On a side note, it is interesting that the story line chose the Russians and the Italians – both white cultures known to be incredibly traditional and patriarchal – as a subtle insult to the weak and impotent image of the modern Anglo Western man. The city of New York is symbolic of the crown jewel of Western civilization, and its "corruption" by these powerful forces of masculinity, small government, and Master Morality is a clever and underhanded snipe at our modern Western Society.

Violence is the way of men

Without elaborating too much, I think this point is self-explanatory for anyone that has seen so much as even the promos for the movies. The film series is clearly of the action genre, and violence is deliciously scattered across the very fabric of its plotlines.

What is interesting to note is that violence is not portrayed horrifically, but rather artistically and, dare I say, beautifully. We almost get the feeling that the directors wish for us to nod our heads in agreement by the end of the movies and say, “yeah, violence seems like a nice and clean way of dealing with your problems”.

The nature of men is violent. Morality is indifferent towards the existence of violence, and moral questions revolve around the correct or incorrect usage of violence, not the existence of violence itself. This point smacks directly in the faces of beta pacifists that derived their morality from quinoa.

Walk, talk, and DRESS like a man

Try to find a meaningful character in the film series that is not dressed impeccably – be it casual or formal – and I'll take my hat off to you. The world of Wick is not subject to the same degeneracy in the realms of fashion and art as is our world. As a result, the presentation of a man organically becomes masculine.

From Wick himself to the various antagonists, a suit jacket and tapered pants are the bare minimum of what is expected. Heck, even the scores of henchmen Wick dispatches are seen wearing full suits with balaclavas. The message is clear: kill in style, and die in style.

Additionally, the film series does not appeal to the egotistical whims of juvenile boys in hoodies that brag about how much they “day game”; it appeals to our deep and often times suppressed feeling of respect and awe towards men that show exemplary qualities, civility, and material success. There is a right and wrong in beauty, and John Wick’s opinion will not be swayed no matter how autistically the fashion community screeches.

Women are inferior to men

One of the most notable features of the film series is the position of women in the hierarchy of both power and competence. Yes, there are female assassins, but this is merely a tasteful nod to the notion of equal opportunity, not equal outcome.

In the first film, the assassin Perkins makes a failed attempt to kill John even with the unfair advantage of breeching the rules of The Continental. Not only is she allowed to seem blatantly incompetent as an assassin, but also the almighty pussy pass does not water down the consequence of her transgression as it would in the real world. The satisfying scene of Winston revoking her membership by literally gunning her to death should send shivers down the spines of all mangina judges in the legal system that too often sympathize with women.

In the second film, Ruby Rose's character Ares is presented to us as a formidable foe that commands the entirety of D'Antonio's small army. However, far from a Wonder Woman feminist wet dream, Ares is portrayed as an incomplete woman as she is mute and somewhat androgynous.

She painstakingly makes up for her lack of feminine sexual market value by overcompensating with superb combat skills and undying loyalty towards her superior, Santino D'Antonio. In the knife fight with John, she puts up a very short and fruitless contest, and is quickly killed by the protagonist.

I cannot help but feel that this scene was produced as a direct contrast to the lengthy and difficult fight John experienced with the male assassin Cassian. Aside from the female assassins, all other female roles are relegated to clerical (accounts payable) or sexual entertainment (Circle Nightclub), signifying their insignificance in the affairs of men.

K-Selective music themes

Without embarking on a critical analysis of the musical content of this film series by getting unnecessarily technical with things like the pan-diatonic elements of the general melody, or how such and such crescendo underscores such and such themes, let us quickly explore its two most notable lyrical pieces, namely “Killing Strangers” by Marilyn Manson and “Plastic Heart” by Ciscandra Nostalghia.

Aside from being great songs to play at a medium-loud volume while your driving your S550 Mustang GT, these songs hold some pretty subversive K-selective messages.

Killing Strangers:

> This world doesn’t need no opera, we need it for the operation
>
> We don’t need a bigga knife (a bigga knife)
>
> ‘Cause we got guns, we got guns, we got guns (we got guns)
>
> We got guns, you betta run (ya betta run, ya betta run, ya betta run)
>
> We’re killin’ strangers, we’re killin’ strangers
>
> We’re killin’ strangers, so we don’t kill the ones that we love…

The notable theme here is the glorification of guns. But a deeper meaning that betrays the heavily K-selective theme of this song is found in the lyrics “we’re killing strangers… so we don’t kill the ones that we love”. Take it how you may, but I see reference to in group preference and the protecting of those around you, even at the cost of eliminating some strangers.

Plastic Heart:

> You are the shark
>
> You hunt me like
>
> Your last goodbye

> Oh fallen angel
> Of the night
> Just take my heart
> Just rip it out
> This holy skin
> It's falling out
> I lay my body
> On the bed
> One day, someday
> You know I will see you again"
> I put my hand against your plastic heart
> No, suicide is not the plan, stand up
> Even the stars are trapped inside, oh my
> There's nothing left to hide
> There's nothing left to die
> There's nothing left to die…

Now while I may not be a literature major from the University of Oxford, it doesn't take much literary sensitivity to see that the feminine voice of the song unashamedly submits to the abstract male presence she sings about.

Lines such as "just take my heart, just rip it out" cannot be mistaken for anything other than total submission to a stronger and, dare I say, somewhat mysterious and damaged male persona. This is the ultimate siren call to the alpha male by the music id of the female as she simultaneously exults her loyalty and feminine support in "One day, someday, you know I will see you again".

Why you should watch John Wick movies

A culture is defined not only by its customs and laws, but also by its art and how its art appeals to its people. Civilization was never defined by an Orwellian, legalistic society, but rather the general zeitgeist of its people when it comes to the abstract appreciation of the world.

The John Wick film series is a powerful piece of art in the cultural war. It exists among notable beacons of true artistic excellence in a society where vomit on a canvas is considered high painting, and 90lb women beating up Russian wrestlers is considered empowering. Everyone who has swallowed the red pill should watch the two movies.

Read Next: Carnival Of Gangs Is An Unapologetically Masculine Multimedia Series

Subetei Gur

Gur is a disillusioned descendant of Genghis Khan with too much testosterone for society's good. Women hate him. Women love him. Men admire him. The establishment wants him dead. However, he is not dead, for his alleles do not shorten upon each successive cell division, rendering his acquisition of slippery vaginal abysses ad infinitum.

French President Macron Is Surprising The World With Actual Leadership Ability

July 3, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The conventional “wisdom” about France’s new president Emmanuel Macron is that he is just another boring EU bureaucrat, notable only for the tabloid discussions surrounding his spouse. Some political observers have predicted that he will prove to be just another mediocrity in France’s postwar line of mediocre leaders. I argue that this judgment is premature, and that, far from being a passive observer to political events, Macron is showing signs of becoming a very assertive leader. He may very well surprise the world.

We should note first of all that Macron is the youngest president ever to hold the office. As a student of philosophy, he is a product of France’s most prestigious schools and institutions. Contacts in the financial world (one of whom I have spoken with personally) describe Macron as a very subtle thinker, a man who is being underestimated by nearly everyone.

Quietly and behind the scenes, he has been aggregating power in his own hands in a very methodical way. He has been helped along in this quest by two factors: the French people’s fear of terrorism, and public dissatisfaction with the weak leadership of his many predecessors.

Some French news periodicals have begun calling him “Jupiter,” as a humorous reference to his perceived drive to make himself the ultimate authority. As a student, he wrote his thesis on Machiavelli, and is known to be an admirer of Napoleon and De Gaulle. He has shown a willingness to act on his own and bypass parliament: he is undertaking a reform of France’s labor code by presidential decree, and is also significantly changing the terrorism laws in France to give law enforcement the tools it needs to combat the threat.

On Monday, July 3, he plans to address both houses of parliament in Versailles, something that would have been unthinkable under past presidents. Leftist parties have scorned the idea, calling it “pharaonic.” It is the kind of thing that De Gaulle or Louis Napoleon might have done, but has not been experimented with in the modern era. Perhaps that is precisely what the situation calls for.

But it is the right move. By addressing the entire parliament directly (925 members in total) he is sending a clear message that he is in charge and knows where he is taking the country. This is just the kind of thing a leader should do in a time of crisis. Displaying an awareness of the need for alliances, he has invited US president Trump to France for Bastille Day, at a time when Trump is widely reviled in Europe. In all of these moves, Macron seems to be practicing a fundamental principle of politics: taking the initiative allows you, the leader, to set the terms of the debate and shape the political landscape.

Macron’s new initiatives are enabling him to keep in check France’s powerful labor unions, and to set the agenda for domestic security policy. One of the big changes in the security arena is his change from allowing the judiciary branch to define the scope of searches and seizures, to allowing his own Interior Ministry (headed by the hard-liner Gerard Collomb) to perform this task.

The interior ministry will now be able to make arrests, shut down mosques that spew jihadist propaganda, and expedite the deportation process. While it remains to be seen whether any of these measures will make a difference in the security environment, what matters is that the president is concentrating power more and more in his own hands.

In the international relations field, Macron has shown a willingness to play both America and Russia against each other: he has courted them both but has been vague on providing concrete assurances about what he is willing to deliver. He has sacked four cabinet ministers—thus far—who have not performed to the level of his expectations. The word is going out, for those willing to listen, that a new reformer is in town who is willing to do what is needed to get the job done. He has been rather unapologetic–even arrogant–in putting the media firmly in its place.

Perhaps the country's crisis mode has given a man like Macron the ability to try to undertake transformative change. People in France are frustrated by decades of stagnation, anemic leadership, and apparently endless terrorist attacks that politicians seem unable or unwilling to solve. Macron enjoys a decisive majority in parliament and intends to press that advantage; his campaign book was entitled "Revolution" and he clearly intends to make major changes. In a recent interview with Le Figaro, he claimed his election was "a beginning of a French renaissance and I hope a European one as well."

Only time will tell whether Macron will be able to make good on his ambitions and projects. It is too early to tell whether his administration will be just another false start, and more empty rhetoric, for a nation and continent desperately in need of vigorous, aggressive leadership. But the initial signs are encouraging, and they are going largely unnoticed here in the United States.

We should keep a close eye on political developments in France: Macron has proven himself to be a canny political operator and has been dramatically underestimated. The ROK International Affairs Desk will be monitoring events in France closely for updates in the weeks and months ahead.

Read More: What The Victory Of Freemason Puppet Emmanuel Macron Means For Western Patriots

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Carbohydrates Are Not As Bad As You've Been Led To Believe

July 3, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Many fitness enthusiasts, when discussing diet and nutrition, will come to the conclusion that carbs are inherently bad, and should be excised from the diet immediately. Some will even go as far as to accuse the neolithic revolution as the point where human society went irreversibly down hill (but that of course ties into the general "noble savage" ideal you can learn about in my Manthropology videos).

Idiotic leftist anthropology aside, there is some grain of truth to this—certainly, carbohydrate consumption is rampant in the United States, and to a lesser extent the Western world on the whole. A major factor, if not the deciding factor, that causes this is the intertwining of political lobbying and agricultural business, in which corn production—to name one glaring example—is stimulated via political lobbying and reasons to eat vast quantities of corn syrup are made up after the corn is grown.

But the question remains, are carbohydrates inherently as bad for you as some have claimed?

Some Info On Grains

Let's make something quite clear: cereal cultivation has been around for the better part of 12,000 years, and despite what some have claimed, 10 millennia is more than enough time for people to evolve the capacity to obtain nutritional value from them.

And far from being an "empty calorie", grains can certainly be very nutritious, more so whole grains rather than refined grains—the difference being that whole grains retain the endosperm, germ, and bran layers whereas refined grains remove the germ and bran. The endosperm is mostly carbohydrate, the germ contains incomplete proteins and fatty acids, and the bran contains dietary fiber, protein, vitamins, and even more fatty acids.

Cereals, when properly prepared, are more than just a quick carbohydrate fix, and yet that carbohydrate fix alone is reason enough to eat your carbs.

Carbohydrates—more accurately, their substrate glucose—are, of course, the main energy currency of the human body. Glucose is very quickly converted to adenosine triphosphate, or ATP, and that in turn is used for purposes of cellular energy (to put it VERY simply). In addition to that, carbohydrates are stored as muscular glycogen for purposes of medium-duration exercise, which is to say the duration of time that a set of an exercise is done.

While glucose can in fact be synthesized from amino acids, and in fact this is the main working arrangement of ketogenic diets, the relatively small amount of carbohydrate content needed, and the quick dietary absorption time compared to proteins, indicates that carbohydrates should be consumed in balance with protein and fat. But then the question remains: what constitutes "balance", exactly?

A Balanced Diet

To make something else very clear, low carbohydrate diets can get results in weight loss. In fact, studies have shown that they get the fastest results in weight loss—however, those same studies show that on a long enough timeline (the example given was one year), the results for various diet programs, measured in pounds/kilograms lost, will be largely the same: the biggest factor in successful weight loss is a consistent reduction of caloric intake. The macronutrient profile of the diet is not nearly as important.

With that being said, don't think you can run out and live a healthy and fulfilling life by eating a calorically reduced diet of junk food. You still need the macro and micronutrients in their proper amounts for purposes of cellular energy, structural repair and growth, and other functions—and like it or not, the recommended daily allowances are adequate benchmarks, if not perfect.

Note that the food pyramid, which was for many years slanted heavily towards carbohydrates, has now been shifted to show all the nutrients in roughly equal amounts.

Despite the fact that agrobusiness is as strong as its ever been, the federal government has been more proactive in recent years towards alleviating the eternally high obesity rates of the US, if only because morbidly obese citizens are net financial losses.

And while the federal government can certainly be criticized for many things, the new revised food pyramid is actually pretty good. While certain goals (weight loss, bulking, muscle building) may require some variation to a nutrient profile, bear in mind that this should be done with caution, as an excess of various nutrients can be damaging to your health.

If you want general good health, and adequate nutrients to sustain exercise and general well being, you can’t go wrong with eating balanced amounts of all nutrients, carbohydrates included.

Read More: Are Carbohydrates Your Friend Or Foe?

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

10 Words The Left Have Forever Ruined

July 4, 2017 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

As the cultural war rages on, the hypocritical left have managed to remain consistent on one thing: overusing their grab bag of buzzwords to the point these words have no internal meaning.

In actuality, leftist buzzwords are defined by their external effect—the emotional pitch in which they are expressed. In other words, the more passionate and angry one sounds uttering these words, the more correct they are assumed to be. For years, the media and popular culture have given the left carte blanche to employ this tactic.

By doing so, they have gotten intellectually lazy. Today, your typical leftist argument tends to cobble these buzzwords together into a string of sentences that, ultimately, contradict each other. In essence, the left have mainstreamed double-think.

Below are ten words you should more than faintly recognize. Let’s do our best to make these words great again…

10. “Systemic”

"Systemic" is an important word for, as an example, understanding holistic human health and the root causes of illness and disease. It can be a handy word for broadly explaining how organizations operate at their core. Unfortunately, the left—particularly social activists—overuse the word to describe institutions they deem to be racist, homophobic, or sexist.

Broad statements can be useful when prefacing specific evidence, but these activists spout "systemic" as evidence in and of itself. Their trick is to use the word with extreme outrage in order to inflate its credibility as matter of fact. "Systemic" is deployed with a deliberate vagueness so a person cannot exactly prove or disprove it. Your only option is to try and shout louder than your opponent.

As The Daily Wire's Ben Shapiro put it, vaguely saying there is "systemic" racism is like going to the doctor and saying "I hurt".

9. "Trans"

The man on the left, Shaun King, claims to be black

There was a time when “trans” was a reliable prefix for “across or beyond”. It used to spice up the verbs written in an odd email or two. Sentences always read better with a little “transact”, “transpose”, or “transcript”. However, “trans” is commonly used as leftist shorthand for “transgender” and now “transracial” (see above photo). It is now difficult to hear the word without imagining some short-haired academic’s soft, belittling voice lecturing you on the importance of tolerating “non-binary” individuals.

8. “Conversation”

By design, leftists use vague language and buzzwords to mask the shell game at the core of their ideology.

Funny how the left often say “we need to have a conversation about x” when they have proven time and again to be the least willing at conversing with conservatives. When the left say “conversation”, they really mean “we need to have a conversation about a topic you must agree with me on”. This allows them to control the parameters of the discussion and dismiss any deviation or counterargument as a “distraction”.

For instance, after the latest jihadist attack, the left will not engage in any “conversation” about Radical Islam. After an incredibly uncommon mosque attack, however, the left scramble to converse about “Islamophobia” and the radicalization of Western white men. The left have politicized the public forum and removed any intellectual honesty worthy of real “conversation”. It’s hard to have a “conversation” with a group of people who are only about acquiring moral and political power.

7. “Problematic”

To be fair, this word was always kind of irritating. But, yes, some things in life are genuinely problematic (eg. you failed your midterm, you lost your job and your monthly rent is due, you lost your car keys). When it comes to political discussions, though, everything is so “problematic” to a leftist you start to wonder, “why even debate then if every idea you encounter is a problem?”

This is at the heart of why the left have become so averse to free speech: when confronted with a challenging idea, they dismiss it as “problematic” and attempt to shut it down instead of unpacking it deductively. Granted, at least this is a leftist’s nonviolent way of managing ideas that hurt their feelings.

6. “Privilege”

Check your privilege BINGO!

Native English Speaker	Cis	Thin	No speech impediment	Christian
Male	White	Attractive	Heterosexual	Able-bodied
Standard accent	No criminal record	Human (FREE SPACE)	Tall	Mentally Healthy
Support mainstream political party	Adult	Born in country of residence	Wealthy	Intelligent
Employed	First-world	Well-connected family	Not a red-head	Educated

There was a time when privilege was a good thing. The word opened speeches to express how honoured a speaker was to receive an award or call upon a respected guest. It was a humbling label one cherished and received with gratitude.

Now, privilege has been co-opted by the left as a shaming tactic to make you feel bad for having things or looking a way you cannot control. Way I see it: we should feel fortunate to live in a society with a playing field that allows for privilege. In many developing countries, next to no one has special advantages due to a lack of resources and free market. In the West, we should feel privileged to have privileges. It is proof we are the best.

5. "Phobia"

The left always finds ways to trivialize mental illness. In reality, "phobia" is an actual anxiety disorder that induces irrational behaviour. Is it irrational to criticize the ideas of Islam (Islamophobic)? Is it irrational to criticize legislation that criminalizes the "misgendering" of someone (transphobic)? Is it irrational to criticize the influx of unassimilated migrants into Western Europe (xenophobic)?

Even if the left is using "phobia" figuratively and do not believe it literally causes anxiety in people with these opposing views, they still have to prove those arguments are irrational. Rather, leftist leaders use "phobia" to push political agendas and, in exchange, have allowed the Right to dismantle this idiotic term in the culture war. Unfortunately, allowing it to exist in the former is more dangerous than the latter.

4. "Tolerance"

Wedding Photos That Prove Two Grooms Are Better Than One

Double the suits, double the love.

BUZZFEED.COM | BY SARAH KARLAN

Yes, tolerance is—was—a good thing. Sadly, the left—habitually compelled through some postmodern urge to distort value-based words until they have no moral standard—take "tolerance" as far as tolerating intolerance. If you criticize a minority's cruel religious custom, you lack tolerance. If you criticize normalizing mental illness, you lack tolerance. Ironically, in a culturally and morally relative society, this form of politicized "tolerance" has become the new absolute.

3. "Inclusive"

Like Political Tolerance, "inclusive" has been utilized by leftist activists and institutions to legitimize any new self-proclaimed "identity" claiming marginalization and victimhood. However, when it comes to groups that do not share the left's victimology or politics, inclusivity ceases to exist. Take the cop ban at Toronto's Pride Parade or the shutdown of pro-lifers at last January's Women's March. Once again, leftists take well-meaning euphemisms like "inclusivity" and move its goal posts to accommodate and enforce their backwards ideology.

2. “Diversity”

Globo-cuck and king of “tolerance” Justin Trudeau.

Diversity is a strength—when it comes to diversity of thought or diversifying your stock portfolio. The left, however, have hijacked “diversity” when describing their multicultural utopia. “Diversity of ethnicity” is now assumed to be a virtuous end in itself, irrespective of that group member’s own merits.

Embracing this type of diversity is simply reverse discrimination—including someone because they look a certain way or have a certain background that completes your multicultural furniture display. There is genuine “diversity”, but the word has been misappropriated by the left ad nauseam that it has lost its true value.

1. “Hitler” (Literally)

While the “Hitler” comparison to Trump has reduced itself to parody, its overuse reveals a key facet of the left: their rhetoric undermines the evils in the world they claim to crusade against. All this bluster about “Hitler”, “KKK”, “Rape Culture” is spouted so liberally—to forgive the pun—that it trivializes real Hitler (a fascist who annexed part of Europe and commanded the extermination of millions), real KKK (a Democrat-created secret clan that lynched blacks), and real rape culture (which has infested Western Europe via the international migration crisis).

As conservative commentator Gavin McInnes observed, due to the left’s infantile worldview “Hitler now just means a guy”.

And this is only scratching the surface…

What other words have The Left forever ruined?

Read More: 5 Buzzwords Liberals Use To Smear Dissidents

Harry Lime
Writer. Filmmaker. Lover of cuckoo clocks. Email: harrylimerok @gmail.com.

3 Signs A Rape Accusation Is False

July 4, 2017 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Despite what the media would lead you to believe, it's an open secret here in the sphere that all public rape allegations are false. Women who publicly accuse men of rape have been proven to be liars time and again, yet, the public is still advocating ridiculous campaigns like "Listen And Believe" and "It's On Us", and "No More".

Though there seems to be an increasing awareness of false rape accusations, women continue to make them at an increasing rate. As a result, we're beginning to see patterns emerging with every (crocodile) tearful count of these harrowing tales of treachery.

Here are 3 ways to tell if a woman is lying about being raped.

1. They tell more than one person, but not the police

A woman who has been forced to have sex against her will feels violated and ashamed. Many of them keep the ordeal to themselves, some may tell a close friend or confidant and leave it at that, and some may never tell a soul, not even law enforcement.

But a female who has drunken sex with a Tinder match then decides it was "rape" the next morning because he left her apartment before she woke up and hasn't heard from him since who tells everyone but the cops is probably lying.

Girls are a lot of things. Stupid isn't one of them. They're well aware of the fact that if they go to law enforcement, they'll be forced to give details and be subjected to questions to actually prove her claim. If she wasn't really raped, she'll have to fabricate a story which opens up a whole other can of worms.

If she tells her friends but not the cops, she's probably lying

A court of law requires proof. The court of public opinion does not. Women are keenly aware of this so they go to the public knowing full well that men are guilty till proven innocent in the court of public opinion.

Another false rape accusation tell is when asked why she didn't report the alleged rape to the cops the go to statements they all seem to use are "I was embarrassed" or "I didn't want to bring shame to my family." So she can tell everyone she knows about her "horrifying experience" without shame or embarrassment but she can't give that same story to law enforcement?

Now if a woman accuses a man of rape and doesn't go to the cops, that doesn't necessarily mean she wasn't raped. But if she doesn't go to the cops but tells other people, it's probably a false rape accusation.

2. The sex was consensual

I've stated in the past that the term "date rape" is a myth. If a woman is forced to have sex against her will she has been raped. Whether or not she knew her assailant doesn't matter. Neither does the fact that she was out on a date or a meetup. A woman was either raped or she was not.

Women use the term "date rape" to muddy the waters when it comes to the details of her sexual encounter with the accused. If she knows she willingly engaged in sex but turns around and makes a false rape accusation, she'll say she was "date raped" to cover up the fact that the sex that occurred was not forced.

This doesn't look forced to me or anybody else

Having a one-night stand with a guy who never calls or texts again isn't rape. Neither is a FWB who ghosts on her after a few weeks. So if a woman says she was raped, but then admits the sex was consensual, she is making a false rape accusation. Period.

3. Her "offender" is rich

Women are motivated by a lot of things and money is near the top of that list. Good looking women have used their looks to acquire money and resources for generations. From call girls, strippers, and prostitutes who cash out early, to attractive good girls who are smart enough to take a long term strategy and marry high value men at a young age, females know and understand that their aesthetic beauty is and always will be their meal ticket when all else fails.

When a woman falsely accuses a celebrity, professional athlete, or a man with an eight figure net worth, you can bet your ass it's a money grab. Today's attractive females feel entitled to cash and gifts for their vaginas and when they're humped and dumped by a man with wealth, they accuse him of sexual assault to get paid. They couldn't care less if the accused serves jail time or not. They're in it for the money and nothing else.

Two summers ago I wrote about then Chicago Bulls star Derrick Rose's false rape ordeal. Aside from the obvious lack of evidence, what tipped me off to this money grab was the fact that his accuser didn't want him prosecuted criminally. She pursued "justice" in civil court and asked for millions for pain and suffering.

"We ran a train on that ho and now she wants to get paid??"

As I correctly predicted (which isn't difficult to do in these cases these days), Rose easily won his case and didn't pay the woman a dime. Chicago Blackhawks forward Patrick Kane was also fortunate enough to beat a false rape accusation without having to pay off the accuser.

Everyone knows that celebrities, professional athletes, wealthy men, etc. don't need to rape women. They get pussy thrown at them at all times from every direction. There's no need to take something illegally when it's offered up so freely and frequently.

It's for that reason alone that most people, red pill aware or otherwise, know that when a woman makes a rape accusation against a man of financial means and would rather be awarded punitive damages for her "pain and suffering" than seeing her attacker put in prison, it's a false accusation.

Conclusion

The false rape accusation is one of a precious few circumstances where women have a decided advantage over men. Females are acutely aware of this and exploit it whenever they damn well please for whatever reason they deem necessary.

Always keep the above motivations in the front of your mind when commingling with a women on any level. All she has to do to turn your life upside down is make a false rape accusation against you. And she won't lose a wink of sleep over it because she knows that the worst case scenario for her is better than the best case scenario for you.

Want more Donovan Sharpe? Visit his website and checkout his podcast The Sharpe Reality on YouTube, Soundcloud, or iTunes.

Read Next: A False Rape Accusation: My Story

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

The USA Needs A Trade Policy Benefiting Americans And Not Globalist Billionaires

July 4, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

During the late 19th century, the USA became an industrial powerhouse, its manufacturing capacity becoming among the world's foremost. During the late 20th century, industry was disappearing at an alarming rate. Countless mill towns and even some major cities were blighted, a trend naming a broad region: the Rust Belt. Globalism caused this devastation. The British can tell a similar story.

Just as Communists once proclaimed that socialism was inevitable, the free trade fanatics insist that globalism is the only possible way. Overpaid CEOs join the chorus, moaning that American workers are too expensive. Contrary to what the talking heads think, it wasn't always like this. Let's see what we can learn from history and explore a reasonable compromise.

How it rolled in the Renaissance

It’s all about keeping this stuff circulating within your own country.

The trade doctrine of mercantilism included the following features:

- High tariffs
- Forbidding colonies to trade with other nations
- Monopolizing markets with staple ports (the public can buy goods passing through the city)
- Banning the export of gold and silver, even for payments
- Forbidding trade to be carried in foreign ships
- Subsidies on exports
- Promoting manufacturing through research or direct subsidies
- Limiting wages
- Maximizing the use of domestic resources
- Restricting domestic consumption through non-tariff barriers to trade (such as regulations and quotas)

This wasn’t an elaborate doctrine originating from theory. This developed from nations doing what was in their economy’s best interests, and only later did theoreticians document it. Basically, this represents trade protectionism and hard-nosed business practices to keep wealth circulating within their country rather than flowing out of it. Note also that today’s economic policies take the opposite approach—except, of course, for limiting wages.

Eventually, Adam Smith’s ideas friendly to free trade prevailed. Lately, economic whiz kids give mercantilism a pretty bad rap. Nations doing what’s in their economy’s best interests? What? Oh hell no, we can’t have that!

Mercantilism has been criticized for leading to wars. Well, has anything improved lately? Banksters love wars (be they worldwide catastrophes or prolonged spit-in-your-eye wars), and so does the military-industrial complex. Individual businesses often benefit too.

Globalist hubris

“We have got to stop sending jobs overseas. It’s pretty simple: If you’re paying $12, $13,

$14 an hour for factory workers and you can move your factory South of the border, pay a dollar an hour for labor, have no health care, no environmental controls, no pollution controls and no retirement, and you don't care about anything but making money, there will be a giant sucking sound going south." —Ross Perot

Item 5 from above is of particular interest. It would be a hard sell to insist all container ships be American-operated. However, it's rather galling that the government started allowing Mexican trucks to ship cargo inside the USA, to cut American truck drivers out of their piece of the action. To facilitate NAFTA imports, the federal government spent taxpayer money to build Interstate 69 (quite a symbolic number).

More ambitious plans for the "SHAFTA Superhighway" haven't come to pass. This would've included a mega-scale walled-off toll road up to four football fields wide, with tributaries bound toward all corners of the USA, carrying Chinese goods shipped in from a Mexican port (cutting out American dock workers too), with Mexican customs officials in a Kansas City "SmartPort".

Interestingly, the lefty magazine The Nation wrote an article beginning with how all that was a crazy right-wing conspiracy theory. Then the article reversed direction, describing how politicians were working on plans for pretty much all that, until citizens raised holy hell. Really, liberals should be just as concerned—aren't they supposed to be all about protecting the common people from predatory plutocrats? Well, so the theory goes.

Other than that, we haven't traded our dollars out for "ameros" yet. However, ultra-wealthy globalists certainly do have ambitions to erase the USA's borders and create a "North American Union", eventually to include Central and South America. Actually, that's exactly what Leon Trotsky wanted too. Strange, that.

American tariff policies, past and present

It wasn't always this way.

In 2010, tariffs (averaging 1.3%) were 1.2% of US revenue. Back in 1860, tariffs (averaging 15%) funded 94.9% of the federal budget. Fifteen percent? How punishing! Imagine going to a big box store and paying $11.50 instead of $10.13 for $10 of foreign merchandise—zOMG!

About a century ago, the federal government got hooked on income tax, and it's never been the same since. I'm not saying we can return to 1860s standards and maybe even abolish the income tax. That only could happen if the government quit fighting spit-in-your-eye wars, paid down their astronomical debt, weaned the public off the welfare tit, and fixed government waste. How awful—hell no, we can't have that!

Free trade is great for multinational business owners, but not so good for labor. At this, free trade zealots often scoff, "What, you're saying American workers can't compete?" Well, of course we could, if we brought back sweatshops, starvation wages, no pollution controls, 12-hour workdays, goon squads, etc. Sounds awesome! Another problem is that when a huge trade imbalance persists, wealth gets sucked out of one country and poured into another, at least until conditions in both places meet in the middle and the trade imbalance begins to even out because of that "invisible hand" mojo.

The meddlesome globalist CEOs swim in gravy, but how does the public really benefit? Jobs in factories and call centers have been moving overseas steadily for decades. Slightly cheaper merchandise at Wally World isn't much good for those who can't find work.

The economy has been pozzed out to varying degrees since 2001. Wall Street has bounced back (and gained quite a bit more) from after the banksters and Wall Street crashed the economy in 2008. Unfortunately, things haven't fully recovered for the real people, despite improving somewhat lately.

Following the 2008 disaster, multitudes of formerly working people had to get on public assistance, no matter how galling it was. For one example, during 2009, the number of disability applicants rose by about a fourth—coincidence? Desperation was in the air while talking heads spoke of the economic "new normal".

Today, the World Trade Organization is running the international commerce show, surely with many grubby globalist fingers in the pie. Countries with Most Favored Nation status must have the same standards applied, whether they're industrialized countries like ours, or places where laborers toil in horrible sweatshops for a tiny fraction of our minimum wage. Well, to hell with all that!

A trade policy to protect jobs here and promote progress abroad

Penalizing starvation wages and exploitation could help the world's downtrodden.

Here's a better proposal:

- Baseline 2% tariff, including not just manufactured goods but "offshored" services
- 2% more for countries with a minimum wage under 60% of ours, per the official exchange rate
- Additional 2% more for countries with a minimum wage below 30% of ours
- 2% penalty for those without reasonable environmental protection
- 2% penalty for those with regressive labor practices (organized labor forbidden, unsafe factories, etc.)
- 5% penalty for severe exploitation (legally mandated social immobility child labor, exorbitant predatory lending / debt bondage, toleration of slavery, etc.)

So according to this sliding scale, decently-run industrialized countries get the 2% rate, and the worst get the "punishing" 1860 rate of 15%. This would reduce incentives for globalists to move jobs wherever they can pay the fewest peanuts. There would be plenty of free trade between countries with similar wages and labor standards. Goods from elsewhere still would be obtainable, though at up to 13 cents on the dollar more.

Would this hurt Third World countries? Actually, this would provide incentives for their leaders to stop treating their workers like dirt. (Compliance checks would be required; having enlightened laws on the books that never get enforced doesn't count.) A badly-run country could knock one third off of their tariff simply by abolishing unconscionable practices.

An added benefit is that incentivizing livable wages and reducing exploitation might improve conditions in the Third World. Now, destitute masses flee by the millions to First World countries. Some compete for jobs with the citizens, but others live off the welfare tit, cause trouble, and outbreed the locals. Indeed, as devastating as free trade favoring the absolute cheapest labor markets has been, population replacement immigration is globalism's worst crime.

Read More: Global Elites Caught Plotting The Islamic Invasion Of Europe

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Everything You Need To Know About Dubai

July 4, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Generally speaking, whenever ROK and its readers comment on some aspect of the Arab-Muslim world, negative light sheds upon the region and its inhabitants. Although less alien from a Western point of view, the aversion is perhaps also directed towards Dubai, known for its massive wealth, largely created under slave-like conditions by migrant workers with few if any substantial labor rights.

In spite of these negative depictions, Dubai is obviously an interesting place as a booming post-oil era trade hub, and after having spent a vacation there and increasing my knowledge on the wealthy emirate's history and economic development, I intend to describe its history and current profile. Additionally, I will also consider its value from a mere tourist point of view.

The formation of the United Arab Emirates

The modern history of Dubai goes back to 1833 when the Bani Yas tribe resettled from Abu Dhabi to Dubai, a land which previously had been inhabited. This was the second wave of modern migration. Since that year, the Maktoum family, a branch of the Bani Yas tribe, has ruled Dubai. The government structure is patrimonial and autocratic, although with democratic-like features among the rulers.

In colonial times the region has also been under the control of Portuguese, Dutch and British settlers. In fact, it was until 1971 the land was a British protectorate.

In pre-modern times, the land suffered from local and regional slave trade and pirates, much different from its now largely crime-free, authoritarian yet hedonistic aura. In the more distant pre-modern past, this was the starting point for long caravans, and raiding has always been part of that phenomenon.

Since the British local trade interests were threatened, they organized anti-pirate measures, and whether directly or indirectly, the British culture has significantly influenced the economic structures and modalities of this region. The British hegemony was made possible due to the gradual dissolution of the Ottoman empire, which created a regional vacuum for European powers to fill.

Since 1972, the UAE consists of seven emirates of which Dubai is the second largest in demographic terms after the capital Abu Dhabi, which likewise constitutes an emirate. The current population is over 9 million, of which about 2.8 millions live in Dubai. About 90% of the workforce in the private sector is made up of non-citizens.

The citizens of the UAE are granted a cradle-to-grave welfare, including first-world education and medical services. Arab-speaking expats have better chances to partially integrate and be part of the UAE community, but there is a substantial difference between Emiratis and foreigners (especially poor workers from Asia and Africa).

How Dubai became an economic powerhouse

Large amounts of oil were found in neighboring Saudi Arabia and Iran in the early 20th Century. In 1966, Dubai had similar luck and is the main factor behind today's massive wealth. Sheikh Rashid has been a key figure in the creation of high-class infrastructure and economic institutions, such as Dubai Airport, built in 1959 but obviously reconstructed and refined multiple times in parallel with growing wealth.

From the 1970s onward, the UAE has been politically and socially stable, and managed to have constructive relations with its neighbors, as well as significant global players such as the United States, EU and China. This has secured the inflows and outflows of capital and favored the mobility of the foreign workforce.

However, since economic and material development tend to be based on cumulative processes, Dubai has significantly diversified its economy. The difference is that Dubai did not have to go through several stages, but instead managed to leap the stages to today's high-mass consumption. Currently, revenues from oil and gas make up only about 5%, whereas trade, real estate, construction and financial services constitute its largest sectors, alongside mining, shipping, tourism, and mass communication.

An oasis for the global middle and upper classes

Dubai has similarities with wealthy East Asian cities and city-states such as Singapore, Hong Kong and Macau, and culturally with Kuala Lumpur (Malaysia) and Marrakech (Morocco), and makes up sort of an oasis for the global middle and upper classes. In 2016, Dubai had 14.9 million overnight visitors and the economy is characterized by massive inflows and outflows and a steady growth rate at about 8% annually.

Though the future is unforeseeable, one should expect increased yet non-linear growth in at least the coming decades. Dubai is a prime example of an interplay between global human capital and localization of economic activities. That is the type of sane and limited globalization that also us Westerners want. The local interests are the basis, whereas relative "globalization" is only a means that might serve this end.

Although there are Westerners who reside there more permanently, Dubai is a typical location for either short stays or so-called circular migration. One resides there weeks, months, or in some cases even years, but in the end many prefer their home countries. After all, a hyper-materialistic sheikhdom built on expatriate exploitation and at least partially Wahhabi-influenced doctrines, where one is expected to awe Shaikh Khalifa Bin Zayed Nahyan, is not a place to spend one's entire lifetime.

From my own, very recent experiences, Dubai is absolutely stunning from a material point of view. The architecture, hotels, scenery and activities are at least at the same level as those in Las Vegas, and slightly better than Macau and Singapore.

Although it is unrealistic that the rest of the Islamic world will follow this pattern, it is still preferable than militant Jihadism and other forms of Islam. Symbolically, my Arab driver put on the radio which played Ariana Grande's song about being excessively fucked by a badboy, "Side to side", while going on a desert safari tour. The soft power of Western pop culture is obviously more appealing than to recite the Quran.

Like East Asian countries, contemporary Dubai is a hybrid culture. The difference is of course that places like Japan, South Korea and Singapore mix their post-Confucian ethos with Western-global culture, whereas Dubai blend their Arab-Muslim heritage with Western practicalities, knowledge and hedonism. For instance, the sexes are generally self-segregated in the metro (there are segregated train cars in Tokyo too).

At one moment I had to admonish my girlfriend as she wanted to step in one of the mixed-sex areas, where severely sex-hungry men will likely grab females by the pussy or at least ass. The strategy for the rational male, who has to make most if not all of the important decisions in order to accommodate, is to let the girls stay in the females and children-only section, while you stand close to her in the male area. Although I prefer the culture in East Asia I find Dubai slightly appealing.

Apart from the desert tour, I recommend Ferrari world in Abu Dhabi (where one can go with the world’s fastest roller coaster, Formula Rossa, with a maximum speed of 240 kilometers per hour), Buddha Bar in the luxurious Dubai Marina, Burj Khalifa, and a stay at some of the city’s five-star hotels.

Expect to meet only a few locals, multiple Chinese and Korean tourists, a few Europeans and Americans, and a service staff which mainly consists of South Asian, Filipino or African people. If you have any doubts about the Arabs, you do not have to deal with them much anyway, as long as you abide by the law.

The price levels and excessive heat, at least between April and October, are two downsides. There are ways to hack around that but the major tourist attractions, besides the desert safari tours (about 50 US dollars), cost quite a lot.

Conclusion

Dubai is an economic powerhouse that takes some of the positive and negative features of the region and mix them with Western know-how and lavish consumerism. The UAE, Dubai and Abu Dhabi in particular, has managed to develop from a poor to a rich country in only a few decades. As far as tourism goes, I would highly recommend a visit there.

Read More: How Privileged Urban Liberals Profit From Poverty

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Cars 3 Is The Latest Movie To Brainwash Young Boys Into Being Subservient To Females

July 5, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

While I might be a little old to be seeing movies like Cars 3, there is something nostalgic about them. So while I've outgrown them as far as age, I've still made an effort to see the latest ones, because—well, race cars.

But after seeing the latest Cars movie and the overwhelming sense of "you go gurllll" propaganda shoved down your throat in the last 15 minutes of the movie, I'm sincerely hoping that Cars 3 ends the trilogy for good and doesn't spin the newest "star" into a new series.

What was once a great movie for young boys to enjoy that focused just on sport, competition, and friendship is now filled with an attempt to brainwash young men into thinking that women are superior—even if they don't deserve it.

The Former Cars Movies

Before I start discussing Cars 3, let's have a quick recap of the first two movies that preceded it—both of which were rated very positively overall, and did have pretty solid life lessons in it for young men.

The first Cars movie was about a young, hotshot racer whose enormous racing skills nearly matched his enormous ego. The entire movie was based on the typical professional sports story—young upstart begins to beat everybody, the older veterans can't take it, but eventually the youngster is served a piece of humble pie before bouncing back with a lesser ego.

Cars 2 was based on loyalty, friendship and ended with some James Bond-esque spy scenes as the characters ran through London to defuse a bomb about to blow up the palace.

You can look at either of those first two movies and say that it's a story that young boys can enjoy, and that the messages told by either are relatively positive towards cultivating some sense of masculinity, brotherhood, or simple sense of good. Plus, race cars.

Cars 3 Starts Well, But…

It goes south in the last minutes of the film, which is a shame. Boys are basically told—you're not good enough, and you have to move over for a girl, now. The main character, Lightning McQueen, is now at the end of his racing career.

Much like how he was the up-and-coming hotshot in the original movie, Lightning is now being de-staged by some new future generation cars. He's getting his ass whooped, and goes down the rabbit hole to try to figure out how to be faster. His team is bought out, he gets some fancy new simulators, as well as a new personal trainer—Cruz Ramirez, voiced by Cristela Alonzo.

Needless to say, Alonzo won't be playing a personal trainer in any role but a voice-over anytime soon:

A Poor Message

McQueen's comeback story is reminiscent of the typical professional sports athlete who sticks around a bit too much and tries to regain his former glory. Think Michael Jordan on the Wizards, Lance Armstrong ruining his career by coming back, or Michael Schumacher's fruitless return to Formula 1.

McQueen's comeback story is obviously possible with the Hollywood scripting. With the help of Cruz's "training", some old-school dirt track demolition derby, and guts and determination—McQueen gets to the point where he's at his final race. He starts last and works his way through the field. Again, it's a good lesson in there for young men (even if it's not applicable to aging athletes)—work hard, persevere, and eventually it pays off.

Then it all falls apart. When he comes in for his first pit stop, he has a moment. It's during this moment that he decides that he will have Cruz come into the race replacing him, and he will retire and become a crew chief. Effectively immediately.

Yes, the female car who has never raced in her life (who told him previously that was her dream). The female car who looks strikingly like McQueen, yet the whole story has been based on how McQueen's old and outdated technology (aerodynamics, i.e. looks) can't keep up with the cars of the future.

It's this sudden change that sends the message to young girls of, "You're beautiful no matter what."

And it says to the young boys, "This is the way that life is. No matter what, you are going to be upstaged by girls because you are inferior." Unlike the first Cars movie, there was no mentorship (that's how McQueen was first humbled). There was no sign of guts and hard work on her part—she just ran around the whole moving, following him. The girl car just came in the race, took over, and that was that. The irony is made even greater by the fact that it's the land whale Cruz who is playing the personal trainer.

Not only is the veteran male racer upstaged by someone with no merits—it's someone who embodies the same physical qualities that was making Lightning McQueen fall short of his racing goals. It sends a poor message regarding body image to both boys and girls.

Cars 3 says that ultimately your physical looks don't matter—you'll still win at life, despite this. Even if you're fat and out of shape, you can still win races. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The new-age car style (left) versus the old (right).

A Female In Racing Who Doesn't Deserve Her Ride

As someone who actually follows racing on a professional level, I couldn't help but laugh. After all, people have been fighting for equality in racing for a long time. Danica Patrick was supposed to be the savior—the female talent who could finally knock the boys off.

Of course, Patrick has a top-tier ride in NASCAR, with full funding and the best equipment available. Throughout her career, spanning 171 starts, she has managed to finish in the Top 10 exactly seven times. And never in the Top 5.

Meanwhile her teammate Kevin Harvick, in identical equipment, has finished in the Top 10 ten times this year alone (out of 17 races). Second teammate Kurt Busch has eight Top 10s. Third teammate Clint Bowyer, in his first year on the team, has seven.

Danica Patrick is the perfect example of a female who is where she is in racing because of her good looks, not because of any actual ability she possesses behind the wheel. Cruz Ramirez is the same thing—a girl who gets an undeserving opportunity (except she obviously wins the race in the movie).

What kind of message does this send to young boys? That you should just move over and let the girls pass you by. That even if you work hard and are deserving, you don't matter. That girls are better, and it doesn't matter how they look. That equality doesn't really exist in the "workspace"—girls are going to be given opportunities simply because they have a slit in between their legs.

Even my Ukrainian girlfriend, who is hardly familiar with the poisons of feminism, remarked to me (unprovoked), "I don't get it—what did she do to deserve that win? She didn't…do anything."

Closing Thoughts

While I enjoyed the movie overall, the ending was impossible for me to look past, and it disgusts me how many young boys are going to be influenced by this movie. In another life, if I wasn't unplugged, I wouldn't have given a second thought about it. The timeline when the original Cars came out, or even Cars 2, I would have never realized this. But I know better now.

The obvious attempt to draw girls into the Cars franchise by staging a female winning the race may or may not work for Disney and Pixar. Girls aren't that interested in cars—they want to dress up like a princess and play house—not get oil under their nails (exceptions obviously). It'd be nice if Hollywood would quit trying to fuck with the minds of young kids, but it's never going to happen.

Right now, the message they want to instill into the minds of young boys with is simply this: You're not good enough.

If you want to learn how to build a business free of feminist poison, check out my guide. For more articles, visit my blog This Is Trouble.

Read More: The Expectations Of Modern Women Have Lost Touch With Reality And Common Decency

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

What To Do When You Blow It With A Beautiful Girl

July 5, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

You might think that the worst outcome when you approach a beautiful girl is that she rejects you. But that isn't the worst thing at all. Even more perturbing is when she is attracted to you and agrees to a date, but then for whatever reason—she changes her mind, you mess up, or logistically things don't come together—you don't end up sleeping with her. I call these situations 'near misses'. This article is about how to try to prevent them and what to do when one occurs.

Near Misses

There are different degrees of ‘near miss’. The most extreme is when you get a girl back to your place, she is naked on your bed and then she changes her mind about wanting sex with you and leaves. This phenomenon, sometimes called LMR (last minute resistance) is understandably confusing and frustrating when it happens. A more subtle form (and more common) form of ‘near miss’ is when you meet a girl who is clearly attracted to you, perhaps agreeing to a date and even making out with you, but who then changes her mind and won’t progress things further with you.

The latter happened to me recently. I met a hot Russian girl, blonde, very pretty with a petite but extremely curvy figure. She was definitely an 8.5 and possible a 9. The first time I saw her she gave me what is known as the ‘doggy dinner bowl look’: that is, she maintained prolonged eye contact with me, and her eyes were large and round and filled with desire. You can distinguish a real ‘doggy dinner bowl’ look easily from a more casual glance, since in the case of the former there will be a real sense that something of significance has passed between the two of you. It is an IOI on steroids.

It was pretty clear she was into me, so when the right moment presented itself to me I went over and chatted to her, getting her number quickly and easily. There followed some two-ing and fro-ing over Facebook Messenger, including some hugely flirtatious and sexual comments from her.

Then we went on the date. It didn’t go well. In a large part I think this was due to the fact that this girl, currently in early recovery for her excessive use of cocaine, wasn’t drinking alcohol. Now, as much of a pussy hound as I may be, I wasn’t going to encourage her to drink when it wasn’t good for her to do so. But the girl felt awkward. She told me it was the first time she’d been on a date with a guy sober.

For my part, I don’t think I did anything ‘wrong’ as such. I just did my usual date ‘thing’—cocky-funny banter, some comfort laced with verbal and physical escalation. I was on pretty good form and did my best to make the girl feel comfortable and to be fair the conversation flowed well.

Unexpectedly though, after only a short time, she said she had to go home. I tried a couple of things to change her mind, but when it was clear she’d made her mind up I sat back and watched her beautiful ass and the long gold hair that tickled it as she retreated to the subway.

I don’t expect I’ll ever see her again.

Now, shit happens and fortunately I have abundance, so after she’d left I simply called up another girl who’d come over from Hungary to hang out with me, and a few hours later I was banging her back at my apartment instead. But I won’t pretend that my failure with the Russian girl didn’t sting, especially as I texted her later and her reply didn’t suggest that I’d misread the situation.

How To Prevent A Near-Miss

Is it possible to stop something like this happening to you? There are certainly a few things you should bear in mind that can help.

The first is to say that it’s always a good idea to get to sex as quickly as possible after you meet a new girl. Why? Because the longer you leave it, the more time she has to mull everything over in her mind and the more likely she is to find some pretext on which to reject you. So had I met the Russian girl, she’d given me doggy dinner bowl eyes and we’d slept together that night then the whole scenario I’ve just described need never have taken place.

You see the difficulty is this: when you go on a ‘date’, even if it’s just a casual drink, then you are effectively putting yourself forward to be judged against whatever criteria happens to come up with. So while her hindbrain and body may be keen for sex with you; her forebrain, the part where intellectual decisions are made, may choose to reject you for any number of reasons.

In my experience, the biggest problems you'll face will be due either to over- or under-escalation. For myself, I have been prone to over-escalation at times which has without a doubt lost me a bunch of lays.

Escalation is when you push the envelope sexually. Physical escalation is when you use touch to get her excited, verbal escalation is when you say sexy things to turn her on.

Here's the bind. Too little escalation and she'll think you're not interested / not alpha enough / gay and she'll consign you to the friendzone. Too much escalation and you risk overheating the whole thing and watching her walk away.

The latter has happened to me many times. I've had girls out on dates who have literally been all over me, making out. But if you don't have sex that night as a result then you're unlikely to see her again. This is because she will know that the next time you meet intercourse will be foremost on the agenda, and so the very act of her coming to meet you will feel slutty.

My best advice is to take a middle course. Without a doubt you must inject sexuality into the proceedings. You must present yourself as a sexual being verbally and you should use touch judiciously to introduce a sense of physical intimacy between you. Just don't push it too far. Instead, hang back and allow her to be the predator too. Otherwise you risk jettisoning whatever fragile bond has been established between you.

What To Do If You Experience A 'Near Miss'

If you experience a ‘near miss’ then you might find that it stings significantly more than a standard rejection. Why? Because you were in with a chance. You were in sight. You were faced with an open goal, you gave it your best shot and… you missed.

There is little that is more dispiriting for a man in the dating arena to fail to score with a girl who has shown clear signs of interest in him.

In this situation the first thing you must do is remember the old adage ‘you can’t lose what you never had.’ Because the truth is that you never actually ‘had’ her. Yes, perhaps she was interested, but you didn’t really lose anything.

If you can, you should try to congratulate yourself on the progress you did make, and resolve to learn from the experience rather than wallow in self-pity.

Another thing I find really helpful in such situations is to write down a detailed account of everything that took place. Not only will this help you analyse what went awry and learn for next time, you’ll also be amazed at just how much the practice will take the pain out of the situation and allow you to see if more clearly.

Another great tip is to speak to a close male friend about what happened. A good buddy will further help you to put things into perspective and you may even find yourself laughing about it.

Finally, you need to continue to approach other girls. This will open up new opportunities for you and, even more importantly, it will help you to see that the girl you ‘lost’ was just that, a girl. One of billions, in other words.

For a compilation of all Troy’s best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: Why Being Good Looking Is Not Enough To Be Successful With Women

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Homosexuality Acceptance Is Leading To The Normalization Of Pedophilia

July 5, 2017 | by Liam O'Connor | Link | Original Link

It was not that long ago (2015) that we reluctantly gave gays the right to marriage, along with all its benefits. We didn't want it, but like any other form of degeneracy that was being pushed by students of the Frankfurt School, we gently let it slide, because we gave them the benefit of the doubt that it would become the slippery slope that it always does.

We were warned by the staunch detractors again and again that acceptance of homosexuality into the mainstream and in institutions would inevitably lead to them pushing for more degeneracy—no matter how far it goes. The gays browbeat us, called us "Bible Thumpers," shamed us through all forms of media, and got the legal system on their side to fine people who want to run their business the way they want

Homosexuals finally got what they wanted because people—specifically White Christians—are willing to give people a chance if their sob story is good enough, because we thought in the end we would just let 'em have it. "It doesn't affect us," we said. "Who cares who they fuck as long as they don't bother me?" Such is the case for any minority group, racial or otherwise, that wants to become a protected class and bully whites into submission.

Great People!

Homosexuals as a group are some of the most depraved, morally compromised, and mentally ill people you will come across in your lifetime. The level that they embrace and push for degeneracy and debauchery is astounding to the effect that it is consistent among the vast majority of them.

Not only do they all advocate for perversion, they are amoebas that shamelessly absorb any and all depravity which comes their way. A simple visual representation of this is the rapidly expanding acronym used to identify them: LGBTQIAPK2SAAP—no joke, this is the best official acronym that I could find considering the irony of them being formless.

More Rights!

Back in the 1980's in the United States, when GRIDS (gay-related immune deficiency) was first popping up all around the gay community, people were scared stiff of this new super virus that meant certain death if you caught it. It had an unintended effect of catapulting gays into the very forefront of public scrutiny and discourse. Along with it came safe-sex education and contraceptive use as the fear of contracting the equivalent of the Black Death during the middle ages was very high. A brief period of advocates vs. detractors came to be, but in the end, sympathy was given to the gays.

Only in very recent times have we seen the level of perversion accelerate at a frightening pace, with it going from sex with other men, to trannies, sex with animals, 100+ genders, and finally sex with children. Merely a few years ago, the idea of normalizing pedophilia was completely off the table. Now it is being rapidly introduced and pushed for public acceptance just like homosexuality was all those years ago.

Here are some stats on how much homosexuals enrich our society:

-They make up approximately 3% of the population but account for 25%-40% of all child molestation cases.

-They make up over 80% of all male child molestation cases and the average pedophile victimizes between 20 and 150 boys before being arrested.

-Homosexuals account for almost half of all serial killers and child killers, no surprise due to their fragile mental state.

-Most child molesters, child rapists, murderers and serial killers are male. Homosexual males account for 1% to 2% of the population. That means 1% to 2% of the population commit 1/3 of child molestations, 1/3 to 2/3 of child rapes, 1/2 of all murders, and more than 2/5 of serial murders.

-Homos have a disproportionate representation in all media (Hollywood, TV, Stage).

-Children of homosexual parents are twice as likely to have emotional instability than with children from normal parents.

–In 2014 alone, gays aged 13-24 accounted for 92% of new GRIDS diagnoses in their age group

-Over half the people affected with HIV are homosexuals

-Blind surveys reveal a gross number of homos that admit to sexual contact with a minor

Not All Homosexuals!

Hmmmm. Who has been known to shove degeneracy down our throats?

In the 1990's, an organization by the name of Gay and Lesbian Adolescent Social Services (GLASS) was accused of abusing troubled youths that were situated in their homes. The kids in these homes were groomed and used for sex by the adults that were a part of and ran the organization. Books were given out to help children "discover" their sexuality, and some youths were believed to be "born gay."

This group still exists to this day, despite continued abuse reports. These cases are not unique, as fags routinely like to use organizations that specifically target youths to get their rocks off. Think of the boy scouts, church youth groups, and social workers as other avenues for gays to insert themselves.

The push for pedophilia is being waged the same exact way that all previous "accepted" forms of degeneracy have been. This movement is real and growing in strength and influence. They begin first by changing the discussion from moral absolutes to moral relativism in the same way that homosexuality became about "love" instead of being completely amoral (i.e., antithetical to the Bible).

Instead of being an absolute depraved and sick offense on the moral fabric of society, they are now “born that way,” effectively taking choice out of the equation, which thereby absolves the offending party responsibility—and with it, blame for the consequences of their actions on society. Not only do we have this, but pedophilia is also being pushed on the medical science front as being a “condition” that needs treatment. And you know what kind of treatments are being suggested? Micro doses of a drug to ease them off their pedophilic tendencies. Guess what the “drug” is? Yup, children.

It’s not just the innocence of children that is under attack. The nuclear family and healthy relationships in general are under siege constantly by the gay agenda and many others. Same sex parents are not conducive to a stable and healthy family environment and any of the other dregs of society that the LGBT lobby accepts are fit to raise children either. To gays and their ilk, children are groomed to be both the filth that their parents are, as well as whatever deviant flavor the child’s malleable mind decides as well.

Conclusion

Homosexuals and the other freaks that associate with them are just more foot soldiers created by (((certain people))) to surround white people with enemies who want to tear down the healthy patriarchal civilization that they built. Unfortunately for us normal people, we have allowed the number of enemies and rabid dogs who hate us to grow in number, and when the inevitable conflict breaks out, it will be all the more difficult to cull the infestation, especially since gay laws are paving the way for pedophile rights.

Read More: You’re Homophobic If You Don’t Accept The New Gay Abbreviation

Liam O'Connor
Liam's predisposition to shattering delusions brought him to the Red Pill. After getting the last of his delusions destroyed, he refuses to apologize for telling the truth. When he's not improving himself, he is counting the friends he is slowly losing. The confines of his mind can be accessed at neverslavery.com and on Twitter @never_a_slave

10 Steps That Helped Me Get In The Best Shape Of My Life

July 5, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Disclaimer: I am not (yet) a fitness guru and do not own academic qualifications in that field. I still have things to learn. I am sharing with you the excellent advice that worked for me. The pictures are not of the highest quality but are not Photoshopped.

I would like to start with a short statement: I am in my early thirties and I am stronger now than I have ever been in my life. I have to say that it feels great to say it.

I am fairly happy with my general shape even if some areas need to be improved. So let me share with you the good decisions that improved my life.

1. Getting my goals in order

FAR LEFT: Martial arts only training, terrible diet. LEFT: Incorporated more calisthenics but diet still poor. RIGHT: Reasonable diet plus early stages of weight training. FAR RIGHT: Discovered ROK on the 18th of June, 2014. Good diet, gym, and swimming training immediately followed.

Ever since I read Douglas Heppner's concise, thought-provoking article Could You Defeat A Past Version Of Yourself?, I now ask myself regularly that question, analyse which areas need improvement, and then get to work.

My 2010s self had more overall stamina and technique, but I am convinced that my present self would smash him being thirty pounds heavier and using the experience accumulated and the brute force of heavier striking.

My main issue: I hit puberty late but sprouted fast. My limbs stretched but the muscle mass did not follow. I grew up tall and slim (just under 6’2″/188cm) into adulthood even with hardcore training. With that ectomorph body type, I had problems putting on muscle. Even now with decent training and nutrition, growing muscle takes a long time.

What I want is a functional physique that allows me to strike hard and grapple effectively. Looking good is one thing but I do not aim at the “sick cow on steroids” bodybuilding type.

The body type I am aiming at.

Find out exactly what you want to do, organise, and execute. No more “kinda” or “sorta”. Regularity pays more than going balls out a few times then slacking off.

For instance, I have four goals now: gaining five to ten pounds of muscle in the next year, improving my cardio (not satisfied now), sleep better, and fix my recurrent “close to chicken legs” issue. It is going well lately but there is still some work ahead.

2. Finding inspiration

I like the expression of “standing on the shoulders of giants”. For me, Return Of Kings was a great source of inspiration and I must thank all the contributors and my peers who accompanied me in this journey.

You must train with the best to be among the best. You must look for failure, train with sportsmen stronger than you, hurt your ego with defeat, and use the fire of adversity to forge your mind and body. Persist despite setbacks, illness, or injury.

The motivation and hard truth of the “never enough” motto should always ring in your head. I met my martial arts coach after a year of absence and only gym training. I was in top shape but he dropped the truth bomb that woke me up…

> This is cool for the girls and all, but you lost a year of technique.

Always look for excellence and be inspired by real life examples. I had the privilege to train sambo with some Continental and World champions. The vibe and positive impact of those encounters were priceless.

If no live inspiration is available, excellent books, documentaries or even Youtube channels exist to get you inspired. I am in a cycle of scooby1971, Jeff Cavaliere's Athlean X and Elliott Hulse's Strength Camp at the moment.

3. Avoiding alcohol and cigarettes

I never smoked in my life but started a year ago in Eastern Europe as it is so cheap, very social, and a decent opener. But that garbage lowers testosterone and stamina. I was not a big smoker but could go through half a pack if I got smashed. Cigarettes also worsen the hangover. I've since almost entirely stopped.

I also had too many hangovers spent hiding in my hole like a spider, cursing the world when I could have been productive in various areas of my life or gone to the gym.

I used to drink plenty of beer before I read about its negative effect on testosterone. I now rarely drink it. I drink much less in general and choose spirits when I go out.

But I do not live like a monk and had good results lately as I found an old, rusty gym with no girls, and I currently drink around three alcoholic beverages a week tops. I also have a good sleeping rhythm at the moment.

I cannot speak for the effect of other drugs as I have never had any experience with it.

4. Focusing on nutrition as much as training

Left: August 2015, after a summer full of delicious carb-rich food and gallons of beer. Right: March 2016, after two months of 90% carbs cut down (same training).

I started cutting down on carbs (especially bread, potatoes and pasta) for a year now. I find it effective for fat loss but I miss it a lot (I still have oats in the morning or wild rice with my meat).

I started drinking more water (about half a gallon a day) and reduced my consumption of salt. It was difficult for me as my two favourite dishes are herring in oil with steamed potatoes and Polish pickled cucumbers. I also cut entirely on raffinated sugar (in my coffee too) and only eat fruit occasionally but compensate with vegetables.

Too much cardio does not help being lean without the proper diet. I made the mistake of thinking that I could be lean by running four times a week while stuffing my face with everything I could put my hands on.

I eliminated dairy too following the few articles I read about milk being full of estrogens, after drinking it in great amounts all my life. Another determining factor was Arnold's quote from Pumping Iron.

A good tip that helps me not to eat all that delicious food is to do my groceries on a full stomach. Worst mistake is to buy the week's supply while starving after a gym session. You just want to rob the store and eat off the shelves. You will probably give in and buy something you should not eat like processed meat, puff pastries, or truckloads of sauce.

5. Choosing quality over quantity

My personal experience of the impact of a poor diet comes from my student days. I had 2-3 hours long martial art sessions three times a week plus 45 minutes jogs here and there.

In the above picture, I reached national level in my discipline (bronze medal) in individual and silver medal in team contest. Technique and excellent teachers made up for my average condition.

I ate what I wanted but mainly entire saucepans of potatoes or pasta with cream, cheese or sauce, bread of the lowest quality and processed meat. I only ate real meat when I was visiting my family or coming back to uni with my bags full of ham and chicken.

My diet and my financial situation where both dirt poor. I now have a better physique even if I train less and can afford a better diet than when I was a student.

The quality of the meat you ingest makes a huge difference. I met back home a farmer that had enough of being fucked over by slaughter houses and the European directives. He eliminated the middle man by raising his top quality cows, slaughters them himself and has clients (including me) on a private email list. He notifies us when the meat is ready.

I turn up and buy two weeks to a month worth of meat. I rarely had something tastier and it had the triple effect of being cheaper and tastier while keeping my money away from the thieves that run modern supermarkets.

6. Becoming more time efficient

One of the great ideas that I need to re-institute in my life is the habit of cooking all my meals of the week on Sunday and defrost them. It is a game changer and saves so much time. It goes lighting fast if you get a George Foreman grill and a steam cooker.

I also plan my workouts before arriving at the gym now and time my sets while turning off the Internet on my phone or leaving it in my bag not to be bothered.

7. Experimenting and retaining what works

I like my present routine of weight training, calisthenics and MMA

I remember which activities improved specific areas of my body and continue to extract what is effective. For instance, rugby was great for bulking up with frequent, fast runs combined while tackles improved resistance and core strength. My legs soon doubled in volume but I was around 20% body fat from constant hunger and after-game beers.

Boxing was excellent for cardio. I got very lean but for a long-limbed guy like me, boxing alone can’t give me the muscle mass I want.

Calisthenics, wrestling, and weight training should be done outdoors whenever it is possible. There should also be half an hour of walking in your daily routine.

I recently observed the positive effect of hot climate and walking more than thirty minutes a day. I spent a month in South America last winter, training less but walking everyday often more than half an hour.

Left: Summer 2016. Right: Dec. 2016, post-South America. Flexing a bit in those images but definitely leaner. My diet was not better as I had only two meals a day (late morning & late afternoon) and long hours of fasting in between.

I focus now much more on form than reps during workouts. Improving body posture at all times also did wonders with my overall state of fitness while strengthening my core and the muscles of my back.

8. Focusing on better sleep and recovery cycles

I started lifting weights four years ago after I moved overseas. I had crazy days: waking up at 4.45AM, 90 minutes of overpriced commuting, slaving all day until 6PM, hitting the gym everyday for almost 2 hours without a plan or writing anything down, 90 minutes of more overpriced commuting, cooking a meal that often involved cheap sausage or processed food then stuffing myself to the brim before collapsing in bed around 23.30.

Then I proceeded to destroy my gains with two consecutive days of drunkenness and being hungover on Sunday. While I trained like a madman, I could not see progress.

I get better results now with around three gym sessions (less than an hour) a week, plenty of recuperation and good cycles of sleep.

I also see recovery in a radically different perspective now. A large majority of injuries in sport are sustained after going too hard after a long period of inactivity. I pace myself a lot more now when I come back from a break.

Baby steps, lads, baby steps. No point going hardcore if you are unavailable the next three weeks because of an injury and have to restart from square one.

9. Going easy on supplements

The only supplements I use now are a scoop of whey protein isolate with water after each workout, a spoon of cider vinegar a day and vitamin D (double the dose in winter).

I have never used anything else that could involve pills or needles and do not intend to. It's maybe because I grew up on a farm that I don't like what is synthetic. I have only been using protein powder for 9 months now and it took me years of thought and long talks with doctors and fitness people before finally experimenting with it.

I am following a diet close to keto after I saw a few of our authors and other fitness articles praising it. I am quite generous in meat quantities but should measure it. I need to get my macros in order.

I also want to try intermittent fasting and observe the effects of flaxseed and fish oil.

10. Keeping track of everything

I log all of my workouts in a notebook. I used to improvise and randomly choose weights and reps, but workouts need to be organised just like life. I now work out faster and more efficiently using sets and weights that always follow the three laws of getting bigger and leaner.

I have followed this method for the last year and a half and can observe progress or decline during any given period. Now I can go back in time, compare pictures, workouts and see which training and diet combinations were the most efficient.

Devenir plus fort pour pouvoir vivre en paix

I consider that I would have no right to contribute on Return Of Kings if I did not look the part. This article is my way to show you that what you read here works and give back to those who distributed their precious knowledge.

I detailed here what worked for me. Perfection is not reached and the journey is still long. These tips are highly likely to have the same effect on anyone who is committed.

Read More: 7 Tips On How To Get In The Best Shape Of Your Life

---

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

6 Tentacles Of The Leftist Power Structure That Control Western Society

July 6, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The world's major power blocs represent national interests, religions, and ideologies. They're like icebergs: partly visible, but mostly beneath the surface. Openness and transparency aren't exactly core principles!

Power bloc interactions and internal structures

Individuals can operate within more than one. Power blocs usually have sub-groups, either constructively (alliance-building) or otherwise (excessive factionalism). They can join with one another (and smaller power blocs) toward shared goals, and sometimes one group co-opts another. Consider it like concentric and overlapping circles; things get complicated.

Here are some examples. Secretly funding the Nicaraguan Contras off the books, the CIA sold weaponry to Iran. Worse yet are allegations of playing footsie with dope traffickers, perhaps a bipartisan job. Zionist ethnic networking brings together ties to finance, politics, and the press. One result of this synergy was the Balfour Declaration, paving the way for Israel. Leftists are courting Islamists lately (what possibly could go wrong?) Politics makes for strange bedfellows.

Here we'll describe the modern leftist power structure. Briefly recapping from before, they're a loose coalition. The System drives the agenda. (It's basically what Mencius Moldbug called The Cathedral, though this terminology is controversial.) The Hive (Joseph Sobran's allegory) swarms in orbit around The System and implements their directives. The criteria for System membership are great wealth, great influence, or easy media access.

The following describes their operations within major spheres of influence.

1. Big Money sphere

> Let me issue and control a nation's money and I care not who makes its laws.
> —Mayer Amschel Rothschild, 1790

A $350K annual income seems like a decent paycheck. However, any such entry-level "one percenter" barely matters in the power game. One could argue about who really counts: the world's top thirteen, 300, 2000, or 40,000; the picture is fuzzy. The most notable are banking dynasties, other Old Money families, European nobility, Wall Street executives and international financiers, and New Money tech billionaires. I'm okay with those earning wealth through honest work and who don't sabotage their society, but I have no use for crooks or champagne Socialists.

Leftist control

Globalists are heavily networked internationally. These "citizens of the world" are loyal to their wallets rather than their nations, yet many benefit from corporate welfare. Quite ironically, they embrace an ideology about leveling all social distinctions and empowering the downtrodden against the mighty. It's debatable how much their meddling is for "the feels", lust for absolute wealth and control, or both. Be it dilettantish naivety, utter cynicism, or hypocritical atonement, either way they're slowly creating a homogenized one-world banana republic.

They operate through highly secretive groups which critics call the "shadow government". Some are ostensive foreign policy think tanks, though their membership resembles a "who's who" list of world politics, including several modern American Presidents. Others include overt advocacy foundations, throwing millions to activism efforts as if tossing Mardi Gras beads.

Media executives exercise top-down control through ownership. Donations to universities likely influence the Education sphere. Their greatest power is in the Government sphere through "campaign contributions", hedging their bets by donating heavily to both sides.

As business owners, they also take measures to influence the cultural environment.

Implementing this at The Hive level, corporate advertising munchkins often piggyback sociopolitical messages into their ads, unfortunately a common problem lately. Social media companies censor news and opinions Also, HR departments (basically make-work programs for sociology and women's studies graduates) implement "diversity" initiatives and other feel-good measures. Further, they police politically incorrect viewpoints (likewise flirting at work), depriving offenders of their livelihoods.

Power source

- Money
- Connections

Weaknesses

- Many are nuttier than squirrel shit.
- They're getting paranoid, though perhaps justifiably.
- New Money possesses considerable business sense and technical expertise, but otherwise, wealth doesn't guarantee smarts.

Counterstrategy

- Stop buying their products and encourage others to quit feeding the beast.
- Expose their activities; "sunlight is the best disinfectant".

2. Media sphere

> And it could be that while unemployment and the economy worsens, [Donald Trump] could have undermined the messaging so much that he can actually control exactly what people think. And that, that is our job.
>
> —Mika Brzezinski

Centered in New York City and Hollywood, 90% of America's news and entertainment comes from six mega-conglomerates. (Likely it's pretty similar elsewhere.) The government—the best politicians money can buy—repealed antitrust provisions meant to prevent this problem. They operate TV networks, newspapers, magazines, radio stations, the literary establishment, the music scene, etc.—even comic books.

Leftist control

The System's propaganda arm is owned by Big Money executives. Other System level types are actors, musicians, anchormen, and notable talking heads. However, it's often slim pickings in The Hive. I don't envy entry-level journalists, publishing-house flunkies, starving artists, and D-list actors. The only decent creative profession for those who never make it big are aspiring musicians; even bar bands get groupies.

Outside of the Big Six are other cultural pursuits. The art scene became a circle-jerk between critics and mediocre artists, generally a leftist boondoggle. Even the porn industry can have agendas.

Power source

Being a monopoly on mainstream news provides great power to mold public opinion. Celebrities can share their profound political expertise with the ignorant masses.

Weaknesses

The MSM greatly overplayed their hand; they've lost more credibility than ever. Conservatives consider them brazen liars, and even most liberals don't believe "all or most", much different from Walter Cronkite's days. The music scene is trashy, and literature is dead. The media alienated their audience, which is tuning them out.

Counterstrategy

- Cancel your cable bill and other MSM subscriptions; encourage others to do so.
- The time is ripe to start building parallel cultural institutions and information networks online.

3. Education sphere

> Liberating tolerance, then, would mean intolerance against movements from the Right and toleration of movements from the Left. As to the scope of this tolerance and intolerance: … it would extend to the stage of action as well as of discussion and propaganda, of deed as well as of word.
>
> —Herbert Marcuse, Repressive Tolerance

Most children receive state-funded education; quality varies greatly. Then college is promoted as a ticket to the middle class. System level influencers include the Department of Education, teachers unions, and college presidents.

On The Hive level, professors and the skyrocketing administrative staff have great jobs. Public school teachers are less prestigious, but it's a decent living if one doesn't mind dealing with brats.

Leftist control

They have a firm grip on most social sciences and humanities departments, and you can forget about working in them unless you talk the talk. (Hint: method-act until tenure.) Academia has become a great make-work program for the young SJWs they indoctrinated. Being the Second Assistant Dean of Diversity is a better gig than Fivebucks Coffee!

Many public school teachers feel they have license to mold young minds before the kiddos can think for themselves. The first time it happened to me was in second grade, and I miss the good old days.

Power source

They deliver twelve years of state education, with an optional four year ideological deep-fry, more with advanced degrees. Indoctrinating generations of kids saved the left from demographic collapse. Subverting the universities was a shrewd move. Other than that, academia wears the mantle of scholarly respectability. They sometimes develop new ideological trends and buzzwords. They also operate within the psychology sub-sphere.

Weaknesses

- Members of this "intelligentsia" are often educated beyond their ability to comprehend, unable to defend logically the arguments they're parroting. (They're not teaching critical thinking skills, and it shows.) I served my time and greatly resented their constant brainwashing attempts, and now I easily dissect their ideology with glee.
- The public increasingly realizes leftist academia is mental masturbation.
- Outside of their Ivory Tower, they're pretty ineffectual. For one example, would you fear a mob of sociology professors?

Counterstrategy

- Carefully screen schools. Raise hell at PTA meetings and school boards as needed,
- Don't send your children to SJW factories either. Some colleges aren't pozzed out. Make sure they obtain a worthwhile degree.
- Alternatives exist: homeschooling, trade schools, and self-study.

4. Government sphere

> [Donald Trump] is running away with the nomination and it scares the daylights out of the insiders who have not only run the party, but they've run the country for a long time.
>
> —Mike Huckabee, 2/27/2016

The US government's top levels include the Presidency, Congress, Cabinet members, federal judiciary, department heads, and high military officers. Lobbies work to influence Congress, some quite powerful. They represent multitudes of interests (the military-industrial complex, broccoli farmers, Wall Street, bird watchers, etc.), but you need money to get in that game. State governors also have significant influence.

Things get interesting at The Hive level, down in the swamp! Middle grade bureaucrats wield power in implementing policies. Even the front lines exercise individual discretion: clerks handling your paperwork, IRS agents, and obviously local police. (Hint: pass the "attitude test".)

Leftist control

The political circus has much in common with professional wrestling. The Democrats pushed softcore cultural Marxism since the 1960s. Neocon entryism turned the Republicans into a controlled opposition. Big Money calls the tune, so they win no matter which party is in power.

Trump is the first Presidential outsider in ages, too rich to be bought off. The party bosses kept trying to sabotage their leading candidate's campaign. The Democrats didn't look much better with their dirty primary (and dirtier top candidate).

Power source

The legal system, a national budget, and military force

Weaknesses

- They're supposed to practice openness and follow their own rules. When caught with their hand in the cookie jar, significant fallout can happen. With luck, the crook will lose the next election.
- Ineptitude, wasteful spending, and hostility to the public are also easy to expose.
- Politicians usually lose touch with their constituents, expecting the peasants will remain "unaware and compliant".

Counterstrategy

- If a Hive-level munchkin troubles you, push it up the food chain.
- For politicians, expose their misdeeds.
- Decentralization could cut the head off the snake.
- Support alternative parties.

5. Organization sphere

> I, too, take a class position. It is anti-capitalist and pro-revolutionary. I believe in non-violent methods of struggle as most effective in the long run for building up successful working class power. Where they cannot be followed or where they are not even permitted by the ruling class, obviously only violent tactics remain. I champion civil liberty as the best of the non-violent means of building the power on which workers rule must be based. If I aid the reactionaries to get free speech now and then, if I go outside the class struggle to fight against censorship, it is only because those liberties help to create a more hospitable atmosphere for working class liberties. The class struggle is the central conflict of the world; all others are incidental.
>
> —James Baldwin, ACLU co-founder

Countless organizations represent all viewpoints, single-issue or broad ideologies. These are advocacy groups, think tanks, foundations, NGOs, nonprofits, parties (from those running the Government sphere to tiny ones mostly existing in the imagination), etc. Some medium to large organizations have extensive Government connections (influence, lucrative contracts, or even direct policy input). Some have a religious focus but are ultimately political.

They exist to promote their views, gain membership and subscriptions, raise funds, and some are focal points for Activism. Most are okay, even those with disagreeable views; they're just expressing opinions. Those featuring dishonesty, hidden agendas, no transparency, or dirty tactics are the organizations of concern.

Leftist control

Their foundations are another make-work program, employing multitudes from paper pushers up to community agitators. Apparatchiks can move into the Government sphere, as bureaucrats or elected officials.

A few gain celebrity status through recognition and lavish praise from the Media sphere, becoming great leftist heroes. Although those promoted into the power structure's upper echelons fly above The Hive and ascend into The System, they still must please their Big Money handlers. Not all major Organization heads become big shots (though many dream of it), but a six figure salary isn't an uncommon consolation. Some are cynical and corrupt enough to make televangelists blush.

Most leftist groups are independent, but several are fronts in the pay of Big Money. Others receive funding from trusts established by Gilded Age donors, lately infiltrated and subverted by entryists. The payback generally involves pressuring governments, staging angry demonstrations (sometimes becoming riots), or dirty tricks to discredit opponents. As we saw in 2016, there's lots of swag to go around; enough to pay protesters and bus them in from out of state.

Some groups operate in the legal sphere. This includes alphabet soup "watchdog" outfits that defame dissidents and compile naughty lists, sharing them with law enforcement. (One in particular is a skeezy operation with a skeezier head honcho, using scare tactics to solicit donations.) Others specialize in judicial activism to lawyer up their agendas.

Power source

- Donations
- Popular support (sometimes astroturfing)
- Friendly Media coverage
- Activism does their ground work

Weaknesses

- Factionalism and ideological clashes
- Ineffectual ones waste time and resources
- Sometimes there are too many chiefs and not enough braves

Counterstrategy

- For regular groups that play nice, argue against their positions; standard debate stuff
- Expose those using nasty tactics
- Report those using illegal tactics
- Conduct our own networking

6. Activism sphere

> It was 1969. Kate [Millett] invited me to join her for a gathering at the home of her friend, Lila Karp. They called the assemblage a "consciousness-raising-group," a typical communist exercise, something practiced in Maoist China. We gathered at a large table as the chairperson opened the meeting with a back-and-forth recitation, like a Litany, a type of prayer done in Catholic Church. But now it was Marxism, the Church of the Left, mimicking religious practice…
>
> —Mallory Millett

Here at last are ordinary citizens. Enthusiasm varies, but we'll include everyone who does more than vote and message friends occasionally. Some might join Organizations; others contribute individually; some operate entirely online. Some work for single issue causes, others go in for several.

Leftist control

Lenin called liberals "useful idiots". Deep down, most are nice people concerned about social problems. It's a shame that so many caring idealists are exploited for donations and hard work by unscrupulous Organizations. They believe they're championing diversity, fighting for the downtrodden, and opposing a corrupt Establishment. Ironically, they're being tooled by Big Money types trying to run the world into the ground for profit while turning the masses into homogenized serfs. It's hard (but not impossible) to break through their conditioning.

The radicals are a worse category, fanatical and impervious to reason. Sadly, most were good kids before their brains were marinated in Media / Education psyops. Others are recruited from gangs or the homeless. Unlike liberals, these zombies won't hesitate to vandalize, steal, or riot if they think they'll get away with it.

Social Justice Warriors are spayed or neutered radicals, the leftist power structure's septic tank. These armchair Lenins lack debate skills beyond posting talking points on social media, thinking that actually makes a difference. They can't comprehend reality, often having mental problems. I'd pity these pathetic dregs if they didn't engage in online mobbing, their greatest (only) weapon.

Power source

- Demonstrations, peaceful or otherwise
- Shouting down opponents
- Petty crime
- Online mobbing, doxing, and smear tactics to deprive targets of income or endanger their safety

Weaknesses

- Neither facts nor logic are on their side.
- They're rabbit people.

Counterstrategy

- With liberals, you might break through partially by staying reasonable and finding common ground.
- With radicals, deescalation might work. Also, once I was badly outnumbered, but I deterred them by holding frame.
- SJWs are very weak-minded and easy to "trigger".
- Every day, try to do something advancing our agenda.

Summary

How fierce… now I'm terrified!

We're in a difficult struggle against powerful and highly motivated opponents, but together we can prevail. In general:

- Cut off their funding.
- Support alternative institutions.
- Help spread the word. Many can see that things are going terribly wrong, but haven't put the pieces together, don't know what can be done, and feel isolated.
- Never give up; defeat is not an option.

My books are available at Smashwords and Amazon.

Read More: The Elites Have One Rule For Themselves, And One Rule For The Rest Of Us

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

5 Initiation Rites To Help Turn Weak Boys Into Masculine Men

July 6, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

Within the manosphere, one of the best-known problems that confronts young men in the West today is a lack of genuine initiation rituals. In past times in the Western world, young boys underwent various hardships and pains which, once completed, marked their transition from boyhood to manhood. And even today, such initiation rituals still exist in other cultures. But in the West, no such rituals really remain.

At present, there are no established initiation challenges that a Western boy must complete before he is considered a man. After all, is a boy considered a man the first time he has sex? Maybe, but even boys can have sex. So then is it when a boy gets his first job? Or when he first starts to drive? Is it when he finally goes to college? Who knows, which is precisely what the problem is!

Now, while the above options are potential points which could mark a boy's transition into being a man, all those options are actually quite unsatisfactory. And they are unsatisfactory because they fail to capture the unique essence of manliness: namely, strength, a tough physicality, a biting intellect, self-sufficiency, sacrifice, discipline, and an undying grit which never quits even when your body cannot move another inch.

Consequently, proper initiation rituals, wherever possible, need to emphasize such traits in order to truly mark the transition from boyhood to manhood.

Not the kind of initiation ritual that Western boys need.

At present, there is no way that Western society will reintroduce some type of initiation ritual which all boys can experience. In fact, in our feminized society, there is little doubt that any attempt to reintroduce a formalized initiation ritual exclusively for boys would be met with howls of protest and indignation from feminists and their ilk, but that does not mean that Western men, in small groups, cannot create initiation rituals with their own sons to allow those boys to have a true initiation challenge.

To that end, let me propose five different initiation rites which men could use today to mark the 'boyhood to manhood' transition for their sixteen to seventeen-year-old sons or nephews. (And please note that since these challenges are physically demanding, it is strongly suggested that your medical skills are up-to-date before undertaking any of these tests.)

Initiation Challenge 1 – Hundred Man Combat

Long before the UFC ever existed, a karate master named Mas Oyama invented Kyokushin karate. He also created what is arguably the most brutal martial arts test known to man: the 100-man kumite. In essence, what this challenge consists of is fighting 100 opponents in a series of two minute rounds without any significant break in-between the rounds. If you get injured, but you can keep going, then you do so. If you are so tired that you cannot raise your arms, too bad. Come hell or high water, the fight continues or you fail the test.

Now, as you can imagine, this is a type of challenge that only a man can complete. Thus, if your teenage boy is into martial arts, and if at least 10 participants are available that can rotate in and out of the fighting, then the 100-man kumite—or a scaled-down version of it—would be a test that would truly show the boy that he is a man. After all, he would be on his own in the ring and would have to use all his strength, will, and wit to survive.

Note as well that the goal of this challenge is not for the boy to really fight the opponents in any significant way; rather, the goal is that the boy faces the challenge and never quits, no matter how tired or in pain he is.

Additionally, realize that, if desired, such a test could be Westernized by changing the fighting to boxing rather than karate. Or, alternatively, this challenge could be completed with rounds of grappling instead of stand-up fighting. Either way though, surviving such a test would show the boy that he is indeed a man.

Initiation Challenge 2 – The 100-Km March

One of the best ways to test soldiers is with a rucksack march, and some of the most stringent special forces' testing in the world includes forced marches. Consequently, a 100-km forced march would be another challenge which would truly show a boy that he has transitioned into being a man.

The plan for such a test is simple. The boy—and you, of course—has as long as he needs to complete the march, but he cannot stop to sleep. He must carry all his supplies on him. He can rest at any time, but he cannot quit. That is the test.

Note that, if necessary, this test can be scaled down as well. But anything less than 50-km would be too easy to count as a transition to manhood.

Initiation Challenge 3 – Hell Day

Just as certain special forces use forced marches to test their candidates, others use a challenge called Hell Week to put their candidates to the test. Therefore, you could put your son through a Hell Day as his initiation ritual.

Hell Day would consist of various physical tests and exercises which would not cease for a full 24 hours. Everything from make-shift obstacle courses to 10-kilometer runs could be part of this challenge. So could a thousand burpees or jumping jacks. Either way, plan out everything in advance and then get to it!

Also note that if you are already part of a group of males—such as a sports team or a martial arts club—then you would likely already have the facilities to use as a base camp for this Hell Day. This would also allow you to complete the challenge as a group, which would make it that much more interesting.

Initiation Challenge 4 – The Million-Pound Lift

If your son is into weight-lifting—as he should be once he hits seventeen or eighteen—then another possible test is to challenge your son to a ‘million-pound lift’. What this means is that you must both move a million-pounds of total weight before the test is done. You and your son enter the weight room, and you don’t leave until a million pounds of iron has been moved by the force of your muscles.

Now such a challenge would take hours to complete and it would involve fatigue the likes of which few men have ever experienced. But what a test it would be! Only a man can endure such a challenge. And that is the point.

Of course, as always, this test could also be modified as necessary for your particular circumstances.

Initiation Challenge 5 – Other

Finally, we must consider initiation rites for boys who, whether due to disability or otherwise, cannot complete physical tests. For such boys, such things as a prolonged fast of a week or more, or a contemplative retreat to a monastery or the mountains could be used to test their willpower and fortitude.

Such boys could also be tested intellectually, perhaps by such a challenge as having them read a series of massive history tombs that are clearly at the level of an adult, or by having them write a thesis-length paper on a subject of their interest.

Either way, the point would be to have them complete an intellectual task that is only expected from a well-seasoned adult. And if they do so without complaint or whining, this would mark their transition into the sphere of men.

Conclusion

In the end, these are just a few of the tests which could be used today to help a teenager know that he has transitioned from being a boy into being a man. But whatever type of test that you choose, the point is to push teenage boys into accomplishing something which only an adult man could do, and which exemplifies the masculine virtues of strength, courage, and will.

Indeed, the goal of any manhood initiation ritual is to push teenagers past their boyhood limits and make them accomplish something which they, as boys, would have never thought possible. But once they realize that it is possible, and once they realize that they, themselves, can endure more pain and suffering then they, as boys, ever thought possible, then they will realize that they have now truly become men.

Read More: On The Disappearance Of Male Initiation Rituals

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

How To Make Your First $100 Online With A Simple Niche Site

July 6, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Pro Niche Site.

Sometimes, it's the simple things that can have great returns. In 2017, we have informational overload. As a result, there is a high demand for good information out there.

There is a stupid amount of money in telling other people what you think about a product. If you've ever looked at the price of buying ads on keywords, you'll take note that certain keywords are much more expensive than others.

For example, keywords that have "buy steroids" or "steroids review" tend to be a lot more expensive than "how to take steroids".

Generally speaking, there is a funnel that people go through before they actually purchase something. Using our steroid example, it would look something like this (as far as keywords):

- steroids
- steroids for beginners
- how to take steroids
- where to buy steroids
- best steroid stores
- where to buy steroids online
- ABC steroid store review

The beauty is that there is usually an opportunity to make a sale somewhere on that path. Somewhere that, if you know how to write, how to do your research, and generally have some business sense—you can make excellent profits.

Many of you who have read my work on this site for the last 3+ years have likely seen some of my contextual links to my “niche websites” such as Ukraine Living, Eastern European Travel and Speaking Abroad. My goal isn’t to convert an ROK reader (i.e. you) into buying a product on those sites—it’s to improve the ranking of the site so that someone else finds me somewhere on that funnel of keywords.

When I quit my corporate job back in February of 2016, my main blog was fledgling to say the least. And I had my first course in the works, and was hoping that it would ultimately be able to support me. It was a gamble, that thankfully paid off. I did commit to posting on my main site at least daily for the first year. I mostly achieved this.

But there is only so much growth you can force (I wasn’t going to post 3 times a day)—some of it has to take time to happen organically. So I decided to spin up a few other sites in the spare time I had. I wrote some of the articles myself, hired out some others, and generally took them on as fun “hobby sites”.

Well, in June alone Ukraine Living cleared over $600 in revenue. A fitness/supplement site that I started in early January will clear $500. Eastern European Travel will make $100. Speaking Abroad is new and is a little slow off the line.

Is this big money? Absolutely not.

But at the same time, the amount of work I have put into either of these sites is barely 50 hours (each). And when they consistently make numbers like that, you can often sell them outright for 15-20 times the monthly revenue.

I have firmly shifted my belief that starting off with a small, low-investment website is one of the best ways to make your first foray into “passive” income (I hate that term). No matter what way you spin it, internet business is always going to take trial and error.

My aim is to remove as much of that process as possible and to send people the right way. Here are a few reasons why niche sites are an excellent way to get started in online business.

Very Minimal (Or Zero) Start Up Cost

If you already have a web host, you’re already set. Most plans allow you to host unlimited websites free of charge. If this is the case, your only additional investment is the new domain name.

If you don't have this, your out-of-pocket costs (other than your time, obviously) is going to be about $100-150.

- $75 or so for hosting, for one year
- $10 for a domain name
- (Optional) $50 or so dollars for a premium theme (of course you can go as cheap or as expensive as you want with this)
- If you choose to hire out some articles, you can probably expect to pay $20 for 1,000 words of reasonably good quality content. I encourage against this at the beginning.

I mean, what other business can you start for $150 or less? There's not many out there.

The Skills You Learn Are Numerous

If you choose to take on a project like this, there are so many skills that are applicable to multiple online businesses. Or hell, you could even use these types of skills to get a corporate job in certain sectors.

Here are just a few of the skills you easily develop:

- Web and basic graphic design
- Writing (to sell)
- Search engine optimization
- How to hire freelancers (if you choose to outsource some work)

- Social media marketing
- Business planning and strategy

It Builds Equity In Something

As I mentioned earlier, if you have a website that can consistently make $500 a month, you can reasonably sell that on a site like Empire Flippers or Flippa for 20 or so times those earnings. That's potentially a $10,000 payday if you're willing to let that income source go.

The internet moves quickly, and things go out of style quickly. While content websites are by far the slowest way to make money off the bat, it's one of the few ones that builds equity in something.

Many people have asked why I haven't gotten into higher-end affiliate marketing—pushing thousands of visitors to signup pages and making money off each conversion. The answer I give is: because at this point in my life, I feel more comfortable with building pillars of support that I know aren't going to disappear. Things that I can leave for a few weeks, and trust that they will still be making money.

Eventually, there will be a point in my life where tackling those bigger ticket challenges will come about. But the first year of quitting my job, moving abroad, and trying to scale a business was not that time. I had another friend who moved with me and attempted to learn to day trade as he was running out of money. Take a wager how that turned out.

Closing Thoughts

The internet is continuing to grow, and more people are coming online every day. This kind of business isn't going anywhere, because people are always going to be searching out information.

So if you want to pursue a niche website, how do you start? Well, find a passion in a niche—then within a subniche.

For example, the "fitness" niche is a poor choice. Good luck competing with Men's Health, BodyBuilding.com, etc. But what's within the fitness niche?

- Supplements
- Home gym equipment
- Yoga
- Information products
- Many others

It doesn't have to be difficult, but there is a lot of information out there—and that's why I created a 6-part FREE video series that helps pick these topics out, and get started.

You can get access to all 6 videos here.

PS: Beyond the free workshop, the full Pro Niche Site course (including 12 weeks of 1-on-1 coaching, Kratom not included) has launched this week, and is available at it's lowest price until this Sunday night at 11:59pm EST. Click here to learn more.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Patreon Employee Aaron Ringgenberg Publicly Supports Antifa Domestic Terrorist Organization

July 6, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

An engineer for Patreon, Aaron Ringgenberg, has publicly come out in support of Antifa, the network of communist-anarchist activists now declared a "domestic terrorist organization." On June 12, the New Jersey Department for Homeland Security and Preparedness made the categorization, citing the leftist group's violent activities from New York to California.

Ringgenberg's Twitter biography, complete with his ready-made gender pronouns, gives us all we need to know about his political preferences (read: biases):

> I tweet about diversity and inclusion, progressive politics, & funny/cute stuff. He/him.

His view of Antifa was not only tolerant but close to laudatory (before he deleted his tweet):

> This looks like a great group with a good mission statement. I see no problem. We need active anti-fascist groups in the age of Trump.
>
> — Aaron @Anime Expo LA (@singgenberg) July 3, 2017

Aaron Ringgenberg publicly supported an organization now deemed a domestic terror organization.

This should cause serious concerns for anyone who desires proper and peaceful political discourse. What does he mean by “active anti-fascist groups”? And, better yet, what is a “fascist”? After all, leftists such as Sunsara Taylor, schooled by Tucker Carlson earlier in the year, have put Donald Trump and his supporters in the league of fascists alongside Hitler. With this faulty equation comes the faulty idea that Antifa need to mercilessly attack and potentially kill their ideological opponents.

Shockingly, Antifa incidents at places like the University of California, Berkeley have resulted in severe beatings for people whose only “crime” seems to have been standing for free speech, supporting Donald Trump, and/or attending a canceled Milo Yiannopoulos speech.

Whatever “mission statement” an Antifa group puts out, their modus operandi, as Ringgenberg would know, is anonymously assaulting those considered too right-wing. Men like 48-year-old Howard Caplan in Philadelphia this week:

Aaron Ringgenberg's endorsement of Antifa comes at a strange time for Patreon. The crowdfunding platform has just got into bed with Deray Mckesson, the notorious race-baiter and leader of the putrid Black Lives Matter movement. Not only did Patreon roll out the red carpet for Mckesson recently, it obsequiously thanked him for "spending so much time with us":

> Thank you @deray for stopping by @Patreon and spending so much time with us. It was a total honor!
>
> — Adam Fishman (@fishmanaf) June 29, 2017

> It was great to visit @Patreon and to learn more about the work y'all are doing. I'm excited about the possibilities! https://t.co/egL7970bvQ
>
> — deray mckesson (@deray) June 30, 2017

Which "right wing" users will Patreon ban now?

SJW-inspired tech companies have started banning the likes of Milo Yiannopoulos, all while turning a blind eye to violent leftists. If they're going after gay men who hate feminism, what about those of us who support traditional patriarchy?

We have seen this before with another social media corporation–Twitter. Jack Dorsey's once innovative company went down the road of supporting and pandering to SJW types. Dorsey himself fawned over Deray Mckesson. Worse still, Anita Sarkeesian, who defines online abuse as merely questioning her positions, was appointed to Twitter's "Trust and Safety Council," a very thinly veiled attempt to impose mass censorship on conservative viewpoints. Even a moderately optimistic reading of the current tech climate will lead many to assume, with justification, that Patreon is likely to follow suit.

As Twitter quickly bowed to fringe leftist activists, truly violent people and groups in the mould of ISIS were allowed to maintain accounts with next to no company pushback. The real targets became people with inconvenient, incisive ideologies, including Milo Yiannopoulos, rather than real-life extremists espousing serious violence. Martin Shkreli, who had already upset the gay community due to his decision to raise the price of an AIDS drug, faced the Twitter ban-hammer as well, ostensibly for Photoshopping himself into pictures with a feminist journalist. Will Patreon be next in going full mental?

If Aaron Ringgenberg's employer does not go down the road of culling conservative users, its mere endorsement of leftist extremist groups is bad enough. Return Of Kings and other outlets have catalogued a number of remarkably sinister incidents of late, all involving coordinated and malicious SJW violence. Non-leftist men defending themselves from Antifa bottle attacks are labeled "woman-bashers" and Trump supporters are the victims of Antifa attacks with hard metal objects.

There are astoundingly dark consequences when these actions are not only glossed over, but also promoted through outside support of Antifa organizations. Aaron Ringgenberg should be ashamed.

Who's next?

Roosh's PayPal ban is just a taste of what it is to come from a raft of tech companies. Conservative or simply non-leftist views are firmly in their sights.

In many ways our readers are our best researchers. To your knowledge, which "unsuitable" users (read: thought criminals) are being kicked off social media or crowdfunding websites? Maybe you are one of them. Roosh, for example, now boasts a lifetime ban from PayPal and he will be the tip of the iceberg before too long. Just as importantly, which employees, like Aaron Ringgenberg, and even executives from tech companies are backing those leftists with the intention of creating true violence?

Aaron Ringgenberg is in all likelihood just one of many overzealous tech workers who hold deep and abiding sympathies for violent leftist groups. Their negative role needs to be closely monitored and, whenever necessary, called out for what it is. Social media and crowdfunding platforms are vital tools for conservative and tradition-minded outlets such as Return Of Kings, which is why we cannot take them for granted. If harnessed for leftist purposes, as they are often are, they can be used against us with terrible and violent results.

Read More: Antifa Gets Destroyed By Right Wing Safety Squads In Berkeley

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

City Of Oakland Pays $1 Million To Teen Prostitute Instead Of Putting Her In Jail

July 7, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

In another example of the Pussy Pass in action, teenager Jasmine Abuslin, who turned tricks under the name Celeste Guap, was awarded $989,000 in a massive taxpayer bailout this week.

> The teen at the center of a Bay Area police sex scandal will receive nearly $1 million from the city of Oakland after her claims dredged up the muck of widespread alleged misconduct in its department.
>
> Jasmine, a 19-year-old also known as Celeste Guap, said she was sexually involved with dozens of officers from multiple police departments in the Bay Area, including some while she was underage.

Does this look like a teenager to you?

Guap, whose single mom works as a 911 phone operator, befriended and fornicated with dozens of members of law enforcement, including at least one while underage. (Incidentally, while the average pay for 911 dispatchers in California is $55,000, her mother pulled in over $133,000 in 2015.)

Guap became angry and resorted to blackmail when she learned that a group of Oakland officers formed an informal club talking about the ease of which she was willing to sleep with them. While she received actual cash on at least three occasions, the majority of the time she was rewarded for her services with meals or snacks, including a bag of Cheetos.

Chester Cheetah Made Me Do It

In now-deleted Facebook posts, Guap described the encounters as “harmless relationships” and posted a picture of an Oakland officer dropping her off at a Richmond convenience store with the caption “Took me back to Richmond in style.” But after realizing she had been giving away the goods at below market prices, Guap, who admittedly uses illegal drugs daily, obtained legal council who was able to negotiate a massive bailout that outweighs her entire lifetime earning potential.

WTBCF (Would Trade Bag of Cheetos For)

The award may sound ridiculous, but the decision was not unanimous. Oakland city councilwoman Desley Brooks voted against the award, saying it was too low. Nevertheless, the motion passed, and Mayoress (((Libby Schaaf))) approved the bailout.

Desley “Mo Money” Brooks

Western economists are in awe of one of the greatest examples of price inflation ever seen, as Guap raised the price for defiling her body from a bag of Cheetos (her 2015 rate) to just short of a million dollars in the span of less than two years.

The value of a woman at peak fertility, post-feminism

The age of consent in California is 18, and while In The Current Year, finding an 18 year old virgin is about is difficult as finding a good kratom connection, that doesn’t stop the mainstream media from perpetuating the false image of 17 year old girls as pure innocent wholesome angels, when in fact they have likely been sexting for almost a decade, and many have already learned how to monetize their vaginas.

Guap was one of these, and she approached members of the Oakland police department, befriending and fornicating with at least 30 police officers from 5 departments along San Francisco's East Bay.

Big Tits aside, this teen is already approaching the wall

Women have a natural propensity to lie, and Guap's background is certainly confusing: she has a large neck tattoo of the national motto of Dominican Republic, but claims she is from Nicaragua. She is seen in media interviews wearing Puerto Rico flags, and despite being in the US from at least age 17, claims to have attended Universidad de Guadalajara in Mexico.

She has a different last name than her mother, says she is bisexual, self-employed, and claims she was married in 2015 (around the time she was slutting it up with the officers). She appeared to take a tag the sponsor trip to Puerto Rico in September, 2015 where she posted several photos with local police officers. She may be a single mother, as she has posted several pictures with a young child.

Straight Outta Compton!

Some may look at this story and say, wow, nothing new here, a promiscuous young woman uses her body to entice guys into taboo sex with her, but Guap is also costing the taxpayers of Oakland a million bucks. Oakland is not exactly swimming in cash. In addition to this huge waste of resources (and believe me, Guap will quickly blow through this money and will be a permanent leech on society for the rest of her life), officer Brendan O'Brien, one of several married men who traded Cheeto's for Cheap Hos, committed suicide after Guap blackmailed him because he failed to respond to one of her texts quickly enough.

Several officers sent Guap to a drug treatment facility in Florida. After three days, an enormous hunger for Cheeto's swept over her, and she ran outside the rehab center, flashed her enormous breasts at cars passing by, and attacked workers who tried to bring her back inside, destroying property and biting one worker on the arm. Police arrested her for aggravated battery, and she attempted to solicit sex from the responding officers.

Getting dropped off at the Food Mart after having her body defiled. Classy

Certainly I would hope that public servants would not engage in sexual relations with teenagers. And while the remaining officers deserve punishment, no one deserves to die because they accepted an offer of taboo sex.

Those on the front line prosecuting the law should theoretically set an example for the rest of society. In reality, I'm not sure police are any more moral or law abiding than the average man, but I definitely know that when enormous breasts and easy sex are offered to men, no matter their line of work, they will take it, and there is no amount of public shaming or law writing that will alter this biological fact.

On the matter of age of consent, while there appears to be at least one case of Guap having sex at 17 (by the now deceased officer), which is illegal in California, Guap's sexual actions would be fully legal in many states in the US, and Guap claims she was legally married in 2015, and therefore able to legally make sexual decisions with her husband, though somehow not with other men.

In an interview with local television station KPIX, Guap states: "Personally, you know I have no negative feelings towards any of them… thinking back at it, yeah, you know, uh, I do see myself as being a victim, because…. um… " (see clip at 3:10 below)

Is teenage Abuslin, with her multiple tattoos, club lifestyle, developed body, criminal acts, and casual attitude towards sex, a victim? Looking at her and observing her actions, I have trouble seeing any truth to that statement. She certainly missed out on having a father in her life, and lacks an education and moral guidance. But there are insufficient resources to hand out millions of dollars to every damaged woman in America. And with the rate that men are dropping out of marriage and families, this trend will only continue.

Is forcing taxpayers to forgo schools, bridges, roads, and parks a valid punishment because city workers took advantage of freely offered sex, as men will biologically do? Is a society that bends over backwards to excuse any and all female behavior and provide cash bailouts to morally questionable women creating a better world? Just how bad will Guap look in another 5 years? We all know the answers to these questions. But we are living in a sick world where up is down, gay is straight, and man is evil.

Read More: Female Medical Student Who Stabbed Man Is "Too Intelligent and Pretty" For Jail

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

How White Flight Can Be Reversed

July 7, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Since at least the 1960s, more and more people of European descent have been fleeing the unwanted, invasive and often crime-riddled presence of non-whites. At the end of the 1980s, my parents left the Parisian suburb of Créteil after Arab drug dealers had taken over the neighborhood and sent their sons en masse to the local public school.

In the US, suburbanization has been an answer to mandatory busing and anti-"discrimination" policies. As blacks were pushed in or allowed to invade peaceful places, whites abandoned these en masse as well. Now the suburbs, in addition to being isolating and expensive, are targeted as well by unruly non-whites and the anti-white media that defends them.

Most cases of migration today are non-whites invading places whites have built and whites fleeing them. Yet there are some exceptions to this depressing trend. These exceptions are at best moderately inspiring: as we will see, they have been caused by the kind of hypocrite liberals who loathe us, too. But even then, they show that white dispossession is not a fatality and that, with a bit of will and political-bureaucratic power, positive urban policies can be pursued.

Examples of when the invaders are more wealthy than those who flee

Paris, France

For ages, the “City of Lights” had blue- as well as white-collar populations. Parisians ranged from bums to billionaires. Then, from the 1970s onwards, the factories were sent in other countries, automatized or simply shut down, thus reducing the former workers to pauperized welfare recipients.

Middle-classers did not care much until they noticed the growing price of everything, rents and daily shopping, coupled with a shortage of employments. Slowly, but surely, Paris became too expensive for them—and when they considered going to close suburbs, they noticed these had been made inhabitable by alien African populations.

Thus many former Parisians are forced to live either in a very far-away periphery, beyond the non-white masses that occupy the immediate surroundings of the city, or more or less among them and forced to do their best to ignore their offences.

So far it could be thought of as another case of white flight. But there is more. The first cause of exodus here has not been non-whites, as in other cases, but the typical “gentrification” phenomena where a left-leaning, globalist and wealthy upper middle class appropriates a neighbourhood. Several previously “popular” districts had their flats bought off by marketers, executives, mainstream journalists, “non-profit” white collars and other sons of the so-called information age. This rather peculiar class attracted organic retailers, “trendy” hipster places, and drove the rents and life prices up, thus forcing the less wealthy out.

Look at the Pigalle area. Fifteen years ago, it was Paris’ first red light district. There were plenty of nightlife, sex-shops and street hookers going along with bars and clubs. Drug trafficking and casual violence were part of the district. Nights were noisy and streets become dirty on Saturday and Sunday mornings. Because of all this, flats there were available at a cheap price. More and more of them were bought by upper middle class nationals and wealthy foreigners. These attracted Naturalia retailers, lounge bars, driving the square meter price up. More shops were bought off and turned away from wild nights and prostitution.

Minister of Interior Nicolas Sarkozy, although despised by the champagne left and constantly criticized by mainstream media, did their bidding by repressing street prostitution—thus contributing to making Pigalle more bourgeois, more "artsy", more trendy-but-not-too-raunchy, more like all other hipster areas.

Before the gentrification, many Arab pimps and other related crooks swarmed there. Now, it may be said that Pigalle lost its soul, but these criminals are gone. What worked against the working class can also work against chronic parasites and offenders.

In passing, note that highly lib-fashionable events such as the Gay Pride and Paris Plage motivated the expelling of bums from the banks of Seine. The Right would have been "fascist" had it done that. When the left did, it did so with the moral backing of "non-profit" organisms and without media scandal.

New York, USA

The Big Apple has long been famous for its low-white, high-crime neighbourhoods. Those who do not live into the Bronx have mythologized it as a cradle of the "vibrant" hip-hop culture—and many who live elsewhere also managed to extract juicy crime or violence stories from it. The same can be said about other famous areas such as Harlem and Time Square.

Indeed, during the 1960s, these districts went down into a spiral of crime—and uncontrolled immigration. Yet, later, things have changed. During the 1990s, Republican mayor Rudy Giuliani enforced a tough policy against crime: massive police forces were deployed, "zero tolerance" meant a highly efficient determent even for minor offences, and the same murder rate that had quadrupled during the 1960-70s has been divided by three.

From 2002 to 2013, Republican mayor Michael Bloomberg pursued the same policy. He is known as a "staunch proponent" of Stop-And-Frisk, something liberals used to mount a huge attack over Trump but seem to have curiously tolerated when it benefited to New York.

Now that two Republicans did everything they could to secure a nice environment for their champagne liberal citizens, it happens that the former black ghetto South Bronx is being colonized by white—and (((white)))—hipsters. Some clever developers, such as Keith (((Rubenstein))), and local actors such as Ted (((Weinstein))), happen to be related with the growth of coffee shops and trendy organic retailers.

After all, a neighbourhood that has been "cleaned" by friendly senior officials and where space is still cheap happens to be a good place to take over.

Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

Brazil is famous for its endemic crime and wide favela problem. Rio de Janeiro, the old imperial capital and most famous city of the country, had its favelas immortalized in movies such as Cidade de Deus (2002) and Tropa de Elite (2007). Stuck between the Atlantic Ocean and mountains, Rio is a place where space is scarce. Favelas grew illegally on mountainsides and have a long track record of violence, poverty, and numerous children from bad boys and teen mothers.

Yet Rio had still something more. It was a "cool" city. The favelas were barely livable for foreigners, but their movie exposure made them "cool" too. Then, it just happened that the militarized police corps commissioned with the favelas cracked down on them, killed most gang leaders, and would only let live the faveleiros who would dabble in drugs but not in weapons. When the tropa de elite completed its tough job, a proximity police corps was installed to endure that the favela would remain calm.

Guess what happened next? Once pacified, these places were still a bit messy, but they benefited from a privileged localization and low prices. Gringos, followed by some cariocas, started to rent places in favelas. Yes—even favelas can witness this same phenomena. Then…

> Seen as unexpansive to foreigners, prices now frighten old dwellers. According to the president of the Association of Residents of Vila Vidigal, Marcelo da Silva, the arrival of ‘gringos’ and the [sociological] reshaping of the favela were accompanied by a substantial increase of life costs, which make access more difficult to lower classes.
>
> “To those who come from the outside, paying R$800 or R$1.000 [approximately $250-300] of rent is an excellent deal. But to those who are from here this is expansive. Now, who could before rent a house for all his family needs to remain in a kitchenette or leave the place”, Silva said.

Also, the same upper middle-class leftists whom you can see in Tropa de elite gloating about Foucault, “repression”, “alienation” and “social work” and despising the “fascist” police joined the wave of foreigners who appropriated the pacified favela.

São Paulo, Brazil

In contrast with Rio, São Paulo is a wide city with a lot of space left. Opportunities to grow are far from scarce, and favelas and small homes can still be found there abundantly.

Still, the phenomena we are concerned with happened here at least once. During the 1970s, the powerful (((Klabin))) family managed to get a particular district “benefit” from a policy of “un-favelization”, which actually means that a then-tolerated favela was no more so and had its inhabitants expelled by the police.

The Klabin and (((associates))) then bought and sold the plots. Today, the area is officially referred to as Chácara Klabin and ranks among the most expensive in São Paulo, although its public parts are windy and inhospitable. (The private condominiums are much better.) Most of its inhabitants are of (((Lithuanian))) origin, and the French high school there has its private security provided by a company called "Hagana", which means "defense" in Hebrew.

When middle-class useful idiots invade a neighborhood (gentrification)

All of the previous examples involved wealthy, well-connected urban dwellers, who may be briefly mentioned but never attacked by the media. And none of them prevented the broader trend of immigrants invading working-class or middle-class white spaces, marked increase of crime, and subsequent white flight.

The first step of the bobo conquest of a neighbourhood is the eradication of violent crime by an efficient and rather harsh policy. The liberal double standard is blatant here: criminals benefit from near impunity when they attack working-class and middle-class whites. When they turn previously peaceful, but not bourgeois bohemian neighbourhoods into slums, either the police turns a blind eye or Leftist judges give lenient sentences, if at all.

However, everything changes when crime happens to the upper middle class that serves top globalists or to the globalists themselves. In 2006, a Black Panthers-style small group just had to show itself en masse on a symbolic Jewish street in Paris, without even hitting anyone or destroying any property, to be promptly dissolved by authorities. The average white guy can die off far from the cameras, but whoever you are, do not dare to even disturb the one percent!

No country for black identitarians if they rebel against their usual masters. Raping white girls is OK though

A key moment comes once crime has been successfully eradicated. The neighbourhood has become safe, but is still cheap due to its historical reputation. Real estate developers and market-sassy people take advantage of this cheapness to nibble the place. Organic markets and trendy bars open, and the costs of square meter/foot values increase.

Some non-whites depending on welfare may still be there, but they won't be able to do what they please anymore in the streets, and may even be quietly encouraged to find themselves a new dwelling. Then the media notices that crime has fallen and that "gentrification" is happening, because all this just happened, you know.

Depending on whether they pretend to be radical or dwell in the mainstream of the mainstream, leftists will either pretend to have nostalgia for the "popular area" of before or gloat on how "revitalized" and "vibrant" the place has become, although both benefit equally for the new state of things and did nothing to prevent it.

When criminals and chronic welfare recipients flee, they go to the actually popular or middle class suburbs, thus only displacing the unruliness bourgeois bohemians have chased away.

A model at all?

Urban liberals deep down

All in all, the pattern I have been describing is a mixed bag. On the one hand, many working- and middle-class whites and honest non-whites have been chased away by this ruthless dynamic. I also cannot feel at ease with the copious amount of champagne liberal hypocrisy at play here: the same who virtue-signal by caring noisily about criminals and rapefugees can show a merciless will to repress or chase the very same people away when appropriating a new backyard.

On the other hand, the sheer possibility of taking an efficient stance on crime and doing Reconquista is enthralling. It shows that white dispossession is not a fatality and can be successfully reverted.

Read Next: How Elites Are Getting Rich From Moving Third-World Immigrants Into American Suburbs

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Men Who Love Sex Dolls Are A Grim Sign That Sex Relations Are Beyond Repair

July 7, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Getting down to business with realistic dolls is pretty weird. However, they do sell, so what's the deal?

Better than nothing?

Davecat is living with his wife and their bisexual girlfriend. That might be the dream lifestyle for many, except that they're RealDolls (they're more lifelike in appearance than store mannequins, but still within "uncanny valley" territory). Davecat created elaborate backstories for their relationships. He posts online about their imaginary social life. To his credit, he's well aware they're not "organic women"—or to put it more bluntly, they're not real.

Davecat and others this deep (if you'll pardon the expression) into silicone girlfriends call themselves iDollators. He hopes one day sex robots will take realism to the next level. In case you were wondering, he's neither a virgin nor a 600-pounder.

Perhaps it's different only in degree from dildos, vibrators, and cucumbers available to women for ages. Although it's not highest on today's bizarro-meter, carnal knowledge with a doll just doesn't appeal to me. Despite my unenthusiasm, I'll hear him out.

Why would anyone want to bang dolls?

Davecat cites several reasons:

> A synthetic will never lie to you, cheat on you, criticize you, or be otherwise disagreeable. It's rare enough to find organics who don't have something going on with them, and being able to make a partner of one is rarer still.

I'll concur that finding someone who is compatible, honest, and low-drama isn't always easy. Still, that's no reason to give up.

> …I didn't ever want to be That Guy Who's Being Aggressively Persuasive. So instead of asking whatever lass I was with to consider me as a boyfriend, I simply wouldn't force the issue.

Where do I begin? I need a beer…

> We've all seen relationships where things start out fantastically, and then just end up falling apart. A friend of mine just got divorced after 17 years of marriage. That's an enormous investment of time, money, and emotion, and I'm not interested in having someone in my life who may bail at any time, or who transforms into someone unpleasant. Ultimately, getting romantically involved with an organic woman doesn't seem worth it to me.

He's giving the "glass is half empty" case, but yanno…

> I was seeing an organic lass—a coworker… Our relationship started out alright, but several months into it, whenever I'd attempt to get together after work with her, she'd always have something come up. I was beating myself up over it when I realized: Why am I wasting my time trying to get her to hang out and be romantically involved with me, when I have a Doll who is in love with me at home? Plus, it was a bit of a contest with said coworker, as she was interested in two other blokes while she was seeing me.

Okay, granted, a doll won't flake on you or put you last in the rotation.

> Then there was the lass I bought a house with back in 2003. I was attempting to help her out of a bad relationship. She claimed to be one of my best friends. She wasn't the least bit romantically interested in me, but I thought that if I helped her and she and I lived under the same roof, eventually she'd view me more > favorably. Turns out that didn't happen, as I later discovered that she was a pathological liar with a coke addiction, and I moved out of the house after living there for only four months. That really drove home to me that I guess I'm too trusting with some organics.

Neither do they friend-zone you nor turn into coked-out zombies. During my Blue Pill days, I suffered from both problems, though fortunately not from the same woman.

> Gynoids and androids… would lack the qualities that make organics difficult to deal with. They would be pleasant, agreeable, non-judgmental, aesthetically and mentally pleasing, and more… The way I see things, your spouse should be easygoing and a joy to come home to… I think the best way to reach that goal is through humanoid robots.

Correction, I need two beers.

> Being in a relationship with a synthetic means that the organic is taking a stand against loneliness on terms which harm no one. Instead of being miserable, they're doing something about it, without having to waste time, money, and emotion playing silly games to win the fleeting affections of someone who might be wrong for them in the first place.

These are not my choices, though the libertarian argument makes sense here.

> Furthermore, it seems easier for women to find an organic male partner than it is for men to find an organic female partner. Women, by and large, are more selective than men are…

Davecat seems quite game-unaware, but that observation is impossible to miss.

> A lot of men are lonely because they're misogynist pricks, true, but a lot of other men are lonely because they don't meet women's expectations. The latter group may be entirely nice individuals, and would treat their girlfriends extraordinarily well, but they're shy, or unappealing on some level, or what have you.

He has it backwards. Obnoxious assholes are in great demand, defying all logic. Meanwhile, being nicer than warranted (in terms of reciprocal interest you've received) will get you shot down. Kindness without previous buy-in is worse than using "Tell me about the lambs, Clarice" for a pickup line. It's quite a bitter irony (though possible to work around) for guys determined to have a social life while remaining decent people.

Our social environment has gone to hell

Davecat is a man who has given up. He's found an acceptable (to him) substitute for women. Apparently banging dolls is just a new sexual marketplace safety valve. It's his life, but this seems a waste of time at best. Although learning game takes a lot of work, it's not quite like calculating orbital mechanics on an abacus.

Decades ago, the "iDollators" probably would've had regular love lives eventually leading to families. It used to be much easier for ordinary guys to find girlfriends who'd take them seriously and not bust their balls. That's the tragedy here.

Will sex dolls be the next big thing for involuntary celibates? Will this become a disruptive technology for the sexual marketplace? Only time will tell.

Feminists still don't get it

Some feminists have taken notice, and they're quite displeased (as always). Still, they hardly can argue against the exploitation of plastic objects. Actually, they're quite guilty of it themselves.

Milo Yiannopoulos had the following to say about this:

> Another reason men might be enthusiastic about female-free sex is obvious: the sociopathic, man-hating feminism we see so much of on television and in our newspapers today is turning men off dealing with women altogether. Constant whinging about "toxic masculinity," "manspreading," "mansplaining," the bogus gender pay gap and the absurd campus rape culture myth are pushing the sexes apart, fostering mistrust and fear. […]
>
> In response, men are simply checking out, giving up on women and retreating into porn and video games. I call it the "sexodus," and its immediate victims aren't men, but women, who are being consigned to singledom as men lose interest in them or are simply too exhausted or fearful of the social consequences of approaching girls romantically. […]
>
> [M]ost of the reason I went gay is so I didn't have to deal with nutty broads. Imagine how much worse they're going to get when the passive aggressive manipulation tactics stop working because the guy can get himself off with a thinner, hotter robot any time he wants to. They're going to go mental.

So there you have it. As I've suspected, not all gay guys were "born that way". Nasty attitudes and Princess Complex are creating sexual marketplace safety valves like porn and “escorts”, or even other men and sex dolls.

Really, this should be a wake-up call for feminists. They inflated the price of their precious goodies above sustainability, while polluting society with their neurotic hostility. The sooner feminists fade into oblivion, the better for everyone.

Read More: How To Deal With Intense Male Competition In The Sexual Marketplace

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Top 10 Manliest Movies of All-Time

July 8, 2017 | by Jimbo Jones | Link | Original Link

The 2017 summer movie slate might just be the least testosterone-addled in cinema history. Between the faux female-empowerment of Wonder Woman and Atomic Blonde, the enforced multiculturalism of The Fate of the Furious and Guardians of the Galaxy 2 and the syrupy juvenilia of the tertiary Cars and Despicable Me installments, there hardly seems to be anything showing at the local multiplex catered towards the refined, adult sensibilities of male viewers. Indeed, outside of Dunkirk, I can't think of a single movie coming out during the Memorial Day to Labor Day box office bonanza that's catered towards the traditional, masculine, movie-going masses.

With such scant options at the nearest neighborhood cineplex, now is a most opportune time to revisit some of the greatest, XY-chromosome-centric celluloid classics of yesteryear. Instead of exposing your children to an effete, effeminate Spider-Man, Tom Cruise's feigned attempts at displaying heteronormativity or identity politics-driven drivel like Detroit and The Dark Tower, why not treat them—and yourselves—to these manly movie masterpieces instead?

Thunder Road (1958)

You'll never see a movie like Thunder Road again. Robert Mitchum's cult classic is one of the greatest pro-masculinity movies ever, depicting a rugged individualist moonshiner fighting for his right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness against corrupt and crooked federal agents.

Devoid of nudity, vulgarities, graphic violence and on-the-nose progressive politics, Thunder Road simply tells the tale of a conflicted man following his conscience and standing up for his morals without demanding the audience agree lockstep with his own virtues. It's one of the best action movies and character dramas of the 20th century and an absolute masterpiece of libertarian/classical liberalism cinema; you owe it to yourself to see it at least once.

The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance (1962)

Featuring three of the manliest actors of all time—John Wayne, Jimmy Stewart and Lee Marvin—The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance is largely considered one of the best Westerns ever filmed, and for good reason.

The Wayne/Stewart dichotomy presents an interesting portrait of manhood, demonstrating the necessity for the rugged, individualist persona and the more cultured, intellectual mentality. Few movies out there do as splendid a job depicting what makes a constructively-aggressive male leader and what separates them from destructively-aggressive male leaders; if you want to show your kids what real men look like, this is one you need to add to your library A.S.A.P.

The Dirty Dozen (1967)

Forget The Avengers, forget Justice League, and definitely forget Star Wars – no movie has ever had a greater ensemble cast than this World War II masterpiece. Starring a literal manly actor Hall of Fame roster—Lee Marvin, Ernest Borgnine, Charles Bronson, Jim Brown, George Kennedy and Kojak himself, Telly Savalas, make up just half the team—this exquisite action classic might just have more per capita testosterone than all of the Expendables movies combined.

While the concluding chateau siege sequence is undoubtedly one of the greatest finishes in movie history, what really makes The Dirty Dozen stand out is its character development; if you're looking for a thrilling action movie with a smart script and top-notch acting, you won't find many rivaling this outstanding late '60s offering.

Emperor of the North Pole (1973)

Here's another great testosterone-enthused treat from director Robert Aldrich. Set during the Great Depression, Emperor of the North Pole (sometimes titled simply Emperor of the North in some prints) focuses on seasoned hobo Lee Marvin showing neophyte vagabond Keith Carradine the ins and outs of (illegally) hitching train rides.

Things take a turn for the worse when they decide to hop aboard a locomotive engineered by the psychotic Ernest Borgnine, who takes great pride in maintaining a stowaway-free operation – even if it means killing a few vagrants every now and then. The concluding knockdown, drag-out brawl between Marvin and Borgnine might just be the greatest fight in movie history – Lord knows, it's definitely the manliest.

Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia (1974)

You really can't talk about manly movies without talking about the manliest director of all-time, Sam Peckinpah, and this might just be his best (and most uncompromised) overall work. Starring the extremely-underrated Warren Oates, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia focuses on a U.S. military man who takes up a drug kingpin's offer to decapitate the Mexican lothario who deflowered his daughter.

Loading...

Of course, things go awry (no spoilers, but let's just say a rape scene involving country music singer Kris Kristofferson plays a prominent plot point) and by the time our protagonist finally gets a hold of the titular noggin, he's ready to embark upon the ultimate revenge fantasy road trip. There are a lot of great "vengeance is mine" movies out there, but as far as I'm concerned, none of them have surpassed this wild, woolly and unabashedly nihilistic action romp – it's definitely triple A viewing fare for when you're having a particularly bad week at the office.

Hard Times* (1975)

Charles Bronson could rightly be considered the manliest actor of all-time, and this fairly obscure boxing flick from the mid-'70s is all the evidence you need. The iconic Death Wish star plays a Depression-era vagrant who is good at one thing and one thing only: bare-knuckle boxing other hobos. Enter sleazy boxing promoter James Coburn, who quickly turns old Chuck into a barn-storming, bum-pummeling sensation who makes a mint shellacking vagabonds all over New Orleans.

This movie is a firm reminder of just how great Hollywood action movies used to be before the plague of cultural Marxism infected the box office; with exquisite acting and some of the best pugilist scenes in movie history, Hard Times is a delightful, character-driven ass-kicker with both brains and brawn.

Smokey and the Bandit* (1977)

Burt Reynolds was the last of the great, non-metrosexual movie stars who could actually act (sorry, Stallone and Arnold.) The great mustachioed one's signature role comes in one of the best action-comedies ever filmed, a rollicking yet reverent ode to the American trucker and a celebration of every red-blooded man's right to drink beer and drive as fast as they damn well please.

It's also an aggressively libertarian film, rooted in an abhorrence of stupid federal regulations and even stupider local authorities. Plus, it's the only time Sally Fields has ever actually looked hot in a movie, so it's probably worth watching it for that facet alone.

Sorcerer* (1977)

More so than just about anybody else, George Lucas is responsible for the emasculation of American movies. The runaway success of Star Wars ensured Hollywood would abandon the rough and tough, reality-based star vehicles of the 1970s—The Sting, Taxi Driver, The French Connection, etc.—thus ushering in an age of family-friendly fantasy yarns and merchandising-tie-ins-disguised as movies like E.T. and Back to the Future. William Friedkin's Sorcerer – which, as fate would have it, was released alongside the first Star Wars movie – shows us what mainstream moviemaking was like before the industry's mass infantilization and demasculinization.

A taut, nuanced, sophisticated thriller starring Roy Scheider as a man tasked with transporting a super-explosive delivery across the rocky terrain of South America, Sorcerer is a simple yet extremely engrossing, character-driven classic – and further proof that Hollywood was much, much more entertaining when they stuck to crafting entertaining movies instead of finding ways to indoctrinate audiences with their progressive (regressive?) ideological convictions.

Blue Collar* (1978)

Forget Grease and Saturday Night Fever, this is the film that embodied what the 1970s were really about. Richard Pryor turns in an astonishing, Academy Award-worthy dramatic performance as an auto worker caught up in a union conspiracy, with best pals Harvey Keitel and Yaphet Kotto doing a fantastic job playing his partners-in-crime.

Moreover, it's an excellent indictment of the times, showing how union greed, federal regulatory corruption and the degenerate vices of the American worker all came to a head to cause the spiritual death of America's once-proud auto industry.

Hardcore* (1979)

Rounding out the top ten is another movie helmed by Blue Collar director Paul Schrader. The nearly 40 year-old movie feels eerily prescient now, painting a bleak portrait of the end outcomes of second-wave feminism, free love and the post-Baby Boomer drug culture.

George C. Scott turns in perhaps the greatest performance of his elite Hollywood career playing a grieving Michigan father who slums his way through California's grimy porn industry to rescue his daughter from the clutches of a sex trafficker.

The final 20 minutes of the movie are among the most depressing ever filmed, demonstrating exactly what happens when father figures are discounted as "patriarchal oppressors" and traditional family values are discarded for so-called "sexual liberation" idealism.

Read More: You've Already Seen One Of The Greatest Red Pill Movies Ever Made

Jimbo Jones

Jimbo Jones is a nihilist ... but he's the nicest nihilist you'll ever meet.

Men Must Be Educated In The Classics If They Wish To Regain Masculine Fortitude

July 8, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Quintus recently sent me a review copy of his translation of Sallust's Conspiracy of Catiline and War of Jugurtha. Both chronicles take place during a turbulent period in Rome's history. It was an epoch when the glories of overseas imperialism caused new social strains at home. The republican constitution, long the bedrock of Roman society, was collapsing under the avarice and jealousy of a senatorial elite consumed by the new wealth and luxury it had reaped.

Sallust was harshly critical of this process and the nobility. He blamed them for the fracturing of the republic and its descent into civil wars, and this is reflective in both the Conspiracy of Catiline and War of Jugurtha.

Several of the speeches, from Memmius and Marius in particular, ring so contemporary that one would be forgiven for thinking that they are living people railing against the Washington swamp. When attacking the Roman elite and its willful misconduct of the war against Jugurtha, Marius says thus:

> My friends, compare me – a "new man" – with those arrogant nobles. What they are used to hearing or reading, I have either seen first-hand or have done myself. What they have gathered from books I have learned myself while serving as a soldier. Consider now whether you believe actions are worth more than words. They sneer at my common origins, and I at their uselessness. Before me lies my own fate; before them lies their disgrace. I believe there exists one universal > nature for all men, and that the bravest has the best pedigree. And if the fathers of Albinus and Bestia could be asked whether they would prefer to have begotten me or them, what do you think their answer would be if they truly wanted the best offspring?

>
> If by right they look down on me, let them also look down on their own ancestors whose nobility was based, like mine, on masculine virtue. They resent my occupying the office of consul: then let them resent my hard work, my integrity, and the dangers I have risked! For it is though these things that I have achieved my office. Men truly corrupted by arrogance live like this; it is as if they think nothing of your honors. But they seek these honors just the same, as if they lived their lives honorably. Delusional are the people who expect that these two completely different things are equal: the delights of idleness and the rewards of virtue. And when they deliver speeches in the senate or to you, they mostly deliver orations praising their ancestors. They think themselves more courageous by recalling these famous exploits. But it is just the opposite. The more distinguished their ancestors' lives are, the more pathetic is their own indolence.

If there's a more biting polemic that can describe our time, I'm not sure where it can be found.

Quintus worked hard on his translation to make Sallust's language burn as brightly in English as it did in the ancient Latin in which he composed. And good as Sallust's polemics are to read, greater still are his exhortations to virtue in men. As he says at the very start:

> All men who seek to be better than the animals ought to exert themselves with the greatest efforts, lest they pass their lives in silence as if they were beasts of > burden, which Nature has conditioned to be prostrate and subservient to their stomachs. All our powers are situated in our minds and bodies; we make use of the mind more for control, and the body for service. One of these we hold in common with the gods, and the other with the wild beasts. For me it seems more proper to seek glory through one's natural character than through the efforts of naked force and, since this life that we delight in is so short, to fashion a legacy for ourselves that is as lasting as possible. For glory derived from riches and appearances is transitory and brittle, but masculine virtue is pure and eternal.

These are the words that sum up why Quintus has worked so hard to translate Sallust and Cicero, and why the Classics are so important to reclaim.

The Classics vs. Moderns

Ancient historians, such as Sallust, Livy, and Plutarch, sought to inculcate their readers with lessons on fortitude and virtue. This is a stark contrast from today's educational regime, which seeks largely to cram students with as many facts as possible (most of which they'll forget anyway), and then teach them to hate themselves or to view themselves as victims on the side.

For the ancient historians, the inculcation of good character was just as important as understanding the facts. This may certainly have skewed their coverage, but even Thucydides, the most thoroughly modern of the ancient historians, stated at the start of his great history that the events of which he was writing were unprecedented, and that his work was "not designed to meet the taste of an immediate public, but was done to last forever."

Thucydides' account is full of character lessons provided in the cases of Pericles and the notorious and destructive arrogance of Alcibiades, who championed the ill-advised Sicilian expedition that crushed the power of Athens. The Peloponnesian War was so notable and so big in the mind of Thucydides, that he thought it crucial for the education of all future generations of men.

These sorts of lessons are too detached from modern education. As Quintus writes at the start of his translation of Sallust, the Classics had previously been given a central place in education, but that has declined precipitously since the middle of the 20th century, and I don't think it's a coincidence that since then, we have witnessed such phenomena as the mandated gender-bending of children and the invited invasion of Europe.

A civilization that has lost touch with its past and has no pride in itself or fortitude in its people will embrace all sorts of strange, destructive ideas, a phenomenon with which Sallust himself was all too familiar:

> But when the republic grew through labor and the application of justice, and great kings had been subdued in war; when barbarous peoples and mighty nations were brought to heel; and when Carthage, jealous of the Roman Empire, was destroyed root and branch and every land and sea lay open; then, at last, Fortune began to vent her disfavor and all began to become turbulent. Those who had easily borne labors, dangers, insecurity and bitterness now found that leisure and riches – so desirable in some situations – were instead a burden and source of woe. Thus first the love of money grew, and then the love of power as well; these things were essentially the building blocks of all evils. Greed overturned honesty, good faith, and other positive virtues; in their place it nurtured arrogance, cruelty, neglect of religious duty, and the idea that everything could be bought for a price.
>
> Worldly ambition compelled many to become deceitful: to have one sentiment in the heart yet a different one ready on the tongue, to make friends and enemies not on an objective basis, but on an estimation of monetary convenience; and to display a good face rather than a good character. These tendencies grew little by little, occasionally to be punished. Afterwards, when the infection spread like a contagion, the state was transformed, and a government that was among the most just and strong became inhuman and unbearable.

Return of Kings recently featured a post on moral relativism, a foundation of modern leftist thought. It should come as no surprise that as the Classics have declined in education, moral relativism rose. Cicero, whose On Duties was a standard school text and which Quintus also recently translated, anticipated moral relativism in some ways, and has a clever take on it:

> When a fissure opened up in the earth after a series of rains, Gyges descended into it. There he found the body of a dead man of huge proportions, with a gold ring on his finger. He removed the ring and put it on his own finger. When he turned the ring towards the palm of his hand, he was seen by no one, while he > himself was able to see everything. When he rotated the ring back to its original position, he again was able to be seen by other people.

>
> So, taking advantage of the opportunity created by this magic ring, he seduced the queen of Lydia and, with her as his accomplice, murdered the king of that country. He destroyed all whom he thought might oppose him, and neither was anyone able to see him as he went about these crimes. Thus, with the unexpected help of the ring he rose to become King of Lydia. But if a wise man had such a ring, he would no more think he could commit crimes than if he did not have it. For moral goodness and not secrecy for evil deeds is what good men seek.
>
> Herein lies the power of the magic ring concept and of this little fable: if no one were able to know or suspect when you do something for the sake of riches, power, domination, or sensual pleasure, and if such an action could forever be hidden from gods and men, would you do it?
>
> Introducing this little thought experiment is like torture to them [the doubters]. If they answer that they could indeed commit an evil act with impunity (i.e., to do what is most expedient for them), then they are basically admitting that they have bad characters. But if they deny that they could commit an undetected evil deed, then they are, in effect, conceding that all morally wrong things must without exception be avoided.

Cicero as Consul indicts Catiline in front of the Senate. What he failed to understand was that Catiline was a symptom of a failing system.

With texts like this now out of the schools, it’s little wonder that imagination has replaced reality, that hysteria and censorship has replaced debate, and that the feelings of groups competing in the victim Olympics have replaced the rights and obligations of free citizens in a republic with a common heritage, character, and identity. It is also little wonder that a generation of gender-bending freaks has arisen before our eyes and welcomes their own invasion and overthrow.

I can't be certain, but I think it was in no small measure that, because I was exposed to the Classics somewhat as a teenager, I avoided the fate of so many others of my generation. It is long since time that these texts and authors are reintroduced as one of the foundations of a young man's education. Quintus is doing a good job in this, and I recommend translations such as Sallust.

Read Next: Why Men Should Read The Works Of Sallust

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

Top 24 Country Songs From The Genre’s Five Best Singers

July 9, 2017 | by Johan Le Roux | Link | Original Link

Many modern Americans do not listen to country music, for some reason or another. They listen to a whole lot of other modern music garbage but claim that country music “sucks” or is “boring” or “old-school”. For the modern male (those living in America especially), I feel that it is especially important to start appreciating this genre of music for what it is.

In this article I will be outlining the main reasons why I believe that more red-pilled men should listen to country music, as well as my top five country music artists and their songs that I highly recommend.

Reason 1: Red pilled lyrics

Referring mainly back to the good ol’ days of country music – the era of Johnny Cash, Kris Kristofferson, and the like – I can honestly say that much of the lyrics are red pill as f*k.

After being introduced to this genre from a young age by my father, I slowly grew to enjoy country music for it’s simplicity, traditional elements, great lyrics, and red-pill truth that is revealed in many songs.

Among some of the red pill topics I’ve heard in country music lyrics are: struggling with temptation (sexual intimacy, booze, drugs, etc.), coping through times of hardship, knowing when to fight and when not to, being lonely, losing a father (or other relative), and many more.

Reason 2: Traditionally American/Canadian

Unlike modern music, country changes little and although you now have countries outside the USA producing their unique brands of country music (think Australia, South Africa) as well, it still remains an American- and Canadian-dominated genre.

Most country singers will be seen wearing cowboy uniforms, hats, etc. They still believe in sticking to American/Canadian roots and traditions. Even the female country singers must be some of the most feminized women you can find nowadays in the music industry (think the likes of Shania Twain, Ann Murray, Kacey Musgraves).

So if you consider yourself conservative and traditionally American but don’t listen to country music, you ought to be ashamed of yourself! Without further ado, I shall move on to the best country singers of all time and songs I recommend from each one:

1. Kris Kristofferson

My personal favorite, Kris Kristofferson has a gruff voice that he uses equally well for both telling stories and singing. His lyrics are about as red pilled as they get, so this is one country singer I highly recommend to newbies.

Best songs: 1. To Beat The Devil (temptation and struggle through hardship)

2. Help Me Make It Through The Night (loneliness, sexual desires)

3. Sunday Morning Coming Down (loneliness, boredom)

4. Why Me Lord (gospel song)

2. Johnny Cash

Johnny Cash is known as one of the greatest artists of all time, incorporating elements of rock and roll, rockabilly, blues, folk, and gospel into his music. He too, is a shining example of masculinity : he helped to dig his brother's grave, he was arrested seven times, and he served in the Air Force.

Best songs: 1. Understand Your Man (dealing with women's bullshit)

2. Solitary Man (loneliness, difficulty finding a good woman)

3. I Hung My Head (killing a man for no reason!)

4. Folsom Prison Blues (time spent in prison)

3. Kenny Rogers

Another great example of traditional masculinity, Kenny Rogers is also an iconic country artist and is a member of the Country Music Hall of Fame.

Best songs: 1. Coward of the County (message to son to not follow his footsteps)

2. Ghost of Another Man (seeing another man with his wife)

3. I Wasn't Man Enough (self-explanatory)

4. Lucille (woman leaving man with responsibilities at inopportune time)

4. Willie Nelson

A true veteran of the Country genre, this guy is renown for popularizing the “outlaw country” music genre. While he may be more liberal, as is evident by his use of marijuana and his activism for biofuels, he still remains fairly conservative in his songs, which mostly reflect upon earlier times (“cowboy” days). Most notable for his long locks of hair and his guitar “Trigger” which has a hole in it, and his American patriotism.

Best songs: 1. To All The Girls I’ve Loved Before (self-explanatory)

2. City of New Orleans (American pride)

3. My Heroes Have Always Been Cowboys (glorifying cowboys and their lifestyle)

4. Mammas Don’t Let Your Babies Grow Up To Be Cowboys (warning to mothers but encouragement to masculine men)

5. Pancho and Lefty (song about betrayal of Mexican outlaw Pancho Villa by his sidekick Lefty)

5. George Strait

Last but not least on this list, the so-called “King of Country” Mr George Strait, another alpha male cowboy country singer. This guy has undoubtedly looks made countless panties wet in his time and I’m sure continues to do so even today. Listed below are slightly more songs than the rest just due to this guy’s awesomeness.

Best songs: 1. All My Exes Live In Texas (self-explanatory)

2. Troubadour (about growing old)

3. The Fireman (different interpretations, but most common being that it’s a metaphor for a guy who bangs hot women or “puts them out”)

4. I Just Want To Dance With You (about not hesitating with women, taking the lead)

5. Cowboys Like Us (glorifying cowboy life)

6. Murder On Music Row (ode to dying traditional music and rise of degenerate modern music)

7. The Seashores of Old Mexico (about an outlaw finding refuge in Mexico)

Conclusion

The above mentioned country artists are merely five of the best. I realize that I have not mentioned ALL of the greats and I will address this in a future article. I will also be addressing different music genres and their respective red pill artists in future articles.

Read More: 5 Things Wrong With Modern Music

Johan Le Roux

Johan Le Roux is a born-again Red Piller from Pretoria, South Africa. Loves to spend his free time lifting, learning new skills, expanding his business, and reading. Doesn't have a website yet, but will soon...

Time Magazine’s Four Most Stupid And Insulting Covers

July 9, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Saying that the MSM is biased is about like saying that water is wet. Time Magazine is a repeat offender, constantly insulting the public with their propaganda.

Meltdown

Hillary still lost, so suck it!

The symbolism on the 8/22/2016 cover was glaringly obvious, but for a fuller explanation, we have:

> …Trump has continued to inflame audiences with controversial remarks this week — first, with his Second Amendment comment about his Democratic opponent Hillary Clinton… and more recently, calling President Barack Obama the "founder of ISIS…
>
> The illustration is simple and succinct, capturing the billionaire's face oozing down like a lit candle, with the spare cover line: "Meltdown."
>
> It was created by Edel Rodriguez, a Cuban-born artist known for taking on tough topics such as gun control, racial relations in the U.S. and gender equality.

Golly jeepers, I'm quite certain that Time chose this picture because of its measured ideological balance, right?

Their 10/13/2016 cover was quite similar, "Total Meltdown", showing The Donald reduced to a waxy puddle. This issue appeared shortly after the shocking revelation that he said "pussy" eleven years previously. However, their triumphant crowing was rather premature.

Better propaganda:

Now who's having a meltdown?

Yo Decido

The 3/5/2012 cover, subtitled "Why Latinos will pick the next President", was rather controversial. One of the twenty people pictured isn't Hispanic: the guy in the center of the top row (under the "M") is Eurasian. As he tells it, the photographers never explained what the pictures were going to be used for. That's not exactly a great way to avoid misunderstandings.

At least it wasn't as big a racial gaffe as eighteen years prior, when they digitally darkened OJ Simpson's mugshot on their cover. That made for quite a contrast at the news stands, since Newsweek ran the unaltered version.

Hey, Time editors: "Yo mama!"

Anyway, "Yo decido"—the first Spanish title of theirs—seems rather sketchy. It kind of suggests that Latino voters don't know English. (Imagine how a different cover would go over: "Wir wählen: Midwestern German-Americans might decide Romney's election".) Many are immigrants, but anyone eligible to vote passed a citizenship test which includes English proficiency. Given the contemporary nit-picky political climate, it's surprising that SJWs didn't have a meltdown about that.

On the other side of the coin, what's truly irritating is their blatant celebration of the leftist endgame strategy. Time's cover practically gloated about what their mass immigration policies have been doing. The Democratic Party has pushed population replacement policies ever since Ted Kennedy's 1965 immigration act. Since the influx of cheap labor drives wages down, they sold out blue collar workers, their former major power base.

The real reason was to import tens of millions who would bloc-vote for Democrats. Basically, mass immigration amounts to stuffing the ballot box. (That's exactly what politicians are doing in Europe too.) The Republicans have tried to horn in on the action—for example, consider Bush the Younger's silly campaign speeches in Spanish. Courting votes from what Republicans called "natural conservatives" failed completely.

Some leftist talking heads have crowed about the double bind they've forced on the Republicans: either they continue enabling mass immigration (giving Democrats even more bloc voters) or curtail it and alienate Hispanics (not that they'll switch parties anyway). If America's founding population—what the Constitution's preamble calls "our posterity"—falls below 50%, then electing candidates who will halt the demographic decline would become impossible. Further, Whites would lose control over the destiny of the country their forefathers built. Many leftists practically giggle like little girls about that one.

Better propaganda:

I'm sure MS13 is full of "natural conservatives".

Are You Mom Enough?

The topic is attachment parenting. More traditional styles include "free range" parenting (everything up through the 1980s) and "helicopter parenting" (shaping the millennial generation). In this case, attachment parenting could be called "Apache attack helicopter parenting" or "Brazilian jiu-jitsu parenting".

It's hard to make breastfeeding cringe-worthy…

So the big deal is that it showed the model standing with a rather defiant-looking pose while nursing her child. The kid happened to be nearly four years old at the time and was standing on a step-stool. It seems a little odd to put such a photo on the cover of Time. After all, periodicals showing titty on the front cover are usually sold in "24 hour news stands“, or sometimes behind the counters of gas stations in opaque plastic.

Nursing babies is natural, healthy, and quite tender (usually); that’s what sweater puppies are made for, right? However, that’s not quite the image conveyed by the photographers, who deliberately selected that pose. (Not pictured was her other kid, an adopted Ethiopian boy a year older who also got nursing privileges.) Anyway, I’m rather skeptical about it being a good idea to keep kids on the tit when they’re old enough to remember… paging Doctor Freud!

Attachment parenting is rather controversial. The mother indeed has strong convictions, such as doing volunteer work to assist Syrian refugees. However, again it was Time’s staff being aggressive about promoting the message. The title itself—“Are you mom enough?”—is equally as provocative as showing bare boobage on the cover of a MSM periodical. It’s insulting to imply that mothers not into Brazilian jiu-jitsu parenting are second-rate.

Anyway, surely it’ll make quite the conversation piece for when the kid is old enough to bring a girlfriend home: “Look at this! Your new boyfriend was on the cover of Time.”

Better propaganda:

How’s this oldie for propaganda? Best of all, it shows nursing done the right way.

The New Face of America

On November 18, 1993, Christmas came early for the globalists. Using a morphed image, Time’s “special issue” depicted what they believe future humanity should be, after the multicultural pressure cooker extinguishes genetic uniqueness. The picture doesn’t look White, Black, Hispanic, Asian, American Indian… it’s nothing at all. If that wasn’t enough, it’s unclear if the image depicts a soft butch woman or an effeminate man. This is what they think the future should be.

Leftists say races don't exist, but they're sure in a hurry to destroy every last one of them.

This issue is full of articles praising mass immigration and multiculturalism; for instance:

> Intermarried…with Children
> For all the talk of cultural separatism, the races that make up the U.S. are now crossbreeding at unprecedented rates.
>
> Miami: the Capital of Latin America
> A city that was once a languid resort town is now a pulsating center of international trade and pop culture
>
> The Global Village Finally Arrives
> The New World Order is a version of the New World writ large: a wide-open frontier of polyglot terms and post national trends

Could they possibly be any more blatant about their rotten agenda? This is what globalists have always wanted, be they flaming Communists like Leon Trotsky, ultra-wealthy shmucks like Richard Coudenhove-Kalergi (and the banksters who backed him), sickos in academia, or Eurocrats in Brussels.

As one very underappreciated former British MP put it way back in 1963:

> They talked of what they called "multiracialism", which was simply a universal mix-up: Take humanity, put it in a bag, shake it together, and heaven knows what would come out. They wanted to get rid of what existed, all the little grey people of the world who hate the beautiful diversity of human development. They always want to get rid of the natural, the noble and the beautiful. They wanted to get rid of it; they wanted to make all nature as grey as themselves. It was their > deep instinct.

>
> We were always opposed to that. We said, “No, it won’t work, and it’s undesirable that it should work!” We can live in peace and friendship, side by side, in separate nations and separate developments; but we cannot have the mix-up of peoples and races who are widely different and divergent. It will lead to nothing but trouble!
>
> This policy of mixture, what does it really mean? It doesn’t mean “freedom”, it doesn’t mean “brotherhood”, or any of the cant and humbug which is taught. That is just a mask for some of the finest forces on earth to exploit the peoples in the future as they have done in the past…

Want to stick it to the globalists? Date your own people exclusively, have children who look like you, teach them about their heritage, and warn them about cultural Marxism and the lying media.

Better propaganda:

Leftists call images like this “hate”. They claim to support diversity, but really want to destroy the world’s diversity.

My books are available at Smashwords and Amazon.

Read More: How Mainstream TV Uses Emotional Triggers To Sway Political Opinion

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How To Choose Fashion Accessories

July 9, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

By this point, if you read my articles diligently, you will have some idea of how to dress yourself. You will know that fit and cut are everything, you will know how to be interchangeable with your clothing choices, and you will know how long and proportionate your cuffs and wrists and collars have to be. Or at the very least, you'll know well enough to let a tailor deal with those.

But if you want to really be a cut above the rest in terms of clothing, you need to pick something that will likely make you a bit apprehensive. That being, accessories!

Top hats?

I am, of course, a bit apprehensive myself, since the whole idea of “peacocking” and “Wearing a great big ‘I’m a retard'” sign has not yet mercifully died— as I will likely detail in a later edition of my “PUAssholes” videos. I do have a bit of a grudge against the Mystery Method and its proprietor.

I told you once before that my fashion advice will never involve peacocking, and I stand by that. The key is symmetry and synergy of all the parts of your outfit, combining to a greater whole. Accessories are just cherries on top, they cannot save a crappy foundation.

Almost as important is the idea that an accessory should be functional first and stylish close second. As you go down the list, you’ll notice that many of these accessories serve a practical purpose.

Hats

A man should wear a hat for a few reasons:

1. They’re useful, a good hat protects you from bad weather and enhances your dress.
2. It sets you apart (“it’s better to be looked over than overlooked”)
3. They make you look taller, for those readers who are shorter.

As usual, the hat should match the clothes being worn and the weather, and in general they should only be worn with a jacket. Don’t be that sperg wearing a fedora with a t-shirt.

Don’t be this guy

Or this guy

Better

Watches

Not so useful nowadays, watches are still a timeless accessory, serving as the masculine equivalent to the bracelet. The most formal watches are simple metal, with leather bands and one set of hands, but a big honking fancy one is good as well. Bear in mind that a “black tie” event means no watch.

The previous two pictures are acceptable formal watches. This one is not.

Rings

Besides your wedding ring, rings can symbolize membership, wealth or extravagance, depending on what type. School and fraternal rings are membership rings, but in general you should only wear one ring on each finger at most, otherwise it looks kind of tacky.

As a side note, ignore that “skull ring brass knuckle crap” that some people propagate. Brass knuckles are kept an inch ABOVE the finger for a reason, punching with a ring is a great way to break your fingers.

Despite the big birth stone, don’t punch with this.

A more formal ring

A bit ostentatious

Cufflinks

First of all, I should explain what they are: they’re shirt cuff fasteners that are only needed for French cuff shirts. The key here is, as usual, to be interchangeable: simple colors, metal cufflinks and solid color cuff knots (like monkey fists that go into the French cuff holes)

Sunglasses

They should be clean and compliment the face. You should have two sunglasses: one that are formal, for suits, and a cheaper disposable pair for boating/the beach. Athletic wraparounds are good for sports, but NEVER wear them with a suit or anything above casual attire.

Decent formal sunglasses

Athletic sunglasses

No. Avoid the lipstick as well.

Tie Bars, Chains, and Tacks

These are a great example of purposeful accessories: all three keep your tie from flapping in the breeze (bear in mind that the tie is NOT an accessory, it is an integral part of formal wear, and should be treated as such).

These tie accessories add a bit of pizzazz, and remember that interchangeability is always the key, so it is best to wear a simple gold or silver tie bar. They are by nature a bit rigid, so you can wear it at a bit of an angle.

Tie chains are…a chain, but work the same way.

Tie tacks suck, avoid them.

And with that, you have a decent primer on fashionable men's accessories. Since this is such a big topic, I will add to it in the future.

Read More: How To Choose, Buy, And Shoot A Shotgun

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

12 Ways Leftism Embraces Weakness, Disease, Victimhood, And General Mediocrity

July 10, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Leftism is not an ideology that works towards achieving '300 Spartans' style six-pack abdominal muscles. Nor is it an ideology that finds having sexually transmitted diseases like chlamydia something to be even slightly ashamed about.

Leftism loves victimhood over accepting any personal responsibility for one's own misfortunes and pitiful position in life. Frankly, the whole spectrum is designed to just embrace mediocrity, ugliness, ill health, degeneracy, flagrant falsehoods, and poverty for all (but at least they'll be equal!).

This article will explore twelve reasons why leftism is the preferred pathway to nowhere, and maybe even the eventual collapse of Western civilization.

1. Fat Acceptance

Australian landwhale Rebel Wilson promoting her “plus size” clothing

Leftism embraces fat acceptance, which encourages people to be proud and comfortable in their abhorrent obesity, rather than emphasizing the importance of a healthy weight for the sake of increased life expectancy, sound mental health, having an agreeable appearance, and success in the dating market.

2. Tattoos, Piercings, And Fake Hair Colors Are “Cool”

Leftism embraces cotton candy inspired hair colors, disgusting nose piercings, and degenerate tattoos with gusto. Unfortunately, many of these hive mind leftists are forever coasting in financial purgatory, as their poor choices of “individuality” turn off most lucrative employers and (for women) good husband material.

3. Worship Of Homosexuality

We’re so happy for their biological dead-end and high risk of AIDS!

Leftism embraces homosexuality and gay marriage like it is the second coming of the messiah. While homosexuals are deserving of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness just like everyone else in an enlightened and peace-loving country, their lifestyle should not be flaunted and praised in the public sphere in any manner for the sake of a healthy society.

Extinction of the human race and the proliferation of degenerative venereal diseases would be the only endgame which would result from widespread homosexuality. As for pro child-bearing and AIDS-resistant straight pride, leftists would consider that an act of “hate”.

4. Wearing One’s Mental Illness As Some Sort Of Badge Of Honor

5 Essential Ways to Support the Autistic Community in Autism Acceptance

Leftism embraces various mental illnesses and disorders like Autism, Asperger's Syndrome, or Depression like they are something to be shared with the whole world, and deserving of some kind of bravery medal.

While private acceptance and seeking help with these disorders is encouraged, they do not need to be flaunted to the entire world like some kind of desirable victimology merit badge. Much like homosexuality, these conditions are detrimental to society at large.

5. Thinking That "Love" Will Defeat Terrorism And Bigotry

Weeeeee! My Burning Man pinwheel bicycle of "Love" will defeat those terrorist trucks of "Hate"!

Leftism embraces the impotent concepts of "love trumps hate" or "all you need is love".

However, “love” is just simply an emotion-dominated biochemical reaction in the human brain which causes people to make affectionate long-term decisions based upon short-term attractions (often ending in disappointment).

Since leftists are driven more by emotions rather than facts and logic, calling for “love” at the expense of any sound reasoning is a ‘progressive’ duty. Maybe those ~~nearly always Muslim~~ terrorists will just go away if they carry on as usual, change their Facebook avatars, and light candles of love for England and France.

6. Thinking That “Awareness” Will Actually Solve Something

Exactly. It leads to nowhere.

Leftism embraces “awareness” like it is the end-all be-all for any kind of social problem. Think breast cancer awareness, autism awareness, depression awareness, and any other negative phenomena you can think of. But here is the million dollar question that leftist virtue signalling has no answer for. Will all these “awareness” campaigns actually lead to a cure?

7. Browbeating And Lecturing White Males

Leftism embraces guilt-tripping, browbeating, and demonizing heterosexual white males at seemingly any given opportunity. Rather than trying to emulate the success (or express any sense of gratitude) towards WASP culture, which is responsible for ending slavery, creating 90% of relevant technology and medicine, and maintaining 90% of the world’s most prosperous countries, shaming them into self-loathing is a ‘progressive’ pastime.

What kind of world do they want white men to maintain? Haiti? Saudi Arabia?

Loading…

8. Thinking Everyone But Straight White Males Are Victims And Under

Threat

(1:39 – C'mon guys you aren't saying "love" enough. Say it just a few more times!)

Leftism embraces the absurd notion that whenever something doesn't go their way, like Donald Trump winning the U.S. presidency, then some kind of oppressive white male patriarchy must have been at work. Blacks, Latinos, Asians, Muslims, gays, transgenders, women, immigrants, and disabled people should all now be very afraid, and consider themselves to be under serious "threat" (but from whom and what?).

But don't worry, for "love trumps hate". Let love overwhelm them!

9. Thinking That Income Inequality Is A Grave Injustice

Leftism believes that inequality of any kind is an abomination to the ideals of a progressive utopia. Female Starbucks baristas should be getting the exact same paychecks as male vascular surgeons, otherwise everyone is living in a greedy and oppressive capitalist wreck!

However, anyone with any common sense (which is lacking in leftist thought) will realize that income inequality is inevitable in a free market society, which is by the way the most successful type of society the world has ever seen. Austrian economist Peter Klien gives an explanation on this phenomenon here, and does so in a soft and soothing voice to make sure that petulant overgrown left-wing children can try and understand.

> (0:39) "Inequality, meaning differences of talent, of taste, of temperament, is sort of fundamental to the human condition. All of us are different, all of us have different interests and different abilities. Because in a free market, the returns to our abilities, the money that we generate, the wealth that we accumulate, is tied > to our individual characteristics. We wouldn't expect income or wealth to be distributed evenly across all people at all times."

10. Thinking People Are "Ignorant" For Noticing Differences Between Races

Elderly SJW Jane Elliot "destroying" any semblance of objective reality

Leftism embraces the concept that race is just a "social construct", and that there is absolutely no differences between human beings other than the amount of pigment in their skin. Didn't you know that Australian Aborigines are just the same as the Japanese and Swedes in their intellectual, civilization maintaining, and personal hygiene characteristics? They can build Saturn V rockets too if you just give them the chance!

If you stray from this mode of thinking then you are "ignorant" (despite hilariously being the total opposite of the definition of ignorant), and that word will be repeated seemingly endlessly.

11. Excusing Rampant Black Crime

Poor decision making and poor life choices led to this collage. Not "racism".

African-Americans have the highest crime rates of any ethnic group in the entire western world by a considerable margin, and primarily contribute to the U.S. having some cities registering on "world's most dangerous cities" lists while culturally similar nations like Australia, New Zealand, Canada, Ireland, and the United Kingdom simply do not.

Leftism embraces the concept that high black crime rates can be blamed squarely on an outside force. "Systemic Racism" (despite lower Asian-American arrest rates compared to whites) and poverty are the usual suspects, while poor foresight, more aggressive tempers, and lower levels of impulse control which are all correlated to lower average IQ's is never considered. That's would be racist of course.

12. Excusing Islamic Terror And Muslim Bigotry

Yes…… keep letting us in….. you won't regret it

Leftism has embraced the religion of Islam with open arms, at the complete expense of the Christian traditions and values which have permeated all western countries for either centuries or entire millennia. This is perhaps the most retarded of all leftist agendas, and the one which will backfire significantly once Islam has the demographics to exert great power in (formerly) western cities, as we have now seen with London's Sadiq Khan.

Despite being portrayed as a victim group by the left, Islam is the absolute antithesis of everything that western liberalism stands for. They are against women's liberation, they despise homosexuals, they despise social degeneracy (ok that's not too bad), they don't look favorably upon non-Muslims, they are super patriarchal, and they aren't out protesting terror attacks in western countries caused by their kinsmen.

Islam is a strong entity which seeks to subjugate the weak, and that is exactly—as the rest of the list shows—what leftism embraces: pure weakness.

Read Next: Sweden's Fall To Leftism Is A Cautionary Tale For The Western World

John Carver
John Carver is a four year ROK veteran with over fifty articles of SJW-triggering truth bombs on archive. You can follow him on Twitter if you are so inclined.

How To Develop A Rock-Solid Frame That Women Can’t Resist

July 10, 2017 | by Avery Hayden | Link | Original Link

“There is little that can withstand a man who can conquer himself.” – Louis XIV

What is a strong frame? In any social interaction, one person is reacting more than the other. One person needs more approval, validation, and acceptance from the other person than vice versa. Whoever is reacting less has the stronger frame. Whoever has the stronger frame has more leverage and social power.

External factors influence this dynamic. Research has found, for example, that subordinates tend to match the vocal patterns of their superiors, but superiors do not match the vocal patterns of their subordinates.

However, ultimately, a truly strong frame doesn’t rely on titles or external status, it is something you carry with you wherever you are and with whomever you are interacting with.

What A Strong Frame Isn’t

A strong frame isn’t being nice to make a girl like you. It isn’t using lines to appear ‘hard-to-get’ to make her chase you. A strong frame isn’t trying to seem unreactive so that people react to your strong frame.

That last one is especially important. You can’t try to have a strong frame. Affirming, “I have a strong frame,” is really just admitting to yourself that you don’t think your frame is strong enough. Pretending you don’t care is showing that you care too much. You can’t fake a strong frame and you can’t force it. It is unconscious, it is emotional, it is a part of who you are. You either have a strong frame or you don’t.

Is It Pointless To Try To Develop A Strong Frame?

Fuck no. Building a strong frame is one of if not the most important things you can do. But it’s important to know that a weak frame isn’t something you can fix simply by reading theory. It’s something you can only develop through experience. A strong frame is a personal quality that is earned.

The difference between a weak frame and a strong frame is the difference between the veteran CEO and the recent college grad who’s trying to climb the corporate ladder. The difference between a weak frame and a strong frame is the difference between the hardened soldier who’s seen combat time and again and the guy who’s fresh out of training. The difference between a weak frame and a strong frame is the difference between the guy who’s read 10 pickup books but never goes out and the guy who’s been approaching 10 women every single day for months.

Forged By Pain

You develop your frame by putting yourself through social pressure (also known as tension or discomfort), again and again and again. Each time you do this, you come out the other side a little bit more grounded, a little bit less reactive, a little bit stronger.

You go out and meet women to get laid, obviously, but instead of focusing on getting laid on any particular night, you focus on taking the actions that will strengthen your frame. It's not about the girl, it's about you and who you are becoming.

This mindset has many advantages. First, going out to get laid can be needy, it's about getting something external (this way of thinking is often reflective of a weak frame). Instead, going out to build your frame isn't about taking something. It's about expressing your masculine energy and becoming a better man. Second, when you go out to strengthen your frame, you're going to get better results with women, both short-term and long-term.

You develop your frame by straining it, testing it, challenging it. Your frame is a psychological muscle, and to build it up you have to break it down by putting it under pressure. This means that when you go out with the intention of developing your frame you're going to take very different actions than you would otherwise.

To strengthen your frame, the right action is the action that challenges you and makes you experience a certain level of self-doubt.

If you're frame is weak enough that you eject from interactions as soon as women indicate a slight hint of disinterest (a lot of guys do this); then your mission is to stay in your interactions and to withstand that discomfort as long as possible. Not because it will help you fuck that particular girl, but because it will make you a stronger person (to be fair, sometimes it does help you fuck that particular girl, too).

If you have trouble opening girls who are in big groups or are with guys, the proper action is to approach those sets because your fear is a reflection of a crack in your frame. Your frame is weak wherever there is fear, and by intentionally leaning into situations that trigger your fear, you will conquer the weaknesses in your frame.

The exact implications of this approach to game are determined by your level of experience. At a beginner level, you might strengthen your frame by going out every day (instead of just watching videos of other guys picking up girls). If you're an intermediate you can develop your frame by trying to close every girl you talk to; you might try to pull every girl you meet or you might try to get every girl's number (even when a girl clearly isn't that into you). If you're legitimately advanced you might develop your frame by approaching and trying to pull every single nine and ten that you see while you're out.

The Paradox Of Outcome-focus

The irony here is that when you go out and your main agenda is to pull a girl you are actually much less likely to pull than if you go out to strengthen your frame. This is because when you go out with an agenda to pull a girl it's hard not to go on defense.

When you're talking to a girl that you've decided you should pull, it's easy to hold back and play it safe. For example, you might not say things that are polarizing, you might avoid physicality, or you might hesitate to lead because those actions risk 'losing'. Taking risks might fuck up your opportunity with that particular girl. Going on defense is one of the worst things you can do when it comes to picking up girls.

Girls want a guy who's on offense. They want the guy who does take risks, the guy who does try to pull her, the guy who asserts himself unapologetically as a man. It just so happens that the actions that put you on offense are the same actions you must take to strengthen your frame.

Common Sense

Confucius say, “Don’t be an idiot.”

There’s an important nuance here that some guys misunderstand. Building a strong frame doesn’t mean being intentionally uncalibrated in an antagonistic way to show how free from outcome you are. I’ve seen this, guys who define having a strong frame as purposely ignoring how a girl feels. If you’re scaring girls or making them afraid that you’re going to hurt them, they’re not going to fall into your frame.

This antagonistic approach is a form of trying way too hard, which is actually a symptom of a weak frame. It’s putting on a ‘tough guy’ mask to prove how little you care about getting rejected. If every girl you talk to is uncomfortable, you’re trying too hard to have a strong frame. Getting rejected on purpose (whether consciously or unconsciously) is not going to strengthen your frame. There’s a certain level of common-sense and calibration that needs to be taken into consideration here.

Conclusion

Each time you challenge yourself by intentionally facing social pressure and barreling through discomfort you are taking an important step towards developing a rock-solid frame that will make you attractive to most women in an immediate and visceral way. Women can feel a genuinely strong frame, it literally turns them on.

Not only will women be more attracted to you when you have a strong frame, but you will also be less likely to self-sabotage your interactions. The stronger your frame, the less you care about rejection, and therefore, the more likely you are to take the risks that will get the girl, and the next one.

Read More: The Battle To Maintain Frame Control

Avery Hayden
After years of video game addiction Avery decided he'd replace Night Elves with living, breathing women. After approaching thousands of women and getting a degree in psychology, he put both skillsets to use with his website, Red Pill Theory , which offers dating advice with a scientific edge. You can also check out his books Zero Fucks Givenand The Trial: Transform Your Dating Life in Eight Weeks on Amazon with the above links.

Blue Pill Losers Are Invading The Digital Nomad Community And Turning It Into A Safe Space

July 10, 2017 | by Joe Goerbert | Link | Original Link

Feminists, inclusionists, and Marxists have flooded the mainstream digital nomad sphere. Since I found remarkable competence among digital nomads, it's been a personal pain for years to observe liberal influencers rake in mass followings and install a belief system perhaps best described as radical self-denial into the minds of promising talents. The digital nomad lifestyle is one of the few chances still left to the freedom-seeking man to both enjoy life and offer resistance.

Depiction of radical self-denial (Kosmocentrism) at a presentation for impact entrepreneurs in San Francisco

Radical Altruism Produces Incompetence

Most of the powerful digital nomad influencers advocate radical self-denial and constantly attack egocentrism, ethnocentrism, spiritual, gender or generational centrism, and many of the other circles of identity and belonging. With this, they're almost like the Rotarians or Kalergi Plan promoters.

This highly Marxist view has led many nomads and would-be nomads to sing along with social justice warriors. They crave feel-good people on stage and push true competence, sobriety and down-to-earth strategy planning away from them. Crippling the mind, falling in level, the nomad becomes just like any other libtard. How sad indeed when that happens.

Contaminated with beliefs such as white guilt, colonial shaming, radical tolerance, radical inclusionism, Hollyweird gender roles, political correctness, taxpaying, faith in mass-media, apologetic metrosexual attitude, nonviolence, pacifism, Rainbow Nazi acceptance and all these other hurdles, you're kept from full masculine expression. The "good" news: you will quickly make friends at mainstream digital nomad or impact sphere gatherings such as the DNX, Hive, Bioneers, Nomad Summit, Nomad Cruise and your remaining host of whatchamacallits.

Well-travelled, broadly educated men are easily falling prey to the blue pill

No Place For Honest Discussions In The DN-Safe Space

If you actually have spent years traveling and came back a battle-proven veteran with all the facts and wisdom, be prepared for disappointment. I personally was viciously attacked by the German SPIEGEL journalist and leftist feminist sex blogger Theresa Lachner after first criticizing German migrant crime and immigration policy. I then received my "death blow" as a DN influencer when she mobilized the community against me since I wouldn't apologize for sharing how much I disliked being woken up at 6 AM by Muslim prayers promoting religious violence in the South of Thailand in Koh Lanta. This lead to many of my associations being cancelled, with famous DN Tim Chimoy (CitizenCircle) taking the lead.

Another example is when I helped Marcus Meurer, the German DN Kingpin recover his cellphone from an armed attacker in Berlin, risking my life using my own blade. This notably reduced my reach and interactions. At Hive I talked about the deep government's lethal robotic repression option and again suffered rejection, though low-key.

Mentioning the Israeli Defense Forces' Samson Protocol or that feminists in power have turned Sweden into a Disneyland for rapists in less than a decade and practices comprehensive censoring to cover it all up is a sure-fire way to hurt yourself socially. Try it and watch as your following becomes disengaged, if not turn against you.

These developments are easily proven facts, but even DN-people you hung out with for some time will cut you off immediately if you discuss them. Luckily that's when you tend to find those actual red pill bros. Here are some more off-limit topics that show the digital nomad mainstream is blue pill, just so you understand where I'm coming from…

- All topics in reference to the existence of the deep government, even after all we know today of the NSA etc.
- Topics having to do with war are often considered inappropriate, because “bad energy”
- Tax justice and many topics concerned with justice, if it’s not for Marxist understanding of equality
- Game, faults of feminism / female judgment and masculinism
- Cultural, Zionist, LGBT and religious criticism (except to bash Christianity), mass media and blue pill system criticism
- Super taboo criticizing refugee policy or refugee crime
- Civil resistance, armed resistance against criminals, any action that is not complete surrender

Note how these are quite important, even interesting topics. I could go on and on. The mainstream digital nomad movement is under constant siege of influencers trying to make it more effeminate, toothless and confused. Anyone who speaks up is brutally sanctioned if they were of any influence. If they were of no influence, they will be henceforth ignored.

“So what?” you might ask. The digital nomad sphere is large enough and there are enough red pilled tribes out there you can choose to make your home at. In my opinion this argument is flawed. I’d put the current sufficiently red-pilled rate at 12-15% max and there is another huge problem, and that’s talent waste.

Displays of skill in arts and music at Cosmic Conversion Electro Festival, fully identified with radical inclusionism. The event promotes price discrimination to disadvantage Americans and Europeans and is backed by the highly influential NuMundo Impact

Entrepreneurship Network, which in turn is close to the Burning Man scene which again is richly dotted with individuals who'd do well in our ranks were they not 100% brainwashed

Digital Nomadism Is A Highly Effective Yet Peaceful Weapon Against Consumerist Enslavement

The actual champion red pill nomad is still part of a tiny minority. Many get caught up in the ideological traps of peace-love-and-unity blue pill influencers. It's a damn shame when the appropriate initial drive should become confused and pussified.

Well-educated, maybe even already half-pilled young white people end up as roadkill, tricked into thinking for example that South Africa is a giant party and it's cool to walk home three blocks. Crap cultures fail and it sucks to live there, and belief bubbles and safe spaces don't do well against blades and bullets. I've tried it, trying to talk assailants out of robbing me. It really goes so much smoother if you're packing. But show me the influential nomad influencer who recommends packing a weapon! I'll believe you when I see it.

For pictures such as these you'd already start getting heat. Shooting as a hobby, or carry-rights even if one has shown one has enough mental Zen to wield such arms? Pretty much off-limits to the "respectable" nomad, or so the mainstream will agree

We Can't Be Happy With These Losses And Humiliations

Red pill nomads have the choice to either hold still and do business with traitors and sheep or to speak up and suffer sanctions and banishment. I say let the principles of higher design flow forth to speak for the richness of our capacity. Through relentless, masculine strive, we are a growing force to be reckoned with.

Always remember: We are the essence. Libtard ideology is but a sorry, empty story for feeble-minded losers. If we stay true to what we know is right even under fiercest onslaught, we will yet bend, sink and break the boat of worms and rebuild the desecrated temples of reason and logic.

From one, many.
From many, change.
From change, hope.
From hope, victory.

Hopefully we can end the corrosive blue pill stranglehold on the nomad and impact sphere.

Read Next: The Pitfalls Of Being A Digital Nomad

Joe Goerbert
CEO
Joe, 29y & German origin, 11y ghost and copywriter (brainhive.de, brainhive-ethical-marketing.com, solreign.com). Was gonna be a digital nomad influencer but stumbled over criticizing SJW paradigms. Also raps (SolreignRecords) and makes jewelry (instagram.com/solreigndotcom) to aid in the red pilling of worth-it people.

3 Simple Steps For Defeating Temptation

July 10, 2017 | by Michael Witcoff | Link | Original Link

Peace, grace, and mercy to you all from the Lord Jesus Christ.

For those of you seeking to strengthen your faith by turning your back on worldly temptation, I am writing to you today with a simple 3-step system you can use in order to stop these distractions dead in their tracks.

As you will see, each step of this system is clearly outlined in Scripture as a perfect remedy for putting on the armor of God against the attacks of the Enemy, whose sole purpose is to keep you from knowing Christ. Remember, the Devil does not need worship to win; he only needs you not to worship God.

If the Enemy can diminish your focus on God by getting you to place it on the mindless accumulation of wealth, occultism, or indulgence in casual sex, that's just as much a victory for him as getting you to draw pentagrams on your walls. Thus, today's article will describe how to catch these attacks when they're occurring–and stop them before you find yourself indulging in sin.

Remember as you read this article that the Enemy knows your particular and personal buttons for what is most likely to lead you astray. He has been around much longer than humanity; as such, he is already familiar with our most powerful weaknesses and failings.

Even more insidiously, he and his minions are intimately familiar with the individual failings and weaknesses of every single man and woman on this Earth–and just like a good conman, he knows exactly how to present himself and his offerings in order to best entice you by way of those weaknesses.

Before I continue, I would like to point out that I am aware some people like to read articles like this and immediately look for flaws in the writer, as a way of “disproving” the truth of what he is saying. So let me spare you the time and energy; I am an imperfect man and would never claim otherwise.

But having turned my back on worldliness to seek a relationship with God, I have discovered tremendously powerful ways to catch these flaws in action before they can turn into sinful behavior.

So with the caveat that I am not successful with them 100% of the time (nor should true perfection ever realistically be expected), I would now like to share with you some simple and Scriptural tools which will help you succeed in your efforts more often than not.

1. Recognize When You Are Feeling Compelled To Sin

We read in James 1:14 that "Every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own desires, and enticed."

Thus, we can see the Apostle James (the brother of Jesus) explaining that sin begins in your own mind and heart, before it ever expresses itself as the outward behavior. When we allow ourselves to fan the flames of desire, whether it's the desire for a fancier car than our neighbor or the desire to sexually possess an attractive woman, we are being "enticed" and will soon be "drawn away" unless we learn how to reverse the process.

Thus, the first step in this system is to catch the desire beginning to burn in your own heart and your own mind. This can take two forms; you will either catch yourself thinking "I really want that," or feeling the pull of compulsion to possess.

Regardless of whether you first become aware of your own desire via your thoughts or your feelings, you must first catch your own lower instincts in the process of their beginning to take hold of you. The contents of your heart and mind matter just as much as your outwards behavior; this is why our Lord said in the book of Matthew that, "whoever looks at a woman to lust for her has already committed adultery with her in his heart."

Once you have recognized the desire to possess a worldly thing, you can then stop that desire from boiling over by moving on to second step in the process.

2. Pray For Deliverance From The Desire

One of the most important steps on the path toward Christian development, and something I mentioned in my article on celibacy, was the realization that human beings are quite powerless against the dark spirits of the world. They are older than us, they are stronger than us, and we are relatively helpless to fight against their influence without wearing the armor of God.

Fortunately, this armor is available to every believer and can effectively shield you from their attacks. This is why we read in 1 John 4:4 that, "he who is in you is greater than he who is in the world."

Recall that God gave Jesus authority over all creation–and that creation includes all the angels and demons which constantly surround us. They are all powerless against His name and against His authority.

Therefore, once you have caught a worldly desire beginning to burn in your mind or heart, the next step is that you must begin to sincerely pray for assistance. Jesus demonstrates how to pray in the Sermon On The Mount in the Book of Matthew, by invoking God's aid and saying "YOUR WILL BE DONE."

This is a theme Jesus demonstrates again in the Book of Luke when he prays, "Father, if you are willing, take this cup of suffering from me; yet not my will, but yours be done."

The key takeaway here is that our desires come from our will and our base and lower instincts; these are in strict opposition to the Holy Will of God the Father in Heaven. Jesus prays as He does because He knows that He cannot overcome the suffering of earthly life by His own will and power; He must invoke God's aid and beg for God's will to supersede His own.

Two pillars hold up the prayers of Christ: that of humility and that of submission. He has the humility to recognize His own relative powerlessness compared to that of God, and

He is willing to submit His own will in order to live by God's instead.

This is how you should also pray; by first recognizing a sinful compulsion, and then immediately invoking God's aid in overcoming it before it can take hold in you and cause you to act on it. Be humble enough not to try and "bulldoze" your way through it of your own will; this is like being a "dry drunk" whose moment-to-moment existence is nothing but struggle.

If you try that, you will likely find the same compulsion expressing itself again soon afterward. It may be for the same desire, or that pent-up energy may seek to express itself by way of a different sinful outlet, instead.

Either way, you must have the humility and submissiveness to pray for God's help in squashing the desire and restoring your heart and mind to the pure state which He desires them to be in.

3. You Must Believe God Has Heard Your Call

Prayer without faith is like rock music without a guitar solo; the structure is there, but the soul is not. Thus, the importance of genuine faith cannot be overestimated.

In the Book of Mark, Jesus explains that not only is faith in God's power necessary for prayer to work, but He even gives us actionable instructions on how we can use this information for our greatest spiritual benefit. We read the following in Chapter 11, Verse 24.

"Therefore I tell you, whatever you ask for in prayer, believe that you have received it, and it will be yours."

While many New Age deceivers like to take this line out of context, it's important to remember that Jesus is talking about praying for spiritual victory—not a fancy new car. He's also constantly asking that His prayers be answered if it's God's will.

With this one powerful line, Jesus gives us the instruction that our faith in God should be so absolute that we must believe God has heard us; that we must believe God has answered; and that our request will then materialize as a result.

As gratitude to God is an important tenet of this path, it then follows that we must thank God for providing the answer to our prayer–even before it has materialized–having full faith in the fact that it will. There is no room for doubt.

"I hope this works" is not faith. "I guess I'll try this" is not faith. Faith is "Thank you, Father, for giving me the power to overcome these demons and impulses."

To recap, the 3-step process is therefore:

1. Recognize when sin takes root in your heart or mind
2. Immediately pray in the name of Jesus Christ for the spiritual armor to fend off the attack
3. Profusely thank God for answering your call and providing you with the solution.

It's not easy at first to have such absolute faith…but the more often you see the results, the faster this process will move from faith to knowledge and become a core practice in your spiritual life.

Read More: The Myth That Jesus Christ Was Not Masculine

Michael Witcoff
Michael is a Christian, a copywriter, an author, and a marketing consultant. He believes the West is experiencing divine wrath for turning our backs on God, and that the only hope for salvation is to unite under one faithful banner as our enemies have under theirs.

How Abortion Creates A Society Of Entitled Women And Desperate Men

July 11, 2017 | by Rob Reed | Link | Original Link

Is it a coincidence that the best countries to find women in are the same ones where abortion is a crime? Think Thailand, Brazil, Costa Rica, the Philippines, Poland, and Argentina. If not outright illegal, abortions are heavily restricted there, with massive fines if not jail sentences for doctors that violate the rules. In Thailand, every abortion requires a court order.

The worst countries for finding a woman—the U.S., Canada, Sweden, etc.—have abortion available on demand and even subsidized by the state. And women have been getting worse in those countries as abortions become more available.

Abortion hasn't always been legal in the U.S. As recently as 1967, abortion was a felony in 49 of the 50 U.S. states, until activist judges whittled away at the restrictions, finally eradicating most of them in the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision, which effectively made abortion legal across the country.

This unleashed the ultra-hypergamous dating and marriage culture that men suffer under today.

The good old days

Back when abortion was a crime, you could be a decent guy with a middle-class or even lower-middle class job and you would probably be able to find a reasonably virtuous woman to marry and start a family with. You didn't even have to have game — just be a decent person. There was a reason. Although the Pill had been approved by the FDA in 1960, an “accident” with the wrong guy could ruin a woman’s life.

“Getting pregnant without being married was wrong, and if a girl did get pregnant then she and the boyfriend who had gotten her in that fix were supposed to get married,” writes Charles Murray on 1963 America in Coming Apart. “These were conventional views shared across the political spectrum.” In that sexual marketplace, nice guys weren’t invisible: they were the only sensible option.

But since the 1970s, American women have had a “choice” whether to saddle a man with a pregnancy or terminate the unborn child and look for a different father. This has distorted the sexual marketplace, creating the perverted dating scene we have today. Roe created new generations of arrogant, entitled women—and a generation of dateless, dis-empowered and desperate men.

Men foolishly bought into abortion in the 1970s, thinking it would liberate them from unwanted fatherhood and turn men’s lives into hedonistic sex fantasies. Male sexual liberationist heroes of the day, like Hugh Hefner, donated heavily to Planned Parenthood. But men should have seen that abortion was a ruse, like the pornography Hefner peddled. The future that was being created would mean less sex for the vast majority of men, and turn the nuclear family into an endangered species.

Abortion perverts the balance of nature

By perverting the balance nature, abortion corrupted women and actually made commitment-ready men less attractive. “Choice” meant that women could now strategically target high-status males with a “chosen” pregnancy while the “wrong” pregnancies, produced with attractive but irresponsible bad boys, could be conveniently snuffed out in the womb.

No woman better exemplifies this arrogance than feminist columnist Jessica Valenti, who wrote about her abortion experience in her new memoir.

Abortion lover Jessica Valenti

"I had a job, money, and enough family support to have a baby," she wrote in her memoir, Sex Object. "But I also had a shitty boyfriend, a lingering love for an even shittier ex-boyfriend, and was in the process of finishing my first book." In Thailand, she would have needed a court order to terminate the pregnancy she had with her "shitty" boyfriend.

In the post-Roe sexual marketplace, women can freely fuck the bad boys without consequences. If a high-status guy does show up, she can either get pregnant with him or marry him. Valenti did eventually find a high-status man to marry, bearing a kid with him before having yet another abortion.

Choosing who pro-creates

For high-status men who don't want to get married, the post-Roe dating marketplace became one where they have to effectively abort their own ability to pro-create to avoid being unwillingly "chosen". The whole purpose of purchasing a costly male vasectomy is the ability to present a paper in front of a judge that effectively says, "He couldn't be the father."

Perhaps not coincidentally, less than two years after Roe v. Wade, the U.S. child support enforcement system was set up to ensure that government power would guarantee that the 'chosen' providers would pay up whatever the state demanded. A disturbed or immature woman now had no need to grow up and form a nuclear family to grab financial resources from a sperm donor. She could marry him or, if he wasn't up for that, hit him with a lucrative support order. It helps to score a celebrity: Eddie Murphy paid $60,000 a month, Mel Gibson $20,000 a month, Donald Trump half a million a month. No surprise the “choice” in these cases was to keep the baby.

A pregnancy from a “shitty” guy, like the ones Jessica Valenti fucked, can simply be snuffed out in the womb. If the guy’s rich, you just keep the baby. “Pro-choice” has been hypergamy crystallized.

Which brings us to the “normal” middle-class guys, neither “shitty” nor high-status, that used to serve as the safe choice for a woman. These guys were the dating ideals of 1963 — eager to commit, marry and father children. There was one for every woman. (And a woman for every man.)

Well, they are the official losers of the post-Roe dating marketplace. In today’s sexual marketplace, there are the “shitty” hot guys women have abortions with, and then the high-status providers they actually have babies with. The middle-class “decent” guys — the ones that once formed the basis of nuclear families for a thousand years or more — are un-chosen for either sex, marriage or fatherhood. Once the ideal mate, they are now invisible.

If you are one of these guys, you have to try hard to be “shitty” so you can at least get laid once in a while. But have a kid or a family? Think again. You need status for that.

Abortion is the disease that created this perverted marketplace — not a symptom of it, but the cause.

The wisest thing for single American men who want a wife to do has been to get out of the country and go to places where abortion is still restricted, and many are doing that. Why are women so wonderful in Thailand? The reason is Article 305 of the Thai Penal Code, which states that abortion is illegal unless a woman has been raped or the pregnancy threatens her life.

A woman's 'choice' to destroy Western Civilization

"Choice" is at the very cornerstone of feminism's open agenda to undermine and destroy the nuclear family and Western civilization along with it. In fact, self-identified "pro-life" feminists were banned from participating in anti-Trump women's marches because "inclusivity is not about bolstering those who harm us", as Valenti put it.

"Choice" is codified by cultural Marxists in the mainstream media and educational institutions as a precious human right, more sacred even than Freedom of Speech. In December, Lena Dunham admitted she hadn't had an abortion "but I wish I had" because sharing abortion stories had become so empowering for women. Perhaps it shouldn't be a surprise that the Soviet Union was the first nation to legalize abortion in 1921.

The man who will end of Roe v. Wade?

The reason there were so many tears from feminists on the night of Trump's surprise election was the threat he poses to Roe v. Wade. Now with the likely retirement of swing voter, Justice Anthony Kennedy, and the advancing years of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Trump seems likely to swing the court against abortion.

Unlike so many other institutions set up to dis-empower men, the abortion status quo is actively opposed in the United States. 70 percent of the public believes abortion should be illegal under some circumstances, and 20 percent believes it should be outlawed under every circumstance.

If Roe v. Wade can be overturned, it won't just end a morally questionable, and probably murderous industry — it may save the American sexual marketplace, and Western Civilization with it.

Read More: How To Deal With Intense Male Competition In The Sexual Marketplace

Rob Reed
Robert Q. Reed is a veteran journalist and business reporter based in Reno, Nevada.

The Rules Of Engagement For Battling The Left

July 11, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

Ever since Laura Loomer rushed the stage of New York City's rendition of Julius Caesar by the 'Shakespeare in the Park' theatre group, different factions of the political-right have been debating the merits of giving the political-left a taste of its own medicine. Of course, the "respectable" conservatives decried the use of any tit-for-tat strategy. By contrast, many members of the hard-right cheered such a move. And other members of the right fell somewhere in-between those two points-of-view.

For my part, I endorsed the idea of using the left's tactics against it. In my ROK article "The Argument for Using Leftist Tactics Against the Left", I argued that using the left's tactics against them in a proportional manner, and when done in response to those tactics, was a perfectly moral strategy given our current state of cultural war with the left.

I also pointed out that just as a police officer is perfectly moral when he proportionally and reasonably responds to a threat even though he may use the same tactics that the threat uses, so too is the political-right perfectly moral in using the left's tactics against them, so long as the right's response is proportional and reasonable.

But with the above point already argued, the next issue that needs to be addressed is the following: can a systematic method or system be created to determine when and how the political-right should use the left's tactics against them? And, in fact, there is such a system, and its inspiration also comes from the policing world.

The Use-of-Force Continuum

The officer continuously assesses the situation and selects the most reasonable option relative to those circumstances as perceived at that point in time.

Within the law enforcement community, modern police forces teach their officers something called a use-of-force continuum. This is a concept which is meant to provide police officers with a systematic and standard way to apply their use-of-force tactics in any given situation. And what this concept essentially teaches is that a police officer is justified in mirroring a subject's own level of force, so long as the officer's actions are fundamentally responsive to the threat against him and are also proportionate to that threat.

If a subject begins showing clear signs that he is about to use deadly force against a police officer, or if the subject already is trying to use deadly force, then the officer can respond to the threat with deadly force. But if a subject is simply engaging in a verbal argument with a police officer, then, of course, the police officer cannot legitimately respond to that subject with deadly force.

The use-of-force continuum teaches the police officer when they can legitimately use violent tactics against a subject as well as what type of violent tactics can be employed at what time.

Just as the police have a use-of-force continuum to help guide their actions, I propose that the political-right adopt a cultural 'use-of-force' continuum to help guide them in their cultural conflicts with the political-left. Such a tool would help individuals on the right know when they can use certain cultural-war tactics as well as understand what specific tactics they can legitimately use in response to the left's attacks.

What would this cultural 'use-of-force' continuum look like?

First, it would make absolutely clear that any 'illiberal' tactic used by the political-right would only be employed in response to the left's use of such a tactic. This does not mean that such a tactic could not be used pre-emptively, but it would mean that there would have to be clear and unmistakable signs, visible to a reasonable person, that the political-left was going to use such tactics before the right responded in kind.

This would be in much the same way as a police officer can become physically-aggressive with a subject so long as the subject is showing clear signs that he was about to be assaultive, such as through the clenching of his fists and jaw, posturing, cocking his fists to punch, and so on.

Also note that for the political-right to be strategically responsive does not mean that it must be on the defensive in a tactical sense; rather, it means that the political-right should follow the maxim of never starting anything, but always finishing everything. And in order to do that, an offensive tactical attitude is an absolute must!

Next, in terms of its approach, this cultural 'use-of-force' continuum would teach the political-right to mirror what the political-left does. So, if the political-left remains civil, engages in debate, and keeps their protests within the bounds of the law, then the political-right would restrict its tactics to the same activities. However, if the political-left (or parts of the political-left) begins to engage in illegal and illiberal activities and protests, then the political-right can respond with similar tactics, at least when targeting the parts of the political-left that are doing so.

Of course, this does not mean that the political-right necessarily has to use such tactics in response to the left if it is not strategically advantageous to do so, but it mean that such tactics could be used if it is in the interests of the political-right to employ them.

Finally, if the left decides to engage in actual violence against members of the political-right, then the political-right can always respond in self-defense against such an attack until the physical threat has been stopped. And if the threat do not stop, then alternative measures, such as pushing for secession, are the next step to be employed.

The Morality of the Cultural Use-of-Force Continuum

It should be made clear that this cultural use-of-force continuum is not only a rational strategy for the political-right to adopt, but it is also a perfectly moral and ethical strategy as well. For again, remember that both a criminal and a police officer use violence as a tactic to achieve their ends. However, a criminal uses violence for personal gain and to disrupt the stability of society; by contrast, a police officer—who is also called a peace officer—ideally uses violence for the benefit of society and as a means to restore peace to society.

The police officer and the criminal are completely different from a moral perspective even though they both employ the same tactics; and they are different precisely because their reasons and ultimate ends for using the tactic of violence are different. Indeed, the police officer does not become a criminal simply because he uses violence just like the criminal does.

In the same way, an individual on the political-right does not become a leftist simply because, in response to the left, the rightist uses tactics most often associated with the political-left. After all, the political-right's reason and ultimate end for using such tactics are different from the left. The political-left uses illiberal tactics—such as shutting-down and attacking speakers on the political-right—in order to gain power and to undermine ideas that are opposed to them without debate.

By contrast, if the political-right decides to start using the same sort of illiberal tactics against the political-left, it is to teach the political-left a lesson in the only way that the left learns from: namely, painful experience. It is also to push the political-left back to a position where they once again start to respect free speech and civil debate. So, even though the tactics used might be the same, there is no moral equivalence between the left and the right because the reasons for using those tactics are completely different.

Furthermore, the minute the left stops using such tactics, the right will stop as well. However, the reverse of that is not the case. And that is a critical difference as well.

Is there a chance that, in response to the political-right's use of their tactics, the political-left will simply escalate their own tactics? Of course there is a chance of this occurring. But the political-left is not going to stop escalating their tactics simply because the political-right asks them to. After all, the "respectable" conservatives have been politely asking the left to stop using such tactics for the last dozen years, and during that time, the political-left has culturally steam-rolled over such conservatives. They also continued to use their illiberal tactics with impunity wherever they held power, such as in academia.

Conclusion

In the end, if the only option is to keep losing to the political-left or to use the political-left's tactics against them, then the choice is obvious. After all, while it may be distasteful to use such tactics for the limited time that it is necessary to beat back the political-left, the fact is that losing to the political-left is infinitely worse than merely using such tactics.

And so, in order to be able to use these tactics in a reasonable and legitimate manner, I suggest that the political-right adopt this idea of a cultural 'use-of-force' continuum, for doing so will help to ensure that any tactics used by the political-right are entirely proportional to the tactics used against them. And that will not only help the right win the cultural war, but it will also help them win the hearts and minds of the average citizen as well.

Read More: Tactics For The War Against Cultural Marxism In 2015

Damian Michael
R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

5 Mating Strategies To Ensure You Reproduce

July 11, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

The Australian academic researcher Frank Salter has written many relevant books and articles, as well as edited ditto anthologies, on topics such as ethnic nepotism, immigration and genetic diversity. In On Genetic Interests he argues that individuals have genetic interests, and that those often are connected to larger demographic patterns in one's society and the world. For instance one can argue that in the United States, both whites and blacks have common interests in not letting too many Hispanics and Asians in.

But even if a person would focus less on the bigger picture, it is still in a man's interest to pass his own genes on. Of course it is also in his own interest to live a good life, and under current circumstances it might be questionable to get married although there are still some benefits. From the premise that the marriage market in the West appears gloomy, many men will remain childless, and although men always have had a lower reproductive value than women, the number and share are shrinking because of cultural decline.

Therefore it can be wise to think a little bit outside of the box and propose several mating strategies of which monogamous marriage is but one. A good thing is that us men can have children when we are 20 as well as 40 (and of course in some cases even younger and older than that). Thus at some point you will have the opportunity to secure your genetic legacy by means of some strategy.

1. Conservative marriage with a good female

If one happens to find a decent and attractive woman, preferably young, with a penchant for more traditional and conservative values and ways of life, then a monogamous marriage is the way to go. It will bring stability for oneself, one's wife, one's offspring, and enable a greater degree of nurturing and family planning.

Even if divorce eventually occurs, all included have still benefited from the bulwark that is marriage until it happens.

2. Having kids out of wedlock

Another strategy for securing your divine DNA is to convince a girl, preferably in a long-term relationship, to have kids. Perhaps you have to use some Machiavellian cunning in order to get what you want in some cases, but she might want it too under some phase of her life.

Since a large share of women are hypergamous, slutty, and egoistic, it is likely that the relationship will end at some point, but at least you are not stuck in a bad marriage, waiting to be divorce raped, and can have partial control over the situation. You haven't lost what you didn't have because you knew that was likely going to happen.

3. Importing a wife from a poor and conservative country

The topic of importing a wife from a poorer and somewhat more traditional country has been touched on several times on these pages, and besides from all the logistical, practical and economic difficulties – and then we have not even considered to actually find that particular girl who is in accordance with your standards – it is likely that she will quickly become Westernized and leave you for something better or different. In fact she might even have ulterior motives to be granted a citizenship in the first place.

However, as a cynical person you already knew that could happen, and likewise you haven't lost what you didn't have. It is not the best starting point for a healthy upbringing of children, but your own genes are invested and you have to deal with the consequences accordingly.

Another potential "benefit" is that if you find a wife in let's say Moldova, that poor person has little options, and could be hesitant to do something stupid that might harm herself. Make sure that if she's cheating on you, you will make her life miserable from a financial standpoint. But if she is a good mother and loyal partner then she will be rewarded with material comfort that she could not have in her home country. If possible, stay out of urban environments.

4. Impregnating lots of women and let the government support them

If you happen to be an egoistic and Machiavellian player you can have sex with multiple girls within a year, and the chances are that some of them want to keep the child if a pregnancy occurs. Especially if you have made them believe that there is something serious going on.

The wise man, or the fox as Machiavelli refers to, makes sure to remain anonymous but to have the contact details of his female sperm vessels, so when the big fat daddy government comes to look for him and want him to support he is nowhere to be found.

As for immoral behavior one can think about that two minus poles become a plus. In a negative environment a person sometimes have to tackle a problem with the same type of measures. Something good could still come out of it in the end. And evolution does not care about morals; it cares about adaption and concrete results.

5. Use love tourism as a means to serve your genetic ends

The fifth strategy that I am suggesting is to use so-called love tourism to pass your genes on. Some countries, like Japan and South Korea, are about as infertile as those in the West so even though you may relatively easily get free access to local vaginas, the females will likely be hesitant to have unprotected sex.

In developing countries such as Indonesia and the Philippines on the other hand, the situation is different. Many of the girls, who often have lower IQs and few if any career plans for the future, live only for the moment. Some have even called them little brown fuck machines, and that might be a reason why Indonesia has about 250 million inhabitants.

Furthermore, in a pigmentocratic society in which a white pehenotype is associated with higher socio-economic status, many of these women dream of a mixed-race Eurasian child. Something similar is the case in locations like the Caribbean, Brazil and Colombia as well.

While you might not see much of your offspring in the future given that you choose this strategy, you know that he or she is likely going to have increased social status, and might even become a model, actress or pop star in the future. And your genes have been passed on to the next generation.

Although less risky than in one’s home country, as long as you get the fuck out of there in due time, it would be wise to not let the girl(s) know your real identity, but if you have some kind of contact information you can perhaps send some money in the future and/or figure out where they live and make a visit at some point. Of course, you can also be completely open about your intents and move there permanently.

In summary

To draw a parallel to game, a man would be less sanguine if only one strategy existed (say online game), but if one realises that several such exist things suddenly do not look so bad. Even though some of these options are far from the most optimal, they might still be pragmatic under certain circumstances. It is up to you to decide have much your own genetic interests matter.

Read More: Why Do We Push Women To Choose Career Over Family?

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

4 Trifling Conversations American Women Love To Have That Fry Your Brain

July 12, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I was out with one of my readers the other night, who had the good fortune of never really coming across an American woman in his life. But this month, he's traveling through a few parts of Europe that are more dense (quite literally, in this case) with American women. And you know what he said to me?

> I've only heard an American girl speak a few times in my life before this week, but now that I have heard them…I don't understand. What the fuck is the nonsense that they are talking about, all the time?

I couldn't help but laugh at his complete shock. I also couldn't help but laugh in despair at the fact that I really didn't have any answer for him. I guess that's a perk when you live in a country too dangerous for your average female to venture into solo. After we'd said our goodbyes, I figured I'd sit down and write out a list of the most pointless conversations that American women most often have. Here's what I came up with.

1. Food And Drinks

The next time you are out with more than one female at a restaurant, I dare you to count how many times you hear the words “yummy”, “so good”, “tasty”, “OMG”, “divine”, and, my personal favorite for outright stupidity, “delish”.

Honestly, over the course of a one-hour meal, it’s pretty common to hear these adjectives dropped at least 50 times. If you order fancy cocktails or an appetizer, or, heaven forbid—dessert—prepare to double the amount of descriptive words.

Of course, no girl can be a downer when out with her friends. You could feed them a steaming pile of local artisan dog shit at the local Asian joint and they’d still be ooh-ing and aah-ing about how divine the local canine turd is. It’s all about immersion, right?

It’s not even just those basic bitch adjectives—it’s how in detail they can talk nonsense about a food as if they’ve been a top chef at a Michelin 5-star restaurant.

Seriously, you don’t need to have a 15 minute conversation about your “craft burger.” It’s a piece of meat with lettuce, tomato, onions, and ketchup—the ketchup is one step above Heinz so therefore it can now be called “craft”. There’s a piece of bread around all of it, with some potatoes on the side. No, just because they sprinkled a little bit of Parmesan cheese on them does not make them “craft french fries”. End of discussion.

Even worse is the foodies who throw out all the nonsense terms. American girls have to always one-up each other (especially on Instagram), so they talk using fancy culinary terms—and they don’t know what any of them mean.

For extra fun, the next time you’re out with a girl and she brags about ordering an artisanal, rustic, curated, or farm-to-table dish, ask her to actually explain what it means. The look of panic upon her face will be priceless.

2. Reality TV

If you've ever worked in a female-friendly office, you know exactly what I mean. "Meetings" that end up being an hour-long recap of the recent Bachelorette episode, while no work actually gets done. It's the equivalent of water cooler talk for men, except it goes on forever.

Loading...

I guess that's what happens when girls have nothing to live for except careers that they hate. It's what happens when they forego marriage and motherhood in favorite of idolizing the latest slut to spread her legs for 3 different dudes in 3 nights.

3. Political Talk

If you haven't learned by now, it's pretty hopeless to have a worthwhile political discussion with an American girl. Foreign girls can be just as bad, but at least you don't have to worry about them becoming outraged and triggered. You can have the discussion, but any and all logical points will instantly be cancelled out by feelings. Unfortunately, today's world is dictating more and more than feelings are the basis for an argument instead of reality.

It's funny, because even (some) guys who have opposite political beliefs than I can debate logically. Often times, we reach a point of mutual understanding within minutes. He learns that I don't love everything about Trump, and I learn that he hated Hillary and just wanted some sort of middle ground.

Good luck reaching a mutual understanding on politics when debating an American girl. And yes, the conversations they have with each other are even more pointless. Rather than talking about pros versus cons, instead it becomes a huge orgy of good feelings. No one dares speak out of place in fear of upsetting the other hens, so the conversation just goes round and round, just like the craft burger speak.

4. Relationships

As someone who has quite a fair bit of experience in the dating world, I've had plenty of girls approach me for advice about a specific situation in their dating lives. And how often do you think any of them have actually followed my advice? Never.

It's not uncommon to hear girls talk about a specific thing a guy said or did, no matter how minuscule and insignificant it is, for hours on end. Never is anything actually done to move forward in the conversation—the same things are constantly rehashed, re-analyzed, and then the friend doing the listening makes the one complaining feel good. Granted, men are often guilty of the same thing—over-analyzing text messages or online dating conversations.

American women, however, take it to a whole other level. It used to be that that kind of gossip was left for sleepovers or private, in-home nights with a bottle of wine and friends. Now though, it's fair game to shout out all the details (including the dirty details) in restaurants, on public transit, and anywhere else that they can share the story with the rest of the world.

Closing Thoughts

A decent pair of noise-cancelling headphones is becoming an increasingly good investment when out in public. I'm thankful that the majority of my interactions and day-to-day life don't involve any of this, but when I do hear it, I can't help but cringe—because people like my reader, who have never been exposed to it, are dead on with their analysis.

And that is a lot of time being wasted out in the world.

If you want to build a business that helps you move out of America, check out my free course, Pro Niche Site. For more information about living abroad, check out Ukraine Living.

Read More: 7 Criteria A Girl Should Pass To Enter A Relationship With You

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Women Don’t Want Relationships With Men Who Want Relationships

July 12, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A common criticism of the ‘dark art’ of game is that it is all about guys discovering manipulative tricks so that they can get as many girls as possible into bed. Actually, this is often not the case. A great many men are attracted to it simply because they want to meet a girl with whom they can form a relationship.

Some might say that it is the most laudable motivation there is, but the counter-intuitive truth is that if you approach her with the mindset that ‘I want to get a girlfriend’ then you will most likely fail. The dating marketplace being what it is you must first generate attraction and great sex: relationships come later and should be initiated by the woman.

Through social conditioning we are inculcated with the belief that the best way to get a girlfriend is through comfort. That is, if I am friendly and pleasant and treat the girl that we like with the utmost respect then she will see what a great guy I am and fall in love with me. If only it were really that simple. This might be what girls say they would prefer, but real-life experience teaches us something different.

As you will no doubt be aware by now if you have any knowledge of game at all, such a strategy is doomed to failure and any guy attempting it will almost certainly find himself languishing in the friendzone. Why? Because girls—like men—respond to what they find sexy, and being nice just isn’t.

This is common knowledge by now (in the community at least) and most guys understand it on an intellectual level. Nevertheless, I often notice a kind of ‘purple pill’ doublethink going on, even in more experienced players. ‘Yes,’ they might say, ‘I know this game stuff—being the bad guy and all that—works well on club sluts and random girls. But when I meet someone who I want to be in a relationship with then I should do things differently.’

No, you shouldn’t. Here’s why. Every single long-term relationship I’ve been in started off on a ‘just sex’, ‘friends-with-benefits’ footing. Meanwhile, every single girl I ever pursued to become my girlfriend (back when I used to do that kind of thing) rejected me outright.

I only represent a sample size of one. But I’d be willing to bet that my experience reflects that of most other men. Certainly this has been my experience speaking with, and coaching, other guys.

Girlfriend

As an example, I met my last girlfriend L through Tinder. At the time she has fairly recently come out of a long-term relationship, and she told me straight-up that she wasn’t looking for anything serious. Well, that was fine with me. We’d meet up once a week, have sex, maybe hang out a bit after, and that would be it.

Over the course of a few months of this L and I got to know one another better and discovered that—apart from having great sex—we also had a few other things in common too. We began hanging out more. After a while—when she pushed the issue—we finally became boyfriend and girlfriend.

Now, for various reasons that relationship didn’t work out and we no longer see one another—largely because I realised that the lifestyle she wanted wasn’t for me at this point. But the principle holds good. In this climate, the best way today to get a girlfriend is to attract her, begin a sexual relationship with her and then wait for her to move things forward.

Had I approached L trying to make her my girlfriend then I would almost certainly have failed. And yet L was far from being some stereotypical ‘club slut’. She was actually a very well-brought up girl who—it turned out—was very loyal and wanted nothing more than a conventional life. But I remember her showing me text messages from an unfortunate former lover of hers who had pushed the ‘relationship’ button too early and been blown off as a result.

From a male perspective it’s hard to make sense of this. If in the end a girl wants marriage and kids then why wouldn’t putting yourself forward as one who might provide these things work just fine? But the counterintuitive truth is that you must always present yourself as the lover before you switch to provider mode (assuming that’s what you want to do).

There are several reasons for this. For one, we live in a hyper-sexualised culture in the West and all of us, men and women, are encouraged to seek out ‘great sex’. Yes, sex is no longer just another part of a functional relationship. Now it has been elevated almost to the position of an Olympic sport, and if you're not winning gold every time then you're doing something wrong.

As such, girls are led to think that there is a greater 'connection' with men with whom they have intense orgasms. Logically that is not a particularly sound criteria on which to plan a future, but there it is. There is also, of course, the more workaday factor that girls, like us, get hooked on great sex. So for these reasons you must bang her—and bang her good, over a period of time—before you should even think about making her your girlfriend.

The other thing is that no one likes to be given anything on a plate. What we receive too easily we tend to end up despising. This is why it is a far better strategy to hang back and wait for her to push you to formalise what you have as a relationship. And don't worry—she will. Girls always do, in time.

With L I came to the realisation that I liked spending time with her and wouldn't be averse to trying a relationship. But at the same time I have also always valued my freedom, and I was actually rather enjoying having the best of both worlds—sex on tap and female company without the concomitant commitment. So my strategy was to do nothing. Sure enough, after a time L began dropping bigger and bigger hints about our becoming a couple.

So if you are getting into game because you want to get a girlfriend then realise that you are coming at it the wrong way. The first thing you need to do is get good at generating attraction in a wide variety of girls, so that you have a sense of abundance. Next you need to learn to escalate things to a sexual level, and to deliver the goods in bed. And then finally you need to develop the discipline to hang back and let her pursue you. Far better to do that than to push the relationship envelope too early and have her reject you.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: Why Being Good Looking Is Not Enough To Be Successful With Women

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The Stupidest Things That Liberals Have Told Me

July 12, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Liberals have been led astray by an ideology that just doesn't work, and they haven't seen through its many flawed premises. For some, enlightenment begins after they gain life experience. Until then, they're encumbered by some odd beliefs, including the following ones I've heard.

Money grows on trees

One of my former girlfriends told me that the government should loan a million dollars to anyone who wants to start their own business. This would get around the problem of banks capriciously deciding who qualifies for a loan. Since having to create viable business plans is an unreasonable burden, the government simply could rubber stamp all applicants and cut them a check for a cool mill. Yes, she was dead serious.

I have my misgivings about banksters, to say the least. Even so, they're certainly correct to reject loans that are unlikely to get repaid. After all, they've gotten their fingers burnt over risky loans before. What sense, then, does it make for the government to start tossing out millions like confetti?

I asked, "What if someone fritters it all away instead and can't pay it back?" She didn't think it was a big deal. So I pointed out that for the government to lend everyone a million dollars, the only way to raise the money would be to tax everyone a million dollars. Then what's the point? Nevertheless, she wasn't deterred from this big idea.

The fundamental error

The government doesn't create wealth; it taxes it. For that reason, whenever the government spends money, it should be for a very good reason, which frequently it isn't. All too many liberals believe the government is a limitless wellspring of money. Because of fiat currency and the Federal Reserve, it kind of is, except that creates debt rather than wealth. Swiping that unlimited credit card ad infinitum brings consequences.

It's a mentality similar to leftist revolutionaries who don't understand how wealth is created and maintained. They see it as a big pile of treasure that someone else has and they don't. They consider this unjust, and the solution is to steal it. When they run out of people to loot, the result is places like North Korea, Venezuela, and Zimbabwe.

Richard Nixon sets it straight

> We are not spending the Federal Government's money, we are spending the taxpayer's money, and it must be spent in a way which guarantees his money's worth and yields the fullest possible benefit to the people being helped.

Burn it all down

Saul Alinsky, grandfather of the community agitators

A public school teacher with SJW-like tendencies told me that whenever there's a problem in society, the solution is to tear down the system. Reform isn't enough. I was going to argue that if you set out to destroy something, you first should ensure that whatever takes its place will be better. However, she beat me to it, going on that it doesn't matter if the results are worse than the starting point. What?

The fundamental error

If you take one step forward and three steps back, then you were better off leaving well enough alone. Sometimes reform is necessary and proper, but it must be carefully considered and have a realistic plan leading to constructive results. Not all change is progress.

This "burn everything down and magically paradise will emerge" mentality is a common theme. We've seen this with the Jacobins (France), the Bolsheviks (Russia), cultural Marxism (our society), the Cloward-Piven Plan (the welfare state), the feminists (the family), and the list goes on. Half-baked leftist schemes have a terrible track record. When they set out to torch everything, then Year Zero begins with a pile of ashes.

Richard Nixon sets it straight

> One of the most startling gaps in the Communist theory is the lack of any clear notion of how a Communist economy would be organized. In the writings of the great founders of communism there is virtually nothing on this subject. This gap was not an oversight, but was in fact a necessary consequence of the general theory of communism. […]
>
> Operating then, in this vacuum of guidance left behind by their prophets, how did the founders of the Soviet Union proceed to organize their new economy? The answer is that they applied as faithfully as they could the teachings of their masters. Since those teachings were essentially negative, their actions had to have the same quality.

Human nature can be altered easily

One of the primary means they use to try to change human nature

One of my friends conducts group debates via email which includes a millennial Bernie Sanders supporter. A debate over global warming somehow morphed into a discussion over what future society should be like. The kid stated that we'll have to change human nature to eliminate greed completely. From the way he wrote about this, he considered it to be as easy as passing a speed limit law.

It doesn't work this way. For example, Christianity has preached against excesses of greed from the beginning, likewise Islam and major Eastern religions. They significantly discouraged avarice along with other vices, but in thousands of years they haven't eradicated them from the human mind. For that matter, they're all nominally religions of peace, but it doesn't always work that way.

Good luck on getting ideology to do more than sermons of hellfire and brimstone did! I thought of pointing out the futility, but he seemed impervious to reason.

The fundamental error

Leftists—from moderate liberals all the way to flaming Maoists—have great faith that human nature can be remade into whatever suits their purposes. They believe it's completely created by society. Culture does matter a lot (which is why they should quit screwing it up), but you can't engineer society like reprogramming a computer. That doesn't work.

Still, they cause a lot of damage attempting this. Worse for them, these absurd social engineering efforts create smoldering resentments by coercing people to act against their nature. The sudden collapse of Communism in Eastern Europe should've warned them. For example, if the Swedes arise against their dispossession, there will be hell to pay. The same is true elsewhere in Europe; it's only a matter of time before many criminally irresponsible politicians and their cronies find themselves in deep shit.

Richard Nixon sets it straight

> In the long term we can hope that religion will change the nature of man and reduce conflict. But history is not encouraging in this respect. The bloodiest wars in history have been religious wars.

The media is objective and independent

Around Trump's inauguration, one of my liberal friends (who does have some redeeming qualities) breathlessly told me that most magazines and newspapers were going to use the word "resist" in their headlines.

I mentioned how much collusion that would require. Then I asked if it bothered her that the media outlets were in cahoots with each other and had so little ideological variation. Sure, you'd expect some leftist periodicals, but why so few with other viewpoints? She just continued with how great the "resist" headlines would be. Again I brought up the issue of balance, but I might as well have been talking to a wall.

This seems to have been a half-baked idea; only a few publications followed through with "resist" headlines. Still, liberals should be concerned about a vast ideological imbalance in the press, even if it's in their favor.

The fundamental error

If voters are to make informed decisions, they must get accurate information. This doesn't happen if the news is one-sided partisan propaganda. Consider the following:

- Obama's Deep State had the whole country under surveillance: no big deal.
- Hillary's staffers erased thousands of emails: no big deal.
- Nixon's team bugged two rooms and erased a few minutes of tape: the press went berserk.

I say they owe Tricky Dick an apology.

Richard Nixon sets it straight

> The American people are entitled to see the president and to hear his views directly, and not to see him only through the press.

My books are available at Smashwords and Amazon.

Read More: 12 Reasons Why Liberals And Progressives Will Always Be Losers

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

5 Reasons Women Deserve To Be Paid Less Than Men

July 13, 2017 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

For the past decade plus, we've been told day after day about the alleged "wage gap". One might think that an issue as serious and widespread would have multiple layers to it with facts and statistics to back up this claim.

Thing is, it's not. It simply states that for every dollar a man makes, women only make 77¢ – 79¢. Though this bullshit myth's been debunked in dozens of ways allow me to put in my 2¢ (pun intended) and dispel this ridiculous falsehood:

Last year it was 77¢, this year it's 79¢….which is it?

1: Men work higher paying jobs, many of them blue collar (bridge builders, road graders, welders, millwright, etc.) that women are neither interested in, nor capable of doing.

2: Men work longer hours, hence more pay.

3: If a man and a woman work at the same company and do the same job and the man makes more, it’s because he’s been with the company longer.

Wage gap myth squashed.

“I should totally be making as much as him! I mean, his job isn’t even that hard!”

Even still feminists and the gynocentric media continue to cram this bullshit narrative down our collective throats. Like every other “issue” they bitch about, it’s as though they want this gap to be real so they can continue to squawk about what they don’t have despite living the best lives in the world.

So I’m going to give them their wish and give 5 reasons men should earn more than women for doing exactly the same work.

1. They’re always late

Women are late to everything. Birthday parties, doctor’s appointments, you name it. If there’s a designated time they have to be there, they’re going to be late. It’s one of the few things we can actually count on women to do consistently these days.

Work is no different. Chicks have every excuse under the sun as to why they’re perpetually tardy. My cat’s sick, my alarm didn’t go off, the sun didn’t come up, and on and on. It’s always something. They’re never at work on time consistently and it’s never their fault.

If any employee, man or woman, is always late they should be warned, reprimanded, and then fired. But since we know it takes an office shooting to have grounds to terminate a female (and even then she’ll probably collect unemployment), the solution here is to dock her pay. Pay her markedly less than men who actually show up to work on time every day.

2. They have a period every month

Yep, you read correctly. Women should be paid less than men because of their periods.

Today’s woman is a pain in the ass to deal when they’re body chemistry is in a rare state of calm. But when they start menstruating, they’re all but impossible. And that’s not counting the days leading up to the big event called PMS which we all know makes females insufferable… at best.

Sounds about right

The irritability and emotional swings caused by their periods affects their work performance—badly. Women simply should not be paid the same as men who's work performance is consistent while there's a solid 10, maybe 11 days out of the month when they go completely sideways because of their menstrual cycle.

3. They take maternity Leave

Currently, paid maternity leave is required in California, Washington, New Jersey, and New York. But you can bet your ass that number will increase if things keep going the way they're going what with laws to further give women a decided advantage in the workforce.

When this happens (and it will), women are going to get paid for sitting at home and stuffing their faces with pizza, ice cream, and donuts all day if they happen to become pregnant. Even if they're not paid, her job is waiting for her when she decides to return to work.

In the meantime, somebody's gotta pick up the slack because her work isn't gonna do itself. Further, while her job is being held for her, a qualified applicant who has zero chance to become pregnant (read: a man) misses out on a job opportunity because the U.S. is doing its best to stamp out male privilege.

Hiring a woman comes with the built in risk of her missing 25% of the calendar year due to pregnancy. Rather than keeping her on the payroll for doing nothing or holding her job, pay her less.

4. They're a distraction

Any time a woman invades a male space, chaos ensues. The American workplace is no different. By the time a female gets her workstation set up, she's already decided who's she's going to fuck, who she's going to get fired, and whose coat tails she's going to ride up the ladder to success.

"Can you help me with my…um….printer?"

How do they accomplish these things? Drama. And lots of it.

If they're not flirting with the VP hawtee, they're either starting rumors about other women or they're at HR for the third time this week filing, yet, another sexual harassment claim because some beta "attempted to sexually assault her" by telling her hello.

All of these shenanigans reduce everyone's productivity, including hers. So take it out of her pay.

5. They hardly work

Sure, they're on the clock but their noses are always in their phones scrolling through their mindless Facebook feeds, setting up the 3 new Tinder cocks for the upcoming weekend (two of which are on the same day….possibly at the same time), or shopping for the usual useless crap they can't stop buying.

I'm sure that's work related

When they actually turn their attention to their monitors they're on the company chat software talking to everybody about everything non-work related and reading HuffPo.

The bottom line is that women just aren't as productive as men and that's all there is to it. Pay 'em less.

Conclusion

The vast majority of women are flat out useless liabilities in today's workforce. Yes, there are a few exceptions to the rule but by and large, the average female will end up costing a company a hell of a lot more than the average man because of all the built in baggage they bring with them to work.

And that's before, they start up with all their nonsense. So while we know there isn't really a wage gap, there certainly should be.

Wanna hear 3 more reasons there should be a wage gap? Click here. And while you're at it, check out Donovan's website and checkout his podcast The Sharpe Reality on YouTube, Soundcloud, or iTunes.

Don’t Miss: 5 Reasons Why The Gender Pay Gap Is Bogus

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

As A Coloured Man From South Africa, I Exist In The No Man's Land Of Racial Identity

July 13, 2017 | by Narmer Bull | Link | Original Link

"Coloured" is an inherently ambiguous reference. TV has educated the world into believing that this word is antiquated and therefore racist reference to black Americans. But in other less litigious parts of the globe, it's a perfectly acceptable demographic category.

In South Africa, the social group identified as coloured is genetically diverse and placed between black and white. As such our historical experience is essentially an instinct to assimilate in either direction, depending on the political atmosphere. Our character can be described as tribalistic and vain. While our values incline us towards individual displays of power through violence.

So how does a coloured South African find his way to the international phenomenon that is Return of Kings? In this article I will clarify the identity, experience, character and values of a racial grey area. Because whether coloureds like it or not, as a group, we must serve some function in the country we inhabit.

Black/White/Grey = All = None

Identity In No Man’s Land

Apartheid basically attempted to physically separate people on the basis of genotypical (genetic) and phenotypical (observable) features. As offensive as that may be for liberal sensibilities, anthropologists do the same thing intellectually when they observe the natural distinctions between human beings. The fact is that humanity is characterized by biological diversity.

Humans do not form a single genetic population. Racial groups or sub-species (only an offensive word if you are corrupted by political valuations) have their own gene pools. Which determine the various observable physical features. This means that it’s very easy to indicate the different regions of the world various races can trace their origin to. Despite ubiquitous hybridization.

For instance, Mongoloids are phenotypically identifiable by short to medium body length, brown eyes, broad faces and low to medium nose bridges. They can be found mainly in Asia and the Americas. People with Negroid features mainly in Africa, Capoid in Southern Africa and Caucasoid, in Europe, and Western Asia.

Hybrids (mixed genetic ancestry) blur the lines. We exist in a physical and intellectual No Man’s Land. The manifestation of disorder, we are difficult to pinpoint in the world. So without this connection to a primary group identity and location we lack a homemade internal system of moral appraisal. We are indeed the “Other” my South African ID refers to – appraised only by inconsistent external standards.

Our Historical Experience

There can be no cohesive history in No Man's Land so invariably we are left judging all history by whatever modern standard we've been educated into giving importance to. Consequently our individual and collective historical experiences are self-centered and negative.

Most of us have the standard self-depreciating personal tale that we hope contributes enough to the liberal narrative to achieve some pitiful payoff. As children we were chased off whites-only public beaches and our parents weren't served in restaurants. Such apartheid experiences validate the poverty, malnutrition and alcoholism prevalent in our low income communities that are oddly well serviced by informal liquor stores and abortion clinics.

We've become forerunners in fetal alcohol syndrome rates. "Women included in the research acknowledged that they were aware that alcohol could detrimentally affect their babies, but they did not care".

The No Man's Land experience is that we will always be exposed to attack from both sides. We were and will never be a group whose interests are prioritized by whichever sub-species achieves power. This, however, does not mean we should be the perpetual victims of a racial hierarchy, always looking to assimilate into the apex group.

It means that without ties to a core group identity, location and history we have the opportunity to develop a truly unique and interesting character. Completely outside the boxes that politics and science has placed everyone else in.

I've always found white liberals to be more condescending than any openly racist conservative. Don't help me with my condition. Your charity only breeds servility and contempt.

The Coloured Character

No Man's Land is characterized by tribalism. We are prone to extreme violence, especially in the form of gangsterism. This characteristic is prominent because gangs, much like tribes, appeal to our specific psychology — they guarantee membership and territory.

When hungry we become corpses.

There is however, another often overlooked but fundamental characteristic. A distinct vanity, as you would have noticed by now, embedded in coloured identity and character. It's that particularly strong vanity, the type that provides refuge throughout years of wounded pride. It's the thread tying all coloureds together in a common culture. We are unjustifiably vain.

We've always been in the middle of the racial hierarchy. Never the good guys or the bad guys. So we have never carried any of the burdens associated with the wealth and power at the top. We've also never had to overcome the personal challenges associated with life on the bottom. We've never needed to accomplish anything, we haven't, and we know it.

No goal, no achievement, and no pride. So we collectively remind ourselves about our balanced good looks, lower middle class education and physical capabilities. As if these were important for the collective rather than the individual.

When full, we rival Hermes.

Core Coloured Values

Through identity, experience, and character, coloureds seem to have independently developed a Nietzschean philosophy which motivates all our actions and creates our communal circumstance. Anything that increases an individual's power is deemed good. Anything that decreases it is bad.

An after school power struggle.

Any action that this fundamental idea motivates is an action to increase individual power. Regardless of whether that action endangers one's own life. The values are therefore very simple, in any engagement, it would be good to win and bad to have your personal vanity checked. Hence the lack of sympathy a victim of violent crime receives in No Man's Land.

The weapon of choice for a young stabbist.

Conclusion

So why, since finding ROK, have I done as much as I can to red pill my brothers? Because the impulse to assimilate is preventing us from changing our circumstance and experience. We are not all going to be effeminate liberal clowns or international sports entertainers. But that doesn't mean our social activities should be limited to alcohol abuse and savage sword play.

Our out-the-box identity, un-burdened experience, vain cultural character and Nietzschean values are merely lacking an internal moral system. One that can provide a sense of connection to a core group code. This is where social pride comes from—internal motivation, not politics. We need to turn grey filth into gold and I believe ROK has the formula for this type of alchemy.

What we do not need is liberal charity that aims to turn us into socially agreeable, politically valuable, but permanently static pet projects.

Read More: How White Europeans Contributed To African Cultural Identity And Dignity

Narmer Bull
A coloured South African, and student of the ancient near east.

How To Be The Asshole That Beautiful Women Love

July 13, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

The following is a sponsored article by Troy Francis.

Having been into pickup since around 2004, and having read a great deal of game material by many diverse authors, one things that fascinates me about today's output is how little it is geared towards meeting women of high quality. By this I mean the very hottest girls: the singers, actresses and models; the 8s, 9s and 10s. Because surely this is the aim we all have, right? Isn't this why we got into pickup in the first place—to meet the sexist girls possible?

Remember the book The Game? In that, Neil Strauss talked about hitting on the likes of Paris Hilton and Britney Spears. There was a real sense, when it came out, that here was a volume that would teach us how to meet these upper-echelon girls.

Today most pickup advice is a lot more measured. These days—thankfully—it's not about canned lines and routines. These days it's about self-improvement and maximizing the number of approaches you can do. Which is great—I strongly advocate these practices myself. But where is the aspiration? Who is teaching us the mindsets and strategies necessary to have a chance of meeting the most beautiful women on the planet?

It struck me that there must be something, some special sauce, that can be identified that sets apart the world's greatest players from those who do well but don't often pick up the cream of the crop.

Asshole Game

How often do we hear that ‘nice guys finish last’? How often do we read that it’s the assholes, the jerks who get all the hot girls? All the time. And there’s this sense, isn’t there, that you are either a ‘nice guy’ or an ‘asshole’. And if you weren’t born with the ‘asshole gene’ then sorry, you’re just going to have to make do with the scraps along with all the other beta, nice guy losers.

I refuse to accept that is the case. I believe 100% in human beings’ ability to transform themselves into whatever they want to be. That being so, I wondered if there are specific characteristics of ‘assholeness’ that can be learned, so that the guy to whom they don’t come naturally is able to take advantage of their obvious benefits.

And by the way, this goes far beyond just picking up girls. I have recently been locked in (yet another) battle with an unscrupulous corporate employer. I’ve had a couple of these situations in recent years—where a company has tried to harm me and I’ve fought back. What they’ve taught me is that in an arena where your opponents will fight dirty to destroy you, you have to be prepared to do the same. And I’ve risen to the challenge. So while if you met me you might think me to be a ‘nice guy’—and indeed I am—I haven’t been afraid to use the tactics of the asshole when it’s been in my best interests to do so.

The political shenanigans I’ve been through at work renewed my interest in texts such as Oliver James’ excellent Office Politics: How To Thrive In A World Of Backstabbing, Lying And Dirty Tricks , as well as Robert Greene’s The 48 Laws of Power and Niccolo Machiavelli’s The Prince, all of which are invaluable for negotiating such situations.

The Dark Tetrad

Oliver James's Office Politics focuses heavily on the so-called 'dark triad' characteristics of Machiavellianism, narcissism and psychopathy. James' central thesis is that people who have all three are those most likely to thrive in a corporate environment, since they have no compunction in doing whatever it takes to get to the top.

Fascinatingly, there had also been a lot of coverage both on men's sites and in the mainstream media about the fact that women are most attracted to 'dark triad' men. The 'bad boys' who were getting access to quick and easy sex with hotties, as opposed to the 'good guys' who were made to wait seven dates and were expected to marry and take on responsibilities in return, were dark triad.

If anyone was looking for the DNA of the asshole then here it was.

But as I researched the dark triad further I became aware that there was a fourth element that researchers had identified to make up a 'dark tetrad'—sadism. And it seems pretty obvious in a post-50 Shades of Grey world that women are hot for a bit of (consensual) sadism.

Special Sauce

It was clear, though, that there was something else, some special sauce that was required to make even the dark tetrad man irresistible to the hottest women. After all there are plenty of guys with warped personalities out there and they're not all banging Taylor Swift.

It was at this point that I became really interested in the idea of radical differentiation (a term first coined by Ross Jeffries) and how it had helped me in my own development as a player. 'Radical differentiation' is the act of differentiating yourself as sharply as possible from your competition—other men. The more that you can do to stand out and be different, the more attractive you will be to women.

The Formula

And then it hit me: if you are able to harness dark tetrad characteristics to radical differentiation perfectly then you would be irresistible to the hottest women:

DARK TETRAD CHARACTERISTICS + RADICAL DIFFERENTIATION = IRRESISTIBLE TO THE HOTTEST WOMEN

Now for the disclaimer: of course, it is impossible for a regular guy to perfectly take on all of the dark tetrad characteristics fully, and nor should you want to. However, I realised that I had hit on something new. If you could get anywhere close to the formula above then your success with women would go through the roof. If guys took and applied this idea then it would be like nothing else since Mystery Method.

Ethics And Boundaries

Of course, there is an ethical dimension to this. You probably don't want to become a complete asshole and nor should you, since doing so won't make you happy. But if you can take on little elements of each of the four dark tetrad characteristics and radically differentiate yourself from your peers then not only will your success with girls go up exponentially, but you'll also find that you have stronger boundaries and you are less likely to get pushed around in work and social situations

In the end, when you bring it down to a more 'normal' level, the dark tetrad characteristics are about taking less shit from other people, while radical differentiation is about being yourself unapologetically. The great news is that if you can do both of these things then you will be truer to yourself as well as more attractive to beautiful women.

How To Be An Asshole (That Beautiful Woman Love)

These are the ideas I explore in my latest book of brand new material, HOW TO BE AN ASSH*LE (THAT BEAUTIFUL WOMEN LOVE) which was released as an Amazon Kindle ebook on Monday 10th July. This book presents a brand new formula for attracting beautiful girls which has the potential to revolutionise the game more radically than anything since The Mystery Method.

The book will also be released in paperback format soon.

Yes, it's hot on the heels of my last release HOW TO GET HOT GIRLS INTO BED , but I've had a lot more time to devote to writing recently, plus the idea for this book came to me almost in a flash and demanded to be written.

HOW TO BE AN ASSH*LE does what it says on the tin. It explores each element of the dark tetrad in turn, and considers how the regular guy might benefit from taking on elements of it in his own personality. It then goes on to examine radical differentiation, and how you can benefit by being more yourself and caring less what others think.

Then you will learn how you can put all of the pieces together to become a stronger, more dominant, alpha man who women are drawn to and men respect.

To get your copy of HOW TO BE AN ASSH*LE (THAT BEAUTIFUL WOMEN LOVE) as soon as it's released, visit this link. If you want to sleep with hotter girls and you want to stay up to date with the most cutting-edge thinking on how to do so then you need a copy of this book. I'm getting feedback from the first readers already and to say they're loving it is an understatement.

To order your copy of Troy's brand new game book HOW TO BE AN ASSH*LE (THAT BEAUTIFUL WOMEN LOVE) click here. (UK readers should click here.)

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

It’s Your Civic Duty To Fat Shame Obese Women

July 14, 2017 | by Jimbo Jones | Link | Original Link

I’ve always found it moronic—if not morosely comedic—that middle-aged women think the plastic proportions of Barbie dolls have a negative influence on the emotional well being of little girls.

Perhaps these “body positive” activists should try waltzing down the boys’ aisle some time. Row after row of miniature super-heroes and professional wrestlers, all sporting impossibly muscular physiques – surely, such perverse parodies of masculinity would have the same deleterious effects on boys’ developing body images, right?

Strangely, you don’t see 50-year-old men—with their sagging bellies and receding hairlines—raising a fuss about G.I. Joe’s “unrealistic” anatomy. Nor do you hear of any organizations attacking the NFL, NBA and bodybuilder magazines for giving boys unpleasant ideas about nigh-impossible-to-attain physiques.

Why? Because men do something that women simply don’t – when it comes to their own bodies, they take self-responsibility for the end-outcomes.

One look at the “fat activist” ranks demonstrates the “body acceptance” jihad is an almost entirely female phenomenon. Statistically, this makes sense, since the bulk—pun most definitely intended—of America’s obese populace is female. But therein lies a key difference between the sexes: while men wallow in obesity in relative silence, female fatasses are utterly obsessed with politicizing—and ultimately, weaponizing—their unhealthiness.

How a whale managed to get this far inland, I've no idea.

When irresponsibility becomes a "disease"

Obesity doesn't just happen out of the blue. In fact, there's an algorithmic process for how it happens – a person consumes far more calories than he or she expends on a day-to-day basis. One must marvel at the incredible gluttony that occurs for a 5'6 female to maintain a 300-pound-plus body weight. By one metric, to do so would require the person in question to gobble up at least 4,200 calories every 24 hours – more than double the recommended daily allowance established by the National Academies' Institute of Medicine.

In that, being fat isn't "a disease." It's the consequences of overconsumption and a sedentary lifestyle. But today's third wave feminists can't accept they and they alone are responsible for their miserable health conditions – and since it's much easier to normalize their biologically suicidal lifestyles than hit the treadmill, naturally they try to make a virtue out of their biggest character defects.

Don't you just love it when feminists use the phrase "unrealistic body image," as if thin, beautiful women don't exist anywhere in the world? As evident by the entire industry of modeling still existing, however, it quite obviously is possible to not be a lumbering, 300-pound wad of redundant adipose tissue. Of course, such requires moderation, dedication and vigilant repression of instant gratification wants – i.e., the kind of personal discipline and restraint fat women just can't muster.

Care for a shag?

Why would anybody be proud of being unhealthy?

At least men are honest about this kind of thing. Average Joes like you and me admit we don't have the kind of tenacity and willpower to have a physique like Brock Lesnar or JJ Watt. We don't blame "genetics" and "societal norms," we blame our damn selves for not having the proper impulse control and sticktoitiveness.

But feminists—the narcissists they are—don't dare fathom blaming themselves for their problems. Instead of admitting they're too lazy and undisciplined to look decent, they try to convince everybody else that there's nothing intrinsically wrong with them and that their triple chins and high blood pressure should be idolized as "the new beautiful."

So-called "fat-shaming" might just be the most pathetic event at the Self-Victimization Olympics. For one thing, since almost three-quarters of women in America are overweight, that actually makes them the majority and therefore logically incapable of taking refuge in "muh minority rights."

Furthermore, fat isn't an intrinsic characteristic, like race or gender – it's the aftereffects of idleness and gluttony. It's like being asked to take pity on a man who chose to saw off his arm for the insurance money, or feeling bad for a four-pack-a-day smoker with emphysema. Such fates could've easily been avoided, and the only person to be blamed for such pitiful circumstances are the individuals who CHOSE to engage in the dangerous behavior to begin with.

Civil rights revolve around what people are, not what they do. "Fat" is not an identity, it's a consequence – dare I say, even a representation of one's failing content of character. With more than 800 million people in the world at risk for starvation, how insulting is it that these fatass feminists dare posit themselves as "victims" of anything other than their own bad decisions?

It’s her body and her choice … only with your money paying the hospital bills.

Subsidizing bad choices

If we’re going to live in a welfare state in which almost 70 percent of the Federal budget is allocated to socialized medical care, fat-shaming is far from a form of discrimination – it’s actually a civic duty.

Right now, the health care costs associated with obesity is a floorboard-buckling $190 billion a year – accounting for almost a quarter of ALL healthcare spending in the United States.

Think about that. We could reduce one-fourth of ALL taxpayer-subsidized health costs if only these waddling, thunder-thighed, self-professed “BBWs” would lay off the Chunky Monkey and figure out how to use an elliptical every now and then.

If only those proud lardasses would drop a couple of pounds, the money used to pay for their Metformin prescriptions and motorized scooters could be diverted to fighting childhood cancer and finding cures for Alzheimer’s. Because these shameless Instagram whores are too vain to admit they’re killing themselves with terrible diets and too apathetic to stop cramming Ring Dings down their gullets like Tic-Tacs, millions of innocent children and senior citizens continue to suffer and die.

Don’t take it from me, take it from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention – obesity, a totally PREVENTABLE condition, is now the greatest contributing factor to death in this country.

There’s nothing liberating or empowering about that kind of self-destructive behavior and there’s absolutely nothing noble or admirable about sucking funding from taxpayers’ coffers to deal with the dire consequences of your own poor choices. In that, ridiculing, mocking and belittling fat women isn’t just reasonable – it very well could save untold lives.

Read More: 20 Things Women Do That Should Be Shamed, Not Celebrated

Jimbo Jones

Jimbo Jones is a nihilist ... but he's the nicest nihilist you'll ever meet.

5 Ways Northeast Asian Countries Benefit From Having No Diversity

July 14, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

The world's most prosperous and developed regions, or what we casually refer to as the "first world", are roughly divided into four key areas of the planet. They are Anglo North America (U.S. & Canada), Australasia (Australia & New Zealand), Europe (though northern Europe in particular), and Northeast Asia (excluding the communist nightmare North Korea).

The northeast Asian cluster of developed nations differs from it's European, North American, and South Pacific counterparts by being the only highly populous and high-income region of the world which is not predominately inhabited (or founded) by people of Germanic European extraction. Furthermore, these northeast Asian countries are the only advanced parts of the globe (along with Israel) which have absolutely no diversity or multiculturalism agenda being forced upon them.

This article will explore five ways in which the prosperous countries of this region (Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and mainland China to a smaller extent) greatly benefit by not having "diversity is our strength" garbage shoved down their throats by the global elite.

1. Enviously Low Crime Rates

Even people of northern European descent are statistically more likely to commit crimes than northeast Asians. The Japanese, Koreans, etc. are therefore WISE to not let us/them permanently migrate to their countries, as it would inevitably upset the very low crime rates they enjoy.

The native inhabitants of northeast Asian nations are arguably the most law-abiding on the planet, aided by having a very high average IQ, a docile temperament to civil authority, and cultures which highly emphasize honor and mutual respect. Japan for instance, is perhaps the most sincere country in the entire world, and famous for various "wallet drop" experiments which yield an amazingly high chance of having your property returned with all cash in it's proper place. (Good luck with that in Africa or Latin America).

Furthermore, all major cities in Taiwan, South Korea, Japan, and Hong Kong are like toy towns. They have absolutely fantastic and far-reaching metro systems, and overall safety levels so high you can literally (Hitler) throw a dart at anywhere on the city map, go to that area at two in the morning, and absolutely nothing is going to happen to you.

Why in the hell would these super safe and honorable cultures want to embrace and "celebrate" diversity and multiculturalism? Bringing in distant foreigners, who are routinely lower IQ and prone to higher rates of crime and degeneracy (yup, white people included!), would not only be outright foolish, it would be completely anti-humanist in regards to the well-being of the native citizens.

2. Excellent Social Cohesion

> We fight as a single, inpenetrable unit. ~~Diversity~~ That is the source of our strength. – Leonidas, King of Sparta (300)

In the later decades of the 20th century, the comparatively small island nation of Japan became the world's second largest economy and a technological powerhouse, and ethnic and cultural "diversity" had nothing to do with their massive success. Mainland China has also really been able to spread it's wings now in the 21st century, and they couldn't have done it without the aid of racial diversity and free-for-all Islamic immigration (not).

And how about the business environment of South Korea? It's Samsung Corporation has enjoyed phenomenal global power and success with it's various consumer electronics, while it's Seoul headquarters is 99% ethnic Korean. So considering the great success of these monocultures, can ethnic and cultural diversity really be considered a source of "strength" as the West regurgitates, or rather a source of friction and discord?

A Korean family looking at moving within Daegu. They do not need to research "bad neighborhoods" like Americans do, because everywhere will be inhabited by the same low-crime prone people with the same ethnic heritage, language, culture, and values as them.

The awful truth is that diversity has no inherent strengths. At face value it's merely neutral at best, while it can only be a potential catalyst for major societal issues/weaknesses. In fact, study after study shows that ethnic and cultural diversity leads to a lack of social trust and community cohesion. Additionally, most people around the world demonstrate a clear preference for 'homophily', which is the tendency of people to prefer the company of others who are most like themselves when entirely left to their own devices.

One of the reasons the countries of northeast Asia are so successful is that they have great social trust and cohesion, aided primarily because everyone shares the same ethnic heritage, speaks the same language, and shares the same culture, values, and traditions.

On the other hand, the rampant multiculturalism occurring in North America, Europe, and Australasia is leading to increasing social strife and discord, sometimes culminating in instances of mass violence. Even Roosh has done a video which demonstrates the folly of multiculturalism.

3. Time And Money Saved On “Diversity” Crap

A Japanese boardroom embracing the only “diversity” that actually matters. Diversity of portfolios, investments, ideas, and RESULTS.

All over the Western world, corporations and media organizations spend untold amounts of time and money telling everyone about how wonderful diversity is. Meanwhile, the non-diverse nations of northeast Asia can just… sort of carry on with their valuable time and keep making money.

When there is next to no diversity, there is no inherent need to even acknowledge it’s existence. This is why countries like Japan, South Korea, and Taiwan don’t have to waste time with such asinine things like “sensitivity awareness” or “diversity training” within their corporate working environments.

Australia Post unleashing the same virtue signaling SJW Diarrhea we’ve come to expect from this formerly great country. Japan, Korea, and Taiwan don’t even have to bother with eye rolling time wasters like this.

And it’s not just the private sector, multiculturalism and diversity are major time and money drains within the government realm as well. Having to translate documents into over half a dozen languages (ever been to a California DMV?) and the amount of resources spent on refugee welfare programs could be better utilized trying to get everyone to assimilate as quickly as possible. Northeast Asian countries simply don’t have any of these problems, because they wisely chose to opt out of the diversity shtick.

4. No Islamic Terrorism

If you don't have followers of Islam in your midst, then you won't have Islamic terrorism. It's really that simple. Somehow the current Muslim mayor of hyper-multicultural London did not get that memo, and instead tried to save the face of his religion (and SJW mindset) by saying that terrorism is just "part and parcel of living in a big city".

Meanwhile, Tokyo is the largest metropolitan area in the world and they have absolutely no Islamic terrorism. Because the religion of Islam is not there, other than the most token of numbers. Other cities in northeast Asia like Osaka, Seoul, Busan, Shanghai, Taipei, Sapporo, Kaohsiung, etc. don't have any problems with Islamic terrorism either for the same reasons.

By comparison, just a little further abroad in southeast Asia, Islam is nothing but a source of friction or even outright violence in the countries where it has a large footing. Muslim-majority Malaysia imposes various levels of economic and civil discrimination towards non-believers, Muslim-majority Indonesia has suffered bombing attacks, and the Philippine island of Mendanao has been engaged in an ongoing conflict that is Islamic in origin.

As Black Pigeon Speaks has pointed out, wherever there is Islam and the other, there is always conflict. The nations of northeast Asia would be wise beyond measure to make sure that the religion of Islam does not ever gain any significant foothold in their territory.

5. Safe And Satisfied Tourists

Western tourists in Taipei. Unlike modern London or Paris, their chances of getting robbed/conned by Africans or stabbed to death in an Islamic whack job is pretty much zero.

Northeast Asia's fantastic natural human capital (high IQ, low crime, hard-working, non-belligerent people) along with the regions lack of cultural diversity tends to work wonders on their domestic tourist industries. Other than the relatively high costs of the region (especially Japan), visitors to these countries tend to express very high levels of satisfaction with their experience.

Tourists routinely give praise to the high perceptions of personal safety, lack of street harassment and scams by unwanted foreigners (unlike many modern cities in Europe), and appreciation for the regions unique cultures. Unique cultures which, unlike the West, are not being tainted with such a degree of forced multiculturalism and degeneracy that many native inhabitants no longer even recognize their own countries.

Safe and satisfied tourists equals great word of mouth and even repeat visits, which are things that "diversity is our strength" countries like Brazil and South Africa routinely miss out on, as those nations have much poorer reputations for personal safety. Tourist numbers to formerly picturesque cities like London and Paris have also been hit hard in recent times, as the recent spate of terrorist attacks is driving away outside spenders.

Conclusion

Besides having more "food options," the facts show there is no logical benefit to diversity, and countries that are not diverse would be wise to keep things that way. While Japan, Korea, and Taiwan will still be ethnically and culturally Japanese, Korean, and Chinese at mid-century, it is a complete Pandora's Box as to how much Europe, North America, and Australasia will change for the worse.

Read Next: Only White Countries Are Expected To Let In Hordes Of Illegal Migrants

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

The Myth That Liberals Are More Fair And Less Authoritarian Than Conservatives

July 14, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

For years, a meme has been promoted by institution-occupying liberals who pretend to be “political scientists”: liberals care about fairness, whereas conservatives value authority and purity. At face value, the idea seems to be only that liberals and conservatives are different political tribes, who love and value different things.

The meme, however, has an important implicit content. It could be summed up this way: liberals are enlightened, conscious of universal values, have a wider range of feelings and experience, and are more “humane.” They are more intelligent and more fully human. Conservatives, on the other hand, are narrow-minded, more partial, more selfish and less intelligent. Strangely, liberals have no problem using IQ and SAT scores to cast themselves as superior whereas they spent decades shrieking at them and partially outlawed them when they indicated racial differences.

The meme has been repeated countless times on institutional outlets. A MSM outlet used it to dwell on how to manipulate Trump voters into espousing liberal sympathies through a narrative supposed to take their moral preferences into account. There are studies backing the idea, yet they are mostly if not only drawn up by liberals who steer their respondents where they want to through clever questions. The idea goes completely in the sense of typically liberal ideas, worldview and values-judgment: it is too perfectly liberal to be true.

Are liberals caring more about justice and fairness?

First of all, what is justice? In the academia, Plato or Aristotle's classical answers tend to be considered as little more than a formality before entering into modern-leftist theories, mostly inspired by utilitarianism or John Rawls. These are well tucked into the usual narrative. Utilitarianism goes along with an abstract, rootless view of individuals, is used as an excuse for managerialism—as the great calculators are supposed to know how you can contribute to the "greater good" more than you do—and "widening the circle"—reshaping your identity and social norms whether you want it or not.

Allegedly against utilitarianism one can find John Rawls' moral theory, which uses a different procedure but also goes along with abstract individuals and special policies for whoever gets acknowledged as "unprivileged." As for virtues, they are scarcely considered aside perhaps as an enabler for modern-Leftist theories.

No matter if you choose "socialist Aristotelianism" with (((Martha Nussbaum))), "anti-specist"—a fancy word for vegetarian—utilitarianism with (((Peter Singer))), or another of the officially available brands, all accept the same dogmas from the start and lead to the same conclusions. Namely, to "social justice" as the left appropriated the notion, to a stance that goes well with liberal feel-goodism and pro-"minorities" stance.

Behind the brands, "justice" in the SJW-stolen academia means pushing their narrative, taking more from the dispossessed majority, excluding and disenfranchising it evermore, rewriting history so that our ancestors who built, created and sustained pretty much everything in the West are either cast as villains, omitted as creators, or reframed as mere predecessors of leftism.

Of course the seemingly abstract, vernacular-riddled theories of justice that are taught in the academia are never confronted to reality outside of the narrative. Said reality is only evoked through omissions and distortions. When these are hard to do, reality is dismissed as “their worldview”—non-leftists are the real Other these days—reduced to ridiculous theories. If you want to “explain Trump vote”, why don’t you just ask voters?

Many whites have noticed how they were led to work more for less, to throw themselves into a tiresome competition that was designed for them to lose, and were hated by “minorities” unless they went SJWs themselves. This is a very common observation amongst people who perceive outside of the blue pill.

Former workers, former nice guys, legitimate heirs of the Western civilization… are deprived, defamed and sidetracked. Simultaneously, urban minoritists go power cultish, MSM drove into their own hysteria, Hillary clearly showed how greedy and careless she was, and the wealthy, powerful liberals boast about running or reshaping the world, no less. Where are justice or fairness here?

Theories appear mere tools in their deadly power plays. To know about justice, throw John Stuart Mill, Rawls and all the official garbage literature aside—read Plato and Aristotle instead.

Are liberals more sympathetic?

Leftists want very much to believe so. They portray themselves as caring about the fashionable victims of the day and love to point out how self-absorbed “the wealthy” are, how “repressive” patriarchs were, or how “autistic” the alt right would be. Curiously, they have no problem stigmatizing people who were born with autism, and will shift from mocking the ten-year-old Barron Trump to celebrating the allegedly Aspie icon Mark Zuckerberg if called out for their callousness.

Liberals may be sometimes truly sympathetic, but their sympathy is by no way universal or based on explicit rules. The so-called bleeding hearts have a very selective and arbitrary policy. I remember a time when the Che was cool and South America fashionable, because of all the revolutionaries there, but now the whole thing has fallen out of fashion and I know of bourgeois bohemians who despise the poor and middle classes south of Mexico.

Liberals “love” unwomanly women and have no problem with propelled careerists telling people to vote them merely because they have a vagina but will choose that, say, Marine Le Pen does not represent feminism women. Liberals will grant pussy passes but harm their own children because they see them as too white, “privileged” or guilty of being born with balls.

The same craziness can be found in girls shrieking for their “right” to kill their own children with the taxpayers’ forced help, or in these women who, instead of being caring and nurturing as their own nature wants to, turned into self-absorbed capitalists managing their social capital. Ayn Rand wouldn’t have gone that far in her lack of kindness.

On the other hand, only the dissenters, those made evil by the System, show kindness and warmness towards the dreaded white-cishet-male-this-and-that. And we know of the hypocritical, uncaring, double-faced leftist authority. No, liberals are definitely neither sympathetic nor caring outside of their own virtue-signalling shows. If they had a heart, they would care about us instead of giving passes to invaders and criminals.

Do conservatives care more about loyalty?

Plausibly, both purported political tribes are loyal although not to the same things. Liberals have a sense of loyalty and identification to their own party, to the “cultural” institutions they took over, to their ideology, to their networks. Confusing their own minoritists with the social categories these pretend to embody, they have often accused of “false consciousness” or stupidity by those belonging to these categories yet refusing to worship minoritarians.

There is also a lot of liberal hostility to those who were once liberals then joined a non-liberal party—no matter how obedient to leftism this party actually is—or took their independence. As a friend of mine once said, the left looks for traitors whereas the right courts converts.

Conservatives, of course, have their sense of loyalty too. In a normal society, this should be a quality, not an euphemism for “ha, you inferior chauvinist!” However, I would contend that genuinely prosocial conservatives should sense loyalty for something else than Founding Fathers, a flag that separates them from other whites, purported rights or fuzzy values.

Also, more than a few conservatives have a very real loyalty to leftist values, which is why they make such ridiculous efforts to pander to “minorities” and suffer when tagged “racists”: they really want not to be “racists” but considered respectable by culture-controlling leftists. Ultimately, these conservatives should understand that leftist pseudo-values have been tailored to disenfranchise them—or they will remain dominatrix-worshipping cucks indefinitely.

Does anyone still care about individual rights?

Some libertarians, scattered between conservative niches and remote corners of the Internet, still do. Others have understood that the very framework of abstract individuals and rights is but a fiction and that what is going on is something else: a battle between two mighty powers, the system-controlling left that radicalizes itself all the time, and we the people who keep struggling for our survival against the Hydra.

Abstract individualism has always been used for political ends—from destroying throne and altar in the eighteenth century to anti-white, misandric, family-phobic “social justice” now. True individuals always come from particular families, have a specific temperament, a sex, a race, and at least for some a particular calling.

“Rights” bestowed to individuals no matter who and what they are is more of an absurdity than of an ideal, and the left itself stopped pretending to believe in this as it was working tirelessly to deny us any right. Believing the Hydra should be tolerated or kept alive because “free speech” seems misplaced loyalty and idiocy. Fortunately, righters have been pushing well beyond this obsolete scheme.

The polar opposites have shifted

“Yeah, we’re all about care and fairness, only conservatives are all about authority. Now SHUT UP AND RESPECT MY AUTHORITY!”

Thomas Sowell famously theorized that liberals had an “unconstrained” mindset. Liberals would be more unrealistic but also more creative and able to perceive potentialities, whereas conservatives would be “constrained”, thus more prudent but more limited. Now, what we are going through is the exact opposite.

Liberals have stiffened into their own anti-white, anti-male radicalization. Many of them have become unable to think about their SJW box, spouting pseudo-sophisticated sneers wherever they go, and drowning into hysteria if their pretension is exposed. We on the other hand benefited from being deprived of the cucks’ hobnobbing with Democrats, and having much less to lose or fear, we’ve been able to go past the Leftist engineered walls.

We are the side of potentialities, of creativity, of experimentations. We have much less means and firepower than liberals, for they are the system. We are also those whom liberals should consider valuing less—not more—authority, as they pretend to cultural and normative authority and cannot stand serious criticism.

Justice is ours. Fairness is ours. “Social justice” as they have come to use it is a monstrous illusion, an ideological bludgeon borne out of the sheer will to destroy the creators and sustainers of the Western civilization.

Liberals have an impressive intellectual and metapolitical history, although acknowledging the second aspect already implies a critical perspective from their dogma that drifting leftwards equals “progress.” Yet they undermined themselves through arrogance, hysteria, ideological stiffness and intolerance, and denying realities dozens of millions of Westerns go through daily. We can ground ourselves on both the reality principle and creativity to flip all their vacuous talking points and expose them.

Read Next: 5 Cultural Milestones Where Leftists Assume Zero Responsibility For Their Choices

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Billionaire’s Daughter Dumps Nice Guy For Sexy Gang Banger, Proves Crime Really Does Pay

July 16, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Nice guys with rich, beautiful, or even just average girlfriends, beware. “Hot con” Jeremy Meeks is on the prowl and proving once again that criminally-inclined men, especially good-looking ones, almost always win with women. He has just snared Chloe Green, the daughter of British billionaire Sir Philip Green. In the process, he has apparently cuckolded Green’s nice-guy-boyfriend and demolished his own marriage with the woman who stood by him while he was in prison.

Here’s the rich in girl in question:

Even as a 4/10 (arguably), Green is constantly surrounded by many of Britain and the world’s most eligible bachelors. Of all the men she could choose from, she selected one with a felonious past and gang affiliations.

We told you so

Robert Cavalli, the son of a mega-wealthy fashion designer, didn’t stand a chance against Jeremy Meeks.

Over a year ago, I wrote an article entitled, "Every Violent Male Criminal Is Rewarded With Sex From Beautiful Women". I described high-profile cases of hot women falling for men who had been in prison as a "a microcosm of a significantly wider trend." From Ted Bundy to Jeremy Meeks, a lot of girls, many of them very high-quality in physical terms, either will actively chase violent men or would love to if given the chance.

Despite the mounting evidence (and the gut feelings of almost all of us), countless men still rationalize that they can find and keep a woman by being considerate, a good provider, and otherwise fully attentive to her needs. The problem is that so many guys confuse what they think are her needs with her true needs.

Jeremy Meeks has been accused of 'stealing' Chloe Green from Robert Cavalli after Meeks and Green were spotted all over each other on a yacht in the Mediterranean. Even if we disregard Meeks' much better looks, Cavalli, with all due respect, has the demeanor of a wimp in comparison:

He had no chance.

There's no point in moralizing what happened here, largely because female psychology is not morally-inclined by nature. No amount of 'love' or fealty to Cavalli prevented Chloe Green from following her biological imperative.

She just couldn’t resist a convicted felon.

Meeks’ good looks don’t explain everything

There’s no doubt that Meeks sits on one of the highest rungs in terms of raw male attractiveness. That said, the popularity he now enjoys is really due to his criminal rap sheet. Being handsome was a necessary but not sufficient condition for his newfound fame. Just as many are silly for assuming that having game obviates the advantages other men have in being more physically attractive, good looks are not a sure-fire way to drown in pussy.

Men like The O.C.'s Chris Carmack are arguably just as good-looking as Meeks, but fade from public view. Meeks' looks do not explain everything.

The world has millions of good-looking people who will never come close to capturing the public's attention like Meeks has. Every five times you visit a run-of-the-mill coffee store in a major city, you're likely to see a male barista or patron who rivals or perhaps surpasses Meeks in the looks department. Yet the former is earning minimum wage or an average salary while the latter is reaping the rewards of his extended past as a miscreant.

If you want even more profound examples of this, look no further than the celebrity world, where a revolving door's worth of good-looking men are discarded. Recently a girl I was with bought a copy of a terrible straight-to-DVD film called The Butterfly Effect 3, the second sequel to the original film starring Ashton Kutcher. I struggled to remember where I knew the male lead from, but eventually realised it was Chris Carmack from The O.C.

Carmack and those like him, irrespective of their looks, will never be a Jeremy Meeks precisely because they didn't go down the path of crime and a disregard of authority. Study after study is demonstrating that women prefer men with darker and badder personalities, most commonly in the form of the Dark Triad. Good looks may ice the cake, but they don't bake it.

Things are going to get much worse

Kate Rothschild got similarly wet for bad boy rapper Jay Electronica as Chloe Green did for Jeremy Meeks. Electronica didn't have Meeks' overtly criminal past, but the feel Rothschild got from him would have been close to identical.

A permissive social environment encouraging women to slut it up is only going to encourage the sort of behavior Chloe Green demonstrated on that yacht. Men without a knowledge of game and even many of those with it will continue to face an uphill battle. They will struggle to get and then keep average women, let alone high-quality ones, in the face of competition from life-long, real bad boys with a history of objectively anti-social or foul behavior.

Society is very unlikely to change its present course. I predict (and I'm sure others will, too) that many of game's current value-demonstrating routines will become redundant or far less effective. The sexual marketplace will make Main Street versions of a Chloe Green all the more common. Roosh himself admitted in his recent Q&A session that Bang had a shelf-life of about ten years, which is why he is writing a new book that can last for thirty.

Funnily enough, even 'respectable' families like the Rothschilds have found a daughter falling for either criminally-inclined men (her recent boyfriend) or men who give off the air of being unashamedly intimidating (her former boyfriend). Kate Rothschild destroyed her marriage with Ben Goldsmith, himself from a very Rothschild-like family, when she got the tingles for rapper Jay Electronica. Last year she was dating a former drug dealer, showing that the elite are not immune from the degeneracy they squeeze onto the masses.

The moral of the story is that crime often pays for men's sexual relationships with women. Good looks certainly help, but plenty of either good-looking women or high status women from the 'best' families are unable to resist the man with the dark, violent past.

Read More: Every Violent Male Criminal Is Rewarded With Sex From Beautiful Women

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Game Of Thrones Is Successful Because It Reminds Us Of What We Lack

July 16, 2017 | by Mark Derian | Link | Original Link

I've seen every episode of Game of Thrones. While immersed in the show's dream of swords and breasts, my consciousness is mostly incapacitated, but periodically it jolts awake and I find myself thinking, "this is Dungeons and Dragons, except instead of playing I'm watching, and instead of being with people, I'm alone." Perhaps I'm with my girlfriend but watching a serialized show with your girlfriend is a good way to feel alone.

Yet I keep watching because I sense a nutrition in the soap opera. Starving children eat the clay beneath their feet because it contains essential minerals. They haven't analyzed the earth scientifically, of course, but ethereally they know they need what's in the dirt. Post-modernity's dirt is Game of Thrones. It may be filled with bacteria and disease and perhaps even crap, but it gives us what we need—what our psychologies crave.

George Martin, Comic Book Guy incarnate, is a history buff and so created the show as an homage to the War of the Roses. This was a 30-year period during the 15th Century in which the Lancaster and York families battled each other to reign on the English throne. The war probably seemed like a big deal at the time but it ended up being inconsequential. The fact that we can fixate on two families in a pointless gang war indicates two essential minerals for our psychology: family and values. Of course, family values.

Women need Game of Thrones more than men

The incessant stand-offs, boobs, and swords (which never not represent masculinity), would make us think the viewers are predominantly men. However, the most represented viewer demographic is single women located on the coasts (i.e., feminists). Except feminists, with their attachment disorder parading as independence, rebel against family values. Yet they need family values like they need Vitamin D. Game of Thrones bridges this gap of cognitive dissonance as a way for women to nourish themselves with something that's supposed to disgust them. It's a spoonful of sugar for the Huffington Post crowd.

The characters are constrained by family as their purpose is to fulfill the obligations of their family. But the obligation carries with it the security of structure. Postmodernity is the opposite. We have the cultural freedom to cut loose family ties, but we lack the personal freedom to become individuated. Without a properly formed psychology, we gradually enmesh ourselves in whoever happens to be nearby.

We equivocate and kowtow. Instead of definitive responsibilities, we have loose plans. We cater to middle managers. We're free to do what we want, but we lack the psychological foundation to be free. The confines we create are invariably passive aggressive. Freedom means nothing without transcendence, which postmodernism's mother, critical theory, has executed. Knowledge without responsibility is the bedrock of anxiety.

The character Daenerys is the feminist on the inside who gives the main viewer a foothold into the show. The man she loved, the man who could have made her happy, was placed in a world that would eventually kill him. She has since attracted only orbiters who pine for her but could never satisfy her. To fill the void of subservience she has three dragons that, not coincidentally, have the temperament of cats. They want to be left alone except on their terms. They give her the archetype of an alpha whose attention she can use her femininity to appease. In the meantime, her neglected libido drives her to conquer cities through power she's gained for no other reason than she's accidentally magic.

Without boundaries that would limit a lesser being, Daenerys develops a savior complex, and so feels the savior's pain of being forsaken. Like a woman in the modern-day nonprofit, she tries to help people who don't love her, with haphazard results. It keeps her busy, and there have been worse existences, but no one would diagnose Daenerys a happy woman.

Game Of Thrones provides a surrogate life

The feminist's cubicle is makeshift, and worthy men become even more scarce as she ages, but she has outlets for her nature. Instead of organizing her husband's finances she organizes her boss's finances. Instead of taking trips with her family, she attends company retreats. Instead of making dinner for dependents, she goes out to dinner with codependents. She convinces herself it's progress because self-deception knows no limits. But the truth of her situation is sporadically inescapable via the panic attack: no one loves her and she doesn't love anyone.

For the male mind, to be released from family is unfortunate, but manageable. We still have our callings of science and philosophy and wealth accumulation. But for the female mind, to live for itself is an empty motion. The feminine achievement is the association. Without relationships, there can be no meaning, no reality.

Modern woman has not only forgotten about the water of feminism that surrounds her, but she's anesthetized to the drowning. Then a television show comes out that subjugates women to the family and the code of masculinity, and she glues herself to it. It's the opening scene in every dystopian novel: the hero stumbles across a relic from the past enlightenment.

The penultimate season airs this weekend. I cannot make decent predictions about what will happen because I have terrible instincts for that sort of thing, but I know what I would say if I were in that writer's room: take out the Iron Throne, the Platonic Good, the ultimate ideal everyone is after. We know what happens when characters have something to fight for, now let's find out what happens when the structure is removed. How will people act when there is no more code? Without a value, what could possibly be the need for the family?

Then the show will become, like all great art, a full-length mirror for society. At least then I'll be able to convince myself I don't regret watching it.

Read More: Has Game of Thrones Lost its Magic?

Mark Derian
Mark Derian is a graduate student in psychology. follow him on Twitter

3 More Fashion Accessories That You Should Try Out

July 16, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Last week, I did an article on the various types of men's fashion accessories, and how you can use them to subtly put the metaphorical cherry on top of your wardrobe. I also warned you against some of the bad advice you see on other men's websites, including "peacocking" and the idea that an accessory can save an otherwise bad foundation. I also promised that I would do another article on some of the types of accessories that I didn't mention in my first article.

So without further ado, here are three more men's accessories that you can really use to stand out from the crowd.

Vests

While some may dispute that a vest (or waistcoat, for my friends across the Atlantic) is an "accessory", they are simply not an essential to a suit as they once were. And besides, I find them to really be something that makes a suit "pop".

The vest smoothes out rumples in the shirt and gives you extra pockets, plus you can wear them without the jacket (Except for the sort of vest that has a false back, obviously those need a jacket.) The best part is, you can wear them in a wide variety of colors: you can match the waistcoat with the jacket to get the ultra-refined three piece suit look, or alternate colors to really make yourself noticeable. Just make sure that the vest falls properly and covers the belt (but not beyond that).

Combine the vest with a tie chain or pocket watch if you really want to get that "better than you” look—and I always do.

Here we can see two examples of vest usage—the left a semi-casual attire that one might wear on a date, and the latter more formal. Whether the colors match or contrast, the vest is a good look

While vests can indeed be worn as outerwear, this should be avoided

Pocket Square

One of the quintessential accessories worn with any proper jacket, whether it be a suit jacket, blazer, or an odd sport coat. Placed in the breast pocket (which should be on the left side of the jacket unless you’ve made a terrible mistake in buying your clothes), it can add color and/or panache to your overall ensemble.

Typically, a pocket square should be contrasting, like a white pocket square for a black suit, or complimentary, like a warm colored pocket square for a cool colored jacket—the one rule for pocket square coloration is that you NEVER have the pocket square be the same color as the jacket or the tie. The whole point of pocket squares is that it provides a bit of contrast and attention, and it can’t do that if it’s matching something else. It has to compliment, it is garnish.

Also know that the pocket square is NEVER used as a handkerchief, it is part of your outfit. Keep a handkerchief or tissues in your back pocket if you need one.

Folding pocket squares is itself a way to make or break this accessory. As luck would have it, the methods of folding a pocket square are pretty simple, and will be detailed in the following pictures. Bear in mind I have used a neckerchief in these pictures because it is bigger. The actual pocket square is much smaller.

The straight fold is the most basic, it is done by folding the pocket square lengthwise, then width-wise (leaving a little edge), and then lengthwise again.

The point fold is my favorite, and it is as follows:

Lay the pocket square on a flat surface, and bring one corner to another corner, making a triangle. Then fold the left corner to the right, and the right corner over the left corner fold that you just made. And finally, fold the bottom up towards the point, but not covering the point.

The Puff Fold is done by laying the square flat on the table, and pinching the middle while picking it up, allowing the folds to come together naturally. Hold the middle of the wadded fabric as you gather up the bottom of the square.

Boutonniere

Some may balk at this, but I'd recommend it. Just wearing it shows confidence and you can get them for free in the right season, and it'll certainly make you stand out. It is properly worn on the left side of the breast, near the heart, and keeping it simple and subtle is the key to pulling it off. Remember contrasting colors, complimentary colors, etc.

You push it through the lapel buttonhole on the left side. The stem is held in place with a loop in the jacket (your jacket may not have this), the calyx should be pushed into the button hole which locks it into place. Since most jackets don't have the boutonniere loops, try pins.

The flower is typically a carnation, white being the most formal. Various flowers are worn for various events, just avoid green carnations since that has been appropriated as a symbol of the gay community.

A carnation, the standard

An unusual boutonniere using various fruits instead of a flower, but it doesn't look half bad. Try it if you want to create a sort of "humble yeoman" look

Yes, that is a toiletry boutonniere. No, you shouldn't wear it. You should also know that a baseball cap + a suit = an embodiment of modern failure.

Remember, accessories are not a game changer, if your clothes are shit the accessory won't work. But if you are already well dressed, the accessory takes from good-yet-ordinary to extraordinary

Read More: How To Choose Fashion Accessories

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

YouTube Blocks Conservative Views While Allowing Video That Teaches Children How To Use Dildos

July 17, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

---

[image]

After the detestable propaganda contained in the latest #MoreThanARefugee and #ProudToBe videos, which Youtube actively promoted, they are doubling down by not removing a video called Parents Explain Masturbation, which teaches young children how to use dildos. This comes only three months after Youtube demonetized dozens of conservative channels.

You might need eye-bleach after watching the video. At least, the dislikes and comments show that people are not blind.

[image]

(((American Utopia)))

The channel that published it is WatchCut, a basic bitch leftist channel, sponsored by Those Who Shall Not Be Criticised. Those channels always have the same boring, liberal click-bait themes: “Donald Trump = Bad Bad”, “Homo = Good”, “Christian = Bad” (while obviously Judaism and Islam = Off Limits). They have probably bought fake subscribers too.

[image]
Sex sex sex sex

The subtle psyop is achieved by presenting what the Left wants you to believe are the new normal families of the Brave New Western World:

[image] [image] [image] [image] [image]

In the video, white men are portrayed as beta, single, without wife in sight, or married to unfuckable women of another race. White women are ugly feminists or obese single moms with race-mixed, bastard, overweight children. Siblings are depicted as having different fathers or adopted. Non-white women are slender and prettier, post-wall thousand cock veterans that look fun to bed.

[image]
If someone asks me why I believe it should be illegal for over-the-hill mad feminists to have their defective eggs fertilised, I will show them this picture.

Chosen bits

[image]

> It kinda looks like a finger. Imagine like, they’d probably do it, like erm…

Beta dad explaining about female masturbation, something he absolutely knows nothing about as he probably has not seen a vagina since the conception of his son… if that really is his biological child.

> Mother: Remember when you found mine and I told you that was a back massager? (giggles)
>
> “That was… oh, Mommy…

Red pill dropped. Yes, your mother is promiscuous and you probably were an accident. The child is already so gay before reaching puberty for not having a father figure to teach him about being a man, I could not tell his sex until he spoke. He expresses himself like a toddler but is probably ten years old.

> Have you ever masturbated before? It is OK if you do.

No one will know except the millions of viewers of this video that your mother dragged you into to give herself that “so tolerant” attention buzz to compensate for her dying eggs and your whole family turning their back on her because of your absent father.

> Even if when I have a partner, I still like to masturbate. With that thing, you don't even need a boy!

Translation: Even if I get a bang from a drunk chubby-chaser of Craigslist once every three years, I still masturbate to forget my cold, empty bed where I cry myself to sleep while blaming white men for the bad choices I am responsible for. Strong independent womyn don't need no man. They need liters of Pinot Grigio, a rat-wheel career and three cats.

[image]

> Mom, did you ever masturbate?
>
> Oh yes, I think the first time was in Kindergarten.

The child's awkwardness is palpable, she does not even want to be there.

YouTube keeps ignoring its users and will pay the price

Youtube, you will never learn. You have been revealed as the controlled brainwashing liberal machine that you are, slave to those in charge and peddling your filth to our youngest minds.

More than Bacha Bazi, Taqqiya, FGM and Jihad

Viewers did not wait to speak their minds

It is now clear that the gloves are off. With videos portraying children as sexual beings, celebrating homosexual mental illness, or praising radical Islam are acclaimed and sent to the trending section while conservative channels, just by exposing facts that do not fit the leftist narrative, see their content blocked or their videos demonetized, you know that we have crossed a threshold in the culture war.

deleting likes, manipulating truth, what else can we expect from the libs

Répondre · 6520

r

Wow, so we cannot even choose to dislike this propaganda? What is the point of having a dislike button if Youtube keep on deleting the dislike count. This is censorship and unethical at it's finest.

Répondre · 2010

Wrong on so many levels

A video showing kids how to masturbate is something I hoped I would never witness in my lifetime, but here we are. Who are the sick minds who push sexual education in schools, on the Internet, and in every media outlet so kids think it is normal to be sexual beings at their early age? I have an idea but I can't quite put it in words.

[image]

If parents talk to their children about sex, it should be done in the privacy of their own home and when kids are actually approaching puberty, if it should be done at all. This decision is incumbent to the father and the media should not be involved.

This video has no other goal but celebrating the pride of being a loser. What those adults are really saying is: "I find non-reproductive, self-provided masturbation awesome and the media thinks it is trendy to teach it to my kids. I say it without shame. It is great to be a pussy, not grabbing life by the balls to find a partner, live happy, and have children. Thanks (((liberal media)))!"

[image]

It is not the first time that we raise the alarm on the left's efforts to normalise the sexualisation of children. Here are a few articles we already published on the subject:

- 4 Ways National Geographic Is Furthering A Degenerate Leftist Narrative
- Montreal Celebrates 8-Year-Old Drag Queen And The Perverted Sexualization Of Boys
- Homosexuality Acceptance Is Leading To The Normalization Of Pedophilia
- Today's Youth Are Being Encouraged To Become Transsexual
- Sweden Continues To Fund Bizarre And Inappropriate Sex Education For Young Children

The fight is not over and we must expose this great evil until its promoters are defeated.

La censure est devenue la norme

While attracting people for its reach and the possible creation of revenue, Youtube takes dangerous steps against its users' freedom of thought and slips into full blown censorship. We see this phenomenon becoming more frequent with the rise of dissenting voices.

The company also keeps deleting comments and dislikes on videos like#MoreThanARefugee and #ProudToBe that were featured in the Youtube Spotlight section to reach a maximum number of viewers, regardless of their recommended videos choices or disagreement with the political propaganda contained in the segments. As one commenter astutely put it "You can delete comments, Youtube. But you can't delete the truth".

Read More: 4 Ways National Geographic Is Furthering A Degenerate Narrative

---

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

3 Reasons Why The Corporate Elites Support Mass-Immigration

July 17, 2017 | by Peyton Farquhar | Link | Original Link

Much has been written about the strange bedfellows of the establishment left. What unites feminists, Islamists, anarchists, Bernie-bros, LGBTQ+, BLM rioters, and Hillary voters often seems to be little more than rebellious hatred for Western Civilization. However, that still does not explain what motivates their upper-echelon donors. What causes the—mostly white and male—chairmen and executives of the Western, corporate elite to financially support the very people who would gladly see them hanged in the streets?

The short answer is a deadly combo of greed and virtue-signaling, exacerbated by a small cohort of anti-white agitators. While this is a varied and complicated issue, for simplicity's sake this article will focus solely on the effects this has on immigration policy.

Quite tellingly, the entire left and most of the right take it for granted that mass-immigration is not just good, but necessary. Diversity is, after all, our strength, and each year executives across America and Europe fund open-borders politicians, organizations, and media conglomerates to the tune of billions. Why do they do it? What makes the majority of corporate elites support mass-immigration?

1. Cheap Labor

The first reason is cheap labor. In the first world, labor is expensive. This is not because Western workers are spoiled, but rather because the costs of living are significantly higher. We have an industrialized economy, massive infrastructure, and a modern educational system. This all makes the West a very good place to conduct business, but as a corollary Westerners can demand a higher price for their labor.

But what if corporations could gain all the benefits of the Western world's infrastructure and institutions without having to pay first world wages? Historically, this has been partially achieved through outsourcing and offshoring. However, these schemes incur costs of their own, often requiring bribes to foreign governments and installing roads and other infrastructure. All of this is expensive and raises the question: why trouble bringing the factories to the third world when you can bring the third world to the factories? After all, people are cheaper to ship than tons of steel and concrete.

Mass immigration side-steps all the pesky issues associated with employing third worlders in their home nations. It combines the benefits of cheap labor with the comfortable infrastructure of home. As an example, if Carrier air conditioning were to relocate all 21 million denizens of Sri Lanka straight into downtown Indianapolis, they could pay their assembly-line workers thirty cents per day, without the inconvenience of building a factory half-way round the world.

It doesn't take an MBA to see the serious benefits to the bottom line. An extreme example to be sure, but it illustrates the first major incentive driving pro-immigration executives: the prospect of third world wages right here at home.

2. More Consumers

The second and arguably more insidious reason corporations support mass immigration is to inflate consumption. Capital is always seeking new markets, but investing in and developing those foreign markets can be risky and expensive. The solution: bring them all here. Instead of waiting for the third world to develop, elites can create first world consumers overnight by importing the populations of the third world to Western countries. The entire project of development can be skipped with a quick boat or plane ride.

Needless to say, the people of Angola will be significantly better positioned to take out car loans and buy cell-phone plans once all 25 million of them have been safely relocated to Denmark.

Similarly, only 7% of the Africans in Burkina Faso have reliable access to electricity; a developmental technicality severely curtailing their ability to order cheap, plastic trinkets off Amazon.com. If we fly them all to America, Amazon won't have to wait for the Société Nationale d'électricité du Burkina Faso to get its shit together. Whether these new arrivals can afford first world consumption habits is inconsequential. The indigenous white tax-payers will supply the difference via the welfare state. Anything less would be racism.

All joking aside, what these circumstances effectively amount to is the citizens of Europe and America being forced—through taxation—to subsidize corporate profits by financing the very people who are imported to replace them. Any objection has historically been shouted down as racism or xenophobia, and thereby the process has continued unabated.

The banks and businesses of the West generate an ever-growing consumer base for their loans, credit cards, and electronics by siphoning off the fertility surplus of the third world. The effects of this process on the lives, communities, and ancient cultures of the West have been deemed acceptable collateral damage.

3. Cheap Virtue-Signaling

The final reason is the twofold benefit provided by virtue-signaling. On the one hand, virtue-signaling about open-borders allows executives to market their corporations as somehow more moral than their competitors. 84 Lumber's Superbowl commercial provides a memorable example of this ploy. At the same time, doing so allows them to satisfy their own personal need to feel like good people.

Furthermore, I suspect that supporting uncontroversial leftish shibboleths—like open-borders—constitutes a kind of social currency among elites, wherein they compete with each other over who can write the largest checks and proselytize the loudest.

Interestingly, I also suspect that were you to confront any of them on the horror that their philanthropy inevitably produces, you would likely be meet with their genuine shock and disbelief. Their worldviews are formed by the candy-coated narratives presented at galas and fundraisers for wealthy NGO's such as the International Rescue Committee (IRC). In the below IRC propaganda piece, refugees are presented as aspiring female lawyers and gregarious old Muslim kite-makers. The hoards of young, male economic migrants are strangely absent.

They see this:

Not this:

Reality, it seems, constitutes an unimportant distraction from the feel-good echo-chambers in which elites get to play at being virtuous ‘citizens of the world’, and keep their corporate profits too.

Conclusion

It is this last reason—virtue-signaling—that most damns our elites. It is one thing to knowingly do great evil. It is entirely another to convince yourself you are good for doing it.

Despite careers spent singing the praises of open-borders, in their personal lives elites distance themselves as much as possible from the diversity they claim to love. The hypocrisy is mind-numbing. By dint of their enormous wealth they will never live in the ghettos, favelas, and no-go zones sprouting across the West. Their children will not attend schools equipped with metal detectors and knife wands. They will never wait in line at 7-Eleven behind a scowling Salvadoran draped in MS-13 tattoos. Most of them will live out their entire lives without ever once having to face, publicly or privately, the odious reality of their treason.

Prepare for enrichment…

I cannot see our elites stopping this madness off their own accord. They will likely double down until the bitter end. The only thing standing between them and the total destruction of the Western world are the few of us who know the score. We lack the billions in corporate funding, but truth is on our side, and we won’t let the West go down without a fight.

Read More: How Mass Immigration Is Driven By Female Consumerism And Low Fertility

Peyton Farquhar

Peyton is a 20-something thought criminal. Despite his best efforts he simply cannot seem to enjoy the decline. He is compelled to resist.

5 Major Works Of Japanese Writer Yukio Mishima

July 17, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

In post-World War II times, very few fiction authors appear interesting and inspiring. Either they have weak narrative and stylistic talent or lack firm ideas to hinge their skill upon (or both).

Yukio Mishima, the pen name of Japanese author Kimitake Hiraoka (1925-1970), is however one such unusual literary persona. As with many other literary cult figures, he was something of a renaissance man or at least a more sophisticated Jack of all Trades, as he wrote various novels, essays and plays, appeared in films, practiced kendo as well as natural bodybuilding, and did some modeling. He was also a political activist and devoted family man.

There are many firm and masculine ideas within his works, combined with a dazzling prose. I would like to describe five of his best works below. The brackets include the release years for the first editions in Japanese and the somewhat later translations into English.

[image]

The Sound of Waves (1954, 1981)

The Sound of Waves is a brilliant novel about heterosexual love in a simple maritime environment. Even though it is obviously linked to a particular location and context, a fictive island in Japan, it includes an almost universal depiction of love, before urban modernity penetrated the lives of most common men. Although one does not have much use of this book these days, as it is romantic, it still shows how real love can manifest itself under particular circumstances.

The book includes several beautiful descriptions of the surrounding environments, and shows how magnificent nature can be even today. A man, regardless of age, can be captured by the objective truth of the world's nature and gain strength from it:

> The boy felt a consummate accord between himself and this opulence of nature that surrounded him.

The main character, Shinji, is a poor and simple but physically able boy who possesses real character:

> The only thing that really counts in a man is his get-up-and-go. If he's got get-up-and-go he's a real man, and those are the kind of men we need here on Uta-jima. Family and money are all secondary.

Although those types of qualities unfortunately are less significant these days, one could still emphasize them as good ideals in a better future.

The Temple of the Golden Pavilion (1956, 1959)

A less cheerful yet enthralling and likewise extremely well-written story is The Temple of the Golden Pavilion. Those who have been to Kyoto might have visited the golden pavilion, Kinkaku-ji, and been rapt by its majestic and profound beauty.

This building was burned down in 1950 (and rebuilt in 1955), and around that fact Mishima has elaborated a story about the mind of a young deranged male person who lets his shortcomings and almost mysterious misanthropy guide him.

Theme-wise it does partly resemble another book by Mishima, The sailor Who Fell From Grace With The Sea, and Swedish Nobel prize in literature laureate Pär Lagerkvist's book The Dwarf (1944), but unlike Lagerkvist's dwarf the stuttering protagonist does not represent pure evil as his personality appears more complex and caleidoscopic. If one is interested in Zen Buddhism, this book is highly recommended but can be read regardless of one's religious inclinations.

> Amid the moon and the stars, amid the clouds of the night, amid the hills which bordered on the sky with their magnificent silhouette of pointed cedars, amid the speckled patches of the moon, amid the temple buildings that emerged sparkling white out of the surrounding darkness – amid all this, I was intoxicated by the pellucid beauty of Uiko's treachery.

After the banquet (1960, 1963)

Personally, I am not particularly fond of purely political novels. However, in After The Banquet Mishima has found a delicate balance between ideas, social realism, culture and sex relations.

The story centers around a woman, Kazu, who gives up her entrepreneurial career in order to focus on the marriage with an aristocratic retired politician. The story portraits a truly strong and good yet far from flawless woman, in the interval between tradition and modernity, and how she realizes that she must make personal sacrifices in order to serve her husband.

Apart from the middle-aged Kazu, it portrays a truly masculine man who lacks any sign of degenerate dandyism so common among those in power:

> Only Yuken Noguchi seemed different and stood out from the others. His manly face had a straightforward ruggedness it would never lose, and, unlike the others, his attire was utterly devoid of affection or dandyism. Thick, strikingly long eyebrows jutted above his sharp, clear eyes. His features taken individually were impressive, but they warred with another, and his lean build accentuated the disharmony.

The Sailor Who Fell From Grace With The Sea (1963, 1965)

The Sailor Who Fell From Grace With The Sea is one of Mishima's true masterpieces, as it constitutes a plot which mixes traditional masculine ideals with thrilling narration.

A group of 13-year-old boys, of which one is the protagonist Noburu, are fascinated by a sailor who wishes to settle down with Noburu's mother after spending manifold rough days and nights on the sea. However, when they realize that the world of adults if full of whims, petty romanticism and hypocrisy they conspire against the fallen role model.

Their fanatic worldview gives a hint of Mishima's own traditional elitism. One of the most intriguing passages is when Noburu kills a kitten as a rites of passage:

> Noburu had withstood the ordeal from beginning to end. Now his half-dazed brain envisioned the warmth of the scattered viscera and the pools of blood in the gutted belly finding wholeness and perfection in the rapture of the dead kitten's large languid soul. The liver, limp beside the corpse, became a soft peninsula, the squashed heart a little sun, the reeled-out bowels a white atoll, and the blood in the belly the tepid waters of a tropical sea. Death had transfigured the kitten into a perfect, autonomous world.

Albeit it is a bit extreme and far-fetched there are some red pills in there, as many boys are disappointed by weak males who fail to hold on to ideals which they earlier in life held so dear.

If one is interested in maritime settings and wishes for something more philosophical than let's say Ernest Hemingway's The Old Man And The Sea, I would highly recommend August Strindberg's On The Seaboard (1890, 1913), as it is a perfect complement to Mishima's work.

Sun and Steel (1968, 1970)

Natural bodybuilding was a serious interest for Mishima, and as I have stressed in several articles it is for me too. Therefore it is a blessing to read about this phenomenon from a philosophical perspective. Mishima was not big but he lifted consistently and wrote about it with great enthusiasm in the essay Sun and Steel.

Here is a great quote:

> The nature of the steel is odd. I found that as I increased the weight little by little, it was like a pair of scales: the bulk of muscles placed, as it were, on the other pan increased proportionately, as though the steel had a duty to remain a strict balance between the two. Little by little, moreover, the properties of my muscles came increasingly to resemble those of the steel. The slow development, I found, was remarkably similar to the process of education, which remodels the brains intellectually by feeding it with progressively more difficult matter. And since there was always the vision of a classical ideal of the body to serve as a model and an ultimate goal, the process closely resembled the classical ideal of education.

Conclusion

Yukio Mishima is indeed one of the most fascinating authors in post-war times, and has managed to create a synthesis between traditional and some of the best modern Japanese and Western ideas. Stylistically his prose is often extraordinary and finds itself a position between laconic realism adorned with dazzling metaphorical language. ROK readers are thus advised to neglect the keyboard or smartphone for a moment and take part of some of his literary work.

Read More: The Important Works Of French Author Michel Houellebecq

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

The Barbarians Will Solve Your Sterile Existence

July 18, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Why can't the Muslims, Africans, and Indians be more civilized like people in the West? Why do they insist on endless breeding when their children have no chance of attending an Ivy League university? Isn't there a way we can help them to see the light of civilization, rationale thinking, and clean hygiene? These are questions you may have asked at some point when looking down on the third-world barbarians, but from the perspective of nature, it's not them who are the problem. We are the problem. We are the defects of nature that will be eradicated.

Nature does not care about education, "high quality" offspring, college degrees, equal rights, cleanliness, sustainability, philosophy, or the environment. It cares about fertility and might, and the species or race that is most fertile and most powerful will be rewarded with the bounty that the Earth provides. The people who are able to take over the planet in sheer numbers, regardless of their intelligence or manners, will come to rule the world, just like how homo sapiens came to overrun the more intelligent Neanderthals by breeding at a far superior rate. The most intelligent race on the planet can use their smarts to fortify themselves in caves as the more numerous barbarians take over the planet, even if they're nothing more than mindless zombies.

Rational thinking from the enlightenment era, when taken to its logical end in proving that families, divinity, and traditional standards aren't necessary, along with the notion that the individual is God, leads to the suicide of society. Rationale, in it's beautifully cherished civilized form, leads to the end of any race who participates in it, while the stupid barbarians with IQs of 95 or lower, who follow a 1400-year-old book that implores them to conquer and chop off heads, continue to multiply and take over more lands.

We are the mistakes of nature. We are the grotesque. We have been condemned for replacement, forsaken by God for enabling over one billion abortions in just a few decades while we attempt to change the rules of nature, to declare man woman and woman man. Our goal is not one of spiritual enlightenment but of achieving the most vile feats of degeneracy.

Because of our cultural and biological sterility, I believe we have been fated for destruction. Even though this end stares us right in the face, the best we can muster is a few rants on internet web sites, while the barbarians are raping, conquering, and breeding. I promise you they will win. History shows that the barbarians always win. They are the solution to a broken people. They faithfully worship their gods while we worship our Facebook likes and celebrities. We are so hopelessly sterile, so anti-life, that nature will celebrate when we are replaced by those who can barely read. But they will treasure the life of their kind, and that's enough.

Even if we solve all the political problems of the day, and neutralize the most vulgar of our society, what are we left with? A shrinking population and citizens so atomized that they are even losing the ability to communicate with each other, who have to use computerized apps and alcohol to fornicate while the female is on sterility medication, which her parents awarded her upon turning 16 years old. Our punishment is coming. Lands of the West will be given away, and even if the barbarian horde can be beaten with technology, there will be a day where there's man left to stand against them to push the kill button. The barbarians will inherit the new world until they become civilized themselves and the cycle renews once more, like it has many times in the past.

Nature doesn’t care about your egalitarian laws or your superior IQ. It cares about reproduction and power, and what the barbarians lack in intelligence, they make up for in life energy. We are the anomalies, we are the mistakes, and unless we re-discover the ways of family, tradition, and God, we must be ready to accept the inevitable end that it was us who become so weak as a people that we didn’t even bother having a gate, and that all the barbarians had to do was walk right in.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: 20 More Degenerate Cultures Of Our Dystopian Society

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

9 Steps For Anti-Social Men To Become More Outgoing

July 18, 2017 | by Pete Zephyr | Link | Original Link

I don't know about you, but sometimes I feel anti-social. If I'm working on a big project I go into "work mode" and tend to avoid chitchatting so I can get more work done. Then after a long period of reinforcing that habit I begin to find it harder to connect with people.

If you choose to avoid conversation consistently your brain learns that conversation is hard. And if you avoid it for long enough you'll struggle to remember how to do it well. If you choose to avoid people consistently your brain will spend less time being externally focused on others. Instead you'll be more focused on your internal thoughts.

You may be familiar with gems like these…

- "I can't think of anything to say."
- "She doesn't like me."
- "These people are better than me."

And they'll trip you up when you're trying to make friends. The good news is that this happens to everyone. But what can you do to pull yourself out of it?

Saying Anything Is Better Than Saying Nothing

Each time you make the choice to stay in your head instead of saying something (anything!), you make it slightly harder for yourself to be social. Because the next time you're faced with that same choice you'll be more likely to make the same decision you made last time.

So it follows that each time you make the choice to say something instead of staying in your head, you make it slightly easier for yourself to be social next time.

Should I say "Thanks, have a great day" to the café staff as I'm walking out? Or should I just say nothing?

Should I say "Hi, how are you?" to the person who sits next to me on the bus? Or should I stare at my feet?

Should I ask the taxi driver how his day has been? Or should I scroll through my Facebook feed?

Even if these interactions last for ten seconds before going back to silence, deciding to initiate them is psychologically better for you than staying in your head. Your brain will go, "Oh, maybe focusing externally is something I should do more of instead of rattling around in this echo chamber," and your negative thoughts will decrease.

If you're feeling antisocial, expect to fail at this a bunch of times, but start small to keep yourself from getting discouraged. Start with Step 0 below and f*ck it up until you consistently get it right, then tackle the next step.

You'll notice your confidence increase with every step. You'll genuinely feel more comfortable around people, more motivated to talk, and more willing to take bigger risks if you just open your mouth and do this.

Step 0: Make eye contact and smile.

Keep doing this with new people and try new ways of doing it until you consistently get smiles back. Their smiles will make you feel more confident and will prepare you for the next step.

Step 1: Go out of your way to greet service staff with things like “Hi, how are you?”, “Thanks, have a great day,” etc.

Keep trying this in different ways until you consistently get positive comments back. Their positive comments will make you feel more comfortable.

Step 2: Say “Hi” when walking past people.

Keep trying this until you consistently get positive responses back and feel comfortable with it.

Step 3: Make quick observations and verbalise them. Like “Oh what a cute dog,” or “Nice shirt.”

You can end the conversations there. Keep trying this in different ways until you consistently get positive reactions back.

Step 4: Make a real effort to continue the initial conversation in ANY direction.

Just say anything after the initial introduction. Like “Where are you from?” or “What’s the dog’s name?” or “You look like you’re on your way to something important.” You can end the conversations there. Keep trying this in new ways until you can consistently continue conversations beyond the initial introduction, and get the reactions you’re looking for.

If this sounds difficult to you it means you’re probably not at Step 3 yet. Getting to Step 3 makes Step 4 easier, and so on. (And if you need more help with this, my site has a guide that will also help you figure out what to say and how to say it.)

Step 5: Add something personal about yourself, like “I want to get a dog one day.”

Add, “It’d be nice to have something to take care of,” or “You know I usually avoid taking risks but I’m starting to wonder if I should change that,” or “I love __. I could talk about it for hours.”

Rather than trying to impress people with what you say, just aim to keep yourself entertained or engaged. Keep trying this until you consistently get the reactions you want.

Step 6: Ask something that makes the other person think.

Say things like “What made you decide to get into that?” or “Are you usually lucky or unlucky?”, or “What’s something your friends would say you’re great at?” Anything that they have to reflect on before answering.

Now you’re having a legit conversation. Keep trying this until people consistently open up to you.

Step 7: Start group conversations.

For example: “Where are you guys from?” on a walking tour, or “Did anyone see that thing in the news today?” with your co-workers. Keep trying this until you can comfortably lead and continue these group conversations.

And of course do this without being the loud and obnoxious guy who doesn’t know when to shut up and listen.

Step 8: Play a character in conversation.

If I'm telling a story about the time Steve ate a rotten egg, for example, I might temporarily impersonate his voice and body language and re-enact the situation, rather than just saying, "He cried to mummy and spewed." Keep trying this until people consistently laugh at your characters.

Step 9: Invite people to things that you organise. Get friends to bring friends you don't know.

Now you're leading the social circle. Keep trying this in different ways until people consistently accept your invitations.

At this point the world is your oyster. You're taking much bigger risks than you were when you started this whole thing because you've built a consistent habit of getting out of your head and saying SOMETHING.

This isn't the end of the road. It's just a solid foundation that lets you take control of your social life. From here you'll decide what risks you want to take, and which direction you want to grow in. And if you're struggling with any of the steps, add your own smaller steps. For example you can ask the time or directions before verbalising observations if that's easier.

So get up and say something (anything!) to the next person you see. It's a skill you develop by doing it. Not something you're born with.

Read more: 3 Steps To Breaking Out Of A Slump

Pete Zephyr

Pete is an advanced social skills coach and founder of Beard Strokings. He teaches his clients to be charismatic in genuine ways, in order to deeply connect with people through conversation. If you're ready to transform your social and dating life, check out Conquer Confidence 2017.

Will 2017 Turn Into An Epic Year For Good Men?

July 18, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following is a sponsored article by Expandourmind. It is the final part of a series on Marxism and upcoming events for mankind. Read Part 1, Part 2, and Part 3.

Dr. Lawrence Dunegan attended a Pittsburgh Pediatric Society lecture in 1969 where he listened to Dr. Richard Day, an admitted "insider" in the "Order." The lecture was about the "New World System," also called the "New Order of Barbarians" in which he defined the changes that would be accomplished by the year 2000.

Procedures and people had long been positioned to implement this nefarious system where the rulers want to become human gods who enslave the few people who are allowed to survive – just like Lucifer wanted to become an almighty God in the Bible.

At that time, Dr. Day was a Professor at Mount Sinai Medical School. He had previously been the Medical Director of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America. He reiterated that people would have to get used to change. He also said: "People are too trusting; people don't ask the right questions."

Dr. Richard Day – Insider Of The Barbarian Order

Nuclear terrorism, world wars, depopulation, world religion, mass euthanasia, LGBT, falsified science, death of the family, death of religion, vaccines, mass surveillance, free sex, bad food, chip implants, no private property, luciferian world religion, destruction of young people, secret cancer cures for the elite, etc. They are responsible for all these things and their purpose is to depopulate large parts of mankind and enslave the survivors under their tyranny. Who gave them the right to play God?

Dalai Lama Performs Kalachakra Rituals All Over The World

Dr. Day disclosed that there is close cooperation between the east and the west – communism of the east has the same hidden leaders as the capitalist system of the west – in line with Hegelian dialectics. The term Barbarians have a striking connection to the Kalachakra prophecy which Dalai Lama promotes across the whole world as “absolute truth” with ample support from Western puppet leaders. In this prophecy, the non-Indian “Demon King of all Barbarians” attacks the whole world from India – a country where non-Indian Dalai Lama resides since 1959.

We can see that most of the predictions of Dr. Day have come true or are on the verge of becoming true with nuclear terrorism and/or a quick World War III being on the charts, because these globalists want to seize absolute power by threatening the masses into submission. Make no mistake – whichever countries that oppose each other have traitorous leaders serving the same globalist masters and the purpose is to enforce their Satanic world state. Dr. Day mentioned falsified science in 1969 as it applies to the Theory of Evolution.

The Theory Of Evolution Has Deceived Many

I was one of those completely deceived by the evolution theory as a youngster. First of all, who was Mr Charles Darwin? He was the grandson of Erasmus Darwin, a top mason and a sorcerer who was involved in the French Revolution. Facts prove that Charles Darwin was a complete fraudster too.

Mike Sutton’s book ‘Nullius’ proves that Darwin told six deliberate lies in order to achieve primacy over Matthew (another researcher whose theories Darwin stole). Having destroyed the myth of Darwin, the honest gentleman of science, we can turn to his mysterious love of Karl Marx, who lived in London from 1849, and sent his book Das Kapital to Darwin. Darwin even wrote an affectionate letter to Karl Marx expressing his deep admiration of Marxism. Were they both part of the same secret society in London?

Karl Marx set out the link between Darwinism and communism as follows:

> Darwin’s work is most important and suits my purpose in that it provides a basis in natural science for the historical class struggle. (Letters: Marx-Engels Correspondence, vol. 2, p. 126).

Stalin said:

> There are three things that we do to disabuse the minds of our seminary students. We had to teach them the age of the earth, the geologic origin, and Darwin’s teachings.

“Darwin Revalued” (1955) by Sir Arthur Keith states that Darwin made a fortune through investments. Darwin lived as a gentleman on a huge estate with up to eight servants. Yet he received no wages from employment, and earned only about 10,000 pounds from his books during his lifetime.

Could Darwin’s fortune and triumphant investing have resulted, not from fortuitous newspaper picks, but careful guidance by financial powers? Might this also explain his son’s good fortune in landing a bank partnership?

Ernst Haeckel (1834–1919) was a German professor of zoology and an icon of Evolution Theory. His schematics of embryos have been published in virtually every textbook. Yet he was proven to be a great fraudster already during his own career and he admitted it openly and stated that the whole “elite of evolution science” were fraudsters.

During the trial, Haeckel confessed that he had altered his drawings, but excused himself: “I should feel utterly condemned and annihilated by the admission, were it not that hundreds of the best observers and biologists lie under the same charge. The great majority of all morphological, anatomical, histological, and embryological diagrams are not true to nature, but are more or less doctored, schematized and reconstructed” (Bowden, Malcolm (1977), Ape-Men: Fact or Fallacy?)

“Natural Selection” Will Create A Master Class And A Goblin Class – “Modern Evolution Science”

Scientist To BBC: The Enslaved Class Will Become Goblins

A leading evolution scientist claims in a BBC interview from 2006: “Humanity may split into an elite and an underclass”, says Dr Curry in an interview with BBC. The article further states, “The descendants of the genetic upper class would be tall, slim, healthy, attractive, intelligent, and creative and a far cry from the ‘underclass’ humans who would have evolved into dim-witted, ugly, squat goblin-like creatures.”

We all know from the Jewish Talmud that the Jewish masters of the world are supposed to rule all “goyim” as “animal like” slaves in the future. Now we see how they plan to turn people into goblins – we already see how people have more and more trouble to keep in shape due to poor diets, GMO, computers etc.

Do we believe that people will become goblins “naturally” as in “natural selection” or do we believe that the evil rulers deliberately transform people into goblins by engineering and feeding them poisonous stuff? Do we really believe that Globalist rulers will become tall, healthy and intelligent people because nature favors them?

David Kills Goliath – Mankind´s Epic Battle To Take Back Freedom?

We see how the rulers mock people with fake science. I know for a fact that there are many men out there that would fight until death for their freedom if they knew that complete enslavement and loss of their willpower and human body was at stake. Many ROK readers know the hidden rulers of their country and this world by now. It´s a small group of hidden people. If they have unveiled the monstrous truth shouldn't they get a chance to fight for their freedom?

The Upcoming Epic Battle Of Good Vs Evil

Above: Viking Battle Prayer.

> Man's life is short; and therefore an honorable death is his immortality.
> —Publilius Syrus

From ancient history, we know of Samurais, Vikings and American Indians. Upright men of those cultures all wished to die an honorable death in battle. Their enemies seem very civilized compared with modern man's monstrous enemy.

Man's enemies are almost completely identified and they hide behind labels of media tycoons, government advisors, zionists, intelligence agencies, super bankers, leaders of secret societies, religious leaders, politicians, multi-national companies etc. These people work for Satan knowingly or unknowingly and they destroy our human civilization. What will happen next? Prophecies have real answers.

> ..when the Church and her servants are denied their rights, the monarchies have been abolished and their rulers murdered, then the Hand of Almighty God will work a marvelous change, something apparently impossible according to human understanding… The powerful Monarch, who is sent from God, will uproot every Republic. (Ven. B. Holzhauser, 1650)
>
> This is first and foremost about Faith. There are only two sides in the conflict: In favor of the Lord or against the Lord! (Katharina aus dem Ötztal (b. 1883))

Ancient Prophecies – A Hidden Source Of Inspiration

We have investigated many ancient prophecies and found hope, truth, and inspiration. If modern people have become brainwashed weaklings how can they battle these satanic globalists who control every country with their MSM, puppet leaders, intelligence agencies, and central banks? There is no chance to fight them unless divine support appears. What was prophecied in ancient times for our modern age?

- Subversion of all religions from the inside. Collapse of divine belief.
- The rise of antichristian governments controlled by traitors who sell out their countries and suppress their own people.
- The birth of a worldwide Marxist culture including destruction of the family, Marxist education of the children, feminism, free sex, materialism, high technology, computer age, drugs etc.

Prophecies: Falun Gong´s Arrival And Persecution By The CCP From 1999-2017?

- The birth of a new spiritual belief which spreads across the world very quickly and which can heal diseases. It’s upright and the evil can’t control it from the inside and becomes extremely jealous. Its subsequent persecution in China was prophecied to start in 1999. This evil persecution will last for 18(6+6+6) years until 2017 when the evil will be eliminated and Gods will reappear according to prophecies. The only matching spiritual belief is Falun Gong and it focuses on cultivation of mind and body in daily life without dogma, priests, membership, monasteries or fees.

Dalai Lama – Supported By All Countries And Religions. Prophesied Antichrist?

- The arrival of the non-Indian Antichrist who will attack the whole world from India. Dalai Lama travels to our world leaders using India as his base. He openly promotes the Kalachakra prophecy as absolute truth and he tries to play the role of the Barbarian Demon King in the prophecy.
- The sudden appearance of a warrior king from the north in 2017 with divine abilities who will help people overthrow their traitorous governments. People will face a choice to either fight the Antichrist or become enslaved by him. If one dies fighting Antichrist he will go to heaven. The return of real Kings (Monarchies) – "Return Of Kings" will come true according to prophecies.
- From 2017 – 2024 there will be cleansing of the earth from all evil through many battles between good and evil people. In the end, even water will become undrinkable. Finally a new, wondrous earth will be born with a few good people surviving.
- Traditional culture will be reinstated and good men will rule again.
- Towards the year 3000 people will have developed spiritual powers and they will know about their previous lifetimes and they will have supernormal abilities like levitation, telepathy. They will know how and when to cure their own diseases. People will take good care of the earth and they won´t waste resources. They will remember our wretched era and they will have a heart for helping each other since they know that without unity the world collapses.

Why Was This Evil Era Arranged For Mankind?

Why are bad people allowed to rule the world today? According to polymath and prophet Emanuel Swedenborg, all people need to be tempted by this evil culture to let each person choose between good and evil under very trying circumstances. In physics there is a balance between positive and negative charges and there must be a similar balance between good and evil human beings. After this era is ended, bad people will perish. Good men have suffered greatly and they will be given the honor to cleanse the world from evil.

Nordic Warrior God Thor Is Prophecied To Kill The Midgard Snake

A warrior King´s arrival is prophesied in 2017. Below some examples of his mission and how he will wipe out the evil republics:

> That valiant duke [MONARCH] will exercise a fatal vengeance on all kings and princes who have betrayed their country. Woe to those who have made a prey of the kingdom of their forefathers, as well as of the Church. They must pay everything back with double interest. No safety will be in the house of those thieves. (Matteo Ricci, 16th century. Beykirch 1849 – "Prophetenstimmen")
>
> Through the power of the Most High he shall confound the tyrants, the heretics, and infidels. He will gather a grand army, and the angels shall fight for them; they shall kill all God's enemies. (St Francis de Pau, 1470)

Nostradamus stated in his "Centuries, 10:86":

> Like a griffin will come the King of Europe,
>
> Accompanied by those of "Aquilon":
>
> He will lead a great troop of red ones and white ones,
>
> And they will go against the King of Babylon.

Nostradamus Was Right? The Sky Shows Us The Time?

From the MSM, you might get the idea that 2000 and 2012 were the big years in prophecy. They were not. 1999 was the prophesied start of the spiritual battle of good and evil. That's when 100 million Falun Gong practitioners were persecuted in China by the CCP.

Except for the Mayan calendar, many prophecies, including Buddhist prophecy, have targeted 2017 as the starting point of the golden age. That's 18 (6+6+6) years after 1999 and exactly 2500 years after Buddha passed away in India. The stars and planets are said to be aligned with Revelation 12:1 for the first time in 7000 years when the Feast Of Trumpets kick off in the evening of Sept. 22, 2017 in Jerusalem.

Norse Mythology similarly claims that the End Times Battle, "Ragnarokkr", will kick off when "Heimdallr" blows his horn to the world. People on hell roads will quake from fear while good people will dance from joy. Good and evil will then fight each other until the end, which is the birth of a new and wondrous earth after all evil has been defeated. It sounds rational, plausible and yet unimaginable to modern people. However, Queen Elizabeth recently stated that 2017 must be the year of WW III.

What will the end of 2017 really bring us? Expect the unexpected, have hope, stand on the good side at all times.

For more, visit Expand Our Mind.

Appendix:

Dr. Day 1969 – An Insanely Evil Plan To Enslave Mankind – Transcript

Evolution Theory A Fraud? – Part 1 Of 3

The Eternal Book(Ragno Nero 14th Century) 2016-2030

Knight Templars Prophecy AD 1099 – Describes Marxist Culture In Year 2000 And Future Society In AD 3000

Mitar Tarabic Prophecy Describes Modern Society And Our Path To The Future

2017 – The Cataclysmic Year According To Prophets And Buddha

First Resurrection Is Calculated In The Sky For Sept. 23 2017?

Where Is The Saviour Of Mankind According To Prophecies?

The Arrival Of The Northern Warrior King – Prophecies

Catholic Prophecies About Antichrist

Fight Antichrist And go To Heaven

German Prophecy Deciphers Number Of Beast(666)

Norse Myth: Heimdallr Blows His Horn To Kick off Ragnarokkr In Sep. 2017?

Dalai Lama – The Antichrist Of Christian And Buddhist Prophecies?

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Stop Caring About What Other People Think Of You

July 19, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A lot of guys getting into game want to find a way through the pain barrier of embarrassment. If only, they think, I could not feel embarrassed when I walk up to her. If I felt no embarrassment I could do anything.

Well here's the thing. You will feel embarrassment—it's all part of the game. But if you can learn to love embarrassment, to welcome it, to hold it close to you and embrace it like an old friend. Then you will have developed a social superpower that will get you great results with girls.

My Own Experience With Embarrassment

I wonder to what degree embarrassment is culturally inculcated? Certainly it seems so with the British, of whom I am one. Think Hugh Grant's stuttering protestations of love in all those rom-coms. That is what we Brits are like.

Other nations seem brasher to us. Americans, for example, seem to have no trouble being cocky funny. And Italians are forward and persistent with apparently no issue at all.

Actually, though, from coaching a great many guys worldwide I know that in reality most of us feel the same way. We are self-conscious, too aware of ourselves. We look at ourselves in 360 degrees, and imagine what others must be thinking too.

For whatever reason, I was always incredibly shy as a child and growing up. I was shy to the point that I found it hard to look people in the eye when I was talking about them. I found it difficult to get up and leave a room to go to the bathroom in case everyone talked about me when I was gone. I was even embarrassed when I phoned up a call centre, imagining what the bitchy office crew on the other side might be saying about me when I hung up. My whole life since, including my journey in game, has been a slow process of giving less of a damn.

When you suffer from embarrassment, or acute social anxiety in my case, the thought of approaching a woman is terrifying. What will she think? What will others think? And this is of such great concern because you are investing too much importance in the attitudes and opinions of other people. And you are also attempting to mind read.

The First Girl I Asked Out

I recall the first time I ever asked a girl out. We were in the same class together. She was the prettiest girl in school. I fancied her like crazy. Probably every other guy there did too.

Of course, there was no way I could speak to her face-to-face. So instead I got her phone number somehow (I forget how) and I called her up.

I was so embarrassed even just making that call that I brought a comb with me down to the phone in the hall. As I dialed her number, I clenched that comb in my fist so that its teeth bit into my palm. It hurt—when I looked at my hand later I'd drawn blood—but that hurt kept my mind focused away from the acute embarrassment of making the call.

She rejected me. She gave me an 'I like you as a friend'-type speech. We were perhaps 14. It's amazing how girls have all of that stuff down so young. I later found out that she'd been seeing this guy called Vinny Pringo, the class alpha. It was an early taste of the red pill for me. The movies had told me that if you wanted a girl all you had to do was tell her how you felt.

How To Handle Feeling Embarrassed

Most of us become more confident as we get older. It is unusual to meet anyone past their early twenties who is crippled with social fear, and it tends to lessen incrementally as we get even older. Age has a way of allowing you to put things into context, and to understand that something as simple as getting rejected by a girl is not the end of the world.

One popular way of reducing social anxiety, though, is through desensitisation. In this article the writer James Altucher describes how he travelled from 42nd Street to Brooklyn Bridge on a subway train, skipping carriages at each stop, doing stand-up comedy to the passengers. That must have taken some balls. And then again, in another way maybe not.

Here's Altucher on making the decision to just go for it:

> I said to myself, "there's no way I'm going to do this. This was a waste of time." And I got ready to get off at the next stop.
>
> Then, I figured, why wouldn't I do it? What can happen? I'm not even really trying to make people laugh. I just want to do it.

What jumps out? For me it is 'What can happen?' and 'I just want to do it.'

Because really, what can happen? Altucher chose to break with social convention and do something highly unusual on public transport in NYC. But he wasn't doing anything illegal. He wasn't doing anything offensive. He was just doing something that most other people wouldn't dare to because of their fear of what others would think. Why? Because he wanted to.

That's a kind of positive selfishness, when you think about it. In life a lot of us tend to think far too much about the concerns of others, and far too little about our own concerns. And a way to reframe the way we behave socially is less 'I'm going to be very brave and do this' and more 'I'm going to put myself first and do this.'

When you approach a hot girl in public in front of other people, you are doing so because you want to get with that hot girl. If you choose not to approach then you are making what you imagine other people will think more important than what you want. But why in the world should you do that? Why shouldn't what you want be more important to you—as long as you're not harming anyone—than any other consideration?

If you really find it difficult to approach girls because of embarrassment or shyness, then you could try a desensitisation exercise like James Altucher's stand-up comedy training. You could go and pull some crazy stunts on the subway to get used to people looking at you, so you realise that in the majority of cases the consequences are minimal.

Or you could do the mental work necessary for you to put yourself first. After all, if you just want to do it, then what can happen?

Either way, once you have reduced your sensitivity to embarrassment successfully then you will be thousands of kilometres ahead of the majority of other guys. It will be like you developed the equivalent of a social superpower and your results with women will improve exponentially.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: Women Don't Want Relationships With Men Who Want Relationships

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How Cryptocurrency Is Destroying The Jewish Globalist Banking Cartel

July 19, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen, I do not speak lightly when saying that cryptocurrencies such as Bitcoin, Ethereum, and File Coin, are the biggest financial revolutions since the creation of paper currency. If you've been keeping up to date with the financial markets, you've likely heard CNN, MSNBC, and the other fake news media outlets claiming Bitcoin is in a bubble, that it's unsafe, not secure, and other lies.

I'm here to tell you that cryptocurrencies are not only going to revolutionize the entire world, but they're going to bring power back to the people, make a new class of millionaires, and put an end to the corrupt global cartel of bankers, who've long preyed on our country's economy.

Bitcoin: Destruction of The Globalist Elite

The cryptocurrency market is completely disrupting the IMF, Federal Reserve, and globalist banker elite. First, you need to understand that Bitcoin is a peer to peer digital transaction system.

In other words, there's no middle man, as there is with an ACH, wire transfer, credit purchase, or cash purchase. In addition to this, cryptocurrency can be stored in a number of ways, such as on a portable flash drive, or on the cloud. While these two characteristics of cryptocurrency may seem insignificant, they're actually going to completely revolutionize Western Civilization for the better.

With no middle man, the bank can't take their 5% fee for transferring your money. They also aren't required to hold your money, meaning that they can't operate based off of the fractional reserve system, and give out billions, even TRILLIONS in faulty loans, which destroys the economy (like it did in 2008).

Furthermore, Bitcoin is mostly anonymous, meaning that it's hard to be tied to any name or what it's used to purchase. If you use a VPN or the Tor browser while purchasing something with Bitcoin, as many dark web drug dealers did, the government can't even identify the location of your transaction.

This means that Bitcoin, among other digital currencies, are 100% tax free. No government, no bankers, no middle men. For centuries, the bankers have thrived off of debt and printing currency, but with Bitcoin, this is impossible. There is a built in algorithm designed to make the expansion of Bitcoin's supply slowly decrease, until it becomes equal to the rate of loss (forgetting passwords, losing hard drives, etc).

Can The Government Regulate It?

No. Several governments have tried to regulate it, and they will like continue trying to regulate it, but due to Bitcoin's peer to peer transaction system, it's virtually impossible to track or regulate. The government can't print it, they can't loan it, and they can't tax it—which the globalists despite.

They're terrified of Bitcoin and other cryptocurrencies, which is why they've ignored it for so long. When it began making people literal multi-millionaires in 2015 and 2016, however, a number of activists such as Andreas Ontonopoulos and various Silicon Valley executives began to spread awareness.

The fake news media was forced to address it, but they did so reluctantly. They've made it seem like cryptocurrencies are a fad, a thing that kids are trading for some quick cash, but that will fade out of popularity. They've pushed the idea that Bitcoin is a dangerous investment, it's too volatile, and it's in a bubble, and they're doing everything they can to stop it from gaining popularity… but they're failing.

The people have, and will, always find a way to ensure their own freedoms. Whether it be by using IP-masking software or even trading cryptocurrencies in person via flash drives, there will be a way.

It's Not Just Bitcoin (Ethereum, Lite Coin, and more…)

As a testament to the public's faith in Bitcoin, hundreds of other cryptocurrencies have emerged, creating a rich ecosystem of peer to peer, digital currencies that can be used for a multitude of purposes.

Ethereum, which is often called Bitcoin 2.0, is the next big player—similar to Bitcoin in that it's digital, peer to peer, and has a controlled growth rate to minimize inflation, there's one thing that distinguishes it from its peer.

It's on a block chain. In layman's terms, this means that it's part of a global, decentralized infrastructure that easily allows developers to create markets, store registries of debts and credits, create contracts, and more. In other words, it's the developer's best friend.

Many games, such as League of Legends, are playing with the idea of accepting Ethereum for in-game skins, boosts, and new characters—even sports organizations have been toying with this idea, where sports fans across the US could use Ethereum to bet for or against various teams, which require a contract (Bitcoin cannot do this).

When the public caught wind of this revolutionary new technology, Ethereum shot up from around $10 to nearly $400 in a matter of 5 months. This whopping 4,000% increase has made teenage nerds and seasoned investors alike the new wave of millionaires.

And it's just beginning.

Stratis: How to Gain 35,000% in Less Than a Year

Another example of public faith in cryptocurrencies is Stratis, a coin compatible with C#. The coin's programming compatibility makes it easy for developers to create a rich ecosystem of contracts, markets, and trading systems around it.

So when the public caught wind of it, it jumped from around 3 cents to $10.50 in under a year. This is a roughly 35,000% increase. In other words, if you had purchased just $1,000 worth of Stratis in late 2016, you would now have $350,000.

Now, I know what you're thinking. "Holy shit Jon, how do I get in on this? Is it too late?" Thankfully, it isn't too late. In fact, it's projected that the cryptocurrency market will continue to grow over the next 30+ years, reaching new heights and bringing about a new and improved era in global commerce, free of the (((bankers))) and their greedy little hands swiping away your money.

Jon's Personal Strategy to Make $1,000,000

There’s several ways that you can cash in on this new and incredible technology. The first, and most stable, is mining. Without going into too much detail, this entails of purchasing an expensive processor, which uses complex algorithms to “crack the code,” and create new cryptocurrencies. This is how the market avoids needing a centralized bank—anyone can use their computers to slowly multiply the volume of cryptocurrencies.

As more and more people create more Bitcoin, the algorithms slowly grow more difficult to crack, which is what puts a peak on the coin’s inflation rate. While you can buy a professional grade Bitcoin miner for $3,000 and expect to profit $500 a month, I do something that’s even better.

There’s a service known as Genesis Mining, which effectively allows you to rent out processing power on an incredibly complex and powerful supercomputer based out of Iceland. Everything from the computer itself to the environment, which is freezing cold, is made to minimize energy expenditure and maximize profit.

Furthermore, you can also “reallocate” your rented out processing power DAILY, meaning you can choose to mine different coins which may be more profitable depending on whether the market goes up or down. Again, I use the service Genesis Mining, and it’s phenomenal—cryptocurrencies are deposited into my account every single day, and it’s fully automated. I just purchased a 2 year contract, and let their computer do all the work. I don’t have to do a single thing, and the money keeps rolling in every day.

For a wallet, I recommend you use Coin Base—it’s a free mobile app which gives you $10 worth of Bitcoin when you join, and you can link it directly to your bank account for easy transfers, to either buy or sell cryptocurrencies, or to cash out and deposit money into your non-crypto bank account.

You can also try day trading, but I don’t recommend you use large amounts until you get the hang of it first. Start off with $50 and scale your way up to the $1,000’s. Many men across the manosphere have been swing trading, as well, meaning they buy/sell over an intra-day period, to take advantage of multiple day, or weekly trends. If you’re going to do this, there’s plenty of tutorials on YouTube for you to watch.

Summary

In summary, Bitcoin, among other cryptocurrencies, are absolutely demolishing the globalist financial structure that they've spent centuries trying to build. It's peer to peer, meaning there's no middle man. It doesn't require a bank to hold it, a middle man to transfer it, or a government to print it. Cryptocurrencies are entirely open to anyone with internet access, and seeing that only 50% of the world has this so far, it's bound to explode as we advance into the technological age.

Don't get left behind—cryptocurrencies have already made numerous millionaires, such as the pizza man who accepted bitcoin as a payment in 2010, who's now worth $7 million.

I recommend that you start mining, as it's the safest option. Use Genesis Mining and slowly rack up those coins over time. Use Coin Base as your wallet, because it's convenient, there's a mobile application for it, and they'll give you $10 just for signing up.

And lastly, I'd like to recommend an upcoming ICO (Initial Coin Offering) called File Coin. The developer, Juan Benet, has an enormous amount of connections in Silicon Valley and the cryptocurrency market. In addition to this, there's several components of File Coin which make it a revolutionary new technology, but I'll leave it on you to research it. Just know that I'm investing probably $10,000 into the coin before it even goes public.

Learn how to build sky-high confidence, super-human discipline, and ALPHA MALE assertiveness with Jon's flagship 7 Strategies to Develop Your Masculinity program.

Read More: How to Make Money Trading Cryptocurrency

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

How The Dissident Right Can Topple The Two Main Pillars Of The Left

July 19, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Postmodern leftism is not a coherent set of ideas. Much as we may hate the losing forces of "Conservatism, Inc." that ooze timidity, we can at least say that they generally try to stay consistent with their overall philosophy.

The forces of the modern left are not this way. At the same time they decry an entirely imaginary "rape culture," they can import a real one en masse. While shrieking in an entirely unpersuasive manner about the environment, they can invite mass illegal immigration that is terrible for the environment (among many other environmentally unfriendly measures). Furthermore, they can do this without any self-doubt or hesitation because they genuinely don't see any contradiction in these beliefs.

Why? Because they're motivated solely for the destruction of the social order of their own civilization, and in that one category, all of these beliefs are consistent. In their minds, they are pure angels surrounded by an ever-encroaching Zerg creep of darkness, with monsters everywhere charging against them on all sides. This is why leftists have increasingly become violent and demagogic since Trump's inauguration and why they will likely get worse as the public continues to reject them.

How they see their opponents.

That said, while the public does keep rejecting them, don't kid yourselves: the leftist paradigm is still dominant. Its orthodoxies have weakened, but are still supreme. Leftists still control the academic and cultural institutions and still largely set the parameters of political debate and acceptable thought, especially when you have cowardly Republicans who shrink in fear at the thought of changing the frame. Why is this? And what should be done to change it?

Leftists haven't been dominant because of their ideas, which are merely an inconsistent clusterfuck masking the destructive impulse that drives them forward. Rather, they've been dominant because of these two pillars which we're currently undermining, and here's how we can continue to do so.

1. Make them Uncool

Since the 60's, leftists have controlled popular culture. Given the stifling atmosphere that prevailed before then, it was understandable that the left would become dominant by challenging the prevailing attitudes. Being part of that effort was "cool."

The right certainly didn't help to change that attitude, with its older population, seemingly uptight religiosity, and endless 50-page white papers that nobody outside of "think tank" echo chambers wanted to read. Meanwhile, the left had all the artists and celebrities. Who's gonna make more of an impact on the hearts and minds (and therefore, political beliefs) of the people – Kurt Cobain or the National Review staff?

You can cry and moan about it all you want, but the former is the answer, even if it is self-destructive (the analogy was, as you may surmise, deliberately chosen). Celebrity status, innovative art and entertainment, subversive humor, and attention-grabbing trolling will always be more influential than "think tanks" in determining the makeup of the Overton Window.

But recently, it's been the left that have become the lames and the squares of the established orthodoxy. It's they that have become humorless, spouting the same tired moral preening and driving toward censorship, which of course, only makes the humor against them edgier. In the same way that cultural elites raged at George Carlin's infamous 7 Dirty Words, they now rage over CNN memes to the point of persecution.

Before, it was the religious right raging about scantily clad women. Now the left does it. More than that, they actively promote fat acceptance and blue armpit hair as being paragons of beauty. Despite pretensions to the contrary, this is decidedly not beautiful, and therefore, not cool. In the meantime, right wing people are more physically attractive and several prominent right wing social media celebrities that are physically attractive (like Lauren Southern) are quickly "red pilling" Generation Z.

Want to really make an impact and become more persuasive? Don't try to out-logic the other side. Logic isn't the most persuasive track by default (as Caesar knew), and the left won't respond to it because, as we have seen, it has no internal logic. Instead, lower the social status of your opponents. Point out their ugliness and the ugliness of their women compared to your team's physically attractive women. Want to get a hot girl, or, if you are a woman, be a hot girl? Don't go with them, go with us.

Don't produce 50-page whitepapers. Instead, produce comedy that mocks leftist "polite society." Produce art and entertainment that pokes at the politically correct orthodoxy and promotes the values of the new emerging rightist counterculture. Point out that their work is merely derivative and full of the same bland, sterile, puerile virtue signaling rather than promoting anything new or thoughtful.

The current standard practice in Hollywood is merely to take an established franchise, produce a sequel or remake, and then repackage it with "social justice" dogma, often to horrendously disastrous results. The remake of Ghostbusters took the cake on that one.

Want to undermine leftist orthodoxy? Don't explain why your side is better. Make fun of their icons like Star Wars (which they've appropriated with the derivative sequels) and create your own, new ones.

I suppose the best analogy I can give of what should happen, oddly enough, stems from the world of professional wrestling. During the 90's boom period of the industry, both of the major companies (WCW and WWF) ditched cartoonish, over the top, "family friendly" products and launched a far grittier, edgier, realistic form of entertainment, with the nWo story in WCW, followed by the WWF's Attitude Era.

The constant vulgarity, scantily clad women, bitter feuds, and high intensity, brutal matches and vignettes left primarily right wing moral crusaders, then on the tale-end of their power, highly offended. Yet, it was these same aspects that made this period of wrestling must-see TV that brought in tens of millions of viewers every week and had all the kids hooked, myself among them.

I believe we have the talent and the reach to create something very much like an Attitude Era of our own, with new ideas and new entertainment that gets attention, shatters the lame, boring leftist stranglehold, and changes the culture in our direction.

We now need the capital and the venues. Mike Cernovich has been whispering about a CPAC style "big event" for people in our sphere, an idea I pitched to him myself in February. Picture segments and workshops with Mike and Ann Coulter on humiliating the fake news media, Paul Joseph Watson on how to grow a big YouTube following, perhaps even Roosh and Quintus on reinvigorating masculinity and masculine virtue. The sky is the limit, and that's what we want to aim for.

This is the kind of cool versus uncool dynamic that changes the political frame. The right just hasn't been doing it until very recently. It's time to expand.

It's also worth noting that when Roosh did this kind of thing with his tour two years ago and the meetups at the start of last year, there was a worldwide outrage, which to me was a definite sign of fear. The leftist power structure doesn't want this budding counterculture to go off the internet, and that's precisely why it should.

2. Make them Immoral

Equally, if not more important than their stranglehold (until recently) on popular culture is the moral high horse that leftists try to put themselves on. Nobody wants to feel like a bad person, and this dynamic is the other big part of why leftists have controlled the terms of political debate. The right has been so pathetic in fighting back on this front, so cowed by leftist buzzwords, that "Conservatism, Inc." gladly resigned itself entirely to economics while leaving everything else in society to the left.

The truth of the matter of course is that leftists are often completely immoral and depraved people, which is why they need to hide behind moral relativism. The way they've acted since the election of Trump should leave little doubt about their true character. And instead of being cowed by their pretended moral superiority, now's the time to pounce.

They want to undermine Trump at any cost? Say that they want the economy to fail and for people to lose jobs. Say they'd rather see people in breadlines than getting jobs. Say they'd rather see people die from crumbling bridges than giving someone they don't like credit for passing an infrastructure initiative.

They want to crow about Russia endlessly? Call them demagogues that would rather see American troops die in a confrontation with a nuclear power or in silly, needless interventions in Syria because Trump is in office. They don't want Obamacare repealed? Say they want middle class families and small business owners to suffer and maybe die because they can't afford health insurance. Laura Ingraham said it best recently:

> Dems masterfully using personal stories to sell resistance to Obamacare repeal. GOP uses sterile numbers. pic.twitter.com/TvpW3LNTHz
>
> — Laura Ingraham (@IngrahamAngle) July 13, 2017

Laura gets it. Paul Ryan and his kind of Republican don't and haven't for decades, which is why they've been losing.

More important than exposing leftist hypocrisy is exposing leftist immorality. We've gained in no small part thanks to the censorship drives and the Antifa ferals. This is something to continue and expand. When leftists try to dominate space of the political debate, don't go for hypocrisy (which rarely works), go for showing the world that they're bad people.

Conclusion

The formula is simple. The left has used two pillars to power – popular culture and moral preening. To undermine them:

1. Make them uncool.
2. Make them immoral.

Doing this will hurt them far more than any "conservative think tank" ever could.

I wish it wasn't this way. I'd like a more genteel, logical, healthy level of discourse. But when your opponent is using total warfare against you with carpet bombing and long range artillery, trying to fight limited, gentlemanly battles with muskets and brightly colored uniforms and salutes becomes suicidal.

Read Next: 7 Methods The Elites Use To Control Us

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

5 Demented “Phobias” That The Left Is Ready To Unleash

July 20, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

As every person on the right knows, the left loves to control language. Whether it is through so-called “hate speech” legislation or political correctness, the left strives to dictate what words can and cannot be used in society-at-large. And the left seeks to do this because they know that to control a person’s language is, quite literally, a way to manipulate and steer that person’s thoughts. It is a means of creating self-censoring thinkers.

Thus, language-control is a way of gaining power over people. Furthermore, it is a power that makes people fight the left using the left’s own chosen terms, which means fighting the left on its own rhetorical terrain. And, as any strategist knows, you never want to fight an enemy on ground that he has selected. This is why refusing to use the left’s 1984-language is so crucial, as is positively fighting back against that language control.

Now, in recent years, when it comes to the battle for language, everyone and their dog has experienced the explosion of the left’s ‘-phobia’ and ‘-ism’ propaganda war. You have homophobia, Islamophobia, transphobia, and so on. At the same time, you have racism, sexism, ableism, etc. All these terms are designed to elicit a positive emotional reaction from the left’s true believers while simultaneously seeking to shame the individuals or groups at which those terms are aimed. And, for a surprising number of years, these terms have been quite effective at shifting the cultural landscape in the left’s favor.

However, as times change, and people stop caring about being labeled with these aforementioned terms, their effectiveness has decreased. Of course, leftists, being leftists, have not given up on using these terms; rather, they have doubled-down on their use. In fact, they have even started seriously pushing relatively new terms, such as transphobia, which has only become mainstream in SJW circles recently.

So, in light of the left's drive to create more and more '-phobia' terms, here is a prediction of which presently obscure '-phobias' we will see pushed into the mainstream by the left in the coming years.

Term 1 – Pedophilophobia

Hey, he was just born that way!

SJWs and leftists are so degenerate that in the next few years, I expect the term 'pedophilophobia'—which already exists—to start being pushed in a serious and concerted way. After all, in 2015, leftist outlet Salon.com published an article titled "I'm a pedophile, but not a monster", which was an apologia for pedophilia.

While the article was roundly criticized, never forget that this is the way the left works. It puts out its feelers, gets a taste of the culture, then adapts its message. After all, nobody a generation ago would have dreamed that Western society would be seriously promoting the idea that men who call themselves women actually are women, and yet here we are.

Plus, remember that the left's homosexual "born this way" rhetoric works with noose-worthy pedophiles too, so that is an angle the left will also push to claim that fear of child-molesters is a "phobia".

Term 2 – Polygamophobia

Polygamy…the next frontier of "marriage equality", likely pushed by an alliance of leftists and Muslims.

Ever since the homosexuals achieved victory in the marriage debate, the polygamists have been waiting in the wings getting ready to claim that their rights "to love and marry multiple people" have been infringed as well. So expect a term like polygamophobia to appear on the cultural mainstream soon.

Now, while polygamy is not nearly as objectionable as homosexuality—at least reproduction is possible with the former—the fact remains that polygamy is neither good for men, nor women, nor civilization. It ensures that many men have no female partner for sexual reproduction, thus transforming such men into either self-created eunuchs or societal de-stabilizers (perhaps not such a bad thing in our present age). And while women get a high-end man, they are also transformed into little more than sexual objects, rather than being respected matriarchs, which the nuclear family, and monogamous patriarchy always them to be. Thanks feminism!

Term 3 – Fetishophobia

Really, when confronted with something like this, there is nothing to say…

Again, just like with pedophiles and polygamists, fetishists are very likely to get in on the ‘phobia’ action as well. After all, are you an adult who likes to wear diapers? Well, you were born that way, and so no one has the right to hurt your feelings and call you a degenerate! Hell, if a man can become a woman merely by claiming to be one, it’s not that much of a stretch to claim that a grown man can be a baby on the inside either.

The fetishists won’t just be men with diapers. There will be people who demand that their “marriages” to inanimate objects be considered normal and valid. In fact, we might even see such deviancy as necrophilia being pushed as normal and potentially permissible, so long as the person had given consent to be used sexually once they died. After all, once the slippery slope of sexual deviancy begins, there is a long and dark way to fall.

Term 4 – Incestophobia

Did George Lucas have a dark side? Or did he just have no idea where his story was going?

Yes indeed, incest will soon start to be pushed heavily as well. The leftists will start to claim that the taboo against incest is just a relic of our religious past that needs to be discarded in the interests of enlightened progress.

Furthermore, the idea of incest is right in-line with the leftist's morality, for incest can be consensual, which is all the leftist needs for something to be considered permissible and moral. So brace yourself, because incest is the next frontier of progressive progress. Except it won't be called incest. It will be called something "scientific" like Genetic Sexual Attraction, which—surprise, surprise—is a term already in use.

Term 5 – Bestialophobia

Not just for wool anymore!

Finally, the idea that sex with animals is wrong will no doubt soon be pushed by leftists as a phobia. In fact, such prominent leftist "philosophers" as Peter Singer defend the idea of consensual bestiality, as do many others on the secular left (just check out the Conservapedia page on "Atheism and bestiality" for more details). Thus, in the years to come, don't be surprised if, say, Patrick-the-pig-poker starts pushing for his innate love of swine to be recognized and respected as the beautiful expression of diverse love that he claims it is, rather than as the shame-worthy degeneracy that it actually is.

Conclusion

While we should all recoil in disgust at these terms, we should nevertheless push for the left to embrace these phobia labels and use them as much as possible. Why? Because it is using the left's own ideas against them, for once many normal people see what being a leftist entails, they will recoil in horror at the thought, thereby naturally moving such people to our side.

At the same time, certain people of the leftist persuasion will no doubt embrace these fake phobias, and their embrace of them will be to the right's benefit as well. Why? Because by embracing such absurdities, leftists will make their battle-lines that much clearer. They will help to expose their side more clearly, thus allowing us to see our cultural enemies better. Additionally, they will help to show us who our allies are and who the neutrals are as well. And such knowledge is a strategic gift. Thus, if at all possible, let us promote the left's use of these future phobias, for it is our benefit to do so.

Finally, just for the record, note that it is 2017, and so let's see how long it takes for my prediction about the left's mainstreaming of these terms to come true. I say it will take no more than a generation—as with homosexuality—but who knows, in this climate, it could take less than a decade.

Read More: 7 More Misleading Leftist Concepts That Pretend To Be Positive But Are Not

Damian Michael

R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

Women Lag Far Behind Men In Tech Fields Despite Endless Girl Power Propaganda

July 20, 2017 | by Jimbo Jones | Link | Original Link

I keep seeing a commercial that features a cartoon woman who works in some kind of factory. Displayed prominently in her work-space is a Rosie the Riveter propaganda print, emblazoned with the slogan "We can do it." Some robotic contraption is introduced, and then there's a quick montage of the robots replacing every human worker there, except for her. Two faceless, shadowy men sneak up behind her and she makes a sad face, because that means the robots have taken her job, too.

Then there's a quick cut to the woman (of course she's a mom) enrolling in an online I.T. college program. She studies day and night and eventually her kids bake her a cake and she graduates and what do you know, she finds herself working a cushy office job where she periodically strolls down long halls of giant computer servers.

The ad ends with her taking a red pen and scrawling "I.T." over the "it" in her aforementioned propaganda poster, as the syrupy strings of the most saccharine cover of The Cranberries' "Dreams" you've ever heard fades into a full-on advertising pitch for the online university.

Of course, it's all shameless shekels-grabbing cloaked under the warm and fuzzy security blanket of identity politics. The reality is that the University of Phoenix's enrollment is easily two-thirds female, with blacks, Hispanics, and Asians making up about 60 percent of the student body. On top of that, less than half of all enrollees make it past their first year, and on the whole the school posts an atrocious 17 percent graduation rate.

And the punchline to all of this? There's at least a 50/50 chance that the diplomas of those who somehow do manage to graduate is totally unaccredited, making the degree about as valuable as something you churn out on M.S. Paint in five minutes.

You've got to be one dense piece of work to think that, in just four years' time, you can go from being an assembly line worker with no knowledge of coding to an integrated systems manager making north of $200,000 every year. But that's exactly the kind of people these ads are taking advantage of – women.

Do you think these two have any idea what "API" stands for? For that matter, do you think they can even spell "API?"

A high tech illusion

There's been a nonstop barrage of gender-baiting propaganda encouraging women to get into STEM fields, but the data has remained largely unchanged for more than a decade. Females, after all, barely account for 18 percent of computer engineering degrees in the U.S., so why should anybody find it surprising women are outnumbered by men in virtually every STEM field out there?

Since I.T. is big money, naturally the feminist types were going to complain about the "overrepresentation" of men in such high-paying fields. Strangely, these same mentally menstruating naggers and complainers seem to have no qualms whatsoever about the vast overrepresentation of females in high-paying industries like healthcare, education and especially social work, nor the glorious underrepresentation of women in such lower-paying fields as sanitation and construction work.

All that matters to them is that men are making a lot of money and not a whole lot of women are capable of performing as well in those same careers, so now it's become some sort of social justice necessity to get as many women into coding and engineering jobs as possible.

There's just one teeny, tiny problem, though: not only do women not want to go into these careers, those who attempt it soon find out they have no earthly clue what they're doing and inevitably realize they will never be able to adequately compete in the glutted, globalized I.T. marketplace.

Or, to put it another way – women just don't have I.T.

Don’t worry, Becky. I’m sure you’ll figure out how C++ works … one day.

Hardwired to fail

I don’t know if it’s social conditioning or just the way their brains are wired, but 95 percent of all the women I’ve encountered in my life have been technologically retarded. I’ve spent half my career working in or around colleges, and I can’t tell you how less technologically-inclined the alleged “fairer sex” is when it comes to even the most rudimentary computer tasks.

I’ve had to work with students and colleagues that had no idea how to send an attachment in an email or even access a Wi-Fi connection. Most male students and colleagues have no problem getting the fundamentals of Final Cut down, but virtually all of the females are hopelessly lost less than five minutes in. EVERY single time I got a report about a student clicking on scareware and thinking they’ve activated the latent Y2K bug – every, single, time – it was a female.

These are people who can’t figure out how to use WordPress, or even debug simple HTML. And you expect them to all of a sudden flip off their Instagram feeds, drop their intersectional feminist degree track and become mechanical engineers and front-end developers and plug-in designers? Take it from somebody with mucho experience in the area: you’d have an easier time training a fish to ride a bicycle.

Well, Rachel, if we can't figure out how this CMS stuff works, we can always Ask Jeeves!

It's not about inequality, it's about intelligence

There's a reason why Forbes' list of the 100 richest people in tech contains a grand total of five women. By and large, women aren't analytical problem solvers. They don't see things holistically and even their spatial skills are remarkably worse than men.

By and large, they simply don't have the cognitive toolkit to iron down things like web design, coding and especially systems management. And even if they did, can you imagine Jack Shit getting accomplished in the office with all those broads chinwagging about totally unimportant aspects of their personal lives all day? With such detail-oriented tasks on the docket, I just can't imagine gossip-obsessed I.T. workers managing to do an adequate job monitoring anything – that is, besides their own Pinterest feed during on the clock hours.

Maybe it's cultural, maybe it's biological, but the fact of the matter is that men are just plain better at all the technical skills necessary to be successful in I.T. careers. Hell, I'd assume a good 95 percent of all men on the planet lack the cranial wherewithal to succeed in computer engineering or software development. As much as the feminists may want to ignore it, the meat of the matter is that most people on the planet just don't have what it takes to be successful in I.T. fields, regardless of their gender.

Sorry, gals, it looks like this is one area where possessing a vagina simply isn't enough to overcome a lack of the only organ that really matters in such competitive, international markets – good, old-fashioned brains.

Read More: U.S. Government Goes Full Retard And Backs War Draft For Women

Jimbo Jones

Jimbo Jones is a nihilist ... but he's the nicest nihilist you'll ever meet.

How The Half-Life Video Game Series Mirrors Our Current Reality

July 20, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Since the release of its first opus, the Half-Life series has had an almost mythical aura. Sure, its gameplay was well-thought, its graphic engine quite advanced—but beyond that, the series has a good story arc and a compellingly immersive universe. This has been true for both Half-Life (1998), Half-Life 2 (2004) and the following two Episodes (2006-7).

Video games are often derided on the manosphere as a beta-tailored false reality that encourages escapism. Indeed, the typical beta male flees from the harshness of the outside world and rushes into a fantasy where he plays the adventurer, the hero, or anything else he wishes from behind his keyboard. Even worse, the collective man cave of video games has been invaded by restless SJWs who poised the place with stinky blue pill propaganda.

Half-Life did not escape this fate: the second part and following episodes have thrown on the player's face a strong-and-badass-womyn character, Alyx Vance, who has been complacently placated on Half-Life 2: Episode 1 cover.

Muh strong womyn! At least she’s nice to Gordon

Yet, as with anything in life, what matters is less the thing in itself than the use we make of it. I usually enjoy playing management games to learn in a light-hearted way about accounting and market mechanisms. Likewise, in the Half-Life series, I have found a brilliant example of (mis)management, and although the stroke may seem exaggerated, there is definitely something to be gleaned from it.

A hero with a crowbar

Everyone knows about Gordon Freeman. A young scientist and engineer, he also happens to be a fairly good adventurer—by the player's efforts—a lone ranger, and a mute-but-purposeful man. In the first Half-Life game, Gordon arrives at the secret base of Black Mesa, participates in an innovative experiment that, (un)surprisingly, opens a multidimensional portal.

The aperture floods with wild, ferocious animals from previously unknown universes, and what happens mirrors exactly what happened in real life when European explorer set foot on remote islands: the "evolved" animals they brought with them, especially cats, crushed the insular less-evolved ones. HL1 consists mostly in escaping from alien teeth and claws. The gameplay is entertaining but there is not much to say about the narrative.

Half-Life 2, so to speak, is another story. Waking up from an unexplained ten-years sleep, Gordon Freeman finds that the multidimensional portal attracted not only wild alien beasts, but also an intelligent and more dangerous entity, the Combine Empire.

A multidimensional entity, highly advanced and organized, the Combine seized up the opportunity of the open portal to send an enormous army on Earth. When Freeman arrives, the Combine has annihilated untold millions. Only cities survive under the Combine rule whereas the wild aliens met with in H1 wander wherever they can find food or a suiting environment. Most, if not all of HL2 and the following episodes, happen in or around City 17, nothing being said or happening anywhere else.

At first glance City 17 looks like a mishmash between the Soviet Union (or 1984) and your classical sci-fi novel. The Combine treats people like cattle, forcing them to pass through an indefinite number of checkpoints every day under the cold look of masked soldiers. Intimacy is but a distant memory.

Flying security cameras, force fields and blue metal Combine furniture set the tone for daily life. Wallace Breen, a “wise elder” type, tangentially Gordon Freeman’s ex-boss, appears all the time on giant public screens spouting pro-Combine propaganda.

In real life, this shill would work for Conservative Inc.

The background once set, Half-Life 2 may look like an immersive shooting gallery. It is so, but once again, more than this is at stake. For Gordon Freeman knows right from the start what he must do and who he must attack. Imagine for a second that you were teleported into a kind of futuristic Big Brother State: would you know with certainty what you should do if at all? Well, Gordon Freeman does.

Namely, he attacks the Combine Empire, this seemingly all-powerful entity that managed to annihilate and enslave humanity. With a cool head, Gordon's choice should seem nonsensical: how could a lone ranger, arguably helped by a loose resistance, fight a heavy, highly advanced empire?

The answer: with determination and a plan. First, Freeman manages to find secret passages in City 17 so he can move on even when hunted down. Second, he scrounges on weapons and makes contact with anti-Combine resisters. Third, he targets key Combine places, such as industrial facilities, officers' mess and high-security prisons, as to weaken their hold over City 17.

Sometimes Freeman takes the more discrete way, and then he must face nasty alien animals, yet he knows these are just animals: there is no time to lose destroying them. Instead, Freeman manages to get some of them on his side, and as the Combine organization eventually crumbles, their soldiers will find themselves overwhelmed with these.

The tenacious Freeman thus focuses on the right enemy, no matter how nasty the headcrabs or antlions you spend half of the game shooting at. By these deeds, he manages to gather and inspire resisters so much that they rise up against those they spent years frightened of. At the end of Half-Life 2, as City 17 is completely torn apart by the war between Combine soldiers and human resisters, Gordon Freeman makes his way to the heart of the Empire on Earth, the Citadel.

The Foreign Elite

When the player enters the Citadel, he is struck by the cold, strange architecture, which features unsettling asymmetries and drops. All he knows is that the top of the building is a dimensional portal—and if Freeman makes his way up there he may destroy it, thus cutting the Combine's communications and pinning their forces on Earth. By hitting at such a focal point, Freeman keeps his momentum and forces the Empire's managers, that is, the top enemies, to show themselves.

So far in HL2 there are no managers in sight. Combine soldiers and policemen are enforcers, not decision-makers. The "wise elder" Wallace Breen himself is but a spokesperson, a hired face. So, it should be asked, who is in charge of this whole stuff? Is there a Deep State? Well, there is—and at the end of HL2, Breen can be seen supplicating one of its members: it is made of fat, amorphous, ugly, but also hugely intelligent and telekinetic power-endowed creatures referred to as Advisors. In all aspects they seem like a caricature of a degenerate managerial elite.

From the beginning of their existence, the Advisors were a highly intelligent species. These excellent engineers managed to pair biological with robotic expertise to create bionic creatures and master technologies unknown to man. Top supervisors as well, they excel in distributing whatever goods and service—and constraining—whoever is ruled over.

Their information-managing facilities seem rudimentary, but their production lines and machinery are impressive: it is powerful enough to, say, dry an entire sea by sucking up all its water. This means they can handle very complex calculations by head and are likely to have a wide memory. They don't have the computers we use for making calculations because they simply don't need these. And they can handle objects at will through sheer telekinesis. Impressive, isn't it?

Two Advisor aliens. One of them is taking breakfast

On the other hand, they are completely degenerate and unfriendly in every aspect. In addition to their sheer physical ugliness, they have no sympathy or feelings for anyone or anything but themselves. All living organisms working for them, human or otherwise, are manipulated and automatically surged without remorse.

They have no sense of beauty or aesthetics: their architecture is functional, the Citadel's plan makes a lot more sense once you understand it was thought for them to dwell in next to their core facilities, yet even then no beauty-sensitive being would have designed it this way. They also behave like extreme cases of autism in at least two respects.

First, they dwell so much in their own Citadel they never get out of it even once—until Freeman's daring attacks force them out. Second, they show rigid thinking patterns by either plundering and mistreating any place or thing they are interested in or abandoning it completely, without any ability to nuance.

The Advisors' most striking feature: they are spineless cowards. Having spent an indeterminate time in cushy pods with everyone around obeying them, they lose their mind when meeting a clever and courageous opponent. The end of HL2 hints at this.

As Freeman rushes into the Citadel, any Advisor could step out his pod and use his telekinetic power to immobilize him and rip him apart. Well, no one does. Instead, they keep sending soldiers—an astonishingly stupid decision as Freeman can kill them all with ease. None of them dared to go face to face with a single human and their lack of courage allows Freeman to destroy the trans-dimensional portal at the very top.

From the heights of a not-so-stable power

In Episode 1, as the resisters get the upper hand and the Combine organization lines crumble, the Advisors choose the way of slightest effort . They won't face the resisters even if they still have plenty of soldiers and synths: instead, they start overheating their own nuclear heart in order to destroy the whole city.

Gordon Freeman manages to stabilize the heart, once again without any Advisor confronting him directly. In the course of the episode he meets with an Advisor… who merely sends him waves of psychic attacks, hiding inside his pod.

In Episode 2, as the battle moves to the countryside, the player sees an Advisor in an out-of-order pod who strolls with at least fifty soldiers and machines as convoy. Does a mighty being need so much protection against an impoverished guerrilla?

Eventually, driving in the woods, Freeman notices a crashed Advisor pod. Inferring the alien's closeness he searches it out and finds it hiding inside a life-support facility itself tucked inside a barn. If he just considered the balance of power, Freeman should let the grubby alien alone: instead, following his intuition, he forces it out by attacking the cocoon. Reluctantly, the creature appears. It instantly disarms and lifts Freeman. It could snap the hero's neck and put an end to the whole war. But, once again, it doesn't.

Instead, the player can see the Advisor hesitate—for too long: an explosion happens, the creature is wounded, and instead of finishing the job, it freaks out, releases Freeman, destroys half of the barn to make itself an armour, and flees. It also sends soldiers to do what it could have done much more easily if only it had the courage.

(((Our Benefactors)))

An exclusive screenshot of Half-Life 3. Note the improved level of detail on the Advisor's face

Beyond the sheer video game qualities, the Half-Life series shows us a credible sci-fi dystopia with a logic of its own. In my opinion we can find it both a lesson in intelligent warfare, as the crowbar-using hero never loses focus on who he must attack relentlessly amidst the headcrabs and laser shots, and a creative caricature of foreign, degenerate elite.

The brilliant engineers and managers of a multi-dimensional empire are also maggot-like, autistic creatures who lack most human feelings, have no aesthetic sense, live in complete isolation from the world(s) they haughtily manage and flee from much weaker enemies.

Psychologically speaking, they seem to have a very high performance intelligence and a low verbal one. Perhaps if we reverse this makeup, so to have a high verbal intelligence paired with a low performance one, we get a hostile elite that looks less like “our benefactors”—Breen’s in-game expression—and more like (((our greatest ally))). That is, an elite that looks down on blue collars and engineers but is glad to use what they produced.

Read Next: 4 Underrated Classic Video Games

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Anti-Defamation League's Hate List Puts Alt Right And Alt Lite Figures At Risk Of Leftist Violence

July 21, 2017 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Earlier this week, the Anti-Defamation League published an article titled "From Alt Right to Alt Lite: Naming the Hate," singling out 36 purported members of each movement—including myself—as "white supremacist" and "neo-Nazi." The intent of this article isn't merely to ruin the reputations of those on the list (though given the lack of credence most people give to fake news media outlets these days, that isn't likely to happen), but to encourage violence against us by left-wing lunatics.

Leftist organizations such as the ADL and the Southern Poverty Law Center (the latter of which targeted ROK publisher Roosh several years ago) have been using this tactic for years. With the rise of political violence in the U.S. since Donald Trump's election as president—including an attempted assassination of House Majority Whip Steve Scalise by a Bernie Sanders supporter—the ADL's libels against me and others in the article represent a real threat to our safety and that of our loved ones.

Sex, Lies, And Jewish Media Control

Among the most well-known personalities on the ADL's list are Daily Stormer publisher Andrew Anglin, (((Daily Shoah))) host Mike Enoch, NPI president Richard Spencer, Arktos CEO Daniel Friberg, and Counter.Fund founder Pax Dickinson on the alt right. The alt lite portion of the list includes author and First Amendment attorney Mike Cernovich, "Based Stick Man" Kyle Chapman, radio host and Vice magazine founder Gavin McInnes, and former Breitbart columnist Milo Yiannopoulos, among others.

The piece appears to have been assembled by a poorly-paid intern, because many of its claims are flat-out wrong. For example, the blurb about me falsely claims that I work for alt right media outlet Red Ice and attributes one of that site's videos—an interview with Holocaust revisionist Eric Hunt, which they describe as a "Holocaust denial screed"—to me. The ADL also ignores the fact that I dissociated from the alt right a month ago due to disagreements with the direction of the movement.

To make matters worse, several of the figures accused of being "white supremacist" are not white. For example, Vox Day is part American Indian, Jason Reza Jorjani (editor-in-chief of Arktos) is part Persian, and Tara McCarthy (co-host of the podcast Virtue of the West) is part Indian. This sloppy research underscores how little thought the ADL put into their hit piece.

Assassination By Proxy

> The ADL is a terrorist organization targeting me and my family for a Scalise style shooting. #ADLTerror pic.twitter.com/kCvl4ZXGQM
>
> — Mike Cernovich □□ (@Cernovich) July 18, 2017

The ADL published their list with the intent of dividing and conquering the alternative media—which is already wracked with divisions—as well as singling us out for harassment and violence from left-wingers.

Organizations like the ADL and the SPLC are not news outlets, but exist for the purpose of providing unstable leftists with targets to go after. Assassins have already used dossiers and lists of “hate groups” and “white supremacists” to enact violence against right-wingers; in 2013, a mass shooter attacked the Family Research Council after seeing them on an SPLC list of “anti-gay” groups.

Political violence in the U.S. has reached a level not seen since the 1970’s, with antifas and right-wingers duking it out on the streets of Berkeley and other cities and rhetoric from both sides becoming increasingly violent. Last month, James Hodgkinson, a far-left activist, attempted to assassinate House Majority Whip Steve Scalise and other House Republicans at a basketball game. He was egged on by the fake news media drumming up hysteria against President Trump and the GOP.

Virtually all of the individuals on the ADL’s hit list have already been the victims of left-wing intimidation and violence. For example, Richard Spencer was famously punched in the face by an antifa when he attended Trump’s inauguration in January, while journalist Jason Kessler has been harassed and stalked by leftists in his hometown of Charlottesville, Virginia.

I myself have been threatened and attacked by antifas in the streets and they’ve also targeted my family in the past. Additionally, since I now live in Europe—where Holocaust denial is a crime in many countries—the ADL’s defamation of me as a Holocaust denier could have legal ramifications for me.

In response to the list, Mike Cernovich and several other alt lite/alt right figures have launched the #ADLTerror hashtag on Twitter, attempting to bring attention to the ADL’s passive-aggressive attempt to get its enemies harassed or killed.

> Weird how @ADL_National never says a word about violent Islamic extremists #ADLTerror
>
> — Jack Posobiec □□ (@JackPosobiec) July 18, 2017

> The @ADL_National is trying to incite hate and violence toward people such as myself who don't agree with them politically. #ADLTerror
>
> — Tara McCarthy ♥□□ (@TaraMcCarthy_14) July 18, 2017

> Cernovich and Jack Posobiec could be the next Steve Scalise. The SPLC and ADL are Jewish terrorist organizations #ADLTerror
>
> — Hunter Wallace (@occdissent) July 18, 2017

While some members of the alt right (such as Richard Spencer) have ridiculed the #ADLTerror campaign, the reality of what the ADL is trying to do is no joke. While groups such as the ADL and SPLC have lost much of their credibility as instruments of social shaming, the rising tide of violence against right-wingers cannot be ignored. The ADL’s attempts to attack the alt right and alt lite should be vigorously combated.

Read Next: Alt Lite and Alt Right Hold Dueling Free Speech Rallies, Alt Right

Wins

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

New Amsterdam Law Criminalizes The Act Of Unsuccessfully Flirting With Women In Public

July 21, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Amsterdam, the largest city in the Netherlands and once a mecca for those interested in pot and prostitution, is in the process of criminalizing men approaching women. Though the Netherlands has enjoyed a reputation as a liberal country sans the SJW extremism of Scandinavia, this might be about to change.

The new laws in Amsterdam are aimed at male actions that "frighten" women, according to one of the lawmakers responsible. This kind of highly subjective test, in an age where women write 2,000 word diatribes on "manspreading" on public transportation, is ripe for abuse and overuse.

In Rotterdam, the Netherlands' second city, large fines and even jail time await a man who cat-calls or "bothers a woman in any way." The test is also painfully subjective and shows no indication that it will rely on proper evidence, only the he-said-she-said calculations already capable of sending men to prison for decades after poorly-argued rape allegations.

As I brought you last year, the English city of Nottingham now defines unwanted male approaches of women as a "hate crime." Expect many more cities, if not entire legal jurisdictions, to follow suit. Totalitarian lawmakers will use different words and legal formulas to criminalize men approaching women, but the intentions and many of the pernicious results will be the same.

Feels above evidence

"And then a guy on the street who wasn't Brad Pitt said, 'Your dress looks nice.'"

Well before the latest developments in Amsterdam and Rotterdam, Return Of Kings has repeatedly poked holes in the idea that women are ubiquitously harassed, not to mention sexually assaulted, in public. Given the prevalence of CCTV surveillance in the West, most especially in the United Kingdom, we have criticized a complete paucity of objective evidence demonstrating either street harassment or sexual assault.

At best, the approach bans being implemented in Nottingham, Amsterdam, and other cities are the result on largely self-serving anecdotal evidence, which conveniently portray female complainants as the subject of constant sexual desire on the part of men.

In London, for example, the realization of one aging Game Of Thrones actress, Souad Faress, that she had hit the wall–one far older, higher, and stronger than the one manned by the Night's Watch–probably led to the most ridiculous false rape accusation of all time. Just as we want economic forecasts to be based on verifiable proof, so, too, must we have hard data on the level of supposed street harassment.

An issue we've always covered

We've been saying time is running out for men approaching women in public for years.

My coverage of the Nottingham debacle, part of a wider virtue-signaling operation being orchestrated by politicized UK police chiefs, was preceded by Tuthmosis Sonofra's eery prescience about the future of approaching women in public:

> …soon this time-honored way of meeting a complete stranger… will be illegal.

This year, Beau Albrecht continued our critical inquiry. He pointed out the spectacular incongruence of women expecting men to "man up" and approach first, all while castigating undesired suitors for being so-called "street harassers."

To be frank, we're tired of being right. Defenders of the draconian Nottingham move said that wolf-whistling would not become a hate crime. Even if we significantly doubt this, Rotterdam's legislation has gone one step further and banned cat-calling itself. It's only a matter of time before other vague but still menacing feminist laws become specific and even more menacing ones.

Every man is a potential target

Even for seasoned students (and teachers) of game, not every approach leads to a number or date, let alone some bed-warming soon after. And the more experience you accumulate, the higher the quality of women you tend to pursue, whether in Amsterdam, Nottingham, or New York City. This in itself can lead to frequent enough rejections, as can the fact that many women are taken (without you realizing it) or simply in a bad mood. You reject some women and some women reject you. It's a part of life.

Yet plans like the Amsterdam and Rotterdam ones should cause significant concern for two reasons. The first is evident–who proves whether street harassment took place? Secondly, a massive conflation is at play here. "Unwanted" communication, which can include compliments and date requests, is progressively being equated with instances of actual violence, right up to rape.

Having tight game will only take you so far. Just as your tight game won't cure the sluttiness drive of women you encounter, it will not always insulate you from shady, concocted claims of street harassment. It didn't insulate Donald Trump or even Dutch football star Robin van Persie, who found himself held in jail for two weeks after a false rape accusation, from allegations of misbehavior. If you think you can always escape what these men didn't, you should be teaching the rest of us.

The proposals show how rare actual rape and sexual assault is

Recent migrant crises are likely to significantly alter violent crime rates, but the general trend has been downward for years.

That the police in a place like Rotterdam will have to chase men who cat-call is a testament to the fact that rape has fallen to historic lows across the Western world, at least prior to the present migrant crises. If we truly were experiencing a "rape culture," cat-calling would be an issue the authorities would just have to ignore until actual rape numbers were eliminated or at a minimum brought under control.

The Amsterdam move is similarly illuminating in that:

> Perpetrators would be tracked, possibly by using plain clothes police officers, he said. Cameras should be installed in places where there are a lot of problems and extra police checks carried out.

I generally agree with the installation of cameras, despite the risk that one recorded incident will be presented as "proof" of an epidemic of men saying highly sexual things like, "Nice shoes, baby." What is confounding, however, are the resources evidently at the disposal of local police.

Amsterdam is home to many universities, which are, like in the United States, designated as rape hotspots by feminists and SJWs. Why are lawmakers prioritizing a cat-calling plague in Rotterdam or a "he's talking to me" plague in Amsterdam when their ideological bedmates are simultaneously alleging a plague of rape?

In the age of cell phone cameras, where are all the videos of this outlawed "harassment" taking place?

I think I've seen about 25 videos of wandering cats in Amsterdam over the last several years, uploaded by zealous Instagram, Snapchat, and Facebook sharers. Where are all the street harassment ones? There are far more Dutch cats online than cat-calling instances or things far worse than cat-calling.

Because advocates of the new laws report more salient problems in crowded areas like red light districts and nightclub precincts, we should be seeing firsthand, objective evidence of these harassment incidents all the time. In fact, an inundation of them should have arrived already. But no, we have nothing.

Moreover, if these incidents were regularly recorded, it would almost certainly highlight the triviality of most of them and how the proposals in Amsterdam and Rotterdam are nothing short of leftist overreach presenting normal male behavior as rape-like.

How many of the real street harassers are recent migrants?

Proponents of real street harassment in the Netherlands.

My final question is one very few people in the Netherlands seemingly want to answer, either for ideological reasons or for fear of speaking out and perhaps even being prosecuted like Dutch politician Geert Wilders. Like in Scandinavia and Germany, migrant populations, including those whose large communities were established since the 1970s, have an abysmal rate of incarceration for serious crimes in the Netherlands.

Rates of antisocial behavior and true sexual harassment towards women are much lower than feminists and cucked politicians claim. Nevertheless, any unacceptable actions are disproportionately committed by non-European Dutch residents.

Moroccans are a noted troublesome group. They account for 2.2% of Dutch people, but comprise 11% of the prison population. Around 48% of incarcerated felons come from non-Western backgrounds and they are more likely to be the perpetrators of violent crimes. In bigger cities like Amsterdam and Rotterdam, indigenous Dutch and even Europeans generally tend to form minorities in many districts.

Consequently, the leftist commitment to an anti-male but pro-mass migration agenda means that men with no inclination for crime will be unfairly labeled as sex pests for having the balls to approach attractive women in public.

Read More: British Police: Men Who Try To Get Laid Are Guilty Of Misogynistic "Hate Crimes"

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Film “Money” Drops A Big Red Pill On The Greediness Of Women

July 21, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

The 2016 film “Money,” recently released to DVD, is a typical thief-rips-off-another-thief thriller. The main character, who plays the role of a newcomer to the neighborhood, surprises two thieving coworkers as they are about to split up their stolen money, and is an excellent example of a strong, masculine man that women are driven to follow.

This character displays most of the positive traits we discuss here at ROK. The film’s female characters also behave in very realistic (and surprising for Hollywood) ways.

The film has five major characters. Two young men, who work together and have schemed a way to rip off their employer for $5 million dollars, their female partners, and the main character, John, played by British actor Jamie Bamber (Battlestar Galactica’s Apollo).

The two would-be thieves, Mark and Sean, with their women

As the film begins, Mark arrives home from work to his wife Sylvia. He and his friend have stolen $5 million from their employer, and are there to celebrate and divide the winnings. The two friends go to the basement to play pool and split up the money. The women are upstairs preparing drinks and dinner for a private celebration. Mark and Sylvia, who are married, and living in a large two-story home with a gardener and maid, are the hosts. The other friend, Sean, is there with his girlfriend Christina. Both men are young and decent looking but rather douchey and ostentatious.

John, the smooth, suave visitor

Soon the doorbell rings, and Sylvia, the wife, answers. It is John, dressed sharply and carrying a $1,000 bottle of wine. He introduces himself as a neighbor who is renting a house up the road in a quiet waterfront community, and they chat for a minute. It's obvious that John is a natural player, and he flirts a bit at the door with the married Sylvia.

John quickly reads Sylvia, and is able to guess the designer of the dress she is wearing. Sylvia is surprised that a man could recognize an expensive designer dress, and asks how he knows. John drops a DHV by saying he once dated a fashion model and purchased a similar dress for her in Milan.

Hi, I’m a stranger with game. I bet in 60 seconds I can convince you to welcome me inside your husband’s home.

Feeling the tingles, Sylvia can’t help but invite this stranger into her husband’s house. He joins them for drinks, subtly demonstrating more of his knowledge and world experience, and charming the group. He converses with Christina, Sean’s girlfriend, in Spanish. After they have dropped their guard a bit, he indirectly insults Sean as a coward, triggering him to react out of anger. When Sean loses his temper, John quickly subdues him physically, and announces…

> I have no intention of harming any of you, unless you make me. I’m a professional. I don’t do drama. Let’s do this quickly, keep it nice and simple. Now if you’d be so kind to bring me the money I’ve come for, I’ll leave right now and you can carry on with your very pleasant evening.

The women, panties now moistened, know nothing of the money. Sylvia asks her husband if there is any money and he denies it (she will later use this as the reason to betray, rob, and divorce him).

John quickly demonstrates he has researched their backgrounds and intimate details and there is no point in lying to him. After things get a bit violent, they soon admit they have the money in the basement on the pool table.

Christina, played by 23 year old Spanish actress Lucia Guerrero (sorry, no nude scenes)

Christina, the girlfriend, is sent downstairs to retrieve the money. She pockets some of it, and returns with one briefcase. The other briefcase with Mark's half is upstairs in a locked safe. The group argues a lot, with John manipulating the women and turning them against their men.

Rescue is repaid with betrayal

Mark and his wife Sylvia

Mark is locked in a room by the pool until the time-lock safe that is holding the second briefcase can be accessed. While they are waiting, the gardener arrives, and Mark frantically tells him to rescue his wife Sylvia when he causes a distraction. Minutes later, John returns, and Mark stalls, giving the gardener time to untie Sylvia in the house.

Mark, when given the opportunity to be rescued by the gardener, does not ask him to call the police, or to be set free, but instead asks to save his wife. Sadly, white knighting, even for one's own wife, can be dangerous.

Instead of escaping or calling the cops, Sylvia quietly empties one of the briefcases with the money, hiding it and replacing it with a book John commented on earlier that gave her tingles. She sits and waits quietly for John to return, taking the full briefcase and the secretly emptied one as he flees the scene.

After they recover from the tragedy, Sylvia goes upstairs, packs her bags, and walks out, announcing she is divorcing Mark, and secretly taking his share of the money.

John knows game

John has naturally good looks, but what sets him apart from everyone else is his ability to charm, flirt, converse, and casually and naturally have a good time. He is confident, calm, and slightly cocky, but without being braggadocious. He is a world traveler, independent, unmarried, self-employed and self-sufficient, funny, intelligent, and mysterious. And of course he has a bad side. He's somewhat reminiscent of the Patrick Bateman character played by Christian Bale in American Psycho.

While some aspects of game can be faked, charm cannot. John has the natural ability to read and engage a person, modifying his banter and mannerisms to the other party, a quality that President Bill Clinton was well known for.

He drops DHVs casually, first by complimenting Sylvia on her dress, so that he can mention he dated an attractive fashion model (pre-selection) and bought her the same designer's clothing in Italy (showing taste, wealth, travel). Unlike other men who display their wealth by driving fancy leased import cars and living in exclusive neighborhoods with hired help, John casually intimates that he is independently wealthy, working here and there on his own terms.

Women respond to mystery, independence and self-sufficiency. John quickly dominates the conversation, as the women are much more interested in hearing of his world travelers than their husband's boring day at the office. John mentions vaguely that he is a consultant:

> I just got bored of working for other people, following orders, and wanted to set up my own business, be my own boss.

He has refined tastes, able to recognize fashion designs, and able to discern a slight change Sylvia has made to a cocktail recipe. He remains a gentleman, and never curses, but can match violence or aggression when others bring it. His skills at gaming both men and women allow him to blend into any social situation, and these skills literally opened the door for him to walk away with millions.

The greed of women

Me ! Me ! Me !

In the end, the two coworkers who stole the money are left with nothing, and both of their women leave with the money they have stolen. John steals one briefcase holding half the money, while Sylvia has stolen the money out of the other briefcase. Christina has pocketed perhaps $10,000. Neither man is aware of this. The women could have cooperated with their men, and shared the money with them, but instead they betray their partners for immediate gratification.

In Sylvia's mind, she justifies divorcing and abandoning her husband because he told her a lie. Yes, he lied to a violent stranger in order to protect his family's assets and safety, but in her mind, a lie nonetheless. As John threatened the guests, Sylvia asked her husband if there was any money in the house, and he replied no, obviously not wanting to admit to a thief they had millions of dollars in their home. To her, this was an unforgivable sin. However, HER betrayal of her husband, breaking her wedding vows, and her theft and greed are not seen as bad, because feelings.

Women will never take responsibility for their actions, and often will blame others for their behavior. You see, in Sylvia's mind she didn't steal anything. The money was already there, and she just "spent it" or however she justifies it in her head. And she only took the money because John lied and denied there was any money. It's all his fault, you see.

A woman's moral compass is situational: The right or wrong thing varies based on their feelings and impulses. Even if they make a decision that is universally bad, it will not be regretted later–it will be labeled the choice that others "forced" her to make.

Conclusion

The film is a good video rental. The omniscient bad guy is over the top, as John knows a bit too much about the personal preferences of the others (their favorite foods, art, etc.), much of the plot is predictable, and the steal-from-the-thief plot has been done before. But John, minus the criminal element, is an excellent example of a masculine, confident alpha, and the ending with the female betrayal, is a realistic reminder of the dangers of losing frame and the hypergamy of women.

Read Next: The John Wick Film Series Is A Modern Magnum Opus Of Red Pill Cinema

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

ROK Writer Threatened With Violence After Expressing His Opinion About New Zealand Women

July 23, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Assumed-to-be-retired Return of Kings author "Hamish Rangi", who contributed two articles to the site in the middle of 2016, has been the latest target of social justice warrior witch hunts directed against the non-violent members of the manosphere.

His article "6 Reasons New Zealand Women Are The Worst In The Western World", which addressed problems which are inherent to the female persuasion in his self-described home country, recently went semi-viral and attracted the attention of the New Zealand Herald (in a laughably sloppy article with asleep-at-the-wheel quality control and seemingly non-existent grammar checks), and a woman by the name of Millie Elder-Holmes.

Who Is Millie Elder-Holmes?

Degeneracy 101 – Exhibit A: Millie getting the “Goddess!” treatment from her beta orbiters, who clearly love her copious butt-ugly tattoos that look like she landed on a giant griddle.

Millie Elder-Holmes (the hyphenated family name and rampant tattooing are automatic red flags) is the stepdaughter of Paul Holmes, a prominent New Zealand radio and television journalist who passed away in 2013. Her main preoccupations are lounging around Greece (probably on her fathers inheritance) and maintaining a by-the-numbers “progressive lifestyle blog” where everything is of course about “wellness”, “empowerment”, “healing”, and “letting go” among other cookie-cutter female fluff.

Further investigation into her background shows that previous years have been rife with self-destructive behavior and choices. This includes having had a taste for methamphetamine, and shacking up with a New Zealand ‘Head Hunters’ gang member who was later murdered.

Nice choice of boyfriend Millie. Great foresight.

Two things can be summarized about Millie. First of all, she fits perfectly into a female archetype which has existed for as long as the written word has survived. She is "world-famous-in-New Zealand" for being nothing more than a semi-attractive wife or daughter of many a man who has actually accomplished something big in life, and has successfully been able to ride off their husbands or fathers coat tails with "no sweat equity".

Second, she is another poster child for exactly what is wrong with modern dating, relationships, and the choices that young women make all over the west. They prefer to ride the cock carousel with degenerate, damaged, and even outright dangerous men while in their aesthetic prime, while completely sexually ostracizing nice and normal guys who are genuinely respectful, mannerly, don't pierce or ink themselves, and won't lead women on a path of self-destruction.

Those guys are just too "boring" or "not exciting" enough for an adventurous and "empowered" Kiwi lass. And now without further ado, we come to the prominent point of the article.

The Smoking Gun

BINGO! Tacit approval for preemptive violence against Hamish means that Millie and her New Zealand Zerglings completely lost the moral high ground.

New Zealand has a lot of problems, such as cultural Marxist migration policies which are meant to displace white New Zealanders as quickly as possible from the country, gang violence, wildly overpriced and poorly insulated homes, and as we can now clearly see… belligerent women who want to violently lash out at a man who has brought no harm (nor any threat of harm) to any person, animal, or property.

Millie Elder-Holmes consciously decided to use her 77,000 follower Facebook page, "Clean Eatz NZ", as a mouthpiece which would only end in a witch hunt against Hamish. Threats against him for his thought crimes (like his desires for Kiwi women to use less profanity, dress better, not disturb men just trying to get some dinner at McDonald's, and not threaten to "fuckin' whack" people over the phone) included dick punching, throat punching, and even stoning. Millie herself would never denounce any of these words, and even gave tacit approval to a preemptive dick punch.

Also, in a rather bizarre victimhood twist, a group called "White Ribbon New Zealand" denounced the article as "more toxic masculinity that only leads to violence". Now just who exactly is making threats of violence? The 'Roosh Right' at Return of Kings, or the liberal left blood-thirst of Kiwi women?

White (Knight) Ribbon New Zealand thinks ‘toxic masculinity’ in article will lead to violence. Maori New Zealand woman with toxic femininity then proceeds to desire violence.

Conclusion

Calls for throat punches and medieval executions (with laughter), and rampant profanity by New Zealand women. Hamish Rangi… we now see your point.

While Mr. Rangi’s article is undeniably chauvinistic (so what else is new with Return of Kings?), it's claims are nonetheless backed up by several examples of factual evidence, such as the "twenty fuckin' whacks" phone call, the number of sexual partners to stable marriage ratios, and the country of New Zealand clearly emphasizing too much masculine behavior for their women folk.

The article is also safely within the grounds of free speech that we are (supposed to) enjoy in representative democracies like New Zealand, Australia, Canada, Britain, and the United States. While presenting information that many may not like, it does not under any circumstance call for any violent actions against people or animals, destruction of property, or political insurrections/coups/riots. No article gets past the Return of Kings pending process which advocates any of those preceding no-no's.

The fact that Ms. Elder-Holmes and her mostly female Kiwi followers made so many tacit or even outright blatant calls for violent action against Hamish, along with the copious amount of "cunt" filled profanity from their Facebook feeds, only comes to show that he was correct on a lot his assertions about degenerate New Zealand culture.

Women of Aotearoa, you ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Don't Miss: 6 Reasons New Zealand Women Are The Worst In The Western World

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

4 Leftist Strategies The Right Should Emulate

July 23, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Leftist ideology has been bankrupt for quite some time now. Things seriously took a wrong turn with Karl Marx. Even moderate liberalism hasn't been much to write home about for the last fifty years, as the negatives outweigh the positives. Despite all that, some of their strategies are on the right track.

Planning ahead

"Dear Mr. Alinsky, I'm your number one fan. Can't wait for your new book! I want to be just like you some day. XOXOXO, Hillary"

Even when leftists aren't in power, they're busily planning how to get there. Afterward, they figure out how to retain control. I must admit that some of their plans were fairly brilliant, even though what they did afterward didn't work out so well.

For some examples, consider Lenin's 1902 revolutionary blueprint, What is to be Done? The Bolsheviks started here from the ground floor, and fifteen years later they took over the largest country in the world. During the 1930s, Max Horkheimer and his Frankfurt School pals developed cultural Marxism; in time, it spread throughout the universities and strongly influenced the 1960s counterculture.

Also during the 1960s, the Democrats introduced some major changes into American federal law which created voter blocs beholden to them. Although the Soviet Union fell, Western progressivism took on a life of its own. "Communism Lite" became PC orthodoxy, assuming nearly religious dimensions despite being complete nonsense.

Naturally, the world would be a better place if leftists made as much effort figuring out things that actually work to improve society. Fortunately, our job will be pretty simple; we don't need to devise radical and untested policies, or even do much theorizing. We can go quite far simply by pointing out how leftist policies failed, and (when we're in a position to do so) replace them with what worked in the past. Until then, we should start planning the road to victory.

At long last, leftist narratives are slipping. In fact, through their dysfunctional behavior and policies, they've delivered to us a truckload of rhetorical ammo. We should keep discrediting them mercilessly. For just one example, imagine the results if the public understood what feminism was really about and recognized how they've wrecked society. Their spell is fading already; let's keep stamping this—and other nutty leftist narratives—into the ground.

Further, the media's stranglehold on information has been seriously challenged. We can do our part as individuals by helping to Red Pill the public. By striking while the iron is hot, we can achieve critical mass. After that, great possibilities will be within reach.

We should make other plans as well, to handle any possible contingencies that might develop along the way. A few examples include censorship (particularly in Europe), political violence directed against us (the Antifags, among others), government repression (like domestic spying), or establishment politicians throwing the public a bone but changing nothing (Margaret Thatcher and Angela Merkel, etc.) For too long, the right has been on the defensive; with proper planning, we can change this.

Unity

In many respects, the radical left is much more diverse than the alternative right. Some leftist alliances make no ideological sense, and the only purpose is to build a coalition opposed to Western civilization. There are vastly conflicting agendas on the left. Smoldering resentments sometimes reach the surface, but for the most part they're managing to keep everyone in lockstep.

Sometimes it's quite ridiculous, but they don't care. For one example, some feminists cozy up to radical Islam, despite the highly regressive nature of Sharia law. Sometimes these silly people even say that wearing a ninja suit is “liberating”. It’ll be an utter disaster for feminists if the jihadists they’re trying to empower take over, but that doesn’t bother them either.

On the right side, things have been much more fragmented for ages. Unfortunately, armchair Caesars are partially at fault. I’ll just say that those who dream of recognition should earn it. The left certainly has its share of armchair Lenins, but we don’t have the time to waste with big egos and big talkers.

Other fragmentation is from ideological disagreements. Granted, there are genuine questions about where we want to go that eventually will have to be resolved. The good news is that the alternative right isn’t purely reactionary as some believe, or bound to dogmatic theory; we’re pragmatically interested in what will be best for our people.

In any event, petty squabbles aren’t constructive. We should let our various factions develop naturally and keep sniping to a minimum. Those with the best ideas will come out ahead. Let’s save our rhetorical firepower for leftists whose misguided and often malicious policies are harming society.

This includes avoiding declarations like “I’m not an extremist, unlike this guy a little to my right.” Republicans have fallen for this again and again. This greatly limits their effectiveness and assists leftist “salami slicing” tactics.

Consequentially, mainstream conservative discourse isn’t allowed to stray an inch outside of the Overton Window of “respectable” opinion. (Who gets to define what is mainstream and respectable? Think about it.) When have liberals ever rushed to denounce one of their own for ideological heresy, or even for being too chummy with radicals (like Saul Alinsky or Bill Ayers) or hobnobbing with foreign dictators (like Fidel Castro or Muammar Gadhafi)?

All told, not everyone on our side will see things the same way. Constructive debate and even limited criticism aren’t bad. Still, we should seek to have no enemies on the right. For example, some might see the “alt right versus alt lite” schism as separating the wheat from the chaff, but we’d be better off opposing our common foes who’d be happy to censor us all.

If from the beginning we’d struggled against our real enemies as much as we were fighting each other, we’d be much closer to the finish line. For these reasons, we should focus on commonalities, and beware of “purity spirals”. Never let the perfect be the enemy of the good.

Networking

“Those unruly peasants are criticizing my policies, Zuckie! Do they think this is a free country or something?” “Don’t worry, Angie; they know too much, so we’ll shut it down.”

Quite remarkably, the Weathermen had ties to dozens of radical organizations (Communist and otherwise), not just in the USA but in several countries abroad. This enabled joint operations, and they even were guests at a conference in Havana. How did fugitives, holed up in one grubby hideout after another, do all that?

They were active mostly during the 1970s, when they would’ve had to rely on pay phones, snail mail, and private conversation. It’s unclear how exactly they acquired and maintained all those contacts (though I have a few ideas), but they were remarkably successful at it.

We should be organizing and building our contacts too. It’s very easy, because Al Gore invented the series of tubes we call the Interwebs. Not only will this help our short-term efforts, networking is a major part of how things get done in politics. This has a greater role in history than most people suspect, from personal friendships to shadowy globalist clubs.

Activism

More fun than going to the gym

I’ll have to credit leftists for being very highly motivated. Moderate conservatives are all too often “Joe Sixpack” types, trusting that everything will be peachy once their candidate gets elected and cleans house. (Maybe taking a more active role toward shaping their destiny might could be prudent?) Meanwhile, even moderate liberals often get involved in demonstrations and other activism.

Rightists tend to be more concerned with self-improvement, careers, and our social lives. Indeed, some leftists have quite a bit of free time on their hands. We will have to close the gap by using our time judiciously. Every day, we should be doing something to advance our cause, even simply a conversation to enlighten someone.

Another thing holding us back is fear. Many are afraid of what their friends might think, or their employers, etc. A friend who can't tolerate a difference of opinion isn't much of a friend, and an employer shouldn't pry into an employee's private life, but still these are legitimate concerns. Even so, we'll have to take calculated risks; the stakes are too high to conform to petty tyranny.

Read More: The Argument For Adopting Leftist Tactics To Defeat The Left

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Men Have No Excuse To Skip Out On Strength Training

July 23, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

In the many articles I've posted on this website, I have discussed that there's more to life than strength training—and I will never stop standing by that. Contrary to what some in the manosphere would have you believe, to train solely for strength is only giving yourself a half-advantage; after all, a man who can deadlift 1000 pounds isn't all that useful if he can't walk up a flight of stairs without dying of a heart attack.

With that being said, I wish to make something perfectly clear: while I don't feel that strength training is the only thing you should do, I do feel that it is the most important thing you ought to be doing. To put quantities upon it, I would roughly estimate that 50% of the state of being "fit" is strength training, with the remaining 50% being a combination of cardiovascular and flexibility/dexterity training.

Simply put, if you're not strength training, you are not training yourself to be as fit and strong as you can possibly be.

The benefits to your body from strength training and numerous and, if you'll pardon the expression, diverse (finally, a form of diversity that isn't inherently terrible!).

Strength

Obviously, the most visible benefit in strength training is that, simply, you will see increased strength and ability—which is to say, the ability to produce and resist external forces. It's pretty self-explanatory: both the actual muscles fibers will increase in strength, and the central nervous system will become more accustomed to firing muscle units in synchronicity. Or to put it in even simpler terms—if you train with progressively heavier weights, you will become stronger

Hypertrophy

Another benefit for those who desire it is that of hypertrophy—gettin' swole, in the layman's. While I personally don't care for bodybuilding, preferring instead to have functional strength and movement ability…

Finally, the handstand picture I couldn't take a year ago due to my broken foot

I can in an ascetic sort of way understand the appeal of packing on as much mass as possible, and I do respect the effort and labor that goes into it.

While training for pure hypertrophy does not require quite as heavy loads of pure strength training, doing many repetitions of 75-85% of your max lift will develop your strength far beyond that of the average man, and will give you many of the not-as-visible benefits detailed below.

Increased Cardiovascular Endurance

Yes! That may surprise you, but increasing muscular strength can improve your cardiovascular endurance.

The way this works is that when you have trained your muscles (in particular the appendicular skeletal muscles—i.e., the limbs) to become stronger, you will increased blood circulation to them, and make the uptake of oxygen much more efficient. And with increased circulation and oxygen efficiency, you will by definition have more cardiovascular endurance than you would if you didn't strength train.

Bear in mind of course that your average weightlifter is not going to be capable of running a marathon fresh out of the gym—you still need to train for the specific athletic adaptation you want (i.e., if you want to be able to run longer distances, you have to train running), but strength training will give you an advantage that the completely unconditioned person would not have.

Weight Loss

Obesity being the massive problem that it is in the wealthy world (and increasingly the developing world), this is obviously a goal that many are seeking to accomplish. As luck would have it, resistance training will help you substantially with that.

To put it very simplify, losing weight requires you to expend more calories than you lose. And when doing the fundamental full-body lifts, the sheer amount of muscles being exerted means you are expending a lot of calories. As if that wasn't enough, weight lifting stimulates the production of androgens, most notably testosterone, which also stimulate the burning of fat

Bone Strength

Last but not least, resistance training will make your bones and joints stronger, thus enabling you to lift heavier and heavier weights and thus get all of the enumerated benefits above.

The Big Four

So now that you know the benefits of strength training (even if you don't explicitly want to develop your strength and hypertrophy), the novice might be asking: which lifts should he do?

To get all of the benefits detailed above, you are going to have to do lifts that hit as many muscles as possible. And I think you know what those lifts are…

That's right, the big four lifts! The squat, the deadlift, the bench press, and the overhead press. You already know the latter two, the former will have articles soon. Keep working at them with proper form, and all of those health benefits will be yours.

Read More: How To Start Training The Front Lever For Strength And Flexibility

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

5 Social Justice Rock Bands You Should Boycott

July 24, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Popular music has long been a major outlet for disseminating degenerate SJW trash. While the godlike radio airplay and online viewership of the likes of Nicki Minaj, Katy Perry, Ariana Grande, Miley Cyrus, and other teenage girl corrupting singers do the heaviest damage, the less mainstream rock world also rubs some unwanted salt in societies proverbial wound.

This article will address five groups, of varying degrees of exposure, that no red pill masculine man should make any monetary contribution towards. Bleed the beast, one riff at a time.

1. Stray From The Path

I never heard of this group until Paul Joseph Watson gave them a well-deserved troll job. Affectionately dubbed a "cuckcore" band (it's funny because it's true), these guys lyrically hit just about all the SJW buttons you can think of.

Lots of profanity, cries about "racism", cries about "hate", cries about "Nazis", cries about "supremacy", "It's the current year!" nonsense, what a supposed "threat" the KKK entails to everyone, and advocating wanton blood-spilling violence against people they disagree with.

Thankfully, their video for "Goodnight Alt-right" has been getting the lightsaber treatment online, and their underwhelming riffage and sky high cringe-o-meter reading should help ensure that their musical foray is either short-lived or unsuccessful. Hopefully both.

My best advice for these relatively unknown axe-wielding cucks is to set aside a sufficient amount of whatever cash they make for their tattoo removals. Because, in their own words, they are largely going to get "knocked the fucked out" of the two-figure-per-hour labor force unless they get rid of their degenerate neck ink.

2. Green Day

Green Day's heyday was back in the mid 90's, stretching from their 1994 megahit 'Dookie' album to their 1997 effort 'Nimrod'. It was fun, simple, and catchy punk rock that mostly addressed social alienation, boredom, and relationships. Any faults you could find largely just boiled down to the juvenile music theory, and the fact that they weren't much beyond juveniles themselves (all members were in their early 20's during Dookie days).

However, ever since they sort of reinvented themselves with 2004's 'American Idiot' album, intended for a new generation of youth, they have been on a systematic SJW downward slide. Aging into their 30's, and now even their 40's, while still paint brushing their hair in neon green or blue, also seems as ridiculously out of place as their late-bloomer liberal college campus politics.

Try and cherish the memories of a 1995 era Green Day, because they are a cringe-inducing shadow of their former selves, and not deserving of any concert attendance or merchandise purchases while they choose to remain active.

3. Anti-Flag

Anti-Flag are an anti-capitalist middle-aged ragtag of punk rockers from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Once signed to the major label RCA Records (oh how capitalistic!), their far-left talking points delve into just about every whiny topic from the SJW playbook.

They love to bitch and moan about how "unfair" everything is, "slavery" somehow still exists in the United States (and Jim Crow too), history is "white-washed", profits are "fascist", and that "terrorism" is in plain sight (must be that KKK again. They're everywhere!)

At least they haven't been advocating violence against the right, or not yet anyway…

4. Millencolin

Ah Sweden… if there was one country on this list that had to make an outside-of-the-U.S. appearance, you were always going to be a top choice. Millencolin have been around for quite awhile (they are in their 40's too), and while not as widely known to American audiences, they have been popular throughout Europe and Australasia since the days of 2000's 'Pennybridge Pioneers'.

A lot of their earlier material passes the SJW seismograph, but the bands leftist/progressive/anti-racist politics, which has jointly coincided with their nations demise, has come out in full force in recent years. Read the lyrics of 'Sense and Sensibility' closely and you can see how it hits everything we have known about SJW's for years.

> I always thought I was a tolerant man
> The kind that'd always try to understand
> But there's a darker force inside of me that wants me to > Be as bad and be as sad, sad as you
>
> And that's the side of me I turn to
> When I think about the world, well
> That's not my cup of tea
> Yeah, it's the side of me I take
> That tells me you've got it wrong
> Well, how clear we disagree
>
> Yeah, it's the side of me that said
> "I would like to kick your head in > You're so far out at sea"
> This state of mind is hard to get through > Makes me hate as much as you do
> It clearly makes me see
> You're just a racist clown to me
>
> You're just a racist clown to me
> You're just a racist clown
> A racist clown to me
>
>
> That "I'm gonna stab you" stare when you dare to disagree with an anti-racist modern leftie

As you can see, they are anything but "tolerant", they have many sinister issues/intentions, they "hate" a lot more than right-wingers ever will, they shout "racist" when they have run out of things to say, and they are increasingly fantacizing about violence against the right. You don't want to get "your head kicked in" for daring to disagree with social justice in real life do you?

5. Rage Against The Machine / Prophets Of Rage

Pretty much sums up the young left-wing attitude towards everything

Rage Against The Machine have been on hiatus since 2011, and as far as I'm concerned they can stay that way. The quality of their music (politics aside) has been down the crap chute since their 1992 debut album, and they have been perhaps the most popular Marxist rock band in contemporary history.

Their fairytale views are considered to be Anarcho-communist in nature, and to date the best known example of an Anarcho-communist society was the anarchist territories of Spain during their 1936 Revolution. Now just how exactly did that turn out? Worthy of emulation again?

Unfortunately, Rage 2.0 now lives on through 'Prophets of Rage', which is a new SJW side project of several Rage Against The Machine members and B-Real from 'Cypress Hill', among several others. Get a load of their brilliant hive-mind lyrics like "No hatred, fuck racists, and unfuck the world", and also their tacit approval to the use of violence (Richard Spencer sucker punch 0:58).

Conclusion

I appreciate the irony that a modest amount of Youtube clicks might actually make some of these groups a couple of dimes in advertising royalties, but ensuring that as many people as possible don't fork out $60 for a concert ticket, $30 for a T-shirt, or even just $5 for a digital album download are the main prizes to help spring a leak in their coffers.

If you are a father, do not finance your children to attend one of their shows, and carefully check the lineup of music festivals to gauge the level of SJW infiltration. Just one ‘progressive’ spouting band might be one band too much.

Finally, by all means write in the comment section if you are aware of any additional rotten eggs that should be added to this basket of cringe lyric deplorables.

Read Next: How To Deal With Friends Who Believe In Social Justice

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

The Real European Union Is Based On Christendom

July 24, 2017 | by Rik Storey | Link | Original Link

As someone who has written for various right-wing websites, I am only too aware of the deep need felt by white men across the West for an identity and community. Indeed, these things are fundamental human needs, as Maslow pointed out in his famous 'hierarchy of needs' – needs which I have felt for as long as I can remember. The problem is: we are seeking fulfilment in all the wrong places.

Mistaken identity

Sports teams, regardless of how little they truly represent the local demographic, are the most common and abhorrently sad display of this. Seeing grown men paint themselves, chant religiously, fight vehemently with other teams and weep bitterly at any loss would make sense if it was for some ritual concerning a shared myth or metaphysical belief which bound some group together at a subconscious level. But this is all most commonly seen at football matches – a glorified children's game. Such is the pathetically desperate need of the Western man for a cultural identity.

When we look at minority communities, welcomed into Western countries with remarkably great ease and even more remarkable numbers, the why and wherefore of our lack of European communities become even clearer. 'Muslims need to integrate,' the civic nationalist mindlessly insists. 'Integrate into what?' they must think, as they pay lip service to the consumerism we call our culture. Nevertheless, the licentious West invites greater numbers of young men from these more cohesive groups, filling our cultural vacuum.

Those complaining about a lack of integration should be attending a church, or doing something to build up their own communities. After all, if our civilization lacks something, it is our sore lack of the very cultural technology Muslims still possess. In this feeble condition, all complaints to the state fall on deaf ears; its coercive power follows the path of least resistance, falling on weak, white (as yet) majorities. We are an easy and bounteous target.

Naturally, this begs the question: if even our own political class refuse to protect us adequately, how can we expect other civilizations to treat us? I therefore contend that the irresponsible omission by our men to develop and maintain strong community institutions alone makes terror attacks inevitable in the West.

Sadder still, following the now commonplace bombings, stabbings etc., you see the soulless Westerner desperately trying to find his heartbeat – some sign of life in their civilization, anything to hang their flimsy value system on:

The right look to patriotism, but that too must be based on something. A superior people, perhaps? The Brits, Germans and now the Scandinavians have all tried this in one way or other but they have all ignored the dangers of our excessively individualistic tendencies when not bound by an absolute, objective and transcendent creed.

The left look to love, but…what love? Did I miss the history lesson in which humanity was inherently lovely? Resources are less scarce now, sure, permitting enough peace for middle-class leftists to forget the brutish nature of man; yet, we can hardly describe the West as a beacon of love to the world. Our hyper-individualised society only knows of going to and from the workplace, indistinguishable cafes and home; personalism and the community are all but extinct here.

The thing we are all looking for, which has been replaced (left and right) by the state, is Christendom.

Identitarians will probably stop reading here. Race is first and foremost for preserving Western civilization in their estimation. What they fail to understand is that you must have the whole package. Of course, ethnic homogeneity is vitally important for preserving a high trust society, which in turn is important for markets, the rule of law and any other Western institution you could care to mention. Of course! But is that all it takes to keep unity amongst Europeans?

Either I have missed yet another history lesson or Europeans have always been a danger to each other because of our individualistic psychology – generally above average on the psychopathic scale. Was Pagan Rome unity? Not sustainably; their statism, adopted in part from the Near-East, allowed too much scope for irresponsibility among the political class.

The proverbial Ring of Power could not be resisted by plutocrats, especially not following the Renaissance and the Reformation, when proper states formed in Northern Europe and all conceivable institutions became centralised as a means of control. Welcome to modern Europe.

How do we save Europe?

The EU has tried in vain to unite Europe under this soulless, modern system of centralised statism. But it is currently failing and, indeed, can never succeed because it functions in fundamental opposition to human nature; the nature of Europeans to be more precise. Pope John Paul II called for the EU to recognise its Christian heritage but this was ignored and, not ten years later, the EU began to crumble. Yet, during the greatest periods of decentralisation in Europe, it was the unifying creed of Christendom which not only united the continent of Europe and the mosaic of communities, guilds, universities etc. etc. which comprised her.

It should be noted by all identitarians and made a matter of close study, that the Church (unlike super-tolerant paganism) was able to secure cultural homogeneity within regions, providing peaceful, lawful trading relationships across a diverse Europe, whilst also celebrating and defending the decentralised systems of government and voluntary, individualistic institutions natural to us. It was this system, prior to the rise of nation states, which saw Europeans identify each other as brothers, especially the nobility. Differences could be set aside to handle common foes and preserve an equally common identity.

Just look at Eastern Europe! They are ‘living proof that defence is possible’, as Hungarian PM, Viktor Orban put it, declaring that they ‘will not change their identity’ in the face of the EU bringing Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic to the ‘Court of Justice’ for not accepting Muslim migrants. What is this identity?

According to Orban, ‘the European identity is rooted in Christianity’. As Prof. Ricardo Duchesne has shown in his brilliant article of the same name, Christianity is a Hellenistic religion and Western civilization is Christian. Therefore, it seems the problem many new right and Christian folk alike now face is the indivisible nature of Christian and European identity. As Belloc put it, ‘the faith is Europe and Europe is the faith.’

Tens of thousands of Polish Christians march for their identity

If we Westerners want our identity back, we have to embrace its entirety and learn the lesson of Eastern Europeans, who have risen from the ashes of Communism, knowing its value. We cannot currently replace the vital cultural technology of religion. Civilizations cannot and do not function without it.

Therefore, it is a monumental oversight, an ideological compulsion or a mental deficiency which could cause one to do so. More than this though, we should revisit this ancient institution which built our civilization in search of the soul of our people, but not simply out of practicality. Our pews are empty, as are so many of the pleasures of our civilization; let us rediscover what gives those Eastern Europeans not just their identity, but their zeal for it.

Read More: Brexit Vote: Why Britain Should Leave The European Union

Rik Storey
One Englishman promoting the great libertarian values and sociobiological qualities of the West. Visit my page, That Libertarian Chap, here - https://www.facebook.com/thatlibertarianchap

Why The Greek God Hermes Is A Perfect Symbol For Neomasculinity

July 24, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

In an article titled 7 Core Principles To Help Reinvigorate Western Culture, I mentioned Greco-Roman culture as the main source of inspiration for current and future endeavors within the West, including both Christianity and the Hellenic past. I take it for granted that many agree upon this outlook, rather than Westerners looking at Vedic, Buddhist, Taoist or Islamic sources of inspiration.

In this regard there a number of gods and symbols that might be of particular significance for parts of the readership. Those who almost represent the essence of this websites' spirit. For instance, if one takes the concept of neomasculinity as a starting point, one notices that elements such as game, self-improvement, ethics, entrepreneurship, and male virtue and development constitute important parts of it. That in turn can make one want to look for proper symbols within Western history.

One relevant such is the Greek god Hermes, which many likely only have a limited understanding of. In Antoine Faivre's book The Eternal Hermes: From Greek God To Alchemical Magus (1995), and additional sources, a more nuanced and full description of this complex and multi-faceted divine figure emerges. I intend to look into some of these dimensions and point out which specific facets that are of particular relevance in this context.

The manifold functions of Hermes

As the fact site Greeks Gods and Goddesses tells us:

> Hermes was one of the 12 Olympian Gods and was god of trade, thieves, travelers, sports, athletes, and border crossings, guide to the Underworld. He was the second youngest Olympian god and was the son of ZEUS and Maia, one of the seven Pleiades and daughter of the Titan Atlas.
>
> As the god of boundaries and transitions, Hermes was known to be quick and cunning and had the ability to freely move between the mortal and divine worlds. It is this skill that made him a luck-bringing messenger to the gods and intercessor between mortals and the divine.
>
> He is also the patron and protector of travelers, herdsmen, thieves, orators and wit, literature and poets, athletics and sports, invention and trade. In some myths Hermes is also depicted as a trickster where he would outwit the gods either for the good of humankind or for his own personal amusement and satisfaction.
>
> Both Homer and Hesiod portrayed Hermes as the author of skilled or deceptive acts, and also as a benefactor of mortals.

Greek Name	Roman Name	Parentage	Concern	Attributes
Zeus	Jupiter / Jove	Cronus - Rhea	Sky god, weather, sovereignty	Beard, thunderbolt, eagle, scepter, throne
Hera	Juno	Cronus - Rhea	Marriage, family	Matron, peacock
Demeter	Ceres	Cronus - Rhea	Harvest	Matron; ears of corn; often w/ Persephone
Artemis	Diana	Zeus - Leto	Wild animals; maidenhood	Bow, short skirt; often w/ animals
Aphrodite	Venus	Zeus - Dione / Uranus' genitals	Love, human fertility	Doves; often w/ Cupid. Only nude goddess
Hermes	Mercury	Zeus - Maia	Commerce, travel, thieves	Hat, caduceus (staff w/ snakes), winged sandals
Hephaestus	Vulcan	Hera (alone)	Crafts, metallurgy	Lame, bald; hammer
Poseidon	Neptune	Cronus - Rhea	Water, sea; earthquakes	Beard, trident; chariot over the sea
Apollo	Apollo	Zeus - Leto	Healing, music / poetry, prophecy	Young, beardless, lyre, bow, coiffure
Ares	Mars	Zeus - Hera	War, violence	Beardless, shield, sword
Athena	Minerva	Zeus - Metis	Civilized life / culture; maidenhood	Helmet, spear, aegis, owl
Hestia	Vesta	Cronus - Rhea	Household	Matron (rarely pictured)
Dionysus	Liber	Zeus - Semele	Ecstasy; the vine	Ivy in the hair; panther skin; often w/ Maenads and Bacchantes
Pan	Faunus	Hermes -nymph	Wild animals; shepherds	Goat legs, pointed ears, horns, pipes
Heracles	Hercules	Zeus - Alcmene	Civilizing force	Club, lion skin over head
Hades	Dis Pater	Cronus - Rhea	The dead	Beard (rarely pictured)
Persephone	Proserpina	Zeus - Demeter	The dead; agriculture	Young women; often w/ Demeter
Asclepius	Aesculapius	Apollo - Coronis	Medicine	Beard, staff w/ snake, saucer

In this regard one can think of neomasculine phenomena such as game, travel, physical nurturing, making money, upsetting politically correct people with hate facts and memes, as well as accumulating lots of knowledge. The Roman equivalent of Hermes is Mercury, associated with the merchant occupation, but as clearly showed above this is but one of many functions.

There are other facets of Hermes too, most notably Hermes Trismegistus, the proclaimed author of The Hermetica, the Greek-Egyptian sacred texts from the 2nd and 3rd centuries AD. These were translated into Latin in the late 15th century by Marsilio Ficino, compiled as the Corpus Hermeticum. This work has influenced many writers of the Perennial school of religious philosophy (Philosophia perennis) and similar branches of thought.

Carl Gustav Jung's ideas of individuation and the collective unconscious have been influenced by Hermes' transcendental function, and Julis Evola has written The Hermetic Tradition, a work which deals with the esoteric teachings of alchemy, different from both the archaic cults of Hermes/Mercury, Jung's psychology, and primitive chemistry.

Typically one can divide Hermes into Hermes-Mercury (the Greek/Roman god) and Hermes Trismegistus, but it is not that simple as Faivre notes:

> At this epoch, we have not only a euhemeristic process, but also a reverse euhemerism: Hermes Trismegistus is both the precipitation of Mercury into human history and the sublimation of history to Olympus. These fluctuations, or rather this twofold motion, favors a fluid genealogy and the presence of several Hermeses.

Additionally there are not only overlaps between and combinations of the two figures, since Hermes is associated not just with the Egyptian god Thoth but also the Islamic Idris and even Jesus or the archangel Michael:

> It is no different in the Corpus Hermeticum, which presents Hermes sometimes as a god, sometimes as a sage, and at other times as a disciple of the Nous or Divine Intellect. According to the Arab tradition, his life is simultaneously physical and trans temporal, after the example of Elijah's, and even in his body he manifests a state of eternity. Pierre Lory recalls that Idris/Hermes is said to have written poems, particularly odes, in Arabic, Hebrew, and Syriac; thus he rises "above sectarian divisions, transcends religious mysteries and chronological time," and speaks "the languages of heaven, of earth, and of man in the integral state, namely Arabic."

One should note, though, that after the rise of Christianity, polemic literature has been written and directed towards the Greco-Roman pantheon. The supposedly malefic character of Hermes, such a libertine, liar and thief, has been emphasized by a number of prominent Christian thinkers, such as Sulpicus Severus and Lactantius.

During the Late Middle Ages and early Renaissance periods, Hermes became an important figure within written culture, such as the work of Giovanni Boccaccio, De genealogia Deorum Gentilium (1360-1374). In this regard Boccaccio linked Hermes/Mercury to the planet and its supposedly flexible nature. In the 17th and 18th century, Hermes/Mercury has been depicted numerous times in the visual arts across Europe, but has hold a less prominent role outside of those interested in the various local translations of the Corpus Hermeticum. Instead more interest was generally taken in Orpheus.

Interestingly, Hermes has also been linked to the Don Juan figure, especially the depiction of him chasing a nymph. This just further shows the versatility of Hermes, as well as the various re-interpretations of the Olympian.

Conclusion

Overall, Hermes is a fitting symbol for many of the good and constructive things that one holds dear and regard as important in current times. Those who control money, culture and can use athleticism, wit and cunning to get what they want are bond to be influential both in private and public.

It is also of some significance to repossess Hermes as a symbol after some have wanted to associate him with geeks and globalism, which shows how the de-construction of our past, if not complete separation from it, works within radical liberalism. It is true that some of the leading Romans considered him to be a symbol of the merchants, and not even particularly Roman (rather Celtic or Semitic), but commerce is indeed one part of the whole and there is no reason to give it up to the opposing team.

That is also the case with various occult and esoteric movements, even though it might be a palpable misrepresentation to view him as a dark god since he was Olympic and thus not even worthy of consideration for the sinister arts. With that said, not all branches of Western esotericism are dark and diabolical, and it is not even the Greco-Roman god that the esotericians are interested in, but rather a very specific facet of this dual figure. After all, Jesus has been represented as a symbol for everything from gay rights advocacy to extreme philanthropy and gnostic spirituality and there is not much to do about that.

Obviously a cult of the Greco-Roman god is not to be longed for. However, Hermes as a historical reference and symbol for many of the neomasculine ideas appear quite relevant. For those who seek deeper understanding, Faivre's book and Aesop's fables are good starting points.

Read More: On Becoming Immortal: The Life Of Heracles

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

6 Stages A Man Goes Through When His Testosterone Level Declines

July 25, 2017 | by Darrell Flores | Link | Original Link

It’s becoming a common occurrence for men to drastically lose testosterone as they age. The below stages show how that transition looks like.

Life slows down

> “I used to chase girls, but I guess I’m getting more mature.”
>
> “I have a decent routine at the gym, I just haven’t been going lately.”
>
> “I definitely have a ton of hobbies, but lately I get off work and just take it easy.”

That’s how it begins. Normally you wouldn’t think twice about a few weeks of low energy. It’s not like you’re spiraling into depression or you’ll have to move into your parent’s basement. But low testosterone creates a terrible feedback loop.

Dry spells creep up on you, gains fade, you spend more and more free time at home on the internet. As your lifestyle gets worse, your testosterone drops, which makes your lifestyle even worse, which means even less T, and so on until you’re a puddle of soy.

Meanwhile, testosterone levels have been falling since scientists began to measure them. When your father and grandfather were your age they had more T than you do today.

The funny thing is, not one really knows why it's happening. Is it the modern lifestyle? Something in the water? Whatever the cause, it gets especially serious past age 30.

You look for answers

> "I'll spend more time outside and take Vitamin D pills."
>
> "I'll read more masculine blogs or buy an ebook."

You can waste a lot of time and money in this stage. If you're lucky you might see results. You might have a vitamin deficiency that's easy to fix, and you might get smarter about caffeine, but in general, all you'll see are short placebo boosts.

Not all red pills are equal

> "I just found great testosterone booster made from crushed mushrooms and oyster shells. Game changer, bro."

Testosterone boosters sound like a solution, but they're the worst of all. They watered them down so that teenagers desperate to make the football team can take 20 doses a day with no side effects. You're better off with a cheap multivitamin.

You look for a shot in the arm

> "They're all taking something: every pro athlete, every movie star over 40. Most of the young ones too."
>
> "Go hard or go home!"

Steroids are seductive. A modest dose of testosterone means adding muscle even if you sit around doing nothing. Hard to believe, but you can avoid exercise for ten weeks and still gain more muscle than normal guys following a solid workout plan. If you combine testosterone with training, you can expect to gain a pound of muscle a week.

And it's not just muscle, you also gain focus, energy, libido, motivation, mood, bone health, and better sleep.

In certain crowds you almost feel Amish if you're not cycling. Guys seem to be having a great time doing it…

> Saturday afternoon fever @jogiorgiajo @ricky_martin #gvlifestyle #mordidita #rickymartin
>
> A post shared by Gianluca Vacchi (@gianlucavacchi) on Jul 23, 2016 at 7:04am PDT

But it's not always simple. Millionaires can afford specialized medical care and world class sources of whatever they take. As regular guy, you have to cross your fingers ordering from the internet, and trust yourself to research different esters, how to recognize gynecomastia, the differences between clen, tren, sust and anavol, how long you should cycle everything, how to inject, how to brew at home, how to send secure payments, how to interpret bloodwork, and so on. Basically you'll need a PhD in bro science.

That's bound to be intimidating. At this stage you'll probably look for testosterone gels online. No prescription, no needles, no hassle. Less powerful too. NKNW and Andro-forte encourage you to order a month's supply so that you can experience "just a taste" of high testosterone without committing yourself to weekly injections:

Haters do hate, especially testosterone gels

Because that’s the thing about a shot in the arm. It’s never just one shot (and it’s in your ass, not your arm). If you’re injecting testosterone, your body quickly shuts down its natural production and you’ll be dependent on injections for life. Gels and creams are less intense, but still.

You can win glory at this stage, or mess up and grow man boobs. High risk/reward.

You go hard-core warrior monk

> “The road to high testosterone is paved with cold showers, dead-lifts, steak and broccoli.”
>
> “I used to drink beer, watch porn, and procrastinate. Now I kick ass, take names, and meditate.”

At this stage you’re listening to classic advice. No more “get testosterone quick” schemes. You work hard, and hopefully your Spartan/Gorilla/Viking mindset takes you to the high testosterone promised land.

We had to choose between this photo and one with Steven Seagal

If you're reading RoK, none of this advice is new. You've already tried most of it. We've all done cold showers, right?

The question is, how many of us are still doing cold showers? How many of us are going strong with no-fap? A lot of us, sure. But if your testosterone is low, you probably never built enough momentum. You stopped before you saw results, and it's hard to blame you. With low T it's a struggle just to get out of bed.

It's a Catch-22. Better habits and lifestyle would raise your testosterone, and higher testosterone would improve your lifestyle and make the habits easier. But you can't even get started.

Meanwhile, your grandfather didn't have to design his entire life around maintaining high testosterone. He could enjoy a few beers. Chances are he wasn't a gym rat and his diet was nothing special.

Modern men are facing new challenges, and sometimes even the best advice isn't enough, even when it's low risk and the reward should be high.

You go mainstream

> "I finally talked to my doctor about low testosterone. . . "

Here's where everyone should start: blood work.

If you're feeling great, do blood work now to set a baseline. Your testosterone might be 1,000ng/dL, which is high but normal. If it drops to 500 in a few years, you'll be far below your ideal level. Not good. But according to your doctor's chart, 500 is well within the normal range. He'll tell you not to worry, because his chart compares you with the rest of the modern population, not with your normal range.

Blood work is the first step to take when you get serious

If you're not feeling great, a blood test can tell you why. Not every problem is testosterone related. And when it comes to taking action, before and after tests are the best way to measure progress. That's especially true if you want to run short cycles, jumping on and off gels or injections for a month.

You'll want a doctor to review your blood work. Doctors can be daft, and blood panels aren't rocket science, but you don't have time to research every little thing that might turn up.

If prescription testosterone is the best plan, hopefully your insurance is decent, because it can cost a fortune. Testosterone is a simple molecule, generally synthesized from Chinese beets, hardly a precious resource. But pharmaceutical companies get away with murder, and doctors offices charge a healthy fee for weekly injections.

Without insurance, you either pay hundreds a month or you hit the grey/black markets. They're thriving, and prices are often five times cheaper. But still, insurance is comforting.

Acceptance

Nobody wants hormone replacement therapy. In a perfect world, you would eat/sleep/train and feel like a million bucks. That's where you should start. But gels and injections save lives, and there shouldn't be any stigma.

Slim pickings when it comes to manly self-acceptance memes

Imagine a world where everyone started producing less dopamine receptors, generation after generation and as they got older. Before long people would experience the world as a dark, joyless place. It would be a crisis, and the second they created “dopamine replacement therapy” no one would hesitate to jump on.

ROK readers understand that a world without testosterone would be just as dark. Low T is a crisis. There are no easy answers, so get to work.

Read Next: What Lack Of Testosterone Does To The Male Brain, And How To Fix It

Darrell Flores

Darrell Flores is a former police officer from New Jersey. He enjoys travel, horses, poker, and time with his family. The world feels much brighter since he sorted out his testosterone.

Public Schools Are Brainwashing Factories For Children

July 25, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Dumbing Us Down by John Gatto is a book that gives you the red pill on modern education and how it is tragically failing those who have to endure it. Since I am a product of the public schools in a predominately Democratic state (Maryland), and received a steroidal dose of liberal brainwashing in university, it's a small miracle that I was able to fully digest the red pill since the whole point of those who educated me was to keep me ignorant.

> School is a twelve-year jail sentence where bad habits are the only curriculum truly learned. I teach school and win awards doing it. I should know.

This book is nothing new to those of you who are already aware of the problems in education, but there are a few key segments that I want to share as Gatto offers his perspective from working as a public school teacher.

> The [establishment] ensures a workforce that will not rebel — the greatest fear at the turn of the 20th century — that will be physically, intellectually, and emotionally dependent upon corporate institutions for their incomes, self-esteem, and stimulation, and that will learn to find social meaning in their lives solely in the production and consumption of material goods.

> […]
> The schools we've allowed to develop can't work to teach nonmaterial values, the values which give meaning to everyone's life, rich or poor, because the structure of schooling is held together by a Byzantine tapestry of reward and threat, of carrots and sticks. Official favor, grades, or other trinkets of subordination have no connection with education; they are the paraphernalia of servitude, not of freedom.

To keep people engaged in playing the rat race, you have to give them material rewards as young students, priming them for addiction so that as adults they will eagerly take on debt and other hardships to continue receiving more shiny rewards placed just beyond their reach. Public education teaches children to greatly covet the material through the focus on class status, prizes, and the benefits of having a "good job." When these children grow up to be adults, their self-esteem is wrapped around the gain of material items, making them obedient and compliant workers for the elite class who happens to control what goes in the school curriculum.

> I began to realize that the bells and the confinement, the crazy sequences, the age-segregation, the lack of privacy, the constant surveillance, and all the rest of the national curriculum of schooling were designed exactly as if someone had set out to prevent children from learning how to think and act, to coax them into addiction and dependent behavior.

He makes the analogy that public schools are essentially prisons, but now that schools are doing away with physical education, you actually get less exercise in schools than being locked up in jail.

> I've come to see that truth and schoolteaching are, at bottom, incompatible, just as Socrates said thousands of years ago.

How much can we blame those on the left, who put their fingers in their ears and scream and yell as you speak the truth, when they are logical products of the education they received? We have to accept that humans were never meant to be self-aware after decades of indoctrination, and that once a mind is lost, it is likely lost forever. Instead of sharing the truth to those who are no longer capable of receiving it, the better option is to neutralize them away from positions of power and influence so that the health of society is not negatively affected.

> Lives can be controlled by machine education, but they will always fight back with weapons of social pathology: drugs, violence, self-destruction, indifference, and the symptoms I see in the children I teach.

At School

Forcing students to sit through mind-numbing lessons for hours causes so much inner tension and conflict that the only way they can balance that is to act out in expressions of "freedom" that tend to be destructive and degenerate. This is also commonly seen in children with strict parents who try to control all aspects of their lives.

Adults are also not immune from the balance equation. If you forbid me from having sex, and I am unable to release that tension, I will find another outlet to release the aggression. For example, it's so common to see fist fights among men at the end of a weekend night in the city because they are frustrated that they could not act on their sex urge. Other outlets for repressed sexual energy include accumulating excess material wealth, using drugs, and joining the cult of social justice.

> Networks do great harm by appearing enough like real communities to create expectations that they can manage human social and psychological needs. The reality is that they cannot. Even associations as inherently harmless as bridge clubs, chess clubs, amateur acting groups, or groups of social activists will, if they maintain a pretense of whole friendship, ultimately produce that odd sensation familiar to all city dwellers of being lonely in the middle of a crowd.

The problem with communities is that they only cherish one specific part of us, while ignoring the rest of the whole. In your work network, what will happen if you talk about your thoughts on women? You'll be fired. In your gym network, what will happen if you talk about the latest philosophy books you've read? You'll be looked upon as too brainy. Loose communities are a poor simulation of friendship, which is more suitable to share the totality of your experience and being.

> As we approach the twenty-first century it is correct to say that the United States has become a nation of institutions, whereas it used to be a nation of communities. Large cities have great difficulty supporting healthy community life, partly because of the coming and going of strangers, partly because of space constrictions, partly because of poisoned environments, but mostly because of the constant competition of institutions and networks for the custody of children and old people, for monopolizing the time of everyone else in between. By isolating young and old from the working life of places and by isolating the working population from the lives of young and old, institutions and networks have brought about a fundamental disconnection of the generations.

We're segmented, we don't talk to each other, we don't understand each other. You probably look at someone just five years older or younger than you as belonging to a wholly different generation. Thanks to the internet, we've become so used to interacting only with people who have the exact same niche interests as we do that we are losing the ability to talk to those who differ only slightly from us. This artificial tribalism is further amplified in urban environments if people who live in your neighborhood studied at the same liberal schools, consume the same mainstream media, eat the same trendy foods, and work similar types of politically correct jobs.

> …every institution's unstated first goal is to survive and grow, not to undertake the mission it has nominally staked out for itself. Thus the first goal of a government postal service is not to deliver the mail; it is to provide protection for its employees and perhaps a modest status ladder for the more ambitious ones.

This applies to every organization. Whatever their stated goal of helping citizens or providing a service, it is always subservient to the interests of individuals who are a part of the organization. When it comes to organizations related to intelligence or defense of the state, you will find that they may actually work in opposition to the country they're supposedly in service to.

> One of the surest ways to recognize real education is by the fact that it doesn't cost very much, doesn't depend on expensive toys or gadgets. The experiences that produce it and the self-awareness that propels it are nearly free. It is hard to turn a dollar on education. But schooling is a wonderful hustle, getting sharper all the time.

How much did it cost you to educate yourself on game, fitness, and politics? You bought a few books, read reams of text on free web pages, and watched some Youtube videos. Compare that to what you paid for during your university education, and what your parents paid in taxes for your public education. These expenses amounted to a colossal waste that can no longer be justified in the internet age where education now merely requires motivation instead of money.

> …some disturbing evidence exists that the income of working couples in 1990 has only slightly more purchasing power than the income of the average working man did in 1910. In effect, two laborers are now being purchased for the price of one — an outcome Adam Smith or David Ricardo might have predicted. And an unseen social cost of all of this has been the destruction of family life, the loss of home as sanctuary or haven, and the bewilderment of children who, since infancy, have been raised by strangers.

By pushing wives into work, feminism is a war against the middle class for no gain in household wealth while children can be “educated” in Marxist and far-left thought. The elite pocket all the monetary gains from having an increase supply of cheaper labor at the same time they successfully put a wedge between men and women, who are now forced to compete against each other for resources instead of bonding together to create a strong institution of family that can resist negative governmental influence. All the while, children suffer because they are educated to be weak, ignorant, and dependent on the system for the entirety of their lives.

> …people are less than whole unless they gather themselves voluntarily into groups of souls in harmony. Gathering themselves to pursue individual, family, and community dreams consistent with their private humanity is what makes them whole; only slaves are gathered by others.

And that’s why the community we have here, especially at Roosh V Forum, is so powerful, because it was self-organized based not only on mutual interests, but also the values of how a society should be, and through that community we educate each other in a more profound way than what we experienced in the schooling system.

If I ever have a son, I will either home school him or find a specific school that is not intent on brainwashing him to be another beta male slave in the machine. Because leftists have unsustainable birth rates, the only way they are able to further their movement is to capture the children of those on the right. It makes no sense for me to feed my children through their machine, for them to score another convert to their sick cult.

While Gatto’s book focuses more on education, it’s essentially an introduction to the red pill by showing us how we can relay the truth to the next generation so they are more sane and fulfilled. I strongly recommend it, especially to those who plan on having children or who already have them.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: “Dumbing Us Down” on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Insider Tips For Hard Gainers Struggling To Build Muscle

July 25, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following sponsored article is from Jon Anthony's Body of an Alpha.

When I was around the age of 14, I weighed a whopping 115 pounds—with my shoes on. For a while I was okay with it. I was okay with playing video games and eating hot pockets all day, coasting through school… but eventually, when puberty kicked in, and those hormones started rushing through my bloodstream, something started to change.

I don't know if it was the countless women that seemed to flock towards men with muscles, or if it was the allure of having more social status, but something deep inside of me pushed me to start working out. I bought a gym membership at my local Gold's, bought all the supplements the buff salesman recommended to me, and started hitting the gym immediately. It was only a matter of time until I got jacked, right?

Wrong. After 6 months, hundreds of dollars wasted, and countless hours spent in the gym, I was exactly the same weight. "What the hell?" I thought. I did everything the conventional health experts recommended! I ate the healthy foods, I took the supplements, I worked out exactly like they said to. Why couldn't I put on any weight?

It wasn't until YEARS later that I discovered where I went wrong. See, most gym advice out there is geared towards two types of people: fatties trying to lose weight, and average people trying to bulk up. Well, I hate to break it to you, but if you're a hard gainer, that advice isn't going to work for you. If you're a skinny guy who's struggling to put on weight, you need to ignore 90% of what the "health experts," are telling you.

How I Gained 30 Pounds of Muscle in Just 3 Months

I remember when I bought my first bodybuilding program. Every single word of advice in that $97 eBook was marketing gold. The sales page was designed to convert cold traffic at a 20% ratio, the customer support was professional, and the cover was absolutely KILLER. Everything looked great, but there was one problem.

It was complete and utter bullshit. The guy who wrote that eBook wasn't even jacked. He was a brilliant marketer, yes, but he wasn't jacked.

He never showed his face, and just paid male fitness models to pose for his eBook cover. I didn't realize it at the time, but in retrospect it should have been obvious. This is what 90% of the fitness industry is comprised of: marketing geniuses who slap together a few Bodybuilding.com articles into a passable guide, and then outsource everything from designing the cover, to coding the sales page, to creating the video.

And while the advice in these mass-produced, generic eBooks may work for the average Joe, they won't work for hard gainers, because they're not written for hard gainers. I'll never forget what my previous mentor said to me, years ago. He told me that you should find someone who's where you want to be, and fucking listen to them.

It seems so obvious, but very few people do it. If you want to build muscle as a skinny guy, you have to listen to someone who's been there and come out on the other side. You have to take advice from someone who's gone from weighing a measly 115 pounds to a jacked 185 at 6% bodyfat. You have to find someone who's gone the journey that you're trying to travel, and who can show you the way. That's what I plan to do.

Using the following tips, in addition to the gold mine of information I reveal in Body of an Alpha, I was able to put on an ungodly amount of muscle in record time.

1. Ignore Conventional “Dieting” Advice

Go to your doctor some time and ask him what foods you should eat to be healthy. I’d bet money that he’ll recommend you eat a diet comprised mainly of vegetables, fruits, and lean meats. And while these are great to eat, there’s something that he’s leaving out; something critical.

If you want to bulk up as a hard gainer, you need to eat buckets of carbohydrates. You need to eat at LEAST 300 grams of carbohydrates every single day—when I was preparing for the before and after picture above, I ate 450 grams of carbohydrates per day, in conjunction with the routine I discuss in my eBook.

Carbohydrates are demonized by the mainstream health industry, because most people aren’t hard gainers. If you’re trying to lose weight, cutting out the carbs and following a paleo diet is great, but if you’re a skinny guy trying to build muscle, you NEED those carbs.

Carbohydrates spike a hormone known as insulin, which is a “storage hormone.” In other words, when you eat starches like sweet potatoes, brown rice, and oatmeal, it releases a cascade of chemicals in your body, signalling for it to put on weight. This is obviously bad if you’re fat, but if you’re scrawny? It’s a dream come true.

I recommend you do what’s known as carb-loading. I discuss this in depth in Body of an Alpha, but the idea is that you strategically time your carbohydrate rich meals in order to maximize muscle gain and minimize fat gain. As a hard gainer, you should aim to have 100-150 carbohydrates before your workout, and 100-200 right after.

Aim to consume slow digesting, complex carbohydrates, such as the following:

- Sweet Potatoes
- Oatmeal
- Whole Wheat Pasta/Bread

- Quinoa
- Brown Rice

Some have speculated that you should avoid grains, but the data isn't out on that one yet. You'll have to see for yourself how you feel after consuming gluten. Personally, I recommend you bulk cook a week's worth of quinoa and store it in a container for later. Quinoa is the only non-meat based food that is a complete protein, plus it's got tons of fiber, vitamins, and complex, slow-digesting carbohydrates to help you build muscle ASAP.

2. 90% of Routines Won't Work For You

I remember my first personalized workout routine. After paying $100's in fees for a personal trainer, he told me that he'd designed a custom-tailored, perfect fit routine just for me. It must've worked great, right?

Wrong. Most personal trainers, "gurus," and fitness "experts," don't know shit about how to build muscle when you're a skinny guy. Asking that dude who's been jacked since age 14 how to build muscle is like asking a trust fund baby how to make money. If you want to know how to get jacked as a hard gainer, you need to ask a hard gainer who's done it himself.

Most people make one of two mistakes—they either do the typical starting strength type routine, or they follow some ridiculous split. While these have their merits, and you'll certainly gain some muscle as a hard gainer from these routines, they aren't optimal.

It took me YEARS to figure this out, but hard gainers respond best to a combination of strength and hypertrophy training. If they focus too much on hypertrophy, they plateau very easily and never gain muscle. If they focus too much on strength training, however, they don’t get any bigger after a certain point (just stronger).

P.H.A.T., which stands for Power Hypertrophy Adaptive Training, is the no-holds-barred, brutal and effective system for hard gainers trying to build muscle, PERIOD. It’s based around two forms of training: power and hypertrophy.

I give a specific workout routine to follow in my eBook, along with an exercise demonstration guide to follow, but this is the model which you want to build your workout around:

- Day 1: Upper Body Power
- Day 2: Lower Body Power
- Day 3: Rest
- Day 4: Back/Shoulders Hypertrophy
- Day 5: Legs Hypertrophy
- Day 6: Chest/Arms Hypertrophy
- Day 7: Rest

All in all, it comes out to roughly 5 days a week—the power days lasting around 2 hours, and the hypertrophy days being just over 60 minutes. While this may sound like a lot, it’s actually not considering how fast you’ll make progress. Aim to have as many compound lifts as possible, especially for your power days. The bulk of your hypertrophy workouts should be compound lifts, but don’t forget to throw in some auxiliary lifts, as well.

3. Smoothies Are Your Best Friend

The single greatest discovery I made as a hard gainer was using protein shakes to add an extra 1,000-2,000 calories into my daily diet, because it’s a pain in the ass to eat 1,000 calories worth of brown rice, lean steak, grilled vegetables, and sweet potatoes.

It takes 15 minutes to cook the rice, another 10 for the steak, 10 for the veggies, and 10 to microwave the sweet potatoes, then another 20 minutes to eat, and 10 minutes to clean up. Having to make 3-4 meals like this every single day is WAY too much time.

With shakes, though? You can make a delicious 1,000 calorie protein shake jam-packed with protein, healthy fats, and complex carbs, in just a matter of 2 minutes. In fact, when I first started to understand the power of personalized protein shakes, my gains exploded through the roof.

When I was preparing for my "Before and After" photoshoot, which you saw above, I had AT LEAST two protein shakes from my "Alpha Shakes," eBook every single day. Here's two of my favorite recipes for hard gainers:

Monster Mass Shake (1740 Calories)

- 1 1/2 cups of whole milk
- 4 scoops of chocolate mutant mass
- 1 banana
- 1/2 cup dry oats
- 2 tbsp almond butter

When you throw all of these ingredients in a blender and mix them together, an aroma not unlike a chocolate milkshake will tantalize your taste buds. This smooth, frothy, and creamy shake has a whopping 78 grams of protein, 49 grams of healthy fats, and 255 grams of carbohydrates. Even the most stubborn of hard gainers will put on weight if he has one of these suckers a day.

Chocolate Honey Hulk (765 Calories)

- 1 cup almond milk
- 2 scoops chocolate whey protein
- 1 tbsp raw honey
- 1 banana
- 2 tbsp peanut butter (almond butter if you're allergic)
- 2 tbsp cacao powder

What can I say? I absolutely love chocolate shakes—and it shouldn't be hard to see why. This one has a modest 765 calories, with a high protein to carb ratio. It's great first thing in the morning or right before bed, to prime your body with muscle-building nutrients meant to take your gains to the next level.

If you want to get extra serious with the shakes, you can add supplements such as creatine to them, but I'll save that for the next tip…

4. Use The RIGHT Supplements

Upon buying a membership to your local gym, you will be bombarded with offers from sleazy salesmen promising you unrealistic gains from ridiculously overpriced supplements. Let me tell you now: you do not need 90% of the supplements that they will recommend to you.

Will they help? Yeah, sure—some of them might. But is an extra 5% increase in your muscle gain worth $149 a month? Of course not. As a hard gainer, focus on sticking with the basics: creatine, a mass gainer, and a pre-workout. Then, if you'd like, you can add some testosterone-boosting supplements on top of this (which I discuss in Body of an Alpha), but only after you have the basics covered.

Creatine is dirt cheap. You can get a year's supply for like $30, but the impact that it has on your strength is absolutely incredible. By enhancing ATP, your body's energy synthesis mechanism, it will give you explosive power, the likes of which you've never seen before—and best of all, it will make your muscles look fuller, rounder, and pumped up.

Most guys would recommend you buy whey protein isolate, or even concentrate, but if you're a skinny guy I recommend you buy a mass gainer. These are protein shakes designed SPECIFICALLY with skinny guys in mind, who need some serious nutrients to pack on slabs of muscle. I recommend Rich Piana's Mutant Mass for all hard gainers, due to its high caloric content, phenomenal ratio of macro-nutrients, and high quality ingredients.

Lastly, is the pre-workout. While many would claim that they're all hype, I would disagree—good pre-workouts are loaded with nutrients meant to boost blood flow, jack testosterone, and give you incredible laser focus for the most intense workout session you could possibly imagine. My personal favorites are discussed in the Body of an Alpha package, but a great all around pre-workout is GAT's Nitraflex.

If you'd like to take it to the next level, you can check out Primeval Labs and follow the supplement regimen that I discuss in "Alpha Supplements," but as a warning, they are NOT for the light-hearted. If you're under 18, just follow the advice that I laid out—eat a ton of carbs, blend strength and hypertrophy training, down those shakes, and get the key supplements. You'll be absolutely shredded in no time at all.

Want More? Check Out Jon's eBook!

If you want to put on POUNDS of solid muscle faster than you ever thought possible, then consider checking out my flagship eBook. For a limited time only, I'm giving Return of Kings readers 50% off, plus two FREE eBook bonuses that are not available ANYWHERE ELSE!

In addition to this, you'll also get "Priority Coaching," where if at any time, you have ANY questions about how to get jacked, you can send me an email to my PERSONAL email address, and I'll get back to you with your answers in just 48 hours—that's a promise.

In Body of an Alpha, I cover damn near EVERYTHING that you need to know about packing on slabs of muscle, from what workout routine to follow, to what supplements to use, to recovery tactics, dieting advice, and more. This "Bodybuilding Bible" has a whopping 26 chapters and over 150 pages PACKED with insider secrets and tips from YEARS of experience in the fitness industry!

Here's some of the benefits that you'll get when you decide to purchase my DEFINITIVE guide to bodybuilding in the next 48 hours:

- Put on POUNDS of muscle, that will have your friends and family SHOCKED at your rapid transformation!
- Build a body that COMMANDS respect—no more looking like a pathetic little beta male!

- Get INSTANT attraction from women, with your new broad shoulders and MASSIVE arms!
- Experience the RUSH of having primal strength, and more power than you ever imagined!
- Develop MASSIVE confidence, discipline, and motivation from Jon's GRUELING routine!
- Discover the "Body of an Alpha" workout routine, that will make your body grow before your very eyes!
- BONUS #1 – Get Jon's "Alpha Supplements," guide to no-bullshit LEGAL steroids, that the FDA is currently trying to BAN! Where to get them, how to use them, and more!
- BONUS #2 – A reader requested FAQ, including where to buy stylish clothes to fit your newfound physique, how to balance lifting with your lifestyle, and SO MUCH MORE!
- BONUS #3 – Priority Coaching! If you ever have any uncertainties or questions about the Body of an Alpha routine, diet, and lifestyle, just shoot me an email and I will PERSONALLY respond to you within 48 hours!

The sale ends in 2 days, so when you ACT NOW, you'll receive 150+ pages of all-killer no-filler advice, LOADED with knowledge from nearly a decade of experience and over $10,000 spent and WASTED on bullshit.

I want to be clear, though—this won't be easy. This isn't some late night infomercial promising you that you can look like Arnold Schwarzenegger in "5 minutes a day," or some other nonsense like that. Getting the physique of a Greek god will take a LOT of hard work, discipline, and focus…but if you're willing to put in the work, the reward is yours.

So if you want to take it to the next level, and get that aesthetic, ripped physique that'll get you laid in record time, act right now and take advantage of my 50% off discount while it still lasts! Do NOT let this opportunity pass you by, my kratom-loving brethren! This sale will expire within the next 48 hours, and will NEVER be available again! Click here to learn more.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

How To Respond To Threats Of Political Violence

July 25, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

It's an unfortunate fact that political disagreements can turn to violence. The left has an extensive history of this from guillotines to gulags, with terrorism and urban riots often in fashion. When the right gets fed up with being attacked repeatedly, responses typically include boot parties, death squads, and one-way helicopter rides.

Some disturbing trends are emerging lately. The "basket of deplorables" speech was laughable, but highlights a malevolent mentality; apparently Cupcake thinks people like us shouldn't exist. Operatives used "bird dogging" tactics to try to influence the last election. Further, the leftists started turning up the heat with degrees of rioting unknown since the 1960s. Radicals often riot, make threats, and use other dirty tactics to censor voices they don't like. The left's narratives are slipping, and now they're acting out of desperation.

I'd prefer to avoid future violence, if at all possible. It's best if everything is settled in the marketplace of ideas. A mere difference of opinion shouldn't warrant rough stuff. Besides, large amounts of aviation fuel can be dreadfully expensive.

Persons of interest

Triggered, but unlikely to do anything crazy

I don't count all leftists as enemies. The majority are just moderate liberals. Those ones tend to be kind and gentle; actually too nice for their own good. They've been conditioned from a young age by TV, the schools, and pop culture to believe an ideology based on flawed premises, reinforced with guilt complexes.

When liberals regurgitate silly talking points, try not to be angry; they're doing as conditioned after years of mental abuse. It's by no means easy, but with enough patience and exposure to real facts, they can be deprogrammed. Until then, let's remember that there's a difference between being wrong and being evil.

Those of greatest concern are the radical leftists. The indoctrination went deeper for them. They don't merely support bad policies from ignorance; they wish to wreck their own society. Some are rebels without a clue; others are truly twisted. Although I hesitate to write people off as irredeemable, the fact is that it would take a major epiphany for them to get their heads screwed back on straight. Unlike moderate liberals, they're not out for "progress"; they only want to steal from the productive and cause destruction. If trouble happens, it will come from them.

Today's weaksauce Red Guards

Communists ain't what they used to be.

Leftists don't make fighters like they used to. In the past, they were a force to contend with and highly determined. A platoon of snowflakes cowering in a "safe space" wouldn't measure up to a single Viet Cong guerrilla. The fighting skills of today's leftist radicals are pretty lackluster. They specialize in sucker punches and cheap shots. They don't like to attack unless they significantly outnumber their opponents, and even then they often lose.

For some examples, a dreadlocked Antifag activist set out to take "100 Nazi scalps" in Berkeley. As soon as she choked someone, she found she'd greatly overestimated her combat readiness. James Hodgkinson went postal on Republicans playing baseball, but picked a second-rate rifle and had poor Marxmanship. This Bernie Sanders fanatic merely wounded four people before getting poetic justice from the police. Diane Oughton of the Weathermen blew herself up trying to make a bomb. I have a pretty good idea what she did wrong, but out of general principles, I won't discuss IED safety tips.

Efforts to build strength

Since leftist radicals with any sense are painfully aware that their comrades can't punch their way out of a wet paper bag, they've been trying to build alliances with violent groups. One of my liberal friends researched the agitation groups that raised hell and burnt cities in 2016. (To her credit, she disapproves of that sort of thing.) She told me that they're half Social Justice Warriors and half gang members. In turn, I clued her in about the funding from globalists. As for the Antifags, they're being recruited from the homeless and seem to operate like a cult.

Then there is the curious effort by leftists to ally themselves with radical Islamists. It's been argued that Islam is progressive too, as it was an improvement over the way things were done before in 7th century Arabia. All I have to say is that it's not the Dark Ages any more. Muslim theocracy has nothing to do with leftist politics; obviously this is an alliance of convenience. Those people want friends on their side well known for shootings, bombings, rioting, and driving trucks into crowds. Bless their hearts.

This is why globalists are so enthusiastic about importing them by the millions, with no end in sight. However, if they think that their virtue signaling will inspire Muslims to take orders from them, they're in for a rude awakening. They might also be shocked to discover that transgender potty rights aren't in the Quran.

The case for restraint

Effects of the castor oil cure

If someone breaks the peace, let it not be by the right. In any confrontation, don't count on the legal system to be impartial. Further, trial by media in the court of public opinion definitely won't be impartial.

Although violent leftists even can attain folk hero status, anything done by the right always is spun the worst possible way. Not only does it give the left a propaganda victory, but it also can be a convenient excuse for punitive actions and more repression. For example, the Unabomber hasn't tarnished environmentalism. However, Timothy McVeigh was used to discredit the militia movement, even though he wasn't part of it.

Further, we should try to refrain from overconfidence ourselves. Recall the words from Gone With the Wind, echoing popular sentiments at the time:

> Why, we could lick them in a month! Gentlemen always fight better than rabble. A month— why, one battle—

The political climate might well become more tumultuous, but it's too early to tell what the outcome will be. It depends on factors not (yet) in our control. If fighting occurs, we shouldn't be the ones who start it, but we certainly should be the ones to finish it.

Proportionate response

WEDGIE TIME! Who’s the big, tough Red Guard now?

I’m all for taking the high ground. Still, this doesn’t mean we have to fight (either rhetorically, or physically if it comes to that) with both hands tied behind our backs. Leftist radicals need to understand the reciprocity principle:

- If they want reasoned debate, we all can have a polite discussion.
- If they scream at their opponents, they’ll get an earful back.
- If they attack, we will defend ourselves.
- If they try to start a revolution, they’ll either go to prison or go to hell.

Reactions should be proportionate, as this is generally required by the law. This isn’t the place for a long legal discussion, and I don’t have the technical qualifications. A basic example is that if a guy shoves someone, that doesn’t make it okay to stab him.

There’s an old Italian custom called the “castor oil cure for Communism”. A Yugoslavian saboteur was caught in Fiume (if I recall the details correctly). He was an old guy, so rather than giving him the traditional penalty, they showed mercy and made him drink castor oil instead. This became a tradition involving a Blackshirt, a liter bottle of castor oil, and a Communist soon to get a case of the screaming Trotskies.

Consider this not as a specific recommendation, but as food for thought. The castor oil cure for Communism took on a figurative sense too: basically showing them who’s boss as gently as possible. This is what I mean. Remember that these radicals are spoiled children and should be treated with an appropriate level of discipline.

Prevention

Si vis pacem, para bellum.

Let us remember the Roman proverb, “If you want peace, prepare for war.” The goal is not aggression, but deterrence. Your enemies won’t attack if they fear you.

Preparedness is essential. If you’re not muscular yet, it’s time to get in shape. I found that my physical confidence went way up, and it deters others from starting trouble. Learn some fighting skills. Buy guns and practice target shooting. Hopefully you won’t need any of this, but if you do, you’ll be glad you made the effort.

Read More: The Culture War Is Being Transformed Into A Hot War

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

The Amish Show Us What The West Could've Been

July 26, 2017 | by Amator Crucis | Link | Original Link

Three months ago, as I was walking by soccer fields in my local sports complex, I saw something that amazed me: two fields were being used by high-school aged Amish and Dutch Mennonite communities that were on a rare trip to the outside world.

Admirably, the young women played on one field while the young men played on the other. Here, there was no sign of an egalitarian, co-ed, genderless safe space. Gender differences were acknowledged and respected.

Even in the scorching summer heat, the girls wore modest squirts, that extended beyond their knees (in the same vein, the young men wore properly-fitting pants and shirts). The young girls also were healthy and fit. They had no tattoos, no piercings, no dyed, half shaven hair. There were no outward signs of brokenness. They were playing with a cordial innocence, the kind you'd expect from teenaged girls who haven't been tarnished and soiled by consumerism, social media, and postmodern filth. They were beautiful, happy, and innocent.

On the adjacent field, the young men were playing an old-fashioned, no-nonsense game of footy. No whining and certainly no bitching. Every player was getting on with their task with gravitas and determination. The young men were playing with an incredible intensity. They were determined to score, and to win. All forms of masculine virtues were on display.

These scenes were bittersweet

As a first-generation immigrant to the West, I had never witnessed anything like this. Sure, I've watched many soccer games. I've seen genders segregated. I've encountered groups of young men and women, who had not been physically marked by the degenerate 'edgy' fads of SJW culture. I've even seen modestly dressed women playing sports. But this was the first time I've seen all of the above displayed by Canadians of European ancestry.

These scenes were bittersweet. Bitter, because it made me lament and yearn for a day and age when I too can take part in a society with such rich tradition and values. A society where men are not scorned or demeaned, but respected and esteemed. A society where women are not placed on an altar demanding to be worshiped. Here, there was an unerring feeling that these young women admired and even adored these young men.

In a few years short years, these young men will marry these virgin, pure, and chaste young women. Left to the pastoral, traditional setting, where no liberal welfare state exists to pacify the masculine instincts, these men will protect these young women, provide for them, and in return, the women will cherish them and love them for it. The lack of a welfare state also means that these women will seek masculine virtues in their men. In the absence of a 'generous' and 'stable' state, they will seek a generous and stable husband.

A violent diatribe against the modern West

It was sweet, because this was an enormous vindication. These scenes were a visually violent diatribe against the degenerate, failing, and weak West. Here was a social group that was purposely stuck in time.

After all, for many complex reasons, the Amish and Mennonite communities chose to be insular and rarely change their mode of traditional, pastoral living. Yet while they remain technologically “limited”, their social and group dynamics are superior to those of our modern Western Civilization.

Drawing this into stark perspective, was the third field, that was occupied by a co-ed (i.e. non-segregated) Canadian group of young men and women playing soccer. The women were fat, obnoxious, and foul mouthed. They sported aggressive, masculine tattoos. Meanwhile, the men were weak and effeminate house-pets, almost subjugated and controlled by these vile women. The women were barking orders, and the men would do as they were told, without batting an eye-lash. Such are the rotten fruits that feminism has produced.

The Amish however, rejected influences of the enlightenment, and by extension, all the false doctrines that came after it – Marxism, feminism, postmodernism. And because of that, they can bear the fruits of a superior existence. They are not afflicted by counter-intuitive ideologies that seek to disrupt the natural order of humanity, and create a deep-seated resentment, and fatal division. Instead, they are guided by Christian beliefs that not only bestow on them an abundance of virtue, but also social and group unity and cohesion. Men, women and children know their place in society.

The Amish, an image of the West’s former self

While we can always compare the modern West to pictures and movies of the its past self, why create hypotheticals and possible ‘straw-societies’? We can avoid speculation and introduce certainty into our analysis by drawing comparisons with communities like the Amish and Mennonites that are quite literally stuck in time.

It is true that pastoral Germanic and Dutch traditions of the Amish are not wholly representative of an ever-cosmopolitanizing impulse throughout Europe at the time. However, rural farming communities were still a dominant part of the landscape. These societies strongly resemble the post-reformation, pre-enlightenment state of Western Civilization. They are an incredible snapshot into this bygone era. By extension then, the Amish and Mennonites are an image of the West’s former self.

For these reasons, the Amish and Mennonite societies can be the control group when observing the Western experiment. The modern West, the test-tube that has been relentlessly inculcated with feminism, Marxism and postmodernism, is a decrepit and dying society, that just cannot wait to be conquered and subdued by virile foreign hordes. The control test-tube that has avoided these ideologies, the Amish and Mennonite society, has remained strong, self-sufficient and continues to yield an abundance of life-energy. Its people are self-assured and more alive. They are more human.

The Amish are culturally superior

How do we know the west has socially degenerated beyond recognition? Because it is far inferior to the cultural image of its former self. The Amish are far superior. They're youth are alive and happy. Our youth are confused, sad and anxious. Their young men are brooding with confidence, testosterone, and masculinity. Ours are doubtful and weak. Their young women are feminine and willing to be led. Ours are aggressive and lack virtue. They're posterity will inherit great riches, born about by tradition, patriarchy and God-fearing. Ours will inherit doubt and depravity.

Far after the degenerating West collapses into a matriarchal, egalitarian third-world basket-case, barbarian hordes will marvel at Amish and Mennonite communities as outposts of a once-great civilization.

Read more: The Purity Of Non-Western Thinking

Amator Crucis
Amator Crucis is a strong defender of Christendom, of freedom and of truth. A leader of men. A protector of the weak. He never recoils before the enemy. He makes war against evil without cessation and without mercy. Write to him at Enlarge his war-chest by becoming his benefactor here.

A Killer Instinct Will Get You More Girls Than Looks Or Money

July 26, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

There are plenty of game naysayers who are happy to tell you that ‘game’ is useless. You don’t need it. All that early-200os negging and feather boa-wearing—-a load of nonsense. What you need is to be good looking and rich and you will be surrounded by a posse of scantily clad, nubile ladies keen to sleep with you in no time.

This is stupid and guys who tell you this are not getting laid. What really gets you girls is a killer instinct. If you don’t have that then however physically attractive you are you will get passed over for men who do.

I can think of two times when I got passed over for guys who were less good-looking than me. Maybe it happened a great many more times, but there are two in particular I remember.

Yes Girl

First, with a girl called Sophie who I was at high school with. Sophie was in the orchestra. She played cello. Looking back she was a typical ‘Troy’ girl: slim, brunette, long straight hair, pretty and artistic. If only I’d known then this would be the type of girl I’d be chasing around the world for the next two decades.

Anyway, Sophie liked me. She was a ‘yes girl’: that is, I didn’t have to do anything and she just liked me anyway. She used to look at me with ‘doggy dinner bowl’ eyes for too long when I was speaking, sit next to me in class and hang on every word I said.

We were in a show together. Well, she was in the orchestra and I was helping out backstage. Even though I was inexperienced with girls, I knew she was into me. It was that obvious. Something would happen—it felt inevitable. I would hang back, I decided. Play it cool. This was in the bag so no point in rushing, right?

The last night of a show there was a party for everyone involved, performers and stagehands. Tonight would be the night. I turned up for that dance in my best shirt, a white Oxford with a flower print on it my stepmother had bought me from a catalogue.

During the evening I hung back. I didn’t dance with the other kids as I was embarrassed to at that point. This would work in my favour I thought. Not for me the shallow pleasures of the masses. No. I was special and different. The mysterious guy who didn’t dance.

Towards the end of the evening I looked out over the party and saw that Sophie was slow-dancing—no, grinding—up against Todd, this waster in our year. Todd wore an ill-fitting fake leather jacket. He had greasy hair. He was kind of ugly.

I went to the bathroom and looked at myself in the mirror. Surely I wasn’t uglier than Todd? No, Todd was definitely uglier.

I was mystified.

Kissing

There was this other girl called Amelia. This was in college. A friend of mine had liked Amelia but, on a night out at a local club, she's shown a strong preference for me and we'd ended up kissing.

As with Sophie, this looked to be in the bag. But again, having not learned my lesson, I chose to take things slowly. Amelia and I would hang out, go to clubs in London together. One time, when my parents were away, I got her to stay at my place for the night after we'd been out.

I was still a virgin: it was the first time I'd had a girl in bed with me. We kissed a bit, I was too scared to try to get her undressed. Then we fell asleep. Nothing happened.

It doesn't matter, I thought to myself. I can wait. We're getting closer to it. Soon we will have sex. Soon.

A week later I was shocked to find out Amelia was dating a guy called Rick. He was another greaser in a fake leather jacket. And we're not talking George Clooney here, either. Rick was funny-looking, with tight curly hair and an ungainly, awkward manner.

Again, I looked in the mirror in despair. It had been going so well—how could I have messed things up so badly? Surely I was better looking than Rick?

What I failed to realise in both of these cases is that it was not physical attractiveness that was the deciding factor. Nor, by the way, was it money, since both Todd and Rick came from disadvantaged backgrounds. No, what made the difference was that both of these guys had a killer instinct that I lacked.

You see, it is the man's responsibility—within the boundaries of consent, of course—to push the interaction in the direction of sex, not the girl's. Yes, girls do occasionally initiate sex, but it’s rare. They expect you, the man, to lead.

I used to think that it was enough that a girl was interested in me and that I wouldn’t have to do anything else – sex would ‘just happen’. I was wrong. A girl indicating her interest may be a great start, but it’s only that: a start.

This is where game comes in because game is not a set of lines or routines: rather, it is understanding sexual dynamics and how to act accordingly, even if that requires behaviour that is not natural to you.

Had I known that it was necessary to have killer instinct and push things forward then it is likely I would have slept with both Sophie and Amelia. As it is I was forced to watch from the sidelines as other men did what I should have done myself.

There are a number of lessons in these two anecdotes, but perhaps foremost is that if you find a girl attractive you can bet your life that other guys do too. And if you see an opportunity you need to display your killer instinct and go for it.

The bottom line is that girls want to get laid too, but they respond best to men who are upfront, unapologetic and go for what they want. It’s sexier for her. Even if you’re better looking, even if she is a ‘yes’ girl, if you do nothing then she will eventually lose attraction and go for the next ruthless cad that comes along and pushes the envelope.

For a compilation of all Troy’s best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: Women Don’t Want Relationships With Men Who Want Relationships

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Why Civic Nationalism Will Fail

July 26, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The alt lite and the alt right agree on several things, namely the need to respect national sovereignty, strong borders, and opposing globalism. But the biggest difference between the two camps is that the alt lite believes that it is still possible to hold the United States together using civic nationalism. But here's why civic nationalism is doomed to failure.

What is civic nationalism?

Civic nationalism is the idea that diverse groups of people can get together and build a nation without their ethnic loyalties taking a priority over that of the nation. The US in the 20th Century was a good example of a working civic nationalism. Groups of mostly western Europeans laid aside their old loyalties and committed themselves fully to the American project. Immigrants often did not bother to teach their children their native languages because they wanted their children to become Americans, not Germans, Italians, and Frenchmen who happen to live in the US.

The opposite of civic nationalism would be ethnic nationalism. In ethnic nationalism, people support the nation because it mostly consists of others who are more or less related—they look similar, they speak the same language, they have the same religion, and they have a shared culture. Some examples of ethno-nationalist states are South Korea, Japan, Israel, and Poland. It doesn't mean that they have no foreigners living within their nation; it just means that the overwhelming majority of people are from the same ethnic group.

It is important to note that in an ethno-nationalist state, foreigners may be respected and treated well, but they may feel that they can ever become fully Korean or fully Polish. It may take a couple of generations before their descendants finally become part of the ethnos.

Forging a new people

Unity based on a soft drink

Civic nationalism only works if a new people is created. This happened in the US in the 20th century. American culture replaced the immigrants' old culture. There was even a sort of national religion which political philosopher Samuel Huntington defined as a Christianity without Christ. When asked who they were, these Americans did not say, "I'm German-American," or "I'm English American." The response was always, "I'm an American," and it was said with pride.

The one group that was somewhat excluded from being fully American were blacks. There were several reasons for this including the history of slavery, cultural differences, and the fact that they looked very different from the white majority.

The war on poverty

Starting in the 1960s, the US undertook a herculean effort to incorporate the black community into the American mainstream. American elites, through government legislation, affirmative action, welfare, judicial activism, Hollywood, television, and educational institutions put in place measures to remove all impediments to blacks integrating.

Fifty years later, it is fair to say that the effort to integrate blacks into the American mainstream has failed. While it is true that some blacks have benefited from Byzantine conglomeration of measures put into place by the elites, blacks "continue to lag far behind whites in key areas of economic well-being like wealth, income and home ownership."

Of course, this system to integrate blacks is not free. Publisher and sci-fi writer Vox Day calculated that the average white American will transfer almost a million dollars to a black American over the course of a lifetime when you take into account interest on the federal debt. If the calculation is correct, the system the elites have put in place is unjust and unsustainable.

> If you are a white American, over the course of your life you will transfer a net average of $971,000 to a single black individual.
>
> — Supreme Dark Lord (@voxday) June 30, 2017

Plan B

If Americans were aware of how big the failure of the war on poverty has been, they would immediately put a stop to the system. But the media and universities deliberately whitewash the real story to preserve the system for a while longer. Meanwhile, the elites have implemented a Plan B to solve the problem.

Plan B takes a different approach. Rather than trying to integrate blacks into white society, Plan B aims to do away with white society altogether. It does this in four ways: through unchecked third world immigration, encouraging miscegenation and low birth rates, and calling for a need for an end to "whiteness."

Immigration

Before 1965, virtually all of the immigration into the US was from Europe. Now, the vast majority of immigrants come from Central America, Asia, and Africa. And we are at record high immigration levels. Whites have gone from 89% of the population in 1960 to 62% in 2010. This sort of population replacement normally does not occur except in cases of full scale military invasion.

Miscegenation

State Farm ad

The media is encouraging intermarriage through television shows, movies, and commercials. The excuse given is that the producers are just reflecting the diversity of the US but it seems a lot more pervasive in the media than it does in the real world.

Encouraging low birth rates

Another common tactic aimed at whites is trying to persuade women to have fewer babies. But you'll never see a "have fewer babies" article with black, Asian, or Hispanic women and babies. It is always white women and babies that are featured. This is one area where the media completely forgets about diversity.

An end to “whiteness”

The latest attack has been to challenge “whiteness” itself. Whiteness is a social construct that is inextricably linked, we are told, with racism. Some have gone further, even issuing not so subtle calls to violence against whites. But we never see articles encouraging blacks to give up their blackness or for Jews to give up Jewishness.

How will it end?

Donald Trump subscribes to civic nationalism. His campaign promise, and I believe he was being sincere when he made it, was to make America great—lifting all Americans, whatever their color. If anyone could make civic nationalism work, it would be Trump. Sadly, it doesn’t look like Trump is going to get the support of his own party in realizing his vision. Establishment GOP politicians are too beholden to wealthy plutocrats to allow any serious derailment of their plan turn the US into a country with no identifiable majority.

In truth, though, even Trump’s plan to restore civic nationalism does not go far enough. To do that, it would take more than deporting a few illegals and improving the US economy. It would require a complete rollback of the entire affirmative action apparatus, a moratorium on immigrations, and a complete reworking of existing social programs. No one, not Trump and not the alt lite, is talking about this. Thus, the civic nationalism train has left the station.

Rather than civic nationalism, the future looks more tribal—men will align with whatever group they share the most commonalities with. For most Americans, that may mean embracing some form of white nationalism. There is already an increasing amount of agreement between far right groups in the US and Europe. The elites recognize this and they are frightened, and with good reason—there has never been this level of cooperation between white nationalist groups across the globe.

But white nationalism is not the only possibility. There are a few religious groups that have the possibility of forming tribes that do not strictly break along racial lines.

Catholics, Mormons, the Orthodox, and Muslims all possess the strong infrastructure necessary to unite their adherents into self-sufficient communities once order begins to retreat.

Finally, there is one possibility that does not involve tribalism—an empire built upon spiritual unity. The Holy Roman Empire, which lasted a thousand years, encompassed many different peoples but who shared a common faith. Given the disappearance of belief in the US and Europe, this possibility is a long-shot.

Conclusion

Civic nationalism is only possible when there is something that strongly unites a group of people. American elites, perhaps with good intentions at the start, have systematically undermined everything that bound Americans together. Now we are left with a bunch of groups that will become increasingly polarized over the next decade. Begin preparing now for the inevitable.

Read More: Why Democracy, Nationalism, And Globalist Economics Can't Coexist

---

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

5 Most Common Forms Of Passive Aggressive Behavior You'll Encounter

July 26, 2017 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

The feminization of our era brings with it some annoying concepts. Out of which, one that we are so used to and almost always annoyed by is the passive aggressive behavior (PA for short). Here it is defined:

> …a non-verbal aggression that manifests in negative behavior. It is where you are angry with someone but do not or cannot tell them. Instead of communicating honestly when you feel upset, annoyed, irritated or disappointed you may instead bottle the feelings up, shut off verbally, give angry looks, make obvious changes in behavior, be obstructive, sulky or put up a stone wall.

I, as a man, would like nothing more than to have people telling me what they want and if they have a problem with me. I may solve it, or mitigate it or even choose to ignore it. I get somewhat annoyed when I get the regular "Everything's fine" with a tone that makes sure that you understand that it is not.

Another classic is "[Stab you in the back] but don't be offended". As we know, females use mostly covert communications. Here are a few examples of passive aggressive behavior…

1. By proxy (using other people)

PA persons (mostly females, but a growing number of males as well) will use other people to disrespect you. The PA person will talk to your friends and colleges and bad-mouth you in an indirect way or direct way (less sophisticated but with more intense feelings). This may also include blatant lies and “divide and conquer” tactics. The goal is to get people around you to like you less or convey the message that this person does not communicate to you.

2. By using the “Don’t get upset, but…”

Whenever you hear this it means that someone is trying to set you up. If you do get upset, they win – you were told not to get upset and could not behave as a grown man. If you don’t get upset, they also win – they were able to “soften the blow” and tell you something that you probably did not like and “get away with it”.

3. Evasion

This includes a lot of specific behaviors such as ignoring you when you react, the all time classic “You should know,” and its wing man “I’m not going to tell you”.

Other favourites are “It’s not my fault that [insert whatever is the topic here]” and “Well excuse me for being [insert whatever here].” The purpose here is to “punish” or avoid the target.

4. Victimization/lashing out

This type is when someone uses a sympathy card for criticizing others. Examples include changing the subject in order to attack you, sulking in order to get attention and sympathy, refusing to see their own part in the situation (because that will make them responsible), and using the “Poor me” scenario (unlike sulking, this is directly trying to get sympathy).

Another recurring action is blaming everyone else, besides you, for the situation. SJWs use this all the time.

5. Withholding

Here, the person will withhold behaviors or roles such as example sex, cooking and cleaning, running a bath, etc., all to reinforce an already unclear message to the other party. This goes hand in hand with evasion.

The classic scenario is your girlfriend avoiding sex but not communicating what happened. In a work setting, it may be ignoring requests, not going for lunch or coffee, and stopping recurring actions.

What to do about it

Behavior is caused by feelings. If you have identified a recurring behavior pattern, try to find out what emotions are driving it. If you can do that, you may assume control of the situation. In any case, here are some of my favourite tactics to handle passive aggressive behavior…

Identify it. Sometime it’s not that easy to identify the behavior. If it is occasional, it is not PA. If it is recurring, it is PA.

Explain it. Stand up to the PA person and tell them. Tell them how you are affected. Do not attack or judge, just tell them. Do not speak about what they are doing, but about what you are experiencing. This will take the edge off the other side, at least in some cases.

Own your part. PA is sometimes not only the other side's fault. You may have some part in it. While you identify the situation, look into what you are doing. If you contribute to it, stop.

Control your responses. PA is feeding off you. One can "starve the beast" by not caving in and not falling back on automatic responses. By doing this, one stops the loop and reduces the PA behavior.

Set boundaries and consequences. If the aggressive behavior of others continues to affect you in a negative way, set clear boundaries around yourself. Define rules for what you will and won't accept. Stay strong and focused and get on with your life.

Use game. If it is a girl you are dating and she turns PA on you, game her. I tease, neg, deploy amused mastery and cocky-funny humor. This reduces the edge and brings back the attraction. It does not, however, eliminate it altogether.

Disengage. If it is possible, and you come to the understanding that the PA person is doing it regularly and far too much, just remove yourself from the toxic source. If it is an LTR, move on. If it is a boss, find another job. If it is an employee, fire them. Get that toxic waste as far away from you as possible.

PA is annoying. If it is not noticed, it starts to suck the life out of you. Maintain frame and use the combination of the solutions above to combat it. It will never go away, but it can be reduced.

Read Next: Why Liberalism Is Just Passive-Aggressive Totalitarianism

Dawn Pine

Dawn Pine (aka TheMaleBrain) is an Israeli 40+ divorced father of 2, former casualty of the blue-pill. Since he has taken the red pill his hobbies are: working out, writing, mentoring, harem management and self improvement.

What I Learned About Women From Working As A High-Level Club DJ

July 27, 2017 | by Arlo Dash | Link | Original Link

For pickup artists, the nightclub is often times the most commonly used venue in their endeavors. In nearly every nightclub worldwide, you will find a DJ whose job it is to create a musical atmosphere conducive to partying. Being both a longtime Roosh supporter, as well as a DJ who has been actively playing for nearly a decade, I want to share my experiences in the nightlife scene.

I have traveled to multiple continents to DJ, have spent time on tour, and shared the stage with 30+ of today's biggest names in EDM. As a result, I have spent enough time in the game to have a series of profound, eye opening experiences that shed light on many topics related to the manosphere, beginning with the true nature of women.

The nightclub is the 21st century theater of openly accepted cuckoldry

DJs are typically placed above the crowd to give a strategic vantage point when analyzing how an audience is reacting to their selections. As a DJ, you see more of what goes on in the club than any other staff member or patron. At first, I planned to describe this scenario as: “true nature of women reveals itself to you,” but I realized that was far too benign. Instead, what actually occurs is the true nature of women hits you in the chest like a fucking 9mm.

When you spin music for a nightclub, it is your job to “read the crowd.” You are constantly watching, analyzing, perceiving, and emphasizing with the club patrons to deliver the best possible experience and make their night one to remember. I’m guessing you can see where this is going.

I have seen hundreds of women commit vile acts in nightclubs. It is as if they believe that dim lighting and four vodka cranberries propels them to a “consequence free zone.” The saddest part is that they are often correct.

I once watched a women whose boyfriend went outside to smoke get gamed into giving another a guy a blowjob in the bathroom. She finished him off in time to french kiss her boyfriend when he came back in.

I worked for a club owner who loved fucking women in relationships, often times the wives or girlfriends of his top bottle service clients. He would give these women a free table, a bottle or two, and “disappear in the back” with one of them for an hour. He’d come to the booth at the end of the night and brag about how he had anal sex with them, make them go ass to mouth, and bust loads in them before they’d get picked up by their husbands or boyfriends. Never, ever trust club owners.

One time, I saw him go in the back with a bottle service girl. Her boyfriend showed up looking for her, and the bartenders played it off and gave him free drinks while he waited for his girlfriend to emerge from getting fucked by her boss. She came back acting like nothing had happened. Yes, this is my work environment, though I eventually quit playing at that club.

Before I played one night, I was chatting up a new girl in an empty VIP section, and I started making out with her. Looking to get some pre-set action, I reached down to her crotch, and made direct contact with her pussy. Confused, I looked down and saw she was wearing crotchless pants despite being dressed to the 9's in designer clothes otherwise. Her bare pussy was totally exposed in the club. She was so ready to get fucked that she had special pants that let her keep her clothes on while it as happening.

A friend of mine once met two girls at a club I was playing at, took them both back to his place and had a threesome with them. He's a true to form, old school PUA. He decided to bring them back to the club afterwards, and one of them decided that the threesome was not enough for her.

She went out looking, and found the man she's now engaged to at that same nightclub. Imagine that, she's making out with her future husband an hour after somebody else's dick was in her mouth. Worst of all, I think he eventually found out.

Upon first look, you would have no idea these women act this way. Most of the time, these are good looking, well dressed "career women." Many of them are wearing wedding rings, or are in long-term relationships. As we already know, women take the shape of the container they are placed in. If you put a woman in an environment where promiscuity and cuckoldry is celebrated, it's not hard to assume what will inevitably happen.

Nightclubs promote extreme cultural degeneracy.

> Lol The DJ hands her a flyer and says then don't come on these nights.Video via facebook.com/changomusic
>
> Posted by DJ Mixes Now on Saturday, February 13, 2016

In addition to observing numerous instances of slut behavior, I've been physically attacked by some of these women for not playing their requests. I'm not exaggerating in the slightest. The girl in the above video is actually quite nice compared with what I am used to dealing with.

Try explaining what the term "music policy" means to a girl on birth control and psychiatric medication while piss drunk. I've had glasses thrown at me for politely declining a request. I sometimes wonder what would happen if their husbands, employers, or any other strong male figure in their life knew they acted in such an unsettling, disrespectful manor in public.

All things considered, you may be reconsidering your trip to the club this weekend, bringing me to my next point.

Clubbing is largely a waste of time.

This is not an experience that merits spending hundreds of dollars.

Not what you were expecting to hear from a DJ? I know. You could say I'm somewhat jaded. On the converse, you could say I've had plenty of time to observe these environments from a neomasculine point of view.

If you're one of these people who finds themselves spending an exorbitant amount of money on the "clubber lifestyle," I urge you to question your actions. Low quality, high mileage women aren't worth such a great investment of your hard earned resources.

Roosh has mentioned the damaging effects of these excessive luxuries in an incredible podcast he recorded recently.

I found it particularly useful when considering my own lifestyle and how it is impacted by these experiences, which brings us to my final point.

The DJ lifestyle is likely just as you would expect.

This looks as good as it tastes.

Groupie sluts, free alcohol, and nice paychecks are all part of what makes this a great career for myself and my peers. If hedonism is your thing, I cannot suggest being a DJ enough.

I am a full time DJ, meaning I work no other jobs. Other perks of DJ life include traveling to new cities for gigs with all expenses paid, a constant creative outlet, and the ability to network with interesting, creative people.

The DJ lifestyle is reserved for those who work the hardest and remain hungry to continue to improve their skills. If I had any advice to anybody who was considering starting, I would say be prepared to give up everything else in your life, because the level of commitment it takes to be successful is absurd.

If you're looking to become a DJ just to meet women, go buy one of Roosh's books instead. It is a far better plan if that is your end goal.

Read more: How To Get Connected In The Club Scene

Arlo Dash

Arlo Dash is a nomadic writer currently enjoying the spoils that life in Eastern Europe has to offer.

The Transsexual Lobby Now Dictates Terms To The Criminal Justice System

July 27, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Lately, society increasingly resembles Roman decadence as described in Juvenal's Satires. The historical parallels are hard to miss. Indeed, Juvenal may be the grandfather of the alt right just as Ovid was the grandfather of the PUAs. Still, it seems we may be outdoing Rome's decadence. The latest evidence is the transsexual agenda dictating to the prison system. Let's see how this developed over time.

Richard Speck

(Warning—the following can't be unseen.)

The first notable transsexual in prison was Richard Speck, a habitually drunken career criminal, and overall an evil and dirty man that no one wants to know. In 1966, he raped and murdered eight nursing students. A lone survivor hid out and later identified him. This oxygen thief was convicted and sentenced to ride the lightning, but the story doesn't end there.

Although guilty as hell, in 1971, the Supreme Court ruled that his death penalty conviction was "unconstitutional", so the state of Illinois must redo it. The next year, it became a moot point, since the liberal SCOTUS overturned all death penalty convictions in the USA. So Speck got re-sentenced, for 400-1200 years. Although he was doing time in a tough, maximum security prison, apparently he was having a blast. As one summary describes:

> In May, 1996, five years after his death, a pornographic video made secretly in prison began airing on Chicago's WBBM-TV showing the mass murderer wearing woman's panties, doing drugs, having sex and bragging about living the good life at Stateville prison. A total embarrassment for Illinois lawmakers, the tape, believed to have been shot in 1988, shows Speck handling $100 bills and casually snorting from a huge pile of coke. At one point he says, "If they only knew how much fun I was having in here, they would turn me loose."
>
> A feminine-looking Speck appeared to have taken hormone shots and, like fellow killer Bobby Joe Long, seemed to be sporting a pair of tits. It is unclear how the jailhouse Tarrantinos obtained the equipment to make their porn video. Besides Speck two other inmates appear on the tape, Speck's black lover, or in prison lingo, "his bitch," and the film maker himself who casually pops in for a line of coke. After viewing the video, Illinois state Representative, Al Salvi, said the demeanor of Speck and the others suggest "that they had the run of the place." On the tape, the convicts do not appear worried about getting caught. At one point Speck acknowledges that he killed the eight nurses saying that it, "just wasn't their night." For years he claimed to have "blacked out" on drugs, and couldn't remember anything about the killings.

It's been speculated that becoming a prison punk with chemically-induced breasts was a means of survival, or possibly a strange form of atonement. However, given his statements, those explanations don't hold up. He clearly wasn't sorry about anything, and he was partying it up behind bars.

No doubt the female hormones (like the dope) had to get smuggled in. However, in the Current Year, all that's different. In some places, that will be provided by the state, because Constitutional rights.

Robert Kosilek

Cuter than Andrea Dworkin at least.

Unlike Richard Speck, Robert Kosilek (who now goes by Michelle) first took female hormones as a young adult and grew breasts. Despite this, he got married, but—as you might guess—things didn't turn out well. As the legal papers say:

> About two and one-half years later, in October of 1992, the defendant gave a series of recorded interviews to a television news reporter. An audiotape recording of one of the interview sessions was played for the jury. During the interview, the defendant stated that: on the day of the murder, he and the victim had been in an argument; the victim threw boiling tea into the defendant's face; he then knocked the victim down; she grabbed a butcher knife and chased the defendant into another room, threatening to kill him; he picked up a piece of wire that had been on a table; and this was all he was able to recall until he woke up days later in the hospital. The defendant stated in the interview that he "probably, because of the trauma of it… went into a black out at that moment." He also said, "Apparently, I did take her life. It was probably in self-defense."

We don't have the wife's side of the story, of course, because she's dead. She had been strangled by both a rope and piano wire. That seems strangely like the "suicide" of Rudolf Hess. Be that as it may, note well that leaving loops of piano wire on your coffee table is just plain bad luck. Don't do that.

In 1993, Kosilek was convicted by a Massachusetts court to life without possibility of parole, and became famous for filing lawsuits about transgender issues. In 2002, the court granted hormone therapy and psychiatry, based on 8th Amendment protections against cruel and unusual punishment. Ten years later, a district court ruled that denying sex change surgery was also unconstitutional. Thus, refusing sex change operations to lifers is the same moral category as drawing and quartering.

And taxpayers foot the bill

At least it wasn't a bad hair day.

The barriers the above trailblazers encountered are on the way out. The transgender agenda has reached complete convergence in California (of course). The state that used to gas murderers will now give them free sex changes. The New York Times reports:

> The policy, which took effect this week, grew out of a pair of successful lawsuits filed by inmates. In one, a federal court in April ordered the state to provide surgery to a prisoner, which transgender advocates hailed as a landmark victory, > but the inmate was paroled while that ruling was on appeal, making the point moot.

>
> Then, after years of fighting such requests, the state settled the other case in August, agreeing to surgery for Shiloh Quine, a convicted murderer formerly known as Rodney J. Quine, who is serving a life sentence. California's prisons already provided hormone therapy to transgender inmates, but experts said the Quine settlement was the first time any state had agreed to taxpayer-funded surgical reassignment for an inmate.

I do love California despite all its faults (geological and otherwise), but come on, people! Indeed, early in 2017, Shiloh Heavenly Quine—a 57 year old lifer—became the first to receive a sex change surgery at taxpayer expense. Who says crime doesn't pay?

As the article states:

> Ms. Quine told a prison psychologist who recommended her for the operation that it would bring a "drastic internal completeness."

So the story has a heart-warming ending, right? As for Quine's victim, he doesn't have the opportunity for self-actualization, of course, because he's dead.

Logic time

Denying someone an emergency appendectomy would be cruel and unusual punishment, but nobody dies from not getting elective surgery. That's right—a sex change operation doesn't really turn a man into a woman; it's just extensive cosmetic surgery.

It's a controversial point. There are two ideas concerning what a "trans-woman" is:

- A woman trapped in a man's body; or
- A delusional man who thinks he's a woman.

The first proposition isn't supported by hard science, though psychologists with agendas offer plenty of mumbo-jumbo. Occam's Razor favors the second proposition. Delusional people certainly do exist. They're easily observable, unlike female souls inhabiting male bodies (which can't be proven to exist). So then, why exactly are highly controversial and unproven psychological notions treated as Holy Writ?

Is penal trannymania confined to liberal states like California and Massachusetts? Apparently not. In 2013, the authorities in Harris County, Texas ruled that inmates will be placed in jail according to whichever gender they claim to be. Before that, Harris County Jail was notorious primarily for pizza that tastes like cardboard with cheese baked on top. (So, what do they do if someone claims to be non-binary or an attack helicopter?) If Juvenal were still around, he would've had some witty things to say about the law bending over backwards (or forwards?) for the transsexual agenda.

Read More: Pentagon To Allow Transvestites To Serve In US Military, Will Pay For Sex Change Surgery

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Stop Trying To Convince Girls To Sleep With You

July 27, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Recently, a reader asked me a question regarding building a harem—more specifically, the question was, "How do I even start?" Indeed, it can be difficult for one to date multiple women if the pressing issue is getting a phone number, or getting a woman on a date.

In reality, much of life revolves around sales—selling oneself. Need a job? Sell yourself. Need a college scholarship? Sell. Want a date? Sell yourself. Want to fuck that hot girl? Again—sell, sell, sell.

However, there is always going to be a target market for selling to. How do you think selling diet pills to a group of bodybuilders would do? Probably not so well. But change that target market to a group of fat girls who love Oreos and all of a sudden you're a wealthy man. Likewise, you wouldn't try to sell eating a chicken salad for lunch to those girls, but you would for the bodybuilders.

In reality, game works the same way in the fact that you should go after the proper target audience. You should be looking for the YES girls—the ones who are intrigued by you and are going to put you through less hoops to have sex with them. It's far better to filter for the YES girls and filter out the NO girls. Trying to convince the NO girls into liking you is an exhausting, demoralizing, and often fruitless tactic.

If you were trying to sell those diet pills to bodybuilders, you wouldn't invest the time or energy in trying to change their mind. You'd take their "no", and immediately move on to the next target. Look for the YES girls in game and your life will be much easier.

What Constitutes A Yes Girl?

There's an old saying (don't ask me who coined it), "You don't need game as long as the girl is complying with you."

And this is very, very true. Do you think Justin Bieber needs game? Definitely not. He filters exactly down to girls who will say yes to him, and just leaves the no girls behind. He doesn't need them, after all. The yes girls are so compliant that they just go along with him.

For those of us without millions of fan girls, things are a little bit more difficult, but not impossible. In the case of cold approaching, you want to be looking for the girls who are having an engaging conversation with you. Not the ones that are making you fight tooth and nail for every inch of conversation. In the online world, the girls who are compliant and give you their number and agree to a date are far better options instead of the ones who throw endless tests your way ("But WHY do you need my number?").

So how much do you invest in trying to get a number? When in doubt, it's always better to get a number for the sake of having another lead than not. Just don't invest too much energy in to them, but you never know when things might turn around. This leads me to my next point.

Remember The Fickle Nature

Despite what I've written above, like I said—there are exceptions. And girls are fickle, fickle creatures. Sometimes, it's just one thing you say that turns a no girl straight into a yes girl (or sometimes, even vice versa).

Every one of your interactions should be a direct funnel to getting what you desire—usually sex. A girl's job is to dissuade you from this path, in the form of off-topic conversations, shit tests, and more. Always redirect and put her back on the path that you want her on. This means getting her number, getting her out on a date, and then getting her into the bedroom. Think of it as a road trip—you're going to have to make stops to eat and fill up the tank, but then you get right back on the freeway until you reach the destination.

Of course, in this metaphorical example, a girl is free to be left on the side of the road at any point—and that's okay. Sometimes, that's the nature of the beast. You have to leave girls behind. For one reason or another, they go hot to cold. It's important to remember that it's part of the game. Maybe her dog died. Maybe it's that time of the month and she's cranky. The exact details don't matter, but you just keep filtering for the yes girls.

Put A System In Place

It’s important then to remember to systematize things to an extent. While I don’t think you need played-out pickup lines, having an idea of a system of conversation (or messages, if using online dating) that you know gets you results is excellent.

Does it take time to develop a system that works for you? Absolutely. Trial and error is the only way. It’s going to depend on where you live, your style, and your overall attitude you take towards game and life. Some guys go on dates and as as serious and mysterious as James Bond. Other guys go on dates with the goal of just having a good time. You have to figure out what works for you.

But, once you have figured out what works for you—stick to it. Stick to the system that works. Always move forward and if she isn’t on board—away she goes. Put girls through your system and be absolutely brutal about the rules of engagement. When it comes to girls, take the yes and fuck the rest.

Want to start building your own funnel of girls? Learn how in my book.

Read More: 3 Things I’ve Learned From Dating A Ukrainian Girl For One Year

New TV Series “Confederate” Will Be Used To Browbeat And Humiliate Southern Whites

July 28, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

The developers of the massively popular ‘Game Of Thrones’ TV series, (((D.B. Weiss))) and (((David Benioff))), have recently announced that their next television project will be an alternate history dystopia called ‘Confederate‘. It will be set in a world where the Confederacy won the American Civil War, and the union of Dixie states are still fully functioning as of the late 2010’s.

Well now, if the Confederacy won the American Civil War, it just had to be a dystopia right?

Admittedly, at present there is only so much we can speculate on the project. However, if there is one thing that we know for sure, it will act as little more than a multi million dollar white-shaming and white-guilt showpiece. Over 150 years in the making.

The shows two Jewish developers will make sure that ‘Confederate’ will portray white Southerners as poorly as possible, sanctify blacks, ~~completely omit Jewish involvement in the slave business~~, and hopefully get as many non-white Americans as possible to further browbeat Caucasians and reiterate the dangers of “white supremacy” in real life.

The Bullshit Premise

“Confederate” will be set in an alternate universe where the South successfully secedes from the Union and remains the Confederate States of America, and in it’s wake “gives rise to a nation in which slavery remains legal and has evolved into a modern institution”. Both nations will continue to have antagonistic relations with each other, with the Mason-Dixon Line serving as a “DMZ” of sorts between the two countries.

Furthermore, according to the press, “the story follows a broad swath of characters … freedom fighters, slave hunters, politicians, abolitionists, journalists, the executives of a slave-holding conglomerate and the families of people in their thrall”.

The Stupid, It Burns

The Present Day Reality

The announcement of this show almost seems like prophecy, as little more than a month ago I penned an article called "4 Flagrant Lies About The American Confederacy", highlighting some of the most preposterous myths that people on the (mostly) political left keep regurgitating about the Civil War. In fact, the very first point in that article was the classic dissenting argument "If the South won, we would still have slavery".

While the Confederacy did indeed live and die with the institution of slavery (the country only existed for four years in the early 1860's), the presumption that a hypothetical modern C.S.A. would still keep Sub-Saharan Africans as property is an absolute absurdity. Yet so many blue pilled African-Americans, liberals, or just those outright lacking in simple historical and international knowledge, vehemently refuse to dismiss the notion.

Wait what's that? Brazil was the last western Christian country to abolish slavery in 1888? And a black Muslim country called Mauritania still practices it? Oh….. "I'll have to get back to you on that one".

As I mentioned (and history will agree with me 100%), the country of Brazil was the last western Christian nation to abolish slavery in the year 1888. A combination of sweeping changes in the moral zeitgeist of the west, and a series of major technological advances in agriculture, rendered chattel slavery both hopelessly outdated and 100% economically impractical at that point in time.

There is absolutely no reason to believe that a hypothetical Confederate victory in the 1860's would also see the institution of slavery go the way of the dodo in a maximum of 25 years for similar reasons, or roughly corresponding to the 1880's much like Brazil.

At an extreme, any notion of Confederate slavery seeing the first light of day of the 20th century is laughably preposterous, as there is no doubt the country would have faced severe international condemnation, isolation, and trade sanctions from the British Empire, French Colonial Empire, German Empire, and the now fractured (but recovered) United States. Simply put, both economic and public relations suicide with the world's largest economies of the late 19th century.

Beyond the West, slavery did not finally end in Imperial China until 1910, and it took until the mid 20th century in many hopelessly backward Arabian countries (but it's the religion of peace remember!). Furthermore, none of those non-white cultures are made to feel any ongoing guilt or shame for their late-bloomer / post-1900 manumission process.

But oh well, let the left live by their emotional hyperbole and virtue signaling, instead of factual and rational reflection on broader historical events. "The (first world) south would still have slavery in 2017". Let me direct you to next weeks slave auction in Charlotte…

Calling Out The Cultural Marxists

CMouse 2 days ago
Here's another set of Hollywood opinions and puffing. Some people think Abraham Lincoln was a vampire hunter and the War was fought over slavery. It will take us another 200 years to dispel the lies and fallacies from this series. Cyrus McCormick invented a machine he called the Harvester in 1867. Slavery was doomed from that time forward. Even George Washington wrote in his diaries he was afraid slavery would bankrupt him. The "institution" was to expensive and wrecked the lives of all involved. This is nothing more than a way for the left to gin up hatred toward white Southerners and revise history to suit the cultural Marxists.
Like Reply

Connie Chastain 2 days ago
I suspect this series will be made for the purpose of fomenting hatred for white Southerners in the rest of America. Most of what Hollywood makes about the South is for that purpose, and I can't imagine why this would be different.
2 Like Reply

Oh look at all these "dumb" white southerners. They're so "ignorant" aren't they?

Thankfully, a lot of people aren't putting up with this crap, even if it's ultimately fruitless online protest. People can read the fine print and damn well know this series is going to do nothing but tacitly humiliate whitey, attempt to turn African-Americans against whitey, and attempt to remind the whole country that "white supremacy" harms everyone. Therefore, massive non-white immigration policies must remain a national priority.

In the meantime, keep a look out for at least several of the following cultural Marxist attributes when this Hollywood diarrhea hits the small screen.

Southern Nazis: "Well suh (sir), I do have reason to believe you are hiding runaway slaves under your floor boards. Do you deny it suh?"

- Insinuation that the C.S.A. maintained peaceful or even supportive relations (similar to or even beyond authoritarian Spain) with fascist Germany and Italy in the World War II era. This is despite the C.S.A. being a constitutional Republic, which would have despised any notion of authoritarianism/fascism.
- The Confederacy is a true "white supremacy" the left always dreams about. All non-whites are 2nd class individuals who cannot vote and must give up their seats, tip their hats, step aside on footpaths, and open doors for whites without any expectation of reciprocity.
- Slaves will be beaten with whips on a regular basis. Expect lots of close-up shots of bloodied backs, distressed and crying faces, and tear-jerking melodramatic music made to instill maximum white guilt and maximum anger among Hillary and Bernie bots.

- Complete omission or mention of Jewish slave holders or traders, despite huge Jewish involvement in the slave trade. It must be 100% White Christians.
- White southerners will be given atrocious and room temperature-IQ sounding accents.
- Slaves will be bought, traded, or sold on Tinder-like smartphone apps (called it!).
- Waffle House imitation chain will be staffed by slaves. “Mo’ grits suh (sir)?”
- Chick-Fil-A imitation chain will refuse service even to free blacks (a literal interpretation of the joke that the expensive fast-food joint is a “white” place to eat).
- “Dog The Bounty Hunter” like reality TV shows which follow runaway slave catchers.
- White southern women having sex with black male slaves – (via love and mutual consent, and to get away from their boring and beta slave-owning husband).
- White southern men having sex with black female slaves – (via rape only).

It looks like the efforts by those in Hollywood and the media to further divide-and-conquer the races will not cease.

Read Next: The Truth About Black Slavery In The Americas

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

The Bible Does Not Justify Ardent Zionism Among Christians

July 28, 2017 | by Michael Witcoff | Link | Original Link

Peace, grace, and mercy to you all from the Lord Jesus Christ. There are three groups of people to whom God wishes me to speak; one of those three groups is Christians who automatically ally themselves with the modern state of Israel.

The vast majority of Christians that I've met are Zionists. They not only espouse a Jewish right to a homeland in Israel, but they refer to Jews as "God's Chosen People" and believe it is their duty as good Christians to defend Israel no matter what.

When I ask Christians whether Zionism is a valid position to hold, I am not asking whether they believe in the Jewish right to their own homeland. I believe that every group of people should have their own homeland, if they should desire one. Instead, I am talking about the reflexive posture of submission and servility shown by Christian Zionists towards the state of Israel in the belief that doing so will bring blessings from God.

In this article, I am going to examine the position of Christian Zionism from both a Biblical and an ethical perspective. But before certain elements decide to label me with slurs, I'd like to explain something first.

As I've mentioned on my website, I was born and raised in Reform Judaism. It's about as close as you can get to secular humanism while still maintaining some veneer of religion, and I even went to Israel for my “Birthright” trip at the age of 26.

However, I had neither a relationship with God nor a belief in religion at all until much later in life. In fact, I was not Saved by the Lord Jesus Christ to become Born-Again until after I’d been through an atheist phase, a New Age phase, and even a brief Luciferian phase.

In other words, what I’m about to write is not the result of some kind of bias. It’s the result of many years of serious philosophical study and discovery, ultimately culminating in my salvation towards the end of 2015.

That’s when all my illusions were blasted away, and the truth made itself unmistakably known to me. So that said, let’s break down Christian Zionism and see if it’s a Biblically-sound position to hold.

The Abrahamic Covenants

To defend their position as Zionists, most Christians refer to the covenants God made with Abraham and his descendants in the Old Testament. In exchange for Abraham’s agreeing to murder his own son and deliberately cut off part of his penis, the Old Testament God makes a few covenants with him.

God says to Abraham in Genesis 12:2-3, “…I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing. And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee, and in thee shall all families of the Earth be blessed.”

We read in Genesis 15:18, “In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river,

the river Euphrates."

Finally we read in Genesis 17:7-8, "And I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God."

On the basis of these verses (and a few others later in the Torah), Christians recognize that the Israelites were the Chosen People of God according to the Old Testament. Whether the Jewish people currently ruling Israel are actually the blood descendants of said Israelites is a matter for another time–but a matter which should (clearly) be of vital importance.

After all, if the Jewish people currently ruling Israel are not the blood descendants of the ancient Israelites, then there should be no reason at all for most Christians to defend them as per the Old Testament's writings. I have read both sides of this argument, and I think it is very important to study.

There is a big difference between those who Jesus called "those who say they are Jews but are not," and those Peter called "fellow Israelites." Anyway, this is where the crux of the problem begins.

Covenants Fulfilled

The very same Christians who refer to the Old Testament covenants to defend their belief in the Israelites as "Chosen People" will very quickly turn around and declare–when it better suits the argument at hand–that "the Old Covenant was fulfilled by Jesus and we are under the NEW Covenant now instead."

They make this argument–which is completely incompatible with their aforementioned belief in the Old Testament covenants–when presented with such questions as "why don't you follow the dietary laws of the Old Testament?" or "why didn't you circumcise your son?"

When switching their argument to the "we're under the New Covenant now" side, many Christians will quote from Paul's letters on the topic. They are correct in their assertion that Paul believed the Old Testament had no further meaning or purpose after the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

"The Old Testament was just a prank, bro."–St. Paul

There are entire chapters in the New Testament specifically devoted to addressing the question of whether the "Old Covenant" is still relevant. In Galatians 3:28-29, Paul summarizes his answer to that question with the following passage…

> There is neither Jew nor Gentile, neither slave nor free, nor is there male and female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus. If you belong to Christ, then you are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.

Paul wrote–in very unambiguous terms–that the heirs of God's promise to Abraham are now those who follow Christ.

If Christ's "rending of the veil" removed the separation between Jews and Gentiles, opening up the Kingdom of God for all who believe in Him…then how could a Christian justify still believing that only one particular group of people are favored by God?

Even more importantly, how could they justify believing that the only people favored by God are those who rejected His son and the Gospel? It's a completely insane thing to believe.

As it must be pointed out, what Paul preached on this topic is not what the Living Christ actually preached during His ministry. In fact, it's the polar opposite.

As recorded in the Gospels (the New Testament writings outside of Paul's letters), Jesus was crystal-clear on His belief that all of the Old Testament's commandments were to be followed. Even further, He insisted that His teachings were only for the Jews. Paul's decision to negate these instructions from Christ has been widely debated since the day he made it.

This is why early Jewish Christian sects, like the Nazarenes and Ebionites, utterly rejected

Paul and his anti-Torah message. They followed what the Living Christ said, and followed the Old Testament's commandments to the letter.

Therefore, Jewish Christians like the aforementioned groups (and modern sects like the Messianic Jewish synagogue) could potentially justify their defense of Israel if its modern rulers were actually descendants of the ancient Israelites. However, any Christian who believes in Paul's message must necessarily reject Zionism as anti-Scriptural heresy.

The Ethical Defense Of Other People

Now that we have examined the "Old vs. New Covenant" dilemma, let us move on to examining whether it's truly ethical to defend any particular group of people–no matter what they do.

I think it's a fairly dangerous position to take, and one that leads to very negative logical conclusions. After all, if one has made up one's mind to defend a person or group of people no matter what they do, then is there any point at which one would hold said person or people accountable?

Is there any crime so vicious, any act so heinous, that your sense of decency (or self-preservation) would kick in and you would want to defend yourself from them, instead of defending those actions?

Or, if the Israeli politicians are "God's Chosen People" who can do no wrong, do you simply turn a blind eye to anything bad they do out of fear of offending God?

This is a very serious matter, as the Old Testament does say that those who curse the Israelites will be cursed in turn. It puts the thinking man in a difficult position, if he believes in the Old Testament and ignores Paul's thoughts on the topic.

Of course, the problem is easily solved if it is true that the "Jewish" people currently running Israel have no blood relation to the ancient Biblical Israelites. If that's the case, then not only are Christians under no obligation whatsoever to mindlessly defend them, but we can also safely hold them accountable for their actions without fear of divine retaliation.

Read Next: How American Christians Were Manipulated Into Loving Israel

Michael Witcoff
Michael is a Christian, a copywriter, an author, and a marketing consultant. He believes the West is experiencing divine wrath for turning our backs on God, and that the only hope for salvation is to unite under one faithful banner as our enemies have under theirs.

Should You Judge Other People?

July 28, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Some weeks ago, a ROK piece pointed out that social laxity encouraged misbehaving and extreme individualism. It linked to intelligent articles from a psychologist, Theodore Dalrymple, who showed how the commitment not to judge the others amounted to a refusal to learn from experience and had caused criminal cases of neglect.

Indeed, the turning of a blind eye to crime and criminal character have allowed criminals to kill and rape freely—from the case of a two-year-old children killed by his dark triad father Dalrymple mentions to what happened in Rotherham. These cases could have been easily prevented if only authorities were allowed to do their job and if common sense could prevail without constant leftist interference.

Yet, and although the lack of judgment is a real problem, it is only a side of the wider trend. Leftists do judge a lot. They had no problem slipping from the purported nonjudgmental hippie attitude of the 60s to a harshly coercive behavior.

"Don't be racist!"
"Don't be right-wing!"
"Follow the fashion!"
"You're privileged! Accept everything the professional 'minority' groups will throw at you and shut up!"

Behind the hysteria that reeks on "fing white males!" is a very judgmental will to enforce a hostile notion of "social justice." SJWs are willing to judge and shame people. They only feel bad—not remorseful—when they see their tactics fail. The very ones who protest fat shaming have no problem expressing grim judgments against those they label "fascists" or anything like that.

Here I would like to clear a bit of the general mess the nonjudgmental commitment has contributed to create through a kind of philosophical approach.

The basic issues

Philosophy, or at least one manner to do it, consists in formalizing and abstracting general issues. Particular cases always imply a variety of factors and make it easy to remain trapped inside an all too subjective point of view. When a question is considered abstractly and through concepts, and when particular cases are used as examples instead of being at the center, it becomes much easier to ask it seriously and consider possible answers.

In the case of judgment, I would say the questions are:

- What is judged, both positively and negatively?
- Who judges who?
- Is it possible not to judge?
- If it is, is it good or better not to?

The last question is the most composed of all and consequently comes after them in the logical order. It also seems the most common-sensical as it is closer to practice: if I judge that expired food ought not to be consumed, judgment is obviously useful as to protect me from health-threatening consequences.

On the other hand, it could be argued that if I go beyond the judgment, without rejecting it altogether, I could consume expired food in order to experiment its effects, so to see if they are really deleterious, mildly uncomfortable or absolutely negligible.

When expanded to the social sphere, judgment can have a conservative or a “progressive” function, no matter the exact nature of what is to conserve or promote. Edmund Burke urged the philosophers to be respectful of popular wisdom, even if they failed to grasp its reasonableness or its legitimacy in judging. (((Jonah Goldberg))) was hiding behind a Burkean mask when he argued that "character-forming institutions [should] softly coerce (persuade) kids—and remind adults—to revere our open, free, and tolerant culture over others."

Of course, the same "judgmentalism" one can find in popular wisdom can also be used by social engineers or interest groups to tweak what is usually considered common sense, and what Goldberg upholds as a worthy cultural identity seems more like the absence of actual identity. In all cases shame can be understood as a tool with a particular social use.

Embroiled with the aforementioned issues is a related one: accountability. Can one be at least nominally held responsible for one's actions or condition, and if so, should one be? Depending on the answer to this question comes the ability to shame or not.

Leftists make a spurious distinction between being a land whale and getting shamed for being a self-wasted blob. They also confuse their own categories with external reality as to engrave the former into the latter: when a libtard says "we have a right to make you feel like you're a racist if you're behaving like a racist", this means "let us lock you down in our anti-white, anthropology-mutilating, reality-denying narrative, and submit to our categories and judgment, you worthless freethinker."

If you accept the implicit affirmations and shaming behind their use of the r-word as legitimate, you open the way to be judged and shamed according to their narrative and value-judgments—no matter their actual truthfulness or utility. In contrast, if you answer something like "no, whites have a right to exist and you are responsible for shaming self-defence and self-preservation, you manipulative liberal", you contest the validity of their judgment criterion.

A social mess

“This is perfectly normal, and Muslim bombings are OK, but the far-right is intolerable!”

All this seems pretty straightforward as long as we consider concepts, sentences and simplistic situations. Philosophy allows to gain mastery over fundamental ideas and questions. Doing some allows one to become aware of his own implicit and not-that-obvious beliefs. Anyone who wishes to be decently knowledgeable about life-relevant issues should, I think, better read Aristotle’s Ethics than feed exclusively on personal improvement websites. Still, when you start applying philosophy to the real world, you can see how messy and chaotic it is—and here common sense does quickly what philosophy could tediously half-do.

The red pill per se entails an almost philosophical interrogation when one starts to notice how the “normal” is not normal at all and why it is so. As Plato and later Aristotle would say, philosophy begins with astonishment, when the seemingly normal or common world we live in shows us a strange inconsistency. Before we gathered on the Internet, many of us had red-pilling experiences. Our consciousness drifted from the narrative and we started to see through the taboos, untold rules and all the stuff that structures the narrative—and that normies want to keep taking for granted.

> Perhaps the greatest power of all is the ability to impose one’s narrative upon the minds of others. Without coercion, without violence, one epistemologically dominates others through the values and “facts” that they takes for granted. The greatest power is to determine what is “normal.” Cultural struggle is thus one of the highest political struggles. (Source)

We contend with liberals to uphold different versions of normalcy. We know it is not normal in the absolute, non-relative or transient sense, that trannies are celebrated, that criminals are constantly excused, that irresponsible sluts are constantly saved from the consequences of their own behavior, that death threats are celebrated if made by "minority" individuals against whites. The Current Year "normalcy" is a hopeless nightmare, an endless stream of unfairness and ugliness that drowns any trust left and is downright killing whites.

Julius Evola's Riding the Tiger, making a similar diagnosis during the Freudo-Marxist onslaught of the 60s, advised his readers to withdraw towards their inner citadel. It is good to do so indeed, as long as the withdrawal is temporary and used to gain a critical edge—not when it becomes synonymous with backing down or autism. Just as philosophy existed on public forums before it was taken away by ivory tower academics, a fair, balanced consciousness should be a basis for recasting the mess rather than ignoring it.

The left worked hard to inject "racism" or "xenophobia" into the usual discourse and thinking. It did everything it could to steer people by barring normal ways of thinking. Likewise, we have to turn the mess on itself by deconstructing leftist categories of thought, exposing them or laughing them out, by trolling libtards and everything else.

Even then, what we are doing may seem messy from the analytical point of view of philosophy as well. The Alt-sphere has no rigid system of thought. We act rather through a sense of things and a willingness to make the normal normal again than from exceedingly formal principles. Thus it is hard to suggest ready-made answers to the aforementioned questions: these are more of a support of reflection than an absolute basis, and the answers may seem different from person to person. Diversity of ideas in the Alt-sphere may be our strength as long as internal disagreements remain on the sideways.

Are we more or less judgmental than leftists? The question, which may seem relevant when we criticize their purported commitment not to judge, is actually misplaced. For just as the left judges X more harshly than Y, or abstains altogether from judging Y or having a prejudice against Y, we do the same, albeit with different Xs and Ys.

I think I can rightly say that we want a healthy ability to judge fatties, social parasites of various kinds, welfare abusers, family-destroyers, criminals in general… just as we find unjustified the smearing of wealthy people qua wealthy, or against entrepreneurs, or against masculinity.

When white boomers laugh along with a (((Democrat))) because they find that their peers killing themselves is funny, they judge so to be normal and a laughing matter. We rightly find it scandalous and wish for more solidarity and respect. Everyone judges, all the time. Everyone has to—even considering the most trivial matters such as what possible path is better to go back home after work.

The virtue of fair judgment

As for today, it could be said that red-pilled people must gain the upper hand over shrieking society-destroyers and over the blue-pilled mass in general. In the longer term, traditional distinctions and roles will have to reassert themselves.

Not because of wanting for "supremacy", as Leftist power cultists want to believe, but because this makes for an equilibrated, stable, healthy, goodness-rewarding world, and because, goddamit! our civilization was basically ours before (((little grey men))) started tearing it apart by turning social categories into hostile groups.

Those who took over had no particular right to do so: they only acted in a "might is right" fashion, albeit more subtly than through the open use of force. Manipulating norms and common sense is no more legitimate per se than hitting your neighbour because you judge his clothes ugly.

Short-term, a good judgment follows the red-pilled awareness, no matter who does it. Long-term, finer and more orderly distinctions will reassert themselves. Just be careful that neomasculinity does not get hijacked, for example, by thugs taking over in the name of their own notion of virility.

Knowing how to judge, when to express one's judgment, how, what not to judge and to adapt one's judgment to the particular circumstances one dwell in is a true virtue. It is an ability one hones day after day, occasion after occasion, for years—even decades.

One can be too harsh by, say, over-criticizing or overemphasizing petty details, just as one can be too complacent by ignoring important issues or by complaining about said issues while remaining lukewarm about their causes. I remember a baby-boomer who could ignore bullies—among children he was supposed to care about—but would make fusses about uncleaned breadcrumbs over the common table.

This kind of blatant misjudgment is painful to the child who senses how misplaced, unfair, and hypocritical it is. Fortunately, we are no more children and I know many millennials whose judgment seems much better to me than boomers'.

SJW's worst nightmare

Aristotle was right about the Golden Mean, the Stoics were right about holding oneself to high standards, those who bestowed unconditional "rights" on whatever crafty crybully were wrong and most if not all the mainstream idols from last century were wrong. Does that sound judgmental? It is. Yet it is no more judgmental than your average SJW's hamstering, and in contrast with that, it is (on the) right.

Read Next: It's In Our Nature To Judge Others

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

4 Latin Mottos From Medieval Times That Men Should Honor Today

July 30, 2017 | by Nathan Turner | Link | Original Link

Nestled comfortably in the center of history sits a thousand-year high point. Often erroneously named the “dark ages,” this millennium was the greatest source of light in the history of Western civilization. Though miles of library shelves have been filled with medieval writings on the skins of goats and cattle, a small taste of their mottos is enough to demonstrate their wisdom.

1. “Ne gladium tollas, mulier.” (Erasmus, Adagia)

Erasmus of Rotterdam was a Dutch priest and mastermind polymath from the fifteenth century. In his book of sayings, the Adagia, he coined the phrase “Woman, don’t pick up that sword.”

On its surface, this kind of brazen sexism and patriarchalism would be red pilled enough in itself. Of course women should not be fighting in tournaments or serving on the front lines of the military. They should not be cheapening their femininity and emasculating men by putting their lives and nice-looking faces in harm’s way.

The genius part of this quote, though, is that it’s not about women in combat at all. Obviously, in Erasmus’ day, the armies of medieval kingdoms did not have the problem of pussified, politically correct gender-diversification policies. There would be no need to oppose “women in combat.” Rather, what Erasmus is getting at is that you shouldn’t offer assistance if you’ve got nothing to offer.

Don’t ask me if I need a hand with my bags if you’ve never lifted a weight in your life. Don’t tell me how to vote or how to live if you’re a brain-dead celebrity with four divorces and a drug addiction. Don’t act like you’re the gatekeeper of conservatism if you’ve been rolling over and playing dead since Bill Clinton was elected. Woman—just put it down.

2. “Per me reges regnant.” (Charlemagne, Aachen Town Hall)

I’ve walked all over the German town of Aachen, appreciating the grandeur of its soaring towers and deep cultural roots. It was the seat of Emperor Charlemagne, the first Holy Roman Emperor known for uniting Western Christendom under his rule, crushing the Saracens and Moors, and sparking a cultural revival of art and learning known as the Carolingian Renaissance.

Over the front entrance of Aachen’s 1200-year-old town hall is Charlemagne’s motto, an inscription from the Book of Proverbs: “through me kings rule.”

Later dynasties adopted this motto as well.

Vast as Charlemagne’s military and economic power was, he acknowledged first and foremost that his authority to rule came from God. Unlike the ignorant and opportunistic political philosophers of the so-called enlightenment, who thought that the sovereign ruled solely because the people allowed him to, Charlemagne understood that all rulers are illegitimate unless God delegates His power to them. No king deserves recognition by his subjects unless he himself recognizes that he is a subject in the kingdom of heaven.

Modernity and its pestilent secularism demands that “separation of Church and State” be defended at all costs. What they fail to realize is that the two can never be separated, only one subjugated to the other. In the absence of God’s righteous headship, the State becomes the Church. This is modern America and most Western nations. It has led us to a self-destructive place.

I saw a garage door in Aachen with graffiti painted on it, depicting Charlemagne holding his famous globus cruciger (ball and cross), which represents the Church presiding over the State. Next to it was painted a hand flipping the emperor the bird. Here was a resident of Charlemagne’s own city, one of the great centers of cultural heritage on earth, so full of spite for their own patrimony that they could only react with mindless hate.

In rejecting history, the Germans have failed to learn all but its most recent lessons. Merkel’s weak and dissipated Germany will eventually fall, and its cultural treasures will be pillaged. When that day comes, they will beg the spirit of Charlemagne to return.

3. “Ut superius sic inferius.” (Hermes Trismegistus, Smagdarine Tablet)

This cryptic phrase from the esoteric Smagdarine Tablet (of dubious late antique origins) can be taken in several different ways. Translated simply, “as above, so below,” it was originally meant to express the parallels between microcosms and the macrocosm in ancient natural sciences.

Just as humans manipulate musical notes, so the planets move according to the “music of the spheres.” Just as we have our loftier body parts (heart, brain) higher up on their body, so do the heavens become loftier the higher one travels (to the primum mobile, or first mover). And so on. Basically, there is an aesthetic, logical, and moral order to everything, consistent throughout the universe.

Man, the microcosm, posed atop the spheres, the macrocosm.

The phrase has also been adapted for Christian use, given its uncanny similarity to the line in Jesus Christ’s Our Father, “thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven.” Thus did Christ place human action in the context of the Divine Will, as if to say remind us that the good we do is part of God’s master plan, and our evil is fighting it. Christian theologians like St. Augustine took the phrase even further, such as when he argued that the threefold human faculties of memory, intellect, and will were a mirror for the Holy Trinity. As above, so below.

Modern man perceives the world in a much different way. In fact, the words of the ancient Greek philosopher Protagoras summarize the modern mindset rather well: “Man is the measure of all things.” Plato and Aristotle both criticized him for this relativism, but it appears as though Protagoras’ spirit lives on. For modern man, part of taking the red pill, and piercing the modern fog, means acknowledging a higher power that orders and moves the universe.

4. “Ora et labora.” (St. Benedict of Nursia, Regula)

Amid the wreck of the old Roman Empire, a very ordinary figure did something extraordinary: he left. Benedict was a noble in the Italian city of Nursia who realized that he needed to stop running the aristocratic rat race of struggling for power with all the money-hungry merchants and petty bureaucrats in his city.

He took the ultimate red pill and realized that he could acquire something of far more value if he could just find stillness, so he journeyed far into the countryside to live by a simple set of practices known as his Rule. He was joined by many others, and soon,

Benedictine monasticism was the most widespread cultural movement in history.

Benedict's famous injunction, "work and pray," perfectly captures the necessity of stillness. Those who only work fritter their lives away serving corporate overlords and pencil-pushers while suppressing other deep, human needs. Together, work and prayer are two halves of a whole: fervent ambition to accomplish and ascend, along with prayerful recognition that this life is not all there is, and what comes after is far more important.

It is interesting that Benedict, who left the world to find peace and stillness, became the founder of a monastic order that built amazing structures, produced brilliant writings, filled positions of leadership and influence, acquired great riches, developed genius technology, and painted beautiful artwork.

Go forth and get medieval

Armed with these and other weapons of wisdom from the middle ages, you are equipped to defend yourself against modern confusion and degeneracy by having an actual worldview that is both coherent and sound.

Remember that you are not a lonely soul wandering in a wasteland; you are a created being in a vast natural order ruled by a deity. If your mind contains that fact alone, you are already more red-pilled than the vast majority of proles walking today's world.

Read More: How To Restore Civilization By Following St. Benedict's Example

Nathan Turner
Nathan is an adjunct professor of history and literature, and resident of the state of Illinois. He's recently married and has two kids. He was born red-pilled (with a real Dad and everything) and spent his entire life training as a freerunner and martial artist. Follow him on Twitter @invisibleturner.

What Men Can Learn From The Fascinating Destiny Of English Explorer William Adams

July 30, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

I have done some thrilling and exciting stuff over the years. However, it is hard to compete with the real William Adams (1564-1620), the British explorer who sailed almost the entire globe, became a samurai in Japan, and who has served as a source of inspiration for various cultural products in modern times.

In this piece I explore the destiny of Adams and how it has been depicted in Western popular culture. Furthermore, I briefly discuss some of the lessons that one can learn from his fascinating life journey. I have mainly used Giles Milton's monograph Samurai William (2002) and this academic paper as points of reference.

The perilous route to Japan

William Adams was born in Gillingham, Kent, in England and aimed to become a sailor. More specifically he studied shipbuilding, navigation, and astronomy before he joined the Royal navy. He served an apprenticeship under Nicholas Diggens, a leading shipbuilder who later secured a profitable contract from the East India Company.

Later, he took up employment with the Barbary Company, as pilot and master, before joining a Dutch voorcompagnie (pre-Dutch East India Company) voyages to the East Indies. That left Rotterdam on 27 June 1598 under the command of Jacques Mahu.

The goal was to reach the East Indies, via Cape Horn, to acquire spices and other local commodities, but things did not proceed as planned. After a series of severe setbacks in the South Atlantic, only three of the cruise's five ships made it through the Magellan Straits. These ships set course across the Pacific for Japan. However, only the Liefde made it all the way to Bungo in Kyushu, Japan, and arrived the 19 April 1600. Fortunately for Adams, he had been transferred to the Liefde and survived.

Before that the gradually decimated crew had reached Cape Verde Islands, Cape Lopez and Annabon in Africa, Mocha in South America (where many of the crew members were slaughtered), Hawaii, and the "Galapagos of the Orient", the subtropical Bonin Islands, located southeast of Japan.

The journey indeed was fascinating, if not more than Adams' experiences in Japan. About one and a half dozen crew members survived, which is only slightly more than 5% of the initial crew number of the five ships that dispatched from the isle of Texel, Holland, in 1598. Many died from dysentery, scurvy or were killed by local tribesmen (William's brother Thomas was one of them). Some stole food and were hanged or ran away on exotic islands. The voyage would become a great adventure movie.

The rise of the first Western samurai

In subsequent letters, Adams claimed that he intended to return to England where his wife Mary and two children lived, but that he and the other survivors, whose maritime know-how was valuable to the Japanese, were prohibited from leaving Japan.

This may have been an afterthought, but unhesitatingly Adams did well in the land of the rising sun. After an initial encounter with the powerful warrior Tokugawa Ieyasu, later to be shogun, he and his crew members were incarcerated. Ieyasu found Adams' accounts to be untrustworthy. However, after realizing that he had no obvious reasons to keep them locked up he released them, and those who were loyal to Adams took indirect advantage of his shipbuilding skills (he built a miniature replica of the Liefde which pleased Ieyasu). These skills, along additional knowledge in trade relationships (the fact that he spoke English, Dutch, Portugese and Japanese certainly helped), were Adams' ticket to relative local success.

Later he got married to a Japanese woman, had children, and integrated into the exotic yet cultivated society. The Japanese considered Europeans to be too uncouth, and hence Adams and other survivors had to be taught local customs and etiquette. In contemporary Japan, Adams is often called Miura Anjin (Miura Pilot), which manifests how well he was regarded. A statue has been raised in Izumiōtsu (Osaka prefecture) to praise his commemoration.

The creation of the modern Adams myth can be dated precisely to 1872. In that year an expatriate Englishman, James Walters, “discovered” tumuli, two stele, and two lanterns on a hill near Hemi. Walters claimed that these were the tombs of Adams and his Japanese wife. Also a significant share of Brits took notice and “nationalized” Adams, which made him into their own symbol for English mastery. However, for most Westerners it took another century to know of this man, at least indirectly, through James Clavell’s book Shōgun (1975) and the subsequent TV adaption.

The question is if Adams is worthy of to be held in such a high regard? More critical academic sources have emphasized that his involvement in the trade between the Dutch and Japanese was exaggerated, and samurai was first and foremost a title that certain segments of the upper classes held in these times. He was not a sword master. Moreover his navy skills were not as unique as one can think (although the shipbuilding skills were since the Japanese largely were in a lack of them during this period).

Furthermore, his dealings with the hostile Portuguese Jesuit monks who already resided there, and were not too keen to let Protestants in to say the least, were seemingly not as crucial as some might have thought. He did not die as a particularly wealthy man either, although richer than most Englishmen and Japanese, but he left a cultural legacy after himself upon dying from malaria.

As for his fortune and properties he divided them fairly equal between his two wives. Even if the destiny of Adams is partly more constructed than real, he has had a cultural impact and influence in both the West and the East. He is also a manifest of how constructive inter-cultural exchange can occur.

William Adams in popular culture

As for Japanese pop culture I do not know that much since I do not read Japanese. However, the above-mentioned novel Shōgun (1975) and the nine hour television miniseries with the same name are indeed worthwhile and interesting. Although these may partly be historically incorrect and/or mixed with the more construed Adams myth, overall they depict his life relatively accurate and fact-based.

The novel in particular offers a good insight into Japan during the early 17th century before it was isolated (Sakoku) from further Western influences until 1853.

In 2016 a video game titled Nioh was released, which main character partly hinges on Adams, but with supernatural samurai skills rather than more modest practical and theoretical knowledge as its main ingredient.

Although I only play about five hours a month with a friend who has a PS4 unit, I would like to try it some time, as it is in the same spirit as Dark Souls and Castlevania. As far as Youtube clips and generally favorable reviews go, it appears worthwhile (in smaller portions as with all video games).

The lessons to be learned

Furthermore, one can learn a couple of lessons from the historical and near-mythical Adams. First, never give up, although hardships might await you under some circumstances. An athletic physique and good stamina could also be of great service. Secondly, greater risks may come with greater rewards (sometimes). If one makes it in life one can harvest from it.

This is also linked to the fact that Adams grasped the opportunity which came upon him and used his skills to survive and prosper in a vastly different environment. That is also a lesson for masculine migrants: if you have skills to offer a host country they will often be of use, whether it is Japan, Australia, Brazil or Poland that one has in mind.

Lastly, one has to realize that leaving one's home and roots permanently, whether voluntarily or not, also comes with a two-sided situation. On one hand one will gain something new and hopefully reap the fruits of a fresh environment. It can be the case of for example job opportunities and women, as well as to obtain knowledge of the current culture.

On the other hand, one will leave one's family, friends and home country behind and cannot, for obvious reasons, maintain these relationships and cultural roots. That is why travel and circular migration often are better options in the age of globalization. Move swiftly between locations like a hyper-modern Hermes but do not cut the roots off.

Conclusion

William Adams is certainly a fascinating historical figure who is interesting to learn about, whether it be through Milton's book, academic sources, or pop cultural content. He also signifies sort of the essence of the European and Western mindset, such as to obtain valuable skills and make risks in order to find one's way in life, or to even become legendary.

Read More: 5 Things I learned After My First Trip To Japan

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

How To Display Masculine Body Language

July 30, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

In this past article, I discussed how to present a strong and masculine face. Which is to say, I taught you how to manipulate your head's body language for the purposes of making yourself appear strong, masculine, and confident.

While the head (and particularly the eyes) are the most "readable" part of your body, there's obviously a whole lot more body to deal with, and that's what this article will deal with.

The first issue that we will be dealing with with regards to the body is, of course, posture!

Posture

Posture shows and affects the attitude that you convey. Remember that body language is the sum of the parts of all the body. Think of it like this: the face shows the mood, and the body shows the intensity of the mood. Confidence starts at the face and spreads through the body

As with the face and head, you want to be tight, upright, and symmetrical. However, masculine and dominant body language with regards to the torso and limbs adds a new dimension, that of taking up space.

To put it very simply (and thus make it easy to understand and perform in your daily life), high status and confidence are reflected in an open and wide posture. And conversely, low status makes people shrink up, showing posture that is closed and prospective.

As you can see in the pictures below, posture that utilizes hunched shoulders, a drooping head, and inward chest shows weakness and a lack of commitment.

As the picture states, these pictures show the man to be nervous and unconfident

Even without seeing their heads, you can tell that these people are standing tall and proud

Throwing Your Weight Around

In the literal, not the metaphorical, sense.

Placing the weight evenly between the legs, while standing firm and upright, shows strength, confidence, and all of the masculine traits that you want to convey.

Hold your head high, chest open, and stomach in and tight. The feet and legs have to work in harmony with the torso, arms, and heads to convey a certain image. If you want to be seen as powerful, you must stand firm with your legs shoulder width apart and your chest puffed out.

Yours truly. Note the high chest and shoulder width legs

And don't think that these rules only apply when you're standing. When sitting down, the strong and confident man has his legs retain their shoulder length position, and the body is slightly leaned back and the arms are relaxed and neutral: not open, not closed.

While I hate to use the cliched animal metaphors that you so often see on hacky men's websites ("be like a wolf, brah!"), it is fitting here: Imagine a lion, does he lean forward and make himself scarce? No, he reclines and stretches out, taking up space and showing who's dominant.

Room To Breathe

A good rule of thumb to remember for strong body posture (i.e., the one thing you must remember) is to present your testicles—and yes, I'm being serious. Another way to put this rule of thumb is to ask, "Are my testicles breathing?" If you feel that your bits are being squashed together and are uncomfortable, you're not taking up enough space.

Like this, except I'd advise you to not do this naked or with that particular facial expression

So beyond that rule that most men know instinctively, what else can be done with the body?

Arms

Seeing as the "ball rule" deals with the legs, and posture deals with the torso, the arms are all that is left. Luckily, this is probably the simplest to deal with: having them open too wide makes you look open, and welcoming, where as having narrow shoulders and arms clenched before your groin makes you look weak.

The key is arm neutrality, or occasionally arm crossing should you want to convey authority. Also bear in mind that palms facing downward shows authority ("the buck stops here" sort of thing), so if you want to gesticulate to make a point, your palms face downward. Bear in mind that crossing the arms will by definition put the palms downward.

All of the information above deals with the entire body for the most part, and can be instantaneously utilized to present superior body language.

There are many other moods and mindsets that can be expressed through body language, but a cool, masculine dominance is the gold standard of body language, so why would you bother learning anything else? Your body will naturally form any other emotions needed, so just try to maintain dominant body language as much as possible, and you'll notice your life will markedly improve.

Read More: How To Present A Strong And Masculine Face

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Can Men Be Masculine Without Being Warriors?

July 31, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

As our society rots in peace along with the materialism and hedonism that comes with it, it is becoming clear that the only way to bring back true masculinity is to return to our warrior roots. Men were meant to battle for domination and conquest, and the fact that our modern society has relegated us to be useful money-making drones is what's leading to the degradation of masculinity. It is no wonder that we are all lost as to what our true purpose is in this world.

Masculinity is man's capacity to be a warrior

While there is much debate as to exactly what constitutes masculinity, I believe that it is defined primarily by men's capacity as tribal warriors just as wolves are defined by their ferocity and their propensity to hunt in packs. You simply cannot be a man without being a warrior.

Now, some will disagree and say that you don't have to be a warrior to be a masculine man. They will point to men of accomplishment in areas of money-making, creativity, and philosophy. But we should remember that being talented and great doesn't necessarily make you masculine. These are different qualities.

Some others (especially the MGTOW crowd) associate masculinity with making scientific breakthroughs and contributing to the technological advancement, bringing up examples of Newton, Nietszche, Tesla, and so on. While their profound minds are admirable and their genius is undeniable, can we really say that these men were masculine?

To take a more modern example, we all saw what happened to the scientist Matt Taylor when he was targeted by feminists over a shirt he wore: he broke down into tears. While men certainly have higher logic than women and more productive minds, I wouldn't tread too far and say that intelligence alone makes one masculine.

Masculine traits as warrior traits

Battle-hardened soldiers of Syria's Tiger Forces who's been fighting the Jihadists for years. These men won't be cucked anytime soon.

Manhood is intrinsically connected to testosterone and testosterone is what fuels us to assert our violent will against the world. If you analyze all the core traits of masculinity, you'll realize that they all correspond to traits that are both necessary attributes of warriors and cultivated through fighting as one. Those are:

- Physical strength and skills necessary for combat.
- Endurance, resilience, and the power of the will.
- Bravery and decisiveness in the face of danger.
- Stoic disposition and mental toughness.
- Discipline and austerity.
- Propensity for violence and aggression.
- The drive for dominance and power.
- Focus on a mission and a sense of purpose.
- Intelligence and cunningness.
- Honor and loyalty.

It's also no surprise that many warrior traits are related to the Dark Triad traits that women find so irresistible, which explains why serial killers seem to activate a deep-seated sexual attraction within many women. To take another recent example, a woman who was working for the FBI flew to Syria to marry an ISIS fighter she was investigating. I guess all the other clean-cut, male agents in suits she was working with didn't exude the raw and untamed masculinity of an Islamist soldier.

But even without such extreme examples, the facts are clear: women love and respect violent men who possess the warrior spirit. Just ask the wives of Vikings and Samurais if they ever thought about cheating on their husband or asking for equality.

Warriors are the backbone of a strong and healthy society

While many lament the demise of nationalism and traditional nuclear families, I would say that the disintegration of strong male groups is, by far, the greater calamity that is leading to the societal decline that we are witnessing all around us. In fact, hierarchical male order is the backbone of a strong and stable social order that allows vigorous national identity and patriarchal family formations to thrive. You can't have nationalism and nuclear families without there first being men who are warriors.

Of course, the problem is that there is no need for strong group of organized men in today's consumerist society. Our "civilization" has disintegrated male order in favor of an atomized population that is easier to exploit as economic units by the elites. Masculinity is becoming systematically obsoleted.

Being a warrior gives man a sense of purpose

Unfortunately I can’t remember nor find the the journal I’m referring to here from years ago, but the gist of the psychological study I had read showed that young European men in the military enjoyed the time they served as they were better adjusted, healthier, and formed deep social bonding with each other. They actually liked going through a routine, being told what to do, and having a sense of purpose. But once they were discharged and back home, many started to become lazy, unmotivated, and even depressed to a point of not wanting to get out of their beds.

While we use Alpha-Beta divide to (wrongfully) distinguish between masculine men and men who are emasculate and supplicating to women, we should remember that Alpha-Beta actually refers to male hierarchy (the actual antonym of alpha males would be the omega males). In the primal world, being a beta doesn’t mean that you aren’t masculine, but that you are subordinate to the alpha leader. Beta males are capable warriors in their own right and often challenge the alpha to become the new leader.

Knowing this, you have to wonder just how many “betas”—from effeminate cucks to frustrated youth full of angst—are merely men who never had a chance to be led by a strong male leader. When we don’t live in a warrior society, when we don’t have any brotherhood to belong to, we become lost and without a purpose like the European men who had just gone out of the military.

Men long to be warriors

I have a new friend who told me how much he loves the television series, Vikings. On a whim, I asked him if he wished he could live like a viking. His face brightened up and he answered with a resounding "Yeah!" And this is a shy and awkward young man who grew up under a domineering sister and without a father, a classic "beta" who barely works out and spends his free time watching anime. But in spite of it all, hidden inside his heart was his desire to be a warrior.

All men strive to become warriors whether they know it or not. They are fueled by the same testosterone that makes them desire sex. We know that boys who reach puberty want sex without ever having experienced it before as it is one of our core primal drive. The same is true for men and their desire to be warriors—it is something that is imprinted in our genes.

Why else do you think men enjoy aggressive sports and video games? Why else would men enjoy watching tribalism and violence through movies and television shows like The Expendables and Walking Dead? What other motive would push men to train in MMA, shoot guns, and join a gang or the military?

We all long to be warriors and we all enjoy the adventure, brotherhood, and the excitement that comes with it. The problem is that all we have today are surrogate activities as we no longer live in a warrior society.

Surrogate activities and compensations

An example of a modern day warrior: Level 90 Night Elf

As our society discourages and forbids our primal drives, it's no surprise to see hordes of men dedicating themselves to surrogate masculine activities to compensate for their inability to actualize their lives as warriors. And those drives are often exploited by governments and corporations for their own gain. Masculinity has become commercialized.

Think about it: what are competitive sports if not surrogate activities that simulate war? The most popular sports are the ones where two opposing group of men, the modern-day gladiators, fight for victory in a controlled battlefield. And they exist for the sole purpose of keeping men's testosterone in check by providing them an outlet to vent out their masculine energy while profiting from it.

The same can be said of other forms of entertainment. It's not by accident that men love television shows and movies that depict violence, survival, and power struggle. And the most popular video games for men are RPG's and first-person shooters where the player is a warrior in an adventure or a solider in war.

The compensatory activities also extends to other areas such as bodybuilding, money-making, picking-up women, Internet tribalism, and political struggles. They all use fragments of our warrior traits to achieve a section of our masculine needs. But they are never complete for they don't honor our core identity that is buried deep within us. Surrogate activities cannot bring us contentment.

We should open our eyes and realize that all the hyped-up, macho entertainment exists only to keep us doused. No matter how many "masculine" and "red pill" films you watch, they will not make you a man for the same reason watching a marathon of martial arts films isn't going to turn you into a Kung Fu master.

Masculine Intellectualism as just another surrogate activity

Reading about men who fight and conquer won't make you a fighter and a conquerer. Drop the damn book and create your own legacy.

It wasn't long ago that I wanted to read classic works like the Iliad, Count of Montecristo, Fight Club as well as the philosophical works of Seneca, Nietzsche, and Evola—not to mention the countless history books that recount the achievements of men. But now I find myself wondering: what the hell for? What will they add to all the works that I've already read? For example, I'm currently reading a book from the manosphere circle that is highly rated, but I find it far too trite to continue.

I used to believe that reading books, especially the timeless tomes of our forefathers, was a worthy task in cultivating our masculinity. And it is—up to a point. The problem with indulging in books is that it doesn't take long before it turns into just another surrogate activity, one that traps your ego high up in the ivory tower. It becomes an exercise of intellectual masturbation to satisfy one's own deep-seated longings: a way to escape from the modern degeneracy so that one can take refuge in words and thoughts instead of fighting in the real world in flesh and blood. It is just another way of compensating for our inability and unwillingness to move the world around us.

No book will ever compensate for lack of experience in real life. The brutal truth is that even if we spend our entire lives reading thousands of books on masculinity and the lives of great men from history, none of it will actually make us a masculine man, let alone change the society and culture. It's safe to say that one month of fighting in a brutal war will harden a man into masculinity more than decades of reading "manly" books.

We have to admit to ourselves that we read and write on the topic of masculinity as a compensatory activity because our society prohibits us from exercising our warrior spirit. I'm sure that without the life-time of social conditioning that has made us passive and weak, most men would jump at the chance to live a life of a warrior instead of just reading and writing about it just like how no healthy man would prefer watching porn over real sex. And that's exactly what "masculine" literatures are: porn for men who thirst for a masculine existence.

We have been robbed of our way of life

It pains me that I didn't grow up in a warrior culture like these boys.

Much is said about how men today are turning into low-T betas and cucks, but why should they be any different? What motivates them to keep their masculinity sharp? The men of today's West live in infinitely peaceful conditions and live in a culture that values safety over bravery. And since our society has no need for warriors (save for the professionals who will fight like dogs for the elites), they have absolutely no incentive to be masculine except when it's time to pretend being tough for ego-validation.

For today's technology-addicted, materialistic, and "progressive" men, maintaining masculinity is like still wearing a coat when it is summer. They have no use for masculinity and they don't want to make the effort to cultivate it. The women, in turn, have no reason to respect men and behave feminine, which explains why our society is becoming more androgynized with each passing day.

And what about men who still value their masculinity? What serious options do we have? There are almost none. We have been robbed of our lives as we've been trained from childhood to serve a matriarchal system with "tolerance" and "equality" as our religion. The society doesn't want us to be men; it wants us to become mere cogs for its machines. It wants us to be tied down to some soul-sucking and meaningless jobs.

I personally lament the fact that I never got to experience being a warrior in my youth. And what other meaningful activity should I be pursuing in my short life? I'm not interested in writing endlessly to vent out my repressed masculine drive; I'm not interested in making money or chasing “success” to compensate for emasculation; I don’t want to develop blabbering skills to attract women; I don’t want to continue pissing my life away on the Internet; and I certainly won’t be wasting any more of my time with entertainment and books.

My only real opportunity to be a warrior is to join the armed forces of a country I have no love for (Canada) just to be shipped out to fight people whom I have nothing against. And that is pretty much the choice of all men in the West: your only outlet to be a true warrior is to be a pawn for the state, risking your life in wars to benefit the globalists.

Conclusion

So, to answer the question: Can men be masculine without being warriors? The answer is yes and no. I suppose if you engage in just the right surrogate activities, train aggressively like a fighter, and put yourself through many life experiences that challenge your mind and body, you could simulate being a warrior and develop the masculine traits listed above. But ultimately, it will not be authentic and men as a whole (on average) will continue to be stripped of their masculinity.

Warrior is the only way for a man to be and all our social problems related to masculinity can be attributed to the decline of warrior culture. Any and all talk of defeating feminism and restoring masculine order is futile until we are willing to become warriors again.

Read Next: 10 Masculine Virtues That Went To The Grave With Our Grandfathers

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

4 Lessons From Mankind’s Very First Shit Test

July 31, 2017 | by Jonathan Castle | Link | Original Link

Understanding shit tests is important. Real important. Not just for navigating your relationships with women, but also for understanding, defining and defending yourself.

Don’t believe me? Then why did God chronicle the world’s first shit-test in chapter 3 of Genesis, immediately after the trifling matter of the Creation of Heaven and Earth? Before any discussion about, say, the purpose of life, the nature of God or the path to freedom, God sits us down and says, “Okay men, this is how it is. Listen up.”

And yet here we are, eleventy bazillion years later having to relearn the lessons of this primordial story of man vs. woman. Be of good cheer though. The story is short and the lessons are vivid.

The first shit test

Let’s set the stage:

The serpent was the shrewdest of all the wild animals the Lord God had made. One day he asked the woman, “Did God really say you must not eat the fruit from any of the trees in the garden?”

“Of course we may eat fruit from the trees in the garden,” the woman replied. “It’s only the fruit from the tree in the middle of the garden that we are not allowed to eat. God said, ‘You must not eat it or even touch it; if you do, you will die.’”

“You won’t die!” the serpent replied to the woman. “God knows that your eyes will be opened as soon as you eat it, and you will be like God, knowing both good and evil.”

The woman was convinced. She saw that the tree was beautiful and its fruit looked delicious, and she wanted the wisdom it would give her. So she took some of the fruit and ate it. Then she gave some to her husband, who was with her, and he ate it, too. At that moment their eyes were opened, and they suddenly felt shame at their nakedness. Genesis 3, NLT

So what is the shit test? Simply this: Should Adam take the fruit to please Eve and maintain his relationship with her? Or should he tell her, 'Shut up. Walk away from the talking snake and go back to the tent. I want to be fruitful with you.'

Lesson #1 – this crap isn't new

God's response to Eve's disobedient shit-test is rather enlightening:

"And you will desire to control your husband, but he will rule over you."

In other words, this tension, this conflict between men and women that we deal with constantly goes back to the very beginning. First-wave feminists didn't create it. Second or third-wave feminists didn't create it either. All they're doing is coming together collectively to do what they can't do individually – control men.

Feminists will tell you that feminism is all about equality. 'Equality' is a lie. As it ever was, their desire as women is to rule over you. Period.

Now fast-forward a couple thousand – or million – years. Because women haven't changed, the same admonition is given:

"…you wives must accept the authority of your husbands. For instance, Sarah obeyed her husband, Abraham, and called him her master. You are her daughters when you do what is right without fear of what your husbands might do." 1 Peter 3

Now, women wouldn't be told to submit to men if they weren't capable of it. That would just be mean. But even well-meaning women quite naturally fear what their man would do with his authority if she actually did submit to him. Letting go, trusting another human being, is hard. Humans mostly suck. I get it. And feminism is always there to stir this fear and distrust.

Managing this age-old conflict requires us to acknowledge their fears and to manifest a solid, trustworthy – if playfully unpredictable – masculinity.

Lesson #2 – Be active not passive

Adam's punishment is:

"Since you listened to your wife and ate from the tree whose fruit I commanded you not to eat, the ground is cursed because of you. All your life you will struggle to scratch a living from it."

Did you catch that? The cause of Adam's transgression was that he 'listened to his wife' and followed her into disobedience. Happy wife, happy life my ass!

He should have grabbed the nearest shovel and chopped the serpent's head off before admonishing his wife for her covetousness – this despite their lavish habitation! Instead Adam passively sat there as the scene unfolded.

The lesson is simple. Be active. Be engaged. And actually care about your woman. Sure, many women will call you a bully and say you're too controlling. That's fine. If you're in it for an actual relationship, next her. This one can deal with the 'serpents of life' on her own.

You can't fool me, Mister!

Lesson #3 – Women are gullible and covetous

Women have exquisite feminine virtues based on openness and receptivity that men rightly treasure when we can find it. Frankly, when we see it, it's impossibly attractive and intoxicating. But there's a flip side to feminine virtue.

When you're open and receptive, you're also more easily fooled.

And it was not Adam who was deceived by Satan. The woman was deceived, and sin was the result.

And when your nature is to attract and receive, you are also more prone to materialism and covetousness as you search for validation in all the wrong places.

She saw that the tree was beautiful….and she wanted…

This is one reason – there are others – that men should lead women in relationships. It's not to lord over them abusively or for self-gain. It's to provide women a safe space to express and share their feminine nature with us without being taken advantage of.

Conversely, when women call the shots in a relationships, it's inherently exhausting and ultimately unsatisfying for both of you. Her covetousness and gullibility will combine to dominate the purpose of the union. She will see and want and be sold…. a bigger house… a bigger diamond…. a newer car… another expensive vacation… a fairy-tale wedding. You know the drill.

In the end, her covetousness and gullibility will become your own. And the things that control her will become your masters.

Who’s the boss?

Lesson #4 – Lead your woman, or else..

Let’s game this out. There’s a period of time when Eve has taken the fruit but Adam hasn’t. At this point, Adam has two choices . He can follow Eve – submitting to her – or follow God. In the end of course, he submits to Eve.

But why did he chose Eve over God knowing it was wrong? Because he was afraid of losing his relationship with her which he treasured, a relationship marked by unquestioned trust and pure physical and emotional intimacy. Sounds good right?

In the end though – and this is the lesson for us – by selling out his own integrity and his call to leadership, he ended up losing the very relationship he sought to protect. In its place, he received a new relationship with Eve marked by distrust, conflict and competition.

Likewise, when we abdicate leadership, when we sell out our own integrity, we lose self-respect first, and then in turn, her respect. And then the relationship either ends, or worse, it lingers in blue-pill hell. There is simply no acceptable alternative to men leading relationships.

Conclusion

So there it is. Nothing new is under the sun. Women are the same as they’ve ever been. And the tension between us is as old as humanity – baked into the heart of every man and woman.

So what do we do? Well, what did Adam do? He picked himself up after that colossal shit-test failure to end all shit-test failures and took the red pill.

Then the man—Adam—named his wife Eve, because she would be the mother of all who live.

In other words, he takes his authority back and moves forward the best he can, perhaps having learned a little along the way. Oh, and he take Eve back to the tent. And she follows.

Read More: The 4 Important Shit Tests Rocky Balboa Passed To Win Adrian

Jonathan Castle
Jonathan swims against the current, deep under the surface of corporate America. A maverick by nature, he instinctively avoids herds - often to his detriment.

The Story Of How Female Viagra Got Approved To Fight “Sexism”

July 31, 2017 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

On August 18, 2015 the FDA approved the first treatment for “sexual desire disorder”. A pill named Addyi was approved to treat “acquired, generalized hypoactive sexual desire disorder (HSDD) in premenopausal women”. Prior to that drug, there were no FDA-approved treatments for females with a low sex drive.

This seems like a good deal, right? Finally, females have their version of viagra. She’s not in the mood? Let’s give her a pill and she will be DTF.

Give her a pill and she'll get in the mood

From the start of the millennia, Big Pharma has invested many resources trying to develop a cure for low female libido. As we know, this does not come from actually caring about people's' well-being, but from a greedier outlook. If Big Pharma can get females hooked up on better sex life, it will provide a new cash flow that will last decades (or more). Also, if you think about it – having a good sex life might also relieve stress, decrees boredom and reduce divorce rates. Looks like a win-win.

One cannot have a drug without naming a disease. The solution was to "identify" it as a disorder. DSM-IV-TR (Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders) named in 2000 "Sexual and Gender Identity Disorders" as HSDD (Hypoactive sexual desire disorder). This means that premature ejaculation, paraphilia (fetishism), analloerotic (having no sexual interests in other persons) and lack of sexual desire are in that same category.

Now that the "disorder" was identified, the public was "educated" that low sex drive needs to be tracked and monitored.

“I’m not in the mood. Try another day”

Mala fides?

After a few years in the lab it seems that there was some light at the end of a tunnel. Boehringer Ingelheim, a German drug company, was able to synthesize a new anti-depressant named Flibanserin. The company noted that some of the participants reported increase of their sexual drive. Looks like a revised Viagra story. The clinical trial was based on pre-menopausal females – young females are not yet reproductively useless.

The trial divided the subjects into 2 random groups. Every day, each subject was asked to rate their sex drive on a 4-point scale (0 – no desire, 3- intense desire). The trial found out that there was no distinctive difference between the groups.

Furthermore, it seems that by taking Flibanserin, there were major side effects: dizziness, sleepiness, and nausea. Based on those, the FDA rejected the new drug based on risk-benefit as well as failure to demonstrate a statistical effect on the sexual desire and overly restrictive entry criteria for the two Phase 3 trials. The message was received and Boehringer Ingelheim decided not to throw good money after bad one.

Throwing bad money after good money is not a calculated step

One man's garbage is another man's gold. A new pharma company named Sprout Pharmaceuticals thought that they can win the gold. Actually, from the looks of it, the founders thought exactly that. They approached Boehringer Ingelheim and bought the rights to Flibanserin, after raising 20M$. Sprout was headed by Cindy and Robert Whitehead who both had extensive experience in the pharma business.

Cindy and Robert Whitehead

They looked up the FDA comments and decided to change tactic. Instead of a daily report, it became a 4-week report (meaning that the subjects reported every week about the past four weeks). That smelled bad – we all know that the longer one waits with reporting subjective feelings (and desire is completely subjective), the more prone to error one is. The company re-submitted the drug for the FDA in 2013. The FDA rejected it again based on the same risk/benefit ratio.

What do you do when the government refuses to give you a license to print money? You lobby and use the classic straw-man – feminism. The company established advocacy group called Even the Score in D.C. and started using feminist language to shame the establishment and call the FDA "sexist". They went after congresswomen and got them to write letters to the FDA. They went as far as running a campaign. Here is one of the commercials:

The pressure worked, but was noticed even by BuzzFeed, which we all know is not a harsh critic of liberal/feminist policies. In 2015 the FDA approved the drug for commercial use, even though nothing basically changed. One can read the pressure into the release:

> The FDA has recognized for some time the challenges involved in developing treatments for female sexual dysfunction.

Since feminists like to beat the drum on equality, it is important to note that there is still no treatment for men:

> Prior to Addyi's approval, there were no FDA-approved treatments for sexual desire disorders in men or women.

Downhill and fast

Right after the approval, Sprout Pharmaceuticals was acquired by Valeant Pharmaceuticals for a whopping 1B$. Valeant actually thought they had a good deal going for them. However, as Murphy's Law states: "Anything that can go wrong will go wrong." – so did the "female Viagra".

Valeant had a practice of buying drugs and then driving their price up. That was all good, until the government noticed. It was on October 2015. To make matters worse, Valeant doubled the price of Addyi to $800. Addyi also faced the problem of distribution, as Valeant chose a company named Philidor, which went out of business shortly.

Yes. It was that fast

Sprout shareholders, angered by Valeant practice, reached out to Valeant management and demanded explanations. The height of this was a complaint filed last November that is still settled in court. The 2016 sales were poor – about $10M globally. The comparison to viagra is not flattering – it sold $788M on its first year on the market. Valeant is now bleeding money, and its main shareholder sold out on March this year at a reported loss of $2.8B.

Conclusion

Yes. I got a Billion dollars and all I had to do is manipulate the government

This is a story of greed and abuse of power. It shows how the state can be easily manipulated using “sexist shaming” tactics. Also, the only people coming on top are Sprout Pharmaceuticals shareholders, headed by the founders who had their pockets filled and just moved on. It was almost a “hit and and run” corporate scheme. Everyone else connected to the “pink Viagra” paid a heavy price. This was also a clear case in which feminism was nothing more than a vessel for big money. Who cares about health, when big money is on the line?

From a red-pill perspective, we know that a woman sexual desire is a fluid and fickle phenomenon. Not everything can be repaired by drugs and chemistry. Life is more than measurable quantities. In any case, we are all waiting to see if and when an actual “women’s Viagra” will be on the market – how many women will actually use it. Women would rather not thwart their hypergamious nature than to have a sexually satisfying relationship with a beta.

Read Next: The Anti-Feminism Wisdom Of The Bible

Dawn Pine
Dawn Pine (aka TheMaleBrain) is an Israeli 40+ divorced father of 2, former casualty of the blue-pill. Since he has taken the red pill his hobbies are: working out, writing, mentoring, harem management and self improvement.

Seduce The World With The Red Pill Gospel Or Be Destroyed

July 31, 2017 | by Amator Crucis | Link | Original Link

I claim to be a leader of men, who wages war against evil without cessation and without mercy. I also claim to be a protector of the weak who never recoils before the enemy.

Some have groaned and complained about these unrealistic, self-aggrandizing claims. Yet, I assure you, my rhetoric is purposefully and unashamedly grandiose. My prose is well calculated. There is method to my madness. Allow me to explain.

In the past couple of years, I have violently sauntered upon an incredibly severe truth – facts, reason and logic are not as important as I thought they were. Emotions trump reason, always. Why? Because reason can rationalize and justify, but emotion motivates.

Scott Adams, a philosopher and expert on persuasion has helped shape these views, and this article builds on many of his brilliant ideas. Here, I stand on the shoulders of this intellectual giant (and others).

Reason and logic are masculine

While reason, common-sense and logic are the social capital that men have used to drive civilization forward, to bring us to the moon, and to cure all sorts of ailments and diseases, they are ineffective when used to communicate to the general masses, and those of lower intelligence.

This is especially the case when speaking to women. Dr. Jordan Peterson has surgically extrapolated the consequences our historic gender roles have had on our political values, and how we view reality. Where men have pushed each other to explore, to produce, to invent, to protect and to build, women were tasked with distributing resources throughout the “in-group”. As such, for the female mind, equality and fairness trump conscientious virtues associated with male production (that are far more fact reliant).

Fairness and equality are emotionally driven, yet male endeavors of production and gathering of resources require a hard realism. Our male ancestors needed to fend off vicious predators to obtain resources. They needed to climb, to lift and to strategize to protect their women and children from the elements and barbaric armies. These endeavors are not emotionally compelled. They depend on intelligence, reason and pragmatism.

Why President Trump is a monster to the Left

For these reasons, many women on the left, and their effeminate beta-male orbiters, view President Trump so differently than masculine men. Where masculine men (like readers of this blog) see a great builder, a brilliant persuader and a man motivated by pragmatic common-sense (i.e. build a wall to keep illegal migrants out), the feminine Left sees him as a monster who endangers their ability to redistribute resources to those who are “vulnerable” and “oppressed.”

To evangelize the left and bring it out of its collective insanity, we will need to adopt this emotionally oriented message. That is the only way we reach the hearts and minds of these equality driven, culturally suicidal modern women.

Let me be clear. We will remain staunch and steadfast in our views. But our messaging will have to change and evolve, if we are to survive the impending feminist dark ages, and continue to build this movement.

Our enemies are using nukes while we use swords

For while we fumble in the manosphere with facts and figures, using the masculine virtues of reason and logic, our enemies in the Social Justice radical left along with their Alphabet Soup Nazi allies (LGBTQRSTUV etc..) deploy methods that are far superior – they appeal to the masses' emotions and feelings, even if those appeals are devoid of truth and reality. And the Left eats it with the same vigor as solid game being delivered upon a young woman with 'Daddy Issues.'

These truths have also been expounded by veterans of the game, albeit in a different context. Too often, us men, especially those with above average IQ's, employ reason and logic, so that we are made impotent, unable to communicate and speak an emotional, less intelligent language that women understand and so desperately crave.

In this feminized epoch of history (perhaps the first ever), where many men have adopted a feminine-centric fairness-based outlook, we will need to re-orient our powers of seduction to seduce the masses into adopting our political views. Like 'game,' political seduction will need to be an emotionally driven pursuit. We will need to taunt and tease our ideas into the collective zeitgeist and slowly and vigorously thrust and penetrate our dogma into the feminine sphere, so that our superior seed of survival and self-preservation will bear us a new more masculine, sane political progeny.

Where once we relied on moral, pragmatic arguments, we will need to evolve them into emotionally based views that appeal to fairness and equality.

Example 1 – Abortion should be illegal

Let us examine how this would play out in a pro-life/anti-abortion argument:

While I, and many here would condemn abortion for its moral depravity, and for the hard reality that it destroys demographic continuity and eliminates a woman's sense of self-responsibility, an emotional/fairness based argument spoken to a leftist would look like this: Why is it fair for you to kill fetuses who would develop into human beings, while you yourself were able to survive such a predicament and become a human being?

Example 2 – The West should avoid importing mass amounts of "refugees"

Another example, relates to mass migration of foreign hordes. The manosphere argument looks like this: it is wrong to import mass amounts of people with inferior values than us, since they will be unable to integrate with the rest of society, and cause social chaos (Exhibit A – Western Europe). This makes sense for moral and common-sensical reasons.

An emotional/fairness based argument looks like this: allowing mass migration is not fair to working class people, who will have to bear the brunt of the ill-effects of these migration patterns.

If the left counters with their relativistic nonsense, and claim that these migrants will not be a strain on social resources, but a benefit (since "diversity is our strength"), then the alternative argument would be: importing migrants en masse is unfair since it is exploitative and predatory. We Westerner's should stop bombing their homelands and displacing them, sending them onto dangerous journeys where they put themselves at severe risk of death. It's not fair to these developing countries that we then pluck out their young men and women, which causes major demographic imbalances for them.

These arguments are not morally, or pragmatically oriented. They are inferior since they are driven by fairness and equality, yet the conclusion is the same – abortion should be illegal/foreign migrants should not be imported en masse to the West. In order to evangelize and spread the red pill gospel, we will need to start appealing to the left's emotions.

Know your audience

Back to my bio, I write these things because they are meant to invigorate and to inspire you – my fellow dissidents – so that together, we can reclaim Western nations. My prose changes according to the audience that I am addressing.

On our quest to reclaim Western lands then, we will need to win the hearts and minds of the masses, by speaking their language, by appealing to their emotions and their sense of fairness and equality. We will need to change our prose accordingly. While foreign hordes are knocking at our gates, our skills of seduction can very well save our societies.

For us to survive, we must seduce, charm, manipulate, and enchant the female voter.

Only then can we lift our movement from the underground, into the mainstream, where we will achieve great victories for Christendom, for freedom and for truth. We will protect our women, we will defend our brethren, and we will defeat the Globalist enemies who torment us like demons.

Read More: US Government Goes Full Retard And Backs War Draft For Women

Amator Crucis
Amator Crucis is a strong defender of Christendom, of freedom and of truth. A leader of men. A protector of the weak. He never recoils before the enemy. He makes war against evil without cessation and without mercy. Write to him at Enlarge his war-chest by becoming his benefactor here.

What I've Learned About Women From My Long-Term Relationships

August 1, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'd like to share some things I've learned about women from the relationships I've had. A lot of that experience comes from Eastern European girls, who are more feminine than American girls, but I believe the true nature of women is the same no matter where you go, lurking underneath regardless of outward presentation and behavior.

1. They lie a lot

Men assert their interests through logic, dominance, and physical strength. Women assert their interests through beauty, guile, and deception. A girl has self-interest in a relationship that may not overlap with yours, and will use her strengths to maintain that interest. Lying is one of the ways she steers the relationship into her desired destination, and this is often done unconsciously to the point where she may actually believe the lies she is telling you.

Girls who are more moral or “good” compared to others can still lie by omission. Because they feel some guilt with bold face lies, they instead craft narratives that leave out damaging facts which may cause her to lose power or standing in the relationship. Lying by omission requires a careful editor within their minds that are meticulous about removing details that can cause problems, especially in their encounters with other men.

For example, imagine a a girl asking her man what he did during the day. He replies, “I ran into a girl I knew today and we had a cup of tea.” He was walking home from work, suddenly recognized a girl he went to college with, popped into a cafe to talk about old friends for twenty minutes, and then gave her a handshake goodbye without any suggestive touching or flirting.

Now imagine a man asking a girl the same question. She replies, “I ran into a guy I knew today and we had a cup of tea.” The event happened in the same way as the man, right? Wrong. What actually happened was an old flame contacted her on Facebook, they exchanged several dozen suggestive messages that included kiss emoticons, he asked her to meet at a specific time in front of a cafe, they went inside and talked for two hours, their legs touched underneath the table, they reminisced about a past drunken hookup, they went for a walk to a nearby lake where more incidental touching happened, and then finally they said goodbye with the guy failing to get a lip kiss and having to settle for a playful grab of her ass.

What she told her boyfriend about the event was not a lie in her mind, but he thinks the event happened in the same way if he recounted it to her. As you can see, asking a girl to narrate an event will not get you close to the truth, because the truth would damage her standing in the relationship. The truth can only be uncovered after asking specific questions.

- How exactly do you know this guy?
- Did you hook up with him in the past?
- How long were you at the cafe?
- Did he try to touch you?
- Where did you go after the cafe?
- What exactly did you talk about?
- How did he say goodbye to you?

This is exhausting for you to perform, but may be prudent if you are suspicious about a certain encounter. If she hesitates at an answer, you are witnessing her editing mechanism at work, and can assume she has gone from lying by omission to outright lying.

2. They’re time vampires

The late comic Patrice O' Neal, who dropped reams of red pill relationship advice on the Black Philip Show, called women "time vampires." He described how for men, the actual sex act is the most pleasurable part of being with a woman, but for a woman, merely having a man spend time on them is the sex. They like being taken out, doted on, entertained, and so on. This explains why they will go on dates with men they don't even like, because the act of going out and being "hunted" by a man is so extremely validating.

Men just want sex, a bit of intimacy, a companion to eat or watch movies with, and space. Women want sex, cuddling, and endless hours of conversation about nothing important. She wants her man to be a problem solver, psychologist, warrior, and punching bag all in one, and even if you satisfy those needs, she will always want more, because it's in her nature to keep extracting value.

For whatever reason, a woman finds it impossible to be alone. They'll spend time with someone they hate, or who they are intensely jealous of, than be alone. A woman rather have a gaggle of gay friends, and hear them constantly talk about butt sex, then watch documentaries or read old books. Their primary fear in life is being alone, something that many men actually desire. A man would not spend time with someone else he dislikes from fear of being alone, because it's during his alone time that he can recharge his batteries and process his experiences.

When a girl identifies you as a romantic boyfriend, what she really has found is a "time friend," someone who can now spend dozens of hours a week with her, just so she doesn't have to be with her own mind. For men who do value their alone time, this causes the bulk of relationship conflicts, but since pussy feels so good, we continue making the sacrifice, as we have been doing for millennia.

3. They have nothing going on in their lives

Waiting in line for a little cupcake

Time vampires need other people's time because they have nothing going on in their own lives. Men have peculiar interests and hobbies that can occupy them endlessly. I've gone days without human contact while working on a particular book project or web site, and didn't feel particularly pained.

Women don't have hobbies or interests that are not external projections of how they wish to see themselves. Their primary life interest is men, because only men allow them to construct an image to others of who they want to be seen as: a good girlfriend, a girl in love, a girl who another man greatly desires, a sexy woman, an honorable woman, and so on. The man is a needed accessory in this manipulation, which is why it's so common for a girl to dive into a long-term relationship, and profess her love for a man, only to cheat on him from the weakest of impulses. The relationship merely serves as validation of how she wants to be seen, not who she really is. The gap between who she wants to be and who she actually is gets taken care of by her advanced rationalization mechanism that prevents her from accepting she is rather clueless and makes grievous mistakes.

It's her relationships with men that give her definition to her life, because outside of it, she has nothing but Facebook news feeds, Instagram, pop trends, a mind-numbing job, and friends who mainly talk about other men, gossip, text messaging, and feminine hygiene. Besides work, which she pursues partly to have more leverage in her relationships with men by not needing their money (compared to many men who actually enjoy their jobs), she has no identity that she can call her own, no interests to ground her, no passions that are unrelated to men and being seen as attractive by them.

Loading...

The above is a nice way of saying the following: if women were judged by how they judge men, they'd be losers. Put a dick on just about any woman you know and watch her instantly transform into a loser, one who is addicted to social media, overpriced restaurants, toxic entertainment, and endless validation from strangers. The biggest male loser is as accomplished, talented, and skilled as the biggest female "winner," and the only reason very few girls are seen as losers is because they have a pussy, and just about all pussies feel good, regardless of who it's attached to.

4. They are unable to perceive their own hypocrisy

Women will hold you to a standard, at the threat of dumping you if you break it, when she herself is not holding that standard. They do the very things they wouldn't want you doing, and rationalize it by saying that what she's doing is actually different, when in all likelihood it's even worse. They remember every thing you said, even from years ago, but can't see a behavior they did just last week that contradicts her standards for you.

Women have no objective standard or morality, and thus no way to identify if they are right or wrong about anything. Instead, they use pure emotion to guide their behavior. If they feel good then it must be just. If they feel bad then it must not be. Since emotions can twist the perception of any event, she will simply do what she wants to do and find an emotional path or false strain of logic to convince her it was right.

The most amazing behavior I've seen in women is denying something that you caught them doing. You can show them evidence, right to their face, and they will deny it, and then find a way to blame you for it. I have been warned about this before, but was skeptical until I experienced myself. She is such an unreliable "witness" to her own behavior that there may be no point to ever getting an explanation from her about anything. If you don't know the facts about something, and need her side of the story to get the facts, you'll never get the facts.

5. It takes a village to keep a woman monogamous

I don’t care how much of an alpha male you are, or how tight your game is, but if you are the only positive influence in your girlfriend or wife’s life, and everything else around her is pushing her to feed her primal need of pleasure, fun, and higher status men, you will get burned. You will not provide an “oasis” of tradition and monogamy if everything else is programming her for feminism and promiscuity. You may be able to keep it together for a few months, a few years, and maybe even a decade, but eventually it will collapse.

I’ve learned that having game is only half of the component to maintaining a healthy relationship. The other half is having her in an environment that tells hers to “cherish your man, be faithful, have children.” Otherwise you will lose. We’re all products of our environment, whether we want to admit it or not, but this impacts women even more because they operate on the consensus of others.

If everyone started jumping off a bridge tomorrow, she would too, because it’s the social proof which convinces her that it’s an activity she would feel good doing. On the other hand, men operate on hierarchy, and we only follow the top dog. If everyone is jumping off the bridge, but our leader doesn’t, we do not jump off the bridge. A man will not follow a crowd of weak men because they are numerous, unlike a woman, who thinks that participating with the majority will make her feel good by lowering her chance of being rejected or ostracized from a group.

For one of my relationships, I tried to create a serene bubble of patriarchy and goodness, and it worked for a while, but eventually I lost out to Facebook, her promiscuous friends, her enabling relatives, and to the degenerate majority. By dating one girl, you date the world around her, and if that world is sick, a negative outcome is inevitable.

6. Red flags are red for a reason

If a girl has done what you consider a red flag, you know she will not be suitable for a long-term relationship. But when you really like a girl, and emotion starts to cloud your logic, you find a way to transform a red flag into a yellow flag. You ignore the advice of your friends, ignore your own instinct, and start looking for insignificant green flags as counterweights to justify the relationship until it all falls apart.

A woman's actions do not lie. I repeat: a woman's actions do not lie. Her words are an unreliable witness and must be ignored. The way she acts and behaves is who she is, not what she says. If her actions tell you she's not quality material, don't make her a wife. The problem is that men get so caught up in a girl's beauty and pussy that they actively try to turn the ho or feminist into a housewife.

I can now see the futility in asking a girl how many partners she has been with. You won't ever get the truth. A girl has the most incentive to lie about this, along with other features of her past, so look at her actions instead. How comfortable with sex is she? How flirtatious was she with you in the beginning? How slutty are her friends? From these observations, you will be able to surmise a number, even if she tries to lie about her actions by playing hard-to-get with you specifically. If a girl couldn't resist your game, she also can't resist the game of many other men.

Conclusion

When it comes to relationships, my standards are impossibly high, and I will be the first to admit that, but it's based on the logic of modern relationships and the fact that I don't want to experience a divorce like my parents did. If a woman marries the wrong man, divorce is easy for her. She gets the children, house, monthly payments, and community support for being so brave. If a man marries the wrong woman, his life is ruined. He gets depression, destitution, suicidal thoughts, and children that are programmed to hate him.

Who has to be more careful about any decision to enter a long-term relationship that may result in children?

I have high relationship standards because the stakes are high, so I will use my knowledge of the true nature of women, which I've spelled out here, and then use logic to determine which woman may be the mother of my children. If I ignore that true nature, I may enjoy bliss for maybe a few years (if I'm lucky) until the hammer comes down on me, and I'm left in a miserable position compared to an ex who is galloping away with my property and children. I'm at the point in my life where I wouldn't mind having children, but I am also a man who can accept being alone. The latter is surely a better option than being a victim to something I could have predicted would happen.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: The Dangers Of Romantic Love

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Our Second T-Shirt Has Arrived

August 1, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm proud to announce that we've added a second t-shirt to Red Kings Shop. It features my huge head printed on a high-quality 100% cotton black Los Angeles Apparel branded shirt that is made in the USA.

Just like with the official ROK shirt that we launched a couple months ago, you will experience these benefits:

- Testosterone increase of 900% (insanely more than what Kratom provides)*
- Induce mental breakdown of any liberal who sees your shirt*
- Rapid 9-inch elongation of your penis (doubled my size)*
- Immediate 120-pound gain in your bench press*
- More ravenous attention from beautiful women of suitable breeding stock*
- Reduction of body fat by at least 10%*

* The above claims have not been independently verified, and may be an attempt by Roosh to sell more shirts

If you're enjoying the articles on ROK and want to support our operation, visit Red Kings Shop and buy your shirt today. If you didn't get a chance to buy our first shirt, you can buy them both and save on shipping. Your shirt(s) will be shipped out within one week from when you place your order. As always, your support is much appreciated.

Click here to visit Red Kings Shop.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Justin Trudeau Proves That You Can Still Act Homosexual Even If Your Dad Was An Alpha Male

August 1, 2017 | by Eusebius Erasmus | Link | Original Link

By now, every Canadian is aware of Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's $10.5 million cheque to Omar Khadr, a convicted Canadian terrorist. Khadr, who manufactured roadside bombs for al-Qaeda, and murdered an American soldier, pled guilty to terrorism-related charges in 2002, and was interned in Guantanamo Bay for a decade. Although Khadr's Constitutional Rights were violated during his tenure, even wrongfully-convicted criminals do not receive so sizeable a settlement.

How to become a multi-millionaire in Trudeau's Canada? Be a convicted terrorist with a unibrow.

The good news is that Canadians are annoyed: 71% of Canadians, including 61% of Liberal supporters, are against Trudeau's largesse towards Khadr. The fact that the liberal government chose to settle, instead of going to trial, also raises uncomfortable questions.

Yet none of this is surprising. We are, after all, talking about Justin Trudeau, a man who gleefully exposes his children to gay pride parades, while wearing virtue-signalling 'Eid Mubarak' socks. Trudeau's SJW degeneracy is nothing new, and has been well-covered in this outlet.

Justin Trudeau flirting with some dude

Justin's Dad: Pure Alpha Male

What is surprising is this: Justin's father, Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau, was the definition of alpha. Pierre's response to terrorism was to invoke the War Measures Act, implementing martial law across Canada in 1970. When a CBC journalist was foolish enough to question the decision, Trudeau responded in a thoroughly masculine manner:

Indeed, Trudeau the senior seemed phased by little. When confronted by rioting Quebec separatists, while campaigning in 1968, Trudeau rejected his aides' pleas to take cover, and publicly faced the rioters.

Pierre Trudeau's background is also impressive: he attained a world-class education, attending Harvard, Sciences Po, and the London School of Economics.

His game was air tight. When Trudeau was first elected Prime Minister, aged 49, the press described him as a 'swinging young bachelor.' He dated the much younger Barbra Streisand, and in 1971, married 22-year-old Margaret Sinclair, whom he first met when she was 18. When he later divorced Margaret, he returned to his playboy ways: Allan Gotlieb, the Canadian ambassador to America, complained that Trudeau once brought three girlfriends to a dinner.

So how did such an alpha father engender such a shriveled excuse for a son? There is a simple explanation: leftist ideology.

Pierre's Degenerate Leftism

While I respect Pierre Trudeau's hard work, style, and intelligence, I deplore his leftist politics, which started early; when Trudeau was at Harvard, he wrote his dissertation on Marxism, and later fell under socialist Harold Laski's influence in London.

As Canada's Minister of Justice, he liberalized divorce laws and legalized abortion. During his second tenure as Prime Minister, he alienated resource-rich Western Canada with his National Energy Policy, a centrally-planned (i.e. 'socialist') program to dispel so-called affordable energy across the country. Most disturbingly, perhaps, he was responsible for the widespread adoption and promotion of multiculturalism, a policy which has wreaked havoc on true Canadian values.

Of course, such corrupt ideas politically translate into bad personal choices. According to The Globe and Mail's Margaret Wente, Pierre Trudeau enjoyed women who were 'young, gorgeous, lively, artistic, left-wing and a bit flaky.' While the first four of these attributes are admirable, the latter two are certainly not, and Trudeau made the unfortunate decision to marry a slut.

Justin Trudeau's mom: a whore who enjoyed clubbing

Margaret Trudeau, the woman who made Justin Trudeau a feminist, was a terrible wife to Justin's father. While Pierre was busy crafting policy, Margaret was bored, and entertained herself by going out clubbing, sleeping with random men, and snorting cocaine. For her sixth wedding anniversary, Margaret 'partied' with Mick Jagger in the back of his limousine, and, later in her life, expressed regret that she hadn't had sex with every Rolling Stone band member.

The Prime Minister's wife herself admitted to affairs with Lou Rawls, Tom Sullivan, and Jack Nicholson in her autobiography, and some even allege that she had sex with Fidel Castro and Ted Kennedy. In addition to these adulterous liaisons, she abused cocaine and other drugs.

Is it truly shocking that this woman is mother to a cuckolded Prime Minister? Pierre Trudeau, as alpha as he was, left his son's rearing in the hands of an incapable and unstable woman.

A Cautionary Tale

The cuckolded Prime Minister of Canada

Although this is purely speculative, imagine if Trudeau senior had been more conservative and traditional: he would have chosen a pure girl to marry, or at least would have kept Margaret in her place. He would have been more active in young Justin's education, and we would have been spared a SJW feminist Prime Minister today.

I have heard that towards the end of his life, Pierre Trudeau returned to his Catholic faith, and attended mass every day. Perhaps he realized the errors of his ways.

Regardless, the point is not to dwell on the past, but rather to use its lessons to inform us as masculine men. While it is certainly necessary to be an alpha father, it is not sufficient. Degenerate ideologies, like feminism, multiculturalism, and leftism, will cause your children to stray down a dark, dangerous, and ultimately self-destructive path.

Read Next: Canada's Prime Minister Learned Feminism From His Gold-Digging Mother

Eusebius Erasmus

Eusebius is a Prairie Canadian who likes gun rights, traditional values, and economics.

How Toxic Femininity Turned Men Into Tranny Chasers

August 1, 2017 | by Jimbo Jones | Link | Original Link

Perhaps the greatest lie of the 21st century is that men need women more than women need men. We've all heard the tired and trite musings a million times by now. "Women wouldn't start wars, men can't create life so all they know how to do is destroy it, the world we be a much better place if women ruled everything," so on and so forth.

Of course, this overlooks all of the historical atrocities committed under matriarchal governments—indeed, queendoms throughout history have been 27 percent likelier to invade or attack rival nations than male-led regimes—or that roughly 70 percent of all filicides are committed by mothers, or the downright bamboozling Freakonomics factoid that nations with female heads of government tend to have remarkably higher reported rape statistics than their neighboring, male-led countries.

But the one "reason" that's probably been the most commonly cited as to why women, hypothetically, are more important to men than vice versa involves procreation. Women, after all, have the wombs and the ova, and without those, humanity couldn't continue. Naturally, this logic becomes a chicken and an egg larf, since those wombs and ova are pretty much useless without sperm, and it isn't long before we tumble into a pointless tautological argument.

But where things get really screwy is in the long-held and long-propagated thesis that men can be controlled by women simply by denying them sex. The idea that men are so beholden to the vagina that their every action can be manipulated through their (heterosexual) desires isn't a newfound, post-Hippie trope – it goes as far back as 400 B.C. Greece, as evident by the Aristophanes play Lysistrata (which, for those of you who aren't too keen on the antiquities, is about a bunch of women stopping a war by refusing to go to bed with their husbands until they stop fighting.)

The particularly crass and crude rapper Brooke Candy reiterated the age-old assumption in the quite blasphemous music video for her 2013 song "Pussy Makes the Rules," which includes the rather telling refrain "bitches know we got the power in the pussy, cause you major pain and turn your brain into a Slushy."

It's hard to not see a dark streak of toxic femininity in such lyrics. There's nothing innocuous about extolling the virtues of an ideologically weaponized vagina, nor is there anything innocent about encouraging listeners to turn their sex organs into methods of controlling, manipulating and domineering over other people.

In tandem with the ghastly social influence of third wave feminism—a philosophy that more or less posits men as inferior, with the goal of legally and culturally denigrating those with gonads to second class citizens—perhaps it shouldn't be surprising that a large number of technically heterosexual males would eventually abandon pursuing women altogether and instead pursue the embrace of males pretending to be female.

Of course it's a female. It has to be if it's wearing hoop earrings!

The chicks-with-dicks complex

It doesn't take much Googling to find online community after online community of "straight" men who have come to fetishize drag queens, crossdressers, fembois, male-to-female transsexuals, t-girls, shemales and—perhaps most notably—traps (that being, men who dress as women who don't tell their partners their real gender, oftentimes with the hopes of "converting" their boyfriends into full-time homosexuality) as alternatives to the traditional female sexual worship object.

The en vogue term is femmephilic polysexuality, which basically means a sexual attraction to anybody with traditionally female characteristics, regardless if they have a vagina. This part, I believe, actually makes a tremendous amount of sense.

There's no way around it – women today are nowhere near as attractive as they were 20 years ago. The Great Big Lie of third wave feminism, complete with all its body-positivity mumbo-jumbo, has convinced women that it's okay to be morbidly obese, dyke-ish, adverse to even basic forms of hygiene and walk around with full blown mustaches, and that men will just have to change their own preconceived notions of beauty and roll with it. After all, women do have the vaginas, don't they, and men will do anything to spill their precious seed inside them, even if it means bumping uglies with a 400-pound, smelly, tatted up Skankasaurus, right?

If anything, the rise of the femboi/trap subculture is a direct reactionary statement to the defeminization of the American woman. There's no denying it: a transsexual porn star like Sarina Valentina is unquestionably more attractive than a "real feminist" like Andrea Dworkin, while cam-tranny jerk-off queen Paige James is inarguably prettier than such loud and proud biological celebrity females as Lena Dunham and Leslie Jones.

They have all the traditional hallmarks of feminine beauty (including the breasts, however artificial they may be), they're almost always thinner and cleaner than the aggregate feminist, and they generally don't engage in the heavy-handed, virulently misandrist identity politics of "real" women. In fact, the only major difference is, well, they've got two sets of balls and a cock to go with them … and there's a pretty strong chance it's longer than yours, too.

Remember: if you don't think this is "hot," you've committed a hate crime.

How female liberation created shemale fetishization

I don't know the technicalities here, and I'm not even going to pretend I do, either. I guess any sort of voluntary penis-on-penis contact is inherently gay, and no matter how many hormone injections a shemale gets, they're always going to have a Y chromosome and the enzymes inside them for producing sperm. There are entire forums out there dedicated to "straight" guys getting deflowered by traps, which would seem to suggest a pretty strong sense of preexisting homosexual tendencies.

But by that same token, it looks like there are a lot of dudes out there who a) don't find "real" men attractive and b) would never engage in gay activities with another dude who do want to get it on with trannies, so maybe calling it a strictly gay phenomenon isn't quite the right label.

Regardless, this concrete fact remains: a ton of dudes out there don't want to have sex with women, but they do want to have sex with men dressed up like women.

This is an amazing social phenomenon that I suppose can't be explained except in terms of toxic femininity. What else would drive a man who is sexually attracted to the female form into the arms, crotch and buttocks of another man with synthetic tits, a wig, and $200 worth of makeup on his face? What other explanation would suffice for why men would demand their lovers have all the classical characteristics of a woman except their baby-making (and, if cultural high priestesses like Brooke Candy are to be believed, man-entrapping) genitalia?

Just how hideous do women have to get—physically and behaviorally—for men to say no thanks to pussy in favor of a good old fashioned rectal hammering? How can you even begin to comprehend how such fringe fetishist subcultures even came to exist without first acknowledging that women did something very, very wrong in the first place?

Thanks a lot, feminism. Thanks a whole damn lot.

Pussy ain't what it used to be

Think, for a minute, just how noxious your behavior has to be for men, en masse, to reject the most innate of human drives – the desire to procreate. Alas, taking a glance at the 400-pound, man-hating Tumblrinas and armada of liberal arts majors dressing up like vaginas to protest the alleged patriarchy out there, perhaps this startling counter-evolutionary behavior makes at least some sense.

If hardline feminists really do seek to transform their vaginas into weapons of ideological warfare, perhaps this "heterosexual" tranny-chasing phenomenon is a wholly predictable response – men opting for the lesser of two degeneracies, if you will. Alas, as perverse as this tranny-fetishization may be, it's nonetheless a stern reminder that even when it comes to matters of genital pleasure, women don't dominate the marketplace as much as they think they do.

When it comes to sexual pleasure, men can make do with the occasional escort service and the inevitable wave of hyper-realistic sex-bots, and where reproduction is concerned, high-tech Petri dishes are likely a few decades away from making women totally unnecessary. Women, conversely, will never be able to live without men's incalculable contributions to society – the cars engineered by men, the highways built by men, the power plants overseen by men, the technology infrastructure created by men, etc.

And as deplorable and decadent as it may be, the shemale question proves that pussy is no longer the great cultural trump card women have over the male species. Then again, feminists only have themselves to blame for their own obsolescence: if sex is literally all you have to offer, wasn't it just a matter of time until men found a way to get it cheaper, easier and without all of the tribal-politics nonsense?

Read More: You Go-Girl-Ism Is More Toxic Than Feminism

Jimbo Jones
Jimbo Jones is a nihilist ... but he's the nicest nihilist you'll ever meet.

10 Lessons About Girls I'd Teach My Teenage Self Today

August 2, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Over the last two decades I've done a lot of game, had many adventures and enjoyed relationships and short-term encounters with a lot of cute girls. But it wasn't always like this. I am now in my early forties. When I was a teenager my dating life was a shit show. I didn't lose my virginity until I was twenty.

There was no need for this. I'm not claiming that I could have been the world's greatest player but equally I missed out on a lot of opportunities because of incorrect beliefs and a lack of experience.

Here are 10 things I would tell my teenage self now if I had the chance.

1. Relax, it does get better

When I was sixteen I already felt like I'd been alive a very long time. Things weren't great and my hunch was they would continue to get worse—forever. I was worried not only that I would never get a girlfriend, but also that I'd never get a job, I wouldn't be able to support myself, I'd end up homeless. And so on.

Today I can be prone to negative projection too. But with far more experience I am also able to see that life is made up of both good and bad. While terrible things do undoubtedly happen, so do good things.

Also, I have more control than I thought. With the ability to put in hard work (into game as well as business enterprises) I can shape my own future.

2. Don't put her on a pedestal

This is perhaps the single most important lesson any young man can learn.

In my early life, my love interests all followed a very predictable pattern. I would become fixated on a particular girl (usually a brunette, skinny one—my tastes haven't really changed at all). Then, instead of taking action, I would wait for something to happen, hoping that my meaningful glances during chemistry class were sufficient to convey my interest to her.

Of course, this was a terrible strategy. And as nothing happened I would become more and more obsessed with the girl. This would raise her perceived value to goddess-like status in my eyes, and so the pain of not having her would become ever sharper.

By putting these girls on pedestals I not only stored up a lot of emotional discomfort, but I also made it far less likely that I would actually get them. You see desperation is palpable: women can tell, as though by a sixth sense, when a guy is interested. If he then doesn't have the balls to follow through and be honest about what he wants then she'll quickly despise him for it.

3. Go with the girl who is actually interested

Another consequence of putting girls on pedestals (or oneitis) was that I would overlook those who were actually interested in me.

I always used to say that I had terrible luck with girls at school. In fact, that wasn't really the case. There were a good many (attractive) girls who were interested in me. But I would always blow them off for whoever the object of my obsession was at that particular time. This meant that I passed up a number of great opportunities.

Remember, when you get IOIs you should always respond to them—failure to do so means you're leaving money on the table.

4. Jealousy is a powerful motivator

Ironically, my failure to engage with those girls who were actually interested in me cost me opportunities with my oneitus girls that could have been sparked with jealousy.

What I failed to realise as a young man was just how powerful jealousy can be as a motivator. I always clung to the blue pill notion that it would only be by ‘showing that I was serious’ that I could hope to get the girl.

This is fallacious. ‘Showing that you are serious’ is the worst way to ignite sexual excitement and the best way to look like a desperate, overly-invested chode.

Had I taken the bait on one of those other girls then it’s likely that not only would I have enjoyed myself, but I would have stimulated demand elsewhere in the market too.

5. Don’t try to be perfect

Don’t strive for perfection. Don’t second guess what her ‘perfect man’ is like and try to fit the bill. Don’t waste your time on all of that stuff.

Look at the guys who actually get laid in high school—the jerks, the wasters. You think they waste time trying to be ‘her perfect man’? Of course they don’t. They are simply honest, upfront and put themselves on the line, come what may.

My strategy led me to try to be ‘different to all the rest’. While radical differentiation from other men is indeed key, trying to be more honorable just won’t work—not in this universe, anyway.

Loading…

6. Sexual attraction comes first and you can’t negotiate your way into her underwear.

Vinny Pringo, yesterday.

As a teenager my strategy for getting girls centred around negotiation. If I could communicate to her all of the reasons why she should like me then she would realise how perfect I was and choose me over other men. What I didn't see, at that time, was that sexual attraction always trumps appeals to logic.

My contemporary Vinny Pringo had a much more visceral strategy than me. Our recreation area at the school boasted a climbing frame for the younger kids. At lunchtimes, Pringo would remove his shirt and do pull-ups on the bars, showing off his well-developed shoulders, arms and abs to the girls. At the time I disdained his method for being 'too obvious'. I swear he used to oil up his chest before these displays.

Nevertheless, the reality was that Pringo was knee deep in pussy most during our senior year, while I was stuck having 'deep and meaningful' conversations with girls that went nowhere.

If there's a choice between igniting raw sexual attraction or negotiating intimacy, always go for the former and never the latter.

7. Put yourself first

For this reason—as naturals like Vinny Pringo are intuitively aware—it is imperative that you put yourself first.

Do not second guess what you think the girl wants. In fact, don't waste any time thinking of her at all. If you like working out on the bars then do so. If you love football then play. If you want to learn the violin then do that.

The more you seek to please yourself rather than her, the more you are on your own path, the better you will ultimately do, since no woman wants to replace a man's mission.

8. Rejection is not the end of the world

When I was in high school I was absolutely terrified of rejection: this was at the root of all of my problems. I honestly thought that if I was rejected just once the skies would fall in and I would likely not survive.

Of course, this was nonsensical. The fact is that rejection is unavoidable in all areas of life, whether you want to publish a book, get a job or interest investors in your business idea. Why should it be any different with dating?

As I got older I learned not only to accept rejection but to embrace it. In time rejection became a badge of pride. At least I was doing something that intimidated a huge percentage of guys. For that alone, I was ahead of the pack.

9. Not all girls think the same

Following on from the previous point, just because you get rejected by one girl it doesn't mean that the next will automatically turn you down as well. This was yet another fundamental misconception of mine. I truly believed that girls all thought the same as one another, and that if you were deemed unsexworthy by one then the next would think the same thing too.

That was before I properly got to grips with the complexities of the sexual marketplace, and realised that male value is not static. A guy who couldn't pull a 3 in the US might well be the toast of the town in Shanghai.

Your SMV is very much subjective and in the eye of the beholder.

10. Even if you get with her, it won't solve your life's problems

And finally, another blue pill fantasy that needs to be quashed. Even if you do get that girl that you've wanted for so long, do not for one moment think it will make your life wonderful and you'll never have any problems again. Quite the contrary.

The unfortunate truth is that it is when a relationship with a girl begins that the really hard work starts too.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed

Read Next: Women Don't Want Relationships With Men Who Want Relationships

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

5 Reasons Women Should Be Banned From Working As Police Officers

August 2, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Here at Return of Kings, we aren't exactly the biggest fans of the great flood of women entering the workforce. Every female who takes a relatively well-paid full-time job is accordingly denying another man a reliable income in an era where "jobs for all" is long gone, and yet undeniable truths of the sexual marketplace have not (and will not) ever change.

A man is always going to be willing to date, marry, and have a family with a reasonably attractive woman who is by every definition "unemployed" and almost penniless, but a reasonably attractive woman (and therefore a woman with options) will not date, marry, and have a family with an unemployed or broke man.

Oh she's so "empowered" and "badass"!

Nonetheless, if women must be in the workforce for the sake of requiring dual incomes, the least they can do is enter a profession where they are just as fully capable as men in performance standards, and where they are close to guaranteed to be coming home safely to their boyfriend, husband, and/or children every night.

Being a police officer is not one of those professions. Now for the sake of on-the-job competency, the safety of the public, and offering a greater number of men a (pun intended) shot at employment, this article will elaborate on five reasons why women all over the world should be banned from being cops.

1. They Are Weak And Go Down Too Easily

I have touched upon this topic (which in an intelligent world should be relegated to just basic observational and factual science) in several previous articles like "Anything Women Can Do, Men Can Do Better" and "It Doesn't Matter If Women Win Gold Medals At The Rio Olympics". Women are, without any Marxist drivel or 'girl power' rebuttal, substantially weaker than men and cannot absorb nearly as much physical punishment or brute force.

In the preceding video, we can see why society is dependent upon capable officers who are the total opposite of this "badass" lady cop. That is, those who can physically hold their own (or for at least awhile until a taser or something can be brandished!) against the most commonly encountered wastes of oxygen and taxpayer dimes in any given country.

In the mean urban streets of the United States of America, that waste of oxygen is most likely going to be black, male, young, 6 feet tall, at least 180 pounds, brimming with testosterone and “the ‘tude” (attitude), and packing a big pounds-per-square-inch (P.S.I.) punch or shove. 99% of women in the United States just can’t handle that.

Meanwhile, while the comparatively far more peaceful New Zealand isn’t particularly well known for having the most sensible women, they at least have the sense to send out a police officer who has the strength and physique to get the job done for the task at hand. Well done Kiwis, I guess that rugby culture comes in handy sometimes (for the men).

2. They Are Lazy, Slow, And Incompetent

There is a reason why you don’t see many women in comparatively highly paid professions like petroleum engineering, Alaskan crab fishing, or mining. It’s because most women, those who are even just slightly in touch with their natural feminine imperative, are not at all attracted to outdoorsy and physically intensive jobs with no guarantee of perfect weather.

They are naturally inclined to seek out temperature-regulated and comfortable-seating office jobs where gossip, Instagram, and Facebook can occupy half of the “work day” in their mostly vanity (ie. non-essential) employment industry. Accordingly, this natural inclination for inherently lazy and slow-paced work means that being a police officer is not a suitable working environment for women either.

In an absolutely embarrassing video which was captured in New York City, not one but two female police officers are utterly incapable of bringing down a lone black male suspect, all while appearing to be putting in a snails effort to keep pace or chase. The man capturing the video finds this gross incompetence absolutely hysterical. Meanwhile (after we are done laughing too), all we can do is make the face palm gesture.

3. They Are Too Soft And Easily Scared

(1:18) “Obviously he’s a violent hooligan. He’s not that tough though. This refugee, a normal Joe in terms of strength, overpowered the female cops. And it goes to show you just how low the Swedish feminist standards are when they hire police officers.”

A video of not one, not two, but three female Swedish police officers, failing to subdue a single medium-build hooligan, made the rounds around the world and (for awhile) turned the leftist fantasy land into a laughingstock. While seemingly implausible, it actually makes perfect sense.

Loading…
Women by nature are far more easily frightened and repulsed in the face of danger (hence you see all three quote-on-quote “police officers” backing away from the suspect after he lands a hard punch or two) and they are often too soft to put up any sustained resistance.

Raising young children is a profession which best utilizes a woman’s softer, delicate, and more nurturing strengths. The OPPOSITE is trying to subdue hostile adult men from an equally hostile culture.

4. They Are Too Dependent On Male Officers

A female cops radio dispatcher might as well just be called their “white knight” call box. They are by and large, for any length of time, utterly incapable of doing their job properly without male assistance.

Smaller, weaker, slower, and often just plain lazy, they have to phone in an instant dose of testosterone (competent male cops) in order to see to the end even the most asinine of iffy situations. Like a defiant urban “dindu nuffin” who is not going to put up with getting a citation for riding his bike on the sidewalk.

By proxy, this makes female police officers a huge waste on police resources and their overall efficiency. For every far more capable male officer who has to assist an affirmative-action (female) hire, that is one more male officer who is temporarily taken out of availability in case a far more serious crime actually needs attention.

5. Lives Depend Upon Fully Capable Police Officers – Which Women Are Not

The preceding clip from the 1976 film “The Enforcer” (part of the ‘Dirty Harry’ canon) accurately portrays just what can go wrong when feminist and affirmative action hiring practices infect police departments. An unimposing female law enforcement officer with no field experience is being considered for the role of an Inspector, while male officers with 10 or 15 years of real experience are clearly being passed up on the opportunity.

When completely unsuitable women (due to physical weakness, softness, incompetency, too easily scared, lack of experience, etc) are considered for selection for all the wrong reasons (gender quotas & feminist fapping), they will inevitably put the lives of the public and their colleagues at risk.

The sheriffs deputy who was easily overpowered and beaten into a coma by Brian Nichols in the Fulton County Courthouse in Atlanta, Georgia in 2005. The convict then took her gun and escaped custody, leading to four murders / innocent deaths before his eventual recapture. All of those deaths could have been avoided if a larger, stronger, and more capable MALE officer was assigned to watch over the large and imposing suspect.

Being a beat cop is serious business. It is not just some profession where you go "durrrrrpppp, I need a job!" just because you happened to be unemployed and you heard the department was looking for some new street meat.

If you are a heterosexual white male (the most browbeaten and hated creature in the modern United States), you need to be prepared to have everything you do completely filmed, scrutinized, and dissected by the "minorities" (who make up 50% or more of the population in many large cities) you will be dealing with everyday.

As for women, I'm sorry. 99% of you just don't have what it takes to deal with the hyper-masculine dregs of society. The closest societies in which being a female cop could actually work are places like Japan, Korea, Taiwan, or Iceland. Even then, women are still second-rate choices.

Conclusion – Female Cops Should Be Bedroom Sex Fantasies For Men Or Lesbians ONLY

She can arrest me, strip me down, and “brutalize” me anytime

Considering how much weaker, slower, softer, lazier, incompetent, scared, and dependent female police officers are compared to men in the same profession, it is a living joke as to why they are even hired in the first place. Since female police officers are living jokes, then the mere idea of female police officers must also be treated as a joke.

Most men’s idea of a fun and joke filled night would include a joyful lovemaking session, which was preceded by our ladies wearing a sexy female “cop” outfit for a bit of whimsical spice. NOT receiving a phone call from the intensive-care unit informing us that our never-should-have-been-a-real-cop significant other is bleeding to death through her bullet-riddled police uniform.

Again I will reiterate. For the sake of on-the-job competency in an essential service, and offering far more capable men a chance at steady employment (and therefore a new potential suitor in an era of record low birth rates), women must be banned from becoming police officers. A complete and permanent hiring freeze on women should go into effect in all countries starting immediately.

Read Next: Female Police Officers And Soldiers Reduce Everyone’s Safety

John Carver
John Carver is a four year ROK veteran with over fifty articles of SJW-triggering truth bombs on archive. You can follow him on Twitter if you are so inclined.

John McEnroe Infuriates Media By Saying Serena Williams Would Get Crushed In The Men's Division

August 2, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Tennis bad boy John McEnroe told NPR during an interview that number one female player Serena Williams is the greatest female player of tennis history, but that wasn't good enough for the feminists. The lady responded by asking why McEnroe said the word female, and not just say she's the greatest tennis player of all time. John then told them that would be a whole different topic and responded, "…if she played on the men's circuit she'd be like 700 in the world."

The media went ballistic, hammering John during a CBS interview demanding an apology, but he didn't give them what they want. Instead he gave common sense logic which the goons couldn't accept.

Professional tennis has two divisions, ATP (Association of Tennis Professionals) and the WTA (Women's Tennis Association). So when talking about players, of course you have to mention gender, because there are multiple divisions. You can't just make general claims.

To end the controversy, John suggested what I and many other tennis fans, have always wanted for years: let men and woman play on the same tour. Then all female players will have to prove themselves.

Serena evaded with this:

> Dear John I respect you but please keep me out of your statements that are not factually based. I've never played anyone ranked 'there' nor do I have time.

> Respect me and my privacy as I'm trying to have a baby. Good day sir.

When asked how he would be ranked on the men's tour, John made it clear at 58 years of age and to play 5 setters instead of 3 like on the women's side, he'd be about 1200th in the world. He admitted that at his tennis academy in Long Island, he has lost many times to teen high school players, and older pros.

John Previously Said He Could Take Her

John even said on Jimmy Kimmel that he felt he could still take her out in a match. He mentioned Donald Trump made an offer to see it happen, but it wasn't enough to get it going so he wasn't sure if he was joking or if it could actually be scheduled.

Even Trump Offered Money For Him To Beat Serana

Attacked By Stephen Colbert

Colbert made weasel jokes personally attacking McEnroe. What do you expect from a low life rat like Colbert whose on par with the other globocucks like Samantha Bee?

McEnroe also asked why this is only an issue in tennis, not basketball or other sports? Nobody thinks any female baller compares to Michael Jordan so is tennis the only sport crucified?

What The Men's Tour Is Like

Tennis is very demanding sport, at least on the men's side. You've got to be fit, fast like hell, and strong to generate power in tight spots. It's not like other sports where you can just power your way, run your way, or pay off your way to the championships. It truly is the independent man's sport.

You've also got to be smart with quick reflexes to think on your feet within seconds or less. Forget the skinny guy stereotype. On the pro tour, and even at colleges and clubs, you see a lot of tall wiry but ripped players. Single digit body fat percentages are not uncommon, and fitness is usually the big thing that separates the players from amateurs. Control is another, but this is not a tennis lesson.

What about the WTA?

The game is much slower and to be frank, boring. Just listening to awkward screams and yelling. As you can see, the men's game is much faster compared to the WTA. The ball is struck harder, and a much higher fitness level is required. Too many poor guys ranked higher than 30th in the world are struggling to make bread while the WTA pays millions to women with average skill compared to the men.

What Would Happen If The ATP Played WTA?

It would go like this (keep in mind these are not even high ranking male players):

If the men were playing seriously in a real match, not charity, 90% of the serves will go unreturned. The WTA won't be able to handle it; they'll be blown off the court in an hour or less and that's only because the men have to win best of five sets.

Martina Navratilova vs Jimmy Connors drew in big crowds back in the day, but Connors ended it in straight sets. All players in the WTA would suffer the same fate against the ATP.

Serena likes to think she can beat the top 200th player, but to be honest, I could probably beat her even though I'm not pro as are MANY other college players. I could give her a run for her money simply because I know I'm quicker, stronger, and can pace the ball much faster than what she's used to.

For the men's circuit, that's another story. Let's just say I need more training, but Serena, or anybody else from the female tour, no problem.

If I were a betting man, I'd put my money on any top college or state ranked high school player against her any day, or even elite club players for that matter. Those guys are good, they'll smack the ball at 120mph right in your face.

McEnroe said it best: abolish the WTA, make it one pro unit, then will see just how well the women do. I applaud his tell-it-like-it-is statements. Even at his age, he's still got more guts and testosterone than 95% of the "yes ma'am" knuckleheads in the the media.

Read More: Why It's Time To Boycott Women's Tennis

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

The Sordid History Of When The Soviets Tried To Breed Apes With Humans

August 2, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

It's a common catchphrase that "There are no races; there's only the human race." To be technical, humanity is a species, but there I go being a spoilsport. Once again to be technical, the biological definition of species is:

> …a category of biological classification ranking immediately below the genus or subgenus, comprising related organisms or populations potentially capable of interbreeding…

As it happens, the USSR attempted to prove the human race species is much more inclusive than expected. Even in today's "anything goes" climate, this monkey business seems a wee bit odd.

Ilya Ivanov's background

Ilya Ivanovich Ivanov was a professor and researcher in biology. He became an animal reproduction specialist, pioneering artificial insemination. This technique was essential to his next act, hybridization. Ivanov crossed several different types of animals: cattle and buffalo, cattle and antelopes, zebras and donkeys, rats and mice, mice and guinea pigs, guinea pigs and rabbits, etc.

This blurs the definition of what we originally considered distinct species. So these animals are inter-fertile, yet generally prefer to breed with their own kind, unless there is unnatural outside influence. Here, the influence involved Professor Ivanov's turkey baster. In 1910, he aired the idea of crossing humans and apes before the World Congress of Zoologists—quite likely one of their more memorable conferences.

Is it possible? Humans and chimpanzees have 98% of DNA in common. Humans have 23 pairs of chromosomes and chimpanzees have 24 pairs. still, Professor Ivanov managed to interbreed some species despite a dissimilar number of chromosomes. Following the Russian Revolution, he got his chance to test the idea.

Monkey business

A New Science article states:

> Despite the disapproval of the scientific establishment Ivanov got the go-ahead – and the funds to mount an expedition to Africa to collect apes. Documents show that the decision was pushed through by leading members of the Bolshevik government.

Ivanov first went to Paris in February 1926. The next month, he journeyed to colonial French Guinea, arriving at a primate research station in Kindia. However, they didn't have any sexually mature chimpanzees. Then he went back to Paris and compared notes on capturing primates with Serge Voronoff, the “monkey gland” surgeon.

In November, Ivanov returned to Africa. He and his son rounded up some female chimps and, at the island of Conakry, tried to get three of them pregnant. (This involved the turkey baster procedure, rather than a dinner date and a movie.) Despite their efforts, the experiment didn’t work.

This convinced him that he was doing it wrong. His next idea was to impregnate women with ape sperm. He wanted to do this to some local women under the guise of medical examinations. The colonial governor refused to allow this, quite sensibly. Score one for the governor.

More monkeying around

However, Ivanov wasn’t deterred. In 1929, he set up shop in Sukhumi, in the now politically unstable region of Abkhazia. His primate research station would later conduct studies on radiation exposure and vaccines. He got five women to volunteer for insemination. It’s unclear how freely they cooperated; some accounts say they were prisoners.

However, Tarzan the Orangutan, his only mature male candidate, died. As a New York times op-ed from October 2005 put it:

> Next Ivanov wrote a Cuban heiress, Rosalia Abreu. Abreu was the first person to breed chimps in captivity and had a large menagerie outside Havana. Ivanov asked if any of her male chimpanzees might be available to inseminate a Russian volunteer known to posterity only as ‘G.”
>
> At first Abreu was agreeable. But Ivanov made the mistake of approaching Charles Smith of the American Association for the Advancement of Atheism for fund-raising support. Smith was something of a showman—he liked to appear in public with a chimpanzee dressed in a business suit—and went to the newspapers with Ivanov’s proposal. The New York Times thundered, “Soviet > Backs Plan to Test Evolution."

>
> The resulting publicity brought the case to the attention of the Ku Klux Klan, which threatened Abreu with retaliation if she took part in Ivanov's experiment, calling it "abominable to the creator." Abreu withdrew her consent.

Score one for Fraternity Tri-Kappa. Ivanov ordered some primates for the facility, but most of them died in transit.

The end (not)

The ape-man project was plagued with problems since the beginning, but politics did it in. Lysenkoism became fashionable, and it was dangerous to be a biologist. He got arrested, sent into internal exile, and died two years later.

This already-strange tale has some rather odd twists and turns. Contrary to what we might expect, Ivanov wasn't considered a kook in his day; his early research (before the ape-man stunt) did get results. Also, it obviously was a significant priority. The initial funding (which in 2017 would be equivalent to $140K) wasn't a trivial amount to the USSR, which was doing a terrible job of feeding its citizens. Finally, it wasn't exactly a secret. Still, the story was basically forgotten until the 1990s; interest picked up a bit after the archives became available.

Later, the Chinese carried on the effort. As the St. Petersburg Independent reported on 2/12/1981, the Chinese repeated Ivanov's first experiment, and it actually worked. A three member team, including Ji Yongxiang, got a female chimp pregnant. The article doesn't mention whether this was achieved through the turkey baster technique or the "Who Lies More?" routine.

Once again, political trouble doomed the project. He got arrested during the Chinese Cultural Revolution, and the pregnant chimp died of neglect. He indicated willingness to resume, which would be useful in creating a workforce customized for specialized tasks.

Was Ji Yongxiang blowing smoke, or am I a monkey's uncle?

Ivanov’s motivation

So the major remaining question was why. Perhaps demonstrating the sanctity of human life wasn’t exactly a huge big priority. As one account puts it:

> According to Moscow newspapers, Stalin told the scientist: “I want a new invincible human being, insensitive to pain, resistant and indifferent about the quality of food they eat.”

Still, until the original newspapers can be identified and cited, consider all that to be apocryphal. Reginald Urch’s book The Rabbit King Of Russia does indeed cite a couple of newspaper articles from Leningrad, dated 11/27/1925 and 12/5/1925. He summarized:

> The task of the Ivanov expedition was simple. It was to go to the Congo and, if possible, induce the French Pasteur station working there under Professor Calmette to assist the Bolshevist scientists to catch a number of female chimpanzee apes. After this, Ivanov and his staff would endeavor to fertilize the apes by artificial methods and bring back the mothers with their little human apes to gladden the hearts of the anti-God Society in Soviet Russia and prove that “There is no God.”

The New Scientist article goes in depth on the possible motives, giving the following as the most likely:

> The high-ranking Bolsheviks who backed Ivanov were intellectuals who saw science as a means of realising their dream of a socialist utopia. “Politicians could change the political system, nationalise industries and turn farms into vast collectives—but the task of transforming people was entrusted to scientists,” > says Etkind. “The aim was to match people to the socialist design of Soviet society.”

>
> One way to do that was through “positive eugenics”, using [artificial insemination] to speed up the spread of desirable traits—a willingness to live and work communally, for instance—and to get rid of “primitive” traits such as competitiveness, greed and the desire to own property. “There were many projects aimed at changing humanity,” Etkind says. “Ivanov’s was the most extreme but if he succeeded then that would show that humans could be changed in radical and creative ways.”

Most eugenicists at the time wanted to promote high intelligence and prevent a population explosion of people perpetually dependent on the government. The Communist version of eugenics apparently didn’t share that goal. Actually, crossbreeding people with apes would be an efficient way of producing a population too dull to question government policies or the sociopolitical status quo.

Trying to manipulate the gene pool to produce compliant citizens, born to conform to leftist goals… why does that sound so familiar?

Read More: Is Genocide On The Elite Agenda?

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How To Train The Next Generation Of Men

August 3, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

If you were a parent in the 1950s, you had a pretty good idea of what the future held for your sons. The path to success was set: get good grades in school, go to a respected university, and get hired by a large corporation. But parents today have no such obvious path to impart to their children. We are living on a powder keg and we can't predict if and when it will explode. This means that we have to prepare our sons to succeed regardless of what the future holds.

A modern agoge

The movie 300 gives a glimpse of the agoge (training) that young Spartan boys underwent to become full-fledged Spartan warriors. While we don't know exactly what the agoge of the Spartans consisted of, we can guess that it involved learning how to fight as part of the Greek Phalanx, strengthening and endurance exercises, and activities that developed confidence and toughness.

The modern age did away with the necessity of putting boys through a strict agoge. The modern military is staffed by professional warriors. Everyone else in the society is a civilian with almost no idea of warfare. The only training most of us receive is training to become a cog in a giant corporate machine. The hamster wheel of the modern world is to get a job, overconsume and go into debt, and spend the next 50 years working to pay for the overconsumption.

But the current environment is not sustainable. Even mainstream pundits recognize that the neoliberal order is beginning to crack, and for good reason: it enriches a tiny elite while slowly eroding the living standards for the masses of people in North America and Europe. The only questions are when and how the neoliberal order will finally fall.

This uncertain situation makes it unadvisable to educate your children in the same way you were educated. The next generation of children, especially boys, must be trained in both the arts of peace and the art of war. In other words, we need to create a modern agoge for our sons. This article is my attempt to suggest a possible approach.

The basics

I don't believe that our civilization will collapse into something like the Dark Ages where we lose the technology we have built up to this point. Therefore, it is a safe to assume that we cannot neglect the basics. The standard subjects that are taught as part of the Grades 1-12 curriculum–reading, writing, arithmetic, history, science, and grammar will continue be important for all children to learn.

Public schools in the US teach all of these things but I think they do a shoddy job of it, so I would not entrust my child to the them. First, public schools are constantly experimenting with a way to teach math that will cause all the children to "get it." Unfortunately, there is no magic method of teaching math and the newfangled math curriculums end up being less and less effective. The result of this constant changing of curriculum is that most kids graduate from high school without a good foundation in math.

Second, the mission of public schools is to educate future employees for US corporations—not academic excellence. Thus, there is a lot of wasted time in the school day. After all, children must learn to spend a certain number of hours in the "office" regardless of whether they are being productive.

There is one part of the standard curriculum that would need more emphasis: American children are woefully deficient in knowledge about history, particularly European history. As a student in the public schools, I was taught about the Revolutionary War, slavery, the Civil War, racism, Jim Crow laws, almost nothing about WWI, WWII, the New Deal, and the Civil Rights movement. I also had a class in Russian history that was pretty basic.

I left high school with a poor understanding of world history and have had to spend much of my adult life remedying this deficiency. This should not be the case. A good understanding of history gives a person the ability to learn from the mistakes other have made. This perspective is necessary if you want your children to grow up to be effective citizens.

Additional subjects

While the standard subjects are important, they are not sufficient to equip our children for the unpredictable future. These additional subjects will be useful no matter what the future holds.

Entrepreneurship

As I mentioned above, American education is aimed at producing employees, not independent business men. This is a bad strategy as the corporate employee model amounts to indentured servitude. A modern agoge recognizes that business ownership is a better path to financial stability.

Finance

Public schools teach very little about finance. That ignorance leads many people to make bad financial decisions. Our children should know about how to invest, different investment vehicles, and the best strategies before they finish their high school level education.

Qualities for success

In life, what you know may be worth less than how you react to situations. I am sure you know men who may be very educated but who are not as successful as business men with much less education and brain power. The difference is in the mettle of each individual. Perseverance, grit, self-confidence, and strong people skills must be instilled in children from a young age.

Rhetoric

The ancients trained in rhetoric—the ability to move men by the power of speech. A well-rounded person should be able to write and deliver a speech that will sway his listeners.

Training to be a man

Up until this point, pretty much everything I have mentioned can be taught to our daughters as well as our sons. But there are differences between the two sexes. Here are some of the masculine qualities we need to instill in our sons.

Self-defense

Every man must be able to defend himself in hand-to-hand combat. There are many martial arts that could give your sons an adequate self-defense but the arts that have lots of sparring are better than ones that emphasize forms or partner practice that involves play-acting. Brazilian Jiu-jutsu, boxing, wrestling, and MMA training are all viable options. Skill with a knife and a handgun would also be included as part of a program of modern agoge.

Hunting, fishing, and living off the land

If civil war lies in the future, men who can live off the land for short periods of time will fare better than those whose only experience with food is going to a supermarket. Plus, hunting, fishing, and camping can serve as excellent coming of age rituals.

Military strategy

In ancient world, there were few professional warriors. The military consisted of able-bodied men who trained in the arts of war part time to protect their land and families from invaders. In early Rome, soldiers were responsible for purchasing their own weapons and armor. Thus, even farmers would know the basics of military strategy. Today, unless they have served in the military, most American men are completely ignorant of military tactics. Given the unstable world situation, it would be a mistake to let our sons grow up ignorant of the art of war.

Conclusion

These are my preliminary thoughts on what should comprise a modern agoge. We are in uncharted waters where the old pedagogy will fail the future generation. However, we can’t wait for the education “experts” to show us the way forward. It is up to us in the RoK community to blaze the trail.

Read More: How Modern Masculine Men Can Bring Back The Era Of The Gentleman

---

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

The Shocking Decline Of American Music

August 3, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Every civilization is judge on what it produces for the world. One way of doing this is by listening to the kind of music a nation creates. The Western world used to produce some fine music over the past couple decades whether it being from America, England, or other modern nations. However, today it has declined to a shameful level.

50’s Music

Dave Brubeck – Take Five

A man’s skill in wielding an instrument was the true measure of his musical genius back the. Listen to the drum solo in this song…

Bill Haley & His Comets – Rock Around The Clock (1955)

A well-loved classic. The standard was very simple in those times: if you were not truly exceptional at playing an instrument and had great a voice, you were out.

Frankie Avalon – Venus (1959)

Might not want to try this on girls, don’t think you’ll get the same response today. Get some tattoos and gold plated teeth and try rapping while “making it rain.”

The 60’s

Glen Campbell – Wichita Lineman (1968)

I know this may come as a shock for you millennial viewers, but yes there actually were classy descent looking well-groomed men who sang in proper English. This is the kind of music that helped soldiers get through hard times while touching people's hearts.

Andy Williams and Marcos Valle – The Andy Williams Show (1967)

Brazil was becoming famous back then in the States mainly because of its young musicians creating music like this.

Feminists you need to watch this. Your hatred for men is very misguided. Such passionate music is created from the fire that burns in a man for the love of women, not because they want to suppress you.

Sergio Mendes & Brasil '66 – YE ME LE (1969)

Bossa Nova really took off and it's not surprising when you listen to it. One of my favorite genres.

70's Music, Let The Party Begin

Oh come on Mr. Luthra, we need something we can dance to. Sure thing – enter the 70's. Disco took off with songs like this…

Machine – There But for the Grace of God (1977)

A common expression used to describe music was "it has soul". This was not just in old school Cuban and Salsa music, but all genres seemed to have that heart, that extra kick that today's music is severely lacking.

Bee Gees – Night Fever (1977)

This song was popularized in the film Saturday Night Fever with John Travolta. Yes, I know it's hard to believe, but there was time when Americans were slim. They also didn't need to drench themselves in alcohol either to have a good time.

Music From The 80's

Living in a Box – Living in a Box (1987)

Manly guys dressed in suits with manly voices. There's passion, energy, and that extra spunk that gives it that magic like quality to it even though the song is about something not very pleasant. You don't see handsome musicians with such talent nowadays who know how to work the stage.

Pep Boys -West End Girls (1987)

This is what was considered classic pop back then, about as close to Justin Bieber as you could ever get. Good English music, shame that they produce stuff like this anymore.

Paul Hardcastle – Rain Forest (1985)

Smooth jazz was also popular then. They didn't need to smoke pot or do drugs, at least not at the epidemic level that it is today. Instead that had this kind of music.

Was (Not Was) – Walk The Dinosaur (1988)

Yea you had dancing with girls, but it good clean fun, no one is twerking or doing any other degrading behavior. You had blacks having a good time with whites, with better relations than what we have today. Black music wasn't all just bling, rappers, and twerking bikinis.

What Love Songs Were Like

For starters, they were actually about love and had emotion, the kind that every real man is seeking in a woman. Say what you want about it, but it's still better that the free love promiscuous message that is promoted in today's music.

Or you could dance to it like they did in the 90's.

Music Today (if that's what you call it)

Feminized garbage sung by emasculated men that are so talent-less they need big butt babes, million dollar mansions, and other various props desperately trying to hold your attention.

Just go on the YouTube homepage and scroll through the first couple of promoted videos for trash that has no meaning or rhythm. This is why the Muslim Brotherhood is so hell bent on destroying Western civilization. They don't want their daughters ended up like this, and with the continued feminization of Western society, they might succeed if people don't man up.

Fortunately some of the greats are still alive and are still during music tours like Marcos Valle who performed in Moscow. Russians are known for being calm reserved people who don't easily show emotion, but even they went wild after hearing such great music as art is universal.

You can also check out my playlists on YouTube, it's work in progress. Thank God for the internet, anyone can instantly access great music from the past. There are some good musicians out there today, but they are not promoted nor given the attention they deserve due to the music/industrial complex.

Read More: Bill Nye The Degenerate Guy Promotes Perverted Tranny Music For Children

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

Sex Is The Driver Of All Cultural And Political Conflict

August 3, 2017 | by Roy Barzilai | Link | Original Link

Taxes, healthcare, national security. These are the issues that most people would say differentiate one political party from another, one candidate from another. But in fact, these issues are only symptomatic of what actually differentiates candidates: sex.

The 2016 presidential elections in the United States—Hillary Clinton vs. Donald Trump—exemplified how gender manifests in political conflict, from defining their personality types to shaping their entire ideological worldview. And the heated nature of that contest showcased the split across gender lines, exhibiting how sexual relations is threatening to tear Western society apart. We are heading for a "cultural divorce."

The masculine versus feminine

The strong, masculine personality type projected by Donald Trump stands for an "America First" vision for the world: a more self-interested policy in which the interests of the American people are preferred, with closed borders that protect national interests and promote national identity and culture. This is contrasted with Hillary's globalist, more inclusive vision for humanity that promotes altruistic sacrifice of self-interest, driven by the feminine characteristic of empathy and social bonding in order to unify a multicultural global community by eliminating the old order.

By studying our political strife from a social-science perspective we can better understand the inherent forces that drive social conflict. Social bonding is an incredibly important quality that enables the rise of complex human societies with shared intentionality, the cultural transmission of knowledge, and the division of labor. The feminine attributes of empathy and love are significant in connecting people into social networks that allow for mutual cooperation and exchange of ideas and trade.

A completely anti-social personality could not interact with others. However, if our social bonds become too tight, those social connections can flip from bonded to bondage, restricting the degree of freedom needed to develop individual character and take personal responsibility for our actions. Social bondage prohibits creativity, rationality, and objectivity. Hence we need to balance the feminine side of social bonding and altruism with the masculine side of rational self-interest and a greater degree of independence.

In view of how this distinction between the genders shapes our political divide, we can gain valuable insights from recent studies in neuroscience on how hormones drive our sexual differentiation and structure our brain. It is important to understand that we all begin as females in the womb, but the rise of the sex hormone, testosterone, leads to the development of male characteristics in utero. Again in puberty, the growth of sex hormones kick in to further induce development of the different genders.

The driver of civilization

[image]

In humans, as in most mammal species, it is the males that compete for social status to gain access to the females. Females act as Mother Nature's selectors, choosing their preferred mate and thereby which men will succeed in propagating their genes into future generations.

The dominant, alpha male personality type and culture, in the context of competition between greater social groups, such as nations, secures territory and resources in order to protect and provide for their females and build a nest. The biological imperative to reproduce and procure the resources to raise our children is the underlying theme in shaping our human history and social and political traditions. These are the biological origins for the modern concept of the Western nation state with secure borders. The rule of law and order is established to promote the rise of a flourishing and civilized society.

However, if we study human history, much of it is shaped by periods of imperialist wars of aggression in which the lack of respect for definite boundaries between social groups leads to increased violence and conflict. The strong conquer the weak, uniting many cultures under great empires.

Examples of these are the Roman Empire, the Islamic Empire, or the empire created by the Mongol hoards that conquered a huge land mass across Eurasia, from China to the Middle East and Russia. In the twentieth century, both the fascist regimes of Nazi Germany and the Communists in Soviet Russia sought to conquer huge empires under their control. History teaches us that lack of secured borders leads to wars of aggression in which men fight over resources and females, leading to conquest and rape.

The modern concept of the nation state has only emerged since the Age of Enlightenment in the seventeenth century, in which European societies decided to promote peaceful coexistence by defining national borders and securing the rule of law. The cultures that developed, like the United States, promoted individual rights, and men were able to compete economically to enhance production by more efficiently utilizing natural resources, rather than battling to control and enslave each other.

In my recent book, The Testosterone Hypothesis, I make the case that it is actually the rise of the male hormone testosterone that has led to modern Western civilization in which national and personal independence and liberty are the celebrated values of free men. This masculine culture, in which men feel secure and confident under the rule of law, promotes independence and challenges centralized authority as the Founding Fathers of the United States did in their rebellious war for Independence in 1776, fighting for these Enlightenment ideals.

However as testosterone declines, men lose their drive for self-determination and their internal locus of control and become increasingly dependent and subjugated by socialist state controls and centralized forms of government that become more imperial and all encompassing, encroaching on the sovereignty of the individual.

This hormonal view of history is confirmed by recent scientific studies on the effects of testosterone on men's political ideology. A study done in 2013 by Danish scientists found that stronger men correlate with more conservative political and economic views. The study was conducted among hundreds of men in the U.S., Denmark, and Argentina, and the researchers concluded that men's relative physical strength is indicative of their ability to defend their families and procure resources to provide for them:

This is among the first studies to show that political views may be rational in another sense, in that they're designed by natural selection to function in the conditions recurrent over human evolutionary history.

Our sex hormones determine the degree of independence versus bonding that takes place in how we organize our social structure. Hence, we need to further study and integrate the natural sciences—primarily biology and neuroscience—with the humanities to reach a more comprehensive level of understanding of our mind-body connection and how evolved sexual reproductive strategies drive the organization of our society, culture, and political ideologies accordingly.

Read Next: The Decline In Testosterone Is Destroying The Basis Of Masculinity

Roy Barzilai

Roy Barzilai is an independent scholar, who studied both Ayn Rand's philosophy of Objectivism and Rivka Schechter's philosophy of language, rooted in the Hebrew Bible. The synthesis of Rand's Aristotelian philosophy, and the biblical creed of ethical monotheism provides profound insights into the ideas that shaped the Western mind. By exploring the intellectual history of Western civilization, Roy seeks to reach a greater understanding of the human mind. He is author of The Testosterone Bible and holds undergraduate degrees from Tel Aviv University in Law, accounting, and computer science.

How To Combat Declining Nightlife Game

August 3, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Exclusivity is always going to be the name of the game. As I write this from a cafe in Wroclaw, Poland (the first European city I ever went to), I realize now that if you want to continue to seek you must seek new destinations. You must move up in frequenting higher-end venues that keep out the riff-raff.

Why do guys go to places like Wroclaw? For pretty Polish girls and vodka, of course. But, things have changed drastically since 2014. Roosh and I detailed this in a podcast, and I've written about it before, too.

In 2014, on a weekend night, I walked into a club with a friend. We were the only guys in there, and were surrounded by 20 girls. Nearly all of them had dresses and heels on. This weekend, I walked into a club, and most of them had foregone the heels and dresses for baggy jeans and Chuck Taylors. There were five guys for every one girl. Talk about a 180.

What Changed?

Well, girls are going out less now, that's for sure. The explosion of the online dating game has changed this drastically. Now, you can use a nightclub as an excellent measure of how healthy a sexual marketplace really is.

If girls have to go out to meet a guy, that's great for guys. And actually, it's great for girls—it keeps their egos in relative check—at least in comparison to the mammoth mountains where they currently reside. Nowadays though, a girl gets all of the options she could ever need (and a lot more) from her smartphone.

I could sit here and complain about that, but it's better to move forward. How? By seeking places that are more exclusive. Too many guys have an abundance mindset with women (or at least they preach it). But yet, they don't have that same abundance mindset about money. I realize now, I used to be one of those guys.

$10 cover? Too expensive.

Drinks that are 25% more than the "usual" places? Pass.

I've been trying to shift this mindset recently because I've realized the benefits of it. Rather than trying to play with everybody else, I'd much rather pay the extra fees and be part of the exclusive crowd rather than the low-end. It does take a certain amount of age, experience, and overall weariness with how things have changed to reach this conclusion—in my case, several years.

Can You Still Game?

Of course you can. But it's the matter of enjoyment. By human nature, we want what we can't have. So when a girl is getting approached dozens of times in an hour, she's far less likely to turn away the next guy. In reverse, if the girls outnumber the guys, she knows she has to give every one a chance to get what she's looking for.

Plus, in older times (meaning 2014), girls would actually go out to clubs to meet a man for a relationship. Until the smartphone dating app scene took off, their only options to meet a guy were work, social circle, or "old school" internet dating where you actually had to send a message. If none of those were options, girls would go out to clubs for opportunities.

There's just something about being surrounded by hundreds of other guys all vying for the attention of girls that turns most people off. Even the best players in the world will have this wear on them over time. I wish I could say I've found some fix for being able to power through—but I haven't. Other than to buy your way up and out of the cesspool.

But What About The Girls?

We all know that girl's skills with money management and financial planning are lackluster at best. So it would be a fair assumption that cover charges and high-priced drinks would deter some women from getting into these venues.

Of course, it's going to vary from place to place. Even in places like Las Vegas, sometimes cover charges for girls are north of $50 (while being $100+ for guys). But, the hottest of the hot girls usually find some way or another to get into these places—so it has the added bonus of filtering out the lower-quality girls, too. High-end places want the hottest girls—it's the equivalent to parking the Lamborghini in the front of the hotel valet. It shows status.

Plus, girls want a winner. The highest quality girls know their value, and typically won't settle for anything less than a high-value man. Girls in 2017 are always trying to date up, hence why you see so many land whales with relatively attractive dudes. Now that we know the hot girls will still fill these venues, the simple solution to the problem of nightgame being overrun and over is to simply move up in life.

So the next time you're out and you're bitching about a $10 cover charge, maybe re-think that philosophy. $10 is all that's standing in the way of you and meeting the top girls that only the top guys have access to. Everybody else is behind.

And if you don't have $10? Well, it's time to increase the money abundance in addition to women. And until you do, it's safe to say that nightgame is only going to continue getting tougher and less enjoyable for you.

Check out my podcast for more great wisdom about travel and game. Want to start building your own funnel of girls? Learn how in my book.

Read More: 5 Things You'll Notice About Online Dating In 2017

5 Stages Of Decline After A Society Becomes Infected By Feminism

August 4, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Individuals within the body politic are what cells are to organisms. Just as people can catch diseases, nations can suffer from ideological maladies. Here's how the feminism disease progresses.

Stage 1: Benign growth

Has a threat ever been more idle?

Feminism begins as a benign condition, but case studies show that it often metastasizes into malignancy. Political movements in democratic societies are similar to homeostasis processes in organisms. If groups are disadvantaged under the law, they will consider this unfair and pursue change. This becomes pathological, if in excess (disrupting the homeostatic balance the other direction), or if hidden agendas become vectors for ideological pathogens.

In some nations—particularly under Sharia law—women really are oppressed, and very badly. Most feminists overlook this, and some even ally themselves to radical Islam. Note well, that seems paradoxical to anyone who doesn't understand modern feminism's real agendas.

When America's first wave of feminism began with the 1848 Seneca Falls convention, women were treated far better than Middle Eastern standards. Women had their expected roles and obligations, but so did men. For example, back in those "bad old days", a man could be conscripted into war, unlike women. Eventually, stage 1 feminism achieved its objectives of equality under the law. The exceptions are areas disadvantaging men (like divorce law or the draft).

Women attained the vote gradually, beginning with Wyoming in 1869 and eventually all the USA in 1920. By itself, this was not problematic until feminism became malignant. Finally, if someone claims women have no power in society, that's been false for nearly a century.

Stage 2: Malignant hostility

Andrea Dworkin, radical feminist and doughnut addict

Second wave feminism began in the mid-1950s, and the infection was spreading rampantly through the body politic by the mid-1960s. It metastasized through exposure to potent toxins from the ideological malady called cultural Marxism, a mutant strain of Communism.

There are diagnostic criteria to determine if any political movement has become a malignant ideological malady. A biopsy can examine if individuals at the center resemble normal people, or are a mutant strain. Also, are they acting in symbiosis toward the common good of the body politic, or are they sabotaging critical functions and spreading discord? Finally, when their goals are met, are they placated or do they make even more radical demands?

With 1963's Equal Pay Act, the final objective of American feminism's benign variety was met. (Next time someone whips out the pay gap myth, remember that equal pay for equal work has been federal law for over fifty years.) Did feminists declare it a job well done and celebrate the golden peace between men and women? Did they give us even a crumb of gratitude for acquiescing? No, demands just became even shriller.

A decade later, they got abortion, which by now has even exceeded the body count of FDR's good buddy "Uncle Joe" Stalin. Yet even that wasn't enough to placate feminists. Were the gods of liberalism thirsting for blood?

During stage 2 feminism, diseased individuals (including some who are literally crazy) spread this mind-virus. During this phase of infection, this new contagion infects great quantities of normal females, lacking any natural ideological immunity. Feminists suffer chronic irritation, some even shrieking with rage.

Infected individuals irrationally fear all males, no matter how benevolent or harmless. Social heart disease begins as male-female relations are poisoned. The divorce rate reaches 50%. Reproduction slows; some individual lineages start becoming extinct.

Stage 3: Tertiary sybaritic syndrome

Res ipse loquitur

The third wave of feminism began during the early 1990s. The fever abated slightly, but the infection was far from running its course. Some even questioned what they were doing, but quickly got shouted down. Then, screeching about oppression quickly renewed. Feminists began exacerbating comorbid cultural Marxist conditions, a symptom called “intersectionality”.

Stage 3 feminism profoundly affects the life cycle of individuals. In the past, males and females would pair up and form families, a biological fact quite displeasing to second wave feminists. Stage 3 feminism promoted “alternative lifestyles”. Sterile same-sex pairing is just the beginning.

Youthful high-class female individuals are encouraged to enter college. That wouldn’t be problematic if not for other factors. They’re indoctrinated and have massive debt by graduation, educated to serve corporations and generate more tax revenue. During their most fertile years, they consume large quantities of ethanol and mate frequently. However, a constellation of arbitrary criteria (not flashy enough, too short, middle class, too nice, etc.) are grounds for rejection.

Loading...
Only when the bloom of youth fades is “settling down” acceptable. Marriage requirements include having adequate resources and not minding used goods. If he displeases her (usually expressed as “I’m not happy”), then she can terminate her vows of “till death do us part”, steal half his money in court, and then find another sucker. Reproductive rates are low; feminism encourages them to keep slapping the “snooze” button on the biological clock until it’s too late.

A different disease progression creates low-class females. They internalize “you don’t need a man” to include raising children. Beginning at an early age, these specimens spawn several children by multiple absentee fathers. Often they’re observed in discount stores, having double the normal body mass, with their underdisciplined illegitimate offspring in tow. The government buys their votes through tax money collected from males and high-class females.

Stage 4: Artificially-induced domestic strife

In the USA, feminism metastasized into the fourth wave about ten years ago. Stage 4 feminism is tightly aligned to cultural Marxism. Its practitioners are difficult to distinguish from Social Justice Warriors. Many male individuals also are infected by now, unaware that they’re being played as useful idiots, much like chickens persuaded to vote for Colonel Sanders.

While feminism was mutating, cultural Marxism itself was mutating too. No longer having Soviet ideological guidance, its former proxies in Western academia started pushing things in very strange directions. For example, the Frankfurt School wanted to turn Americans into a nation of wimps, reduce social cohesion, and inflict guilt complexes useful to their ideology. However, they wouldn't in their wildest dreams have imagined the US military paying for sex change operations, or school children encouraged in that neurosis too.

Stage 4 feminism profoundly affects the reproductive life cycle of individuals even beyond stage 3 dysfunction. Heterosexual activity is discouraged: cockblocking, "street harassment" rhetoric, dreadful lies about "rape culture", etc. Unfounded accusations obtain great publicity; when discovered to be false, there are no consequences for the accuser.

By this time, multitudes of invasive bodies are entering the nation because of comorbid multiculturalism. Rather than establishing symbiosis in the new society, they freely consume its resources.

Stage 5: Terminal phase

Welcoming collective suicide

The nation is near death. The feminist agenda is completely unopposed. Individuals are infected early in their growth stages. Dissent—something that could inoculate against infection—is prohibited. The high viral load causes individuals to reproduce at only half the rate needed to sustain the nation, which begins to wither quite rapidly.

Then invasive bodies attack the host with impunity, just as happens to an AIDS patient. The government (the nation's cerebral executive function) will even encourage this, because all the while it's been infected by the alien microbes that released the cultural Marxism toxins. The law (the nation's immune system) is utterly paralyzed and can't control the invaders. Several case studies show that it will not react at all if massive numbers of female individuals are targeted. However, the law will still punish free speech by healthy individuals trying to halt the diseases killing the nation.

The USA isn't at stage 5 yet, though Sweden is nearing terminal infection, and some other Western European nations show symptoms of full blown compromised immunity. At this point, curing nations of malignant feminism and comorbid cultural Marxism becomes extremely difficult. If untreated, death is inevitable. The invaders will die off too after they've devoured the nation's corpse, and so will their enablers, but they're oblivious to this.

The cure

Where's Augusto when you need him?

If feminism reaches stage 2, the best course of treatment is to deploy powerful ideological remedies attacking the root cause of cultural Marxism. This should begin as soon as possible, before the nation becomes gravely ill. If feminism reaches stage 5, then emergency surgery might even be necessary to try to save what's left of the body politic.

Read More: The DEFCOCK Alert System

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

White British Lord Sentenced To 3 Months In Prison For Mocking Colored Guyanese Woman

August 4, 2017 | by Christopher Leonid | Link | Original Link

The West has reached a stage in its decline at which private individuals are able to criminalize other private individuals by taking offence at them. The obvious problem with this is that, although practically anyone can find someone to offend them for some reason, only those who are reputable and within reach of the law can become suitable targets for the offence takers. Thus, offenders tend to be selected much more for their material and social suitability than for anything they have actually done or said, while those claiming to be offended can be anyone simply seeking to remedy a vague sense of inferiority or victimhood.

The trial and imprisonment of Lord St. Davids was classic in this respect.

Lord St. Davids

Stage 1: Self Induced Victimhood

A year ago, when Britain voted for independence by a democratic majority, a former model called Gina Miller took it upon herself and her third husband's massive fortune to question the constitutional legality of the Brexit process in the Supreme Court. For a heart-stopping moment, this woman's tight-lipped smirk dominated the front pages of the press, emblematic of the smug manipulation of the nation's legal systems by an elite minority of bad losers.

The Supreme Court's ruling, however, not only provided Ms Miller with the legal clarification she sought but actually served to secure the constitutional validity of the process that Brexit would take. So she quietened down and was happy for a few months.

A woman can only humiliate herself so much before her whole life becomes a vendetta against her society.

Ms Miller is from Guyana, a former British colony, but is descended from coolies brought in from Britain's larger colony, India. She claims to have suffered domestic abuse from her second husband, British philanthropist Jon Maguire, whom she divorced in 2002. In 2010, when the idea of Brexit was still hopelessly idealistic, Maguire stood as a political candidate on a pro-Brexit platform. I will let you ponder whether Miller's recent attempt to manipulate the course of British self-determination was driven by a respect for due process or a vendetta rooted in something else.

In any case, Miller could only launch a legal bid to thwart the will of 15 million voters because Britain is an exceptionally tolerant society which believes in upholding the plea of an conscientious individual against the will of the nation. Even in Britain, however, a reasonably intelligent person should have anticipated that someone might say something nasty behind her back. Miller says that the abuse that she claims to have suffered in her previous husband made her strong enough to endure a torrent of bile directed at her by the public. She certainly wasn't brave enough to handle the following:

> £5,000 for the first person to 'accidentally' run over this bloody troublesome first-generation immigrant.

The comment was shared privately on Facebook by Lord St. Davids, a society rascal. It was accompanied by a description of Ms Miller as a 'boat hopper' as well as a suggestion that migrants in general should return to their 'stinking jungles.' I might not have said these things myself, but it would have been amazing if nobody had come out with something of the sort.

Stage 2: The White Knight Offence Broker

Normally, Lord St. Davids' comments would have gone unnoticed. However, the opportunity to connect a litigious celebrity woman with another celebrity scapegoat for the scorn she had recently suffered proved too tempting for a desperate society blogger named Matthew Steeples. Seeing his chance to cream off some media attention for himself, this pathetic man picked up Lord St. Davids' comments and forwarded them directly to Miller. She swallowed the bait, felt 'violated' by the 'racist' language, hired security guards and went to court. Lord St. Davids was handed a 12 week prison sentence and Steeples' blog, a kind of low Testosterone Takimag, celebrated with the language of heroic vanquishment.

Matthew Steeples – a translucent invertebrate lurking at the bottom of London's social ocean for a fragment of celebrity to fall from above £5000 for a killer, advertised for by a private citizen on Facebook. Could this be taken as a serious threat? Of course not.

A distinction has to be drawn between renting bodyguards because you feel threatened by an individual and renting bodyguards because you are actually in danger.

Were Lord St. Philips' references to "stinking jungles" and "boat hoppers" racist? Of course not.

For many, Miller's intervention grated more because she is a foreigner – but the difference between treachery and invasion has never been described in terms of race and I doubt her critics could care less whether she were Chinese, Rhodesian or an Eskimo. (Even racist comments should be permissible when directed at a figure who deliberately thrusts herself into the public life. The legal suppression of true bigotry prevents it from defeating itself).

Stage 3: Trial By Press

This pathetic and hypocritical trial became a useful catharsis for many disparate personal interests, exposing more about the nature of Lord St. Davids' critics than I think they intended. For starters, the judge passed the sentence with a tiresomely formulaic indication of her own cookie-cut conscience:

> …you show hatred by publicly directing abusive threats at others, which is a criminal offence in this multi-racial society we are lucky enough to live in.

However, unrestrained by fetters of reality or legal formality, it was the press pillorying that truly let the mask of justice slip to reveal the underlying motives of the obstinate, bigoted and puritanical mob. In order to construe the criminality of fashion, previous comments of Lord St. Davids', mostly on the theme of condemning immigrants, were dredged up by the courts and the papers. Few had the impartiality to concede that he had also called for Tony Blair to be tortured, because such a revelation would have risked exonerating him in the eyes of the public. The papers also wasted no time in listing his former convictions, foreign escapades and bankruptcies (which make for hilarious reading, by the way).

Nawdy!

Predictably, however, the self-appointed inquisition overplayed their hand by broadcasting – horror of horrors – that Lord St. Davids is a supporter of Donald Trump. I don't know which gallery of the coliseum The Mirror thought they were addressing with this attempted slight, but we all heard it and the only possible sane response is to ask why, if the outrage truly had anything to do with anything Lord St. Davids had said, did The Mirror deem this information relevant for its readership? Is support of Donald Trump a crime now? What kind of blinkered morons are reading this paper? Do they not understand that it was exactly this sort of pig-headed pillorying of the opponent that lead to Trump being elected in the first place? Although we must assume that Brexitland is on the right course, some commentators still display an astonishing level of naiveté about the spell of anti-white racism and class war that their propagandists cast over them.

> "Guess Lord. St. Davids got a lenient sentence because he's a white aristocrat – would have been longer if he was black and unemployed." – Commentator

No. He only got noticed because he's a white aristocrat. If he had been an unemployed East-London Somali waving a meat cleaver and chanting death to the infidel to a cheering crowd of brethren, there would have been no virtue to be signaled in relaying his comments and no social or material capital to be gained from feeling intimidated by them. When an outburst emerges from the ranks of elite white men, however, the culprit is pointed out like a tiny green shoot in the the Sahara: irrevocable proof once and for all that the sterile, peaceful, environment is under mortal threat.

Faced with the constant prospect of arbitrary punishment a person who – by wealth, standing, opinion, or accident of birth – finds himself in the camp of the offenders might as well consider himself on relentless parole.

The only question, then, is whether or not he should self-censure accordingly. Well, I think we all know the answer to that.

Double Down And Never Surrender

Lord St. Davids refused to stand in court until deputy chief magistrate Tan Ikram addressed him by his correct title.

Self-interested heroism which that is only displayed under state protection will stop when people like Steeples stop being rewarded for it. Until then, it is people like Lord St. Davids who preserve the extremities of acceptable speech.

Fortunately, the only person who the law is attempting to correct in this situation is the only person who won't change a bit. The British aristocracy have mostly experienced life in a boarding school system which would make Guyana look like Switzerland and, as a result, are completely invulnerable to limp-wristed attempts at penal correction. When he gets out later this summer, Lord St. Davids is going to enjoy more goodwill than ever before. The legal order may bend toward social homogeneity and tyrannical kitsch, but the social order (that toadying court eunuchs like Steeples want so desperately to be a part of), will always follow Lords like Viscount St.David.

Where the party goes, the nation and its laws will eventually follow. That's how civil society works in Britain, and anyone who finds our green pastures intolerable is free to head back to their fragrant woodlands.

Read Next: British Police Chief Will Prioritize Online Abuse Reports Over Burglaries

Christopher Leonid

Defining male agency during the collapse of the Sexual Revolution.

How To Be A Good Jew

August 4, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

As the saying goes: if you can't beat them, join them. If the rulers are able and intelligent enough to rule the West through controlled dialectics, banking, and other rather sophisticated stuff, they have definitely earned their right to rule. If might makes right, well, a weak resistance appears rather futile and it would make more sense to hail the mighty bookkeepers.

Everyone red-pilled enough knows how powerful the Jewish diaspora is. The Ashkenazim, in particular, have the higher mean IQ, the higher mean wealth, and centuries of experience in usury cleverly helping their neighbors, each factor contributing in making them definitely smarter than we are.

Do not worry though. We cannot save anything, as most Westerners chose to drove into a sea of ephemeral pleasures and illusions, especially women, yet we can imitate the most successful sons of Israel and turn just like them. We won't have the precious Semitic or Khazar blood, and we won't have Tay-Sachs, but we may get plenty of booty.

Why become a Jew?

A good goy

"OT" stands for Old Testament and Only Truth. The Talmud and bank records aside, this book is the only one worth the shot. Written by wise elder Rabbi, the OT clearly stipulates that God—oops, I mean G.d—discarded the whole of humanity but one people He chose over everyone else. Before Jews stood only primitive, retarded peoples, and after Jews appeared only falsities such as this Sadducee sect called Christianity. Jews are also the oldest, wisest people alive on Earth. (The Aryan Vedas, the Chinese Tao and other gems of wisdom do not count. No Westerner reads them anymore anyway, and Aryanity was made taboo after 1945.)

Being a Jew is much better than being a goy. Sure, every human on Earth is valuable, and this is something these awful racist, retarded Trump voters failed to understand; but G.d Himself wanted the cattle… I mean, the rest of humanity to serve His chosen people. Is it not better to eat at the globalists' table than to wait for crumbs to fall out?

Even if you are Bill Clinton or George Bush, you will always be second-class if you are not Jewish. You may be a good goy, doing all the petty stuff G.d's chosen do not want to do, but this is nothing compared to getting in touch with the Holy Mysteries of the Wailing Wall. (Forget that Arabs spent centuries pissing on said wall. Lord Rotsch… ahem, Balfour managed to have them deported anyway.)

> From my perspective, there are on the one hand Jewish people like my father, his friends, the shames, the jiddelech, the einkilech, the schlichim, and on the other the non-Jews: maids, sweepers, Shabbat goyim—who come start or stop the fire at home on the day of Shabbat, for it is forbidden to us to do it ourselves on this day–, police agents, do-nothing drunkards roaming the streets… all non-Jews are inferior people. Me? I am the son of Schmuel Friedman. I am the son of a king! (Oscar Friedman, "One Second Of Happiness", quoted from Hervé Ryssen, Les milliards d'Israël, 2014, p.127)

The right mindset

As I said in another piece, the mindset is the most essential part of it all. Have the right mindset, carry on, and sooner or later you will pierce or flip any obstacle. So, to get any success in life, choose the Jewish mindset and grow it by remembering constantly of the following tenets:

1. The goyim (non-Jews) are cattle. They have no rights per se. They may have rights if a Jewish authority decides so: these rights are temporary, useful, and can be revoked at will. Therefore, the goyim can be exploited without sin.

2. Jews are better. They are more intelligent, more cunning cleverer, more creative, and rise to the top of any intellectual profession. There is no point arguing against this—especially since it is anti-Semitic to do so.

3. The world is a sea of economic niches and potential passive income, i.e. what happens when you own a capital and others pay you a fee for using it. Try to spot a niche, and if it still belongs to the goyim or no one took it over, get it!

4. Real, productive work is degrading. The spiritual aristocracy, as count Coudenhove-Kalergi had put it, should take the niches and live off the work of the cattle. If you can't find a way to exploit the goyim—which can also be construed as helping them to get closer to G.d—you are a second-class Jew.

5. Usury is good. The rainless crop is but a classic that never falls out of fashion.

6. The more money, the more blackmailing, the more influence you wield is equal to your total score at the game of life. People like Madoff, Sheldon Adelson or "Ashley Montagu"—the English really believed that one was one of theirs, LOL—are top dogs. Bernie Sanders is second-, perhaps even third-tier. He got sidelined because a goya wanted to come first. What a pity.

7. You must think constantly about how to make money. This obsess… ahem, focus and strong-willedness will allow you to find creative ways to con your uncut neighbours.

8. Be an internationalist. Be a nomad. Your tribe lives across the borders. Take advantage of this by pretending to be patriotic or attracted by whatever culture you live in when you can extract a profit from doing so. If the locals are mad at you after you helped them, move on. Also, non-Jews and especially whites fighting each other is very good. Whites should never rise above petty divisions. They have nearly destroyed themselves because of these, and they should complete the job before the NWO is achieved. Both pro-refugeeism and civic nationalisms—note the plural—should be encouraged.

9. Bobby Fischer and Norman Finkelstein are monstrous traitors to the tribe. They should be hated absolutely and relentlessly. If you happen to meet them, stab them then say a "right-winger" did it.

“We’ve been chosen by S… G.d. Yeah, really!”

Undergoing circumcision and doing all the intricate ceremonies is secondary. Judaism is less a religion, if at all, than a group strategy. What matters is joining G.d’s chosen, eating kosher—a natural-born Jew does not need to do that but you should virtue-signal a bit at the start—and unlearning any Aryan or honest way to think. Ethics is but a toolbox.

Get yourself a copy of Werner Sombart’s The Jews and Modern Capitalism to get a taste of the creativity, progressiveness and open-mindedness of Jewish merchants during the Middle Ages. Aryan or Christian merchants were stupid enough to respect the rules whereas Jews had original, awesome ideas, such as making propaganda, selling used stuff as new, making up cheap surrogates of luxury goods, clipping gold coins and so on.

(If you are reluctant to read, remember that the best Jews are Ashkenazim with a high verbal IQ. Jewish Nobel Prize receivers are all Ashkenazi. When Albert Einstein was, um, borrowing complex equations from Henri Poincaré and David Hilberg, his Sephardic counterparts were selling used trousers to credulous goyim in dark alleys. Be cool, be an Ashkenazi.)

Small scams

…by selling China-made or used clothes

Once you joined a liberal synagogue—the orthodox ones reject the soaped goyim like you—start small. Swindling, conning, lying with a “vibrant” or “radiant” aura are all parts of an art. As every other art, trickery must be practised repeatedly to be well done. Start petty and local before moving to greater levels.

The simplest thing to do is buying a stock of cheap Chinese stuff and selling it on a flea market. Jewish trade has always been, mostly, import-export, as this kind of trade allows the seller to benefit from the cheapness of a particular place and lie to the customer on the quality of whatever he sells. Of course, as you must rise above the dark-skinned swindlers, you cannot decently be content with spreading your stock on a carpet and waiting for the customer. No, you must add at least one twist.

For example, you could sell fake football jersey at the price of the original minus twenty per cent. Explain to anyone interested that you are selling real, original stuff, not like all the others around, and that your stuff is last year collection or something. Put up a nice stand. What matters is that people believe in what you say and take their wallet out. You could also sell fake leather jackets or genuine but worn-out ones you coated with polish before the exhibition. Sell these at the price of new, genuine ones, then tell the potential customer he looks good and could benefit from an exclusive bargain.

In France, Sephardic sellers specialized in telling customers they just won at a raffle and could buy pieces of furniture at half the price. Then they would sell their furniture at an enormous price, “but don’t worry, for you won an exclusive right to buy it at half the price… oh, and as a courtesy, we will give you this one too for a third of the price!” Eventually customers would notice that the solid wood table was actually made of mixed lumber. The Sephardic had bought it first at a much cheaper price before they would tout it.

Due to the fact that even goyim can discriminate—sheesh!—between real and fake leather, solid wood and mixed lumber, or notice how a “brand new original” jersey would become tattered after two washings, it is better to change location regularly when engaging in such a trade. Notice how gaming the schiksa will give you a good training for gaming girls. As Yuri Slezkine or James Coleman noted, we are living in a world where everything has become a “capital”, so, just sell it.

If you prefer a sedentary life and have more money, get a brick and mortar store in a poor—or, better yet, a recently impoverished—location and play the hardcore pawn. Buy up the leaving goyim’s goods for a cheap price. If the goyim need money, allow them to borrow it from you in exchange for something precious they have. Of course, they will have to sign a lengthy contract written in small print and filled with obscure clauses that allow you to keep whatever they pledged if you wish.

The point of pawning is extracting valuable goods from the poor and needy. If they repay their credit, you will benefit from a rainless crop, and if they do not pay, sue them while keeping their stuff. Cons: you should better be able to recognize real jewelry from fake and must have a pet gorilla some security.

If you know personally some urban bourgeois bohemians, use them to create a non-profit.

You can pander to any cause célèbre available provided you manage to get at the very least $5000 of donations per month. Then, use the money to pay yourself a high wage, and then give at best half to whatever “unprivileged” you pretend to live for.

“I really care for the unprivileged”

If you are good at imitating other people, start faking IDs on the Internet and give fake transfer orders here and there. You can buy anonymous offshore bank accounts, prepaid credit cards and other devices on the Darknet.

Great frauds

As most ROK readers are actual underprivileged—had you not been abandoned or even rejected by the system in the first place, you would be a SWPL—I won't dwell much on these. If you are curious on big Jewish frauds, read about Goldman Sachs, carbon fraud, and Hervé Ryssen's newly translated The Jewish Mafia.

A good way to start a great fraud is through a Ponzi scheme. This age-old method never tires. Create an investment fund, pretend to be another person if you need to, or launch your own MLM project with the help of unscrupulous goyim who will be right below you in the pyramid. For the scheme to persist over a long time, pay small interest rates: this will be easy to justify by the never-ending crisis, and the gullible will think of it as a proof of security.

If you wish to join some lobby but cannot because of the intense competition or boot-licking it takes, start studying law. If you become a magistrate, you will de facto join the government of the courts that looms over all the States, and contribute to letting your newly found brothers off the hook when they get in the dock while sentencing harshly the Trump voters and other dissenters whenever you can. Being a magistrate will not make you a swindler per se, but you'll have ample opportunities to meet with some and bargain your way up.

As a conclusion

Why do honest work when you can earn millions without producing any real asset? Why sell assets to anyone when you can contribute to a shameless self-promotion while enjoying power over the huddled masses? Stop being a brainless Gentile. Become a Jew.

Remember to get your certificate of Jewishness from your local rabbi. Buy it out if you must. You will need it later to flee to Israel, a country where numerous swindlers live happily with their millions, as Israel barely extradites any of its citizens.

Be careful though. Perhaps there will come time when Satan—ahem, S.tan—will fail at rewarding creative, progressive, and clever behavior.

The above piece was satire. I do not advise anyone to really convert into Judaism nor commit unlawful actions. Reader discretion is advised.

Read Next: How Cryptocurrency Is Destroying The Jewish Globalist Banking Cartel

How The Promotion Of Homosexual Culture Harms Straight Men

August 6, 2017 | by Ben Bera | Link | Original Link

I am sure the majority of RoK readers will know how homosexuality and gay rights are harmful to men on the grand civilizational scale; but, I'm here to talk about how gay rights and the acceptance of gay culture in the mainstream is harming men on a personal level.

Since the late 1960's, when the baby boomers erupted in misguided fury at the world their forefathers built, fought and died for, gay rights and, in turn, gay culture, has become intimately entwined with the mainstream. Today, with the Western world's confusion over what it is, gay culture has become sacrosanct, an intrinsic component that is viewed as inviolable and august.

It Has Made Men More Vain

One of the most distinct aspects of gay culture's grip on the contemporary West is how its influence has made ordinary men vainer. Of course, it's important for a man to look good, to take care of his body and pay attention to how he dresses. I do it and most of my friends and family do it.

However, to adopt the daily rituals of moisturizing, waxing, applying fake tan, etc., is crossing the thin line between healthily enhancing one's self-confidence and being consumed by vanity.

As the fashion industry is overly populated with women and gay men, this dangerous mix churns out ever more effeminate looking styles and grooming products for men. We've reached a point where some men will spend just as many hours preening themselves in the bathroom mirror as their girlfriends do.

It's one reason why I think globalists and consumerist entities love to push gay culture wherever they can. The obsession with youth and vanity is the perfect tool to keep businesses coffers permanently overflowing.

It Has Destroyed Men's Ability To Bond

Today, most men in the West have superficial friendships with other men. They will treat their friends as part of the furniture, and the topics of conversation will be limited to football and where they're going on holiday. Why has this happened? Well, there are many reasons, with the usual suspects such as hyper-individualism, feminism, etc., playing a part, but the main aspect is Western acceptance of gay culture.

The increasing prominence of gays and the gay lifestyle in media and entertainment has, over many decades, secured in the minds of men what is and is not gay behaviour. For the most part, men, helped in their views by women who want to monopolise their time, will see any bonding or intimacy with other men as gay, thus putting a giant wedge in their ability to forge genuine friendships.

Gay culture has helped to all but destroyed men's understanding of Platonic love, and it's clear to me why we see so many men today suffering from various forms of depression and anxiety. For example, if you're with a woman who's an emotional drain, have a crappy job, and all your friendships are built on nothing, then wouldn't you be depressed also?

For many of you reading this, male bonding is still an uncomfortable subject, because the influence of gay culture has informed your way of thinking so much, even without you knowing it.

Most of the friends who I would confidently call brothers are from Eastern/South Eastern Europe or the Middle East (mainly Iran and Turkey) for the simple reason that our bonds are so much greater than with most of my Western friends. This is because all of them were born and raised in countries where homosexuality is highly frowned upon, so the poisonous distortion of Platonic love doesn't happen.

It Gives Men Unhealthy Sexual Appetites

A man having a bit of fun with a cute girl is healthy and natural. Men need to play the field to a degree, but today, men, from their teens onward, are becoming promiscuous to an unhealthy degree.

Again, there are myriad factors one can attribute to this, but with our elites in assault mode, trying desperately to make gay the new standard, from mainstream media talking about the benefits of "analingus" to anal sex. This rejection of morality and resisting anything but temptation, part and parcel of the gay psyche, is having an obvious and deleterious effect on men.

This obsession with constant sexual gratification, exploring ever more degenerate ways to get that gratification, is leading men down a seedy and perverse path. This has all come about through the promotion of the homosexual lifestyle.

Conclusion

In the words of Henry Makow, "I have no malice toward gays. I feel the same way about people who have the flu. I want them to get better, and I don't want it to spread." There are a few gay men out there who I greatly respect, writer Jack Donovan being one of them, but, ignoring the wider societal damage, the embracing of gay culture across the Western world has harmed, more than any other group, heterosexual men.

Read More: America Is Becoming A Homosexual Nation

Ben Bera

Ben is a freelance writer, photographer and entrepreneur. A Socialist for all of eight months in his teenage years, now in his mid-twenties, he is a proud right-winger, with a distaste for much of the modern world. You can find him at his most right-wing on Twitter.

Top 4 Fitness Tips From The Former Soviet Union

August 6, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Against all logic and reason, I occasionally find myself feeling some twinge of patriotism towards my homeland of the United States of America—albeit, usually in the context of "Criticizing its institutions so she can relieve herself of the guilt and malaise that has been laid upon her".

On a similar note, while I do have a great deal of respect for the culture of the Russian Federation and its environs, I am not quite as enamored with Eastern Europe as some nameless manospherians are, with a few exceptions in some select areas.

Like most on Return of Kings, I despise communism in all its forms, and with just cause. However, having the interests and professional career that I have, I'd be remiss if I didn't point out that there were two things that the Soviet Union did very well—music and weightlifting.

The music is, of course, completely beyond the scope of this article (I'd recommend looking into the Alexandrov Ensemble myself), but weightlifting can be discussed in depth.

And so without further ado, here are four performance techniques of weightlifting that were developed either in the Soviet Union or in Former Soviet Union states, and can be immediately utilized in your lifting endeavors.

1. PNF Flexing

Also known as "proprioceptive neuromuscular function", this is essentially where one flexes/squeezes as many muscles as possible in order to call even more muscle fibers into play. And the more muscle fibers that are involved in a lift will of course lead to a greater increase in strength. In fact, according to one of Russia's greatest exports Pavel Tsatsouline, doing PNF can instantaneously make you capable of lifting another 5-10 pounds that you couldn't before.

When you're doing a lift, merely grip the bar as tight as you can, and clench the buttocks as hard as you can. This will cause irradiation (see below), force the other muscles of the arm and the lumbo-pelvic-hip-complex to maximally tense as well, giving you an overall increase in your muscular strength.

2. "Greasing the Groove"

In general, Olympic weightlifters seem to follow a pattern of high intensity/load, low reps, and moderate sets spaced throughout the day. Paradoxically, doing high repetitions can also provide some benefit to strength as well—not so much from increasing the strength of the muscles, but from training the central nervous system to be accustomed to the particular movement you are doing.

In other words, to develop strength, you can do a program of high repetitions and moderate weight, as this will train the central nervous system to become more "used to" the movement and thus easier for you.

However, a problem does arise from this—doing too many reps with a weight close to your maximum can lead to compensatory movements and thus injury (i.e., arching or twisting the back to achieve a lift, to cite just one example), and doing many reps with a light weight kind of defeats the purpose of strength training in the first place.

There is a way to both grease the groove to get the neural advantages of repeated sets AND develop strength as well, and it happens to be the next entry.

3. Drop Setting

Going back to Pavel Tsatsouline's example, he does not refer to this technique by name, exactly, so much as he cheekily refers to it as something of a "Potemkin Village" of fitness. Namely, his Spetsnaz unit in Afghanistan had to occasionally impress military officers by putting on a show of Herculean musclemen that were ordered to specifically put on said show.

One of their tasks was to build their muscles to be as large—yet still functional—as possible, a goal that was achieved with drop setting.

To do this, begin with one set of your one rep maximum, with no more than 2-3 reps. Then drop 5 pounds and do another set of 2-3 reps. Then drop another 5 pounds. And another, and so on and so forth. You can literally do this exercise until you're just lifting the bar. This technique trains both the one rep max and many repetitions, the only downside being that it does take a large amount of time to do

4. Cycling (not steroids!)

Also known as periodization, this is a technique in which you must do something that might seem a bit paradoxical. Once you have reached a plateau in training, lower the weight down to a light intensity, and start the cycle again.

Slowly, over a period of 8-10 weeks, you should get back to where you were before, and you just might find that you will set a new personal record.

Dos vidanya, and good luck with your training!

Read More: 3 Ways High-Rep Lifting Can Improve Your Routine

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

3 Reasons Why Christian Parents Are Raising Slutty Girls And Beta Males

August 7, 2017 | by Eusebius Erasmus | Link | Original Link

I grew up in the Church of England (aka Anglicanism), a church that, among other heresies, permits female ordination and gay marriage. This is perhaps unsurprising given the Church's speckled past; King Henry VIII's sinful polygamy caused England's 1534 split with the Church of Rome.

Because it’s [insert current year]! God will understand.

The creeping influence of secular leftism has not only penetrated the Anglican Church. In response to Donald Trump’s moderate immigration stance, Pope Francis condemned Christians who turn away refugees, and likened refugee-holding centres to ‘concentration camps.’ This, of course, is a straw man: no moral person, Christian or otherwise, argues for turning away legitimate asylum seekers.

While these developments are troubling, they occur because, at their core, Christian parents produce beta boys and slutty girls who do not mimic Christ’s image. Until I swallowed the red pill, I was very much in the former category. I have, thankfully, renounced the Church of England, while maintaining my Christian faith.

Before I enumerate the reasons that Christian families create such poisonous qualities in their offspring, I start with a disclaimer for men: in no way should this prevent you from marrying a proper Christian girl. However, you need to know how to sort the sheep from the wolves – a skill that only game bestows.

1. Biblical monogamy is misinterpreted

In St. Paul’s letter to the Ephesians, verse 5:35, it is written,

> Husbands love your wives, as Christ also loved the church.

This verse has frequently been interpreted to mean that, in effect, husbands should bend over backwards to please their nagging wives – Jesus, after all, died for us ungrateful sinners! Thus many a Christian man becomes slave to his spouse, licking the ground she treads upon.

However, St. Paul’s advice to women, in Ephesians 5:22, is conveniently ignored:

>

> Let women be subject to their husbands, as to the Lord.

Harken to a better time.

In other words, women are not natural leaders in the household, and should always be subservient to their husbands. They should always strive to respect, adore, and obey their men.

Husbands should, of course, love their wives, but the Biblical meaning of 'love' has been diluted by cheap romantic literature and Hollywood fairytales. In Christian theology, to 'love' is to 'will the good of the other.' Thus, loving someone means sometimes exerting a strong guiding hand, steering that person away from harm, even if that person does not appreciate it at the time.

For instance, I know of a Christian guy who allowed his wife to go clubbing with her girlfriends. As any red pilled man knows, this means she is getting bored of her marriage, and is seeking outside excitement (i.e. sex with an alpha). Clearly, both wife and husband were not living according to St. Paul's Biblical dictates. Allowing your wife to walk around unguided is tantamount to Adam's original sin: allowing Eve to wander around the Garden of Eden, stumbling upon the luring Serpent.

2. Forgiveness excuses promiscuity

Young women, like men, have high sex drives. The difference is that sex, for women, is easy to procure, especially if a girl lives in a city.

Loading...

Many conservative girls, brought up in a religious household, have a job or schooling that takes her into the big city from which she derives sex, drugs, and SJW brainwashing. That old joke about Catholic schoolgirls – that their repressed sex drive finds abundant outlets after high school – rings true. My supremely devout Catholic friend raised a daughter who now has feminist tattoos defiling her otherwise beautiful body.

A typical Catholic schoolgirl

The girls always excuse their behaviour by saying something to the effect of, “Oh, it’s alright, God will forgive me later!”

While Christ’s forgiveness is supreme, and we often stumble in our Christian journey, such forgiveness does not imply permissiveness. St. Paul repeatedly asks us to turn away from sin, so that we might strengthen our relationship with Jesus. As his letter to the Romans reminds us,

> For the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Sin is not to be sought, and while I myself have been guilty of falling back into a pattern of sin, I have recognized and taken steps to remedy my path.

3. Christians praise beta behavior

If sex is easy for women to procure, it is hard for men. We have to hunt; in other words, to learn game. I know Christian men who claim that they are ‘waiting until marriage,’ but it really is not their choice – no quality girl would voluntarily sleep with them. They excuse their lazy behaviour by claiming that they are leaving it in God’s hands.

And they are enabled in this attitude by bad Christian pastors, many of whom are beta boys themselves. Take, for instance, this video from LifeTeen, a Catholic youth ministry:

I cringed, to say the least. The advice is: be intentional, become her friend, don’t text her, get to know her, etc. Although some of this advice is good (“Be okay with rejection”), the rest is laughable. Once we understand girls’ true nature: they prefer ambiguity to intention, will never have sex with friend-zoned guys, and favour text-messaging to other modes of communication.

Sadly, this advice, and worse, is representative across Christian denominations. Such repressing of a male’s core sexual instincts is detrimental to Christian men, who often find themselves marrying a slut who has tired of the cock carousel.

Conclusion

Let's use our churches as mosques – 'cuz tolerance!

Is it any wonder, then, that our churches have become so cuckolded? We, as Christians, are raising beta boys and loose women. Such creatures are natural prey to SJWs and liberals, who only seek to defile and destroy Christianity.

While I do not subscribe to all of alt-Christianity's tenets, ROK contributor Damian Michael is correct: Jesus Christ was a masculine man. He was fully God, but also fully human, and therefore 100% man. We, as a Church, should seek to reflect Christ's godliness and humanity in our lives. To do otherwise is the Devil's influence, and contrary to natural and godly law.

Read Next: Western Parents Are Raising Boys To Be Failures In Life

Eusebius Erasmus
Eusebius is a Prairie Canadian who likes gun rights, traditional values, and economics.

Israel’s Nuclear Policy Goes Beyond Deterrence And Threatens The Entire World

August 7, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Some consider nuclear weapons a curse, and I concur. Others say nuclear deterrence has helped keep the peace. Still, there are some obvious problems. At least twice, false positive radar readings nearly started doomsday, largely unbeknownst to the public. Also, deterrence obviously works only with rational actors, unlike emerging pests such as North Korea. Unfortunately, one of America’s closest allies is one such problem.

Israel’s precarious geopolitical situation

These confrontations often don't end well.

Israel, surrounded by Muslim countries, has a land mass and population slightly less than New Jersey. Relations have been strained by sporadic warfare since the beginning, leaving the Arab public seething with hatred. Their leaders are somewhat less hostile, but not enough for normal, neighborly international relations.

There's a grim historical precedent here. In 1099, the First Crusade—a rather late reaction to Muslim expansionism—established the Kingdom of Jerusalem. In 1187, it was largely overrun, surviving only in southern Lebanon. In 1291, it was obliterated completely. All that would've happened sooner if the Arabs had been more unified. The Islamic caliphate then expanded further, until reaching a terminal decline.

The Israeli leadership is well aware of what's at stake. They maintain a well-funded modern military. They've had the draft since the beginning, even for women; a pretty extreme measure, though justifiable in their case. The Palestinian territories are mostly walled off, which has gone far to curtail the endless spit-in-your-eye war they've suffered since day one.

Further, intense lobbying has gained them proxies in the American government, and they've done much to destabilize neighboring regimes. For example, I'm not shedding any tears for Saddam, but there was more to the Gulf Wars than Kuwait's independence or even promoting democracy. Senator Fritz Holdings said in 2003:

> The truth is, I thought the Israeli intelligence was really furnishing all of this information and that we were going in this time for our little friend Israel. Instead of them being blamed, we could finish up what Desert Storm had left undone; namely, getting rid of Saddam and getting rid of nuclear [arms] at the same time.

Be all that as it may, Israel's ace up their sleeve is their nuclear capability.

Israel's nuclear program

The nuclear weapons plant at Dimona: here's what you can see

PM Ben-Gurion made Israel's nuclear ambitions a priority since the beginning. According to Peter Pry's 1986 book Israel's Nuclear Arsenal, they studied from the masters. Fifty six Israeli scientists were trained at Oak Ridge in Tennessee and the Argonne National Laboratory in Illinois. Israel's first reactor was the Soreq Nuclear Research Center, designed in 1956 by American Architect Philip Johnson. According to Pry, the USA supplied this effort with fifty kilograms of enriched uranium. This is just a research facility, but all the experience allowed the Israelis to pursue other goals.

With assistance from France, Israel created the Negev Nuclear Research Center near Dimona, which began construction in 1958 and went online around 1963. In fact, President Kennedy expressed some concern. JFK didn't have much of a chance to follow up on this, for obvious reasons. Some consider this not to be a coincidence, but all that's highly debatable.

The Dimona facility contains six secret basement levels for arms production under the Institute 2 lab. The elevators are located by the cafeteria, behind a wall to fool the American inspectors visiting in the 1960s. Below ground is the real control room, not the Potemkin Village version the inspectors saw. It's estimated that the Dimona facility produces 40 kilos of plutonium annually, as well as enriched uranium. Lithium, deuterium, and tritium (used in the ignition sequence of H-bombs) are its other products. Estimates in 1986 put Israel's arsenal at 100-200 nukes.

We wouldn't know about these details if not for the revelations of Mordechai Vanunu, a former worker at the Dimona facility. Before he lost his job in 1985, he snuck in a camera and took over fifty pictures. The next year, he took his story to the Sunday Times in Britain. Unfortunately for him, he got taken in by a "honey trap", then was drugged and abducted. After the Mossad took him back to Israel, he was imprisoned for eighteen years, eleven of which were in solitary confinement. At least it's better than what Julius and Ethel Rosenberg got, back in the day.

Israel has never signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty; I'll have to give them credit for honesty. By now, top Israelis have admitted what everyone knows, yet strategic ambiguity—the "maybe we have 'em, maybe we don't" game—still serves a purpose. Specifically, American law has strings attached to foreign aid, and developing nukes is a no-no. If the international community includes two hundred rowdy kids in a playground, nine of whom have grenades in their backpacks, then it doesn't make sense to let more of them have grenades.

Israel is a very large recipient of American foreign aid. (In 2017, they'll get $3.1 billion, a lavish racket for our industrialized "51st State" that's gone on for decades. Meanwhile, Mexico gets just under $135 million, largely toward combating the drug trade.) In fact, the US government has been sued to try to get them to enforce their own rules, which most people aren't aware of unless they read the Israeli press.

The Samson Option

Israel's weapons delivery systems include fighter-bombers, with the Tel Nof air base being a likely depot. Further, the Jericho III ICBM has an estimated maximum range of 11,500km. Their navy includes Dolphin-class submarines capable of launching missiles.

The Israelis intend to use nuclear weapons if their country is in danger of losing a war. During 1973's Yom Kippur War, this nearly came to pass. Things were looking pretty dicey, so they notified Henry Kissinger that his boss had better send aid, or else. Nixon complied, sending a massive airlift to Israel's defense, saving the day.

Israeli attitudes tend to go beyond a wish for self-defense:

> Twenty, thirty atomic bombs on Berlin, Munich, Hamburg, Nuremberg, Cologne, Frankfurt, Stuttgart, Dresden, Dortmund and so on to assure the job gets done. And the land will be quiet for a thousand years.
> —Chen Ben-Eliyahu

As it happens, Germany sold them their new submarines. That's par for the course for today's German leadership. Consider also the following:

> If left to its own Israel will have no choice but to fall back on a riskier defense which will endanger itself and the world at large… To enable Israel to abstain from dependence on nuclear arms calls for $2 to 3 billion per year in U.S. aid.
> —Economic advisor Amos Rubin
>
> We possess several hundred atomic warheads and rockets and can launch them > at targets in all directions, perhaps even at Rome. Most European capitals are targets for our air force. Let me quote General Moshe Dayan: 'Israel must be like a mad dog, too dangerous to bother.'… We have the capability to take the world down with us. And I can assure you that that will happen before Israel goes under.

> —Martin van Creveld
>
> You Americans screwed us in not supporting Israel in its 1956 war with Egypt… We can still remember the smell of Auschwitz and Treblinka. Next time we'll take all of you with us.
> —Israeli official quoted in The Samson Option

Will cooler heads prevail? Let's hope we don't have to find out.

A plague on both their houses

The Israelis and Arabs should settle their quarrel like gentlemen and leave the rest of us out of it.

One hardly can fault Israel for wanting to defend themselves against hostile neighbors, but they certainly can be faulted for threatening to nuke countries elsewhere. Further, an all-out launch would devastate the entire world from fallout and nuclear winter. If they're serious about this then "our little friend Israel" is as irrational as North Korea. (Why are these guys still getting American aid again?) Their leaders should consider the day after: who would take in any Israeli survivors if they did this?

As much as I dislike Muslim terrorism, it has a couple of advantages over the Israeli kind. At least they're not out to nuke the world if they don't get their way. Further, they don't pretend to be our friends while playing us for chumps.

Really, Israel has a lot going for it; they should get back to that. If their mission is to be a light unto the nations, then it’s time to start acting the part.

Read More: Is Antisemitism Genuine Bigotry Or A Practical Counterdefense Against A Powerful Tribe?

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Culture Is Downstream From Politics

August 7, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A popular expression these days is “politics is downstream from culture,” which was said by the late Andrew Breitbart. While it is certainly true, the reverse is also true. Culture and politics are deeply intertwined, affecting each other proportionally within an escalating feedback loop.

Where did game come from? In a recent podcast, I explained with a guest that game was a direct reaction to feminism, which was a top-down political effort by the elites, such as the CIA, to employ women (to lower the price of labor) and to destroy the traditional family unit (to make women dependent on elite-controlled institutions instead of men). Game was an effective individual response that helped push new political action in the form of “rape culture,” which attempted to allow most instances of sex to be defined as rape. The game reaction to that is to avoid leftist women, record sexual encounters, or expatriate. The leftists will react to that in due time, perhaps forcing a man to date certain woman like a Christian baker is forced to bake cakes for homosexuals.

Where did the alt right come from? It is a direct reaction to a high number of non-white immigrants to the United States, which began with the 1965 Immigration Law. The culture of pepe, cuck-shaming, and a white ethno-state is the 50-year delayed response to one law. The rise of the alt right affected politics by helping elect Donald Trump as President while introducing many dissident figures to the mainstream. The political reaction of trying to shut them all down is ongoing.

From every dissident reaction came before it a law that was created in response to a previous cultural reaction, which was formed from an even older political reaction. This chain of causality can be traced back to the first society in a process resembling a Hegelian Dialectic of action clashing with reaction to form a synthesis that will then collide with another action. Everything is connected from the beginning of man, and what we do today will have ripple effects for the remainder of humanity.

What's interesting to note is that feminism and immigration to the Western world was disproportionately promoted and enabled by Jews. Therefore in the case of modern dissident movements, a more apt saying would be “reaction is downstream from Jewish action.” If you are to believe that Jews are at the top of most Western institutions, dissident movements are a reaction to their power.

The life of an elite Jew is to control the non-Jew through both cultural and political means. The non-Jew responds and then the Jew adapts to that response. The lives of Jews and non-Jews are therefore inexorably tied together. Understand that any attempt to control something external to you means that you are also being controlled by it, since your existence becomes primarily a response to the external. The fact that the behavior of a Jew is at least 95% identical to that of a non-Jew is testament to that.

I respect the late Andrew Breitbart and the work he did into jump-starting the dissident right, but I believe he missed the other part of the equation of how strongly politics, particularly laws, influence culture. If I stop and think of my life, it is primarily a result of laws surrounding immigration (hence my birth to Middle Eastern immigrants in the USA) and feminism (hence my foray into game). My “culture” would be rather different in the absence of these two forces, and that’s assuming I would even have come into existence at all.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: The American Cold Civil War

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

7 Recommended Products For Your Butthurt Liberal Friends

August 8, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

It’s tough to identify as a liberal. Just about every major news network shares your political viewpoints, your beliefs won’t get you ostracized or terminated from your employer, your rantings won’t get you mass unfriended on Facebook, and most university professors and your fellow students all “have your back”.

Seeing how everything is so stacked against the left, especially since neo-Hitler has infiltrated the White House and is going to bring back black slavery and exterminate Muslims any time now, what can they do to cope with this threatening and butthurt-inducing new world order?

As an offering of good grace and friendship to our misguided liberal cousins, here are six products which we highly recommend to help you survive the fallout of any triggering phenomena you bear witness in your day to day lives.

1. I Can’t Believe It’s Not Butthurt!

The greatest fictional product for liberal butthurt that has ever been devised from the interwebs. If your 'progressive' friend has a sense of humor (which is becoming pretty rare nowadays) then the gift of laughter is a quick fix for emotional devastation.

Otherwise you risk being unfriended from all forms of social media. Shows just how "tolerant" they really are.

2. Professional Cuddling Service

Oh no! Did some fascist in a suit tell you to speak English instead of Spanish in the United States? How will you ever "heal" from this incredibly traumatic event!? Fortunately, there are now professional cuddling firms which are booming under the Trump Reich, and they are more than happy to help a liberal snowflake depart with their cash.

3. Ben & Jerry's Ice Cream

Ice cream is truly one of life's great comfort foods. In fact, it would have made for a delicious and therapeutic treat for a left winger after the presidential election. You know, when that evil white supremacist Nazi, Donald Trump, beat ~~Hitlery~~ Hillary Clinton and ushered in the Fourth Reich.

Since liberals tend to love 'social justice' causes, you should recommend they go purchase the overpriced brand of Ben & Jerry's. The company was co-founded by Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield, two (((super white guys))) who announced in May 2017 that their company would no longer serve two scoops of the same ice cream flavor in Australia.

Why? Because of the Australian government's refusal to legalize same-sex marriage all across the country.

Nothing says "progress" like taking away the rights and personal choices of Australian consumers in order to protest against the form of marriage which facilitates childbirth! So have them fatten up on Benny's and they'll feel better in the spirit of social justice!

4. A New Trash Bin

Did Donald Trump / (Literally) Hitler get reelected? Did somebody give a speech which didn't march lockstep with social justice? Did Return of Kings publish another article saying that women with tattoos and blue hair are less than absolutely perfect "Goddesses"?

If so, then be prepared for maximum fury being unleashed on trash bins. Picking them up and forcefully throwing them on the ground appears to be somewhat therapeutic for SJW's.

5. The Sound Of Music

Nazi's…. Nazi's are everywhere nowadays! The biggest European villains of the 1930's (after the Jewish-Soviet's who orchestrated the Ukrainian Holodomor of course) seem to have resurfaced all over the United States, and are plotting to take away the rights of everybody who is not a heterosexual white male!

The best recommendation for them to cope with the resurrection of Nazi's is to offer them a viewing of 'The Sound Of Music'. It's probably the most G-rated of Nazi-era movies ever produced, which is important to remember since even words that liberals don't like are now considered violence.

Have them retreat to their safe space where they can defeat "hate" via lots of "love" and singing and spinning around the Austrian Alps!

6. A(nother) Cat

This option is the most preferable for single and childless women over the age of 40, popularly known as "spinsters" and more pejoratively as potential "crazy cat ladies". However, since this article is about expressing sympathy for the butthurt, we'll just call them "strong independent women".

Usually liberals, strong independent women tend to absolutely adore cats, and the older they get, the more they treat them like Pokemon to fill an increasingly bitter void for their lack of procreation. Gotta catch em' all!

7. Adult Coloring Books

Take that Hitler! I'm going to color you as black as your heart!

Adult coloring books have become a thing in the 2010's. A sign of the increasing infantilization of Western adults who cannot seem to bear letting go of childhood pursuits. Since SJW's pretty much are adult children, this will be a great sedative for their butthurt.

All manner of malls and supermarkets should be carrying them. So quit cryin', get off Huffington Post, and color away.

Conclusion

An offering of laughter (if they can bear it), a paid cuddle, Ben & Jerry's Ice Cream, a trash bin to toss around, 'The Sound Of Music' DVD, lots of cats, and lots of adult coloring books. Put all of them together and you've got yourself the ultimate safe space to facilitate recovery from the cancer of liberal butthurt! It's time for the snowflakes to go shopping and cast away their unbearable pain of dealing with reality.

Read Next: Feminists Demand Free Menstruation Products So They Don't Have To "Pay To Be Women"

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

Black Music Has Devolved Into Absolute Degeneracy

August 8, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

From John Coltrane creating masterpieces with a saxophone to Michael Jackson grabbing his genitalia with a white glove, black sentiment and culture can be studied through their music. It is currently at the lowest point in their history.

What Black Music Used To Be

Jazz and funk used to be popular genres. During a time when it was safer to go to clubs, disco was it. And some of the greatest musicians of this era were in fact black. The stuff they produced was amazing and puts today's rappers to shame.

John Coltrane – Giant Steps

It’s hard to find another musician who can match Coltrane’s skill on a saxophone. Do you hear any rappers doing this kind of performance anymore? Nope.

Kool & The Gang – Summer Madness

CD 101.9 was once a popular smooth jazz station, but got replaced by the crap millennials listen to. Songs like this were played, perfect for a drive on a hot day or even just to chill out. You can actually feel your mind going to a higher level as you listen to it.

George Duke – Summer Breezin

Back when the afro was popular, Duke dished out this relaxing tune.

Najee – Betcha Don’t Know

Released in the 90’s, this hit was not that long ago, which goes to show you just how fast the music world has fallen to a level that is no longer recognizable to its predecessors.

Was (Not Was) performing Walk The Dinosaur

Yes there were girls showing skin, but it good clean fun without perverted ideograph and zooming in of butts and thighs.

If you like music like this, checkout my playlist.

What Black Music Has Become

Jail, shooting people, promiscuous sex, and glorifying the thug ghetto gangster lifestyle is essentially what the music is about.

Snoop Dogg – Lavender

Snoop Dogg, a dog trapped in a human body, thinks it was fine to make a video pointing a gun to a Trump figure.

I lost count how many times curse words are used. Apparently, rappers these days are incapable of saying one sentence without “mother f#$ker” or some other foul language.

Rappers are promoting violence and degeneracy whether they realize it or not. It is encouraging the black youth to identify themselves with the gangster image and to treat women, white or black, as ‘hoes”.

This is what passes as “music” today. Misguided souls think this is just expression of “art.”

Well perhaps art means something else today.

Candy Shop by 50 Cent (even though it’s pronounced Fifty Cents)

I once showed this video to a Pleiadian friend of mine who was visiting at the time (long story) who had never seen anything like it before. His comment was, “This is lowest consciousness.”

Ludacris – What’s Your Fantasy

There’s no point or purpose to this song, just hopping around like a clown with paid-off bimbos. Pretty much all of the big-name rappers rip music off of real musicians. You’re listening to a breed of “musicians” who can’t even play an instrument, taking the tunes from others and spitting out rap about grinding with women, slapping hoes, and drugs.

I once found a female friend of mine in college listening to this Missy Elliot “Work It” song. She was always moody and depressed from all the failed relationships she had with guys from parties, clubbing, and alike. Listening to this, is it any wonder why today’s youth are so confused?

Papa Singh once yelled at me pretty good in front of my friends when he heard Twista’s “Slow Jamz” as I was flipping through stations in the car. Most responsible parents don’t want their children listening to this garbage, because they know what it does to the mind.

Does this mean all rap is bad? Certainly not, however, it's quite rare to find songs that are free of cursing, $2 trash girls, and drugs. One that I remember that was acceptable, was the theme from the first Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles movie. As cheesy as it may be, it has far more creative lyrics compared to what is produced today.

That goes to show you just how low the genre has fallen that you have turn to a kid's movie to find something that is of some decency.

What Rap Has Done to Society

It's created a generation of domestic terrorists. Criminals, to be frank. Kids that seek to attain the same low-life desires portrayed in these videos. Some are even glorifying the criminal image, stating it naturally attracts girls. Yes, but take a good look at what kind of girls are attracted to these thugs, and then think whether or not you want to adopt that image. You can still be a bad boy without being a gangster.

Too many kids are imitating this criminal lifestyle. It has infected the Western world all over from America to England and even New Zealand.

Is Rap Really African Culture?

I have heard claims that rap is part of ancient African culture and that I've offended them. Well, how come you don't see traditional tribesman in Africa dressed up like gangstas?

Anyone who's ever been to Africa will tell you that when you arrive, they greet you in their traditional attire and perform old ritual dances which don't include any cuss words or rapping.

During one semester, I watched a real African group that performed their traditional dance. It was refreshingly amazing—the performers actually had skill playing those drums by hand while you had real women dancers with rhythm. Nothing like what you see in America. It's hard to find good examples online, but this is closest I could find…

Black kids should watch this then rap. It might do them good in life.

Read More: Why Are Rappers Acting Like Women?

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

6 Reasons Why A Man Learning Game Should Also Do Brazilian Jiu Jitsu

August 8, 2017 | by Liam O'Connor | Link | Original Link

Sometimes, we can fall into the trap of one-track thinking.

> Okay so I will meditate in the morning for an hour before going out and approaching at least 20 girls, then lifting later. Tomorrow I will do it again.

It's easy to have a laundry list of things that you have to do and can only use for one specific purpose—like having 50 tools for 50 things. Why not have a few tools for the same 50 things? As you go on in your journey of improvement, you will find ways to streamline your tools to achieve the same results and beyond. Allow me to present an excellent tool for any man trying to become a casanova: Brazilian Jiu Jitsu

1. Increases confidence

On the mats, you are forced to concede defeat to other men (and sometimes women if they're really good). Normally, you will be training in front of most of the class, too. Failing in front of a crowd can be painful, especially if you partake in a tournament. The constant beating you will receive does its part in destroying embarrassment.

Always be pushing the envelope and chasing discomfort through new classes, tournaments, and better opponents. Becoming proficient at anything boosts a man's confidence. Once you break through that beginner's rut, you will submit one person, then two, then ten, and looking back on how far you came from your first miserable day will make you proud. The thrill of conquest in your bones will make it much easier to apply the same frame to gaming girls.

2. Doubles as self defense training

Over 90% of street fights go to the ground, and grappling will teach you how to manage, diffuse, or outright destroy your opponent. BJJ is only grappling, which means that there is no punches, kicks, or any form of striking. Knowing how to make an opponent helpless without throwing a single punch is both rewarding and incredibly practical. Of course in an actual fight you will be striking, but the BJJ training will give you a huge leg up over anyone who you might get into a fight with.

3. Trains the mind to relax in uncomfortable situations

When you first start out in BJJ, you will be burning energy and sweating up a storm like you never have before. You will think aggressive tactics is all you need to win at BJJ. You will go into each match at 110% and burn all the gas in the tank.

Off the mats, your mind will be occupied with thoughts of times you tapped out, times where you missed an opportunity, and have regrets over what you did not do. Losing in BJJ and reacting with anger and frustration is the fastest way to quitting or never improving. The same mindset applies to game.

Over time you will expend less energy and focus more on technique. Your mind and body become synergistically connected and you flow more—rather than being tense and hyperreactive all the time. Eventually you will develop a state of zen when grappling. You focus less on breathing and become in tune with your surroundings. This “zen” is simply the mind reaching homeostasis.

Conditioning the mind like this can be done through meditation and rhythmic hobbies, but BJJ does that too. Capturing the essence of when you hit your zen mode is how you apply it to all other areas of life—game included. BJJ forces you to be in the moment and flow with your competition while trying to get an edge to beat it. Like chess, you can think ten moves ahead, but what happens now (her shit testing, your opponent making a move) determines how you will flow with it. Getting tapped out (rejection) phases you less and less after hyper exposure.

4. You meet tight, fit girls at tournaments

The girls you will meet when doing BJJ are some of the best aesthetically. Getting muscular does not go hand in hand with grappling, so girls that do it are fit and lean, instead of trying to look like a man. They have tight, firm asses, toned legs, and pert tits.

Some sports have a bell curve with a higher proportion of more ugly females (cough crew), but BJJ girls have not disappointed me so far, save for very few outliers. BJJ as a discipline is attractive to women because there is no violent striking, and women can compete with anyone without getting seriously hurt.

5. Breaks the touch barrier

BJJ requires you to get close and personal with your partner. Not once have I thought of two men grappling as being gay, but I have seen grappling with girls as having sexual undertones at times. We all know women think about sex a lot more than men, but when these girls are rolling around with a lot of sweaty guys emanating hormones left and right—you get tingle paradise.

Going to tournaments and other classes, you can run game on any girl that you roll with, and it is extremely easy to break the touch barrier and get physical with her when you work up more tingles using your tight game. Rolling with girls while having other girls see you also sets off a biological signal in her head whether she thinks it or not. Seeing you dominating another girl makes her think about sex 10/10 times. Thus, it is easier to open other girls after practicing on a few.

I have personally netted great results from being “that guy that charismatically submits the girls” at both different gyms and competitions. One thing though, if you have a gym or two that you call your home, then don’t shit where you eat. 99% of the regulars at these gyms are close knit, and if you aggressively pursue the girls at your gym, whether you fail or not, can lead to a less than favorable training environment for you.

Don’t nuke potential bonds with fellow grapplers at your gym for one piece of pussy. You can be more sexually aggressive outside your home gym(s) and competitions. Game at your home gym should be after she shows IOI. Don’t let your desire for pussy supercede your desire to become a great grappler.

6. Teaching dates to grapple leads to sex

You will look like a wrestling god in front of a girl who has zero experience in the sport. Make sure to let her know during your interaction that you grapple. Make it interesting, and work it into your LMR smashing tactics, or as a way of easing into sex. If you get her to agree to learning some “important self defense tips,” then the foot is already in the door. She may not see it as sexual first, but getting heated and rolling around with your bodies rubbing close to each other creating friction will get any girl’s motor running for sure.

Conclusion

Your focus should be on your training first and foremost. The point of this article is that BJJ naturally remedies some issues facing many men today who are learning game. If you do end up joining just for the “poon gainz,” then my advice to you is to stick with it for at least a year.

Over time, you will highly enjoy getting on the mats and rolling with your classmates. You will sign up for tournaments because you want to win. There is a commonly held belief in the manosphere that says if you foster an attractive, healthy, and interesting lifestyle, women are more inclined to come to you. That is the raw honest truth when taking up BJJ. You will have so much to talk about, a hobby that trains your body, and an excuse to give girls a “demonstration.”

Read Next: 5 Things I Learned About Life From Brazilian Jiu Jitsu

3 Reasons Why The Democratic Party Has Already Lost The 2020 Presidential Election

August 9, 2017 | by Michael Witcoff | Link | Original Link

Our enemies have not only overplayed their hand in a panicked spiral over these last few months, but have also demonstrated a shocking inability to read the new zeitgeist and learn from their mistakes. Mark my words: there is a 0% chance of a Democratic Presidential victory in the 2020 United States elections.

While the reasons for this are many and varied, I've done my best in today's article to distill the three most prominent reasons for why I believe that any attempt at victory on their part will lead to nothing but yet another of the disastrous humiliations they've been subjecting themselves to since Trump's victory.

November 8th, 2016, was a sign that the pendulum of American politics is now swinging in the other direction. As Rhythm is an eternal Law of Nature, it will now continue swinging rightward for at least several decades until hitting its peak and returning course in the other direction at some time in the future.

This being the case, I believe we should be conducting ourselves with a forward-thinking mindset, and putting more focus on what we will be building over the next decade than how to defeat an opponent that has already lost.

That said, let's take a look at three concrete reasons for why the Democrats have already lost in 2020.

1. They Are Losing Constituents (And Gaining None) With Each Passing Day

Even their politicians are starting to abandon ship.

With each failed attempt to market Social Justice to the American public (and it fails every single time), more citizens "wake up" to what's going on. Their minds piece together the grand tapestry on a higher level, and they feel the sting of betrayal from the establishment they had previously thought had their best interest in mind.

Every time this happens—which is now a weekly if not daily occurrence—more and more of those who grew up on the left begin to question their old beliefs. The questions that have been brewing in their minds for some time finally boil over into full-blown curiosity, and they start looking around for answers that can help them reconcile what they're observing with what they've been told is the truth.

This does not––ever—lead to the conclusion that everything is "as it seems." The deeper down the rabbit hole they go, the more exposed they become to the truth which has been hidden from them; this inevitably pushes them away from the left, especially as they begin to realize who is responsible for keeping it all hidden in the first place.

This same phenomenon is not occurring on the other side of the spectrum. There are no conservatives or traditionalists who, observing what's happening in the world, are abandoning their beliefs in favor of "social justice."

The only people "social justice" appeals to are those who have already made up their minds… and more and more change their minds daily. The Universal Mind of the American public is only traveling in one direction—and with the latest revelation that millions of illegals have been voting Democrat for at least eight years, it seems likely this has been the case for much longer than is now becoming obvious.

Their one and only hope of winning the popular vote is to flood the country with illegals and remove the citizenship requirement for voting. I don't think this is going to happen, since more people than ever are now keeping a very close eye on this process and I suspect there will be some major criminal cases soon regarding those who have been trying to hinder the legal voting process from behind the scenes.

Our President obviously knows this, and I suspect his latest immigration act was drafted to hinder illegal leftist votes more than for any other reason.

2. They Have Boxed Themselves Into A Corner

An artist's sketch of the 2020 Democratic candidate pool.

By having no more coherent message than "down with white men," Democrats have automatically limited their leadership options to only white women, minority women, or minority men.

All three options lead to a fractured party (and an electoral loss) given the particular quirks of the leftist mind. I will detail these in a moment.

They cannot run a white male Presidential candidate, because even more of their rapidly-shrinking base will jump ship than is already happening anyway. Regardless of what the white male might say, most of their audience is not really able to grasp anything beyond surface characteristics, so even if he says things they agree with, they will feel bad if they cast a vote for a white man.

And at the end of the day, feelings is what leftists go with. He won't win, no matter how much he throws his own race and gender under the bus attempting to do so.

For the record, I'd vote for a traditional Christian minority over a white liberal atheist 9 times out of 10. I very strongly believe that any form of nationalism without God at the center is bound to fail, and that ultimately faith is a stronger tie than ethnicity.

Theocratic Nationalism makes more sense to me than any other kind, and brings blessings which I frankly don't see with less traditional forms of government.

Anyway, that is a matter for a different time. Back to the topic at hand.

Given the bewildering level of identity politics at play within the Democratic Party, the other options are also bound to end in nothing but division and in-fighting. If they run a white female, most of their constituency will still complain that she's white and ultimately not support her.

White women themselves generally hated Hillary Clinton and many voted for Donald Trump, so they have already demonstrated that a candidate's simply being white and female is not enough to win them over. They prefer more traditional values over the identity-politics game.

But if the Democrats run a minority female, the anti-white, anti-male message she will have to run on will invariably alienate the majority of the American population. If they run a minority male, the other minority groups will complain that 1) he's a man, and 2) he isn't doing enough to serve the minority groups of which he himself is not a member.

The leftist hoax of "intersectionality" is a lie. When the rubber hits the road, their constituency is nothing but a bunch of competing victim groups that each chooses its own interests over that of the others.

In other words, Democrats have no winning plays in the 2020 election. It's already over.

Ultimately, the left simply cannot and will not appeal to the majority of the legal American population either way. They have made "whitey is evil" their sole point of rapport with their constituency, and—how fortunately for us—seem utterly incapable of learning from past mistakes.

Not enough people believe in this message to vote for them, and the vast majority of the legal American population has become unwilling to vote for candidates who do nothing but insult them.

Even the massive censorship on public utilities like Facebook and Google has been unable to contain the obvious shift in narrative which has occurred over the last few months.

Since the "mob-rule Democracy" we now live in basically means that whoever tells the masses what they want to hear wins (one of the Founding Fathers' worst nightmares) you simply cannot win the Presidency by running on a message that the majority of the population does not want to hear.

3. We Will Probably Be At War

Whether it's with Russia, Iran, North Korea or simply multiple factions of a Civil War here in America, I think there is a decent chance that the United States will be at war during the 2020 election. There will definitely be a war sometime during the decade, but it might happen a bit early.

If you look at American history, you will quickly discover that Presidents who run for reelection during wartime simply do not lose.

Whether it's because the American public has decided it's too risky to make that big of a change when things are already so tumultuous, or patriotism and "love for the leader" are heightened during times of conflict, we always stick with what we've got when the going gets tough militarily.

Ironically—and depending on which of these countries we'll end up at war with by 2020—there's a good chance it'll be a result of the establishment's saber-rattling. Yes, the same establishment that threw everything it had into the disastrous loss of Hillary Clinton in 2016 may well be entirely responsible for the fact that their next puppet will lose as least as soundly as she did (and likely by a wider margin).

So you see, gentlemen, the Democrats have already lost. And they've lost badly. Rather than continuing to ridicule them and pick apart their arguments (as fun and easy as that can be), it is far more prudent at this point in time to decide on what we want the shape of post-2020 America to look like.

It is time to formulate and verbalize precisely what we want moving forward, so that our leaders in the near future can begin building their platforms and policies now. Being ignored will sting the Democrats even more than all these recent losses have, since they seem to love drama and attention more than they like winning anyway.

Instead of wasting our time with fruitless debate, let us simply mock them for having already lost. Let them sputter and squeal in their desperate attempts to stay relevant; let us drown out their cries with our laughter.

As we begin to deprive them of the attention and respect they most desire, they will double-down on their insanity and simply push more and more of their already-shrinking base over to our side. All while we prepare and move our desired pieces into place.

Read Next: 3 Reasons Why Only Unmasculine Men Vote Democrat

Michael Witcoff

Michael is a Christian, a copywriter, an author, and a marketing consultant. He believes the West is experiencing divine wrath for turning our backs on God, and that the only hope for salvation is to unite under one faithful banner as our enemies have under theirs.

Google Forsakes Its Reputation By Firing Employee Who Dared Sharing Mundane Facts

August 9, 2017 | by Eusebius Erasmus | Link | Original Link

A Google engineer has been fired after circulating a 10-page 'Anti-Diversity' memo. James Damore, a published Ivy League biologist, wrote the tract, Google's Ideological Echo Chamber, which challenges the organization's gender equity policies and political correctness. He currently plans to sue Google for wrongful termination.

This story's frightening aspect is that Damore's views are centrist, and hardly controversial. While acknowledging that 'discrimination' can cause gender disparities, Damore argues that biology also plays a role. Among other empirical findings, women display more agreeableness, and higher neuroticism, than men, and are thus better suited to certain careers. He then goes on, in his memo, to suggest methods to create gender parity, with these biologically-based traits in mind.

For this ignominy, he was chastised by Google's senior brass. Vice President of Diversity, Danielle Brown, crafted an emotional diatribe against Damore, and Chief Executive (white knight) Sundar Pichai told employees that Damore had perpetrated 'harmful gender stereotypes.' If anything, Google's actions only confirm Damore's worst fears, that "Google's left bias has created a politically correct monoculture," in which free expression is punished.

Never mind that Google does not practice what it preaches – 20 percent of its technical workers are women, and 35 percent are Asian. This, of course, makes sense for a profit-maximizing company, but the SJW mantra must be ceaselessly chanted from the rooftops nonetheless. What is worrying is that a moderate and scientifically based memo can instigate a witch-hunt. Yet there is a silver lining to this: we, in the right, can cultivate centrist allies, as the left increasingly alienates people.

The Biological Evidence

Of course Instagram whores should fight in wars!

Testosterone is a fundamental male hormone, which is why ROK readers are encouraged to get blood flowing through their testicles: lifting weights, cold approaching girls, and training martial arts. Testosterone determines behaviour and choices. Low-T men turn into beta losers.

It is therefore unsurprising that testosterone determines career choices. For instance, in research published in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, scientists found that "individuals high in testosterone… were more likely to choose risky careers in finance." It is easy to surmise, from this alone, that high-T men will easily out-earn women. Indeed, women born with abnormally high testosterone levels are more likely to choose traditionally male careers, like pilot or computer scientist.

Men are attracted to careers which require working with objects and ideas, while women want jobs which involve social interaction (wasting half their day on social media). The former, which involves hard skills like computer programming or woodworking, earns more than the latter.

When four psychologists were asked to respond to Damore's assertions, they all agreed with him. Indeed, Debra W. Soh said:

> As a woman who's worked in academia and within STEM, I didn't find the memo offensive or sexist in the least…
>
> Within the field of neuroscience, sex differences between women and men—when it comes to brain structure and function and associated differences in personality and occupational preferences—are understood to be true, because the evidence for them (thousands of studies) is strong. This is not information that's considered controversial or up for debate; if you tried to argue otherwise, or for purely social influences, you'd be laughed at.

That sexual differences cause differences in career choices should therefore come as no surprise. This is simply science. What is shocking is Google's reaction.

The Narrative and Its Adherents

Women's comparative advantage is to be mothers and homemakers. For 99% of women, their time is better spent raising healthy, balanced children, than engaging in cubicle-slavery, alcoholism, and promiscuity.

Yet the dominant globalist narrative is that women are equivalent to men, in every facet of their being. The purpose of this is threefold:

1. To destroy the family. Doing so dissolves individuals' support structures, and makes them depend on the government and corporations.
2. To ensure that women compete against men, hence lowering everyone's wages.
3. To destroy Western culture, which is premised on appropriate gender roles. Destroying the culture encourages hedonism and rampant consumerism.

Whether or not the globalists actually believe these tenets is irrelevant, since it serves their purpose. The point is they have thus far been successful. Damore's sin was to question the idea that we are separate from our genes.

Silver Lining

James Damore is not the only centrist to have suffered for his opinions. Homosexual liberal Dave Rubin's views on Islam caused his YouTube revenues to drop by 60%. Other controversial YouTubers, like PewDiePie and Entrepreneurs in Cars, have suffered similar fates from YouTube's demonetization. Jordan Peterson, the acclaimed Canadian psychologist, whose views are centre-right at most, was denied government research money. Popular UCLA law professor Keith Fink was fired for his supposedly conservative opinions. I could go on.

There is a silver lining: the left is persecuting moderates. We, as right-wing men, should therefore seek strategic alliances with useful centrists, especially those who have a large audience and/or are in positions of authority. Roosh wisely warned that we cannot win without parallel institutions; a possible tactic is to cautiously ally with moderates in creating separate universities, media, and think tanks.

Eusebius Erasmus

Eusebius is a Prairie Canadian who likes gun rights, traditional values, and economics.

Game Of Thrones Has Nothing But Beta Males And Alpha Women

August 9, 2017 | by Maximus King | Link | Original Link

Although Game Of Thrones, at first glance, appears to be about war, blood, loyalty, family, and betrayal, a closer look will reveal that the entire cast is filled with alpha women tolerating weak, emasculated, orbiting, deformed, insane, beta males.

The women all have a vision to rule the Seven Kingdoms from the Iron Throne. The men are pathetic, with few exceptions. This complete role reversal from medieval-like times actually represented, when women gathered, cooked, and raised children while the men hunted and ruled, perpetuates the current trend of grrrl power and men-hatred that has metastasized throughout our entertainment industry.

The women

Cersei: Queen of the Iron Throne, for now. Rules her brother, who should be king. She joyfully kills all who cross her, and any innocents who may get in the way.

Daenerys: Queen of the Dragons and a bunch of other titles. She has some moral qualities like freeing slaves, and is the quintessential “cat woman” surrounded by her loyal, deadly dragons.

Olenna Tyrell: The true power behind the House Tyrell (while alive). Even at 80-some years old, she was far tougher than almost any man on this show.

Yara Greyjoy: Self-proclaimed commander of the 14 seas, usurping her brother and uncle. Gets more women than both combined.

Brienne: A six-and-a-half-foot tall mammoth woman who is loyal to a fault and tougher than almost any man on the show. She also kills men with ease.

Lyanna Mormont: A 10-year-old girl who makes grown men cower with fear with her ferocious onslaught of orders, common sense, loyalty, and honor. Any man would be proud to be half as tough as she.

Arya Stark: The second youngest alpha on the show and the toughest. On a mission to kill everyone who has harmed her or her family, including Cersei, who is probably the evilest person on the show.

Sansa Stark: Queen of the North. A natural leader. Grown men, including her older brother Jon Stark, listen to her advice and follow her commands.

Now the “men”

Samwell Tarly: The ultimate beta. He took in a Wildling, an unforgivable act to his family and his people, and is raising her son, who he allowed to be named after himself. This caused him to be excommunicated and disinherited by his father, a true alpha, who is not part of the show. Also, there is a fair chance that Samwell has impregnated the Wildling. We shall see.

Tyrion Lannister: The smartest person on the show, but he's a dwarf. There is nothing wrong with being a dwarf. However, this is medieval times, and dwarves are called "imps," and they are not respected. Tyrion has had to talk his way out of death many times, and his family tried to kill him.

Jamie Lannister: Made babies with his sister, who rules him as his queen. Doesn't seem to have any interest in other women, despite being dashingly handsome. Also, only has one hand.

Theon Greyjoy: Tortured and neutered by Ramsay, Theon has gladly allowed his sister to rule him. During battle, he jumped ship instead of trying to save his sister.

Jorah Mormont: The ultimate orbiter. Banished by Daenerys so many times that she finally gave up and allowed him to return. A better example for the friend zone has never been found.

The Hound: A big bad-ass, true. But, he's deformed, afraid of campfires, and was almost killed by a little girl.

The Mountain: One of the fiercest men in the kingdom. But he's the queen's slave.

Varys: Neutered and loyal only to himself. And homosexual. Game of Thrones almost refuses to allow any man to be what that society would consider "normal."

Littlefinger: Sold Sansa, a teenager, to Ramsay. Then tried to have sex with her. Some might call this an alpha move, but he sold a virgin to a twisted psycho and then tried to get sloppy seconds from her afterwards, despite their 20-plus year age difference. Pathetic.

Ramsay: Dead now, but a twisted, evil torturer who loved to watch people burn, get skinned, and get eaten alive by his dogs. Probably the most hated character on the show, rivaling only Joffrey.

The list isn't complete, but I've made my point: under the guise of warring families ruling for control of the known world, the show is actually the ultimate example of bossy women controlling pathetic men. War, blood, battles, and breasts are thrown in as a distraction to keep the men who are watching distracted from the fact that their very essence of manhood is being subliminally evaporated by a society that celebrates beta males supplicating to frigid females.

Game of Thrones (GOT) isn't the only show where you'll find this current trend of go-girl writing. Or of Athena-like women displaying amazing powers. Atomic Blonde, Wonder Woman and Kidnap are recent examples of attempts by the industry to capitalize on the trend. If you want to see weak men, you only need to head over to Silicon Valley and take your pick. Big Bang Theory is beta male paradise.

Or, watch Chris Pratt's character, in Passengers, wake up Jennifer Lawrence (who has higher-level access to everything, of course) ninety years early because he's lonely. Stop fast-forwarding for a minute, watch almost any commercial featuring a married couple, and you'll quickly see a stupid man being berated by a bossy woman.

Weak men are literally everywhere in entertainment. This misandry has become our new zeitgeist, and it's not getting better. We need more male characters with qualities like Jon Snow from GOT, who risked his life refusing to bend a knee to Daenerys, and John Wick, who calmly killed the enemy while dressed to the nines. Our newest hero, Roland, from The Dark Tower, is caught in an eternal battle against someone way tougher than he.

I long for the days when men like Eastwood, Stallone, and Schwarzenegger ruled the screen. Or Segal, Van Damme, and Snipes. These men were pure alphas who took no shit from any man or woman, and, more importantly, lived in a society where that was accepted.

Unfortunately, today we live in a society that is in its heyday celebrating the beta male. For now.

Read More: How Feminism Is Ruining "Game of Thrones"

Maximus King
Maximus King is a happily married serial monogamist who believes that feminism, affirmative action, and social censorship are hurting America. He has no social media or Website or anything to sell. If you want to reach him, he might get back to you from

What To Do If You Keep Meeting Boring Girls

August 9, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

If you want to pick up hot girls, having charisma is crucial. A huge part of charisma is finding other people interesting enough to engage with them in a fun, albeit challenging manner. Guys who are natural players understand this instinctively. The rest of us have to learn it for ourselves.

The following query posted on the Seduction group on Reddit by a reader called Shit_My_Ex outlines his disappointment in the personalities of the girls that he meets through cold approach. I hope he won't mind me quoting it verbatim here:

> I have never been concerned whether I'm going to come across as boring or uninteresting, but I find most of the women I'm immediately physically attracted to I either don't have much fundamentally in common with them or they severely lack a well rounded personality. Humor is one of the biggest turn on's for me, I could be talking with a 10/10 stunner/ Neurosurgeon/ noble Laureate swim suit model…. But if her personality isn't one that works with mime and we can't whole heartedly laugh together… I just really don't care. Obviously this a personal thing to me. But I wanted to know how often the rest of you legitimately like talking to the women you talk to.

I have heard this type of thing many times before from men and I'm not sure I buy it. It smacks a little of excuse-making. With all due respect to Mr Shit_My_Ex, I find it hard to believe that if a Victoria's Secret model indicated that she wanted to sleep with him he would refuse on the grounds that she had a slightly impoverished sense of humour. It just doesn't tally with male biological programming, which compels us to seek out sexual opportunities with young, physically attractive females.

I do accept however, that the poster might not want to enter into a relationship with a ‘boring or uninteresting’ girl. That is fair enough: neither would I. But here I believe he’s going about things the wrong way. As I have made clear many times before, in modern human courtship sex always comes first, the relationship second.

This isn’t some sort of misogynistic objectification of women but merely a fact. Sexual attraction is sparked, the guy and the girl go on a date or two (or maybe not if it’s a one-night stand) and they sleep together. It is only after that that the consideration of whether they should take things further arises.

I’m not saying that this is the way things should be, but it’s certainly the way things are. Most of us know from past experience that the other way—being a nice guy to ‘prove’ our compatibility with a particular girl in the hope that this will encourage her to have sex with us—doesn’t work. This is because sexual attraction cannot be negotiated. It is either present, visceral and all-consuming (and this can be influenced to some extent through game) or it isn’t.

I don’t mean to call out Mr Shit_My_Ex because, as I mentioned, I’ve heard comments of the kind he makes many times before from other guys. But I believe his attitude is a form of self-defence. On some level he doesn’t want to continue to expose himself to the (potential) cruelties of the sexual marketplace. Instead, he would rather absolve himself from the outset. By saying that most girls ‘severely lack a well rounded personality’ he is effectively stating that he is better than them. And if that’s the case then why should he bother approaching?

If you feel the same way then that’s fine—it’s entirely your prerogative. Give up on women, don’t approach and do something more productive with your time instead. Bu why then would you continue to read and post on a seduction message board? Mr

Shit_My_Ex's actions reveal a truth that his words conceal: he still wants to get laid.

Charisma

What is at the heart of this, in my view, is charisma. Here's a working definition:

> Charisma: Compelling attractiveness or charm that can inspire devotion in others.

Fascinatingly, the dictionary goes on to state that, from the Greek, charisma indicates a divinely conferred power or talent. The etymology is as follows:

> Mid 17th century (in sense 2): via ecclesiastical Latin from Greek kharisma, from kharis 'favour, grace'.

So he who is charismatic has had 'favour' and 'grace' conferred on him divinely. In this context, charisma is something like a superpower.

Last weekend I visited my father and met up with two of my sisters. At one point my sisters commented on my dad's charisma, marveling at how he knows and is friendly with bar and restaurant owners and staff all over town. And it's true. Wherever I go with him, be it in London or Brighton where he lives, he befriends all kinds of people.

Watching him in action it's easy to see how. He shows genuine interest in everyone he comes into contact with. He is warm, witty and charming. People are naturally drawn towards this and they open up to him and remember him afterwards.

To someone who is less able to do it, it might seem as though he has a 'divinely conferred' ability. But actually he is shy and somewhat introverted. But because he has learned to do the work—that is, be actively interested in others—he reaps social rewards. And the people that he interacts with become hugely more interesting because he makes them feel comfortable enough to reveal their personalities.

As a man who has been into game for many years, I love women (despite all those pesky intergender dynamics we all have to negotiate) and I can honestly say that I have rarely, if ever, approached one that I've considered boring.

That's not to say that there haven't been women I've been more compatible with than others. But I've dated all different kinds of girls from PhDs to shop assistants and I've found something interesting about them all.

Human beings are incredibly complex. All of us, from the least intelligent to the most articulate and well-educated, have enormously intricate inner lives. It is in the gift of the one approaching to draw out—through his charisma—the personality of the girl before him.

Remember, it has been said that in pickup the girl is your mirror. If you are looking in a lot of mirrors and finding what is reflected back to be uninteresting then perhaps there is some work to be done closer to home.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed

Read Next: Ten Lessons About Girls I'd Teach My Teenage Self

4 Harsh Realities Travel Nomads Need To Accept And Surmount

August 10, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A number of manosphere writers, too numerous to name, have extoled the virtues of American and other men relocating to places like Eastern Europe and South America. The cultures abroad are often actually cultures, not a mass of fearful, obsequious consumers, and the women are, on average, considerably more feminine and attractive than back home. Nevertheless, many advocates of relocation are either blind to or choose to ignore the many issues a Western man will encounter moving overseas or traveling extensively in other countries.

Thankfully, Return Of Kings has been quite frank about the pitfalls of travel or moving abroad. I remember an older video by Roosh that shows him getting flaked on by a Ukrainian girl. This is not only an example of how some basic female patterns are shared by women across the world, but it demonstrates one of the many logistical problems men will be saddled with in their new temporary or permanent homeland. It is not a click-your-fingers type of scenario where all the frustrations in the West will suddenly disappear once you're abroad.

Like with Roosh's recent podcast with Kyle Trouble, discussing these issues allows you to surmount them. I, too, am not interested in doing many of you a disservice and claiming that moving to Europe has somehow been perfect just because I arrived with a well-functioning red pill outlook.

I am genuinely excited about my future travels in South America and Europe, but my experiences so far have taught me that rosy expectations are regularly disappointed. Just as you swallowed a red pill and continue to do so, you need to swallow these pieces of advice.

You need to learn the local language–and relatively fast

Mango Languages is one of many convenient options for men to learn a local tongue.

Sure, you'll probably be fine in Prague or another more Westernized Eastern European city like Gdańsk (Poland). But outside these areas and often within them, you are severely limiting your opportunities, most of all with girls, by not having a intermediate knowledge of the local language (B1 or B2 in the European common framework).

You need to make a choice between learning the language properly and getting by with English. Half-hearted forays into learning the local tongue are mostly pointless and essentially the same as opting for English. One will fast exhaust the basic number of permutations provided by restaurant-themed or "What's your number?"-style sentences.

Do not be concerned about fluency. Because I use a language like Spanish, Czech, Hungarian, or Polish for two to four months at a time and then stop for months, I make a number of minor mistakes all the time, especially with Slavic declensions. But, all in all, I am considered reasonably fluent in Czech, Spanish, and Polish, in addition to some other European languages I speak.

If you have no time for learning the language, and some of you will definitely fall into this category, you need to have something–connections, regular social haunts, or something else substantial that can make up for your lack of speaking skills. My advice to learn the language is not a religious one, yet 98% of the time better language skills will improve your experience and performance, including with girls.

Having money is not all it's cracked up to be–and incites jealousy

Money and status attract girls, but can also be disadvantageous for foreigners living in poorer societies.

My starter soup the other day in only a basic Slovakian restaurant cost more than the girl who served it earns in an hour. My Peeks & Cloppenburg suit, just a temporary one I will end up leaving at a girl's place in Europe for next time, cost the male sales attendant two weeks' worth of salary. To be blunt, there is a certain amount of local resentment at proportionally cashed-up Westerners living it up in Eastern Europe, chasing local women, and otherwise living lives far better and more luxurious than 97% of natives.

I'm not a frugal man, yet I am not interested in being ostentatious, either. Still, having good levels of disposable income or simply a secure bank balance can arouse jealousy and put a rift between you and the locals. Because of the much lower wages, people in places like the Czech Republic and even more so in places like Romania choose cheap social entertainment. Subsequently, the club scene even in tourist meccas like Kraków is lacking compared to Western cities like London.

Money may have its advantages, but for someone like me not willing to buy my way into people's hearts, taking pleasure in the simpler things is undervalued by Western travelers. To an extent you need to think like a man who earns US$3-5 an hour.

You need to be prepared to go it alone

Ready to set your own pace and make your own life?

I initially took Topdeck and Globus tours when I traversed Europe. Topdeck was mostly full of young Americans, Australians, and Canadians, while Globus fitted a middle-aged crowd and offered somewhat more structure. Topdeck was great for communal activities with similarly aged Westerners, whilst Globus allowed me to explore cities in-depth and also slip off to meet local girls. Eventually, though, you tire of this and desire a more long-term European experience, an experience which then creates its own set of problems.

At the time you branch off by yourself, expect to remain by yourself much of the time. Of course, I meet lots of people on my travels and many of them I've known for quite a while. But when I return to my base city, Bratislava or Brno, the trip is usually taken alone. I can make new connections on a bus or plane, yet constancy in companionship is lacking. It gives you more bangs but less of a community feel to anything you're doing. I've lost count of the number of great people I've meet, or girls I've gotten with, whom I will probably never see again.

Flaking, when it happens, is arguably more annoying when you're traveling or living abroad. If a girl flakes, often you'll need to have a much stronger back-up plan than you would back home. Unlike your university days, you can't always hope to find another friend randomly hanging around. Plus, in poor societies, it's not just flaking you need to be concerned with. A lot of people do have things that require their attention for legitimate reasons, whether work, study, or something family-related. It's your job to have something (or someone) else to do when that occurs. And it's an ongoing job.

Let's remember that most friendships are basically enforced. We make friends in school, in college, or in the workplace, three places where we are mandated to spend time with the same people, or at least be reasonably close to them. Over time, bonds develop and people forget the basically unsocial way they built up communication and trust. True, a seasoned traveler is at something of an advantage because he can use the excitement of a vacation to make more memorable friendships than people back home. That is, until all your Western friends have to leave and promises of a reunion stretch out into months or years.

Meanwhile, in Bratislava or Brno, my native friends are seasonally consumed by realities I rarely have to face. For example, if it's company audit time for the brunette junior accountant I'm banging and she's doing 16 hour days, I don't expect to see her. Likewise, you often fail to make the social connections locals would because you're not sitting next to them in the same group of cubicles five days a week or cracking the same jokes by the water cooler. For that reason, traveling or relocated men are better of enrolling in even the most boring night class (bar knitting classes), just to be around some of the same people regularly.

Your resolve and work ethic are constantly tested

Nope, choose now.

In nine days recently I covered Debrecen, Bratislava, Prague, Wroclaw, and Poznan, all cities I know well. As a result of the speed of my travel, I got close to zero done for my work commitments. Twenty-five article ideas for Return Of Kings have remained unfulfilled for months and a promise to chew off at least two of them during these nine days came to nothing.

I got plenty of bangs, but also spent over 24 hours on intercity buses, and a good number of further dead hours on city buses, on subways, in taxis, and carpooling. Leaving a hotel for meals in the city with girls or friends was great, yet took far longer than anticipated. Once you get tired of banging a girl three times in two and a half hours, after a whole day of traveling between cities and/or sightseeing, there's virtually nothing left for productive endeavors.

Good intentions will take you even smaller distances than in your native country. Surrounded by in-your-face opportunities and a bevy of local beauties, your grad studies or, in my case, other writing work persistently falls by the wayside. Time management is an even more crucial tool in your version of paradise than in the monotony you call the United States, Canada, the UK, or Australia.

Are you ready for fun and commitment or just fun?

There’s fun outside but work to be done inside. Which will you choose?

Travel is a commitment, not just fun. Inasmuch as you need a positive outlook and a desire for a better, more enjoyable life, you also have to regularly curb your enjoyment to keep that same life going. Getting into a language-learning mode, modulating your spending tastes to fit in, managing or overcoming the solitary patches, and valuing your work time are unexciting but essential ingredients for any travel nomads out there. The long-term benefits, whether with a fatter bank account balance or smoother communication, are palpable.

If you want the lifestyle, and many of you do, take my advice: get real and enter a world that you must consciously create and work towards. Travel is great, but the ease with which you can do it is usually greatly overestimated.

Read More: Interview With An Accomplished World Traveler On Life And Travel

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Chris Pratt Shows How A Relationship Is Doomed If One Partner's Value Changes Dramatically

August 10, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

A divorce between a Hollywood A-list couple always brings people to tears. I've never understood why this is. Every time a "power couple" breaks up, people take to Twitter and write sob messages about how sad they are, and if "They can't make it, love doesn't exist!"

Except, in the case of the split between Chris Pratt and Anna Faris, the tears had some merit. Because a very popular A-list actor directly confirmed what we've been saying for years now: men prefer younger and more beautiful women—every time.

Hollywood is always an interesting dynamic in displaying how the sexual marketplace really works, simply because there can be such drastic changes in value in a short amount of time. A C-list actor may be happy to take on an aging A-list actress because of the status and connections in Hollywood she gives him access to, but if that actor makes it big, he'll be looking to jump off the ship ASAP.

On the flip side, you actually don't see a ton of the younger women/older man dynamics—likely because of the backlash the older actor would receive. Even one of the most famous bachelors of Hollywood, George Clooney, ended up marrying a woman who was 35 when they wed (albeit still over a decade his junior).

Not too long ago, Chris Pratt looked like this:

His new look?

Chris Is A Smart Man

With his physical transformation over the years, combined with his increasing star power, Chris Pratt is a smart man for getting off the sinking ship that his soon-to-be ex wife, Anna Faris. From what I gather, they've been married for about ten years. Prior to the marriage, both had success in Hollywood—but Chris has now exploded.

He's getting out of the marriage before he gets even bigger movie roles, bigger star power, and therefore—even bigger paydays (that she would likely be entitled to, as it's relatively suspected they don't have a pre-nup). At the same time, he's now got his choice of pretty much any younger and hotter girls in the world instead of this:

Now, I'll say this—she doesn't look bad for 40. You've probably seen better, but you've also probably seen a hell of a lot worse. She's preferably to many of the women like this. But, then you go and compare her to Jennifer Lawrence (it's been rumored Pratt is now with), and it's no contest. Even if Lawrence is batshit crazy.

What The Politically Correct Statements Will Say

The media, and Chris himself, will likely make up some crap about how they had drifted apart, but that they needed to grow individually, and how it's not anybody's fault because they still love each other and always will.

Everybody reading this website knows that's a load of crap. Pratt is now entering the prime of his life (38)—one could argue that 35-40 is a man's prime in general, provided he has his life together. This is even more true for an A-list Hollywood actor. He has a superhero contract with one of the largest movie franchises to ever hit the screen as Peter Quill in the Marvel Universe.

Then he moonlights with another mammoth contract where he's taming dinosaurs in the Jurassic franchise. Throw in a few other larger contracts, and you can see that he's not going anywhere. Meanwhile, Faris works on some show called Mom (apparently on CBS). If you Google "anna faris mom", Chris Pratt's name shows up in results 5-10 for his one guest appearance.

How Career Dictates Value

Those who are unplugged know the truths: men value youth and beauty, and women value power. Youth and beauty is relatively self-explanatory. Power is a bit trickier to define though. It's the reason that so many females can't ever describe what their real "type" is. That's because power manifests in many shapes and forms—by social proof (other females wanting a man), money, physique, and other elements that are beyond the scope of this article.

It's rare that men will sacrifice our prime desires (youth and beauty) in order to enhance our career or status. And when they first wed, it made sense.

Pratt had far less money, no physique, and way less social proof (women thought he was an adorable teddy bear instead of wet-panties-inspiring). You can look at older photos and say, "Yeah, that's a couple that makes sense together."

Closing Thoughts

We'll never know the truth about any of these divorces, but it's not hard to see the writing on the wall. While maybe Hollywood couples do marry for the right reasons, it always seems to end messy. Despite what the media and all of Hollywood would like us to think, biology is still very much in control of us. Men are going to want younger and more beautiful women. As careers rise and more access is given, you can expect the marriages to fall apart.

I, for one, applaud Chris Pratt for getting out while he can. He'll never admit it, and maybe it was mutual—but I'd bet money on the fact that he's been feeling increasingly resentful towards his life choices over the past years as his star power has grown. It was a smart choice.

Check out my show, the Dating Abroad Podcast. Get my free 6-part video workshop on making money here.

Read More: The Expectations Of Modern Women Have Lost Touch With Reality And Common Decency

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at

This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

What To Do When The Enemy Uses Human Shields

August 10, 2017 | by Christopher Leonid | Link | Original Link

The collapse of the sexual revolution is giving rise to an abandonment pandemic among post twenty-something women. Nature abhors a vacuum, so the ecological force of the missing husband and empty crib manifests in political efforts to attach women to the state and import extra virile, hard, young men.

Civilisations are uncannily good at exercising the imperatives of their sexual economies without revealing what those imperatives truly are so, while no rational excuse has ever been forthcoming for the Islamic settlement of Europe, anyone who dares to raise an objection is typically met with 'Think of the children!'

The origins

Long before the invasion of Europe, the Think of the children™ stamp was already being used as a defence for any selfish demand it suffixed.

> I got pissed on Blue Nun, read Eat Pray Love, and decided to shack up with a fit Turkish taxi driver – YOLO! but I still have a right to fleece my ex-husband for a fortune in alimony because think of the children!

Or…

> We need aid programmes to send ageing female charity workers into the Calais jungle to help young men with construction work and social integration, because think of the children!

Or even…

> It's a woman's right to have an abortion! An unwanted child shouldn't be brought to life think of the children!

The ethical posturing is demonstrably phoney – because it is selective.

You're not really supposed to think of these children, because they're the victims of racial minorities in Britain.

And as for the victims of the largest child massacre the world has ever seen (move aside Hitler!), they were mostly the victims of free love and women's rights which, of course, are the highest ideals in our society.

Escalation during the migrant crisis

Nothing, however, displayed the hypocrisy of this sentimental shibboleth quite so well as the narrative that surrounded the invasion of Europe.

You probably remember this picture – iconic of the crisis of 2015 – when a million bearded young men arrived on European shores.

Abdullah Kurdi decided to pay a people trafficker to take his family out of Turkey (where they had lived peacefully for three years), to the EU. The boat sank and only Abdullah survived. This photo of his drowned son, Alan, went round the world. Months after the tragedy, the German newspaper Bild caught up with Abdullah, by then safely back in Iraq. In Abdullah's mind, it seemed quite clear who was to blame for what happened to his family: Western governments.

> Now I'm probably safer than I've ever been in my life, but for what? People are > still dying and nobody is doing anything about it.

Bild did a good job in documenting Kurdi's sublimation of grief into resentment toward others. The only problem is that people reading his words in the West were bound to sympathise with his warped view because they feel sorry for his son. I feel sorry for him too, but that doesn't mean I must to buy into his father's geopolitical theories.

Kurdi broke European law and supported a criminal racket in order to take his family from safety into danger, then used the resulting tragedy to blame the very people who tried (not hard enough, in my opinion), to stop him. The only way anyone could possibly stare down these facts – let alone ignore them entirely – is through the emotional blackmail generated by those who have appropriated the image of his dead child for political purposes.

A barrage of such images were used to pour scorn on anyone who might otherwise voice their natural malaise at the violence, rape, panic and illegality of the ensuing Islamic invasion. Anyone who dared to point out that the images failed to represent the true demographic of people who were pouring across our borders was shamed in to silence as uncharitable, racist or – har har! – 'un-Christian.'

The World Press Photo Award 2015 went to this photo of a child being passed, by moonlight, from (peaceful) Serbia to Hungary.

Realising that Europeans would appropriate the blame for any suffering inflicted upon their children, migrants and press were quick to supply the newfound demand.

This Iraqi family became poster-children of the influx when photographed arriving on the Greek Island of Kos – supposedly escaping from mortal danger.

A year later, a newspaper tried to track them down in Germany, only to discover that they had returned to Iraq. Only their son remains in the West. He has become a criminal. No matter, though. Emotional memory linked to the original photo should far outlast any inconvenient consideration of fact (and if it doesn't, then that's just because you're autistic).

So the press continued its appeal to emotion and, very quickly, we had this…

He's going to kill himself if the EU governments send him back to Turkey. Did he write that sign himself?

People have to understand that a hostage situation in which people take themselves hostage is still a hostage situation. It is normally the policy of Western governments not to negotiate with hostage-takers so as to discourage it as a means of manipulation. Their failure to apply this policy to migrants lead, inevitably, to this…

These migrants sank their own boat and drowned because they believed that they would be rescued by the boat they encountered. Unfortunately for them, the boat was Tunisian, not Italian.

By the end of this summer, thousands more will have died in similar circumstances. Think about how many lives might have been saved if we had just shot a few, or at least convincingly pretended to have shot a few, attempting to cross in the first place.

Sound too harsh? Well, let's turn for guidance to the scriptures that lie at the foundation of our occidental Christendom.

The response: King Solomon's judgement

The most efficient way to protect the greatest number of children is not to throw public money at them, but rather to stop tolerating delinquency in their adult supervisors.

For a society to do this actually requires less effort, not more. However, the difficulty lies in the realisation that the original effort to think of the children had nothing to do with thinking of the children and everything to do with thinking of the motivations of the people who told us to think of the children.

King Solomon bossing the ultimate shit-test

King Solomon (he of 300 wives and 700 concubines), understood better than anyone how to handle the types of emotive little outbursts we are now supposed to revere. One day, two women came before him to seek his justice. They lived alone for they were Harlots (Kings 3:16). Both had recently give birth (single moms). One had accidentally rolled over and squashed her baby in the night (fatty), and both pointed the finger of blame at the other.

Unable to settle the matter between themselves, they sought judgement from the state in the person of King Solomon (the Bible is charitable enough to omit that if they'd had a man around in the first place they probably wouldn't have ended up in this pickle). King Solomon responded:

> Bring me a sword, divide the living child in two, and give half to one, and half to the other.

Two words: agree and amplify.

At this, the women were suddenly forced to weigh their selfish interests against that of the child. The woman who was lying was happy to let the child be cut in half while the true mother revoked her claim to the child in order to allow her baby to live with the other woman. So (disobeying both of them), King Solomon gave the baby back to his mother.

> And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had rendered; and they feared the king, for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him to administer justice

In her seminar 'The Israelite Woman: Social Role and Literary Type in Biblical Narrative,' Professor Athalya Brenner-Idan – a biblical scholar at Tel Aviv University – notes that both women's maternal instinct is intact. For the true mother it is manifested, as mentioned, in the compassion and devotion that she shows for her son. For the impostor it is manifested in her desire for a son, which makes her steal the other mother's son when her own son dies. According to Brenner, one of the lessons of the story is that “true maternal feelings […] may exist even in the bosom of the lowliest woman.”

I agree with the professor and I draw her intriguing observation to its logical conclusion: women, by their nature, must be managed by stoic men – or else chaos ensues.

Conclusion

One way or another, the hundred-year female suffrage experiment is grinding to a halt. Polling data from across Europe is quite clear: pro-invasion leaders like Mutti Merkel and cuck-consort hag-fag Macron would not be in office without the votes of unmarried women. Their very purpose is to defer King Solomon’s judgement indefinitely at the expense of the accumulated financial and social capital of the West. When that is done, the matriarchy will collapse.

The only question is: will it be replaced by a Christian patriarchal resurgence or by Sharia law?

Read More: German Government Cuckolds Its Men By Teaching Migrants How To Sleep With German Women

---

Christopher Leonid
Defining male agency during the collapse of the Sexual Revolution.

Patreon Attempts To Deny That Their Banning Policy Is Ideologically Motivated

August 10, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

A video posted on 7/28/2017 provides a long-overdue explanation of Patreon's banning policies. In the beginning, Jack Conte says:

> A lot of people are just going to try to find holes in our logic.

Challenge accepted!

Patreon CEO on Content Policy, Lauren Southern, and IGD

He explains why Patreon shut down the accounts of Defend Europe, Lauren Southern, and IDG (It's Going Down). He says all this was nonpolitical, based entirely on "manifest observable behavior". He repeats this phrase often, sometimes flashing the words onscreen to drive home the point. He explains:

> We're talking about removing a person's income. The authority to take away a human being's income is a sobering responsibility. It is not something to be done on a whim.

No arguments here so far. Many people receive much of their income from online sales and donations, which need platforms (such as Patreon) to receive payments. Although my day job involves remodeling in partnership with one of my steady girlfriends, I certainly can relate to being subject to the whims of some corporation or other entity. Further, this is how several organizations receive their funding, so ideological neutrality is important.

His explanation for why Defend Europe and Lauren Southern got banned

He explains that they blockaded a so-called "rescue boat". Quoting Lauren:

> So this is a boat called The Aquarius that has been illegally bringing in migrants from the Libyan ocean for the last while, and they're just heading out again to bring in more illegal migrants and we're going to stop them.

According to a US News & World Report article—which doesn't seem to disapprove of illegal immigration—these ships pick up migrants off the coast of Libya. They're in vessels considered unseaworthy (I suspect this involves being overloaded far beyond capacity) which are operated by human traffickers. Then:

> Virtually all the migrants picked up by charities are brought to Italy instead of Libya, which is considered unsafe, and about half ask for asylum. Almost 200,000 asylum seekers are living in the country's state-funded shelters.

I'm not an expert on maritime law, and I doubt Jack Conte is either. Be that as it may, a few facts stand out about this Camp of the Saints racket:

- Libya was good enough for the illegal aliens to come there in the first place, as the stepping-stone to countries with generous welfare benefits.
- Libya is a rough neighborhood, but Tunisia and Egypt—right next door—aren't as bad.
- Even so, the best option is to send the illegal aliens back to their home countries.
- Illegal immigration is a crime, and those assisting it are accessories.
- The governments of Europe would stop this if they were working for their people. Apparently, they have other priorities.
- This is an invasion. Although an invasion is usually carried out by armed soldiers, this isn't necessary because the Eurocrats don't defend their countries, a government's number one job.

Therefore, it's disingenuous to portray Defend Europe and Lauren Southern as wrongdoers, rather than illegal aliens and their enablers.

The truth about the "refugees"

A boatload of scientists, engineers, and industrialists

Still trying to keep the high ground, the video shows the heartstring-tugging photo of Alan Kurdi, the Syrian kid washed ashore (obviously not wearing a flotation device). What most people aren't asking about this unfortunate episode is what a little kid was doing on an inflatable dinghy packed to twice its rated capacity. Also, most people are unaware that prior to the ill-fated trip, he and his parents were actually living in Turkey, which is still one of the most prosperous and enlightened places in the Middle East. Still, the call to greener pastures yet was too tempting.

I'll grant that Jack Conte is concerned with migrants in dangerous conditions at sea, risks that they're voluntarily assuming. Still, where's the concern about the crime and terrorism that these migrants are bringing with them? There's a reason why any European with a brain (a category not including their governments) doesn't want them there.

The migrants may be fleeing violent and dysfunctional places like sub-Saharan Africa, Iraq, Afghanistan, and Syria. (Actually, many “Syrian refugees” are from elsewhere, and very few are women and children, but all that’s another matter.) When they arrive upon Europe’s “magic dirt”, they don’t want to assimilate; instead, they bring violence and dysfunction with them.

All these “humanitarian NGOs” would do better trying their luck at helping fix those societies, rather than enable overrunning stable countries. Am I just being a big cynic, or could there be another agenda?

More banning

Freedom of speech is meaningless if it only covers “approved” viewpoints.

Less than a minute of the ten minute video concerns the leftist outfit IGD, which he explains was banned for doxxing and encouraging the sabotage of railroad tracks. Then this:

> There are probably going to be a lot of people who say that we’re just taking down IGD’s page just to seem like we’re being politically unbiased and fair, so I want to cut that argument off right here.

Following that, he explains how their content review polices work. Okie dokie. Am I being a big cynic again, or could this have something to do with Patreon being called out for hypocrisy a month previously?

Finally, he states what he’ll fix. One item is implementing an appeals process, because:

> …[E]very creator deserves fair treatment and a second chance. We commit to building a more fleshed-out warning system.

I seriously doubt that this will be extended retroactively to Defend Europe or Lauren Southern, but we’ll have to see about the IGD radicalinskis. I must credit Jack for good rhetorical skills, though; he’d do great as a lawyer or lobbyist.

What he doesn’t explain is why Patreon banned Occidental Dissent—did they hurt someone’s feelings with a Confederate flag or something? And how about Wife With A Purpose? The most controversial thing this Mormon homeschooling mom said was that White families should have more children—oh my golly! She later explained that she wasn’t completely being serious (though it sounds like a fine idea to me); still, is saying so a criminal activity?

For that matter, why did Paypal ban Roosh? Did they consider his Kratom-powered Rasputin beard a weapon of mass destruction?

Why free speech matters

The left used to champion free speech, especially in the 18th century when liberalism was still a good thing. Even as late as the 1960s, they were still talking a good game about it. Then when the leftist power structure achieved decisive cultural dominance, they reversed course—funny that.

The left is in utter panic over recent developments. They failed to elect Hillary, a major setback. Further, the public is starting to push back and challenge leftist narratives that we've been browbeaten with for decades. This is why we're seeing the increasing trend of "de-platforming" dissident voices, as well as cutting off funding to them. Doing this to everyone even a millimeter to the right of William F. Buckley is the Current Year's big fad.

Social media companies are censoring speech too. Even governments are colluding with them. Further, Germany can't control "refugees" running wild, but they can arrest people for political opinions, just like the Stasi once did.

The left is so well-funded that they can pay outside agitators and bus them into remote cities to raise hell. (In fact, that's a good argument for charging the globalists and their front groups under the RICO Act, but I'll have to let greater legal minds ponder that one.) However, the rest of us rely on grassroots support.

I can see that Jack Conte wants to assure Patreon's users that they're going to be fair and respect free speech. Unfortunately for him, all this "no-platforming" by Patreon and others like them is backfiring. Their overreach and nauseating hypocrisy are causing alternate institutions, such as Counterfund, to emerge.

Governments banning dissenting speech are tyrannical, but an oligopoly of leftist companies doing the same aren't much better. Banks and phone companies don't micromanage their customers over ideology, and neither should payment processing and social media platforms. Finally, orthodox opinions can flourish even under censorship, but free speech is a vital necessity for dissident opinions. That's why this is important.

Read More: Afro-Islamist Riots Sweep Through Vibrant Suburbs Of Paris

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Women Are Pathologically Addicted To Flaunting Their Bodies For Sexual Attention

August 11, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

In the age of the internet, women can't stop exploiting themselves on the internet in ways that can be described as perverted or even pornographic. Lately we're seeing new lows where women are doing anything to make a quick buck or achieve overnight fame.

Girls come up with creative excuses, but to the trained eye, they are simply attention whoring. From showcasing their pregnant bodies, to offering to deliver a porn flick in exchange for subscribers, the internet has empowered them to do whatever they please without the fear of consequence.

Before continuing, let me define two things:

- Prostitution – selling oneself in order for monetary or social gain.
- Pornography – prostitution on camera.

Western women of today have mastered the deceitful trick of appearing to look innocent yet at the same time exposing themselves indirectly, even though you may not initially realize it. For example, look at this photo…

Nothing wrong with it, just girls in bikinis. However, feast your eyes on this next one…

Skinny Californian mom Jamie Lynn posed for TIME a while ago. As you can see, this is not about being a mother or breastfeeding, it’s about this narcissistic woman using her child as a tool to gain attention.

Money is the main factor for these kinds of stunts, but others include fame or boredom. Girls crave attention and need the masses, particularly male viewers, to send limitless compliments of how beautiful they are. It’s like a crack addict who needs more and more. One hit isn’t enough, stronger doses are needed.

Prostituting for subscribers

Lena Plug announced to do an x-rated film if she got one million followers and sell it online as part of a $29.99/month package. According to the Sun, she got 60k paying subscribers pretty quickly. So that means she made roughly $1.8 million dollars. Even if you subtract online merchant fees and other miscellaneous expenses, she still brought in over a million dollars simply by selling herself sexually while refusing to be labeled as a porn-star. She also stated she let her friend “try out” her boyfriend’s penis.

Struggling American citizens who study science and engineering (like me) to solve the world’s problems make zilch compared to these talent-less low lives who degrade themselves on the internet. It doesn’t matter what double talk they spit out of their dirty filthy mouths, their actions speak for themselves.

Breastfeeding in public

Women today feel entitled that everybody must witness them nursing their child to prove their superiority while simultaneously displaying themselves as holy and sacred mothers.

Magazines are raking in the dough by providing HD quality photographs of women exposing their breasts which easily passes through the filters of major search engines. Most people however, especially parents, don't want to see it, because it is still publicly exploiting a sexual organ.

It's okay for a woman to gain weight, but not a man

There’s a new trend of ex-female bodybuilders who are “embracing their real bodies” by letting themselves go, gaining anywhere between 20-50lbs while stating that bodybuilding hurt them.

However, if a man—let’s say an actor—is caught with his gut hanging out, paparazzi swamps in with cameras ready to instantly upload it online. There is no glorification, but for women, it’s somehow accepted. This is gender equality?

Bodybuilding and having a single digit body fat percentage is hard, and it’s okay to gain when you’re done with it, but it doesn’t deserve an award.

Brad Pitt had clear-cut abs in Fight Club. Although he may not be as defined today, he’s still in great shape. That’s fine, but women expect men to bow at the altar of their fat butts and kiss their feet while telling them how hot they look bulging out of their bikinis.

Voluptuous, full figured, curvy, and BBW (whatever that means) are the new terms to cover up that ugly word – fat. More and more women are embracing it, and some how they think it’s society’s responsibility to give credit for their average achievement.

The other excuse is, "having the perfect body isn't all it's cracked up to be". See the before and after photos to judge for yourself. Pornography is further adding to this by brainwashing men into digging "thicc" girls and mushy elephant size butts.

Paris modeling agencies promoted the scarecrow look hiring bulimic girls with emancipated bodies, but now fat is fashion. When a skinny fitness blogger girl gains muscle, real life compliments aren't enough, the whole world needs to know. Men are made fun of if skinny or fat, but women get off easy.

Celebrities with camel humps

Serena Williams was real quick to play the poor pregnant mother role when John McEnroe said she wouldn't stand a chance in the Men's Pro Tour. She claimed she wanted safety and privacy. However, she posed nude for Vanity Fair (you can see the photo on your own, however I suggest you have your therapist on speed dial, as Roper said in Enter The Dragon, there's a point I won't go beyond).

She also posted a video of her performing intense exercises while being pregnant. This is dangerous for the unborn as it can cause damage. Too many celebrities just don't know how to stay away from the lime light. Instead of focusing on being a healthy mother, they'd rather risk a miscarriage for "likes".

Post-pregnancy pics

Even after giving birth, the narcissism continues as women on Snapchat are posting pics of their skin with colored stretch marks after giving birth, presenting as art. Perhaps it would pass in kindergarten.

With thousands of likes, many others are posting content of similar nature. The idea being stressed is that “the woman is superior because she carries the baby”. As you can see, the system makes it very easy for women to gain instant fame and wealth through media exposure all the while appearing to be just an innocent soul.

Read More: 4 Ways That Western Women Are Ruining Themselves

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info, questions, or to be put on the list to receive updates, visit GSL Creations

3 Ways Japan Is Naturally Alt Right

August 11, 2017 | by Makoto Fujiwara | Link | Original Link

Following the election of President Trump last November, the political and cultural climate of the United States shaped a new era in world history. With the astonishment of the voting cycle coming to a close, fervor opposition towards the current administration remains high. With social media booming with hashtags of #notmypresident and dozens of cultural icons explicitly denouncing the Commander-in-Chief, it's as if Trump has little to no support from the American populace.

Reports of Trump in Japan

However, the alt-right emerged to the forefront, bringing attention to other issues involving American and global policy. Several ideas compose the relationship between the alt-right and Japan, encompassing a list of several components that contribute to the support of the Tokyo political spectrum.

1. Refugees in Japan

Citing controversial cases such as Germany or Sweden, adhering to refugee policies holds adverse consequences within the alt-right. Hence, when Japan accepted only a handful of refugees during the height of the Syrian crisis and beyond, ideologues commended the country for having stern resolve.

Some members of the alt-right openly expressed appreciation for Japanese immigration policy, stating that the state is merely protecting itself, while some made extreme claims that the country is trying to preserve its “purity” in the form of ethnocentrism. This idea coincides with the Abe administration and its connection with Nippon Kaigi, which seeks to maintain the sanctity of the Japanese state.

What’s certain is that if you’re a foreigner with a particular level of skill, finding work in the country is a matter of filling out some paperwork and getting sponsorship. Despite ramblings from critics, Japan isn’t as “exclusive” as they would have you believe.

Furthermore, although the country does not openly support alt-right rhetoric, is it not understandable why Tokyo would be rather stringent with refugee policies when countries that implement more egalitarian ideals undergo more levels of violence and conflict.

What Europe used to stand for

The Western world has yet to show how to incorporate better assimilation clauses that show the economic and social attractiveness of supporting refugees. Alt-groups continue to grow in number within the countries where problems of cultural assimilation arise. Refusing to acknowledge the elephant in the room proves that Western leadership exists in a sort of echo chamber, unaware of the cultural malaise plaguing the moral fabric of their respective countries.

2. Crime-rates and homogeneity

Downtown Tokyo

Another talking point among alt-right circles is the crime rate in Japan. Ideologues often like to mention the low crime rates in the country as a measure of success, insinuating the idea that such situations occur due to the lack of diversity in the country. Contrasting the crime numbers between the Western nations and Japan, it would seem as if both parts of the world are drastically different.

Still, population size, cultural distinction, as well as other factors that contribute rates of criminality, need to be taken into account before suggesting that the mere lack of multiculturalism is a catalyst for success.

Besides, is Japan a homogenous culture? While Japan still maintains a high level of Japanese, other groups have been in the country for generations, weaving a unique pattern in the concept of homogeneity. This issue lies in term “multicultural,” as Japan has had a concentration of different groups throughout its history.

Despite having distinct dissimilarities between more “mainstream” Japanese, these groups influenced the contemporary fabric of the country, sharing distinguishable customs and ideas. Therefore, how is it that crime rates are still low? Many factor contribute to this, but researching average IQ levels, the conviction rates of the country, as well as the lack of bleeding heart ideologies of allowing “misfortunates” in without recourse is a step towards understanding that.

3. Nationalist significance

Although Japan plays a significant part in the influence of world affairs, determining the political shift of the country is one that is open to various interpretations. As a prominent leader in East Asia and the international community, perhaps Japan has to look towards more globalist ideas, especially since the country still relies on a considerable amount of U.S. support.

Outside of the peacekeeping efforts in Africa, and a few supporting roles in Western conflicts, Japan remains on the outside of the international arena. In order to ensure constitutional reform, the right balance of negotiation with globalist supporters is paramount to achieving those objectives.

As much as some wish Japan to go rogue, the country isn’t in a position to politically do that. Therefore, maintaining a public face of supporting globalist regimes, while inwardly pushing forward national agendas is a way Japan can achieve its objectives.

Negotiations on where to go forward

Opponents claim that Japan hasn't fully let go of its imperialist past, using the lack of playing globalist ball as one of the reasons why Tokyo isn't necessarily prepared to be a major voice on the international stage. The geopolitical motions of the current government understand this, looking to share more of the international burden of world policing with allied states to cool criticisms of xenophobic overtones.

If Japan continues on this path of playing both sides, the country may see their goals eventually materialize. This ties in with alt-right views of nationalism, as Japan seems to be putting the needs of its own citizens over than of the world community.

Still, the game of international politics is one that requires a level of subtlety and deception. Despite maintaining an arms-length approach to refugee reforms, greasing the palms of the elites through appealing to globalist ideals is a way for Tokyo to swing the negotiations in their favor.

Make Japan great again?

Japan has to play ball with the globalists…for now.

Ultimately, Japanese policymaking continues to be a model system for alt-right and right wing advocates wishing to have similar laws in their countries. By looking at the low rate of accepted refugees and the lack of extensive crime rates, alt-right groups continue to support Japan and see the nation as an ideological ally.

While Tokyo cannot directly influence these groups, it shouldn't come as a surprise when detractors use such talking points to promote why Japan shouldn't receive a more prominent role in global affairs.

Adhering to current political procedures is effective in terms of allowing Japan to participate in more international affairs. Despite the critics in East Asian political circles, linking Japan to the alt-right is an intellectually clutching at straws, lacking concrete evidence to support these claims.

Although alt-right groups look at Japanese policies as a sort of model system, it shouldn't come as a surprise if the country itself doesn't reciprocate the praise.

Read More: 5 Ways Northeast Asian Countries Benefit From Having No Diversity

---

Makoto Fujiwara
Makoto Fujiwara is the pen name of an author who lives and works in Tokyo, Japan.

4 Important Lessons From Economist William Easterly's Book "The Tyranny Of Experts"

August 11, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Recently I read one of the most influential economists in the world, William Easterly's book The Tyranny Of Experts (2014) and will share some important lessons from it. While much is well-established common sense at this date, such as that benevolent autocrats rarely exist and historical conditions matter for economic development, there are still less obvious points to absorb and learn about.

The book essentially argues that the Austrian-British economist Friedrich Hayek's classic liberalism is preferred over the Swedish technocratic economist Gunnar Myrdal's ideas. They both shared the Noble prize in economics in 1974, but the debate between them never took place in public, and perhaps if it had, some of the misguided remedies for poor countries could have been avoided. Easterly is unhesitatingly on Hayek's side on the political-economic spectrum, although with a nuanced understanding of this complicated issue. Both markets and governments matter.

1. Individual economic and political rights are more important than national policies

There are not just cultural and social but also economic benefits from nationalism. For instance, as the likewise distinguished economist Dani Rodrik (which Easterly refers to in other regards) has emphasized, domestic markets are for a variety of reasons generally more well-functioning than international markets.

However, national policies as such have only a limited effect. Essentially, the wisest thing a government can do is to provide for public infrastructure and secure individual economic and political rights for its citizens. From there on the people, especially the more talented and industrious such, will create spontaneous solutions to local problems (a lesson from Adam Smith which commonly has been misunderstood as that the Scotsman cherished greed), and create wealth and prosperity for themselves and others.

An excellent example are the people from the Fujian province in eastern China, which have dominated the trade and investment in East Asia and affected the development in mainland China 1978 onwards.

Also from older history there are clear examples of this:

> Spain and Portugal had Atlantic trade access but they had absolutist institutions and values. Northern Italian cities had relatively free institutions and values but they did not have Atlantic access nor free values. The winners were the United Kingdom and the Netherlands, which had Atlantic access and already had relatively free institutions and values by sometime in the 1600s.

2. Also poor people yearn for freedom

There has been a tendency among technocratic economists and development "experts" to assert that poorer people do not care about freedom. Although it might be true in some instances, surveys and interviews indicate that this is indeed not the case. Easterly summarizes:

> The general picture is that poor people (like rich people) do not like being told to shut up; they like to speak up to protest any goverment abuses of them.

It seems that the near-universal model of individual rights (within the nation's border) and market-based economy is the most appropriate model for real development.

[image]

3. Economic growth has large measurement errors

GDP is an adequate rough estimate for national wealth but the measure of it tends to be very flawed, to say the least. For instance, the World Bank's World Development Indicators (WDI) tend to present vastly different data than the Penn World Tables (PWT), not just on sub-Saharan African countries – which often fail to collect and present adequate data – but also on high-performing states such as Singapore. The discrepancies can sometimes be vast.

The reason why this is relevant beyond accuracy is because it makes it very misguided to either celebrate or accuse a government of incompetence if the data is not correct and unambiguous.

4. Growth over time is more crucial than temporary miracles

The truth is that economists rarely can predict growth. When they look at past experiences they can pinpoint that which in fact does work and that which does not, but the future is yet to be unfolded and is unpredictable in many significant ways. Easterly stresses:

> The root cause of these findings is simply that annual growth rates are extraordinarily volatile. The average change in GDP per capita growth rates (in either direction) from one year to the next is over 4 percentage points, usually reflecting the appearance and disapperance of temporary factors like a commodity-price boom.

That is why one often has to wait and see and not be excited about sudden growth miracles, which rarely last more than a couple of years (or less). There are exceptions, such as Hong Kong, South Korea, Singapore and Taiwan, which managed to have growth that lasted for several decades, but the growth rates have eventually slowed down in these countries. Easterly predicts the same regarding China.

Conclusion

Easterly's book provides relevant data and perspectives on economic development, both success stories and failures due to misguided beliefs that the inadequate knowledge and agency of governments will cure the ills of the world.

It is intriguing to read about historical instances from places as different and distant – in both time and space – as Genoa, New York City, Colombia, Benin, Syria, South Korea and China. It does not address every relevant topic, such as human capital, cultural differences and the effects from women competing with men in the job market, but a single work rarely covers every important aspect. Many academics do also have a tendency to avoid contentious issues, or take for granted that industrious Jews, women and Chinese should be praised within the modern West.

Some of these ideas indeed question the benefits of nationalism, but as far as I see it has never been autocratic nationalism that masculine men cherish but rather a more libertarian such. Economically, the government should let its habitants have the opportunity to prosper and then stay away as much as possible. Internationally, a delicate balance between nationalism and restricted globalism appears to be the best prescription.

Read More: 5 Important Insights From Red Pilled British Economist Peter Bauer

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

“Unite The Right” Rally In Charlottesville Shut Down By City Government And Their Violent Leftist Allies

August 12, 2017 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Earlier today, the scheduled Unite the Right rally in Charlottesville, Virginia was shut down after violent antifas launched a riot. According to both organizer Jason Kessler and speakers Richard Spencer and Daniel Friberg, local police actively aided the antifas by refusing to restrain them and by blocking Kessler, Spencer and other speakers from entering the rally itself. Police then declared the rally an “unlawful assembly,” ordering attendees to disperse under threat of arrest. Democratic Governor Terry McAuliffe also declared a state of emergency in the city, sending the National Guard into Charlottesville.

The shutdown of Unite the Right shows how entrenched radical leftists are in the government, law enforcement, and the media. The Democrat-controlled Charlottesville city government, in cooperation with the Democrat-controlled Virginia state government, local law enforcement, and violent leftist groups conspired to disrupt a peaceful right-wing rally. I spoke to Kessler and Friberg briefly about what happened at the rally and what they and the other organizers plan to do next.

The Origins Of Unite The Right

Jason Kessler launched Unite the Right last month as a response to the Charlottesville city government attempting to remove a statue of Confederate general Robert E. Lee in the city's Lee Park. For the past several months, Democrat-controlled city governments in New Orleans and other Southern cities have been removing statues of Confederate generals and other historical figures due to their supposed "racism," a deliberate attempt to destroy the cultural heritage of white Southerners.

As an independent journalist, Kessler has extensively reported on the corruption and anti-white bigotry of Charlottesville's leftist government, particularly its black vice mayor, Wes Bellamy. Bellamy has been caught making racist statements about whites on Twitter, as well as making statements supporting rape, comments that would get a white and/or Republican politician run out of office. Kessler also exposed Bellamy's "slush fund," a "nonprofit" called Young Black Professionals Network of Charlottesville that is operating in violation of both the IRS and Virginia law.

Unite the Right was designed as an event that would bring together disparate sectors of the American right—the alt right, the alt lite, Southern nationalists, and more—in defense of Southern and white heritage. In addition to Kessler and Richard Spencer, speakers included libertarian radio host Christopher Cantwell, technologist and Counter.Fund founder Pax Dickinson, Traditionalist Worker Party founder Matthew Heimbach, and more. Fans and members of The Daily Stormer, the Proud Boys, and r/The_Donald were also participating in the rally, promising to make it the biggest right-wing protest in the U.S. in recent memory.

Unite the Right had met with stiff opposition almost immediately after its announcement, with antifas organizing a counter-protest and local politicians condemning the event. Airbnb has also banned rally attendees from using the service to rent places to stay.

Several days before the rally, the Charlottesville city government revoked Kessler's permit for the event in an attempt to shut it down. With the help of the ACLU, Kessler successfully appealed, with a federal judge restoring Unite the Right's permit.

> Incredible moment for white people who've had it up to here & aren't going to take it anymore. Tomorrow we #UnitetheRight #Charlottesville pic.twitter.com/D9cBipniSp
>
> — Jason Kessler (@TheMadDimension) August 12, 2017

Even still, it looked like Unite the Right was set to be a major success. A torchlight gathering in Lee Park organized by Kessler and Spencer the night before the rally was a big win, with only a small, scattered group of antifas showing up to cause trouble. However, few people saw what was going to come next.

Unite The Right Shut Down By Antifas And Police

> Unlawful assembly declared before event could even start #UniteTheRight #Charlottesville https://t.co/EEwdPKXp9o
>
> — Jason Kessler (@TheMadDimension) August 12, 2017

As seen on various livestreams of Unite the Right, attendees arrived at Lee Park in groups with tight security, walking past antifas and counter-protesters. Antifas were also witnessed throwing cans, rocks and other objects at attendees, as well as setting off smoke flares; in response, security armed themselves with shields and formed a line around the Lee statue in the park. By my estimation, roughly 500 to 1,000 attendees showed up in support, with as many antifas and possibly more.

According to a phone interview I conducted with Kessler, the police were supposed to have "a security plan in place that was going to involve them escorting our speakers into the park," then controlling access to keep the antifas from entering. However, when he, Spencer and the other speakers arrived at Lee Park, contrary to the plan, only half of the park was reserved for Unite the Right, with antifa taking up the other half.

> I love the smell of mace in the morning! pic.twitter.com/Ccse00aO9V
>
> — Richard ☝Spencer (@RichardBSpencer) August 12, 2017

Kessler also stated that there was insufficient protection due to a lack of Charlottesville city police (only state police) on the scene, and "Spencer, Baked Alaska, Horus the Avenger and a number of other people were maced in the face on the way into the event." State police denied the speakers entry into the park, claiming they needed authorization from Charlottesville police. Kessler was unable to reach them, and when they finally arrived twenty minutes later, they told him that they were "declaring an unlawful assembly and they had to leave."

Around this time, fights began to break out between antifas and Unite the Right attendees, with police refusing to intervene or protect the attendees. While Kessler left,

Richard Spencer stayed behind for several minutes arguing with the police before he was forced to disperse. In a Periscope video, Spencer asserted that Unite the Right had been set up by the police and city government; since they were legally forced to allow the rally go on, they instead allowed it to be canceled by refusing to restrain antifas or keep them from attacking attendees.

When I asked Kessler about this, he confirmed Spencer's version of events, claiming that the police had allowed the leftists to exercise the "heckler's veto." What happened at Unite the Right is similar to what happened to President Donald Trump's rally in Chicago last year and Milo Yiannopoulos' planned speech at DePaul University, events which leftists were able to shut down by instigating violence, with police refusing to intervene.

> The Nordic AltRight was on location in #Charlottesville, for #UniteTheRight. It escalated into a total civil war.... https://t.co/moKTPJbg0e
>
> — Daniel Friberg (@Daniel_Friberg) August 12, 2017

I also spoke to AltRight.com European editor Daniel Friberg, who was slated to speak at the event. Friberg told me that he was maced heavily by the antifas when he attempted to enter Lee Park. According to him, following the police's dispersal order, cops began "pushing the entire audience" directly into the antifas' path with the intent of making fights break out. Friberg and several others stayed behind to assist attendees in getting out safely; he also said that several rally attendees were arrested, though they have since been released.

> Will make video about hacking soon. Please stay calm Red Ice members, PP details or anything else related to payments can not be accessed.
>
> — Henrik Palmgren (@Henrik_Palmgren) August 12, 2017

In addition to physical attacks, leftists launched cyber-attacks on several websites who were affiliated with Unite the Right. Alt right radio and TV network Red Ice was taken offline by antifas, who pledged to dox its subscriber base. The hackers also seized the Twitter accounts of Red Ice hosts Henrik Palmgren and Lana Lokteff, the former of whom was at the rally and was going to live stream. (As of this writing, Palmgren and Lokteff have retaken control of their Twitter accounts.) Hackers also attempted to DDoS AltRight.com, though they failed to take it offline.

What Comes Next?

> My recommendation: Disperse. Get out of Charlottesville city limits. State of emergency has been called.
>
> — Richard ☝Spencer (@RichardBSpencer) August 12, 2017

As of this writing, chaos is still unfolding in Charlottesville. In my interview with Kessler, he told me that he was planning to sue the city with the help of the ACLU, hoping to "sue for multi-million dollar damages for this fiasco." Additionally, someone drove a car through a crowd of antifas, resulting in numerous injuries and killing at least one. According to Friberg, the car incident happened a half-hour after Unite the Right attendees were evacuated from Lee Park, and the driver was not part of the rally.

> Video: Car driving through crowd of #protesters in #Charlottesville
> Via @Rebelutionary_Z #Antifa #UniteTheRight pic.twitter.com/ECOQYFwVwk
>
> — Anti-Media (@AntiMedia) August 12, 2017

While the dust has yet to settle, it's clear from what happened that the left will pull out all the stops to prevent nationalists and right-wingers from organizing in the U.S. Antifas have the government and law enforcement on their side, and when push comes to shove, your local police are more likely to arrest you than them. Right-wingers will need to be careful from now on, because it's clear that we are on our own.

Additionally, the riot may turn out to be a major propaganda win for the alt right. While the fake news media has been trying to smear Unite the Right as "Nazis," every live stream and broadcast of the event clearly showed rally attendees being peaceful and antifas instigating violence. While the left may have won a battle today, it could come at the cost of them losing the war.

Read Next: Anti-fascist Protesters Try To Shut Down Neo-Nazi Rally In California, Get Stabbed

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Men Will Always Be Seen As Evil By Feminists

August 13, 2017 | by Ryan Campbell | Link | Original Link

Debating feminists can be a trying affair. Their tendencies to use straw men fallacies, ad hominem attacks, emotionally-loaded but hollow rhetoric while constantly moving the goal posts is well known. As is, when all else fails, they settle for the tried and true muh-harrassment tactic. But more than just faulty reasoning—if you can even call it that—much of what feminists argue involves having their cake and eating it too. (And in most cases, this involves a very substantial amount of cake.)

In this article we'll focus on one particular gaping hole in feminist "logic." Aside from the radical feminists who explicitly hate men, most feminists deny the charge that they despise, hate or hold men in contempt. "It's the patriarchy" or something like that. Men "aren't naturally bad, it's society and the environment" or "toxic masculinity" or whatever.

Aside by the interesting point that this is pretty close to an admission that they despise men, in general, as they are in the real world today, it would at least be a coherent position.

Coherency and feminists don't go well together though. The not-so-radical feminists may say men are naturally good, but they then set up what is an effectively impossible criterion for men to actually be good. It is what I will call "The Feminist Tautology" for virtually all sets of male behavior fall within it. An individual man may be able to escape its condemnation if he flagellates himself and his gender enough. But the male sex is damned if they do and damned if they don't. No matter what, they're evil.

Men Doing Bad Proves Men Are Bad

Proof Men are Evil

We'll start with the obvious. If men do something bad more so than women, this is proof that men are terrible. While painting with an awfully broad brush, it makes sense.

So men commit close to 90 percent of violent crime and almost three quarters of all crime. Men are more likely to harass others online (although men are also probably more likely to be harassed), drive drunk and receive a Darwin Award. Most wars have been started by men. Etc., etc., etc.

Of course, feminists have done a great deal to exaggerate men's avarice. The Partner Abuse State of Knowledge Project, which consists of over 1700 studies, found that domestic violence is pretty close to 50/50 and if anything, women probably commit more (although men do more damage). Indeed, lesbian couples appear to be the most violent. Women commit the majority of child abuse. The "1 in 5 women are raped on college campuses" canard has been completely refuted. A portion of the gender crime gap is due to a massive (63 percent according to Professor Sonja Starr) disparity in criminal sentencing.

Even differences in aggression are less than previously thought when you take "relational aggression" (i.e. ostracizing, spreading secrets or lies, etc.) into account.

And contrary to the "there would be no war if women were in charge" crowd, a study from New York University "…analyzed 28 European queenly reigns from 1480 to 1913 and found a 27 percent increase in wars when a queen was in power."

Still, while feminists torture the data with bogus advocacy research, the general thrust of their argument is correct; men do commit more crime and violence than women.

Men Doing Good Also Proves Men Are Bad

More Proof Men Are Evil

But once we turn to the other side of the equation, things start to get a little more, well, problematic. After all, shouldn't male achievement be a credit to the male gender?

Apparently not. After all Larry Summers was forced out at Harvard for noting that the reason there are less female scientists may be because of factors other than discrimination. Why are more women going to college than men? Who cares! Why aren't women equally represented in engineering and science? Sexism of course!

The discrepancy between male and female achievement in the upper echelons is actually far larger than most people think. Yes, in the past women were sometimes locked out of such opportunities. But the gap is still massive today when such barriers have been eliminated (and often reversed.)

Charles Murray did a historiometric study of the greatest figures in math, science, literature, art, technology, music and medicine from 800 B.C. to 1950 for his book Human Accomplishment and found that 97.8 percent of the greats were men. Murray also noted that men won 96 percent of the Nobel Prizes between 1900 and 1950 and 97 percent between 1951 and 2000 (apparently sexism increased over the last 50 years of the 20th century). Not a single woman had won the Nobel Prize in Economics until 2009 and none had won the Fields medal in Mathematics until 2014.

As for positions of leadership today, this article from EverydayFeminism.com of brings home that point, > Among Fortune 500 companies, women are only 5.2% of CEOs and 17% of board members. Among Fortune 1000 companies, women are still only 5.4% of CEOs – and 8.1% of top earners.

>
> Women won in record numbers in the 2014 midterm elections, but still only 20% of the Senate and 19% of the House are women. At the state level, only 24.2% of legislators are women – and only five women are governors.
>
> Only 16% of directors, executive producers and producers, writers, cinematographers, and editors of top-growing domestic films are women – and > only 28% of off-screen talent in broadcast television are women.

>
> Women are only 30% of physicians, 13% of engineers, and 9% of management and 14% of senior management positions in IT.

This is a feminist site, so we know they must first bemoan that “Unfortunately, a lot of cultural conversations around women’s leadership don’t encompass solutions to these gaps.” And the reason for those gaps? Well, obviously “gender still holds women back at work.” The one-note song of male oppression is sung once again.

But let us consider this briefly in more detail. If we need a “solution to these gaps” it is implied that male and female achievement should be 50/50 or approximately that (despite having never been so at any time in history ever). Indeed, feminists say this kind of thing all the time so feminist theory infers that men’s and women’s achievement should move in tandem. Therefore male achievement and female achievement are not independent variables, but directly contingent on each other.

So let’s arbitrarily set male achievement at 100 and female achievement at 50. There are two ways to look at this. The first is that both should be 75. In that case, men are just hogging some of that sweet achievement for themselves, but not costing society anything.

But feminists tell us that “liberating” women and ending discrimination will improve the economy and increase overall progress and achievement. Science, progress, nay, the future itself “is too important to leave to men.”

Thus, we would expect that if achievement were brought into a supposedly natural equilibrium, male achievement would stay at 100 and female achievement would come up to 100.

What this means, weirdly enough, is that men are actually doing wrong when they do right.

The only feminist-approved way to be a “good man”

If this were true (spoilers: it’s not) male achievement is actually only 50. It would be 100 on its own, but because men can only do better than women by oppressing them, you have to subtract 50 off men’s 100. In other words, half of men’s achievement was simply taken away from women. Women’s, on the other hand, should be at 100 if you add the stolen 50 back.

So in the upside down world of feminists, women have actually been, or at least should have been, mostly responsible for the technological, scientific, artistic and medical achievements of humanity while men continue to be responsible for crime, poverty, environmental decay and war.

A feminist who was called out on this might concede it’s not completely contingent and it’s only supposed to be approximately 50/50. But the same logic would apply. Then men’s achievement is only approximately the cause of any shortfall in women’s achievement.

The end result is the same. When speaking about the gender on the whole, when men do bad, they are bad. When men do good, they are also bad because the only possible way men could do better at anything than women is because they discriminated against them.

Again, an individual man who consumes sufficient quantities of soy, subordinates himself and chastises his own gender enough may be considered tolerable by feminists and their ilk. But in the end, the male gender has been damned by feminists with the original sin of being evil no matter what. And unless you are under the belief that men and women are effectively the same and these differences can be completely abated (in which case, you’re stupid), then this original sin is also unfixable. There can be no salvation nor redemption. Men are evil. By definition, they have to be and there’s nothing that can ever change that.

When looking at the matter this way, men would be wise to ask themselves a simple question: What exactly is the point of trying to appease people with such views?

Read More: “Womyn” Need A Lesson On The Evil Patriarchy’s Etymology

Ryan Campbell
A simple apostate from modernity who takes pleasure in pointing out blatant leftist hypocrisy, mocking SJW nonsense and a little thought-criminality from time to time.

9 Reasons Why The United States Should Ally With Iran

August 13, 2017 | by Eusebius Erasmus | Link | Original Link

When President Trump visited Saudi Arabia, he concluded an arms deal with the oil-rich kingdom, and toured its Global Centre for Combating Extremist Ideology, a think tank devoted to fighting Islamic terrorism.

If this strikes you as a joke, then it should; Saudi Arabia is the world's biggest funder of Islamic terrorism. With its billions in oil revenue, it sponsors an anti-Western, jihadist ideology known as Wahhabism. Indeed, your local Sunni mosque could be receiving Saudi money and propaganda. This same ideology is responsible for organizations like al-Qaeda and ISIS.

'I see much terrorism in your future…'

With this in mind, the United States, and allied countries, should swiftly seek to make alliances with Saudi Arabia's competitor, Iran.

1. Shia Islam is superior to Sunni

Of the two Islamic branches, Shia Islam is the superior one. Those countries that have significant Shia populations – Iran, Syria, and Lebanon – are pro-Western and science-friendly. Furthermore, Shiites have scarcely engaged violently with Westerners. Saudi Arabia, by contrast, is largely Sunni.

2. Saudis have no sense of taste

If you ever walk through fancy shops in Oxford Street or Harrod's in London, you will be quickly accosted by wealthy Arabs in town for a weekend of shopping. Mostly from nations like Saudi Arabia or UAE, they have little decency, and, like the Chinese, simply care for conspicuous consumption.

This is because Saudi Arabia has no deep culture of its own, unlike Iran, which has millennia of civilization. Iranians that I have met, abroad, are vastly more cultured and well-read than Saudis.

3. Iran is more democratic

Saudi Arabia is an absolute monarchy, in which the House of Saud maintains power over a compliant population (Saudi citizens are given well-paid sinecures to shut their mouths). There are no meaningful elections or free press.

I heard a story, once, of an Indian man who entered Saudi Arabia, carrying a Bible. His assets were promptly seized, and he was thrown into an open-air prison for two weeks – for being a Christian.

Iran, by contrast, has political elections, and while it is not a full democracy, it protects the rights of minorities – including Jews, Christians, and Zoroastrians.

4. Iran has never attacked the United States

To be precise, Iran has never attacked another country, at least since Reza Shah Pahlavi consolidated his power and transformed the country in 1921.

Although Iran funds groups like Hezbollah, these organizations have never attacked the United States, and are primarily concerned with Israel. Yet Israel, a small Middle Eastern nation, is no more important to us than the Czech Republic, a similarly sized country.

Iranian leaders have made acerbic remarks about the West, referring to the U.S. as 'The Great Satan,' but as we all know, actions matter beyond rhetoric.

Saudi Arabia, on the other hand, has recently been engaged in a barbaric invasion of neighbouring Yemen, with the United States's full support.

5. Saudi Arabia has accepted zero migrants

Although Saudi Arabia has 100,000 air-conditioned, vacant tents, it refuses to accept any refugees. Instead, the kingdom would rather have us Westerners accept the economic and social burdens of the Muslim horde.

Iran, to its credit, has put up millions of Afghan refugees within its borders. These migrants have had trouble integrating into Iranian culture, so perhaps Iran can sympathize with us on these issues.

6. Persian girls

They are cute and will put out (if Westernized). Anyone who has visited Los Angeles can confirm this. Sure, Saudi women may be gorgeous, but if you manage to rip that burka off her body, you have my congratulations, for you are the King of Game. Of course, her father and brothers will likely murder you afterwards.

7. The nuclear threat is overblown

If Iran develops a nuclear weapon, the only country that should worry is Israel. My response: who cares?

If Iran and Israel both have nuclear weapons then that would return balance-of-power to the Middle East between two nations that refuse to obey the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. This can only be good for the United States, which has been Israel's bitch since 1967.

The analogy to game is clear: plate-spinning is an important technique to manage women. Once that whiny girl you have been monogamous with sees that she has competition, she falls into line.

8. We still need oil

Amidst the shrill songs of global warming activists, the fact is that no technology has surpassed the internal combustion engine, in terms of efficiency and convenience. Electric cars and windmills are no solution. We need petroleum.

Should we be buying our oil from a country that supports terrorism, oppresses religious minorities, and engages in hedonistic consumption? Or should we buy from a country with an ancient culture, that does not actively support violence against the West?

9. Iran's leader

Iran's Supreme Leader, Ayatollah Khameini, suggested that feminism and sexual libertinism are Zionist ploys to collapse Western civilization.

While his categorizations may be imprecise, the Ayatollah seems acutely aware of the dangerous culture war at play. Singling out human rights groups and liberal think tanks, he said:

> ...cultural attacks by the enemy are more dangerous than military attacks.

A plan forward

For Donald Trump, I suggest a three-point plan:

- Change your visa policy to ban Saudis, while permitting Iranians to visit.
- Begin immediate negotiations with President Hassan Rouhani of Iran, with the express purpose of gaining access to Iranian oilfields.

- Sanction Saudi assets – the priority should be financial assets.

If these three points are followed, the West would be safer, wealthier, and we can avoid seeing Saudis on the streets of London.

Read Next: 4 Reasons Why Assad Must Win The Syrian War

Eusebius Erasmus
Eusebius is a Prairie Canadian who likes gun rights, traditional values, and economics.

The Influence Curve

August 13, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Many men want the influence of being followed by a great mass of people without understanding the costs to gaining that influence, not just from a fame standpoint, where you lose your privacy, but also an adversarial standpoint, where your influence starts to encroach on the interests of powerful groups. I have learned firsthand that past a certain point of influence, you will suffer exceptionally damaging attacks that don't offer a proportional increase in influence. The "curve of influence" dictates that you should stop attempting to increase your influence past a certain point.

Every day, a man somewhere begins a journey at gaining influence. He uses his existing talent and experience to produce articles, videos, podcasts, or tweets. The early stages will be rough as his work will not be readily rewarded with influence, but if he persists, he will eventually cross a threshold where his influence rises rapidly and his following becomes dedicated. Soon, his influence begins stepping on the toes of other people, especially if he's a dissident that is not controlled by the mainstream establishment. He will then be attacked.

The creator is happy with attacks, because it causes his influence to rise, earns him more money, and gives him the recognition that is natural for the ego to crave, but the attacks are likely to increase in intensity to the point where he now has to dedicate more time at defending against them instead of producing the work that gained him influence in the first place. Soon, his influence starts going down as his output becomes entirely framed by his enemies and no longer provides value to his core audience.

Here is a graphical representation of how this looks:

The sweet spot is the point where the creator has high influence but sustains a minimum exposure to attacks. If he seeks higher levels of influence, he must then engage with the enemy. This increases his influence further, but only by a small degree. He continues until hitting peak influence, which is no more than 20% higher than the influence he had at the sweet spot, but this comes at a heavy price of being attacked more regularly. The creator's existence now consists mostly of responding to the attacks instead of producing work. This causes him to lose influence.

My creator career fits this curve. There are three notable attacks I've sustained: (1) being placed on the Southern Poverty Law Center misogynist list in 2012, (2) getting attacked by Canadian mayors in 2015, and (3) having to shut down my meetups due to worldwide outrage in 2016.

I approached the sweet spot with the SPLC denouncement, surpassing it three years later during Canada. The meetup outrage was my moment of peak influence. Every man has a limit to the influence he can gain, and by continuing on the path I was on, my influence would actually decline. So I ignored my ego's call for more influence. Otherwise, there is a fair chance I'd be dead right now, because my ego would have convinced me that I'm not truly influential unless people are trying to kill me. That did not seem like a productive outcome.

The curve doesn't account for great personal costs in seeking influence. Once the attacks against you are ramped up, you become less able to produce the work that you love and instead become more paranoid and jaded. The moment you need to hire bodyguards to ensure your personal safety, or when you have to study operational security tactics written by former CIA agents, is when you know you're close to your peak influence.

The solution is not to pass the sweet spot. This means you must purposefully take actions that limit your influence by using enemy attacks as an indicator of where you stand. If attacks against you are increasing, you are proceeding on the curve. If the attacks against you are stable or decreasing, you are not moving on the curve. I have moved leftward on the curve since the meetup outrage by not holding events, not trolling on hot-button issues, reducing my profile on social media, and not actively trying to produce viral content. Taking these measures is quite hard for my ego to accept, because I know that if I do an event tomorrow, there will be spectacular riots that will shoot my name to the top of the news headlines. It's imploring me to go through the entirety of the curve, but I understand that listening to it will prevent me from creating the work I like in the first place.

I guarantee you that not a single creator will follow my suggestion and purposefully limit their influence. Getting attacked by the enemy is extremely validating as you begin to judge your self-worth based on how often people come after you, but within that lies the paradox that your influence will actually decline as you become more of an entertainer than a thought-leader. Even though I understand this, a part of me still craves that moment of peak influence and the intoxicating effect of when the eyes of the whole world are upon me. Time will tell if I can avoid that temptation.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: How To Influence People In The Modern Era

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Benefits That Minorities Enjoy While Living In "White Supremacist" Countries

August 14, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

All across the Western world, but most notably in the United States, we keep on hearing about how awful "white supremacy" is. Apparently, white people (and particularly white men) have too much political power in society, keep taking all the best jobs, keep taking all the biggest movie roles, and have a hard-on for beating up black men on the street for "no reason" via the modern day slave patrol or "police force".

Rather than acknowledging that political power tends to come naturally with majority demographics, lucrative jobs favor a culture which emphasizes good education and marketable skills, the movie industry is actually exceedingly Jewish, and black criminal responsibility is equally as important as police brutality, white society just needs to regularly be browbeaten and demonized at any chance by SJW's and their Marxist media platforms.

White men who are right wing, heterosexual, and Christian are particularly sidelined for criticism and scorn, and treated like they are all closet Ku Klux Klan members and Nazi's in their private lives.

A rather silly looking outfit which a lot of SJW's think is hiding in every right wing heterosexual Christian white male's wardrobe.

This "white supremacist" power structure is treated like it's the scourge of the modern age, and it must be "dismantled" (ie. white men removed from positions of power and influence) around the globe at all costs. Because according to SJW's, "everybody suffers from white supremacy". Even other white people which seems rather odd…

However, this article will let you know in four key points that white supremacy as the left describes it is a farce. White supremacy is a good thing, and it should be celebrated in the same way the left thinks meaningless diversity should be "celebrated".

Please note that the frequent use of "white supremacy" in this article is meant to be tongue-in-cheek and to mock SJW publications overuse of the term. Additionally, my definition of white supremacy in this case is not to denote a country where whites are superior and have special privileges, but a country where whites maintain a clear demographic majority and the national culture is centered on white European traditions and free market capitalism.

1. They Have The World's Highest Standards Of Living

2016 estimates for 2015 [1]	Change in rank from previous year [2]	Country	2015 estimates for 2015 [1]	Change from previous year [2]
1	—	Norway	0.949	▲ 0.001
2	▲ (1)	Australia	0.939	▲ 0.002
2	—	Switzerland	0.939	▲ 0.001
4	—	Germany	0.926	▲ 0.002
5	▲ (1)	Denmark	0.925	▲ 0.002
6	▼ (1)	Singapore	0.925	▲ 0.001
7	▼ (1)	Netherlands	0.924	▲ 0.001
8	—	Ireland	0.923	▲ 0.003
9	—	Iceland	0.921	▲ 0.002
10	▼ (1)	Canada	0.920	▲ 0.001
10	▲ (1)	United States	0.920	▲ 0.002
12	—	Hong Kong	0.917	▲ 0.001
13	—	New Zealand	0.915	▲ 0.002
14	▲ (1)	Sweden	0.913	▲ 0.004
15	▼ (1)	Liechtenstein	0.912	▲ 0.001
16	—	United Kingdom	0.909	▲ 0.001
17	—	Japan	0.903	▲ 0.001
18	—	South Korea	0.901	▲ 0.002
19	—	Israel	0.899	▲ 0.001
20	—	Luxembourg	0.898	▲ 0.002

The Top 20 countries on the Human Development Index. All but 5 (Singapore, Hong Kong, Japan, South Korea, Israel) are white supremacies. The white supremacies graciously allow various levels of non-white immigration, while Israel, South Korea, Japan, Hong Kong, and Singapore have very restrictive immigration policies. In fact, Israel's migration policy is outright RACIST against anyone who is not Jewish.

White supremacist countries like Norway, Australia, Sweden, Denmark, Iceland, Germany, Netherlands, New Zealand, Switzerland, Canada, and the United States all share the distinction of having the world's highest standards of living. In these countries where people of northern European extraction predominate, infrastructure is reliable and well-maintained, corruption is low, civil rights and liberties are high, technological innovation is high, jobs are on the cutting edge, and hospitals and universities are world class.

To put it mildly, things just work.

2018 estimates for 2015 [1]	Change in rank from previous year[1]	Country	2018 estimates for 2015 [1]	from previous year [1]
169	—	Afghanistan	0.479	—
170	—	Malawi	0.476	▲ 0.003
171	▲ (1)	Côte d'Ivoire	0.474	▲ 0.008
172	▼ (1)	Djibouti	0.473	▲ 0.008
173	—	Gambia	0.452	▲ 0.002
174	—	Ethiopia	0.448	▲ 0.007
175	—	Mali	0.442	▲ 0.004
176	▲ (2)	Congo, Democratic Republic of the	0.430	▲ 0.010
177	—	Liberia	0.427	—
178	▲ (1)	Guinea-Bissau	0.424	▲ 0.003
179	▲ (2)	Eritrea	0.420	▲ 0.002
179	▼ (3)	Sierra Leone	0.420	▼ 0.011
181	▲ (1)	Mozambique	0.418	▲ 0.004
181	▼ (2)	South Sudan	0.418	▼ 0.003
183	▼ (1)	Guinea	0.414	—
184	—	Burundi	0.404	▼ 0.002
185	—	Nassau Essa	0.402	▲ 0.003
186	—	Chad	0.396	▲ 0.002
187	—	Niger	0.358	▲ 0.002
188	—	Central African Republic	0.352	▲ 0.005

Meanwhile, the bottom 20 countries are almost exclusively black African nations. Liberia ranks 177th, a country which was founded by freed African American slaves in order to (oddly enough) escape white supremacy.

On the other hand, much of the rest of the world's nations vary in their levels of infrastructural, educational, and political dysfunction. Additionally, these countries are often plagued with grinding poverty, substandard healthcare, poor job prospects, and questionable civil liberties for the common citizenry.

Even in the wealthy northeast Asian countries (which don't allow foreign migrants beyond token numbers), many people in those lands still desire to move to white Western countries for greater variety of employment opportunities, access to much more spacious housing, to escape cutthroat standards of conformity, and to embrace the west's much greater respect for individualism (which helps foster Thomas Edison and Elon Musk types.)

The various peoples of the entire world reap innumerable benefits by living within a nation which is considered white supremacist. However, those benefits are greatly called into question if the dominant group which is responsible for making those countries so desirable in the first place (white people) are being dispossessed by mass immigration. White demographics need to stay high in all of these countries so that the non-East Asian minority groups living within them can equally thrive.

2. They Have The World's Lowest Levels Of Racism And Intolerance

Cultural Marxist agendas constantly try to insinuate that white Westerners are very intolerant and well, just act sort of outright cunty towards non-white and non-Christian foreigners. The preceding clip of a man in a New York City dentist office being told by a white woman not to speak his scary “Muslim” language is a perfect example of this melodramatic propaganda.

This is absolutely not the case, and countries which are demographic white supremacies are in fact the most tolerant and most accommodating nations on the entire planet. For example, the Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden, Uruguay, Australia, Finland, New Zealand, Ireland, Canada, and Iceland were named the world’s 10 most tolerant countries. All of these nations are white supremacist in their racial and religious (Christian) demographics.

Some of the wealthy northeast Asian nations like Japan are NOT very tolerant as you can see. White supremacies the world over would not put up with this sort of ethnic and linguistic discrimination for a SECOND.

By comparison, even the wealthy nations of northeast Asia express their intolerance and unaccommodating nature by accepting hardly any immigrants, and some even forbid foreign tourists of any race from using many hotels and shops at various locations throughout the country. Well that’s not very nice is it!?

As for many black or Muslim countries, don’t even get us started. African countries like Liberia clearly state in their constitution that only people of black African ancestry can become citizens, while not a single white country on Earth has such racist clauses anymore. Furthermore, Muslim nations are among the most intolerant and barbaric.

The religion of peace still executes people in some countries for saying “I quit” (apostasy).

Women cannot show their faces or drive in Saudi Arabia, homosexuals can be killed in many Muslim nations, apostasy can be punishable by death, gay marriage is legalized pretty much nowhere, and non-Muslim minority groups like the Coptic Christians of Egypt are treated like 2nd class citizens at best.

White countries, with all their guaranteed freedoms of religion and expression on offer, and the great liberties that women, homosexuals, and other groups enjoy, don’t sound so bad now do they? White Christian societies made all of those liberties happen.

3. They Have The World’s Best Salaries And Career Opportunities

Despite lower levels of economic prosperity compared to other groups (primarily due to personal choices and their potential consequences), the approximately 45 million African Americans enjoy a median household income of $35,500 (compared to $350 in nearby Haiti). Black Americans additionally benefit from white-orchestrated affirmative action policies designed to further increase their employment opportunities and economic standing. The "white supremacist" U.S.A. also has over 35,000 black millionaires. More than the ENTIRE CONTINENT of Africa.

As you can see from the preceding factoids, via living in a white supremacist country, African-Americans enjoy the highest annual earnings of any highly populous black population in the entire world, and by a considerable margin. As politically incorrect as it may sound, and with no desire to cause (butt) hurt feelings, there is not a single truly prosperous and high-income black country elsewhere on the entire planet.

People from all over the world desire to relocate to one of many white countries, as they offer a level of career advancement, along with their generous corresponding salaries, which are essentially non-existent in their home nations. In fact, certain non-white ethnicities (Indians & Chinese for example) in "white supremacies" earn even higher average salaries than the white majority, while the irony of the situation is that their ancestral homelands are noisy, polluted, and low-income.

A university student in India, a country where people still defecate in the street and the nominal per capita income is less than $1,600. Ask him where he wants to go to get a lucrative career and he will probably say Australia, Canada, the United States, or the United Kingdom. All of them white supremacies.

The benefits of having a generous income cannot be understated. An abundance of money offers peace of mind in that healthy food will be on the table every night, the rent or mortgage will be paid, the motor vehicle will be full of gas, and that much desired overseas holiday can be paid for. White supremacist countries offer this kind of economic security which is lacking in most of the world.

And speaking of travelling overseas…

4. Their Citizens Have The Most Visa-Free Travel

Sadiq Khan, the shitty Pakistani-British SJW mayor of Londonistan. His white supremacist British passport allows visa-free or visa-on-arrival access to 173 countries and territories. By comparison, a passport from his dysfunctional homeland would only allow visa-free or visa-on-arrival access to 29 countries and territories.

When you are the citizen of an economically prosperous country with a strong human rights record and representative government (ie. most countries predominated by people of northern European extraction), you are rewarded with a privileged passport which offers well over 150 countries that they can visit either visa-free or visa-on-arrival at worst.

Why? Because the citizens of most white countries are accurately considered to be low-risk candidates for people to overstay their visits (illegally migrate), be unable to afford their journeys duration and departure, and be highly unlikely to swarm the local refugee or political asylum offices.

A jovial African-American woman travelling abroad on her white supremacist U.S. passport, ranked 3rd in the world with 174 countries and territories visa-free or with visa-on-arrival. By comparison, most sub-Saharan African passports are among the world's most restrictive due to the continents rampant poverty, corruption, and instability.

Such passports are not inherently white supremacist and "racist" of course, as the wealthy and peaceful Asian countries of Japan, South Korea, Singapore, and Hong Kong etc. also have very strong passports. It is purely due to the economic and political standing of the country in question.

Since white Europeans and northeast Asians have proven themselves time and time again to maintain the most advanced (and therefore unfucked) societies, it is for the benefit of everyone in high-performance white majority countries that the white population remains in the clear majority. Your passports power depends on it, because the wealthy northeast Asian countries are certainly not very well known for taking in immigrants who are not of their core ethnicity!

Conclusion

Sundar Pachai, the Indian-born CEO of Google, one of the white supremacist USA's largest corporations. In his oppressed minority position, he has the power to terminate white male employees who express thought crimes (red pill truths) about gender, and point out the obvious discrimination against conservatives in tech companies.

As you can see from the preceding four points, "white supremacy" really isn't so bad after all. Butthurt SJW's of many various factions seem to be complaining about it all the time, but we don't exactly see them filling out their forms to move to Liberia, or return to whatever third world nation (like India) they originally came from to try and escape white supremacy or carve out a successful career there in any considerable numbers.

Why? Because life is good, healthy, functional, accommodating, innovative, financially abundant, and tolerant in white supremacies. And it is the white European natives, and their majority white settlers in the United States, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand which made all of these wonderful things possible for non-Europeans in the first place.

In short, the left has got it all wrong. White supremacy is not a horrible thing. White supremacist countries are in fact a fantastic thing for everyone who lives in one.

Read Next: What You Need To Know Before You Consider Living In Another Country

John Carver

John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

What To Do When The Cops Show Up

August 14, 2017 | by Wayne Star | Link | Original Link

Maybe you didn't deserve it but there you are, talking to the cops. If you answer wrong you can earn a ticket, an ass kicking, jail or all three. Everyone thinks they know what to do but, having worn a badge for over five years, I can say with authority that knowing a few things can definitely help you avoid trouble.

First, a little about me. No, I never shot anyone but my partners did. I had my share of fights and pursuits, which I always won. I never had to violate anyone's rights to get my job done because it was too easy to arrest legit violators without cheating; people are idiots. I never experienced any of the ratchetness that you see on YouTube except when female officers came out to play.

My motto was always, "manners are nice, politeness is neat but have a plan to kill everyone you meet."

Who you are up against

Not all cops are fuckwits like the ones featured online. In most cases, the officer has had extensive training in legally getting you to do as he wishes without even touching you. For example, he has probably studied the Reid Interrogation Technique and "Gerbil Voodoo." Also, his squared-away uniform is designed to stimulate your natural authority-compliance tendencies that you learned in school. He has also dealt with your exact same crime dozens of times over his career and has heard every single explanation and lie you could imagine.

“Please resist”

If you decide to step out of line, he and his partners are schooled in several ways to kick your ass and can easily, legally kill you with the tools on his belt and a few hidden ones that you will never see coming. He runs through scenarios in his head all day long, pre-planning how he will kill you when the time comes. He is way readier than you. You are entering the situation vastly out-gunned, mentally and physically.

You mall-ninjas think that since you spent a month earning a blackbelt at a McDojo and are “pretty good at talking your way outta shit” that you may win the encounter, but this isn’t your mom or a high school hall monitor you are trying to out-smart. Law enforcement officers use these skills daily in the real world and they are better than you at it.

They may look dumb but in many cases that is actually just a front to get you to become overconfident so you’ll screw up. For example, when I was on patrol I used to wear dark-frame glasses with prescription-free lenses in them because they made me look like a nerd. People assumed I was stupid and would try to pull more shit, which I easily saw through and got more arrests. Boom!

Would you ever enter the Octagon against a top-ranked professional MMA fighter? That is who you are against when you try to match wits against the cops. They do this every day.

Rule #1: Shut the fuck up!

The Miranda warning was written to let stupid people know that the only reason the cops are talking to you is that they do not yet have enough probably cause to arrest you. The only way they will get that probable cause is to 1) ask questions or 2) look for evidence. Eliminate #1.

Once they have probable cause, you go to jail, no more talking. Cry all you want about your attorney, which you don't really have, and something about the officer's mother, but he can't hear you because he has already faded a Christian radio station to the back seat of his patrol car to drown out your pathetic cries.

Remember, you cannot say anything to the cops to make yourself sound LESS guilty. Everything you say will be twisted to make you sound more guilty.

Here is an example: "I stopped you today because you were speeding. Is there a reason why you were going so fast?" Here you think you'll provide some bad-ass excuse to prevent a ticket like, "Yes officer, your wife is waiting for me," or whatever. But no, every answer you give to the, "Why were you speeding?" question is just an admission that you were, in fact speeding. Correct response: silently hand him your license.

In America, the Fifth Amendment keeps you from having to serve as a witness against yourself, meaning that you are not required to say shit to the police, ever. If you are the suspect in a crime, you can hand them your ID and do nothing else until the encounter is over. If an officer wants to stop you and "just ask a few questions," you can say, "No thanks, am I being detained?" If the answer is anything but YES, you are free to go.

“Can I resist?”

No you cannot. The cops can stop you for a reasonable amount of time to conduct a brief investigation to determine if a crime has occurred or is about to occur, generally referred to as a Terry Stop. If they detain you longer or arrest you “for nothing,” don’t resist, ever. Doing so risks your health and safety. The time to resist is later in court after you obtain legal representation.

During a traffic stop, can being silent get you a bigger ticket? Yes. Can being compliant sometimes earn a little goodwill? Perhaps but 90% of the time, a cop has already decided, before he pulled you over, if you were going to get a ticket or not.

“But Wayne, I’m innocent, I have nothing to lose by talking.”

My dear moon calf, yes you do. You see, cops have the task of rounding up suspects for the courts to try. They do not care if you are guilty or not—they care if there is probable cause to arrest you. Once you are arrested, they can call the case solved and move on. There are thousands of cases where the wrong person has not only been arrested but convicted, because the cops got them talking and they said something contradictory (suspicious) and ended up in jail.

He isn’t reaching for your participation trophy

Conclusion

Don’t do their job for them, make the cops work. The cops won’t be impressed with your legal knowledge, your ability to quote case law or the fact that your personal lawyer is a stud. None of that Sovereign Citizen bullshit will help you either.

You are facing a trained killer who got into the profession because he has a capacity for violence and has a desire to use it for the good of society. He trains, practices and constantly daydreams about ways to make you spill your guts and admit guilt in ways you can’t even imagine. The best hope you have in getting out of this encounter unscathed is never doing anything illegal, shutting your gob, and not resisting.

Read Next: Female Police Officers And Soldiers Reduce Everyone’s Safety

Wayne Star
After work, when Wayne isn't climbing in the mountains he is brewing beer, making music, skiing, hunting, working out, or dating girls who can keep up. Teacher, firefighter, cop, mountain guide and florist are all hats that Wayne has worn with pride.

Charlottesville Was A Disaster For The Dissident Right

August 14, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I carefully followed the events from Charlottesville this past weekend that culminated with a declaration of emergency for the state of Virginia and the death of a liberal protester who was ran over by an alleged Nazi sympathizer. Regardless of the peaceful intent of the alt right protest, I believe this was a catastrophe that has given the establishment key momentum to marginalize and harm dissidents whose ideology is not based solely on white nationalism.

Charlottesville saw the exact same story we've seen during my Canadian lectures in 2015, university events by Milo Yiannopoulos, and spring time protests in Berkeley of coordination between the state authorities and far-left groups like antifa or Black Lives Matter. In the case of Charlottesville, city government and Virginia state police shut down the alt right event before it started through a state of emergency that made any assembly "unlawful," even though a Federal Judge sanctioned the legality of the event a day before.

Police proceeded to eject alt right protesters from a park into the waiting arms of rabid antifags, who proceeded to attack by launching pepper spray and other objects. One alt right personality, Baked Alaska, is looking at permanent eye damage from what may be a diluted acid attack. Many others on his side sustained serious injuries.

The police determined that any assembly was unlawful for the right, but not for antifa and Black Lives Matter, who gathered bats and other weapons to protest on the streets, completely unmolested. That is when an alt right protester plowed into a crowded intersection with his car, causing the death of a 32-year-old leftist and injuring over a dozen others.

It turns out that the driver was a fan of Hitler and Nazi imagery (other protesters showed up with a Nazi flag). With the narrative now sealed, the media has the death they need to link the alt right to Nazism and domestic terrorism, providing a perfect rallying cry for leftists around the world to dox, harass, impoverish, and threaten dozens of men associated with the protest. I have no doubt that ROK and myself will be put back on the chopping block once the alt right is weakened from this massive assault.

Many dissident commentators are speaking out on how the police were unfair. The left was given a pass, they say, to run wild and attack with impunity, but that doesn't really matter. This is the game as it is, not as you want it to be, so if you expect fair treatment while the rule of law applies to you but not your enemy, you will lose. If you're counting on the police to protect you, you will lose. Might makes right, and right now big chunks of the dissident movement is flailing their arms crying about how the enemy is not playing by the rules while they get their clock cleaned. This is not a tactic that will lead to victory.

The reaction of the biggest alt right leader, Richard Spencer, tells me that he was neither prepared not qualified to deal with the events in Charlottesville. His post-mortem podcast was painful to listen to—he joked around and complained endlessly about it being a "set-up." If I didn't study properly for an exam, I'd think the teacher set me up, too, upon realizing I don't have any of the answers.

Would you show up to a rally next month if led by a man who is jovial a day after one of his associates was blinded by a chemical? His actions after the Charlottesville debacle make me question his leadership, and while he may be sincere and gutsy, that's not enough to prevent injuries and deaths getting racked up on your scorecard. To his credit, he did tighten up in his press conference, but he needs to do some serious soul-searching on whether he's the man who can continue as a leader for his followers.

There are two psy-op triggers that are buried deep in the American mind: rape and Nazism. When I triggered the world with my How To Stop Rape article, I took the loss and stopped talking about rape. When the alt right triggered the world with their "Hail Victory" Nazi salute, which I defended on free speech grounds, they doubled down until someone who legitimately believed he was a Nazi killed someone.

It's clear that the Nazi trolling, encouraged by the likes of The Daily Stormer and The Right Stuff, will get you meme-making internet fans and at least one real-life idiot who ends up killing others, whether accidentally or not. The Charlottesville death vindicates prior denouncements by the likes of Gavin McInnes, Paul Ramsey (Ramzpaul), and Mike Cernovich, who seemed to know what an appeal to Nazism would lead to.

If Donald Trump doesn't need to meme about Hilter to win an election, you don't either, unless you want your movement to die or be seen as controlled opposition. It's no surprise that Trump came out to speak against "racism" and "hate," throwing the alt right under the bus. Their stench is just too great, which is why I will continue to moderate pro-Nazi imagery and users from all sites I operate.

There is a personality called Millennial Matt. Watch this clip of him giving a hospital update of his friend Baked Alaska:

I know that look on his face, because I had the same back in February 2016 during the meetup outrage. It's when a man is pushed to his limit, when he feels the walls closing in around him, and when he's hoping that things will just blow over, but sometimes the momentum is too large and things don't blow over—it continues for weeks. I expect civil lawsuits by those injured in the car accident in the near future.

This isn't a game, this is war. You may scoff at that comment, but if you're going to a rally without the expectation that someone there will try to maim or kill you, you run a high risk of being maimed or killed. We have broken the seal of death, and people will start dying at increasing rates. Antifa will want payback for the death of one of their communist allies, so you should not attend any rally unless you're able to defend your life. Big boobed e-thots should stay home. I repeat, this is not a game, and there is zero excuse for you to be blindsided from this point on.

An important question is what to do next. Rallies and other public events should be crossed off the list unless you're prepared to run them like a counter-terrorist operation, which is how I was able to pull off my Canadian lectures. It makes absolutely no sense to announce the time and place of your meeting for the main benefit of appearing in fake news, all to be ambushed by antifa who have nothing to lose through their felonious violence.

Unless you're an e-celeb with a huge ego, you don't need public events, you don't need to make the news, and you don't need to gather massive groups of men you don't know. Build your movement slow and steady instead of attracting whack jobs who praise Hitler and run people over with cars. Create flash events where leftist foot soldiers don't receive advance notice on their iPhones of your whereabouts, and focus on winning hearts and minds with poignant, effective, or humorous engagements that are publicized through images or video and allow you to grow slowly as you gain needed experience.

If you insist on facing off with antifa, it's going to be a fight that will likely lead to injury or imprisonment for you, but not imprisonment for them, and with the My Paycheck Matters police on the side of the state, it's a hill you don't want to die on until we enter a hot Civil War scenario. If you can't become as competent on the field as a genuine Army Major, do not lead people into what will be sure ruin.

It should be clear that we have no allies in existing state and cultural institutions. They hate you and wish you would disappear, because you're the one remaining obstacle to allowing them to permanently rule and usher in their "end of history." They're currently treating you with kid gloves, but we're fast approaching the point where it will just be easier to outright kill you through their antifa or BLM zombies.

Before you associate with any dissident leader, ask yourself if he will get you maimed or impoverished through his incompetence, unpreparedness, or stupidity. Are you following a leader with an ego or an ego who doesn't know how to lead? Since we're still about 2-4 years away from violence that will make Charlottesville look like nothing, you still have time to decide the best way to proceed for you and your country.

Read Next: "Unite The Right" Rally In Charlottesville Shut Down By City Government And Their Violent Leftist Allies

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Australian Fire Department's Female Firefighter Quota Of 50% Will Get People Killed

August 14, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Not satisfied with regular SJW-enabling and social engineering, Australia's biggest fire department has implemented a 50% female hiring quota. Unfortunately for residents of New South Wales, Australia's most populous state and the home of Sydney, this is only going to increase property destruction, not to mention cause serious injuries and deaths.

Feminists, god bless them, have been appalled by the proportion of female firefighters, which presently hovers around 3-5% for Australia's eight mainland states and territories (for good reason). The solution is one for the ages, as former Australian socialist leader, now anti-SJW crusader Mark Latham has revealed:

It wants new recruits to be able to "drag a collapsed firefighter to safety on their own", yet to accommodate female applicants, the Physical Aptitude Test has been reduced from a 90kg [200lb] dummy drag over 20 metres [66 feet] to the relatively easy task of carrying a 30kg [65lb] weight for 10 metres [33 feet].

The price for gender "equality" has been revealed: female firefighters are now expected to carry the same load for the same distance as a 45-year-old suburban housewife bringing groceries to her car. If they do this, they can get the job ahead of a man who can carry twice or thrice that weight for much longer distances.

America may have spawned Evergreen State College and other SJW factories of late, but Australia is rapidly edging ahead of the US for the title of the most cucked English-speaking nation. And, as we know from so many other arenas, one Western country's ridiculous social experiments tend to spread to all other Western countries. So watch out Britain, Canada, and the US.

An insult to every qualified firefighter who ever lived and a risk to everyone finding themselves in danger

Female feelings are being put ahead of people's lives across the Western world when it comes to fire department hiring policies.

When I think of hardworking firefighters, I remember the brave–and doomed–members of various New York City firehouses ascending the stairs of the two World Trade Center towers on September 11, 2001. The professionalism of these men (all lost FDNY personnel were male that day) has already been insulted by their Department's mollycoddling of incompetent female recruits who persistently fail fitness tests. The same can be said of fire departments across the Western world, probably all of which have been assaulted by some form of SJW madness.

An even bigger problem will loom if the FDNY and other organizations opt for a New South Wales-style quota. Like New South Wales, New York City has millions of people, many of them living in densely-populated apartment blocks or mega-sized residential towers that make it difficult to escape blazes. The potential for horrific casualties in highly urbanized areas is going to skyrocket when hiring policies are geared towards female feelings over professionalism and physical requirements. This process is now in full swing.

They're going to carry you out of your burning building?

Fire brigades' effectiveness and cohesion will be progressively destroyed if too many years' worth of subpar recruits are admitted, whether in New South Wales or elsewhere. Moreover, once standards are lowered, it is hard to see them being increased again, until people really start to die. Even if they do die, do not expect the authorities to throw the blame at the quality of any (female) recruits.

The former socialist leader Mark Latham, whose about-turn from leftwing politics should inspire all of us, compared the decision to enact quotas in New South Wales to Orwellian Newspeak. He called out how a fire chief demanding a 50% forced representation of women could ever say:

Merit selection will determine the best candidates for the job, regardless of gender, but we will deliver equity in the number of male and female firefighters.

Officials aren't even trying anymore.

Our safety is being undermined

For those of you not fully up to speed on the topic, the video above is a prime example from Sweden about the end result when you put unqualified females into public safety positions. If the man the female police officers tried to restrain had wanted to kill them, he could have done it easily.

Like the horrendous decision to hire women half the time for New South Wales Fire and Rescue roles, Sweden has repeatedly favored women in police capacities, to the point of deliberately taking in more women than men. When similar stories for the emergency services in England, the US, Canada, France, and Germany are considered, we have a storm brewing.

Return Of Kings is replete with cases like these, including my article earlier this year about how the current proportion of female police officers and soldiers endangers the public. The soldier successfully disarmed at Orly Airport outside Paris was, of course, a woman. And the firefighters most likely to be "disarmed" by the demands of fighting fires and rescuing people are going to be female ones.

Now people will have to take their fire safety risk even more seriously than before and act independently of government support in times of emergency. With many tens of pounds of equipment already strapped to firefighters' bodies, is anyone going to expect more than a tiny fraction of these female recruits to be able to carry them out of a burning building and save their lives?

Read More: Female Police Officers And Soldiers Reduce Everyone's Safety

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Movie “Brooklyn” Is A Sound Case Study Of Female Hypergamy

August 15, 2017 | by Eusebius Erasmus | Link | Original Link

Nominated for three Oscars, and winning a BAFTA Best Film award, the 2015 movie Brooklyn might appear to be typical mainstream garbage. On the contrary! There is, in fact, much to commend in this piece, from its decorous sets to its resplendent cinematography. Yet the astute viewer notices something deeper and darker: ostensibly a film about a working-class Irish immigrant’s struggles in 1950s New York City, the movie subverts dominant cultural narratives about gender, and firmly reveals female nature for its ugly inner moorings.

In 1951, Eilis Lacey is a cute Irish girl who endeavors, futilely, to find good employment in County Wexford, Ireland. Her only wages come from working part-time at the bakeshop of Miss Kelly, the town's cantankerous, gossipy old wench. Yet Eilis has dreams of becoming a bookkeeper and decides, with the Catholic Church's support, to move to Brooklyn, New York. While there, the Church finds her work at a luxury Manhattan department store, and also pays for her bookkeeping lessons at a local college.

Eilis then falls for Italian beta-boy and plumber, Tony Fiorello, who declares his love for her before she does; this, of course, is a Cardinal Sin of Game. Regardless, they get married, for although Tony is a beta in the bedroom, he is an alpha of the world, having concrete plans for starting a home-building business and of buying Long Island property. Despite their happy marriage, Eilis avoids telling her family or friends back in Ireland.

In July 1952, Eilis's priest informs her that her sister has died suddenly, and Eilis travels back to Ireland, without her husband, to soothe her grieving mother. While she is back in the home country, the economy has recovered, and Eilis gets part-time bookkeeping work. She also starts dating a wealthy local man, Jim Farrell, ignoring her husband's ceaseless letters. Eilis, with her fairy eyes, wavy hair, and slim body, is what we might call a 'solid 8,' and she realizes that she can easily marry up, even though doing so would make her a bigamist.

Yet Eilis's dreams of settling down in Ireland are rapidly dashed into fragments when her former employer, the curmudgeonly old Miss Kelly, beckons Eilis into her bakeshop for a private meeting. At the film's climactic scene, Miss Kelly informs Eilis that she has received word from New York that Eilis is in fact Mrs. Fiorello.

What, therefore, is Eilis doing, gallivanting around with a local Irish lad like a common whore? Eilis storms out of the room, slams the door, and sobs, realizing Kelly's implicit threat: her reputation, in town, could be ruined.

The next day, she packs up and returns to New York, to be with Tony, never to return to Ireland.

The Wanderlust Heart

Eilis has the atavistic female desire to aspire towards better things. She seeks to become a bookkeeper, a traditionally male discipline, and moves to New York for wealth and, perhaps, access to superior men. Back home, she appears more than willing to drop her Italian-American husband, Tony, for the promise of a wealthy Irish heir.

This breed of woman, blindly seeking ambition, comprises creatures contrary to natural law. Women are biologically inward-looking and spiritually reflective, delicate beings, who do not often attempt to usurp men's labour. Return Of Kings warns against getting too involved with the capricious type of girl, who harbours poisonous feminist and social justice sentiments. You shall know them by their stripes: for they enjoy travel, fancy events, and take pride in shaming career men.

We belong to a time, unlike any other, in which all regulations constraining the unbridled sexual market have been loosened. The Church is powerless to act, and elders implicitly endorse hedonistic yearnings. The difference in Brooklyn is that Eilis was prevented from carrying out her fiendish desires because 1950s social institutions prevented her from doing so.

The Church, The Old Witch, and The Town

The Catholic Church still maintains some vestige of power in Ireland, which is why the country continues to ban abortions. Parenthetically, that might change, now that the Taoiseach (Prime Minister) is a gay Indian Millennial. Anyway, the Church had much more power in the 1950s, and was able to support Irish immigrants like Eilis, as they made their way across the frigid Atlantic.

Although the Catholic Church has been a net force for good, in Brooklyn its influence on Eilis is indisputably bad. The Church enables her to pursue her half-baked dreams in New York, and pays for her to qualify in a male profession. In this manner, Brooklyn's Church is similar to Western governments today, who have opened their coffers wide so that women may open their legs. Needless to say, social programs and welfare have incentivized women to act badly, replacing the patriarchal, personal husband with a matriarchal, impersonal State.

What ultimately stops Eilis in her tracks is community: in a small Irish 1950s town, even the tiniest secrets are openly dished about, encouraging proper behaviour. After all, one does not want to be known as the town drunk, or, even worse, the town slut. Miss Kelly, who awakens Eilis to the reality of the young girl's immorality, is the archetypical Old Witch of literature – that elderly woman who keeps young women in line.

Indeed, when Eilis lives in New York as a single girl, she inhabits a house with young women and an elderly landlady. The landlady enforces strict discipline, forbidding the girls from having men call in the evenings. The importance of older women in policing young women's choices has always been recognized, except today of course, when such a role is brushed aside as 'slut-shaming,' hence confining old women to a withered state in nursing homes.

A final point should be made about the men: Tony is a beta male, but he is financially shrewd and business-savvy. Jim Farrell, Eilis's wealthy Irish boyfriend, is more of an alpha, but his wealth is inherited, and he has no real-world skills. Society, at that point in time, motivated young women to marry a stable man like Tony.

Conclusion

Is it any surprise, then, that the globalist elite intends to immolate community so that they may attain power and wealth? Instead of men's gymnastics clubs, and women's knitting circles, we now have Facebook and Instagram, which simply encourage narcissism and hyper-consumerist mores. Women sleep with several men, leading to mental illness, while men refuse to marry, knowing that divorce portends alimony slavery.

Brooklyn's Eilis is a warning to young women of today, and perhaps its spectre lives in all of us: that dangerous, ugly, savage human evil, squirming and struggling to break loose from heaven, much like Lucifer's erstwhile shadow.

Read Next: The True Nature Of Female Hypergamy

Eusebius Erasmus
Eusebius is a Prairie Canadian who likes gun rights, traditional values, and economics.

10 Reasons Why Switzerland May Be The Best Country In The World

August 15, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Recently I went to Switzerland, partly to see if it really is the best country in the world. In this piece I will argue that this reputation indeed is well-deserved.

The World Factbook tells us the following about Switzerland:

> The Swiss Confederation was founded in 1291 as a defensive alliance among three cantons. In succeeding years, other localities joined the original three. The Swiss Confederation secured its independence from the Holy Roman Empire in 1499. A constitution of 1848, subsequently modified in 1874, replaced the confederation with a centralized federal government.
>
> Switzerland's sovereignty and neutrality have long been honored by the major European powers, and the country was not involved in either of the two world wars. The political and economic integration of Europe over the past half century, as well as Switzerland's role in many UN and international organizations, has strengthened Switzerland's ties with its neighbors. However, the country did not officially become a UN member until 2002. Switzerland remains active in many UN and international organizations but retains a strong commitment to neutrality.

If one goes on and look at specific dimensions, linked to economics, politics, society and culture, at least 10 are worthy of consideration and serve as proof of the nation's high quality.

1. High average incomes and low taxes

The monthly median gross salary of jobholders, on all educational levels, is 5979 (roughly $6180 US dollars). Although the financial service sector, and related such, make up a large part of the job cluster, blue collar workers earn a lot as well. Only Norway pays one hour's service more than Switzerland.

Needless to say, the cost of living is also high in general, but like in Norway it is possible to find a situation in which a worker can save a lot or have a good balance between saving and consumption.

For instance, if a person earns 6000 Swiss francs per month and the rent for a spacious apartment in Zurich is 2000 Swiss franc monthly, then a large bulk of money is still left since the tax burden in Switzerland is one of the world's lowest.

2. Low crime rates

Crime statistics are a bit fuzzy and depends on a variety of factors and can differ from one category to another. One can also argue that more advanced crimes might be linked to Switzerland's clandestine banking system.

However, regarding both petty crime and violent crime, those two categories that generally have the most significance for an individual, Switzerland is indeed a very safe country. For instance, its largest city, Zurich, has virtually no no-go areas.

3. A good balance between nationalism and globalism

Switzerland is linked to several international institutions, such as NATO, the U.N. and various globalist associations such as the World Economic Forum in Davos. The "customer-oriented" bank system, although more conformed to general European and global standards lately, is yet another such dubious element. Additionally, it has several significant bilateral agreements with the EU.

However, since a large share of Swiss people are nationalists and the national conservative and right-wing populist Swiss People's Party is the country's largest (29.4% in 2015), an effective balance has been created. Formed in 1971 as a party for both urban entrepreneurs and farmers, SVP has become more populist and radical under the leadership of wealthy businessman Christoph Blocher and farmer Toni Brunner in the 2000s and forward. It also has a strong and well-educated youth section, SVP Junge, and is overall much more competent than many other similar parties around Europe.

Benefiting from direct democracy, SVP has suceeded in several anti-Islam and immigration-restrictionist referendums that they have set off by collecting more than 100,000 petition signatures from Swiss citizens. For instance, after a referendum in 2009, minarets are banned in public and both EU migrants and non-EU migrants are restricted by specific quotas.

Ethnically, it is over 90% European. The largest ethnic groups are German 65%, French 18%, and Italian 10%, while other such make up only 6% (mostly people from the Balkans). Still if a non-European can contribute and integrate well he can move there permanently and be granted a citizenship after 10 years without social welfare.

The economic policies, especially those of SVP, is a mix between classic liberalism and pragmatic conservatice policies with a strong protectionist element. Those in turn perfectly balance the globalism that is also a feature among the more left-leaning, largely French-speaking segments in Geneva and other cities on the country's Western border. Both rural farmers and urban workers benefit from the system, which constitutes a fruitful compromise: it is open enough to avoid isolationism but nationalist enough to make it self-subsistent, wealthy, and largely independent.

4. Social conservatism

This point is linked to and largely overlaps the national conservatism among the Swiss German-speaking share of the population. Although a distinctively secularism-oriented state, Christianity, both Catholicism (38%) and Protestantism (26%), are integral parts of the country's culture and one finds much less of post-Marxism, feminism and social justice warriors, although they are part of the liberal and social-democratic segments of the populace.

However, as a modern Western country it is at least one step toward complete liberation of female forces. Women's suffrage was introduced after a referendum in 1971. In 1991, the canton Appenzell Innerrhoden was the last to allow women the vote on local issues. Yet the social conservative elements within the right counter the degeneracy. As expected, divorce rates are lower in the more rural than the urban areas. Another facet of social conservatism is the mandatory military service for men.

5. Regionalization of political influence

Somewhat similar to the United States, Switzerland builds on the confederation of 26 cantons with more or less distinctive regional features and preferences. Coupled with the direct democracy mentioned above, fertile soil for self-determination is the case. A person with the intent to move to Switzerland permanently can thus choose the one which conforms the most to one’s particular preferences.

6. Excellent infrastructure

The trains in Switzerland are some of the best in the world, even though the price levels can be repellent. For instance, I paid about 70 francs for a round-trip ticket between Zurich and Konstanz (in Germany, just at the Swiss border, near Bodensee). Other aspects of the infrastructure are likewise of very high standard. Switzerland is overall a high-tech country.

7. Beautiful nature

Switzerland has a temperate inland climate with cold winters and quite humid summers.Thirty-four degrees Celsius in August are not rare. Some positive characteristics are the Alps, picturesque small villages, and lots of high hills. The views are stunning, especially in the Alps and around Bodensee. Also parts of Zürich, the Old Town in particular, are very easy on the eye.

8. A great geographic location in Europe

The country is also located next to Austria, Liechtenstein, Germany, France and Italy, and not far from Slovenia and Croatia either, which makes its position excellent for a traveler. Eastern, Northern and Southern Europe are also within reach.

9. High gun ownership rate

Although the comparisons with the U.S. are misguided since it fails to distinguish that the gun ownership among non-criminals in the U.S. generally works, Switzerland has a very high gun ownership rate and yet very little violent crime. Every freedom-loving masculine man should be pleased by this condition.

10. No Islamic terrorism (yet)

Muslims (nearly 5% of the Swiss population) are not allowed to behave just as they please and the total number of Muslims is in relative terms much lower compared to neighboring Austria, France and Germany. This, paired with a rather strong military capacity, makes terror attacks less likely to occur.

Yet it might of course happen and some claim that is only a matter of time before it eventually does.

In summary

There are pros and cons with every country, and Switzerland is no exception. Interrelated phenomena such as secularism (which often goes hand in hand with increasing secularisation), liberalism, post-Marxism and globalism have affected the alp nation as well. However, in terms of degree there are palpable differences between Switzerland and many other European countries. It has managed to find a more appropriate balance between nationalism and globalism with a distinctive conservative flavor.

Given the low taxes, high incomes and standards of living, it is one of the best countries to migrate to and live permanently in. An English-speaking person should have no problem to learn Swiss German and abide by the law to the extent that one will be granted a citizenship in due time.

Read More: 4 Reasons You Should Visit The Island Of Malta

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

3 Crucial Factors That Determine The Bulk Of Your Dating Success

August 15, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Below are three main factors that largely underlie success with women. One is not enough; a male needs some degree of all of them. These have been identified after 20 years of actual experiences with females, ever since I first made out with a girl as a 12-year-old aspiring Casanova outside of a disco.

I have also observed many other males in my social network, some of which are highly successful and some are the complete opposite, and needless to say also taken into account all the game material on ROK and elsewhere that I have come across. Hopefully this effort can help to identify some of the most crucial factors in order to guide other males and engage discussion.

1. Looks

With looks I refer to the whole spectrum of face, height, body composition, hair, dress style, grooming and hygiene. Although looks are largely influenced by genes, they are also partly malleable.

For instance, a person who is critically short – at least in taller countries such as the Netherlands, UK and Denmark – can use stretching exercises and certain insoles in order to add two inches (one authentic and one inauthentic). With a long-lasting diet and exercise program a person can look like an Olympic athlete. Anyone with a middle income can buy a Calvin Klein suit and cool shoes every now and then.

Looks are also partly contextual, relative and a matter of degree. The short blonde athletic guy in the Netherlands who do not do so well with the local women may be akin to a star in Japan or Colombia. Also within countries there is a lot of variance since the tastes differ.

As for game there is a strong feedback relationship between the inward and outward. With some muscles, low body fat, cool outfits, and even unnatural hair colors, a person can look much better than he would if he did not do all these things in order to maximize his potential. That in turn makes him objectively better-looking in the eyes of most beholders, and he will think that he himself deserves better quality and perhaps also higher quantity of women.

Regardless of which factor that is the most important, how one feels inside or how others look at you, I cannot recall any time that I have slept with anything better than a six or seven when my body percentage has been too high (bulky rather than fat). While looks are not enough as an isolated factor it sure helps to get direct and free access to attractive girls.

2. Confidence

As for the internal and external feedback loops, looks often overlap confidence. The better a person looks, the better the confidence, although that is a half-truth since many decent looking guys have only moderate confidence or in some cases less than that. As with appearance there are seldom any absolutes in this respect but is a question of degree: one is more or less confident. Confidence is perhaps also the factor that more frequently switches on and off and thus is less stable than many other factors. Like VO2 max it has to be almost constantly maintained.

However, it really does matter, for the very simple reason that a guy seldom will be chased down by girls, even if he looks good. He might get more IOIs (Indicators of Interest) than an average-looking person but that is still insufficient. Confidence does also have a strong comparative advantage and therefore to be irrationally self-confident might be a very decisive factor.

Loading...

Nevertheless, most lays – as well as kisses, phone numbers and dates – stem from confidence. Sometimes it is only a small degree that makes the difference, such as to make a cold approach, call someone after the first encounter (less common these days), or kiss a girl in an appropriate moment, but still one cannot be without it.

3. Determination

The third main factor that I put forward is determination. How many times have you not avoided to approach a girl in a bar, club or in public as a consequence of lack of determination? Surely, this phenomenon overlaps confidence, but it is not enough to explain neither success nor failure in this regard. For example, one can do a lot of things that one is not completely confident to do. When I tried skydiving in Australia I did not feel confident at all but still I did it, because I was determined to do so.

The same is the case with girls. One can feel more or less confident inside, and get more or less external validation from others, but one must still be determined to make an effort, whether small or big. Sometimes it happens almost spontaneously but numerous times one must almost force oneself to make something uncomfortable, such as several cold approaches. But it can often transcend these types of interactions and simply mean to live through hours of bullshit.

For example, I have an ambivert personality and can easily slip into writing, reading, working and exercising and only do some online game before I feel compelled to get back on the wet track after consecutive months of drought. Then I will be much more willing to use for instance Machiavellian cunning in order to be on the score board once again, such as to pretend to be a left-liberal just to pseudo-connect with a Swedish slut that I have little in common with. Always when I feel that I have to perform I am willing to use more of this.

For example, I often imply that I intend to stay longer than a few weeks when I am in Asia so that the girls will not activate their anti-slut defense shields, which will prevent me from increasing my notch count. My current girlfriend is the result of determination, combined with looks and confidence (and other factors).

Furthermore, a lot of the self-improvement efforts are linked to determination. It can be to train six times a week, eat strict, take the best possible photos that you will use online, and buy those clothes and shoes that might make the difference in a highly competitive sexual market. Or be more sociable than you sometimes feel like at a particular moment. It is even more important than the Dark Triad, although it might be the case that your personality profile partly underlies your behavior, including determination. Subclinical narcissism is linked to mental toughness.

The underlying factor in all of these different cases is always determination. Sometimes you are not willing to make much of an effort to get girls, for whatever reason. Perhaps you are already on a roll and do not care for another one, or are not on a roll and have lost track of the efforts that underlie relative game success. Sometimes you lack motivation. Nevertheless, determination is crucial.

Conclusion

As I stated in the introduction, there are a variety of factors involved. At best one can disentangle main factors but even those are seldom more than general predicators for a large share of individuals, not all. Still I think that these three are the most important such, and I myself and my two decades of interactions with the (un)fairer sex – combined with manifold observations of other males – is a proof of that.

Read More: How Achieving A "Pop Star Look" Can Drastically Improve Your Success Rate With Women

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

How The Decentralization of Power Structures Is Destroying The Globalist Elite

August 15, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

In my previous article, I wrote about how Bitcoin is destroying the global banking cartel. It's a decentralized, peer to peer method of transaction that can be done anywhere in the world. In other words, it can't be traced, it can't be hacked, and it can't be printed. While Bitcoin and other cryptocurrencies have been loosening the stranglehold that bankers and payment processors have on the financial markets, something else has begun to happen.

Over the past year, as conservatives have begun to wake up and realize the perils of having gigantic leftist conglomerates, we've started to see an interesting phenomena. Rather than power becoming more centralized, which is typical of technological evolution, power is actually becoming more decentralized. In layman's terms, the power is slowly going back to the people.

From 5,000 BC to Now

For millenia, governments and the powers that be have been trying to control information. It's not hard to see why, either—when you control the information, you control the people. Unfortunately for (((them))), however, the outlets for media distribution have slowly been expanding to allow anyone with basic technology to voice their opinion.

Take, for example, the following sequence of media evolution:

- 5,000 BC to 1440 AD – Scribes and clergymen controlled 100% of non-verbal information. Only the highest echelons of society had access to information. Nobody else could even read.
- 1440 to 1850 – The hand-operated printing press created massive intellectual outgrowth as the cost of books was driven down. Still, however, the top .001% created the information.
- 1850 to 1920 – The emergence of the machine operated printing press allowed for numerous newspapers to begin reporting local and national news. At this point, the top .01% created what was printed.
- 1920 to 1960 – Radio became popular, which signified a massive shift from written word to spoken word. Although still heavily centralized, radio allowed ideas to spread far more rapidly than before. At this point, roughly the top .1% created the information.
- 1960 to 1990 – As television grew, thousands of men eager to share their opinions and ideas followed suit. At this point, the top 1% ccreated the information.
- 1990 to 2010 – With the digital age revolutionizing the spread of information, we began to see a surge in early alternative news sources.
- 2011 to 2017 – As platforms such as Twitter, Facebook, YouTube, and WordPress have grown, literally anybody with a blog and a camera can reach millions. The elites have begun to feel this shift, and have begun to push back hard. At this point, the top 25% create information.

While we've certainly made massive leaps and bounds in who creates the information, the power structures which distribute the information are still relatively centralized. Even though anybody with access to a computer can create information, the top .00001% of society still has a say in whether or not it's seen and allowed.

Companies such as YouTube, Google, Facebook, and Twitter have repeatedly shown us that they have no issue with censoring conservative and nationalist viewpoints. Although they don't realize it yet, the global elite are creating their own demise: the decentralization of the very power structures which allow them to control us.

The Death of YouTube

In the wake of the recent censorship protocol YouTube has put into place, conservatives have been looking for alternative platforms to spread ideas. For years, one single website had a monopoly on 95% of online video streaming services, but that monopoly is now starting to disintegrate.

After YouTube began demonetizing pro-Trump YouTubers in 2016, many conservatives began to panic, fearing that an Orwellian future was not far away. When YouTube crossed the line by putting conservative videos into "limbo," however, a new video sharing platform emerged—and it can't be controlled by a handful of globalist executives. It's entirely decentralized.

Meet LBRY, a free, open, and community run digital database filled with endless hours of video. Although it's only in its beta version, the decentralized library (no pun intended) has gained massive support all across the globe. LBRY works by utilizing block chain technology, where random volunteers around the globe can volunteer to store data. This effectively decentralizes the video sharing network, putting it into the hands of literally tens of thousands of users, just like you and me, and because of this, it's immune from censorship.

Blockchain Technology

I predict that new digital technology known as blockchain will be a the forefront of this decentralization process. Although I'm not tech-savvy enough to fully understand it, I have a basic grasp of the concept, and from what I understand it's completely revolutionary, something that will be even more world-changing than the printing press or the locomotive engine.

Let's use Wikipedia for a quick definition of what the blockchain is:

> A blockchain[1][2][3] – originally block chain[4][5] – is a continuously growing list of records, called blocks, which are linked and secured using cryptography[1].[6] Each block contains typically a hash pointer as a link to a previous block,[6] a timestamp and transaction data.[7]

> By design, blockchains are inherently resistant to modification of the data. Functionally, a blockchain can serve as "an open, distributed ledger that can record transactions between two parties efficiently and in a verifiable and permanent way."[8]

> For use as a distributed ledger a blockchain is typically managed by a peer-to-peer network collectively adhering to a protocol for validating new blocks. Once recorded, the data in any given block cannot be altered retroactively without the alteration of all subsequent blocks and a collusion of the network majority.

In layman's terms, blockchain decentralizes records, and can be applied to practically anything that's digital. The world doesn't realize it yet, but historians will look back on this technology as the final nail in the global aristocracy's coffin—Soros and his Bilderberg pals are too isolated in their own bubbles to realize this.

Using blockchain technology, we can effectively circumvent the “centralized power” problem by creating a free, open, and community supported network of ANYTHING—from money to videos and data to medical records to business deals. The practical applications are absolutely incredible.

There’s A Pattern Here

“Hold on, Jon—you’ve only referenced a few points. Are you cherry picking your data?” This is a question that many readers may be wondering, and while it may seem like I’m selectively choosing my data points, if you look closely you’ll start to notice a very intriguing pattern.

As I laid in the previous section, for the past 7,000 years, the means of creation and distribution have slowly become more and more decentralized. Now, it’s only a matter of time before this quantum leap in civilization bleeds into every other aspect of our lives.

We’ve seen it with Bitcoin, Ethereum, and other digital currencies. I’ve personally made ridiculous gains from investing in the cryptocurrencies such as Bitcoin and Ethereum (among others), and know men that have seen returns as high as 22,000% in less than a year.

We’ve seen this pattern with information, as well. With radical new applications such as Filecoin, information can be crowdsourced so that no single entity can control it. With coins such as Golem, even data processing can be crowdsourced, so that we no longer have to rely on a monopoly of distribution.

How You Can Benefit

As this decentralization process continues to advance, we will all benefit—as the powers that be begin to lose their chokehold on Western Civilization, an era of prosperity and cultural revival will emerge.

Some will benefit more than others, however; especially those who can see the changing tides and act accordingly. If I were you, I'd take a few steps to ensure that you can not only profit financially from the upcoming changes, but in other ways as well.

- Safeguard yourself – As society undergoes these transformations, there will no doubt be retaliation. The elite does not want to lose their power and will do anything they can to stop this from happening. So prepare yourself: buy guns, buy food, get in good shape, and learn some basic survival skills.
- Invest in cryptocurrency – I previously laid out my plan to make $1,000,000 in this article here. I recommend you follow its advice to the T.
- Become a creator – With the decentralization of power, anybody can create new content. Just a decade ago, the ideas discussed on ROK wouldn't stand a chance of reaching the public. Now, however, we've got a reader base in the tens of thousands. Start a blog, create a YouTube channel, sell an eBook, just do something to set yourself up for the future.

Millions of men have already begun to feel the shift—it's only a matter of time before the powers that be start to crumble, and humanity can finally be free. Although many may call my visions for the future idealistic or even naive, I would challenge them to look at the good in people. It seems that no matter how hard they try, no matter how much they control, and no matter how many people they silence, the elite cannot resist the human spirit.

If you want to support Jon's work and get more SHREDDED than you ever thought possible, check out his Body of an Alpha fitness guide—on sale for ROK readers only.

Read Next: How Cryptocurrency Is Destroying The Jewish Globalist Banking Cartel

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

Conor McGregor Is The Ultimate Alpha Male And The Smartest Athlete Alive

August 16, 2017 | by Maximus King | Link | Original Link

Conor McGregor is the UFC lightweight champion. He is the highest paid fighter in UFC history (which isn't saying much as far as professional sports go, especially fighting sports).

Mike Tyson, in the 1980s, for example, was earning around $30 million per fight. Although the UFC is secretive about its payroll, it's reported that Conor earned somewhere in the neighborhood of $5 to 10 million dollars for his last few fights. Most UFC fighters earn under $100,000 per fight, and the champions typically earn in the low millions or less. The fighters' low pay is a constant topic of strife between them and management.

His Rise To Fame

Conor's first fight in the UFC was in 2013 at the age of 25. He quickly earned a reputation of making short work of his opponents and also giving great fights, something the UFC has a history of rewarding with bigger and better fights.

In 2015, at the age of 27, Conor got his first title fight, which lasted 13 seconds, the fastest in UFC title fight history. He had become a champion in two years. Soon after, he got a chance to fight for a second belt at a different weight class, a fight he handily won in the second round with a knockout. Conor had become the first fighter in UFC history to simultaneously hold two belts in two weight classes.

Now, at 29, Conor is set to fight one of the greatest boxers in history: Floyd "Money" Mayweather. Conor will be making a rumored $100 million for this fight, which almost every expert has concluded he will lose and that this is a prop fight just for the money. The promotional tour has been laughably entertaining and, win or lose, the fight will be a huge success for both fighters.

The Ultimate Alpha Champion

What makes Conor the ultimate alpha male? There are many factors that make him the ultimate alpha, and we can all learn from him and maybe adopt some of his qualities. Keep in mind that he is only 29 years old and has had these qualities for years.

He has style

Conor wears fitted shirts, fitted suits, a trimmed beard, and has well-cut and groomed hair. He's always presentable, whether it's for a public event or just going about town. When asked about it, he said, "I like to look good, my friend."

He’s outrageously confident

Alphas are confident. They should be. They look good. They’re fit. They have game. An alpha like Conor has an additional quality: he can get inside your head and start winning the fight verbally. His fight starts way before the actual fight. That’s how he gets his fights, and that’s how he wins his fights. A strong alpha should be able to hold his own verbally without losing his cool.

Conor was able to get two championship fights at two different weight classes. He did this not only by being a great fighter and giving great fights, but also by calling out the fighters he wanted to fight in such a way that they felt they had to fight him (see video below). After winning both belts he started calling out Mayweather.

Why would an MMA guy call out a boxer? Conor would have to box, which means no kicking or grappling. He would be at a terrible disadvantage against the world’s best living boxer, right? The obvious answer is for the money. The UFC, even for Conor, pays less than $10 million and a Mayweather fight could get him $100 million, right? Not so fast. Mayweather had no interest in fighting an MMA guy.

But Conor didn’t stop. The shit talking didn’t let up. MMA fans got interested. The UFC got interested. Mayweather got interested. Connor was told he couldn’t go off and box because he was an MMA fighter. He said, “If they (the UFC) let people go fight jiu-jitsu tournaments, they can’t stop me going to fight a boxing fight.” Hard to argue that logic. UFC fighters go off and compete in all kinds of other tournaments, both for free and for money.

Mayweather told Conor that if Conor made $5 million a fight (probably close to the truth), Mayweather would pay him $10 million. Conor said, “I’m not taking a pay cut to fight you.

I want $100 million, not a penny less."

Here's what Conor said about his own shit talking: "You beat him verbally. You beat him mentally, and then finally, you beat him physically. That's the three ways to beat a man."

Some other Alpha qualities that Conor owns

1. Alphas are Persistent

Conor is not a quitter. He fought good fights and won them until he could start calling out the champ, and then he got the title fight and won. Then he did it again at a different weight class. Then he called out the greatest living boxer until he got that fight, too.

2. Alphas are Entertaining

There is no one in MMA, or, arguably, any other sport, more entertaining than Conor.

3. Alphas are Humble

Conor is far from humble before a fight, but when he lost to Diaz, he had this to say: "I'm humble in victory and in defeat. I respect Nate. It is what it is. I'll face it like a man." A true champion.

4. Alphas Are Courageous

It takes incredible courage to fight for a living. Anyone who has fought competitively knows this. But Conor has a special type of courage. He calls out champions and wins. Twice. Then he calls out the world's best boxer, a sport in which he's at a tremendous disadvantage. For the money? Maybe, but he has a reputation, too, and if he gets wiped out, he will look silly. Like he says in his commercial, "If your dreams don't scare you, they're not big enough."

Conor Is The Smartest Athlete Alive

On August 26, 2017, Conor McGregor will transform himself from a modestly paid (by professional athlete standards) to one of the highest paid athletes in the world. All because he was able to talk himself into a fight with the greatest fighter alive and able to get his fans and then Mayweather's fans excited about the possibility of a great fight between them. He was able to go from a first time UFC fighter to a $100 million dollar boxer in just four years. No one has ever done this in the history of the UFC, where the fighters line up to fight for $50,000, if that.

He will go from making $5 to $10 million per fight to possibly $100 million dollars (over $46,000 per second for a 12-round fight). Because he has the swagger, style, and hubris to pull it off. He's a heavy underdog, but don't count him completely out. Mayweather is famous for fighting to win scorecards, so we can expect him to fight for a 12 round decision. Conor fights to win fights, is only 29 years old (Mayweather is 40), and hits hard. There's a chance, albeit small, that Conor wins this thing and gets to entertain Mayweather trying to get a rematch. That would put Conor on the receiving end of a $200 million dollar payday.

We could all borrow a little from Conor to make our lives better.

Read More: The Difference Between The Nice Guy, The Asshole, And The Alpha Male Learn To Be An Alpha From Athletes

Maximus King

Maximus King is a happily married serial monogamist who believes that feminism, affirmative action, and social censorship are hurting America. He has no social media or Website or anything to sell. If you want to reach him, he might get back to you from

Swedish Museum Accelerates Their Cultural Collapse By Turning Viking Artifacts Into Scrap Metal

August 16, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Following the revelations of one of its angry archaeologists, it emerges that the curators of Stockholms Länsmuseum have been ordering the systematic destruction of newly found artifacts from the Iron Age and the Viking period under the guise that it would be too burdensome to process.

Coins, arrow heads, ritual amulets, weapons, jewellery and weights that were kept in the past are now directly dumped into metal recycling bins upon discovery instead of being treasured and displayed.

The museum's version

Following a recent surge in excavations aimed at construction that are occurring all over Sweden, the museum excavators are instructed to recycle unearthed iron elements into scrap metal following the pretext that "it would take too much resources to process, identify and store them." The findings are usually quickly disposed of in order to make way for construction machines and building workers.

This was kept secret until this week's declarations by Johan Runer, archaeologist at the said museum. He tried to raise the alarm before but only met indifference from the Liberal Swedish Media. According to Runer, this has been going on since at least 2016 as he recalls the example of an entire human settlement from the Bronze and Iron Age that discretely got levelled to allow road works for Sweden's E6 motorway to progress. We do not know so far if this practice only incriminates this museum or is part of a greater scale.

How I picture the LänsMuseum's board

Runer explains that the archaeologists cannot themselves auction the findings to the private sector as it would encourage crooks and robbers to then resell the treasure.

The mask slips and reveals the true motive

The money argument for a national museum implanted in one of the most prosperous countries on Earth (for now, before the "New Swedes" do what they do best) does not make sense. There is no shortage of funds in Sweden to host more refugees and promote multiculturalism in every media, but the money seems to vanish when it's time to preserve European common heritage.

The tragic aspect of this situation is that those construction works that unearth the artifacts destined to be destroyed are probably the new buildings needed to house the freshly arrived migrants that the Swedish government is so eager to welcome. Talk about full circle.

Treasures thrown away when the answer is the people

Archaeological artifacts made of iron are altered by time and roughened by the terrain. No one can really judge of their quality and uniqueness until they are being processed and restored. In this particular case, no chance is taken and anything made of metal that is not well conserved is ditched.

It was even kept relatively secret until one researcher who could not take it anymore had to tell the world. Why do they not invite other museums around the world to collect and protect their artifacts in their name if money is an issue? I know at least ten museums around me that would stop everything they are doing right now to plan a trip and bring back the artifacts to add them to their collection.

Why don’t they store them in labelled wooden boxes as it was done for hundred of years? If not, let them ask for voluntary work to take care of the findings or let it be given to the native people that are interested in this culture. Even if used as door stops or cutlery, they’ll take better care of it than any Swedish liberal government.

The gods are angry

This news made my blood boil. I am an enthusiast of the Viking Age, being an eager student of its history, folklore and traditions as our readers have noticed in the past. But regardless of my attachment to this particular culture, it is the gross disrespect and complete lack of regard for an entire country's History that makes me furious. And knowing the hardly-hidden motives behind it makes it worse.

Terminally ill patients suffering from the Liberal Cancer like Alice Bah Kuhnke ("New Suede" and Sweden's Minister of Culture) are the ones that now approve those decisions and define what should compose Swedish History and choose what will be Sweden's future.

Alice Bah Kuhnke

The same people that consider that the ideal treatment for returning ISIS fighters to Sweden should be more love and integration.

Today, Sweden. Tomorrow, us?

The leftoid cyborgs will be quick to declare “A few arrow heads and trinkets? So what? The Whites did the same yadi yada”.

This is where they are dead wrong. If we do not expose them and fight this lunacy, how will it stop? This story is just one more proof of the Left’s effort to shape the future of the their ugly world using the technique of the scorched earth.

It also follows recent claims from Leftists that ancient marble statues made thousands of years ago are actually racist and were specifically used to “whitewash history”. Other examples where History is targeted include the Left using violence and threats in order to get Southern generals statues removed from various locations in the United states.

Lately, the BBC used an incompetent feminist professor’s views to create an “educational cartoon” where, among other things, Roman centurions in Britain are black. This is one episode of a series where some Picts and Norman Barons are also black.

Caius Septimus WeWuzKangus is a historical reality according to the BBC Teach channel.

There is not much difference between those Liberal iconoclasts and the soldiers of the Islamic state's goons smashing millennia-old statues and monuments with sledgehammers. In both cases, those who destroy claim that the targets are false idols. The first against a multiculturalist future and the latter against Allah.

Un peuple sans Histoire ne sait pas pourquoi il se bat

From Saul Alinsky's "How to create a Socialist State".

Such practices are revolting to say the least. A prime example of how Cultural Marxism aims at erasing the past to get rid of the last roots that our children can call theirs. Just like violent communist regimes in the past aimed first at burning libraries, bringing down churches, graveyards and museums before shooting teachers and scholars in the back of the head.

As our readers already now, the knowledge of history is a core concept in masculinity. Without respecting the ancient traditions of men, a stable and healthy future cannot be built.

By destroying elements attached to the idea of Viking culture, which valued financial success, bravery and putting one's people first, Sweden's self-loathing decision makers try to erase the few traces that show Sweden as something else than a multiculturalism-infected petri dish.

Destroy a people's history so they cannot find a common heritage to fight for and you can start anew and create the society you seek. This shall not be.

Read more: Cultural Collapse Theory: The 7 Steps That Lead To A Complete Culture Decline

---

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Does An American Spirit Really Exist?

August 16, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Conservatives have from time to time upheld what they consider a distinctly American identity. The Founding Fathers with two capital Fs, the Constitution, an inalienable and unconditional set of "rights", and classical liberalism. All this comes in mind when one thinks about what conservatism proclaimed to be.

This stance appears in a work like Charles Murray's Coming Apart, which opposes an "American model" of industriousness, self-responsibility, and pride in excellent work to a "European model" consisting of welfare State, cravings for job security, and general opposition to work (see chapters 9 and 17). In less intellectual terms I also remember the ridiculous "freedom fries" fad, because lee-bur-ty and patriotism mean doing the Deep State's bidding based on lies, y'know?

The big alt tent, although rife with different political ideas, has constantly striven to escape from this stance. Many oppose big banks and big corporations, who destroy the possibility of a small-scale entrepreneurism and exert an unchecked power over pop culture. Some on the Alt-Right openly oppose shadowy capitalists, to the extent of proposing the nationalization of SJW-managed companies like Twitter, an idea no conservative could have had ten years ago.

Some on ROK consider that "rights" are a convenient myth, a modern invention—a position I agree with. Clearly, we have been more culturally efficient than cucks who quote Russell Kirk while worshipping Martin Luther King with years of delay. But precisely because of this, both sides of the one party in power, the strong Democrat and the weak

Republican, have accused the alt-sphere of being “un-American.”

Is being “American” an idea? A mindset? In other words, would there be an “American spirit” that both faces of the Current Year partake but that we would not—regardless of our passports?

Are your stars still so bright, does your banner still wave?

To a European, two pictures of America have coexisted. One was of historical pioneers, of endless opportunities, of cow-boys, of superheroes. The other was of the uneducated, rude, imperialist Yankees, obsessed with money but somehow clever and sassy. These apparently conflicting pictures have often fused or overlapped. Both are superficial and, to some extent, true—at least historically.

To get a deeper portrayal, I will borrow from Murray’s aforementioned work. According to his interpretation of American history, the United States have been based on the following virtues since their foundation:

1. Industriousness. Willing to work, cheerfully looking for opportunities and seizing them, generations of Americans would have been enthusiastic defenders of a classically liberal civilization:

> To them, industry signified a cluster of qualities that had motivated the Revolution in the first place—a desire not just to be free to speak one’s mind, to practice religion as one saw fit, and to be taxed only with representation, but the bone-deep American assumption that life is to be spent getting ahead through hard work. (Coming Apart, chap.6)

2. Honesty. Americans would have known that only a honest, trustworthy people could live without needing an authoritarian government. Dishonest, unvirtuous men would call for armed forces looming over everyone, whereas people who respect the law and tell the truth would be able to govern themselves with only a minimal State beyond. O, the land of the free…

3. Marriage. Echoing the Scottish philosopher David Hume, founding fathers such as James Wilson and John Adams have insisted on how the "sacred bands of marriage" were essential for society and how marital fidelity was conducive to "peace and harmony." Murray stresses the degree at which a distinctly American morality made marriage a more demanding, and consequently less scandalous, institution than in Europe.

4. Religiosity. Here Murray highlights the necessary social role of religion. From Adams to Jefferson, the founders allowed themselves to disagree on particular dogmas but all agreed that religion was essential to maintain morality and keep the passions in check. "Avarice, ambition, revenge, or gallantry, would break the strongest cords of our Constitution as a [land?] whale goes through a net", Adams wrote.

John Adams would not have been pleased

Although Murray's list of essential "American" virtues likely holds its share of truth, it also strikes me as highly idealistic, confusing the wishes of the founding fathers with historical reality. He also seems unaware of how calculative and utilitarian his portrayal sometimes sound, as if religion was only a tool that aimed at a smooth functioning of the market and at worldly success—yet perhaps that part is an accurate representation of a peculiar feature of modernity.

By all accounts, the birth of the United States owes a lot to Europeans' desire of fulfillment and free self-realization. Cautious, religious, wilfully ascetic, Puritans aimed at managing themselves with success, and they somehow did. They resented the hierarchies of Europe, both in papacy and Anglicanism. Very friendly with Jews, whom they often regarded as the "people of the Book", they nourished a narrative of emancipation. European noblemen such as La Fayette were fashionable for helping to fight against privileges, that is, against their own blood and caste identity. (These men who went against their own interest and identity were conveniently brushed off as insignificant by the reductive Marxist view of history.)

Are you heaven on Earth, or the gloom of the grave?

Murray argues that the four "American" virtues have been well practised until the 1960s, when the cultural offensive of the Left forced significant changes among the commonly admitted behaviours. Once again, this may be broadly true, but seems to ignore how much the worm was already inside the fruit at the very beginning.

The founding fathers only barely highlighted that their country was to be mostly white. Perhaps it seemed evident then—too evident to say. If one follows a particular kind of universalism, of abstract individuals endowed with inalienable "rights", one can think that anyone can be "American" provided he pretends to aim at these virtues. The Puritans were also cucked from the start by worshipping their later (((greatest ally))), and the Jerry Falwells or John Hagees strike me as contemporary Judas who couldn't have appeared elsewhere.

Impregnated with a messianic fervour of Jewish origin, 'Muricah substantiated a zeal towards other causes than capitalism and (a mostly white) entrepreneurial liberty. Roughly one century after the mythicized Revolution, the government allowed the country to show a rather peculiar face to the world: the Statue of Liberty, a colossal "Mother of Exiles", greeted the immigrants by welcoming the "poor", the "wretched", the "huddled." Miserabilism, loving the poor as such and as perpetually indebted to a great Luciferian Mother—you had it.

Later, in the 1910s, workers' masculinized wives would push for the infamous alcohol prohibition so that their tired husbands would go back groveling at them instead of unplugging and bantering with fellowmen. All this happened well before the 1960s. The worm was in the fruit.

If you strip libertarianism from religion and respect for property, you get what French Leftists called libertarisme and what normal people would call licentiousness: I have a right to do anything as long as other people consent and, of course, consent can be obtained through manipulation and social cleverness. This may seem at odds with the American ideal of liberty, but it is easy to understand than unbridled ambition easily treads on the rights of others.

A lot of what comes from the US shares at least some of the initial "American spirit" and is historically degenerate. In the name of "rights" and freedom, anyone can be anything, anyone can make him or her or xieself. A frail child, Theodore Roosevelt purportedly answered his father's physical challenge by saying "I'll make my body." The Arnold Schwarzeneggers and the Jay Cutlers followed the same philosophy. Why not the Bruce Jenner then? Can't anyone be anything xie wants, even special snowflakes in a kindergarten?

The vivacious belief in "rights" fulfills SJWs with the motivation to shriek and lynch—just as the messianic idea gave wings to the pseudo-ideal of the racial melting-pot, as if considering races as raw matter sounded like an ideal at all.

Even without considering the vanguard of hysterical degeneracy, one can perceive some unfortunate particulars that benefited greatly from the American liberty: Jews crushing the last remnants of decency through the porn market, and big capitalists shattering independent businesses. O, land of the hidden fees, home of the corporate slaves, owned by an elite of Jewrasians, micromanaged by HR anglobitches!

Not an end in itself but a springboard

Don't get me wrong. As we say in France, I'm not spitting in the soup. Some of the worst degeneracy was born in the US, but so were the manosphere, Alt-Right and other vanguard currents too. Everyone involved here shares a mindset of self-responsibility, of personal investigation, of an ability to change and adapt without renouncing to oneself. These are virtues many Americans still hold in high esteem.

The European Right*s* and nationalism*s* often struggle with petty ambitions, useless ideological bickerings, and divisive irredentisms. Americans have a much easier time thinking of themselves practically or racially instead of dividing along old-fashioned national lines, and their pragmatism makes them able to go straight to the point without getting led astray. And while I would clearly object to the "American"—quotation marks highlighted—idea that anyone can be anything, so would Murray, as he upholds an idea of vocation or personal calling that seems closer to the dharma than to transgenderism.

It should also be noted that the "national" cultural life has always been rife with conflicts. Some potentialities were ferociously suppressed in the name of a rather neoconservative view of what "America" means. Is the stable 1924-1965 immigration period less "American" than the hostile anti-whiteness and misandry of today? Do you need to consider your ancestors as stupid or inferior, in the name of progress, to be fully "American", if this means something at all? Is MK Ultra "American" because Hollywood suggests it is?

One can reconsider, autonomously of course, what it means to be "American", or wake up from the American dream while keeping the glorious, adaptive and identitarian parts left. As for myself, I would consider it a springboard to something that goes beyond petty, divisive nationalisms—including both the French-Jacobine and the stars-and-stripes varieties—and that would make our—yes, our—civilization dharmic and racially and culturally united again.

Read Next: The American Dream Is Every Man's Nightmare

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Men Need To Take Back The Reins

August 16, 2017 | by Michael Majalahti | Link | Original Link

As I grow older and hopefully wiser, I feel there is a moral duty in each and every one of us to give back, as it were, to the world around us by making a contribution. This contribution can be anything from sharing acquired knowledge to spreading monetary wealth — if such a fortunate thing might have happened to your personal finances — to giving of your time to those less fortunate than you.

If you make it only about yourself and only you, I can guarantee you that you'll be emotionally empty and find yourself unfulfilled in your spirit. This is because if no one outside of yourself affirms that you have internal quality to draw from, your internal mirror will not reflect any true, tangible value back to you about who you are.

Have you learned the bigger, manly lesson behind Clint Eastwood's Gran Torino movie?

I recall a case study many years back about who were the happiest people on the planet. As funny as it may seem to some, the results showed that those immersed in goodwill work, where the recipient had no way of paying them back in any way, were the happiest of most contented of all. This finding coincides with what science has come to show as the reward center of the brain; the part that releases not just endorphins but also dopamine. The trigger cannot be pulled with just any random act of our choosing; it requires specific stimuli.

Now, there will certainly be those amongst the readership here that will balk at what I am about to say, and to them I retort, in advance: move on. But, if you have ears to hear, and if you can value another person's life experience who have reached his mid-forties, then read on and take stock of what I am about to share. Because what I have to say here is meant for the betterment of world around me, and specifically, my words are geared to the young men and men in general out there.

Now some might ask, am I so brazen as to assume that I have any right to believe that my understanding of "right living" is palpable and applicable across the board? Fuck, yes. Any man, or person for that matter, who tries to walk in accordance with what they feel and believe to be true, and doesn't believe that they have the stock to instruct others ain't worth shit. Your belief system must be rock solid, and you yourself must be convinced, through trial and error, that you are on the right path. You must have conviction, and you must make a solid attempt to walk in accordance with your beliefs.

I've been a wrestling coach and personal trainer now for the better part of nearly 14 years, teaching folks from all walks of life in about a dozen countries, plying these trades, and a lot of what I do has to do with psychology. I've learned and seen. I've become a mentor to many of those whom I've trained, and some of the life lessons I've dispersed outside of the physical aspect of my coaching have been received with open ears and minds. Some have even come back to thank me, years later, for the guidance given and lessons learned. So yes, I do believe I can help many around me. Not all, but many.

Having been fortunate enough to travel the world many times over in my global excursions as both a professional wrestler and rock musician, I have seen many cultures and shared my time with peoples of many nationalities from many walks of life. My life experience, therefore, is quite broad here in my mid-forties. Add to that the life teachings of a morally strong father who is a preacher, and voilà, you have a pretty solid ethical foundation upon which this man's personal house has been built. The lessons learned early on in life are certainly not lost in transition, as the years roll on.

The Upright Agenda

Gladiator: another movie that teaches the viewer what true manliness embodies.

For years and years now, I've looked around and digressed at the movements and undercurrents of modern society, and the not-so-slow erosion of the moral fabric and backbone of our Western society. A lot of this has to do with our excessive desire for hedonistic pleasure, much like the times of Ancient Rome, just before it's empirical collapse. People today are more interested and immersed in frivolous, vain pleasures than at any time in recent world history. A lot of this has to do with the advent of technology, and the easy distractions that it provides its captives.

Never before has it been so easy to become entrapped in an alternate reality, one which is lived only inside of one's own head. Through the advent of the internet and the explosion of social media, people are snared into a false world of virtual existence that only feeds their growing inner emptiness. Less face-to-face encounters, more cluttered brain activity and mental overload by cheap, meaningless thrills brought on by "likes" and "followers," in addition to useless entertainment and bullshit "news" that are forgotten by the end of the week, at the very latest. People's heads are cluttered full, but their spirits are vexed and their souls are empty.

In this conundrum, folks today are increasingly mind-fucked. There's no nice way of putting it. And for the record, I refuse to be politically correct to appease the people out there who feel offended at the slightest thing that inconveniences them. That's another area, where we, as a culture, have strayed far off track: we try to use "convenient language" that wouldn't rock anyone's boat or stir any backlash.

We've become gutless and spineless in the day of political correctness, afraid of what those around us might say to dissuade our beliefs or stance. To them I say: if the shoe fits, wear it. If you feel offended, you have reason to be offended. Point blank. Check your own beliefs and values and see why anything that rubbed you the wrong way was so potent an aggravator in your case. And if your beliefs or attitudes have been challenged, then you have a personal obligation to do some inventory and housecleaning, because no one can survive inner civil war within themselves and come out whole.

The problems today goes way beyond the prior generation finding fault in the younger generation. This is not a case of grumpy older men picking apart strapping young lads for the sake of ego or "not just getting it." Trust me when I tell you, your fathers (and mothers) went through all the shit you've gone through internally, because although technology advances, people inherently stay the same. Our internal makeup as individuals has remained the same for thousands of years, despite the hogwash social engineering that evolutionary dogma tries to push on us.

This is proven by the fact that even old, antique texts still resonate with people today. The teachings of, per se, Socrates, are still as relevant today as they were in 470-399 B.C., as wisdom is universal. Therefore, there is no such thing as ”not getting it”, when it comes to the older generation (read: accumulated life experience) picking apart the fallacies of the younger generation (read: the indoctrinated). Only a fool would discount, no-sell and bypass the information, advice or teachings of those that are far ahead of them in the game of life.

The Invaluable And Central Lesson To Be Learned

Men are meant to lead the charge, as they have through history, building empires and constructing great cultures, so only direct, strong talk should be expected by anyone that holds themselves to actually be a man. Surely, Napoleon was not a pandering twit, who placated to those he addressed, in order not to ruffle any feathers. Nay. Leadership is something else altogether, and men, since the beginning of time, have been called to lead. Regardless of your spiritual beliefs, think of the lessons told in the first chapters of Genesis, where Adam and Eve fell into sin and God allotted the wages of punishment for their disobedience.

Then He (God) said to the woman, “I will sharpen the pain of your pregnancy, and in pain you will give birth. And you will desire to control your husband, but he will rule over you.”

“And to the man he said, ‘Since you listened to your wife and ate from the tree whose fruit I commanded you not to eat, the ground is cursed because of you. All your life you will struggle to scratch a living from it.'” (Genesis 3:16-17)

Now anyone with an iota of understanding and a rational, clear mind can think of these passages for just a moment and see some mighty weighty truth behind them. They depict exactly how things have turned out. This is also where I come to my intended man-to-man talk with the males of species out there, and it concerns men's relationship to women, by and large.

For whatever reason, nowadays, men have, to a great extent, become emasculated. Their balls have been shorn and their authority is not just questioned and balked at, it is damn near dismissed. Many guys today don't even know what it is to have authority or to walk with their heads and chests up high, taking on the role as the alpha of the species. Modern society sure doesn't want it. And this is a damn tragedy.

Be it the onslaught of first, second, and now third-wave feminism, each more ugly and belligerent than the last, or the social engineering of unisex dogma, teaching boys and men to be passive, dress in pink and get in touch with their feminine side, the results of this ambiguous infusion have been dire. Men today are lost, out of touch with themselves, slaves to their gadgets and increasingly beta, therefore easily controlled by outside influences and others. Men, in short, have sold themselves down the river… but for what?

Here's my question to you: what have men gained by giving up their position of authority and selling out their masculine fortitude, much like Adam shifting the blame of him eating the apple to Eve, who extended the forbidden fruit to her husband? How has it benefited men, that they've become passive and accepting, which are feminine, motherly, nurturing traits to begin with?

Looking at the statistics of gamers locked in their basements, young men dropping out of the educational system, male suicide rates, the onslaught of depression meds and the mass explosion of internet porn, it's damn clear that men are not well at all.

Where your grandfather was out at the dances like a killer wolf looking to land your grandma in the hopes of getting fruitful with her, guys today are settling for a POV with Asa Akira, imagining it's them, getting the royal treatment, in lieu of learning the age-old mating and courting game that countless generations of men have implemented with women for as long as people have been around. I don't know about you, but it all sounds and seems pretty pathetic to me. Would you rather live it, or just dream it?

The age-old dance of the predator and prey, an essential dynamic to intergender relationships.

The Great Error Of Men At Large

It’s here, in the area of sex and male-female relations, where men have gone so badly astray, by and in large. It’s this hemisphere of the human experience, where, for some God-forsaken reason, men have sold their manliness and masculine forté down the river, in hopes of placating women and appeasing their every desire.

Now remember the lesson from Genesis 3:16 where God says that as a result of the first human couples’ disobedience, the woman would seek to control the man, but the man would still rule over her. It’s an inherently rotten deck of cards that we’re dealt at birth. Women will always try to control men, as it is part of their fallen nature. You’re going to get both sides of the coin when you get involved with a woman, every single time, and it’s up to you, as the man, how you learn to navigate through the woman’s inherent desire to control you.

Of course, you can always hope that she gets spiritually enlightened to the fact and smartens herself up, taking the red pill that is good for her. Yet, the man’s original place and position was one of leadership, for he was created first and God gave expressly the man the commandment not to eat from the Tree of Knowledge in the Garden of Eden (Genesis 2:15-18).

Tending to your woman’s needs is quite reasonable and proper, but bowing to their every want is a neverending train of unhappiness, exhaustion and vanity (in short: hedonism). You are simply not responsible for fulfilling the wants of other people. Wants are cherries on top of the cake, their little bonuses, and should be seen as and enjoyed as such.

Happy wife, happy life. Ever hear of that one? Where did this garbage adage come from? Let's flip it around: happy husband, happy life. Doesn't rhyme, does it? Maybe that's why no one ever thinks about the flipside of the coin or even questions the reverse. But it stands to be questioned: why are we, as men, trying so hard to please and appease women? What the hell are we gaining in all of this pandering, soft agreeability? What has led us to believe that women should somehow be gifted with the finest of all experiences, pleasures and treasures, and we, as men, are dictated to provide them with such simply because they have two X chromosomes?

One of the saddest cases of feministic hogwash in cinema, What Women Want, featuring Mel Gibson reaching an all-time low, showcasing how pathetic being beta really is.

Over the past few decades, the role of men has considerably changed from what it had been for thousands upon thousands of years. A large part of that has to do with men bending over backwards for women now, which is something that didn't happen to this absurd extent in the past. It's like men have become fearful of the reactions and opinions of women, and in order to stay the course and keep the females (I don't say ladies, because that is a term which should be used sparingly, if the etiquette lends to it) happy, men have sold their cojones down the river.

What it all boils down to is selling out to the illusional "power of pussy", which really, is nothing more than men selling out for a piece of the pie that they desire here and now. Put a rain check on that thing and let your hunger build! Hunger makes you sharp.

So men have given women not just what they've wanted, but more. They've abandoned alpha male traits and become betas in an attempt to keep their women happy. Yet, the divorce statistics are off the charts and marriage is seen largely as a joke now. Don't believe me? Just think of nearly every sitcom out there. The single mother/single parent households are racking up beyond measure.

There’s a distinct (albeit erroneous) glorification of individuality and the freedom of being single. But hey, keep on drinking to forget your misery, popping those psyche meds and depression pills, and remember that social media will be there to spike your dopamine, regardless of the law of diminishing returns!

There’s no mentorship anymore on a societal level. Well, not unless you pay through the nose for it by taking a course specifically engineered for that very purpose. Back in the day, however, the elders of whatever tribe or culture passed those essential life lessons on to the younger stock of pups as part of the daily grind. Fathers taught their sons the essentials of masculine skills and values, where mothers passed on to their daughters the virtues and know-how of being a good wife and mother in turn. This has all been done away with now, and we, as a culture, are reaping it’s bitter fruits, thorns and thistles.

Time For Resolution

It is men at large that I rally to “man the fuck up” in today’s ever-convoluted, muddied waters of confusion and displacement. It’s time to take back the reins, to step into a place of personal responsibility where you own your shit, where you implement hard resolve in leading the charge.

Your inner person and self-worth will thank you for it. Your ego will find a healthy, strong embodiment, in lieu of boastful, empty egotism. Your close community will sense the change, and the chips will start to fall into place, from your personal relations right down to your business dealings.

Oh, there will be plenty of backlash and mockery. The world at large will not understand, for the public consciousness and conscience is sedated. Expect to be shit upon and gear up in full battle armor. Just stand strong, like building your body up at the gym, and before long the empty clutter and non-beneficial opinions of others won't even trifle you.

Become a man of your word. Stand like a rock. Act like a man, like the heroes of lore and history have stood before you, because they are your role models and predecessors. Stop pandering and placating to women, trying to appease them and their every whim, in the sorry hopes of landing a little piece of pussy. Don't sell your manliness down the river.

Know your stock, have some respect for yourself. Have some rock-solid standards. Aim higher. Go for a unicorn, rare as they may be. Be a hunter. An adventurer. Step up to the challenge and make your life interesting. Be the hero of your own life story. There's a lot of false advertising out there. Don't fall for the hype and mirage. Don't believe the bullshit. Test the waters, try the ice before stepping out onto it. Make better choices. Own your shit. Find a cause worth fighting for, because every man needs a worthwhile battle to discover his own power. Take responsibility. Take charge. Be a leader. Become an alpha.

The Payoff

So, what's the upside to all of this? Feeling like you are empowered. Feeling like you might even understand a small iota of what Winston Churchill preached when he spoke to his peoples in 1940 at the time of The Battle of France, in the face of the Nazi threat.

Another upside? Gaining the respect of women, and more specifically, the woman in your life. Pussy follows in quick order. It's the natural order of things, as it creates the needed polarity for intergender relationships.

Another upside? Personal clarity. You will be able to cut through the riff-raff much easier than ever before in the past. You will be able to see things for what they are, not for what you have been told they be.

Life is short. Don’t waste any more of it. Your golden youth is only for a moment, but consequences can carry over a lifetime.

Read more: Taking The Red Pill Is One Of The Hardest Things A Man Can Do

Michael Majalahti

Michael is arguably the most acclaimed and accomplished pro wrestler in history out of Northern Europe, as well as the pro wrestling pioneer of Finland, where he has lived since 1996 after moving from his homeland of Canada. Michael is known as an outspoken figure that bucks the system and swims against the tide. Known in pro wrestling circles as "The Rebel" StarBuck, Michael has been a champion the world over, in addition to being a rock vocalist in three bands, a personal trainer, a voice-over pro, a business owner, an actor, an artist and a husband. More:

What The Smartest Women In The World Teach Us About Sex Roles

August 17, 2017 | by Eusebius Erasmus | Link | Original Link

I endorse Roosh's polemic against educating women beyond high school. Ask yourself a simple question next time you see a university girl: would her time be better spent studying and preparing for a job, or should she spend it as a mother and homemaker, hence allowing a suitable man to take her place at work? In 99% of cases, the answer is the latter; a girl fulfills her comparative advantage at home.

However, there is still that 1% hovering in the air as an open question. There are certain careers, of course, like teacher and nurse, that women naturally flood into, though one hardly needs a university degree to teach 10-year-olds or care for patients. It is, nonetheless, instructive to focus on the One Percenter woman: that rare bird who attains masculine heights of greatness, but only at great cost.

To make my case, I focus on four brilliant women: Ann Coulter, Camille Paglia, Phyllis Schafly, and Marie Curie. I choose these women on purpose, for they are truly exceptional. An attentive reader might ponder why I do not consider the cases of Sheryl Sandberg or Marissa Mayer; the answer is obvious. A competent man can easily replace these women. Yet the four I have chosen are exceptional.

Ann Coulter: Conservative Troll

ROK readers are reminded to be wary of so-called dissident right women – cute girls like Lauren Southern and Brittany Pettibone are useful in drawing attention to our cause, but they ultimately desire gaining attention for themselves, like many girls their age. Their brains are vessels that are only filled through the intellectual hard labour of men; you need only watch Southern's YouTube channel to realize she repeats ideas of other men. Yet Ann Coulter transcends these vacuous women, bringing gusto, flair, and wit to the conservative movement.

Coulter is undoubtedly smart and well-read, easily out-debating liberal reprobates. She is also slim and attractive – women in their fifties should take a cue from her. Her take-down of The Young Turks's Ana Kasparian, for instance, is a pleasure to watch. She exceeds most men's mental and verbal abilities.

Yet Coulter is unmarried, having dated high-status men like Bob Guccione, Jr., Dinesh D'Souza, and Andrew Stein. She has no children. Women are drawn to men who are superior to themselves – for Coulter, that significantly dries the dating pool. I can only imagine that she lives a lonely life.

Camille Paglia: Lesbian Provocateur

A professor and self-identified feminist, Paglia is held in revulsion by the feminist establishment, for positing that the sexes are inherently different, and that men, not women, have built civilization and art. Her intellectual rigour is outstanding, and the depths of her arguments are sublime. Her 1991 article on date rape, for instance, makes many of Roosh's same points, excoriating women for demanding sexual freedom, while refusing to take responsibility for it:

> The only solution to date rape is female self-awareness and self-control. A woman's No. 1 line of defense against rape is herself. When a real rape occurs, she should report it to the police. Complaining to college committees because the courts "take too long" is ridiculous.

Paglia is a lesbian and, like Coulter, has no children. She herself admits that her obsessiveness, a typical male trait, gives rise to her brilliance. Although she was red-pilling people long before the current SJW despotism, I suspect, based on her 1990 treatise Sexual Personae, that she completely sublimates her sexual energy into artistic and intellectual excellence.

Phyllis Schlafly: Common-Sense Catholic

Phyllis Schlafly, a socially conservative Catholic writer, was what most feminists could only aspire to be: a successful professional who nonetheless raised healthy, balanced children. Schlafly earned a BA and MA from Harvard, and a JD from Washington University in St. Louis. Married at twenty-five to a wealthy lawyer, she had six children, one of whom, Andrew, started Conservapedia. Clearly she was sensibly aware of her Sexual Marketplace Value; after all, she worked as a model in her twenties, and traded her looks for security with a high-SMV man.

Schlafly catapulted into notoriety for opposing the Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which would have enshrined equality between the sexes into the founding document. Rightly questioning the ambiguity of such an amendment, Schlafly was victorious, out-debating feminists on national television, and the ERA was never adopted.

Conservative girls might look to Schlafly as a beacon of aspiration, but Schlafly made tremendous sacrifices: she had no time to party or socialize in college, working nights in an ammunitions factory, while still attaining high grades. She only started her career after raising children, relying until then on her husband's family affluence. In fact, she took thirty-three years, between her MA and JD, to be a homemaker. In 1985, she instituted the Homemaker Award, claiming she was most proud of that aspect of her life.

Most girls, let alone men, do not have such fortitude or intellectual ability. Schlafly had both, yet prioritized her family.

Marie Curie: Husband's Assistant

Would not bang.

Feminists worship Nobel Prize winner Marie Curie as a godlike figure, extolling her as a role model for girls in STEM. While the French-Polish Curie was scientifically gifted and intellectually sharp, her achievements should be contextualized appropriately: she was an empiricist, who relied heavily on her husband Pierre.

Curie's first Nobel Prize, in 1903, was due to her joint work with her husband, during which she was little more than a laboratory assistant. In 1906, Pierre died in a road accident, and Marie was offered his endowed position at the University of Paris. Armed with vast sums of money, Curie hired many lab assistants, soon discovering the elements polonium and radium, for which she was awarded the 1911 Nobel Prize in Chemistry. Whether this was directly her work, or that of her assistants, is an open question.

Furthermore, it is openly acknowledged among scientists that empiricists, those who work in a lab or with data, are mentally inferior to theorists, who actually amalgamate data into scientific concepts. Curie was, by no means, a theorist, and won the Nobel Prize for simply isolating elements.

As an aside, Marie Curie's second Nobel was almost withheld, due to Curie scandalously having slept with her husband's former student. This man, Paul Langevin, went on to become a famous physicist in his own right.

Upon reflection, then, Curie's brilliance relied on her ability to convince the public that she was in fact brilliant. Her reliance on others is only too clear. Even if the standard Marie Curie narrative is true, most girls lack that level of scientific ability, or the work ethic to attain it.

Lessons

If you are a girl reading this article, then stop at this juncture, and ask yourself an honest question: Am I truly brilliant, or can a man perform my job just as well?

If the answer is “No, a man can replace me,” then why do you want a career? If the answer is “Yes, I am awesome,” then ask yourself if you want a life like those brilliant women considered here. Given their daemonic sacrifices, you may need to gnaw on your second response.

Read Next: Pushing Women Into Leadership Roles Is Ushering The West To Its Doom

Eusebius Erasmus
Eusebius is a Prairie Canadian who likes gun rights, traditional values, and economics.

9 Reasons Nazism Should Be Kept Out Of The Masculine Right

August 17, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

In the wake of the recent incidents in Charlottesville, where the whole right wing spectrum has taken a gigantic hit in credibility and sympathy due to the actions of a single Nazi-affiliated wacko, I think now is a good time to re-assess where we stand in relation to the more extreme factions on our political corner.

To put it out in the open, the masculine right should have NO sympathy or comradeship with old Nazism or it's featherweight modern interpretations whatsoever. Spot it, shun it, or walk away in a 90-180 degree direction. Here are nine brief reasons why, and feel free to add more.

1. A forever browbeaten Germany

Cuck Country

Nazism and it’s legacy has thoroughly browbeaten and humiliated what should be the proud people of Germany. A country which has been responsible for a sizable percentage of all the world’s technological and scientific advancements for several hundred years (starting with the monumental Gutenberg press in 1440), saw most of it’s gorgeous and irreplaceable cities turned to rubble in World War II, and it’s people have had to endure over 70 years of agonizing Third Reich references and their related put-downs.

Due to this history, it’s modern day citizens are conditioned to embrace self-destructive SJW agendas like few others in the world today. Additionally, right wing sentiments in the country are looked down upon with immediate suspicion or even outright scorn, no matter how sensible they may be.

2. They killed a lot of masculine style for future generations

Nazism has arguably made dressing in incredibly handsome (no homo) and well-tailored suits uncool for entire generations of men in the late 20th and early 21st centuries. Particularly if they share similar color codes with Wehrmacht or Gestapo officers (grey or black). As for any symbolic imagery, that's a complete no-no or "cultural appropriation" at best.

In it's wake, dressing well in such a manner has become a source of ridicule among young people. It's akin to being lambasted as a "one percenter", while butt-ugly Antifa rags, giant tattoos, piercings, and dyed hair are supposed to be "beautiful" and "inspiring".

3. Their actions look bad on us

Neo-Nazi's hijack many of the ideas and virtues of the masculine right and make it appear like we are both fellow travelers. Not only is this association entirely unwanted on our part, when they screw up it severely damages the reputation of any right wing cause (which the fake news media uses as defamation fuel) and turns off many potential converts to the red pill. Many others accordingly become even more belligerent SJW's due to their perceived tag-along status.

4. The Confederacy is falsely merged with Nazism

The Confederacy was a constitutional Republic (like the USA and France which both fought the Nazis)

Neo-Nazi's tendency to display their flag in close proximity to the confederate battle flag has made both Nazi Germany and the Confederacy appear almost indistinguishable from each other in the eyes of historically retarded leftists. The Confederate States of America is now called “fascist” when in fact it was a constitutional Republic like many modern Western nations. Also, short of just two battles between professional soldiers at Antietam and Gettysburg, they fought an entirely defensive war against mass rape, pillage, and arson.

The left wing media, SPLC, Antifa, and other organizations then tactfully use these photo ops to try and obtain full legitimacy in their take down campaign of Confederate monuments and memorials. All with absolutely no input from local citizens.

While not giving tacit approval of the Confederacy, it is nonetheless blatant intellectual dishonesty with how the left twists this episode of American history to suit their current narrative. Neo-Nazi’s and their nearby flag waving give the left all the fuel they need to make this dishonesty a “truth”.

5. Degenerate and belligerent tattoos

Unlike their 1930’s and 1940’s counterparts (who made dressing super stylish uncool), Neo-Nazi’s tend to be big fans of donning degenerate “don’t give me a job” ink in all the worst places. The number of articles in Return Of Kings where we clearly expresses our disdain for rampant tattooism is simply too many to count.

6. They make up most of what the left can mock about the right

SJW Media: Yes……. “denounce” and genuflect to social justice!

The few Neo-Nazi’s give endless fuel to social justice obsessed websites and Youtube channels like Huffington Post, Al Jazeera Plus, MIC, ATTN, and MTV News to always have a moral checks-and-balances system in place against the Caucasian right, in case another high-casualty Islamic terrorist attack (inevitably) happens or they are feeling increasingly boxed in by embarrassing incidents.

Honestly, if Neo-Nazi’s and the KKK didn’t exist at all, the left would struggle so much to have any regular attacking fuel against the ‘white right’ on social media it’s not even funny.

7. They completely shun blacks

See those girls over there? Let’s go wing it buddy!

Is there a fair bit of mud-slinging about black crime rates or black male-white female interracial relationships on the masculine right? Sure there is, I’ve even addressed the crime factor several times and it’s undeniably a big problem in the United States.

However, does that mean that black men (or non-white men in general) aren’t welcome in this sphere? Of course not. Guys like Donovan Sharpe provide a valuable insight on the red pilled black male experience, and black men in the comment section like Psquare and Red Hood’s Assault drop among the best tidbits of wisdom that one could ask for.

Some big mouths aside on the keyboard, a large gathering of masculine right regulars would be pretty much guaranteed to produce more genuine black-and-white friendships than any pretentious pow-wow of liberal hipsters.

As for Nazi types, they wouldn’t even try.

8. They don’t seek self-improvement

The masculine right loves fitness, quality reading, game, entrepreneurship, minimal or no body modifications, and otherwise imperfect (but good) citizenship. The only time you'll see Neo-Nazi's who appear to have been doing any lifting or quality reading are the ultra-tattooed one's who just got out of jail. Let's just say this creates a lot of conflicts of interest…

9. War (What is it good for?)

And finally, as awesome as it would have been to see a functional big-ass 'Ratte' tank in the flesh, here on the masculine right we are not particularly big fans of violence and war, which is what the Nazi's did all throughout Europe and the Atlantic for more than half a decade.

Countless lives lost, gorgeous buildings gone forever, and irreplaceable works of art gone missing means that Nazism is an affront to those who take pride in western civilization.

The modern incarnation of Nazi's, however incredibly small and non-threatening as they are, is just as bad as the violent SJW's who are hell bent on taking down western civilization themselves. Primarily because they give the SJW's a sense of legitimacy for their destructive actions. So stop it, both of you.

Read Next: 6 Reasons Progressives, Leftists, And Sjws Are (Literally) Hitler

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

I Spent One Month In The Epicenter Of Cultural Degeneracy

August 17, 2017 | by Frederick Barbarossa | Link | Original Link

The formation of the second Reich in the late 19th century by Otto von Bismarck created an economic titan that would earn the ire of the other great European powers for over half a century. Its rapid industrialization and expanding colonial presence in the run-up to World War I resulted in the British adopting an Anti-German foreign policy to maintain their world hegemony. The second iteration of this policy, following the rise of the Third Reich, proved too costly for her Empire, and now Germany reigns as the supreme economic force of Europe.

Germany is a state cursed by its geography and haunted by its history, and one could say that the former is largely responsible for the latter. Its central position in Europe has ironically led to great vacillations between political extremes as a kind of defense mechanism against those foreign forces that have repeatedly tried to reduce them to a second-tier state. Once Germany's aggressive backlash against these foreign powers was quelled at their defeat in the Second World War, they seesawed to a country devoted to society-degenerating Cultural Marxism, in no small part due to its progeny being inculcated with a feeling of insurmountable shame.

Before my month in Dresden, I often told my American compatriots who spoke of the certain demise of Europe that they failed to see the more pressing situation unfolding in America, where the white population was much smaller and closer to being an outright minority. Once I witnessed firsthand how degenerative German society had become, I had to retract my statement entirely.

While "American values" are often defined to suit the audience a politician wishes to evoke sympathy from, there is nevertheless a semblance of cohesive resistance to Marxist influence in America that Western Europe lacks entirely. It could be the greater religious presence in America in which God acts as a shield against the nefarious influences of post-modern culture. The only God left in Germany is environmentalism, where recycling is substituted for weekly sacraments, perfectly pruning one's garden is a form of prayer, and fields of sacred windmills are erected like shrines.

Dresden lies in the Free State of Saxony, and has been noted for its rallies for organizations such as PEGIDA and the Alternativ für Deutschland political party. One shouldn't be fooled, though – this city is still dominated by Marxists. There is graffiti everywhere, and the theme is uniform. "FCK NZIS," "FCK PEGIDA," "FCK AFD," "No people are illegal," among other pro-Antifa slogans are plastered on nearly every street.

Germans don't just have a taste for putting graffiti on their streets, either, as a large portion of the German youth are covered in tattoos (sometimes extending to their jaw-lines), and disturbing lobe-gauging earrings are another popular practice. The number of women with dyed hair is obnoxious as well, and it seems there is a general consensus that once a woman has eclipsed the age of 35, she must sport a short haircut suited only for punk rockers and bull dykes.

A professional dancer connected to the local drug scene told me that ketamine was the drug of choice in this city, and added, “You would be amazed at how many drugs a German has to take to open up to you.” On any given night, one can stroll through the city’s region of bars and clubs and find people littered about the street drinking amidst roaming packs of Africans and Middle Easterners sending their kids out with cups of change begging for money.

In the clubs, men outnumber the women by a staggering ratio, which made sense after seeing how many girls were packed in the university library. German women are extremely career-oriented and don’t need to blow off steam about their impending demographic time bomb.

An overall view of the people reveals a population that is childless and growing very old. Seeing German babies is a rarity, and when you do it is usually a sole child being pushed in a stroller. Middle Eastern men spending time with their children, lounging in the grass, or playing soccer was a much more frequent sight. The root of this phenomenon was perfectly captured when a lone, thirtyish German woman covered in tattoos and wearing the appropriate blue-dyed, dyke haircut stepped on my bus, followed by a Middle Eastern man tending to his three young children. It was almost poetic how perfectly this moment captured the inevitable demise of German society.

The central issue in understanding the modern, passive nature of the average German is in the level of trust he places in his media. While even average Americans now know that their media is fundamentally anti-American, the Germans live in an entirely different world. Imagine an America where CNN is relied upon for accurate depictions of world events for a better understanding of the German’s complacency. This has also resulted in Germans harboring an embarrassing obsession with Donald Trump very similar to American liberals.

The spirit of this country has been conquered by the bludgeoning of its youth with the sins of its ancestors, and the collective choice to extinguish the possibility of such a mistake being repeated is an understandable tragedy. Obviously, each region of Germany experiences this cultural phenomenon to a different degree (Berlin being the epicenter), and one cannot question the industriousness of the average German. One can question why they would feel the need to be industrious, however, when the fruits of their labor will ultimately be passed on to foreign peoples. Herein lies the nihilistic heart of childless, Cultural Marxist decadence.

It is obvious that the foreign cultures residing in Germany should have little respect for this society, just as I have little respect for the present condition of the German world. I do have sympathy, though, simply because I share common ancestry with these people. The fundamental Islamist will have no sympathy, and he certainly will have no urge to join this cultural degeneracy. And so the central question concerning Germany's fate should not be, "When will foreign elements conquer these people?" but rather, "Why haven't they already tried?"

Read More: The Battle Over Public Libraries Shows How Sweden Continues To Push A Cultural Marxist Narrative

Frederick Barbarossa

Frederick Barbarossa did not die according to legend, but went into a prolonged slumber so that he could one day restore Germany to its former glory. Upon awakening, however, he has seen that his efforts cannot be reserved for Germany alone, and has set out to bring tradition and identity back to Western civilization.

The Purity Challenge

August 17, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When people attempt to fix their fatigue or mood problems, they may become dependent on substances or drugs that actually have the opposite intended effect with the added detriment of long-term issues. I recently embarked on a 30-day period of purity that has allowed me to troubleshoot health problems, stabilize my energy and mood, become more in tune with my natural state, and reduce psychological dependencies.

In your physical prime, you are not likely to give a second thought to drinking a couple espressos a day or having fun on the weekend by pounding shots with your friends. Your sexual vitality may also remain high in spite of excessively consuming drugs or estrogenic compounds. This changes once you reach your 30's. Your old habits start to drag down your energy and mood while masking lifestyle or health problems that need to be resolved.

I wake up and I'm tired so I drink coffee throughout the day. Then I'm too jittery so I drink a couple beers to take me back down. I'm too busy to go out during the daytime so I take vitamin D pills instead of getting sun. I'm bored at home so I watch some porn and jerk off. Suspecting that these habits were harming my natural state, I quit them cold turkey. Here's how it all went…

No caffeine

The first thing I used to do when waking up was brew a strong black cup of coffee. I would sometimes add a second cup throughout the day or drink a pot of black tea.

As I've written before, the withdrawal symptoms of caffeine are quite serious, revealing how potent it is as a drug. On the third day of the purity challenge, I was exceptionally tired, and had to take daily naps for several days. I also experienced bad headaches for more than a week. It took approximately ten days for all withdrawal symptoms to subside.

To substitute my coffee habit, I would drink one cup of green or white tea in the morning, which has exceedingly low caffeine, and herbal tea after that if I craved additional hot beverages. The result is that my energy is more flat throughout the day, without the highs and lows I had before. I also know that if I don't go to bed at a good hour, there will be no way to relieve my fatigue the next day unless I take a nap.

No alcohol

Over the winter, I developed a habit of drinking at least one pint of beer every evening. This was quite easy to stop from an addiction standpoint, but it was more challenging on a social and dating level.

Whenever I go out at night with my friends, they're all drinking. I can directly see how the alcohol helps them enter a more relaxed and fun state where they enjoy the loud venue while I remain stiff as a board. I was also reminded how deeply alcohol is integrated into modern dating, since girls insist on drinking copious amounts of booze at night and on dates. It wasn't a big deal that I wasn't drinking at the bar while hunting, since my soda water with lemon could easily be confused for a drink, but not drinking on dates ensured the girls wouldn't drink either, greatly reducing the speed to sexual fulfillment.

I've had some experience with "sober game" in Ukraine, where I met girls who didn't drink, but having to do it on every single date posed a big challenge. The result of sober dates is that you actually have to like each other beyond physical attraction, because your logical mind remains quite strong, ready to dismiss the girl for practical reasons that you wouldn't have come up while inebriated.

Going completely sober ultimately means that it will take longer to sleep with any girl. The benefit is that you're unable to bang subpar girls just for the notch and are able to spot genuine connections that don't require a drug to blossom. In terms of health, the benefits are no hangovers and improved sleep, especially on nights I would have consumed more than two drinks. I can stay out late on the weekend and wake up the next day without feeling any negative effects.

No supplements, medicines, drugs, or cigarettes

My supplement stack was fish oil, magnesium (to counter heart palpitations caused by caffeine), and vitamins B, C, and D. I stopped all of those cold turkey, added more vegetables to my diet, and spent more time in the sun on warm days.

I do think vitamins work in theory, but I don't believe they get absorbed in the same way as nutrients from food. We also have to be careful about thinking a substance has a benefit for us when it was tested on populations that differ in genetic profile. For example, the benefits of fish oil are heralded as reducing heart disease, but it's mostly tested on Asian populations where fish is a staple of their diet. The problem is that I'm not Asian. I also didn't know exactly how these vitamins are made, and whether companies cut corners during the manufacturing process.

I haven't noticed any obvious changes after stopping all supplementation. This is not surprising since most of their benefits are supposed to be long-term. If you happen to smoke cigarettes or take pharmaceutical or illegal drugs, you can halt those too for the purity challenge.

No porn

Lastly, I quit porn. I'm already familiar with the damaging effects of porn, particularly how it programs you to greatly desire sluts while harming long-term penis function, but what pushed me over the edge was that I was experiencing less spontaneous boners. For years I have been training myself to only get boners when I watched porn or was with a naked woman. Porn also caused me to masturbate not when I was horny but when I was bored.

Masturbating without porn meant that I had to be genuinely horny, enough to imagine sex with my mind, which I haven't had to do in over 15 years. Since using your mind to masturbate isn't as fun, the effect is you fap less and have a higher baseline of horniness that helps with your game.

Another big impact in not using porn is that I'm far more sensitive to seeing female flesh or images of girls in lingerie. It's possible for me to get a half boner right now if I catch sight of a girl out my window in a bikini top. I'm 38 but feel that my penor vitality has gained a solid decade in youth. If you think you're masturbating too much, you can also add no fap to the challenge.

Lessons from the purity challenge

Even after the 30 days of the challenge passed, I decided to continue because of the strong benefits. Not drinking caffeine has stabilized my energy, forcing me to fix fatigue with rest and sleep instead of the short-term benefit of coffee. Not drinking alcohol has improved my ability to seek a different kind of connection with women while I enjoy better mood and sleep. Not taking supplements has pushed me out the door to get more sun while improving my diet. And not watching porn has given me more frequent boners and higher overall horniness.

Another change is that I've become extremely perceptive to tiny changes in my body. Coffee and alcohol tend to mask your natural state, but now I can link a change in energy or mood to either my previous nights' sleep, a meal I just ate, bad news I received, or a tense conversation I experienced. It has become easy to connect why I'm feeling a certain state with my most recent actions. This has led me to conclude that getting proper sleep is the absolute best way to have a good day. Following that is is avoiding foods that have high glycemic index like pizza, which may cause you to feel sleepy, and steering clear of people who start arguments or drama.

The first two weeks of the purity challenge may be a drag for you as your body copes with withdrawal symptoms, so wait until weeks three and four to observe its true benefits. I'll certainly backslide when it comes to alcohol and coffee, but at least I'll remember that their benefits are cancelled out by costs which have a measurable impact on my body, and that existing mainly on sleep, food, light teas, and water puts me close to my most primal animalistic state.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: 5 Surprising Uses For Baking Soda

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

3 Dystopian Movies That Have Been Uncannily Accurate About The Future

August 18, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Portrayals of not-so-wonderful futures are fairly common in cinema, often focusing on major concerns of the times. The first dystopian science fiction movie is Fritz Lang's 1927 Metropolis. Other than interesting developments in robotics, this groundbreaking masterpiece depicts the wealthy living in opulence, provided for by dispirited workers toiling underground in dangerous and exhausting conditions. Social class and labor relations were pretty contentious subjects back in the day. It was rather controversial then, but its Socialist angle wasn't too heavy-handed.

Hollywood is showing signs of running out of new ideas, which unfortunately is the cinematic establishment's smallest problem lately. (As evidence, I'll cite needless remakes of great movies from the good old days, which often don't live up to the originals. Further, they're increasingly raiding comic books for plotlines.) Even so, they've come out with a few good recent films concerning where a decaying society might lead. Actually, since Hollywood seems to be knee-deep in degeneracy, who better?

Idiocracy

A high-IQ couple has waited too long to have children. It's quite a common scenario these days, especially with the advent of feminism and consumerism. Specifically, young ladies with professional aspirations typically party away their most fertile years. Then (as pictured in the film) they finally get around to locking down a boring reliable provider, but then they have to wait, wait, wait until they're financially secure.

Unfortunately, they've slapped the "snooze" button on the biological clock one too many times. However, depicted alongside them is a couple with dull-normal IQs. None too diligent about birth control, they have many children, and a great number of descendants. Over the centuries, the world's population becomes increasingly stupid and incompetent. The film takes several pokes at redneck culture, though certainly not the worst example of Hollywood types making fun of the people who grow their food.

All told, it describes a theme that Francis Galton and Henry Goddard (among others) warned us about a century ago. What's quite remarkable is that Idiocracy accepts the idea that intelligence is hereditary, IQ has meaningful effects, and the loss of intelligence over time would cause profound social problems.

That's basically what The Bell Curve: Intelligence and Class Structure in American Life set out in painstaking detail. Aside from the conclusions (obviously), the book took a moderately liberal position. As such, the authors seemed like bishops who discovered an ancient manuscript in the Vatican archives that irrefutably disproved some key Biblical doctrine, like the existence of God or something monumental like that.

Despite their modest approach, and overall focus on how best to help everyone to fit into society, the book was—and still is—hugely controversial. (That was mostly because of chapters 13 and 14, discussing racial differences.) Basically, the authors walked across the ideological tripwire of the nature/nurture debate set by Franz Boas and Trofim Lysenko. I'll have to give Richard Herrnstein credit for having been one of the most honest leftists on the planet, unlike all the others who've been screaming bloody murder about The Bell Curve since it came out. Furthermore, Charles Murray is an exceptional Libertarian for not ignoring the subject.

How would a society work out, after the intelligent K-selected types fail to keep their lineages going, but the dull r-selected types breed like rabbits? If you go by Idiocracy, this results in a crude and incompetent society, with even medical technicians utterly clueless, and energy drinks used in place of water. If you go by The Bell Curve, there's a strong correlation between low IQ and social dysfunctions like illegitimacy and crime, compared within the same population group. If you go by world IQ maps, average intelligence corresponds fairly closely with how well countries are run.

Loading...
Overall, it's a discomforting thought, and what to do about it remains a thorny question. This is in no small part due to leftist taboos about even considering these matters. The movie itself has no answers, but it's pretty good for lowbrow humor.

Wall-E

The film begins showing the world completely turned into a trash heap. It's so desolate that a roach—the only example of animal life depicted—actually looks cute. Sure, it's only a cartoon, but one wants to scream at the people for letting things get that way… except that there are no people. The titular robot works tirelessly to clean up the mess, using broken-down robots as a source of spare parts. Wall-E has been at it for so long that he's developed intelligence, and a bit of nostalgia for the culture that once existed.

Then another robot appears on the scene—this one more sophisticated—and a love story develops. As it happens, EVA has a secret mission, one which ends up profoundly affecting destiny. As their adventure continues, one wonders if the robots are the only intelligent beings left. When the humans finally are seen, it's utterly horrifying—they're such couch potatoes that they can't even walk. Actually, the original plan was that people would degenerate further yet into amorphous blobs, though the filmmakers decided to tone it down in order not to scare the kids.

The film does end on an upbeat note. Still, they have to recover from total environmental devastation. I doubt it would ever get quite that bad for real. Still, the loss of species in modern times qualifies as a global extinction event already, and it's hard to say how much worse it will get in the future. If noticing this makes me a tree-hugger, I'm guilty as charged. All told, the film is a powerful warning about pollution, resource depletion, environmental catastrophe, consumerism, and of course lack of physical exercise.

Blade Runner

In the far future (2019 to be specific), a cop reluctantly agrees to "retire" four escaped replicants, genetically engineered humans. These ones have been designed to have superhuman powers, not experience emotions, and die in four years. They're the perfect slaves—unless they start getting ideas of their own.

Although these fugitive replicants aren't quite psychologically human, they're really just acting as rationally as they can. They play dangerous bad guys in the movie, but their "retirement" seems pretty much the same thing as murder. Well, slavery sucks; a point that's pretty uncontroversial in all but the least civilized parts of the world.

All told, it's a classic science fiction movie. Blade Runner is one of the few instances where a film is better than the novel on which it was based. Do Androids Dream Of Electric Sheep? was kind of a yawner, but that's how it goes for Philip K. Dick books.

Now that we're coming up on 2019 pretty soon, the movie's timeline seems dated. (It's only half right; remember that it came out in 1982 when southern California still resembled America.) We don't have interstellar colonies (just an international space station thus far), and LA's smog problem isn't quite that bad. Despite that, if things don't go well, then Los Angeles might end up looking nearly as crowded, polluted, and dismal in the next century or two. However, if society does degenerate to that condition, we might not even have an international space station by then.

The Western world is on a slow descent trending toward conditions in the developing world. One reason (among others) is the erosion of the middle class, which gets worse each time the economy crashes. The ultra-wealthy tend to thrive throughout it, especially when they're bailed out for being "too big to fail". Increasing vast disparities of wealth aren't too promising for the future. If trends don't change, then the malaise and desperation of Blade Runner could come to pass in the New World Order that the globalists have planned.

As for genetic engineering, that has great promise. Not only can it eliminate genetic diseases, it also can boost intelligence (averting the Idiocracy scenario), and even make people better looking. However, it could be used for bad ends: unhealthy food, creating unnatural genetic freaks, or making the public docile and stupid. There are absolutely no limits to where some people would go toward that. Blade Runner serves as a warning about this new technology just on the horizon.

Read More: How Brave New World Author Aldous Huxley Foresaw Modern America In 1958

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Night Of The Digital Knives: Silicon Valley Launches Biggest Internet Censorship Purge In History

August 18, 2017 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

As the fallout from the failed Unite the Right rally in Charlottesville, Virginia last weekend continues, leftist-controlled tech and social media outlets have started mass censoring right-wingers and banning them from their platforms. While sites such as Twitter have been hostile to the right for a long time, the events in Charlottesville—where alt-left agitator Heather Heyer was killed by rally attendee James Alex Fields, Jr.—have given leftist-run sites the excuse they need to ideologically cleanse their websites.

As of this writing, numerous right-wing websites and personalities have been banned from PayPal, Twitter, Paypal, Stripe, Facebook, Instagram, Mailchimp, Soundcloud, Uber, and countless other platforms. To make matters worse, domain registrars and website maintenance companies such as CloudFlare and GoDaddy have no-platformed The Daily Stormer, keeping the site offline since Sunday. It's clear that ideological dissidents are going to have to change their tactics in order to keep their websites and other platforms online.

Dozens have been purged

> And they've just got started. pic.twitter.com/Csk3s8aXZM
> — Hamish (@Alba_Rising) August 17, 2017

Even before the Charlottesville rally, right-wingers had been targeted for no-platforming by leftist-converged social media and financial platforms. Since Donald Trump's election, we've witnessed a flurry of attacks from Silicon Valley, from the mass demonetization of politically dissident YouTube videos to the banning of individuals such as Hunter Wallace, Davis Aurini, and ROK publisher Roosh Valizadeh from PayPal.

In the lead up to Unite the Right, Airbnb began cancelling the accounts of right-wingers that it suspected were renting apartments in Charlottesville to attend the rally. On the day of the rally itself, alt-right media outlet Red Ice was hacked by antifas, along with the personal Twitter accounts of hosts Henrik Palmgren and Lana Lokteff; the site is still offline. Baked Alaska and James Allsup were also banned from Uber after they were kicked out by their driver for supposedly being "racist." This was all a prelude to what came next.

The first wave of the assault on right-wingers came on Sunday, when several of the major rally attendees, including Pax Dickinson, Mike Enoch, and Levi Smith, were banned from Twitter. Dickinson's ban came not long after he revealed how local police had deliberately set up the rally attendees to be overwhelmed and attacked by antifas.

> I got banned from Facebook suddenly. I hardly even post there, I can't imagine what I could have done to get banned.
>
> — The Duck Reborn (@TheDuckReborn) August 17, 2017

Over the next few days, PayPal and Facebook announced a major crackdown on right-wingers. Facebook has banned the pages and personal accounts of numerous right-wing personalities and sites, including American Renaissance, Christopher Cantwell, Pax Dickinson, and the Traditionalist Worker Party. PayPal has also banned Cantwell, Richard Spencer, Jason Kessler, American Renaissance, VDARE, and countless others from using their services, cutting them off from a vital source of funds. In the latter two cases, AmRen and VDARE were banned even though neither they nor their leadership had any involvement with Unite the Right.

> Mailchimp did a massive purge on Monday, @CounterFund's account was also canceled as well as at least 4 others that I know of. https://t.co/d288wRY5tW
>
> — The Duck Reborn (@TheDuckReborn) August 16, 2017

Additionally, Mailchimp has purged numerous right-wingers from using its mailing list services, including Christopher Cantwell and Pax Dickinson's Counter.Fund. Cantwell was also banned from YouTube permanently and may be completely ruined due to his involvement in Unite the Right. Discord has also banned alt-right servers.

To make matters worse, leftists have begun attacking web hosts, domain registrars, and other infrastructural services that right-wingers rely on to keep their sites online. Rootbocks and Hatreon, two free-speech alternatives to GoFundMe and Patreon, respectively, have been forced to switch domains and webhosts after being banned due to their unwillingness to ban right-wingers. Free speech Twitter replacement Gab has been subjected to several DDoS attacks for the same reasons, and the Alternative Right blog was deleted from Blogger last night.

> This is the largest DDoS attack against Gab in our existence.
> Happening on our one year anniversary.
> Only propelling our message.

> — Gab (@getongab) August 15, 2017

But no site has suffered as much as The Daily Stormer. After they published an article on Sunday mocking Heather Heyer, they were forced off their domain registrar GoDaddy after alt-leftists complained. They switched to Google Domains, only to have their domain seized in violation of Google's terms of service. The Daily Stormer is currently only available on the deep web and may not be able to return to normal operations.

What's astounding is that alt-left-controlled tech organizations aren't even hiding their desire to purge right-wing organizations. For example, anti-DDoS service CloudFlare banned The Daily Stormer solely because their CEO woke up in a "bad mood," which he admitted in a company-wide email:

> Let me be clear: this was an arbitrary decision. It was different than what I'd talked talked with our senior team about yesterday. I woke up this morning in a bad mood and decided to kick them off the Internet. I called our legal team and told them what we were going to do. I called our Trust & Safety team and had them stop the service. It was a decision I could make because I'm the CEO of a major Internet infrastructure company.

The purge has swelled to the point that Lauren Southern—who is completely unaffiliated with the alt-right and was not present at Charlottesville—was nearly banned from Instagram, despite her account there being completely apolitical. As Hamish's Tweet above shows, these are far from the only examples of right-wingers being purged, no-platformed, censored, or merely harassed. Others, such as Social Matter's Ryan Landry and *AltRight.com/*Arktos' Jason Reza Jorjani, have chosen to leave the alt-right altogether.

Where do we go from here?

> Imagine if we got to do the last 15 years of internet business over, on a slightly smaller scale but brand new? #AltTech
>
> — The Duck Reborn (@TheDuckReborn) August 17, 2017

While the purge of right-wingers from mainstream financial and social media platforms appears to be slowing down somewhat, it is clear that the right can no longer rely on these services to promote or finance their operations. The fact that previously neutral platforms such as domain registrars and DDoS protection systems such as CloudFlare are also booting right-wingers is a chilling development, because it means that alt-tech platforms such as Gab, Rootbocks, and Hatreon are at risk of being no-platformed as well.

While I believe that nationalism will ultimately triumph over globalism, it is clear that right-wingers will need to take drastic measures in order to safeguard their First Amendment rights. In addition to minimizing or eliminating their dependence on mainstream platforms, right-wingers will also need to eliminate their use of Nazi imagery—even as a joke—and tone down their criticism of Jews. Much like how Roosh was able to maintain his relevance despite no longer being able to talk about rape, the dissident right can maintain its relevance without turning into Hollywood Nazis.

Additionally, the dissident right cannot look to President Trump for protection from the alt-left. While Trump has made his displeasure at the alt-left publicly known, his lack of action against them—and against the no-platforming of his right-wing supporters—indicates that he either doesn’t understand the problem or doesn’t care. For the moment at least, we are on our own.

Read More: Charlottesville Was A Disaster For The Dissident Right

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

How William Clark Made An Everlasting Impact On The Japanese Psyche

August 18, 2017 | by Murray Kilpatrick | Link | Original Link

William S. Clark is not a name which strikes a chord with the American public, let alone all but the most dedicated of 19th century history buffs. In both cases, all parties can be 100% forgiven for their complete lack of knowledge on this somewhat benign figure.

That is, at least in his native country of the United States. The nation of Japan however, lying over 10,000 kilometers away from his native state of Massachusetts, has the man's work, and above all his words, immortalized in the national consciousness. So who is this Mr. Clark?

Origins Of An Agricultural Educator

William S. Clark in 1876 (Age 50)

William Smith Clark was born in the western Massachusetts town of Ashfield in 1826. Growing up, he pursued an academic life, first by obtaining a degree from nearby Amherst College in 1848, and eventually a doctorate in chemistry from the University of Göttingen, known as the “city of science” in Germany.

Naturally, an academic career in the sciences is what would become Mr. Clark’s mainstay for much of his adult life. After returning to Amherst in 1852, he would serve as a professor of chemistry at his old Alma mater for the next fifteen years. His relatively lengthy tenure would only be briefly interrupted during the Civil War (1861-1865), where he served as a colonel with operational command of the 21st Massachusetts Regiment for about fourteen months.

Most notably, his very own regiment suffered nearly 30% casualties while valiantly fighting during the Battle of Antietam on September 17th, 1862. It was the single bloodiest day in U.S. history, with over 22,000 men on both sides either dead, wounded, or missing before the clock struck midnight.

Clark's regiment fought and took heavy casualties at Antietam, the USA's equivalent of Britain's "First day on the Somme".

Following the return to his much more life-affirming civilian career, he became a pivotal figure in the early history and success of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, which would eventually be renamed the University of Massachusetts Amherst long after his passing in 1947.

Now fast forwarded to the 1870's, his extensive experience in science teaching, leadership in a new and innovative college, and commendable war record would attract the attention of a rising nation far far away. Mister Clark had no idea at the time that his decision to work in Japan would set himself up for immortality in that country, as a revered national figure of ambition and encouragement.

The New Land Of The Rising Sun

1870’s Yokohama, Japan.

Japan in the 1870’s was undergoing profound changes which altered society right to it’s core. After the American Commodore Matthew C. Perry finally forced open the country to trade via ‘gunboat diplomacy’ in 1854, the Japanese leadership was convinced that they must wholeheartedly embrace Western technology and customs, or else continuing their policy of “Sakoku” (national isolation) would endanger their sovereignty.

As the Japanese feudal lord Shimazu Nariakira stated in the 1850’s, “if we take the initiative, we can dominate; if we do not, we will be dominated“. And the rest as they say, is history.

Japan would rapidly transform from a feudal society in 1850 into the world’s first non-Western industrial powerhouse by the centuries end. The Yamato people expressed a fundamental determination to succeed and not be subjugated, and their government would take great interest in Mr. Clark’s agricultural work as the years progressed in order to achieve this goal.

Hokkaido, Japan. William Clark's home for eight months.

During this period of rapid modernization, the Japanese government would take in a considerable number of 'oyatoi gaikokujin' (hired foreigners). These were essentially Westerners who were aloud to temporarily reside in Japan and teach a specialized craft or technological skill which was lacking within the nations own borders at the time. It was a very prestigious and once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to be sought out as a hired foreigner, and whatever positions on offer were very highly paid.

In 1876, a now 50 year old William Clark was in the fortunate position to have just the right combination of skills desired in agriculture, along with many years of experience accumulated in his craft, to impress the Japanese government enough to take him on board in the program. He would set sail for the northern Japanese island of Hokkaido that year, which would become his new home-from-home for the next eight months.

Boys, Be Ambitious!

Clark's offering of knowledge completely transformed the agricultural landscape of Hokkaido and eventually Japan as a whole. He introduced the first American model barnyard to the country, and helped the people of Hokkaido adopt new crops and techniques in fishing and animal husbandry, which would also eventually be taken nationwide. Considering the country has a modern day population of over 120 million, that's not a bad legacy for the work of a single man is it!

As the months progressed, Mr. Clark was becoming well aware of the tremendous influence he was having upon Hokkaido affairs, writing to his wife back in Massachusetts "I tremble to think how much confidence is reposed in me and what responsibilities I am daily assuming".

Bust of William S. Clark at modern day Hokkaido University

Along with the great work he was doing, William Clark made fantastic rapport with the first students of the Sapporo Agricultural College (now Hokkaido University), which he helped establish soon after arrival in Japan. The same teachings of morality he expressed as an educator in Massachusetts, along with his rhetoric of ambition and personal success, resonated deeply with his pupils who had been born into a rigid feudal caste system just two decades prior.

Eventually, there came the day that would change Japan forever. Mister Clark's departure on April 16th, 1877 witnessed many of his students and faculty ride with him nearly 20 kilometers outside of Sapporo, a mark of profound respect for their teacher who had imparted so much applicable and philosophical knowledge. After saying his farewells, Clark shouted…

> Boys, be ambitious! (Be ambitious not for money or for selfish aggrandizement, not for that evanescent thing which men call fame. Be ambitious for that attainment of all that a man ought to be).

The Legacy And Lessons of William Smith Clark

The statue of William S. Clark at 'Observation Hill' in Sapporo is a popular tourist attraction, and frequently visited by graduating students in the city.

"Boys, be ambitious!" is now a legendary phrase of goodwill and encouragement in Japan, and elementary schoolbooks across the nation contain Clark's picture along with a brief story of his life. Eight months of work which had just been normal routine for him at home, along with three parting words to uplift the human spirit, had immortalized this otherwise ordinary gentleman into the consciousness of one of the world's most prosperous and populous societies.

If William Clark was resurrected for just one day to witness modern Hokkaido, and how his words would be instantly recognizable to untold millions of people, he would be humbled beyond the point of speech.

The lessons to be learned from this story is that being born at just the right place and time in history, along with following lucrative opportunities when they are presented, can make all the difference in how you may impact local communities and be remembered to it's future generations. So make the smart choice, and have fun doing it.

In the meantime, next time you visit Japan, be sure and drop "Boys, be ambitious!" to any young man you come across who deserves the recognition. Whether it's a new friend, likable colleague, or even a happy and lively young boy with his family, you are almost guaranteed to get a smile and nod of respect.

Read Next: What Men Can Learn From The Fascinating Destiny Of English Explorer William Adams

Murray Kilpatrick

Murray Kilpatrick is a 30-something patron of history and the arts. In the timeless words of Thomas Paine, he is here to offer you nothing more than simple facts, plain arguments, and common sense.

Lindsay Lohan Becomes A “Chaste” Muslim Woman After Spending Years On The Hollywood Cock Carousel

August 20, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Lindsay Lohan, who is now making a living out of being an on-again, off-again “Muslim,” is a prime example of how a celebrity—or plain promiscuous woman—expects to be celebrated and fawned over even after years of hypocrisy. All her past misdeeds, which completely contradict her new identity, will be washed away. She will be lauded as “brave” and carve out a new niche with many pliant (male) followers.

To the surprise of many people, including my early teenage self, Lindsay Lohan became a kind of sex symbol years ago. And with that status came a multitude of high-profile sexual relationships, including with singer Nick Carter (nearly 20 years ago!) and actor Wilmer Valderrama. God knows how many ones we didn’t know about it as she rode the cock carousel about as far as it would take her.

Then this happened…

Her looks receded and her film roles dried up substantially. What came next actually makes a lot of sense if you understand the attention-seeking that drives women like Lohan.

Wrapping yourself up like a virgin doesn't make you a virgin.

After Lindsay hit 30, she found God–I mean, Allah. She has apparently only now looked up the word "modesty" or "chasteness" in the dictionary:

Women hitting the wall want to deny other, younger women attention, rather than wishing to improve society

Orange tan or not, Lindsay Lohan should have wifed herself up at the age at which this photo was taken.

If more girls would come out and say, “Being a slut was a terrible decision and against what is best for women,” I could accept them wanting to prevent others from going down the same path. But that is evidently not the case with someone like Lindsay Lohan. Realizing that their expiration date has arrived, they instead try to shame their younger or perhaps now just better-preserved peers in a way that highlights their own “virtue.”

Last year I brought you the case study of Rose McGowan, the former Charmed actress who went from this:

…to this:

The eviscerated McGowan now runs an “army” to support feminism and challenge the objectification of women. Likewise, Lohan was already looking like this several years ago:

Father (I mean, Mother) Time has had their way.

Of course, Lohan could ride the cock carousel until she's 50, or even get some fanboy with loads of cash to wife her up. But none of this will replace the image and youth that she has lost. So what better way to move on than to make it look like you moved on, becoming a chaste Muslim "by choice" rather than loss of looks?

Many women expect praise for all their life decisions, no matter how contradictory and hypocritical they are Lohan with Emir Bahadir.

What I didn't tell you is that Lindsay Lohan is going back and forth between her old and new self, as the occasion demands. She is now possibly romantically involved with Emir Bahadir, whose Turkish parents own a billion-dollar real estate portfolio. She has recently been partying in Mykonos, one of the least chaste and least traditionally Muslim places on the face of the Earth. Let's hope that Lindsay's newfound "chastity" survives the test. Like many women, whatever Lindsay Lohan does, she expects to be applauded for it and to garner the public eye.

Read More: Mainstream Media Rushes To Excuse Muslim Woman Who Decapitated Russian Child

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Is It Time To Rebrand The Alt-Right?

August 20, 2017 | by Damian Michael | Link | Original Link

In the life of a political or religious movement, there may arise certain events which make it wise for that movement to rebrand itself. And with the recent events that have occurred in Charlottesville—of which every ROK reader is no doubt aware—it may thus be time for the alt-right to consider such a marketing change.

But why might such a course of action be necessary at this point in time? Because, quite simply, the alt right label has now been severely—perhaps irreparably—tainted by the alt Reich / alt white sub-faction within the wider alt right. And whether the perception of this taint is just or not, the undeniable fact is that it is indeed now perceived as being there, and this perception will remain there in the minds of the wider public for the foreseeable future, if not permanently. Consequently, this is a serious problem for the alt right.

So, in light of this problem, it is suggested that the non-alt Reich / non-alt white faction of the alt right use this occurrence as an opportunity rather than a set-back. In particular, the Charlottesville incident can be used as an opportunity to make a clean break with the alt Reich faction of the alt right by the rest of the alt right (meaning the so-called alt West, the alt lite, and the Vox Day-style alt right). Indeed, this event is a chance for the wider alt right to make it clear that the alt Reich faction of the alt right is now its own separate entity; and that if that faction is perceived to be the "alt right" as a whole, then so be it, for the actual alt right will move to another label.

However, this then raises the question: What will the new label for the alt right be?

A New Alt Right Term

Although trying to rebrand a movement is never easy, and though no label will satisfy everyone, I offer three candidates as potential replacements for the term 'alt right'.

Not a way to win American or European hearts-and-minds.

First, there is the label 'nationalist right'. It is simple, to the point, and easily conveys the idea that this is a rightist group which is primarily focused on the nation rather than anything else—just as the broad alt right is. This is a good label, and perhaps the easiest to adopt quickly and naturally. It is also excellent because the term 'nationalist' means exactly what the alt-right movement is trying to achieve:

> Nationalism is a range of political, social, and economic systems characterised by promoting the interests of a particular nation, particularly with the aim of gaining and maintaining self-governance, or full sovereignty, over the group's homeland. The political ideology therefore holds that a nation should govern itself, free from unwanted outside interference, and is linked to the concept of self-determination. Nationalism is further oriented towards developing and maintaining a national identity based on shared characteristics such as culture, language, race, religion, political goals or a belief in a common ancestry. Nationalism therefore seeks to > preserve the nation's culture. It often also involves a sense of pride in the nation's achievements, and is closely linked to the concept of patriotism. (Wikipedia: Nationalism)

Thus, a member of the nationalist right is someone who is akin to an ethno-ideological nationalist, thereby wanting all ethnic groups, and all severely divided political factions within those ethnic groups, to have the right to self-determination and to have their own nation where they can live in peace.

So, the label nationalist right is a strong choice, but there are two other options to consider which may have a rhetorical benefit that the label 'nationalist right' does not have.

The second choice is the term 'nationalist conservative'. The purpose of this term would be to create a bridge between the nationalist and the conservative movement. It would also convey the nationalist focus of alt right people who may have called themselves conservatives in the past. However, given the link between conservativism and political-cowardice (see: cucks), this may not be the best term to use.

Not the image that the Nationalist Right wants to portray!

Finally, the term 'universal nationalist' should also be considered. This term has the rhetorical advantage of using universalist terminology, which is generally seen as the domain of the left; thus, it subverts the left in this minor way, while still articulating the fact that it's focus is on nationalism. Furthermore, it is very difficult to be against universal nationalism, especially since most western people believe in the idea of self-determination.

At the same time, this label of universal nationalist also has the advantage of removing the political labels of 'left' and 'right' from itself. This is a benefit because the universal nationalist can thus say that he is not opposed to the left or the right creating its own nation, he just thinks that they should have that right regardless of their political leanings. Ergo, if insane progressives in California wish to start their own nation, then the universal nationalist has no problems with such a course of action.

In the end, though, perhaps the label ‘universal nationalist’ is more of an explanation of what the ‘nationalist right’ is, rather than its own separate term, and so the two terms could be used interchangeably.

Thus, arguably the best term to replace the ‘alt right’ label is the term ‘nationalist right’.

Advantages and Disadvantages of Change

Now, as with any rebranding, there are advantages and disadvantages to taking such a course of action. In terms of the disadvantages, any new label—such as nationalist right—will need to gain traction and make-up ground that it lost from the rebranding. However, in this case, the advantages clearly outweigh the disadvantages.

The type of nationalism that wins a culture.

First, the new label allows for a clear differentiation between the nationalist right and the alt Reich side of the alt right, and this differentiation is the following: if you see Nazis salutes or Nazi flags or Nazi symbols, or if there is talk of white supremacy and racial dominance, then that is not part of the nationalist right. The nationalist right may agree that such groups have the right to self-determination, but such groups are not part of the nationalist right. (And as a side-note, who the hell would want to be associated with an outdated political faction that lost the war that it engaged in? Not me, that’s for sure.)

Second, the term nationalist right is positive, and it thus promotes a positive agenda. It is, in essence, in favor of everything found in Vox Day’s 16 Points of the Alt-Right, but it adds the seventeen point that the alt-Reich is not a part of it.

Third, the term nationalist right shows that such a group is not an “alternative” to anything, but rather that is a perfectly reasonable and sensible position which would be embraced by most people on the right if that position was explained to them properly. Thus, the nationalist right has broad-tent appeal and sounds mainstream.

Playing the Left's Game

Finally, some might accuse me of playing the left's game in trying to rebrand the alt right and then distance the new label from the alt Reich faction of the alt right. And in some respects, this is true. But it is also true that sometimes your political opponents win such a significant battle, or your side makes such a significant mistake, that taking drastic action is necessary. And I believe that this is one of those times.

Playing the Left's Game? Maybe. But maybe it is achieving a strategic win from a tactical loss.

Furthermore, there is also the idea of cutting off a poisoned limb, and the term alt right may just be poisoned enough that it needs to be cut-off. At the same time, it is also about cutting off deadwood, and the alt Reich—who seem more interested in their own version of Nazi virtue-signaling than in winning—are deadwood that the alt right needs to separate from. And one way to do that is through a rebranding campaign that clearly delineates the alt Reich from the rest of the players on the nationalist side.

So, in the end, it is time for the broader alt right to transform itself into the nationalist right, a group that supports and aims for universal nationalism, including its own. This is the best way to move forward, and it is the best way to actually achieve what the alt-right seeks to achieve.

Post-Script: Please note that as the originator of the idea of Alt Christianity, I simply note that it would also be possible to rebrand Alt Christianity as Nationalist Christianity, and that the 21 these of that movement would still stand without issue.

Read More: Patriarchal Nationalism: The Only Societal System That Can Save The West

Damian Michael

R. Damian Michael. Author. Apologist. Alt-Christian. Website. YouTube. Patreon. PayPal. Books.

How To Develop An Iron Chin That Can Take A Hard Punch

August 20, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

"Develop my chin? What do you mean, Larsen?" Just to clarify, I'm not talking about giving you that sculpted lantern jaw that all men want but most men can't obtain. That's mostly a combination of losing fat and genetics—although my colleague Jon Anthony recommends chewing mastic gum. You can try that if you want, but that's not really what we're here to discuss today.

No, I'm using "chin" in the boxing/martial arts sense—the ability to take a punch without going down. Anybody who follows combat sports will have heard terms related to this phenomenon: "good chin", "hard chin", "iron jaw", "glass jaw", and so forth. Many will also assume that this, much like having a defined jawline, is something that you either have or you don't.

Wrong.

Chin?

The first misconception people have about developing the chin is the name. The ability to take a punch, in fact, does not have anything to do with the structure of your jawline at all!

A knockout or concussion occurs when the head is hit and the brain literally slams into the inside of the skull. Thus, we can surmise that the more the head moves from the blow striking it, the more susceptible the person is to a knockout.

Thus, to enhance your toughness and lessen your susceptibility to knockouts from blows to the head, you have to keep your head from moving when it's struck. And to do that, you will have to strengthen not your jaw, or any of the muscles of your face, but your neck.

Think of the head resting on the neck similarly to a lever resting on a fulcrum. The wider and bigger the fulcrum is, the less the lever can move, and thus the less the lever can affect movement upon an external object.

Bearing in mind that I was much better at biology then I was at physics, we can thus surmise that the neck is the fulcrum, the head is the lever, and the brain is the object placed on the end of the lever that will be moved by the lever.

Thus, if we make the neck bigger and stronger, the head will move less when it is struck, and thus you will be more difficult to knock out.

The Proof

The simplest way to prove the veracity of what I'm claiming is the simple fact that many martial artists—of all stripes, whether they be strikers, grapplers, or mixed martial artists—extensively train their necks to be stronger and more durable, for this exact purpose.

Anyone who has wrestled will remember doing extensive training in bridging, as well as neck bridging. The reasons for doing this are two fold: not only does the flexibility facilitate various types of throws and pin escapes, training the neck will, in essence, make you more durable and more resistant to being dropped on your head. Similarly, any judoka or jujitsu practitioner worth his salt will train his neck extensively as well.

And let's not forget that strikers themselves train their necks extensively. In his tome Championship Fighting, Jack Dempsey specifically refers to this as a must-do exercise. Dempsey was only knocked out once in his career. Need I say more?

The Exercises

The good thing here is that there are only two exercises you need to make yourself tougher. These are the neck bridge and the hands-free headstand.

If you have read my articles previously such as this, you will already have some background in bridging—it's an exercise that I have repeatedly advocated, and for good reason. And to do the neck bridge is very simple:

Lay down flat on the floor in the bridge starting position. Then, rather than doing a standard bridge, push off the back of your head and roll onto your forehead. Then, cross your arms across your chest. From here, you can do one of two things. You can either hold the neck bridge for time, or do repetitions, slowly rolling all the way back and then again.

If you want to make it even harder, you can hold a weight in your unoccupied hands, although I usually do not recommend doing any exercise that puts weight directly upon the spine.

The other exercise, the hands-free headstand (or neckstand), is the other exercise. Unlike the neck bridge, this one is only one in holds for time. Go to a wall and kick into a headstand.

Then remove your hands and hold. In addition to strengthening the muscles and connective tissues of the neck, both of these exercises will also train your willpower by forcing you to endure pain.

Conclusion

What more evidence do you need? If you want to make yourself tougher and less susceptible to knock out—and why wouldn't you?—start doing these exercises now.

Read More: A Primer On The Best Exercise You're Not Doing

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

How “Soft Game” Can Help Men Who Are In Committed Relationships

August 21, 2017 | by Maximus King | Link | Original Link

Soft game is a term used to describe a very mild type of game married men can play to stay loose and comfortable in the presence of women. It’s a non-escalating, friendly rapport that is developed over the course of minutes to hours, depending on the situation, allowing men to elevate themselves and increase their perceived value during a conversation.

Married men often find themselves in social situations where soft game can help them, whether it’s during a couple’s dinner, a house or office party, or even in the field while shopping or at a park. A common scenario happens when a married man gets approached by an attractive female because he’s alone with a baby or a dog. This has happened to me and my married friends many times.

Don’t be this guy

Soft game isn’t about approaches, number collecting, dates, escalating, and notches—its essence is about being friendly, communicating, and building rapport with women. Why is this important? Because too many married men will often stray off-course in one of two different directions: either too much game, which can hurt their marriage, or not enough interaction due to shyness, fear, or whatever is stopping them from acting “normal,” which makes them appear awkward or weird.

Too much game is a mistake newly-married men make when they haven’t yet fully accepted the fact that they have committed to one woman for life. Too little game is what happens to betas and men who have been beaten down for too long by alpha wives.

You’re Married. Don’t Approach.

How Is Soft Game Different Than Simply Talking?

Soft game is a type of harmless “flirting,” but you are the only one who knows what you are doing. It is not flirting in the traditional sense. It’s a way to talk to women that makes them more interested in you and leaves them wanting more when the interaction is over. You do it by leaving bait, not answering questions directly, and leaving the conversation early.

Depending on the situation, you would use phrases like “Where I’m from…” and “At my job…” and “When I traveled out of the country…” When prompted, you should be vague, change the subject, and get her to talk about herself, which is usually her favorite subject, anyway.

Dale Carnegie said, in How to Win Friends and Influence People:

> Talk to someone about themselves and they’ll listen for hours.

Finally, when you feel that the conversation has good momentum, it’s time to leave. The effect on her is very similar to actual game. She becomes more engaged in the conversation, because you are more interesting. The bait you drop leaves her with questions you can answer as you choose, but vague is better, or humorous.

I know a pharmacist who tells women that he is drug dealer. This gets way better reaction than “I’m a pharmacist.” Boring. Anything but straightforward. The goal is to be different. When women do this they are called “coy.” When men do it they are enthralling and engaging. When the conversation is flowing nicely, you politely leave with a “…nice talking with you,” “see you later,” or whatever feels right to you. The point is to end it early.

As the famous saying goes:

> Always leave them wanting more.

This is far better than a tit-for-tat straightforward exchange of information and facts. While productive and economical, this type of engagement will not distinguish you from anyone else or make you any more riveting than a banner scrolling beneath a newscaster. The point of soft game is to elevate yourself in her eyes.

Don’t be boring

Why Bother, If You’re Married?

Everyone wants to feel better about themselves, and soft game will help you get there. Done correctly, all you’re doing is having captivating conversations with women you are already going to be talking to. Your conversations will have something “extra” that’s indefinable to any observer, but you know that you are intentionally making yourself more engrossing and, therefore, attractive.

Your wife will probably notice this (mine did) and will likely become more attracted to you, too. This is due to a similar effect as pre-selection. With pre-selection, women are more attracted to you because a taken man is more valuable. With soft game, your wife becomes more attracted to you because she notices that other women seem to be more interested in you. You have become more valuable. She has what they want, and they can’t have you.

Nobody expects their house to burn down, but they get fire insurance, even if the house is paid off and the bank doesn’t require it. The same goes with car insurance. Prenuptial agreements are just a fancy way of saying divorce insurance. Similarly, soft game keeps you ready in the event that your good marriage turns bad or, God forbid, you become a widower. After an appropriate period, you’ll be back in the game for real, and your soft game can easily be escalated into real game.

Additionally, by then you’ll have established a huge network of friends on Facebook, LinkedIn, or whatever social media you use (I don’t belong to any, but I have been asked hundreds of times for my info). These women already find you interesting and valuable due to pre-selection. In no time at all you’ll be back, because you were never completely out.

Soft game has been an integral part of my life for many years, and it can be a part of your life, too. My wife loves it when women half my age ask for my Facebook or eyeball me from across the room. Trust me, it's not my looks. The "rules" are simple: drop bait, be vague, change the subject, talk about her, and end it early.

With practice, you will gain self esteem and confidence if you don't already have enough. You will have much more interesting conversations with women that you are already talking to anyway. Your perceived value will increase, making you more attractive. You will feel better, which will permeate throughout other areas of your life. Lastly, in the unlikely event that you find yourself single, you will have the confidence to effortlessly transition into your new life whenever you are ready.

Read Next: Don't Stop Running Game In Long-Term Relationships

Understanding The “Degenerate Triad” Of Irrationalism, Emotionalism, And Symbolism

August 21, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Much ado has been made about the supposed “left-right” cultural divide. More recently, the divide has been explained in terms of genetics. The origins of the “culture war,” some people say, lie in the populating of the North and South of the United States by people from different parts of England, with those same parts having gone to war in the civil wars that rocked that country in the 17th century. The descendants of those warring populations, housed in their regional homelands, would roughly overlap in America’s civil war. So a case can be made that these are the origins of today’s “culture war,” with ideology only the projection of genetics.

But this viewpoint might be too constraining. More and more former constituents like Dave Rubin and Bret Weinstein (the Evergreen college professor hunted by the mob on that campus) are turning against the left and I remain convinced that adherence to “social justice” is mostly fueled by a desire for status. “Social justice” thus moves forward as a ghost in a machine, not by its own merits, which only the activist class really believes in. Hard genetic categorization may be a stretch too far.

Instead, the biggest left/right divide that I can see is in terms of language and information processing. Words, labels, and images control behavior far more than any kind of contemplative thought process, with leftists succumbing to this to a larger degree than their more conservative counterparts. Specifically, leftists process information in terms of what Roosh V Forum veteran AnonymousBosch calls “irrationalism, emotionalism, and symbolism."

A Tale of Contrasts

As August began, President Trump introduced something that was vitally important to his most ardent supporters – an overhaul of the dated legal immigration system to favor skills and an inflow that protects American workers. The predictable opposition began that day, but it was drawn along two lines that showed a clear divide in thinking and information processing.

For instance, Senator Jeff Flake (R-AZ) came out against the proposal, saying the cut in the rate of immigration would be detrimental to economic growth, and that "conservatives welcome immigrants."

I can't find the video, unfortunately, but note that the label "conservative" is to a large degree controlling his thinking. Even so, paired with it is a reason why he thinks the proposal would be bad. Jeff Flake may be a contemptible, out of touch pussy, but at least he has a real world argument for his self-professed beliefs.

On the flip side was perhaps the fake news media's biggest attention whore, CNN's Jim Acosta.

Note that Acosta had zero reasons for his position in his diatribe. It was all irrationalism, emotionalism, and symbolism.

The symbolism came with Acosta's processing of the issue through the Statue of Liberty and that poem that was added later. This led directly to the emotionalism surrounding it, with Acosta giving away the game by pondering aloud whether the RAISE Act was some kind of attempt to ethnically engineer who could come in – namely "can only people from Britain or Australia come in?"

This brings us to the third leg of the "degenerate triad" – the irrationalism that came when Acosta thought that only those two countries speak the English language, even though millions of people from every continent (Nigeria and India particularly come to mind), speak English as a matter of second nature, if it wasn't their first language to begin with.

How leftists view the RAISE Act – a literal representation.

This is why Miller's attempts at rebuttal, in my opinion, fell short. Don't get me wrong, he did a great job, but he could have been more persuasive. If it were me, instead of responding with "cosmopolitan bias" (a term that almost no one will understand and that will certainly not be processed by those thinking along the lines of the "degenerate triad," as Acosta showed), I would have probably said something like, "What are you Jim, some kind of racist? Do you think that only people from Britain and Australia are capable of speaking English?"

Not only is this a more potent attack and a better display of frame control, but more crucially for this post, it communicates with the leftist in his own language – irrationalism, emotionalism, and symbolism. In many respects, you have to communicate with leftists in their own language to stump them.

Talking Past Each Other?

When I said "communicate in their own language," I really meant it. In many respects it does seem as though the left and right not only have political differences, or perhaps even genetic ones, but communicate in a different language using the same words. This is why so often it's said that the two sides are "talking past each other." They might just be, literally.

This is why to make the most of your meme-ing efforts, you have to recognize this "degenerate triad." I would argue that a huge part of why the traditional conservatism of the past 50 years has been such a failure at conserving anything is because it often actively seeks to avoid the "degenerate triad," but in doing so, it isn't as engaging to the public, and allows the left to push forth their narrative unimpeded because it can't respond to language it doesn't understand. If the fake news media is going to be reporting in narratives, you have to communicate with those narratives to have a decent shot at disrupting the bad reporting. Facts are only secondary.

Trump consciously or unconsciously knows how to speak to the "degenerate triad." The result is that the left constantly gets triggered, melts down, and is forced to be reactive, rather than proactive. It allows Trump to dominate control of the narrative and ultimately make the left look like idiots with nothing to offer besides being anti-Trump, partially because he has become the symbol of evil incarnate to them, forcing them to "resist" no matter how bad it ultimately makes them look.

This has been a year that's seen leftists and their media propaganda apparatus whitewashing jihad coming from the lips of Linda Sarsour, ignoring, as much as possible, Antifa riots and an attempt at mass assassination on Republican congressional leaders, and generally excusing as much violence and violent overtures as possible, all because Trump is the ultimate symbol of evil to them.

The face that launches a thousand ships of triggered leftists…daily

This streak was of course broken by the disaster in Charlottesville, which stemmed in large part because the idiots in that march both failed to understand the power that symbolism holds for their opponents and at the same time were motivated by the same degenerate triad that the "social justice" left is. As Samseau put it:

> The optics were indeed terrible when you use images of the worst sorts of racists imaginable. Nazi and KKK imagery is pathetic beyond words.
>
> Imagine if this rally had been done by Christians; organized with Cross imagery, asking for fair treatment for Whites. Then the antifa comes in and attacks White Christians. That would have been fantastic optics. Instead we now have to defend vile and repugnant people's first amendment rights. The fact is, MANY of these WN's are no different than SJW's who will never listen or reason with you. They > will tune you out or call you names. Go to WN boards and speak with them if you don't believe me.

Not a word of this passage is incorrect. To Antifa, the symbolism Samseau mentioned would still be evil, which would trigger irrational and emotional responses, almost programming them to attack like robots…but it would certainly alienate the general public, again. Yet, because a merry band of Nazis decided to come out and cosplay in Charlottesville with their own symbols that were so important to them, Antifa now got to be the heroes in the fake news media, even though, as Trump said, both sides were essentially worthless thugs that deserve each other.

The lesson is clear: understand the language of irrationalism, emotionalism, and symbolism. It's especially imperative when communicating with the left, and indeed, protecting yourself from their violent antics, which will get worse.

Read Next: How To Use The "Agree And Amplify" Tactic To Combat Degenerate Leftists

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

What’s So Bad About A Global Religion?

August 21, 2017 | by Michael Witcoff | Link | Original Link

Peace and grace to you all from the Lord Jesus Christ. I hope that, in these trying times, you are able to find some semblance of optimism and joy.

This past week was particularly difficult for those of us in the United States who hold the First Amendment in high esteem, and it can be very difficult to maintain hope when it seems like our nation is crashing down around us. And yet, the spring of living water does not ever stop flowing, and in Him we may find the security for which we seek and strive.

As most of the audience is probably aware, part of the New World Order’s plan for global government also calls for global religion. This one-world religion, with its foundation in such books as Alice Bailey’s Externalization Of The Hierarchy, can sound appealing at first glance. After all, the idea of everyone living together in harmony—worshiping God and treating our neighbors well regardless of our upbringing—is certainly a pleasant thought to entertain.

However, there is more going on than meets the eye, and in today’s article, I’d like to address the topic of spiritual warfare and expose a bit of the enemy’s playbook. It is important (and often difficult) to remember that in our dealing with political enemies, we are not actually competing against human beings.

Paul writes in Ephesians 6:12, “For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms.”

This is the only war that matters.

It's as true today as it was 2,000 years ago that spirits use human beings as vessels by which to carry out their will. In the case of the demonic spirits which animate the enemies of God and truth, there is a relatively small number of ways by which they can enter a human being and subvert that human's will in order to carry out their own agenda.

I'm only going to discuss one of those ways today, but first I must define what the enemy's agenda actually is. Keeping in mind that all demonic spirits are simply minions of the enemy, their goal is to manifest Hell on Earth. They desire power and control, and they feed on chaos and pain. The more chaos and pain they can cause in human affairs, the stronger they become and the worse things get for us in the physical realm.

The one and only thing in their way of complete dominion of the physical realm is the group of human beings who are "spiritually sealed" against their influence by the blood of Christ. This being the case, demonic spirits know that their best chance for becoming manifest on Earth is to draw the minds and hearts of human beings away from Jesus Christ. With that accomplished, it is a very easy task for them to subtly take control.

Therefore, they disguise themselves in a number of ways in order to achieve this end. They do not simply show up as demons and tell you to let them in, as this would "give away the game." Instead, they promise equality, liberty, fraternity and other lies which sound inspiring but lead to destruction. As Paul writes in 2 Corinthians 11:14, "Satan himself masquerades as an angel of light."

Like this, and probably carrying a rainbow flag for good measure.

In a sense, the enemy tells the same lie today as he did in the beginning: "I'm here to make you powerful and free!" He told Eve she would "become like God," and that's not so different from some of his many forms even today. Remember that these spirits have been around far longer than human beings. As such, they know all of our weaknesses and temptations both as a species and individually.

Therefore, you may be sure that Satan will take the form most personally appealing to you when he's trying to pull you away from Christ. For many people in the modern world, they want to believe in "diversity, inclusivity, and tolerance." One of his favorite tricks in today's culture is trying to put all religions on "equal footing." People inspired by the enemy's minions will tell you "it's all the same," "it all leads to the same place," or perhaps the classic "one Light, many paths."

I was deceived by this for a long time myself, so I know quite well how seductive these ideas can sound. But in the end, they are lies. The people spreading them don't consciously realize they're lying—and very likely believe they are on the right side of history—but that's because their minds have been twisted and tricked by the spirits possessing and using them.

If demons can get people to believe that all religions lead to the same place, all it does is weaken belief in Christ as the only means by which to be sealed against them. It's not a complicated trick, it's just a very subtle one. As to whether there's any truth to the "equality" of all these different belief systems, Christ Himself already answered that question. He tells us in John 14:6, "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me." All who have been Born-Again know the absolute truth and power of this statement. Those not sealed against demonic influence are easy targets, and it is against these easy targets that we are currently fighting.

If you want to win this war, realize it will not be won on the ground. As you have seen this week, the enemy has all the money and temporal power. Instead, realize that the spirits animating our political enemies are powerless against the blood of Christ and His spiritual soldiers. By believing in the Gospel and sealing yourself against demonic influence, you become one less puppet of the enemy and one more point of power by which the angels may operate. Remember that the Enemy does not need worship to win; he only needs you not to worship God.

Outside of the New Testament, my highest book recommendation for making yourself into a soldier of God is the Jack Sparks translation of Victory In The Unseen Warfare. It is simple, straightforward, powerful and transformative.

The more people across Planet Earth are sealed by the blood of Christ, the fewer portals wicked spirits can use to enter our realm. That is why the Enemy's single greatest fear is a united global Christian Church, by which I mean no more than a united body of believers in Jesus Christ.

So to wrap up today's essay, allow me to answer the original question of "What's so bad about a global religion?" The answer is "nothing." So long as it's the one that Jesus Christ preached.

Read More: The 21 Theses Of Alt-Christianity

Michael Witcoff
Michael is a Christian, a copywriter, an author, and a marketing consultant. He believes the West is experiencing divine wrath for turning our backs on God, and that the only hope for salvation is to unite under one faithful banner as our enemies have under theirs.

There Is No Sex Equality When It Comes To Civilizational Contributions

August 22, 2017 | by Ryan Campbell | Link | Original Link

Recently we had another one of those cringe-worthy clickbait responses to some troll or random Internet nobody as Steve Adler, the mayor of Austin, Texas replied to an angry email from some dude who was upset about those women-only Wonder Woman screenings (which by the way, may have been illegal).

Regardless, a women-only, trigger-warned, safe space screening should be met with eye-rolling and mockery by any healthy man (and woman for that matter). Instead this guy got triggered himself, saying in part,

> Achievements by the second rate gender pale in comparison to virtually everything great in human history was accomplished by men, not women. If Austin does not host a men only counter event, I will never visit Austin and will welcome its deterioration.

Then came Mayor Adley's "absolutely epic response."

> I am writing to alert you that your email account has been hacked by an unfortunate and unusually hostile individual. Please remedy your account's security right away, lest this person's uninformed and sexist rantings give you a bad name. After all, we men have to look out for each other!

Barf.

The next part merits a bit of a closer inspection though.

> Can you imagine if someone thought that you didn't know women could serve in our combat units now without exclusion?

Can you imagine if someone didn't know that women make up only 14.6 percent of the military, 2.3 percent of combat deaths and there's an odd tendency for pregnancies to skyrocket right before deployment into a hostile region?

> What if someone thought you didn't know that women invented medical syringes, life rafts, fire escapes, central and solar heating, a war-time communications system for radio-controlling torpedoes that laid the technological foundations for everything from Wi-Fi to GPS, and beer?

Okay, I know there are a bunch of often contradictory stories about who invented what, but let's go with the mainstream view here and run down the list.

- Medical Syringe – Adler is referring to Letitia Mumford Geer, who patented a "one-hand operated syringe that is the basis for most modern medical syringes." Or at least that's what her 30 word Wikipedia page says. In fact, there are 10 different figures listed on the Wikipedia page regarding the invention of the syringe. Nine of the ten entries—including Charles Pravaz and Alexander Wood, who developed a medical hypodermic syringe in 1853—are men.
- Life Raft – Congrats to Maria Beasley for patenting "two improved life raft designs." [Bold mine]
- Central and Solar Heating – Maria Telkes "worked on solar energy technology" and "is known for creating the first thermoelectric power generator in 1947… designing the first solar heating system for the Dover Sun House… and the first thermoelectric refrigerator." That's some good work Maria, albeit a bit specific. Anyways, I should note that Augustin Mouchot and his glorious mustache invented the earliest known solar-powered engine.
- A War-Time Communications System for Radio-Controlling Torpedoes – If you need to be this specific, you know you're really reaching. Anyways, this refers to Hedy Lamarr, but the story is a bit more complex than Adley leaves you to believe,

  > During World War II, Lamarr learned that radio-controlled torpedoes, which could be important in the naval war, could easily be jammed, thereby causing the torpedo to go off course. With the knowledge she had gained about torpedoes from her first husband, she came up with the idea of somehow creating a frequency-hopping signal that could not be tracked or jammed. She contacted her friend, composer and pianist George Antheil, to help her develop a device for doing that, and he succeeded by synchronizing a miniaturized player-piano mechanism with radio signals. They drafted designs for the frequency-hopping system which they patented. [Bold mine again]

This “laid the technological foundations” for GPS and WiFi? I guess it did, along with many, many, many other things. And of course, Roger Easton (GPS) and Vic Hayes (WiFi) should get the most of the credit (although there were plenty of other men involved for each).

- Beer – Oh for fuck’s sake… Apparently the author Jane Peyton made the case that beer was invented by women. But beer dates back into prehistory, possibly as far back as 9500 BC. So honestly, we have as good an idea about who invented beer as we do about who invented fire. (Other than we can probably assume it was men in both cases.)

Back to our intrepid mayor…

> And I hesitate to imagine how embarrassed you’d be if someone thought you were upset that a private business was realizing a business opportunity by reserving one screening this weekend for women to see a superhero movie.

And imagine how embarrassed you would be if people read this and wondered why you were spending all this time responding to some random email in a way that might get you picked up by Upworthy rather than actually doing your job as mayor of a large city.

The Male Contribution To Civilization

We hear much about how “there would be no war if women were in charge” and “toxic masculinity” and about some great female accomplishment that we undervalue and so on. We hear endlessly about how we owe this or that to women. One of many such examples would be Stephen Colbert bloviating that, “Did you know that the first computer, ENIAC, was programmed by six female mathematicians? If it weren’t for those pioneering women, we might not have computers at all.”

Is anyone stupid enough to actually believe that we wouldn’t have computers if it weren’t for women’s contribution? It’s incredible how people delude themselves into believing this or the overhyped contribution of Catherine Johnson to NASA or that Ada Lovelace inspired the modern computer or many other such myths.

Indeed, it reminds me of this old meme:

And the male response:

Normally, common decency and politeness would demand we let the wildly disproportionate male contribution go unmentioned. But with all the anti-male hysteria and pandering to the rare female contribution to the highest echelons of society, the record needs to be set straight.

Indeed, the male contribution to science is overwhelming. On the website ScienceHeroes.com, it makes the claim that science has saved the lives of over 5.34 billion people. And while such numbers are difficult to measure, they are certainly defensible. Those it credits with saving over a billion are two teams:

- Fritz Haber and Carl Bosch (synthetic fertilizer): 2,720,000,000 lives saved
- Karl Landsteiner and Richard Lewisohn (blood transfusions): 1,094,000,000 lives saved

Those four men alone have possibly saved more lives than the total that have died in every war in recorded history. The site has the top 105 scientists listed. So I calculated the male and female numbers. For teams, I gave credit to each scientist for the proportional number of lives their invention is estimated to have saved. Here's the final tally:

- Men: 98 Scientists, 5,534,198,714 lives saved
- Women: 7 Scientists, 50,578,286 lives saved
- Ratio: Scientists – 14 to 1, Lives Saved – 109 to 1

If you think of the truly world-changing inventions, basically all of them were by men:

- Printing Press (Johannes Gutenberg)
- Steam Engine (Thomas Newcomen and James Watt)
- Light Bulb (Thomas Edison)
- Airplane (The Wright Brothers)
- Computer (Allen Turing and others)
- Internet (Tim Berners-Lee and others)

Sorry Hollywood, men did this.

Charles Murray actually took up the task of categorizing the great achievers between 800 BC and 1950 in his book Human Accomplishment. He used a historiometric study, which analyzes the space devoted to each individual in neutral history texts. In all, he comes up with 4002 significant figures in the fields of sciences, medicine, technology, philosophy, music, art and literature. Of those, only 88, or 2.2 percent are women.

Were women just left out? Unlikely. Murray reviews books on women in science and finds no entries that should have been included in his own analysis but were missed by the mainstream sources.

The highest scoring woman was Murasaki Shikibu, who came in third in Japanese literature. Marie Curie is the second highest ranking woman, who comes in 14th in physics (which is actually behind her rarely-mentioned husband Pierre, who placed 10th).

As far as Nobel prizes go, Murray again,

> In the first and second halves of the century respectively, women won four and seven prizes in the sciences, and five and four prizes in literature. In percentage terms, their proportion decreased marginally.

That's 4% of the prizes (not including the peace prize, which men have won disproportionately as well) from 1900 to 1950 and 3 percent from 1951 to 2000. That should put to rest the idea that the only reason men have achieved more is because of discrimination. Is anyone arguing there was more discrimination against women in the second half of the 20th century than the first?

Not a single woman had won the Nobel Prize in Economics until 2009 and none had won the Fields medal in Mathematics until 2014.

Murray's review leaves out significant figures in economics, architecture and engineering, business, politics and the military, but we can expect that the results would be similar. Indeed, whether good or bad, progress is almost always pushed by men. Of all the religions that have come about, for all their virtues and faults, virtually all have been started by men. From Abraham to Jesus, Mohammed and Joseph Smith, to Zarathustra and Siddhartha Gautama. The only noteworthy exception is Mary Baker Eddy, who started the Christian Science denomination of Christianity. I guess Wicca was started by women too, particularly Doreen Valiente.

The great secular thinkers, from Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Seneca, Kant, Locke, Hume and Descartes to Confucius, Lao Tzu, Adi Sankara and Ibn Khaldun were, of course, almost all men.

The greatest statesmen (many of whom were, of course, not so great), from Cyrus the Great to Julius Caesar to Charlemagne to Tokugawa Leyasu to George Washington to Winston Churchill were, quite obviously, men.

Virtually every major business from Standard Oil and U.S. Steel to Microsoft and Google were founded by men. Only 14 of the 100 richest people in the United States are women. Most of those were from inheritance (particularly through Sam Walton or James Cox's fortune) or marriage. Some became big players in company's their father started, such as Abigail Johnson. But only one started the business from the ground up, Marian Ilitch, who started Little Caesar's Pizza with her husband Michael. And when you look back in history, it is even more one-sided.

Wealth creation is predominantly the field of men. Indeed, as of January, 2017, women made up only 28 of the CEO's for companies in the S&P 500. In other words, 5.6 percent, a fact that feminists endlessly complain about.

Much the same could be said for charities. The largest charity in the United States is the United Way, which was founded by four men and one woman. Of the remaining top ten biggest charities, seven were started by men, one by three women (Boys and Girls Club for America) and the Salvation Army was started by William and Catherine Booth.

Rolling Stone's list of 100 greatest musicians of all time includes 10 women and two bands with both men and women. The rest are all men. Is that just because The Rolling Stone—the magazine that published the most blatant rape hoax since Tawana Brawley—is misogynistic? I'll let you decide. I didn't feel the need to count for their list of the 100 greatest guitarists. Their list of top 50 comics is, despite pretty blatant political correctness (Wanda Sykes makes the list), still mostly male.

A brief perusal through the National Inventors Hall of Fame list of inductees shows the vast majority of their inductees have been men too. All 100 of the directors of the AFI's Top 100 movies selected in 2007 movies were men. Three quarters of the Pulitzer Prizes for nonfiction between 1995 and 2014 went to men and even in 2011, 64 percent of the prizes for journalism. The architect of the Burj Khalifia—the tallest building in the world—was Adrian Smith. The number two spot goes to the Chinese man Jun Xia. David Childs was the architect for the Freedom Tower, which is the tallest building in the United States.

A bit phallic, but incredibly impressive nonetheless

The vast majority of such architects were men. As were the engineers who have designed and overseen many of the world's most magnificent wonders, from things like Parthenon in the ancient world to things like the Chunnel today.

And of course, it was almost exclusively men who built those buildings along with most everything else. This stretches back to prehistory when men did the hunting, shelter-building and defending. Today, we shouldn't overlook the average man, who dominate in professions such as construction, maintenance and engineering that hold up the infrastructure of society as well as other critical professions such as doctor, entrepreneur and firefighter. On the other hand, women mostly work in the helping and caring professions that often mimic motherhood (and sometimes partially replace it, such as in the case of daycare workers).

Returning to the pioneers, we find that the beginning of jazz is often attributed to Buddy

Bolden. We don't know who invented the Blues, but all of its early founders, from Robert Johnson to W.C. Handy were men. Rock is credited to Chuck Berry. Rap to DJ Koll Herc.

James Naismith invented basketball, Abner Doubleday invented baseball, Walter Camp invented football, James Creighton invented hockey and a bunch of ancient Athenians, almost certainly male, started the original Olympics.

The highest a woman has ever ranked in the FIDE World Rankings of chess grandmasters is eighth. And despite Serena Williams complaining that John McEnroe's claims she'd be ranked around "700" in men's tennis, Williams and her sister got obliterated by Karsten Braasch, who ranked 203rd in men's tennis at the time. And for all that talk about how the U.S. women's soccer team is underpaid, well, it did lose to a 15-year old boys team 5-2. Indeed, across the board, female individual athletic records are about that of a 14 or 15 year boys.

You could go on and on into all sorts of things.

Women are by no means useless. They are critical for raising children, taking care of the home, inspiring and helping their husbands and generally cause less violence and mayhem then men do. But the endless feminist propaganda has obscured the truth and rendered the male sex as being somewhere between useless and evil in many people's minds. Such blatant fallacies, along with the virtue signaling of mayor Adley and the like, needs to be put to rest.

The male contribution to civilization is almost incalculable and certainly indispensable.

Read More: How To Restore Civilization By Following St. Benedict's Example

Ryan Campbell
A simple apostate from modernity who takes pleasure in pointing out blatant leftist hypocrisy, mocking SJW nonsense and a little thought-criminality from time to time.

Daily Stormer Is The First Website To Be Banned From The Internet For Its Speech

August 22, 2017 | by Jimbo Jones | Link | Original Link

Years from now, the "Unite the Right" event in Charlottesville, Virginia may be remembered—oh so ironically—as a digital rights Kristallnacht. And it may have turned Daily Stormer owner Andrew Anglin, of all people, into the 21st century's greatest free expression martyr.

The motor vehicle death of Heather Heyer immediately became a culture war flashpoint, and The Daily Stormer (for those late to the party, it's a satirical website that the mainstream media labels as "neo-Nazi," "anti-semitic" and "white supremacist," among other arbitrary, self-serving descriptors) became quite possibly the first 100 percent "legal" website kicked off the Internet for "muh feelings." Shortly after an article calling Heyer a "fat slut" was posted on the Stormer, both GoDaddy and Google announced they would no longer host owner Andrew Anglin's site. And that's when things got very interesting.

When Anglin and pals tried to register a site on the .wang domain, the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN)—an international I.P. manager enacted by a memorandum of understanding with the U.S. Dept. of Commerce—quickly yanked The Daily Stormer off the Web again. The website went live shortly thereafter on the .ru domain, but was seemingly crippled by a DDoS attack when Cloudflare (whose owner called Anglin and associates "assholes" in a memo to his employees) abruptly suspended their paid services to the Stormer.

A stay at the .lol domain was similarly short-lived, with the Stormer getting booted off the platform in mere hours. With nowhere else to go, Anglin and crew were forced to host the website on the Dark Web, a decision which drew condemnation from The Tor Project, an organization that's apparently peachy keen with its product being used for drug running, child porn, and literal slave trafficking, but absolutely aghast that some people might use it to say racial slurs and criticize the Jews.

Effectively, Anglin was banned from the Internet—that horrid goulash of pedophilia, scat videos and ISIS snuff films that it is—for somehow being too offensive. Considering his anti-diversity, anti-globalization rancor so utterly repugnant (read: oppositional to their own political ideals), the entire Silicon Valley empire organized a coordinated effort to bar a specific human being from expressing his opinions to the world at large.

Andrew Anglin – the first man in history to get banned from the Internet simply for saying unpopular things.

Thoughtcrime: From Fiction To Reality

While a few organizations (namely, the Electronic Frontier Foundation) have stood behind Anglin, both civil liberties watchdogs and the tech industry as a whole have said little about the chilling effects established by the Daily Stormer case (even though Cloudflare CEO Matthew Prince himself touched upon the ominous precedent-setting, stating "I woke up in a bad mood and decided that someone shouldn't be allowed on the Internet … No one should have that power" in the very same internal memo that excoriated Anglin's "hate speech.")

I reflect on the early 1990s, when the equation was flipped around. Then, the hardcore right-wing fundamentalists were hell-bent on silencing rap groups like 2 Live Crew (sample lyric: "because I'd stick my dick in and it would get stuck, the girls would say 'stop!' I'd say 'I'm not!'") and shutting down museums that showed the anal fisting "artwork" of Robert Mapplethorpe in the name of wholly subjective, intangible principles such as “decency” and “family values.” While the ACLU and other alleged First Amendment proponents were quick to rush to the defense of unpopular, controversy-courters who got federal endowments to drop crucifixes in buckets of piss, the supposedly freedom-loving left is nowhere to be seen when it comes to defending the free expression of today’s countercultural right.

Indeed, the ACLU recently came out and announced that they don’t believe the First Amendment applies to so-called “white supremacists seeking to incite or engage in violence” – an oddly-worded policy shift that not only rejects the First-Amendment reaffirming Supreme Court ruling in Brandenburg v. Ohio, but seems to advocate an ideology-driven smell test for the “merit” of one’s free expression.

Funny how the ACLU never released a statement disavowing the free expression rights of black supremacists seeking to incite and engage in violence after Ferguson was torched to the ground or after 17-year-old Brian Ogle was nearly beaten to death, nor did they release a statement disavowing the right to assembly of leftist factions seeking to incite and engage in violence after Antifa attacked Trump supporters in California, Missouri, Chicago and in more than 50 other cities in the U.S. since 2016, no?

The plight of The Daily Stormer is but one example of the ideological censorship writ large demonstrated by Silicon Valley’s tech titans. We see such in Google’s termination of James Damore, YouTube’s jihad against “hate speech” (complete with the deputization of user-generated Red Guards), the removal of Gab from Google Play and the increasingly despotic policies of Twitter and Facebook. And as the un-personing of Andrew Anglin indicates, the free expression-squelching power of these tech heavies continues to increase.

If a website that is 100 percent legal under the Constitution can be scrubbed from the Web altogether for ideological reasons, what’s stopping ISPs from blocking users from accessing the Internet at all—or real banks from stopping electronic payments—based simply on the fact they don’t like what somebody is saying online? Such examples sound preposterous now, but up until a few days ago, so did the idea of tech companies blocking an entire website from the Internet simply because they wanted to virtue signal.

U.N. Report Declares Internet Access a Human Right

SHARE

U.N. REPORT DECLARES INTERNET ACCESS A HUMAN RIGHT

A United Nations report said Friday that disconnecting people from the internet is a human rights violation and against international law.

The report railed against France and the United Kingdom, which have passed laws to remove accused copyright

Too bad the U.N. forgot to send the memo to Google and GoDaddy…

The New Free Speech War

If nothing else, The Daily Stormer brouhaha lets us know two things about contemporary society. Number one, the left is no longer the vanguard of free expression and, in fact, have become obsessed with eliminating any ideologies that run counter to their pro-diversity, pro-globalization, pro-multiculturalism religion. And secondly, modern free speech is no longer a story of the state against the citizen, but the technological infrastructure against the user. A recent statement from Richard Spencer printed in The Washington Post is well worth quoting in full:

> Doofuses in the conservative movement say it's only censorship if the government does it … YouTube and Twitter and Facebook have more power than the government. If you can't host a website or tweet, then you effectively don't have a right to free speech. Social networks need to be regulated in the way the broadcast networks are. I believe one has a right to a Google profile, a Twitter profile, an accurate search … We should start conceiving of these thing as utilities and not in terms of private companies.

It's a strange predicament, to be sure, considering the United Nations has already declared several edicts (all unenforceable, naturally) that favor Anglin's right to Internet usage as a god-given human right. From Frank LaRue's 2011 UN Special Rapporteur report, presented before the UN Human Rights Council:

> The special rapporteur considers cutting off users from Internet access, regardless of the justification provided, including on the grounds of violating intellectual property rights laws, to be disproportionate and thus a violation of > article 19, paragraph 3 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

And if that doesn't give Anglin enough support, try this 2016 non-binding resolution, in which the UN declares the intentional disruption of citizens' internet access as a direct violation of article 19 of the UN's Universal Declaration of Human Rights:

> The UN affirms the same rights people have offline must also be protected online, in particular freedom of expression, which is applicable regardless of frontiers and through any media of one's choice.

Apparently, nobody sent Google, GoDaddy, Cloudflare or any of the other platforms that considered Andrew Anglin persona non grata a memo letting them know that, according to the United fuckin' Nations, they were actually committing bona fide human rights violations by denying him services.

Coming soon to the U.S., courtesy of Facebook and Twitter?

An Ominous Future

You don't need a crystal ball to see where such ideologically-driven tech principles will lead us. Indeed, the fate of Chinese citizens—whose online behavior is monitored, recorded and used as deal makers and deal breakers for loans under the Sesame Credit system—may one day be the norm in our neck of the woods as well. Think it's crazy to believe that, one day, Facebook and Twitter could turn over our user data to banks and our allegiance or non-conformity to the populist tide could determine our fiscal well being? It's already happening in Beijing, and what Constitutional safeguards are in place now that could prevent it from happening in Berkeley?

Andrew Anglin and The Daily Stormer are easy targets. Of course no one in the mainstream media or big business will rush to their defense. But what's happening to them very well could be a fate that befalls each and every one of us. As painfully ironic as it may be, perhaps nothing sums up the inherent danger of Anglin's de-personing more than a slight rephrasing of Martin Niemoller's most famous poem.

First, they came for the neo-Nazis and I did not speak out, because I was not a neo-Nazi.

Then, they came for the alt-lite and I did not speak out, because I was not the alt-lite.

Then, they came for the moderate conservatives and I did not speak out, because I was not a moderate conservative.

And then they came for me, because there was no one left to speak for me.

Read More: Southern Poverty Law Center Sues "Anti-Semitic" Blogger In Federal Court For $300,000

Jimbo Jones
Jimbo Jones is a nihilist ... but he's the nicest nihilist you'll ever meet.

Hollywood Male Actors Deserve To Be Paid More Than Female Actresses

August 22, 2017 | by Maximus King | Link | Original Link

According to Forbes' World's Highest-Paid Actress list, Emma Stone made $26 million between June of 2016 and 2017. Jennifer Aniston came in second at $25.5 million. Emma made the bulk of this money from her Academy Award winning performance in the highly-acclaimed musical La La Land, which grossed $445 million worldwide.

Should actors make more?

It hasn't always been so rosy at the top for Ms. Stone. Earlier this year, she was involved in some controversy over equal pay. In an Out magazine interview, she stated:

> In my career so far, I've needed my male co-stars to take a pay cut so that I may have parity with them. And that's something they do for me because they feel it's what's right and fair.

Jennifer Lawrence, last year's biggest female earner ($46 million) has had similar trouble in her career. She found out during the Sony hacks that she was making less than her male counterparts in American Hustle. She, at least, took responsibility by blaming her own poor negotiating skills.

Should Emma Stone, or any actress, make as much as their male costars? More importantly, Should male actors be taking pay cuts in order to give their female colleagues equal pay? Let's investigate.

I'm a poor negotiator

The Women

Here's a list of the remaining top 10 highest paid Hollywood actresses and what they earned between June of 2016 and 2017:

3. Jennifer Lawrence ($24 million)
4. Melissa McCarthy ($18 million)
5. Mila Kunis ($15.5 million)
6. Emma Watson and Charlize Theron ($14 million)
7. Julia Roberts and Cate Blanchett ($12 million)
8. Amy Adams ($11 million)

To be fair, these ladies don't all make their money from acting. Some are producers and directors. Some get residuals from hit televisions shows, and some have cosmetics deals and other lucrative ventures.

Maybe a look at their total box office will give a hint as to why these women are so highly paid. To save tedium, I'll show only at the top 5 (source: Box Office Mojo).

1. Emma Stone ($1.5 Billion)
2. Jennifer Aniston ($1.6 Billion)
3. Jennifer Lawrence ($2.5 Billion)
4. Melissa McCarthy ($1.1 Billion

5. Mila Kunis ($1.1 Billion)

Except for Jennifer Lawrence, the list makes sense: the higher the total box office, the higher the pay. Jennifer Lawrence was the highest paid actress last year, so this metric is fairly accurate. A true outlier on this list would have been Emma Watson, whose total box office is $3.2 Billion, and she is only #6 on the list, but most of her money for this list came from the billion dollar hit Beauty and the Beast.

The Men

Of course I'm number 1

Now, let's take a quick look at the Hollywood actors (From Forbes 2016 list. The 2017 list not published at the time of writing):

1. Dwayne Johnson ($64.5 million)
2. Matt Damon ($55 million)
3. Tom Cruise ($53 million)
4. Johnny Depp ($48 million)
5. Ben Affleck ($43 million)
6. Vin Diesel ($35 million)
7. Robert Downey, Jr. ($33 million)
8. Brad Pitt ($31.5 million)
9. Adam Sandler ($30 million)
10. Mark Wahlberg ($30 million)

And their total box office (Top 5)

1. Dwayne Johnson ($2.8 Billion)
2. Matt Damon ($3.2 Billion)
3. Tom Cruise ($ 3.7 Billion)
4. Johnny Depp ($ 3.5 Billion)

5. Ben Affleck ($2.3 Billion)

The top men make more money for the studios, they provide more entertainment for their audiences, and their characters are more realistic.

The men, front and center, where they belong

It's easy to name a leading male movie star: Duane Johnson, Mark Wahlberg, Vin Diesel, Tom Cruise, Robert Downey, Jr, Chris Hemsworth, Jason Statham, Daniel Craig, Channing Tatum. The names and their movies just roll off your tongue. Now quickly name some female leads: That chick in the Edge of Tomorrow movie with Tom Cruise, the Hispanic girl in the Fast movies, Tom Cruise's ex-wife in Logan Lucky (is she even a lead?). The blonde chick in Atomic Blonde.

I'm being facetious, of course, but the male leads are much easier to name because we go to see the movies because of the male leads. The box office numbers don't support moviegoers watching movies with female leads, with few exceptions.

According to the Motion Picture Association of America, the biggest demographic of moviegoers in 2016 was 18-24 year olds. Are they looking to see a woman almost as old as their moms beat up bad guys in Blonde ($48 million domestic) or a woman over twice their age play an alpha female TV producer in Money Monster ($41 million domestic)? Nope. They'd rather see week 2 of Captain America: Civil War ($408 million domestic).

The types of roles played compared to the box office numbers are telling, as well. For both sexes, I'm going to remove super hero movies, because not only do they both do well, but they are unrealistic. If I left them in, the men would still win, so let's continue.

Let's look at the biggest money making movies for the top five men and women. Emma Stone played a waitress in La La Land, a traditional female role. Jennifer Aniston's biggest movie was Bruce Almighty, a Jim Carrey leading role, in which she played a supporting role as a housewife. Jennifer Lawrence? Hunger Games: Catching Fire. Outlier. Female warrior superhero type. Melissa McCarthy scored big in Bridesmaids in a traditional female role. Finally, Mila Kunis' biggest hit was Oz the Great and Powerful, in which she played a heavy as the Wicked Witch of the West (but not the lead).

What about the men? Duane Johnson played one of the leads in Fate of the Furious, Matt Damon played the lead in The Martian, Tom Cruise played the lead in War of the Worlds, Johnny Depp played the lead in Pirates of the Caribbean: Dead Man's Chest, and Ben Affleck played the lead in Batman v Superman: Dawn of Justice.

Give us more money

So, the top women are playing supporting roles as traditional female characters in hit movies with male leads, for the most part, and the top men are playing leading roles in their own hit movies. This is actually how life should work, and the 18-24 year old audience supports that.

If you were a red pill male actor, instead of a beta white knight, would you take a voluntary pay cut, reducing your family's lifestyle, so that a female who wouldn't be in a leading role and therefore wouldn't be working as hard as you, who didn't have the audience draw that you have, so that her portion of the box office is smaller, who fewer people want to see, can get the same paycheck as you? Of course not. You would tell her to get a better agent.

Conclusion

The answer, obviously, to the headlining question is "no." Women actresses do not deserve the same pay as their far more successful male counterparts. It's not even close. Fortunately, the movie industry recognizes this and rewards the performers accordingly. If a male doesn't bring in the box office numbers, he will make less money and will eventually be out of work. That's show biz, folks.

It’s too bad that other industries have been beaten down and cucked by the liberal SJWs to the point where society has been gaslighted by the misconception that women make 76 cents for every dollar men make. Intelligent studies have shown this time and again to be untrue.

I fear that if actresses keep whining about gender equality and parity long enough, the motion picture industry will eventually buckle and we’ll be paying double for our movie tickets to see women do less work in supporting roles while making just as much as their box office generating male leading counterparts.

Read More: The Reason Female Actors Get Paid Less That Nobody Wants To Talk About

Maximus King
Maximus King is a happily married serial monogamist who believes that feminism, affirmative action, and social censorship are hurting America. He has no social media or Website or anything to sell. If you want to reach him, he might get back to you from

“When The Shoe Fits” By Osho Is A Deep Introduction To Tao

August 22, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When The Shoe Fits is a transcription of a lecture given by Osho in 1974, based on the teachings of the ancient Taoist Chuang Tzu. Osho is one of the more famous modern Taoists who achieved cult-like status among his followers. To remove suffering, he advises men to not achieve and just allow life to happen to you. This advice exists on an opposite plane when compared to what is taught within Western culture.

> And whatsoever you achieve through will always remain a burden to you; it will always be a conflict, an inner tension, and you can lose it at any moment. It has to be maintained continuously – and maintaining it takes energy, maintaining it finally dissipates you. Only that which is attained through effortlessness will never be a burden to you, and only that which is not a burden can be eternal. Only that which is not in any way unnatural can remain with you forever and forever.

When you gain something through effort, you experience a feeling of pleasure, and then must continually work so that both the gain and pleasure are maintained. If you do not maintain it, you will lose the gain and experience suffering in an equal and opposite way to the pleasure received.

If I earn $1,000,000, I will experience pleasure, but if I lose it, I will experience an equal amount of opposite suffering. Even if I don't lose the money, trying to hold onto it will cause anxiety because of the sizable fear I'll have of losing it in the future. If I go to the gym to get big muscles, I will be happy with how I look, but if I lose those muscles, I will mentally suffer whenever I look in the mirror and see a decline in my appearance. Any campaign of effort has suffering built in, because it is difficult, if not impossible, to maintain a gain for the entirety of your life.

> Every child is born in Tao, then we cripple him with society, civilization, culture, morality, religion… we cripple him from every side. Then he lives, but he is not alive.

Osho argues that if a human wasn't born in society, but raised among animals in the forest, he would have no suffering if his survival needs were met. Because he would not have any human being to compare himself to, he would have no need to compete, no need to gain power, no need to prove himself to others, and so he would exist in harmony with nature.

> Allow nature! And don't give any goal to nature. Who are you to create goals and purposes? You are just a tiny part, an atomic cell. Who are you to force the whole to move according to you?
>
> […]
>
> Look at nature, everything is so perfect. Can you improve upon a rose? Can you improve on nature in any way? Only man has gone wrong somewhere. If the rose is beautiful without any effort on its part, why not man? What is wrong with man?

Because you exist in an ignorant, flawed state, any goal you create is almost sure to create suffering since it is from a place of society instead of nature. You simply do not have the awareness or knowledge to create goals that are in harmony with your true nature, and what you may describe as "success" is—upon achievement—the beginning of a cycle of frustration or suffering.

> Meditation will only help you to understand. It will not lead you to the truth, it will only destroy the mind, so that whenever there is truth, you can see it.

Osho believes that the Buddhist ashram style of meditation is an unnatural behavior that goes against the Tao, because it attempts to put man in a blank state of "no mind." Osho does not believe in the asceticism of the Buddhists, and sees them on the opposite extreme of the hedonists. Both sides have lost balance with the Tao.

> You need a compass because you are not confident of life; you need moralities, precepts, principles, Bibles, Korans, Gitas to direct you because you are not confident of the inner force. That is your life…. So many precepts to be followed, so many principles to be managed – so many moral concepts. You have so many things imposed on you that your inner life cannot be spontaneous.

People want to be told how to live. They want an instruction booklet as if they were assembling furniture from Ikea. Scriptures are dead books—they weren't written for your environment or your situation, and must be squeezed into modern life in some way (often after being maliciously interpreted), but that still does not eliminate suffering if you follow it. Osho believes that there is no need for rigid morality if the Tao is followed, but since balance with the Tao is subjective, I see a situation where Tao alone can't prevent us from sliding into a situation of degeneracy like we have in the modern West.

> Don't be against anything. Why? Because whenever you are against anything it means that deep down you are for it, otherwise why be against it? A man who is not angry deep down will not be against anger. Why should he be? A man who is not greedy deep down will not be against greed. Why should he be against it? There is no problem for him, it is not a choice, he has not made any distinction. Remember, it is always greedy persons who are against greed, sexual persons who are against sex, angry persons who are against anger, violent persons who are against violence. Then what do they do? They create an opposite goal.

If a man becomes emotionally engaged against a cause, it's a certainty that that cause is a part of him in some way, and his emotion is a sign of either an inner guilt or deep love that his ego refuses to consciously accept. The most violent members of society today are leftist protesters who tell you they are against violence. The most sexually degenerate people of today are those who say they stand against rape. I have stated my hate for feminists in the past, and criticized their loose sexual morals, while I myself engaged in loose sexual morality with feminist-minded women. That which you hate exists within you. That which you're apathetic about does not.

> You always choose the difficult because the difficult gives you a challenge and challenge gives you the ego. Difficult is right for you; easy is never right. Because with the easy there is no conquering, the ego cannot feel fulfilled. The more difficult a task, the more the ego feels exhilarated, ecstatic. It has to be done – Everest has to be conquered, the moon has to be conquered.
>
> […]
>
> The difficult attracts. The more difficult it is, the more it attracts you. It becomes more valuable because through it, if you conquer, you will achieve a greater ego. Even if you fail, you will achieve a greater ego because you at least tried, while others have not tried at all.

I have given advice to men in the past stating that if they're faced with two options, they should do the harder one because they'll become stronger and achieve more than if they had succeeded with the easier task. Osho has me pegged in that my strategy is one of ego satisfaction, of putting in harder effort to achieve something greater. From the standpoint of Western materialism, my advice will yield more "gain."

With nonstop messages in the West of achievement and accomplishment that make doing the easy task be seen as "lazy," it's hard not to see that the entirety of the West is built upon an ego proposition, which is great for society in terms of the heights it achieves, but poor for the individual who suffers because of it.

> If you win a war and kill millions of people you make history. If you just brush your teeth in the morning how can you make history? And EASY IS RIGHT! You take a bath, and you sing a little song, how can you make history? You eat your food and you silently go to sleep without any dreams. How can you make history? No! History takes no notice of persons who are easy and natural. History takes notice of people who are mad, obsessed with something, who create trouble in some way or the other. And difficult is wrong, easy is right; be easy and don't try to be in history. Leave it for fools and mad people, you just stay out of it. Because you cannot have both.
>
> Either you can have life, or you can be remembered in history. If you have life, you will be just an easy and simple man, doing simple and small things, and enjoying them. You will not create any trouble for anybody, nobody will take any notice of you; you will exist as if you never existed. That is what easy is – existing as if you are not existing, existing as if you are not, not in anyone's way.

I want my work to leave a legacy so I slave over my computer every day, typing up a storm, like I've typed this review, and life quickly passes me by. I will have my legacy, but at what cost? What have I missed?

> Doing anything, if you feel easy doing it, it is right. If you feel uneasy doing it, something is wrong. If you are tense, it means you are living an uneasy life. If you cannot sleep, cannot relax, cannot let go, it shows you are living an uneasy life – you are after difficult things, impossible things.

If I were to take his advice, I would work just the minimum to satisfy my material needs, and then relax for most of the day. I'd go for walks, do a basic level of exercise that doesn't involve having big muscles, cook simple meals, and seek out pleasant company. Instead, I have a schedule set out for me before I wake up, meaning my day is dead before I even open my eyes. I have strategies to maximize the amount of work I do. I have exercises for my right wrist which is experiencing chronic pain due to excess computer use. I have special stretches for my lower back to combat the effects of sitting all day in front of a screen. I sacrifice my body for work and excess material gain.

> Nature is vast, and all man created laws are narrow. They are like funnels – the more you move into them the narrower they become, and a moment comes of cul-de-sac, you cannot move anywhere, and the tunnel becomes your grave. That is how everyone is stuck.
>
> […]
>
> …laws and regulations cannot protect you, they only give you a feeling of protection. But nothing protects. The laws cannot make you secure, they only give a feeling of security which is false. Death ultimately comes and shatters all your securities. You will stay trembling, fear-filled, unless you come back to the > source – the inner tower of the spirit.

Following scriptures, rules, and laws is the same as following the dictates of men before you, and what they have decided is the proper life for you to live.

> Fulfillment comes through nature – not through society. You carry your destiny within yourself but it is an unconscious thing. Follow it. Nobody else will know that you have reached but you will be aware. You may not get a Nobel prize because it has never been awarded to a fulfilled person. Nobody fulfilled has yet received a Nobel prize, no Buddha, no Jesus, and it won't happen in the future either, because the Nobel prize is given to somebody who has obeyed society very sincerely, and who has achieved society's aims – not his own. Look at the Nobel prize-winners and you will not find sadder men than those. Most of them commit suicide, and this is not accidental, it has deep meaning in it. Most of them feel unfulfilled. Prizes cannot fulfill you. Allow the conscious nature, don't force it consciously.

Society has awards in the form of money and material trophies to keep you playing the game, but winning the game is Pyrrhic, because the moment after you victory, once the cheering crowd disappears, you're disappointed that you feel no different than before.

> Be sincere to your inner nature and help others to be sincere to their inner nature. This is what I call a religious man. A religious man is one who is sincere to his inner nature and helps others to be sincere to their inner nature. You are here to fulfill your destiny, and others are here to fulfill theirs. Don't expect anything from them, otherwise you will turn them into liars. Don't expect anything from anybody, and don't fulfill others' expectations of you.

The only way to get anywhere in society is to network, build alliances, and curry favor. Scratch this man's back and maybe he'll scratch yours in the future. Pretend to be nice to that man so maybe he won't criticize you to others. At what point do we turn into actors, sacrificing who we are, for future gain that is not even necessary?

> Whenever others appreciate you – beware, you are moving on a dangerous path. Sooner or later they will punish you. When people talk about your success – beware, now failure is not far off. When they put you on the throne, escape, because sooner or later they will throw you off. But you are so foolish and stupid, that you never see the fact that somebody else was there on the throne before you. They put him there, and now, for you, they have thrown him off. Now they are garlanding and welcoming you, but sooner or later they will find another showman and they will throw you out. This happens to everybody who lives through public opinion. Don't ask for any success in the outside world and you will not have any failure. Don't ask people to respect you, then there will be no insult.

But then how will I get fame? How will I get riches? How will I feel validated that I "made it”? Most people fear the ordinary life as much as they fear falling from a high position, because they crave the adoration of the masses that allows their ego to feel that they are a somebody instead of a nobody.

> Nothing is lacking and nothing is missing. You are perfect as far as there is any possibility of perfection.
>
> […]
>
> It is difficult for you to think that at this very moment you are gods, but I ask you – what is lacking? What is missing? You are alive, breathing, conscious – what else do you need?
>
> […]
>
> If you say, ’If those conditions are fulfilled then I will be blissful’, then these conditions are never going to be fulfilled. And, secondly, even if these conditions are fulfilled, by that time you will have lost the very capacity to celebrate and enjoy. And moreover, when these conditions are fulfilled – if ever, because they cannot be fulfilled – your mind will create further ideals.

Something is always wrong with us. We’re close to an ideal but still far off. More work must be done; if we can only have this thing, or that thing, everything will be perfect, life will be complete, but imagine a carrot at the end of branch, and just after you leap up and grab the carrot, a bigger carrot suddenly appears, and the branch is moved ever so higher so that you have to work harder to get it.

> The whole is vast, you are just an atomic cell. The ocean is vast, you are just a drop in it. The whole ocean is salty, and you are trying to be sweet. It is impossible!

When you fight with the world, you fight with yourself, because you are a part of the world, a part of the whole. Everything in this world influences you in direct proportion to how you influence it, and so what you fight against is certainly already a part of you, because the part can not be separated from the whole. You are not distinct or unaffected from what you see around you.

> If you fight, then the enemy impresses you, and remember… even friends don’t have such an impact as enemies have. If you fight with someone continuously, you will be influenced by them, because you will have to use the same techniques to fight them. Ultimately, enemies become similar.

If a general wins a war, the man who he most respects will be the general of the opposing side, because he is barely different from him. The uniforms are different, but the man is the same. They’re supposed to hate each other, but instead a mutual admiration is developed.

> …when you are ready to fight at every moment, you are a coward. Fight is a cover-up. You want to prove that you are a brave man. The very wanting, the > very desire to prove, means that you are not. A man who is really wise will never in any way be searching for opportunities to prove that he is wise. A fool is always in search of a way to prove that he is wise. A man who is really in love, who has become love, will not try to prove that he is in love.

>
> […]
>
> When you think you are confident of your strength, remember well, you are hiding something from yourself. What do you mean when you say: I am confident? If you are really confident the word is meaningless. You are not confident, you are pretending. And not only to others, you are repeating to yourself: I am confident. You are creating an auto-hypnosis. If you repeat it long enough you may start feeling it but that feeling will have no inner energy in it.

To prove that I am good with women, I had to sleep with many of them, but the very fact that I needed this proof is only proof of the struggle I had with them. And then finally I did become good with women, I could sleep with them consistently enough, and then the need for proof disappeared. I become dissatisfied with my behavior and stopped. To find what out what a man is, look at what he doesn't try to prove. To find out what he isn't, look at what he is trying to prove.

> Treat all that is beautiful, good and true, just like a seed. Give it some soil, a hidden place in the heart, don't display it. But just the opposite is done by everybody: whatsoever is wrong, you hide it, you don't want it to be known by others. Whatsoever is ugly you hide and whatsoever is beautiful, even if it is not, you try to advertise it, you magnify it, you display it.

What is a first date but a grotesque display of acting? The woman shows her fleeting and transitory beauty, enhanced by makeup, clothing, and special effects, along with a politeness that will be the peak of you experience from her, and the man packs in his best jokes, statements, moves, and stories into a clown performance that he hopes is enough to get into her pants. Two actors pretend to be someone they aren't, and fall for what isn't.

> So if you want to prove something it shows that you are doubtful about it. You want to destroy your doubt through others' eyes, through their opinions. You are not really convinced of your beautiful person, you would like others to say that you are beautiful.

This piece of advice is often done in the reverse, where any positive quality must be immediately displayed, and once it is praised and talked about, the magic and beauty of it is lost, and now you race to find another trait to display to garner the same amount of praise, until you run out of displays and the audience becomes bored and moves onto someone else.

> You may go on thinking yourself a beautiful person but nobody thinks that way about you because everybody is concerned with his own beauty, not with yours.

> And if anybody nods and says, 'Yes, you are beautiful', he or she is just waiting for you to nod about his or her beauty. It is a mutual bargain: You fulfill my ego, I fulfill yours. I know well that you are not beautiful, you know well that I am not beautiful, but I fulfill your ego, so you fulfill mine.
>
> […]
>
> If you are an exhibitionist then you will remain a commodity, a thing. You can never become a person, because 'person' is hidden deep in the recesses of being. It is the deepest possibility in the whole of existence.

The most insecure people in the world are actresses and models. Their entire conception of self is based on external validation, not inner contentment or understanding. Once that validation dries up, and it always does, they are as unsure of themselves, and begin mutilating themselves with plastic surgeries to regain the praise they lost.

> You see a musician and you want to be a musician; you see an actor and you want to be an actor; you see a doctor and you want to be a doctor. You want to be everything except yourself – and that is all that you can be, nothing else. Nothing else is possible, and nobody else is like you, so nobody can become your ideal.

Western philosophy teaches you that you're a thing-becoming, not a thing that has already become. There are many parts of you that are wrong and you need to learn, strive, work, and exist in constant want to become the final thing that should instantly give you everlasting fulfillment, but this is a lie, and the goal you treasure is a dead-end because nothing external of you will give you fulfillment. You are already the thing-become.

> It is good to try to understand leaders of men because they are the great monkeys. And you think you are following them? Basically, deep down, they are following you. A leader is always a follower of his own followers because he always has to look where you are going, what you are doing. He must know beforehand where the wind is blowing so that he can be just ahead.
>
> […]
>
> There are many ways to crucify a man, crucifixion is only one. You can also put him on the throne, then too he is crucified, and in a subtler way; very non violently you kill him. Whenever you start respecting a person you have started killing him, because now he has to pay; he has to look at you – what to do, what not to do.

A leader is a victim to his own followers, because his status can immediately be revoked if his followers feel that it is in their best interest to follow someone else. The leader's talent is that he knows what his followers want before they themselves know. He comes up with a slogan that touches them deeply in their hearts, and the followers cry out in pleasure that they have found their leader, when merely they have found someone who is holding a mirror up to themselves.

> A man of Tao moves absolutely without identity. Why? Because if you show talent then people cannot forgive you. People can forgive fools, but they cannot forgive wise men. That is why Jesus was crucified, Socrates was poisoned. You feel so utterly inferior before a Jesus or a Socrates, how can you forgive them! It is natural, you will make a concerted attack. You will all make a concerted attack to kill that man. Then you will feel that a burden has been thrown.

One of the easiest ways to be liked by others is not to step on their egos. Allow them to think of you as an inferior man, a simple man, and they will not strike you down. The second you assert your superiority over them by showing virtue or talent, resentment is built, and they will wait for their opportunity to hurt you, to prove that they are not inferior to you.

> And a man who has not known his innermost being is always like a thing, always on display in the window of a shop; always waiting for somebody to come and use him with all his certificates, distinctions, talents; always crying: Come and use me, make me a thing. I am a most valuable thing, you will never get any thing better than me. Come and use me!

To be useful is to be enslaved by those who find you useful. They have expectations of you to continue being useful, and so your life becomes a mission of ensuring you are always useful, always a somebody in the eyes of others, but being this somebody is an illusion, because one day you will no longer be useful, and all the validation and attention will be removed. The illusion of your superiority will be shattered as you watch a new man receiving the admiration that you once had.

> In the spiritual world no footprints are left. It is just like the sky: a bird flies – no footprints are left, nobody can follow. Just take a delight in me, be happy with me and you will absorb. And that will become a light within you and that will show you the path. But don't copy, don't believe or disbelieve, don't be head-oriented. Don't be a monkey – be a man.
>
> […]
>
> You can know yourself only in total freedom – and rules are prisons. They are prisons because no-one else can make rules for you; he may have discovered the truth through these rules, but they were for him. Nature differs – they helped him but they will not help you; on the contrary, they will hinder you.

There is fear of being your own man, because you may fail, embarrass yourself, be hated, be seen as inferior. So men look to other men for guidance and instruction to help assure their success, but the only result is they become a copy of a copy, a man who mimics another man's life for material gain and ego gratification.

> If you are a little understanding, give others around you freedom to be > themselves and don't allow anybody to interfere with your freedom. Don't make anybody a slave to you and don't become a slave to anybody.

We rarely accept people for who they are. The second we meet a girl, we think about how she can be improved. The second we bond with another man, we think of how he can be made more useful to us to achieve our goals. We meet people and do calculations in our head about how we can extract from them, benefit from them, and they are doing the same. Friendships and relationships become mere business arrangements.

> The first thing to understand is not to take life as a question. Once you take it as a question you will be in trouble; you will have already moved on a wrong path – it will be a cul-de-sac. Somewhere, in some theory, you will be stuck. Everybody is stuck somewhere in a theory, and then it is very difficult to drop the theory. You cling to it because the question scares you – at least a theory is some consolation, at least you feel that you know.
>
> […]
>
> …life will not wait for you and your theories, it is moving fast. Soon death will happen and you will die with your theories in your hand; and they won't help, they are just dead ashes.

The first thing you do once you notice things in life is to construct a theory based on your patterns. Not only does your theory aid in your ego's need to feel superior, since you will share this theory to anyone who will listen, but it's also an attempt to alleviate the anxiety of living in a world where anything can go wrong at a moment's notice. You hope your theory will predict the future with some accuracy to keep your safe, but no theory has withstood the test of time. They all have flaws, they all have failed, and yet man will not stop at trying to construct the ultimate theory, the theory of everything, to feel that he has figured it out and is immune to the spontaneous nature of life.

> Buddha has said that when you find an old man as happy as a youth, there is something there – bow down to him, listen and learn from him. In India, it was the tradition that whenever we found an old man happy, dancing, we would make him a master.

It is very easy to be happy when you are in your prime. You're at your peak health, beauty, and physical fitness. Everything is new, with a world of experiences before you, and the daily stimulation of novelty and discovery ensures you won't get bored. But to be happy when you are old, when the river has dried up, that is something special. When your health is gone, your beauty is gone, your phallus no longer works, your muscles are atrophying, your back is crooked, your prostate is the size of an orange, and when people all around you see you as a burden, waiting impatiently for you to die; if you can be happy at that time then there must be true fulfillment within. Show me a happy old man, a man who has been tossed aside by the generations that have preceded him. He is someone I want to learn from.

> That which is caused cannot be forever; that which is uncaused can be forever. Remember that always whenever you are happy; remember… is it something uncaused or caused? If it is caused then it is better to be sad, because it is going to be taken away. It is already on the way, it has already left you – sooner or later you will realise it has gone.

Anything that makes you happy, once removed, will then cause you suffering, and if it is caused by something, it will certainly be removed. If you are ever thinking that having a person or situation in your life will bring you happiness, you are generating the energy for the suffering caused by its removal. Nothing in the material world can give fulfillment, because they will all be taken away from you. If there is something caused that makes you happy, I hope for your sake it is something simple that is hard to take away—a hot cup of tea, a breath of crisp cold air, being alone with your thoughts, a good night's sleep, or a pleasant conversation with someone you trust.

> You cannot find the answer in the past because nothing is the same today. You cannot find the answer in the past because the answer is not the thing, it always dies with the man who has discovered it. But ghosts go on haunting. Your Vedas, Korans, Bibles, Gitas, they are ghosts. They are not realities now, they are long dead.
>
> […]
>
> Whenever you are too engaged with the past you are engaged with dirt, with graves, you are a gravedigger. You live in a cemetery, you are no longer a part of the living phenomenon that life is.

If the great men of the past were alive today, would they still share the same advice and knowledge that they left? Would they have the same teachings, in spite of a different environment? It's unlikely. They were men of their times, and so we go on learning about the past and how to live in that man's time, instead of looking with our own eyes in the present.

> Needs can be fulfilled, but desires cannot be. Desire is a need gone mad. Needs are simple, they come from nature; desires are very complex, they don't come from nature. They are created by the mind. Needs are moment to moment, they are created out of life itself. Desires are not moment to moment, they are always for the future. They are not created by life itself, they are projected by the mind. Desires are projections, they are not really needs. This is the first thing to be understood, and the deeper you understand, the better. What is desire? It is movement of the mind into the future.

Most suffering in the West comes from trying to satisfy desires. The second you satisfy one, and grab the carrot from the end of the stick, the bigger carrot immediately appears. Forever you work at grabbing what's at the end of the stick, but always you feel a lack. Once you have satisfied your material needs, and reach basic comfort, you are now free to find your path, to explore life, but most people instead immediately ensnare themselves to a new desire, and keep themselves stuck in its pursuit until they die.

> Needs are beautiful; desires are ugly. Needs are bodily; desires are psychological. But look at your so-called saints and sages: they always condemn your needs and always help your desires to be projected. They say: What are you doing? Just eating? Sleeping? Wasting your life? Try to reach heaven! Heaven is the ultimate desire. Paradise is waiting for you, and you are wasting your life on ordinary things – just vegetating. Stand up and run, because there is not much time left! Reach! Knock at the door of heaven! Reach God! But don't stand there!

I've shamed men in the exact same way, particularly in my essay Thoughts On Being An Excellent Man, where I package Western ideas of ego gratification in a pompous display of telling men to essentially be like me in order to be "excellent." Your ego will have you believing that you are the most superior man in the world if you let it, better than billions of people. Who am I to tell other men what greatness or excellence in manhood is? I can only teach what I've learned about being a man, without value judgements, and no more.

> Life is dangerous, but that is the beauty of it – it is insecure, because insecurity is the very nature of movement, aliveness, vitality. The more dead you are, the more secure. When you are in your grave there will be no danger. What can happen to you anymore? Nothing! Nobody can harm you when you are dead. But when you are alive, you are vulnerable, you can be harmed. But I tell you, that is the beauty of life.

Most of what we do in life is an attempt to remove all insecurities, spontaneities, and anxieties—to make life a dead thing that will never harm or surprise us. By living safe routines, we succeed instead at deadening life while the anxieties never go away, because merely by trying to address them, you give them power over you. Kill one anxiety and another will appear, just like with desire, and so we live in cage as if we were a scared chicken, imposing artificial limits and rules just to avoid the dangers of life.

> Life is insecure! Let this truth penetrate deeper and deeper in you. Let it become a seed deep in your heart – life is insecure. It is its nature and nothing can be done about it – all that you do will be poisonous. You can only kill. And the more secure you feel, the more dead you will be. Look at people who are really secure with wealth, prestige, castles around them – you can see they are dead. Just see their faces, the eyes look as if they are made of stone.

The most fearful people in the world are the rich. They have elaborate security systems, bunkers, panic rooms. You don't build a bunker unless you fear for your life, unless you believe catastrophe is around the corner. You don't lobby the government for power unless you deep down fear another man coming to take away your wealth or the poor masses putting your head on the chopping block. You hire professionals to guard that wealth, a team of lawyers to protect it, and are more fearful than a homeless man who has nothing to lose, who knows that no one can take anything away from him.

> Insecurity is the nature of Tao. Don't make securities – otherwise you are cutting yourself off from nature, from Tao. And the more secure you are, the further away you will be. Move into the unknown and let the unknown have its own way.

This quote remains me of Jesus feeding bread to the multitude:

> When Jesus heard of it, he departed thence by ship into a desert place apart: and when the people had heard thereof, they followed him on foot out of the cities.
>
> And Jesus went forth, and saw a great multitude, and was moved with compassion toward them, and he healed their sick.
>
> And when it was evening, his disciples came to him, saying, This is a desert place, and the time is now past; send the multitude away, that they may go into the villages, and buy themselves victuals.
>
> But Jesus said unto them, They need not depart; give ye them to eat. And they say unto him, We have here but five loaves, and two fishes. He said, Bring them hither to me.
>
> And he commanded the multitude to sit down on the grass, and took the five loaves, and the two fishes, and looking up to heaven, he blessed, and brake, and gave the loaves to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude.
>
> And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the fragments that remained twelve baskets full. And they that had eaten were about five thousand men, beside women and children. Matthew 14:13-21

Don't be afraid. God, Jesus, nature, Tao, or whatever great force you believe in, will provide for your needs. As a creation of this Earth, you were given the ability to attain your bread, and as evidence of that, I bet that you have never gone a full day without food. You will endure until you must die, like all other creatures must, and your being, soul, spirit, and molecular composition transforms into a different energy or state that allows the entire cycle to continue existing as it has.

> You love thinking because thinking can become instrumental in achieving something: you can become a great thinker, or, through thinking, you can become a great leader. Through sleeping have you ever heard of anybody becoming a great leader? They all condemn sleep, they all condemn laziness. They all condemn people who simply enjoy life and are not too active – they call them hobos or bums, vagabonds, and condemn them. But have you ever observed the fact that the world has never suffered from any lazy man? Because no lazy man can become a Hitler, no lazy man can become a Nixon, no lazy man can become a Mao, a Ghengis Khan, a Napoleon. No lazy man can become active. Action has brought all the wars. Action is the most mischievous thing in the world. But still we go on saying that action is needed – because everybody is ambitious.

If you are plugged into the rat race, into the Western mentality, you will react with anger to Osho's teachings. You will say, "But look at India, where people defecate on the streets!" You will exclaim, "Look at Africa and the laziness that one can witness!" You will yell, "But we are the most advanced civilization in the world!" And you would be correct in that the West does not have sewage problems, and its technology and skyscrapers are a sight to behold, but at what cost to the individual? What has the individual man in the West had to endure to have such splendid material marvels, to have clean streets? What is going on in the homes on those streets, in the minds of those who have to live in this splendor?

We arrive at the conflict between individual fulfillment and societal magnificence. What's good for the individual may not be good for society, and what's good for society may cause suffering to the individual. I agree we must have standards within a society to prevent it from succumbing to every degenerate cause under the sun, but it's a danger to place it above that of the individual.

Osho's words help me check myself during the times I'm blindly carrying on in life, stacking my plate full of multiple projects, aching to make a difference in the world to mold it into my imagined image of righteousness. He helps me realize that my ego is a parasite that steers me onto paths that serve me little or no benefit, that all my needs are already achieved and I can stop and enjoy life for what it is instead of creating tension, conflicts, and distractions that put me on a path to misery.

I see Tao as a logical extension of Stoicism, because while the latter insinuates that are you a thing-becoming, Tao argues that you have already become. If you do get value out of Stoicism, I believe you will enjoy this book by Osho.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: "When The Shoe Fits" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How “Constructive Ambiguity” Can Help Improve Your Game

August 23, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

In seduction as well as in business and politics, it is a huge mistake to show your hand too early. If you want to sleep with hot girls—and in particular if you want to keep them around afterwards—it is essential that you practice ‘constructive ambiguity’.

The clusterfuck that is Brexit is the gift that keeps giving over here in the U.K. right now. Many on the right were delighted when last June we voted to leave the European Union, regarding it as a modern-day peasants’ revolt against the bureaucracy and red tape imposed by Brussels, and a reclaiming of British sovereignty.

It is becoming increasingly difficult, though, for even the most ardent ‘leaver’ to find much to admire in the Tory governments’ handling of this complex process. I’ll spare you the details of our embarrassment on the world stage since it has been well-documented elsewhere, but suffice to say that Great Britain appears to be undecided about what it hopes to achieve, underprepared and naive at the negotiating table.

With Theresa May leading a minority government bolstered only by an alliance with the DUP, and with strong voices on the left (and right) eager to derail the whole Brexit process, we have an interesting few months ahead of us when the summer recess comes to an end.

While I am no fan of David Davis, our bumbling and allegedly alcoholic Brexit secretary, the man leading our negotiation, he did say something recently which makes a lot of sense.

> You will find it difficult sometimes to read what we intend. That’s deliberate. I’m afraid in negotiations you do have constructive ambiguity from time to time.

In this Davis is absolutely right. For while he and his team have received a huge amount of criticism in the media, both in the UK and worldwide, for their handling of the whole process, it is entirely correct for him to suggest that allowing one’s opponent to have complete sight of your ‘hand’ upfront would be ridiculous.

Constructive Ambiguity

David Davis being constructively ambiguous, yesterday.

The phrase ‘constructive ambiguity’ has been attributed to Henry Kissinger, said to be a foremost exponent of the art. It is also reflected in Robert Greene’s third law of power “Conceal Your Intentions’, and also in his fourth, ‘Always Say Less Than Necessary’.

Less generously, constructive ambiguity has been called ‘fudging’—that is, being deliberately vague in one’s use of language in order to cloud a complex issue.

In the case of the British government, it is difficult to say whether constructive ambiguity is actually being used as a deliberate strategy, or whether they are simply flailing in trying to deliver the impossible: a complete divorce from the EU bloc to appease eurosceptics while retaining key benefits of membership to ensure our economy doesn’t fall off a cliff in April 2019. Presumably this will become clear in time. But on a personal level, constructive ambiguity can be a hugely valuable tool, both in game and in life.

Constructive Ambiguity With Hot Girls

A hot European girl considering Britain's Brexit negotiating stance

In pickup, the player who is most ambiguous about his intentions is the most intriguing and will therefore enjoy the hottest women. Does this mean that you should approach indirectly and conceal your sexual nature? No, not at all. Constructive ambiguity is absolutely not incompatible with being upfront about wanting sex with her. The mindset that you should adopt is as follows:

> I am a man, and therefore of course it follows that I seek to sleep with hot young women. That is a fact and I own it. Nevertheless, I have multiple sexual options and so I remain ambiguous about my intentions around commitment.

When I approach a girl I like to make it very clear that I am a sexual being, that I see this as a man-woman interaction and that I am interested in her principally as a sexual prospect. I don't mean that I tell her this in a clumsy way, but rather that it is implied in every aspect of my presentation from my eye contact with her to my tone of voice, to my body language, use of touch and so on.

Ambiguity around being a dominant man who desires sex and is unafraid of showing it is an anathema to females and will lead you straight to the friendzone.

However, ambiguity around your intentions with that specific girl is dynamite and will get her hooked. Yes, you would bang her, that goes without question. But equally, you are able and willing to walk away since you have so many other options. This is where teasing comes into its own.

I often open with something like 'Hey, you're cute.' But I will immediately override this with a takedown of some kind, something teasing and challenging. I want her to realise that at this stage I'm 'just browsing'. Yes, she's an attractive option, but right now that's all she is—an option. And with plenty of others waiting in the wings I am more than happy to walk away with no deal.

Once you have slept together you should continue with the same strategy (if you want to keep her around either as a friend with benefits or a girlfriend). Don't be too eager. Don't respond to her texts too quickly. When you do respond, always write less than her. Don't drop your plans on her behalf. Be unavailable sometimes. Don't talk about your feelings. Never initiate the 'so are we boyfriend and girlfriend?' conversation: let her do that.

By all means ignite the flame with a direct approach if you like, but after you've done that use constructive ambiguity to keep her guessing, to maintain her excitement and intrigue. As it becomes clearer that the UK's short-to-medium term prospects outside of the EU are economically bleak, so our opponents surmise that we don't have options and can proceed to screw us royally over Brexit. You don't have the disadvantage of the world's media being trained on you, so maintain your mystery at all costs. Always remember, if you are an open book then she will leave the library with another.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed

Read Next: Ten Lessons About Girls I'd Teach My Teenage Self

8 Ways You Have Been Psychologically Severed Through Harmful Conditioning

August 23, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

It has been pointed out repeatedly on ROK how much millennials lack the ability to create or sustain relationships. Women glued to their phones and men addicted to video games, people exploiting each other for attention or validation or money, thin relationships that quickly wear out: the West today has a "together alone" vibe. Even worse, many compensate for this strangely shared loneliness by virtue-signaling and trying hard to be hip or mainstream, which usually implies reinforcing their own blue-pill conditioning and contributing evermore to this poisonous atmosphere.

How did the West turn like this? We already know some of the causes. We know it is hugely related to the massive attack on family, commitment, masculinity, to the West-bashing, relentless SJWing, to a general policy of "deconstructing" traditional social structures through massive influence peddling. Universities, Hollywood, the mainstream media, the corporations and many others imposed it to us. The iron fist of destructive, hateful globalism coerced us through the velvet glove of "progress", "social justice" and so on. As a result, the millennial generation is likely the most autistic one ever.

Lucien Cerise, a French writer with a Ph.D in philosophy, has been enthralled during his youth by some of the elite's projects, especially transhumanism. Eventually he saw how nightmarish the world would become if said elite managed to win. He spent years studying its ways before voicing his first criticisms. Here are some of the means globalists, according to Cerise, used for decades to control our "cognitive processes" and confine us into a world of biased appearances and remote-controlled judgments.

Being invisible

The most efficient power is the one you won't notice. Whether it is considered trivial, poses as inoffensive or clownish, is protected by a taboo or uses hired faces, the best power is the one who managed to avoid unwanted attention. Father of cybernetics Norbert Wiener theorized how to pound social groups with propaganda—previously theorized by Edward Bernays—while avoiding backlashes, along with Arturo Rosenblueth and others, in the 1950s. But what is acting on others, sometimes harming them decisively, without facing any consequences if not impunity?

An age-old way not to face a backlash is redirecting it to someone else. As Hervé Ryssen pointed out, the mainstream culture talked without taboo about the Italian mafia or Irish gangsters, just like it repeatedly blamed Stalin for the dozens of millions of people murdered in USSR… without mentioning political commissars there or other Mafiosi in America. Scorsese's movies on the Italian or Irish mafia contribute to put the whole blame on someone else.

And here it comes again, although to a lesser extent, when blue pills babble on how "millennials killed relationships" or "nice guys are not communicative enough"… well, perhaps, but why? Who conditioned, nay, who caused millennials to behave this way? When it comes to us, leftists forget all the disingenuous environmentalist explanations they noisily invoke to forgive black crime. Suddenly people shift from being pure products of their environment to super beings with a complete agency over everything they do.

Power invisibility can be achieved in a subtler way by taking up seemingly innocuous or trustworthy social roles: a non-political technocrat, a creative marketer, an artist, a care worker, even a nun can all be means or masks to push for “change.”

1. Blurring the difference between make-believe and objective truth

New-agey make-believe, marketing, narrative-pushing movies, social constructionism or “whatever I point fingers at is a social construction”, you-go-girlism, philosophies of history from Marxism to pushing for “hope” or “change” or “we live in The Current Year so immigrant invasion cannot be an invasion anymore” have all contributed to blurry the difference between fiction and reality. I strongly suspect modern urban life to contribute cutting us from nature and making us used to life into a completely artificial world where touting mere appearances is much easier.

Mindless fashion cycles, media dependence, the ever growing denial of biology in favor of an “I am what I want to be”—or what the media and group tell me it is “cool” to be—, all seemingly happening by themselves as if a kind of historical necessity, were instrumental into turning even grown adults into a psychological and social silly putty.

2. Injecting a well-crafted mind virus to impair cognition

The brain or subconscious works by distinguishing, categorizing, and classifying objects. We also need to imitate other people to learn: even an adult, if he enters into a new field, must observe what the established experts do to learn how things are done there.

Well, what about preventing all this? Let's say distinction is "discrimination"; categorization is "racist" and "oppressive"; classifying, as it implies hierarchizing, is "judgmental"; imitation is "reactionary", "not creative" and stupid. Do not imitate the others! Children should learn all by themselves, parents should not "repress" them! As a result, children become petulant, unruly, autistic or hyperactive whereas their parents struggle with contrived moral dilemmas out of fear of being this and that. How can you choose a path, an associate, a potential mate over another if you cannot "discriminate"?

3. Fostering intolerance to the "authoritarian personality"

Although the Horkheimers and Adornos would value very much authority among themselves, their "classic" The Authoritarian Personality was a milestone of Leftist onslaught. It jumbled together and blamed Christianity, patience, normal families headed by a father, a purported lack of hedonism, anti-Semitism and "homophobia." Identified with "fascism", the traditional pater familias was to take the blame. Men should not set frames or take family decisions anymore: men should pursue sex, seek a mysterious "liberation" and of course contribute to "change."

Authority still exists, of course. It has either become subtler, acting through seduction and perceived charisma, or was reverted so that "minorities" and SJWs can wield it over the hapless masses. Yet the old-fashioned boss, the domineering father, are thoroughly demonized—up to the point where some want to forbid any corporal punishment and foster a pseudo-friendship between parents and children. Lacking the lessons from authority, boys are thrown into the world without knowing how to pick up, make themselves respected or handle threats whereas girls carry their narcissism around.

4. Destroying the distinction between familiars and foreigners

All world citizens, all anonymous and replaceable, all strangers

The distinction between familiar and foreigner is but a keystone of human relationships. People have thicker, more trustworthy relationships between family members. Likewise, a close friend whom you knew for years is more likely to tell you the truth or repay what he owes you, and it should be normal that foreigners are to be put to the test and rejected if they choose to harm us.

Well, these normal categories have been destroyed through “antiracism”, “tolerance”, “help refugees” and so on. Some say the endgame of this all is the destruction of all otherness. Everyone shall melt into the Brave New World! Of course, the lack of clear or firm references only fosters anomie, when related people start acting as antagonists towards each other whereas hostile strangers are welcomed with open arms. As millions of whites rejected the brainwashing, the System started to otherize them. Now “fascists” and “right-wingers” are the new Other. Not only are we deemed more foreign than foreigners, but our very existence is deemed intolerable.

“Humanism” is nothing else than a ploy to de-humanize those who won’t follow.

5. Fostering new conflicts

“A group of happy Black people? Can’t be! Let me organize them!”

All “minorities” are inventions wholly created to gang against Whitey. Different people, who went along together, were antagonized by narratives of “oppression”, purported past wrongs, and encouraged to follow their newly discovered identity. Thus a centrifugal movement, made of contradictory desires, revenge-seeking, leads everyone farer from each other. This is controlled dialectics.

Isn’t that strange that they promote “creativity”, “self-expression”, i.e. smaller tribalism and individualism, at the same time than the one-world dream? These trends are clearly contradictory. Unless the first is but a means towards the second. Once again—destroy and rebuild.

6. Exacerbating differences that split

Gangsta culture, LGBTism as a shining example of freer, cooler individuals, Muslims as spiritual and oppressed exotics, white cucks doubling down on attacking their own kin as to virtue-signal. Imploded into widely different and potentially antagonist subcultures, society has let room for communities. Common sense, common understanding, a shared sense of norms and belonging have been well eroded. Civilization has exploded. Only its infrastructure remains.

If the Left was not bound by its hatred against us and dependent from the System, its hive would have imploded long ago.

7. Construing new norms on the ruins of the normal

Among hippie-like students as inside families, the lack of norms leads to a string of problems: substance abuse, immediate gratification-seeking, a lack of tolerance to frustration, autism, hyperactivity or inability to focus, manipulative behaviors, psychopathologies… all leading to a new phase of conformism and cowardice. The Greeks already knew of this.

Destroying norms and limits was but a phase of the process. The next phase consists in re-making the norms, which relieves the mind from contrived internal conflicts, but differently. Now, people are allowed and strongly encouraged to discriminate on political grounds, to establish a hierarchy between different communities and their purported past sufferings, and to imitate what is in the media, academic or other systemic institutions. Why can girls discriminate absolutely whom they want to talk to whereas men should accept to give themselves to fat, entitled, disgraceful slobs? Because the demiurgic social engineers wanted it that way.

8. Maintaining invisibility

Just some rich dudes' party. Move on

During all these steps, a true member of the elite should remember to maintain invisibility. Indeed, if someone feels like he is under attack, he will try to defend himself, and if the targeted individual manages to spot the attacker he may attract the attention of others on it, which would limit the attacker's possible moves. Thus, everything should be made so that the attacker is either not perceived or not taken seriously.

The dumbest will believe that Leftism is "love" or that whatever comes next—that is, the next step of onslaught and degeneracy—will be cool. Gay marriage forced by the Supreme Court is awesome! Refugees are so enriching!

More commonsensical people will be tricked into believing that the threat comes from "terrorism", or from the "far right", or from Islam—as opposed to Western degeneracy and stripped of any racial implication—or whatever bogus cause that can be summoned. Fake opposition from a so-called radical Left that attacks "the bankers" without ever mentioning other actors of the crisis or who exactly bankers are before reinforcing the anti-right, anti-white, anti-Trump conditioning also make a good job at this.

Conclusion

Neuro-Linguistic Programming is a filtered-down version of the techniques used by the elite. As Lucien Cerise says, if cognitive sciences start from the assumption that the mind works like a computer, those who use them can consider that average people can be reprogrammed or "rewritten", just as they can be disconnected or reconnected at will. This thinking suppresses people's agency. Humans become mere matter between the hands of know-better social engineers—and we, just like the world we live in, are increasingly reshaped and remold by the mad will of power cultists.

Fortunately, once you know the tricks, spotting them is much easier.

Read Next: The Dysfunction Of Modern Society Is Proof That Cultural Marxism "Works"

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

How To Become A Catholic Priest

August 23, 2017 | by Eusebius Erasmus | Link | Original Link

I know what you're thinking: "How can a man be celibate for the rest of his life?" I will gladly address that glaring concern, but first, hear me out.

The Church needs masculine leaders. Far too many priests are weak, cuckolded, beta men (and a few are child abusers). This is in stark contrast to the Church's historical martyrs, like St. Jean de Brébeuf, who withstood harsh winters, month-long canoe trips, and gruelling torture, to spread the Gospel in Canada. Masculinity reflects Jesus Christ's own human nature, as well as God the Father's patriarchal attributes.

The question of celibacy is important: we men are wired to spread our seed. This issue can be addressed in two ways. First, after you have sowed your wild oats, and had your fill of hedonistic game, then you can join the priesthood; fornication does not yield lasting fulfillment, after all, and marriage is a rigged lottery. Indeed, the skills you learn by practicing game will be useful for the Church.

Second, consider joining an Eastern Catholic Church, which permits ordination after marriage – the downside of this is that you may need to be fluent in Ukrainian, Greek, Arabic, or some other language. In this article, however, I restrict my attention to the Church of Rome.

There are general requirements: you must be Roman Catholic, unmarried, and male. The Church often pays for your training, after which you attain a bachelor's degree in theology or philosophy. Eventually, you are ordained a priest, taking solemn vows. This gives you the power, through Christ, to perform the sacraments: baptism, confirmation, reconciliation, marriage, and anointing the sick. After this, your Bishop or Superior may decide that you require further education, sending you to get a master's degree or PhD.

You must decide whether to become a Diocesan priest, or to join a religious order. In the former case, you need only make vows of chastity and obedience – thus a Diocesan (secular) priest can own property and start a business. However, you are generally restricted to a single geographic area, making it difficult to move.

Religious orders, on the other hand, may require you to also pledge poverty, meaning you cannot own property, aside from simple personal items like a toothbrush. The upside is that you live in a community of likeminded men, and can travel or have other careers: teaching, research, medicine, etc. Each order has its own spirituality, and it is worth discerning this before you commit.

There are, perhaps, hundreds of religious orders to choose from. In what follows, I provide a summary of a few notable ones.

The Jesuits

Founded in 1540 by former soldier St. Ignatius of Loyola, the Society of Jesus is the most popular Catholic order. In addition to vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, Jesuits make a special vow of obedience to the Pope. Historically, the Jesuits were an important part of the Counter-Reformation and Vatican II.

The heart of the order is Ignatian spirituality, which requires you to “Find God in all things.” Ignatius, a military man, realized the importance of drills, and therefore composed a series of spiritual exercises for Jesuit men to follow. These exercises are performed in a 30-day silent retreat.

Jesuits have a reputation for liberal theology and politics, but there have been conservative Jesuits, like Cardinal Dulles. The order does not permit monasticism, since it requires Jesuits to be active in the community.

Franciscans

‘Franciscan’ is not an order as such, since it encompasses several orders, such as the Friars Minor, Saint Clare, etc. However, these orders all adhere to Franciscan spirituality.

St. Francis of Assisi, after whom this spirituality is named, was a medieval Italian friar who was a hippy, living in the wilderness, preaching to birds, and conversing with flowers. During the Fifth Crusade, he tried to convert a Muslim Sultan of Egypt, without success. Franciscans carry on St. Francis’s spirit, finding harmony in Nature, wearing a friar’s habit, and ministering to the community.

Priestly Fraternity of St. Peter

The Fraternalitas Sacerdotalis Sancti Petri (FSSP) is a traditionalist order, which grew from a rift between members of the Society of Saint Pius X. The order harkens to a pre-1964 Catholic Church, emphasizing the traditional Roman rite, in which all masses are said in Latin.

I have attended the ancient Tridentine Mass, and it is absolutely beautiful and sensuous, arresting your nose with incense, your ears with melodic Latin hymns, and your eyes with simple elegance. Needless to say, the men who work in this order are traditionalist and conservative in outlook. They are also fairly young, the average age being 37.

Conclusion

The Catholic Church is one of the few powerful institutions, in our modern world, that stand for Western values, and against degeneracy. It needs masculine leadership to ensure that it remains the rock upon which Jesus and St. Peter founded it. Prayerfully consider joining the priesthood, and improving the Church from within.

Read Next: Cardinal Raymond Leo Burke Rebukes Feminization Of Catholic Church

Eusebius Erasmus
Eusebius is a Prairie Canadian who likes gun rights, traditional values, and economics.

Men Are Becoming Too Scared To Ask Girls Out

August 24, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Men used to have to rely on social connections family ties, or just dumb luck to meet a girl. In some ways, this new way of dating makes it more difficult. More guys have more options. Despite this however, I'm seeing a disturbing trend—guys are unwilling to make the first move. When all it would really take to significantly improve their results with girls would be to try a little bit harder.

Time and time again, when talking to guys, receiving emails, or coaching, I see a disturbing pattern emerging: they are simply not making a move at appropriate times. Even worse, they're not even inappropriate times. They're just not doing anything at all.

I'm not sure if it's the massive quantities of soy that are infecting our general population, rendering a man useless and weak. Maybe it's a lack of interest in the other sex because of the options are are available. But whatever it is it has to stop.

Girls Hate It, Too

As much as it's fun to complain about their attitudes, flaky nature, and the lack of any and all feminine warmth in the West (in comparison to say, Russian girls), girls are sick of men being weak. What's a girl to think when the majority of guys don't even have the courage to ask for her phone number on Tinder? Or when they won't have the balls to ask her out over a simple text message?

It's simply easier than ever to ask a girl out. Does anybody actually use the phone function on their cell phone these days? All it takes to get a girl to meet you for a drink is to type out a few works on your screen and press the ‘Send’ button. It’s so simple, and yet so many are still not doing it.

I’m old enough to now think back of the “good ol’ days” of high school—I didn’t go to school in the richest area, and most of us didn’t have mobile phones. If I wanted to call a girl and ask her out, I had to call her house phone. I had to deal with the realistic possibility of her parents picking up the phone and ~~explaining~~ stuttering through who I was and why I wanted to talk to their girl, then asking if I could speak to their daughter. And if she wasn’t home, I had to hope they’d pass on the message and she’d return my call—then I’d wait by my own house phone to save her the ordeal of having to go through the same thing on my side of the line.

And if she didn’t call back, I’d have to go through the whole ordeal again.

A Reminder: Game Is NOT Always Needed

Game is not required as long as a girl is complying. Think of dating like a highway. You keep going on the road, to your end destination. It’s up to you as the man to guide her down that road. Occasionally, she’s going to take you off the road. Maybe she has to piss. Maybe she’s hungry (they always are). The reason doesn’t matter. The point is, you take a break from the road and then you get right back on it.

In terms of game, this means that she throws shit tests your way. When you’re trying to escalate things in a sexual sense, she tries to change the topics. You put her back on the road and keep going. You must continue to re-direct and drive towards the destination. Left in the hands of their own devices, women will veer you off the road and into a ditch, every time.

Of course, none of this is even necessary if she’s not deferring you in the first place—in that case, you're more likely to screw things up by trying too hard. Sometimes she likes you and just wants you, it's really that simple. This is increasingly true the more that sluttiness becomes accepted across society.

I noticed a stark contrast between dating earlier in my life (2013) versus more recent years. Repeatedly, I felt like I had girls out with me, and all I had to do was not screw it up. But, before I could get them out I had to follow the process.

- Obtain phone number (ask for it online or in-person)
- Follow up on phone number via text
- Is she compliant? Yes, great!
- Ask her out
- Set date and time on my terms

It was quite simple, and that simple process still works. It's all the other hamstering that you do along the way that gets you into trouble. Game is shockingly similar to sales, and what's the one thing they teach you in every sales class?

You have to ask.

The same applies to girls. If you're not even willing to try to ask for her number or ask her on a date, you're simply not going to get very far. It's becoming increasingly clear that you can win the game just by doing more than most other guys are—and thankfully, most of them aren't doing much.

You are always going to regret the girls that you didn't try for. The one you didn't ask out. The one you didn't approach. The one you didn't try to kiss. You'll never regret the ones you did try for.

So get to trying.

If you enjoyed this post, get my free program, Get More Dates.

Read More: Stop Trying To Convince Girls To Sleep With You

When The Horse You're Riding Dies, Get Off

August 24, 2017 | by L.T. Smash | Link | Original Link

> Found on Reddit: Q: How many feminists does it take to change a light bulb?
>
> A: It's actually 12: One to screw it in, one to excoriate men for creating the need for illumination, one to blame men for inventing such a faulty means of illumination, one to suggest the whole "screwing" bit to be too "rape-like", one to deconstruct the lightbulb itself as being phallic, one to blame men for not changing the bulb, one to blame men for trying to change the bulb instead of letting a woman do it, one to blame men for creating a society that discourages women from changing light bulbs, one to blame men for creating a society where women change too many light bulbs, one to advocate that lightbulb changers should have wage parity with electricians, one to alert the media that women are now "out-light bulbing" men, and one to just sit there taking pictures for her blog for photo-evidence that men are unnecessary.

A number of years ago I read a small book what is similar to the title of this article. The exact title of the book is, If You're Riding a Horse and It Dies, Get Off, by Jim Grant and Char Forsten.

Proposed solutions to ride a dead horse successfully

Grant and Forsten give some proposed solutions to the problem of a dead horse not going anywhere. All of the proposed solutions simply deny the horse is dead.

- Maybe a bigger whip will help.
- Use an electric prod.
- Visit some schools that are successfully riding dead horses.
- Try a more experienced rider.
- Assemble a committee to study dead horses.
- Testing the horse.
- More federal assistance.
- Give the rider a competency test.
- Try team riding.
- Categorically denying there is anything wrong with a dead horse.
- Evaluate the horse’s reputation.
- The horse is lazy.
- Raise the standard for riding dead horses.
- Adding an additional saddle.

Although the idea of the dead horse can be compared to many things, for the purposes of this article the dead horse is progressive ideology. Western civilization has been sick for many decades and is becoming sicker. The diseases of multiculturalism, feminism, diversity pandering, and emasculation of men are killing the horse of Western civilization.

Compare the list of proposed solutions of riding a dead horse to the problems and proposed solutions in Western civilization. Most business leaders, politicians, and most academics advocate that the societal diseases in Western civilization are good and preferable. I have yet to encounter a progressive snowflake that does not believe in the supposed virtues of the previously mentioned societal diseases. Progressives are telling people that cancer is a good thing.

Any ideas contrary or people opposed to these societal diseases are treated as a problem. These diseases create illusioned societal hysteria. Those that believe in these societal diseases see sexism, racism, homophobia, weightism, and about every other ism they can conjure out of their butt holes. Oregon State University is offering "Fat Studies". We are seeing colleges offering courses on problems with being white. Additional examples are the ideas of manspreading or mansplaining.

Catering to the weak-minded

Our businesses, political leaders, and academic institutions are catering to the weak-minded, the progressive snowflakes (which melt under the slightest pressure or heat) in our culture. The weak-minded are easily influenced by emotion and the straw-man arguments pushed by progressives and the global establishment. Progressive snowflakes will not acknowledge their own shortcomings, failures, and weak-mindedness. Instead they look for problems that are minimal in scope, do not exist at all, or were never problems in the first place (such as the "wage gap").

The weak-minded are easily controlled by those seeking for power. Obama and Clinton both pandered to the weak-minded. They offered "solutions" similar to what is advocated by those in the book. Instead of acknowledging the horse is dead (the problem does not exist or individual shortcomings), they push a narrative that appeals to those that desire no responsibility and want to externalize their personal issues, stupidity, and laziness on other people, typically men.

Peter Theil, one of the founders of PayPal, discusses in a video on YouTube how people begin to see things that do not exist or blow things out of proportion. Feminists begin to see lamp poles, traffic signals, pens and pencils, light bulbs, air conditioning, snow plowed streets, and hockey sticks as “symbols” and “signs” of female “oppression”. Progressives begin to see white paper, white walls, white skittles, white statutes, white cars, and milk as racist.

The divisions will be continually and deliberately exploited by the global establishment to destroy the remaining foundation and framework of Western civilization. There are people in Venezuela eating dogs and going through the garbage while here there are people more concerned about having sex changes.

Actions

The horse of Western civilization is not dead yet, but we must work to save its framework and foundation. First, pick your battles. A lot of energy and resources are spent on fighting and arguments. When progressive snowflakes engage others that disagree with them about their disastrous ideology, they have a sense of accomplishment. Constantly engaging such people is a waste of time and energy. Progressives will be further divided and we are seeing them begin to fight among themselves. Be aware of where your time, money, and other resources go.

When engaged by progressive snowflakes, turn the tables or ask for details and control your emotions. Be as sly as serpents and innocent as doves. When someone brings up “issues” turn the tables against them. One way is to ask for specifics, the more details the better. People will try to give general examples that lack substance. One of the best things you can do is get a progressive snowflake to question progressive ideologies.

An example would be the “scientific” research quoted by many people about sexual assault. What they don't tell people, and people do not think to ask, is how sexual assault is defined. Sexual assault is typically defined as any unwanted touching. This can mean a woman visits a concert and has people who brush against her or accidentally touch her, which would be common at a crowded place. This would be classified by feminists and progressives as sexual assault.

Be aware of the activities and learn the tactics and strategies of your enemies, but do not spend a lot focused on the enemy directly. Tactics and strategies of war are good to learn, but we must take care not to become the same as our enemy. God uses the wicked to punish and destroy the wicked. In the words of C.S. Lewis.

> There are two equal and opposite errors into which our race can fall about the devils. One is to disbelieve in their existence. The other is to believe, and to feel an excessive and unhealthy interest in them. They themselves are equally pleased by both errors and hail a materialist or a magician with the same delight.

In 1964, James Clavell, wrote The Children's Story… But Not Just for Children. The story was made into a short film in 1982. Watch the clever tactics used on children and compare them to modern progressives. Watch the methodology used to get the children to cut up the U.S. flag, destroy a belief in prayer and God, and even go against their parents.

Progressive can fight over a dead horse all they want; and whomever wants to fight with them about the dead horse is certainly welcome to engage them. How do you fix over 80 years of progressive ideological disease? Protect and rebuild the foundational framework.

Read More: The True Story Of A Carousel-Riding Military Wife

L.T.Smash

L.T. Smash is a long student of history and various historical methods for war, economics, law, propaganda, journalism, ancient civilizations and various other subjects. He is interested in how all these things come together to impact our world and us individually.

ESPN Pulls Robert Lee From Game Duties Because He Shares Name With Confederate General

August 24, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

ESPN pulled an Asian broadcaster named Robert Lee from a University of Virginia football game because of his name. Lee is being moved to cover a game in Pittsburgh instead.

“We collectively made the decision with Robert to switch games as the tragic events in Charlottesville were unfolding, simply because of the coincidence of his name,” ESPN officials disclosed in a statement obtained from ESPN spokesman Derek Volner. “In that moment it felt right to all parties.”

OutkickTheCoverage.com's Clay Travis broke the story Tuesday evening. Travis wrote:

> In a story that seems made for The Onion, but is actually true, according to multiple Outkick fans inside ESPN MSESPN decided to pull an Asian college football announcer named Robert Lee off the William and Mary at University of Virginia college football game because they were concerned that having an ASIAN FOOTBALL ANNOUNCER NAMED ROBERT LEE would be offensive to some viewers.
>
> Did I mention that Robert Lee is Asian?

ESPN originally scheduled Lee to cover this weekend's game between William and Mary College and the University of Virginia. Instead, ESPN reassigned Lee to cover the game between Youngstown State and Pittsburgh. Dave Weekley will cover the game in Virginia. "Unless someone tries to take down Dave Weekley statues between now and kickoff," Travis wrote. "In which case ESPN will be royally fucked."

Travis continued:

> Does ESPN really believe people are this dumb or that having an Asian announcer named Robert Lee is too offensive for the average TV viewer to handle?
>
> Yes, yes they do.

“It’s a shame that this is even a topic of conversation and we regret that who calls play-by-play for a football game has become an issue,” the ESPN statement concludes.

> New: internal memo from ESPN prez John Skipper about the Robert Lee decision pic.twitter.com/3yFk4hbDRb
>
> — Brian Stelter (@brianstelter) August 24, 2017

Read the entire article

Read Next: General Robert E. Lee: American Hero Or Slavery Apologist?

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Women Will Never Be Taken Seriously Until They Fight To Be Included In The Draft

August 25, 2017 | by Maximus King | Link | Original Link

As every man over the age of 18 knows, registration with the Selective Service System is mandated by Federal law for men only. The consequences for not doing so are dire, and have been well-covered here at ROK. Registering with Selective Service puts young men's names in a database to be used in the event of war, requiring those men to be involuntarily drafted into military service.

A Volunteer Military

The draft in America ended with the Vietnam war, and we have had a volunteer military ever since. Our military, in the 40-plus years since the draft ended, has been involved in conflicts all over the world, with no need to reinstate the draft. In that time, millions of young men, including myself and most of you reading this, have registered and are essentially ready to be pulled into war at the President's request and Congress' approval.

But that hasn't been required, despite the first and second war in Iraq and the war in Afghanistan, the longest war in U.S history. Our volunteer military, according to the Department of Defense's 2017 fiscal year budget proposal, is over 2 million people strong, suggesting that military service is a relatively safe and rewarding career choice for many people, both men and women.

I never visit feminist websites, and I'm not too familiar with their main issues, besides "gender equality" (except when it comes to fighting for men's rights). So, I searched out and visited some sites and even searched what their main issues are. I got stumped. They don't even know what they're fighting for.

I was finally able to condense their fight down to a few main issues: gender equality, equal pay, eliminating "rape culture," and a woman's body is her's to do with as she chooses (weight, abortion, clothing, etc). There are more, but these seem to be some of the major issues.

Feminists have the freedom to fight for these causes because they live in a country with a government guided by a sacred document called the Constitution, and the tenets of that document are preserved and protected by our military. If a foreign invader successfully defeats our military, we lose our Constitution and the rights afforded by it.

I can't think of a better cause, or of a better way for feminists to truly and honestly fight for gender equality, than for them to organize and march on the President and Congress, demanding to be included in the mandatory registration process of Selective Service. Then they can join the ranks of every 18 year old man and register to potentially be conscripted into military service and potentially die for their country in combat.

If women were to ever get drafted, as unlikely as this is, they would be drafted right alongside men, theoretically. I don't believe this would actually happen for combat positions, however. I believe, right or wrong, that women would be drafted into support positions and men would be placed into combat roles. Maybe I'm wrong. Whether women would be better or worse in combat will be covered later.

What is true is that women would have an easier time with the physical requirements of basic training. They are not required to perform as many push-ups and their minimum run times are extended. Why? Well, all four major branches of the military believe they are the weaker sex. See the charts for the minimum fitness requirements.

The following chart shows examples of the minimum requirements for the Army Basic Training PFT:

Age Group	Gender	Push-Ups	Sit-Ups	2-Mile Run
17 - 21	Male	35	47	16:36
	Female	13	47	19:42
22 - 26	Male	31	43	17:30
	Female	11	43	20:36

The minimum score requirements for the Basic Training PFT differ from the requirements to graduate from AIT. To graduate AIT you must score 180 points or higher on the end-of-cycle APFT with at least 60 points in each event.

The following chart shows the minimum score allowed to graduate from AIT and the requirements for your semi-annual Army PFT there after:

Age Group	Gender	Push-Ups	Sit-Ups	2-Mile Run
17 - 21	Male	42	53	15:54
	Female	19	53	18:54
22 - 26	Male	40	50	16:36
	Female	17	50	19:36

These tables reflect the Army's bare minimum PFT requirements, however these scores are considered below average and could reflect poorly on your record. In addition the Army offers a Physical Fitness Badge to those soldiers who score 270 or above on the Army PFT.

The Army thinks women are weaker and slower

THE U.S. NAVY PHYSICAL FITNESS TEST

Male	Min Score*		Perfect Score
Age	17-19	20-24	17-21	20-24
1.5-mile Run	12:30	13:30	8:15	8:30
Curl-ups	50	46	109	105
Push-ups	42	37	92	87
500-yd Swim	12:45	13:00	6:30	6:30

Female	Min Score*		Perfect Score
Age	17-19	20-24	17-21	20-24
1.5-mile Run	15:00	15:30	9:29	9:47
Curl-ups	50	46	109	105
Push-ups	42	16	51	48
500-yd Swim	12:45	14:30	6:45	7:15

These are the minimum requirements. Certain units, schools, and forces may require higher scores.

So does the Navy

MEN	1.5-mile run (minutes)	Abdominal circumference (inches)	Push-ups (per minute)	Crunches (per minute)
Under 30
Current max	9:36 or better (50)	less than 32.5 (30)	60+ (10)	68+ (10)
New max	9:12 or better (40)	35 (20)	57+ (10)	64+ (10)
New min	13:36 (12.5)	39 (12.5)	30 (5)	42 (5)
30-39
Current max	9:48 or better (50)	less than 32.5 (30)	57+ (10)	61+ (10)
New max	9:36 or better (40)	35 (20)	57+ (10)	64+ (10)
New min	14:30 (12.5)	39 (12.5)	27 (5)	38 (5)
40-49
Current max	10:24 or better (50)	less than 32.5 (30)	40+ (10)	47+ (10)
New max	9:48 or better (40)	35 (20)	44+ (10)	50+ (10)
New min	14:52 (12.5)	39 (12.5)	21 (5)	34 (5)
50-59
Current max	11:00 or better (50)	less than 32.5 (30)	30+ (10)	43+ (10)
New max	10:27 or better (40)	35 (20)	44+ (10)	46+ (10)
New min	15:22 (12.5)	39 (12.5)	15 (5)	28 (5)
60-plus
Current max	11:06 or better (50)	less than 32.5 (30)	25+ (10)	41+ (10)
New max	11:22 or better (40)	35 (20)	30+ (10)	42+ (10)
New min	16:14 (12.5)	39 (12.5)	14+ (5)	22+ (5)

WOMEN	1.5-mile run (in minutes)	Abdominal circumference (in inches)	Push-ups (per minute)	Crunches (per minute)
Under 30
Current max	11:36 or better (50)	less than 29.5 (30)	42+ (10)	51+ (10)
New max	10:33 or better (40)	31.5 (20)	47+ (10)	54+ (10)
New min	16:22 (12.5)	35.5 (12.5)	15 (5)	30 (5)
30-39
Current max	11:54 or better (50)	less than 29.5 (30)	40+ (10)	42+ (10)
New max	10:51 or better (40)	31.5 (20)	46+ (10)	45+ (10)
New min	16:57 (12.5)	35.5 (12.5)	14 (5)	29 (5)
40-49
Current max	12:30 or better (50)	less than 29.5 (30)	25+ (10)	33+ (10)
New max	11:22 or better (40)	31.5 (20)	36+ (10)	41+ (10)
New min	18:14 (12.5)	35.5 (12.5)	11 (5)	24 (5)
50-59
Current max	14:24 or better (50)	less than 29.5 (30)	18+ (10)	30+ (10)
New max	12:53 or better (40)	31.5 (20)	26+ (10)	32+ (10)
New min	19:43 (12.5)	35.5 (12.5)	9 (5)	20 (5)
60-plus
Current max	14:54 or better (50)	less than 29.5 (30)	14+ (10)	27+ (10)
New max	14:30 or better (40)	31.5 (20)	21+ (10)	31+ (10)
New min	20:58 (12.5)	35.5 (12.5)	7 (5)	11 (5)

The total number of points possible for each test are shown in parentheses.

Source: Air Force AFI 36-2905 and non-Waiver guidelines

…and the Air Force

Fitness Requirements for Each PFT Event (Males)
Age	Pull-Ups	Crunches	3-Mile Run
17-26	3	50	28:00
27-39	3	45	29:00
40-45	3	45	30:00
46+	3	40	33:00

Fitness Requirements for Each PFT Event (Females)
Age	Flexed-Arm Hang	Crunches	3-Mile Run
17-26	15 Seconds	50	31:00
27-39	15 Seconds	45	32:00
40-46	15 Seconds	45	33:00
46+	15 Seconds	40	35:00

Marine Corps PFT Classification Scores (Both Male and Female)
Class	Age 17-26	Age 27-39	Age 40-46	Age 46+
1st	225	200	175	150
2nd	175	150	125	100
3rd	135	110	80	65

…and the Marines

Physical demands aren't the only thing easier for women. How about something more basic, like hair? Women have it better there, too. You might think hair is no big deal, but to an 18 year old, hair is a very big deal, even to a man.

Belieb it, his hair is important

It took him over an hour to get this Styles

Now take a look at some male and female Marines in recruit training (boot camp).

Shaved to stubble, without exception

They get to keep their hair

So, when the women get down time, they can literally let their hair down and look like women. A man with a shaved head, these days, looks he might be something other than military. This is yet another example of unequal but better treatment for women in the military.

What about the pay? Good news, ladies, pay is based on rank. An E-5 sergeant makes the same, regardless of genitalia.

I can already hear the argument about the push-ups: men are stronger, so they should have to do more. Men run faster, so they should have quicker times. Okay, but women have smaller bodies, so aren't they proportionally equivalent? Watch this 17 year old girl:

So, is the military being sexist and non gender equivalent by lowering the physical fitness standards for women? Since there are hundreds of thousands of women in the military, maybe they can take on that battle. When they have time.

What about combat? Another well-known fact with women about to be deployed is the increase in pregnancies. But I'm sure there are plenty of women willing to die for their country if given the opportunity. I, for one, would not want to fight next to someone who was allowed entry on reduced physical standards. At least not in infantry. Just like I wouldn't want to be rescued by a female fireman who was quota'd in like they do in Australia. Aircraft, however, is another story.

Some studies have suggested that women make better fighter pilots because they have better hand-eye coordination, faster reflexes, and can handle G-forces better because of their smaller frames. That may be true. Actually, it makes sense to me, and I have no reason to disbelieve any of those claims. I've also heard that women don't have the same "kill instinct" that men have and that they hesitate a split-second longer than men do, especially in instances when there is a possibility of civilian involvement or friendly fire. I believe these statements, also. I have never flown in combat, but I have known fighter pilots, none of whom have flown with women. Maybe someday those truths will reveal themselves.

Feminists, Fight For The Draft Or STFU

Do I want 18 year old women in combat? No. I also don't want 18 year old men in combat. But, as mentioned above, we have a volunteer military, and these women would likely just remain on a list until they were too old to be drafted, if a draft were to ever happen. We have plenty of volunteers, and we've had plenty of volunteers for over 40 years. So, this is a safe, but meaningful, fight for the feminists to attempt.

If they made their voice loud enough, they could win this fight, too. They've already turned consensual drunken sex into rape. They've also gotten the media and the rest of the liberals convinced that they only make 76 cents (or 74, 77, 78) for every dollar men make for doing the exact same job.

So why not fight for the best example of gender equality possible? If they ever do, and they fight hard enough to win, I will become a feminist. A proud, flag-waving feminist. However, I am confident beyond measure that this will never happen, because I will always believe that feminists will never fight for true equality in anything.

Read More: US Government Goes Full Retard And Backs War Draft For Women

Maximus King
Maximus King is a happily married serial monogamist who believes that feminism, affirmative action, and social censorship are hurting America. He has no social media or Website or anything to sell. If you want to reach him, he might get back to you from

The Dissident Right Should Adopt Gandhi's Strategy Of Nonviolence

August 25, 2017 | by Eusebius Erasmus | Link | Original Link

We are operating in times of oppression. The alt-left is vastly more violent than the alt-right, murdering five police officers, shooting a Republican Representative, and condoning Islamic extremism. With a controlled media, we are rendered weak when a single, stupid, neo-Nazi, who may have been panic-stricken, rams his car into Charlottesville protesters. As Edward Herman and Noam Chomsky write in their 1988 treatise, Manufacturing Consent, "the media serve, and propagandize on behalf of, the powerful societal interests [globalists] that control and finance them."

However, this should not discourage us: similar wars have been fought, and won, in the past. In particular, I document the reasoning behind Mohandas K. Gandhi's peaceful struggle for Indian independence. Although Gandhi had a few personal demons, he offers us, in the dissident right, a template for strategic action amidst a sea of present-day troubles.

This is not a general call for nonviolence, which is merely a strategy. I have no doubt that if civil conflict erupted, we on the right would triumph against cranky leftist cat ladies. Yet any victory would be pyrrhic at best. We need to tussle towards long-lasting success, and in this case, nonviolence offers the best opportunity.

The Indian Mutiny

British colonialism, mostly due to Christian missions, brought much good to India: schools, hospitals, and universities. Regardless, colonialism was, overall, a cruel master; The Bengal Famine, Amritsar Massacre, and Partition were simply tips of the imperial iceberg. Fundamentally, no nation should be enslaved, a sentiment the American Founding Fathers recognized.

In 1857, perhaps inspired by former revolutions, Indian troops (sepoys) rebelled against their British colonial masters. Initially, the sepoys used the element of surprise to great effect, seizing important towns and forts. However, the superior British forces fought back, massacring Indian sepoys and civilians in Delhi. By December, 1858, the so-called Indian Mutiny had been fully suppressed.

British newspapers revelled in propaganda during this period, and were particularly drawn to rape reports. The Times, for example, claimed that, in Delhi, bloody-eyed, brown-skinned sepoy men had raped 48 innocent English girls. The report, however, was from a clergyman based in Bangalore, 2,000 km from Delhi. Indeed, this tradition of false sexual assault reports continues to this day, as Western feminists claim that India is a rape-infested urban jungle.

A decade after the Indian Mutiny, Gandhi was born. The Mutiny's memory, of course, would never fade from British memory – much like Charlottesville may never fade from the left's.

Gandhi's Strategy

Degenerate leftists have propagated the myth that Gandhi was a pacifist. On the contrary, Gandhi once wrote, in "Doctrine of the Sword,"

> …where there is only a choice between cowardice and violence, I would advise > violence.

He even believed in the right to bear arms, and thought that Indians should gain firearms training, rather than "crawl like a worm at the bidding of a bully."

In other words, nonviolence, for Gandhi, was a strategy, not an overarching philosophy. He knew that Indians were outgunned, and that efforts at armed rebellion would only result in publicity fiascoes. Nonviolence, on the other hand, exposes the enemy for what he is: pure, calculated evil.

The practical effects of nonviolence are threefold:

- Engaging in nonviolent strikes and independent business, thus depriving your enemy of economic power.
- Cooperating with authorities, when appropriate, hence freeing your movement from legal blame.
- If your enemy acts violently, then ensure that you have a camera: you can capture your enemy's barbarism for the world to see.

Ninety years after the Indian Mutiny, in 1947, India attained independence, at least partially thanks to Gandhi's tireless struggles.

Lessons for the Dissident Right

Fighting violently against the alt-left is too costly; the police, academia, and the media back BLM and antifa. Although we have been winning the online war, who knows how long that will continue? Google, Facebook, Twitter, and Paypal are against us. Instead, we should adopt a nonviolent strategy.

First, we need to organize clandestinely, much like Roosh organized his Canadian lectures. This allows us to plan, while building masculine solidarity and community spirit. We need not confine ourselves to ROK readers; countless men are angry at the establishment.

Next, we should carefully withdraw our economic services; masculine men produce the bulk of GDP, giving us immense power. Refusing to pay taxes, serve SJW customers, or work at a leftist company can strengthen our cause. This step, however, must be used intelligently; for instance, James Damore's firing from Google red-pilled many moderates – would your dismissal do the same?

Capturing the media is the next stage; we must videotape alt-left barbarians amidst nonviolent yet defiant right-wing men. Protests and rallies can be useful, but only when we are willing to sacrifice our bodily safety to exhibit leftist brutality. In other words, right-wing leaders should understand that protests, rallies, and direct action serve a strategic purpose.

Finally, we require good leaders. Men like Richard Spencer, who had a death on his activist scorecard, must be exorcised from the movement. Instead, we require organized, thoughtful, and inspirational captains of masculinity. They need to control crowds, and be mindful of media spin. Most importantly, perhaps, they need a winning strategy; in this instance, I suggest nonviolence.

Read Next: Charlottesville Was A Disaster For The Dissident Right

Eusebius Erasmus
Eusebius is a Prairie Canadian who likes gun rights, traditional values, and economics.

This Is The First Video To Be Sandboxed By Youtube’s Censorship Alliance With The ADL

August 26, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There has so much truth being shared on Youtube lately that Google decided to partner with the Anti-Defamation League to shut it all down by introducing a program to sandbox videos they merely don’t like. This has come just months after a demonetization wave that impacted many conservative channels.

> We’ll soon be applying tougher treatment to videos that aren’t illegal but have been flagged by users as potential violations of our policies on hate speech and violent extremism. If we find that these videos don’t violate our policies, but contain controversial religious or supremacist content, they will have some features removed. The videos will remain on YouTube behind an interstitial, won’t be recommended, won’t be monetized, and won’t have key features including comments, suggested videos, and likes.

This censorship tool has just been rolled out and the first known sandboxed video has been identified. Would you like to take a guess as to what the video is about? It’s not about ISIS or child sexualization. It isn’t a video by an unhinged liberal encouraging a coup against Donald Trump. It’s a video titled “Race Differences In Intelligence.”

Try to watch the following to see how the sandboxing works…

Youtube won’t let you watch the embedded video. Instead, it takes you to an interstitial screen warning you of the “offensive” speech you’re about to witness.

Are you triggered yet, shitlord? If you're not and click through, you're greeted with a naked screen that doesn't even let you visit the creator's channel.

The video itself was produced by Jared Taylor of American Renaissance. It contained the argument that the main reason blacks have poorer outcome than whites is not due to lack of opportunity but lower IQ. Whether you agree with that argument or not, Youtube believes that no one should have the ability to share, comment, or like because of it. You'll never see it recommended to you or shown in a search result. What is it about the idea Taylor shares that has caused the ADL and Google to go to extreme lengths in censoring it? As you may already know, it square goes against their egalitarian agenda.

> Concealing the lie of egalitarianism requires artificial cosmetics in every facet of Western life. The media must not report on incidents that show sex or race differences. The government must construct laws and policy to help "equalize" the sexes, which means demoting heterosexual men as second-class citizens. Public schools and universities must spread propaganda to give an intellectual basis for the big lie that ends up being dismantled by the work of a few dozen > dedicated bloggers.

>
> The eyes and ears of the masses must be deliberately impaired to prevent them from seeing contradictions of the big lie in every day of their lives, and those who have shaken off the cataracts of their vision, who get close to exposing the lie after peeling the layers that conceal it, must be viciously attacked and marginalized.

Silicon Valley, once a brand associated with innovation and high technology, is now becoming linked to censorship and stifled speech. Instead of executing their mission to create technologies that improve human lives, they're using it to innovate new ways to inflict pain and suffering on those who disagree with their globalist nightmare of the world. These are the people who overlook Islamic terrorism by urging us to "pray for peace" while using a single right-wing death in Charlottesville as an excuse to launch a massive internet purge.

> As of this writing, numerous right-wing websites and personalities have been banned from PayPal, Twitter, Paypal, Stripe, Facebook, Instagram, Mailchimp, Soundcloud, Uber, and countless other platforms. To make matters worse, domain registrars and website maintenance companies such as CloudFlare and GoDaddy have no-platformed The Daily Stormer, keeping the site offline since Sunday. It's clear that ideological dissidents are going to have to change their tactics in order to keep their websites and other platforms online.

By now it's clear that every corporation in Silicon Valley hates you and your ideas. They will demonetize you, demotivate you from using their sites, and then finally deplatform you, all to preserve a cherished agenda which is having a mighty hard time standing up to the truth. If this continues until suitable alternatives are created, we may be entering a dark age for the once free internet.

Read Next: Daily Stormer Is The First Website To Be Banned From The Internet For Its Speech

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Floyd Mayweather Vs Conor McGregor Fight Thread

August 26, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Variety:

Boxing legend Floyd Mayweather Jr. and UFC champion Conor McGregor will step into the ring for a 12-round super welterweight boxing bout this Saturday and what promises to be an event the likes of which comes around almost as rarely as a total solar eclipse.

The matchup, which will take place at the 20,000 seat T-Mobile Arena in Las Vegas, has the potential to be one of if not the top-grossing combat sport cards in history. Estimates range from a more conservative $300 million all the way up to $1 billion, factoring in domestic and international pay-per-view (PPV) sales, merchandise, and ticket sales. For those wishing to attend in person, the cheapest tickets currently available on StubHub are going for over $1,200.

“There’s never been an event like it before and there may never be one like it again,” former HBO PPV head Mark Taffet told Variety. “When you look at these type of events, they’re more than just sporting events. They’re true entertainment spectacles. This has all the characteristics of a great spectacle where people can get together in large numbers and watch together like a Super Bowl party.”

Mayweather knows a thing or two about big spectacles, considering he has been part of multiple record-setting pay-per-views in his career. Mayweather helped set new standards in the pay-per-view buys arena with his fights against “Canelo” Álvarez in 2013 (2.2 million buys) and Oscar de la Hoya in 2007 (2.4 million buys). But both of those paled in comparison to Mayweather’s bout with Manny Pacquiao in 2015. When all was said and done, that fight did an astounding 4.6 million buys, generating approximately $400 million in domestic revenue. For his part, McGregor has been part of some of the biggest UFC pay-per-views as well, with his rematch against Nate Diaz at UFC 202 drawing 1.65 million buys in August 2016.

Fans can shell out $99 to watch Saturday's fight on Showtime PPV in HD, or $89 for standard definition. It will also be on multiple digital platforms, with CBS and UFC making the fight available on their streaming services for the same price as PPV in a major boost for digital viewership of live sporting events.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: 13 Reasons Why Fighters In The East Are More Successful Than Fighters In The West

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

3 Reasons Why Men Should Avoid Soy Products

August 27, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Soy. The boogeyman of masculine men everywhere. Indeed, the term “soy” (and derivatives such as “soy boy”) itself has become a slang term encapsulating all that we hate about the state of modern manhood: weakness, effeminancy, soft facial features, and more.

But is that the case? We all know that soy is the only complete vegetable protein—which is to say it’s the only vegetable protein that has all of the essential amino acids—but is it really so bad for people in general and men in particular?

The short answer is: for “people” as a vague concept, no. It’ll keep you alive and functioning. But for MEN, specifically, seeking to be the best possible men they can be, the answer is a resounding yes.

What It Does, and Why It’s So Common

As I said above, soy will keep you alive—it is a complete protein, which means it will indeed give you enough protein to trudge through your daily life. That much, even I will not dispute.

As many have pointed out, soy is indeed an extremely common foodstuff and food additive, not just in its native East Asia but increasingly in the other four cardinal directions of the compass rose as well. Note that the three largest producers of soy beans, which make up a majority (80+%) of the world’s crop are all in the Western Hemisphere: the USA, Brazil, and Argentina.

And indeed, when I say it's extremely common, I mean it with no hyperbole. In addition to just being eaten in its natural state, soybeans are processed into many foodstuffs such as the famous tofu and tempeh and vegetable oil. If that weren't enough, textured vegetable protein, or TVP, is a soy product that is used as a filler/substitute in many meat/dairy substitutes and as an enhancer.

Why is it so common? While some conspiracy theorists would undoubtedly posit that this is all some fiendish Illuminati/Judeo-Satanist plot to emasculate men around the world, I don't think that's the case. Frankly, I've always believed in Hanlon's Razor, the idea that you can never attribute to malice what can be attributed to stupidity—and I would paraphrase "laziness" for stupidity.

The simple reason for the preponderance of soy in the modern diet is simply that it is cheap, and corporations are primarily—and entirely— businesses, seeking to maximize their profits and minimize their expenditures. Thus, a cheap source of protein like soy is common, nevermind the side effects. And what are those side effects that deliberately harm men?

1. Hormonal Distress

Soy products are confirmed to inherently contain phytoestrogens, which can have estrogenizing effects on the human body. Indeed, they have been linked to positive effects for women, including the reduction of risks of certain types of cancer—and this happens to be the same effect that can occur with certain types of estrogen supplementation.

Since this is the case, we can also discuss the inverse (i.e. the same estrogenizing effects that are good for women will of course be bad for men). Of course, the issue is a matter of debate, but more than one study has reported negative hormonal effects of soy in men.

Testosterone

2. Decreased Male Fertility

Related to the above, a soy-heavy diet has also been linked to fertility dysfunction in men: lowered sperm counts and decreased semen quality. If you read this website, you've probably picked up somewhere or other that testosterone levels in the Western world are lower than they were in previous generations, and not only that, several studies have confirmed that testosterone and sperm counts are being lowered THROUGHOUT all Western countries.

Again, it's not likely that this is a deliberate conspiracy, so much as an unfortunate side effect of cheapness and decreased quality of life.

3. Flatulence

And now going in a completely low brow direction, eating an excess of soy products has been linked to gastrointestinal distress. And needless to say, being associated with flatulence stink won't do much for anything that you're attempting to do, whether it be physical fitness, seduction, or business.

While one may not believe in the phenotypic changes associated with the stereotypically weak, spindly, soy eating male, the three reasons cited above are enough for any man to avoid this food.

What To Do

Seeing as soy isn't required in the diet, avoiding it shouldn't be so difficult. Just read all food product labels, avoid anything with soy, and avoid eating it directly. Replace it with animal proteins instead.

Make these simple changes, and see health and masculinity improve.

Read More: 5 Easy Ways To Boost Your Testosterone

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Stand For Something Or Die For Nothing

August 27, 2017 | by Michael Majalahti | Link | Original Link

Responsibility. It's a big word. All too many people today don't take on full responsibility for their lives, and thus, they remain juvenile and immature, while doing a whole lot of complaining that gets them nowhere.

In general, when I look around today, I see a lot of people blaming a whole lot of other people and circumstances for the predicament that they find themselves in, especially on social media. It's just another branch of attention whoring and it's weak and apathetic. And it reflects a complete lack of personal leadership of one's self, a.k.a. responsibility and accountability.

The blame game is one of the most prevalent escape attempts that people the world over implement to try to avoid personal responsibility. It's like knowing you have to lose weight, but it was rainy today, so dammit, you didn't go out for cardio and instead opted to sit around watching TV all day while eating potato chips. It's not your fault, nay! The fault always lies somewhere else.

Yet, if you're up past your neck in debt for buying into the Western dream of having that big house, that fancy car, those three foreign vacations every year, or any inane amount of vanities "provided" by the "good life", you are responsible for making those choices. If you've reached the stage of your relationship turned relationshit, you have to own up to the fact that you were the other half of that equation. Therefore, you have the tools, at least in part, to dig yourself out of that hole and repair what needs to be fixed. By so doing, you reassert control and take full responsibility on your own behalf.

You are the blacksmith of your own life. You forge your own destiny. This includes absolutely every area of your life. You are always, at least in part, responsible for how things turns out. Scapegoats simply don't exist. Do we even stop to ponder whether our excuses would ever hold up in an earthly court of law?

It's like the old saying "There are no such things as excuses, only reasons why things don't get done." That's all part of owning your own shit. That's called being accountable and being in control, at the end of the day.

The Power Of Choice

Wherever you are in life, you must realize that if you are not happy with the way things are, your choices have brought you to this point. From the unhappy feminist who can't land a decent man for the life of her, to the lonely white knight who can't land a girl who'd be attracted to him, to the jailbird sitting behind bars doing time for getting caught, to the pick-up artist who doesn't feel anything anymore, regardless of the hot chicks that he bangs, to the modern individual swimming in a sea of stress and worry to maintain a certain lifestyle, you have got to realize… your beliefs and actions dictated the roads you took that landed you where you now are. You have the option of making better choices, moving from dissatisfaction to satisfaction.

By taking on full, personal responsibility, you move into a place of power. All the complaints and gripes end when you take control of your life. Sure, you might feel frustration in your personal struggles, and surely you will, but that doesn't automatically warrant a complaint. That said, any time you, or anyone for that matter, issues a complaint, you damn well better also have some plausible solutions available, so that you don't ascribe yourself to being a basic bitch. With the complaints department closed, you can focus on the things that truly weigh and matter, and thus, orienteer yourself in getting your shit together.

A lot of people today look to evade hardship and aim to procure the “easy life” for themselves, thereby shedding the weighty garb of full, personal responsibility, and accountability. In so doing, they become weak in their hedonistic quest, like someone who doesn’t want to push the heavy weights, lest they become musclebound. Don’t fall for the bullshit and mirage. Be the one to bitch-slap yourself so someone else doesn’t have to do it for you.

For the most part, life is mundane. It’s a grind, from day to day, trying to pay the bills, trying to make headway for a better tomorrow. The mountain high experiences we have are just a brief respite, to give us a sense of escape and elation, before the roller coaster rushes back down to the valleys below for more struggle and toil, which, granted, is what the bulk sum of life adds up to. You don’t want the hard times, but you need them. You need them to learn and grow, so that you don’t become or remain a milksop.

See it as your payoff for the moment when you experience mountain highs. Don’t expect life to offer you a continuous string of steady goodness, because should such an unfortunate thing happen, you would quickly tire and get bored, and the said high would become the next tier in the mundane existence you otherwise lead.

Therefore, mountain highs must be rationed. You have to earn that bone, little doggie! You need those drivers of necessity in your life. Otherwise, you’d have no ambition. You would feel no need, and have no driver that compelled you to push forward. You’d simply drift, much like all too many kids of rich folk, who end up druggies and complete wastes of life, having been handed it all. Trust me, I’ve seen it. The easy life is no blessing.

Everyone gets tested in this life. It’s a necessary good and evil, all rolled into one. You can’t stop the winds from blowing, nor the rain from falling. The tests are there on a consistent basis to make you stronger. But of course, it’s out of your free volition what you choose to do in the face of these tests. Either relent or push through. That’s the beauty of it. This is the stage where you get to own your own shit, where you get to step up to the plate and make yourself more of a man. This is where the word perseverance comes in.

The Power of Perseverance

The number one thing, fellas, that I would adhere to when life tests you, is to stay the course. Persevere. Especially as a man, for the sake of your internal stock, stand. Get your armor on, cast-iron faceplate included, and weather the storm. Stand like the fucking Rock of Gibraltar. Stand where others fall, where others simply have given up. Choose to be more than the status quo, so that in the end, your life will have meant something and you’ll be able to respect yourself.

This is, in short, is where especially men, the world over, have failed. Simply, they’ve failed to stand and persevere. Or perhaps their personal houses were built on such shoddy foundations, that when the storms of life contested them, their abodes were consequently laid to waste. Regardless, relenting in the face of pressure and abandoning their post has been to the detriment and downfall of men the world over. All too many people today crumble in the face of criticism and pressure, changing their views and stances to appease the dominant mindset. In so doing, they lower themselves to betas and find themselves courted by the pastures of victimhood.

Bruce Lee had it right, when he advised “Do not pray for an easy life, pray for the strength to endure a difficult one.”

Instead of standing and persevering, we have chosen to drift and sway, to avoid the weight of hardship and the heat of trial. We have chosen to be agreeable, even when we don’t agree, just to avoid conflict. Somehow, we think that if we relent and just go with the flow, we’ll have it easier in life. Bullshit. That’s the exact point at which your life and inner workings become a living hell and you end up feeling defeated, less than a man.

As a man, it’s your duty above all to yourself, that you navigate and captain your personal ship with trustable authority. Without personal accountability and full responsibility, this is purely impossible. Without standing and persevering in the face of trial, this will never happen. You have to be able to respect the man looking back at you in the mirror.

Know and recognize what it is that you stand for. You must guard and honor your post. You must stand. Son, you are at the helm. You wear the captain's hat. Don't throw it away, no matter how hard the ride is.

No matter the criticism, no matter the pressure, no matter how turbulent the sea, just stand. The winds are going to blow anyway and you can't stop the storms from coming. So stand like your life depends on it. Because if you're honest with yourself, it does.

In closing, when pondering the tenet of personal responsibility and asking yourself what you stand for, take it from the central punchline in Sly Stallone's 2008 rendition of Rambo: "Die for nothing, or live for something."

Succumb and become a beta, or stand steadfast like an alpha.

Read more: How To Stand Up To Abusive U.S. Customs Officials And Win

Michael Majalahti

Michael is arguably the most acclaimed and accomplished pro wrestler in history out of Northern Europe, as well as the pro wrestling pioneer of Finland, where he has lived since 1996 after moving from his homeland of Canada. Michael is known as an outspoken figure that bucks the system and swims against the tide. Known in pro wrestling circles as "The Rebel" StarBuck, Michael has been a champion the world over, in addition to being a rock vocalist in three bands, a personal trainer, a voice-over pro, a business owner, an actor, an artist and a husband. More:

How “Being Nice” Creates Serious Problems For Men

August 28, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

As I’ve watched the US and European nations destroy themselves through idiotic policies, I’ve often wondered how we got into this predicament. After much thought, I am convinced that most of our ills are attributable the drive to be “nice.” Here are some examples of how niceness is destroying us.

Being nice poisons our relations with women

Being a nice guy is the kiss of death if you want to get and keep a woman. This may sound odd because every woman, when asked, says that she wants a nice guy. In truth, women despise nice guys. What they really want is a strong man—a man who will lead them. But it is impossible to lead while always being nice.

Niceness is what leads men to beta orbit women on social media and in real life. The manosphere has been out here for years but I still see men posting comments like, “You look really beautiful,” to mediocre-looking women on Instagram. What do these men gain from commenting on an attention-whoring photo? What do you think the chances are that the woman who posts these pics will choose to date one of the 50 thirsty men who commented on her photo?

Being nice is even more of a liability in marriage and long-term relationships. It may be nice to ignore your mission to please your spouse, but it will repel her over the long haul. This is because niceness is inherently beta and women do not want beta males. I know two cases of men who had their wives cheat on them. In each case, there was nothing that the man did wrong. Neither man cheated on his wife, gambled away the family fortune, or developed a heroin addiction. They were both outstanding providers and fathers.

Their only fault was they were too nice. Their marriages could’ve have been saved if they had been more willing to unapologetically take the lead in the relationship.

Niceness in religion

Christian teaching has been deeply affected by the “will to niceness.” I recently read a discussion on Twitter between three theology students, one male and two females, at the Dallas Theological Seminary. DTS was once a conservative Evangelical seminary. Now it seems it has succumbed to therapy culture. The discussion consisted of the man challenging feminist talking points, but then conceding the argument to the women because he was told that he ultimately “could never understand being a woman.”

Sacrificing truth at the altar of niceness is not just something done by Protestants. In the past 50 years the Catholic Church has also de-emphasized its more difficult moral doctrines in the hope that it would become more welcoming. It has gotten so bad that some are teaching that having nice manners necessitates that the Church drop certain moral teachings altogether.

Of course, niceness in religion has the exact opposite of its intended effect. Rather than removing impediments to faith, it waters down that faith to the point where it is so insipid that there is no reason to even bother.

Being nice is destroying the West

After the Barcelona terror attack

Pretty much everything that ails Western countries is the result of someone's stupid attempt to be nice to one group or another. Girl power was built on the premise that girls might feel bad about themselves and that is why they chose not to go into disciplines that are dominated by men. Gay marriage is the law of the land because we bought into idea that the homosexual men were sad that they could not enter into lifetime monogamous commitments.

When a few Social Justice Warriors complain about Confederate statues (most blacks don't seem to care), conservatives quickly agree to take them down because they value being popular more than sticking to their principles. Europe and the US's immigration policy is similarly driven by niceness. These nations are willing to sacrifice the lives of their citizens rather that make people who live in Islamic countries feel bad.

In reality, it is not possible to govern a country without offending someone. Trying to do so can only lead to foolish decisions.

Being good is not the same as being nice

> Don't be afraid to embrace your inner asshole.
>
> You can't go through life being nice to everyone. Sometimes you gotta say fuck it.
>
> — Ed Latimore (@EdLatimore) August 23, 2017

One of the most common misconceptions of being nice is that it is the same as being good. This misconception even affects many otherwise red-pilled men. The truth is that being nice is often the exact opposite of being good.

The reason for this is that the compulsion to be nice springs from an inordinate desire to be popular and loved. The conservatives at National Review capitulate on every major cultural issue because they want to remain members of progressive society. Christian leaders who water down doctrine do it because they have a greater desire for the acclaim of the crowd than they do the salvation of souls. And beta orbiters on social media prefer to get a "like" from an internet thot to improving themselves.

By contrast, being good means you will sometimes have to assume unpopular positions. This is especially true on modern society where good and evil have been completed inverted. If you share the same political opinions your grandfather held, you will be branded as a fire breathing racist. You may lose your job because of it. If you want to restore the patriarchy, you will be shunned as a troglodyte.

Although there is a cost to being good, it is important to remember that history is never made by “nice” men, but by those who dare to hold lofty ideals even when it goes against popular opinion.

Conclusion

We must wage a holy war against “being nice.” But this holy war is not targeted at any external enemy but at the “nice guy” who lives inside each of us. You must oppose him every time he wants to beta orbit a girl online or in real life. Slay him when he urges you to put your woman before your mission. Crush him if he suggests that you should tone down your political or moral views to avoid offending others. At all times choose to do what is right and good, not what is nice.

This is a battle that lasts a lifetime. We were all programmed to be nice guys. Getting over that programming is not easy, but the rewards are worth it: you’ll will experience true freedom when you end the tyranny of nice.

Read More: US Government Goes Full Retard And Backs War Draft For Women

---

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

If Your Favorite Globalists Were Evil Men From The Book Of Mormon

August 28, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The Book of Mormon came from Joseph Smith's translation of the Golden Plates—or his very fertile imagination, take your pick. Some characters resemble today's globalists, so either history repeats itself or life imitates art. I'm technically Mormon, but a really lousy one for unbelief and high beer intake. Still, I'll liven up the book that Mark Twain called "chloroform in print".

What is globalism?

Globalists want to unite the world. In practice, this means free trade, profiteering from social engineering, and even population replacement policies.

They seek to abolish borders, as impediments to corporate profits. The first step is transferring sovereignty piecemeal from democratic nations to transnational authorities. Later, regional superstructures are to be established—having little accountability to the public—like the European Union. Early on, Leon Trotsky proposed the same for the entire Western Hemisphere, after being exiled from the USSR for being too leftist.

Afterward, things may converge further yet into a one-world government.

Bill Clinton and Zeezrom

Besides The Lightworker, Bill Clinton was the awesomest POTUS ever, though Hillary is the true brains of the operation. He loves to grab burgers by the buns—then chews slowly, because he doesn't inhale. Lately he's slimmed down, as Cupcake is beside to remind him, "No snacking, Bill!"

Chubby Bubba signed the NAFTA treaty during his first year. The American manufacturing sector didn't thrive as predicted, but who needs factories, right? At least big box stores full of imported goods and fast food joints are still hiring.

Book of Mormon* connection:

Zeezrom was a slick lawyer well-skilled in word games:

> Now the object of these lawyers was to get gain; and they got gain according to their employ.
>
> —Alma 8:22

Okay, that's obvious. He began as an all-around shmuck, though happily he saw the light in the end.

Most federal politicians are ascended lawyers, like Slick Willie. ("It depends on what the meaning of 'is' is" was pure lawyerly brilliance!) Although attorneys know how the law works, making them politicians is like foxes guarding the henhouse.

George Soros and Amalickiah

This high-rolling currency speculator commands such immense funding that he can short-sell a country's currency straight to hell. By pressing a few buttons at the right time, he can profit a tidy sum that would take a truck driver or machinist hundreds of lifetimes to earn. Not bad for a hard day's work!

Still, Georgie has a heart, making large donations to philanthropy. The Open Society Foundation funds numerous causes promoting "peace and progress" throughout the world.

Book of Mormon* connection:

It begins like this:

> And Amalickiah was desirous to be a king; and those people who were wroth were also desirous that he should be their king; and they were the greater part of them the lower judges of the land, and they were seeking for power.
>
> And they had been led by the flatteries of Amalickiah, that if they would support him and establish him to be their king that he would make them rulers over the people.
>
> —Alma 46:4-5

When his power grab among the Nephites failed, he jumped ship for the rival Lamanites. Their king said, "Sure, dude, we'll make you our general." Then he promptly sold out to a rebel faction. After surrendering the army, he whacked both the rebel leader and the Lamanite king. (Never trust a turncoat.) Then he tried to take over the Nephites again, but his luck ran out.

So here's a hyper-ambitious fellow, skilled at playing both halves against the middle—sounds familiar…

David Rockefeller and King Akish

Life was kind for the grandson of oil magnate John D. Rockefeller. American soldiers endured battles like Anzio, Tarawa, and Normandy, but this rich kid was a pogue. David's cushy Army intelligence officer gig got him valuable contacts along the way. Beginning in 1946, he worked for Chase National Bank (now JPMC) eventually becoming CEO in 1969.

In 1949, David became a Council on Foreign Relations director—not bad for a rookie bankster! He also became heavily involved in the Bilderberg Group. However, two interesting clubs weren't enough, so he founded the Trilateral Commission, along with having his fingers in several other international institutions.

Mr. NWO and some of his buddies at Goldman-Sachs created Republicans Who Care, a foundation backing moderate conservative candidates. Other than that, his family donated the land for the United Nations building, our wannabe one-world government.

Book of Mormon* connection:

Prince Jared deposed his father, got deposed himself, and—with his equally rotten son-in-law Akish's help—deposed Dad again. Then:

> For so great had been the spreading of this wicked and secret society that it had corrupted the hearts of all the people; therefore Jared was murdered upon his throne, and Akish reigned in his stead.
>
> —Ether 9:6

Then more cyclic history happened, etc. A secret combination (secret society) enabled Jared's temporary comeback, and for Akish to double-cross him.

> And it came to pass that they formed a secret combination, even as they of old; which combination is most abominable and wicked above all, in the sight of God;
>
> —Ether 8:18

Ether 8:22-25 has even better stuff. Quite interestingly, Granddaddy J.D. said:

> The day of combination is here to stay. Individualism has gone, never to return.

He meant monopoly power. However, grandson David apparently expanded the concept toward some interesting directions.

Angela Merkel and King Moron

Merkel began as an official in the Agitation and Propaganda department of East Germany's "Freie Deutsche Jugend". When reunification was nigh, apparently she switched sides. In just sixteen years, this virtually unknown newcomer became Germany's Chancellor—not bad! Earlier, this Manchurian East German candidate said that diversity doesn't work. Later, her greatest accomplishment has been bringing cultural enrichment to her country.

Her buddy Suckerberg is removing criticism from the world's largest social media platform. Her government prioritizes arresting online dissenters, like those criticizing immigration policies. Meanwhile, the police can't keep the public safe from all the new vibrancy. Some suspect migrants are intended as a destabilizing force. Either way, Merkel's reckless policies might eventually make Germany ungovernable.

Book of Mormon* connection:

The Book of Ether 9:14-18 describes an inept King who got punked by conspirators:

> …Moron did that which was wicked before the Lord.
>
> And it came to pass that there arose a rebellion among the people, because of > that secret combination which was built up to get power and gain; and there arose a mighty man among them in iniquity, and gave battle unto Moron, in which he did overthrow the half of the kingdom; and he did maintain the half of the kingdom for many years.

Moron regains control of the situation, then is jailed after a palace coup, and begets Coriantor. Apparently he got conjugal visits. Still, morons shouldn't breed, or rule countries.

Richard Coudenhove-Kalergi and Korihor

Count Richard Nikolaus Eijiro von Coudenhove-Kalergi was born of an Austrian diplomat and a Japanese mother disowned for marrying a gaijin. He was brought as an infant to a small town in central Europe. Quite likely, his background made it difficult to fit in as he grew up. Perhaps if he'd been raised in today's California around Eurasians he could relate to, it might have been better (or maybe not).

To resolve his personal angst, he sought to remake the world in his image. As a young adult, he received an enormous inheritance. He became a professional activist, gathering a dizzying array of contacts with European leaders, as well as banking magnates quite interested in his efforts.

His activities eventually spurred the establishment of the European Union, but it doesn't end there. He conceived of the future as being without genetically distinct groups, run through the multicultural blender set on puree. He didn't merely say it would just happen; he wrote quite enthusiastically about that. Apparently Europe in particular was too White and delightsome!

According to his book Praktischer Idealismus, the spiritual nobility of cultures would still carry on after their genotypes were eradicated. Baloney; this would annihilate every distinct society. The world's remaining cultural heritage would be junk food, shopping, pop music, and TV.

Also, he pledged the spiritual leadership of Europe to some religion or another, writing worshipfully about them. (Nope, not the Mormons.)

Book of Mormon* connection:

Korihor was an Antichrist figure advocating atheism and (more generally) moral relativism. To the pious people, this "question everything" stuff rocked their civilization to the foundations:

> And thus he did preach unto them, leading away the hearts of many, causing them to lift up their heads in their wickedness, yea, leading away many women, and also men, to commit whoredoms—telling them that when a man was dead, that was the end thereof.
>
> —Alma 20:18

In modern times, this "up is down, right is sideways" obfuscation is socially corrosive. Just as cultural Marxism and suicidalism are destructive by design, Coudenhove-Kalergi's globalism is an assault on the right of nations to exist as political, genetic, and cultural identities. Anyone of any heritage who values it should oppose globalism.

Read More: You're Either A Globalist Or A Nationalist

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

I Took The Red Pill After Observing The True Nature Of Women

August 28, 2017 | by Brian Gerard | Link | Original Link

The subject of taking the red pill and how it can positively affect our lives is one that has been discussed at length here at Return Of Kings. Its importance cannot be understated, as this mindset is essential for any man looking to succeed in today's sexual marketplace.

However, there is one topic that hasn't really been discussed, which serves as a foundation to any other discussions concerning the red pill. What causes someone to take the red pill, to question all of the "wisdom" given to them by their lives? While some may argue that the only way to become red-pilled is by suffering a significant setback in life, I wonder if there is a viable alternative to this.

Through my own process of becoming red-pilled, I believe that one does, and it consists of observing the tragedies of others to jump start one's own process of self-examination. To illustrate my point, it is necessary for me to provide three examples of how this strategy helped me evolve from being purple-pill to a full blooded red pilled individual.

"The Meat-seeking missile"

Back when I was in college, I knew all about political theory and how to beat leftists at their own game, but didn't know much about women. While I could generally distinguish between girls worth spending time with, and the ones to avoid, the finer points regarding red flags eluded me.

This all changed when, during my first week of law school, I met a girl named "Becky". Objectively, this girl was a solid "7", had decent boobs and ass, and appeared to be articulate. Over time, however, I began to notice a few things that didn't seem quite right.

Despite being an SJW, she had a new boyfriend every few months, and I began to notice a pattern with three components. First, her current boyfriend was always more successful than the last. Second, she had a habit of accusing her ex-boyfriends of being gay, or unable to please her. Finally, she always cheated on her significant other with classmates, professors, and even my best friend's buddy from out of town.

It was obvious that this girl never cared at all about whomever she was with, as she only cared about his potential to pay for her lifestyle. What had always confused me was why, despite dating seemingly successful people, she felt the need to cheat on them at every possible opportunity. It wasn't until I took the red pill that I realized the truth: this woman was the human equivalent of a female praying mantis, in that she fucked a guy and extracted his resources, only to discard of him when she got bored. This conclusion was reinforced by the fact that she would simultaneously complain about why no guy would enter into an LTR with her, while viciously screaming at anyone who suggested that her behavior was to blame.

What did I learn from observing this woman, who was "friends" with my circle? I learned about hypergamy, the concept of "alpha fucks beta bucks", and how women who ride the carousel engage in self-denial. I also began to realize that everything I had been taught by my parents, religion, and society was wrong when it came to women. This caused me to start searching for better answers, which ultimately red-pilled me.

"Battered Cuck Syndrome"

One of my buddies in college was a guy named "Mitch", a quiet guy who counted staying indoors, playing video games and watching cartoons as his favorite activities. Though he was highly intelligent, and had a proper diet, he didn't know how to stand up for himself and was never obnoxious or confrontational to everyone. In summary, he was a "nice guy", which ultimately was his downfall.

A year after he graduated, he met a girl named "Beth", and the red flags became ever more apparent. She was at most a 5, never even gave him so much as a hand job, and felt the need to control every aspect of his free time. My buddies and I told him, numerous times, that this relationship was a bad idea and that he would get burned in the end. Our predictions were proven true 6 months later, when he caught her cheating on him.

While he was justifiably pissed, he had a choice to make. Would he end the relationship and learn from what happened? Or would he take her back and give her a second chance? Sadly, he chose the latter, and his situation hasn't improved much since it happened.

Why is my buddy's tale of woe relevant to the red pill? Because it taught me the importance of frame, as well as what shit tests were. My buddy was cheated on because he was perceived to be a pushover, which was evidenced by the fact that he never pushed back on any of the "changes" she made to his life. Over time, this caused her to look at him with disdain, which led to her looking elsewhere for satisfaction. These were things I didn't know while being purple-pilled, but these events were another factor that led me to question everything I was taught growing up.

"Too Much Work"

Another buddy of mine from college, named "Chin", represents today's final case study. As the title suggests, he thinks virtually anything that is good in life takes too much effort. Accordingly, despite having a marketing degree, he worked in retail for several years after graduation, and only recently got a new job designing and building smartphone apps.

While you could argue that his career path was stained by the degree he chose to take, his skills with the opposite sex have also followed a parallel track. Despite having a sense of humor, a natural affinity for electronics and tech, and a desire to work for himself; he still has yet to utilize any of this to increase his sexual market value.

For example, there was one time we went to a bar about two hours before closing time, our plan being to run game and leave with a few chicks before the lights came on. While I was able to do okay that night, mainly from blind luck, my buddy didn't do so well. Part of it was because of his appearance, given that he didn't lift weights and wore baggy clothes. The other, more underlying reason behind his failure was his unwillingness to put himself out there and test his limits. While it may be difficult and uncomfortable at times, this is the only way in which our species advances.

In our realm, this means that we must all embrace and adapt to a certain level of discomfort in order to be successful with women. This was especially tragic for "Chin" because he has a better sense of humor and proclivity towards technology than I do. However, because he was unwilling to take the first step, he was never able to capitalize on his strengths.

Chin's tale of woe reinforced the most important life lesson that I've ever learned: to never accept mediocrity, and always push one's limits in every possible way. His failures also taught me the importance of WANTING to improve one's situation, given that the desire to become better must first exist for a man to make the necessary sacrifices.

In summary

Every individual born into this existence has a distinct purpose to play in one's life. While some function as our mentors or friends, others are meant to serve as obstacles that we must overcome to succeed. There are even a few, sadly, whose existence only serves a limited purpose. Specifically, their obligation is to serve as a visible warning to us, so as to ensure that we do not allow ourselves to live a life without virtue, morals, or purpose.

Read Next: Why Marriage Can Still Be A Viable Option

Brian Gerard
Brian a.k.a "Philosophus Velociraptus" is a refugee from the legal profession who has hidden in plain sight in the banking world. Having spent his college years triggering SJWs, he now enjoys lifting, shooting guns, occasionally employing game, and planning his eventual exit from the West.

Why I Rejected Evangelical Protestantism For The Eastern Orthodox Church

August 29, 2017 | by Tubal Cain | Link | Original Link

In the year 987, Vladimir the Great (later St. Vladimir of Kiev), a then pagan ruler of the Kievan Rus', sent emissaries to various neighboring nations to study their religions.
He was especially interested in the Greeks. The Greeks had preached to him about the history of the world from its beginning. They told him of another world, and if he accepted their religion, that he could die and then live forever. But if he accepted the other religions, that he would die and burn in fire.

Of the Bulgars on the Volga, his emissaries described how they worshiped in their temple, called a mosque, in an undisciplined fashion. They described how the Bulgarians stood ungirt, bowed, sat down, and looked all around like men possessed. They went on to report that there was no happiness found among them, but instead only sorrow and a foul stench.

Vladimir rejected Judaism as the Jews had lost Jerusalem. He concluded that their God had forsaken them.

His emissaries then went among the pre-Schism Latin Rite churches of the Germans. They reported to Vladimir that they beheld no glory there, and that their churches were cold and gray, and their services were boring.

They went on to the Greek Byzantine church in Constantinople. There they were taken to Divine Liturgy in the great Hagia Sophia. Then they delivered their report to Vladimir.

> The Greeks led us to the edifices where they worship their God, and we knew not whether we were in heaven or on earth. For on earth there is no such splendor or such beauty, and we are at a loss of how to describe it. We know only that God dwells there among men, and their service is fairer than the ceremonies of other nations. For we cannot forget that beauty.

Thus began the Christianization of Vladimir the Great and the Eastern Slavs.

My Journey Begins

Sixty years ago, I was born into Evangelical Protestantism. I grew up in Independent Baptist and Southern Baptist churches. At a young age, I said the sinner’s prayer and accepted Jesus Christ as my personal lord and savior. Later in my teens, I received believer's baptism and was baptized by immersion. Despite the expository sermons, and the puritanical hymns, I wanted something deeper.

As I grew up, I began to question my faith, tradition, and its teachings. Why did just a simple prayer grant me a get-out-of-hell-free card? Why did the church suddenly disappear after the deaths of the apostles, but then resurfaced in Northern Europe in the sixteenth century? Why was Sola scriptura the battle cry, yet I saw idolatrous book worship, and everyone and anyone interpreting scriptures as they saw fit? Why were there tens of thousands of Johnny-come-lately denominations, all claiming a corner on the truth? The questions went on and on.

The Frozen Chosen

After leaving the Baptists, my journey took me into the Reformed Church tradition. I learned all about the Five Points of Calvinism, or the TULIP, but I still believed in free will. I could choose to accept God's grace, or reject it. I started to doubt how God could "elect" me, or choose me, while damning others to an eternity separate from him.

Happy Clappy

I decided to look at non-denominations in the form of Mega Churches that consisted of irreverent praise and worship music, rock bands, skits, big screen televisions, endless announcements, watered down seeker sensitive sermons, and altar calls left me with nagging doubts.

I saw Mega Churches springing up like weeds. Their shelf lives were short. Attendees were frequently jumping ship for even more hip pastors, more stylized worship, and better entertainment.

My Journey Concludes

I finally stopped attending church altogether, but as St. Cyprian of Carthage said, “A man cannot have God as his Father if he does not have the Church as his Mother”.

I started to become familiar with the teachings of the early Church Fathers. I began to clearly see that the early Christians believed and worshiped much differently.

Then late in life, I made the decision to “Cross the Bosporus”. I was accepted as a catechumen, and I was eventually Chrismated into the Holy Orthodox Church. I had reached the final stop on my journey at the Church of Peter and Paul.

Today, I am a member of an Antiochian Orthodox Church (Greek Church of Antioch). Liturgy is in English, Arabic, and Greek. The church is Eastern Rite, or Byzantine Rite. The exotic beauty of the ancient liturgy, the iconography, the mysticism, chanting, the permanence of tradition, divine union with an eternal and unchanging God, and worshiping with the eyes of the soul (Nous) are totally different from the worship of emotionalism and teaching of my Evangelical Protestant roots.

Orthodox means right belief. I know that I am not rolling out of bed on Sunday to hear social justice sermons, political correctness, or Heterodox fads.

Conclusion

Despite my rejection of my Evangelical Protestant faith tradition, I am eternally grateful for the moral and Godly upbringing I received from it. In an age of moral relativism, such a heritage is priceless.

I recently entered Minor Orders. I am currently an Acolyte, and I serve at altar. Now an older man, in what years I have remaining, I have resolved to live a pious life and serve the lord. Jobs, materialism, or the endless pursuit of pleasure pale when compared to final judgement before God and eternity. “For what shall it profit a man if he gains the world, and loses his own soul?” (Mark 8:36).

Like the tenth century pagans, I too am “at a loss of how to describe it”. But like them, I saw that “God dwells there among men” in the Church of the Apostles.

Read More: ROK Undercover: What It’s Like To Attend An Eastern Orthodox Church Service

Tubal Cain
Tubal Cain is a metallurgist by trade residing in the Midwest. He is a strong traditionalist with an Alt-Right viewpoint. Cain has a passion for his profession, and his interests include younger Eastern European women, high-quality firearms, and animals.

The Australian Military Is Enforcing A 70% Female Quota For New Recruits

August 29, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

First the SJWs came for the firefighter departments, then they came for the Army, the Air Force, and the Navy…

Military recruiters in Australia are facing punishments from top brass if they do not conform to draconian new gender quotas. For the weekly 50-person recruitment target across the Royal Australian Army, Royal Australian Air Force, and Royal Australian Navy, 35 (70%) of accepted applicants must be women. One of the only exceptions appears to be if some of the recruits are male Australian Aborigines or Torres Strait Islanders.

So why is all this happening? Well, the Australian military wants to double the proportion of female soldiers, from the present 12.5% to 25%, in the next eight years. The solution is to encourage an influx of otherwise physically inferior and unsuitable extra female recruits, who will only be required to pledge two years' service in roles such as infantryman or artilleryman (yes, -man), compared to six years' mandated service for men.

The initial physical tests only demand that female recruits in the Royal Australian Army complete four push-ups and 20 sit-ups. After seven weeks of "grueling" training, they will be required to complete–wait for it–an amazing eight push-ups and 45 sit-ups. Physical standards are typically lower in the two other principal services, the Royal Australian Air Force and Royal Australian Navy.

In a classic case of Orwellian doublespeak, one Australian military source told The Daily

Telegraph: "Yes, they [men] can apply – but only women will get the job."

Australia will be in huge peril over the coming 50 years–and this is making it worse

Australia will depend on technological sophistication and soldier training to counteract the threat of much larger military forces, such as Indonesia's. Yet the influx of physically poor female recruits into the Australian Defence Force will severely undermine this.

Australia's self-inflicted female soldier problem is one it shares with many other Western countries. The US Marine Corps has already gone down the rabbit hole of so-called "gender-norming," after a couple of years ago zero female recruits passed particular forms of training. In the United Kingdom, three female "soldiers" received £100,000 (US$130,000) each in compensation after they were "forced" to keep up with male soldiers by marching. The pussy pass runs very deep in Western militaries.

Nonetheless, I do not think that Americans and other Westerners seriously appreciate the terrible geopolitical challenges Australia will face over the coming decades, more so than other Western societies. Sandwiched between an economic relationship with China (our biggest trading partner) and political and cultural links with the United States and Britain, Australia is eventually going to have to make a more decisive choice between the old and the new.

Added to this dilemma is the presence of plenty of other fickle allies/potential future foes, principally very densely-populated and poor Indonesia. Australia's prosperity, which is even more miraculous in the context of its isolation from the rest of the world and its very lightly-inhabited landmass, will increasingly become a jewel in the eyes of larger would-be aggressors.

All of this underscores the clear and present danger of lowering standards in the Australian Defence Force (ADF). In the case of a serious armed deployment to stave off an enemy attack or, worse yet, an actual full-blown invasion, how can Australia depend on recruits forced to complete only four push-ups in the initial stages of their recruitment? Even eight is deplorably low.

The Australian (wo)manpower disaster cannot be denied. Having only 25 million people, with two-thirds of the adult residents being overweight or obese, Australia has a very modest 60,000 active "soldiers" (many, if not a majority of whom will never expect to perform any fighting), while Indonesia has 435,750. Because Australia's basically uninhabited northern coast faces Indonesia, it would take minimal effort for Indonesia to land thousands of troops in any conflict.

And what about other possible enemies?

This is about far more than Australia

It's in China's best interests to avoid recruiting more women like this who can't throw a grenade. Why? Because right now the West is doing its fighting for them, with countries like Australia recruiting physically subpar soldiers in bizarre gender experiments.

Do not let the focus on Australia's military fool you. If you are not an Australian, but live in the West, your nation is either currently caught by the tentacles of gender social-engineering or will be next.

Just as our societies are progressively (pardon the pun) being undermined internally by SJW and other politically correct madness, even our external means of defense from foreign adversaries is rapidly being destroyed as well.

When the shit hits the proverbial fan, how will countries like Australia survive?

Read More: Australian Fire Department's Female Firefighter Quota Of 50% Will Get People Killed

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

You Become What You Fight

August 29, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

BOnce you declare an idea or person to be your enemy, you give them a room in your mind. Within that room you insert their history, strategies, tactics, strengths, and weaknesses. You dedicate more of your waking hours to understanding how to defeat them. As time passes, items from that room start to leak out into your being, until you look in the mirror and realize that you are not that different from your enemy.

At the height of my PUA days, I declared feminists as my enemy. They were degenerate, anti-family, and promiscuous. This was at the peak of when I embarked on behavior that was degenerate, anti-family, and promiscuous. My attacks against them were one way of relieving the guilt and discomfort of my own behavior, since most of the girls I slept with had to have feminist thoughts in their minds to allow me to gain easy sex. I was experiencing pleasurable orgasms with the enemy in the evening then writing about how bad they were the day after.

I went one level up. Who created feminism? Who pushes their ideas? The Jews. They were crafty, intelligent, persistent, and masters of propaganda. Their negative influence on Western civilization must be countered, I thought. I examined their tactics and mimicked some of them in my own informational outlet, Return Of Kings, which has Jew-pilled thousands of men. I started thinking how to be more effective with propaganda and create opposing narratives, until I realized that in order to counter the Jew, I had to become more like the Jew.

Recently, Trump supporters Jack Posobiec and Laura Loomer tried to shut down a New York play that attempted to normalize violence against the President.

If you mute the audio of the video, you may think Posobiec and Loomer are left-wing activists, since this is the same type of tactic that leftists have used for years. I don't particularly mind their disruption of the play since it gives the left a taste of their own medicine, but it was inevitable that those on the right would copy the left, just like how you should now expect the left to copy the right's use of effective memes. However righteous your movement, understand that you will think and become more like your enemy as you fight him.

Even battling against something clearly immoral like pedophilia forces you to get in the head of pedophiles. What triggers them to abuse children? What kind of abuse do they perform? How do they network with each other to carry about their abuse? You start to think like pedophiles with the intention of stopping them, until the only step remaining is to actually view child porn yourself like in the case of reporter Kurt Eichenwald, who established financial ties with a child porn producer to investigate him.

Declaring a man as your enemy is the start of an intimate relationship that stems from three possible motivations: (1) you want to be more like him by having his power or wealth, (2) you want to gain more of your own power by hurting or crushing him, or (3) you want to relieve your inner guilt from already being like him, like in my case with feminists. The enemy will be present every single day of your life as you study him, interact with him, and probe him for weaknesses that you can exploit. At the end of many years of battle with your enemy, do not be shocked when you look him deep in the eyes and see a reflection of yourself.

Defend yourself against those who wish you harm, but understand the cost in having enemies. They are merely a mirror into your own demons and inner conflicts. Find out why you hate something before you start attacking what you'll become more like with every passing day.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: 5 Stages Of Decline After A Society Becomes Infected By Feminism

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Joss Whedon Pretended To Be A Male Feminist While Cheating On His Wife With Young Actresses

August 30, 2017 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

As Vox Day wrote in his book SJWs Always Lie, SJWs always project, and the extraordinary downfall of director and screenwriter Joss Whedon in the past week is the latest evidence of that. Whedon, best known for his outspoken feminism and for creating TV shows and movies such as Buffy the Vampire Slayer that purported to celebrate female empowerment, was recently outed by ex-wife Kai Cole as a serial philanderer who psychologically manipulated her into having a nervous breakdown:

> Joss admitted that for the next decade and a half, he hid multiple affairs and a number of inappropriate emotional ones that he had with his actresses, co-workers, fans and friends, while he stayed married to me. He wrote me a letter when our marriage was falling apart, but I still didn't know the whole truth, and said, "I've never loved anyone or wanted to be with anyone in any real or long-term way except for you ever. And I love our life. I love how you are, how we are, who you are and what we've done both separately and together, how much fun we have…" He wanted it all; he didn't want to choose, so he accepted the duality as a part of his life.

These revelations couldn't have come at a worse time for Whedon, barely a month after his unused script for the Wonder Woman movie was leaked to the public. Whedon was lambasted by feminists for depicting Wonder Woman as a frail, defenseless damsel in distress who constantly needed to be saved by the men around her, which not only makes for bad storytelling, but is a complete 180 from the actual Wonder Woman movie that was released in June.

Joss Whedon's adultery is yet another example of the duplicitous and narcissistic nature of male feminists. Contrary to the fake news media's claims that neomasculine and anti-feminist men are predatory and misogynistic, it is almost always male feminists such as Whedon who turn out to be the biggest abusers and users of women. Any man who identifies as a feminist is a liar who should be shunned and avoided by both men and women.

A Brief History Of Male Feminist Users

Joss Whedon's behavior towards the opposite sex is the norm and not the exception when it comes to male feminists. Much in the same way that Jesus warned us against listening to "hypocrites" who loudly and piously proclaimed their faith as a compensation mechanism, men who can't shut up about "mansplaining" and "equal rights" are doing so in order to hide their own demons. Over the past decade, prominent male feminists have been repeatedly unmasked as rapists, abusers, and cheaters, behavior far worse than the "sexist" men they attack.

Whedon's collapse is reminiscent of the fall of Hugo Schwyzer, formerly one of the world's most prominent male feminists. A photogenic, articulate community college professor from southern California, Schwyzer became famous by presenting himself as a "reformed bad boy" who had become a feminist after a lifetime of dissolute behavior, including sleeping with his students and attempting to murder an ex-girlfriend.

Beloved by feminists and leftists, Schwyzer was a frequent contributor to prominent websites such as Jezebel and The Atlantic, and even led L.A.'s SlutWalk in 2011. He used his media megaphone to push positions that were extreme even by feminist standards, such as advocating that men allow their girlfriends/wives to penetrate them with strap-ons and proclaiming that men should not date women younger than them.

Schwyzer's world came crashing down came four years ago, when it was revealed that he had been cheating on his wife with a porn star. In the aftermath, Schwyzer went on a manic Twitter rant, revealing that he had falsified his academic credentials, had been sleeping with his female students, and more. Not long after that, he attempted suicide by crashing into a car while drunk, earning himself a felony DUI. Schwyzer was finally forced to resign from his teaching position after the administration announced an investigation into his affairs with students.

Another notable male feminist who abused women is Jian Ghomeshi, the disgraced former host of CBC Radio's arts program Q. Three years ago, Ghomeshi was terminated by CBC Radio and arrested after over a dozen women alleged that he had beaten and raped them. While Ghomeshi was ultimately acquitted of the charges, the revelations of his creepy sexual behavior ruined his reputation and kept him from returning to his previous role in Canadian public life.

Another example of a typical male feminist is Anthony Weiner, a former Democratic congressman and the husband of Hillary Clinton's chief of staff, Huma Abedin. Weiner was famously forced to resign from Congress after being caught sending pictures of his penis to random women. Prior to his fall from grace, Weiner had been feted by feminists for his crybaby speeches accusing the Republicans of trying to roll back women's rights.

One of the most remarkable aspects of male feminists is how they are completely unable to take responsibility for their actions. In the case of Joss Whedon, when Cole confronted him about his adultery, he effectively blamed the patriarchy for his actions, all the while using her as a prop to silence critics who were skeptical of his commitment to feminism:

> Fifteen years later, when he was done with our marriage and finally ready to tell the truth, he wrote me, "When I was running 'Buffy,' I was surrounded by beautiful, needy, aggressive young women. It felt like I had a disease, like something from a Greek myth. Suddenly I am a powerful producer and the world is laid out at my feet and I can't touch it." But he did touch it. He said he understood, "I would have to lie — or conceal some part of the truth — for the rest of my life," but he did it anyway, hoping that first affair, "would be ENOUGH, that THEN we could move on and outlast it."

As Roosh V Forum member AnonymousBosch has written, Whedon's sexual pathologies are on full display in Buffy the Vampire Slayer and other works he has created. It's almost certain that other women will come forward in the future revealing how he has used them, and like Ghomeshi and Schwyzer, he may end up facing criminal charges for his actions.

Masculine Men Are The Only Trustworthy Men

Joss Whedon's downfall—and the rapidity with which his female feminist fans have turned their backs on him—is living proof that it does not pay for a man to be a feminist. Despite feminists' proclamations that they want men who are sensitive and attuned to their "needs," they repeatedly disown and reject men who espouse the same beliefs that they do. Feminist women are still women, and as much as they may deny it, they want real men, men with balls, men who won't put up with their power games and emotions.

Indeed, given the track record of male feminists so far, women are right to distrust them. Joss Whedon and other men like him are psychos and predators who mouth feminist platitudes in order to find new victims to prey on. Any "man" who identifies as a feminist is likely a narcissist or psychopath who should be avoided.

Read More: Why Feminists Hate Male Sexuality

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

How To Break Up With A Hot Girl

August 30, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

With her long dark hair, her unblemished skin and her slender, erotically-toned body, Andrea was the most beautiful girl I had ever slept with. And when you've met your ideal women it's kind of hard knowing that after today you will never speak to her again.

But I knew only too well what I had to do.

Here's the problem. Men get into game because they're frustrated and unhappy with their sex lives. They read material on sites like ROK and in books. They watch pick-up videos on YouTube. They go out and practice hitting on girls.

Their first attempts are horrible. But over time they get better. Through sheer repetition and the implementation of game principles they find themselves getting positive attention.

They have sex, often for the first time. The girls aren't of earth-shattering quality, but still. They start to feel that fabled sense of abundance that pick-up gurus always talk about. Their confidence soars.

Now, all of a sudden, they are getting attention from higher-quality girls. Real hotties. Then one day an approach is made. A girl who could be a model—perhaps she is a model—gives out her number. A date is arranged. Sex happens.

Success. And yet it is at this point, when they guy has finally got everything he wanted, that he is in the danger zone. Why? Because if he is not a natural who is used to the attentions of extremely attractive women then it is likely he will get obsessed, fixated, and develop what we often call 'oneitis'.

And once he has that, he is in a very difficult position. He will be so unwilling to let go of his dream girl that he will endure all manner of henpecking and privations from her, she will lose attraction for him, and eventually she will dump him.

If you are someone who had to learn game, like I did, rather than having it down naturally, then the next stage in your journey is to learn how to walk away from girls too.

Romanian Hell

Years ago, I found myself in Romanian hell. Andrea. I still have a few old photos of her on my computer (not to be advised, by the way—really you should junk all reminders).

It would be impossible to construct a girl from scratch who was closer to what I thought perfection was than Andrea.

All men have their own individual idea of what a ten is. I'm sure mine is very different to yours. But for me, Andrea was a ten. In some way she was a culmination of all femininity that I had craved my entire life. She was the princess in the fairy tale I'd read at school and she was the porn star I'd coveted on screen. She was a raven-haired PhD with bewitching eyes, a gypsy wildness and a pert little ass. I was beyond smitten. She engulfed me.

The problem was she had a boyfriend—and it wasn't me. I was her bit on the side. She wanted me for sex at weekends, and to go back to her boyfriend during the week.

Nowadays that would seem like an ideal arrangement, but back then it seemed intolerable (what was I thinking?!) You see game had given me the skillset to access hotter girls but I hadn't learned to control my feelings around them—yet.

I still had that same scarcity mentality that had stuck with me since I was a kid. That sense that 'if I don't hang on to her I will never get another like her ever again.' And because Andrea was my ideal, or so I thought, I wanted to lock her down. I wanted her to leave the boyfriend and come live with me.

I wanted to imprison myself with a girl who would brazenly cheat on her boyfriend.

At first our rendezvous were exciting because they were all about sex. We would meet in hotel rooms in the afternoon and have sex all through the night, the perfumed sheets crumpled, ripped and thrown on the floor. But I had to ruin everything by following the beta playbook: ‘If it’s this good then I want her forever. She has to leave him for me.’

I pressured her and she became cold. Once a source of stimulation to her, a nexus of sexual desire, now I was an irritant. She already had a boyfriend, someone to order her around and put pressure on her. I was the lover. I was the one getting all of the benefits with none of the accountability. Why didn’t I understand that?

She withdrew. I panicked. Intoxicated with oneitus, I tried ever harder to hold onto her. Predictably, this just pushed her further away.

In the end, I asked her outright to define our relationship now and to tell me where we would be in the future. This is of course precisely the opposite of the correct order of things. She should have been asking me those questions.

‘I can’t promise anything,’ she said.

It was at that point that I finally came to my senses. I realised that there was simply nothing in this situation for me any more. That I was not getting what I wanted and that there was slim chance and no guarantee that things would change going forward.

Immediately, I hardened up. This was it. There would be no more back-and-forth. When she messaged me that evening (she was still using me as an emotional tampon, even though she was no longer sleeping with me), I replied curtly. And then I deleted her number and all of her previous messages. Now I had seen the light. Whatever happened, we were done. However much it hurt in the moment, there would be no return.

Freedom

I had lost the girl of my dreams. I had had her, and, through my own naivety and lack of game-savviness, I had ruined everything. This was my worst beta nightmare come true. The removal of my 'ideal other.'

And yet, surprisingly, I felt light and free. The most terrible thing in the world emotionally (or so I thought) had happened and I was… okay.

In the days and weeks that followed I began to smile and laugh again, something I hadn't done for an age. I started hanging out with friends once more. I enjoyed life anew. I was filled with a new sense of excitement and purpose. I traveled to Ibiza and had one of the best summers of my life. I began writing a new novel. I slept with more girls than ever before.

Perhaps most significantly of all, I realised something huge. That I didn't actually want a girlfriend. That I didn't want to be tied down to 'someone special.' I wanted freedom. I wanted to experience life with boldness and magnificence.

If You're Riding A Horse And It Dies, Get Off

That whole experience taught me a huge lesson. There is no one 'ideal other'. And the loss of some girl, no matter how 'hot' you might think her, won't kill you. In fact, it might just be a weight off your shoulders. And from that point on I was never frightened to walk away from a girl again.

After all, the worst had already happened. I'd already lost my dream girl. And I had not only survived, I was thriving.

There is an old saying 'if you're riding a horse and it dies, get off.' It contains a lot of wisdom. Consider whatever situation you find yourself in. Are you happy? Are you getting what you want out of it? Because if you're not then you might just have to face up to the fact that your horse is dead and that it's time to get off.

And trust me when I tell you that doing so might just be the best thing you'll ever do.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed

Read Next: Ten Lessons About Girls I'd Teach My Teenage Self

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

What It Was Like To Attend A French Survival Training In Poland

August 30, 2017 | by Heath Wayland | Link | Original Link

Last month I was invited to review a weekend survival training conducted in English by the Hussard company in Poland for mostly French men. I'm neither French nor Polish, but I speak English and that was good enough. From attending the first day of the training, it's clear to me that at least some Frenchmen are steeling themselves for greater conflict in their home countries while more carefully exploring the idea of expatriation.

Hussard is organized by Gregory Leroy, a Frenchman who left France for Poland five years ago. I flew into Warsaw to check out the training and see what type of man attended it. Muscular and tall, Gregory does have the physiognomy of a man who would do a training involving guns and survival. Meeting him for the first time, he came across as confident but friendly.

The rest of the fifteen French attendees didn't jump at the opportunity to speak English, though many did warm up to me as the day went on. Besides me, the only non-Frenchmen present was a three-man crew from Vice, who came to shoot a video segment. I was concerned that they would paint everyone as "far right extremists," but as you can see below, the end-result was reasonably balanced.

We all took shuttles from downtown Warsaw to a locally-owned gun range where we met two Polish special force operators who saw action in Afghanistan. I didn't even know that Poles sent men to the Middle East, so it was fun to pick their brains, such as their ideas on self-defense and what they thought of other special force units (the British SAS was ranked highly and the French were ranked towards the bottom). One of the trainers was quite open is describing nationalistic views that essentially boiled down to “remove kebab,” though he stressed that Poland’s most existential enemy is more the Russians than Muslims.

Wound training

We started with wound training, particularly Tactical Combat Critical Care (TC3), which is focused on stabilizing the wounded until they can be evacuated.

“Your natural instinct will be to immediately rush to the wounded, but this is a good way to get yourself killed,” the instructor said. “If you’re in a mall and there is a shooting, first wait until the threat is gone before you help anyone, or at least drag them to a hidden area.” He showed us a technique to press your knee against an artery in the leg or arm to stop bleeding while continuing to shoot the enemy, assuming you have a gun.

We were taught the MARCHE system:

M – Massive bleeding (apply pressure to arteries or put on a tourniquet)
A – Airways (make sure the wounded can breath)
R – Respiratory (check for possible pneumothorax)
C – Circulation (re-check for blood loss, apply gauze inside wounds)
H – Hypothermia and Head injuries (maintain body temperature and ensure at least one artery is feeding blood to the brain)
E – Everything else

The best thing you can do in an emergency situation is prevent the wounded from bleeding out until they get to a hospital. A tourniquet is the simplest tool to achieve that when it comes to limb wounds, and the trainers showed us how to apply one on ourselves. When a couple of the students complained of pain when the tourniquet got too tight, a trainer flatly said, “Either take the pain or die.” They tightened the tourniquet. He relayed how if you’re putting on a tourniquet for someone else, they will howl in pain as you tighten it, but that’s necessary to ensure survival.

An important fact I learned about tourniquets is that if one is on for at least ten minutes, you should not release it. The reason is that potassium builds up in cells that don’t receive oxygen, so when you undo the tourniquet, all that potassium hits your heart at once and could stop it. The good news is that you can have a tourniquet on for six hours or more (possibly up to twelve) until there is a risk of having to amputate the limb.

Gun training

At 34 years of age, I have never fired a gun in my life. It’s not that I was drinking soy by the gallon, but I became so nomadic starting in my late 20’s that gun ownership never make sense, and now I live in a country where gun crime is practically nonexistent. It’s no shock I was extremely excited to finally shoot a gun at my very adult age of 34. For the training, we used Glock 17s.

The trainers taught us the basics of using a Glock: how to load and release a clip, how to reload the mag with your hands, how to release the mag, how to add bullets to the clip, and how to pull the trigger.

When I got into stance to fire my first bullet, I noticed that my hands were slightly trembling. I didn’t know if this was because ten other guys were watching me or because I’m a soft city boy who is not meant to fire guns. Even worse, maybe I’m just a pussy. Then BANG, one bullet flew threw the paper target, I released the clip, and the gun was back in my holster. I couldn’t help but smile.

There were a few more rounds of shooting two rounds at a time to fine-tune our technique, until a final round where I was instructed to fire ten rounds “really fast” without releasing the trigger all the way between each round. Launching that 10-bullet hail of gunfire was exhilarating, even though my accuracy was horrible. Inexplicably, I started giggling like a school boy.

“Why are you laughing?” the trainer asked me sternly.

“I don’t know,” I replied. The only other times I laugh for no reason is after a good orgasm or smoking weed. Immediately, I started thinking of how I could get myself a gun, maybe something discreet like an Uzi or an AK-47, and just spray bullets for the rush.

A couple of the Frenchmen were police officers, and this was apparent with their superior gun technique and accuracy. After it was all done, I added “shooting guns” to my list of masculine activities, right after “getting laid.”

Conversation among men

After the Glock training, we drove back to Warsaw and I started thinking of the practicality of what I just learned. The wound training, at least for the Frenchmen, where there is seemingly a terrorist attack in their country every month, could certainly come in handy, especially since the trainers showed us how to use clothing or a belt as a makeshift tourniquet. The gun training is helpful if you are allowed to own guns, but since the French aren’t, their main hope is stealing a terrorist’s gun like John Wick and then using it against them. At least for me, getting introduced to gun use was invaluable in helping me decide if it’s something I want to pursue.

Back in the hotel, I sat with a group of Frenchmen and asked what they thought about the situation in France. They immediately looked down and tightened their lips. The most common refrains were “France is finished” and “Unless we fight back soon, it’s over.” In the shadow of Emmanuel Macron’s recent victory, these men were quite realistic in understanding that France as they know it is over, and something new and much more violent will take its stead, at least for the duration of their lives.

Their training in Poland wasn’t so much to learn how to kill migrants back home, but to put their mind on a footing of self-defense and survival as their country descends into a real life The Camp Of The Saints. And judging by how they complimented Poland, its women, the safety, and the lack of immigrants, I wouldn’t be surprised if most of the men return within a year for a longer trip.

As the night wore on, I noticed another great benefit of the training that Hussard offered: the ability for likeminded men to meet with one another, bond, and speak without a filter. “I can’t talk about these issues back at home,” one told me. “I’d be called a racist.” I remembered how the media and government worked so hard to shut down ROK’s meetups a little over a year ago.

My mind stirred with anger, because I know that there is nothing men can’t solve if they get together, plan, and act. The elite knows this, and will do everything they can to stop men from organizing and exercising their freedom of association, forcing the more industrious men to train and network abroad. The Frenchmen I met will go back to their homes stronger, more skilled, more connected, and more able to help their tribe, and who knows, maybe they’ll gather the collective strength to tighten the tourniquet in a country that is bleeding out as we speak, and where not much hope is left.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: How The Camp Of The Saints Predicted The Migrant Destruction Of Europe

Heath Wayland

Heath is a Midwest American who is reaching towards his ancestral European roots.

I Was Attacked By An Elderly Swedish Woman For Putting My Girlfriend In Her Place

August 31, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Like I have stressed in earlier articles, I am in a long-term relationship. This is not because I want to share too much personal information but due to the fact that it can provide context to some of the ideas presented in the writings.

As we all know, even the women of higher quality – in terms of looks, personality and behavior – have their flaws. Recently I brought my girl to meet with two close male friends of mine for drinks.

The ambiance was all well and nothing negative occurred. However, she got drunk and wanted me to take her home around midnight. I made a quick calculation and decided that the wisest choice was to take the metro, which is located just outside the bar. I know that traffic can get congested, especially where we were at that time, and even short taxi rides are very expensive in Stockholm, where we live. Of course I can afford a taxi ride or twenty but in this case it was the proper decision to not do it, especially after taking travel duration in to consideration.

Unluckily, she was afraid of throwing up inside the train car and thus convinced me to go and grab a cab instead. We did, and as expected it took much longer time and costed me almost the equivalent of 50 US dollars. What a joke, I thought. Because of construction work we also had to walk about 300 meters to our home, and she was wearing a dress, rubbing her arms a bit to showcase the low outside temperature relative to her choice of clothing.

She then consequently asserted that she wanted to borrow my (stylish) jacket, but I was annoyed and didn't want to lend it to her in that particular situation. The same day I had competed in the Tough Viking contest, which consists of 15 kilometers of running and about 30 more or less physically demanding obstacles. The competition includes swimming and wading in fairly cold water, as well as crawling through thick layers of mud. I thought that if I can do that then she could walk a short distance and realize what it feels like in a very light version.

Additionally, I thought that if she occasionally associates with my male friends, then she should talk to us on more equal terms and not be afraid of some realtalk. So while listening to her complaints I raised my voice and semi-yelled that if she would have listened to me in the first place we would not have to walk outside and would already be home by now. Perhaps it was an overreaction but I did not think, even while being completely sober the day after, that it was that much of an overblown behavior either. Quid pro quo.

Then an old lady attacks

Meeting us on the sidewalk, then about 200 meters from home, a middle-aged woman suddenly shows up. She stops next to me and starts yelling directly in my face. Although she looks normal, she unhesitatingly manifests her dislike for my behavior. My girl has started to cry a bit, not atypical behavior for her subspecies. This is about to get worse, I thought, in the glimpse of an eye.

The 50-something bitch sees this and engages in another attack, after I have tried to walk past her in an attempt to ignore and move on. She threatens to "wrestle me to the ground" and calls me an "ass hat," all while standing two inches from me, looking hostile. She refrains from doing so but does not listen when I stress that it is neither her nor anyone else's business, and the entire situation is taken out of context too for that matter.

After that she also starts a lecture on the ABC of Cultural Marxism. She is so tired of white males who use their privilege bla bla bla. I argue back and to some extent she responds less emotionally. When I said that her drivel sounds like nothing more than a big post-Marxist cliche she claims “Marx was a big idiot.” At least that is something, I reflect silently. Still she would not let me go. My girl has now started to listen to us, but remains silent and uninvolved. She might think that her savior, the motherly deus ex machina, in fact prevents us from walking into the warmth of our cozy apartment.

A white knight, perhaps a male feminist – although on a bicycle instead of a noble steed – shows up and asks if there is a problem. Well, that is great, I quietly sigh. I try to calm him down and say that the screaming woman is crazy. Luckily for me he hears the bitch calling me an ass hat again and decides to leave. At least there is some level of rationality left among cucked Swedes. Perhaps he reads ROK in his leisure time.

The “conversation” continues for another five to ten minutes and like Gandhi I stoically remain calm. She gabbles her last feminist tenets, hugs my girlfriend, and suggests that she should leave me. Her mission is almost completed. The woman then adds that there is still something good in me and I do not have to be an ass hat. I can change. Then she left. Probably I will remain an ass hat, though, at least as it is understood from the lens of a Cultural Marxist madame.

Lessons to be learned

If there is anything to learn from this minor debacle it is that non-violence is the only available strategy for a masculine man in many situations where he is confronted. Of course it would be more than pathetic to beat a woman, but many might consider doing it to give someone disrespectful like that a lesson. Think again. In fact, even speech can be considered violence in our current radical left-leaning societies, and to avoid rough talk and a raised voice near women is the way to go.

Situations like this will also provide an opportunity to reflect and discuss with your partner on how you ought to act and talk to each other. We managed to sort things out. Everything is not gloomy in our current feminist universe, although various random people from the opposing team might want to make things bad for you whenever they have the chance.

Read More: Feminist Attack Elderly Gay Man For Saying Older Women Shouldn't Wear Yoga Pants

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

4 Common Items That Are Destroying Your Testosterone Levels

August 31, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Many men are aware of our declining testosterone levels. Ever since the baby boomers came into play, our T-levels have been dropping more and more each year. Many men have tried to counter this, myself included. We spend hours researching which foods boost testosterone, invest hundreds into testosterone replacement therapy, and even make shady connections with steroid dealers to get that oh-so-coveted T-boost.

What most men don't focus on, however, is the hidden chemicals that are destroying your testosterone levels. Ever since the big business boom of the 1960's began, companies have been sneaking unnatural preservatives, chemicals, and other junk into your food, household items, and even clothing. Simply avoiding some of these common mistakes will help you boost your testosterone in no time.

1. Your Tap Water

Every single day, Americans consume thousands of gallons of water—but did you know that there's a large swathe of chemicals in your tap water that have been linked to lower testosterone levels? Fluoride, although often touted as a solution to rotting teeth, has not only been linked to having a lower IQ, but also to declining testosterone levels. Is it any wonder that the Bilderberg-controlled government puts it in our water supplies like there's no tomorrow?

The solution to this is to buy a reverse osmosis filter. I personally installed one nearly five years ago, and feel absolutely incredible. When you're not putting dissolved birth control pills, IQ-sapping fluoride, and probiotic-killing chloride into your body every day, you tend to feel much better.

2. Your Kitchenware

Most men don't know this, but 99% of the stuff you have in your kitchen probably lowers your testosterone levels. No, I'm not talking about foods that kill testosterone, I'm talking about the stuff that you store the food in. Cans, containers, and water bottles all contain a chemical known as Bisphenol-A, or BPA for short.

In addition to being linked to cancer, diabetes, and heart disease, BPA is also a known culprit for having low testosterone. The endocrine disruptor is in everything and anything that's plastic nowadays, even a lot of supposedly "BPA-free" kitchenware. The solution to this is using only glass storage devices, with the exception of water bottles and canteens which should be metal.

I personally only use glass containers to store my grass fed beef, wild caught salmon, and other testosterone boosting foods. It makes meal-prepping a breeze, and ensures that you won't get bogged down by low-T causing BPA's.

3. Your Shampoo

I wasn't kidding when I said that there's chemicals in damn near everything which have been linked to lower testosterone. It's almost like there's a war against men or something, wouldn't you say? Parabens and pthalates, two nasty chemicals linked to being a low-T cuck, are probably in every single one of your cosmetic products. From shampoo to hair spray to moisturizer and even deodorant, you can bet that it's in them.

Both parabens and pthalates have been linked to a plethora of petrifying, penis-pertaining plights, such as:

- Low testosterone
- Infertility
- Weight gain
- Cancer
- …and more

The solution is to only buy paraben-free and pthalate-free cosmetic products. Buy your shampoo, moisturizer, and whatever other cosmetic stuff you use at Whole Foods, Trader

Joe's, or some other organic-friendly store. Always check the labels and make sure your products are free of parabens and pthalates, and make sure your deodorant is aluminum-free, as well.

4. Your Clothing

That's right, even certain articles of clothing are known to decrease your testosterone levels—and no, I'm not talking about wearing a dress or bonnet, I'm talking about outerwear. Waterproof fabrics such as Gore-Tex, Perfluorooctanoic Acid, and other Teflon-based plastics have been linked to increased risk of cancer, infertility, and, you guessed it, lower testosterone levels.

So what in the hell is a man to do? You can't just walk around naked, unless you're a freelance writer/blogger like Roosh or I. Instead, it's best if you simply avoid or minimize your exposure to certain types of clothing. Opt for loose-fitting underwear, as constricting undergarments have been shown to decrease testosterone levels. If you have the option, avoid synthetic chemicals and opt for natural fibers such as wool, cotton, and leather.

If you do have to wear a waterproof jacket or coat, try to find one that's Teflon and PFOA-free. If you absolutely must wear your testosterone-leaching jacket, then at least wear a long sleeve shirt underneath it to minimize skin contact.

Summary

The vast majority of men's modern ailments, from depression to low energy to being overweight to even being an anti-Trump, limp-wristed cuckold, usually come down to not having enough testosterone. As a baseline, you should start by AVOIDING the things which are already lowering your test. Then, and only then, should you be concerned with "boosting" it, or getting TRT.

If you'd like to bypass all the BS and get sky-high test, 4% bodyfat, and a chiseled six pack, check out Jon's flagship fitness eBook, Body of an Alpha. On sale for ROK users only!

Read More: 5 Easy Ways to Boost Your Testosterone

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

TSR: Live With Donovan Sharpe Starts This Monday At 5PM EST

August 31, 2017 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Donovan Sharpe.

This coming Monday, September 4th, which is Labor Day, TSR: Live is going to air live, every weekday afternoon at 5EST/2PST on Youtube.

For those of you who are unfamiliar with my show, the content is going to revolve around self improvement in the areas of health, finance, girls, and relationships.

You guys know I'm not a finance expert, a certified nutritionist or personal trainer, and to be honest I don't consider myself to be an expert in seduction or pickup. Sure, I've fucked more pretty girls than the average man but that doesn't make me a so called "professional dating coach" or "expert PUA or pickup artist." What I do bring to the table is a lot of personal experience and the advice I give men is based on things I've been through and tried myself. Sometimes I'll talk about things I've seen and heard from friends and family but by and large most of what I talk about are my own personal experiences.

I've had six figure incomes on more than one occasion, owned multiple homes, multiple cars and all the rest of that, and I've been broke and homeless. No, that's not an exaggeration. I went from having a six figure job at Research Triangle Park in North Carolina when I was married to later living in a quasi-crack house with literally nothing to my name a few years later, then getting lucky on a few residential properties a few years and making enough money to live a modest but comfortable lifestyle.

I used to be bad with women. I married a woman who was a drug addict and committed paternity fraud. I rented a house for a single mom and her son while she was fucking her baby daddy on the side. I proposed to a girl after I knew she cheated on me multiple times. I came from all of that to being able to sleep with good looking girls on the regular.

I weighed over 300 pounds when I was married and as you guys can see, I don't anymore. I'm 6'1", 230 and in great shape.

So I'm no expert in any of these fields but I've managed to create a great life for myself and I'm more content now than I've ever been at any point in my life and I'd like to share with you guys how got here and what I do on a daily basis to make sure I stay here.

I'm also going to talk about articles, videos, and blogs you need to checkout so you can stay on your game and I'm also going to talk about the shenanigans women involve themselves in just in case you start to slip back into blue pill thinking. That will be a daily segment because a lot of guys out there secretly believe that women aren't as bad as we say they are. You say to yourself, "Okay Donovan you make good points but they can't be THAT bad."

Well if you listen to TSR: Live I can assure you that you won't fall into that trap and end up getting duped by these hos out here.

So tune into TSR: Live at 5PM Eastern, 2PM Pacific starting this Monday September 4th which is Labor day and every weekday afternoon after. Click here to visit my Youtube and subscribe so you can watch the first show.

Want more Donovan Sharpe? Visit his website and checkout his podcast The Sharpe Reality on YouTube, Soundcloud, or iTunes.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

When The Little Inconveniences Of Living Abroad Begin To Add Up

September 1, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

The cashier at the restaurant handed me the credit card terminal. I slid my card into the terminal, as I'd done many times before. As the receipt printed, I removed the card from the terminal—also, as I'd done many times before. It was then she yelled at me.

She was speaking a language I couldn't understand. Slavic. But, her tone was unmistakable. She was pissed. Then she changed to English:

"Why you remove the card!! It wasn't done. Now it is all bad."

She called the younger, male employee over. I assumed it was to fix whatever issue I'd caused with the credit card machine. As she finished talking to him in their native tongue, he turned on me in the same angry tone.

"You CANNOT remove the card!!! Why did you do that?!?! It wasn't done, you shouldn't have done that."

As if I didn't understand the first time. Finally, I fired back.

"I KNOW. I understand it wasn't ready. It printed, I thought it was done. You can stop YELLING now."

Everybody behind me in line looked up, slightly bewildered. I'd had it. I was a paying customer, and while I understood it was my fault—I wasn't going to sit there and be yelled at. I merely matched their tones. As I left the restaurant, I pulled out my phone and logged onto my bank's mobile app.

There were two identical charges from the restaurant. The first one had gone through just fine, as I had suspected. It was in this moment… I missed home.

Soviet medicine…

The Doctor

I woke up for the fifth day in a row with a splitting headache, and a bit of light-headedness. I got out of bed, and poured my morning cup of coffee in the hopes that it would solve the problem. For the fifth day in a row, it didn't. What I initially had assumed was nasty jet-lag was showing symptoms of a nasty sinus infection of sorts.

I emailed multiple "general practitioners" offices that day after their phone numbers never picked up, asking when they had an open appointment, and how much it would cost a foreigner to get a basic checkup for a likely sinus infection. A week later I'd heard nothing.

The symptoms continued. I was always tired. I wasn't getting my work done. I was cranky and irritable. My girlfriend tried calling around. The one clinic she could get a hold of told her they could see me…in 3 weeks. I started researching natural cures for sinus infections, thinking I'd just be a doctor myself if no doctor in this country wanted to take my money and write me a prescription.

For the next three days, I downed raw garlic with whatever nasty concoction I'd thought of, and hoped it would go away. For two days, I felt like a genius. Then the symptoms returned. Finally, on a Friday afternoon I went to Google again and found a doctor right down the street. I walked into her Soviet-style office. Her entire "office" was one room, with two desks and one patient "table".

She told me she could see me right then and there. She performed an examination on me while I sat on a plastic chair next to her desk. She wrote me a prescription, and I paid a reasonable $25 for her 5 minute service. A week later, the symptoms persisted. I felt scammed. It was in this moment… I missed home.

The Deliveryman

I was waiting for an expensive package to be delivered by DHL. I'd arranged to be around the whole day. My apartment has four locked doors before you can even ring my doorbell, so I had to be. All morning, I heard nothing. At 11:41am, I refreshed my tracking page and was met with disaray.

"11:32am: Address invalid, please contact DHL to confirm contact."

I called DHL. Apparently the number the driver had was wrong.

ME: "Did the driver think to contact the alternate number on the order?"

DHL*: "No."*

"Okay…can you have him drop it off at the local DHL?" (One just five minutes away from me)

"No."

"Why?"

"Because. You can pick up the package tonight, at the DHL warehouse. Anytime after 6pm, I think." (This warehouse being a 1-hour 1-way trip for me)

"Are you SURE it'll be there at 6pm?"

"No. Maybe 7pm, maybe 8pm. I don't know."

I sighed.

I ventured out to the warehouse—my journey entailing two metro lines, and an old-school

Soviet style bus. The driver was pissed with me that I didn't have exact change—this bus wasn't included on my all-city transit pass, unbeknownst to me (hindsight is 20/20, I should have just taken Uber).

I finally made it to DHL and retrieved my package. As I stood in a grassy, desolate field in the middle-of-nowhere while waiting for the return bus—while holding $1,000+ worth of electronics in my hand—I wondered what the hell I was doing with my life.

It was in this moment… I missed home.

Closing Thoughts

It was these moments that make me ponder whether maybe people are when they think I'm crazy for having moved abroad. It was these moments that make me wonder if I can really live abroad for the rest of my life.

I'll admit, at first glance, some of these do seem petty. I consider it the price I pay to live abroad, and to live a good life devoid of all of the poisons of western culture. But no matter how patient and tolerant you are, these things can and will eat at you. The little things on a daily basis wear you down over time. What once was a cool and unique adventure—venturing out to DHL in the boonies, for example—becomes a massive waste of time and frustration.

These three stories are just a handful of the consistent things expats deal with on a usual basis. If you're on shorter trip, you don't even notice these things. It's over the long term you lose patience. And your only choice is to suck it up and deal with it, or return to your home country.

Ultimately, what I've realized is this—no place is perfect.

If you want to learn how to get more dates, check out my free guide. For more articles, visit my blog This Is Trouble.

Read More: 6 Rules All Expats Should Live By

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

11 More Ways The Elite Psychologically Severs Us Through Harmful Conditioning

September 1, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Last week, building on the critical work of Lucien Cerise—a Ph.D and expert in cognitive sciences and transhumanism—I outlined broadly how the occult elite had proceeded to "change" how people think and act over decades. The elite's project is a kind of giant, society-scale neurolinguistic reprogramming. It is a demiurgic attempt to destroy and recreate, to make everything and everyone artificial.

No more men and women, but multi-addicted abstract individuals pretending to decide their "gender" overnight; no more wholesome foods, but Monsanto-grown frankenfoods; and so on. To change a multi-secular, satisfying status quo, the elite took up various roles, chose various scapegoats to take the blame when necessary, impaired our innate ability to discriminate and hierarchize, blurred the difference between truth and fiction. And this was only the beginning.

All these indeed are preparatory steps to make people more plastic. Obviously, a system—as they say in cybernetics—which is unbalanced, contradictions-ridden, and wishing for external help is easier to change than a stable, healthy, and autonomous one. Now, in line with last piece, we cut deeper into how exactly our neo-hermetists did that.

1. Trusting, trivializing, stigmatizing

One of our in-built subconscious categorizations works along the lines of:

- whom I can trust,
- what is regular or trivial or doesn't matter,
- whom I should be wary of.

Common sense, social norms, distinctions between relatives and strangers, and personal experience were more than enough for us to know who or what we should do. Prejudice arises when this pattern of thinking becomes too rigid and hampers one's daily life. Otherwise, this way to categorize people is normal, as long as one can punctually step out from the autopilot and consider someone or something consciously.

The elite took this pattern over by changing its content. For example, people knew intuitively that trannyism was a sign of pathology and degeneracy, but now normies believe trannies are poor innocent victims who should either be considered normal—hence trivial—or pedestaled. Conversely, a wholly new category appeared with modernity: the "far right", which did not even exist before at best the eighteenth century, became synonymous in the normies' minds with a "foul beast" people should relentlessly stigmatize and reject without a thought.

Through reframing, promoting contrived narratives, painting Leftist heroes as sympathetic or more humane in contrast with "right-wingers" who are always depicted as stupid or evil, they shaped a whole worldview of new good and bad guys. Keep the old structure intact, change its contents, and you will have changed pretty much everything.

2. Karpman's triangle: the victim, the tormentor, and the savior

Another in-built triune pattern the System took over is what is commonly referred to as Karpman's triangle. During an interaction, someone starts to become bossy, overcritical, controlling over someone else. The first takes up the role of the "persecutor", the second the role of the "victim", and a third party may come in rescue to the second. These are roles in the sense that they are more like holes or boxes than essential attributes. They can shift, and a purported role might hide something else.

When politics are framed as a wide-scale drama triangle, as it repeatedly happened with the inception of every new "minority" and their "rights", the average Joe is baited to feel empathy to the purported victim, hatred towards the tormentor, and a desire to be or join the rescuing party. This is part of a polarization strategy, not unlike scandalous tabloid headlines. Of course, the repeated use of the victim-tormentor-savior in politics amounts to reducing a complex, nuanced reality to a very simplistic, Manichean narrative, and can be used to hide contrarian truths.

Behind the mainstream world of appearances, people who play the Biggest Oppressed Victim are also the bossier, most narcissistic, and most disrespectful ones—in a single word, crybullies—while deadbeats struggle to be acknowledged as victims too without even noticing the structure they try to fit in, and white knights see themselves as noble rescuers whereas they are little more than enablers of toxic behaviors.

3. Promoting empathy, one-world-fusionism, and the regressive Left

Ancient myths tell of a paradise world, whether inhabited by Adam and Eve or ancient Golden Age Hyperboreans, that turned divided, scattered, rife with warfare and other woes after a major cataclysm. The Babel tower story follows the same pattern.

These myths still resonate much in human psyche. Modern thinkers such as Jean-Jacques Rousseau and Karl Marx tapped there by inventing a kind of "natural state" or primitive communism inhabited by noble, innocent savages. This utopian world, they told, had been destroyed by the establishment of private property. Thus, what better way to "fix the world" than destroying private property and establishing communism? The same goes with castes, social classes, and even the sexes. If we are different, hence unequal, we can all go along very well as long as there are proper, acknowledged boundaries, protecting territories, prerogatives, and other components of identity.

A strong trend inside the Left is the sheer hatred of these boundaries and differences. Everything should merge! No borders! No limits! One world!

After Communism ignominiously failed, the occult elite changed its strategy. Through new-age, they would promote "empathy" as a means to lose sight of who one is and to make men more vulnerable to emotional blackmailing. They blamed the warring aspect of masculinity, promoted "communication" and "consensus" to browbeat men into pussies and turn females into caricatures of men. Aren't our ancestors sooooo guilty of oppressing the whole galaxy after all?

4. Confusion between self, others, and the media

People who are too empathetic can confuse their own feelings or beliefs with others'. This is especially true of individuals who ignore how they can be manipulated, either because they are young, or because they spent their time in an artificial urban world gazing at contrived pictures and lack testosterone. They are all too prone to empathize with characters and points of view that are forcefully presented or suggested to them, no matter their genuineness or truthfulness.

Here is a textbook example of a Leftist inventing a whole scenario out of thin air and selective empathy, then pushing it on Twitter. Upon seeing an unknown Muslim woman in mass transit, (((Rachel Jacobs))) invokes Karpman's triangle and patterns a story where the-white-male-is-an-oppressor, the-muslim-woman-is-a-victim and I-Rachel-Jacobs-or-another-SJW-am-the-fierce-and-noble-savior.

Is Jacobs actually connected to this Muslim woman or fantasizing? Are SJWs retweeting #illridewithyou all merging into a proto-one-world, or individually daydreaming, forgetting their actual hollowness, and twitting with their mental background all conditioned by the media?

Here we have a mixture of the elite's invasive narcissism and blue pill gullibility. The first project its own ideas upon everything else while the second submits to the point of mentally living inside part of the elite's mind and ignores the reality around.

5. Stigmatizing true differences

German jurist Carl Schmitt unveiled an essential feature of the liberal, modern, "democratic" "humanism" when he noticed its fundamental hypocrisy. At first glance, "humanism" celebrates what all humans share, tolerates differences while allowing to "go beyond" them towards a beautiful and harmonious human brotherhood. But in fact, "humanism" threatens to cannibalize all cultures, nations, and lifestyles. "Humanism" destroys the possibility to life peacefully with different and unequal people and instead evilizes whatever it cannot include. If you aren't a "humanist", you aren't fully human!

Thus, having purportedly destroyed or included differences, which is exactly the same when "including" someone or something means making it another brand, "humanism" or progressivism creates a new otherness. This one is not national or geographic but political. All humans are to be cannibalized into the new unity, but beware of the "far right", this black sheep that dares to be different!

After their cognition was impaired by an artificial inability to discriminate or hierarchize, normies can have their brain working normally anew when they at least meet anew with the otherness. At least, good and bad guys! God bless Trump for allowing us liberals to feel superior!

Once again, destroy and rebuild: the mind virus of the 60s prevented distinguishing, hierarchizing, imitating, and now normies can do all that again—distinguish between the "good" refugee and the "bad" evil white male, hierarchize between the invaluable suffering of the "micro-agressed" princess and the unworthy beta male, imitate or follow the media-touted "causes."

Not to forget the typical carrot of "look, we're gonna have a perfectly nice and beautiful world, we just need to eliminate X before… and Y… and Z…" Just say X is "racist" or Y is "-phobic" and this will be enough. Pavlovian conditioning is that simple.

6. Blocking access to new information

"Reality is a far right hoax!"

This may seem out of place in the so-called information age. We have Internet, numberless books around, free communication… how could we lack information? Simple: overloaded with new information and stimuli, the typical individual will follow what is put in front of him as "valuable", "legit" or "the real deal." Those who follow this lead end up, once again, living inside a closed system and blocking whatever might threaten their shared narrative.

In France I have seen numerous bourgeois bohemians quote the globalists' Le Monde religiously. Their "reference newspaper" does not inform on reality, it makes it. On the other side of the pond the same upper middle class herding happens with the New York Times. As society disintegrates into antagonistic small groups, the bewildered mass along with the members of the Hive decide to go on sharing the same illusion.

Hence the emphasizing on the source rather than on objective truth—and why, as long as the System's outlets will repeat such myths as the gender gap, they will keep believing it no matter how debunked it actually is.

Postmodernism went so far as to deny the non-contradiction principle as well as the existence of an objective truth. In the world of fake news or mainstream media, the approved, Hive-belonging outlets are perceived as if they made the truth. Notice how far we went here into make-believe: it is as if truth could be produced or manufactured firsthand, as if everything was a "social construction" subjected to the whims of our demiurgic managers. Race does not exist! Race exists but this is all "social"! White genocide does not exist! White erasure is great!

> I have had the same experience with journalists citing each other about my books without the smallest effort to go to my writings—my experience is that most journalists, professional academics, and other in similar phony professions don't read original sources, but each other, largely because they need to figure out the consensus before making a pronouncement.

> — Nassim Taleb, Antifragile, chap.23

7. Severing the links with the family, with dissenters, fostering social autism

Once external information has been blocked, those who share the same illusion tend to sever their remaining links with those who do not. Large family meals, when they lead the typical blue pill to meet with red-pilled relatives, are typically a quagmire of avoidance, sham, passive-aggressiveness or overt conflict. Hair-dyed twentysomethings will resent their grandparents for being –ist or –phobic.

Do you know what kind of movement leads its members to cut all ties from their relatives and past history? Totalitarian, cultish movements do. Under its smooth façade, mainstreamism orders its members not only to follow, but also to convert their friends and relatives—or to otherize, ridicule, and finally reject them. Thus the bubble becomes thicker and its members all the more together alone, everyone more or less sharing the same semblance of reality.

8. Impairing critical thought, destroying the ability to handle hypotheses, muh feels

In such a context there is no place for doubt. The very habit of being conditioned day after day numbs the mind. When I started philosophy, I remember that most if not all students tried to find simple, immediate answers to the great philosophical questions, as if doubt was an unbearable state. True, the making of hypotheses may be part of an autonomous make-believe, but handling and weighting them requires more than scrolling down a newsfeed or watching Game of Cucks.

SJWs act as if they were absolutely right because they have no notion of probability or hypothesis. The very idea of weighting alternative versions seems anathema to their "feels." Instead, what they display is impatience, intolerance to frustration, rigid thinking, it is hidden behind "clever" or "witty" references, hysteria, clownery, or sheer nonsense.

9. Rewarding this crap with narcissism and passes

“If you’re a good follower, you will have pussies passes if female, tags for virtue-signaling if female, and Victimhood Points if belonging to a minority. Be transblack, transgender, and openly autistic to apply for the Big Victimhood Tournament!”

10. Neophilia

As I said last week, target individuals must will the mind virus or an updated version of it. Making them addicted to fashions, fad, and the Next Big Thing fulfills various functions:

they are obviously more malleable, more prone to follow the media, eager to fit in the bubble so that their mental universe does not crash, able to spend their money on the next iPhone or whatever.

On a deeper level, neophilia is a key component of what some sociologists dub the “liquid society.” After the pater familias was killed, there are no core values, no stable internal structuration. Opinions are fluid—they will drip from one box to another as long as the transition is smooth. We will have pedophilia shoved down our throats, but not now, for the elite still needs to include polygamy and young teens before they start preying too obviously on children. The mainstream is just that, a stream.

11. Anti-Oedipus

Just wait for a few more steps in “equality” and “inclusiveness”

Just like gender roles, “heteronormativity” was until recently something so obvious and normal it didn’t even need to be put into words. Using the vocabulary of cognitive science, one could say that “heteronormativity” and the rejection of incest are built-in parts of any normal mind. These parts have to be a bit enforced during education. The male child must be separated from his mother and do male activities. He cannot do what he wants, or if he does, he will never grow up.

Borrowing to the overrated Deleuze and Guattari, Cerise uncovers their concept of “anti-oedipus” as meaning the exact opposite of this. If you ban the bans, if limiting the children’s range becomes criminalized, or worse, if you encourage the children to go beyond the limits he should respect, what you get is blurred boundaries, a lack of sense of identity, and a desire to “regress” towards being one with one’s mother.

This one might seem a bit far-fetched. And yet, when we see how incestuous some powerful tribe is, well, perhaps all the clutter we faced last decades in relation to sex is a sign that we live in a world they shaped all too much. This can also be a good sign as it proves that, if they are to pull the strings, they must somehow show themselves and can never maintain a complete invisibility.

Read Next: 8 Ways You Have Been Psychologically Severed Through Harmful Conditioning

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Why Aren’t Liberals Enforcing A 50% Female Quota For Secret Service Agents And Bodyguards?

September 3, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Gender social experiments in the military are being conducted at an alarming pace, but the protection of senior American politicians is being left–surprise, surprise–almost exclusively to men. While the national security of Western countries is being progressively dismantled by an influx of poorly qualified female military recruits, those tasked with directly keeping liberals from harm’s way are almost universally male Secret Service agents and other male bodyguards.

Hillary Clinton, for example, really, really didn’t like the idea of having fellow members of the Sisterhood shielding her during her 2016 Presidential run:

Unless these very male-looking Secret Service agents somehow identify as women and fit some kind of female quota for recruits.

At least we know that one half of the Clinton Political Machine doesn't support gender quotas for Secret Service agents.

Alas, senior politicians are afforded the security that the rest of us are being increasingly denied–physically and mentally competent armed protectors, who are almost always going to be men. For all the SJW clamoring about patriarchy and gender bias, SJW

Senators and House Members, or those simply pandering to SJWs from within Congress, are quite happy to outsource their 24/7 personal security to men, largely and even deliberately excluding women.

The two best examples of this hypocrisy are the respective usages of the US Secret Service and the US Capitol Police. The latter body is one of the few law enforcement bodies directly under the control of a legislature, rather than the executive arm of government. The overwhelming majority of frontline Secret Service agents and heavily-armed US Capitol Police, however, are men. None of the transgender or female-oriented military policies orchestrated by the Obama Administration seem to have made their way into the Secret Service or the emergency response arms of the Capitol Police.

When common sense briefly returns–but for very selfish reasons

When their own asses are on their line, liberal politicians opt for men to protect them.

Of course, all of this makes perfect sense. Physically unimpressive women (and men) are a clear liability in situations requiring the protection of government institutions, people, or simply vulnerable locations, as shown in the case of a Muslim terrorist who easily disarmed a female soldier at Paris' very busy Orly Airport earlier this year.

But for us, the mere common folk, our local law enforcement officers do not even have to pass basic fitness tests to ensure we can be protected by them, all because society needs more female police officers ([1] [2]).

In the same vein, potential female members of the US Marine Corps are currently enjoying the white-knighting of a lifetime courtesy of deplorably relaxed physical standards, allowing them to be retained and paid for the kind of poor conditioning that would see male recruits thrown out of the military. More alarmingly still, the present American and wider Western adoration for gender affirmative action comes at the same time that China is undergoing its unprecedented rise as a global military power.

The one context where all the gender diversity madness takes a permanent vacation

Here's a photograph showing the response of the US Capitol Police when an evidently unstable female morotist tried to attack one of their checkpoints, checkpoints designed to protect the 550 Members of Congress from death or serious physical harm:

Where are all the women running at full pace and carrying heavy automatic and semi-automatic weapons? Between early 2007 and early 2011, the Democrats, whose leaders included the ultra-SJW windbag and House of Representatives Speaker Nancy Pelosi, had all the time in the world to take a stand for gender "equality" and mandate a 50% quota for frontline US Capitol Police. They had control of Congress, let's remember. Yet they did nothing.

If an equal representation of women is not good enough for the bodies tasked with protecting politicians, an equal representation (or anything close to it) for institutions as vital as the US military is unacceptable, too. The very heavy division of duties in the Secret Service and US Capitol Police also obscures the very high proportion of men literally putting themselves on the line for liberal, gender experiment-obsessed politicians.

Uniformed desk jobs and other civilian roles give the appearance of a much greater female workforce when, in fact, very few women will ever face any prospect of taking a bullet for their boss. Case in point: some 90% of Secret Service agents are men, and agents across the board exhibit a great diversity (pardon the pun) in the particular dangers of their job roles.

Only by ridiculously increasing the funding for their own protection can liberal politicians feign gender "equality" in the Secret Service and Capitol Police

Nancy Pelosi and the patriarchy.

The Republican-dominated Congress has recently raised the prospect of increasing US Capitol Police funding, but Democrats have done the same thing in the past. This is probably the only way that liberal and SJW politicians could effect some kind of bizarre gender parity in the Secret Service or US Capitol Police. Instead of having half a dozen agents or uniformed police standing with them, a particular person might be given a dozen.

Regardless of whether they choose to ignore the issue entirely or think of dishonest ways to promote gender "equality" when it comes to their own protection, leftist political figures will always ensure for themselves the kind of physical safety that the rest of us could only dream of.

We the general public will get the perverse gender experiments that put us in growing danger, whether from the violent gang-banger or the foreign military opponent like China, while liberals at the top can sleep peacefully with the knowledge that they will always be protected via the public purse–and by men.

Read More: The Australian Military Is Enforcing A 70% Female Quota For New Recruits

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Improve Your Rhetoric

September 3, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

The history of rhetoric – the art of verbal persuasion – stretches back about 2500 years and its very basics are typically taught in high school in the Western hemisphere. It is also a particular subject at many universities around the world.

The classic Greek philosophers Empodocles, Protagoras, Gorgias, Isocrates, Plato and Aristotle have all made valuable contributions to this field. Plato criticized the unethical aspect of persuasiveness in the dialogue Gorgias and made other insights in Phaedrus. Aristotle made the subject more systematic in his work Rhetoric. In the Roman Empire Cicero and Quintilian are some of the most well-known figures in this regard.

Rhetoric have suffered various setbacks throughout history, but have regained its strength and relevance during the 20th and 21 centuries. Although the dark side of rhetoric is associated with mass psychology collectivism under the aegis of modern totalitarianism, it is accepted as something important and probably inevitable in our current world and democratic societies. Both the left and the right use it, although sometimes in quite different ways.

How about the individual male as he enters the world stage, whether it be a very small such, and even online to a significant degree? With the basic rhetoric triad of ethos, logos and pathos as a point of departure, I will give suggestions on how to improve one's ability to persuade and be regarded as a more valuable and respectable person.

Ethos

Ethos is linked to a person's character, and includes a whole plethora of different factors such as social status, appearance, life experience, moral conduct and behavior. The downside of this aspect is that most men will not be listened to even though they may have multiple strengths, for the very simple reason that only a few men can become billionaires, celebrities, lobbyists or politicians. It does not matter if you are smarter than PewDiePie since he has 56 million subscribers while you have 56 (or at least 56 lays I hope).

However, that is no reason to cry because a more average man can still improve his life a lot at his particular level and to some extent strive to reach higher grounds. More specifically it can mean to improve his earnings, body composition, dress style, social network, social capital and ethics. To have a pretty woman at his side will also be a benefit and make him look good. No one listens to losers and why should they?

With regard to actual speech, or actio as it is called in rhetoric, confidence, voice, posture and body language all matter.

Further, do not be a complete macho guy but do not act like a weak male either. Find that optimal balance, vary the way you speak, and change somewhat depending on audience and context. Practice and real experience are crucial ingredients. Study other males, avoid obvious mistakes, but find your own particular way of doing it.

Logos

Logos is the intellectual and logical dimension of rhetoric ability and affects the way you may able to influence people. I know that many think that it is only a waste of time to go to university, but that notion should be approached with some caution. To have a master's or doctoral degree, even if it often has little significance from a mere income perspective, imply a certain level of intellectual sophistication and/or create incentives for to obtain more advanced knowledge.

Regardless, you should be able to better discern knowledge and information in order to improve your logos. No one has complete knowledge and sometimes it is wise to just accept that you do not know this or that, but for example politics, economics, cultural studies and genetics are not rocket sciences. Use unimpeachable sources, to the extent that such exist, and avoid low-value and flawed studies. Think thrice before accepting mainstream science as truths.

As for relevance, facts and logic do not always – far from it – win, but that does not mean that you should neglect it. People will respect a knowledgeable man, and notice that you are well-informed. In this way, a man's logos will positively affect his ethos in a benevolent feedback loop.

Pathos

Lastly, pathos is related to feelings. A masculine man will almost instinctively reject, even scorn, emotionalism.

Still, the wise man knows that emotions affect people under various circumstances, and often overlap common sense morals, such as to be horrified by war, rape, murder and other consequences of the darker shades of the human psyche. Therefore an appeal to emotions can be important and will not even conflict a more aloof and rational image.

I am not a super-big Trump fan but I'll have to admit that I like his persuasive way of stating obvious common sense ideas about right and wrong. Instead of trying to appear like a virtuous man he just asserts what is right or wrong and then moves on.

Additionally, to be upset is only one type of emotion. Two of the historical functions of classic rhetoric were to entertain and please the audience. Wittiness, discussed in Aristotle's The Nicomachean Ethics, is considered as at least a lesser virtue. Therefore, a sense of humor is a powerful weapon and a definitive part of the arsenal.

Yet a delicate balance is required, and humor should not be the backbone of a man's persuasiveness (if he is not comedian, obviously). On the other hand he probably could not be without it either.

Conclusion

As has been illustrated, these three main elements of rhetoric do not exclude but complement each other. Strong logos and pathos influence a man's ethos in a positive feedback loop and might be a key to gradually rise to higher grounds, whether it is only within the frames of a man's private life and workplace, or a more socially important occupation as a politician or public debater.

Looked upon in this broader sense, rhetoric improvement becomes almost the same as general self-improvement, which transcends the traditional conduct of the art of speech.

Read More: How To Recognize Meaningsless Rhetoric From Masters Of Deception

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Feminist Move To Desexualize Breasts Could Allow Men To Squeeze Them With Impunity

September 4, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Touching a woman's breasts without her consent is a textbook example of sexual assault (if sufficiently proven in a court). Yet a growing number of feminists argue that both female breasts and the nipples on them should be "desexualized." If this rather moronic policy proposal is ever implemented, it would be entirely illogical and indeed unfair for any person touching a woman's breasts to ever be accused, let alone convicted of sexual assault.

However, this is exactly what braindead feminists are arguing for en masse:

As for me, I am happy with the status quo: breasts are highly sexual body parts, more so than the male chest, and so laws should exist and be enforced to prevent these breasts being groped without permission. My only concern (and a very big one!) is with the evidentiary standards and procedures for proving that someone, almost always an accused man, actually did sexually assault a woman's breasts. Other than that, laws as they exist now on paper are largely fine.

It is generally agreed that touching a man's pecs will not result in you being arrested for sexual assault, whether you are male or female. Likewise, tapping someone on the very non-sexual shoulder is a universally accepted way of getting their attention. If certain categories of feminists wish to desexualize breasts and female nipples in line with the male chest and nipples, they need to accept the same outcomes as when we men are ever touched on the shoulder or the chest–there's no sexual assault which can be alleged or prosecuted.

Feminist typists gotta type

Back when Cosmopolitan didn't argue that breasts weren't sexualized.

As we would expect, such high-brow publications as Cosmopolitan have shown an interest in "desexualizing" the nipple and therefore breasts. The stupidity of Eliza Thompson's article would be hilarious if it were not for the tragic implications arguments like hers usually end up engendering. By arguing for some kind of perverse "equal" treatment towards men and women's chests, Eliza is really advocating that women should have no recourse to sexual assault laws if they find their breasts forcibly touched or fondled by anyone.

This kind of feminist solipsism will no doubt try to bolster itself by claiming that women can sexualize and desexualize their breasts and nipples at will. When it comes to showing them off in public, their breasts will be entirely desexualized. But if someone touches these breasts, feminists will reserve the "right" to have them treated as sexually as genitalia would be. There is therefore not even a patina of solid ground on which to base such a ridiculous proposal as "Free the Nipple" or "Desexualize Breasts." It is the feminine equivalent of a circle-jerk.

How many times do women touch your chest?

This fan has a better chance of touching Nicholas Cage's chest than my chance of touching Miranda Kerr's–and for good reason.

It happens all the time to me. Some recent examples in my own life include:

- Photos taken in a Bratislava nightclub. Across seven images, I spotted four girls with their hand dead-centre on my chest, palm open.
- I made a joke to a 24-year-old Slovenian birthday girl that 24 in female years is 52 in male years, so she better hurry up and have kids. She playfully pushed my chest and kept her hands there far longer than she should have.
- A female friend came up behind me in London and grabbed my chest from behind to surprise me.

There was no sexual assault in these cases because in legal terms the adult male chest is not sexualized, or at least not nearly as sexualized as the female chest. Desexualizing female breasts and nipples would require a similar non-observance of sexual assault laws for it to make any sense whatsoever. Combine my experiences with yours and these are exactly the things that feminists will have to accept happening to them and other women if they succeed in desexualizing whatever body part they want desexualized.

Of course, many men, myself included, will continue to treat breasts as the sexual body parts they are and behave ourselves accordingly. Others will not. If anything, "Free the Nipple" and related social retardisms represent a desire by feminists to deliberately inflict sexual harm and assault on other women. Who ever said women don't hate each other?

Breasts are highly sexual–for the benefit of women let's keep it that way

Her boobies are sexualized and for good reason.

Unless a mother is breastfeeding in public (and thank you to those women who are not childless, cat-lady feminists), there are powerful reasons why breasts are deliberately kept sexualized, both socially and in terms of the law.

“Equality” for male and female chests is not only a rejection of common sense, it will encourage actual sexual assault under the flimsy guise of gender non-discrimination. It is akin to proposing equal menstruation rights when men do not have periods.

Read More: One College’s Bizarre Approach To Sexual Assault

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Downsides Of Dating Traditional Women

September 4, 2017 | by Chris George | Link | Original Link

Women coming from more traditional societies, such as in Eastern Europe, Southeast Asia, and the Caribbean, are often being compared by mostly Western authors to their US, UK, and Western European counterparts. Their femininity, obedience, care, and support are hugely praised. As somebody that has grown up in Eastern Europe (Bulgaria) and spent the larger part of the last five years in the Southern Pacific (the Philippines), I have been surrounded by such women basically my whole life, but there are some downsides to dating this type of woman.

1. Traditional women are very dependent

It’s a fact that a lot of the girls from poorer countries have less resources than men and if they want to have a better life, they need somebody who can provide them with more resources. This is among the main reasons why Western men have tremendous success out of their home countries—their potential for resource extraction is immediately being recognized.

Let’s not pretend however that the male role of a “provider” has only upsides. Usually those girls will remain dependent on you throughout your relations. If you are just dating casually, you won’t get to feel it hard, because you just pay for a few drinks and meals here and there, but if you consider getting into a relationship, know that it will be up to you to provide till the bitter end (or probably forever, depending on marriage laws).

Lots of traditional women are street-smart and can learn quickly, but they usually didn’t spend the time and money to pursue fancy degrees, which could make them into the dreaded strong and independent career woman. If you can shoulder the bill and carry another person on your back (apart from any prodigies you may end up having together), then all should be good.

If you can barely afford to have a good life on your own, when you start “providing” chances are you will find yourself in the predicament of a reduced standard of living. I know that many guys get excited by the thought that their woman’s existence is dependent on the money they bring home, and this may not be a concern for you if you are loaded, but it is definitely a commonly overlooked factor worth considering before committing to anything long term.

2. They are extremely good at long game

My impression from reading about Western women is that the hardest part is establishing a meaningful relationship with them. This comes very natural to traditional girls, as traditional societies are still largely focused around family life and don’t cater very well to singles. Hence, chances are that by the time you meet one, she has already been in at least 2-3 long-term relationships before. While guys in the traditional countries may vary between very weak and extremely macho and dominant, the women are almost always naturally gifted at tying you down.

Observing traditional girls playing the long game is quite the masterpiece because you rarely get what's going on, if and when it's happening to you. Some men may consider this an asset and I'm definitely not one to hold it against women for their ability to initiate, build, and sustain long-term relationships, which can lead to starting a family together. Before you know it though, you'll find their over-consuming presence in all areas of your life and unless you are equally gifted at long-game and sticking for your own goals, she will have carefully navigated you towards a path that best suits her interests but not necessarily yours.

Most men I have observed, regardless if having had affairs with hundreds of women or marrying their high-school sweetheart, usually react very similarly in such context: they play along up until they feel the benefits of the relationship outweigh the negatives and if this stops to be the case, they find themselves in a situation where it's equally difficult to restore the balance and gain back control, as it is to change or leave their partner.

Decades ago, when family traditions were at their peak, a couple would eventually hit that unbalanced state after many years if not decades. Nowadays, thanks to the internet and freedom of movement, this moment happens much faster in a relationship, usually before the birth of a child, while the temptation to choose a path different than family life are always at an arm's length.

In short, Western women may suck at building relationships and traditional women may be extremely skilled at it, but unless you are able to time their presence in your life with your own priorities and purpose, in the long run you would eventually feel equally discontent in both cases, albeit for slightly different reasons.

3. They don't age well

Women in Eastern European and Southeast Asian countries seem to have two states of physical appearance: quite feminine and attractive up until certain age and then almost immediately and automatically they turn into near-granny material (late 30's – early 40's). Some would argue that this applies to women in general, but I think that poor living conditions, lower access to healthcare, higher alcohol consumption and less money for plastic surgeries and expensive cosmetics are factors that make the transition more notable and sudden than among Western women.

The traditional society also plays quite a big role here, where women say it's "inappropriate" for somebody at their age to go to gym, dress elegantly or go out in bars and clubs, something women in the West still frequently do deep into their 40's.

All in all, my main point as someone who has (almost) exclusively dated and mated with traditional women is that even though they seem like an overall better deal than their Westernized counterparts, they also come with their own set of fine print that you must understand and accept before opting for a long-term relationship.

Read Next: A Traditional Sex Role Success Story

Chris George
An Eastern European shapeshifter, traveler, future cryptocurrency mogul and modern-day Casanova on the quest of finding the perfect balance between family life and building a modern day harem. Currently exploring the beauties of SEA and writing about life and game at Casanova.bg.

Victory For Fathers: Israeli Court Rules Both Parents Must Share Child Support With Joint Custody

September 4, 2017 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

As a divorced man, I have an ongoing burden. It is child support. I, like many of my divorced brothers, am the sole person responsible for my kid's financial welfare. The law in the state of Israel, much like other nations, puts that burden on me. A burden which the kids' mother does not share legally.

My story is maybe somewhat different, yet it shares the same dynamic and narrative of others: I married an epiphany stage girl, who sought out a good beta provider (with some alpha qualities). I was blue as a smurf, and have the scars to show it.

That is why I momentarily rejoiced, upon reading the following news (on July):

> The [Israeli] Supreme Court ruled on Wednesday that divorced mothers of children aged six to 15 will have to share equally the financial burden of child support with the fathers if their salaries are equal or the woman's is higher and children are in joint custody.
>
> The ruling, issued by an expanded panel of seven justices, was given in response to an appeal by two divorced men whose ex-wives earned higher salaries than they did but who were still required to pay child support even though their children were in joint custody.

Justice? Could it be?

This sounds fair enough. Yet as we live in the matrix, I decided to read the verdict for myself. Even though I'm not a lawyer, I decided to share the story, the good, and the bad with ROK readers.

The story

The couple, to which the verdict refers, married in 1999. They divorced in 2014, having 3 kids. They agreed to an actual joint custody (equal number of nights the kids spend at any parents over a time period). The mother also makes up slightly more than the father (he makes ~3500$/month and she makes ~3750$/month). That is close enough to be considered equal income.

In late 2013 (during the divorce procedure), she sued him for child support of 2500$/month. I was actually mortified at that number. Does she even understand the consequences of her asking that? As CH states:

> When the love is gone, women can be as cold as if they had never known you.

The family court ruled against her. The female judge stated that the principles of justice and equality requires looking at both parents income and mandating child support based on those. However, since it is not according to previous rulings, the judge decided that it is only for the ages of 6-15.

If a female feels that she is entitled to money, she won't back off that easy. She appealed to the district court, and at the beginning of 2015 a verdict providing her with 800$/month of child support. That was because that verdict was based on the Israeli and Jewish law, as well as fear that father would use joint custody as an excuse for reduction of child support while not “pulling his weight as a parent”.

It seems that there was a contradiction. On one side is the law, which requires the man, and only the man, pay child support first. On the other side is equality and justice which require that both parent share the burden.

The father appealed to the Supreme Court and was able to hold off the verdict until the new verdict (which is final).

The Good

1. The court noticed that there is a gender bias, and this time it’s against men.

That is a good thing as it pushes back on the feminist/SJW narrative that “the oppressor cannot be oppressed”. You want to fight against SJW narrative? Here is a case of applying equalism ideology to its full extent.

2. The court noticed and mentioned that divorced fathers carry a financial burden much greater than divorced mothers.

Next time she tells you that divorced women have it tough, you can say, “Well sweetie, the Supreme Court thinks fathers have it much harder financially. Would you like to switch and carry the financial burden, while the man sits at home and collects child support?”

Maybe not that much of a burden

3. The court quoted the UN “Convention on the Rights of the Child” article 27:

> 1. States Parties recognize the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for the child’s physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development.

> 2. The parent(s) or others responsible for the child have the primary responsibility to secure, within their abilities and financial capacities, the conditions of living necessary for the child's development.

This means that lowering the father's standard of living is against the UN treaty, that most states are part of. Next time you are in court, try using it (I doubt it, but it's worth a try).

4. Maybe the most important is the ruling: child support is based on both parents financial ability (ages 6-15).

This means that a frivolous divorcee cannot just claim that the kids need "their high standard of living". In this case she will need to take ownership of (at least) her part in it. Also, this brings the share custody into the public awareness again.

The Bad

1. The court adopted the common feminist view of the "wage gap".

Even though it has proven time and again as false, the Israeli Supreme Court still quotes feminist literature and articles and believes that women earn less and it is because they take care of the household. Even our dear attention-whores from Huffpo know it's false. But as we all know, If you repeat a lie often enough, it becomes the truth.

2. The court adopts a view that fathers seeking joint custody maybe just trying to lower their child support.

Sometime the SJW feminists are tangled in their own web. On one side they want mothers and fathers to be equal parents. On the other side, if a father tries to be an equal parent (joint custody), then he is automatically a suspect. This is exactly what my colleague Ryan Campbell recently titled his recent article: "Men Will Always Be Seen As Evil By Feminists" .

3. The court says it will not provide a formula for child support. It will be on a case by case basis.

If the law is clear and simple, people know what to do. If it is a "case by case" than it is up to the judge (Israel does not have jury). This makes situations more complicated and creates confusion. It was recently stated that 'constructive ambiguity' is good for your game, but it is certainly not good for hedging risks such as marriage.

More than that, article 61 of the verdict mandates family courts to determine a mechanism to handle "other required expenditures" for the kids. It is to be based on one parent who will be compensated by the other or even a joint bank account. This, to me, is somewhat disturbing. Joint bank account is what you had when you were married. It didn't work than, why should it work now? Also, since women are prone to get into debt, what happens if she uses that account for an "I had to buy it, now you pay it" expenditure?

This is how I feel financially after my divorce

One good thing about divorce that I noticed is that you can hedge your family expenses. Child support is known, and unless a catastrophe happens (and they usually don't), you have a good idea how much you will need to cough up every month.

Final Thoughts

The verdict itself can be found here (it's in Hebrew). As I state above, there is both good and bad. I believe that the good (this time) outweighs the bad. Please note that is is relevant only to Israel, but the sentiment may spread to other countries.

Sometimes, when one applies justice and equality, it can favor man (at least compared to what we had until now). We will have to see if other developments in this area will take place. The Israeli DoJ has been stalling or trying (depends on which side of the feminist map you sit) not to change the law, even after several appointed committees pointed out some of the current injustices named in the verdict. I'm semi-optimistic, as Israel has a relatively low divorce rate of 30%.

Read Next: Man Must Pay $30,000 Child Support For Someone Else's Kid

Dawn Pine

Dawn Pine (aka TheMaleBrain) is an Israeli 40+ divorced father of 2, former casualty of the blue-pill. Since he has taken the red pill his hobbies are: working out, writing, mentoring, harem management and self improvement.

How To Adjust When Moving From Hedonistic PUA To Long-Term Lover

September 5, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Previously, I have outlined the contours of an optimal personality profile and emphasized what I consider to be the three crucial factors that determine the bulk of your dating success (looks, confidence, and determination). I have also come across Return of Kings senior game writer Troy Francis' book *How To Be An Assh*le That Beautiful Women Love* and will partly relate my argument on its main idea.

The underlying concept in Francis' book is that the so-called dark tetrad—Machiavellianism, narcissism, psychopathy and sadism—combined with positively standing out from the rest of the male crowd, is the explosive powder which is required to bed the most attractive females.

I think it is a very reasonable idea and doesn't exclude the importance of the three factors that I mentioned. In fact it goes hand in hand in many ways, since a person's personality profile largely underlies his looks, confidence, and determination. A little bit of sadism brings that extra dimension in the bedroom, and may be reason why hotter women stick around.

However, when it comes to long-term relationships, some of the dark elements have to be toned down at the expense of other more "beta" traits.

The importance of agreeableness, gregariousness, conscientiousness, and openness to experience

Many of us can agree that a significant degree of dark traits are required when it comes to modern dating. They will also be needed when one seeks after a more traditional woman. The Machiavellian man knows how to display the sides that are in his favor, and a confident male who looks good and has ambition is a near-universal appeal for the opposite sex.

But within the frames of long-term relationship—perhaps even a mini-relationship—with a fairly healthy woman, other sides are needed as well. Sure, you should continue to possess frame, ambition, good looks, and cunning, but a relationship is more than mental games and wild sex. It is about interpersonal intimacy, having fun, and showing loyalty. For this you need the four personality traits of agreeableness, conscientiousness, gregariousness and openness to experience, of which the two first-mentioned are almost the complete opposites of the dark tetrad.

Trait	Description
Openness	Curious, original, intellectual, creative, and open to new ideas.
Conscientiousness	Organized, systematic, punctual, achievement oriented, and dependable.
Extraversion	Outgoing, talkative, sociable, and enjoys being in social situations.
Agreeableness	Affable, tolerant, sensitive, trusting, kind, and warm.
Neuroticism	Anxious, irritable, temperamental, and moody.

In order to connect with another human being, you need to be warm and kind, and even gregarious (a facet of extroversion). To some extent your partner is your friend, and you could do things that you and your best male friend could do together, such as meeting your respective family, friends, having dinners, and traveling. That is rather obvious and should come as no surprise to anyone who has been in a LTR and observed many others throughout life.

Also consider the conscientious aspects, such as being reliable, having your finances in order, and showcasing sound moral behavior. These are all positive features. It is not more complicated than the fact that you need some of these things to have a normal life between those more delicate moments of passionate sex, joyful leisure activities, and unforgettable trips to various places around the world.

The latter is also also linked to openness and experience. You don't have to manifest your intellectual prowess to your girlfriend, if that was not a reason why you ended up together in the first place, but be open for some fresh ideas every now and then. You are still you, with a unique essence, but some new elements can be positive for both you and your partner. They can be both sexual and non-sexual.

Often it is as easy as you suggesting a place where you want to go, or something that you want to do, and then you do that together. To convey such a message to your partner and convince her about your suggestion being the most optimal is not difficult for a man of some value. Be a leader, while simultaneously being somewhat open for compromises and your partner's wishes. Females love urbane men who know their way around, and the men love themselves for it.

Conclusion

The dark tetrad, to a proper degree, is a powerful tool that a man may use in order to attract women in general and attractive such in particular. However, within a long-term relationship, brighter dimensions are needed to counter the dark traits and create a fruitful balance within the kaleidoscope which makes up most modern relationships. This is because human nature as such is quite complex and variegated.

Read More: How "Soft Game" Can Help Men Who Are In Committed Relationships

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

France Adopts Law That Uses Informants To Monitor Private Conversations For “Hate Speech”

September 5, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

The French Government, led by Emmanuel Macron, adopted a law on the 5th of August 2017 punishing non-public “provocations, insults & slander” against those who are (or not) part of a certain group based on their supposed race, religion, gender identity, sexual orientation, etc. This unprecedented measure relies on tips that inform and extract private conversations and exchanges. If found guilty, the accused can face prison, heavy fines, or “re-education”.

Parody comes to life

This measure comes after the Night of The Digital Knives and recent crackdowns led by Western liberal governments against views that they brand as “hate speech.”

In France, the usual suspects holding the reins of power already made sure to direct their sanctions entirely against the subversive voices that dared speak their mind against the globalist narrative in public, but from now on, you are not allowed to express your opinion behind closed doors.

This motion was obviously adopted in quasi-secrecy and none of the French media reported on it. It is one the heaviest attacks on free speech ever created in the modern Western world.

A law that reflects the fragility of the liberal mind

This is a real headline

Here is a rough English translation of the new law. There is no definition given in the text of what is “racist”, “transphobic” or “intolerant”—it will be decided by your accuser and the jury, but something tells me that heterosexual right-wing white men, being at the bottom of the “victimhood pyramid,” will be the great majority of those targeted. “Everyone I don’t like is Hitler” comes to life in the form of a decree that punishes dissenting citizens, without investigating if what they declare is the truth or not.

If you say something offensive in a private conversation, on social media, in telephone calls, or in your emails, you can be prosecuted and your life destroyed.

The law is enforced through outside tips and informers that can only come from the ones close to you. I would not be surprised if the state introduces a monetary reward system or bounties for the tips and information given to the government about “problematic elements”.

Sanctions worthy of an Orwellian regime

In addition to prison sentences, category five fines between 1500 and 3000 euros usually accompany offenses of the same type that are uttered in public. Here is the section of this law that describes the new penalties:

> Art.R. 625-8-2. Persons guilty of the offences detailed in this section shall incur, in addition to the penalties already in vigour, the following additional penalties:
>
> (1) The prohibition of applying for or carrying, for a period of not more than three years, a weapon subject to authorisation;
>
> (2) The confiscation of one or more weapons of which the condemned is the owner or of which he has the legal access;
>
> (3) The confiscation of the device which served or was intended to commit the offence or the item which is the product of the said device;
>
> (4) Community service for a period of twenty to one hundred and twenty hours;
>
> (5) The obligation to perform, if necessary at his own expense, a training course of citizenship and civility.

Your weapon, legally purchased, will be seized and you can't apply for a permit. Your right as a citizen to legally possess a weapon is nullified because you upset someone with words.

The device used to relay the "insult" is confiscated. Phones, computer, tablets will be held by the state. It is evident that the device will be investigated for evidence of additional "hate speech." If found, heavier charges can be made.

The citizenship training course (if it is the same one currently approved by French courts) will teach one the "republican values of tolerance and the respect of human dignity". You will be taught the correct way to think.

That would not be a French law without double standards

The French government is taking a radical step against thought crime. Stiff measures already existed to punish dissenting wrong-think in public, but now the Rubicon is once more crossed with this law relying solely on informants, alleged accusations, broad interpretation, and subjective opinion.

Stating facts in a private conversations will be now racist, homophobic, ableist or LGBTZOZZLEOphobe. If I enter the privacy of my own home and declare "God, I wish I had an eye for every existing gender", as I have two eyes and I am white, all the xirs and xers fluid demisexual otherkins of the neighbourhood can now drag me to court.

Obviously, this does not apply to those calling for the death of whites, exhorting their followers to use trucks of peace against pedestrians, or defend and celebrate paedophilia as a beautiful thing.

One further step towards madness

It echoes the numerous cases of vocal right-wing activists that got tried and were found guilty of hate speech in the past. Some might have heard of Boris Le Lay, a monarchist right-wing blogger from Brittany who got sentenced to six years of prison (he is still in exile) for saying that Black Celts never existed in his native Brittany (a known historical fact)

The comedian Dieudonné, whose status as a famous black person did not protect from the almighty French multiculturalists, and Jewish conservative writer and journalist Eric Zemmour both collected hefty fines for their speech.

After multiple attacks on French soil by Islamic terrorists, the priority of the state is not protecting French life but going after those who expose the lies of their narrative.

Comment s’en protéger

Delete Facebook and its useless counterparts if you have not yet done so. It is waste of time and a clever tool for the establishment to gather information on you and possibly use them against you in the future.

Use VPNs & install the browser Brave which does not track your data. The /pol/ board of 4chan lead the charge against the Google behemoth by promoting the software Adnauseam which clicks adds for you randomly and forces the company to refund advertisers. Moliere's article is excellent on the subject of online anonymity.

If the many articles here have not convinced you of the war that is going on, I must refresh your memory. This is a cultural war. The government will not help you, and is your number one enemy. You are nothing but cattle to the elite. If you rebel and get caught, you will be dealt with and vaporised.

Get yourself in order, become bullet-proof, weight you actions, count on your brothers, do not accept the elite's lies, and keep fighting with every breath and you might prevail.

Read more: The European Union Partners With Facebook, Google, And Twitter To Censor "Hate Speech"

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

How To Stay Healthy And Strong As You Get Older

September 5, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Time comes for all of us, regardless of who you are or what your status is. I would certainly hope that it's not a controversial opinion that nobody escapes from the ravages of age. Simply put, everybody is going to get older, unless you deign for whatever reason to die right now—and frankly, I have no desire to be blamed for a suicide epidemic so please don't do this.

Jokes aside, what will be sort of difficult for many physical culturists to grasp is that your body will get weaker and less able once you get beyond a certain point in age. This is especially difficult for those who were born weak and feeble and have continuously built their strength, stamina, and ability throughout their lives in a never-ending physical "prime"—and that includes myself.

However, just because your physical capabilities will inevitably be somewhat diminished with age, that does not mean that you have to stop exercising entirely once you get beyond the age of 30 or so. The "dad bod" is a real phenomenon, but it doesn't necessarily have to be.

Why The Decline?

Before we can discuss how to slow the ravages of age, we should first discuss what those afflictions are: simply put, as a person gets older, the human body will undergo many changes that will adversely affect the person, in particular the stiffening of blood vessels and the slowing of its production of the sex-determining hormones, amongst other things.

For men, this will lead to a decrease in fertility, decrease of muscle mass and bone density, and increase in body fat, in addition to a decrease in one's cardiovascular and muscular endurance.

All of these bodily changes will sneak up on the unsuspecting man and hit him all at once, and they'll only continue as the years go on. Faced with such a sudden decrease in physical capabilities, the average man will relax more and exercise less and pretty soon you'll wake up with the dreaded dad bod pictured above.

What Can Be Done?

Simply put, what you have to do to slow the aging process is continue exercising. That statement is, of course, blindingly obvious, so I feel that a greater degree of explanation is required.

We can begin by looking at the main afflictions of age, and how exercise can affect those:

1. The Loss of Bone Density

As one ages, your bones become thinner and weaker—this is hardly something that can be disputed, and the increasing likelihood of bone disorders such as osteopenia and osteoporosis can speak to that.

As luck would have it, in addition to "getting swole", heavy resistance training has also been documented to strengthen the bones and other connective tissues of the body. Thus, even mainstream doctors—the better ones at least—will advise elderly patients to do some sort of resistance training.

As for what sorts of resistance training you should do, I would recommend doing the exact same sort of resistance training that a young man does, just with reduced weight and repetitions. Whether you are a young man or an old man, proper form is the key, and should you be using proper form in your lifting, you will avoid injury and repetitive stress, whether you are 20 or 80.

2. Strength Loss

While athletes often say that your strength is the last thing to go (certainly it goes after endurance), it will eventually go, especially if the connective tissues are no longer conditioned. Thus, keeping your strength up as an old man is done in the exact manner as retaining your bone density: continuing your resistance training, combined with eating a nutrient rich diet.

3. Weight Gain

Along with the decrease in muscle mass and testosterone production, age is often associated with a slowing of metabolism and increased percentage of body fat. And, yet again, continuing a program of resistance training, whether it be weights or calisthenics, has been associated with increasing one's natural testosterone levels.

Combine that with a sensible diet, and you'll find yourself slowing or even reversing signs of aging, or at the very least becoming one hell of a silver fox

4. Circulation

Leaving resistance training behind for now, cardio is also important for the older person—arteriosclerosis, a stiffening of the blood vessels, is a natural process with age. To increase your circulation, you can perform any sort of exercise that gets your heart rate up, again bearing in mind to reduce the intensity for considerations of age. This can range from traditional cardio, to circuit training, to even traditional strength training which will give you a small secondary benefit of cardiovascular training.

If you are a retiree, you likely have more free time than a younger man, but even if that is the case, I would still recommend doing the fundamental compound lifts and calisthenic moves. I certainly plan on continuing fitness as I get older, and all of you should as well.

Read More: A Brief Guide To Fitness After 40

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

What Does Antifa Want?

September 6, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Recently, "The Antifa Manual" was found at Evergreen College, America's most pozzed-out campus possibly excepting Columbia and Berkeley. It doesn't go into urban guerrilla tactics (which would've been an informative read), but it does focus on ideology and offers an eye-opening look at the type of world they want.

It's not really an official document; Antifa is too decentralized for those. Thus, one could object that the unnamed author doesn't speak for all of them. However, apparently this is someone intimately familiar with their rhetoric and goals.

What is Antifa?

They represent an alliance of convenience between Anarchism and Communism, symbolized by a red flag covering a black flag. Anarchy does have a following, which is at its most workable in the very broadest sense of local authority. However, as for the traditional meaning of no government whatsoever, that stuff is for failed states and fourteen year olds. Still, these guys should study history and see how well Anarchists and Communists got along during the USSR's early days and the Spanish Civil War's later days.

Many Antifa cells became notorious for staging violent counter-demonstrations using improvised weapons. They're sometimes known for recruiting from the homeless, appear to have a cult-like environment, and wish to make the USA ungovernable. According to a former member, hard drug usage is commonplace. All told, violent cells act as radical leftist paramilitary gangs.

Who they consider enemies

Wedgie time for fierce Red Guard at Berkeley

As their name indicates, they oppose fascism. The definition of fascism is debatable; myself, I'd take Mussolini's Doctrine of Fascism as a starting point. However, apparently some Antifa members have their own special definition.

The front page begins:

> Do not distribute to any cis[gendered] white males non PoC [people of color] non-LGBTQ peoples a.k.a. fascists.

So there you have it—every straight white guy is a fascist. Anarchists such as Mikhail Bakunin and Peter Kropotkin fall into this very broad category; likewise untold numbers of mainstream liberals like Al Gore and Bernie Sanders.

Warnings to keep the document secret appear twice elsewhere. That's rather curious; normally, political manifestos are made available to the public as widely as possible. What kind of movement wouldn't want to say what they're all about, loudly and proudly? It's advertising, right?

Their motives

Res ipse loquitur

After the opening, the first topic of discussion is “White Privilege”. It begins stating that the printing presses, newspapers, and TV were always controlled by white guys. Curiously, no complaints are made about the press in Japan, China, and Korea being Asian-dominated, but there I go being a spoilsport. Then this:

> Some of our kind have begun to infiltrate high-level positions of power in major media organizations.

Later parts of the document further emphasize taking over the media. Its author should meet the toxically leftist journalism students I attended college with, doing their part to push MSM bias since these Antifa dopes were dirtying diapers. They certainly weren’t the first batch of media manipulators either!

> And of course … the new king of idea dissemination is Social Media.

Here we have some truth at last. If social media didn’t exist to discuss things the MSM was conveniently ignoring, then Hillary would be President. Today’s increase in censorship is only about thought control—despite the pretext—but all that’s another matter.

Hence, cis white males have inherent privilege in our society. This is the basis on which people of color, LGBTQ, the disabled, and other groups that need protection will level the playing field and form a New World Order a.k.a. One World Government. A government by protected classes of people, for protected classes of people, for the protection and betterment of all of humanity.

Check it out, someone took a sociology class!

The rest is basically the same guilt-tripping baloney that impressionable students have been indoctrinated with for decades. People like me are a bunch of warmongers who've done no good for the world, blah blah blah. (If that's simply our nature, then why are we supposed to feel guilty about it?) Apparently the writer never heard of peaceful folks like the Mongol Golden Horde, the Aztecs, Shaka Zulu, or the Imperial Japanese army.

Tips on rhetoric

Yes, literally!

The next section, "Creating a Culture of Tolerance", states:

> Every idea critical of our movement or our way of thinking must be condemned as: racist, homophobic, misogynist, etc.

Then it recommends deploying the reductio ad hitlerum when losing an argument. Dissenting minorities must be silenced, because they don't know what's good for them. As for dissenting whites, a later section is called "Believe the Way We Do or You Will Be Fired". (Pretty tolerant, right?) Dude, tell us something new!

> Our color, my blackness, for example, comes first. It defines who I am. Black first, American second. Gay/Lesbian first, little person / dwarf second, American third, and so on

But what if you're a patriotic blue Smurf ?

The author gloats:

> By 2117, one hundred years from now, our goal is to have 70% of the US population be non-white.

This is to be done through illegal immigration (which must be named something else), anchor babies, emotional appeals, and (in "Speeding Up Progress") abortion.

Does that seem a smidge overreaching? Really, all that's pretty tame; aren't liberals already on board with those things? Well, that's so long as it never affects their own neighborhoods, but good luck with that one.

Their real goals

What a waste…

"Phase 2: The Socialization of Capital" opens:

> Never reveal our endgame, but the obvious next step once we control the media is the socialization of capital.

We already know how well communism works.

As for specifics, health care must be taken over first, and then the media will become "worker-owned, ANTIFA-controlled entities." Then they will seize banks and finance, then technology and manufacturing. When will these useful idiots realize who they're working for, anyway?

One thing we must be sure of is to never let the white man excuse himself of his obligations to us by taking so-called "reparations." That time has surely passed, and would give the cis white male power structure an excuse to stop caving to our demands. "Oh, we gave Jamal $100k in reparations two years ago, we don't need to help him now that he's a penniless crack addict on the street now," they will surely say.

Easy fix: put down the crack pipe.

"Phase 3: New World Order" proposes universal microchipping. However, this horror not even Orwell imagined would be used toward pretty lame goals:

> Imagine a world where you'll never have to be called the n-word again. Imagine a > world where you can be as gay as you want, and not be called a raging, dick-sucking "faot."

Apparently someone's been triggered a few too many times. For the record, as "deplorable" as I am, the above is not how I talk. The document describes fairly obsessively how microchipping and DNA sampling will be used to determine who has "n-word" privileges versus who commits "hate speech" thereby.

Then it goes into very general details about shouting down opponents and the morality of violence.

people who happen to be Muslim have decided to blow themselves up for their cause. Clearly this is the result of hundreds of years of Western intervention by cis white males o their culture. Osama Bin Laden would not have attacked the WTC and Pentagon had we not dropped atom bombs on Japan in WWII, for

So Osama was avenging the Japanese, and it had nothing to do with jihad? Still trying to figure this one out…

"Phase 4: One World Government" promises that they'll get Communism right the next time around. They made a huge mess of it, but give them another chance—basically what Leon Trotsky said. Then they'll get to redistributing wealth, which involves:

> …ferry[ing] poverty-stricken brown people from around the world to the (former) United States and Western Europe.

This Camp of the Saints stuff is really nothing new.

According to the plan, those who can't work will get a stipend and unlimited free dope. (That figures; I mentioned earlier that Antifa likes drugs.) Contrary to its author's illusions, in a communist society, freeloaders and dope fiends would be dead weight.

Is that crap for real?

Some have speculated that it's satire, or a false flag operation. I doubt it. If I felt like writing a black propaganda piece in Antifa's name, I'd do a much better job than that dreary mess. Let's just say that they'd get lots of heat all over them (as they deserve), and that's only the beginning.

Rather, "The Antifa Manual" is exactly what a butthurt Social Justice Warrior would write, after getting marinated in sociology classes featuring microaggression theory and grotesquely biased interpretations of history. It's mainly a regurgitation of propaganda the far left has preached for years. Millions of impressionable college students are brainwashed with that kind of baloney, while incurring tremendous debt.

Really, it's rather disorganized and amateurish, rehashing tactics begun many decades ago, completely unaware of their present successes. The leftist professors neglected to mention that today's globalists in the media, big business, and many other major institutions already push cultural Marxism.

Furthermore, any armchair Lenin must be smoking some pretty potent weed to imagine that plutocrats will let ultra-radical screwballs take over their corporations and throw them off their gravy train. The tail does not wag the dog.

I'm profoundly embarrassed for today's leftists. Their movement used to make much more sense, and even was exciting. These guys used to have substance. A century or so ago, they were labor leaders, sensible social reformers, and people like Theodore Roosevelt and Jack London. The communist central planners of old tried their best (despite flawed premises) to build societies that worked; they weren't campus whack-jobs haunting "safe spaces". What the hell happened?

Read More: We Should Thank Emily Rose Nauert For Scaring Women From Becoming SJWs

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Hollywood Stars Throw Hilarious Temper Tantrum After Trump Ends DACA

September 6, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

Several Hollywood stars raged on social media Sunday in response to reports that President Donald Trump has decided to formally end former President Barack Obama's controversial Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals or DACA amnesty for nearly 800,000 illegal immigrants.

Comedian and outspoken Trump critic Sarah Silverman fumed that the president's "inhumanity is bottomless."

> Jesus H his inhumanity is bottomless @HouseGOP @SenateGOP HISTORY IS WATCHING YALL https://t.co/rofFFzzKN0
>
> — Sarah Silverman (@SarahKSilverman) September 4, 2017

ABC's Modern Family writer-producer Danny Zuker said if Christians support Trump ending the program, their "Christianity is bullit."

"Dear Christians, if you support @realDonaldTrump's decision to end DACA your Christianity is bullit. But on the other hand fk you," Zuker tweeted.

> Dear Christians, if you support @realdonaldtrump's decision to end DACA your Christianity is bullshit. But on the other hand fuck you.
>
> — Danny Zuker (@DannyZuker) September 4, 2017

Netflix's House of Cards creator Beau Willimon urged his followers to march on Washington to "stop Trump's racist agenda."

> Want to #SaveDACA?
> Want to stop Trump's racist agenda?
> We need thousands in DC to meet the #Cville2DC marchers when they arrive Wednesday.
>
> — Beau Willimon (@BeauWillimon) September 4, 2017

While a majority of those benefiting from the DACA program are young adults age 18-25, actress Alyssa Milano said "Our country should protect children. Period."

> Our country should protect children. Period. This should not be even a discussion.
>
> — Alyssa Milano (@Alyssa_Milano) September 4, 2017

The president will reportedly speak publicly about ending the program while urging Congress to pass a pro-American immigration reform bill over the next six months.

Below is a roundup of celebrity reaction to Trump's DACA decision.

> .@realDonaldTrump, I'd consider praying for your corrupt soul on #NationalDayOfPrayer if you hadn't ended #DACA on the same day, you monster
>
> — Beau Willimon (@BeauWillimon) September 4, 2017

> Booting 800k law abiding & productive ppl out of USA by repealing DACA is cruel & stupid.
> But "cruel & stupid" is the Trump family motto.
>
> — Adam McKay (@GhostPanther) September 4, 2017

> The most cruel, disgusting, vile man to hold the office of the President in the modern era and possibly ever. https://t.co/rBgAMen66H
>
> — Josh Gad (@joshgad) September 4, 2017

> Trump has made it clear: in order for the nation to heel, he will continue to prey #DefendDACA #DayOfPrayer
>
> — Joss Whedon (@joss) September 4, 2017

> All I can think to say to Trump is "you are garbage" and then I realize he's probably garbage bc his father told him "you are garbage"
>
> — Sarah Silverman (@SarahKSilverman) September 4, 2017

> What is happening to us? https://t.co/dcJoTqJUDS
>
> — Andy Richter (@AndyRichter) September 4, 2017

> They don't have to be extraordinary to earn our compassion. Or valedictorians. Or anything but American, which is what they are. #SaveDACA
>
> — Michael Ian Black (@michaelianblack) September 4, 2017

> Trump's plan to deport Dreamers in 6 mos. is cruel, divisive and politically motivated. Shame on him, and shame on us for electing him.
>
> — George Takei (@GeorgeTakei) September 4, 2017

> Unfortunately there is no other way to say this: Donald J. Trump is a heartless prick.
>
> — Rob Reiner (@robreiner) September 4, 2017

Read the entire article

Read Next: Does The Hollywood Elite Use Rituals And Sexual Blackmail To Keep Its Stars In Line?

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

4 Incredibly Effective Ways To Build Comfort With A New Girl

September 6, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

There's a famous quote from infamous early PUA Mystery that goes 'the game is played in comfort.' Unfortunately a great many of us—myself included—nod sagely when we hear this, only to forget about it in the field where we concentrate entirely on attraction. This is a mistake, for if you don't take steps to build sufficient comfort with the girl you are interested in then the likelihood is you will lose her.

The issue is this: pumping attraction is addictive, so addictive that even over a decade after having discovered how to do it many players still delight in their ability to get a woman they've just met excited and turned on.

Girls enjoy it too. You can tell by the way they laugh and smile and flush and play with their hair that they're digging your playboy vibe. And why wouldn't they? After all, you're being flirty and sexual—unashamedly so—and you're making her feel good. What's not to like? But there's a big difference between you building those fun, fizzy feelings up in her and her actually wanting to go all the way and have sex with you.

I've lost so many girls through not establishing sufficient comfort that I can't even begin to count them. In my view this happens for several reasons, but chiefly if you're all pull and no comfort then you come off as a player with no substance or, even worse, a horny desperado.

Of course, there is also the counter-risk that you create too much comfort. Do this too early on in the interaction and you risk being friendzoned. Do it too late—once you're already dating—and you risk getting dumped.

As with most other things in life, balance is everything. So with that being said, what are the best ways to create comfort with a new girl that will give you the best chance of sealing the deal

1. Hand holding

Yes, you should touch her early and then frequently when you first meet (kino). No, that does not mean you grab her ass or tits just after the intro. Instead, you should concentrate on non-invasive, 'safe' touching that nevertheless establishes a physical connection between the two of you.

A great way to achieve this is through hand holding. On Thursday I took a girl called Mariella for a drink. Almost as soon as we sat down in the lounge I took her hand in mine and stroked her fingers gently. She made no attempt to take it away. It established a nice feeling of easy intimacy between us without crossing the boundary into 'creepiness'.

Hand holding is great since it's easy to initiate and it moves on the physicality between you without being invasive. In this way it also builds comfort.

2. Dropping 'Gaminess'

The other thing you should make an effort to do is to drop all sense of ‘gaminess’ from your demeanor.

It’s a mistake I’ve made many times in the past myself, but there’s no point in continuing with all those cocky-funny lines you were using to first pick her up.

You use that kind of chat in the initial stages to show that you are not a chode and that you have edge. But by the time she’s hooked—i.e. shown reciprocal interest in you—then you need to drop all of that crap (for the most part) and act like a normal human being instead.

If you keep up trying to be funny and busting her balls while generally acting like a noughties PUA on amphetamines then you will not do yourself any favours.

Instead, drop all of that for a while and chill. You need her to understand that you are a three dimensional person, not a caricature, for only then will she consider getting intimate with you.

3. Moving Her To Different Venues

This is old-school PUA advice, game 101. The bounce. If you want it to seem like you've known one another for longer than you actually have then you need to move her around.

Resist the temptation to stay in the same place for the whole date. You need to break things up. You need to move. Why? Simply because it will create an illusion that you've known one another for longer. The more places you visit together, the more intimate your bond will seem.

4. Giving Her Space When You First Get Back To Your Apartment

Resist the temptation to jump on her immediately get her back to your place (unless of course things are so ‘on’ that not to do so would obviously set you back). Instead, give her space. What I normally do it show her into the sitting room and let her sit down while I go to fix drinks, sort out my room (if required) and any other chores that need doing that will keep me out of the way for a few moments.

Giving space like this is incredibly powerful since it builds trust. If she’s coming to your place for the first time then, let’s be honest, she probably feels like she’s taken a risk of sorts. After all, you are a guy she doesn’t know well. Yes, you seem OK and she’s attracted—hence her accompanying you—but she doesn’t know for certain.

When you leave her to her own devices temporarily then she sees that she has the opportunity to leave at any time she wants. That’s huge. Also, you demonstrate that you are not a horny sex-fiend with nothing on his mind other than sealing the deal. Again, that is huge. After all, no girl wants to feel like she is solely there as a plaything, regardless of what the circumstances might be.

So next time you’re out with a girl and you find yourself running attraction material for too long then just calm down, relax and put the brakes on instead. Then try applying the comfort techniques I’ve outlined here. I guarantee that if you do so you’ll find the result more pleasing than if you fail to.

For a compilation of all Troy’s best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: Ten Lessons About Girls I’d Teach My Teenage Self

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

China Is Poised To Surpass The United States As The World’s Biggest Superpower

September 7, 2017 | by Ned Kelly | Link | Original Link

China is set to take over from the United States as the world’s largest economy. Military strength is built ultimately upon economic strength so if current trends continue, China will become the world’s second superpower, alongside the US, and perhaps eventually the world’s sole superpower.

They already have 1.4 billion people, nuclear weapons, and easily the world’s largest standing army with 2.3 million soldiers. This is probably not great news for those of us who like the rule of law, democracy, free speech, due process and, you know, not being slaves.

To understand the Chinese, we need to understand what they refer to as the “century of humiliation.” Between 1839 and 1949, the Western powers and Japan meddled in China with impunity, killing tens of millions of Chinese.

Understandably, this is a source of great anger and shame and the ruling Chinese Communist Party has built itself upon the pledge that such humiliation will never be repeated. Unfortunately for the West and Japan, it may soon be payback time. Let’s look at the five most likely scenarios for the rise of the world’s next superpower.

1. China enjoys a gradual rise

This is easily the best of a bad bunch of options. Thankfully, it is also the most likely. In this scenario, China continues to develop and in about a century from now it will be a fully-fledged first world nation with the largest middle class on earth. These billion or so middle-class Chinese are going to consume a lot of stuff which will hopefully keep the world economy ticking over. This much consumption on a finite planet will require some serious technological innovations so as not to destroy the earth. Get thinking, people.

In this scenario, China will gradually expand its influence in the Pacific and the US will gracefully withdraw. Japan, Philippines, Australia: you are now on your own.

Whether the Chinese Communist Party will survive is anyone's guess. Economically they have already abandoned Communism in all but name. If the CCP does retain power then the increased wealth will enable it to shift from its current 1984 Room 101 totalitarianism to more of a control through pleasure and apathy Brave New World totalitarianism.

Think one billion overweight Chinese on the couch watching virtual-reality reality-TV. The latter option will be more fun for the Chinese people but will also make the CCP harder to overthrow.

2. China enjoys a rapid rise

This is the “tipping point” scenario and it has less to do with China and more to do with the US. If the US declines rapidly over the next few decades then China will be able to expand its influence into the Pacific more quickly than originally planned.

Can China’s economy survive without the current US export market? Probably. If they’re smart, and they are, then they have already planned their pivot away from the US market.

3. China collapses

Some experts predict that China is an economic and social house of cards that will soon collapse. Economic depression, revolution, civil war: take your pick. A population of 1.4 billion is a lot of people so if things do go bad they will go really bad. People will be eating each other. This could be the worst humanitarian crisis in history.

It may seem like an ideal outcome for those of us in the West but, as all hunters know, beware the injured beast with nuclear weapons. And if China's economy goes down the rest of the world will likely be in for a nasty depression.

4. A Chinese Empire

Scenario 4 is a Chinese Empire. But haven't we learned from the collapse of the European empires? Aren't empires too costly to build and maintain? Well, yeah. We can call in the translators and explain that to the Chinese all we want, but ultimately the decision will be up to them. Maybe they can make it work.

Most likely they will not need to conquer and occupy countries militarily. They will simply use a combination of hard and soft power to establish client states and one-sided trade relationships. Maybe they will occupy Japan. China doesn't like Japan.

5. World War 3

Doomsday preppers, rejoice! It's time to start hoarding food, making bullets, and digging bunkers. In this final scenario (literally), the US has not withdrawn gracefully (did anyone really think they would?) and the two nations are throwing nukes at one another. Or maybe it's China vs India or China vs Russia. China doesn't really get along with anyone.

It doesn't matter who is firing nuclear missiles at whom, we're all screwed. Duck and cover, get out your sleeping bag and prepare for nuclear winter.

Conclusion

Let's all hope for scenario one and start learning some Chinese language and history. It really will come in useful.

At the end of the day China will only respect strength. If the West cannot remain as world police then we must at least maintain our defensive military capacity and make things difficult for China if they choose the path of aggression. It's probably not a bad idea to stock up on canned food and bottled water too. Gānbēi!

Read more: Why China Is Winning The Game Of Civilization

Ned Kelly
Ned is an intellectual bushranger. He has spent the past ten years in the leftist corridors of Australia's universities and civil service and he's had enough.

The Dangers Of Casual Sex

September 7, 2017 | by Michael Majalahti | Link | Original Link

Our current society is over-sexed, beyond any shadow of a doubt. Don't misunderstand me, I'm not immune to it, either. I've simply come to understand much of the problem and mass epidemic of garish sexuality that plagues the west right now, and it's affecting absolutely everybody.

Everything today is overtly sexual in nature, from advertising to music videos to the way girls dress out in public, right down to the pictures they post of themselves on Instagram, which are as soft-core pornographic and borderline smut as it gets these days. Boy, the lengths you've got to go nowadays to get attention. Conspicuous, ain't it?

Porn itself has become harder-edged than ever before, with revenge porn, all manner of fetish porn, and emotionless fucking taking center stage. A lot of it might be arousing, but hell, it's ain't even sex. It's an aberration of sex and it doesn't take a psychologist to understand that it has absolutely nothing to do with love, nor the original purpose of sex, which I'll get into in just a minute.

As a result of this overt sexuality running rampant nowadays, our dopamine stores are sorely vexed and running on damn near empty. We have troubles getting off, as a society.

Yet, everyone wants sex. All the time, seemingly, if you can deduce anything from peoples' talk and online behavior. It's almost manic in nature, the way people laud on about sex. Of course, the window dressing promises you something entirely different than the stark reality that lies beneath all of this bullshit and it's high time we woke up and smelled the house burning.

Superimposed is the image of sexuality these days, looking vibrant and abundant. It seems everyone's getting a piece of the action. Reality, however, couldn't be any further from the truth.

Starving At The Sex Buffet

At the same time that this over-influx of sexuality is taking over like the plague, relationships are languishing far and wide from the lack of intimacy and nil sexual intercourse between actual couples. This has been well-documented all across the board in recent years by everyone from family counselors to sex therapists to psychologists. Statistically, it is shown in study after study, that couples are having less sex than every before right now.

For men, porn has largely taken hold of their imagination, dulling the libidinous blade considerably and sabotaging their dopamine tanks, which are essential (and to be rationed) as a trigger for sexual stimulus response. As a side-note, this is probably why the frequency of sex teeters off to two or three times a week for most married couples, but that amount generally doesn't present a problem to those in long-term relationships.

Granted, cellphones, tablets, laptops, and iPads play a huge part in this aforementioned emotional detachment, which sees both parties in the relationship being swept away mentally into alternate realities and useless brain clutter in the form of inane entertainment and facetious “news” that are as quickly forgotten as they are ingested. People are way too mentally engaged with what may as well be deemed white noise (which, for those of you who are too young to know, was the static white screen of fuzz from old school TV sets when the channel didn’t show) and everyone is paying a huge price for this. Yet, the majority are so numbed by their chosen tech drug, that they don’t even recognize — nor are willing to accept — this utterly tripe reality of the way things truly are these days.

And so we come to the area of casual sex, which seems to be the most sought-after kind of actual sex on the market today. Easy flings, no attachments. Getting laid is the top priority, superceding everything else. Superficiality to the umpteenth degree and the age of Tinder. Just the quick release, because real attachment is way too scary and requires far too much work. We want easy lays these days.

Since everyone wants to get laid, what’s so wrong with casual sex, then? Let’s break it down.

The Law Of Diminishing Returns

First of all, the proof is already in the pudding: nothing sticks anymore. You don’t have to look any further than the writing on the wall. Stick a piece of tape enough times on any surface of your choosing, pull it off, repeat said process until the glue wears off and all you have left is a useless, used piece of tape, ready to be thrown away. And yeah, statistics show that there are more broken marriages, fleeting romances, single parents, and disenchanted singles today that at any recordable point prior. This is already a social epidemic.

The arguments to get into a serious relationship aren't there, due to the superficial values that people hold these days. In that light, it's no surprise that the fish aren't taking the bait. What is there to win? What is there to be had? If I give something up (read: a part of my personal freedom to be with you), what do I gain (read: how will you contribute to make my life better)?

Well, the only thing to be had is quick, casual sex, after which you get the hell out of there, and trust me, that shit gets old fast. Motörhead had it right when Lemmy sang sometimes the chase is better than the catch. Once you pop the cork, the anticipation is done. The thrill of the kill is over. That thrill, folks, is a one-time occurrence with every single new catch.

Were there key arguments to sticking around, a whole lot of men and women would be forming lasting, healthy relationships after one night stands and casual flings. Point blank, that is the truth.

Yet, it doesn't happen. And it's obvious why: neither party have bothered to invest their time into seeing whether there is anything worth of value underneath the initially attractive surface.

It's called window dressing, folks. It's the icing on the cake, not the substance underneath. The base could just as well be made of dog shit and people would eat it anyway, based on appearances (read: the outer core). We've become so goddamned hedonistic and lazy that we may as well just lie in the bed that we've made for ourselves, but that ain't the formula for happiness or contentment.

The Key My Father Taught Me

My father is a wise man and I was lucky enough to get a good degree of mentoring from him about life as I was growing up. As a preacher amongst small, immigrant communities in Canada in the '70s, '80s and '90s, Dad counselled many newly married or otherwise married couples as part of his pastoral job. There's something that my father said to me one day, back when I was a young man: "Son, don't get intimately involved with a woman too early. It messes up her emotional radar."

What my father implied was that becoming sexually involved too early with a girl fogs the mind and you don't end up making calculated, wise decisions or discernments about the person, nor do you see them in the light of reality as they truly are. I would argue that this works both ways. You don't know whether the other person is capable of negotiation, compromise or if they even want to do the job that would be required of them from your point of need in a possible serious relationship. You end up in a dreamworld of self-fabricated ideals and expectations, because your emotions are running the show and euphoria is high.

Why is this? Because you simply cannot touch another person more intimately, than through the act of sex. And this act, in and of itself, especially when it's new, clouds one's rational judgement.

Whether we want to admit it or not, sex goes deeper than the skin. It touches the spirit. Otherwise, we wouldn't be so wounded and devastated after break-ups. It's a 3D experience: it messes with the mind, it touches the spirit and it is a bodily, physical interaction. Mind, body, spirit — get it?

Therefore, it's simply foolhardy to become intimate with someone you hardly even know. There's no foundation of trust, no familiarity, no depth whatsoever. Yet, you end up going to the deepest part of another, touching their most intimate inner person, without even knowing them.

Oh, I know that as a strapping young lad, many hate to hear this. The truth is rarely convenient for any of us. No apologies, guys. I am only sharing what life has taught me as I look back here in my mid-40s. Yeah, in hindsight, my dad was right. Even I could have played my cards smarter back in the day. But yeah, I had to learn these things the hard way, too.

We've been brainwashed to be slaves to our own desires, which we have allowed to run rampant and lead us. Back in the day, before the mass social engineering of “free love,” our modern sexual conundrum would have been seen as madness. Of course, people throughout the ages have been promiscuous. Still, it was more of a hush-hush thing, something done under the cover of night, something done in secret (with the exception of openly garish times like the fall of Ancient Rome and such, which led its peoples’ to quick and imminent demise). Never before has it been so blatantly promoted and glorified as it is nowadays.

But hey, times change. Even though, on the inside, people don’t.

Custom Ordering Yourself A World Of Problems

Casual sex creates problems for you personally. How?

Well, let’s say you’ve had the best sex of your life with a certain girl. Let’s say she did all of the hot and nasty stuff that you like. Let’s say your mind imploded and she left you wondering, “Can it ever get better than this?”

Then, let’s fast-forward to your break-up with this special girl. Things just didn’t work out between the two of you. She was headed east, whereas you were headed west. You both wanted different things from life. Her values system was completely different than yours, and there was no way you could have ever survived as a cohesive, harmonious couple. Yet, you had the best sex of your life with her. Guess what, buddy?

You’re going to find yourself languishing in Wax Nostalgic Land for years to come, just wishing that the girl you are now with is somehow going to find a way to give you the kind of ride that your ex did. Of course, this is damn near impossible, since there are so many other factors at play.

Like comedian Chris Rock so aptly stated in one of his stand-ups: ”Men cannot go backward sexually.” You’ve got all of the little idiosyncrasies that make up each individual person (read: everyone is unique) and moment, and you simply cannot duplicate those. It’s like magic: it only shows up once. If you fail to grab on to it when it’s there, too bad for you. You’ve blown your chance. Move on, because it’ll never come back the same way again.

Living with the mental burden of lying in wait for that next equally hot lay as the best you ever had does no favors to you as a man. Read that line again and stop to think about it.

A lot of guys get trapped on the thrill of the kill train, finding themselves ever after a new lay in order to feel the high of conquering a woman again and again. The dopamine high requires, as it were, this sacrifice, as without this constant pursuit, life would be so much more colorless and boring. This endless cycle, however, is devastating to the man's spirit and absolutely desensitizes his mind. It's called becoming jaded. Add to that a few STD's and you have yourself quite a cocktail of unhappiness.

Of course, there is always the flipside of the coin. If you don't experiment and play the field, taste the flavors and indulge in your curiosities, you may end up haunted by the things that never were. Yet, even part of that is social engineering. We've been taught by our culture to be this way, to want to ride the carousel. It's been pounded into our heads that men want to sow their seed as far and wide as possible and monogamy was never in cards for us, especially as the males of the species. Believe what you want. You will always know the tree by the fruit that it bears.

I remember reading an article way back in my early 20s from either Playboy or Penthouse magazine, interviewing five or six random women about the best sex that they ever had. Only one girl said that the only man she ever had was the man she married, her husband, and she has never had bad sex in her life. Wow! What a testimonial! Just think of how lucky that girl was, with no other person to compare her husband to. She was completely satisfied with the man she was with.

How many people today could state the same thing? How many people would give anything to be in this girl's shoes?

Oh yeah, and whoever her husband is, he should count himself truly blessed and lucky. I am sure there are countless men today who would give their left nut to hear the same thing from the woman they are now with.

Casual Sex Dulls Your Ability To Bond

Ah, the unpopular truth, once again rearing its unwanted head! We all could have been smarter, fellas. We all could have implemented more caution, critical gaming eye and common sense. Instead, we let our lust do the talking and then, like a dog on a leash, our lust led the way and did the walking for us, too. And we've only got ourselves to blame. We let go of the reins.

Anyone remember the movie Grease (1978), with Olivia Newton-John and John Travolta? Sociologists and the like have deemed that this movie was the pivotal turning point in steering the American (read: Western) youth down the road of eroded morality (read: casual sex).

In that movie, Olivia Newton-John's character Sandy falls hard for bad boy Danny, played by Travolta. To appease and please her bad boy boyfriend, Sandy starts to smoke and have casual sex with him, as if that were a way for girls to hook and keep the men they wish to have in their lives.

This film was a huge, smash hit when it came out (and remains an all-time Hollywood classic to this day), and it caused a social shift in the underlying consciousness of the youth of its day. That generation spawned the next generation and you can do the rest of the math, seeing where we find ourselves in the here and now.

But, unlike in the movies, in life the bad boy and the good girl rarely, if ever, make for a doable, stable couple. The same goes for the stripper and the preacher's son, a close call that I avoided by the grace of God Almighty back in the mid-'90s. This is because one's values dictate who they are and how they behave. A clash of values will have you at constant war with one another. Just like Simon Sinek ascribes: People don't buy what you sell, they buy what you believe.

The Purpose And Role Of Sex In A Relationship

Maybe one of the least asked questions is: what is the actual, natural role of sex outside of procreation? Yet, this is an integral and all-important question, and the answer is really quite simple and exclusive.

If you break it down, sex is a bonding experience between a man and a woman. It unites the couple. It is perhaps the highest form of intimacy to be had. At the very least, it's the most tangible.

Sex is meant to bring a man and woman together and strengthen their bond to one another. Take a couple who aren't having sex, and you can see a whole slew of problems arise. Granted, it can be well argued and seen that sex is a reflection of how a relationship is actually doing otherwise.

While sex is something that you spend an considerably short amount of time engaged in, its significance is monumental to the health of any said marriage or intergender love relationship. And since sex is a bonding experience that we cannot discount or nullify, it is madness to think that being sexually intimate with a large number of prospects or flings would make you more of a man, a better person, more fulfilled or stronger or better to any degree. Being a busy Cassanova doesn't make you an alpha; strength of character does.

So first and foremost, outside of procreation, it can be firmly seen that sex is a bonding experience. After that, you can sprinkle in the pleasure, the release, the kicks, the high and what have you. But be smart: recognize the foundation and trunk before just chopping off branches for your own immediate personal pleasure.

Remedy The Malady

Once again, don't get me wrong. I'm not talking from up on a high horse here. I like a nice pair of tits and ass as much as the next guy. But, like ice cream, just because I like doesn't mean that I should freely indulge. You've got to know what it's going to cost you. Ice cream has a shitload of calories that you will have to jog your ass off to get rid of, if you don't want to get fat, just as fucking any random hot girl that you meet will cost you on the aforementioned personal levels that we've gone through here. Simply, it just isn't worth it, no matter how tempting the prospect of casual sex is.

Your stock as a man should not be hingent upon your sexual validity in terms of nailing any hot chick that you desire. You should know who you are as a man, and you should know your internal stock. You should not be so weak and vain, that you need another sexual conquest to validate your manliness, masculinity, masculine fortitude or power in general.

Just like with everything else in life, true value and power comes from within. Its about knowing who you are, knowing your true strength and respecting and honing your personal, strong qualities. Only after waking up from the dream state that you otherwise would wish to remain in, will you be able to understand this, as Anthony De Mello so eloquently and bluntly pictured it in his fantastic book Awareness.

Yeah, I know this puts you between a rock and hard place, but that's life. Choose your hard. We all need a war to win, a battle to fight. Stop settling for sloppy seconds.

And step one in getting off of this self-defeating pussy carousel of casual sex is to orient yourself in finding a quality girl that is worth her stock, whom you can honestly marry and make a keeper. If you aren't having luck finding her, start asking the right questions. Get serious. Don't waste any more of your life. Start making the right choices now for a better personal tomorrow.

Read more: 7 Things I Require In The Future Mother Of My Child

Michael Majalahti
Michael is arguably the most acclaimed and accomplished pro wrestler in history out of Northern Europe, as well as the pro wrestling pioneer of Finland, where he has lived since 1996 after moving from his homeland of Canada. Michael is known as an outspoken figure that bucks the system and swims against the tide. Known in pro wrestling circles as "The Rebel" StarBuck, Michael has been a champion the world over, in addition to being a rock vocalist in three bands, a personal trainer, a voice-over pro, a business owner, an actor, an artist and a husband. More:

Man Agrees To See Woman Again After She Throws Her Feces Out His Window

September 7, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

During a supposedly “successful” Tinder date, a British woman went into Liam Smyth’s bathroom in Bristol and did her business. Believing his toilet could not flush properly, she fished out her own fecal matter and threw it out the window. After the fecal matter became stuck, and while Liam was looking for a different solution, she tried to retrieve it herself and became stuck in said window. At a cost to the taxpayer and representing a complete waste of first responders’ time, the fire brigade had to rescue the female poop bandit by smashing the window.

Here’s the photo again, gentlemen:

The worst part of this story is that the woman got a second date. A single story might not explain every aspect of the modern sexual marketplace and the woes it has unleashed on men, but this one is certainly representative of the current dating dynamics.

Here's an incomplete checklist of what men often—if not almost always—have to fulfill to get more than half-hearted interest from even semi-decent women:

- good (probably means great) job
- stable (probably means upper middle-class+) financial situation
- height
- muscles/excellent physique
- humor
- fashion sense
- whatever else Cosmo or Jezebel says that she deserves

I doubt that Liam's date was a real looker, which makes it more obscene still that one of the assumed, unconscious criteria for a girl, that she won't hurl her own feces out your window, was not met.

Whilst I fully appreciate that upstanding and demure women should never recklessly fart in a man's presence or leave traces of her brown-only unicorns in the toilet, the date's solution of throwing her own crap out the window and into someone's garden is beyond belief. It a tragic sign of our times that whenever a woman feels the potential for embarrassment, she can ham-fistedly execute a move to attempt to avoid that embarrassment and have it justified by others later, including by the man who still wants to date them.

Here comes the white-knighting

Sadly, poor Liam can see her as a part of his future. “[W]ho knows what the future holds” is what he told the media after the second date. Perhaps I am judging the man too harshly, especially as Bristol, home of the Milo Yiannopoulos-hounding University of Bristol, is one of the chief SJW factories in Britain today.

Relative to the market available to him, this girl may possibly be the keeper of keepers, some sort of ray of light in a city usually swallowed in feminist-related storms. But I sincerely doubt it. I have a feeling that if he continues this relationship, his smile will begin to fade:

Another alarming part of this story was Liam's willingness to smash his own window and pay for it himself. As he made clear afterwards, he has had to crowdfund to fix the damage. Again, the turd-flinging woman gets a pass (the first two were getting the second date and having first responders haul her out), allowing the public to fund what she should be paying out of her own pocket for her stupidity.

Even the unbelievable is now believable when it comes to what women will do

Even without judging the characters of women like this, it is sad that the hoops men must jump through for subpar pussy are growing larger in number.

The local fire and rescue department confirmed the authenticity of the story. Even if they hadn't, I would believe it. We have descended to the level where a woman can expect to perform all manner of unseemly or plain bizarre behaviors on dates and expect male supplicants to keep fawning over them, including when the girl throws their shit out of your window.

Compare this to a semi-recent flurry of signs found plastered in Hooters restaurants across the United States:

The bar (pardon the pun) is being set ever lower for a woman to get outside help to extricate herself from a harmless and non-abusive date, or just reject men who don't meet her inflated standards. "[N]ot who they said they were on their profile" is really just girlspeak for "he looked/sounded more [personal physical characteristic] on some website or app." It has basically nothing to do with personal danger or some kind of real threat.

Meanwhile, men have to put up with the poop-throwers of the female dating market, who have the security of knowing that they will either keep the affections of the male in question or, better yet, will soon have an obsessive line of other suitors to take his place.

If you want to be angry about this state of affairs, be so only for mere minutes. And then get into the ongoing process of navigating these pitfalls and improving yourself to the best of your ability.

Read More: What It's Like To Date A Strong And Independent Woman

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Endgame That The Occult Elite Has Planned For You

September 8, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Dear Citizen of the World,

Have you read the Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion? Do you remember this letter from autumn 1999? Likely, no, you don't. The former is surrounded by such a stigma that you'll be deemed a tinfoil hat lunatic by the second you start talking of it—no matter the truthfulness of the contents—while the latter only enjoyed a semblance of spread.

In 1999, I was still a trainee inside the elite's corridor. Upon reading the letter I became afraid that the sheeple could realize the truth. Had it happened, my own career might have been in jeopardy. Fortunately people were busier sharing idiotic chain mails and what I knew was a gem of dangerous truth was promptly forgotten. Now, having almost twenty years of high-level experience under my belt, I know how hopelessly stupid the majority is and therefore can write this letter with confidence. Our god is with us after all. It is up to you to follow him as well.

A brief word about me. My family tree is centuries old. So far, I am half-Jewish, quarter Scottish Catholic, and quarter German Protestant. Or perhaps it is half Scottish and only an eighth Jewish. In fact, my family went through so many marriage-alliances it is hard to tell you who I am exactly. It does not matter very much. Sometimes I feel like I have no real identity apart from my belonging to the elite. And I want you to give up any identity you might believe you have in exchange for what we are crafting for you.

We destroyed most of the traditional world. We confiscated wealth through usury. We took esoteric knowledge away by publicly denying it through science while carefully preserving it inside our Freemason networks. The way of men itself became ours. We made you forget about God, replaced him with idols and never-ending desires.

Your women absolutely loved this. At least, they could get out with the sisterhood every time they wanted, drink tons of alcohol, sleep with random men, and kill their own babies in the womb. Way cooler than staying at home, isn't it? We are no atheists though. At best, atheism was a means to undo Christianity—at worst it is a pretext for douchebags who pretend they're still siding with "progress" like Richard Dawkins.

No, our god is the one who brought the light to humanity at a huge risk. When your god had you spoiling your life through dull homilies and primitive work, our god gave us the light. Alice Bailey, Saul Alinsky, and transhumanist Max More contributed to enlighten the world. And once again, when we win, you may become fully enlightened, too.

Look, he's a cool guy

In the name of equality, freedom, dignity, justice, advancement, open-mindedness, hope, and many other buzzwords, we made you reject your own landmarks. Fascinated, hypnotized, or browbeaten by those who were, you forfeited your own inheritance. Nations mean war, families mean oppression, being white means evilness. And unless you're one of us, being a man is oppressive too.

How about undergoing a costly, harmful surgery to get your balls chopped off and pretend you are the Other or even genderless? We support human dignity as long as we are the ones defining it. Just as we oppose rape the way our land whale foot soldiers define it. That is, rape happens when a cis-white-male has sex with a girl or even thinks about it. Rape is not what happens when, for example, you get penetrated against your will by a Muslim migrant.

We define and redefine words at will. When you own the media and the academia, and when most people are just too lazy to check the dictionary, definitions become incredibly plastic. Likewise we built every skyscraper you may work in, every shopping center you can stroll in. Only we have the money and the authorizations to venture in such works. (And if someone else built a tower or a shopping center, we'd buy them out, or some puppet of ours would seize it.)

We own the world you live in, we have produced every dollar you are earning or spending, and we give dollars their value out of thin air. The best part of it all is, you're not even allowed to publically acknowledge our existence. We are invisible and wish to remain so. Dare to connect the dots and, following our orders, the sheeple will label you a conspiracy theorist.

Our long term aim is twofold. We want to recreate man, and we want to recreate the world. This may seem grandiose, not to say impossible, but after we have made it everyone will thank us and kiss our asses forever. First, we want to turn flesh-and-blood individuals into abstract units. To be fully human one should have no race, no sex, no family name, no roots, no nationhood, no "proper" culture. Most places and social functions should be interchangeable.

Already we've pulled out some very promising outcomes. Look at how happy urban hipsters are, jumping from one fad to another, constantly finding out new tasks to perform and new stuff to consume! Sexes were oppressive. They tightened whatever people could do. Now, instead of these boring, unchosen two sexes, we have more than 90 genders that people can choose overnight. Nothing is true—everything is possible. We took the Original Chaos, put it in a bottle, and we're selling it to you every day. On credit.

People will fuse. One world, one salad bowl, one mixer. Actually, we will keep interbreeding with skilled Asians, Jews, other noble families, and exceptionally we'll admit in our brethren some gifted adepts whose high IQ and toil will have proven the genetic worth, whereas the proles—including you—are to blend with the dark-skinned masses. You will also fuse with technology. This is what you have been told to wait for under the name of singularity. Speaking of it, the tattoos so many of you cover their bodies with are but a preparation to the planned merging with machines. One world, many virtual worlds, and an indefinite number of potentialities expressed—each fad, each good, each newly creation embodying the limitless possibilities of Human. Every individual will become the demiurge of his own world.

The fusing will go much farther than your narrowly conservative minds can imagine. Anti-racism and gay marriage are but baby steps. Later comes anti-specism, the rejection of limits between species. When you consider oneself a citizen of the world, you should also become a citizen of the Living, where all animals are included. Eventually, when animals are properly included into our world, we'll pull anti-regnism out of our hat. Yes—even plants and minerals will join. In the end all otherness will have been destroyed. Everything will be conquered. Everything will be one. Progress will be complete.

But before we get to these heights, you should prepare by exercising "love" with wrinkles-ridden spinsters, relatives, children, and nature (go on and Google "ecosexuality"). Children are individuals like any other. As for nature, you are part of it, it is part of you, it can be both your mother and lover. Isn't it marvelous?

I'll tell you: Lucifer is cooler than your god. Many of you bow to the Dollar God every day, without realizing that this god was created to serve ours. You have already started to lose sight of the Sun as you live at night, stare at screens and eat our food. When we have won, we will be your sun, unequivocally hovering above the Earth.

A word on something that has been sorely misunderstood: the aesthetics of the ugly. For decades Christian dissenters said we wanted to inverse the values of beauty and ugly, to have the ugly considered as beautiful and vice versa. Boy, how stupid they have been. Had they looked broadly at the so-called modern art, they would have found pieces of their taste. Christians often get blinded by a very typical Manichaeism. When something does not side with "beauty", it sides with "ugliness." Same thing with "God" and "the Devil."

In truth, we were busy putting an end to all these limits. We don't want to destroy beauty, we just want to make it relative to the Will. When we have won there will be no ugliness left. Ugliness is either otherness or imperfection. In our perfect unified world, nothing will be Other, and everything will be perfect.

Patricia Piccinini, The Welcome Guest, 2011

One of our main thrusts right now is the making of chimeras. We are blending the DNA of various animal species with human genome. We are already setting the scene when the next generation of living beings, created by us, will rise: check Patricia Piccinini's works. If this seems surreal or sci-fi like, remember that sci-fi is either serious projects and hopes or pure diversion to lead idiots astray (or a blending of both). As soon as 1894, John Jacob Astor knew we'd have a worldwide telephone network and harness solar energy. Conversely, in 1990, if you had been told that gay marriage was to pass and become the new norm, you wouldn't have believed it. Yet here we are.

Throughout the process you will become more and more dependent from the owners of the artificial environment you live in. You, or your parents, paid twice or thrice the price of your house for sheer interest. Even if you are "red-pilled" as you say, you still need to cater to our norms if you want to get a notch. Independence belongs to yesterday. Today, and tomorrow, everyone is to be interdependent.

You may believe you know more than before about us. Frankly, you don't. Some say the Rothschild or the Rockefeller tower over the rest. Some say we are 13 bloodlines. Others told of 33 or 200. This makes absolutely no difference for the masses. I am not a Rothschild although one of my ancestors was the stepsister of one, and inside our insular culture the Rothschild bloodline is deemed superior to mine. Sometimes I think a bit too much about this, but then I remember I am above 99.99 percent of the world, so, this compensates pretty well.

On that note, I have to get back to my 30 days of discipline challenge—climbing the elite ladder requires difficult, hard work, even when you're wearing an apron under your belt—before I really talk too much. Thank you very much for joining our peaceful world!

Read Next: Who Are The Knight Templars And Freemasons?

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

6 Letters Sent In From ROK Readers

September 8, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Today I answer several mailbag submissions, with the final question coming from a female reader from Australia.

1. Letter from a Navy serviceman

> I just want to say how surprised I am to find such an amazing site. I'm 23 and in the navy and prior to joining I thought being in the military would separate me from my blue pill college going generation but that hasn't been the case. I have about five friends that have the mindset your website promotes and I just wanted to say thank you for creating this site. I love sharing the articles with my crew and all the life advice that they give.

You certainly can never judge a book by its cover. You will find blue pill guys everywhere. The culture ingrains us to think and behave in a certain way, so it's more and more the default behavior to have a white knight, blue pill, globalist mindset. While part of my red pill awakening was the realization that the military is not a force used to keep the public safe, but a tool of the elites to foment foreign wars and control both people and resources at home and abroad, there are definitely still advantages to be found on a personal level.

Besides a culture of physical fitness, a strong work ethic, and teamwork, one advantage of the military is that despite being part of a big bureaucracy, you are surrounded mostly by younger, idealistic, energetic, hopeful men. It's a great opportunity for male bonding.

I had an excellent experience in the Boy Scouts, with many parallels, I imagine, to the military. Outside the military and scouting, male spaces are considered "toxic."

Consider yourself lucky to have five friends who you can relate to. Most of us do not have that, or by the time our friends come around, they are so beat down through divorces, child care payments, or are simply mentally broken in their encounters with females that they are too jaded to turn their life around. Talk about the things you read here, and if they resonate as true with you and your friend's real world experiences, take them to heart. I have a friend in the Navy and his advice is never, ever, ever date a girl who has been in the Navy. If you don't know why yet, you soon will.

2. "[ROK] helps me grow as a man"

> Thanks for the recent articles on how anti-social men can become more outgoing and how to stop caring about what others think. I struggle in these areas, so I searched for similar topics to these a few weeks ago and didn't find much. I was glad to see these two pop up recently. I love ROK. Thanks for your content. It helps me grow as a man and also make sense of the world.

Are you really anti-social or do you just have trouble relating to people whose main interest is watching others play sports and consuming alcohol and other drugs? Maybe you just need to find the right kind of friends who share your same hobbies and interests.

Perhaps you are just an introvert. And introvert does not mean shy (I know many outgoing introverts and some quiet extroverts). An introvert is someone who relaxes and recharges his batteries by spending time alone, while an extrovert must be in an active, public place around many people in order to relax.

Becoming more outgoing, whether that is your natural inclination or not, is a valuable skill. The most successful people I know, regardless of their occupation or intelligence, are those who are socially active and always making connections. It's a good skill to have in general, and it definitely helps with meeting women.

3. "Your posts are pieces of shit"

> Yo I'm not a female but your posts are pieces of shit and mean nothing. You just look like a stupid fucking bully and one day will get what's coming to you, whatever you deserve I hope you get it.

Yo, I'm not female either. I despise bullies, and hope that you find a way to find happiness and meaning in your life. I am pretty happy with my life so far, and doing what I can to better it every day. We may not all get what we deserve, but we can all improve our lot in life. Cheers.

4. When your girlfriend needs to lose weight

> I have been dieting to lose weight and am strength training. I would have thought my example would have motivate the girlfriend. How do I tell her to trim those > hips and legs?

Changing other people is far, far harder than changing yourself. First, congrats on dieting and strength training. You should do this for you first, and the side benefit of women appreciating it is just a plus. Has your girlfriend noticed or commented on your changes? If so, encourage her, invite her to the gym with you, and try cooking some healthy meals together.

Guys in relationships don't like to hear it, but perhaps it's time to look for a better girl than the one you currently have. Unless she's making some progress already, don't expect that you'll be able to change her. Your current self is better than your past self. You can get better girls than you could yesterday. The question is, will you?

5. ROK writers are "little-dick men"

> Wow how ridiculous this website is with it's bullshit articles about NZ women! ha you must be a bunch of stupid backward egotistical boring males!! Piss of to another country if you don't like the women here, we don't need little-dick men like you here!!

I've never been to New Zealand, but hear that it is worse than Australia, which is scary. New Zealand is an awesome place to visit for the natural beauty, health, safety, and quality of life, and is indeed one of the best first-world countries to live in, but as you correctly put it, the quality of women is so low that it can physically shrink the size of one's penis. It's true that my penis shrivels up whenever I am exposed to loud, fat, aggressive, cursing, masculine women.

6. Message of thanks from Australian girl

> Thank you for creating Return of Kings. I read nearly all of the articles here every day.
>
> I appreciate the existence of the Return of Kings community because in Australia, my home country, the youth have no male (or female, for that matter) role models. Reading content and comments on the pieces posted on Return of Kings has exposed me to ideas and concepts censored by Australia's education system, government and society.
>
> Before reading articles here, I was beginning to follow the strong feminist influence. My mum talked poorly about my father, was obese, and maintained a poor home. She did not allow me to grow my hair long, I was overweight and I hardly ever wore dresses.
>
> My Dad, however, is a good, hard-working man whom I respect, even if I disagree with his decisions sometimes. He has taught me about feminist propaganda in the education system and that I should have children and be a good housewife, but with only 20% custody post-divorce, his messages were weakened.
>
> I read Return of Kings articles to get me through career class in school, where > saying you would like to raise children and make a man happy is scorned by childless spinsters, 20 years past the wall. Reading Return of Kings allowed me to realise that I needed to live with my Dad on a full-time basis to live a happier, healthier life.

>
> I chose to live with my Dad and have since lost 10% of my body weight, have grown my hair to 60cm long, wear dresses most of the time, and have trained myself in the feminine arts in preparation for my future.
>
> Also, I have some questions that I would love if you could spend the time to answer.
>
> 1. In Australia, I am considered slim. Considering you have been in countries with much better women than Australia, do you believe that I should lose weight? If so, approximately how much?
>
> 2. I am saving my virginity for marriage. How do I keep a boyfriend interested for two years until I am old enough to marry? (I am under 18 now.)
>
> 3. How can I lower the chances of my boyfriend cheating as much as possible? I am afraid that while my boyfriend attends university in the future, he will meet more attractive, smarter women than me, and will abandon me.

First, congratulations to your father for raising you with proper morals and ideals, which are not taught in Western schools or even most churches, and kudos to you for accepting these principles and honoring them.

The lack of heroes is universal. We are living in a time with few role models or heroes. In the past, there were role models in many fields—astronauts like Neil Armstrong, John Glenn, and Alan Shepherd were well known ambassadors of science and exploration, many religious leaders could be looked up to for guidance and as a model for how to live (i.e., Fulton Sheen), and sometimes there were even political leaders who inspired and honored their nation and its people (JFK).

Today the list of influential people includes mostly rich members of the elite class, most of whom are actively breaking down our culture and morals. People like Mark Zuckerberg, degenerate musicians, or corrupt politicians (rumors are Zuck will soon run for public office).

Without role models we are left only with ideas. It is important to realize that never before in history were females made “equal” to men, and that universally every society throughout the world realized that would have disastrous effects, for both men and women. We must seek out and honor the wisdom of the past and build on it going forward. Women should be honored and revered for their femininity, which I love and crave as a man. They should not be made masculine.

If you are a healthy weight, don’t obsess over if some celebrity is prettier or skinnier than you. Exercise, eat well, which means preparing meals at home made from fresh ingredients, and keep your body below the medically suggested average for your body size, and you and your partner will be happy.

Guys your age will be interested in sex, not the other things you are talking about here. Just wait. Do not worry about keeping them engaged in a long-term relationship with you. Ask anyone older, and they will tell you that the things you worry about as a teenager, or even in your 20s, are rarely important later. If you continue the path you are on now, you will have NO problem finding a good man to marry in a few years. Don't try to keep a guy interested now and marry him later. You WILL find better men as you age, and are exposed to more adult men. It's much easier to find a successful, moral, older man when you are 20, than it is to pick a 16 year old that you hope will be a good husband when he grows up.

Again, if your boyfriend is a teenager also, he's probably interested in sex. If you're not offering him sex (and I fully support this decision), and he wants it, there's not much you can do. University is a great time to be exposed to a lot of guys, but also consider meeting some guys a few years older than you. They will be looking for marriage, instead of just a fun date this Saturday night, and will appreciate the qualities you are developing. When I was in college, I didn't care about long hair, virginity, or conservative morals. I do now. Seek out guys that have what you are offering, and don't try to make your teenage boyfriend appreciate things he may not be interested in.

I'm very happy that ROK motivates you and am curious how you found it, but would encourage you to also seek out some traditional feminine information, as this site is focused on men. But despite what feminists will tell you, we have your own best interest at heart, as well as our own. Women are less happy today with feminism than in the old, awful "oppressive" past. Women and men are both happier when they are in committed relationships.

You probably already feel better about yourself being thinner, and more attractive with long feminine hair and wearing dresses. Nurture those natural female traits and you will grow more happy, and attract the right man, with patience. Good luck!

That's all for this installment. If you would like a question answered by the ROK staff, send it via our contact form.

Read Next: Life Advice That All Men Should Follow

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Use This Totally Scientific Chart To Find Out How Racist You Are

September 9, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A photo from what appears to be an academically based publication uses a sliding scale to determine your level of racism. The only way you can appear as non-racist is to declare your willingness to sacrifice your health and well-being for other races. Otherwise, you're a racist, and declaring that you have "black friends" does not protect you from a racism accusation. Here's the chart in full:

For full size: Right click > Open in new window

You’re an overt racist if you believe whites are the “superior” race, but only one step beside that is believing that whites are under attack, a category that I fit into, even though I am technically non-white (half Iranian and half Armenian). Whether by design or accident, it’s clear that feminism and third-world immigration in the West have the effect of marginalizing whites and reducing their population relative to other races. Even Alex Jones, who rarely steps into the waters of “white genocide,” finally accepts that that is the agenda.

You’re a potential racist if you state that you don’t like high-crime areas and are definitely a subconcious racist if you start a sentence with “I’m not a racist, but…” I could not get the proper sourcing of this chart, but I would imagine a liberal finds it to be highly scientific and accurate.

A member of RVF declared that the chart did not accurately reflect his level of racism. He added a new category to the left…

The chart also lists a handy guide of 15 micro racial aggressions that you should avoid, such as referring at all to the race of your minority friend. Race should be the elephant in the room that you ignore at all times, except for when you get sent to jail for your racism and then have to find a gang that matches your own race so you don’t get violently assaulted by other races.

With the production of charts like this, it’s clear that liberals don’t even want to have a conversation with anyone they disagree with. They will continue to double down, call everyone a Nazi or racist, and then use that as justification to steal your domain, get you fired from your job, or outright assault you. We still have a long way to go until liberal hysteria works its way through the culture.

Read Next: White American Girl Raises Over $30,000 Because Her Dad Is “Racist” Against Black Boyfriend

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Teenage Delinquent Who Can’t Speak English Properly Is About To Become A Millionaire

September 10, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Society continues to reward and even cultivate girls of non-legal age who act like sluts and adore anti-social behaviors. You’ve already seen it on the streets or have had to tolerate it in shopping malls, but now it is increasingly being disseminated across the internet. Jailbait is jailbait for a reason, yet many people, including adults, are supporting the sexualization of what are pre-legal pubescent and adolescent girls.

This mind-numbing trend has a new poster girl, 14-year-old Danielle Bregoli, a soon-to-be multimillionaire whose mother has hurtled her down a path that may lead to serious drug addictions, pornographic videos, and other malaises by the time she reaches adulthood. This troubled teenager has now released a new rap video celebrating promiscuity, attention-whoring, and the inability to speak the English language properly:

When I last checked, the video had 12 million views in the space of a week or so. Because she has allegedly been paid £32,000 (US$42,000) just for appearing at one musical festival, the odds-on chance is that Danielle Bregoli will soon be a millionaire. A poster girl like this is enough to alter (read: regress) many thousands of teenage and pre-teenage girls. It does not matter that only a few like her will ever reap the high financial rewards of such behaviors.

The signature personality trait of girls like Danielle Bregoli, who are becoming ever more numerous, is a lust for instant gratification, particularly in the form of attention. The need to out-shock and out-viral others ensures ascending levels of slut-like behavior and debauchery. Perhaps the sole things “missing” from Bregoli’s story are rampant drug abuse and a sex tape.

What this girl represents is a perilous social cancer, the effects of which will be more fully understood when her generation turns, say, 25. The slut culture evident in the present female crop aged 20-30 will eventually be made to look like kindergarten business when contrasted with the Age of Bregoli. Strangely enough, too, before I was born, Madonna was said to exert a bad influence on teenage girls. Like today’s slut culture, however, the Madonna of the 1980s will be seen as comparatively tame if juxtaposed with what 2017 is offering female adolescents and young adult women.

Thanks, Dr. Phil

Danielle Bregoli first came to “prominence” as a juvenile delinquent on The Dr. Phil Show. Her father and mother had been locked in a bitter custody dispute and the incomprehensible Bregoli–surprise, surprise–lived with the latter. In addition to running away from home and stealing credit cards, the then 13-year-old became famous for her ghetto-style elocution. Her threat against Dr. Phil’s audience members (“Cash me ousside, how bow dah?”) became an internet meme:

The saddest thing about this girl’s life is that her cop father, who tried to keep regular contact with Danielle but was denied, is now raising a normal, loving family without her:

During at least one period of her life, sheriff’s deputy Ira Peskowitz, despite many attempts, did not see his daughter for years. Throughout this time, Danielle Bregoli has had the “guidance” of her mother, whose influence appears to have led to the young girl assaulting people on airplanes:

That incident is presently the subject of a lawsuit. Barbara Ann Bregoli has also been accused of physically abusing her daughter after a shocking video of her hitting Danielle emerged.

Why this matters

Another “great success” to add to the Single Mother Hall of Fame.

If I could bring you the neo-masculine version of sunshine and roses all the time, I would. We live in a very negative culture and to a large extent we must faithfully catalogue and then critique the deleterious aspects of this culture. Nevertheless, these are some very positive reasons why we should be conscious of stories like this.

Danielle Bregoli did not start this mess and, even if she will contribute to its furthering, she is in most ways the end result of decades’ worth of slut-programming fed into young women and girls. She may be one of the worst case studies for this disease, but do not fool yourself into thinking that the women you are chasing have not been partially–or significantly–infected with the same ailment.

Our general preference for youth and beauty in females means that we need to be very aware of how girls in the bottom half (1989-94) of Generation Y (1983-94) and all of Generation Z (1995-) have been raised by social media and society at large. Danielle Bregoli’s adult contemporaries in Generation Z share much in common with her, most notably in their unprecedented addictions to their smartphones and platforms like Instagram. They have been weaned on these technologies to a degree that those before them have not.

I, for example, am observing a cross-cultural convergence in adult members of Generation Z, those only a few years older than Bregoli. The youngest girls walking around with whom I’ve had sex, those born in 1997 or 1998, are the most alike I have ever seen. Differences between British and Eastern European girls, for instance, appear much smaller than those of girls from my own age bracket (1989-91).

At times I believe we can see female behaviors across generations as mostly linear, rather than as wildcards that could make sudden jumps above and beyond what we expect. We have been accustomed to bad news when it comes to the modern female psyche and we should really expect a lot more doom and gloom. When 14-year-olds behave this way, the prospects for adults is more grim still.

An earlier article by ROK proprietor Roosh will probably need to be revised to incorporate the last half of Generation Y and all of Generation Z before too long. Instead of needing to be clowns to attract women, men trying to date girls born in the late 1980s or after will increasingly have to act like monkeys in order to snare female attention.

Good luck to all us would-be players out there. If those only some years older than Danielle Bregoli are anything to go by, we're going to have our work cut out for us. And when Bregoli and her cohort hit 18, 21, or 25, watch out. Only then will today's unmarriageable 20-somethings will look like saints.

Read More: Peak Female Privilege: Madonna Gropes And Exposes 17-Year-Old Girl Without Punishment

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 Improvised Weapons To Look Out For During A Fight

September 10, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

You certainly don't need me to tell you that political violence is on the rise—I've already written two articles on this. Some would also argue that violent crime in general is on the rise as well.

In response to this violence, police are starting to get more involved—somewhat unevenly, of course, but involved nonetheless. Thus, weapons are no longer allowed to be carried willy-nilly into protests. However, our opponents may very well find ways to improvise weapons. Keeping that in mind, this article today will teach you four improvised weapons that you should watch out for.

For purposes of understanding their function and use, we can discuss how they are "made."

1. The Millwall Brick

A favorite of English soccer "firms," this is not the most effective weapon, but it is simple, cheap, and thus very common amongst those in the know.

It is very easily made: the transgressor first grabs a newspaper. If there is no newspaper, a skilled user will get as many sheets of heavy paper as possible—construction paper, a magazine, or even printer paper if all else fails. The papers are then placed on a flat surface. From here the paper can be "loaded" in two ways. One can moisten the paper (emphasis on moisten, not soak. It has to stay in one piece like paper mache), or place a small rock or a load of pennies in the center of the top paper. Once it's prepared, they'll begin rolling it up lengthwise and as tight as possible.

Once it's in a tube, it'll be folded in half. From there one can moisten it again, tie a lanyard around the end, use tape to "tighten" it, or "load" it in some other fashion.

While this is, again, not the most effective weapon (you can block it much easier than you could your average cudgel), it's advantage is in its inconspicuousness. No policeman would arrest someone carrying a newspaper, right?

2. The Blackjack

The poor man's flail or nunchaku, the blackjack is essentially a flexible club consisting of a heavy object inside some sort of pouch. Some would argue that this is properly called a slapjack, but that's an issue for the linguists.

A "proper" blackjack is made of leather and has a rigid handle attached to the pouch, but any small-time thug can improvise one with any fabric object. A doorknob or paperweight inside a tube sock is often used, and again, not even our overly-litigious society can arrest somebody for wearing tube socks and carrying a paperweight.

Pantyhose, towels, a woman's purse, these are all things to watch out for should you be going into a dangerous situation—and I'll not make the obvious joke about your average Antifa member wearing pantyhose and carrying a purse.

For fun and edification, allow Steven Seagal to show how such a weapon can be used (skip to about 4:00).

3. Pens and the like

“Derp, this is pretty self explanatory” you might be saying to yourself—and for the most part it is. However, in writing this section I wish to convey two things. The first is how to tell if your opponent is skilled or not: the skilled opponent uses a fist grip.

Whereas the unskilled opponent will do some sort of hoopty “thumb on the spine grip”. If you see that kind of grip, you’ll have a much easier time disarming the guy.

The other thing is to point out that any long and sufficiently rigid object, even if it’s dull, can be thrusted effectively. A pen, a compass, even the aforementioned Millwall Brick can seriously hurt if you get hit with it.

And on that note…

4. The Umbrella

Believe it or not, the umbrella can in fact be used as an effective weapon. And bear in mind that I’m not referring to the “battle umbrellas” you can buy from arms companies and have been seen with some frequency amongst bodyguards and other security personnel. No, I’m referring to your average, full-sized folding umbrella.

Much like the pen as an improvised weapon, you can easily tell a skilled opponent from an unskilled opponent with regards to the umbrella: the unskilled opponent uses swings—a folding umbrella is far too fragile to take more than a couple of power swings, and thus you’ll be able to fight back pretty easily. The skilled opponent, in contrast, will use it like a bayonet: thrusting with both hands, aiming the point of the umbrella at you. That can take much more punishment, and deliver it too.

A truly skilled opponent might also buttstroke with the back hand, swinging the handle around for short range attacks, or possibly hooking and trapping techniques as well, but seeing as you’re likely not going to be fighting either Mr. Steed or Wong Fei-Hung, I’d be more wary of the bayonet-style stab.

In conclusion, should you unfortunately be forced into a dangerous situation, these are the improvised weapons you'll have to watch out for. And if you manage to disarm your opponent, you can certainly do a lot worse than these to fight on.

Read More: 14 Self-Defense Tools To Use Where Weapons Are Banned

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

4 Television Productions That Show How British Media Is “Blackwashing” History

September 11, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

The recent years have seen a sharp rise of the historical facts that the British media voluntarily distorts to depict them as more inclusive and politically correct. The recent outbursts of liberals online accusing experts of “whitewashing” history are in fact a projection to divert our attention from the mainstream media of Britain trying to falsely portray Ancient and Medieval Britain as being “ethnically diverse”. Here are a few examples of clear historical manipulation.

1. King Lear, the film (2016)

Shakespeare's tragedy is butchered in this joint project of the BBC and the Royal Exchange Theatre, portraying Lear and his daughters as being black because "it is black history month" and the Muslim Taqqiyah artist and Mayor of London, Sadiq Khan, says that it is the way things will be from now on. So progressive, Captain Sweden would be proud.

From the historical characters that inspired King Lear, the historical period in which the play is set, and how Shakespeare described it, we know that Lear and the other characters were Anglo-Saxons and therefore white.

2. Troy: Fall Of A City (2017)

We follow up with an upcoming series financed by the BBC (yes, again) supposedly depicting the Trojan War of Homer’s Iliad. But in this series, the hero Achilles, his friend Patroclus and the God Zeus are black.

From the countless representations in Greek and Roman art and thousands of archaeological discoveries and evidence, Achilles, Patroclus and Zeus, even if they are fictional character, are represented as white by their creators.

British series’s Achilles v.s “Achilles being taught how to play the Lyra” (first century A.D Herculanum fresco)

The South African actor that will play Patroclus v.s the Greek representation of Patroclus, getting his arm bandaged by Achilles (amphora, 500 B.C)

The British-Nigerian Zeus and the Greek Zeus depicted on a ancient clay vessel, kept at the British museum, nonetheless

I think here the creators are being quite “problematic and inherently racist” because “Helen of Troy was the most beautiful woman in Greece,” according to the Illiad, yet the actress is white. And why didn’t they cast beautiful, strong independent women like Serena Williams or Leslie Jones to play Helen of ~~Detroit~~ Troy? Could it be that casting those people (the words “women” and “actresses” do not apply in that particular case) as the love interest is not believable for the audience?

3. BBC Teach’s The Story of Britain (2016)

British child on the left, Roman slave on the right

In 2016, the BBC (did not see that one coming, did you?) released an “educational” series that was supposed to describe the historical foundation of Britain. I covered it in one of my previous articles:

> Lately, the BBC used an incompetent feminist professor's views [Mary Beard] to create an "educational cartoon" where, among other things, Roman centurions in Britain are black. This is one episode of a series where some Picts and Norman Barons are also black

These fabrications are fed to children. They send the message that "this is the factual story of Britain, this is how it happened. What we depict is the truth". They have the nerve to declare that this propaganda is seen through the eyes of a "typical family" and here, the "typical" is very important.

Norman priests:
Life after the Norman Conquest | History - The Story of Britain
10,003

Celts:
3:58 / 5:40

We know for a fact that the only Roman units that were ever raised in parts of Africa were light skinned Africans from the northern coasts, closer to modern Berbers, not the Sub-Saharan and West Africans.

Paul Joseph Watson from Infowars got into a twitter row over this very issue with some liberal British history enthusiasts.

The cucked media rushed to support that fat supply teacher and Mary Beard against the "evil white supremacy" of Watson, such as the simpleton who penned this article for the Guardian, using the microscopic number of African barbarian allies of Rome present in Britain as proof that the average centurion in Britain must be depicted as black.

[image]
Source: Don Henon, "The Origins of Anglo-Saxons" used by P.J. Watson.

The author of the Guardian article grasps at straws invoking the "Moors" stationed on Hadrian's wall (from Nubia and other Northern Roman African provinces, so proto-Berbers).

Berber people

Proof is also supposed to lie in the person of Septimius Severus, the “black” Roman emperor (wet dream of every PC cuckold and We Wuz Kangs theory aficionado), when in fact Severus’ father was Lybico-Punic and his mother came from the gens Fluvia in Italian Rome. Severus would be mixed at most and those ancient depictions prove that he was not Black per se.

The Guardian’s coup de grâce towards P.J. Watson comes with the existence of a “black” governor of Britain (had a hearty laugh at this one), Decimus Clodius Septimius Albinus, because he was born in Hadrumetum, modern-day Tunisia.

If the pen-pushers at the Guardian had an ounce of honesty or did a bit of research (not holding my breath), they would have known that he came from the Ceionia gens (white Romans from mainland Italy) and that “albus” from which “Albinius” is derived, means

“white” in Latin. The governor’s father named him that way for “the extraordinary whiteness of his complexion”. (Source: Julius Capitolinus, “Historia Augusta.”)

Decimus the White, “black” Roman Emperor

I do not know if our very own Quintus Curtius would laugh or roll his eyes reading their article. The zeal of the narrative serfs (they stopped being journalists a long time ago) shown to defend their side providing shortcuts and fictional sources is truly astonishing. But after all, we speak about The Guardian, the only Leftist rag delusional enough to write articles like these:

The Guardian

Like Page

Nadiya Hussein’s appeal is quite simple. She is the quietly brilliant girl next door, and someone you want to be mates with. As wholesome as The Great British Bake Off itself, she is what we might define as ‘quintessentially British’.’

Nadiya Hussain has won so much more than the Great British Bake Off

That an Asian Muslim woman in a headscarf can win a thoroughly British competition prove that ‘Britishness’ is broader than some would like to think

THEGUARDIAN.COM | BY REMONA ALY

Cease this heresy at once

4. Robin Hood (2006 series)

In popular culture and the numerous novels and films depicting him, Robin Hood is a local thief who lived with his band of merry men in twelfth-century England. But the BBC (no way!) went the extra mile to cast a black actor for the role of Friar Tuck and gave Robin a Muslim female sidekick.

Friar Tuck and "Djaq"

Robin Hood's story involves real characters such as John Lackland or Richard the LionHeart and is set in a medieval timeline that already endured three crusades. We can easily imagine the hostility and hatred the Christians harboured for people perceived as Saracens after the attacks they led on pilgrims and the previous campaigns, sieges and occupations of Jerusalem and the Holy Land.

This masquerade should have been filed in the comedy genre, like Mel Brook's Robin Hood: Men in Tights, instead of "adventure drama".

1066: A Year To Conquer England

BBC Two channel decided to release “a drama-documentary” (so it doesn’t have the mission of portraying reality), based around the conquest and administration of England after the invasion by William the Conqueror. Robert de Beaumont joined the Duke William and fought at Hastings before becoming Earl of Leicester. Being a Norman, he came from a Norse stock with Frankish admixture. However, this is how the series’ producers chose to depict him:

We have proof that Robert the Beaumont was white. This is a fact and a historical truth. One of the most famous and well-conserved artifacts of Robert’s time, the Bayeux tapestry depicting the Norman invasion of England in 1066, contains more than six hundred Saxon and Norman characters. Not a single one of them is black or even slightly dark.

The Bayeux tapestry

Robert hailed from the Beaumont family, whose ancestor is attested to be Torf, a Norse lord of the tenth century. This is confirmed in William of Jumièges' account Gesta Normannorum Ducum ("Deeds of the Dukes of the Normans").

I would even be surprised if any black people lived nowadays in the sleepy village of Beaumont-le-Roger in Normandy, where Robert's family originated from.

Panem et circenses

These decisions are lazy in addition of being dishonest. Why not spin the original works around a new context and set it in an original, fresh environment?

Kurosawa adapted King Lear to feudal Japan in "Ran", Sturges took the Seven Samurai and transferred them into the Far West to obtain the Magnificent Seven and more recently Ralph Fiennes brilliantly transported Shakespeare's Coriolanus from Ancient Rome to the twentieth century Balkan wars in the eponymous film.

Those movies were successful because they were credible. Ugly women over sixty are not depicted as the love interest in films (although mad feminist harpies would petition for that to happen) and neither are adults cast as children, because nobody would believe it to be remotely possible.

À mettre des coups de pioche dans sa télé

The BBC has been the champion of submissive political correctness and self-hatred for a while now. Their slogan should be "Enrich me, daddy. Whitey has been bad". But the Swedish media has also been particularly busy trying to out-cuck them with their damage control of criminogenic migrants,"whitewashing" suspects and culprits photographed in newspapers.

The goal is to manipulate the viewer (the younger and more passive the better). Nowadays, people research less and less, they absorb without filter. The masses must be entertained, kept idle but lies must be injected in the medium to kill two birds with one stone. This is why the red pill, the search of truth and the will to question what surrounds us is essential to fight those who are behind the cultural collapse.

I leave you with the film "Victoria and Abdul" coming this year, which has already made the frapuccino-sipping soy boys wet their undies with excitement. Looking at the plot, it is not surprising why.

Read more: British Media Doxes Small-Time Youtuber For Having Nationalist Views

---

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Psi Males: Men Who Are Too Alpha for Their Own Good

September 11, 2017 | by Matt Frohlich | Link | Original Link

There are some pitfalls in the conventional wisdom of the online manosphere despite providing a more realistic explanation of gender relations than that of the feminist establishment. What I find concerning is their near unanimous endorsement of alpha male behavior while disregarding the possibility that alpha behavior can also lead to a man's downfall.

I recommend a new classification for men who self-destruct in the pursuit of alpha male status. For lack of a better term, I will be classifying these types of men as "psi males."

The Archetype of the Psi Male

I once heard a story about a wildlife conservation effort that perfectly described the archetype of the psi male. I cannot attest to the validity of this story, but it does serve to illustrate my point.

The conservation effort, which was an attempt to increase the regional gray wolf population, went awry when one of the male wolves took over the entire population. Within a short amount of time he killed off all of the other males and mated with all of the females. He then went on to kill all of his male offspring and mate with his own female offspring.

The loss of so many male wolves diminished the hunting capabilities of the population, resulting in mass starvation. He eventually died off, leaving a path of destruction in his wake. Within a generation, the once vibrant wolf population was reduced to a handful of inbred females with no mating prospects.

Initially, it may seem best to classify this wolf as an alpha male as he had many of the characteristics that are associated with alphas. He was strong, dominant, and most of all, he mated with many females. Despite this, he was missing one of the defining characteristics of alpha males: reproductive success.

It is true that he produced more offspring than the average male could ever hope to produce. But he also killed many of these offspring. Those that he allowed to live were forced to fend for themselves. Best case scenario, he produced a handful of lackluster offspring with severely diminished mating potentials. Worst case scenario, he was an evolutionary dead end who took down the entire wolf population with him.

He would not qualify as a beta male either as his characteristics were the antithesis of those commonly assigned to betas. He certainly would not qualify as an omega male as he actually managed to produce offspring.

Still, from an evolutionary biological perspective, his reproductive success was only one step above that of omegas and far below that of betas. Hence I have decided that it is best to classify him as a psi male, since psi is the second to the last letter of the Greek alphabet, succeeded only by omega.

Granted, this is an extreme example of a psi male and it is unlikely that a single human male could ever hope to kill off all of the males in a population and mate with every female. But that is why this wolf serves as the archetype for the psi male: he is the perfect representation of what a psi male would be like. Despite the improbability of a true human psi male emerging, there are real-world examples of men who have attempted to live up to the gray wolf archetype.

Real-World Examples of Psi Males

Many cult leaders exhibit psi male behavior. A common theme in cults is that they are led by a charismatic male leader who has primary, if not exclusive, sexual access to the women. Many of the men in cults willingly hand their resources and women over to the cult leader without objection.

Despite the apparent invulnerability of the cult leader, this is a system which has repeatedly proven itself to be unsustainable, as evidenced by the numerous instances where such cults have self-destructed in a violent manner.

An infamous example of a cult failing in this manner is the mass suicide of 909 members of the People’s Temple in 1978 under the direction of their leader Jim Jones. Unsurprisingly, Jones reportedly had a voracious sexual appetite which he routinely unleashed on his members. Much like the gray wolf archetype, any potential children sired through the sexual conquests of his members either perished with the cult or were left to fend for themselves in the real world.

Dictators are another example of men who exhibit psi male behavior, with a relevant example being North Korean leader Kim Jong-un. Granted, it is difficult to say what goes on behind closed doors in a nation as secretive as North Korea, but it is reasonable to suspect that Jong-un's access to North Korean women is limited only by his own libido, because that is how dictatorships typically work.

Despite his numerous sexual escapades, he may end up leading his people into a nuclear holocaust, potentially eliminating him and all his offspring from the gene pool. It is baffling to think that the supreme and undisputed male leader of 25 million people could wind up as an evolutionary dead end, but that is a testament to the destructive potential of psi male behavior.

In Conclusion

The gray wolf archetype, cult leaders, and dictators are extreme examples, so I do not know how common psi males actually are. They may be so rare that the average person does not ever need to worry about encountering them. On the other hand, psi males provide a counterexample to the manosphere's conventional wisdom that alpha male behavior is always a good thing, so perhaps they are still worth discussing.

Psi males do raise some interesting questions for the manosphere: What is it that separates alpha males from psi males? Are psi males simply alpha males who succeed in fulfilling all of their desires, or are they motivated by different things? If they have the same motivations, should that diminish the honor the manosphere awards to alpha males? Is it possible for a true human psi male to exist? If a population is susceptible to being taken over by a psi male, does that mean they are already on the verge of collapse? If sexual strategy really is amoral, as is sometimes argued in the manosphere, then is it possible to form a moral objection to psi male behavior?

I do not have the answers to these questions, all I know is that there appears to be a contradiction in the conventional wisdom of the manosphere, and that psi males personify this contradiction.

Read More: Game Of Thrones Has Nothing But Beta Males And Alpha Women.

Matt Frohlich
Matt Frohlich's background is in scientific research. He also manages Protosci, a blog that focuses on the technological singularity and transhumanism. You can follow him on Twitter or read more about him here.

If Leftist Ideology Is Correct, Why Are Liberals Using Dirty And Violent Tactics?

September 11, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Leftists believe countless silly things: gun control makes everyone safer, Hillary is suitable to be President, men can get pregnant, etc. Postmodernist professors believe objective reality doesn't exist. Despite that, leftists are all very certain that the truth is on their side and everyone else is dumber than dirt.

Suppose you're in a debate where you're wrong. Your opponent merely can show that either your facts or your reasoning are incorrect. Then you lose, and you go home looking awfully silly. Pretty simple, right?

Now the following are heavy-handed tactics that nobody needs to use if the truth really is on their side. Lest anyone try to misrepresent this, I don't recommend using bad arguments or dirty tricks, but be aware of how to spot them.

Priming the audience

Anyone advocating highway construction will also have a bellicose foreign policy and a lousy human rights record, QED.

Being “the firstest with the mostest” is a great advantage in any war of information. This can be taken to dishonest extremes. The first recourse against targeted dissidents or competing ideologies is an information blackout.

If they’re getting too big to ignore, the next step is to turn the public against them preemptively before their message reaches a wide audience. Clever propagandists will go further and portray targeted views not just as wrong, but as completely reprehensible. The very idea of objective discussion—or even considering the merits of the targeted opposition—must be made to seem crazy, idiotic, sinful, evil, etc.

The target might be a specific organization, collection of groups conveniently lumped together, or ideologies and policy positions. By crafty association, adherents are portrayed as ill-tempered, brutish, criminal, etc. Video presentations with spooky music and old stock footage of historical meanies can help drive home the point. Meanwhile, adversaries of targeted views will be portrayed sensitively and cloaked in virtue—sometimes almost worshipfully—even if they’re none too saintly. (In fact, the irony sometimes rises to black comedy.) Thereby, politics is reduced to melodrama befitting a spaghetti Western.

Afterward, more familiar propaganda techniques are sufficient to keep the public turned against the targeted opposition. If they’re allowed any media access, usually it will be by their least charismatic and articulate members. However, any gaffes or particularly controversial points will suffice too. Today’s propagandists are great at cherry-picking sound bites (sometimes out of context) and carefully selecting shots and camera angles.

All this is how the Blue Pill public’s minds get made up by people they don’t know. If the truth is on their side, why is it necessary to condition the masses to have unquestioning, knee-jerk reactions?

Logical fallacies

This straw man clearly encourages children to smoke grass!

The art of rhetoric concerns proper debate as well as detecting verbal trickery, such as:

- Begging the question: Using an unstated assumption as a premise
- Irrelevant conclusion: Talking about something else to dodge the substance of the argument
- False dichotomy: Incorrectly portraying something an either/or proposition
- Appeal to popularity: If "everyone" believes something, it must be true
- Straw man: Overstating an opponent's position
- Appeal to emotion: Effective as the "pathos" element of rhetoric, but illegitimate when it derails logical discussion

Those twisted arguments (among many others) are so old that they have names in Greek and Latin. In modern times, common new variants on old themes include:

- Cherry picking evidence supporting one's argument
- Whoever cares the most about a subject must be "right"
- Sidetracking a discussion onto endless tangents
- Picking apart disputed evidence that's fairly inconsequential, while ignoring everything else
- Insisting you provide cited scientific studies, while expecting you to believe their unsupported assertions

- Dismissing peer-reviewed scientific studies with non-PC conclusions as “offensive” or “insensitive”
- Gross exaggerations or outright lying

Fallacious tactics are sometimes sloppiness, though bad arguers usually know what they’re doing. People secure in their facts and reasoning don’t need to use misdirection tactics, “my researcher can beat up your researcher”, or other word games.

Censorship

This tactic goes back to antiquity. Likely the first time was a king telling his subjects to quit criticizing his mistakes, or else. Although censorship can go quite far to silence opposition, there are drawbacks. It’s remarkably heavy-handed. Also, welding the safety valve of public opinion shut leads to simmering resentment. Further, it deprives a regime of valuable honest feedback.

Today, this takes several forms. Once again, the information blackout is the first line of defense. When the mass media is an oligopoly of a few corporate conglomerates with like-thinking executives and staffers, it’s easy to exclude competing narratives. Vigorous public debate can exist, so long as it’s within certain unspoken limits subject to change.

Since the 1990s, online communication has given the public a means to present their own information and commentary. To put a lid on it, service providers (ISPs, web hosts, payment processors, etc.) include terms of service allowing them to shut down dissenters arbitrarily. The criteria are very broad but very vague, giving massive discretionary power to block opposing narratives. Social Justice Warriors monitor for dissenting narratives across many platforms, and some companies even hire teams of them. The newest trend is computer-driven analysis to police speech robotically.

With several policy positions, one side may be argued freely, but the other side is delegitimized. For instance, it’s permitted to advocate vociferously for open borders. However, explaining why that’s bad can get you censored for “promoting hate” (whatever that’s supposed to mean).

The final phase of censorship is by law. This is already well in place in most parts of Europe. Questioning policies, or even certain historical matters, can result in fines or jail time. Thus, you can advocate multiculturalism until you're blue in the face, but advocating against it will land you in court. Once again, the criteria are very broad and selectively enforced.

If leftists believe certain ideas are so clearly incorrect, then why is it necessary to keep them out of the public sphere or make them illegal?

Intimidation

Chinese Communist struggle session

By instilling fear of questioning narratives, people can be induced to censor themselves. Conformity is a powerful force, as the Milgram experiment (among others) demonstrated. One example is all the "if you're voting for Trump, then remove me from your friends list" messages from last year, posted by people who pride themselves on tolerance and inclusion.

Worse is online mobbing and doxing. Expressing certain opinions might get you blacklisted from your job or have your personal details revealed. You and your family can be deprived of income or put in danger. Leftists are still incensed about efforts to get Communists out of Hollywood and the State Department six decades ago during the height of the Cold War. However, they're curiously silent about ordinary private citizens getting purged in recent times over non-treasonable dissent.

The final step is violence. In recent years, a number of leftist groups have been raising hell, rioting, and suppressing dissenters. Some are well-funded to the point where "protesters" can be paid and bused in from afar. (Although the members are cannon fodder for globalist billionaires, they think they're fighting the Establishment.) Police response is sometimes ineffective, even though they've been targeted personally. Often police are overwhelmed, or even on orders to stand down.

Why are witch hunts and goon squads necessary in a free marketplace of ideas?

Why ideologies take on a life of their own

Entire regimes can be enmeshed in ideologies that are flawed to the point of absurdity. Suppose that the Soviet leadership had openly admitted that Communism doesn't work, and they stopped punishing dissidents for saying that. Would they (and all the apparatchiks working under them) have stayed in power?

For a more recent example, quite likely thousands of people work in foundations or otherwise make their careers out of trying to get more women into STEM fields. How long would they keep riding the gravy train if they admitted that most women simply don't like nerdy careers? (Recently, James Damore got fired from Google for saying something similar.) To bring big donations to foundations and justify feminist HR specialties, it takes the scare story about "The Patriarchy" keeping women out of technology. To maintain the narrative, other explanations must be suppressed.

That one is a relatively innocuous example. Several other flawed notions have astronomically greater impact on the public, but I'll leave that as an exercise for the reader. If the leftist power structure loses grip over their narratives and can't exclude other views, their corrupt regime will fall.

Read More: Twitter Appoints Anti-Free Speech Feminist Anita Sarkeesian To Head Trust And Safety Council

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

What Is The End Game Of Game?

September 12, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A question I'm often asked—and one that I've often asked myself—is this: if game is the journey then what is the destination? A constant refrain is, "Do I keep hitting on girls forever, or should I settle down so I'm not alone when I'm older?" We can fall into the trap of thinking this a binary issue when really it isn't.

Many of us got into pick-up back around 2005 when The Game was published. That was twelve years ago, over a decade of life. In that time we have all got older. I myself am now in my forties. Many very famous PUAs are a similar age, or in their late thirties.

This means that real, serious 'life' is happening to all of us. A lot of us are no longer in our twenties, and happy to go to nightclubs night after night looking to pick up (although of course there are plenty of new guys in just that category). Guys are starting to look at the arc of their lives, and to consider what it is they actually want: marriage? kids? stability?

I write about game all the time—'how to' articles, advice and so on—because the dynamics between men and women fascinate me, and because I am still, for the moment, motivated to keep going out and meeting new girls.

Last year I had a long-term girlfriend come move in with me. For various reasons it didn't work out, and so for the moment I'm 'back out there' in the field. So for me as much as for anyone else the question of 'where is this going long-term' is very relevant.

I wouldn't want anyone to come away with the impression that I glorify the single life and promiscuity above everything else, or that I recommend it. As I always make clear, attraction and sexual chemistry are at the root of both one-night stands and long-term relationships. So the skills you need to pick up that girl in the bar are the same skills that you require—initially—to meet the woman who ends up as your girlfriend or wife. (Of course, in the case of the latter you also need another skillset, one that pertains specifically to relationships.) This is why game is so important.

Casual Sex Versus Marriage

But as Michael Majalahti pointed out in his excellent article on casual sex last week, constant womanising is neither healthy nor a good foundation on which to build a useful and happy life.

I think a lot of men feel this instinctively. But also, we are nothing if not prey to societal programming, and the idea that marriage = good, pick-up = bad is deeply ingrained. As far as our society is concerned, men who continue in the player lifestyle much past their 40s are players, sad 'Peter Pan' characters, immature, damaged, toxic, creepy, headed for loneliness and unhappiness. And so on.

Even though we may have taken the 'red pill' and become much more skeptical about what the culture tells us, this is a highly emotive issue where society's arguments make a lot of sense. After all, who wants to be the fifty-five year-old player in the shopping mall hitting on young women?

Where the difficulty lies, though, is in believing that there is an 'easy' solution. "Just stop being a player. Find a 'quality girl' and settle down with her. It's the right thing to do," people say. But this is where logic starts to break down.

It astonishes me that in 2017 some men still imagine marriage (or a long-term relationship) to be some kind of safety haven which, once reached, offers eternal respite from the shallow indignities of the dating market.

Guys ask me, “Should I look to get married, because I don’t want to be lonely when I’m old. I don’t want to die alone.” Why don’t they stop to consider that you can get married and still end up lonely when you’re older, and still die alone?

My father was married twice. He was also in a long-term relationship with a non-Western woman. Now, in his late-sixties, he is alone. My uncle, who’s of a similar age, was also married twice. Now he too is alone. I have a friend also in his late sixties. He was married five times. He has also been divorced five times. Now he lives alone. Marriage, you see, is no insurance against being single later in life.

Does this mean that I’m anti-marriage? No, not at all. Like most of us (probably), the thought of having someone to care for me and love me forever seems very attractive. Who wouldn’t want that? But I am also a pragmatist. And if my father, who first got married in the nineteen-seventies, is now single, then what hope, realistically, is there for someone tying the knot in 2017?

Yes, you can travel outside of the USA or the UK and find a no-Western woman to settle down with. That seems like a decent strategy. It’s entirely possible I will do that myself.

But here’s the thing. Don’t fall into the trap of thinking this a binary issue, with game (bad) on one side and marriage / LTR (good) on the other. Because marriage, rather than being the ‘happy ever after’ at the end of the story, is actually the start of a whole set of other problems.

Plus the sad fact is that your marriage may not last. Yes, you can try and ‘screen’ your future wife, but just remember that everyone’s on their best behaviour in the throes of a new relationship.

A Player For Life?

For all of these reasons I don't advocate either being a 'player for life' or marriage as the panacea that will solve everything. Instead, my advice would be to keep your options open, but crucially, to ensure that you are living a fully-rounded life as a man that includes a mission that is entirely separate to women.

Because the good news is this. The men I mention—my father, my uncle and my friend—are not unhappy being single. Actually, all of them seem to have great lives. My father has a business and friends. My uncle spends his time training and going skiing. And my friend is dedicating his life to business and writing.

So rather than looking at my future solely in regard to women (that is, in terms of whether I'll game perpetually or 'settle down'), I prefer to consider it in terms of my passions and ambitions (writing, business, and travel). Whether a woman comes along for the ride or not is secondary: I am placing myself first.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: 4 Incredibly Effective Ways To Build Comfort With a Hot Girl

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Australia’s Aboriginal Lobby Is Exploiting White Guilt To Promote A Far-Left Agenda

September 12, 2017 | by Ned Kelly | Link | Original Link

Australia’s native aboriginal lobby is highly influential. I use the term “lobby” deliberately because it consists of organised individuals and groups and many of its members are not aboriginal themselves.

There are lawyers, politicians, civil servants and academics who live large on the tax dollars of working Australians. The aboriginal lobby exercises remarkable influence on Australian political discourse given that aboriginals make up just 2.8% of Australia’s population.

How has a lobby group that represents such a small minority of the population become so influential?

Australia’s peace and prosperity means that most of us do not have many real problems (at least by international standards), so the historical dispossession and poor treatment of aboriginals has taken up a larger and larger share of political space.

The aboriginal issue is also a good distraction from some looming problems such as unsustainable immigration, unaffordable housing, growing national debt and an ageing population.

Furthermore, many remote aboriginal communities really are problems; completely dysfunctional despite (or more likely because of) billions of dollars of government spending. These communities are plagued by multi-generational unemployment, alcoholism, violence, and sexual abuse.

The fact that so many Australian aboriginal children grow up in these conditions is tragic, but the aboriginal lobby has completely failed to fix these dysfunctional communities. Instead, it has cultivated and exploited white guilt and negatively impacted Australian society in four key ways.

1. Attacks on free speech

Unlike the United States, Australia does not have a constitutional right to free speech. Section 18C of the Racial Discrimination Act states that it is unlawful for a person to "offend, insult, humiliate or intimidate another person or group" based on "race, colour or national or ethnic origin".

At least 15 cases have gone before the courts. Thankfully, most have been unsuccessful but the accused have still suffered the stress and costs of hiring lawyers and defending themselves. Australian political debate occurs under the shadow of this law and countless individuals have been intimidated into silence. If Return of Kings was published in Australia I guarantee it would already have been sued under Section 18C.

In 2011, a group of mixed-race "aboriginals" with mostly white ancestry successfully sued conservative commentator Andrew Bolt under Section 18C. Bolt had accused them of identifying as aboriginal for career advantages. The court forced him to pay legal costs and issue a retraction.

In 2016, a group of white Queensland University of Technology students were unsuccessfully sued for complaining on Facebook that it was unfair that a computer room was set aside only for aboriginal students. The fact that these cases ever reached the courts is a disgrace.

2. Land grabs

In 1992, in Mabo v Queensland, Australia's highest court recognised "native title" over land for the first time. The High Court ruled that occupation entitled aboriginals to legal ownership of land if they had maintained an "ongoing connection" with the land and their native title had not been "extinguished" by government actions.

In the Mabo case this was not a terrible decision, as Eddie Mabo's tribe had lived on their small island north of Australia for thousands of years. However, the Mabo decision opened the floodgates and the courts have become ever more flexible in deciding what constitutes an ongoing connection.

Currently, aboriginals hold native title over 36% of Australia and that is expected to grow significantly in coming years. Much of this formerly public land is either no longer accessible to non-aboriginals or is accessible but only by paying an entry fee.

3. Affirmative action and the rise of white Aboriginals

It's so hip to be black

ANDREW BOLT

Why are so many people eager to proclaim their aboriginality, despite it being such a small part of their heritage?

Andrew Bolt was successfully sued under Section 18C for insulting these white aboriginals.

In Australia's civil service and universities, there are many affirmative action positions exclusively open to aboriginals. The first problem is that these positions are for university students or university graduates and do not, therefore, do anything to help the truly disadvantaged aboriginals who do not finish high school.

The second interrelated problem is that it has become fashionable and advantageous for white Australians with only a tiny proportion of aboriginal ancestry to identify as aboriginal and take these affirmative action places.

The government departments and universities can pat themselves on the back for reaching their desired quotas of "aboriginals" and a bunch of rich white kids are further advantaged while the genuinely disadvantaged aboriginals get nothing. Whenever I see a group photograph of affirmative action "aboriginals," a large majority of the group is always 100% white in appearance. The story of The Emperor's New Clothes springs to mind.

4. Encouraging white guilt while taking zero personal responsibility

Cartoonist Bill Leak was attacked by the left for this supposedly "racist" cartoon criticising negligent parents and advocating personal responsibility.

The aboriginal lobby is forever encouraging white guilt and seeking symbolic recognition of that guilt. After more than a decade of campaigning, in 2007 Australia's Prime Minister apologised on behalf of the Australian government for taking mixed race aboriginal children from their mothers between 1905 and the 1970s (the "Stolen Generations").

Before the apology, the aboriginal lobby argued that only once white Australia said "sorry" could we move forward together as one nation and fix dysfunctional aboriginal communities. Of course, the apology did not achieve any practical improvement for disadvantaged aboriginals.

Fast forward to 2017 and the aboriginal lobby wants constitutional recognition that they were here first, a treaty, and to change the date of Australia's national holiday.

Australia Day is currently celebrated on 26 January and it marks the date in 1788 that the First Fleet landed in Sydney to begin a British colony. The aboriginal lobby disparages it as "Invasion Day", ignoring the fact that rival aboriginal tribes were killing and dispossessing each other for tens of thousands of years before 1788.

The above complaints and demands are certainly annoying, but their most recent demand is potentially dangerous. That demand is for an elected aboriginal-only parliament to sit alongside the current democratic parliament. It is not yet clear exactly what purpose or powers this body would have other than giving high-profile members of the aboriginal lobby a cushy taxpayer-funded soapbox. At best it would be deeply divisive and at worst it could cause future constitutional crises if the body's powers became contested.

None of these symbolic acts would do anything to help the aboriginal children living in dysfunctional communities from East Arnhem to Yarrabar to Wilcannia. If there is hope for these kids it lies in encouraging personal responsibility rather than making excuses and blaming everything on the white man.

Read more: 5 Reasons You Shouldn't Feel Guilty About European Colonialism

Ned Kelly
Ned is an intellectual bushranger. He has spent the past ten years in the leftist corridors of Australia's universities and civil service and he's had enough.

Achievement Is The Conversion Of Willpower And Time

September 12, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I used to take personal achievement very seriously. If I wasn't achieving, accomplishing, or even doing something productive, I believed I was moving backwards in life, wasting away like a drug addict. Metrics had to be hit, whether related to money, women, fitness, web site views, or accumulated knowledge. Otherwise, I was not realizing my true potential.

Looking back, I see that my thinking was flawed, and my achievements were really nothing more than conversions of one form of energy into another. It's not so much that I was creating something out of nothing, but playing a game of musical chairs.

Achieving any goal comes down to willpower and time

Willpower is needed to go from doing an easy activity, like watching television or napping, to a hard activity, like going to the gym and activating your muscles. Time is needed to read or study resources that teach you how the activity is competently done, and of course the actual time to do it. That's the formula to achieve anything in life, and when that happens, what you're really skilled at is not necessarily the activity itself, but dedicating willpower and time in a way that many others cannot.

Why are some men so good at summoning willpower and time to specific goals? How can

I have labored for so many years getting laid around the world when most other men can't be bothered? How can a man go to the gym four times a week when I'm fine with going once or twice? What can push men to completely dedicate themselves around achieving a materialist goal that surpasses their true biological and physical need? The answer is emotion. The only way to push a man beyond what his nature requires is to make him feel so emotionally inadequate and insecure that he feels the only way to patch up the hole is to dedicate his being—and sometimes his entire life—to the achievement.

I was a late bloomer who didn't go through puberty until my late teens. This wrecked my confidence with women and caused me to get less attention than my male peers, leaving a gaping void around women and masculinity that had to be filled with 13 years of achievement in game that I shared publicly with the world in the process of becoming a teacher and "influencer," until finally in my mid 30's the hole was patched and I no longer wanted to dedicate as much willpower and time into the same tasks.

Your wounds create emotional cravings

Look at a man who is most obsessed about money and you will uncover memories of his youth where he felt ashamed for not having toys his friends had. Look at men who have the biggest muscles and you'll uncover stories of being picked on in childhood. The only motivator that causes men to go above and beyond any area of achievement is inadequacy, and when that hole is filled, the willpower and time spent on the task will fade. The man will then feel frustrated and unsure of what to do next.

The self-realized and content man is a loser in the eyes of others, because he never surpasses his need enough to be a public expert in anything. He is fine with an average income, average sex life, average body, because he has no emotional hole that is begging him to convert his willpower and time into grand achievement. If a woman is self-realized, why would she feel the need to show off her body and genitals to the world through pictures and revealing clothing? Why would she ache for fleeting sexual encounters that rarely even comes with orgasmic pleasure? Look at a person's goals and you can discover where they suffered emotional pain.

I've met men who, to bang more women, take supplements to increase their horniness. They have used game to satisfy their sexual needs, but once that happened, their ego wanted more and forced them to artificially manipulate their need so the banging could continue. Game started as a tool for them, subservient to their being, but now it's their master. Productivity gurus do the same when it comes to money. They teach you how to manipulate your schedule, lifestyle, eating habits, and personal relationships all to accommodate more money making, so you're an accomplished merchant in the eyes of others.

What is your true need?

Of course I'm not giving you an excuse to be homeless, unhealthy, or to choose a life of involuntary celibacy because you are afraid of taking social risks, but there is wisdom is knowing when enough is enough. If you have to take dubious supplements and sustain injuries to achieve your fitness goals, you've surpassed your body's need. If you're cutting off potential long-term relationships or love because you want to bang more girls to brag to your friends, you're merely trying to fill a hole. If you're exhausting yourself at work because you want to buy a toy that you don't need, you're trying to find self-worth in the material, and if you have a goal where, upon achieving it, you simply decide to gain more of it, you've found not a goal but a black hole, and soon your life will revolve entirely around it.

I'm currently writing a new book. Usually I'd make sacrifices to other parts of my life to finish it quicker, but then the book, the achievement, ends up owning me during that entire time. I don't need more fame or more money, so I'll write the book at my own pace, and when it's finally done, people can buy it if they want. Unless I can enjoy the process of writing a book on a timeline that feels balanced for me, I allow the goal to become my master. Once you achieve basic material comfort, work on goals without timelines, without pressure. Enjoy them for their own sake instead of what they may provide.

I have to warn you that if you follow my advice, you will watch as others pass you by. They will get more money, women, and fame than you. They will dangle their prizes in front of you and teach you how to work as hard as them, and try to make you feel like a loser if you don't. But they're just converting their emotional holes into willpower and time and finally into materialistic achievement that can be measured and compared. This is why achievement has to involve a number to keep score: number of bangs, net worth, bench press one rep max, number of Youtube views, number of countries visited, and so on. The best way to win this kind of numbers game is not to play at all. Let others choose to be a slave to numbers while you never lose touch of your true need.

Passing on things I've learned to you as I approach middle age may come across as foolish, especially for those of you who are under 35. If you are young and full of both energy and the need to prove yourself to the world, it's best you ignore my advice and keep converting your willpower and time into the type of achievement you believe will satisfy you. In a best case scenario, your achievement will patch a hole, like it did mine, and you can release it as a goal and pursue it at your own enjoyment. In the worst case scenario, you go deeper and let the goal control you, watching hopelessly as your self worth paradoxically goes down upon comparing yourself to men of even higher achievement who are just slightly better than you at converting their time and willpower into materialistic gain.

When I started looking at achievement as mere conversion of one form of energy into another, I started doing things for myself and those in my inner circle than for the world, because it's not really achievement that is taking place when I write an article like this or a book—it's just the moving of furniture in a room. I hope I'll soon forget about achievement so I can become an average man, a mediocrity in the eyes of the accomplished, but after pursuing it for so long, and becoming a "somebody" in the eyes of many, I wonder if it's really possible to go back.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: You Become What You Fight

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

There Are A Lot Of Mothers But Very Few Moms

September 13, 2017 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

A mother is simply a female who gives birth to a baby. A mom is a woman who gives birth and then puts the needs of her child before hers and raises them properly and to the best of her ability. Mothers generally take the easy way out and are selfish. Moms do what's necessary no matter how difficult in any and all situations and don't have a selfish bone in her body when it comes to her kids. Simply put, mothers are bad moms, and moms are good moms.

Now on the birth certificate it says mother and father, meaning the biological mother and biological father. When people say the word "mother," what gets lost in translation is the biological connotation of the word. We automatically assume that if a woman is a mother, she must be a mom.

And people might say "Well Donovan, there's no difference between a mother and a mom….they're the same thing"

Mothers (read: bad moms) never read to their children

And those people would be wrong. It’s easy to become a mother: just let a guy fuck you without a condom and shoot his load in you, and if you happen to be fertile and ovulating, you get pregnant. The real work begins after you have the kid and that’s what separates the mothers from the moms.

When we hear and see things involving childbirth, we attach this moniker to it called “The miracle of childbirth.” It tricks us into putting “mother” and “mom” in the same category. We see commercials with beautiful, inspirational music in the background, we see the nurse gently hand the newborn to the mother who’s overcome with emotion as she meets her child for the first time, and we see the proud father looking on. The whole scene is this rosy image of what childbirth is like.

When we see stuff like this the human mind envisions the most elegant form of conception. We see a husband and wife slowly making sweet love in missionary position and looking into each other’s eyes as if they know that this is the day they’ll conceive. We imagine this rosy little scene and assume that the wife will be a good mom, and that the husband will be a good dad and everything will be alright.

But most pregnancies don’t happen this way. Most of us are conceived through hard, rough sex. The inseminator is fucking her doggy style, he’s pulling her hair, smacking her ass calling her names while she’s moaning like a slut telling him to pound her harder.

It doesn’t take an act of congress to get knocked up.

He shoots his load in her, they smoke a cigarette or whatever their post coital activities normally are, and they have no idea he just got her pregnant. That’s how most pregnancies happen. It’s far from this rosy sweet love making session.

In either case, becoming a mother is the easy part. There’s nothing heroic, difficult, or arduous about getting raw dogged then pumped full of pain killers and popping out a kid. But childbirth has been exaulted and pedestalized to the masses as if it’s some monumentous feat of valor and strife. That’s one of the many reasons why most mothers in America are terrible fucking moms.

They essentially ride the coat tails of the 17 hours of labor and epidural inspired childbirth throughout their kid’s childhood. They think that going through 9 months of pregnancy and having the kid is all they need to do to get all the accolades of being a mom. But here’s the rub:

Giving birth doesn’t make a woman a MOM!

It makes her a mother at that point and nothing more. And unfortunately for most American children, most American mothers are not interested in being moms. Not in the least.

A few examples

DISCIPLINE

Mothers don’t normally discipline their children as they should. It’s easy to let them get away with shit because then her kids “like her” all the time which is why they’re easy on them in the first place. But mothers go easy on their kids for selfish reasons and that reason is that they don’t want to feel like their children “hate” them. They don’t want to deal with the crying and screaming or fit throwing. Mothers don’t subject themselves to the difficulties of motherhood.

Moms aren’t afraid to discipline their child(ren).

A mom, however, consistently does the difficult tasks like disciplining her children. She’ll endure the crying and screaming. She’ll tolerate the fit throwing. A mom is willing to pay the price to do the right thing for her kids because, again, she’s putting the needs of her children before her own. She’s willing to take the arrows in the short term to help mold her children into good and decent human beings in the long term.

ATTENTION WHORING

A mother uses her children to bring attention to herself and not her children. Sure, she’ll post pictures of them on social media, but she’s checking the likes every five minutes and if she gets 100, she’s not saying “Hey look Junior, your picture got 100 likes!” Nope. She’s not even thinking about him when she refreshes that page. She is only thinking of herself.

“OMG I luv being a mom!!”

Mothers also like to give their kids unique names spelled in “unique” ways like Jaedyn, Ostyn, or Ginnyphur (pronounced “Jennifer,” and yes, gentlemen, I’ve seen all of these names). They don’t do this for the kids. They do this so other people can pay more attention to them than other mothers.

ACTIVITIES

A mother takes Junior to soccer practice and his games and lets everyone know it on social media. Every picture she takes of him to show everyone how handsome he is in his uniform. But she’s also in the picture, with her hair done, full makeup, wearing a shirt that shows 75% of her tits to show everyone what a great “mom” she is.

But if you ask her how Junior played that day, she wouldn’t know because she spent half the time on her phone taking selfies and texting the two dudes she’s fucking in hopes that one is free later.

Mothers only pay attention to their phones

Sure, she may have gotten a few seconds of footage of her actual son in the game but the camera turns right back to her so she can tell everyone on her Facebook page that being a mom is the "toughest job I've ever loved!" Then she'll turn her attention right back to her phone to see if Kevin responded about their date tonight and if he liked her picture.

A mom would take her kid to practice and games and actually pay attention him. She'll make sure he has a post-game snack, she'll cheer him on, and encourage him when he screws up. Unlike the mother, mom could tell you everything he did on the field from start to finish and when she finally digs her phone out of her purse, she'll take a picture and post it on social media because she, too, is proud of him and entitled to show him off. But she's nowhere to be found in those pictures and if she is, the kid takes up most of the screen because he is the priority.

MEN

Simply put, mothers regularly put men before her kids. A mother would drop her kids off with whoever was available so she can go out and get fucked by whoever she swiped right for earlier in the day.

If she can't find a sitter, she'll let a man neither she or her children know into the home so she can get dick. She also brings random men around her children all the time regardless of how long she's been fucking him, regardless of whether she really knows him or not.

Nevermind the fact that her kids can hear what's going on. Nevermind the fact that her kids are confused as to why mom has a different man around them every week. A mother simply says to herself “They don’t know what sex is, they’ll be alright” or “They’ll get over it”.

“Kids? What kids?”

A mom is careful with whom she dates and is especially careful about bringing men around her children. She understands that being selfish and irresponsible in this way will have negative effects on her kids and will cause them to resent her later on. A mom knows that in order to be a MOM, sometimes she has to sacrifice her need for male attention and validation (God forbid).

The bottom line…

Any horny woman with a few eggs to drop can open her legs and take a man’s load. That’s the easy part, which is why most women have kids, but it takes a woman who is dedicated to her children, puts their needs before hers, and does what’s necessary to raise them properly regardless of how difficult it may be. Mothers don’t make sacrifices for the betterment of her child(ren). Moms do.

Mother’s Day shouldn’t be celebrated for baby mamas or hos with a bunch of kids who only pretend to give a shit about their kids on social media or when she thinks the world is watching. It should be changed to Mom’s Day for the real moms of the world to be celebrated for the hard work and sacrifices they make the bring their children up the way they should be and not the way the public thinks they are.

Watch the podcast version of this article below:

Tune into Donovan’s show, TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe, weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST on YouTube. Listen or watch all episodes on thesharpereality.com, itunes, or Soundcloud.

Read Next: The True Story Of A Carousel-Riding Military Wife

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

How I Finally Got Off The Weight Loss Roller Coaster

September 13, 2017 | by Scott Myers | Link | Original Link

In modern society, the biggest obstacle to overcome is losing weight brought on by years of inactivity and piss poor diet. After putting in a lot of discipline and effort in regards to eating right and hitting the gym, you will reap the reward of a massively improved physique.

When you lose excess fat, you feel increase in confidence thanks to the positive attention received from others. New clothes are purchased to flaunt your new physique while fat clothes are given away in an attempt to completely shed all memories of the extra pounds that used to be present in the mirror. After a long period of dieting, the strict control is loosened and you feel comfortable indulging here and there.

A few months later, the new clothes are getting tight while the gym membership card collects dust in a drawer. The lies we use to justify our complacency grow in proportion to our re-growing waist size. Before long, it’s time to go clothes shopping again, this time to get a size or two bigger because the only pants that fit anymore are sweat pants. The rationalizations are many but the reality is the fat is coming back. It creeps up and is difficult to notice until it’s too late.

They didn’t shrink in the dryer.

My Story

I was that person twice. For reference I am 6’2 (188 cm). I was at my heaviest in high school, where I tipped the scales at 330 pounds (150 kg). Tired of always asking for rides, I began walking everywhere and inadvertently lost 70 pounds without making any major changes to how I was eating (isn’t adolescence great). From there I lost another 40lbs and settled in at 220 pounds.

A few years later, thanks to a poor diet and inactivity driven by significant marijuana usage and alcohol consumption, I was back at 280lbs. I began exercising and watching what I ate and dropped back to 220. Again after a couple of years my motivation had gone up in smoke along with the copious amounts of marijuana I consumed and I was back at 290. I had reality shoved in my face like the many slices of pizza and bottles of soda I guzzled when I was at an electronics store and did not recognize myself on the TV until after I thought “Wow, that guy is fat.”

I approached the age where my father was diagnosed with type 2 diabetes and watched my parents’ physical health degrade from their obesity. I knew I did not want that kind of life. I stopped smoking weed at 25 and at 26 (5 years ago) I became serious about my approach to how I eat.

After researching different diets I dropped to 170lbs over the course of a year using the South Beach Diet. I'm not going to break down the diet here as the information is readily available online but I liked South Beach because after an initial restrictive phase of two weeks you are able to eat a wide variety of foods with no macro-nutrients avoided.

Some tips that have worked for both my weight loss and continued maintenance

All accountability is your own. The only person you cheat during self improvement is yourself. Most people want you to fail because it helps reinforce their belief that it's not their fault that they are fat. Learn how to say no to yourself. What got you fat in the first place is always giving in to cravings. Self-control is a pillar of the red pill and antithetical to the "muh feelings" mantra of the left.

Eliminate spontaneity by planning every meal. Control needs to be maintained and it is nearly impossible to be in control when you don't have a plan. I always have my lunch prepared the night before work, if not a day or two in advance.

Sometimes bumper sticker wisdom can be relevant.

Learn to love healthy food. Staring down a pound of broccoli on your plate is not an initially appetizing endeavor, especially when you are used to a diet of burgers and fries. It can become an acquired taste, much like coffee and beer, but you must acquire healthy tastes by consistent consumption.

Prioritize protein intake. This is important during weight loss as adequate protein intake helps to preserve lean body mass. Advice varies but I like to shoot for one gram per pound of lean body mass. Not getting enough protein during my weight loss was a mistake that can be easily avoided.

As an adult, what you eat and how much you eat is 95% of losing weight and maintaining the loss. Unless you exercise at professional athlete levels you will never out train a bad diet, especially once you have gotten fat.

If I could go back, the one thing I would do different is to incorporate strength training during the weight loss, which is the other 5%. I became weak and skinny fat. After struggling to lift a 50 pound bag at work, I knew something needed to change. I began strength training using Stronglifts 5×5 and I am up to 195lbs.

I am consistent in lifting (heavy) three times a week while including some sort of physical activity on my rest days such as walking my dog. My current project is to get my body fat under 10% and I am using the Leangains method of intermittent fasting, of which I am a huge fan.

This should be a part of your gym repertoire.

What you're up against

There is a myth perpetuated by many that losing weight increases metabolism. This is far from true. As you weigh less, your body requires less energy to move and your metabolism is lowered (simple thermodynamics, right?).

There are a few other things at play. When you gain fat, your body creates more fat cells to store the fat. As you lose weight the cells empty but are not destroyed. They remain, waiting to fill again. This is one of the main reasons why so many people easily regain the weight they lose and then gain more. Some studies state that as much as 97% of people regain the weight lost after a diet.

Another mechanism to fight sustained weight loss is that your body begins increasing production of a hormone know as lipoprotein lipase as you lose weight. This hormone helps to refill the fat cells that are empty. You are basically at war with your body to keep the weight off and the fight will be there for the rest of your life.

It has been four years since I dropped to my lowest weight, and the key takeaway that I tell anyone who will listen is that once weight is lost, it is critical to maintain and build upon the behaviors that enabled the weight loss for the rest of your life. You have to find what works best for you and I highly encourage you to avoid crash diets that are unsustainable.

Simply put, the key to winning the battle of the bulge is saying no far more often than saying yes to food indulgences. I enjoy myself from time to time and have built my current diet with food I love, but I am compliant 99% of the time. Any deviation is planned and accounted for. Unfortunately, most people lack the resolve and willpower to fully digest this information and will ride the weight loss roller-coaster until they give up and begin promoting fat acceptance like is the case with most women.

Read More: The Top 3 Fat Loss Mistakes Guys Make

Scott Myers

Scott recently stumbled across the Red Pill while on a journey of self improvement and hasn't looked back. He seeks to inspire others to fight the complacency that is common in western society and enjoys guns and lifting. You can find him in the desert blowing up tannerite.

10 Favorite Quotes From Fydor Dostoevsky's "The Brothers Karamazov"

September 13, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The Brothers Karamazov is a book published by Russian writer Fyodor Dostoyevsky in 1880 that explores themes of spirituality, psychology, and the changing nature of Russia. It's a mammoth 800-page piece of work that would never get written today, but nonetheless provides value to those who read it, especially if they are interested in understanding the Russian soul.

Here are my favorite quotes from the book…

> A man who lies to himself and listens to his own lie comes to a point where he does not discern any truth either in himself or anywhere around him, and thus falls into disrespect towards himself and others. Not respecting anyone, he ceases to love, and having no love, he gives himself up to passions and coarse pleasures, in order to occupy and amuse himself, and in his vices reaches complete bestiality, and it all comes from lying continually to others and to himself.

Without self-awareness, man is not able to see the errors of his behavior, and will always forge down the wrong path as if blindfolded. Even worse, he may attack anyone who attempts to remove his blindfold.

> 'I love you madly,' she says, 'even if you do not love me— no matter, only be my > husband. Don't be afraid, I shan't hinder you in any way, I'll be your furniture, the rug you walk on … I want to love you eternally, I want to save you from yourself …'

I don't believe it is possible to find a woman who would state the same thing today. Instead she'd explain, "I love you madly in this moment only, and I expect you to treat me like your queen. Be afraid, because if you hinder me, I will walk on you as if you're my living room rug, and ensure that you do not escape my punishment."

> There is no more ceaseless or tormenting care for man, as long as he remains free, than to find someone to bow down to as soon as possible. But man seeks to bow down before that which is indisputable, so indisputable that all men at once would agree to the universal worship of it. For the care of these pitiful creatures is not just to find something before which I or some other man can bow down, but to find something that everyone else will also believe in and bow down to, for it must needs be all together. And this need for communality of worship is the chief torment of each man individually, and of mankind as a whole, from the beginning of the ages.

A man may make bold proclamations about being free, but as soon as he becomes free, he quickly seeks out an object or being to submit to, whether it's a vice, a woman, or a god. It is impossible for a man to exist in nature without worshiping what he believes is higher than himself.

> With bread you were given an indisputable banner: give man bread and he will bow down to you, for there is nothing more indisputable than bread. But if at the same time someone else takes over his conscience— oh, then he will even throw > down your bread and follow him who has seduced his conscience. In this you were right. For the mystery of man's being is not only in living, but in what one lives for. Without a firm idea of what he lives for, man will not consent to live and will sooner destroy himself than remain on earth, even if there is bread all around him.

As soon as a man sates his needs, he will then develop a new need which begs for satisfaction. The way to control men, it seems, is to keep them in an enduring state of need, so that they don't escape the slavish cycle of worship.

> Freedom, free reason, and science will lead them into such a maze, and confront them with such miracles and insoluble mysteries, that some of them, unruly and ferocious, will exterminate themselves; others, unruly but feeble, will exterminate each other; and the remaining third, feeble and wretched, will crawl to our feet and cry out to us: "Yes, you were right, you alone possess his mystery, and we are coming back to [the church]— save us from ourselves."

Freedom from God and tradition did not lead to true freedom. Instead, it led to submission to egalitarian ideas, rationale that is manipulated by the ruling class, and the female form, which is lofted above us as the new gods that must be worshiped by all.

> The world has proclaimed freedom, especially of late, but what do we see in this freedom of theirs: only slavery and suicide! For the world says: "You have needs, therefore satisfy them, for you have the same rights as the noblest and richest men. Do not be afraid to satisfy them, but even increase them"— this is the current teaching of the world. And in this they see freedom. But what comes of this right to increase one's needs? For the rich, isolation and spiritual suicide; for > the poor, envy and murder, for they have been given rights, but have not yet been shown any way of satisfying their needs.

>
> […]
>
> Taking freedom to mean the increase and prompt satisfaction of needs, they distort their own nature, for they generate many meaningless and foolish desires, habits, and the most absurd fancies in themselves. They live only for mutual envy, for pleasure-seeking and self-display. To have dinners, horses, carriages, rank, and slaves to serve them is now considered such a necessity that for the sake of it, to satisfy it, they will sacrifice life, honor, the love of mankind, and will even kill themselves if they are unable to satisfy it.

Materialism has failed, as Dostoevsky predicted. It produced such a spiritual void that the suicide switch of society has turned on by those on the left who want to destroy us all. While they actively engage in the promotion of sterility, authoritarianism, and death, the elite class is enjoying the decline to experience riches that were not fathomable in Dostoevsky's time.

> And therefore the idea of serving mankind, of the brotherhood and oneness of people, is fading more and more in the world, and indeed the idea now even meets with mockery, for how can one drop one's habits, where will this slave go now that he is so accustomed to satisfying the innumerable needs he himself has invented? He is isolated, and what does he care about the whole? They have succeeded in amassing more and more things, but have less and less joy.

In a world where anything can be bought, what is valuable? If you can travel to anywhere, where is worth visiting? If you can take a picture every second of your life, which picture deserves another look? Pleasures that would have satisfied kings of past elicit a mere shrug from the normies of today, and even if they release themselves from the material and embark on a journey to “help others,” it comes not out of personal charity but to signal moral superiority, that I am better than you because I’m helping someone other than you. The drive to “help” becomes a personal weapon to attack others because it allows one to receive an egotistical pleasure that is higher than material pleasure.

> If the wickedness of people arouses indignation and insurmountable grief in you, to the point that you desire to revenge yourself upon the wicked, fear that feeling most of all; go at once and seek torments for yourself, as if you yourself were guilty of their wickedness. Take these torments upon yourself and suffer them, and your heart will be eased, and you will understand that you, too, are guilty, for you might have shone to the wicked, even like [Jesus], but you did not. If you had shone, your light would have lighted the way for others, and the one who did wickedness would perhaps not have done so in your light.

It’s easier to declare someone an enemy than to hold a mirror to ourselves and identity the true source of our anger. Instead, our first instinct when someone conflicts with our views is to mock them and then share the mockery for all to see, which I’ve personally done on numerous occasions. When you’ve lost the connection with your fellow man, and when your neighbor acts as if he’s from another country, there is no motivation to seek mutual understanding.

> Your work is for the whole, your deed is for the future. Never seek a reward, for great is your reward on earth without that: your spiritual joy, which only the righteous obtain.

I can’t help but think that this work would not succeed today because of its length. Attention spans are too short and patience is too limited for all but continual drama and action. Instead, it gives us a slice of family conflict and soul-searching as a country embarked on great change that mirrored much of what happened in the West. In Dostoevsky we can add another prescient author who clearly warned us about what would happen if we killed tradition and God.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: “The Brothers Karamazov” on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Female Executive With Music Degree Oversees Largest Computer Hack In World History

September 14, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> I would say the role of a CISO [Chief Information Security Officer] is similar to a military role, in fact, we see in the military and various government agencies that they actually talk about cyber warfare now. We've historically used guns and that kind of thing, but now we have cyber weapons to fight the cyber war. I think that the CISO role is analogous to that at the enterprise level.
>
> — Alleged comments by Chief Information Security Officer Susan Mauldin, whose company Equifax lost 143 million Americans' identities

The unprecedented hacking of 143 million Americans' credit file details, including their social security numbers, government-issued IDs, names, addresses, and other personal information, is raising serious questions about the credentials and academic qualifications of a major corporation's female head of IT security. Susan Mauldin, who serves as credit-reporting agency Equifax's Chief Information Security Officer (CISO), appears to lack any proper academic qualifications for her role, which required her to thwart exactly the kind of massive hack that hit her employer in late July.

With firms desperate to hire women in senior IT and other STEM roles under threat of financial sanctions from governments, it is possible that Susan Mauldin got her current job because of her gender. She has a bachelor's degree in music composition and a master's degree in music composition, a major that seems to have had no relevance whatsoever to protecting the details of the affected 143 million people.

For Equifax, this might become one of the costliest mistakes imaginable. Vanity Fair and other outlets are reporting a somewhat likely $70 billion loss as a result of anticipated litigation. One Senator, Heidi Heitkamp, is presently calling for at least some senior Equifax employees to be jailed, though in this case she is mostly responding to allegations of insider trading after several executives sold company shares before reporting the hack.

Regarding college dropouts like Bill Gates and Mark Zuckerberg, at least they made sure that their uncompleted degrees roughly matched the fields they made their billions in. The same cannot be said of Susan Mauldin, whose entire job description revolves around protecting sensitive data.

What is Susan Mauldin trying (badly) to hide?

Many online commentators have pointed out that Mauldin's original LinkedIn page has been mysterious deleted. Before the current scandal, it read like this:

Her current resumé is titled only "Susan M." (at the time of publication) and omits any references to her Music Composition degrees. All I could see was "University of Georgia," without further elaboration, under her educational attainments. To almost any reasonable observer, this is a tacit admission by her that she lacks the normal or expected requirements for such a high-profile (and well-paid) role.

More alarmingly still, a website called Cazena evidently deleted the transcript of an interview (archive link) conducted last year with Susan Mauldin, in which, very fittingly, she tried to ridicule people who questioned IT cloud security (Google cache). The video version has also gone walkabouts and when I tried to access it, I was redirected to a generic resources page.

Susan Mauldin should be proud to stand on her record. She has taken high levels of remuneration for her role at Equifax and pruning the internet of anything that might compromise her professionalism is deceptive and highly problematic in light of the serious criminal damage the hacking scandal has caused and will continue to cause.

The female STEM curse

Susan Mauldin may not have misled anyone like Elizabeth Holmes has (the former's resumé was public knowledge), but both have now faced accusations of being dangerously unqualified for their respective STEM roles.

Sound familiar? Well, I brought you the implosion of Elizabeth Holmes' blood-testing "empire" last year and ROK guest contributor Justin Puck had already called her shaky company Theranos out the year before that. Holmes dazzled–and allegedly scammed–her investors for years, with few, especially in the media, willing to criticize such a feminist golden girl. This ignorance risked countless lives and eventually caused the US Federal Government to intervene and half-chase the very exposed young woman out of her chosen industry.

In another case, a far less well-known woman working in IT as a "relationship manager," Jayde Phoenix, used her breasts to try and promote herself. With no obvious qualifications that could lead to her being described as an "expert," Phoenix was nonetheless feted as some sort of STEM super-genius by various papers. Such is the desperation of affirmative action and diversity politics.

These stories might seem anecdotal, but they reflect wider problems, not to mention a general dumbing down of STEM fields–and workplaces–to accommodate women. One of my articles earlier this year covered a female physicist's complaints that high school and even university physics courses were being eroded specifically to make them easier for girls.

Susan Mauldin and those who hired her need to explain how on God's green earth she could possibly serve as the Chief Information Security Officer of Equifax. Short of her having some prodigy-like talent she failed to ever mention on LinkedIn, no person in their right mind should hire a woman with no discernible technical qualifications in IT security.

Who's going to take the blame for this?

Two very large, half-exposed breasts. Oh, and IT/STEM professional Jayde Phoenix.

Whilst no one is suggesting Susan Mauldin has any criminal responsibility, nor that any hacking attempt is preventable, Equifax seriously needed a properly trained and relevantly educated professional to command its IT security operations. Perhaps more evidence will be revealed in the coming weeks, yet so far the indication is that the company should have looked further and harder for a candidate with a robust, including theoretical, background in information technology.

If someone flying a plane without a pilot's license crashes an aircraft, no one questions who is responsible–the unqualified flier and the company that hired them. Whilst there may not be strict legal demands that a Chief Information Security Officer have a typical academic background, someone without such a pedigree needs to share a large proportion of the blame when a corporation like Equifax finds its IT security systems utterly eviscerated.

But for what does something like this matter, if companies insist on hiring women in STEM fields at all costs?

Read More: Female Ex-Employee Tried To Get $20 Million From Ashley Madison Over "Medical Condition"

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Importance Of Having Struggle In Our Daily Lives

September 14, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

One of the precepts of Buddhism is that by its nature, life involves suffering. (Another context of the original terminology means unfulfillment.) There's something to that, but it only tells part of the story. Life sucks, and life is awesome—it all depends on which specific moment of it is being considered.

A satellite falls out of orbit and totals your new car—that sucks! Your greatest rival at the office moves to Outer Mongolia, and you get the big promotion—that's awesome! So really, life is a random grab bag containing both good and bad. That goes back to the concept of the world as a wheel of fortune, which sounded a lot cooler before the goofy game show ruined the phrase.

The thing is, we'd take the good things in life for granted if not for the bad things. For example, we wouldn't appreciate light if not for darkness. As the proverb goes, hunger is the best sauce. If I haven't had a nasty cold in ages, I worry that I might get too complacent about good health. This is a point going back again to Eastern philosophy, as well as the Stoic tradition which developed quite similar concepts independently.

Behavioral science weighs in

John B. Calhoun's "Mouse Utopia" experiment warns of what could happen when life is too easy. He created a large pen called "Universe 25" and introduced eight mice into it (four male, four female). The big rodent housing project had room for nearly 4,000 mice, with food and water capacity far exceeding that. The mice got clean litter and fresh air, and were protected from predators and disease. With nobody moving their cheese, these mice had it made—or did they?

Much like so many utopian schemes devised by meddlesome social engineers, the mouse pen became a catastrophe. In the beginning, there was a population explosion. However, the rate of increase slowed after nearly a year. The population eventually peaked at 2,200 mice, still well within capacity. After day 600, no more mice were born. Meanwhile, their culture was degenerating. Here's what happened:

> Among the aberrations in behavior were the following: expulsion of young before weaning was complete, wounding of young, increase in homosexual behavior, inability of dominant males to maintain the defense of their territory and females, aggressive behavior of females, passivity of non-dominant males with increased attacks on each other which were not defended against. After day 600, the social breakdown continued and the population declined toward extinction. During this period females ceased to reproduce.

Does any of that sound familiar?

> Their male counterparts withdrew completely, never engaging in courtship or fighting. They ate, drank, slept, and groomed themselves—all solitary pursuits. Sleek, healthy coats and an absence of scars characterized these males. They were dubbed "the beautiful ones." Breeding never resumed and behavior patterns were permanently changed.

Surprisingly, the study doesn't mention these mice being absorbed in video games and porn. Calhoun described this rodent version of cultural collapse as a "behavioral sink". He kept repeating the experiment, changing some variables (such as rationing food), but couldn't find a way to prevent irreversible decline.

Likely overcrowding disturbed their behavioral customs irreversibly; the comparison with densely-populated urban environments often has been made. However, they didn't reacquire normal behavior after the population dwindled, or even acculturate when some were removed and placed with normal mice. I speculate that boredom could've contributed to terminal malaise; even these little creatures with a brain the size of a kidney bean need adventure and challenge in their lives.

What this could be doing to people

On a broader scale, some negative changes eventually occur for domesticated species. When they no longer must hunt for food and defend against predators, natural selection stops working. Without chlorine in the gene pool, evolution goes into reverse gear. Among several effects, researchers have noted that their intelligence declines and sexuality becomes disrupted (like same-sex mounting and mating outside their breed). The most alarming aspect is that modern ease of living might be doing this to the human population, though that—among other aspects of dysgenic degeneration—is a topic worthy of its own consideration.

In the Current Year, many are taken up with idle pursuits. Goofing off occasionally isn't so bad, unless it's taken to excess. Still, why are so many emotionally wrapped up in whether their sportsball team wins or loses? Comics, fantasy, and science fiction are fine for entertainment, but why do some people make that a religion? I could say quite a few things about people who pierce up their faces or get tattooed like a Yakuza hit man. We're in the most libertine time since the decadent phase of the Roman Empire (at least), but meaningless sex is not making us fulfilled. Cheap escapes like marijuana and (considerably worse) hard drugs are quite popular, although their drawbacks are common knowledge.

Are these just weird trends, or is there more to it? Some of this is indeed by design. Still, perhaps cultures where concerns of immediate survival are distant are at risk of people lacking meaning in their lives. The phrase "First World problems" speaks volumes. It's also no coincidence that the world's most wealthy and powerful are among the most decadent.

Should we seek the easy life?

Someone I once worked for—who we affectionately called Satan—said the American Dream was putting your feet up on the desk while the money rolls in all on its own. I hate to admit it, but Satan had a point. I'd only add that "something for nothing" mentality isn't only an American affliction.

Many dream of winning the lottery. (Those who are bad at math consider it an investment strategy.) Yet the question must be asked—for what purpose? If the answer is to be free to watch TV and play video games all day, I'll suggest that there are better things to do! Sure, work sucks, but the daily grind has an upside. Other than paying our bills, individual efforts help to advance the economy forward.

In ancient Greece, it was believed that an aristocracy that didn't need to work is advantageous, since they'd be free—"eleutheros"—to pursue intellectual efforts like philosophy. (Today, there are plenty of unemployed philosophy graduates, but is this a great achievement?) Some old-school socialists looked forward to the day when work hours could be reduced, envisioning that the common people would have more time to create and enjoy cultural works. We have the 40-hour work week now, but sportsball seems to be more popular than attending symphonies or painting pictures.

Star Trek depicts a society where nobody lacks anything. As Sam Francis (not exactly a Trekkie) put it:

> The planet Earth and much of the inhabited universe have been unified under a mysterious, omnipotent, but benevolent "Federation," and there seem to be no wars, no political or social conflicts, and no wants in this warp-speed utopia unified by Global Democratic Capitalism gone galactic. Indeed, what else does the human race in the Star Trek cosmos have to do but stick its nose into the affairs of other species? They can zip about the galaxy at velocities faster than > light and “beam” themselves from one place to another instantaneously, and there never seems to be any question of food, clothing, money, disease, aging, or even of career advancement in this placid paradise.

Starfleet crews apparently have the only exciting jobs left. The shows don’t describe the daily lifestyles of Federation civilians too thoroughly, but it must be dreadfully boring if everyone can get everything they need by pushing a button.

In the final analysis

Ultimately, we shouldn’t desire the life of maximum ease, but the life well lived. The “Golden Mean” rule applies to struggle in our lives. Too much makes life dreary and grim, but too little makes it boring. The point of the Epic of Gilgamesh is that how long you live isn’t what counts, but how well you live your life. The message from the world’s oldest book is still quite relevant, thousands of years later.

Read More: How Brave New World Author Aldous Huxley Foresaw Modern America In 1958

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

4 Tips For Long-Term Relationships With Foreign Girls

September 14, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Dating girls in the West is about the same as buying a lemon car. No matter how much maintenance you put into the thing, something is just always broken. There's always a part that's falling off, it's an endless money pit, and overall it causes you more grief and frustration than any of the joy that having a car provides.

Foreign girls? Much better, as discussed here many times before. With that being said, there are different ways you can, and should, approach dating girls abroad. It requires a whole different set of skills, especially patience, as you deal with cultural differences. In addition, you're usually dealing with far more gentle souls rather than souls that have been tormented by one ~~hundred~~ too many trips around the carousel.

Here are a few tips and adjustments I've had to make:

1. Screen her well

I went into great details about this in my post, 7 Criteria A Girl Should Pass To Enter A Relationship With You. Simply put, put in the time to get your game skills up to par. This will give you far greater outcome independence with girls and make you pickier, a very good thing when it comes to relationships.

Over time, long term relationships make your life simpler. This is especially true after the initial phase of lust is over. It usually comes down to a girl making your life better in a simple matter, or making it completely miserable. During the first few months, it's easy to overlook any and all bad issues because biology drives you to bond with each other.

But over time, she will prove whether she makes your life better (and again, it won't be like Disney claims), or absolute hell. As soon as she starts showing signs of making it difficult, prepare to put one foot out the door. Don't hesitate to test her and kick her to the curb if needed.

2. Rule with an iron fist

The burden of performance is always going to be on you, even more so with foreign girls. You are going to pay for most things. You are going to have to make the hard decisions. You are going to have to still have your appearance, overall self-confidence, and bankroll on point.

It can be difficult at times to always be "on" with the decisive, action-taking masculinity, but it's a must. Make the decisions, even if they're wrong. Better to be wrong and own it up than to be wishy-washy and right. If she is out of line, take appropriate action. Keep the harmony between masculine and feminine and both you and she will bring out the best of each other in the relationship.

Fail to do this and you'll end up like one of those chodes that gets scammed by a foreign bride. He imports her, lives in harmony for a while, then the day her citizenship is granted, then takes the kids and half his money and moves them to a liberal cesspool of a city.

3. Some kindness is good

When in longer term relationships with American girls, I relentlessly toyed with their emotions as a tool to keep their pussy lubricated for the long-term. Otherwise, I wouldn't just need to change the oil every 3,000 miles—I'd need to find a whole new car.

I endlessly teased, disappeared, and screwed with their heads to keep the balance of power in my corner. I knew as soon as I took my foot off the gas, she'd start getting a little bit more intrigued by all the dudes trying to slide into her DMs.

I'm not saying that you should be a mushy, sappy pussy with foreign girls, but a bit of kindness isn't going to be the knife in your back. And in most cases, you can be a lot easier overall on them. There's been a few times that I can say I've actually probably hurt my girl—by saying things that would normally make a western girl swoon.

4. Accept cultural differences, but know your boundaries

This is one thing I never would have thought to prepare for. Most of my jaunts prior to actually moving abroad were just two-week ventures to sleep with as many women as possible. The cultural differences were minor for those short trips. It created no conflict when we both knew what the deal was—a fun fling for a night, or at most a week.

To be in a relationship with a foreign girl, however, get ready to butt heads on strange things. Language barriers seems like a cakewalk compared to what happens as time goes on, where you seem to be on different planets. The most important thing is to know your boundaries. Her culture is who makes her who she is, after all. If you like her, you don't want to lose that. But, there are definitely some things that you must draw the line on. Only you can determine what those things are.

Closing thoughts

Don't think it's not work. It is glamorous, especially at first. But, I'm finding as I cross the first year mark of being abroad, little inconveniences add up, and the LTR is good—but it is still work. Don't kid yourself into thinking it's easy street just because you bought a plane ticket.

For more expat content, check out my blog This Is Trouble. Want to get more girls? Check out my program, Go Date Online.

Read More: A Simple Way To Screen For High Quality Foreign Girls

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

The Jesuit “Secret Rules” Is One Of The Best Manuals On Intrigue And Power Ever Written

September 15, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

This piece is about an antiquated manual of how-to-take-over-when-you-are-a-minority: the allegedly Jesuit Secret Rules, written in the course of the 16th century. It is a short, highly synthetic piece, amounting to roughly 40 pages in English translation.

The “Society of Jesus” is said to have been created in 1534 by the Spanish nobleman and almost sigma male Ignatius of Loyola along with other Castilians. Acknowledged as a legitimate religious order by the Pope in 1537, the Society would not dwell much in contemplation like the other orders, but quickly went in a frenzy of creating schools, sending confessors and advisers inside all Christendom, and establishing forward posts outside of Europe. Across the centuries, many promising individuals were schooled in Jesuit establishments, and today, the order is still famous for its “social work” and high cultural level.

A sulphurous order

A Jesuit college in Czech Republic

However, Jesuits are also the most sulphurous and controversial Catholic order, apart perhaps from the Templars.

Before the end of the 16th century, they had already made themselves a reputation of cunning men who used religion as a tool and a mask for power-grabbing. Again and again, people noticed how Jesuit priests would sneak into the first circle of any wealthy or powerful figure, become confessors of kings, insist to be in charge of educating the sons of noble or rich families, distort the meaning of laws to either exonerate the obviously guilty or condemn the innocent, and so on.

Accordingly, Jesuits were expelled from many countries—where they always managed to creep back in—before being dissolved by Pope Clement XIII in 1773. Said Pope died in suspicious circumstances. The "Society of Jesus" was officially restored by another Pope in 1814, and it went back to its former place with little delay, as if it had never ceased to exist surreptitiously during more than 40 years.

Colloquial language was affected by Jesuit ways. The very word "Jesuit" has become synonymous with "unclear" or "ambiguous", and casuistry, which referred to the official Jesuit method of settling ethical issues. Today it is still equated with a dishonest use of evidence and specious reasonings to judge anything according to one's interests rather than in accordance to justice or truthfulness. Jesuit priests could absolve a servant who killed his master to steal from him—as long, of course, as said servant sought absolution from Jesuits and no one else—but condemn to hell anyone who dared criticize them.

Philosopher Blaise Pascal exposed them with jest in a series of texts, the Provincials Letters (1656-7). Despite what the Catholic church says today, Pascal quoted the Jesuit casuists closely, and if you are a legal practitioner you should definitely check these letters.

Just like the Jews, Jesuits benefit from a hugely positive bias from official history. All their cunning, bad reputation, and recurring troubles are conveniently swept aside in favor of a narrative that emphasize their courage, intelligence, or how they worked for a better world. Just like with the Jews, if you dare investigate, you will soon be called a "conspiracy theorist". A deadly mixture of unquestionable intelligence, Machiavellianism, power plays, money, subversion and globalism, all hidden or trivialized by official history, is at play in both cases. Someone should write a book about Jesuitism as a group strategy.

In such circumstances, it is hardly surprising if at all that a compendium of "secret instructions" leaked. Clear, consistent, surprisingly straight to understand for an allegedly Jesuit writing—perhaps this is the strongest argument against its genuineness—the Secret Rules are of high interests to anyone who wants to understand better power relationships and intrigue.

Are the Secret Rules genuine?

Soon after the Rules was published, Jesuits priests rushed to argue that it had been forged by a disgruntled, revenge-seeking ex-member of their order. The Catholic Encyclopedia and Current Year Wikipedia still repeat this claim. Thus, they say, the book saw the light in 1614 in Poland, the alleged author being Polish. However, this version is undermined by the fact that another copy was found which had been published in 1596 in Venice, and said copy is still around although hidden under an esoteric Latin name. The official views constantly ignore this copy—as if the Polish guy history had been forged and the Secret Rules was genuine.

In the course of the eighteenth century, several copies of the Rules were found in various Jesuit lairs. Eventually, a nineteenth century historian would argue that the Rules "may have been issued by [Jesuit] authority" (here, p.147), and a man who had been a Jesuit himself for fourteen years wrote that the Rules were truthful (here, p.7).

Thus, while the exact authorship is uncertain, it is very much possible that the Secret Rules has been written by a Jesuit. And whoever the author, even scholars who inclined to think of the Rules as a forgery emphasized the relevance of its content. The Rules was "drafted by a shrewd and keen observer, who seeing what the Fathers did, travelled analytically backwards to find how they did it", one said. Even "apocryphal, [the book] certainly gives a true representation of the… arts and practices of the Jesuits", added another. This is all what matters.

How to take over when you are a group of cunning priests

Appropriately described as "a strange mixture of Machiavelli and Saint Thomas", the Rules explain how a Jesuit should behave so that his Society grabs all the power it can.

While reading the book, I could not help but remember of Robert Greene's 48 Laws Of Power, many of whom are clearly exemplified by the Secret Rules. Is this really the way of men or something overly dark?

Here are some of the contents of the Rules—and note that I am barely scratching the surface:

- Always maintain a good reputation. Be humble, be pious, be serving. Provide service and do some charity work when you can. Be well groomed. Always follow the Jesuit Fathers' clothing style, so that the order maintains a face of cleanliness and seriousness. At the same time, crack a joke or two, be entertaining, especially when someone's attention must be diverted.

- Multiply the unwitting cat's paws. Court the small folk so that you appear really generous, disinterested, and so that the little people who like Jesuits end up playing the occasional informants for them. The small people can also be used to spread rumors, thus contributing to establishing or crushing the reputation of target individuals, or to either make them globally included or excluded. Court, as well, the wealthy, the lords, everyone with money and power. The Jesuits must have relays everywhere without them to be seen. Obviously, this works especially well when the relays ignore they are so.
- Be indispensable. Jesuit Fathers are encouraged to act as brokers for possible weddings, as teachers and intimates, as advisers, as asset managers. Every role a Jesuit can take up means more power to the order.
- Know who everyone is deep down and how to make the better use of him or her. The Rules mention how "inconsistent" women are and advises to entertain them more than men. When it comes to information, the aforementioned unwitting spies are of use, but the most important source is confession. Faithful Catholics are compelled to tell their "sins" to their regular Father, which makes them a first-rate source of discrete titbits. Eventually, the information can be gathered to draw up plans, blackmail, and so on.
- Target the rich widows, make them psychologically dependent from their Jesuit Fathers, discourage them from marrying anew, turn them into fearful bigots who will give their inheritance away to the "Society of Jesus." Substantial parts of the Secret Rules deal with widows, indicating the Jesuits' experience in hooking them.
- Play on people's interests, regardless of how ethical or unethical they are. Jesuit Fathers must use a lax—and sometimes outright specious—interpretation of rules, so they can grant more "liberty" to their flocks. At the same time, they must cultivate an air of unpredictability by changing their version of what is good or not, and their reasonings have to be so intricate that people will continuously come back to them for spiritual direction. The official Jesuit policy of facilitating the reception of sacraments can be interpreted as a gambit to steer the flock into coming back very frequently.
- Last but not least, divide and conquer. Jesuits must step up as prime brokers to sign contracts and peace agreements, yet behind the scenes they must also work to play people off against each other.

> It would be advantageous, if we could cautiously and secretly foment dissentions amongst nobles and princes, even to the mutual wasting of their strength; but if they seem likely to be reconciled, the society should immediately endeavor to pacify them, lest it should be effected by some other intervention.

The beginning of the end?

If you have read Greene's 48 Laws, you will have noticed familiar themes. Power-grabbing and group strategies follow patterns. Precisely, this is where the Jesuits have in part undone themselves.

Greene's 48th law advises to be formless. Learn to create new forms, new strategies, assume no definitive identity. If one can "reinvent" himself constantly, one can push new plans unnoticed and seem always young.

The Jesuits have transgressed this law. As Greene could say, they took a noticeable shape. The typically crooked argumentative style of casuistry, the little games around widows and noblemen, the sudden swings for or against particular individuals among the clergy, have all become quite distinctive across the centuries.

As Christianity was expelled from mainstream culture and replaced with aggressive secularism, the so-called Society of Jesus became obsolete. How could priests be at the kings' doorsteps when there are no more kings and when the bankers took their place? For many people the Jesuits look like little more than a relic in which case the Secret Rules are an interesting historical precedent, giving a prime example of how genuine spirituality can degenerate into a crass search for wealth and power, but whose subject is now a mere shadow of its former self.

Yet Jesuits are still there. Sure, their hour of glory, if one can speak of glory at all, has ended long ago. But even then, if you look closely, you can notice an updated version of degeneration: Jesuit priests have played a key role in implementing Vatican II and have pushed "liberation theology", which is a Christian version of the leftist craze for "emancipation". Not to mention Francis Zero, as traditional Catholics call him, first Jesuit Pope of all history and supporter of rapefugees.

Definitely, there are many grey areas to shed light on. The good thing is that uncovering shadowy people's plotting is not that hard. After all, they are shameless, but not that smart.

Read Next: Why Is Modern Christianity So Wimpy?

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

What It Was Like To Leave Canada And Work In Prague For A Danish Company

September 15, 2017 | by Papa Selo | Link | Original Link

As a Croatian-Canadian with dual citizenship and several years work experience as a software developer, I have the opportunity to live anywhere in Europe I want. However, this realization only dawned on me after grinding for several years in Western Canada's startup scene. With nothing to show for all my 60-hour work weeks in what is supposedly one of the best nations in the world, I figured I might fair better in the Old Country. By transplanting myself to a part of the globe where I was by default advantaged with my perfect English and Canadian work ethic, perhaps I could earn a free lunch by maximizing the returns on my relative value compared to the local labor pool.

In the beginning, the ease with which I emigrated seemed like a blessing, but over the course of two years I had come to resent my decision to live abroad. Perhaps compared to the wild, romantic Prague I managed to fuck and flaneur just five years ago on vacation, it has simply become a terrible place to live, a city where droves of ratio-skewering British stagholes eliminate virtually any possibility of consistent night game with their obscene behavior, and where the toxic shadow of Western Europe creeps ever more perniciously from the horizon.

While I deeply respect my Croatian Motherland—I was raised in a traditional God-fearing Catholic household—Croatia just didn't cut it as a long-term arrangement. No, even though I'm fluent in the language, I'm a spoiled wage cuck and the wages were too low for me. Besides, a short flight meant I could visit whenever. As a Slav, the only other viable options were Czech Republic, Poland or Ukraine because anything west of Dresden is, frankly, closer to Europistan than Europe. So I opted for Prague. Prague has higher wages, and a wage cuck I am.

The Pay

The first thing I noticed about earning a salary in Prague is that my significantly lower wage as compared to Western Canada was not much greater in proportion to the cost of living. Had I done more research, or consulted with men on the ground, this probably would have been more clear. Unfortunately, Numbeo and the other online price aggregators I relied on didn't reflect reality upon arrival.

My Scandinavian paylords were well aware of this discrepancy in perception and so low-balled my salary, convincing me that life was much cheaper than the roughly 15% difference that is obvious to me now after two years of living abroad. Thinking I had found my free lunch and swooped in for the steal. But man was I wrong.

The Masters

All else being equal, I have enjoyed my time here in Europe. In general, for a guy in his mid-20s, what matters most: women, booze, rent, cigarettes and caffeine, these things were still somewhat cheaper than back home. But what really crushed my soul over these past two years were my valueless, secretive, dishonest, and unconscionable middle managers.

I'm not sure why I ever agreed to work for this company. I never planned on climbing the ladder here, despite having received a promotion, bonus and a raise after my first year. I didn't move to Europe to become a slick-haired, overalls-clad farce of a Lumberg in the image of Office Space.

Most importantly, I read Roosh's "Don't Bang Denmark" years ago. Insofar as Scandinavians have zero game and their androgynous women are effectively apeish men, they tend to be just as sociopathic. The psychological acuity of a Scandinavian appears to be directly proportional to his incontinence. Ultimately, the female head games they continually played with me drove me nuts. So I resigned and went back to Canada.

Despite the fact that Prague is growing economically and that there are lots of jobs available, I'm accustomed to a certain standard of living and even some of the competitive senior positions in the Czech market paid less than junior salaries back home (all costs considered), so in the end I decided it was time to head back overseas, my lumbering kobasa hanging like an anchor between my feet—as if a reminder that while my head preferred greener economic pastures, my cock preferred Czech pussy nonetheless.

The Cake

While the free lunch I thought I saw in an Eastern European salary turned out to be quite expensive relative to my expectations, there was certainly a lot of cake. And they let me eat it too. Scandinavians adore their cream-covered bakery products, but in Racist Socialist Europe, your marginal product of labor doesn't matter, no matter how much cake they feed you. Your wage buys you.

I have not lost all hope for Europe. I genuinely enjoy my free time outside corporate slavery a lot more here than I did in Canada, but that's not the bar I want to be aiming for. I have since recognized that what I need to improve most is myself.

One would assume that by merely being a tall, perfect English speaking white male from North America with a 4-year University degree and European citizenship that I would have automatically commanded a high wage and respect from the austere middle managers that came to control my life. The truth is, without the "fuck you money" leverage that a source of location-independent residual income allows, working in Eastern Europe is about the same or worse as grinding out an equally soulless corporate paycheck in the West. At least back home, I can put some money in the bank.

The Czech Republic, and Prague in particular it seems, has bent the knee to Merkel and her financial overlords. One can daily smell the encroaching Western toxin. On the other hand, the more bucolic Czech cities of Brno or Ostrava, Slovakia's Košcice, and countries such as Poland, Ukraine, Belarus and Russia remain stalwart in their defense of masculinity and traditional virtue. My advice to men considering the move to Eastern Europe, whether in search of real feminine women or a more balanced lifestyle, is to come prepared with all the leverage you've got.

Whether that's a year's savings in the bank, or an online business paying daily residuals, you won't survive without it. I've come to know several friends here who have managed to build an independent life for themselves and by all accounts seem to be thriving. The next time I depart to conquer my little slice of Eastern Europe, I plan to Return as a King.

Read Next: 6 Things To Know About Prague (Czech Republic)

Papa Selo
Papa Selo is a Croatian philosopher with an old soul. Aside from tending to his olive trees in the heart of Dalmatia, his singular passion is fjaka (doing absolutely nothing) in his village by the Adriatic sea.

5 Countries That Use “Soft Power” To Be More Powerful And Influential

September 15, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

As Roosh elegantly has pointed out, culture is downstream from politics (and the opposite is also true). One can stress that culture is also downstream from economic power, both directly and indirectly.

One way to understand this is by looking at the term soft power – coined by the American political scientist Joseph Nye (1937-) in the late 1980s, developed in his work Bound to Lead: The Changing Nature of American Power (1990), and re-elaborated in a number of later books and articles.

According to Nye, soft power signifies “the ability to get what you want through attraction rather than coercion or payments,” and hence it is different from hard power phenomena such as military force and sanctions. Power – whether “soft” or “hard” – is often connected to foreign policy and a particular country’s will to influence other countries of the world by the means of dissemination of their own particular cultural taste.

Looked upon in a broader way, it can simply mean diffusion of culture in general and has less to do with power in the normal sense, but since soft power is often linked to current (Western) economic models and globalization, it can be hard to distinguish between soft power and hard economic power. In fact, the economic and the cultural dimensions do often overlap, or rather, soft power is often funded by governments.

I will provide five examples of how soft power currently is manifested in the world. Although there are several possible viewpoints in this regard, I focus on the country level.

The United States

The United States – the world's largest economy and superpower over the last 130 years or so – does unhesitatingly use a lot of hard power, such as military force, the almost global imposition of their currency, and sanctions against certain countries.

But soft power-wise, one can also highlight the near-global diffusion of American popular culture – films, music, sports, fast food, etc. – and its largely market-based economic system and liberal democracy that many other countries either already have absorbed or wish for. The quote below offers a relevant and nuanced overall description of how hard versus soft power can be understood in the case of America:

> Take the United Stated as the example. The worldwide popularity of Hollywood movies, Apple products, Google, Starbucks, and the NBA — to name just a few — may be cited as evidence of U.S. soft power, but it would be far-fetched to argue that this soft power has been a crucial factor behind the U.S. ability to get what it wants in other parts of the world. For one thing, drinking Starbucks coffee or watching the NBA does not necessarily translate into pro-American policy preferences. For another, it is difficult to imagine that the symbols of American soft power would have spread to the rest of the world and had such broad appeal had it not been for unrivaled American economic and military power.

China

Chinese soft power has become more evident during the recent years – a country set to be the largest economy in the world in the not too distant future – and this has been manifested through for instance the large funding and dissemination of Chinese academic institutions and Chinese cultural centers around the world, as well as large-scale events such as the Summer Olympics in Beijing in 2008:

> The Chinese government also has spent hundreds of billions of dollars improving the communication capabilities of its media outlets like CCTV, organizing mega events such as the Olympic Games and Shanghai Expo, funding Confucius Institutes, hosting summits attended by dozens of world leaders (e.g. APEC), and sponsoring forums on regional security and prosperity (e.g. the Boao Forum). An important justification for such lavish spending is that these activities can contribute to China's soft power.

In democratic countries like Canada and Sweden, the academic freedom appears to have been undermined by Chinese-funded and -controlled institutes, which has resulted in several shutdowns of Confucius institutes that promote research on Chinese culture.

Perhaps China may not be as successful as the United States in this regard (people do generally long more for democracy and Starbucks than Confucian values), but the Chinese government does still strive for the use of soft power and has funded a vast amount of projects with large sums of money.

Loading…

Saudi Arabia

Saudi Arabia is in total a rich country indeed, and at the same time it is one of the most authoritarian regimes in the entire world.

Saudi Arabia's soft power is intimately connected to the country's Wahhabi doctrine, a "modern" and fundamentalistic form of Islam that was founded during the late eighteenth century and which advocates a draconican, Sharia-based (Hanbalic school) interpretation that will not allow any other religion or form of Islam. This religio-cultural framework has been funded by rich and influential Saudis since the 1970s onwards:

> All in all, Saudi figures show that in the period 1973 and 2002, the kingdom spent more than $80 billion to promote Islamic activities in the non-Muslim world alone. This truly colossal sum has built a huge network of Wahhabi-controlled institutions, including over 1500 mosques, 150 Islamic Centers, 202 Muslim colleges, and 2000 Islamic schools in non-Muslim countries alone. (Alexiev 2011)

Unfortunately, not all Muslims stand against Wahhabism and its ideological twin, Salafism, which is manifested through the Islamic State and other organizations and movements that partially hinge on totalitarian ideas.

Russia

Russia constitutes one of the largest countries and economies in the world, and like China and Saudi Arabia it is more or less authoritarian. Another current characteristic is its geopolitical expansions in, for instance, Ukraine.

Besides military hard power, influential Russians use soft power by the means of media channels such as Russia Today in order to spread an alternative worldview, different from the Western, pro-EU and pro-American counterpart.

This might be a relatively fruitful way to get both Western and other people more on the Russian side, or at least to have a more nuanced understanding of Russia and what it aims for both culturally, economically and (geo)politically.

South Korea

ROK readers are familiar with K-pop and the Korean wave.

However, I might add that the South Korean government, after recognizing the good financial results in the aftermath of the distribution of particular TV dramas and K-pop, currently uses Korean wave products as means for national branding and consequently increasing revenues through tourism and export of Korean wave products, such as music, TV dramas, and food.

This will probably lead to – and has already to some exetent led to – a positive feedback relationship, since a probable consequence may be a better depiction of South Korea in the global community as well as more revenues, and the revenues can in turn be used for more investment in cultural products and their distribution, which may lead to even larger revenues.

It is also interesting that Chinese leaders are concerned about the vast popularity of South Korean celebrities in China, as well as the country's close ties to the US. South Korea is definitely one of the big soft power players these days and constitutes a pop cultural alternative to both the American and Chinese products.

There are many ways in which soft power can manifest itself. The national level, in close relationship to political-economic elites, is one such way, and some countries are indeed more successful than others in this regard.

Read More: How The Deep State Operates

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

4 Highly Estrogenic Foods Besides Soy That Could Lower Your Testosterone

September 17, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

A few weeks ago, I discussed soy, its byproducts and how that vegetable has negative, estrogenizing effects upon the masculine physique. Naturally, nothing has changed in those few weeks: soy is still rightfully stigmatized by men.

Having said that, let's make something perfectly clear: soy is not the only food that can sap your masculine vigor—far from it! As you probably assumed, this article will deal with four estrogenizing foods other than the hated soybean, and why you should avoid them.

1. Beer

"Beer?!" you might ask. Yes beer, of all things, has been shown to be estrogenizing. More specifically, not all beers but just certain types of beer—those that are brewed with hops, which is to say the overwhelming majority of the beers you can find on the market.

Of course, beer is very fattening, hence the term “beer belly”, but it goes beyond that. Hops contain phytoestrogens, which are found in (you guessed it) soy as well! If that wasn’t bad enough, it could concurrently lower your testosterone levels as well.

This effect can be somewhat ameliorated if you drink beer that is not made with hops—malt extract, fruit, corn, the permutations of alcohol are many, and if you must have an alcohol kick, you can probably find something other than hops.

“But beer is a manly thing!” Some who refuse to curb their drinking are probably saying that right now. Says who? The media, of course! That same media that is doing everything in its power to denigrate masculinity 90% of the time. Am I the only one who finds that suspicious?

2. Processed Sugar

In reality, any sort of high carb diet is estrogenic, but this is the worst. In fact, according to some research, eating too much sucrose and fructose can have an epigenetic effect in causing dysfunction of the regulation of sex hormones.

Naturally, this effect occurs whether you eat high fructose corn syrup or sugar, but I specify “processed sugar” because of the sheer preponderance of it in the modern diet. You should already be avoiding food that’s high in sugar purely to avoid giving yourself a dad bod, and this is just another reason for that prohibition.

And in a manner of speaking, what is the above beer if not just liquid simple carbohydrate? The verdict is in: avoid excess carbohydrate consumption!

3. Flax

“What the hell is flax?” most of you are probably asking. “How do you eat the stuff they make linen out of?” the slightly more knowledgeable may inquire. It may surprise you but flax (or more accurately flax seeds) are found in a fair amount of food—including whole grain bread and cereals. And to be clear, they’re not all bad: they are one of the predominant vegetable sources of those valuable omega-3 fatty acids that are good for the central nervous system. However, that comes with a trade off in the form of lignans, a chemical compound with estrogenic properties.

Flax seems to be the least harmful of the foods on the list, so if you are in need of omega-3 acids, a small amount of flaxseed or flaxseed oil can’t be too bad in limitation

4. Processed Animal Products

While I have repeatedly stated that animal products are some of the best things you can eat—and I stand by that—I should make a very clear distinction between healthy and unhealthy animal products.

The vegans do have a point about one thing: factory farming and similar processes aren’t good for anybody. Not only are they abominably cruel to the animals themselves, the sheer amount of hormones and other chemicals they give to the animals when they’re alive (to get increased meat, milk, and egg yields) are not good for your health. And neither are the preservatives you’ll find in various processed meats.

Say what you will about the European Union, they just might have a point in banning American beef and milk for import—and the fact that the US has much higher obesity rates would probably illustrate that fact.

The worst part of it all is that the estrogenic effects are probably the most mild effect of all the farm-related hormones: increasing rates of cancer, heart disease, and metabolic syndrome are also associated with said hormones, to name a few.

Read More: Four Super Foods and Their Effectiveness

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

5 Ways To Find Out If A Girl Likes You Or Not

September 17, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Troy's recent article about building comfort had me pondering an important question related to my overall game style – should you try to force indicators of interest out of a girl early? The impetus for this question came when he mentioned the key point that staying in a sexy, attractive phase for too long is counterproductive. Yet, that's precisely what the – dare we say it – classical style of "pickup" often advocates. People used to get too hung up on what "phase" of the interaction they're supposed to be in, rather than what was actually happening in front of them.

Instead, what I usually try to do is force out indicators of interest early, even if approaching indirectly. Not only is this a test to see if you're getting anywhere, but it can be "pre-suasive" in changing her state of mind by shifting her attention to the fact that she likes you, if you're doing well, of course. The point is that if you get these indicators of interest, you can assume that some kind of attraction exists and go on to "play the game in comfort" faster, leaving the clown bullshit behind, which is immensely relieving in and of itself.

The usefulness of each of these "tests" will vary depending on the situation, but I've generally found them practicable in most interactions. You don't have to do them all, but the more of these you pass, the more attraction you can probably assume, and the less time you'll likely have to spend "building" it.

As you might guess, this is a variant of the kind of "screening" game popularized by Good Looking Loser and others. It's designed to quickly disqualify girls that aren't into you and allow you to move on to another one that is. Today I'll be talking about the day game variations.

1. Direct Opener

They aren't for everybody. In some situations they can be detrimental. Some guys find them harder. I find them easier because I don't have to spend as much time or feel incongruent thinking of a situational opener (or in other words, I pay attention to something other than the girl), so I usually do them when I can. If she responds favorably, this is one indicator of interest and your confidence will at least be credited. The pitfall is that she may only be talking to you because she feels validated, so this isn't enough by itself. I learned that the hard way.

2. "I'll Leave If You Don't Want to Talk"

This one only follows a direct opener, and it might be controversial, as I've debated it back and forth with some of my fellow Roosh V Forum members. By saying this, it is absolutely true that you could be inviting an excuse for rejection and get her thinking in that frame, where you might have possibly done a bit better if given some more time. I can't say that this hasn't happened to me, because honestly, girls usually know in 30 seconds whether they might have sex with you or whether there's no way, so you might as well not waste your time.

The way I see it, a quick "no" saves both her time and yours. If you get a "yes," she's essentially forced to put herself in the state of mind that "yes, this is a guy I want to talk to."

One other virtue of it is that, if you're in a closed space like a cafe, this takes the pressure off of her and gives her a way out. I've usually found that the women I talk to appreciate that kind of social intelligence.

A green light is a good sign and if you look good and approached with confidence you'll probably get it most of the time. But once more, it's not foolproof since the validation scenario is still present.

3. Hand Shake/Hold

This might be old form by now, but when introducing yourself, hold her hand for longer than normal when you shake it and look into her eyes more deeply. If she reciprocates it's basically another forced IOI.

4. Compliance Test

An oldie, but a goodie, as this is a very good way to put her into your frame early. The idea is to get her to follow your lead on something. One test I love to use is, when outside, I'll try to get her to accompany me to a different location. This is a strong indicator that at least some sort of attraction is in place. A useful pretext for the change in scenery, like a cool sight, can help you along with this, but no matter what you sold her on, she probably wouldn't have agreed to come with you unless a degree of attraction exists.

5. Hair Brush

I discovered this one somewhat by accident, as one girl I approached early this year had something in her hair which I noticed and slowly brushed out early on. The move served to make what was already a pleasant interaction into a far deeper, more flirtatious one, as she invited me to change locations with her. As soon as we sat down, her body language – most importantly her legs and feet (the most honest parts of the human body) – signified very eager interest and deeper touching followed.

Not every interaction went exactly this way, of course, but a woman letting you touch her hair, especially early, is a strong indicator of interest, as this kind of kino usually comes later. The great thing about forcing it early on is that it not only lets you know her interest quickly, but that you may have shifted her state of mind into greater interest faster.

Conclusion

This list is by no means exhaustive. There are other methods of forcing an indicator of interest fast. These are just some of my favorite ones you can use very quickly. The more indicators of interest you get, the stronger you can assume the attraction is. If you breeze past all of these, you can probably drop most of the clownish act you may have going on and get into comfort game. It's also efficient, asserts your leadership, and lets her know you're a sexual threat.

But I want to hear your thoughts. How do you go about this? What has your experience taught you? What methods do you use?

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

7 Ways Women Are Just Like Abandoned Dogs

September 18, 2017 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Over the years, women have been accurately compared to many things—roses, milk, T-shirts, bread, and just about everything else that depreciates in value, spoils quickly, or loses it's shine at an accelerated rate.

Well I've got another log to throw onto the fire: women who are perpetually single (read: sluts) are like abandoned dogs waiting to be rescued. There are way too many similarities between the two not to point them out.

1. The single life is the shelter

Dogs

Dogs don't want to be in shelters. They want a permanent home with a family because it's a better life. Granted, a dog can't say out loud that they want a family, but they all do. You can tell in their behavior in both environments. Those Sarah McLachlan commercials (which I absolutely cannot watch) tell you all you need to know about how dogs feel about shelter life.

A shelter is unpredictable. Some of the staff treats them nicely and some of them not so much. Maybe they get walked three times one day, and only once the next. And when they have to watch other dogs getting adopted, they wonder to themselves, "When is someone going to adopt me? Why doesn't anybody pick me? Is there something wrong with me?"

This is exactly how perpetually single women feel

Women

Women don't want to be single. They want a permanent relationship with a man because it's a better life than sleeping around, worrying about STDs, worrying about being found out, or worrying about getting pregnant because she doesn't remember if Derrick used a condom last night or if she forgot to take the pill yesterday.

Today's women will brag about how they just #LuvDaSingleLyfe! and how they don't like being locked down but they're lying through their teeth. Every woman wants to be a relationship of consequence, no matter what they say out loud.

The single life is highly unpredictable for women. Some men treat her great, some treat her like dog shit. Some men are married, some are players. Some are around a lot, others only once a month. And when they watch their friends getting commitments from their boyfriends or getting married, they think to themselves "When am I going to get married? Why can't I find a boyfriend? Is there something wrong with me?"

2. One size does not fit all

Dogs

As a potential dog owner, you have to understand the differences in breeds. You can't treat them or train them all the same, and have to do your research beforehand. For example, German Shepherds need a lot of exercise because they're working dogs, Pomeranians don't because they're mainly for companionship. If you keep a German Shepherd cooped up in a small apartment all day, they're gonna tear up your house, drink out of your toilet, and pee on your floor because of the pent up energy. A Pom would be just fine.

Women

We all know that most women are hoes and that their operating systems default to slutty behavior which manifests into the same ho tendencies. But they're not all the same in terms of personality traits and what makes them tick.

Pomeranians don't need much exercise

You might have a woman who'll comply the first time you simply tell her to "lower your voice." Then you might meet a woman who needs to be told to shut the fuck up while you glare at her in order to get her to stop running off at the mouth. Similarly, there are women who respond better to negative reinforcement, and there are women who need positive reinforcement more than others.

The point is that you can't treat them all the same and expect the same results. One size doesn't fit all with dogs and it damn sure doesn't with women.

3. They've both had plenty of chances

Dogs

A shelter dog's had more than a few owners in the past but it's not the pup's fault. Their past owners didn’t know how to potty train them, how to keep them from tearing up the house, they didn’t want to crate train them, and were afraid to raise their voice or discipline the dog because it’s “mean” or “inhumane.” A lot of times a shelter dog has had multiple owners but because those owners couldn’t handle them, they ended up with another inept owner or eventually back in the shelter.

Women

Sluts have had plenty of boyfriends in the past but were afraid to check her in private and in public. They had no idea how to cultivate good behavior while eliminating bad behavior. They weren’t aware of the fact that women are self destructive by nature and need a firm hand to keep them away from things that could harm her both mentally and physically.

She’s had plenty of boyfriends…none could handle her

A slut’s previous boyfriends were clueless about the real mindset of a woman. They didn’t understand that she’s not looking for Mr. Nice Guy who’s gonna let her do whatever she wants and that what she’s really looking for a strong leader who will lead and discipline her when she steps out of line. Sluts have had plenty of men in their lives, but because those men couldn’t handle them, they either ended up with another clueless boyfriend or eventually back on the market and single again.

4. It’s hard to find a good one

Dogs

Understand you’re almost never going to find a pure breed dog at a shelter. Most dogs in shelters are mutts (which isn’t bad), and can certainly be mitigated if you pay attention to the dog and figure out what you’re dealing with.

The best way to guarantee yourself a pure breed dog is to find a reputable breeder. That way you know exactly what to expect. Pure breed dogs are very expensive because it takes a lot of time and money for breeders to produce quality pups. If you're willing to spend the coin, it's worth it, provided you know what you're buying.

Pure bred German Shepherd pups. Won't find these at the shelter.

The alternative if you don't have the extra money is to adopt a shelter dog which, again, isn't a bad thing but it's going to take a little more work, time, and attention to get the dog where it needs to be.

Women

Similarly, you also have to understand that the chances of finding a woman with a low notch count or even a virgin in the Western world are slim to none. Most women these days are sluts, which is obviously not good, but if you've done your research by consuming red pill content, you can avoid a lot of the problems that comes with dealing with them. No, it's not going to be long term, but getting in and out without her taking her pound of flesh is where your overall game is important.

Virginal, quality woman. You won't find her in a club.

If you live in the West, this is a necessary evil. However, if you want to increase your chances of finding a woman with a low notch count or even a virgin, you can move to another country if you're willing to making make the financial investment and sacrifice temporary familiarity and comfort during the adjustment period.

Some men say Eastern Europe is a good place to find quality girls. South America, particularly Brazil which is highly endorsed by our own James Maverick, has been said to have a large number of females who haven't jumped on the carousel. Whatever you decide, do your due diligence if that's the direction you think you may want go.

5. They need to be saved for a reason

Dogs

Though it's through no fault of their own (especially strays or abandoned dogs), shelter dogs are in a shelter for a reason. Maybe they bark too much, maybe they attack other dogs, maybe they attack people, maybe they're not good around children, or maybe they're not potty trained. Whatever the case may be, they're not in a shelter for no reason.

Fortunately for these dogs, they can be rehabilitated to become ideal pets for people looking to adopt them.

Most shelters are great at rehabilitating dogs

Women

A woman who is perpetually single is single for a reason but unlike dogs, she bears all responsibility for her relationship status or lack thereof. People around her will tell her she’s a great catch, or that Mr. Right is out there somewhere, or that her last boyfriend made a mistake when he dumped her, but they don’t always know the whole story. She might be an insufferable bitch, she could have expensive habits, she could be a drug addict, alcoholic, she might have daddy issues, or she might be a serial cheater. At the end of the continuously single woman were such a catch she’d have been caught already.

Unfortunately for these women, they can never be rehabilitated to become ideal mates for men looking for long-term relationships.

6. They require heavy research

Dogs

Before you decide whether you want to buy a dog from a reputable breeder or adopt a shelter dog, you have to do your research. Find about about different breeds, their dietary and grooming needs, how much exercise they need, how much mental stimulation they need, what their lifespan is, what disease and conditions they’re prone to, etc. At that point you’re ready to either go to a shelter or contact a breeder.

Women

Before you hit the dating scene, you've gotta do your research which is finding and obtaining red pill related material. You need to bookmark Return Of Kings, Illimitablemen, the Roosh V Forum, The Rational Male, and so forth and consume this material regularly. There are plenty of other sites out there you can supplement them with but starting with these four will put you on the right track. You also need to watch guys like Tom Leykis, the late great Patrice O'Neal, and yours truly.

When you feel like you've got a good handle on things, you're ready to either start dating around or start the process of becoming an expat.

7. Their flaws are easily concealed through the internet

Dogs

The very worst places to get a dog is off of Craigslist or other online classified sites like it. You see it all the time: "I'm moving and my new place doesn't accept animals" or "My boyfriend's allergic to my dog" DO NOT FALL FOR THIS AND DO NOT TAKE THESE DOGS. They're giving their dog away because it is menace and they're looking for someone else to clean up the mess they made with their pet.

You're asking for trouble if you take a dog home from here

People never give away dogs that are "sweet, loving, and just the perfect pet!" There's something seriously wrong with it which is why they're trying to get rid of it.

Women

The worst place to find a quality woman are Tinder, Plenty Of Fish, OkCupid and other online hookup apps masquerading as "dating sites." The bar or the club are two places you should avoid when it comes to a long-term relationship.

Like the dog on Craigslist, she's at the bar or club because men of value don't want her. If she were such a good woman and such a catch she'd have dudes lined up around the block without ever having stepped foot in a bar or a club. Further, we all know that women on dating sites are epic sluts. They're not there looking for love, they're there looking for dick regardless of what their profile says. There's something seriously wrong with these women which is why the quality men they managed to fool for a short time got rid of them.

Conclusion

Shelter dogs and sluts are the same animal. Yes, there are a few slight differences between them but by and large you can apply the same principles to both. You can get what you want out of them if you know what you're doing, but if you don't your life will be turned upside down in many ways.

Be sure you know everything before making this important decision in your life.

Watch the podcast version of this article below:

Tune into Donovan's show, TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe, weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST on YouTube. Listen or watch all episodes on thesharpereality.com, itunes, or Soundcloud.

Read Next: 8 Essential Rules For Banging A Single Mom

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Why “Social Justice” Exists

September 18, 2017 | by Daniel Baird | Link | Original Link

According to the Cultural Marxists and Postmodernists, all of society’s “values” are mere instruments that the oppressors use to legitimize their power and pound their subjects into submission. Cultural Marxists advocate for “social justice” in the hopes of remedying this state of affairs, with stated goals more radical than economic Marxists. To the Cultural Marxist, society must be turned upside down, shaken, and ripped apart to eliminate every potential inequality between groups and subgroups that can be subdivided ad infinitum.

The initial hypothesis—that our society’s values are meaningless instruments of naked power—leads to an interesting conundrum. Why should social justice, as a value system, be immune to the ruling elites’ machinations? If anything, the ability to conjure up causes and identity groups out of thin air offers endless opportunities to pit their inferiors against each other and engage in shameless social experimentation.

And unlike the values in the past, which were inherited and could be inconvenient at times, social justice allows for the normalization of alternative lifestyles (like homosexuality) that appeal to the elites.

It seems a bit naive to think that people like Barack Obama, Angela Merkel, and Mark Zuckerberg all agree on the tenets of social justice due to their high moral character. These people didn’t rise to the top by their impeccable virtues. They used whatever tools they had available to ascend the social hierarchy.

Inferring The Motivation

We can never know for certain what their exact goals are when it comes to the social justice agenda, but we can look at the results and infer the motivation. Most glaringly, social justice has led to the deterioration of Western culture and demoralization of the Western peoples.

We have seen the hollowing out of the American middle class as our jobs are shipped away and competitors flown in from abroad. And we have seen the decline in Western fertility as our cities become more dangerous and our economies more precarious.

If Merkel and the VP of the European Union are any indication, the elites' biggest project now is the wholesale replacement of white Westerners with dependent, Third World peoples.

But why is this even necessary? Don't existing citizens make for good tax harvesting, and aren't they good at obeying the orders of the technocratic leaders?

True though that may be, the elites know that you can't be trusted, simply because you are still competent enough to someday challenge their power, if you ever decide to do so. With some residual democracy and national feeling still present in the West, the elites have ascertained that the risks of dealing with you and other native citizens outweigh the benefits of your labor and social organization.

The University Hustle

Still, the masses have to be made to go along with the charade, at least until the job is complete. To render them compliant to the mass migration project, the elites have carefully restructured society's main institutions along the lines of social justice.

The most blaring example is the university. There, the psychobabble of social justice—tolerance, globalism, equity, diversity, feminism—pummel the population into accepting and celebrating their replacement. Simultaneously, they sign away valuable years of their lives enter extended indentured servitude for the globalist banksters.

Finally, when they escape the re-education center, they are scarred by an ideology that has turned many of them into sterile consumerist zombies who vote along the globalist line and hate their own culture.

The Military Churn-And-Burn

The military might seem like a good alternative to the university, especially for young men who are less bookish by nature. Enthralled by the grandeur of the military, conservatives in particular are blinded to the fact that our troops are nothing but fodder for insidious deep-state operations, nation building, and the spreading the “values” of the American Empire. These values happen to be the same social justice values that globalists peddle: blue haired women and restrooms designed for cross-dressers.

While the military is busy starting wars that help to ensure Europe is flooded with migrants forever, massive invasions on the American southern border and in the Mediterranean Sea are completely ignored.

Anti-White, Anti-Male Capitalism

There must be some place where regular people can avoid the mind-numbing social justice and simply live a normal life. The corporate world, Libertarians tell us, is a bastion of entrepreneurial creativity, where only results matter.

As the firing of James Damore illustrates, corporations are just another arm of the globalist power structure whose primary purpose is the destruction of the native white middle and working classes. Fittingly, it is nearly impossible for a straight white male to rise up the hierarchy on his merit alone.

Adding insult to injury, these same corporations use the guise of social justice to lobby the government for foreign visas (see Mark Zuckerberg's FWD.us), while quietly outsourcing most of their workforce. The end-game for most American companies appears to be a group of Globalist Diversicrats overseeing an army of H1B Indians with call centers scattered across the globe.

Noblesse Oblige No More

We are in an interesting place in history. Never have we had elites who are so squishily sentimental about certain subjects and so callous and cruel about others.

When they aren't demonstrating how morally righteous they are through their crusades of multiculturalism, feminism, gay rights, and climate change, they are on constant guard against the faintest whiff of criticism toward their pet peoples (the so-called "protected classes").

On the other hand, they are completely indifferent to the concerns of their native populations, and even have the gall to pat themselves on the back for instituting policies that blatantly benefit their class and harm their citizens.

We usually get the leaders we deserve, and cruel elites are no historical anomaly. That said, even the cruelest of elites have generally allowed their populations to enjoy their harmless folk traditions as well as the continuity of their ethnic group. In the worst penury, family, religion, and one's tribe make life bearable for the masses, and keep them tied into the system.

Today, however, the elites cannot even allow the population to enjoy these simple pleasures. Ethnic identities have to be erased. The family and religion must be crushed, and any sense of local pride must be mocked, snuffed out, and replaced with conformist consumerism which causes everyone to be confused, isolated, and indebted.

Fortunately, though, the elites may have overplayed their hand and cranked up the heat on their frog populations too soon. If the election of Donald Trump shows only one thing, it's that regular people are beginning to see through the social justice agenda for the cold cynical truth: they're being screwed by their betters.

Read More: Why Social Justice Is Satanic And We Need Religion To Defeat It

---

Daniel Baird

Daniel is an American writer. After surviving college, he went abroad in search of foreign women, and seeking dating advice, he stumbled upon the early Manosphere writers. Now he wrestles with the dark realities of biological realism, the decline of the West, and the globalist dystopia.

How To Free Yourself From Debt

September 18, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Debt is like junk food—although best avoided, moderate quantities won't kill you, but too much will creep up on you and make your life suck. It allows us to buy things we can't afford, but at a higher price. Ultimately, it's a big contributor to today's rat race. Quite unfortunately, many people get themselves swamped.

Governments aren't immune either. Thanks to the Federal Reserve, the USA has an unlimited credit line to run up an astronomical amount of debt. This is what happens when politicians who have trouble balancing their own checkbooks are in charge. It's little different for many other countries, but all that's another matter.

The public spending money they don't have is an inflationary pressure. As Ezra Pound (a poet, "deplorable" radio commentator, and political prisoner) noted, compound interest corrupts everything it touches. Is it any wonder that the world's economy runs on fairy dust?

Types of debt

Hell no!

Installment loans for a house or car are the least bad; after paying them off, you own a high-value tangible asset. It's hard to avoid, since few people keep large amounts of cash on hand. Student loans are another source of high-ticket debt. It's okay so long as you can get a decent job with the degree. (If not, you're up the creek.) Basic mitigation strategies involve acquiring the least amount of debt possible, shopping for the lowest interest rates, and being realistic about your return on investment.

Other sources of debt are more pernicious. The worst are predatory lending schemes like payday loans, title loans, and pawn shops. Those are sucker deals with exorbitant interest rates, and you should consider them as appealing as getting an arm and a leg chewed off by a gator.

Credit cards are also big offenders; the credit limits give you enough rope to hang yourself, they have relatively high interest, and the companies won't hesitate to kick you when you're down. If you're paying them off in full every month, and they have a reward program, then they're actually a benefit. However, if you're running revolving balances, then you're eating an interest charge, and it adds up.

For you, that's as productive as feeding several $20 bills into a paper shredder every damn month. (Meanwhile, the banksters are getting enough gravy from their customers to float an aircraft carrier.) Then you end up paying interest on the interest; that really makes it suck. Without going into exponential math, let's just say that it really eats into your future. Countless people are stuck in a debt spiral, barely scraping by while unable to make more than minimum payments. If you're carrying a balance every month, then it's time to make a plan to free yourself.

The solution

Time to get real

If you have a pile of old bills to pay down—or worse, you don't have enough to stay solvent without hitting the plastic—then you need to make some hard choices. In principle, though, it's actually pretty simple. Cash flow is an input-output equation. That means make more money, spend less, or do both.

On the income side, getting a better salary is easier said than done, but do be on the lookout for promotions or better jobs. However, getting a side gig is easier. It doesn't even have to be steady work to add up: personal training, IT consulting, writing a book, helping people move, remodeling, picking oakum out of ropes for the British Navy, whatever. If you have a lot of collectibles you don't need, sell them.

On the expenditure side, often this is easier said than done. As a society, we're suffering from the disease of "affluenza". This generally involves keeping up with the Joneses or buying crap we don't need. Women get a bad reputation for retail therapy, but men aren't immune. For anyone, that's both irrational and pretty common.

Reducing expenses

Fun until the bills come due

Obviously an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure. Take the example of Fountain Hughes, who lived over a century without spending even a nickel on store credit. Although he was a former slave (and thus didn't get a first-class education), he was considerably more sensible than millions of shopaholics hocked to the gills on plastic. Not spending more than you earn is a pretty obvious concept.

Being a big cheapskate yields benefits. For example, do you really need to buy a $5 cup of coffee every day at some virtue-signaling chain store? That adds up. Get your own coffee maker! Shop around for a decent price, or look on the used market, and say goodbye to Fivebucks Coffee forever.

Do you have cable TV? Why? It's a lot of crap and propaganda that you don't need. It's easy to download most things worth watching. If you're a television addict, then get an antenna for the damn idiot box.

For consumer goods, check out bargain stores, garage sales, and look online for auctions and classified listings. Restaurants are also an unnecessary expenditure; the food is marked up considerably, so learning to cook can save you quite a bit. Bar tabs can add up considerably too. Other than that, do you really need a new cell phone every year, and the unlimited data plan? Anyway, hopefully you get the picture.

Advertising is very sophisticated, studied intensely since the 1950s. Even the placement of items in grocery stores is well-researched. It's time to tune that out! Distinguish between want-to-haves versus need-to-haves. Will you die if you don't have some particular item? You probably won't, other than food or medical care. Also ask yourself, will life really be that much better if you have that? Always remember, money is a good servant but a bad master.

Finally, if anyone repeatedly consumes your resources without providing reciprocal value, it's time to get the moocher off your back. The party's over; you have bills of your own to pay. (I can count on one hand the number of people I know who are honest enough to pay back loans, and still have a finger left over to flip off the rest.) If your brother is smoking meth on your couch all day, it's time for him to get his ass to rehab. Helping out a girlfriend occasionally and within reason isn't too bad, but never do this for someone stringing you along.

The specifics

If you follow the above, then you should be able to stop the bleeding on your budget and have some surplus to pay down old bills. That won't happen overnight, but butch up about it.

Which debt should you pay down first, then others following? Three options:

- The one with the highest interest
- The one with the lowest balance
- The one with the company you hate the most

The first option is the most rational, since this mathematically means you'll end up wasting the least amount of your money on interest. The second is the "debt snowballing" strategy, beneficial since you'll most quickly see tangible signs of progress by signing fewer checks. The third will be psychologically satisfying likewise. It's your bills and your decision.

You can call credit card companies and ask for a lower rate; sometimes they'll do it. You also can log-roll it to balance transfer offers, but read the fine print carefully (it's not free), and remember that's just a temporary measure.

What to do when you’re free

Once the debt monkey is off your back, then you’ll have a decent surplus from not feeding $20 bills into the paper shredder every month. The first priority is to create an emergency fund; enough to cover unexpected car repairs and the like. Then it’s a good idea to save up “fuck you money“, just in case. Once you have a few thousand clams, you might consider putting it in a decent investment. By that I mean a well-diversified portfolio, rather than some Ponzi scheme or other scam. That’s worthy of its own discussion, so stay tuned.

Finally, after you’ve reached your goal, never dig yourself into another pit. You learned your lesson the first time around, right? Now get out there and free yourself. You’ll make a bankster cry.

Read More: 5 Myths In America That Cry Out For Realtalk

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How To Play Real-Life Tinder

September 19, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I was hanging out with an Italian friend recently when he asked me if I wanted to play "real-life Tinder." Intrigued, I agreed.

He positioned me at the top of a park staircase and told me to wait. A pair of girls climbed the stairs but did not look at me. "Keep waiting," he said. Then a girl walked up and locked eye contact with me. I heard a yell from behind, "It's a match! She swiped right." It turns out that I've been playing real-life Tinder for 15 years without even knowing it.

There are only two steps to real-life Tinder. First, confirm that a girl is paying attention to her environment and not walking fast. This means she installed the real-life Tinder app and wants to play. Then you look at her. If she looks back at you without immediately looking away, you matched her and can start a conversation using a basic opener. If she smiles or gave you a rape stare, you have a super-match and can open with literally anything, even a primordial grunt. (Of course you can approach girls you don't match with, but the responses will be hit or miss.)

The best thing about real-life Tinder is that there is minimal lag. You never have to wait more than one second for her reply, and if you're good at reading body language, you'll perceive instantaneous reactions that approach zero lag. Forget about the frustration of waiting minutes or hours for a reply to come in!

Another benefit of real-life Tinder is that girls rarely have sustained conversations with men they don't like. If she thinks you're not her type, she will look away quickly, because the last thing she wants to do is give you encouragement. Compare that to Tinder, where what may appear to be a solid match turns into immediate silence after your opening text. In real-life Tinder, you always get a response, even if it may not be one you prefer.

Real-life Tinder also makes it impossible for a girl to ghost on you while in the middle of a conversation. Due to the laws of physics, it's simply impossible for a girl to vanish or teleport to another location while she's standing in front of you. When she wants to leave, she has to say goodbye or give some sort of excuse as to why she's ending the conversation. In Tinder, she can disappear without any excuse, even if you had what appeared to be a nice conversation, and feel no remorse about displaying anti-social behavior.

But by far the best reason to play real-life Tinder is that you know exactly how she looks like. She won't be able to defraud you by sharing old or photoshopped photos taken at precise Myspace angles. I only went on one Tinder date in my entire life, and boy did she not look like her photos. In playing real-life Tinder for 15 years, it has never happened that my eyes defrauded or deceived me in any way—not even once!

The argument that Tinder takes less time than real-life Tinder over the long run seems dubious, and even if Tinder was faster, it requires you to stare at a screen that you already stare at for several hours a day. Aren't we technologically zombified enough? For men who are trapped indoors and don't have time to play real-life Tinder, I suspect they have bigger problems to solve than meeting women, and should vigorously question their entrapment.

I like to play real-life Tinder when I have a sexual need. I walk out my front door and within five minutes I can begin swiping. I can do 200 swipes within an hour, depending on the time of day, and get a handful of worthy matches. Four hours of real-life Tinder will yield enough leads to keep me busy for a week. Since I'm able to and willing to put in this real-life work, I have no need for the original Tinder.

There's one final advantage to playing real-life Tinder: you feel like a man doing it. To aid in your live-action hunt, your body produces testosterone, but when playing Tinder, your body halts testosterone production since no hunting ability is required. I believe it's the lowered testosterone which allows men who exclusively play Tinder to accept the demoralizing behavior of impressing and entertaining girls who are either not that attractive or happen to be secretly fat.

It's a great feeling to get a real-life match with an attractive girl. Only three feet separate you from her, so you can absorb her entire essence without lag or fakery, and be able to trust your instinct on her value. By comparison, Tinder seems archaic. It introduces unnecessary obstacles that any socially competent man who lives in at least a medium-sized city should feel constrained by, but if you're a woman, it's an app from heaven that gives you the attention you desperately crave without having to put forth any social effort.

I can't help that I love to look at women in the flesh. I enjoy their efforts at attracting men such as myself, assuming they know how, and am titillated when I can sense they are attracted to me and want my penor. Tinder simply doesn't give me this feeling, so it's only the real-life game that I will play.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: Women Have Reduced Themselves To Sexual Commodities

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What’s Next For The Alt Right?

September 19, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

After Charlottesville, the alt right finds itself in an odd position: it is falsely demonized by the media and the GOP as “Nazis,” it is disavowed by the alt lite, and the government seems to view it as a potential terrorist organization. People who peacefully participated in the rally have lost jobs and been thrown out of colleges. What happens next to a political movement that finds itself a pariah?

Which Way, Western Man?

The US desperately needs a right-wing movement. What currently passes for the right in the US is the Republican Party. While most GOP politicians talk a good show about conserving society, they actually govern as globalist liberals. For example, “conservatives” pretend they are pro-life, but when they had the opportunity to defeat Planned Parenthood earlier this year, they didn’t bother. And while the GOP has been promising to repeal Obamacare for seven years, when they finally got the opportunity to do it, they opted to do nothing. Thus, the US needs a real alternative to the progressive decline offered by both of the current parties.

Unfortunately, the dissident right in the US is not currently constituted in any form that could make it a viable alternative. It is currently no more than an unorganized group of people who generally agree that immigration and globalism are destroying the country. Here are some possible ideas on which paths the alternative right could take:

1. Secession

The “extremists” of the past.

There are a small number on the hard edge of the dissident right that advocate for a separation that would bring a quick end to the current government. One proposed form of this would be to secede from the United States. Although the US itself started as a revolutionary break with its parent nation, the conditions that made it successful no longer exist. One of these that the English colonies were separated from England by the Atlantic Ocean. That made continued British control logistically difficult for the crown. Now, natural barriers are easily surmounted.

Later, when the same tactic was taken by a large number of Southern states, it led to a crushing defeat in the Civil War. It is doubtful that a modern effort would meet with better results. Thus, any discussion of leaving the United States has to remain at the level of the theoretical for the foreseeable future.

2. Winning hearts through memetic warfare

An example of the brilliant memes the Alt Right used to help Trump get elected.

Although physical warfare is a bad idea at the present time, psychological techniques are a winning strategy. In a nutshell, memetic warfare is to present ideas in a form where they are assimilated quickly and easily. And memetic warfare happens to be a specialty of the alt right. During the Trump campaign, the alt right ran rings around the old school conservatives at National Review. They were able to convey ideas in seconds with a graphic that took the “true conservatives” entire essays to essays to achieve.

Memetic warfare continues to be the most effective weapon in the dissident right’s arsenal. But the globalist elite are now aware of the effectiveness of this type of psychological combat. All left-wing attempts at mimicking the alt right’s memes have failed so they have resorted to censorship to stop the effectiveness of memes. Any alt right twitter account with a large number of followers was banned. Even Milo, who’s views are fairly tame, found himself banned from Twitter.

The censorship has taken even more draconian forms. The alt right website, The Daily Stormer, became the first website to be banned because it posed too much a danger to the establishment. Even Gab, an alternative to Twitter that was started with the explicit intent to allow all speech, recently has begun censoring users under threat of its domain provider. Despite these setbacks, memetic warfare will continue to be one of the most powerful weapons the dissident right possesses.

3. Hold more rallies

Unite the Right torch rally.

Up until now, the biggest real-world activity that the alt right has engaged in has been rallies. Although the alt right has just as much right to hold rallies as Black Lives Matter, the reality is that the latter group is favored by the elite while the former is not. That means that news reporting will always be staged to make the dissident right appear to be a hate group. And as the Unite the Right rally in Charlottesville demonstrated, right-wing groups cannot rely on the local governments to protect their constitutional right to assemble.

Plus the benefit of a rally is limited. Yes, you can get some good optics, such as the peaceful nighttime torch gathering at Unite the Right, but leaders of the right need to recognize that optics are easily co-opted by the media. There are ways to perform an end run around the media, but rallies do not seem to be a promising strategy for the immediate future.

4. Take over the GOP

Think you are not qualified to be a leader? Then accept that you will be ruled by men like this.

There are a few within the dissident right that like to use Nazi imagery such as Roman salutes or swastikas. This is a dubious strategy, even if done ironically, as it is gives the media a set of optics that are easily exploited. But what I don't see is the dissident right doing is emulating any of the successful strategies of prior rightwing movements. For example, Adolf Hitler did the hard work necessary to take over an existing workers' party and turn it into a vehicle to win democratic elections.

The US does not have a parliamentary system like Germany did so the only option is to take over one of two main parties. The logical vehicle would be the GOP, but the transformation of the GOP into a right-wing party can't be done by a single, charismatic leader. Rather, it would require many right leaning men to join the party and gradually assume positions of leadership. The alt right is well-positioned to do this precisely because it is a movement without centralized leadership.

To do this, men who identify with the dissident right will need to exercise prudence with regard to how much of their ideology they reveal publicly. One of things that hampers right-wingers on this point is that they feel they must be fully forthright with their beliefs about everything. When asked about feminism, equality, or democracy, traditional men often believe they are required to condemn these things unequivocally. But doing so means that they will be disqualified from participating in the political process—at least in the current environment. In this case, revealing too much information is self-defeating.

Leftists, on the other hand, are smarter when it comes to concealing their views. Leftists will spend their entire careers espousing banal centrist views. It is only when they attain power that they begin to implement their radical ideas. Even then, they will continue to pretend that they are centrists. You'll never catch a high ranking leftist politician wearing a Che Guevara t-shirt or waving a Soviet flag. Their goal is to gain power in the present, not to resurrect some past version of their ideology.

Concealment plays a necessary skill in life and it is especially necessary in democratic politics. As Ivan Throne writes in The Nine Laws:

> Master each realm of concealment. Learn well to conceal thoughts, lest they betray. Learn well to draw curtains across purpose, so that it is not thwarted. Understand that survival is at odds with prominence.

Political leaders can shift the Overton Window to the right—Donald Trump's campaign was proof that this was possible. But as long as we live in a democratic society the shifts must happen gradually. Therefore, learn from the leftists. Gain power first. There will be ample time to move to the right after that.

Conclusion

Whether the subject is the Twelve Apostles, the 20th Century Fascists, or the Bolsheviks, history teaches that when a small group of men is united in purpose, they can achieve dramatic change in a short period of time. Thus, the fourth strategy is the one that carries the greatest chance of long term success. Unfortunately, I don't see that happening on any sort of a large scale.

Read More: How Hillary Lost The War On Pepe

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

How To Weaponize Your Mind, Body, And Spirit With "Of Tyrants & Tellers"

September 19, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by Sonny Arvado – Strength By Sonny.

Something is wrong but you can't quite put your finger on it. Everywhere you look it seems as if the system is rigged against the modern man. Don't worry. You're not crazy. Your instincts are correct. There is a silent war that is being waged on the modern man's mind, body, and spirit. And you know what? The modern man has evolved accordingly.

Let's be honest here… the modern man is a soft, emasculated pansy lacking decisiveness and drive. He is physically weak. He is mentally defeated. And his spirit has been taken from him. But why? Why did things get so bad? What exactly happened to the modern man?

Here's the simple answer: He was destroyed.

The modern-man was destroyed by a two-front attack: chemical and cultural warfare. This is no accident but rather a purposefully designed operation that has been implemented on a mass scale for quite some time. The war on men is a known reality and it will bring about the end of civilization unless something is done about it.

What exactly is the war on men?

The war on men is a widely misunderstood concept especially within the general manosphere or red pill community.

Many are led to believe that the war on men is personal. Someone, somewhere decided that it is women's turn to be in charge. Patriarchy had its turn. Now it's time to switch things up! They believe that the war on men is being waged as a way of getting "back at men" or leveling the playing field. However, it goes much deeper than this.

The fact of the matter is that the war on men is just a small part of what is really going on. For starters, there is also a war on women. This war is also being won in the same way, via decades of chemical and cultural bombardment. This brings us to yet another why. Why are both sexes being attacked?

Depopulation Via Androgenization of the Human Species

When you put all of the pieces together, you will eventually come to the conclusion that the ultimate goal of the secret elite is depopulation. This is not conspiracy, nor is it wishful thinking. It is reality. And you do not have to dig deep to discover this reality. The elites are all on record admitting it.

> "A total world population of 250-300 million people, a 95% decline from present levels, would be ideal."- CNN Founder Ted Turner
>
> "The negative impact of population growth on all of our planetary ecosystems is becoming appallingly evident."- David Rockefeller
>
> "We humans have become a disease, the Humanpox."- David Foreman, Co-founder of Earth First

The why is clear. This leaves how. How are the elites secretly working toward creating a smaller, more manageable population?

Well, think about it from the other side of the spectrum. How do you increase the population? The population increases when there is an increase in procreation between men and women. An increase in birthrate is one of the tell-tale signs of a society with healthy, optimized hormones, or a high testosterone civilization. This is exactly what happened in the United States during the post-World War II years, which many consider to be the Golden Age of America.

The economic boom that America experienced enabled the creation of physical infrastructure and more importantly, social infrastructure. The U.S. was fresh off of a big time victory in World War II and there were plenty of jobs and money to go around, so people started creating infrastructure by having children and keeping those families intact.

The American Dream, the goal of average Americans at this time, was represented by the pursuit of the accumulation of wealth and raising families. Everyone knew their place. The men were strong, masculine providers for the family. The women were feminine homemakers who took care of the home and raised the children.

Now if you were a member of the secret elite, this would be the cause of great concern because this new wave development of strong, traditional nuclear families would essentially create units of power and wealth outside of your control. No, you could not let that happen. You would do everything within your power to destroy the very idea of forming families.

How would you do this? You would embark on a slow but steady engineering project in which you turn the world upside down. You would discourage heterosexual relations between men and women in every possible way. You would vilify it and even go so far as to make people fearful of it. In place, you would heavily promote and glorify homosexuality. You would wage an all-out war on traditional gender roles. Instead, you would promote a complete reversal of gender roles by making the men more feminine and the women more masculine.

Sound familiar?

It should, because this is the reality you see every single day. This goal of combining male and female sexual characteristics and traits into one gender, or androgyny, is the means by which they are subtly “trimming the fat” on civilization. A small, androgynous population is ideal for the masters because this is a dream come true from a management standpoint.

No Men = No Fight = Easy Control

ENTER OF TYRANTS & TELLERS

This work is a new beginning for both the individual and civilization. Mankind has always flourished under the leadership of builders. So that's what this work challenges you to do. Build. Civilization and the individual are linked by their need for infrastructure and culture. Without infrastructure and culture, both are doomed to collapse…

In Part I, you will learn:

- the power of culture
- how to change culture
- the exact reason why there is a war on men
- how Hollywood destroys masculinity via mass programming (psychological operations)
- how sex is weaponized to enslave you

In Part II, you will take massive action and accomplish the following:

- develop an understanding of your role in civilization
- destroy the poisonous programming that has held you back from fully embracing your masculinity
- start a new culture based on powerful words and mindsets
- build a strong body with The Of Tyrants & Tellers Weightlifting Program (contains 44 pictures)
- win the war against compression with a total body movement daily routine (contains 27 pictures)
- deweaponize sex and destroy the pornography psyop once and for all

Pride. Precision. Professionalism. This is the new way of things. Make this your story where you are the hero. Click here to buy your copy of Of Tyrants & Tellers.

To learn more about masculinity, mindset, bodybuilding, modern-day dating, and much more, be sure to visit Strength By Sonny. Also be sure to follow Sonny Arvado on Twitter: @StrengthBySonny

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

3 Ways To Prepare For The Impending Economic Crash

September 20, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

While the media is hyping up the stock market, the real insiders know the truth: we are destined for an incredible economic collapse, the likes of which we've never seen before. Our debt has surpassed $20 trillion dollars, our nation is in a state of incredible polarization thanks to Marxist identity politics, and our culture is a complete cesspool of degeneracy and sexual confusion.

Some have regained their hope after President Trump was elected, and while he's certainly doing his best to circumnavigate the globalists and their plans to destroy America from within, it's far better to be safe than sorry. I propose that every man must prepare for the worst possible scenario, which in all likelihood, could easily happen within the next 1-2 years. Here's four ways that you can prepare for this upcoming catastrophe.

1. Invest In Alternative Assets

Very few people know this, but I assume that most red pill men are aware that the US dollar is backed by absolutely nothing—it's literally just a cotton-paper composite. It's not backed by silver, it's not backed by grain or corn, and it hasn't been backed by gold for decades. In other words, once people realize that the jig is up, they'll scramble to get rid of their US dollars in favor of more valuable assets.

This will be a time of massive wealth transfer, but those who prepare will make out like bandits. The two assets which I urge you to invest in are physical metals and cryptocurrencies—predominantly silver and Bitcoin. Precious metals have historically grown 10x, 20x, even 100x in value when a country's economy collapses, so investing in silver and gold now could end up making you a very wealthy man in the next few years to come.

The demand for silver has also steadily been increasing, while the production of silver has been decreasing. It's a precious metal needed for all sorts of computer-related purposes, and when the economy crashes, not only will it be in extremely high demand due to its intrinsic value, but tech companies will be forking over money left and right to get their hands on the stuff while they still can.

As for cryptocurrencies, I advocate the purchasing of Bitcoin. While some men have expressed concerns over the "cashless society," I'm not too worried. I advocate using silver and cash for in-person transactions, but when it comes to the internet, bitcoin is far superior to credit card—it's anonymous, self-regulating, and can't be taxed or controlled by a government.

We've already seen bitcoin grow from less than a penny to its all time high of nearly $5,000 in just a few short years—a $13 investment in Bitcoin when it first came out would now be worth over $7 million. While some have expressed concerns over its volatility, rest assured, it will change the world. Investing in Bitcoin in 2017 is essentially like investing in Google in 2004. Men, make no mistake: this will be the single greatest investment opportunity for the next 20 years, at least.

2. Prepare Yourself Physically

If Hillary had been elected, this would have been priority number one—but thanks to the efforts of the manosphere, and various alternative media outlets, President Trump was put into office. I have great confidence that he will be able to face the threats of antifa and other Soros-funded organizations, but it's still absolutely necessary that you prepare yourself physically in the event of a crisis.

Start with the basics like Starting Strength or Stronglifts in order to build a good foundation. Beyond this, you can upgrade to my Body of an Alpha program for a discount (since you read ROK), or maybe try a variation of the PHUL workout. Dr. Layne Norton's PHAT is also a phenomenal advanced workout routine, although it's very rigorous and is not recommended for beginners. Another free program that you can try is the Daniel Craig Workout, which is great for beginners to intermediate level gym goers.

If you're trying to lose weight, consider counting your calories or going into on ketosis by following the steak and eggs diet. If you're trying to bulk up, utilize mass gainers, complex carbohydrates, and bodybuilding supplements. It's really not that complicated, and has already been written about before.

In addition to this, consider taking Brazilian Jiu Jitsu in addition to a striking art such as Muai Thai or boxing. Purchase some basic "bug out bag" materials, such as a tent, canned food, and a gun. While I do not believe that you will need to resort to physical combat, it could still easily happen. So far President Trump has been doing a good job of dealing with antifa and other far left terrorist organizations, but things could change in a heartbeat if our good old pals in the Bilderberg group decide to up their funding.

3. Network, Network, Network

There's a reason why SJW's and leftists tried so damn hard to shut down Roosh's The State of Men tour—they understand that if men like us begin to network and organize, their anti-American agenda is toast. Liberals thrive by keeping conservatives apart from one another, and alienating us from other like-minded people. They understand that when they control the media, and make traditional men believe that they're the only ones who think the way they do, it's very difficult for them to take action.

As I've already discussed, however, there are far more men on our side than we believe—President Trump's victory is evidence of this. Every single day I get emails from men all across the world, thanking me for writing what I write, and proclaiming their support for our traditionalist, masculine movement. Start going to activist organizations and expanding your social circle from there. Pro-Trump rallies, freedom of speech events, and the gym are great places to find men who you can side with.

The ROK and manosphere network is also a great one to surf through, and while it may be dangerous due to the number of SJW thought police lurking around every corner, it'll be pretty damn hard to track you down if you use a fake name and a burner cell phone. Being a lone alpha some twenty years ago could work, but now the time has come for men to re-create their dominance hierarchies and reclaim the west.

Summary

In short, the chances of a massive economic collapse that renders our society destroyed is not extremely likely, although it's quite plausible that it could happen within the next few years. Even if our society isn't decimated like Venezuela or Zimbabwe, we will at least experience a massive economic crash over the next year or two. While President Trump has certainly tried his best to circumnavigate this impending doom, the globalist elites and the (((federal reserve))) are intent on destroying this country from within.

It's incredibly important, for both you and your family's sake, that you prepare yourself accordingly. Allocate a large portion of your investments into silver, gold, Bitcoin, and Ethereum—when the shit hits the fan, these assets will explode in value. Spend some time training, which you should already be doing. Take up classes at a local boxing gym, because even having a rudimentary knowledge of fighting will prepare you fairly well for a fight.

Lastly, start networking with other like-minded men, because they're the ones who will truly help you out if things go south. Reach out to old friends, connect with new ones, and become active within pro-Trump circles in order to weather this upcoming storm. If you play your cards right, you could be a hell of a lot better off after it passes than before.

Learn the secrets to building the sexy physique that women want, that will make them desperate to sleep with you! On sale for ROK readers only!

Read More: How to Prepare For Your First Triathlon

Jon Anthony

Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

Why Western Governments Promote Women's Liberation

September 20, 2017 | by Christopher Leonid | Link | Original Link

To broach a delicate subject, I'd like you to cover the girl below with your hand and ask yourself which of these boys is the dominant male?

This photo was chosen to be reproduced in the Soviet press in the 1960s. There is a lot going on in terms of the interactions within the scene and what its publisher wished to say.

The Snapshot

The bookish looking chap in the foreground sits square on. Gazing to a source of authority behind the camera, he bites his lip as he concentrates. His inquisitive look and eagerness to please signal dutiful subordination. The boy behind him sits in a masterful, shitlord, repoise – as if he just dropped a lizard into the girl's satchel. His heavy-lidded stare is focused at you, straight down that arrogant nose.

It is the girl who acts as the catalyst in the scene. I actually wonder whether she may have been 'photoshopped' in. Angled away from the boys, she casts a sidelong grin at the beta with a pre-pubescent squee which anyone would have to recognise could culminate – in a few short years – with a steamy tryst in the back of Babushka's Lada.

Political Use Of The Female

Suppression of culture's conventions naturally leads to the stark revelation of that to which culture lends euphemistic expression: the dynamics of the sexual marketplace.

Having destroyed religion, class, and the record of history, the great political cults of the 20th century were at great pains to force generations of children into peaceful, diligent subservience to the state. The last major source of human worth in a valueless society is carnal power, so the young female (whose value is infinitely higher than the young male) started to be promoted to supremacy by default.

The problem with a society that uses women to motivate boys is that those in charge of the cultural narrative effectively become pimps. So in order to get round the problem of sexual exploitation, carnal force is packaged in the guise of general sexual liberation. The majority of men don't benefit from this, of course (80% of the women sleep with just 20% of the men), but are either forced to lower their standards or remain silent about their disappointments.

Meanwhile, an idea of existential nobility and innate brilliance is bestowed upon girls to explain away their otherwise embarrassing natural power advantage. This is how we get 'affirmative action' in STEM occupations, boardroom quotas, a general promotion of women into male 'gender roles' and, when it all starts to fail, the eventual denial of sexual dimorphism itself.

To understand the source of vile moxie exhibited by the modern urban slut (and a reason for its tolerance by men), look no further than the sassy role models depicted in Eat Pray Love, the most recent Mad Max and Star Wars films, and Atomic Blonde. But it didn't start there.

It’s great for making a political point, but don’t you dare tell the girl on the left she’s holding her rifle upside-down.

By denying that the society is maintaining itself by spending down its carnal capital in a sterile orgy, those in charge of the narrative can also forestall the inevitable collapse of that economic powerbase by broadening the smorgasbord of resources at their disposal (fat acceptance and the sexualisation of children spring to mind here). So while such a society starts to portray attractive women in a professional light (see Susan Mauldin, Elizabeth Holmes, and Jayde Phoenix), it promotes ugly women in a sexual light.

Offensive to sexualise this body

Offensive not to sexualise this body

Ultimately, such a society has to find ways to compensate its dejected female victims by holding them up as absolutely awesome in every respect. This is how cults of gynocentrism are born.

Women’s Lib = War and Revolution

Women’s liberation from—and power over—men is the only liberty that can truly be granted by the state, for only the state is impersonal enough not to judge the self-induced private tragedies that arise from it while being able to shift resources to bear the costs of those tragedies. This is why women’s liberation (again, often in the guise of general sexual liberation), is often found at the forefront of the popular agenda for any totalitarian regime.

The end goal is to make the population emotionally and materially dependent upon a bigger and bigger state to support the spiraling cost of maintaining women’s expected value after the true value of their youth has been spent in a publicly funded bimbo-limbo, which prices women out of the marriage market, and the beta schlubs refuse to step up and marry them. It ends with a state-governed sexual contract, plummeting birth rate, distrust between men (who see no incentive to provide for used-up women), nationalised child bearing and child rearing, large scale debt to state backed banks, and an eventual Beta Bux strike which heralds total fiscal collapse.

And to it’s dying breath, whether under the guise of courtly love, romanticism or feminism, such a society will hold up a fantasy of women as the ultimate source of virtue and strength. Any of this ring a bell?

If you really want to see the type who benefited from the sexual revolution in reality, though, you need to look at who protests at its collapse.

Negating the Negation

Here's why the red pill will always be anti-social: it desecrates the noble façade which society erects to cover its shameful abuse of the sexual economy. No wonder our writers and thought leaders have been shut down and banned from travelling under laws designed to prevent terrorism. No wonder there were Soviet-style attempts to shut down screenings of The Red Pill documentary in Australian cinemas, as well as the ROK meetups last year. By describing the lie upon which feminism is based, we are antisocial. It still doesn't make us wrong, though.

Society actively promotes the whims of women to the extent that now, men find themselves deprived of responsibility yet burdened with full accountability for the collective behaviour of the entire failing sexual economy. Those who understand the dynamic write like Samizdat hacks under pseudonyms while journalists who support women who make false accusations of rape can leave the offices of national tabloids by the front door in broad daylight. But I'm certainly not complaining. We here have the immense honour of partaking in the push-back against a tyranny so complete that it is almost illegal to speak of its existence.

Judgement Cometh

Our civilised opponents will tell us, with smug scorn, that we can't wind the social clock back to 1950. Yet, with their next breath, they fatalistically resign themselves to the growth of a foreign culture in our midst that is successfully winding it back to 1300.

The decadence, obfuscation and pretty lies that the West peddles to itself are all about to be weighed up against a real culture of toxic masculinity; a culture that won't bother to write nice articles to explain their position or suggest that we might allow negative outcomes for irresponsible behaviour or that maybe that feminism isn't all that great.

These people do. not. care. If they were literate enough to blog about their attitudes toward home and hearth, they would make Return Of Kings look like Mumsnet. They also have more babies than people on Mumsnet.

The Christian Schoolchild

In a way I was lucky, because my introduction to the most horrific and deeply ingrained facets of our deceptive sexual dystopia were revealed to me not through repeated rejection but because, four years ago in my mid twenties, I committed a crime against our social order: I rejected the romantic advances of a fat feminist.

I like to think that what happened next has turned me into feminism's finest product: a gift to the manosphere, manufactured by matriarchy, courtesy of the fat-acceptance movement, equality for women, autistic screeching, stalking, crony court systems, communism, and all things that Mammon and her lapdog could summon to throw at the boy whose crime is that he will sleep only with his wife and select her himself for her femininity and beauty.

My hope is that, through sites like this, we can succeed in making a solid 5, 10, maybe 20% of Western men as absolutely selfish as myself. What I mean by that is, whether they are soldiers, businessman or politicians outwardly, they must be monks inwardly. Only once independent from self-appraisal based upon what others think can a man choose to be virtuous. Because virtue must flow from a position of personal authority; from strength to weakness.

It will take great courage and virtue to brace ourselves, in whatever we do, to the antisocial vocation of the manosphere: to destroy what the West has become since the Sexual Revolution, but we must each stand our own ground because, even at its lowest ebb, Christendom is still better than the evil that it fails to prevent pouring in across its borders.

Of course, many will use their power only to frolic in the dying embers of the Sexual Revolution. While that may be fun, what lies before the Western hedonist as he skips into his twilight years is what lay before the model Soviet citizen queuing to collect his pension for the last time in 1991.

And the fat feminists are likely to be in that same queue.

Read Next: The Undeniable Importance Of Sexual Self-Regulation

Christopher Leonid

Defining male agency during the collapse of the Sexual Revolution.

5 Positive Side Effects Of Improving Your Game

September 20, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Does a man improve himself and make certain lifestyle choices, such as to traveling and lifting weights, in order to be better with girls, or are girls just a positive side effect from those choices?

Sometimes it might not even matter which starting point one has. For example, a couple of years ago I went to Morocco to experience the local culture for a week or so, but still happened to run into some Spanish women. Or conversely, when I primarily went to East Asia to meet women but happened to pass by a Buddhist temple and talk to a monk (in Korean) for several hours. I also think that a man's motives and interests tend to be multifarious, although it is hard to argue against the fact the 24/7 sperm production is one of the underlying causes.

In this article I will focus on the positive side effects from running game, and also show how a man can do it in such a way that he optimizes both his finances and well-being. A player always puts himself first.

1. Your muscles get bigger

The positive consequences from resistance training have been covered numerous times so I will not dwell on that. Regardless of you have zero sex or a three-digit notch count, it is something that you should engage in, more or less, year after year. Only losers quit because it is “boring” or doesn’t make you a global fitness star on Instagay.

Natural bodybuilding is also a cheap pursuit. A gym membership, a few supplements, and regular food are nothing compared to fatties going to McDonald’s or Starbucks five times a week. So if it is one key that will help to unlock a girl’s revolving door, it is not an expensive one.

2. Your style improves

Style is great and just three nice suits and the same number of pair of shoes can make a huge difference with regard to your level of flamboyancy. Some brands are quite expensive, but good news for you is that multiple items can be found on large discount.

For instance, a Calvin Klein suit costs about 300 dollars with 50% discount, and a pair of nice shoes costs about 100 dollars under similar conditions. Of course, cheaper items should largely be consumed during sales periods. In the process of being more attractive to the opposite sex, you have improved yourself.

3. You find better places to eat and drink

There are indeed great costs involved when a man engages in upper-scale nightgame or even is stupid enough to go to hostess bars and take part in similar pastimes with extremely low ROI.

But there are of course several price levels to found, both locally and globally, and generally the semi-fancy places are the way to go when it comes to nightclubs, bars and restaurants. In fact, some cheap places offer surprisingly good quality of food, drinks and women. Part of game is to be well-informed.

4. You avoid gold diggers

This point is largely related to the just above-mentioned: avoid the pure gold diggers if you are not planning on making a Machiavellian move on a sugar daddy dating site. They are simply not worth it. When you are interested in game you know what to focus on and what to avoid.

5. You avoid over-drinking

For both economic and physical reasons, a wise man drinks alcohol selectively. For sure a couple of beers or drinks with friends are definitely okay once in a while, but generally he saves it for the nights when he knows he has a chance to score. This is particularly important due to the decline of night game.

Typically I drank more as a student and nowadays I mostly drink on weekends while traveling. Make sure to find those moments that are worth it and be good-looking, confident and determined. Even if you fail in the mission of finding a bed companion, so what? Neither your body nor your bank account will take more than slight notice.

Conclusion

As has been demonstrated above, a man does not need to spend a lot of money to be successful since there are multiple strategies to use in order to avoid large expenses. Neither does he do what he does for someone else than himself, at least primarily. Even if he happens to be the exact opposite of successful he can still enjoy all the non-sexual yet positive side effects from natural bodybuilding, nice clothes, travel, and so on.

Read More: Where To Travel In East Asia To Experience Bountiful And Fleeting Pleasures From Women

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

French Government Does Nothing About Black Looting On Hurricane-Ravaged Island Of St. Martin

September 21, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Earlier this month, Hurricane Irma hit with unusual force the Caribbean island of Saint Martin, following Hurricanes Cindy and Harvey that devastated the Antilles and some parts of the United States in August. The post-apocalyptic images of looting and civil chaos that occurred on the island, and the damage control led by the media, showed how helpless the inhabitants were once the government abandoned them.

The media tries to silence St Martiners

In the first days following Irma, the narrative serfs of the French media kept repeating that the situation on the island of Saint Martin was under control, that there were limited human casualties compared to the violence of the hurricane. All was fine and dandy.

But angry voices of actual Saint Martiners kept rising on social media, describing a climate closer to a civil war, with numerous robberies at gunpoint, bodies washing ashore, and roaming bands of looters scavenging day and night. Those Facebook and Twitter posts, even after being seen millions of times are being deleted, as they conflict with the narrative.

The word salad peons employed by left-leaning newspapers were burning the midnight oil to have those testimonies “debunked” for some strange reason. Something tells me that the racial character of the looters worried the narrative peddlers.

The busiest to “debunk the rumours” are leftists rags such as Liberation and Le Monde’s “Les décodeurs”, who signed back in March a contract to fight “fake news” (read “anything that contradicts the narrative”) and target “hate speech”.

The non-exhaustive list of the controlled media in France

A French territory that looks more like Sierra Leone

Testimonies of inhabitants being robbed at gunpoint or beaten in broad daylight for meager possessions they managed to save after the storm spread all around the web. Those who were not armed could not defend themselves. Even the gendarmes present on the spot advised the locals to use any weapon they had at hand to defend themselves as the police forces were simply absent.

In Saint Martin, a crime-prone "abandoned territory of the Republic," the disaster and dire situation aggravated the long-existing racial tensions on the island. An overwhelming majority of black looters preyed exclusively on whites as a mean of revenge against their wealthier situation and perceived "privilege", targeting households that had weaker tenants or seemed empty of men.

The local police is helpless and are only authorized to shoot in the air to deter the scavengers.

> #SaintMartin : Les images de guerre civile que le gouvernement français cherche à censurer, ici fusillade et un gendarme blessé pic.twitter.com/qneOdHA9hR
>
> — Boris Le Lay (@boris_lay) September 14, 2017

The usual left-leaning wastes of human matter attempted damage control by pretending that the disturbing pictures of looters specifically targeting businesses and warehouses owned by whites, or snatching televisions appliances and jewelry, do so because "they are destitute after the catastrophe."

The profile of the victims of this crime wave also reflect fundamental sexual realities. On one side, typical post-carousel "single moms with children" have nothing to eat but "cans of tuna and a few tomatoes." Where is the man of the house? Where is the shelf of emergency food? And on the other side were males in their forties and fifties, armed and prepared, staying home with their families or confronting the looters and driving them away with their weapons.

The French government could not help

Paris is busy trying to control information and hide reality, showing Macron on the island with his sleeves rolled and pretending to care, while insisting that His Regressive Highness had to sleep on a camp bed and wash his manletness in a bucket.

But like Sylvester Turner, the incompetent mayor of Houston following Hurricane Harvey, the French government advised St Martiners to stay at home at all cost. Great plan when the house is flooded, the State tells you it is illegal to arm yourself, and there are less than two hundred soldiers sent to control an island of 37,000 inhabitants.

The state was warned a week before of the exceptional character of this hurricane and the island could have probably been evacuated, but virtually nothing was organised. And the locals watched helpless, as their homes and businesses got torn off the ground.

But some thrive in this situation. Following the "free for all" example of the looters, Air France quadrupled the price of the airfare for the ones trying to escape the island just like the airlines in the US for those fleeing the zones affected by the cyclones.

The fat girl at the beginning of the report justifies the looting:

> Yes, we steal. They want to arrest us but they don't understand that we need clothes and other items because we do not have anything left under our roof.

She has nothing because she did not plan any back-up despite living in a region prone to natural disasters, so she will steal the others' property because they are richer. And why steal plasma screens and hardware if you only need "food and clothing" and there is no electricity? The theft rationalisation hamstering is strong.

Trust the state, see where that gets you

Even in the “first world,” all goes through the window when the state bails and we revert back to the elementary law of the jungle. The groups that trust the government blindly and think they will be helped because they are “productive member of society”, vote for liberal “my feelings” party, and pay taxes are sadly mistaken. Maybe the all-too-common profile of the looters might help them snap back to reality.

The most credulous of St Martiners still think that Macron will do something for them. He came on the island and clumsily tried to prove that he has what it takes to be a leader. What do the sods who voted for him exactly expect from that empty suit? Muslim migrants are for him more important than a handful of his countrymen lost on some minor Caribbean rock.

The same happened in the United States where inhabitants had only each other to rely on and it was an overwhelming majority of civilian men that saved others. The media was prompt to paint them as “hillbillies” or “right-wing Trump voters,” suffering from an evident case of “toxic masculinity” while for the rest of the thugs in the city felt like Christmas came in early, busy looting Foot Locker stores for new Jordans.

From the evil masculine men deliver us, O Lord

In other news, this is also how the French magazine Charlie Hebdo, who got Aloha Snackbarred in 2015, thinks of Americans who grieved for them when times got tough. It does make you think…

"God exists! He drowned the Texas neonazis!"

Are you prepared?

This is a taste of what would happen on the mainland of any first world nation if a great disaster occurs. All escape routes cut and criminals know they are in a situation of virtual impunity.

My question to the readers of Return Of Kings: are you ready to face such a situation? Are you armed? Do you know how to defend yourself? Do you have a plan? Are you well-stocked with food? Do you have a close circle of four or five resourceful men that you can trust and band with if things turn ugly?

I took the habit of buying an extra tin of food and pack of rice every time I do my groceries. This way, I quickly find myself with an extra shelf of food in case of need. I have an escape plan, three close male friends on speed dial less than five miles from me, and I am reasonably confident that I can take care of myself.

I do not want to turn into a paranoid survivalist, but brutal reality checks like these always make me question my state of readiness. I could be in one of those St Martiners' situation if the state abandons my city or region and it would be utter chaos in a matter of days.

Chacun pour soi et l'bon Dieu pour tous

In my mind, this incident reinforced the clear differences between what makes a government and what makes a country, which were not so clear and defined when I was younger. The country is made by its founding inhabitants, its monuments, nature, and history. The government is composed of low-lives that fill their pockets, ruling over, and pretending to represent and care about the majority group. It just cannot be trusted.

The multicultural myth and equalitarian false God has abandoned the elite and makes France's urban centers look more and more like the ghettos of South Africa. Remember those who were forsaken on Saint Martin Island when you feel that you can trust your first world government.

Update: As I write these lines, Hurricane Maria has already hit the French island Martinique and this time is closing in on the coasts of Saint Martin, Dominica and Guadeloupe. Similar scenes of chaos and pillaging should be witnessed in the following days.

Read more: Washington Post Caught Plagiarizing US Government Propaganda On Ukraine Conflict

---

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

20 Passages From George Orwell's 1984 That Have Become Reality

September 21, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

As the back cover of my cheap paperback copy of George Orwell's masterpiece dictates…

> 1984 has come and gone, but George Orwell's prophetic, nightmarish vision in 1949 of the world we were becoming is timelier than ever. 1984 is still the great modern classic of Negative Utopia.

I recently revisited this book after many years of absence, and while reading along I highlighted many quotes and passages which struck me as relevant to the "social justice" zeitgeist of the late 2010's. To little surprise, I discovered that what the political left seeks in this day and age is well and truly like the negative utopia described in this classic story.

Here are twenty passages from the book which many of us have to ~~live~~ suffer through everyday in "it's the current year!"

1. Telescreen

> The instrument (the telescreen, it was called) could be dimmed, but there was no way of shutting it off completely.

Travelers in U.S. airports are tortured with CNN Fake News which they cannot escape. The numerous “telescreens” may not be shut off.

2. Thought police

> The patrols did not matter, however. Only the Thought Police mattered.

3. Gullible women

> It was always the women, and above all the young ones, who were the most bigoted adherents of the Party, the swallowers of slogans, the amateur spies and nosers-out of unorthodoxy.

A proud and “diverse” photo of a Huffington Post / Big Brother staff meeting. What can they do to blame white males again today?

4. Female useful idiots

> The idea had even crossed his mind that she might be an agent of the Thought Police. That, it was true, was very unlikely. Still, he continued to feel a peculiar uneasiness, which had fear mixed up in it as well as hostility, whenever she was anywhere near him.

5. Monsters of hate

> The next moment a hideous, grinding screech, as of some monstrous machine running without oil, burst from the big telescreen at the end of the room. It was a noise that set one’s teeth on edge and bristled the hair at the back of one’s neck. The Hate had started.

6. The opposition

> The program of the Two Minutes Hate varied from day to day, but there was none in which Goldstein [Donald Trump] was not the principal figure. He was the primal traitor, the earliest defiler of the Party’s purity. All subsequent crimes against the Party, all treacheries, acts of sabotage, heresies, deviations, sprang directly out of his teaching.

7. Conformity

> To dissemble your feelings, to control your face, to do what everyone else was doing, was an instinctive reaction.

Vagina-Hat Lemmings of “The Party” at the Women’s March

8. No escape

> Thought-crime was not a thing that could be concealed forever. You might dodge successfully for a while, even for years, but sooner or later they were bound to get you.

According to the media, this man is a “pro-rape” advocate who harms women and lives in his mother’s basement

9. Erasing history

> People simply disappeared, always during the night. Your name was removed from the registers, every record of everything you had ever done was wiped out, your one-time existence was denied and then forgotten. You were abolished, annihilated: vaporized was the usual word.

Confederate statues being removed in Baltimore, in the middle of the night, and with no public notice.

10. Male useful idiots

> Parson’s [Tim Wise] was Winston’s fellow employee at the Ministry of Truth. He was a fattish but active man of paralyzing stupidity, a mass of imbecile enthusiasms–one of those completely unquestioning, devoted drudges on whom, more even than on the Thought Police, the stability of the Party depended.

“Yeah I live in an almost all-white neighborhood in Nashville, and I send my daughters to an almost all-white private school, but white folks are BAD M’kay?”

11. Indoctrinating children

> It was almost normal for people over thirty to be frightened of their own children. And with good reason, for hardly a week passed in which the Times did not carry a paragraph describing how some eavesdropping little sneak–“child hero” was the phrase generally used–had overheard some compromising remark and denounced his parents to the Thought Police.

“And then I…(sniff)…. heard my waysiss pawents… (sniff)… complaining about high black kwime waits (crime rates) at dinner!”

12. Literally Hitler

> The enemy of the moment always represented absolute evil, and it followed that any past or future agreement with him was impossible.

> Nazi's are deemed to be the world's biggest villain, so make sure to portray the enemy of the moment like he is (literally) Hitler

13. Rewriting history

> Day by day and almost minute by minute the past was brought up to date. In this way every prediction made by the Party could be shown by documentary evidence to have been correct; nor was any item of news, or any expression of opinion, which conflicted with the needs of the moment, ever allowed to remain on record. All history was a palimpsest, scraped clean and reinscribed exactly as often as was necessary.

They wuz Kangz!

14. Fake news

> Beyond, above, below, were other swarms of workers engaged in an unimaginable multitude of jobs. There were the huge printing shops with their sub-editors, their typography experts, and their elaborately equipped studios for the faking of photographs.

CNN Alters Photo of Umpqua Killer Chris Harper-Mercer to Make Him Look White

Jim Hoft Oct 4th, 2015 12:23 am — 187 Comments

CNN photoshops the photo of Oregon killer Chris Harper-Mercer to make him look white.

Fake News CNN up to their usual propaganda

15. Threats to state power

> One of these days, thought Winston with sudden deep conviction, Syme [Jared Taylor] will be vaporized. He is too intelligent. He sees too clearly and speaks too plainly. The Party does not like such people. One day he will disappear. It is written in his face.

Some of Jared Taylor's well researched and informative videos on 'Race and Intelligence' have already been "vaporized" by Big Brother Youtube for failing to march lockstep with social justice.

16. Narrative zombies

> As he watched the eyeless face with the jaw moving rapidly up and down, Winston had a curious feeling that this was not a real human being but some kind of dummy. It was not the man's brain that was speaking; it was his larynx. The stuff that was coming out of him consisted of words, but it was not speech in the true sense: it was a noise uttered in unconsciousness, like the quacking of a duck.

Cenk Uygur: “Quack Quack Quack”

17. Shaping reality

> In the end the Party would announce that two and two made five, and you would have to believe it. It was inevitable that they should make that claim sooner or later: the logic of their position demanded it. Not merely the validity of experience, but the very existence of external reality was tacitly denied by their philosophy. The heresy of heresies was common sense.

Only “Female” and “Male” are true. But in ‘1984’ world you may identify as an Attack Helicopter. Common sense must be vaporized.

18. Lowest common denominator

> There was a small bookcase in the other corner, and Winston had already gravitated toward it. It contained nothing but rubbish. The hunting-down and destruction of books had been done with the same thoroughness in the prole quarters as everywhere else.

19. Changing the past

> One could not learn history from architecture any more than one could learn it from books. Statues, inscriptions, memorial stones, the names of streets–anything that might throw light upon the past had been systematically altered.

20. Destruction of sex relations

> He thought of her naked, youthful body, as he had seen it in his dream. He had imagined her a fool like all the rest of them, her head stuffed with lies and hatred, her belly full of ice. A kind of fever seized him at the thought he might lose her, the white youthful body might slip away from him!

Before feminism and after feminism

Truly captivating stuff from a literary classic. Also bear in mind that these passages were only taken out of the first 100 pages of the book. Such is the scope of modern day social justice insanity that many great passages cannot fit in just one article.

Read Next: 10 Feminist Fantasies That Could Become A Reality In The Near Future

John Carver

John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

A Face That I Could Love

September 21, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When I'm hunting, I view a girl who crosses my path from the bottom up. Her legs, after seeing so many thousand pairs, reveal to me her body's size and shape, even if she's wearing a long winter coat. I look away if the legs are misshapen or lumpy, not daring to risk accidental eye contact. Otherwise, my eyes move upward, excitedly, to see what kind of chest, face, and hair she has. I then make a snap judgement of her overall condition and if she's worth my effort.

When a girl passes my visual inspection, she'll have at least a good body and an average face with one unique quality that is exquisite. That's more than enough to pursue a night or two of sex, but for more than that, I need much more—I need a face that I could love.

A face that I could love may not contain the most beauty, or the least amount of flaws, but it is a face that I'd enjoy looking at every day for the rest of my life, one that I would instinctively risk my life for if a group of men more barbarian than me tried to take her away. A face that I could love will still contain objective beauty, because a man of my experience and age can't be anything but a widower of beauty, but I rather stay alone than to be with an ugly face that I cannot possibly love.

A face that I could love will not be the same face that you could love, and that's something we should both be grateful for. I can try and describe it to you, the softness of her cheeks, the silent invitation of her eyes, the gentle moistness of her lips, but it would just give you the wrong idea. A face that I could love can not be measured or quantified. If I explained it to a police sketch artist, he'd up drawing a monstrosity, because the heart cannot put into words what it wants. A face that I could love is imprecise, maybe awkward even, but always beautiful, like the the first flight of a bird after its mother encourages it out of the nest.

Love is a decision. When you perceive that a girl is deserving of your love, you let go. You turn off your shield so things happen as they may. While she may refuse that love, and stab you in the back with a hundred serrated knives, the decision must be made for you to feel what is love.

If you do not make the decision for love, the end will be decided at the beginning. When the novelty of her energy or naked body fades, or she dares to do something the least bit bothersome that you wouldn't even notice on a girl who has a face that you could love, you'll end it hastily, cruelly, without regret. The course of events with a new girl is written in the first meeting, if not the first minute, if not in the first moment you glance at her, top to bottom or bottom to top, with a most careful examination of her face. None of this requires your conscious awareness. You know if you will love her before you know if you will love her.

When I'm with a girl who has a face that I cannot love, I avoid her eyes. What a waste to be with such a girl! I'll get some orgasms from her, as cheaply as I can get them, but the time it takes to get an orgasm from a face that I cannot love means I miss out on the opportunity, the chance meeting, with a face that I could love, but the need for sex is stronger than the need for love, and even easier to satisfy, so it's sex I have pursued for so many years and sex that I will continue to pursue, but I know this is a devil's bargain, for while I can experience the sexual satisfaction of sultans of old, the chance of love fades with every new girl.

The better I've become at gaining sex, the less I am open to the possibility of love, and sometimes at night, when I lay on my bed before going to sleep, I wonder what would happen if I write off sex completely to just talk to girls who have a face that I could love, a face I see once every several weeks, often while looking at the face of a man whom she already loves. I fall asleep. The anonymous women who come in and out of my dreams seem to mirror the ones that come in and out of my life. The pattern holds firm, the grey hairs steadily increase in number, and my motivation to work for women fades, so I greedily hold on to any short-term pleasure while the chance of making a sacrifice for a face that I could love becomes ever more improbable, until it will finally disappear. My heart will give up soon, and then it will be hard to look at faces anymore.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: All Girls Are Spoiled Children

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Tranny Activists And Feminists Are Starting To Attack Each Other

September 22, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

One of many problems leftists have is that they don't understand basic biology, such as what the word female means. However—to their credit—some radical feminists are more intelligent than that, and actually know what a woman is. This puts them at odds with those who think a man can become a woman simply by declaring he is one and putting on a dress. Although this make-believe isn't much different from a young child making a wish, it's the Current Year's latest orthodoxy that mustn't be questioned.

Note that I generally don't care for radical feminists, because of the many ways they've damaged society, wrecked our future, and encouraged discord between the sexes. However, even as dreadfully wrong as they are, I certainly don't condone violence against them. Bashing little old ladies is certainly out of the question. Unfortunately, that's exactly what's happened recently.

The Homintern strikes a blow for "tolerance"

A Daily Mail article titled "Sixty-year-old woman is shoved to the ground as fists fly in a punch-up between transgender activists and their extreme feminist rivals in Hyde Park states:

> Two factions—the Trans-Exclusionary Radical Feminists (or so-called TERFs) and their bitter enemies Trans Activists—clashed in an unseemly bust-up that ended with a 60-year-old woman being bundled to the ground and punched in the face.

> The incident was caught on video and is now being investigated by the police.
>
> Mother-of-two Maria MacLachlan, who describes herself as a 'gender critical feminist', was attacked at Speakers' Corner in London's Hyde Park at about 7pm on Wednesday.
>
> She had joined around 50 fellow TERFs who were to be given details of the secret location for a talk entitled What Is Gender? The Gender Recognition Act And Beyond.

As the article explains, the TERFs had invited Miranda Yardley, "a prominent transgender writer", to speak at the event as well. So then this wasn't going to be an echo chamber, but rather a dialogue of sorts. That sounds pretty inclusive even; so far so good, at least in the beginning.

They first intended to meet at a public venue, but changed their minds following "online warnings of a protest". However, someone must have tipped off their enemies concerning their whereabouts. While they were gathered waiting for final directions to their private meeting, they were set upon by the forces of peace, love, and tolerance.

> Among the groups threatening to protest were the LGBTQ+ Society from Goldsmiths University, an organisation called Sisters Uncut, and Action For Trans Health London. Ms MacLachlan told The Mail on Sunday: 'I was chatting to one of the speakers, Miranda Yardley, and people started to come who looked different to the rest of us. There was quite a generation thing.
>
> 'These studenty-looking types were turning up and some arguments started to take place but I kept well out of it.'

Another intended speaker tried to address the crowd of Social Justice Warriors, but quickly got shouted down. Then:

> 'I thought, "I can film this, it will be interesting." They were getting louder and louder. Then suddenly someone tried to grab my camera. It was scary. Someone kept trying to get my camera. I think it was a girl, but I couldn't tell because they had a hoodie over their eyes.'

Troublemakers concealing their faces? That sounds rather familiar… Where have we seen this before?

Although she wasn't even arguing with anyone, and was only taking pictures, the following happened:

> Her Lumix camera was smashed and the memory card stolen. She also sustained a nasty bruise on her face, red marks on her neck and grazed knees. She added: 'I didn't go to hospital but it has really shaken me up.'

So a senior citizen got punched and choked and forced onto the ground, her camera was smashed, and its chip was stolen. The TERFs called the police, and six officers arrived on the scene, but nobody got arrested.

Since multiple laws were broken, I hope they're going to do something about it. The tranny supporters certainly weren't a spontaneous gathering. Since the mob was clearly organized, I'll bet pounds to crumpets that someone knows who battered Maria MacLaughlan. We'll have to see; unfortunately, British police seem to be having a lot of trouble doing their jobs lately because of political correctness.

The TERFs finally got the location information and—despite having been attacked—left for their meeting. But:

> They left in small groups hoping not to be followed but were tracked down by the activists. Another feminist, Jen Izaakson, said tension remained high at the venue. She added: 'The staff had to form a human chain to let our people in and keep protesters out.'

Were the police still there while they were trying to leave? The article doesn't mention that, but if they were, I'd like to know what were they doing. And if it couldn't get any more surreal:

> Action for Trans Health London issued a statement saying: 'We condemn violence against women in all forms. We're proud that many self-organising activists, allies and supporters stood against hatred, misogyny and intimidation.'

First of all, what does any of this have to do with "misogyny"? This was simply a nasty episode of political violence. Second, it seems a little disingenuous that they would try to grab the moral high ground. This was one of the groups intending to protest people holding a private political discussion, whereupon things got pretty ugly.

Still, I'll give them credit for making a conciliatory gesture, even if the delivery wasn't the best. Believe it or not, some fruitcake gloated about the attack. Apparently, according to that person's enlightened opinion, anyone who believes that males and females are real and unchanging categories deserves to be hit.

What does this tell us?

Someone didn't get enough hugs as a kid.

By now, it's hardly a surprise to us that there are leftists who will stop at nothing to prevent dissident thought from being voiced. The Jacobins and Bolsheviks ended up cannibalizing themselves, and it looks like cultural Marxism is headed that way too. Normally, I'd be on the sidelines selling popcorn to the onlookers. However, roughing up senior citizens is particularly vile, even when you thoroughly disagree with them.

Interestingly, this episode shows us that the TERFs have to meet in secret—just like political dissidents more familiar to us—lest they be badgered or subjected to violence. Ladies, welcome to our world. Although radical feminism was (and still is) one of the major pestilences spreading chaos throughout society, they'll be on target if they don't obey the new Party Line. There aren't very many sensible leftists these days—and even fewer allowed near a microphone—but they should consider this a wake-up call.

It's rather strange. Radical feminism began during the mid-1950s, reaching a fever pitch a decade later. Since then, they've steamrollered their way across the sociopolitical landscape. For the most part, they only encountered token opposition from normal society, but even spirited efforts haven't thwarted their agenda. However, they rolled off a cliff when the transgender agenda became the left's latest orthodoxy. Even CIA agent Gloria Steinem—yes, Her Majesty Gloria if you can believe it—has seen which way things are going and had to reverse course on the transdoodle issue.

Feminism has been described as a societal Shit Test that we've failed. I'll add that they're hardly the only group that played that tactic to the hilt. I have to wonder what would've happened if the Silent Generation had found its voice back in the day. Suppose they'd stood up as one and told the feminists, the GLBT crowd, the hippies, and all the other disaffected types to cut it out until they learn to express themselves in reasoned debate.

If they'd done so, we'd be in a far better place today.

It's time for the public to set aside apathy and stand together at last. We must confront the whole freak show and make them understand that they need to knock it off with their antics. Although society has gone to hell for the last six decades, it's better late than never!

Read More: 4 Ridiculous "Crimes" British Police Investigated Instead Of Preventing The Westminster Terrorist Attack

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

7 Important Books About Power From Antiquity To The 19th Century

September 22, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Power is a broad topic. Every important aspect of our lives is related to it. This is evident in game, where dominance must be obtained or simulated, and where females resort to shit tests, flaking, emotional blackmailing or apparent unpredictability, and this holds no less true in politics, culture, or economy. The reason why your job is offshored is that some have the power to take it away. Likewise, you want to work freelance or dip into a foreign country to take your life back from them and have a future again.

Power has many subtleties. It takes whole books to give it a slightly exhaustive coverage. Aside from real life experience, the student of power would be inspired to read history books on particular characters or periods, or pieces about contemporary economy, politics, and related themes, with a keen eye on who's getting what. Those who hate us were doing it before we were born and their SJW heirs depart in a frenzy when we dare doing something as small as a public meeting.

However, dwelling too much on the side of particular events can lead us to lose sight of the essential. A proper sense of power of what others are actually doing and of what one can or could do is best trained by switching back and forth between minute stuff no one else may care about, masculine energy, and timeless meditations. Here I will dwell on the second element and mention several books well worth reading about power in general. This is the first of a two-parts piece, with the present one dealing with classical—yet not old—books and the next with more contemporary matter.

1.Plato's Republic

This work never turned old in 2500 years and is unlikely to age at all. Written as a long-winded dialogue, the Republic discusses justice, moral and political, and tackles related topics such as political systems and the proper virtues of a proper citizen. Through his mouthpiece Socrates, Plato answers various theories of justice he considers narrow or false, and ponders the fitness and goodness of various characters.

Although Greece fifth century B.C. was a mess of city-States, the context Plato writes from is rather refreshing. Greeks then were independent, versatile, and masculine. Respectable men in Athens gained the status of citizen and had their saying at the general meetings. Plato's dialogues are infused with subtle, intelligent masculinity. They are an example of a time and place when citizens—not neutered "officials"—could routinely tackle complex yet relevant issues of their lives, and stand atop all noisy globalists who today pretend to discuss the same topics.

Plato's Republic also contains pieces of anthology, such as the allegory of the cave, the myth of Er, or a discussion of how even a perfect city-state can degenerate into a mass of tyrant-ruled schlubs. Womanly shit tests are part of the degeneration process (see 549d-e).

2. Aristotle's Politics

A leading disciple of Plato, Aristotle was to grow dissatisfied with at least some of his master's teachings. Once an adult, he would tackle similar topics from a slightly different angle and criticize some typically Platonic ideas—for example, that in a perfect city women and children may be shared. Less meditative, more practical-oriented than Plato, Aristotle would become just as influential as he, and both philosophers were to become a great complementary duo.

Aristotle's Politics are a collection of loose treaties. The order of its parts are far from certain and still occasions scholarly debates. Nonetheless, what the philosopher had to say is mostly clear, and to someone who is not used to philosophy this may be an easier read than the lengthy Republic.

A keen observer of things, Aristotle managed to gather no less than 158 constitutions and charts, including one he had written himself, before he started penning Politics. The resulting output deals with various interrelated topics: the political communities from nuclear families to whole cities, the "natural" political systems and those that are merely the result of subsequent degeneration, who should be considered a citizen in the strongest sense and who should not.

Noteworthy parts include considerations on how the unions of men and women should be regulated (Politics, book VII, chap.16), on the causes of dissent among fellow citizens (book V, chap.2) or on the middle class (book VI, chap.11).

3. Aristotle's Nichomachean Ethics

While the Politics deals with what is usually considered political, that is, what was deemed so before everything got weaponized or politicized, the Nichomachean Ethics covers more individual matters. Here Aristotle begins with a philosophical problem. Different people aim at different goods, and if asked what good and justice are, they will give mutually different, mutually exclusive answers. Does this mean that there is no essential good and that everything is relative? As mentioned above, Aristotle rejects this idea. He embarks on a quest to reconstitute a proper hierarchy of ends, so that different temperaments and aims all unite in one Sovereign Good.

The first book of the Ethics alone is worth getting a copy. Aristotle distinguishes action from production (free men act in the highest sense, slaves are devoted to making consumables), upholds those abilities, knowledge and other things that cannot be stolen matter most, and explains how a truly virtuous man can ride the flow of contingencies:

> If activities are, as we said, what gives life its character, no happy man can become miserable; for he will never do the acts that are hateful and mean. For the man who is truly good and wise, we think, bears all the chances life becomingly and always makes the best of circumstances, as a good general makes the best military use of the army at his command and a good shoemaker makes the best shoes out of the hides that are given him. (Nichomachean Ethics, book I, chap.10)

Aristotle also expands the concept of arete, a word often translated as “excellence” or “virtue” but which also refers to the proper end or a thing or person. It could be said that Aristotelian arete is the Greek equivalent of a Hindu’s swadharma.

Beyond listing virtues and comparing characters, an exercise Aristotle seemed to enjoy, the Nichomachean Ethics develops several theses: for example, that courage is the necessary condition of all other virtues, for a coward never frees up situations where he can exert other virtues, or that happiness goes along with living virtuously. All in all, a meditation on power over oneself and others, on ends and on what a good life is.

4. Kautilya's Arthashastra

Decades or centuries after Aristotle, an alleged Hindu royal adviser named Kautilya wrote what would become the greatest political treatise of India. Parts of its name meaning respectively external goods (artha) and written code or set of prescriptions (shastra), this book has been written for a king or sovereign.

The Arthashastra distills centuries of experience in the art of governing. It considers relevant aspects of sovereignty, necessary or possible situations, and many possible answers. Kautilya also discusses the advice of other counselors on the issues he examines.

Max Weber, impressed with this book, said it "put Machiavelli to shame." I usually find Weber overrated and ambiguous, but on this particular case, he is right. Kautilya gives a thorough idea of what governing is like and should be thought of if one wants to maintain his course in tumultuous times. You do not need to own a kingdom to find value here. Reading the Arthashastra gives foresight, ideas for strategic planning, and helps to make sense of the seemingly unpredictable actions of others.

The only drawback with the Arthashastra is its length. The 1915 English translation goes beyond 600 pages. On the other hand, no one said it would be easy. Especially worthy of attention to us are book I, which addresses "discipline" and examines issues such as the fatal flaws a sovereign should avoid or how to test other people; book VII, on possible configurations on the battlefield; and book XII, on what to do when under attack by a more powerful enemy.

5. Machiavelli's Prince

The most famous book ever written about power, Machiavelli's Prince—issued in 1532, almost at the time than Ignatius of Loyola created the Jesuit order (1534)—appears against a background of great turmoil. Italy was then fragmented into small republics and petty principalities, constantly warring against each other to triumph.

Born a Florentine, the nobleman Nicholas Machiavelli had the opportunity to carry out diplomatic missions and assist the very "Machiavellian" character, Cesar Borgia. He was also a devoted scholar of antique texts. These influences allowed him to put himself in his sovereign's shoes and give him a corpus of advises to conquest all Italy.

Despite the target audience, The Prince seems to be written less from the standpoint of an established ruler and more for an adventurer than could be expected. Machiavelli explains how to take over a realm and keep it. He emphasizes how important reputation is, how to be appreciated, admired and feared, and what virtues are either useful or favorably judged. A sovereign should be wary of the courtiers who will flatter him to gain the upper hand. Machiavelli also dwells on various examples of non-obvious power situations, such as why the conquests of Alexander the Great did not rebel after his death or why some past rulers fared as they did.

Concise and short, The Prince may be more appealing than the works aforementioned. Those who have read the 48 Laws will notice obvious borrowings—for example, Machiavelli criticizes the use of fortresses and notice that rules of thumb have reversals. Yet, The Prince is also narrower in scope than the other works and I could not help but find it much less inspiring.

6. The likely Jesuit Secret Rules (Monita Secreta)

Now we approach recent times and it happens that many interesting or thought-provoking texts have been shelved. The Secret Rules, or Monita Secreta in original Latin, is an apocryphal piece allegedly written by a Jesuit priest during the XVIth century. As I have already devoted a whole piece to the Secret Rules, I won't go much into detail here.

Described as a mixture of "Machiavelli and Saint Thomas", which adequately expresses the major influences of the times, the Rules explains how a Jesuit should behave as to further his order's interests. A Jesuit should care about getting a good reputation through selective care and virtue-signaling, have many cat's paws among both the powerful and the humble, know how to extract wealth from a rich widow or scapegoat innocents when someone must bear the weight of a known—and Jesuit-done—misdeed.

Whoever wrote this book had understood how the Jesuits took a very earthly lemonade from a place where lemons should be spiritual. The Secret Rules is very short, and if you are a bit familiar with European history, you should go through it with ease.

7. The Protocols From The Learned Elders Of Zion

Generations of sponsored historians worked hard so that you never dip into this one. (Latest example: French copywriter Pierre-André Taguieff, who published an entire book to digging up "anti-Semitic" dirt around the Protocols, has ties with Jewish Freemasonry.) Read this work and you will understand why.

The Protocols tackle contemporary topics such as the prevalence of a financialized economy, the uses of the mainstream media, the breakdown of the family unit and others from the alleged point of view of a cunning Jew speaking to his peers.

While the authorship of the book is an entangled issue (it is hard to think that people plotting how to take over the world would have let such an incriminating document behind), its content adequately describes many trends that would only show decades after it was written, and the similarity between what the Protocols describe and known fact is too important for them having been made up out of thin air.

Read Next: 6 Ways The Globalist Establishment Has Achieved Worldwide Supremacy

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Why You Should Move To Norway

September 22, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Norway is known for its large oil funds, high standard of living, majestic fjords, and maybe a little bit too much diversity and progressivism for its own good (but at least not as bad as Sweden, Germany or France).

But there are indeed incentives for a man to go there, at least short-term or semi-permanently, since the wages are very high and quality of life largely match up the level of income. For sure it is extremely expensive as well, but if one makes a concrete income/cost analysis, it is obvious that the net savings can be quite high anyway.

As a Swedish man who has worked there for a while, visited multiple times, and have numerous friends who have resided or live there now, I will shed light on some of the main reasons why a man might consider to work and live in Norway, temporary or semi-permanently.

National characteristics

Norway is located in Scandinavia in Northern Europe, neighboring Sweden and Denmark, with about 5 million inhabitants. The World Factbook describes the climate as…

> …temperate along coast, modified by North Atlantic Current; colder interior with increased precipitation and colder summers; rainy year-round on west coast.

Smaller cities like Bergen, Trondheim and Ålesund on the west coast suffer from regular downpours, although the summers can be fairly pleasant.

Politically and economically, Norway is a predominantly social-democratic society with a large welfare sector. In tandem with the large wealth, primarily from oil revenues, this leads to a relatively low work ethic, at least from the basis of being a Germanic country. On the other hand, the societal trust is high and crime is low outside a couple of “vibrant” parts of the capital Oslo.

Compared to Sweden, Norway is also patriotic, which is manifested on 17 May when the Norwegian Constitution Day is celebrated. Feminism is quite widespread but that is mostly in the urban areas.

The female stock is made up of a significant share of relatively tall women (many younger girls are 5’7″ to 5’9″) who are semi-chubby, but a large portion are slim and petite. Combined with a typical Scandinavian look, this implies that some chicks are extremely pretty: here a man will find 9s once in a while and a steady supply of 7s and 8s.

As a consequence of mass immigration, a man will also meet women from Eastern Europe, the Middle East, South America and East Asia as well. Combined with the fact that many Norwegian men – this of course excludes ROK readers – are chubby betas, it is safe to say that the general competition is low, even though some guys also are really handsome.

Language barriers

Norwegian is part of the northern branch of the larger Germanic branch of the Indo-European language tree. This means that it is very similar to Swedish and Danish – as a Swede I understand roughly 90% of all words – and many are similar to English, Dutch and German as well.

I am not suggesting that it is a super-smooth process to learn Norwegian, but far from as difficult as to deal with let’s say Korean or Russian (so it appears, since I have never learned a Slavic language). Since Norwegian people tend to speak relatively decent English, you should have no problem of being linguistically integrated there, especially if you work in a more international company in which the bulk of staff communicate through English.

Work permits, wages and accommodation

If a man is a citizen of a EU and/or EEA country, a work permit may not even be required. However, an American citizen might need one. Examples of seasonal work are forestry, agriculture and horticulture, fish processing, the restaurant industry, and the tourism industry.

In this regard it is wise to live in a shared apartment and have a semi-austere lifestyle. Norway is very expensive and if you indulge in alcohol, food, shopping, and other hedonistic pursuits you have to say hei da (good bye in Norwegian) to the bulk of your savings. The monthly cost for a room in a shared apartment in for example Bergen is somewhere between about 340-530 US dollars. A one bedroom apartment costs about 1100 US dollars.

On the other hand, a man with some discipline can earn and save a lot in just 6 months or so. For instance, in the fish process industry workers earn 162 Norwegian kronor, roughly 21 dollars per hour. Given that you work about 160 hours per month, this salary translates into roughly 2300 post-tax US dollars, but you can easily work much more than 160 hours in many sectors. Thus expect at least 9000 US dollars in net savings from 6 months of work in locations like Oslo, Trondheim, Bergen, Stavanger, Tromsø and Ålesund.

A man who works in engineering, computer engineering, or finance can easily double or triple that amount, even accounting for higher expenses for food and accommodation. One of the riskiest but also most well-paid occupations is offshore diving, which comes with a gross income of about 70-80 000 annually.

Sightseeing

The towns and cities in Norway are generally not that interesting, but Tromsø and Ålesund are quite unique, picturesque, and definitely worth a visit. The same is the case with the Geirangerfjord. It is expensive to travel domestically, so be prepared or go with car and bring a tent if you want to save money.

I will also recommend mountain hiking or a trip to Iceland, located about 2 hours and 40 minutes from Norwegian flight hubs like Oslo.

In summary

Needless to say, there are pros and cons from working overseas if one has a first-world country as a starting point. Why go to Norway or Switzerland when one can work in the United States, UK, Canada, Australia or Germany? I think part of the key lies in the whole new experience in conjunction with having the opportunity to save a large sum of money and date an exotic who are tired of their men.

Read More: 10 Reasons Why Switzerland May Be The Best Country In The World

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

When You Have Everything But Are Still Unhappy

September 24, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I stomped on the gas pedal as the light turned green. Clutch out. Tires peeled. The throaty roar of the Mustang took over the cockpit. Clutch in. Second gear. 45 mph. As I exited the corner and turned on to my office street the back end snapped around. I jabbed the throttle harder and flicked the wheel back to the right to correct the slide. Clutch in, third gear. 60 mph. Fourth gear. 75. 85. 90. Office coming up. Fast. Right foot to the brake, still hard. Clutch in. Rotate right foot heel to the gas. Tap the throttle. Grab third gear. Another flick of the heel. Second gear.

I brought the car to a near stop as I pushed the clutch in and grabbed first. I rolled lightly over the curb so as not to scratch the body of my beautiful, sleek, grey Mustang. I pulled into my parking spot. Clutch in. Motor off. Just like that the best part of my day was over.

On paper, I had everything. A brand new Ford Mustang, Pony Package edition. A hotshot job as an up-and-coming engineer at one of the top Japanese companies in the world. A nice apartment in one of the most desired cities and neighborhoods in the world—La Jolla, California. More money than I knew what to do with.

And best of all, I was only 21 years old. You'd think this would be cause to celebrate and enjoy life. Instead, I found myself becoming increasingly more unhappy by the day.

Eastern Europe, 2017

Fast forward three years later. I walked up to the table and shook hands with my buddy. He introduced me to the rest of his (former) programming team. They were out at dinner, celebrating his departure from the company. A few minutes after getting acquainted, one of them asked what I do. I responded with my usual, "I'm self-employed." I tend not to go into too much detail unless people really prompt and push me.

He said, "No wonder you're so happy." I chuckled, because it's so true.

The funniest part of the story? My friend had already shown that guy my blog, so an hour later he realized who I was, and said, "OH, YOU'RE THAT GUY!", and had a bunch of questions for me. Anyways…

Let's Recap That

In San Diego, I had the following:

- Nice, modern apartment in the middle of one of the best neighborhoods, but had to commute ~25 minutes to work that I paid $1,500 a month for
- Brand-new, sexy car that I paid $700 a month for (payment, insurance, gas)
- An up-to-date television and other gadgets
- Highly regarded job at a highly regarded company
- My pick of the best ~~warthogs~~ females the United States had to offer, most of whom had extra pounds and an extra large mouth—and spent 5 hours a day on Instagram

In Eastern Europe, I have the following:

- Apartment in the center that I pay $800 a month for. It's not modern, at all. My commute is walking from the bedroom to the office.
- No car, but I do have an unlimited city transit pass that I paid $150 for the year
- No television

- A job where I do whatever I want and genuinely try to downplay to avoid the onslaught of questions and disbelief that always follows
- Thin girls everywhere who know how to cook and be a genuine pleasure, though it's not all roses

Now, which one do you think society told me was the better pick for me?

The Shock Factor

I used to be an engineer, so I remember the after-work happy hours when we'd all get together and nerd out about stuff, whilst simultaneously complaining about how incompetent management was. It was the twice-monthly escape where you could bitch and complain to your heart's content to other people who actually understood you.

That goodbye dinner with my friend reminded me of that, and it just shocked me. It was like getting into a time machine and being stuck on loop during one of the most unhappy periods in my life. Pointless meetings with retarded project managers, incompetent bosses, and a general office culture that encouraged doing just enough to not get the can (so I could pay the bills on all of those expensive things I mentioned before).

That same friend, who quit his job on Wednesday said he got more programming work done on his own projects on Thursday and Friday (2 days) than he had in the last two months at work. He said he worked way harder but it was infinitely more exciting, stimulating, and feel-good than his old gig.

I continue to find it difficult to explain to people how it really feels to work for yourself. Nothing really feels like work anymore. You work hard, you feel drained, but there is no "grind" to it like it was EVERY day in the corporate world.

Short-Sightedness

Now, I don't subscribe to the one size fits all model. Entrepreneurship is most certainly not for everyone. You are certainly right to be skeptical of any and all offers that come your way promising you riches for just an hour of work a day.

I actually believe the corporate job is reasonably right for plenty of men—especially those with families and in need of consistency in their life. I also believe there is a right and a wrong way to go about it—if you are so enslaved by debts of consumer products that you are forced to be there every day with a gun to your head—that's going to make most quite unhappy.

If you don't have the cushion or fallback to be able to walk out and still control your own destiny, the worse I think it is. The last two months of my corporate life, when I knew I was walking out the door, were far more tolerable because I knew I didn't need it.

The point I'm trying to make is that if you have the foundation either in savings, or a side hustle, you have leverage. You are likely going to be able to tolerate a corporate job with a miserable boss better if you have that freedom to lose the job and not work for a few months behind you. If you're paying off thousands of dollars in credit card every debt, that's impossible.

But, if it is for you—you owe it to yourself to try. Or else the coolest Mustang in the world won't make you happy.

To get the latest travel tips, international dating advice, and more—sign up for The Daily Trouble. For more online business musings, listen to the Nomad & Nerdy Show.

Read More: There Is No Such Thing As Passive Income

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

How To Get Over The Fear Of Being Punched In The Face

September 24, 2017 | by Adam Rockman | Link | Original Link

The fear of getting punched in the face can severely limit your ability to defend yourself and your loved ones. Imagine walking outside and bumping into some idiot who doesn't know to step out of your path. He pushes you back and shouts, "Stay out of my way!" No matter what you do, this aggressive psycho has already decided to get revenge for imagined disrespect. Suddenly, he swings a wild haymaker at your jaw. What do you do?

If it's your first time reacting to a punch, your instinct might be to flinch, close your eyes, or turn your back to protect your face, but this puts you in even more danger as you don't know exactly where the aggressive psycho is.

To overcome the fear, accept the possibility that you could get hit. Otherwise, fear takes over and forces you to make poor decisions that could actually put you in more danger. Accepting some pain from a jab to the face is a small price to pay for maintaining the awareness you need to handle the situation or escape. If you want to get over this fear then you have to risk getting hit.

Here are 4 ways to train yourself to overcome the fear of getting punched:

1. Have Someone Throw Stuff At You

Have someone throw objects at you that won't hurt on impact, preferably something soft. Pay attention to your reactions. Do you flinch more than necessary? Do you close your eyes? Are you trying to protect yourself from something that can't even hurt you? This is a simple method that helps you understand your own flinch reaction and begin to decide when it's appropriate to flinch or not.

2. Get Punched Repeatedly

Once you've started to gain control of your flinch instinct, put on some boxing gloves with a partner and try to protect yourself while simultaneously suppressing the urge to take your eyes off the opponent. Keep the gloves up and touching your head from the front or side to protect yourself. Have your partner hit you repeatedly with light to moderate strikes. Try to maintain your guard and protect yourself while maintaining eye contact and letting go of the urge to flinch.

3. Learn How To Fight Back

Fear comes from a lack of control. If you don't believe you are capable of defending yourself, it makes you more likely to freeze up and get hit. If you know how to fight back, you will have more control over the situation because you have more reference experiences backing up your belief that you can defend yourself successfully.

So take some martial arts classes and practice assaulting a punching bag while maintaining proper form. It will help you feel more confident in your ability to defend yourself should the need arise someday.

4. Spar And Practice Staying Calm

After you learn basic striking and defense skills, practice sparring with a partner. You will get hit. Deal with it. Spend a few sparring sessions focusing on staying calm no matter what they throw at you. Hold your composure. Don't get angry. Practicing accepting the reality that you got hit, but focus more on the present moment and less on the pain from the hook that grazed your temple.

These four methods should help overcome the natural reflex to flinch. Becoming a fully conscious man means taking control of some of your instincts. The flinch is supposed to protect you from danger, but it can also put you in danger by making you freeze instead of taking action.

To overcome the flinch keep your eyes open no matter what. Prioritize observing your surroundings so you can react appropriately. Also, mentally prepare yourself for strikes swung close in the air that don't actually make contact. I've seen guys flinch and turn their back when the other guy threw a punch that wasn't even close to landing. It was completely unnecessary and opened them up to get hit and kicked from behind. Train yourself to stop overreacting in this way.

These training methods will help you overcome the fear of getting punched. Notice they require a partner to help you train more confident reflexes. If no one can help you, or you aren't able to train these skills then at the very least remember the following key points when that psycho is throwing a punch at you…

Keep your eyes open at all times

Always keep your eyes on the opponent. Your situation can only get worse if you have no idea what is happening. It also shows you aren't afraid. The more terrified you look the more the aggressor will think he or she can hurt you. Also, keeping your eyes open helps you stay aware of escape opportunities.

Protect yourself

You've probably heard the cliché "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." It's easier to defend yourself from the second strike if you successfully blocked the first one. So get your fists up to the sides of your face to protect it. Try to keep your chin tucked in and a bit behind your lead shoulder.

Move

If you do get hit in the face then move! Get out of the range of the same strike. Take a step away, duck, or do something that makes the aggressor guess where you are going to be. It's harder to hit a moving target.

If you really want to overcome the fear of being punched then drill these habits. Practice boxing with a partner. Eventually you will be unfazed by strikes that fly a millimeter from your face.

You will also realize that many hits don't actually hurt as much as you anticipated. If you flinch, you are assuming a horrific pain is rocketing towards you. When the aggressor's fist actually lands, it might cause zero damage, but you feel more pain than necessary because you expected it. However, if you relax and focus while taking control of your flinch response, the hits you do take won't hurt as much and you should be much less afraid of getting punched.

Read More: The Key To Facing Your Fears Confidently

Adam Rockman
Adam Rockman is a confidence coach and author of the best-selling book: Social Confidence Mastery: How to Eliminate Social Anxiety, and the Fear of Rejection His site Evolve To Win, is dedicated to mind and body optimization for winning at life.

Why Barcelona Became A Fertile Training Ground For Islamic Terrorism

September 24, 2017 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

Barcelona is one of the finest cities in Europe, and maybe the world. It has one of the best architectural sites, the finest football teams, and a high reputation among tourists. I myself have been there several times, both for business and pleasure and enjoyed my stays. The food is also good, and if you come at the right season, prices may not be that high.

Lovely city, isn't it?

However, in August, the city suffered a major terror attack. ISIS succeeded in killing 24 people and injuring 130 others by using a van on the famous La Rambla boulevard. The incident has a detailed entry on Wikipedia.

Spain has had its share of terror attacks, the largest "Muslim based" being "The 2004 Madrid train bombings". This event had 192 casualties and over 2000 injured. Spain, during the late 20th century, also suffered from the Basque separatist organization ETA acts of terror.

The Spanish MSM reaction was expected: "We are not afraid", "We won't stop living our lives, " and how we must "watch out for Islamophobia". This begs the question: why Spain? What is going on over there?

Love migrants, hate tourists

Barcelona and the Catalan state have been very eager to "embrace" migration. The Catalans have a long history of pro-leftist ideological support, starting even before the Spanish Civil War. The historian Stanley George Payne, who studied this war, came to the conclusion that the war was about a leftist revolution against a right-counter-revolution. It is worth mentioning that he shows how fascism has similarities to communism.

The Catalans have never forgotten, and would like to start their own state. They are conducting a popular poll on the subject in mid-October. This is understandable, since this state suffered quite a bit under Madrid's reign. However, sometimes that tone becomes far-left, radical, and anarchist. And your enemy's enemy? Maybe your friend.

Earlier this year, Barcelona mayor Ada Colau attacked her own government and claimed that it was preventing cities from accelerating the arrival of refugees. Barcelona would actually like to take in more refugees and less tourists. I do understand frustration of city folks when the rent keeps going up because of tourists, but the idea that not building new hotels will curb tourism is absurd. Actually by building more hotels you will have cheaper rents due to extended supply.

Ada Colau. Nutty as a fruit cake. This is Barcelona's mayor

That's not all for Catalan politics. Colau supporters, the far-left party of CUP, has made friends in Venezuela. Yes, that same country which my colleague Quintus Curtius earlier this year named "A Total Disaster". Well, if they keep it up, they may find themselves eventually at the same place. I would advise learning the lesson before one turns the country into a leftist dictatorship.

Why bother investigating? Let's sabotage

The Spanish government was smart enough. After the events in Berlin and Nice they decided to put bollards to prevent this exact type of attack on tourist sites. All state and municipal police received those guidelines. Guess who "revised" them? That's right – the same migrant enthusiastic Barcelona mayor. La Rambla is known to be a potential for terrorist attacks, but that did not stop Catalan's Minister of Interior Affair to claim that "it is impossible to place it, as it would affect traffic". I wonder if they heard about traffic engineering.

The Catalan police and the national police do not cooperate or share information as they should. They basically ignore each other (as much as they can). I believe that politicians will use every incident for their political advantage. This means that Catalan authorities repeatedly refused help from the national government, putting lives at risk.

As we know, "never let a good crisis go to waste". So while we're at it, the Catalan parliament adopted anti-Islamophobia measures. Those include restrictions on profiling by religion or ethnicity during police patrol as well as not using the phrase "Islamic Terror". I think that the Spanish anti-Inquisition is at work here.

Yep. Same process again

And if there was a crisis, let's use the court of law. If you have a convicted felon, who is not of your nationality, what would you do with him? No, they are not to be deported or restricted. They should be cuddled and "assimilated". Don't believe me? Here is a case study. After being convicted of drug trafficking, and sitting in jail for four years, you would expect that a known terrorist would be expelled, but no. He has a track record of being registered in the Spanish social security system for six years, four of which were in jail. His lawyer claimed that this means that this legalizes his stay in Spain. I have no idea how dumb that judge was, but it seems that he can probably compete with Spongebob Square Pants.

What's next

We would all like to believe that the attack might have shaken up Catalan and Barcelona government. Not a chance. The left rejects efforts to harden the penal code. They still see the problem as being the war in Iraq and Saudi Arabia. This has common sense embedded in it, but we fail to see any solutions coming from them.

Keeping up the message of peace, love, and harmony sounds good. Too bad convinced ISIS about that. Colau's Twitter account is full of those platitudes stating that terror will not prevent Barcelona from remaining a united and open city. I think the 1970s taught us that that does not work. Staying ego-invested may take future lives of tourist and locals as well.

Lovely Barcelona. Let’s hope the Catalans don’t ruin it

It is possible that the Catalans are reenacting the Spanish civil war. They probably believe that they are the brave democratic republicans fighting the evil fascist monarch religious regime. It sure seems like that when one reads their rhetoric. However, if they don’t open their eyes, the result might be reenacting the 15th century Reconquista. But this time – the other way around.

Read Next: Orange Bus In Spain Causes Political And Social Outrage For Stating There Are Two Sexes

Dawn Pine

Dawn Pine (aka TheMaleBrain) is an Israeli 40+ divorced father of 2, former casualty of the blue-pill. Since he has taken the red pill his hobbies are: working out, writing, mentoring, harem management and self improvement.

How To Find A Girl Worthy Of A Long-Term Relationship

September 25, 2017 | by Michael Majalahti | Link | Original Link

As I read a lot of the pieces and comments on ROK and other masculinity-based websites, there seems to be a lot of griping about the general quality of women out there who would be reasonable relationship material. And rightfully so, all things considered.

Yet, while it is true that most modern women, at least in the West, are socially engineered to be inept and arguably useless life partners, the truth is that not all women are of the same ilk. This is because quality comes to quality and as the old saying goes, water seeks its own level, regardless of how times change. You will always find quality, regardless of the period you find yourself in.

I recently had a young man I've known for the past decade call me up regarding a break-up with his long-time girlfriend. Understandably, he was devastated following her leaving him out of the blue after six years together. As he sulked in his misery and poured out his sorrows, looking for advice, I changed gears and got him thinking from a much broader spectrum about his predicament.

First, I asked him to write down his top three life values. ”What do you stand for?” I asked him. Unless you are able to clarify and identify what your utmost values are in life, how would you expect a woman with similar values to come your way? Why shoot randomly in the dark when you have the option of turning on the lights and removing your own blindfold? Besides, three is a good, solid number. If you can list three core values that you reside by, clarity comes into the picture and you will be able to navigate toward women that share and appreciate such values. And remember the law of life: value always comes to value, just as water seeks its own level.

I recalled a very useful approach that was espoused by acclaimed life coach Tony Robbins in an audio series that I listened to back in 2007 when I was suffering from burnout. In this series of life-altering monologues, Robbins talked about writing down all of the attributes that you wanted your future mate to have. No matter how vain or trivial, write down everything that comes to your mind. Then go over that list a second time with some deeper thought and check off only the attributes and values that are absolute musts; those without which the deal if off.

Once you can pinpoint exactly and precisely what you are after and what you need, the end game becomes a lot clearer. But you must write it down on paper, because only then does it become a goal. Up until then, it remains simply a wish inside of your own head.

Quality comes to quality

As I talked to this heartbroken young man and as he listened, I offered him an extended word of advice which mirrors that dream list aforementioned: ask yourself, am I the kind of man that such a hoped-for woman would be drawn to? If the answer is ”no” or ”I’m not sure” then you’d best man yourself up and get busy working on the minuses in your person that would inhibit such a union.

Once you recognize the qualities and attributes you are truly after, you need to start asking yourself where women of that specific ilk spend their time. What is their turf, as it were?

Whereas over 50 years ago, 80-90% of the women were relationship material, the inverse is true today. Yet, there is still that 10-20% demographic which are viable, and that shouldn't be discounted. On the contrary, that minority demographic should become your target and hunting grounds. The real question is: where do these elusive, quality females of the species reside so one might find them? Life isn't as complex as we oftentimes make it, guys. Let's use logic to break it down.

If you are looking for a woman with high moral character, the answer might very well be a church or a humanitarian cause. If you are looking for a woman who takes care of her physical appearance and condition, your answer may very well reside in a beauty salon, a gym, or a sports team. If you are looking for a woman with traditional cooking and homemaking skills, your answer may very well be found on an internet forum that caters to such things, or a cooking class in your neighborhood. If you are looking for a woman who is empathetic and kind, how about a nursing student? Think outside of the box. Don't be too proud to walk into a cooking class and pick up some new skills yourself. Besides, who knows what you might find as you let your testosterone confidently do the talking.

Change your mindset

When I read a lot of the comments here at ROK, I sense a lot of guys have abandoned hope. They feel that there are no good, quality girls out there. At all. This, however, is an absurd and erroneous notion. Plus, abandoning hope does you absolutely no favors, as cynicism steps in. And do you think anyone in their right mind is drawn to cynicism? Remember, like attracts like. You get more of what you focus on.

This brings me back to value—the value in one's own self. If you, my friend, do not exude value, how the do you expect a woman of high value to come your way or be drawn to you? Water seeks its own level. They're not called "diamonds in the rough" without reason. I'm not talking about hypergamy. I'm talking about logic and reason.

Even King Solomon, the wisest king in the history of Israel, knew this and acknowledged it back in his day, when he said: "A wife of noble character who can find? She is worth far more than rubies. Her husband has full confidence in her and lacks nothing of value. She brings him good, not harm, all the days of her life." (Proverbs 31:10-12)

I told this young man to place all of the things about his ex into the scales, as it were, and weigh out the positives versus the negatives. Now everyone has pluses and minuses, but if the negatives honestly outweighed the positives, good riddance! We, as men, have a personal responsibility to utilize our logic and common sense. We are not predominantly emotionally-driven. Let your emotions bleed to get it out of your system, but then move on! It was for your betterment and to your advantage that things didn't continue.

Some of the best relationship advice I ever got

Only through trial and error did I personally find my own diamond in the rough after nearly forty years of life. I don't say this to imply that somehow I have the perfect relationship. No, relationships are tough even if you manage to get fortunate enough to find a pliable girl. But it was my trek to finding a keeper that taught me the base rules and by-laws of proper selection. It's precisely these that I'd like to share with you from personal life experience.

I became increasingly selective and focused after each ended relationship, honing in on the qualities and attributes that I truly held to be musts. I recognized the negatives in each terminated relationship, but I didn't focus on them. Because like attracts like. Instead, I opted to pinpoint that things that worked for me. The things that really mattered and which I desired.

I recall an actress from Los Angeles that wrote me back in the days when MySpace was still relevant as a form of social media, before the boom of Facebook. She had noted some of my comments and blogs at the time relating to women. I voiced some of my own frustrations in my writings back then, and in turn, this unknown actress took the time to respond with some of her own sentiments to my writing, which proved to be highly constructive.

Firstly, she buttered me up by commending me on the seeming strength of character that she sensed in me. I liked the sound of that, and my receptors were open. Only then did she give her words of advice to me. Don't talk about the things that you are against, she urged me, speak about the things that you are for.

This was some of the most valuable advice I'd ever received in my life. This actress went on to expound that, indeed, like attracts like, and if I wanted to draw the quality of woman into my life that I was truly after, I needed to resonate a message that would compel her toward me. Being negative and critical was not going to take me to my desired destination.

I let this LA lady's words of wisdom sink in over the next couple of days, but only after I was fully convinced of her exhortation. It made a world of sense. And as is the case with all things we come to recognize as truth, we are responsible for conforming to that corrected understanding. Anything else would be self-deception and self-sabotage.

Over the coming years, I altered my status texts on Facebook after I moved on from MySpace. I made a mental note not to share negative sentiments about women or about relationship issues. Sure, if something really stuck out or served as a good example, I'd post about it. Otherwise, I'd play it smart. In doing so, I watched my social media followers change. I paid attention to those that were liking my older posts where I would gripe. As I shifted to positive-minded posts, even if they would pertain to the same issues as before, my social media engagements began coming from a new follower base. Like began to attract like. The negative-minded no longer gave me thumbs up for my positive-minded, constructively-crafted postings. And so the snowball was set into motion.

The payoff

Over the years, I found women of quality more often than not to get involved with. Save a few duds when I was downright stupid and let my lusts do the walking, I invested my time in relationships with women who had things to offer that I valued and truly looked for. I found the girls that cooked, that went to the gym, the ones who were empathetic. Even in Finland, the promised land of sexual equality and feminist propaganda galore, I managed to find girls that carried traditional characteristics and qualities. This was only possible due to the fact that I was tuned into what positive qualities I was honestly looking for in the fairer sex.

As is the case with all things in life, I learned through trial and error with women. Things didn't work out for any number of reasons, and that's fine. Yet, every single one of my serious relationships have been with women who offered traditional female skills and attributes to the relationship.

When I decided to get married in 2013 at the prime age of forty, I did so because I found an Eastern European girl from Romania who believed in the traditional roles of men and women in relationships. I found a woman who wanted the man to wear the pants and she was happy to wear the dress. And even in this case, it was because of my established character that a common Facebook friend told my wife-to-be about a man in Finland who doesn't smoke or drink and is a solid guy. The foundation that I had laid out, even on social media, choosing to change my tone to being positive and constructive, although I was still edgy and direct, paid dividends in the long run.

I tell you all this, because a lot of guys out there need to get their heads out of their asses. They need to start applying better psychology, not just in the hopes of finding a good life-mate, but also in terms of making their personal lives better. Whining and complaining only makes you feel like shit.

If you want to land a keeper, have the fortitude and stock that she'd expect. Girls of high, righteous caliber don't come easy. Then again, you wouldn't value them if they did.

Read More: 6 Warning Signs A Girl Isn't Worth A Relationship

Michael Majalahti
Michael is arguably the most acclaimed and accomplished pro wrestler in history out of Northern Europe, as well as the pro wrestling pioneer of Finland, where he has lived since 1996 after moving from his homeland of Canada. Michael is known as an outspoken figure that bucks the system and swims against the tide. Known in pro wrestling circles as "The Rebel" StarBuck, Michael has been a champion the world over, in addition to being a rock vocalist in three bands, a personal trainer, a voice-over pro, a business owner, an actor, an artist and a husband. More:

Should White Girls Who Join ISIS Be Allowed Back In Europe Or Face Death In The Middle East?

September 25, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Just as you should not accept a sexually-used woman into your life, Western societies should never welcome back politically, culturally, and, yes, sexually-used former ISIS girls. One of these girls, teenager Linda Wenzel, is currently doing her best to sob and attract the attention of her native Germany in the hope of being given passage back to Europe.

Wenzel left her home in eastern Germany for Syria and Iraq in 2016, married a Chechen ISIS fighter, and was captured and jailed by government troops after they liberated Iraq's second city of Mosul this year. She is currently awaiting trial in Baghdad. She may be executed for her involvement with ISIS.

I previously wrote that I was indifferent to the reported demise of Samra Kesinovic, a 17-year-old Bosnian-Austrian ISIS recruit who was apparently beaten to death in 2015 for trying to escape her new life in Syria. I am not for violence for the sake of violence, but the world is simply too big–and has far too many problems–for us to spend large amounts of time mourning the life of someone who willingly chose to join a terrorist group.

Samra Kesinovic willingly joined a group performing actual mass rape and then wanted to leave ISIS territory after being passed around as a “sex slave.” You can’t fix stupid.

Although we should support due process, Linda Wenzel’s firm support for ISIS is an open-and-shut case. What is arguable is whether she participated in the various acts of barbarity and cruelty attributed to her, such as seriously beating and torturing other ISIS women, or working as a sniper. Even if she was simply an ISIS bride, she should at the very least be left to rot in an Iraqi prison for the rest of her life.

Bringing the Linda Wenzels of the world back to Europe or other Western countries is a waste of money and diplomatic efforts, signaling to many other potential terrorists or terrorist supporters that they can join a violent death cult and then be welcomed home with open arms.

In our own nations, there are sufficient numbers of walking (or not walking) wounded to take up our focus already, not to mention major domestic terrorist threats. Linda Wenzel and others like her chose their fate and now they must accept it.

Accepting Linda Wenzel and others back will only encourage more ISIS recruits

You reap what you sow, Linda.

A clear message needs to be sent to would-be Western ISIS recruits everywhere–if you go, you won't be allowed back. For the women, who might expect a customary pussy pass, the urgency to blast their expectations of returning home is especially needed.

ISIS may be well and truly on the back foot now, but how long can it last? Remember, too, that half a decade ago, the only Islamic terrorist groups most people knew of were Osama bin Laden's al-Qaeda and perhaps Hezbollah and the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades. Even if we see ISIS vanquished in the next couple of years, a new sophisticated network is likely to take its place. The groundwork for dealing with the next spinoff of Islamic terrorisms needs to be laid now.

Thankfully, despite the terrible immigration and other policies of countries like Germany, only outliers like Denmark have openly supported returning ISIS fighters. To avoid any ambiguity, however, other governments must be unequivocal about refusing to admit Islamic terrorist members back into their territories. Because there is no way of knowing what these people have done, their mere membership of groups similar to ISIS should be enough for them to be turned away or jailed for life.

These girls chose a real patriarchy, so let them enjoy it

This is the super mild version of what Linda Wenzel, Samra Kesinovic and others chose when joining ISIS.

Oh, the irony. After years of women being falsely told that the West is an unmitigated and oppressive patriarchy, some have opted for the closest living thing to a literal definition of patriarchy: ISIS. Let them reap the rewards of their choice. Repatriating these creatures back to Europe, America, Britain, Canada, or Australia would be as dumb as dumb gets.

I can understand some attention being given to Linda Wenzel's case by German diplomats, yet across the world we can be sure that many other Germans in criminal trouble need consular assistance, too. Unlike Wenzel, the guilt of many of these citizens is often seriously in question. With very finite resources at its disposal, the German government is sadly probably going to white-knight for a girl who gladly joined an organization dedicated to murderous acts in Germany ([1] [2]).

We should not condone gratuitous violence against captured ISIS girls like Linda Wenzel, but they have simply lost their "right" to go home. They are broken women and do not belong in the West.

Read More: Who Cares If Islamic State Bride Samra Kesinovic Was Killed For Trying To Escape?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 Ab Exercises That Most Men Have Never Seen Before

September 25, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Summer may be over by now, but there's still a lot of opportunity for you to show off the physique that you've been developing throughout the rest of the year—maybe even into the winter months.

While I for one have always felt that resistance training should always be functional—which is to say training your body to be functionally strong and able, rather than merely training to look good—the fact is that if you strength-train, you'll get aesthetic appeal as a side benefit, whereas the dandy who trains purely to look good will not be nearly as strong.

Like it or not, we are sexually reproducing beings (well, most of us are anyway). A man with a good physique is more likely to achieve his sex goals then a doughy, deconditioned man, and the torso, particularly the stomach, is a major source of sexual judgment—for both men and women.

Hard to be attracted to this

Seeing as that is the case, let us make the most of it and do some exercises for the abs that will give you far greater size and definition than the crunches you learn in most commercial gyms.

1. The Inverted Sit-Up

If you've been doing your power lifts, you'll likely have halfway decent abs due to their use as stabilizer muscles in those total body maneuvers. Thus, your average crunches and sit-ups are not going to be hard enough for you. Of course, you could just increase your repetitions, but seeing as I and many other men find endless repetitions to be a bit boring, a much better thing to do is to increase the intensity.

Thus, the inverted sit-up might be right for you. Often seen in movies, the exerciser grabs a hold of the nearest horizontal bar, swings his legs up and around it, and lets his body hang vertically. From there he does sit-ups, moving his chest and torso as close as possible to his thighs.

2. The V-Sit Up

Slightly harder than the inverted sit-up, the V-Sit up is not only a difficult exercise but also a prerequisite to doing more advanced gymnastic maneuvers like the V-Sit and (God help us) the Manna.

The Manna

To do the V-Sit up, lay down on the floor on your back and stretch out your arms and legs as far as they can comfortably go. Then sit up with both your arms and legs, using your hips as an axis and forming a body shape that resembles the letter "V".

Be sure to make sure to bring your arms and legs back down COMPLETELY to the floor, as many people can be tempted to cheat by not lowering their arms fully and thus making the exercise easier

3. The Abdominal Vacuum

The vacuum is quick, as easy or difficult as you want it to be, and requires absolutely no equipment at all. To do this exercise, stand up as straight as you can, and place the hands on your hips. Take a deep breath while simultaneously “sucking in” the abdominal muscles—imagine that you are trying to touch your bellybutton to your spine.

Then exhale while simultaneously continuing to suck in your abdomen, Once you have completely breathed out, relax. If you put a finger on your abdomen, you’ll feel them flexing.

4. Single Leg Front Lever Alternations

If you’ll remember my front lever article, you probably know how difficult this gymnastic fundamental is. But the static pose will train the entire body for maximal strength.

However, if you want to train the abdomen specifically, there is a variation of it you can do. Assume the single leg front lever as seen below

Then, at whatever pace you want, retract that leg and extend the opposite leg, keeping the back and torso straight. Then alternate until exhaustion. If that becomes too easy for you, then you can try starting out in the tuck lever, and then extending both legs simultaneously.

No matter which of these exercises you choose, you'll work your abs harder than any conventional exerciser, and be the talk of the gym.

Read More: How To Complete The Front Lever Maneuver

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

This Ugly Woman Invented 15 False Rape Accusations Before Finally Being Jailed

September 26, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Prosecutor Madeleine Moore told the court police spent 6,400 hours [38 straight weeks' worth of manpower!] investigating Beale's claims at a cost of at least £250,000, and the trial cost at least £109,000.
>
> — The Daily Mail's report on Jemma Beale and how seriously police took her multiple false rape allegations

British men in general may be sexually thirsty, but they are certainly not thirsty enough to rape a woman who looks like Jemma Beale. Yet this highly unattractive woman managed to falsely accuse fifteen men of rape and sexual assault before she was jailed for ten years, representing a mere six or seven months for each of her victims. Most of these men, as we would expect, had zero sexual activity with Beale.

One of her victims, Mahad Cassim, spent two years of his original seven-year rape sentence in prison before he was released. Another falsely accused man had to escape Britain for good. Why? Because, armed with a political and social climate of "listen and believe always," feminists and their enablers have successfully argued for rape quotas that leave matters of evidence and due process in the dustbin of history.

She was only caught and jailed because she went too far

Like with many other high-profile false rape cases, Jemma Beale was only undone by her own mistakes.

Had Jemma Beale restricted herself to two or three, maybe even five false rape accusations, it is almost certain that she would not be in jail right now. What undid her was her making fifteen of these highly bogus reports. It is a classic case of overextension and a more intelligent but malicious woman would have exercised greater self-control in their attention-seeking.

The ease with which police believed—or were forced to believe—Jemma Beale provides further evidence that the only truly effective way to fight against a false rape accusation is to wait for your accuser to completely unravel herself. Remember: there is no need for "proof beyond reasonable doubt" for you to be convicted, imprisoned for years or decades, and officially branded a sex offender for life.

Yes, these kinds of rape happen, but they are rare

The more photos you post of her, the more ridiculous her story becomes.

Unfortunately, there are some very depraved individuals out there. Occasional stories of seasoned criminals raping elderly women surface, for example. Regardless, SJWs themselves mostly concede that younger, often more attractive women are the principal targets of alleged sexual assault, irrespective of how many fat, repulsive girls might join SlutWalk marches and claim they have been raped a billion times by Brad Pitt lookalikes.

If Jemma Beale can get away with making fifteen false rape accusations, imagine how "efficient" the allegations of an average or attractive woman would have been. The most amorphous verbal "sexual harassment" allegations, like the ones against the fired Bill O'Reilly, are perfectly suited to non-ugly women, after all. The effects are only amplified with more concrete claims like rape.

It is coming to the point where a man may only be able to conclusively prove his innocence in rape cases by producing a secret, usually illegal video recording of consensual sexual activity, or simply using a body cam in all his other interactions with women.

Our police are being politically bullied into pursuing frivolous cases

Mark Pearson was falsely accused by a woman identified as Game of Thrones actress Souad Faress in the most astonishing and farcical of circumstances.

There is understandable outrage about how police continue to pursue what turn out to be very bogus cases. Institutionally, however, I am not sure what else we can expect. Britain's Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) and top police have made it clear time and time again that they expect more convictions, rather than sound convictions. Just ask one Mark Pearson, who faced months of hell from the CPS after perhaps the most ridiculous rape accusation in recorded history.

Inasmuch as we want regular police to resist any anti-due process diktats and instead investigate allegations meticulously but fairly, these public servants are under incredible strain to meet what their political and police superiors demand.

Until we see wholesale changes in the way legal systems–and not just Britain's–operate, men need to be very careful about any interactions they have with women, no matter how ugly they are. A woman who looks like Jemma Beale has a much better chance of being believed nowadays than you do.

Read More: Game Of Thrones Actress Souad Faress Falsely Accuses Man Of Rape For Walking Past Her

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The NFL Is Killing Itself Through Identity Politics

September 26, 2017 | by Jimbo Jones | Link | Original Link

Literally the only thing I watch on TV is sports. If hockey, boxing, MMA or the occasional soccer game isn't on the tube, I shut the thing off. This is for many reasons, but primarily it's because—up until recently—the world of sports was my only mainstream media escape from the nonstop left versus right cultural holy war.

Ever since Trump was elected, America's media-entertainment-industrial complex has turned into a 24-hour-a-day, nonstop political propaganda machine. Award shows have devolved into little more than a platform for entertainers to find new ways to say "fuck Republicans," with the MTV Video Music Awards basically becoming a three hour paean to white guilt – if not an outright Maoist struggle session broadcast into 200 million homes. Even commercials have become smug, self-righteous tributes to the leftist cause, with Proctor and Gamble somehow trying to sell soap by trudging up segregation era racial violence.

With movies, television, the news, cartoons, video games, and comic books all becoming unabashed social justice warrior agitprop, sports were the only form of mass entertainment that was unaffected by the anti-right cultural jihad. Sports—for all its faults and foibles—remained a non-political realm, the only sector of popular culture that could rightly be called a meritocracy. Dogged tirades against racism, homophobia, misogyny, or police violence had no place in the figurative and literal sports arena. The NFL, NBA, and MLB remained cultural constants that rest outside the taint of contemporary social issues.

But that all changed when Colin Kaepernick decided to protest "systemic racism" and "police brutality" in 2016. For whatever reason, Colin—whose black father abandoned his white mother while he was still in utero, and who owes his entire livelihood to being adopted by a well-to-do white middle class couple instead of being left to stagnate in single-motherhood poverty—figured kneeling during the national anthem would be the best way to symbolically take a stand against cops shooting black people, inner city schools being so shitty, and non-black people saying the word “nigger,”, I suppose.

Of course, Colin never explained how refusing to participate in a League-wide ceremony that is explicitly prefaced as a “tribute to our men in women in uniform” had anything to do with police brutality, failing African-American students, or white people in Arkansas using the term “jungle bunny,” but somehow, it caught on. Rather than show respect for the 1.8 million people who have died defending the country since 1776—among them, the 300,000 Union troops who literally gave their lives to end slavery, not to mention the nearly 8,000 black soldiers who died in Vietnam—a litany of (almost exclusively black) NFL and NBA players began taking a knee or sitting on the sidelines during the performance of “The Star Spangled Banner.”

This is their oh-so-special way of saying “fuck the system,” and as the media has kindly reminded us time and time again, any and all displays of black dissatisfaction are both valid and meritorious by proxy of “we wuz slaves.”

Actually, Colin K. does have a lot in common with Malcolm X. Like the fact they’re BOTH really bad at playing football.

From interceptions to intersectionality

Over the last year or so, it has been impossible to detach the world of sports from the world of social justice warrior-dom. Even ESPN turned into a de facto branch of Antifa, with on-air hosts publicly chiding the Trump Administration for supporting alleged “white supremacy” and Sportscenter episodes beginning not with a rundown of football and baseball scores, but a quick roll call of all the multimillionaire ballplayers who valiantly refused to stand for the national anthem.

And on Sept. 24, 2017, the NFL finally went full retard.

Two days earlier, Trump made some rather caustic remarks about pro athletes who refused to stand for the national anthem, stating how awesome he'd think it would be if owners finally grew a set of testicles and told their players to cut out the commie shit and do what they're paid to do – give each other concussions and serve as a bargaining chip for publicly-subsidized stadiums.

> If a player wants the privilege of making millions of dollars in the NFL,or other leagues, he or she should not be allowed to disrespect....
>
> — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) September 23, 2017

> ...our Great American Flag (or Country) and should stand for the National Anthem. If not, YOU'RE FIRED. Find something else to do!
>
> — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) September 23, 2017

Naturally, the media didn't take too kindly to Trump's comments, and the NFL—which, as evident by the League's impressive yearly DUI and domestic abuse estimates, is roughly three-quarters African-American—-went into full blown SJW mode, with even its universally loathed commissioner Roger Goodell issuing a statement that this time around that the POTUS had gone too far.

The end result? Virtually every week 3 game of the NFL season featured predominantly black players linking arms and kneeling during the national anthem, with several teams refusing to even leave the locker room during the performance. This time, the message was crystal clear: the players weren't kneeling and sitting down to protest "injustice" or "racism," they were refusing to honor dead military personnel as a figurative way of saying "fuck the president."

> Great show of unity. Enjoy tonight's great matchup #DALvsAZ https://t.co/CAI05JHHTq
>
> — Roger Goodell (@nflcommish) September 26, 2017

Of course, the commentators for the game spent more time talking about the protests than the on-field action. The game of football had become secondary to the politics of the day, and that's a direct violation of the contract between sports viewer and sports provider. We watch football to get away from the rest of cultural orthodoxy, and by interjecting their maddening, anti-right drivel into the broadcast, the games themselves became unwatchable.

Welcome to post-Obama America; where actually STANDING for the national anthem is considered “controversial.”

A silver lining?

At one point during Sunday night’s Oakland Raiders vs. Washington Redskins game, commentator Cris Collinsworth wondered out loud if the Raiders’ shitty performance could be attributed to the team spending more time figuring out what to do during the national anthem than actually preparing for the game itself. Of course, he quickly walked it back as soon as the words escaped his mouth, but he was dead on the money.

Instead of offering us hyper-violent escapism for millions of dollars, NFL players are now more concerned about virtue signalling than winning games. They think their big time TV platform gives them free rein to spout whatever identity politics nonsense they want, and we as loyal consumers have no choice but to suck it up. If you want the gridiron action, they seem to be telling us, then you’ll have to accept our heavy-handed bloviating as part of the package.

It’s a funny thing. Just a day earlier, I recalled watching the University of Georgia vs. Mississippi State college football game. Nobody protested on the sidelines. The commentators didn’t make a litany of pop cultural references. It was, for all intents and purposes, totally apolitical. The game felt like it took place in an atemporal vacuum, far removed from the rest of the TV landscape. This is a game that could’ve taken place in 2007, 1997, or 1987. It was devoid of the trappings of modernity, and in short, it felt truly timeless.

Fan burns his NFL gear

That's a crucial variable the NFL is sacrificing with all of this "protesting" nonsense. The games are overshadowed by the prevailing politics of the day, and hardcore sports fans aren't paying money to see partisan propaganda. The more the National Football League tries to market itself as "politically conscious," the more it's going to alienate the average, apolitical football viewer.

The backlash is already happening; that aforementioned Raiders/Redskins prime time tilt drew 10 percent fewer viewers than its prime time counterpart from this time last year. Once a guaranteed sellout 8 times a year, NFL teams are now struggling to even meet half capacity on gameday. And as the ultimate slight against the NFL's attempt to politicize the product, in the aftermath of the week 3 protests the best-selling player jersey in the League belongs to Alejandro Villanueva – the only member of the Pittsburgh Steelers to come out of the tunnel to show his respect for the military before a Sept. 24 game against the Bears.

As a matter of fact, Villanueva—an ex-Army Ranger who served three tours of duty in Iraq—has already issued what I believe is the most cogent rebuttal to the national anthem protest phenomenon.

"I will be the first one to hold hands with Colin Kaepernick and do something about the way minorities are being treated in the United States, the injustice that is happening with police brutality, the justice system, inequalities in pay," Villanueva told ESPN, rather fittingly, when the whole protest brouhaha began this time last year. "You can't do it by looking away from the people that are trying to protect our freedom and our country. I don't know if the most effective way is to sit down during the national anthem with a country that's providing you freedom, providing you $16 million a year… when there are black minorities that are dying in Iraq and Afghanistan for less than $20,000 a year."

The NFL and its protest-happy players might want to heed Villanueva's words. After all, he is the League’s most popular player for a reason.

Read More: NFL Suffers Ratings Drop After Pandering To The SJW Narrative

Jimbo Jones

Jimbo Jones is a nihilist … but he's the nicest nihilist you'll ever meet.

Experience Is A Harsh Teacher

September 26, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Mars Evolving.

Have you ever had a goal in life, that seemed like it should have been within your reach, but no matter how much you wanted it, or what you tried to do to get it, it remained tantalizingly out-of-reach? Like maybe you wanted to get fit, but it was an uphill battle sticking to your diet and exercise program, or even if you did, it wasn't working?

Maybe you resolved to make more friends, and meet attractive and compatible women, but you never felt like you made any progress. A lot of men feel stuck in dead-end careers, but have no idea how to get out of the rut they're in.

Reading self-help books often doesn't help, and neither do college courses. The type of knowledge that makes you successful isn't conscious or declarative in nature, like knowing that a dog is a mammal; it's deeper and more implicit, like knowing how to relate to a dog.

Have you ever wondered how success comes to some men who don't seem to be any smarter, better-looking, or talented than you are, without any great adversity? It's probably not because of a how-to book they read, or a class they took.

Here are two interesting facts:

- Most self-made billionaires are not geniuses!
- Most geniuses are not billionaires!

Now, you probably aren't willing to commit this lifetime to the level of personal sacrifice that would likely be needed to reach billionaire status, but self-made millionaire status doesn't require more than discipline and good choices.

So if raw intelligence and talent are not prerequisites for self-made wealth, what are? Here's a short-list:

- Drive
- A readiness to adapt to externally-imposed change
- A habit of initiating change instead of just reacting to it
- A personality that doesn't react to problems with disempowering emotions
- A habit of making good choices at critical junctures after weighing costs and benefits

You might reasonably assume that at least some of these traits are more-or-less genetic. The good news is that whatever you were born with, you can have more of by developing, and small changes make big differences downstream. Where do you learn how to develop these traits? Well, probably not from reading a book about how to get rich, or by going to college. It seems as though if college were really all that valuable, college graduates would be more uniformly successful in terms of prosperity, accomplishment, and personal happiness than they actually are, even if they lacked the connections to get into a prestige school.

Most of what you know, you learned unconsciously. You didn't learn to talk by your parents shoving a fork in front of your face and saying "Fork! Fork!", and then having to do the same thing for every word you learned. You picked it up unconsciously just by hearing people talk about forks and seeing the results, without even paying any conscious attention. Every time you heard the word and then saw or otherwise experienced the object, your brain made an unconscious association between the two. Although you might have experienced frustration when you didn't know how to express yourself, the process of learning new vocabulary was itself effortless.

Trying to learn consciously, versus unconsciously, is why it's so much harder to learn a second language through formal lessons in class or out of a book. People often find they can't speak a language after years of lessons, but make rapid progress when they immerse themselves in a part of the world where that language is spoken. It's possible to simulate the same process with lessons that are designed much differently than traditional lessons, but almost nobody who designs languages lessons realizes that.

A better way to reach success

The vast majority of what you know is the result of experience, and not from a school-marm prattling at you. Y*our success in life is more the result of your experiences than of your formal education. In fact, a lot of your success in formal education is the result of your experiences of education, not the content!* You might think you're "no good" at some topic, when the real problem is your unconsciously-programmed associations to it. You probably have more potential than you've ever realized; it's a matter of developing it, and to do that, you might need different programming than what you've had up to now.

A lot of your success in life is a function of your overall thought patterns, and these are influenced by your experiences. Suppose when you were a boy, you got slapped and screamed at for accidents, honest mistakes, or for taking initiative without permission. Lacking opportunities to build up more emotional stability than the adults around you, you would tend to react with your own emotions, typically some combination of fear, anger, or shame. Men who had too many of these experiences growing up never accomplish great things, out of fear of failure, or fear of acting without permission.

Because men tend to not only hide their emotions, but are often actually out-of-touch with them, they never notice how their disempowering emotions are sabotaging their success, just like a fish doesn't notice water. The wrong kinds of experiences unconsciously program you for failures. The right kinds of experiences unconsciously program you for success.

Experience through stories

If only there were a way to borrow better experiences than the ones you actually had. Well, there is…stories are vicarious experiences. As long as you are fully engaged in them, your brain is processing them as experiences.

Reading stories also helps to develop the ability to accurately 2nd-guess other people's thoughts, emotions, and motives, and to detect lies. This is valuable for getting along with others, including in cut-throat corporate environments.

Men are at a disadvantage for reading in part because of the relative paucity of fiction tailored specifically to men's needs and tastes. Even to the extent that men do read or watch movies, the vicarious experiences they offer are often no better, or even worse, than the ones they had in real life:

- Most novels and movies are trashy for the same reason that cheez puffs and soda-pop outsell brussel sprouts.
- Many modern authors write protagonists with obvious mental problems. To the extent that your thought patterns start to entrain to theirs, that's bad for you.
- Movies and books are commissioned to program you in ways that benefit a government or corporate sponsor, not you. You're being programmed to behave in ways that benefit someone else, to your own disadvantage.
- Most literature transfers unrealistic experiences that inspire bad choices. If you live your life the way that characters in typical television shows or novels live theirs, you're not going to experience the same happy ending they do!

That's why I've started a new magazine whose feature content is serialized stories that actually make you a little smarter, mentally tougher, and give you a certain sophistication about how to live well.

A magazine for men who want to succeed

A typical mass-media magazine is around 85-100% “Public Relations” (PR)—actually, a euphemism for advertising and propaganda in disguise. The staff get it for free because the article is more valuable to the sponsor than to you. My magazine, MarsEvolving, contains none.

Another service is the forums where you can ask questions and get answers from peers and mentors. One of the hot topics will be how to find a way to make a living in an economy where unemployment levels are widely predicted to hit the 50-75% range. And companies are already under pressure, that will soon turn into mandates, to hire people who DON’T look like you! This is something you really need to know about to plan for it.

For a limited time, 100 FREE one-year subscriptions are available exclusively to readers of Return of Kings using code C7FDA413F8.

Sign up for the free newsletter, and get a free report. Don’t worry, no spam; it’s just a monthly digest of recent articles. Your email address will not be shared with 3rd parties. If you decide it’s not for you, you cancel any time for immediate removal from our distribution list.

> “I should have met you 20 years ago. Would have saved me a lot of grief.” -P.G., Mukilteo, WA, USA
>
> “Kalkin is my go-to man for intelligent discussions about financial matters.” -T.K., Orono, MN, USA
>
> “I’ve always been a big fan of your spiritual insight and your ability to connect the spiritual with the temporal. I think that would be popular with a lot of people.” J.A., Novosibirsk, Russia

Disclaimer: any discussions of financial matters are for informational purposes only and do not constitute advice.

Have you sensed yet the potential talents and strengths deep inside yourself, waiting to be discovered, unlocked, and put to work? If yes, click here to get a free subscription with code C7FDA413F8 and begin today to unleash that potential.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Should You Travel To Meet A Girl You Like?

September 27, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

If you game internationally, meeting girls in different cities or even countries, it is inevitable that you will like some more than others. This is fine and only to be expected. The decision you have to make then is what to do about it. While travelling long distances for girls with whom you have 'fallen in love' is a rookie mistake, there is huge pleasure to be derived from having a 'girl in every port'—an international selection of girls in other locations whom you can spend time with at the drop of a hat.

If you meet a girl in Venice, which is let's say a two-hour flight away from your base, do you jump back on a plane to see her again the following week, or do you simply write her off as another 'notch' and go move on to the next one? This is very much down to the basis of your relationship with her. If you're coming at it from a boyfriend or provider position, the enterprise is doomed to failure. If, however, you have made it clear from the outset that you are her lover and nothing more, travelling to hang out with her could be a lot of fun.

No Sex In The City

Years ago, before I got properly into game, I met a girl in the Lower East Side of New York City called Amanda. I was in a dive bar on Avenue A with a couple of friends. I got chatting to her, she digged my English accent and a few minutes later we were making out. A few days later we went on a date which ended up with us both naked back at her apartment.

All great so far. Amanda enjoyed fucking a random English guy she'd likely never see again, and I enjoyed fucking this San Diegan former homecoming queen in her Stuytown kitchen.

The trouble started when I decided to come back to visit her three months later. At the time I was living in Manchester, England and I was on a pretty low income. Nevertheless, with the help of the magic money tree which is credit cards, I was able to book a transatlantic flight. I would stay at Amanda's apartment, thus mitigating the need to pay for expensive accommodation.

Over the phone Amanda seemed excited I was coming back over. However, when I arrived in Manhattan something had changed unaccountably. Conversation with Amanda was stilted and a little difficult. I felt awkward being in her apartment.

For the first few days she wouldn't have sex with me, pointing out that she wasn't the kind of girl who would 'just hook up with people,' even though that was precisely what she had done on my last trip. Then things came to a head. She sat me down for a 'talk'. We could still hang out but I had to leave her apartment, she said. She'd called The Carlton Arms Hotel, a down-at-heel fleapit I'd stayed at last time, and told them I'd be staying (and paying) for the remainder of the week.

I shifted my stuff over to the hotel, but over the next few days I managed to talk her round. Of course, using logic rather than emotion to shift a girl's state is a n0-no as far as most game practitioners are concerned, but in this instance it worked. I argued that, for the duration of my stay, Amanda had all the benefits of a boyfriend without any commitment or emotional complications. She bought it. That night we fucked five times in my seedy Carlton Arms room to an 'oldies' radio station playing The Eagles and Genesis.

All good. I returned to England happy with my ‘oneitis’ for Amanda fully charged. I decided to visit her again, this time for New Year’s Eve, a couple of months later. By now I had pretty much convinced myself that I was in a long-distance relationship with Amanda, even though such an arrangement had never been discussed between us—and it would have been a terrible idea anyway.

I lucked out and got upgraded to first-class on my British Airways flight just after Christmas 2002, so I slept all the way to NYC and woke up wonderfully refreshed. From my cab into town the city looked magical—icy and with beautiful festive decorations lighting up the urban winter gloom along with the neons.

When I reached Amanda’s apartment, though, I immediately knew something was wrong. Once more, she was distant, even cold with me. Once more, sex didn’t materialise though we shared a bed. No need to worry, I thought. I convinced her last time and that will happen again on this trip. She’s a ‘good girl’ after all—the type who needs to be ‘warmed up’ a little before agreeing to sex.

I was wrong. We spent New Year’s Eve itself in her apartment playing poker with a few of her friends. That was convivial enough, but the next morning—New Year’s Day 2003—I awoke to hear Amanda on the phone to someone in the bathroom. The conversation went on a while. Then she came into the bedroom and faced me.

“Something terrible’s happened to my friend Susan.”

“Oh no,” I said. “What’s that?”

‘Her aunt’s died,” said Amanda.

“I’m sorry.” I said. “That’s terrible.”

“It’s worse than that,” she replied, and then paused for dramatic effect before adding “It was suicide.”

“I see.”

“I’m going to have to spend a lot of time with her to help her get over this. So I’m sorry but I’m going to have to ask you to leave the apartment.”

“But I can just wait for you here while you’re gone.”

“No—I’ll be staying over with her tonight and it’s not fair on my roommate for me to leave a guest her when I’m not around.”

Try as I might to convince her to let me stay she was adamant. This time she hadn’t even bothered to call the Carlton Arms. In short order my suitcase was packed, and I was out in the freezing, rainy Manhattan streets, entirely alone. I had just stopped drinking at that time and it took some divine intervention to prevent me from walking into one of the welcoming-looking Irish pubs to drown my sorrows. Happy New Year.

Of course Amanda was lying about Susan’s aunt. The fact was she wanted me out because my neediness and oneitis repulsed her. Plus I’m pretty sure she had just started banging some other guy anyway. I was dimly aware of this even at the time, but still I was profoundly disappointed that Amanda, who I’d considered a ‘nice girl’, could treat me so callously. It was a number of events like this that led to me to take the red pill and understand female sexuality—and male-female relationships—from a more realistic perspective.

Bang Budapest

Nevertheless, I don't blame Amanda for doing what she did. I was a naive fool who needed to learn a lesson. Things are different now. Yesterday I got back from a trip to Budapest where I spent time with Liliana, my Hungarian 'friend with benefits'. We had a great week exploring her city and having lots of sex.

The difference this time is that the frame is entirely different. For a start there is zero neediness or oneitus on my side. There is no pressure, or implied requests for monogamy. Instead it's 100% about fun with no expectations at all. I have other fuck buddies in the UK and other countries, and I game regularly to acquire new 'leads'. Of course, I haven't said this directly to Liliana but then I don't need to—she can sense it in every aspect of my demeanor and presentation, and there is an unspoken understanding of our status.

I hope that these two very different examples demonstrate my point about travelling to meet women. If you do so on the implicit basis that this is just for enjoyment then it can be great. I had a wonderful time in Budapest both from a sexual point of view, but also just by hanging out in the city with a cool girl. But if you are coming from a frame of weakness or neediness then you must think very carefully indeed before booking that air ticket.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: What Is The End Game Of Game?

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Australia’s Gay Marriage Vote May Lead To Spectacular Failure For The Left

September 27, 2017 | by Ned Kelly | Link | Original Link

Australia is currently voting in a postal survey on whether to legalise gay marriage. A clear majority of Australians support gay marriage but I predict that the “No” side will win the vote. When this occurs, the radical left will have no one to blame but themselves. There is a strong feeling of a Trump or Brexit type upset in the air, but the main reason that the “No” campaign will win is because the “Yes” side’s campaign has alienated the sensible center.

Australia is one of the few countries in the world that has compulsory voting in elections but this postal survey is not compulsory and I would be surprised if turnout is much over 50%. Opinion polls over recent years have consistently shown that around two thirds of Australians support gay marriage, but the expected low turnout makes the result of the postal survey hard to predict. Just as the “silent” Trump voters skewed the exit polls in the 2016 US Presidential election, there is probably also around 5% of Australians who are telling pollsters that they support gay marriage but who will in fact vote no.

The “Yes” and “No” campaigns

The “Yes” campaign is led by around half of the ruling centre-right Liberal/National government, including Australia’s Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull, plus the opposition centre-left Labor Party and the far-left Greens Party. Almost all prominent Australians are supporting the “Yes” campaign.

The “No” campaign is led by religious organisations and a few conservative politicians. The fact that most Australian Muslims will undoubtedly vote no is an ironic turn for the leftists who have campaigned so hard to allow them into the country. The overwhelming support for the “Yes” side amongst prominent Australians from politics to media to entertainment to sport is reminiscent of opposition to Trump in the US and to Brexit in the UK.

The “Yes” side is not really making much of an argument, they just keep saying “love is love”. Presumably they do not think that incest, paedophilia or polygamy are ok because “love is love”, but they haven’t elaborated.

The “No” side is not making much of an argument about gay marriage either. Instead, it is arguing that gay marriage is another step towards political correctness and denial of free speech and religious freedom. Australia’s former conservative Prime Minister Tony Abbott is urging a “no” vote to “stop political correctness in its tracks”.

The left’s counterproductive tactics

The left is making two key strategic errors in its campaign. Firstly, it is arguing that there should not be a public debate or public vote on this issue. Secondly, it is bullying, persecuting and harassing anyone brave enough to declare that they will vote “no”.

The left has long argued against a public vote on same sex marriage saying that it will hurt gay people’s mental health and that straight people should not have the right to decide if gay people have “human rights”. The left does not appear to understand that people don’t like being told what they are and are not allowed to discuss, debate, say or think.

Some of the more radical leftist individuals and groups have also harassed, bullied and persecuted people who oppose gay marriage. On September 22, a “Yes” campaigner head butted Tony Abbott. A former champion boxer, Abbott assured the media he was “entirely unscathed” but said that he worries about “the brave new world of same-sex marriage if this is how some of the people who are most enthusiastically supporting it are behaving”.

In Canberra, an 18-year-old woman named Madeline was fired from her job at a children’s party business for advocating a “no” vote on her private Facebook wall. Capital Kids Parties owner Madlin Sims said she fired Madeline because “advertising your desire to vote no for SSM [same-sex marriage] is, in my eyes, hate speech”.

In Brisbane, the National Union of Students organised a rally outside a church to harass the attendees at a “vote no” meeting. The rally turned violent and one woman was arrested.

When “no” campaigners hired Skywriting Australia to write “vote no” in the sky above Sydney the business was abused on social media and the business owner received a torrent of harassing text messages including the following:

> …you really are a shit human. You’re definitely the biggest piece of shit in Australia today. Probably tomorrow too. Hope you’re proud of yourself. Don’t be > surprised by the hate coming for you. Titt for tatt, it's only fair, right? You stupid, ignorant, remorseless, pathetic, old, LOSER.

The organisers of the skywriting later reported that GoFundMe "has decided to freeze our funds, until we give our names and locations. This is on the back of a massive amount of hateful messages we have received by people who want to silence our message and personally attack us."

Of course, there are people on the "No" side who have behaved inappropriately too. The difference is that within the "Yes" camp the arguments that there should be no debate, or that those who oppose gay marriage should not be allowed to state their views, is mainstream.

Unlike the United States, Australia does not have constitutionally protected free speech. The Australian Parliament has passed laws imposing fines of up to $12,600 for anyone "vilifying" or "intimidating" another person during the gay marriage debate. I expect these laws will be enforced selectively against "no" campaigners for "homophobic" comments.

Lessons for the right

We shouldn't underestimate the radical left, but we shouldn't overestimate them either. Let them be themselves and they will alienate ten people for every one they convert. We on the right must not get down into the gutter to fight with these radical leftists or we will come out at least as dirty as they are. Let's maintain the moral high ground and promote civilised debate, free speech, and non-violence.

Read more: Is Feminism Its Own Worst Enemy?

Ned Kelly

Ned is an intellectual bushranger. He has spent the past ten years in the leftist corridors of Australia’s universities and civil service and he’s had enough.

4 Unconventional “Bio-Hacks” That Actually Work

September 27, 2017 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Everywhere you look, there’s some self-proclaimed expert spewing complete nonsense, trying to get you to buy his latest program for “just $19.95.” The fitness industry is perhaps one of the most BS-ridden industries in all of existence, and the emerging bio-hacking industry is right up there with it.

Bio-hacking is exactly what it sounds like—hacking your biology. Bio-hackers aim to tweak their environments, adjust their food intakes, alter exercise methods, and use technology to create an optimal body and mind. Unfortunately, despite the very cool premise, this industry is filled with scam artists and outright liars.

Most of the best “bio-hacks” can be done for free, and only a few are expensive (upwards of $1,000). As someone who’s been involved in this sphere of influence for years now, here’s a list of my favorite and most effective bio-hacks.

1. Binaural Beats

Type	Frequency (Hz)	Brain Location	Cognitive Description
Delta	up to 4	•Frontal (adults) •Posterior (children)	•Occurs in sleeping adults and is frequent in babies •Indicative of a continuous attention task (Kirmizi-Alsan et al. 2006)
Theta	4 to < 8	•Various locations	•Common frequency found in young children •Indicative of drowsiness or arousal in older children and adults •Idling •Has been found to spike when person is actively attempting to repress an action or response
Alpha	8 to 13	•Posterior regions of head, both sides •Higher in amplitude on dominant side •Central sites at rest	•Indicative of a relaxed/reflecting state •Closing of eyes
Beta	>13 to 30	•Occurs on both left and right sides of brain •Has a symmetrical distribution of activity •Most evident frontally	•Indicative of an alert or focused working state, active, busy or anxious thinking or active concentration
Gamma	30 to 100+	•Somatosensory cortex (both left and right sides of brain, midline to front and back)	•Indicative of sensory processing (hence association with somatosensory cortex) •Also shown during short term memory activities

"Do binaural beats work?" one of my clients asked. "Yep, they work," I said. "No, like do they REALLY work?" he asked again. "Yes," I said. "Try them for yourself."

Ever since I was introduced to binaural beats sometime around 2013, I've recommended them to pretty much every single client I coach—and while they may seem like something out of a science fiction movie, there's a growing mountain of evidence proving their efficacy.

In layman's terms, binaural beats are basically a series of frequencies that you listen to, played in such a way that they alter your brain's state. Want to get "in state," before going out to get a girl's number? Great, listen to some "alpha frequency," binaural beats. Or maybe you want to fall asleep quickly? That's fine too, just plug in some "delta frequency," binaural beats and watch yourself slowly drift off to sleep.

Binaural beats are hands down one of the most effective bio-hacking tools that I've discovered to date, and in my experience they will work for about 90% of people (the other 10% being hard cases). I recommend you use Life Flow, but others have found success with Brain.fm and Hemisync.

2. Alpha Male Posture

Mike Cernovich first popularized this technique in his "Gorilla Mindset Morning Routine," which I urge you to check out. We all know that certain postures are associated with alpha males, and other postures are associated with beta males, correct? Well bio-hacking takes it one step further.

With the alpha male posture bio-hack, you simply emulate high status body language. This consists of standing up straight with your chest out, throwing your arms high in the air, and even pounding your chest like a silver back gorilla.

While it may seem stupid, it's actually been proven to increase your testosterone and decrease your cortisol in a matter of just 60 seconds. In one experiment, researchers found that simply changing their test subjects' body language led to a sharp difference in their ability to complete a scary task (bungee jumping).

If you're wondering how to be an alpha male, the best place to start is to change your behaviors. This doesn't mean to neglect the underlying thought processes behind being an alpha male, as attaining these is how you truly transform into one—but there's definitely something to be said for faking it until you make it.

3. Light Therapy

For millenia, human beings had a complex and intimate relationship with the day and the night. They would follow the natural rhythms of the sunrise and sunset, which would dictate their daily schedule. Now however, with artificial light bombarding us at every second of the day, many of us are finding that our circadian rhythms are way out of whack.

This is where “light therapy,” comes in. Studies have shown that light regulation is an effective way to optimize your hormones, energy levels, and sleep—three things that every man should value.

The first, and easiest way for you to begin light hacking, is to install the application F.lux on your computer. It will automatically dim your screen to simulate the sunrise and sunset, eliminating blue frequency light waves which prevent the production of melatonin.

The second, and more expensive option, is to purchase a light box. They can range anywhere from $30 to $300, and although it might be a bit of an extra hassle, I highly recommend that you order one and try it out just for a week. I have one mounted right on my nightstand, programmed to blast my face with 10,000 lux of pure light, removing any possibility of me falling back asleep.

Exposing your eyes to this “artificial sunlight,” first thing in the morning helps to regulate your hormones and sleep cycle, so it can be especially helpful for men who have insomnia and other sleep problems.

4. Cryotherapy

Experts are slowly discovering that 99% of our ailments are due to inflammation. Depression has been linked to an inflamed brain, Crohn's has been linked to an inflamed gastrointestinal tract, and even obesity has been linked to inflammation of the whole body.

In response to this discovery, a new branch of medicine known as "cryotherapy," has begun emerging. The idea is simple—subject the body to ungodly temperatures in order to massively combat inflammation. While the premise is relatively easy to understand, it actually has incredible health benefits.

Cryotherapy centers have been popping up all over the country, and while they use advanced technology and liquid nitrogen to achieve such cold temperatures, you can create a DIY version yourself. Many athletes now use cold baths, which can run you around $1,500 for a one time installation fee, not including maintenance.

For the less financially endowed readers of the manosphere, however, you can pick up a couple bags of ice at your local gas station, dump them in your bathtub, and fill it with cold water—then jump in there for about ten minutes. Your body will absolutely hate you for it, but it will thank you later.

Summary

Humans are just beginning to understand the complexities of our own bodies, but as technology advances and as our understanding of science grows, we will eventually be able to create a paradise on earth, as Ray Kurzeil, futurist and best-selling author, believes.

It's predicted that millennials will be the first generation to live forever, as the advances in medicine and life-extending technology grow exponentially—and while this may be the worst possible generation to bestow eternal life upon, I'm just happy that we're finally reaching that point.

Learn how to shred fat, pack on slabs of lean muscle, and build a chiseled physique that women go crazy for! Get Jon Anthony's Body of an Alpha program for 50% off while the sale lasts!

Read Next: 6 Lessons For Building Your Body And Mind

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

“Pro-Communist” Army Officer Could Have Gotten Away With Treason If He Didn’t Brag Online

September 27, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Hill:

The U.S. Army announced on Tuesday that it is probing a West Point graduate’s pro-communist posts on social media.

The Army was quick to announce it was looking into the messages posted by 2nd Lt. Spenser Rapone, issuing a statement on Tuesday saying, “Second Lieutenant Rapone’s actions in no way reflect the values of the U.S. Military Academy or the U.S. Army.”

“As figures of public trust, members of the military must exhibit exemplary conduct, and are prohibited from engaging in certain expressions of political speech in uniform. Second Lieutenant Rapone’s chain of command is aware of his actions and is looking into the matter. The academy is prepared to assist the officer’s chain of command as required,” the statement continued.

Rapone put out two visibly pro-communist posts on Twitter this week, including one in which he voiced his support for Argentine communist revolutionary Che Guevara.

“In case there was any lingering doubt, hasta la victoria siempre,” Rapone tweeted on Monday, along with a picture of him revealing a red shirt adorned with Guevara’s face under his uniform.

> In case there was any lingering doubt, hasta la victoria siempre > pic.twitter.com/0XrW38wcCk

> — Commie Bebop (@punkproletarian) September 25, 2017

Rapone posted another picture on Sunday of him holding up his military hat with the message “communism will win” written inside in a tweet expressing support for NFL free agent Colin Kaepernick amid President Trump’s attacks on NFL players who take a knee in protest during the national anthem.

> #VeteransForKaepernick pic.twitter.com/3jnCtawvHc
> — Commie Bebop (@punkproletarian) September 24, 2017

Read the entire article

