember the story of one such wreck that stands out for the extraordinary tale of suffering and survival it contains. We will tell the tale of the wreck of the schooner Cod Seeker, which went down on May 9, 1877.

The Cod Seeker was a two-masted fishing vessel built at Clyde River, Nova Scotia, in 1877; after being provisioned and fitted at Halifax, it embarked on its first cruise with a crew of 13 and a captain named Philip Brown. Codfish was her object; then as now, the cod industry was a key part of the economy of the area. (I should add that I myself worked at a codfish processing house on the New Bedford waterfront before going to college).

But the ship ran into rough seas near Baccaro Light and capsized a few days after leaving Halifax. In the confusion and chaos surrounding the disaster, the captain and another crewman jumped into a dory (a shallow-bottomed boat) to get away from the schooner, which by now had rolled over in the water amid turbulent seas. Since it was night, he could not see who else had been able to get off the wreck. The captain was able to guide the dory to Cape Sable Island, where he organized a rescue team to head back out to sea to hunt for survivors of the Cod Seeker.

The rescue mission picked up four sailors, but they were not aware that two crewmen (Samuel Atwood and James Smith) were actually trapped inside the forecastle of the capsized boat, surviving in a pocket of trapped air. The two men were at first amazed that the entire compartment had not flooded, but the air pocket managed to keep the water level from rising. There was some food and provisions in the forecastle, but not much; at most they would have enough for a few days.

The water level, however, gradually began to rise. At first it was only about 4 feet deep; but then the men noticed a gradual and steady increase in the level. But they were soon aware of something even more horrifying: the schooner was sinking. Dropping below the ocean surface, the terrified men felt the ship going down, down, and still further down. Eventually they felt the ship rattle as it hit the ocean floor; the masts hit first, and then the hull. The ship settled into new position, and the men could only hope that death might come quickly, perhaps through asphyxiation or perhaps through the crushing of the ship's hull by water pressure.

But after a few hours something very strange began to happen: the ship slowly righted itself and slowly, slowly started to float to the surface. What had happened? Cod boats in those days carried large, heavy bins of salt to preserve the fish caught at sea. The weight of the salt had undoubtedly helped carry the Cod Seeker to the bottom; but when the salt dissolved in the flooded ship, it lost this weight, and was carried back to the surface.

Although Atwood and Smith had been saved from certain death, they were still back in their original predicament. The air in the compartment had nearly lost its oxygen, and the men were suffering from the symptoms of carbon monoxide poisoning. By this time they had been in the forecastle for about eighty hours, and the ship had drifted far in the ocean currents.

An American schooner from Maine named the Ohio was cruising near Seal Island (in the Gulf of Maine) when the lookout spotted a shape on the ocean surface that he took to be a whale. As they sailed closer, they realized it was a floating shipwreck. The Ohio's captain launched two of his men to investigate; and the men climbed aboard the hull of the Cod Seeker to have a look at the situation. As they did, they began to hear a steady pounding coming from within the hull. With a shock they realized that there were living men entombed in the ship, and called for an axe to be brought immediately.

Yet more danger awaited. As the axes crashed through the hull of the ship to liberate the two men inside who were already near death, the pressurized air within burst out, and the water level began to rise again. The ship was sinking, and quickly. By breaking into the pocket of air in the ship, they had inevitably allowed the water to resume the flooding of the forecastle. It was now a race against time to make the hole big enough to get the two men out before the ship sank for good beneath the waves. They won the race against time. After being trapped for ninety hours in the hold of the Cod Seeker, both Atwood and Smith were rescued.

Amazingly, the Cod Seeker did not go to the bottom after the rescue. The ship was towed to Port Maitland in Nova Scotia, repaired, and sent back out to sea. The further adventures of the Cod Seeker are not known to history, but it is said that Atwood and Smith thereafter looked as if the stress of the ordeal had aged them many years.

Read More: Adrift In The Arctic: The Incredible Story Of Bruce Gordon

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

4 Alternate Cardiovascular Exercises When You're Incapable Of Running

June 26, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

In April 2016 I was in a serious car accident that gave me what is known as a lisfranc dislocation, in which the metatarsals are dislocated from their accompanying connective tissues. For many months I was incapable of walking or doing any of the exercise that I typically enjoy doing.

Since then I have regained almost all of my capabilities. I am capable of lifting weights and doing calisthenics and martial arts (with a few minor modifications, such as kicking with the ball of the foot or instep being right out). However, running is still not something I can do, and will likely not be able to do for at least another year, if at all.

While some may not find this as disappointing as me, something we can all agree on is the vital importance of cardiovascular training. Being able to elevate your heart rate and develop endurance is one of the best things you can do for general health and well-being.

So knowing that, I realized that I had to find various ways of elevating my heart rate now that just going out and hoofing it wasn't really an option. And with all that introduction out of the way, here are the five cardiovascular exercises that I have been utilizing since I have regained some degree of physical capability.

1. Stationary Cardio

You're probably familiar with things like the stationary bike and the elliptical. I want to make something very clear here: I hate stationary cardio. The idea of working hard and not accomplishing anything—not even forward movement—is something I find utterly detestable. In short, I have no desire to be akin to a hamster running on his little wheel in his cage.

That being said, I have been forced to adapt and in some ways I see advantages to them. Namely that these machines have quantifiable metrics of time, rate of movement, and heart rate on them that running outside does not. In a pinch, these can work for cardio purposes.

2. Swimming

Probably my favorite non-running form of cardio, swimming is in some ways superior to its terrestrial counterpart. It's much lower impact on the joints and bones, and it trains essentially all of the muscles of both the upper and lower body.

Plus, you can do swimming of any intensity (while you can theoretically do interval training on a machine, the pounding and rumbling of your body weight on the machine might alarm your fellow gymgoers). You can also do interval training with different strokes or alternate from long distance endurance training to high intensity/low intensity interval training.

The only problem with swimming is that swimming in a pool might have the same issue that running on a cardio machine might have—it's kind of boring visually, to swim back and forth in the lanes of the pool.

Of course if you have miles of open sea/river lanes to swim in, by all means swim in there instead. But it's not very common where I live. So, to the issue of boredom, I say "Deal with it".

3. Shadowboxing

Just as Jack Dempsey says in Championship Fighting, boxing (or any martial art, really) is at its core a very disjointed and awkward sort of movement, certainly different from the rhythmic repetitions of other forms of cardio. Because of this, throwing punches and kicks will get your heart pounding and breathing more labored in short order.

More of a sprint than a distance run, my method of doing this is to throw combinations of punches kicks, and other strikes on the bag or in the air, as hard and fast as I can for a minute or so. Then stop, take a break for 10-20 seconds, and repeat. With just 10-20 minutes of this you will have an outstanding cardio workout.

4. Circuit Training

Circuit training is an example of how resistance training can be utilized for cardiovascular purposes. This is simply where many sets and repetitions of resistance exercise are followed one after the other, with as little rest period between them as possible.

While this can provide a decent cardio and strength workout, it does not provide the maximal workout for either attribute, because maximal strength lifting requires a longer rest period to allow cellular respiration to work and regain cellular energy. As such it would not be my first choice, but it is a nice variation

By giving you information like this, I am attempting to teach you that even if you are handicapped in some fashion, you can still get just as good a cardio workout as an able bodied person. If you are at all capable of movement, there's no excuse for poor cardio.

Read More: 5 Reasons Men Should Limit Their Cardio

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

6 Tips For Long-Term Success In Corporate America

June 27, 2017 | by J. Wilkes Boothe | Link | Original Link

A fellow commenter on ROK requested I write an article for younger guys heading into the corporate world. My gut says to tell you “Don’t do it!”, but I realize not everyone is an entrepreneur. There is still safety, security and money to be made in corporate America, but you have to play the game and conform to corporate culture. With rare exceptions, innovation, creativity and thinking outside the box are stifled, not rewarded.

I’ve worked for corporations from utilities to manufacturing since 1981. It has paid the bills well. If you can handle politics and diplomacy, you’ll probably do fine. If you are careless, arrogant or even highly principled expect trouble. Here are some lessons I’ve learned over the years.

One “Awww-shit!” wipes out all your “Attaboys”

The great job you did yesterday doesn't matter if you screw up royally. You are only as good as you are for the day and no one is indispensable. Working in a corporation is like putting your finger in a bucket of water. Pull it out. See if it leaves a hole.

You are there primarily to generate profit or to support the people who do. They are not your family; you are a "human resource." Don't forget that. If you get sick or injured they will forget about you like a broken toy and replace you. You are also there to make your superiors look good. What you do reflects on the people that hired you, so be punctual, conscientious and knowledgeable. On the other hand, don't do such a good job that you are perceived as a threat by your boss.

Don't get your honey where you get your money

She's laughing at your email, but HR won't be…

Live by it. There are attractive women in most corporate facilities. If you are remotely attractive, they will flirt with you. You will want to flirt back if you are a normal male. If you aren't careful, things may escalate and you will find yourself in a relationship that will probably end up in the toilet within six months. Then you have to look at each other every day. It will be uncomfortable.

I have seen work place love affairs end careers; in one case even a senior executive's. Be polite to the ladies, be nice, but remain aloof and stay out of office romances. This warning also applies to keeping HR off your back for sexual harassment charges. I don't care how horny you are or how hot the girls are, leave your love life at the door. It will save you a lot of trouble.

Beware of CLM: Career Limiting Mouth

I had a chronic disease as a young man: Career Limiting Mouth. When someone came up with a stupid idea, I couldn't shut up. I'd point it out and it didn't matter that I was right. What mattered was that I alienated people. That will be reflected in your performance reviews, no matter how good a job you do otherwise.

You have two ears and one mouth. Use them accordingly; listen twice as much as you talk. You will learn a lot from the folks who know what they're doing. You will also learn a lot about those folks who are doing things they shouldn't. Simply do what your supervisor tells you no matter how stupid it seems (unless it's illegal or dangerous). Just be sure to document it. If it blows up, go back to your supervisor, explain what happened and ask, "Now what do you want me to do?"

Write everything down

Keep a notebook or journal. If you must keep an e-log, then back it up to your personal flash drive. The same with emails. Whatever you're told to do or see going on that is questionable, document it! Include times, dates, names and places.

Journal entries reign supreme, because you're not relying on memory. If you're Machiavellian this can be a handy tool for future "leverage." It is also a very useful self-defense weapon, especially if you become a whistle blower.

If you want a peaceful mediocre existence in a big corporation to get your "thirty" in and retire, don't be a whistle blower. If you have principles, balls and don't mind getting fired for doing what's right, then be sure to write everything down. Trust me on this.

Your skill set is very important

Industrial automation skills are always in demand

Some trades and disciplines are quite rare and valuable. Try to find a niche. For example, there are a lot of IT folks on the market so competition for jobs is fierce. But if you can write code and administer networks, you can easily learn to work with Distributed Control Systems (DCS), Programmable Logic Controllers (PLC) and Human Machine Interfaces (HMI).

Automation skills are always in high demand in heavy industry and manufacturing. My niche is instrumentation and control systems. There are numerous jobs and never enough techs to fill them. Field service work pays good money and you get to travel as much as (or more than) you want. Plus you'll have more autonomy than the standard corporate drone.

If you'd like to cruise along doing minimal work, find a job at a utility. They pay you to be on hot standby a lot, because when things are running and nothing's broken, you can't touch anything. You will work outages and maintenance shutdowns periodically which can be hectic. But you'll get plenty of overtime and the money's good. With big utilities, once you're in the door, the bar is so "high" if you pick up your feet you won't trip over it.

If you are in a skilled craft, your supervisor may ask you to do a "government project" from time to time. For instance, I recently had a request to make a crossover cable so a supervisor could transfer data on a couple of his home computers. Don't balk, just do it. You're getting paid and it goes a long way when you need a favor in the future.

Do yourself a favor: Conform!

I wonder why he can't find a good job…

If you must get tattoos, keep them where you can cover them in normal attire (including short sleeves). If you show up for an interview with full sleeve and neck tattoos, a steel pimple in your eyebrow and ear gauges, the hiring manager probably won't be impressed.

It's all about conformity in corporate America. If you "stand out" you won't get in the door. If you're already in and to go non-conformist think of yourself as that nail sticking up out of the back deck. You will get pounded down. If you won't stay down, you'll get pulled and replaced. Hygiene and appearance are very important. Always be neat, clean and well dressed even if you're in a craft.

Be nice to everyone you meet from the janitor to the CEO. Having a reputation as a nice guy is an asset. Always remember that the toes you step on today may be attached to the ass you have to kiss tomorrow.

Read Next: 5 Things The Corporate World Taught Me

J. Wilkes Boothe
J. Wilkes Boothe is a rugged individualist who went down the rabbit hole long before there was a red pill. A staunch enemy of the state, he can be found enjoying fine firearms and fast motorcycles when he's not exposing truth through the written word.

Women Who Don’t Have Babies Go Crazy

June 27, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A girl recently told me that she hopes her female dog would breed. Otherwise, the dog may have a false pregnancy where she pretends she is pregnant and shows increasingly unstable behavior. This was the first time I learned about the scientific condition in dogs called pseudopregnancy. I was immediately struck by how similar it is to the behavior of adult human women who don’t have babies, especially ones who live in the affluent West. After studying this condition extensively, I speculate that women who don’t fulfill their biological program of having children exhibit the disturbing signs of false pregnancy by becoming insane.

The symptoms of false pregnancy stem from hormonal changes. The female dog, which I will refer to as the “bitch” from this point on, experiences enlarged mammary glands and may secrete milk. Her abdominum swells, she gains weight, the vagina discharges a fluid, and there may be nausea and vomiting. The bitch may even exhibit cravings for certain foods alongside increased appetite.

Emotional changes are soon to follow. The bitch shows overt emotional attachment and even defensiveness for abstract objects like toys or clothing. Her nesting instinct causes her to hoard random objects like tennis balls, and she will often appear confused or disoriented. Other symptoms include aggression, depression, restlessness, and anxiety.

When I read the symptoms of canine false pregnancy, I realized that the majority of childless women over the age of 25 exhibit the exact same symptoms. The most obvious symptom that we can visually observe is weight gain. It is hard, if not impossible, to find a female past her fertile prime that is of normal weight. Next, the human female shows emotional attachment to objects that are outside of her personal domain of home and family, specifically minorities and Islamic migrants. A childless woman collects animals and third world migrants like a bitch collects tennis balls, as if she is their mother trying to protect them from danger, but of course poor brown people are not her children, and may view her as stupid.

Refugees Welcome
RUPTLY

#LOVE
REFUGEES

The barren human female also displays aggression against those who threaten her "children." If you try to take away a tennis ball of a bitch who has false pregnancy, she will attack you. The same happens if you try to "take away" the brown migrants that a human female has coveted. She will be vicious in calling you racist, fascist, literally Hitler, and whatever bad man of history that she happens to remember from her history classes in high school.

Understand that aggression is the most dominant trait of the false pregnancy, because the bitch actually believes that someone is trying to kill her “offspring.” In human females, you see displays so full of anger and violence that even include calls for an uprising that overthrows or kills a democratically elected president. The nurturing instinct, which is useful in women who have children, goes horribly wrong in women who fail to have children.

If a woman doesn’t hoard brown migrants, she will procure a cat or dog and pretend that the animal is a human child. It is now common to see women dress up their pets as if they’re actual humans and talk to them using a baby voice. The motherly instinct becomes hijacked by these furry animals.

The other symptoms of false pregnancy, such as depression, restlessness, and anxiety, seem to perfectly describe childless Western females, who are so mentally ill that at least 25% of them need to be medicated with pharmaceutical drugs. The combination of their sterility and the extreme enabling of their behavior in Western culture has created a perfect storm that is leading to societal mass hysteria.

It turns out that false pregnancy is common in the mammalian world, occurring not only in dogs but also cats, mice, swine, and yes, humans. In human cases, the woman has to think she is falsely pregnant to be diagnosed with the disorder, but I believe that a woman experiences the same symptoms without actually thinking she is pregnant. When reading the scientific literature on female dogs, I had to remind myself that it wasn't about human females—that's how similar the clinical presentation of the symptoms are.

If you know a woman who is showing signs of false pregnancy, I recommend you do an intervention to remind her that she is not pregnant, brown migrants are not her children, and Donald Trump is not a threat to her pug. Unfortunately, there is no cure unless she actually becomes pregnant, but that would require her to emotionally bond with another human being and sacrifice for its needs in a way that goes beyond superficial virtue signalling. That may be asking for the impossible, but unless women start having babies, I expect them to continue descending into greater levels of madness.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: The Future Mother Of Your Child Should Be A Virgin Who Believes In God

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Things To Do At The Moment Your Ideal Girl Walks By You

June 27, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by Daytime Dating.

There can be no doubt that in 2017 day game is an essential skill that all men need to learn. If you are not already approaching girls that you see as you go about your daily life, such as when you are travelling to work, shopping, or going to the gym, you are missing out on countless opportunities that could lead to intimacy.

The decline in night game in most Western countries has by now been well documented. Clubs are noisy, expensive, crowded, and filled with girls only looking for validation. Thanks to Tinder and other dating apps, women have lost the urgency to meet men as their attention spans become seriously compromised by the prospect of their next right swipe.

Day game, on the other hand, is still a viable option for guys hoping to meet someone of the opposite sex. The fact is you see a lot more beautiful girls around in the day than you do in the club, since not every hot girl around likes to party to Afrojack every night of the week. Another thing is that the girls you talk to in the day time are unlikely to be drunk and even better, they're often alone, so you don't have to deal with their cockblocker friends.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, day game works well because if you do it right, the girl will feel like she's living a scene from her favorite romantic movie, and be more ready to invest in a relationship with you as a result.

All that said, here are five tips to follow when you go out to meet girls in the daytime…

1. Be direct and sincere

Girls are busy just like we are, and the last thing they need is some guy they don't know coming up and wasting their time. For that reason, it works really well if you're upfront and honest in your approach. For example, you might say something like "Hey, I just noticed you and you looked really interesting. I wanted to say Hi. I'm Jeff. What's your name?"

While it's possible some girls may shrug off such an opener and go about their business (as perhaps they are married, in a serious relationship, or simply not interested), many will be flattered that you took the time to open them with a compliment in a socially calibrated manner.

From there you might make a small observation about her, based on her clothing or style. Whether your observation is accurate or not, this should lead into a conversation about what she is actually doing.

Don't be tempted to go overboard with game tactics: she's much more likely to want to meet a normal, confident guy for a drink than someone who comes over as too "game-y".

2. Don't be afraid to be a little nervous

It’s absolutely fine if you’re a little nervous—in fact if anything it can be an advantage. You don’t want to come across to her as the kind of guy who’s done this with the last ten women he’s met. Far better to seem slightly shy—it only makes the whole thing more authentic.

Of course, if you genuinely are very nervous about approaching women then this is something you’re going to have to get handled when you start day game. By far my favorite technique for overcoming nerves is to remind myself that just by making an approach at all I’m putting myself ahead of 95% of other men who would never dare do such a thing. From there I choose only to “reward myself” for making the approach, regardless of what the outcome might be. So even if she rejects me, I congratulate myself for having tried anyway.

3. Don’t make the reason you’re going out to be solely about hitting on women

Rather than going out with the intention of picking up women, it is far better you do so as part of your everyday routine. That way your interactions will seem natural and unforced.

I work in the center of a major city and I travel to my office on the subway. In the mornings I make it a habit to approach at least one girl before I get to work. By doing this, I break through any “approach anxiety” I might be feeling early in the day, and you’d be surprised how many girls are receptive to a pleasant approach this early too.

Later in the morning I will get an approach in as I go to my local coffee shop, or when I go to the grocery store for lunch. An easy way to open girls here is by making a humorous comment about the food or beverage they’ve selected.

Finally, a great time of day to approach is in the evening when girls are on their way home from work. Most are happy to be getting out of the office and are chatty as a result: doubly so if she’s been for an after-work drink with colleagues.

4. Get her number and text her

This may sound obvious but it’s vital. In the day time, numbers are far more important than in night game and a two-minute conversation in the street can easily lead to a date that night. So always ask for the number and always follow up with a text. You never know what might happen, particularly since girls will be excited to hear from you as you’re not just another ‘bar guy.’

When texting a new girl keep things light and humorous and bear in mind that, while it’s great if you can spark up some witty conversation on SMS, the main object of the exercise is to get get her out on a date.

For example, if you commented on the red dress she was wearing when you met, you might open with something like “Hey, so it’s red dress girl from earlier.” Then you can ask her about her day or whatever, before saying something like “Well, it sounds like you could do with some relaxation. We really should meet for drinks: how about X Bar at 7pm tomorrow?”

5. Do not follow her

Approach her, touch her shoulder and then HOLD YOUR GROUND. She may well keep walking a few steps before she works out that you are not a beggar. Stay still and wait until she faces you, stops, or walks back. Do not be tempted to walk after her: it looks weak, needy, and at worst, potentially threatening.

At this point you should simply tell her that you saw her walking past, that you think she looks cool and you would like to introduce yourself. Again, some girls may not stop, and that's fine: far better to weed out definite "no" girls up front and early.

Others will be receptive and stop to chat. With these you can be confident that there is at least a baseline level of interest. Go into normal conversation before saying "I've really enjoyed talking to you. I have to meet friends now, but let me take your number and I'll message you. We should meet for drinks another time." Then you can simply hand her your phone open to the contacts page so she can enter her details.

To become really proficient in day game, though, it's worth investing in high-quality training in order to ensure that you have the most cutting-edge techniques at your disposal. For that reason you should to check out Daytime Dating by Jeremy Soul from Love Systems. It will allow you to…

- Be able to comfortably and easily talk to women that interest you with potent daytime dating tips in all different types of social settings
- Have complete freedom and choice in your love life
- Meet, attract, and date attractive girls (who share your interests)
- Know how to attract beautiful girls without having to use cheesy pick up lines or pretend to be someone you're not
- And do all of this without feeling awkward, nervous, manipulative, or at a loss for words

Daytime Dating is a tried and tested, 3-part system you can use to meet, attract, and date any of the gorgeous women you just happen to see during your day-to-day life. Learn how to date a beautiful woman through a rigorous program that contains three parts:

- Part 1: Preparation (The When, Where, and How)
- Part 2: Emotional Progression (What to Say and Do)
- Part 3: Physical Progression (How to Get What You Want)

Daytime Dating equips you with the approaches, insights, and skills that you need to quickly and easily transform your interactions with women, as well as techniques to get past your own issues, gain confidence, and turn that corner towards the life you want, all without the fear of rejection, uncomfortable pauses, or not knowing what to say. To learn more about Daytime Dating click here.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Youtuber PewDiePie Has Red Pilled More People Than Anyone Else In The World

June 27, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

A website such as Return of Kings has reached a quite impressive following and as a part of the greater manosphere, perhaps even affecting the presidential election. If one takes the alt light, alt right, 4Chan and other fuzzy movements and initiatives into account, there is a quite huge front against the matrix, which in turn hinges on the nexus between globalism, big corps, mainstream media, leftist politics and cultural Marxism.

Since the establishment opponent is indeed very powerful, it is crucial to have a significant number of influential people on one's side. Consider Swedish Youtuber Felix "PewDiePie" Kjellberg, who has managed to red pill more people than any relatively influential alt-writer can even dream of, and has realized what it means to swim against the mainstream current. I will explain why, how, and to which extent the works of PewDiePie matters in relationship to significant cultural and social change.

Massive fame and following

Born in 1989, PewDiePie dropped out of a technical university in 2011 while living in Gothenberg, Sweden, and started his later to be massive YouTube channel.

One year later, he had about 2,500 followers and was already in a relationship with his Italian girlfriend and likewise vlogger Marzia Bisognin, whom he – not surprisingly – met online. Today they live in Brighton, England, where their videos are produced.

Although the content has become more diverse over the years, his signum is to comment while playing various video games. While his techniques were rather simple, he took the advantage with simultaneous screens and mixed it with huge amounts of spontaneous humor and real or displayed outbreaks.

In early 2013 his following had reached over 15 million. Today that number is, despite some controversies along the way, 55 million! Paradoxically, controversy has helped his following to grow, since the events displayed the media's lack of facts and reason, which led to increasing numbers of sympathizers.

In 2016, Time Magazine called PewDiePie one of the 100 most influential persons in the world. If PewDiePie says big boobs or the media sucks, a big portion of the Internet will repeat it.

Ethos

[image]

Whether PewDiePie does something as trivial as playing a new video game or dissing feminists, social justice warriors, or the Wall Street Journal, his ability to persuade stems from his fame. However, that in turn has been created because of his particular personality and behavior.

In rhetoric, this is called ethos. Although a gamer, and not the type of player which ROK often refers to, he is good-looking, smart, funny, creative, has a hot girlfriend, and lots of cash and fame. He is the epitome of the global fame of youngsters, although not as impressive as let's say Christiano Ronaldo, the world's best soccer player.

He's a symbol that any random guy can become someone big, without lots of formal education and/or establishment backing, while doing something as relaxing and undemanding as playing video games and uploading YouTube videos.

Although he can use fact-based, sound and coherent arguments (logos), and occasionally real or exaggerated feelings (pathos), it is the ethos which is PewDiePie's main strength as an influential Internet personality.

Sexism

The reason why PewDiePie has become controversial is largely because of accusations of sexism. One might even view his behavior, including the notorious bro fist, as a form of toxic masculinity. The way his eyes turn big while zooming in big boobs on slender girls in video games is a palpable manifestation of the male gaze, which feminists are obsessed about (likely because no high-value man will gaze at them in the way they look at attractive women).

This is magnified by his blonde looks. A straight white guy simply cannot remain unpunished when he quasi-drools over virtual Asian and Caucasian hotties.

Much of the so-called sexism is linked to when PewDiePie plays certain video games, but also with regard to how he responds to some of his critics (he has dissed Buzzfeed in the past). There is also no sign that he will stop pissing politically correct progressives off, especially real people who have the audacity to confront him without any real factual or logical basis, particularly if they try to reprimand males while just looking and behaving stupid themselves.

As the video below shows, he supports his young male fan base who often has to withstand young girls' entitled and condescending behavior.

General political incorrectness and enfant terrible personality

Some of PewDiePie's YouTube videos have caused outrage because they are "anti-Semitic" and "racist." For instance, he has made multiple Jew and Hitler jokes and taken this a bit too far for the establishment to accept. Additionally he has also said the N word and commented on black persons, although without any explicit "racism".

It is also possible to find a little bit of "homophobia" in there as well, probably as a consequence of PewDiePie's spontaneity while playing. The critique mostly shows how far things can be taken in current times in terms of thought-crime and newspeak.

In February this year PewDiePie was under a coordinated attack from the mainstream media and social justice warriors (the Wall Street Journal in particular), which caused him to lose his contract with Disney. Although he is still on YouTube and does his thing, he had to make amends and has toned down some of the controversial elements, as well as deleted some of the supposedly offensive material.

If anything, this indicates that even an Internet personality has limitations. On one hand he is part of a decentralized, digital global structure, but simultaneously he has to conform to big corps and Google hegemony, which is linked to computational science, network theory, information processing, and centralized control mechanisms.

If one loses the platform, and only has limited options at one's disposal, then many will choose to be controlled opposition. At least they can get some purple pills out there. Ironically as it may seem, he is a product of globalization while also a threat to it.

And as far as the post-outrage content from the world's greatest YouTuber indicates, PewDiePie will continue to annoy people, whether general SJWs, mainstream media outlets, and even some of the big corps. He has that type of enfant terrible personality paired with confidence, which makes him almost unable to stop. He might take a few steps back before he once again moves forward. And after all, why would a person with 55 million subscribers back down when dumb girls and petty cucks tell him what he should do?

Conclusion

PewDiePie hasn't completely taken the red pill, but because of his massive influence and particular persona he is able to speak more truths and make his audience absorb them than any other alternative individual. And whatever he might lack in logos, he can get from sites like this, and then use his ethos to get the word out.

The end goal is not to have more guys into video game but rather the opposite, and to reach higher planes of individuality and personal development. Or as we Swedes say: Jävligt bra gjort, snubbe.

Read More: 3 Ways Women Have Ruined Video Games

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Why Being Good Looking Is Not Enough To Be Successful With Women

June 28, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Unless you have the kind of good looks that are absolutely irrefutable, relying on them to pick up women is not a robust strategy and you will have to learn game. Why? Because the results that a man can achieve solely through his appearance are hugely inconsistent and not to be relied upon.

This is why the concept of 'leagues' in the sexual marketplace is a flawed one. If you see a girl and fail to approach her because you think she's 'out of your league' then you are doing yourself a disservice because you can never know for sure what physical type she prefers in a man before you walk up to her.

Looks Are An Inconsistent Indicator Of Success

To explain what I mean, let me tell you a little about my own experience. Of course, it is difficult for anyone to be completely objective about their appearance, but if forced to describe myself I'd probably go for something like "quite good looking, not particularly tall."

While I have definitely attracted women on the basis of my looks without having to run a great deal of game, I am certainly not in the male model category I mention above.

For full disclosure a girl I slept with a couple of years ago rated me, unprompted, as an 8.5 . My feeling is that she was being somewhat generous, and that you should definitely shave a point or two off of that. In fact, I am somewhere in the vast, grey middle of male SMV, where I suspect many other guys—probably most guys—sit also.

What does this mean for my results with women? That they are inconsistent (when based solely on looks) and at times wildly unpredictable. I have pulled 9s and I have been brutally rejected by 6s.

When I look back at photographs of myself at college or university I can see now that I was decent looking. Was I getting girls though? Hell no.

Game Denialists

This is where those game-denialists who write in comments sections on articles like this one that “it’s all about looks” are way off beam. Because if I took that girl I slept with at face value then I could claim to be a good-looking guy—an 8.5!—put down all of this game stuff and just wait for all the sexual offers to come flooding in.

But it doesn’t work like that.

For a start your looks (and your sexual market value generally) are always judged contextually, and there is always someone better looking than you (or richer, more powerful, stronger or whatever).

A couple of weeks ago I picked up on IOIs (indicators of interest) from this very sexy Belarusian girl I met in Berlin. Blonde, slim and aged 24 with pert breasts, I’d confidently expect most men to put her at an 8.5 or 9. As soon as I met her this girl flashed me so-called ‘doggy dinner bowl eyes’. Later we exchanged contact details and off the bat she began sending me sexually-charged, flirtatious messages. Then we met at a club where things got very hot between us indeed.

It’s still work-in-progress but her attraction to me can’t be doubted, and I didn’t need to ‘game’ her at approach in the normal way.

If only it were always like that.

Then on Saturday I went to a club in Berlin filled with hot girls—and tall, good-looking men—where it was a huge slog for me to get any traction at all. I probably opened around 20 girls, got shut down by the majority and only achieved any real traction with a couple of them.

My point is that in theory I’m someone who could just about be accused of running ‘good-looking guy game’, particularly by a man a few points below me on the SMV scale. But the unfortunate truth of the matter is that I can no more ‘rely’ on my looks than he can.

Style

I've been thinking a lot about IOIs recently and it would be a lie to say that I don't consider them to be a very important element of my game. The more that you are able to pick up on those small signals girls put out that show that they like you, the better. It means that your approaches are warm rather than cold, and that you are more likely to see a positive result from your approach.

But bear in mind that IOIs are not solely indexed to your looks. A girl may display interest based on your confidence, on the way you walk, on the way you speak, on your body language, your clothes, your style—everything about you, in fact. The good news here is that a majority of those things are completely within your control.

I have pretty good style, a distinct look and way of carrying myself. I dress well, I speak powerfully and I'm pretty confident. This is all a result of self-improvement work that I've undertaken over many years and I believe it's why I'm now a lot more successful with women than I was in my late teens and twenties (when I was as good-looking, if not more so).

But on App like Tinder which is based solely on looks I don't do anything like as well as my male model friend. And in venues like clubs where looks are paramount, the success that I do achieve comes largely through the confident, cocky and dominant manner in which I approach.

Put it this way, if I just stand around 'relying on my looks' and waiting for girls to come up to me then I'm likely to go home empty-handed.

The truth is that looks (and in particular male looks) are very much in the eye of the beholder and subject to that beholder's own individual tastes and preferences. Yes, if you have really top-tier male model looks then those alone will probably get you laid enough for you not to have to worry too much about using game to get sex (although you will always need some game). But if your own aesthetic falls anywhere short of top tier then the principles of game are absolutely essential if you want to introduce any level of consistency at all into your sex life.

Before learning game my access to women was extremely patchy. Although I slept with some very attractive girls, ‘dry spell’ of several months in between were not unusual, and the girls tended to leave me anyway when they realised that I was beta with no idea of how to handle them.

It was only when I internalised the principle of game that I was able to achieve the sort of abundant, regular sex life that I’d always desired My looks, meanwhile, remained unchanged, demonstrating to me unequivocally that it is the manner in which I interact with girls rather than the way that I look that really makes the difference.

For a compilation of all Troy’s best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: The Counter-Intuitive Method To Closing The Deal In Tough Night Game Pickups

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

A 1958 List Of Communist Objectives For America Is Now Nearly Complete

June 28, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Communist Rules For Revolution

"Cause the registration of all firearms on some pretext, with a view to confiscating them and leaving the population helpless."

(Captured In Dusseldorf May 1919 By The Allied Forces)

A. Corrupt the young, get them away from religion. Get them interested in sex. Make them superficial, destroy their ruggedness.

B. Get control of all means of publicity and thereby:
1. Get people's minds off their government by focusing their attention on athletics, sexy books and plays and other trivialities.
2. Divide the people into hostile groups by constantly harping on controversial matters of no importance.
3. Destroy the people's faith in their natural leaders by holding the latter up to contempt, ridicule and obloquy.
4. Always preach true democracy, but seize power as fast and as ruthlessly as possible.
5. By encouraging government extravagance, destroy its credit, produce fear of inflation with rising prices and general discontent.
6. Foment unnecessary strikes in vital industries, encourage civil disorders and foster a lenient and soft attitude on the part of government toward such disorders.
7. By specious argument cause the breakdown of the old moral virtues, honesty, sobriety, continence, faith in the pledged word, ruggedness.

C. CAUSE THE REGISTRATION OF ALL FIREARMS ON SOME PRETEXT, WITH A VIEW TO CONFISCATING THEM AND LEAVING THE POPULATION HELPLESS.

* "NOTE: The above "Rules for Revolution were secured by the State Attorney's Office from a known member of the Communist Party, who acknowledged it to be still a part of the Communist program for overthrowing our Government."

Cleon Skousen was an FBI special agent until 1951. He then taught at BYU and became Salt Lake City's police chief in 1956. His classic book The Naked Communist included a 45 point summary of their subversive agenda in the USA. Many sources date this list to 1963, when it was read into the Congressional record. However, the book's first copyright date was 1958, well before the mid-1960s when these changes took the public by surprise.

Communist goals of 1958

Gus Hall, Secretary General of the Communist Party USA

Items 1-14 concerned enhancing the position of the USSR and other Communist nations. Here's the domestic agenda:

15. Capture one or both of the political parties in the United States.

16. Use technical decisions of the courts to weaken basic American institutions by claiming their activities violate civil rights.

17. Get control of the schools. Use them as transmission belts for socialism and current Communist propaganda. Soften the curriculum. Get control of teachers' associations. Put the party line in textbooks.

18. Gain control of all student newspapers.

19. Use student riots to foment public protests against programs or organizations which are under Communist attack.

20. Infiltrate the press. Get control of book-review assignments, editorial writing, policy-making positions.

21. Gain control of key positions in radio, TV, and motion pictures.

22. Continue discrediting American culture by degrading all forms of artistic expression. An American Communist cell was told to "eliminate all good sculpture from parks and buildings, substitute shapeless, awkward and meaningless forms."

23. Control art critics and directors of art museums. "Our plan is to promote ugliness, repulsive, meaningless art."

24. Eliminate all laws governing obscenity by calling them "censorship" and a violation of free speech and free press.

25. Break down cultural standards of morality by promoting pornography and obscenity in books, magazines, motion pictures, radio, and TV.

26. Present homosexuality, degeneracy and promiscuity as “normal, natural, healthy.”

27. Infiltrate the churches and replace revealed religion with “social” religion. Discredit the Bible and emphasize the need for intellectual maturity which does not need a “religious crutch.”

28. Eliminate prayer or any phase of religious expression in the schools on the ground that it violates the principle of “separation of church and state.”

29. Discredit the American Constitution by calling it inadequate, old-fashioned, out of step with modern needs, a hindrance to cooperation between nations on a worldwide basis.

30. Discredit the American Founding Fathers. Present them as selfish aristocrats who had no concern for the “common man.”

31. Belittle all forms of American culture and discourage the teaching of American history on the ground that it was only a minor part of the “big picture.” Give more emphasis to Russian history since the Communists took over.

32. Support any socialist movement to give centralized control over any part of the culture–education, social agencies, welfare programs, mental health clinics, etc.

33. Eliminate all laws or procedures which interfere with the operation of the Communist apparatus.

34. Eliminate the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

35. Discredit and eventually dismantle the FBI.

36. Infiltrate and gain control of more unions.

37. Infiltrate and gain control of big business.

38. Transfer some of the powers of arrest from the police to social agencies. Treat all behavioral problems as psychiatric disorders which no one but psychiatrists can understand [or treat].

39. Dominate the psychiatric profession and use mental health laws as a means of gaining coercive control over those who oppose Communist goals.

40. Discredit the family as an institution. Encourage promiscuity and easy divorce.

41. Emphasize the need to raise children away from the negative influence of parents. Attribute prejudices, mental blocks and retarding of children to suppressive influence of parents.

42. Create the impression that violence and insurrection are legitimate aspects of the American tradition; that students and special-interest groups should rise up and use “united force” to solve economic, political or social problems.

43. Overthrow all colonial governments before native populations are ready for self-government.

44. Internationalize the Panama Canal.

45. Repeal the Connally reservation so the United States cannot prevent the World Court from seizing jurisdiction [over domestic problems. Give the World Court jurisdiction] over nations and individuals alike.

Does any of this sound familiar?

A few results of cultural Marxism today

Along with elements of the traditional subversion script, this shows clear influences of suicidalism and cultural Marxism, though missing a few notable agendas. Back in 1958, surely these predictions must've seemed merely like "McCarthyism". Skousen got much criticism for his views. Clearly he wasn't just blowing smoke, though; most items were partially or completely fulfilled. Did this really "just happen" all by itself, with the heat suddenly turning way up during the mid-1960s? Like Cassandra of Troy, he was a prophet ignored until it was too late.

The two parties didn't become Communist, of course. However, the Democratic Party—formerly the working man's party—was co-opted by cultural Marxism, and the Republicans became a controlled opposition. The educational system got pozzed out. So was the media, and I doubt it took much convincing to get them on board.

American culture—literature, art, history books, and religion—became remarkably different from that of times past; which would've been hardly recognizable to our forebears. Lawyerly activism got agendas 16 and 28 fulfilled with judicial scrupulosity, and assisted with some others. Recently the GLBT crowd got everything they wanted, though likely they're thinking of new demands. Feminism burnt our social environment to cinders.

As for items not fulfilled, number 38 is quite alarming; it would've abrogated all semblance of due process and sent us straight to Kafka-land. Social agencies have tight integration with police, but quite fortunately don't have direct powers of arrest. Item 45 would've been very ominous too. Some still think it would be wonderful to surrender our sovereignty to the corrupt UN, our wannabe world government.

Was all this accomplished by Soviet agents and Communist subversives? No, they had plenty of "useful idiots" to help do their work for them. All it took was the "long march through the institutions" to get into influential positions, put the ideas into the public sphere, and convince others that all this was "social justice". As Yuri Bezmenov put it:

> ...the demoralization now reaches such areas where previously not even > comrade Andropov and all his experts would even dream of such a tremendous success. Most of it is done by Americans to Americans thanks to lack of moral standards.

What the future holds

Class-based Marxism-Leninism is a spent force. The few remaining Communist nations are hanging by a thread. Thus, the foreign policy points from items 1-14 (omitted for length) have little emphasis now. Unfortunately, today's progressives still push "Communism Lite".

There's been little effort (yet) to roll back domestic measures, although the USSR—their reason for existence—ended in 1991. In fact, unless you've been living under a rock, you'll notice that many still are promoted quite actively. This wouldn't have surprised Skousen very much. Powerful groups still find progressive ideology useful to control the public. As a biographical summary noted:

> Skousen's further studies eventually led him to conclude–like fellow anticommunist Robert Welch–that the communists were not the principals in the conspiracy to destroy America; they were merely the most visible arm of a much larger conspiracy. This conspiracy was run by a group of super-rich investment bankers from around the world who manipulated political agendas and public opinion to suit their own ends.
>
> Proof of the elites' influence and their power structure was found in a book by Dr. Carroll Quigley, a professor of history at the Foreign Service School of Georgetown University, called Tragedy and Hope. Quigley was a member of the elitist Council on Foreign Relations. He had many personal connections with the super-rich and could trace their financial dealings in detail.

Those who declared victory with the USSR's collapse did so prematurely, since tricky globalist billionaire clubs are promoting much of the same these days, enforcing cultural Marxism through the media and other institutions. The more things change, the more they stay the same.

Read More: Soviet Defector Yuri Bezmenov Accurately Predicted How America Would Decline

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

There Is No Such Thing As “Passive” Income

June 28, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Most of my grandparents were born in the 30s or 40s. When I try to explain to them how I make my income, they can’t even come to fathom it. I’ve accepted the fact that they seem to think there are secret, dark holes of the internet where someone with technical skills can conjure money out of thin air.

While the internet has a wealth of new ways and tools to make money as an entrepreneur, there is one term that is always thrown around—passive income.

And I’m here to say it loud and clear—I absolutely fucking hate the term. Nothing could be further from the truth. In fact, there is even no such thing. It simply does not exist, both from a startup and maintenance standpoint.

That’s not to confuse passive with “satisfying”. The longer I go on outside of my former office career, the more I think that the life of cubicles is just never going to give many men any sort of fulfillment. After all, we’ve been laboring outside and building things for our tribes as “work” for thousands of years.

You don’t undo thousands of years of biological programming in the last few years since florescent lights and plastic walls and windows became stylish.

So yes, internet business and passive income are superior to this (but not totally feasible, especially if you are a family men). But the term “passive income” needs to be debunked, once and for all. This is why.

The Upfront Work Is Enormous

Part of the reason the term has become popular is because it's sexy. Who doesn't want to make money while they sleep, or while taking a dump? Who wouldn't want to see the dollars roll in while you're sitting on a picturesque beach in Bali versus one of the aforementioned cubicles.

Now, those things are possible. But the upfront work to get to that point is enormous. Let's face it, most people start internet businesses because they want (or at least want the possibility) of being able to move abroad or travel with their newfound freedom.

And the "starting off" points of passive income aren't pretty. You don't see any digital nomads going to live in Switzerland or London. Instead, they're flocking to Chiang Mai, Thailand to find the best one bedroom apartment they can rent for somewhere between $200 and $225 a month.

Trying to make an internet business (for most people) and have enough to sustain living in the United States just isn't feasible right off the bat. There's a reason they have to escape to foreign lands. It's not just the thinner and hotter women. It's because it's impossible to live (in most places) in the US without having a "real job" income. That's a discussion for another day.

The point is, passive income only becomes passive after you've put in a tremendous amount of work up front. Think writing a book or creating an online course isn't time-intensive? Think again.

It's Hard To "Turn Off" Work

When your income (and therefore well-being) is directly tied to your own business and its results, it's a lot harder to ever step away from it. It's easy to go home and forget the drudgery of office work with a 6-pack of crap beer. You don't give a damn about that job. It's someone else's dream, even if it's tied to your own well-being.

Generally speaking, the attitude is not to succeed and prosper in work, but to do just enough to get by without being fired. The masses need those 6-packs of Bud, after all.

Even when passive income is working for you, after the up front work, it's really hard to ignore it. If you're in affiliate marketing or paid traffic, you're constantly watching for the next dry spell so you can react. It's hard to resist checking stats every waking minute. The point is, you can and will drive yourself mad. Every internet entrepreneur does at some point.

It's easy to say that you will retire after you have passive income, but nothing could be further than the truth. I like to joke with my family that sometimes I am—there are days I wake up with tons of new money in the bank and am a bit unmotivated to create anything new that day.

But there are rarely hours that go by where I am not thinking about work at some level or another.

Nothing Good Ever Comes To Men Who Are Passive

Simply put, we live in a society full of pussies. Plenty of men do nothing to keep up their self-appearance, marry over-the-hill-whores, and generally have no backbone to them.

All of these men are passive by nature. They are unable to muster the confidence to go after what they truly want in life. Instead, they allow society to impose beliefs on them. These beliefs manifest themselves in results that are mediocre, at best.

By being passive, they let the good things in life pass them by. Instead of dating hot and young girls, they date broken sluts. Instead of building a business, they build someone else's. Instead of doing everything they want to in the world, they go on cookie-cutter vacations where they've shoved on to a boat with a bunch of other fat people.

The term passive income needs to go away forever—because no person who is passive will ever truly be able to make money while they sleep. Internet marketing gurus sell the dream of making a million bucks while you sleep within a month of taking their $5,000 course.

Nothing could be further from the truth. Start with making $100 and go from there. Allow yourself to make the mistakes, to learn and grow from them. Needless to say there is always going to be a lot of pain in achieving something that's worthwhile.

So while making money while you sleep sounds great, don't kid yourself. Eventually it will come, and you can achieve that. But there are a lot of sleepless nights that come before it.

The feeling when you do hit that point is worth the loss of sleep.

To learn how to make "passive income" from a small website, check out my free 6-part video workshop. Check out This Is Trouble for more business articles.

Read More: 5 Thoughts On Publishing Your First eBook

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

15 Quotes From “How To Be A Lady” That All Women Must Implement Without Delay

June 28, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

How To Be A Lady: A Contemporary Guide To Common Courtesy is a book written by Candace Simpson-Giles and published in 2001. The book is intended to be a self-help guide of sorts for women to bring back their natural feminine essence, in a world where they are being increasingly masculinized and encouraged to compete with men on a level playing field.

> “The roles women play in society today are drastically different than they were twenty-five years ago, and some of the rules have changed. Somewhere along the way, the art of being a lady was lost in the shuffle to become a self-sufficient, straight shooting, aggressive survivor in the world. Some of us lost sight of the rewards that being a lady could bring.” – Candace Simpson-Giles

Even at the turn of the 21st century, Ms. Simpson-Giles was aware that overt feminism was not creating the rainbow-laced utopia that so many people were promised, and this publication was meant to help turn the tide. The book acknowledges that men and women are in fact very different, they should focus more on their core gender strengths, and they should not lose sight of what’s truly important in life beyond a career.

I picked out 15 quotes from the book which I think a lot of young women in the 2010’s are particularly having a lot of problems with. However, there are many more good ones within the whole body of work.

1. “Unless absolutely necessary, a lady does not carry her cellular phone into a restaurant. If she must, she turns it off.”

This was a lot easier to accomplish back in 2001 before smartphones, but nonetheless, a man knows he's got a potential unicorn (by modern standards) on his hand if his attractive date is truly giving him 100% of her attention, instead of checking on the male thirst tsunami in her Tinder and Bumble box half the time.

2. "A lady respects other people's time whether at the office or at home."

Whether it's "Time Vampires" or "Flakes", men absolutely despise the nature of women who have a knack of wasting their valuable time. Show men some respect and indicate whether or not you are interested in pursuing a relationship within a reasonable time frame. If you must cancel a date, give as much notice as possible (preferably a day or more) instead of just one hour beforehand.

3. "A lady is mindful of her appearance at all times."

Moldylox, before getting punched in the face when she decided to fight “Nazis”

A woman who voluntarily chooses to dress like street trash, probably has a mind about as trashy. A well dressed lady with a sense of style probably isn’t going to spend her weekends on the hunt for “100 Nazi scalps“.

4. “A lady knows how to make others feel at ease.”

Relaxed posture and cheerful/approachable demeanor. Unlikely to think you are “creepy” if you come over and say hello.

Scowl faces, sarcasm, high decibel speech, profanity, and belligerent behavior are not ladylike behavior. High quality men won't want to marry them, and their gender won't always save them from consequences.

5. "A lady never curses in front of others."

Aging SJW profanity factory Sarah Silverman is unmarried and has no children. Thank goodness.

Profanity coming out of the mouths of females is even more unattractive compared to when men do it. For women, it is a clear indication of poor mothering and nurturing skills, and excessive cursing is the forte of degenerate leftists and SJW's. A real lady can keep her language "X" rated in the sheets, but "PG" in the streets.

6. "When faced with life's minor setbacks, a lady does not act like a victim."

I lost the election because of sexist right-wing white men!

A lady does not blame her inability to land that dream job on sexism or the “patriarchy”. She is also wise enough to realize that there is no “gender wage gap”, but instead acknowledges an earnings gap because women disproportionately choose lower-paying professions and often work less hours per week.

Even in a larger setback, like losing the U.S. presidency, a lady does not squarely blame Russia or her vagina for her loss. Instead, she acknowledges that maybe her self-destructive policies and unladylike demeanor played a huge part.

7. “A lady knows that the gym is her opportunity to get in shape. She should be focused on her workout and dressed appropriately so that she is not a distraction to others or even to herself.”

Women should not wear skin-tight or revealing attire to the gym if they do not desire being stared at or hit on. What did she think she was going to invite?

8. “A lady should never ask someone if she looks fat in something.”

If she has to ask, then she probably is. A change in diet and a gym routine should ease her anxieties (see point 7).

9. “A lady uses her turn signals.”

I suspected this was a euphemism for “get off your f___ing phone and pay more attention to the road”. Sound advice for anybody, but women are statistically even more likely to constantly yak into a phone while driving than men.

10. “A lady knows that trends come and go, while true style is timeless”

Cotton candy short blue hair, bull rings, butt-ugly tattoos, and tattered Antifa/SJW rags may get a young woman a few short-lived friends and a low-rent boyfriend now, but natural colored long hair, no-piercing and no-tattoo skin, and some clean and attractive clothes will never get old to both men and women who have any class.

11. “A lady donates the clothing she no longer wears to those less fortunate than she.”

Men find kindness and other nurturing qualities in women very attractive, and donating unwanted clothes to goodwill rather than just tossing them out is no exception. It’s a red flag if a woman purchases clothes with the sole intention of wearing them once before returning them for full money back.

12. “A lady never assumes that somebody else will pick up the tab.”

There is something amiss in a western country where fully emancipated women are purposefully spearheaded into high-paying white collar office jobs, yet still assume that a male date will financially cover every dinner and drink order which comes their way. A lady acknowledges both her liberties and her responsibilities, and is always prepared to pay her fair share towards financial obligations.

13. “A lady avoids sexist and racist terminology”

Women with any kind of class, or love of that “equality” stuff they desire so much, should think twice about calling out a “all white male card game” or accusing someone of “mansplaining” without negative feedback and creating an embarrassing situation for themselves. These female politicians from Minnesota and Australia are not ladies.

14. “A lady does not turn down invitations. She never waits for something better.”

Whether it’s a date with a clean cut masculine man who has his life in order, or an invitation to a fancy dinner party or the ball/opera, women need to understand that their youth, beauty, and fertility are vital to their romantic and social appeal. A lady will understand that one day, when she is somewhere on the wrong side of 30, these invitations will become much more rare, and ultimately come to a grinding halt.

15. “A lady knows that sick children are more important than a deadline at the office.”

A lady knows that having children in general is much more important, and ultimately more satisfying in the course of a lifetime, than any office job in the world.

Conclusion

How To Be A Lady's analysis on modern female faults is far from perfect (I'm not going to give an "A" to a book which completely omits any mention of "a lady knows how to cook"), but Ms. Simpson-Giles' heart was in the right place when unleashing these many bite-size pieces of advice to any young woman who bothered to pay attention.

It's an entertaining and easy-to-digest read for an hour or so, and the author should be commended for her efforts. Bravo, Candace.

Don't Miss: 15 Important Quotes From The Predatory Female

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

5 Underappreciated Activities Every Man Should Engage In

June 29, 2017 | by Johan Le Roux | Link | Original Link

While many of us are aware of the basic tenets of red pill philosophy and masculinity, such as lifting, learning game, dressing well, and earning an income, there are other less popular activities that are not featured much, yet still have a place in every man's repertoire. The five activities mentioned below are, in my opinion, the best for ensuring one is a well-rounded masculine male:

1. Gymnastics

Can you do this yet?

While many men view this activity/sport as “gay” for whatever reason, I would have to disagree and maintain that this is perhaps one of the best full-body workouts that you can get, apart from swimming.

Numerous benefits I’ve noted since joining include: increased spatial awareness of one’s body; humility (after having done some bodybuilding for a while, gymnastics really makes you realize what you CAN’T do); and of course, contributing to a lean physique.

Haters gonna hate…

I challenge any man who thinks he’s strong but has never tried gymnastics movements to go ahead and give this one a go. You’ll be surprised at how many muscles many gym-goers fail to work when performing their exercises.

There comes a sense of pride when one is confident in their ability to control their body. Gymnastics helps to achieve this by teaching handstands, flips, balance, coordination, and flexibility.

2. Martial Arts

Block this, you degenerate Leftist!

Many guys lift and are into fitness, but can they defend themselves in a fight? Sure, girls might be initially impressed by your great physique and it might intimidate fellow men from picking a fight with you, but it is still crucially important to know at least the fundamentals of fighting.

These can be learned quickly in basic boxing and grappling classes. Although I love them, kicks are not very practical in a street fight, barring low kicks and knee strikes, but if you're into that then MMA classes would be perfect for you.

Wouldn't wanna be that guy on the Left…

I personally would recommend Krav Maga, having done it for three months myself. It teaches you no-BS street-fighting tactics and techniques that incorporate boxing, lots of knee strikes, grappling, and defending against surprise attacks from armed assailants (knife, stick, gun, etc.). Some schools also train students to defend against multiple attackers.

3. Running

Time to evolve, man…

Our Paleolithic ancestors, not having the modern luxury of cars and other forms of transport, had to run just about everywhere they went. Especially for men, to be able to able to run (fast) was an important trait in many hunter-gatherer societies, as these guys had to catch moving prey or else go hungry.

Left or Right?

I am a big advocate of both short and medium distance running, however I must emphasize the importance of short distance sprints especially, for its muscle-building, fat-shedding benefits. Middle distance will help build stamina and endurance and compliment the short distance sprint work so that your legs get properly conditioned.

Long distance generally leads to muscle catabolism which is bad for those guys looking to get ripped. On a side note though, long distance running ability could help you save money on transport costs.

4. Dancing

I can already see many guys frowning at this one. Nonetheless, learning to dance (mainly classical forms such as Waltz, Ballroom, Foxtrot, etc.) can do wonders for the masculine man.

What better foreplay can there be?

Good dancing ability in men almost automatically makes women visualize how you would be in bed, thus it is a useful skill to have. And in today's world where it is quite difficult if not foolish to show our strength by fighting other males, dance is a form of passive demonstration of high value to females.

Granted, I cannot dance to save my life (yet) but it is in my plans in the future, after I've got my priorities sorted out in terms of finances, game, looks, etc.

5. Manual labor

Gym? Ain’t nobody got time for dat!

The last one on this list, and rightfully so, as it is perhaps the most important. Manual labor has long been a primarily masculine pursuit, and any self-respecting man ought to make a point of partaking in such, as frequently as possible (or necessary).

The cool thing about manual labor is that there are many different types so you’re bound to find something you enjoy doing, and also that you can get paid for this. Oh wait, there’s another one: you’re also getting a good workout in in most cases.

Most useful manual labor types:

- House painting – ever painted an entire room? Your shoulders, neck and back will be burning like hellfire
- Cleaning windows
- Washing cars – my personal favorite
- Basic car maintenance – changing tyres, removing an engine, etc.

Conclusion

The above five activities are those that I personally believe to be great activities for masculine men. Some of them are already well-accepted in the community, others not so much. Regardless, if you’ve never tried any of the above and you’re looking for new ways to improve yourself, I encourage you to do so.

Read More: The Case For Minimalist Running

Johan Le Roux

Johan Le Roux is a born-again Red Piller from Pretoria, South Africa. Loves to spend his free time lifting, learning new skills, expanding his business, and reading. Doesn't have a website yet, but will soon...

British Men Are Finished

June 29, 2017 | by Ben Bera | Link | Original Link

Before I begin, I want to say that what I am about to write is in no way intended to be malicious. I was born and raised in the UK and many of the men I most admire are British or of Anglo descent, with the UK producing some of finest minds in all of Western Civilisation, from Geoffrey Chaucer to Sir Roger Scruton.

However, British men of today are (for the most part) finished, in terms of being torch bearers for Western Civilisation. They are no longer at the forefront in any of the crucial battlegrounds, be it creative, philosophical or technological, and I want to attempt to explain exactly why that is.

British Men Are Ruled by Their Women

The bossy wife and hen-pecked husband have been a mainstay in British entertainment for many decades.

The majority of British men clamour for female attention and only feel validated once they have secured the attention of a woman. Today, this has reached the point where, if I walk down any street in any town or city, I will see many a slim and in shape man holding hands with an ungrateful land whale in a tight fitting top and “jeggings”.

Growing up in a family that had a mix of Eastern and British roots, I was able to witness the differences between how husbands and wives behaved with each other. The Eastern side had very defined male and female roles, husbands and wives were not in each other’s pockets but had an equal balance of a life together and a life apart, which made for healthier marriages. For example, all of my male relatives would spend time with their friends, there was no need for clock watching or fearing they would get a thrashing because they were neglecting the little woman at home.

In stark contrast, my British relatives and their friends, ranging from working to lower middle class, always had, what appeared from my perspective, odd marriages. The husbands would be described as the head of the house, but in name only. They would generally be down-trodden, subjected to decades of tirades and tantrums from their wives, they would neglect friendships, sometimes allowing lifelong friends to slip into oblivion, because they placed their wives on pedestals and treated them like Goddesses, attending to their every whim. The husbands would very rarely spend any time away from their wives for fear of retribution.

Despite being so obsequious, to the point of turning into clones of Uriah Heep, the wives would always complain to their friends about how lazy and stupid their husbands were, irrespective of these husbands, especially the Baby Boomers, working long hours and still concentrating on keeping the garden in shape and fixing up the house during weekends.

For those of you thinking the bossy wife and hen-pecked husband is a recent phenomenon, then you only have to take a look at British culture to see this has been a present theme for over 100 years. From films such as ‘Sailor, Beware!’ (1956), the long-running and still highly popular soap opera ‘Coronation Street’ (1960 – onwards) which, from its inception, portrayed a plethora of domineering women, to comical seaside postcards from the late Victorian era.

I believe it has always been the case in Britain that women have had the upper-hand in marriage, but due to the social dynamics shifting dramatically, coupled with the decline in Christian social conservatism after WWII, it’s become more pervasive.

Britain Is Feminist Ground Zero

British suffragettes proved to be the most violent of all, in trying to get what they wanted.

Britain is a bastion of feminism and has long been so. It bore Mary Wollstonecraft and its intelligentsia welcomed, with open arms, the likes of Antipodean harpy Germaine Greer. One can trace the very beginning of feminism as an ideology in Britain back to Wollstonecraft and her pamphlet – A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792).

Britain’s rigid class system has been the perfect breeding ground for insidious ideologies like feminism. Queen Victoria may have called women’s rights a “dangerous folly”, but the burgeoning suffragette movement, consisting of well-to-do ladies, unleashed the poison which Wollstonecraft had wanted to do some 100 years previously.

Let’s compare the behaviour of British suffragettes to their French counterparts. Women’s suffrage was encouraged by the Catholic clergy in France, as they knew that women were still influenced by their local priests and husbands. The approach of French suffragettes was also more refined. The British suffragettes, on the other hand, quickly descended into anarchy and outright hatred of men, with many sympathetic to social justice, wreaking havoc across London and other cities.

This strain of anarchy did not die when women secured the vote in the UK in 1918, but remained at the heart of every social justice movement women were involved in.

Britain Allowed Soft Socialism To Gain A Foothold

Sidney Webb, an early member of the nefarious Fabian Society and co-founder of the leftist cesspool known as the London School of Economics.

Britain's handling of socialism with kid gloves can be traced back to Methodism, the weakest of all Christian denominations. Methodism was born and cultivated in the UK in the 18th century, by the Anglican theologian John Wesley and George Whitefield et al, and it would be the Methodists who would become the most active proponents of social justice.

Methodists were big players in the formation of Trade Unions in Britain, as well as other social and cultural enterprises during the Victorian era and, as ideas of socialism as we know it today began to circulate, the Methodists were quick to embrace certain elements of it.

Socialism truly began to entrench itself during the first decade of the 20th century, with the formation of the British Labour Party, an amalgamation of radical socialists, Trade Unionists and intellectuals of the Fabian Society. In a few decades, the party would become a dominant force in politics, especially after WWII.

If it wasn't for the Methodists and their promotion of soft socialism in British culture, I feel Britons today would be less inclined towards social liberalism and the destructiveness that comes with it.

Conclusion

After over a century of assault, many British men, like most of their Western counterparts, feel lost and confused.

In 2017, all of these components have reached their zenith, becoming a Goliath that is hindering British men from reaching their true potential. Of course, there are myriad other components, historical, psychological, cultural, and it's a very complex issue, but these three are the most injurious, laying the foundation for the many ills Britain faces today.

If one looks at the bigger picture, men across the Anglosphere are hindered in becoming men of merit due to these same problems, some less, others more. Yet, I am optimistic some British men will be able to break through this mess, as the country further self-destructs. British society has always had this ability to produce some of the most unique voices in Western culture, such as Enoch Powell, Jonathan Bowden et al, men who stood as prophets, able to see through the miasma.

Read More: British Police: Men Who Try To Get Laid Are Guilty Of Misogynistic "Hate Crimes"

Ben Bera

Ben is a freelance writer, photographer and entrepreneur. A Socialist for all of eight months in his teenage years, now in his mid-twenties, he is a proud right-winger, with a distaste for much of the modern world. You can find him at his most right-wing on Twitter.

Facebook Added A Homosexual “Like” Button To The Glee Of Virtue Signalers

June 29, 2017 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

Facebook has rolled out a bunch of new things to help people celebrate Gay Pride Month this June. The most degenerate addition is a “pride reaction” which adds a little rainbow ball to the other five standard reaction choices. The button is only active if you show active approval for homosexuals on the site.

It’s only for the LGBTBBQWTFIAA

The gay reaction is unlocked if you go to the LGBT Facebook page and like it (don’t rush all at once now). This then will supposedly give you the gay like buttons and probably put other gay things into your news feed.

If you live in a country that is not down with the gay, then you are out of luck, because Facebook doesn’t give gay likes for anyone with an intolerant IP address.

The only good thing about the left is that they have less attention span than a squirrel.

After the next Islamic terrorist attack, Facebook may add the ISIS flag so we can like that too.

Facebook is recruiting you to the gay cult

Establishing a pride month for the gays is legitimizing them as if they're black. It's a savvy move by the gay community to adopt everything that isn't heterosexual, monogamous sex as part of their movement under the ever-increasing umbrella of their rather clunky acronym.

This may backfire upon them if they over-extend their relevancy by endorsing the next big thing like pederasty or bestiality, but, for now, their strategy seems to suck up everyone who isn't completely straight in the head.

It mocks Christians

I wish…

Since America has been a primarily Christian country since it got started, many things, like Jewish pornography and Satanism, exist solely to bash on it. Supposedly the gay rainbow flag represents a lot of things, but the rainbow was originally God's promise that He would not ever flood the earth again after the great flood. Seems like it's part of the gay M.O. to pervert religious symbols.

I'm a fairly tolerant person. I've got no issue with a dude liking another dude; I've even got no issue with two dudes, or two women, living together. I really don't have any issue with them receiving the same benefits under the law as married people.

But why do they have to spread their degeneracy to everyone, including children? Don't they understand that those kids will never, ever be normal and they won't have the choice to "go gay" like they did? Do they hate Western culture so much that they would drop the birth rate so far below the replacement rate that Islam can just waltz right in in two generations, throw them off the nearest rooftop, and set up a caliphate?

Conclusion

While Facebook giving you the ability to virtue signal your gay-liking of something is not a big deal in and of itself, it's a sign of the times that sexual perversion, which ought to be something handled discretely with an unwritten agreement that things be kept quiet, is now totally mainstream and somehow glamorous. It is up to us and other right-minded men to find a way to reverse the course if it is still even possible.

Read More: Adored Gay Leftist George Takei Calls Child Molestation "Delightful" & "Delicious" With No Media Outcry

Rufus Winnfield
"You know, walk the earth, meet people... get into adventures."

7 Reasons You Should Visit South Africa

June 29, 2017 | by Johan Le Roux | Link | Original Link

South Africa is a country recognized perhaps mostly for its history of apartheid laws, much like the segregation of blacks in America almost a century ago. The only difference is that the South African government actually enforced segregational race policies as law. This involved a race hierarchy, with Whites on top, Indians ("Asians") second, "Coloureds" third, and Blacks right at the bottom, which is still evident in most parts of the country where one can see specific areas dominated by one or two of the aforementioned races.

South Africa and the USA share many similarities, as I reveal in this article, but also many differences. Anyway, let me stop rambling and get to the point of this article, which is, why you should visit this amazing country.

1. Strong masculine culture and history

Settlers arriving at The Cape of Good Hope

Although hotly debated nowadays, the fact remains that the early settlers from Europe (predominantly Dutch) brought civilization to this country when they arrived in the Cape 1652, and although they were not the first to discover this land (the Khoikhoi and San inhabited the area), they ultimately made it what it is today (as it is with most of the developed colonies).

These guys treat their sport as war between nations

War has almost defined this country. The early settlers had to fight numerous wars with natives, perhaps most notably in the “Battle of Isandlwana” on 22 January, 1879, in which the outnumbered British suffered a humiliating defeat from the fierce Zulu warriors…

Battle of Isandlwana

But the wars were not limited to simply those between natives and settlers. Fast forward two hundred years and you've got the Anglo-Boer War between Afrikaners (or "Boers") and the British, which lasted from 1899 to 1902.

Don't forget South Africa's amazing war effort during WW1 and 2, and also their famous Special Forces team, commonly known as "Recces" (their logo is my profile image)

Hierdie ouens vat nie kak nie! (English: These guys don't take shit!)

2. Women

South Africa has produced countless Miss World's and Miss Universes and, being a multicultural country, a man can find here, in order of highest population size: black women, colored women (mixed white and black), white women, and Indian women.

If you're into black girls, many of them still value traditional gender roles so you're in luck there. They can be found all over this country.

Coloured women in the Cape Town area are pretty Westernised but still tend to value traditional gender roles, however your best bet for coloured women would be in the more conservative and rural towns of the Western and Northern Cape. You're also likely to find a large portion of Muslim "Cape Malays" which are also classified as "coloured", but from experience I've found that these girls tend to be prettier than their non-Muslim counterparts for some reason.

Cape Malay beauties

White women fall into two camps. I think it's safe to say that the majority of English-speaking white women are liberal and about as Westernised as in first World countries. However, the Afrikaner women are mostly conservative and you will find the majority of these in the Gauteng, Pretoria, and Free State provinces.

Candice Swanepoel, an Afrikaner model for Victoria's Secret

Lastly if you're looking for Indian women, you can find most of them on the east coast of the country in the province of KwaZulu-Natal.

3. Cuisine

This is a “braai”, not a barbecue, bru

This is definitely one aspect I missed sorely while on holiday in Europe. The food quality in general was just poorer than what I’m used to.

I may be biased because this is my home country, but South Africa has, arguably, some of the highest quality food on the planet. In the Cape, you’ve got a Mediterranean climate, so fish like snoek, hake and yellowtail are commonplace.

The wine industry in the Western Cape is also very big and produces some of the finest wines in the world. Lots of fruit and vegetables are grown in the Western Cape due to the climate, and therefore it is quite an interesting region to stay in Further inland you’ve got most of the livestock farms with sheep, cattle, and poultry. Beef and lamb are the main sources of meat in this country, not pork as in most European countries. While here, you cannot leave without trying “potjiekos” (stew cooked in a cast-iron pot over a fire), snoek (fish species found in Cape Town), and “boerewors” (the best sausage you will ever taste, guaranteed).

4. Scenery and wildlife

Where else in the world can you get such an exceptional view?

In South Africa, you will find some of the best scenery in the world. Starting at Cape Town, where you've got "Table Mountain" (so named because of its flat top resembling a table). Moving inland is the Karoo which is semi-arid, and further inland is the eastern part of the country where you can visit the Drakensberg mountains on the border of Lesotho.

Not to mention the huge variety of wildlife this country has to offer, of which the "Big Five" would be most famous (the animals are featured on our old bank notes!).

5. Beaches

Fish Hoek beach, voted n0. 1 by both humans and Great Whites

You will find some of the best beaches in the area surrounding Cape Town. These include Fish Hoek, Muizenberg, Clifton, Boulder's Beach, Blaauwbergstrand and Langebaan Lagoon to name a few. There are also beaches in Durban and all along the southern coastline but I can't really say much about those as I've never been there.

6. Great weather

Climate zones of SA

With a subtropical climate, South Africa has fairly predictable weather and receives sunshine for about 300 days a year. This is one of the things I missed during my trip to Europe last year, and when I got back I was instantly rejuvenated with the sunlight (not really, it was winter when I returned, but you know what I mean).

Week-long Itinerary

Below is an example of places you could visit in a one-week trip.

- Cape Town, Western Cape: Table Mountain; Fish Hoek Beach (located in False Bay, the most shark-infested area of the world); wine-tasting in Constantia; Chapman's Peak (beautiful views); Stellenbosch (university town – plenty of white Afrikaner babes)
- Limpopo, Mpumalanga: Kruger National Park (one of the largest game reserves in Africa)
- Johannesburg, Gauteng: Cradle of Mankind
- Lesotho: Drakensberg Mountains (bordering Lesotho and several South African provinces)

Conclusion

So, whether you've never even heard of it before, or if you've already considered a trip to this highly advanced African country, I'm sure you will find much to love about this country once you're here. I look forward to writing more about my country in future articles, where I will discuss the good, the bad and the ugly.

Anyways, I wish all of you the best while here (I trust you've booked your plane ticket already?) and that you at least survive in this (currently) crime-ridden and corrupt—but also awesome and unique—country that I call home.

Read More: 5 Reasons You Should Maybe Visit Sri Lanka

Johan Le Roux
Johan Le Roux is a born-again Red Piller from Pretoria, South Africa. Loves to spend his free time lifting, learning new skills, expanding his business, and reading. Doesn't have a website yet, but will soon...

How Game Can Improve Your Bodily Recovery During Major Health Catastrophes

June 29, 2017 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

I have been semi-incapacitated twice with the exact medical condition. However, the difference was that during the first incapacitation I was blue pill and married while the second time was when I was practicing red pill and game. As you may expect, there were huge differences in outcome.

First time: blue pill

Blue pill as hell

This was about a decade ago. I was married, with two small daughters, and was working at a high-tech international corporation. Things were not that good at the time, to the point that we considered marriage counseling. Yes, I know. I was blue as a smurf, a classic beta guy.

Out of nowhere a medical condition happened. It is something that happens to people in my condition, but is considered rare. I was confined to the house, able to move but with limited functions. I had to see a special doctor at the outpatient clinic of a hospital on a weekly basis and could not drive there. I knew that recovery takes several months (happened to me in my early 20s), and that I needed to be taken care of.

One would expect that the marriage vow "For better or for worse" will apply to this case, right? After you have been there for her when she was sick, in labor, supporting her and your children, one ought to expect her to also be there when you need her.

Yes – she wasn't into me as well

I found myself fighting with her left and right. I had to shout her into taking me to my weekly doctor's appointments, threaten her to do stuff for me (running an errand once or twice a week), and basically not get any sex, comfort or sympathy. She did not take any interest to the condition, read about it or talk to doctors.

To top it all off, she was asking for sympathy for taking care of me and went back to smoking (a filthy habit which she agreed to stop as a pre-condition to our engagement). My feeling was that I was bleeding on the floor and being kicked at the guts.

I was experiencing a lot of negative emotions – pain, helplessness, frustration and a feeling of betrayal. I reached out to my family to tell them what was happening and they were shocked. To this day some of my relatives say that they will never forgive her.

I had no idea what to do, but I understood that something was terribly wrong. I was frustrated as hell with the condition, but did not question the blue pill narrative yet (that would come a few years later when I was in the middle of the divorce). It took me three months to find a medical solution to have me back to close to my normal self, no thanks to her.

Second time: red pill

Some time after my divorce, I was practicing game and had a small harem of three women. My game level was intermediate; I was working as a consultant, with flexible hours (less income than working for an international corporation); and living in a rented apartment. Then it happened again. The medical condition came back. I was confined to the house, although the solution from the last episode made my recovery far easier.

All three girls, who had zero formal responsibilities for me and did not owe me squat, came over often. They cooked for me, cleaned the house, kept me company (not at the same time of course) and fucked me good to make me feel better.

When they would express concern about my condition, I would tell them that taking care of me will speed up the healing. They accepted the challenge and would arrive whenever I permitted them to come. I could not believe what a radical change game can have on the situation.

Learning from experience, I kept my melancholy low and showed a cheerful face about how I was certain of a rapid recovery. The two girls who owned a car (the third did not own) suggested driving me to my doctor's appointments, without me asking them to. All of their actions came without me asking for anything, and none of them "had" to do it.

I continued to game them – agreeing and amplifying my condition ("Yes. I may die – in 40 to 50 years"— punch in the arm and smile), teasing ("What's it like being with a handicap person?"–punch in the arm and kiss) and escalating sexually ("Here, Feel my body, it needs sexual healing"–sex).

A good description of how they felt

One of them dropped out of the harem during the month I was at home, but it is expected

(not all girls will remain with you even when you are healthy). I still had two girls coming over regularly to assist me. It took me one month to partially recover back to my (close to) normal self.

Game is crucial in most (if not all) aspects of life

The saying that "At least you have your health" has extra meaning for me. Health is like air – you notice it only when it is lacking, while having game can improve any medical condition you endure. I'm not saying to married readers to ditch their wives, but by using game, you can have a better chance of being taken care of.

We all need to be prepared for emergency. Either by having a "Fuck You Fund", a network of professionals, physical strength, mental ability, or an understanding of the future (my favorites 1, 2 and 3). Having game allowed me to convert a potentially bleak situation (if I had been on the blue pill) to a far better outcome (being taken care of and having sex on demand).

Some of you may say that being optimistic would have made the first situation far better. I agree to some extent. However, even if I was optimistic, I would still not being taken care of, not to mention having sex on demand. Having game, to me, seems far superior to just being optimistic. It's a tool that can be used in life-changing situations that one may not have anticipated.

Read Next: Are Men To Blame For Women's Mental Health Issues?

Dawn Pine
Dawn Pine (aka TheMaleBrain) is an Israeli 40+ divorced father of 2, former casualty of the blue-pill. Since he has taken the red pill his hobbies are: working out, writing, mentoring, harem management and self improvement.

The Life And Times Of Futurist Thinker Jacque Fresco

June 30, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Praise and glory is given to the advances in technology with many academics worshiping the field as though it were a god in itself. There is however, the flip side of the potential dangers of it. As we've seen in America with the forced switch to digital-based technology, privacy, security, and personal freedom have suffered. Technology is a wonderful thing, but has it really enhanced human life or created consumer addiction?

Liberation Or Invasion?

Prophecies of science fiction like lifestyles are inscribed for the future, and while it may seem far-fetched, several are currently being executed.

Smart Cities

A new term used to describe urban develop projects featuring automotive technology to improve the standard of living. And the race is on as countries like Singapore, Dubai, and more all want in on it.

CITE Project (Center for Innovation, Testing and Evaluation) is a billion dollar city in New Mexico to conduct research, although it's unclear what that entails.

"The vision is an environment where new products, services and technologies can be demonstrated and tested without disrupting everyday life," said Pegasus Managing Director Robert Brumley. Similarly, another $40 billion dollar city is being built in Astana, Kazakhstan.

Korea has their own concept for a mega metropolis

Even Forbes predicts "Smart Cities" a trillion dollar opportunity.

Robots & Automation

Google now is testing its Waymo, a self-driving car. Facebook and Intel are heavily invested the AI industry as well. And of course, Japan is making advancements.

Economy

Charge it on credit! Now it gets better as more are getting into cashless providers like Bitcoin. The shift to a monetary free economy has begun.

Amazon recently bought Wholefoods and implemented a shopper tracking technology which over-rides their phones to sell products. What most don't realize is that most, if not all, of these concepts are copycats. Such "smart city design" technologies were proposed decades ago by a man named, Jacque Fresco. His vision however, was very different to anything most have encountered.

A False Society

Automated transportation, construction, production of goods, revolving platforms, and self evaluating computer testing of new technology were all proposed by Fresco decades ago on Larry King.

Jacque saw machines as a tool to free people, not to control them. Too many people project the Armageddon scenario that they see in movies, but little evidence exists on machines being able to attack people. Hardly any incidents of that exist in time. Fresco reasoned the Terminator scenario was all Hollywood brainwashing, and his plan was to use technology to free people.

Technology cannot be stopped according to Fresco, so it is wise to use it intelligently. However, many companies have stolen his patents over the years for personal gain and profit.

The Problem With The Current Structure

Politicians will never be able to fix our problems, argued Fresco. The present day economic structure is obsolete. He claimed that soon the entire global economy will collapse all over the world.

Fresco's hope was for people to then consider other alternatives rather than going along with the same politicians whom he referred to as "cerebral insufficients".

A World Free Of Politics, War, And Money?

Over the past couple of decades, Jacque worked to build what he called, The Venus Project, a proposed new design of the world's social and economic structure.

Fresco reasoned that most of all the world's problems can be solved through intelligent use of the earth's resources to give people the basic necessities of life – clean air, clean water, a spacious home, healthy nutritious food, access to resources and technology, and a relevant education. Many associated it with communism/socialism, but Fresco reasoned it had nothing to do with it as his designs has no need for politicians.

Solving Problems

According to Fresco, military generals don't know how bridge the differences between nations. War, he says, is the most inappropriate way to solve problems, and he reasons that it creates hatred for generations. As a matter of fact, when it comes to solving the world's social, agricultural, environmental, and energy problems, politicians haven't got a clue!

Jacque gave lectures at various universities and sought funding to build the first city. He gave tours of his research center in Venus, Florida, and spoke all over the world on how his designs could help their economy. He felt a healthy educated society is more economical than the present system which suppresses them and believed his design was the current best plan that he was aware of to address the issues in our world today.

Jacque's Early Days

Living through the Depression, Jacque saw homelessness and violence due to failed politics. When he was in his twenties, he thought up ways of how society could be better structured. Soon after, he began to test his theories.

Believing most social problems could be corrected by bridging the differences between people, Fresco joined chapters of the Ku Klux Klan and the Black Panther Group, and dissolved them both in about two months by using his knowledge of human behavior. By presenting films of different colored people from different parts counter to what they believed, he was able to dissipate their hatred.

When drafted into the military, Fresco designed various safety units for helicopters and other aircraft. He worked as an industrial designer and inventor, and consulted for various companies in the film, medical, and agriculture industries. Later, Jacque took various jobs while funding his research project to make it what it is today.

He was co-creator of Revel Plastics with Lou Glaser in 1941, created a prefabricated aluminum company, and designed electronic devices for the Parkinson's Institute of Miami.

To Fresco, The Venus Project, formerly Socio-cyberneering, was a quantum jump in time, light-years ahead of the present social structure to create a peaceful society without war, politicians, or money. However, this wasn't without pain.

Loss Of Family And Kids

They say the worst pain someone can have is losing their kids. Well, Jacque lost both his son and daughter due to a car accident and cancer. Even veterans who describe their time being tortured in Vietnam and other horrible scenarios with a stern face, break down when mentioning their deceased kids. Despite great loss, Jacque moved on continuing his work. It was all he had left.

A Life of Dharma

Although he didn't believe in the version of God society labeled as acceptable, he lived a life dedicated to helping others unselfishly. Creating a world where everybody has food, water, and shelter was his goal. He mentioned it was the will of Jesus to create such a free world, as in the bible Jesus said, "Thy will be done on EARTH, as it is in heaven."

In heaven there are no wars, no businessmen, no politicians, no money, and no prisons. Doing away with poverty, politics, and war, made the incentive for crime goes away according to him. The remaining issues left would be helping the mentally ill and socially damaged people.

Resources Available

Fresco believed that we already have the technology to create such a world. However, the current management of the world's resources is being run by stupid politicians. Impressive as it seems, it will need testing at in an actual city, but many are now interested in more holistic city designs.

It would have been interesting to see how he would have handled Black Lives Matter or ISIS. In his earlier days, Jacque met a leader of an Arab group who believed the earth was flat. He rubbed a chip on a balloon and let the static attract it to teach the Arab how Earth's gravity acts as a magnet.

What Will Be The Future of Technology?

One thing is for sure – democracy as you know it will be dead. Killing and spy drones are already being used by the military, and technology is already replacing many jobs in the name of greed as the billionaire “elites” will save a buck.

With machines, they can ramp up their production without having to pay a salary, provide medical coverage, or give vacations. It’s perfect for them and with Jacque gone, this gives the greedy corporations more leeway to steal his patented designs and run with it for their own agenda. However, if used wisely, a bright future can be created.

Less Regulations Could Improve The Economy

Take a good look at your current cell phone. In a few years or even less, you know it will become obsolete, because technology continues to improve quickly. If you went back just ten years, you remember that the phones you have today costed much more back then, most weren’t even around. Remember the days of the first cell phones? So what happened?

The same thing that happened with the television, computer, and internet. These industries had little to no government regulations and so entrepreneurs were able to expand and innovate.

When production and efficiency goes up, costs go down, meaning your buying power skyrockets. That’s how people are able to buy technology today that once costed millions.

Whether it is medical, genetic research, or engineering, people have learned to accept that technology improves rapidly. Unfortunately, they don’t expect the same for government and the economy. They are still looking to politicians to take care of everything rather than giving new ideas a chance.

Funneled government funds made technology what it is today, but now corrupt greedy billionaires are ruling the world through monopolies and must be stopped as it’s killing entrepreneurship.

Even when Nikola Tesla presented free energy and robots to replace hard labor, he was denied as the American government felt his technology threatened capitalism. Hey, capitalism was a wonderful departure from communism, however, it isn't immune to corruption.

The Death Of A Great Mind

During the morning of May 18th, 2017, Jacque Fresco died. His last few days were spent with close friends and he worked on his vision for a better future until the very end.

The Venus Project was Jacque's life work, a plan for using science and technology to create a world free of money, military, politicians, and war. It proposed an alternative to the current social and economic structure presently being exercised in our world, and offered an entirely new approach to solving problems.

Jacque maybe gone, but left us a vision for a better future. Perhaps someday, the world may look back and acknowledge him as one of the greatest minds of the 21st century.

Read More: Is Technology Our Friend or Foe?

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests.

He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

5 Ways You Can Revolt Against The Modern World

June 30, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Italian philosopher Julius Evola wrote a book in 1934 entitled, Revolt Against The Modern World. The book is prophetic in that Evola was able to accurately diagnose the ills of modern civilization while they were still only ideas awaiting implementation. But Evola doesn't give a lot of practical guidance as to how a man can revolt against the modern world. Here are some ideas for how we can implement Evola's ideas.

1. Go outside

Evola was an avid mountain climber before an allied bomb robbed him of the use of his legs. For Evola, alpinism was something more than exercise, it was a spiritual experience. The concentration involved, the sheer danger of climbing, and the magnificent scenery all help to purify the mind.

Many Americans today never actually go outside. They take their car to work where they spend nine hours in a temperature controlled cubicle. When they get home they either go to their air conditioned gym, attend happy hour at a bar, or play video games. The only time they might be outdoors is during their vacation. We have to take vitamin D supplements because we don't spend enough time in the sun to derive it naturally.

Most of us don't live near a mountain range, but we can still make a small act against the modern world by spending more time outdoors. Make regular use of your local parks (trust me, they'll be almost empty). Go on weekly hikes. Plan regular camping and hunting trips with your friends. If you live near the coast, go surfing or sailing. Make it a point to spend as much time outdoors as possible. You'll function a lot better when you are closer to nature.

2. Increase time with friends and family

One of the worst side effects of the modern world is atomization—we are all made to think and live is individual units with little connection to our community. This is by design. Atomized units can't get together to join a revolt. United we stand, divided we fall.

Social media can be a powerful tool in bringing together like-minded people—just take a look at what it is doing for the growing right-wing in the US—but is usually harmful as it takes us away from having real encounters with people. New technology is only going to accelerate the process of atomization: Recently Facebook announced it was developing a virtual meetup up room where friends could "touch" each other remotely. Why bother interacting in real life?

To swim counter to these modern tendencies, lessen your use of social media and try to meet with friends instead. And try to stay close to your family. Tribes are made up of families. In the West, we no longer have tribes but we are still permitted have families. Take advantage of the fact that blood is usually thicker than water and build strong relationships with your relatives.

3. Ignore the current political scene

Laura Loomer

Politics are important but paying attention the current political scene is a waste of time. This is true even of so-called rightwing politics. Take the most recent case of Laura Loomer, an employee of the alternative media outlet, The Rebel. Loomer burst into the public consciousness when she ran onto the stage to protest a leftist rendition of Shakespeare's Julius Caesar that featured the assassination of a character that was obviously meant to be Donald Trump. Loomer instantly became a media sensation and a major celebrity in the alt lite.

Loading...

The problem is that Loomer's protest was little more than a publicity stunt. She knew that she would get arrested and even created a "Free Laura" fundraising website before the arrest. In other words, Loomer created a fake incident with the express purpose in gaining notoriety within rightwing circles. As soon as she gained prominence is the alt right/alt lite circle, she immediately tried to impose her own views on the movement, which, as Roosh points out, is classical entryest behavior.

> Laura Loomer seems like a classic entryist: gain status and trust within a group then immediately start changing it https://t.co/AC03ZjUBQh
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) June 22, 2017

Loomer is an example of why it is not worth your time to engage in the clown circus that is contemporary politics. It is filled with parasites who don't really give a damn about creating a healthy society—only gaining notoriety and riches. The antidote to degenerate modern politics is to fill your mind with solid material that will give you a good foundation on how to approach politics. Here are a few authors that are worth your consideration:

— Joe Sobran
— Mel Bradford
— Richard Weaver
— Julius Evola
— Alain de Benoist

— Joseph de Maistre
— Nicholas Gomez Davila
— Dominique Venner
— Tom Sunic
— Hans Hermann Hoppe

4. Get off the hamster wheel

The average life of a modern American is a hamster wheel to nowhere. We watch commercials that awaken in us lust for items we don't need. We go out and buy those items and saddle ourselves with debt. We indenture ourselves to employers for decades to pay the debt and keep up our consumption.

After 50 years of employment, we hope and pray that the stock market will not have a downturn immediately before we retire. If everything works right and our health holds up, we might be able to enjoy life for a few years before we die.

To revolt against the modern world we have to get off the hamster wheel. There are two ways of doing that. First, we can build multiple streams of income—if one gets cut off (getting laid off, for example), you still have income to keep you afloat.

Second, we have to be able to say 'no' to overconsumption. Even the truly rich can burn through their fortunes if they have no fiscal responsibility—just ask Johnny Depp. Your goal should be to reduce your fixed expenses to the lowest possible levels. One strategy to do this is to try to live interest-free.

You are only free when you are free to voice your opinion without fear of being financially ruined. Few of us have reached this level, but all of us should aspire to it.

5. Eat well and lift

The famous yoga master B.K.S. Iyengar once said that one cannot experience true freedom unless your body is functioning at peak efficiency. It makes sense, because even if you obtain financial freedom, it will be of little value of you are weak or sick.

The modern world is built (by accident or by design) to make us weak and sick. Corporate food is laden with excessive carbs and unhealthy fats and should be avoided. Instead, eat whole foods whenever possible. A good rule of thumb is that if it wasn't available in 1900, it should be avoided.

Another trend in the modern world is to celebrate soy-fed manlets with no muscle tone. There are men walking around who look weaker than their girlfriends. Fight this trend. You don't have to become a bodybuilder, but start hitting the weights at the gym. And don't skip leg day.

Conclusion

These are simple steps but they will dramatically improve your life if you practice them. More importantly, you will be laying the foundation for a true revolt against the modern world.

Read More: Alt Lite and Alt Right Hold Dueling Free Speech Rallies, Alt Right Wins

---

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Why You Should Ban Visually Barbaric LED Lightbulbs From Your Home

June 30, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Our daily lives are full of things we take for granted and do not give much attention to. Do you think much about the lamps, or better yet, the light bulbs in your home? Usually one pays attention to such a thing only when it stops working and needs to be fixed. You think about bulbs when your ceiling light burned out, otherwise it is just fine. The same goes for many other seemingly or actually trivial things.

But if the devil hides in the details, as the saying goes, it hides in the apparent trivialities too. Artificial lights, although they have been everywhere for more than a century, have much changed in the course of last three decades—and they are far from trivially important. You may be aware that staring at bright screens at night is bad for your health, that it disrupts the natural day/light cycle, and that using a warm filter lets your eyes far better. LED bulbs are still another case: they seem less obvious because we usually don't stare at them.

Perhaps, metaphorically, we should.

How I became LED-aware

In 2009 I started going, first timidly and cautiously, then on a regular basis in the unofficial Catacombs of Paris. The place has no light of its own, which means that visitors must bring their own, as speleologists do. Thus I bought the classic battery-powered headlamp any large sport shop sells. It had three small LED light bulbs behind its protective glass. Later I bought another headlamp that had only one, yet more powerful, LED bulb. All headlamps you can find on the shelves use these same bulbs.

For a special use like wide-subterranean exploration, this makes sense. When you know you will remain for hours in a place with no lights and know unexpected things like a closed exit may happen, the battery duration is the first consideration, and LEDs are undisputedly the least energy-intensive lamps.

Yet, even then, when sitting in a room one notices quickly that a LED light is unsatisfying. Its glow looks cold—its crude white-bluish sorely lacks warmth. This is why cataphiles bring candles with them.

Better yet: an acetylene (carbide-powered) lamp

As long as one remains able to choose and as LEDs are a freely available mean for a specialized use, I see no problem with them. Catacomb tours are a small-time exposure, and when LEDs are used in order to save battery, they are pretty good. But obviously the world we live in is not like that.

Years later I went to Brazil and noticed many artificial lights displaying the same crude, eye-hurting cold color around. In the streets, in bars, even in houses—Brazilians are used to these sorts of lights. A paradox in a country fairly renowned for its hot girls and where there is much more human warmth than in ruthless “developed” metropolis. Add to the assortment of LED and neon lights late-night TV and you get a splashing visual barbarism. Needless to say, I stuffed my own place with incandescent, either traditional or halogen, bulbs that shine with warm glows.

Dangerous lamps

At least Brazil shows things as they are. LEDs are a cold light, not only to the naked eye but physically as well. Whereas natural sources of light, such as the Sun or fires, and artificial ones such as incandescent bulbs emit red and infrared lights, LED lamps emit no infrared, some red on the higher part of the spectrum, and lots of intense blue.

Cold light is the essential, defining character of LEDs. In contrast with other lamps, they are not a thermic source as they emit no heat. They are high on the blue spectre, low on the red and infrared. To alleviate the visual inconvenience, companies have invented LED lamps that show a predominant yellow taint.

These are very much in use in lounge bars, on the streets, and even around art painting and monuments, which makes them associated with a "classy" ambient. However, these apparently eye-friendly LEDs are physically dissimilar with traditional sources of lights: they use a fluorescent sheet to "dilute" the aggressive blue light into a whitish taint and exaggerate the yellow and red as to dissimulate the colder colours—which are still fully emitted.

Seemingly warm LEDs "lie" on what they are. On the surface, they are normal, flexible, and classy lights; on the physical spectrum, which ought not to be confused with the visible one, they are poor in infrared, poor in low-spectrum red, and excessively blue. These unseen light emissions are not only "colder" in general but deleterious to the eye as well.

Two studies have shown that rats exposed to lights of equal, median intensity for 24 hours were only harmed by LEDs. The excess of blue light hurts the visual cells while the lack of red and infrared prevent cell regeneration—and may let us with less energy left as the body also absorbs energy from light sources.

Lights here appear yellow and provide a typical sober, “classy” effect. Compare with incandescent bulbs and you will notice their coldness, too

As a phototherapy specialist warns:

> If you use LED lights after sunset, you reduce the regenerative and restoring capacities of your eyes. Needless to say, with less regeneration you end up with degeneration. In this case, the degeneration can lead to AMD, which is the primary cause of blindness among the elderly. However, and this is that most fail to appreciate, LED light exposure that is not balanced with full sunlight loaded with the red parts of the spectrum is always damaging to your biology. Just more so at night…
>
> [T]he main problem with LEDs is the fact that they emit primarily blue wavelengths and lack the counterbalancing healing and regenerative near-infrared frequencies. They have very little red in them, and no infrared, which is the wavelength required for repair and regeneration.

A creepy attempt at imposing LEDs

Since 2005, the European Union has planned to impose LEDs everywhere and ban incandescent bulbs. Unsurprisingly, the army of unelected technocrats there justified this umpteenth restriction of our freedom with ecology. LEDs consume so much less! Well, this is true—but is it worth degrading people's life conditions? Especially when millions of undesired immigrants are allowed to enter, when they receive always more and more from the public institutions, and when technocrats already allow themselves much?

Regardless of the real importance of consuming less energy, the measure seems to embody some sheer power-tripping micromanagement of people's lives as well as a good measure of influence-peddling. Several companies have invested a lot in LED research, and they want their investment to pay off—for research, for shadowy shareholders, for revolving door insiders and for overpaid CEOs.

The European Union is notoriously pervaded by lobbyists. It mishmashes the will to micromanage, down to olive oil jugs or vacuum cleaners, with imposing Big Corp's wishes as to force the consumers into buying its latest crap. How much did Nichia Corporation pay for the right bureaucrats to enforce convenient guidelines?

It was originally scheduled to have all incandescent bulbs banned in 2012. A group of other manufacturers then managed to peddle enough influence to lift the complete ban until at least 2018. Non-European countries have moved in tandem with the European bureaucratic monster. In Brazil, houseware chain retailers stopped selling traditional light bulbs. They still sell halogen bulbs, although a clerk told me these would be phased out next year due to be energy-rated C.

Forcing people into buying more expensive bulbs that will harm their health and damage their daily life conditions, then pocketing the benefits and self-congratulating from muh ecology: a perfect synthesis of globalist big-scale assholery. All quietly, on the margins and through a seemingly non-political channel, of course.

When I moved in my current home, I climbed the step ladder to remove the crass LED whitish lights and put halogen bulbs instead. But then, I found that the home was equipped with… specially LED-tailored bulb holders. These make loose connections with the halogen bulbs. They work perfectly, though, with old-fashioned incandescent bulbs—something rather ironical given that halogens are the most “ecologic” incandescent bulbs.

Now my only working halogen bulb is mounted on a vintage art déco lamp and all the preexisting supports are staffed with incandescent bulbs. Independent retailers are still selling some.

Buy incandescent bulbs (and don’t be a Leftist hypocrite)

The spiciest part is still to come. Guess who rushed in defense of the project to compel LED lights everywhere? Pseudo-radical Leftists at Alternet, who invoked straw man “conspiracy theories” on the topic, and their more official coworkers from the French outlet Le Monde who instead dampened the results of aforementioned studies on rats as to make the issue look trivial and overly technical.

It turns out, yet, that I am not the only one disturbed by the splashing cold brightness of LEDs. As big names of bulb-making massively shifted their production, hipsters have started to make “vintage” bulbs… and it just happens that urban bobos love enlightening their trendy cafés and large flats with warm orange filaments. “Ecology”, or at least its non-glamorous side, is forced on the vulgum pecus whereas those benefiting from globalism still have the options they want. It isn’t as if they were experts in hidden double standards after all.

Conclusion

I long the day when a craftsman on our side will start making old-fashioned and halogen light bulbs. Bureaucrats and depopulation enthusiasts be damned. Until then, buy incandescent bulbs, stock them if you can, and favour warm lights.

Read Next: Why Modern Men Should Develop A Passion For Living

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

How To Start A Local Labor Union

June 30, 2017 | by Davis M.J. Aurini | Link | Original Link

I was recently sitting down with an old acquaintance, and the conversation turned to his job. He works in construction, and was frustrated with the fact that during the last economic downturn wages went down, but despite the recent uptick they hadn't risen.

This problem of cost disease is endemic throughout the West. The volume on your soda bottle goes down, but the price remains the same. You take on more responsibilities at work, but you continue to make the same wage. New technologies lay people off, while demanding higher skill levels amongst those who remain, with no commensurate increase in pay.

I'm a strong believer in the efficiency of free markets, but that doesn't mean I'm opposed to workers unions. Free association is a crucial element in a free society, and the decision to bargain collectively is just one of its forms. Furthermore, the union can serve a vital function in the economy.

No sane Capitalist wants to benefit from the tragedy of the commons – short term profit at the cost of destroying the industry – and unions can provide a vital signalling function, allowing owners to understand what things are like "on the ground", alleviating the long-term costs of aggressive, exploitative policies, which can wind up destroying the labor force which their company relies upon.

There is nothing inherently wrong with unions, but it's become a dirty word because of the dirty practices they've engaged in. At the turn of the last century, factory owners were hiring the Pinkerton detective agency to threaten and assault striking workers; the unions responded by getting into bed with organized crime and Democrat politicians, embracing the Marxist "gimme dat" philosophy, which is just as destructive as the "rape and pillage" philosophy of Robber Barons.

None of this indicts the principle of unionization; it is merely an indictment of corrupt practices. And in this era of increased globalization – of the new Robber Barons who live overseas, and plan to turn the entire world into a company store – a return to domestic workers rights and fair negotiations is a crucial plank in maintaining middle class independence.

Are you the right man for the job?

Complaining is one thing; anybody who's ever worked an honest day for honest pay knows that the complaints are endless. Bonding over those complaints is half of the reason bars were invented. But to put together a workers' union, you need to have more than just complaints.

First, you need to lead by example. It's not enough to be an opinionated journeyman in a green hardhat; at that stage, you might as well be a Social Justice Warrior, fresh out of college, and full of ideas on how everyone else should live their lives.

If you want to make a positive difference in the world, you need to start by making a positive difference in your day-to-day life. You need to be a competent employee, with several years of experience under your belt, and a wide familiarity with the trades which are complimentary to your specialty. You need to be able to demand quality out of others, by performing quality yourself.

Second, you need to be familiar with the financials of the market in which you operate. After all, what we're talking about is negotiating with owners who are more concerned with interest rates and government subsidies than with actually building the damned product.

The core of your complaint as a tradesman is that they're failing to appreciate the struggles of you and your brothers on the factory floor; ergo, it's incumbent upon you to understand the struggles that they're dealing with up in the offices. Nothing gets built without a skilled pair of hands, but that skilled pair of hands will remain idle if somebody isn't working with the bank to finance the whole project. You need to educate yourself about their realm of expertise if you ever want to negotiate with them like an adult.

Third, you need to do a moral inventory. Your frustrations are centered around the greed and ignorance of the owners, correct? In that case, you need to ensure that you aren't motivated by greed in turn.

During the late Twentieth Century, Unions became greedy for power, and became just as bad as that which they opposed. They consolidated power across industries, sought the backing of government legislators, and placed unreasonable demands upon the owners, resulting in the collapse of many industries throughout North America.

Often, these Unions would prey upon the journeyman, forcing them to pay dues so that they could live like the fat cats they decried, and wound up being just as responsible for the rust belt as the globalists who want a world of serfs.

Class envy will destroy you. It is always an excuse for the spendthrift ways of the person who voices it. Whether it's a college graduate with a useless degree, or a plumber who blows his paycheck at the bar every weekend, class envy is a sign of immaturity and irresponsibility. If you haven't learned how to act like an adult, then you're in no position to help your fellow worker.

Carrot or stick?

STRIKE CALLED

ALL UNIONS TO GO OUT

Published for Principle and Not for Profit — Full Leased Wire Service of the United Press Association

Seattle Union Record

DAILY EDITION

SEATTLE, WASH., MONDAY, FEB. 3, 1919

ANNOUNCEMENT OF STRIKE

A general strike of all the union workmen in Seattle was decided upon definitely at a meeting held in the Labor Temple Sunday, February 2, 1919, when the date for the general strike was set for 10 a. m. Thursday, February 6, 1919.

Plans are perfected by the workers to feed the strikers and public at places which will be announced later by this committee. The plans, as outlined by a committee of the culinary trades, will insure the strikers and public in general no hardships or privations so far as having suitable places to eat are concerned.

A committee has been appointed to visit the Metal Trades and Central Labor Councils of Tacoma, who had decided to call a general strike for Tuesday, February 4, at 12 o'clock noon, to prevail upon them to postpone action until Thursday at 10 a. m., so as to act simultaneously with the Seattle Unions, thereby effecting a solid front, indorsing the metal tradesmen in their demands.

SIXTY THOUSAND TO RESPOND TO CALL

At 10 o'clock next Thursday morning 60,000 organized workers in the city of Seattle will stand shoulder to shoulder in the first general strike that has ever been successfully inaugurated in the history of this country. Insolently and contemptuously Mr. Charles Piez and his labor-smashing shipping board threw down the defiant gauntlet which has now been taken up with a firmness of resolution and a solidarity unmatched in the annals of the American labor movement.

The workers of the northwest believe that they have been flouted and fooled by Piez and his fellow labor-baiters, that they have been deceived and betrayed by the politicians, both state and federal, and they have resolutely grasped the only weapon ever which they have any direct control, determined to make a fight that will demonstrate whether or not they have the power to secure the justice that has been denied them by industrial tyrants and humanitarian dreamers.

35,000 SILK MILL WORKERS STRIKE

PATERSON, N. J., Feb. 3.—More than 35,000 silk mill workers went on strike here today, according to unofficial estimate, following refusal of the employers to meet demands

NO CONSTRUCTIVE LEGISLATION YET

Grand action capture our imagination, and when it comes to unions there's nothing grander than the general strike. The men are all organized, the news channels are out in full force, and the owners are sweating bullets as their assembly lines fail to turn. It's a dramatic vision, the oppressed rising up to throw off the shackles of their oppressors… but it's also expensive and destructive for all of those involved.

Consider the Second Amendment for a moment, and why it is that men carry a pistol on their hip. Is it to live in some sort of John Wayne fantasy world? Or is it to deter crime? You're far better off avoiding both the mugger and the police investigation which comes from ventilating said mugger.

Your focus shouldn't be on the fight against the bosses, so much as the solutions which help you both. A skilled tradesman, who shows up to work on time, stays sober, and does good work, is a massive carrot; depending upon the industry, they can be few and far between. Instead of focusing on the strike, what if you focused on creating a network of men you could vouch for? A loose association of professionals whose work was guaranteed?

By offering the owners a carrot, you've managed to get your foot in the door. Because your group is reliable, they can already start demanding higher wages than others in your industry – and because you're earning higher wages, there will be plenty of others who'll want to join you. Eventually, if you need to, you'll have enough people in your association to create a meaningful strike… but if you've been developing good relationships with the owners, in all likelihood you won't have to.

Command and control

The advantage to starting off small, is that you have less need for organization. But if you're going to be successful, you need to start planning your organization from the very beginning.

Conquest's Second Law of Politics states that "Any organization not explicitly right-wing sooner or later becomes left-wing." What he means is that any organization which doesn't explicitly know it's own purpose, eventually devolves to the lowest common denominator. This is why online movements always fail, and if your association devolves into nothing but grumbles and complaints, all you'll wind up doing is blacklisting yourself and your confederates.

It is crucial that you maintain clarity purpose for your organization and perspective and concern for your fellow man, neither exploiting them through punitive licensing/union fees, nor destroying the industry through excessive demands.

To do this will require education. Just as you learned about the financial difficulties the owners are forced to deal with, you'll have to learn about organizational difficulties. The Founding Fathers of the United States were successful because they had studied many forms of government before waging their revolution. If you plan to succeed, you will likewise study the many successes and failures which exist in the pages of history.

Conclusion

Individual autonomy within hierarchy is the foundation of Western Civilization; it is what has made the West the most successful society on the planet. Even back in medieval times, a peasant might genuflect to a noble, but he wasn't expected to kowtow while shaking in fear. And for his part, the noble treated even the meanest of peasant huts as a castle, politely requesting admittance rather than forcing his way in.

The spirit of globalism rejects this mutual respect, and the inherent dignity upon which all men have claim. Instead, it seeks to atomize the individual by inflaming zealous loyalty to monolithic groups. The solution is to reject both these extremes. Neither the extreme individualism, where each man is out for himself, nor the blind loyalty of an "us versus them" ethos. Assertiveness is the key: demand respect from others, while giving respect in return.

A new wave of organic, conscientious, and responsible unionization – or association, or network, or whatever term you wish – could play an integral role in reestablishing the American Middle Class, as well as her industrial base. Every single one of us has a role to play, and there are great opportunities out there for those who who are willing to take on the mantle of responsibility, who are willing to go out and seize opportunity, and who are willing to hold themselves to the standard that made our ancestors great.

Read More: Ignore The Unwarranted Hate Of Trade Jobs

Davis M.J. Aurini
Davis was trained as a Historian at McMaster University, and as an Infantry soldier in the Canadian Forces. An author, strategist, Catholic medievalist, and an entrepreneur, his writing can be found at Stares at the World.

3 Things I Learned From Nine Months Of Celibacy

July 1, 2017 | by Michael Witcoff | Link | Original Link

Peace and grace to you, gentlemen, from the Lord Jesus Christ.

Though I never in my life thought I would arrive at where I am right now, it is God's will for me that I share with you what I have learned in my transformation from living a degenerate and hedonistic life into a disciple of Christ, who lives by the guidance and conviction of the Holy Spirit.

In fact, I don't even want to be writing this. I would rather be in the background, living my life and running my business with complete anonymity—but God impressed upon my heart that my story and testimony would do no good for the world if I were to keep it to myself.

Therefore, I'd like to share with you what it's been like for me since leaving behind the world of harems, threesomes and one-night stands for the celibacy I have been experiencing over the last nine consecutive months. My "Salvation Experience" occurred earlier than that, which I will probably write to you about soon, and that is where my heart and mind were truly transformed.

However, I was still an infant in my walk with Christ, and I became more purified the deeper that walk becomes. Now, looking back, I believe I can somewhat-effectively verbalize an experiential transformation that truly defies description in the limited lexicon of human language.

I will share with you the three greatest lessons I have learned in that span of time, but first I will give you a quick background first on the kind of life I used to be living. I mentioned in my article on copywriting that I often used drugs and sex to numb myself from the pain of this upside-down Clown World we live in.

You know what I mean: the world where being honest and virtuous gets you chastised and mocked, but being a functional sociopath gets you lauded with praise and reward. If you are like me, you may have never felt like a part of this dark world in your heart—even if you had to “play along” sometimes just to survive.

In order to “deal” with it, I was constantly either high, seeking sex, or both at the same time. Those moments of temporary escape were more important to me than the potential consequences, and needless to say, it led me in a very dark and lonely direction.

Since meeting Jesus face-to-face and experiencing the complete transformation of the very core of my being, I have been lifted above this dark world and the material prison in which our souls are trapped. This is not to say I am perfect; I’m far from it, and as guilty of sin as anyone else.

However, that sin is of an exponentially rarer and less serious nature. And rather than dwelling in it (or taking pride in it, like I used to do) I now feel utterly convicted in my heart that when it happens, I have distanced myself from God and from the comforting grace of the Holy Spirit.

So let’s start there.

1. You Cannot Make Genuine Spiritual Progress While Living For The Flesh

If the headline of this section triggered you in some way then I invite you to explore that feeling and its source. You may be hosting some unwanted spiritual guests, invited into your home by your throwing the door open to them.

There was a time in my life when I thought that “learning Game” was spiritual progress. I genuinely felt like I was growing as a person by studying Mystery, David DeAngelo, and other “gurus” back when I was in the position so many men still find themselves in today.

In a way, I was making progress. I learned to stand up straighter, to be more assertive, to be more confident, to ask for what I wanted and to stop acting needy around other people.

All of these were great lessons. However, as with all blessings, they can quickly become a curse when used for the wrong purposes—and that is exactly what the rabbit hole of the “player lifestyle” ended up being for me.

It led to a place of complete inner emptiness, with my being terrified moment-to-moment that “the mask might slip” around some particular woman of interest and I would never see her again. I thought I was in it for sex; looking back, the validation was just as important.

All that time, all that effort, and all that energy spent learning how to please mortal, imperfect human beings was time, effort, and energy I didn’t spend learning how to please the immortal God—the only being whose validation or approval actually matters at all.

Genuine spiritual growth—which you will know by the fruits of a peaceful, harmonious mind and existence—only comes from doing a better job of living up to God’s will. As long as your “spirituality” is just a mechanism to get more of what you want, you will be depriving yourself of these blessings.

2. Your Mind Is Capable Of Phenomenal Creativity And Power

With my thoughts constantly circling around how to maintain this girl in my harem or which kind of opener to use in that situation, I never had the "silence of mind" to explore my own inner world and the incredible depth of what it contains.

We are God's children—and just as in the situation with our earthly parents, we do not receive the blessings and rewards of our Father in Heaven unless we are obedient to His will. As our parents did not give us allowance and time to play video games when we misbehaved, neither should we expect God to bless us with peace, power, happiness and health while we are our spending our time and energy on materialistic and fleshly pursuits.

The human mind, while capable of wonderful things, is not unlimited in its resources. With your mind focused on the material plane and fleshly pursuits, you will never know its true power and potential.

Look upwards and keep your eyes focused on the Spirit, and you will unlock fountains of energy that you never realized you had within you.

3. God Can Do For You What You Cannot Do For Yourself

The failings of New Age philosophy are many and varied, but this is perhaps the most serious and damaging of them all. At one point or another, I was a part of many different systems of spirituality which all more or less branched off the "New Age Tree"—and one thing they all had in common was the ultimate conclusion that "God" was just a metaphor for "you."

Not realizing either the blasphemy or stupidity of such a sentiment at the time, I was deep into the particular version of Gnosticism which falsely claims that the idea of man as God was the "secret teaching" of all the other religions. Having no familiarity with the Bible at all—and no spiritual discernment whatsoever—I did not realize this was simply the newest iteration of the world's oldest lie.

In retrospect, I now realize that this self-directed idolatry is the most prideful and poisonous of all sins. By not recognizing God as without, as a Higher Power that is unfathomably stronger and wiser than a tiny human being could ever dream of becoming, I was cutting myself off from the highest blessings that the spiritual kingdom has to offer.

The most relevant of those blessings, at least for me, was being transported to a higher and purer plane of existence than I ever realized was possible. I do not have to "fight against" my lust, most of the time.

I am not struggling to contain myself; in fact, just the opposite is true. God lifted me to such a high place that the mere thought of going out and hitting on strange women creates a suffocating feeling in my chest.

That, the conviction of the Spirit, is not something that comes from within. It is something that comes from repenting for sin and believing in the risen Christ, exactly as the New Testament details.

If the idea of being celibate for long periods of time sounds impossible to you, it is because you are considering it from your own power. God can do what you cannot do for yourself, for “he who is in you is stronger than he who is in the world.”

Pray sincerely for the power to overcome the flesh, and God will send his angels to attend to your request.

Read More: The 21 Theses Of Alt-Christianity

Michael Witcoff
Michael is a Christian, a copywriter, an author, and a marketing consultant. He believes the West is experiencing divine wrath for turning our backs on God, and that the only hope for salvation is to unite under one faithful banner as our enemies have under theirs.

The Truth About Moral Relativism

July 1, 2017 | by L.T. Smash | Link | Original Link

"Openness, as currently conceived, is a way of making surrender to whatever is most powerful, or worship of vulgar success, seem principled." – Allan Bloom, The Closing of the American Mind.

Everyone is being inundated in our culture with the idea of openness, specifically, the left's idea of openness. This idea of openness is actually moral relativism masquerading as moral virtue; a moral virtue that changes, based upon convenience and emotion, which is really no morality at all.

Moral Relativism

Moral relativism is pushed as the highest possible moral code. A moral "code" of tolerance above everything else. Moral relativism and the idea of relative moral truth go hand-in-hand. These two cannot be separated. Hence, the phrases, "This is true for me," and "That is true for you." Subjective desires, whatever they are, become the "new" moral truth.

Moral relativism teaches the philosophy that all moral truth is subjective (not to be confused with objective truth which is independent of the person and his consciousness, i.e. 5+5=10). Anyone that accepts the idea of tolerance as the highest moral priority really has no moral code. The arguments for universal tolerance, which is based upon no concrete standard, are typically very persuasive.

In his book, The Closing of the American Mind, Allan Bloom states:

> There is one thing a professor can be absolutely certain of: almost every student entering the university believes, or says he believes, that truth is relative. If this belief is put to the test, one can count on the students' reaction: they will be uncomprehending. That anyone should regard the proposition as not self-evident astonishes them, as though he were calling into question 2 + 2 = 4.

Moral relativism has permeated all aspects of the Western world, political, spiritual, religious, and cultural and has made its way into the sciences. Cynthia Crossen in her book, Tainted Truth discusses how information is deliberately manipulated for specific outcomes. What is pushed as objective truth is no longer truly objective.

The death of objective truth leads to the eventual death of all things related to it. Morality, integrity, honor, and all other foundational underpinning of civilization crumble away. Civilizations can be compared to a building, the foundation being the objective truth and moral law of the civilization. Without objective truth and moral law we have no foundation.

Since moral truth is relative, this means that truth becomes unreasonable and cannot be known because moral truth is different for each person. Moral relativity is presented as moral liberty but in reality moral relativity is a type of slavery. Few realize the opposite of war is tyranny and slavery.

As our societal foundation crumbles away, governments construct ever more detailed and morally relative statutory codes in an attempt to provide cohesion to society since foundational laws and traditions are openly disregarded and attacked. This creates a society where virtues are presented as a vices and vices are presented as virtues. To present virtues as vices and vices as virtues requires a corruption of the soul and mind. This is a world where people claim emotional and moral chaos is freedom.

In a world ruled by moral relativity, emotion is substituted for reason, cowardice is taken for bravery, tolerance is substituted for virtue and standards, and weakness is substituted for strength.

Personal restraint and self-respect are being destroyed. Moral relativity operates under the idea that what feels good is good for me and for society. Pleasure and emotional whims decide what is good, and our statutory law and case law come to reflect this idea.

Moral relativism is a disgusting, murky, swamp of narcissistic behavior presented as freedom and a trouble free playground. Moral relativism has resulted in the creation of a various committees, such as the "Safe Space Committee" at Old Dominion University to reduce “homophobia, transphobia and heterosexism” on campus.

The United Methodist Church recently selected a transgender person to be a deacon. Eventually, this same person or another transgender person will be leading a congregation of United Methodists. Any other churches, faiths, or groups that oppose transgender are regarded as bigoted, backwards, and “out of touch”. Transgenderism and the idea of non-binary sexes are examples of moral relativism and the idea of biological sex being a relative truth.

There Is No Moral Neutrality

The purveyors of moral relativism promote the idea of that a person can be morally neutral. This is a make-believe world where no right or wrong and hence no judgement exists for any of the behaviors of other people. This type of thinking is full of hypocrisy. The postulators of moral neutrality are more than happy to push the make-believe world of moral neutrality as long as they feel they have not been wronged by anyone else.

We make judgments every day in life. We are constantly presented with choices and judgments of various natures. When people insist we do not pass judgement upon someone’s moral choices, the people insisting any such judgement have questionable character.

A person believing they are morally neutral believes they are on the moral high ground. Accusing someone else of passing judgment while claiming to be morally neutral is contradictory; the claim of being morally neutral becomes self-refuting because the person accusing another of judgment is passing judgment upon someone who is not claiming moral neutrality. Being silent is not being neutral. Silence is a quiet acceptance of whatever thinking prevails at the time.

Everyone has two places that influence moral decisions. One place is external from sources such as God, government, society, conventionalism and normativism; the other is internal or the self. Understand moral relativism's center is the self, moral relativism is an extension of narcissism.

Even those that push moral relativism and have no morals pull rationale and their foundation, even though the foundation is extremely shaky, and ideology from external sources to justify internal desires. Moral relativism is practiced by those will little or no character and those without honor. Such people are quick to forsake any kind of standard for what is convenient.

Understand laws enforce some kind of viewpoint. The laws are changing in the Western world to reflect the current moral relativist view. Moral relativism leads to a double standard. Moral relativism is why many feminists are not prosecuted for bearing false witness against the men they accuse of rape or other crimes. Moral relativism is why no parties were prosecuted and nothing was really fixed after the 2008 financial collapse. Moral relativism is one of the reasons why women and children have come to rule over men as spoken of in the Bible.

What needs to be done

The more evil, decrepit, and morally relativist a people become the more they have need of taskmasters telling them what they can and cannot do.

Those in the moral and truth relativism quagmire are without honor and do not honor others let alone themselves. Do not honor such people. Many of these people lack or have poor reasoning abilities. Wisdom necessitates we periodically evaluate what forces and factors influence our decisions, our standards, and what we value.

Do not include in your circles, unless you have no choice, people engaged or that push moral relativism. They will drag you down. When we abandon the idea that laws do not apply to everyone, without exception, all the remains is the subjective personal desires and opinions.

Believe your standards to be true, believe in something other than yourself, and place what you value (what is deemed to be of worth) at the front. Do not be the same as other people by believing the freedom of our time is the liberty to choose any values you desire as long as you don’t believe them to be true. Standing up to moral relativism will have a lot of butt hurt people, but that is their problem.

The purveyors of moral relativism do not need your compliance, all they need is your silence and they will succeed. Since moral relativism is really no morality at all, what society accepts as “moral” will continue the downward march until they drown in the murky swamp of me-ism.

Read More: The Truth About AIDS & Heterosexual Transmission

L.T.Smash

L.T. Smash is a long student of history and various historical methods for war, economics, law, propaganda, journalism, ancient civilizations and various other subjects. He is interested in how all these things come together to impact our world and us individually.

Megyn Kelly’s Career Is Finished

July 2, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Megyn Kelly has lost all relevancy. Remember her first show debut on NBC? Well, neither did anyone else. She committed career suicide by hosting disastrous interviews with Vladimir Putin and Alex Jones. Ratings for her new TV program have plummeted to laughable levels and now it’s unlikely she’ll have a respectable career in media. Here’s how she did this to herself.

Vladimir Putin Interview

Kelly played the globalist line, but Putin slammed all the false allegations claiming Russia rigged the 2016 election as a hoax.

Strongly and powerfully, he bashed all the so called “official reports” Kelly cited to him, stating that these were based on unproven invented data gathered from public, not official, sources. There was no evidence proving that Russia was involved in interfering with the American presidential election.

Recently, a CNN supervisor admitted the whole Trump Russian collaboration is BS.

The jig is up folks, and now CNN is facing a possible $100 million dollar lawsuit over the fake story.

St. Petersburg International Forum

Kelly tried to trip up Putin with prefabricated scripts provided by the dark shadow goons in NBC, but instead it completely backfired as the Russian president made her look like a fool.

Desperate, she then tried to get India’s Prime Minister Narendra Modi involved, asking for his comment, but that didn't work either. India and Russia have a strong relationship; there was no way they were going to let some bimbo compromise that.

Did Megyn really think she could turn them against each other?

Both men, along with other leaders and millions watching around the world, couldn't stop laughing at Kelly's foolish accusations. Indeed, it was a rare site to see Putin laugh this much.

Alex Jones

Jones' recording of a pre-interview reveals that Kelley lied about the date of the show airing, the context of the interview, and about refraining from a smear campaign. Well, as expected, it was everything she promised NOT to do.

And the ratings reveal all. People were so disgusted that viewership dropped to new lows. Everyone is on to her and even NBC knows it, which is why they attempted damage control by attacking Jones for three quarters of the show.

Look, Jones has claimed some controversial things like 9/11 being an inside job and elites creating human-frog hybrids. Still, there was no intelligent dialogue in the interview, just setup "gotchya" questions and follow up weasel phrases.

Kelly has destroyed her own career and is now paying for it. At best, she'll find work as another stooge for some other anti-Trump media company to continue the lies. There are a few lessons to learn, especially for women.

Looks doesn't hide personality

When you sell your soul to the devil, it doesn't matter how much makeup you put on, no amount can ever cover the demon within. It was pretty apparent during her exchange with Trump at the debate, but now her true colors are on full display.

Academic or career "prestige" doesn't matter to deplorables

Elites like to think they're better than every one else, but deplorable American citizens, the majority of whom voted for Trump, place less important on nepotistic connections. Kelly's education or net worth didn't automatically make her show a hit.

Endless career pursuit don't make you happy

She would have been a lot happier had she stayed home with her family. If there's any ounce of respect and dignity left in her, she'll do just exactly that – retire and go home.

It's a safe bet to say that Megyn Kelly is finished. Ever since she attacked Trump at the debates, she's been unable to bounce back no matter how many millions mainstream media spends on her.

We only have to wait a month or two more until she pulls a Kathy Griffin and blame the old white man as the source of all her troubles.

Read More: Samantha Bee And Other Globocuck Comedians Are Leading The Rise In Fake Comedy

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

What It’s Like To Use Online Dating In Russia

July 2, 2017 | by Grigory Orlov | Link | Original Link

There is an ongoing debate concerning the utility and effectiveness of online dating. Quite often the opinions tend to generalize the advantages and shortcomings of this type of tool, forgetting the specifics of local context. A good example of that is Russia (or Russian speaking countries), which is on a league of its own concerning online dating.

Over there its use is widespread and considered a normal practice for meeting people as any other. While in most Western nations many of the dating sites are used by girls with the single purpose of getting validation and a legion of beta followers, in Russia they deliver the real deal: if you follow some simple rules, your chances of meeting a beautiful sexy girl are pretty high.

There are indeed some pre-conditions to be successful in the use of these sites, especially if you are a foreigner. Most of the websites (like Mamba.ru, for example) will have an English version, so to navigate them wont be a problem. Still, one of the most important factors to grant an unprecedented rate of success for a non-native is to have a good command of the Russian language.

Don’t get me wrong: by using English you will still be able to talk and engage with a significant number of Russian ladies. You will also be able to score with a considerable number of them. However, the scope of girls that you will be able to reach out to will be significantly reduced and, believe me, there are girls on those websites that you would hate to miss out. So try to grasp at least the basics of Russian language before trying this approach. That investment will pay you back big time.

Russian girls from Penza looking for an online date

The other important factor, when you sign up for one of those Russian dating sites, is to have presentable photos (either displaying some wealth or taken in exotic locations). Don’t be too shy to display your material assets.

Girls find well-to-do men very attractive, even if physically you will be out of shape. Lastly, try to disguise, as much as possible, the fact that you are just a passing by tourist (if that will be the case). With the easiness of renting a flat nowadays, you can effortlessly make up a story that you are an expat or a frequent business traveler to Russia. It’s important for the girls to feel that there is a slight chance of continuity or of a relationship, in order for you to be able to seal the deal faster. They are tired and wary of sex tourists.

What to expect

The quality of the girls in Russian dating websites is way above average. If you exclude the unavoidable attention whores (they are everywhere nowadays), your difficulty will be to chose where to start. The possibility that you will get a phone number and even a webcam chat just after a few minutes of conversation is really high.

From then onward, you can pretty much decide on how fast you want things to happen. A good example of that came out recently when some Russian youtubers decided to play a bit with online dating and literally push the boundaries of what kind of results you can achieve.

Another day in the life of a young couple in Russia

These quite popular Youtubers are a couple that lives in Penza, a city 600 Kms southeast of Moscow. They became well known in Russia with a series of weekly comical sketches that are called “The Beauty and the Beast”.

Basically they portray the life of a young Russian couple, with a comical twist and a blunt depiction of how relationships work in that country. Needless to say that most of the episodes would be considered by Western feminists “appalling and outrageous to the female condition”, which makes it for another good reason to actually follow them. The other detail is that the girl in the videos is, actually, quite sexy.

Caption from one of their episodes

A few weeks ago they posted something different in their YouTube channel. With a mix of humor and a touch of social experiment, they decided to test the boundaries of online dating, while filming the whole thing.

The plot was quite simple: a user profile in a dating website was created, using one of the guys that plays a minor role in their sketches. Since he didn't look exactly like a movie star, they dressed him up and made a couple of photos of him, next to a friends car. The car, although of a recent model, was not from any of the top brands that Russians appreciate (usually, of German manufacturers).

In a matter of minutes the profile was live and they started to chat with girls. Initial success was quite easy and, as they show on the video, one of the girls even sent them a photo in her panties, after just a few messages. Interestingly enough, one of the first questions she made was: "Is the car yours?"

The whole thing was funny but, by itself, not worthy of an YouTube video. They decided to push it forward and test the willingness of the girls to meet their guy. The challenge proposed was one that no male would try in a Western society: the girls were asked to meet the man, in the doorstep of his building, bringing four cans of beer with them. At first, they were not sure if any girl would be willing to do such a crazy thing for a guy they had never met.

That mood quickly changed when three girls accepted the "invitation". Soon enough dates were scheduled (for that same day) and the Youtubers set their cameras in the flat balcony, wondering if they would really show up.

Flowers in exchange for beer. Fair deal.

The first one didn't take long to appear, with a plastic bag full of beer cans. As they watched her from the distance, they could see a perfectly normal good looking girl approaching the building. When she arrived downstairs, all the crew came out, with the guy in the profile holding a flower bouquet.

She was surprised and extremely embarrassed, asking not to be filmed. They ignored her request and posted the video anyway. The second girl had a similar reaction but she seemed to be alright with the prank. She took the flower bouquet and they kept the beers. Fair trade.

The third girl acted differently: as soon as she saw the camera crew coming out of the building door, she immediately dropped the bag with the beers and ran away as fast as she could. Although her face was hardly visible, she was good looking and attractive. In fact, all of them were.

In the end, one question is unavoidable: would it be possible to achieve a similar result in a Western society, just in a matter of a few hours? The answer is clearly no. Western girls' mindset is one that leaves all the effort to the man, with a an unpredictable (if any) payoff.

Russian girls also have their requirements (lets not be naive, shall we?), but they are willing to put the effort, even if that means to bring beer to the guy's doorstep. And,that's what "gender equality" should be all about.

Read More: 3 Ways To Be More Successful At Online Dating

Grigory Orlov

I'm an experienced traveler, an avid reader of books and a passionate believer in traditional family values and professional integrity. I'm also a highly politically incorrect author of a book that speaks about the decadence of the corporate world. My page is an atrium of free thought.

10 Racist, Sexist, Xenophobic, And Homophobic Countries Ignored By The Left

July 2, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

All sorts of sub-groups of the regressive left, whether they are ‘anti-racists’, feminists, ‘Black Lives Matter’ advocates, or just lazy armchair activist social justice warriors, repeatedly pick on the same handful of countries whenever it comes time to criticize whatever they perceive to be an “injustice”.

The United States (racists!), Russia (homophobes!), Germany (Nazis!), the United Kingdom (colonizers!), France (you too!), and Australia (also racists!) always seem to bear the brunt of these criticisms, while by extension just about every western country can be held accountable for a firm scolding from the righteous finger of SJW indignation.

However, this article will expose their selective bias and explore ten different countries which are mostly ignored by all the aforementioned leftist subgroups, and furthermore give a rather simple explanation of why.

1. Jamaica (Homophobia)

I love you guys! (No homo)!

Several human rights organizations have declared Jamaica to be quite possibly "the most homophobic country in the world", with high levels of physical violence directed at LGBT people. The U.S. Department of State also shares a very similar sentiment on the matter.

Even in fairly recent years, public opinion is highly against granting homosexuals equal rights and privileges in the country.

> In 2008, a poll of 1,008 Jamaicans was conducted that read, "Whether or not you agree with their lifestyle, do you think homosexuals are entitled to the same basic rights and privileges as other people in Jamaica?" 26 percent said "yes", 70 percent said "no", and 4 percent did not know.

While 2015 did see the very first LGBT Pride celebrations on the island nation, there was not any parade. It would have been deemed very risky for the marchers to take part without risking violence or severe verbal harassment.

Now imagine if this was the current scenario for homosexuals in any western country at this point. Furthermore, look how close Jamaica is to the 'social justice' obsessed United States of America on the world map. Why does this country largely get a free pass on criticism despite this reputation for rampant bigotry?

2. Liberia (Racism)

Liberia. Not only super racist, but clearly a “cultural appropriator” of another famous countries flag…

Liberia was founded in 1822 as a repatriation nation for freed black slaves from the United States, who wished to return to their (roughly) ancestral homeland in west Africa. The irony of the countries name, meaning “land of the free”, is that only people of black African origins have the liberty to obtain citizenship in the nation.

> Article V, Section 13 of the 1847 Constitution which states: “The great object of forming these Colonies, being to provide a home for the dispersed and oppressed children of Africa, and to regenerate and enlighten this benighted continent, none but persons of colour shall be eligible to citizenship in this Republic.” The phrasing “persons of colour” was changed to “Negroes or persons of Negro descent” in a 1955 revision.

My goodness, even Israel allows dark-skinned Ethiopian Jews to immigrate to their country despite their vastly different appearance and cultures from their Sephardic and Ashkenazi counterparts, so why the free pass from global criticism? Now just imagine the thermonuclear reaction from social justice warriors if the United Kingdom, Germany, or Sweden implemented “White Europeans or persons of White European descent” nationality laws next week…

Three… two… one… initiate global Tsar Racista!

3. Japan (Xenophobia)

Leftist/Diversity/Tolerance crowd loving on the flag of Japan! (Fun Fact: With this same national flag in effect since 1870, Japan committed almost the exact same fascist atrocities as Nazi Germany in WWII and more than 10 million Chinese were made to endure forced labor by Japan for 8 years between 1937-1945. An astounding figure, and twice as long as forced labor existed in the Confederate States of America.)

Interesting how Anime loving SJW's can love on Japan so much and hold it's national flag to a completely different set of standards, as compared to how they would otherwise treat the Nazi flag or the Confederate (battle) flag which they hate so much.

Anyways, the world's 2nd most populous 1st world nation almost completely shuts it's borders to refugees, and grants an incredibly small amount of permanent residencies and passports to people of non-Japanese ethnic backgrounds every year. Additionally, there are countless stores, shops, saunas, spas, and bathhouses which prohibit non-Japanese people from entering their premises all across the country. Japan is truly a 1st world nation like no other. So how do they get away with it?

You mean the land of my ancestors is actually way more xenophobic than the American whites I am always trying to guilt-trip? OH MY!

4. China (Racism & Xenophobia)

Just trying to imagine this in any western country…

It is next to impossible for a foreigner to get citizenship, let alone permanent residency status, in Mainland China unless they are of Chinese descent. The best you could ever hope to be is a guest worker on a one or two year visa, which could be revoked at any time. That's pretty racist considering it's (insert current year) right now, wouldn't you say?

Unfortunately that doesn't stop Chinese-Australian and Chinese-American SJW's from wanting to browbeat and guilt-trip the majority white population of their respective countries, particularly by constantly rehashing Chinese exclusion laws which were put in place in the late 19th century but have otherwise long since been repealed.

They completely and utterly fail to grasp their own hypocrisy, taking into consideration how their ancestral homeland would treat would-be Caucasian immigrants here in the 21st century. Access denied round-eye!

5. Bhutan (Xenophobia)

You pay now! Now!

Foreign visitation to the Kingdom of Bhutan (population 775,000) is extremely regulated under the seemingly Orwellian decree of "High Value, Low Impact" tourism, which is intended to minimize it's impact on the country's unique society and environment.

One of those regulations is an exorbitant fee just to be in the country, at anywhere between $200-250 U.S. dollars per day depending on the season. While it's admirable of the country (any country in Asia, really) to want to keep out loud, drunk, profane, and degenerate Australian lager louts with such rules, the measure is quite extreme and just a tad hypocritical.

Just imagine the uproar if small western countries like Iceland (population 330,000) suddenly implemented such rules in order to minimize foreigners "impact on the country's unique society and environment."

6. Laos (Sexism & Xenophobia)

“Keep Your Hands Off Our Women” – Laos Government

The relatively quiet and uneventful country of Laos stipulates that foreigners may not have any sexual relations with Laotian women unless they are married. Accordingly, this also means that Laotian women may not have sexual relations with any foreign men (at least on paper).

Not only is this law very petty and somewhat reeking of jealousy, it’s also incredibly sexist and authoritarian by nature, as it forbids local women from having full control of their own bodies and how they choose to use them, right down to something as personal as intimate contact. I mean come on Laos, you’re not even a Muslim country and it’s (insert current year)!

Ever heard about any western feminists fighting for the rights of Laotian women to be foreign notch-collecting sluts if they want to? Yeah, I didn’t either.

7. Malaysia (Racism)

"Bumiputera Contractors Only" means only ethnic Malays can take this job. Clear racial discrimination against Chinese or Indian Malaysians.

On the surface, peninsular Malaysia is racially a lot like the United States in many respects. There is a majority race (though like white Americans a minor majority race) occupied by the 'Bumiputera' or the ethnic Malays, and the two smaller but still highly visible Chinese-Malaysian and Indian-Malaysian communities. Both roughly corresponding to U.S.A. blacks and Hispanics, except generally of higher socio-economic status compared to the ethnic Malays.

The key difference between the United States and Malaysia is how the dominate race treats it's minority brethren. The Muslim ethnic Malays give themselves the highest degrees of civil liberties and privileges, while there is repeatedly light-to-medium discrimination faced by the Chinese and Indian communities in regards to work opportunities and housing benefits etc.

Meanwhile, mostly Christian white America repeatedly does everything it can to prop up it's statistically lower performing minority populations with affirmative action, relaxed college entry standards, and round-the-clock sympathy from the liberal news media.

'Ethnic and religious enrichment' would best describe Malaysia's scenario regarding the Bumiputera, while 'pathological altruism' from American whites would be nothing short of an understatement.

8. India (Racism)

Give us that “H1-B” work visa or whatever you racist Americans/Aussies/Kiwis/Canadians/Brits!

The title of “most racist country in the world” can be rather subjective, but nonetheless India has never particularly had a reputation for wide-ranging tolerance and a sense of brotherhood. Research and surveys have shown that over 40% of Indians would be reluctant to have neighbors who are of a different race, while it was less than 4% in the United States by comparison.

Within the country itself, India’s caste system is also very racist in nature. Dark-skinned ‘Untouchables’ are generally relegated to be the dregs of society (ie. shit shovelers), while fairer skinned north Indians and Brahmins are top of the social totem pole.

9. Mauritania (Slavery!)

Come on “Black Lives Matter”! Why aren’t you getting them freed?

> Mauritania’s endless sea of sand dunes hides an open secret: An estimated 10% to 20% of the population lives in slavery. But as one woman’s journey shows, the first step toward freedom is realizing you’re enslaved.

Western countries, and only western countries, are repeatedly reminded and guilt-tripped of any past experiences they had with slavery, despite the institution coming to a full close in 1888 with Brazil freeing it’s last remaining slaves that year. By comparison, China would not follow suit until 1910 and many Arab nations maintained slavery until the mid 20th century.

Unfortunately, the north-west African country of Mauritania, which is inhabited primarily by black Muslims, is the last major holdout of the barbaric practice which still exists in the world today. Yet western SJW’s, feminists, and ‘Black Lives Matter’ activists simply do not care about their plight. Does being both black AND Muslim grant a ‘social justice’ get-out-of-jail-free card or something?

10. Saudi Arabia (Racism, Sexism, Homophobia, Terrorism)

Paul Joseph Watson accurately describes Saudi Arabia as one of the most, if not the most, bigoted countries on Earth. A nation run by hardcore Muslims (that religion which western liberals seem to absolutely adore), there are innumerable features of the societal landscape which would have SJW’s triggered beyond belief if they were taking place in any western country.

Women cannot drive and must wear ninja garb in public? Sexism! Homosexuals will be hung from cranes if they are caught? Homophobia! Saudi’s are paid a lot more than foreign workers who are kept in near-slavery conditions? Racism!

What a festering turd of a country. Why does the left keep putting up with their crap when they would rather just attack Return of Kings in their spare time? We envision a world that women and homosexuals would be absolutely thrilled to live in compared to Saudi Arabia.

It’s Because These Countries Are Not White

Countries predominately run by men of white European descent are the freest and most tolerant on Earth. They grant LGBT, women, non-whites, and non-Christians the highest levels of civil liberties, protection from abuse, equality before the law, and economic opportunity. Yet they are repeatedly browbeaten and demonized by the Marxist left and anyone who they infect with ‘social justice’ and victimology.

The image speaks for itself. The regressive left is constantly on the hunt to demonize, and only demonize, white-majority western countries and white South Africans for the sins of the past which are still widely practiced in many non-white countries around the world today.

They claim to preach “equality” all the time, which should also include equal opportunity in regards to dishing out criticism, but picking on Russia and the United States (the only two countries on Earth with white populations in excess of 100,000,000) constantly seem to be their prize targets.

Instead of coming to terms with their hypocrisy and cultural Marxist subterfuge, they would rather just continually point out how awful Russia is for not taking in migrants or treating homosexuals like nothing short of Gods. Furthermore, they would rather show white Americans yet one more picture (in a rare incident) of a black man being lynched, in an era so long ago that cameras were only capable of taking their photographs in low-resolution monochrome.

Read Next: Only White Countries Are Expected To Let In Hordes Of Illegal Migrants

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

How Achieving A “Pop Star Look” Can Drastically Improve Your Success With Women

July 3, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Over the years, ROK has presented manifold relevant articles on style and fashion, both linked to game and general respectability. Here I will add my own perspective and flavor to this dimension of self-improvement.

The argument builds on earlier articles on game, travel, and lifestyle optimization. Although one can regard this as a general self-improvement strategy, regardless of age and starting point, I think that this type of advice are for those who aim for to be in the top 20% of males and want to compete for the top 20% of women in the sexual marketplace, whether locally or globally.

Experience and underlying logic

Recently I went to Dubai with my girlfriend, dressed in white pants, white shoes and white jacket, but with black belt and black shirt in order to create a necessary contrast. Added to the mix I had my regular light-brown hair blended with dyed blonde and my body fat is currently about 13-14%. The response from virtually everyone was overwhelming, although I would add that part of the reason is because of my hot girlfriend. We looked like a really good couple.

For instance a Swedish girl who scanned our bags touched me in an semi-intimate way (sexual harassment someone!), I got looks from all sorts of males (like I was a respectable person, not in a homosexual way), and young Korean girls said 잘 생겼어요 at the airport (meaning handsome for a male).

Conversely, I got zero response when I wore dark green shorts and a regular blue t-shirt on the way back, and I only had to go to the toilet and be forced to take another line before guys at Schiphol (Amsterdam) started to approach and give compliments to my girl (who dressed casually).

It is not first time either that those extra efforts make the difference, and as long as a country or city is more or less Westernized – which includes for example the United States, South America, Europe, East Asia and Dubai – that kind of look works. It has a general, almost universal appeal.

The underlying reason is likely linked to biology, cultural programming, and more specifically cognitive sciences such as the prototype theory (often used in cognitive linguistics). Everyone has a concept of what a really attractive and successful person looks like. The more a person looks like the prototype of a generic celebrity, the better the response will be. Conversely, the more someone reminds other people of Average Joe the worse the response (although it would, of course, be even worse to look ugly).

Needless to say, a person's preferences and specific cultural programming differs, but it is generally the same kind of pop stars, actors, models and sportsmen that show up in the media. Thus if someone says that you look like for instance Ryan Gosling, Christiano Ronaldo or Jusin Bieber, it is a good thing. The immediate positive association is linked to features such as low body fat, conspicuous and cool yet classy clothes, and matching hairstyle and hair color.

Below I have presented three concrete ways to maximize a male person's style potential on the dating market and to be the best version of yourself in that regard. I have also added concrete examples on how to look so that the idea becomes clearer.

1. Shred down to about 10% of body fat

Notice that I wrote that I had 13-14% body fat above, which is good, but not exactly a maximal and optimal level where that chiseled, grim and masculine face emerges. One has to go slightly lower in order to get there. However, 13-14% is obviously better than the male average.

The question is if even lower than 10% is even better. Although it can depend from one individual to another – for instance with regard to where your remaining body fat is mostly concentrated, such as the face, ass or belly – there is much evidence to suggest that this is an optimal level for several common sense reasons.

Firstly, bear in mind the laws of diminishing returns and return on investment (ROI). It is hard enough to get down to 10% and to go even further will drain your energy levels, which will negatively effect your testosterone levels, strength and to some extent social savviness. Fitness then becomes a lifestyle that is simply too prioritized, at the expense of other facets of life. The opposite sex will generally not think that you look better with 8% body fat than 10% and might even start to think that it looks unhealthy.

Additionally, if you are not using anabolic steroids you can lose significant muscle volume, and the loss of too much fluid, which is part of a more extensive diet process, can even make you about half of an inch shorter. With that said 10% is better than 12% because it is likely that you will look better with the first- than the last-mentioned body fat level. Once again the fitness model Marc Fitt is an excellent example of how a 10% natural bodybuilder, that would look good in a suit, realistically can look like.

And forget about being “too big” these days. Virtually everyone is used to see global fitness stars such as Jeff Seid, Simeon Panda, and Jeremy Buendia online. Even in places like Japan and South Korea, where the thin and androgyne look has dominated, fitness is growing at a rapid speed due to Asians' constant willingness to copy the West, although with some delay. Plus there is nearly impossible to become too big if you are a natural bodybuilder and reach the 10% mark.

Even if you do not dedicate yourself to the gym it is wise to build some muscles and/or to cut as much body fat as possible. You do not even have to use specific measurement tools. Just look at the picture below and make sure to get there by the means of combined resistance training and a high-protein diet.

2. Dye your hair blonde

Over the last four decades or so, a significant number of male celebrities have dyed their hair blonde. In current times one can think of Eminem, Justin Bieber, PewDiePie, and various K-pop stars. It generally looks better on whites and Asians, since white people already might have dark blonde or light-brown hair naturally, while Asians for some reason can look really cool as well, even though they have black hair biologically.

A blonde hair can add that extra dimension of conspicuousness and celebrity look that one needs in order to stand out from the rest of the crowd and contrast almost all colors that you are wearing besides yellow. Personally, I have done it occasionally since the mid-1990s.

Make sure to use the strongest types of blonding cream and use a silver shampoo several weeks afterwards. You do not want the silly yellow and even orange tones but the whiter and silverish look. As long as you follow those two simple advices you can do it on your own.

3. Dress like a pop star

Before I go on, I will make some clarifications and answer a few typical questions that tend to arise. First, there is no reason to not look like you are a bit more than your middle-income job and modest social status. Remember, this is for the top 20%, not the 2%, and the opinions of those much below 20%, who might say that you look gay and cater to women's needs – the lesser betas, omegas and MGTOWs – you do not care about anyway.

How about not being yourself and copying other, more successful people? Only about 50% of your personality is inherited and to reiterate myself, there is no need to put imaginary limits on yourself. You will still not be Christiano Ronaldo even though you may look almost as well. That is not the point either, but to be the best version of yourself. Why would you not want as much positive feedback as possible? Well actually from other males too, in a platonic fashion.

Next, how does a pop star look? Obviously that depends but I do have a high-class yet conspicuous look in mind, which is mostly fitting in clubs and restaurants, and at upscale dinners and parties. One can find concrete examples here and there but I think that the K-pop celebs often dress the best, or at least have that little extra edge, as long as they keep their masculine elements.

Just avoid the borderline homosexual paraphernalia, such as pink, gloves, make-up, and really weird outfits that will only work in a music video or live setting. Likely, you will also add your own masculine aura with some beard, age, broad shoulders and the already mentioned chiseled face, creating a perfect balance that will make multiple pussies wet worldwide. It depends on your taste and you as an individual, but do not be afraid of looking gay or androgyne. It is super-easy to avoid if you just have common sense and a sense of style.

There is obviously an economic dimension in all of this, which is not the case with the above-mentioned things. Two ways to optimize costs and benefits are to focus on the jacket and shoes and buy the rest from cheap clothes stores such as H&M. No one will notice your pants or t-shirt as long as they look okay when the shoes, hair and jacket are the focal points.

Keep looking for cool and somewhat original jackets online or offline and preferably with heavy discounts. You can sometimes get a lot with only 200 dollars per each pair or item. If you have more money to spend, a more expensive brand such as Dior can be worth the cost every now and then, although I myself am hesitant to spend as much as 3000 dollars on a jacket.

In summary

These comparatively small efforts and improvements can make a big difference in a competitive society. Although one can adjust a bit depending on taste and individual differences, I can assure you that these tips can improve your real and perceived value a lot. It will be easier to get 6s and 7s, and those 8s and 9s that you think that you almost do not deserve, are suddenly within your reach.

Read More: A Beginner's Guide To Dressing Well

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

The John Wick Film Series Is A Modern Magnum Opus Of Red Pill Cinema

July 3, 2017 | by Subetei Gur | Link | Original Link

A big hit in theatres recently, John Wick Chapter 2 continues the story of John Wick's artistic world of assassins, underground organizations, and deliciously action packed plot line. While most of you enjoy what looks to become a high grossing film trilogy for little more than its artistic and entertainment excellence, there is a deeper message that beautifully eludes the consciousness of most viewers as well as the leftist Hollywood establishment.

Like The Matrix, this film series seeks to subtly insinuate cultural memes into the population in a way that may organically take years or even decades to fully foment. In the case of The Matrix, society was gifted with the notion of the "blue" and "red" pills and all the corresponding depths of meaning behind these terms. This one film trilogy that started in the late 90's is now seen as the catalyst for society's recent awakening to the Orwellian control system that surrounds us.

However, while the Matrix trilogy is set to a somewhat depressing and insidious atmosphere that painfully awakens us to the decaying society around us, John Wick presents to us a wacky alternative world where almost all controls are let loose and humans are free to live by their own accord. In essence, one could argue that the Matrix trilogy identifies an ugly problem, while the John Wick trilogy presents one possible solution.

An in-depth analysis of the John Wick series can easily span an entire literary thesis numbering in the hundreds of pages, and no respectable ROK writer, myself included, would ever subject our valued readers to such anguish (or hedonism, depending on the reader). So without further adieu, here is a brief and condensed analysis of the ways in which the John Wick film series unabashedly conveys notions of K-selection and masculinity.

The K-selective protagonist

John Wick, played by Keanu Reeves, is not presented to us as some pretty boy 'roided up Jersey Shore caricature that serves the sexual and emotional interests of women on all fours while the wind blows through his golden blonde hair. No, the directors present to us a man of good stature, fit, somewhat to the leaner side, and with a half Asiatic face of limited expressions, sporting full facial hair.

He is devilishly skilled in anything to do with violence and little else, and has a passion for classic muscle cars. John Wick is not a play boy, and the directors made sure to show that neither is he a man that attracts ample sexual attention from females – not because he is unattractive to them, but because every female character he chances upon in the films read loud and clear that he is not interested in catering to their whims or sexual needs, and that pursuing him would be a futile endeavor.

He is a man of "focus, commitment, and sheer will" who puts his goals ahead of everything else. He is not interested in spiking women's emotions in order to con them into bed, and he is most certainly not interested in dancing around like an r-selective monkey to capture anyone's attention.

Even the choice of Keanu Reeves as the actor, a man with a complicated personal life in the real world and a man gifted with an extra dose of genetic K-selection from his Asiatic roots, speaks volumes about the direction of this film series from the get go. The director screams at us quite succinctly: John Wick is not a sexy hero. He is the silver backed gorilla that will fuck you up if you get in his way.

There is no meaningful state

The world of John Wick is set in a parallel universe where it seems the only element missing is an overbearing, bureaucratic state. Assassins roam freely on the streets and perform contracts with impunity. The law is not enforced by any state authority, and codes of behavior are simply a gentlemen's agreement, the violation of which at times result in retribution by the faulted.

In fact, the only police officer we see is Jimmy, the fearful and incompetent non-contributor who quivers at the very sight of Wick. My take is that the directors intended to portray a world that cleverly flips the victimhood mentality and fetid Slave Morality of our modern West on its head, and instead embraces individual choices and consequences, and an overarching Master Morality.

In the first movie it appears that the Russian Tarasov family essentially controls significant shares of the city's economy with no consequences with the authorities, while Winston and The Continental harbor assassins openly. In the second movie we see that the Italian D'Antonio family holds significant power in society and operates, once again, with complete immunity from the law. Even the currency of exchange in both films is focused around the gold coins issued by The Continental, which is difficult to interpret in any way aside from a direct and blatant snub at our real world's fiat currencies.

