Don’t Miss: 5 Reasons Why Women In Army Ranger School Is Worse Than You Think

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

The Problems With Teaching Men How To Find A Wife

September 28, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I recently read an article by Michael Perilloux titled How To Catch A Wife, the latest example of how modern game teachings have impacted traditionally-minded men. Unfortunately, I believe Perilloux's advice falls short in helping men actually find a wife.

> I have my first kid on the way with my beautiful traditional wife. I'm blessed to have her, but our relationship was not a lucky accident.
>
> A few years ago, I decided I was going to get married. So I did. I made plans, restructured my life, and developed the relevant skills. It worked.

His declaration of victory is premature. With a short courtship, rapid pregnancy, and a bun still in the oven, he may still be in the honeymoon phase of his marriage, or at least in the phase where major differences, such as with child-rearing, have yet to surface. I do hope his marriage is successful, but we should not give much weight to the article's initial demonstration of authority. There are many divorced men who would not have reported problems to you during their ex-wives' first pregnancy.

> The first problem men have is "Naïve Romanticism," which is the belief that you can just cruise through life, relax, and not worry about getting married, and "the one" will come along at some point and sweep you off your feet like some kind of romantic comedy.

I don't know a single man who has that problem. If anything, it's the problem of women. Men hesitate towards marriage today simply because there are more downsides than upsides in getting married. With the abundance of free sex, casual relationships, digital entertainment, and urban fun, there is no advantage in marriage unless you specifically want to create a family, and that comes with the knowledge that the state is ready to destroy you through punitive family laws. Men are abstaining from marriage because of rational choices, not idealism.

> You know what else is unromantic? Dying alone with no children.
>
> The fact is that this is the most important problem in your life. You need to take it as seriously as your professional career, starting a business, or planning an invasion.

The only downside he mentioned of not getting married is dying alone. This is a fear shared by many, but the problem with a fear like this is that to avoid it, you rush into flawed actions and make decisions that cause the fear to own you.

If I fear dying alone, and catch my girlfriend or wife cheating when I'm in my 30's or beyond, I'm more likely to make the disastrous decision of keeping her, nearly guaranteeing I'll be cucked again. A better approach is to accept your fears and then make the choice that serves a positive gain to your existence instead of one that merely avoids a negative pain.

> Our ancestors lived in a very different society. They had homogeneous, high-trust communities where their neighbors were of the same class, folk, faith, and social circles. They all grew up together, went to church together, and were well-integrated in a social fabric where everyone knew each other. As a matter of course, every young man knew multiple eligible girls who would make good matches. The parents, friends, busybody old women, tradition, and random happy circumstance would conspire to make successful marriage almost automatic. Naïve romanticism was a perfectly adequate strategy in such an environment, because marriage was supported by such a powerful social machine, which no longer exists.

Perilloux is correct that the path of least resistance in the past was marriage. In other words, the social structure was such that a good wife would land on your lap from having a full-time job, or even merely the intent to have one. You didn't have to date, learn game, go to the gym, step up your banter, be cocky, and so on.

A society is healthy if creating a family is the default mode of relationship structure that is also rational for men to do. Marriage has its problems, but the alternative back then of not getting married had far more downsides, especially in a climate that was not as promiscuous or as welcoming of the eternal bachelor lifestyle.

One reason why marriage was such a good deal was because you didn't have to study game, fitness, and psychology and then apply that learned knowledge through hundreds of hours of work just to get into a meaningful relationship. If you have to do this work today to get married, and the sword of Damocles is hanging over your head through an anti-male culture with full court backing, does marriage still become a low friction endeavor? It doesn't, so Perilloux has no choice but to apply an achievement model to his hunt for a wife to make it happen in a degenerate age.

> To replace naïve romanticism, we need the fundamental masculine skill of life in the real world: the will and confidence to take a problem seriously and deliberately figure out how to solve it. You can sit down and think this problem through, come to an understanding, make plans, and reason things out. This is the only way anything real ever gets done.
>
> In throwing out naïve romanticism, which is a fundamentally passive strategy, it is useful to have a much more active and high-agency model to work from.
>
> […]
>
> Modern women also have all kinds of little psychological blocks that will derail your chance at marrying them, unless you go in with an iron will to bust through all their silly resistances and win them. My own courtship, for example, was full of rocky uncertainty, resistance, and lack of will on her part. It wouldn't have happened if I hadn't disregarded all that and put my will into making it happen.

To find a wife, Perilloux urges us to treat it like a business by being goal-oriented and transferring will and energy into the task. I've used my will in the past to do things I dreamed of when I was younger, such as quitting my job, traveling to dozens of countries, expatriating from the United States, and bedding many women, all of which were more-or-less individualist crusades, but I'm hesitant to use that same process to find a wife.

As a man, I can surely hunt and work for what I desire, but relationships are different in that you want a woman to put in as much investment and will of her own. The more she's invested, the more likely she will stay. If I put in full will, and she puts in less than me, it's inevitable that I will feel underappreciated and become fatigued as she coasts or takes advantage of my efforts, which will not be easy to maintain indefinitely.

Just like when launching nuclear missiles, two officers have to turn their key simultaneously, and outside of being a leader and fulfilling the masculine roles of the relationship, I do not believe a man should do all the work in maintaining it, which I suspect Perilloux is doing. How do we know that his wife is just going along for the ride because he makes it so easy for her? What happens if he gets tired, sick, or has employment difficulties? Will his wife stay with him?

We don't know the home situation or the type of challenges his wife puts him through to be convinced of his method, which seems to reduce the investment the female has to make for the singular goal of getting a wife. We also don't know what other sacrifices he has made. The costs will simply be too much for most men, especially those who are not convinced that marriage is the most rational choice to make, such as myself. Men who took the red pill can't simply pretend they don't know the true nature of women and the societal odds stacked against them to perform Perilloux's mission.

> People often don't keep their eye on [the] fundamentals and become confused with ideas about true love and such. But love is a side-effect, not a fundamental.

> If the fundamentals are good, love will come. If the fundamentals aren't good, love won't help. Consider the outcomes of arranged marriages, where the families set up marriages with good fundamentals without regard for love. They are very stable, and they end up in love anyways.

Good luck convincing the modern woman that love is a side effect! It's not just Hollywood that pushes romanticism but the entirety of the West, and that has been going on since the 18th century. You are simply not going to get the average woman to adopt the practical standards of Indian women who get into arranged marriages, for example, and if you do find one, none of your tactics mattered anyway because she was already primed to be with a man for practical reasons.

It's not that Perilloux convinced his bride to be practical about love, but that she was already convinced, perhaps from being raised in a more traditional environment. For most men who live in urban areas, these traditional women are wholly out of reach, so I suspect Perilloux lives in a smaller town.

Odds are you are reading from a mega city like London, New York City, and Toronto, so I'd have to urge you to move to a smaller town, get a new job, or drastically change your environment and habits to essentially become a new person for the prospect of finding a wife to be responsible for who, odds are, has a 50% chance of kicking you to the curb at some point. That's an impossible sell.

When it comes to finding a wife, the problem is not one of game or standards, but societal: there simply are not enough traditional women to go around for men currently living in urban environments that tip the balance of marriage from being irrational to rational. Sure, if I move to a specific area, join the church, and give value to the community, I'll probably find a wife, but upending your life for a goal means the goal steers you, now and for the entirety of that marriage. I can't in good faith urge men to make drastic life changes beyond matters of general self-improvement or taking a two-week trip to Brazil.

In the past, men didn't have to upend their lives to find wives, and the likelihood of divorce was far lower. Why should I make more sacrifice for less potential gain? While I definitely see the value in having a family, and would be open to being a father, the woman and situation has to be just right for me to take such a huge risk in today's climate. Telling me and men like me to essentially "man up and get married" is not going to cut it.

Perilloux's article shines when it comes to evaluating a girl based on her wifely standards:

> Is she feminine and traditional? You want a traditional woman who acts like such. Many "anti-feminist" women don't practice what they preach, so watch out. She should feel comfortable taking the feminine role in marriage.
>
> Is she a virgin? You don't want the kind of girl who did a lot of "partying" before "settling down", you don't want the baggage, you don't want her thinking of you as her retirement, and you don't want the spectre of those other men haunting your marriage.
>
> Does she have good domestic and family skills? Can she keep house, cook, clean, deal with finances, decorate, host, sew, fix, and so on? Is she good with kids? Is she comfortable and happy doing these tasks?
>
> Does she want to be a wife and mother to lots of kids? Women can be hard to convince. Big bonus if she already wants a big family.
>
> Does she believe in traditional marriage and oppose divorce? There will be times when she doesn't like you anymore. For the marriage to work, she has to be committed anyway, because she believes in marriage. Make sure she's committed to the idea of marriage itself, not just to you.

Not surprisingly, no girl I've been in a relationship with has hit on all of his points. I have standards that I believe are optimal, but in reality they are unrealistic if I can't find it "in stock" at the marketplace. While it's an encouraging sign that traditionalism is emerging as a new counter-culture, that change will be too slow for men who are in their late 20's or beyond to hope and wait. Many will miss the fatherhood boat, most likely including myself, but our experiences can at least aid men of future generations.

The most flaccid portion of the article is when Perilloux attempts to share how to meet a wife, a pressing urge for men who are already well-versed in game and know what they're looking for.

> Social proximity. You need to maximize the number of good women in social proximity. The more good women moving through your social network, the better. This means changing your lifestyle, social circles, and activity level. Some places are going to be much better than others; search for the places and social circles with the most good women. Good traditional churches, hobby groups, friend circles, parties, family networks, charity organizations, where you live, even dating apps. Whatever you have or can get should be used.
>
> Spotted. You need to keep an active lookout for good women, so that you actually notice them. You're screening for the more visible factors: is she pretty, is she young, is she feminine, how does she dress, is she of your people, how does she carry herself, does she look virtuous, what does her social interaction look like, who is she associating with?

That's the extent of his advice, which may have as well been cribbed from the Art of Manliness. He missed a great opportunity to share how he met his wife and what the process was like, but instead kept it so general that it gives little in the way of action items. I'm forced to guess that he met his wife at church for her to hit all the traditional notes.

A few months ago, I started researching churches in my area, not to meet women but to put myself in a more spiritual environment. I also researched local ways to volunteer to help others, since my stay-at-home internet job doesn't put me into contact with many people. I haven't yet pulled the trigger, since I fell back into old game habits after a recent break-up, but if inserting myself into these environments puts me into contact with traditional women, and getting into relationships with them becomes a rational choice with little friction that is encouraged by my most immediate surroundings and society at large, I would certainly pursue it.

However, I will not attempt Perilloux's "will to power" strategy because I'm too red pilled to put on the blinders for a singular goal that I'm not absolutely convinced is worth it in the end, no matter how open I am to fatherhood.

I also know firsthand that will alone is not enough, and will lead to easy-come-easy-go scenarios where things flag off if my will is reduced, like is so often the case when meeting a girl through cold approaching. This isn't to say that I'm not willing to put in work, but as I've painfully learned, it takes a village to maintain a relationship, because even if I do everything right, things can still go south.

If these times make it too sick to create a family through rational means then I won't create a family, though I would certainly wish the likes of Perilloux luck and observe from a distance to see how he created his marriage safe space away from the evils around him.

In the end, we have to be careful about taking advice from men who have a sample size of one marriage. It's easy to create rigorous models for game because you can develop your theories from sleeping with hundreds of women and tease the patterns from that, but you can't have more than one successful marriage. There is just too much variance between one man and another when it comes to such an advanced goal, which is why I think we will never have solid information on finding a wife in a dying civilization. This is a problem that you'll have to figure out on your own, assuming you even want to.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: What I've Learned About Women From My Long-Term Relationships

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Inventor Of “Degenerate” Playboy Lifestyle Hugh Heffner Dies At Age 91

September 28, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Daily Mail:

Hugh Hefner, the founder of Playboy, has died aged 91.

Hefner was born on April 9, 1926 in Chicago, Illinois, and went on to become a millionaire after founding the influential men’s magazine in 1953.

On Wednesday night the official Playboy Twitter account announced: ‘American Icon and Playboy Founder, Hugh M. Hefner passed away today. He was 91. #RIPHef’.

Hefner’s death was confirmed in a statement from Playboy Enterprises that said he ‘passed away today from natural causes at his home, The Playboy Mansion, surrounded by loved ones.’

Hefner’s son, Cooper Hefner, who is also the chief creative officer of Playboy Enterprises, said: ‘My father lived an exceptional and impactful life as a media and cultural pioneer and a leading voice behind some of the most significant social and cultural movements of our time in advocating free speech, civil rights and sexual freedom.

‘He defined a lifestyle and ethos that lie at the heart of the Playboy brand, one of the most recognizable and enduring in history.

‘He will be greatly missed by many, including his wife Crystal, my sister Christie and my brothers David and Marston, and all of us at Playboy Enterprises.’

It has also been reported that Hefner’s wife Crystal Harris will inherit nothing after signing an ironclad prenup before their wedding and was never added to his will.

Read the entire article

Read Next: Porfirio Rubirosa: The Last Playboy

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

5 Old But Awesome Weapons That Have Not Been Made Obsolete

September 28, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

If there is anything that Hollywood has taught us with their relentless sequels, remakes, and feminazi updates of beloved classic films, newer does not necessarily equate to a superior product. As strange as it may seem at first glance, certain pieces of military hardware also fit into this same category.

Like with modern Hollywood blockbusters, the speed, visuals, and “fireworks” of newer military machines are not always technically more impressive. Newer military technology often merely complements older hardware, not fully replacing it.

This article will show five pieces of military equipment older than 45 years that are still satisfactorily performing their intended duties in the 2010’s. They will be presented from newest to oldest.

1. F-15 Eagle (1972)

Since 1972, video games have gone from ‘Pong‘ to ‘Grand Theft Auto V‘. But the F-15 Eagle’s airframe and ordinance is still largely unchanged.

The McDonnell Douglas F-15 Eagle is a tactical fighter aircraft which was designed in the late 1960’s (with it’s first fully functional flights attained in 1972) to gain and maintain ~~white~~ air supremacy and oppress all other (presumably Marxist or Muslim) fiends of the 1970’s sky who dared to seek ‘equality’. This jet-powered toy box of destruction is like the Floyd Mayweather of fighter aircraft, currently undefeated in aerial combat with over 100 victories to zero losses in over 40 years of service among several national air forces.

Though technologically surpassed by the stealth enhanced F-22 Raptor in the USAF, the Eagle nonetheless remains a fast and fearsome weapon, and the United States military is reluctant to send an excess amount of F-15’s either to the scrapheap or the Arizona Boneyard until the 2030’s. It’s long length of service, along with it’s flawless air-to-air kill ratio, means that this will probably go down in history as the best overall fighter jet ever produced.

2. M61 Vulcan (1959)

The M61 Vulcan is a six-barrel rotary cannon which has been dishing out 6,000 rounds per minute (yup, no typo there) of 20mm mayhem since 1959, or before most Americans had ever even heard of John F. Kennedy. Though typically attached to fixed-wing aircraft for practical purposes (high velocity aircraft require a high velocity rate of fire), the Vulcan is best known to the general public for it’s extreme overkill usage in ground combat by action movie stars Jesse Ventura in Predator, and Arnold Schwarzenegger in Terminator 2.

Clearly if you want to transition from being an action hero to a state governor, you had better have experience with “old painless”, the same exact M61 which was used in both films. Don’t worry, you are in no rush, because there is nothing on the horizon which looks to replace this weapon for it’s intended purpose.

Note: If the U.S. domestic terrorist organization “Black Lives Matter” took possession of an M61 Vulcan, there would be a lot more police casualties in this scene compared to the 0.0 inflicted by the Terminator.

3. B-52 Stratofortress (1952)

The B-52 Stratofortress or “BUFF” (Big Ugly Fat Fucker) and its gifts to ISIS

2017 marks the 65th maiden flight birthday of the Stratofortress, and this grandpa aircraft has absolutely no intention of going on medicaid and calling it quits for some time to come. This Cold War era bombers long operational range, giant payload capability, and relatively low operating costs will keep it alive as a major player in U.S. military power until 2045, an incredible 90 years after it’s formal introduction to the USAF in 1955.

From Chuck Berry to a hypothetical President Chelsea Clinton (please Lord don’t make it happen), the B-52 will have seen it all by the time it’s finally due to turn the engines off for good. Impressive, and at the same time somewhat disconcerting that we seem to have long reached a technological apex in aircraft capabilities.

4. AK-47 (1946)

Designed towards the end of ‘The Great Patriotic War’ (Russia’s name for World War II), the AK-47 was intended to serve nationally as a local answer to Nazi Germany’s StG 44 (the world’s first assault rifle), as well as fulfill Mikhail Kalashnikov’s personal wish to deter any future conquests of his homeland; essentially, to achieve “peace through superior firepower".

So far his plan has worked in staving off another Napoleon or (literally) Hitler type from invading Russia, but the AK-47 has hardly been the bringer of peace to just about any other part of the globe. The weapons raw killing power, ease of use, and reliability in less than ideal conditions has made it the world's most popular assault rifle, now over 70 years since it was first showcased in 1946.

It is likely to be seen around the world on a regular basis, in conflicts big and small, for many decades to come.

5. M114 Howitzer (1942)

Capitalist Taiwan and South Korea still maintain M114 howitzers in their arsenal to help protect their countries from their belligerent Communist blood brothers, China and North Korea.

The World War II era M114 Howitzer has continued to remain in circulation for more years than many men can expect to draw breath on this Earth—75 years and counting.

While it has now been twice surpassed in overall performance and mobility by the U.S. army's M198 (1979) and now the M777 (2005), the artillery pieces long range and high degree of accuracy (when provided with precise coordinates) means that many other armed forces around the world see no inherent need to retire whatever M114 arsenals they possess. Several advanced countries like South Korea and Taiwan are no exception.

One day, somewhere and someplace, the M114 will fire it's final shell. But until that day comes, a piece of World War II military equipment which is still deemed practical for bombarding a fixed position in the 2010's is quite a claim to fame.

Read Next: The True Story Of A Carousel-riding Military Wife

John Carver

John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

How The Concept Of Legitimate Government Has Changed From Antiquity To The Present Day

September 28, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Governments, be they enlightened or otherwise, generally provide justifications for their rule. Despotic regimes don't really need rationales beyond "We're in charge, obey or else". However, in practice, even tyrants go through the motions. A "People's Democratic Republic" might not quite be a bastion of freedom, but they'll sure talk a good game of it. The notion of legitimate government has its uses, even when reduced to a myth.

In ancient days, the rulers (kings, nobility, and priests) led society. The warriors were below them, carrying out the nation's first duties: to defend the people and keep public order. The producers (everyone else) formed the third class. Plato wrote the book about this tripartite top-down structure. Modern scholarship has noted that this was universal in Indo-European societies. India developed it further yet.

The concept of legitimacy argues that a regime has moral authority, while discouraging backstabbing and promoting obedience. The ruling class must believe the king deserves the job. The warriors must obey His Pudgy Majesty's officers unquestioningly, and not contemplate regime change. The producers must remain motivated to keep working, obeying the law, and paying taxes.

Despite this cynical perspective, the tripartite arrangement works. It's essentially how all countries function. The degree of freedom—from the Libertarian ideal to an Orwellian dictatorship—all depends on how it's implemented. No alternatives exist, other than half-baked utopian schemes like anarchy.

Legitimacy in history

Among cavemen, the strongest hunter probably called the shots. Thrasymachus in Plato's Republic argued for that harsh pragmatism. When tribal societies emerged, the chief was a hereditary job.

During the dawn of civilization, nations were emerging. Agriculture began providing a fairly steady food supply for the masses. People figured out how to bake clay into bricks and stack them together. City-states in Egypt coalesced into the northern and southern kingdoms, and by about five thousand years ago, they united under a single Pharaoh. Around the same time, Mesopotamia and China came onto the world stage. Other nations arose over the centuries, all ruled by monarchs who amassed great wealth and power.

This presented a particular problem. Imagine a peasant villager talking politics: "We're dirt farmers living in mud huts. Meanwhile, the King lives in this huge palace with golden furnishings. He has dozens of wives, concubines, and slave boys. He makes lousy decisions and taxes our loincloths off. This incompetent weakling hasn't worked a day in his life, and his toadies are no different. Really, what makes this douchebag so special?"

The ruling class needed to give the public a compelling reason to kiss their asses. Sometimes "obey or else" isn't enough.

Divine right

Early on, some rulers set themselves up as deities. This wasn't discouraged by the priestly class that also rode the aristocratic gravy train. This didn't mean the monarch could pull off cool stuff like walking on water or levitation. However, what mattered was the public at least paying lip service to the notion.

The Egyptians took it pretty seriously back in the day. The Romans knew the Imperial Cult was baloney, but still had to go through the motions, a major sore point in monotheistic Judea. During heathen times, the Anglo-Saxon kings sometimes traced their lineage to divine ancestors. After all, who dares challenge Woden's great grandkid?

During Christian times, that stuff didn't fly any more. So the story changed: kings ruled by God's will. To obey the king—even if he was a royal asshat—was to obey God, and rebellion was a sin. The Catholic Church certainly encouraged this message, and also had significant political power. To symbolize divine sanction, bishops and sometimes Popes presided at coronations (though Napoleon spoiled the party). Biblical references like the following encouraged the notion:

> And he changeth the times and the seasons: he removeth kings, and setteth up kings: he giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to them that know understanding:
> —Daniel 2:21

This leads to a conundrum. This concept of divine destiny means that God put fruitcakes like Ivan the Terrible, Idi Amin, Kim Jong Un, and Justin Trudeau in office. Couldn't God pick better leaders? In contrast, in the Chinese concept of the Mandate of Heaven, divine approval is contingent on the rulers acting responsibly.

So throughout this time, legitimacy meant that the king would be the eldest son of the previous king. How did the dynasty's first king get in charge? Usually he was whichever chieftain last took over the place. Saying it's all God's will sounds much better.

Popular sovereignty

Militant radical extremists in 1776

Age of Enlightenment philosophers came up with several new ideas, such as limited government, separation of powers, the rights of man, and rule by the people. Democracy existed at times in ancient Greece and Rome, but otherwise was largely unknown for centuries. By this standard, legitimate government means that the people are in charge.

The early USA's success showed that representative government could work. The electorate now chose their rulers, directly or indirectly. Religion (the updated priesthood) was still a powerful force in the moral sphere, but lacked political control. Meanwhile, government stayed out of their hair. Following this proof of concept, eventually kings were deposed or reduced to figureheads. By the mid-20th century, monarchy was washed up, with the sole major exception of Saudi Arabia.

Those preferring "throne and altar" traditionalism consider the Age of Enlightenment a big mistake where everything started going to hell. Granted, monarchy had some positive attributes, and made sense when commoners were mostly illiterate. Back then, lords were lords and peasants were peasants, but nobody was an atomized consumer tagged with a damn Social Security number and spied on nine ways from Sunday.

Still, we needn't throw out the baby with the bathwater. If done properly, representative democracy has clear benefits. The people have investment in their government. Bad politicians can be voted out. It's regime change without all the hassle, at least theoretically.

Ideological government

During the 20th century, Communism and Fascism emerged as major players. In a way, these were the realizations of Plato's "philosopher king" concept. In Communism, legitimacy means the Dictatorship of the Proletariat. (The Party defined itself as the Will of the People, naturally.) Fascism is basically populism on steroids, with the nation's interests in first place. Both had big government strategies, ham-fisted propaganda, and lousy human rights records. All this was considerably more so for Communism in actual fact, though Fascism has a worse reputation for fairly obvious reasons.

The fortunes of war were the downfall of Fascism. Perhaps better diplomacy could've avoided this, though opposition from the League of Nations made this difficult. Also, globalism was emerging, which opposes nationalism. The downfall of Communism was their goofy economic system. Former Communist nations still struggle to recover. Neither ideology remains a major player in pure form. However, both inspired some derivative ideologies, some better and some worse.

Globalism

Business interests tampering with American statecraft is nothing new. However, the most prominent powerbrokers form an international clique. During the early 20th century, this ultra-wealthy coterie attained great power.

Surprisingly, they were fairly chummy with Communism despite the "Dictatorship of the Proletariat" business. Some even wired the Bolsheviks heaps of cash during the Russian Revolution. In the USA, they were quite influential by FDR's administration. Eventually they had their fingers in both major parties and the Deep State. One small example of "Shadow Government" influence is Wall Street selecting Obama's Cabinet.

As for religion, its influence is greatly diminished from times past. However, the mass media—The System's propaganda arm—takes its place. The celebrities and pop culture figures it promotes are its priesthood. Most are nauseatingly leftist (or at least know who signs their paychecks) and serve the power structure headed by the globalists. Academia also fills a priestly role, lending some gravitas.

A surprising number of prominent figures have spoken glowingly of the "New World Order". The public considered this as sinister as hell, so euphemisms were substituted, like "global governance" and "international cooperation". The goal is to erase borders gradually. In practice, this means free trade, mass immigration for population replacement, and transferring sovereignty to unelected bureaucrats. However, the way they describe it sounds pretty darn warm and fuzzy.

Plutocratic billionaires pull strings behind the scenes by buying politicians, a hazard of the open nature of democracy. Their favorite hobbies are social engineering, subverting governments, and golf. Unfortunately, many of our would-be rulers are sickos with a God complex. Worse, they've settled on cultural Marxism for a ruling ideology, and practice its script of continual destabilization. They live like kings and seek to make everyone else peasants.

They’ve subverted our society’s legitimate basis of government. Managed democracy is not democracy. What right do they have to do this? Really, what makes these douchebags so special?

Read More: How A Small Cabal Is Using Socialism & Cultural Marxism To Consolidate World Power

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Millionaire Oxford Girl Is “Too Bright” To Go To Jail After Stabbing And Assaulting Her Boyfriend

September 29, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Just as Return Of Kings predicted in June, Oxford medical student Lavinia Woodward has dutifully received her pussy pass, with a British judge sparing her from jail. This is despite her breaking her bail conditions by texting her victim, whom she had stabbed and assaulted with various physical objects. She was handed a very measly ten-month suspended prison sentence by Judge Ian Pringle QC.

Using the typical trope of having a former boyfriend who “abused” her, plus pleas of “immaturity,” “mental illness,” and “I have a drug addiction,” Woodward walked from the courtroom a free woman. Even in a world where we should be used to female privilege, particularly in the legal system, her preferential treatment is more than worthy of a second article here.

Whilst men across the Western world, in the United States most of all, are punished for very fabulist, wholly unproven claims of “rape” and banned from campus forever, Oxford University is still yet to decide whether to throw Lavinia Woodward from her medical studies. She was found guilty months ago, not by a university panel or tribunal, but by a court. If you needed a single case study to illustrate how universities are so openly dismissive of men’s due process and overindulgent towards poorly-behaving women, here it is.

Judge Ian Pringle QC emphasized how reluctant he was to “ruin” Lavinia Woodward’s career prospects.

Having hired a lawyer who matches her family’s social status, one of the leading (and most expensive) criminal law barristers in England, James Sturman QC, Woodward was in a highly favorable position from the very beginning. Her family’s extremely affluent financial status only compounded the female privilege she already enjoyed.

Meanwhile, what about all the people from the working and middling classes, most of them men, who end up being jailed for similar or even far less serious actions?

That poor, poor daughter of millionaires!

While Lavinia Woodward spends her time at idyllic vacation destinations, or simply lives her normal life of luxury in Italy, other university students slave away without resorting to drug-taking or criminal violence.

Here’s a quick, non-exhaustive recap of Lavinia Woodward’s extraordinary life of privilege:

- her father is a multimillionaire senior oil company executive;

- she often lives in a royal-like villa in northern Italy, which is owned by her mother;
- she attended the Sir James Henderson British School of Milan, where fees cost at least the equivalent of $20,000 annually, in addition to all the other expenditures (Swiss ski trips etc) associated with such a prestigious institution;
- while many university students slave away at menial part-time jobs to make ends meet, she is noted for taking $1,400 Chanel designer handbags to class; and
- at the time of her sentence deferral mid-year, it was revealed she was presently subject to a mandatory drug-testing regime at the insistence of her college at Oxford, Christ Church, which was supposedly ready to expel her if she did not comply (ROK still doubts the "ready" part).

Life may not become totally perfect when your family's wealth bestows this kind of existence on you, but Lavinia Woodward has a far better life than 99.9% of us, whether male, female, black, white, liberal, or conservative. This is no ghetto girl whose life of want and severe poverty made her do what she did.

Worst of all, Woodward still has a fighting chance of qualifying as a surgeon. Yet if we were chronic drug addicts, domestic violence aficionados, and just generally unbalanced like this girl is, those of us from regular, middle-class backgrounds would entertain absolutely no prospects of being recognized as surgeons, lawyers, or members of other higher-rung professions.

Sadly, I can envision a very financially rewarding future for Woodward as a medical professional, due to the fact that the powers-that-be are demanding more female surgeons, software engineers, and "scientists" no matter the cost. If she achieves her goal, future male colleagues will probably white-knight for her ad nauseam, ignoring her inevitable emotional outbursts and even serious mistakes at work.

While you walk on eggshells in life, the Lavinia Woodwards of the world can do what they want and face no consequences

On the plus side, Lavinia Woodward's drug-taking and possibly karma are making her age very badly.

You can be a perfectly able (and overqualified) male candidate for a job and not get the position, simply because you're male and a mentally erratic Lavinia Woodward should take your place. If you're on a college campus right now, you are automatically branded a potential or even likely rapist due to your genitalia. But a woman with a proven history of violence and unhinged behavior can expect a flood of sympathy and be given chance after chance, despite coming from a very wealthy social background that indicates she has zero excuse for such antics.

Life for modern males is very much analogous to walking on eggshells. Through no wrong of your own you can and will be punished. At the same time, those with actual things to apologize for, many or most of them women, will perpetually have their actions excused and totally glossed over.

Who said 21st century life was fair?

Read More: Judge: Female Medical Student Who Stabbed Man Is "Too Intelligent and Pretty" For Jail

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 Words Liberals Use As Weapons To Destroy Western Society

September 29, 2017 | by JD McGuigan | Link | Original Link

A very bombastic yet very intelligent, sharp, and witty radio talk show host named Michael Savage refers to the left's war on American values as an assault on our "borders, language, and culture." I don't think any individual pundit or commentator has more accurately summed up this great divide in just three simple words.

The attack on our language in particular is a very dangerous, albeit effective tactic – it is a battle among the intellectuals within the larger war against our borders and culture, a war which expands and encompasses the wider range of both the educated and non-educated on both sides of the debate. That is to say it does not take an educated man to notice the attack on our borders and culture, but the same cannot be said for such a calculated attack on our language.

The English language is a beautiful and intricate one. For non-native speakers it is difficult to learn, and many American citizens graduating with college degrees still cannot write an effective thesis in their own native language. As such, it is impossible to overstate how disconcerting this is, for the majority of the population is not keenly aware that their language has been hijacked and is being compromised on the daily. Words have very little meaning anymore, and great orators of our generation – men like Alan Watts, Christopher Hitchens, and other grandmasters of the spoken word are undoubtedly turning in their graves over what is happening today.

Here are a few examples of how the left has invented new words or hijacked existing ones in an attempt to redefine them to suit their agenda:

“Islamophobia”

> “A persistent, irrational fear of a specific object, activity, or situation that leads to a compelling desire to avoid it.” – Dictionary.com

There is no such thing as an irrational fear of or aversion to Islam. With regard to the specific tenets of the Quran and the Hadiths, a fear of these ideas being exported to your country is incredibly rational. Furthermore, an aversion to stoning women for adultery, throwing homosexuals from rooftops, or beheading apostates seems not only rational, but noble. One could make a strong argument that being anti-Islam is a synonym for being pro-human rights.

The word “Islamophobia” is a ploy – a propaganda word used by Islamists who believe it should be illegal to criticize Islam, in order to deter infidels from doing so publicly. As Marco Rubio said, let’s dispel this notion that those who use this word don’t know what they’re doing. They exactly what they’re doing, as they are often lawyers, professors, and people of above average intelligence.

We would all agree that discomfort merely with seeing a Hindu or Sikh family on your flight could be a genuine display of intolerance, but what the “Islamophobia” crowd have done is deliberately conflate generic bigotry towards brown-skinned people with opposition to Islamic doctrine. This is very dangerous because of the potential for a slippery-slope progression. Yesterday it was drawing Muhammad, today it is criticizing Islam, and tomorrow it is being a non-Muslim.

“Rape”

I just can't even.

> "Unlawful sexual intercourse or any other sexual penetration of the vagina, anus, or mouth of another person, with or without force, by a sex organ, other body part, or foreign object, without the consent of the victim." – Dictionary.com

Do you notice the qualifier of penetration?

We all know about the universally discredited myth which claims 1 in 5 women are the victims of "sexual assault" on college campuses, but let's break it down. Apparently, a study was done in 2007 that concluded the aforementioned assertion. This outlandish and intrinsically flawed study polled an extremely small sample of women, and were deliberate about wording the questions in the vaguest, broadest terms possible.

The study only interviewed 5,446 women across two universities, and included incredibly subjective questions such as:

> "Were you unable to provide consent or stop what was happening because you were passed out, drugged, drunk, incapacitated or asleep?"
>
> "Can you discuss sexual encounters that you think (but are not certain) happened?"

The first step was to blur the lines between rape, a very specific term, and sexual assault, a much broader and slightly less severe term. The second step was to broaden the definition of "sexual assault" so as to include crude comments, unwanted touching of the hair or shoulders, and even consensual sex between two drunken adults that resulted in female "buyer's remorse" the next day. The third step was the blur the definition of consent such that a woman's expectation to act responsibly were far lower than a man's, while her word in a court of law meant much more than his.

Once the phrase “sexual assault” was diluted of all meaning and it was made interchangeable with rape, this allowed proctors of the study to double down on their confirmation bias and assert that 1 in 5 women were effectively raped on US college campuses, painting on unconscionable picture of all men as “potential rapists” and the American campus as more dangerous than ISIS territory for a young woman.

“Racism”

> “A belief that race is the primary determinant of human traits and capacities and that racial differences produce an inherent superiority of a particular race.” – Dictionary.com

Dating back to the 1970’s, the far-left has hijacked the word “racism” so as to include vague inferences to “power”. This is an extension of “critical race theory”, which was made popular by a handful of black male and (mostly obese) white female college professors. It has retained a pulse due to modern-day race hustlers like Marc Lamont Hill and Michael Eric Dyson alluding to it constantly during their weekly word salad on CNN/MSNBC.

This alternative definition with strong implications of “power” is not a mainstream definition outside of radical leftist university classrooms or commentator panels at said “news” stations, but as the far-left grows and becomes more vocal, this definition is shouted louder and more vociferously from megaphones with every passing year.

These vague inferences to “power” are typically accompanied by other liberal buzzwords like “institutional” and “systemic.” These words are also intentionally broad and typically rely on philosophical tropes, alluding to how the effects of slavery are “intractable” even 160 years later. These race hustlers have to fall back on ancient platitudes absent any abundance of specific examples today. Note that a few instances of systemic racism (the Ferguson police department's emails) are not ample evidence to convict of an entire country of 330 million people of "systemic racism".

The purpose is simple: to give the impression that white people have a monopoly on racism. It gives non-whites carte blanche to take their anti-white racism as far as they want to, because by definition they can never be racist. Forget tens of millions of white people living in poverty while we are one election removed from a black President and black Attorney General, but even terrorists loosely affiliated with Black Lives Matter "cannot be racist" because they don't benefit from these invisible, so-called discriminatory "systems", all of which were abolished in the 1960's.

I have been waiting for the longest time for someone to ask Marc Lamont Hill, Michael Eric Dyson, or Shaun "Talcum X" King whether white people can be racist in South Africa where they are facing a genocide, or in Zimbabwe where by government edict they cannot own land. I am still waiting.

"Nazi"

> "A member of the National Socialist German Workers' Party, which controlled Germany from 1933 to 1945 under Adolf Hitler" – Dictionary.com

There are very few Nazis still living. Many of them are in their 90's and are being prosecuted all over the globe for the war crimes they committed seven decades ago.

There is indeed a resurgent movement of Neo-Nazis in the West, largely as a response to this global attack on our borders, language, and culture. Neo-Nazis represent a deeply extreme perversion of what we affectionately refer to as "Western culture". They are absolutists and totalitarian in their ways, which separates them from the rest of conservatives.

These individuals were marginalized and banished to the fringes of society where they belonged. People like David Duke had not been heard from in twenty years, until CNN resurrected him as a weapon to maul Trump with during the primaries. The white supremacist movement as a whole was dug out of obscurity by Antifa, who needed an enemy to punch. These Neo-Nazis are throwbacks that share the ideology of the National Socialists, but they are not Nazis. They are Nazi imposters and not nearly as dangerous or intimidating as the original version, as much as they wish they were.

There is a broad spectrum of bigotry on the far-right, and not every conservative is someone like Richard Spencer. However, the far-left has gone nuclear with the phrase "Nazi" on nearly everyone this side of the 50 yard line. It was quite a stretch to call Milo Yiannopoulos, a homosexual who prefers black men a Neo-Nazi, but the left lost all remaining credibility when calling people like Ben Shapiro and Sam Harris Nazis. Shapiro is an Orthodox Jew, Harris is a liberal atheist, and both are ardent supporters of the state of Israel. The day these men were called Nazis for the first time was the day irony died.

These examples are not the only four I can think of, but if you ever find yourself in a public debate and one of these words is used in the aforementioned context, respectfully point out that there can be no discourse until both sides show respect to the language we've all agreed upon. And if they insist, make sure they understand that deploying the extraordinary luxury of redefining words at will just might be their non-white privilege talking.

Read more: This May Be The Fastest Way To Learn A Language

JD McGuigan
JD is a 27 year old travel bum who jumps from job to job recklessly usually just before getting fired. He is also the author of a short e-book called The Pink Doughnut Phenomenon, which is a thesis on masculinity in the 9-5 workforce.

Sexbot Damaged And “Heavily Soiled” By Horny Men At Tech Conference

September 29, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

A display model version of Samantha, a popular high-tech sex robot, was damaged and “heavily soiled” by various men during a tech conference in Barcelona, Spain, this month, according to a report.

Samantha’s developer, Sergi Santos, claimed the men treated the sex robot “like barbarians,” broke two of her fingers, and left her “heavily soiled” at the Arts Electronica Festival.

This is a robot, not a real woman

“The people mounted Samantha’s breasts, her legs and arms… Two fingers were broken. She was heavily soiled,” declared Santos, who added that the sex robot had to be sent away for repairs and cleaning. “Samantha can endure a lot, she will pull through.”

Samantha, which retails for around $6,450, features an artificial G-spot, various modes of interaction, and voice-activation.

“You can touch Samantha in the hands, you can kiss Samantha, she likes to be kissed,” explained Santos earlier this year. “Normally she likes to be kissed always, and also she responds to, basically, the G-spot and also the breasts. She can also respond to the hands. So basically the hands are family, the romantic, the hips are family and romantic, and basically the spots where she feels sexy would be the mouth and the G-spot.”

She will never cheat on him

“She has a way of interacting, that initially she would like to be romantic, she would like to be family, and you get to a point that she wants to be sexual,” he continued. “The objective, the final objective of the sexual mode is to give her an orgasm.”

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: How Fast-Approaching Sexbot Technology Is Making Women Fearful

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

7 Influential Books About Power Published After The 19th Century

September 29, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Last week, I discussed several books from antique and modern times about power. For power is a whole aspect of life, something that impregnates our choices, our actions, our judgments, down from the opener we choose among several to get this particular girl look up from her smartphone up to career choices that could set the mark for the next ten years.

Some on the left say “nothing is neutral”, because everything is about power. Such a sweeping statement is grossly exaggerated and reflects an unhealthy adoration of power, it still contains a kernel of truth. Knowing where your power starts, where a legitimate power rules, and where you can take it back and how, is far from evident, and can only be discovered through experience and a long reflection.

Antique thinking is usually more broader, fuller, thicker than its modern counterpart. It sounds less like a lecture course and more like a support for meditation. For this reason, if you want to gain shrewdness, I strongly advise to start with Plato or Aristotle. However, these are by no means enough. Since these distinguished philosophers pondered times have changed much and we are faced with challenges men from Antiquity did not know about—or much less. Today, an important part of what we struggle with is related to money and cultural conflict. These aspects are more directly addressed by contemporary books.

As you will note, pioneers in these areas were barely our friends. Of the following works, only two out of seven have been written by individuals who could be considered more or less on our side, with serious doubts staining one of them. If we are to beat the Hollow Empire on its own ground, meeting with its most cunning agents is necessary, no matter the sourness of the experience. It is not as if they had produced the first bittersweet books after all.

1. Walter Lippmann's Public Opinion

"I am Chesterton without the mustache and the foreskin. Now hear (((me))) dwell on how people misthink."

Penned in the aftermath of the Great War by a Jewish journalist, Public Opinion said a lot about the "manufacture of consent" before the infamous Noam Chomsky was born. You know what you're up to when you crack the book open and meet with a quote of Plato's cave allegory in full at the outset. As a reminder, the cave allegory depicts clueless people whose outlook is limited by blinders and who are led to confuse shadows of puppets with real things.

Public Opinion makes a sharp distinction between two kinds of individuals: first, the "elite", the "expert", the "specialist", who has been trained and knows; second, the regular citizen, who is riddled with bias and prejudices and belongs in a "bewildered herd" in need for guidance. The public opinion, mostly shaped by the press day after day, is how the former guides the latter—for its own good, of course. (In a sequel book, The Phantom Public, Lippmann doubles down and draws an even more scathing picture of the Gentile average public.)

By criticizing the "unregulated" media and how people, when faced with incomplete or uncertain information, rely upon hypotheses, Lippmann explains how to manipulate people and justifies doing so. He distinguishes between a “real” world and a “pseudo-environment”, made of purported prejudice, superstition, stereotypes, myths and—you may have guessed—social constructs. The cool part, from Lippmann’s point of view, is that 1) the stupid goyim majority cannot tell the difference between truth and “social construction”, and 2) the pseudo-environment can be deconstructed, reconstructed, manipulated by those who know it exists and how to change it.

If you want to trace back the roots of the fake news media who loom over us today, Public Opinion is a must read, provided you can bear with Lippmann’s arrogant remarks about the “simpletons” or on how the girl next door should be dissected by a psychiatrist. In passing, you may note that hyped-up stuff like Daniel Kahneman’s work on “people’s bias” can easily be called on in support of a Lippmannian agenda.

2. Edward Bernays’ Propaganda

A nephew of Sigmund Freud, Edward Bernays would be to advertisement and discrete marketing campaigns what Lippman was to journalism. Bernays is indeed a pioneer in occult influence, indirect advertising, clever use of symbolism, spinning and other practices he would brand under the euphemistic expression of “public relations.”

Propaganda, Bernays’ most famous book, explains some of these methods, along with successful uses he made of them. For example, in 1915, he promoted a Russian troupe of ballet dancers by promoting their colorful costumes in fashion, pushing opinion pieces about dance, and provoking American men (troll bait: “are American men ashamed to be graceful?”).

Bernays is mostly known for his “torches of freedom” campaign. To expand the market of cigarettes, he teamed up with a psychoanalyst, (((Abraham Brill))), and corrupt journalists, and together they spun pseudo-spontaneous happenings by young women who would all smoke in public at the same time. Looks pretty much like Soros' Femens. More money for tobacco tycoons, more opportunity to spin a "progress" narrative for Leftists, less morals for everyone else.

Bernays also helped President Woodrow Wilson to betray his first election promise, namely that the US would not join the Great War, but managed to have another propagandist, George Creel, scapegoated in his place when this campaign was exposed as full of lies.

Reading Propaganda, one will notice how much Bernays tries to justify and regulate—in words—his own practice. In a democracy, it would be necessary that "our minds are molded, our tastes formed, our ideas suggested, largely by men we have never heard of." Well, perhaps freedom of speech for everyone encourages an arms race on the market place of ideas, yet Bernays conveniently forgets (((who))) started self-promoting and playing tough competition at a time when it was considered trespassing on someone else's territory.

3. Ayn Rand's Atlas Shrugged

Hardly in need of introduction to the American reader, Atlas Shrugged can be understood as a philosophical tale on personal and social power. Far from being the greedy bastards they are sometimes depicted as, the Hank Rearden, Francesco d'Anconia, Midas Mulligan et al. are heroic characters with a neat ethical code and sense of integrity. Full of masculine energy, they follow their callings, are self-controlled and strong-willed, develop abilities that make them able to thrive and contribute to the wellbeing of society. All are virtuous and some, like d'Anconia, are curious, even playful.

Tightly woven with the main characters' adventures is a true sense of genuineness. Hank Rearden could earn even more money than he already makes by associating with the corrupt government, but he does not. Midas Mulligan could keep investing cleverly as he does, but he'd rather scuttle his own empire than bow before an unfair judgment. John Galt could live in a mansion if he patented his Tesla-like motor, but instead he will spend years in a small flat, posing as a humble rail worker, so that he and other good-minded individuals manage to fix a world turned insane.

Atlas Shrugged is based on a sharp distinction between external goods, such as money and social status, and internal elements such as integrity and values. John Galt teaches all of his targets to abandon the former, no matter the suffering this implies, so that they can keep the latter. Only those who betrayed their own moral sense for a place inside the system, as Galt's former professor Robert Stadler, or those who seem like they never had any, will argue that integrity is but a social construction or that no one should be truly independent. Ayn Rand's depicting of the literati as a bunch of neurotic assholes willing to take over what they could never create is hilarious and, although it is sometimes simplistic, remains essentially truthful.

Sure, Atlas Shrugged has to be read with a huge grain of salt. Objectivism has no objection against feminism, heaps scorn upon family and race, and obviously encourages robber barons to do anything they please. Even then, Ayn Rand's main work remains infused with a constructive sense of life and a relevant analysis of important power relationships.

4. Saul Alinsky's Rules for Radicals

After books about journalism and advertising come the most infamous one ever written about politics. An agitator and rabble-rouser since the end of the 1930s, Saul Alinsky had more than thirty years of experience when he published the Rules for Radicals. This book has been covered twice on ROK, so I will only comment briefly on it.

Whereas Lippman's elitist, long-winded prose has a philosophical vibe that makes him look like a doppelganger of James Burnham, and while Bernays' book has this "40% advice, 40% stories, 20% bullshit" mark so typical of corporate-personal improvement stuff, Alinsky clearly writes to put his reader on a particular track. A master practitioner of pilpul, he manages to mix up a might-is-right stance close to Ragnar Redbeard's with a sanctimoniously Marxist tone. If you manage to bear with the Leftism-hammering part of his prose, Rules for Radicals explains many strategies any organizer or agitator can use in particular circumstances.

Stirring up grievances, emphasizing trivial or unimportant events while making actually important ones taboo, pressuring key individuals, rattling up a compromise through a war of attrition before abusing from it, making a particular target audience "pregnant with hope" in you while intimating another audience so that it stays out of the way are all strategies that Alinsky explains.

Rules for Radicals gives an insider view to the intricate workings of the Left, which still applies many of these strategies today. A reader on our side can also pick up some advice, especially since Alinsky have been an outsider to the parts of the establishment he was helping to lay off, just like we are now.

While reading this one I started thinking about how the Left tries to block us from imitating it. Our attempts to organize—legally—are always frantically scorned and repressed. Another example is how they managed to create a "courageous rebel" aura around their characters who faced repression whereas every red-pilled individual who rises gets reduced to a lowest common denominator and defamed. Clearly, the lukewarm conservatives Alinsky faced were nothing compared to the establishment we face. I guess it will make our victory all the more praiseworthy.

5. Esther Vilar's Manipulated Man

Esther Vilar in 1975

Issued in 1972, only one year after Alinsky's Rules, Vilar's Manipulated Man is completely different in all respects save perhaps the topic. Originally written in German, penned by a Jewish author, The Manipulated Man comes from a woman who became sick with how her sex plays the oppressed, frail, in need of help to extract free service from the other, i.e. men.

Just like judeocritical Jews are often the best critiques of their own background—think of Gilad Atzmon or Paul Gottfried—the rare breed of women who are too honest and good-natured to go along with the manipulative stance of their peers give valuable insights. Vilar was red-pill, manosphere-friendly before the words were coined.

In a clear style, she exposes the true character of feminists (aggressive, power-thirsty, always projecting their own character on the other, blaming everyone but themselves for their own misery), the daily exploitation of approach anxiety-ridden men, and how the hardest-working sex becomes more and more frail and forced into passive obedience whereas "stress-free" women become a driving force in politics.

In a single stroke, Vilar removes the veils of gallantry, white-knightism, and accusatory narrative-hammering of both feminists and the more moderated women. The Manipulated Man is as relevant today as in the 70s. It also gives a key view of the context nice guys of our generation have been raised in—a context that has nothing to see with patriarchy.

In several ways, The Manipulated Man is like Herrnstein's and Murray's The Bell Curve: it sold much, but only "behind closed doors" would the authors receive support, and upfront, they would face heavy-handed media defamation and death threats.

6. Robert Greene's 48 Laws

Having gained personal experience of power dynamics through working at Hollywood, Greene used his passion for history and writing talent to create the 48 Laws of Power. The result was a best-seller. Honestly, its success was deserved.

Greene's "laws" are general rules that apply more or less in many power relationships. Some of the rules always apply, some are more context-related, all of them help to gauge a particular situation and know what is going on. The 48 Laws have a very nice layout, tell stories on an upbeat tone, and interpret them both elegantly and deeply. As this book has become a classic, with innumerable sources quoting it, I would advise you to get a cheap used copy if you haven't already cracked it open.

7. Ryan Holiday's Trust Me, I'm Lying

Note Holiday's repressed Alt-Righter haircut

To end this list comes a version 2.0 of Edward Bernays. A college dropout, Ryan Holiday understood (1) how the "big names" of mainstream Internet media were taking their stories from smaller bloggers, and (2) how to bribe bloggers. Trust Me, I'm Lying hilariously explains how Holiday triggered feminists to have them promoting a crappy movie without even knowing why, or how he flattered and bribed female Instagramers so that they would make "free" advertising for American Apparel. Gawker and Jezebel get exposed as unethical, scandal-seeking, brain-unplugging outlets.

When it comes to justifying the book, Holiday says he eventually grew disgusted with all the deceit around and opted for spilling the beans. One should be wary with this kind of display. Many offenders try to turn their bad reputation upside down by claiming loudly that they shifted to a road to Damascus. Nevertheless, it is very much possible that Holiday became genuinely disgruntled because he is not Jewish.

He depicts (chapter 14) Andrew Breitbart as a "media manipulator" who never grew weary or morally disrupted by what he was doing. Perhaps at least some non-Jews cannot imitate the "chosen people" all the way down without feeling like they are betraying themselves to the bone.

Trust Me, I'm Lying suffers from a liberal bias in the choice of some of its examples. Mentioning Breitbart, Holiday basically accuses "angry Republicans" of the mischiefs SJWs are actually doing, and shows sympathy to undeservedly promoted blacks whereas he does not show any for SJW-targeted dissenters. It also becomes repetitive after a while. Still, it is a very good book for a twenty-something's, and it can be seen as an applied version of Bernays' craft.

Conclusion

Power over oneself and social power are two different things. Someone can quietly enjoy the former and live a good, happy life, without much of the second, whereas someone who enjoys a lot of the second kind of power may bring ruin to himself and others by acting like an entitled crybaby. In any case, social power today all too easily turns into something disgusting. For often one must craft a picture, a public appearance of oneself which at bottom is deceitful.

Being honest with the normie, brainwashed masses, or with the crooks looming over us is like casting pearls before swine. Understanding Leftism, or the System, or women, and seeing past the endless new façades is liberating. But the very fact that we must sometimes act on a Machiavellian way feels disturbing. And yet we don't have the choice—game is just about that, and the masses must be told with "pedagogy", i.e. in a crafty way, to be steered in the right direction. Andrew Breitbart had to be Breitbart to red pill a much wider public than Vdare or ROK.

To get more social power, we have to be creative and flexible, to come unexpected. Never compromise, though, on the fundamentals. Ayn Rand had this right and Julius Evola did, too. Taking up this wording, this role, this cause and so on does not necessarily mean deep agreement with it. As we could say many cases, "it is not that simple." And even then, I got a stomach pain while reading Alinsky's Rules, and a second time later when I went through Holiday disingenuously painting himself as a liberal truth-teller—which seems rather paltry just considering the title of his book.

Apart from Atlas Shrugged, all the books mentioned here are sour to some extent, and perhaps dwelling much in them could be considered as a katabasis after which the sacred texts only appear more illuminating and rejuvenating.

Read Next: Are Proles The Useful Idiots Of A Two Centuries Old Elite Plan?

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

The Great Siege Of Malta

September 30, 2017 | by Lord Baron | Link | Original Link

Soldiers of the Ottoman Empire were routed on September 11, 1565 in what came to be known as “The Great Siege of Malta”. They were humiliated and forced to retreat from what was supposed to be an epic campaign of conquest for the greater glory of Allah, the Merciful. Was it a coincidence that Islamic terrorists chose the same date to destroy the twin towers in New York?

Let us start from the beginning. The Knights of Saint John, or Knights Hospitallier, were originally a religious order founded in the 12th Century in the Holy Land. Their mission was to care for the pilgrims who entered the Holy Land, and defend them from any threats on the perilous road to Jerusalem. They were a religious as well as a military order, created under a papal charter, which meant that they answered to no one but the Pope.

Fast forward four centuries. The Knights still lead a never-ending struggle against the forces of Islam. The Crusades were ancient history. The people had all but forgotten them. The Knights of St John were considered obsolete relics of a bygone age. Other orders of Crusaders, such as the Templars, had been extinct for more than two centuries.

The Knights of St. John had been forced from their Fortress in Rhodes in 1522, and for a while were homeless, until they laid claim to the Island of Malta, which was given to them by the Holy Roman Emperor, Charles V, grandson of Fernando de Aragon (Machiavelli's model of a ruler in "The Prince"). Fernando had expelled the Moors from Spain after eight centuries of invasion, and Charles V himself led a lifelong struggle against the Crescent and Star.

The Grand Master of the Order of St. John, Jean Parisot de la Valette, was 71 years old at the time. He had a personal stake against the Muslims, having been a knight since he was 18, participating in fights against Islam throughout his whole life. His family had served in five different crusades, with distinction, and he was raised with tales of their epic bravery. He had been defeated and expelled from Rhodes years earlier, and had even been a galley slave to the Muslims for a year, rowing up to 20 hours a day, before escaping and swearing revenge.

The Knights survived by raiding Ottoman naval trade routes and basically making life impossible for the Turks. The knights were hardened warriors, great sailors, and pious men. Most of them were the 2nd or 3rd sons of aristocracy, refined noblemen with no inheritance. They were considered the most formidable fighting force in Europe, and were indeed elite in every sense.

Suleiman's Desire

Since its foundation in the 7th century, Islam had wanted to achieve one feat: invade Europe. These primitive, desert dwelling barbarians had spent most of their history killing one another, until Mohammed united them against one common enemy: Western civilization.

The Ottoman leader, Suleiman "the Magnificent", was the most powerful man alive. His empire was ridiculously large, stretching from Vienna to Babylon, all the way to Aden, in the southernmost part of the Arabian Peninsula. His titles included Vice-Regent of God on Earth, Lord of the Lords of East and West, and even Possessor of men's necks, since he beheaded just about anyone who displeased him. But alas, such an empire was not enough. He had set his sights on Europe, and there was not a force on earth powerful enough to stop him. Or so he thought…

The Knights of St John had been a thorn in his side for long enough. They were massively effective at crippling Turkish operations from their new home in Malta, assaulting the Ottoman ships at sea. These western corsairs were led by the intrepid Romegas, a legendary Knight that had joined the order at age 15, and a close friend of La Valette's. Romegas was considered one of the greatest mariners of his time. He had taken lots of booty and several high-ranking prisoners on his sea raids, and Suleiman had enough. He decided to crush the Order of Knights, once and for all.

Assembling a massive army of 48,000 troops aboard 200 ships, among them elite, scimitar wielding janissaries called "The Invincible Ones" and drug-crazed layalars that wore the skins of wild beasts to battle. Their only concern in life was to slaughter Christians and die a glorious death, to be able to enter paradise and enjoy the 72 virgins promised to them by their prophet.

Who were their opposition? A mere force of 700 knights, keeping watch on a barren little island. Surely, they were no match for the Vice-Reagent of God on Earth. In March 1565, the Muslim fleet set out, determined to obliterate the Western world, and subjugate Europe under Islam's boot forever.

Alone and Surrounded

Surely enough, La Valette's intelligence warned him of the impending apocalypse, rapidly sailing directly towards him and his brave knights. He sent messengers to all of the European kings, asking for aid against the coming darkness. None answered, save one: Charles V of the Holy Roman Empire. A legendary bulwark against Islam, Charles promised assistance if they could hold out long enough. For the time being, it seemed, the Knights were on their own.

The Island of Malta had three main fortresses: The Fortress of St Angelo, St Michael and the recently constructed St Elmo, on the peninsula of Mount Sciberras. Both of them were solid structures, and even though they were nothing compared to their original fortifications on the island of Rhodes, they would have to do. La Valette devised a strategy to mount a defense as best as they could, but the situation for the Knights was quite bleak.

The fortifications of Malta

There were 700 knights defending the island, and around 8,000 Maltese soldiers. La Valette swore that there would be no retreat, no surrender. They gathered in a final prayer and braced themselves for the assault. It is said that after the prayer, all weakness disappeared from their hearts, and any petty animosities between them were dissolved. The power of faith made its presence felt.

La Valette, himself a man of deep faith, is said to have stated:

> It is the great battle of the Cross and the Quran which is now to be fought. A formidable army of infidels are on the point of invading our Island. We, for our part, are the chosen soldiers of the Cross, and if Heaven requires the sacrifice of our lives, there can be no better occasion than this.

He knew that this was not a fight he would win with brute force, if at all. Cunning, faith, and bravery were to be his tools for survival.

The Onslaught Begins

The first attack launched by the Ottomans was on St Elmo. Relentless artillery fire and waves of assaulting Ottomans rained upon the defenders. A mere 100 knights and 500 soldiers held the fort. They were commanded to fight to the last man. The Turks were confident they could take the fort in three days. Yet after weeks, the defenders were still battling on.

The defenders were quite ingenious, and devised all sorts of incendiary devices. They developed a primitive hand grenade consisting of a clay pot filled with the famous Greek Fire, a napalm-like substance. They hurled these towards their opponents with devastating effects: the shrapnel would explode and damage enemies by the dozens.

The knights invented large fire hoops, wooden rings wrapped in layers of flammable material, such as brandy, turpentine, gunpowder, and cloth, they would get ignited and be rolled downhill towards the Turks by the hundreds.

They also invented the Trump, a long hollow tube filled with flammable sulfur resin and linseed oil that, when lit, would spit fire for several meters for as long as half an hour. The Knights would use these primitive flamethrowers at strategic chokepoints, that would hold back any advance by the attackers. The Turks wore long robes, so being set on fire was quite devastating to them.

After weeks of fighting and being bombed, the defenders were malnourished, sleep deprived, and disfigured to the point of being unrecognizable. Many were gravely injured, limping badly, and bandaged in improvised cloths, but their conviction did not falter. They received reinforcements and supplies from the main fort of St Angelo, with the message from their Grandmaster to fight to the death.

To make matters worse, the arrival of Drajut, known amongst his men as “the drawn sword of Islam” and “the scourge of the Christians,” reinvigorated the Turkish forces. He brought another 1,500 of his elite warriors. The bombardment continued, and the Turks kept trying to charge into the fortress. Soon, a cannon splinter injured Drajut. He was dragged off to his tent. The drawn sword of Islam had met his end. Morale in the Turkish army began to falter.

Enraged, Mustapha Pasha, now commander, ordered the fort surrounded by the entire Turkish fleet. The largest of their cannons were moved to the front, and the defenders were pounded relentlessly. The latter gathered, said their prayers, and defiantly tolled the chapel bell for one last time. Those who couldn’t stand were sat in chairs, fully armed, their souls commended to their Lord Jesus.

The Turks poured in and finally the defenders were defeated. All of them were slaughtered, and Suleiman's Red Crescent was put in place of the flag of the Knights of St John. But they shuddered, for across the bay was the significantly larger and more impressive St Angelo. It had taken them four weeks to overrun the smaller fortress, and they had lost almost 10,000 men.

Terror Tactics

Mustapha Pasha knew that he had to break the defenders spirit, because he had seen how much their bodies could withstand. So, he ordered the deceased knight commanders to be decapitated. Their heads were put on pikes, and their headless bodies were sailed across the bay to the remaining defenders, fixed atop crude wooden crosses, a mockery of their faith. La Valette responded in kind. He ordered the Turkish prisoners decapitated, and shot their heads across the bay with their largest cannon. The message was clear: no retreat, no surrender.

The bombardment began. There was relentless shelling of the fortress, and an attack from the south side. The Turks were determined to take this little patch of land. Mustapha had a master plan: while the Christians were busy defending the south side, ten large ships with 1000 elite janissaries would storm the north end, but La Valette had prepared for this eventuality. He left Chevalier de Guiral with a 5-gun battery placed at the base of the fort. He could scarcely believe his eyes as the Turks sailed right into his trap.

At the ideal range, he ordered his men to open fire. Nine of the 10 boats were destroyed, 800 janissaries sunk into the water on the spot. Only one ship got away, and the frightened look in their eyes sent fear into the heart of the Muslims. The defenders opened the gate and charged out, and overwhelmed the attackers who ran for their lives.

St Angelo survived another day.

Mustapha surrounded the fortress, and continued bombarding the Christians. For over a week, all the Turkish guns thundered upon the defensive positions. The bombardment could be heard from Sicily, over 20 leagues (100 km) away, and the people there were awestruck that any man could survive such a hellfire.

The Turks renewed their attack and poured in from all sides. Victory would be theirs at last, it would seem. They breached the walls, but found themselves upon a second layer of fortifications. Cannon fire rained on them, and they were enclosed in a very effective death trap. After some time, the locals leaped from their defensive positions and forced the Turks to retreat. Again, they were defeated.

Several times the attackers breached the walls, but they were always met with effective funneling towards these kill zones, with an organized wall of pointed pikes and musket fire eager to greet them. La Valette himself grabbed his spear and led the charge several times to push back the attackers. Despite his advanced age, he was a brave and proficient fighter. The sight of their leader leading the attack, inspired the knights to hold back wave after wave of Turkish attackers, in several occasions where all hope seemed lost.

The Will of God

The death toll for the Muslims was catastrophic. Disease was rampant in their ranks, the corpses of friend and foe rotted all around them. Their supplies were running out, including gunpowder. Over 130,000 cannonballs were fired upon the Maltese defenders, in total. The summer heat was scorching them, and the water on the island had been poisoned by the locals before retreating. Their morale was fading. Rumors spread to the commanding officer's tent, of soldiers whispering "It is certainly not Allah's will that we take this forsaken island."

They tried all manners of stratagems to destroy the defenders. They tried digging tunnels, but the Knights collapsed them with mines of their own, and sent soldiers to fend off the tunnel makers.

Then, Mustapha prepared his siege tower, a massive behemoth, taller than even the ramparts of the fortress, to invade. But La Valette ordered his men to remove stone from the base of the walls, and fired upon the tower with huge cannons, containing two cannonballs held together by a chain. The strategy was massively effective and destroyed the tower utterly. The defenders cheered as they saw the Turks jumping from the collapsing contraption, spitting oil and fire upon their own ranks.

Winter was coming, and victory seemed nowhere in sight for the attackers. Mustapha ordered his men to take the nearby walled city of Mdina. His army approached, but was met by heavily armed soldiers manning the walls shooting cannons. "A second St Elmo!!" screamed his soldiers, as they retreated. But it was all a ploy, the governor, foreseeing this turn of events, ordered civilians, women and children, to man the walls, dressed in armor and carrying pikes.

In another attempt to destroy the attackers, the Turkish forces assembled a massive bomb, packed with gunshot and gunpowder, and rolled it into the Christian positions. The latter responded, rolling the fiendish contraption right back at them, resulting in a spectacular explosion. Hundreds died.

The Knights did not display much tolerance with the muslim invaders,

Salvation

Finally, after all hope of salvation had faded from the defender's hearts, a relief force was in sight. Over 10,000 men in 28 ships had arrived; soldiers from all over Europe, inspired by the courage of these knights had come to join in the fight. Even then, they were outnumbered massively by the Turks. Mustapha ordered his men to charge against the relief force, but they were severely weakened after months of fighting and rampant disease.

In Helm's Deep style, the Christian relief force charged into the heart of the Turkish army, destroying the Turks utterly. It was a blood bath; the Muslims were slaughtered, chased around the whole island, and picked off. They scrambled to board their ships and leave. It was a crushing victory.

Out of the 48,000 invaders that initially set sail to terrorize Europe, only 10,000 made it back home. The knights suffered heavy losses, too, but by some miracle, victory was theirs. Their sacrifice was immense; the Western world owes these men more than we will ever know. If not for them, Europe would've been converted long ago, and we would most likely be speaking Arabic (and sodomized from a young age).

Knights looking from the ramparts as their enemies are crushed

Both Romegas and La Valette survived the fighting. After the siege, the Knights were commended and all of Europe hailed them as heroes. They had heard tales of their legendary exploits, charging in the face of seemingly insurmountable odds, and were inspired. Many donations were made to the Knights, and with them, The Citadel of Valetta was built, in honor of the Grandmaster La Valette. The Pope sent his best engineers and the city was planned and designed as a solid fortress ahead of it's time, to defend Christendom against any future attacks.

Their victory had a profound impact across all of Europe. The local princes realized that the only way to defeat Islam was to stop warring amongst themselves and unite against the common threat. This resulted in a vast fighting force that seven years later crushed the Turks once again at Lepanto, ending the Ottoman sea superiority forever. Romegas was once again in the front lines of this battle.

Romegas died several years later in Rome, after a long life of fighting Islam at every turn. La Valette was offered the position of Cardinal, but he refused. The sword was the only path he had known for his entire life. He headed the reconstruction of Malta and died a peaceful death only a few years later in 1568. But tales of their heroic deeds would last for centuries to come. This would come to be known as the last epic encounter between Crusader Knights and Islam.

Victory

Conclusion

There are lessons to be learned from these events. It is said that those who do not know their history are doomed to repeat it. La Valette and his knights were considered obsolete, useless fossils by their contemporaries. Many people respected the Knights of St John, but the majority laughed at their traditions and old-fashioned way of life.

But the Knights knew in their hearts the truth. They did not let public opinion sway their convictions. They did not follow the rest of the civilized world in the descent to ignorance, decadence, and madness into forgetting what it is that makes us great. Their faith and their traditions were sacred to them. They held watch, silently, for years, until destiny finally called.

I invite you, fellow reader, to do the same. Forget about political correctness and the opinions of the masses. Search your heart for the truth. Meditate, isolate yourself, get disconnected from the insanity of the modern world. Take some time for yourself, get in touch with nature, and in turn, your own nature. Then, you will begin to see the truth. In the silence of your mind, you will find the answers.

It only took 700 of these Knights to save Europe. Now, Europe is threatened again, this time from the inside as well as foreign invaders. Maybe there will be enough awakened, red pilled souls to stem the barbaric invasion.

Let us prepare and strengthen ourselves. Maybe destiny will call us for a hero's journey. In the meantime, let us see what we can do to preserve our ancestral homelands and our traditions. Do not allow the sacrifice of the brave men of Malta to be in vain. Strong men are needed now, more than ever.

Read Next: Clash Of Steel And Wills: The Story Of The Battle Of Lepanto

Lord Baron

Lord Baron is the last in a long line of nobilty, descendant of crusaders and heroes. In constant battle with all enemies of western civilization, he seeks to restore pride and strength to masculinity. Is currently living grand adventures in South America.

Men Who Are Still Watching The NFL Are Suckers

October 1, 2017 | by Christian Huff | Link | Original Link

The football team or teams you're seeing on the television or at the stadium aren't "your" team. Truth is you personally don't know any of them. "Your" team is actually owned by millionaire businessmen who are in the business of making money, your money. These people don't actually have your best interests in mind when they do anything or make any decisions. It's not there priority to cater to you or even necessarily entertain you unless it makes them money.

That Steelers hat you bought to show support for "your" team had the profit gained from it distributed across all 32 teams in the league. It feeds the whole machine, the one of complete strangers that don't know or care about you. You're a stupid mouth-breathing wallet to them. Truth is, the whole thing is a big money and time waste for you and your family.

Every time you go to a game, tune into a game, or even click on news articles related to the game, you are directly or indirectly feeding the machine and making more revenue for the fat cats. Unplug from it. Ask yourself the following questions. What difference does it make what these people are doing? How is this directly affecting me? Chances are the answers are it doesn't make a difference and it's not affecting me at all.

Drink more of these crappy beer

The subliminal message

Ever wonder why when you think of football it’s almost synonymous with drinking beer and eating food that is terrible for your health? Every commercial break is filled with fast food and beer advertisements. Me and the guys watching the big game drinking beer after beer and feeding our face with hot wings and pizza. This is what real men do?

No, my friends, that’s what guys like this do. I have absolutely nothing in common with men like that. It happened before in the Roman Empire the elites would put on events and give away free bread in the hopes of keeping the people entertained and oblivious of the corruptions of their leaders. Take a look at what’s going on in modern times. Its looks eerily similar, doesn’t it? And why not also sprinkle in feminism into an all-male sport and watch you accept it.

The NFL is a colossal waste of time

Seems like the older I get, the faster time goes by. Material possessions, jobs, and money come and go. Almost everything is replaceable. The one thing that is not replaceable is time. You only here for a moment and then you’re gone, your children are only little for a short while and then they’re grown. Time is precious, so be careful how you spend yours.

The NFL, NBA, NCAA, etc. are huge distractions to keep you weak and dumb. It affects some way more than others. I challenge you to do this: turn off your TV and electronics. Sit quietly and close your eyes. Take a few large breaths, in and out. Now look around. Breathe and relax. This is your life. This is where you're at in your life. Every circumstance and decision has led you to where you're at this moment. This is your existence and it's ending one second at a time. While you're bitching about who sat for the anthem or how the officials blew that call, millionaire politicians and business men are getting richer and more importantly keeping you distracted from what's really going on behind the scenes.

Forget about who sat for what while hoping that “your” team improves this year or off-season and improve yourself. Pick up and learn a new hobby, practice martial arts, lift weights, start that diet you have been talking about doing for years. You will be surprised how much you can accomplish and improve without bothersome distractions in you’re life like televised sports.

No better time to jump off the NFL for good

No matter what your stance is, the point of kneeling during the national anthem is meant to get a rise out of people and care about the NFL. That is exactly what it's doing. I compare the recent events in the NFL to an unruly woman shit testing her man, with the NFL being the woman and the fans being the man. How much can I get by with and him still support me? How much can we get by with and people still fork over their money and time?

The best solution is if it bothers you disconnect from it. Hit them where it hurts the most, their wallets. I unplugged from the distraction two years ago and I haven't looked back. Now I have more time with family and focusing on self-improvement. I urge everyone who reads this to do the same.

Read More: Stop Watching Sports

Christian Huff

Christian abandoned everything society had conditioned him to believe in late 2015 and opted for the red pill, and although the red pill truth of things can be a harsh reality for some, he wouldn't have it any other way. He now focuses more on self-improvement of the body and mind.

Hundreds Injured As Spanish Government Brutally Shuts Down Catalonia's Vote For Independence

October 1, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Daily Mail:

Hundreds of people have been injured as riot police shut down polling stations on the day of the controversial independence referendum in Catalonia.

Officers were seen stamping and kicking protesters as they stormed buildings and seized ballot boxes.

Footage captured in the village of Sarria de Ter in the province of Girona showed authorities using an axe to smash down the doors of a polling station where Catalan president Carles Puigdemont was due to cast his vote.

> Spanish police fire rubber bullets at voters today in the #CatalanReferendum. #1o #Catalonia #Cataluyna pic.twitter.com/O8o4b0UlCG
>
> — WikiLeaks (@wikileaks) October 1, 2017

And in Barcelona, the region's capital, officers fired rubber bullets at thousands of protesters demonstrating against their votes being denied.

At least 460 people have been hurt in the clashes across Catalonia, the city's mayor said, while Spain's interior ministry said at least 11 police officers had been injured.

And tens of thousands of fans have been banned from attending FC Barcelona's football match with Las Palmas as part of a protest against the violence.

Spain’s Constitutional Court has suspended the referendum and the central government says it is illegal.

But regional separatist leaders pledged to hold it anyway and called on the area’s 5.3million eligible voters to show up to cast their ballots.

> Spanish National Police strike with batons Catalonian fire fighters trying to protect voters in today's referendum. #referendumCAT #o1 pic.twitter.com/OcbAhXctTI
>
> — WikiLeaks (@wikileaks) October 1, 2017

Today Mr Puidgemont condemned the Spanish government’s crackdown. He said: ‘Police brutality will shame forever the Spanish state.’

But the Spanish deputy prime minister Soraya Sáenz de Santamaría said officers in Catalonia are acting ‘in a proportionate manner’.

She added that the Catalan government ‘has behaved with absolute irresponsibility’ by going ahead with the referendum.

Shocking footage from Barcelona shows police officers throwing voters down a flight of stairs and stamping on people as they raid a polling station.

Read the article here

Don’t Miss: Spanish Politician Is Crushed For Questioning Feminist Dogma

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Why Are Americans So #king Fat?

October 1, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Americans are fucking fat, and yet, when you look at percentages of obesity, America manages to just barely be in the top 10. Why? Why have so many billions of people become obese in only the last 30 years or so? I would like to analyze the "turning point" for when Americans started to become obese, shining some light on the rest of the world as well.

Back To The Past

For all of the talk of how "Everything in the past was worse than things are now," I can safely say that at least in terms of Body Mass Index—a legitimate measure of obesity for approximately 95% of humanity, no matter what fat women say—things in the past were better. The average American man in the 1960s weighed about 160 pounds, and the average American woman was a slim and trim 120 pounds with a 28 inch waist. And nowadays the average American woman is 160 pounds, and the average man much heavier than that.

What happened? Studies seem to indicate that the sudden spike in obesity only started around 1980. But is there a specific “X factor” that caused it to happen? The mainstream writers always seem to argue that “increased availability and affordability of food, combine with intense marketing, explains excess energy intake and weight gain amongst different populations”. But frankly, that argument always seemed a bit flimsy to me.

I don’t think there’s any more food advertising available now then there was back in the 60s—if anything, you’d imagine advertising to be more harmful in a day and age when cigarettes could be legally advertised on cartoon shows. And that’s clearly not the case.

Debunking A Few Myths

One of the studies I used for this was Shapiro’s study from Brown University, and perhaps the section I liked best is when he discusses how, contra the “unrealistic body standards make women anorexic!” propaganda we hear from feminists, the occasions of that disorder occurring are extremely low, and “We do not find a significant increase in the amount of people that are dangerously underweight”. But then again, you could just take a quick glance around at American women and realize that there’s clearly not that much anorexia going around.

Speaking of throwing shade in the face of fatties, the study’s medical research team, most medical doctors, and certified personal trainers such as myself all agree that the single biggest cause of weight gain is the consumption of more calories than you expend with physical effort.

Ultimately, all of the studies I read for this article refer to the “big two” causes of the obesity epidemic: a nationwide decrease in physical activity and a nationwide increase in caloric consumption. Certainly, these things exist—just take a look at restaurant portions.

But again, we have to ask why?

In other words, even if there's junk food and high fructose corn syrup flying through the sky, why do people choose to eat it instead of good, wholesome food? If I may, I have a few theories as to why the country has decided en masse to eat shitty food and not exercise…

1. Increased food additives, processing, and lack of regulation

Agrobusiness corporations have, in the last 30 years or so, been given free reign to load up their food with as many preservatives, soy products, and high fructose corn syrup as possible. Because, hey, it won't kill anybody and it saves them a shitload of money!

Soy and preservatives have been linked to many health disorders, and high fructose corn syrup's insidiousness is due to its ubiquity rather than its inherent unhealthiness. Chances are if you look at a fat person's diet, it will have a lot of these things.

It's time once again to break out the potted meat food product. Protip: anything that has to clarify that it is, in fact, food, is not something you want to eat

2. Increased Poverty & Stagnant Wages

I'm honestly surprised how rarely this is brought up. It is often remarked that the USA is one of the few countries in world history where the poor are fat and the wealthy are slim. It's also a common talking point that American wages have basically stagnated since the 1970s in terms of real purchasing power, while prices have increased. Compare the prices of healthy food to the price of unhealthy food.

While I have argued that it's not difficult to pinch pennies and get healthy food for yourself even on a barely-above-poverty salary, let's also bear in mind that most people are pretty goddamn stupid, and thus aren't aware of this fact. If all you're looking for is enough food to get you through the day, and all you have is 20 bucks, you can buy a lot more junk food with 20 bucks than you can buying good food.

Along with the destruction of American industry forcing many to live paycheck to paycheck, there's also…

3. Destruction Of The American Family

As we commonly discuss here on Return of Kings, the American family is in a state of disrepair, which is unfortunate because the children of single parents (especially single mothers) tend to grow up to become dysfunctional adults. Therefore, I've always felt that it's not too much of a stretch to assume that a dysfunctional family will neither feed the children proper food, nor get them involved in some sort of physical activity. After all, if some urbanite woman is still "riding the carousel" into her 30s, is she going to cook for her sprog? Hell no!

4. Decline of American Culture and Community

Related to the last one, numerous studies have shown that increased multiculturalism and diversity have the adverse effect of destroying any sense of community and shared culture amongst any group of people, whether it be a city or an entire nation. And when the streets aren't safe, and grocery stores are closed down due to rampant criminality (the actual cause of the alleged "food deserts" nice white people complain about sometimes), you're going to see an increase in obesity and lack of physical activity–and count on that.

Conclusion

So, it seems to me that there isn't one single factor or turning point that caused America to become a nation of morbidly obese lardasses. Rather, it was many factors happening simultaneously with each other that seemed to cause it.

Fixing it, on the other hand, will also require more than "raising awareness" of healthy food options or promoting "beauty at any size."

Read More: Monsanto Ruins American Bodies

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

6 Reasons Why Frenchmen Have A Cowardly Reputation

October 2, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

The treacherous, lazy and cowardly French. We have all come across this cliche. It is time to understand what are the forces behind the creation of this unjust reputation and put it to rest.

Being French, I have heard quite a few of these jokes about the French army running away in many countries or the ones about French civilians focused more on love and wine-drinking than creating and conquering. I don't mind those as they are usually extremely funny and I believe that self-derision is an essential part of having a sense of humor

The legends around our hedonistic nature might have triggered those thoughts but something deeper was at work. The French display the same symptoms of cultural decline that are present everywhere in the Western world: high divorce rate, forced immigration, encouragement of degeneracy, destruction of male icons, widespread use of the birth control pill, famous white men targeted and smeared, etc. So why are they singled out as weak?

1. A slanderous campaign lead by American cuckservatives

It would be easy to evoke the past victories of the French and the Franks before them to show that out of the world's nations, they have one of the highest victory ratio worldwide. But no matter how glorious the past of the French was in military matters, it all was eclipsed by the most recent and memorable defeat of 1940.

When one thinks about that era, Poland, the Netherlands and Belgium got trampled by the Wermacht too, but France's case stayed in the collective memory as it was one of the most imposing nations of the "Old World" that was brought to its knees.

The soldiers on the French side fought bravely and paid a heavy price (200,000 military casualties, almost as much as the U.K) before their institutions chose the path of least resistance through the collaboration with the invader. Sun Tzu describes it well when he writes in The Art of War that "even if a general knew many victories, they could all be ruined by a single resounding defeat."

The “French bashing” and the campaign of character assassination was stirred up after 9/11 and the start of the second Iraq campaign when Jacques Chirac refused to follow the United States in Iraq to protect their “national interests” (read “oil and Saddam dropping the US dollar in 2000”) and fight for their greatest Eskimo allies, linking the choice of the French not going to Iraq with their “cowardice” of 1940.

That is when the whole “cheese eating surrendering monkey” meme was created by cuckservatives (Jonah Goldberg, Mark Molesky, Kenneth Timmerman), popularised by American neocons from the Bush administration, then relayed by Murdoch-run media and their lapdogs in Europe.

2. Masculine heroes are degraded while effeminate figures are promoted

Strong pre-seventies role models become more rare. That phenomenon is also observable in other Western countries. Movie male archetypes of the previous decades have been demonized. Strong father or warrior figures in French history and arts have been turned into the bogeyman of modernity, heirs of vile times of “colonialism”, “inherent violence”, “inequality” and “machismo”.

Entertainment giants and powerful corporations have been selling for a few years the “twig-armed metrosexual bobo” as being the feminine ideal. Actors that looked and behaved like men such as Ventura, Gabin or Belmondo are now a relic of the past. Now, Romain Duris and other urban preys with haircuts like distressed brooms are carried to the pinnacle of fame.

Then…

These actors sometimes dress like women

The only French musicians that are promoted to the top charts or gain access the TV studios in France are PC pawns with scrawny bodies of heroin addicts that sing with a falsetto voice or ethno-masochistic “white rappers”.

Then…

Now…

They are advertised as the ones who reach status, become wealthy, and swim in a sea of women. The old style of singers have been replaced: Brel, Montand or Bécaud. All gone.

The plague is observable at its most advanced stage on the web. French teenagers are now fed endless channels of effeminate and geeky Youtube clowns like Squeezie, Cyprien or Norman (one of his vids is where he elaborates about the shame of being white).

It is incredible to think that their whole comic routine is based on being lonely, eternal teenagers playing video games all day, mocked by girls, and crippled by white guilt. These are the characters that are also exported and sold overseas. The random foreigner will think that this is how the majority of Frenchmen act like.

The contemporary urban native French youth is exhorted to identify as those fragile stereotypes. Young strong patriots are persona non grata everywhere in the media. They already have to endure non-native violence in silence but now the institutions pile up on them too

French young men are stuck between a rock and a hard place: being attacked by city predators, staying passive, being mocked and spat on, or defending themselves or daring to raise their voice and being called racist by the politically correct junta of Parisian bobos and punished by the law.

The French population, just like the Germans, the English and the Swedes, are forced to love their enemy and celebrate their weakness. Let us not forget how Rome fell:

> As true now as it was then pic.twitter.com/1yPV0Kgmpv
> — Tolerant Fellow (@nontolerantman) September 26, 2017

3. An absence of retaliation against hostile elements

Our country has also been the butt of everyone's joke lately following the deadly attacks lead by home-grown Muslim terrorists, after the country's leaders failed to control our borders or acknowledge and name the problem of radical Islamism in France on our territory.

We are mocked because the majority keeps voting Left, holding candle vigils, and preaching diversity from their gated communities. We are mocked because the majority stays idle, defenceless and like the man falling from the proverbial building, keeps repeating to itself "So far, so good".

I have met a lot of locals in the countries I visited that were curious and actually quite puzzled about the impotence of our government following those attacks and their inability to protect our people and terminate nationwide Muslim radicalism.

The Eastern Europeans were especially surprised that there was no violent public reaction against Muslims. The idea they shared a few times could be condensed to this: "It is strange. Until I met you, I thought that the French were weak-minded, happy that Muslims treat them like doormats and desecrate their land". I heard that concept a lot. I imagine that they did not know that the traitors of the Left and the State are almost as hostile towards patriots as violent immigrants are.

The election of Emmanuel Macron only supports the thesis that a sizeable number of French leftists enjoy their masochistic relationship with immigrant rape, Islamic pillaging, foreign almighty banking cartels, and the advancement of the homosexual agenda by voting for a frail liberal bedding a shriveled grandma twice his age while keeping his closeted homosexuality low key. Now the whole planet can see that this French prototype of urban metrosexuality, beacon of passivity, and betatude can reach the highest spheres and actually become president of the country.

4. Traditional masculine hobbies in decline

The French have good athletic results in a wide variety of sport so the problem does not come from physical incapability, but now the most popular and televised urban sport in the country is soccer, a hotbed of immigrant gangster culture, cheating, corruption, frail physiques, dirty money, and questionable morals. French schools teach less and less sport and if they do they usually limit it to a couple of hours of track &and field or team sports.

With the help of the media, video games are now painted as hip and trendy instead of being a waste of productive time and a culture of isolation and escape of reality.

The culture of weapons is also wavering. The number of hunters and sport shooters are in free-fall, the result of a feminisation of society, disappearance of fathers transmitting the hobby to their sons, and a attack of that way of life led by media moguls.

The laws are becoming more complicated to purchase guns and the intrusive surveillance of legal gun owners by the state is becoming ridiculous. While as everywhere else, most crimes involving weapons are committed by illegal holders, but cutting the supply of those weapons in no-go zones does not seem to be a priority for the government.

Since last year, globocuck decision maker J.C. Junker got out of his customary alcoholic slumber to add additional tedious regulations for gun owners in his lifelong project of finally disarming all European citizens. It is not hard to understand that obtaining anything more than an air gun will soon become a bureaucratic hell in France.

5. Our men are raised by women

This problem is endemic to the Western world. Young white men are not incited to go after girls and reproduce. Our women have great potential and used to reach high standards of beauty, but third-wave feminism, abortion on demand, and television programming turned them into a majority of insufferable narcissists on one end of the spectrum and unattractive manly women on the other.

Girls of the feminist persuasion, following what is parroted to them everywhere, see their egos inflate exponentially when they have even an above-average physique, as competition between very attractive girls is scarce.

The young French man does not have public masculine role models anymore. He might only count on the male role models that are in his immediate circle. If his father bails or the family does not value masculinity, he is on his own and absorbs what the global trends tell him to believe.

France also has one of the highest divorce rates worldwide and children conceived out of wedlock often guarantee a fatherless childhood. Compulsory military service has been revoked in 1997 so the majority of boys born after 1979 have no military training whatsoever. An additional way to be guided by masculine institutions was removed.

This is why I observe that the “male” crowd in skinny jeans and pastel scarves is now a staple in every large city center. That is what happens when smacking your children for misbehaving becomes illegal.

6. A sword is dangling over those who speak their mind

Your words can be held against you at all times in France. As soon as you state something—even if it is the truth—that hurts a snowflake's feelings, you can be punished for what you said.

This shields the French from a lot of opinions that would be considered "illegal" or "unpopular" in their home country. And generally speaking, they are not used to other people being verbally aggressive towards them for the sake of it (apart from allochthonous elements in France). Hence why they get offended and defensive easily, which could explain why they are perceived as sensitive and thin-skinned. As soon as they travel abroad, especially where people are used to speak their mind, they are in for a shock

The French are so scared of being called "racist" or any "-ist" curse (I remember being afraid of that even in the school yard; it was like a scarlet letter, even if there was only one black child in my school) that a great number of people just choose to stay silent and endure the disrespect coming from all sides.

The laws that punish dissenting voices are so stiff, the majority has to find foreign grounds to hear or practice true freedom of speech. This is what happens when PC French men go abroad and get red pilled right in the cheese receiver. Prophetic real talk circa 2009:

Français, relève-toi

The defeatism of the French youth does not originate from flaws relative to their body or physical perception. They usually have a build that is reasonably tall and strong (if they do not destroy what has been given to them) and their strength only needs to be encouraged and cultivated. It is in their mind where ideas of inaction, defeat, and low self esteem germinates.

Our youth does not become weak only due to external factors. Every man is responsible for his own behaviour, but the way their environment keeps pounding that they are evil by nature, exhorts them to a plethora of vices, weakens, and discourages them on a daily basis.

All signs point to the existence of a fringe of the right-wing youth population that grows stronger by the day. Youths that have swallowed the red pill thanks to alternative media or helpful peers now see past the lies of the narrative. They seek to reach their maximum masculine potential and fight back against the forces that kicked them while they were down.

Although a majority follows the herd, an enlightened few had enough of this treatment and sharpen their blades in silence. The fire is rising, there is no doubt about that.

Read More: What It Was Like To Attend A French Survival Training In Poland

---

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Las Vegas Tragedy: Over 50 Dead In Worst Mass Shooting In United States History

October 2, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via USA Today:

A gunman opened fire on thousands of concertgoers jamming the Las Vegas Strip, killing at least 50, wounding 400 more and prompting chaos as the panicked crowd scrambled for cover or simply ducked to avoid the onslaught from the deadliest mass shooting in modern U.S. history.

> Otro ángulo de la balacera en #LasVegas. Impactantes imágenes. pic.twitter.com/4YlVng1zrP
>
> — Gusini Solano (@GusiniSolano21) October 2, 2017

The massacre ended when police stormed a 32nd-floor hotel room overlooking the concert and the shooter, identified as Stephen Paddock, 64, killed himself, Clark County Sheriff Joe Lombardo said.

“Right now we believe it’s a solo act, a lone wolf attacker,” Lombardo said. “We are pretty confident there is no longer a threat.”

Authorities shut down part of the Las Vegas Strip and Interstate 15 after receiving reports of an active shooter at the Route 91 Harvest festival, near the Mandalay Bay Casino, at about 10:10 p.m. local time.

> May god protect the innocent. #lasegas #mandalaybay #shooting #vegas #casino #pray pic.twitter.com/DG5xjeijDB
>
> — Space Trek9 (@spacetrek9) October 2, 2017

The White House said President Trump “has been briefed on the horrific tragedy in Las Vegas.”

“We are monitoring the situation closely and offer our full support to state and local officials. All of those affected are in our thoughts and prayers,” White House press secretary Sarah Sanders said in a statement.

“My warmest condolences and sympathies to the victims and families of the terrible Las Vegas shooting. God bless you!” Trump tweeted.

> My warmest condolences and sympathies to the victims and families of the terrible Las Vegas shooting. God bless you!
>
> — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) October 2, 2017

Lombardo confirmed at a news conference that the shooter had fired from the 32nd floor of the Mandalay Bay. Numerous firearms were found in the room at the scene.

Paddock lived in Mesquite, Nev., a city 80 miles northwest of Las Vegas.

Lombardo said reports of multiple shooters and explosives were false. Some of the deceased were police officers, he added.

Videos on social media show people ducking for cover and fleeing as gunfire rings out.

Lombardo said police were confident they had detained a person of interest, who he named as Marilou Danley, the suspect’s roommate.

He said officers also located a Hyundai Tucson and a Chrysler Pacifica Touring, both with Nevada plates, which were registered to the dead suspect.

“Our condolences go out to the families who lost loved ones tonight. Thoughts and prayers are with all of those affected by this tragedy,” the Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department said on Twitter.

Ivetta Saldana, who was attending the festival, told The Las Vegas Review-Journal she hid in a sewer after the shooting began.

“It was was a horror show,” she said. “People were standing around, then they hit the floor.”

Witnesses said they saw multiple victims and dozens of ambulances. Some concert-goers huddled in the basement of the nearby Tropicana hotel-casino.

Nevada Gov. Brian Sandoval tweeted: “A tragic & heinous act of violence has shaken the #Nevada family. Our prayers are w/ the victims & all affected by this act of cowardice.”

Read the entire article

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Can You Escape A Broken Society By Becoming A Hermit?

October 2, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Many citizens feel deep down that something has gone terribly wrong with society, yet they can't put the pieces together. Some might research this, and begin to explore the depths of the rabbit hole. Those who've taken the red pill apprehend how deeply dysfunctional things are. If you've just discovered that most of your country's politicians and business leaders regard people like you with indifference at best and hostility at worst, it's an unpleasant realization.

After the Red Pill

The hangover is a bitch.

The question, then, is what to do about it. The entrenched forces opposing Western civilization are formidable, and they want you to believe they're invincible. Some fall into apathy and despair, hopefully a temporary condition. Others work toward reform, informing their fellow citizens, and other constructive efforts.

Another category has difficulty digesting the bitter red pill. They're well aware of the culture war, but don't want to get involved. Some might even embrace the decline, reasoning that if society is in the toilet, it's easier to enjoy the ride down the tubes.

Finally, some are tempted to withdraw from society. That might involve the MGTOW lifestyle, or even fully "going Galt" by moving to the mountains and living off the grid. There's much to be said for resilience, preparedness, and unplugging from consumerism. However, avoidance and retreat don't bring victory, and aren't personally viable in the long run.

Society and culture

C’mon, mohawks are out of style!

The last six decades brought profound changes. This is more so in the USA’s coastal urban areas than “flyover country”, of course. However, it’s getting hard to find places remaining untouched. For one small example, I was astounded when I heard a junior high student tell his mother what he was taught in sex ed that day. This was in rural Kentucky, over ten years ago.

You might not care much about public morals, or even attention-seekers literally putting their private lives on parade. Sure, I get the “live and let live” argument. However, if you want a family (which is natural and proper), the social environment affects your dating prospects, your marriage, and your children’s upbringing. It’s not insurmountable, but it needs addressing.

Other than that, the social malaise of cultural Marxism affects numerous areas of life. It’s especially so when backed by law and other influential forces. Society is considerably cruder than in times past. Today’s celebrity antics would’ve been unthinkable twenty years ago. Androgyny and other ugly fashions are trendy. The divorce rate is alarmingly high, as is single motherhood, exacerbating numerous other social ills by traumatizing the youth. Using a biologically correct pronoun might cause a scene. Hookup culture has changed the social landscape immeasurably. The list goes on.

Feminism and the gay agenda are major contributors to this, backed by the media and judiciary. No compromise will satisfy them. They received reasonable accommodations long ago, but kept moving the goalposts. Whenever society gives in, then it’s always something else. They get nearly everything they demand eventually. If this remains unchecked, they’ll never stop pushing.

Can you escape to another country? If Eastern Europe—and even Latin America—are beginning to show these trends, then what society is safe? Remote areas in the Third World might change little during your lifetime, but the desert or the jungle isn't for everyone.

Encroaching tyranny

Your phone calls, emails, web traffic, etc. are recorded at the Utah Data Center

The long arm of the law has quite a reach. (About that mountainside shack you built with your own hands, you did get a building permit and code inspection, didn't you?) Even if you're doing your best to obey the law, you're probably guilty of something. Legislative bloat is nothing new:

> The more laws, the less justice.
> —Cicero
>
> The more corrupt the state, the more numerous the laws.
> —Tacitus

Sounds familiar?

Ancient law codes from Hammurabi to the Anglo-Saxon kings were pretty concise and easy to understand. Today, even skilled lawyers sometimes struggle wading through legalese, and they make bank researching it and arguing in court about what it really means. The ACA (Obamacare act) is 906 pages long. The IRS code makes the Talmud seem like light reading. You could fill several bookcases with all the laws applying to you. Some call this progress.

Usually the worst thing an honest citizen has to worry about is an overzealous traffic cop. However, the key word is "usually". If some bureaucrat doesn't like you, prepare for interesting times. If the police are involved, things can get much worse, and very quickly. Our article "What To Do When The Cops Show Up" received much criticism, but really, the author was telling it like it is. Other than that, prosecutorial tunnel vision is real.

Ruby Ridge was a worst case scenario. The short version is that the government didn't like Randy Weaver's politics and tried to recruit him as an informant against others like him. When he didn't play ball, they set him up. Then they conducted a raid on his family's cabin in the mountains, resulting in several fatalities. In a memo, an FBI official later noted quite candidly, "Charge against Weaver is Bull Shit."

In the USA, the surveillance state is out of control, unaccountable, and unconstitutional. This won't go away by itself. It's not much different in several other major countries, and everyone's sharing information. Perhaps your life is an open book and you have nothing to hide, but that doesn't mean you shouldn't care about Big Brother peeking inside your kimono. If you stayed awake during civics class, you might remember something about due process and probable cause.

So the domestic spying apparatus, which would've made Comrade Brezhnev weep with jealousy, is already in place. The problem with soft despotism is that unscrupulous politicians can turn it into hardcore despotism very quickly. Suppose a major crisis happened (spontaneous or manufactured) and Congress suspended habeas corpus. Then, dissidents and suspected dissidents could be arrested arbitrarily and indefinitely. As for Europe, some governments already zealously prosecute politically incorrect speech and criticism of immigration, while turning a blind eye to migrant crime.

Some will say, "Surely this can't happen here, not from our government!" Is it our government still? Until we get effective campaign finance reform, major globalist donors will dictate terms within the political machines. The DNC leaks and similar revelations provided a rare glimpse into just how dirty the sausage-making gets.

So the party bosses greatly influence who gets the nomination. Further, George Wallace's 1966 observation that "There's not a dime's worth of difference between the Republicans and Democrats" isn't too far off the mark. Even so, the electorate chooses between the selected finalists. However, the electorate itself is changing. This is by design.

Changing demographics

Rocket scientists and biotech engineers sneaking across the border

Unless decisive changes are made soon, the USA's White population will fall below 50% in a few decades. (It was 90% in 1965, when Ted Kennedy sold out America.) Likewise, several nations in Europe will soon follow. If this happens, the former-majority populations will lose control over their destiny. Other nations aren't expected to give up their living spaces; nobody demands that China accept millions of unruly migrants, or says that Nigeria is too Black.

Note well, the people never chose this. In every instance, this was done against the public's wishes by their so-called leaders. The politicians valued campaign contributions and good "optics" more than the future of their constituents. I'd have to write a book to explain fully why this happened, who benefits, why this is already a disaster, and why nothing is being done about it. However, Peter Brimelow and Pat Buchanan already have, and they're tough acts to follow.

Some people have told me with a straight face that they don't see why their dispossession would be a problem. Here's why. Without a clear majority, a nation becomes fragmented and difficult to govern except by brute force. Further, Whites have been told that in-group preferences are evil, and they must not have pride or solidarity. However, everyone else has been told exactly the opposite, and that Whites have caused all their problems. Are they likely to embrace universalism if they gain numerical majority?

What would the future hold? South Africa and Rhodesia might give some indications. Maybe you don't see identity politics, but identity politics sees you. That's why we should care.

Non-Whites would have much to lose too. Today's ethnic turf wars will worsen with disunity and further overcrowding. Also, politically correct history aside, Whites have a knack for running stable, prosperous societies. Finally, if Western civilization falls, its great engine of creativity goes too.

The answer

Rather than retreating from the world, we must engage it. Escaping to the suburbs didn't help over the long haul, and escaping to the hills won't either. We must inform our fellow citizens who are still in the dark. Above, I've listed several problems that need fixing, of which the public lacks sufficient awareness. Consider these as action items.

Once united, we can demand accountability from our politicians. Either they fix their mess, or lose their jobs.

Read More: The Culture War Is Being Transformed Into A Hot War

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Is Sofia (Bulgaria) Worth A Visit?

October 2, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I recently spent a week in Sofia, Bulgaria. I was quite impressed by the friendliness of the people, the modernity of (some) areas, and the general vibe of the place.

As more and more British stag parties continue to gut former great Eastern European destinations, I feel almost hesitant to share information about Sofia. At the same time, Ryanair is already flying there ($20 from London), so how worse could I possibly make it?

Normies are flocking to places like Budapest and Krakow instead of Sofia and Belgrade. The masses have yet to penetrate these Balkan capitals on a truly high level. With that being said, here are some thoughts I have about Sofia, Bulgaria after a week there.

1. Potentially A Fantastic Nomad Hub

One thing that impressed me the most about Sofia was the internet speed. My AirBnB, every cafe, and anywhere I went had consistently good internet that was more than sufficient for your average worker.

One day, I ventured out to a co-working space that an American friend had been using, and was thoroughly blown away by how nice it was. While it was a typical Soviet-style building on the outside, inside was a beautiful facility that any entrepreneur would be happy to call home a few days a week. The view was from the top-story even had a nice view of the mountain…

In addition to those perks, the food is good. There are plenty of trendy cafes and restaurants that will be familiar to expats, as well as some good traditional Bulgarian cuisine. Personally, I prefer Balkan cuisine of Bulgaria, Serbia, and Croatia to the much more bland Slavic taste of Poland, Czech, and Ukraine.

2. A Modern(ish) Infrastructure

Apart from the internet and food, Sofia is nice and becoming a bit more modern. The main walking area, Vitosha Boulevard, is beautiful, clean, and has a great vibe. Once you get out of that main area, it becomes a bit more “grungy”, you could say.

The most apt comparison I’ve found would be to take the Ruin Pub District/Jewish Quarter of Budapest and apply it to the majority of Sofia. If you like the vibe of that section of Budapest nightlife, you’ll like Sofia (though the parties aren’t as good).

The metro is very nice and modern in some sections, and much older and run down in others. If you’re a foreigner, you’ll have very little reason to ever leave the main area of Vitosha.

3. Friendly People

One of the districts lacking modern infrastructure.

Much like I found Serbians to be (although my time there was brief), Bulgarians were very friendly people. Even in the center of Sofia, people were still “excited” to be able to speak some English, would ask where I was from, etc. Undoubtedly this will not continue forever—girls in Poland were thrilled to speak English not too long ago.

Overall though, everybody had a very friendly vibe and was more than willing to share their city and culture with a foreigner.

Again, your mileage is going to vary greatly depending on how open and friendly you are, as well. Those same stag parties I mentioned before will be looked upon with disdain, and will generally ruin the impression of English-speaking tourists.

I did hear a fair amount of American English while on the streets walking around. However, I consistently noticed something—these people were all very well-behaved, quiet, and respectful. You could just tell by the tone of their voices and the vibe they gave off.

Bulgaria is not a place that your Average Joe or Brittany is going to have on their vacation bucket list. Instead, people who choose to come to Bulgaria typically have a genuine interest in the country and culture—and it shows.

4. Bulgarian Girls

Heels not as common as in Ukraine, but still seen fairly regularly during nice weather.

Ah, yes—the part everybody is really curious about.

Bulgarian girls are definitely cute. I would say a step below their Serbian neighbors to the north, or their even more northern counterparts in Ukraine. Of course, a step below is really not that big of a drop-off. You see plenty of beautiful girls walking around.

The problem is that Sofia is small, and there is not going to be that many of them. If we consider that game is truly down to the numbers, you're going to have your work cut out for you based on the fact that Sofia is simply a small place.

There is only one small walking area that would be consistently worth it for day game, nightlife that is quiet most days of the week, and there is a generally small population that would make technology-based dating difficult.

In addition, the winters are quite cold, and supposedly during the summer the capital empties out while people head to the beach (which I do hear good things about). Factor all of these things together, and I'm just not sure how highly I could recommend Sofia just for girls

Whereas for Ukraine, I'd say you could pick cities just for the girls alone (and suck it up if you didn't enjoy the city itself), I couldn't say that about Sofia. I'd say you'd be far better off picking it as a place to spend a month because you enjoy the city, culture and vibe. The dating scene is a nice bonus.

To hear more about Bulgaria and other EE countries, check out the Dating Abroad Podcast. If you want daily updates from around the globe, go here.

Read Next: 3 Things I've Learned From Dating A Ukrainian Girl For One Year

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

6 Signs That A Man Is A Cuckold

October 3, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Wikipedia defines cuckold as…

> A husband of an adulterous wife. In evolutionary biology, the term is also applied to males who are unwittingly investing parental effort in offspring that are not genetically their own.

In short, being a cuckold is not a desirable position for any self-respecting masculine man to find himself in. Also in recent years, the term has been broadened in use to describe men who are perceived to be weak, effeminate, seemingly derive pleasure from being laughed at or humiliated, or are supportive of policies which are counter-productive to Western civilization and the traditional family unit.

People on the alt-left hate how right-wing masculine men denigrate people as cucks, because they usually exhibit several of the follow behaviors and traits.

1. He Marries An Older Woman

"LE CUCK": Barely 40-year-old French President Emmanuel Macron (right) with his nearly senior citizen wife Brigitte (age 64).

A woman's value significantly depends on her fertility and beauty, which are directly associated with youth. A man's value significantly depends on his resources, intellect, and character. All things which are forged through trial-and-error and years of experience. In short, it is utterly ridiculous as to why men would want to firmly cement a relationship with an older woman via marriage.

To be fair, men who marry suitable partners that are only barely older than themselves, like Prince William marrying Kate Middleton, are exemptions from being branded as cucks. It's perfectly acceptable if people met via serendipity or mutual friends during their same year of school or university etc, and the youth gap between the man and his wife is barely six months to a year.

A true King Of Cucks on the current world stage is French President Emmanuel Macron, whose wife is almost 25 years older than him. Either the marriage is a total sham, Emmanuel is mentally ill, or he's just an uber-bitch boy masochist who enjoys the thought of men around the world laughing hysterically at his complete and utter lack of self-respect.

Have no self-respect? Then go marry your own 'Brigitte'. Bingo nights are probably a good place to find a single (or widowed) woman about her age.

2. He Wears Another Man's Sportsball Jersey

Wooooooo! Sportsball YEAH!!!

This is probably the easiest way for a man to cuck himself, since absolutely no association or contact with the opposite sex is required, and beta and omega males tend to not be particularly choosy in how (and whom with) they spend their valuable time.

Nonetheless, going out and spending probably over $100 on some alpha male multi-millionaire's sports jersey, and wearing it in public, is one of the most cucky things a grown man can do. The man behind the number and the name doesn't give two shits about you, but he is more than happy to continue his alpha playboy lifestyle (and embrace the free marketing) at your continued beta chump expense.

Shout out "Cuck!" to the jumbotron, and go get yourself a three figure sportsball jersey today!

3. He Lets His Wife Be Queen Of The Castle

There was once an old saying which went something like this, "a man's home is his castle". His home was supposed to be his fortress and citadel. A sanctuary of family respect and authority after enduring at least 40 hours a week of acquiescing to the authority of someone else (his boss or corporate overlords). It was his well deserved compensation for earning the money to pay for that said 'castle', not to mention all that food on the table to satisfy the stomachs of his wife and children.

Nowadays, such thinking is so 'patriarchal' and passe. A true cuck will let his wife scold, berate, and verbally humiliate him in his home. He knows he probably deserved it, because he was either acting "out of line" or was "not attentive to her needs". More than likely, he knows his wife is understandably angry at all men because of the 'gender wage gap' or something like that. It's perfectly acceptable for her to emasculate him in his very own home, until such patriarchal oppression in the workplace is stopped.

4. He Adopts A Child From A Polar Opposite Race

~~Cuck~~ Country star Thomas ‘Rhett’ Akins and wife Lauren’s little adopted bundle of joy! The Deep South is finally becoming ‘Progressive’!

Adopting a child, or consciously choosing to take full personal and financial responsibility for raising a tiny human being which shares absolutely no blood relations with yourself, and for up to eighteen years I might add, is kind of cucky behavior in it’s own right, don’t you think?

Well, that all depends. “It’s the current year!”, and adopting a child who is at least from your own race or ethnic group simply isn’t cucky enough I’m afraid. You’ve got to show your true “love is love” attitude and progressive colors (pun intended) and adopt a black baby! Or at least a Cambodian or a Laotian or something!

Forget all the evidence which shows that transracial adoptions often lead to those children growing up with serious identity issues (Colin Kaepernick is no exception), because it’s what all the Hollywood stars have been doing for years. After all, everyone knows that the leftist elite of Los Angeles are valid role models for showing what’s best for the rest of the country. Especially when it comes to the modern family unit…

5. He Marries A Single Mother

"OMG I luv being a mom!!"

Ah, a true cuck classic! A man who risks half of his lifelong financial portfolio with a woman (often based upon a short term attraction), while also mentoring and economically supporting her children which were the end result of another man's orgasm, is a truly special kind of beta.

For up to the greater part of two decades, he will find himself repeatedly emasculated with cries of "you're not my real father!" following heated arguments with "his children", the perplexed look of other parents at social events who say things like "I don't see the resemblance", and best of all, those awkward unannounced appearances of the kids' biological father with his newer, thinner, hotter, and younger wife or girlfriend in tow.

In the event he does not (slightly) uncuck himself by having his own offspring with said single mother, her genes will still potentially weather all storms and carry on through the ages via her biological children, while his will simply wither and die in an instant on the day of reckoning. All the burdens of fatherhood, yet with no small part of him which will carry on past the grave. No future legacy to pass on.

So "man up" and marry a single mother. It will help economically empower her!

6. He Lets Another Man Sleep With His Wife Or Girlfriend

Yup, that's you on the right!

Why let an otherwise happy and stable relationship go to waste? Let yourself get cucked and embrace a "poly" relationship, one where your wife or girlfriend is allowed to date and have sexual relations with other men. Or at least let her get on Tinder and have a fling with one of those gym junkies with washboard abs and massive pecs once in awhile.

Better yet, the Jewish-dominated pornography industry has the best idea of all! Let your (presumably white) wife fornicate with a well-built black man in your own bedroom, while you sit back in your sportsball jersey and listen to your spouse constantly belittle you. She will love it.

In fact, the only thing that can make this scenario even better is if she gets pregnant from the encounter, and you wind up raising the mixed-race child as your own offspring while baby-daddy goes off on his merry way. Also if your wife just happens to be a few years older than you, and she has at least one child from a previous relationship, then you'll get a bit of all six points rolled into one. How sweet is that!

Conclusion

NOT A CUCK: The Commander-In-Chief of the United States has always enjoyed the company of young, beautiful, and fertile women. He does not marry older women or single mothers, and has raised 5 attractive biological children.

Left leaning men don't want to be like Donald Trump right? Because that man is a monster! Our advice for such men is to do the exact opposite of what "number 45" does as a means of legitimate protest, and this article is a perfect starting point for that. Wife up an older woman with dried up ovaries, go parade around in a Colin Kaepernick's jersey, let your spouse be the Queen, adopt a black baby, and make sure you pay your stepsons annual $30,000 college tuition bill on time.

We sincerely hope we were able to be of service. Happy cucking.

Don't Miss: Is Anthony Bourdain Getting Cucked By His MMA Wife?

John Carver
John Carver is a four year ROK veteran with over fifty articles of SJW-triggering truth bombs on archive. You can follow him on Twitter if you are so inclined.

This Year’s Active Hurricane Season Does Not Prove Global Warming

October 3, 2017 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

Hurricane Irma captured the world’s attention in the beginning of September. By the end of September’s first week, Irma reached its peak intensity with 185 mph (295 km/h) winds, and a minimum pressure of 914 hPa (27.0 inHg). I checked the Wikipedia page and it seems that it is considered the seventh most intense landfall hurricane in the US.

As we know, “never let a good crisis go to waste”. This was the sign for all “Climate enthusiasts” and “Global Warming” people to push their agenda. The mainstream media is there to help. For example, this article in The Economist said:

> One cause is global warming. The frequency and severity of hurricanes vary naturally—America has seen unusually few in the past decade. Yet the underlying global trend is what you would expect from climate change.

So at the same time you blame global warming, even though there is literally no evidence, you have the usual double speak of “It’s because of global warming” while at the same time “There is no actual proof”. Oh, and we forgot the scapegoat, or the devil himself, Trump. The Guardian blamed Trump. No, he did not cause the storms, but it is because of him that there will be more death:

> But the merciless assault on the US mainland by Harvey and Irma should be forcing the president to recognise the consequences of his arrogance and complacency in dismissing the research and analysis carried out by scientists.

The article keeps on going. It states that climate change is not responsible for a specific storm or number of storms, but then it flips back to saying that there are three reasons for climate change to make hurricanes worse: warmer water makes harsher storms, hotter atmosphere makes heavier rain, and higher sea levels make storms more deadly as they have more water to push. So we should understand that global warming is bad, and do everything in our power to reduce CO2 emissions, whatever the cost may be.

Have you heard about the “Hurricane Drought”?

CNS news had an interesting article. Its title was “U.S. Major Hurricane Drought Ends at Record 4,323 Days”. It seems that for twelve years no major hurricane (Category 3 and above) has hit the US. There were nine minor ones (Class 2 and below) and one 2012 superstorm (Sandy), which was not considered a hurricane (post-tropical cyclone). The last “Drought” was 1860-1869.

"The world is presently in an era of unusually low weather disasters. This holds for the weather phenomena that have historically caused the most damage: tropical cyclones, floods, tornadoes and drought." Roger Pielke Jr 2017

I'm a little confused. How can it be that we see less hurricanes, which cause less harm, and at the same time have global warming and more storms? Well, the NOAA clearly states (or less clearly in this case):

> It is premature to conclude that human activities–and particularly greenhouse gas emissions that cause global warming–have already had a detectable impact on Atlantic hurricane or global tropical cyclone activity. That said, human activities may have already caused changes that are not yet detectable due to the small magnitude of the changes or observational limitations.

After 200 years of carbon emissions, which grow more in magnitude, there is no concrete evidence that it actually impacts tropical storms in terms of their creation, magnitude or frequency. We keep hearing that global warming will make it worse, but it does not seem like it.

How about those three reasons mentioned before? Well, here is a funny thing: there is no correlation reported or observed. First, there is no evidence of storms becoming worse. Second, some researchers claim that CO2 emissions and pollution actually balance global warming. Third, sea level rise was just 1-3 mm annually. Claiming that this has a major effect on storms is a new level of absurd, unless you're SJW. In this case, anything goes.

More progress, less casualties

If global warming harms more people, we should actually consider changing the policy, but here is the "craziest" thing: there are less casualties.

In 1900, the "Great Galveston Hurricane", which was "only" a category 4 storm, killed 6000-12000 people. That was the deadliest hurricane recorded. Hurricane Katrina (2005) was the fourth deadliest, killing 1500 persons. You might claim that the difference may not be that big, until one recalls that in 1900 there were about 3 million people in Texas, while Louisiana in 2005 was the home of 4.5 million. So we have less people dying from hurricane over the year – both absolute and relative numbers.

So you are saying that I have no idea what is going on, and that progress is helpful?

Those dreaded fossil fuels are the same ones that evacuated millions of people. Shelters, medicine, and the ability to provide care for the people all rely on fuel. Yep, those same carbon emitting substances that should be reduced.

It seems that deadliest disasters, recorded since 1900, were almost all in under-developed nations. Check out Wikipedia on that. Oh, and only one of them was after the year 2000 (the famous Tsunami of 2004). Europe has last witnessed a natural catastrophe of death toll over 100,000 people in the 16th century (Netherlands – flood). Check out that page, and you will see that there is now rarely a big natural catastrophe of historical scale. Progress, that which have brought us the carbon emissions, has been the major factor in human casualties' reduction.

Global Warming activists – this is your wakeup call

This article paints a clear picture: progress has a positive effect on catastrophe casualties' reduction, while it has an unclear effect on the climate. When it comes to hurricanes it is actually clear that there is no effect. If one wishes to reduce carbon emissions, there is a price, and that price may include human lives.

This web site has dealt before with population reduction. In this case I want to use Hanlon razor – "Never attribute to malice that which is adequately explained by stupidity". I myself, don't believe that there is an actual intent to have more people die in natural catastrophe, but that is my opinion.

This is another wakeup call for climatologists and "global warming" activists

Hurricane Irma is not a wakeup call for president Trump. It is a wakeup call for climatologists and "global warming" activists. Show some humility and admit that the situation is a complex one. Stop trying to engineer the climate. Stop messing with the economy; you are only playing into the hands of the elite. Look at the data, sea levels may not even be rising. I'm not saying that pollution is good, but I am saying that a binary state of mind (we are good, anyone else is evil) is wrong.

Read Next: History Is Full Of Climate Change Myths That Were Used To Control Human Behavior

Dawn Pine
Dawn Pine (aka TheMaleBrain) is an Israeli 40+ divorced father of 2, former casualty of the blue-pill. Since he has taken the red pill his hobbies are: working out, writing, mentoring, harem management and self improvement.

5 Authentic Activities That Can Test A Man's Character

October 3, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

ROK writer Corey Savage is right to assert that one of the most authentic manifestations of masculinity is warfare. Everything else is pretty much only surrogate activities and often "inauthentic" as such (for example martial arts).

But a man should be hesistant to join an armed force and fight alongside the globalists, even though the underlying training process is constructive, masculine, and helpful whenever real catastrophes occur. An exception would perhaps be to fight ISIS but as much as I sympathize with Kurds and other Middle Easterners who suffer from the damages caused by the Sunni terrorist sect, I am hesitant to join them in their battles at this point.

Therefore a more individualistic approach might be taken, which also has the benefit of not imposing a person's endeavor on anybody else. Both the German philologist Friedrich Nietzsche and the Italian cultural analyst Julius Evola have emphasized the importance of having a riskful existence (Evola himself became partially paralyzed after sauntering around in Vienna while the Austrian city experienced severe bomb attacks during World War II) and I also think life becomes incomplete if one merely lives through a petty, safe existence.

During the pre-family stage of a man's life (often until 30-40 years of age during current circumstances), or in some cases during the last stages of it, a man can partake in a number of risky and authentic activities that will put him to the test. Below are a couple of concrete suggestions.

1. Snorkeling and scuba diving

Snorkeling and scuba diving are generally safe pursuits, but once you choose your own spots and conditions, or diverge from the typical safe route that a guide or instructor have provided for you, things become riskier and indeed real.

For instance, at the Great Barrier Reef in Australia, one can meet fairly large reef sharks and lethal stingrays. Also the weather conditions, such as the wave and currents, affect the level of risk.

2. Mountaineering and hiking

Needless to say, mountaineering and hiking can be sketchy. For instance, K2 in the Himalayas are one of the tougest peaks to conquer and there are many more such around the world, not just in Central Asia. Perhaps it is wise to start with a less demanding and expensive route and then decide afterwards if it is something for you or not.

Hiking can also be a real challenge. Personally I prefer (sub)tropical areas, like Taiwan, since they bring an exotic flavor to the senses and make you sweat a lot, but locations in temperate or arctic climate can be interesting to penetrate as well.

3. Urban exploration

ROK writer André Du Pôle has examined the Paris catacombs and I myself has endured similar activities in the Swedish capital.

Urban exploration is an excellent way to magnify the personality traits openness to experience and psychopathy. You need to be or become a little crazy in order to walk around in dark tunnels, hospitals or whatnot. It can also be combined with some more theoretical and practical knowledge of the particular environments that you visit. Asylums, for example, tend to be interesting.

Furthermore, a man can do less planned city walks in various shady neighborhoods, like Tijuana in Mexico or some American equivalent. Stay alert.

4. Wildlife excursions

[image]

Akin to hiking, wildlife excursions constitute another method to explore the real, objective earth authentically. Of course one can generally follow a safe route, but there are various ways in which a man can depart from it too.

I recall for instance when I walked around on Rincah Island in Indonesia, densely populated with the famous Komodo dragons, with only a stick as a tool to use if confronted by the big varans. And I met plenty of them from a very small range.

Of course there are many places in the U.S., Australia, Africa, and Europe which likewise offer risky encounters with wild animals.

5. Parachuting

I've only tried parachuting once, in tandem with an instructor. It is very unlikely in that case for something to go wrong. Hence it resembles a more extreme roller coaster ride, and therefore it is a borderline case with regard to authenticity.

However, the experience is still very thrilling and should be lived through at least once in a lifetime. It is also possible to continue with single-person jumps as a hobby, and which implies that a man has to take full responsibility for the process.

A much more extreme form is to fly with wingsuits, but that is a bit too difficult, expensive, and risky in my opinion. I rather stick with more simple and natural tasks.

In closing

A man, before building a family at least, should occasionally transcend his safe modern existence and try some fun or thrilling activities that will remind him that he lives. If he does not die from it, of course.

If you want to read more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: 8 Ways To Live A Virtuous Life In The Modern Age

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Media Is Upset That Men Don't Want To Sleep With Trannies And Other "Nonbinary" Freaks

October 4, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

A few months ago, Vice came out with an article, "Why Can't My Famous Gender Nonconforming Friends Get Laid?" Like a rubbernecker passing by a gruesome auto accident, I couldn't help looking.

> Alok and Jacob are two of the most publicly visible gender nonconforming femmes I know. As a performance poet, Alok has just gone solo after touring in dozens of cities in the US and abroad as one half of the poetry duo Darkmatter. Jacob was named to 2016's OUT 100, has made a web series for NBC, and been the subject of a GLAAD-nominated episode of MTV's True Life. Both are trans-identified, but belong somewhere in between genders, and they've amassed huge social media followings as gender nonbinary, femme, and fabulous human beings. They've become celebrities in their own right, with Jacob regularly walking down the red carpet at LGBTQ galas and Alok featuring in the Janet Mock—narrated HBO documentary The Trans List.

The most common transsexuals are men believing they're women. However, a different subset considers themselves neither male nor female. It's quite strange how quickly exotic, hair-splitting gradations like "genderqueer" and "non-binary" have sprouted up; terms nobody heard much about until the last few years. Apparently being a very self-convinced drag queen just isn't enough any more.

Anyway, so these two got a pretty decent amount of publicity—more than the average person's allotted "fifteen minutes of fame"—thanks to the media making this part of their agenda in recent years. So does this social proof enhance their social life? Apparently, it doesn't. Big surprise, right?

Dating apps are a vast wasteland (actually, we agree)

20,000 suitors? Decisions, decisions…

The article continues:

> But if you think all that would land them a date, you'd be wrong. And nobody is more puzzled than me as to why such obvious catches are having dating problems when so many clamor for their attention.

Then, the author (based on personal experience in dating as a transsexual) advises them on setting up a Tinder profile:

> "OMG, I'm going to switch my gender to 'woman' too so I can look at straight guys!" Alok exclaimed as they picked up their phone, and Jacob followed suit. I'd vaguely known that most of their prospects had been gay-identified men, but it didn't even occur to me that if given only two gender choices, they would need to pick "man" on Tinder so they would get gay instead of straight matches, along with the rare bi and pan guys.

The author prefers dating straight guys, finding them "more willing to experiment with GNC [gender non-conforming] folk than gay guys, because their attractions aren't as socially defined and don't come with a lifestyle attached" as well as more numerous. In that case, male thirst is worse than I imagined.

> “Straight boys are soooo cuuuute,” Alok said as they and Jacob started swiping, their exaggerated intonation managing to feel both sincere and ironic. “Maybe we should get electrolysis and take hormones,” Jacob added in jest, perking up at the bevy of new options.
>
> Loading…

Oh dear…

The greater problem

For argument’s sake, let’s take the author’s word that these two are indeed great catches. Actually, I have to hand it to Alok—anyone who can make it as a professional poet these days has accomplished the impossible. However, there’s still a problem. Gay guys can have their cool moments (it helps if being gay isn’t their only hobby). However, that doesn’t make straight guys want to bang them. If I were on Tinder, this wouldn’t quite be what I’d want to find.

As for gays, they have their own set of preferences. “No fats, fems, or fags” is apparently pretty standard boilerplate on their personal ads. They like what they like too. “Jocks” and “twinks” are quite popular, and “bears” also have their following. Although swishy queens are the common gay stereotype, they’re not highly prized.

So, despite whatever personal charisma some gender-benders might have, they’re turning on neither straight guys nor gays. Would women be interested in them? That’s not too likely, either. Men quite often get shot down for merely misdemeanor levels of insufficient machismo, such as being too nice or failing a Shit Test. It’s Game 101, and hardly needs repeating. As for lesbians, they generally don’t believe the dress-up show.

As for the final results:

> Between the three of us, Jacob seemed to have the most exciting life, dating-wise. Between moving to a new city and working on a glamorous, award-winning TV show, their life was full of newfound opportunities to meet prospects. But by Valentine’s Day, they’d ended up in a crisis: The supposedly femme-friendly gay guy they’d been hanging out with for weeks told them he didn’t end up reciprocating their crush. It’s a scenario that’s played out over and over again for them.

Apparently, there’s no escaping the Friend Zone, even on the Dark Side! I’m not sure how crashing and burning after several weeks qualifies as an exciting dating life. Given the gay community’s extreme libertinism, if these two can’t get any action, it’s time to rethink their strategy more fundamentally.

Somebody has to tell the truth about this

The biological principle of sexual dimorphism means that the two sexes—yes, there are two—have physical differences. Some of these serve as mating cues. In humans, two classic examples (among others) are a woman's hourglass figure and a man's muscular frame. Characteristics like these cause attraction on sight. There are important psychological attributes too, which is why wimpy guys and unladylike women aren't popular.

By default, males are attracted to female characteristics, and females are attracted to male characteristics. (One needn't be an evolutionary biologist to understand why.) For homosexuals, the preferences are reversed. Whichever sex someone likes, only the real thing will do, because there's just no faking it. However, presenting oneself as neither male nor female doesn't attract anyone. That's as wrong as two boys fucking.

Read More: 11 More Ways The Elite Psychologically Severs Us Through Harmful Conditioning

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Why Is Day Game Such A Grind?

October 4, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Anyone who has tried game in more than one of its forms (day game, night game, online game, social circle game, etc.) are aware that day game offers a particularly low return on investment (ROI).

Although its proselytisers try to paint day game as a walk in the park (perhaps literally) where you don't have to deal with drunkenness, cockblocks or AMOGs, the reality, as most men who have tried it will attest, is that it's a grind. A grind to get phone number and then a grind to make anything meaningful happen as a result. Even some of the best players in the world report a conversion rate of only around 11%. Why is this the case, and what should you do to improve your odds?

The reason day game can provide little tangible benefit for hours of work is simple: it all comes down to lack of trust. In fact a lack of trust that is built into the day game model itself. Put simply, day game requires you to walk up to a woman you have never met before, in a totally random context, talk to her for a few moments, and hope to seduce her as a result. When put like this, is it any wonder that social circle and even night game tend to produce faster and more prolific results? The act of cold approach in the day time is socially unusual and a big ask for girls to go along with.

Conditions for Trust

This week I attended a talk by the British journalist and author Ian Leslie, who has written a number of books including Born Liars on the subject on lying in the 'post-truth' era. This was an advertising industry event, and Leslie was there to discuss the notion of trust as it pertains to brands marketing their goods and services. Put simply, trust in big corporations is at an all-time low right now. You only have to look at the respective reputations of Uber and Ryanair in the UK at the moment to see that.

Leslie wanted to talk to us about what he termed the necessary 'conditions for trust'. These could apply to advertising, but equally to friendship, business, diplomacy between nations, and everything else in between. The conditions he named are:

- Time
- Consistency
- Ritual

What does this mean when we think about it from an interpersonal perspective. Well, if you spend a lot of time with someone, if they are consistent with you in terms of their contact, and indeed, if seeing them becomes a ritual for you then you are much more likely to feel truth in them than if any one of these conditions doesn't apply.

Perhaps unsurprisingly, this is also true when we apply it to intergender dynamics. Some time ago I conducted an experiment where I completed 100 cold day game approaches in a month. At the same time I was also doing social circle and night game approaches too.

Thanks to this effort I succeeded in getting laid abundantly. But what was most interesting was that the girls I slept with were not, in the main, from the day game I undertook, even though this was where most of my efforts had gone. No, the girls I got into bed were largely from social circle and night game.

Why might this be? Hopefully it’s obvious if you’ve been following so far. The girls I met through social circle trusted me more because I met the three necessary conditions. I had naturally spent more time with them than the girls from day game. I was consistent in seeing them (for example, a couple were girls from work who I saw every day). And there was ritual involved in our meeting—for example, one of the girls I would meet for secret cups of coffee in the canteen every day at 4pm.

Trust is Super Important

In game we get so hung up on attraction, attraction, attraction that we tend to forget about trust (or comfort). I’m not talking here about trust in a blue-pill, hands-around-the-world, kumbaya-type way, but on a very base level she’s got to trust that you are a normal guy who isn’t going to turn psycho on her, or stalk her or whatever. And of course, that is far easier when you are someone she sees regularly.

This, as I’ve argued before, is the principal problem with day game—it’s often not grounded enough. It looks too player-ish and contrived. That’s why even when you get a phone number there’s a good chance it will flake. When she’s gone home and had time to think there’s every chance that she (or one of her friends) will revise her opinion on the value of meeting up with you.

Acceptance Prophecy

How to counter this? There are no easy answers. Am I saying, though, that you should avoid day game? No, not at all. I've done day game since the early 2000's and I've got laid through it loads of times, so it can definitely work, but you must bear trust in mind when you go out. Yes, it's fine to appear like frothy 'player' for the first few minutes. But after a time you really do need to pull back just a little, and act normally as well.

Another concept that might help with this that Leslie introduced us to was 'the acceptance prophecy" (The Reign of Error, Stinson et al, 2009,). The idea here is that there are social optimists and social pessimists, and that loneliness compounds. That being the case, if you are a social pessimist and you go out thinking that no one likes you then this is likely to become a self-fulfilling prophecy. Alternatively if you decide that everyone is pleased to meet you then the opposite will occur.

On this basis, when you go out to meet girls through day game, always do so with the mindset that she will like you and welcome your approach. Simply doing that will make it more likely that you will get a positive reception and this will compound, building warmth and trust between the two of you. To push this further, it's worth approaching each new girl as though you'd known her for years. If you refuse to accept the frame that you are 'strangers meeting in an unusual way' then she will feel more comfortable, and you are much more likely to generate that valuable trust that is so crucial for success.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: What Is The End Game Of Game?

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Every Man Must Visit His Ancestral Village

October 4, 2017 | by Papa Selo | Link | Original Link

My appreciation for Croatia grows deeper every time I visit. This week I went to my “selo” (pronounced sell-oh). The Selo to me is more than just a summer respite between trips down the coast, so the direct translation of “village” doesn’t quite cut it.

To me the Selo is homemade wine; it’s barrel-brewed rakija (fruit brandy bordering on moonshine), the bursting fragrance of the overripe plums, figs and pomegranates from which this traditional liquor derives. The Selo is old babas (grandmothers) covered in the black shawls with which they honor their long-dead husbands—warriors who served and died defending their homeland during several generations of Balkan war.

The Selo is traditional women playfully berating you for not eating enough just after stuffing you full with freshly-baked bread, a hearty stew and all the lamb you can stomach. The Selo is Bura, the sharp, howling Northern wind that emerges with absolutely no warning and just as rapidly decays into nothing, a signal perhaps to unwelcome visitors that their time here is fleeting.

To me, the Selo is a home that is at once very real and a very distant dream. Despite the tranquility of it all, there are three practical reasons to visit your ancestral village: knowing where you come from is incredibly grounding, knowing your options improves your bottom line in life as a negotiator, and knowing yourself gives you peace of mind. All of this knowledge is best found in the Selo.

Know Where You Come From

While the Selo may be bountiful, it doesn't come without its problems. Though many of my cousins' fathers had perished in war not more than a generation ago (those who didn't tend to drink themselves into a stupor) their sons have since been blessed with beautiful lives, families of their own, and vast tracts of untaxed land to build up into whatever future they might envision.

As for me, I may command a higher salary at a corporate job, but I've had to learn game just to stay afloat within the unnatural, toxic maze of sex-signalling internet whores and masculine Third Wave Feminists that comprise the North American dating market today. Despite the relative chastity and traditional values of Croatian-Canadian women, I'm still too young to marry (at least back in the West where most Croatian women do still pursue an education and career).

At the end of the day, it is reassuring to know that there is a life beyond Canada that better reflects my true values, and that the people living out just such a life are doing perfectly fine. This, in stark contrast to Western media's typical portrayal of the sullen-eyed Slav and his supposedly dismal xenophobic culture makes me feel more at home in my convictions. Growing up in an anti-White cesspool such as Canada can be stifling. Exposing yourself to visceral examples of your heritage is a remedy to false multiculturalism that cannot be experienced merely by watching YouTube videos.

Know Yourself

Everyday I've been here I've walked past at least one pregnant or child-rearing woman about my age or younger who in Vancouver could just as easily be showering herself in male attention with Twitch or Patreon donations, funding her useless Liberal Arts degree by stripping nude online whenever it pleases her. At my advanced age (I'm just shy of 25), I'm no stranger to village marriage solicitations—insomuch as they are announced in half-joking manner by well-meaning parents who wish to capitalize on some North American social value for their daughters, they often do represent real dating opportunities.

While many men in the West are driven to their brink and feel as though they have no option other than to expatriate, as a dual-citizen I'm caught between. It's at the stage of my life that I wonder if I've been robbed of a better one. While my cousins are limited by their geography—and for many of them, a college degree and proficiency in English—I remain in the purgatory of indecision.

Should I spend the next few years working hard to build a location-independent income just to return to Europe and marry my future village bride anyway or should I take the plunge and simply live as my cousins do, open an olive oil business and grind out my days as a young family man sooner rather than later?

In the Selo, "divorce rape" is what happens to a harlot's reputation if she dares leave you, not what happens to your wallet when a biased court system strips you of everything you own. While my closest relatives reap in the natural delights that an investment in family entails, I constantly question whether I'm really doing anything better with my life, if the celebrity I experience for being a "stranac" (ethnic foreigner with money) has any real lasting value. In the past two years, I've learned some new programming languages, I've drank some new kinds of beer and I've captured a handful of new flags. What else new will I really gain from another ten years of being a bachelor?

Know Your Options

Whereas in the past I was annoyed by the overt honesty and intrusiveness of village folk, I've since come to appreciate their open, non-chalant nature. As I grow older, I feel more and more valued in their presence. I wonder if this is what it feels like to be a camgirl or Instagram Babe in North America. To tell you the truth, it feels alright. The best part is that I don't have to strip naked while feigning allegiance to some fictitious social movement such as "body positivity" in order to prove my worth.

All a man requires to be successful here, with woman or in business, is a consistent work ethic, integrity, and a willingness to tell compelling stories. More than anything, whenever I visit the Selo I come face-to-face with the kind of life I could live if I were willing to make the commitment. This gives me a mental edge when it comes to negotiating with business partners, employers, and whatever else life has to throw at me. If all else fails, I know that I could live a life of relative splendor for next to no financial burden, even if at the expense of some of the more comfortable aspects of modernity, such as a high monthly salary, a marginally better Netflix selection and legal Marijuana.

Chuang-tzu once said that “the wise man knows it is better to sit on the banks of a remote mountain stream than to be emperor of the whole world.” I would agree and add that’s it’s better to be a poor, happy Seljak (villager) than a prostrate corporate yuppie with a 6-figure salary. If you ever have the chance to visit your Selo, whether in Europe, Vietnam, India, or elsewhere—whether you can speak the language fluently or not—do not neglect your chance to do so. Take advantage of every opportunity. The Selo knows you best. The more you know about yourself, the less uncertain you’ll feel about your future.

Fuck the Selo for showing me what I could have yet don’t possess, but God Bless it for showing me who I am.

Read More: The Best Time To Visit Europe If You Have Strong Romantic Intent

Papa Selo
Papa Selo is a Croatian philosopher with an old soul. Aside from tending to his olive trees in the heart of Dalmatia, his singular passion is fjaka (doing absolutely nothing) in his village by the Adriatic sea.

PUA Game Is Not Enough To Keep The Girl You Like

October 5, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Broadly, there are two types of “game.” The first type is pick-up artist (PUA) game: the art of meeting girls and getting them to go out on a date—or more. The second type is relationship game: the ability to stay in a relationship with the high quality female of your choice. Unfortunately, just because you are good at one does not mean you will be good at the other. Unless you plan to become a monk, you need to be adept with both types.

Pick-up game qualities

Soy-faced beta male attempts pick-up game at coffee shop

A man with good pick-up game has a certain set of qualities. Probably the most important of these is self-confidence. If you have self-confidence and nothing else, you can still have good pick-up game.

I encountered a great example of this while I was still dating my future wife. One of her friends was dating a very shady character that she met at a club. Even though this guy didn't have much going for him, he was very effective at presenting himself as a man to reckoned with. Whenever he went out, he made sure he was dressed like James Bond. Even though he had a minimum wage job and no marketable skills, he created a Facebook page where he listed himself as CEO of some imaginary company. More importantly, the man exhibited bulletproof self-confidence. When he spoke to girls, he gave off the impression of being a very important person. Using his technique, he was able to pull some very attractive girls, live with them with them for a period until they caught on to his true situation, and then move on to another target.

The second most important factor in good pick-up game is having the ability to carry on a conversation. If you look like a Brad Pitt but are unable to chat comfortably, you will never be able to refine your pick-up game to high levels. Some pick-up artists use predetermined pick-up lines, but I never used them and had pretty good success in every venue except nightclubs where girls are naturally copping an attitude and where the music is so loud that conversation is impossible. Simply developing good general conversation skills—talking to a girl is really not too different from talking to your friends—is probably a better use of time than memorizing a script.

Of course, it helps to be good looking but it is not as important as confidence and the ability to chat. Regardless of what you may hear girls do prefer buff men. A man did an experiment on Tinder where he posted a picture of a very fit male model, but included some strong red-pill statements. Despite his "misogynist" sentiments, women were fawning all over him hoping to get noticed. When it comes to physical appearance, cleanliness and dressing well can’t hurt either.

Finally, attitude is also important to pick-up game. If you give off an air of desperation, you will have little success. There are other more esoteric concepts that you can find here on ROK. Those concepts can be helpful, but if you have the qualities mentioned above, your pick-up game will be solid.

Relationship game qualities

Most websites that talk about game stop at pick-up game. But most men do not want to hop from woman to woman for the rest of their lives. We want to settle down with a single, high-quality woman. Being able to keep a high quality woman also requires game, but the qualities it requires are different from those required in pick-up game. Some of them are shared.

For example, self-confidence is critical to relationship game. Women want a leader they can trust. The difference is that when you are in a relationship, you can’t fake self-confidence because your wife or girlfriend will see you at your worst moments. She will see the real you and if the image you’ve constructed doesn’t match reality, she will lose interest.

Another quality of good relationship game is being able to provide. While some women are just immoral gold diggers, all women are naturally wired to seek out a man who can provide her in and her children with food, shelter, and protection. Ideally, women want to marry an alpha male who can provide. If no alphas are available to her, a woman will settle down with a beta male who is a good provider. This is a bad situation as women always gravitate to alpha males, even after marriage. The phrase, alpha fucks, beta bucks conveys a lot of truth. Therefore, it is critical to up your social status if you plan to stay in a relationship.

A third important quality is having a mission. Women want to be loved and cherished but they don’t want a man whose entire universe is his woman. Please don’t be that guy who loses his life and merges into his woman like some weird parasite. Discerning a mission is not always easy but once you find it, it will focus your life like nothing else.

Communication skills—listening and being able to verbalize what you are thinking—are critical to a successful long-term relationship. You don’t have to worry about being interesting so much as being able to genuinely converse about what matters. Allied with this, a man needs to be a true friend of his spouse/girlfriend.

Just as in pick-up game, maintaining your looks is necessary in a relationship. Turning into a slob after you get a girlfriend or get married is a good way of encouraging your woman to look elsewhere. That said, once you are in a relationship, especially marriage, looks take a backseat to the other qualities.

Last but not least, love is requirement for a successful long term relationship. That doesn’t mean that you have to feel infatuated with your partner, but you must love your girl as you love yourself. After all, if you don’t love your woman, why are you in a relationship with her?

Conclusion

To be a well-rounded man, you must have a good degree of both types of game. You’ll need pick-up game to meet the women you want to meet, and once you’ve met one you want to settle down with, you’ll need relationship game to keep her. The good news is that if you are missing one or both types of game, it is possible to develop the qualities through diligent effort.

Read More: The Father Of Relationship Game Shares His Secrets

---

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

The Official Narrative Of The Las Vegas Shooting Is Bullshit

October 5, 2017 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

Here we go again. Although I was hoping we'd make it out of 2017 without some mass shootings, we picked up one last weekend on Sunday night on the Las Vegas Strip, where a gunman began shooting from a hotel room into an outside-venue concert across the Strip and continued until the police battered in the hotel room door to find him dead. Many, many questions have been asked about these events, and there aren't answers to be had. We'll talk today about some of the details that have emerged, the theories, and the government spin.

Details

Although it's undergone some revision, the current reports have it that the gunman, one Stephen Craig Paddock (have to use all three names, for some reason, when talking about serial killers, assassins, and the like) had a lot of weapons in his hotel room, but none of them were fully automatic. This was after CNN desperately drummed up some experts saying how easy it is to convert a semi-auto AR-15 into a fully auto version.

Folks, as I come off hiatus to once again don the ROK Gun Writer hat, I can assure you that it is, in fact, NOT easy to modify an AR-15 into a fully automatic rifle, or, to be more precise, a select fire rifle. The serialized (as in, has the official "number" of the gun) part is the lower receiver. That is "the gun" and everything else is a part bolted onto "the gun." You can buy registered fully automatic guns (discussed in a bit) and registered fully automatic capable parts, but those parts will not fit in an AR-15 lower receiver as there is extra aluminum there on purpose to block them.

The idea is to make it as mechanically difficult to mount full auto hardware in a semi-auto receiver as it is to just make a new receiver on a mill. That requires skill, and time, and good machinery to do. It's easier (but more expensive) to undergo the background checks, get permission from the government, and buy one of the "transferable" machine guns that are now all over 30 years old, pre-dating the 1986 legislation stopping the sale of new ones.

However, Paddock didn't have any fully auto weapons, either legally obtained select fires (as described above) or hack jobs where you make the gun into a runaway that will dump mags until it runs out of ammo (which is technically full auto, but really dangerous.) What he had was at least one rifle modified with a "bump fire" device.

A Vegas suite, some rifles, and presumably the dead shooter.

Bump firing is the idea of rapidly pressing a semi-automatic trigger to mimic full auto cyclic rates. The term comes from modifying the gun to hold your trigger finger steady and press the rifle into it. The gun will go off, recoil will happen, the action will cycle, the gun will come forward, and "bump" your finger, doing it all over again.

A very popular bump fire stock, the SSAR-15 by Slide Fire Solutions, involves a free floating stock with pistol grip and "trigger finger rest" that will hold steady while the rest of the rifle recoils. You simply place your finger across and in front of the trigger onto the rest, and push the gun (and trigger) forward with your support hand, and the cycle happens.

SSAR-15 stock by Slide Fire. Note the pistol grip and trigger finger rest, all part of the stationary stock. You press the fore-end forward, moving the trigger into your finger.

I own one of these very stocks, although I have not had it mounted on a rifle in years. Bump firing is a cute little trick to do at a range, but all it does is burn up ammo and pretend to be fully auto. It's not fully auto; it's way too slow. If you listen to the shots in the videos, that's not automatic gunfire you are hearing (although everyone says it is,) it's extremely fast semi auto-shooting. An M-16 will truck along at 400-900 shots a minute, which is a minimum of around 7 shots a second. I don't think Paddock's guns were running that fast; they seemed to be going some 50-70% of full auto speed and were similar to bump fire speeds (which need to reset and break the trigger each shot.)

The real reason bump firing and their stocks, or other things like a hell crank trigger are just toys is because of the absolutely horrible degradation in accuracy you suffer while using them. A reasonably competent marksman, with a rest, at the 300-400 yards at which Paddock was shooting, should have been able to connect with every shot had he been shooting an AR-15 the way it was designed.

300 yards with a decent, but fixed, amount of drop is fairly easy shooting with a bipod and rest. However, if you're pushing a bump fire device, accuracy suffers to an extreme degree.

However, he apparently was just dumping Sure Fire coffin mags (which hold either 60 or 100, depending on the model and are easily identified by their doubled thickness) into the crowd and not really aiming. Multiple guns were found in the hotel room, and more were found in his home.

Theories

The guys over at RVF have come up with seven theories of what might have happened:

> 1. Lone-wolf "snap" theory: He was angry, frustrated, or bored at life. He had simmering mental or financial issues that went undetected. This caused him to snap and plan a military-style shooting. This is the current mainstream narrative.
>
> 2. Lone-wolf "radical" theory: He's a far-left/antifa sympathizer. He wanted to kill conservatives while advancing gun control or civil war. The authorities are hiding his motive to prevent a political or national crisis.
>
> 3. Deep state asset theory: He's an undercover agent that was participating in a high-level arms deal. The arms deal went bad and the buyers covered their tracks by mowing down a crowd. Possible variant: Mexican bagman.
>
> 4. Deep state false flag theory: This was a deep state operation (CIA/FBI) to advance a police state agenda (body scanners, gun control, facial recognition etc.). Paddock is the fall guy they murdered and placed in the crime scene.
>
> 5. ISIS theory: He was radicalized by ISIS to kill infidels. He may or may not have > had assistance from ISIS members to carry out the attack.

>
> 6. Far-left terrorism theory (including multiple shooters): He was part of a larger far-left cell that had planned for massive destruction in Las Vegas. The plan went wrong and he became the patsy while the FBI shields the truth to prevent mass panic.
>
> 7. Independent arms dealer theory. He was dealing arms illegally and independently of any sanctioned government black-op program. Some of his clients murdered him and the Las Vegas victims in a deal gone bad.

In addition, how did a guy get so many pounds of weaponry up into a hotel room, defeat the window and the security and the fire alarm, then rain down automatic hell for so long?

More to the point, why did he do it? Paddock was not a "gun guy;" no one knew he had guns, knew guns, or used them. Me, I'm an amateur enthusiast with a modest collection, but my close confidants would say "yeah, he has guns and knows how to shoot."

None of it makes sense. His brother has no clue; he sent his girlfriend to the Philippines so she'd be out of the country when this went down (and she doesn't know anything, apparently, either) and even ISIS has claimed credit multiple times for the event (while some Muslims have the temerity to lecture us about terrorism; they ARE experts in the field, after all.) He was a white, retired, accountant, and those aren't the kind of guys who shoot up country concerts, even if it WAS Bro-Country.

The really interesting thing is that no one actually saw him shooting. He was dead, amongst a pile of guns, when the police broke down the door. It's a stretch, but this all may be a setup.

As the reports come in about more and more guns that Paddock purchased over the years, and how they were stashed in multiple locations, and how he apparently did a casing run the previous week, the pundits have tried to put some spin on it, with very little traction.

Spin

Hillary, desperate to retain relevancy after getting Trumped last November, starting tweeting politics too soon, and got shut down by people of good taste. Other liberal politicians, who took a more measured response, have found precious little to work with and an unreceptive, GOP dominated government of whom they must convince of the merits of their gun control ideas.

These two bitches got right to work.

Just like the Congressional Baseball shooting, there is not a whole lot of gun control to be done here. Automatic rifles and machine guns are illegal for citizens to own without massive amounts of legal procedures, and have been that way for 30 years. Automatic weapons simply are no longer used in US crime because they are all accounted for, and you really don't need automatic fire for much of anything other than making a statement.

I will say it here; bump fire stocks are stupid, and have no place on a serious man's rifle (which is why mine is in a box). They won't be banned, because they don't matter. It would be like banning the SKS used in the previous shooting; it's an old gun surpassed by most everything and banning it would accomplish nothing.

The pundits can't even decide if it's the worst shooting in US history (it's not) or just "modern history." It appears that the only real casualty of the gun control agenda is that the bill on legalizing suppressors will probably die in the House, even though Paddock used none in his attack.

Some country artists are trying to go for the sympathy plea and vocally saying they were wrong and that country music artists need to be pro-gun control. I think they'll find that this will further solidify the schism between real Country and Bro-Country, and the only ones who will follow them will be their fellow tractor-rap fans.

Conclusion

People are wondering why a retired white guy collected guns and then planned and carried out an assault. He wasn't a gun guy, apparently had no motive, and wasn't acting in an unplanned rage. He had no kids, no wife, a girlfriend he met while gambling, which seemed to be his only vice, and a penchant for being left alone.

My only theory on the matter is, as American society fractures further, and more and more people go into their old age with never really having had a family of their own or any serious connection, romantically or otherwise, we will see more of these style of events.

The danger with the liberal solution of dealing with discontented, unfulfilled people with access to guns of removing those guns is that you still have those unhappy people, and they will eventually find a way to make themselves heard, with guns or with other means of violence. Perhaps we should examine ways to better our dysfunctional society and stop causing these people to be so disconnected in the first place.

Read More: Las Vegas Tragedy: Over 50 Dead In Worst Mass Shooting In United States History

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

Body Modifications Are Getting Out Of Control

October 5, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The human body is a work of art. However, since antiquity people have tampered with it. Sometimes it was for fashion, and sometimes to mark criminals and slaves. Today's efforts are pretty dreadful.

Tattoos

Res ipse loquitur.

In times past, tattoos were pretty rare. For the most part, that was for sailors, truckers, bikers, and circus people. A woman with tattoos might be a hooker, or at least someone you wouldn't introduce to Mom. These days, it's pretty common to see people inked up nearly as much as Yakuza gangsters or South Seas islanders.

Why this is bad: Tattoos are forever. If you change your mind, tough. One of my exes (Stripper One) tried to get a simple tattoo lasered off, an expensive procedure. It left bright red scars, and the guy didn't even finish the job. Stripper Two got a tramp stamp of her ex's name, someone she now surprisingly hates. That made the doggy style position a rather surreal experience.

Summary: Surely I'm sounding like an old fogey here. Fine, I'm guilty as charged. I won't say never ever get inked, but please, be judicious. Don't put a picture on your body if it's not artistically good enough for your living room wall, okay?

Piercings

Critical failure on OSI Layer 8

Delving further into strange territory, body piercings became a fad in the Victorian demi-monde. However, after that, women (with the exception of Gypsies) seldom pierced their ears until the 1960s. Piercing anything else was pretty much unthinkable. Then, body piercing got revived by the California gay leather BDSM scene back in the 1970s. During the 1980s, guys started piercing their ears too.

Later in the decade, a few celebrities got navel rings, and it was all downhill from there. Then the new vogue was inserting ironmongery into lips, eyebrows, nipples, the junk, and even the perineum (you don't want to know).

One time, I talked a seventeen year old girl out of getting a facial piercing, one that would've looked particularly awful. Since she's from a devout Jewish family, I saved her from committing a sin, one that would've marked her as a real weirdo among her community. Let nobody say I'm incapable of a good deed.

Why this is bad: While healing, piercings must be cleaned regularly, typically with a medical-grade iodine solution. Even so, problems can still happen; here's one of the horror stories I know. One of my exes got her navel pierced, against my advice. Before long, she got a wicked infection. When the rash had spread across her belly, from the sternum to the bush, she got the hint and took the thing out. As I remind my girlfriends, "Mussolini is always right!"

Summary: For women, ear piercings are tolerable but pointless. In India (only), nose piercings work—it's their culture—but I still don't get it. Regarding anything else, it's not going to enhance any babe's beauty, but it sure as hell can detract from it. As for guys, if you're tempted to put holes in yourself that don't belong, then be like Amy Winehouse and say "No, no, no!"

Larger holes

The problem glasses are the first mistake.

Hipsters quite frequently get ear gauges. With time, they can be stretched wide enough to fit a hand through them. Is it to be different like all their friends, or do they need a place to hang clothes? Occasionally they'll do this to their noses too, a reminder to the rest of us that the Apocalypse is nigh.

More rarely, someone will inflict this horror on his/her/its mouth. Perhaps East African lip plates will one day be the next big thing. (Some tribes started that to discourage Arab slave traders from capturing them, but you'll never hear about that in your history class.) As we'll soon see, just about everything else anyone can imagine to ruin their appearance has already been tried.

Why this is bad: There are ways to conceal tattoos and piercings, but big holes are a career-limiting move. Worse, it requires surgery to correct this mistake.

Summary: No. Just no.

Below the skin

Me so horny

For the really ambitious, there are other options, such as beads or spikes emerging from the head. Those Borg implants are secured using a subcutaneous doohickey similar to a drywall spreader. Objects also can be implanted fully beneath the skin, sort of like having a permanent Klingon forehead.

Why this is bad: There's more than the ugly factor to consider. Since most shops doing body modification will usually refuse to do things like this, some people perform surgery on themselves. There are even websites encouraging this, with instructions. I hate to burst anyone's bubble, but surgery is for doctors; they have years of training and know what they're doing.

Summary: Since the most comparable things are Borg implants and Klingon tire tracks, it's clear that this stuff makes people look like aliens. What a way to display taste and sophistication!

The really weird stuff

Yes, the banana split is metaphorical.

The final category is not for the faint of heart, making all the above seem pretty tame. Skip the following if you're hungry; you've been warned.

Some examples I've heard about include repositioning the nail cuticle further back on one's fingers (why—just WHY?), injecting saline into the scrotum (artificial bravery?), castration, splitting the tongue in half, splitting the dick in half, and that ain't all.

Why this is bad: Those who don't understand are beyond the point of reason.

Summary: Those who like this stuff should start with castration first. This will help cleanse the gene pool, which needs a stiff dose of chlorine.

Et enfin

"Romney lost? Awesome!"

The human body in its natural form looks fine as is; all that's necessary is good hygiene and staying in shape. We should respect our bodies; they're the only ones we have. I could go on a political tangent and wax eloquently about how the "everything normal sucks" meme is making the world uglier, but hopefully you get the picture.

Read More: Tattoos Are Not Artistic, Unique, Or Rebellious

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

I Went To Paris To Visit A Girl And She Gave Me The Cold Shoulder

October 5, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Most men are somewhere in between “alpha” and “beta” behavior, depending on context. Since romantic betatude is generally detrimental for attracting women, a man would have to change his inner state of being if those inclinations ever happen to take a stronghold over him. This happened to me a number of years ago, and I will explain how I quickly decided to change my ways and steer them towards more fertile soil.

A great year with a ~~disillusioned~~ hopeful ending

2009 was a great year. I had an attractive Swedish girlfriend – who happened to be a neurotic and histrionic energy thief, but that is another story – and when we broke up I went to Japan and experienced a fair share of Oriental experiences. Back in Sweden later that year I continued the streak and had additional success.

While in Busan in South Korea the same year, I had met a super-cute 75% European and 25% East Asian girl whom I had not slept with but was having somewhat regular contact with through Facebook. Hereafter I will call her Apolline.

I insisted on seeing her in Paris, partly to see Paris which I had not visited since childhood, and partly to meet her and hopefully seal the deal in the city of ~~Muslims~~ love. Apolline occasionally waited a good while with responding, but after I had quite explicitly hinted at my non-Platonic intentions she was sanguine to see me the next year in spring. She even stressed that I could stay at her place and looked forward to receive me as a guest.

Of course I would not let my romantic inclinations penetrate my entire existence, but I'd be lying by saying that I didn't think of her every now and then. After all, the goddess of destiny had decided to make our paths cross at the other side of the globe so why wouldn't it be rightful to think of Apolline as my earthly goddess of love? All of the other hoes were just fleeting pleasures after all.

These tendencies became magnified because I didn't have any sex at all for several months, even though my spring diet went really well and I looked good. I had talked to other people in my social circle – including girls – who were insistent on the idea that she was clearly into me and that our upcoming encounter unhesitatingly would result in mutual sparkling flames. C'est justement le cas, je me suis trompé. Well, it just so happens, I was mistaken.

The romantic illusion evaporates

When we eventually met in Paris, things started off positive, but when Apolline made it clear that she was staying at a male "friend's" place while I borrowed her centrally located apartment that belonged to her friend's grandmother, I understood where things were going. Or perhaps rather what had been going on while I was creating romantic fantasy stories inside my hermit head. We spent some pleasant time together and experienced a number of beautiful sites in the French capital, but there was no kissing.

The next evening we met some of her female friends at a dubstep club. One of them asked me why I had come to Paris, and I responded that I had come to see Apolline, which was at least 50% of the truth. My point was actually that she was a reason why I wanted to visit, but the way I conveyed the message was maybe a bit brief and unclear.

Anyway, this led to the female friend walking straight up to Apolline and gossiping about my response. As a consequence, I was a bit ashamed and butthurt when Apolline not long after asked me about my misguided travel reasons, but I managed to downplay it to some extent. I said: “I came to see Paris but it is good to see you too, and that you’re letting me borrow the apartment. That was what I meant”. She seemed to believe me, at least in part, but I left early, then sauntered around the streets of Paris with a doleful look on my Nordic face.

Alpha fucks, beta sucks

When I arrived at the apartment, two French girls were standing just outside the gate, which was located not far from a bar/club on the opposite side of the steet. We started chatting and it didn’t take long before I regained some of my inner strength, and simultaneously forgot about the quarter-Asian dame. To be honest, the girls were kind of average, around a 5 and 6, but the positive and flirtatious interaction still managed to ignite the inner flame of game. I met them inside the other place a bit later.

I recall that the bar was full of Muslims and Africans but also a significant number of white expats and locals. I bought a beer or two and increased my well-being, ready to take action at any moment. In the middle of the dance floor I made eye contact with one of the French chicks, whom I had just met and considered to be the most attractive of the two, and started to make out with her not long after.

I left her not many minutes later. Then suddenly an American chick of Italian descent showed up and before I even realized how goddamn pretty she was we were making out. The comparatively much less attractive French girls pseudo-laughed at me as they passed by but could not hide their at least slight exasperation, but there are always some Maghreb male waiting to, literally, fill the gap so they shouldn’t have to mourn long after the loss of the little Scandinavian superman. I took the girl to grandma's house. Not one second I thought about Apolline.

Conclusion

I am far from flawless and the initial mistake was of course to let the romantic inclinations guide me in the first place, but if we accept the fact that we as individuals are imperfect, especially when the effects from the red pill haven't become entirely predominant in our minds, the second best option is to quickly redirect our inner compasses towards that of the assertive alpha, away from the romantic beta.

If you want to read more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: 15 Tough Lessons I Learned From Life

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

7 Conversation Topics That Will Trigger A Boomercuck

October 6, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Boomers were the most privileged generation in contemporary history. Born at the dawn of the Trente glorieuses, they knew nothing for decades but growth, cheap tuition, full employment, easy sex with neither AIDS nor rapefugees nor rape hysteria.

During their carefree years, they took the moral high ground by protesting the Vietnam War or taking the streets, and the culture immediately started leaning towards them. They had no difficulty to go from being pampered students, drowning into New Age babble, booze and easy lays to shrewd bourgeois bohemians occupying every subsidized job and seizing every bonus.

Millennials like myself were born during the last years of this exceptional epoch. Just in time to see all the malignant lies creeping below the surface, all the parasites and exploiters hanging to their unwarranted earnings. Baby boomers got an awesome, in-building edifice, they leave it to us overpriced and full of cracks.

The worst part, though, is perhaps their total unwillingness to discuss the truth. Many boomers only accept a one-sided communication, where they do all the talk and we're supposed to nod or parrot. From my experience, boomers tend to be honest fellows, but the majority of them tend to otherize their very children and drown into a SJW-like hysteria when we mention the following topics.

1. The low SMV of young men

Many of us were raised into being nice, romantic, “respectful”, a bit chivalrous. Women’s lib was great, promiscuity is cool, just offer flowers and drinks and it’ll be okay. Then we met with the truth: women are hypergamous, will want only the higher-status males and consider the other, normal ones “beneath” them. Millions of young men has been fed lies, let unprepared, then disenfranchised. And some adapted by working on their game, looks, and general value.

Have you ever tried bringing this up with boomers? No matter how they actually live, they will answer that you’re a loser, a misogynist, an extremist. No, we’re just underprivileged like you never were—and we’re the only ones deprived of any possibility to be acknowledged as such.

As women turned into commitmentphobic creatures with boomers giving them passes, no wonder millennials do not create families and go into PUA-resourcefulness instead. Especially since we have witnessed divorce-rape, a related topic boomers won’t talk about.

2. Immigration

This word used to stand for individuals going to live abroad. Today, it stands for millions of non-whites flooding the West, getting welfare and jobs. They are replacing native Westerners, and they are heavily promoted. “Affirmative action” happens so that they take jobs they aren’t qualified for. MTV and the like promote them. Judges give them a pass for their numerous crimes. Hyenas framed as sheep had our future handed out to them. But wait—who did that?

Boomers still hold cushy sinecures, unionized jobs—something millennials only hear of—and a comfy retirement that allow them to look down on us from their third property or their safari trip in Tanzania. We on the other hand do not need to go to Africa to see it.

3. White flight

As with the two aforementioned items, we can do it but not talk about it. Boomers have no problems with their children moving to foreign countries. At first glance it is easy to combine with globalism: yes, we were interested into discovering life elsewhere, getting new opportunities, picking up a new language, and so on, but we also escaped because of what Western girls turned into, because cities are expensive and insecure, because jobs are outsourced or handed out to the Big Other, because Leftism is stifling. More often than not, Western cities are no country for us.

Try to tell a boomer. Even if he relocated to an expensive house in the countryside, i.e. in a peaceful, non-diverse place, the lifelong fan of John Lennon will never admit he paid to escape from an immigration policy he supported. “Not in my backyard, not during my lifetime, deal with that you juvenile racist!”

4. Real estate

Back in the 1960s and 70s, cities were socially diverse. Some neighbourhoods were rich, some were poor, some in the middle. There was barely any immigration. Most apartments and outlets belonged to people from inside the city or hard-working Westerners. Then came globalism.

Multinational corporations, backed by Wall Street, started buying out most “cool” hangouts. European countries used public housing to force “diversity” into previously peaceful places. The wealthy stopped going to hotels and started to buy downtown flats instead.

Boomers embodied the same trend. They bought out flats from crime-ridden neighbourhoods then got their connections to remove crime, thus “gentrifying” the area. The poor and traditional middle-classes were driven out. Instead, young city-dwellers are forced to either pay an astronomic rent or share their rented flat with others, or live in a diverse slum no “tough-on-crime” policy will ever clean.

You can talk a bit with boomers about how overpriced real estate is. They may listen as long as you let them put the blame on others. If you go a bit deeper, they’ll say, “Hey, you should just get yourself a better job, when I was your age I worked as a waiter and…”

5. The struggle for cheap, crappy jobs

Which brings us to the next point. Boomers were spoon-fed with decent jobs. They didn't have to care about how to get modafinil (or even how to get a six pack). Today, the young apply for dead-end, crappy jobs or unpaid internships and compete with several other youngsters, many non-Western in origin. Too many jobs have been outsourced or automatized. The few jobs that remain, just like the lower 20% of women, are subjected to an intense competition. And the game is rigged against you. Just look at these lefty urban magazines where most writers are women and/or homosexual.

To get some attention from a recruiter, the dullest experience must be marketed like it "changed your life" and made you a world-class expert when you're not even 21. Then you'll have to face a dismissive, half-jaded boomer who is going to tell you he would better hire someone with a darker skin or a vagina. Or you will have your third or fourth internship.

Or, if you're lucky, you'll get a freelance job, but only after the aging hippie gets tired of Indian programmers coding bugged websites. And then your retired land-owning uncle asks, "what, even within a globalized world you still didn't find a job?"

6. Insecurity aka street violence

Some manage to flee the cities—and too many of those who flee forgot what exactly they escaped. Many others, though, cannot do so or must go on for several years before they get the money or the opportunity to leave the diverse hell behind. Violent thugs keep thugging with near impunity. "Diverse" groups fuel themselves with gangsta-rap and entertain an aggressive, violent, openly anti-white culture which seems to be a low-IQ, high-T version of SJW crybullying.

We, on the other hand, were not raised to fight. To the contrary, we got neutered by the blue pill. Civilized, law-abiding Westerners grow up to realize that they are an easy prey to "diversity" and antifa. In your own streets, built for you by your ancestors, you are now a stranger.

Henry Ford already told us of an arrogant, dominating group who pressured opponents just that way. Conservatives from Ben Shapiro to Vox Day told the same about Current Year SJWs. Thugs are also doing the same with a more violent style, all are cloaked under the same taboo. The day a BLM or SJW mob falls on you, boomer relatives will automatically assume you are the one to blame.

7. Boomers' betrayal

Along with the global warming fashion came a lot of noise about the world "we" (who exactly?) would leave to "our" children. Ironically, boomers barely care about what they leave their own sons. To the contrary, they seem to have massively shifted their heirs. Instead of caring about their sons and grandsons, they care about their daughters and so-called minorities.

In France the shift was symbolized by movies such as The Intouchables (2011), featuring a cool, sympathetic but forsaken old man helped by a funny and generous black guy, or Serial (Bad) Weddings (2014) which shows an old couple whose four daughters marry with a Jew, an Arab, a black and an Asian. Such movies depict a world where we simply do not exist—or only as rude, bothersome antagonists.

In 2015, France Télévisions president Delphine Ernotte told that "French TV is full of white males over fifty years old; this is going to change… so that we have young, female, diverse people." In other words, when the old "white males" hit the pension jackpot, normal millennial men will be dismissed, excluding perhaps a few homosexuals and bourgeois bohemian shills.

Our inheritance is not completely eaten away. It is also handed out to the Big Other. Spoiled young women hit the streets to defend their "right" to kill their own children in the womb. Baby boomers who, either quietly or blatantly, disown their sons for not being slaves of the Left, fuel the same unhinged culture.

So what?

No, boomers, we were not persuaded by “fake news.” To the contrary, we have been subjected to a constant unnatural Leftist conditioning, then met with a rather uncomfortable reality you constantly ignored, dismissed, trivialized or made taboo. We spent years getting away from your neutering set of illusions. Hence our path from game and personal improvements to making the West great again. You briefly embraced the “no future” motto before picking the low-hanging jobs. We, on the other hand, want a future, for ourselves and our children.

Of course I know not all boomers are like that. Those who were factory or field workers and lost their jobs often grasped what diversity stood for before we did. But these are seldom heard.

Boomers complain that most millennials prefer speaking with other millennials instead of them. Well, if you’re a boomer and went that far, perhaps you understand why now. We don’t want your sanctimonious “life lessons” told from comfort and cowardice. We want help, acknowledgement, and getting back what the Big Other is stealing. If you can’t provide with that, you are free to keep squandering your oversized pension anyway.

Read Next: Bob Dylan’s “The Times They Are A-Changin” Is Our Song Now

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

10 Reasons Why You Shouldn’t Do A PhD In The Arts And Humanities

October 6, 2017 | by Ned Kelly | Link | Original Link

A PhD is an 80,000 to 100,000 word thesis that makes an “original and significant contribution” to human knowledge. The arts/humanities include disciplines such as literature, classics, history, politics, philosophy, religion, visual arts, performing arts, and gender studies. I recently completed a PhD in a humanities department at an Australian university. Australian academia is a small world so for the sake of my career I won’t give more details that could identify me.

Whether or not to do a PhD is a choice you have to make for yourself. It’s not for me to say that no one should ever do a PhD in humanities. Even I admit that it isn’t a complete waste of time, and if it’s what you really want to do then go for it. These disciplines need some right-wing people to balance the scales.

What I can say is that I personally regret doing a PhD in humanities. If I had to do a PhD again I would definitely choose a STEM (science, technology, engineering, math) field, but I don’t think I would do a PhD in any subject. Life’s too short. Anyway, here are ten reasons not to do a PhD in humanities.

1. You learn minimal skills

After more than ten years at university my advice to new students is to focus on learning skills rather than content. You will forget most content you learn, and even if you don't it isn't that useful. What you need for work and life is skills such as writing, math and coding.

Have you ever noticed that third-year humanities subjects have few or no prerequisite subjects or skills? That is because the only real difference between first-year and third-year humanities subjects is that third year subjects have more pages of weekly readings (that most students won't read anyway) and longer essays.

You'll never see a third-year subject in a STEM department with no prerequisites because STEM students learn skills like math and coding that build on previous knowledge so that by the time you are in the later years of your degree, you're doing things you could not have done in first year. You would hope that all university degrees would work like that, but you'd be wrong.

The lack of skills taught in humanities departments continues into the PhD. Sure, you develop skills in writing, research, critical thinking, and self-motivation but unfortunately those are skills that are both common and difficult to quantify on job applications. For example, even undergraduate students in STEM can write well enough for most desk jobs whereas to me their math and coding looks like an alien language.

2. Humanities fields are not academically rigorous

Humanities subjects are highly subjective, there is often limited evidence available to researchers, and most arguments cannot really be proven or disproven. Humanities is all about making plausible arguments. The average humanities PhD thesis is a house of cards consisting of plausible but unprovable arguments built upon plausible but unprovable arguments. One of the foundational arguments may well be wrong which invalidates all the rest, but it doesn't matter because no one will ever be able to prove it.

Humanities PhDs often cover laughably broad topics. It is not uncommon for humanities research to cover multiple countries and/or centuries. The only way to cover such large topics is with shallow analysis, minimal evidence and arguments that are, at best, plausible but unprovable. In my opinion, most humanities writing is better thought of as reality-based fiction.

3. No jobs

"I attended a liberal arts college. I graduated with a Bachelor of Unemployment degree."

This one is simple; humanities departments are pumping out PhDs but there are very few jobs in academia, and humanities PhDs are not particularly useful in other fields. In my department, there were around 50 PhD students and 2 post-doc positions. That's math that even a humanities student can do: 1 job per 25 students.

4. High opportunity costs

The average PhD takes over four years of full-time work in addition to the 4+ years of undergraduate and Honours study that precedes it. That is a lot of time, effort, lost wages and lost career progression. Think of all the travel or hobbies you could do with that time and money. In four years, you could even do something useful like a trade, an engineering degree or a hitch in the army.

5. Mental illness

PhDs are long and stressful ordeals living in poverty with minimal incentives or rewards. No surprise, then that PhD students have much higher rates of mental illness than the population at large.

6. Too many feminists

Humanities departments are full of feminists. These are not your garden variety “women should be equal” feminists. These are the man-haters who interpret everything through the lens of an “oppressive patriarchy”.

Their raging confirmation bias means that as a straight, white man anything you say can and will be twisted and turned against you. You are privileged, subconsciously sexist and potentially violent, whether you like it or not. Most of the men in arts departments are falling over themselves to prove that they are just as feminist and man-hating as the women.

7. Incestuous students

Humanities PhD students are highly incestuous with multiple short and long-term relationships forming within most cohorts. These people are like hamsters crawling all over one another. Cheating is commonplace. Humanities PhD students are mostly women so this may sound like a dream scenario to many men but trust me, it's a trap! Women love drama. Don't shit where you eat and don't put your penis or any other part of your anatomy near crazy.

8. Too many crazy leftists

Arts departments are full of leftists. The research topics chosen by most of these leftists are equal parts boring and irrelevant. You are more likely to see research about the effects of World War II on gay aboriginal women in Australia than you are to see a thesis on the actual battles that decided the course of human history.

Disturbingly, this leftism has taken on some of the forms of a dogmatic religion. One example in Australia is called the “Acknowledgement of Country”. At the beginning of any talk or workshop someone has to get up and say: “I would like to acknowledge that this meeting is being held on the traditional lands of the [appropriate tribal group] indigenous people, we pay respect to elders both past and present and celebrate them as the oldest continuous culture on earth”. All human cultures have common ancestors, so all cultures are equally old. Point this out at your own risk.

9. Competitiveness and ego

Let’s be honest, most people do a PhD primarily for the status of being able to put “Dr” in front of their name. Most also love the idea of becoming an academic psuedo-celebrity within their field and having their name and photograph stamped on the covers of books. Academia is Hollywood for ugly people who like to read.

They don’t actually enjoy their research and yet they are highly competitive over who can publish the most articles in the best journals, give papers at the most conferences, and finish their thesis the quickest. Think of a workplace full of competitive narcissistic feminist women working jobs they hate for terrible pay and knowing that after four years 96% of them will be fired.

10. Publishing for its own sake

This is what they make you read in Hell.

Academic research in humanities is almost universally unread. This is because humanities academics choose boring and irrelevant topics and because publishing is done primarily as a way to get and keep academic jobs rather than because the author has something important or useful to say.

Conclusion

If I sound a little bitter it's because I am. My PhD was a horrible ordeal and I don't have much to show for it. But I take full responsibility for my choices—no one had a gun to my head. If I'm honest, humanities academia was the only thing I was good at and earning a PhD was a way for me to patch up my low self-esteem.

On the plus side, I always thought I had the ability to do a PhD and now I don't have to die wondering. The problem is that I have now looked behind the curtain and realised these disciplines are mostly bullshit. If it's something you want to do then go for it, but do your research and embark with an appreciation of the pitfalls. Don't be afraid to quit if you're miserable. Sometimes quitting takes more courage than continuing.

Read more: How Liberal Arts Hurts Our Economy

Ned Kelly
Ned is an intellectual bushranger. He has spent the past ten years in the leftist corridors of Australia's universities and civil service and he's had enough.

Traitors Within The Gates? Immigrants Have Practically No Loyalty To Their Adopted Countries

October 6, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

"German" Turks are an ever-increasing share of Germany's population, but contemporary events demonstrate how many of them, perhaps even a majority, are much more loyal to Turkey than to the German state or the West generally. Turkey's President, Recep Tayyip Erdoğan, recently called on his "countrymen" in Germany to boycott Angela Merkel's "conservative" Christian Democratic Union (CDU), plus the center-left Social Democratic Party (SPD), and the leftist Greens Party.

Although the election did not begin until late September, polling indicated that many "German" Turks listened to someone who for many of them is technically a foreign leader. More than a third of those asked in the weeks before the election said they would not be voting.

In addition, Erdoğan himself is highly popular amongst Turks in Germany and the Netherlands, even after he labeled the leaders of those countries as "enemies" and "Nazis" ([1] [2]). He also failed to distance himself from political allies in the Turkish media who spoke of full-blown war with Germany and France. Millions of "European" Turks either support this rhetoric or will refuse to oppose it.

As people interested in the preservation of Western culture, we should be deeply alarmed by this and see it as replicable for many other ethnic groups in Europe, America and elsewhere. It is yet another indication that very large non-Western migrant communities, many of them existing for decades, are quite happy to follow the directives of an outside power with which they have strong or exclusive blood ties. In the event of far more serious bickering between Western and non-Western countries, or even armed conflict, it seems almost certain that millions of ethnic minorities in places such as Europe will firmly side with their non-Western homelands.

A sign of things to come

Turks in Germany, many or most of them German citizens, have rallied in large numbers for Erdoğan in the past.

Since last year, Germany and a number of other countries, including the Netherlands, have been arguing with Turkey over allegedly repressive measures taken by President Erdoğan after an attempted military coup against him. The Netherlands, which actually has a smaller proportion of ethnic Turks than Germany, still felt a very powerful backlash from its Turkish population after Erdoğan stirred up highly nationalist sentiments in some Dutch cities. He went so far as to try to hold political rallies for himself on Dutch soil.

Whilst you might think that Return Of Kings would have supported calls for a boycott of three German political parties which have supported the "open doors" immigration policy that started in 2015 (or smirked at Turkey causing mayhem for a cuckservative Dutch government), Erdoğan's interference is highly disturbing. He may have helped a little in the massacring of the German Socialists that took place last month, and thus helped the anti-mass migration Alternative für Deutschland (AfD), but this was simply a misfiring of a nevertheless troubling power many foreign leaders now wield in Western countries. In the future, we should expect more of this and that it will be used much more effectively and dangerously.

The basic disloyalty of many immigrants is obscured by economic prosperity

To put it bluntly, Germany has been an employment and welfare teat for many Turkish immigrants and their descendants. Compared to the wages and other financial benefits they might reap in their ancestral homeland, even low-end jobs in German supermarkets or factories are much more preferable. Millions of Turks now live in Germany. In response, the authorities have been heedless about what might happen if the economically propped-up multicultural bubble bursts.

We have no idea about how many immigrants would lovingly turn towards their kin elsewhere if major economies started to fail. If unemployment in Germany, which perennially hovers around 10%, doubled or tripled, would we really expect German multiculturalism to hold itself together? And what if, due to a financial crisis, welfare payments had to be cut and certain overrepresented ethnic communities received less than what they previously had? With no “German” culture to keep the country functionally intact, could we really expect positive vibes and sing-a-longs?

Turks are one of the least problematic groups from the Middle East–so what will happen with other communities in the future?

The present hordes of Syrian, North African and other Middle Eastern migrants will probably be much more troublesome than the established Turkish communities of Europe in the coming years.

For all the negative talk I hear about Turks in Europe, they are actually the most secular and non-fundamentalist of all the major Middle Eastern ethnic groups. Anyone familiar with the founding of the Turkish Republic and the biography of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk knows that Turkey largely avoided the political instability and social uproar we associate with other heavily populated countries such as Egypt or Iran. That secular, more moderate strain still exists today, albeit in diluted form with the likes of Erdoğan.

Turkish nationalism is certainly a major threat to Europe, yet I would probably much rather have five million Turks in Germany than five million Egyptians. Hence this question: if the more secular Turkish communities are causing such troubles, what will happen with other growing minority communities in the future? When the shit hits the proverbial fan, don't say I didn't ask.

Read More: Turkish Leader Ataturk Proved That A Nation's Terminal Decline Can Be Reversed

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Liberal Hollywood Had Decades To Expose Harvey Weinstein's Sexual Predation But Did Nothing

October 7, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> "It wasn't a secret to the inner circle," said Kathy DeClesis, Bob Weinstein's assistant in the early 1990s.
>
> — The New York Times

Covering countless topics from the benefits of socialism to the evils of "manspreading," multimillionaire Hollywood stars and other celebrities have been moralizing to politicians and the general public for decades. On matters related to women and "misogyny," however, these pampered souls have arguably been the loudest.

The irony of this constant Hollywood fixation became all the more apparent this week after news of producer Harvey Weinstein's long-term sexual harassment of women broke. What's more is that Weinstein basically admits he has sexually harassed multiple women. This does not mean that every accusation against him is true, but it does demonstrate the rank hypocrisy of Tinseltown. One of its leaders, if not its major leader, is preaching liberal, feminist values despite having sexually hounded female staff and starlets.

The New York Times, to its partial credit, has turned on a political ally (Weinstein is an avowed Democrat and Hillary Clinton supporter). Carlos Slim's publication is listing allegations against the Miramax and Weinstein Company co-founder that date back around three decades. Though it is nice to see such a leftist outlet eating one of its own, The New York Times almost certainly wouldn't have pursued the story if it didn't anticipate revenue from it.

Harvey Weinstein with Vince Vaughn and Ashley Judd in the 1990s. Judd has accused Weinstein of sexual harassment and abuse.

So our major question should be this: if Weinstein's sexual harassment was not a "secret" according to those who know and knew him, where were all the Hollywood stars? His accusers include actresses Ashley Judd and Rose McGowan. Moreover, he has been praised by the likes of Academy Award winners Colin Firth and Jennifer Lawrence. Did any of these stars have any inkling of the allegations, allegations which, according to The New York Times, have resulted in eight known financial settlements with accusers?

Whilst the individual allegations from people like Judd, McGowan and others are not necessarily all true, surely a raft of other celebrities, including men, knew about at least some very negative alleged incidents involving Harvey Weinstein and women. Where were these male stars in particular? Counting their pay checks and too scared to confront the issue head-on?

Do not expect any introspection from Hollywood whatsoever

For a party that swears by the “Republican war on women,” the Democrats sure as hell hang out with some left-leaning abusers of women in Hollywood.

The allegations against Harvey Weinstein, both the true ones and the invented ones, will not encourage Hollywood heavyweights to reconsider their putrid activism. Instead, they will use Weinstein’s transgressions as an excuse to moralize even more than before. “See, we told you misogyny was everywhere!” will be the response we get.

What we can expect is more clamoring about the Hollywood “gender wage gap,” an even greater emphasis on “strong women” roles where petite girls beat up muscled male soldiers ad nauseam, and a doubling down on all things related to “rape culture” and “entrenched sexism.” Of course, Republicans and non-leftists will be in the scopes of major producers and stars, forgetting that they have had zero to do with leftwing Hollywood men abusing women since the dawn of time.

In fact, the blame-shifting has already started. Harvey Weinstein himself has promised to “atone” for his sins by–wait for it–attacking the National Rifle Association (NRA). Who ever said Hollywood types never took responsibility for their actions? Similar to many in Tinseltown, Weinstein is a vocal hater of Donald Trump. We can therefore anticipate that he will launch numerous broadsides at and attempted character assassinations of the US President in the coming months. Anything and everything will be used to ingratiate himself back into the respect and good graces of Hollywood.

Sadly, this strategy almost always works. A prime example is the constantly protected Roman Polanski. This filmmaker, rightfully seen as a pariah by the general public for anally raping a 13-year-old girl forty years ago, is nevertheless perhaps the most revered–and defended–living director within high-flying acting circles. Virtually no attention has been paid by celebrities to more recent allegations that Polanski sexually abused other young women, even minors. Harvey Weinstein may not have been accused of statutory rape or another form of truly serious criminal sexual abuse, but he has obviously considered Polanski's story as a sign that he can easily rebound back into Hollywood's main orbit.

Who's next?

If Roman Polanski can keep Hollywood's respect, Harvey Weinstein will, too.

Some have speculated that Harvey Weinstein fell afoul of key liberal requirements, like keeping up leftwing political fundraising, and was therefore outed for his sexual transgressions. I remain skeptical about this, but there are certainly other, mostly very leftwing Hollywood producers, directors, and stars with closets full of female-related skeletons.

Despite my lack of sympathy for Weinstein, there is no doubt that a number of false accusers are going to come forward against him or other men in Tinseltown to get lucrative cash settlements. These men may end up getting their just desserts, yet any witch-hunts within celebrity circles may also have a detrimental impact on society at large.

Even after years of high-profile rape hoaxes, such as the Duke lacrosse case and Emma Sulkowicz's lies, we should be wary of stories like this one that might help swing the pendulum back the other way and again legitimize unproven, inconsistent accusations of rape, sexual abuse, or "harassment." Too much is at stake for us to simply yell "Schadenfreude!" at Harvey Weinstein or comparable figures.

Meanwhile, the hypocritical Hollywood train of self-absorbed political activism will roll on. Having harbored and downright protected a man like Weinstein for decades, they will still shout that the rest of us in the real world are all shameless misogynists.

Read More: Does The Hollywood Elite Use Rituals And Sexual Blackmail To Keep Its Stars In Line?

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

NFL Players Are Setting A Bad Example By Teaching Black People To Encourage Victimhood

October 8, 2017 | by Ned Kelly | Link | Original Link

Jimbo Jones recently outlined the growing dispute between President Trump and black NFL players who are kneeling during the national anthem. I support the players' free speech rights to kneel, but I wish they wouldn't do so because they are setting a bad example for young African Americans by promoting a victim mentality.

This is especially disappointing because these players are real success stories and should be serving as positive role models for young black kids. These players have found their talent, worked hard at it, and now legally earn great money within the current US socio-economic system.

Black Lives Matter, as long as they're killed by white people

The kneeling NFL players are part of the broader Black Lives Matter protest movement which campaigns against anti-black racism, especially police shootings of African Americans. Opposing innocent black people being shot by police is fine; none of us want to see any innocent person get shot by anyone.

The problem with Black Lives Matter is that their narrative is distorted. They do not put any focus on the black on black shootings which account for 90%+ of black people who are shot. Black neighbourhoods in Chicago and other cities are not dangerous because police are rolling through shooting everyone. They are dangerous because every night black gangsters shoot other black gangsters and anyone else unlucky enough to get in their way.

Black people being shot is overwhelmingly a problem within the black community. If African Americans are genuinely worried for the safety of their sons they should be focusing on ending gang violence in their communities, but Black Lives Matters chooses to use rare police shootings as an excuse to promote a radical narrative that the US is a fundamentally racist nation in which African Americans are not given a chance to live peaceful and successful lives. They are therefore promoting a victim mentality.

According to FBI figures, both blacks (90%) and whites (82%) are overwhelmingly killed by their own race. But many more whites are killed by blacks (15%) than blacks killed by whites (8%). White lives matter too.

Victimhood is disempowering

Even if you are genuinely a victim, having a victim mentality is unhelpful because it is disempowering. A person with a victim mentality sits around feeling sorry for themselves and dismisses any positive actions they could take to improve their situation as “pointless” or “too hard”.

Yes, racism against black people still exists in the US. Yes, a disproportionate number of black kids are disadvantaged, but the answer to those problems is not to reject US society and choose easy but ultimately disastrous options like crime and drug use.

The answer is to take individual responsibility and positive action for yourself and your family. Find your talent, work hard and follow the rules of the system. If the system really is stacked against you then use that for motivation and work twice as hard to spite the system. Most people in the third world would kill to have the opportunities that disadvantaged African Americans have.

The fact that black NFL players are promoting a victim mentality is so disappointing because they have obviously not lived by a victim mentality in their own lives. When time came to try out for junior football did they stay home because they were worried the coach might be racist? When the trainer pushed them for one more rep in the gym did they quit because it wasn't fair? When they lost a game did they blame the umpires, did they declare that they system was rigged and then quit to pursue a life of crime? No, no and no.

Conclusion

Most black kids won't become millionaire athletes. Neither will most white kids. But the traits that made black NFL players successful – hard work, resilience, teamwork, determination – are useful to everyone everywhere. These players should spend less energy undermining the system that pays them millions of dollars, think more about what has made them successful in their own lives, and encourage other African Americans to follow their example. It's time for these players to stand up and be role models.

Read more: If Black Lives Matter, Blacks Need To Stop Killing Each Other

Ned Kelly

Ned is an intellectual bushranger. He has spent the past ten years in the leftist corridors of Australia’s universities and civil service and he’s had enough.

It’s No Longer A Felony In California To Knowingly Infect Someone With HIV

October 8, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via LA Times:

Gov. Jerry Brown signed a bill Friday that lowers from a felony to a misdemeanor the crime of knowingly exposing a sexual partner to HIV without disclosing the infection.

The measure also applies to those who give blood without telling the blood bank that they are HIV-positive.

Modern medicine allows those with HIV to live longer lives and nearly eliminates the possibility of transmission, according to state Sen. Scott Wiener (D-San Francisco) and Assemblyman Todd Gloria (D-San Diego), authors of the bill.

“Today California took a major step toward treating HIV as a public health issue, instead of treating people living with HIV as criminals,” Wiener said in a statement. “HIV should be treated like all other serious infectious diseases, and that’s what SB 239 does.”

Supporters of the change said the current law requires an intent to transmit HIV to justify a felony, but others noted cases have been prosecuted where there was no physical contact, so there was an argument intent was lacking.

Brown declined to comment on his action.

HIV has been the only communicable disease for which exposure is a felony under California law. The current law, Wiener argued, may convince people not to be tested for HIV, because without a test they cannot be charged with a felony if they expose a partner to the infection.

“We are going to end new HIV infections, and we will do so not by threatening people with state prison time, but rather by getting people to test and providing them access to care,” Wiener said.

Supporters of the bill said women engaging in prostitution are disproportionately targeted with criminal charges, even in cases where the infection is not transmitted.

Republican lawmakers including Sen. Joel Anderson of Alpine voted against the bill, arguing it puts the public at risk.

“I’m of the mind that if you purposefully inflict another with a disease that alters their lifestyle the rest of their life, puts them on a regimen of medications to maintain any kind of normalcy, it should be a felony,” Anderson said during the floor debate. “It’s absolutely crazy to me that we should go light on this.”

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: How The Promotion Of Homosexual Culture Harms Straight Men

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Rich Women Who Promote Feminism Are Gigantic Hypocrites

October 8, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

While countless Americans, male and female, attempt to get by week-to-week with their insufficient pay checks, average women have been taught to–or shamed into–feeling happy for women with millions or billions of dollars. Sheryl Sandberg serving as Facebook's Chief Operating Officer, for example, is meant to be a cause for celebration amongst women cleaners, childcare workers, cashiers, and others who work for something close to minimum wage.

"My success is women's success!" says a new (but very, very small) generation of female public figures. Books like Sandberg's Lean In would have you believe that the key to women being happy is watching literally the tiniest proportion of other women ascend to the ranks of corporate chief executives and other board members.

Consequently, one of the biggest con jobs in modern society is the extent to which feminists will focus on gender representation amongst the <0.1% and perhaps <0.01%. Forgetting that the generally lazier male sex dominates high school SAT scores (and also makes up the majority of the mentally challenged), the biggest gender moral imperative of our time is to supposedly increase the number of women running Fortune 500 companies.

“Lean in while I share some horrible stories about my family being booted out of our favorite country club when I was a teen!”

The arrogance that motivates these klaxon calls is astounding. In no way does it alleviate any day-to-day pressures on normal women, including everything from mortgage stress to raising children on only $20,000 per annum. In fact, it only compounds these problems, convincing many that they actually get something out of feeling happy for Sheryl Sandberg and others like her whilst simultaneously robbing them of the energy to challenge and reverse their own mediocre situations.

By hijacking the conversation to make it about “sisterhood” when it’s really about themselves, wealthier women, many of whom already had wealthy childhoods, can avoid questions as to why so many other women are left at the bottom of the socioeconomic totem pole.

How many influential women came from privileged families?

The father of the disastrous ex-Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina was an Ivy League law professor. Women with privileged childhoods have been overrepresented in Fortune 500 companies for decades.

It never ceases to amaze me how all women are lumped in together when it comes to talk of gender representation, especially in domains like corporate boards. The socioeconomic backgrounds of many female executives–or other very well-paid women–are typically never raised.

For all the talk by feminists of intersectionality, the idea that white or wealthy women suffer less “oppression” than non-white or poor women, few try to reflect on their own backgrounds or those of their treasured poster girls. Two of the most well-known female executives of recent times, left-leaning Sheryl Sandberg and Republican Carly Fiorina, both came from very financially well-positioned families. Many others hail from similar “ivory tower” pedigrees.

With privileged families having roughly the same number of daughters as sons, the benefits of wealth and social status flow more or less evenly to female children. No one has ever properly explained to me how the daughter of a multimillionaire or well-connected public figure is going to have a harder time in the corporate or professional world than a man from a lower middle-class background with no network. Yet that’s the narrative constantly shoved down our throats, that all women face more barriers than all men, no matter how many trust funds were created or how many $40,000-a-year schools the daughter of the Ivy League professor or Wall Street hedge fund manager attended.

Meanwhile in the real world…

This girl is meant to leap in joy because Sheryl Sandberg and 0.0001% of women have hundreds of millions or billions of dollars, or are on the boards of Fortune 500 companies.

Like dreams of winning the lottery, the media bantering on about female representation on corporate boards or the pushed need for a new Elizabeth Holmes does nothing to help the average woman, let alone the average person or family.

If you want a textbook definition of narcissism, Sheryl Sandberg is it. Inasmuch as I support a generally free market, in no way does the largesse or profile of a Sandberg or Fiorina "trickle down" to the masses of women cleaning our floors, ringing up our groceries, or stocking up our department store shelves.

All of this has nothing to do with common struggles or professional dreams and everything to do with certain individual women's self-aggrandizement and their desire to create a cult around themselves.

Read More: It's Becoming Easy For Single Men To "Drop Out" And Live On Minimum Wage

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Instagram Model Still Single Despite Thousands Of Thirsty Men Begging For Her Attention

October 9, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The morass that we call today's sexual marketplace is leading women to ever higher expectations of men, usually with little being given to men in return. These expectations are now so inflated that women are willing to pay thousands of dollars for an ideal but apparently totally elusive partner through matchmaking agencies, even though they already get attention from hundreds—if not thousands—of men yearly. Having been fed a media diet of "never settle" and "you deserve the best," many women are obviously never settling and refusing to accept what they presently have as the best they can get.

One woman, Australian fitness model and professional Instagrammer Zoë Daly, paid AUD$5,000 (ca. US$4,000) to be matched with high-status, ambitious men. And this is just the tip of the iceberg. Whether through more high-brow, non-seedy matchmaking agencies, the route Daly "thankfully" took, or via less polite avenues like SeekingArrangement.com, women are literally reaching for the stars.

Zoë Daly's 200,000+ Instagram followers and her constant time around buff men haven't enabled her to find a male partner. Her standards are clearly too high.

Daly, an 8/10 in my book when she's not overly striated for competitions, has just been awarded most of the money she paid an agency after having a "bad date" and taking the matter to the New South Wales Civil and Administrative Tribunal, based in Sydney. I will make no major comments about her claims against the matchmaking agency. From the facts I have read about, she did indeed not get the service she was promised.

All this aside, one has to wonder about why Daly needed the agency in the first place and why plenty of other women do, too. What exactly was the problem with finding a male suitor amongst her 200,000+ Instagram followers? Or why couldn't she pick one guy from the masses of presumably muscled men she comes across in the world of being a fitness model?

Hamsters gonna hamster

The sad thing is that men and women used to meet rather normally, even online in the first years of the internet, and early. Then they would stay together, at least until the divorce five, ten, or twenty years later. Nowadays, usually because of a woman's inflated expectations, the question of "What's enough in a man?" is rarely settled. Hence the large number of never married women entering their mid-thirties and forties childless, but having had more relationships than years in their lives.

I learnt from this article that Zoë Daly was 32 last year, so by the end of this year she will have turned 33, possibly 34. She's a number of years older than me, but it's fair to say that her parents, like mine, probably married in their early to mid-twenties. Even before the marriage, they had found a long-term boyfriend or girlfriend when they were just past 20.

A woman like this fitness model is literally 10-15 years behind her parents' generation in finding a mate and settling down. Added to this game of incessant catch-up is a seemingly insatiable desire for "the best," a desire that leads to standards that perhaps 0.1% of the male population in her age bracket can possibly fulfill. And this says nothing about whether she herself is in the top 0.1% range for women. With her Instagram account alone, her hypothetical reach in trying to find a mate is about 1,000 times more than her mother's was. And still she's not happy and still she hasn't found someone!

Even women not forking out thousands of dollars for matchmakers are thinking similarly

A lot of women lack the funds to pay a matchmaking agency $5,000 or have priorities that see their money spent elsewhere (shoes, travel, chihuahua grooming, or, God forbid, helping themselves become marriageable women). Yet do not think for a second that countless other girls are not operating according to a comparable mindset as Zoë Daly.

"Where have all the good men gone?" is a refrain women's magazines and more radically feminist sources have been pumping out for years. It's the same refrain that prompts a majority of women on Tinder to exclude the majority of the men they swipe, or a majority of women in the real world to ignore the advances of the majority of men who approach them.

Though we might sometimes see more exaggerated, salient instances of the distorted sexual marketplace at play, like a good-looking but not extraordinarily beautiful woman paying a hefty $5,000 for a matchmaking service, related trends in lopsided male-female dynamics are manifested all the time in more banal ways. The average girl at the club is swatting away many a male opportunity, just like Zoë Daly probably is. So, too, is the college junior hooking up incessantly, all whilst complaining that "Mr. Right" constantly evades her.

Without bringing much to the table anymore, women are nevertheless demanding more and more from the men who chase them. As a result, there's little wonder that women like Daly are rarely, if ever satisfied romantically.

Read More: Is This "Inspiration To Women" Faking Cancer And Stealing Hundreds Of Thousands Of Dollars?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

6 Quick Game Tips For Meeting Ukrainian Girls

October 9, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

I just spent a month in a second tier Ukrainian city, to determine whether this country would suit me for a long term stay. I passed through there last summer and here are my additions on Ukrainian girls for short or long term relationships.

1. Find the normal girls

It will take effort to find students and regular women. Try the river banks, campuses, or open markets (rynok/рынок). Leave the centre. The difference between two streets can be huge.

High-end “western” shopping centres exist but are almost empty. Normal people can hang out there but rarely buy.

The girls we are after don’t go to high-end clubs. Avoid the slightly older “sponsor” girls (summoned by rich men) there, who display universal slut signs.

2. Be careful not to be played

Two stories stuck with me. First, a nineteen year-old nine from day game tried to blackmail me into sending her flowers in the mail, even before considering a coffee date.

Nineteen and already aware of her value. Details follow.

Second, my wingman set up a double date with his attractive target and a grenade for me. They were late arriving and attraction was absent. He set up a second date despite my disagreement. A different grenade with a snapback hat (which I detest) showed up for me with his girl. It was painfully obvious that they feigned interest. Once they ordered cocktails, hookah and sushi, they pretended to go for a smoke and disappeared, leaving us with the bill. My friend managed to bullshit the manager into not making us pay the bill but we learnt our lesson.

3. Focus on effective game

Online game has average quality and is lower than day game, which yields better results and is less time consuming.

Night game (high-end) has girls that are rarely under their mid-twenties, including hot Dubai girls, career girls, or moms with “ex-husbands.” Dancing with girls without prior interaction is ineffective. Booking a table without a circle is counter-productive.
Evgeny, an oligarch we met, said: “Among the girls present, 70% are actual whores. 30% do not do it full time.

For day game, observe the street. There are just more women to approach. Ukraine is day game country.

4. Appearances matter more

Looks must be on point, be it clothes, watches, shoes or apartments. My approaches rarely worked when I was heading off to the gym, in short and trainers, regardless of confidence.

I left the so-so flat I booked upon arrival and upgraded immediately. I knew that girls would have ran away if they had seen it.

The feminine potential is also taken to the max. Even uglier girls could fool you (from far) with toned bodies and impeccable style.

5. Attraction is obvious if present

Post-bang laundry folding

The girls I slept with took care of me unprompted, preparing food, or doing the washing up. One even mopped the floor. Those are signs of attraction.

My wingman brilliantly redeemed himself with another double date. His girl's friend, a small brunette with nice curves, and I hit it off right away. Eventually, we called a cab, paid our tab, and respectively took our girls home to be intimate with them them. By combining attraction and paying the bills, an implicit agreement for intimacy took place.

Mini brunette

I later met a beautiful, innocent eighteen year old with braids (my kryptonite). A shame that the attraction was strong but I never managed to set up a second date as I flew home the next morning.

I had only wheat fields and Viking babies on my mind during that date

6. Concurrence is rare but fierce

Few high-value males for many high-value females make women compete harder. My Russian coach once said: “JB, we’re Soviet Union, because alcohol, because war, because prison: men little, women a lot.”

The oligarchs, well connected middle-aged men sitting on millions from shady deals, are only a handful so there is enough for everyone.

Foreigners are rare outside of Kiev. Mainly groups of Turks and middle-eastern students, spending their day smoking hookahs in cafes. I only saw them bringing prostitutes (sub-par and in the thirties bracket) up the brand new tower where all the foreigners had short term apartments.

Ce qu’on en retient

Forget online game. The street gives varied and numerous options. Do not be afraid to be bold. Display dominance in a non-verbal way. Local girls are into men that lead though aggressive game does not work as well in the FSU as in South America or Asia. Good hunt, brothers.

Read More: 7 Game Principles I Personally Verified During My Trip To The Ukraine

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels

the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

How Western Globalists Created Radical Islam

October 9, 2017 | by Alexander Hamilton | Link | Original Link

For decades, the West has been plagued by Radical Islamic Terrorism. From the bombing of the US embassy in Lebanon in 1983, to the more recent Charlie Hebdo attacks, Orlando Night Club shooting, and Manchester Arena Bombing, there is no doubt of a connection between radical Islam and terrorism. Is this some problem inherent to Islam, or is this a more recent development with a discrete cause?

Timeline of radical Islamic terrorism

The Wikipedia article on Islamic terrorist attacks lists the earliest example as the seizure of the Grand Mosque in Mecca in 1979, followed by a sprinkling of attacks through the 1980s. During the 1990s, the intensity of Islamic terrorist attacks picks up, finally becoming commonplace by the 2000s.

The web site "The Religion of Peace" has a more exhaustive archive going back to 2001, demonstrating conclusively that Islamic terrorist activity has dramatically intensified in recent years. Islam has been around for centuries, including numerous wars against Western Crusaders, and there have been isolated acts of terrorism at times. Yet intense terrorism of this kind against the West is clearly a recent phenomenon. What caused it?

The Muslim Brotherhood

The Muslim Brotherhood was founded in Egypt in 1928 by Hassan al-Banna. The Brotherhood was a Sunni Islamist, pro-Sharia movement that also opposed Western imperialism. Their anti-imperialist stand led them to oppose British involvement in Egypt as well as calling for Jihad against Jewish Zionists in the Arab revolt in Palestine that lasted from 1936-1939.

The British Empire realized that the Brotherhood was a threat to their domination of Egypt, so they decided to co-opt the movement for their own purposes. British officials met with leadership of the movement in 1941, and by 1942 they were providing funding to the group. The leadership of the Brotherhood often met with British spies, who provided the group with information (and occasional disinformation) and support in their efforts.

For the next few decades, the Brotherhood functioned as a conservative, Islamist counterweight to any populist, secular movements that emerged. They supported a 1952 military coup, were involved in assassinations, and were themselves subjected to assassinations, violence, and infiltration. The Muslim Brotherhood slowly spread to other countries in the region, and function as a means of maintaining a strategy of tension in the region (secular nationalists vs. traditional Islamists) that caused people to ignore the influence of Western intelligence on their nations. Radicalization is seen as the price to pay for maintaining Western hegemony.

Zbigniew Brzezinski and the Mujahideen

In 1978, Communists under the leadership of Nur Muhammad Taraki took over the government of Afghanistan. Soon afterwards, they signed a treaty of friendship with the USSR, implemented secular education and land redistribution, and began widespread political oppression and murder of opponents, including devout Muslims. The religious factions under the leadership of Hafizullah Amin formed a militia called the Mujahideen and overthrew the Taraki government. In response, the Soviets invaded Afghanistan and installed a government favorable to Moscow.

Jimmy Carter's National Security Advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski saw this as an opportunity to hand the Soviets their own Vietnam quagmire, and agitated for intervention. The United States began offering non-lethal aid to the Mujahideen rebels through the CIA. Under Reagan, this cascaded into tens of millions of dollars per year in aid to the Mujahideen, small arms, including the tactically-decisive Stinger antiaircraft missiles, training, and intelligence. The Mujahideen's ally Pakistan was an even larger recipient of aid, with an estimated $20 billion sent to Pakistan over the course of the war.

Blowback

After a terrible 10 year war and widespread destruction of Afghanistan, the Soviets withdrew. The Mujahideen were successful, but the damage was already done. In addition to arming and training the rebels, the West had actively encouraged radicalism, seeing it as a way to unite the people against the godless Soviets. British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher spoke to the Mujahideen in 1981, telling them "The hearts of the free world are with you." In an infamous video, Zbigniew Brzezinski told the Mujahideen "Your cause is right, and God is on your side."

These radicalized Muslims went on to found and support terrorist groups like Al Qaeda, ISIS, Boko Haram, al Shabaab, and many others. Once the ideology and tactics of Radical Islam were created and encouraged, it spread like wildfire throughout the world, with dozens of such groups now in existence.

There are valid arguments that Islam itself does encourage some of this behavior by endorsing Jihad and dishonesty to non-Muslims, but history shows that the relatively high prevalence of radical Islam is a recent phenomenon. During the Islamic Golden Age, Muslims lived in peace with other religions, and their cities were centers of science and progress.

While the Islamic Crusaders under Saladin were courageous warriors with an honor code, modern Islamic terrorists are cowards that target women and children, convinced that God requires them to kill all infidels. One-hundred years ago, most Muslim nations were more tolerant than they are today, and terrorism was a rarely-used tactic.

Globalism

The British have been operating a worldwide, globalist empire for centuries. Zbigniew Brzezinski is also a notorious globalist, who wrote a book in 1997 describing the world as a Grand Chessboard, describing his strategy for manipulating nations like chess pieces to maintain hegemony of Western power. In a 1998 interview he expressed no regret at creating radical Islam. He actually bragged about it:

> A: Regret what? That secret operation was an excellent idea. It had the effect of drawing the Russians into the Afghan trap and you want me to regret it? The day that the Soviets officially crossed the border, I wrote to President Carter: We now have the opportunity of giving to the USSR its Vietnam war. Indeed, for almost 10 years, Moscow had to carry on a war unsupportable by the government, a conflict that brought about the demoralization and finally the breakup of the Soviet empire.
>
> Q: And neither do you regret having supported the Islamic [integrisme], having given arms and advice to future terrorists?
>
> Brzezinski: What is most important to the history of the world? The Taliban or the collapse of the Soviet empire? Some stirred-up Moslems or the liberation of Central Europe and the end of the cold war?"

Conclusion

Radical Islamic Terrorism is a synthetic creation of Western intelligence. Although Islam is not without flaws, there can be no doubt that intense, widespread Islamic terrorism can be traced to Western intervention in Egypt, Afghanistan, and elsewhere. Globalist meddlers like Brzezinski and the British Empire always fail to anticipate blowback effects, because they fundamentally fail to appreciate the wisdom of the historical American concept of noninterventionism. They believe they can play God (Allah) and not face the consequences.

Read Next: The Newfound Alliance Between Feminism, Marxism, And Radical

Islam

Alexander Hamilton

Alexander Hamilton is an American School economist who fights to reverse the decline through modern infrastructure projects like an orbital ring space elevator.

“Model” Lets Boyfriend Of One Month Tattoo Her Eyeball, May Go Blind

October 10, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Vice:

It’s been four weeks since Catt Gallinger says her ex-boyfriend botched the procedure and she still doesn’t know just how bad the damage is.

Even when Catt Gallinger’s eye started leaking purple ink she didn’t think anything was wrong.

No, actually she thought it was fine. The 24-year-old model said she didn’t question it because her ex boyfriend—who injected the purple dye into the sclera (white part) of her left eye—told her it was normal. He also allegedly said that it’s not odd for the eye to swell up to a massive size. It was only when the man suddenly broke up with Gallinger and she asked other experts if everything was OK that she realized swelling and vision loss wasn’t normal at all.

And now, four weeks after getting the body modification procedure done, Gallinger doesn’t know if she’ll ever regain full sight in that eye again.

Gallinger is no stranger to body modifications, she sports a split tongue and many, many tattoos—"body modifications are part of who I am," she told VICE. Gallinger said that the body modification was done by her then-boyfriend who swore to her that he had done this type of work successfully before. She says that he repeatedly pushed her to allow him to do the procedures.

"The artist, my ex-boyfriend, just kept pushing me until I got it done that night," Gallinger told VICE. "We were only together for a month but I've known him for years. It was something I thought I could trust him with because he had a portfolio. I was wrong."

So one night she gave in, let her then boyfriend numb her eye and inject purple ink into it. Gallinger, alongside experts, say that the the procedure is supposed to be done over two to three days with a small needle and a mixture of saline solution and a small amount of ink. When the saline solution evaporates from the eye it will then stain the scleral. Though her ex-boyfriend did numb the eye, that was about the only thing he got right.

"He did not dilute the ink with saline, he just put pure ink in my eye, he used a very large needle and went too deep," said Gallinger. "He did two injections, one on the top and one on the bottom. It took only about ten minutes."

The swelling and the pain was immediate but her ex-boyfriend, whom she was living with at the time, told her this was normal. She did go to the hospital but because the procedure is on the cutting edge of body modification, they didn't know anything was wrong either. Gallinger was given pain medication, steroid drops for her eyes and was told to ice it.

Out of nowhere, while her eye was still swollen, Gallinger's boyfriend broke up with her and gave her no reason—she now believes it's because he knew he botched the procedure and "didn't want to admit it." Upon returning to her hometown, Gallinger sought a second opinion, something she readily admits she should have done immediately. At this point it was weeks later and her eye was still swollen, filled with ink and she was experiencing sight loss and pain.

“That’s when I found out how wrong the procedure had gone,” she told VICE.

Recently, Gallinger took to social media to tell her story—her posts have been shared thousands of times—saying that people need to research the individuals doing body modification. Answering a question on her Facebook page, Gallinger has said that she plans to take legal action.

In the near future, Gallinger will be meeting with eye specialists about how to go forward to remove the excess ink stuck in her eye. Next week she will be undergoing surgery, and the outlook is positive, but because this is a rare case no one really knows what can or will happen.

“The pain is like a constant cramp. It depends on the day, on the moment, the pain can increase or decrease,” she said. “Sightwise I have gotten some of my sight back, it’s at the point where I would need glasses.”

“It’s all a waiting game at this point, we’re learning as we go. If the ink solidifies, it’s supposed to take three months, it gets harder to remove and it can seriously impact your vision. If it moves back to the eye were the retina is, it can cause nerve damage.”

The Gallinger said she’s experienced significant mental health effects as a result of her situation and the backlash she received by going public with what happened. Gallinger told VICE she doesn’t want to leave her house, she’s losing weight at a rapid pace, quit modeling, and is suffering from severe depression.

“There is a lot of fear,” said Gallinger. “I’m living with my mom right now because I just can’t live on my own with everything that’s going on. The depression has hit very serious, scary moments where I have had to wake people up in the middle of my night because I was scared of what might happen.”

“I hit a point where I had to quit modelling because I can’t look myself in the mirror, let alone going to get photos done by people. It’s very hard to be secure when your body’s been damaged.”

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: I Spent One Month In The Epicenter Of Cultural Degeneracy

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

4 Ways To Replace The Estrogenic Foods In Your Diet

October 10, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

So a couple of weeks ago I discussed how the estrogenic menace is not merely found in soy products, but many products that you can unfortunately find on your grocery store shelves. As luck would have it, there are also products you can eat that will fill the same dietary niche as those bad products, but without the estrogenic side effects. And most of those are also available on the shelves of your local grocery store.

Without further delay, let us discuss what those foodstuffs are, and how they're beneficial to you:

1. Grass-fed and healthy animals

Meat is good for you, despite what the soy-eaters tell you. The exact nutrient profile of your butchery depends on the various cuts/styles of meat you get, but as a nutritional category, animal products provide more protein, healthy fats, iron, calcium, B-Vitamins, and various other nutrients than any other food product.

However, as the previous article linked above discussed, much of the meat and dairy you find at the grocery store is processed, factory farm-raised, and loaded with hormones, antibiotics, and various other chemicals that you likely wouldn't want in your body. After all, the first thing any hunter does when he butchers an animal is checking the quarry's liver to see if it's diseased—and thus good to eat. So why should you not take that precaution just because you're not butchering your meat yourself?

If possible, you should try to get your meat from a small reputable source, in which you know that the animals are at the very least not crammed into tiny cages and kept alive with constant hormone and antibiotic injections. Try patronizing your local farmer's market, or why not try raising your own animals if you have the capability to do so?

Obviously, most of us cannot do so due to space or monetary concerns, so the next time you go to the grocery store, take a good long look at the labels of the meat packaging. If you see ingredients other than "BEEF" or "CHICKEN," I'd avoid it.

2. Non-Hoppy Alcohols

We've already learned that hops contain phytoestrogens, and most beers on the market today contain hops. And most alcohol on the market is beer. So what is a man to do if he wants to get a buzz?

Alcohol can be made of any carbohydrate product. There are beers that are made with malt extract, fruit, honey, corn, and more. If beer's not your thing, you can try cider, scotch, whiskey, whine, vodka, brandy or the julienne of other alcoholic products that don't use hops or, in fact, aren't beer at all.

I would actually argue that the majority of alcoholic products in the world are not made with hops and grains, it just so happens that the USA has only in recent years developed any sort of alcohol culture beyond beer (as with many other terrible things in American culture, busybody schoolmarms caused this to happen via prohibition, but that's a whole different issue)

So grab a glass of something unusual, and wow your friends with how much better you are than them!

3. Honey

If you need a dose of sweetness in your life, I'd recommend honey over sugar any time. It'll give you just as good of a carbohydrate fix as sugar, but there's so much more to it than that. Unlike processed sugar, honey contains vital nutrients

Honey
Nutritional value per 100 g (3.6 oz)
Energy	[illegible]
Carbohydrates	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
Fat	[illegible]
Protein	[illegible]
Vitamins
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Vitamin C	[illegible]	[illegible]
Minerals
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Other constituents
[illegible]	[illegible]

[illegible]

Units

[illegible]

[illegible]

If that wasn't enough, some studies have shown that honey might have some mild antiseptic and antimicrobial properties as well. Seems to me that that's something you would want to be eating, wouldn't it? Plus, honey can come in a variety of different flavors depending on what flower the bees were pollinating beforehand. Let's see sugar do that!

4. Nuts

Nuts are very good for you: they're loaded with healthy fats and oils, as well as various micronutrients that the body needs. And more importantly, the nutty flavor—if you'll pardon the expression—is quite satisfying to those umami taste buds. Various nuts can also be ground into flour for those of you who are interested in doing the paleo diet or similar things. Even in standard breads, they can replace the estrogenizing ingredients such as flax.

If you are afraid of estrogenic foods, don't despair! It's relatively simple and easy to find a greater alternative—and to open up a culinary experience you had never imagined before.

Read More: 4 Highly Estrogenic Foods Besides Soy That Could Lower Your Testosterone

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

New California Law Allows Jail Time If You Use Wrong Gender Pronoun On Tranny

October 10, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Fox News:

California health care workers who “willfully and repeatedly” decline to use a senior transgender patient’s “preferred name or pronouns” could face punishments ranging from a fine to jail time under a newly signed law.

California Gov. Jerry Brown signed the legislation last week.

The sponsor, Democratic state Sen. Scott Wiener, has argued adamantly that nobody is going to be criminally prosecuted for using the wrong pronoun.

“It’s just more scare tactics by people who oppose all LGBT civil rights and protections,” he said in a statement last month.

But the language seemingly allows for the possibility, however remote.

The bill itself is aimed at protecting transgender and other LGBT individuals in hospitals, retirement homes and assisted living facilities. The bill would ensure those facilities accommodate transgender people and their needs, including letting them decide which gender-specific bathroom they prefer to use.

“It shall be unlawful for a long-term care facility or facility staff to take any of the following actions wholly or partially on the basis of a person’s actual or perceived sexual orientation, gender identity, gender expression, or human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) status,” the bill reads.

Among the unlawful actions are “willfully and repeatedly” failing to use a transgender person’s “preferred name or pronouns” after he or she is “clearly informed of the preferred name or pronouns.”

The law states that if provisions are violated, the violator could be punished by a fine “not to exceed one thousand dollars” or “by imprisonment in the county jail for a period not to exceed one year,” or both.

Wiener’s office noted that violations for residential care facilities under existing law rarely resulted in criminal charges, especially for minor violations. Criminal penalties are meant more for violations that expose a patient to risk of death or serious harm, his office said.

Wiener’s office noted that the law “does not create any new criminal provisions,” but rather creates “new rights within an existing structure.”

One opponent of the law, the California Family Council’s Greg Burt, slammed the measure when the bill was in its early stages.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: It’s No Longer A Felony In California To Knowingly Infect Someone With HIV

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

The Dissident Right Can’t Win Without Parallel Institutions

October 10, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

As the culture war drags on, many men ask me what they can do to improve the situation in their country outside of helping their tribe or spreading red pills through global informational warfare. The answer is creating or helping maintain a parallel institution that serves the same function as one the left has already taken over and excluded from us.

Every single institution the left has is crucial to maintaining their power. This includes universities, media, think tanks, corporations (including tech companies), Hollywood, public schools, churches, and both local and national politics. They have achieved their power by taking over every single institution that touches your life in a meaningful way and using that position to ban anyone who disagrees with their neoliberal globalist cult. The solution is to take back these institutions through our own long march or simply create our own.

The dissident right has already created many parallel institutions. Here are just a few examples…

The left has women’s studies departments. The right has masculine studies in the form of game and Return Of Kings.

The left has the mainstream media. The right has Alex Jones, Red Ice, and alt lite Twitter personalities who disrupt the news cycle.

The left has all the think tanks. The right has web sites like Social Matter, Thermidor, and The Unz Review. They share ideas not found in establishment think tanks financed by the likes of Qatar.

The left has Hollywood. The right has meme shitlords and video channels like Murdoch Murdoch, which reach the youth in great numbers.

The left has a collection of celebrities who get attention when they share their political ideas. The right has Richard Spencer, who gets reported on from tweets he shares while in his pajamas, along with his alt right allies.

The left and cucked right has talk radio. The right has a collection of independent podcasters like Weimerica, (((The Right Stuff))), and Radio Derb.

The left has Reddit, Wikipedia, Twitter, and Patreon while the right has 4chan /pol/, Infogalactic, Gab, and Counter.fund.

Since we've only just begun building parallel institutions, we have no replacements as of yet for universities, public schools, the advertising industry, most of the Fortune 500, most of Silicon Valley, and converged Christian churches. This process will take multiple decades, but is absolutely necessary if we want to build enough power to defeat the left in a cold civil war scenario.

We also don't have our own politicians. While Donald Trump did win the latest Presidential election, he lacks the "1000 statesmen," as Ryan Landry put it, to carry out his agenda without being obstructed at every turn. He may control the brain of the millipede, but not its legs, meaning that he risks not fulfilling his agenda. We need leadership organizations that can groom young red-pilled men to defeat cuckservatives sponsored by the same billionaires that back the globalists.

And we have to do all of this better than the left and with less money. Simple, right? In case you're holding your breath for our own billionaire to come in and save the day, understand that every single billionaire in the world got there by being a globalist, not a traditionalist, and if a billionaire did come knocking on our door, I'd be extremely skeptical of his intentions. There is no money in advocating for tradition, so we'll have to accomplish what the left has without handouts as if we we're bootstrapping a business. It will be slow, but the message of the dissident right is seductive enough that people will put their blood and sweat—and soon their lives—into it.

Simply take a look at what the left controls that we don't, and then duplicate it for the right. If that's too much work for you, or beyond your current ability, simply find an existing parallel institution and donate your time into making it stronger, but don't compete or attack an existing dissident group for short-term political gain, like we've seen recently between the alt lite and alt right.

My suggestions assume that you already took care of yourself, your friends, your family, and possibly your neighborhood. Only then would I advise doing institutional work, because there is absolutely no point in helping out your country or society if you or those immediately around you are in bad shape. For us to really defeat the left, we'll need hundreds of our own institutions that are supported by tens of thousands of people who share similar belief systems as we do. It's no easy task, but it is the path that will lead to victory.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: The American Cold Civil War

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How Most Relationships End

October 11, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

People ask me when I ‘took the red pill’ (as much as I dislike that phrase). Was it when my girlfriend of five years cheated on me with two guys from the restaurant where she worked? Was it when my stepmother divorced my father for another man after twenty years of marriage? Or was it when I got deep into game in London and saw first hand the way women (and men) behave when they think no-one else is looking?

While many experiences throughout my life that have chipped away at what you might call a ‘Disneyfied’ view of relationships, the point at which I truly woke up to the fact that all was not as it seemed was when I became conscious of the fact that relationships always seem to degrade in the same way.

Clarissa

Clarissa was a nurse, a hot little thing with long blonde hair, a pretty face and ripe melons for breasts. I met her in the club where I was working. I didn't have any game at all back then. I lucked out with her, really. I dressed differently than other guys and (due to overdosing on antidepressant medication at the time) I was kind of cocky. She liked that.

So began a six-month mini-affair. At first, I might as well have been Jesus reborn. She literally worshiped me. It was like I could do no wrong. The sex was passionate and afterwards she'd stroke my hair as we fell asleep in each others arms.

Then, after about a month, I made my first big mistake which was moving in with her. Well, to be fair I didn't strictly 'move in', since I still had my own place, a room in a shared house elsewhere, but for all intents and purposes, Clarissa and I shacked up together. I'd sleep at her place every night, and slowly, over time, I began moving more and more of my stuff in.

In my defense, I should point out that this was all at her request. I may have been naive, but even then I was aware of what is actually a mainstream meme anyway—that you shouldn't begin cohabiting too soon after you meet. But Clarissa was adamant. 'I want you here with me.' 'I can't bear to be apart from you.' 'Don't you want to be with me all the time too?'

It proved impossible to resist these pleas from a woman who appeared totally enamoured with me. But after a couple of months things started to shift. At first the changes were barely perceptible. Later they became a maelstrom.

First, the sex became less frequent. After a while it died off almost altogether. With it, I also witnessed the demise of Clarissa's formerly sweet nature. Whereas once I could do no wrong, now she would nag me over stupid things.

To try to appease her I took on more and more of the household chores, but nothing was ever enough. Now she became more and more illogical in her arguments. Suddenly I was to blame for everything in her life, even things like her happiness at work, which had nothing to do with me. “If only you were more like this,” she’d say. “Then things would be different.”

It wasn’t long before we split up. She went out with friends one night and—I believe—got it on with another guy. This was right before Christmas, and during that season of goodwill (for everyone else) she unceremoniously threw me out of her flat.

Devastated, I crawled back to the cold, lifeless room that I’d vacated for her only a few short months ago, and proceeded to drink my way through to new year. She might have deserted me, but whiskey would never let me down.

Of course, I was incredibly green at that point and not game-savvy at all. In fact, you could take this article, print it off, and pin it up on the wall as an instruction guide for what not to do in a relationship. Still, even as I got more clued-up in my dealings with women, I observed this pattern repeating itself time and again.

As I became more ‘alpha’ and outcome-dependent, and as I began to experience greater sexual abundance, the pattern slowed down somewhat. Perhaps I would spend longer in the ‘pink cloud’ early stages with a girl before things turning sour. But even in my most successful relationships, I continued to observe the same overall arc, essentially an inversion of the ‘hero’s journey’. At first, I was the hero. By the end, I was a loser who she wouldn’t deign to throw a single coin at were I a beggar in the gutter at her feet.

As a younger man it was very easy for me to blame myself, and indeed, by putting the principles of game into practice (most notably outcome-independence, pre-selection, abundance mentality, dread game, jealousy plotlines, plate spinning and a willingness to walk away), I have largely mitigated the negative effects of this cycle in more recent times.

But with the rise of the internet came the opportunity for thousands of men to share their relationship experiences anonymously with one another. And as I started to delve into these, I realised that I was far from alone.

Betaisation

The book that really connected all the dots for me was Practical Female Psychology (For The Practical Man) by Joseph W. South and David Clare Franco. In it, the authors describe in great detail what they call the 'betaization process' whereby women, through their innate need for security, effectively make men domesticated cucks.

Ironically, rather than make these same women more favourable to their men, it actually kills their sexual desire for them (along with any affection that accompanies this).

Therein lies a terrible paradox. While men as well as women crave the perceived security and warmth that a committed relationship brings, in drawing ever closer to one another we sacrifice that sexual spark that made such intimacy viable in the first place.

This is why so many marriages fail. People get bored. Men who acquiesce to too many of their wives' demands end up emasculated and unattractive to them. Women want that initial spark back, but they can't get it with the man in the kitchen with the apron on, so they have to go elsewhere.

We see this sad story played out every single day, millions, probably billions of times across the world.

You might say "Ah, but I'm alpha. I'll game my wife and none of that will happen to me." Well, good luck with that. You'll perhaps offset the worst effects of betaization for a little longer than the average frustrated chump, but there is a deadly inevitability to the cycle.

Because remember, as soon as you've put that ring on her finger, as soon as you've moved in together, you've already conceded to her. You are already playing within her frame. Learn game and proceed with caution.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: Why Is Day Game Such A Grind?

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

England Is Dangerously Overpopulated And No One Is Talking About It

October 11, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

When people think of overcrowded European states, the first thought in the minds of many will be the Netherlands. Yet England is actually the most densely populated major European country, with minuscule Malta in the Mediterranean being the only place across all of Europe with more people per square kilometer or mile.

If only a medium-sized sociopolitical or economic crisis grips Europe or the wider world, England stands a good chance of collapse and starvation. Over 50% of the United Kingdom's food comes from other countries, and one would suspect that crammed-in England produces much less food per head of population than more airy Scotland or Wales.

Nope, even the Netherlands isn't as crowded as Mother England.

In 2013, population density in England was a disastrous 411 people per square kilometer (ca. 1,065 people per square mile). With a very large chunk of the island of Great Britain taken up by independence-minded Scotland and comparatively rural Wales, England's serious space issues are generally forgotten, with "experts" considering the whole of the United Kingdom and not its most populous (and very overpopulated) constituent nation.

Since the pro-mass migration Blair government took office in 1997, population density in England has gone up a massive 10%. Because a proper, lasting Brexit is several years away, the measurement is set to rise even further. If the present Conservative British government manages to arrest this growth, resource and land-deprived England will nevertheless remain grossly exposed to any sizeable regional or international emergency for years to come.

Talk of immigration and overpopulation = "racism"

Former United Kingdom Independence Party (UKIP) and Brexit leader Nigel Farage has faced 25 years of being called a “racist” for sounding the alarm bells on immigration and overpopulation in England and the rest of the United Kingdom.

Despite the glory of the majority vote for Brexit last year, public “discourse” in Britain still largely revolves around anti-mass migration activists being called “racists.” When pundits crunch numbers on television, the figures they come up with are usually the estimates of people arriving, not the additional negative strain these newcomers place on the very limited land available.

Let’s not kid ourselves: England is absolutely tiny. It is four times smaller than similarly populated metropolitan France. The country can in no sense sustain itself materially and current levels of immigration are doing nothing but exacerbate the problem.

England can easily be starved–just like what nearly happened in the Second World War

You don’t need a Hitler to try and starve England anymore.

One of the reasons why the modern ignorance about English overpopulation is so tragic comes from 20th century history. Hitler’s fleet of U-boats were perilously close to starving England and Britain in the early 1940s, sinking millions of tons of Allied shipping, especially from the United States. Of any country in Europe, island-bound England should be acutely aware of the risks of being cut off from its imports, mostly notably foodstuffs, and promote sustainable demographics.

We may not have a World War on our plate now, but anything from a moderate trade tussle to a regional military conflict could lead to widespread, lethal misery in England and its population of 53 million. Anything close to a Hitler will not be required. Instead of planning for a national emergency, though, authorities in the United Kingdom, England most of all, have gleefully stuck their heads in the sand.

What happens when social decline meets material catastrophe?

A more multicultural, starved version of A Clockwork Orange is awaiting England.

We have enough problems in the West already. So what happens when a lack of food or other necessities meets our long-term social decay? The results will be truly frightening. England in particular is a mass of weakly-bonded "citizens." Multiculturalism has left millions of people arguably sharing economic ties alone. Sans a prosperous or even functioning economy, how will people living on an overpopulated plot of land relate to one another peacefully?

As a matter of future life and death, England needs to get very serious very quickly about its terrible overpopulation problem. Things may seem fine and dandy for now, but just wait until a long-overdue existential crisis hits the country.

So long live England, if it can last.

Read More: England Set To Ban Talking To Women In Public As "Misogynistic Hate Crime"

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Boy Scouts Will Allow Girls In Latest Effort To Destroy Male Spaces

October 11, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via LA Times:

he Boy Scouts of America announced on Wednesday that it will admit girls into the Cub Scouts starting next year and establish a new program for older girls using the organization's same curriculum.

In the historic move, Cub Scout dens — the smallest unit — will be single-gender, either all boys or all girls. Cub Scout packs, which are larger and include a number of dens, will have the option to welcome both genders if they choose.

The Boy Scouts' board of directors voted unanimously for the change on Wednesday.

The new boy scouts

"This decision is true to the BSA's mission and core values outlined in the Scout Oath and Law. The values of Scouting — trustworthy, loyal, helpful, kind, brave and reverent, for example — are important for both young men and women," Michael Surbaugh, the group's chief executive, said in a statement.

Loading…

He added that "we believe it is critical to evolve how our programs meet the needs of families interested in positive and lifelong experiences for their children. We strive to bring what our organization does best — developing character and leadership for young people — to as many families and youth as possible as we help shape the next generation of leaders."

The program for older girls is expected to start in 2019 and will enable girls to earn the coveted rank of Eagle Scout.

In a statement, the group said that after "years of receiving requests from families and girls," it "evaluated the results of numerous research efforts" and came to its decision.

The Girl Scouts of America, which is separate and independent of the Boy Scouts, has been the primary scouting alternative for girls, and claims a membership of 1.8 million.

Recently, the Boy Scouts announced that it will allow transgender children who identify as boys to enroll in its boys-only programs.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: The Boy Scouts Is No Longer A Place For Young Males

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

My Father Invented A Hand-Cranked Multiple Grenade Launcher

October 11, 2017 | by Tubal Cain | Link | Original Link

My late father was an inventor and tool & die maker. In the late 1940s, he built stamping dies and tooling for a company that manufactured fishing lures. During his tenure with this company, he invented a fishing lure used for Walleye Pike.

In the late 1950s, he worked for a machine shop where he invented a machine used to remove tree bark off logs for the lumber industry. In 1960, he father went to work for Honeywell Corporation Aeronautical Products Division, Hopkins, Minnesota.

One evening, while still a small boy, I was sitting with my father on the sofa watching a Western movie on television. In the movie, the cavalry was using a Gatling Gun. Unbeknownst to me, my father had an epiphany. It later became the Honeywell MK 18 Hand-Cranked Multiple Grenade Launcher.

The Backstory

During the Vietnam War, the United States military used the M79 Grenade Launcher. The boop gun, as the soldiers in the field called it, was a simple single shot weapon that fired a 40mm grenade.

The United Sates Navy had expressed an interest in rapid-fire weapon that would fire the 40 mm grenade for use on gunboats in Vietnam.

My father presented his concept of a hand cranked rapid-fire grenade launcher to a colleague named Wilford Martwick. Martwick was a brilliant engineer who had previously worked for Boeing. He got the project approved, and he signed off on it.

Initially, the director of marketing expressed his disapproval of the MK 18. He said in a meeting that the MK 18 would never sell, and if it did, he would eat his hat.

The design the two men came up with was a rotary split breech that used straight through feeding of ammunition. This eliminated the need for a reciprocating bolt, extraction of ammunition from a belt, and extraction of ammunition from a chamber. The weapon would fire at a variable rate of up to 250 rounds per minute at ranges from 300 yards to 2,000 yards. Two rounds were fired per each full crank revolution, and the weapon loaded at the three and nine o’clock positions.

The firing sequence was at the six and twelve o’clock positions. A three-position knob was located at the rear of the gun for fire, safe and load. It used a 48 round ammunition box. The ammunition belt was Dacron impregnated with Mylar, and then heat-sealed. A metal fork located the belt, a shuttle spread the belt apart, and metal fingers opened the pocket in the belt to receive the round. This was accomplished in a fraction of a second. The empty shell casings remained in the expended belt.

My father, and Martwick, built the first model on their own time, and used spare parts. I remember my father spending many late nights in his basement workshop. I often fell asleep listening to banging and clacking as my father ran dummy rounds through the launcher.

Between 1965-1968, Honeywell manufactured 1,200 of the MK 18s. Typically mounted on top of the dual .50 caliber M2 Browning machine guns on the stern of the gunboats, the weapon proved to be deadly against the Viet Cong. The pivoting motion of the MK 18 allowed rapid-fire and maximum coverage area with 40 mm fragmentation grenades. It could also be mounted on a standard tripod for use at firebases and bunkers.

Yet Another Invention

In 1965, my father and Martwick had lunch in the company cafeteria to discuss ideas. My father proposed a single shot grenade launcher mounted on the M16 rifle. They went to work developing the weapon. Both men's names appeared on the patent. Honeywell then sold the patent to Colt Industries. In 1969, the M203 Grenade Launcher was born.

In 1968, my father decided to leave Honeywell. He saw the Vietnam War winding down.

The MK 19, a fully automatic grenade launcher, replaced the MK 18.

My father, with his invention

Years later, I met a Vietnam War veteran who served as a River Rat in the Brown Water Navy in 1967. He asked me if I was a relative of the man who had invented the MK 18. When I told him that that man was my father, the veteran told me of the times he used the MK18 in firefights against the Viet Cong while patrolling the Mekong River.

My father died in 2009. Prior to his death, I had the opportunity to learn his story of the MK 18. And what became of the director of marketing who said the MK 18 would never sell? The day the United States Navy awarded the contract to Honeywell, they had a party. A cake shaped like a hat was presented. The director of marketing had to cut the first piece and eat it. I guess he did have to eat his hat after all.

Read More: The History And Evolution Of Rifles

Tubal Cain

Tubal Cain is a metallurgist by trade residing in the Midwest. He is a strong traditionalist with an Alt-Right viewpoint. Cain has a passion for his profession, and his interests include younger Eastern European women, high-quality firearms, and animals.

Does Legalizing Prostitution Shift The Balance Of Sexual Power To A Man's Favor?

October 12, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Not long ago, a reader of my blog sent a question in asking what my thoughts were on escorts and general prostitution. While at one point in my life I was vehemently against any man paying for sex in any situation, my opinion of it did change a little bit last year.

I'll never forget when I got to Krakow, Poland last year. While I was on a date with a girl, she mentioned that prostitution was legal in Poland. I didn't think much of it.

The next day after I'd banged her out and sent her home, I decided to see what she was talking about. I got on my computer and started Googling around for escorts in Poland, with low expectations on what would actually turn up. I figured I'd see a bunch of ugly gypsy girls whoring themselves out.

But I was wrong. I was amazed.

The quality of girl I could hire for an hour was insane. 8s and 9s were going for $50-$75, or even less for 30 minutes. I do realize that many of these photos are probably ripped off of porn sites, or heavily edited. Regardless, what I saw shocked me.

Legalizing Prostitution Impacts The Entire Sexual Market

Let me be clear—I am not the first man to make this argument on the internet. I've read it before in numerous places, but never agreed with their assessment. It wasn't until I actually experienced it (to an extent) myself that my stance on the issue shifted.

Legalized prostitution would take a lot of the power out of the dating market for women, so of course they act disgusted by it. Guys would be a hell of a lot less thirsty if they could legally get on the phone and have a good-looking girl at their door within an hour for a reasonable price. It would create such a drastic shift in power that much of the poor female behavior we witness nowadays would disappear.

Girls would flake less, attention-whore less, and overall be more pleasant people if they knew that the power of a vagina could be bought for chump change by a "provider" who is way hotter than they are.

All of a sudden, all the regulation and general hysteria surrounding the sex trade industry in the States made sense. The entire agenda is to empower girls, and prostitution is the number one easiest way to give power back to men in the dating market.

The Shift To Prostitution Lite

While I don't think the laws and regulations will change anytime soon, there has been a very grey area that has developed over the past couple of years with sugar dating—which as far as I'm concerned is just Prostitution Lite.

Rather than be labeled as a "whore" or an "escort", terms that have been seen as derogatory for centuries—women who basically trade sex for money get to be labelled as "babies".

> I can report this is now most certainly changing in America with the "sugar" re-branding movement. The conventional terminology > such as prostitution and whore is being deliberately replaced with cutesy nomenclatures like sugaring and sugar babies, words far more palatable to the female psyche.
>
> My final takeaway is that this re-branding movement enables the sugar baby to > pursue a double-edged dating approach where she extracts large amounts of resources through prostitution with one group of men and at the same time retains the popular princess lifestyle with her main group. Throughout most of human history a woman of status was the antithesis of a whore. But as recent trends have shown, it now appears that princesshood and prostitution are two contradictory lifestyles that can be found embodied within the modern woman at the same exact time.

You Can’t Have It All

Remember a few years ago, when women were told they could sleep with attractive alpha men throughout their 20s (and even 30s), then settle down with the nice guy? While it worked for a few, others were left behind to grow old with a litter of kitties. Many who did manage to settle down are now also divorced. Some women are wising up to it. Again, emphasis on some—because the appeal of getting hot and random dick from your smartphone is a temptation most girls can’t resist.

Despite sugaring becoming mainstream and cool, it’s impossible to have the best of both worlds over the long-term. How are some of these girls going to go from jet-setting and $200 seafood platters every week to dating a “nice guy” who is making $70k a year? Will they ever truly find happiness in that? I doubt it. Expectations in women don’t decline with age, they only seem to rise (despite their value trending downward).

I predict that sugaring will be the new Sex And The City lifestyle for girls in the coming years. It will come complete with all girls claiming, “But I’m NOT an escort!” on their profiles.

Because they know that if they were escorts, their entire value would be crushed by a couple of bills in an unsealed envelope.

If you want to move to greener pastures with better girls, listen to The Dating Abroad Podcast. Get my book, King's Code, here.

Read More: The Expectations Of Modern Women Have Lost Touch With Reality And Common Decency

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Star Trek Discovery Is Social Justice At Warp Speed

October 12, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

After the groundbreaking Star Trek original series (TOS) was cancelled, the franchise went dormant. Afterwards, a film series began in which the even-numbered movies were good. Then it returned to television with The Next Generation (TNG). After it ran its course, other spinoffs were launched. Then it went off the air for a while, but a rebooted movie series began; apparently the odd-numbered films are now the good ones. Quite recently, Star Trek: Discovery (STD) marked the franchise's return to television.

The plot (spoilers ahead)

I haven't followed the shows after TNG because I gave up television. However, I caught the first three episodes of STD. Note well, it's a prequel to TOS, predating it by ten years. The Klingons have been dormant for a century, effectively disappearing. However, they've hatched a plot to "remain Klingon". Pretty scary, right?

Then we meet the main Federation protagonist, a Black lady with a soft butch appearance named Michael. (Why not Janet?) She's Spock's adopted sister—another surprise relative like Sybok in the fifth movie. She's a survivor of a Klingon attack (apparently they're not so dormant after all). Accompanying the Captain—a soft butch Asian lady—she shoots holes down a well to frack it for some thirsty space bugs. A radiation field dried up the water table. (Gamma rays don't do that.) I guess this was for character development?

Back aboard ship, they note a strange anomaly. You already know what'll happen… Michael puts on a space suit to investigate, despite an intense radiation field. (Don't they have robotic space drones?) After finding a large, mysterious object, a Klingon pops out. After two seconds of combat, he gigs himself with his Swiss glaive, and Michael is injured and adrift. The Klingons then argue about who should be the boss. That's because the Chief Ninja Turtle himself went to chase off the intruder, alone and armed with a medieval weapon.

Michael awakens back aboard. She leaves Sick Bay after being warned that not completing the radiation treatment would mean death, yet survives. A Klingon warbird arrives, at first in stealth mode. (Didn't the Romulans invent the cloaking device?) After having kicked the anthill and making themselves sitting ducks, they argue about what to do. Amidst the crisis, Michael steps out for a quick private call with Sarek, her Vulcan adoptive dad. She urges the Captain to shoot preemptively. To settle the argument, Michael ineffectively performs a Vulcan nerve pinch. (Smooth move…) After dithering too long, several more Klingon vessels arrive. Oops.

The second episode briefly shows Michael joining the crew, and Sarek warns her to behave. After the flashback, Michael speculates that the Klingons are trying to unite. The Captain isn't amused—understandably, given the nerve pinch stunt—and Michael goes to the brig. Following a quick Klingon pow-wow, other Federation ships arrive.

A battle breaks out, badly damaging the ship. A clueless redshirt dies. Michael has a quick psychic pow-wow with Sarek. The battle resumes, with dirty tricks on both sides. Then Michael and the Captain stage a botched raid on the Klingon ship. The Captain's remarkably short memory about her second-in-command's competence proves fatal. Michael gets a life sentence, unsurprisingly.

The third episode takes a radical departure, likely leading to the show's main premise. They've developed fungus allowing teleportation. (It's already available in Amsterdam.) My crystal ball predicts future hand-wringing about bioethics and WMDs.

Analysis

Star Trek casting always has been pretty diverse. That's inoffensive, unlike the preachy political messages. However, this time they're really laying it on thick. (One of my girlfriends wondered what's the deal with two chicks commanding a starship.) There's even a fish-man from Innsmouth with a spidey-sense for danger, actually STD's most interesting character. Fortunately, there's no Wesley Crusher, avoiding the Waltons In Space shtick from TNG.

As for the much-discussed "social justice" agenda, the greater part concerns the Klingons. Traditionally, they're the Russians—pretty grouchy in TOS, later wary but mellowing out. However, in STD, they're bad guys again, now representing Trump supporters. (Gee, thanks!) It's no secret that the tagline "remain Klingon" is based on "make America great again".

TOS had classically structured storylines, borrowing heavily from theater. TNG got into more complex story arcs, with plot crowbars aplenty. With STD, the special effects are pretty good, but they really need to stop using "idiot ball" plot devices.

Sometimes it seemed the screenwriters weren't too familiar with the old shows. Really, the entertainment industry should recognize that adding to a long-standing franchise isn't merely creating a product. It's a dramatic work which should flow smoothly with the others in the series and live up to audience expectations, building onto what worked before. Good development goes a long way.

What do the Klingons want?

They're this caricature, updated for The Current Year.

They wish to solidify political unity in order to defend their sovereignty and culture—in short, to "remain Klingon". They believe—fairly plausibly—that the Federation won't let them live by themselves, but rather incorporate them into their interstellar empire where they'll lose their independence and way of life.

The Federation's sociopolitical structure isn't explained in great depth, but money is obsolete. Food (and presumably other consumer goods) are instantly available via replicators. Advanced technology finally has made fairy tale Socialism work. Likely the public is either dying of boredom or goofing off on holodecks all day. However, the Klingons aren't feeling the love about all that.

Despite frequent interstellar meddling, TOS and TNG still paid lip service to the "Prime Directive" noninterference principle. However, the Federation in STD basically plays the same role the Borg did in TNG—"Prepare to be assimilated, resistance is futile". Since they've unwittingly staked claim to Klingon territory, a gentlemanly resolution to the border dispute isn't in the cards.

The Federation always represented a globalist vision of the future, basically the United Nations in space. Thus, globalists are the Borg of today, and the form of Socialism they want for us won't be the fairy tale variety.

Remain Klingon, my friends.

Read More: 9 Things That Geek Feminism Ruined

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Meet The Billionaire Jewish Family Funding Breitbart And Milo Yiannopoulos

October 12, 2017 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

For the past several years, Bob Mercer, a reclusive billionaire and co-chair of hedge fund Renaissance Technologies, has been covertly funding numerous right-wing movements in the U.S. and U.K. A major donor to President Donald Trump's campaign and supporter of Brexit, the Mercer family has also been bankrolling both right-wing media outlet Breitbart and former contributor Milo Yiannopoulos through their foundation, the Mercer Family Foundation.

A recent BuzzFeed article revealed the extent to which the Mercers have been funding and supporting both Breitbart and Milo. In particular, the Mercers are so enamored of Milo that following his resignation from Breitbart earlier this year after the fake news media dogpiled him as a "pedophile," they helped him launch his current project, MILO Inc.

While Return of Kings has no ill will towards Milo or Breitbart, we believe it is important that people know how they're funded. Milo and Breitbart are not an organic nationalist resistance, but are being used to push the agenda of a wealthy Jewish family.

Who Is Bob Mercer?

Steven Bannon is closely aligned with the Mercers.

Bob Mercer is known for being intensely private and refusing to talk to reporters, meaning that we can only divine his ideology through the campaigns and personalities he supports with his money. The Mercer Family Foundation has been a consistent supporter of right-wing politicians and groups throughout the years, including the Tea Party movement, the Club for Growth, and the Heritage Foundation.

During the 2016 presidential election, Mercer was initially a major supporter of Ted Cruz, donating $11 million to a pro-Cruz super PAC. Following Cruz's withdrawal from the race, however, Mercer switched his support to Trump, founding a pro-Trump super PAC named Make America Number One, and was instrumental in securing senior positions for Breitbart executive chairman Steve Bannon and Kellyanne Conway within the Trump campaign and administration.

Mercer was also a major supporter of the Leave campaign in the Brexit referendum in the U.K. last year, donating data analytics from one of his companies to U.K. Independence Party leader Nigel Farage. This greatly aided the Leave campaign by allowing Leave.EU, a leading pro-Leave group, to target likely supporters via highly personalized Facebook advertisements.

Most importantly, the Mercer family are fervent supporters of Israel and Zionism. During his presidential primary campaign, Ted Cruz made support for Israel a major plank of his platform due to the Mercers' money. Similarly, both Mercer-funded Breitbart and Milo have consistently pushed a Zionist worldview and support for Israel's nationalist prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, as well as opposition to Islamic extremism and ISIS.

The Mercer Family: Fake Nationalists?

While the Mercers have helped aid President Trump and other American nationalists, it is clear they are doing so not out of a traditionalist worldview, but to push their own agenda. In particular, their continued support of Milo Yiannopoulos, a flamboyant homosexual who brags about having anal sex with black men (and who recently "married" a black man in Hawaii), is puzzling. Why bankroll Milo and not an authentically traditionalist voice with less baggage?

The answer is because the Mercers are not conservative at all. Their support for Trump, Milo, and Breitbart is because they are concerned with the state of Israel, not America. In recent years, the left and Democratic Party have become increasingly anti-Israel, to the point where a pro-Palestine Muslim, Keith Ellison, was nearly elected chair of the DNC. The Mercers are seeking to prop up Zionist voices and politicians to guarantee Israel's security in the years to come.

None of this is intended as an attack on Milo or Breitbart. However, fans of one or the other should be mindful that they are funded by a family whose pro-Jewish interests may not be the same as theirs.

Read Next: What Donald Trump's Victory Means For Men

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Instagram, SoundCloud, Twitch, VK, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice, Affirmative Right, and other sites.

Foreign Women Should Come Before Men In Any Immigration Plan

October 12, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Countries like Sweden, France, UK and Germany have accepted many migrants, particularly non-European males. To some extent that is also the case with the U.S., Canada, and Australia. For instance, the Swedish economist Jan Tullberg has asserted that Sweden now has 125,000 males for every 100,000 females.

This effect is magnified in the younger age cohorts due to the massive influx of Afghan unaccompanied ~~male adults~~ refugee children, and Middle Eastern and African male economic migrants which have come as a consequence of the coordinated efforts from globalists like George Soros and various NGOs such as Save the Children International.

Some have also speculated that feminists in leadership positions either want to make things worse for native men, or that they want to increase the female value in the sexual market by making the society more competitive for men while improving their own access to men. More men imply a better situation for adult females who are free to pick among both native and non-native men and for both short- and long-term relationships.

The social consequences can become quite detrimental since this development leads to not just an unstable or even inverted sexual market and marriage market, but also higher crime rates and more men joining extreme nationalist, left-wing, and Islamic groups (ISIS in particular). Hence constructive changes are called for.

More females as a solution

Part of the solution is to halt and reverse immigration, but another aspect is to make room for more female migrants. My suggestion is to accept more women from poorer parts of Eastern Europe and adjust the numbers for the total population size of each host nation.

Countries like Russia (142 millions) and Ukraine (44 millions) will not be depleted of their women if a couple of million leave for Western countries. Additional poor countries with large populations like Brazil (207 millions), the Philippines (104 millions) and Indonesia (260 millions) could be other options in this regard. Furthermore, real refugee women from war-ridden countries like Yemen could be another group that is allowed to entry the West, at least short-term.

If this hypothetical scenario were to become true, it would probably have a number of positive effects for social cohesion. When both white and non-white citizens notice that they have a higher chance of finding a long-term partner, they will focus more on living a stable life instead of joining pathetic extremist groups that do no one no good.

Additionally, the sexual market will be much more balanced, and even native women may have to adjust and better themselves as a result of the tougher competition from their global sisters. And why should a man go and live in South America, Eastern Europe or Southeast Asia under worse material conditions when he can live in the West with a more traditional female partner?

Practical implementation

This is largely a political task and few politicians will support this idea, at least initially. Hence this has to be put on the agenda in the online community, which can have spill-over effects in real politics.

The first step is to use clever rhetoric to put the question on the agenda. For example, what happened to the old adage that women and children should come first? The pathos of the public will be affected by pictures of poor girls and women in Russia, Ukraine, the Philippines, Indonesia, Yemen et cetera. Then we should put forward some of the logical arguments behind this idea. Eventually particular parties and politicians will push for this agenda.

Conclusion

More female migrants should flood the West in the coming years, perhaps even decades, in parallel with reversing male migrant flows from non-Western countries. This will have a number of positive effects on these societies, such as a more balanced sexual market, lower crime rates, and better social cohesion. We should all fight for this hypothesis to become real. The first step is to put the question on the agenda.

For more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: How Mass Immigration Is Driven By Female Consumerism And Low Fertility

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Hollywood Has Always Used The “Casting Couch” To Trade Sex For Fame

October 13, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Scandals by celebrities always have been a common staple of media attention. Despite their wealth and fame, movie stars are essentially disposable, given the vast number of hopefuls who would sell their souls for a shot at stardom. However, Hollywood’s problems don’t end with them.

Harvey Weinstein

Quite unusually, the spotlight has focused further up the food chain on Harvey Weinstein, a 65 year old producer involved in over 300 movies and TV shows since 1981. Some of his more famous films were the Kill Bill series, Pulp Fiction, Inglorious Basterds, and Mandela: Long Walk to Freedom. If recent allegations are true, could this be symptomatic of a larger problem?

A recent New York Times article begins:

> Two decades ago, the Hollywood producer Harvey Weinstein invited Ashley Judd to the Peninsula Beverly Hills hotel for what the young actress expected to be a business breakfast meeting. Instead, he had her sent up to his room, where he appeared in a bathrobe and asked if he could give her a massage or she could watch him shower, she recalled in an interview.
>
> “How do I get out of the room as fast as possible without alienating Harvey > Weinstein?" Ms. Judd said she remembers thinking.

This isn't just a single "he said / she said" incident; it describes several other very similar encounters. Another item mentions an alleged groping of an Italian model. The article stated that frequently these resulted in cash settlements, often with a confidentiality agreement. Journalists have failed to report on these incidents. It's no accident that the Big Six MSM megaconglomerates own Hollywood's Big Ten movie studios. Despite some exceptions, the great moguls seldom get thrown under the bus.

Despite anything that may or may not have happened, Weinstein does have serious feminist street cred. The NYT article states that his company distributed a feature concerning the subject of campus sexual assault. He raised money for Hillary's campaign, gave Malia Obama an internship, "recently helped endow a faculty chair at Rutgers University in Gloria Steinem's name", and participated in a women's march during the Sundance Film Festival.

His attorney states these allegations are false, and legal action may result against the Times. According to a follow-up NYT article, a third of his company's board quit. Further, Weinstein made an apology, recognizing that all this "caused a lot of pain", and will be taking some time off indefinitely.

Still, perhaps the public hasn't seen the last of these disputes, as several new stories recently surfaced elsewhere. Some allegations are considerably worse. Even Hillary and The Lightworker had to take notice.

Even if most turns out to be true, it would merely be the tip of Tinseltown's very dirty iceberg.

Hollywood’s sordid history

Sexual harassment is particularly thorny subject. On the one hand, being a sleazebag is obviously reprehensible. Nobody should be asked to trade sexual favors for employment. On the other hand, legal developments have created a climate of fear, and unfounded charges can be very damaging. Further, the rich and famous should be answerable to the same rules applying to everyone else.

The motion picture industry long has been a staple of American culture. Thomas Edison and D.W. Griffith created its early beginnings. Soon after, Hollywood was established by Central and Eastern European immigrants. All of the chiefs ended up ditching their starter wives for nubile movie stars. Despite that, the “casting couch” gambit has been legendary for a century.

Simply put, where there’s smoke, there’s fire. Although remarried to America’s most beautiful women, trading sexual favors for starring roles was something expected of many other actresses to open doors. Marilyn Monroe’s 1955 statement (after she got a major contract) is rather telling:

> I’ll never have to suck another [nationality adjective] cock again.

Julia Phillips even wrote a bestseller about the industry’s moral turpitude during the 1970s-1980s called You’ll Never Eat Lunch In This Town Again. How deep does the dirt go?

The sleaze continues and is international in scope, noted in the European cinematic scene, and even the outwardly puritanical institution of Bollywood. It’s so bad that the film industry is the one place where feminists would actually have a point about “institutionalized this” and “structural that”. However, like with most real ongoing problems, feminists usually take relatively little notice.

It gets worse yet

Typical "casting couch" incidents involved young adult women, and were quid pro quo offers which they could accept or decline. Once again, let it be clear that being a sleazebag is wrong. Unfortunately, it doesn't end there.

Teenagers—and even younger—of both sexes have been subjected to inappropriate conduct. Shirley Temple wrote about a producer exposing himself when she was twelve. As disgusting as that is, outright coercion has happened too amidst a culture of secrecy. Sometimes that includes minors being plied with drugs. Hollywood's response to the Roman Polanski matter is basically, "That happened a long time ago; besides, he's cool!"

Conventional law enforcement typically has had notorious difficulty handling high-profile cases. Then what can be done about these problems?

The solution

Quit funding their degeneracy and propaganda.

So Hollywood has tolerated grotesquely immoral behavior since day one. Other than that, they've been using their position to push cultural Marxism. Lately, their propaganda is so bad that it affects the quality of their product. Then they have the nerve to lecture us rubes in "Flyover Country" about politics at their Oscars ceremonies, making what was once an entertaining event seem like a sociology professor's sermon. When the subject turns to women's rights and the welfare of children, they're bigger hypocrites than televangelists.

There's one thing the Hollywood types listen to: the bottom line. After reading all of the above, how motivated are you to buy an overpriced ticket for the latest shlockbuster? How willing are you to keep your cable TV subscription which sends royalty checks to them? Their virtue-signaling can buy off the feminists, but it's time for the public to tune them out.

Read More: 6 Reasons To Boycott Hollywood Forever

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How Virile Philosophers Saved The Greek Civilization

October 13, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

The state of Greece twenty-five centuries ago has surprising contemporary overtones. The Hellenic peninsular was a very loose confederation of city-states, many constantly at war with each other. Greeks only managed to unite when threatened by aliens: first when the prince of Troy, in Asia Minor, abducted one of their princesses of most royal blood, second when the Persian Empire fancied to rule them. Twice the Persian invasion was crushed (the Thermopylae battle masterfully depicted in 300 happened during the second time).

When war ceased, Greeks were already used to union and managed to bicker much less. Trade soared. Sparta declined. Athens, its long-time rival, attracted crafters, merchants, intellectuals, to the point of becoming a cosmopolitan center.

However, the prosperity had worms in its fruits. With the spirit of military camaraderie and phalanxes being no longer necessary, individualism rose. Along with the goods came money lending and scamming. The most noticeable change was a rise of rhetoric and dialectical discussions. Skilled aliens, having no political rights in Athens, coached young aristocrats who wished to rise above their peers. They taught them to speak well, to capture the people's passions, to use framing and reasoning so that they would steer anyone to any conclusion. These masters of rhetoric were called sophists.

Under their influence, Athens became more "vibrant": too many words diminished the value of words, too many individual ambitions raised mistrust, too many contradictory ideas fostered chaos. Social relationships became disingenuous, and some, after they got a taste of the gleaming, cool "philosophy", became cynical:

> For I fancy you have not failed to observe that lads, when they first get a taste of disputation, misuse it as a form of sport, always employing it contentiously, and, imitating confuters, they themselves confute others. They delight like spies in pulling about and tearing with words all who approach them.… And when they have themselves confuted many and been confuted by many, they quickly fall into a violent distrust of all that they formerly held true; and the outcome is that they themselves and the whole business of philosophy are discredited with other men. (Republic 539b-c)

Many Athenians grew tired, not only of the sophists' tireless babble on any topic, but of their influence over the young. One Athenian, Socrates, decided to beat the sophists on their own ground. He trained himself in asking contrived questions, outframing and reframing anyone. When he descended into the arena, he managed to outsmart at least some of the rhetoricians by turning their own arguments upside down. All Plato's dialogues bear this mark: Socrates always knows where he wants to go, yet he never tells, and leads his discussion partners there through contrived questions.

But Socrates turned dangerous as well. The philosophical chaos in his environment had already turned him into an acid skeptic. Plato's earliest dialogues such as the Euthyphro and Laches tell about the impossibility to, respectively, have a satisfying idea of piety and bravery—which are fundamentally related to spiritual and civic consciousness—while the later Euthydemus is fully dedicated to pure, empty dialectical games a Saul Alinsky would not disown.

Socrates' solution was too strong and destructive. Not only did he reject the sophists' houses of cards but the foundations of his own city as well. Being really Socratic meant going full circle, rejecting almost any certainty, and disengaging from politics, which means withdrawing from the very basis of civic brotherhood, common sense, and shared culture.

When Socrates was rightly trialed, his judges would have liked to simply exile him or sentence him into closing his damned mouth. He would not give them the choice: either they should praise him as a hero or condemn him to death. Unsurprisingly, he was ordered to drink the hemlock.

When Socrates finally passed away, his young disciple Plato mourned him with utter sadness. The latter, though, used dialectics and rhetoric quite differently. When the true Socrates' influence waned, the fictional Socrates we meet within the later dialogues stands out as an efficient mouthpiece who promotes brotherhood among legitimate citizens, a functional caste society, a vivid spirituality spanning from the simplest myths to the most complicated esoteric.

Plato constantly bashed and ridiculed the alien rhetoricians, perhaps more efficiently than his master did. But where Socrates led to nothingness Plato pushed for the re-forging of a true aristocracy. His Republic and Laws muse a lot on that. Those who have a knack to the occult will notice references to music, mathematics, geometry, and symbolic myths, mostly related to the Pythagorean tradition though not only—in the Timaeus (22b) a mysterious Egyptian priest tells out of nowhere, “the Greek are always children!”

Thus Plato and his close friends, whom we meet at the side of the fictional Socrates in the dialogues, succeeded where the real old Socrates failed: they drove sophistry out of the city and dried up the disorderly desires it fed on. You may find that Plato went a bit far, for example when he advised censoring or expelling the artists, but when you notice how much fashion, art, and marketing took a firm grip on people’s minds and judgments it becomes evident that his reasons are still ours.

> Poets and story-tellers are guilty of making the gravest misstatements when they tell us that wicked men are often happy, and the good miserable; and that injustice is profitable when undetected, but that justice is a man’s own loss and another’s gain—these things we shall forbid them to utter, and command them to sing and say the opposite. (Republic 392a-b)

Plato’s ideal city was never realized. Utopias are more like guiding stars than mandatory plans. It still led the Athenians and other Greeks back to their true compass. One of these Greeks, who hailed from the northern city of Stagira, spent years studying under Plato before becoming a classic on his own right. His name was Aristotle, and although the sheer volume of his writings is enough to create awe, he was not a pompous sputter but a true thinker who understood the value of the world we live in.

Aristotle collected many things, from corpses of animals to political constitutions, and he drew insightful comparisons from them. Needless to say, he needed several travelling assistants to pick up such data, and he could afford these because he tutored the older prince from a kingdom on the North, Macedonia. This average-sized boy was made king under the name of Alexander III. Eventually he would become a fierce warrior, unite Greece by his military strength and skill, and make up his own empire.

If you had lived in Athens just before Socrates made himself a name on the agora, you would never have guessed what was to happen later. Greeks were divided, individualistic, well under the sway of marketers before the word was coined. And yet some of them, using the marketers' very weapons, would expose them and have them chased away. Less than 50 years later, the Greeks were alive, well, full of masculine energy and travelling back to the Aryan fountain of youth in India at the side of Alexander the Great. If Plato and Aristotle came back today, they would undoubtedly side with the red pill.

Read Next: As Western Democracy Descends Into Tyranny, Plato's Republic Becomes More Relevant Than Ever

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

London Begins Decriminalizing Rape By Letting Hundreds Of Rapists Free With Only A Warning

October 13, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Evening Standard:

Hundreds of sex offenders, including rapists, are escaping with “a slap on the wrist” by simply being cautioned for their crimes, the Standard has learned.

Figures obtained by the Standard reveal more than 1,100 cautions were given to sex offenders in London, meaning they dodged court and potentially lengthy prison spells. The tally includes 16 cautions for rape, which carries a maximum life imprisonment sentence if convicted in court.

Cautions, described as “warnings”, require offenders to accept guilt and are mostly issued to deter first-time offenders or bypass court proceedings for lower-level offences. They are not recorded as convictions but can show on Disclosure and Barring Service checks, formerly CRB checks.

But the Scotland Yard figures show thousands more cautions were handed out for other violent and serious crimes as their use in London surged 25 per cent over the past five years.

Police and the Crown Prosecution Service insisted it was “rare” for offences as serious as rape to result in a caution. They said it could happen when victims cannot face the trauma of testifying in court. A caution ensures the offender is placed on the sex offenders’ register and monitored.

However, campaigners called for a “wholesale review” as the Standard’s findings revealed 183,043 cautions were issued from 2012 until last year, with 1,115 given for sexual offences, including 16 for rape.

The circumstances of the rape cautions in the figures are unknown. But previous cases in which cautions have been given for rape have involved child offenders, including siblings, and people suffering mental health problems. There have also been cases where crimes logged as rape by police have resulted in a caution for a lesser sex offence.

The figures were released following Freedom of Information requests submitted by the Standard. City Hall pledged to question the Government over the use of cautions.

Dianne Whitfield, of charity Rape Crisis, said issuing cautions for sexual offences was in most cases “wholly inappropriate” as “they don’t in any way reflect the seriousness of the crime or the long-lasting and often devastating impacts that sexual violence has”.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: This Ugly Woman Invented 15 False Rape Accusations Before Finally Being Jailed

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

How To Train For A Marathon

October 14, 2017 | by Keith Daniels | Link | Original Link

Running a marathon is an extreme test of will, discipline, mental strength, and of course endurance. Completing a race of this length has enticed people to train for months in order to accomplish this feat. Not only is running a marathon intense, but the training is absolutely grueling. Expect to spend months training multiple times a week, for many miles.

The Right Mindset

You already know that running a marathon requires a lot of training. While most people shrug it off, thinking that they can do it, a lot of people quit after only a short stretch of training. What gives?

For a lot of people, they just don't have the mental willpower to tackle marathon training. One of the main reasons for this is that they lack a purpose. Before running a marathon, you have to decide why. "Because it's fun" won't cut it. When you go through training you'll realize that running a marathon isn't all fun and games.

Your reason for running a marathon should be because it's something you're passionate about. Or because you find it a true challenge—something that you won't be able to pass up.

While it would be nice to have a cookie-cutter marathon training program, that just won't work. People are just too different in their endurance, experience and time available for training. Therefore, you're going to have to adjust your training based on the varying factors that dictate your ability to run.

However, we'll do our best to use a few guidelines that all runners should implement into their training programs.

Getting Started

A good technique for running a marathon is to choose the date far in advance. Pick the race at least six months in advance, if not more—some suggest that novice runners start a year prior. This gives you the opportunity to write it on your calendar so that you have no excuses to not plan properly.

Although all marathons are the same length, they all have unique aspects. Some are in the heart of a city, while others are out in rural areas. Keep this in mind when signing up for your race. Also, it's best to stick to a marathon that's close to home. This allows you to prep adequately for the race, and get a good night's rest and meals without worrying about traveling.

When starting out, it's important to know your limits. This is going to be based on your prior running experience. If you have none, then start low as there's no reason to push it. This can't be understated. The amount of running, in terms of frequency and distance, is much more intense than a casual neighborhood jog. Injuries that usually arise from marathon training occur because mileage was built up too fast. Your body can acclimate to new forms of stress, but it takes time to do so.

Get comfortable running at distances of 20-30 miles per week (3-5 per day, 5-6x per week) before testing the waters even more. A good way to practice this is by signing up for shorter races, such as 5k's, 10k's and eventually half-marathons. Not only will this help you train properly, but it will give you opportunities to prepare for specific race dates, resting for the race, and recovering from it.

Training Structure

It's important to break down the building blocks of a marathon so that you can incorporate them into your training. There are several factors involved:

Base Mileage

This is perhaps the 'key ingredient' to running a marathon. It's what allows you to build up over time to get to the point where you can run a full 26.2 miles.

Again, 20-30 miles is a good starting point. The long-term goal, however, should be at least 50 miles. This can be broken down into 3-5 runs per week. Any less is not enough, and any more is too much.

The intensity of these runs should be reasonably moderate. This is because you're not trying to achieve any records with your training, but are instead trying to build up your body to be able to handle certain distances.

So let's say you start out at 20 miles per week, but want to work up to 50. You're going to need to find a way to add distance each week, but not so much that you over-train.

A good rule of thumb is to add 5-10% each week to your distance. So let's say you start out at 20 miles per week. You would then add 1-2 miles to your training, perhaps broken up into different sessions.

Long Runs

Most of your training sessions should be at a significantly shorter distance than what you would run in the marathon, especially when building up. However, it's important to do long runs every week or so in order to help your body adapt quicker to longer distances.

It's best to take it easy on these runs. Move at a brisk pace, especially at the beginning, in order to build up that confidence needed to run these long distances.

A good rule of thumb for these type of runs is to move up one mile per week. Start out at a distance you feel comfortable doing and move up. You also want to dial back every 3-4 weeks, cutting down by a few miles, only to jump right back up where you were before.

For example, you go from 7 to 8 to 9 to 6 to 10. See how that works? Adjust it for your skill level.

Rest

The only way to grow is to recover! You must schedule regular rest days, as well as periods of decreased activity to allow for adequate recuperation.

If you're one of those people who can't sit around without doing anything, then do another form of exercise: yoga, strength training, swimming, or stretch. Just avoid high-impact exercising similar to running.

And when the date of the marathon gets closer, you're going to have to taper off your workouts. This means that you should scale back quite a bit in terms of distance and intensity to let your body heal for the big day.

Again, the mental block of doing marathon training can be rough. Just make sure that you have a good reason to get running. Also, you can always recruit a friend to run with you. That will certainly keep you motivated to get your runs in.

Read More: How To Train Your Body For Strength Versus Endurance

Keith Daniels
Keith is a former collegiate athlete who now writes about the latest trends in health and fitness. You can read more of his articles on his blog First Rate Fitness.

Can Christianity Be Made More “Muscular”?

October 14, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Several articles on this website pertain to how weak, effeminate, and ineffectual modern religion is, particularly Christianity, and that’s certainly true, but what if I were to tell you that this crisis of effeminate religion has already occurred, and physical culture was a major weapon in combating this?

The 19th Century Crises of Abrahamic Religion

For the purposes of this article, we’ll be looking at two concurrent “muscular religion” movements that emerged in the 19th century: Muscular Christianity and Muscular Judaism.

Muscular Christianity began as a reaction to a problem that will seem very familiar to a lot of you: in the 18th and 19th centuries, the attendance of Christian churches (in particular Protestant Churches) was heavily skewed towards a female audience—and this was almost entirely caused by the practice of preachers at that time.

As other articles on this site have pointed out, Christianity is not inherently an effeminate religion, but the practice of it, then as now, is inherently womanly: concepts such as bridal mysticism—a medieval conception essentially conceiving of the worshiper as the consort or lover of Christ, created largely by female mystics such as Mechthild—led to an increasing feminization of the religion and more women being drawn to it. The church would respond by catering further to that audience, and the cycle would repeat. It seems that, then as now, the church has always partially been a business. Note that even today, much ecclesiastical language refers to “being in love with Jesus” or the like.

Realizing that this language was utterly failing to connect to masculine men, various social reformers throughout the Anglosphere sought to inject a small portion of the “barbarian virtues”, in Theodore Roosevelt’s parlance, back into Christianity, to combine the gentle virtues and ethics of religion with a masculine physicality, camraderie, and honor. Thus we see in the 19th century the flowering of sporting organizations such as the YMCA, as sporting, particularly team sports, were seen as a way to cultivate both the masculine and feminine virtues that would create a well balanced worshiper. In the words of Thomas Hughes, of Tom Brown’s Schooldays fame…

> …a man’s body is given him to be trained and brought into subjection, and then used for the protection of the weak, the advancement of all righteous causes, and the subduing of the earth which God has given to the children of men.

From The New Testament To The Old

Not to be outdone by the gentiles, Muscular Judaism arose roughly around the same time, with a broadly similar goal; while Muscular Judaism did not have the same imperialist/missionary undertones that Muscular Christianity had, the goal was still to cultivate the mental and physical properties to revive the nation of the Jewish people in the long term and more immediately to counter the stereotype of the Jews as a weak and dyspeptic people that is still common in anti-Semitic depictions.

For both religions, the idea was to combine the ethics of the religion with a “barbaric” masculinity, and a partial emphasis on sports and physical culture in addition to the liturgical teachings.

Max Nordau, coiner of the term “Muscular Judaism” and the possessor of a truly virile set of facial hair

The Religious Argument

In both cases, it should be pointed out that opinion was hardly universal in the need for this—many religious leaders felt that focusing so much on the body was a pointless distraction from the truly important (the spiritual). However, bear in mind that the paradox of having a religious component to physical fitness, the most pagan of disciplines, was always seen as a compromise rather than religiously "pure".

Indeed, it seems to me that the whole idea was something of a lesser evil, that it was better to have slightly barbaric men in a slightly barbarized church, then have masculine men eschew the church completely and turn to crime and degeneracy.

Indeed, I've always argued the same: that despite it's inherent primalism, from strength and vigor come all things, including the gentle virtues— and both me and the 19th century "church fathers" would likely agree with its necessity as a foundation before said gentler virtues were created.

Or to put it in the parlance of the YMCA, the harmonization of mind, body and soul, as represented by the inverted red triangle logo. Indeed, that seems to be a fair approximation of the goals of neomasculinity.

Implications for Today

As some have pointed out, the culture of today doesn't really engender much love of religion, and even those who are against the rampant degeneracy of the current zeitgeist don't seem to be effective in rescuing those flagging church attendance numbers. Indeed, the overwhelming majority of Christian denominations today are basically hemorrhaging attendees—and who can blame them? They have essentially turned into, as a former ROK writer put it, "service industries for women".

I'm not a religious man myself, but the Muscular Religion approach can be effective: Jews were soon over-represented in Austria-Hungary's Olympic teams and church attendance soared amongst men for a good half century. If you want to give rebirth to masculinity—and undoubtedly we all do—an emphasis on physical culture seems to me to be as good as any a place to start, and if masculinity could be encouraged and reborn in a more religious age, I don't see why it can't be done in this less religious age as well.

As a side note, those worried about the rise of anti-Semitism might want to encourage a rebirth of Muscular Judaism amongst the Chosen People—certainly I think the Nordau types would be much more respected than the cavalcade of modern American Jews who seem intent on embodying so many of the negative stereotypes of their people.

Just speaking offhandedly, I highly doubt that the members of, say, the Hakoah Vienna athletic club would be the sorts of Jews promoting “poz” and degeneracy

No matter what religion you are, you can diligently train yourself, and encourage others to do the same, and encourage them to embrace the masculine virtues. If they could do it in the 1800s we can do it now.

Read More: Will Neomasculinity Create A New Patriarchal Religion?

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

White Christian Couple Adopts Eight African Children At One Time

October 15, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In a case of virtue signalling on steroids, an American Christian couple have adopted eight children from Sierra Leone in one go, adding to their existing biological family of two children. They made sure to broadcast their charity far and wide, even publishing a book, so that the entire world knows how superior they are to people who do not dedicate their lives to helping non-whites.

> A couple have done an extreme 'Brangelina' by adopting eight siblings from an African orphanage in one go – the biggest single adoption in history.
>
> Hayley and Mike Jones instantly increased the size of their family from two to ten by adopting the children from Sierra Leone.
>
> The pair wanted a bigger family but were put off having children after both of Hayley's pregnancies ended with emergency C-sections.

I would also be concerned for my wife's health if she had two difficult births, but I would look to alternatives such as using a surrogate mother if I desired more children. The first thing on my mind would not be flying to Africa to adopt eight African children without considering how such an addition would affect my two existing children.

> When the couple originally looked into adopting they were adamant it would just be one or two children.
>
> But after hearing the names of a number of children who were still waiting to be adopted they decided they should take more.
>
> They were then told about Michael, 16, Samuel, 15, Gabrielle, 12, Levi, 11, Malachi, nine, Judah, eight, Isaiah, seven and Zion, five, and decided they would be the perfect addition.
>
> Mr Jones said: 'We thought it was about two or three children we'd be adopting when we initially met the orphanage.
>
> 'But God was telling us both separately to keep going for more and more – it was just brought up that there was a sibling group of six and eight.

Did God also tell them to run to the Daily Mail to share the tale? We'll never know, but at risk of projecting my hyper-sexual worldview onto the couple, I can't help but notice that the oldest "child" is more athletic, virile, and masculine than the husband.

“Child”

Is it possible that his mother adopted an alpha male to compensate for her beta male husband? We’ve seen this before with Western European women who cuck their boyfriends by eagerly adopting masculine refugees into their homes.

Honey, I’m not happy. Let’s adopt an African refugee!

Sweetie, can Roosh Junior move into the bedroom with us? I want him to be comfortable.

Since the article mentioned that the wife had an interest in Africa, it's safe to say that it was her idea to adopt. While we should all be thankful that the African children have a second-chance at life, and I hope they do thrive in America by attending prestigious Ivy League colleges, we can't avoid the couple's political intent, which Matthew 6 of the Bible specifically shames.

> 1 "Be careful not to practice your righteousness in front of others to be seen by them. If you do, you will have no reward from your Father in heaven.
>
> 2 "So when you give to the needy, do not announce it with trumpets, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and on the streets, to be honored by others. Truly I tell you, they have received their reward in full. 3 But when you give to the needy, do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing, 4 so that your giving may be in secret. Then your Father, who sees what is done in secret, will reward you."

Forum member Ocelot explains further…

> All telescopic philanthropy is virtue signalling: no exceptions. They could have adopted 8 American orphans of any ethnicity of their choosing, and used the resources saved on other charitable ventures.
>
> There's a reason they chose not to dedicate their resources to helping those closer to home. There's also a reason they chose not to adopt some passably-white-looking kids orphaned by Islamic militants killing their parents in the middle-East.
>
> It was important that the children both resembled them as little as possible, and > were from an area firmly associated in most people's minds with crushing poverty. Because the act is about them, not about the children. Hell, if you care about the kids so much, why not use your resources to pay someone in their own country to adopt and raise them instead of transplanting them into a foreign land.

>
> It's also a possibility that the intention is to groom these kids to be sent back to their home country as evangelists of whatever fake-ass McChurchian sect they belong to.

As the West continues to collapse, we may see no limit to how white Americans race to have themselves replaced by foreigners. It's almost as if they longer want to exist.

Read Next: 6 Signs That A Man Is A Cuckold

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

10 Things To Do On Sundays That Are Better Than Watching The NFL

October 15, 2017 | by Ron Briggs | Link | Original Link

Watching football on Sundays used to be something that I really enjoyed growing up but like most things in life that has changed. The NFL today offers me very little with the exception of it making for a great precursor to a nap. With commercials every five minutes, now paired with an inordinate amount of replay reviews, the game has had no flow for many years.

The average NFL game only has about 11 minutes of live game footage. If you were to actually sit awake through an entire NFL broadcast (hard to imagine but try your best) you would spend approximately:

- 67 minutes watching players stand around
- 63 minutes watching commercials
- 35 minutes watching shots of coaches, fans or cheerleaders in-between play
- 15 minutes watching excessive replays
- only 11 minutes watching live game action

Less than 6% of your time spent sitting through a full NFL broadcast will involve the viewing of actual, live football. The vast majority of your time will be spent watching non-football related material like commercials and people standing around.

Penalties and rules are another issue ruining the league over the past decade. The NFL has made it extremely difficult for defensive players to actually do their jobs. Defenders now regularly get penalized and sometimes even fined for hard, clean hits on quarterbacks, wide receivers, and running backs. This can be frustrating to watch especially if you're old enough to remember the NFL before it implemented these new regulations.

Every week you'll see a roughing the passer call for merely patting the quarterback on the helmet, an unnecessary roughness penalty on a clean hit that makes you shake your head or a defenseless receiver penalty that was clearly unavoidable. I'm all for player safety but when you sign up to play football you know the risks involved.

Another annoyance plaguing the league is the fact that players now celebrate nearly every play that they make. It's now an anomaly when a play is made with no celebration afterwards. Our culture celebrates silliness and professional football is no different. Everyone is starving for attention so whether it's an offensive or defensive player, it makes no difference, even routine plays are now celebrated with foolish enthusiasm.

For a good example of how the game was played in the past watch the video below. In this clip you will see consecutive goal line stops made by a defense playing in a big game. There will be minimal or no celebrating until the final 4th down stop. This type of business-like attitude is rarely seen in the league today.

The NFL has been degrading for more than a decade and there looks to be no reversing this decline. Now with politics cementing it's way into the league, football on Sundays is something that I can do without. The following is a list of simple ideas for things to do on Sundays besides sitting in front of a television and watching football:

1. Prepare Your Weekly Meals

Free up some time in your upcoming work week and save yourself money in the process by cooking and prepping your weekly meals on Sunday. Not only is this a nice way to save time and money but it can be a great way to insure that you eat healthier throughout the week.

2. Lift Weights

Instead of watching men exercise on TV, go and do some exercise yourself. Weekends are a great time to get some training in especially if you're excessively busy during the course of the week. Gyms also tend to be relatively empty on Sunday afternoons, which is a bonus.

3. Run, Walk, Hike or Bike

The fall is a beautiful time of the year to spend outside. Hiking, biking, going for a run or even walking are all great fall activities. Get out of the house, enjoy the scenery and get some exercise outdoors.

4. Practice A New Skill Or Work A Side Hustle

Spend your free time learning to do something new. Practicing a new skill can be extremely rewarding, whether it’s a foreign language, a martial art, carpentry, or cooking. Get started on a project that you’ve been putting off. Most of us have some idea we’ve been procrastinating on, get it started on your next Sunday.

5. Read

Stimulate your mind instead of vegging out in front of the television. Catch up on interesting articles you may have missed throughout the week. Open up a book and learn something new.

6. Practice Game

For some reason I notice an above average number of cute girls out on fall Sundays. It may just be the ratios being skewed by the many men being at home watching football. Go do some shopping at your local grocery store and work your day game.

7. Get Together With a Friend

With most people off from work, Sundays are a great day to hang out with an old friend. I try to schedule Sunday meet ups a few times a month. Catching up, enjoying good conversation, and exchanging ideas is infinitely better than sitting in front of a TV.

8. Go On A Date

I find myself doing productive work on weekday nights and I would rather not spend a Friday or Saturday evening out on a date. That leaves Sunday as a great time for scheduling dates, especially first dates.

9. Relax Or Spend Some Time In Thought

Do something you enjoy. Drink some tea, smoke a cigar, enjoy a nice meal or take a nap. These activities are not only relaxing but they make for great physical and mental restoration in preparation for your upcoming week. Take it easy and slow life down a little. Review things or plan your upcoming week. Take a look at your goals and your process for achieving those goals to make sure that they're still in alignment.

10. Enjoy A Family Meal

Get your parents, wife, or kids together for a nice family meal. Enjoy the conversation and ask them how their week went.

The NFL has been degrading for over a decade with all the wasted time on commercials, an excessive amount of questionable rules, immature players and unrestrained political involvement. It is certainly not an activity purposeful men should spend any considerable amount of time on. Do yourself a favor and go do something more productive with your Sundays.

Read More: NFL Suffers Ratings Drop After Pandering To The SJW Narrative

Ron Briggs
Ron Briggs enjoys the process of developing his character, mind and body.

12 Years A Hottie

October 16, 2017 | by Frank Cervi | Link | Original Link

We are all slaves to reality, and at the end of the day, women are slaves to their own unique biological reality. When feminists blame the 'patriarchy,' what they are actually blaming is an observable reality. In reality, 'patriarchy' does not exist. It is a boogieman. What feminists are actually frustrated with is the fact that Mother Nature has internalized misogyny. It is Mother Nature that forces women to be 12 years a hottie. Men do not have a sell-by date, but women do.

Women, have a 12-year window (give or take) in order to capitalize on their attractiveness to get the man they wish to hitch themselves too. Before third-wave feminism, women were able to do this as there was a bounty of available, successful men to choose from. The system had allowed men to work, thrive in their careers, produce without being taxed to high heaven, and have access to jobs—as opposed to the current gynocentric society which does not support men and discourages men from attending colleges that have turned into feminist cesspools. With all of this, we see a culture with a declining birth rate and fertility, along with stagnant economies and a growing welfare state.

Women's hypergamous nature today is allowed to run unrestrained. Even though institutions like marriage still exist, the contract has changed and it no longer restricts hypergamous tendencies nor controls them anymore. Marriage and family are no longer stable since there are no consequences for women—just No-Fault divorce. All the responsibilities are now placed on the man, and all benefits go towards the woman. Men are left holding the bag, when (not if) the ship sinks.

Women Win the Lottery at Around Age Eighteen

A front loaded life with the clock ticking down.

Women today, everywhere, squander their 12 years of being a hottie. When they hit The Wall by around age 30, they are left scrambling and trying to figure out, “Why are there no ‘good men?’”. ‘Good men’ is girl-code for money or men with money—their Christian Greys, their Chads. There are no ‘good men’ anymore because feminism has turned our society gynocentric, and when that happens men no longer have the means or incentives to become Christian Greys. Women have essentially shot themselves in not one, but both feet.

The women of today, once they are ready to ‘settle down’ at age 35+ (well-passed peak attractiveness) have nothing to offer high-status men. After riding the cock-carousel for the past 12-years, and having miles of dick in them, why would a high-status man invest in your ass at full value? A modern, Aging American Party-gurl at 30+, going up to a high-value man, trying to get him to commit, is like a car dealer trying to sell you a 1986 Chrysler LeBaron that has been rode hard for years, thousands of miles on the odometer, no tread on the tires, and telling you that it is brand new!

The problem for men is that there are no good women left since feminism has created a sea of entitled, worthless, bitter women that no man needs to take a risk on. And there are loads of manginas who enable these women, by going on social media and worshiping them with ‘likes’ and, “Oh gurl you’re so hot” even if the chick is a 5 or a landwhale. If you do this, you are part of the problem—propping up the egos of women who don’t deserve it.

Making You Addicted To Her

Women don’t care about their vagina, they only care about what it can get them.

The issue that a lot of women face, when they get older, is that the game that they play starts to get a lot harder. Women operate on the modus of trying to get the man addicted to her pussy. And the way that they try to get you addicted is to throw it at you, early and often. Once they get you to “fall in love” with them, it’s over. They “got you”. They’ll throw sex at you, kiss you, give blowjobs, and hand jibbers all day/all night, until you surrender your cock and balls by putting a ring on her finger.

The problem with this is that it only works (for the most part) on young guys who haven’t formed too many bonds, yet. Essentially, if a woman finds a dude who is a virgin or hasn’t had many relationships, he will bond well to her. Now, doing this with older men (more experienced) who have banged their fair share of snatch, doesn’t hold as well. What is the woman offering? Mostly her pussy, nothing new.

The Value of Modern Pussy

Understand that most women today are for day-trading. Not for going Long on.

Today, women have eroded their stock down to just their vagina. No verifiable virtue, morals, responsibility, restraint, charm, softness, rarely beautiful (dyke-cuts, landwhales, tattoos, clown hair). What do they demand from men? To pound the BUY button. Offering men full-on risk in exchange for everything they have (their time, commitment, money, freedom) is not a fair trade.

Men will pump and dump. That is easy to do today, as the price of pussy continues to be at all-time lows (if you avoid marriage). So long as women are on Tinder and other social media, trading their sex for Facebook 'likes', dollar beers, concert tickets, Netflix and Chill sessions, and Gina Tingles, men will be there to provide the pipe—but not the paper. By the time they find that "deal", their end has already been tarnished by miles of dick and bukkake pile-drivers.

In the foreseeable future we will continue to see economic decline, waning birth rates, rising divorce, men in poverty, increase in single moms, violent crime, married/single or middle-aged female teachers sleeping their students or teens, increase in suicides. This all will continue if our culture does not acknowledge human sexual dimorphism and the fact that men and women are different (not equal from a biological standpoint).

Read More: Lindsay Lohan Becomes A "Chaste" Muslim Woman After Spending Years On The Hollywood Cock Carousel

Frank Cervi
Frank is a retro soul finding his way through modernity. An ex-idealist turned author, who travels often to Las Vegas and Florida or to exotic places where the beer flows like wine and where the women sway like the palm trees. You can find his other writing and books at Frankcervi.com.

The Steady Rise Of Homosexual Messages In Children’s And Adult Entertainment

October 16, 2017 | by Ryan Ashville | Link | Original Link

On February 27, 2017, Disney’s XD channel made headlines for its first gay kiss in an episode of the children’s cartoon Star vs. the Forces of Evil. The Disney XD show saw main character Star and her friend Marco attend a concert where they were surrounded by kissing couples, including two men, and later in the episode, two women. A closer look at the history of Disney (or any top animation or kids shows brand) shows that the company has been sporting a gay agenda for over two decades.

Consider the BBC film adaptation of The Boy In The Dress, a children’s book written by David Walliams, a television comedian best known for the show Little Britain. It tells the story of a twelve-year-old boy who enjoys cross-dressing. It is aimed at readers aged eight to twelve, intended to teach children that cross-dressing is a healthy and acceptable hobby and not something to be ashamed of.

Yet another show on CN that shoves homsexuality into your child's mind is "Clarence"

Some people, especially the internet's fujioshi community (explained later), think that homosexuality is cute and many comedians should base their jokes on this distortion of nature, but it's now heavily promoted by the media and entertainment industries. The target of these Marxist homosexual propaganda broadcasts are not teenagers or adults but the small children whose minds are still very receptive to external inputs and suggestions.

The use of subliminal messages

A subliminal message is a signal or message designed to pass below the normal limits of perception. For example, it might be inaudible to the conscious mind (but audible to the unconscious or deeper mind) or might be an image transmitted briefly and unperceived consciously and yet perceived unconsciously. It has often been suggested that subliminal techniques are used in advertising and for propaganda purposes (e.g. party political broadcasts).

A form of subliminal messaging commonly believed to exist involves the insertion of "hidden" messages into movies and TV programs. In the concept of "moving pictures," the popular theory of subliminal messages usually suggests that subliminal commands can be inserted into a moving picture at the rate of perhaps 1 frame in 25 (or roughly 1 frame per second). The hidden command in a single frame will flash across the screen so quickly that it is not consciously perceived, but the command will supposedly appeal to the subconscious mind of the viewer.

In the Pixar movie Monsters Inc. there's scene where this drawing of people having intercourse pops up for a brief moment.

Early homosexual subtext

Harry Benshoff and Sean Griffin write that animation has always "hint[ed] at the performative nature of gender and homosexuality, such as when Bugs Bunny puts on a wig and a dress, and acts effeminately".

The first form of homosexuality depicted in film was in 1895 between two men dancing together in the motion picture The Dickson Experimental Sound Film. Film critic Parker Tyler stated that the scene “shocked audiences with its subversion of conventional male behavior,” but common men eventually brushed it aside.

During the late nineteenth century and into the 1920s–30s, homosexuality was largely depicted in gender-based conventions and stereotypes. Oftentimes male characters intended to be identified as gay were flamboyant, effeminate, and degenerate characters in film.

The terms “pansy” and “sissy” became tagged to homosexuality and was described as “a flowery, fussy, effeminate soul given to limp wrists and mincing steps.” Because of his high-pitched voice and attitude, the pansy easily transitioned from the silent film era into the talking pictures where those characteristics could be taken advantage of.

Charlie Chaplin’s A Woman (1915), in which Chaplin cross dresses and plays with the affection of various men. Famous series of drag queens included Miss Fatty (1915), featuring Fatty Arbuckle, and Sweedie (1914–16), created a comedic view of drag that many in the late 1910s and early 1920s could find entertaining.

Wonder Bar (1934) Features a brief, but explicit homosexual reference that most of the straight audience would definitely dismiss

Aftermath of the Stonewall riots

Introduced in 1963, Northstar was the first openly gay superhero in the Marvel Comics universe, back when these comics were still being marketed to young boys and parents had no concern over what comic their child reads. He married his husband, Kyle Jinadu, in Astonishing X-Men #51 (June 2012), which was the first depiction of a same-sex wedding in mainstream comics.

Following the 1969 Stonewall riots in New York City (a major turning point in the LGBT-rights movement), Hollywood began to look at gay people as a possible consumer demographic. It was now time for mainstream media to come out of the closet and feature homosexuality more explicitly. Through the work of an increasingly visible LGBT movement and overall attitudes in America about human sexuality, sex gender roles changed and a huge destruction of masculinity occurred as a result of the LGBT and feminist movements.

The Disney film The Rescuers featured a naked woman in the background, but since the scene was moving too fast, you'll get to see it when you pause it at the right moment. Note that this movie is intended for kids. Not related to homosexuals but you can see the Marxists' intent to sexualize children.

Up to recently, many children's cartoons used subliminal messaging of same-sex relationships, because conservative parents would protest if the messages were direct, but we've now entered a period where companies like Disney feel comfortable inserting explicit messages without fear of retribution. This didn't happen overnight: starting in 1895 with The Dickson Experimental Sound Film, those in media have been taking one calculated step at a time for their ultimate goal in sexualizing children with homosexual propaganda.

Read Next: Homosexuality Acceptance Is Leading To The Normalization Of Pedophilia

Ryan Ashville
I'm a heterosexual anti-feminist and a conservative male. A frequent news watcher and I dedicate my findings to various MRA sites and anti-feminist authors. I enjoy swimming, hiking, observing mainstream entertainment and masculine literature.

Why Did Rose McGowan Attack Harvey Weinstein For Sexual Harassment But Defend A Pedophile Director?

October 16, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Yeah, I still don't really understand the whole story or history there, and I'd rather not, because it's not really my business. But he's an incredibly sweet and gentle man, lovely to his crew, and a very hard worker.
>
> — Rose McGowan defending child rapist and pornographer Victor Salva in The Advocate

With some people already alleging that Hollywood is hiding a major pedophile ring, Rose McGowan's double standards about sexual abuse and rape have been uncovered. Even just bad game by an adult male towards an adult female is career-ending, whereas pedophilia is "not really my business." The mentally unstable McGowan not only chose to work with but actively defended one Victor Salva. She was directed by Salva in Rosewood Lane, knowing full well that he had been in prison for child rape and pornography.

The release of Rosewood Lane came 14 years after the supposedly "brave" ex-Charmed actress took a $100,000 settlement from Harvey Weinstein over allegations of sexual misconduct (and now rape). When reminded in an interview about the film that "Salva is a convicted and registered sex offender," McGowan called him "incredibly sweet and gentle."

This hypocrisy has not stopped the post-wall leader of "Rose's Army" from trying to renew her celebrity profile in a way that her subpar acting skills could not. She is throwing all her energy into resurrecting herself as a feminist icon. The attention she is being lauded with contrasts badly with the celebrity world's relative neglect of former child actors Corey Feldman and Elijah Wood, who have both directly alleged sexual misconduct, even rape, towards children working in Hollywood.

So much for these people taking a stand against sexual harassment and abuse! Men like Matt Damon and Russell Crowe are being taken to task for undocumented accusations that they protected Harvey Weinstein's reputation, but a verified defense of a pedophile has been brushed aside as irrelevant.

Is spitting bad game in Hollywood now worse than pedophilia?

Bad game is career-ending.

In some ways, the answer to this question is a clear "yes." An example from this year demonstrates this sad reality. Despite his Academy Award win, actor Casey Affleck, accused (not convicted!) of "sexual harassment," has rarely been defended publicly, all while a child rapist like Roman Polanski is never seriously challenged by A-listers. At worst, Affleck has probably engaged in bad game, yet that will not stop him from being shunned by many more people in the coming years. Polanski, on the other hand, will be widely feted by the Hollywood elite when he dies soon.

The pederast director Victor Salva may not have been as powerful as Harvey Weinstein in 2011 when Rosewood Lane was released, but the bare murmors accompanying his time so far in Tinseltown is a testament to how unimportant the presence of pedophiles is in acting circles. Production companies are unlikely to be hounded by professional feminists and actresses (who are often the same people) for collaborating with someone like Salva. Moreover, an actress cannot get a six-figure payout from a wealthy producer for an allegation of pedophilia, unless she acted in films or television as a child. As a result, far less of an uproar results from people working with a Salva or Roman Polanski.

Tragically, it gets worse. Though they later deleted the articles, editors at Salon, which is a continual ally of liberal Hollywood, gladly published pieces trying to "humanize" pedophilia and its twisted practitioners, including the psychologically repulsive Todd Nickerson. In comparison, Return Of Kings has never observed Fox News or The National Review, two conservative outlets incessantly attacked by leftwing film stars, promoting pedophilia.

Always look at what celebrities excuse or ignore versus what they condemn

I dare say that Angelina Jolie wouldn't be doing this if it didn't help her career and fame.

As ROK proprietor Roosh commented to me about Rose McGowan recently, "Her attacks [on Weinstein and others] are meant to further her interests, nothing more." More generally, it always makes sense to trace how a celebrity's chosen advocacy, most notably feminism, might give them a future cash cow against a demonized man or, in the case of an aging woman like Rose McGowan, find a new career or profile after a major post-wall decline.

At the same time, very worthy causes, such as stopping the actual sexual exploitation of children in Western acting circles after serious allegations of abuse (or proven crimes like Salva's), will almost always be taken up with far less enthusiasm.

And people wonder why others call Hollywood sick.

Read More: Liberal Hollywood Had Decades To Expose Harvey Weinstein's Sexual Predation But Did Nothing

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Make Money Online

October 16, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I finally did a new podcast. After sharing my personal background of making money online, I give a broad overview of how you can do it as well by sharing the revenue-generating methods of display advertising, affiliate marketing, and selling your own products. I also talk about the importance of finding a good niche.

Listen on Soundcloud or download the MP3:

Listen on Youtube:

Subscribe on iTunes or add the RSS feed to your favorite podcast app. If you like the podcast, please leave a rating and review on iTunes.

Previous Podcast: The Girls Of Brazil

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Women Demand Legal Protection Against Men For Willingly Sharing Their Own Nude Photos

October 17, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Personal responsibility. There's a phrase you do not hear much anymore, especially related to women and most especially related to women who take nude photos of themselves that somehow end up online.

Though crimes are inexcusable, we should all make efforts to protect ourselves from people who can (and will) take advantage of us. Just as we would all label a girl a fool for giving out her credit card details online or via SMS, a girl is usually a fool for disseminating highly explicit nude photos of herself. Whether the dissemination by another person is legal or not, individuals need to accept that there are risks to their actions.

Not that common sense like this seems to matter much nowadays. Though I only partially keep abreast of the news back home while I'm in Europe, a recent scandal involving an Australian sportsman and naked photos of a teenage girl caught my attention. The Australian rules footballer, unidentified as of now, was part of the Grand Final-winning Richmond Tigers. This is obvious if you see the 2017 championship medal being worn by the following topless female:

…or the photo of her prancing around with almost no clothes on in front of a Richmond Tigers sign:

The girl has apparently gone to Victoria Police, which serves the city of Melbourne, over claims that the Richmond footballer spread her nude photos until they ended up online. If she wishes to bring in the authorities, that is her right. Yet this doesn't change the fact that the girl was reckless. The player responsible could be charged and held criminally responsible. Regardless, it should not prevent us from pointing out, "The nudes would not have gotten online if you had taken normal precautions."

Eerily enough, at least one of these nude photos was taken in a public space. With these kinds of antics by her, it becomes all the more hard not to regard this woman as a total buffoon. Just as she knew she could be spotted in public as she undressed herself on the street and agreed to have a saucy photo taken, she should have known what can happen when someone consensually obtains your nudes, i.e. they fan out across the digital landscape.

“I left the door to my house unlocked and a thief stole things! I’m a victim!”

Burglary is a serious crime, but we still lock our doors to keep intruders out.

You can be the victim of a crime or moral transgression and still have stupidly placed yourself at risk of harm or humiliation. Like the homeowner who leaves their front door unlocked, the girl sending out her nudes or allowing herself to be photographed nude by someone else is always playing with fire.

We can never fully eliminate risk in our lives nor should we try to, given the amount of time it would take each and every day. Notwithstanding this, there is a definite pro tip for staying out of nude photo scandals of the national media or mere college dorm varieties–don’t take nude photos.

It is unfortunate that this teenage girl lives in an age where females are taught that they have virtually no control over eventual consequences. Perhaps she would have taken the nude photos anyway, but I’m betting that the “women are never responsible” mantra drummed into her from preschool or kindergarten exerted a big influence.

The Fappening taught us this years ago

Kate Upton was one of the celebrities caught up in the Fappening.

iCloud and nude photos of female celebrities, what could possibly go wrong? Well, the Fappening, which featured the release of many hundreds, if not thousands of intimate photos of female actresses, singers, and others. Smaller photo scandals have hit Hollywood in particular since, but you can wager that nothing has really been learned by either the people we see on TV all the time or regular women. Better to play a victim than to take self-preserving steps to avoid embarrassment, like keeping nudes off cloud computing or just not taking them at all.

Ironically, Australian rules football players have been the victims of so-called revenge porn as well. Two well-known athletes were "catfished" last year all without making the "poor me" front pages of local newspapers (they seem to have accepted they made a gamble). A less recent story, where jilted teenage girl Kim Duthie falsely said she was pregnant by one player and posted nude photos of multiple men online, read like a manual for female hamstering and having an allergy to personal responsibility.

In your own country, I am sure you can think of male sportsmen or other famous figures who tacitly understand the risks of sharing their nude photos, whereas women who carelessly give out their nudes immediately begin erecting temples for their own victimhood. Whilst I support the sharing of private nudes being illegal, there's no chance of foul play if nudes aren't ever created!

Girls will keep their credit cards tucked away in their purses and their bank statements in a locked home to ward off fraudsters, but will snap away incessantly at their titties, asses, and pussies. Go figure.

Read More: Female Danish Athletes Diminish Their Own Championship Victory By Taking Nude Photos

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 Concepts SJW's Invented To Shame White People

October 17, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

For decades, leftists made great efforts creating intellectual-sounding rationalizations for cultural Marxist ideology. Lately it's gone on freakish tangents that not even the Frankfurt School could've anticipated. If they'd made as much effort solving social problems (rather than worsening them), the world would be a better place. However, fixing things was never the goal.

Social Justice Warriors and other True Believers have developed an elaborate vocabulary to frame their arguments. By understanding what they really mean, we can expose their absurdly faulty logic.

1. Person of Color (PoC)

Not exactly this guy, but hey…

This means anyone not of European heritage; the more hip term for non-white. PoCs are assumed to be denied privilege; even if one compares a white busboy to an Asian billionaire. The term enhances the self-awareness of their racial heritage, something that Whites are discouraged from developing. For comparison, the difference between a “man of religion” and a “religious man” is the difference between a minister and someone who simply believes in God.

The rhetorical trick: Under normal circumstances, each race pursues its own interests, within its own territory. Very different groups with separate agendas lumped together as People of Color encourages mutual solidarity against Whites. Naturally, whites are strongly discouraged from having any solidarity, reinforced through guilt trips induced by the usual suspects.

Worse, multiculturalism pushes several disparate groups into the same territories, creating volatility. Furthermore, all PoCs are expected to follow everything the leftists tell them. Dissenters can be accused of disloyalty to their heritage.

Translation: Colored person.

2. Prejudice plus power

Nothing to see here.

This is the new definition of “racism”, the most potent devil-word in the SJW vocabulary. I first saw it on a website for Leon Trotsky fans, but it’s been making the rounds. Naturally, this means only whites fit this “prejudice plus power” redefinition, because supposedly whites have privilege and PoCs don’t.

Thus, Jared Taylor is “racist”, despite being Mr. Reasonable. Meanwhile, Colin Ferguson—who murdered six passengers on a commuter train in Long Island for racially motivated reasons—was merely having a bad day. William Kunstler and Ron Kuby—his pro bono attorneys—invoked the “Black Rage” defense, but you won’t find too many leftists calling it a “hate crime” for obvious reasons.

The rhetorical trick: It’s the old fallacy of special pleading, resting entirely upon the “privilege” argument. Further, “prejudice” is greatly expanded over the traditional definition of preconceived judgment, and evidence (like what Jared Taylor frequently discusses) is no defense.

Translation: Only whites are “racist”; everyone else can do no wrong.

3. Privilege

On top of the world, right?

This is a big grab-bag of advantages that an individual might have, supposedly unearned and at the unfair expense of others based on some group identity. Aside from race, the argument goes that men are privileged and women are not, straights are privileged but GLBTs are not, beginning a very long list. This is the basis of the SJW "victimization Olympics" hierarchy, the sole determinant among them of who is right or wrong.

Further, society must give special handouts (which is real privilege) to compensate. I'm considered privileged, although neither my race nor my sex gets me scholarships, Affirmative Action hiring advantages, set-asides in awarding government contracts, etc. Okie dokie…

The rhetorical trick: All this rests upon the leftist notion of hyper-equality; everyone is exactly the same—or should be. Unequal outcomes result from malice, rather than actual differences, life choices, or behaviors. No evidence need be given.

Leftists have a saying, "Privilege is invisible to the privileged." So it's as intangible as spectral evidence at the Salem Witch Trials. For those considered under-privileged, it causes resentment (as intended), but also defeatism and disempowerment. Finally, that's silly. Luciano Pavarotti can sing better than I can—does this mean he stole part of my talent?

Granted, growing up in a good neighborhood—an example of privilege—is advantageous over growing up in a rough one. However, the character of a neighborhood actually depends on who lives there. Furthermore, urban problems became considerably worse because of leftist social engineering. Still, they've always blamed amorphous social forces, lately calling it privilege. It's a circular argument.

Translation: You don't deserve the things you have, and you owe everyone else.

4. Problematic

This is the catch-all term for anything even vaguely politically incorrect. There are no clear standards; in the Current Year, one can get in hot water for something that once was innocuous or even regarded positively. (For instance, saying “I don’t see race” is problematic because it denies a PoC’s essential identity.) Something “problematic” isn’t always outright thoughtcrime, though they want it either discussed their way or not at all.

The rhetorical trick: This is a way to derail discussion, because reasons. Note well, problematic doesn’t mean factually wrong.

Translation: You can’t say that!

Triggered

Traditionally, “triggering” means a PTSD sufferer reliving a traumatic event (a combat veteran hears firecrackers) or a recovering addict experiencing a stimulus causing temptation (a former cokehead sees a pile of laundry detergent). The expanded definition applies to SJWs becoming enraged upon experiencing thoughtcrime. Unfortunately, since too many millennials have been coddled, they’ll freak out when hearing opinions contrary to their world view.

Although they’re pampered snowflakes, SJWs never have any consideration for the feelings of others. They haven’t the least concern for how much their irrationality, sophomoric rhetoric, blatant rudeness, imperviousness to reason, and insufferable smugness profoundly irritate everyone else.

The rhetorical trick: The basic idea is that your contradictory opinion is causing such psychic pain that you’re a big bully for disagreeing. Lighting a firecracker behind a traumatized combat veteran’s back indeed would be a dick move, likely resulting in a beating. However, developing a thick enough skin to handle differences of opinion is part of becoming an adult.

Translation: I'm butthurt.

Conclusion

(Time for a break!)

Unfortunately, SJWs actually believe all that baloney. They're enemies of everything decent and normal, and the society that gave them their comfortable lives. Fortunately, their ideology rests on a flimsy house of cards, and now you know how to knock it over.

Read More: 7 Recommended Products For Your Butthurt Liberal Friends

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

The Hunt For A Moral Woman

October 17, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A lot of men I talk to think the best way to find a good girl is to visit a small town or village. The girls will be more pristine, they figure, and they're generally right about that, but there's just one big problem: those girls have not been tempted enough for us to know what their true character is.

There are two kinds of "good" in a girl. The first is situational, where she appears good only because the devil has yet to tempt her. The second is tested, where he made his offering but she resisted. When a man identifies a girl who has upstanding character or morals, what he actually found is a girl who has yet to be tossed into a world of sex, drugs, money, or attention (fame). Once that temptation occurs, or she is removed from a bubble that has kept her good, it's nearly certain that she will dive head-first into the ocean of human depravity.

In Eastern Europe, I noticed that a girl is most kind and sweet in the six-month period starting with her freshman college year after moving from the village to the city. She's also the easiest to get into bed. Her sexuality and raging hormones have been bottled up in the village, watched carefully by her family, but now that she's in the city, she can finally do what she wanted to do all along. It wasn't that she was a good girl in her village, but that she lacked the opportunity. As much as I would like to think I'm a casanova for sleeping with such a girl, the reality is that I was her gateway into a promiscuous lifestyle, soon to be forgotten after her 20th or so sexual encounter.

If I go to a village today, and meet a 22-year-old girl who didn't have the chance to attend college and who has a notch count of less than five, is that confirmation of her goodness? It's not, because she has yet to be put in a sinful environment. I think we already know what she would do if she had the opportunity to move to a cosmopolitan city like New York, London, or Toronto.

The saying “all women are like that” implies that if you tempt a woman with a city lifestyle where she can have anonymous casual sex with men who turn her on, she will do it. Some may just experiment, a notch here or there, but a girl won’t say no unless she happens to be part of a tight-knit community that constantly watches her. The number of women who are capable of resisting are in fact so few that they are statistically insignificant. We should therefore assume that no woman can pass the test of temptation, and perhaps no man as well.

Every single female you meet has succumbed or will succumb to temptation, and it may be unfair to expect anything otherwise. This is why, as women have degraded sharply in the past century, the only way to keep men interested in marriage is through sustained cultural programming that makes them accept obesity (as beauty), vulgarity (as strength), promiscuity (as experience), bisexuality (as sexy), and equality (as just). Constant offerings of temptation are causing female value to plummet to such an extent that men have to be literally brainwashed to believe that women are still beautiful princesses who must be cherished and beholden to.

Upon realizing that no woman can truly resist temptation when tested, we encounter a simple solution: don’t test them with temptation. Create a better society with built-in safe spaces where the sweet and kind teenage girl stays locked into situational goodness thanks to male efforts shielding her from the temptation she has no innate immunity against. If Eve could not resist from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, today’s modern woman cannot resist even the smallest bread crumb.

The challenge for men wanting to create a family is therefore not trying to find a good girl who can resist temptation but one who, through good parenting or sheer luck, has not yet been excessively tempted, and keep her there by building a firewall which prevents the devil from knocking on her door when you momentarily step away. The only way I can see this reasonably happening today is to find a girl who has economically poor parents that are religious and where she eagerly accepted their religious teachings. You will maintain her faith and give her a slightly upgraded standard of living that is valuable to her and her parents but not so valuable that you tempt her with status and riches. Go to the village to find the good girl, but you'll have to keep her there, or you'll find out for sure that she has no innate goodness like you may have thought.

Understand that the problem of goodness is not exclusive to women. When I had the opportunity to experience carnal and worldly pleasures, I took it… for over a decade. The fact that I realized it was a dead-end does not make me a moral man, and the only credit I can accept is eventually understanding what hedonism really stands for. I'm not impressed by men who preach to me their moral goodness because it's almost certain they haven't been tempted around the world by beautiful women, but if they have indeed rejected Brazilian, Colombian, Ukrainian, Polish, and Croatian women who wanted to sleep with them, something that I found impossible to do, I will personally commission golden crowns of morality for them to wear.

There's no need to despair upon realizing the flawed nature of women, because it's really the flaw of humans. When presented with options of excitement, sex, and sin, we almost always take the low road. Instead of asking women to possess moral strength that they simply don't have, we should simply identify women who haven't yet been tempted or who have made tiny mistakes when tempted strongly. If a woman moved to a big city, refrained from drinking, and maintained a religious social circle, it may be prudent to accept her if she made one or two mistakes.

There aren't many girls out there like that, but if you find and marry her, do your part in helping create a home, a neighborhood, a society where temptation is moved to the background of life like it was in the past, instead of being thrown directly in our faces like it is today.

This article was originally published On Roosh V.

Read Next: Stop Worshipping Women On The Internet

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Disqus Is Shutting Down ROK Comments Effective Friday

October 17, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On Monday evening, I received an email from  stating that they are suspending all Disqus services to Return Of Kings starting on October 20, 2017. Here is the full email:

> Hi there,
>
> We wanted to reach out to inform you that your site has been found to be in conflict with the terms of use of Disqus. Because of this, Disqus is unable to offer your site continued discussion services past the end of this week.
>
> Site activity or content that can result in the termination of discussion services include:
>
> – Featuring copyrighted material, which results in DMCA takedown requests.
> – Adult-oriented sites containing illegal content which result in abuse complaints, users with inappropriate avatars or behavior visiting other Disqus sites in an unwelcome way, or are otherwise misusing Disqus services.
> – Using Disqus on pages that contain hate speech, which violates Disqus' Terms of Service and results in abuse complaints.
>
> Additional information on these Basic Rules may be found here: https://help.disqus.com/customer/en/portal/articles/1943775-basic-rules-for-disqus-powered-sites

> Please be advised that discussion services for the shortname “returnofkings” will be terminated on October 20th, 2017 for one or more of the above reasons.
>
> To help your site prepare for this change, we recommend the following:
>
> Export your comments
> Comment exporting is available in the Admin Panel at https://returnofkings.disqus.com/admin/discussions/export/) and will be available until 30 days after termination. More information on exporting is available here: https://help.disqus.com/customer/portal/articles/472149
> If you have any issues exporting your comments, please let us know by replying to this email.
>
> Sync your comments
> If you use WordPress, make sure all Disqus comments are synced back to the native comment platform within WordPress. More information is available here: https://help.disqus.com/customer/portal/articles/663782
>
> Migrate to a new commenting system
> Disqus will no longer load on your site after October 20th, 2017. To ensure uninterrupted discussion, we recommend selecting and installing an alternate commenting system prior to the end of the week.
>
> We hope this helps you prepare your site and community for this change. If you have any questions, please let us know by replying to this email.
>
> Thank you for your time and attention,
>
> The Disqus TOS Team

I replied asking what specific terms were violated but have not yet received a response.

I'm guessing we were terminated because of their vague "hate speech" clause, which really means "speech our liberal employees disagree with." Whatever the real reason, my priority is installing a new commenting platform. Within a day or two, I'll roll out the first alternative, which will have far less frills than Disqus. Feel free to suggest alternatives in the comments.

San Francisco-based Disqus joins Shopify, Paypal, and numerous ad networks that have terminated their relationship with ROK because of the views it contains. While I'm not surprised that Disqus shut us down, I'm beginning to wonder how Silicon Valley expects to survive if they are so hellbent on censoring anyone who shares a politically incorrect opinion.

The Silicon Valley lawnmower

If you're a dissident who doesn't ever want to vote for someone like Hillary Clinton or raise your wife's African sons, it may be best not to establish a business relationship with a Silicon Valley company in the first place.

Don't Miss: Night Of The Digital Knives: Silicon Valley Launches Biggest Internet Censorship Purge In History

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Tinder's "Menprovement" Marketing Campaign Reveals Their Utter Disdain For Male Customers

October 18, 2017 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Social justice is like a termite infestation, ripping its way through the body politic and leaving nothing but sawdust in its wake. The latest victim is Tinder, the quasi-useful phone app for finding loose women to have one-night stands with. As part of the rollout of Tinder Reactions, a new feature that allows users to call out people who act in "annoying" or "harassing" ways, Tinder posted an ad called "The Menprovement Initiative" that attacked "douchebags" using their platform.

The absurdity of this video should be self-evident—Tinder was so terrified of the counter-reaction that they shut down comments and likes/dislikes on their YouTube channel—but let's go through it anyway.

Beyond the ridiculous of having a snarling spinster-cum-tranny like Whitney Cummings posing as a "relationship expert," the "harassing" male behavior that the ad attacks consists of men being self-employed, working out, and doing things to better themselves. Basically, if you're a man who does anything at all, Tinder hates you.

Moreover, contrary to what the Strong, Independent Women™ in the video claim, it is girls, not men, who are behaving badly on Tinder. While once a useful method of finding girls to hook up with, Tinder has become flooded with flakes, fatties, scammers, and other detritus of the female species. Outside of Eastern European countries, Tinder has become worthless to the average man, and this new ad is all the more reason why they should abandon it.

Tinder Is A Fraud

When Tinder was initially launched in 2012, it was an effective means of finding slutty girls for casual sex. While hookup apps have been popular among homosexuals for years, Tinder was able to succeed where previous heterosexual apps had failed by marketing itself as a social networking application instead of a means to find easy sex. This allowed women to use the app without feeling like whores, because they could rationalize themselves as only using it to meet people.

Since then, however, Tinder has steadily declined in quality due to both greater social trends and poor decisions on the part of the app's designers. Most notably, the introduction of Tinder Plus and Tinder Boost several years ago stripped the app of much of its usefulness. While no one can begrudge Tinder for wanting to make money, both Plus and Boost essentially throttled the accounts of most male users, making it more difficult to find women without spending good amounts of money. I strongly suspect that even paid male users are having their accounts throttled, because if they can find sex (or love) easily, they'll be less likely to drop $10 or more a month on Tinder.

More importantly, Tinder has singularly failed to rein female misbehavior and fraud on its app. Women on Tinder have become notoriously flaky, refusing to answer messages when they match with men or matching with them long after they've left the area the man is in (this is very common with American and Western women vacationing in eastern Europe). Tinder also allows women to use old and inaccurate pictures to hide their aging and obesity; I recently went on a Tinder date with a Westernized Hungarian girl who was thirty pounds heavier than her pictures showed.

Even worse, the new Tinder Gold feature, which allows women to look at and Like men's profiles for faster matching, has been taken over by scammers. When I was using Tinder on a trip through Ukraine and Poland last week, I repeatedly got Likes from obvious scam profiles that tried to redirect me to a Polish-language camwhore site.

While Tinder ignores these blatant female abuses of their platform, they're all too happy to film expensive ads shaming men for innocuous behavior such as going to the gym and vaping. This is despite the fact that men are necessary for Tinder to work; it's male thirst and the male desire for sex and companionship that keeps the app profitable and popular.

Get Off The Ride, Get A Refund

It's clear that Tinder has been converged by leftist women who have forgotten what made the app successful: it facilitated hookups between men and women. Indeed, the women in the "Menprovement Initiative" seem deluded as to how Tinder actually works. For example, one of their complaints about "douchebags" is that they "don't introduce you to [their] friends," as if any self-respecting man would parade around some slut he met off a hookup app.

While I've had success using Tinder in Hungary, Ukraine, and Poland, I'm unwilling to invest my time and money into an app run by people who hate me for being a straight white man. Because of this, I urge you to uninstall Tinder from your phone and cancel your Tinder Plus and Gold subscriptions (if you have them). In the West, Tinder has already become useless due to female entitlement, obesity, flaking, and fraud, so this should be an easy decision for many men.

Tinder's management has made it clear that we aren't welcome on their platform, so we should stop giving them money and watch their business crumble. The easiest way to combat SJW-converged companies is to stop rewarding them with our time and dollars. There's no reason to use a service or platform run by people who hate you.

Read More: Facebook's Newest Change Shows That Older Women Are Getting Desperate

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Instagram, SoundCloud, Twitch, VK, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice, Affirmative Right, and other sites.

4 Tips To Improve Your Verbal Game

October 18, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

However handsome, jacked, rich, or well-connected you are, there's one equaliser in game that all guys face: you have to be able to hold a conversation with a girl. And not just any conversation—you can't be boring, you must pique her interest, and you must create attraction while at the same time not looking 'try hard'. You have to have an edge but you can't be too intimidating or you'll push her away.

It's not an easy feat to pull off, and most guys fail at least some of the time, but the plain fact is that no matter what other aces you might hold, the better you can talk to women the more success—measured in intimacy—you'll get.

When you first approach a girl, you might well be met with disinterest, or perhaps half-hearted encouragement. Unless she is a yes girl who greets you with huge enthusiasm what you won't be receiving is much help. And after all, why should she help? It is your responsibility as the guy to chat her up, not the other way round. The longer that you can extemporise verbally with little external assistance, the better.

Fortunately there are several ways that you can improve your chat. Here I list my top four.

1. Reading

Reading is hugely important for a whole variety of reasons, but one peripheral benefit of the practice is that it helps you talk to girls in two key ways.

Firstly, if you read a lot you will inevitably furnish your mind with plenty of information that you can talk about. So, if you read a book about, say, sexual dynamics between men and women in the 21st century, then you will be able to steer your conversations in that direction and then drop in the various things that you've learned. Reading makes you a more interesting person.

Secondly, reading widely expands both your vocabulary and your ability to logically present a case. If you read about politics for example, then not only will you likely pick up some new words, but also you will find out how politicians couch their arguments, how they evade difficult questions and how they divert in favour of topics that suit their own agendas better. Reading about them will therefore assist your conversation on both a micro and meta level.

2. Writing

Writing helps in a similar way. Talking to someone is about manipulating words effectively in order to communicate information or emotion or both. Although not a verbal form, writing is nonetheless the practice of shaping language to transmit thoughts and feelings, which is exactly what you need to do when you talk to a girl.

I write an article everyday for my website and I have done for some time. Before that I wrote pretty much every day too, for over a decade, although a lot of that work has not been published. This daily commitment to writing has really helped my conversational skills, since what writing compels you to do (particularly writing you know will be read by other people) is to shape what might be somewhat amorphous thoughts into language.

Writing every day also forces you to be creative. It requires you to be an improviser, someone who plucks topics out of thin air and expands on them entertainingly and sometimes at length for his audience. It makes you look for the interesting angle, for the colourful turn of phrase that best encapsulates what you're trying to say. Again, these are all necessary and transferrable skills needed for talking to girls.

3.Podcasting or Vlogging

A more direct way of practicing your conversation skills is to start a podcast or a a vlogging channel. I myself record a podcast every week and have fairly recently started putting out videos on YouTube.

It's amazing how sharp your verbal faculties get when you force yourself to step up to the plate regularly to create spoken content that is enjoyable for other people.

Even if you're not looking to build a content business or an online brand I would still recommend that you try your hand at one or other of these forms—or both. Not only is it fun but also I guarantee that you'll see your conversational skills skyrocket as a result.

The subject matter you choose to talk about isn't really important. You could be giving away your best tips on building IKEA furniture or playing Minecraft. What matters is that you get used to standing in front of a microphone or camera and delivering your ideas in a coherent, clear and engaging way.

4. Getting A Job In Sales

So much has been written about the parallels between sales and game already that I am reticent to add to the yottabytes of content already out there. That said, there is no doubt in my mind that working in sales is absolute dynamite as far as improving your conversation (and social) skills is concerned.

After all sales requires you to verbalise the specific benefits of a product to a potential buyer who may or may not be interested. It also requires you to deal with objections (shit tests) and to persist, finding new ways to couch your arguments when others might give up.

For these reasons if you ever get the chance to work in sales, even for a short period of time, I would highly recommend that you do so. Not only will it really help you with chatting up girls, but you might well make some money too.

For a compilation of all Troy's best game writing, advice and techniques from the last four years buy his new book How To Get Hot Girls Into Bed.

Read Next: How Most Relationships End

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Female Flight Attendants Terrorize Air Passengers By Having A Massive Panic Attack

October 18, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Star:

Passengers on an Indonesia AirAsia flight from Australia to the holiday island of Bali described a panicked flight crew announcing an emergency and oxygen masks dropping from the ceiling after their airliner lost cabin air pressure and rapidly descended.

Flight QZ535 returned safely on Sunday to the airport at Perth city where many of the 145 passengers spoke to media about the fear and confusion on board.

“The panic was escalated because of the behaviour of staff who were screaming, looked tearful and shocked,” passenger Clare Askew told reporters.

“Now, I get it, but we looked to them for reassurance and we didn’t get any, we were more worried because of how panicked they were,” Askew added.

The budget Indonesian airline said in a statement the pilot turned back “following a technical issue to ensure the safety of passengers.”

“We commend our pilots for landing the aircraft safely and complying with standard operating procedure,” AirAsia Group head of safety Captain Ling Liong Tien said.

“We are fully committed to the safety of our guests and crew and we will continue to ensure that we adhere to the highest safety standards,” he added.

The Australian Transport Safety Bureau, an accident investigator, said it was investigating the airliner’s depressurization at 10,363 metres.

The plane rapidly descended to around 3,048 metres, an altitude to which cabins are pressurized and at which oxygen masks are no longer needed.

Random AirAsia flight attendants

Data from FlightRadar, a website which tracks flights globally using GPS, shows the plane descended 7,250 metres in the space of nine minutes.

Perth Airport said in a statement that emergency services were on hand when the plane landed 78 minutes after it took off.

A passenger named Leah told Nine Network television: “I actually picked up my phone and sent a text message to my family, just hoping that they would get it.”

“We were all pretty much saying goodbye to each other. It was really upsetting,” she added.

Passenger Mark Bailey told Seven Network television: “Hostesses started screaming: ‘Emergency, emergency.’ They just went hysterical.”

“There was no real panic before that, then everyone panicked,” Bailey added.

Passenger Norman Pearce told Seven the flight crew said: “Emergency. Crash positions and that was it. Nothing for about five minutes and then the oxygen fell down.”

Random AirAsia flight attendants

Peter Gibson, spokesman for Civil Aviation Safety Authority, the Australian industry regulator, said the airline had been asked for information on what occurred on board.

“Our job as the regulator is to gather information on these sorts of events and review that to see whether we’re satisfied that everything was managed properly and determine whether we should dig any deeper,” Gibson said.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: Why Airlines Will Join The War On Fatties

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

What Nietzsche Had To Say About Social Justice

October 18, 2017 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

SJWs are one of our favorite subjects here on ROK. If you care to do a site search, you end up with 28 pages of articles that include that term. We discuss their tactics (examples 1 and 2), how to mitigate them (example 1 and 2) and of course we all agree that SJW Always Lie. We have been analyzing this phenomena for quite a while now, but it seems that it is not that new.

I recently read Nietzsche's "Thus Spoke Zarathustra" ("Also sprach Zarathustra" in German). It seems that one of our favorite philosophers had a keen eye and identified them as far back as 1883. We have already discussed 19th century feminism, but I'd like to review what Nietzsche wrote about them.

SJW as "The Tarantulas"

According to popular belief in the 19th century, those spiders were lethal. The only way to avoid mortality was to dance like a mad man. I'm not kidding. Today we know that those spiders are not lethal, and can be pets and long term companions (the females live up to 30 years, while the males only 7. That's misandry!).

That is one big tarantula. Source: Youtube

> BEHOLD, THIS is the tarantula's den! Would you see the tarantula itself? Here hangs its web: touch this, so that it may tremble.
>
> There comes the tarantula willingly: Welcome, tarantula! Black on your back is your triangle and symbol; and I know also what is in your soul.
>
> Revenge is in your soul: wherever you bite, there arises black scab; with revenge, your poison makes the soul giddy!
>
> Thus do I speak to you in parable, you who make the soul giddy, you preachers of > equality! Tarantulas are you to me, and secretly revengeful ones!

In these lines he identifies core aspects of the SJW. The first is that you just need to touch "their web" (read – come to their consciousness with something that strikes a chord within them) to see them come out. The second is that they will come willingly and have their special "symbol" (read – clothes that identify them as such) and the third is that they do not care about justice – they care about revenge.

How to handle "The Tarantulas"

> "Therefore do I tear at your web, that your rage may lure you out of your den of lies, and that your revenge may leap forth from behind your word "justice."
>
> Because, for man to be redeemed from revenge – that is for me the bridge to the highest hope, and a rainbow after long storms.
>
> Otherwise, however, would the tarantulas have it. "Let it be very justice for the world to become full of the storms of our vengeance" – thus do they talk to one another.
>
> "Vengeance will we use, and insult, against all who are not like us" – thus do the tarantula-hearts pledge themselves.
>
> "And 'Will to Equality' – that itself shall henceforth be the name of virtue; and against all that has power will we raise an outcry!"

So simple, so elegant. You want to tackle SJW, you tear down their web of lies. You want them to lose their wits so everyone can see them for what they are. SJWs want "justice" no matter what the price is, and they'll insult their way to that goal. Equalism is their religion, this is how they will signal their virtue. I don't know about you, but I was shocked to see how within a few sentences the core of SJW is revealed. And that coming from a distance of 130 years ago.

One way to fight SJWs

> "You preachers of equality, the tyrant-frenzy of impotence cries thus in you for "equality": your most secret tyrant-longings disguise themselves thus in virtue-words!
>
> …
>
> Their jealousy leads them also into thinkers' paths; and this is the sign of their jealousy – they always go too far: so that their fatigue has at last to go to sleep on the snow."

Equality has its place in the world. To Nietzsche the will to equality seems like the will to be slaves or to be ruled by a tyrant. We have seen before that SJW are actually on the hunt for authoritarian style of state. They just hide it in nice words. Nietzsche identifies it as linking to the core emotion of jealousy. You want equality because you are jealous. That emotion leads you too far, and in some cases to make your country a terrorist fertile ground or have much higher rape cases.

> "That they speak in favour of life, though they sit in their den, these poison-spiders, and withdrawn from life – is because they would thereby do injury.
>
> To those would they thereby do injury who have power at present: for with those the preaching of death is still most at home.
>
> Were it otherwise, then would the tarantulas teach otherwise: and they themselves were formerly the best world-maligners and heretic-burners."

“Power is bad, unless it is on my side”

SJW would rather withdraw from life (read – live in their fantasy world) and harm other people. They will go after those who currently have power, because they want that power distributed “fairly”. For Nietzsche – “life itself is will to power”, so by wanting to lose power you choose death over life. We can surely identify with that. SJWs were those people who would slander the world as it is, and burn those who think differently.

What their actions really signal

> “Inventors of figures and phantoms shall they be in their hostilities; and with those figures and phantoms shall they yet fight with each other the supreme fight!
>
> Good and evil, and rich and poor, and high and low, and all names of values: weapons shall they be, and sounding signs, that life must again and again surpass itself! ”

SJW will use their emotion of injustice to create phantoms, and they will fight with their proclaimed enemies until someone wins. SJW will use virtue as their weapon, but they fail to understand that by using them, they are actually stating that life is a struggle. This means that maybe, just maybe, might makes right. Otherwise, why wouldn’t they win without dirty tactics?

THE PHANTOM himself

Closing thoughts

Nietzsche's book is not an easy one to read. The book's second title is "A Book for All and None". And with good reason. Another philosopher, Heidegger, claimed in 1953 that people do not understand Nietzche's book and just take bits out of it. Ironically, this is what I've done here.

Nietzsche's advice on letting enemies struggle among themselves and against their enemies seems like a kind of test to see who wins. For him it does not matter who wins the fight, as long as someone comes on top. As someone who understands an enemy's true nature, he is taking a back seat to watch if our civilization will be overrun by the tarantulas. This brings us to some of the best critic I read about him, with a hat tip to our own William Adams.

When I read this part of the book, I immediately recognized the tarantulas. That analogy was not only brilliant but captures core essence of the SJWs. However, his call to learn from them and to fight each other does not resonate well. It is true that understanding the full extent of Nietzche is probably an effort above this writer's ability with regard to the article.

Read Next: Why Leftists Are Stunned At The Wise Words Of Friedrich Nietzsche

Dawn Pine
Dawn Pine (aka TheMaleBrain) is an Israeli 40+ divorced father of 2, former casualty of the blue-pill. Since he has taken the red pill his hobbies are: working out, writing, mentoring, harem management and self improvement.

4 Insane Feminist Gripes That Have Actually Caught On Among Western Women

October 19, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

After five decades of radical feminist demands and societal concessions, the quest continues for ever tinier things to gripe about. Many of these "microaggressions" hardly even qualify as First World problems. Much is in the eye of the beholder, but it doesn't help that crabby feminists believe that the world must revolve around their personal perspectives. There's little hope that meaningful dialogue can emerge from this, unfortunately.

Mansplaining

This involves a man explaining something to a woman, allegedly in a patronizing fashion. The basic concept came as an LA Times article by Rebecca Solnit, "Men Who Explain Things":

> Men explain things to me, and to other women, whether or not they know what they're talking about. Some men. Every woman knows what I mean. It's the presumption that makes it hard, at times, for any woman in any field; that keeps women from speaking up and from being heard when they dare; that crushes young women into silence by indicating, the way harassment on the street does, that this is not their world. It trains us in self-doubt and self-limitation just as it exercises men's unsupported overconfidence.

Ms. Solnit might feel that all women have had this experience. However, I can't remember a single instance. For example, when I showed a female colleague how to edit a text file, I certainly didn't do so patronizingly. She was the head of the computer department and believed she was my boss. My real boss never gave me a job description because it would've made her even more jealous and paranoid. Very long story, but I digress.

Shortly after the article, a user on Livejournal—one of those social media platforms that thrived before Fakebook came along—coined the word "mansplaining". Nine years later, I'm mansplaining to you what this is supposed to mean, and probably doing a terrible job because I've never done or even witnessed it.

Ultimately, this is silly. If anyone gives background information on something that's already understood, why blow a gasket?

Why it matters: Because dude doesn't assume chick knows everything, I guess?

The final take: Condescension is condescension, no matter who's doing it. However, there's no reason to get huffy when no offense is meant.

Manspreading

This occurs when a man is seated with legs supposedly too far apart. Note that the maximum acceptable angle is undefined, so there's no "bright line" standard.

By habit, women typically cross their legs or keep their knees together for modesty. It's probably more comfortable for them, since they have wider hips, unless they have thunder thighs. However, men just don't think about our leg angle, because it's unimportant. Apparently feminists expect us to sit like women.

Commonly the context concerns public transit; a leg angle deemed unacceptable might partially block an adjacent vacant seat. The Toronto Sun quoted Lyndsay Kirkham, a feminist English professor, thus apparently some kind of authority "aboot" this:

> "If you ride the TTC, most women experience the encroachment of men's bodies in the space they're sitting in, and it's unnecessary," she said. "I think it's incredibly valid because this is about physical comfort and safety. For many people, this is incredibly triggering."
>
> If you want to sit in a seat and you have someone pressing their leg against you because they think they have the entitlement to do so, that can be pretty problematic."

Oh, Canada! Anyway, what's with Ms. Kirkham's Twitter profile picture showing her sitting and encroaching both adjacent seats?

This seems rather fishy. Why make up a word only applying to men? Also, what's wrong with asking, "Can you move over a bit?" If a woman puts a shopping bag on an adjacent seat, is that an atrocity too? I call bullshit.

Why it matters: Because dude reveals too much package, I guess?

The final take: Quit staring at our crotches. Our eyes are up here, okay?

Male gaze

Oh no… he has eyes!

This idea began in 1975 is an article about feminist film theory:

> The paradox of phallocentrism in all its manifestations is that it depends on the image of the castrated woman to give order and meaning to the world. An idea of woman stands as lynch pin to the system: it is her lack that produces the phallus as a symbolic presence, it is her desire to make good the lack that the phallus signifies.

This has morphed from cinematographic discussion of camera angles and panning into something else entirely:

> The male gaze, which refers to the lens through which mostly white, heterosexual men are viewing the world, is a lens of entitlement.

It only gets worse from there. The “male gaze” is—you guessed it—part of “rape culture“.

Why it matters: They want dudes wearing blindfolds, I guess?

The final take: If women didn’t want attention, they’d all wear burqas.

Topfreedom

The idea is that if men aren’t required to wear tops, then neither should women. Going shirtless in public hasn’t been fashionable with guys since the 1970s, outside of beaches and the like. Actually, if a guy is so porky that it looks like he has jugs, going shirtless is a crime against humanity.

Are feminists are so enthralled with leftist biology denial that they forget that only women have sweater puppies? Contrary to their beliefs, breasts are a secondary sexual characteristic. Different cultures simply have different standards of dress, but arguing that it’s burdensome to wear at least a bikini top is absurd. If they feel like bouncing ’em, nobody will object if they go to a nude beach or other nudist recreation area.

Why it matters: Actually, go right ahead, unless they’re really saggy.

The final take: Apparently feminists can’t decide whether or not they want us checking them out. Fortunately, we don’t care.

Finally

Ted Kennedy at the “haabah”

What will the feminist chip-on-the-shoulder brigade do if they finally can’t imagine anything else to complain about? Since they’re so good at making mountains out of molehills, surely they can design awesome push-up bras.

Read More: 9 Types Of Feminists And How To Counter Them

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Playboy Magazine Features Its First Transsexual Playmate

October 19, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Roosh V Forum:

Hugh Hefner is rolling over in his grave. Looks like they waited for him to die to do this.

> "Being a woman is just being a woman." Meet November 2017 Playmate Ines Rau, the first transgender Playmate. https://t.co/w28vfilSP9 pic.twitter.com/iVAqOgB0TK
>
> — Playboy (@Playboy) October 18, 2017

> These days Ines is a globe-trotting model with an irrepressible passion for self-love and honesty. “I lived a long time without saying I was transgender,” she says. “I dated a lot and almost forgot. I was scared of never finding a boyfriend and being seen as weird. Then I was like, You know, you should just be who you are. It’s a salvation to speak the truth about yourself, whether it’s your gender, sexuality, whatever. The people who reject you aren’t worth it. It’s not about being loved by others; it’s about loving yourself.”

Next up will be a law that makes it a hate crime if you reject a tranny because of her genital package.

Comment by Kosko:

> They hide the trannies hands. It’s always the hands.
>
> You can pump yourself full of all the hormones you want, and get all the plastic surgery you want but you can’t chage the physiology of your hand structure and > hand bones. The trannies fatal flaw is that they lurk on edge of being exposed. The tranny gets exposed because of the simple fact of both sexes..

>
> Women have small hands
>
> Men have big hands
>
> Simple as that.
>
> So Playboy's first tranny does all these circus level contortions to hide it's junk and man hands. It isn't natural to men to try and pose in such ways. Women have some sort of animal ability to control their body and pivot their body parts in a sensual way. Trannies dont have this ability which is why they look like they have a hernia or a broken back in photos such as the example of the Playboy clunker.
>
> It's all just tricks as they want you to focus on a heavily Photoshopd face and long hair to make you even think for a split second that you are not looking at a freakazoid.
>
> This is a dead cat bounce for Playboy, the magazine will go under in the next 3 years. Hugh is rolling in his grave but his daughter has been running Playboy into the ground for a long time now so this nonsense shouldn't be surprising.

Read the entire thread

Must Read: 8 Ways To Spot A Transsexual

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

What We Can Learn From The Weinstein Scandal

October 19, 2017 | by Rob Reed | Link | Original Link

If you want to see what a real polyamorous society is like, look no further than the case of Harvey Weinstein. The 65-year-old, once-mighty movie mogul represents a womanizer who, whether you realize it or not, you're competing against in the dating marketplace. A super rich member of the 1% of the 1% who could create, break, or turbo-charge any woman's career, Weinstein has no doubt been blown by hundreds if not thousands of the most beautiful actresses in the world on his infamous casting couch. Guys can look at the wreckage of his life and career, and the careers he's pulling down with him, and learn a lot about female nature.

Weinstein understood female nature better than most, but not well enough to know when it was time for him to completely disappear. He was also a feminist, funding women's causes, which isn't a contradiction when one considers what his life mission was about: creating unlimited opportunity for men like him and taking it away from guys like you.

Harvey Weinstein and Gwyneth Paltrow when their relationship worked.

Briffault's Law at Work

Enough has been written about what Weinstein allegedly did: harassment, rape, forced oral sex, etc. His accusers of course include Gwyneth Paltrow, Heather Graham, Angelina Jolie, Asia Argento, Ashley Judd, and countless "minor" actresses and models.

What isn't being discussed nearly enough is why and how the women of Hollywood suddenly gathered with their knives to carve him a new one in 2017. He had been at this for 30 years after all.

During his up years, Weinstein really seemed to understand Briffault's Law. English anthropologist Robert Briffault (1876-1948) wrote that "the female, not the male, determines all the conditions of the animal family. Where the female can derive no benefit from association with the male, no such association takes place."

Weinstein finally makes the cover of Time.

From the 1990s to about 2012, women could derive tremendous benefit from associating with Harvey Weinstein. He was arguably the world's most powerful film mogul, with access to capital and a capability for not only picking the right scripts and right talent, but of mounting an Oscar campaign to ensure that his lady starlets won Oscars. Jennifer Lawrence won her Oscar for Silver Linings Playbook after Weinstein cast her in the movie and successfully lobbied the Academy for her to win, like he had for Gwyneth Paltrow during her glory years.

Paltrow continued to make movies with him, long after he supposedly made his clumsy, unrequited passes at her in 1996. Weinstein's Dimension Films distributed accuser Asia Argento's The Mother of Tears in 2007, ten years after her "incident" with him.

It must have been a rude awakening for him when the same women who were fighting to be photographed with him (even years after their "incidents" with the producer) suddenly decided in 2017 to throw him under the bus.

Since the 1990s, his behavior was far from unknown in the industry. It was even a cute inside joke. Seth McFarlane, during his announcement of the Best Actress nominations at the Oscars in 2013, joked: "Congratulations, you five ladies no longer have to pretend to be attracted to Harvey Weinstein."

By 2016, Hollywood had started to notice that Weinstein's ability to deliver had faded. His films were bombing. No Oscars had been awarded to any actress since Lawrence. As Briffault's Law deftly puts it: "Even though a woman has accrued past benefits from her relationship with a man, this is no guarantee of her continuing the relationship with him."

Rose Mcgowan and Harvey Weinstein

Even his own wife, who must have been aware of his behavior, dumped him days after the scandal broke. It took five days for Hillary Clinton, who had accepted millions in bundled fundraising payments from him in 2016, plus $250,000 for the Clinton Foundation, to say anything bad about him. Michelle Obama followed.

Thanks to his value as a provider of Hollywood fame and Oscar glory, Weinstein had gotten away with paying out collectively less than $2 million to his accusers over the past couple of decades, including a paltry $100,000 to Rose McGowan in 1997, and she says she was raped by him. (She would go on to be photographed with him in 2007 when he distributed Grindhouse, directed by her then-married boyfriend Robert Rodriguez).

Not only would his accusers continue to work with him, but in at least one case, a woman who said he raped her would even continue sleeping with him, before it was clear his Hollywood powers were gone and "continuing the relationship" yielded no benefit.

Women were his enablers

An unsurprising theme in the whole affair is the apparent lack of agency of his accusers. Mira Sorvino and Gwyneth Paltrow kept working with him — both had won Oscars under his stewardship — after they said he harassed them. Ashley Judd didn't want to offend him by complaining about him or reporting him. When Judd rebuffed his request to massage him and watch him shower naked in 1997, the New York Times reports, “she quipped that if Mr. Weinstein wanted to touch her, she would first have to win an Oscar in one of his movies.”

Asia Argento and Harvey Weinstein, years after the alleged incident.

Among those accusing him of rape is Asia Argento, who enjoyed success in the late ’90s and early 2000s. After the rape, “She said that she had consensual sexual relations with him multiple times over the course of the next five years, though she described the encounters as one-sided and ‘onanistic.’ Years later, when she was a single mother dealing with child care, Weinstein offered to pay for a nanny. She said that she felt ‘obliged’ to submit to his sexual advances. Argento said that she knew this contact would be used to attack the credibility of her allegation.”

When Weinstein was at the top of his game, there was a good reason to keep in contact and avoid angering him. As accuser Ashley Judd put it, her big problem when she showed up to a hotel room to meet Harvey Weinstein for a business meeting in 1997, only to find out he was expecting to fuck her, was “How do I get out of the room as fast as possible without alienating Harvey Weinstein?”

By 2017, it no longer mattered if Weinstein was alienated.

The real reason he’s a scumbag

Weinstein is a feminist, a major fundraiser for Hillary Clinton and the financial force behind the recent date-rape hysteria documentary The Hunting Ground. On the surface, that seems ironic, but there actually isn’t a contradiction in a male feminist being a “predator” at the same time he works to alienate women from men as a whole.

Harvey Weinstein's anti-rape documentary "The Hunting Ground" warns women about the danger of college-aged guys.

As a feminist, Weinstein is a man at war with Western civilization, battling the women as much as the men. The degenerate art he funds and the values he espoused not only led to the corruption and degradation of countless women, but wrecked the lives of a lot of men as well.

Millions of young women seduced and then ground up by the sick and degenerate entertainment industry could have and would have been great girlfriends, wives, and even mothers in another American time. Now they grow into old and bitter women like Rose McGowan, who went from being a fresh faced beauty in 1997 to the resentful post-wall rageaholic she is today. What an awesome wife and mother she could have been if she hadn't danced with the fat hairy devil of Miramax. Even she seems to see this, posting a '90s pic of herself on Twitter as the scandal unfolded.

McGowan has become a Twitter celebrity in the wake of the scandal.

It isn't surprising that Weinstein financially supported feminist causes, from Hillary Clinton's failed presidential bid to Planned Parenthood to the date-rape hysteria documentary The Hunting Ground, because it was in his interest to alienate attractive women from ordinary men. Women who are in love with their career are also easier to seduce on a casting couch. Naturally hypergamous women always look up the status ladder for guys they are willing to spend time with. Elite, wealthy, well-connected males like Weinstein create more opportunity for themselves by lifting women higher in a society than the women's male peers. It's why we are seeing more women going to college today than men. This is being engineered.

Hypergamy naturally makes women want to operate like Asia Argento and "mate up" the economic ladder, so they gravitate to the 1% of males, basically joining a harem.

Men who try to upset the power dynamic are dealt with swiftly. "I had a male friend who, based on my experience, warned a young actress who said she was going to dinner with Harvey to be careful," Kate Beckinsale, one of Weinstein's many accusers, told People. "He received a phone call the next day saying he would never work in another Miramax film."

Weinstein's deep hatred for the West can be seen in all of his films, including Django Unchained, the anti-Catholic Philomena and the anti-Christian Mary Magdalene, due out in 2018.

In the respected Jewish arts-and-culture publication Tablet Magazine, Mark Oppenheimer surmised that Weinstein was motivated by a desire for revenge on "gentile" society. "It goes without saying that nearly every one of these women—Rose McGowan, Ambra Batillana, Laura Madden, Ashley Judd, etc.—was a gentile, all the better to feed

Weinstein's revenge-tinged fantasy of having risen above his outer-borough, bridge-and-tunnel Semitic origins."

While you can't feel sorry for women who foolishly dance with the devil, we can still condemn and hate the devil. How sad it is that a degenerate like Weinstein has been shaping western culture for the past 30 years – all the while turning our culture's best women into his whores.

Read Next: Liberal Hollywood Had Decades To Expose Harvey Weinstein's Sexual Predation But Did Nothing

Rob Reed
Robert Q. Reed is a veteran journalist and business reporter based in Reno, Nevada.

Guillaume Faye Is One Of Few Right-Wing Writers Worth Reading

October 19, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Although there exist several interesting writers who are linked to the right – Oswald Spengler, Vilfredo Pareto, Carl Schmitt, and Julius Evola to name a few – many of them lived many decades ago. Their contemporaries are mainly academic types and some of them not even particularly right-wing.

One exception, though, is the French New Right (Nouvelle Droite) thinker, Guillaume Faye, known for his writings that have been translated into English as Archeofuturism, Why We Fight, and The Convergence Of Catastrophes, with help of the transnational publishing house Arktos Media. Also his latest book, A Global Coup (2017), which concerns the relationships between Europe and America, is sound.

There are a number of points to criticize Faye for, such as his penchant for biological engineering and that he somewhat misguidedly bases his argument on Samuel Huntington's book The Clash Of Civilizations. Yet the strengths are predominant.

I consider Why We Fight to be his most important book. It was originally written in 2001 and show how correct Faye was and that his ideas largely overlap neomasculinity and a general masculine thought program. Since the book is largely structured as a dictionary which discusses multiple keywords, I have selected some of them and quoted Faye. All of them are relevant to a broad male audience.

1. Aesthetics

> Contemporary egalitarian ideology abhors and implicitly domonises aesthetics. (…) With the plastic arts, architecture, cinema, literature, theatre, even fashion, the ugly, the unachieved, the unformed, the most far-fetched nonsense, the shady and the watered down are now preferred to the aesthetic, which is made synonymous with a menacing ‘order’. Since the mid-Twentieth century, contemporary arts, encouraged by the dominant ideology, have rejected any notion of aesthetics. Instead of harmony, the power of forms, the exaltation and elevation of sensation of beauty – notions of abstract ‘conceptual art’ are preferred, which becomes a pretext for degeneracy, wilful ugliness, and subsidied incompetence.

2. Consumerism

> Consumerism is a form of slavery, to which the mass men of our civilisation have succumbed, these mass men who are neither citizens, nor actors, nor responsible individuals, but rather passive domesticated beings.

3. Devirilisation

> The declining values of courage and virility for the sake of feminist, xenophile, homophile, and humanitarian values. (…) In no case the notion of ‘virility’ ought to be confused with ‘machismo’ or with the stupid demand for some sort of ‘masculine social privilege’.

4. Discipline

> Discipline is the basis of all education and every civilisation. Permissive ‘pedagogical’ theories cannot but lead to the failure to transmit knowledge, as is so evident today.

5. Domestication

> Its symptoms are innumerable: susceptibility to ideological conditioning, dependence on consumerist ways of life, loss of independent judgment in respect to propaganda and culpability, the banishment of all spirituality (replaced by the media gnosis) etc.

6. Elite

> Contemporary elites are ‘recruited’ according to criteria that have nothing to do with excellence or character. These criteria are now nepotism, connection, membership in a lobby, a clique, a mafia, a clan (sociological or ethnic); or else the ability to make money.

7. Homophilia

> After having long sought recognition as a marginal social element, the homosexual lobby now demands a sort of superiority, with heterosexuality > treated as something inferior or mutilated. First equal rights, then privileges.

8. Human rights

> As a synthesis of Eighteenth-century political philosophy (often badly understood), human rights is the inescapable horizon of the dominant ideology. (…) Profoundly hypocritical, human rights ideology accomodates every form of social misery and justifies every form of oppression. It functions as a veritable secular religion. The ‘human’ in human rights is nothing but an abstraction, a consumer-client, an atom. (…) ‘Humans’ (already a vague notion) possess no fixed or universal rights, only those bequethed by their civilisation, their tradition.

9. Neo-primitivism

> The signs of this new primitivism are multiple: the rise of illiteracy in the schools, the explosion of drug use, the Afro-Americanisation of popular music, the collapse of social codes, the decline of general culture, knowledge, and historical memory among the young, dissolution of contemporary art into a brutal, vacuous nihilism, the mass coarsening and deculturation fostered by audio/visual media (the ‘cathodic religion’), the increase of criminality and uncivil behavior, the decline of civic duty, the accelerated crumbling of social norms and collective disciplines, the deterioration of the language, etc.

10. Populism

> This presently pejorative word must be made positive. The prevailing version to populism actually expresses a covert contempt for authentic democracy. Like its corollary anti-demagoguery, anti-populism is a semantic ruse of politicians and bourgeois intellectuals – to deflect the people's will, especially that of the modest social strata, reputedly dangerous, because they are the most nationalist.

11. Presentism

> Presentism fosters contempt for the survival of one's people. It's a consequence of a narcissistic individualism and the bourgeois spirit. (…) Presentism is the infantile demand for everything right now…

In closing

As has been demonstrated above, Faye is a straightforward writer who points out important aspects of our present Western societies and how we can try to fix some of them. While many of his works are worth reading in full, these eleven aspects point out some of the core ideas which are particularly important.

For more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic politics.

Read Next: Why Beauty Is Not As Subjective As Feminists Insist

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

The Guardian’s Nicole Silverberg Tells Men To Believe All Rape Claims And Always Apologize To Women

October 20, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A perfect ten writing for The Guardian, Nicole Silverberg, has unlocked the ancient secrets to male excellence and how to stoke female desire.

No, not really, but at least she tried. Silverberg’s bizarre “self-improvement” list for men implores them to accept “rape culture” by “trusting and believing women” and to apologize whenever a woman asks for it. She also demands that men give women the credit for male ideas and even sacrifice promotions to allow females to climb the corporate ladder. And it only took the Harvey Weinstein sex scandal for her to share it all with us.

Nicole Silverberg basically promises readers that by following her counsel men will gain the respect of women, presumably leading to all sorts of accolades and filling their beds with hot, nubile women. No? Well, again, at least she tried.

After seeing the wisdom of this self-described “comedian,” who is like a milder and less psychotic Laurie Penny, Return Of Kings realizes it has failed you all. We should have told you to grab your scrotum and promptly rip it off from your body, per the effective instructions of Silverberg, and then march to the nearest prison or HR department to report yourself as a compulsive rapist. We promise to be better!

The reality: I would wager that the writer’s real problem, like for many girls declaring the same feminist ideology, is with her own appearance and perhaps some men from her past (real or imaginary) who pumped and dumped her. She wants to lord it over the men weak enough to do what she says, but truly craves a catharsis with the masculine men she knew in the past or could never have in it.

Let’s reflect on the evidence again:

Yeah, we thought so.

Translating feministese

I felt a great disturbance in the Force, as if millions of male voices suddenly cried out in joy and were suddenly silenced by the wisdom of Nicole Silverberg. I fear this perfect 10 has given them the secrets to male excellence and how to stoke female desire.

Here's a quick translation of some of Silverberg's pieces of advice:

"Talk to your friend who is 'kind of a creep' at work." = I pretend to be strong, brave, and independent, but it's better when men do things for me. Plus, the "creep" isn't Brad Pitt.

"Don't talk over women." = Don't disagree with me and allow me to talk over you incessantly.

"If you are asked to be on a panel/team and see that it's all men, say something. Maybe even refuse the spot!" = Allow me to take your place even with my subpar work performances.

"Involve women in your creative projects, then let them have equal part in them." = Let me take the credit for your ideas.

"If a woman tells you that you fucked up, and you feel like shit, don't put it on that woman to make you feel better. Apologize without qualification and then go away." = The woman is always right, now apologize to her five times and speak to HR.

"Don't need to literally witness a man being horrible in order to believe that he's horrible. Trust and believe women." = Allegation of flirting = actual rape. Imprison him, no evidence needed.

"Don't read a list like this and think that most of these don't apply to you." = Anyone with testicles can never understand how bad my life is, so just trust me and shut the fuck up, I'm a woman.

This is what happens when you follow advice like Silverberg's…

Sam Kriss, male feminist.

You end up like Vice writer Sam Kriss by losing your job and publicly outing yourself as a "sexual abuser" just because an anonymous woman called you one.

Kriss has just been fired for following exactly the same advice that Silverberg endorses. He was anonymously accused of sexual assault and then admitted it on Twitter and Medium, paying special attention to the "always apologize to women" and "listen and believe" parts.

Many people on the right will dismiss this with something along the lines of the typical "male feminists are always the real abusers" response. I'm not so convinced. Having peddled leftist and feminist filth for years, a man like Sam Kriss probably fervently believes in the SJW illness he has spewed at others.

A number of men in our societies can be or already are firmly convinced that merely approaching a woman is a veritable form of sexual harassment, if not sexual assault. Like Kriss, when the proverbial knock at the door comes and they're amorphously accused of sexual harassment or rape, they will either go along with their own social and legal immolation or lack the tools and confidence to fight it.

This is why, for all the hilarity of what Silverberg has written, there's a dark undertone to it that we should be aware of and combat.

She writes for a men's magazine

On a final note, if you needed more of an indication of how feminized “male” spaces have become, look no further than Nicole Silverberg’s involvement with the supposed men’s magazine GQ. With such hard-hitting masculine titles as “Whatever Happened to (Consensual) Sex on Game of Thrones?” and “Every Time DJ Khaled Politely Declined to Wear a Shirt in 2016” (which I shan’t be linking to), we can see that the task of male “self-improvement” is now in safely feminist hands.

A word of caution: taking advice from women about women will not help you. As Sam Kriss hopefully learns one day, all it frequently does is give (feminist) women the ability to try and undo you when they want and how they want.

In the meantime, Nicole Silverberg, Laurie Penny and company should leave it to outlets like Return Of Kings to explain the world of women to men.

Read More: If Feminist Laurie Penny Was Serious About Stopping Rape, She Would Protest Outside Prisons

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Homosexual Movement Began As A Communist Bathhouse Front Before Infecting The Entire West

October 20, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

It's commonly believed that the Stonewall riots started the LGBT movement, sparked by a 1969 police raid on a New York gay bar. Actually, things were in motion long before. In 1950, America's first successful gay activist group was formed. Who they really were is a long story.

Harry Hay's colorful history

Harry Hay was born in 1912 to a prosperous, world-traveling mining engineer. When he was young, his family moved to California. He got along badly with his father, who considered him a sissy. When he was nine, he had sex with a twelve year old boy. Later, he lied about his age and went to sea at fourteen, and then hooked up with a twenty five year old sailor. As a young adult he began cruising for guys in Los Angeles. Upon entering college, he got interested in the theater scene, and also began frequenting underground gay clubs in LA and San Francisco.

He dropped out for health reasons, but continued pursuing theatrical interests. In 1934, bisexual actor Will Geer became his steady boyfriend. Hay, already favorable to radical causes, embraced Communism under his guidance. Together they distributed literature for several front groups with hidden Marxist agendas. Geer later got on the Hollywood blacklist, but eventually became best known as Grandpa in The Waltons.

In 1938, Hay tried going straight by marrying Anna Platky—another Party member—later adopting two children. Back then, American Communists considered homosexuality deviant, something which not even mainstream conservatives dare express now. However, before long, he was cruising for guys again. They divorced in 1951, the year after he'd met fashion designer Rudi Gernreich.

With his new boyfriend, they founded a gay advocacy group, eventually called the Mattachine Society, approximately meaning "masqueraders". Hay later gave up CPUSA membership and Mattachine leadership for public relations reasons, though remained involved in leftist and gay causes. In the 1970s, he took up American Indian spirituality (a long-time interest) and also co-founded the Radical Faeries. In 2002, he died in San Francisco, lauded as a pioneer.

The Homintern

Looks pretty reasonable, so far.

Hay's unorthodox interpretation of traditional Marxism considered homosexuals a distinct social category similar to ethnic minorities. However, that concept was right on track with cultural Marxism, soon to reach critical mass in the 1960s. The basic script is to radicalize a social category with class consciousness, hiding true agendas behind front groups, and initially limiting rhetoric to moderate appeals for fairness and equality. After demands are met, move the goalposts, repeat ad infinitum. Sounds familiar?

Hay's Mattachine Society drew further Communist inspiration from multi-level cell-based structures like guerrilla units and spy rings. It began basically as a secret society, though with a public newsletter and local discussion groups. Soon the FBI took notice.

Their constitution disclaimed political affiliation:

> [W]e find it especially significant that the most brutal and restrictive laws against homosexuals occur in those countries like Russia, where the freedom of the individual is most severely limited; and whereas those who attack the basic freedom of individual in this country, both of the extreme right and extreme left, have been the most bitter enemies of the homosexuals…

Despite this stated sentiment, early membership was heavily Communist; not unlike today's average college sociology department. Despite their tight security, the FBI report indeed noted participation of several CPUSA members. Another item describes a blood donation drive for good publicity, something that wouldn't have gone over well three decades later. On the legal front, the Mattachines opposed vice stings (resulting in an important court victory). As might be expected, their literature equated opposition to homosexuality with McCarthyism.

It's all quite strange. Wouldn't Communism be unnecessary baggage for a general gay advocacy group? The FBI report hints at dissension over this. Further, orthodox Communists then considered homosexuality to be bourgeois decadence. Still, since both pursuits didn't mesh well, were mainly underground, and organizing depended much on word-of-mouth, how could Hay unite so many fruity Bolsheviks—and why? Were they effectively the CPUSA's punishment battalion?

The early document "A brief history of the Mattachine movement" states their goals, including under the "General" subheading:

> 1. To accomplish these aims in a law-abiding manner. Homosexuals are not seeking to overthrow or destroy any of society's existing institutions, laws or mores, but to be assimilated as constructive, valuable and responsible citizens. […]"
>
> 2. We oppose indecent public behavior, and particularly excoriate these who would contribute to the delinquency of minors and those who attempt to use force or violence upon any other persons whatsoever.

How the times have changed! Item 3 claims they're politically unaffiliated, opposed to Communism, and won't become a front group. Believe what you will. After attaining broader outreach, the Mattachines numbered thousands of members.

Hay himself walked a strange line between radicalism and moderation. He strongly espoused gender nonconformity, himself quite fond of women's clothing and jewelry. However, he criticized the Stonewall riots—which took the American LGBT movement he inaugurated to the next level—as setting a bad example of disorderliness. The Mattachines then became seen as stodgy and insufficiently radical; ultimately overtaken by their own momentum.

Hay's other agenda

Although perceivedly too moderate, he said this in 1983 at NYU:

> Because if the parents and friends of gays are truly friends of gays, they would know from their gay kids that the relationship with an older man is precisely what thirteen-, fourteen-, and fifteen-year-old kids need more than anything else in the world.

Perhaps he enjoyed being punked out as a kid, but most child abuse victims certainly do not. This emphatic recommendation is considerably worse than calling this not always traumatic, or even "delightful" and "delicious". Hay associated with the North American Man-Boy Love Association (much like Allen Ginsberg), speaking frequently at their events.

This is even more troublesome than his Communist ties. He'd worked hard to make homosexuals respectable; just ordinary folks with different romantic inclinations. However, that wasn't the real Harry Hay.

Lessons learned

All the above reveals considerable double-talk between moderate public images versus actual viewpoints. Despite the carefully crafted aura of moderation for the movement he launched, much more was beneath the surface.

It's like the Muslim principle of taqiyya, basically lying to one's enemies. Such deception may be tactically profitable, per Alinsky's "ends justify the means" concept. However, that certainly gives no reason to trust further agendas by radicals.

Read More: New California Law Allows Jail Time If You Use Wrong Gender Pronoun On Tranny

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

What Is Western Civilization?

October 20, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Western civilization is under attack. It has been routinely betrayed from the inside by fifth columns degrading it, calling it imperialistic, oppressive, hypocritical, and so on. When only seeing the upper, most superficial crust of leftists, we can be tempted to identify instinctively with it: they have been breaking the whole social fabric for decades whereas conservatives, seeing the intricate, delicate flower of humanity the West was, tried to save it.

Problems appear when we delve a bit more into the topic. If the West was purely geographic, there would be barely anything to defend as we're free to go abroad. If civilization was synonymous with material goods and technology, we could start anew anywhere and thrive without hard feelings. We identify with the West, but the West is a mess. So let me clear the issue a bit.

Vocabulary issues

"Civilization" comes from the Latin root civis, which referred to a group of people sleeping under the same roof, then to members of the same city—citizens—or subjects of a same ruler. The word boomed during the eighteenth century, when rising intellectuals opposed it to savagery and barbarism. Leftists love to hate that: they routinely accuse the "dead white males" of the times of having disrespected the sacred Other. However, beyond their obvious caricaturing of otherwise complex intellectual figures, they tend to forget two important things.

First, the philosophers of non-European tribes or political entities deemed barbarian were often really so. Even the most hardened problem glasses-wearer would not dare to defend human sacrifices, cannibalism or the Arab culture of enslavement. (They tend to sweep these inconvenient facts under the rug instead.)

The Jewish anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss famously said that "the barbarian is the one who believes in barbarism", something leftists love to use to suggest that mild-mannered builders are more "barbarian" than Stone-age nomadic tribes who routinely kill each other. But Lévi-Strauss himself felt awkward facing Muslim violence and bigotry.

Second, the philosophers were much less worried about the Aztecs or Africans than about evilizing their own domestic adversaries. They blamed the Middle Ages and Christianity as "less civilized", "superstitious", "fanatical"—they did not aim at defending the West but at ushering their own version of the West.

Since then many talking heads mused with the notion. Some equate the West with modernization. Thus, as everyone on Earth got into global capitalism, bought a smartphone, knows about Hollywood movies, everyone is "westernized" and the West is everywhere. Of course, if the West is just that and everyone is equal (not), we have no particular merit or genius behind our ancestors' highly complex and demanding realizations, no identity: only a set of artifacts we would be "privileged" to benefit from.

Others see "civilization" as a burden: the more complex, the more difficult, the frailer. Here Lothrop Stoddard joins Nassim Taleb—if civilization means bureaucracy and central planning, it is bound to fail. In both cases the word has been discreetly narrowed, equated with very particular, non-evident views. Should we identify with technology worship or paper shuffling?

Traditionalist authors such as René Guénon or Julius Evola oppose the modern civilization with the traditional. Non-Western civilizations, as well as the Roman Empire and Christian Europe, sprang from peoples of differing characters and needs but all had a sacred, genuinely spiritual core, in contrast with the "materialistic" civilization of godless, anomic modernity.

The traditionalist or perennialist school of thought is immensely inspiring but suffers from one important flaw: it heaps too much scorn on the post-Middle Ages West. Thus, it makes itself too easily ripped off by not very bright Muslims who will condemn what they could never make and today freely benefit from. Traditionalism sorely needs to be updated so it would fit more with our needs. (Needless to add, traditionalism appeared in the West and nowhere else.)

The cultural issue

When "the West" is becoming way too inclusive

The ambiguity stems from the fact that too many narrow (or excessively wide) identifications and value judgments have been thrown into the notion of Western civilization. A much less ambiguous way to talk thinks of a civilization as an enduring ethno-socio-cultural unit. As Evola said, a particular civilization has a peculiar morphology that students of history typically recognize.

But morphologies move and change. When are we passing from one civilization to another? (I am not asking this rhetorically: many twentieth century traditionalists got at pains with reconciling Western identity with a non-Christian spiritual path, and Russia literally endured centuries of debates on whether the Slavic identity is European or "Asian.")

A civilization, in that sense, can also be subverted from the inside. The Roman empire had early clashes between worshippers of a masculine, Jupiterian sacred fire and the promoters of a “civilization of the Mother” (Evola’s expression) where a feminized Earth becomes the main god, which of course completely changes everything else.

Today, morphologies tend to be subverted by globalism, financial capitalism, the flood of Tinder and you-go-girlism into cultures which still raised traditional girls, and individual initiative. Did our civilization lead to the undoing of its very concept?

What are we to defend then? Coalitions of interest are contingent, un-identitarian, and culturally and spiritually empty. I absolutely refuse to let my identity shrink to a simple network, a business partnership, or my own individuality. Yet the System—which is a product of the modern West—supports just that: social atomization, in the name of modern humanitarian values.

Philosopher Alasdair McIntyre pinpointed that the “classic”, mainstream political values were mutually incompatible with each other, and this has only worsened with multiculturalism. Just like the late Roman Empire, the West has too many civilizations in it. And as Plato could see, such an unhinged state can only lead to either tyranny or collapse.

Who are we then? As for myself: meeting with Iranian guys in an Arabic country, I could tell intuitively they were different from the Bedouin landlords, and part of the same identity than I in a way Bedouins are not. I felt the same when I found out about the Indo-Aryan Kalash people: they are not Westerners, yet they are us and we are them in a way goatf*ckers will never be.

When I was particularly fond of traditionalist René Guénon, I mused that whites should perhaps completely un-identify from the West as to find back the Eastern fountain of youth. But that would be a betrayal of a glorious epic everyone craves to benefit from. No anti-white ever refused an iPhone. No critique of the West rejected the IT without which we would never be communicating across the Earth or investing in bitcoin.

All in all, we need to refine our intuition of what the West is or should be, so we can un-identify with all the degeneracy and applied parts the masses still identify with. Neomasculinity, coupled with the basic acceptance that there are Western natives too, should help us to do the job. Got to find back who we are so we can become it again.

Read Next: The Amish Show Us What The West Could Have Been

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Update On ROK Commenting System

October 21, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I had to pull the new comments system, at least temporarily, because their backend had some serious adware problems that were slowing down people's computers. We're now using a completely stock system that doesn't have ratings or sorting. In the next day or two, I will experiment with various plugins to improve what you're seeing now and also fixed the broken "Comments" links.

To display an avatar with your comments on the stock system, register an account with Gravatar. Then enter the same email you registered with them in the email address field below. Your avatar should automatically be displayed. Commenting rules still apply.

Unfortunately, a lot of comments have been lost. I couldn't recover Disqus comments left since August and the new commenting system was not syncing properly, so no comments left on it have been imported. Prepare for several weeks of commenting instability, where things don't work and comments disappear. Keep me informed of any problems you're seeing. I'll get things stabilized eventually.

Previously: Disqus Is Shutting Down ROK Comments Effective Friday

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Won’t Hillary Clinton Go Away?

October 21, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Hillary Clinton recently interviewed with Britain’s Channel 4, first asked if she still believes that The Donald is “a clear and present danger to the United States, and indeed the world”. She confirmed this opinion, citing his plans to de-certify the Iran nuclear agreement. To lift economically damaging sanctions, Iran would reduce (but not eliminate) their isotope enrichment capacity temporarily. Gosh, why would anyone think that’s a lame deal?

More boldly, the interviewer discussed the email server brouhaha. However, he generously omitted embarrassing specifics, like wrongfully conducting highly sensitive State Department business on a private server lacking government oversight and security measures. Hillary had a ready response, beginning that “it was a dumb mistake, but a dumber scandal”. (No genuine remorse, or even decent method-acting?) Then Her Majesty had the chutzpah to blame the media for the fallout. (Out of touch much?) Further:

> There was an investigation, which I knew would lead nowhere, it led nowhere…

Oh, was that because all the data she didn’t want investigators to find got deleted with Bleachbit? Cupcake’s remarks made Nixon’s historical legacy a little brighter.

Harvey Weinstein

Halfway into the video, he asked about Harvey Weinstein. Laying it on pretty thick, the interviewer even called her “a beacon of feminism”. (Actually, I agree, though not in praise.) It’s a pretty touchy subject, if you’ll pardon the expression. Weinstein has been a very enthusiastic Democratic Party supporter, donating heavily, even hosting fundraisers.

Hillary emphatically denied hearing any rumors prior to the recent revelations. That much is plausible. After all, Hollywood is pretty tight-lipped about certain things. Quickly switching to attack mode:

> Look, we just elected someone who admitted sexual assault to the presidency. So there’s a lot of other issues that are swirling around these kinds of behaviors that need to be addressed.

Since Hillary keeps beating this dead horse, let’s set the record straight about this frequently-quoted “grab ’em by the pussy” soundbite.

What Trump’s remark actually meant

What The Donald didn't mean by grabbing pussies

Trump and TV host Billy Bush were aboard a parked tour bus. A camera outside overlooked the parking lot. The two chatted idly, including some crude remarks; likely unaware the microphones were on. Arianne Zucker was to arrive soon, and Bush repeatedly urged Trump to make an overly-dramatic greeting.

Then the infamous quote:

> I better use some Tic Tacs just in case I start kissing her. You know I'm automatically attracted to beautiful—I just start kissing them. It's like a magnet. Just kiss. I don't even wait. And when you're a star, they let you do it. You can do anything. Grab 'em by the pussy. You can do anything.

It's plausible to take the first part literally; that Trump had kissed some beautiful women, quite quickly, and with their willingness—"they let you do it". However, the rest is crude hyperbole concerning the boundless potential of this willingness, given female enthusiasm toward celebrities in general. Trump doesn't say that he specifically did that, much less without anyone's willing participation. This meant, "For celebrities, they would allow even that", rather than "I did that", and certainly never implied anything without their approval.

When Zucker arrived, Trump—despite his previously stated appreciation of her appearance—certainly did not plant a big wet one on her, much less grab her crotch. He didn't even use the overly-dramatic greeting as recommended. Billy suggested that she hug Donald, which she did. It's pretty anticlimactic. Then they walked into the building and down the hall, with nothing further even slightly objectionable.

Among friends, guys can let it all hang out. "Locker room talk" particularly is crude, politically incorrect, frequently exaggerated, sometimes juvenile, often joking around, and certainly not intended for public consumption. Women do that too among themselves. In mixed company and formal situations, people normally clean up their language.

Several Presidents are pretty well-known for potty-mouth moments: JFK, LBJ, Nixon, and Clinton too. However, the recording was made a decade before Trump entered the Republican campaign. The media digging this up a month before the election was simply "gotcha" politics.

Did Hillary forget something?

The 2016 election's "elephant in the room" was Hillary's husband Bill Clinton. Arkansas State Trooper stories and "bimbo eruptions" were notorious long before the Lewinsky shenanigans. However, other allegations came out during the investigation, for example:

> In the first published account of the alleged incident, the former Clinton campaign worker describes a meeting in his hotel room in which Clinton held her down forcibly on a bed and bit her lips while engaging in sexual intercourse.
>
> After the encounter, she says in Friday's edition of the Journal, Clinton told her not to worry because he was sterile. When she was leaving the room, he looked at her bruised face and, according to Juanita Broaddrick, said: "You better put some ice on that."

Did Hillary know? According to Broaddrick's open letter:

> What did you mean, Hillary? Were you referring to my keeping quiet about the assault I had suffered at the hands of your husband only two weeks before? Were you warning me to continue to keep quiet? We both know the answer to that question.

I could continue excavating the mountain of dirt covering the Clintons and their interesting connections, but we'll leave it with that.

"Tu quoque" right back at you

Hillary has zero credibility and zero room to criticize

Ultimately, it’s pretty disingenuous of the Hilldebeest to respond to the newly-breaking Weinstein stories by deflecting it back onto Trump’s crude but misconstrued statement in a 2005 private conversation.

The softball interview concludes with the media talking head bringing up “White supremacists”. As if on script, immediately Hillary castigates Trump for anti-immigrant rhetoric and appealing to White voters.

> Whatever scapegoat you wanted, whatever prejudice you held, was going to be fed by Donald Trump.

Since the 1960s, the Democrats very openly have courted minorities, while increasing their bloc voters tremendously through population replacement immigration. That’s perfectly fine, but appealing to Whites is super deplorable; the typical leftist double standard. Isn’t it time Cupcake gets over losing the election?

Read More: Trump Presidency Creates Mountains Of Salt From Butthurt Liberals

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Progressives Will Not Stop Until Civilization Is Completely Destroyed

October 22, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

A great deal of people have often commented here asking: "Where does it stop?" In everything from the efforts to stigmatize normal flirting (while ignoring rape from "migrants") to criminalizing the failure to celebrate transgenderism, so many people wonder where does it end. When will this insanity to finally run its course? The answer is…

Never.

Modern "progressives," as the way they style themselves suggests, are obsessed with everything they see as being "new." As Thomas Sowell said over 20 years ago, it's vital to their self-image that they differentiate themselves from the rest of the public, which they view as being hopelessly backward and morally inferior to themselves. Yet, it's actually in this instinct that they reveal themselves as not being "new" at all. The "social justice" peacock of today is nothing more than the latest version of an old zealot that stretches back to Ancient Egypt. This zealot is the revolutionary in the service of the "Year Zero" cause.

What is Year Zero?

The term itself originates from Pol Pot. He borrowed it from the French, who in their revolution declared that the execution of Louis XVI was the event that began Year One on the new, revolutionary calendar. All events prior to that date were irrelevant, not worth preserving, and were to be erased from memory, along with everyone who defended them, or who were merely insufficiently enthusiastic for the new era.

The remains of dead royals were destroyed, the churches were closed and desecrated (which included throwing what was said to be the Crown of Thorns into the gutter), and any defenders of the old order (or simply those suspected of it or connected to it in passing) were sent to the guillotine.

The impetus of a Year Zero revolution is to raze the existing culture to the ground and build a new one from scratch. Any connection to the past, whether in the form of art, law, or people, needs to be erased. Pol Pot was perhaps the most extreme in this. Seemingly anyone at any time was prone to being killed. Even those who wore glasses were in danger of being seen as intellectuals and thus an obstacle to the implementation of Pol Pot's agrarian socialist paradise. Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge killed more people in their country per capita than anyone else.

A Year Zero regime is the fullest measure of totalitarianism. Not even language itself is immune. The use of Orwellian terms has often been mocked here at Return Of Kings, but the art form goes way back. The pioneer of Newspeak was the Pharaoh Akhenaten, who sought to overthrow the ancient religious order in Egypt and replace the familiar gods with his one god, the Aten. Akhenaten closed down the temples and prohibited the worship of the old gods, but this was only the start. Akhenaten of course erased the names of the old gods, but he even went so far as to cross out the plural "gods" on inscriptions all over Egypt. Prominent people would change their own names, usually to reflect solar deities (say, from something like "Wenamon" to "Wenare") to either incur his favor or avoid his displeasure.

Not even the age-old beliefs in the afterlife were immune from the revolution, as the famous death prayers were no longer addressed to lord of the dead, Osiris, but to Akhenaten. A depiction has even been found of the Aten defeating the gods of the underworld. This would have been a stunning and dismaying piece of propaganda for an ancient Egyptian, who would have always been concerned about his eternal life. This was a culture that, more than any other, created entire industries to ensure that people would be able to have a comfortable afterlife.

It's often been said that Communist propaganda was designed to be as demoralizing as possible. The architecture in Soviet-occupied Europe, for example, was stunningly ugly. This is certainly a tendency that's been carried over into our own time, from the celebration of vulgar art, to the celebration of fatness, to the mandated use of "proper pronouns." Yet, as we've seen, none of this is new. It's an age-old technique to enforce submission to the revolution through compulsory amnesia. Nothing about the past can be looked on fondly or even spoken of at all.

And it's certainly no coincidence that both ISIS and the "social justice" peacocks have a penchant for toppling statues. Both are driven by the same instinct in service of whatever their conception of utopia is.

What happens after the revolution?

Unfortunately for the Year Zero zealots, things never go the way they expect. They're usually too busy accusing each other of anti-revolutionary sentiment in a bid for power, or focusing on nonsense. Prioritizing the personal behavior of the population and the imposition of a manufactured (and therefore ugly) culture makes for bad government.

People can only pay attention to one thing at a time, and failure to control your attention will lead you to make the wrong decisions in life. Akhenaten focused so greatly on his revolution that the Hittites sponsored the conquest of Egypt's Asiatic vassals under his watch. The French Directorate was too busy replacing the calendar and accusing each other that they neglected to manage the wars that country got into as a result of the Revolution.

Into this vacuum of chaos usually steps some kind of strongman to lead the reaction against the revolutionaries and restore order. After the chaos of Akhenaten's regime, a general named Horemheb eventually took control of the country, putting down the domestic disorder the revolution caused and restoring order, which included an ironic turn of the tables – he began the erasure of Akhenaten, his heirs, and his regime from memory.

This example would repeat throughout the centuries. Into the disorder after Oliver Cromwell died stepped General George Monck and a restored monarchy in Charles II, who purged Cromwell's cronies and destroyed radical factions like the Fifth Monarchists. Theaters were reopened and other excesses of Cromwell's regime reversed. The populace was overjoyed.

140 years later, Napoleon would lead an armed coup, overthrow the Directory, and end the reign of the Year Zero revolutionaries in France. Though he was no conservative by the standards of his time, Napoleon would go on to restore law and order, the church, the calendar, and other institutions the revolutionaries had sought to overthrow, becoming immensely popular.

These are only a few examples. Because the Year Zero revolutionaries bring such chaos and disorder, they demoralize and anger the population, and because they're extremely violent, little options remain for the disaffected population but to rally to the support of these strongmen. They restore the old order, but certain liberties are often lost in the process. As leftists in our own culture grow more violent and brazen, we would be well served by remembering this pattern.

If the "social justice" peacocks think Donald Trump is some kind of strongman, they might surprise themselves at what comes next, should they continue to act so insufferably – and all evidence says they will.

Read Next: An Introduction To The French Revolution

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

Austria Elects 31-Year-Old Conservative Shitlord As Chancellor

October 22, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Austria's conservative and nationalist parties have thrashed their leftist opposition, securing nearly 32% and 26.5% of votes respectively. The leader of the center-right Austrian People's Party (ÖVP), Sebastian Kurz, is poised to become the youngest European head of government at just 31. He has additionally moved his party away from its recent cucked immigration policies.

Though Austria is a very small country, with ten times less people than Germany, it is hard to recall a more positive electoral victory in West European politics over the last few decades. Only the Brexit vote last year, which was a referendum and not an election, supersedes this event in terms of a strong rejection of national suicide.

The nationalist Freedom Party of Austria (FPÖ), led by Heinz-Christian Strache, is firming as the most likely coalition partner for the ÖVP, having just been pipped into third place by the Social Democratic Party (SPÖ). Prior to this election, the conservatives were in a cringeworthy grand coalition with the SPÖ.

Heinz-Christian Strache.

Perhaps the political classes, especially amongst the conservatives, will betray Austrian voters, but at first glance the election results represent a decisive blow against globalism and the ridiculous immigration policies (read: open borders mayhem) of the 2000s and 2010s.

What is even more heartening is that Austria, despite its putrid leftist parties, has not suffered as much socially as Germany since 2015. Austrian voters have nevertheless looked across the border and realized the importance of never ever going down the path of Angela Merkel's mental asylum.

Moreover, the contemporary paralysis experienced by Germans over Nazism and the Second World War ("We have to let in millions of people we don't know because Hitler!") is much smaller in Austria. Yes, surprise, surprise, a group of German speakers feels less of a need to ruin their country over things they had nothing to do with 70-90 years ago.

Austria nearly had its first nationalist President last year

Within a whisker: Norbert Hofer was close to becoming Austria's first nationalist President of modern times.

Heinz-Christian Strache's protégé, Norbert Hofer, won the first round of the Austrian Presidential election last year. In two second rounds (the first of which was annulled), he nearly achieved a majority. What stopped him? Well, not only the usual mainstream media bias, but also a concerted effort by European elites of all persuasions (or perversions, take your pick) to associate Hofer and the FPÖ with Nazis and Hitler.

When the party was led by the late Jörg Haider and entered into a coalition agreement with the Austrian People's Party, countless European politicians and officials boycotted the Austrian government at functions. The threat of this happening again lingered over the Austrian Presidential vote last year and, to his credit, Norbert Hofer demonstrated the incredible potential of a nationalist party like the FPÖ in weathering the storms of political correctness.

Parliamentary democracy is a different beast to choosing a head of state, but the FPÖ has built on its immense success in 2016, a year in which neither the conservatives nor the socialists made the second round of the presidential election.

You can tell a lot by a politician's wife or girlfriend

Sebastian Kurz's girlfriend and the wife of Heinz-Christian Strache.

On a final note, the girlfriend of Sebastian Kurz and the wife of Heinz-Christian Strache tell you a lot about these two men. When it comes to leftwing men and vacillating "conservatives," we always expect a frumpy matron or, at best, a reasonably pretty wife bought with the male politician's trust fund or stale social connections.

It's nice to see that a definitely masculine man like Strache and a hopefully masculine man like Kurz have opted for women who fit the emphasis at Return Of Kings on female beauty and fertility.

Perhaps Europe stands a chance after all.

Read More: Today Is The Final Vote Of The 2017 French Presidential Election

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Most Popular Diets People Use To Lose Weight

October 22, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Weight loss is a very important topic to not only America, but the West as well. And why shouldn't it be—people are fucking fat! You know that, I know that, everybody knows that people in the developed world (and increasingly the developing world as well) are getting way too big for their britches.

Directly proportional to the increase in girth of the average Joe has been the proliferation of diet plans, workout plans, and various gimmickry that are all marketed as sure-fire methods to lose weight easily—"easily" meaning without strenuous exercise, deliberately planned dieting, or really any effort on the part of the fatbody using the plan, who is likely slothful in addition to gluttonous.

But how effective are these diets? To answer that, and to answer the question of "what diet is the most effective to lose weight", we must briefly educate ourselves on nutrition, and then take a closer look at a few of the popular diets that are out there nowadays and judge whether or not they are effective.

Low Carb Diets

Low carb diets incorporate things like the paleo diet, ketogenic diet, and the Atkins diet. These are diets that attempt to force the body to utilize its stored body fat by minimizing the amount of carbohydrates eaten—after all the fastest way to put on fat is to eat an excess of calories, and carbohydrates are a quicker caloric fix than anything else. And there is some truth to these diets—studies have shown that these diets will get the fastest results in weight loss in the immediate sense.

However, various types of low carb diets can cause problems depending on the individual. Those who choose the Atkins diet (which states that all carbohydrates should be minimized, including complex carbohydrates like fruits and vegetables, while proteins and fats should be maximized) report adverse effects such as headache, dizziness, and constipation. Indeed, the original diet plan has been modified to include more vegetables, provided they are low in carbohydrates.

From my own personal experience, the paleo diet works wonders for weight loss—and regularity of bowel movements—but it has one major disadvantage: it's expensive as hell!

And indeed, studies have shown that in the first year, low carb diets are the most effective, but…

Vegan Diets

Let us put aside our nigh-universal distaste for the stereotypical smug, preachy vegan, and look at their diet from an objective standpoint. Vegans, of course, eat absolutely no products that are sourced from animals in any way, including honey.

Truth be told, when carefully planned and supplemented, veganism can be just as healthful as a regular diet, although it doesn't give you the superior health many of its adherents claim.

However, when not planned properly, vegans are more prone to being deficient in certain types of nutrients, and that's not getting into the fact that a diet consisting entirely of junk food can be technically vegan (in the sense of being made with no animal involvement), and thus lead to the somewhat paradoxical phenomenon of fat vegans.

Despite the fact that the vegan diet is in many ways wrong, and indeed some anthropologists feel that eating animal products enabled man to become the apex predator he is, I do feel people could stand to eat more vegetables, especially in the West.

The Raw Food Diet

This encompasses many diets: there are raw vegans, raw omnivores, and raw carnivores, all sharing in common the belief that the overwhelming majority of a diet should be uncooked, unprocessed foods.

And there is a grain of truth to this: cooking will often lead to fat and water soluble vitamins being lost from the food, which explains the omnipresence of soups, stews, and broths throughout the cultures of the world as a method to retain said vitamins and minerals.

But then you'll get into the fruitier concepts of this diet, namely that food has "enzymes" that are destroyed when food is cooked. While nobody sane doubts that enzymes exist, the belief of raw foodists that the "food enzymes" are more beneficial than our own digestive enzymes has not been scientifically proven.

The problem with this is that many, many raw foods are harmful to people, including milk, eggs, various types of greens, and potatoes and other root vegetables, to name just a few. Cooking evolved for a very good reason, after all.

So which diet is best?

From my experience, the best diet to lose weight is whatever diet involves you consuming less calories than you burn, which can be any of the above diets, or just eating a standard balanced omnivorous diet. Just in the past few months, reducing my calories and exercising more (facilitated by me becoming a personal trainer and leaving my desk job) has enabled me to drop 30 pounds, without any great amount of planning or change of macronutrient quality.

Me at a pudgy 215

And me at a leaner 185

Granted, it would be better to eat a high protein/fat diet than the inverse, since that diet will ensure proper muscle, nervous system, and (likely) bone strength than the soy-based flotsam most people eat today, but if weight loss is your goal, that diet won't help you if you eat a surplus of calories.

So, I'm sorry to disappoint anybody who wants an easy solution, but if you want to lose weight and get muscularly defined, you're going to have to reduce your total caloric intake, and increase your exercising, particularly heavy resistance training.

Read More: The Downfall Of Every Diet

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Self-Hating White Mom Surprised To Find Out Her Daughter Hates Being White

October 23, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Globe & Mail author Tama Ward has recently shared an article revealing how her five-year-old Canadian daughter Abigail feels guilt and shame for being white.

> At breakfast, in the glass-towered city of Vancouver, five-year-old Abigail looks glumly at her half-eaten bowl of cereal.
>
> "What is it, honey?" I brush the bangs back from her face.
>
> She lets out a big sigh. "I wish I wasn't white."
>
> I start. Nothing in the parenting manuals has prepared me for that.
>
> "All we've ever done is hurt people," she continues. "I wish my skin was dark and that I had a culture."

How could a young child have such an acute awareness of her race? It's not hard when she has a social justice mother who has brainwashed her into loving anything and anyone non-white.

> We live in a part of the city where immigrant families abound. Our neighbours are homesick, first-generation Mexicans, which means that salsas and pinatas and Aztec legends feature prominently at shared social gatherings. Our family regularly eats in Little India where we gush over the flavours of curry and dhal, and every February, we attend the Chinese New Year parade in the slanting rain. Plus, my husband and I are children of missionaries and harbour an acute guilt for the cultural imperialism of our forebears. To compensate, we've raised our children with a deep appreciation of non-Western cultures.

> So when Abigail laments the colour of her white skin, part of me is programmed to protest. Is it not my moral obligation to tell her that her feelings of poor self-worth are nothing compared with the psychological ruin of real racism? Girl, everything about Canadian culture weighs in your advantage and you have no right to snivel!
>
> Instead, I feel a sadness settle over me. We thought we were raising the enlightened child of the 21st century. We thought we were doing our part in setting the history record straight. Yet, in doing so, it seems we have robbed our oldest child of something primal to psychological health, something elemental to her well-being as a human being: cultural roots.
>
> I don't know what to say.

The mother Tama Ward

Do you really believe her "sadness"? If she truly was sad, she would attempt to right the wrong and teach her daughter to be proud of who she is, but she does nothing of the sort. Instead, she continues to program her with revisionist history.

> I consider the you-are-Canadian spiel: "part of a new society made up of the vibrancy of many cultures, etc." Yet, "Canadian" is precisely the problem. What is Canadian? Her best friend is Canadian and Mexican. Her cousin, Canadian and Bengali. Even our Indigenous neighbours have a First Nation before they have Canada. To play the Canadian card will further neuter her culturally when what she's looking for are deep roots that ground her to a people and place.

The truth is that her article is a way to compete with other liberal moms: "See how much my daughter hates whitey? Your daughter is more likely to be a racist than mine!" This is nothing short of emotional abuse for the child, and I'm sure Canadian psychologists are salivating at the prospect of dealing with the intense identity issues that Abigail and her peers will certainly have when they get older, as Leonard D Neubache from the forum points out:

> It's actually pretty sad imagining what it's like for this kid.
>
> Mum hates white people.
> I'm white.
> Mum hates me.
>
> "I wish I wasn't white", is the kid saying, "I wish I was someone you could actually love."

Another way that self-hating mothers are harming their children is by taking them directly to transsexuals for disturbing reading events called Drag Queen Story Hour. One event featured a tranny dressed up as Baphomet, a popular symbol among Satanic worshippers.

Liberal moms in the back, enjoying the show while drinking Starbucks

This child will not grow up healthy

Parents who bring their children to this freak should get a visit from social services

If you're a tranny child molester who happens to be reading this article right now, Drag Queen Story Hour is a great program for you to be in direct contact with potential victims. I have no doubt that we will soon see cases where parents turn a blind eye to their children's molestation to "destigmatize" pedophilia, which is actively being normalized. We also can't forget to mention mothers subjecting their children, usually sons, to hormone therapy to change their sex, sharply increasing their risk of suicide.

With single motherhood on the rise, we may see no limit to what liberal mothers subject their children to in order to announce to the world that they are the most virtuous social justice warrior on the block. It's too bad that they have ruin the lives of defenseless human lives in the process.

Read Next: Brad Pitt And Angelina Jolie's Daughter Is A Sad Casualty Of Disastrous Liberal Parenting

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Stop Trying To “Find” A Wife

October 23, 2017 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

I have a rule at Asshole Consulting. If I get a unique question, it’s a statistical oddity. If I get it again, it’s a coincidence. But if I get it a third time, it’s a trend that demands attention as there are likely many more men with the same question. And the question of:

“How do I find a wife?” or “How do I meet a quality girl?”

This has come up multiple times now, thereby necessitating a discussion about it. First realize that there’s more to this topic than you think. For it’s not just about “finding a quality wife,” but avoiding a huge and costly mistake most men make. So costly, in fact, it can ruin your life and avoiding this mistake is likely more important than finding a quality wife in itself.

Stoicism, Economics, and Mortality

First, understand there is no definitive answer on how to find a marriageable or long-term quality girl in life. There is no store that sells them. They are not hanging out at some venue we’ve yet to discover. There is no strategy some PUA or red-pill seminarian has concocted that “for just $99.95 you too can learn this strategy at Slicky McSlickerson’s ‘How to Find a Wife Seminar!’“. I met my current 10-year-plus girlfriend teaching a dance class. Another couple I know met through friends. A third were set up by their parents. There is no correlation, trend, relationship, or other statistical corollary behind finding a spouse, so stop trying to look for a science where there is none to be found.

Since there is no science behind this problem, realize the nature of the problem changes. Because if there's nothing you can tangibly "do" to find a wife, no strategy you can employ, how precisely are you supposed to find one? This presents a paradox because any attempt to "go about finding one" is an attempt to "tangibly do something" and therefore won't work. And, therefore, as is with many problems in life, the solution does not lay within directly addressing, tackling, and solving the problem (as men are prone to do), but changing your perception of the problem, changing your understanding of the problem, and actually changing yourself in order to solve it. It is ultimately a lesson in stoicism that reminds us we only control ourselves and not others.

But there is another important lesson to learn when it comes to the pursuit of a life-long partner. And that is one of economics and mortality.

My friend and I often joked in our 30's that had we not wasted time chasing girls in our 20's, and instead invested it into more profitable ventures we'd have a lot more to show for it, beyond notch counts and the painassery it took us to get them. I could have had my doctorate. My buddy would have had a house paid off (arguably two). Our bank accounts would certainly be more flush with cash. And that says nothing of the decades of headache we would have spared ourselves.

These economic opportunity costs are huge. Most men, if they invested their time into themselves instead of women, would easily boost their lifetime earnings by over $1 million. We could easily retire at 40. Most of us would have no mortgage, car loans, or student loans. Not to mention the mental serenity, peace, and calm that comes with such a life. But there are also other opportunity costs in the quality of life when you put wife-hunting ahead of your own life. You forfeit adventure, hobbies, traveling, intellectualism, philosophy, reading, entrepreneurship—a nearly limitless number of things you could have pursued, enjoyed, even mastered—making your life a genuinely interesting one, had you not wasted your time on bars, nightclubs, or Tinder.

“But What About The Women?”

The problem this presents, however, is that if you're spending your time hiking, biking, writing, swimming, studying, and pursuing a career, how are you exactly going to find a wife? Not that going clubbing or hitting girls up on Tinder was with the aim of finding a girlfriend, nor is there anything wrong with going out with the sole intention to bang. But don't you have to pursue women at some point on some level to find a life-partner?

No.

And the reason is because living your own life is precisely what will attract women towards you, whether you intend to get married or not.

This is the biggest problem my wife-inclined and girlfriend-inclined clients fail to understand. Horse-blinded by logic (and admittedly, most of these guys are nerd STEM majors who have formulaic minds), most men will think pursuing women, putting the time and effort into approaching them, chatting them up on social media, and running various sorts of game is how you get and attract women. These things certainly don't hurt, but you do so at a great disadvantage because what exactly do you offer them?

If you're an accomplished 38 year old engineer who likes to go mountain climbing, spends his time at the gym, is well read on philosophy, and has traveled to Nepal, you offer a girl much more than your 18 year old contemporary who has no hobbies, interests, accomplishments, or experience in life. I liken it to being an older computer hard drive with a ton of interesting video games, programs, and apps on it, versus a brand new laptop with a blank hard drive. No girl is going to want to play with a computer with a blank hard drive. She's always going to choose the hard drive with actual programs on it. And so it is the job of every young man to put interesting things on their hard drives.

But there's even more at stake here than failing to attract a wife if you don't season yourself to be an interesting and accomplished man – the risk you'll waste your life.

Always Look Out for #1

The truth of the matter is you're going to die. You get one, short, finite life on this planet, and you better make it count. And while there's nothing wrong with going to a party, getting drunk, and chasing the occasional skirt, when you make the pursuit of women your #1 priority in life, you do so at the expense of your life.

All those weekends you went out partying? You could have learned to work on cars.

All those days you spent helping a girl with her homework and you were friendzoned? Could have boosted your own GPA and got a better job.

And the limitless hours you sang and danced like a monkey in a cage to impress a girls at bars? You could have improved your mind reading philosophy.

And so instead of ending up like the World's Most Interesting Man at the age of 55, you are your typical, obese, divorced, bald 55 year old man joining a Christian singles group to meet some other equally vapid female equivalent.

Live your life on your terms, pursuing the dreams you desire. If you want to climb Mt. McKinley, go climb Mt. McKinley. If you want go motorcycle across the country, go motorcycle across the country. And if you just want to stay home and read instead of going to the club, by all means stay home and read. Besides, there may be a lot of girls at the club, but there's even more in living your life.

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

Playing In The Rain

October 23, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On a cloudy summer day, a friend and I went to a cafe. A light rain started not long after we received our drinks, forcing people to hurry from the outdoors to shelter. After talking with my friend for some time, on topics ranging from meeting girls at night to what World War 3 would look like, I noticed a little girl outside in the rain, looking straight up into the sky, eyes squinted just enough to shield the rain drops.

My first instinct was to sense that she was in danger. “Is she alone? Where are her parents?” I looked around and found a couple sitting two tables from me watching her closely. The girl ran to them with a big smile, her face wet. Her mom fixed her jacket and let her run back into the rain. She spread her arms out wide and skipped along from one side of the outdoor courtyard to the other, her hair getting wet.

“Look at the girl,” I said to my friend. “Everyone is running away from the rain but she’s running towards it.”

Whenever I see a little child approaching a rain puddle, I pause to watch. Almost always, the child attacks the puddle, jumping directly into its center to make the biggest splash. Then I wait for the inevitable scolding. “Don’t do that! You’ll get wet!” Already, the child is being socialized to act like an adult. Its playful instincts, weeded out.

Did my parents attempt to socialize me? I don’t remember them giving me a list of dos and donts. They didn’t tell me what was acceptable or not. When I wanted to play as an adult, jumping into puddles of words, I got a lot of people wet.

The little girl outside the cafe did not get bored with the rain. For half an hour, she twirled and danced, jumped and smiled. She couldn’t have been older than three, well before the age she enters school, when teachers and classmates give her their list of dos and donts to sculpt her and take away a simple joy of something as mundane as rain. “You’ll get wet! Come inside! It’s dirty!” Something she used to love will become something she hates and runs from.

Are we so far gone that we can’t enjoy the rain? Did society take us into its clutches, socialize us, iron us out, and hand us a constructed list of what is acceptable and what is not?

One month later, I was at a restaurant alone eating a burger and fries. A heavy storm began. Customers who came inside shook the water off their clothing before ordering at the counter. I took my time, hoping the storm would pass by the time I finished eating, but it was still coming down strong when I walked out the door. The rain was cold. I instinctively hunched over and lowered my head, like anyone else would, but then I told myself to relax. I loosened my shoulders and looked straight ahead.

I began the one-mile walk to my home, as slowly as I could manage. The first few minutes were chilly until my body adjusted to the temperature of the water. I watched other people, hunched over, defenseless without an umbrella, racing towards shelter. I walked by awnings with people in various stages of wetness, waiting for the rain to soften. I walked by taxi cabs with drivers waiting for a wet fare. I walked by other men who seemingly didn't mind the rain, but whose bent, stiff necks betrayed their indifference, their pace a tick too fast.

Many people looked at me intently, a concentrated look. They seemed to ask, "What is he doing?" I recognized the look because it was the same one I gave to the little girl, a bewilderment, maybe even confusion, that someone is not doing what you would do, what you're supposed to do.

I didn't take it far. I didn't twirl or dance, I didn't smile. Something a child does every day can be interpreted as insane when done by an adult, though I'm not sure if that says more about the child or the adult.

I was fully soaked by the time I turned on an empty street. Not a soul around. I closed my eyes to hear and feel the rain, and I started to smile, and for the next five seconds I can say I experienced pure joy, something the little girl must've felt continuously for nearly an hour. It ended when a thought entered my mind that my phone may be getting wet. I dropped the smile and opened my eyes.

In the last stretch to my front door, I had to pass a lively pub, still at my slow pace. A dozen drinkers were congregating out front, smoking under an awning. They stared at me sternly. The alcohol allowed them to give a response that others had thought but not shown. "This guy is weird." I felt self-conscious and quickened my pace home.

Twenty five years from now, there will be a heavy rain. A young woman will be caught in it without an umbrella. She will lower her head, tighten her shoulders, and seek shelter. Waiting for the rain to stop, shivering from the cold, she will see an old man, water dripping from his white beard, his eyes closed, smiling at nothing. He's a crazy old man, she'll think, but then her mind flashes with a memory of when she was a little child. She looks up into the sky.

This article was originally published On Roosh V.

Read Next: Billions Of Egos Dance For Your Attention

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The #MeToo Campaign Compares Not Replying To A Girl's Texts With Raping Her

October 24, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

If our readers have paid attention to their social media feeds over the last week or so, many of them will have noticed countless virtue signals from the #MeToo campaign. A male feminist spinoff of this putrid witch-hunt, #IHave, is now comparing not responding to a girl's text messages to abusing her sexually. Apparently "rape culture," which is about as fictional as that giant annoying dog from The Neverending Story, is perpetuated by men not writing back to girls after they've had sex with them. Not texting a reply to her leads to rape, remember!

What we are witnessing is the realization by feminists and others that actual rape is at an all-time low. Still, people, SJWs most of all, need their boogeymen and scapegoats. Consequently, behaviors women themselves engage in (flaking, ignoring SMS invitations from interested males, etc.) are presently being equated with promoting rape when it is men who are performing them. "Ghosting," an unspoken refusal to communicate with someone, is evidently such an affront to women that it has been included in the "rape culture" lexicon.

Of course, a perennial topic of game, including by Roosh in Bang, is dealing with girls who flake on dates, don't text back, or fail to pick up the phone. If only Roosh's readers and readers of Return Of Kings could accuse a woman of furthering "rape culture" every time she doesn't respond to them! We could resolve common female antics almost overnight if that were the case.

Yes, this is real

Sweet Jesus. It's hard to see how these girls are at risk of rape every day.

The virtue signals being offered by men at the moment may differ from one another somewhat, but this is the general sort of thing being plastered on Facebook and other social media platforms [the emphasis is mine]:

> #Ihave
> I have assumed she knew we were just "hooking up" on a regular basis with no strings attached.
> I have stared way too long, not caring if she catches me checking her out.
> I have gone ahead with sex without having the time or inner sensing to see if that is what I actually wanted.
> I have ghosted someone after hooking up a few times.
> I have assumed consent once is consent always.
> I've used intoxication as an excuse for "coming on strong."
> I have emotionally hurt women I've cared about through sex.
> I have leaned heavily on the emotional labor of woman to teach me how to be a better man to them.
> I have tolerated "locker room talk."
> I have tolerated cat-calling by my friends.
> I have wielded my "power-over" in many ways to get what I want.
> I'm not a bad man, I'm waking up within a rape culture and learning everyday what it means to feed life instead of stealing it. I'm not posting this as a confession or in an effort to absolve my sins, but to give examples of how I've > learned that I have contributed to rape culture in order to encourage other men to do the same.

> #itwasme #ibelieveyou
> – Copy/paste if you have ever contributed to harassment and rape culture or failed to confront or prevent it (modify as appropriate). Don't leave it up to the women, gender non-conforming folks, and smaller number of men who have suffered sexual harassment, sexual assault and rape, to address a problem they didn't cause.
> (Note to other men: Please do not leave comments praising me for posting this. The focus is on survivors, not heaping unearned praise on men who had to hurt people to learn how to be decent humans. Feel free to share your own stories/apologies though.)

Let's take a look at some of these points.

I have assumed she knew we were just "hooking up" on a regular basis with no strings attached.

What do women expect? With girls racking up historically high notch counts, the majority of relationships are not really relationships. In fact, as Return Of Kings has stated a number of times before, men are the real romantics, which is usually to their detriment. Most, if not all ambiguity about the nature of sexual relationships (random fuck or "I'm going to marry him") would be removed if women valued their virginity and near-virginity more.

In the context of pathetic male apologies for "advancing rape culture," #IHave recklessly throws consensual sex with a woman into the same basket as sexually abusing her. With so few examples going around of men beating girls in the head and forcibly penetrating them, a woman voluntarily entering a bed with you will now suffice as sexual assault if you do not later requite her feelings and pursue a long-term relationship with her.

I have stared way too long, not caring if she catches me checking her out.

Yes, because women dressed and behaving like the girl below, constituting an ever growing number amongst the fairer sex, are not trying to court any attention whatsoever. Worse still, they are obviously deeply traumatized when such attention comes their way:

I have ghosted someone after hooking up a few times.

a) Because he's a rapist. b) Because he's a rapist. c) Because he's a rapist. d) Because he's a rapist.

Incidentally, this is the tactic actress Charlize Theron is said to have used on Sean Penn when she dumped him. Before I heard about this, I knew what "ghosting" was in basic terms, but had never come across the word itself. Given the sad state of male thirst in today's world, plus the time-honored, hardwired female practice of hypergamy, it's a safe bet that women utilize this a lot more than men.

I have emotionally hurt women I've cared about through sex.

Remember, this is the age of the snowflake and subjectivity, not facts, are king. Ivy League students, touting themselves as the cream of the crop, have meltdowns over Halloween costumes. So God knows what can happen when a man rejects a woman he has had sex with or simply does not do what she wants in any relationship.

Western society is beset with a divorce rate above 50% and most women have many sexual partners before marriage. As a result, are we to believe that it is ever possible for a woman with a notch count of, say, ten men to have not been emotionally "hurt" multiple times by a sexual partner? And this says absolutely nothing about whether the feelings she has are rational or justifiable, let alone whether they should be mentioned alongside a crime like sexual assault or rape.

Are you ready for the total conflation of hurt female feelings and "rape"?

Well, let's be honest. We have been approaching this outcome for a long while. Right now, however, the rot is accelerating beyond belief. The floodgates have well and truly opened with the downfall of Harvey Weinstein. Any slight a woman has suffered at the hands of a man (or concocted in her own mind) can be conveniently subsumed under a hashtag like #MeToo. No evidence is needed, only a Facebook or other social media post.

We should give the leftists credit—they have done a spectacular job in redirecting the focus onto the vague, otherwise easily disprovable idea of "rape culture" and away from the hypocrisy of liberal Hollywood. Likewise, the collapsing of real crimes like rape onto normal male behavior or, at worst, bad manners is steadily ensuring that the definition of sexual abuse is whatever hurts a woman's feelings.

Got your sex consent forms ready yet, gentlemen?

Read More: Orally Raping A Man Won't Get You Indicted In America

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Russia Is Not As Good For Men As You Think

October 24, 2017 | by Andrew Sobolewski | Link | Original Link

There is an interesting tendency that I personally see every day: many of my North American red pill colleagues and friends consider Russia as a symbol of masculinity, patriarchy, and resistance to globalism and emancipation. Such points of view always put me, a person who was born and raised in Moscow, in a cognitive dissonance, because even though you won't see gay parades and blue-haired transsexual freaks in Russia like in Canada, my country of residence, you will definitely be surprised that's it not that favorable for a masculine man. In fact, Russia is one of the worst places for men.

As predictable, it all started with communism. Once the Russian Empire was usurped by Western-backed communist forces, they implemented propaganda of "Dekulakization". Basically, they brainwashed the entire lower "disadvantaged" class into destroying the rich "kulak" farmers, who were defamed as "responsible" for any economic, political, and demographic injustice in the early days of the Soviet Union.

Destroy kulak as a class!

“The rich privilege” termination was more than successful: the kulaks, the most powerful and influential men, being the foundation for one of the greatest empires, were savagely pulverized except those who managed to flee the Soviet Union. In addition to seizing the means of production and slaughtering more than 20 million of their own, communism nullified the institution of traditional patriarchal family. Bolsheviks simply introduced a new set of laws prioritizing females over males and constantly persecuted the Orthodox Church, a main institution of traditional values.

This achieved the concealed enslavement of men present and future. Fathers were legally prohibited from being actual chiefs for their families. So any vital decisions for the fate of younger family members ended up in hands of anybody—their mothers, teacher, the Komsomol, but never fathers.

Government was gaining control over the future brainwashed male population by using the empowerment of women as a tool, protected at all levels from a man’s influence or being a part of traditional family. They did this by creating the Cult of Mother, sponsoring abortions, and allowing women in government positions while pushing them into becoming astronauts, pilots, and metallurgists.

Long live the Soviet women’s equality!

Down with the “Kitchen Slavery”!

A weak man has only one type of relationship: being suppressed by a dominant woman and, provided he somehow receives limited sex, granting her one or two children for her disposal to be raised as her servants. This vicious cycle repeated generation after a generation in the Soviet Union.

That’s why the USSR was relatively strong and advanced for a few decades until its male population became totally weak, culminating with its collapse in 1991. Finita la commedia. The country was left in ruin.

Was it a global conspiracy or a simple mistake? It can take volumes to answer this question, but the funniest thing is that legislation has barely changed since 1991, despite the capitalism and government changes that followed after perestroika. Let's look at some examples of blatant, yet surviving and imposed anti-male legislation.

Progeny

Our constitution is still compromised when it comes to fatherhood. A man is legally separated from his children in case of divorce. He has no right to decide whether child lives or get murdered by abortion, but if man ducks alimony he will be screwed really hard by law enforcement. Russia has the same shit as in Western Societies, except abortions are even more prevalent. The official total number of abortions per year is around 700,000. The "unofficial" one can be up to few million.

Health care

The State Duma of Russian Federation (legislation) allocates huge funds for female programs, female health, and motherhood support. When it comes for fatherhood and male health, the allocation is absolute zero. Meanwhile, cardio-vascular disease and cancer statistically affects more men than women (the life duration of an average man is 17 years less than average woman's).

Equality before the law

In modern Russia, women get 3-4 times less prison sentences than men for the same crimes. Moreover, we have a lot of amnesties extra derogations for women as defined by the Criminal Code. It can be surprising for you, but the majority of judges are women. As you know, women have a natural tendency to ally against men.

Mandatory draft

The real men serve their country!

At 18 years of age, every man is on the hook for military service. He is deprived of almost every civil freedom and right. The horrors of Russian draft army are known to everyone. Since antiquity, is has been known that the best army can only be made out of professionals, with slaves being the worst soldiers. That's why Russia was totally screwed in Afghanistan when they had sent male teenagers to fight against well-armed and trained Muslim militants.

Pension

The age of government retirement is 55 for women and 60 for men, but the average lifespan of men is only 58 (it's 72 for women). In practice, a woman is likely to enjoy pension benefits for about 17 years longer than a man. Would a country that cares about men have such a policy?

So, my comrades, if you are currently banging Svetlana and planning to get settled in Russia, you might wanna think twice. If things go wrong with her, or you have trouble finding employment, you'll be more screwed in Russia than in the West.

Read More: Why Vladimir Putin Is Russia's Proto-Tsar

Andrew Sobolewski
A Millennial Standing for Patriarchal Values

Today’s Conservative Has Become Yesterday’s Liberal

October 24, 2017 | by Bruno Buscaroli | Link | Original Link

With Donald Trump as president of the United States, it would seem as though traditional beliefs are making a comeback in the West. However, one only needs talk to the average ‘’conservative’’ for a while to realize they’re not as conservative as they think they are. Rather, they’ve accepted and integrated many leftist beliefs into their own worldview. They’ve become nothing more than yesterday’s liberals, and now defend ideas against which their predecessors used to fight. Let’s briefly look at a few examples:

Homosexuality

He’s cool with them

The very idea of homosexuality used to be socially abhorrent during the early 20th century in the West. If you look at conservative politicians now, however, you’ll find they’re pretty okay with having gays around. We’ve reached a point where modern Western culture has become universally acceptant of homosexuals.

Donald Trump, for instance, ensured he’d do everything in his power to protect LGBTQ citizens from hateful ideologies (might have earned him more voters, but you get the point). Even allowing gays to get married is accepted among conservatives nowadays, and suggesting that it might be a bad idea gets you funny looks at best.

Women in the workplace

Encouraging women to study and pursue long term careers damages the family structure by discouraging traditional gender roles. If women are busy working, they can't focus on being good wives and mothers. Not only that, but it may even cause them to forgo marriage and kids completely.

Despite this, you'll find almost no one on the mainstream right suggesting women should focus on the home. They believe that doing so would ''invite misogyny and sexism'' or get them compared to ''crazy far righters''. Denial of biological truths does society no favors. The longer the average citizen believes men and women to have the same roles in a family, the more damage will be done.

Sexual marketplace

Regulation of the sexual marketplace in the form of marriage and female chastity has long been central to the formation of healthy families in western societies. Without a strong and stable family unit, maintaining civilization becomes impossible. Since promiscuity is the opposite of chastity and monogamy, it naturally runs against family stability.

Characters like James Bond are looked up to as symbols of masculinity and role models for traditional men. While men should aspire to emulate his strong nature and character, emulating his love of casual sex is damaging to society in the long run. Sure, quick and easy sex can be real fun, but let's not forget sexual liberation is inherently leftist and has done nothing but damage civilization.

Denying the importance of race

Often seen as the most taboo of subjects, race gets ignored as much as possible by the mainstream right wing. Science tells us that human ethnic groups have genetic differences, ranging from physical strength to IQ levels. But to even speak about those differences in public is to invite an endless parade of comparisons to Hitler, so conservatives dodge the issue.

Instead, they often preach about civic nationalism, the idea of a nation being more based on its identity than it's ethnicity. They say that as long as immigrants accept American values of Democracy and hard work, their ethnicity doesn't matter. Sounds nice in theory, but a nation can't survive once it's demographic has been replaced.

You can't win by defending alone

Conservatives nowadays don't seem to know what it is they're conserving. Their claims of standing for a traditional society feel empty when they also advocate for gender and marriage equality. As the culture war against leftists progressed, they slowly lost ground on almost every front. And as their image became demonized by the media, they conceded even further to try and appeal a bit more to the masses. After all, if the general public is okay with two men marrying, it'd make them the bad guys to say there's something wrong with that.

Fear of being stigmatized makes them unable to push back, so they inevitably become weaker as time goes on. Even worse, the children of conservatives who were born into a watered down version of it don't even realize it. A cycle forms then, in which the next generation is always more liberal than the next.

Mainstream Conservatives cannot reverse civilization's decay, only delay it. Movements like Neo-Masculinity, the Alt Right and Alt Christianity lack the presence and member count of Conservatives, but are all better alternatives. Unlike the mainstream right, the dissident right isn't afraid to push back against leftist narrative. One cannot win by defending alone. No matter how strong a castle's walls, the stones that form it will crumble if it's attackers aren't stopped.

Conservatives are already thinking in the right direction, but haven't fully taken the red pill. If the West is to survive, it's imperative that we help these people fully wake up. They're halfway there already, so hopefully they just need a few more nudges.

Read More: Are You A Traditional Conservative But Don't Realize It?

Bruno Buscaroli

Bruno is a young man who used to dismiss red pillers as alarmists. Then he spent a semester in a college campus and became one himself. Now he educates himself through the internet and a library card.

How The Sexual Inquisition Against Men Started

October 25, 2017 | by Christopher Leonid | Link | Original Link

The British press have raised a slughorne to the manosphere:

> Why do so many false rape accusations come to court?

A proper explanation requires us to butcher the most sacred among sacred cows: female sexual liberation.

The 'Respectable Slut' Paradox

As an ecological event, the Sexual Revolution is unprecedented. Quick credit, contraception, and computer networking have handed western girls completely unobstructed and commitment-free access to the sexual marketplace. The 'customer is always right' dynamic means that anyone who opposes or questions a girl's judgment while she is in her nubile prime is treated with scorn, so the entire West has gaslighted itself into the assumption that the female sexual whim is infallible.

Women have stolen nature's mandate for a 1:1 relationship between sex and commitment and now marry the men they need only when they can no longer get the men they want.

Feminist marriage advice

But the female quest to play God can only work so long as men are prepared to submit to their zoning by women into sheepfolds of 'sexy bad-boy' material and 'stable husband' material, overlooking the retro-active cuckoldry that threatens their future marriages. Today, as men increasingly opt out of marriage, feminism is attempting to protect the women who invested their bodies into the cartel by doubling down ever more forcefully on rationales which shift accountability for their sexual behavior to men.

'Men only think about one thing… Girls have to be so careful these days!'

Enforcement of the Sexual Command Economy

Society covertly sets its gold standard of feminine rightness with conventions, clichés, and pocketbook pathologies that overwhelmingly describe masculine wrongness. Did the vast spectrum of ‘autism’ exist before the attempt was made to frame empathy as more correct than rationality? Did the ‘Madonna Whore’ complex exist before men were expected to comply with their female sexual categorisation? Did party-girls dismiss stable men as ‘sweet’ or ‘creepy’ at 20 then whisper of ‘closet homosexuality’ or ‘fear of women’ when they refused to step up and marry at 30? Does a female creep even exist?

Type ‘narcissist’ into a Google image search. Are you confronted with advertisements for treatment and help centers, or with a slew of easy access vindication memes for single moms and jilted women? These ideas tell us much more about those who casually apply them than those to whom they are applied. None of this rubbish existed before women expected to have their cake and eat it (which reminds me – neither did fat acceptance).

Thus, man is chivvied into compliance with the emancipation from nature that woman first sought for herself – and men are complicit in this every time they ‘make an honest woman’ of a slut or project shame to their brother with the ‘guess you just can’t get laid’ rhetoric.

Adam, the first White Knight, refused to put his foot down with a rebellious woman. Nothing has changed in the basic pattern of male failure since.

Female State Power

Where culture goes, law follows. The crime of male insubordination to the female whim does not appear on statute books, but we can know it exists just as we can know an invisible celestial object exists by the movement of other celestial objects around it. Whether he’s an ex-husband, lover ,or someone she saw across the street, a man who fails to step up on cue and commit intimacy or resources to the value that a woman ascribes to her own sexual intimacy can now be prosecuted under other civil and criminal charges which are defined in law.

Joseph rejected the advances Potiphar's wife. She then accused him of rape.

The only problematic challenge is how to use a law which technically has not been broken to convict for a crime that technically does not exist.

The Cathartic Prosecution Service

It is impossible to say whether rapes outnumber false accusations (no specific crime of making a false accusation exists in the UK), but, by redefining rape in the broadest possible terms and false accusation in the narrowest, feminism has developed a theory of Rape Culture.

Like all good conspiracy theories, the fact that hardly any of the survivor hashtags, self identified victims in anonymous college campus surveys, and #metoo style claims actually come to court is taken as yet more proof of the depth of society's problem.

> Victims of rape trust Twitter more than they trust the police! – feminist queef

No – liars trust Twitter more than they trust the police.

Feminist myth vs feminist reality

But the incantations of survivors presents too good an opportunity for the openly politicised Crown Prosecution Service to pass up and, rising year on year, a staggering fifth of their cases are now based on allegations of sexual violence. Not a week passes without another man being paraded through the press for a perfidious accusation and, even when acquitted in court, his negative publicity remains a sentence in itself.

The genius of this inquisition is that it fulfills feminism's covert purpose of frightening men into compliance not through successful convictions but through constant public failures.

By showing that even the sickest rape fantasist can condemn a man to show trial without consequence, the CPS has handed women automatic power of state over any man who disappoints her.

CPS Director Alison Saunders – fairy Godmother to mendacious women

This inquisition is damaging to both individuals and society, but it will ultimately defeat its own purpose in one of two ways:

1 – The law will change to grant the accused the same anonymity as the accuser.

or

2 – Slowly but surely, the failure of the show trials will make the accusations of sexual abuse – whether true or false – as laughable to the British public as they already are to the women who make them.

I suspect that even most diehard feminists would prefer the first compromise to their state power – although I'll let the sales figures for Fifty Shades of Grey and the rape fantasies of Jemma Beale speak of a possible female lobby for the second.

However, until this is over, an upright man must be prepared to turn his back on the whole pantomime of British justice.

Judge in Your Own Cause

I'm a reasonably good looking and wealthy man in my late twenties. I doubt I've met my wife yet and, as I don't believe in free love, I occasionally turn down the sexual advances of increasingly desperate non-wife material. Daring to rebuff women like this is like playing the coin-pusher in a fairground. Eventually, one tipped over the edge and escalated a series of false accusations against me over the course of four years – mostly online, which I had no problem with – but lately also in the courts. Her increasingly deranged claims of sexual abuse (I never so much as held hands with her), could well culminate in the R-Bomb and a subsequent trial which would serve her penal end as well as feminism's social end.

I have no intention of becoming another one of Britain's broken souls trying to piece his life together after a pyrrhic court victory. I also have no material trappings in the West and a pied-à-terre in a non-aligned country so, like any dissident in a revolutionary society, my suitcases are packed in the hallway.

Your move, CPS.

A land of chaos is better than a land of tyranny that is ordered against you.

Read Next: Feminists Try To Debunk False Rape Culture With False Data

Christopher Leonid

Defining male agency during the collapse of the Sexual Revolution.

How To Meet Girls When You Have Practically No Time To Run Standard Game

October 25, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

One of the drawbacks of getting deep into game and studying all its subtleties and nuances is that there's a danger you'll stop seeing the wood for the trees. After all, in the end, what is the point of game? It's to meet and connect with attractive women.

Yes, there are certain mindsets, and multiple techniques and approaches you can employ. But the basic actions required to approach a girl and get her contact details are supremely straightforward. If time or other constraints prevent you from entering into a long, elaborate 'routine' then you'd be foolish not to at least try 'cut-to-the-chase game'.

What do I mean by 'cut-to-the-chase game'? Essentially, when you approach a women you are looking to do a minimum of three things—introduce yourself, indicate that you are attracted to her, and take her contact details.

In a more sophisticated model you are also aiming to spike attraction, to realise the benefits of push-pull, to tease, and to position yourself as the alpha male she cannot afford to pass up. You can do these things in stripped-down 'cut to the chase game' too. But the core of what you will be doing is simply, well, cutting to the chase.

Anna

I'll give you an example. One of the hottest girls I ever met, Anna, I pulled through cut-to-the-chase game. She was blonde, with long, slender legs visible through the slit in her black dress. She was wearing heels in the day time, unheard of in London.

She was coming out of a chemist's store. I saw her, and I had that false, innate feeling of 'she's out of my league' that even experienced players get when they spy a particularly attractive woman. It was also clear that she was in a hurry. She was walking quickly towards the ticket barriers of the London underground.

My mind performed its rapid, involuntary calculations. Taking into account her speed and the proximity of the gate, there was no way I'd be able to deliver my usual day game spiel—or it was unlikely, anyway. I had a choice. Either I let her walk out of my life forever, or I attempt some 'cut-to-the-chase' game.

I chose the latter.

'Hey,' I said. Anna stopped, and fixed me with her crystal-clear blue eyes. 'I just saw you shopping. I'm going back to work now, but I think you're cute. I'd love to take you for a drink sometime.'

Momentarily she was confused, blindsided by my directness. Then she spoke.

'OK,' she said.

'Here, put your number in my phone,' I said, handing it to her. She tapped at it with her beautifully-manicured fingers then passed it back to me.

'I have to go now,' she said. 'I'm on my way to the airport.'

And then she disappeared into the crowd.

I didn't expect anything. But a while later I sent my customary follow-up message.

'Nice meeting you before. Are you always so friendly to strangers? ;)'

I heard nothing, but to my surprise I received a reply the next day.

‘Hey, I am sorry for this late reply. Now I am in Moscow.’

It turned out that Anna was a student who’d just graduated. She was going home to spend a little time with her parents before returning to London where she was to take up a job in the aeronautical industry.

We pinged increasingly flirtatious messages to one another for the remainder of the week. Then, when she was back, we met for cocktails.

The rest of that summer was a lot of fun.

There are two key lessons that I took from this experience which I hope will be useful for you too. Firstly, as long as you have your shit together—that is, you look good, you are confident, you have strong body language and so on—then that plus the approach itself can be enough to spark attraction.

Secondly, assuming all of these things are in place, if you take action, even if it means not running ‘perfect game’, then there is a chance you will enjoy a favourable outcome.

Yes, it’s sometimes easy to stop seeing the wood for the trees. But think about what the essence of a pickup is, what it is you’re trying to achieve. By all means put into practice the more elaborate strategies you have at your disposal. But if all else fails, don’t be afraid to keep things simple and do the minimum required to achieve your goals.

Want to learn how jer

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Men Have Started Taking Classes Run By Feminists To Unlearn Being Masculine

October 25, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Cut:

For some time, Stephen Hicks had felt like something was off. “My relationship ended, then a lot of things started collapsing in front of me,” Hicks says. He began attending therapy, which made him realize that he needed to make a bigger change: “I wasn’t doing really terrible things, but I also wasn’t being the most ideal Stephen I could be,” he says. “The bar is really lowered for cisgender guys.”

So earlier this year, Hicks signed up for the pilot Rethink Masculinity class, a partnership between the Washington, D.C., Rape Crisis Center, Collective Action for Safe Spaces, and ReThink, an organization that works to prevent sexual assault.

The program bills itself as a class where men “learn how social constructs of masculinity harm them and the people around them, and work to construct healthier masculinities.” Or, as Hicks puts it, “It was eight weeks of guys discussing how they can address their actions with better self-awareness and less toxicity.”

“We spoke of emotional labor, consent, violence, communication, empathy, and vulnerability,” he adds, noting that the last subject, in particular, was a struggle for him: “[I was] trained and conditioned to be tough growing up.”

The Rethink program is the latest in a growing number of courses targeted toward people who identify as men, including the Men’s Project at the University of Wisconsin, Masculinity 101 at Brown, and the Duke Men’s Project at Duke. The goal, proponents say, is to help men examine their own biases and behaviors in order to cut down on misogyny and gender-based violence.

There’s no doubt that the problems these classes aim to tackle are pervasive ones — a reality that’s been made especially, painfully clear in recent days and weeks, as the Harvey Weinstein revelations have pushed discussions of sexual assault and harassment to the forefront. But can a class really be enough to chip away at something so deeply entrenched?

“It’s a promising approach,” says Eric Mankowski, associate chair of the psychology department at Portland State University and head of the school’s Gender and Violence Intervention Research Team, “but we don’t know whether they prevent sexual violence. Some studies show promising effects on attitudes and behavior intentions, but a single class is unlikely to undo years of socialization in toxic masculinity.”

For the past 25 years, Mankowski has taught a course titled Psychology of Men and Masculinities, which, he says, “deconstruct[s] how masculinity is socialized as a performative mask rather than a biological imperative.” He argues that the concept of “toxic masculinity” has four main components: suppression of anything stereotypically feminine; suppression of emotions related to vulnerability, like fear, sadness, or helplessness; male domination over women and other men; and aggression.

“From those four distal expectations come the proximal attitudes and behaviors, like ‘I deserve to have access to women’s bodies,’” he explains. “What we don’t know is if it’s more effective to address the distal or proximal ideas and behaviors." Mankowski says alcohol abuse is a perfect example. "It numbs feelings and allows men to act aggressive. We can effectively address it, but we're not addressing the underlying issue. It's functioning to help them display their manhood, so why would they stop?"

"We've spent many years addressing survivors and victim behavior, but ethically, and in terms of efficacy, that's incomplete," he adds. "We have to address the roots." And while course evaluations show that his students typically absorb what he teaches, Mankowski notes, that doesn't necessarily mean that the class is making a real-world difference: "It may change beliefs about gender," he says, "but does it change behavior?"

It's not a given, but it's not impossible, either. Research consistently shows that holding sexist attitudes is associated with gender violence, for example, so it's not unreasonable to hope that better beliefs can lead to better behavior. Studies have also demonstrated that bystander intervention training — a subject covered in Rethink classes — can be effective at reducing the incidence of sexual assault.

On the other hand, though, these classes are taking on a lot. Trying to undo a lifetime's worth of lessons about how to act at home, in the workplace, and in public — it's a lofty goal, especially when so much of what participants encounter outside the classroom contradicts what they learn within it. And some of the desired outcomes — increased vulnerability, more emotional openness — are difficult to measure.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: Men Will Always Be Seen As Evil By Feminists

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

It’s Time To Bring Back The God Apollo To Our Lives

October 25, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Return of Kings has taken an interest in Western civilization and looked into both history and spirituality, including Greco-Roman culture, which in spite of all its flaws and various (mis)interpretations, provides a rich source of inspiration for art, symbols and ethics. Although one may have a penchant for particular gods, such as Zeus or Hermes, there is no need to limit oneself to a single symbol or deity.

Another Greek god of particular relevance is Apollo, since he is linked to Apollonian “high culture” and as such opposed to the Dionysian “low culture” (hedonism). In this article I will give an overview of Apollo and how he has been depicted throughout history, as well as to explain how one can live a more “Apollonian life”.

Apollo in Western history

As Julius Evola notes in his book Ride The Tiger and Umberto Eco in On Beauty, the depictions of the Greek gods Apollo and Dionysus as opposing elements are simplified, even wrong or misguided. For instance, scholars specialized in this topic emphasize that Apollo himself is related to opposing elements:

> Apollo is linked with both healing and destruction, especially sudden death inflicted from a distance; he is associated, Ferguson suggests, with the sun “which both scorches and gives life.

In Fritz Graf’s book Apollo, he stresses that in Homer’s Iliad Apollo shoots arrows into the Greek camp and as a consequence Agamemnon has to give in. Obviously he is not a nice and calm deity, but a god of sudden death. However, that is but one aspect – he has more than one string to his bow:

> Apollo is generally associated by ancient writers and artists with one of two stringed instruments, the lyre or the bow; the first generates harmony, the other deals death. The god is linked also with phenomena as varied and diverse as plague, ritual purification, the herding of sheep, ecstatic prophecy, constitutional law, colonization, and healing. Perhaps in no other case is it so difficult to express in concrete terms the range of an Olympian god's concerns and activities.

Such a multifaceted god and symbol can be linked to (traditional) Western civilization almost in full. As Richardo Duchesne notes in his work The Uniqueness of Western Civilization, historically the West has been both constructive and destructive, built and shattered its surroundings (and sometimes colonized foreign lands).

Another key feature is that Apollo represents the sun, which is one of the essential elements of life, an idea which has pre-Classic origins. Perhaps this idea is a bit misguided, since very few worshipped Apollo as a sun god in the ancient past, but it is still something that one tends to associate with this deity. Furthermore he is the slayer of evil, like the snake Python, and as such a pro-cosmic symbol.

Moreover, like Hermes, Apollo is also depicted as an archaic player, and have had mythological liaisons with Cassandra, Coronis, Daphne, and Sibyl (which he didn't meet on Tinder, I suppose) to name a few. Apollo also had an Olympian twin sister, Artemis, whom likewise has been worshiped at different locations in the ancient Mediterranean, Delphi in particular.

During later historical periods, especially 19th-century German scholarship, Apollo has been linked to the orderly and often illustrated as a graceful statue during both Renaissance and neo-Classical periods. In that regard, some of the old representations meet the newer ones, and as much as Apollo is a bit ambiguous one tends to associate him with law, order, healing, and the solid forms of beauty which are found in European art, architecture, literature, music, and to some extent in modern fashion.

How to live an Apollonian life

Concrete examples on how to integrate Apollonian ideals into your life are to read, write, lift weights, eat healthy, dress well, and encourage classic, beautiful art and architecture, while boycotting its opposites.

Even more concretely, spend considerable time in beautiful buildings, gardens, and other sites, like for example churches, castles, museums, and libraries. The pursuits that you partake in and the environments where you choose to spend time in will affect you, and in this case in a positive way.

Start the day with a healthy breakfast, continue with lunch, and after a day of work you go to the gym. Read a good book afterwards, like The Brothers Karamazov in the evening, and on the weekend you will visit some of the sites mentioned above, with or without company. Personally I also like to visit a pretty spa once in a while and almost feel like a Roman.

In closing

As I see it, Apollo is the ideal which one should strive for, but in order to get there we may have to use more of the trade and trickery that are linked to the god Hermes. Hopefully we do not have to shoot our enemies with arrows like Apollo did. Our culture already has enough of degenerate music, pop culture, ugliness, incompetence and retarded social media. True beauty must heal it and it starts with you as a person.

For more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: Why The Greek God Hermes Is A Perfect Symbol For Neomasculinity

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Would You Bang New Zealand’s New SJW Prime Minister?

October 26, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Here at Return Of Kings, we are very frank about the fact that men objectify women and vice versa. In the case of women, they are valued for their beauty and fertility (when male thirst doesn’t lead to guys lusting after land whales). Men, on the other hand, are principally rated using a combination of their status, achievements, and, increasingly, looks.

The election of the grossly inexperienced Jacinda Ardern to the post of New Zealand Prime Minister provides a great opportunity to assess her attractiveness. Is her lack of credentials in leading a country, albeit a small, leftist one, made up for by her aesthetics? You decide:

Let’s at least agree that she’s a vast improvement on the last female (and last socialist) leader of New Zealand, Helen Clark:

If you think we’re sexist, look at what’s been said about Justin Trudeau

No homo, this was just for the article.

On this topic, for once, we support equal opportunity between men and women, even if objectification takes different forms depending on the gender of the person being rated. Girls, both professional typists and average hypergamists, had a field day (and still do) talking about how they deeply desire sex with Justin Trudeau. In fact, one writer for Vice, Stephanie Mercier Voyer (the last part should be "Voyeur") wrote a piece entitled "I Want to Bone Justin Trudeau."

After Trudeau became Prime Minister of Canada, everyday ladies went wild on Twitter and elsewhere. News articles have obsessed over his buttocks, more than a year since his election. As recently as this month, he continues to arouse fawning comments:

> Seems like it's been awhile since I've mentioned how hot @JustinTrudeau is.
> Justin Trudeau is so hot.
>
> — k~i~m (@KimsBayBrews) October 19, 2017

> Marry me
>
> — ☾ ris (@crizzztina) October 13, 2017

> I want to marry Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. pic.twitter.com/XIYPmmQjC1
>
> — spooky lem-n (@llunv_) September 30, 2017

The gays and trans people really want to bone or be boned by him, too:

> If Justin Trudeau doesn't have sex with me, I will burn his country to the ground…
> you have 48 hours to respond @JustinTrudeau pic.twitter.com/kJtYpM0zqP

> — IG danielthomasNYC (@Deshasuxx) March 12, 2017

> If Justin Trudeau doesn't have sex with me this instant, I am calling the police https://t.co/C0JhRBYBnQ
>
> — Rachel McRea (@Rachel_McRea) February 24, 2017

Some more pictures to help you decide if you would have sex with Jacinda Ardern

The New Zealand media boiled with anger when guest ROK contributor Hamish Rangi criticized the average Kiwi woman. Some of my experiences with South Island New Zealander girls in particular contradicts Hamish's take, yet the furious response in many quarters to the article vindicated a lot of what he said, at least for a number of women in the country.

Leftist New Zealanders should be thrilled that, instead of supporting Hamish's belief that men should avoid having sex with Kiwi women, I am suggesting it is more than possible to want to have sex with New Zealand's new Prime Minister.

Being the facts-based scientists that we are, let's look into the available evidence about Jacinda Ardern:

Jacinda Ardern has just hit her late 30s. Provided you had a sex consent form signed (SJWs gonna SJW), would you bang her? Procreate with her? Or would you just pass on this New Zealand and female answer to the unqualified Justin Trudeau? Decisions, decisions.

Read More: 6 Reasons New Zealand Women Are The Worst In The Western World

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Doctors In African Nation Of Malawi Are Being Killed By Mobs Who Think They're Vampires

October 26, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Daily Mail:

Doctors in Malawi have been beaten for carrying stethoscopes by vigilante mobs who believe they are vampires using the instruments to suck blood.

Medics have also been robbed and had their vehicles smashed, while ambulances have been attacked as patients were taken to hospital, a doctors' association said.

The Society of Medical Doctors in Malawi said a case of 'mass hysteria' sweeping the south of the country has led thousands of people to believe there are vampires in their midst.

Nine people have been beaten to death after being accused of being a vampire, while 124 have been arrested for carrying out the attacks.

In a statement, society president Dr Amos Salimanda Nyaka said: ‘We are disturbed by the reports of thuggery that has resulted into some health workers being attacked for carrying a stethoscope.

‘Some have had unfortunate incidences of having their vehicles smashed, and in others having their possessions taken off them for being suspected of being blood suckers, and or in pursuit of the non-existent suckers.

‘Some ambulances have also been attacked whilst being used to ferry patients to and or from hospital.

‘This is despicable and we condemn all these and all similar acts of barbarism on innocent people unreservedly and in the strongest language possible.

‘No health worker can suck blood with a stethoscope.’

Dr Nyaka added that there is ‘no evidence’ the vampires are real, and instead blamed the situation on ‘Shared Delusion Disorder’.

He said: ‘This is when a dominant individual who is deluded and can have those following him believe and internalize his delusions. Shared delusion is usually confined to a locality.

‘In view of the magnitude of the problem in that it is affecting many districts and the readiness of many Malawians to internalize these beliefs this presentation would constitute that of Mass Hysteria.

‘It is the considered view of the Society that such blood suckers do not exist. This is purely Mass Hysteria.’

The attacks started in mid-September but alarm has grown in recent weeks as they spread to Blantyre, the second-largest city in the country.

Malawi is one of the world’s poorest nations, and belief in witchcraft is widespread.

Police arrested 124 people on Friday last week after two men were beaten to death in Blantyre, accused of trying to obtain human blood for voodoo rituals.

‘One person was burned and another stoned to death by angry mobs in incidents on Thursday for being suspected to be blood suckers,’ police spokesman Ramsy Mushani said.

The latest killings took place outside Blantyre, the country’s commercial capital, where angry mobs clashed with police and blocked main roads to protest against the alleged vampire threat.

The country’s police chief said the 124 arrests had been made in a ‘coordinated operation’.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: An Ugly African Woman Has Somehow Managed To Win Miss Helsinki

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Top 3 European Cities To Visit If You Have Two Weeks Or Less

October 26, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

If a man has only two weeks of vacation a year, he might be hard-pressed to fit everything into a trip that he wants to achieve. Assuming your average single man in the West hopes to game some girls, see some culture, and not waste too much time in airport lines—a trip to Europe can be difficult.

After hopping around this continent for nearly the last two years, I've hit upon a group of cities that I think can offer men most of what they are looking for, without wasting the most precious resource he has—time.

I've picked three cities that are all close together (offering easy connections by train, bus, and even boat during the nice weather), have a mix of many parts that Europe has to offer, and are mostly safe from refugee invasion. These three cities are Vienna, Bratislava, and Budapest.

Vienna, Austria

This is the cultural stop. Austrian women are called by the locals as “bland”, so it’s not exactly the ideal game situation. But, Vienna itself is a beautiful city with lots of interesting things to see and do. If you had 14 days in Europe, you could easily spend 2 or 3 in Vienna and not run out of sights to see.

Vienna definitely has it’s fair share of migrants who are attempting to rape and pillage the locals, but after spending time in both cities in 2016, I can safely say that it’s nowhere near as bad as Paris. It’s definitely not a cheap city, but considering the next two cities on the list, stretching the budget for a few days shouldn’t be an issue.

Lastly, if you happen to have a girl in Europe, or perhaps you meet one you click with in the other two cities, Vienna is definitely not a bad spot to bring a girl for a few days. Watch her eat a couple sausages, see some sights, and save your partying nights for one of the next two places.

Bratislava, Slovakia

Just an hour from Vienna by boat, bus, or train, and about 2-3 from Budapest, Bratislava will give you an off-the-grid experience into European culture. While the city center is quite nice, once you venture more than a kilometer outside of the center, you're met with the rundown and Soviet style housing that is so prevalent throughout Eastern Europe.

And that's one of the main reasons why I'd recommend Bratislava (even though I said so differently last year)—it will give you an insight into how different things can be in Europe, and it's a stark contrast if you're coming from either Vienna or Budapest. If you enjoy the run-down and beaten nature of Bratislava, there's a good chance you'll enjoy trekking further east to a place like Ukraine on your next trip.

The girls are pretty, and Bratislava overall is not slammed with silly British stag parties that flock to Prague, Poland, and Budapest.

It is worth noting that Slovakia uses the Euro, and not their own separate currency. But, they certainly don't have the wealth that a country like Austria has. Despite this, the prices are relatively affordable (expect to pay about 5 Euros for a mid-level meal).

Finally, Bratislava is also a short hop away from Brno (1 hour) and Prague (4 hours) in the Czech Republic, should you fancy adding another country on to your list.

Budapest, Hungary

You can get to Budapest by Vienna via train in about 2 hours, or about 2-3 from Bratislava. There's also bus connections if that's more your cup of tea.

There was a stark contrast between my 2015 and 2017 trips to Budapest, so I'll say this—get there while it's still good, because it may not be for much longer. There are far more British and American expats, prices are rising (still quite cheap), and things never tend to improve once that happens.

With that being said, Budapest is a fun city to party in. You can get out every night of the week in the ruin pub district if you so wish. On weekends, the Hungarian clubs are great fun. There's always festivals and events going on (the Red Bull Air Show is a goal of mine for next year).

The local Hungarian girls can definitely be harsh, but for a short trip, you'll likely be able to pick up a non-local girl at any of the foreigner bars (get there early to avoid the super-sausage-fest that occurs after midnight).

Closing Thoughts

Yes, there are definitely places in Europe that are more off-the-grid, have hotter women, or are more interesting to see than these three. They all have their pros and cons. However, I do believe that these three cities can provide a bit of everything for the single man who has limited time.

When you factor in an hour from the city center to an airport, an hour of waiting before the flight, plus flight and another trip to the center, it's easy to spend 5-7 hours in transit for what amounts to a measly two hour flight. In Europe, it's far better to take the train and spend that time enjoying the countryside and sipping a drink as opposed to fighting the airport madness.

These three cities offer easy connections and a taste of everything, and then you can plan the next trip based off of what you enjoy the most.

If you want to build a location independent business, check out Pro Niche Site—winter enrollment closes on November 1st.

Read More: 4 Tips For Long-Term Relationships With Foreign Girls

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

The Story Of How The South African Koevoet Killed Thousands Of Communists

October 26, 2017 | by Kiron Solari | Link | Original Link

When the bloody tide of communism started rolling across the Black Continent in the 1960's, the Western world preferred to sit and watch, or even assist it. The astute few, however, quickly realized that this seemingly chaotic surge had a clear purpose: to drive the white man out of Africa and make it a foothold of third world hordes. And even though the white man was greatly outnumbered, with hands tied by political treachery and cowardice, there still were plenty who stood and fought in an epic struggle that continues to this day.

The Warning Shot

After major colonial powers' withdrew from Africa, the only white players left were Portugal, Rhodesia and South Africa. Made complacent by years of peace and comfort, Portuguese colonial administration could do little to stop Angola and Mozambique from rapidly corkscrewing into oblivion; toppling of Salazar's regime in Portugal by communists simply delivered the coup de grace. Mozambique became a typical African dictatorship, while Angola was split between three armed groups: MPLA, UNITA and FNLA.

South Africa, realizing it was next on the menu, started supporting UNITA and especially FNLA against MPLA, which was heavily backed by USSR and especially Cuba. Unfortunately, MPLA still managed to assume power in Angola, and it was not long before it found a new target: South West Africa, a mineral-rich protectorate of South Africa.

The South West African People's Organisation (SWAPO), initially the runt of the Afro-Marxist litter that survived on meager handouts from the Eastern Bloc and treasonous Western governments, started gradually gaining power. In 1972, political opossums in the UN granted it recognition and in 1976, MPLA allowed SWAPO to use its bases in southern Angola as staging grounds for incursions into South West Africa.

Modus operandi of SWAPO wasn't any different from other black-and-red terrorist groups of their time: infiltrate a remote farming area across the border, murder any whites encountered, torch a farm or two and run back. Arn Durand's autobiography sums them up perfectly:

> Fill your head with Marxist communist ideologies. Pick up an RPG-7, an AK-47 and some landmines and hand grenades, put on a Cuban or Chinese camouflage uniform and march across the border of another country. Shoot and kill the locals who don't support your ideas. Abduct the schoolchildren at gunpoint, march them to your training bases to indoctrinate them and fill their heads with your > bullshit to force them to do what you are doing. You're looking for shit and you're bound to get your head blown off and those crap ideas spilt out all over the fine white sand.

>
> – "Zulu Zulu Golf", 2011

Ovamboland, the northernmost part of South West Africa, rapidly became a battlefield, with its native Ovambo tribe splitting into anti- and pro-SWAPO factions – the former determined to maintain the comfortable status quo under an administration loyal to South Africa, the latter intending to help drive the whites out of "Namibia" and seize power over it.

Ops K

South Africa reacted quickly, dispatching its army to guard the Angolan-SWA border. But SADF, despite being very adept at conventional warfare, lacked the flexibility needed to intercept SWAPO raiding parties, not to mention that at the time it was not allowed to cross the Angolan border. Invading guerrillas could only be tackled by something much swifter and far less hierarchical than the army – something that South Africa did not have.

Securing the full length of the Angolan-SWA border required tens of thousands of troops.

The solution came in 1978, with arrival of Johannes "Sterk Hans" Dreyer, a South African Police brigadier, in the area of operations. Having served in Rhodesia in the period when SAP assisted it with counter-insurgency efforts, he knew how the country's most fearsome military unit, the Selous Scouts, operated. While recognizing the usefulness of local population for intelligence gathering, he dismissed the Scouts' infiltration tactics as unsuitable for the flat, nearly featureless landscape of Ovamboland.

Instead, he opted for a highly mobile hunter-killer unit that would track and pursue guerrillas across immense distances. Operating on a shoestring budget, Dreyer managed to recruit 60 Ovambos and 6 white police officers to man two pickups and two cars, arming them with trophy weapons. His detractors were in stitches over this ragtag outfit, but quickly went silent when in 1979, after seven days of pursuit, it intercepted a terrorist warband, killing two. This was soon followed by another long chase and more dead terrorists; in less than a year, Dreyer's men were killing 50 to 80 SWAPO per month.

Johannes Dreyer, founder and father figure of Koevoet

But the unit's official recognition was still far away; until then, "Ops K" sustained itself in any way it could, including by stealing supplies and equipment from military bases. Moreover, the unit's classified status meant that all their kills were credited to the army; these two circumstances paved the way to mutual resentment that sometimes bordered on open hostility. Three years later, Dreyer went to the higher-ups with statistics. Despite the massive military presence at the Angolan border, Ops K had more enemy contacts and kills than all of the deployed units combined. Backed into a corner by undeniable facts, the MoD finally started coughing up money.

The Crowbar

The first sign of the government's goodwill was a batch of Hippo APCs, intended to counter SWAPO's copious use of landmines. Dreyer's men showed their gratitude in a very unorthodox way – by using arc welders and angle grinders to make Hippos open-topped, add gunports, and install weapon mounts that could accommodate even 20mm cannons. Engineers back in SA were horrified, but later ended up incorporating the modifications into new MRAP vehicles: the Army got the Buffel, while Koevoet, as Ops K came to be known, got the Casspir.

This machine pretty much defined the unit's tactics. Koevoet was split into battlegroups, each comprised of approximately 40 Ovambos, 4 whites, 4 Casspirs bristling with weapons and a Blesbok supply vehicle. The groups patrolled the bush in week-long shifts, visiting villages and inquiring about SWAPO sightings. The moment spoor was picked up, the hunt was on: Ovambos would run in front, pointing out the spoor with long sticks, with Casspirs following closely behind, gunners on top watching for ambushes.

When the enemy was close but not yet visible, a Casspir or two would often leap-frog ahead of the main group in order to prevent them from scattering or cut off a possible escape route. The moment a contact was made, trackers would hit the ground while Casspirs rushed in, encircling the enemy in a hail of gunfire and bursts of white phosphorus grenades. In case of casualties or overwhelming enemy presence, helicopters would be scrambled from a nearby airfield, providing additional firepower and vision; Koevoet's relationship with the Air Force was far more amiable than with the Army.

Even by African standards, Koevoet was an anomaly. If carrying out military operations as a desegregated police unit in an apartheid state was not enough, the unorthodox tactic they employed put them at extreme risk. Casspirs, while bullet- and mine-proof, offered no protection from RPGs, and their open-topped design made gunners very vulnerable during contacts, while trackers were not protected at all.

Koevoet frequently disregarded the army's combat zone designations, which resulted in several friendly fire incidents. Another distinguishing feature was the bounty system – the unit was compensated for every killed and captured terrorist, as well as their weapons and equipment, leading to cutthroat competition between battlegroups.

Koevoet also engaged in an improvised hearts-and-minds campaign by treating local natives with great cordiality and protecting them from SWAPO raids; this sharply contrasted with their habit of decorating bumpers and wheels of their Casspirs with corpses as a warning to SWAPO sympathizers. Some Koevoet trackers were ex-SWAPO themselves: similarly to the Selous Scouts, particularly skilled captives were offered to join the battlegroups, while others were gainfully employed as farm workers and cooks. Most of the fighting, however, was still done by whites, as many Ovambos refused to or were simply afraid to participate in contacts.

Fear Incarnate

Resourcefulness and sheer brutality of the new unit paid off: despite constant attempts by SWAPO to terrorize South West Africa's population, very few succeeded and none were left unavenged. The full list of Koevoet operations is far too long to provide here (especially considering that most started as routine patrols), but it is crowned by their defense of Tsumeb, when over 150 SWAPO on their way to a small mining town were intercepted, dispersed and annihilated by several battlegroups before the Army even started to react. The few captives later confessed to being ordered to burn Tsumeb to the ground.

In its prime, SWAPO was a force to be reckoned with. Armed by Soviets, trained by Cubans and brainwashed into extreme bloodthirst, they were a formidable foe even for SADF, one of the most capable armies in the world. And yet, Koevoet did not even bother with posting sentries during their overnight camps in the bush – their reputation did the job just as well.

For SWAPO, the South African Army represented pure evil, but it was a familiar, comprehensible evil. However, hearing the unmistakable roar of a Casspir's engine and catching a glimpse of a Koevoet constable's olive uniform was often all it took for a trained guerrilla to panic and flee. Not even 32 Battalion instilled such dread – the idea of an enemy that chases you until you drop dead was far more terrifying than any ambush, and mercy was not guaranteed even in case of surrender.

After South Africa told the UN to scram and allowed its troops to cross into Angola, syringes with benzedrine became standard issue for terrorists, whose survival now hinged on beating Koevoet to their bases deep within Angola rather than just the border. Few ever succeeded – Ovambos' tracking skills, which they learned from early childhood as herdboys, bordered on supernatural, and Casspirs were never far behind.

The facts speak for themselves: 11 years, 1615 contacts with the enemy, 3681 terrorists killed and captured, 153 constables dead and 949 wounded. That's a 25:1 kill ratio, compared to the SADF average of 11:1, not to mention that total number of Koevoet staff never exceeded 1000.

The Final Look

Koevoet veterans gather to pay respects to their fallen comrades-in-arms. Pretoria, 2013.

For an outsider, Koevoet were barbarians – grubby, bellicose and completely ruthless. Apartheid South Africa was the favorite boogieman of both communist East and subverted West; once existence of Koevoet was revealed, it also became a target. The very people who bled to ensure that population of South West Africa slept tight at night were described as depraved butchers by politicians and journalists who never stepped foot outside their sterile offices.

Koevoet was disbanded in 1989, its veterans either finding new occupations or becoming scattered across the world as private security contractors. Contemporary governments of Namibia and South Africa prefer to ignore them altogether – given the African tradition of exterminating all opposition, it could be worse.

The outcome of the Border War itself remains unclear: while South Africa failed to retain South West Africa, it bled SWAPO into total impotence, preventing them from establishing yet another bloody dictatorship and forcing them to adhere to more or less democratic means of maintaining power. Modern Namibia owes its peace and stability to Koevoet, SADF and sacrifices they made back in the day, no matter how hard its government tries to deny it.

Read More: An Unsung Hero: The Legend Of Danny Roxo

Kiron Solari

Kiron is a somber European man who devotes most of his time to making money, reading, working out and plotting revenge against the people who turned the world upside down.

American Girl Gushes About Getting Divorced And "Dating" Her Way Across Europe

October 27, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> I think you can learn from every person and every relationship, no matter how brief (or awkward). I'm building a better picture of what I want in a partner, but I'm also learning that I don't need one to be happy.
>
> — Elise Linscott justifying the cock carousel for our friends at Cosmopolitan

The name Elise Linscott is normal enough for an American girl. Sadly, so, too, are her sexual habits. Having divorced her husband at the age of 26, she went on a ten-week cock carousel tour to Europe. As Linscott puts it, she "dated" across most of the 11 countries she visited. Cosmopolitan then dutifully picked up her story for publication.

> This summer, just two days after my divorce, I left for a 10-week solo trip through Europe, visiting 11 countries and dating in most of them.
>
> My ex and I eloped to Hawaii when we were 25. But shortly after we started arguing more, and with more intensity. Despite counseling, neither of us was happy, so I moved back in with my family. That was last winter.
>
> By summer, I was feeling like myself again, but I was falling for a guy I met on Tinder. Will* was a passionate, outgoing PhD student who wasn't looking for commitment and who was leaving for a summer internship across the country.
>
> So at 26, single for the first time in my adult life, I decided to spend the summer > traveling. And dating men abroad.

The hamstering is unbelievably strong in this “article,” which reads more like a manifesto of badly rationalized decisions than a deliberately candid insight into the female mind. Following her divorce, Elise Linscott said she was “falling for” another man called Will in the United States. This didn’t stop her from spreading her legs for what seems to have been a lot more men than she talks about in the article.

You can presume she engaged in a lot of other undesirable female behaviors, but here’s some of what she explicitly or basically admits in the article (we can be sure these behaviors repeated themselves):

- she spent dates with men talking about her desire for Will (alpha widow based on a few sex sessions?);
- she asked for men’s opinions and was evidently offended when those opinions contradicted her own emotional conclusions;
- she promised to pay men back for dates and then evaded/blocked them when they asked for the money back; and
- she slept with multiple men and presumably will never tell Will about them all (we know there are more than the two or three she talks about in her piece).

Plus, significant amounts of time are missing from her trip. What she describes appears to have taken up about a week only–just 10% of her stay in Europe. What happened during the rest of her journeys? Do we want to know?

The ex-husband–relevant or not?

Is this pairing really so bad?

A number of people in the manosphere responding to Elise Linscott's article are commenting on the dorky appearance and demeanor of her ex-husband, suggesting it motivated her divorce and subsequent European cock carousel tour. There may be some merit to this, but it's worth emphasizing how very indulging modern Western "culture" is to young women. Two decades ago and this couple would likely still be together. Women's standards and expectations have been inflated to the point where I think even we are sometimes guilty of presuming an otherwise average man is out of the league of an aesthetically normal girl.

It's hard, if not nigh on impossible to isolate specific causal factors behind Linscott's leg-spreading path of "liberation." Nevertheless, we can look at the general ones easily enough. Eat Pray Love-style narratives stand out as obvious contenders for what changes and corrupts girls like her in the United States and other Anglosphere countries. Pretty much anything that privileges "never settle" and "always try to find yourself" over more common sense mantras directed toward women will suffice as an explanation.

The problem with essentially red-pilled men always raising the appearance or personality of an ex-husband or ex-boyfriend is that it underestimates the pernicious effect of popular culture on women. Girls are by and large artificially enhanced creatures, using L'Oreal, other products, and digital filters to present themselves to the world. Despite all this investment, objectively-speaking Elise Linscott's ex-husband matched fairly well. In a healthy, balanced society, their pairing would raise no eyebrows whatsoever. Out of control, socially-reinforced female hypergamy is what makes us think much of what we think about the ex-husband. Remember that.

The rise–and rise–of the female sex tour

Cock-a-doodle-doo.

Female sex tours, marketed as “holidays” or “self-discovery,” have been with us for years. Expect them to only increase in popularity over the next decade. We are, however, dealing with the tip of the iceberg. European getaways serving as cock carousel treats for women catch our attention because they involve other countries and more exotic destinations.

Numerous other female antics occur right under the noses of unsuspecting men every day. God knows how many future husbands, for example, are unaware of the true notch count of their “near-virginal” betrothed. Most of this happens in places like Lexington, Kentucky or Melbourne, Florida, not Sevilla in Spain or Nantes in western France.

Let’s look on the positive side, though. Any self-respecting man who has read Elise Linscott’s account, or accounts delivered by any girl like her, will steer clear of a woman like this.

Read More: Lindsay Lohan Becomes A “Chaste” Muslim Woman After Spending Years On The Hollywood Cock Carousel

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Top 5 Horror Movies Ever Made

October 27, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The Halloween season is a great time to curl up with your girl to watch a horror movie. But there is nothing worse than watch a horror movie that turns out to be a complete dud like Paranormal Activity. Here is a guide to some of the best horror flicks to ensure you don't waste a dark stormy night.

The Omen (1976)

A present for Damien

The Omen is story of the birth and childhood of the antichrist. The antichrist, named Damien Thorn in the movie, is the devil's literal son. While that is terrible theology, it doesn't stop the movie from being highly disturbing. For me, the most shocking scene is when Damien's nanny hangs herself as a willing sacrifice at his fifth birthday party. I will give an honorable mention to The Exorcist here as another movie that has the devil as the main protagonist, but I feel the special effects are pretty campy by today's standards.

The Shining (1980)

Horror, like science fiction and fantasy, is a despised genre. Actors and directors would prefer to do "serious" works about AIDS, cancer, or mental illness. For this reason, horror movies are typically low-budget affairs starring no-name actors and directed by men who will never receive an Academy Award nomination. The Shining was an exception to this rule. It was directed by Stanley Kubrick, who already had several Oscars to his name, and it starred Jack Nicolson, another Oscar winner. And the screenplay was based on a novel by one of the masters of the horror genre, Stephen King.

The Shining is a ghost story set in a hotel that caters to the very rich nestled in the Colorado Rocky Mountains. Due to the harsh winters in the mountains, the hotel shuts down in the Fall leaving only a caretaker to maintain it. The caretaker is a writer named Jack Torrence who jumps at the chance to spend the winter with his wife and young son in a hotel doing almost nothing but writing. Of course, Jack gets more than he bargained for as the hotel is haunted by the evil that has accumulated from the shocking immorality that occurred in the hotel over the years.

The suspense in the movie is heightened by the fact that Jack Torrence is also an alcoholic. The viewer is never 100% sure whether the events unfolding at the hotel are caused by ghosts or by Jack himself. Kubrick does a masterful job of creating a foreboding atmosphere and the actual encounters with the ghosts are brief. Nicholson is brilliant as the tortured artist who is slipping into madness.

Out of all the movies in this article, The Shining is the only one that I watch almost annually. Even though I have the movie practically memorized, I still get sucked into the disturbing atmosphere of the movie.

A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984)

A Nightmare on Elm Street falls firmly within the slasher genre: Teenagers are pursued by the villain, Freddy Krueger. But director Wes Craven injects the supernatural into the movie. Freddy Krueger is dead and the way he kills his victim is through their dreams. If the victim dies in his dream, he dies in real life. The teenagers quickly learn that the only way they can survive is by not going to sleep. Of course, it is not possible for one to stay awake forever so the teens find themselves being picked off by Freddy.

In the movie, the viewer is never 100% sure whether he is watching reality or if it is a dream so he is constantly off-balance. And while many horror movies rely on recycled monsters (vampires, werewolves, ghosts, etc.) A Nightmare on Elm Street introduces a truly memorable villain in Freddy Krueger. His burnt skin and trademark glove with blades on the fingertips make him one of the most easily recognizable film villains.

Hellraiser (1987)

Some horror movies rely on pure creepiness instead of trying to surprise the viewer. Hellraiser falls into this category. The story involves a magical box that, when opened, is supposed to give the possessor of it untold wealth, power, and pleasure. When a man opens the box, it instead summons a demon that take his body and soul to hell.

The man's mistress (his brother's wife) starts having one-night stands with random men, and sacrificing them to bring back her paramour. She is successful, but there's a catch—her boyfriend has come back without skin. He proceeds to kill his brother and steal his skin.

Hellraiser is disturbing from beginning to end. This is no feel-good movie. It is best watched alone very late at night.

Ringu* (1998)

Ringu is a Japanese movie. There is an American version of the movie starring Naomi Watts called The Ring. For whatever reason, the Japanese version is infinitely scarier. The plot involves teens (it's always teens) who watch a video they find in a vacation cabin. The teens all end up dying with looks of horror on their face. The heroine is a journalist who tries to figure out the mystery. In the process she watches the video herself. After watching the video she receives an ominous phone call. She realizes that anyone who watches the video is doomed to die after a certain number of days.

Disturbed, the journalist enlists the help of her ex-husband, who seems to have some latent extrasensory perception ability. Together they figure out that the video has some connection to a female psychic and her disfigured daughter. The rest of the movie is spent trying to figure out how to escape the curse of the video.

Ringu relies on a creating a foreboding atmosphere and the element of surprise. If you don't already know the surprise, you'll definitely enjoy Ringu.

Conclusion

You may have noticed that most of the movies I mentioned are from the 1980s. I believe that the horror movies from that period are more enjoyable because they have a supernatural element, whether that is a demon, a ghost, or someone who has returned from the dead. In contrast, the more recent movies in the horror genre tend to lack any reference to the paranormal. Instead, their subject matter involves people being tortured and killed by flesh and blood people. Movies like Saw, The Strangers, The Invitation, and Hush all involve random, gratuitous violence.

I would argue that the disappearance of supernatural horror in movies is a good barometer for the state of religious belief in the West. As more people lose their faith, all that is left is random violence.

Of course there are many other movies that I could mention, but space does not permit.

I'd be interested to hear your suggestions for other high quality horror movies in the comments.

Read More: 4 Underappreciated Horror Movies

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Famous Investor Marc Faber Goes Nuclear On Political Correctness

October 27, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Globe & Mail:

Marc Faber, the markets prognosticator known as "Dr. Doom," has resigned his board seats at Sprott Inc., Ivanhoe Mines Ltd. and NovaGold Resources Inc. on Tuesday after his latest newsletter ignited international outrage, with the publication of a litany of inflammatory and racist comments.

"Thank God white people populated America and not the blacks," wrote Mr. Faber, who is managing director with investment advisory and fund management firm Marc Faber Ltd., in his latest monthly newsletter.

"Otherwise the U.S. would look like Zimbabwe, which it might look like one day anyway, but at least America enjoyed 200 years in the economic and political sun under a white majority."

In the publication, Mr. Faber was also highly critical of the removal of Confederate statues in the United States – an issue that generated much controversy after white supremacists marched in Charlottesville, Va., in the summer to protest the city's plans to take them down.

"The very same people" he wrote of U.S. liberals "are now disturbed by statues of honourable people whose only crime was to defend what all societies had done for more than 5,000 years: keep a part of the population enslaved."

In the newsletter, the 71-year-old Mr. Faber claimed he is "not a racist" but wrote that the reality, "no matter how politically incorrect," needs to be spelled out.

"If stating some historical facts makes me a racist, then I suppose that I am a racist," Mr.

Faber later told Bloomberg news service in an e-mail.

Mr. Faber did not respond to The Globe and Mail's request for comment.

Hours after his newsletter comments were made public, Toronto-based asset manager Sprott asked Mr. Faber to step down from its board of directors, a position he had held since 2010.

"Recent comments by Dr. Faber are deeply disappointing and are completely contradictory with the views of Sprott and its employees," said Peter Grosskopf, CEO of Sprott, the precious metals asset manager, in a release.

"We pride ourselves on being a diverse organization and comments of this sort will not be tolerated."

Through a spokesperson, Mr. Grosskopf declined further comment.

In a release late Tuesday, Ivanhoe Mines, which had employed Mr. Faber as a director since 2004, said it "disagrees with, and deplores, the personally-held views about race," that Mr. Faber had published. The Vancouver-based international mining company, which was co-founded by mining financier Robert Friedland, said it had requested and accepted Mr. Faber's resignation.

NovaGold also announced in a release on Tuesday that Mr. Faber had resigned as a director. He had served on the board of the Vancouver-based company, which has a gold project in Alaska, since 2010. In a regulatory filing earlier this year, NovaGold said it benefited from Mr. Faber's services because of his "vast knowledge of economics, global market trends, precious metals and commodities."

Mr. Faber was born in Switzerland but is now based in Thailand. He worked as a managing director with the defunct U.S. investment bank Drexel Burnham Lambert from 1978 to 1990. At one time, Drexel Burnham was the junk-bond king of Wall Street.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: Will The Swedish Negro Ball (Negerboll) Survive The Era Of Political Correctness?

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

The Nightmare Of Electronic Progress And Automated Processes

October 27, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

On Saturday, September 30, I went to the bank to withdraw some cash. It was the end of the month, when many people receive their wages and rush to the bank to make withdrawals. At the bank, almost all cash dispensers warned they were empty: only one seemed to work. I went there. The withdrawal attempt was accepted. The machine started counting banknotes, but stopped in the middle and finally rejected my card. I tried once again—same result.

As I needed some hard cash, I went to another bank. There several dispensers actually had cash. But now, the dispenser told me otherwise: I exceeded my allowed withdrawal limit and could not withdraw anymore. What the…? Had non-withdrawn money been counted as actually withdrawn?

Two days and several attempts later, I managed to reach a hotline support. At the other end of the line, some girl half-assedly explained that each of my attempts had been counted as a withdrawal, even as nothing was actually withdrawn from my account. "Oh, and you tried hard!" Well, of course, you idiot. This is my money, and as long as I did not actually withdrew it beyond the limit, I have absolutely every right to get it.

Apparently, the absurdity of this peculiar bookkeeping did not reach the weak neurons of my interlocutor. And she could not do anything as only my "personal" bank advisor, whom I have never seen, could cancel my dead-in-the-womb attempts. Guess female hypergamy does (mostly) not extend to being actually competent.

Several calls later, the so-called advisor could not be reached, no matter the time I would call at or the amounts of emails I would send. Thus I remained unable to pay for my bills during more than a week in spite of being financially able to.

This is not the only time I witnessed this kind of phenomena. If you are over 25 and traveled a bit, you likely went through it too. Upon your arrival on a new country, you reach your PayPal account and… get blocked because of where you're connecting from. Then you must answer a ton of security questions, type a security code sent by SMS, and send a new passport photo—but you created your account years ago, so you forgot the answer to at least one of these questions, your passport is a new one, and your mobile phone subscription does not have a roaming function. You absolutely need some digital money, but you're blocked—and your investing in bitcoin won't give you the immediate availability PayPal boasts. What will you do?

To be honest, PayPal is far from the worst. Their security proceedings are a pain to go through, especially when you have other, more interesting things to do. But at least you can reach PayPal human representatives from time to time. A friend of mine, who had his passport number rejected by the payment platform for an unknown reason (poor algorithm programming?), managed to get acknowledged anyway after an employee validated his passport scan. AirBnB is much worse. I had to cancel a weekend travel after that proverbial SJW-ran platform rejected my passport scan—and I swear I scanned it perfectly—then sent my asking for help to the "website community" instead of validating it by hand.

Automation has always been controversial. More than two centuries ago, workers called the Luddites destroyed factory machines because they feared these could make them jobless. Today, companies automate whatever they can in a never-ending quest to reduce costs. The more this happens, the worst everything becomes (except, perhaps, the shareholders' already fattened purse).

Blue collars are reduced to fixing machines, white collars are now girls who babble endlessly in cushy offices whereas illegal or foreign workers do the real jobs machines cannot do, and customers get a crappy service from either non-human processes or wastes of oxygen. Talk about a better world.

Most FAQs state the obvious or expand on what you can already see in the menu. They seem to be written by two-digit IQ or robots for a borderline retarded public. "Community" people, on the other hand, are unpaid suckers who do the work actual employees should do, except that they have no access to the back office, which makes them unable to help when you need something as simple as a handful of papers validated by hand. (Did I even tell of the cat ladies and beta orbiters you meet in these forums?) Needless to say, these Internet roaches will almost always assume you did a mistake even when the malfunctioning of the company's automated processes is glaringly obvious.

By a strange turn of fate, it seems like the more automated working processes are, the most degenerate humans get. Two centuries of factory work allowed the population to multiply, giving us a raft-of-the-Medusa-like world where space turned scarce, where normal Westerners are being replaced, where many Westerners embody various degenerative trends and where the mean IQ is under 100.

We did not need a world with so many automated processes and idiots. A less technology-advanced, less populous world would likely be a much better place. Men could be masculine, women could be feminine, and everyone could develop her own virtues instead of having to make stunts to get some attention.

SJWism and virtue-signaling are but distorted caricatures of true care and relationships. When narcissistic executives like Sherryl Sandberg get paid lofty wages so they can write self-celebrating books, do not wait for them or their employees to take care about you, no matter the amount of work you did or how much you paid. (And I'm not even talking of basic deontology or ethics. Companies should obviously care about their customers, of course, but even a free or a cheap service should not be an excuse to be uncaring assholes.)

Hello, I'm the Tikkun Olam Bank/PayPal/AirBNB/Literally Hitler, just let me crap on your face, you know there's nothing you can do. Or can you?

The solution, I guess, is being self-reliable as much as you can. Stack cash. Grow your own vegetables. Trade with people you actually know. Form a network of friends, relatives, you can trust. Companies that are supposed to make your life easier have been hijacked: when they aren't blocking you out of sheer incompetence, carelessness or outsourcing, they will spy on you, then join witch hunts. When you need actual attention, they're not there—just as many Western girls you can ramshackle when your game is tight will be unable to actually relate with you if you want more than sex.

The post-human, trans-everything, fully automated anything does not make us happier. At bottom, the quest for outsourcing is fueled by sociopathy—just as the wish to cut down the costs by firing honest fellows when you're already a multi-millionaire is the symptom of an unseemly greed. If an alt-bank, or alt-AirBNB, or alt-whatever emerges, with human representatives we can reach, I will happily join. Before that, I plan to rely only minimally on these services.

Good luck to those who build us an alt-grid.

Read Next: Twitter On The Road To Bankruptcy Thanks To Supporting Censorship And Social Justice

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Did Former President George H. W. Bush Cop A Feel On C-List Actress Heather Lind?

October 29, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

After seeing a picture of former Presidents gathered to discuss hurricane disaster relief, actress Heather Lind wrote a social media post alleging an untoward encounter by former President George H.W. Bush four years ago. Following that, MSN—the MSM's fountainhead of fair and unbiased coverage—released a new bombshell, "Heather Lind accuses ex-Prez George H.W. Bush of sexual assault", documenting allegations from this now-deleted Instagram post which was hashtagged #MeToo.

It begins:

> "I found it disturbing because I recognize the respect ex-presidents are given for having served. And I feel pride and reverence toward many of the men in the photo. But when I got the chance to meet George H. W. Bush four years ago to promote a historical television show I was working on, he sexually assaulted me while I was posing for a similar photo," Lind, 34, wrote.
>
> "He didn't shake my hand. He touched me from behind from his wheelchair with his wife Barbara Bush by his side. He told me a dirty joke. And then, all the while being photographed, touched me again. Barbara rolled her eyes as if to say 'not again.' His security guard told me I shouldn't have stood next to him for the photo."

Uh oh! Then this:

> "It seems to me a President's power is in his or her capacity to enact positive change, actually help people, and serve as a symbol of our democracy. He relinquished that power when he used it against me and, judging from the comments of those around him, countless other women before me," Lind wrote.

Further, she indicated that she came forth following others telling their stories. As the article concludes, the Harvey Weinstein mess appears to be the background for this, which perhaps involved more than a pat on the butt by the famous Hollywood mogul.

So what really happened?

Somerset..., Wales, United Kingdom, 5 hours ago

Unfortunately we live in a society where 'being a victim' is seen as fashionable. In much the same trend as being 'oppressed'. All this does however is cheapen the real crimes out there and make it harder for genuine victims to come forward.

New Comment | Reply Click to rate 74 1

Rockcom, New York, United States, 5 hours ago

He should have stuck his thumb up her ass so that she would really have something to complain about.

New Comment | Reply Click to rate 53 4

Bluwater, Naples, United States, 5 hours ago

This is not sexual assault!

New Comment | Reply Click to rate 51 4

Comments at the Daily Mail are fierce!

The article doesn't give us much to go on here. Did Bush the Elder perhaps nudge her in the backside? That seems to be what this is driving at, but the specifics are unclear. Was it an inadvertent shoulder brush, or something intentional? Did it even happen this way?

As for his side of the story, we don't have too much to go on here. However, the writeup by the Daily Mail includes the following aftermath, delivered by a spokesman:

> President Bush would never—under any circumstance—intentionally cause anyone distress, and he most sincerely apologizes if his attempt at humor offended Ms. Lind.

Could this have been the limerick beginning "There once was a man from Nantucket"? Without further background on it, that's really hard to say—once again, did it even happen this way? Hell, the guy is known for apologizing for everything, including the well-deserved "misguided Marin County hot-tubber" comment about John Walker Lindh (hopefully not a relative).

All this puts me in a very odd position here, doing something I never expected I'd do:

stand up for Bush the Elder, once at the forefront of a thundering herd of neoconservative RINOs. This is the guy who thought The Simpsons was too sassy for his tastes. During his presidency, the media had to make a big deal out of his dislike for broccoli, apparently during a slow news day or something. Further, he's been suffering from severe health problems since 2000. All told, if these allegations turn out to be true—a pretty big "if" given that it's basically a one-sided story at this point—then the most probable conclusion is that Bush the Elder was having a senior moment.

Dear Reader, suppose that you were in a retirement home, waiting to see an aged relative. Then a little old lady rolls up in a wheelchair, executes an Elderly Opener maladroitly, and botches a Kino Escalation—perhaps even patting you on the butt. Would your response be any of the following?

- Laugh it off and give Mildred a big hug.
- Point out the old feller looking wistfully from the corner; "He looks like a nice guy, and I find it touching that yours was the last generation that truly appreciated productive men with pleasant personalities."
- Thank her for her service in the WAVES, defending San Francisco and Los Angeles from imminent conquest by the Japs.
- File a police report against the dirty old lady.

All the above are wrong answers. You're supposed to blog about the encounter four years later!

Conclusion

Was a thirty-year-old starlet, standing beside several others—including the former First Lady—truly at risk from an old guy in a wheelchair who hadn't held the reins of power since Bill Clinton took over in January 1993? Some truly heinous things do happen sometimes, but this doesn’t seem to be one of them. There was no element of blackmail, potential career damage, or threat of force. Why did this story even surface—was it a slow news day once again?

Perhaps flimsy allegations with nothing beyond a little uncomfortableness finally have jumped the shark. One could only hope.

Read More: New Evidence Suggests Mattress Rape Victim Emma Sulkowicz Made It Up

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

What It’s Like To Meet Muslim Women In Morocco

October 29, 2017 | by Otto Theudoricus | Link | Original Link

The kingdom of Morocco is a post-colonial country made up mainly of Arabs and Amazigh (Berber) people. As a result of its past but also its proximity, the nation is still heavily influenced by its northern neighbours, yet it retains a very distinct culture of its own with Sunni Islam as the overwhelmingly majority religion. It occupies the most north-western part of Africa with the Atlantic covering its entire western shore and the Mediterranean to its north.

If you speak French you’ll have an easier time as the locals speak it more than English.

What you can expect to find

Beautiful women seem to be in abundance and are more than happy to be approached by a foreigner with light features. In fact, depending on the environment, they may even initiate the interaction. This may be in part due to their exotic looks in relation to many people visiting Morocco and the novelty factor.

For the most part, you'll find that the women have very swarthy features, usually dark brown to jet black hair and brown eyes. Skin colour varies a lot, from very white European looking to dark brown, which can be observed following a north-south pattern. You could compare South American girls to them as in they have similar facial features and are very curvy. Racially, they are comparable to Iberians, who of course colonised and settled much of Latin America.

Being not only a Muslim country but also ruled by an Islamic dictatorship, which basically means the law of the land is drawn from their own interpretation of the Koran, Morocco is very conservative and patriarchal. People have very close families and are expected to follow traditional norms. Therefore, the hook-up lifestyle of the West is not acceptable, or at least on the surface.

However, women do have almost equal rights and are not expected to cover up (the burqa is actually banned). It is somewhat of a free country and I think the best way to describe it politically is a benevolent dictatorship with the king allowing enough free trade and limited dissent to keep people from full on revolt.

The Tinder match rate I experienced was unprecedented, approximately 1 in 3 and more than 50% of these replied to my first message. Living in the UK in a medium sized town, I've always had a 1 in 8 or 10 match ratio and 20% reply rate. So, within a matter of days

I had more conversations than I could manage.

You will be more respected simply for being male

Flakiness is rare so if a girl agrees to meet, you won't get some last-minute lame excuse like "oh my friend recently broke up from her boyfriend and needs moral support". You don't need to be this overly extroverted entertainer to keep a girl's attention either; you can be normal.

Remember, in Muslim countries men are still respected by women and girls will be more honest with you. A girl even said she was "lucky" to meet me! Back in Western Europe, most men are scrambling and tripping over themselves just to get a girl's attention, only to be used as a self-esteem prop that these wannabe narcissistic goddesses need to maintain their pseudo confidence. So as long as you're not a completely spineless beta, you'll do just fine.

The honey trap

Beware! Premarital sex is illegal in Morocco, although hard to prove if reported. Corruption is rife so if the police are involved, you could find yourself in a sticky situation if you can't offer a "payment" to "resolve" the problem.

In night clubs especially, you will find very friendly girls offering themselves to you rather easily—too easily in fact. These are de facto prostitutes and you should tread carefully. They'll ask you to go to another club with her and some friends and then perhaps back to her apartment. Sometimes it's innocent and she'll simply use you to buy drinks before going back to her place for a 400 Dirham (around £35).

Once I found myself in the bar buying another round of drinks when this girl and three of her friends were begging me to go with them to another club. As the barman served me, he leaned over and said "don't go". I took his advice—this is a commonly used tactic to rob unsuspecting horny male tourists distracted by these long-haired curvy Moroccan honey traps. About an hour before, I'd tipped the same barman 20 Dirham, which is a lot over there, therefore my unwitting generosity probably saved me a lot of hassle.

If you meet a girl and want to spend the night together, it could be difficult if you're staying in a hotel. The staff won't allow unmarried couples to share a room or to bring girls back who are not guests. You could try sneaking her in but that would be risky. Your best bet is renting a private apartment and keeping a low profile.

When on a date they rarely look at their phone and will have their eyes fixated on you. Other than the obvious differences shared which serve as a good topic of conversation, you can talk about anything. You won't have any trouble keeping her attention as long as you don't do or say anything creepy.

I found the best way to get a Moroccan girl into bed was to arrange a day time date first, like a walk along the beach depending on which city you're in. Follow it with an evening date in a bar or restaurant. To avoid drawing too much attention I'd recommend not holding hands or showing signs of affection. This actually adds to the sexual tension: when you get back to your apartment she won't be able to hold back and things will escalate very quickly.

I kept in contact with several women after leaving. I then got into a relationship with a girl in the town I currently live in. Another girl blocked me after I told her, only to message me a few weeks later asking me to come back over to her place, saying, "Don't worry I won't tell your girlfriend". In short they'll tolerate you sleeping with other women.

A coastal city in southern Morocco

Conclusion

Morocco is definitely a place to go if you want to find beautiful women who have not been poisoned by cultural Marxism. Also, it’s a beautiful country with vast deserts, a large mountain range and an amazing coastline, and your money goes a long way. Just don’t fall for the pushy sales tactics locals use, and always negotiate on prices.

Read Next: 6 Quick Game Tips For Meeting Ukrainian Girls

Otto Theudoricus
An ageing millennial, recently red pilled and on a mission to restore common sense and promote traditional values. Fairly well travelled and bilingual with an interest in history and currently living in the UK.

How To Dress Well With Only A Handful Of Interchangeable Pieces Of Clothing

October 29, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Previously, I had done an article on the very basics of men's fashion and style, discussing the principles of color contrast, fit, and matching the clothing to the setting. And those alone will enable you to dress better than the overwhelming majority of the shuffling biped bovines that represent modern humanity. But if you really want to dress good, in contexts both formal and casual and everything in between, you're going to have to undergo more in-depth study of the matter. And in my opinion the most important concept to learn for true knowledge of couture is that of interchangeability.

What Is Interchangeability?

Interchangeability is, I freely admit, not a concept that I came up with. We are all "standing on the shoulders of giants" who have already done much of the theoretical "heavy lifting", and thus we can learn from those who came before us rather than constantly reinventing the wheel. And in this case I learned from Antonio Centeno who also maintains his own website at A Tailored Suit, which is where I gleaned a good amount of my fashion knowledge.

Interchangeability is the idea that, instead of having a million different individual articles of clothing, you have a relative few articles of clothing that can be switched and swapped with each other depending on the occasion or event you are entering. With interchangeable clothes, you have limitless options for outfits depending on the weather, season, and level of formality and gravity of a day.

His terrible haircut aside, this outfit can be easily dressed up or down with the addition of a tie and fully buttoning the shirt, or removal of the jacket., respectively.

When you become fluent at interchanging articles of clothing for different occasions, you open yourself up to limitless options to make the most out of your dress shirts, ties, pants, suits, jackets, and shoes, even if your quantity of outfits is limited (and I advocate that it should be, because I'm not into the whole "spending money" thing).

You want to arrange your wardrobe to maximize interchangeability. A rule of thumb for thinking about this is that you want clothes that can be aesthetically fitting in various ensembles in the greatest variety of weather and situations.

A neutral colored shirt like this is interchangeable in a wide variety of situations

Whereas pastels and light trousers like this are less so. These are best worn in the summer only.

How To Be Interchangeable

Why do you think white dress shirts are the go-to shirt? Because it has neutral colors and is thus interchangeable with many sorts of other articles of clothing.

Old reliable

Similarly, you want to begin building your wardrobe with the old reliable standbys such as brown sports coats, black trousers, and navy suits: neutral colors that allow you to mix and match without spending a lot of money.

A classic example of neutral colors working well together

Bear in mind of course that these are just suggestions, interchangeability doesn't have to be merely earth tones and dark suits—I am a man who wears a white suit on fairly regular occasions in the summer, to cite one example previously discussed, and for lighter fabrics and colors the white jacket and slacks are made very interchangeable indeed.

Another thing to bear in mind is fabric weight/warmth: medium weight fabrics are the most fashionable, due to the same principle of interchangeability. For example, a medium sweater is better–which is to say more fashionable—than a heavy sweater (in terms of aesthetics) because it can be worn in more seasons and weathers and it will likely present that always desirable streamlined silhouette, whereas a heavy sweater is bulky and can only be worn in the coldest weather. Of course, when practicality is needed, fashion standards can be loosened.

Sure there are more stylish overcoats you can wear, but when your life is at stake, you forgo fashion.

Incorporate your style into the interchangeable wardrobe. The “moderate pieces” are often kind of muted and neutral in color and pattern, so you have to make them shine by combining them with other pieces. The best way to observe this is to, what else, look in a mirror.

When experimenting with interchangeability, you have to balance between “classic style” and your own personal style, which is to say whatever image you wish to convey for yourself. Moderation is the key-if you’re too classic, you look generic. If you’re too personal, you look contrived and unnatural.

No!

Then, once you’ve begun to build a wardrobe, you can begin experimenting with bolder colors and patterns. Remember the discussion of contrasts that I discussed in the first fashion article I wrote: the colors have to work for YOU, not anyone else. Whatever it is you’re endeavoring to do, in order to bend the rules, you must first learn the rules. And THEN you can experiment.

Read More: How To Dress Stylishly In Hot Weather

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Would The World Be Safer For Women If They Were Declared The Legal Property Of Men?

October 30, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

It is grim to realise that we have reached a point where our contemporary society is so sick, that it could be healthier for everyone if women were imposed the legal status of property instead of being free individuals. The fact that this absurd method could indeed create a safer society shows how cancerous our “progressive” Western world has become.

How it would work

Women would keep the status of human beings even by becoming property. They would become the asset of a Senior Male Authority (SMA) from birth until his death or their own. In practice, the bond between man and female property would resemble the one between a legal guardian and a minor, incapacitated senior or mentally handicapped adult.

With women being children in adult bodies, the comparison is appropriate. But where the authority of the legal guardian expires in time, the right over female property would not be finite. All decisions would be taken by the SMA (father, older brother, then husband). The auction of a young woman from a father to a suitor of his choice would be agreed upon by setting a dowry.

Purchasing power would be in the hands of the SMA, preventing women to spend male income on frivolous and useless items like female "holidays" (the real sex tourism), designer clothes, drugs, club entrances and the like.

Women becoming property: the barrel bomb of dread game

This measure would include the right of repudiation for the husband in case of serious misconduct. The decision would have to be studied and approved by a jury of adult all-male peers.

Repudiation would be efficient to keep women in line because they greatly fear being called out, held accountable, and losing resources or status because of self-inflicted behaviour, and this proposal would not deprive them from love. On the contrary, because of the affection that a man shows towards his property (added to the blood or family bound), the women he acquires will be safer. His “investment” has both a financial implication in addition to an emotional one.

To the triggered liberals, women are already property in Islam. But all I hear about it from the left on social media are crickets. Contrary to Shariah law, my theory does not include whipping, gang rape, honour killing, beheading or stoning when women are at fault.

10 societal benefits of declaring women legal property

Choose wisely

1. No women in the military or police, so men and women would die less.

2. Divorce would plummet and single mommery would become a rarity.

3. No access to funds (under SMA supervision) for women would benefit the global economy.

4. Being a negotiable asset, women would be under constant male protection.

5. Women (and men) would die less of drug, tobacco, alcohol abuse and the heart diseases, cancers and violent or accidental deaths caused by it.

6. Due to heavy competition, women would have to be thinner, reducing the epidemic of obesity and the health risks that it involves.

7. Less child mortality and death during childbirth (women giving birth younger combined with better healthcare hence greater chances of survival).

8. No more left-leaning parties elected as women would be deprived of the right to vote.

9. Conservative governments elected by men would favour traditional families over leeches and degenerates.

10. Less domestic violence as women would avoid damaged men, having no personal resources (and hitting your woman would be like keying your own car: pointless).

7 ways this proposal would bring balance to the sexual market

1. No more welfare policies encouraging women to remain single or raise bastards. Welfare would be focused on those who need it the most, like veterans or the elderly.

2. No more inflated ego and instant gratification through attention whoring on social media. Its restricted access would create saner women. Promotion of degeneracy would be greatly reduced in the mainstream and social media.

3. No Instagram prostitution for wealthy sheikhs, being defiled for platform shoes and handbags with “stylish” patterns worthy of a child doodle.

4. Women would actively seek males based on their ability to provide, as they would have no alternative access to wealth.

5. Males would access a healthier sexual market, their hard work being rewarded by regular sexual intercourse, relative loyalty and children.

6. No more violent third world hordes imported by the votes of bitter women. No more homosexual agenda, gateway to the next great taboo, the pedophile-friendly agenda.

7. Professional advancement and success earned by women through sexual favours, like the one popular in Hollywood, would virtually disappear as adultery would be a valid reason for repudiation. “Promotion through horizontal refreshment” would only be used by already repudiated women, nothing of value would be lost.

Women being property would render this model obsolete

L’ami Bonaparte avait de l’idée

It is not a panacea. The nature of women can’t be changed, but women-as-property would be finally held accountable after the “empowered” ones spent such a long time driving the Western world into the ground.

Read More: Women Must Have Their Behavior And Decisions Controlled By Men

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Donald Trump’s Former Campaign Manager Paul Manafort Indicted By Special Prosecutor Robert Mueller

October 30, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Bloomberg:

Paul Manafort, a former campaign manager for President Donald Trump, and his onetime business partner became the first people charged in the broad investigation into Russian meddling with the U.S. election.

The charges against Manafort and Rick Gates indicate that Special Counsel Robert Mueller’s probe is intensifying and could pose a danger to the White House. Investigators are likely to pressure the pair to cooperate with prosecutors in a bid for leniency and to disclose everything that they know about Trump’s campaign.

Manafort and Gates face money laundering, conspiracy and tax charges in a 12-count indictment.

Trump has repeatedly dismissed the probe as “the single greatest witch hunt in American political history.” The White House appeared rattled over the weekend, and on Sunday administration officials were uncertain who would be arrested, with the president tweeting that investigators should focus instead on Hillary Clinton and the Democratic Party.

Early Monday, prosecutors told Manafort and Gates to surrender. Mueller’s demand caught both men by surprise, with their allies confident that they were safe for now.

Manafort, wearing a suit and tie, drove past a crowd of photographers and cameramen in a black SUV as he left his Alexandria, Virginia, home around 8 a.m., according to photos and videos posted on Twitter. Gates lives in Richmond, Virginia.

The federal charges put the prospect of a presidential pardon front and center, a potential wild card for Mueller’s investigation. Trump has said on Twitter that the president has “complete power” to pardon. But doing so could deepen the legal trouble of those in Trump’s circle because prosecutors could then try to compel pardoned individuals to testify since they lose some Fifth Amendment protections.

Manafort is also under investigation by authorities in New York state, where the president wouldn’t have authority to issue a pardon.

Trump’s reaction to the charges — which could also include messages to witnesses to stay quiet — should be watched carefully, former U.S. attorney Preet Bharara said on CNN’s “State of the Union.”

Manafort, 68, has been under investigation by Mueller for months for work before he joined the Trump campaign. A top Republican strategist who also worked extensively for foreign politicians, he left the presidential campaign after only a few months in 2016 when information surfaced about his earlier work in Ukraine for a pro-Russian party, which intensified scrutiny of his past business dealings.

Gates worked with Manafort on Trump's campaign and political campaigns in Ukraine. After Manafort left the campaign, he stayed on and later joined the president-elect's inaugural committee. He was said to be working with Thomas Barrack, a wealthy Los Angeles investor and Trump confidant, and the two often visited the White House together.

The charges were filed in federal court in Washington. Calls to representatives for the two men weren't immediately returned.

Manafort joined Trump's campaign in March 2016 and managed it from June to August, when he resigned amid questions about his work for pro-Russian politicians in Ukraine. He has said he knows nothing of Russian interference. Mueller is also investigating possible obstruction of justice by Trump and other crimes by his associates.

Mueller's office was especially aggressive in its pursuit of Manafort, scrutinizing whether he laundered money from Eastern Europe into New York properties, complied with the Foreign Agents Registration Act, and paid taxes on international clients he advised, particularly in Ukraine.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: The Deep State Now Has The Upper Hand Against Donald Trump

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

3 Vital Social Norms That Cultural Marxism Is Destroying

October 30, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

A harmonious and well-run society relies on the general acceptance of several social norms, a few of which I'll describe. These were once uncontroversial; fairly instinctively, everyone understood them and considered deviance repugnant. However, cultural Marxism now seeks to "deconstruct" them, using recently-created buzzwords to reframe normality as something bad. Fair is foul and foul is fair.

Unfortunately for them, biology disagrees. Typically they'll use lofty rhetoric about individualism and even human rights. However, breaking out the fife and drums doesn't change the fact that personal whims aren't always good for society, or even the individual. Laws of nature don't go away by wishing reality was different, and social engineering that disregards them brings consequences.

Gender essentialism

Just some average ladies elegantly showing grace and charm

What this buzzword means: There are meaningful differences between the sexes.

When I was three years old, I could observe from among my peers that boys and girls acted differently and had different interests. Later, I understood that these differences complement each other and result from evolutionary biology. Leftist sociologists (less clever than a three year old) claim these differences don't exist. They argue that everyone is programmed by society—or "the Patriarchy", for their new buzzword—into sex-specific roles and behaviors. They cling to this viewpoint, despite extensive research contradicting it.

The "gender is a social construct" line basically argues that humans are an exception to the biological rule that advanced species have sexual dimorphism. To believe that all differences (beyond a few unimportant anatomical characteristics) result from social conditioning, one also would have to believe that all societies worldwide came up with the idea during prehistoric times—independently, arbitrarily, and with basically the same particulars. Further, one would have to believe that these supposedly irrational customs were maintained everywhere for thousands of years, until the feminists came along and told everyone that we're doing it all wrong.

Consequences of rejecting normality: Too many problems have resulted from feminism to describe in merely one article. I'll focus on the most relevant item here. Men don't like unladylike women, and women don't like guys who act like spineless emo wimps. Unfortunately, that's exactly what's been promoted lately, and it's making both men and women unhappy.

Heteronormativity

Just some average dudes.

What this buzzword means: Heterosexuality is normal.

About 96-98% of the public (depending on the survey) is straight. Heterosexuality is default because evolution promotes fertility to ensure species survival. As for the rest, there's a decent libertarian-style argument for tolerating differences and accepting their right to privacy. That, however, isn't a good reason to make society bend over backwards (or forwards) to accommodate them in other ways. The tail does not wag the dog.

With tolerance and acceptance handled, the next step was mandatory celebration; virtue-signaling by politicians and corporations has gone pretty far toward that. The media has been especially instrumental. The public believes that over 20% of the population is gay; quite a testament to their power to alter perception of reality. The next steps, naturally, are forced participation and punishing those who disagree. They've gone far, but it's doubtful we've seen the end of that.

If the gay agenda was merely about the right to do private things behind closed doors, it wouldn't be too controversial. Gay parades and social venues aren't too big a deal either; it's understandable that they want institutions of their own, and the rest of us aren't required to participate. However, their agenda has been allowed to go too far: forcing their way into explicitly straight organizations, expecting society to change long-standing customs to cater to them, and even bringing this into schools. This is what happens when heterosexuality isn't regarded as particularly normal and advantageous.

Consequences of rejecting normality: In the early 2000s, extremist positions suddenly became incessant demands, things that not even average liberals advocated or wanted previously.

These included gay marriage (an unprecedented alteration), gays in the military (a distraction at best and serious morale problem at worst), and even the Boy Scouts (what possibly could go wrong?) There could've been reasonable compromises: civil unions as a parallel institution, all-gay military units (perhaps even a Navy "Love Boat"), and gay camping clubs (18+ please). However, the activists have been telling the public "my way or the highway" and using the courts as a societal battering ram.

There are further consequences too; for a couple of examples, erosion of public morality, and the drain on the public health system from treating STDs endemic in their prolific hookup culture.

Cisnormativity

Just an average… I'm not sure what this is.

What this buzzword means: There are two sexes, male and female.

Transsexuals are three tenths of the general population, a small fraction of the GLBTQQIAOMGWTF fruit salad. Just as with homosexuals, this is reproductively maladaptive. Of this 0.3% of the public, a far smaller number actually have something biologically wrong with them. For the rare few with genetic disorders, it's reasonable to be understanding, but that doesn't necessitate rearranging society in their image.

As for the rest, transsexuals are delusional, considering themselves to be something they're not. These confused people have been led to believe that their feelings are more real than biology. Enabling this is not compassion, and it certainly doesn't make sense for society to indulge this neurosis.

Consequences of rejecting normality: This group delusion has increased considerably, facilitated by the recent bombardment from the media and even the schools.

The worst part is what this is doing to children. Usually kids with “gender dysphoria” grow out of this phase. However, lately some have been encouraged to ruin their bodies with puberty-blocking drugs, hormone “therapy”, and even surgery. It began as junk science with disastrous consequences, and remains a horrible form of child abuse. When they start growing up and realize what’s been done to them, there’ll be hell to pay.

Conclusion

This is how it rolled back when things were still pretty sane.

An ideology not grounded in reality will not produce good results. A major problem with cultural Marxism is that they don’t know when to stop pushing. It’s about time that we stand up as one and tell them to shut up and quit wrecking our society.

Read More: Are You Ready To Live In A Society That Pressures Toddlers To Become Transgender?

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Why I Ate My Pet Pig And You Should Too

October 30, 2017 | by Papa Selo | Link | Original Link

As a joke once, I offhand mentioned that I would love a pet pig. Of course, I was on a Tinder date so naturally my girl did not hesitate to call out my bluff. Next thing you know, we were on a train riding deep into the Slovakian countryside. An exhausting half day later, and a one month old baby Bacon was on his merry way to a new home. Little did he know, however, that he was resting in the arms of his future butcher.

Yes, I did raise a pet pig. Yes, he was a pain in the ass, but most importantly, he was fucking delicious. Some of you may think this to be borderline psychopathic, but I can assure you this is simply nature, and a man has got to get his fix. This is especially true for Western men whose daily habits of consumption are woefully removed the real source of his nutrition.

Mark Zuckerberg was right though, it’s best to kill the meat you eat. I can tell you this, however, I would never, ever consider eating a dog or a cat. The thing is, without having lived with a pig for some time, I cannot blame anyone for thinking that they might make worthwhile pets. Mini pigs have, after all, been flooding Instagram lately, and while they seem intelligent and highly sociable, I can guarantee you that after spending enough time with one you will see them less as friends and more as food.

The following are five reasons you should absolutely avoid adopting a pig as a pet and eat it instead.

Intelligent as fuck-all

Pigs, especially Gottingen “mini pigs” (the kind you see all over social media), are incredibly intelligent, though not in the way you’d imagine. You’d think that because it literally takes a day to teach your pig to potty train, and all of five minutes to teach it to spin for a treat, that they’d fetch your slippers or keep you warm at night.

On the contrary, they are selfish, repugnant, and hyper-intelligent in all the wrong ways. Unless it’s about their next meal, your commands will be not only be directly ignored but fucked with.

Instead of fetching your slippers they’ll shit on them without remorse, as if keenly aware that ruining your property would be insulting to you. Instead of sleeping next to you, ready, and waiting in guard position, they will find a comfy spot squarely on your forehead, burrow down and screech to high heaven if you motion to remove them. Rinse and repeat they will, despite many deserved beatings. Brats.

Stubborn as hell

Ran out of good food for the afternoon? Once they taste anything other than the pet store gruel you're meant to feed them, there's no going back. One day, I made the mistake of feeding baby Bacon too many apples and bananas.

After one late evening at work, I returned to what appeared to be a walking skeleton. So used to the sweetness of a rich red apple, my little piglet refused to touch the overfull, brimming bowl of high-powered protein pellets I left him for the day. There's a reason we call ungrateful people pigs.

Dirty as shit

Pigs shit and piss a lot. At two months old, baby Bacon would urinate approximately 8 times a day at his recommended daily consumption of 1 litre of protein-infused water. Shitting twice daily, that's a load of crap! If you fail to empty its litter box every single day, you're in for a grotesque surprise. One day after work I found a fully grown toadstool in his poop.

Needless to say, I was disgusted. On top of this, pigs mature extremely quickly, becoming sexually active at two to three months of age. Sooner than I could blink, baby Bacon was a teenager, leaving crusty white semen everywhere he went. I am not joking! Say goodbye to the sanctity of your blankets and pillows unless you keep your piggy away from you at night, and your bed coverings stored away during the day.

Clearly, my patience for the little porkchop would soon grow very thin. For all of the six effortless lays he got me via Instagram posts, his marginal value was clearly declining as a function of upkeep.

Women don't respect them

For all the flack I've given baby Bacon, he was entertaining at times, and did lead directly to a small number of lays over the two months I had fed and watched him grow. Unfortunately, I wasn't pulling the numbers I thought I would by raising him.

Girls may think the experience novel, but ultimately they could care less. I did in fact notice a difference in reactions between women in different age groups, with MILFs being more confused than anything, and college girls getting overboard obsessed until they would rather it stop voraciously humping their legs.

At the end of the day, you will definitely lose more potential lays raising a pig, especially if you do so alone, because of the extra time it takes compared to biweekly night game. A pig will evoke some interesting reactions from the women you court, but unless you're not totally bored with your life it's best to just stick with what works, and don't venture too far from a German Shepard.

They grow too quickly

At three months of age, baby Bacon was 20kg, the weight of an average dumbbell and growing uglier by the day, sprouting a beakish mouth in place of the cute button nose he proudly displayed when I first wrestled him away from the desperate clutches of his birthmother. While the novelty of a baby pig, much less a mini pig, is an amazing opener, especially for online game via Instagram or Facebook, you'll be hard pressed to even take the fucker on walks so unless you plan on personally slaving over your living cutlet at home all day long, what's the point really?

The tiny spring porklet I rescued from definite farm slaughter just a few months prior was growing into a beast and fast, at a rate of 5kg, then 10kg in the first and second month, respectively. While a true mini pig is supposed to be grow slowly, I did read online prior to purchasing it for $50 at the farm that you can never really know ahead of time.

The reality is pigs come in all shapes and sizes. Their growth is too hard to predict without observing them closely for a few months. They also all lack a hunger inhibition so without discipline it is very easy to overfeed them. Even small deviations from their optimal diet can lead to unexpectedly fast growth.

All in all, it was getting to be much more work measuring his meal portions than merely resigning to the meal I would soon come to make of him. So, at the end of the day I decided to fire up a special roast. Ultimately, this little piggy really did live up to its name.

Disposal and cooking recipes

Assuming you own a pet pig and have followed along, you should by now know what you're going to have to do:

When disposing of a baby piglet, it's important to remember not to startle it before execution. The meat is most succulent when little cortisol is running through its fibres, so it is best to get it drunk beforehand. Here are the preparation instructions and recipe:

- Do not feed your future meal for 24 hours prior to execution. It may drink.
- When ready to proceed, pour 1 litre of beer into its regular water bowl.
- Once totally inebriated, take to a shower, and with a heavy plumber's wrench crack its skull with a single powerful strike. This should kill it instantly. Make sure to kill it on the first swing, so as not to delay pain. A quick and ethical death blow is best.
- Take a 12 inch stainless steel kitchen knife or something similar and cut off its head. Toss immediately into a thick, voluminous garbage bag.
- Do not mix with public garbage waste bin. I do not know your jurisdiction's laws and I am not a lawyer, so make sure you dispose of its bodily contents properly and comply with all local bylaws.
- Take a shoelace and tie its two hind legs together, tying the other end to the shower head, letting all blood drain into shower.
- Once fully drained, proceed to cut its stomach and remove all vital organs, as per this guide.
- It's not as hard as it looks. Just avoid the intestines in case there is any feces remaining. If the feces comes in contact with the meat, you're better off disposing of everything and forgetting about the succulent Lechon Asado just around the corner.

- Remove the hair with a blowtorch (do this outside, of course) or by dunking it into a barrel of scalding hot water. Once dunked, take a small kitchen knife and peel off all the hair you can. Any remaining hair will cause your place to smell wretched. Obviously, leave the skin if you like your meal salty and crispy.
- There are many recipes online for garnishing. This one is great.
- The best thing about small piglets is that they should fit directly into your oven. Place on a cooking rack and fire it up to 350F and simply let sit for 3.5-4 hours!

There's really not much to it! The naturally high fat content of a baby suckling pig will cause it to be extremely juicy, and will make it very difficult to overcook or burn. Don't be a bitch. Eat your pig. Bon Apetit! Dobar Tek!

Read Next: How To Identify A Roast Beef Vagina

Papa Selo

Papa Selo is a Croatian philosopher with an old soul. Aside from tending to his olive trees in the heart of Dalmatia, his singular passion is fjaka (doing absolutely nothing) in his village by the Adriatic sea.

5 Ways That The Modern “Rape” Hysteria Resembles Stalin’s Great Terror

October 31, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The bodies may not be stacking up like in Soviet times, but leftists in 2017 are copying Stalin’s playbook when it comes to dealing with highly dubious allegations of “rape” and “sexual assault.” Combining ideological fervor with shoddy “determinations” of guilt, SJWs are peddling fear and irrationality at every turn in trying to demonize the male gender.

Although he was a highly gifted politician and social strategist, the Soviet leader Joseph Stalin is infamous for his persecutions of millions of innocent Soviet citizens and foreigners. In order to secure his power during the 1930s, he embarked on an unprecedented policy of state-sanctioned butchering, beginning with show trials against senior Bolshevik colleagues and culminating in a more generalized pattern of extermination, known today as the Great Terror.

By the end of the 1930s, hundreds of thousands of run-of-the-mill people had been rounded up and executed, or were simply left to die through hunger, illness, or torture. Others were demoted, fired, or severely ostracized within their communities. In addition to the death toll and various forms of repression, what most characterized the Great Terror was the remarkable paranoia it cultivated in the minds of nearly every resident of the Soviet Union. “Will I be next?” thought tens of millions of everyday Russians, Ukrainians, and members of other Soviet nationalities.

In most cases, serious physical harm and death do not befall those spuriously accused of “rape” or “sexual assault” in the West today. Notwithstanding this, the paranoia and many of the methodologies of Stalin’s Great Terror are replicated in instances of “abusers” targeted by SJWs and their powerful enablers.

Here are the very unfortunate commonalities:

1. There are quotas for “convictions”

Senior British prosecutor Alison Saunders has led the charge for more rape convictions.

Sound convictions are far from a focus for SJWs, similar to the heyday of the Great Terror. In fact, the reverse is often true. What matters is the number of convictions, however unethically they are procured. To achieve this, SJWs start by saying things like, “Only 5% of rapes are ever reported.” Of course, an unreported “rape” is not a rape in reality because we have no idea whether it happened or not. That is irrelevant to SJWs; they’re all rapes for those who want more convictions.

Worst of all, this emphasis has now reached the highest echelons of our legal systems. In the United Kingdom, which we can assess more easily than the 50 states and countless counties of the United States, the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) has tried to “improve” conviction rates for years. With comparatively few real rapes and sexual assaults, walking past a woman in a London train station is enough for the state to chase after you.

Because most Soviet citizens and others residing in the Soviet Union were preoccupied with just surviving, Stalin and his henchmen had to literally search for people to take the place of largely imaginary dissidents, spies, and saboteurs. Those in the West finding themselves prosecuted over bogus claims of “rape” or “sexual assault” may not face a firing squad today, but the hunt for new “criminals” continues unabated.

2. Actual evidence is merely an inconvenience to be avoided

Forced confessions and a lack of objective evidence were the hallmarks of Stalin's show trials and the Great Terror. A lack of objective evidence is a defining feature of most rape trials today, too.

Unsubstantiated or plain anonymous denunciations were the order of the day throughout Stalin's Great Terror. The same can be said of contemporary "rape culture" witch-hunts. Beyond college campuses, which provide archetypal examples of how "rape" hysteria operates, men can be harassed, hounded out of places, and even impoverished or imprisoned via anonymous rumors. Alternatively, the names of accusers are only known to a select few, with serious prison sentences awaiting anyone who reveals who they are. Moreover, alleged evidence is rarely, if ever provided, let alone verified by something close to a court.

The personal stories that illustrate this disregard for proof are nothing short of gut-wrenching. Last year, mid-level comedian Aaron Glaser found himself blacklisted from the New York City comedy scene for "sexual abuse." His accusers, as far we know, were essentially unidentified. Many of those who vilified Glaser did so on the basis of random Facebook rants. The man's livelihood took a massive nosedive and his Twitter account nowadays reads like a conversation with himself. He has never faced charges, as you would expect with such a poorly backed-up set of accusations. This hasn't stopped the SJW mobs.

3. Those targeted must admit their "guilt" or face even harsher penalties

93-year-old men near their deathbed are now under attack.

The best chance of survival in either a Great Terror or a modern-day “rape” witch-hunt is to admit some kind of moral guilt or support the goals of the SJWs. Maintaining your innocence, nominally a legal right, only inflames your detractors. In the 1930s, a refusal to confess increased your chances of dying (regardless, many confessors were still executed in the end). The contemporary social climate is all about recognizing you engaged, at a minimum, in a form of sexual “misconduct” for which you should be sorry.

2017 is full of situations where apologies are forced, but one recent controversy should be singled out. Former US President George H. W. Bush has been very opportunistically accused of groping by at least two women. Besides his senility, Bush is presently stuck in a wheelchair and has issues moving his hands higher. If he did touch the buttocks of certain women, itself very debatable, the proposition that he went further and felt them up for sexual gratification is far from proven. After the groping allegations came to light, he and his spokespeople just had to apologize to the women involved. Anything less and this seriously ill man would become a pariah for rabid SJWs.

4. True believers are not spared from persecution

Where’s Nikolai?

Sure, it might often arouse schadenfreude in us, but it is also very troubling that the obsession with “rape culture” ends up devouring many of those who have otherwise furthered the SJW cause. If anything, the gobbling up of erstwhile fellow travelers is an attempt to legitimize the witch-hunts: “See, we are so dedicated to justice that we will mete it out to our best friends!” Stalin did this repeatedly, including with his main man in the NKVD, Nikolai Yezhov (and his predecessor).

Only days ago, Vice writer Sam Kriss was bitten badly by the same political beast he had fed for years. A girl (again, pretty much anonymously) accused him of sexual misconduct and Kriss consumed his medicine without complaint. He was fired, still maintaining his SJW beliefs, like how countless victims of Stalin pledged loyalty to him even as bullets, knives, and fists ended their lives.

Though there have been enough cases of male feminists being churned out for semi-believable rape or sexual assault stories, we need to be cautious. Social justice is a mental illness at its heart. I have no doubt that many men are so infected by their leftist activism that they would sacrifice themselves for the cause, genuinely believing that they raped or sexually assaulted their accusers when they actually did not.

5. Guilt by association or group membership is commonplace

Denounce, denounce, denounce, Ben and Matt!

Just as the family members and associates of those condemned during the Great Terror suffered, those connected with people accused of “rape” or “sexual assault” face immense challenges. Some in an accused’s social circle, due to the esteem in which they are held, are harder to unseat than others. Yet all should be regarded as vulnerable. A failure to attack your own kin or buddy after a “rape” or “sexual assault” allegation can lead to problems for years.

Inasmuch as I despise the selective, self-serving politics of, say, Meryl Streep, her denunciation of her “God” Harvey Weinstein is understandable. She had to join the fray of hungry leftist cannibals, lest her career suffer, no matter how much of a privileged leftist figure she may appear to be. So, too, did Matt Damon and Ben Affleck. The dilemma for these two, however, is that they are men. Affleck especially has been in the firing line and is currently being savaged for a video of him “groping” Hilarie Burton (who seemed to love the attention back then, might I add).

There are plenty of sad stories from the non-celebrity world as well. Paul Nungesser, the man falsely accused by whacko Emma Sulkowicz, became a marked man for the rest of his education at Columbia University. Former friends attacked him and entire groups of people avoided him. If you didn’t support Emma and denounce Paul, you were apparently supporting “rape.”

Are you ready for the purge?

Condemned, poorly “convicted” men awaiting their fate.

You should be. The fallout from the Harvey Weinstein scandal could go one of two ways. The accusations and denunciations, now impacting dozens of male celebrities, plus innumerable everyday men, might exhaust themselves temporarily, as happened two years ago when the James Deen story petered out. Whilst this is the better option, a new round of media-enabled show trials will resume some time after. Let’s call this the cyclical scenario.

Perhaps, though, the “rape” and “sexual abuse” hysteria will snowball like never before, sucking in more and more unfairly attacked men. If this second, dystopian possibility is how things turn out, don’t say we didn’t warn you.

Read More: The Bill Cosby Rape Scandal Is Just Another Example Of Modern Hysteria

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Kevin Spacey “Bravely” Comes Out As Gay After He’s Accused Of Sexually Assaulting A Child Actor

October 31, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

An actor from the SJW-themed Star Trek: Discovery, Anthony Rapp, has effectively accused Kevin Spacey of being a pedophile. In response, Spacey did not deny the allegation that he sexually manhandled a 14-year-old Rapp in the 1980s. Instead, he decided to come out as gay to deflect attention away from any attempted molestation of a child. He also blamed heavy inebriation for what might have taken place when he was 26. To boot, no one has adequately explained why the teenaged Rapp found himself in Spacey’s apartment for a party with alcohol.

Kevin Spacey’s name had already been thrown around as a potential sexual abuser for years. Only weeks ago, journalist Heather Unruh said that he sexually assaulted someone she knows in the past. After the Harvey Weinstein story broke, there seemed to be a severe reluctance in the media to go after Spacey. In fact, multiple outlets refused to name him “for legal reasons,” despite every woman and her dog getting fawning attention for their “truths” about Weinstein.

Anthony Rapp.

For all his power in Hollywood, Harvey Weinstein was a backroom heavyweight, not a front-and-center star. People like him are easily sacrificed. Yet when men like Kevin Spacey are in the firing line, it puts an even more public face to Hollywood's degeneracy and further undermines any pretense that celebrities are the arbiters of moral virtue. An actor's homosexuality, which normally protects them from the scrutiny a heterosexual man would receive, only compounds any sexual abuse crisis in Tinseltown. When straight men can't be the whipped donkeys, panic erupts.

Here is Kevin Spacey's "mea culpa":

I have a lot of respect and admiration for Anthony Rapp as an actor. I'm beyond horrified to hear his story. I honestly do not remember the encounter, it would have been over 30 years ago. But if I did behave then as he describes, I owe him the sincerest apology for what would have been deeply inappropriate drunken behavior, and I am sorry for the feelings he describes having carried with him all these years.

This story has encouraged me to address other things about my life. I know that there are stories out there about me and that some have been fueled by the fact that I have been so protective of my privacy. As those closest to me know, in my life I have had relationships with both men and women. I have loved and had romantic encounters with men throughout my life, and I choose now to live as a gay man. I want to deal with this honestly and openly and that starts with examining my own behavior.

- Kevin Spacey

"I do not remember the encounter" and "I choose now to live as a gay man" are the most telling parts of Spacey's words. He cannot remember if he tried to sexually seduce and therefore tried to statutorily rape a 14-year-old boy. At the very least, he could have denied attempted sexual activity with a child. But he didn't. The bigger talking point is meant to be his "bravery" in publicly identifying as a gay man.

What can we possibly make of this? And what other "stories" are "out there" about him?

"My dad was a neo-Nazi and he raped me!"

Gay man accused of trying to molest an underage boy? Use your neo-Nazi dad to absolve yourself. Results guaranteed!

As Kevin Spacey goes into damage control, his brother Randall Fowler, a Rod Stewart impersonator, is seeking to shift the conversation to their neo-Nazi father. Thomas Fowler was a member of the American Nazi Party and is thus a very easy target, especially now that he is dead. I would not be surprised if Spacey purposely had Randall wheeled out as a means of salvaging his acting career.

Just as Spacey linked the alleged pedophilia towards Rapp with his seemingly tortured life as a badly closeted gay man, Randall Fowler is suggesting there's a "predator gene" that makes people sexually abuse others. Kevin Spacey has no children that we know of, nor does his brother.

We should call this the Todd Nickerson defense. The movement to partially or fully legitimize pedophilia as an "illness" hit a snag some months ago, leading to Salon deleting its pro-pederasty articles. It might make a resurgence with the present turmoil engulfing Kevin Spacey, particularly if more gay men in Hollywood are accused of sexually dealing with underage boys.

The Spacey pedophilia scandal will probably help protect other pedophiles in Hollywood

Over ten years ago on Family Guy: “Help! I’ve escaped from Kevin Spacey’s basement!”

Spacey’s own juxtaposition of his homosexuality with the Anthony Rapp allegation presents a very difficult situation for fellow gays in Hollywood. We should expect that any other figures suspected of misbehavior concerning underage boys, such as director Bryan Singer, will be greatly shielded in the coming weeks.

Remember, the real boogeyman in the world is healthy, heterosexual male behavior. It’s a “hate crime” to ask for a woman’s phone number in England if she’s not attracted to you. Across the Atlantic, men learning to become accountants, teachers, doctors, and lawyers at American colleges are supposedly the people most likely to rape girls. Anything and everything to restrict non-dangerous expressions of male sexuality will be pursued, whilst real-life pederasty can be blamed on a bad childhood or the pain of being gay.

Whatever happens in the coming weeks, let’s all at least agree that Middle America no longer even has to pretend to take lessons in political or moral character from Hollywood.

Read More: Why Did Rose McGowan Attack Harvey Weinstein For Sexual Harassment But Defend A Pedophile Director?

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Tinder on God Mode: How To Slay On Dating Apps

October 31, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following is a sponsored article from Hookups On Autopilot.

What I'm about to reveal to you will seem counter-intuitive. If you're the typical nice guy, this might even shock your reality so much that you block it out of your mind because of cognitive dissonance. But just stay with me for a bit, because I'm about to tell you what no one else will: "The Cheat Codes to Tinder".

This has worked really well for me ever since 2015, when I was living in Manhattan. But I promise you this still works as of now, as I have refined this method a lot ever since I came up with it.

Now keep in mind that you still need to do the usual stuff: swiping right on every girl and then weeding out the fugly ones, maxing out your sexual market value (SMV), and writing a bio that draws the girl in to actually message you first, etc. But in this article I'm gonna discuss the subtle stuff that doesn't get mentioned a lot. Basically, all I do is use a few unusual tactics that most other people would tell you they're dumb.

BUT THEY WORK.

What you've been told about Tinder is wrong

Before I go into detail, let me explain what the mainstream media (MSM) tells you to do in order to be successful with dating apps and why it is wrong. You've seen the noise all over Google:

- Copy-Paste pick-up lines to send girls
- Include a pic of a cute dog in your first pic
- Make sure to add your height in the bio guys!
- Add a Tinder logo to your first pic so it looks like Tinder officially approved you (WTF?)
- And on and on with these dumb gimmicks (god I hate MSM)

Now let me blow you away with one simple question: How many other guys just like you have read those exact same articles and are doing the exact same thing?

If you've ever heard of the Pareto Principle, which I go over extensively in my article on how to start a Tinder conversation, you know that 10% of your actions will result in 90% of your major results. This is not just some bullshit some guy in bumblefuck Europe made up. This is real and can be seen in all aspects of life. The ratio can vary (80/20, 90/10, 99/1) but the core concept is the same.

Some examples:

- 10% of men sleep with 90% of women (this could be a bit of a generalization but take a look at social media and you'll notice the majority of men crying about women putting them in the "friend-zone"
- 10% of people in the world hold 90% of the wealth (again, I'm generalizing but we already know what's going on these days… just look at the gap between the lower and upper class… there isn't even going to be a middle class soon in the United States)

When 99% of people are doing one thing, you MUST do the 1% everyone else is not doing. This results in ridiculous results and you start experiencing "tail-end phenomena" such as girls messaging you first for sex.

Alexis from Tinder messaged me first because I wrote a dirty sexual fantasy in my bio

Alright so how does the Pareto principle apply to Tinder and dating apps? Like this: 90% of your biggest results will come from 10% of the tactics you can do. Instead of being Scrooge McDuck and keeping this content from you, I've decided to release it (I'm a strong believer in the abundance mentality). Here is the exact 10% that will give you 90% of results:

Dating App 90-10 Rule Set

Rule #1: The number of matches you get doesn't matter, your conversion rate does.

Rule #2: Your match quality depends entirely on YOUR PICTURES' perceived SMV (not yours).

Rule #3: When it comes to closing, you should have your closing skills on point (the better they are, the fewer matches you need to slay on Tinder)

While everyone else focuses on minutiae, you focus on these three things and perfect them to a T.

Let's go into detail on this ruleset that has basically revolutionized my dating app game and allowed me to pretty much order girls to my front door like a Grubhub order.

Rule #1: The number of matches you get doesn't matter, your conversion rate does

Have you seen these dumb Tinder blogs that tell you to put a cute dog in your first pic or some kind of outdoors pic? Look, every other guy is doing the exact same thing. While others zig, you zag.

Your goal is not to get 2000 matches that all swiped right on your pic because they thought the dog was cute. Your goal is to get 10 matches with girls who are SEXUALLY INTERESTED in YOU. How do you do that? You use an entirely sexualized Tinder profile. Yes, sexualized pictures (preferably taken by a professional photographer). Oh and contrary to what MSM tells you, shirtless pics DO work. They might not get you 2000 matches, but they will get you 10 matches that will actually show up at your front door and fuck you.
And yes, you will also need a sexual bio.

If you want in-depth info on how to do this, I wrote a blog post on How to get Tinder matches that don't flake.

Rule #2: Your match quality depends entirely on YOUR PIC's perceived SMV (not yours)

Stop attaching emotions to the way you look and how girls respond to your pics.Look at it as a marketer. In online marketing, there is something called a split test, where you test multiple variables against one another to find the best performing one. From here on, you will be "split-testing" your pics in order to find the best performing one (and no, do not rely on Tinder's smart photo to do this for you… you need to test various combinations and then start refining further). Here is a blog post I wrote on how to test your Tinder pics like a marketing wiz.

Rule #3: When it comes to closing, you should have your closing skills on point (the better they are, the fewer matches you need to slay on Tinder)

I went out 4 nights a week and took girls home within minutes of meeting them. I approached girls on the street and had my car nearby and just pulled them by telling them there's a "gay party in Hell's Kitchen" (I was living in Hell's Kitchen at the time). This allowed me to escalate in the car and within about three red lights I would kick her out if she wasn't down.

More importantly, over the years, this made me a fierce closer with escalation skills and gave me a solid understanding of the subtle nuances in body language enabling me to close girls within minutes once I did actually start using Tinder.

DO NOT BE A COUCH POTATO and think you'll be a "closer" when it comes to Tinder game (you won't). Here are some of my infield videos of "street game".

Once again, your mind is going to tell you to run away after reading this post, and that is basically the instinct the mainstream media and years of social conditioning from a feminism ridden society has instilled upon you.
But don't give in. Fight that instinct and promise me that you will try ALL THREE of these things for at least two months before you go back to your regular routine.

Again, if you want to be among the top 1% of men who slay from Tinder, you kinda have to do things differently.
So get out there and implement!

P.S. I promise you that 99% of men who read this post will go on about their day trying to get 2000 matches using a cute puppy in their pic. LET THEM DO IT. This strategy is for a unique type of man, the type of man who wants "Hookups On Autopilot."

To learn more about Hookups On Autopilot, check out my massive case study on "How to Get Laid on Tinder, which includes actual pics and proof of results I got when using this exact strategy you read about on this blog post.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

8 Killed In New York City Terrorist Attack

October 31, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via NY Post:

A man in a pickup truck killed eight people when he drove onto the West Side bike path in lower Manhattan Tuesday afternoon — and then shouted “Allahu Akbar” as he got out of the car with fake guns, police sources said.

The suspected terror attack happened around 3:15 p.m., when a man in a flatbed pickup truck from Home Depot veered onto the bike path at West St., a few blocks north of Chambers St., police said.

The suspect, who was shot by police, then plowed his car into up to 23 people on the path, killing eight and injuring more than a dozen others, according to cops.

He continued driving south and hit another car, then got out and displayed “imitation firearms,” police said.

The man then shouted, “Allahu Akbar,” according to police sources.

Witnesses described a scene of terror, as people fled for safety.

“Jesus! A car just ran over 2 people and then crashed into a school bus. I see two dead bodies and citibikes on the floor destroyed,” a Twitter user wrote.

“What happened was there was a car crash… he came out of one of the cars. He had two guns,” a 14-year-old Stuyvesant HS student said. “We thought it was a Halloween thing. He started running around the highway. There was another guy in a green shirt that was chasing him around.”

“I heard four to six gunshots — everybody starts running,” she added.
Video of the scene shows at least two people lying limp on the street. Photos show a smashed-up Home Depot rental truck and two mangled Citi Bikes.

Counter-terror police were searching the truck for explosives.

“Oh my god I just heard gun shots and ran with my dog. Downtown. F–k,” Josh Groban tweeted.

Read the entire article

Read Next: How Western Globalists Created Radical Islam

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

NOW AVAILABLE: Limited Edition ROK Ugly Christmas Sweater

November 1, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Starting today, we are selling ROK Ugly Christmas Sweaters that you'll be able to wear in time for the holidays. The sweaters feature the message Merry (((Christ)))mas to celebrate the birth of Jesus while simultaneously signaling your awareness of the liberal agenda. The sweater also contains an obligatory Kratom joke.

To bring you this sweater at the insanely affordable price of $35 (only $10 more than our t-shirt), we are printing it on a standard red sweatshirt instead of an actual knitted sweater. Have no fear of soaking it with grandma's eggnog since it's easily washable. Red pill your whole family by proudly echoing your way through Christmas. Your secular Jewish friends will love your cheeky humor!

We will be taking orders for only five days: from today until Sunday, November 5. If you want one of these sweaters, you must order by November 5. The sweaters will be printed and then shipped to you on Saturday, November 25.

North American customers should get their shirt around December 2 and international customers around December 9, giving you ample opportunity for maximum holiday trollage. Click here to order your ROK Ugly Christmas Sweater today.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How Immigration Hurts Immigrants

November 1, 2017 | by Bruno Buscaroli | Link | Original Link

Every year, thousands of people leave their Third World countries in hopes of living in the First World. Some do it illegally, crossing borders without the consent of the nations they're migrating to. Others do it through proper legal channels, intending one day to become citizens. Much has been said about the negative effects of either kind of immigration for the local population. What doesn't get said much, however, is how immigration ends up hurting immigrants as well.

First batch: skilled, hard-working immigrants

Wikipedia defines the Third World as “the developing countries of Europe, Asia, Latin America, and Africa”. These countries have consistently lower life expectancy, higher crime rates, higher infant mortality and a host of other problems. Not wishing to deal with such problems, many leave for more developed nations. While the reasons for leaving are understandable, many fail to see they’ll just be trading one problem for another.

The first waves of Third World immigrants are usually middle class or higher, who can afford private schools back home and have the resources to afford college and residence for their children in the First World. Being among the first to leave their country, they also have more risk tolerance and ambition than most of their fellow countrymen. These are people you’d expect back in their home country to start up companies, drive research, or even run for office. All the potential that could be spent developing their home countries gets shipped abroad instead.

People with the resources, drive, and talent to succeed in their fields leave the homeland that most needs them. So instead of getting entrepreneurs, researchers, and drivers of change in the Third World, you get more people competing for ever decreasing jobs in the First World. Developing countries miss out on their chance to properly develop, making them poorer in the long run. And because these countries continue to worsen, more people keep leaving them, leading to a national death spiral.

Second batch: not-so-skilled immigrants

Skilled, competent immigrants can be successful in their new countries and benefit the economy. Their arrival, however, is usually followed by additional waves of immigrants who aren't quite as valuable. We're talking about the new arrivals who become leeches on the welfare state. So all the hard work the first batch of migrants are doing becomes nullified by their less productive countrymen who follow in the second batch.

But harm to the economy isn't the only export of low-skilled migrants. As has been said many times already, they also bring with them a host of cultural problems: increased crime rates, lowered social cohesion, etc. The same problems that made skilled immigrants leave their nations are brought to their new countries.

Cultural dilution

Nearly every single time, an immigrant who's over a certain age will struggle to fully fit in. Even those who come with the intention of embracing their new culture never quite do so. A culture's customs and traditions become a part of their people. This is specially true outside of the West, as these countries are allowed to feel pride in their homelands.

The elites use this cultural pride as a weapon against the local majority, making minorities into an almost protected class. Again, this has been well covered on this site already. A point that doesn't get made, however, is that this protected status will only last as long as the elites need them. Once the local majority becomes a minority, the new majority will become targeted.

Third World cultures, for the most part, value the traditional family. The father provides, mother cares for the home, children are raised in values of their parents. If progressives truly means to erase the family and reduce population, these cultures can't be left alone, lest they reinstate the natural order.

One by one, all cultures will be eroded into mainstream Western culture, so that everyone can become a mindless consumer. This is already being done to the Third World through American media by encouraging careerism in women, normalizing abortion, and attacking religion. You'd be surprised at how many people in Latin America, for example, already buy into leftist propaganda.

Everyone is happier at home

Most people would be happier to keep living in their home cultures. Adaption and integration into different societies is a hard process that's never completed. No matter how "protected" or "special" minorities are deemed to be by the elites, they'll never be fully integrated. Instead, they'll just get used until deemed an obstacle.

Of course, staying in one's home country is often easier said than done. For folks in failed states like Venezuela or warring countries like Syria, being asked to stay might sound silly. Why should they not seek to improve their station? Why should they care for what happens to their countries? Leaving home for greener pastures is a personal choice, and you can't really force someone to stay. While I don't claim to have an easy solution, the alternative doesn't seem that great either.

Read More: Immigrants Who Skipped Work To Support Immigration Became Upset When Subsequently Fired

Bruno Buscaroli

Bruno is a young man who used to dismiss red pillers as alarmists. Then he spent a semester in a college campus and became one himself. Now he educates himself through the internet and a library card.

7 Beneficial Activities That Cost You No Money

November 1, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Whenever lifestyle optimization or something similar comes into question, the tips typically include cost-reducing hacks such as to buy things on a discount or do something potentially constructive but with low cost.

However, I would like to take this a step further and show how a man can do something constructive which costs absolutely nothing. The Chinese Tao philosophy has a saying, wu wei, which means non-action and I think there might be some truth in it. Sometimes it is better to do nothing. Still I think that we can have our own more appropriate Western version of this aphorism: action without paying (and I am not referring to sex). Say no to consumerism but still cultivate ourselves.

1. Outdoor gym exercising

I would typically argue that gym membership is a great investment and once you have paid the fee, usually monthly via an automatic payment service these days, you can go there as much as you like. Personally I hit the iron six times a week, on average, and my membership is not even particularly expensive. For the sake of the argument, though, one can try an outdoor gym as long as temperatures exceed 10 degrees Celsius.

Most exercises for the entire body can be done and some of them, like pull-ups, dips and various abs exercises, are really demanding even for the fitness enthusiast. For most men an outdoor gym and what it offers is more than enough.

2. Speedwalking, jogging or running

Speed-walking is an excellent, non-costly way, to get some—hopefully—clean air, burn calories, and watch the surroundings. Likely also listen to some pleasant music in the meantime.

Although I am not particularly fond of long-distance running, to tackle shorter distances are great for fat loss, health and increasing VO2 max, especially during spring and summer (Scandinavia is dark and cold between October and March). And it costs absolutely nil.

3. (Intermittent) Fasting

Obviously you got to eat, but to fast about 16 hours has a lot of health benefits for normal people. Perhaps this is a bit hard for working people but once you have got used to it, it can work even in general.

I think that especially during weekends this is a great hack to reduce costs while staying healthy. Instead of spending money, you save money, and you will be healthy in the process. Look for cheap protein sources and vegetables.

4. Visit the public library or read online

Besides from the potential aesthetics benefits, visiting the local public library and borrowing a good book on a subject that you are interested in is an excellent way to cultivate yourself while spending nada.

In case you prefer to read in front of a computer screen, there are hundreds of free articles and e-books online. Perhaps you may have missed some earlier ROK articles between 2012-2017 (now exceeding 5,000). There is always a new angle to self-improvement, politics, and how bad Western women are under current conditions that you haven't come across yet.

5. Prayer or meditation

Spirituality is often a private matter, but regardless of your specific beliefs, you may understand that to pray or meditate for as little as 15 minutes a day can reduce stress and anxiety. If you are Christian of some sort you already know the praying drill and how it helps you.

6. Talk to someone important

Regardless of how much you value your individual space and free time, it is a balance, and there is often more room to meet and talk to someone important. Whenever I let go of the individual projects and pastimes, I tend to realize how much conversations matter. Even with those that I think is a bit boring, or at least are not longing for to meet (like my girlfriends' dad). Sure it can be combined with dining and drinking, but might be as good without it.

7. Practice your conversation ability

Some practice cold approach game and some do not. Some are really good conversationalists and some are not. Many are somewhere in between. The thing is that you are never too good and there is always room for improvement. The goal should be to conversate, not just respond, something explained further earlier on these pages.

The worst thing that could happen is that those you meet are less sanguine about your newly found verbosity, and the best things could indeed be really good for you.

In closing

Whether you see these merely as temporary hacks to save money in order to afford something particular, become a little more well-informed, or truly identify with the power of minimalism and anti-consumerist ways of living, these are all constructive things that will do both your mind and wallet good.

If you want to read more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: 10 Things To Do On Sundays That Are Better Than Watching The NFL

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Awesome Holiday Gift Ideas For Liberals You Unfortunately Know

November 1, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

It's getting to be that time of year again, where holiday trees soon will go up in honor of Santa. It's now less than two months from the winter holidays, and you know what that means: shopping! If you're scratching your head, figuring out what prezzies to get radical leftists for Xmas or whatever they're into, I have some excellent suggestions.

Gifts for feminists

Feminists are never happy, and much of their eternal grouchiness results from profound sexual frustration. Understandably, it's hard to get much action when their hair is buzzed short and dyed neon colors, their faces are all pierced up, their skin is covered in bad tattoos, and they're addicted to Ben & Jerry's. Worse than all the above combined is their miserable attitudes.

They need a good sex toy to jump-start the joy. For a garden-variety type who still believes that feminism is all about equality (which hasn't been true since the mid-1950s), a slim six inch vibrator will suffice. For a granola-munching vegan merely carrying feminism in her ideological grab bag, go organic with a cucumber. For a women's studies professor, though, you'll have to splurge a bit. She'll need an extra-strength clit blaster running on 480V three-phase power. When Ms. Feminist's toes have been curled sufficiently, then she'll be able to drop the 'tude and begin rejoining the ranks of normal humanity.

Gifts for black radicals

BLM has been given carte blanche to destroy cities and attack police, like they did in this scene in Baltimore

Got some pals in BLM? Surely they'd love to get far away from American cops who they believe are gunning them down for no reason. Further, it's always a good thing to get in touch with one's ancestral culture, right? I have the perfect solution.

Give them a trip to Africa. Since they're suffering from White oppression, send them to an all-Black country of their choice: Liberia, Uganda, Rwanda, Zimbabwe, whatever suits their fancy. Problem solved! In these tropical paradises, the weather is never lousy like Harlem, Chicago, Baltimore, or Detroit. Since they'll be delighted to stay in these beacons of human rights governed by their own people, make it a one-way ticket.

Gifts for Antifa

This domestic terrorist outfit is well-known for using improvised weapons: household chemicals, bottles filled with cement, fireworks, even used tampons. Well, all that's a little second-rate for armaments, don't you think?

It's time for them to start using real manufactured weaponry. The cartoon series Road Runner showcased a wide variety of fine, military-grade hardware: rockets, explosives, you name it. You need only send your Antifa friends the Acme Corporation product catalog; their buddy Doctor Evil will spot them the dough to purchase all the top-quality goods.

Gifts for Hispanic radicals

Contrary to their citizenship oaths (for those who bothered to arrive legally), radical Hispanics wish to take over the American Southwest and secede. After that, they'll turn "Aztlan" into a place just like they left, of course. There are a couple of problems here.

First of all, there are too many liberals in California, who they can't get rid of because they're paying all the taxes for the lavish welfare benefits they enjoy. Second, secession didn't work out too well in Southeastern states a while back, so why do they think they'll do better in the Southwest? Conducting a second Pickett's Charge armed with leaf blowers is too risky. Fortunately, I have a better idea.

What they really need are better Latin American countries; then invading and dismembering another nation would be unnecessary. Currently, governments south of the border are usually run by corrupt plutocrats who don't give a damn about the public (not an uncommon problem in the Western world too.) These kleptocracies don't provide social services; they don't have a middle class tax base to strip-mine for "income redistribution" like over here. Their plutocrats rely on immigration to the USA as the economic safety valve that keeps the impoverished masses from overthrowing them. For decades, our own plutocrats have been okie dokie with this arrangement; the Democrats want more bloc voters, and the Republicans want the cheap labor.

Send your radical Latino pals the economic writings of G.K. Chesterton and Hilaire Belloc, preferably in Spanish. Distributism will create healthy local-based economies in their countries of origin, eventually allowing them to get the crooks off their backs. Besides, they'll need some reading material for a one-way bus trip back to where they belong.

Gifts for globalist billionaires

Now that we're wrapping things up with the Milky Way, it's time we planned our leveraged buyout in the Andromeda Galaxy.

These guys are so bored that they fill their empty lives with extremely weird pursuits and destabilizing countries for funsies. What can you get for someone who's richer than God? I have just the answer.

The motivational classic Who Moved My Cheese? will be a big hit. Some of them may have sent this to their own employees as a little parting gift during a "reorg", "downsizing", "rightsizing", "offshoring", or whatever they want to call canning thousands of people who actually got the job done. Some plebeians considered that sort of thing rather insulting—as Dilbert creator Scott Adams put it, a "patronizing message for the proletariat to acquiesce”—but some of the big shots likely haven’t read it themselves.

This might help to adjust their attitude after they’re thrown off the gravy train. That’s quite likely if the USA gets hip to Distributism too, as well as closing their special tax loopholes. For those who’ve been especially ambitious in screwing the public for personal profit, also include Who Moved My Soap?: The CEO’s Guide To Surviving Prison.

Gifts for Social Justice Warriors

SJWs are the lowest of the low on the radical totem pole. They have no real lives, are often batshit crazy, and want to welch on their massive loans for that gender studies Ph.D. Their approach to activism involves posting memes on Tumblr and screaming “Check your privilege!”, somehow believing this improves the world. I have the stocking stuffer just for them.

The gene pool needs a stiff dose of chlorine about now, and these “useless eaters” are (undeservedly) living proof. Help them permanently reduce their carbon footprint to zero by giving them a copy of suicide how-to book Final Exit.

Read More: 7 Recommended Products For Your Butthurt Liberal Friends

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Always Be Prepared To Walk Away From A Girl Who Treats You Second Best

November 2, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Being prepared to walk away is the only way to deal with situations where you are likely to be bested by an AMOG (alpha male other guy). Showing weakness, fear, annoyance, butthurtness, or any combination of the above and you will lose. If you play it well you can still get the girl, and even if you don't, far better to walk away with your dignity intact than not.

I have recently faced two situations where an 'alpha' (I used inverted commas since the designation of 'alpha' is situational and varies from girl to girl) threatened my game. In the first I lost the girl. In the second I won her back. Both reinforced my view that a willingness to walk is essential.

Stella

I'll give you the Cliff's Notes version of each incident. The first occurred when I met a girl called Stella from Bumble for a drink. My first impression when she arrived was that she wasn't as hot as her pictures suggested, but that she was attractive enough for a fleeting encounter.

After some vodka, it became painfully aware that she was not particularly intellectually gifted either, as she related one uninteresting anecdote after another in her thick Essex accent. Still, I played along, hoping for an easy win. We made out a few times and she invited to meet her again at the weekend.

During the third drink, however, I became aware that Stella kept looking over my shoulder. I glanced behind me and saw a drunken AMOG, a ruggedly good-looking man in a white shirt. He glared at me. "Let's get out of here," I said to Stella. We downed our drinks. I walked out with her without giving the guy a second glance. I was aware, however, from my peripheral vision, that Stella was still smiling at him.

When we reached the atrium, Stella stopped. "I'm going to say goodbye here," she said. "I need to go to the bathroom, then I'm going to walk to the train station."

"No problem," I said. I kissed her goodbye, and went into the men's room.

I already knew what was happening. Still, a perverse part of me was curious to see the drama play out to the end. I waited for several minutes, and then walked briskly back through the bar. Sure enough, there was Stella sitting with the AMOG.

I didn't intend for her to see me, but she did. She stared at me, her dumb eyes filling gradually with comprehension and guilt. I winked at her and walked on. Later on, when she messaged me, I didn't bother to reply.

Lilianna

Lillianna is a regular fuck buddy of mine, a Hungarian girl who I met earlier this year. Last weekend I traveled to Zagreb, Croatia, to attend a party with her. The one snag? Her Spanish ex-boyfriend Rafa was there too.

Lillianna and Rafa had a stormy relationship that lasted for over five years and finally came to an end in early 2017. However, as he is an entrepreneur and she is a fellow director of his company, they have never been out of contact.

Lillianna had promised me ahead of time that we would not see much of Rafa at the event. In fact, he ended up hanging out with us for most of it. This I didn't particularly object to. He turned out to be a decent enough guy, dominant, with that slightly arrogant air that makes Spaniards and Italians so good at game. Plus I am not Liliana's boyfriend and so don't really have the right to dictate who she hangs out with.

What did annoy me, though, was the way Lilianna, still clearly in love with Rafa, seemed to defer to everything he said. It was clear to see that for her he remained her 'eternal alpha.'

Things came to a head at about 5am. I was exhausted. Lilianna was also tired and her feet were hurting from wearing her high-heeled shoes. "Let's go," I said.

"OK. I'll just say goodbye to Rafa."

She went over and spoke to him. By this time he had picked up some drugged-up girl who was hanging off his arm. She returned and sat down again.

"He wants us all to go back for a group session together."

"Are you kidding? I came here to see you. I'm not going back to some hotel room to watch you getting fucked by your ex-boyfriend!"

“Troy…”

“And what would I get out of it anyway? That girl he’s with is ugly. There’s no upside for me.”

“But . . . you have to understand, I loved him for five years,“ Lilianna sobbed. “I can’t refuse him anything.”

I looked at her.

“Well in that case you should stay,” I said. I grabbed her, pulled her towards me, kissed her roughly on the lips and got the hell out of there. I would not tolerate being second best under any circumstances. This would be the last time she would ever set eyes on me, I thought.

In my Uber I was researching alternative hotels on Booking.com when she popped up on Facebook Messenger.

> Took a taxi now. Hopefully there in a bit.

I softened a little. I hadn’t expected her to follow me and I hadn’t staged the walkout as a ploy. However, she had made a decision in my favour. I decided to go to bed in our hotel room and see what happened. It was late, and I could always leave the next day.

When she returned she slipped into bed tearfully, and clung to me while she sobbed herself to sleep. The next morning she gave me one of the best blowjobs I have ever received, before washing me from head to toe in the shower. Suddenly she was compliant, submissive and sweet once more.

Be Prepared To Walk Whatever The Outcome

My willingness to walk away had won Lilianna back—for the moment. But here’s the thing: the more you do game the more you will come up against obstacles, including AMOGs. No matter how rich, fashionable or good-looking you are, there will always be some other guy out there who will beat you. Or, as with Lilianna, there will be some ex-boyfriend who she is still hung up on.

There is little point in trying to outdo these men. Attempt to be louder or funnier and you risk looking butthurt and try-hard. Because what alpha truly confident in himself would feel the need to overcompensate in that way?

For me, the only real solution is to be philosophical and prepared to walk. Again, the true alpha would have enough options that he could happily afford to do so. Even if you lack those options you must make as though you have them.

I cannot guarantee that walking away will bring your girl running back to you, as it brought Lilianna back to me. But you must do it anyway. In my case, I had no intention of ever speaking to Lilianna again. It was only because she shifted her position that I continued to entertain her, and she is certainly downgraded in my priorities.

You should never for one moment acknowledge that another man has got the best of you, or is in any way superior. And a willingness to walk away remains your best insurance policy. Remember, it is better to risk losing the prize than to losing your dignity: girls come and go, but your self-perception is forever.

Want to find out how jerks and badboys get the hottest girls? Check out Troy's latest book How To Be An Asshole

Read More: How Most Relationships End

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Man Faces 15 Years In Prison After Recording His Wife Having Sex With Another Man

November 2, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via NY Post:

A New Jersey florist using the “Find My iPhone” app to track down a lost gadget stumbled into a prickly situation — his naked wife in bed with her boss.

And now, the cuckolded hubby is facing up to 15 years in prison for his snooping.

“I feel like it’s unjust what they’re doing to me,” Sean Donis, 37, lamented to The Post. “It’s like I’m being punished twice.”

The Clifton man used his cellphone to record two brief videos of the hot-and-heavy session when he confronted his wife and her lover more than a year ago.

He broke down crying when he shared them with The Post.

The first, a seven-second clip, shows Nancy Donis going at it with Albert Lopez in the dimly lit master bedroom of his Rockland County, NY, home on April 15, 2016.

As Sean takes in the seamy spectacle, he exclaims, “Wow!” and Nancy hops off her lover before Sean drops his phone in shock.

The next video, 35 seconds long, shows Nancy and Lopez covering up as Sean berates his wife.

“All on video! All on video! . . . I can’t believe you, Nancy. I can’t believe you,” Sean says.

“Stop. Please, stop. Stop. OK, I get it. I get it. Stop,” she pleads.

Lopez angrily orders him out of the house and the phone gets jostled during an apparent struggle before Sean says, “Don’t worry, I’m leaving,” and the video ends.

Home where the cheating occurred

Earlier that day, Nancy asked her husband to watch their son, now 5, so she could go to dinner with friends in Elizabeth, NJ, according to Sean.

At one point during the evening, he noticed the boy’s iPad was missing and activated the “Find My iPhone” app.

The software showed the device traveling toward Rockland, Sean said, stirring fears he had been harboring about Nancy, who at the time worked with Lopez in the billing department at an orthopedics office in Clifton.

“She would hide her phone. I’d touch the phone — she would get very nervous and say, ‘No, don’t touch my phone.’ She’d go to work looking extra pretty. And she lost a lot of weight also,” he recalled.

Sean had his mother watch the boy while he got in his car and followed the signal to Pomona. There, he found Nancy’s Ford Edge parked outside the sprawling home Lopez, 58, owns on a quiet, tree-lined cul-de-sac.

The front door was unlocked, Sean said, so he walked in and headed upstairs, where “I saw what I saw” and “screamed a little bit.”

Nancy, 38, subsequently filed for divorce and her six-year marriage to Sean was dissolved in February, court records show.

But Sean got a July 20 letter informing him a Rockland grand jury had indicted him on charges of felony burglary and unlawful surveillance.

He pleaded not guilty last month and is due back in court on Sept. 20.

Defense lawyer Howard Greenberg predicted Sean would be fully exonerated.

“He commits a trespass that in a sane jurisdiction is a violation and not a crime, and he uncovers the greater evil of his wife screwing some stranger,” Greenberg said. “No jury is going to convict this man of anything, let alone a felony.”

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: Ex-Wife Wins Right To Sue For Alimony Twenty Years Later

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Unlike “Christian” Girls, Muslim Women Are Modest And Take Their Faith Seriously

November 2, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

When was the last time you saw a woman with a headscarf or other form of Islamic headdress behaving or otherwise dressing like a whore? The answer is probably a long time ago or never. For whatever criticisms have been made about the mostly Muslim migratory invasions of Europe and the problems they cause, the fact remains that the daughters of Islamic societies and families largely keep their religious and social practices, even when are transplanted into Western countries.

If Muslim girls want to act like whores, they typically make a much harder break with their religion than slutty girls who claim to profess Christianity. They permanently get rid of the headscarf and, aside from visits to their parents, forsake all the other trappings of Islam, too. I am not advocating that we should take up lives as Muslims, but I am praising the very strong social expectations and practices that keep Muslim women demure.

Compare this to the antics of many “Christian” girls, enabled by a mollycoddling Western society, and the result is extremely underwhelming. Since the time of (the singer) Madonna, Christianity has been reappropriated by a constant stream of sluts, coming from both the celebrity and everyday worlds.

What is meant to be this:

…has for a very long time been this:

What happened to Christian female modesty?

Slutty girls publicly identifying as Christians not only inflate Christian numbers, they completely misrepresent and distort the faith. The new “church” for these girls becomes walking down the street with an overly displayed crucifix, with most of their breasts and half of their ass showing. Instead of courting prayer time with God, they’re courting never-ending sexual attention, the antithesis of what Christian teachings implore.

When the bar for being a Christian girl is set so low so much of the time, others copy the example. Within a few generations, church attendance falls to record lows. Putting a crucifix around one’s neck and keeping it there permanently warps into the sole profession of faith for most people for the rest of their lives. The sexual spoliation of women that follows should be a surprise to no one. The little Jesus between a woman’s breasts isn’t going to act as a magic moral conscience for them.

So, anything that comes close to modesty, let alone chastity has fallen by the wayside for tens of millions of self-described Christian girls in the West. Christianity and the values it is meant to represent have become a shell of their former selves.

To preserve their culture–and women–Muslim communities self-contain

The answer?

A lot has been made of Muslim/non-Muslim segregated zones in recent years. In Paris in particular, but also large districts in London, Berlin, Brussels, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam, Muslims often branch off into separate physical spaces that heavily replicate the lives they would lead back home in the Middle East or in other Islamic countries. The vast majority of even their public interactions are frequently conducted with coreligionists. This has been a significant instrument in keeping Muslim girls modest and loyal to their faith.

When they cannot create or preserve these physical spaces across entire neighborhoods as they would like, countless Muslims practice an ideological separation with comparable results. They meet as Muslims for religious or broader cultural purposes, well beyond just one weekly gathering at a mosque. In many instances, marriage partners, obviously Muslim as well, are at least unofficially sought out for their children years before a wedding ceremony takes place.

Certain Christian communities use similar group-strengthening practices. Mormon-majority and white-majority Utah, for example, boasts the highest birth rate in the United States, plus has the lowest incidence of out-of-wedlock pregnancy and the youngest average age of marriage. In addition to the benefits of outnumbering non-Mormons statewide, Mormons in Utah, like elsewhere, go further and reaffirm their social ties through the full gamut of weekly and seasonal activities. Church itself for Latter-day Saints takes three hours, not one, and many will spend five hours on a Sunday with other members.

Though some may question the extent to which we can bring back the fallen Western girl, the only workable solution appears to be reverting to some kind of traditional group doctrine and, as much as possible, protecting that doctrine from outside intrusion.

Give credit where credit is due

Criticize Islam's bad influence on Western society as much as you want, yet the ways in which Muslim groups keep women modest are remarkably successful.

Again, I am not suggesting we all convert ourselves and our women to Islam. There are a number of reasons against this. What we must do, however, is study those cultures that, despite their faults, carve out effective ways to preserve the dignity and innocence of women, especially through sex.

Not every ROK reader is a Christian, that much is clear. Nonetheless, I am sure almost everyone reading this would prefer a return to a more Christian-minded society with more Christian-minded women than a slut-filled feminist free-for-all. In terms of avoiding this latter outcome, the Muslims are well and truly ahead of us.

Read More: 3 Reasons Why Christian Parents Are Raising Slutty Girls And Beta Males

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Girls Will Think You're A Coward If You Don't Make A Move

November 3, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

She was the roommate of my good female friend. She had that blonde, girl-next-door kind of look. She'd also grown up in a town close to me. I'd hung out with her in a group a couple of times, went to a concert with her once (very casually), and then eventually we ended up going to the beach together one night.

I was one of the cool kids who had his own car, a rarity for a freshman in college. That car could have gotten me so much pussy if I'd just known what I was doing. Just being able to drive off-campus is huge value to girls who are always cooped up in the same small dorm room talking to the same people all the time.

Anyways, that night at the beach, I'd still never kissed a girl in my life, and was nearly 19 years old. I distinctly remember, as we walked on the beach with the waves crashing on the shore, her hand brushing mine a half dozen times. Of course now I realize that was a clear indicator of "TAKE MY HAND YOU CHICKEN SHIT!", but 18-year-old me just thought it was an accident. We sat down on the pier and looked out at the Pacific Ocean. It was closing in on midnight, and we were the only souls on the beach.

She sat right next to me and brushed her thigh against mine for good measure. She looked right in my eyes and held the eye contact. I saw the glimmer in those big blue eyes. And I looked away. The next time I looked back the look on her face had changed drastically. I know now. The desire vanished, just like that. She saw me for what I was—a coward. The glimmer was gone.

I never saw her after that

In hindsight, I'm shocked that she even returned my texts at that point (this was 2009, so before the social media attention whoring took the nation by storm). My attempts to get her out to see me again were futile, but this story has a bit of a happy ending.

I did see her three years later, when I picked her up in my new car, after I'd gone through my game transformation and was living the life. I botched the kiss on the beach and seemed destined to die a virgin, but I did figure things out.

I got a girlfriend, she ended up being crazy, and was the true catalyst for my blog and work, but I did get the "no kiss" monkey off my back (though it still took years to lose my V card). But after that happened, I got on a roll with the ladies. That was around the time I finished school, got the hotshot job making good money, and bought a sexy new Mustang. After I'd been with my fair share of girls, I somehow ended up in touch with her again.

I sent her a message. I think she liked a few of my photos where I was showing off my new life. I was confident in my newfound texting and game abilities, and it was almost too easy to get her out on a date. I picked her up in the Mustang ("Wowwwwww, you've moved up in the world…"), and we went to the local pub and pizza spot near the beach.

I never made a move. Again. But this time, it wasn't a lack of fear. This time, I was able to actually think outside of the pressures of trying to kiss her, and I realized something: we had absolutely zero chemistry to begin with.

We got along fine, but that spark that makes you and drives you to make a move on a girl was totally missing. I don't know what it was, but in that moment I understood that there are girls you just click with and some girls you just don't (even if they're cute as a button).

I stopped beating myself for that failure in the years before, and was able to let go of it. Yes, I should have made the move regardless of chemistry, but I was able to make peace within myself. I beat myself up because I thought that if I'd made a move on the beach, I might have banged her within a few weeks. As a result, I would have been relieved of all the pressures of girls for most of my college career, and would have had much more fun (and many more girls) as a result.

I realized that sometimes you are better off letting a girl go. In her case, I'm fairly certain she found a long-term relationship, and I believe they're married now (or at least engaged). Hopefully she eventually has the family she always wanted, and finds happiness in her life. I am at peace with having not tried, and peace with myself for not understanding women when I was younger.

If you want to learn how to run a harem, check out The Harem Handbook. To listen to my podcast about dating overseas, click here.

Read More: When You Have Everything But Are Still Unhappy

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

British Authorities Will Now Use The Sexual Histories Of Men Accused Of Rape To Better Convict Them

November 3, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Prosecutors will be asked to focus on a male suspect's previous conduct in other relationships in order to find any relevant evidence.
>
> — Britain's The Telegraph reporting on the atrocious changes to "rape" prosecution in the United Kingdom

Scraping the bottom of the barrel has taken on a twisted new meaning in Western rape trials. Why? Because Britain's Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) is allowing prosecutors to use "evidence" of a man's previous sexual relationships with women to try and convict him of raping a completely different woman. Our favorite witch-hunter, CPS head Alison Saunders, is at it again.

Even when men are convicted, rape trials are quite remarkable for the extreme paucity of objective evidence they provide. Unlike, say, burglary cases, which typically have more concrete proof like CCTV footage or fingerprints, allegations of rape are invariably "he said, she said" battles over the testimonies of the accuser, who is anonymous close to 100% of the time, and the accused.

Alison Saunders.

With the existence of conviction-worthy evidence already in doubt, fairness for the accused will in many situations be utterly destroyed due to the admission of allegations, more tenuous still, of “bad behavior” or “control and coercion” from previous relationships with other women.

Bad break-ups are perhaps the norm nowadays and it is to be expected that a man will have a number of prior sexual partners he cannot stand, let alone wants to ever see again.

An accuser’s sexual history is usually inadmissible

Prosecutorial changes are lessening any demands for proper evidence and permitting women to get away with unsubstantiated allegations.

Alison Saunders and a number of media hacks allege that these changes are the outcome of female accusers' own histories being delved into during rape trials. The exoneration of falsely accused soccer player Ched Evans is the only one of these cases really being cited. Yet such excuses for further diluting the standard of proof to secure a conviction are just that—excuses.

In the Ched Evans debacle, special permission had to be given for the female accuser's past to be examined in the retrial. A general prohibition exists against using a woman's sexual history in court as a result of the terribly named "rape shield" laws. The practical implication of this is that an otherwise promiscuous woman can experience buyer's remorse and cry "rape" against a man, all while pretending that she's not the kind of girl to engage in casual sex. The lack of a requirement for real evidence makes these claims especially advantageous in covering up female infidelity.

Moreover, if a woman's sexual history were really admissible, the authorities would go to the trouble of naming her alongside the accused. This would enable a robust discussion about her antecedence. After all, the accused man's history is debated ad nauseam and in a defamatory manner through both the mainstream media and social media. Nevertheless, a girl is almost always anonymous and the man she is accusing is almost always named.

If the evidence from the accuser is already so bad and non-existent, how bad and non-existent will the evidence of former girlfriends be?

Wow, what excellent evidence for a "rape" in 2017–the ex-girlfriend from five or ten years ago.

Plus, how relevant will it be? An ex-boyfriend might have told his then girlfriend he didn't want her to go out clubbing without him. Of course, it's completely normal that a man wouldn't want his woman out at venues where other men will undoubtedly try to grind against her ass or make-out with her. Three years and a bad break-up later, however, and much of the time a woman is going to portray such behavior as "control and coercion."

More puzzling still is how a man's apparent "misdeeds" with old flames can be collapsed onto a rape allegation involving a completely different girl a long time later. So, he's said to have raised his voice during arguments in 2014–what the heck does this have to do with "rape" in 2017? Obviously, feminists think it has quite a lot to do with it. But for those people interested in cause and effect, not to mention robust judicial procedures, whether a man goes to prison for years should be determined by proof that a particular thing happened at a particular time, not if he's on good terms with women from his past.

Even exonerated men will be defamed for life because of these changes

Prison or not, men affected by these changes will be branded as guilty for life.

Given that their names have remained in the public record for years before these changes, the plight of men exonerated by courts has been bad enough. It is only going to get worse with this new focus of "rape" prosecutions. The use of character assassins in the form of jilted lovers and/or bitter ex-girlfriends will solidify further the lifetime's worth of stigma facing any men taken through Western court systems over unsupported claims of sexual assault.

And then there's the absolute hell for men found "guilty." Conviction quotas for sexual offenses are the order of the day in 2017. The quantity of convicted men, not the quality of the evidence put forward to convict them, is what matters. To achieve the necessary numbers, perverse evidentiary standards like "factoring in the opinions of your ex-girlfriends" are being pulled from the world of gossip and jammed into what are meant to be fair and facts-based criminal trials. In other words, Don't Bang Britain.

Read More: The #MeToo Campaign Compares Not Replying To A Girl's Texts With Raping Her

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Ancient Greece Was A Middle Class Civilization

November 3, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Ancient Greece has mesmerized modern Westerners for centuries. Enthusiastic scholars went as far as talking of a "Greek miracle," and even if they went a bit far, it is easy to understand why they were so thrilled: ancient Greece shows us kindred heroes, who cultivated virtues, harnessed individual powers for the greater good of their cities and brotherhoods, worshipped tutelary gods, could switch from war to business, and from toiling the fields to philosophy. Or, at least, this is the feeling their works communicate. Even if we know that time tends to sort things out, and what we've got of the classical Greeks was perhaps the best they produced, their writings show a people who managed to unite sophistication with masculine energy.

Greeks knew about castes and Indo-European tripartite organization. Homer and Plato mention these explicitly. However, they had less social classes than other societies. The neighbouring Persian empire had a pyramidal structure, with many slaves, whipped by rather antipathetic small bosses—who themselves could have their heads cut off were the almighty despot to order it. As Leonidas says in 300: "You have many slaves, Xerxes, but few warriors." For a warrior is not only a man wielding a weapon and the weapon doesn't make the warrior. Only a free, worthy man deserves the label.

As they lived in city-states, Greeks were not removed from the power centers. Their city could be the vassal or part-dependent from another, more powerful city, yet they knew who was managing it. Men were what the Romans would call pater familias—head of their families, kings in their homes. As power scales remained small and people preferred excellence (arête, ἀρετή) to bullshit games, more or less everyone knew where they stood and those at the middle knew they could trust those above. In some cities, one could try to rise by engaging his own funds to, say, order—and finance—a military or commercial expedition. In others, especially Athens, a random draw would decide who was to be appointed.

In another article I said Socrates, the archetypal philosopher, undermined sociability by attacking several of its core aspects. Aiming at defeating the sophists, Socrates used their own dialectical games against them, but his contrived questions and absurd definitional standards tore common sense apart: Plato shows him rejecting various definitions of piety and bravery until he concludes we have no satisfying idea of these notions. If this is so, do we know what we should respect? Should we really aim at being courageous? Reject all landmarks and what you get is going through life with no compass.

However, when Socrates was trialed and condemned to death for messing with the gods, one of his contemporaries, Xenophon, wrote a touching compilation of Socrates' "memorable" moments. It is a thinly veiled apology trying to prove the philosophers' accusers wrong. Xenophon mostly insists on how much Socrates practiced virtue, respected the common gods, encouraged people to act well and taught positively by sheer example.

Indeed: Socrates owned his home, was a full citizen, went to battle at least three times during the Peloponnesian War—which seems to imply he had his shit together. Once, Xenophon recalls, Socrates explained how to gain and care about friends, another time he motivated an able yet shy man to enter politics. He also married an unbearable woman, Xanthippe, who once emptied her pot chamber on his head, just to train his own Stoic ability—the exact reverse of female hypergamy.

Retrospectively, we cannot assess the degree at which Xenophon overstated Socrates' virtues or overdressed his stories. What we do know for sure is how much Greeks esteemed excellence in practice. It didn't matter if Socrates wanted people to almost reject all concept and definition, as long as he still had a clear view of practical goodness, fairness, beauty, morality and the like. The city-State was a confederation of kindred small producers and families. As long as they lived the good life, Xenophon suggested, they did not need the clashes of definitions and arguments Greece would become known for.

Later Plato's Republic extols the idea of an ideal city-State organized around three castes: the philosopher-kings-priests, the guardian-warriors and the craftsmen-growers-producers. This idea is a direct example of the Indo-European tripartition. However, this does not mean having snobbish classes or cliques hovering over the rest.

In Plato's ideal city, everyone aims at being an aristocrat on the etymological sense—of attaining excellence as to rule, in his own field, as an excellent man. The city may have various castes, it only has one class. Only at a later stage of a degenerative history would the Greek city divide into two classes, abusive oligarchs, and short-sighted poor. What Plato describes as "not one, but two cities, living in the same place and constantly conspiring against each other" (Republic, 551d) shows how "classism" tends to divide what was united: whereas castes are founded on the concordance of inner vocation and outer social needs, not unlike complementarity between the sexes, classes come from some accumulating wealth at the expense of others and of virtue.

The two-classes divide Plato talks about, which is strikingly resembling with Karl Marx's bourgeois-proletariat diptych, is not necessarily "capitalistic" in character. Both modern bankers and Bolsheviks aimed at maintaining it: either by having a small class owning (privately) everything or by having everything owned by public ownership, both meant dispossessing the wide majority of their own stuff. Managerialism is about stripping people from their means and controlling their life. It does not matter if this is done by a despot, a company manager, or a civil servant—serfdom is always the same.

Well, this is what Greece rejected when their cities united to reject Persian slavery. Later, as the city-states were absorbed by Alexander's empire, they more or less maintained an organic relationship with each other. However, the empires would fall—Alexander's was divided, while Rome proved so ripe with internecine struggles it had to transfer part of its power to a soulless bureaucracy.

As the saying goes, small is beautiful. The longer-lasting empires proved able to delegate the maximum they could to the smaller scales. And even then, there was enough space for most individuals to own their field and produce much of their own subsistence—or be self-owned craftsmen.

Only did the modern world make bureaucracy, factories, and a pyramidal structure absolutely necessary by the extant of demand, the sheer volume of goods, information and people that had to be managed. Before that, management could be done at a lower scale—especially the scale of regular men managing their own life. The Greeks talked much of virtue because they were responsible for this—they didn't have media telling them what to do or oligarchs forcing them into conformism. (Sometimes they had this kind of despot, but these wouldn't end prettily.) Being less numerous than their Persian neighbors, they did not need bureaucracy or massive factories. Were they lacking something?

Aristotle openly states that the better cities are mostly peopled with middle-class individuals. The wealthy despise and exploit the others, the poor are forced into obsequiousness and resentment. The former need slaves to maintain their lifestyle and haughty behavior, the latter often lack any sense of responsibility: "when poor people become the prevailing bulk, the city deteriorates and dissolves" (Aristotle, Politics, 4, 11). Only those who are in the middle can cultivate temperance and befriend each other. Along with excellence should come friendship (philia, φιλία).

Perhaps only small-scale, self-owned producers, who care about virtues and don't take orders from either a foreign elite or low-life mobs, cam entertain a fair society. Perhaps only a middle class can entertain an equilibrated sociability.

Read Next: Men Must Be Educated In The Classics If They Wish To Regain Masculine Fortitude

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Why Are Male Feminists Such Creeps?

November 5, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Sex and its bizarrely interesting, particularly American permutations have been in the news a lot in recent days, in particular amongst the alternate media. Of course, everybody with a pulse has heard about Harvey Weinstein and his Hollywood cohorts using the age old "casting couch" while hypocritically stumping for Hillary Clinton and claiming to "empower" women through contrived "ass kicking woman in tight pants" movies.

Beyond that, renegade non-SJW nerds such as myself were unanimously amused in the schadenfreude manner when humorless social justice schoolmarms like Joss Whedon were outed for their rampant infidelity, or the ongoing tally of anti-Gamergaters and "feminist allies" that have been caught sexually harassing, abusing, or occasionally even raping "m'lady" that they were supposed to be valiantly defending—and let's not forget the classic examples of this happening.

While we all can point and laugh at this, it does raise a very important question that, as far as I am aware, has not received the sociological/psychological attention that it deserves. And that question is: why do so many male feminists come off as, and show themselves to be, complete creeps?

HOME > FILM > NEWS

OCTOBER 10, 2017 8:04AM PT

Harvey Weinstein Scandal: Bombshell New Yorker Piece Alleges Mogul Raped Women

By Brent Lang and Ramin Setoodeh

A Point of Contention

Now, just to clarify, when I use the term “male feminist”, I am not referring to a man who merely thinks that a woman can choose to have a career OR choose to be a homemaker and equality under the law and generally wants the sexes to both be convivial and content with their lot in life. I consider myself to be this and I presume most people reading this do as well.

No, by “male feminist”, I mean the loud and obnoxious sort who denounce their fellow men for being masculine, get all giddy over any subversion to masculinity or a strong and dominant woman, go out of their way to be as unmasculine as possible, criticize works of fiction for not being sufficiently “woke”—in short, the sort of guy who refers to himself as a male feminist.

More likely than not, these spindly douchebags are the ones getting busted for behavior far more "misogynistic" than anything us atavistic reactionary cavemen are doing to women. But why? I feel that my unique position as something of a former leftist who might have gone down that route had I had a few more bad days, might shine some light on things.

A Thought Experiment

Imagine that you were a child like I was as a young lad, and probably most of these male feminist cretins were as well—smarter than most of your peers at school, but also shy, wimpy, and bookish. You probably grew up watching a lot of movies and cartoons and playing lots of video games. While you were too shy to talk to girls made of flesh and bone, you were surrounded by idealized, impossibly beautiful and pure damsels in the various media you consumed, as well as cartoonishly dark, seductive, and licentious "bad girls" in that same media. Thus, the first foundation stone is lain in the male feminist psyche—the good old Madonna and Whore complex!

This is not to take the SJW “women should be realistic but also perfect” malarkey, media is based on idealization and exaggeration after all. Rather the lack of real life female interaction is the problem here (i.e., the fact that the only interaction with females is from media is where the problem lies).

The portrayal of men in action movies and video games is also a problem, as most things intended for kids and adolescents tend to be somewhat black and white in terms of morality, which has some adverse effects when combined with a nerd’s daily experiences of getting beat up and wedgied after school. In the misfit’s mind, the bullies are Sauron, Ganondorf, Lex Luthor, and the oppressed nerd is the hero, of course. So you can add a dollop of a hero complex.

“Gimme your lunch money, faggot!”

Puberty comes and the nerd is now substantially more randy and still miserable, because now his unpopularity includes not having sex in addition to mockery and bullying. Said nerd has probably moved on to more adult, more sexual forms of nerd media—Conan, Elric, Dune, and the like, and this combined with his raging hormones makes him crave sex, but of course Chad Thundercock is—in his mind—bogarting sex from him.

Knowing that he can't compete with "Chad", and still having an idealized concept of womanhood, he decides to forgo the whole masculinity "thing", spitting in the face of the "dudebros" and embracing womanhood. The feminist girls in school tolerate his supplicant non-offensiveness more than any other woman ever has, if their agenda goes through he'll have his final revenge on the cool kids, and he might even get in bed with one of his new cohorts, because unlike Stacy and her merry slut brigade, the feminist girls see how good he is.

Does that sound ridiculous? If so, bear in mind that until I was about 15 years old, I literally could not conceive of any way to get to speak to a girl that didn't involve me rescuing her from armed robbery/assault, so many young men do unfortunately think like this! I had that weird, video game induced "Rescue-the-princess" Madonna/Whore thing, and yes, I despised "Chads" and "Dudebros".

I of course changed my ways when I got into fitness and the "school of hard knocks" of learning how to attract women in college, but let's pretend that I didn't. Let's follow our nerd into his adulthood.

Nerd Life Part Two

Still sexually frustrated because his feminist friends have inevitably been passing him up for sex in favor of those Neanderthals they're supposed to hate, he's starting to resent women—keeping hold of his idealized concept of femininity mainly out of habit and because the alternative (Admitting that the dudebros were right) is so much worse to him.

He won't force himself on a woman—heaven forbid, that's disgusting—so he just continues to hate them silently… but then! He achieves his dream job-writing for a leftist news rag, or Marvel Comics, or sells a TV pilot or movie script.

Now all of a sudden he's a star, he has ascended to a similar position in society as Chad Thundercock, but via being a nerd! And best of all, for the first time, women are giving him the time of day—in fact, they're practically throwing themselves at him. Beautiful young women, the kind that have been mocking and bullying him since kindergarten.

Those half-remembered dreams of being a swaggering alpha male brute, suppressed for so long, come to the surface, and he revels in his newfound status, "casting couch"-ing most of his girls and coercing or harassing the ones who don't put out. And to an extent he also sublimates his desire for vengeance against the Stacies of the world by defiling their beauty with his flabby unpleasantness.

Pleasurable to body and fulfilling to the spirit in the short term, he ultimately feels kind of bad, because this is going against the feminist ideals he has been imbibing since he was a teenager. Thus, he overcompensates by supporting female politicians and writing overblown “Strong women” into his work, but not actually changing his ways of course, because he’s having sex, bro!

The cycle of cognitive dissonance and mental instability continues until it all comes crashing down, as we’re seeing now.

Speculation?

This, of course, was just a theory, based on observation of the objective unattractiveness of most male feminists, their behavior, and my own time as a rage-filled teenage nerd and incel. As it is, it seems plausible if nothing else, and I predict that as the sexual situation in the west remains dysfunctional, expect more of this beta male rage. It will not be the explosive, violent, Marc Lepine type, instead it will be this sort of duplicitous rank hypocrisy from men in power.

And if you think this is just the words of some misogynistic crank Return of Kings writer, keep in mind that many women are starting to learn that male feminists tend to be pretty terrible people, and likely many more will in the future.

Read More: Why Feminists Hate Male Sexuality

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Liberals And Mainstream Media Lose Their Shit Over “It’s Okay To Be White” Signs

November 5, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Washington Post:

Posters proclaiming “IT’S OKAY TO BE WHITE” have been appearing on college campuses and on city streets across the country this week, prompted by an anonymous chat-room comment that suggested the message would feed social unrest and sway white Americans to far-right ideologies.

> "IT'S OKAY TO BE WHITE" sign found on doors at Montgomery Blair HS in MD.
> School says flyers were removed and says they're investigating.
> pic.twitter.com/jSTUwG3gNp
>
> — ABC 7 News – WJLA (@ABC7News) November 2, 2017

Since Tuesday, the posters have been spotted in Rocky River, Ohio; at Concordia College in Moorhead, Minn.; at Tulane University in New Orleans; at Montgomery Blair High School in Silver Spring, Md.; around college-campus rich Cambridge, Mass., including the Harvard Yard and at the University of Alberta in Canada. In most cases, schools and cities have pulled the posters down, but the message has continued to spread in images and hashtags across Twitter and other social media platforms, even prompting a related Know Your Meme entry detailing its Internet origins and cultural backstory.

The signs began as a suggestion on the online chat space 4chan last month, a kind of Internet prank laced with ennui and cynicism about race and white identity in modern-day America.

> /pol/ launches nationwide “It’s Okay To Be White” campaign and its absolutely

> TRIGGERING liberals everywhere. pic.twitter.com/TgPkULwIpl
> — Mike Tokes (@MikeTokes) November 2, 2017

A series of messages said people should print signs reading “IT’S OKAY TO BE WHITE,” post them on college campuses and elsewhere, and then stand back and watch the fun begin. News reports would draw attention to the posters, the writer behind the idea predicted. Then white Americans derisively referred to as “normies” in the white nationalist ecosphere will discover that American journalists and “lefties” hate white people. In the process, normies will stop regarding news outlets as credible. That would deal a damaging blow in the culture war, the post said, inevitably converting more “normies” to the white nationalist, alt-right side. It could be that easy to seed social disruption, the post implied.

The episode is indicative of the efforts white-nationalist groups have made to recruit in and around the nation’s college campuses and other mainstream settings with claims of growing white maltreatment and expanding anti-white discrimination. The white victim construct is one that experts say, not so long ago, only had traction in avowed white supremacists, segregationists and neo-Nazi circles. But today, it animates open and anonymous public discussions of race and shapes the nation’s politics.

> THEY ARE CONDUCTING MANHUNTS for a posting a piece of paper that says "It's okay to be white"… Are we living in a totalitarian dystopia? pic.twitter.com/lr19MvQvFQ
> — Meme Alert™ (@MemeAlertNews) November 3, 2017

In the period just after the 2016 election, investigators with the Southern Poverty Law Center documented a surge in posters and recruitment activity by white-nationalist organizations on 150 college and university campuses. White nationalist organizations regard colleges as spaces where millions of young Americans, without their intervention, will be inculcated with the ideas of valuing diversity, seeking and creating inclusion and equity, the investigators found. And, on campus, white-nationalist groups have made every effort to counter that with well-dressed, tech-savvy and articulate spokesmen who recast equality and cultural sensitivity as a damaging loss for white Americans.

In the months immediately after the November 2008 election, the country saw an increase in both hate crimes and hate group membership, said Nicholas Valentino, a political scientist and research professor at the University of Michigan’s Center for Political Studies. For those already worried about what they view as the unacceptable price of equity, an end to white control, the country’s decision to elect its first black president was a chilling moment. But these Americans’ perception that equity is effectively anti-white discrimination appears to have been adopted by a bigger portion of the American white population, Valentino said.

“Whites inside various supremacist groups and movements believe, and have for a long time, that they are part of a victimized racial group," said Valentino. "Far right, white nationalist, neo-Nazis and their ilk have always had this sense of aggrievement, the zero-sum mentality that says as other groups gain rights or options and opportunities from which they have been excluded, whites necessarily lose and this can not be tolerated. But research, my research and several other initiatives, suggest that the white sense of victimization, and by that I mean the perception of victimization, has been increasing dramatically since Obama's election. At this point, it's not a majority of whites, but it has grown dramatically outside those extremist groups."

The sense that white Americans have become the lone group in America unable to attend to group interests shows up in those 4chan chat threads and Twitter timelines, too. During the 2016 election, then-presidential candidate Donald Trump even retweeted a message from a like-minded account littered with inaccurate data on race and murder. On the campaign trail, Trump said with some regularity that life was safer and all-around better at a time in America when no one had to concern themselves with being "politically correct."

The factual basis for claims that white Americans are collectively suffering is difficult to find. On average, they continue to enjoy better income, personal wealth reserves, health, health care, housing, schools than any other group. White Americans also make up 90 percent of the nation's elected officials despite making up about 61 percent of the total population.

At Concordia College, one of the campuses where the "IT'S OKAY TO BE WHITE" placards and stickers were found this week, removed them. Concordia officials said in a statement they did so because the signs did not adhere to campus display policies, the Minneapolis Star Tribune reported. Concordia President William Craft said he wanted to invite the campus community to discuss the posters at a public forum the school will organize. He also pointed out that the posters were distinguished, among other things, for a lack of information, even the name of the group behind them.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: Why White People Are Dying Off

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

3 Annoying Types Of Females That Most Men Encounter

November 5, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

ROK is wrongly understood by its opponents as misogynistic. The truth is that we want nothing but the best for everyone, women in particular. Although we may sometimes enjoy the cultural decline and the YOLO slut behavior which leads to easier casual sex, many are looking for a cultural renaissance that will be beneficial for both sexes.

In the meantime, the encounters with the opposite sex are limited to a small number of friends, acquintances, family, relatives, co-workers, girlfriends, and the brief encounters that come along with casual sex. Masculine men prefer to associate wither other males, or perhaps rather stay alone, and there are good reasons for that.

Although there are a significant number of females with pleasant personalities, many of us have encountered some really toxic such along the way that can tell us what is wrong about the current culture. It is like they represent a certain negative tendency in our society.

1. The female friend who can’t stop calling and think that men and women are equally talkative

When you were younger, it could be beneficial to have female friends and acquaintances. You used social circles to meet other girls. When some of those drop off you usually replace them with more males. However, one girl that I only had made out with and was not the slightest interested in just couldn't stop calling me.

She called me pretty much every single night and wanted to talk about her relationship problems and the dullest of the dullest of things in her petty everyday life. A phone call doesn't have to be that tiresome if it is brief, but this one didn't know anything of that. Nor did she take notice of me hinting about studying, going to the gym, or cooking afterwards.

At some point I just had to say no, so I stopped answering her damn phone calls. Not surprisingly that made her desperate to reach me, and she started calling three times more. Eventually we talked and I concisely explained that I didn't want to talk to her anymore. Our "mutual" relationship didn't give me anything. She became upset, of course, and said she was going to unfriend me on Facebook (oh no!). Funny thing is that I met her in Stockholm several years later and she wanted to add me back again.

2. The backpacker bitch who cannot take a joke and gets mad over nothing

You go to places like the Philippines to have an easy lay, not to talk to fat-tatted Western girls. Especially those who have loud mouths or completely lack humor.

Somewhere on Cebu I and some other travelers were playing a typical drinking game, and for some reason I made a joke about the vagina of an Aussie girl, a six or seven with a super-bitchy attitude. It wasn't even personal against her, just random wittiness, but still she had to make nasty comments about me for the rest of the play round.

Then in the middle of a karaoke session I just went when she was supposed to start singing, and the look in her eyes was that of pure ire. I thought she was going to stab me.

3. The spoiled one who doesn't understand that men and women are different

Sometimes I write about the same topics on social media that I do here, and it has happened that I have uploaded girl pics and party photos on my social media accounts (often erasing most of them after being in a LTR).

One Swedish girl, an acquintance of mine who is a spoiled young girl, just couldn't take it. She said that she wanted to vomit because of my lifestyle and how I talked about Swedish girls, and after a conversation on Facebook Messenger, she unfriended me and stressed that three other girls that we both know were about to do the same. After another trip to East Asia I made a point of stating that Orientals have a better demeanor than Western girls, on average. She then unfriended me.

Perhaps it would help her if she noticed that men and women are different. A guy who sleeps around a bit are not hurting himself, while a girl does. Overall just complete cry-baby behavior for nothing.

Three worthy mentions

4. The 40-year-old former colleague, whom you always were nice and helpful to, but have heard about your player lifestyle and now hates you.

5. The young social justice warrior who wants to get you fired for writing that it's easier to get laid in Tokyo with thin girls.

6. The stalker girl whom you slept with once and now tries to contact you by calling, Messenger, Viber, Whatsapp, e-mail and whatnot.

Conclusion

Although normal men are imperfect, we should not have to deal with borderline crazy girls and women for no reason. There are enough of real bad man to put the blame on. The best advice is to be very selective with the females you associate with and remove yourself from them as fast as possible if bad signs occur.

For more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: I Was Attacked By An Elderly Swedish Woman For Putting My Girlfriend In Her Place

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Lone Gunman Kills 26 In Texas Church Attack

November 5, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Yahoo News:

5:40 p.m.

Gov. Greg Abbott says 26 people were killed in the attack on a Texas church and that it was the deadliest mass shooting in the state's history.

Abbott's remarks came during a news conference Sunday, hours after the attack on the First Baptist Church in Sutherland Springs, a community 30 miles southeast of San Antonio.

The victims ranged in age from 5 to 72 years old.

Two officials who spoke to The Associated Press on the condition of anonymity identified the attacker as Devin Kelley.

—

5:20 p.m.

Two officials have identified the suspect in a mass shooting at a Texas church as Devin Kelley.

The officials — one a U.S. official and the other in law enforcement — spoke to The Associated Press on the condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to discuss the ongoing investigation, which they were briefed on.

The U.S. official says Kelley lived in a suburb of San Antonio and that he doesn't appear to be linked to organized terrorist groups. The official says investigators are looking at social media posts Kelley may have made in the days before Sunday's attack, including one that appeared to show an AR-15 semiautomatic weapon.

Authorities say Kelley walked into the First Baptist Church in Sutherland Springs and opened fire, killing more than 20 people and wounding at least 10 others.

This item has been corrected to fix the spelling of Kelley on second reference.

___

5 p.m.

A congregant who wasn't at a Texas church the day of a deadly shooting says his cousins attended and that family members have been told at least one was killed.

Thirty-four-year-old Nick Uhlig says he didn't go to the Sutherland Springs church Sunday because he was out late Saturday. He says the cousin who was killed had three children and was pregnant with a fourth. He didn't know specifics about how the other was doing.

Uhlig says the family had just met days earlier for his cousins' grandfather's funeral.

___

4:20 p.m.

The wife of the pastor of the First Baptist Church of Sutherland Springs says the couple's 14-year-old daughter was among those killed in a mass shooting at the church.

Sherri Pomeroy, wife of Pastor Frank Pomeroy, said in a text message that she lost her daughter "and many friends" in the Sunday shooting. The text came in response to an interview request sent by The Associated Press to a phone number linked in online records to Frank Pomeroy.

Sherri Pomeroy says both she and her husband were out of town and trying to get back to Sutherland Springs, outside of San Antonio.

___

3:30 p.m.

A law enforcement official says more than 20 people have been killed in a shooting at a church in a small town outside San Antonio.

The official, who was briefed on the investigation, says the gunman fled the church in a vehicle after the shooting and was also killed, either by a self-inflicted wound or during a confrontation with police. The official was not authorized to discuss the ongoing investigation and spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity.

The official says between 10 to 15 people were also injured but stressed the investigation was early and the figures could change. Authorities are still trying to determine a motive.

Federal law enforcement swarmed the scene to offer assistance, including ATF investigators and members of the FBI's evidence collection team.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: The Narrative Of A Shooting Can't Be Formed Until The Media Knows All The Races Involved

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Women Aren't Women Anymore

November 6, 2017 | by J.T. Malloy | Link | Original Link

There was once a time when women acted like ladies. Some time ago, this all changed. They stopped speaking and acting liked women and started tattooing themselves from head to toe while adopting the personalities of low-class men.

Going all the way back to the 1950s, we find women still in their purest form. They mostly wore skirts and dresses when going out in public and "getting a tattoo" was unheard of for anyone but a sailor. Feminism barely existed, because why would a woman want to act in a way that would turn off men?

How Women Spoke In The 1950s vs Today

Intelligent, educated women from yesteryear spoke differently from the women you encounter on the street today. Whether it came from strong, parental upbringing, their favorite movie stars, or their weekly cotillion classes, ladies back then sounded more ladylike than their present day counterparts.

Contrast that to today's average woman who fumbles her way through the English language, sounds unimpressed and tired of life, and seems to offer very little in the way of conversation. The superficial chatter uttered by women today is also usually accompanied by a bad case of vocal fry which only adds to the unattractiveness of their speech.

Most of these women could learn a lot by watching movie actresses from years past. One of these is Grace Kelly who with her Mid-Atlantic accent embodied exactly how an educated woman should sound.

Notice how feminine her voice is compared to the women of today. The tone is soft and she doesn't end her sentences with a croaking vocal fry like so many girls now often do.

As mentioned in the video, vocal fry makes the person sound world-weary about the topic at hand. It's just unattractive to hear a woman talk like this and yet we see all of the Hollywood puppets like Kim Kardashian with this speech pattern. Girls everywhere watch this and then start to emulate their role models. And now we have an epidemic of this nonsense on our hands.

And if vocal fry wasn't bad enough, women these days now have the propensity to swear. Once again, they were taught this from their "role models" on TV. It started with movies and has now spread to the reality TV scene where profanity gushing from these women is constantly bleeped out.

This unladylike type of behavior would never be allowed back in the 50s because the men who ran the networks and studios didn't want their wives or daughters talking like that. But now there is a new element running the studios and in control of our media and they are perfectly fine with allowing women to swear as much as they like. You can hear women hurling expletives around their friends, boyfriends, husbands, and even their kids when out in public.

Of course no woman who does this can be considered a lady. Grace Kelly would never be seen acting this way, which just goes to show you that women like her are no longer being emulated. Women seem to be more interested in speaking however they want to and declaring themselves liberated instead of holding themselves to a higher standard.

How Women Acted In The 1950s vs Today

A young woman in the 50s grew up in a good family with a father and mother who were determined to make a marriage work. Because of this, she was raised by a loving father whom she grew up to trust and respect. Wanting her family's respect and that of others in her community, she was courteous to others. She strived to act like the female stars she saw on the silver screen who would be her role model.

This is what a lady should look like

The persona of what a woman wanted to project was one that expressed to men that she was a good catch; that one day she'd be a loving wife to a man who wanted to marry her. Contrast this to the women of today. Bitchy and masculine are just a couple of adjectives I can use to describe today's women. They have no grace, no warmth, and no innocence left from what they once were. On top of that, they don't respect themselves or others.

Women that never attended finishing school

They're told that being shy is a weakness and are advised to act "strong." But what that really means is masculine, obnoxious, and domineering. This little ploy by the left-wing media is the usual game of taking one word and giving it another meaning.

With a lot of today's young women growing up in single-parent households without a father, they immediately distrust men from the get-go. Her mother bad-mouthing her ex and other men she dates only further serve to make things worse.

By the time the young woman is out of the house and on her own, her view of men has already been radically changed from her 1950s counterpart.

What Will Become Of Women?

Women, who were once soft-spoken, warm, and graceful, have lost all of those wonderful traits that made them so attractive. They've descended into an abyss of low-brow behavior that should be repulsing to both men and women alike. Then again, we now live in a society where dignity has been removed from our culture. So maybe it's no surprise that we now have an epidemic of women who are no longer ladies.

As for the women from the 1950s who were once held in such high regard, they are now looked down upon by the mass media as being weak, manipulated, and out of date. It's no wonder then that today's women don't try to copy that outdated model of what a woman once was and what a lady should be.

Women's magazines and TV shows tell them it's okay to dispose of all the womanly traits their grandmothers had as they are no longer useful in today's society.

It's easy to see that the mainstream media and their puppets are mostly to blame for this plague upon our women as they've clearly been steered in the wrong direction by the wrong people. Because of this, the only way to change the tide is to remove the current decision-makers in our media and replace them with the types of people that want to see women return to being women. Only then can we begin to return to a dignified and cultured society.

Read More: American Women Are Mad They Aren't Courted Anymore

J.T. Malloy
J.T. Malloy is a lover of good films, classy women, and the days of old. He believes in the preservation of liberty and freedom for his country and restoring the West to greatness. You can visit his site at Jesus Tribune

Two Empowered Lesbians Got Lost At Sea And Had To Be Rescued By Men

November 6, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Naval history is a fascinating epic of bravery, endurance, and adventure. The Phoenicians plied the sometimes tempestuous Mediterranean, and even beyond the "Gates of Hercules". The Greeks were famed mariners likewise; The Iliad immortalized the names of the triremes crossing the wine-dark sea. Galleys helped maintain the vast Roman Empire. Later, European men began exploring the world. My Viking ancestors set forth in longboats, braving storms and bitter cold. Then Columbus discovered America: thousands of years after the Indians, five centuries after the Norse, but five centuries before Jack Kerouac. His voyage into the great unknown ignited the Renaissance.

Navigation was critical, driving great technological advancement. Viking methods were crude: for instance, sail northwest from the Orkneys until a particular star gets four fingers closer to the horizon, then due west to reach Iceland. When men sailed in caravels, things were further advanced; sextants took precise measurements, cross-referenced to tables. Clocks became ever more accurate to determine longitude. Charles Babbage developed the first stirrings of computer technology, intending to print precise navigation tables without math mistakes or copying errors that might leave sailors lost at sea.

Today, GPS is the big thing. However, despite today's advanced maritime technology, two strong and independent American ladies recently got in quite a pickle.

The Skipper and the First Mate set sail on a fateful trip

Not these two, but yanno…

Last April, Jennifer Appel and Tasha Fuiava and their two dogs left Hawaii in the Sea Nymph. Their destination was 2700 miles south-by-east: Tahiti, long prized by tourists seeking tranquility or a romantic getaway. Appel did have experience sailing around Hawaii, but Fuaiva was new at it.

They expected to arrive in three or four weeks. Soon things began going horribly awry, leading to a nearly six month odyssey. So much for the three week tour…

The weather started getting rough

As the Daily Mail reports:

> After leaving 'we got into a Force 11 storm, and it lasted for two nights and three days,' Appel said of the storm they encountered off Oahu. In one of the first signs of trouble, she said she lost her cellphone overboard.
>
> 'We were empowered to know that we could withstand the forces of nature,' Appel said. 'The boat could withstand the forces of nature.'
>
> But the National Weather Service in Honolulu said no organized storm systems were in or near Hawaii on May 3 or in the days afterward. Archived NASA satellite images confirm there were no tropical storms around Hawaii that day.

If that indeed was a cell phone (rather than a satellite phone), then it wouldn't have worked anyway. (Pro tip: the ocean doesn't have cell towers.) They considered turning back to the nearest tropic port, but incorrectly figured that Maui and Lanai wouldn't have docks suitable for their 50 foot boat. They pressed onward, faster than a speeding hamster.

The tiny ship was tossed

Then they had a problem with the sail rigging, but unfortunately empowerment didn't alleviate this. Traditionally, sailors climb the mast using a strap and fix the ropes. Perhaps the ladies didn't have a strap suitable for this purpose.

They came upon a small island, but…

> 'It is uninhabited. They only have habitation on the northwest corner and their reef was too shallow for us to cross in order to get into the lagoon,' Appel said.
>
> But Christmas Island, part of the island nation of Kiribati, is home to more than 2,000 people and has a port that routinely welcomes huge commercial ships.

If they'd gone to nearby Tabuaeran (Fanning Atoll, population ~2000), Napari (Tereitaki village) on the northwest has an ocean-facing dock. Tenenebo Village also has a dock just inside the lagoon. Or they could've set anchor nearby and found a helpful soul to un-goof the rigging.

If not for the courage of the fearless crew

After bypassing these uncharted desert isles, they decided to head to the Cook Islands. From Kiribati, it's about 300 miles further away than Tahiti. For alternate destinations, American Samoa is about as close as Tahiti. The mate, a mighty sailing woman, proceeded onward with the skipper, brave and sure.

> Then, they say, another storm killed their engine at the end of May.
>
> The Coast Guard made radio contact with a vessel that identified itself as the Sea Nymph in June near Tahiti, and the captain said they were not in distress and > expected to make land the next morning.

Bummer! As those with diesel-oriented inclinations usually know, the fix is to eject the water from the cylinders by removing the glow plugs and turning the engine. Adrift in the hot and sultry tropics, the Sea Nymph floated aimlessly for five months.

Don’t Bogart the chips, Ginger

Their year’s worth of provisions were dwindling. Quite fortunately, they had stocked up, heeding the advice of experienced mariners. Thus, they didn’t have to barbecue their pets, dive for clams, or whatever.

They had floated to within 900 miles of Japan, roughly opposite their original trajectory and twice as far; not exactly where they intended to go. A passing Taiwanese fishing boat noticed them and summoned the Navy. The USS Ashland brought the pair and their pets to Okinawa. However, the Sea Nymph was not towed back with them; it was determined likely to sink within a day. Poseidon had mercy at last.

Many questions have arisen. Why not use the radio as soon as the engine went out, when apparently they were quite near Tahiti? How about their flares? They had an emergency distress beacon too, but…

> She claimed that in her experience the beacon should only be used when you are in imminent physical danger and going to die in the next 24 hours.
>
> ‘Our hull was solid, we were floating, we had food, we had water, and we had limited maneuverable capacity,’ Appel said in an interview in Japan, where the U.S. Navy took them after their rescue. ‘All those things did not say we are going to die. All that said it’s going to take us a whole lot longer to get where we’re > going.'

Other accounts of the incident state that they feared sharks would breach their hull. In any event:

> Appel and Fuiava also said they had six forms of communication that all failed to work.

I really hate it when that happens.

Conclusion

It's not just a job; it's an adventure.

Here's why the crabby feminists who think men aren't good for anything are wrong. We specialize in designing, building, and fixing things. Technology apparently is part of "toxic masculinity". We invented today's conveniences that make life comfortable, which often are taken for granted (until something breaks). We're quite resourceful too. Solving problems—rather than talking about them—gives us personal satisfaction. Also, we help others out just because, even if they got themselves into the pickle.

After being rescued by the Navy, these two plucky ladies were sincerely grateful; quite touching these days. Feminists should start cultivating gratitude too, rather then resentment. They also should quit infecting normal women with their hostile attitudes. Male helpfulness is frequently exploited, sometimes to our detriment. However, continued ingratitude is making our patience wear thin.

They plan a redo of the trip next May. First they intend to build an "unsinkable and unbreakable boat". If they succeed, this unprecedented technological advance would make them a fortune. At the very least, hopefully lessons learned will empower these strong and independent women to have a more successful three week tour.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Male Writers From Buzzfeed Have Catastrophically Low Testosterone Levels

November 6, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Roosh V Forum:

What we've suspected has been confirmed by lab testing. Four writers at Buzzfeed got their testosterone checked and they are all lower than what you'd expect… for men in the 85-100 age bracket.

Age	Total Testosterone (ng/dL)	Free Testosterone (ng/dL)	SHBG (nmol/L)
25-34	617	12.3	35.5
35-44	668	10.3	40.1
45-54	606	9.1	44.6
55-64	562	8.3	45.5
65-74	524	6.9	48.7
75-84	471	6.0	51.0
85-100	376	5.4	65.9

From Infowars:

> The average testosterone level for an American male is a range anywhere from 270 to 1070 ng/dL with an average level of 679 ng/dL.
>
> When a crew from Buzzfeed got their testosterone levels checked as part of an investigation into male attractiveness, 3 out of 4 were apparently low.
>
> Eugene, the Asian guy, was the only one of them to have normal testosterone levels, though he was on the low end of the normal range.
>
> Studies have shown men who are physically strong are more likely to be right-wing, while weak men are more likely to be left-wing socialists.

The results are contained in this Buzzfeed video, which may be the gayest thing you see today.

Read the entire thread

Don't Miss: 4 Common Items That Are Destroying Your Testosterone Levels

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

8 Important Lessons From The Classic Novel Lolita

November 7, 2017 | by Ted Deveer | Link | Original Link

It’s easier to find advice for what not to do than what to do. This is true in general, but is overwhelmingly true of one of the greatest cautionary tales on why not to be a beta male that literature or the screen has seen: Nabokov’s novel Lolita, and in particular, Stanley Kubrick’s often forgotten 1962 film adaptation.

Lolita is worth a watch or re-watch; or even better, a read or re-read. We all know the one sentence summary: a grown man falls in love with a barely out of puberty hot girl. But the one sentence boildown loses all of the subtlety of the movie—and it is in the subtlety that the timeless wisdom is found.

But there is one group (a group which your humble writer was a member of; and perhaps still may be) that needs to listen to the wisdom of the movie. A sub-group of the “beta male” category: the “nerdy beta male” or, slightly less euphemistically, the “pseudo-intellectual beta male.” He prides himself on the size of his bookshelf, on his knowledge of obscure words, on his superior wit and intelligence as compared to those around him. The protagonist of Lolita, the doubly-named Humbert Humbert, is the consummate pseudo-intellectual beta. He is a disaster, whose life falls into greater and greater disaster as the narrative goes on, and the cautionary tale is clear: don’t be Humbert Humbert.

This general lesson becomes clearest in eight particular ways throughout the movie. Let's go through them.

1. Supplicating yourself to a girl will make both the girl miserable, and you miserable. When Lolita complains to Humbert Humbert that she's not happy, he gives a cringe-inducing speech about how he does everything for her and cleans up after her while painting her toe-nails. Even without words, the toe-nail painting scene would have made the same point. The result of the supplication? She's even unhappier—and so is he.

2. Beta males never learn. Humbert Humbert keeps repeating the same mistakes over and over again. This point becomes unequivocally clear in the last scene of the movie. Lolita had run away years earlier and they had not seen each other for years, she is now married and pregnant, and yet, again, he makes one last attempt to convince her to run away from her husband and elope with him. Of course, she rejects him.

3. Oneitis is fatal, literally. Our sad professor Humbert falls in love with the little girl and can't get over her. He ends up killing the alpha male, going to jail, and dying in jail, as the final credits tell us.

4. Once a girl has dated an Alpha, she'll always be an Alpha Widow. Lolita confesses, at the end of the movie, a key detail that ties the whole plot together: that she had been in-love with her mom's old boyfriend, who had been the person following them around. He was the alpha male that she couldn't get over. What did he do right? He was the opposite of Humbert. He had the balls to do risky and fun things—like pretend to be a German school psychologist to trick Humbert. Plus he hung out with artists and other cool kids.

5. Once an Alpha Widow, the girl will marry the supportive, nice guy beta loser. This is precisely what Lolita does, and the final part of the movie goes to pains to show what a loser he is. He can't even open his beer can properly. It's important to note that the husband isn't the intellectual beta, but the manly beta. He works with his hands, and comes off as a classic lower middle class type guy—that type of guy beats the intellectual beta for the alpha widow, any day.

6. Some girls are just slutty. Both Lolita and her mom have the "Thousand Cock Stare." In the movie, neither the mother's nor the daughter's sluttiness can be tamed. The mother even gives a speech to her husband's dead ashes, promising that next time she'll find a better guy—a speech reminiscent of many conversations girls have had with me and other female friends, promising to find a better guy next time. They never do.

7. Like mother, like daughter. There is truth to the ancient cliche: you want to know what a girl will be like in a few decades? Look at her mom. And what will your daughter be like? Probably a lot like her mom. This is an under-rated risk of slutmating.

Humbert Humbert submissively painting Lolita's toenails.

8. Admit to yourself who you are. One of the Humbert's core problems was that he never seized his strengths to make himself attractive and find his own path. Instead, he let his own Achilles' Heels seize control of his destiny. He married Lolita's mom, even though he was never interested in her, just to get to her daughter. He never searched for someone with whom he could have an adult relationship, instead using his position of power over Lolita to pressure her into a relationship with him. He tried to control Lolita by not allowing her to do anything, rather than trying to charm her so she would want to be with him. He shacked up with her in an illegal manner (she was his underage step-daughter, after all), so he could always be intimidated by the police, and scared they were after him even when they weren't—leading to a timid life of fear.

Looking back at it from today, there's a meta-lesson in Kubrick's movie, and the original book, beyond the obvious of not Humbertizing yourself. It's that human nature doesn't change, across time or space. The movie was released 55 years ago; the book published over 60 years ago. With some updated language and details, the same lessons are just as true today as they were then, but it is even more important that the lessons are spread and listened to today, since there are far fewer good role models for men to follow today, than there were in 1962.

Much more about conspiracy theories and protecting your privacy.

Read More: 4 Reasons Why Beta Males Persist In Human Populations

Ted Deveer

I'm Ted, I read old books, and my interest in Stanley Kubrick has nothing, absolutely nothing, to do with my interest in conspiracy theories, not at all, no way. And I like my privacy.

Woman Gets 20 Beta Males To Buy Her iPhones, Then Sells Them To Buy A House

November 7, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via NY Post:

One crafty female from China has performed the ultimate hustle to raise funds for a home deposit.

The scheme involved a lady convincing her 20 boyfriends to buy her 20 new iPhone 7s, which she then sold for enough money to put a down payment on a house.

Using the pseudonym Proud Qiaoba, a blogger gave a detailed description of how the hustle was performed by a colleague of hers, dubbed Xiaoli.

While the legitimacy of the story might sound dubious at first, the BBC reported it has been able to authenticate the claims.

“He bought me this and I didn’t even have to put out!”

Proud Qiaoba said she was utterly surprised when Xiaoli revealed she sold 20 iPhones to a mobile phone recycling plant for $A23,200 ($17,815) and then used that money for her house deposit.

“Everyone in the office is talking about this now,” Proud Qiaoba wrote in her blog, reports the BBC.

“Who knows what her boyfriends think now this news has become public.”

Proud Qiaoba said Xiaoli did not come from a wealthy family, so she had to think outside the box to raise the funds for a home.

“Her parents are getting old and she might be under a lot pressure hoping to buy them a house,” she wrote.

“But it’s still unbelievable that she could use this method.”

Making the feat even more impressive is the fact the iPhone 7 was only launched on Sept. 17 this year, which means Xiaoli hustled quickly.

Following the story, users on China's microblogging site Sina Weibo have been expressing admiration for the smart cookie.

"I can't even find one boyfriend. She can actually find 20 boyfriends at the same time and even get them to buy her an iPhone 7. Just want to ask her to teach me such skills," wrote one user.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: Women Would Rather Be Raped By Invaders Than Stuck With Beta Males

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Western Women Are Far More Likely To Be Killed In A Car Accident Than Murdered By A Man

November 7, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

When it comes to addressing the great social malaises of our time, from feminism to Black Lives Matter, the first skill lacking in most people is basic arithmetic. Words like “epidemic” and “genocide” or “gendercide” are thrown about as if millions of women or black people were being murdered on the streets and in the homes of the West by patriarchal white males every year (and, in the case of black people, not by other blacks).

The issue of men killing women in the West is actually a non-issue. Murder and other forms of homicide are tragic, but they are indicative of the bad morals and actions of the tiniest fraction of society. For every 100,000 men in every Western country, literally only a handful (or less) will end up murdering or otherwise killing a woman in any given year. A large proportion of this tiny, tiny minority has already been sanctioned by the criminal justice system before they kill a woman. The idea that their behavior is common, let alone condoned is a myth.

By refraining from using basic arithmetic to test the proposition that men killing women is regular or acceptable, feminists and leftists keep alive the biggest of myths–and profit from it. How many careers and accolades have been garnered by “activists” due to the lie that many women are in constant danger of being murdered by men in the West?

Let’s crunch some numbers

This is very rare.

In 2016, my native Australia recorded 71 violent deaths of women, representing all violent female deaths, irrespective of whether other women were the perpetrators or a man also died in a particular incident. This tally includes everything from women dying in domestic violence situations to a girl being killed in a robbery or home invasion.

It is unclear if all of these 71 fatalities were bonafide homicides because, as of 2017, perhaps a majority of these cases have not been fully determined by courts. Remember, perpetrators of "homicide" are more likely to be mentally ill than the general population. There's a rather large difference between someone killing another person with malice (or "sexism") and someone doing the same thing as a result of, say, schizophrenia. That said, I will presume that all 71 deaths were genuine homicides and were perpetrated by men.

There are over 24 million people in Australia and just over half of these are female. About two-thirds, or eight million women are aged between 15 and 64.

12 million females and 71 violent female deaths (all categories) = 0.0005917% chance of a woman being killed in a suspected homicide in 2016 (1 woman in 169,000)

Eight million females (aged 15-64) and 71 violent female deaths (all categories) = 0.0008875% chance of a woman being killed in a suspected homicide in 2016 (1 woman in 113,000)

Intellectually dishonest activists like Jenna Price in Australia have claimed that the very small number of female homicide deaths each year are the outcome of “entrenched sexism.”

US figures are higher in both gross and relative terms, but nevertheless demonstrate a tiny statistical chance that a woman will be killed by a man in a given year. In 2007, when America had about 300 million inhabitants, roughly 1,650 women were killed as a result of “intimate partner violence” (IPV), such as a boyfriend killing his girlfriend (or a girlfriend killing her girlfriend!). Statistically, a woman is more likely to die from a car accident than by the hand of a man (1 in 18,000).

150 million females and 1,650 female IPV deaths = 0.0011% chance of a woman being killed through intimate partner violence in 2007 (1 woman in 91,000)

100 million females (aged 15-64) and 1,650 female IPV deaths = 0.00165% chance of a woman being killed through intimate partner violence in 2007 (1 woman in 61,000)

What am I missing? What are you missing, too? We can call someone’s death a tragedy yet retain the sense of mind to realize that the probability of a woman dying from a man’s actions, including those of her intimate partner, is beyond miniscule.

Crime rates are at an all-time low

Steven Pinker.

One non-rightwing thinker and numbers man you should familiarize yourself with is Steven Pinker. He has proven that violence is currently at an all-time low, at least on average. Individual places (St. Louis, Detroit, etc.) may buck the trend and still we have normally safe societies, though factors such as immigration and African-American crime are continually ignored by liberals.

The group most likely to die from homicides are young to middle-aged men. In places like Chicago, the overwhelmingly majority of victims are male and/or black, not female. Even if the number of women dying in the West did represent an "epidemic," a far greater one afflicts men fatally disposed of by others.

No wonder there are so few women in STEM. If rank-and-file feminists are anything to go by, calculating sums, percentages, and probabilities is beyond their intelligence.

Read More: Angry Woman Shit Tests Boyfriend And Ends Up Getting Them Both Killed

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The White Woman Punched In The Face By A Black Cop At A Football Game Deserved It

November 8, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Feminists and white knights everywhere are up in arms because a black cop at a college football game punched a white woman who struck him (and tried to strike him before that, too). Well, in a nutshell, the woman deserved it.

The incident occurred as a whole squad of officers had to carry her to remove her from the stands. Here's the fisting that came her way:

Not only did Bridget Freitas of Pembroke Pines in Florida get what was coming to her, she should also be shamed for her terrible, drunken behavior. It is high time that women dealing with police (and men in general) realized that hitting someone should come with the expectation that they will hit you back—and potentially hard.

For now, Freitas is charged with felony battery against a police officer. If the charge sticks and she's convicted, the pussy pass will likely come into effect during sentencing. Vulturous attorneys in Florida are probably already salivating at the prospects of being able to launch a million-dollar civil suit for "excessive force" on her behalf. That said, how she should be able to stay employed as a registered nurse, a job in which she presumably often interacts with police, is beyond me.

Freitas' attack on lawman Douglas Ross had been preceded by her repeatedly refusing to leave Hard Rock Stadium, where the University of Miama was hosting Virginia Tech. She even sat on the steps for a time and didn't budge. Of course, the reason for her eviction was clear—she had been abusing other patrons and allegedly hit another woman.

So just take it on chin, Bridget (or in the face).

No news here, move along

Why did she hit first?

I have lost count of the number of occasions I have seen police, security guards, nightclub bouncers, and bar patrons hit other guys back, usually much harder than the blow they received. None of this makes the news, irrespective of how much bigger, more martial, or less inebriated the retaliator was. Nor should it usually make the news.

If you pick up one end of the stick, you're picking up the other end, too. If women deserve the special sensitivity that comes with not being backhanded or punched by a man, they can keep their hands and legs well and truly to themselves.

As we can always predict, various outlets are going into overdrive to defend Bridget Freitas and cast defamatory aspersions about Douglas Ross. ABC News takes the cake so far:

> With her eyes half-closed, Freitas flails with her open hand at Detective Douglas Ross, who is carrying her right leg.

No, this was a deliberate and premeditated attack on a law enforcement official and therefore the community. "Flailing" is when you're having an epileptic fit and cannot control yourself, or falling and desperately trying to grab onto something. Only God knows how much worse professional liberal typists would have reacted if the races were reversed and a black woman had been struck by a white officer.

Who's going to wife her up?

Incoming: subservient future husband.

Sadly, some chump will. And you can bet your bottom dollar that if Bridget Freitas hits a cop when she’s drunk or feels irritated, she is capable of taking swings at her future husband. Thankfully for the guy who marries her, though, the police now have her priors and will be more likely to think that any domestic dispute was triggered by her.

It’s a pathetic indictment of the state of the modern sexual marketplace that we know without a shadow of a doubt multiple, probably desperate suitors await Freitas, if she doesn’t have them already. Needless to say, she will probably rule the roost over any man she half-settles down with, as he will believe that she is the best he can get.

We can hope that the courts will throw the book at this poor excuse for a woman, but I am not holding my breath. The bigger, more obscene probability is that hardworking Douglas Ross will lose his job either soon or down the track.

Read More: How To Get Over The Fear Of Being Punched In The Face

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

New York Strippers Go On Strike Because They're Not Getting Enough "Respect"

November 8, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Zerohedge:

Wealthy Wall Street finance types are going to need to find a new way to entertain their wealthy asset-management clients – at least for the time being – because the strippers are going on strike.

The source of the dispute is a simmering dispute between New York City dancers and a growing cohort of Instagram-famous "startenders" who wear outfits that are almost as revealing as the strippers' outfits, but also promote the club on social media – bringing in a loyal following of customers – while also serving drinks.

The club owners, not wanting to lose the revenue that the bartenders are bringing in, have stood idly by while the bartenders' influence inside the clubs has grown, while the strippers, who typically pay clubs a house fee to dance, are seeing their nightly earnings dwindle.

The result? One stripper who spoke to the post said she used to make $1,000 a night. But now she's pulling in closer to $400.

"No dancer in New York City is making $1,000 a night anymore."

Of course, the strike is still in its early stages. But according to the Washington Post, it's quickly gaining support.

> Panama is a stage name and she declined to provide her real name. She is for > real, though, said Mona Marie, the owner of a New York dance studio where many dancers train called Poletic Justice. And, she says, so are their mounting grievances, so much so that some of them have declared a stripper's strike. It's unclear how many dancers are participating and what the impact on the clubs has been. The strike is about a week old.

>
> This isn't your normal labor dispute between employees and employers. It's between bartenders and strippers, on the one hand, and between strippers and club promoters on the other, who tend to side with the bartenders because, after all, it's the bartenders who they believe are bringing in the customers via social media.

As it turns out, the advent of photo-sharing apps like Instagram and Snapchat has violently disrupted the business of being an exotic dancer. To compensate for the drop in their nightly take at NYC clubs, the dancers now travel more because they can earn more money at clubs down South, or clubs in smaller towns where girls from fresh faces can earn more money.

Because of the club owners' indifference, many of the best dancers to skip NYC altogether, one stripper said.

> A dancer named Gizelle Marie is one of the strike organizers. "The [New York City] bartenders tell the customers not to tip us. They block us from the customers while we dance or they are sweeping our money off the stage while we dance," she told The Post. Several videos taken from inside different clubs posted on Instagram appear to support her claim.
>
> Gizelle Marie says most customers can't tell bartenders apart from strippers > anymore because they all basically dress the same and “the club promoters and owners encourage the behavior.”

>
> Gizelle Marie got the idea to mobilize the NYC Strippers Strike after she traveled to Washington last month to dance at a club during Howard University’s homecoming.
>
> “I made a lot of money. It made me think to myself that a lot of the great dancers aren’t dancing in New York anymore. They moved away to other cities to work or they just completely stopped,” Gizelle said.
>
> Within a couple days, she posted the word on Instagram and 30 strippers gathered last week at Poletic Justice in the Bronx for a meeting.
>
> Panama said, “The dancers used to be the most respected in the club, and now it’s like the dancers are at the bottom of the barrel. And the dark-skinned dancers are all the way at the bottom of the barrel.”

Among other considerations, the striking strippers are demanding a reduction in house fees and that black dancers also have the opportunity to be hired as bartenders.

> In the past, the dancers have mostly been silent about their issues out of fear, she said. “People were in fear of losing their jobs if they spoke out. A lot of these women have other careers, are parents, are putting themselves through school so that fear factor absolutely played a part in it.”
>
> They want their house fees reduced. They want bartenders to pay house fees, too. The black dancers want the opportunity to be hired as bartenders. And they want the bartenders to stop stealing their money.
>
> They wish as well that management would stop pitting the strippers and bartenders against each other. The dancers believe everyone can work together harmoniously if rules are established.
>
> “All we want is respect at the end of the day,” Gizelle Marie said. “If it doesn’t change by us going to the owners we’ll take further matters legally.”

However, the nascent strike is facing one major obstacle: Club promoters' reaction to the strike ranges from indifferent to downright hostile.

> Club promoters are not sympathetic to the strippers' demands. Sean Simmons, promotional director for Aces New York, said the strike is "nonsense." He said there is no racism in the nightclubs and that he employed "all ethnicities" as dancers and bartenders at his club before it was shut down a couple months ago.
>
> "The whole industry itself has changed," Simmons told The Post in a brief phone interview. "Some clubs are bartender-driven, but that's just because the bartenders are beautiful women." Simmons said that there should be rules and regulations between dancers and bartenders, but said, "Nothing will come from the strike."

Still, the women plan to keep fighting.

"No matter how people perceive your work environment, a work environment is a work environment and everybody needs to be respected and treated equally. If there's something you can do to help or change your establishment, you should do it."

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: Can Strippers, Pornstars and Live Sex Models Be Good Girlfriends?

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Anonymous Sexual Harassment Allegations Leads To Suicide Of Welsh Politician Carl Sargeant

November 8, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Mr Jones said the women spoke to his office on the basis of confidentiality.
>
> — Welsh First Minister Carwyn Jones, describing how he denied due process to a "friend" who then committed suicide

Carl Sargeant, a Minister until last week in the Welsh Government, has committed suicide after being very amorphously accused of sexual harassment. His boss, Wales' First Minister Carwyn Jones, apparently didn't bother to inform him as to what the allegations were.

Instead of giving his "friend" even a modicum of due process, Jones, the head of the Welsh Labour Party, handed the allegations to political apparatchiks to investigate, rather than the independent civil service or police. He railroaded Sargeant and promised to make "confidentiality" for the accusers his top priority.

Once more, the big thing missing is evidence. None has been provided so far. None was provided to Carl Sargeant before his death. Nearly 15 years in the Welsh Assembly counted for nothing when it came to Sargeant's prospects of keeping his job or merely being afforded the chance to defend himself.

Carwyn Jones, Welsh First Minister, fired Carl Sargeant without even telling him what the allegations against him were.

The way the dead man has been treated vindicates an article I wrote not long ago comparing modern-day "rape" witch-hunts to the tactics and procedures of Stalinism. Just as in the heyday of the Soviet Union, anonymous denunciations without evidence (and without giving the accused the chance to properly respond) are enough to ruin the livelihoods of those in the firing line.

This travesty also resembles dystopian great literature. In Franz Kafka's novel The Trial, the protagonist Josef K. is treated as a criminal, irrespective of not knowing the charges against him. This is the same treatment that Carl Sargeant received, except in his case the allegations were probably not even of a criminal nature.

Is suicide an overreaction? Perhaps, perhaps not

After eating their own for a long time, the left is now killing them.

There are going to be many people—and yesterday I was one of them—who think that

Carl Sargeant overreacted in taking his own life. Nevertheless, we do not know the circumstances of his life or how many others might have attacked (or threatened) him personally after he was fired as a government minister. Much has been made about Sargeant "stepping down," but given he was already suspended by his party, his high-profile job was as good as gone.

There is no doubt that Carl Sargeant furthered an anti-male agenda while in office. At the beginning of this month, he was Cabinet Secretary for Communities and Children. Before that, he had been Minister for Social Justice. I do not want to engage in schadenfreude, yet Sargeant was well and truly aware of the reputational damage that comes the way of men accused of any "indiscretions" against women, oftentimes years after "events" take place.

As the witch-hunts in the West multiply, there are going to be men who, for reasons of mental illness or strained personal circumstances, either kill themselves or ruin themselves with substance abuse after being denounced. "There but for the grace of God go I" is frequently going to be the appropriate response to these situations. Without the red pill we have all swallowed, how would we fare in Carl Sargeant's position? We just don't know.

It's time to weaponize Carl Sargeant's death and those of others like him

Vague, anonymous and unsubstantiated allegations like "inappropriate" behavior are driving a number of British Members of Parliament at Westminster to fear losing their jobs as well.

Another British man, youngster Jay Chesire, committed suicide after a patently false allegation of rape in 2015. Amidst the waves of "harassment" free-for-alls that have hit newsstands over the last decade, how many others have also taken their own lives in response to unsubstantiated claims?

Call it distasteful, yet these deaths do indeed need to be politicized. At the moment, away from Cardiff and over in London, a number of male British Members of Parliament (MPs) face losing their jobs after a "dossier" of words (no proof!) began circulating in the media. Buzzwords like "inappropriate" behavior, which are never defined, let alone proven, are all that is necessary for these men to be attacked and face the prospects of losing their careers.

The loss of one’s livelihood is bad enough. But it can get worse than that and I am sure many of those accused of usually baseless claims of sexual harassment have contemplated taking their own lives. In the future, more of them will, too.

Deaths like Carl Sargeant’s are exactly what is going to happen when Western society substitutes witch-hunts for properly verifying claims and innocence before guilt.

Read More: British Socialist Politician Says Eating Disorders Are Caused By Female Narcissism

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Media Establishment Hires Soy Boys To Help Spread Their Anti-Masculine Agenda

November 9, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

The “Try Guys” at Buzzfeed, or as Trump branded it, “that failing pile of garbage”, shot one more of their asinine click-bait videos where they visited a lab, to determine which of them was “scientifically” the most attractive. One of the tests involved a testosterone level reading. As we reported earlier, the quartet of man-children displayed low testosterone levels, comparable to those of elderly men. They tried to downplay it but the red pill crowd smelt the blood and went for the throat.

Age	Total Testosterone (ng/dL)	Free Testosterone (ng/dL)	SHBG (nmol/L)
25-34	617	12.3	35.5
35-44	668	10.3	40.1
45-54	606	9.1	44.6
55-64	562	8.3	45.5
65-74	524	6.9	48.7
75-84	471	6.0	51.0
85-100	376	5.4	65.9

They flaunt what should be shamed

Here is the Hooktube link to the original video (it allows you to observe their flaws without funding them through Youtube views). It brings us the living additional proof that epicentres of liberal and left-leaning values like Buzzfeed turn men into weaklings if they are exposed long enough to their toxic influence.

Leftist values, websites, writers and their audience have (supposedly) male attributes but are closer to homosexuals and women than men. Left means low-T, it is that simple.

Breaking news: Liberals are weaker

Those xirs specialise in short, sassy videos with bright colours, simple words, a lot of swearing and comical sound effects. It reveals a serious problem where the “news” plastered on every social media feed directed at a young, gullible audience shape their opinion into thinking that those runts are sane, normal people.

Those Try Guys constantly behave like homosexuals, are paid to get fingers up their rectum, dress in drag and reek of weakness and low confidence.

I have written in the past that leftists are repulsive. We now have the confirmation that in addition of being the ideology of the world’s rejects, Left-leaning politics and leading a life following its principles turn men weaker on the long run.

Witnessing liberal low-T manlets like the Buzzfeed crew, their effeminate mannerism and high-pitched squeals triggers two types of reaction:

- Disgust, indifference and rejection from feminine women
- Incredulity, contempt and borderline violent hostility from masculine men

Wolves bear their fangs the same way before mauling subordinate rivals

This is the passive, beta Homo Progressivus that Liberalism creates and the ruling Kabala can control with ease.

Reading their faces was sufficient

This is not how adult men's chins, jaw lines and facial structures should look like. Those soft faces are bloated, the physical testimony of a life spent guzzling carbonated drinks, gorging on processed food and Frankenmeat. A life of video games, insecure Facebook posts at three in the morning and sexual solitude.

Above are the high testosterone faces of the men that can fight and get women. Sharp square jaws, prominent cheek bones and lean faces combined with low body fat. Reader, this is how your facial features should look like.

9 easy ways to be the opposite of those soyboys

"Poz, Feelz and Enrichment: The Show"

I advise you not to watch more than a minute of their clips. I wanted to sock them all in the nape to put them out of their misery. I recently stopped watching clips that I know would make me angry. If the problem (like the plague of Left-leaning ideologies) is already clearly known, no point exposing yourself further. Finding ways to eradicate it is more productive. Here is how:

- Practice intense competitive sports: the key is that they should put you in a situation where that "fight or flight" tense sensation is common, triggered by external aggression, pain or danger. Choose specific team sports such as rugby, hockey and American football, or individual sports like martial arts (including full-contact, regular sparring, actual risk of being knocked out or full-force grappling), climbing, big game hunting etc.
- Avoid eating these: processed food, licorice, soy products, flax, food prepared in plastic containers, beer, raffinated sugar etc.
- Cut down on cigarettes, marijuana, and alcohol.
- Get plenty of restful, quality sleep: Stop using any device with a screen one hour prior to bed time. Do a calm activity, read or meditate until then. Lie in total darkness. More on that topic here.
- Eat food that triggers the production of testosterone: red meat (with moderation), pork, eggs, fish, game, poultry, veal, fat, nuts, cruciferous vegetables and drink a lot of water.
- Game women: Approaching and sleeping with beautiful girls will raise your testosterone.
- Lift often and heavy. Use compound lifts.
- Stop masturbating and remove pornography from your life.
- Get a lot of natural sunlight and vitamin D.

On les aura à l'usure

Return Of Kings has published extensive articles on how to boost your testosterone, avoid what lowers it and the issues linked to that phenomenon:

- 5 Testosterone Tips To Attract Women And Pump Up Your Sex Life
- The Decline In Testosterone Is Destroying The Basis Of Masculinity
- What Lack Of Testosterone Does To The Male Brain And How To Fix It
- 5 Ways To Boost Your Testosterone
- 5 Easy Ways To Boost Your Testosterone
- 4 Common Items That Are Destroying Your Testosterone Levels
- 6 Stages A Man Goes Through When His Testosterone Level Declines

Holes in the narrative like that testosterone reading must be exploited to their maximum extent. Be a man, be right-wing and be proud of it. The stone-cold blade of reality must puncture the oestrogen-caked hearts of liberals. This is the only language they understand.

Read More: Why Cortisol Is Making Men Fat, Weak, And Effeminate

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Liberal Woman Fired From Government Job After Giving Middle Finger To Donald Trump’s Motorcade

November 9, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via BBC News:

A woman pictured raising her middle finger toward US President Donald Trump’s motorcade has reportedly been fired from her job over the photograph.

The image went viral after it was taken on 28 October in Virginia, close to a Trump golf resort.

Juli Briskman, who was identified as the cyclist in the image, alleges she was fired by employers Akima LLC after she posted it to her online profiles. The company did not respond to the BBC’s request for comment.

Ms Briskman told US media the firm had called her into a meeting a day after she informed their HR department she was the subject of the widely circulated image.

She told the Huffington Post news website that executives had told her they classified the image as “lewd” or “obscene”, and therefore deemed that it violated their social media policies after she had posted it to her Twitter and Facebook accounts.

However Ms Briskman said she had emphasised to management that she had not been in working hours when the photograph was taken and had not mentioned her employers on the social media pages.

Ms Briskman also alleges that a male colleague was allowed to keep his job after deleting a post deemed as offensive in a separate incident.

She therefore questions why she was immediately dismissed from her role. The 50-year-old mother-of-two had reportedly been at the government contractor firm for six months working in communications.

Despite losing her job, Ms Briskman said she did not regret making the gesture. “In some ways, I’m doing better than ever,” she told The Huffington Post.

“I’m angry about where our country is right now. I am appalled. This was an opportunity for me to say something.”

The press photographer, Brendan Smialowski, told the AFP website that it was common to see people protesting or making obscene gestures at presidents as they drove by.

He said that he had been struck by the “tenacity” of Ms Briskman after she made the gesture several times and made attempts to catch up with the motorcade.

Read the entire article

Read Next: How To Survive A Modern Day Witch Hunt

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Switzerland Will Never Be Conquered In War

November 9, 2017 | by Otto Theudoricus | Link | Original Link

Switzerland is in a unique position in Europe. It is landlocked and borders three potential big players in an all-out war. Besides its neutrality, which would by no means guarantee protection from an invasion (e.g., Netherlands in WW2), there are many practical reasons why this small country can offer shelter and safety from an armed conflict even if the country were to be invaded.

It has a small but highly trained military

The Swiss army is made up of 21,000 active personnel and another 150,000 in reserve. National service is mandatory for every able-bodied male citizen, making just about every man in the country having a basic level of combat training and the ability to use a firearm. At age 35 you become part of the reserve and the government issued assault rifle is given to you. The idea behind your assault rifle being so readily accessible is for the scenario where in the event of war each civilian becomes a soldier almost immediately, making mobilisation very fast and efficient.

The Stgw 57. Although no longer in production or used by the army this assault rifle is widely owned privately.

An armed population

Gun ownership is extremely high. Unlike most other countries in Europe, the Swiss government encourages an armed populous and requires active personnel to store their assault rifle at home and, up until 2008, even store live ammunition. Over 600,000 citizens belong to shooting clubs, including children.

The population of Switzerland stands at around 8.2 million, of this 2.7 million are male aged between 15 and 64. With 3.4 million guns this makes for an impressive force for an invading army to face.

However, with globalism and the cancer that it is spreading to all corners of the planet, gun rights are being eroded and limitations are slowly being implemented. In just 20 years, the militia has shrunk from 600,000 to less than 200,000. Every time there is a shooting, the subject resurfaces and there is a knee-jerk reaction of some who want a total gun ban. With guns so deep rooted into Swiss culture, every referendum so far has failed, but small changes have been made. This being said, crime is very low and the high number of guns does not correlate with the number of homicides, as the left loves to claim.

Natural borders

Geography

The entire southern border is made up of the Alpine mountain range, with most of the highest peaks concentrated in this region and forming the natural divide between Switzerland and Italy. An invading army would simply not be able to enter through this formidable obstacle with heavily armed defenders on every cliff edge.

Yes, Napoleon marched his Grand armee up and through the St Bernard pass but there was no opposition to hamper his progress.

The Northwestern border is also protected by mountains, much smaller but still a logistical headache for an invader. Along the North and East, you have the Rhine river and lake Constance, so this leaves very few flat entry points. The only realistic routes are in and around Geneva and Basal, but even these are quite narrow and would bottleneck the invaders. Monumental efforts would be needed to either navigate through mountain passes or cross large rivers and lakes.

Disguised bunkers like this are dotted all across the mountains

Eventually, a well-equipped and determined army would probably breach the border in combination of full frontal attacks in the urban areas mentioned above and amphibious assaults across the Rhine. This would only be the start however as Swiss militia and regulars retreat into their natural defenses, trying to flush them out will be nearly impossible short of dropping nuclear weapons.

This would eventually descend into guerrilla warfare which could last for years. It is unlikely that the occupiers could be pushed out and defeated without some kind of foreign intervention depending on the belligerents involved. For example, Italy and Austria would not stand a chance of even invading in the first place due to the Alps. France and Germany would also have a hard time but would probably be able to invade and hold at least part of the country.

Individual nations invading is very unlikely, though the EU could turn tyrannical and mount an invasion. Russia would be a distant second and I don’t see any other foreign powers capable of reaching Switzerland to invade.

A well-built fallout infrastructure

There are enough nuclear fallout bunkers to shelter the entire population. Regulations since 1963 made it compulsory for every new building to have such shelters

If Switzerland is left alone and the war takes place just outside its borders but involves nuclear weapons, the large mountains will offer good protection from such strikes. Large cities are the primary targets of nuclear attacks, so if we look at which cities are the closest to Switzerland, this can help to work out where the safest place would be.

If we assume the worst case scenario and a 50 megaton warhead is dropped, Paris, Berlin, and London are all far enough away to escape the blast and even the thermal radiation. Therefore the safest places are the towns and villages directly behind mountains deep within the Alpine regions away from the borders, mainly the South and Central parts.

Conclusion

Entering Switzerland now is very easy since it is a part of Schengen and one can literally walk across the border with seldom checks at crossing points that are actually manned. For those who think all-out war is just not going to happen, don't be surprised when it does, especially with the polarisation we're currently seeing. At best there will be armed insurrections across Europe, which will be mostly isolated but numerous and could easily escalate. Worst case is of nuclear bombs leveling the entire continent. Either way I predict most survivors will find themselves in Switzerland.

Read Next: 10 Reasons Why Switzerland May Be The Best Country In The World

Otto Theudoricus
An ageing millennial, recently red pilled and on a mission to restore common sense and promote traditional values. Fairly well travelled and bilingual with an interest in history and currently living in the UK.

5 Ways Millennial Men Can Save The West

November 9, 2017 | by Nickolas Sinko | Link | Original Link

Every generation has some defining characteristics within which they see the world, and the role they played (or will play) in the theater of ideas that writes our history.

First we have the greatest generation who grew up during the deprivation of the Great Depression, and whom went on to fight and destroy out-of-control fascist governments during WW2. Then, at the end of the day, they came home and built America into an economic powerhouse.

We then had the Baby Boomer generation which was a result of the Greatest Generation coming home from war, building businesses, and picking up a woman to start a family with. These kids grew up in the patriotic, conservative, and chauvinistic world the patriarchs of the Greatest Generation created.

When the 1960's rolled around, Jewish intellectuals from the Frankfurt School decided to pivot away from the ideology of the bourgeois vs the proletariat and adopt a new way to sell Marxism to the West. And so identity politics were born. It was the rich vs the poor, the haves vs the have nots, capitalism vs communism.

Hippies began to spread this anti-capitalist, anti-West ideology into the popular culture through music and arts. By the end oft he 1960’s, the baby boomers had successfully swung the pendulum the other direction from the post-war American pride of their fathers.

Generation X was born during this now popular culture of post-modernist, Marxist thinking. Since the hippies were now having kids of their own, they could mold them to the idealistic image of progressiveness they saw in their ideology. They raised their children to be critical of the West, and to have a distrust of the institutions their grandfathers had built. These kids had no reason to object, as they were growing up in a time of relative economic ease and were still riding the wave of the post-WW2 America built by their grandfathers. They had it both ways for a long time. The millennial generation, whose birth was just around the corner, were about to inherit a West so damaged that many have asserted would be impossible to recover.

What goes up…

National debt began to rise in the late 90’s early 2000’s. Terrorism became a real threat after September 11, 2001. Liberal policies caused the biggest economic disaster since the Great Depression when the housing bubble burst in 2008. Since then, national debt has continued to skyrocket, illegal immigrants have begun swarming, and wages have stagnated.

Businesses under the stranglehold of high taxes, intrusive bureaucracy, and red tape are beginning to close their doors. Factories moved over seas in search of cheaper labor as the result of poorly negotiated trade deals which saw American nationalism taking a back seat. Even though we were hurting worse every year, our parents incessant liberalism kept trying to solve a problem by throwing more and more money at it. The answer was always more government, more control.

The counter culture of the 1960's had become the dominant culture, and was quickly destroying everything the Greatest Generation had built. What our parents lacked was the context and experience that their grandparents had. Their grandparents knew that Western civilization was superior and must be protected, but their kids took it for granted and unknowingly allowed the dominoes to begin falling.

We have inherited a broken West. Communism is knocking on our door yet again, cultural Marxism has infiltrated the roots of our educational institutions, resentment for capitalism is growing, and the left has taken their post-modern identity politics to the extreme. The salt in the wound is that the only ones who can save the west, millennial men, have been emasculated by feminism and are lost in a crisis of identity.

The good news is that there is a cure. The damage is severe, but we are not past the point of no return. Even in the face of what seems to be insurmountable adversity, anger is always more useful than despair. Here are five ways we can turn the ship around before we sail over the edge entirely.

1. Recognize that the West is the best

The Western world is the greatest civilization humanity has ever seen. Our culture is not only different from other cultures, it is superior. As millennial men, we have been handed the reigns to the pinnacle achievement of the human race. Thousands of years of trial-and-error have lead to this very moment, but in the war of ideas, we cannot become complacent. This begins with acknowledging exactly what we have inherited, and having the intellectual and historical context to understand its value. Nowhere else in the world is there the opportunity, freedom, life expectancy, productivity, advancement, or industriousness that there is in the West. We must protect it.

There is a war of ideas happening as we speak, and the egalitarian idealists on the left are attempting to institute a philosophy which holds that the West is somehow the enemy by spreading lies like “the West is destroying the planet with our pollution”, “we are oppressing minorities through capitalism”, and that “the patriarchy itself is an evil that is to be destroyed”. We must reject this devastating philosophy of destruction, and bring Western patriotism and pride back. When our peers spit on the culture that our forefathers created we must spit back and remind them that everything they enjoy today is a result of Western beliefs and Western philosophies in action.

2. Reject egalitarianism

Part of recognizing that the West is the best is acknowledging the big lie of egalitarianism. All cultures are not equal, all philosophies are not equal, and all people are not equal. To pretend otherwise is to continue digging our own grave. Western ideals have provided mankind with the vessel to accomplish the impossible, to bring order to chaos, and to provide for our advancement like no other society on earth.

The big lie of egalitarianism presumes that all people, cultures, and ideologies are equal and interchangeable. Egalitarianism suggests that the West is not the best, but is only different from other societies. The side effect of egalitarianism is that we have nothing to protect, nothing to pursue, and no greater purpose to strive for. If we are all equal anyways, why bother striving for anything?

If you are looking for chaos and pain, look no further than third world non-Western countries, or anti-Western values through history. From the tribal warfare of Africa to Islamic slaughter in the Middle East or the mass genocide of communism, the alternative to Western civilization is ugly and barbaric.

3. Know your enemy

Know what we're up against. Research cultural Marxism, the nihilistic and malevolent doctrine of post-modernism, and the slaughters of communism. Gain some perspective by looking back through time and learning about how societies rise and fall. The looking glass of time is cloudy and smudged by default without education, so while we still have time on our side we need to wipe it clean with study and insight.

History is the world's most effective teacher. Ignorance of the natural laws of chaos and order are not excuses to repeat past mistakes over and over. Hell was once defined as a place where there is no reason, and if we don't have perspective or an understanding in the war of ideas, we are existing in a state of hell. Knowing why the West is the best, and who the enemy is will better equip us to fight and win.

4. Speak freely

Freedom of speech means the unlimited freedom of ideas. It is allowing your intellect to flow, and not placing restrictions on the dissemination of ideas. Free speech is the foundation that the West is built on. History is littered with oppressive regimes attempting to quash free speech so they could hold onto power. Evil ideologies cannot prevail unless the truth is hidden.

Make sure that truth is always visible, and speak your mind freely. This is why Jesus said "No one lights a lamp and puts it in a place where it will be hidden, or under a bowl. Instead they put it on its stand, so that those who come in may see the light." He was referring to the importance of truth.

Learn to debate, and how to persuade others of your position. Speech is your sword in the war of ideas, and if we want to win we must keep them sharp. Always be looking for the truth, especially if it hurts. Truth doesn't exist to please, it exists to light our path through the chaos of life. Political correctness, as we all know, exists to quash free speech in favor of the doctrine of the left.

However, we need to pay particular attention to definitions. Since the left cannot defy human nature to suppress free speech, they are now trying to hijack and re-frame definitions to suit their movement. This way the speech can continue, but it can serve their purpose. They have redefined words like racist, socialism, radical, and conservative to mean what is convenient to them. Radical used to mean an extreme ideology. Now it means anything that doesn't tow the post-modernist line.

5. Start a business

Go to work for yourself and produce. Create jobs, and create wealth. Enterprise is the engine that keeps the vehicle of the West moving. Men are designed to produce things of value, and to improve the lives of others. If we aren't producing, we are dying. This is why we are living in an epidemic of identity crisis, drug use, and absentee fathers. When we have no reason to exist, we default to wasting our lives.

Wealth creates the means for positive change, and puts the reigns of the West into the free market – into the hands of the people. If you want to live a meaningful life, and make a lasting impact on our Western society you must generate adequate wealth to do so. A life of poverty doesn't only short change you with what you could've been, but also what everyone else your enterprise could have touched could have been. Entrepreneurs don't only feed their own families – they also create the means by which others can feed their families.

The Most Important Generation

The solution to our identity crisis as millennial men is recognizing our purpose as a generation. We might not be the greatest generation, but we could prove to be the most important generation. The fate of the West may well lie within our hands. We are about to truly come of age, and take the wheel of Western civilization, so it is up to us whether we continue to steer it off the cliff of chaos, or turn it back towards human greatness.

We must consider our children, and our children's children. Will they grow up in a culture of lost values, big brother, and nihilistic malevolence? Or will they grow up in the land of opportunity, freedom, and truth. Hard times breed strong men, and strong men breed easy times. Easy times breed weak men, and weak men breed hard times. Knowing this feedback loop is half the battle, and preventing it from poisoning the future is something we will have to figure out.

Read Next: Patriarchal Nationalism: The Only Societal System That Can Save The West

Nickolas Sinko
Nick Sinko is a proud western chauvinist who refuses to apologize for creating the modern world. He is the publisher of Right Wing Magazine. You can also follow him on Twitter.

Charlie Sheen Accused Of Having Sex With Then 13-Year-Old Corey Haim On Set Of Movie Lucas

November 10, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Daily Mail:

Charlie Sheen is being accused of sodomizing a then 13-year-old Corey Haim on the set of the movie 'Lucas.'

According to the National Enquirer, a now deceased Haim had told others about how he was allegedly raped as a minor by Sheen, who was 19 at the time, while filming the 1986 movie.

Former actor Dominick Brascia claims Haim disclosed to him what happened between him and Sheen. Brascia went on the record about what he says Haim told him before he died in 2010 at 38-years-old.

'Haim told me he had sex with Sheen when they filmed 'Lucas,' Brascia told the Enquirer. 'He told me they smoked pot and had sex. He said they had anal sex. Haim said after it happened Sheen became very cold and rejected him. When Corey wanted to fool around again, Charlie was not interested.'

Meanwhile on Wednesday, Sheen emerged from his parents Martin and Janet Sheen's home looking defiant while smoking a cigarette in the face of the bombshell allegations against him.

By the afternoon Sheen released statement through his representatives to the Hollywood Reporter saying 'Charlie Sheen categorically denies these allegations'.

The magazine also says that Lost Boys actor's closest friend, Corey Feldman, alluded to the alleged incident in his book 'Coreyography: A Memoir.'

'At some point during the filming [of 'Lucas,' Haim] explained an adult male convinced him it was perfectly normal for older men and younger boys in the business to have sexual relations, that it was "what all guys do," Feldman wrote.

'So they walked off to a secluded area between two trailers during a lunch break for the cast and crew,' continued Feldman,' and Haim, innocent and ambitious as he was, allowed himself to be sodomized.' Feldman never named Sheen as the man in the incident.

In 2011, according to the Enquirer, when Feldman was asked about Sheen he said: 'I'm not a huge fan of Charlie Sheen…especially the way he's affected other people that I know.'

Tellingly, Feldman also said Haim 'fought for his entire life to recover from those early experiences and to get his life together.'

And, just last week, on the Today Show, Feldman said a report coming from the National Enquirer was to be expected.

‘They cover it up. They protect it. I know of a friend of mine that actually went and spoke to a reporter and gave all the information and they were — the day before I launched my campaign, they were supposed to put out a story in the [National] Enquirer.’

‘I believe there’s a lot of darkness in Hollywood right now, and I believe it’s been there for quite some time,’ said Feldman. ‘It’s going to continue unraveling. This is just the beginning, it’s just the tip of the iceberg.’

Other sources came forward to support the claims made by Brascia about Haim’s interaction on set with Sheen- who is now living with HIV.

Another insider alleges that ‘Corey was so confused by the sexual encounter he believed, like so many victims, he was ‘in love’ with his abuser,’ adding that the actor bullied the young teen actor into a vulnerable position for sex.

Brascia added that Haim told him he later had consensual sex with the ‘Wall Street’ star while in his mid-to-late 20s. ‘Haim told me he had sex with Sheen again,’ Brascia said, adding ‘He claimed he didn’t like it and was finally over Sheen. He said Charlie was a loser.’

According to the report, the Enquirer says they spoke with dozens of sources who say Haim told them about his alleged abuse at Sheen’s hands before he died of pneumonia in 2010.

Additionally, a confidant close to Sheen claims that the ‘Platoon’ actor had said he had a liaison with Haim, but said it was consensual.

Other allegations in the report emerged about Sheen’s behavior with at least one other minor on the set of ‘Lucas,’ in which the report says a total of eight set witnesses spoke out as part of the investigation.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: Idiotic Women Had Unprotected Sex With Charlie Sheen And Now Complain About HIV Risks

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

5 Reasons Why Ray Kurzweil’s Singularity Will Never Happen

November 10, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Ray Kurzweil is famous for promoting a very optimistic vision of the future, at least among the hip urban globalists. His core idea is that we will fuse with technology.

Our abilities will be multiplied! Life duration will be radically extended! We’ll be free from the limitations of our bodies, from diseases, from our narrow identities! We’ll be able to choose our gender, experience anything, know everything—and turn post-human! One definitive change inclusive to all other changes! Yay!

The end of individuals. Of genders. Of families. Of nations. Of identities. Only minds that have been crammed through years of propaganda perceive this endgame as “cool”, “edgy” and the like. Getting tattooed and pierced already means treating one’s body as an external commodity. We know it is a sign of degeneracy.

Fortunately, Kurzweil’s well-marketed dream shows impossible. Just like Communism, it is bound to fail ignominiously.

1. Diminishing returns

According to Kurzweil technology follows a pattern of accelerating returns. When technological development goes on and on, more and more discoveries are made, more and more power is harnessed. Thus the improvement rate always goes up until the Omega Point or "Singularity" is reached. (Actually, the latter is but a tech-washed rehash of the former.) Kurzweil devotees like to point out how computer science went through a series of always closer breakthroughs since the middle of last century as a prime example of accelerating growth.

In truth, development follows a pattern of diminishing returns. Sometimes a breakthrough is made, big changes are reached, but soon after the same technology starts to give less while asking for more work to be done. Going from 40 to 80 mph thanks to improved cars was a revolution in transportation, but going from 80 to 100 mph means only a small advantage in earned time, a much higher fuel consumption and an increased accident risk. Facebook was awesome but having a thousand Facebook, Twitter, LinkedIn and their alternatives is just noise.

Remember the infamous F-35, a useless fighter jet that has cost $1.45 trillion ($1.450.000.000.000) for advantages that are negligible compared with the much cheaper F-15?

Diminishing returns mean that, after the initial breakthrough euphoria, researchers run up with limits they may surpass at an exponential cost for a negligible gain. Try to fuse the whole world with that.

2. The fakeness of the blue-pill world

The world we were born and raised in is full of it. When we were blue pilled, we tried to balance the necessity not to be "sexist"—and the sincere gentlemanly desire to be "respectful"—with the natural need to get laid. Our equilibrium was ruthlessly blamed as hypocritical by uncaring loud mouths. Later, when we took the red pill, we started seeing much more shams than our innocent teenage shyness:

- Seduction is about selling oneself or a picture of oneself, every man becomes his own salesman
- On the negative side political correctness entails a lot of taboos and unsaid truths, for example about female hypergamy, non-white crime and welfare free riding, Western demography, and so on
- On the "positive" side PCness tells a lot of lies and goes with a lot of double standards
- People pretend to be free while accepting all this without a word, following the latest craze, virtue-signaling, and the like
- The media is biased and systematically deceiving
- The streets, TV, and Internet are full of illusory appearances thanks to endless advertising
- The corporate world and personal improvement fields are riddled with New Agey quackery
- Unimportant parts of the Hive create BS events for self-congratulatory ends
- Many jobs are useless, women who get there thanks to sheer pussy pass affirmative action spend their time gossiping and paper-shuffling, their male counterparts become faggy and effeminate or must lead a double life

And so on indefinitely. The academia is full of sophisticated noise. The corporate world is full of BS-selling gurus and SJWs. The media has always been a manipulation tool aiming at shaping the public opinion, and today, media insularity has reached bias. The unemployed get redundant, useless jobs, like being a traffic cop at a red light, repeating what the automated light already says. Most of all of it is for the sake of appearances, and those who pretend to be creative or inspired are essentially rehashing stuff already told elsewhere.

Is all that BS a temporary ailment before the awesome singularity, or rather a sign that something is very, very wrong in the crowded cities? Can urban areas that systematically produce a degenerate culture and degenerate beings usher in a fantastic new age? Allow me to doubt it.

3. The fragility of an interdependent world

Cities thrive within globalized capitalism at the expense of rural areas. Basically, anyone who produces a good very cheaply and in enormous quantities will be able to inundate these places with his merchandise. Now imagine that a new crisis happens, perhaps a crash in food production or a power shortage. How many time before urban dwellers start fighting each other for food? If you stay there, you'd better be bulking, on a budget if needed.

Resilient or antifragile systems are able to sacrifice some of their parts and learn from their mistakes. They must be able to avoid the typical contagion effect, so that if an anomaly spawns somewhere, it is promptly dealt with. By contrast, an all-together system is prone to fatal accidents that will sink all of it. The Titanic was entirely sunk by one single iceberg because it couldn't resist the overwhelming pressure of the water no matter how protected the hold was. A set of smaller boats would at worst have lost one of its members, and the survivors would have boarded in safety on the other boats.

The economy, because of its excessive reliance on the State-corporate-finance octopus, is hugely vulnerable. So are the cities. They depend upon complex, artificial routes for everything which is in—and they are overburdened. Recently a little Italian girl died of malaria because of a sub-Saharan immigrant who contaminated her. Innocents and do-gooders are exposed whereas the losers and leeches who put the whole system at risk are systematically bailed out. This unfair, fragile system is bound to fail.

Needless to say, the resiliency or antifragility of small, independent units ultimately flies in the face of one-world-ist arrogance. Empires that outperformed postmodern West in virtue and masculinity ultimately fell. Perhaps our Fukuyama, Kurzweil and the like are merely into make-believe about the supremacy of their West—which is definitely not our West. And perhaps their West needs to fall.

4. Fragmentation and limitless wars

Kim Noble, "Caged"

Modernity went hand in hand with individualism and atomization. Postmodernism, far from interrupting the trend, intensified it by making individuals think of themselves as abstract units able to choose their gender as they could choose their outfits. Now a globalist could say this augurs well: nations, races, families, were all blunders on the road of the One Perfect Unified World. Atomized individuals are indeed more prone to follow the trends, to obey peer pressure, and to remain forever trapped into a relation of dependence towards the system. Isn't that perfect to lead them towards some great unification?

Facebook enjoyed a tremendous success because it made people able to connect with like-minded individuals. Millenial girls are famous for their complacent narcissism, autism, and lack of proper sociability. If a trend is going on, it is communautarianism, networking, getting back to a tribe—not fusing with the entire world.

In France I noticed a strategic media bent as EU integration fell out of media fashion to get replaced by more chauvinistic references. The Bolsheviks spent decades telling Russians their identity resided in socialism, yet when the WW2 broke out they had no choice but to pay respect again to Mother Russia.

People need palpable identities and, aside from half-autistic techies, no one derives his identity from fantasies of technological fusing.

People also need a minimum of recognizable conflict or difficulty in their lives. Otherwise they become bored and start indulging in shameful pleasures like collecting beta orbiters. Reality shows, trashy stuff attract attention for a reason. Any narrative needs antagonists. 90s' movies used aliens to create a feeling of human identity. Unless people undergo unimaginably radical changes, they won't become mere cells in a Gaian superorganism.

5. The mind is not a computer

Originating from behaviorism and cybernetics, cognitive science starts from the assumption that the mind is built like a computer. Just like its intellectual ancestors, this model was a cherished tool of the elite. It allowed to reverse-engineered the mind as if it was a computer: that is, as a set of modules processing information. Such model tends to deny agency, willpower, even consciousness. It makes individuals soulless, at mercy of being rewritten or reprogrammed.

As for singularity, computers only have a relative individuality because they were built that way: the Internet of Things is already replacing it with an indefinite set of interrelated objects. If people are like computers, they can be fiddled with until they are in such a state of interconnection they won't be differentiated anymore.

Real minds are not like that. Individuals are conscious. They have faculties—powers, something cognitivists loathe when they cannot represent them as a pure result of dead processes. They have vocations. They have identities that cannot be completely rerouted and resolved into empty fashions, virtue-signaling, or fleeting pleasures. They have spiritual needs that New Age baloney won't blind forever.

When you acknowledge that individuals, the sexes, cultures, populations… are different at bottom, pretending they can merge with technology and fuse becomes much harder. Nature made us more complex than arrogant techies will ever understand. Which is quite a good thing.

Will postmodern West crumble?

I have no crystal ball. Still, a general urban collapse seems far more likely to me than an extravagant hope in high-tech. The only thing that matters is that we do not fall with the wicked world. Untold numbers are already living the crowded areas for the land or at least middle-sized cities, where one can live around relatively trustworthy neighbours, have space to own supplies, perhaps own a garden and live far from the gangs of roaring criminals.

Singularity and related globalist myths only exist because urban leeches are able to extract wealth from the real makers. Which countryman could have invented behaviorism, Keynesian economics, singularity and other ideas that seem to come from a void? Kurzweil's idea would turn the entire world into a giant New York. It would also be a definitive victory over the good people, a sealed denial of the red pill truths. On the other hand a collapse will be painful, chaotic, but it will let room for the true light to come back on Earth. Those who keep living into a blue-pill dream machine may have a rude awakening.

Read Next: Bizarre Science Fiction Novel Sheds Light On What The Technological Singularity Will Be Like

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

How To Keep Your Knives Blazing Sharp

November 10, 2017 | by Jay Mullins | Link | Original Link

Dull knives are more than just an annoyance, they're a safety hazard. Don't believe me? Fine. I dare you to use a dull knife for an entire month. If you actually do this, what you'd find is that a dull knife requires more pressure to get the job done compared to a sharp knife. And because you're applying more pressure, you're at a greater risk of cutting yourself. The safest knife is a knife that does the work for you, not the other way around.

So, what can you do to achieve a hair-splitting knife edge? Well there's 3 things: honing, sharpening, and stropping. Do these 3 things and dull knives will be a thing of the past! Let's discuss each of these 3 in greater detail, shall we?

Hone, Hone, Hone Away!

Just what the hell is honing anyways? Without getting too technical, honing is the process of aligning a misaligned knife edge. So, you're probably wondering how a knife's edge gets misaligned to begin with. Every time you use your knife to slice, chop, or cut something, you knock your edge off alignment ever so little.

A knife edge is extremely delicate, and even the action of chopping up vegetables can over time result in an edge that is folded over (AKA misaligned). The thing is, we can't prevent misalignment; we can only correct it. Honing is the process of correction.

This Is What A Honing Rod Looks Like. Make Sure You Get One!

I'm not going to get into the details of how to hone a knife, because that's a discussion in and of itself. Instead I suggest you check out my honing 101 instructable. It explains how to hone a knife in 3 simple steps.

Get Yourself A Sharpener!

I said it before and I'll say it again, dull knives are a safety hazard. If you have any reason to never use a dull knife ever again, let that be motivated by the safety of you and your loved ones. Without ranting on too much, my point is this: dull knives suck, so we need to sharpen them. Knife sharpening is an interesting topic. It can be as simple or complicated as you make it to be. I prefer simple. It is the process of slowly abrading material (steel), with the purpose of achieving as sharp an edge as possible. When it comes down to it, you have 3 choices as far as knife sharpeners are concerned:

Electric Knife Sharpeners

Electric knife sharpeners take away most of the skill and technique required to sharpen an edge. They're typically the most expensive of the three types of sharpeners.

Work Sharp Ken Onion Edition Is One Of The Best Electric Sharpeners On The Market

What I Like:

1. It’s All About Quick Results—Good electric knife sharpeners can get your blade from dull to finger cutting sharp in about a minute!
2. Anyone Can Use Them—So easy, even grandma and grandpa can work these. Once you know the basics of knife sharpening, it’s literally plug and play.

What I Dislike:

1. Can Cost Quite A Bit Of Money—The good ones can be quite expensive. I’m talking in and around the range of $140-250.
2. Electronics Malfunction—Compared to the other three sharpeners, the electric variations are the least durable.

Pull Through Sharpeners

If you’re looking for the most bang for your buck, pull through sharpeners are your best bet. You can find some awesome ones that cost less than a McDonald’s combo meal!

Brod & Taylor Is The Crème De La Crème Of Pull Throughs!

What I Like:

1. Not Hard On The Wallet—Unlike the electrics, pull through sharpeners are very reasonably priced. That’s not to say you can’t find a $150 pull through. Price range is about $5-150.
2. Perfect For Outdoorsmen—The fact that they’re portable, lightweight, manual (no batteries or electricity required), and easy to use, make them the ideal sharpener for camping, hunting, fishing, and hiking trips. You can even toss one in the car!

What I Dislike:

1. Results Are Average—The only caveat with this are the results are average. It sharpens an edge to the point where you should be able to get the job done, but nothing more.
2. Wouldn't Trust Them On My Expensive Knives—Pull throughs are perfect for whipping up a beater knife into shape (I say this from experience). I wouldn't use them for my expensive collection, and I don't recommend you do either.

Stone

Old is gold. No seriously, old is gold! It's no surprise that this ancient sharpening technique is still relevant even today.

You Can Sharpen Just About Anything On This. Talk About Versatility!

What I Like:

1. You Can Expect Professional Results—If used correctly, sharpening stones can produce results similar to a professional service. Of course, this depends on several different variables: stone quality, sharpening technique etc.
2. Most "Natural" Way To Sharpen—One thing I dislike about electric and pull through sharpeners is that they can be a little too aggressive on a knife edge, and they strip off too much steel. With sharpening stones, you have full control over how much steel is abraded.

What I Dislike:

1. Takes Time To Learn—Sharpening using stone requires a little bit of a technique and understanding. In that sense, it's not everyone's cup of tea.
2. Confusing For The Newbie—Sharpening stones are a completely different ball game. Diamond (continuous and non-continuous), water, ceramic, and oil stones are what you can expect to find these days. This is just high level though. The deeper you dive, the more detailed it gets!

Last But Not Least, Stropping!

Stropping is something I usually do after I sharpen. To strop is to polish, coat, and align your edge. Think of it as the final step in achieving maximum sharpness. Wondering how to strop? Here's an instructable I wrote on the topic. Check it out!

You should be honing every two weeks. When honing is no longer effective, then and only then should you sharpen (and strop).

Read More: Is Agribusiness Making You Sick?

Jay Mullins
Jay is a man of many passions. Knife sharpening, and travelling are just some of them. Oh, and he also tells me he is a raging foodie who loves trying out different foods from all around the world. Jay is also a regular contributor at myelectricknifesharpener.com. Go check him out!

I Do Not Date Woman Who Have Any Of These 15 Red Flags

November 12, 2017 | by Kauai | Link | Original Link

"It's not the daily increase but daily decrease. Hack away at the unessential." -Bruce Lee

The above is a quintessential Bruce Lee quote that I live by. In a world where busy is sexy and flaunted as a status symbol, we must channel fortitude in our everyday life to do less; particularly, when it comes to selecting women.

It's near impossible to find quality LTR women nowadays. but being mindful of the points below, we eliminate a plethora of time-sucks and low quality mates, thereby saving precious time and energy for the best women out there.

1. A woman who has slept with much older men and prefers it. Would a father or male role model allow his teenage girl be taken by men decades older unless there was a specific reason?

2. A woman who falls for “black guy” game. She will tend to be loud, hyper-aggressive, and impulsive.

3. A woman who dances Salsa, Bachata, Kizomba. Basically any Latin dance, because all it comprises of suggestive lyrics and skimpy attires, where men lead women intimately and rub and touch them. It’s kinda like foreplay to sex.

4. A woman who keeps in touch with her ex-boyfriends and casual sex partners. She should want to let go of any man besides you, because you are her world, and vice-versa.

5. A woman who entertains a swarm of beta-male orbiters, and acts aloof about it. She’s an attention whore who needing constant validation and connection.

6. A woman who flirts with other men overtly or covertly, and doesn’t resist another man’s game. The man’s subconscious rationalizes it as a green light and presses her with bolder moves.

7. A woman who doesn’t have a strong relationship with her family. Strong parenting is the antidote to sluts. Fathers and mothers, please take time to show your girls what they should expect while dating and how they should carry themselves as well how to find lifelong mates.

9. A woman who doesn’t have good, healthy examples of what a real, committed, long-term relationship looks like. Otherwise they believe that a relationship is always easy with no troubles, disagreements, or fights. And the moment it gets difficult, they deem you as being "controlling" and they move on to the next guy.

10. A woman who has a career in massage, dance, modeling, or acting. It's a bad sign if she needs to use her physical body or looks to get paid.

11. A woman who lies to you and withholds information from DAY 1 or DAY 100. Self-explanatory.

12. A woman who never fights for your time, attention, and love. But gives the whole world unceasing empathy and unconditional love.

13. A woman who moved out really early from her parents home or lived in a different country and traveled to many cities. Yes, she has slept with lots of men that you know nothing about, and still thinks she deserves a solid, good man.

14. A woman who values the opinions of her girlfriends or anyone else, over yours. Not a keeper!

15. And most importantly, a woman who doesn't want to grow in all areas of her life, every single day. Instead she might use logic, such as "you don't like me the way I am" or "you're trying to change me" or some sort of bullshit along those lines. Nope! "I love who you are, but I also want you to keep improving yourself everyday girl. And I'll promise to do the same."

We men must realize that meeting good women is not about doing more, but having the patience and perseverance to do less. Good luck out there my brothers.

Read More: How To Pass The Bliss Test In Long Term Relationships

Kauai
Kauai is a #RedPill writer, entrepreneur, equities trader, and Muay Thai practitioner.

How To Do A Standard Squat

November 12, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Having previously discussed two other lifts in the "big four" series, we will now discuss the squat, arguably the best exercise for the legs, and unarguably a fundamental motion for any athlete or physical culturist. This is because doing the squat properly will not only train the big muscles of the quadriceps, but also the calves, the feet, the buttocks, and the hips.

Combine the squat with the deadlift (which hits the hamstrings much better than the squat), and you'll never need any other lower body exercises. And it goes without saying that in training your legs, you'll make yourself run faster, jump higher, punch and kick harder, grapple stronger, and do anything you want to do better.

Squat Variations

Like most exercises worth doing, there are a julienne of variations of the squat. There's high bar squats, low bar squats, back squats, front squats, overhead squats, pistol squats, and so forth. However, for the majority of lifters, the basic high bar back squat is sufficient for their needs.

To do this exercise, you will need a rack or power cage, preferably the latter as it has safety bars to put the weight down should you be incapable of lifting the weight. To begin, remove the archetypal dudebro doing curls in the squat rack—you’re a man and you’ve got real exercises to do!

Once that’s been done, place the bar in the rack at about shoulder/neck level. Load it with whatever amount of weight you wish.

Then, duck under the bar and then stand up straight, with the bar rest on your trapezius muscles and shoulders—NOT your neck—and gripping the bar with an overhand grip. I understand this might seem a bit confusing, so here is a picture.

The camera was a bit skewed, hence why the picture looks a bit lopsided. My apologies.

Some lifters with a little bit of experience might be asking why I am not using the pad, or that weird ox-yolk thing, or any other sort of device to cushion the weight of the bar against my shoulders. The reason is that I'm not a little girl, and I don't need to protect my delicate shoulders with a "pussy pad". Grab the bar, flex your upper back, and suck it up. If your form is right, you don't need the pad.

Having grasped the bar properly, you must get ready to lift. Get yourself comfortable and place your feet shoulder width apart. Look straight ahead and lock/hollow the back. If that sounds familiar, it should—it's the exact same preparatory steps you took do for the deadlift. This speaks to the shared muscles these exercises target, and the shared risk for injury should form be improperly done.

This is a textbook image of the medical condition known as hyperlordosis, but as a visual aide I feel it helps people keep their backs in the right position

However, while back injury is a possibility with the squat, the knees and ankles are much more at risk, and will be discussed shortly.

Anyway, keep your feet pointing straight ahead or slightly pointed out. This keeps the knees from pronating inward, which is not something you want to be doing—it weakens the squat and leads to risk of injury.

Begin squatting down in a controlled fashion, while keeping your torso tight and your feet angled properly. Squat down at least until your hips are parallel to your knees, and preferably until your hamstrings touch your calves—or “ass to grass” as the laymen say.

It is through this squatting that the two main risks for injury occur. Should the trainee not squat low enough, he will be bearing weight on his knees rather than the muscles of his legs and glutes, and this can lead to nagging injury outside the gym.

A patella fracture

And in the “ass to grass” squat, a trainee that doesn’t keep his back and hips tight can risk having lower back movement colloquially known as “buttwink” (in actuality a forward tilting of the pelvis at the bottom of the squat), and this can also lead to lower back and hip injury. Luckily, should you already be performing my posture exercises—and really, there’s no reason you shouldn’t be—you should have the hip flexibility to avoid this.

Once you have gone sufficiently low, the actual lift begins. Push hard through the ground (again I recommend doing this barefoot if you can) and straighten out the legs, while keeping your body straight as it should be. Once you’re finished, walk forward and ease the bar onto the rack.

Read More: The Thrust Is A Must (The Importance Of Core Strength)

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

ISIS Wife With Four Kids Flooded With 1,300 Messages On Online Dating Site

November 13, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> I can't help but love him. I don't know how to make that feeling stop.
>
> — Texas-based Briton Tania Georgelas, who supposedly has a current American boyfriend, describing her ongoing tingles for her ex-husband and ISIS terrorist John Georgelas

An American IT professional named Craig is dating a British woman who supported ISIS and married the terrorist organization's highest-ranking American leader, John Georgelas. Worse still, Craig has taken on the responsibility of helping to look after and provide for Tania Georgelas' four children by that same marriage, whom she had previously raised in militant-held Syria. Before this, she received 1,300 replies on Match.com, using a profile that admitted her links to ISIS and her terrible parenting skills.

Aside from the obvious question of why Tania Georgelas is not in jail for assisting an organization that creates actual sex slaves and brutally murders thousands, this newest instance of a thirsty male with a low quality, maladjusted female (plus all the other suitors who eagerly vied for her) should make us all shudder. What's happened to society? What went wrong?

Of course, Tania Georgelas never learned her lesson at all. She only came back to the West because of food and water issues, not because of any pang from her conscience about the group she was involved with. Even her initial involvement with ISIS has been blamed on "racism" she said she faced living in Britain.

Mother of the decade for taking her kids to live in ISIS-dominated Syria.

As I have said repeatedly in recent times, women's standards for men are grossly inflated. The story of Tania Georgelas is yet another illustration of this. Numerous men are now taking their cues from these same ridiculous assessments by women, hence why an educated American man is willing to take an ISIS terrorist's sloppy seconds, complete with four children who are not his own.

Here at Return Of Kings, we have heard of some doozies when it comes to thirsty men. You might remember the Polish boyfriend who knew his girlfriend was planning on sleeping with 100,000 men, for example. But just when we think a particular story cannot be matched or topped, a new one comes along to rival it.

The truth: women often get their only true tingles from depraved, violent men

Whether they're your South Central gangbangers, Sicilian mafia, ISIS terrorists, or local versions of the same thing, women regularly crave violent, morally indifferent men.

It's not just a case of childhood trauma or other external factors influencing mate choice. Women do want "dark" or "bad" men. And a number of these types of men are also the kind to behave criminally or with gross indifference towards the suffering of others. John Georgelas fits the bill in this regard and even after he endangered her children, his ex-wife Tania pines for him all the more.

We see plenty of parallels in the West itself, not just in areas like Syria or Iraq. In Europe, how much of a woman's preference for open borders comes down to her unconscious lust for foreign men who act aggressively and behave violently? Who knows, but the same lust Tania Georgelas maintains for her ex-husband is the same lust that motivates many a female cheering on the migrant crisis in places like Germany.

If this is already bad enough, what makes the debacle additionally troubling is the abject willingness of men like Craig to take in broken women in the mould of Tania Georgelas and try to wife or girlfriend them up. All it does is reward bad female behavior, enhance the spectacular usefulness of the pussy pass, and send a clear message to all women that you can further a murderous death cult and still expect a decent man to love you, fund you, and excuse away all your actions.

Don't contribute to the rot

How a man can stay with a woman who admits to loving her terrorist ex-husband is beyond us. What we can do, however, is refuse ourselves to contribute to this societal rot. As my friend Troy Francis recently insisted, you must be willing to walk away from a woman who treats you second best. To this I would add a corollary: advise that same self-respect for your friends and associates.

Amidst a murky social and political climate, in which poor female antics are condoned and rationalized, our main priority has to be our own personal conduct and self-advancement. Whilst our readers are nowhere near the self-loathing of Craig, his mistakes should serve as a wake-up call for how bad our present circumstances are. We have no choice but to maintain the highest standards and reject broken women.

Moreover, this whole situation demonstrates the stupidity of those complaining about Donald Trump's border policies. When an ISIS-supporting woman who risks the lives of her children to live in Syria is allowed into the United States, what sort of system is that? A broken one, just like Tania Georgelas herself is broken.

Read More: Terrible Mother Who Took Her Kids To Syria Now Wants To Leave Islamic State

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How Men Can Live In The Spirit Of “Plus Ultra”

November 13, 2017 | by Bruno Buscaroli | Link | Original Link

[image]

In ancient Greek myth, Hercules was said to have reached what’s now the Strait of Gibraltar, which connects the Mediterranean Sea with the Atlantic Ocean. This was he furthest West he ever ventured, as well as the edge of the known world. The two edges of the Strait of Gibraltar, Jebel Musa (African coast side) and the Rock of Gibraltar (Europe side), were thus named ”The Pillars of Hercules”.

According to the stories, on the pillars were engraved the words ”Non Plus Ultra”, meaning Nothing Further Beyond in Latin. These words were meant as a warning not to venture any further.

On the year 1516, Spain’s King, Charles V, overturned this warning and made the words ”Plus Ultra” (further beyond) into the national motto. This reversal came about as a result of Christopher Columbus sailing past the pillars into the new world on 1492 and the reclaiming of Spain from the Arabs.

Having effectively ventured past the end of the world, Spain went beyond the previous limits, ushering in a new prosperous era. This slogan remained popular in Spain and throughout the world after Charles’s death, having been used in the names of sports teams, brigades, and even engraved in Donald Trump’s Florida mansion.

Applying Plus Ultra

Take Plus Ultra and apply it to everything you're working towards. On the gym, dare to go for just a bit more weight than you think you can handle. Go for that extra rep on your pull-ups or push-ups when it feels like your arms will bust if you keep going. Your body will flood you with pain to protect you, but you must go that bit further anyways. More often than not, that one extra rep won't break you, but rather, make you stronger.

On your work, put extra effort in even when you want to stop. If you've decided to work 20 minutes and then take a break, make that 21 minutes. Once you've persevered past what you thought you could handle, you'll often find yourself going even further.

The limitations you thought you had seem trivial once they've been smashed over and over again. Work harder, bolder and bigger than you had originally planned to. Dare to take risks and strive for excellence.

Of course, there's a limit to what you can achieve by just willing yourself into action. Willpower is ultimately finite, and relying on it alone won't solve your problems. However, nearly every time, you won't have gone as far as you actually could. We often underestimate what we're actually capable of.

If you don't try to past your limits, you'll never find out what those limits actually are. Challenge yourself to go further every time you think you could do more. You'll find your limits stretching with every bit of extra effort you put in.

Reversal

Non Plus Ultra this bull

There are times to heed the warning on the Pillars of Hercules. There are things, both in the outside world and within yourself that must not be challenged. These are boundaries to be respected, lines to not cross.

As an individual, this means establishing and defending boundaries for what you'll accept from others: being uncompromising with your standards for long term relationships, refusing to go against your principles when urged to, and not taking shit from bosses, friends, or co-workers. Your personal boundaries must be as the ocean nobody dared to sail past.

And as for the larger world, these are absolute truths and realities, such as inherent biological differences between the sexes and the need for order in a civilized society. No good comes from opposing such facts.

The vision behind Plus Ultra doesn't apply to just the individual man, it was also meant as a call for progress for the whole country and Western civilization as a whole. A message for new generations to go further than their predecessors did. We should be conquering new frontiers in colonizing Mars, not trying to redefine gender.

Let’s aim for this instead, ok?

In short

Let Plus Ultra be your battle cry as you take on life. Man’s drive and potential is worth nothing if not used. Go further, as those before us did, so that those who follow can go beyond even that.

Read More: In Defence Of The London Ultra-Orthodox Jews Who Banned Women From Driving

Bruno Buscaroli
Bruno is a young man who used to dismiss red pillers as alarmists. Then he spent a semester in a college campus and became one himself. Now he educates himself through the internet and a library card.

Race Hoax: Black US Air Force Cadet Caught Writing Anti-Black Slurs On Dorm Doors

November 13, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

Air Force Lt. Gen. Jay Silveria was quick to react in September to allegations of racism at the Air Force Academy Preparatory School in Colorado Springs, Colorado. But now the incident that sparked the general's reaction has been proven a hoax.

Superintendent Lt. Gen. Jay Silveria delivered a video on Facebook that quickly went viral after reports of "racism" on campus. In the video the Gen. addressed his cadets, saying, "If you can't treat someone from another race or different color skin with dignity and respect, then you need to get out":

According to the Washington Post, the message "Go home," followed by the N-word, was written in black marker on the message boards of five black cadet candidates. The academy pledged to launch a full investigation into the incident.

But now, it appears that the incident was a hoax all along.

Investigators found that one of the black students himself had written the "racist" message, the Associated Press reported.

The cadet who reportedly admitted to writing the obscene message is no longer at the school. Authorities have declined to say whether he was expelled or if he withdrew of his own volition. Officials have also declined to identify the student.

Gen. Silveria defended his widely seen response video by saying the sentiment was still relevant even though the incident has proven to be a hoax.

“Regardless of the circumstances under which those words were written, they were written, and that deserved to be addressed,” the general told the Gazette newspaper. “You can never over-emphasize the need for a culture of dignity and respect — and those who don’t understand those concepts, aren’t welcome here.”

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: 5 Examples Of CNN’s “Fake News”

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

You Need To Be In The Top 20% Of Men To Experience Sexual Success

November 14, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

You know where you'd rather be, and you can get there.

The Sexual Revolution created a big free-for-all. Yet paradoxically, it's been slim pickings for most men. Proverbially, today's sexual marketplace follows the Pareto rule where the top 20% of men have great success, but the other 80% get the scraps (if even that). Societally, it's a tremendous recipe for unhappiness when most guys are left out in the cold.

However, for an individual man, it need not be a cause for despair. The reason why is that it actually isn't hard to get into the top fifth. Yes, it's easier than you think.

So who gets into the top 20%?

You don’t have to take it quite this far…

Although men tend to put a very high value on looks, women have a wider range of criteria. Thus, there are several advantages that can work towards a man’s favor: social proof, wealth, good looks, personality, etc. How much these are valued may be assumed to vary somewhat according to individual tastes, but these are all good attributes. There’s no clear dividing line of who is in the favored top quintile, but the results in your love life will give you a pretty good idea when you get there.

The more advantages you have, the better, and this can offset disadvantages. For example, Hugh Hefner was so rich and famous that he had more cute babes than he knew what to do with even when he was an old fossil. He had girlfriends young enough to be his granddaughters, all the way up to when it was time to stick in the embalming needles. Chairman Mao had a sea of groupies despite atrocious hygiene and untreated STDs. That’s not a pretty picture, but you get what I mean.

You don’t have to get to rock star level here—membership in the top 20% is your target. However, maximize what you have. We’ll focus on a couple of items which are attainable with time and effort.

Appearance

What not to look like

First of all, over two thirds of the American population is overweight, and it’s not too far behind in many other countries. In fact, about a third is clinically obese. Those in the normal weight range are either skinny, skinny-fat (weak and a little doughy), or muscular. Take a wild guess what’s more attractive. So if you can get some visible muscular definition—and the more the merrier—you’re going to stand out from the crowd.

The “Do looks matter?” question has long been debated. Once again, there are other avenues for success if you’re not muscular (yet). Still, check out your nearest bookstore’s romance novel aisle (also known as chick porn). Did you notice any covers where the guy has the body of a cheeseburger addict, an anorexic, or the typical hipster? I didn’t think so. Looks aren’t everything, but it’s a fact that muscularity causes sexual attraction on sight, just as a lady with curves in all the right places gets your attention. Think that could be an advantage?

Consider this a “fashion don’t” as well

How you look affects how you get treated. Recently, a cute eighteen year old flirted with me a couple of times, no mean feat for someone old enough to be her dad. She also saw me six months ago, but didn't really notice me. However, she did after I dropped thirty pounds, revealing better definition and vascularity. Other than that, who's more likely to get pepper sprayed for saying "hi"—someone who's badly out of shape. or a fit guy? All that is good reason to hit the gym and push the fork out of your face.

Other than that, do all guys dress sharp? Do all guys have good posture? Does everyone even have good hygiene? Those can be fixed pretty quickly. If you have those bases covered, you're in line ahead of those who don't.

Proper game

Never supplicate!

Mainstream dating advice hasn't caught up with the times. The 1950s game that's still conventional advice doesn't get you too far these days. In fact, the manosphere and PUA literature are the only places you'll find up-to-date information. This is one reason of many why most guys today have terrible game. Think you can do better than that? Simply by finding this site, you have access to better knowledge than most guys out there. By taking the critical step of putting it into practice, that alone can get you into the favored top fifth.

Some articles here state that most guys are too scared to make an approach. At first, I found that doubtful. I've flirted since early adolescence; back then, that was what everyone did. (I was terrible at it in the beginning, as is everyone; it really is a learned skill.) Today, social media is making people less social. Online dating isn't a good way of getting practice with personal interaction, and it's also a sausage fest. Lately I've observed that many guys are socially disconnected, and probably using porn and video games as surrogates for human interaction.

Don’t let this happen to you – it totally looks weird!

Apparently a statistically significant fraction of the population really has left the game. Some of the pawns just walked off the chessboard. It’s a sad sight, though their loss is your gain. Obviously anyone who has the guts to start a conversation is ahead of anyone who doesn’t. Much like sales, it’s a numbers game, and doing nothing gains you nothing.

However, it takes more than just opening your mouth. Women hate lame approaches. I see a lot of bad game happening out there. You can distinguish yourself by being better. Social awareness can get you pretty far—it’s not mind reading, but consider it the next best thing. Becoming good at conversation gets results too. Once again, these are learned skills; putting in the practice gets you results.

Projecting positive vibes certainly can help. I don’t mean in a New Agey kind of way; what I mean is that moods are contagious. Being fun and carefree is where it’s at. There are times when you won’t be feeling it, but try to method-act it. That gives you an advantage at the club over mopey drunks, loudmouth drunks, grouchy drunks, awkward drunks, and recently divorced after catching the wife being tag-teamed by a dozen guys in clown suits kinds of drunks.

Conclusion

On second thought, totally go for it.

The sexual marketplace imbalance, in which average women don't think average men are good enough for them, seems like a cruel cosmic joke. Unfortunately, that's what we have to work with until things settle back down to normal, which might take decades. In the meantime, it's better to be a "have" than a "have-not".

So if you put it all into action, your results should improve. All that I outlined above is straightforward and attainable. This isn't effortless, so let me qualify things. I mean this is easier than becoming a millionaire, rock star, porn magnate, or President-For-Life of some unstable developing country. Anyway, go out there and make it work for you.

Read More: 9 Steps For Anti-Social Men To Become More Outgoing

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

The High Cost Of Working 40 Hours A Week

November 14, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I recently took on a month-long project that served as a corporate job simulator, a full decade after quitting my microbiologist career. This short project was a powerful reminder how modern work is incompatible with human contentment.

During my project, I woke up every day at the relatively reasonable time of 8:30 a.m. to be at “work” at 9:00 a.m. I then had to pay attention, focus, cooperate with others, and do mentally intensive tasks. This project required five hours of solid work a day, which translates to an 8-hour a day office job that includes downtime and extended breaks.

The first side effect I experienced was having practically no thinking ability left over after work. It was extremely difficult to do my own writing—my brain simply didn’t want to cooperate. I vegetated endlessly in front of YouTube and Twitter, whereas usually I’d get bored of them relatively quickly.

Secondly, I realized that my unique male brain is not designed to pay attention for prolonged periods of time in cooperative environments. I did not want to sit down continuously for hours, wait my turn to speak, and pretend to be “nice” to others. I also saw the females present not as my intellectual equals—even if they were smart—but as fodder for sexual fantasies that gave me distracting boners. The women seemed to greatly enjoy this environment, probably because men treated them with great respect just because they were women, regardless of their intellectual contributions.

Thirdly, the work environment created so much inner tension that I strongly ached for doses of pleasure in the form of alcohol, coffee, sugar, or masturbation. I successfully quit coffee for the three months prior but now I craved it daily. I’d masturbate after lunch instead of wait until the late evening. I sought out sugar and other carb-based foods far more than usual. I also allowed excuses of fatigue to decrease my gym routine. The main ways my body wanted to relieve work tension was through actions that are likely to cause obesity, decreased muscle mass, and other forms of body degradation.

Lastly, I became more anti-social. Spending so many hours with my co-workers used up all my social fuel for the day. Afterwards, I had to stay silent and alone to recover. I didn’t want to talk to any girls, even if I was horny, and in the rare occasion I did manage to flirt, it would fall on the weekend when my tank was partially replenished. My social life was greatly harmed during a peak summer season when I should’ve been out most nights making big moves.

This experiment was disconcerting because it made me realize how fragile my energy really is. Work used up all my daily stores of focus, willpower, creativity, and extroversion, leaving almost none for my own projects and goals. I temporarily gave this project my lifeblood and in exchange I received a narrow benefit and the slothful need to lounge on the couch while snacking on munchies.

It makes complete sense to me why, after quitting my job ten years ago, I did not consider resuming it, even when my income was at poverty level. Leaving that job unlocked bountiful energy that I devoted into writing, internet projects, and basic life enjoyment. Working again would destroy that. Even if you have a job that is not physically taxing, it may be creating enough fatigue and tension that your body is demanding release through perverted leisure, alcohol, and unhealthy food, hence the typical pattern of working all week only to get wasted on the weekends.

We have to ask if we were designed to work as much as is expected by society, especially upon realizing that the 40-hour work week was a random compromise between government, trade unions, and factory owners during the Industrial Revolution that aimed to keep the slaves from being worked to death or outright revolting. When you're in your early 20's and full of energy, it's possible to work even more than 40 hours a week while also socializing and pursuing your own hobbies, but as you age, you're sure to enter the "I'm tired" zone and have to essentially dedicate your life to your job. Based on my month-long experiment, I believe men who don't love their jobs are sacrificing more than just their time for what amounts to material reasons that are not necessary for survival.

I resumed my old ways as soon as the job ended. I woke up later, started writing again, took random bike rides when the sun was out, and resumed socializing with beautiful women. Without any financial goals or people to impress, I have to work just hard enough to keep the lights on, which is certainly not 40 hours a week.

If I ever do enter dire financial straights and have to work a normal job, I already know I'll be scheming from day one to find a way out, or seek seasonal work in the form of a music band roadie or cruise ship bartender. A job is just a means to living an enjoyable life, not the end itself, but when you work a full time job, it becomes that much harder for your life to be about anything else.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: Do Not Work In A Job That Employs Women

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at

RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

GQ Magazine Declares Unemployed Football Player Colin Kaepernick “Citizen Of The Year”

November 14, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via GQ:

He’s been vilified by millions and locked out of the NFL—all because he took a knee to protest police brutality. But Colin Kaepernick’s determined stand puts him in rare company in sports history: Muhammad Ali, Jackie Robinson—athletes who risked everything to make a difference.

In 2013, Colin Kaepernick was on the cover of this magazine because he was one of the best football players in the world. In 2017, Colin Kaepernick is on GQ's cover once again—but this time it is because he isn't playing football. And it's not because he's hurt, or because he's broken any rules, or because he's not good enough. Approximately 90 men are currently employed as quarterbacks in the NFL, as either starters or reserves, and Colin Kaepernick is better—indisputably, undeniably, flat-out better—than at least 70 of them. He is still, to this day, one of the most gifted quarterbacks on earth. And yet he has been locked out of the game he loves—blackballed—because of one simple gesture: He knelt during the playing of our national anthem. And he did it for a clear reason, one that has been lost in the yearlong storm that followed. He did it to protest systemic oppression and, more specifically, as he said repeatedly at the time, police brutality toward black people.

When we began discussing this GQ cover with Colin earlier this fall, he told us the reason he wanted to participate is that he wants to reclaim the narrative of his protest, which has been hijacked by a president eager to make this moment about himself. But Colin also made it clear to us that he intended to remain silent. As his public identity has begun to shift from football star to embattled activist, he has grown wise to the power of his silence. It has helped his story go around the world. It has even provoked the ire and ill temper of Donald Trump. Why talk now, when your detractors will only twist your words and use them against you? Why speak now, when silence has done so much?

At the same time, Colin is all too aware that silence creates a vacuum, and that if it doesn't get filled somehow, someone else will fill it for him. In our many conversations with Colin about this project, we discussed the history of athletes and civil rights, and the indelible moments it called to mind, and we decided that we'd use photography—the power of imagery and iconography—to do the talking.

By the end of the 1960s, Muhammad Ali's stand against the Vietnam War—he'd marched in Harlem with the Nation of Islam after he was drafted and refused to serve—resulted in him being locked out of his sport for three years, at the peak of his talent, much as Colin is now. He continued to train throughout that period, waiting for his chance to return to boxing. He was known for jogging in the streets, and kids would chase him—the People's Champ, boosted in his darkest days by the joy of his truest fans. That's why we decided to photograph Colin in public, in Harlem, among the men, women, and children he is fighting for. To connect him to a crusade that stretches back decades. And because Colin has spent a year as a man without a team, we worked with him to assemble a new one: ten of his closest confidants—artists, activists, academics, and one legend of the civil rights movement—who shared with GQ what Colin's protest means to them, and what we all should do next.

Ava DuVernay
Filmmaker, Selma, 13th, and 2018's A Wrinkle in Time

I see what he's done as art. I believe that art is seeing the world that doesn't exist. A lot of people excel at creativity—making TV, movies, painting, writing books—but you can be an artist in your own life. Civil rights activists are artists. Athletes are artists. People who imagine something that is not there. I think some folks see his protests, his resistance, as not his work. Not intentional. Not strategic. Not as progressive action. As if this was just a moment that he got caught up in. This was work. This is work that he's doing.

The last time I saw him was the night after Trump called him out at the Alabama rally. It was a really dynamic weekend. I had dinner with him and Nessa [Kaepernick's partner]. To be able to sit with that brother on this particular day—on the day between two historic cultural moments that swirled around him—was shape-shifting for me. Being able to observe that and witness his stillness and wisdom—I'm just really honored to know him. He's sitting there and I'm sitting there and I'm like, "Look at this brother—he's doing better than any of us would've done." A lot better. With a lot more elegance.

Carmen Perez
Activist, executive director of The Gathering for Justice, which addresses mass incarceration and child incarceration

What I always tell people is, I could teach you about the law, I could teach you about the criminal-justice system—but I can't teach you how to have heart. We don't need a movement full of experts. We need people who care deeply to stand up and offer what they have, because there's a role for everyone. You make music? Make some for the movement. You cook? Organizers need to be fed. You teach self-defense or yoga? Help people heal. You're an athlete? Use your platform to raise awareness. It's not about everyone trying to become the next Martin Luther King Jr., because he had clergymen and journalists and artists like Harry Belafonte. It's about how we connect to our neighbor and offer our skill set. As Mr. Belafonte has said: Don't pay me back—pay it back to the cause.

I want people to understand that even if incarceration doesn't personally impact you, or police brutality doesn't personally impact you, you can still be involved. How can we show these mothers who are suffering that we love them and we care about them? I often ask: Can we see our liberation bound to one another's? I'm a proud Mexican-American and Chicana who deeply believes that black lives matter and that once black people are free, then my people will be free.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: How American Football Became A Racket

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

You Can’t Succeed In Night Game Without Blasting Through Rejection

November 15, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

There is huge value in pushing through rejection and other obstacles in night game. In fact, it is probably the only way you will get night game to work for you in 2017. You have to be prepared to roll with the punches and take the blows if you hope to be taking another sort of blow at the end of the night.

I’m not saying that game is just about numbers. There are definitely skills and techniques to be learned that will help you to be more effective each time you do an approach. These include the judicious use of cocky-funny humour, leading, being assertive, passing shit tests and so on.

Nevertheless, the reality of today’s market, particularly in nightclubs, means that you will need to be prepared to go through a lot of chaff before you discover the wheat. In this context, the core traits you need to develop to really ace your game are those of resilience and perseverance. And these should be served up with a huge helping of not-giving-a-fuck.

Ten Approaches

This became clear to me last Saturday when I went to a club in London. I really wasn't it the mood. I'm not a huge fan of clubs these days anyway, plus I'd had a difficult week. However, I'd already bought a ticket and my friend gave me a pep talk so I went.

Once I got to the venue I still wasn't it the mood. I was tired and irritable. I didn't want to be there. I didn't want to deal with the bullshit and the cockblocks. I wanted to go home and mope.

Then I made a deal with myself. 'Troy,' I said. 'Do ten approaches. That's it. Just ten approaches. It doesn't matter how bad they are. Then you can relax and go home if you like.'

So I began. Ten approaches in a packed nightclub is not hard to achieve. Actually it's pretty damn easy. Everywhere you turn there's another girl. All you have to do is say hi.

In order for each one to count as an approach, though, I vowed to myself that I would have to at least make an effort to have a meaningful conversation. That meant that if I just said hi and she walked off or something it wouldn't count.

To make things easier for myself, I decided to ditch any sort of fancy 'game' and go in with a simple compliment: 'Hi, I couldn't help noticing you're really pretty. I'm Troy.'

Sod it. It really doesn't matter too much what you say, as long as you open and say something.

So I wandered around the club delivering my line. The first few times I was faced with stonewall rejections. But as I warmed up, so did the interactions. Even if I didn't get anywhere at first, the girls became more friendly and receptive. (Funny that you may think that girls in the club are bitchy, but check your own attitude first. What you give out in many cases tends to be what you get back.)

About the fifth set I got talking to a still-sexy MILF in her thirties who was sitting sipping champagne. Again, nothing really came of it, but I was on fire. Outrageously flirtatious lines were coming to mind and out of my mouth with startling regularity. Suddenly, despite my mood, I was in the zone. I was gaining traction, both with my environment and with the girls.

I'd spotted Sarah earlier on in the evening, a pretty, leggy blonde PR girl with large breasts. Without thinking, I stood before her now and told her she was pretty. I was fired up from all my previous approaches, fully in state.

'Why, thank you,' she said, all mock-giggles and faux-ladylike affectation.

A moment later and we were making out. Twenty minutes or so after that she had her hands all over my cock in a dark area of the club. An hour later and we were in a taxi heading back to her apartment.

Sarah was something like my fifteenth approach of the evening. I'd got into the mood after the ten I'd originally planned, and so I decided to carry on.

While all the others weren't disastrous blowouts, it's fair to say that I didn't get any earth-shattering responses before Sarah.

So what if I'd have given up at approach 14? I'd have gone home cursing the night as a washout, and probably vowing never to go clubbing again. But because I chose to continue, not to give up, that fifteenth approach worked out well, and we had an enjoyable evening together. And it made all the other other approaches I'd attempted fade into insignificance.

The thing with game, as with so many other aspects of life, is that you really only need a few wins. You don't have to score every time. You just need to score enough times to have an amazing life. And that is entirely possible for anyone, as long as they have the nerve and the fortitude to keep going even when times are tough.

Want to find out how jerks and badboys get the hottest girls? Read Troy's latest book How To Be An Asshole

Read More: How Most Relationships End

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Girl Who Became Famous For Showing Off Her Fake Boobs Complains About Sexism In Sports

November 15, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Tallahassee Democrat:

It's been a few years since Jenn Sterger set foot on Florida State's campus.

She made a name — an "internet persona," she calls it — as an "FSU Cowgirl," making her first appearance on national television during FSU's 2005 game against Miami.

Magazines like Maxim and Playboy wanted her to grace their pages, but once the photo shoots were done, she wanted a career in sports media.

That’s when the challenges started. And she wants to help young journalists avoid the roadblocks and tribulations she’s faced as a woman in media.

Sterger faced controversy in 2010 when superstar NFL quarterback Brett Farve allegedly sent her explicit photos while she was New York Jets’ “Gameday Host.” She also recently ripped ESPN on Twitter for a job interview conducted by the company she says ended in a strip club.

> Since we are being honest, I will say this: I HATE how Barstool Sports treats women. But the other side is JUST as bad. pic.twitter.com/i8kSoyA98A
>
> — Jenn Sterger (@jenniferstergerr) October 24, 2017

“For eight years it felt like I didn’t have a voice,” she said.

Sterger’s voice will be heard again around the nation soon enough. Next Saturday, she starts with NBC Sports.

“I’m so pumped because I was never sure whether or not I was going to work in sports again” she said. “I’ve been given little jobs here and there, but I’ve never had a channel back me. It was little online things here and there. I just never felt like I regained the momentum I lost 10 years ago. ”

She said it felt good to be home in Tallahassee, speaking to a class of about 40 students in a talk called “Changing Channels: The Raw Truth About Sports Media” at FSU’s Health and Wellness Center.

“I’ve spoken at other colleges before, but it just felt so good coming home,” she said.

“You know, this place was where everything got started. It kind of closed everything for me. Being able to come back here and tell the whole story, it’s very empowering.”

Sterger, 33, spoke for about 90 minutes about her time in sports media — and the trials she’s faced as a woman — and took questions from the class.

She said she wanted to make sure the class left knowing they’re part of the changing landscape of journalism.

“They’re going to be a part of the next wave of sports media,” she said.

“Of media in general. There’s a big change that’s coming right now, with all of the Weinstein scandals and stuff that’s breaking. I think people who have abused their power are now being exposed. I think it’s showing young people they don’t have to be treated a certain way in order to get ahead in life.”

She was candid in the way she spoke to students, not holding back in her criticisms and answering tough questions with sincerity.

She also gave her fair share of deadpan jokes.

“I love being able to help others and give back,” she said. “This university gave me so much. I have such fond memories here. The camaraderie and the family I built here at Florida State, I don’t want to say I peaked in college, but I had the college experience of a rock star.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: Porn Star Bree Olson Complains That People Think She’s A Slut

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

6 Behaviors That Are Immoral

November 15, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

ROK and associated writers have taken quite deep interest in morals and proper behavior, and linked the discussions to Greco-Roman virtue ethics, Christianity, science, and common sense. Roosh has rightly pointed out the the danger of hedonic adaption and earlier also suggested a middle path which avoids so-called 'ego sex'.

I myself have looked into Apollonian culture, simply meaning an ordered and virtuous way of life, and suggested a model of roughly 90% Apollonian and 10% Dionysian (hedonism) elements in our lives.

However, that does not answer the question which actions and behaviors that are acceptable or not. Hence I will look into that, with them aim to provide some proper guidelines.

Although Christianity provides many answers for how to live a moral life and build a society centered on spirituality, social order, binary sex roles, and monogamy, it nevertheless lacks some fundamental elements. For instance, much of the New Testament and the Pauline epistles are partly irrelevant for today's Western societies. Paul was but a man and his concerns were directed towards new adherents in the Mediterranean region and Asia Minor.

Moreover, many of the contents of the Bible are compiled of texts by several authors. In the process of translation, new interpretations emerge. Thus there is not a single essential message in the Bible but rather certain tendencies of faith and morals which signify the two testaments. Hence I am hesitant to, despite all its wisdom, let my life solely be guided by such multifarious sets of ideas. Especially since much is not relevant for today.

An additional perspective, that will provide a broader “law of conduct”, are if your actions are hurting yourself and/or other people. I will give some examples of actions which appear to do that.

1. Sexual deviances

Sexual deviances can hurt the individual who commit them, and the victims of such actions. Here the saying of lesser evils can give context to that kind of behavior.

Although sodomy is always bad and wrong, it is even worse if it includes pedophilia and bestiality. Even though animals have a lower generic value than humans, both from a legal and moral standpoint, it is a disgusting behavior that should be avoided at all costs.

2. Ego and casual sex

Heterosexual ego sex is bad only if it may hurt the individual and the people which are affected by such actions; the action as an isolated example is neutral, though.

If, however, ego sex leads to a broader degeneracy, which affects individual emotions, private economy, and human relations, it is wrong. Ego sex is thus relative.

3. Breaking the law

Laws often reflect certain cultural, political, and social tendencies, rather than being purely the result of objective and “independent” legislative decisions. Therefore one must always be aware of that they do not always conform to common sense, sound science, or near-universal and timeless wisdoms found in scriptures.

Yet, overall, to break the law means you do you and the people around you more harm than good. Hence you should abide by it, although some minor deviances are acceptable.

4. Manupulating others

Whether or not it is acceptable to manipulate other people is tricky, since you have every right to try to persuade others and protect your own interests. However, to lie and deceive – especially for a bad purpose – is negative and may likely hurt others. It will likely also corrupt the individual and lead to a downward spiral of moral decay.

Approach with caution, but be open for to use it to safeguard yourself and those around you. Often the situation, rather than the rule, decides which way to go.

5. Narcotics and drunkedness

Already in Renaissance thinking, such as Lorenzo Valla's work On Pleasure, there were attempts made to incorporate Epicurean ideas into Christanity and humanism. In current times it can imply to drink alcohol from time to time and even be a bit drunken.

Although alcoholic intake is relative, to be drunk is often associated with a set of bad behaviors, such as aggression, verbal conflicts, unwise risk-taking, and negative impact on brain and general health. Taken morals into account, it is wise to drink selectively and never become intoxicated.

As for narcotics they are often, but not always, even more detrimental but something like temporary use of sleeping pills will likely not hurt you or someone else.

6. Hurting animals

It appears as if most masculine men are anthropecentric, meaning that they regard human beings as more valuable than other life forms, including animals. This largely conforms to both Christianity and modern ethical models like utilitarianism.

As Immanuel Kant rightly emphasized, to hurt animals may lead to that you hurt yourself and other. Moreover, many animals do not deserve do be treated badly for no other reason than being potential food sources or attacking you under very particular circumstances. Pets may also be valuable for masculine men, although not as significant as for a cat lady. Thus animals should only be hurt in the process of killing them for food.

Conclusion

I think it is important to discuss general guidelines and have a more nuanced and balanced understanding of moral behaviors in our everyday lives. The wisdom found in Christianity, and partially in other traditions, combined with the hurting yourself or others perspective will be useful when you make proper decisions.

If you want to read more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: The Ethical Principles Of Neomasculinity

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

How High Will Men Jump To Get Married?

November 16, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

For many years, I've been bombarded with advertisements, articles, and general advice from the mainstream media about how to properly propose to a woman.

From the cut of the diamond, to how to craft the perfect proposal, and how to capture it all across every social media platform possible, the mainstream media has made sure I am prepared on any and all levels to make my soon to be bride as happy as can be. And if I don't do all of these exactly right, you can be sure that I am not worthy of her love.

I expect the mainstream to tell me this, and I expect there not to be an escape from it, either. From my mother to the annoying commercials ("Every Kiss Begins with Kay") shown during sporting events, I know that the world wants me to man up, marry, and carry out my duties. It's easy enough to just look the other way.

Except now, as I've crossed the threshold into being closer to 30 than 20, I'm finding there is no escape from it in my personal life, either. Yes, that is "the thing" to do when you are about this age. Get married and settle down. And while I recognize this is a "coming of age" kind of deal, I also find it absolutely cringe-worthy, and somewhat terrifying at the lengths men are willing to go to get down on their knee and ~~beg~~ ask for marriage. Take, for example, all of the engagement photos that are littered all over my Facebook page. There are thousands. Per album.

Or, worse—the one old acquaintance from college who decided to start a blog. One of his first posts is about how to buy the right engagement ring for your girl. It was so cringe-worthy that I dedicated an entire podcast to poking fun at it.

The Biggest Shit Test of All-Time

The phrase “shit test” has been around for many years now, used as a broad-level term to simply define how a woman tests how high you will jump. From the opening minutes when she asks what you do, all the way to getting down on one knee to propose—women are constantly testing how a man reacts and how this fits into her longer-term plan.

There is nothing you can do about this, except to expect it. Woman have confounded the latest generations of men for many years. They choose to accept it and simply say, “I don’t get women.” My way of thinking on this is different. I don’t claim to understand them all the time, but I do expect them to be women in their actions… all of the time.

Yes, this means I expect them to test constantly. I expect them to overstep their boundaries, and that I’ll have to enforce them. And finally, it means I expect them to swing occasionally with their moods and whims, and that I simply must not be blown by their winds. It’s the only way to retain sanity.

The problem with these tests is that they become more and more full of consequences over time. While the first date tests cost you nothing, the later tests (such as the proposal) have far more consequences if you get them “wrong”. It’s the equivalent to the teacher giving a pop test that has little bearing on your grades versus failing the bar and having your life plan of being a lawyer set off course.

How High?

Truthfully, this old acquaintance's story on his blog just made me cringe. This was a guy who always had game. He always had cute girls around him. He's quite successful. And here he was, giving advice about the cuts of diamonds, how much to save each month to afford a $10,000 ring, and how to size the ring correctly so that—heaven forbid—when you propose, it slides on smoothly to ensure your photos and video moments aren't ruined. Simply put, he bought into the crap. Now he just has to hope it doesn't blow up in his face.

But here was a guy who didn't cater to every girl's whim in college, at least from what I saw. And yet, judging by his photos, and that post—he was willing to jump pretty high for his girl, because he was told to jump.

The thing is, this moment—if you deem a girl worthy of it—should be a test for HER. Expect the question should not be how high you can jump, but how low she will go—because she should love you. And a lifelong commitment should be based around said love, not how flashy a fleeting moment is.

Is she okay with a low-level ring that signifies smart financial decisions as you move forward together? Is she cool with the setting being quiet and calm, or does she insist on being in an elaborate, exotic local? Is she okay with it not being plastered on every social media channel? Is she okay choosing to keep the moment intimate between the two of you, devoid of cameras?

I don't know if someday I'll go through with an engagement, but I do know this: If I do, it'll be final test for her, not me.

To learn how to date multiple girls at the same time, get your copy of my book—King's Code.

Read More: Girls Will Think You're A Coward If You Don't Make A Move

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

If You Have A Heart Attack During Sex, You're As Good As Dead

November 16, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Daily Mail:

Fewer than one in five men who suffer a cardiac arrest during sex survive, according to new research.

This is because their partner does not know how to perform a simple, life saving technique, say scientists.

It underlines the importance of teaching CPR (cardiopulmonary resuscitation) to the general population, they warned.

Sex is known to trigger a sudden cardiac arrest and this causes the heart to suddenly stop beating. It usually occurs without warning.

The 13-year study of more than 4,500 sudden cardiac arrests (SCAs) in Portland, Oregon, found only a third of cases that occurred during intercourse received 'bystander CPR'.

It was determined this accounted for the less than 20 per cent of patients who survived to hospital discharge.

Senior study author Dr Sumeet Chugh, associate director of the Cedars-Sinai Heart Institute, Los Angeles, said: ‘Even though SCA during sexual activity was witnessed by a partner, bystander CPR was performed in only one third of the cases.

‘These findings highlight the importance of continued efforts to educate the public on the importance of bystander CPR for SCA, irrespective of the circumstance.’

Doubles chance of survival

The British Heart Foundation says about 10,000 people die in the UK each year because bystanders do not know how to do CPR if they see someone having a cardiac arrest.

CPR involves giving regular chest compressions to make the heart pump blood around the body. It has been found to double the chance of survival.

Dr Chugh and colleagues showed although the overall risk of having a cardiac arrest during sex is low, death rates are high.

Only a small percentage of cases are related to sexual activity, but survival remains low.

The study published in the Journal of the American College of Cardiology said this was despite a partner being present.

Sex triggers heart attacks

It results in around 350,000 deaths annually in the US, and about 100,000 in the UK. It is known sex may trigger cardiac arrests.

So the researchers looked at the community-based Oregon Sudden Unexpected Death Study (Oregon SUDS) database from 2002 to 2015 to discover their frequency during or within an hour after sex among over 18s.

All reported cases were based on emergency medical service reports containing detailed information regarding their cause.

In total, the researchers identified 4,557 during the study period, of which 34 (0.7%) were linked to sexual activity.

On average these patients were more likely to be male, middle aged, African-American and have a history of cardiovascular disease, with a majority taking medication for it.

Overall, the researchers said they found a relatively low burden of cardiac arrest in relation to sex.

Most cases were men with a previous history of cardiovascular disease. The researchers also noted some cases after sex may also involve medications, stimulants and alcohol use.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: 5 Men's Health Supplements That Actually Work

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

4 Most Overrated Fiction Books In Modern American Literature

November 16, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Literature was once serious art, but things just aren't what they used to be. Part of that is because of the tastes of today's readers, but the moribund literary establishment is at greater fault. It's been on a downward trajectory for decades. The Big Six mainstream media mega-conglomerates own the dwindling number of major publishing houses. The New York literary establishment has promoted some turkeys in the past (two of which are described below), but most of yesterday's acclaimed literature wouldn't stand a chance of getting on a bookstore shelf now.

Aspiring writers typically grit their teeth when they see horrid literature selling like hotcakes. (I'm guilty as charged too. However, I have fun with it and write parodies.) Any newcomers hoping to break into the scene basically have a snowball's chance in hell. However, with the right gimmick and incredible luck, even a talent-challenged hack can win the literary lottery.

Twilight

Faaaabulous!

Eastern Europe is famous for innovations in literary horror: vampires, werewolves, Baba Yaga, and so forth. Perhaps that's because everyone got snowed in during long winters and passed the time telling ghost stories. Be that as it may, a Mormon lady from Connecticut outdid them all. Stephanie Meyer's twist involves sparkly vampires. Epic!

Anyway, Bella is a seventeen year old high school student. Edward is 104, but doesn't look like it, so the May-December relationship doesn't seem so weird. Some people think immortality would be super awesome, but he considers his undead life pretty damn dreary. Either it's sort of a Byronic shtick, or it's because he's too close to Seattle and Portland.

Anyway, what's he still doing in high school? Four years of that was barely tolerable for me. No wonder he's such a big mope! Doesn't taking algebra repeatedly get boring? After enough of that, he might as well get an education degree, start teaching the damn class, and get a salary for it. Maybe that would give his dreary life some purpose.

By all means, buy a copy if you suffer from insomnia.

tl;dr:

> Oh Edward!
>
> Oh Bella!

Catcher In the Rye

At least Mark David Chapman didn't think it was overrated.

It's quite a bestseller, with tens of millions of copies sold and still going strong. It has great appeal for those considering themselves misunderstood. That includes the guy who whacked John Lennon, the nut-job who shot Ronald Reagan, and several other screwball shooters. I've read it, though didn't get the urge to pop a cap in a celebrity.

This one is the gripping adventure of a teenager going through a midlife crisis. The wangsty punk tells the story from a psych ward, droning on sophomorically like some burnt-out pothead. The poor rich kid's tale begins with flunking out of prep school for the third time. Then the potty-mouthed protagonist goes to the Big Apple where he blows most of his remaining cash, dreams up half-baked ideas about what to do with his life, and frequently makes an ass of himself. He resents all the popular students, resents his family (except his little sister), and resents pretty much everyone else.

Exciting, isn't it?

tl;dr:

> Everyone's a big phony! Waaaah!

A People's History Of The United States

This terrifying dystopian fiction is an alternate history in which Americans are imperialist running dogs, and Socialists (including Communists) are the good guys. This is unsurprising, given Howard Zinn's radicalinski past. It's sold over two million copies, many of which were strangely passed off as an actual history textbook to high school and college students.

The rampant bias starts right in the beginning. It opens centuries before the USA's independence, describing the governorship of Christopher Columbus. Apparently Zinn took the biased account of Francisco de Bobadilla at face value—whose purpose was to take his job as governor and nullify his 10% of colonial revenue. It could be worse; I've had a professor actually tell me that Columbus sent salted Mayan children in barrels back to Spain for dog food.

The early USA had very little going on other than slavery, mistreating the Indians, and oppressing the poor, according to Zinn's Communist "dialectical materialism" approach to historiography. He calls America's peculiar institution "the most cruel form of slavery in history". Although it's wrong in any form, Zinn apparently was oblivious of Middle Eastern slavery, which continued long after abolition in the USA and the rest of the Western world. The reason why the Middle East doesn't have a race problem is because African men were routinely castrated. Most slaves in Latin America got worked to death. What was this about unprecedented cruelty again?

It does talk about history a lot, but doesn't provide a coherent narrative. For example, the coverage of the Civil War is pretty sketchy. If you want to read about Bull Run, Gettysburg, Shiloh Hill, etc., then you'll have to consult a real history book. As for how it started:

> Lincoln initiated hostilities by trying to repossess the federal base at Fort Sumter,

> South Carolina.

This is one of many whoppers peppering his tall tale. As any kid who stayed awake during history class should know (unless Zinn's book was assigned reading), the Confederates initiated hostilities by attacking Union troops in Fort Sumter. A real history book would explain this, as well as describe the nervous tension leading up to that, but Zinn didn't do very basic research.

These errors and omissions are quite frequent. For another example, he suggests that the Rosenbergs and other atomic spies were railroaded on flimsy evidence. Actually, their guilt is candidly acknowledged even by Soviet insiders. All told, Zinn's fiction raises some valid criticisms, but is far too biased to take seriously.

tl;dr:

> America sucks. Power to The People!

Portnoy's Complaint

This one is billed as a consummate Great American Novel. It begins with the narrator on his psychiatrist's couch, talking about his childhood full of Freudian TMI moments. Then in his adolescence, Portnoy becomes the Maestro of Manustupration: for example, taking a break from supper to whack off in the bathroom while his mother demands to inspect his bowel movement, screwing a cored-out apple, and even a piece of liver. Maybe this is supposed to be funny, but I needed a gallon of brain bleach after all that.

As an adult, he becomes a well-paid bureaucrat in some social justice agency. He goes through girlfriends like toilet paper. His personal life makes Anthony the Weiner seem like an amateur. Portnoy would even pump and dump a pencil sharpener. Much of his wangsting is about his love/hate relationship with the Jewish community, and his hate/envy relationship with the Gentiles. It’s a grim insight into the psychology of this tragic and destructive dynamic.

The funniest part of the book is when the wanker goes to Israel and finally finds a Jewish girl at last. This could relieve the conflict in his tortured soul. However, he badly bungles a seduction attempt. Then she gives him a very well-deserved ass-kicking after he tries to rape her. The only other funny moment of this hundred page bellyaching was the shrink’s one line at the end:

> So [said the doctor]. Now vee may perhaps to begin Yes?

As for the scariest part, that’s the book’s critical acclaim. Mark Twain’s The Adventures of Tom Sawyer was a classic because readers could identify with the character and his youthful misadventures. It speaks volumes about the reviewers who read Portnoy’s Complaint and thought, “Hey, I totally can relate to this guy!” The literary establishment is, well, a big circle-jerk.

tl;dr:

> Nofap? No way!

Read More: How New York Killed Male Literature

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Senator Al Franken Accused Of Kissing And Groping Playboy Model Without Consent

November 16, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via KABC:

In December of 2006, I embarked on my ninth USO Tour to entertain our troops, my eighth to the Middle East since the 9/11 attacks. My father served in Vietnam and my then-boyfriend (and now husband, Chris) is a pilot in the Air Force, so bringing a 'little piece of home' to service members stationed far away from their families was both my passion and my privilege.

Picture of accuser, Leann Tweeden

Also on the trip were country music artists Darryl Worley, Mark Wills, Keni Thomas, and some cheerleaders from the Dallas Cowboys. The headliner was comedian and now-senator, Al Franken.

Franken had written some skits for the show and brought props and costumes to go along with them. Like many USO shows before and since, the skits were full of sexual innuendo geared toward a young, male audience.

As a TV host and sports broadcaster, as well as a model familiar to the audience from the covers of FHM, Maxim and Playboy, I was only expecting to emcee and introduce the acts, but Franken said he had written a part for me that he thought would be funny, and I agreed to play along.

When I saw the script, Franken had written a moment when his character comes at me for a 'kiss'. I suspected what he was after, but I figured I could turn my head at the last minute, or put my hand over his mouth, to get more laughs from the crowd.

On the day of the show Franken and I were alone backstage going over our lines one last time. He said to me, "We need to rehearse the kiss." I laughed and ignored him. Then he said it again. I said something like, 'Relax Al, this isn't SNL…we don't need to rehearse the kiss.'

He continued to insist, and I was beginning to get uncomfortable.

He repeated that actors really need to rehearse everything and that we must practice the kiss. I said 'OK' so he would stop badgering me. We did the line leading up to the kiss and then he came at me, put his hand on the back of my head, mashed his lips against mine and aggressively stuck his tongue in my mouth.
I immediately pushed him away with both of my hands against his chest and told him if he ever did that to me again I wouldn’t be so nice about it the next time.

I walked away. All I could think about was getting to a bathroom as fast as possible to rinse the taste of him out of my mouth.

I felt disgusted and violated.

Not long after, I performed the skit as written, carefully turning my head so he couldn’t kiss me on the lips.

No one saw what happened backstage. I didn’t tell the Sergeant Major of the Army, who was the sponsor of the tour. I didn’t tell our USO rep what happened.

At the time I didn’t want to cause trouble. We were in the middle of a war zone, it was the first show of our Holiday tour, I was a professional, and I could take care of myself. I told a few of the others on the tour what Franken had done and they knew how I felt about it.

I tried to let it go, but I was angry.

Other than our dialogue on stage, I never had a voluntary conversation with Al Franken again. I avoided him as much as possible and made sure I was never alone with him again for the rest of the tour.

Franken repaid me with petty insults, including drawing devil horns on at least one of the headshots I was autographing for the troops.

But he didn’t stop there.

The tour wrapped and on Christmas Eve we began the 36-hour trip home to L.A. After 2 weeks of grueling travel and performing I was exhausted. When our C-17 cargo plane took off from Afghanistan I immediately fell asleep, even though I was still wearing my flak vest and Kevlar helmet.

It wasn’t until I was back in the US and looking through the CD of photos we were given by the photographer that I saw this one:

I couldn’t believe it. He groped me, without my consent, while I was asleep.

I felt violated all over again. Embarrassed. Belittled. Humiliated.

How dare anyone grab my breasts like this and think it’s funny?

I told my husband everything that happened and showed him the picture.

I wanted to shout my story to the world with a megaphone to anyone who would listen, but even as angry as I was, I was worried about the potential backlash and damage going public might have on my career as a broadcaster.

But that was then, this is now. I’m no longer afraid.

Today, I am the news anchor on McIntyre in the Morning on KABC Radio in Los Angeles. My colleagues are some of the most supportive people I’ve ever worked with in my career. Like everyone in the media, we’ve been reporting on the Harvey Weinstein sexual misconduct allegations since they broke, and the flood of similar stories that have come out about others.

A few weeks ago, we had California Congresswoman Jackie Speier on the show and she told us her story of being sexually assaulted when she was a young Congressional aide. She described how a powerful man in the office where she worked ‘held her face, kissed her and stuck his tongue in her mouth.’

At that moment, I thought to myself, Al Franken did that exact same thing to me.

I had locked up those memories of helplessness and violation for a long time, but they all came rushing back to me and my hands clinched into fists like it was yesterday.

I'm still angry at what Al Franken did to me.

Every time I hear his voice or see his face, I am angry. I am angry that I did his stupid skit for the rest of that tour. I am angry that I didn't call him out in front of everyone when I had the microphone in my hand every night after that. I wanted to. But I didn't want to rock the boat. I was there to entertain the troops and make sure they forgot about where they were for a few hours. Someday, I thought to myself, I would tell my story.

That day is now.

Senator Franken, you wrote the script. But there's nothing funny about sexual assault.

You wrote the scene that would include you kissing me and then relentlessly badgered me into 'rehearsing' the kiss with you backstage when we were alone.

You knew exactly what you were doing. You forcibly kissed me without my consent, grabbed my breasts while I was sleeping and had someone take a photo of you doing it, knowing I would see it later, and be ashamed.

While debating whether or not to go public, I even thought to myself, so much worse has happened to so many others, maybe my story isn't worth telling? But my story is worth telling.

Not just because 2017 is not 2006, or because I am much more secure in my career now than I was then, and not because I'm still angry.

I'm telling my story because there may be others.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: Charlie Sheen Accused Of Having Sex With Then 13-Year-Old Corey Haim On Set Of Movie Lucas

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Poland’s 60,000-Strong Nationalist March Gives Hope To Europe

November 17, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The nationalism of Poles was on full display in Warsaw on Saturday, November 11 when 60,000 marched to commemorate Poland’s Independence Day. Many of those called for an end to the European migrant crisis. It was nearly a hundred years ago, following the armistice that ended the First World War, the country emerged from long-term Austrian, German, and Russian rule.

The Polish mass demonstration is a victory for many reasons, not least for the relative silence it created in Poland’s atrocious leftists. In the eyes of most foreigners, the center of Polish leftism is Warsaw or Poznan (ROK proprietor Roosh would say Warsaw, whereas I would say Poznan). Whatever the case, the Polish SJWs counter-protesting the main march comprised a mere few thousand and were relegated to mostly watching events unfold in one of their traditional bastions.

With Germany plummeting to its post-World War II nadir and steadily killing itself, Poland’s political situation is much more promising. Not even the usual Western accusations of “neo-Nazism” dissuaded the incumbent government from describing the Polish nationalist march as a success. A few more eccentric marchers were cherry-picked and paraded as being reflective of the whole group, despite the obvious problems with calling Poles, whom Hitler and the Third Reich loathed, “Nazis.”

This was the real story:

Normal, decent Poles were simply interested in the preservation of their country, culture, Roman Catholicism, and, more broadly, a healthy and self-respecting Europe.

Maintain your frame and the rest follows

For a European conservative, Polish President Andrzej Duda is actually conservative.

The impressive display of Polish patriotism did not come from nowhere. As a former member of the communist bloc, Poland is a net recipient of European Union funds. Nevertheless, this has not stopped the country from regularly protecting its interests and opposing Western-style “progress.” Notwithstanding recent protests in favor of abortion, the country is decidedly against this practice and gay marriage. In addition, the Law and Justice Party-led government has consistently stuck up its proverbial middle finger when called upon to take in non-European "refugees."

Inasmuch as I detest Civic Platform, the main Polish "leftist" party, its policies are far less moronic than its equivalents in Western Europe. Poland is a good example of a once economically feeble society that has still managed to preserve its core cultural base. Instead of purely whoring itself out for Western funds, the Polish state has been relatively resistant. This state of affairs is under marginal threat at the moment, but developments are far from deleterious in 2017.

What to do if you are a Pole, Hungarian or Westerner in Eastern Europe

It's not just Poland: Hungary is another superb illustration of a healthy and nationalistic society, as are large elements of the Czech Republic and Slovakia.

These are great times to be either a nationalist-minded Eastern European or a foreigner living in Eastern Europe. Although there are some appalling trends afflicting segments of the Polish and general Eastern European populations, especially amongst women, a widespread refusal to accept mass migration remains an extremely positive aspect of living here.

In light of Eastern Europe's basic self-respect, both locals and foreigners should capitalize on the regional political situation. Now is the time, regardless of where you come from, to forge connections with Eastern European nationalists in areas where you live. For me, this experience has been liberating, as I was so used to the restrictive, politically correct atmosphere back home in Australia. The friendships you can create in this environment are beyond description, particularly for those of us who attended overly leftwing universities and grew up in socially liberal Western communities.

New fights are coming and we should all take heart from Poland's encouraging display of national pride and opposition to globalism.

Read More: The Best Time To Visit Europe If You Have Strong Romantic Intent

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

British Woman Abandons Her Husband And 9 Children For African Lover

November 17, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Daily Mail:

A mother-of-nine who ditched her children and partner of 23 years for a new life with her African toyboy has been slammed as ‘nasty’ and ‘delusional’.

Heidi Hepworth, 44, from East Boldon in South Tyneside, left husband Andy, also 44, for 30-year-old Mamadou Jallow from Gambia after she started talking to strangers online.

After getting tattoos, booking sunbeds and giving herself a makeover, she flew to Gambia last month – her first ever trip out of the UK.

Heidi has been criticised for her actions on Facebook, with many accusing her of being a bad mother.

One poster wrote: ‘You really are crazy leaving your family for fantasy island.

‘That’s exactly what it’s like. Nothing is real. But your children are. So sad.’

Another said: ‘Whatever you are going through has made you delusional.

‘It’s like a female mid life crisis, but you’ll end up like all the other women who have done the same, taken for a ride, humiliated, used and dumped. ‘

One poster fumed: ‘Oh my god, I can’t believe what I have just read. What kind of person would abandon all her children?

‘I feel sick for them, poor little things having you do this to them. They will be damaged for life.

‘Well done, hope you are happy with yourself.

Another woman said: ‘I understand it is your life… but leaving your babies?’

One woman said: ‘Your poor husband and kids! Fancy leaving them! You ain’t [sic] nothing special and no doubt he’ll be after a passport! Good luck when it all goes t up.’

One man wrote: ‘Leaving her husband, I have no issue with. But leaving nine kids? She deserves to be happy of course, but can’t the kids be considered. Best of luck to her and the kids.

One poster said: ‘You are mental… have you not read all the stories. See sense please lady. For you and your kids sake.’

Devastated Andy told The Sun: ‘The person she has become is horrible. She was a loving, caring mum. Now it’s like an alien has possessed her body.

‘He has brainwashed her. It’s one big fantasy for her and she is following it through step by step.’

The couple have six children together and Andy has raised three children Heidi had from a previous marriage as his own.

They were left in the North East while their mother started life with her new partner.

She told the paper her new squeeze was not after her to get a British passport, and insisted he was a nice man.

Heidi said: ‘I’ve met a young gentleman but it’s not an affair. The marriage had problems. We drifted apart. Can a woman not have a new relationship?’

Andy and his wife had been together 18 years when they eventually decided to tie the knot five years ago.

Now, the Navy veteran is convinced their marriage is over having noticed a change in Heidi in March after ‘Asian and African men’ started adding her on social media sites.

‘She was wearing more make up and dresses which she’d never done before. It just wasn’t her,’ he told The Sun.

‘She was going out all the time with friends and was always on her phone.

‘A caring mum wouldn’t go off gallivanting around Africa with her new boyfriend.’

Heidi said she saw her future with Mamadou and her children, despite being almost 3,000 miles away from them.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: Cheating American Woman Living Eat Pray Love Lifestyle Murdered By Her African Lover

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

7 Trends That Will Shape Your Future

November 17, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

If you are into futurology, you must have already noticed the existence of not one but two futurologies out there. One of them is the mainstream one. It is a mixture of libertarianism and technophilia, loaded with self-claimed futurists babbling on emergence, “holacracy” and other fancy words. Some of them may be a bit wary of fusing humans with technology, but almost every adherent thinks of globalism, identities erasure, and degeneracy as inevitable. Official futurology is mostly a reflection of the mainstream. “Futurists” do their best to either accommodate or ignore inconvenient parts of reality.

The other futurology belongs to the dissenters. It is more pessimistic and, frankly, more realistic. It foresees violent persecutions, financial crisis, engineered poverty, a slippery slope of degeneracy, and the collapse of the cities. Those into dissenting futurology tend to secede from the System, either inwardly or by actively preparing for what will happen. Of course, dissenters’ futurology is way more interesting, as it is devoid of the reality denial and hypocrisy of the first kind. I know at least several self-appointed futurologists who overtly blame us while preparing themselves a nice hideaway on the countryside.

The Deep State could starve millions of people if it decided to cut supply routes. It has already launched or at the very least coveted mass violence outbreaks from SJW, BLM, and other illegals. As time passes, it becomes clear how unbalanced the present situation is. Things will get worse. It doesn’t matter how exactly they will turn so. What matters is that you get prepared.

1. Decay

Abandoned places may be sexy but social decay is not

The left stuffed our heads with a mythology of providential overnight transformations. These dreams come straight from Marxism: when your life is mediocre and you are waiting for everyone else to be in tune with your particular desire, you start hoping for a grand soir that will change the life conditions of everyone around.

Consider decay the opposite of this. No, things won't change overnight. Trends prevail over mere Black Swans. Consider how Trump failed to drain the swamp—and how he succeeded to the extent he rode various trends, from honest Americans being massively screwed to the smug liberals' prejudices. Decay is long, painful, lacking in truly time-changing events but rich in small alterations. Decay is ominous, frustrating, especially when so many Westerners want to go by pretending it doesn't exist. It is everywhere, from frankenfoods to low wages, from part-time economy to grrls, from muh feels to Miley Cyrus.

At a civilization scale, there is not much you can do. If normies believe they will magically escape reality by putting their heads in the sand, well, don't spend too much energy trying to open their eyes. Some will secede, and some will follow the stream of decay all the way until it becomes too late. As the Romans said, o*mnes vulnerant, ultima necat* (all wound, the last kills). Get out of the place or use it to thrive. Social decay will go on and there's nothing you can do. Move on.

2. Collapse

Saint John Cathedral, New York

An unhinged, worsening society cannot last forever. Unless someone takes over and cleanses it, the decayed society collapses. We had a taste of it in 2008. Shocked by the magnitude of the crisis, many foresaw another financial crisis that would induce a collapse. Perhaps the pension funds will go bust. Or perhaps the student loan bubble. Others believe some Rainbow Alliance violence and honest people defending themselves could be the trigger.

No matter the key events, the collapse is very likely to happen. Liberals still manage to get themselves competent, masculine protection, but how much longer can they manage their own chaos? The wealthiest know this. For years they have been busy building bunkers in New Zealand. Their degenerate bourgeois bohemian servants may die in their barren, scum-overrun "glamour" neighbourhoods, but they won't. When the collapse happens Peter Thiel and pals are going to watch it broadcasted, sipping champagne, whereas the bobos will end up Bataclan-style. With all the resentment and violence around, the collapse will be violent: thuggish leeches will plunder shops, SJWs will be on the prowl for cishets to kill, and so on.

At this time, you'll be much safer in the countryside. Beforehand I would daydream about potential collapse scenarios. Now I'm planning to go green.

3. Tribes

Their attire may be weird and stilted but they know what group solidarity is

Individuals are weak. You may be skilled enough to get ranked among the top, motivated enough to work like crazy, but you still need people to trade with—possibly to band with when you need protection. If you are isolated, you remain at the mercy of groups around. Individual rights are a convenient illusion. When everyone plays the game, it's fine, but when the emperor has no clothes you can start counting. And the naked emperor won't defend you.

The only way to thrive is but to join or create a tribe. Inside a tribe, you can trust your fellows. Inside a tribe, you can give your best, and know you won't be cheated—or the cheater will be duly punished. From small networks to whole diasporas and gated communities, tribes allow human potential to flourish while protecting their members.

Many people are trying to join at least one network today. Among French dissenters I have seen a lot of networking efforts since the ridiculous failure of Marine Le Pen. Those who still hoped to be someone saved by the Front National understood that its managers only thought of their own interest and would never save anyone beyond themselves. We are on our own, no one cares, those who pay attention mostly hate us. To ride the tiger, we'd better have reliable, trustworthy, competent men we can work with—and perhaps reliable women we can marry.

4. Alternative means of exchange

2017 was the year of crackdowns. Many dissenters had their Facebook, Twitter, and Youtube accounts deleted or banned. PayPal removed ROK's account. In the aftermath of Charlottesville events, a giant wave of closures struck various alternative websites and personalities, including some like Lauren Southern which had nothing to do with the rally. On the other hand, investing in BitCoin allowed many clever investors to cash out thanks to the growing interest in cryptocurrencies.

I still use Facebook as my chief mean for keeping in touch and sharing news with my pals. I still use Gmail whose storage space and layout are very convenient. But I know, too, that the Empire can spy on me anytime. Just as it can do with anyone dependent on its services.

Gab.ai, Minds.com, Vid.me, BitChute, or Privnote all embody the same trend: non-leftists must develop their own spaces to maintain their ability to communicate. First Amendment requires stepping out of the Left-owned services.

5. General proficiency and versatility

Excessive specialization makes you frail. It is okay to be an autistic cog in the machine when the machine works well. When it falls apart, not so.

My hypothesis is, after the events of 9-11, skeptics realized they needed knowledge of various interrelated fields from metallurgy to shady deals to make sense of what had happened. The world is complex, dynamic, interrelated. Remaining inside a closeted field is the better mean to remain hopelessly naïve about the rest—and even to misunderstand one's own field place among the whole.

What corporate BSers call "360 degrees strategy" and Nassim Taleb a "barbell education" is a remedy to this state: getting out of the machine and rediscovering the world, one topic at a time. Over time, one starts drawing comparisons, noticing patterns, connecting the dots. Reading books from various sciences, indulging in various activities from cooking and training to DIY electronics and growing vegetables, is a good way to get a wholesome idea of the world we live into and become at last a jack-of-several-trade.

6. Survivalism

As Lothrop Stoddard said, “the country can live without the town.” When cities become overpriced cesspools of degeneracy, when we know how much the system was designed to keep us poor through debt and inflation, the rational choice consists in leaving the city. At the beginning of the 2000s, buying a flat at the center of a “glamour” city was a good choice. The value of the apartment would go up, you could rent it or use it as a well-positioned lair. Female hypergamy? No problem!

Now the glamour is still there, but times have changed. Let the supermarket empty or the bank close your account and you’ll start starving, or worse, no matter the glamour of the place.

As the land has become cheaper, in contrast with the overpriced downtown, more and more people are on the look for fertile soil. Buy or build a home, or at least a piece of land where you can grow your own food. I would not be surprised to see the long-forgotten countryside gain in value as more and more flee the concrete-and-thugs hell.

Needless to say, proficiency and know-how become extremely important, as you may have to learn how to repair a motor, make your own seedlings, craft a small windmill to load your batteries and so on. Ultimately, when the collapse happens, you’re out, heading towards survival.

7. Local units

This video shows a way to get Internet without a service provider reaching your place, only through a data-plan and an iPhone. Let’s say you managed to get your own nice piece of land and turned it into a small farm. What if the Internet collapses along with the financial system? What about your neighbours and stuff you can’t order online? Or if urban thugs reach your place to steal from you?

The answer to all these questions is the same. A diaspora may be the coolest thing, yet it is never as resilient as when its members have organized on the ground. If your neighbours are trustworthy and decent, not only can you safely trade with them, but you know you will be able to band together the day (((they))) come—I'm using the triple parentheses in a broad sense. Networks, friendships, should head towards small geographic units. These will ensure the survival and thriving of their members.

Before the collapse, they could be the basis for small-scale businesses.

Conclusion

Futurology is at best an imprecise science. Most forecasts end up being false, especially when they are palatable to the mainstream and either ignore reality or take pleasure in false disaster-mongering. On the other hand, a honest assessment of the situation and trends allows for making a number of broad predictions. We need hypothesis to set up projects. More than that, we need to know where we stand so that when the rug is pulled we can still land on our feet, or better yet, stand near the rug rather than on top.

Read Next: What Type Of Future Can Young Men Look Forward To?

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

The Black Pill

November 17, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

In this podcast, I examine the “black pill,” a frame of thinking that focuses on inaction and acceptance. After examining its core tenets, I describe the most common signs you are getting black pilled and why it’s inevitable if you happen to live in a declining society. I address the important connection between our internal emotional states and the external environment and also tackle the argument that inaction is a sign of weakness or cowardice. Lastly, I talk about where to draw the line in the sand when it comes to fighting back against wrongs that you encounter.
Listen on Soundcloud or download the MP3:

Listen on Youtube:

Subscribe on iTunes or add the RSS feed to your favorite podcast app. If you like the podcast, please leave a rating and review on iTunes.

Previous Podcast: How To Make Money Online

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

App That Digitally Removes Female Makeup From Photos Causes Massive Outrage

November 19, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Information Liberation:

A new makeup removing app named “MakeApp” from Russian developer Ashot Gabrelyanov is causing a triggering on levels never before seen.

While it’s not perfect, there’s no getting around the fact the app is rather shockingly accurate.

MAKEAPP
MAKEAPP
MAKEAPP

The liberal media is losing their minds:

Top stories

MakeApp Creates Problematic Makeup-Removing App

Teen Vogue

10 hours ago

This New Makeup-Removing App Wants To Destroy Your Self-Esteem — & It's B.S.

Refinery29

1 day ago

MakeApp's makeup removing app makes your selfies look worse

Mashable

2 hours ago

→ More for makeapp

Women are spamming it with one star reviews and calling for it to be banned from Apple and Google's app stores, though men love it:

The media responded to the app by accusing developer Ashot Gabrelyanov of being a Kremlin agent — no joke.

A male ex-Russian propagandist is behind an unflattering AI app that shows how women look without makeup

Shona Ghosh
Nov. 13, 2017, 8:52 AM

FACEBOOK LINKEDIN TWITTER

No one knows how to generate headlines and outrage like a pro-Russia propagandist.

Which might explain how Ashot Gabrelyanov has come to promote his artificial intelligence startup.

Gabrelyanov, who lives in Unflattering.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: Female Flight Attendants Terrorize Air Passengers By Having A Massive Panic Attack

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

How To Get An Intense Cardio Workout In Only 20 Minutes

November 19, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Cardio sucks, but it's undoubtedly vital to do to give yourself a truly high level of fitness. As a side note, I've never really felt that circuit weight training provided an effective resistance workout OR cardiovascular workout—but I don't particularly enjoy monotonously plodding along for 30 or 45 minutes, or even an hour at a time, and I think most men don't either (regardless of whether or not you believe the "liberals run, conservatives lift" dichotomy).

And then there's doing stationary cardio such as ellipticals, treadmills, bikes, and the like. I personally find these to be even more soul crushing than standard cardio: they take all of the "fun" of locomotory cardio, but with the added sense of being a gerbil running on a wheel.

So what do you do if you have better things to be doing? As I've mentioned in the past, I have until very recently been recovering from a severely dislocated foot, and while forced to use cardio machines, I came across the solution: a fast, extremely intensive cardio training method that will leave you gassed in no more than twenty minutes: Tabata

Interval Training.

What?

Tabata Interval Training is named after Dr. Izumi Tabata, sports medicine doctor most famously affiliated with the Japanese Olympic Speed Skating team. He designed a program of intensive interval training for his skaters, alternating between sprints and slow jog/rest periods in equal 30 second intervals to provide a brutal cardiovascular workout that quickly forces the trainee to reach VO2Max (maximum oxygen consumption capacity, aka the closest measure of cardiovascular exertion there is), and exhausts the glycogen stores of the muscles in no more than 20 minutes.

And I emphasize 20 minutes max: simply put, if you are not pouring sweat and utterly exhausted by that point in time, you're doing it wrong, and need to increase the intensity of your exercise program. I myself can't even do 20 minutes, I can only do around 13 minutes of this delightfully hellish regimen.

What Tabata Intervals Do For You

The trainee doing Tabata intervals will immediately notice results with this cardio program—most notably vastly increased cardio capacity in all respects—which is to say both in sprinting and moderate intensity sustained cardio. When I started doing this program, I couldn't even break 10 minutes of intervals, and now that I've reached 13 minutes I've noticed that my stamina in jogging, swimming, and other sustained cardio activities is much greater than it was before.

Another immediately noticeable benefit to interval training is weight loss—the trainee will notice rapid weight loss alongside their increased endurance capacity. In fact, studies show that it is every bit as effective as regular cardio for increasing endurance and losing weight, but in a fraction of the time.

And lastly, forcing yourself to do just one more 30 second sprint will do wonders for your mental and/or willpower training.

How To Do It

So now you probably want to know how to do these intervals. And luckily, it's pretty simple—all you need is a timer and some sort of cardio method. Any will do, as long as it is entirely based on your own muscular power. Running, jump rope, swimming, skating, elliptical machines, bicycling, stationary bikes, etc. I specify "your own muscular power" as a way to differentiate it from, say, a treadmill, which moves via programming the machine to go at a certain speed. You can't do Tabatas on a treadmill, as the treadmill does not quickly and/or seamlessly change speeds.

Warm up a bit and then set the timer for 30 seconds. Do a slow, easy jogging pace until the 30 seconds are up. Then immediately start a sprint, emphasis necessary. Sprint as hard and as fast as you can. Sprint like your life was depending on it!

Maintain this sprinting pace for 30 seconds as well, and then repeat the cycle anew until you can't anymore. If you can somehow set your timer to beep every 30 seconds, even better.

I must reiterate, you will not last for more than 20 minutes, and for your first time you likely won't even make 10.

Even though I am now recovered, I still do Tabata intervals because I find that no other form of cardio exercise hits that trifecta of effectiveness, efficiency, and not being an endless slog. And if I, somebody who hates cardio enthusiastically does Tabata interval training, I don't see what reason you have to not be doing this as well.

Read More: 5 Reasons Men Should Limit Their Cardio

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

8 Reasons You Have A Crappy Boss

November 19, 2017 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

Most of us are not freelancers, digital nomads or CEOs but employees, even if we can do freelance work. And I'm referring to myself as well. The most influential element in our work is not money or benefits – It's the boss. Yes, that person who can make our life "heaven" or drag us (kicking and screaming) to hell. The boss is the person you have a lot of interaction with. They also "control" your destiny at work.

Most people have some complaints regarding their boss. Present company included. What is the cause of that? Why is your boss not doing a good job? After all, most of us know exactly what to do about it. Below are eight reasons why your boss sucks.

1. The boss man is actually just a… man

Most bosses are not successful or driven, and lack a high emotional IQ like most business magazines would have you believe. They issues in their personal lives and character flaws, just like we have.

I have worked for grouchy people: females with a ticking biological clock and men who are going through divorce. Those people may have our sympathy, but only for a short while. It gets old very fast, and we start to feel the grind of just being around them.

2. Being in charge is hard

I don't know about you, but when I was heading teams and departments – that was tough. You manage people who are completely different, you need to make hard choices even if you are not ready for them and you also need to answer to your own boss. Telling me to “suck it up” is fine, but it does not help much. If you are a regular employee, it’s easy to focus on doing your own thing. When you manage a team, you are now a kindergarten teacher.

I have met people who were subject to the “Peter Principle” – they were good employees and got promoted to team leaders. Once there, they had many issues dealing with their teams. One person I worked with became a team leader. He had good tech skills, but was a “nice guy” (in the worse sense of the word). He had trouble giving feedback and some of the team would simply “walk all over him”.

The boss, after having to deal with everything

3. They learned from the wrong man

Throughout human history, most people learned by being an apprentice. If you were a carpenter, blacksmith or farmer, you worked for a few years under someone’s guidance. But what happens if your mentor sucks?
In that case you pick bad habits that stick with you.

I have seen people emulate their boss’ bad attitude, since they thought that this “gets the job done”. They have terrible people skills and are proud of it. The same way that game-denialists say that you are unauthentic when you use game. If you studied the wrong material, you will fail the test.

4. The boss was promoted even though he is not a manager

Being a good manager is not the main reason people get promoted but politics, work skills, and timing. Managing people is usually not on the list. I myself have been such a boss. I had no idea how to manage people and did a poor job of it in the first year.

5. Poor (if any) training

Most companies simply do not train their managers. You should learn “on the job” and with no resources invested. Sometimes middle managers go to specific seminars, classes or formal training, and this is the exception to the norm. I want to mention that most of those trainings are not for C-level executives, who usually needs them more.

Maybe not exactly the kind of training we had in mind

6. Power abuse

> “Power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely”.

Imperfect people + power = trouble.

Examples: Harvey Weinstein, The Clintons, Nick Denton, Brian Chesky.

7. Lack of accountability

Most people want to do their job well, even manage. But some people just don’t care. For example, your boss may be humiliating the staff, but he gets results. They may have dirt on their supervisors, so they have to tolerate them, or in the worst case both hierarchies share the same behavior. In other cases, the boss has no one to answer to. If they are even slightly sadistic, you are going to suffer. Even if they are not, their flaws are going to be your problem.

8. He doesn’t know how to give feedback

Most people have no idea how they are perceived. This means no feedback loop. The employees know their boss very well – methods, behaviors and quirks. It is very rare that employees share that knowledge with the boss. This means that instead of correcting their ways, the bosses keep on doing what they've done for years. This is because people fear "Kill the messenger" syndrome. Some people just don't want to hear bad things about themselves. This is why being truly honest with women gets you nowhere.

Your boss is an ordinary person, with regular problems. That affects you, and may hurt you, but understanding why your boss sucks lays the foundation for correcting your situation.

Read Next: Don't Work For A Female Boss

Dawn Pine
Dawn Pine (aka TheMaleBrain) is an Israeli 40+ divorced father of 2, former casualty of the blue-pill. Since he has taken the red pill his hobbies are: working out, writing, mentoring, harem management and self improvement.

Feminists Don’t Really Want Diversity

November 20, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Feminists are among the biggest proponents of diversity, eager to criticize any group which dares to gather without a male-to-female transexual autistic differently-abled person of color. But the truth is they undermine diversity. Whether consciously or not, the end result of feminism is a boring, homogeneous bland society of light brown indistinct people, with the same opinions, preferences, and beliefs. God is dead. Trannies are cool. Aggressive female behavior is sexy and empowering. Wrong, wrong, wrong.

Segregation and labeling

Are you concerned about your fellow human? Well then, you’re a social justice warrior! Had a bad experience with your last boyfriend? You’re lesbian or bi, or at the very least Genderqueer®. Think statues honoring brave leaders from our past are important historical reminders? You’re a racist, misogynistic piece of shit! Don’t believe in no fault divorce? You’re a patriarchal asshole keeping women down. You don’t get affirmative verbal consent from women before sex? You’re a rapist!

Believe women and men would both be happier with less promiscuity? You’re a small dicked hairy fatass living in your parents basement. Didn’t think Hillary Clinton would make a good president? You’re a sexist Donald Trump loving right winger. Don’t want to import refugees from the government-fomented Syrian War? You hate foreigners! Want to get together with other men in a space safe from aggressive female intrusion and discuss ideas with like-minded thinkers? You’re literally Hitler!

The faux diversity offered by feminists

Feminists have zero tolerance for any diversity of opinion. They don't accept nuance or common ground with their opinions–if you don't believe every extreme insane idea they have, they hate you just as much as their purported enemy, if not more. I've heard vegans say they hate vegetarians more than meat eaters, and they hold die-ins at restaurants offering vegan friendly options, just because they still serve meat to the 99% of other customers who are omnivores.

The end result of their segregation and labeling is a very non-diverse group that remains once everyone else has been excluded. Despite their rhetoric, feminists and modern leftists are intolerant and extreme.

Ethnic mixing

New York City is the world's greatest example of diversity. New York offers dozens of cultural experiences within a few blocks, with authentic, local communities where one can see different ethnicities, sample diverse foods, and hear foreign languages. This diversity exists precisely because there are certain segregated areas like Chinatown, Little Italy, Wall Street, and Harlem, where one can find different cultures. The key to this is the cultures have NOT integrated, socially, sexually, or physically.

True diversity

What feminists desire is a bland homogenous culture, much akin to the mythological "fascism" they rant and rave about, where every street is desegregated, every home occupied by a mixed race couple, and every employee hired by a roll of the racial dice.

The purported future American: Feminists Vision of Diversity

What they neglect to see, of course, is that all of the segregated diversity in NYC came about naturally. There is nothing stopping a straight white male from moving into the Castro district of San Francisco, or a Japanese man from moving to Little Italy, or a black man to move to Chinatown. But when given the choice, we choose to surround ourselves with people who are similar. And more importantly, if we did not, then these neighborhoods would slowly die and merge, becoming a less vibrant clone of the next neighborhood, occupied by a mass of anonymous light brown English speakers–the antithesis of diversity.

What makes Latina women great? Their curvy bodies, fiery passionate personalities, and sexual energy. What makes Asian women great? Their adherence to tradition, petite size, good hygiene, and femininity. By mixing we slowly destroy the highs and lows of all groups and end up with a middle of the road "average" person. What's interesting to me about my closest friends and lovers, were their differences–their unique appearance, attitudes, or hobbies. Feminists want to end diversity by mixing all groups together and destroying their individuality.

"Equality": misconstruing differences as criticism

The feminist's quixotic quest for equality is a constant complaint, where feminists warp any observable difference into a positive or negative trait. There's nothing "better" or "worse" about being able to conceive children. But the fact is, as a male, I will never be able to bear children.

A recent published study complained that bidders on eBay pay more for items sold by men than by women. Now, a rational person would conclude that since sellers on eBay are anonymous, this must be some inherent trait of men versus women, perhaps that men had better developed bartering skills, while women have better breastfeeding or knitting skills. But no, the authors stretched to find a reason that buyers were figuring out the sex of the seller and making harsh judgments against female sellers.

East Africans are very fast long distance runners, Swedes are tall and blonde, Japanese are thin and very traditional. There is no criticism involved in describing factual differences. A black man who can run faster than me is no better than me. He is merely different. But feminists take any difference or perceived difference as a horrible prejudicial hateful thought.

And so we end up with sociology textbooks like Occupational Ghettos: The Worldwide

Segregation of Women and Men which laments the fact that women, much like the oppressed poor living in slums, work in “occupational ghettos” alongside fellow women. The authors point out that this trend is actually strongest in progressive wealthy nations! Could it be that women perhaps PREFER a job like schoolteacher over engineer?

Oppressive segregation is occurring when women choose feminine jobs

This is the perfect example of feminist hypocrisy: making value judgments about the actions of others. Who is to say the job of schoolteacher is inferior to that of a lawyer? If anything, I would argue the opposite. If it wasn’t for the need to acquire excess wealth to attract females, the rewards of teaching school, and the low stress environment (not to mention the summers off for vacation), make that job a far more attractive one than suiting up and sitting in a law office staring at a computer screen all day. But to a feminist, if women are still found to teach school in numbers greater than their proportion of the population, that is a clear sign of segregation and discrimination against them to not have “better” jobs.

Equating diversity to anti-male

Instead of actual diversity, coming from a broad array of backgrounds, usually what a feminist means when she is talking about more diversity is merely less men, particularly less straight white men. There was a brief controversy last year when the executive editor of Huffington Post tweeted a picture of their all-twentysomething white female editorial board bragging about how “diverse” they were.

HuffPo Editorial Desk: Literally what feminists consider “diverse”

True diversity is much more akin to the ROK writers–while we are all men (obviously, considering this is a site about masculinity and men’s issues), there are black, white, young, old, bodybuilders, daygamers, introverts, philosophers, religious scholars, historians, teetotalers and kratom enthusiasts living all over the world, submitting our ideas.

When a feminist demands more diversity, typically she is pushing for male exclusion, and often LESS diversity.

Defining diversity to mean lack of standards

Nine times out of ten, when a feminist mentions diversity, she means less white males. The tenth time she is referring to social engineering to replace those most qualified in a position with an unqualified minority group, simply for the sake of social disruption.

Why are more than 50% of our military troops men, when men are only half the population? Feminists want to fix this by lowering standards so that women can now work as soldiers, despite the fact that they are less effective fighters and are far more likely to end up pregnant with a bastard than doing anything related to fighting wars.

CEO of Equifax, who oversaw hack of 143m Americans. Diversity Hire?

One of Orwell's features of Newspeak was that it redefined a word to mean its exact opposite. We can see this today with feminists fighting for diversity by destroying it forever. As lovers of diverse ideas, women, places, foods, and experiences, we must oppose them.

Read Next: Why Feminists Hate Male Sexuality

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

It Was A Nightmare To Work In A 90% Female Workplace

November 20, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Two years ago in Sweden I had a one-year contract at a 90% female environment, a college workplace dedicated to subjects such as beauty and fashion, where I observed many patterns regarding sex differences.

Before I continue, it is pertinent to add that there is significant variation among women. Even in schools with somewhat lower average grades and test scores, some girls are intelligent, diligent, talented, and showcase agreeable behavior. Some are even relatively competent, easy to work with, and not overly sensitive. With that said, this was a predominantly negative experience for a variety of reasons.

Widespread neuroticism

A constant problem was crying, yelling, and being absent as a consequence of depression and various psychosocial health issues. After a while all I could do is sigh.

Far-reaching coddle

Another troubling component was the never-ending coddle of female students, mainly from the female co-workers. The underlying pedagogic idea is that a safe and pleasant environment will create happy and motivated individuals. Girls need special treatment in order to fully thrive, some suggest.

Although it is indeed true that more authoritarian manners may severely backfire, coddling girls leads to a vicious cycle. If no one draws the line, it will constantly be moved, at the expense of self-discipline and responsibility.

If the principal and teachers take ridiculous claims seriously, mainly from manipulative, histrionic or neurotic girls who are the least likely to make substantial assertions on just about anything, the organization puts itself in a tenuous position.

Additionally, the entire concept of treating people, soon to be adults, as borderline retarded kids appears to be pure nonsense that only further accelerates social decline.

Backstabbing and herd mentality

If only one percent of the females decide that they will not accept that you yelled at them once when they were acting moronic during class, or they have identified “offensive” thoughts about Oriental women on your personal blog, many of their female friends will follow suit and band together. They’ll quickly flock around the female staff, the principal in particular, and even involve parents, with the aim to restore their notion of justice.

Such obstacles can be solved in the end, often through strategic diplomacy and benevolent manipulation, but they will nevertheless create stress and unease.

Male workers hunker down or quit

Two consequences of a female-dominated workplace, where masculinity has to be severely curtailed, are that males hunker down or quit. I saw a gradual decline of the percentage of male workers within the small span of just a year.

When you are not allowed to be yourself, sometimes not even in the slightest, you have to dwell inside a shell. Although it would be quite pathetic to complain about such conditions, a majorly masculine man simply wants to spend time in an environment which does not decrease his overall well-being.

The secondary becomes the primary

Instead of focusing on results, skills, and enabling students and teachers to work undisturbed, silly campaigns became the major focus. For example, for one week everyone had to say “Hello” to just all of whom they happened to meet. Even the students with the weakest intellectual faculties considered this idea, which unsurprisingly a female co-worker came up with, as peculiarly inane and stupid.

Females are generally more emotional and gregarious, whereas men are more rational and assertive. When the female elements become the dominant forces, the environment will change accordlingly.

In summary

To work in such a female-dominated environment may likely have a negative impact on a man’s well-being and is not to be recommended. The quality of work may also decline because of females’ penchant for emotional and interpersonal nonsense. A more balanced demography or a male-dominated environment are obviously preferred.

For more of William Adams’ material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: 3 Annoying Types OF Females That Most Men Encounter

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Feminist Gets Punched In The Face After Telling Black Man On Subway To Stop “Manspreading”

November 20, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via NY Post:

A woman says she was slugged in the face by a racist lunatic on the subway — all because she asked him to stop “manspreading.”

The aftermath of Thursday’s violent exchange was caught on video as a good Samaritan tries to defend the woman and usher her violent attacker off the train.

The victim, Sam Saia, said she was riding the N train through Bensonhurst while on her way to work in Manhattan when the man sat down and started overcrowding her around 7:45 a.m.

“He proceeded to press me against the wall and man spread me excessively,” she wrote on Facebook after the incident.

“When I asked him to give me room, he yelled ‘B–ch, you ain’t nothing! I’ve raped white b–ches like you, f—ing c–t! You ain’t nothing, you f—ing b–ch!’”

The woman said she put in her earbuds and tried to ignore the raging man as he continued his tirade.

But the man then socked her in the mouth, bloodying her lip and knocking her head into the wall behind her, she said.

That’s when a man ran to the woman’s defense and started grappling with the suspect.

The good Samaritan, who described himself as being “not on duty right now,” told him to “get the f–k off the train.”

The attacker tried to apologize to the woman before exiting the train.

In her Facebook post, Saia said she reported the incident to police, although the NYPD said they did not have a report on file as of Friday morning.

The video is being investigated by police, an NYPD spokesman said.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: The White Woman Punched In The Face By A Black Cop At A Football Game Deserved It

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Women Have Been Tricked Into Living Like Men

November 21, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The biggest travesty that has happened to women in the past 70 years is not misogyny or sexism, but being put on the same education and work timeline as men in spite of having a completely different biology. Millions of women suffer every day because they're living lives that were designed and optimized for men.

Most women lose the ability to have children without medical intervention at the age of 40. After that, it gets extremely hard for a woman to naturally conceive, and even if she manages to do so, she is 17 times more likely to transmit birth defects to her child than having conceived at age 20. Even at 35, a woman already sees a huge drop in her fertility.

The culture infects young girls with an obsession on career so that they attend an expensive university and rush to work immediately after graduation, all with the grand design of enslaving them into the rat race during the most fertile period of their lives, sharply reducing the number of children they can have. If a girl is lucky, she may have twenty fertile years starting at age 18, but during that time she's expected to get a degree, move out of her parent's home into a "vibrant" big city, establish a career where her skills remain in high demand, fall in love with a man who makes more money than she does, marry him, feel financially secure enough to have a family, and then have her first child. Does this at all sound reasonable to you when her male counterpart has double the time she has? My father had his last child in his 50's. Can a woman do that?

Let's assume for a minute that I won't advocate for traditionalism or make the argument that a woman shouldn't be able to make life decisions on her own, as I have before. What kind of solution remains that would allow women to pretend to be businessmen while still being able to have children before it gets too late? It is to get married and have children before attending university. If a woman does that, she merely has to wait until her last child enters kindergarten to enroll in whichever brainwashing factory she wants, graduate within four years through mostly day-time study, and then begin working while her children are being brainwashed themselves in public schools.

If we assume that a woman who got married early had her last child at a still pert 26, that means she'd be ready for university at 31 and enter corporate hell at 35. Based on current life expectancy figures, that gives her six more decades to decorate her cubicle and LARP as a businessman.

Right now a woman may be thinking, "But men get a head start in your plan, that's not fair!" Yeah, well, you'll live longer than me, which is not fair either. My solution allows women to take advantage of their biology and have children when their body is most ready for it. All that's required is obtaining the love and commitment of a man who is asked to impregnate a young woman who is family oriented and not a whore. That will not be difficult. In fact, if you fit this profile, send me a full body photo and I may wife you up, but please don't wait until you've sampled numerous penises because then your brain chemistry will have degraded to such an extent that you will sabotage any future relationship that has genuine love from a man who wants to provide for you.

I'm sure you can find a dozen other logistical problems to my plan, especially concerning the economics of having one wage-earner support a family for at least five years, but I assume that the wife will know how to cook, grow basic foods in a garden, sew, and not want to display expensive possessions to internet nobodies on Instagram. The major hurdle is not finding a man willing to wife up a supple young bride, but finding a girl with half her brain still intact after her parents threw her into the mud pit of blue-haired feminist pigs.

If you are a young woman in high school, I advise you to skip out on university, live with your parents, work a basic part-time job to earn money for tasteful makeup and clothing, learn important homemaking skills, and then use the remainder of your free time to securing the love of a man who wants a family. Assuming your standards in men are realistic (hah!), it won't take you more than a year to find a worthy contender, because what man wouldn't want to lay down roots with such a family-oriented woman?

As a man who has spent only six years working in a corporate career, one that was actually somewhat interesting, I can guarantee that any job a woman takes will cause more damage to her happiness than not. Women should look at all the men who are quitting the rat race to become location independent and ask themselves why they are being convinced to participate in a rigged game that increasing numbers of intelligent men want nothing to do with. Ladies: you’re not missing out on delaying your career for a few years. It’s better to focus first on creating a family first, while you still can.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: Why Women Shouldn’t Work

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Lena Dunham Declares Innocence Of Friend Accused Of Rape After Stating Women Don’t Lie About Rape

November 21, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

Aurora Perrineau — the daughter of former Lost actor Harold Perrineau — filed a police report with the Los Angeles County Sheriff’s Office Friday claiming that after a night out at a bar in Los Angeles in 2012, she awoke to find Murray having sex with her in his bed.

Perrineau shared the results of a polygraph test she claims to have passed with The Wrap Friday, in which she claimed that Miller had been flirting with her at the Standard Hotel, despite her telling him that she was 17. Perrineau had reportedly been with two friends, and Miller, who was 35 at the time, asked for a ride home. Perrineau said she and her friends all got out of the car at Miller’s residence.

“At some point, I woke up in Murray’s bed naked. He was on top of me having sexual intercourse with me. At no time did I consent to any sexual contact with Murray,” Perrineau reportedly said in the polygraph statement.

In a statement to The Wrap though his attorney, Miller “categorically and vehemently” denied the allegation and said his team had evidence contradicting the actress’s account. Miller also accused Perrineau of attempting to extort him, a charge the actress’s mother denied in a statement.

Dunham, who worked with Miller on the HBO series Girls, defended the writer and producer in a joint statement with Girls co-showrunner Jenni Konner issued Friday.

“While our first instinct is to listen to every woman’s story, our insider knowledge of Murray’s situation makes us confident that sadly this accusation is one of the 3% of assault cases that are misreported every year,” Dunham and Konner said.

“It is a true shame to add to that number, as outside of Hollywood women still struggle to be believed. We stand by Murray and this is all we’ll be saying about this issue,” the statement added.

Miller is one of dozens of Hollywood figures to have been accused of sexual misconduct in recent weeks.

Dunham claimed in her 2014 memoir Not That Kind of Girl that she had been raped by a Republican named “Barry” while she was a student at Oberlin College. An investigation by Breitbart News using the details Dunham provided about her rapist later cleared this “Barry” from the allegations, though Dunham waited months before issuing a statement saying that the name “Barry” was a pseudonym.

Would you bang?

Read the entire article

Read Next: How Much Money Will Lena Dunham Make From Her Rape Accusation?

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

How To Deprogram Yourself After Becoming A Male Feminist

November 21, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Since feminists have the nerve to set up courses to propagandize men to be less masculine, it's time we start deprogramming male feminists. Send this to any friends or relatives who drank the Kool-Aid. They certainly should read it—unless they're afraid their beliefs are wrong and can't withstand challenge.

Male feminists seem ridiculous, but it's a serious matter. Enabling feminist dysfunction makes things worse for all guys, including themselves. It's bad for women too.

What made you a male feminist?

Most of you simply care about women and want what's best for them. However, there's no reason you must believe a weaponized ideology for that! We care too, but traditionalism has better answers. Note well, what's good for women is not identical with modern feminism.

Perhaps you have a guilt trip. For example, if you took a women's studies class, you got a very one-sided spiel. The professor said the last six thousand years were all about oppression of women—and it's your fault (as if you could change the past). You weren't told about all the men who sweated in the fields, factories, and mines year after year. They were doing this for their families, by the way. Sex roles work both ways, get it? It was the men who got drafted to fight for their nations; millions came back badly injured, or in coffins.

Others mistakenly believe that espousing feminism will make women like them. It doesn't work that way. First of all, most women actually don't support feminism, and it continues to lose credibility. Also, subduing your "toxic masculinity" and reciting talking points like a Chatty Cathy doll won't get you a single girlfriend—trust us on this. If that's you, how's that worked so far? What women really want is someone who looks and acts like a man. So forget about virtue-signaling your way into someone's panties.

What does modern feminism want?

Everyone has heard feminism is only about equality, still a common belief. When it began, that's basically what it was. They finalized their major objective of universal women's suffrage in 1920, and the job was finished with the Equal Pay Act of 1963. Since they got equality under the law, why is there still feminism? It's simple: they moved the goalposts. Then it became hostility and radical demands to rearrange society, and even create a unisex world.

By the 1960s, feminism had changed drastically. Radicals, neurotics, lesbians, and others with a grudge against society came to the forefront—while claiming to speak for all women. Their rhetoric became extremely shrill and divisive. In a healthy society, the sexes have good regard for each other. So feminists sought to achieve their political goals by driving a wedge between women and men, a very foul deed. Radical feminism poisoned the social environment, and that's good for neither women nor men.

Perhaps you're thinking—"But that's not real feminism!" Indeed, it has dozens of offshoots—now a sometimes self-contradictory hodgepodge—so we'll have to consider the general consensus. The most radical are still the loudest, and the moderates can't (or won't) rein them in or even disavow them.

By the way, they certainly expect their male feminist allies to shut up and follow the Party Line. If you dissent about something—perhaps you say that paternity fraud is unjust, for example—there's a good chance they'll denounce you over just one item. All your past support will mean nothing.

Modern feminism seeks to turn women into a radicalized social class, united against men by unending grievances and victimhood rhetoric. They want government power to grant them advantages, typically involving income redistribution and reducing the consequences of bad life choices. Is that a formula for a healthy society?

What about male privilege?

At least these men have their male privilege.

Quite effectively, feminists have delegitimized "male privilege" (as they see it), although life certainly isn't as easy for us as they think. However, they're certainly not relinquishing advantages that society still gives them. Feminism only demands equality when it serves their interests. They want to have their cake and eat it.

Divorce law is still grounded in 19th century notions, providing the ex-wife an allowance long after the relationship ended, among other problems. Women still don't get drafted in most countries. They've also acquired new advantages, such as hiring quotas and set-asides. Criminal law gives them preferential treatment. Then there are multitudes of women-only scholarships, social agencies, associations, and government programs. Feel privileged yet? Tell your feminist friends that this has to be changed because it's structural inequality, and see how far that gets you.

How about the "wage gap"? What they don't tell you is that comparatively few women choose high-paying STEM careers, because they're not interested in nerdy stuff. They also don't like dirty, exhausting, and dangerous jobs either. Further, men work more overtime. Why does being extra productive make us the bad guys? The truth is that the "wage gap" results from individual career choices, but feminists dishonestly blame "The Patriarchy".

What about rape culture?

She lied because she got dumped, and then wanted attention.

It's a dirty lie to say that we live in a "rape culture". Since it's a felony punishable by a prison sentence, that means it's not culturally approved. Feminists trying to make men look like savages—including you—are fundamentally dishonest. The truth is that this (along with other violent crimes) has declined greatly from the early 1990s. The job isn't finished yet, but demagoguery for shock value won't help.

Early on, they may have merely intended to draw attention to the crime. However, things got worse when they started using phony statistics to bolster their argument. Further, they altered the definition of rape far beyond what it actually means. Lately, they include several other things under the category of "rape culture" (like flirting or "the male gaze"), conflating things that are impolite—at most—with dreadful crimes.

The resulting witch hunt climate led to a wave of false accusations. Some very highly publicized cases have turned out to be complete fabrications. With all the redefining and inflammatory rhetoric, consensual encounters which are later regretted ("buyer's remorse") can get you falsely accused. Campus tribunals resembling Star Chamber proceedings have the power to expel students without due process. When a crime actually takes place, the police should handle it.

This is bad for genuine victims who may face more doubts and scrutiny after this witch hunt. It's also bad for all the people whose lives have been ruined unjustly. That could be you some day. Being a male feminist will not save you.

How feminism affects society

For half a century, radical feminists have been pushing their toxic ideology on the public, aided by useful idiots in the media. Even women who don't identify with feminism have soaked up some of this. They've been told that it's okay to get a divorce without good reason, single motherhood is super, abortion is wonderful, and so forth. It's irresponsible to change the things that made society work. Much of the civilizational decline over the last fifty years is attributable to the feminist agenda's unquestioned acceptance.

By themselves, the feminists couldn't have gone nearly as far as they did without help from men. Most of their allies misunderstood the nature of feminism, considering it simply a matter of equality and justice. It's time to stop supporting these dishonest radicals who have taken advantage of your benevolent instincts and will show you no gratitude in return, no matter how useful or self-abasing you are.

Being a male feminist is like being a chicken voting for Colonel Sanders. After all they've lied to you, do you still want to be their useful idiot?

Read More: The 12 Step Social Justice Warrior Recovery Program

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

The Left Is Being Destroyed By Their Own Frankensteins

November 22, 2017 | by Jackson Cade | Link | Original Link

You can't help but marvel at what's going on with the Weinstein phenomenon and the cannibalism of the left. The advent of the New Puritans, feminism's "Children of the Corn", has elevated their orthodoxy to religious levels, and what new religion isn't enraptured with its doctrines and prolific in its zealotry?

Humans have an innate need to believe in a higher power, and since the left has eschewed belief in the Judeo-Christian God, it was only a matter of time until they filled that hole with something else. I'm struck by two analogies: Frankenstein and Puritanism.

In Mary Shelly's Frankenstein, young Dr. Victor Frankenstein creates a grotesque and unnatural monster, who being unable to fit into human society, and loathing itself, goes on a killing spree across the countryside, tormenting its creator by killing his friends and loved ones.

It coerces Victor into creating for it a similarly abhorrent mate (cucked pajama boys, anyone?), but the monster exacts revenge by killing Victor's new bride on their wedding night. These tragic events in Victor's life ultimately lead to his death, but Frankenstein finds Victor's death has not brought him the peace he sought; instead his crimes have left him isolated and alone. As it vows to kill itself, it disappears into self-imposed exile and is lost in darkness.

The left has created its own aberration, a Feminist Frankenstein. The motivation was different. Under the guise of equality and female empowerment, it was a weapon used to strike down its enemies. Since the election it has aggressively and successfully targeted its opponents with charges of sexual harassment. It ended the careers of Bill O'Reilly, Eric Bolling, and arguably the lives of Roger Ailes, and Bolling's son.

The left wanted these scalps badly and were very pleased. But then something unexpected happened: the monster believed in its own purpose, and it didn't differentiate between left and right. It went on a rampage exposing the dark perversions and open secrets of liberal Hollywood—sexual assault, rape, pedophilia. The carnage continues with near daily new victims.

The Feminist Frankenstein of spurned hypergamy, and the newly minted legal doctrine of turning "morning after regret" for poor decisions into sexual assault and rape charges, has set the hills of Hollywood ablaze. But it hasn't stopped there. Now it is setting its sights on D.C. and their age old privileges of power. It is quite amusing to watch Senator Al Franken's current spectacle.

This is the left's fatal mistake; it so expertly wielded the tenets of Saul Alinksy's Rules for Radicals, particularly of using your opponent's beliefs against them, that it is becoming a victim of its own success. You see, you can't have your beliefs held against you if they are relative and changeable, or simply absent. In those cases, one is immune from such an attack.

But the left has gotten sloppy, adopted their own religious tenants, and have inadvertently lost their immunity to that strategy. Free from a belief in God, they loosely subscribed to a variety of secular humanism, atheism, moral relativism, and the stalwart of the sexual revolution, feminism. But their freedom from any real or strict orthodoxy gave them a free pass to do as they pleased while attacking their opponents for doing the same.

Those in power are never truly that much different from one another, whatever their politics. Narcissistic and given to enjoying the spoils of their power, they have always reveled in privileges not afforded to the masses, and are probably all equally as guilty. However, since they derive their power from the people, be it programmed by the popular culture or media, they still are answerable, to an extent, to their constituent fan bases. And establishing a new religion for the leftwing fan base has upset the status quo. Now their fans are actually expecting them to live up to their own dogma.

As with any faith based belief system, faith is the evidence of things not seen. Under this belief, the rule of law and the fundamental tenet of innocent until proven guilty no longer really matter. Evidence is not necessary and, in fact, is discouraged. We are told victims should be believed without evidence, and subsequently, guilt must rightly be assumed, no matter the circumstance, how far back in the past the event occurred (20-30 years), or the lack of evidence or hazy recollection. One should have “faith” the accuser is telling the truth due to their gender and perceived power imbalance. Now that they have their own rigid, unfettered, and Puritanical belief system, it is consuming their own.

For most of my life, I’ve watched the left bludgeon the right with their beliefs, wielding “family values” like a weapon of mass destruction against conservatives. Now they are reaping what they’ve sown. In less than a month, Harvey Weinstein, Kevin Spacey, Al Franken, Andy Dick, and Louis C.K. have falledn. The list grows longer each day.

History does surely repeat itself, and I am gripped with excitement to watch these New Puritans burn their own at the stake. I just have one question: who’s going to bring the marshmallows?

Read Next: Feminist Move To Desexualize Breasts Could Allow Men To Squeeze Them With Impunity

Jackson Cade
Jackson is a man of fire, better suited to a more civilized age, namely one where he'd crash axes into skulls on medieval battlefields. A barbarous intellectual who has embraced thought criminality, he relishes the inevitable implosion of socially engineered western civilization. You can follow him on twitter

Charlie Manson’s Legacy Shows That Women Are Attracted To Evil Men

November 22, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Many a dutiful middle-class accountant, schoolteacher, or lawyer believes that the key to attracting and keeping a woman is being nice and providing for her. Charlie Manson, who died this week, would have begged to differ. As a man confined to a prison cell for most of his life, this cult leader, serial murderer, and, yes, cultural phenomenon, nevertheless commanded a female following that the rest of us can barely imagine.

Manson’s real legacy, albeit often a morally reprehensible one, is demonstrating that men who flout the rules and even criminal laws very often stand a much better chance of getting laid by hot women than conscientious men who simply try to be good. There are few, if any rewards nowadays for well-intentioned men who do as they are told, or try to please a woman in the way society or their run-of-the-mill fathers taught them.

Girls like this may not be 10s in an age where almost every woman wears copious amounts of cosmetics, but these Charlie Manson followers constitute more than what most men get nowadays.

Inasmuch as we should promote a sense of morality in our communities, women will not get wet over this. Many of them will, however, get wet over a Charlie Manson. This is the brutal but necessary truth even red-pilled veterans must continually swallow.

Manson may be an outlier of sorts, yet plenty of other men somewhat or greatly approach his Dark Triad-style personality without going to prison or not for as long. Much of the time, they are reliably rewarded with young, fertile females as the good-doer white collar professional watches on and scratches his head in disbelief.

There are certainly costs involved with actions and lives like Charlie Manson's, namely incarceration, premature death (though not in his case), and a frequently penniless existence. Still, many outwardly successful and financially affluent men, essentially the moral superiors of guys like Manson, struggle to attract any decent form of female attention for their entire lives and languish in supreme loneliness, married or not. Where's the justice in that? There is none and that's the point. Good men do not get women wet, at least not because they are good. Don't believe the fairytale.

Let's start to unpack Charlie Manson

Most men today would struggle to sleep with a woman like Patricia Krenwinkel, let alone get her to carry out a serious crime in their name. Krenwinkel was one of the people, most of them women, who committed the Tate murders.

I will not be attempting to provide, as you probably noticed, an exhaustive account of Manson's life. A lot of writers have tried that before and numerous others will attempt to do so in the coming years. Instead, our focus here is on dispeling some of the lies that continually accompany male-female relations. I encourage you, after reading this article, to read up on Charlie Manson and his success with women in greater depth.

Remember, no one is suggesting you should go and murder people in the hope of getting pussy, but few would doubt the raw power Charlie Manson exerted over many females throughout his lifetime. With respect, how many of us could ever get women to work as hard and as dangerously for our goals as they did for Manson?

Sans a world-changing talent, especially for something like sports, merely good men have next to nothing to offer increasingly hypergamous women. They will be lapped and sexually beaten much of the time by Charlie Manson types with few moral scruples. Men like Manson also eclipse close to all of us who have taken the proverbial red pill. Nihilistic or plain evil men oftentimes have the romantic advantage and we should be honest enough to admit it. They tap into female desire in a way that most guys can never dream of. Yes, you can count men with game, too.

More women want to have sex with a man in prison than someone who follows the law

They don't look the best without hair, but would four women keep a vigil for an average or perhaps even famous man like these four did for Charlie Manson? Most men can't get their wives to reliably make them sandwiches anymore.

You know an aspect of female psychology is very strong when otherwise non-woke outlets like The Guardian report on it. Charlie Manson's appeal to women is nothing short of legendary, akin to the fawning female desire spawned by Adolf Hitler and various American serial killers, including Ted Bundy. Leftist rags may not fully appreciate the allure of a Charlie Manson and the commensurate problems with women it exposes, but they cannot help but recognize it.

The legacy of Charlie Manson continued to be made until he was on his deathbed and will live on long after his body has gone cold. Where can we start with his prison antics? More recently, for example, he had tried to smuggle his sperm out of prison to impregnate his then fiancée, a woman in her 20s. Whilst this obviously indicates the lack of sex he was getting, since he was denied conjugal visits, the fact a woman would want the sperm of an octogenarian puts him well ahead of the average young man who struggles not to marry a landwhale his own age.

Decades ago, a number of young women risked their freedom by smuggling contraband items into jail for Manson… in their genitals. And prior to his more famous prison life, his hippie-esque abodes during the 1960s became centers for constant sexual activity, drowning Manson in more pussy in a few short years than several men get in a lifetime. For a diminutive man of about 5'2″, he had a giant way of connecting with women.

So how do one emulate the success of Charlie Manson in stoking the tingles of women? Aside from killing and a general life of crime, which I do not recommend, the next best thing is learning game. It will not get you the notoriety of Charlie himself, let's be clear. That said, it's a start.

Read More: Idiotic Women Had Unprotected Sex With Charlie Sheen And Now

Complain About HIV Risks

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Detachment Is The Best Way To Maintain The Attraction Of Hot Girls

November 22, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

I have a hot female friend I'll call Anna. Anna is blonde, sexy and mysterious. She's a blogger and content creator and has a lot going for her besides her looks, being intelligent, creative, a singer and so on. The other day Anna was messaging me about this guy Rodri she knows.

'I just can't stop thinking about him,' she said. 'I've never known anyone to be so blase before.'

Apparently Rodri had been in the friendzone with Anna for a few years. They'd worked together on music. Then he'd disappeared for a bit. When he came back he was different.

'He had a different attitude,' Anna said. 'He intimidated me a little bit.'

This renewed mojo sparked attraction in Anna. They spent around a week together as some cheesy quasi-couple, going on trips to the park and making out. But no sex. Rodri had a kind-of girlfriend, so things were complicated.

Anna gave Rodri a blowjob one night, but when it came to the moment for D in V he was unable to perform. Maybe it was the drink, maybe it was nerves. Anna didn't really know. But whatever. She made it clear she wasn't bothered, and prepared to give things another try next time.

They spoke on the phone every night, met up in the daytime once or twice. They even arranged a night out together. And then . . . nothing. Rodri had disappeared.

'I don't understand it,' Anna said. 'I just can't understand what his problem is.'

Now Anna is not a girl who is used to guys flaking on her. Quite the opposite. Usually they become obsessed and won't leave her alone, sending her flowers and chocolates and badly written poetry. But this guy, this Rodri, had the temerity not to fall in line. And as a result she was obsessing over him.

You might assume that Rodri pulled back out of embarrassment over his little erectile disfunction episode, but I don't think it was that. I think Rodri simply isn't that bothered about Anna. He has another girl, after all. Something else going on. His mind is already occupied. And predictably, Anna is drawn in as though by some powerful magic.

Soft Nexts

This illustrates something I've been thinking a lot about recently: the power of detachment. Basically, the more detached you can become from the women in your life, the more attractive you will be to them. Detachment is a subtle tool, harder to utilise than a blunt instrument such as a 'soft next', but if you get the hang of it then it will benefit both you and your relationship with your girl.

I have written before here about the power of the 'soft next'. This is where you withdraw your attention completely from a woman for whatever misdemeanor she has committed, typically between four and seven days.

Without any doubt, soft nexts work. Girls who are used to the validation you provide them with are shocked when it is removed. They feel withdrawal effects markedly, and worse, as you will not communicate with them they have no idea when, or if, the soft next will end.

This rallies them into action. You will start receiving texts, Facebook messages, calls and so on. And when you finally do see her again you are likely to end up having wild sex.

However, there are drawbacks. 'Soft nexts' are blunt instruments. They are obvious. Women know what you are doing. They may resent you for it. And your actions may well come back to bite you in ways you don't expect.

Detachment

Detachment is different. Detachment is not the sledgehammer blow that soft nexting is. Instead, it is a subtle removal of investment in her that is implied rather than explicit.

In order to properly detach from a women with whom, say, you have oneituis for, what you must do is first make the decision to detach. Spend some time writing about your relationship with her, about the ways in which her behaviour unsettles or annoys you. Then decide there and then that you are going to detach.

Another useful exercise recommended by Melody Beattie, the author of *Codependent No More (*amongst other books), is to write a list of those things you would and wouldn't be doing if you weren't spending your time and mental energy fretting about this girl and trying to control her.

Once you have your list then follow it: do the things you would be doing—perhaps working out more, working more on your business and so on—and stop the things you wouldn't be doing, like checking your phone every two minutes, looking at when she last logged into Facebook and so on. Physically writing the list down will really help you to maintain focus.

After that, detachment really comes down to the changed manner in which you handle the relationship. This gets increasingly more difficult if you are married or if you live together, although it is never impossible to detach. All you have to do is subtly place more importance on your life and what you are doing, and less on hers. Once you make this mindset shift then it will be reflected in every aspect of your demeanour and behaviour.

If you don't live together then it may be as simple as the way you message her. If you were previously in the habit of messaging one another every hour or so then you will cut that out for a start, as you will have other, more pressing things to do.

The content of your messages will also alter. Rather than questioning and cajoling, fishing for compliments and validation and otherwise trying to control her behaviour, instead you will instead take a far more neutral tone. Texts will be more functional. You won't ignore her or seek to shut her out, you will always remain polite, but the neediness that was evident beforehand will have dissipated. Your new mode of contact will be commensurate with what you are—a busy man with other or better things to do.

By making a conscious effort to detach mentally and emotionally from any girl you are seeing, particularly one who is causing you trouble, you will save yourself a hell of a lot of emotional pain and, counter-intuitively, make her hotter for you than she was before.

And remember, the 'ideal alpha'—if such a man really existed—would be the most detached in the world. Because when you have multiple options, and multiple sexual opportunities, then why would you ever get bent out of shape over one girl?

Want to find out how jerks and badboys get the hottest girls? Read Troy's latest book How To Be An Asshole

Read More: How Most Relationships End

Do Not Try To Help A Woman Who Is A Victim Of "Domestic Violence"

November 23, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Helping women who claim to be victims of "domestic violence" is one of the best ways to suck up your own time, not to mention inject unnecessary emotions and drama into your life. Most of the time, your attempts to help will not be met with gratitude and, in fact, will frequently garner hostility from the person you are trying to "save." Moreover, the target of your rescue mission generally doesn't want to be saved anyway.

There is no need for anger or bitterness when you wash yourself of a woman claiming domestic violence, as hard as suppressing those emotions may be. Like someone dependent on drugs, an obese person, or another kind of addict, plenty of women are addicted to the rush of either a violent man (who is part of a small minority of men) or the thrill and attention of claiming to be the victim of a violent man who isn't actually violent. Any logical, rational advice you give will invariably engender her opposition or inaction.

Particularly if a woman returns to her "abusive" boyfriend or husband after you have tried to save them, helping someone claiming domestic violence leads over and over again to unnecessary, sometimes aggressive or violent conflict with third parties. Even when this does not happen to the worst extent, you find yourself invested in an emotionally unstable woman, whether she causes the instability herself or not.

Most important of all, there is usually no evidence to support claims of domestic violence, bar the fickle testimonies of the couple. If you choose to help, you are almost certainly engaging in a wild goose chase with next to no merit. In today's climate, asking a woman to do the dishes is probably considered domestic violence.

My experiences

Does the helping hand really help? Most times it doesn't.

I learned fairly early on in adulthood that helping women "abused" by men is typically a fruitless exercise. For example, around the age of 19, I attempted to intervene in a situation where a female friend was being told, among other things, that she was worthless by her boyfriend at the time. At one stage, he even told her to kill herself. With zero sexual interest in the girl, I simply thought the guy's behavior was wrong.

Yet, rather than thanking me for my assistance, my advice to this girl was greeted with histrionics and ingratitude. It also attracted a series of threats from her boyfriend, none of which eventuated. I had brought myself into heated verbal exchanges with this guy, without it having any impact whatsoever on the girl. If anything, the whole saga solidified her feelings for him. Aside from maybe interjecting in the "kill yourself" part, I had wasted my time completely. Nevertheless, it was a great lesson to learn so young.

I came to realize that women like this ex-friend are positively attracted to men like him. No amount of investment in time or energy would deter what were emotional longings for Mr. Demeaning. Second-hand experiences I had before and after this situation suddenly began to make sense.

#WhyIStayed and other similar bullshit

> The internet exploded with questions about [Janay Rice] … why didn't she leave [Ray Rice]? Why did she marry him? Why did she stay? I can't speak for Janay Rice, but I can speak for Beverly Gooden. Why did I stay? … Leaving was a process, not an event. And sometimes it takes a while to navigate through the process. I believe in storytelling. I believe in the power of shared experience. I believe that we find strength in community. That is why I created this hashtag. I hope those tweeting using #WhyIStayed find a voice, find love, find compassion, and find hope."

> — #WhyIStayed “creator” Beverly Gooden promoting Beverly Gooden

Yes, because hope, rather than self-preservation, will save a woman who is a victim of actual domestic violence.

In addition to biological drives that impel women to stay with or seek out domineering sex partners, boyfriends, and husbands, good old feminist “storytelling” also motivates females in sticking by or returning to men that they claim hit them or, much more ambiguously, “mistreat” them. A whole cottage industry has developed to support the narrative that women can and should stay with supposedly abusive partners.

If we’re being brutally honest, #WhyIStayed and other feminist call signs keep swarms of feminist typists gainfully employed. They sustain the small rate of actual domestic violence so that these typists can continue to publish articles, despite them being highly exaggerated ones.

Of all the modern-day battles we could say are uphill because of perverse cultural conditioning, seeking to assist a woman who claims to be abused takes the cake. Realistically, what are your prospects of dissuading a woman from what is usually a self-determined, psychological, or biological course of action? If you say your chances are relatively high (whatever that means), is the expenditure of time and energy really worth it? The impact on your own life is likely to be much more than you anticipate.

An exception to the principle for sisters, female cousins, etc.

Doing more for family still makes sense, with limits.

There are some common sense exceptions to what I have been saying. If you or your family have more skin in the game and find one of your relatives in trouble, you obviously should try harder. Inasmuch as family units have been eviscerated in recent years, blood and similar ties still count for something nowadays.

Bear in mind, however, that many of the same limitations you have with female friends or acquaintances will apply in large part to your relatives. Maybe you will draw the biggest line when it comes to protecting your (future) daughter, but the rest of the time you are probably gnashing your teeth over sisters, cousins, or other female relatives who will just not listen to you (and who are in all likelihood gilding the lily about the level of mistreatment, too). If laying down the law doesn't work the first or second time, cut your losses and move on for the time being.

There may come a point when you need to involve police for the very small minority of cases that truly warrant it. That is your call. And, of course, I am not advocating against helping women when you know at the gut level that they need it. What I am saying is that you need to avoid being a martyr in circumstances where being a martyr, literally or figuratively, is against your own interests.

Remember, most women either don't want to be saved or are willing to cost you your state of mind and resources should you put yourself on the line for them.

Read More: Yet Another Survey Shows That LGBT Domestic Violence Rates Are The Same As Heterosexual Couples

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

10 Benefits Of Training Brazilian Jiu Jitsu

November 23, 2017 | by Ron Briggs | Link | Original Link

There are a number of legitimate combat sports to choose from and I understand that BJJ is not the holy grail of fighting. I think that there are many strong sports that can teach you similar lessons including wrestling, judo, boxing, Muay Thai, etc. With that said, BJJ is very good, my largest experience is with BJJ and so I chose to use that to share the following benefits of combat sports in general.

1. Humility

Your first three months to a year of training BJJ will be spent getting smashed. You will be submitted by all types of people: guys bigger and smaller than you, guys younger and older than you, “nerds” and maybe even the occasional female. This is natural and anyone who starts training any combat sport, especially Brazilian jiu jitsu, will go through this learning period.

I remember having my guard passed by a 100 pound female early in my training and it was extremely humbling. Before training jiu jitsu I had a tendency to judge people’s fighting ability by the way they looked; if you were bigger and stronger I assumed you were a better fighter. Now I understand that while strength certainly helps, people of all shapes and sizes must be equally respected.

2. Respect

Alongside humility you will gain an appreciation for high-level combat athletes. You will understand that there are people out there who can take your life using only their bare hands. The vast majority of people on earth have no idea how skilled a tiny percentage of society is at fighting. Joe Rogan talks about this topic in the following short video:

3. Discomfort

You will become more comfortable dealing with discomfort. Being hot and thirsty while dealing with the claustrophobia of having another person smother you is uncomfortable. Over time you will get better at keeping your composure and thinking your way out of a situations which leads to the next point.

4. Problem solving

Jiu jitsu is problem solving. Joe Rogan calls fighting “problem solving with severe consequences”. While jiu jitsu is not fighting as there is no striking, it certainly does involve problem solving. You have to think your way out of and into a variety of different positions. As you improve your game and gain more experience these thoughts become reactions. Nonetheless problem solving will always be a part of jiu jitsu as you encounter different opponents who play different styles and unique games that you must deal with.

5. Discipline

It takes discipline to train BJJ consistently especially early on while you’re spending the majority of your time as the nail rather than the hammer. While jiu jitsu is enjoyable to learn, there will be days when you don’t feel like training, are tired or busy. These will be the days that you must have the discipline to stick to your routine and push through to train.

6. Technique

If there is technique involved in something as physical as grappling then there must be technique involved in all things. This was a great lesson I learned early on while training. I ignorantly thought that strength and size were the most important factors when grappling but BJJ taught me that good technique wins in most situations. My mindset when doing any activity now is “what’s the most efficient way to do this that will require the least amount of energy?” While this may sound like common sense, BJJ helped reinforce this concept of efficiency in other activities.

7. Improvement

Alongside technique I learned that all aspects of our lives are improvable. Again this may seem very basic but if you can improve at fighting by consistently training then that rule must apply to all other areas of life. The improvements you make in your first few years of consistent training are astonishing and this practice can be transferred over to other areas of life.

8. Confidence

After getting humbled for a period of time you begin to improve considerably. With this improvement comes a confidence in your ability to handle yourself in different situations. I'm not saying that BJJ is the be-all and end-all of fighting, far from it, but I do believe learning to grapple makes for a great base. With this base comes confidence.

This does not mean I walk around looking for a fight, quite the opposite. I'm much less likely to fight anyone today than I was a decade ago for a variety of reasons.

- I understand what getting smashed in a controlled environment feels like and I don't want to experience it in an uncontrolled environment, nor do I want someone else to experience this.
- I don't have the need to prove myself physically to anybody else. I'm content and confident in my improving physical abilities.
- Fighting in a gym and fighting in the streets are two very different things. As my first instructor once said, "if he has a knife or he has a gun or he picks you up and drops you on your head.. now you're a dead black belt".

9. Learning what you do and do not control

Entering tournaments can cause anxiety for competitors and this, like anything uncomfortable, can be a great learning experience. You control your training, your effort and your attitude. You do not control your opponent, the referee or fortune. This applies to many areas of life where we must understand what we do and do not control. You learn to do your best with what you control and let fortune have her say.

On a related note, I once entered a tournament at the lightest weight class that I had fought in. I was strong, well-conditioned and as technical as I had ever been. Nevertheless, I came across my toughest opponent to date (the eventual division winner) in the first round and I was dominated. Fortune has her say in all matters, some things in life we don't control.

10. Composure in competition

Alongside what you do and do not control, competition teaches you what you can and cannot accept. Getting beat by a physically better opponent is acceptable, quitting while you're getting dominated in a match or training is not. Failure in life is natural but allowing that to keep you down or to affect your next move should not be tolerated.

Lastly, I would like to note that if you're not committed to training BJJ and don't make time for it then you will not stick with it. It is challenging to train consistently and you have to be mentally determined to do it. Some academies offer beginner classes and these can be helpful to avoid being thrown to the wolves too soon. Either way, sooner or later, you must understand that you will be the nail. You have to remember there will always be someone better than you, even as you progress. If you have the commitment and can accept these factors then BJJ, or another combat sport, can make for a great teacher in your life.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why It's Important To Have A Training Partner

Ron Briggs
Ron Briggs enjoys the process of developing his character, mind and body.

Mother And Daughter Reunite, Get Married

November 23, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Marriage between close relatives has been a taboo going back to the very beginning. The most notable instance is also one of the oldest: Oedipus Rex, the original motherfucker. In the Sophocles tragedy, he was a foundling raised by a shepherd, so he didn't know what he was doing when he killed his father and married his mother. Later, he puts the pieces together about his past. In the aftermath, his wife/mom and children die in a murder/suicide, and he blinds himself in shame. One of the play's minor themes is the red pill axiom that the truth hurts.

That was mythology. However, there have been real cases of close relatives marrying, and willfully. One of them surfaced in the news again lately.

Paging Dr. Freud

Like this, except Leia/Amidala

As the story goes, in March 2016, Patricia Spann (née Clayton), then 41 (other sources say 43), applied for a marriage license in Comanche County, Oklahoma. Misty Velvet Dawn Spann, her 25 year old bride, also is her daughter. However, in August, someone at the Department of Human Services put the pieces together about their past.

> The investigator tells KSWO that Misty and her brothers were raised by a grandparent after Patricia lost custody of them. Patricia allegedly told the investigator that she didn't believe she was breaking the law because she wasn't listed on Misty's birth certificate.
>
> Patricia also told DHS that the two hit it off after reuniting two years ago.

So putting all this together, she was a teenager when she had her daughter. Later on—for unspecified reasons—she lost custody of her girl and her two boys. The grandparent raised them from a young age into adulthood. After their mother finally came back into the picture, she married her own daughter, figuring it was okay since she wasn't on the birth certificate. It's not clear how a mother's name doesn't get on a child's birth certificate, but surely there's a story in it.

This month, the daughter entered a guilty plea for incest, receiving a sentence of ten years of deferred adjudication. That's legalese for "You better not do that again, or you're in real trouble!" As for the mother, she plead not guilty, and the trial resumes in January. Will Misty still get marital immunity if she doesn't want to testify in her wife/mom's trial, or will that be disallowed because it was an illegal marriage? I'll have to let greater legal minds than mine ponder that one.

But wait! There's more!

"I told you so! Now do you guys believe me?"

Understandably, the locals weren't very impressed:

> "Who in their right mind would marry their mom?" Paige Watson who knew Misty from high school, said.
>
> "More stuff happens in small towns than people know," Watson said. "When I went to school with her, she had a girlfriend, and they both worked at Sonic."
>
> […]
>
> "I don't know if incarceration is really going to teach them anything… but there should be some sort of punishment or deterrent," neighbor Nathan Mansell said.

If all that wasn't enough, it turns out that before all this, she married one of her sons in 2008, and got an annulment in 2010. As for the other son, he wasn't too impressed:

> "I think she's worthless she put my sister into this. She forced my sister into this, there's a lot of people that know it," Cody Spann told the local news station. "For you to want to put your own daughter through this, what kind of person are you? If that's what you want that's on you, but none of us kids want that, and now you got my sister behind bars because of your choices, why don't you let that sit on you as a mom."
>
> Patricia reportedly told investigators that the relationship with her son was not sexual and that she only married him to prevent him from being deployed with the military.
>
> She also told investigators that she married her daughter in hopes of adopting a child, KSWO reports.

So a soldier doesn't get deployed if he's married? That's a new one on me. Further, if she wanted to adopt a kid, why did she have to marry someone who already was her kid? (Well, given her track record, she doesn't need more children, but yanno…) Finally, what exactly did she mean when she said she “hit it off” with her daughter? Was that just in a friendly way, or did Misty break up with that chick at Sonic?

Now I get political (you knew I would)

Interesting things can happen if five of them get together and play word games.

This has the potential to do more than inspire a new batch of Oklahoma jokes. This, or another case like it, could get pushed up the judicial food chain and become another one of those “landmark decisions”. All that’s needed is some legal advocacy group turning it into a civil rights crusade.

When a law is challenged in judicial review, the state’s attorney must play defense and argue for why the law makes sense. (The fact that the law was enacted by a legislature elected by the people—which is how representative democracy works—isn’t justification enough.) If the argumentation doesn’t suit the Court’s political feelings, the law is struck down. That’s why judge shopping has been such an effective wrecking strategy.

If someone were asked to explain why parents shouldn’t marry their own children, it likely would be:

- Incest is condemned by society here and around the world;
- It’s forbidden by the Bible and by religions everywhere;
- Everyone knows it’s revolting; and
- It increases the risk of birth defects.

An attorney arguing why laws forbidding incest are unconstitutional (=”I don’t like them”) would glibly dismiss all that. The ignorant prejudices of society are oppressive. Further, we can’t have establishment of religion, now can we? Also, mere public opinion shouldn’t limit someone else’s personal freedom.

Then the lawyer would have a field day with the final item. First, mutant babies are only a concern for straight marriages. That’s because two women or two men can’t have children together (though some believe otherwise). Further, unlike in the evil past, the mentally retarded are allowed to have children, even though that’s high risk too. (In fact, some activists even encourage this, a subject worthy of its own discussion.) In the case of an incestuous straight marriage, they simply could use birth control—or not, because that's their personal choice. That's "reproductive freedom", isn't it? Yada yada yada…

The legal precedents are there

Could it happen? During the great gay marriage debate, cultural conservatives warned that acquiescence would open the door to further "anything goes" redefinitions. As usual, the matter was settled by lawyering it up all the way to the Supreme Court. In 2014, the Obergefell v. Hodges case became another one of those 5-4 decisions that rewrote the law the liberal way in all fifty states. Anthony Kennedy (backed by Kagan, Breyer, Sotomayor, and Ginsburg) legislated from the bench, referencing the 14th Amendment's equal protection clause, along with Loving v. Virgina and a couple other cases that somehow had even less relevance.

It's the typical legalistic casuistry. The equal protection clause was a Reconstruction-era measure meant to ensure that local sheriffs wouldn't disregard crimes committed against freed slaves. The Loving case said that race mixing is a right guaranteed by the Constitution. These said nothing about gay marriage. Still, that blew the doors open for Obergefell, which will be the launching pad for any future redefining.

Since Earl Warren's time, the Supreme Court repeatedly has exceeded its authority. Once again, the Court's majority overrode a legitimate matter of state law, delivered a politically-motivated decision, and came up with legal-sounding pilpul to justify it. Could incest be the next legal frontier? I hope that no further redefining takes place, but anything can happen these days.

Read More: Coming Soon To A Society Near You: Polygamy And Incest

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

LaVar Ball Is Ungrateful That Donald Trump Got His Son Out Of A Chinese Jail

November 24, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

While staying in Hangzhou for the UCLA basketball team's tour in China, three freshmen—LiAngelo Ball, Cody Riley and Jalen Hill—visited the Louis Vuitton store next to their hotel and are said to have pilfered some sunglasses. On November 7, they were arrested for shoplifting. Then they got bailed out the next morning. They continued to stay at the hotel along with a UCLA representative, but missed the following game and didn't return home with the team.

What happened

This hotel chain is designed to suck, but they didn't see much of it.

As ESPN reports:

> A source with firsthand knowledge of the investigation said the players could be in Hangzhou for "a week or two." The source noted that there is surveillance footage of the players shoplifting from three stores inside of a high-end shopping center, which houses Louis Vuitton, Gucci, Yves Saint Laurent and Salvatore Ferragamo stores.
>
> Bruins coach Steve Alford declined to discuss the matter after the team's win.
>
> Los Angeles Lakers rookie Lonzo Ball — LiAngelo's brother — on Saturday said his father LaVar called him Friday night and told him the family is staying in China with LiAngelo and that "we are handling it out here, so that's a good sign."
>
> Hangzhou police arrived early Tuesday morning at the Hyatt Regency, where UCLA and Georgia Tech were staying ahead of their game, and questioned three players from each team. Team representatives and interpreters were with the players during that time, according to a source.
>
> Afterward, LiAngelo Ball, Riley and Hill were taken to the police station in Hangzhou, where they were kept for a number of hours. UCLA representatives, including Alford, were at the police station along with the players.
>
> […]
>
> LaVar Ball, and LiAngelo's brother LaMelo Ball, who have been in China, visited LiAngelo on Thursday. UCLA athletic director Dan Guerrero visited all three players Friday.

So all told, it's a smaller-scale version of the 1997 incident where several members of TSU's Ocean of Soul marching band helped themselves to $22K of consumer electronics in Tokyo. Once more, some college students touring in Asia got busted for shoplifting, causing a minor international incident, and unfortunately gave the locals a bad impression of Americans. This time, the case resulted in arrests, and the President interceded on their behalf.

The aftermath

As Reuters reports:

> The three players — LiAngelo Ball, Cody Riley and Jalen Hill — remain suspended from the University of California, Los Angeles, basketball team indefinitely, coach Steve Alford told a news conference.
>
> All three apologized and thanked Trump for helping secure their release by raising the issue with Chinese President Xi Jinping during his visit, in their first public comments since being detained.
>
> […]
>
> UCLA Athletic Director Dan Guerrero said the students were released by the Chinese police after paying $2,200 bail.
>
> Guerrero said that White House Chief of Staff John Kelly called the students over the weekend to assure them that the government was working on their release. After the players' release, Chinese Foreign Ministry officials said the case had been resolved according to law.

All told, being collegiate athletes—and thus minor celebrities, because sportsball is basically a religion—means they got more than the common citizen's ration of perks. They were accompanied every step of the way by a school representative, and LiAngelo was in contact with his family. Cash was available to bail them out, so they didn't have to stay in pretrial detention. In China, that can last up to a month, or considerably more if authorities aren't following procedure. Rather than being prosecuted, these ones got off with a public apology. Chinese prison certainly is no walk in the park.

Finally, the Presidency seldom gets involved on behalf of those who get in hot water over petty crime. The State Department does try to look out for Americans overseas, but realistically, most tourists can expect to get punished by the standards of the country they're visiting if they get themselves in trouble. These kids fared much better than ordinary students who flout local laws while abroad. Hopefully it was an eye-opening experience and they've learned their lesson. If so, then they won't end up like all too many spoiled athletes.

The reaction

Per Fox News:

> "I would like to thank President Trump and the United States government for the help that they've provided as well," LiAngelo Ball said in a press conference on Wednesday.
>
> "To President Trump and the United States government, thank you for taking the > time to intervene on our behalf," another player, Cody Riley, said. "We really appreciate you helping us out."

>
> "Thank you to the United States government and President Trump for your efforts to bring us home," the third player, Jalen Hill, said.
>
> But earlier in the day, Trump was apparently hearing crickets from the trio and asked where was the gratitude.
>
> "Do you think the three UCLA Basketball Players will say thank you President Trump? They were headed for 10 years in jail!" the president tweeted.

In contrast to the belated expressions of gratitiude, LiAngelo's father wasn't too impressed. Again per ESPN:

> "Who?" LaVar Ball told ESPN on Friday, when asked about Trump's involvement in the matter. "What was he over there for? Don't tell me nothing. Everybody wants to make it seem like he helped me out."
>
> […]
>
> "As long as my boy's back here, I'm fine," LaVar Ball told ESPN. "I'm happy with how things were handled. A lot of people like to say a lot of things that they thought happened over there. Like I told him, 'They try to make a big deal out of nothing sometimes.' I'm from L.A. I've seen a lot worse things happen than a guy taking some glasses. My son has built up enough character that one bad decision doesn't define him. Now if you can go back and say when he was 12 years old he was shoplifting and stealing cars and going wild, then that's a different thing.
>
> "Everybody gets stuck on the negativity of some things and they get stuck on them too long. That's not me. I handle what's going on and then we go from there."

Personally interceding with the President of China was no big deal? Really?

Spending years of their prime locked up in a developing country would've been a life-changing event for the students. Chinese prison involves slave labor and meager rations, and ten years might indeed have been on the table for theft. (That's not too bad by Chinese standards; egregious thefts or repeat offenses can get the death penalty, and the prisoner's organs may be harvested.) Quite likely, that would've derailed their athletic careers, in which case LiAngelo following his brother Lonzo's footsteps into the NBA would be impossible.

Trump fires back

This is someone who doesn’t suffer fools gladly.

The Donald wasn’t amused by the father’s display of ingratitude, making him wish he’d let them twist in the wind:

> Now that the three basketball players are out of China and saved from years in jail, LaVar Ball, the father of LiAngelo, is unaccepting of what I did for his son and that shoplifting is no big deal. I should have left them in jail!

If this took place a year ago and Obama had been the one to arrange their release following the dumb stunt, perhaps the reaction would’ve been different. LaVar’s show of disrespect demonstrates the proverb that no good deed goes unpunished.

Read More: Stop Watching Sports

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Meet Anne Lauvergeon, A French Executive Who Managed To Lose More Than 10 Billion Dollars

November 24, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

North America has more than its fair share of pampered, constantly helped, media-touted, yet ultimately flawed and even nefarious female power figures. Beyond the classical Hitlery, whose addiction to public attention prevents her from hiding with her millions, ROK readers have already heard about Sherryl Sandberg—an overpaid top executive whose main activity consists in poisoning culture and writing self-serving books—or Elizabeth Holmes—whose hyped-up company consistently lied to the public before losing $4.5 billion. Well, there are more. Many more.

For example, Anne Lauvergeon. Few North American readers will be familiar with her name, although she benefited enough from globalism to be touted by Newsweek, Forbes and the like as one of these "powerful women" the girl next door should try to emulate.

Born in 1959, this French boomer was part of a rare breed: females who are actually good at math. After long studies, she managed to succeed at a difficult competitive examination, the agrégation of physics—something much easier then than now, as only a few Frenchmen wanted become to public officials at that time of exceptional growth, yet still deserving.

Then those in power put a motor on her back.

Wow, just wow. So cool!

After only two years as a trainee in steel and nuclear industry, she received the job of chief manager at the Inspection générale des carrières. This administration is in charge, among others, of the disaffected stone quarries under Paris, better known under the name of catacombes. Anne Lauvergeon headed the IGC from 1985 to 1988. Strangely, the media always ignore it, but several elder cataphiles spoke about her policies.

In a nutshell, as soon as she was handed down the decision-maker title, she considered the catacombes as her domain and enforced a repressive policy against those going there without a permit. Hundreds of entrances were welded. Some disappeared under several meters of thick reinforced concrete. Building block walls were erected inside the network to split it. Places were filled with concrete.

Lauvergeon's ultimate aim was injecting the whole subterranean network in the name of safety and modernity. Had this happened, one of the most interesting remnants of Parisian history, and one of the more or less freer places in the city, filled with beautiful architectural artworks, would have been buried under ugly cement. Fortunately, this project was cancelled, mostly because of its unbearable cost.

Today, the catacombes are suffering from an excess of humidity because of Lauvergeon's frenzy to add waterproof concrete—which has been preventing regular dewatering since. I started going there in 2007. Last time I dipped in the galleries, in 2016, I was struck by the ever-increasing water level on the floor. Not only does it make subterranean wandering more difficult, it makes the ground flaky and is dangerous for buildings above. Who cares, right? It was public policy. The one(s) in power had no skin in the game, no personal liability.

Despite her useless and even nefarious spendings, Anne Lauvergeon was handed a dreamy job on a silver platter two years after she left the Inspection. Namely, she became one of President François Mitterand's two top advisers—the other one being arch-globalist Jacques Attali. Hard to satisfy female hypergamy more than this. For five years she sat literally next to the President's door, thus meeting with almost everyone he received and following him during his official trips. Her man-jaws, luxurious clothes, and relative youth allowed her to parade remorselessly.

At the time, the political world was still predominantly masculine, although filled with pussies idolizing "progress" and "modernity": both factors contributed much to her career.

When President Mitterrand died in 1995, Lauvergeon immediately bounced to other high-profile, well-paid positions. Indeed, she respectively sat at the board of directors of the powerful investment bank Lazard Brothers and at the top telecom company Alcatel while the globalist network French-American Foundation, a kind of smaller Bilderberg, also hired her.

This is what a victim of the patriarchy looks like

In 1999, the not yet infamous Dominique Strauss-Kahn had her appointed president of the State-owned company Cogema. This company, whose function is the extraction and refinement of uranium, had been existing for more than 25 years and had more than ten thousand employees. But this was not enough for Anne Lauvergeon.

Before the ink on her nomination contract could dry, she started plotting so that Cogema could buy out Framatome, the other main French nuclear company. “Why should we have two rival companies when a single one could be the banner of the French nuclear industry worldwide?”

Of course the argument was sheer hamstering: Lauvergeon had a taste for mammoth projects paid with other people’s money. For their part, the Framatome employees opposed the merging. They knew very well many of them would be fired were their company to be assimilated. Their efforts were fruitless: Lauvergeon received the money she was chomping at, Framatome disappeared, and on the ashes of Cogema came Areva, a giant state enterprise. To be led by Lauvergeon, of course.

Areva was worth billions. Not that Lauvergeon had actually created anything yet. She had just been able to buy out the result of decades of other people’s work with taxpayers’ money and the result was handed down to her. Bursting with ego, ambition and an insane trust in her lesser-known employee cubicle monkeys personal abilities, she claimed Areva would become the world-class leader in nuclear engineering. Nothing less.

The first big deal appeared soon. In Ukraine, the radioactive remnants of Chernobyl kept irradiating the region, and the Ukrainian government was looking for someone who could build a containment facility around the former power plant. Lauvergeon jumped in, got the deal, bought containment technology—couldn't Areva's big R&D department actually make one?—and ordered to start construction.

However, it soon appeared that the facility was being built along a non-functioning structure. Containment cylinders were too small. Parts supposed to maintain a perfect sealing failed to do so. The Areva engineers argued they didn't have time to master the newly bought technology before they were tasked with building this facility.

Lauvergeon had promised the Ukrainians Areva would deliver in five years. After seven years of continuous problems, Ukraine managed to have the contract terminated. Areva was sentenced to pay 45 million euros as legal compensation.

Chernobyl should have been the company's—and Lauvergeon's—first glory. It was the first major blunder instead. Others were still to come.

In 2003, Lauvergeon succeeded at selling a “new generation” nuclear reactor to a Finnish private group. She mostly secured the deal through aggressive selling strategies: her reactor would only cost 3 billion euros, she said, a rather modest price for one of the most gigantic, state-of-the-art nuclear facilities ever, and it would be finished in three and a half years. Yes! You’ll see!

Inside Areva, everyone knew the selling price wouldn’t cover the costs. Doesn’t matter, Lauvergeon said, because this reactor will be a tremendous success, other countries will buy it and allow Areva to cash in. Guess what happened next?

Lauvergeon tried to have everything built by “her” company by keeping outsourcing to a minimum. A problematic choice, as Areva’s expertise lied in engineering, not architecture. After a year, it became all too clear that Areva could never make it alone. Lauvergeon had to reach another company to entrust with the building of the concrete structure. Alas, the newcomers did not improve the situation either.

The power plant was supposed to be finished in 2009. Today, in 2017, it is still under construction and should be finished with at least a ten-year delay. Areva had to pour 9 billion euros because of constant backlogs and could be sentenced to pay compensation to the Finnish—who are forced to import their energy at a substantial cost.

Despite this abject failure, Anne Lauvergeon kept touring countries to sell other nuclear reactors of the same type. An ex-Areva employee commented on the matter:

> By signing this contract, she proved that she had no idea of what the company could actually do. To us, she was far from an industry leader… yet she had ferocious management methods. After a while, the directors had stopped sharing realistic assessments to her. When you're around such people, the only thing you can say is 'yes.'

An ex-Areva director made the same point:

> To my knowledge she has never been a practising engineer. She's rather a scientist by training. When she entered professional life, she was placed directly near the President, where I doubt she was in charge of plumbing or repairing taps. She was not an engineer but a politician.

In 2007, mostly on her advice, Areva bought a Canadian uranium mining company for $2 billion dollars. Curiously, the company's geologists were blocked from inspecting the mines before the deal was sealed, and afterwards it appeared that none of the purported uranium ore deposits could be exploited. Today, not one ounce of uranium was unearthed.

In a single decade, Anne Lauvergeon managed to drive the monster company she had ordered to the ground. In 2007, an Areva share was worth 82 euros. In 2012 the price hovered around 20 euros. In 2017 it reached an all-time low of 4.50 euros—and now Areva has officially left the stock exchange so that it can be bailed out. Specialists believe Lauvergeon caused the loss of 10 to 15 billion euros. I'm glad I have been investing in BitCoin instead of following my banker's advice ("it's a State-owned company, it's safe!").

To add insult to injury, she also claimed in 2009 that, at equal ability, Areva would "not hire the white male." Her nefarious choices caused millions of workers of both sexes to pay for Areva's bailout, while thousands of Areva mostly male, blue-collar employees lost their jobs.

Lauvergeon has been indicted for massaging her numbers and disseminating false information. Her husband Olivier Fric, whose family name means "cash" in French slang (couldn't make this up) is being charged for various Areva-related insider trading operations.

In spite of all this, Anne Lauvergeon was always let off the hook. Zero liability. After President Sarkozy at least fired her from Areva, when the company balance was already deep in the red, a Rothschild gave her a cushy place at the supervisory board of the left-leaning newspaper Libération (the Parisian version of the Guardian).

In 2012, just like Sherryl Sandberg, she published a narcissistic book where she painted herself as a courageous outsider and blamed various men for everything she had done. Since then she has also been sitting at various boards of directors, including the one of EADS, mostly known for owning the airplane manufacturer Airbus.

See? No problem!

Arrogance, a boundless appetite for pharaonic projects, self-complacency, hamstering, plus a complete lack of remorse, empathy or sense of responsibility are the main traits of what could be dubbed the Lauvergeon syndrome. The only things she managed to do right were political maneuvering and selling. And the same media who complacently touted her as a modern, progressive face, have conveniently forgot about her when the result of her choices became all too apparent.

From the 1980s onwards, this career womyn never learned a thing, constantly avoided to pay for any of her decisions—which are, by now, a social burden—and keeps strutting around with her undeserved millions. Some karma is long overdue here. Neither justice nor responsibility go well with grrl power.

Read Next: The Biggest Startup Failure Of The Decade Was Caused By A Woman

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

4 Steps We Must Take To Fix Society

November 24, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

In the manosphere and right wing circles, there is strong agreement that society as it is currently situated is unhealthy. Conservatives believe that the fix is easy—the answer is just less government spending. But we know that the problems run much deeper than that. Do we have the courage to make the following necessary changes?

1. Roll back feminism

Almost no one is happy with male/female relations in the modern world. Men are unhappy because it is so difficult to find a wife who has not spent her twenties riding the carousel and the ease with which they can be divorce-raped. Women are unhappy that it is difficult to find men who will commit to marriage when premarital sex is so abundant. And, although few will admit it, most women would prefer to be full time mothers than wage slaves chained to a cubicle.

These ills have been brought on by feminism. Feminism pushes women to seek to be equal to men in every way. From a young age, girls are taught to equate serving a corporation with freedom, and motherhood as slavery. Corporations encourage this because it doubles the workforce, thus lowering the wages that they have to pay. Girls are also taught that restricting themselves to one man within marriage is disempowering. Instead they are encouraged by feminism to be promiscuous for as long as possible before agreeing to marry a beta male.

Feminism didn't start with bad intentions. The first feminists came about during the industrial revolution that drew men to leave the countryside to work in the cities. While the men were separated from their wives, many of them spent their money on drinking and prostitutes. The first wave feminists arose to defend the women and children who those men were not providing for.

But despite the initial good intentions, feminism morphed into the man-hating beast that we see today. It is not possible to reset feminism back to its relatively benign 1800s version without it again evolving into a force that eventually destroys society. If we really want a healthy society, we are going to have to say goodbye to feminism altogether.

2. Re-establish morality

The dissolution of morality has been a great boon for men in this sense—it is now much easier to have sex than it ever was. A man with half-way decent looks and a modicum of game can go to a club and pull a six or a seven with little effort. One can spend his 20s taking full advantage of all those feminist girls who are trying to be equal to men in the promiscuity department.

The downside is that once a man decides that he wants to start a family, he is going to have trouble finding a suitable girl to marry. Despite our indoctrination, no man wants to wife up a woman who has served as a cum dumpster for half of the city.

The only way to fix this problem is to re-establish sexual morality for both men and women. That is, most men and women should approach marriage as virgins. This was the norm in the past and it is the only way to ensure that our sons and daughters do not end up getting destroyed in the same immoral culture that is destroying us.

3. Restrict voting

Athenian democracy limited the vote to only the best in society

The founding fathers of the United States were afraid of tyranny, whether it was a result of an monarch or democracy. To protect against monarchical tyranny, they vested power in three different branches of government and limited the power of each. To protect against the abuses of democracy, they had previously restricted voting to land-owning men only. Later they extended the franchise to all free men but put in place checks to ensure the masses did not have full authority. In the original system, the president, vice-president, and senators were not elected by the popular vote.

For some reason, the commonsense of the founding fathers has been discarded. We now believe that expanding the voting franchise is an unmitigated good. In reality, expanding the franchise has led to the expansion of the government and liberal social programs.

If we hope for a return to small government, we'll have to limit the voting franchise. The best way of doing this may be to return to the founders' original conception of restricting it to land-owning males. That is, we need limit the vote to only those men who have skin in the game in the present and future of the country.

4. Criminalizing porn

Producing and selling pornography used to be a criminal offense under obscenity laws, many of which are still on the books but no longer enforced. The video I provide above provides some background as to why degeneracy became accepted. Regardless of how we got here, pornography addiction has become a plague upon our society. I know men whose addictions cause them to spend everything they earn on porn. Even men who don't have such extreme addictions still waste valuable time and energy on a false image.

Porn presents a false conception of what real sex is like. Many men are such heavy users of porn that they become impotent—they are able to "get it up" to masturbate to porn but unable to perform with a real woman.

Conclusion

These are just a few measures we'll have to undertake to restore a healthy, patriarchal order in society. Of course, there are no shortage of voices that tell us that it restoring society by "turning back the clock" is impossible, but as G.K. Chesterton pointed out, they are wrong:

> There is one metaphor of which the moderns are very fond; they are always saying, "You can't put the clock back." The simple and obvious answer is "You can." A clock, being a piece of human construction, can be restored by the human finger to any figure or hour. In the same way society, being a piece of human construction, can be reconstructed upon any plan that has ever existed.

We are not yet in a position to restore society but there is nothing stopping us from implementing some of these changes, such as stopping pornography use, in our own lives.

Read More: Softcore Pornography Has Become Completely Normalized In Western Society

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Women Should Give Bountiful Thanks To The Manosphere

November 26, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The real point of the Thanksgiving tradition isn't actually about stuffing ourselves to bursting with turkey and high-carb cheat food. As the name implies, it's really about counting our blessings. The Manosphere gets bad press sometimes, mainly because crabby feminists don't like men discussing our interests and concerns. Actually, women indirectly have several benefits from our efforts. Here's why.

Women like good game

Ladies do appreciate attention from guys they like. However, lame approaches are a big turn-off. Coming on too strong is bad—"Hey, baby, how about it?" and the like. Not showing enough interest is bad—such as beating around the brush too much when she likes him but is frustrated because he never gets to the point. Bad execution doesn't work—"Um, hi, I think you're cute. You're not, like, too busy to talk or anything?"

Also, it's certainly unproductive to stand around like a dork and cast furtive glances, fearing to make an introduction. Men are socially expected to make the first move, but it takes guts to open a conversation, especially in today's climate. Women don't understand this, since Approach Anxiety just isn't part of their experience. Further, doing it right requires skill. That can make all the difference between crashing and burning versus the beginning of a mutually rewarding relationship. The manosphere is here to help with both items.

People have natural desires, and it doesn't take an evolutionary biologist to understand why. However, nobody is born knowing how to be cool and smooth. Unfortunately, many guys have terrible game. There are reasons: inexperience, lack of positive male role models, bad examples from Hollywood, and so forth. Some guys really do need even the basics described in detail. Conventional dating advice is old-fashioned and largely ineffective as a guide. The rules of the game changed—the manosphere didn't cause this, but we tell it like it is and explain what actually does work.

Despite common misconceptions, game isn't magic tricks or mind control. We're increasing women's dating pool of desirable guys, providing more men who are socially calibrated and clued into what they actually want. (That's not always what women say they want, or even particularly intuitive.) Let's face it—nobody learns be successful with women by watching chick flicks or the Oprah channel. So the manosphere providing information about what actually works in today's dating scene is a win-win for everyone.

We encourage women to look better

Not quite my type, I'm afraid

Today's high-tech convenience and cheap, low-quality food has led to a modern obesity epidemic. By conventional standards, this is not attractive. The feminist solution is to say these standards are wrong, promoting fat acceptance on behalf of women. This doesn't work because people just like what they like. The pickup artist David Deangelo was really onto something with his slogan "Attraction isn't a choice." That one works both ways.

So women who buy into fat acceptance often end up lonely. Yes, that's because guys are shallow, just as women are shallow when they don't like short men. Luckily for them, getting slimmer is easier than getting taller! Actually, some guys do appreciate big gals. (I'm okay with that up to a certain point.) However, the most appreciative (chubby chasers) sometimes get criticized for "objectification" or "fetishism" or whatever. What the hell do these feminists want, anyway?

Our words can be harsh, but we're telling the truth about what else guys really like. Long hair in natural colors is better than lawn mower haircuts and strange colors. Looking like a troll doll isn't sexy. Men usually prefer natural skin rather than being tatted up like a sailor. Weird body modifications disrespect the human form. If women take heed, they'll do better themselves in the dating arena.

We encourage men to look better

Needs a gym membership and a few fashion tips

Although feminists try to tell guys what we should prefer, they certainly aren't urging women to give fat men a chance. Further, although chubby chasers are a niche market among men, that's basically nonexistent among women. Despite the lack of reciprocity, we understand that people just like what they like. Women appreciate guys who are in shape, and we're giving them more.

We in the manosphere also are telling guys the painful truth. For us to get ahead in the dating game, we should try to look our best. We also explain how this is done. Every man who takes action and transforms his physique increases the desirable dating pool for women.

As a collateral benefit, this also promotes good health. Everyone who heeds our advice—men or women—adds years to his or her life expectancy. We all can be thankful about that, right?

We want healthy families

We need a lot more of this

The traditional nuclear family model involves a husband and wife and usually two or perhaps more children. Preferably they build their family in young adulthood. Then they stay together for the long haul and don't cheat on each other. The husband is the breadwinner, and the wife also might work if the kids are in school. Unfortunately, what was once normal and basically expected is no longer so.

The impact on family life is one of the worst results of the sexual revolution. Tradition became unfashionable with the "Me Generation", giving way to personal whims and poor foresight. Easy divorce was another nail in the coffin. The rate of marriage has dropped to about half of what it once was—the cost/benefit analysis doesn't look so good to men these days. Last but not least, feminists started spreading propaganda that the nuclear family is oppressive. Unfortunately, doing it their way made things much worse.

Single motherhood is no walk in the park, and is a drain on the welfare system. It makes it difficult for the children too, statistically leading to worse outcomes. A string of boyfriends in Mom's life isn't the same as having the father around. Waiting until middle age before trying to have children means reduced fertility and declining populations. Worse, childlessness leads to much grief; in the end, filing TPS reports isn't as important as having a family. Abortion is emotionally damaging for the mother, and the kid has a lousy day too.

I haven't even begun naming several other reasons why throwing out tradition was bad, but liberals—and especially feminists—are okay with all that. We in the manosphere disagree. We want strong, happy, stable families again. This is by far the best for individuals—especially the children—and for society. Many of today's generation—both women and men—grew up in difficult circumstances from all the disorder. We want something better for the youth of the future.

We want good relations between the sexes

A nation where the sexes get along together is natural and normal. Unfortunately, the radical feminists sought to drive a wedge between us to further their political goals, and they're still at it. Most people believe their propaganda about only wanting equal rights. Therefore, they don't understand the true goals of feminism and their lack of character, or how extreme it gets. This really has soured the social environment, and that's good for nobody.

This is why the manosphere refutes toxic radical feminist rhetoric and tells the truth about who they really are. Only when the job is done—which might be a while—can things settle back down to normality.

Read More: An Open Letter To Women Who Still Believe In Feminism

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Would You Marry The Indian Winner Of Miss World 2017?

November 26, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Economic Times:

India's Manushi Chhillar today won the coveted Miss World 2017 crown at a grand event in China, bringing to an end the country's dry spell of 17 years at the top pageant contest.

The 20-year-old from Haryana, who is a medical student, edged out top five contestants from England, France, Kenya and Mexico.

Chhillar was presented the crown by Stephanie Del Valle, the last year's Miss World winner from Puerto Rico at the event in Sanya City Arena in China which was televised live globally.

The announcement about Chhillar winning the Miss World crown was also made on the pageant's official Twitter handle as well as on its Facebook page.

"The winner of Miss World 2017 is Miss India Manushi Chhillar," the tweet said.

The first and the second runners-up were Miss England Stephanie Hill and Miss Mexico

Andrea Meza.

In the top five round, Chhillar was asked which profession according to her deserved the highest salary.

“I think a mother deserves the highest respect and when you talk about salary it’s not always about cash but I feel it’s the love and respect that you give to someone. My mother has always been the biggest inspiration in my life.

“All mothers sacrifice so much for their kids. So, I think it is the job of a mother that deserves the highest salary,” Chhillar said to a wide-applause.

Contestants in the Miss India pageant are exceedingly light-skinned Chhillar is the sixth Indian to win the coveted crown, which was first won by Reita Faria back in 1966.

Aishwarya Rai had bagged the title in 1994, followed by Diana Haydon in 1997, Yukta Mookhey in 1999 and Priyanka Chopra in 2000, the last for India.

According to Chhillar’s profile on the Miss World website, she aims to be a cardiac surgeon and wants to open a chain of non-profitable hospitals based in rural areas.

A trained Indian classical dancer, Chhillar has a passion for outdoor sports and actively participates in paragliding, bungee jumping, snorkelling and scuba ..

A trained Indian classical dancer, Chhillar has a passion for outdoor sports and actively participates in paragliding, bungee jumping, snorkelling and scuba diving besides sketching and painting.

Her personal motto, as described on the website, reads: “When you cease to dream you cease to live” and “Courage to give flight to your dreams and the ability to believe in yourself makes life worth living”.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: 5 Reasons Why You Should Not Date Indian Girls

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

My Tinder Experiment Confirms That Girls In Western Canada Prefer Black Men Over White

November 27, 2017 | by Papa Selo | Link | Original Link

For the last two years I've been living in Eastern Europe. For personal reasons, and much to my regret, I've had to make my way back home to Western Canada, if only temporarily. Things have certainly changed. Or have they? Perhaps the new sour taste in my mouth was just a result of reverse culture shock. Surely not all women around here are like gremlins, and not every guy I know was doing poorly in terms of Game. So I set out to think about this some more and pondered about something for which I've always had a sneaking suspicion. What about black guys?

Anecdotally, it has always been glaringly obvious that black guys pull the most around here, but is the effect statistically significant? What if I were a black guy? Originally, this article was entitled "5 Horrifying Reasons Masculine Men Must Avoid Victoria, British Columbia, Canada" and for good reason: it is the Satanic capital of Canada, literally. The number of transsexuals appearing on dating apps (when your preference is set to "women") are sky-rocketing. "Anti-violence" and gender identity propaganda is in full-effect. The list goes on.

I decided to refrain from rushing off to write a damning article about why I hadn't got laid in my first month home in a city that, for most heterosexual men, is no longer welcoming anyway. So after asking my one black friend if I was on to something, I decided to run an experiment to confirm if it really was the color of his skin or just his imagination. He agreed that it was a good idea.

Method

I wondered, is it abnormally awesome to be a black guy in Victoria, Canada? What about Vancouver? Surrey, and Burnaby? I trawled through the internet to create my perfect profiles. I picked an average looking black guy from a random U.S. city. He was of medium build and appeared to have a fun social life.

I optimized his profile by including a picture demonstrating each of Mystery's 5 Attraction Switches, i.e. leader of men (a picture on the football field with his teammates), protector of loved ones (a picture with family members and kid cousins), pre-selected by women (a picture with arms around two girls at a party), ability to emote (a picture with a big wide smile), and risk-taker (a picture in a red sports car).

I purchased a burner phone (the FIGO is great for this kind of thing, has apps and comes globally unlocked), created a new Google and Facebook account, signed up for Tinder Plus for a month and got to work. I set my Maximum Distance to 15 miles, Age Range to 18-55+. I swiped 50 times per day, for 7 days each in each of British Columbia's four largest metropolitan areas (mentioned above), for 28 days.

I did the same thing and set up very similar pictures with a random white dude on my phone and compared. They each had empty bios. It's obviously impossible to ensure equality of experimental conditions, but the fit was close enough. Because I could not effectively control for perceived quality of prospective matches, I simply swiped indiscriminately. That is, I swiped right every single time.

Results

Experimental Black Guy (TJ) received 214 matches, a little more than 50 per week. Experimental White Guy (Brad) received 60 matches, or about 14 per week. That's 28% of TJ's total matches.

Openers were selected with a random number generator, and consisted of:

- Wanna fuck?
- Bitter whiskey or black coffee?
- Would you rather go down on Oprah or get pegged by Ellen?

TJ's matches responded at least once to approximately 50% of all openers (105 responses).

TJ managed to number close 10% of his total matches, or 1/5th of the girls who replied. He got phone numbers and set up dates with 21 of his matches. I unmatched the girls as soon as I received their phone numbers. I did not store those numbers anywhere. OkCupid recently performed a large-scale data analysis showing that the response rate of white female recipients (90% of both TJ's and Brad's matches were white women) to black male messages was fairly low, at 21%, which was only 1% higher than for Indian males. White men, on the other hand, tend to have a response rate from white women of about 30%, or 10% higher than black men on the aggregate.

Brad's matches responded at least once to 25% of all openers (or 15 matches, which is more or less what you'd expect if this were OkCupid). This, however, was half of TJ's response rate.

Over the course of the month, three of Brad's matches agreed to go on a date and provided their phone numbers. That the close ratios were similar was likely a good sign that the profile pictures and openers were sufficiently optimized. The major differences, however, rested in the response rate (to statistically identical openers) and in the total number of matches.

Ultimately, TJ had 700% more potential dates than Brad. I say “potential” here because I did not keep the numbers long enough to record flakes, given that I was the one ghosting.

The best opener was “Wanna fuck?”, which made up most of the conversations that for TJ ended in a number close. No woman responded to Brad when he used this opener. The most straightforward close was by TJ, who used that same line, resulting in a reply the next day consisting of the girl’s phone number and the message “Ya…text me”. She was a certifiable 9 out of 10.

Discussion

Although the experiment did not control for hotness of the girl, and likely many other confounding influences, much can be learned. Did girls match with TJ more often because less attractive girls think that black guys are more accessible? Possibly, but from personal observation, and hundreds of anecdotes and observations over the years, I very much doubt that. I’ve always seen black guys hanging out with the hottest girls in town, and the matches that our Experimental Black Guy was getting were fairly high quality in terms of physical attractiveness.

There was also the fact that women were more receptive to the more sexually aggressive openers when sent by the black guy, such as “Wanna fuck?”. One possible explanation is that explicit sexual advances from black guys come off as humorous because they already stand out as it is, allowing the opener to function as if it were an act of peacocking as opposed to a line that signaled thirsty desperation.

Similarly, making friends with a black guy seems to send a strongly positive social signal to peers, especially in a very Left Wing virtue and diversity-obsessed society such as in Western Canada. Even if your matches don't fuck right away, you'll be sucked into their Social Circle like a vortex in a gravity well.

Another, perhaps less speculative reason, is that black guys really are just viscerally more attractive to the predominantly white European population of women in this part of the world. There is definitely some highly-regarded scientific evidence to suggest that genetic opposites attract. This, in combination with the low population of black men in this region, and the current global cultural milieu favoring minorities in popular culture, is probably the best explanation.

Being black in Victoria, Canada is a pussy goldmine. Being black in Greater Vancouver is likely just as awesome. I even got a few matches from Port Angeles, in Washington State, and they responded with the same level of excitement and fervor.

As for Brad's prospective mating opportunities? Increasingly doubtful. Brad's profile was relatively average, but he was definitely a Chad, just like TJ. If Brad is only getting a handful of dates on Tinder per month, can the average white guy hope to do any better?

White men, it seems, are becoming the new Indian Race Trolls of Western Canada. It's just better to leave and date foreign women, I suppose. Or is the lesson in all this that we should ditch our phones, live out our lives more authentically, and meet women during the day, on their terms?

In the end, if you are a black guy and are considering the move to Western Canada, or never stopped to consider whether it was worth it, it's pretty clear that now more than ever is the best time to follow through with that move. You'll definitely be drowning in pussy in no time at all, and if you don't feel like moving to Japan, or being a foreigner in a strange country, this might actually be one of the better choices.

Read Next: 7 Reasons Why Approaching Girls In Real Life Beats Tinder Hands

Down

9 Important Lessons From A Clockwork Orange

November 27, 2017 | by Ted Deveer | Link | Original Link

It's a tough competition for which classic novel (or film) best predicted a future which maps closest to our own. Was it 1984, with governments inventing endless fake wars and spreading its propaganda against fake enemies? Was it Brave New World, with the population on drugs to make them so happy they become complacent to the evil around them? Despite such eerily accurate competition, one strong contender is Anthony Burgess' A Clockwork Orange and in particular, Stanley Kubrick's 1971 adaptation of it.

But the importance of reading the book (or seeing the movie) isn't just to see how uncannily someone predicted the future; rather, because of the many lessons that the book has for both the alpha male, and for the aspiring alpha male, since it is the story of a deeply alpha—albeit immoral—man. The movie is, indeed, the opposite of Kubrick's warning for what alpha males should not do, Lolita.

Before we discuss the nine key lessons of A Clockwork Orange, we need to remind ourselves that the alpha male protagonist of the book and film is immoral, committing many terrible, illegal acts like brutal murder. We at Return of Kings strongly condemn all such immorality and law-breaking. We can learn from the best of the protagonist, not the worst. It's like learning from Bill Clinton: we may object to his immoral corruption and possible murders of those who got in his way like Vince Foster; but we can still learn from his ability to excite women around him.

Lets go backwards in the film, since the overarching lesson is at the very end of the film: the alpha male wins. Alex DeLarge, the protagonist acts in the most evil ways imaginable and yet… ends up with the Prime Minister literally spoon-feeding him everything he wants. You don't need to be evil; but to win, you need to be alpha.

1. Alex very explicitly rejects the societal norms around him, and carves his own path

Society was rightfully discouraging "ultraviolence" but he and his goons let their lives revolve around their "ultraviolent" ways. Alpha males must reject the expectations of society and find their own path—although, of course, in less evil ways than Alex did. As Joseph Campbell said, "If the path before you is clear, you're probably on someone else's."

2. Society will try to stop you… but their attempts to stop you will often make you more powerful

The government subjected Alex to violent movies in the famous scene in which his eyes are forced open to watch them while constantly receiving eye drops. That worked until Alex tried to kill himself… which broke the spell, and let him return to his violent, alpha ways. This is a key non-obvious lesson of the book and film, and one of the central ingredients to Trump's rise: the more the MSM tried to stop him, the more powerful he became.

At this point, I humbly tip my hat to my tribe's fearless leader-spokesman, Roosh. He is carving out his own path, and society's attempts to stop him have only made his influence grow.

3. Even the alpha male will be influenced by society around him

You can't avoid society's influence on you, so you have to acknowledge the influence in order to temper it. It's key to the plot that not only are Alex and his gang sexually-charged (they wear huge penises on their outfits), but from the first moment of the film, the movie paints the entire society around them as being over-the-top sexual.

Literally, from the first moment: the movie opens with Alex and his gang in a “milk bar,” in which the tables are sculptures of naked women, and the exercise instructor whom Alex rapes has a statue of a huge penis and her walls are covered in penis-art. The message is clear: dangerously over-sexualized society leads to dangerously over-sexualized individuals.

4. Be alpha even in parenting

Alex’s deeply beta parents never had the strength to stop him from going down his violent path. The alpha parent role model and discipliner would have pushed Alex into a healthier direction.

5. Don’t trust the intellectual class; if they say they support you, it’s fake posturing

Intellectuals pretend to support you, so long as it costs them nothing… but the moment they have to apply their ideas to themselves, suddenly, they change their minds. Alex, a criminal and a victim of the government’s brainwashing, falls into a pro-criminal-rights intellectual’s house, and the intellectual pledges to help Alex fight the government. But the moment the intellectual realizes that Alex had, years earlier, raped his wife… he will no longer apply his belief in helping criminals to Alex, becoming a hypocrite. (Not to mention, the accurate mockery of intellectuals wanting to help the very class of people who are raping their wives.)

6. Clean up your own shit

Alex’s past problems keep on coming back to haunt him. He once beat up an old man for no reason—and when he stumbles upon the old man years later, the old man beats him up. Alex pushes the members of his gang too far and years later, when they are policemen, they beat him up.

7. The devil is in the details

How did the intellectual realize that this oppressed boy he took in had, years earlier, raped his wife? Because while showering, Alex hummed Singing in the Rain, the same tune he hummed while raping the intellectual's wife. Lesson: the devil is in the details and, in particular, small details gone wrong make the best-laid plays go awry.

8. Inventing your own vocabulary is alphaful

While the adults and representatives of society in the film all speak in standard English, Alex and his goons only speak in a Jabberwocky-esque English-like language. While reading about droogs and devotchkas makes no sense out of context, it is understandable in-context. Selfdictioning is empowerificating, an observation which our friend Chateau Heartiste has amply proven with his amplious wordcreations.

9. You need at least one deep, cultural passion

Despite his brutish, immoral, and illegal ways, Alex maintains a passion, even an obsession, with Beethoven, whom he calls "Ludwig Van." Without a deep passion, you're just another plebeian. Just an ounce of high culture makes you different from the rest.

Beyond lessons for alpha males, one of the least obvious—and most important—meta lessons from this book and film is that morality is complex. When you're a kid, and you have to read this novel in class, or study the Bible (as I did in my childhood religious school), you are taught that they are simple morality tales of good vs bad. "In this novel and film, Alex is bad, the Intellectual writer good. In the Old Testament, Jacob is good, but Pharaoh is bad."

But as we get older, with more depth of experience with human nature and the world, we are able to see that everyone is good and bad. And that one of the key elements of timeless literature is to capture this nuance.

In the Old Testament, Jacob is one of the the great heroes, yet he steals his brother's inheritance. Very good people often have bad sides, and very bad people often have good sides. One of the key challenges of adulthood is separately out what is ultimately good from what is ultimately bad. It is this challenge, this very complex nature of morality within our very human lives, that prevents most men from rising above the masses and turning themselves into better men.

Much more about conspiracy theories and protecting your privacy.

Read More: 8 Important Lessons From The Classic Novel Lolita

Ted Deveer
I'm Ted, I read old books, and my interest in Stanley Kubrick has nothing, absolutely nothing, to do with my interest in conspiracy theories, not at all, no way. And I like my privacy.

Britain’s Prince Harry To Wed American Feminist Actress Who Is Three Years Older Than Himself

November 27, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Yahoo News:

American, mixed-race and “fiercely independent”: Meghan Markle, Prince Harry’s actor girlfriend, will breathe fresh air into the British royal family when she marries Queen Elizabeth II’s grandson next Spring.

Playing a lawyer in the hit television show “Suits”, the 36-year-old actress with long flowing black hair was barely known in Britain when her name appeared on newspapers’ front pages last October.

The tabloids based their report of a relationship between Harry and Meghan, who lived in Toronto, Canada, on pictures showing them wearing the same tricoloured wristband.

The relationship was formalised by Kensington Palace, which handles communication for Prince Harry, in November in a most unexpected way.

Exasperated by the media frenzy, the palace released a statement attacking the “sexism” and “racism” Meghan Markle faced on social media.

It also blasted the press for “harassing” the actress.

Four days earlier, The Sun, Britain’s top-selling newspaper, ran a piece on its front page titled “Harry’s girl on Pornhub,” the adult video website.

But the actress’s only crime had been to take off her shirt while filming what the newspaper described as a “steamy scene” for her show “Suits,” which then made it onto the pornographic website.

The couple made their first official public appearance together in September, attending the opening ceremony of the third Invictus Games — created by Harry for disabled or wounded soldiers and veterans.

“We’re two people who are really happy and in love,” Markle told Vanity Fair shortly before the event.

‘A woman who works’

With a degree in communication, Markle appears to have navigated her career without a hitch.

Like Harry, she does humanitarian work.

She is also telegenic, practises yoga and drinks detox drinks including “green juices,” according to her Instagram account.

Tabloids were quick to point out that the actress, three years Harry’s senior, is divorced, unearthing pictures of her first marriage (2010-2013) with an American producer.

However, none of this was enough to derail a royal wedding, which will take place early next year, according to Monday’s announcement.

Quite the contrary, says Penny Junor, Prince Harry's biographer: "I think that would be no problem at all, and the fact that she is of mixed race might even be a bonus," she told AFP.

"It would show Harry, a senior member of the Royal Family, to be a thoroughly modern man — not a precious, strange creature from another planet, which is how the royals are sometimes seen".

Some believed, however, that her proud independence — the actress had maintained a long-distance relationship with the prince for much of their courtship — could be a source of contention for the Windsor family.

"I've never wanted to be a lady who lunches — I've always wanted to be a woman who works," Markle once wrote on her blog "Tig".

'Fiercely independent'

Popular tabloid the Daily Mail wrote that it was "easy to see what happy-go-lucky Prince Harry and Meghan Markle have in common."

"What's less clear is…what some female members of the Royal Family will make of a fiercely independent young woman".

Beyond her role as an ambassador for the Canadian charity "World Vision Canada," which works to improve children's lives in developing countries, Markle regularly asserts the feminist beliefs she forged during her childhood in California.

"Aged 11, she forced a soap manufacturer to alter an advert after she wrote a letter to then First Lady Hillary Clinton and other high-profile figures complaining that it implied women belonged in the kitchen," wrote the BBC.

Nowadays, the actress also campaigns for women’s rights alongside the UN.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: Do Not Follow In The Footsteps Of Norway’s Crown Prince By Marrying A Single Mom

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Joe Rogan Is A Beacon Of Raw Masculinity

November 27, 2017 | by Alfonso Taft | Link | Original Link

ROK readers can learn much from the masculine principles of Joe Rogan. The UFC commentator and comedian is successful, down to earth, and constantly learning. His masculine principles of integrity, brotherhood, discipline, and curiosity have brought him fame, glory, and a status limited only by the cosmos.

Joe began his career as a stand up comedian and later landed roles in television sitcoms Hardball and NewsRadio. He continued practicing his disciplines of comedy and martial arts when, in 1997, he started working for the Ultimate Fighting Championship as a commentator. During this time, UFC was looked down upon and not the mainstream success it is today. Thirty years before the Conor McGregor phenomenon, Joe and others helped build the UFC brand from the ground up.

Integrity

For comedians, stealing another comedian's "bit" or rant is a grave sin that can quickly get a comic ostracized. Rogan has stated:

> Great comics don't steal. They may be influenced by others, especially early in their careers, but the truly great ones pride themselves in being able to craft original thoughts for their audience.

Back in 2007, he confronted notorious joke thief Carlos Mencia while Mencia was performing in a Los Angeles Comedy Club. Rogan sprang up from the crowd onto the stage and confronted Mencia. Shortly after, Rogan was handed a microphone. An emasculated Carlos Mencia stood there like a confused asshole as Rogan berated him with clear evidence that Mencia stole material from other comedians.

"George Lopez didn't grab you by your fucking neck and slam you against the Laugh Factory Wall for ripping off his shit in your HBO Special?! You fucking liar!"

"Yeah, he did," replied Mencia in disgrace.

Rogan completely dominated the scene and banished Mencia into oblivion. Mencia has never been the same since. He's completely fallen off the map, a broken man.

“Your mind is weak. Keep talking shit, fat boy. I’ll keep exposing you,” Rogan wrote in a blog post.

Health and Fitness

When it comes to health and fitness, Rogan does not fuck around. At 50 years old, he maintains a physical regimen that includes martial arts, lifting, yoga, running, jiu-jitsu, archery, and hunting. Rogan eats eggs from his own chickens he raises at his home and devours the meat from his big game hunts.

Rogan routinely freezes his body in frigid temperatures as low as -240 degrees in cryogenic chambers. He also frequents sensory deprivation tanks for deep meditation. Rogan describes the tanks as “the most important tool I’ve ever used for developing my mind, for thinking, for evolving.” For users, the tanks offers a natural psychedelic experiences without the use of drugs.

Rogan’s training is spiritual in nature. “I see martial arts as moving forms of meditation,” he said in an interview with Men’s Fitness. “When you’re sparring or drilling techniques, you can’t think of anything else. All your bullshit goes to the back of your head. Because if it doesn’t, you’re going to get fucked up.”

> Human beings still have the same genes they had 10,000 years ago. Our bodies are designed to have a certain amount of physical stress and violence in them. We're designed to run from jaguars and fight to defend our territory. We're hardwired with all this shit that you really can't deny if you want to be a balanced human being.

In 2005, actor Wesley Snipes challenged Rogan to a cage fight. Rogan accepted the challenge and trained hard in jiu-jitsu and other forms of martial arts for the next five months. A financially desperate Wesley Snipes eventually backed out.

"I think when he researched it and found out I'd been doing martial arts my whole life, he realized I was going to choke the shit out of him," Rogan said, "If I'd fought Wesley Snipes, I was 99.9% convinced all I had to do was grab that guy and choke the fucking life out of him."

Curiosity

Launched in 2009, The Joe Rogan Experience Podcast is Rogan's Magnus Opus. His desire to learn and improve as a man are in full display during podcasts with legends like Wim Hof, Alex Jones, and Jordan Peterson. His podcasts with alpha males like Lance Armstrong, Dan Bilzerian, and Jacko Willinc are quality resources for men.

Rogan's podcast has valuable information for the curious man seeking knowledge. Whether it's learning about ancient civilizations with Graham Hancock or learning about sacred geometry with Randall Carlson, the show features guests from the full political spectrum as well as various fighters, entertainers, and entrepreneurs. Personally, I've learned more from The Joe Rogan Experience podcast than what I learned in a college classroom, by far.

Curiosity has also lead him to experiment with psychedelic drugs. Joe is featured in documentaries The Union (The Business Behind Getting High) and DMT (The Spirit Molecule).

Skill Set / Discipline

Joe Rogan is constantly challenging himself to learn new masculine skills. His has developed expertise in the areas of pool, hunting, archery, martial arts, and cooking.

> Obsession fueled discipline and discipline manages that obsession.
>
> […]
>
> If you're trying to improve your yoga, I think it will help your jiu-jitsu. Life is about the pursuit of excellence. That pursuit is probably more exciting to me now than ever.

Perhaps Rogan's most masculine skill other than martial arts is hunting, a discipline not practiced by weak men. "It is a combination of athletics, extreme endurance, hiking, outdoorsmanship, survival skills, the knowledge of hunting, and then you have to be a good shot on top of all that." During a JRE podcast with Steven Crowder, it was revealed that exchanges DM's with Donald Trump Jr. about hunting.

The key to Rogan's success is turning his curiosity into action and willing himself to excellence through discipline. Rogan's ability to maintain mainstream success as a UFC commentator and an internet shitlord simultaneously have lifted him to legendary status as a podcast pioneer higher primate.

Although Rogan has leftists and beta male comedian cucks in his circle, his compadres mainly consist of 21st Century alpha men. Rogan is universally respected by his brothers because of his integrity, curiosity, and discipline. At the age of 50, he is a living testament to his mantra, "Be the hero of your own movie."

Read More: The Decline In Testosterone is Destroying The Basis of Masculinity

Alfonso Taft

Alfonso Taft is a surfer stoner All-American Aryan alpha male quarterback. Raised in the Northeast, he speaks with a Southern twang for no apparent reason.

5 Easiest Metropolitan Cities To Meet Attractive Women

November 28, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

For a man who has limited time, there are five cities that are particularly good to focus on if you want the odds to be more in your favor. I've picked these five because the respective local culture is modern enough to "encourage" non-traditional sex, the obesity rates are low, a large share of women are average to good-looking (partly because they often are thin), male competition is low to moderate, and the populations are large (10 million or more), leading to a near-endless pool of females.

To visit so-called emerging markets comes with several downsides, such as poverty, higher crime rates (Latin America) and bad infrastructure, but since the main object is to meet young women, we will ignore the negative.

1. Manila (Philippines)

The capital of the Philippines offers a lot of young and petite females that you can meet online, at bars and clubs, and occasionally through day game and fleeting social circles.

If you are a fairly good-looking guy (preferably of European or Northeast Asian origin) with normal conversation abilities and level of confidence, you should have no problem finding a significant number of average to good-looking girls, although seldom prettier than 8. You will do well with just English. Generally you can talk about all kinds of things with these girls, but avoid contentious and complicated issues.

Make sure to pipeline a bit through dating apps and websites just before you go and create an abundance of opportunities. Look out for prostitutes and city gangs and be sure not to cause any trouble. Drugs should likewise be avoided. You may have heard about Rodrigo Duterte's tough drug policies, which involve killings of dealers, even users.

Population: 12 million

Apps: FilipinoCupid, Pinalove

2. Jakarta (Indonesia)

Although Jakarta is partly a Muslim city in an Islamic country, it is a rather liberal and secular such with many young girls who want a piece of the (white) flesh. Although some of the hijab-wearing women might be open for sex, look for those who don't wear them since it may save you some time and trouble. It is more likely that they are open for casual sex.

A combination of online game, night game, and a little bit of day game should do you good. Make sure to rent a place since only a few hotels allow guests to bring girls to their rooms.

Some nice clubs are Jenja, Immigrant, and Empirica. Be aware of hookers and semi-pros. Keep frame and don't pay. There are plenty of normal girls of about the same level of attractiveness as in the Philippines to choose from.

English will take you far most of the time, but try to learn some Indonesian before you go. That will help you connect with local females, even if it's just a couple of words and phrases here and there.

Population: 30 million

Apps: IndonesiaCupid

3. Bangkok (Thailand)

Bangkok is associated with crazy nightlife and lots of prostitutes. Another downside is the massive amount of tourists. Still there are plenty of normal girls in Bangkok who are eager to meet foreign men.

Use proper apps, especially ThaiCupid, and visit bars and clubs that lean towards a higher percentage of non-pros (i.e. normal girls). Like in other major Southeast Asian cities, you can expect to do well if you look average or better and have normal conversation skills. Still, the better your pictures and looks, and the more confidence and determined mindset, the more you will likely be successful.

Unless girls ask there is no reason to talk about complicated subjects or even your home country. Focus on Thailand, fun, and travel.

English will take you far most of the time, but try to learn some Thai before you go. That will help you connect with local females, even if it’s just fifty common expressions.

Population: 15 million

Apps: ThaiCupid, ThaiFriendly

4. Rio De Janeiro (Brazil)

Rio De Janeiro is one of few cities in the world where girls approach guys, and as such often in a very direct fashion. Although it is quite easy to kiss some of these (mulatto) girls, often from lower classes and even favelas, it is a bit harder to get laid in comparison. Sometimes kissing is just kissing and nothing more. Still it is often fairly easy to score. Forget about Catholic virtues: many live for the moment, like today is their last on earth.

Like in Southeast Asia you should use a combination of different types of game, but online game and night game are often more than enough. However, you should be slightly more aggressive and confident compared to Southeast Asia. Show that you have balls, both literally and metaphorically speaking. Most girls are between 5-7, but some have better bodies and can reach 8 or 8.5 mark.

Research a bit online regarding appropriate bars and clubs, since that may differ from one year to another. Stay away from shady areas, take a cab rather than to risk anything, and don’t flash jewelry and such.

English will not take you far most of the time, so try to learn some Portuguese before you go.

Population: 12 million

Apps: BrazilCupid

5. Bogota (Colombia)

If you look into a dating website or app like ColombianCupid, realize that there are girls which are really attractive in Colombia, and since the bodies are sometimes so hot they can peak at 8 or even 9. These girls are spread out in different cities like Medellin, Barranquilla, Cali and so on. It would be wise to check out multiple cities if you can, but if time is limited the capital Bogota is more than enough.

If you solely focus on getting laid you should do well with just online game, but for a variety of reasons you should check out the nightlife as well.

English will often not take you far. Thus try to learn some Spanish before you go. Since Spanish is valuable to learn in general, you may regard it is a small life project.

Population: 10 million

Apps: ColombianCupid

Conclusion

I have provided five examples of cities that are appropriate to visit if you want to meet girls, as well as the methods and tools that will enable you to maximize your results. Needless to say but you could also do a lot of other things while in the above five cities, such as to enjoy food and other aspects of the local cultures.

If you want to read more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: Where To Travel In East Asia To Experience Bountiful And Fleeting Pleasures From Women

Why Don’t Feminists Support Mixed Men’s And Women’s Sporting Competitions?

November 28, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

We are constantly told that gender is “non-binary.” Feminists and other SJWs say men can be born biologically female and women can be born biologically male, while plenty of other people supposedly fall outside any male-female distinctions. Surprisingly, however, this insistence on the existence of so many different genders and sexual identities has not flowed down to what leftists demand in professional sporting competitions, which almost always involve men playing men and women playing women. In fact, it all looks awfully like a nod to the “evil” cis-gender dichotomy.

Where are the mixed sporting competitions so that everyone’s “gender” is embraced, not just two? And if one combined sporting field is eschewed (a 100% likelihood since men would cream women), dozens of individual competitions are necessary according to twisted SJW ideology.

Why, for instance, is Wimbledon dominated by the separate Men’s and Women’s singles Grand Slams and not the Men’s, Women’s, Transgender Men’s, and Transgender Women’s singles Grand Slams? After a couple of years, too, shouldn’t the Center Court of the All England Lawn Tennis and Croquet Club play host to a Pansexual singles Grand Slam final? And then a Two-Spirit Gender one?

I give you the 2018 Wimbledon Transgender Women's singles champion.

There are actually, if you take the braindead musings of SJWs, far more than 60 genders. But here are five dozen or so sarcastically outlined by Alternative für Deutschland (AfD) regional parliamentarian (and shitlord) Steffen Königer:

So when are the rest of these genders getting their own sporting competitions to express their "unique voice and identity"? If the distinction between, say, "androgynes" and men is as valid as the distinction between men and women, why not implement this in sporting competitions? Should logistics get in the way of this, bring in one totally mixed competition that pits men against women, without the furphy of team sports that mandate an equal number of men and women on each side in order to cloak the lesser female performances.

Equal pay and representation for all "genders"–not!

Usain Bolt and Elaine Thompson, the 100m track gold medalists at the 2016 Olympics. If gender is non-binary, where are the other genders?

None of what I have suggested here will ever happen because even calls for “equality” for women’s sport are indefensible. Both the United States and Australian women’s soccer teams, for example, have been thrashed by local city boys’ teams in the past year or so, news of which was barely discussed. Certainly those “pundits” who say that the female game is “just as good” will not take these results into account when they keep arguing for so-called equal pay and coverage.

The problem only gets worse when we consider the likely quality of a hypothetical “pansexual” or “two-spirit gender” team, especially the skills of participants who are biologically female. Yet if mere pronoun use matters so much to the menagerie of made-up genders and their ideological enforcers, why shouldn’t sports, regularly touted as a reflection of hard work, achievement, and individual self-expression, exhibit similar diversity? Questions like this are never examined or answered by the same people who declare that we should inject prepubescent boys and girls with the hormones appropriate for their “gender identity.”

When there have been controversies related to the binary nature of sporting competitions, most prominently in the case of South African sprinter Caster Semenya and her outing as a hermaphrodite, the SJWs were nowhere to be seen. If they wanted to be consistent, they would be as intransigent in the world of sports as they are in spying on whether someone uses “hir” or “zhe” when asked.

There’s self-interest at play, too

Even if she weren't Russian, one couldn't imagine a female athlete like Maria Sharapova supporting additional gender competitions that would lose them money.

Media advocates for women's sport will certainly not call for more gender-based fields, principally because it would take money and attention from non-transgender, etc. female athletes. And the vast majority of the highest-earning women, from Maria Sharapova to Hope Solo, would not want that, either. In this vein, pseudo-gender emancipation and "equality" faces the additional obstacle of self-promoting female athletes who want to keep their piece of the pie, sadly a growing one, intact. These people will keep and play only with the "girl power" elements that suit their careers–and bank balances.

Of all the topics I have covered at Return Of Kings, this is one you can predict the smallest backlash about. Suggesting the "logical" expansion of transgender and related malaises to sport is enough to bamboozle the least crazy and ideologically committed SJWs, let alone the bonafide mad-hatters amongst their ranks.

Still, next time someone tries to shove pronouns or new bathroom rules down your throat, you could deadpan and say we should have 60-odd gender-based competitions for each professional sport as well.

Read More: 5 Things I Learned From Entering Bodybuilding Competitions

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Signs You Need Help Managing Multiple Women

November 28, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Player's Toolkit.

As a single man who has developed skills in seduction and no doubt taken advantage of countless opportunities, you will quickly reach a point where you have to manage a significant number of women until finding the one you love. Some women you meet become regular sex-partners, some only one-night stands, and yet others are to be deeper discovered.

But juggling many relationships, even superficial ones, can lead to many difficulties. If you've experienced the following three signs, you may have already reached a breaking point where you can not easily manage all your female contacts.

1. Your brain can not handle all the information required

She wants you to remember the details

Women you interact with give a lot of information they expect you to remember, but assuming you don't have a deep relationship with all of them, your memory will eventually fail you.

With time, you may face awkward situations during which you can not remember things she told you, like her last painful breakup, her last amazing trip abroad, family issues, or her (un)preferred sex practices (which you should better not confuse with another girl's), and we're not even talking about all the details potentially related to logistics which you have to record somewhere anyway (addresses, door entry code, her clothing sizes, online profile URLs, etc.).

2. You often lose the menstruation lottery

“We can’t tonight.”

It’s a question of probability that the more sexually active you are (with multiple women), the more frequently you may face the last minute rejection excuse of a girl saying she’s on her period. At this point, you may want to clarify in your mind the nature of your relationship with her. Is it mainly for sex or do you want to do non-sexual activities together and eventually to build a deeper relationship?

If you’re mainly seeing her for sex, make her understand that you should not meet again only to watch a movie, or else you’ll get the excuse regularly. But sometimes, your intentions are not yet clear, or you don’t want to hurt her by being so direct. In that case, you can still trace your sex-partners’ menstruation cycle on a calendar, so you can easily guess when to better meet them the next time and when to delay your meetings.

3. You don’t remember who’s who

“Who the hell is this?”

Let’s assume you often meet many girls in a short amount of time on top of going on multiple dates alongside having multiple online conversations in various messenger apps or social networks. That much activity is sure to lead to confusion, and you probably have already felt how it’s sometimes hard to remember who’s behind a contact in your phone despite you saved it only a few days before. You may have to regularly check your phone history to figure out who’s who and when to better text or call, which is an annoying process.

Smart men get the right tool they need

If you are not (or not yet) a monogamist, and have experienced the above problems, you need to organize and centralize the information you want to remember for each girl you meet. Since your mind was not naturally built to handle multiple women simultaneously, a tool is needed.

The problem of information overlap has been common since the modern pick-up scene started, but thankfully there are now better solutions than your father’s notebook, your phone’s standard apps, or even some business collaboration apps that are not initially designed for woman management.

Have a look at the Player’s Toolkit, a full-fledged women management app for men in their prime to seamlessly date many women. As a special offer for ROK readers, you can download Player’s Toolkit on Google Play for FREE until December 5 by clicking here.

Here’s a video which shows it in action…

Click here to download Player’s Toolkit on your Android phone.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Women Are Susceptible To Men Who Use Dominant Key Words In Conversation

November 29, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Ever since E.L. James published Fifty Shades of Grey back in 2011, the dating landscape has been irrevocably tinged with the colourings of BDSM (bondage, discipline, dominance and sadomasochism). This is something that men who are looking to meet short-term partners, or even girlfriends and wives, need to consider.

While the extreme end of the BDSM lifestyle is regarded by many as degenerate, the light application of dominant (or 'dom') tropes in an interaction with a girl is a great way to assert one's masculine dominance, reinforce male-female polarity, and get your girl extremely hot under the collar at the same time. And in fact, the assertion of dominance is just an extension of the old game technique of 'flipping the script.'

Flipping The Script

Flipping the script is when you mischievously suggest that the girl you are chatting up is hitting on you rather than the other way around. The idea is to reframe the situation so that she becomes the sexual predator while you are the innocent gentleman she's looking to devour.

Of course, you must be careful to be tongue-in-cheek as you present this alternative vision, since you don't actually want to come across as a naive virgin. But as long as she realises that you are joking then it can be incredibly effective. It's a technique I use all the time, and have done for as long as I've been in the game.

You can flip the script face-to-face when you approach her by accusing her of checking you out, or telling her you just came up to say 'hi' and now she's hitting on you. You can also have a lot of fun with it over text, WhatsApp or Facebook Messenger:

> You look like trouble
>
> You look like the kind of girl my mother warned me about
>
> I can tell you're going to lead me astray / take advantage of me

As a Brit I will often frame it something like:

> I'm an innocent English gentlemen. My mum warned me about Spanish girls like you trying to take advantage of me.

Another thing I nearly always write is:

> You look cute on the outside, but your eyes are very naughty

Again, the point here is to subtly sexualise the interaction and also to position her as a sexual being, even a sexual aggressor. It works well because it's flirty and playful, it introduces the notion of sex into the ecosphere of your interaction and it demonstrates that you are comfortable with her sexuality. That you are not judgemental—which is supremely important.

Introducing The Dom

Flipping the script as above works and it's been a precursor to probably every sexual encounter I have ever enjoyed as a result of game. But just recently I have begun to take things a step further. Inspired by The Control Book by Peter Masters, amongst other texts, I have begun 'introducing the dom', and doing so early.

When you flip the script you are sexualising your girl and framing her as naughty. And that is great, as far as it goes. But what you might then usefully do is seed in the idea that you are man enough to control her, to dominate her, and to rein in her insubordinate nature.

Remember, women get off on this stuff hugely. There is a reason why Fifty Shades of Grey had sold 125 million copies worldwide by 2015 and been translated into 52 languages. Because, like it or not, fantasies of domination, punishment and kinky sex are like female catnip. Even the most ostensibly dominant women often secretly love it.

What I've been experimenting with recently—and getting good results from—is dropping in codewords early on in my interactions to signal to the girl that I will dominate her and to test her compliance. This works well for both of us, since I have a preference for submissive girls (as I believe most men do) and if she will not fall into my frame then it's better we don't waste each other's time.

The particular words that I like to drop in early on are: rules, discipline, punishments, rewards. Each of these words can be relatively innocuous in and of itself, but they also clearly signpost a particular form of dominance to any girl who's even half-awake. If she's into it, she'll be getting wet imagining spankings and rough sex. If she's not, then she'll decline to enter my frame, which is absolutely fine also.

To show you how I have introduced these terms into conversations recently, see below two chats, one from Tinder and one from Bumble. In both cases these are from the beginning of the interactions, since it is important to set the frame early. Plus what I'm seeking to do is to establish extreme male-female polarity upfront.

And . . .

In each case, you can see that the girl has accepted the “naughty girl = needs discipline” frame without comment. In this way our respective roles are established up front and, without being too explicit, I set myself apart from the vanilla ‘provider’ guys who tell her how pretty she is and how much they want to take her out on a nice date to a fancy restaurant.

As with sales, successful dating is very much about understanding the needs of one's customers and then shaping one's offer (the product) in such a way as to make it exciting for them. And given the prevalence of sub-dom imagery in the post-50-Shades world, you can do a lot worse than sell yourself as a man who is strong and confident enough to take control of her both in the bedroom and outside of it.

Want to find out how jerks and badboys get the hottest girls? Read Troy's latest book How To Be An Asshole

Read More: How Most Relationships End

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

7 Benefits Of Testosterone That You Probably Don’t Know

November 29, 2017 | by Mo Saleem | Link | Original Link

You already know that testosterone is the biological cause of masculinity, but did you know that your T-level is also a marker of your overall mental health? Or that it determines how strong your bones are? That’s right. The impact of this hormone is far wider than most men think. In this article I’ll discuss seven things every man needs to know about testosterone.

1. Low Testosterone Can Make You Depressed

Australian researchers brought 3987 men into a lab and assessed them for depressive symptoms. The men with testosterone levels in the lowest quintile also had the highest prevalence of depression (1).

On the flip side, an analysis of 16 human trials with 944 subjects revealed a significant positive impact of testosterone treatment on mood (2). Similar results were found in a Japanese study that found 6-months of testosterone treatment to relieve depressive symptoms from 63% of subjects (3).

If you’ve been wrestling with a bout of depression, it’s likely that declining T is a contributing cause.

2. Testosterone Improves Your Mental Cognition

Men with low testosterone and memory complaints significantly improved performance on various measures of cognitive functioning after 24 weeks of testosterone treatment (4). The same is true for otherwise healthy men who, when given testosterone, showed significantly improved performance in verbal fluency tests (5).

The exact mechanisms of testosterone's influence on the brain are not exactly known, but researchers theorize that it plays a role in preventing brain tissue decay (6). This could explain why low testosterone is directly linked with an increased chance of developing Alzheimer's (7).

3. Testosterone Keeps Your Bones Strong

108 men over the age of 65 were randomly assigned to wear a testosterone patch or a placebo patch for 36 months. Bone mineral density was measured before and during the treatment. At the end of 36 months, the men with low pretreatment testosterone levels experienced a significant increase in overall lumbar spine bone density (8).

Other research has found low testosterone to be independently associated with the risk of osteoporotic fracture in elderly men (9). To maintain strong and healthy bones well into old age, ensure that you keep your T-levels in check.

4. Testosterone Drives Your Competitiveness

As men, it is in our nature to be competitive. Research is now beginning to show that it is in fact testosterone that fuels this drive.

64 male subjects were assessed for their T-level before and after a rigged one-on-one competition. After the first round of competition, subjects decided whether or not to compete again. Interestingly, fluctuations in T predicted the individual subjects' decisions to compete: losers who experienced a spike in testosterone were much more likely to choose to compete again compared to the losers who experienced a drop in T (10). Similar results were noted in university tennis players: testosterone levels were higher for the players that won their matches compared to those who lost (11).

5. Testosterone Increases Your Dominance

Men with high testosterone are more likely to engage in dominant behaviour that is intended to enhance one's status over another (12). Now, at times this behaviour can be expressed aggressively, like is the case with chronically aggressive prisoners (13), but it doesn't always play have to play out this way.

In a study of young boys, aged 6-13, researchers found that the ones perceived as socially dominant by their peers had higher testosterone levels compared to the boys perceived as being less socially dominant (14). Furthermore, researchers found that the boys noted for showing physical aggression had lower T compared to the boys who had no history of physical aggression. These aggressive boys with low T also had lower grades and were unpopular with their peers. The researchers concluded testosterone levels to be positively correlated with social success rather than with physical aggression.

6. Testosterone Makes You Less Risk Averse

High risk equals high reward, right? Well, that's what they say anyway. But to that point, many media commentators said that testosterone was to blame for the 2008 financial crisis. They said that it was the Wall Street warriors with jacked up testosterone levels making risky decisions that led to the collapse. Whether that's true or not, who knows, but the research performed in this area is interesting to note.

A financial traders morning level of testosterone is an accurate predictor of his day's profitability. Researchers found that a trader's willingness to engage in higher risk also set him up for the highest chances of scoring big (15).

Gamblers with high testosterone also tend to engage in greater risks (16). This was found to be true in both men and women. In yet another study, MBA students with high levels of T were more likely to pick riskier career paths (17).

Your relationship to risk is a major determinant of how your life turns out. This is not to say that you should go all in all the time, but if you look at the men who have achieved greatness, they are also the ones who have engaged in a hefty amount of risk.

7. Testosterone Makes You Live a Longer and More Virile Life

Low testosterone levels are independently associated with an increased risk of death from all causes (18).

794 men, aged 50-91, were followed up with for 20 years (19). During this time, 538 deaths occurred. The men with low testosterone levels were 40% more likely to die compared to those with higher T-levels. This relationship held true even after considering factors such as age, body fat, lifestyle, blood pressure, diabetes, and cardiovascular disease.

To Sum Up

Your testosterone level is a major determinant of your overall health and well-being. Not only does testosterone help you maintain a lean and muscular physique, but it also ensures that your mind is functioning near peak potential and that your bones remain strong and healthy well into old age.

The aim of this article was to have you understand the importance of keeping your T-levels in check. Now, a lot of the research cited above has been performed using testosterone treatments, but this does not mean that you need to consider it as well. Unless you have an ailment that is holding your body back from producing T, there is no reason to consider artificial treatment. The natural route is the best route. Step one is to measure your T to find out where you are, after which you can begin making the simple changes in diet and lifestyle to ramp up your natural production.

Read More: 5 Easy Ways To Boost Your Testosterone

Mo Saleem

Mo is an independent men's health researcher and publisher of TripleYourT.com. Having overcome the symptoms of chronic fatigue, brain fog, and a lack of motivation, his mission is to provide men with the evidence-based action steps to help naturally optimize their testosterone levels.

Is There Anything To Learn From Rap Star Murderer Thug Gucci Mane?

November 29, 2017 | by Alfonso Taft | Link | Original Link

What can ROK readers learn from the masculine principles of the notorious rapper Gucci Mane? For starters, Gucci Mane is a textbook alpha male, violent, high status, and charismatic. Rather than dwell on the degeneracy that is hip-hop culture, a proactive approach is to study the ridiculous plights of alpha male psychopaths like Radric Davis, aka Gucci Mane.

Gucci Mane Killed A Man

During a heated feud with rival Atlanta rapper Young Jeezy, Gucci Mane was set up by a female "friend," otherwise known as a thot. Under the impression he and the thot would "hang out," he accompanied the thot to her apartment on the night of May 10, 2005. While inside, five masked men stormed in with weapons and brass knuckles. After hitting Gucci with brass knuckles and threatening to kill him, the assailants tied up and pistol whipped Gucci's friend.

Outnumbered, Gucci put up a fight and somehow, someway, got a hold of a weapon. In a scuffle, shots went off and the assailants scurried out, wounded, bleeding. Three days later, the body of Henry Lee Clark III was found near a local Atlanta middle school.

On May 19, 2005 Gucci Mane turned himself into DeKalb County police on murder charges. Gucci Mane admitted to shooting at the masked men but maintained he acted in self-defense. Gucci posted $100,000 bond only to later return to jail months later due to a prior assault charge. In the Winter of 2006, the murder charges against Radric "Gucci Mane" Davis were dropped.

"There wasn't enough evidence to meet the elements of murder," said Gucci's Lawyer, Dennis Scheib, "Based on what he said and some other information, it came out that it was a self-defense situation. It was going to be either a robbery, an aggravated assault or a murder."

Gucci's will to survive in a fight or flight, life or death situation is a testament to his primal instinct. His respect also would've be in question if his ice cream cone chain was snatched by his rivals.

In the hip-hop world, it's a great embarrassment to have your chain snatched. The robbing of chains is meant to emasculate the former chain wearer and dethrone him of his bright and shiny status symbol. If his chain had been taken from him, Gucci was sure to face taunts on social media and a decrease in status. The chain as a status symbol can make you a target. Gucci Mane showed that he was literally down to die for his chain.

Charisma

How did Gucci react after murder charges were dropped? He bodaciously bragged about his killing and profited from it, literally making a killing. Gucci rapped about the legal murder in a song called "truth" where he taunted his rival Young Jeezy:

"Go dig your partner up nigga, bet he can't say shit," Gucci raps. The song also features audio of television reporters talking about the slaying. Clearly, Gucci has a killer instinct for self-promotion.

In a hip-hop fiefdom reminiscent of the wild west, or war-torn Africa, a rapper killing a guy and getting away with it is the equivalent of winning the lottery.

Gucci Mane is a psychopath

In November 2010, police spotted Gucci Mane driving recklessly in his white Hummer. When they caught up to him, police witnessed Gucci punch a man he was arguing with. After ignoring police, Gucci was pepper sprayed and booked on a slew of charges including “damage to government property, obstruction” and “driving on the wrong side of the road.” In court, many of the charges were dropped and a plea of mental incompetence was filed on Gucci’s behalf.

A ruthless and psychotic alpha male, The East Atlanta Santa was arrested in January of 2011 for kicking a woman out of his moving car. After Gucci plead guilty to two counts of battery, reckless conduct, disorderly conduct, the woman later sued Gucci Mane and won a reported $57,161.

In January 2011, The Superior Court of Georgia’s Fulton County ordered Gucci Mane to a psychiatric hospital due to the mental incompetence filing. The judge ordered that Gucci be transported to a “111-bed psychiatric and chemical dependency treatment facility,” where he would “undergo tests to determine mental health.” Shortly after Gucci was released from the Georgia mental institution, he tattooed an ice cream cone on his face.

Tribal Status

For many, his facial tattoos are considered degenerate, but to others they are a high ranking symbol. Gucci's gold teeth could be interpreted by many as "thug" and low-status, but to others Gucci's gold teeth are a symbol of hierarchy and a commitment to a criminal lifestyle.

Who ranks higher in the criminal underworld hierarchy: the man with no tattoos or gang affiliation or a man with face tattoos, gold teeth, and a reputation for killing his rivals? For most of us who live outside the criminal hierarchy, his facial tattoos and gold teeth say "don't fuck with me, I'm crazy." A violent and unpredictable drug addict, Gucci Mane has been arrested for assault four times.

For ROK readers, it's important to take note of the fact even dangerous alpha males like Gucci can be tricked by thots into getting set up for a robbery or potentially killed. Trickster thots can be dangerous at minimum, to any man.

Gucci has been on the brink of death but in December 2013, he was on the brink of a lifetime of incarceration. In December 2013, Gucci was "charged in federal court with two counts of possessing firearm as a felon." Gucci was facing a maximum of 20 years in prison if convicted. He later agreed to a plea deal and served three years.

Released in May of 2016, Gucci emerged from his incarceration a changed man. He's now completely sober and living a crime free life. Gucci got married in the Fall of 2017.

Few men are rich. Few men who go to jail remain rich. Few men kill a guy, go to jail, and remain rich afterward. There is only one man who did it, Gucci Mane. He somehow managed to pull it off.

Read More: Why Does Jay Z Still GET A Celebrity Pass Compared to Chris Brown?

Alfonso Taft

Alfonso Taft is a surfer stoner All-American Aryan alpha male quarterback. Raised in the Northeast, he speaks with a Southern twang for no apparent reason. Host of America's #1 Chadcast.

3 Depressing Realities About Living In Eastern Europe

November 30, 2017 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

In January of this year, I packed my things and got on a one-way flight to Budapest, Hungary to start my life anew after nearly two years of living in Chicago. This isn't my first experience living abroad—I spent part of 2014 in the Philippines—but it's the longest time. Aside from some stints in Ukraine, Serbia, Poland, and Sweden, I've been in Hungary for all of 2017.

Do I like it here? Mostly.

Don't get me wrong: Hungary (and everywhere else in Eastern Europe) is a massive upgrade over the U.S. in everything that matters. The streets are clean and safe, the women are cute and loose, and the cost of living can't be beat. But after nearly a year in poosy paradise, the bloom is off the rose. Here are some annoying realities of living in eastern Europe that you'll just have to get used to if you're an expat…

1. Many basic services are horrible

Despite being “poor” countries, every Eastern European country I’ve been to has better infrastructure than the U.S., Serbia being the only exception. Poland has the nicest, most modern trains and train stations I’ve ever been in. Hungary’s trains are not as modern but just as fast, and the Budapest Metro and tramways are a delight to ride, with clean stations and cheap fares. Even Ukraine, a third-world country, has trains that always arrive and leave on time, something that Amtrak can’t manage.

Unfortunately, if you ever need to mail anything, you’re in for a world of pain.

Hungary’s own postal service, Magyar Posta, is fairly decent, though blockheaded. For example, I once had to receive a new credit card that was shipped internationally, and the delivery was delayed twice because I supposedly wasn’t home to receive it, even though I had been home all day both days. Turns out that because I hadn’t posted my name on my mailbox, the mailman couldn’t figure out that yes, this was where I lived. He didn’t even attempt to ring my doorbell or knock; he just took the package and skated off.

In a bizarre reversal of how things usually work, private couriers in Eastern Europe are usually worse than government postal services. For example, if a driver from DHL can’t find a place to park near your front door when he comes to deliver your package (which is very possible if you live in the center of a major city like Budapest), he’ll just drive off and report that you weren’t home.

Your only recourse is to either schedule a new delivery (and risk the same thing happening again) or go to their logistics center—which will be located more than an hour away via public transit—to get it yourself. For example, when DHL failed to deliver a box of nutritional supplements, I had to ride all the way to the end of one metro line, take two separate trams, then walk to their headquarters for twenty minutes to pick it up.

These kinds of incidents are the norm here. Expect bad customer service, slow service at restaurants, slow food delivery, slow everything. Hungarians and other Eastern Europeans are all about doing the bare minimum on the job, a holdover from the communist era, when there was no incentive to perform well.

In another example, I once went to a Vodafone store to top-up my phone plan twenty minutes before closing time and was told that they “might not have time” to do it, even though the store was empty and topping up takes about three minutes.

2. Convenience is middling to nonexistent

Unlike Aaron Clarey, I didn’t expect Europe to be full of 24-hour Walmarts where I could wander in at three in the morning in my boxers to do my grocery shopping. However, Europe is missing a lot of the comforts that Americans take for granted. For example, Sunday shopping is severely restricted in Hungary, with most stores closed. If you’re out of food or anything else and the 24/7 convenience stores don’t carry it, you’re shit out of luck until Monday morning.

Similarly, Europeans love to nickel and dime people, and many things that are free in the U.S. cost money over here. For example, not only do you have to pay for plastic bags when you go shopping, you have to bag your own groceries like a slave. You have to pay to use a shopping cart (though you get refunded when you’re done). You have to pay for ketchup when you go to McDonald’s. You even have to pay to use the bathroom in many places, even at restaurants where you’ve already bought something (I’m told this is to keep Gypsies from falling asleep in them).

Granted, none of these expenses are very high, and once you’ve settled into a routine, you can adjust to early closing hours and other realities of European life. But there’s something to be said for convenience. I like being able to go out and buy groceries at ten at night if I need to, and I don’t like having to carry a dozen coins in my pocket in case I need to use the can when I’m out. I definitely don’t like having to bag groceries, because that’s what retail workers are for (and also because I forget to bring a bag when I go shopping half the time).

3. Degeneracy is increasing

Don’t get me wrong: the most degenerate day you’ll have in Hungary is better than an average day in the U.S. Open homosexuality is either nonexistent or barely noticeable in Eastern Europe, and women on average are better-looking and more feminine here. However, globalism’s effects are increasingly evident even in this corner of the world.

For example, in Hungary, tattoos, piercings, and cotton candy-colored hair are becoming more prevalent among young women. Budapest has an increasing number of bars and cafes with tattoo parlors on site, so you can get a dragonfly stamped on your ass while you enjoy a cup of coffee. Hungarian women are also starting to get fat, which becomes obvious if you cross the border into Ukraine: the women suddenly gain two points of attractiveness and lose twenty pounds on average.

Similarly, Tinder, once one of the easiest ways to meet women in Eastern Europe, has significantly dropped off in quality over the past year. In Budapest, women on Tinder have become increasingly flaky, refusing to answer messages and using the app to gain unearned attention from men. Smartphone addiction and online attention whoring have also been on the increase in Eastern Europe, meaning that meeting girls is only going to get more difficult as time wears on (though the further east you go, the slower these trends are occurring).

I don’t mean to sound negative: I’ve enjoyed my time in Hungary so far and would not even entertain the thought of moving back to the U.S. Despite the problems I’ve described, the quality of life in Eastern Europe is incredible and I’m grateful that I’m able to live out here. But anyone who thinks that this part of the world is all sunshine and blowjobs will be sorely disappointed.

Read Next: 8 Things That Eastern Europe Girls Have Said To Me That Blew My Mind

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Instagram, SoundCloud, Twitch, VK, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice, Affirmative Right, and other sites.

Millennial College Graduates May Never Own Their Own Homes

November 30, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

In February of 2016, I walked out of my corporate job for the final time to my new life of freedom. I anticipated several years of being a poor digital nomad, scraping by with $1,000-$2,000 a month until my businesses got some traction, or I had to return to the rat race.

But things ended up way better than that within a short time period. So much so, that I began to research the idea of buying a home in one of my favorite adopted Eastern European cities. The criteria was relatively simple:

- It had to be in a "East-Central" country that had some Western perks but was not so far gone in the liberal cesspool, like Germany or France.
- It had to have a very anti-immigration policy bestowed within it's political culture. I have no interest in buying a home in a city, only for it to turn into a dump within a few years.
- It needed to be reasonably sized (70 square meters or bigger), and while not in the direct city center, within 1 or 2 metro or tram stops.
- Priced between $200,000-$300,000; my goal was to have a monthly payment of less than $1,000.

This left me with the Czech Republic, Hungary, and Poland. All are places I enjoy. The simple goal of this investment was to buy a property in up-and-coming areas that will likely continue to grow over the years. The plan was to Airbnb it out for most of the year, and maybe live in it sometimes myself. Or, depending on local laws, simply rent it out to a local on a yearly lease and try to eek out a bit of profit.

I was not looking to get rich off of this. I merely hoped for maybe a couple hundred dollars profit a month, and to get in before prices potentially skyrocket in a few years. I am okay with even taking a small monthly loss on it, if it came to it.

The Situation Millennials Face

Note: I realize these numbers below are applicable to California, and that the situation is vastly different in other parts of the US.

As the end of 2017 approaches, I realize what a shitty situation many college graduates are truly in. To give some perspective, my parents bought their first house at 25. I was born when my father was 27 and mom was 26. To buy that first modest honest in a California suburb, I believe they paid about $250,000. They received the down-payment as a gift from one side of grandparents.

My first job in San Diego, post-graduation, paid me $54,000 a year. My take home pay off of that was $2,800 a month, or $33,600. I'd usually receive a bit back in tax returns at the end of the year, so let's round up to $36,000.

When I lived in Los Angeles and worked as an engineer, I made $86,000. My take home pay off of that was $4,400 a month, or $52,800 a year. I'd usually receive a bit back in tax returns at the end of the year, so let's round up to $55,000.

To buy that same house now that my parents bought in 1990 would probably cost upwards of $700,000. Let's say I managed to put 10% of that home price down, plus get a 3% mortgage rate over 30 years. The numbers look something like this (keeping in mind a take-home pay of $4,500):

Of course, getting $70,000 to put down on something isn't even realistic. When making that $86,000 a year, the cost of living was so high that I only managed to save maybe $500 a month. At that rate, it would take me 140 months, or nearly 12 years, to save the down payment. This would have put me at roughly 37 years old, and who knows how the prices would look then.

The 9-5 Model Doesn't Work For Home Ownership

We can agree on that, right? The lack of true gains in 9-5 pay, combined with the housing price rise over the years, has resulted in your average college graduate being completely priced out of the housing market. I don't think I need to make the argument that the true path to freedom these days is to build your own business or income stream—one way or another.

So, in my case, I did exactly that. I'm now making more money from online business than I ever did in a corporate job (more than double). Except now, because I'm self-employed, getting a loan from a bank to buy a home is completely out of the question. I'm not sure how the foreign banks will be, because I haven't gotten that far in the process yet. But getting a loan from a US bank? Not gonna happen in a million years.

I would have never been able to save up enough money at my corporate job to afford a home, especially in California. So I migrated and built a business, and yet am still in the same position. Now, obviously this is wildly different circumstances—and there are many more nuances that go into buying property abroad. The easy solution is to just save the money and buy it in cash in a couple years, which is likely the route I'll go. The other route is to start paying myself a "salary" from my company with me as the CEO, but that will still take at least a year or two of proving tax returns to qualify.

But truthfully, I don't know know what's going to happen to my generation. I don't know a single soul who is roughly my age who owns a home. They're all completely priced out of the market. It seems for the time being, most college grads are stuck in the 'make 45k and rent forever' market. And for the time being, it seems there isn't an escape to that.

If you want to learn how to build a harem of hot girls the easy way, get my book. For the best advice about dating and mating abroad, listen to the podcast.

Read More: How High Will Men Jump To Get Married?

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

The Past Is An Anchor

November 30, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s tempting to think that you can start over at any moment, just pack up your bags and head to new places, but like a shadow, your past will follow you. Wherever you go and whatever you do, your memories, experiences, and mistakes will never be far behind.

The lives of my parents shaped me as a child, which shaped the teenager I became, which installed the itches I had to scratch as a young adult, which propelled me to notoriety as a grown man, which pushed me to soft exile in a place I myself won’t confirm. In the moment it takes a woman I meet to search for my name on the internet, the entire distillation of my life is presented to her eyes in computerized form. In the seconds it takes a man to connect my face to a name he’s heard before, he sees a frustrated 19-year-old guy who was stuck being friends with girls and nothing more. In the hours it takes a journalist to write a hit piece on me, images flash of a little boy playing by himself, discovering new patterns.

Everything that happens in this moment is anchored to everything that happened before it, and this I can't escape. A random whim or flight of fancy I once tickled is still with me today, its unexpected repercussions I will never shake. A spontaneous flash of creativity in the past firmly shackles me in the present.

I wonder what it would be like to hit the reset button and start with a new identity, a fantasy that can only come from the mind of a man who wishes to reverse his fame and go back to being a nobody, but this heavy anchor I must lug around with me, even to a tiny village where it would just take a month or two until a local recognizes me. The gossip and the looks and the paranoia follow. You either die a hero, or live long enough to see yourself become a meme, one that always stays with you.

When I'm sitting in public, I don't put my back to the door. I scan every face. By now I can tell when someone knows me, when they're talking about me, when they're brave enough to take a picture on the sly. I have a speech ready for when she finds out, and I watch her face carefully as she decides to take it or leave it. I don't invest time making friends with normal people because they won't be able to handle what I've said in the past. Choosing to be alone more than not stops a lot of surprises, but I'm still ready for a loud knock at the door. If I must go to a new land tomorrow, and leave everything behind, including the little plants that I water every week, so be it.

What have I done?

This anchor weighs on me heavily. I'm squeezed in tight, my body cramps. Why write a new book when it will be burned? Why open a new internet site that will be shut down? Why do a lecture when the hotel will cancel at the last minute? Why open a cute hipster cafe in old age when protesters will show up in front? I wait for something to change, but I know that nothing will. People have their own anchors to deal with than worry about mine.

One day I will burst. I can feel it coming. In a moment of beautiful rage, I will use all my strength and pick up my anchor and lift it over my head and throw it at whatever or whomever I want to destroy. My target will perish, I have no doubt, but attached to my leg is a shackle and chain. I will fly through through the air and be destroyed myself. Everything that happened to me, and everything that happened to my parents, their ancestors, Adam, the first atom, and the whole of the universe will blaze before my eyes. My anchor will explode into 10,000 pieces as my consciousness returns to the source. Finally, I can stretch.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: You Become What You Fight

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Colorado Man Discovers 11-Year-Old Daughter Is Not His, Still Forced To Pay Child Support

November 30, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Fox 31:

Chris Atkins leads a life that might be stranger than any episode of “The Maury Povich Show.”

The daytime talk show host has made a living out of revealing DNA test results to squabbling couples, but Atkins already knows DNA has proven he’s not the father of his ex-wife’s daughter, who was 2 1/2 years old when the couple divorced.

But since the truth didn’t come out until the girl was 11 and his name remains on the birth certificate, he is legally obligated to keep paying child support.

“It doesn’t make any sense to me,” said Atkins, who hasn’t had contact with the now-15-year-old girl in four years.

The cuckold in question

The 48-year-old said he should be allowed to maintain visitation with a girl he considered his daughter or if not, be allowed to stop paying $730 a month in child support and health insurance.

“I just want my daughter, but I can’t even see her, but yet I’m still paying child support. And the biological father has been found and he gets to spend time with her. I don’t get nothing,” Atkins said.

He accused his ex-wife Lori Lonnquist of ignoring court custody orders that grant him visitation while still collecting child support.

When asked if she was being greedy, Lonnquist said, “Maybe, but I don’t feel bad about it, I really don’t.”

Lonnquist insisted Atkins abandoned any relationship with her daughter when he learned she wasn’t biologically his. Atkins denied that and said Lonnquist refused to facilitate visits.

“I went to court and I said ‘I’m not seeing my daughter, but I’m still paying.’ (The judge) said ‘What do you want me to do arrest her?’ And I said ‘Yes sir, something.’ He said ‘It’s out of my hands.'”

When asked if she was taking advantage of the situation, Lonnquist responded, “Maybe so, but that’s also not on me. My kid doesn’t want to see him. She wants nothing to do with him.”

Lonnquist said she would agree to stop collecting child support from Atkins if he would agree to terminate his parental rights.

Denver family law attorney Ron Litvak said Lonnquist’s suggestion is not a realistic option.

“It`s very rare that a court will ever allow someone to terminate their parental rights unless someone else is willing to step into that role. The courts are not usually going to do that,” he said.

The most obvious “someone” would be Logan Doolen, the girl’s biological father. But the Aurora man said he has no intention of stepping to the plate.

Doolen said he feels bad for Atkins, but “on the flip side, if I would have to pay child support that would be messed up too.”

Lonnquist said she doesn’t think it would be right for her to go after Doolen for child support.

“Because he has his own family, he has his own life. I don’t think that’s fair to come onto somebody when they didn’t know for 11 years that they didn’t have a kid and say ‘Hey, by the way, you’re going to pay child support for a kid that you didn’t know was yours.’”

Atkins said he only learned the truth when Lonnquist told him she wanted to legally change her daughter’s last name because she was getting remarried.

Atkins refused to agree to the name change and that’s when he said Lonnquist told him the girl wasn’t really his anyway.

“So the alarms went off and we had a DNA test done and she’s not my biological daughter that I raised for 11 years,” Atkins said.

After Atkins learned the truth, he tried to submit the DNA test to an Arapahoe County judge, but the family law judge refused to accept the evidence because Atkins, who represented himself at the time, didn’t know the legal rules for submitting evidence.

When Atkins came back later with an attorney, his appeal was denied because the judge said he had already been given his opportunity to submit the DNA results.

“You know, I don’t want pity, I just want everybody to know this is happening. It’s not right, it is not right,” said a frustrated Atkins, who is now on the legal hook to keep paying child support until the girl turns 19.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: Man Must Pay $30,000 Child Support For Someone Else’s Kid

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

The Oxford Circus Panic On Black Friday Confirms The British Spirit Has Been Conquered

December 1, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The British are among the most formidable people in Europe. Before the Great War they held the greatest Empire the world has ever seen. It was rightly said that the sun never set on British soil. But a recent incident in a London tube station demonstrates that the British have been conquered by liberalism.

What happened?

The incident occurred on the afternoon of November 24th at the Oxford Circus tube station. Although the British do not celebrate American Thanksgiving, they have adopted the terrible American custom of "Black Friday" so the subway was teaming with shoppers trying to get Christmas deals. Apparently, an altercation between two men inside the tube station set off a panic.

A number of passengers started to flee, thinking that they had heard gunshots. Once they got outside of the station, people on the outside also started to panic and flee. The police were called and two tube stations were shut down as a result. As anyone who is familiar with subway systems in large cities knows, shutting down two stations during rush hour on the busiest shopping day of the year is a big deal.

Scotland Yard tweeted out that people should get into the nearest building and huddle for shelter. This caused people to run into the nearest pub or restaurant. The terrified populace was hiding in the cellars of these businesses. A BBC producer described the panic:

> There was a mass stampede of people running and trying to get away as quickly as they could. They were crying, they were screaming, they were dropping their shopping bags. It was a very panicked scene. A couple of people said they thought it was a gunshot or a fire.

Social media played a big role in spreading the panic. Olly Murs, a British pop singer who was shopping at Selfridges, a British department store tweeted to his eight million followers that there had been gunshots inside the store.

By the time the whole panic was over, 16 people had been injured in the stampede. Fortunately, there were no deaths.

Keep Calm and Carry On

This panic is totally out of character with the Brits who are known for their stiff upper lip in times of crisis. These Londoners are the descendants of the people who conquered a vastly superior French force at Agincourt. This is the same group of people who defeated the combined French and Spanish navies at the Battle of Trafalgar. And the descendants of those Londoners whose motto during the German bombing was to Keep Calm and Carry On.

So what has happened to the British that has caused them to lose their courage?

Islamic Terror

The immediate reason for the Brits losing their nerve is the number of Islamic related terror attacks that have occurred in the past few years. This started with the "7/7" London bombing of the subway and a double decker bus. 52 people were killed as the result of the attacks and over 700 were injured.

In the past few years, the number of attacks have increased. In 2017 alone there were three terrorist attacks. The first was happened in March when a man drove his car into pedestrians on Westminster Bridge killing eight. Two months later another Islamic attack happened at an Ariana Grande concert in Manchester that killed 22 and injured over 200, most of them children. Less than two weeks later, three terrorists drove their van across London bridge killing eight. These attacks would be enough to put anyone on edge. There is no doubt that the people at the Oxford Circus thought another terrorist attack was underway.

Liberalism conquered the British

DAILY Mirror

What have I Done?

HORRIFIC BETRAYAL OF 1,400 CHILDREN

Asian gangs' appalling sexual abuse of young girls lasted 16 YEARS because people in authority were scared of being labelled racist if they tackled it...

Despite Islamic terrorism being the proximate cause of the panic, I don't believe Islam is the real problem. The problem with Islamic immigrants predates any of the 2017 attacks. Britain has been suffering from Muslim rape grooming gangs for decades now. The Rotherham rape gang operated for over 30 years before being broken up.

How could something so awful as the rape of thousands of English girls be allowed to continue right under the nose of the police? The answer lies in political correctness. The police felt that breaking up the rape gang would stir up allegations of racism and the politicians didn't want to lose a valuable voting bloc.

> The failure to address the abuse was attributed to a combination of factors revolving around race, class and gender—contemptuous and sexist attitudes toward the mostly working-class victims; fear that the perpetrators' ethnicity would trigger allegations of racism and damage community relations; the Labour council's reluctance to challenge a Labour-voting ethnic minority; lack of a child-centred focus; a desire to protect the town's reputation; and lack of training and resources.

Thus, the lives of these young girls were sacrificed to the false god of progressivism—the authorities were more afraid of being called racist than they were making protecting their daughters from pedophiles.

How did progressivism (or liberalism, I use the terms interchangeably) become such a deep part of the make-up of the men of the West that it was possible to overcome their natural revulsion of injustice? It was a gradual process that started with the loss of faith in Christianity during the 20th Century. This cleared the path for the creation of the new religion of progressivism. The rest of the process was completed by the indoctrination camps that masquerade as the public school system and universities. The whole progressive apparatus is buttressed and maintained by the media, almost all of which is owned by progressives.

Conclusion

How do we take back control? The only way to do it will be to reverse the process. Start with yourself and try to root out all of your progressive indoctrination. The articles on Return of Kings can be very helpful. It's a process that can take years. Some will never have the courage to complete the process but it is still worth doing. If you have children, try to prevent them from being indoctrinated with progressivism in the first place.

Only once liberalism is uprooted will be able to adequately deal with problems like Islamic terrorism unhindered from the inverted moral system of progressivism.

Read More: British Media Doxes Small-Time Youtuber For Having Nationalist Views

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

15 Signs You Are Working A Bullshit Job

December 1, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Some jobs are physically tough. Some are intellectually demanding. Some are milder, more in the middle, yet still useful. And then there are bullshit jobs: paper-shufflers, keywords typers, CAPTCHA fulfillers, "digital project managers", consultants specialized in consulting, "coordinators" with barely anything in need to be coordinated and so on.

American Psycho has become commonplace. You don't need to wear fancy suits and stroll around New York to work a pointless job and pretend otherwise. More often than not, the will to pursue intellectual and hype, fashionable jobs, leads to this kind of situation: industrial mechanics students barely get useless, full-of-hot-air pseudowork to do.

Are you working an apparently hip, yet unsubstantial, void, aimless job? Do you feel like what you're doing is bullshit? Here are 15 tell-tale signs that, perhaps, your activity is all about saving appearances inside a wider yet hollow scam. But first…

On the purported origin of the expression

These meaningless employments have been used by a well-paid leftoid babyboomer who happens to occupy a pulpit at the London School of Economics (created by the early globalist Fabians). Anthropologist David Graeber published in 2013 an article "on the phenomenon of bullshit jobs", which since then got heavily promoted by the bobosphere—some of its sentences have been turned into taglines on display on the London subway. Ironically, the article itself is three-quarters bullshit.

The piece is indeed a disordered rant, mixing convoluted tangential remarks with outright contradictory stuff, for example when Graeber suggests that "the elite" created aimless employments to keep people busy before adding that "the system was never consciously designed." It was published on a leftist outlet, with the mandatory leftist flavor, and starts with a mandatory reference to arch-planner, authoritarian government-supporter Keynes.

Nowhere does the pulpit-occupier mention actual causes of why "we are not all working 3-4 hour days", i.e. that feminism, immigration, and outsourcing considerably lowered the price of labor, or that the rise of marketing and well-crafted appearances created an arms race and hence an actual need for propaganda spam PR.

Graeber's piece is also a prime example of the unfair double standards the System uses to support its annuitants against us. A LSE professor can speak without quoting any actual source, for example when he says that in the Soviet Union three clerks would sell a piece of meat, perhaps he made this up or some other official lecturer did and they all believe no one will check. He can also suggest that "the elite" does this and wishes that without being called a conspiracy theorist, in spite of the fact that he merely churns a narrative out. When we, however, discuss actual facts that show how flawed the official version of an event is, though, the MSM points a finger. Seems legit.

In spite of these glaring defects, which may be proof that Graeber is well integrated to his less than healthy social milieu, the expression took off. Its appropriator will milk it with a book to be issued next year. (On the record, he also managed to pull a marketing coup with Debt, a dispensable book that uses a tired Marxist argument of debt coming from private property to trivialize the current financial system.) Perhaps someone should write a book titled Bullshit Money: How To Get Rich By Reflecting Modern Nothingness.

Are you working a bullshit job?

Although these positions span across many names and places, they all have many traits in common. You may be working one of them if…

1. You work in an office. Most if not all BS happens with computers and a cushy workplace. Other places make it harder to pretend you're working when you are actually scrolling through your Facebook feed.

2. Your task is stupid, absurd, or much less important than told. On paper, you are calling prospects and ensuring a follow-up, in practice all prospects are dealt with before 10 AM and the follow-up is but a formality. Or, you were hired to a promotion task force, and you are typing keywords again and again in such a way that Google doesn't ban the pages you're editing.

3. Your job title is as impressive as it is obscure. If you're a Junior Brand Creative Strategist, a Relational Optimization Specialist, a Corporate Implementation Analyst or anything that could be made of random keywords, chances are, either you are doing a lot of interrelated yet different things, or very few things at all.

4. You have difficulties explaining to others what you're doing for a living. Not because it is very technical—even the most complex task can still be made accessible to the average guy—but because it is rather lacking in substance. "Um, I enter numbers on an accounting software, I make graphics that look good, and I get free cookies on the daily PowerPoint meeting."

5. Very few skills are needed. You studied hard in college yet you could do your job even if you were a high school dropout. Pushing buttons, typing numbers and keywords, avoiding the bad mood of useless bosses and HR, etc. And you still have to commute every day.

6. Deep down, you know your job should not even exist. A friend told me his days as an Internet marketer were mostly about cheating Google to promote websites, then getting banned by a newer version of the Google algorithm, then adapting and so on. This Google programmers-independent marketers game looks like when you have to dig holes and your coworker was hired to fill them.

7. Most employees around you are women. Where work is dispensable and comfy, women take over. The actual work, whether physical or intellectual, is done by men. Diversity-pushing companies will glad hire women to do a job they are unable to do. Then these women will outsource it to freelancers for a fraction of their own wage.

8. Gossip is a substantial part of the work. When tasks are simple or nonexistent and women are the majority, the psychosocial aspect becomes way more important than getting (real) shit done. If you don't fall in line, all protective shams will be put down—everyone pretends to work but you will be accused of not working—and ciao.

9. Procedures are unnecessarily complicated. Say you are working in security: most of your day consists in printing out entrance badges, calling your absolutely dispensable boss in front of newcomers, applying blindly stupid rules that ignore the context. As you are checking the "contract personal" box, you know you could not a stop a real security threat. When security guys can't do shit—they bear too much liability on their backs—smoke and mirror procedures kick in.

10. You sell stuff you know is useless. Lie bot, here I come! Do you know you could optimize your work and supercharge your company by taking this exclusive dietary complement? Word is, Phil Heath was using it secretly. Here, let me show you photos, and a video, and bogus testimonies. See, it's better than Kratom!

11. No one reads what you write. You churn out official reports or memos or whatever so that your company has plausible deniability and that managers, shareholders and the like can pretend everything is serious.

12. You relate to the notion of boreout.

13. You spend a lot of time on Twitter, Facebook, Bored Panda and innumerable "social media" websites. Poor bloggers struggle to publish numberless silly pieces so that overpaid employees scroll through their day.

14. Management is absolutely useless. As Dilbert could say, some managers are incompetent individuals who were put there so that they wouldn't do too much harm whereas the employees, working well by themselves, actually support the company. The most bullshitty guy I've ever seen was a Senior Consultant Manager who had no single employee to manage.

15. You must attend frequent meetings and seminars. Everyone knows these are the most used folding screen when it comes to hide nothingness.

Bonus: you spent hours reading about bulking on a budget or taking the best preworkouts, but doing nothing consistent through the day makes you too tired (or lazy) to even lift.

So what?

Most of current humanity was called into being because of an overly productive industrial system. When jobs are automated or outsourced, the obvious effect is an increased joblessness. But instead of sheer unemployment we witnessed a rise of bureaucratic jobs. We know that bureaucratic institutions tend to produce rationales aiming at maintaining themselves into existence and increasing their funding. At the same time, as women took over the workplace, they turned it into a cushier, childier, more conformist zone, where actual work matters much less.

Perhaps this giant heap of nothingness is a manifestation of the pointlessness of modern civilization. In any case, the better way to escape it is to leave the overpriced, crime- and degenerates-ridden metropolis behind and get a nice piece of land that can be toiled without a HR department.

Read Next: Should Students Be Able To Successfully Sue Their Schools If They Don't Find A Job After Graduation?

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Illegal Immigrant Found Not Guilty In Katy Steinle Murder

December 1, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via CBS Local:

Jurors Thursday afternoon acquitted the illegal immigrant accused of killing Kate Steinle as she walked with her father on a crowded San Francisco pier of all charges except for felony possession of a firearm.

A spokesperson for the Superior Court of California made the announcement that the jury had reached a verdict shortly after 3 p.m. Shortly after 4:30 p.m., the shocking verdict was announced that Jose Ines Garcia Zarate was found not guilty of all charges except for the gun possession charge.

Jurors have been deliberating on the case since Tuesday, November 21, after prosecutors and defense attorneys finished their arguments whether Garcia Zarate was a hapless homeless man who killed Steinle in a freak accident or a calculated murderer intent on playing a sick game.

The jurors broke for the long Thanksgiving holiday weekend on Wednesday, November 22. Deliberations have been ongoing since the jury reconvened this past Monday.

The jury of six women and six men considered charges against Garcia Zarate that include murder, assault with a deadly weapon and being a felon in possession of a firearm in the death of Steinle, a 32-year-old Pleasanton native and San Francisco resident.

> Kate Steinle’s father testifies and says his daughters last words were “help me, Dad”.
>
> Long Live #KateSteinle pic.twitter.com/r7uyK2amuY

> — Based Monitored□□□ (@BasedMonitored) December 1, 2017

Defense attorney Matt Gonzalez spoke after the verdict was read, first taking a moment to offer condolences to the Steinle family. “I hope that they do not interpret this verdict as diminishing in any way the awful tragedy that occurred,” said Gonzalez.

Gonzalez was also quick to ask that the jury’s decision be held in the proper regard.

“This jury’s verdict should be respected,” Gonzalez said. “They heard the evidence. They deliberated as a group. They heard read back testimony. They looked at the physical evidence and they rendered a verdict to the best of their abilities in accordance with the law.”

The attorney also anticipated the likely criticism that could be forthcoming from some high-profile politicians who had already commented on the case.

“For those who might criticize this verdict – there are a number of people who have commented on this case in the last couple of years; the Attorney General of the United States and the President and Vice President of the United States,” said Gonzalez. “Let me just remind them: they are themselves under investigation by a special prosecutor in Washington D.C. and they may soon avail themselves of the presumption of innocence beyond a reasonable doubt, so I ask that they reflect on that before they comment or disparage the results of this case.”

Sessions wasted no time attacking San Francisco’s Sanctuary City policies after the not guilty verdict in the high-profile trial was made public.

Sessions issued a statement placing the blame for Steinle’s July 1, 2015 death on the city’s Sanctuary City policies, which limit cooperation and communication between local law enforcement and immigration authorities.

“When jurisdictions choose to return criminal aliens to the streets rather than turning them over to federal immigration authorities, they put the public’s safety at risk,”

Sessions said. “San Francisco’s decision to protect criminal aliens led to the preventable and heartbreaking death of Kate Steinle.”

Steinle was walking with her father and a family friend in July 2015 when she was shot, collapsing into her father’s arms. Garcia Zarate had been released from the San Francisco jail about three months before the shooting, despite a request by federal immigration authorities to detain him for deportation.

He had been deported five times and was wanted for a sixth deportation.

Alex Bastian, a spokesman for the San Francisco prosecutor’s office, said the “verdict that came in today was not the one we were hoping for” but it was the jury’s decision and prosecutors would respect it.

Jurors did find Garcia Zarate guilty of being a felon in possession of a firearm.

Public Defender Jeff Adachi said that charge carries a potential sentence of 16 months to 3 years.

Steinle’s death put San Francisco and its “sanctuary city” policy in the spotlight, as Democrats and Republicans lashed out at city officials for refusing to cooperate with federal deportation efforts.

During the presidential race, then-candidate Donald Trump cited the killing as a reason to toughen U.S. immigration policies. Trump later signed an executive order to cut funding from cities that limit cooperation with U.S. immigration authorities, a policy that a federal judge in San Francisco permanently blocked Monday.

But the politics of immigration were not allowed to come up in the month-long trial.

San Francisco Deputy District Attorney Diana Garcia said she didn’t know why Garcia Zarate fired the weapon, but he created a risk of death by bringing the firearm to the pier that day and twirling around on a chair for at least 20 minutes before he fired.

She said he then ran away while other people tried to figure out what had happened. The bullet ricocheted on the pier’s concrete walkway before it struck Steinle.

“He did kill someone. He took the life of a young, vibrant, beautiful, cherished woman by the name of Kate Steinle,” she said.

Gonzalez said in his closing remarks that he knows it’s difficult to believe Garcia Zarate found an object that turned out to be a weapon that fired when he picked it up.

But he told jurors that Garcia Zarate had no motivation to kill Steinle and as awful as her death was, “nothing you do is going to fix that.”

He urged jurors to pick apart the facts of the case, instead of swallowing a ludicrous narrative by the prosecution that relied on circumstantial evidence.

Garcia called the defense’s argument just as implausible and told jurors to look at the entire picture.

The semi-automatic handgun used to kill Steinle was stolen from a federal Bureau of Land Management ranger a week before the shooting.

Before the shooting, Garcia Zarate had finished a federal prison sentence for illegal re-entry into the United States and was transferred in March 2015 to San Francisco's jail to face a 20-year-old charge for selling marijuana.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: The Lazy Man's Way To Subvert The System And Deliver Justice

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

What I Learned From Running Game On My First Trip Abroad

December 1, 2017 | by Jason Rogers | Link | Original Link

Four months ago, I decided to go to Colombia, despite not knowing a single soul in the entire country. At the time, my Spanish was weak, but I was also on a roll romantically. And I was itching to spit some game in Spanish.

Only an hour after landing, I met a beautiful latina with a tight, curvy body and a beautiful smile. Camila was the manager of the Airbnb I would be staying at.

Due to the situation, I mentally put her in the friend-zone. Nevertheless, excited to practice Spanish with her—we immediately hit it off—and talked far longer than her job required.

Fast forward to my first full day in Colombia. It was a Friday. After knocking out my work, I bustled out of my place. I wanted to explore—and to mingle.

I quickly saw a cute Colombian sitting on a bench

She was a petite girl with a nose piercing wearing bright red reading glasses, and, upon getting closer, she also had a devilish look in her eye. Perfect. I introduced myself in my broken Spanish. Her name was Alexandria.

I tried to tell her I was a lost gringo looking for directions to walk back home—to the USA. I don't think she understood my joke. But we kept talking.

I tried to tell her she looked cute, which I liked. She understood this. I then shared she also looked dangerous, which I was reluctant about.

My first attempt at a little push-pull in a foreign land

I'm sure I was wearing a smirk, enjoying every minute of the uncertainty. Despite having massive trouble understanding one another, we got on well. Being in a completely new place, chatting up this cutie, had me feeling amazing.

And for her, she was curious about me. I figured it was because I had some game and because I was foreign. She later told me she was also interested because I was "muy divertido," or very fun.

We talked for about twenty or so minutes. Then, keen to explore more before the sun set, I grabbed her number and left. From there, I did a few daytime approaches, but nothing materialized.

Then, around dinner time, I received a text. It was from the cute manager of the Airbnb. She wanted me to go out with her later. Only 24 hours deep into my time Colombia—and without other plans—I accepted.

Upon arriving at the outdoor bar, I found Camila siting next to a cute woman and another guy. We all hit it off immediately. A lot of laughs and a few drinks later, Camila was extremely touchy, and very flirty. If I wanted to hook up with her, the signs were there. And they were only becoming more blatant as the time passed.

I continued to tell her we were, "solo amigos," or just friends. This seemed to only make her more touchy and more physical. Then, we went to another bar, this one was indoors, and louder. Immediately, Camila escalated more, grinding on me and whispering naughty, delectable Spanish in my ear.

I was torn

This fun, sexy Latina with curves seemed ready. But I work from home, and with plans to live in this Airbnb for the next three months, I willed myself to excuse myself.

This turned out to be the right move—as she had a boyfriend / business partner directly connected to the Airbnb social circle I'd soon become deeply acquainted with.

Yikes.

Anyways, a week later, Alexandria, the first girl I cold approached in Colombia, and I found ourselves in my bed.

After a long night and good sex, I suggested she go. I told her I'd get her a cab—but she said she'd pay. Clearly, she wasn't upset. Over the coming months, I only continued to enjoy being away from home more and more.

Here's five things I learned from that first trip…

1. Tone of voice matters more than what you say

And while you and I both have heard about this principle, Spanish made me strongly focus on this area. Less fucks given on the content, and more focus put on either communicating in a playful tone of voice, or in a breaking rapport tone of voice, depending on the context, served me extremely well.

Besides good body language and eye contact, zoning in on tone of voice was probably the number one key that helped me consistently pull new women back to my place throughout my trip, despite being shit at Spanish.

2. Lacking fluency is no excuse

In fact, not having my verbal game forced me to sharpen my non-verbals, like eye contact, body language, non-reactiveness, and tone of voice. Which leads to the next lesson I kept being reminded of…

3. Having some game makes traveling exponentially more fun

Whereas many English speaking male friends I ended up making felt challenged and stifled romantically—especially around Colombian women, being able to enter a foreign land and hit the ground running makes the adventure and the experience far better.

Get social momentum before traveling. Without some momentum, I'd imagine the first impression you'd get of the new place would be far worse. And the last thing you want to feel is isolated and alone—thousands of miles away from home.

4. Staying non-needy and non-reactive is a universal trigger of attraction

Of course, right? But it's so true. When you can barely understand one another, I found that the non-verbals become even more important. It's harder to speak your way out of a self-imposed blunder.

Your ability to maintain tension, not respond to her text right away, and stay calm when a woman tests you cannot be understated—regardless of her culture.

5. If possible, build your social circle

If you're going to stay in the same location for a period of time when traveling abroad, invest in building your social circle. In the months following my story, my social circle turned into an solid source of fun. And it helped me tap into extra dating opportunities.

Travelers are adventurous. Being away from their families also forces them to extrovert. They're down to meet cool people.

While I don't recommend giving up cold approach and trying to supplement your dating results with social circle, a combination treated me really well. As you know, one complements the other, and vice-versa. With that, if you can, go explore my friend.

Read More: 5 Things I Learned From My First Trip To Europe

Jason Rogers

Jason Rogers is the creator of peakunderpressure.com, where men learn to build core confidence and create their desired dating results. You can also follow him on Facebook.

Why Asian Men Are Wimps

December 3, 2017 | by Adam Chan | Link | Original Link

Nice Guy Syndrome is a worldwide phenomenon. As a man who lives in a predominantly Chinese culture, I constantly bump into crowds of Chinese nice guys. This widespread problem used to shock and anger me. Why couldn't we just a grow a pair? Why can't Chinese guys learn to take charge of their lives? The answer is more complex than one would think and has to do with our Chinese culture and values.

As I write this article, please note that I will be including specific values and aspects of Confucianism, and not all of them. I also assume that most readers already understand the psychology and worldview behind Nice Guy Syndrome. And so I won't be explaining what nice guy syndrome actually is. (Here's my own summary of Nice Guy Syndrome).

Filial Piety

This is the Confucian value where you have to respect your parents and ancestors. It is the most fundamental value of Confucianism, and as a result is a huge value in East Asian culture as well.

Ever since we were boys, asian kids were taught always to respect and please their parents no matter what. This is the toxic mentality behind filial piety. In order to be a good boy, you would have to follow a set of rules that your parents laid out for you. If your parents were happy with you, this meant that you were a good person. If not then you're just someone bad. This is how many Asian guys develop their sense of self, and the reason why they have low self-esteem.

This moral obligation towards the parents also creates the need to seek approval. As children, we begin to believe that our parent's happiness towards us is our duty. And so we work really hard to please our parents. The more we believe that this is the case dealing with parents, we also begin to think this is the way the world works. Thus, the habit of seeking to please others also begins to develop.

For many Asian guys, their parents can also be very controlling. Especially the mother. Mothers will exercise a lot of emotional control over their sons. In return, sons will feel obliged to obey or attend to every emotional need that their mothers have. This kind of dynamic really just castrates a lot of Asian men. They don't know how to stand their ground and assert what they need with power. They would rather avoid feeling like a bad son, as compared to expressing what they really want and upsetting their mother.

Humaneness

This is the Confucian value of caring and concern towards others. It is considered an essence endowed by heaven, and a feeling experienced when a human is altruistic. On Wikipedia, Confucius is said to describe the rules of humaneness as "One should see nothing improper, hear nothing improper, say nothing improper, do nothing improper."

The need to uphold this value is not reflected through daily recitation every day after we wake up—it is a selfless and do-good mentality that is encouraged by the education system, workplaces, and social spaces. It shapes the way students, corporate professionals, and family members think.

And it produces a certain behavior from Asian nice guys. In order to uphold the "humaneness" in themselves, an Asian guy will do his best not to do anything wrong. Ever. His goal is to be selfless and maintain this image of godly perfection. There is sometimes nothing else that concerns a Asian nice guy other than the self-image that he is a man with "humaneness".

Asian nice guys would rather appear to be a man with “humaneness” than appear as someone with actual needs and concerns. The idea of being selfish and infringing on other people’s needs is probably an evil act. After all, it would be bad if an Asian guy were to see anything improper, hear anything improper, say anything improper or do anything improper.

In the end, the “humaneness” worldview does harm in rewarding those in the education system, workplace or social place who repress their individual desires, and put their selfless attitudes on display.

The Place Of A Social Citizen

Confucius did teach everybody of their place in society. This is the idea that it was everyone’s duty to play their unique role. It becomes a moral obligation.

What this means is that men have to manage all their relationships very well. Men learn to be “good” husbands, fathers, co-workers, citizens and friends, and they base their self-worth on how well they perform these roles. Any man invested in playing these roles will most likely develop a self-image based on these relationships.

Instead of cultivating their sense of self, Asian guys will focus on the self-image they have to project when playing these roles. It is more important to play my role in a relationship rather than assert my needs. Sometimes in order to save the relationship from going bad, an Asian guy would also compromise their needs in order to please the other person in the relationship.

Over time, many Asian guys feel trapped and a sense of powerlessness as they have to put in so much effort to maintain the stability of such relationships. The more invested they are in playing these roles, the less personal power they actually have.

Maybe this guy knows what he’s doing?

It takes a long time for any man to realise how damaging his nice guy behaviours are having in his life. For those Asian guys who are self-aware about their nice guy behaviours and how it relates to confucian values, hopefully they can become leaders and moral guides for the next generation of men being initiated through Confucian thinking and teachings.

Read more: The Difference Between The Nice Guy, The Asshole, And The Alpha Male

Adam Chan

Adam Chan writes about masculinity at apex-ology.com (a blog dedicated to men). In his spare time he tries to work on his daygame.

Pathetic NFL Donates $100 Million Towards Social Justice Causes To Appease Kneeling Players

December 3, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

In a move unlike anything seen from a major American sports league, the league will offer the money in hopes that it will end the ratings-killing protest movement begun by Colin Kaepernick in the preseason of 2016.

According to ESPN:

> The NFL's multifaceted offer earmarks at least $89 million over a seven-year period for both national and local projects, according to documents reviewed by ESPN. On the national level, owners this year will allocate $5 million, with their commitment growing annually and maxing out at $12 million per year from 2021 through 2023. At the local level, owners will put up $250,000 annually and expect players to match that amount, totaling $500,000 for each team. Players and owners can exceed that amount if they choose, with no matching requirement. In addition, there would be other fundraising opportunities, including telethons and auctions of jerseys worn in games.

If the players approve their end of the deal, a vote on the appropriation of the money could come as early as March. Commissioner Roger Goodell is believed to have the support of the owners to proceed with the deal.

As far as how the money would be distributed, ESPN reports:

> National funding would be allocated accordingly: 25 percent to the United Negro College Fund, 25 percent to Dream Corps and 50 percent to the Players Coalition, > which has filed 501(c)(3) and 501(c)(4) paperwork for nonprofit status as a fiscally sponsored project. This week, the coalition hired the Hopewell Fund to oversee and advise the group, which hopes to work with grassroots and nonprofit organizations in its areas of focus.

>
> Under the proposal, money at both the national and local level would provide grants for nonprofit organizations focused on law enforcement and community relations, criminal justice reform and education reform.
>
> A working group of five players, five owners (or owners' representatives) and two NFL staff members would help identify future initiatives to pursue.

There are major concerns with several of these groups that are earmarked to receive NFL dollars. The Dream Corps website reads like a Van Jones personal publicity site. The once-avowed communist and current CNN commentator appears on a couple different pages of the site, including a page which promotes Jones's new book.

The group also supports an initiative called Green For All, which has the goal to, "build an inclusive green economy strong enough to lift people out of poverty.

"Our goal is to make sure people of color have a place and a voice in the climate movement. That our neighborhoods are strong, resilient, and healthy. That as the clean energy economy grows, it brings jobs and opportunities to our communities. "

The other gigantic concern here is the 50 percent of funds earmarked for the Players Coalition. The money spent by this group will probably, at least in some significant measure, mirror the spending pattern of the NFL Players Association and how they've spent their money, which should serve as a source of great concern for all.

Back in October, tax documents revealed by conservative watchdog group 2ndVote showed how the NFLPA liberally (figuratively and literally) distributed funds to groups associated with George Soros.

From that report, we learned, "In 2013 and 2015, the NFLPA also contributed to the AFL-CIO's community affiliate, Working America. This group, according to Open Secrets, contributed $1 million to defeat President Trump during the 2016 election. However, the group's anti-Trump activities were not limited to the election. According to the Washington Times, '"Working America has since mobilized against the Republican tax-cut framework, denouncing it as the 'Trump tax scam.'"

In addition we learned that, "In tax documents recently released by 2ndVote, a conservative watchdog group, we learn that the NFL Players Association (NFLPA) made a donation of $5,000 in 2015 to the Center for Community Change Action, a George Soros funded and adamantly anti-Trump organization."

It's important to note that these instances barely scratched the surface of all the left-wing activist groups that had received funds from the NFLPA. Why would any of that change with considerably larger amounts of money given to activist players who are essentially ransoming the national anthem?

The NFL's surrender on the national anthem protests is turning out to be a very costly venture, both in terms of money and our country.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: How Social Justice Warriors Ruined Australian Football

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

The Juggalo March Was Classier Than The Feminist Women's March

December 3, 2017 | by Alfonso Taft | Link | Original Link

A political march that took place this past year exhibited rampant obesity, vulgarity, freakish hair dyes and obscene costumes. Another was The Juggalo March. Although both The Women's March and the Juggalo March featured similar hair aesthetics and profanity, The Juggalo March was decisively classier than November 2016's Women's March.

The word class is defined as "a number of persons or things regarded as forming a group by reason of common attributes, characteristics, qualities" or "a social stratum sharing basic economic, political, or cultural characteristics, and having the same social position." Classy is defined as "high class, rank, or grade; stylish; admirably smart; elegant."

Both marches featured a majority of mentally ill obese white people strung out on prescription drugs conducting science experiments on their own appearance. Having little respect for your appearance and wearing lewd outfits is low-class, or at least it has been for the past century. Although the bar was set disgustingly low by The Women's March, The Juggalo March may have been a classier event.

How Bad Was The Women's March?

The Women's March was one of the most disturbing things I've ever seen. Thousands of women who should be more preoccupied taking care of children took to the streets to protest a President who once made jokes about groupie sluts in a bus with a fellow man. The President joked about women letting him "grab them by the pussy" in response to their blatant thirst for his alpha male attention. The women in the march were literally wearing a joke on their head in the form of a vagina hat. At least the Juggalos know they are clowns.

During the March's rally, vulgar speakers boasted about their nastiness and perverted sexual desires. They belittled their foes and called for a violent overthrow of our democratically elected President. It also featured musician Madonna broadcasting her desire to "bomb The White House" as thousands of deranged loons fervently cheered.

The Women's March featured activists celebrating the butchering of infants. Many were demanding expanded access to government programs dedicated to killing their children.

The Women's March featured Linda Sarsour, a speaker who promotes the mutilation of female infants via Sharia Law. They wore offensive costumes and littered Washington DC with trash.

Women in the march were celebrated by Democratic politicians and cultural Marxist celebrities. This produced a response from the President who tweeted: "Watched protests yesterday but was under the impression that we just had an election! Why didn't these people vote? Celebs hurt cause badly."

The Juggalo March Had A Legitimate Cause

The feminists were celebrated as heroes in cultural Marxist media while The Juggalos were labeled a dangerous gang.

In 2011, a FBI Gang Task Force report labeled The Juggalos (a name for fans of The Insane Clown Posse) was a “loosely organized hybrid gang.” Since the 2011 report, American Juggalos have experienced denial of military service, lost custody of children, and having their names added to local gang lists simply for wearing Insane Clown Posse merchandise.

I’m not unfamiliar with Juggalos. They were rampant in my white rural high school. They ran drugs and threw lavish parties that I never attended. Overall, they seemed okay but shady and gross. Most of them grew up to be well-adjusted blue collar guys, their former Juggalo lives left behind them. The aim of their march was to get a retraction from the FBI concerning the 2011 Report.

The Juggalo March did not encourage any violence. The march attendees were peaceful, friendly, reasonably informed, and represented all ends of the political spectrum. Based Juggalos as well as Bernie ‘JuggaBros’ attended the March. They all gathered in Washington DC to collectively to say, “We’re not a violent gang. This is bullshit.”

What if fans of Madonna and Snoop Dogg were labeled gang members? They represent only two mainline celebrities who’ve called for the assassination of the President of The United States. To date, The Juggalos haven’t threatened anybody, they just don’t want be labeled gangbangers for wearing merchandise of their favorite rap group.

Although both feminists and juggalos share the same propensity for vulgarity, clownish outfits, and sugary snacks, the Juggalos are not nearly as volatile or murderous as modern day feminists.

I personally did not attend either marches but when observing the events closely online the visual comparisons are unavoidable. The optics of both of the events were horrifying, but the Women's March stood out as more sinister.

In a backwards society many are now referring to as "clown world," the mental patients are running the asylum. The honest clowns are labeled gang members while the oblivious clowns are celebrated as useful idiots.

Read More: What The Anti-Trump Feminist March on Washington Really Means

Alfonso Taft
Alfonso Taft is a surfer stoner All-American Aryan alpha male quarterback. Raised in the Northeast, he speaks with a Southern twang for no apparent reason.

16 Important Lessons From The Opening Scene Of Idiocracy

December 4, 2017 | by Ted Deveer | Link | Original Link

When asked what your favorite movie scene is most thinking people choose a moment from a subtle classic like a Stanley Kubrick movie, a timeless great like Casablanca, or a life-changing movie like the Matrix. Being less sophisticated than most, I am compelled to choose a three minute scene from a movie that—superficially, at least—is as stupid as Hollywood gets: the opening sequence of Idiocracy.

This scene shows the parallels, or lack thereof, between two couples at opposite ends of the socioeconomic and IQ spectrum. Two intellectuals keep on postponing having children while they advance in their careers. Meanwhile two low IQ "white trash" types have more and more kids. Even if you've seen it, pause here and re-watch the three minutes and then continue reading.

As stupid as this movie seems to be on the surface, these 180 seconds are chock full of wisdom that is worth articulating:

1. IQ matters

Your IQ determines far more about how your life turns out than we're comfortable admitting, for better or for worse. Smart people, thinking about their goals and ambitions, strategizing and implementing their goals, can plan for a long-term future that, well, idiots won't be able to do because they just lack the capacity to pass the marshmallow test.

2. …But an IQ that is too high can be a curse

But for all the PhDs and classy lifestyle of the intellectual couple, they overthink rather than act and ultimately descend into misery and early death because their life is barren, barren in the most literal sense of the word (having no kids) as well as in the metaphorical senses as well: empty and devoid of meaning. That's because…

3. Having children matters more

Without children, not only is your genetic lineage dead but civilization dies. The future belongs to he who shows up—and those without kids are not even showing up. When the idiots are the only ones who show up, they are the ones who then win, by definition.

4. Life's trade-offs aren't obvious

The intellectual couple, for all their cumulative IQ points and ability to work hard to focus on the future, just didn't realize that by postponing having children to earn more money and get more education they were condemning themselves to not have children at all. If life's long-term trade-offs were obvious, there would be many more deeply moral millionaires.

5. Values matter

How come the high IQ couple didn't realize the importance of having kids? Because values matter. They had a value system that prioritized education and money over children. Had their value system put children front and center, they wouldn't have made that trade-off. The intellectual couple admits this directly when the wife says "There's no way we could have a child now, not with the market the way it is. It just wouldn't make sense." They are letting the stock market determine if and when they have kids.

6. You can afford more than you think you can

The intellectual couple thought they couldn't afford kids when the idiot couple, with substantially less money, not only had the kids, but they're the ones who have descendants rather than disappearing from history. Think of your great-great-grandparents, who were surely very poor (well, at least 1 of your 16 was), and yet they were able to raise your great-grandparents so you could exist.

7. Don't postpone what's important

One of the most timeless messages of all classic traditions and religions is the brevity of life and, as a result, the importance of not putting off what is important to do. You think there's always another tomorrow, and there always is… until there isn't.

8. Time passes faster than you think

Another piece of classic wisdom is tempus fugit, "time flies" (although in the original Latin it is "time flees," a great image: time escaping like she is a bandit). The intellectual couple got old and the man died before they even realized it. They thought they had decades left when they just didn't.

9. Passive aggressiveness is a losing strategy

The intellectual wife, whose husband dies while masturbating, was consistently passive aggressive with her husband once the going got tough. When she says "Well, we've finally decided to have kids, and I'm not pointing fingers, but…" that is the sort of bitchiness that no man wants to put up with. And probably no woman, either. It's not a coincidence that that woman ends up alone, without even children to comfort her in her final years.

10. Indeed, bitchy women literally kill their husbands

Not only did the intellectual man die before reproducing, but the wife had pressured him to agree to artificial insemination and he died while masturbating for that very purpose. So it was the wife's pressure that directly lead to his death. As Ecclesiastes, that bottomless fountain of wisdom, pointed out: a bitchy woman is worse than death; in its original words (7:26): "I find more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets."

11. Even after failing in every aspect of life, the woman still thinks she's worthy of a great man

The high IQ woman is unable to realize how profoundly unattractive she is and that she missed the boat. She is cannot admit to herself the reality of her situation. She even says "…just as soon as the right guy comes along." She's a 50 year old woman sounding like a teenager, capturing a key truth that no matter how educated they are, women are still that naive, unrealistic little girl inside. Too many women never develop realistic expectations about life or about men.

12. Man is starting to conquer evolution, and this has dire consequences

Survival of the fittest has for all of human history (in fact, pre-human history) slowly weeded out those who would fail at life. But modern technology is quickly putting a halt to this, letting those who would not have been able to survive in an earlier era thrive.

The narrator of this opening scene makes the argument very explicitly: "Natural selection, the process by which the strongest, the smartest, the fastest reproduced in greater number than the rest, a process which had once favored the noblest traits of man, now began to favor different traits."

13. Modern technologies encourage idiocy

When the low IQ Clevon engages in a moronic activity and almost loses his penis (the doctor says "he impaled his crotch on an iron gate"), a modern medical technique ("recent advances in stem cell research") lets the surgeons save his "full reproductive function" so he can then have more children. The most advanced medical techniques were used to enable more generations of idiots.

14. The future isn’t going to be all it’s cracked up to be Venture capitalist Peter Thiel said it best: “We wanted flying cars, instead we got 140 characters.” Idiocracy is what the future is more likely to be like than the Jetsons. Be prepared for Gatorade water fountains. At least they have electrolytes!

15. Politics is largely a consequence of demographics

This opening scene is basically arguing that demographics matter so deeply that political situations are a consequence, overwhelmingly, of the demographic situation. Indeed, the entire movie argues that the dystopian, dysgenic future—of which the bulk of the movie is set in is framed—is a consequence of horrendous demographic choices by society for generations and generations.

16. There is one group you’re allowed to mock: poor whites

It is racist to mock blacks. It is anti-semitic to mock (((Jews))). It is sexist to mock women. It is transphobic to mock MTFTM trans people. For every group under the sun, it’s evil to mock them. With one exception: so-called “white trash.” They can be mocked endlessly and cruelly. In defense of this opening scene, the movie mocks the intellectuals even more brutally—although that mockery is less common in the mainstream media, and kudos for Mike Judge for doing so.

Stepping back, there’s a clear pattern to the differences between the high IQ and the low IQ couples here: the later celebrates life and the former is speeding towards death and then actually dies. The idiot celebrates life in moment after moment: Trevor having multiple affairs, his son playing football and screaming that he’s going to fuck all the hot girls (and his father beaming with pride!). They are Living, with a capital “L.” But the high IQ couple, despite their high IQ, can’t produce life, and can’t even enjoy the moment of their brief candle of life flickering.

They say that in medieval Europe the only man who could speak the truth to the king was the court jester. The world hasn’t changed all that much: only a silly, seemingly idiotic movie like Idiocracy can reveal eternal truths, truths that in our day and age you would be burnt at the stake for saying directly.

Much more about conspiracy theories and protecting your privacy.

Read More: 9 Important Lessons from A Clockwork Orange

Ted Deveer
I'm Ted, I read old books, and my interest in Stanley Kubrick has nothing, absolutely nothing, to do with my interest in conspiracy theories, not at all, no way. And I like my privacy.

Texas State University Prints Article Calling For White Genocide

December 4, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The student newspaper of Texas State University released an op-ed by philosophy major Rudy Martinez on November 28 called "Your DNA is an abomination". For anyone who doubts that the American university system has become a big leftist indoctrination mill, one needs look no further.

Since then, the article was quickly removed from the University Star's online edition. Before it got dropped into the memory hole, it was photographed, easily readable with magnification. Here's what it has to say.

Rudy Martinez flips his lid

It begins:

> "Now I am become white, destroyer of worlds."
>
> When I think of all the white people I have ever encountered — whether they've been professors, peers, lovers, friends, police officers, et cetera — there is perhaps only a dozen I would consider "decent."

The opening sentence is a phrase modified from a quotation in the Bhagavad Gita. Ripping off an ancient Aryan classic—gosh, isn't that cultural appropriation? Anyway, what's this "lovers" business? This Latino with a chip on his shoulder doesn't think his own women are good enough? Well, I shouldn't assume orientation; perhaps he practices the "love that dare not speak its name" with gringos. Either way, that's pretty pathetic.

> You were not born white, you became white. You actively remain white. You are estranged from yourself and, in that absence, have been instilled with an allegiance to a country that was never great.

Apparently college exposed him to "whiteness studies" theory. This weird politically correct academic discipline makes "whiteness" into the latest horror, yet strangely pretends it has nothing to do with European genetics. Why it's named "whiteness studies"—rather than some other of the many "-ism" words leftists have—is an unfathomable (((mystery))).

> In your whiteness, you are granted the luxury of not having to think about race daily. Your heartbeat does not speed up when you get pulled over and find yourself staring at the red-and-blue lights of the fascist foot soldiers we call the police. You don't leave your home wondering if you will ever come back. You > don’t give a damn.

Point of fact, cops do make me nervous. Worst case scenario, they can shoot me—sure, it’s extra paperwork on their part, but it would be of little consolation if I’m on a slab in the morgue. Actually, I was “profiled” by a black police officer once, but I’m not mad about it; surely he drew some conclusions about my long hair. In any event, when leftists say that people like me can’t understand the experience of others, they should start taking their own advice.

> Through the current political climate, in which a white supremacist inhabits the White House and those of his ilk would try to prove otherwise I see white people as an aberration.

Apparently he can’t handle his candidate losing. There are pills for that.

> Whiteness will be over because we want it to be. And when it dies, there will be millions of cultural zombies aimlessly wandering across a vastly changed landscape.

They already exist; they’re called Social Justice Warriors. The American educational system churns out a new batch every year. Since he’s one of the guys who got himself arrested protesting the Trump inauguration, it looks like he’s already well on the way to becoming another zombie.

> Ontologically speaking, white death will mean liberation for all. To you goodhearted liberals, apathetic nihilists and right-wing extremists: accept this death as the first step toward defining yourself as something other than the oppressor.

Well, if someone is dead, there’s not much to accept, now is there? However, I’m not interested in death. It’s the leftists who are doomed—their narratives are crumbling, and these zombies won’t walk the earth forever.

Who approved this?

My alma mater's campus fishwrap was one of thousands of training grounds for future MSM flunkies. Back then, I thought it was the absolute pits. Apparently the record has been surpassed.

Although that article was deleted from the University Star website for preaching the Party Line too openly, one wonders why it was approved in the first place. Denise Cervantes, their editor in chief, had the following to say:

> The original intent of the column was to comment on the idea of race and racial identities. We acknowledge that the column could have been clearer in its message and that it has caused hurt within our campus community. We apologize and hope that we can move forward to a place of productive dialogue on ways to bring our community together.

This almost certainly crossed the desk of their opinions editor, May Oliveira. Her Twitter account is now locked, but contained items such as the following:

> …in 2017 i need more videos of WoC beating the shit out of disrespectful white ppl

Gosh, that's not too inclusive, now is it? As for Martinez himself, he seems none too repentant:

> The article speaks for itself," he told The College Fix via email. "… Though my language, especially when I claim to have only ever met '12 decent white people,' could be deemed as hyperbolic (just barely), it has accomplished its goal: starting a conversation and outing racists."
>
> "… Was the piece racist? Nope; racist attitudes come from a position of power," Martinez added in his email. "The only group who have ever held true power in this nation are those who call themselves 'white.'

Ah yes, the old "prejudice plus power" shtick… Although he's a philosophy major, it looks like he's been taking some sociology too.

> In his email Wednesday to The College Fix, Martinez said that for those who find his column insulting, infuriating or racist, he has some reading recommendations. Namely, Frantz Fanon's "The Wretched of the Earth," Dr. Huey P. Newton's "Revolutionary Suicide," Valerie Solanas' "SCUM Manifesto" and "The Autobiography of Malcolm X.'

Alyssa Franks provided the cute illustration, "WHITE IS OVER! IF YOU WANT IT". Oddly, these renegades who want to "eliminate whiteness" don't practice what they preach. Talk is cheap; they can take the first step by playing with a toaster in the bathtub.

Whites made the world a better place

One could dismiss these as rookie journalists who haven't yet mastered the subtlety they'll need when they become MSM propagandists. (I have a notebook filled with clippings from my student newspaper which are nearly as snotty.) However, this episode points out some serious matters.

Quite likely, neither the writer, opinion editor, nor illustrator had attitudes quite like that before they attended college deep in the heart of Gringo-land. The university system was first developed in the Middle Ages to educate society's best and brightest. (That was developed by the "dead White European males" that professors complain about today.) Unfortunately, it's been turned against us, fashioned into a chain of propaganda factories. This is the end result of eight decades of corruption in higher education.

I might add that around the time of the Columbus voyage, writing by Latin American natives was in its very early stages. The easy to learn Latin alphabet—which you're seeing now, and which TSU's students all use—was developed by white guys in Rome. About four decades before Columbus set sail, white guys in Germany invented movable-type printing. Later, more white people invented linotype, electrical generation, computer technology, and the Internet. I've barely scratched the surface; Watson and Crick—a couple of White guys—discovered the DNA that Mr. Martinez is complaining about too.

See—we're not all bad! If whites didn't exist, then the comfortable lifestyles these pampered college students enjoy wouldn't exist either. Our technology also brings knowledge from all parts of the world within reach of everyone. Those achievements even enable countless ingrates to browbeat us. These ones in particular might consider transferring from TSU to STFU.

Read More: 3 Reasons I Will Never Apologize For Being White

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Study: Men Are Viewed As More Feminine If Their Wives Don’t Take Their Last Name

December 4, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Springer Publishing:

When a woman chooses not to take her husband’s surname after marriage, people perceive her husband as being higher in traits related to femininity and lower in traits related to masculinity. He is also perceived as having less power in the relationship. This is according to a study led by Rachael Robnett of the University of Nevada in the US. The research is published in Springer’s journal Sex Roles and is the first to examine whether people’s perceptions of a man’s personality vary depending on whether his wife adopts his surname or retains her own.

The tradition of women adopting their husbands’ surname after marriage is arguably one of the most widespread gender-role norms in Western cultures. In recent decades, it has gained attention from feminist scholars who want to understand why the surname tradition remains widely endorsed despite marked changes in the role that women play in society and in the labor force.

According to previous studies, women who violate the marital surname tradition are viewed differently from others. They are described in terms of instrumental traits that in a gendered society are typically assigned to men. These include having a higher status, yielding more power, being more self-focused, ambitious and assertive. These traits contrast with the expressive characteristics that are typically assigned to women, such as being more nurturing, kind and having less influence and power.

To date, researchers have not yet examined how a woman's marital surname choice influences how others perceive her husband. To this end, Robnett and her colleagues carried out three studies in the US and UK. The first two studies showed that husbands whose wives keep their own surnames are often described through terms that are counter to the gender-typical personality traits and power framework used for men. They are described in more expressive than instrumental terms, and are seen to hold less power in a marriage.

"A woman's marital surname choice therefore has implications for perceptions of her husband's instrumentality, expressivity, and the distribution of power in the relationship," says Robnett. "Our findings indicate that people extrapolate from marital surname choices to make more general inferences about a couple's gender-typed personality traits."

Results from the third study conducted by Robnett's team suggest that people are not unanimous in how they think about such cases. People who firmly hold on to traditional gender roles and can be described as hostile sexists react particularly strongly to a man whose wife retains her surname because they see him as being disempowered.

"We know from prior research that people high in hostile sexism respond negatively to women who violate traditional gender roles," says Robnett. "Our findings show that they also apply stereotypes to nontraditional women's husbands."

"This study joins several others in alluding to a link between traditions in heterosexual romantic relationships and power structures favoring men," says Robnett. "The marital surname tradition is more than just a tradition. It reflects subtle gender-role norms and ideologies that often remain unquestioned despite privileging men."

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: How The Government Is Robbing Men Of Good Wives

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

The Sexual Marketplace Is Hard But Not Impossible

December 5, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Are you disturbed by the present dating market? Well, in many ways you should be, especially if you live in a place like Toronto, Washington D.C., Seattle, or London. Yet there's a difference between criticizing the sexual marketplace and completely or half-giving up on it. I see countless men who have lost hope or, sometimes just as badly, keep doing the same things they have been doing and then bemoan the identical results they get.

There are countless men out there with far more disadvantages than us, including very physical ones, who are achieving the same sorts of things with women and on a number of occasions even doing better. One example I want to share with you is that of Maurice Simpson, who came to public attention for surgeries to help his severe medical condition and facial deformity, neurofibromatosis.

This woman agreed to have a child with him:

I'm presuming she was an 8, possibly an 8.5 before she got pregnant. With respect to Maurice, aesthetically-speaking he's a 0 or 1. Still, we know in this case that didn't matter. Although he's from Utah, hardly the worst place in America to find a marriageable or maternal woman, he did well with what is clearly a great attitude. The couple split, but that's beside the point. He put his seed into a woman who, in conventional terms, was way out of his league.

Men like Maurice Simpson are obviously outliers, as there are plenty of men in a position like his who are absolutely crushed by their appearance and/or impairment. Their experiences should nonetheless cause all of us to pause and reflect, irrespective of how many good quality notches we have. With game, unique achievements, or some sort of voodoo mojo, supposedly "no hope" guys can do a lot more than they think.

Many of your problems are self-inflicted or about perspective

Shane Burcaw and his girlfriend.

My life has been full of completed and half-completed flings and relationships. Having always believed in a form of plate-spinning, managing multiple girls simultaneously, I would see how many I could juggle at once. I was expecting successful logistics, ones that were in reality impossible. Of course, when difficulties (and rejections) invariably arose, at times I became disheartened. Whilst I never became fixated on the ones that got by, my biggest regret is the amount of time I spent on things other than self-improvement in particular areas.

With a little introspection, most guys will realize that their problems with women are a combination of things that are their own fault (and usually fixable), things that are normal to grow out of (an initial neediness in relationships, etc.), or things that just don't really matter (like certain kinds of girls who are unlikely to ever like you).

Someone like Shane Burcaw could worry about all the girls in the world who would not want to sleep with him due to his disability, let alone those in liberal feminist America. If someone deserves to complain about the state of the sexual marketplace, it is him or those in comparable situations. Regardless, similar to Maurice Simpson, he landed a cuter girlfriend than perhaps 90-95% of guys in the West.

Take note of the world but don't be defined by it

She’s not the 10 everyone said she was, but this guy’s doing well.

I and my fellow ROK authors will be the first to admit that there are serious issues with the sexual marketplace and not all men, far from it, are going to be winners. That’s not the end of the story, however. Inasmuch as reality is reality, many men have shown that success is possible, not to mention possible when some of them have challenges, ailments, and even grotesque deformities that you think would exclude them from any happiness with girls whatsoever.

Unless someone can think of presently unaired reasons as to why they can’t get a foothold in the modern sexual marketplace, self-improvement and game will still get you much of what you want in life and with women.

Read More: How To Deal With Intense Male Competition In The Sexual Marketplace

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why Net Neutrality Is An Unnecessary Fraud

December 5, 2017 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Last month, FCC Chairman Ajit Pai announced that the FCC will vote to end net neutrality regulations on December 14, reversing policy instituted by the Obama administration. Under the current rules, Internet service providers are purportedly forbidden from prioritizing certain types of traffic over others or charging users or websites extra money for faster bandwidth speeds. Given that Republicans hold a 3-2 majority on the FCC board, the net neutrality repeal is very likely to pass.

The left, cuckservatives, and Big Tech companies such as Google, Twitter, and Facebook have come out hard in favor of net neutrality, alleging that it will result in censorship by ISPs and higher Internet costs for consumers, allowing ISPs to hold the entire Web to ransom. Some alt-media figures have also fallen for this line: for example, Red Ice's Henrik Palmgren claimed that the FCC will "murder the Internet" on December 14.

All of this is hysteria.

The reality is that net neutrality has little to do with freedom of speech or consumer rights, and ending it will have little effect on the lives of the average American. Indeed, given how fervently left-wing tech giants like Google and Twitter are supporting net neutrality, ending it may actually harm them and keep them from censoring right-wingers, which is what they've been doing for the past three years.

Here's why you shouldn't care if net neutrality is abolished…

The Myth Of Net Neutrality

To begin with, “net neutrality” is a loaded and inaccurate term. It was coined by Tim Wu, a far-left lawyer and university professor who ran for New York Lieutenant Governor in 2014 on a socialist platform and campaigned for Bernie Sanders during the presidential race last year. Wu invented the concept of “net neutrality” as a solution to a nonexistent problem.

Everyone wants a free and neutral Internet, but “net neutrality” has nothing to do with this. Net neutrality refers to Title II of the Communications Act of 1934, which regulates what are referred to as “common carriers,” utilities that hold de facto monopolies and thus are required to adhere to standards of open access and use. Title II originally governed such things as phone service and electricity, but two years ago, the FCC’s 2015 Open Internet Order decreed that they applied to Internet service providers as well.

As Gab founder Andrew Torba has pointed out, existing legislation does not prevent ISPs from charging different rates for different types of services, which net neutrality advocates claim will become reality should the FCC end it. All “net neutrality” does is force ISPs to treat all Internet traffic equally. This benefits edge providers such as Google and Facebook by letting them avoid paying their fair share for bandwidth, while financially hurting ISPs:

TITLE II–COMMON CARRIERS

PART I–COMMON CARRIER REGULATION

SEC. 201. [47 U.S.C. 201] SERVICE AND CHARGES.

Title II doesn't prevent censorship

Title II doesn't prevent carriers from selling "tiers packages".

SEC. 202. [47 U.S.C. 202] DISCRIMINATION AND PREFERENCES.

For that matter, the nightmare scenario in which ISPs charge consumers extra fees to use certain services has never occurred in the U.S. or any other Western country. Despite net neutrality having only been law for two years, American ISPs have never sold Internet service like it was cable TV, forcing consumers to purchase individual packages. Indeed, the only two countries I could find where this model is used are Turkey and China, two non-Western countries whose governments strictly regulate online speech and censor websites on their own.

To put it simply, net neutrality is corporate welfare. Google, Twitter, Facebook, Netflix and other edge providers support it because it gives them a discount on their operating costs at the expense of ISPs, who must pay to maintain and upgrade the infrastructure that makes the Internet possible to begin with. Net neutrality has as much relevance to consumers as Coke vs. Pepsi, and net neutrality defenders are nothing more than useful idiots for Silicon Valley.

Returning Freedom Of Speech To The Internet

Net neutrality defenders who claim that ending it will allow ISPs to censor the Internet don't have a leg to stand on either. As Ajit Pai himself has pointed out, pro-net neutrality edge providers such as Google, Twitter, and Facebook have spent the past three years heavily censoring the Internet by manipulating search algorithms and banning right-wing users, under the guise of cracking down on "hate speech" or combating "fake news."

Indeed, here's a sampling of how left-wing social media sites and search engines have been censoring people at the same time they're crying about net neutrality ending:

- Twitter is preparing to purge all right-wing users on December 18 by using "smart cookies" to track users Internet activity and ban them for visiting sites they don't like, even if they're not violating Twitter's own terms of service. The site has already un-verified several major right-wing figures such as Richard Spencer, James Allsup, and Laura Loomer, while banning Baked Alaska and Blonde in the Belly of the Beast.
- Google has de-ranked RT and Sputnik for spreading "Russian state-sponsored propaganda" with no evidence to support their claim, an act of American/globalist imperialism.
- YouTube briefly banned Styxhexenhammer666 and several other major hosts, before reversing the bans and claiming it was a "glitch." The site has also been "sandboxing" videos by pro-white media outlet American Renaissance, making them impossible to search for on the site or even be seen on AmRen's own channel.

The FCC's own filing against net neutrality cited Gab being banned from the Google Play and Apple stores for "hate speech," Twitter banning an ad from Tennessee Republican Senate candidate Marsha Blackburn, and the Daily Stormer being banned from numerous domain registrars as examples of how edge providers have abused their power in order to control thought and speech online.

These companies hold a monopoly on worldwide Internet communication and use: it is virtually impossible to most people to get by without using at least one of them in some capacity. And yet Google, Twitter, and Facebook want to manipulate and censor information online while claiming to be defenders of a free and open Internet? The chutzpah is so thick you could cut it with a knife.

The reality is that U.S. law already has a precedent for forcing both edge providers like Google and Twitter as well as ISPs to allow any and all speech on their platforms, making net neutrality completely unnecessary. Contrary to the leftist/libertarian argument that these corporations can ban whoever they like due to the "free market," the Constitution establishes set limits on how private entities can behave towards those who use their property.

In 1946, the Supreme Court decided the case of Marsh v. Alabama, in which a Jehovah's Witness was arrested for trespassing because she was distributing religious literature in Chickasaw, Alabama, a town that was wholly owned by the Gulf Shipbuilding Corporation. Marsh argued that because the town's roads and sidewalks were the only means by which she could exercise her freedom of speech—and because the town of Chickasaw had been open to public use in all other respects—the trespassing arrest violated her rights under the First Amendment.

In a 5-3 decision, the Supreme Court ruled in Marsh's favor. Justice Hugo Black decreed that private entities do not have the right to ban speech on their property if they happen to own a monopoly on the means by which speech can take place. Black also argued that the more that private entities open their property up to public use, the fewer rights they have to control or ban what people do on that property.

Given that Google, Twitter, Apple, Facebook, and other edge providers are publicly-accessible entities that have deliberately pushed for monopoly control over the Internet, it's clear that Marsh v. Alabama prohibits them from censoring right-wingers. The statute also applies to ISPs, since they wield a monopoly over Internet access. All it would take to shut down online censorship is a halfway-decent lawyer arguing that these left-wing Big Tech companies are literally violating the Constitution.

Indeed, Ajit Pai's comments attacking Twitter and Google have scared leftists into thinking that the FCC will go after edge providers next. For example, here's a Tweet from Sleeping Giants, the leftist pressure group that successfully convinced several companies to drop their advertising from Breitbart:

> Not only is this shameless shill trying to crush #netneutrality for his old employer, he's trying to use his position to threaten platforms so they'll stop enforcing their own hate speech policies. This guy is something else. https://t.co/AwrOTBKEG7
>
> — Sleeping Giants (@slpng_giants) November 28, 2017

From a freedom of speech perspective, net neutrality laws are completely unnecessary, since free speech rights on ISPs and edge providers are guaranteed by Marsh v. Alabama. Given that net neutrality completely failed to keep Google, Facebook, and other Silicon Valley giants from censoring the Internet—and their current howling in support of net neutrality—it's possible that the existing regulations have done more harm than good.

Not My People, Not My Problem

Unlike in years past, it is unlikely that net neutrality defenders will be able to win over the FCC. While the cause of a free and open Internet used to unite leftists and right-wingers, the heavy-handed censorship by Google et al. in the name of fighting "hate speech" in the past three years has woken countless people to the fact that net neutrality is a fraud.

Ultimately, the net neutrality debate is not a battle of free speech vs. censorship, or consumer rights vs. corporations: it's two groups of crony capitalists fighting over who will exercise more power over the Internet. The outcome of this fight doesn't matter to the average American since it will have little if any impact on our lives. If you're an advocate for net neutrality, you are a tool of corporate interests and nothing more.

Read Next: Did Microsoft Commit Voter Fraud In Iowa To Ensure Donald Trump's Defeat?

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Instagram, SoundCloud, Twitch, VK, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice, Affirmative Right, and other sites.

Miracle: Harvey Weinstein Cured Of Sex Addiction After Only One Week In Rehab

December 5, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The common man's experience of addiction recovery typically involves a twelve-step group, perhaps in a church basement or part of a forlorn low-rent office building. Strong coffee is ubiquitous, as is chain-smoking when permitted. It begins like this:

Jim: My name is Jim, and I'm an alcoholic.
All: Hi, Jim.
Me: My name is Beau. Where's the keg?

However, addiction recovery for the rich and famous is different. It's big business too.

Harvey Weinstein checks in Per The Blast:

> According to our sources, Weinstein was planning to go to Switzerland for treatment, but his brother Bob suggested he go to The Meadows, a treatment facility in Arizona. We're told Bob even offered to pay for it.
>
> Bob suggested The Meadows, we're told, because the facility is popular among celebrities. Michael Phelps, Tiger Woods, and Selena Gomez have all reportedly spent time there.
>
> […]
>
> As we previously reported, Weinstein was very upset when he was told he could not take his cell phone with him into treatment. His position was he needed it to keep on top of business and personal affairs while he sorts out the scandal.

Indeed, according to their rules, cell phones aren't allowed, which is common procedure for rehab facilities. Further, “There is a three day waiting period after admission before patients are permitted to use the phone. Monitored phone times are designated four times daily.” Granted, it’s a hassle for someone with pressing problems to have to wait three days. On the other hand, giving it a rest might be a relief.

Rehab the celebrity way

Sigmund Freud would’ve approved.

The Meadows includes lectures, and common twelve-step groups too, but there’s much more. Some of their many amenities include Tai Chi, meditation, yoga and acupuncture, and even horse therapy. Conditions other than addictions are treated too. According to Rehab Reviews:

> Perhaps the most idiosyncratic aspect of Meadows is Survivors, the full week of treatment dedicated to battling clients childhood issues—present or not—where residents mix with daytime clients who are just coming in for that week. Some of the activities during this five day stint include carrying around a teddy bear as a way to help residents access what Meadows calls the “inner child,” and striking stuffed animals or chairs with a Nerf bat as a way to release buried tensions. While inner child work is important and can be extremely beneficial, it has to be done right; so potential residents should do their research to make sure the Meadows’ approach is palatable to them.

Per the Daily Mail:

> Blacked-out limos swish silently through the imposing stone gates and up the winding, mile-long drive that meanders through the pristine, cacti-dotted Sonoran Desert.
>
> The still air is broken only by the gentle sound of splashing from one of the magnificent ornamental marble fountains dotted around the manicured 14-acre grounds.
>
> At reception, a smiling team is on hand to welcome travellers with a cool drink before they are whisked away to individual hacienda-style lodges complete with > sunken granite baths.

All that may sound pretty yuppified. Still, rehab is never entirely a walk in the park. It's understandable, given the difficult conditions they treat.

Neil Strauss (writer of The Game, PUA handle Style) also has an addiction recovery experience. The unnamed facility he described in The Truth closely resembles The Meadows: their color coding system, among several other details. Neil's first experience was thorough suicide prevention protocols, although he wasn't suicidal. (Still, there's a reason).

The rules were very stringent, especially for sex addicts; he was classified into "code red". A top counselor was particularly grouchy and prudish. She wasn't exactly Nurse Ratched wielding a syringe of Thorazine. However, her attitudes weren't making it easier for Mystery's old friend Style to cough up the red pill. Neil went in strongly motivated, yet found all this barely tolerable.

How would the most rich and powerful clients—used to giving orders, receiving adulation, and seldom being told "no"—consider a similar experience? It's unlikely they'd be happy about it. This especially might be so if they felt under pressure to enter treatment.

Loading…

The Weinstein miracle

Rose McGowan and Harvey Weinstein—this did not end well.

At The Meadows, their standard treatment for sex addiction now is the Gentle Path program. (It costs a cool $66K, but for some of those rich dudes, it's no pricier than a grocery run is for us.) This lasts 45 days:

> How to stop sex addiction? Why is a 45-day program recommended?
>
> Treating addiction effectively requires long term dedication to your personal recovery. There is no such thing as a get well quick response to addiction. It takes longer than four weeks to get the traction you need to change the life long held beliefs and behaviors that are rooted in addictions. Scientific evidence reveals that individuals who remain in treatment longer have a better chance of maintaining long term sobriety.

Despite the above, Harvey finished his treatment in a week. What an amazing success—those decades of casting couch stunts were nullified with seven days of therapy!

This miraculously efficient treatment protocol has emerged just in time. Scores of other Hollywood types, media figures, politicians (even Jesse Jackson), and others got deluged with accusations since the Weinstein story broke. By the time the avalanche is over, surely many other guys will need this extremely efficient seven-day cure. This novel therapy was quite well timed—just as medical marijuana serendipitously came along right before narrow angle glaucoma in the early 20s age bracket became a vast epidemic in participating states.

On a more serious note, per TMZ's article on October 20, it turns out this wasn't the 45 day full meal deal after all, but a seven day program that was to end on Saturday (October 23). The Meadows does have a five day men's sexual recovery workshop, though the dates don't coincide with their schedule for these events. So what really happened? Change of plans?

Following this, he was intending to stay in Arizona for about another month, "because he doesn't want excessive distractions and wants to continue working with his doctors." The rest of the article details announcements from his psychiatrist (who had his permission to talk about it), clarifying things and dispelling rumors. Damage control items include:

- Yes, he's taking the program seriously.
- No, he wasn't ranting that people were out to get him.
- He made it only to one group session, because all the other sessions were one-on-one.
- Although he experienced anger, nobody else would've been in a position to know this.

It didn't mention the other stories that have surfaced concerning his therapy. For example, one alleged tale involved arriving fifteen minutes late to a group meeting, then falling asleep until being awakened by the cell phone he smuggled in.

Perhaps some cynics out there might wonder if the shrink is trying to win an Oscar. Still, as far as aftermath for this big scandal is concerned, these are picayune matters. Hiring an Israeli rent-a-spy firm to dig for dirt on accusers like Rose McGowan was rather more serious.

Is this for real?

This is the right way to act like you're sorry (that you got caught).

The increasing medicalization of immoral or otherwise unacceptable conduct leaves us with several endlessly debatable matters of neurobiology, psychology, and philosophy. Where is the line between bad habits and behavioral addiction? Are free will and moral accountability reduced for addicts, or is the "diminished capacity" argument a big cop-out? Is the casting couch gambit truly a compulsive behavior, similar to voyeurs, kleptomaniacs, or flashers?

Finally, the traditional "repentant sinner" act is oddly more sincere. (Playing the "I found Jesus" card would've made Mr. Weinstein look pretty silly, but work with me on this.) In the old days, wearing burlap or a hairshirt was how it went, and maybe some self-flagellation too. Lately, "sackcloth and ashes" are out; blubbering confessions on TV are in vogue. After Bill Clinton got caught, he started attending church with Hillary. (Oddly for them, they never got struck by lightning.) He always made sure to carry his Bible prominently, as a prop for the TV cameras. The penitent act saves the cost and hoopla of halfheartedly going through the motions in rehab, though neither are convincing.

Read More: Does The Hollywood Elite Use Rituals And Sexual Blackmail To Keep Its Stars In Line?

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

“Hate” Is A Perfectly Normal And Healthy Emotion

December 6, 2017 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Of all the words that the alt-left / SJW’s have twisted around in recent years for their nefarious agendas, to the point of being radically different (i.e. given the 1984 treatment) from it’s chief dictionary term, is the verb of “hate” or the noun of “hatred”.

It’s definition is pretty straightforward, simply indicating “intense or passionate dislike” while synonyms include ‘loathing’, ‘detestation’, and ‘abhorrence’. Wikipedia goes a little bit more in depth.

> Hatred or hate is a deep and extreme emotional dislike. It can be directed against individuals, groups, entities, objects, behaviors, or ideas. Hatred is often associated with feelings of anger, disgust and a disposition towards hostility.

As everyone has witnessed an innumerable amount of times in their lives, hatred is just as common an emotional state to experience in life as happiness, guilt, grief, gratitude, empathy, trust, or wonder. However, a growing contingent of the utopia dreaming political left seems to believe that human beings can be rid of ever expressing hatred, and particularly when it is directed towards other people (or just their butt-ugly blue hair).

Why Do We Hate?

It's perfectly understandable for Roosh to have a hatred (grave dislike) for the mainstream media, due to how they have constantly misinterpreted and slandered his work.

Holding feelings of hatred for other people, places, things, or ideas is a perfectly natural reaction to substantially negative stimuli which a person (or group of people) has experienced from said people, places, things, or ideas. For instance, if a tourist gets robbed twice while in South Africa, it is perfectly understandable for that person to have a substantiated claim to hate the idea of ever visiting South Africa again.

If you wanted to establish a global meetup and the Australian media was one of the first to try and sabotage the idea via spreading non-stop lies, you would probably develop a hatred for the Australian media.

Finally, if you jumped on the Bitcoin bandwagon really early and sold 75% of your holdings when it simply passed the $1,000 mark, you would probably be hating yourself for making that decision at this point in time. As a frequent reader of Return of Kings, you probably also hate a lot of things out there.

For instance, what would you think about people who passionately supported many of the following things, and particularly if you believed in traditional masculinity, patriarchy, and nationalism?

- Homosexual marriage – which makes a mockery out of the traditional family unit
- Open borders – creating an irreversible flow of poor quality migrants to the 1st world
- White male privilege – used as a crutch to constantly belittle white males
- Social justice – any nefarious agenda under the guise of doing something "just"
- Feminism – giving women 50% of all power positions with no basis of personal merit

Thought so. But it's not like we are actually going to go out there and cause criminal mayhem just because we know Salon.com has a love affair with ripping on white men via dubious claims and data, and because you suspect that two men across the street may be sharing the same bed. However, the left thinks you will do just that in mass effect. Especially if you are a right-wing European blooded man who likes sleeping with women.

Angry White Males: The 'Face' Of Hate

According to the left, the 'angry white male' is the most dangerous and "problematic" form of hate.

"To hate" something or someone, or to express "hatred" for that thing or person, now makes you public enemy number one in the eyes of "love" obsessed so-called progressives. However, public ridicule and scorn for people accused of "hate" or "hate crimes" are almost exclusively reserved as a label for heterosexual white males, especially when they are expressing some form of intense displeasure with a non- heterosexual white male, or element of non heterosexual white male culture.

Understand that the alt-left deems white males to possess a particularly dangerous–even genocidal–potential for hatred, since they are the only people in Western society who are capable of "prejudice plus power", which is also encompassed in their twisted modern definition of "racism". Hatred (and racism for that matter) is something that everyone else is incapable of having, because white males have "all the power" in their minds. Non-white males can only merely be 'prejudiced' at worst.

Long story short, this new grand chastising of "hate" is all a part of the latest ramping up of anti-white male sentiment across the United States, in addition to other parts of the western world.

Conclusion: To Hate Is Human

It makes perfect sense that Arnold Cuckinegger would think that hate and hatred is something which can be "terminated" (3:32), since he's been most famous for playing cinematic cyborgs with an emotional depth ranging from "A" to (almost) "B". Sorry Arny, but to hate certain people, places, and politics is to be human.

Zapped or lobotomized of our ability to hate foul spinach, Chinese hawk-and-spit "culture", rampant black crime, anti-Western cuckoldry, Muslim "truck of peace" attacks, and the new normal of American obesity among other things, is to deprive ourselves of what it means to be a unique individual with varying turn-ons and turn-offs. All humans hate (intensely dislike) many things at certain points in their lives, so stop hating on hate you hate haters.

This has-been SJW actress will show hatred and intolerance for you having any opinions which stray from her own. They can't grasp hypocrisy.

Actually, now that you think about it, we should "terminate" some elements of hate out there in the world. I nominate Arnold Cuckinegger to lead by example, and show Antifa that we no longer have any time and tolerance for their hatred, bigotry, vandalism, profanity, illegal road blockages, and suppression of other people's first amendment rights. "Terminate" (disperse) hate with a barrage of non-lethal gas canisters, and maybe they'll get the message. 'Love Canisters' and 'Canisters of Peace' are coming your way, so breathe in all that love.

Read Next: Islamophobia Is Perfectly Natural

John Carver

John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

Politicians Are Whores And It’s Actually Not Their Fault

December 6, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

When people call all or most politicians evil, I’m always incredulous. No matter whether they are the nationalists I love or the SJWs I hate, the vast majority of them are either puppets or non-powerful, albeit brave contrarians. By and large, they have next to no influence and, in the case of the SJWs especially, can be crushed by their overlords. Some political figures (Donald Trump, Congressman Greg Gianforte, etc.) are certainly extremely wealthy and have much more leeway to be themselves, yet most rely on rich benefactors and are always fearful of losing their jobs.

In the United States, Congressmen in particular are slaves to their rather ridiculous two-year terms. From the day they first take office and then every time they are reelected, those sitting in the House of Representatives are immediately canvassing support for their next appearance on an electoral ballot. They have to worry about their own personal finances, campaign finances, primaries against members of their own party, and then a general election.

Remember, Congressmen and Senators are paid under $200,000 per annum. It may sound like a lot, but when the rigors of the job and much higher private sector executive salaries are considered, it’s a pittance. What’s more, obtaining a seat in the House costs around $2 million nowadays and a Senate seat will set you back around $10 million. Candidates have to reach out to others and this invariably involves whoring themselves out for some cash or, alternatively, other forms of political influence.

Because politicians need to mingle in wealthy circles to attract fundraising dollars, the idea of a Congressional salary leading to a comfortable financial life is very overblown. A Congressman or Senator is often far poorer than those he or she is soliciting checks from and must spend a lot just to socialize around these people. It's even worse for aspirants who haven't yet obtained political office. Most folks vying for House and Senate seats are at the mercy of those capable of bankrolling their campaigns.

I am not defending the worst kinds of political prostitution, but a certain level of whoring is just part and parcel of political systems in the West. Multimillionaire politicians like Democrat and former House speaker Nancy Pelosi are arguably beholden to those with hundreds of millions or billions of dollars as well.

Politicians are grossly underpaid, regardless of how much we hate them

As a Senator, former Vice President Joe Biden was one of the poorest politicians in Washington. One must wonder how this affected his policies and how much political whoring he would have had to engage in.

Consider that politicians have next to no quality of life much of the time. Yes, they chose to get into the game. But few people anywhere really understand the hours and constant favors that politicians must put in every month and year without fail. If an incumbent politician loses a tight election race, they don't have a job afterwards. Maybe they will set up a subsequent career in lobbying, an almost identical category of whoring, except this time it's officially in the private sector.

When I was growing up, I knew one of the Australian House of Representatives members fairly well. He was a socialist, though personable and definitely hardworking. In fact, too hardworking. His life was a revolving door of appearances at elementary and high schools, banal awards ceremonies, party meetings across multiple suburbs in his district (so his fellow socialists wouldn't decide to back his primary rivals), and other instances of non-stop political campaigning.

Then there was the whoring to businessmen he had to engage in. Socialist or not, he had to court local business elites, men who were usually supporting the laissez-faire conservatives but threw money into Labor Party coffers, too, so that any future leftwing government wouldn't be so radical in wealth redistribution.

We should not see Donald Trump's 2016 Presidential campaign, which involved Trump's own money and many, many smaller donations, as some kind of permanent game-changer. Political whoring and an associated dependency on big business is not going to stop for any political organization. For example, the rise of the Tea Party some years ago has been unsustainable principally because establishment, non-conservative Republican candidates have access to the bigger checkbooks of their donors.

Let's be frank: traditionalist politicians who are popular at the grassroots level are rarely going to succeed in the current environment. Men like Roy Moore may buck the trend and effectively stick their middle fingers up at the media and political apparatchiks, but sheer dollar power still counts for a lot.

"Hate the game, not the player"

Your Senator or Congressman at last week's fundraising dinner.

We usually see this phrase in relation to getting girls and the sexual marketplace, but in some ways it's equally or more applicable to the world of politics. As I said, some political actions–support for mass migration, Democrats continually letting black communities kill each other, etc.–are plain inexcusable. That said, so much of what we deplore in today's society would happen with or without the current cohort of national and state politicians. They are oftentimes only servants of people higher up in the food chain.

Perhaps the answer is campaign finance reform. Perhaps it's higher salaries for politicians, however much such a proposal would give me more money to leftwing politicians. Whatever the solution is, political whoring is here to stay until we substantially revamp the system. Politicians can be stupid or evil, but more than anything else they are just powerless.

Read More: 6 Most Corrupt And Vile Female Politicians

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Top 5 Places To Visit In Bangkok At Night

December 6, 2017 | by Steve Bain | Link | Original Link

The Bangkok nightlife scene is changing by the year, but the lure it has on guys who want to escape the current madness of Western society's self-flagellation, if only for a temporary battery recharge, is undiminished. If you're sick of social justice warriors, bat-shit crazy feminists, and political correctness gone mad, the Thai capital provides a valuable escape.

As someone who has traveled around Southeast Asia extensively, I can assure you that no other city in the region can compete with Bangkok when it comes to the nightlife. It isn't hard to find Bangkok nightlife guides on the net that cover the city's vibrant red light districts, but getting the lowdown on regular nightlife areas is not so easily done, so I thought a few words on that might add something worthwhile.

RCA – Nightclub Ground Zero

RCA Plaza, Bangkok

RCA actually stands for Royal City Avenue, and it is by far and away the most popular area for clubs/discos. RCA has enjoyed this status for many years already, but it’s only recently that foreigners have started heading there. Virtually the entire street is lined with clubs, but the northern end of the street in particular is wall to wall clubs, and in the heart of all the mayhem, you will find Route 66.

Route 66, which is spread out over various zones, could be described as being the epicenter of RCA. It is a huge club which is dedicated to house music, EDM, and some live Thai music thrown in for good measure.

The clubs don’t start getting busy until after 10pm, but later on clubs like Route 66 reach bursting point, with the party spreading out into the street where tables and chairs are set up to cater for the masses. Let’s just say that if you have not been to RCA, then you haven’t experienced the Bangkok nightlife clubbing scene at its best.

Entrance fees for almost all the clubs at RCA range between 300 and 500 Baht for foreigners (one US dollar is roughly 30 Baht). For locals, entry is either free or it is cheaper. Short-time tourists probably wouldn’t even realize there’s a dual pricing system and, even if they did, they generally don’t object. If you look beyond the dual pricing, RCA is definitely an area you do not want to miss if you are hoping to have a great night out.

Khao San Road – One of the Most Popular Streets in Asia

Khao San Road

In years past, Khao San Road was nothing like it is today. When backpackers on tight budgets wanted to sample Bangkok nightlife, Khao San Road is where they went. Fifteen years ago, there was only one nightclub in the area and the rest of the road was full of cheap guesthouses, restaurants, bars, and tour operators.

Today, Khao San Road is packed with bars and is home to several nightclubs that tend to attract a large number of well-dressed Thais and foreigners alike. It remains popular with backpackers but there’s a much more mixed patronage these days, and it’s not uncommon to see the odd Thai celebrity out and about. In terms of class, it has certainly moved up the ladder, but it has still managed to retain a lot of its original charm. On the downside, bars, clubs and restaurants are no longer allowed to stay open all night, and prices have gone up.

Despite its radical makeover, Khao San Road does still attract its fair share of undesirables. For this reason, there are now countless CCTVs and a strong but discreet police presence. In the event that somebody approaches you and offers you something which is illegal, don’t allow yourself to be tempted.

Thonglor Soi 10 – A Real Eye Opener

The main Thonglor Road (Sukhumvit Soi 55) is full of up-market cafes, pubs, restaurants and so on. It offers a modern, authentic Bangkok nightlife experience. Thonglor Soi 10 is the place to go, but don’t expect to see many foreigners about. You will probably see a few, but certainly not as many as you will encounter in more tourist-focused areas.

Thonglor Soi 10 is generally where you will find many of Bangkok’s wealthiest young people partying until the early hours of the morning. Expect a well-dressed and well-heeled crowd who are out to spend their swollen allowances. Amongst the most popular places here are Funky Villa and Derno, both of which charge a 500 baht entrance fee which also entitles you to two free drinks. Safe House, which is another very popular club, has acquired a bit of a reputation for closing later than the usual 2am restriction. How they get away with this is anyone’s guess.

Sukhumvit Soi 11 – Something for Everyone

Over the last two decades, Sukhumvit Soi 11 has slowly but surely evolved from what was once quite a seedy area, to the relatively upscale area it is today. The area serves up a really nice blend of excellent rooftop bars, fancy bistros, and vibrant nightclubs. Low prices can be found at the aptly named Cheap Charlie bar, whilst more expensive and classy rooftop venues are also available.

Above Eleven, a rooftop bar located on the 38th floor of Fraser Suits

If you feel like ending your night with some dancing and a lively crowd, the Levels nightclub can definitely be recommended. Entrance at this club is free, and girls can usually win a few free drinks as well. Most places in this area don't really enforce any sort of dress code, but smart casual dress is recommended. Some venues tend to turn you away if you arrive in a pair of shorts and flip-flops.

The crowd at Sukhumvit Soi 11 is mostly a blend of tourists and expats, although the area does also attract a fair amount of Thais. Interestingly enough, most of the Thais here tend to be females, which is great for single guys hoping for a date. Another nice thing about this area is the fact that it generally caters for both the younger crowd and the older crowd.

I've mentioned in previous articles that Bangkok is my recommended venue for finding a Thai girlfriend if an exotic romance or two is something that interests you.

Silom Road – Business by Day, Party by Night

Silom Road is essentially a commercial hub during the day with banks and office blocks seemingly occupying every inch of space but, as the sun begins to dip beyond the horizon, makeshift stalls start appearing all around you. Bars and clubs start opening their doors and Tuk-Tux drivers start offering "magical" Bangkok nightlife tours. The atmosphere here is well and truly addictive, so don't be surprised if you find yourself being drawn into the surrounding madness.

While everyone has different tastes, most people would agree that the best way enjoy Silom Road is to keep on moving. In other words, don't anchor yourself in just one bar or club because there is a tremendous amount of variety here that you might easily miss.

Silom Road attracts just as many locals as it does foreigners, and it attracts people of all ages. This electrifying part of the city really does have something for everyone. In fact, unless you are heading out for the sole purpose visiting a futuristic nightclub, one could easily argue that Silom Road is to a great extent the ultimate area for anyone to get a real taste of Bangkok nightlife.

There is so much to see and do in Bangkok, both during the day, and at night, so the next time you are in this enchanting city when the sun goes down, jump into a Tuk-Tuk or a taxi, and get them to drop you off in one of the areas which have been discussed in this short Bangkok nightlife guide. No matter which of these places you chose to visit, you can be sure it will be an experience you will never forget.

Read More: 5 Myths About Thai Girls

Steve Bain

Steve Bain is an Englishman who has traveled to Thailand many times and has lived there, on and off, since 2010. He is a graduate in Economics and is fascinated by the developing economies and cultures of South East Asia.

9 Lies You Have Been Told

December 7, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

There are plenty of politically correct lies out there, regarding culture, history, politics, and biology, of which many have been addressed here at ROK. Here I'll provide my own take on the matter.

1. Men are responsible for girls having weight complexes

A misguided concept is that men prefer borderline anorectic 5'11" model types. Although the preferred height/weight ratio may differ quite significantly within female groups, and a tall heroin chic model of course is better than a landwhale, many men are more keen on 20-30% body fat, fairly tight waists, broad hips, and on top of that a pretty and symmetrical face.

The catwalk ideal is in fact a product of gay fashion designers like for instance Gianni Versace, Tom Ford, Karl Lagerfeldt, Marc Jacobs, and Calvin Klein, who project their skinny boy-man ideal on female models.

2. Beauty is completely subjective or a product of cultural programming

As has been explained earlier on these pages, beauty is neither entirely subjective nor objective. Beauty ideals can also be altered over time and space.

Still there are unhestitatingly certain components that transcend cultural progamming, such as the above-mentioned hip-to-waist ratio, facial proportions, and long lustrous hair.

3. People are entirely a product of their environments

The environment a person currently lives in forms him in all kinds of ways. In many regards, people are indeed a product of their historical and cultural circumstances.

What the neo-Rousseaun cultural Marxists are missing, though, is that in modern meritocratic societies, people pick and even shape the micro environments that conform to their genetic profiles. As the behavior geneticist Robert Plomin and colleagues have shown, for example individuals and families with higher IQ levels own much more books than duller counterparts.

4. Homosexuality is only a question of consenting adults

A typical liberal contention is that homosexuals, roughly 3% of the population, can do whatever they want in private and should be left alone. While that is true in a way, it is also completely beside the point. The point is that the homo agenda infiltrates the public, pushes for further degeneracy, and homosexuals are significantly overrepresented in pedophile crimes.

5. Jewish influence is a false "conspiracy theory"

The JQ or Jewish question makes some people passive and pathetic. Most Jews seldom stand in the way for a man to succeed and improve, and some American Jews like Murray Rothbard, Paul Gottfried and Byron Roth fiercly oppose(d) mass immigration.

However, it is still the case that Jews use ethnic nepotism to increase social and political influence, like Hollywood, AIPAC, and the neoconservative movement. Furthermore, Jews push for cultural Marxism, porn, and other aspects of degeneracy.

6. There are no average psychological sex differences

Are the sexes equally smart? Men overall have the highest IQ and 4-5 points higher average IQ scores. Are the sexes equally competitive and assertive? Men are more competitive and assertive. Do the sexes have the same interests or inclinations? Men are more interested in things and ideas, whereas women are more interested in aesthetics, feelings, and people.

These sex differences are also magnified in gender-equal societies where the sexes are free to pursue what they want to focus on throughout life.

7. Right-wing populism is "authoritarian"

If someone says that right-wing populism is "authoritarian," they may imply that such parties and politicians promote law and order, and more traditional ethics like discipline.

While that is the case, it is also true that right-wing populists are tired of anti-democratic tendencies being on the rise as a consequence of the proliferation and diffusion of leftist PC authoritarian ideologies, which severely curtail free speech. The only classical liberals left are among the "authoritarian" right-wing populists and a very limited number of semi-famous academics.

8. In pre-colonial times, non-Western people lived in peace

How was South America before the Spaniards arrived? They sacrificed people and slaughtered other tribesmen, women and children. How was Africa? About the same, but with more malaria and other diseases on top of that.

Has the West extracted resources and impoverished people in the peripheral economies? Well, particular individuals and companies indeed have, but as Peter Bauer, Michael Chisholm, Niall Ferguson, Steven Pinker and others have shown, the contact with the West has lead to that poor countries, like Botswana, have improved their living standards, including to lower the share of people living in hunger, as well as death casualties.

9. Miscegenation will end “racism” and lead to equality among the races

Although the mixing of different ethno-racial populations perhaps will make things worse for whitey, as his numbers decrease in the demographic statistics, it is untrue that it will end “racism” and lead to equality among the races.

First, not all racial and national groups are equally prone to outbreeding. Chinese, Korean and Japanese people will likely remain predominantly homogenous. Besides that, racial hierarchies will follow a pigmentocratic pattern in the not too distant future: the more pale-skinned, the higher socioeconomic status.

Hence watch out for Eurasian hapas, which will have high average IQ levels and be regarded as some of the most attractive mixed racial groups, especially girls. Also mulattos will do fine, since they can claim everlasting victimhood and high social status simultaneously.

There are a lot of lies, or at least misconceptions, that fleet around in the leftist hemisphere. Our job is to inform potential friends that these are wrong. At least the truth is on our side.

If you want to read more of William Adams’ material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: 4 Flagrant Lies About The American Confederacy

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Migrants Commit An Astounding 82% Of Rapes In Sweden

December 7, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

A compilation of documents have been released by a subversive Swedish website and subsequently relayed by the aptly named GangRapeSweden.com, which details how between 2004 and 2014, 82% of the rape cases where perpetrators were caught, tried, and proven guilty were committed by migrants and non-Swedes with a vast majority of them coming from Africa and Muslim countries.

The documents is a shockwave for the ruling Liberal Swedish government, as they tried to sweep the issue under the rug for so long, suing reporters, and dissidents that pointed at the obvious patterns of crime in Sweden, all showing the flaws of the pro-immigration policy of the country.

An extremely inconvenient truth

Migrants in Sweden are guilty of 82% of the rape cases in the country, yet they represent around 10% of its total population (just under ten million inhabitants).

The whistle blowers took the time to calculate the factors and chances of non-Swedes committing rape and compared it to actual Swedes who were also sentenced. These court protocols were publicly available but they delivered a hard blow to the enablers of multiculturalism by compiling it.

Prosecuted in gang rapes in Sweden per country

Filter:	GANGRAPE

Number of non Swedes in gang rape cases: 118
Number of Swedes in gang rape cases: 26
Percent non Swedes: 82 %
If 20 % of Swedens population are non Swedes then they have an over representation by a FACTOR 18.2

Nationality	Number
NON SWEDISH	40
AFGHANISTAN	27
SWEDEN	26
IRAQ	12
SOMALIA	8
ERITREA	7
TUNISIA	2
SUDAN	2
THAILAND	2
ROMANIA	2
NORWAY	2
SERBIA	2
TURKEY	2
ALGERIA	2
MOROCCO	1
COLOMBIA	1
LEBANON	1
SYRIA	1
INDIA	1
ETHIOPIA	1
FINLAND	1
IRAN	1

Number of convicted in gang rape cases in total: 144

By analysing their foreign-sounding names, country of origin and legal citizenship, they were able to differentiate between ethnic Swedes and migrants possessing a Swedish passport (an essential element that should be applied to criminal statistics and why it is illegal in so many countries) and paint a pretty good picture of the problems immigrants bring in Sweden.

AKREM ABDU AMER	970131-XXXX	B 1889-13	2013-06-14	NON SWEDISH	ATTEMPTED AGGRAVATED RAPE	YOUTH SERVICE 150 HOURS	NO
MEHMET ACARALP	960905-XXXX	B 1889-13	2013-06-14	TURKEY	AGGRAVATED RAPE	YOUTH CARE	NO
JIBRIL ADAM ADEN	971017-XXXX	B 1889-13	2013-06-14	NON SWEDISH	AGGRAVATED RAPE	YOUTH SERVICE 130 HOURS	NO
ALLAEDDIN BEN OTHMAN	960321-XXXX	B 1889-13	2013-06-14	NON SWEDISH	AGGRAVATED RAPE	YOUTH SERVICE 150 HOURS	NO
BASHIR IDRAHIM HUSSEIN	971003-XXXX	B 1889-13	2013-06-14	NON SWEDISH	AGGRAVATED RAPE	YOUTH SERVICE 130 HOURS	NO
MOHAMED YASSIN BEN LOTFI MBARK	970919-XXXX	B 1889-13	2013-06-14	FINLAND	AGGRAVATED RAPE	YOUTH SERVICE 150 HOURS	NO
RUBEL [illegible]	950215-XXXX	B 1059-13	2014-10-17	ERITREA	AGGRAVATED RAPE	0.25	NO
DANIEL HOSSEIN JAFARI	950520-XXXX	B 1059-13	2014-10-17	AFGHANISTAN	ATTEMPTED AGGRAVATED RAPE	0.25	NO
GOITOM MEHARENA MULUBERHAN	960514-XXXX	B 1059-13	2014-10-17	ERITREA	AGGRAVATED RAPE	0.167	NO
FREDY DARIO ORTIZ CAMACHO	961215-XXXX	B 1059-13	2014-10-17	COLOMBIA	AGGRAVATED RAPE	YOUTH SERVICE 130 HOURS	NO
AKRAM ALI	UNKNOWN	B 11469-15	2015-11-05	NON SWEDISH	AGGRAVATED RAPE	0.5	NO
YONÈS HACHIMI	990753-XXXX	B 11469-15	2015-11-05	NON SWEDISH	AGGRAVATED RAPE	0.75	NO
MOHAMED MESAWE	000456-XXXX	B 11469-15	2015-11-05	NON SWEDISH	AGGRAVATED RAPE, DRUG OFFENSES	0.5	NO

Why making the difference is so important. “Non-Swedish” proves that those migrants still have Swedish passports. In the same document, ethnic Swedes are indeed labelled as coming from “Sweden”.

Prosecuted and convicted of aggravated rape in Sweden

: Non-African & Non-Muslim perpetrators

Notice that the heaviest sentences are almost entirely given to those who are not coming from Muslim or African countries

Why is this important?

This data confirms what every mind not infected by the multicultural death cult already understood. The countless stories of mass rapes at concerts, gang rapes of children being recorded by migrants, or the crackdown lead by the government on journalists being a bit too curious did not happen accidentally. This is hard factual evidence that migrants bring crime and the Swedish government is hiding it.

Swedish Dentist Reveals 80% of Migrant 'Children' Are Actually Adults – Is Fired and Now May Lose Home

Swedish dentist Bernt Herlitz revealed to authorities that after checking the molar teeth of hundreds of migrant children that 80% of the so-called children were actually adults.

Herlitz was quickly fired and now may lose his home.

What happens in Sweden when you point out facts.

Huge numbers of convicted rapists were released with only a slap on the wrist (usually about a hundred hours of community service) or treated as a minor that received suspended jail time, costing millions of Swedish kronor to the country and its legitimate citizens.

These ridiculous sentences are given for crimes as serious as aggravated or gang rape on women, children, and even men. The correct response would be to impose heavier sentences and deport them back to their place of origin, but the documents show that this rarely happens.

Sweden's next move

I am convinced that if such statistics were compiled and published in France, Germany, or Great Britain, the whole multiculturalist house of cards could collapse. Facts tend to be very intolerant and problematic.

Collaborators will resort to two strategies now: call it “fake news” while trying to censor further uncomfortable revelations or claim that Swedish society and modern Swedes, some of the most harmless and tolerant people on the planet (their downfall), are inherently racist and “systemic intolerance”, “problematic values”, “police brutality”, “toxic masculinity,” or whichever invented ailment du jour are responsible for the rape epidemic brought by third-world invaders, instead of pointing at their high-profile and known enablers.

Swedish newspapers that dared to publish the story, like Friatider, are actually being sued for only relaying the information.

Nul ne peut sauver l’homme qui veut se noyer

The data provided spans from the 10th May 2004 and the 8th January 2015, which means that these stats only report rapes for a period preceding the Refugee Crisis that had the time to be processed by the snail-paced Swedish Legal system.

Only God knows how dreadful the numbers would look if the same type of documents is released in five years time, taking into account the first exactions of the massive wave of migrants when they were resettled in Sweden.

Evolution of the foreign-born population of Sweden.

One can only wonder if such damning evidence, blatant lies ,and obvious flaws of the suicidal policies the Swedish government has been implementing for so many years will trigger any reaction of self-preservation among a majority of Swedes. I believe that the black-pilled ones among us are not holding their breath.

Read More: Is Sweden Slowly Becoming An Islamic Caliphate?

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Airport Game Is The Best Form Of Game For The International Traveler

December 7, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Airport game is the best form of game for the international player. Why? Because airports feature lots of attractive girls milling around looking at duty-free wine, perfume, and sunglasses in a weather-regulated indoor space ideal for day game type approaches. And if you have checked in online and arrived early then you will have plenty of time to get some approaches under your belt before you board your plane.

Airport game has been but infrequently discussed in the past by pickup artists. This is largely because airports are very transient places where people from all over gather for a brief period of time before jetting off to, well, wherever. It's not like a bar or a club or a mall where there is a likelihood (although it is not a guarantee) that the girls you interact with are at least going to be resident in the same city as you.

This was a view that I'd largely held myself until quite recently. I had rarely approached girls in airports, with the exception of a few customers or air hostesses on the same flights as me, as I'd assumed there would be no point. After all, if you strike up a conversation with a girl headed for Moscow, a place with which you have no connections or plan to visit then, there is no immediate opportunity for you to close the deal. So why bother?

But then it struck me that this position was illogical, since I have phone contact details in my phone and on Facebook for women based all over the world anyway.

In part, this is a consequence of living in London. As it's an international city, I have met a great many girls from all over the world here. But I have also travelled and met women in other countries too. For example, I met an American girl in Ibiza once, stayed in touch, and ended up sleeping with her a year or so later when she finally visited London on business.

Or, just this past weekend I was in Zurich catching up with friends and, while there, I was able to 'close the deal' with a Russian girl who lives there who I first met in London a month or so ago.

The point that I'm making is that my game has slowly become more international as time has gone by. In part, this is because I am lucky enough to live in Europe, and so have relatively easy access to a large number of different countries.

But wherever you happen to be it is undeniable that with the advent of cheaper air travel and the connectivity offered by the internet means that it's a lot easier than it was in decades past for men and women from different places to get together.

For these reasons, when I was in Zurich airport the other morning, waiting for a flight back to London, and I saw a cute brunette glance at me from her position ahead in the queue for security, I decided to approach.

How To Approach In An Airport

Even if a guy is convinced of the potential value of airport approaching, the next mental stumbling block he is likely to encounter is what to actually say. The challenge here is trying to think of something that would make sense contextually.

At first it feels like a big ask. You are two stranger, possibly from different parts of the world, meeting randomly in a transportation hub.

But then when you stop to think about it, what better place is there to initiate a conversation? Generally speaking travel is an exciting prospect for most people most of the time (even though airport security is a real pain). Why not leverage this to socialize?

I opened the Russian girl very simply, like this:

Me: 'Hey,'

Her: 'Yes?'

Me: 'I couldn't help notice that you are very pretty. But it also looks like you are trying to buy up all the duty free in the airport before you fly. Are you a shopping addict?'

Her: [Laughs, blushes etc.]

I used this to lead into generic chat to find out where she was flying to (St. Petersburg), to confirm that she was indeed Russian, to find out how frequently she travelled to Europe (scoping out the possibility of us meeting another time), and to find out why she'd been in Zurich ('I was visiting my boyfriend').

We had a fizzy, flirty conversation that lasted for several minutes. In this situation, of course, I knew that the only course of action open to me was to get her contact details, which I duly did:

> Look, there's a good chance I'm going to be in St. Petersburg at some point soon [true]. Let's exchange details and I'll message you when I'm there.

This was enough for her to enter her digits into my iPhone. Since then she has been messaging me and, despite the 'boyfriend,' has now sent me over twenty pictures of herself and invited me to come over and stay in her apartment for a weekend while she shows me the city.

Where this will lead remains to be seen, but the fact is that, with minimal effort expended, I have established a contact with an attractive girl in a city I've been meaning to visit for some time anyway. This I can only consider a benefit of airport game. Far better that I made that approach—even though it could equally have fallen flat—than not.

For me, game is all about making connections. And as I go about my business I seek to connect with as many people as possible. After all, the downsides of doing so are minimal, whereas the upsides can be huge.

Want to find out how jerks and badboys get the hottest girls? Read Troy's latest book How To Be An Asshole

Read More: Women Are Susceptible To Men Who Use Dominant Key Words In Conversation

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The King Of Exercises Is The Deadlift

December 7, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

I have repeatedly gone on record saying that when it comes to weightlifting, there are only four lift exercises that you absolutely need to do, and this opinion is shared by many other fitness coaches and fitness enthusiasts.

Colloquially being known as the "big four" lifts, I have already discussed two types of presses that will cover almost all of your upper body needs. But the upper body is, of course, only half of the story. To be a truly strong and fit man, you have to work out your lower body as well, in a way that will make your legs, waist, hips, and core both functional and aesthetically pleasing. And, as luck would have it there are only two simple-but-difficult exercises you need!

Why Work Out Legs?

Some people, particularly the novice lifter, might ask why they have to work out their lower body at all. After all, nobody flexes their legs, people only care about the upper body, correct?

I'm not going to go into how effeminate the idea of working out purely to look good is, or how proprioceptive neuromuscular function means that if your legs are strong, it can only make your upper body stronger as well.

Instead, I'm going to point out the obvious: you stand on your legs and you are on your feet for a substantial amount of your day, regardless of whether you are a manual laborer or a cubicle jockey. Almost every motion you do that is remotely athletic is done while standing on your feet: walking, running, kicking, dancing, jumping—it all involves your legs and feet directly. And many more movements, like punching, throwing, and weightlifting, indirectly use the legs. Simply put, if you want to do any of these effectively, you're gonna have to target them with strength training.

The only two lower body exercises you absolutely need to do are the squat and the deadlift. And while they're both very useful—I did teach you to squat first, after all—I would recommend the deadlift as the more important of the two, because while the squat will hit every muscle below and including the lower back, the deadlift will hit 90% of those same muscles, and provide a pretty solid exercise for the upper body as well. More specifically, the deadlift will predominantly hit the trapezius muscles and the muscles of the forearm and hands. And you are all quite aware of how much importance I place on strengthening the hands and forearms. All in all, who doesn't want to work out most of their body with just one exercise?

How To Deadlift

The first thing you absolutely need to learn to do the deadlift is how to "hollow" the back, or as I prefer to call it, "lock" the back. This technique keeps the back tight and straight during the deadlift, which is imperative to do because otherwise you can risk pretty severe back injury.

Stand with your feet shoulder width apart, then exaggeratedly "Stand at attention"—imagine your body lengthening and straightening like a soldier in an old cartoon (laugh if you must, this metaphor helped me visualize the proper position). Feel your chest puff out and your lower back tense. This back tightness is the feeling you want to maintain throughout the deadlift.

Alternatively, you can bend to grasp the bar in your hands and then lock the back. The above is what works for me, but if you want to do it the other way, that's fine.

Once you have familiarized yourself with that feeling, you can do the deadlift—and for the sake of your back it is imperative you master this body position before you even try to lift. Place the bar on the floor and load it with whatever weights you need. Roll the bar to your shins.

Then lock the back, keep the head and neck tight and looking forward—this helps with proper spinal alignment. While maintaining this locked position, keep your arms straight and begin bending at the knees to the bar. Do what feels natural and bend until your hands can grip the bar. Do not bend at the back or move your shoulders.

From here, you can grasp the bar with both palms facing towards you, or do alternating grips. I find that both palms towards the lifter works the forearms better but again, whatever is comfortable for you.

Now you can begin lifting; maintain the total body tightness and lift with your legs. You should feel as if you are pushing through the floor, which is why I recommend that you do this barefoot if your gym will allow you to do so. Push from the floor and the weight should begin to move. Continue pushing until your legs are straight . The bar should be about at your knees.

Then, clench the buttocks and straighten out at the back and hips, making sure to keep them both tight and straight. The bar should finish at about your hip level.

To release the weight, do not drop the weights like an asshole. Instead, just do a reversal of the lifting motion. Lock the back and bend at the waist until the bar reaches your knees. Then bend at the knees until the bar touches the ground.

Any more advice?

Form is imperative! If you feel any pain in doing this exercise, whether it be in your back or your hips, stop immediately, lower the weight, and work on your form. I give this advice especially for the deadlift, as improper form can lead to slipped discs and broken backs. Bridging can only protect you so much.

And with that, the big four lifts are yours. Enjoy being stronger than most in your gym.

Read More: How To Work Out The Lower Half Of Your Body Using Isometric Exercises

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

The Dissident Right Is Being Subverted By Fame-Seeking Women

December 8, 2017 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

In the past year, one of the biggest trends in the alternative media has been the rise of female personalities who advocate traditional values and right-wing politics. Figures such as Brittany Pettibone, Lauren Southern, Faith Goldy, Tara McCarthy and countless others have won dedicated followings thanks to their combination of nationalist talking points and attractive looks. Some have argued that this is a good thing, since it is impossible for any movement to achieve success if only men support it.

While I am not opposed to women participating in politics per se, the reality is that the majority of these "tradthots" are wolves in sheep's clothing. Beyond being unoriginal and bland, tradthots like McCarthy, Southern, and more appear to be subverting nationalism for their own ends. They are converging the alternative media into leftism, no different than what SJWs have done to video games and other industries.

While some alternative media figures such as ROK publisher Roosh V and Daily Stormer publisher Andrew Anglin are trying to push back against the tradthot invasion, the number of white knights and beta orbiters defending them has reached critical mass.

The best you can say about many of these women is that they are looking to make money off of sexless chumps, but if you scratch the surface, a darker picture emerges.

Thot-Provoking Content

ROK readers and contributors are more aware than most that tradthots are not to be trusted. For example, some time ago, I was involved with a woman who called herself "alt right" and who claimed to want a traditional marriage, yet was also a bisexual alcoholic with a rep for cheating on her boyfriends. Following our breakup, she began dating a left-wing skinhead, then suddenly disavowed the alt right for being too pro-Trump and "anti-Semitic."

The dirt that is now coming out on popular tradthots fits the same pattern. For example, it was recently revealed that Lauren Southern, darling of the alternative media, used to exclusively date a half-black man who voted for Trump. According to a friend who knew Southern when she was younger, she went psycho stalker after one of her boyfriends dumped her for a brown girl, then became rabidly anti-Muslim/anti-immigrant in response.

In her book Barbarians: How the Baby Boomers, Immigration, and Islam Screwed My Generation, Southern brags about her previous life as a glorified camwhore, claiming that "I don't masturbate to anime characters. I dress up like them and guys masturbate to me."

It's clear that Southern views nationalists in the same way she viewed anime fans: suckers to make money off of. She's also incredibly sensitive to critics who ask her why she isn't married yet despite being a traditionalist. In a recent video, "Why I'm Not Married," Southern tried to rationalize her lifestyle by claiming that her current work is too "important" for her to settle down. She also banned numerous people (including me) who criticized her, even if their criticism was polite and reasonable.

Tara McCarthy is a more blatant example of how tradthots are feminists in disguise. A YouTube host and podcaster, McCarthy recently commented on Twitter that "the Alt Right is not about fighting feminism, it's about taking control of our demographics," ignoring the fact that feminism is a major reason why white birthrates are in freefall. After ROK publisher Roosh highlighted her idiocy, McCarthy began whining about how she was being "harassed" online, just like feminists do:

McCarthy also has a history of degeneracy and rapid ideological shifts. As recently as last year, she ran a YouTube channel called Think Vegan, where she espoused socialist and feminist views. No one goes from being a socialist to alt right in that short a period of time unless they're a grifter or insane. McCarthy also identified as an antinatalist and proudly declared that she would never have children, a major red flag as all of the antinatalist women I've encountered (admittedly only three) were batshit insane.

To make matters worse, McCarthy used to be known among her friends for her bisexuality and her hedonistic lifestyle, and enjoyed sleeping with married men (click to expand):

These are far from the worst things that tradthots have done, not even close. I'm privy to a lot of information about the alt lite's/alt right's inner workings.

Other, lesser-known tradthots such as Lauren Rose exhibit many of the same issues as Southern and McCarthy: crypto-feminist views, shaming language, and crying about "harassment." They are aided by white knights such as Culture of Critique author and boomer Kevin MacDonald and Nick J. Fuentes' eternal second banana, James Allsup. While some tradthots can be successfully shamed into quitting (for example, as of this writing, Tara McCarthy has made her Twitter private and deleted most of her YouTube videos), the rot may be too deep to get them all out.

Say No To Findom Nationalism

For me, watching the tradthot infestation of the alt lite/alt right is depressing deja vu.

Several years back, I watched as the manosphere went down a similar path: "red pill women" suddenly started popping up everywhere, blogging about how much they enjoyed being traditional housewives cooking for their husbands and giving them blowjobs. To no one's surprise, most of them turned out to be psychotic frauds. I even invented a blog written by a "red pill woman" in order to make fun of them and their pathetic male fans.

Like the manosphere before it, the rise of the tradthot has proven that most alt lite/alt right men are frauds themselves. Any man who claims to believe in nationalism and patriarchy would never get his political opinions from a promiscuous woman. As my friend the Bechtloff puts it, tradthots are nothing more than glorified findom.

Return of Kings is proud to be one of the few dissident outposts that is unabashedly anti-thot and pro-patriarchy. Unlike the tradthots and their male paypigs, when we say we're about traditional masculinity and femininity, we mean it.

Read More: Anti-Defamation League's Hate List Puts Alt Right And Alt Lite Figures At Risk Of Leftist Violence

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Instagram, SoundCloud, Twitch, VK, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice, Affirmative Right, and other sites.

Pop Star (((Pink))) Decides To Ruin Daughter's Life By Raising Her "Gender Neutral"

December 8, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

The singer, who is 38 and married to motorcycle racer Carey Hart, 42, told the U.K.'s The People she does not want her children defined by their gender. Pink said she is delighted her 6-year-old daughter Willow told her she wants to marry an African woman when she grows up.

"We are a very label-less household," Pink, whose real name is Alecia Beth Moore, explained, "Last week Willow told me she is going to marry an African woman. I was like: 'Great, can you teach me how to make African food?'"

“And she’s like: ‘Sure mama, and we are going to live with you while our house is getting ready,’” Pink continued. “I was like ‘what the fk, who are you? Who is paying for this by the way?’”

The performer of international hit “Get the Party Started,” Pink is a champion of the new gender ideology that does not acknowledge the science of two biological sexes – male and female.

“I was in a school and the bathroom outside the kindergarten said: ‘Gender Neutral – anybody’, and it was a drawing of many different shapes,” she said. “I took a picture of it and I wrote: ‘Progress’. I thought that was awesome. I love that kids are having this conversation.”

The Grammy-winner says though she enjoys motherhood, she considers herself to be a “pre-teen boy,” according to The People’s report.

Loading…

“I do bake sales and lemonade stands,” she explains. “I take my kid to school and try to get there on time. I’m a fking grown up now, it’s so weird. I’m still a 12-year-old boy.”

The singer added that her daughter has created a nickname for the U.S. president. Willow reportedly refers to him as “Donald Duck Trumpet.”

“I don’t correct her,” Pink said. “And I should, because it’s disrespectful, but it’s like – ‘fk it’. I feel like we are all in this permanent state of fk it. I can’t imagine being a third-grader and this being the first example of what it means to be president.”

“I throw my hands up in the air every day,” the singer, whose album Beautiful Trauma has gone to number one in the U.K. and around the world. “It’s unbelievable. It’s not funny at all. It’s un-fking-believable. I want to skip ahead to the part that it’s over and we start the clean-up process.”

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: US Navy Has Surrendered To The Gender-Neutral Agenda By Abolishing Job Titles With “Man”

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

5 Qualities That Dying Empires Lack

December 8, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Along with blue pill and global governance comes the Hollow Empire. We live in the golden age of marketing, public relationships, and propaganda. Many people are good at crafting appearances and virtue-signaling by the standards of the degenerate mainstream. The cities are littered with awesome, hip images, but this world is full of it.

Cities are full of useless bureaucrats, con artists, effeminate men, and man-jawed women. People are fake. Interests and excessive desires are either veiled under passive-aggressive forms or openly communicated through sheer assholery. No mystery why stoicism came back into fashion among conscious men: when your day is full of fake smiles, you're better off working on your inner fortress. (And when you're stoic and poor, bulking on a budget makes you better off as well.)

In such a world, some human qualities are sorely lacking. They are often perceived as signs of weakness, naivete, or as antics. Or some start counterfeiting and misdirecting them.

1. Loyalty

Sheep dogs are amongst the most loyal breeds out there. Have you seen a lot of them in metropolises? Bourgeois bohemians prefer small, frail dwarf dogs that cost a small fortune. Or cats, whose displays of egoism and moodiness are always overlooked because they're sooo cute.

Loyalty is a noble trait. It supposes courage, constancy, straightforwardness. A loyal parent cares. A loyal citizen does his duty and tends to become a pillar of his community. A loyal friend is someone you know you can count on. Unfortunately, loyalty has been both abused and derided. Since the 60s, the media started associating it with purportedly "oppressive" and narrow-minded people while encouraging sheepish behavior towards the latest craze.

Being loyal to a girl who would only remain if you treat her badly would be foolish. Beyond this, it is hard to be a loyal patriot once you know how much nation-states sent Europeans kill each other for nothing but neoconnish interests. As French writer Louis-Ferdinand Céline said, "you think you'll die for your country but what you'll really lose your life for is bank vaults."

2. Kindness

According to the dictionaries, being kind means having a benevolent, friendly, helpful disposition. In a normal society, kindness would be the sign of a good nature and it would be rewarded. In The Current Year, kindness towards women or strangers will have you exploited then called a loser or hypocrite. Men with low self-esteem started to serve women in exchange for absolutely nothing: this warped beta niceness has become a patron for kindness in general.

> ‘I’ve tried speed dating and all the dating Apps, but every time I put my real age, all I get are idiots and losers,’ she told the New York Post. ‘I figured, why not make them useful and have them help me around the house?’
>
> She found a match with a man wearing overalls and wielding a hammer in his profile photo and invited him over to install her air conditioning… After he successfully carried out the installation, Bloom asked him to leave and didn’t answer his messages asking her to go on a proper date. (Daily Mail)

Displaying kindness towards freewheeling female hypergamy is the same than being loyal to a brand that makes millions out of sheeple. A sane mind doesn’t do it.

3. Politeness and courtesy

Loading…

Both words refer to a kind of high culture: refined interests, a genuine concern for arts and belles lettres, a tactful and gallant temperament. Polite, courteous manners thrived during the eighteenth and nineteenth century. They were derided as bourgeois by Bolshevists and promiscuous bohemians. Today, loud-mouthed girls know nothing of it, and both have been turned into either mild-mannered spinelessness or pure snobbery.

The arts associated with politeness, such as theatre or classical music, were appropriated by old money whereas the masses are fed with pop garbage. Actually, you can be polite and courteous if you hop in the right context, then use it as a folding screen for game, Sandor Szavost-style. Otherwise you will come across as formal or distant or snobbish. Indeed, neither do boyish immaturity nor grrly aggressive narcissism provide good grounds for taking a woman's hand and leading her through an impeccable tango.

4. Forgiveness

Jesus Christ extolled forgiveness beyond revenge. Clear the slate, turn the other cheek. Just like toleration, forgiveness works best when it is reciprocated: I'll forgive your misdeeds because you will forgive mine, I'll tolerate your antics because you will accept my eccentricities. When the reciprocal aspect wanes, these qualities turn into sheer weakness. Forgiving a BLM activist who sent your brother into a coma only means giving him a pass so he'll do the same to you.

The Golden Rule, just as any of its derivatives, only works within a context of reciprocation and mutual trust. German jurist Carl Schmitt noticed the Latin Bible told about forgiving the inimicus, the disagreeable guy you're squabbling with, not the hostis or foreign enemy who will take your head as soon as he can. There is no point being forgiving towards an enemy you have nothing in common.

Unfortunately, the chaotic Current Year destroyed most boundaries. It is sometimes hard to say who's an inimicus or occasional yet brotherly rival you can forgive, and who's a hostis you should always be vigilant of.

5. Patience

As the saying goes, the early bird catches the worm. Being patient, planning, delaying gratification, is part of achieving great things. (Unless you're picking up a Western whore whom you should bed early). The occult elite does not want you to be like that. Rather, those on the top want you to look for instant gratification.

The social media crack pipe, junk food, porn, and video games are designed so you get a massive rush of dopamine early on and get back there for more. If you go down this road you'll become impatient, addicted, unable to work long hours without some unnatural gratification.

Of course this mindset makes you dependent, frail, unable to provide for yourself over the long term. Impatience is often associated with neuroticism, immaturity, and seeking external validation.

Being patient—without being passive—is required to tread the long path towards the top of the mountain.

Conclusion

Patience can be exercised alone on a purely Stoic fashion. Being patient only requires mastery of oneself, not of others. The four other qualities are essentially social but hard to exert in an anomous, low-trust society. Our natural propensities, from loyalty to the desire to provide, were misdirected and exploited. This made us wary of society in general and of other individuals in particular. When people are foreign to each other they are bound to screw and get screwed.

The better angels of our nature, yet, are still there. In spite of constant bickering and backstabbing the dissenters are closer to each other than to degenerate normies. Some girls can become reliable housewives. Hipsters who snark at old-fashioned qualities are the kind of people who build nothing. If we manage to build thick relationships again, we will effectively foster a civilization renewal.

Read Next: 4 Reasons To Host A Feast

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Japan Bans Chicks With Dicks

December 10, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

At the risk of breaking a personal journalistic rule of devoting far too much time to an incredibly miniscule and unimportant issue, I must draw attention to a recent win for masculinity. The island nation of Japan recently made a common sense decision regarding the extremely minute portion of its population that is dealing with the first world problem of its genitalia not matching the perceived sex of the owner, known in the West as transsexuals or “gender questioning individuals” to use the word salad nonsensical parlance of the day.

Sure thing, toots, just as soon as you lose the balls.

First, I should clarify that no one is being banned, deported, or shipped out of the country in a way that a more aggressive nation like Saudi Arabia might handle this issue. Instead Japan has a simple policy which efficiently handles the transsexual question—one that seems to bewilder and confuse the Western world, who must devote weekly news articles, federal legislation, prime time (((television programming))) and endless discussion on how to handle this fraction of a percentage of its population.

It works like this: do you have a penis? If yes then you cannot be a chick. It's as simple as that.

With that one universal test, Japan has disposed of the endless head-scratching and policy making by Western politicians, critics, and social justice warriors about how to describe their private parts on government identification cards or which restrooms to pee in. In Japan you will be considered a man as long as you have a penis. End of story.

Likewise, if you have a vagina, you will be considered a woman. No matter what clothes you are wearing, how deep your voice is, or how you choose to "identify" that day. The beauty is in the simplicity.

Japanese Sex Change Operation

While Western nations must debate and compromise, legislate and propose, carving out exceptions for this or that behavior and endlessly consulting irate social justice warriors in a futile attempt to placate them, Japan disposes with the entire question of transsexual people with the simple question.

In the Japanese system, Bruce Jenner would not once have been a news story during my lifetime, as he has done nothing newsworthy since winning a 1976 Olympic medal. If and when he actually removes his penis and replaces it with a surgical vagina (Sugina from hereon), only then could he be properly considered a female and could announce he would like to be referred to as Caitlyn. (A person changing their sex is still not a newsworthy story to me, but I suppose there are those who would be interested to know what happened to this former hero of theirs).

Japan: Isolated from Pozzed Western Culture

Japan is a fascinating nation. As an island nation, it is naturally more isolated than most cultures, and is able to control physically and culturally what enters its society. Japan is one of the more difficult countries to immigrate to, and I have been told that Japanese will never fully accept Westerners, even if you take a Japanese wife and live there for decades (and why should they, as those actions will make you no more Japanese than Bruce Jenner installing a sugina will make him a woman).

Japan is one of the only societies in the world that was never controlled by Europeans. It holds on to its traditions, and has a strong history of physical fitness including the samurai warrior. While Westerners are committing virtual seppuku because they touched a woman's butt in 1984, Japanese businessmen will glibly walk to a vending machine and purchase a high school girl's panties for sexual purposes.

An oddity to a westerner, but in Japan men are not ashamed to be men

Odd? Sure, and I'm not going to even go down the road of weird Japanese kinks and bizarre pornography, but the point is the Japanese are proudly Japanese, and will not let others shame them into changing their behavior. I will always remember the line from James Bond's You Only Live Twice concerning women and men, which made an indelible impression on me since childhood.

In Japan, men always come first. Women come second.

What Is A Woman?

Outside of the West in The Current Year, I doubt anyone has given this question serious thought, but today, sadly, it is necessary. If you ask yourself what truly makes someone a woman, It comes down to whether they have a penis or a vagina in their pants.

"OK is She REALLY a man or a woman?" Can only refer to one thing.

While there are levels of masculinity and feminity which vary between the sexes, at the end of the day, if you really want to know someone's sex, you want to know what genitalia they have. All Japan is doing is confirming, yes, that is exactly what sex means.

TransTrenders: Belittling Those Who Are Truly Victims

Just as feminists are opposed to true diversity, the public discussion of sexual dysphoria is a distraction from the minority of people who have real problems with their sexual identification.

Just as those who suffer from the horrible crime of violent rape do NOT want to publicly discuss their traumatic past, those who suffer from rare sexual disorders or chromosomal mutations that affect their sexuality are embarrassed and saddened by their condition. Those who truly have a medical condition which causes their genitalia to be deformed, or not match the sex they mentally feel, or who were a victim of a botched (((circumcision))) want to quietly rectify the problem and live life without others knowing about the unpleasant thing that happened in their past.

The LAST thing they want is to publicly exclaim that they were one sex and are now the other. Which seems to be ALL that being a trans-trender is about. Watch a Youtube video of a prominent transtrender like Justin "Riley" Dennis, and all you were hear is endless talk about their gender identification or their transition (despite the fact that they have rarely if ever actually snipped off the bits and therefore have transformed nothing).

Common Sense: A Lost Idea In The West

Dr. Wang, Japan's Top Sex Change Doctor

By forcing those who claim their sex is "wrong" to surgically correct their sex, Japan is calling their bluff and separating the trans-trenders from the trans-genders. There is no further debate or discussion needed with such a policy. While the West is trying to fire, fine or even imprison academics for using the wrong (read: gramatically correct) gender pronouns when referring to snowflake students, Japan has a simple system: If you want to be a woman, you need to have a vagina. If you weren't born with one, get one first and check back with us.

A Win-Win Policy

While most of us probably aren't comfortable with the idea of going to bed with someone who was born a man, the truth is, if one are attractive enough, and has a vagina, men will want to sleep with you, especially if they don't know about your past (this is a universal truth, not specific to trannies). So if potential trannies really want acceptance by men in the sexual marketplace, this is exactly the model they should be following.

Read More: Are You Ready To Live In A Society That Pressures Toddlers To Become Transgender?

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Don’t Follow A Girl’s Lead

December 10, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

My newest video explains the importance of frame and why you shouldn’t allow a girl to dictate the terms of an interaction.

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them on the blog.

Previous Video: Do Girls Who Wear Chokers Want To Be Treated Like Dogs?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

3 Liberals Ideas You Will Be Tempted To Debunk Over Christmas Dinner

December 10, 2017 | by Narmer Bull | Link | Original Link

It's the time of year to ease up on the self-improvement goals and enjoy the company of family and friends. It's also time to listen their self-indulgent opinions on the various aspects of modern culture. Given our inherent duty to friends and family, it's time for every red pill individual to endure and navigate a deluge of incoherent liberal rhetoric.

Much like flowers, people…

I have spent the year memetically acquiring their opinions from Facebook, Instagram and everyone's favorite fake news network. Liberals are, as you know, incandescent with virtues and ready to adroitly burst all over the family "Saturnalia" tree.

I like to think I'm always prepared for progressive arguments, given the remarkable global consistency of their dogma, but I'm not. Anger, the various bourbon induced emotions, and simply not being Thomas Sowell means that I will need some assistance with valid counter arguments.

Keeping in mind the ideological debate is not as advanced in South Africa as it is in the US and Europe, here are the three liberal precepts I expect to, with the aid of your comments, casually but cogently invalidate.

1. Feminism is about equality

This statement is usually accompanied by tears and screaming. It is repeated with such regularity and intonation that I suspect it's intended to be didactic rather than considered, reasoned or debated. Feminism is a doctrine prejudiced in favour of specific attributes but paradoxically maintains that it is about equality.

There seems to be a foundational assumption here that validates the teaching and practice of a female (femin) doctrine (ism)—that there was some kind of concerted cross cultural effort on the part of all human males, to subjugate all the females. This belief justifies their demand for a compensatory set of preferential policies. But when exactly did men overpower women to the extent that women require them to concede and democratize their power?

I never get a satisfactory answer to this question. Mostly, I just get a glass of wine thrown in my face along with a peppering of provocative words like chauvinist, misogynist and maninist. From my part, Bertrand Russell, in his History of Western Philosophy (1946) has asserted that it was the institution of private property that brought with it the subjection of women, and the creation of a slave class.

I don't intend on challenging an essential institution of civilization, or a thinker of Russell's status, but this assertion seems to provide extraordinarily convenient grounds for restorative justice. Theoretically, a white South African woman could claim to be as "previously disadvantaged" as a black South African man of indigenous ethnicity, and therefore entitled to all the appropriate compensations in order to achieve her equality.

It's funny how such vaguely defined and overgeneralized statements have very specific economic benefits for adherents to this doctrine.

2. The Holy Bible is not relevant

It's not surprising that a global culture advocating pagan levels of female worship also dismisses a book that conceives of God as a patriarch. I always expect liberal rhetoric to deny the origins, and consequently, the authority of a book thought to be inspired by divinity and filtered through the personalities of its various authors.

But whatever their issues with myth, faith, historicity or organized religion may be liberals who dismiss the Bible do themselves a great disservice. The King James Version is the bedrock of English literature. It has provided countless people with inspiration (Psalm 104), consolation (Ecclesiastes) and wisdom (Job). Before dismissing it based on a scientific interpretation of Genesis 1 (literally page 1), every liberal should know that an honest cover to cover reading is necessary before tendering an opinion.

So many of them argue their opinions without ever having read the Bible. Most, dogmatically cling to random quotes from apparent polymath, Richard Dawkins's, The God Delusion (2006). The rest go with Human Sciences 101 facts about earlier Mesopotamian and Egyptian parallels without any concern for further information regarding cultural idiosyncrasies in the Ancient Near Eastern cultural unit.

The big question here is: How do I argue in favour of the value of this book, against people who dismissed it before having read it in its narrative entirety?

3. Conservatives are motivated by Hate

Opinions on race, immigration, homosexuality and abortion are derivative of one standard premise – Hate vs. Love. Liberals reduce every idea and behaviour to one of these two emotions. Obviously they are motivated entirely by care bare grade love. Leaving my differing opinion essentially arguing for the value of hate.

Are they just higher beings?

"You hate other racial groups, you hate foreigners, you hate gays, and you hate women". Their conception of the conservative seems to be a projection and manifestation of their own hatred for a position they are incapable of understanding.

I know there are framing techniques for this situation but they are only useful if liberals responded to reason, allowed you to get the first word in or didn't rely on in-group consensus.

Conclusion

Their rhetorical method is very easy to understand, it's just not easy to counter. They oversimplified the history of civilization in regard to feminism, they are blissfully ignorant of the Holy book they dismiss, and they value emotions over intellect on every contentious issue.

The mind is easily blown when you drop all your STEM subjects.

Their thought process doesn't require them to be correct through reason, logic or facts. That burden is on the shoulders of the conservative. The liberal idea only needs to be trendy, popular and hedonistic to be accepted as a truth. Overgeneralized, ignorant and emotional these precepts authorize every liberal to fulfill their sacred and gender neutral obligation to the universe – the correction of God's oversights.

Read More:Women Will Never Be Taken Seriously Until They Fight To Be Included In The Draft

Narmer Bull
A coloured South African, and student of the ancient near east.

10 Scams Ukrainian Girls Try To Pull On Foreign Men

December 11, 2017 | by Mike Metzer | Link | Original Link

Raise your hand if any of these sound familiar:

"Ukrainian girls are beautiful and feminine."
"Ukrainian girls are great girlfriend and wife material."
"Ukrainian girls love foreigners."

But how about their negative aspects?

Keep in mind that the average person living in Ukraine is very poor, especially compared to Western standards. Often in poor countries, especially in ones where corruption is rampant, many people naturally become good at scamming in order to survive or prosper. It's perfectly understandable and it's not a reason to avoid those countries entirely, but it's also something men need to watch out for when going to Ukraine with little or no experience in these situations.

Although the overall beauty of Ukrainian girls can be subjective (i.e. bad skin, bad teeth) and femininity is slowly declining (i.e. less prevalence of heels and dresses, increased tattooing), they can still be significantly better than girls in countries like USA. There are plenty of beautiful good girls with girlfriend or wife potential to be found, but it requires some weeding out of the bad ones.

As far as the girls' love of foreigners, this common belief needs to be clarified. For example, it's not necessarily like Poland where the girls just generally dig the look of foreign men. Sure, there are Ukrainian girls who do like the look and exotic factor of a foreign man and can be considered a foreigner/English groupie. And then there are the girls who just want a good guy regardless of his background.

Pretty much all of the girls do associate foreign status with being "well-off" to some extent, which isn't abnormal. The big problem is that there are tons of girls who only see foreigners as a living wallet, and that's really why those girls "love foreigners." The men who have been spoiling girls with gifts and trips have done normal guys a disservice. They've helped create monsters out of girls who were born with minds that were already very sharp and genetically predisposed to hustling and calculating. So remember this when you're going on a date with one of them.

Roosh's book, Bang Ukraine, is a great book for navigating your time in Ukraine and not only do I highly recommend it, but a Ukrainian girl who had read it told me how extremely accurate it is. In addition to reading Bang Ukraine, you should be aware of scams that are currently happening in Ukraine.

Below is a list that I've compiled from my time in Ukraine this year. It's a list of red flags and scams to watch out for so you can better protect yourself from the bad girls. When she pulls one or more of these, don't think "she can't possibly be scamming me because they love foreigners and she must feel lucky to be with me." Instead, have the mentality of "she's going to scam me because I'm a foreigner."

If she actually turns out to be a good girl, then great. Don't be afraid to call them out. Be strong. Be a man. If the local men won't put up with it, you shouldn't either.

1. She touches you too much

Ukrainian girls are not overtly touchy in the beginning. Beware if she keeps touching you and is being too affectionate. It's likely just manipulation to distract you from a scam she's planning to pull or has just pulled.

2. She asks you too many personal questions

If she asks loads of questions and leads the conversation in the beginning, she's likely had experience with Western men and knows what to do to fake attraction, just like touching too much as mentioned above. Ukrainian girls usually aren't very talkative on a date and don't ask tons of questions, unless they're the "police interrogation" type of questions that they use to see if you're just a sex tourist.

3. She says it’s her birthday

She might say her birthday is on the day of your date, is coming up very close to your date, or that it just passed (e.g. “it was yesterday”). Of course there’s a possibility that it’s true, but it’s more likely that she’s trying to throw you this hint to get a present or money from you. If she’s using this hint for that purpose, then this also likely won’t be the only scam she’ll attempt.

4. She gives a sob story about her financial situation

She’s hinting for you to give her money, whether she asks for it directly or not. I’ve dated a lot of girls in Ukraine. Even the ones (the good girls) who were extremely poor, struggling, and who lived with multiple people in tiny studio apartments never once mentioned that they needed help, let alone asked for it.

5. She leaves early during the date

This usually happens right after finishing drinks/dinner/etc. She may use you to pre-drink or get fed before meeting her friends, or worse another man.

Before you go on your date, ask if she has plans to go somewhere else after your date, or if she might need to leave early for any reason. You'll want to know if she will have to be leaving early, or if the evening is all yours. She'll likely spring the "I have to go because my friends are waiting for me" routine once she's done consuming the food and drinks you bought her, just in case you might get mad and try to take them from her while they're still in front of her.

Ask her early on firmly, and then clearly repeat the question in different forms a couple more times to test for congruence in her story. You should see if she's wavering in her insistence that she won't be leaving early. It's not a guarantee that she still won't take advantage of you and then leave anyway, but when you ask her firmly upfront and repeat it, it makes her think you might get really angry if she lies and helps to push her off to an easier sucker.

6. She asks for cab fare

If she asks for cab fare to meet you on a date, be wary. If you still really want to meet her, then insist on using your own Uber or Uklon app (preferably Uber in case you need to dispute the ride) to send the car to her place to get her, and have the app charge the cost to your card. Don't pay cash. Watch the route of the car through the app as it comes to make sure she doesn't make numerous stops to run errands or deviate from the normal route while she's on her way.

If she insists on using a non-app cash taxi, be extra wary. The scam goes like this: she arrives in a spot where you don't see her (so you can't directly pay the taxi with cash yourself) then she'll tell you she paid the taxi already but you can pay her back, and finally she'll tell you an amount that is at least double the correct fare so she can make a profit. Often times they won't even take a cab. They might take the metro or already be nearby, but will ask you for the exaggerated cab fare.

Check any fare using an app before she arrives. If the fare is higher than the correct fare, don’t pay her and immediately walk away, no matter what sob story she gives or even if she follows you down the street for several minutes while yelling at you to “be a man” to shame you into paying her.

7. She orders food without your knowledge

Let’s say you ask her out for a drink, but in Russian she orders food or something else expensive in addition to the drink. Unless you speak Russian, you won’t know it happened until the waiter brings it. She’ll expect you to feel too embarrassed to say anything or turn it away.

Show up early to the venue and find out who your waiter is. Tell him if your date orders food or anything else, other than one drink, to inform you before bringing it. Tell the waiter you won’t pay for it if he brings it without your direct permission. Wine bottles, entrees, chocolates—it’s amazing how they’ll even try to do this for something as minimal as a $4 can of nuts. And no, it’s not a shit test. She already ordered it in Russian knowing you won’t understand. It’s a scam.

8. She directly asks you to buy something for her

This is pretty self-explanatory and especially bad if you haven't had sex with her yet, regardless of how cheap the item is. Don't put out an "I have a lot of money" vibe. Don't do table service. No dinners. Go for walks. If it's cold and raining, walk in the mall. But don't buy her a gift. A good girl won't ask you to buy her things this way, especially when first dating a guy she likes.

9. She refuses to put her arm in yours when it's offered

Walking arm-in-arm is something Ukrainian women genuinely like, and it's a very normal thing to do on a first date. After you leave your first date venue, assuming things went fairly smoothly and she likes you, there should be no hesitation whatsoever with this small but significant gesture. It doesn't matter if she says she wants to see you again or seems interested otherwise. Ukrainian girls who refuse to do this are time wasters and not dating you for the right reasons.

10. She doesn't want to walk with you in busy areas

Examples of busy areas are Khreschatyk Street or the Maidan area. She fears people will think she's a foreigner groupie or a prostitute with a foreigner. Although it's not extremely widespread, this stigma does exist to some extent. If she already has any negative feelings about foreigners in this way, it's not a good thing for you. She'll enjoy your spending, and get a kick out of the attention you're giving her, but more likely than not things won't go further.

And yes, I consider number nine and ten to be "scams" because you're being scammed out of your time. It's time lost that could be spent with a better girl who has true interest for the right reasons.

These are all from my own personal experiences of dating a large number of Ukrainian girls in Ukraine. To further filter out the bad girls, only use dating apps for pipelining so you don't arrive cold, then stick primarily to day game. Hit the parks, malls, metro stations, and of course the streets, but watch out for red flags and scams.

Read More: 6 Quick Game Tips For Meeting Ukrainian Girls

Mike Metzer
Mike travels the world, seeks to know the unknown, has a strong desire to expand his mind, and can be reached at

Indian Race Troll Launches Jihad Against The Simpsons Character Apu Nahasapeemapetilon

December 11, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Left-leaning Bill Clinton may have been President for most of the 90s, but at least he wasn't going after Apu from The Simpsons when the character debuted. Leftists in 2017, however, are doing just that. A "comedian" named Hari Kondabolu filmed a documentary, "The Problem with Apu," that insists that the character, after 25 years, is a vehicle for spreading anti-Indian racism in the United States and beyond.

Because the immigrant owner of the Kwik-E-Mart has an arranged marriage (a common enough, if unofficial practice amongst Indians living in America, too), produced lots of children, and runs a convenience store of all things, he is supposedly unfit for television. No doubt many other opportunistic SJWs will be jumping on the bandwagon soon and similarly denouncing the continued existence of Apu Nahasapeemapetilon. When one starts, many follow.

Curiously, the voice of Apu, Hank Azaria, says that Kondabolu's excoriation has been thought-provoking. Probably not thought-provoking enough for Azaria to pay back all the money made from bringing Apu to life, though.

Why not shut down The Simpsons entirely?

Yet we're told the representation of Apu is not flattering.

We are balls deep in an era where seemingly anything and everything can be termed "offensive" by one or another group. Any representation of a member of a certain ethnic, racial, social, or religious group is apt to be dissected by triggered individuals so it can be vilified and then removed from public consumption after sufficient outrage.

The dining halls at places like Oberlin College have not even been spared. Attempts to make simple sushi or Mexican meals for students, not diners at the Ritz-Carlton, were met with vitriol and cries of racism and non-authentic cultural appropriation. Just as we may as well ban multicultural food from anything but restaurants owned by members of a particular race, we would probably do well to just ban The Simpsons entirely.

Let's not forget that Homer Simpson is the archetypal representation of the lazy, lower middle-class, and blue-collar white American male. As the funniest character on the show, Homer's flaws are much more common and emphasized far more frequently than any ethnic-related quirks demonstrated in non-white Apu, who is as cheap as Homer but actually hardworking. We could observe comparably bad things about fellow Caucasian characters Moe Szyslak and Chief Wiggum, who, like Apu, are voiced by Hank Azaria. All three of the white men are overweight and/or physically repulsive simpletons, too.

The whole situation is made sadder when we remind ourselves that Simpsons creator Matt Groening went to Evergreen State College, the same institution where academic Bret Weinstein was punished with death threats and nearly attacked many times for supporting free speech. Groening's politics may be atrocious by our standards, but he has had enough humor over the years to harmlessly poke fun at people in ways that are now considered "racist," "fascist," or worthy of losing one's job.

What is funny but "acceptable" nowadays?

Hari Kondabolu.

What can we say nowadays? What can we make fun of? Is a mannerism or feature portrayed in a television or film character to be perceived as a representation of everyone who shares the character's religion, race, or ethnicity? The answer to the last question is "yes" if we take the reactions of SJWs.

We've already seen this with women and Gone Girl. This drama film was designated "misogynistic" and therefore terrible by most feminists and SJWs because, by showing the main female character as a skilled and deadly manipulator, it apparently showed all women as being like her.

I predict that Apu will either be killed off from The Simpsons or made so irrelevant and politically correct that Matt Groening and others will wish he had been written out of the show altogether.

Read More: White American Girl Raises Over $30,000 Because Her Dad Is "Racist" Against Black Boyfriend

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

New York City Bomber From Bangladesh Fails In Allahu Akbar Terrorist Attempt

December 11, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via NY Post:

An ISIS-inspired would-be suicide bomber set off a homemade explosive device at the Port Authority Bus Terminal subway station Monday morning, seriously wounding himself and injuring three others, law enforcement sources said.

The man — a 27-year-old Brooklyn man identified by high ranking police sources as Akayed Ullah — had wires attached to him and a 5-inch metal pipe bomb and battery pack strapped to his midsection as he walked through the Manhattan transit hub.

The man partially detonated the device, which he was carrying under the right side of his jacket, prematurely inside the passageway to the A, C and E trains at Eighth Avenue and West 42nd Street around 7:40 a.m., sources said.

Police quickly took the man into custody.

Former NYPD Commissioner Bill Bratton told MSNBC's "Morning Joe" that the man was inspired by ISIS and possibly born in Bangladesh.

Bratton, who said the man had been living in the US for seven years, "was supposedly setting the device off in the name of ISIS."

"So, definitely a terrorist attack, definitely intended," Bratton said.

The man, who suffered the most serious injuries, was taken to Bellevue Hospital.

Three others suffered non-life-threatening injuries, police said. One person was taken to St. Lukes-Roosevelt Hospital, another to Mount Sinai and another person was treated at the scene, officials said.

Investigators briefly spoke to the alleged bomber, who told them he made the explosive device at the electrical company where he works.

Emergency personnel flooded the scene following the incident.

Mayor Bill de Blasio has been briefed on the incident.

The incident sent commuters into a frenzy.

A 911 caller, who would only identify herself as Carmen, told The Post: “I didn’t see anything, I just heard an explosion and I ran out like everyone did to look for the nearest exit.”

“I had like a panic attack, I couldn’t breathe. My stomach started hurting,” the witness said. “I’m doing better — I’m just trying to catch a train to go back home to College Point.”

Designer Chelsea LaSalle tweeted: “holy f–k. just was stuck in a running stampede at port authority bus terminal due to bomb scare. cops EVERYWHERE.”

LaSalle followed up her tweet with another that read: “not a scare. actual explosion moments before i was about to get on the subway.”

Commuter Keith Woodfin tweeted: “I was exiting the Port Authority and the National Guard was running towards something shouting ‘Go, Go, Go.’”

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: The 3 Golden Rules For Getting Laid In New York City

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Popular DNA Company Is Giving White People African Ancestry For Fun

December 12, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Last Wednesday, Squawker came out with an article concerning the accuracy of DNA testing:

> In a recent interview with Cracked, one of the major ancestry testing companies, (which specific company is unknown) spilled the beans on what really happens when you purchase an ancestry kit. While I can't say I'm surprised, you may be shocked to learn that these ancestry sites aren't always as accurate as they claim to be. Beyond this, they've also admitted to tampering with the result to "screw with racists".

The usual procedure is that a DNA sample from saliva is processed and categorized, then the results are compared against a database of likely national origins, and a computerized result emerges. However, the real truth is that the results can get massaged.

What might make results different from expected

Since nobody else in the article (or the one it was based on) explained, I will. When conception occurs, half of the father's DNA and half of the mother's DNA create a new individual. However, the part of the DNA you get from either parent may unevenly represent your grandparents. It all depends on how the meiosis process randomly divides up your mother's and father's pairs to produce the gamete cells which created you. The exceptions are the Y-chromosome (which is patrilineal) and mitochondrial DNA (non-chromosomal DNA inherited exclusively from the mother).

Therefore, if (for example) you're 75% Irish and 25% French by ancestry, you may test as more French than expected. Meanwhile, your brother might test somewhat less. It's for this reason why siblings (other than identical twins) resemble each other, but not exactly. Over the generations, this randomly will emphasize parts of some lineages and others may fade into the background. Over historical time, the processes of genetic drift and natural selection give rise to the unique characteristics of nations.

Then there are other possibilities: the milkman from 1952, an adoption that happened a few generations ago, a cute sailor in the 18th century, a foreign merchant who settled down in your ancestral homeland, that sort of thing. It's mysteries like these which many people find DNA testing to be useful for research. When they chart members of their family tree, they're certainly looking for accurate answers to the age-old question, "Who's your daddy?" I could go further and explain the significance of genealogy in Mormon theology, but let's just say this: if you can't go out and drink beer on Friday night, what better to do?

Intentionally biased results

The part of the interview in question is the following:

> Morgan and his colleagues were caught between a rock and a really-want-to-mess-with-racists place. It would've been fun to throw a "10 percent West African" in there, but then they might have a pissed-off, dangerous person at their office, waving a gun. "Since we couldn't do anything to the results (and we wanted to), what we did was add '< 1 percent' to each African category of ethnicity. That way we weren't lying, and they would both be wondering how much under a percentage point was. We always try to round to the nearest number because we sometimes hear about percentage points, but for them, we leave it open to whether it's a one or a zero."
>
> It's a compromise that's elegant in its passive-aggressive simplicity. And it got a result. "The near-N-bomber wrote to us asking what that meant, and we wrote back that it meant it was under 1 percent. And we were not saying zero. Unless > they got another test, that was going to bother them. Maybe they weren't 100 percent Caucasian. I mean, they were, according to the results, but this way it leaves it open, and they'll always be wondering."

Well, that's pretty flippant. They were dealing with clients who were wondering if their natural rhythm was just a fluke, or if they should bite the bullet and learn some good collard green recipes. Their results didn't indicate any African genetics, but the people at this company—whichever one it is—decided to mess with their heads. They gladly would've fooled one of them into thinking he was nearly an octoroon (to use the old term) if they didn't fear getting shot over the prank.

This is rather like falsely being told your hormone panel says you're a girl, because your doctor doesn't like you. Lying to clients is bad customer service, and so is screwing with their self-image. People don't pay a hundred bucks or more for that kind of treatment. It's not their job to punish politically incorrect attitudes.

Perhaps they think that putting a little slice of mystery meat into the results is cute. Still, this is no joke. People rely on DNA results not just for family history, but to be notified of possible health concerns. Blowing smoke is not appreciated.

Who is doing this?

Again, the interview doesn't specify which company is allowing this. It's also not clear if this is quietly approved by upper management, or just something the munchkins in the cube farm are doing on their own initiative. However, the two possibilities are Ancestry.com and 23 And Me. Will the one responsible for these problems ensure that, from now on, the staff working for them will act responsibly? Let's hope so.

Other reasons why DNA testing is important

Modern understanding of genetics has allowed for great advances in medical technology, obviously. It would be hard to overestimate its importance.

Beyond that, it enables the migrations to be traced of peoples across the globe during prehistory. Peering back beyond the mists of time, it allows us to piece together the story of the ancient races of mankind during the earliest of prehistory: the interactions of the up-and-coming Cro-Magnons with the Neanderthals (to the detriment of the latter), the Denisovans (contributing a fraction to the gene pool of some Southeast Asians and Pacific Islanders), and a yet unnamed ancient population in Africa.

Franz Boas and his understudies did much to push the "social construction" line in the academic world, as did Ashley Montagu. Even so, genetic research has revealed that humanity is much more diverse than they wanted us to believe. It's just as well, since the world would be pretty boring if everyone really were the same.

Really, it's remarkable that race-denialist thought would be found in a genetic research company, of all places. That would be similar to finding firm believers in astrology calculating orbits for NASA. As for those who play pranks with their customers, all they're doing is discrediting their own business.

Read More: Man Must Pay $30,000 Child Support For Someone Else's Kid

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Game Will Not Lead To Instant Success

December 12, 2017 | by Aristotle Sigmursson | Link | Original Link

Like many of you, I was eager to put into practice the tools I had gotten from the manosphere once I became red pilled. It is easy to get excited and want to actualize your potential, especially if you are coming from a place of scarcity in terms of women and success. You imagine yourself living like Dan Bilzerian, screwing a different European supermodel every night and then kicking her to the curb, making tons of money, and just generally being admired by all the beta male onlookers.

It does not take long to realize that, as with all things, this takes time. But when you have fully swallowed the red pill, it can be frustrating to have to purposefully hold onto blue pill tendencies while you wait to mature and gain experience. I am going to provide some explanations as to why you need to be careful in this game, and then I will briefly and clearly expand on how.

My experience

When I was totally new to game, the idea of being the hunter and going out and getting what I want was highly appealing. As a disenfranchised male just wanting women to give me the time of day, this newly created persona felt so right. I began walking with my chest out, with confidence, assured of what I am about to get out of life. And that is exactly where I went wrong.

When I would say things like “Ball’s in your court; I don’t have all day” to girls who I figured were playing me, it wasn’t coming from a sincere place of alpha manhood. When I would apply the Chateau’s 2:3 text rule, figuring it would win me over the girl’s approval, it accomplished nothing but made it harder to communicate what I needed to say. When I would say edgy things to girls I was making moves on, it would just come off as bitter and mean. After a while, I became increasingly frustrated and baffled by why none of this was working.

The easy answer, which I found everywhere, was that you need to work on your inner game first and foremost. That means building an impressive body, distancing yourself from the stresses of the world, abstaining from pornography, and building a solid male friend base.

No doubt this was mainly good advice, but it presented some problems. I, like many others new to the manosphere at the time, was entering this world having formerly relied on waiting for others’ approval and taking the easy route. This now felt eerily like that. I could make the excuse that I wasn’t spinning more plates or even approaching more girls because “I’m working on my inner game first.”

The two extremes and the risk of rejection

This is exactly what is wrong with these two extremes (on one hand, jumping straight into forced, aggressive game and on the other hand, avoiding game entirely to read books and lift). In either situation, I was taking the easy route and protecting myself from rejection. Read that line again, because it is important.

We protect ourselves from the potential of heartache or failure. What if that girl doesn't like me? What if this class is too hard? By "taking time to focus on inner game," we very clearly do not have to worry about the cold feeling of rejection. And, by the same token, aggressive game (negging being the perfect example) allows you to stay in your shell and dismiss rejections on account of "she wasn't worth my time anyway."

Rejection stings so much because it is perceived to be a rejection of everything we are: everything we have worked for up to this point, the ups and downs, the identity we have of ourselves, and our ultimate understanding of our place in the world. To have that flipped on its head by some girl you met just minutes ago is painful. It's painful, but it's important.

Before you can begin to employ the confident, assertive strategies of an alpha male, you must become that alpha male. And while inner game is integral to that, nothing is to say you cannot approach right now. What I am asking you beginners out there to do is to cold approach girls directly in a variety of settings. Keep going, utilizing indirect game at times and direct game at others, doing it solo or with a wingman, trying sober or buzzed, until you start spinning some plates.

Getting there is no merry-go-round, but it is a vital period of growth as a man. Because once you become moderately more seasoned and now actually have reliable lays on call, you will have learned not to take the "sorry, I have a boyfriend" lie as personally. And you won't need to tell yourself that "she's a slut anyway," because you honestly will not care that much about what her reasoning is.

Natural* game

I am no pro now, but the confidence I exude when dealing with women I am intimate with or am actively courting feels natural. Had I tried to force this confidence in my formative years, I would have come off as insincere and even more beta/insecure than I already was.

Nowadays, it still takes some reminder that I should be making her chase me, but it feels more and more to be a part of who I am. When I tell a girl who wants me to buy her a drink before we can dance that "I'll let some other pathetic guy do that," I do not walk away patting myself on the back for being such a Chad. It does reaffirm for me that I am better than having to stoop to her little games, but I don't have the mental burden of thinking about how alpha I'm being constantly. When I go cold on a girl for a few days, it is because I am not feeling the reciprocity from her that I expect and so I genuinely am not interested in being her puppy.

What I am saying is: patience, grasshopper. I still hear men bragging about how they approach girls or what they say to girls they're dating. This insincerity leaks through and girls pick up on it. Build the genuine version of yourself that does all the things you read about doing but naturally.

Read More: 8 Solid Day Game Tips For Beginners

Aristotle Sigmursson
Aristotle is a young man fresh out of college who works in the nutrition field. Taking the red pill transformed his college experience and set him on a path to self-betterment, political awareness, and lots of sex. He focuses specifically on helping young men enter the world of game and improve themselves.

American Skier Lindsey Vonn Injures Her Back Two Days After Criticizing Donald Trump

December 12, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Fox News:

American skiing star Lindsey Vonn has withdrawn from her Sunday events at the World Cup in Switzerland after suffering a back injury during a super-G race on Saturday.

The injury occurred two days after she criticized President Donald Trump in an interview about the upcoming Winter Olympics in South Korea.

"I am extremely disappointed," Vonn tweeted Sunday, "but my biggest goal this season is the Olympics and I need to take care of myself now so I can be ready for next week, and more importantly, for February."

> Unfortunately I will not be able to race today. I am extremely disappointed but my biggest goal this season is the Olympics and I need to take care of myself now so I can be ready for next week, and more importantly, for February. As always, thank you for the well wishes ❤
>
> — lindsey vonn (@lindseyvonn) December 10, 2017

On Saturday, Vonn crossed the finish line in obvious distress, almost one second behind the then-leader, and slumped to the snow.

Vonn's tentative run after jarring her back early on placed her 24th, trailing 1.56 seconds behind the surprise winner, Jasmine Flury of Switzerland. The race was shortened due to strong winds higher up the mountain.

Vonn stayed in the finish house to be treated, and one hour later limped slowly into a waiting car to be driven from the St. Moritz course.

> Looks like i have an acute facet (spinal joint) dysfunction. I got compressed on the 6th gate and my back seized up. Rested and had a lot of therapy tonight. We will see how I feel tomorrow and then decide if I will race. Thanks for the support
>
> — lindsey vonn (@lindseyvonn) December 9, 2017

Minutes earlier, her father Alan Kildow told the Associated Press his daughter was “OK.”

Vonn tweeted Saturday that she had suffered an “acute facet (spinal joint) dysfunction.”

Saturday’s race was interrupted several times by gusts lifting flurries of snow, and Vonn was left standing at the gate as the No. 4 starter during the first delay of about three minutes. She stayed warm with a thick jacket draped on her shoulders.

Vonn did not speak with media or fans before getting into the car, and wore the hood of a United States team jacket up to shield her face from television cameras tracking her.

The two-time Olympic medalist told CNN in an interview that aired Thursday that she would “absolutely not” visit the White House if the United States Olympic team gets a traditional post-games invitation.

“I was asked my opinion and I gave it,” Vonn told reporters Friday. “I mean, it’s not necessarily my place to be sticking my nose in politics, but as an athlete I do have a voice.”

Looking ahead to the Feb. 9-25 Pyeongchang Winter Games in South Korea, Vonn told CNN she hoped “to represent the people of the United States, not the president.”

Though Vonn did not mention Trump by name, the athlete activists she said Friday she admired included Colin Kaepernick. The president has responded to the NFL quarterback by posting confrontational messages on Twitter.

“People like Billie Jean King and Arthur Ashe and Colin Kaepernick,” Vonn said in the post-race interview zone. “There’s definitely been a lot of people that have made their voice heard and made a positive impact.”

“I’m not trying to be negative in any way, I’m trying to be positive,” said the 33-year-old Vonn, whose 77 World Cup race wins leads the women’s all-time list. “All those people have made a positive impact and hopefully my message does as well.”

Vonn told CNN she took the Olympics and “what walking under our flag means in the opening ceremony” very seriously.

“I want to represent our country well,” said the 33-year-old skier, who also has seven career world championships medals, including two gold. “I don’t think that there are a lot of people currently in our government that do that.”

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: LaVar Ball Is Ungrateful That Donald Trump Got His Son Out Of A Chinese Jail

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Japan Made Bitcoin A Local Currency, And Now It’s More Popular Than Ever

December 12, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by Localvcoins.

Since Japan made Bitcoin a legal currency, it has surged to over $15,000 USD. Mark my words, the days of the Rothschild banking cartel is soon over. This is a new beginning.

As other countries start to see the benefits of freedom from the Banking Cartel, cryptocurrencies will be the future and the smart ones would have been the ones who got involved early. Now, there are dozens of cryptocurrencies worth market caps of eight figures, and the rate of new entrants is accelerating.

Think, if you would had invested $5 dollars in bitcoin 7 years ago, you would be $4.4 million dollars richer by now! Imagine that.

As humans, we are so scared to try something new, so scared to step out of the norm that most of us just end up in the same old place day after day, doing the same old things. I mean look at the facts: $5 nowadays barely buys you a McDonald's value meal, but there is at least one happy sod out there who thought, "Let me pass on this poisoned food that craters my testosterone." He invested that $5 in Bitcoin instead.

When you could lose $5 while walking down the street, why not? He stepped out of his comfort zone and tried something new! Now he's probably on a yacht somewhere getting his balls licked by two girls in their 20s.

Some companies, like my own at Local V-Coins, even give you a free five dollars when you register so you don't even have to invest your own money. I know that the crypto system is so much better than the big banks that I am willing to give you a free run with real money.

There is more you should know: I didn't invest in Bitcoin solely because of the money. I did it because of what the whole blockchain movement actually stands for: the end of the Zionist controlled central banking system. Blockchain is the biggest financial revolution since the creation of actual money. Thanks to Satoshi Nakamoto, creator of Bitcoin, we have finally been given a chance to take back power from the banking elite.

For those of you who don't know how our banking system works, I will give you a quick explanation. The cash money you have in your hand is just a piece of paper that says I owe you this much or that much. It's not like the past when your money was actually backed by the gold it was made out of. Yet we go to work for that piece of paper, and when we go to work and receive our paychecks, we deposit the money in a bank.

This bank then uses your hard earned cash to invest as it sees fit, sometimes making up to 800% profit, but how much of that profit does your bank give to you? 0.33% in most cases. We even allow them to charge us for withdrawing our own money from ATMs. We pay to use our own money when in reality they should pay us.

The banking system is the biggest scam since the invention of make-up. On the other hand, Local V-Coins is 80% backed by secure material assets. In addition…

- We give you 5 euros credit when you register if you just want to test it out
- We accept all international credit cards
- We are planning to participate in a 300 million dollar ICO

And check out OneGram, which is fully based on gold and planning to receive a $500 million ICO investment. There is also Bullion Coin, where you can choose between gold and silver backing, without the volatility of other currencies. Click here to visit Local V-Coins

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Theresa May Officially Bans Roosh From The UK While Terrorist Sympathizers Are Let In

December 13, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

ROK proprietor Roosh Valizadeh has been banned from the United Kingdom (not that he would ever go there for an extended stay) whilst a number of actual bigots have not been. Of course, Roosh's ban, which is effectively permanent and cannot be appealed, has everything to do with his peaceful opposition to feminism and the way many modern women sexually debase themselves.

Here are four pages from the correspondence Roosh received. He was personally banned by the sitting Prime Minister, Theresa May, when she was serving as Home Secretary in early 2016. Yes, Roosh triggered the female Prime Minister of four countries.

Entirely factual quotes from Roosh like this one were the main basis of the ban:

> …When you give a female unlimited choice on which man to have sex with, what type of man does she choose? An exciting man who treats her poorly and does > not care for her well-being.

Sadly, millions of “nice guys” who started learning game, many of whom gravitated towards Roosh’s work, know this brutal truth all too well.

Roosh’s satire about “legalizing” rape, inspired by Jonathan Swift’s A Modest Proposal regarding rich people in 18th-century England eating Irish babies, was included as one of the ridiculous reasons for him being banned. Women, Roosh observed, frequently take no precautions when it comes to drinking and meeting new men, allowing the 1 in 1,000 men who are rapists to take advantage of them. Just as we men would not walk home alone through the projects of Harlem at 2am in the morning, women should not be throwing themselves at the mercy of the tiny criminal minority.

Due to his knowledge of Swift’s work, Roosh is perhaps the first person in the history of the world to be at least partially banned from the UK for a rich appreciation of classic English literature. Meanwhile, here are three folks who can presently go to the UK as much as they desire:

1. Linda Sarsour

A darling of the new reincarnation of “intersectional feminism,” New York-based Muslim activist Sarsour has certainly done something Roosh hasn’t by calling for the beating of women she disagrees with. This prominent religious nut advocated physical violence against former Muslim Ayaan Hirsi Ali and Brigitte Gabriel, a Lebanese-American Maronite Christian. Add to this her known associations with former members of terrorist group Hamas.

Sarsour has also argued that at least one student critic of hers should not have been allowed to ask her a question at an event because he was white. But oh no, the real “bigotry” according to the UK Home Office is Roosh criticizing women with words because they have had sex with a billion men and are prone to lie about their sexual histories. That is the real crime apparently in today’s politically correct Western world.

2. Syed Muzaffar Shah Qadri

If Roosh changed the name of Return of Kings to Return of Sharia, his UK entry ban would be immediately revoked.

Qadri praised the assassination of a secular politician in Pakistan and was previously given a ban from preaching in his home country. Yet he's good enough to be granted a speaking tour in British mosques! Bear in mind that Pakistan has long been accused of turning a blind eye to hundreds, if not thousands of extremist clerics. So if this guy is such a threat there that he needs a muzzle in Karachi or Islamabad, why on earth can he make it to Heathrow Airport in London? Condoning murder will not get you banned from the UK if you belong to the right group.

At the same time, Roosh is now denied entry to Great Britain merely for saying that women are ruining their sexual dignity by taking cock after cock. It is hardly analogous to murdering someone or justifying their murder. I find it very difficult to understand how politicians in Western countries and the bureaucrats serving them are currently better at writing parody material than comedians normally paid to pen these ideas.

3. Yusra Khogali

It's not the only thing Yusra Khogali has had near her mouth.

This race-baiter and long-term leader of Black Lives Matter Toronto refers to white people as "defects." Had a white Canadian man called a group such as transgenders, black people, or women "defects" he would have been investigated by the Ontario Human Rights Commission and almost certainly jailed for “transphobia,” racism, or misogyny. Given the huge problems London has faced with its local Black Lives Matter domestic terrorism chapter, the UK Home Office could–and should–have immediately and preemptively banned Khogali from British shores.

But again, Roosh is treated as the scapegoat. What was it this time? Perhaps it was the many occasions he suggested that women, who are the unhappiest they have ever been, should marry and have children young, rather than pursuing university studies and careers. Clearly this is as bad as saying an entire race of people are mutants, animals, or defects!

A man who tries to get men laid is more of a “danger” than terrorist sympathizers and extremists who hate white people

Roosh would not have been banned if he looked like this

In an increasingly lopsided sexual marketplace, Roosh began a writing career focused on helping men to get laid. With that help of his comes a frank assessment of how many women rationalize poor sexual behavior. Pathetically, this exercise in truth-telling is what has gotten him banned from the UK. Simultaneously, real extremists and loons continue to receive a red carpet welcome to London and other cities. What else can we expect from a place that wants to criminalize men talking to women?

Read More: England Set To Ban Talking To Women In Public As “Misogynistic Hate Crime”

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Sexual Harassment Hysteria Is Out of Control

December 13, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Unless you have been living in the woods for the past decade, it is impossible to avoid the epidemic of sexual groping allegations and their zero-tolerance repercussions. It seems that a new allegation is made almost daily, usually of powerful or prominent men, who are often terminated from their jobs. I have been struggling of what to make of these stories, the media's decision to make them national news, and what the propaganda purpose is behind it.

Profile Of The Accused

The Bill Cosby allegations in November 2014 were among the first public attacks made decades later against prominent men. Several women complained that in the 1980s, they met up for drinks and drugs in the hotel or bedroom of the married Bill Cosby, alone, late at night, and were shocked! shocked! when they discovered that this innocent meeting led to a sexual liaison.

I just thought he really liked giving out free drugs and booze

Since Cosby, there was a lull of a couple of years, until Hollywood producer Harvey Weinstein was accused by several women of odd sexual behavior, including masturbating into a potted plant in front of young single actresses. The backlash against Weinstein was fast and brutal–he was forced out of the company he helped found, and his wife of ten years announced she was leaving him.

Harvey Weinstein doesn't understand masturbation is for when you DON'T have a woman

According to his accusers, Weinstein's M.O. was to invite young actresses or models to a hotel room or private office, and then perform odd behavior like (literally Hitler) jerking off into a potted plant or pressuring the women for sex.

No longer allowed to tell jokes

Other prominent men who lost their careers after allegations of sexual groping or harassment include comedian Louis C.K., who invited women to his private room where he masturbated in front of them. Louis, known for his “Everything is Amazing and No One Cares” routine, had some funny jokes in his early work, but now is deemed completely unworthy of using his comic talent, as his recent film project was cancelled days before its scheduled screening, scheduled TV interviews were cancelled, and Netflix cancelled his upcoming comedy special.

Because C.K. made 5 women allegedly feel gross and uncomfortable, he can no longer work in his chosen field, and his millions of fans cannot hear him tell another joke.

Katie Couric creepily dangling her hand near Matt Lauer's breast without consent

NBC television anchorman Matt Lauer, a veteran of over two decades on the Today Show, was fired after the first allegation of sexual misconduct in his professional career was made last month. When no specific allegations of rape or violence are made, one must conclude that the behavior was at worst an inappropriate, childish, unprofessional act that made a woman feel uncomfortable. Nothing to be tolerated, perhaps, but does it rise to the level of termination and ostracizing Lauer from ever working again?

In November 2017, radio host Garrison Keillor, who created the wholesome "A Prairie Home Companion" on NPR, was fired after a woman accused him of inappropriate touching. Keillor said he touched a woman's bare back while attempting to console her, and she felt uncomfortable. He apologized, she accepted his apology, but the outrage against this single act of misplaced empathy resulted in his termination, along with ceasing rebroadcasts of his 42 year old radio program. All because he is accused of making a woman uncomfortable once.

Sheriff Jim Kaelin giving one of his last hugs (note: the sheriff has not been accused of any wrongdoing)

Keillor is so white-bread and benign that when he was named funniest man in America in 1985, Bill Cosby said "That's true, if you're a pilgrim." Touching or hugging has become so dangerous that Texas Sheriff Jim Kaelin has announced as of November 30, 2017 that he is no longer hugging anyone other than his family, because the risks for him showing kindness with a hug are simply too great.

Franken rapily thrusts his hands towards the innocent Playboy model in a violent and misogynistic manner

Finally, former SNL comedian and Minnesota senator Al Franken annnounced in December 2017 he is resigning from Congress because of pictures that showed him pretending to touch the breasts of Leeann Tweeden. Tweeden, a former Hooters waitress and Playboy model, was selectively outraged when Franken took a humorous photo which simulated him touching her fully clothed chest. No word yet on how she will retaliate against the millions who saw her naked body and pleasured themselves to it without her explicit consent.

Are These Actions Surprising?

Other than some of the bizarre behaviors, like Weinstein jerking off into a potted plant when he had a real live woman in his bedroom or Louis C.K. awkwardly asking women to watch him pleasure himself, it’s evident that most of the accused men (a) don’t know how to behave around women, (b) are in serious need of game, and (c) don’t understand masturbation is reserved for times when a woman is not in your bedroom.

Power is a strong aphrodisiac for women, perhaps the strongest of all. Why else would women fawn over DJs, who have high social capital in the nightclub scene? Why would twenty-something Monica Lewenski pursue a rather unattractive, much older, and unavailable Bill Clinton?

I’m here about the kindergarten teacher interview

We all know that sleeping your way to the top is a practice that certain women engage in. As long as there are women willing to use their bodies to pleasure men in return for favors (and this has gone on throughout time and cultures), men will seek out these women. Many of these allegations involved men who were used to women dropping their clothes and getting down to business, screening for future applicants.

Men in prominent fields, particularly in entertainment, are often surrounded by young, attractive single women. Who would not use their fame, fortune, and power, to seek out opportunities with the portion of these women who are eager and willing to have sex with far older men?

If a woman is showing up, alone, to my hotel room late at night, I have a very, very strong suspicion that we are going to have sexual intercourse. There’s simply no other reason to visit a man during sleeping hours at his bedside. In fact, excluding hotel maids, sex has happened 100% of the time a younger woman has come to my room.

Test For Dummies

Here’s a simple test for women. If it’s not okay for a guy to accept the same offer you are considering, there is a sexual component involved.

For example, if Harvey Weinstein reads an article I wrote and wants to meet me at 10:00 AM at his office to discuss turning it into a film, that is normal and I could accept. If Harvey Weinstein invites me to Atlantic City to spend the weekend in his hotel room, I would have to politely refuse. If it’s inappropriate for a man to accept the same offer you’re considering, then you can assume you are being invited for sexual purposes and you should refuse.

Next week we will analyze the mistakes made by the men involved, the meaning of the allegations, and the purpose of the media propaganda barrage and zero tolerance punishments against the men involved.

Read More: Hollywood Has Always Used the Casting Couch to Trade Sex for Fame

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Women's Football League Rejects Transgender "Woman" For Being Too Big And Strong

December 13, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

"Hannah" Mouncey, a 220-pound, 6'3″ transgender "woman," has recently been excluded from playing in the female version of the Australian Football League (AFL). Australian rules football, for those who have never seen it, is somewhat like the bastard child of soccer and rugby, combining kicking and tackling. It is most popular in the southeastern state of Victoria, which includes the city of Melbourne.

> The exception is to ensure players don't have an unfair competitive advantage in single-sex competitions where the strength, stamina or physique of players is relevant.
>
> — Australia's Sky News explaining how Hannah Mouncey was banned using the laws of the state of Victoria because she would be too damn good against female players

Despite constant reassurances from SJWs that transgender women are indeed "real" women, the powers that be ruled that Mouncey would be far too good compared to the so-called cis-gender female players. Normally, testosterone levels are the benchmark for whether a transgender woman can participate in a female sporting field. Having fallen below the maximum permissible levels of the male hormone, Mouncey nevertheless received a ban from the sport's governing body.

Female sport needs to be continually protected, not just from men, but also men trying to be women. The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission specifically prepared for the risks of transgender women outclassing biological women, allowing the former to be excluded if they would cream the female players.

The decision has been made more hilarious because Mouncey only seems to have properly taken up the sport of Australian rules football in the last couple of years. Before injecting loads of female hormones, the player represented Australia in men's handball. Whilst this is quite an achievement, handball is close to the least popular mainstream sport in the country and is hardly analogous to Australian rules football.

Watch as the SJWs eat each other

If Garry Shandling had had a transgender baby, it would have been New Zealander weightlifter "Lauren" Hubbard.

I went to university in Melbourne for one of my degrees. Even compared to Sydney, which has the most extreme small-scale leftist hotspots, Melbourne is the country's SJW capital overall. Still, there are occasions where tussles between privileged groups, like real women and transgenders, lead to disputes that are only temporarily resolved by one group shitting on the other. In this case, women with vaginas won.

Predictably, The Guardian has been super-pissed at the decision to boot Hannah Mouncey from contention. Meanwhile, those more interested in advocating the lie that women's sport is as good as men's (by very strictly keeping the sexes from competing side-by-side) appear to support it.

Australia's nemesis New Zealand is also increasingly befuddled by the transgender sports issue. Unlike Hannah Mouncey, though, our sheep-loving neighbor backed the dick-removing side. A deeply troubled Kiwi man (or budding, self-sacrificing shitlord) opted to "become" a woman and then proceeded to smash the competition in weightlifting earlier this year. God knows the sort of intra-SJW wars we will gleefully witness when this fabulous new craze fully hits North American and European shores.

There is no rhyme or reason to leftist madness

“Which penis-less group do we support more today?”

You know the fall is coming if the SJWs really can’t decide who amongst their pet groups to preference and why. As I said, the biological women won this time around concerning Hannah Mouncey. Yet the next victory in Australia or elsewhere will probably be chalked into the transgender column. And so the madness continues.

We live in a sad but interesting period. Amidst the braindead social experiments of the 2000s and 2010s, every once in a while we see developments that bring smiles to our faces. Leftists squabbling over which pecker-less demographic gets the reward of the day is always going to be one of those instances.

Read More: How Social Justice Warriors Ruined Australian Football

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Kill Whitey

December 14, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For many years, I have been at the forefront of teaching men how to embrace their masculinity, maximize their potential, and sleep with beautiful women. During this time, I have come to believe that liberals have an explicit goal to crush men, primarily through the meme of feminism, but I now realize that that was only an intermediary step for a more comprehensive agenda: kill whitey. What I thought was a war against men is really a battle within a bigger war against white people.

You will only get attacked by the establishment if your advice, beliefs, or teachings can possibly help whites, regardless of your own race or sex. If your productive or artistic output could improve the status, reproductive potential, or income earning potential of whites, you will be attacked. If your output helps anyone but whites, or if you can prevent whites from being born by promoting sterility, homosexuality, or abortion, you will be declared a national hero.

Can your self-improvement advice possibly help white men become stronger and more masculine? You will be put on a hate list. Does your NFL activism raise awareness for the oppression of black men? You will be given media support for fostering unity and free speech.

Can your sex advice, written in English, possibly help white men improve their ability to reproduce? Your speech will be curtailed and your family will be doxed. Can your sex advice, translated in Arabic, help migrants reproduce with white women, diluting the white gene pool? You will be financed by the government.

Can your commentary, as a gay Jew, be labeled as hate speech because it helps white men understand the forces they're up against? You will be called a pedophile. Can your commentary, as a Muslim woman, be labeled as terrorism even if you call for Jihad and Holy War against the West? You will still maintain institutional support.

> Linda Sarsour is being targeted because she's a leader who unites people of all faiths and backgrounds. Join us in saying #IStandWithLinda. https://t.co/FdDtLk5fov
>
> — Women's March (@womensmarch) July 7, 2017

Does your traditionalist family advice possibly help white women raise white children? You will be demonetized or banned from Silicon Valley's platforms. Does your abortion organization help kill 60,000,000 babies, many of them white? You will be given government funds for literally killing whitey.

It doesn't matter if, like me, you're non-white—if your work can possibly help whites be stronger or more fertile, you'll be marked for destruction. This is why a black man like Tariq Nasheed, who taught pickup advice like me, though of the "we waz pimpz" variety, is now a media hero because he can't go an hour on Twitter without declaring someone's couch as white supremacist.

On the other hand, if you're a respected black doctor like Ben Carson, you will be labeled racist because your opinions may help whites run their country better.

What a let down to realize that there isn't a crusade against men as much as white people. By publishing masculine advice to a majority white audience, I was put in the cross hairs, but if I released game guides in Urdu, Dari, or Pashto, I would get big financing and puff stories in the media about how I empower marginalized men of color whose ancestors were victims of white colonialism. You've seen the media attack me for being "pro-rape" based on a satirical article yet they can't seem to get around to reporting on the insane real-rape epidemic in Sweden and Germany.

If you want to know why there is a war against white people, I would start by asking yourself who is in control of the liberal establishment, and if that group of individuals may possess a pathological hatred towards the white race. Their movement used to put a “progressive” or intellectual veneer over kill whitey, but now they don’t even bother to hide it, and because I’ve helped red pill tens of thousands of white men on women, I get the public whip.

History shows that wars and genocides happen after a period of dehumanizing a race or people. This is what’s happening to whites as the kill whitey movement approaches its final stage. I do sympathize for the individual whites (and non-whites) who have been harmed in the kill whitey movement, but I’m confident they can take care of themselves. That said, do you happen to be fluent in Arabic? There are a few game books of mine that I would like to translate.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: The End Goal Of Western Progressivism Is Depopulation

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

7 Reasons Why Extra Virgin Olive Oil Is The Original Superfood for Men

December 14, 2017 | by Papa Selo | Link | Original Link

Besides my large, natural masculine bulge, the first few things any girl notices about me are my long eyelashes and smooth beige skin. Sluts these days, right? I almost lament the fact that I typically sow my seed into a woman's gaping lady garden far before I discover her last name. Unless of course, like my oils, she turns out to be extra virgin. But let's get back to how olive oil is responsible for how healthy and confident I feel, and how beautiful my body appears to the fairer sex.

Personally, I gulp back at least one heaping tablespoon of extra virgin olive oil twice daily, straight from the bottle. And if I can, straight from the tree. Unfortunately, the vast majority of vegetable and seed oils available in the West are highly processed: they are heated, washed, and treated with a chemical compound called hexane that strips them of most of their nutritional value, all in the name of profit.

Your typical garden-variety vegetable oil, if contaminated, is deprived of the omega-3 fatty acids that make it worthwhile to consume in the first place, leaving only a small quantity of its cousin, omega-6. Though this particular polyunsaturated fat is certainly necessary for the body, when consumed in excess or alone merely amplifies inflammation, and can even increase the risk of heart disease. Few consider that the oils you occasionally drizzle on a Caesar salad at Applebee's can actually be far worse for you than shooting it straight by the ounce, just like a fine tequila Reposado.

That said, below are seven reasons masculine men everywhere should consider natural extra virgin olive oil as a daily dietary staple.

1. Olive Oil Increases Testosterone and Sperm Count

If you didn't already know, your testicles produce testosterone by extracting cholesterol from special cells within them called leydig cells. In 2009, a couple of Argentinian researchers discovered that olive oil increases the activity of enzymes responsible for energizing these leydig cells, as well as providing antioxidants to keep them alive for longer. As a result, a positive feedback loop between enzymes and antioxidants in your balls can be strengthened, increasing the rate of testosterone production.

Aside from this, they demonstrated that olive oil acts as an indirect anti-estrogenic. It contains a compound called oleuropein that inhibits enzymes, which would otherwise facilitate the transformation of free testosterone molecules into estrogen. This is clearly not an acceptable outcome for any man. One look around my ancestral village convinces me that without a doubt, the copious amount of olive oil consumed plays a strong role in my cousins' unparalleled masculinity.

2. Olive Oil Improves Mood and Fights Depression

Depression is like having a tail, right? Nothing you can do about it, right? Wrong. Drink olive oil, and a lot of it. A recent study of 12,000 Spanish students linked extra virgin olive oil consumption with a nearly 50% reduction in depression. Another study, conducted also in Spain from 2009, showed a 30% reduction in depression for the experimental group subjected to a Mediterranean diet high in olive oil. The authors opine that somehow cardiovascular disease and depression may be interrelated. Whatever the reason, you can't beat results like this. Ableism be damned!

3. Olive Oil Burns Fat

There are only two ways that you can be greeted in the selo (the Croatian word for village) after a long absence. Either with "Wow, you sure have gained weight!" followed by a hard slap to the belly and patronizing laughter, or "Wow, you look like a sick, skinny fuck!" in which case you will be fed until your intestines feel like they are about to explode.

Either way, you won't get an actual compliment. But if you want to feel good about yourself, you know what to do. Yes, apparently extra virgin olive oil speeds up general fat oxidation in the body, meaning it is directly responsible for burning fat. This is perhaps the most simple and consistent result that appears in studies on the subject. Whether it's cutting season at the gym, or cutting season at the gym, the answer is extra virgin olive oil.

4. Olive Oil Improves Focus and Memory

A 2012 study by Ligia Dominguez et al. showed that antioxidants in extra virgin olive oil can both inhibit and sometimes totally reverse age and disease-related learning and memory deficits. Although this research has not been tested in human gastrogenomic trials, I swear my baba (grandmother) never forgets to scold me when I leave the house without my sweater.

At the same time, she also never seems to be forget that a mild draft will not automatically cause my head to violently explode into a million pieces. Olive oil is no modafinil, but I still swear by it. It does too many wonders to not give it the benefit of the doubt here as well.

5. Olive Oil Protects The Heart

Given the abnormally high percentage of fats found in olive oil produced in the Mediterranean, most assume that this would exacerbate rather than prevent heart disease by hardening your arteries. Strangely, the lowest incidence of heart disease-related deaths in the industrialized world occurs in Southern Europe, where people typically have high blood cholesterol, high blood pressure, and smoke a lot of cigarettes.

Although there are many possible explanations for why this is the case, the proof is in the eating. One study, which examined 7,447 patients at high cardiovascular risk, showed that after 4.8 years, the risk of major cardiovascular events (heart attack, stroke) was reduced by 30% in the group assigned to the high extra virgin olive oil diet.

6. Antioxidants In Olive Oil Help Prevent Skin Cancer

Slavs are typically fair-skinned wherever you find them, and while Balkan Slavs closer to the Adriatic have adapted to become darker as they age, they definitely come out kicking and screaming and white as the dickens, just like many of us. A diet high in extra virgin olive oil, however, has been shown to reduce skin cancer risk because of the prevalence of oleic acids, which inhibit certain cancer-causing genes from functioning in cells.

Apparently, only three in every 100,000 residents of countries in the Mediterranean develop any form of skin cancer, despite summer temperatures in most places ranging from 95-115 degrees Fahrenheit. Another Mediterranean paradox resolved by extra virgin olive oil? I think so.

Actually, I do faintly recall my grandmother massaging olive oil onto my back as a child, before I was allowed to play with the other children in my village by the sea. There must be something to that.

7. Olive Oil Is Nature’s Anti-Inflammatory Agent

Olive oil contains a natural anti-inflammatory agent called oleocanthal. Compared to your run of the mill yellow water from Costco, extra virgin olive oils sourced directly from the Mediterranean are up to 500% more potent. Forget ibuprofen and aspirin, which can cause internal bleeding in the stomach, small intestine and in extreme cases, the brain. If you have a chronic inflammatory condition, it may be worth experimenting with olive oil.

I’m no doctor, but the Monell Chemical Senses Center insists on a spoonful a day to reduce pain associated with allergies, asthma, arthritis, colitis, gastritis, osteoporosis, prostatitis, sinusitis, vaginitis (just kidding), tendonitis, and more. Seriously, just do it. Personally, I take two tablespoons, and always down it with a clove of garlic. No harm done.

Please keep in mind that just like the ideal woman, the only olive oil you should ever consider is extra virgin. Most extra virgin olive oil is fake, so conduct a routine background check just as you would before dating any girl and make sure to source your oils from the highest quality family farms. Italy and Greece tend to produce a lot of fakes, whereas Croatia, Portugal and Lebanon produce authentic liquid gold.

Extra virgin olive olives typically have between 5 and 10 times as much polyphenol content compared to regular oils, and a healthy dose of monounsaturated fats. This is because they are not watered down with Feminism, sunflower seed oil, and other pollutants.

Along with copious amounts of red wine, vine-ripe grapes, bursting pomegranates, organic prosciutto, and plenty of raw garlic and onions, it is no wonder that my living relatives and Slavic ancestors from the Mediterranean are known for their extreme masculinity and virility. Whenever I return to Croatia after an unfortunate extended absence, it becomes painfully obvious to me how much catching up I have to do. As Baba always says "Ih, ranko, ih!" which, when said in the best combination of a Texan and Russian accent you can possibly imagine simply means "Eat, dear, eat!" and lather everything in olive oil.

Read More: 4 Superfoods And Their Effectiveness

Papa Selo

Papa Selo is a Croatian philosopher with an old soul. Aside from tending to his olive trees in the heart of Dalmatia, his singular passion is fjaka (doing absolutely nothing) in his village by the Adriatic sea.

Is It Worth It For You To Visit Brno, Czech Republic?

December 14, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

It's no big secret at this point that capital cities in Eastern Europe are somewhat played out. Between tourists flocking to these "new and exotic places," stag parties stumbling through the streets, Tinder taking over, and an influx of Western characteristics—these cities are different than what they used to be. The more that these capital cities become overrun, the more men will look to the countryside to find feminine girls, fewer tourists, and a different way of life.

The Czech Republic is an interesting place, namely because it's outside of Prague and relatively lacking in Western tourists. Prague of course, is overrun as a "game" spot, and gets no love over on RVF.

The second-tier cities in Czech Republic are relatively untapped and unexplored. Unlike Poland, where places like Krakow, Poznan, and Wroclaw are quite known—the same can't be same for places like Brno or Ostrava. I spent a bit of time in Brno last month, and came away with the following four impressions.

1. The People of Moravia Are Vastly Different

Locals in Prague have an attitude similar to New Yorkers or Los Angelos in the United States. Namely, that they think their city and region is superior to the others. And honestly, they're not wrong. Prague is stunningly beautiful, very developed for an Eastern European country, and most of the rest of the Czech Republic is not on par.

The people in Brno, and from what I hear, the rest of the surrounding Moravian region, were much more friendly and open. Speaking English? They'd love to. Service with a smile? Definitely.

The biggest tourist attractions in Brno.

2. There's Less Hustle And Less Money

Of course, with this comes far less hustle and bustle, which tends to de-motivate those of us who like to hustle hard. People in Moravia tend to have a much more laid-back approach to life. While this does have its perks (friendliness), the downside is that it's hard to hustle and get ahead economically.

Here's the thing about many capital cities—they're big places. There are always new opportunities, new people to connect with, and more money to make. People are hustling—they're founding startups, working long hours, trying to get ahead in their career.

Finding that in Brno is going to be difficult. I found myself much preferring to spend the day in a cafe watching people wander by at a leisurely pace. Granted, I was on "vacation," but if I were to book a month there, I don't think I'd get much done.

3. It’s Physically Small

If you’re someone who likes to explore all the ins and outs of your home city, Brno is definitely not for you. You can walk from one end of the main square to the other in 7 to 10 minutes. Outside of that, the beauty of the place falls off significantly. I don’t think foreigners would have many reasons to go outside of that area. All the locals even congregate in the very center—it’s where the majority of restaurants, cafes, and stores are all located. If you have the bankroll to stay in the center, you’ll hardly leave.

Granted, this isn’t much different than people living in a place like Bogota and never leaving Zona Rosa. Often times, expats don’t get out much from their home zone, but places in Eastern Europe like Krakow, Budapest, and Prague have many interesting districts that anyone staying more than a week should explore. I don’t think I could say the same about Brno—those districts simply don’t exist.

4. It’s Mostly Family-Orientated

I was spending most of my time with a friend who had recently moved to Brno. And here’s what he had to say:

> Moravian girls are traditional, they seem to want a family. Even if they move out, they are often not far from their own families. They have a “rivalry” with other, more liberal regions—and don’t want to lose their identity.

I found this interesting. Every country has regions that are more resistant to change than others. Big, capital cities are always the first to dive headfirst into the liberal way of thinking. But in Brno’s case, it has these things going for it:

- A “rivalry” with the more liberal side of the country—apparently Prague and Moravia do not like each other much.
- It’s on the very outskirts of the country—far closer to both Slovakia and Hungary than Prague.
- Everyone knows everyone. Girls are (generally speaking) more likely to be good if they know people are watching.

In any case, Brno was not for me. I know who I am, and I like the big cities. I just don’t seem to click as well with the smaller ones, though they’re okay for short trips, but perhaps you can find what they’re looking for in Brno.

Sick and tired of not getting replies with online dating? Now you can copy what’s worked and use it yourself—learn more here. For more content about dating abroad, check out The Dating Abroad Podcast.

Read Next: 6 Things To Know About Prague (Czech Republic)

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Young People Are Returning To The Land

December 15, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

After decades of rural exodus, the land is becoming popular again. The trend is rather discrete and seldom heard of inside the mainstream world, but it has been gaining traction for years. More and more Westerners have left the cities for the more open land, especially the young.

How could urbanites, raised with the idea that cities were cooler and more progressive, not to mention the comfort of having everything close from home, choose to switch to a hillbilly-associated lifestyle? The official narrative answers that, thanks to "progress," city-dwellers became conscious about the environment and longed for closeness with nature, organic eating, and a healthy lifestyle, which motivated them to have it all in the countryside.

This may account for some bourgeois bohemians' motivations but is far from the whole truth. Actually, most millennials leaving the metropolis for the country are adapting to harsh realities. Big cities have become unlivable. They are incredibly expensive and riddled with openly encouraged criminality. Good jobs have turned increasingly rare and the few remaining are handed out to women or HB1s.

Many of us managed to live a rather normal, blue-pilled life in the city at our parents' home before being faced with the choice of either paying a high rent for a tiny, over-expensive downtown place, or living in some peripheral area for a lower price while being forced to commute every day. When you consider all these factors, the previously unimagined option of getting a plot of land and living off it with no boss, no HR, no thugs, more space and everything cheaper becomes a lot more interesting.

For years I have been witnessing a quiet, yet growing interest in survivalism among French speakers. A seasoned "prepper" from Québec has gained traction from blogging on various agricultural, independent living and preparing for collapse issues.

On the other side of the pond, the YouTube channel France Survivalistes enjoys a discreet yet steady success. Videos on how to spot and secure a cheap piece of land or how to buy a shotgun without a license soared, respectively, reaching beyond 140,000 and 280,000 views, suggesting it is becoming a substantial niche. Several books have also been issued by dissenting editors, including Piero San Giorgio's Surviving The Collapse which became an Amazon bestseller without any MSM cover.

On a more conventional note, community-supported agriculture associations have been multiplying since 2001.

> Many leave the cities to try their fate in the countryside. Some grow vegetables and raise animals. Others create rural holiday accommodations, educational farms, small-scale grocery stores, or play the tour guide… all of them have one thing in common: they want to be close to the land and run sustainable environmental projects. (Source)

This is not about French speakers. Greek millennials, after years without a job in the city they were born into, went green. North Americans did the same.

> The neo-feudalism of today's economy, where large corporations use large masses of the underclass via government funded conduits to earn money, allows for others to seek fortunes elsewhere and by other means… It would take shared goals, ideals, and beliefs–and it would not look like a back-to-the land farming movement, but rather a back-to-the-land pioneering spirit to build up small towns > and rural areas, using location independent workers, technology, and the rejection of the progressive status system. For small towns and little cities, it would not take many individuals to co-locate and transform a community of 5,000, or even 10,000. (Social Matter, "The First Reversal of Urbanization")

Less factories, more machines, and a never-ending quest for cutting costs even in widely beneficiary companies mean fewer jobs. Affirmative action means even less jobs for us. The megacities are overpriced and hold no future for us. They were appropriated by parasitic boomers, thugs, whores on freewheeling female hypergamy, and globalists. Most women living there are supported by the State, NGO or sugar daddies, which makes the place very much like a harem for rich men—or those daring and clever enough to pick up there.

On the other hand, living off the land, selling the occasional surplus and freelancing allows for a more rewarding life. Especially when it lets room for local community-building. If you consider starting a family or a tribe, the countryside is much safer, cheaper, and suiting to viewing things long term.

> We should both reject the idea of mass urbanization as a good, and we should physically abandon them ourselves as well. In the short term, this means that each of us should move out of the cities for the countryside as soon as it is practical to do so. In the long term, it means accepting the idea that the Restoration must involve a recentering of society, from one centered around megacities to one centered around a "manor culture", led in both a cultural and political sense by country squires who form a de facto or de jure aristocracy. (Anti-Dem, "An Introduction to Squirearchy")

The leap is challenging though. First, besides losing the many nearby shops you could go to in the metropolis, you inherit a number of physically demanding tasks. You also have to care about the weather, land fertility, and a number of natural things the cities shielded us from. Second, the Eye of Soros is already projecting its dark glare there, and the left has been busy trying to demonize survivalists while appropriating the trend towards the land.

Middle and right: aforementioned Piero San Giorgio and Vic Survivaliste

The agrarian associative world, which was a bulwark of resistance against commies decades ago, is now under constant pressure to walk crooked like everyone else, at least on surface. Just check their lingo, their marshmallow pastel tones, or the smug liberal faces on at least some farmers' markets. The WaPo article quoted above only interviews female farmers, female consultants and female executives (surprise: it was written by a female journalist). Some bourgeois bohemians use their wealth and connections to buy land easily then promote miscegenation along the way.

Liberals can't help but poison what they touch. Their narrative conveniently opposes a supposedly male corporate world to female or emasculated organic growers. When the virtue-signaling lesbian sisterhood members might benefit from student loan forgiveness and free taxpayer money "farm transition programs," the truly independent know they will have to rely on themselves.

For decades the left did conspicuously not care about peasants. They were not included into the fashionable urban proletariat—those who fed everyone else were deemed reactionary, uneducated hillbillies whose land should be seized in the name of "modernization." Neither did these destroyers of the West invent organic farming, which owes much to traditionalists like Lord Northbourne or Rudolf Steiner. In the 60s, the pampered sons of then well-off middle classes appropriated it while keeping the typical Marxist mindset. Today their ideological heirs are doing the same.

But even then, things might take an interesting turn. A friend of mine, who associated with New Agers before he took the red pill, told me of a community of neo-hippies in central France who had hired security—and they didn't care if the bodyguards leaned right as long as they did their job. Also, even leftists start to understand the value of hard work and the legitimacy of roots, property, and inheritance when they start growing life off the land.

Living off the land means getting back in touch with the very world. Just as when you're bulking on a budget, growing foodstuff is by no means virtual or for the sake of appearances. And perhaps this matters even more than the grown food itself. As the Romans said, soli sol soli—the land owes everything to the Sun.

Read Next: 5 Things Millennial Men Can Save The West

André du Pôle
André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Roy Moore's Loss Shows How "Sexual Harassment" Is Nothing More Than A Political Weapon

December 15, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Though Brexit and the election of Donald Trump taught us how we can beat the odds, Republican and true conservative Roy Moore never really stood a chance in the Alabama Senate race he lost. He was weighed down by a myriad of completely unsubstantiated sexual accusations, all while the GOP and its chief functionaries, including House Speaker Paul Ryan and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, utterly sabotaged his campaign.

This kind of trial by media and social media is going to happen many times over in our political future, particularly against rightwing candidates. Doug Jones' election is indeed historical, marking the first time in a quarter of a century that a Democrat has represented Alabama in the US Senate. Henceforth, the advantages of backing the claims of a Republican opponent's sexual accusers, or even orchestrating the accusations in the first place, is going to be irresistible to Democrats.

I would argue that previously politicians were relatively insulated from dubious sexual allegations. Although the "Republican war on women" lie favored Democrats, there seems to have been a paucity of sex scandals for either party. Both sides probably realized the dangers of reciprocal mud-slinging, whereby the Democrats would quickly jump on some woman's accusations against a Republican and vice versa.

Across the United States' many thousands of federal and state legislators, plus the countless others who unsuccessfully ran for these seats, comparatively few controversies emerged in the past, at least not publicly. Nevertheless, the ruthlessness involved in Roy Moore's case indicates that we are most likely turning a corner. A very bad corner.

Kudos to Roy Moore

Paul Ryan and Mitch McConnell, enablers of “rape culture” hysteria.

Moore did extremely well considering the circumstances of this special Senate election, regardless of how red a state Alabama traditionally is. Doug Jones did not secure a majority (this may change after further votes are counted or recounted) and Moore had garnered, last time I checked, a very respectable 48.4% of the ballots after being called a predator, rapist, and pedophile.

Paul Ryan, Mitch McConnell and many others told Moore to quit a long time ago. The GOP itself suspended his funding and then later pretended to support him by restoring it. The games and betrayal at play against Moore have been unprecedented. To boot, this farce comes without a shred of evidence leading to a proper police investigation of him, let alone charges being laid.

So, again, this week’s win to Doug Jones sends an unequivocal message to political mud-rakers and backstabbers everywhere: by repeating unproven, apparently opportunistic sexual allegations against your conservative adversaries, within and outside your own party, you will derail them 95% of the time. This character assassination is what the future holds for Republicans in general elections and conservative Republicans in GOP primaries.

You need to have total recall or you’re totally screwed, but even with it you’re still screwed

Total recall, American politics edition.

The women's allegations about Roy Moore have been presented in the mainstream media ad nauseam. I will not go into every example of them here, far from it. A general synopsis of Moore's situation, however, is simple. Women (and the Democrats and the GOP leadership) did not need any hard evidence to "convict" him and any time he could not remember one of these women from decades ago perfectly, it was used against him as "proof" of sexual impropriety.

If someone today accused another person of a robbery or physical assault from 20, 30 or 40 years ago, the media and others would largely ignore the story, citing the lack of evidence and huge delay in making the allegations. Allegations of "harassment," sexual assault, and rape, by contrast, are of a different breed. Almost any gap between an alleged event and when a woman "reports" (usually not to police) has been tolerated in non-political arenas for years, which has paved the way for Roy Moore-style political allegations in 2017.

When Moore could specifically deny even meeting a certain woman, he was in only a marginally better position. Without video proof of every interaction he has ever had (or not had) with his accusers, he was perceived as being guilty as sin. This is the brave new world that the conservative politician, once reasonably shielded from spurious sexual accusations, now faces alongside the regular man or non-political celebrity male.

Read More: Anonymous Sexual Harassment Allegations Leads To Suicide Of Welsh Politician Carl Sargeant

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Is It Possible To Die From An Overdose Of Protein?

December 15, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Daily Star:

Many gym-goers consume protein to build muscle and rebuild body tissue. Some will also take supplements, bars and powders to supplement their everyday diets. But can doing this be detrimental to your health?

This year, there have been heart-breaking cases where fitness fans have reportedly "overdosed" on protein.

In March, a dad was on the brink of death after consuming a weight loss product. Two months later, a bodybuilder lost her life after taking fitness supplements. And a few weeks ago, 22-year-old Fabien Van Johnson passed away after consuming an excess of protein powder.

These tragic instances may prevent others from using protein-filled products.

So just how great is the danger of protein?

The Daily Star Online spoke to Dr Daniel Fenton, of the London Doctors Clinic, about the risks. While Dr Fenton reassured that our bodies tend to regulate our protein levels, he did point out that there was still a risk of overdosing.

He said: “The body is phenomenal machine that utilises only what it requires and is very good at getting rid of excess products, which is why high protein diets are fairly (but not totally) harmless.

“But truthfully, too much protein can be dangerous. “Everything in excess can lead to severe consequences – even too much water can cause low sodium, brain swelling and ultimately death!!”

The medical expert revealed that taking in too much protein can lead to kidney stones or gout. While these illnesses are not directly fatal, they can spiral into more serious problems. Killer conditions, including sepsis and kidney failure, can both be brought on by the stones.

Dr Fenton explained: “Put simply, protein consumption generates a great deal of varying acids , which is filtered by the kidneys. To compensate for the acid , bones release calcium to buffer the acid. The extra calcium being processed through the kidneys can contribute to calcium based kidney stones. Proteins are also converted into purines, and subsequently uric acid, this can cause uric acid based kidney stones and even gout.”

Even though you should be cautious when using protein products, evaluating how much is oo much can be difficult.

The expert said: “You may have heard of cases in the recent media of people dying from consuming excess protein.

“It would be extraordinarily difficult to presume exactly what ‘excess’ means in these unfortunate circumstances.”

The recommended daily intake of protein is 0.8 grams of protein per kilogram of body weight – which amounts to 56 grams per day for the average man or 46 grams for the average woman.

It’s best to bear these guidelines in mind when consuming food or products that contain protein.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: Protein Bars Are Worse Than Candy

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

9 Ways To Prevent Depression

December 17, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Previously on Return of Kings, I have elaborated on various personality traits. However, there is one important personality trait that has largely been ignored: neuroticism. One tends to associate it with women and weaker men. The truth is, however, that in modern societies many men suffer from depression or borderline depression for a variety of reasons.

While we cannot change the larger environments that we currently live in, we may do something about our own lives and micro environments. Many of the suggested efforts concern health and nutrition, rather than medication or abstract psychological theories.

1. Sleep 7-9 hours a day

If you have trouble sleeping, it is easier said than done to sleep enough. Nevertheless, it's of chief importance to have enough sleep in order to repair your body and brain cells, as well as to decrease your cortisol levels.

2. Do resistance training in order to increase your testosterone level

As has been explained on these pages, low testosterone levels may lead to depression. Therefore resistance training, combined with proper nutrtion and recovery, may help to increase it.

3. Lose weight if necessary

Higher levels of body fat are associated with lower testosterone, and thus indirectly higher levels of neuroticism. Given that fat people are likely to eat more inflammatory food, these two negative things taken together may be a reason to lose body fat. It often goes hand in hand. 10-20% body fat is a healthy and attainable spectrum.

4. Avoid inflammatory food and eat properly

Inflammatory food is linked with higher levels of neuroticism. The casual relationship may either be that neurotic people eat more crap because they are depressed or that certain foodstuffs increase neuroticism. Recent evidence suggests that the latter is the case. No wonder why so many fat Americans are on antidepressants.

Avoid sugar, processed meat, saturated fat and trans fat foods, vegetable-oil, fried foods, refined flour, dairy, artificial sweeteners and additives, as well as too much alcohol. Instead, eat whole boiled eggs, fish, chicken filets, hazelnuts, almonds, olive oil, fruit, vegetables, and spices such as turmeric (found in curry), ginger, and cardamom.

5. Have a schedule for the most of your activities

As much as we may dislike our jobs and all sorts of other daily tasks, it is in fact healthy to have daily routines. Live through your work day, exercise in the evening (or morning if you prefer that), and do something constructive in the evening, such as reading a novel or spending time with someone important.

6. Pray, meditate or relax briefly every day

For a serious Christian or Buddhist, prayer or meditation are already mandatory practices so to speak. For the layman, however, one must be influenced by similar practices.

What has helped me to relax and increase my level of wellness, besides training and eating properly, is to lay down, close my eyes, lay one hand on my chest, and take long and deep breaths for about 5-10 minutes. Let whatever thought that emerges come: neither add fuel to, nor try to block such perceptions. Just let them come and go like people in crowded public areas. I mainly do this prior to sleep. This is like an ABC relaxation exercise without any New Age mumbo-jumbo on top.

7. Get off the internet, often, or at least every now and then

Online activities are connected to pretty much everything most of us do. It’s important for everyone who is not a monk or ascetic, although many monks these days do also use the Internet, at least in South Korea.

The downsides on the other hand are instant gratification, stimuli addiction, procrastination, sleeping problems, and increased stress levels. Get off the internet once in a while.

8. Spend considerable time in nature

Instead of staring into a computer or smartphone, gaze at trees, rocks, hills, plains, and grass. Although the causal relationships have not been completely disentangled, it appears as if considerable time spent in green spaces increases health and well-being.

For the rural man that implies woods, fields and plains, while an urban man may occasionally have to go to the country or visit a city park every week.

9. Have something to look forward to

Moreover, it might be beneficial to have something to look forward to besides the next chapter of the book you are currently reading, or the next chest and triceps workout at the local fitness center. Likely that may be a trip in your home country or overseas.

In closing

Instead of consuming chemicals or taking leftist psychoanalysts seriously, make concrete and sound efforts to decrease or prevent self-inflicted neuroticism from affecting you. While you cannot change the larger culture and society, you can affect certain aspects of your own life.

For more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: 7 Beneficial Activities That Cost You No Money

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Study: Your Cell Phone Is Reducing Your Sperm Count

December 17, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via CBS:

California health officials have a new message for cellphone users.

For the first time ever, the California Department of Public Health has released guidelines about harmful cellphone radiation and how you can avoid it.

Smith said, “When you sleep, you keep the cellphone at least arm’s length away from your body. And also, not carrying your cellphone in your pocket, having it either in your purse or not carrying it with you."

The research suggests cellphones could increase our risk for brain cancer and tumors, low sperm count, headaches, as well as impaired memory, hearing, and sleep.

Dr. Joel Moskowitz at UC Berkeley said, "Currently we're not doing a good job in regulating radiation from these devices. In fact, we're doing an abysmal job."

Moskowitz says this is a long-time coming.

Loading...

He's partially responsible for bringing this information to light. He sued the Department of Public Health for refusing to release information about the dangers of cellphone radiation back in 2009.

This spring he won that case.

"People are being injured and harmed by the delay in having this information accessible to them," Moskowitz said.

So does the release mean that the state believes cellphones are dangerous?

"Not at all," said Dr. Karen Smith. "Our position is that the science is evolving."

The state said one of the main reasons they've decided to release these guidelines now, is that there are new numbers out showing that cellphone use is higher than ever, with 95 percent of Americans using them on a regular basis.

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: 5 Stupid Photos Girls Can't Stop Taking

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

The Biggest Rape Hoax In History

December 18, 2017 | by Ted Deveer | Link | Original Link

Our revered spokesman Roosh recently Tweeted that Rolling Stone's UVA rape hoax story was the "biggest rape hoax in the history of mankind."

> "Dear sir, I'm writing an article for the magazine that perpetuated the biggest rape hoax in the history of mankind. May we have your consent to twist your words and make you appear as a bigger monster than you already are?" pic.twitter.com/M73637K9gw
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) December 14, 2017

Although I tend to agree with our esteemed leader's insights 19 out of 20 times, this one falls into the 1 out of 20 in which I will humbly disagree. There is one rape hoax that is much bigger in the history of mankind, for it changed the direction of history: Potiphar's wife falsely accusing Joseph of raping her, in Genesis 39 in the Old Testament.

First lets review the context. The Old Testament reviews the history of the universe and mankind, leading up to the three Hebrew Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Jacob has twelve sons, and eleven of them are very jealous of the prodigy Joseph, whom they sell to merchants while telling their father that he died.

Joseph becomes a slave to an Egyptian nobleman named Potiphar and then eventually rises up in the hierarchy to become the Prime Minister of Egypt and ultimately saves his family, Egypt, and the Jews. It is Joseph's and his brothers' descendants in Egypt who then escape from Egypt (led by Moses), to round out the narrative of the Pentateuch, the core of the Old Testament.

But there's a curious moment while Joseph is a slave in Potiphar's house. The moment is worth reviewing, in the original words. Here's the classic NIV translation:

> Now Joseph was well-built and handsome, and after a while his master's wife took notice of Joseph and said, "Come to bed with me!"
>
> But he refused. "With me in charge," he told her, "my master does not concern himself with anything in the house; everything he owns he has entrusted to my care. No one is greater in this house than I am. My master has withheld nothing from me except you, because you are his wife. How then could I do such a wicked thing and sin against God?" And though she spoke to Joseph day after day, he refused to go to bed with her or even be with her.
>
>
>
> One day he went into the house to attend to his duties, and none of the household servants was inside. She caught him by his cloak and said, "Come to bed with me!" But he left his cloak in her hand and ran out of the house.
>
> When she saw that he had left his cloak in her hand and had run out of the house, she called her household servants. "Look," she said to them, "this Hebrew has been brought to us to make sport of us! He came in here to sleep with me, but I screamed. When he heard me scream for help, he left his cloak beside me and ran out of the house."
>
> She kept his cloak beside her until his master came home. Then she told him this story: "That Hebrew slave you brought us came to me to make sport of me. But as soon as I screamed for help, he left his cloak beside me and ran out of the house."

> When his master heard the story his wife told him, saying, “This is how your slave treated me,” he burned with anger. Joseph’s master took him and put him in prison, the place where the king’s prisoners were confined.

Let’s summarize that in modern English. Joseph was sexually attractive. The boss’s wife was a desperate housewife with pent-up sexual frustration. She tried to sleep with Joseph repeatedly but he turned her down every time. When they were alone she tried one more time and he got away, but she got his coat and used thatas evidence for a false rape accusation that ultimately landed him in jail.

When we summarize it like that, it becomes clear: it’s a modern story. This is what is happening to men day after day in 2017.

Loading...

There are a few key lessons from the Joseph story that are important to remind ourselves of…

1. Rape hoaxes are ancient

We may think women are crazy now and we may think that modern movements like “feminism” has made women feel particularly entitled, but it turns out that these patterns have been around for thousands of years.

2. Desperate housewives are ancient

Similarly, “desperate housewives” letting out their sexual frustration in many ways has also been around for since time immemorial.

3. Rich women are especially likely to make false rape accusations

None of the other poor women Joseph was in contact launched a false rape accusation against him, but the richest woman did. The women making false rape accusations today are overwhelmingly materially comfortable white women with too much time on their hands.

4. It’s important for men to be hot

The bible is very direct that Joseph was attractive: “Now Joseph was well-built and handsome.” Even in ancient times it was the high-status man whom women would swoon over, not the ugly ones.

5. It’s dangerous to be alone with women

Joseph was able to ward off all of Potiphar’s wife’s attempts to seduce him as long as there were other people around. But when they were alone it turned into a “he said, she said” situation in which the man always loses. Joseph would have avoided the situation had he used the Mike Pence rule to never be alone with a woman.

6. Take your responsibilities seriously

What makes Joseph greater than most men is his almost inhuman ability to resist temptation and do the right thing. If I were in Joseph’s position, I don’t know if I would have been able to resist the wife. That’s also why I’m just a low writer for ROK rather than the savior of an entire race! But the lesson is critical: what separates “great men” from “average men” is that great men have the ability to resist short-term temptation so they can focus on their long-term objectives.

7. Never leave evidence behind

Joseph left clothing with the wife, which she used as evidence in her false rape allegation. Lesson: never, never leave any evidence behind. Not even a selfie together!

8. The beta blindly believes everything his woman says

Potiphar would have probably believed his wife even if she didn't have the evidence of the forgotten jacket. That's because Potiphar was painted as the classic rich beta who blindly and slavishly followed his wife around and believed every lie she said. As much as Joseph is a model to be followed, Potiphar believing everything his wife says is a model not to follow.

9. Use your talents to overcome seemingly insurmountable challenges

The most important point, however, is that Joseph used his time in prison to focus on developing his abilities—analyzing what he saw to be able to make accurate predictions as to the future—and ultimately become the leader of the Egyptian government behind the figurehead king. We may view Joseph going to prison as a problem—but it was precisely the time in prison that led him to meet the king that led him to the Prime Ministership and thus to save his family and race. Even the hardest times have positive outcomes if we stay on target.

It may not be a coincidence that those making the false rape accusations today, along with the journalists that support them, don't know the Bible. I'm not even saying that they are mostly non-religious (that is obvious), but they haven't even read it. They hate a book and a culture that they don't even know. This is not too dissimilar from how the MSM hates the alt-right and ROK without even attempting understanding us.

If they had read the bible, they would see that their actions today are just repeating an ancient male-female pattern, and that might make them question themselves just a little bit.

Much more about conspiracy theories and protecting your privacy.

Read More: Why Hasn't Jackie Coakley Been Punished For Starting The Biggest Rape Hoax Of The Decade?

Ted Deveer
I'm Ted, I read old books, and my interest in Stanley Kubrick has nothing, absolutely nothing, to do with my interest in conspiracy theories, not at all, no way. And I like my privacy.

5 Benefits Of Making Things With Your Hands

December 18, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

I have always enjoyed creating things with my hands. I believe it is a good way to counter our contemporary society when it encourages us to be mindless consumers, with our days spent sitting, riveted to a screen of some sort, rather than skilled artisans. Crafts connect us to our profound human nature and our innate desire to create something useful, beautiful or both from an abstract concept, giving it life with the help of raw materials, sheer strength and skill.

1. Respect

Seeing how hard it is to create out of nothing teaches you to appreciate the value of your possessions. One can only understand the talent artisans need when building furniture or weaving fabric, by trying to duplicate it. Before doing one myself, I had no idea that a table took so long to build, making sure all the angles are correct, the pieces fit neatly together and it does not wobble.

You will know humility when you try to sell you craft, noticing how people haggle while you remember how many hours you spent on your creation. You will respect, and not worship, your material possessions.

You will learn the importance of good tools. By choosing poor quality tools or material, you cannot expect good results, just like surrounding yourself with low quality people.

2. Ingenuity

“This item I want costs two hundred dollars, which I cannot afford now. No worries, I will do it myself.”

If you spend a hundred hours to create what you could have bought at the click of the button if you had the means, what is the lesson? If it was unpleasant, you will want to reach a financial stability where these two hundred dollars can be spent every day. You might want to create passive income, find a niche or discover a new way to gain financial success so you can afford those nice things that take long hours to build.

You will learn to improvise and circle around problems when you lack the tool, material or resources necessary to reach your goal.

3. Concentration

Extreme focus will be required on the task at hand. It is a welcome change in an era where multitasking, fooling around and short attention span are common place. Only dedication will help you improve.

Martial arts and handicrafts need a similar state of mind. If you are not able to blank the troubles and the various ideas in your mind, you will be thrown on the ground or punched, the same way you can overheat steel because you were busy chatting or cut too short the plank that you carefully measured seven times. Dedicate your total brain power to what you are doing.

Multitasking could come when the task is mastered or involves minimal risk. But I notice that the large majority of people that get hurt do so out of carelessness. While I advocate focus, the activity should still be enjoyable.

4. Motivation

It improves your patience and shows you how easily a mistake is made. The success of your projects will make you want to build more, you find purpose in your art. These skills will help you in the future.

For example, I am not as proficient as I would like to be in carpentry and this is something I would like to change. One of my projects is to build a traditional Norse long house. I have the plans and the land, now I just need to learn the technique. I long to build a place where I can gather my close circle, a sanctuary that I can entirely call mine as I will bring it into this world and will take care of it, just like a child.

5. Peace of mind

A majority of our hobbies need a screen nowadays (chatting with friends, watching films or Youtube, reading, blogging, video games, etc). We remain static and get rusty. Keeping our eyes on those devices disrupt our Circadian rhythm and prevents us from sleeping correctly.

Crafts keep you away from electronic screens, bring you good fatigue and quality sleep. They are a dynamic hobby and are simply good for the body and soul.

It can be compared to a meditation in motion. After hours spent in the workshop, I am tired and my mind is at peace. I am convinced that I have not wasted the hours I put into it.

L’oisiveté est mère de tous les vices

I try to follow what I preach. I needed a Viking practice steel sword for HEMA so I decided to built one. I enjoyed doing it although it took long hours. Click here to see the video.

What crafts teach you will always be beneficial, by its practical or therapeutic aspect. They can be enjoyed until an advanced age. You just need a sturdy work station, a few tools, steady hands and a fertile mind.

Read More: In Praise of Painting

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Fame, Tragedy, And Strangeness Behind Celebrity Culture

December 18, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

How did celebrities become larger-than-life, nearly deified? They're famous (obviously), and usually wealthy. Royalty counts, but few ordinary politicians make the cut. Glamour is the defining characteristic, above notability, money, or power.

They're just people, but in public perception, they're nearly Olympians. Their lives are familiar. Even those who don't worship the celebrity pantheon often can name movie stars who've been strung out on drugs, joined an oddball cult, poached someone's boyfriend, are perverts, etc. Even minor tantrums are documented in supermarket tabloids. Still, their misdeeds excite the public, and consequences are far less than for mere mortals. They're not "beyond good and evil," but pretty close.

Some are righteous folks, but many substitute politics for virtue, and others are moral basket cases. Here are the most common paths to glory, and what happens next.

Athletes

A pro athlete begins learning a sport during early youth, then plays in high school, later joins a college team, and finally gets drafted by a professional league. It requires tremendous dedication (commendably), some genetic good luck, and no career-ending injuries. Even so, only a tiny fraction of kids dreaming of going pro will succeed. This is mainly a male pursuit; female athletes generally get bourgeois-level salaries, not multimillion dollar contracts.

Performance-enhancing drugs are a dirty little secret. However, it's an addition to (rather than a substitute for) years of workouts and practice. Despite this limited exception, there are no shortcuts for success like the other celebrity tracks.

Foremost cardinal sin: Wrath

Some are serious knuckleheads. "Roid rage" doesn't help either.

Musicians

For male musicians, it's a long road for the lucky few who make it to the top. Generally this begins with mastering their instruments in a garage band as teenagers, and later playing gigs in smoky dive bars. With lots of talent—and even more luck—they might release a single that gets air play. If they follow it up with a hit album, then they're in the running for the big time. That's how it worked for the Beatles, and countless other bands.

Female musicians have the option of jumping the queue. This means sleeping their way to the top with industry figures who can get their songs in stores and on the air. Still, a minimum baseline of talent is required. It's hard to sell CDs if a would-be diva's music is beneath mediocre. Visual appeal and autotune only go so far.

There's another form of queue-jumping. A manager might encourage an adolescent musician with a wholesome reputation to sexy up her act. The "Lolita appeal" does sell tickets and CDs. Unfortunately, often they spiral out of control during young adulthood. They must keep upping the ante to build on previous success. They're in an arms race with other scantily-dressed divas. They don't realize when to tone it down, and their personal boundaries are just a bit distorted by then.

Foremost cardinal sin: Lust

Rock stars are well-known for their carnal appetites, obviously. For female stars, their music and public image can affect the girls who idolize them.

Actors

The Oscars

Countless young people dream of success in Hollyweird. Many attempt it, and strike out—one of several reasons for California's homeless problem. However, a lucky few will make it. The traditional road to success involves being cast as extras, later getting occasional bit parts, and then making an outstanding performance. Following that, a lucky few will attain stardom.

Time is limited; they either make it by young adulthood, or probably never. Obviously, the casting couch enables queue-jumping. That can happen for male actors too, though the specifics are pretty grim. Not everybody does it (just as not all athletes inject steroid doses suitable for beefing up cattle), but it happens.

In ancient times, actors had the same social status as prostitutes. During the rise of British theater, the profession still had a disreputable air, despite Shakespeare's tremendous cultural contributions. This former lumpenproletariat occupation is one of today's most glamorous. Acting really is a craft, though reciting lines convincingly isn't exactly rocket science.

Loading...

Foremost cardinal sin: Pride

Sometimes it really goes to their heads, and it shows.

Famous for being famous

The strangest of the celebrity tracks often is attained riding someone else's coattails. That's usually via dating someone already famous, or occasionally an elderly rich guy.

Some are mediocre artists or wannabe celebs with little to no talent. Some others might begin as strippers. Rarely, the toy boy of an actress can become “famous for being famous”.

Another avenue is reality TV. Someone’s cringeworthy eccentricities actually could be a ticket to fame. Unlike movie stars, they might not be able to method-act their way out of a wet paper bag. They’re simply filmed being goofballs, and the public eats up their antics like candy. Finally, a sex tape that goes viral might work too.

Foremost cardinal sin: Sloth

They do basically nothing. Some might lend their names to products, but that’s marketing, not business acumen.

Their life cycle

These demigods are expendable. Usually, a celebrity’s glory days are during youth; then it’s downhill fast. (Sounds familiar?) However, child stars have it the worst. Besides factors mentioned previously, they don’t get a normal upbringing or sense of self, and are under tremendous pressure to perform. Thus, the burnout rate for former child actors is pretty high. That got to Michael Jackson too.

For athletes, age and injuries take their toll pretty quickly. Investing wisely, or at least a backup career, will ease the difficult transition to ordinary life. Those who blow their millions will probably burn out. The top male musicians are mainly unscathed; some 1970s bands are still touring. However, middle-aged female musicians won’t be able to sell tickets like before, even the genuinely great vocalists. Male actors can have decent longevity, but it’s not pretty if they get washed up. Actresses can keep going too, but must adjust. Airbrushing, makeup, favorable cinematography, and digital postproduction only go so far. Today’s sex kitten eventually will be Miss Daisy. The burnout rate for the “famous for being famous” is extreme, even before they become forgotten has-beens.

Many fading actors and musicians attempt to prop up their relevance through ridiculous displays of virtue signaling. (Why do they think celebrity status makes them wise and knowledgeable?) They’ll warn the public about global warming, yet tour the world in private jets. Some adopt children from faraway locales, competing to get the most exotic brood. Faux-compassion would be funnier if the media weren’t trying to make it fashionable (and for pretty obvious reasons). Fortunately, political posturing by athletes is less common. The “famous for being famous” usually don’t bother to pretend to care about anything except themselves, though their lifestyle choices are a bad enough example already.

Other cardinal sins

Only linebackers and the bulimic can get away with chowing down like there's no tomorrow. Gluttony also includes drunkenness and drug abuse, pretty common in all celebrity categories, and fairly universal for the "famous for being famous". It's likely worse than the public imagines; not everybody gets caught. Things can get pretty bad with a nearly unlimited dope budget.

Then there's greed. I can't really fault them for wanting to make lots of money. Still, a truck driver, construction worker, or pipefitter is more productive—yet gets microscopically less pay and recognition—than someone who recites lines on a movie set, sings on stage, or plays sportsball. That's just how it rolls; entertainment is big business.

Envy is generally by the public toward them, understandably. I'll be honest. If time machines existed, I'd give my fourteen year old self an electric guitar, an amp, and a lecture about corporate bullshit. Also, I really should've tried out for the high school football team. (Even if I never went further, my teenage years would've been improved enormously.) If I could avoid the perils of excess, having my life plastered on the tabloids would be tolerable.

Fame is often a mixed blessing. Celebrities escape the common man's struggles, but may acquire another set of problems. Unfortunately, getting a big ego is all too often the first.

Read More: The Strange Life And Times Of Pamela Anderson

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

The Silicone Men Of Silicon Valley

December 19, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Silicon Valley in California is known for being the birth place of many tech companies that lead the world in innovation. With that in mind, it has also produced a new breed of human hybrids composed of silicone material with elevated levels of plasticity. This enables them to delegate their boring laborious work by outsourcing to third world countries, dodging taxes through loopholes in the legal system, and cutting expenses by hiring hordes of undocumented workers without having to record it in their financial reports.

Greed is a very powerful addiction. It makes one compromise his values and even drives him to commoditize his assets, spouse, employees, and anything else available just to make a profit. The odds don't necessarily need to be 100% in their favor as was the case with Twitter blatantly lying about their numbers to lure more advertisers to invest in their business.

These guys are willing to do anything to save a buck, just so their stock will go up a fraction of a point. If they smell the green, they're in. Now, they are pushing the limits by attempting bio-engineering with the goal of becoming one with their technology, which they hold onto ever so dearly. They also are developing the ability to leave the earth, letting its people rot in the very mess they created.

A Hybrid Race

Yes, these Silicone Men of Silicon Valley are a very rare breed indeed. They come from all ethnic backgrounds and of diverse sizes, but generally have one of four basic characteristics…

- A pasty geeky face usually covered in blemishes with plastic-looking sheen and clown like features
- Skinny, poorly toned body due to lack of exercise and low testosterone levels
- A devilish or weasel like smirk that hides their eugenic totalitarian views
- Balding with glasses or sporting the same messy-hair do

Other attributes include being cheap, addicted to marijuana and other recreational drugs, narcissistic, and ruthless. They have a superiority complex yet feel socially inferior around other people, but are masters of assuming the nice guy role to appease others in meetings where laws are regularly made.

Each one typically has a signature feature, a bar code if you will, that distinguishes them from each other, giving them a unique method of exercising their unified agenda. It ranges from having an alien shaped head, possessing mannequin like features, or simply wearing coke-bottle frames.

Some have accents, others have fast blinking eyes. One has a smile that gradually spreads crow's feet all over his face while another walks around in an undershirt among common men pretending to be one of them. There is even one that constantly has a star-eyed bucktooth grin while jet skiing with girls who are young enough to be his grandchildren. Recently, this talentless fool treated a former Muslim-American president to kite surfing.

Ugliness is also consistent among these men. It seems no matter how much genetic engineering is done, Silicon Valley always manufactures men who are unpleasant to the naked eye. A high-pitched squeaky voice is a common trait they possess. There is also an obscure righteousness tone in their speech as if they had received their business plan from God himself (a reptilian god that is), and that whatever catastrophes that may result from their actions are merely acceptable casualties to meet their goal. A means to an end, it’s just all part of business.

Their childhood typically features them being picked on with no one giving them any worthy attention. Most of them were shoved and kicked away by others, and retreated from society to find refuge in their technological sanctuaries where they were able to play God on a computer-generated interface.

Girls never cared for them, nor even acknowledged their very existence which is why they usually marry a bossy controlling slug which is of average looks and motherly quality. Still, some of them stay single, because they unintentionally exhibit female repelling behavior as it is synthetically inbred in their altered genes. However, many were taken advantage of by sexy women for one or a few nights, solely for maximum monetary gain.

Males are usually the gender manufactured from this area, but we are seeing females also being produced as the males see them as superior and believe in a god that is feminine. They wish to ultimately submit to this energy and become its humble slave, profiting from the fruits of labor done by the blood, sweat, and tears of masculine hardworking men.

These beta males are usually college dropouts. The ones that do graduate usually have degrees from the Ivy League schools of lower learning in either computer science and engineering or business as they worship them as gods, having unshakable blind faith that only these fields of study can save the world and shape it into their envisioned utopia, a world where everyone has universal income, a laptop computer, and a microchip all cybernetically linked to a giant super computer that relays real-time personal information streamed through multiple channels of social media.

Outsourcing is universal among them and now they've learned to mass produce copies of their kind in other parts of the world. With alien shaped heads and gelled hair, more hybrid clones are emerging from Asian and European countries at an unprecedented rate. Their eastern arrogance along with their hard work ethic proves to be a valuable asset to the mother base of Silicon Valley.

Economic Moochers of Society

Being experts in profit, these silicone men have a parasitical trait that they use to leech off the efforts of others to pocket more billions of dollars without giving proper acknowledgement or recognition. They're very quick to take and run, but are quite stingy with sharing the rewards. Nearly all of them have received millions of dollars in federal funding funneled by the government which they never paid back thanks to loopholes in the legal system, and by hiring the best lawyers that money can buy. NYU and Harvard both produce a plethora of the latter.

Monopolies are their pride and they use their position to financially squash anybody that challenges them. All these people like to preach idealistic futures with impractical, unrealistic expectations. They demand the world to conform to their lifestyle, turning their backs on anyone who dares challenge their hybrid-socialist views. They profit from the labor of others so of course they lobby for the protection of DREAMers. Companies like IBM, Microsoft, and Mark "Suckerberg's" very own Facebook, have teamed up with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to get amnesty for illegal immigrants.

Hypocritical in nature, such men tell nations to have open borders yet build massive walls around their mutli-million-dollar mansions heavily patrolled by armed bodyguards. They call for universal income yet cheat their own employees by literally working them to death, causing some to be hospitalized, and expect everyone to live the way they want while anointing themselves at the thrown as rulers of the world.

"Treating" Indians with untested vaccines, for their benefit of course

Wearing too strong of a prescription lens often distorts one's view of the world, and this causes some of these silicone men to go to extreme measures to shape their world into their twisted perverted fantasy.

Although the white collar class tries to fight back, their evidence is no match against the billions funneled by these tech giants. Eugenics is a sacred science to them to help rid the world of deplorables.

It is hard to put a finger on them as they are quite the illusive breed. However, one can gain some understanding by studying the very material which they are composed of.

Know Thy Enemy

Loading...
Silicone (noun):

> Any of a class of synthetic materials which are polymers with a chemical structure based on chains of alternate silicon and oxygen atoms, with organic groups attached to the silicon atoms. Such compounds are typically resistant to chemical attack and insensitive to temperature changes and are used to make rubber and plastics and in polishes and lubricants.

As we can see, silicone is a liquid or rubbery plastic resistant to toxicity and high heat making these men impervious to chemical attack with their underground bunkers and offshore castles, which is why they have such cold disregard for how their actions effect the masses.

Silicone (verb):

> Join or otherwise treat (something) with a silicone.

Their flexibility allows them to bond to that which benefits their globalist agenda. Symbiotic unions with government bureaucrats are used to benefit the subsidiary to dodge taxes and legally push their technological empire all the while being immune to liability. Political favors, monetary rewards, drugs, and even escort services are generously provided as tokens of appreciation as a symbolic ritual to solidify their fusion.

Yes, silicone is quiet a thing. It can even make life-like rubbery skin in sex bots and artificial limbs. It may come as a surprise, but silicon and silicone are two very different things. In short, silicon is a naturally occurring chemical element, whereas silicone is a synthetic substance. This is precisely why these men have such artificial personalities with politics of high plasticity. They go wherever the money takes them as they are incapable of human emotion since they were manufactured in the biotech labs of Silicon Valley.

Since these men love their home so much, their silicone composition has allowed them to bond with silicon, giving them special abilities so one must also study silicon to truly understand their madness.

Synthetic Men

Silicon is a metalloid having properties of both metal and nonmetals with many industrial uses. Being 14th on the periodic table of elements, it is the most widely available element on earth next to oxygen. It bonds well with reactive metals, creating a class of minerals called silicates. It is rarely found in nature in its pure form which is why it’s virtually impossible to find any real personality in these men. This also explains how these men can easily mix with multiple parties of sometimes radical, or even dangerous natures as together they form more powerful entities with no allegiance to anyone.

Elemental silicon is a major player in modern technology, because it’s an ideal semiconductor of electricity. When heated into a molten state, silicon can be formed into wafers to serve as the base for microchips. Is it any wonder now why these men are all tech geeks?

Electricity is their source of power and the more they keep themselves plugged into an outlet jack, the more alive they feel. That’s why they have trouble understanding normal people, because to them the most natural state is being connected to a machine. They fear human emotion and wish to connect the population to computers. A world that resembles a circuit board would put them at ease, because then electricity would flow globally, allowing them to transfer themselves anywhere instantly in different dimensions.

Unsurprisingly, Silicon Valley (the southern region of the San Francisco Bay Area), earned its name due to the high concentration of computer and electronic companies in the area producing silicon-based semiconductors and chips.

Political Plasticity

Having no loyalty to anybody other than themselves, the plasticity in these men is astounding. They'll sell out at 300 terabytes per second if it means gaining new business. As we're seeing with Apple, these companies will sell out their own country to do business with China. They are your friends so long as you keep the money flowing, but as soon as you pull out of vested interests like global warming, these silicone men are quick to turn their back on you.

Getting jacked while wearing designer clothing topped with aviator glasses to sport the alpha male world domination look is easy when you're a business tycoon.

They have the luxury of eating seven meals a day of the finest most exquisite food, chemically laced protein shakes, 24-hour access to state-of-the-art gyms, and sleeping twelve hours a day while their outsourced tech workers toil away. It's only a matter of time before one of them reaches the hundred-billion-dollar mark, but if they aren't stopped now, big trouble is likely to follow.

It doesn't matter how masculine Donald Trump is, you can't stop maniacs with that kind of capital. These people have legions of followers all over the world mesmerized by their gadgets and hybrid politics. They all have one thing in common—the desire to take over the world through globalization.

“Globalization should be inclusive” – Jack Ma, World Economic Forum in Davos 2017

Very clever choice of words, but Oxford English dictionary makes it very clear of what “inclusive” really means: “not excluding any section of society or any party involved in something.”

These people believe globalization should include the whole world whether you like it or not, a Borg society if you will just like from Star Trek. If you know anything about history, you’d know of their sneaky tactics masking their quest for domination.

Above The Law

Rules and regulations are made for the low class, the ones made from inferior DNA. Thanks to lawyers from Harvard and NYU, these men pay no tax by using tricks like parking money offshore, manipulating nifty loopholes in the system, taking a micro salary and claiming it as earned income, and even creating “foundations” in order to move their money into protected “charity” bank accounts.
With the newest nuclear threats being aimed at the western hemisphere of the United Sates, many foolishly think that these silicone men will get what they deserve. Their naivety has blinded them from realizing that these slimy, sneaky, slippery men have already purchased hundreds of acres in New Zealand, if not already the entire country itself, along with instant Kiwi citizenship all the while claiming to be a Trump supporter and proud American.

Tech giants have now bonded together in an effort to form a separate political entity which they wish to be free from government limitations. Their reason being that because technology crosses borders, culture, and economics, it is essential for companies to have less regulation. They are highly skilled in using seductive words to get what they want while masking their true motives.

What Can Be Done To Stop Them?

Their monopolies must be broken up to create a fair economy with limitations placed on what they can do. Aggressively pursuing them for dodging taxes should be done as nearly all of them have received government funding, but never paid it back.

Taxes should be placed for hiring outsourced workers and incentives given for using American workers. You’ve got to hit them where it hurts – in their wallet, or in this case, their Swiss bank accounts. If that doesn’t work, then it may be time to embrace the warrior within and take back America through more aggressive action. We are after all living in a jungle, a political one that is. If Donald Trump doesn't stop them now, their combined efforts could end western civilization as we know it.

Featured image designed by G.S. Luthra

Read More: Silicon Valley Darling Elizabeth Holmes Goes From A Net Worth Of $4.5 Billion To Zero

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info about him visit, GSL Creations

Thousands Are Disappearing In China’s Real-Life 1984 Nightmare

December 19, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via AP News:

Nobody knows what happened to the Uighur student after he returned to China from Egypt and was taken away by police.

Not his village neighbors in China’s far west, who haven’t seen him in months. Not his former classmates, who fear Chinese authorities beat him to death.

Not his mother, who lives in a two-story house at the far end of a country road, alone behind walls bleached by the desert sun. She opened the door one afternoon for an unexpected visit by Associated Press reporters, who showed her a picture of a handsome young man posing in a park, one arm in the wind.

“Yes, that’s him,” she said as tears began streaming down her face. “This is the first time I’ve heard anything of him in seven months. What happened?”

“Is he dead or alive?”

The student's friends think he joined the thousands — possibly tens of thousands — of people, rights groups and academics estimate, who have been spirited without trial into secretive detention camps for alleged political crimes that range from having extremist thoughts to merely traveling or studying abroad. The mass disappearances, beginning the past year, are part of a sweeping effort by Chinese authorities to use detentions and data-driven surveillance to impose a digital police state in the region of Xinjiang and over its Uighurs, a 10-million strong, Turkic-speaking Muslim minority that China says has been influenced by Islamic extremism.

Along with the detention camps, unprecedented levels of police blanket Xinjiang's streets. Cutting-edge digital surveillance systems track where Uighurs go, what they read, who they talk to and what they say. And under an opaque system that treats practically all Uighurs as potential terror suspects, Uighurs who contact family abroad risk questioning or detention.

The campaign has been led by Chen Quanguo, a Chinese Communist Party official, who was promoted in 2016 to head Xinjiang after subduing another restive region — Tibet. Chen vowed to hunt down Uighur separatists blamed for attacks that have left hundreds dead, saying authorities would "bury terrorists in the ocean of the people's war and make them tremble."

Through rare interviews with Uighurs who recently left China, a review of government procurement contracts and unreported documents, and a trip through southern Xinjiang, the AP pieced together a picture of Chen's war that's ostensibly rooting out terror — but instead instilling fear.

Most of the more than a dozen Uighurs interviewed for this story spoke on condition of anonymity for fear that Chinese authorities would punish them or their family members. The AP is withholding the student's name and other personal information to protect people who fear government retribution.

Chen and the Xinjiang regional government did not respond to repeated requests for comment. But China's government describes its Xinjiang security policy as a "strike hard" campaign that's necessary following a series of attacks in 2013 and 2014, including a mass knifing in a train station that killed 33. A Hotan city propaganda official, Bao Changhui, told the AP: "If we don't do this, it will be like several years ago — hundreds will die."

China also says the crackdown is only half the picture. It points to decades of heavy economic investment and cultural assimilation programs and measures like preferential college admissions for Uighurs.

Officials say the security is needed now more than ever because Uighur militants have been fighting alongside Islamic extremists in Syria. But Uighur activists and international human rights groups argue that repressive measures are playing into the hands of the likes of al-Qaida, which has put out Uighur-language recruiting videos condemning Chinese oppression.

"So much hate and desire for revenge are building up," said Rukiye Turdush, a Uighur activist in Canada. "How does terrorism spread? When people have nowhere to run."

'Thought Police'

The government has referred to its detention program as "vocational training," but its main purpose appears to be indoctrination. A memo published online by the Xinjiang human resources office described cities, including Korla, beginning "free, completely closed-off, militarized" training sessions in March that last anywhere from 3 months to 2 years.

Uighurs study "Mandarin, law, ethnic unity, de-radicalization, patriotism" and abide by the “five togethers” — live, do drills, study, eat and sleep together.

In a rare state media report about the centers, a provincial newspaper quoted a farmer who said after weeks of studying inside he could spot the telltale signs of religious extremism by how a person dressed or behaved and also profess the Communist Party’s good deeds. An instructor touted their “gentle, attentive” teaching methods and likened the centers to a boarding school dorm.

But in Korla, the institutions appeared more daunting, at least from the outside. The city had three or four well-known centers with several thousand students combined, said a 48-year-old local resident from the Han ethnic majority. One center the AP visited was, in fact, labeled a jail. Another was downtown on a street sealed off by rifle-toting police. A third center, the local Han resident said, was situated on a nearby military base.

While forced indoctrination has been reported throughout Xinjiang, its reach has been felt far beyond China’s borders.

In April, calls began trickling into a Uighur teacher’s academy in Egypt, vague but insistent. Uighur parents from a few towns were pleading with their sons and daughters to return to China, but they wouldn’t say why.

“The parents kept calling, crying on the phone,” the teacher said.

Chinese authorities had extended the scope of the program to Uighur students abroad. And Egypt, once a sanctuary for Uighurs to study Islam, began deporting scores of Uighurs to China.

Sitting in a restaurant outside Istanbul where many students had fled, four recounted days of panic as they hid from Egyptian and Chinese authorities. One jumped out a window running from police. Another slept in a car for a week. Many hid with Egyptian friends.

“We were mice, and the police were cats,” said a student from Urumqi, Xinjiang’s regional capital.

All who returned were intensely grilled about what they did in Egypt and viewed as potential terror suspects, the students said. Many were believed held in the new indoctrination camps, while some were sentenced to longer prison sentences.

The young man from Korla rarely went out in the two years he spent studying Islam in Egypt. He played some soccer — a beloved sport among Uighurs — but wasn’t particularly athletic or popular.

Instead, he kept to himself in an apartment that he kept fastidiously clean, steeped in his studies at the revered Al Azhar University, the 1,000-year-old seat of learning in Sunni Islam. He freely discussed Quranic verses with his Uighur friends but mostly avoided politics, one friend said. He spoke of one day pursuing a Ph.D. in comparative religion.

“He had big dreams,” said the friend who is now hiding in Turkey to avoid being sent to China. “He wanted to be a religious scholar, which he knew was impossible in China, but he also wanted to stay close to his mother in Korla.”

He was fluent in Arabic and but also in Chinese. When they huddled around a smartphone to watch a Taiwanese tear-jerker about a boy separated from his mother, he would be the one weeping first.

When homesickness got to him, he would tell his friends about how his mother doted on him, and about Korla and the big house he grew up in. And when he gets married, God willing, he would say, he'd start a family in that house, too.

"If my wife doesn't agree, then we don't marry," he declared.

He returned to China when he was called back in 2016 and taken away in February, according to three students and a teacher from Cairo. They say they heard from reliable sources in China — but cannot prove — that he died in detention.

Show Of Force

Southern Xinjiang, the vast desert basin from where many of the students came, is one of the most heavily policed places on earth.

Deep in the desert's southern rim, the oasis town of Hotan is a microcosm of how Chen, the Xinjiang party boss, has combined fearsome optics with invisible policing.

He has ordered police depots with flashing lights and foot patrols be built every 500 meters (yards)— a total of 1,130, according to the Hotan government. The AP saw cavalcades of more than 40 armored vehicles including full personnel carriers rumble down city boulevards. Police checkpoints on every other block stop cars to check identification and smartphones for religious content.

Shopkeepers in the thronging bazaar don mandatory armored vests and helmets to sell hand-pulled noodles, tailored suits and baby clothes.

Xinjiang's published budget data from January to August shows public security spending this year is on track to increase 50 percent from 2016 to roughly 45 billion yuan ($6.8 billion) after rising 40 percent a year ago. It's quadrupled since 2009, a watershed year when a Uighur riot broke out in Xinjiang, leaving nearly 200 members of China's Han ethnic majority dead, and security began to ratchet up.

Adrian Zenz, a researcher at the European School of Culture and Theology who tracks Chinese public security staffing levels based on its recruiting ads, says Xinjiang is now hiring 40 times more police per capita than populous Guangdong Province.

"Xinjiang has very likely exceeded the level of police density seen in East Germany just before its collapse," Zenz said. "What we've seen in the last 12 to 14 months is unprecedented."

But much of the policing goes unseen.

To enter the Hotan bazaar, shoppers first pass through metal detectors and then place their national identification cards on a reader while having their face scanned.

The facial scanner is made by China Electronics Technology Group (CETC), a state-owned defense contractor that has spearheaded China's fast-growing field of predictive policing with Xinjiang as its test bed. The AP found 27 CETC bids for Xinjiang government contracts, including one soliciting a facial recognition system for facilities and centers in Hotan Prefecture.

Hours after visiting the Hotan bazaar, AP reporters were stopped outside a hotel by a police officer who said the public security bureau had been remotely tracking the reporters' movements.

"There are tens of thousands of cameras here," said the officer, who gave his name as Tushan. "The moment you took your first step in this city, we knew."

The government's tracking efforts have extended to vehicles, genes, and even voices. In February, authorities in Xinjiang's Bayingol prefecture, which includes Korla, required every car to install GPS trackers for real-time monitoring. And since late last year, Xinjiang authorities have required health checks to collect the population's DNA samples. In May, a regional police official told the AP that Xinjiang had purchased $8.7 million in DNA scanners — enough to analyze several million samples a year.

In one year, Kashgar Prefecture, which has a population of 4 million, has carried out mandatory checks for practically its entire population, said Yang Yanfeng, deputy director of Kashgar's propaganda department. She characterized the checkups as a public health success story, not a security measure.

"We take comprehensive blood tests for the good of the people, not just record somebody's height and weight," Yang said. "We find out health issues in citizens even they didn't know about."

A biometric data collection program appears to have been formalized last year under "Document No. 44," a regional public security directive to "comprehensively collect three-dimensional portraits, voiceprints, DNA and fingerprints." The document's full text remains secret, but the AP found at least three contracts referring to the 2016 directive in recent purchase orders for equipment such as microphones and voice analyzers.

Meiya Pico, a security and surveillance company, has won 11 bids in the last six months alone from local Xinjiang jurisdictions. It won a joint bid with a DNA analysis company for 4 million yuan ($600,000) in Kargilik and has sold software that automatically scans smartphones for “terror-related pictures and videos” to Yarkent.

Meiya and CETC declined comment.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: How America Is Becoming A Real Life Sci-Fi Dystopia

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

3 Dangerous Chemicals In Shaving Cream You Don’t Know About

December 19, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by Wadi Men’s Care.

Shaving cream is something that few men think about, and why would they? You rub it on your face whenever you shave, wash it off, and that’s it. So long as it does its job, who cares?

Well, you should care, because your shaving cream is full of chemicals that are reducing your sperm count, damaging your skin, and hurting your body in other ways. Here are three common chemicals found in men’s shaving cream and how they’re harming your health…

1. Phthalates

Phthalates are chemicals that are used to make plastic and vinyl more flexible and softer. They are common in a variety of consumer products, from personal beauty and hygiene products such as shampoo, shaving cream, and nail polish to plastic toys, shower curtains, and insecticides.

More importantly, phthalates have been linked to decreased fertility in men. A study showed that men who used shaving cream containing phthalates had lower sperm counts due to the fact that the chemicals interfered with the proteins responsible for creating sperm. Men across the Western world are already suffering from disastrously low sperm counts, which is contributing to low birth rates in these countries.

If your goal is to maintain a healthy sperm count and masculine vitality, it's clear that consuming products containing phthalates are part of this. If you want to help preserve your little guys, you should switch to an organic shaving cream that lacks these chemicals.

2. Triethanolamine

Another common chemical found in shaving cream is triethanolamine. Triethanolamine is a viscous organic compound that is used to create mustard gas bombs. It is quite common in personal hygiene and beauty products, including moisturizers and shampoos, due to its effectiveness as a pH balancer. It is also used in mixing cement.

Triethanolamine has been demonstrated to have damaging effects on the skin and body. Studies have linked triethanolamine to various skin allergies, and studies on mice also suggest that it is linked to cancer as well, though this is not conclusive.

When you use shaving creams made from triethanolamine, you are literally rubbing a chemical used to make poison bombs on your skin. Do you really want such a toxic substance in contact with your body? If the answer is no, you should consider switching to a brand of shaving cream that doesn't run the risk of giving you cancer.

3. Surfactant Chemicals And Propylene Glycol

Finally, most commercial shaving creams contain surfactants and propylene glycol. Surfactants are substances that are responsible for lowering surface tension between liquids and solids, and propylene glycol is a colorless liquid used to create polymers. Both are used in shaving cream in order to help give it its unique texture and make it adhere to the skin more easily.

Like the above-mentioned substances, surfactant chemicals and propylene glycol have adverse effects on the human body. Surfactants have been shown to destroy the skin's natural ability to hydrate, drying it out and causing it to age more quickly. When combined with other factors that can damage the skin, such as sun exposure, your shaving cream may cause you to look older than you actually are.

As for propylene glycol, it has been linked to a large number of health ailments, from eczema and asthma to kidney problems and skin allergies. This is on top of the health problems that the other chemicals in your shaving cream can cause. Why risk your health by using these dangerous substances?

Wadi Shaving Cream: Organic Shaving Cream Without Dangerous Chemicals

If you're looking for a shaving cream that doesn't contain chemicals used to make poison gas and antifreeze, we heartily recommend Wadi. Wadi specializes in organic skin and shaving products for men, as a growing number of men are searching for hygiene products that allow them to maintain their health and strength in a world full of emasculating chemicals.

Wadi's premium shaving cream uses carefully sourced natural and organic plant-based ingredients, lacking dangerous substances that can impact your health. It's designed for skin of all types, meaning that no matter your age or background, you can use it to drastically improve your shaving experience.

Even better, Wadi shaving cream contains a built-in moisturizer, revitalizing your skin as you shave. This stands in stark contrast to mainstream shaving creams, which dry your skin out with repeated use. Wadi also eschews the use of fragrance oils, as they too are full of dangerous chemicals, instead using natural lime oil to give your freshly-shaved face a pleasant, natural smell.

Finally, Wadi's shaving cream is barbershop-quality but without creating a mess or taking too much time to use. You won't need a bowl or a brush in order to get the closest shave. Wadi's shaving cream is brushless and allows you to shave quickly and easily, allowing you to get on with your day with a minimum of fussing.

Say No To Dangerous Chemicals

Masculinity is under assault in the West in every conceivable fashion, including on a dietary and chemical level. The chemicals contained in everything from our hygiene products to our food to the plastic containers we use to store things are full of substances that are decreasing our fertility and turning us into logy, skinnyfat soyboys.

By using products that are organic and lack these chemicals, you can take back your manhood and improve your health. Traditional shaving creams are full of these substances and are one of the many things that are hurting your health. By using organic products such as Wadi's, you can curtail the assault on your masculinity. Click here to learn more on their Amazon store.

Also, if you sign up to join their men cave, you'll receive a free eBook on how to master the art of shaving plus 50% off on your first order. Click here to sign up.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Dating Doesn’t Work

December 20, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After absorbing the experiences of hundreds of men (and women), it has become clear to me that dating simply doesn’t work for finding a life partner. No other tactic has a greater failure rate in creating stable marriages and families than Western-style dating, a method that only excels in finding short-term sexual partners.

Before writing off dating completely, we have to first define what a relationship success story looks like. I’d define it as a marriage that is maintained for at least 25 years and which results in the birth of at least one child, meaning no catastrophic divorce that harms the upbringing of children. Many people you know who seem happily married are not yet a success story, but since most of my readers are under 40, let’s lower the bar and define success as any stable marriage that is at least ten years in length.

How many people do you know who have been happily married for at least ten years? Now how many people do you know who have not been married for ten years and who likely have no hope for that outcome in the next decade? Unless you are a part of a religious community, I predict that you know far more people who have absolutely nothing to show for their dozens or hundreds of dates and hookups. As dating has become even more shallow thanks to apps like Tinder, most people will outright fail in finding a mate through the strategy of dating.

If dating was an experimental drug intended to treat cancer, the experiment would stop halfway through because of how disastrous it is on the patient. Randomly opening a phone book and marrying the first opposite sex name you come across would have the same success rate, assuming there is mutual physical attraction. There is nothing within our DNA that allows us to successfully sample a hundred or more people, often sexually, to find love or compatibility without also succumbing to hedonism, self-harm, alcohol abuse, or outright sterility through the contraction of STDs. This is no surprise upon realizing that dating in the West began with 19th century prostitutes and homosexuals to later be normalized for everyone without having to prove its utility. It was never intended as a way for heterosexuals to find long-term partners, and any culture that has implemented it has suffered both lowered marriage and birth rates.

Dating is merely a technique for gaining sex, not relationships. It’s a miracle invention for men who want no-strings attached fun, and I have benefited from it for over 15 years. I almost can’t believe that I can fuck a girl after only knowing her for a couple of hours, all from making a few jokes and maintaining a beautiful beard, but that’s exactly what dating allows. All parties come to an end, however, leaving me and many others of my generation with no partner we love or otherwise happy ending that you see in Pedowood movies, because dating was never designed to help you find life-long partners. It’s a dead-end that explains why so many Western adults in their 30’s have never had a committed monogamous relationship of even a year in length.

I often get emails from both men and women who want marriage but are struggling with the dating scene. Mainstream culture has taught them to essentially become a detached professional negotiator who plays endless psychological games while interacting with 1,000 or more potential partners in the hopes that one will work out. Imagine if you used this soul-crushing strategy with other areas of life.

- Go on 1,000 job interviews to find one good job. There are a lot of jobs in the sea.
- Test drive 100 cars to find the right car for you. Never settle for the car that isn't perfect.
- Inspect 500 homes to find your dream house. You deserve the absolute best.

Yet this is what we do with dating, and we buy into it because it's not so bad in the beginning, especially for women. They like being hotly pursued by so many men in the prime of their physical beauty, thinking that they can hold out a few years until Mr. Right appears out of nowhere, but all those suitors just want to fuck and nothing more. Men like myself greatly enjoy the sex rewards that come with dating, but am I really going to marry the woman who slept with me on the first date and who will kiss my son with a mouth that has been gagged on by over a dozen cocks? I rather be single, and apparently, a lot of other men too.

You may be one of the lucky few who got dating to work, likely from meeting someone in your social circle, but for every one success story, there are a dozen people who are failing or will fail in their marriage goals. Simply pull up a map of the world divorce rate and you'll see a near perfect correlation of divorce with countries that permit widespread dating before marriage. In fact, any country that uses dating as a mechanism of pair bonding will inevitably suffer from cultural collapse, because they have no choice but to allow massive third-world immigration, often from incompatible cultures, to make up for the population shortfall.

When I'm in the mood for easy sex, I'll date. I'll approach a girl, spit my game, and bang her no later than the third date, but I'd be a fool to use that strategy to find a wife, because I know that a woman who is open to dating random men has a sexual history that my strict standards simply won't be able to accept. Since I'm not plugged into a church community or traditional social circle, this means that I'll be stuck on the more shallow end of relationships with women, an outcome that is not ideal, but one that I'll accept far more eagerly than using dating as a means to find someone I could be with for the rest of my life.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: The Hunt For A Moral Woman

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

British Police Withhold 40,000 Messages Proving Male Student Didn’t Rape A Woman

December 20, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> But police sat on her messages in which she begged Liam for sex and praised his manhood.
>
> In another, she is thought to have asked a man about acting out a rape fantasy.
>
> — The Sun reporting on evidence that police in the UK did not pass onto prosecutors

A 22-year-old British student has been exonerated of rape after 40,000 messages from his false accuser, who “cannot be identified,” were not passed on by police. The self-described “torture” Liam Allan faced is yet another reminder of how persecuted men are in the British legal system. With conviction quotas being an established and systemic feature of the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) and its modus operandi, under-pressure police appear to have also joined the anti-due process party.

Allegations of white-knighting are perhaps the worst part of this Liam Allan travesty, aside from the young man’s personal suffering. A male cop stands accused of refusing to hand over the tens of thousands of messages from the woman, which included her begging for more sex and talking about her rape fantasies. He is said to have regarded her communications as being “very personal” and thus too sensitive for disclosure. Another embarrassment for the false accuser is that she began her personal vendetta because Allan stopped their sexual relations.

Yup, you guessed it, the false accuser cannot be named.

I feel very uneasy even saying that these 40,000 messages proved Liam Allan was innocent, despite how satisfied I am for him. The onus should have always been on the prosecution—and police—to prove that Allan committed a crime. Remember, he spent around two years on bail, a harrowing reality that would have ruined his studies in criminology during this time, plus his and his family's ability to earn incomes (and pay for lawyers!). Any insistence that he can simply resume his life and that he hasn't lost much from this ordeal is farcical.

There were already significant problems with authorities chasing rape allegations that lacked any proper evidence and now society should have additional worries about how exculpatory evidence is being handled. There is presently no requirement of hard evidence to convict men of "rape" and when a man can be saved by other hard evidence, his fate depends on the willingness of those who are otherwise tasked with enforcing conviction quotas. What a world.

Liam Allan is incredibly, incredibly lucky

A lot of others like him end up in jail.

As stupid as it sounds, lucky is what he is, at least in a relative sense. There are countless men in the UK and elsewhere whose family members and social circles would abandon them if they were accused of sexual harassment, let alone assault. Many others would not have the psychological resolve, quite understandably, to clear their name or the financial burdens of preparing a defense and paying for legal representation would crush them.

Liam Allan's case is a great, albeit tragic illustration of the false rape hysteria infecting our legal systems. He is just the tip of the iceberg. Plenty of other less well-spoken but equally innocent men have undoubtedly been put in jail due to conviction quotas and/or the deliberate actions of individual officials in withholding or misrepresenting crucial evidence. I have to say that Liam Allan's reasonably photogenic appearance and non-working class demeanor probably helped his cause, too.

We are negative about these stories for a reason

Your local court precinct in the West as of this moment.

I would much rather have every one of my articles focus on self-improvement, game, travel, or related topics. Return Of Kings does not exist in a vacuum, however, and its creation by Roosh stems from a sort of post-seduction age where game needs to be balanced with a firm acknowledgment of significant cultural decline and decay. From what we know, Liam Allan could handle himself with ladies, but even this wasn't enough to spare him from two years of absolute hell.

If any man claims to have the proverbial magic bullet or panacea for always avoiding the worst female behaviors, the making of false allegations of rape among them, let him stand now. At present, all men are at risk of suffering from these behaviors, most of all when, like Liam Allan has learned, other men enable them by inexcusably white-knighting for a girl.

It is incumbent on all of us to share these kinds of terrible stories with others. We are yet to reach a critical mass after which larger numbers of men will begin to question and challenge the narrative of "listen and believe" and the atrocious consequences it spawns. Until that point is reached, more males like Liam Allan are going to go to hell and back following false rape accusations.

Read More: British Government Bans Female Rape Accusers From Being Cross-Examined In Court

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Facebook To Ask Users For Permanent Use Of Their Facial Data In Exchange For 2 New Notifications

December 20, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Gizmodo:

Facebook just got one step closer to becoming the literal embodiment of its name. On Tuesday, the company announced it's rolling out several new facial recognition features on its platforms. Once you agree to let Facebook use your face data, you gain access to new tools the company says will help protect your privacy and block catfishing attempts.

In a blog post, the company described the new features that will soon be available to users who turn face recognition on with "a simple on/off switch":

- Facebook will alert you when photos of you are uploaded, even if you haven't been tagged in them. This happens even if you aren't friends with the person who uploaded the photo, so long as you're included the audience group specified by the uploader's privacy settings.
- Facebook will alert you if your face is included in a profile picture. This update is aimed squarely at preventing catfishing and "revenge porn" style attacks, where someone creates a fake profile using intimate photos of a person without their consent.
- Finally, visually impaired users can now hear aloud who's tagged in photos alongside them.

The catch, of course, is that you'll have to authorize Facebook to access, store, and then match your face data with uploads across the site.

Privacy experts balk at the idea of giving face data to enormous companies like Apple and Facebook, but the social media company has recently moved to further incorporate images of users into their security measures. Throughout 2017, Facebook users have reported being asked by the site for selfies to verify their accounts after suspicious activity was detected. And just last month, Facebook piloted a program in Australia that would essentially block uploads of revenge porn—provided you send the images to Facebook first.

So let's be clear: Facebook has set up new privacy and security schemes that would guzzle up even more face data. The company should similarly scale up its transparency efforts and be even more forthcoming, particularly if this is being done to protect people from having their photos abused, as Facebook claims.

As part of today's announcement, Facebook published a blog post titled "Hard Questions: Should I Be Afraid of Face Recognition Technology?" featuring the above video. Neither, however, mentioned the ongoing lawsuit against Facebookover its handling of user's faceprints. Facebook is currently fighting off a class action suit in Illinois that argues the company violated the state's Biometric Information Privacy Act. BIPA sets a certain threshold of transparency from companies that collect and store biometric data. Facebook, the suit alleges, doesn't meet the threshold because it hasn't full disclosed its intentions.

Adam Harvey, a counter-surveillance expert infamous for his anti-recognition makeup, spoke to Gizmodo back in October about Facebook's push to integrate face data into authentication.

"When any information is co-opted for security purposes it becomes less secure to share," Harvey said. "For example, sharing your mother's maiden name online would not be a good idea. Likewise, Facebook's proposed facial recognition product would make sharing your face online a security issue, even more so than it already is."

Read the entire article

Don't Miss: Facebook CEO Mark Zuckerberg Covers His Laptop Camera With Tape—Should You, Too?

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

The Case For Gendo-Nationalism

December 21, 2017 | by James Miller | Link | Original Link

The alt-right and their leaders have often stressed the need for the establishment of a ethno-state on the North American continent. While I can understand many of their concerns as a middle-class white guy who lives in a gated community in the suburbs of New York City, I honestly do not have to deal with the minority problem on a day to day basis.

Whether the Bronx is being flooded with new arrivals is simply not my problem. Thots, on the other hand, affect us wherever we live. It doesn't matter how great your neighborhood is or even how religious your state is. America has become a degenerate nation, and thottery has pervaded all aspects of American life—Northern and Southern, Protestant and Catholic, conservative and liberal, normie and alt-right.

A thot prepares to flash her breasts to a crowd of onlookers in a 'conservative' state in the Deep South.

Traditionalism Is Hopeless

Many on the right advocate for traditionalism. They think we can just return to the days of a nuclear family, reverse all three waves of feminism, and let women assume their traditional role. While I respect the arguments made by traditionalists, I have concluded that any sort of rollback is now politically impossible in the United States. We have lost the culture war. There is no going back. Sure, you can flee to a country where remnants of traditionalism still exist, but they are merely a little further back on the ongoing global shift towards female 'liberation' and the dissolution of family life.

Furthermore, while this problem has been substantially amplified in recent years, it is certainly not a modern one. Thots have consistently been the downfall of powerful men throughout history. John F. Kennedy was compromised by the Soviet Union as a result of depraved female temptresses. Even Adolf Hitler's defeat in the Second World War can be attributed largely to the presence of Eva Braun. Cleopatra's betrayal of Mark Antony the moment a more alpha chad arrived on the scene surely serves as one of the clearest demonstrations of the subversion of the opposite sex.

Richard Spencer similarly and correctly recognizes a return to the days of actual white supremacy is impossible and undesirable, and instead advocates for a white ethno-state, building on the momentum of left-wing identity politics movements. Although I respectfully disagree with him on that issue, his fundamental analysis is correct. We cannot return to an undefined point in the past when things were somehow better on the issues that we care about. All we can do is seek to influence the future. I have thus come to the conclusion that the only solution to our current thot debacle is peaceful separation between the sexes, and a resulting male gendo-state.

Now, this notion may sound absurd. Most traditionalists love and respect women, and simply wish for them to return to their historical place in society, rather than be done away with altogether. They must come to understand that separation has now become a necessity.

We may reach the point of open conflict with the opposing gender.

Separation Is Necessary

Cultural feminism has degraded women to the point where co-existence is a net negative to males. Women weaken men by their very presence, co-opting and hijacking even traditionalist movements by embracing the rhetoric and yet leaving much to be desired in terms of the personal example they set.

As the last few weeks have shown, women are able to completely destroy the reputations of decent, upstanding men through false accusations of sexual abuse. Women compete with us in a job market that is rigged against us by politicians who have come to see women as an essential voting bloc to appease. Women now even proudly declare that they do not need or want men in their lives.

Why don't we put that to the test? Let us see how well the opposing gender fares when left completely to their own devices. In this way, we could use the rise of feminism as force of acceleration in order to promote our bid for nationhood. It is ironically fairly likely that the world's first gendo-state will consist of pink haired female ogres LARPing as Amazons. But once the precedent is set, males will have a unique opportunity to seize the moment and build the case for our secession.

The Vision

Gendo-nationalism would involve near-total separation between men and women. A physical border would be erected between the respective male and female nation-states, and travel between these gendo-states would be tightly controlled and require permission from the governing authority of the gendo-state being entered. In the male gendo-state, which I have little doubt will be far more successful than its female competitor, male chauvinism will be the zeitgeist of the new order.

In addition, we need to think about the only real thing we need women for—sex. Advancements in robotics in recent years are quickly making this need obsolete. Future improvements in cloning technology may even allow us to replace women for the purposes of reproduction. Until the point at which a solution is devised, the gendo-state could have a work visa system which prostitutes and surrogates could utilize without permanent settlement in our new nation.

Soon, we will no longer need women to lead fulfilling sex lives.

The Path Ahead

Before we can have separation, we need to have a general sense of male identity. Now, I believe this to an extent to be inherent and hardwired, hence the presence of so many all-male social groups in our society. Nevertheless, we must promote the importance of masculinity and push close identification with our gender's collective interests as a component of that.

Subsequently, we need to urge our fellow men to gradually start removing all emotional attachment to women. They're to be seen as a tool, not a crutch. Emotional attachment makes men the weaker sex because women are inherently able to exploit it, and ensures the perpetuation of the anti-male status quo. Once it is overcome, the foundations for a gendo-state can be laid.

Free from the shackles of womankind, men will be able to embrace their true potential. We will have hours more in our days which would otherwise be wasted on entertaining vacuous thots. We will no longer be treated like second class citizens in the very nations we built and shed our blood for. Our inherent physical and mental supremacy will give us a substantial edge in the world marketplace. Much as ethno-nationalist movements played a major role in defining the 20th century, my hope is that gendo-nationalism will define the 21st.

Read Next: Patriarchal Nationalism: The Only Societal System That Can Save The West

James Miller
James Miller is a political strategist and policy intellectual from New York City. He is the founder and president of the James Miller Foundation.

The #MeToo Sexual Harassment Hysteria Is A Pretext For Women To Take Power And Money From Men

December 21, 2017 | by Jimbo Jones | Link | Original Link

Nothing ever happens in a vacuum, and no movement suddenly blossoms into existence without some kind of endgame in mind. And if you were wondering what the final phase of the whole #MeToo phenomena might resemble, the November 17 edition of Newsweek spelled it out for you in living color.

"Pop goes the weasels," the cover of the magazine read in a a comical, cartoonish font. "#MeToo is bringing down powerful men in all fields," read the sub caption. Interestingly, both "weasels" and "powerful men" were depicted in the same standout, red font—an old color psychology ploy to make the brain immediately draw parallels. And of course, where would any gender-baiting headline be without a rhetorical question to goad passersby into a second glance? In this case, the coup de grace is the stinger "Is Donald Trump next?"—which, in direct violation of the Associated Press guidelines Newsweek's writers are supposed to follow, would seem to suggest the president is a "weasel," which is not an objective fact but a matter of opinion.

Oh, and the image on the cover of said issue? Well, it just so happens to be a female hand—presumably female, of course, because of the red fingernail polish—poking a giant penis-shaped balloon with a pin. Talk about subtlety.

Alas, there is something quite intriguing about the cover. Nowhere does it bring up the terms "sexual abuse," "sexual harassment," "sexual misconduct" or any of its permutations. There are no references to “rape,” “justice,” “corruption,” or even “equality.” Indeed, if you had no idea what #MeToo was referring to, you’d be plumb perplexed as to why a major news magazine was seemingly advocating the wholesale puncturing of latex ding-dongs.

Rather, the Newsweek cover seems to post a general “war of the sexes” message, with men—those vertical pissing neanderthals they are—depicted as the deserving victims of an upcoming penile purge. “Watch out boys,” the cover implies, “us women are here to take control, and we’re taking your peckers with us as war trophies.”

Nope. Doesn’t look like the kind of guy who tries to rape women whatsoever.

Victimhood – a for-profit cause?

The driving force of the post Harvey Weinstein tsunami of sexual assault accusations becomes apparent. Women are shamelessly leveraging incidents of sexual misconduct—some, most certainly true, and many more most certainly untrue—as a means of obtaining financial and institutional clout. In short, they’ve parlayed pussy grabbing into power grabbing, and it doesn’t take much sleuthing to figure out what’s really going on here.

Now, as a writer for a website oft vilified as the last refuge of unabashed misogynists, I’ve got something kinda’ controversial to declare: I don’t think women should be raped. Nor do I think they should be molested or forced into having any kind of sexual contact they don’t want. And not only do I have nothing but respect for women who were actually sexually abused and speak out about their mistreatment, I’m more than willing to stand up with them and condemn sexual harassment and misconduct in the workplace.

But there’s a difference between being an innocent victim speaking out about being abused—with the sole intent of getting your victimizer charged and convicted of said crimes—and being a woman who willingly went along with iffy sexual activity who is retroactively trying to profit from it.

Long story short, a lot of these harassment accusers—be they real or phony victims—aren't looking for justice. They don't want their harassers tried in a court of law for their criminal misdeeds; they want free and easy money. They couldn't give a shit about their dignity, all they're seeing is dollar signs and quite possibly the ability to salvage their sagging careers under the auspices of a trendy hashtag.

Why else would anyone drudge up alleged sexual misadventures that took place in the late 1970s, or suddenly spill the beans about gross harassment incidents after 20 years of working with the alleged pervert? The statutes of limitation have long since passed, and the only three things that can come out of such accusations are public sympathy (itself a precious commodity for many a washed-up or never-was actress), the public shaming of their alleged abusers (which I suppose can also be considered a commodity of sorts), and out of court pocket change.

Come on – why let a couple of sexual assaults tarnish an otherwise healthy working relationship?

The politicization of harassment

Isn't it just a tad suspicious that—despite Roy Moore holding public office for almost 30 years—it wasn't until he ran for a national congressional seat that a deluge of supposed rape victims came out of the woodworks to shame him off the U.S. Senate ticket? Where were these women when he was running against Luther Strange, or jockeying for a seat on the Alabama State Court—you know, the one he was apart of for only 20 years?

That none of his accusers are pursuing legal actions in the aftermath of his Senate defeat tells you everything about their underlying motives, doesn't it?

And if Rose McGowan—who has benefited more than just about anyone from Sexual Misconduct-A-Thon 2017—is so incensed by the actions of Harvey Weinstein, then why did she choose to star in a movie directed by a CONVICTED child rapist, even telling one publication that she wasn't aware of the full details of his arrest?

Let me spell it out for you, baldy—a guy who filmed himself making a child blow him and spent several years in jail for the disgusting crime asked you to be in a movie and you accepted his invite. At best, that makes you a brass-ovaried hypocrite, and at the absolute worst, a remorseless pedophile-enabler. Try explaining that one at your next Women's Conference keynote address.

Despite there being scores of men—Matt Lauer, Mark Halperin, Charlie Rose, Louis C.K., Garrison Keillor, Tavis Smiley, etc.—getting fired for alleged sexual misconduct over the last few months, to the best of my knowledge none of them have actually been arrested for sex crimes. Indeed, in most cases absolutely zero proof has been presented to the public backing up these claims.

Even in the most high profile of cases—Bill O'Reilly and Bill Cosby being perhaps the two most noteworthy—actual proof that the accused did anything criminal have yet to emerge (and in the only major criminal wrongdoing case to make it to a judge thus far, Cosby was legally exonerated on a mistrial.)

At this point, we've become a culture that simply accepts all allegations of male sexual misconduct as veracious. We don't need proof, we simply believe the women making the claims are telling the truth. Up until very recently, all of this stuff happened behind closed doors. A woman would effectively blackmail the alleged abuser/harasser/rapist/whatever and they'd reach an out of court settlement. Here's a gag order, here's a million dollars, and both our hands are cleansed of this.

Now, the idea is to get the horse in front of the cart, so to speak. Publicize the alleged wrongdoings, get the asshole fired and then threaten him with jail time until he agrees to give you all the moolah he can afford. Oh, and then you get to commodify your victimhood status, which means ABC or CNN will probably give you your own TV special, which means you can probably beg for an extra couple of dollars on Patreon for your homemade rock jewelry.

Communist China – believing in girl power before it was cool.

The endgame revealed?

Jim Goad wrote a great article shortly before the 2016 Presidential election warning that if Hillary Clinton won, her presidency would usher in a new age of fractured gender relations in these United States (a'la Obama ushering in a new Golden Age of strained racial relations in the U.S. during his tenure.) Well, that's happening even without her in the Oval Office, as apparent by the political leverage gained by the #MeToo movement.

You know who's reaping the most profit from Harassment Gate? Gloria Allred and all of her feminazi lawyer kindred. You see, she and Lisa Bloom are more or less creating a proxy anti-patriarchy warchest from all of these alleged misconduct incidents, and they've already said what their economic final solution entails: not just draining rich and powerful men of their bank accounts, but all of their fiscal assets.

You can try to church it up and give it a philanthropic handle, but let's cut the shit— a "victim's fund" is still just a gigantic slush fund. These skirts don't just want rich and powerful men on their knees, they want them evicted from their houses and the keys to their kingdom gifted to them like gay divorcees. They might not be able to create their own matriarchal empires from the ground up, but you know what they can do? Just like all of those Maoist Red Guards who struggle sessioned planters off their property during the disastrous Cultural Revolution, they can publicly shame rich and powerful men out of their own multi-billion dollar companies and seize them as their own.

The same thing is happening in the world of politics. What are the odds that notorious somnambular tit grabber Al Franken would be replaced by a Planned Parenthood veep—not by a democratic election, but by a governor's appointment? And surely, it's only a coincidence that a pro-amnesty immigration attorney from Silicon Valley whose hobby horse is resurrecting the Equal Rights Amendment just so happens to be the presumptive frontrunner to replace John Conyers as the head of the House Judiciary Committee, right?

We are on the verge of general society becoming an unconstitutional gynocracy where due process amidst sexual assault allegations – much like it is in higher education—is suspended. News has already broke that Lisa Bloom (one of Weinstein's former defenders and wouldn't you know it, Gloria Allred's daughter) tried to pay women nearly $1 million to bring sexual assault cases against Trump during his presidential campaign, and the mainstream media hivemind continues to play protector for its chosen political foot soldiers (i.e., Chuck Schumer) yet fan the flames of hysteria whenever a pol from the other side is accused of sexual misdeeds, regardless of the lack of evidence.

Ours is a cultural milieu where the powers that be tell young women that men commenting on their smile constitutes a form of verbal sexual assault, while women who publicly call for the mass genocide of male babies are considered level-headed freedom fighters for gender equality.

Throughout human history, all concentrated power grabs have been cloaked under the disguise of some phony moralism and shameless scapegoating of a much villified "other." Puritanicalism was used as an excuse for the Catholic orthodoxy to murder thousands of alleged heretics in the Inquisition, McCarthyism was used as an excuse for hardline conservatives to blacklist dissident idealists in the 1950s and today, feminism is being used as an excuse for hyper-liberals to cajole, connive and outright defraud men of their wealth, property and basic ability to economically sustain themselves and their families.

Be careful out there. It may only be a matter of time before the #MeToo Wehrmacht comes after your livelihood, too.

Read More: Sexual Harassment Hysteria is Out of Control

Jimbo Jones
Jimbo Jones is a nihilist ... but he's the nicest nihilist you'll ever meet.

The Solution To The Problem Of Being An Asian Man In The West

December 21, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

The following is a sponsored article by Larsen Halleck.

The idea of Asian men being spastic nerds who are utterly devoid of anything remotely resembling sexuality is a long-standing stereotype and one that, I admit in the interests of objectivity, has a substantive basis in reality—a few articles on this website even point it out. I also notice that there has been a steadily increasing Asian presence in the realms of social justice in recent years.

What if I were to tell you these things were related?

Yes, it turns out that any anger among Asian people in the West (particularly Asian men) is entirely rooted in sexual frustration. And the reason I know this is that I am half-Asian myself, and spent my teenage years as an angry incel.

In the interests of providing succor to this sexual frustration of preventing another beta-male rampage and making Asian people not hate white people, I have boiled down my hardscrabble life experience in the trenches of the sexual marketplace, my auto-didactic knowledge in various gentlemanly pursuits, and the mindset development that enabled me to not fall into the same self-pitying trap that caught seemingly every other mixed race person, into one highly digestible book:

THE ORIENTAL'S GUIDE TO SEX, STRENGTH, AND SATISFACTION

(And yes, I did choose the term "oriental" in a deliberate attempt to anger nice liberal people.)

Y’know, people like this

What’s the deal?

The “deal” is to train Asian men living in the West to leave the mire of self pity, and vastly improve upon their sexlessness and awkwardness, regardless of whether or not those negative traits are based in nature or nurture.

To accomplish this, it will utilize the greatest (indeed, some would say the only) natural advantage an Asian man has: an unparalleled capacity and ability to work, to put their nose to the grindstone and expend the sheer, unrelenting sweat equity to improve themselves. “Work is the solution of his existence” and all that, and if Asian men’s utter lack of sexual attractiveness is indeed based in nature, I deign to overcome it with sheer, overwhelming amounts of rough and tough nurture.

You heard Jack London, the Asian man desires nothing more than access to toil—so use that to your advantage!

As a side note, I'm going to assume there's probably at least one other dating or sex book on the market specifically pertaining to the Asian male problem, but since it would be a mainstream dating book, it probably sucks. This book has the Return of Kings seal of approval, so by definition it's leagues ahead of its competitors.

Loading…

In The Book, You Will Find…

Two chapters debunking whatever nonsense claims Asian men use to justify their anger. I analyze how, caterwauling about internment camps or Exclusion Acts or Hollywood representation aside, it all truly boils down to the fact that women don't find you attractive, and that's why you're so goddamn angry. I also do a bit of analysis on why Asian men seem to gravitate to black culture, and why that's stupid and you should feel bad for doing so.

Chapters on the fundamentals of physical fitness, martial arts, and fashion—things that can be fixed privately and without judgment, as I have repeatedly advocated.

A chapter on grooming—in which I explicitly demand "CUT YOUR FUCKING BOWL CUT!", amongst other useful tips and tricks.

Chapters on how to utilize willpower training to stop being "spergy" in the stereotypical Asian manner, elocution lessons to alleviate the horrendousness that is the Asian accent, and body language to overcome your natural timidity,

Chapters on the ins and outs of dating: How to make yourself an interesting person, selecting a woman and dispelling myths of interracial dating and sex, what to do on a date, how to move the relationship into a sexual context, and how to bang like a champ.

And finally, a few chapters in which I get a little bit personal: I discuss how increasing my masculinity and focusing on self improvement has benefited my life and thus will benefit you as well. I then instruct the reader on how to deal with the haters who will inevitably arise with your self improvement. Again, speaking from my own experience, a lot of your "friends" will hate you for getting into fitness and self improvement—and, most shockingly of all, I answer the question that many people have had: why, exactly, are almost all "hapas" spastic, hysterical retards?

Is This Book For You?

I wrote this book explicitly to help a segment of the population that desperately needs it, but bear in mind that the overwhelming majority of the book has absolutely nothing to do with problems that relate specifically to Asian men. The tips I include are, for the most part, universal for any man who is spergy, awkward, shy, timid, physically weak, or slovenly. And implicitly, the book has an intent to bridge racial divisions by relieving the sexual frustration of Asian men and thus taking away any legitimate reason for them to hate white people, so even if you aren't Asian, you might gain something from reading the book.

You may be wondering why I suddenly deigned to write this. To be honest, I don't like the thought of being a "professional ethnic," but "some have greatness thrust upon them" and all that. In other words, I saw a dire problem that needs to be solved, and since nobody else is doing it, it seemed like it was up to me.

In the short time the book has been out, it has already received three very positive reviews—the last of these can be found on its Amazon page.

Best of all, since it is the holiday season, I've slashed prices by 50%! Any other month of the year, you'd spend $20 on a paperback and $10 for an e-book. But for December, it's going to be $10 for paperback, and only $5 for Kindle! Interesting in grabbing your copy? Click here to learn more about the book.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Star Wars: The Last Jedi Is One Of The Worst Films Of The Decade

December 22, 2017 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

No one will ever go broke underestimating the masochism of Star Wars fans. With the exception of last year's Rogue One, every Star Wars film for the past twenty years has been pure, unadulterated garbage, yet the franchise continues to make enough money to outstrip the GDPs of half the third world. Star Wars: The Last Jedi is the latest outing in a galaxy far, far away, breaking box office records with yet another sugary mix of generic CGI action and social justice mumbo-jumbo.

The Last Jedi has also revealed mainstream movie critics to be bought-and-paid-for hacks, because their universal acclaim for the movie belies the fans utter revulsion for it. And the fans are right: The Last Jedi isn't just the worst Star Wars film ever, it's easily one of the worst films in years. Every time I think Star Wars can't get any worse, the creators somehow dig themselves a little deeper into the hole.

The Last Jedi isn't bad just because of anti-white, anti-male propaganda. It's not bad just because it pisses all over Star Wars canon, including the canon of the previous film, The Force Awakens. The Last Jedi is bad because it fundamentally fails at storytelling and because it doesn't understand what Star Wars actually is.

The Force Awakens was bad, but it was a bland, inoffensive kind of bad, whereas The Last Jedi actually made me angry. I would have walked out of the theater if Roosh hadn't asked me to review the movie for ROK. Here's why the movie is so horrible. And yes, this review is full of spoilers, but who cares?

No White Men Allowed

To be fair, director Rian Johnson had a tall order in cleaning up the mess that J.J. Abrams dumped in his lap. The Force Awakens was full of Death Star-sized plot holes that even a competent director or writer would have struggled to tie up. For example, in the previous film, it's established that the Empire is defeated and the Republic rules the galaxy, yet there's still a "Resistance" a la the Rebels in the original movies. What are they supposed to be resisting?

The Last Jedi picks up where The Force Awakens left off. Despite having destroyed the ~~Death Star~~ Starkiller Base, the ~~Rebels~~ Resistance have been cornered by the ~~Empire~~ First Order on ~~Hoth~~ an unnamed planet, where they're forced to evacuate. But don't worry: this movie isn't just a frame-for-frame ripoff of The Empire Strikes Back. Because Rian Johnson had to prove his dick was bigger than J.J. Abrams', he decided to rip off Return of the Jedi too!

Pretty much everything about The Last Jedi is a conscious slap in the face to Star Wars' white male fans. For example, all of the leading generals in the Resistance are women, including ~~Princess~~ General Leia (Carrie Fisher), which explains why they went from running the galaxy in the previous movie to being reduced to a handful of ships in this one. All of the First Order's soldiers and generals save one are white men, while the Resistance is staffed entirely by non-whites and women, with the exception of Poe Dameron (Oscar Isaac).

Poe is by far the most interesting character in the movie, even considering how the script goes out of its way to shit on him. You can practically hear the writers muttering, "Fuck you, toxic masculinity!" every time he's on screen. Despite being forward-thinking and courageous, Poe is constantly slapped down by his female superiors for being too "hot-headed." For example, despite his bravery in taking out one of the First Order's cruisers at the beginning of the movie, Leia demotes him for being "reckless."

Later on in the movie, after Leia falls into a coma after miraculously surviving being blasted into open space (don't ask), Poe discovers that her replacement, the purple-haired (yes, I'm serious) HR lady Holdo (Laura Dern) is planning to evacuate the Resistance's last cruiser into unarmed transports, a suicidal and cowardly move. He intelligently proclaims a mutiny, only for Leia to side with Holdo, whose plan ends up getting all but two dozen members of the Resistance killed. Heckuva job, Holdy!

The film's C-plot, starring Finn (John Boyega), is equally insipid. Frustrated with HR lady Holdo's complete inability to lead, Finn teams up with Rose Tico (Kelly Marie Tran), a communist Montagnard with Down syndrome, to find a codebreaker who can keep the First Order from tracking the Resistance through hyperspace. They go to the resort planet of Canto Bight and literally start murdering people for the crime of being rich. This is Ghostbusters–tier dumb.

But none of this compares to how The Last Jedi rapes the character of Luke Skywalker (Mark Hamill). The main plot follows Rey (Daisy Ridley), the Mary Sue feminist street urchin, as she tries to convince Luke to help the Resistance and train her to use the Force. Luke initially refuses, whining about how the Jedi "deserve" to end, before reluctantly agreeing to Rey's demands. Hamill's performance is embarrassingly bad and Luke's character arc is a sick joke, rivaling how The Force Awakens depicted Han Solo as a deadbeat Peter Pan.

One good thing about The Last Jedi is that Rey is given far less screen time then in The Force Awakens. She's just as smarmy, unlikable, and unrealistic—her bizarre telepathic dialogues with antagonist Kylo Ren (Adam Driver) are a case in point—but this is still an improvement. Unfortunately, the addition of SJW masturbation fantasies like Rose and Holdo—who I'm pretty sure was given purple hair as a deliberate middle finger to the fans—drowns out this positive move.

Propaganda Over Plot

The Last Jedi's insistence on shoving social justice down the audience's throats is only one reason why it's so bad. Rian Johnson was clearly out of his depth in directing a Star Wars movie: his sole good film to date is 2005's Brick, a quirky blend of teen drama and film noir. The Last Jedi's plot development, tone, character arcs, and everything else are muddled and nonsensical.

For example, the second part of a three-act drama is supposed to be dark and brooding, as the heroes go through struggles that test their ability to survive and triumph. But far from dark, The Last Jedi is full of tonally-inappropriate slapstick. The first part of the film is a dumb comedy routine between Poe Dameron and a First Order general that is not funny and doesn't fit the story at all. Similarly, during one of their telepathic phone sex sessions, Rey whines about the fact that Darth Bugman has his shirt off, making the scene uncomfortably resemble the episode of Girls where Lena Dunham's character catches Adam jacking off.

These constant tone shifts aren't just jarring, they undermine the solemnity the movie desperately needs. The original Star Wars films were rooted in traditional myths and adventure stories of the mid-20th century, and while lighthearted at times, they were fundamentally serious movies. The Last Jedi is fundamentally un-serious, replacing the epic feel of the original movies with hipster nihilism about "let[ting] the past die." This is illustrated when Luke and Yoda decide to destroy the Jedi library, with the reasoning that Rey, a snot-nosed 14-year old girl, is wiser than the collected works of all Jedi throughout history.

Rian Johnson's cargo cult thinking infects the movie in other ways. For example, in the beginning of the movie, I had to stifle a laugh when the Resistance unveils deep space bombers that drop their payload out of bomb bays in the same way that airplanes do. Wing Commander got mocked relentlessly for doing this back in 1999, but the average movie critic's IQ has dropped about five points since then, so nobody noticed how retarded this scene looked. Sure, the X-wing/TIE fighter dogfights in the original movies were based off of World War II airplane combat, but George Lucas wasn't so stupid as to do something like this.

Not only that, The Last Jedi's insistence on lecturing the audience about cultural Marxism actively impedes the plot in several ways. For example, near the end of the film, Finn leads a suicidal attack on the First Order that would save the Resistance. His sacrifice would have been a great moment in the film, showing how his character has grown since The Force Awakens, where he was depicted as a total coward.

But just as Finn is about to die a hero, Rose stops him, justifying it by saying that they need to win by "saving what we love" instead of "killing what we hate" (or some bullshit like that), dooming the Resistance in the process. Good job, moron. At least she dies afterwards, sparing us from having to listen to her nasally voice or look at her ugly face.

Finally, General Leia somehow manages to completely evade responsibility for Kylo Ren falling to the dark side of the Force, even though she's his mother. The plots of both The Last Jedi and The Force Awakens have Darth Bugman focusing all his rage on Han Solo (his father) and Luke Skywalker, with Leia somehow skating off. And despite the fact that Leia's son is the second-in-command of the First Order—meaning she is directly responsible for the galaxy being plunged into war—nobody has a problem with her serving as one of the Resistance's senior leaders.

Putting Star Wars Out To Pasture

Rian Johnson

The central problem with the new Star Wars movies—or revivals of any classic franchise, for that matter—is that contemporary filmmakers don't understand what made the originals good. Star Wars was a product of the 1970's: an epic tale of good vs. evil, drawing on cultural motifs familiar to Americans of the time. Bugmen like Rian Johnson or

J.J. Abrams can see the surface elements of Star Wars, but without being immersed in the cultural milieu that birthed it, the best they can do is high-budget fan fiction with SJW nonsense drizzled on top.

That's all The Force Awakens or The Last Jedi are: cosplay with CGI. The X-wings and lightsabers and aliens may look like the ones in the original trilogy, but the heart and soul aren't there. In their place is poor writing, left-wing agitprop, and dumb jokes. The Force Awakens was dull and boring, but The Last Jedi will leave you longing for the earnestness of Jar Jar Binks. Yes, it's that bad.

The irony is that Kylo Ren's nihilistic mantra of "let[ting] the past die," while completely inappropriate for a Star Wars movie, is precisely how modern moviegoers should treat the franchise itself. Star Wars is dead, nerds. It's not coming back. It's time to take it behind the woodshed and put a bullet in its brain. The original movies were great and some of the video games were pretty good, but the monkey's dead and the show is over.

Read More: Did The New Star Wars Casting Have A Racial Agenda?

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Harvard Newspaper Says Rating The Attractiveness Of Women Makes You Complicit In Rape

December 22, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> …one guy proposed the "hottest" girls in our class. The other did the same. They both then asked me to rank the girls in our cohort in the order I wanted to get with. My alarmed heart bolted blood to my cheeks… I discussed which girls were hot.
>
> — Daniel Hanrahan describing how he supposedly became complicit in "rape" and "rape culture"

An Australian studying on a scholarship at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government has sensationally declared that rating the attractiveness of women encourages and enables rape. Daniel Hanrahan, who says he didn't challenge male peers talking about good-looking classmates, wrote that "[m]y silence lies on a continuum of complicity—complicity that allows sexual assault to occur."

That The Harvard Crimson allowed this piece to run is a testament to how prevalent Daniel Hanrahan's views are on campus, at a minimum amongst those in student leadership and related positions. The difference is that up until now most SJWs have been unwilling to verbalize these nutty views as explicitly as he has. Hanrahan's conflation of normal male sexual desire with rape is chilling, particularly in passages like this one:

> Avoiding small confrontations over sexist comments and behaviors [i.e. rating women's attractiveness] is what allows a rape culture, an environment where rape is prevalent—like at Harvard—to build.

People don't just act this way when writing for The Harvard Crimson.

I have some questions for Master Hanrahan, namely:

- What's the difference between asking a girl out and rating her attractiveness with your friends? The first instance is implicitly saying that the girl is attractive (for anyone but most male feminists), whereas the second is saying it explicitly.
- Does getting an erection without a woman's permission enable rape because you're assuming there's a chance you could have sex with her? Toxic masculine self-entitlement?
- Does mentally rating a girl's attractiveness further acts of rape as well?

We have known for long enough that male heterosexuality and normal expressions of it are under siege. Hanrahan's ham-fisted account of his so-called contribution towards "rape" and "rape culture" is another sad instalment of this tale.

Is Daniel Hanrahan's apparent self-loathing actually an effective mating strategy?

The Joss Whedon strategy works.

Believe it or not, I think it could be. I do not believe that the oft-spread stereotype of male feminists being sexless orbiters explains every case. Especially if a male student has an affluent background, which Daniel Hanrahan may or may not have himself, otherwise ridiculous pandering to SJWs and feminists probably garners a select number of them a fair amount of poontang. They can spend their greater free time ingratiating themselves amongst fellow left-leaning elites on campus, including for the purposes of attracting women. It's very much a choice of these guys to knife their fellow men in order to make a name for themselves, a sort of leftist social proof.

During my first degree, there were indeed social privileges handed out to some privately-schooled young men who touted feminism (and socialism). Facebook pages where men would stand on campus with placards declaring their allegiance to feminism and "listen and believe" did get some guys laid. Obviously, when male feminists commit themselves to particular rules, they sow the seeds of their possible downfall if a woman later accuses them. A good proportion of the loudest male SJWs, however, will never face the music. At the very least, non-gay men who support SJW causes at universities are doing so in the somewhat realistic hope of getting pussy for their efforts. It's obsequious, cowardly, and not guaranteed to work, yet it can pay dividends.

Male feminism is akin to a raffle or lottery–the chances of winning something decent may be only 10% in some instances (0r 1% or 0.1%), but that doesn't stop people from spending tens or hundreds of millions of dollars on tickets. At Harvard of all places, someone like Daniel Hanrahan is probably banking on a very good return on investment by pushing his highly anti-male brand of feminism, whether that's through access to women now, or a future career in politics, social advocacy, or in the corporate world.

Where to next?

Before finishing here, I should discuss some key ways men in which can protect themselves or carve out something good in the current environment, an environment where finding a woman attractive supposedly amounts to supporting rape. More attacking strategies should be employed sparingly a lot of the time, so be prepared to regularly play a proactive defense.

Keep messages and other information, but realize you can't store or prevent everything

If someone takes offense at what you said very recently, that's one thing. But recent times have shown how innocuous events from years or decades ago can be used against men through false rape or "sexual harassment" claims, even when the activities were 20,000 leagues below rape. Having access to some of your past conversations about events, or at least the context surrounding them (for sexual relationships most of all), can help you. Give up on the idea of saving everything to prevent false accusations, though. Unless you plan to have a GoPro switched on every second of your life, that is.

Self-improvement, self-improvement, self-improvement

As deleterious as many things are in our social and political world at the moment, there is no excuse for men abstaining from self-improvement—professionally, educationally, physically, financially, socially, and, of course, game-wise. This self-improvement will not only help you weather a future personal firestorm, God forbid, it is what men are built for in the first place. We should all have a mission. Sex and women are important, but don't seek your entire validation from them.

Seek out like-minded people

They do not have to be readers of Return Of Kings. They do not have to have explicit political opinions or mouth off at feminism. All you require is people who are not infected by SJW ideology and are implicitly quite resistant to it. Perhaps your workplace is full of obedient leftists drones, so find enjoyable people outside it. Sometimes you may feel like The Last Man in Europe (George Orwell's original title for 1984) and it is up to you to try and avoid that. Plus, from what we know, there are still some folks at Harvard who don't feel ashamed about rating girls' attractiveness!

The modern-day West is bad, let's be honest. Nonetheless, masculine men have a reasonably wide scope to choose how they respond to appalling social trends, like other men effectively trying to shame or criminalize (that's coming next) rating how attractive a girl is. We can crawl into our shells and pretend the world doesn't exist in the way it does, or we can recognize the situation for what it is and keep moving in spite of it.

Read More: Liberal Harvard Professors Are Now "Rape Apologists" For Defending Due Process

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Man With “18-Inch” Penis Receives Government Disability Benefits, Lives In Poverty

December 22, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via The Sun:

THE man with the world’s biggest penis has been registered as DISABLED and survives on government assistance and food banks. Roberto Esquivel Cabrera, from Saltillo, Mexico, has a 18.9 inch penis – believed to be the largest in the world.

Although he has refused reduction surgery and hopes to pursue a career in the porn industry, he claims his massive appendage is actually a “disability”, reports vanguardia.com.mx.

He said: “I cannot wear a uniform like anybody in the companies and also I cannot get on my knees.

“I cannot run fast and so the companies think badly of me. They say that they will call me, but they never do.”

According to Roberto, after initially dismissing his claim, the government has now recognised him as disabled.

“Every four months they give me some economic assistance but it is not enough. I visit the food banks every day to take my meals at 12 ‘o clock.”

Earlier this year it was revealed he had been offered his first big movie role by the man behind YouPorn and the FakeTaxi series.

Loading…

‘The YouPorn Guy’ told TheLadBible: “We would fly him over to Prague and he can come see our doctors and nurses at our FakeHospital.com.

“We would make the scene quite comical, and would get a female doctor and two or three nurses all trying to have a go on it.

“He would have the time of his life. Everyone would want to see the scene for sure, whether they would get off on it is another matter.”

Cabrera recently spoke of his desires to break into the adult film industry, explaining: “I am happy with my penis and I wish to go back to the USA and spend the rest of my life over there.

“I would like to be a porn star and I think I would make a lot of money over there.”

While the x-rated film version may be more enjoyable for Cabrera, his penis was recently thoroughly examined by real doctors, who confirmed that the bulk of his 20 inch manhood is foreskin.

Radiologist Jesus Pablo Gilmore said: “Our findings on the CT scan were that he has very large foreskin, it goes almost to the knee.

“The glands themselves are only six to seven inches from the pubic. It doesn’t go all the way through the foreskin.”

Doctors also shed light on just how Cabrera’s genitals became so large – claiming the 54-year-old has been stretching it with weights since he was a teenager.

Dr Gonzalez, who verified the size of his member, said: “He began with this enlargement since he was a teenager, wrapping some bands around his penis with some weights and trying to stretch it.”

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: Revisiting Lorena Bobbitt: Why Would A Woman Cut Off A Man’s Penis?

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

We’re Testing A New Commenting System (UPDATE)

December 23, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It has been two months since Disqus shut us down. Since then, the ROK commenting system has been chaotic, to say the least. I’m now experimenting with a new system that allows easier commenting and sorting. Share your feedback below on what you think.

Also check out our commenting guide to read our rules and learn how to add your own avatar.

UPDATE: The new commenting system revealed a user’s email address in the HTML code, so it has been disabled.

Don’t Miss: Disqus Is Shutting Down ROK Comments Effective Friday

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 False Rape Accusations That Were Made Up Out Of Thin Air

December 24, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

In a classic “he said / she said” case, who should be believed? Often the absolute truth isn’t discernible to third parties. There should be standards for arriving at the next best thing to certainty, especially in today’s climate.

The problem

Harvey, we love your personality!

This greatly accelerated when Harvey Weinstein got caught with his pants down. For decades, he had his pick of starlets young enough to be his daughters, or even granddaughters. On their part, many compromised themselves willingly—though unenthusiastically—as their ticket to stardom. However, when the well dried up, the "shiksas" (let's be honest here) turned on him with a vengeance about his Portnoy's Complaint act. When the dam finally burst, the pent-up inward disgust about being used—with or without their compliance—flooded outward.

However, things didn't stop with him. The avalanche of allegations continues against many others for a variety of misdeeds. Some are truly abominable. Others are more like badly-botched douchebag game. At the low end are several items like "Someone patted my butt a few years ago, and I didn't promptly correct it by saying 'knock it off', but boy howdy I'm telling the world now." Some stories are plausible and backed by evidence, and others are baloney. The vast middle ground involves classic "he said / she said" incidents.

This began as the righteous comeuppance of a first rate male feminist hypocrite. Now, it's just one more way of demonizing male sexuality, the whole spectrum from clearly reprehensible to normal but subjectively perceived as impolite. Meanwhile "slut shaming" remains a feminist cause-du-jour, quite naturally.

How do we sort out the elusive matter of what really happened, or didn't? Is the accuser right, or the accused? Sometimes the truth is somewhere between, though this shouldn't be a default assumption. With only the word of the people involved, and no other witnesses or evidence, then it's very difficult to establish anything with certainty. Often the public only has criteria that might point at the truth, but not enough to stick in court.

A single scandal might be groundless, but a long string of charges may be different. On the other side, credence in an accuser wears thin after several fishy claims. Also, when political motivation, financial reward, or attention-seeking come into the picture, then this tends to cast doubt. Finally, the story's internal logic is a huge clue. Here are a few (of several) actual stories covered here, illustrating how the "sniff test" works.

Souad Faress

The narrative: While in a crowded London tube (subway) station, Mark Pearson shoves his fingers into the cookie of an over-the-hill actress. She screams but nobody helps.

The reality: He merely walked past her. No clothes came off. He didn't even touch her, and his hands were holding his backpack and newspaper.

The tip-off: Security camera videotape confirmed the truth. Although mass surveillance is very worrisome, in this case the 1984-style monitoring exonerated the innocent. JPEGs or it's not real! Also, if something like this happens at a crowded subway station, neither the perp nor the surrounding crowd would be real British people.

Further, the prosecutor had a Captain Ahab complex. This is madness; the British government did nothing while Pakistani child grooming gangs were allowed to operate year after year, because protecting their citizens would be “racist”. That’s anarcho-tyranny at its foulest.

Lorena Bobbitt

The narrative: Battered wife snaps after he rapes her. Enraged, she cuts off his penis with a kitchen knife.

The reality: As Lorena herself put it:

> He always have orgasm, I never have orgasm. He’s selfish. I don’t think it’s fair, so I pulled back the sheets and did it.

I recommend making sure your woman is always satisfied; it’s great for repeat business. Still, “bobbing it” is a rather extreme penalty for not curling her toes. I also recommend not sticking your dick in crazy.

The tip-off: Well, it was more than a tip off here. The clue is that while talking to the police a little too openly, she suddenly realized that she could go to prison for severely mutilating her husband. That’s when she changed her story.

However, most people in TV-land didn’t hear what really happened. We were told that she wasn’t a bunny boiler, but instead a victim finally lashing out against horrendous abuse. The state erred by letting her switch from the real story to a self-serving lie, and the media didn’t do their job either.

“Kayla”

The narrative: College student rapes coed, and in so doing spat on her, bit her, and called her filthy names.

The reality: Crazy chick on campus has very enthusiastic sex, then changes her mind after the fact.

The tip-off: She reported this several months later to a campus tribunal, with the power merely to expel him. She didn't report it immediately to the city police, with the power to file criminal charges. If it happened as she told it, there would've been DNA evidence (from both semen and saliva). Further, the biting would've left dentition patterns matching his teeth. That would've been a pretty easy case to prosecute, if any of that really happened. Further:

> This point hit me very hard one day when I was at the university gym. I saw her over in the corner with some other girl, whispering in her ear and pointing at me. "Great," I thought.
>
> Based off of her behavior, it's very obvious that she "got off," so to speak, on being a victim. She liked the attention that she got from other women and probably manginas. She liked the emotional validation that it gave her. "I was raped," is synonymous with "I'm attractive enough to be raped," and she couldn't get enough.

At first, she merely wanted sex; later, she wanted attention and drama.

Bathroom chick

The narrative: Lust-crazed student tries to rape coed in the bathroom, and she barely escapes.

The reality: College chick invites guy to the bathroom (ugh) for fun, changes her mind before much happens, then creates drama.

The tip-off: She clearly embellished the story. That always should set off the bullshit detectors. She claimed he hid her clothes in the bathroom. (It's impossible to hide things from someone who's watching.) She claimed he locked her in the stall. (They lock from the inside, obviously.) His thoughts were that bad game on his part caused this. I conclude that his only real problem was target selection.

Conclusion

But Zuleikha, you're married to Potiphar, and he's my boss! I banish you to the Friend Zone for this!

Most of the charges flying around lately are much less serious than the above, but the principles apply. Some say false accusations almost never happen. However, people lie about all sorts of things to destroy reputations, or to make themselves look better. Why should sexual misdeeds be an exception? Especially lately, that's very effective at getting revenge, while gaining sympathy.

When this soon reaches the point of absurdity, the public will abandon the current "believe all allegations" position and start applying the "sniff test". Unfortunately, this will make it more difficult for those who've actually been victimized to be believed. However, those to blame won't be skeptics, but rather all the false accusers.

Read More: The Media Uses A Strategy Of Reporting On False Rape Accusations To Destroy Men

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

Jews In Germany Are Shocked At Rise Of “Anti-Semitism” After They Flooded The Country With Muslims

December 24, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via USA Today:

When telecommunications manager Mikhail Tanaev emigrated to Germany in 1998 from his native Russia as a teen, his Jewish faith didn’t matter to classmates or neighbors.

That’s because Germany has taken extraordinary steps since the end of World War II to atone for the Holocaust and prevent anti-Semitism from taking hold again. The country has paid reparations to Jewish victims of Nazi persecution, erected dozens of memorials to those murdered and turned anti-Semitic speech into a crime.

Yet Chancellor Angela Merkel’s decision in 2015 to open the nation’s arms to 1 million mostly Muslim refugees has created a double threat for Germany’s roughly 120,000 Jews: rising anti-Semitism from the newcomers and a resurgent right-wing nationalist movement spawned by the arrival of so many immigrants.

The anti-Semitic sentiment has become more pubic and virulent, said Tanaev, 32. “When I arrived in Germany … I never saw such displays.”

Last week, thousands of protesters in Berlin burned Israeli flags to protest President Trump's decision on Dec. 7 to recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital. The flag-burning prompted a national outcry.

"I never thought that could happen in the middle of Berlin. That's something you see in other parts of the world. It's really disturbing," Tanaev said. "It feels like we're being threatened because you never know how people will react further when something like this occurs."

Other instances of anti-Semitism in Germany have become more common and brazen recently. Last month, thieves in Berlin made off with more than a dozen cobblestone-sized plaques embedded in sidewalks memorializing victims of the Holocaust. And the German military found Nazi memorabilia in soldiers' barracks over the summer.

In 2016, Germany recorded 1,468 anti-Semitic incidents, an increase from previous years that has put Germany's Jewish community on edge, According to a recent survey by the Bielefeld University in western Germany, 62% of Jewish respondents said they experience anti-Semitism in their everyday lives, while 28% said they were victims of verbal attacks or harassment in the past year.

The survey points to increased anti-Semitism by Muslim newcomers and a strengthened right-wing nativist movement, said Andreas Zick, who led the study.

Loading…

Underscoring that trend is the rise of the anti-immigrant Alternative for Germany (AfD), now the third-largest political party in Parliament four years after its founding. The AfD drums up support with nationalist and anti-Semitic rhetoric.

"Germans are the only people in the world who plant a monument of shame in the heart of the capital," senior AfD member Björn Höcke said this year about the Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe in Berlin.

Other party members want Nazi soldiers remembered as patriots.

Zick also noted anti-Semitic remarks posted on social media by right-wing groups. The comments fuel misconceptions among new immigrants that Germany tolerates such behavior, despite strict laws requiring social media giants such as Facebook to delete posts categorized as hate speech, he said.

“There’s a lot of evidence from our studies that the Internet and young Muslim men in public are threatening (Jews),” Zick said. “Refugees coming in don’t perceive that there’s a strong norm against anti-Semitism.”

Such sentiments prompted a Jewish community center in Berlin to launch an initiative to combat anti-Semitism.

“Here, we put in concrete terms that ‘the Jew’ is actually a normal person — that he looks like you and is someone you can have a normal conversation with,” said Rabbi Daniel Fabian of the Kahal Adass Jisroel Jewish community center and synagogue.

Members of the community center have been spit on and harassed in predominately Muslim neighborhoods since 2014, Fabian said. And his synagogue recently received a bomb threat from right-wing radicals. The compound housing the synagogue and community center are now under 24-hour police surveillance.

Jewish leaders are pushing for changes in the education system to head off anti-Semitism, including history lessons with visits to concentration camps. Bavaria is the only German state that now requires such visits.

“We are looking for modern means to convey what has happened and to keep the memory alive,” said Josef Schuster, president of Germany’s Central Council of Jews.

Tanaev said it also is important to draw parallels between the history of Jewish immigration and the current influx of newcomers. “That’s the history of our people, and it’s important to show others that fact,” he said.

Fabian, whose grandmother was in the Auschwitz concentration camp during World War

II, called for support from Muslim groups as well as the government to fight anti-Semitism.

“We can’t be the only ones who are constantly reminding everyone else to look at what’s happening right under your noses,” he said.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: The Damaging Effects Of Jewish Intellectualism And Activism On Western Culture

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Christmas Is Becoming An Act Of Resistance

December 25, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Gather round folks, sing, eat well, and be merry. In those uncertain times, the bond you share with your circle during Christmas matters more than ever. The roots keep the tree upright when the storm comes.

But our foes hate Christmas with a passion, for it is an explicit form of Western tradition and unity, one of the last bastions of our preserved European culture.

Feminists

Christmas embodies everything they hate: parental love, a tight-knit family and a festival where everyone has a role. Dad carries the presents, Mum prepares the feast and the children help put up the decorations.

Seeing them squealing with glee around the Yule tree while their mother spends hours in the kitchen, hurts feminists on a deep level. A reminder that they wasted their fertile years staying barren, widowed of the charming cads that lied with them one day then were out the door the next.

The dreaded biological clock ticks louder and its pesky sound bounces off the walls of their dusty womb. No amount of liberal platitudes can silence it.

Multiculturalists

A united family worries the population control decision makers. Fertile, learned and independent Westerners, impervious to political strife and divisive propaganda (corny parents against trendy children, toxic man against strong woman) are their worst nightmare.

Even if atheistic policies try to drown the religious spirit, the Western altruistic and generous nature of Christmas seduces almost everyone that does not hate us profoundly.

But thanks to multiculturalism, jihadis can target Christmas markets locally and hurt morale, even if Islamic concrete barriers of peace pop up everywhere.

Loading...

Atheists

I will not open the “Jesus is a skinny Jew on a cross” or “2017 and defending Christianity, LMAO!” debate. Christmas or Yule, it is the symbol of warmth and kinship which keeps hope and the fire alive before entering the long winter night.

“It’s a mercantile celebration,” some will cry. But so is our human society, for the law of supply and demand exists since man started rubbing two sticks together.

Of presents

I am not hostile to the whole “gifts” process. The Havamal, my bedside book, tells us:

> A true friend whom you trust well > and wish for his good will:
> go to him often, exchange gifts > and keep him company.

But one must keep a cool head:

> Load no man with lavish gifts.
> Small presents often win great praise.
> With a loaf cut and a cup shared
> I found fellowship.

Reasonable presents should be there. Life keeps getting busier and it is a well-thought idea that a date is set for everyone to exchange gifts, when one might postpone or forget it during the rest of the year.

Do your part

Christmas terminology and Nativity scenes are avoided now, to be “progressive” and avoid offending the “newcomers”. Refuse this “Happy Holidays” masquerade. Reforming the language is one of the first thing leftists do when they gain power (before confiscating guns, gagging the media and “reeducateing” dissidents by force). Say “Merry Christmas”, knowing that your interlocutor might hate it.

Un très joyeux Noël

It is no coincidence that an unhappy childhood is often associated with tragic Christmas memories, caused by family or misfortune. Those moments cement a stable family life. By being joyful, sharing the kindness of Christmas with your loved ones, you are doing something for all of us.

If you had any doubts that you were on the right side, know that our adversaries want to take these moments and these people you love away from you.

Joyeux Noël to each and every one of you, dear readers.

Read More: A ROK Christmas Benediction From Brother Cui Pertinebit

---

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Merry Rooshmas Call-In Live Stream At 2PM EST

December 25, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In just a few hours I'll be doing a live-stream on YouTube.

Loading...
Here are the call-in details…

Number: (641) 715-0873
Access Code: 805890

Don't Miss: ROK Hits Primetime With A Segment On The Jimmy Kimmel Live Show (Video)

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How The Elite Manipulates Your Notions Of Love And Hatred

December 25, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

If some identity or group is on the side of the elite, it is framed as an underdog or ex-underdog who courageously stood up for its rights after having been unfairly persecuted. Muslim terrorists, anti-white murderers, and now invasive Buddhist killers are promoted as poor innocent victims with rights and a legitimate identity.

If some identity or group is on the target list, however, it is presented as "xenophobic", "intolerant", charged with being responsible for every problem around, and it ought to be trodden upon and vilified boundlessly. Note that it is perfectly possible for a group to fall from the first position to the second. In the 2000s Buddhism was the peak of kool-aid wisdom. You just couldn't criticize so humane and enlightened a cult, or at least the lukewarm version of it that prevails in the West. Then the elite decided there should be a "Buddhist Hitler", something unimaginable before, to justify Muslim exactions in Myanmar.

Psyops is all about manipulating ideas, identity, and feelings. It is about creating a narrative and making people internalize it so that they are steered into liking this, loathing that, being indulgent with some but overdemanding with others. The underdog-becoming-a-champion is a sham, not the truth. Actual underdogs who are not protected or supported by the elite are shamelessly repressed. Just ask the 80s' pro-life activists.

I take care not to read too much about the occult elite. This kind of reading is absorbing and very informative, but when you're dabbling too much in there forgetting to carry on with your own life becomes all too easy. It can also lead to depression due to how small and powerless it makes you feel. On the other hand, having basic knowledge about them and especially about how they manipulate helps you not to fall for their traps. Sovereignty on one's mind matters crucially in life. As long as getting informed on the elite is beneficial, do it—otherwise focusing on your own ventures achieves way more.

An important tool used by the elite is appropriating "love" and "hate"—the words and the emotions. If the elite supports you, you'll be identified with love or loveable things, hence you'll be loveable. If the elite wants you out of their way, you'll be identified with hate or disagreeable things, hence you'll be despicable or hateable. This simple rule of thumb goes a long way.

Basically, both love and hate are moral and natural. If you were a Christian, you'd love and invest out of love towards God, your relatives, your friends, anyone who could rightly be considered a neighbor in the biblical sense. The internal emotion and the outward proofs of love were but one. Likewise, hate fulfilled a legitimate function: if someone willing to harm you knows you'll hate him and likely hurt him, he is much likelier to refrain from harm.

The world, natural or not, is made of contraries. We have agonist and antagonist muscles so we can push or pull. Being able to love and to hate, and to act out of both, is part of a wholesome human nature. Now raising above feelings and being at least able to keep them at bay to take a conscious decision is something else. In any case, being capable of opposite acts does not mean self-contradiction but being balanced.

An artistic depiction of the love/hate equilibrium

Love and hate, though, were taken over and manipulated through clever means.

The first Trojan horse was modern (seventeenth century and beyond) romantic love. Before the modern world, the dating market was regulated by traditions that ensured a mix of sexual welfare and rewarding the deserving. Monogamy, negotiations between the groom's and bride's families, ensured that men could marry at their level, had a good chance to marry, and that potential brides wouldn't be tainted by a number of premarital partners.

Romantic love was a mask for inflamed, unchecked male lust and freewheeling female hypergamy. Men starting running after women when they had no need to do so and women gladly inflated their social value. Look at the Belle Époque art. Yes, it extolls masculinity and femininity, and the artists cared about beauty. But look to the content: it glorifies female singers, dancers, all variations of high-valued courtesans, hooking up with wealthy, high-ranking men. Was Sarah Bernhardt really better than Kim Kardashian?

Thus, "love" was confused with lust, shortsightedness, forgetting one's legitimate interests and frequently pitted against the traditional familial consciousness. The nineteenth century let us with a stock of bullshit in verse, usually written by incel, supplicating zeta poets, who have been appropriated and heralded as classics by official history. Eventually, after the second World War, the romantic love mask was discarded as unnecessary and the deregulation of the sexual marketplace took a more Marxist, or "emancipatory" as they say, turn.

Loading...

Emancipation indeed

Although romanticism is not fashionable anymore, the Current Year media still use “love” rather heavy-handedly. They keep pushing a narrative where the globalists, along with their attacks and pet identities, are related to or identified with “love”, versus whoever or whatever is not siding with their interested must be associated to or identified with “hate”.

Kill whitey types are poor and oppressed, hence they should be indulged, empathized with, acknowledged as good boys who dindu nuthin—“love.” Anal marriage has been constantly branded as “love”, from the MSM to Ben & Jerry’s. Governments supported by Soros have been heralded as cool, progressive, edgy—“love”—and brave. On the other hand those not supported are accused of “hatred”, “hate speech” and so on.

> In the West, the police will make sure you only very quietly and politely protest the No Borders anarchists, and if you literally or figuratively raise your voice, they will arrest you for inciting violence, or will look away as people in black bandannas wreck your car. If you punch a leftist, you incited violence with your fist. If a leftist punches you, you incited violence with your words. (Social Matter, “Right-Wing Activism Always Fails”)

As long as you’re not siding with the anti-male, anti-white, anti-western, anti-family, anti-middle class elite, whatever you do will be blackwashed and associated to “hate” or other disagreeable stuff.

1997: Buddhism is cool, Brad Pitt plays a Buddhist monk
2017: Buddhism = terrorism and swastikas

The opposite is also true. When Jewish leftists tried to browbeat Richard Spencer's mom into selling her flats below the market prices and leaving her city, the alternative media uncovered their nefarious actions—and these leftists presented themselves as members of an organization called "Love lives here." Robbing, threatening, swindling people is "love" when you're a Leftist and your target victim is even tangentially related to a dissenter.

In France, bourgeois bohemian youtubers associated to promote themselves giving money to the pseudo-victim Muslims of Myanmar. How did they present themselves? As the #LoveArmyForRohingyas. I remember of a mainstream, vaguely new-age French writer who used the motto "love as a spade and humor as a shield." This looked innocent—until I realized this just meant weaponizing parts of normal life and propagating chaos. At the same time, people who notice the Arab-Muslim violence are stigmatized as "hateful" or pronouncing "hate speech" and so on.

Years ago some leftists used to conclude their messages by the word "peace." A feel-good, positive vibes word. But just before that they'd rant against white males, and "the rich", and "the far right", and this, and that. There was an obvious contradiction between their "peace" pose and their hostile deeds. The contradiction wasn't an accident—the framing serves to maintain a narrative, a shared illusion Leftists keep trying to impose through extended violence.

Problem glasses, dyed hair and a fishmouth mean LOVE. Believe that, you white males!

Is the love-versus-hate narrative Manichean? Of course. (Way more, I would say, than the Stocks vs. Bitcoin issue.) Yet it works better than the mild-mannered conservative viewpoints. Most issues are complex, most people are lazy or have no time to dive deep. Issues must be condensed to be communicated. And, no matter how much you enjoy freedom of speech, strong symbolic pictures, fashionability, an easy-to-grasp narrative and peer pressure works better on most people than half-deep ponderings.

Having Brahmins to steer the opinion isn't a problem per se. The problem comes when the Brahmins start working for the Rothschild and begin to destroy their own relatives—us—instead of leading them.

The narrative must be undermined. We can be successful, happy, in a way that makes us palatable and cool, even when billions are invested into shaming and blackwashing us. We can chide their hypocrisy, for example when they talk about "love" before berating and dehumanizing people. And it can be fun too.

Read Next: How The Perception Of Disgust Is Manipulated Over Time To Break The Human Spirit

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Washington DC Has Bottomed Out

December 26, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Between 2008-2014, I noticed a degradation of DC nightlife and women each time I came back home from a trip abroad. Its decline was a major contributing factor in my expatriation to Eastern Europe, where I currently reside, but for my past two consecutive trips to DC, I've noticed that the city is no longer getting worse, across several areas.

Male-female Ratio: DC is still a sausage fest, and always will be thanks to the government and military jobs in the area, but the ratio has stabilized. If you go out early on the weekends, starting at 10pm, you will encounter quite favorable ratios that only start to flip around midnight. It may even be worth going out at 9pm when girls are wrapping up their foodie dinners.

Female Obesity: DC has plenty of land whales, especially among the black population, but they're not getting fatter. Many foreign and white girls are only a few pounds overweight. Unfortunately, some women go in the wrong direction for their weight problems by doing CrossFit, which gives them a body of a boy who just went through puberty. I rather date a fattie than a muscular woman.

Female Style and Appearance: I was surprised to see many girls wearing heels in the bars. If I visited during the summer, I may have seen them wearing flip flops instead, but in my most recent trip that ended last week, they were dressed up quite nicely. Many girls had long hair and a select few had a rather sexy look.

Female Attitude: A growing problem here is that girls get triggered very easily if you say anything politically incorrect, but as long as you avoid political discussions, you could have pleasant interactions. I only did a handful of approaches on the latest trip, and didn't try to get laid, but I wasn't blown out or treated poorly. The girls seemed open to getting approached, probably because guys are doing it less than before. The game I saw being done was mostly by black men on white girls.

These observations come from going to places I already knew, so it's quite possible that there are even better DC venues I haven't been to yet. If I was forced to live in DC for an extended period of time, such as in the case of a relative getting sick, I would live near a Whole Foods for day game and find two or three medium-sized bars within walking distance of my apartment to do 2-5 approaches about twice a week. To supplement these efforts, I would try to find international venues where I could easily show value with European au pairs. I would also increase my target age range. In Eastern Europe I focus on 21-25 year olds, but in America I'd go for 24-29 year olds since large age gaps take more effort to pull off in the States. If I made all those changes, I could probably manage okay in DC without falling into a suicidal depression.

Loading...

Since the introduction of smartphones and social networking, we haven't had any new shocks which would degrade women further. Almost every woman you encounter has owned a smartphone for more than five years. Her behavior declines in the first couple of years upon using a smartphone or other new cultural invention and then stabilizes. This is why DC women are not getting worse but Eastern European women are: the smartphone was adopted widely in the latter much later. Once Eastern Europe bottoms out in the next couple of years, I'll probably find that the behavior of American and Eastern European women overlap much more than before the smartphone.

I must stress how shocked I was to see so many American women wearing heels. In Eastern Europe, a Scandinavian hipster fashion has taken over, and many girls under 25 now wear sneakers to the club. Even in Ukraine, the country with the most feminine women on Earth, there are more hipsters with tattoos than before. These foreign trends are expected because culture has become globalized—women in different countries consume similar media on the same devices while eating the same types of food. American girls who remain thin can soon compete well on a world stage, not because they're improving, but because foreign women are getting worse. Once those foreign women hit a bottom, which will take 2-4 more years, they may not be that much better than American women.

Now that my player days are behind me, I don't dread the idea of having to live in America like before, but I won't come back anytime soon because of one reason: the cost. My living expenses in Eastern Europe are only 20-25% of what I would have to pay in DC for the same lifestyle. The only other real advantage I have in Eastern Europe is the ability to date younger girls who are more elegant and pleasing. I left to foreign lands for the adventure, freedom, and women, but it's turning out that I stay because of money.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: 15 Reasons Why Toronto Is The Worst City In North America For Men

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Black Woman Complains That “Racist” Charlie Rose Didn’t Sexually Harass Her

December 26, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

An ex-producer for fired television presenter Charlie Rose has complained that she was not “sexually harassed” by him due to “racism.” Currently, there is next to no evidence that Rose actually mistreated women. The more likely outcome is that he engaged in consensual flings and affairs with women who then opportunistically turned on him after the putrid #MeToo campaign started.

> And while many of us on staff were subject to Charlie’s unsolicited shoulder massages and physical intimidation, as he towered above us at a height over six feet tall, the women Charlie preferred and preyed upon—at least that I witnessed—were white. It was an environment that all but erased me, while simultaneously exploiting me as a black woman.
>
> — Rebecca Carroll telling a truly woeful tale of how Charlie Rose didn’t “sexually harass” her, supposedly because she was black

Rebecca Carroll, who described her so-called experiences as “the only black journalist on staff” for Charlie Rose’s eponymous show, very egotistically positions herself in Esquire as someone who should have been sexually harassed but wasn’t. You be the judge as to how attractive she is:

[image]

Naturally, once she pitifully establishes her narrative as a victim of made-up racism, she feigns solidarity with the white women Rose is said to have (again, with no evidence) sexually harassed:

> To be clear, I'm not suggesting it would have been preferable for Charlie to have preyed upon me, too—but rather, his sexualization of white women was a manifestation of gendered power dynamics in the same way that his not sexualizing me was an expression of racialized power dynamics.

Most interestingly of all, Rebecca Carroll says female colleagues were "preyed upon" without ever mentioning how she might have confronted Charlie Rose about this purported behavior. Consequently, she only seems to be "brave" and stand up for fellow women when publications like Esquire give her a chance to write about herself to an international audience, years after the "predatory" antics of Rose. How very sisterly of her.

Hilariously, Carroll whinges that she was "erased" as she did not receive sexual attention from Charlie Rose. Despite the extreme doubts we should all have about these sexual harassment allegations involving other women, not being sexually harassed by a famous television presenter is enough at the moment for someone to be massively triggered.

If this is what "racism" is, then we're all inveterate racists

Using already atrocious leftist standards, Carroll's allegations of racism against Charlie Rose are spectacularly flimsy and tenuous, including this abysmal gripe:

> His language around race felt consistently coded. Charlie demanded I book the black guests he wanted but previously had been unable to get—black guests of a perceived level of respectability and intelligence (Sidney Poitier)—while dismissing the black guests I pitched, (Vivica Fox, for example).

Because Charlie Rose did not want to book Vivica A. Fox, best known to audiences as Will Smith's stripper fiancée in Independence Day and Vernita Green in Kill Bill, he is apparently a "coded" racist. If you do not like older films, nonetheless try comparing Sidney Poitier's performance in Lilies of the Field, his magnum opus, with Fox's turn as a sex worker in a blockbuster about highly belligerent invading aliens. A putative refusal to want to interview the latter individual now meets the threshold for being called a racist in the America of 2017. In fact, Carroll's cries of bigotry regarding the Vivica A. Fox rejection is comparable to calling someone anti-Semitic for not liking Michael Bay's Transformers franchise.

The most cursory glance at PBS' viewer demographics reveals an older audience, one more receptive to someone like Sidney Poitier. If this were not the case, Rebecca Carroll would still have us believe that her boss' reluctance to share the same opinion as her about potential guests on his show is an indication of his racism. "You prefer this black guest and I prefer this black guest, so you're a racist, Charlie!" is the sum total of this particular part of her argument.

Again, Rebecca Carroll was not willing to have a serious argument with Charlie Rose at the time about the way she claims he sexually treated women, but she did kick up a stink about whether Vivica A. Fox could be a guest on Charlie Rose. Go figure.

The end result of social and political insanity

"I was not sexually harassed" is now a status used for virtue signaling alongside "I was sexually harassed."

No one should be surprised that an evidently attention-starved woman has written a bizarre rant like Rebecca Carroll's for Esquire. After all, multimillionaire blacks are oppressed, while poor whites on minimum wage just don't know how privileged they are.

Prepubescent boys can't vote, drive, drink alcohol, or have sex (and rightfully so), yet they can get their dicks chopped off to become "girls." We could go on and on.

Clinging onto pseudo-victim status has become such a sport in feminized America that women who are otherwise unable to scream "sexual harassment" or "rape" can instead declare that not being a victim makes them a victim of another kind. It's an equally ingratiating method of virtue signaling deployed to show how "brave" and "strong" a woman is, except this time they're meant to be brave and strong for putting up with not being sexually harassed. So you weren't groped or raped? Well, the guy facing allegations from others must be a racist, too. Or, if you're a man who pretends to be a woman, he must be transphobic.

Is it any wonder that Roosh's books about men leaving the West for greener pastures in South America or Eastern Europe continue to sell?

Read More: White American Girl Raises Over $30,000 Because Her Dad Is "Racist" Against Black Boyfriend

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

What It Was Like To Get A Divorce In Australia

December 27, 2017 | by Aurora Borealis | Link | Original Link

One of the highlights of my day is avidly reading the articles on ROK and similar sites. Having recently been through the divorce wringer myself, I was interested to read about the trials of my northern brothers and decided to write about my experience. I'm not a lawyer so don't quote me, and this is a casual discussion, so I won't include references.

I'm 50 years old. I was with my former wife for 23 years and I have three kids. She was an attractive slim girl who had a few boyfriends and flings before we met, but she did want to settle down, buy a house, and have a family one day. Additionally, she did not remain in contact with her exes nor flirt with other men despite her attractiveness, unlike most of her contemporaries today.

When we met she was struggling with university and work so I lent her my spare car to save her the hassle of catching buses etc, and she genuinely appreciated it! Displaying that sort of kindness weakness today will see you ruthlessly exploited.

It was basically a successful marriage with only the last three years being toxic. I threw myself into work and study, getting out of debt and investing for the future but in truth I had become an ogre, unbalanced and obsessive.

We had grown apart, yet I was clueless and taken completely by surprise when she announced one morning that we were done. That was a difficult time for me, the first month I was basically paralysed and could not so much as remember the pin on my phone.

Divorce, Australian style

Despite mirroring the US in obesity, promiscuity and repellent behaviour in general, about one third of marriages here fail, and the system, although shitty, is fairer to fathers for the most part compared to the US.

Most splits here are initiated by the women and she can walk out on you for any reason… or no reason at all. Once you separate, all assets are placed into a pool and are divided with the women usually getting about 60-65% if there are kids and she works. If she is a stay at home mum she will get more so watch it! Assets held before the marriage can be exempt but documentation is key.

You can't get a divorce until you have been separated for a year and this time is well spent cooling off, moving on, and working out logistics with the ex.

During my divorce I consulted many lawyers, taking advantage of their free half hour consultation during our first meeting. I got a feel for the process and learned that most settlements fall into the 60/40 split noted above, and to fight that would be very expensive and time consuming. As a result, most men I know cough up and avoid court altogether, saving tons of money and aggro. Much better for the kids too.

There is no alimony in Australia, but if there is a large income disparity between the parties, you may have to pay her "spouse maintenance" for a time. This is not a perpetual impost, and is usually limited to two years or so. The ex is required to retrain, become gainfully employed, and so on during that time.

Loading…

I have only heard of one man who had to pay his ex-spouse maintenance and that was because she did not work. Staying home with the kids is great for their development and wellbeing but get her back into the workforce when the kids are in high school or else you could be slugged!

Child support is based on each parent's income and their portion of care. Fathers basically have equal access rights as the mother, so you will get 50% custody if you want (unless you have been bad), and as a bonus you will not go to prison if you can't pay her! You can't avoid the debt by going bankrupt, but if business is bad, or you lose your job, or go back to school, your obligations are reduced as a result.

Child support is also capped at about 2.5 times average earnings, so this is great news for wealthy alpha men and high achievers. Australian family law is controlled federally so there are no idiosyncratic state regulations to ambush you.

Being married or living together makes no difference to your access rights or obligations to your kids and once you have lived with her for two years she has a claim on your assets, so watch this and make her sign a binding financial agreement! These aren't watertight however, especially when children appear, and the court can overturn or amend them. The informal advice I have though is that BFA's or pre-nups are worth the expense.

So how have I fared after my divorce?

Aside from trying to marry a couple of completely unsuitable women (future article perhaps), I am happier. I have more free time and am rebuilding my finances. I am studying, getting serious about my small business and hitting my fitness goals. It is obviously a traumatic and expensive experience, but I have my kids about half the time now and as a result have more leisure, and enjoy seeing them these days.

5 things I have learned

1. People change a hell of a lot between their mid 20's to mid-40's and most of the time they drift apart.

2. Smart phones, social media, obesity, and the poisonous politics of our age make it much harder to find a suitable woman, court her, and keep her.

3. Your kids are your long-term assets and you will derive ferocious satisfaction inoculating them against the new age crap they bring home from school.

4. Every man must work on himself if he wants to compete.

5. Demography is destiny.

I don't know if I'll get married again but I am sure as hell happy that I gave it my best shot.

The internet is a powerful medium for change, both good and bad, and the rapid pace of our age can work in our favour, so keep up the great work at ROK.

Read More: It's Time To Flip The Script On Frivolous Divorce

Aurora Borealis
Aurora Borealis is middle aged and hails from Down Under. Long suspecting that something was rotten in the state of Denmark, he could not put a name to it until he discovered red pill philosophy. Recently divorced he has spent the last few years inculcating correct mindsets and plotting his return. He enjoys teasing young fillies and lifting heavy.

3 Ways That Having Prejudices Will Actually Help You

December 27, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Prejudice is one of those words that are associated with negative thoughts, opinions, and behaviors. Its connotation is linked to something inferior, intolerant, bad and stupid, like a petty-minded person.

But he who is well-informed about history, philosophy, and possesses street-smartness, realizes that prejudices are some of the best and educated assets in a man's life. Here's why.

1. Prejudice equates with wisdom

In the conservative tradition of the Irishman Edmund Burke, history and philosophy are closely connected. Earlier generations knew a great deal about various phenomena, and to ignore their valuable experiences of the past would be a great mistake. Burke stresses:

> Instead of casting away all our old prejudices, we cherish them to a very considerable degree, and, to take more shame to ourselves, we cherish them because they are prejudices; and the longer they have lasted and the more generally they have prevailed, the more we cherish them. We are afraid to put men to live and trade each on his own private stock of reason; because we suspect that this stock in each man is small, and that the individuals would do better to avail themselves of the general bank and capital of nations and of ages.

For example, although the earlier notions of women might be exaggerated, incomplete and partly flawed, they nevertheless include some underlying truth. Contemporary research in psychology shows that females are more neurotic, emotional and less rational than men, which is pretty much only a more nuanced confirmation of what those before already knew.

Prejudices do not imply that nothing can or should be changed, and it is the duty of our generation to filter out that which is not worthy to hold on to. Still the wise man knows to absorb the wisdom of earlier generations.

2. Prejudice is a legit philosophical position

If one goes a bit beyond the prejudical wisdom, one realizes that prejudices form every person who tries to understand society and the world. In the German philosopher Hans-Georg Gadamer's work Truth and Method, he notes that prejudices are what forms our thinking and our interpretations of various new phenomena in our world that we encounter. Our particular tradition helps us to give it a meaning and at least a preliminary understanding. Therefore we cannot just let our "pure reason" guide us, like some of the Enlightenment scholars and neoconservative ideologists have asserted.

Loading...

Let's say that a blue-haired fat activist showed up somewhere in England in the 15th century. The people might have thought that it was some sort of demon from the underworld that manifested itself. While us contemporaries, on the other hand, know that it's just another blue-haired beast, another degenerate sign of the times. Ergo: we cannot escape the particular historical horizon from which we understand things in the world.

3. Prejudice is the same as street-smartness and good decision-making

Like Steven Pinker claims in a passage of his extensive work The Better Angels of Our Nature, stereotypes and averages indeed are true. Blacks really are more prone to being welfare recipients. The fact that we should not essentialize entire groups is beside the point.

I remember when I visited Los Angeles for the first time in 2006. I took a Greyhound bus and spoke to a decent black guy in his 20s all the way to San Diego. Thus I have absolutely nothing against blacks as individuals, and as a larger population group I hope that they will do better in the future. Nevertheless, it was also wise of me to turn around after having just entered a metro station full of black males in their late teens in downtown L.A.

As John Derbyshire rightly noticed in his infamous article in Takimag, a white or northeast Asian person should avoid large groups of blacks, since they might be annoying at best or hostile at worst. Females, on the other hand, should know that to travel alone in unsafe countries is not very wise. Edmund Burke again:

> Prejudice is of ready application in the emergency; it previously engages the mind in a steady course of wisdom and virtue, and does not leave the man hesitating in the moment of decision, skeptical, puzzled and unresolved. Prejudice renders a man's virtue his habit; and not a series of unconnected acts. Through past prejudice, his duty becomes part of his nature.

The important thing is to look at what research and common sense say, so that our selective prejucides do not misguide us. Given that a man is relatively flexible in his way of thinking and acting, to hold on to prejudices can make up an excellent method to avoid dangerous situations and make decisions in accordance with such clever and virtuous principles.

Read More: Why You Should Not Be Afraid Of Selective Prejudice

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Psychologists State That Women Who Take Too Many Selfies Have “Selfitis” Mental Condition

December 27, 2017 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

Though the term “selfitis” was conceived in a 2014 parody article, two researchers “have looked at the term and have decided there could be some truth to it,” according to Business Insider.

Mark D. Griffiths and Janarthanan Balakrishnan published a paper in the International Journal of Mental Health and Addiction last month, in which they argued that the condition was real.

“They also developed a ‘Selfitis Behaviour Scale’ by surveying the selfie behaviour of 400 participants from India,” Business Insider explained. “The scale assesses the severity of the condition, of which there are three levels.”

Cases ranged from “borderline” to “acute” and even “chronic” stages on the Selfitis Behavior Scale (SBS), the latter meaning those afflicted “cannot control the urge to take photos of themselves all the time.”

Loading…

“Initially, focus group interviews with 225 Indian university students were carried out to generate potential items for the SBS. The SBS was then validated using 400 Indian university students via exploratory factor analysis (EFA),” explained the study. Six factors were identified in the EFA comprising environmental enhancement, social competition, attention seeking, mood modification, self-confidence, and social conformity. The findings demonstrate that the SBS appears to be a reliable and valid instrument for assessing selfitis but that confirmatory studies are needed to validate the concept more rigorously.”

Following the report, Balakrishnan expressed hope that “further research” would be carried out to further examine the alleged condition.

“Typically, those with the condition suffer from a lack of self-confidence and are seeking to ‘fit in’ with those around them, and may display symptoms similar to other potentially addictive behaviours,” Balakrishnan claimed. “Now the existence of the condition appears to have been confirmed, it is hoped that further research will be carried out to understand more about how and why people develop this potentially obsessive behaviour, and what can be done to help people who are the most affected.”

Mark Salter, a spokesman for the Royal College of Psychiatrists, refuted the report, claiming it was “dangerous” to suggest such a condition actually exists.

“There is a tendency to try and label a whole range of complicated and complex human behaviours with a single word,” he declared. “But that is dangerous because it can give something reality where it really has none.”

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: Why Sex Selfies Signal The Decline Of Western Civilization

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Why Is Donald Trump Doing Israel's Bidding?

December 28, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

President Trump promised many things during his candidacy on issues such as immigration, terrorism, the economy, healthcare, and to "Make American Great Again," yet it feels like the priority now is Israel in light of recognizing Jerusalem as its capital. Why?

The timing doesn't make sense when you consider that Russia and Middle Eastern allies have destroyed most of ISIS. Trump appears to be trying to live up to his word, but there still some shady things going on which seem to be favoring "the holy land" and globalists.

Ironically enough, as I typed this, a Christmas song came on with the lyrics, "Born is the king of Israel." Well, it looks like a new king has emerged, but not the one you're expecting.

Assuming Trump truly is an outsider fighting for America, he's still got his work cut out for him as the establishment is going ballistic to ruin his presidency.

The Good

- Corruption – Trump is slowly cleaning up like when he got rid of FBI director Commey who protected Crooked Hilary for her email server scandal and other illegal activities.
- Illegal immigration – A wall was promised, then it was changed to a fence, and now it's a virtual wall. Whatever border does get developed, it's somewhat working. Gangbangers are being thrown back to the hell hole from which they came from, and crackdowns at the US border have increased.

- International fraud – Leaving the Paris climate trade was great to help America get out of the global warming scam. He's also putting the pressure on the UN and other foreign nations to pay their fair share in trade, and in the fight against terrorism.
- Economy – Jobs were created, but still Americans are working harder for a lot less. More jobs isn't always necessarily a good thing if they're not high paying, because people don't want to work like slaves; they want financial freedom.

So some progress has been made, but not without flaws.

The Bad

- Struggling Americans — The world is basically being run by about 6 companies according to reports. This rigged economy makes it very difficult for new businesses which already have a 50% failure rate, and that's why more companies are moving offshore. Trump's tax plan maybe a little better, but not life changing.
- More Spending – Trump acted more like a globalist when he teamed up with Chuck the Weasel Schumer and Nancy Pelosi to raise the debt ceiling. If Trump ran his company like that, he would be selling jerky in Harlem. Now as he wants to embrace Israel, for what?
- War – Trump continuing the war in Afghanistan is the Globalists' dream, and now that he officially recognized Jerusalem as the capital of Israel, moving the U.S. embassy there is asking for more problems from the Middle East. Has Trump completely lost his noggin or is he under globalist mind control? Netan"yahoo" could barely control his excitement.

Even Trump's Enemies Approved

When you see former Trump haters suddenly defend his actions, you know there's much to be concerned about. Globalists want Assad out and Trump is now fitting into their plan for world domination. With Nikki Haley having the arrogance to lecture other nations again like she did in justifying Trump's Syria attack, you can expect to see a bad reaction.

Vladimir Putin is not a pushover. He and other countries are not going to let America bully them forever. Of course Israel approves, because ISIS is not a big threat to them, but Assad is. They won't use their military, but like to play helpless and let the good ole' USA take care of it. As a matter of fact, they are working with the Saudis to provoke war. It's about time the U.S. tells Israel to solve their own problems. Building a military base in Israel is not in America's best interest right now as it paves the path to another Third World War, one that the country cannot afford.

America doesn't need nor wants to embrace Israel. Many Americans are sick and tired of Israel because they do nothing for America yet wants it to fight their wars. No, it's not the holy land, it's corrupt. Netanyahu's new bill just secured his power indefinitely, so let Israel fight its own battles.

Trump can still change this…

Stop Trying to Americanize The Middle East

When Ivanka shed tears over Syria, Trump responded to the "chemical attacks" in Syria with 59 tomahawk missiles despite warnings from Russia. The Kremlin already ceased its air safety agreement with the U.S., and Russian major general Igor Konashenkov called it "a grave violation". Putin said the strike violated international law being an "illegal act of aggression," but war mongering McCain applauded Trump while the foam fell from his wooden dentures.

Syrian leader Bashar al-Assad also told MSNBC that the fake manipulated video by terrorists was the cause for the wrongly done attack on Syria.

Donald Trump needs to be more careful about lending his ear to his double agent advisors like Jared Kushner who had previous ties to Israel, owing a billion dollars and received funds from none other than George Soros. This guy is nothing but trouble and should be removed. He was involved in a visa scheme in China and is just no good for Trump with his New York liberal views. Babyface Kushner also helped a senator lobby for "DACA" amnesty for nearly a million illegal immigrants.

Of course, many die-hard Trump addicts believe he can do no wrong, but they need to wake up.

Prevent Global Destruction

War is BIG business. Profits were over 400 billion in 2011 for contractors, that amount rivals the pharmaceutical industry. Do you really think they want peace? It's all profit to them. Kim Jon Un was supposed to be dealt with, but now the issue pushed away even after he made threats of attacking the U.S. and has control of resources worth trillions according to an MSN report. Even though North Korea has already "sentenced Trump to death" for insulting him, the whole issue has been set aside, because Jerusalem is apparently more important.

Woodrow Wilson ran on the "America First" slogan with good intentions, but was eventually persuaded into war. Trump could do the same, and if he's not careful, he could elicit a Third World War.

What's going to unfold?

More people are waking up and not just blindly going with the Trumpeteer bandwagon. Trump promised America to "drain the swamp" and to make the country great again, but the way he's been acting lately makes one question whose side his advisors are on, or whether he himself is in on it and just Trumped the entire nation. It appears he's now catering to the very powers that he promised he'd be against. He needs to come back his roots and focus on defeating the globalists.

Read More: Open Letter To President Donald J. Trump

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info about him visit, GSL Creations

What It’s Like To Be A Personal Fitness Trainer

December 28, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

For those of my readers who have learned much from me and become true physical culturists, there may come a time when you decide to possibly profit off of your passion—a time when you walk away from whatever unheralded bitch job you work at and try to become that most respected of things: a certified personal trainer!

“After all,” you may think to yourself, “the trainers that train movie stars make millions, and even if you’re not getting actors ready for some superhero movie, you’ll still be in a field where you actually get respect from your clients (a non-physical but tangible fruit of labor) and hey, the lonely housewives in yoga pants are a nice fringe benefit, eh what?”

This is largely what my thought process was when my career in academia as a literati hit a downturn, and thus I decided to become a personal trainer. I studied and passed the test in about three weeks of hard studying; apparently my fellow trainers needed several months to do the same. As useless as college ultimately was for me, I must admit that it did teach me how to knuckle down and focus on one task, and after a brief job hunt, I found employment in this field. So what downsides could there possibly be?

Imagine, public school benefiting you in some way.

The Bad

Let's make something quite clear: the typical gym job you're going to get, especially if you don't have a specialty such as a Crossfit certification, is a lot less "voluptuous, sex deprived housewives in yoga pants" and a lot more "glorified janitorial work". The majority of your time will NOT be teaching classes, banging cougars, or even training clients—no, you're probably going to be dusting ceiling fans, re-racking weights, tightening this or that nut or bolt, and repairing jammed machines. And in case you're wondering, I've only had three man-hungry females explicitly throw themselves at me, two of whom were elderly and the other a pre-pubescent, neither category of female being one that I'm attracted to.

Secondly, most jobs you'll get will not be full time. I myself work a full 40 hours a week by working a combined 30 hours at two regular gyms and the other 10 teaching martial arts classes in yet another location, with clients booking private training and the occasional bit of modeling at two art studios where I'll usually work an additional 5-6 hours a week. So I have five jobs.

While the hourly wages I make are pretty good—ranging from 18-30 depending on the job—the intermittent nature of the work means benefits and job security are not likely, unless you work at a big national or international corporate chain—which are incidentally more likely to have those aforementioned yoga pants clad beauties, so if that "fringe benefit" is what you're looking for, you may have more luck there.

Thirdly, you have to deal with some bad people—and I am of course referring to the customers. Contrary to what all of the 80s movies said, there are no gyms full of snarling hardass trainers that will allow you to make ingrates feel bad (this topic may provide fuel for another article).

Quite the contrary, you have to be a smiling salesdouche and enjoy all the “fun” of retail with added dollops of entitlement, mood swings, ignorance, and general stubbornness. Enjoy fat women arguing with you over nutrition, children crying and parents scolding you because you dared to discipline the smug little bastard, old people angrily telling you that “…[they’ve] been doing this for 40 years, junior!”, angry teenage boys venting their high school rage and involuntary celibacy on the weights, and more!

No matter how badly you want to, you can’t act like this “Well Golly Gee, Larsen” you might be saying, “being a trainer sounds like a real shitheap!” It is indeed not as glamorous as I originally thought, but…

The Good

I’d be lying if I said there wasn’t a lot of good to the job, not the least of which is, hey, you can work out for free and to your heart’s content! In addition to that, you can get a remarkable amount of free stuff should you sign up for public events and the like—and I always consider that to be a plus.

For those who are more gregarious, the opportunities for friendship, sex, and romance are there—perhaps not as abundant and easy as Hollywood has told you, but they are still there. After all, I did refer to the only explicit instances of women throwing themselves at me.

Most importantly, it’s rewarding in the same way that a public school teacher sometimes finds their job rewarding (yes, such a thing does actually happen)—when a client tells you how happy they are to have lost weight, or how their newfound muscles gives them newfound confidence in life, or how you gave them the ability to walk again with bridging and twist stretching, that is more than anything else why I do this job. I do it for the good people that need help, and are ecstatic when I give it to them.

Conclusion

For those who think the job is nothing but a cavalcade of easy sex and money, I would think otherwise. It may very well become that once you've established yourself in the field for a few years, but it won't start out like that.

However, provided you can find a good gym and a clientele that doesn't suck, personal training can be a great and rewarding field once you get past the admitted drawbacks. At the very least, it's not any worse than any other job I've had in my life, and in fact is the best I've had either in terms of payment, ease of work, or both. Consider it!

Read More: A Simple Paradigm Shift To Boost Your Gaming Success

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

3 Reasons To Join The Eastern Orthodox Church

December 28, 2017 | by Michael Witcoff | Link | Original Link

Friends and brothers, it's been quite a while since I last wrote to you. Between my consulting business and my growing interest in the world of blockchain technology, I've had a lot on my plate lately.

But the time seems right for me to come back to Return Of Kings and share a bit more of my journey with you. The rhythm I aim for in life is to learn and grow, then share and teach.

Today's topic, Eastern Orthodoxy, is something I'd never even heard of when my last article here was published. But since discovering what it is and delving deeper into its mysteries, it's consumed an enormous amount of my time and attention.

So much of it, in fact, that I recently decided to leave my Wesleyan ways behind and become a full-fledged member of the Orthodox Church. Today, I'd like to share with you my top three reasons for doing so.

1. It's The Church That Jesus Planted

During my time as a Protestant, it never even occurred to me that a denomination existed reaching all the way back to the time of the apostles.

Once I realized there was an unbroken chain of tradition reaching back nearly 2,000 years, I began to ask an entirely new kind of question. What did they teach? How did they worship? What did they believe? How did it get transmitted through time like that?

I've always believed that, whatever you're trying to do in life, it's usually better to go straight to the earliest sources than to adhere to newer interpretations. It's as true with Christianity as it is for copywriting, and I still consider the old Schwartz and Hopkins advertising books to surpass almost everything that's come out since.

I discovered that the students of the Biblical apostles had written down a fair amount of material regarding ancient Christian practice and belief. From that point on, I could never really look at Protestantism in the same light.

After all, why would I follow the doctrines of the 16th century when I could follow the doctrines of the 1st century instead? It simply made no sense to me that someone who didn't personally know Christ or the apostles could have more understanding and insight than the men who did.

Christ gave the apostles pretty specific directions, and Paul taught those traditions to all the churches he planted and visited during his ministry. The students of the apostles upheld the traditions and taught them to their own students, and so on and so forth right up until the present day.

Best of all, Orthodox services feel like being transplanted directly into the ancient Christian world. That sense of reverence, holiness, and solemnity can inspire the soul in a way that electric guitar music simply cannot.

Being surrounded by the Saints is a very humbling experience.

2. It's Untainted By Cultural Marxism

It is not unusual, among Protestant churches, to hear preaching that's fully aligned with Social Justice ideology and the Cultural Marxism that spawned it. This takes on different forms and manifests to different degrees, but it can reach levels that—at its worst—makes the preaching of a church utterly indistinguishable from what you'd hear at a typical liberal arts college.

This is not only revolting to most normal and healthy men, but also tends to result in lower church attendance. It is well-documented that "the more liberal the church, the emptier the pews."

Between the ordination of unrepentant sinners and the preaching of the "prosperity gospel," it is not surprising that Protestantism is losing its core male audience. This is more than a statistic; it is a tragedy.

Scripture tells us, in no uncertain terms, that men are to lead both church and home. With a lack of masculine leadership forming a new generation of young boys into developed and effective leaders, all of society suffers.

However, you will find nothing like these problems in Eastern Orthodoxy. 100% of the clergy are men, and they follow an ancient tradition of hierarchy and rank.

This tradition—for thousands of years—has naturally taught younger men the healthy dynamics of both obedience and command. The fruit of this effort is an endless chain of men who are prepared for their role as leaders in society.

Equally important, there is little to no trace of the Evangelical Zionism which I was already frustrated with before I'd discovered Orthodoxy. Unlike most Protestant denominations, Orthodoxy follows the proper Scriptural understanding that believers in Christ are the true "people of Israel."

In Matthew 16:18, Jesus tells the apostle Peter that "the gates of Hell will not overcome" His Church.

You can decide for yourself whether lesbian Zionists or alpha male patriarchs better represent the Church that Jesus had in mind.

3. It Offers Deeper Theology And A Richer Experience

I am not trying to attack all of Protestantism with this article. I am still friends with the people I met there, and maintain a deep love for my pastors and their passion for God.

I'm profoundly grateful for my experience in the Wesleyan denomination, and I would never be where I am today unless I had learned the basics of Christianity there.

But that's just it… it stops at the basics. Jesus died for your sins, now you're saved, and that's where it ends.

Orthodoxy, drawing on monastic wisdom going back to at least the 4th century, invites the seeker into a deep mystical understanding of God that far surpasses the typical experience.

"Hillsong? Never heard of her."

I'm not going to sit here and tell you that I have any real understanding of the Orthodox mystery, because I have barely even knocked at the door. However, I can feel the power coming from the other side and greatly look forward to exploring it further.

Each day of my studies draws me in deeper and deeper, as new levels of both God's glory—and my own sinfulness by comparison—are revealed to me. It is humbling, it is powerful, and it's a fuller experience than I knew existed just a few short months ago.

Protestants have the appetizer; the Orthodox serve the meal.

If you are ready to deepen your relationship with Jesus Christ or even to start one…the way that all the apostles and their students did…I highly recommend you check out an Orthodox service sometime and examine it for yourself.

The priests are incredibly helpful to inquirers, and several of them have taken the time to guide me towards various resources or respond to my questions via e-mail.

Even if your nearest Orthodox Church is 20 or 30 minutes away, I think it will be worth your time and effort to make it to a Vespers (on Saturday night) or a Divine Liturgy (on Sunday morning) to see if what it offers matches what you're looking for.

God bless and Merry Christmas.

Read Next: The Orthodox Church Is The Answer To Reviving Christianity In Europe And Saving The West

Michael Witcoff

Michael is a copywriter, an author, and a marketing consultant. You can buy his books at his Amazon page here.

4 Common Mistakes Men Make That Lower Their Testosterone

December 29, 2017 | by Andrew Mullins | Link | Original Link

Testosterone is paramount for a healthy male life. It influences your mood, muscle development, and even your sex life. It's the quintessence of masculinity, essentially. Which is why it's your job as a man to make sure your body's testosterone production is in top shape. There are plenty of things to discuss, but let's start with 4 common mistakes that can sink your testosterone levels.

1. Not Getting Enough Sleep

I always find it funny that many guys who want to boost their testosterone levels don't realize how important it is to get plenty of rest. Of course, that's not always a huge surprise. After all, in today's society, staying up late until 3-4AM is very easy to do. All you need is a computer or a mobile device, Internet access, and it's extremely easy to lose track of time.

For some, it doesn't seem like too much of an issue. Hell, some people are even okay with only getting around five or six hours of sleep per night. However, the truth is that doing something like that is likely to have a negative influence on your testosterone levels. In fact, if you were to get only five (or less) hours of sleep per night for a whole week, it would lower your testosterone by up to 15%.

And keep in mind that's just what happens if you do that for one week. Do it for longer and you might just end up with T levels as low as those of a male writer from BuzzFeed.

My recommendation? Try to get at least seven or eight hours of sleep, and try going to bed earlier (around 11PM-12AM). One way to manage that is to avoid exposure to screen lights one or two hours before getting in bed. Try a book instead.

2. Drinking Too Much Green Tea

I'm willing to bet I'm not the only one who's heard how great green tea can be for your health. Not to say that it doesn't have some perks, but I've even had people (some of them gym buffs) tell me that drinking a lot of green tea can actually have a positive impact on testosterone production in the body – because it's so full of antioxidants. As convenient as that sounds, it's just make-believe.

Yes, it's true that antioxidants usually enhance T levels, but remember that only certain types of antioxidants do that. When it comes to green tea, the antioxidant contents vary a lot.

For example, in this study, male rodents were injected with the main antioxidant found in green tea, namely catechin. According to the researchers, the test subjects didn't just experience a significant decrease in testosterone (70%) but — with some subjects — the size of the testicles ended up being reduced by up to 20%.

“Yeah but that study wasn’t run on human males so it might not be accurate.”

I know that’s the first impression you’d get, but consider this: male rodents have an endocrine system that is surprisingly similar to our own. So, I wouldn’t say it’s too “out there” to believe that the results would be the same if the studies were done on human males.

And if that’s not enough, here’s one more thing to keep in mind: Green tea generally contains large quantities of fluoride. The problem with that is that high levels of fluoride can actually damage your testosterone levels pretty badly.

Loading...

Now, I’m not saying you shouldn’t drink green tea at all. Just remember that moderation really is key in this case — the occasional cup won’t harm your T levels too significantly.

3. Wearing Tight Underwear

Most underwear today feels tighter and more constricting than ever. “It’s a fashion choice; it just looks better,” some people might tell you. But the sad truth is that the tighter your underwear is, the more it negatively impacts your body’s testosterone production.

For one, your gonads are squeezed into a tight spot, which means they’ll be exposed to more heat this way. Well, the problem with that is that continuous exposure to high temperatures can lower testosterone levels and even reduce testicular weight.

And again, I know that the study used wistar rats as test subjects, but their testicles are almost identical to ours (if you don’t take the size into account, of course).

That’s not all, though. Since your testicles are being forced into an unnatural position, your scrotum won’t be able to hang normally. As a result, the circulation in your genitals will be hindered. Consequently, it will take longer for your brain's luteinizing hormone (the hormone that stimulates your body's Leydig cells to start producing testosterone) to complete its journey and start synthesizing testosterone.

My advice is to just wear loose underwear every single day. It's more comfortable anyway.

4. Focusing on a Low-Cholesterol Diet

"Wait, what?"

Yeah, I know a lot of people automatically associated cholesterol with man boobs, ruined gains, and – ironically – low T levels. But the reality is far from it.

Thing is, cholesterol is essentially a sterol, and it can be found in pretty much all of your cells. What makes it stand out in this case is the fact that it's a precursor for your hormones (including testosterone). Also, remember the Leydig cells I mentioned previously? They're actually responsible for converting cholesterol into testosterone.

Lastly, here's another tidbit of info you should know: If your cholesterol levels are too low, your liver will automatically start synthesizing it. In case you need more convincing, here's a study that showcases how large amounts of HDL cholesterol have a positive effect on T levels.

So, there's no reason to go with a low-cholesterol diet — it's actually detrimental to your body's testosterone production. It's the intake of polyunsaturated fats (seed oil, oysters, nuts) you'll want to reduce.

Bottom Line

Since testosterone is so important for a man to enjoy a healthy, natural life, it's necessary to do everything in your power to make the right changes. Sure, it might be a bit inconvenient at first for some of you, but you should focus on the long-term goal of living a manly, confident, and happy life.

And if you know of other similar mistakes or practices that lower T levels, be sure to share them with the rest of us.

Read More: 5 Ways To Boost Your Testosterone

Andrew Mullins
Andrew Mullins is an avid follower or healthy lifestyle who's got 12 years of experience in the fitness industry. Currently he's contributing to TestosteroneSite.com and provides actionable advice on increasing your testosterone levels with simple lifestyle and diet changes and natural supplementation.

We’re Living In Kali Yuga, The Age Of Darkness

December 29, 2017 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

With the year coming to an end, many are trying to make sense of all that happened in 2017. Questions like “Where is God?” circled through people’s heads as many wondered how could a benevolent force allow such horrors on earth. Political parties still continue to sell their pitch and point fingers out each other. Greed dominates with corruption, reeking from White House all the way down, and many have lost their way by being brainwashed with feminism, PC, and passiveness.

While there isn’t a one sentence rational explanation for all this, the Vedas has a different answer…

We’re Living In An Age Of Darkness

In Hinduism, there are cycles of spiritual evolution that earth goes through. They are:

- Satya Yuga – Golden Age, basically utopia where there’s no old age or starvation
- Treta Yuga – Third Age, virtue diminishes slightly, birth of emperors and war

- Dvapara Yuga– Siseases rampant, and loss of ancestral knowledge creates hysteria
- Kali Yuga – Dark Age, ignorance, filth, lies, very low life spans

Guess which one we're currently in according to the Vedas? That's right, Kali Yuga! Now it all makes sense doesn't it? The Bible and other religious texts say the same: we are living in an era where everything is upside down, where the materialistic culture reigns supreme.

What Is Kali Yuga?

It is the Dark Age, where man degenerates and moves far away from God. Dharma (morality) becomes nonexistent, and civilization loses itself in indulgence. The ancient world describes it as the age where the moral character of man is low and that lies, cheating, deceit, and corruption take over the earth. Those whom you would think are supposed to be good are now evil.

Scholars calculated that this era began about 3000 BCE. The good news is that after Kali Yuga, Satya Yuga follows, The Golden Age. The bad news is that it's not going to come for several thousands of years. Predictions of Kali Yuga in Vedas were:

- Dangerous rulers who raise taxes and see themselves as superior rather than protectors of society
- Mass migration to other lands where food is available
- No sense of God or spirituality will exist with fake saints, all ancestral knowledge is gone
- Lust, ignorance, animosity towards people, and murder without reason
- People will laugh, criticize, and attack those who are spiritual
- Krishna, the Hindu God, foretells extreme hardship of those with ideals and higher ambitions

Now it is easy to blow this off as nonsense, but the prophecies have found their modern equivalents…

A World With No Reason Or Logic

More and more people are completely lost in consumer addiction, constantly on their phones searching for answers. Materialistic comforts have become a means to an end, and people no longer judge you on who you are, but rather what you are, your profession.

Higher Divorce Rates

Women are no longer interested in being supportive wives, but want global attention. Men are not judged for their faithfulness and character, but for only what's in their bank account. Marriage rates and down and men in Western nations are sexually frustrated thanks to the anti-sexual harassment movement and the push on women to be career minded.

False Idols

Silicon Men commonly found in Silicon Valley have followers converting to trans-humanism, the unspoken religion that forces technology on you even if you live on the ranch and don't need it. God has been replaced by superheroes, celebrities, politicians, and tech giant. Trans-humanism is spreading like a virus, secretly implanting the belief you are not worthy and that only technology can save you from your "sin"—being normal.

Additionally, you have anointed "holy men" who lecture America to take care of immigrants while they themselves put walls on their borders.

Attacks against those with solutions

Individuals and groups who speak out against the corrupt establishment are viciously attacked by the media and rogue agents online. ROK itself has faced violent aggression from those who pretend to be peaceful and for social justice. People have been banned from nations for simply expressing their views while terrorists are welcomed.

Lies

It doesn't stop at the media. There's fake news and fake science, fake politicians, and even fake people. And the illusions don't necessarily come from words, but from life itself. People go to school expecting education, but get indoctrination and political correctness. People vote for candidates who promise change, but they end up being more of the same. People go to doctors to be cured, but only get drugs. People go to the grocery to buy food, but get heavily processed synthetics.

Globalism

There's nowhere to escape from the one universal religion of the world where everyone believes the false preaching of the globalists. While they may not openly announce their intentions directly, they want to micromanage everyone's lives. The government issues higher taxes on the middle class trapping them in a prison, yet they use loopholes to dodge them. They want you to believe that they know what is best for you, and that you're inferior, because you are not a billionaire tycoon.

How To Protect Yourself From Kali Yuga

When Shiva's wife asked what can people do in this era, Shiva said he will reappear and create a new space, a new center of religion and a new state of mind where man can find God. Japa (prayer), meditation, and yoga are recommended, but be careful as yoga has been turned into a pop culture of the downward dog pose.

Shiva can also mean the masculine energy, and with more alternative online spaces like ROK appearing, perhaps his invisible presence is on earth.

How The Gods Dealt With Evil In The Past

Many westerners falsely believe that the gods of Hinduism were passive. Nothing could be further from the truth. Demons were destroyed by their swords, not balloons like in England.

Vishnu, The Preserver, incarnated on earth nearly ten times in multiple forms to destroy many kinds of evil. According to the Vedas, it is his job to preserve the earth during times of extreme suffering. He beheaded demon kings and defeated their armies.

The chakra, a spinning disk, was Vishnu's signature weapon where he would throw it and decapitate his enemies

In his lion headed-form of Narasimha, he tore the evil king to a bloody mess even after he pleaded and begged for forgiveness.

This is the face God shows to evil

As the world continues to devolve, the system many once believed in is now falling apart. If Donald Trump wants to save America and Western civilization, he must begin by turning the tide and stopping the evil before it gains control of every aspect of our lives.

Read More: Are We Living In A Dark Age?

G.S. Luthra

Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info about him visit, GSL Creations

It Was A Nightmare To Return My Apple Airpods After I Discovered They Were Giving Me Headaches

December 29, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

A computer company that refuses to do email. That's what you deal with when you buy from Apple. After a fiasco involving Apple's AirPods spanning nearly half of a year, I think it's worth sharing this story as a fair warning to readers.

Not knowing if and when I would return to the United States this year, I purchased a set of AirPods from a reseller in Eastern Europe at the end of July. Of course, no refunds whatsoever was the store policy. I knew it when I bought it, so no big deal—-though one might question why Apple continues to allow resellers to have these policies in foreign countries as opposed to opening their own stores.

Over the next month of using the AirPods, within ten minutes of use, I had a splitting headache. My head would feel full of pressure, like a bubble about to burst. I'd have spells of dizziness and a feeling of being jetlagged, like I'd just gotten off a plane.

At first, I chalked it up to illness. I saw a doctor who told me everything was all and well. I just couldn't figure out why every day I felt so terrible. It wasn't until I was working in a coffee shop one day. I put my AirPods in, and within a few minutes later, the pressure in my head started. I realized what was ailing me. I pulled them out. The relief wasn't instant, and the headache didn't continue to get worse.

Naturally, I turned to Google and typed in, "Apple Airpods causing pain". I stumbled upon this thread (and various others). I made it a point to not use my AirPods for the next week.

The pressure and splitting headache that had been ailing me for the last month never returned (and still hasn't as of December 2017).

What Could I Do With My AirPods Causing Pain?

I was in a better situation than an actual Eastern European citizen would have been, that's for sure. I didn't even bother trying to go to the reselling store and explain my issue. Instead, I hit up Apple Support on Twitter and asked what I should do.

It was then that the phone tag hell started. You see, Apple specifically trains each and every one of their agents that they are not supposed to write anything down. This gives them plausible deniability to screw the customers over when it becomes convenient.

So every time I got bumped up the chain (the case ended up with Quality Service Engineering), I was forced to get on the phone. I asked repeatedly to just send me an email with what I needed, and instead was always met with the standard, "This would be best handled over a phone call."

Sending Them Back

Turns out that sending them back to Apple from Europe was a nightmare. It wasn't possible for me to just walk them back into the store and have the reseller ship it—-no, Apple wanted me to trek all the way out to DHL in the middle of nowhere (I've written about it before here) to mail them myself. Naturally I told them to pound sand.

Then I'd go a week without getting a reply, until finally I was told, in writing (gasp!) that I would be issued a full refund for my problems. Then, that agent had some health issues pop up, and ghosted me for a week. I decided enough was enough, and opened up a credit card dispute for a faulty product.

Said credit card company decided in this case that there was nothing they could do. They sent me back to Apple. By then, I'd booked a flight home to California for the holidays. I figured I'd be able to walk into the nearest Apple store there and just wash my hands of them, and get my money back.

Of Course It's Not That Easy

Since I was crossing a border, I was informed my case would need to go to a new department—-"Customer Relations". Except, Customer Relations decided to light a torch to our relationship.

Despite having, in writing, that I'd be issued a full refund, that team told me it would no longer be possible. Instead, I'd be offered:

1. A store credit of the retail US price of the AirPods. They refused to give me a credit for the price I paid in Europe (the difference is about $75), on the spot.

2. An appeasement "gift"—-basically, Apple would ship me a new pair of headphones of my choice, I could then "return" those headphones for a store credit. This would require me to hand them in to the store, wait 3-5 business days, and then go back to the store to return them.

3. If I was willing to wait several weeks, a refund—-again, for the US price.

I was unable to get any of this in actual writing because of Apple's phone call policy, so you'll just have to take my word on it.

The Finale

Long story short: I went into the store, and actually met a couple of very helpful Apple employees who sent me home with a store credit for $300—more than the $225 I paid for the AirPods originally. I turned around and sold that gift card for $284.

Now, let me admit something: I was an idiot. I should have just chucked them in the trash many months ago.

The most frustrating thing is that every step along the way, it seemed to me that we were just “one step away” from getting it resolved. In hindsight, I can easily see that this was not worth my time at all. I would have been better off using the AirPods as extra firewood this holiday season.

I don’t think my AirPods were actually defective—-I simply think that the fit of them caused me some serious problems. I also think I’m probably not alone in this, but in any case, what’s done is done. It’ll be the last pair of Apple headphones I ever use, and I’m rueing having bought an iPad earlier in the year.

What’s done is done. Just heed this as a warning if you ever have to deal with Apple on a higher level than basic customer support. It’s probably not worth the headache.

Want to build your own business? Check out Pro Niche Site, my free 6-video workshop. For advice about dating abroad, check out my podcast.

Read Next: Millennial College Graduates May Never Own Their Own Homes

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

She’s Too Busy For You

December 30, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My latest video explains why you shouldn’t chase girls who disrespect the effort you put in when you ask them out.

Loading...
If you received value from this video, consider supporting my work by buying one of my books at Roosh V Store or making a donation through the Roosh Boosters Club. I also appreciate donations via Bitcoin, Litecoin, Bitcoin Cash, or Monero.

- Bitcoin: 15nepsskTk3yw4XXG68WRgZSvbXFN59Mh5
- Litecoin: LL5XXBi5kuWNTd9Hhn33UY4Fp4FtknFkWi
- Bitcoin Cash: 1BeTknucfpGDjwn89YE3yc1p8gVkPkptwo
- Monero: 4JaeEnpkiVYc4iVhnPd3Jj87EsrSzq3ZQ1ZfpA3n3MaR8E Moj11dtngWE7kuZ3ZhyVGPtR7979LgqiHqXw5xdC43foD9DM5ZLXWCzeoLty

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them on the blog.

Previous Video: Don’t Follow A Girl’s Lead

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at

RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Things I Learned In 2017

December 31, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

In the below video, I explain four things I learned in 2017.

If you received value from this video, consider supporting my work by buying one of my books at Roosh V Store or making a donation through the Roosh Boosters Club. I also appreciate donations via Bitcoin, Litecoin, Bitcoin Cash, or Monero.

- Bitcoin: 15nepsskTk3yw4XXG68WRgZSvbXFN59Mh5
- Litecoin: LL5XXBi5kuWNTd9Hhn33UY4Fp4FtknFkWi
- Bitcoin Cash: 1BeTknucfpGDjwn89YE3yc1p8gVkPkptwo
- Monero: 4JaeEnpkiVYc4iVhnPd3Jj87EsrSzq3ZQ1ZfpA3n3MaR8E Moj11dtngWE7kuZ3ZhyVGPtR7979LgqiHqXw5xdC43foD9DM5ZLXWCzeoLty

Visit my Youtube channel and hit the Subscribe button to see new clips before I drop them on the blog.

Previous Video: She's Too Busy For You

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at

RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Berlin Establishes New Year's Eve "Safe Zones" To Stop Vibrant Migrants From Raping Women

December 31, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The German arm of the Red Cross, an organization designed to deal with the aftermath of wars and famines in Africa, is currently needed to protect women in Berlin. Female-only "safe zones" were erected in Germany's capital for New Year's Eve celebrations, particularly in and around the world-renowned Brandenburg Gate.

Of course, the move has been presented as a means of keeping women safe from "all" men in the terrible white patriarchy of modern Western Europe. The ever-growing elephant in the room, Germany's rampant rape culture amongst migrants and fake refugees, was not addressed when these plans were publicized. What a surprise!

Unable to maintain law and order, the Berlin police force is relying on charity associations to supervise public safety and prevent serious, violent sexual assaults.

Remember the old days?

Remember when the Red Cross used to focus on starving kids in Africa?

What happened to the Red Cross making the news for its activities in war-torn failed states or when responding to the plight of millions in the Third World at risk of starvation? Well, cultural enrichment through open borders migration into Europe came along.

One third of the prisoners in German jails are "foreign," a group that is overwhelmingly Arab, North African, or African and usually taken from pre-2015 arrivals. The non-German percentage of incarcerated felons is actually much higher when non-ethnic Germans without foreign citizenships are counted. Red Cross workers will be more busy still when the newer waves of migrants since 2015 start interacting with the criminal justice system.

One of my colleagues recently wrote about Sweden's similarly lopsided rape culture; a monumental 82% of rapes there are committed by migrants. Not even the criminalization of harmless male behavior, like consensual sex with prostitutes, and other draconian legal redefinitions have been able to increase the proportion of ethnic Swedes engaged in "sex crimes." Rather, migrants are well and truly punching above their weight in this regard.

It is hard to decide what is worse–Swedish police refusing to police in certain migrant-dominated urban areas or a disaster relief organization having to save German women from Angela Merkel's violent guests, including right in the center of Berlin's principal tourist precinct.

Can Berlin's (or Europe's) police do anything about this?

They can’t do anything, nor should we necessarily blame them.

Police in Cologne, which is part of the more conservative German state of Nordrhein-Westfalen, were exposed for their powerlessness in the face of the infamous migrant sex attacks there two years ago. Operational readiness and political will in Berlin and other more pozzed German cities are worse. Arab organized crime members are said to have infiltrated both Berlin law enforcement and other agencies of its city-state government. To say the situation is parlous is an understatement.

Alexanderplatz, another area of central Berlin that was once safe (and where I enjoyed many fine times myself), is now a cesspool for crime, even according to the perennially leftist state broadcaster Deutsche Welle. Drugs are bought and sold in the open and with impunity, mostly by minorities, with police far too apprehensive about exercising their responsibilities to serve and protect. Perhaps understandably, officers are more scared of the criminals than the reverse, all while lacking the support of politicians who have the luxury of armed bodyguards to help them forget about Germany’s exploding levels of crime.

Bear in mind that this is the capital city of Europe’s most powerful country. Smaller, especially Slavic countries may be more nationalistic, but it’s a sign of an intense social and political sickness that the continent’s wealthiest society has been brought to its knees. Merely being a female member of a crowd in Germany necessitates a charity keeping you safe from migrant sexual abuse.

Nothing will change until the real problem is addressed

Cultural enrichment writ large.

With authorities already “teaching” mollycoddled migrants how not to rape, a demand for personal responsibility and an acknowledgment of statistical realities are clearly not going to characterize official responses to soaring foreign crime rates in Germany. And if charities like the Red Cross are becoming involved with warding off criminals because police are overwhelmed and/or reluctant to help, regular European citizens are unfortunately going to have to protect themselves.

I am sure we can all look forward to many New Year’s Eve celebrations in Germany and elsewhere where the Red Cross and comparable organizations are the last line of defense for combating sexual assault and rape by migrants.

Read More: 3 Reasons Why European Women Should Welcome More Migrants

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

French Feminists Say Women Are Smaller Because Men Conspired Against Them

December 31, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

On December 8, as I was musing on the computer before starting some usual Chris Pratt workout training, a strange video popped up on my Facebook feed. French outlet L'Obs, another mainstream left-leaning media, featured a short-haired womyn of Arab origin who explained sexual dimorphism—the height/weight difference between men and women—by saying that "men took over food and systematically deprived women of it."

Admittedly, L'Obs published the video with the tag "Opinion—a hundred per cent cut" and an indicated quote as a resume, as if they were reluctant to suggest that this explanation matches their own position. But other French MSM outlets were not so precautious. Libération, a mostly Rothschild-owned Parisian version of the Guardian, as well as the public radio France Info, both promoted the theory as an established truth.

As ignorant of basic biology as it is, this "women are petite because they were harmed by men" theory is one of the latest ammo used by the French bourgeois bohemian foot soldiers in their war against masculinity and men. Several media, all influential and mostly State-funded—yep, in France the MSM receive millions of euros from the State, who tries to hide the real numbers—have been promoting the theory as legitimate while opposing absolutely no criticism or even the least tint of critical thought.

These media have been coordinating just as their North American counterparts did when they tagged one of Trump's speeches as "dark" or went after gamers. Now the theory is so ridiculous many bourgeois bohemians rail at it in the comments sections, yet none of them dare to trace the evil back to its root, and the whole case shows how extreme the MSM has become, to the point of forgetting both basic science and basic respect for promoting accusatory leftism.

A Lysenkoist view of sexual dimorphism

Trofim Denisovich Lysenko (1898-1976)

"Lysenkoism"

- developed a doctrine, compounded of Darwinism and the work of Michurin, that heredity can be changed by good husbandry.
- As director of the Institute of Genetics of the Soviet Academy of Sciences (1940–65), he declared the accepted Mendelian theory erroneous, and ruthlessly silenced any Soviet geneticists who opposed him.
- He was dismissed by Khrushchev in 1965, having gravely hampered scientific and agricultural progress in the USSR.

Genetic science is clear: what runs through generations is genes. If acquired characters can be transmitted, this remains marginal, and nothing acquired can be maintained if there is no genetic basis behind. Genes are a more fundamental level of reality and tend to change at a much slower pace than culture, let alone fads. It is also well-known that some characteristics, like height, ab shape, collarbones size, and even the dimensions of the brain stem mostly, if not entirely, from gene expression. Female hypergamy is known to have been selected by evolution, too.

Real science can adequately explain what we see. But it also flies in the face of those promoting the idea that individuals are carbon copies where an omnipotent deity called "culture" could write anything.

Marxism has a long story of denying and evilizing human differences. In fact, it went so far at trying to destroy the complex substance of reality through make-believe it once denied genetics even beyond humans. In the 1930s Soviet apparatchik Trofim Lyssenko openly stated that genetics were incompatible with Communism and had to be rejected. He pretended to have invented "vernalization", a method to multiply wheat production by tinkering with temperature. "See, it's all in the environment!"

In fact, Lyssenko's method only obtained marginal improvements in agriculture—so marginal they could be safely attributed to sheer randomness. However, the truth had no right over Soviet ideology. Lysenkoism became part of the mainstream Soviet position.

Lyssenko headed the Academy of Agriculture, branded regular geneticists and scientists as racist jensenist supremacist “counter-revolutionary” and “reactionary”, and had Stalin deport them to the gulag.

Here we are witnessing the same phenomena applied to human sexual dimorphism. Genetics are denied, it is supposed false that everyone and everything were the same, and that differences are both bad and to blame on someone.

In 2005, a “social anthropology” student, Priscille Touraille, defended her thesis where she claimed that sexual dimorphism was “not natural” but created by “a thousand-year old venture of social categorization called gender.” Her main adviser, Françoise Héritier, is a denier of nature who was picked by Jewish anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss to enforce a constructionist/deconstructionist view of humans. Seems legit.

Muh gender!

As for Touraille’s doctoral dissertation, it could be described as a heap of falsities, sophisms and irregular extrapolations mixed with postmodernist logorrhea.

For example, it is claimed that, had evolution happened naturally, it would have selected taller and stronger women, as these are obvious advantages. Or are they? A smaller body is less expensive to maintain than a bigger one. Also, if your biological mission consists in giving birth, being fatter is advantageous as you have to sustain your baby—something men only did indirectly by hunting or growing food.

It is also claimed that in most mammal species females are bigger than males, which is false. All in all, Touraille clearly misunderstood the very nature of evolutionary pressures. Had she understood these right, she would also have grasped the obvious advantage of specialization, with women being selected to be better than men at motherhood—not to be taller or stronger—as this benefits both genes and tribes.

No biologist, nutritionist or actual scientist has evaluated Touraille's dissertation. The panel was entirely filled with female social constructionists. Touraille was awarded a Ph.D, then two public prizes, which respectively claim to reward "thesis works… able to influence our scientific, economic and social environment" (leftwards of course) and to promote "gender equality policies"—in other words, poisonous blue-pill crap, not truth.

The absurdity of Touraille's theory should be obvious. If women's smaller physique does not come from genetic causes, it must have been caused by men taking over food and letting less calories to women. This contradicts the idea of women being locked up in the kitchen, as food tends to be stored there—an idea feminists used for decades just like others used muh slavery and muh holocaust—and also supposes that all men, at all places and times, have been spontaneously conspiring to keep the food to themselves.

This misandric accusation should seem too absurd to be serious. How do you prove such a conspiracy? How do you even explain it, especially when you deny genetics? Yet the French mainstream media seem oblivious to the obvious and promote a hallucinated accusation against an entire sex. Neither coherence nor epistemological modesty, not to mention empirical evidence, are a rule as long as you keep berating and de-humanizing men. Leftists do not do research—they consider no alternative or only so and keep rewriting history according to an a priori given narrative.

Top-down promotion

Priscille Touraille

Touraille turned her dissertation into a book in 2008. It never made it into scientific reviews. Indeed, sexual dimorphism has long been noticed by biologists and evolutionary scientists, and the evidence weights unambiguously on the side of natural selection and genetics. So, instead of making it into real science, the men-caused-women's-smaller-physique-because-all-men-are-evil theory was promoted by the System with no scientist around to give it the refutation it deserves.

After Touraille was awarded two prizes in 2007, her theory served as the backbone of a video documentary realized by two Jews, Véronique Kleiner, and Didier Deleskiewicz, both paid with the taxpayers' money. The documentary was shown in 2013 on the French-German public TV channel Arte. As an astute critique noted:

> The documentary features a number of specialists in biology, paleoanthropology and endocrinology. However, none of them truly supports the theory. Scientists answer to general questions about sexual dimorphism and parts of their answers are exhibited throughout the film. The magic of editing creates an illusion of scientific consensus, all under the patronage of [feminist adviser] Françoise Héritier, who speaks a lot. And the cherry on the cake—the voice-over was made by Sophia Aram [an anti-white French media figure of Arab descent].

Didier Deleskiewicz and Véronique Kleiner

In 2015, Touraille published a cosigned article together with other gender-believers in an "anthropologist" review. There she presented her theory, not as a hypothesis, but as an established truth. "The idea… according to which men need more protein than women… [is] false as demonstrated by the most recent findings in nutrition sciences", she says. What findings? Here Touraille quotes her own dissertation as her sole "nutrition sciences" reference. I doubt that an unclear and hallucinated "gender" has anything to see with sexual dimorphism, but leftist autism seems to be a very real phenomenon.

Then, in 2017, the short-haired Arab girl I mentioned at the beginning published a book to say exactly what Touraille and other public-funded genderists said before, although with a bit less lingo. Then the media coordinated to promote said book lavishly. Oh, the evil patriarchy rewarding absurd misandric bullshit!

A couple of months after the book was published, adviser Françoise Héritier was complacently interviewed by Le Monde. There she spoke of "eradicating… masculine desire", confused dimorphism with dismorphism and inferred incorrectly from an established social practice the nonexistence of genetic causes. Her interview also had that smug, full of hot air, and border demented-tone which has become so commonplace among media liberals.

Beyond the smokescreen of postmodern lingo, the theory even fails at being precise:

> What were women deprived of by men for millennia exactly? We don't know for sure. If you compare Priscille Touraille's, Nora Bouazzouni's and Françoise Héritier's versions, the answer changes from one interview to another. Sometimes iron deficiencies are held responsible for the artificial smallness of feminine bodies, sometimes the blame falls on protein or fat deficiencies. Sometimes it is claimed that women suffer primarily from being petite, sometimes it is rather said that the lack of muscles or strength or bone mass are the substantial part. It doesn't matter much anyway. (Source)

The only fake news around is leftist ideology

The theory of deprivation caused by men was not created on the basis of empirical evidence and with the aim of competing fairly with established theory, but invented as an article of fashion or influence and forced top-down on and by the media lackeys crowd. It looks like many other theories made up by leftists during the last century: these are vague, contradict each other, owe their success to fashion or pressure, and are all deemed socially normal because they are ammo for Cultural Marxism.

Charles Murray's classic The Bell Curve noticed that true anthropological science was stable because it was based on a solid body of observation, measures, and consistent views on heritability. Leftist "anthropology" and thought only has an abundance of contradictory theories, empty words, social pressure and failed policies, but whenever a leftist recognizes that facts don't side with her, she still defends her ideology on the grounds that it is well-intended.

Is erasing and demonizing differences a good intention? Is creating weaponized social groups, a culture of resentment, a perpetual political war and killing whitey fair or moral at all? Is destroying the family unit, creating unmanly men and unwomanly women, both severed from their core, laudable? Leftism is neither moral nor true. And it needs a taste of its own medicine.

If we live in a "post-truth era", as some mainstream pundits said, this comes from Leftism and the MSM. It is leftism that constantly imposed its own ideology over knowledge and its own criteria of judgment (political correctness) and expression over regular social norms. And here it is also mainstream Leftism that pushes its denial of biology to the point of blaming men for sexual dimorphism.

Thankfully, Lysenkoism died, and perhaps one day we'll be free of this bullshit circus too.

Read Next: Special Snowflake Lashes Out At Oxford University For Not Accomodating Her Made-Up Disabilities

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

New Year’s Day Call-In Live Stream At 2PM EST

January 1, 2018 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I’ll be doing a live-stream today at 2pm EST on YouTube.

Here are call-in details…

USA Dial-in Number: (641) 715-0873
Access Code: 805890#

International numbers:

Loading...
Afghanistan: +93 72 989 0516, Albania: +355 4 454 1732, Algeria: +213 98 221 05 23, Argentina: +54 341 527-2967, Australia: +61 3 8672 0152, Austria: +43 1 2650513, Bahrain: +973 6500 9114, Belgium: +32 3 294 10 01, Brazil: +55 51 4042-1934, Bulgaria: +359 2 495 1543, Cambodia: +855 96 696 7757, Chile: +56 44 890 9262, Colombia: +57 6 7334267, Costa Rica: +506 4000 3925, Croatia: +385 1 8000 064, Cyprus: +357 77 788861, Czech: +420 225 852 061, Denmark: +45 78 77 25 36, Dominican Republic: +1 829-239-8024, Estonia: +372 614 8076, Finland: +358 9 74790085, France: +33 7 55 51 14 15, Georgia: +995 706 777 082, Germany: +49 221 98203431, Guatemala: +502 2458 1414, Hungary: +36 1 987 6817, Iceland: +354 539 0325, Ireland: +353 1 437 2299, Israel: +972 55-966-1011, Italy: +39 051 092 0280, Japan: +81 3-5050-5067, Kenya: +254 20 7653251, Kosovo: +381 38 413932, Latvia: +371 67 881 767, Lithuania: +370 46 268634, Luxembourg: +352 20 30 10 94, Malawi: +265 212 342 018, Malaysia: +60 11-1146 0032, Mexico: +52 899 274 8204, Netherlands: +31 6 35205052, New Zealand: +64 6-928 7520, Nigeria: +234 1 440 5252, Norway: +47 21 93 53 43, Pakistan: +92 21 37130638, Panama: +507 838-7848, Poland: +48 22 116 80 16, Portugal: +351 21 114 3134, Romania: +40 31 780 7023, Russian Federation: +7 499 371-06-82, Singapore: +65 3138 9223, Slovakia: +421 2/336 633 07,

Slovenia: +386 1 828 03 22, South Africa: +27 87 825 0127, South Korea: +82 70-7686-0600, Spain: +34 857 80 11 01, Sri Lanka: +94 11 5 896974, Sweden: +46 8 124 105 78, Switzerland: +41 44 595 90 54, Taiwan: +886 985 646 958, Tanzania: +255 41 120 1025, Turkey: +90 212 988 1741, Ukraine: +380 94 711 0808, United Kingdom: +44 330 998 1210, United States: +1 641-715-0873

Here's last week's stream in case you missed it…

Don't Miss: 4 Things I Learned In 2017

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Make Return Of Kings Great Again And Get Paid Doing So

January 1, 2018 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The past year has been rough for ROK. First, we were banned from just about every banner advertising network in existence, causing us to rely on less desirable pop-up ads. Secondly, we were banned from Paypal, which halted the donations you send us, an important source of operating revenue. I've had to let go ROK's editor, Winston Smith, and offer less compensation to existing writers. One result of that is having to rely more on syndicated news articles that are not written in the ROK spirit.

You can't use PayPal anymore

At PayPal, we value a safe community for our customers to do business. We noticed activity in your account that's inconsistent with our User Agreement and we no longer offer you PayPal services.

Any bank or credit card information linked to your PayPal account cannot be removed nor can it be used to create a new account. You can still log in and see your account information but you can't send or receive money. Any money in your balance will be held for 180 days, after which we'll send you an email with instructions about transferring your money.

Perhaps the biggest blow was getting shut down by Disqus. Overnight, hundreds of people we've banned in the past were allowed to comment again and spew their filth. Only now am I starting to get a handle on the trolling issue.

An additional trend that has been impacting ROK is the gradual shift from self-improvement and game to political activism (alt right/lite) and personal inaction (MGTOW, herbivore lifestyle, game shaming, etc.). For some men, it has become too hard to improve their station in life or pursue women, so they reject the core principles of active masculinity that we focus on.

It also doesn't help that ROK, with over 5,000 articles published, has written about almost every topic under the sun. My occasional approval of Jew or race-baiting articles has become a crutch to satisfy a restless crowd, but at the cost of bringing in a type of reader who obsessively wants to only talk about Jews and black people.

Nonetheless, I still get numerous supportive email messages a month from men who share how much of a positive influence ROK has been on their lives. Here's a recent example:

> Hi. I wanted to thank you for the red pill. A long-time friend introduced me to the Manosphere about two years ago. My only regret is that is was not around 20 years ago. I know from following you online that it is a hard road for you to travel, but like any ideal who's time has come there will be resistance at first until the brilliance of the innovation is realized. You have been a game changer for me and I thank you!
>
> For instance, I met a clerk at Walmart he was morbidly obese. All I said was visit returnofkings.com. I forgot about it until four months later when he thanked me. He had lost 80 lbs already. It wasn't me, it was you, that did that. One at a time > your message will get out and win. Keep the faith. And thanks so much for showing me the light!

I've put a lot of blood, sweat, and tears since forming ROK in October 2012 to make it the best web site in existence for masculine men. I think I've achieved that goal, but its direction is no longer entirely in my hands. The power is yours to make ROK the site you want by contributing an article that contains your experiences, stories, knowledge, opinions, or soul, all in a way that can inspire other men to live better.

For every guest article you submit and I accept during the month of January, I will send you a $10 payment bonus via Litecoin, a popular cryptocurrency (amount will be determined at the time payment is sent according to the spot price on CoinMarketCap).

Submit your article

Use our submissions page to submit your article by January 31 to be eligible for the $10 bonus. Here are some tips on how to submit an article that I am likely to accept:

- Article should be between 700-1100 words.
- Pick a well-defined topic. It's better to be narrow in focus than wide since you are limited by word count.
- Keep the structure simple: (1) opening paragraph with clear thesis statement that gets the reader interested, (2) main paragraphs with at least three supporting anecdotes, opinions, observations, lessons, or facts, and (3) concluding paragraph that sums it all up.
- Get to the main point quickly. Ramble after you've stated your thesis, not before.
- Try to add at least one anecdote or story about your life to give your article a personal touch. This allows readers to connect with what you're saying.
- Potential topic ideas: rare dating niches, foreign women, data sheet on a metropolitan city, data sheet on a specific career, misbehaving women, how to make money, masculine hobbies, dating success or failure stories, interesting book reviews, and picture collages of cultural decline. No Jew/race articles.

When you're ready to submit, go to our submissions page. It has more details such as your ability to use a pseudonym. Remember to proofread your article! There is no limit to how many you can submit.

I will personally review all submissions. If you don't get a response within a week, your article was rejected. If your article is almost up to standard, I will give guidance on how to improve it.

Get paid in crypto

After your article goes live, you'll have instructions on how to invoice me with your Litecoin public address so that I can pay you by the 10th of the following month. For example, if you invoice me in January for an article that went live that month, you will get paid by February 10. If you invoice me in February, you will get paid by March 10. You're also eligible for this bonus if you're an existing guest contributor who already has a writer's account.

To receive payment in Litecoin, you need to create a Litecoin wallet. You can install a wallet on your desktop computer or on your mobile phone. Since we're dealing with such a small amount of money, you don't need to go crazy with security.

Desktop Wallet

For desktop users, I recommend Electrum Litecoin Wallet, which I personally use.

- Run the software.
- Create a new "Standard" wallet.

- Choose the option “Create a new seed.”
- Write down and safely store your 12-word seed. It’s the only way you can recover your wallet in the future.
- Confirm your 12-word seed on the next screen by typing it in.
- Set a password to protect your wallet (optional).
- When the program loads, click the Addresses tab to see a list of all your public addresses which you can share to allow you to receive Litecoin. For example, here is what my Litecoin address looks like: LL5XXBi5kuWNTd9Hhn33UY4Fp4FtknFkWi

Mobile Wallet

For Android users, I recommend the Coinomi Wallet, which allows you to store over a dozen different currencies and exchange between them using two external services.

- Download and install Coinomi from their official website. Be careful with spoof websites when it comes to crypto.
- Click “+ COINS” to add a Litecoin wallet.
- Open your Litecoin wallet and click the Receive tab.
- Copy the address at the top of your screen.

If you have an iPhone, your best option is Loaf Wallet, which is maintained by the Litecoin Foundation.

Here’s to a great year!

I look forward to seeing your submissions in the upcoming days. Understand that I don’t have substantially more control over the direction of ROK than you do. While I have the power to screen which articles get published, if no article is submitted by readers, there is no ROK, unlike my personal blog whose fate I completely control.

For the month of January, I hope you submit the type of article that inspires other men not only to take action in their own lives, but to submit future articles which start a chain reaction of inspiration and motivation. For every unit of value you give to the community, I’m confident you’ll receive far more back.

ROK is completely what you make of it, and to give you an extra push, I will be parting with some of my Litecoin, and who knows, that $10 may be worth significantly more in a year or two.

Read Next: How To Become A More Persuasive Writer By Channeling Homer

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Ann Coulter Reveals That She Is Experiencing Pain As A Childless Woman

January 1, 2018 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Most of the time, celebrities put up a false front. The image they want to project is that their lives are interesting, fulfilling, and involve stimulating relationships with other popular people. But every now and then, a celebrity lets the mask slip. This is exactly what happened to conservative pundit Ann Coulter when she criticized Senator Marco Rubio's support for increasing the child tax credit.

> We singles live empty lives of quiet desperation and will die alone. Now Rubio is demanding that we also fund happy families with children who fill their days with joy.
>
> — Ann Coulter (@AnnCoulter) December 15, 2017

Basically, Ann's point is that single people shouldn't be forced to fund married people having children, but what she inadvertently revealed is that she has some unhappiness at facing the prospect of being a childless spinster.

It is easier for men

Both men and women are affected by the possibility of being childless. But let’s face it, women have the shorter end of the stick in this case.

As a man, you are able to sire children up until you die unless an accident or health issue precludes that possibility. A few years back there was a story of a Chinese warlord who sired a child with a concubine when he was in his late 80s.

Women, on the other hand, are much more limited. Women are able to become mothers up until they hit menopause. The average age for menopause is 51, although some women begin to experience it in their 30s. Even though a woman may not be in menopause, the longer a woman waits, the more difficult it becomes to conceive a child. A woman’s likelihood in getting pregnant peaks in her early 20s. By the time she is in her early 40s, a woman has only a 36 percent change of getting pregnant.

Many women are delaying having children with the idea that advances in medical technology will make up for the decrease in fertility as they age. Unfortunately, fertility treatments are expensive and not as foolproof as we’d like to imagine. Many couples wake away bitterly disappointed.

But just because men have a longer window doesn’t mean you should delay indefinitely. The idea is not to just spread your DNA. Rather, you want to establish a legacy. To do that, you will want to raise children. To do that you need to be around for their formative years between birth and 18. Starting when you are a 90-year-old warlord, while it may be fun, would result in your wife (or concubine) raising your children. That makes it less likely that you will pass on your beliefs and wisdom.

The sweet spot for fathering children is probably in your late twenties or early thirties. That way, you will still have the energy to chase your kids when they are small, but you still stand a good chance to see your grandchildren to further cement your legacy.

Loading...

A path for single men

Getting married and having children is the best way to ensure you have a legacy. But I need to be honest: not everyone is going to get married. It could be because of a physical defect or because there are just not any suitable spouses available. Many men find themselves in the latter position today. They are able to provide for a wife and children but there are no suitable women available. Should these men just give up and resign themselves to an empty life?

The black pill may be tempting but it is always a mistake to take it. Life can be fulfilling even without a wife and children. In some ways, it can be better. If a man marries poorly, his wife can make his life a living hell by nagging or cheating on him. And modern divorce laws are stacked against men. A man can invest years into building a legacy for his children only to have his wife destroy it all after watching Eat, Pray, Love. Better to be single and happy that to be married to a scold or a slut.

So how does a single man achieve happiness and create a legacy for the future? There are three paths.

The first way is to become involved in the lives of your nephews and nieces, or other children in your family. My wife has an aunt who is a spinster. She has made a point of staying very close to my children, who consider her another grandmother. This has made my wife and me closer to her as well—we have sort of become the children she never had.

A second way is to benefit your community by becoming a great leader in the military, politics, medicine, academia, or industry. To help your community in a big way requires dedication and any family man is going to have competing factors on his time. But a single man will be able to throw himself into any endeavor with all of his might. Take that military leader General George Patton: would his greatness have been possible if he had a wife and children at home?

The third way of leaving a legacy was obvious in the past but is the path less taken today—that of dedicating one's life to religion. St. Paul promised that those who have given up wives and children for the sake of the gospel would not fail to receive many more spiritual children in return. In the early church, men who dedicated their lives to Christ were regarded as God's shock troops. Becoming a priest or monk is only for men who have faith. For those who do, it can be a way to become part of a much greater mission to change the world for the better while also participating in a community that will be there to take care of you in your old age.

Conclusion

A life as a carefree bachelor can be very fulfilling in the short to mid-term but it carries a big downside in that you run the risk of establishing no permanent bonds. As one ages and comes to face his ultimate destiny—death awaits us all—he naturally wants to have that sense of connection to something greater than himself. Having children is a way to experience this connection.

Read More: Will You Pay The Bill For The Coming Spinster Bubble?

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

What It Takes To Learn A New Language

January 1, 2018 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Depending on a variety of preferences and circumstances, to learn several languages is highly beneficial at best and time-consuming yet frustrating at worst. While ROK rightly has stressed that some generally may be more relevant than others (for instance, Spanish likely beats Arabic and Manadarin), I will not go into that specific debate here.

Instead I will convey a little about my own experiences of learning three different languages (besides English) and what efforts that underlie such a process. Hopefully that will provide a more realistic and nuanced understanding of what it takes to master, or at least significantly learn another tongue.

Norwegian

One of the main aspects of learning a different language is the level of similarity in comparison to your own mother tongue. As a Swede, Norwegian is very similar in just about every way that concerns grammar and vocabulary. Roughly 90% of all written words are so similar in spelling and meaning that a Swede (or Dane) understands them, and Swedes seldom experience difficulties regarding the spoken language either.

Yet there are differences that sometimes cause misunderstandings, for instance a larger degree of diphthongs (a sound formed by the combination of two vowels in a single syllable). That is why those Swedes who live closer to the Norwegian border find it easier to understand spoken Norwegian.

In any case, an average Swede understands the bulk of Norwegian, and once he moves there and get accustomed to the 10% of words that are completely different from Swedish he can be linguistically integrated. I have studied Norwegian and Danish for a very limited time and it was obvious that I could learn it even better than German.

German

As for German, I studied it between the ages of 13-18, in elementary school and high school, and then read a number of academic works in German between 2009-2012. The latter, of course, helped me to widen my vocabulary beyond the basics.

Before my last visit in a predominantly German-speaking country, Switzerland, I studied it for a few hours and while I was there I tried to speak it with my girlfriend and people whom I met, in conjunction with looking for all of those words online that I was keen on learning or had forgot.

Although I had to struggle a bit with all of the new words, and parts of the grammar are a bit arduous to deal with, I found the process rather easy and frictionless. In part that is because Swedish and German are fairly similar, about as similar as German and English, although not as similar as Norwegian.

German and English are somewhat more alike in a grammatical sense, as both are part of the Western-Germanic branch of the Indo-European language tree, but due to the large share and number of borrowings from German between particularly 1100-1350, and later also during the 19th century, Swedes have a slight lexical advantage.

Loading...

Korean

Korean, the only Oriental language that I have learned in depth, is definitely another kettle of fish than the relatively similar Germanic languages. Korean is often categorized as a rather unique Altaic language, only slightly similar to Japanese, and completely different from Mandarin. Only the large share of borrowings makes it “related” to Chinese, but the latter is a Sino-Tibetan language which has no affinities with neither Korean nor Japanese.

While I was working part-time I had the opportunity to study Korean full-time at univeristy, which is entirely for free in the part of Europe where I was living. My schedule was tough as the pace of learning was high, completely different from the slow tempo so common in high school. With the combination of lots of self-learning and amazing native Korean teachers, I could learn more than 5,000 words and phrases within a year and have a simple conversation with another student (or attractive Korean girls in their 20s).

I then continued with intermediate level, learning roughly 10,000 more words and more complex grammar, before I had to stop. I then bought some of the more advanced text books, listened to K-pop, and visited South Korea for almost a month. I approached a lot and had a romance with a girl whom I talked to in Korean a lot. Now I can quit for a while and then continue to study when I have available time and am motivated, but since Korean is much less automated than the Germanic languages it's always a struggle.

Underlying factors and tips

Psychologists like Arthur Jensen and Richard Lynn have shown that the combination of intelligence, opportunity and motvation (or concientiousness) leads to varying degrees of achievements in just about every field. To learn languages is no different. Some have an aptitude for such pursuits, often linked to verbal intelligence, and some don't.

For men in general, who neither are linguistic geniuses nor borderline retarded, opportunity, diligence and motivation matter a lot. For that reason, combined with how similar a specific language is, you should probably focus on one or two relatively similar languages, like German and Spanish, and only deal with a vastly different such like Korean or Russian if you really have time.

Of course, things are not black or white, and sometimes just a couple of words and phrases during a vacation give something in return, but I would not consider that as by any means to have actually learned the language. For a man to do so, he must study it thoroughly, and mix it with lots of real life conversation. If you don't attend at a university, then at least buy the same literature as they use, start with a beginners book, and then continue with intermediate in due time. Forget about learning a language in one week and such nonsense. It's often hard, given that it's not very similar to begin with.

For more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: 9 Languages Men Should Consider Learning

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

The Inglorious Death Of The West

January 2, 2018 | by Michael Majalahti | Link | Original Link

We have obviously come to the end of the West and Western civilization as we know it. No longer does it take a sociological "expert" or someone with a university degree to argue the point. Now it's apparent all across the board. Our Western culture, whatever that even is anymore, is fastly disappearing and dying. And we're letting it happen without even putting up a fight. This, I argue, will be to our own deserved demise.

We need to take a cold, hard look at what has led the West down the road of cultural ruin. After all, we're only getting what we've ordered not too long ago.

Nietzsche the Prophet

I steadfastly argue that the single greatest factor that has led the west into the shitstorm it is now faced with is the abolishment of God and its resignation from all things even remotely Christian. Simply, we became inconvenienced with and ashamed of God and His statues regarding how we ought to orchestrate our lives. Even after the founding fathers of the West chose God-fearing, Biblical statutes to orient the ethical direction of the free world, we chose to balk at the freedoms and blessings afforded us under its banner and umbrella. Excuse my bluntness, but what the fuck?

What the hell was the big problem to begin with, that our Western society had to get rid of God and become so secular? Was it the allure of all things dark, forbidden, and sinful, much like the tempting apple in the Garden of Eden? Or was it just rotten, base human nature that tends to fuck up everything it's given unless its spiritual self wakes up and enlightens the individual to better living? Or perhaps it was it the sins of the Catholic Church at large throughout world history, with its Crusades and and Inquisitions?

Any reasonable, sane person would understand that just because there is a killer loose in Disneyland, it doesn't imply that the fault lies with Mickey Mouse. Anyone with even the slightest amount of intellect should be able to discern the obvious difference between what is faith and what is religion: one is a belief system that ordains personal decisions and and conduct of life at large, the other is a social construct of political yoke that serves to bind its members to its bylaws, rules and regulations.

Then again, the same applies to any secret society, alma matter, or club at large. So let's get real for a moment and ask the hard, central question: what was wrong with the statues and morals of the God of Christianity, that we, as the West at large, decided to dump Him and move out from under His protective hand, as it were?

I suddenly recall a report that came out about the public school system in Canada back 1988, after the government decided to pull the Lord's Prayer from schools in Ontario, where I spent the majority of my youth. What followed was a plummeting of school grades across the board, funny as that may seem. Don't try to connect the dots, only consider the consequences at face value. The bottom line is, something happened in conjunction with this paradigm shift, and it wasn't for anyone's betterment.

Friedrich Nietzsche was right with his "death of God" analogy back in the day. We decided to kill God off from our lives and our society – societies that were largely built on Biblical principles and safeguards to ensure the posterity and safety of its people – and we left the door open for a horde of diverse and tumultuous demons to come in. We made our collective bed, in which we now lay. And the wages of sin is death. How fucking inconvenient for us!

The Fallacy of Relative Morality

There's really no use or sense in complaining. It was a completely willful and conscious decision by us as a people and a collective society. God didn't fit into our big picture and so we discarded the nagging voice of right and truth. We wanted our very own, custom-tailored, relative morality. We wanted to all be special snowflakes who would have their personalized cake and eat it, too. And in our deliberately blind gluttony, heresy, hedonism and salaciousness, we laid the groundwork for the inescapable law of reaping as we'd sown. Hey, don't be fooled!

God is not mocked, and neither is the still, small voice of common sense and conscience within each and every one of us.When the dam broke, we were too ignorant to fix it. We let the landslide advance, unabated. The West let in the aggressive demands and doctrines of the east, the doctrines of which were adverse and foreign to the West to begin with.

Loading...

The healthy not only tolerated but sought to accommodate the complaints and wishes of the perverse. The waters became muddied, unassimilable, and undrinkable. We were like spectators at the Colosseum, watching our own, unethical passion play unfold before our eyes, amused and sedated by it all at the same time. Things went from bad to worse and we just clamored for more fun, frills, and entertainment to fill our empty heads and void lives. Anything to dull the unnerving voice and moment of truth that kept beckoning to each and every one of us.

We didn't protect our borders, our customs, our beliefs or our values, because we didn't respect what we had. Someone else built the house which we inhabited; it wasn't any skin off our own backs. We had no more sense of collective self, of tribe, clan or us. It became every dog for themselves. Me, me, me and even more me. Not you, not us. Just more of what's in it for me, for my own, personal benefit, entertainment and pleasure. We took it all for granted, and now it's being taken away from us.

With the death of God, we adopted new gods, albeit lesser gods at that. Mock gods like those offered at the altar of television, a conduit that taught us to believe whatever was fed through it; the media, who we believed all too eagerly at face value, without enough critical sense to question absolutely everything and ask the crucial and central question: "In whose interest is this message being sold to us?"

Popular music and its altar of indoctrination that has been admittedly so stealthy and shrewd, that even I, as a musical artist for nearly 20 years, can only marvel at its potency in conditioning the behaviors and attitudes of its audience.

Only as you age and grow as a person do you begin to see more clearly, but only if you steer clear of the mass sedation being force-fed all around you. That said, these new faux gods—and many others like the aforementioned—have filled the spiritual vacuum left behind by the absence of light that took immediate effect following the death of God, as foreseen by the accidental prophet, Nietzsche.

The Wages of Sin

In hindsight, we, as the West, have raped, spit on, shamed and insulted the Christian values that our lands were built on. We've become so goddamned secular, so boastful in our arrogant pride, that we've been ignorant of replacing the dismissed guards of our ethics and societal self with new, virtuous guardians of any kind. We've simply let ourselves drift, happily clueless, on our sea of indulgence and hedonistic pleasure. No one saw the hordes in waiting, and now it's too late.

In our weakened state of constant self-gratification, we, as the West, have become weak. We've become milksops: easily offended and readily yielding, fragile individuals who hide behind the cloak of Big Brother. How the prolific words of Benjamin Franklin ring loudly now: “Those Who Sacrifice Liberty For Security Deserve Neither.” Indeed.

Even what’s left of our weakened, watered-down Christianity has become a feminized, ineffective, dead symbol of religious ritualism and ineffective, empty clamor. Gone are the strong men of old, the spirit of the founding fathers. Gone is the bravado, the chest held high with its breastplate of uprightness, the strong and unmoving fortitude that was ready and able to wield the sword of truth and brandish the shield of faith. Woe to us, for gone is the faith that was steadfast, the powerful beliefs that steered the moral uprightness of entire societies. We’ve got it coming to us, folks. In spades.

Summa Summarum

We need that old time Christian warrior mentality now more than ever. Our lands need it. Our people need it. The West needs it. Because the West will not survive without a return to its Christian roots. The secular mindset will not accommodate laws to protect the West, for were it able to provide that, it would have offered them up already. The proof is in the pudding, we’ve already seen the degeneration and decline of morality and societal spine under the banner of secularism.

No religion, no bullshit. Just rock solid Christian values and respect for the freedoms afforded by the vastly gracious nature of Christian and Biblical beliefs. The proof is in our past, if you need further evidence.What have you got to lose? Only the last, scarce remnants of your personal freedoms that are all being stripped away, falling through your fingers, if you choose to remain embedded in secular indoctrination. And if that be your choice, good riddance.

Read More: The Traditional West Is Man’s Best Civilization

Michael Majalahti
Michael is arguably the most acclaimed and accomplished pro wrestler in history out of Northern Europe, as well as the pro wrestling pioneer of Finland, where he has lived since 1996 after moving from his homeland of Canada. Michael is known as an outspoken figure that bucks the system and swims against the tide. Known in pro wrestling circles as "The Rebel" StarBuck, Michael has been a champion the world over, in addition to being a rock vocalist in three bands, a personal trainer, a voice-over pro, a business owner, an actor, an artist and a husband. More:

How To Counter Bleak Dating Prospects In 2018

January 2, 2018 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

The gradual decline of Western societies haven't stopped, although it might have bottomed out. Further, as Roosh stresses in his recapitulation of life lessons from 2017, game is getting harder. Even good-looking guys have to date down, largely due to social media-addicted girls whose egos are as big as a Brazilian butt on Copacabana.

When so much has been written and said about this topic, one may wonder if there's something substantial to add. Although one should skip most of the basics at this point, I think that there will always be new angles and perspectives since societies and markets develop in way or another. Bloomberg does constantly write about economy while ROK focuses on game (among a variety of other subjects), and both with the understanding that these fields change, although certain principles remain constant.

While I haven't figured out something truly innovative about the future yet, there are nevertheless a few points that need to be emphasized and show that a man can do better with the help from taking action and making proper decisions. Sometimes that process goes pretty fast, which is promising for this new year.

Style improvement

Even in urban environments I am almost startled by how bad many guys dress. For example, when I was about to enter a top-tier club in Miami for a couple of years ago, several guys in the line were not let in because they wore sneakers and badly fitting jeans. Sure there are hipsters and the corporate guys in black suits, but even them are no match for a man with a perfect balance between traditional masculinity and flamboyant metrosexuality.

I've realized that this type of style is so great, because it's not just about peacocking (which is a sociobiological phenomenon) and looking more like the prototype of a celebrity, but a way to connect with women's penchant for aesthetics. As long as you maintain masculinity you will not be looked upon as a gay fashion designer, but an urbane mating/dating prospect.

Body fat

Studies have shown that lower levels of body fat are associated with higher testosterone and greater aesthetic appeal. There are exceptions to this, such as the so-called ectomorph body type who instead has to focus on building muscles more than anything else, but most Western men have to shred down in parallel with hitting weights.

Try to hit the 10% body fat level, but realize that this is rather relative and that 12-13% are also appropriate.

Loading…

Intranational migration (travel or semi-permanent)

One angle that has to be more in the focal point in the near future is intranational migration, meaning to move temporarily or permanently within one's home country. Metropolitan cities like New York, Washington DC and Los Angeles are not representative for the entire US, but neither are fat states like West Virginia, Mississipi, Alabama and Arkansas.

Perhaps a man who feels that California and New York are too competitive for him, should try Colorado, Utah, Idaho or Montana instead. Although they are no poosy paradises there are at least difference of degrees in hell. Less of the urban whore and SJW and more of tradthots. Field reports from writers and readers are desirable.

International migration (travel or semi-permanent)

Another method is to try international love migration, such as a trip to Manila, Bangkok, Jakarta, Rio De Janeiro or Bogota.

Although there are much more places than these five—like for instance Malta, Japan, Ukraine, Dominican Republic, South Korea and St. Petersburg—we know at this point that for a variety of reasons some locations are more optimal than others. That will save you both time and money. All because of sites like ROK, Roosh V Forum, and Swoop the World.

Multiple game strategies

Lastly, multiple game strategies are the way to go, although you should be extra precautious if living in SJW-infested locations like Canada, Australia, UK, US or Sweden. Be a generalist, don't only focus on online game but use all kinds of available social circles, day game, and night games strategies. That will likely increase your chances and lead to an abundance mentality.

Game is also "evolutionary" in that sense that it naturally filters out those methods that are deemed unworthy to hold on to at the individual level. If you, for example, get most of your scores from online game and social circle game, then focus less on night game and day game (or vice versa).

In summary

I could bet that many guys already do these things, but I am also confident by saying that many don't do them at all, and that those who have made some efforts have much more to do. Start 2018 with the plan of implementing these, in conjunction with long-term self-improvement like making more money, and you'll eventually see some pink light in the present black tunnel.

For more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: How To Combat Declining Nightlife Game

William Adams

William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

American Man Signs Demanding Contract With Girlfriend To Receive Video Game For Christmas

January 2, 2018 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Daily Mail:

A young woman got her boyfriend the new Call of Duty game for Xbox – a very generous act indeed. However, this gift came with a special set of rules attached.

Ashley Davison created a list of five rules for her boyfriend Blake Perry, including statutes requiring him to put down the game if she calls and to keep her entertained if he's playing the game in her presence.

Davison, a student at the University of Central Oklahoma, even included a space for Perry to sign the agreement, that required he ‘not forget about his girlfriend’ while playing the game.

Perry’s original tweet has been liked over 30,000 times. Users on the social media site have had quite a lot to say about Davison’s list, with nearly a thousand responses to the original tweet, in which Perry said ‘Little does she know these rules will be broken.’

Loading…

One Twitter user replied to Perry’s tweet, saying ‘ Nah bro… I’ve been through this before, she wants you to think it’s a joke but in reality if you don’t follow those rules she will go postal on you. Just beware.’

Davison replied to this Tweet in stride, stating ‘ Don’t worry I’m not going to go postal on him, it 100% was a joke! Thanks for looking out for him though!’

Other Twitter users also chimed in about the Christmas gift. ‘Joke’s on her – you can’t pause Call of Duty,’ one said. Another even suggested that Perry buy Davison a copy of the game. ‘Get her the same gift and play online together,’ the Twitter user said.

Davison’s list has attracted the eyes of tens of thousands online in the days following Christmas, with over 30,000 likes on Twitter

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: 20 Things You Can Do Instead Of Playing Video Games

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

I Will Not Let My Sons Join The Armed Forces

January 2, 2018 | by Aurora Borealis | Link | Original Link

The hiatus between Christmas and New Year is a pleasant time for me. Work has ground to a halt, no calls or emails to reply to, Christmas is over, the mess is cleaned up, and kids are with their mother for the week. There is little to fill each day except for the obligatory thrash at the gym, so I found myself at leisure to reflect and contemplate on life, the year just gone, and the year ahead.

Part of my recent transition to a Red Pill existence is grappling with the realisation that honour, loyalty, and integrity are the main masculine traits that weak men, women, governments and institutions don't possess. You would think the presence of many men in government, the armed forces, and politics would ensure these values predominate, but this not the case. Of course these values cannot prevail in the feminine system we find ourselves in, explaining why the West is so weak, flaccid and duplicitous, and that it's word, be it a threat or promise, cannot taken seriously by anyone, friend or foe alike.

A man I met in the gym

I had an interesting conversation with a bloke in my local gym. This chap was visiting the area on holidays with his family and was training most mornings to work off the excesses that are typical at this time of year.

He had one of his young sons in tow, and the lad had a worried, anxious appearance; way too serious for a kid on holidays. This chap was about 5’8″ tall, very broad and weighed 230 pounds. At his peak he reached 275 pounds.

Although still solid, he carried a lot of fat, and had a puffy, out of shape appearance. What struck me though was the relatively low poundage he was lifting. This was surprising to me as I have observed many overweight men who are nevertheless quite strong.

I noticed him sitting at a machine gingerly exercising the left side of his chest. I thought to myself “Ahh he has pulled a muscle”, so I wandered over and enquired, “Looks like you have strained a pectoral?”

He said, “No, I have bad shoulders.”

I enquired further, “What happened to you?”

“I have cancer and I’ve got rods and inserts in my arms on both sides and I can’t work my shoulders too hard”.

We talked for a while and he explained that he had been deployed to one of the wars in the Middle East, until his illness made it impossible to continue. He was in fact part of our special forces, equivalent to your navy SEALs. During this time he was exposed to a lot of chemicals, toxins, and extreme levels of peril and stress.

His doctor had written him off, giving him months to live. We had a bit of a laugh about the piss-poor physical condition of doctors in general.

Veterans are normally entitled to free premium health care. I said, “At least you have Gold Card to cover your treatment and expenses”. He said that he didn’t have a card, and that he had to prove to them that the war caused it.

The system failed him

This is where the story gets serious. When you realise the bureaucracy hasn’t got your back, that the system doesn’t give a fuck, and that it will sool its lawyers onto you so that now you are forced to fight two wars simultaneously: staying alive and battling the bastards in the government.

This is not an isolated case, I’m sure many of you have heard of similar tales, or personally know someone in the same predicament. Ignoring the morality and efficacy of fighting foreign wars for a moment, there is still the knowledge that once your utility expires, you are transferred to the liability side of the balance sheet. Sound familiar?

I don’t know if his prognosis is favourable, but his stoicism and philosophical acceptance of his reality was remarkable, in contrast to the disinterested and dishonourable behaviour of his employer. And that is why I do not want my kids to join the army.

Read More: French Writer Reveals That Army Is Planning To Recapture Muslim No-Go Zones

Aurora Borealis

Aurora Borealis is middle aged and hails from Down Under. Long suspecting that something was rotten in the state of Denmark, he could not put a name to it until he discovered red pill philosophy. Recently divorced he has spent the last few years inculcating correct mindsets and plotting his return. He enjoys teasing young fillies and lifting heavy.

17 Reasons Why Ukrainian Girls Are Overrated

January 3, 2018 | by Mike Metzer | Link | Original Link

I continue to hear that Ukrainian girls are the best of the best for beauty, femininity, family-oriented mentality, and traditional beliefs, or that the streets of Ukraine are flooded with supermodels, all of whom have the sole desire in life to start a family at 20 years old with an old, ugly, fat guy who simply treats them well and is a good man.

Of course in a country of over 40 million people, there will be girls who do have some of the qualities listed above, but for the most part Ukrainian girls are rather overrated for a variety of reasons. This can lead men to have tremendous disappointment when they experience Ukraine in person and get a harsh reality check. Why are they overrated? Let's begin.

1. Their beauty has a short lifespan

Obviously the photo below is exaggerated, but even the most beautiful Ukrainian girls have a short shelf life with their looks. Around the age of 23 is the peak of these girls' attractiveness. 24-26 year old girls can still be attractive, but it's heading downhill around this point. For example, even some 30 year old girls there can look good simply by staying slim, maintaining their long hair, and wearing the right outfits, but there's definitely a marked difference from an averagely hot 23 year old to even the hottest 30 year old.

2. They don’t have curves

Most Ukrainian girls have very slim bodies with little to no curves. It’s rare to see one with great tits and ass. Every now and then I would see girls who had really amazing asses, but I wasn’t always sure that they weren’t implants since those girls always had lip injections and boobjobs as well. Personally, even though I like the slim model type of build, it got a bit old after a while, making me miss the nicer tits and asses of girls in other nearby countries.

3. They have bad teeth and skin

The majority of the time their teeth are varying shades of gray or yellow, and sometimes you’ll notice visible decay on random spots. The best teeth I’d seen were those of a successful orthodontist, but even then her teeth weren’t truly white.

Their bad skin can be a variety of things from acne to random scars. They generally do a decent job of disguising it with makeup, to their credit, but the number of girls I’d seen in the past year wearing little to no makeup was surprising compared to the year before.

Some girls would have random scars that were largely unidentifiable as to how they happened, in case you wanted to play a game of “guess the trauma.” Stabbed? Bitten by an animal with a misshapen jaw and jacked-up teeth? Fell from a roof and plummeted through some tree branches, before finally landing on a pile of rocks? I was always wrong with my guesses. Usually they were remnants of an accident or botched surgery.

Side note: try not to need a doctor in Ukraine. Seriously.

4. Many have the “mail order bride” look

Personally I don’t care about this one, but if what others think of you and your girl matters to you, and you’re planning on taking them out of Ukraine to a Western country (more on this below), be aware that many of them have that “mail order bride” look. Some of it can be remedied with a change in wardrobe to fit her new surroundings, but they’ll probably still maintain the “cold Soviet look” in their faces that most Ukrainian girls tend to have.

5. They don’t have personality

Some Ukrainian girls can actually be funny, warm, and interesting, although it generally takes a while for them to open up and display their full personality. For the most part, there’s a lot of quietness, lack of engagement in conversations, inability to understand a lot of jokes or even light teasing, which all leads to a big learning curve when dating them.

If you have a fun and clown-game type of personality, which can be rewarded in the West, you won’t like interacting with Ukrainian girls. Some men won’t care and may prefer this, some may find it boring and unstimulating, and some may get frustrated at their non-responsiveness most of the time.

6. They are not feminine if they have a career

In Ukraine, I've dated a wide range of career women from doctors to lawyers to corporate women. When I was new to the country, I thought the career women there would still retain all of their femininity because "it's Ukraine." Nope.

They all exhibited lower femininity in their demeanor than the women who either don't work at all, or who have more basic jobs like a cashier or working in a call center. They aren't nearly as bad as Western women, but it makes me wonder if it will quickly get worse over time.

Females aren't designed to be career women by nature. It should be no surprise that even in Ukraine they begin to lose touch with their feminine side by choosing that path. Even the ones who wore feminine clothing and maintained their long hair had demeanor that was noticeably less feminine when compared to the non-career women.

7. They are getting lazy with their appearance

The sheer volume of girls wearing flats in the city center of the capital, even on warm sunny days during weekends, was astonishing. I asked a few why they were wearing flats instead of heels, and they all answered the same…"it's more comfortable." These were single girls who supposedly wanted a man in their lives, but cared more about comfort. I've even seen girls in flip flops walking on Khreshchatyk Street, but thank goodness that was a rare sighting.

Other than the lack of high heels, short sexy dresses weren't in abundance either. And a lot of times when I'd see a girl wearing a sexy feminine dress, she'd pair it with unflattering flats. I believe this trend is here to stay, but I hope it doesn't quickly worsen.

8. They are attention-whoring more than ever

The usual suspects are in the lineup: Tinder, Instagram, Facebook, etc. Many even use Whatsapp and Viber for the sole purpose of amassing an orbiter collection instead of actually going on dates. There’s no need to go in depth on this one since the negative effects are pretty widely known on how girls change when they become more entrenched in these things.

9. They are getting more tattoos

Tattoos seemed to be on the rise from just a year ago. Younger girls especially were keen to getting them, from tiny finger tattoos to large scroll tattoos on their torsos. Most of the time the tattoos weren’t even creative. It seemed like the girls would just be mimicking garbage they’d see on Instagram “models.” They’d would say the tattoos are cool and lots of their friends are getting them. Not a good sign.

10. They are becoming more accepting of degenerate lifestyles

Don't get me wrong: Ukraine is still rather broadly unapproving of homosexuality. It's not like there are half-naked gays dancing in the streets in tutus while waving inflatable dicks, but considering a few of the relatively recent occurrences like calling the Friendship of Nations Arch the "Arch of Diversity" and painting it in rainbow colors, along with gay pride parades like the one earlier this year in Kiev, the trend is clear.

Sometimes while I was out on dates, I'd see gay men on dates. The guys were always touchy-feely with each other and didn't seem concerned about how others viewed them in public. Girls I was with would express that they're happy for them and how everyone should live in harmony. If I stated that I didn't like it, the girls would get upset and try to school me on how I should be more open-minded and accepting of such a beautiful thing as gay men in love. A couple of times they insulted me by saying I'm homophobic and that there's something wrong with me. So much for having traditional beliefs.

11. They never stop testing you

Ukrainian girls shit test you almost constantly to see if you're a strong man or if you're a sucker they can control. Out of all the women in all the countries I've encountered, Ukrainians have been the worst (Russians weren't too far behind).

Loading...
I usually don't mind shit tests since it can be fun to overcome them if done properly, but sometimes these girls can be really annoying. A Ukrainian man once told me, "Ukrainian girls need a good smack now and then to keep them in check". While I don't condone hitting a girl, this example shows that even the local Ukrainian men who are used to being strong around their girls still believe it has to be taken to that extreme with many of them.

Another local man said, "Ukrainian girls are like springs. As long as you keep it compressed, everything is fine. If you loosen your grip too much, the spring flies out of control and causes a lot of damage."

12. They are calculating and manipulative

Everything is a transaction in their minds. Even the sweetest girls there can flip like a switch if an opportunity arises to gain a financial advantage. It can be fairly manageable if you have tight game, don't do cheap dates, don't spend much on them, and don't act like a provider or sponsor, but it does get old and annoying pretty quickly.

In my previous article I listed some specific scams to watch out for, but this calculating mindset goes beyond just isolated scammer tricks. It's a state of mind that all of them seem to have to varying degrees, and will eventually rear it's ugly head.

13. They see foreigners as walking wallets

Even the nicest girls who truly like you will still have you stereotyped as a rich foreigner. If you are the type to want a woman to love you for you, and not care at all about your money, Ukraine isn't the right place. This is true for pretty much all age points.

Now I'm not saying they're all gold diggers. There are girls in Ukraine who want love. But you are a foreigner. It's possible for her to fall in love with you for who you are inside, but the improvement in her financial situation as an escape from "the hell that is Ukraine" will always be somewhere in her mind when she looks at you. Some men may want to use this as part of their gaming strategy to imply financial gain, but it's much better to play it cool and act normal rather than rich.

14. They give you a low return on your investment

Frustrated? Annoyed? Likely both.

One date. Two dates. Three dates. Four dates… wait, what? Didn't Bang Ukraine say the girls understand that the third date means sex? Yes, the girls absolutely know that the third date and beyond means sex, but that doesn't mean it'll necessarily happen just because she goes on those third and fourth dates.

As a matter of fact, her knowing that those dates mean sex allows her to mentally prepare even more to NOT have sex beforehand, effectively countering the "it just happened" scenario that you (should have) set up for the date.

They can be quite crafty at avoiding sex to attempt to extract more from you. Sometimes they'll even use the "I'm not ready this time, but next time we'll have sex" line when they know they've pushed you to your limit with multiple dates and extreme LMR (last-minute resistance). Once they say that and leave, there will rarely be a "next time."

Some tactics were so common that it was almost like there's a Don't Bang Ukraine book that a Ukrainian girl wrote as a manual to maximize their resource extraction from foreign men and give them little to nothing in return.

This low ROI issue is very real. Some of you unfamiliar with these girls might say, “They’re traditional girls and it’s normal to wait much longer for sex,” but as I said, the problem is that there’s no guarantee that they’ll bang you if you continue to go on many dates and waste your time and money. Even getting heated during a date isn’t always a foolproof guarantee. Many Ukrainian girls seem to have superhuman control over their minds and vaginas even when they’re genuinely horny.

15. The hottest Ukrainian girls do not want you

They usually prefer either a high value Ukrainian man or a sponsor, but more likely both. These girls aren’t dumb. They know their value. It’s theoretically possible to bang a 9 or 10, but if you think you’re going to go to Ukraine and spit your awesome game and be rolling in 10s, think again.

The very first time I went to Kiev, I banged a 9 on the second date. Before that, in Lviv, I banged a 9 in less than two hours of meeting her. At the time, since my game and logistics were solid, I thought I could repeat that indefinitely. I thought Ukraine was a breeze and would always be that easy. In retrospect, both girls were a combination of game, timing, and luck.

After spending more time in Ukraine later on, I realized it’s frustratingly difficult to get with the 9s and 10s, especially those who weren’t the groupie types. Even the 9 and 10 groupies can be hard most of the time since they interact with a lot with foreigners who make things worse by showering them with gifts and attention. I’m not saying it can’t be done, but it can be quite laborious. 8s have been getting increasingly difficult as well, often requiring much more work and a higher tolerance for bullshit to get the bang.

16. You can’t take them to a Western country

Firstly, some tough love: God help you if you're stupid enough to want to marry one of these girls and take them back to a Western country like USA. These women will destroy you. I don't care how solid your relationship game is. You're not a natural. If you were a natural, you wouldn't even be on sites like this. You wouldn't have ever tried to learn game. Ukrainian girls are born naturals. And they've had many, many years of practice perfecting their game beyond even a natural status.

If you take her out of Ukraine, she can and likely will crush you. It may not happen in the first month, first year, or even a couple of years, but the clock will begin ticking the day you take her to her new Western world. Ukrainian girls I've known who were permanently living in USA actually brag about how they've completely destroyed the man who brought her out of her shithole and gave her a new life.

They were not only proud that they took him for everything he had and left him an utter shell of his former self, but they seemed to tell their stories with a glimmer of joy. You can say all women are like that, but these girls can take it to a different level. And to squash the increasing trend of girls telling foreign men that they like Ukraine, don't believe them. They're just trying to make you think that they're different from the other girls there. Trust me, they all want to get the hell out of Ukraine, especially to go to USA. If you find a marriage-worthy Ukrainian girl and you're sure you can handle her, your best bet is to live in Ukraine and preferably have her parents in the same city.

17. Ukraine is not a pleasant country to live in

One of the biggest reasons Ukrainian girls are overrated is because they're from Ukraine. Ukraine isn't a wonderful country. There's turmoil, suffering, corruption, and scamming that's been a part of the country for a very long time. I won't get into the politics of it, or into the psychological analysis as to why, but these things don't bode well for a girl's overall mental state over the long haul.

This article isn't meant to simply trash the country and its girls, but rather to clarify myths and misconceptions surrounding them, to better prepare men for what they may encounter if they choose to go there. Although Ukraine isn't a poosy paradise, and the girls do have lots of flaws, there are many beautiful women there who are lay-worthy, plenty who are girlfriend-worthy for mini relationships, and some who are wife-worthy with the caveat stated earlier. Just don't expect to waltz into some kind of fantasyland of supermodels with them fawning all over you just because you're the pimp that you are.

Read More: 10 Scams Ukrainian Girls Try To Pull On Foreign Men

Mike Metzer
Mike travels the world, seeks to know the unknown, has a strong desire to expand his mind, and can be reached at

Would You Rather Live In A Society Controlled By Sharia Law Or Social Justice?

January 3, 2018 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

If the flame of the West is snuffed out and the choice is between Islam and "social justice," I'm choosing the former. Return Of Kings has long pointed out the travesty of open borders migration, which brings in hordes of anti-Western young men from the Middle East. Notwithstanding this, Islamized societies are much more preferable to the many social sicknesses pushed by SJWs.

Should our values be basically exterminated, aside from private contrarian opinions, I am certain that at least superficially going along with Islam will be the right choice for readers of this website as well. The legitimate criticisms we might have of Islam and its applications within countries pale in comparison to the anti-civilization core of so-called social justice. At least we can say that Muslim men are motivated by basic notions of patriarchy and an acknowledgment of gender differences.

The better of two bad situations

Wahhabism in Saudi Arabia > than whatever this “guy” is taking.

Here are just some of the advantages a society based on Sharia Law has over a “society” predicated on social justice principles:

- Unless you fall afoul of a member of the social or political elite, a false rape accusation against a man is extremely unlikely;
- No affirmative action quota is apt to take your job or promotion away from you and give it to a woman;
- The court systems will not buttress the power of activists and others who insist that your child has the “right” to be injected with hormones of the opposite sex and remove the genitals they were born with;
- Crime in your neighborhood will be dealt with, instead of local authorities or the judiciary determining punishments based on gender or race;
- Female hypergamy will be kept in check; and
- When couples divorce, the wife will know that she will almost never be unjustly enriched, like women with little earning power who get multimillion-dollar payouts from husbands for the rest of their lives.

Put simply, the average man will face far less persecution in an Islamized society than one run by SJWs. Without being defeatist, should the West need to die for a time, embracing Islam is the logical choice for someone who wants to make the most of a collapsed political order.

There’s weight in numbers, too

How can the SJWs control this?

In addition to the rough ideological affinities we share with patriarchal Muslims, demographic realities support the idea of choosing Islam over leftism (if a choice could ever exist). Germany, the United Kingdom, and France are all projected to have Muslim populations of around 20% mid-century. A social laboratory like Sweden will be nearly a third Muslim by that time. Moreover, the political salience of these communities will be even greater than these soon-to-be massive numbers suggest, including the ability to use, like now, aggressive tactics to further Islamic interests.

The mostly pozzed non-Muslim majority will have to kowtow much of the time to the newer arrivals and their descendants. By 2050, expect the incompetence of SJWs to be fully laid to bare, with the authorities powerless to stop the encroachment of strict Muslim values in, say, a “liberal” France or Sweden. Given the option to join with either self-respecting Muslims or obsequious leftists, I know what decision I will be making, potentially long before 2050.

What’s your plan?

Ready?

Roosh recently spoke about the black pill and the need to accept that all we can sometimes do is enjoy the social decline around us. Likewise, the Age of Trump hasn't changed many of the deleterious SJW influences within our universities, media outlets, and "popular culture." The end is not right around the corner, but a lot is still wrong with our societies.

Once the actual fall comes, however, people will have to stop observing and make choices. Inasmuch as we cannot predict everything, the probable successors to Western civilization are already known to us. As of 2017, adopting Islam in the future is the more common sense course of action.

Read More: Why "Social Justice" Exists

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Vegetarian Feminist Professor Says Eating Meat Perpetuates Toxic Masculinity

January 3, 2018 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Anne DeLessio-Parson, PhD, has been on Tucker Carlson and Jesse Waters recently where she argued that the consumption of animal products like steak and cheese both contribute to producing too much aggression. Through her activism, she is hiding potential health risks of a vegetarian lifestyle.

Parson graduated from the Poison-Ivy League University of Pennsylvania, and in her academic bio she mentions her work is on the sociological effects of diet, particularly in the absence of meat. She references that in India, one-third of the people are lacto-vegetarian, but what she doesn't mention is that India has crime just like everywhere else, where gangsters, bribery, and corruption are a big problem today.

Vegetarianism Hasn't Stopped "Toxic Masculinity" In India Or China

Varinder Ghuman, vegetarian bodybuilder

There are male Indians who are vegetarian but still are bodybuilders, soldiers, and wrestlers. This diet did not eliminate their aggression, in fact the high amounts of dairy they eat would suggest it promotes it. In India, dairy is actually an essential part of their diet, not a sin like vegans want you to believe.

In the Shaolin Temple of China, monks regularly exercise and perform intense martial arts. They smash bricks with their hands and withstand dangerous blows to their body. This requires yang, the masculine energy. As per Buddhism, these monks are strict vegetarians, eating simple foods like rice, beans, and mung, but they are not wimps. They most likely have a lot more testosterone than the average hot dog eating American.

The passive nonviolence of these cultures is more derived from their religions while the diet is part of following the moral code. Peace is sought first, and violence is a last resort. In Eastern martial arts, physically defeating an opponent is viewed as the lowest form of victory. Trained men from such areas frown at overly aggressive behavior. It is not because of veganism.

Carlson tried to get Parson to explain how exactly meat consumption promotes aggression, but he all he got were book recommendations rather than clear direct answers. She appeared to be more interested in promoting rather than answering the questions.

Jesse Waters Eats Steak In Front of Her

Loading…
On Jesse Waters, Parson said she wants universal healthcare for animals. Waters then ate a steak in front of her. Her argument was that eating meat leaves blood on your hands, and that killing to eat is not ideal, but there are studies that show plants also feel pain too.

We all know that there are vegans/vegetarians who do it for moral or religious reasons and don't condemn others for eating meat, but this is just another tactic the feminists are trying to use to attack the male gender using silly reasons without providing proper scientific evidence.

Violent Vegetarians

Some of the worst monsters in human history were in fact vegetarian, Hitler being one of them. Vegetarianism didn't curb his aggression. If Hitler had a German sausage, a beer, and some Aryan babes, perhaps World War 2 wouldn't have happened. There are many other examples:

- Roman soldiers and gladiators ate meat sparingly, yet they were more aggressive despite having meat less available than the modern man.
- Having non-vegetarian food can be dangerous in Ahmedabad, because the natives can be extreme and become very angry if they see someone eating meat.
- There are cage fighters who are vegetarian and yes even vegan. Why haven't they chosen a more peaceful profession instead of unleashing aggression in fights?

The PETA movement and alike are more political entities than humanitarian. They are forcing their views on people much like religious fanatics. You don't really see meat eaters forming groups to go to vegan restaurants and attack, yet it is the vegans who are showing the aggression by disturbing people during their meals.

A Wrong Message

While she may have good intentions, Parson's claims are taking it too far and she has misrepresented the vegetarian philosophy. Normal vegetarians in Asia don't force their sentiment on others; it is simply understood as an individual choice. Even in Ayurveda, the Indian system of medicine, meat is recognized as food and even prescribed to build up one's strength. However, like anything else, too much does more harm than good.

So if you want eat a steak, go right ahead, you're not a bad person. It's ironic that a vegetarian has to tell you that.

Read More: How To Gain Serious Muscle Mass As A Vegetarian Without Going To The Gym

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info about him visit, GSL Creations

How To Stay On Track With Your New Year's Resolutions

January 3, 2018 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

The beginning of a new year is a customary time to take a Socratic self-assessment of how your life has been going, and then decide what you want to change. These goals can be several different things. Many will want to get in better shape, overall a good idea. Perhaps it's time to quit the porn habit. Maybe you want to stop smoking—that's a good one too. If it's crystal meth you're smoking (let's hope not), better cut it out while you still have teeth. Maybe your strange way of fertilizing potted plants is giving you too much bad publicity. Ultimately, whatever you decide to change is up to you.

Self-improvement is a good thing, and we harp on that a lot around here. However, people don't always follow through with their resolutions. The gyms are jam-packed with new customers in January, but things are generally back to normal after February. This suggests that resolutions all too often have a two month shelf life. When promises to yourself fall by the wayside, it leads to disappointment, and sometimes even feelings of hopelessness.

Well, let's work on doing better than that, how about it? Here are some tips that will help take you across the finish line.

Set goals properly

Someone’s got some work to do.

First of all, make sure that your goals are realistic. If you set out to go from noodle arms to 18-inch biceps before spring break, become fluent in Japanese in six weeks, invest $1000 and quickly turn it into a million (that only works for Hillary), or bed a new supermodel every month, that’s setting yourself up for failure. Pacing yourself out so that your progress is measurable and attainable is important. Another potential pitfall is trying to do too much at once. You can make a timetable to pace things out.

So, do the research, figure out how long a goal should take, set a timeline, and get ‘er done. For example, “lose some weight” isn’t very specific. What’s the target? If someone has a serious problem—like a junk food addict who is 100 pounds overweight—then losing 10 pounds is a step in the right direction, but not a huge dent. A partial victory is better than nothing, but it’s the wrong place to rest on one’s laurels.

Staying motivated

It’s going to take some doing.

You will have temptations along the way. You will wonder if it’s really worth it. However, if you give up, then you’ll sink back into the inertia of old ways.

Most resolutions generally involve breaking bad habits, or acquiring good ones. This can be many things: eating right, practicing the guitar an hour a day, not snorting scouring powder, etc. It takes mental effort to overcome bad patterns of behavior and switching to good ones. However, over time it becomes easier. If you keep it up, then it becomes second nature.

Until then, you have to exercise self-control to keep working toward goals. How much do you want it? For example, do you want to keep eating crappy food, or get a great body? Even the nastiest habits can be overcome by the power of reason. Crackheads won’t light up in front of a cop, because they don’t want to go to jail for six months. Exercising self-control means policing yourself.

There’s an “extinction burst” effect that you may encounter. Here’s the short version. When you’ve done without something you’re trying to give up, the parts of the mind responsible for generating that thought will kick into high gear, generating a strong temptation. This will pass, and no, that junk food won’t taste as good as what you’re imagining.

Finally, “ego depletion” may make it more difficult to stay on track. This can happen after resisting several other temptations. (Remember, don’t take on too much at one time.) Also, things like anger, stress, and fatigue can make it harder. Think about all the times you decided to do something and blew it—was there something else leading up to that? Get proper rest and avoid unnecessary stressors when possible.

How the mind works

Plato's Republic is a masterpiece covering many subjects. One of them is the divisions of the mind. These are:

- Desires ("epithumia")
- Emotions ("thumos")
- Reason ("nous")

In Plato's system, emotions are a counterbalance on the body's desires—food, sex, etc. However, the power of reason is the ultimate decider. Freud repackaged this much later as the id, ego, and superego. The superego counterbalances the id, and the ego is the executive function.

Interestingly, Plato's ideas correspond well with the modern triune brain model. The bodily desires come from the brain's most primitive region, called the reptile brain. Emotions were the next to evolve, the mammal brain. The rest of the cerebrum is the neocortex. The power of reason is in the frontal lobe, very well developed in humans, responsible for both intelligence and impulse control.

Basically, your frontal lobe is in charge—or it should be! The emotions are wrapped underneath in a deeper layer, and the desires are the deepest. They can send strong signals, but they're not the ultimate decider. Further, the power of reason can contextualize emotions, and even recruit them to override other signals, be they troublesome emotions or animal desires.

The Rationalization Hamster makes excuses for bad decisions after the fact.

However, when we fail to let the power of reason call the shots, a number of bad things can result. These include laziness, gluttony, misdirected anger, letting the “little head” do the thinking (four of the cardinal sins here), irrationality, cowardice, juvenile behavior, etc. Desires that need to be moderated can come from the basal ganglia. In practice, that can bleed into the limbic system too, where it gets tied in with emotions. That leads to bad habits and mental associations. It’s how nonsensical perversions and compulsive behavior like kleptomania originate.

The point of all this is that it’s possible to control yourself, and you should. Actually, Plato’s Republic argues powerfully for this. The short version is that leading a balanced life results in overall increased happiness. An unbalanced life gives you higher highs, but lower lows—and much more of them. If you want to get a culture fix, put it on your reading list. Everyone slips up occasionally, but this isn’t something we should consider acceptable.

Putting it all together

This little feller doesn’t belong in the driver’s seat.

When the lizard brain starts screeching like a four year old wanting a candy bar, Daddy should tell him to put a cork in it. A strong emotional push will help; the sarcastic big brother can provide running commentary. When all this is lined up, it works like this:

- Desires: “I want that candy bar!” Emotions: “You want to blow the diet, you fat bastard?” Reason: “Nope, earn a cheat day first.”
- Desires: “I want to watch porn.” Emotions: “That crap is disgusting!” Reason: “I’ll find a girlfriend instead.”
- Desires: “I’m tired. Let’s leave the gym.” Emotions: “Five sets to go, you pussy!” Reason: “I’ll tough it out; this is how I make progress.”
- Desires: “Just one more cigarette won’t hurt.” Emotions: “Just one? That’s what you said last time. So you want to die horribly?” Reason: “I’m done wasting money on cancer sticks.”

Feel free to be harsh with yourself as needed. In recent times, there’s been a lot of emphasis on self-esteem, not feeling bad about anything, and all that other warm and fuzzy Barney the Purple Dinosaur stuff. That puts the cart before the horse; self-esteem comes from accomplishing something. That’s what makes it real. If you’re tempted to blow it, remember what happened all the times when your rational mind let your emotions or desires do the thinking. Ultimately, the power of reason should be calling the shots.

I won’t conclude by telling you good luck, because it’s not about luck, but about willpower. Anyway, butch the hell up and make 2018 be the one where you accomplish your goals.

Read More: Stop Being A Pussy

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

A Guide To Weimerica

January 4, 2018 | by Bryce Lockwood | Link | Original Link

"Weimerica," an amalgam of Germany's pre-Nazi era Weimar Republic, is a term you've probably heard in the past year if you've been active in the ongoing political maelstrom that is social media. Some alternatively call it "Clown World." I prefer "Weimerica" as it more specific to what the United States has become recently and hints at a cataclysm yet to be.

This "guide" to Weimerica was written on the fly in-between back-to-back New England snowstorms, originally for an audience of one person. The genesis of this guide was the impending first-time visit to the US of a friend of mine from Lebanon. I wrote it not to show how bad things are, but instead to show how ugly things are. Not to frighten, but to inform on the many unpleasant realities that are all too quickly (and conveniently) forgotten about on a day-to-day basis. How indifference is the order of day despite the ever-tightening noose around the necks of most people.

So what is Weimerica, you ask? Read on and find out.

The New Normal

What is Weimerica?

Weimerica is….

…homicides being up 20% from 2014 (equivalent in raw numbers to more than the September 11th attacks).

…the 17,250 confirmed homicides of 2016 being more than any other year since 1997 (when there were 18,208).

…66,324 drug overdose deaths in a 12-month period (the Vietnam War saw 47,434 hostile deaths over 15+ years).

…44,193 suicides in 2015, with suicides being at 30-year highs in 2016, and suicide being one of the top ten causes of death in Weimerica.

…23,000,000,000 views on Pornhub in 2016 (729 per second every single day non-stop for the whole year) with there being only 7,466,964,000 people on Earth.

…70% of Weimerica being on prescription medication with 20% being on more than five medications at once (and life expectancy still dropping).

…real income showing little to no gains for decades on end.

…being worse off financially than your parents.

…a decrease in the average household income in New Jersey from 2005 to 2015.

…everything being fleetingly temporary, you won't have that long lasting job, house, car, marriage, etc., like your parents and grandparents did.

…nearly half of all pregnancies being unintended.

…Weimerica is a colossal, dystopian shopping mall filled with 325 million atomized, rootless individuals with no common culture, cause, language, religion or background, united only by their shared consumerism ("Did you see the Giants game last night?" "Oh my Gawd, Stranger Thingssss!").

The Motto for Weimerica: "NO LIVES MATTER"

A seven-time convicted felon and five-time deportee fatally shoots an innocent passerby in the back with a stolen 40-caliber Glock handgun on a public pier? Acquitted.

A crying father begging for his life shot to death crawling on his hands and knees towards a SWAT team aiming AR-15s and screaming at him? Acquitted.

A bride-to-be gunned down in front of her house in her pajamas when a police officer sitting in his squad car suddenly draws and fires pointblank into her face? No charges.

22,000 attend a country music festival surrounded by high walls and patrolled by security guards and police officers in the most heavily surveilled city in the Western hemisphere? Gunned down by the score with total impunity in the biggest mass shooting of all time.

926,190 abortions in 2014, with an estimated 98.3% being elective (meaning unrelated to rape/incest and medical complications).

Everything Is Fake

Zillow.com and other real estate websites photoshop clouds, grass, and trees around properties and present them in a way that makes them appear much larger and more modern than they actually are.

These two pictures are of the same person:

Real Life

Social Media

Wall Street rating agencies graded $400 billion worth of subprime mortgage bonds without knowing what was in them, giving many of them the highest “AAA” rating (effectively making them rating agencies in name only).

The 5-star Mandalay Bay hotel in Las Vegas employed an unregistered, unlicensed illegal immigrant as a security guard.

Love To Hate

Everything being either “awesome,” “insanely good,” or “the best _____ ever,” or “shit,” “shitty,” or “the worst _____ ever,” with little to no middle ground and/or reasoned opinions. For example, the discrepancy in reviews for The Last Jedi and nearly every one of the 100+ reviews I read for the Ford Fusion being either “BEST CAR EVER” or “Should be recalled, WORST CAR EVER.”

Every piece of media being heavily and ridiculously scrutinized down to the last detail for any inane reason to hate it. For instance, one of the top comments on a YouTube video for “Shout” by the Isley Brothers accused the video’s author of not including enough black people dancing in his/her photo montage and further asserting that this lack of inclusion was deliberate.

Hating something because it is successful/popular just to go against the grain. For instance, actual “professional” reviews of Dunkirk being “Yeah, yeah, it was great, but why weren’t women the main characters?” and “Yeah, it’s good, but Christopher Nolan and his Nolaniods….”

The hate-watching of TV shows (Keeping up with the Kardashians, Jersey Shore, etc.) propelling them to ultimate success.

Insane Anti-Social Atrocities Are The New Norm

4 out of the 5 worst mass shootings in Weimerican history took place in the past five years.

The worst mass shooting in US history (600+ gunned down) disappears from the news and thus collective consciousness in the space of a week.

The Sutherland Springs massacre (which featured babies being executed at pointblank range by rifle fire) disappears from the headlines within a day or two. This shooting would have ranked as the worst in Weimerican history as recently as 2007.

The mass shooting body count record for Weimerica was broken in 2017 a mere 15 months after the now-second worst mass shooting in Weimerican history occurred.

The firearms technology used in recent mass shootings has been around for decades, and gun laws as a whole have never been stricter and mental health resources have never been more available (remember 70% of the population is on prescription medication), so why is this happening now?

War Is The Default State

After 16+ years in Afghanistan and 14+ years in Iraq (and 6,935 total US deaths), war is the default state of Weimerica and no longer afforded special or notable status (in contrast, the major combat phase of the generation-defining Vietnam War was seven years).

0.4% of the population is active-duty military, meaning ~95% of the population most likely is not emotionally invested and/or cares minimally about whatever combat is/was taking place (or will take place).

Fuck me in the butt!!!

The Everyday Absurdisms Of Weimerica

Prescription medication used to combat anxiety, depression, and suicidal/homicidal thoughts and actions causes anxiety, depression, and suicidal/homicidal thoughts and actions as a side effect.

A Rutgers University professor lamenting the Sandy Hook massacre so much that he made a YouTube video about it, but still believing in infanticide up to one year of age.

New Jersey has the highest paid police officers in the nation with an average salary of $100,000/year, but also has three cities in the top ten for “worst homicide rate” and those officers still have the right to shoot you to death if you don’t follow their conflicting orders to the letter while having a gun pointed at your head.

Parents working and saving money for twenty years to send their kids to college only for them to return home after graduation hating them, their country, and themselves in addition to being tens of thousands in debt.

One-fourth of graduates leaving college with a four year degree in hand are no better off than if they did not go to college at all from a wage perspective.

The maintenance staff at a college making more than most of the graduates of that college because they are unionized.

Consensual sex (“fuck me in the butt!!!”) being redefined as “rape” with such concepts as “enthusiastic consent” (Yes.=Rape, YES!=not rape), “continuing consent” (“ask every ten minutes if it’s okay to keep going”), and “affirmative consent” (“Can I hold your hand? Stroke your thigh? Whisper into your ear?”).

The wife of “American Sniper” Chris Kyle saying she married him because “he was a nice guy.”

"I do not care, I am a millionaire, I do not give AF."

Some Classic Weimerican Quotes

"I was naked underneath my clothes." ~A woman explaining her #metoo moment.

"CRAWL TOWARDS ME! IF YOU FALL, YOU BETTER FALL ON YOUR FACE!" ~A police officer's reasonable and coherent order that must be obeyed upon penalty of death.

"He was turning his life around!" ~The classic family/friend lament of a dead victim/perpetrator with a less than stellar background.

"He changed into something he wasn't." ~The pathetic attempt of a high school chum of a mass shooter to cover up for the fact that he somehow missed what a psycho his friend was.

"Russian interference!" ~A viable excuse for anything and everything.

"The hoes are laughin'? YEP!" ~An exchange between a confused TV doctor and a 14-year-old aspiring female rap artist.

"He was COMPED!" ~The humblebrag of the coked up brother of a mass shooter/pasty.

"Stay in the car."~A plea to do nothing and ignore the situation, whatever it may be.

When Did America Become Weimerica?

No firm answer, I first noticed it in the spring of 2009 when there was a constant stream of family murder-suicides and mass shootings, some of them recession related. Afghanistan also escalated that year (with death tolls doubling for both Britain and the US from the year prior) under the election promise of "I'll get us out of Afghanistan, take that to the bank!"

Things really picked up steam in 2012 when large public mass shootings began occurring with increasing regularity, labor force participation hit a three decade low (meaning there was no economic recovery), and drug overdose deaths had already jumped 211% (in the Northeast) in comparison with 2010.

Read More: 4 Reasons Why Collapse Will Be The Best Thing To Happen For Men

Bryce Lockwood

Bryce Lockwood is a straight white male who works at a university in a blue state and thus cannot use his real name. He writes, he lifts, he has skin in the game, and he lives at Ground Zero for Weimerica. He possess an ever-present sense of humor that would have seen him quip, “Merry Christmas, ya filthy animal!” had he been the SEAL that capped Bin Laden. He also has a masochistic streak that has expressed itself by climbing Mt. Tammany in the rain and reading the citation sections of various history books. He recently had to buy a new wardrobe as his waist shrunk from his workout and he just passed day 74 of the NF challenge. Friendly to stray dogs, hostile to stray thots.

The Mainstream Embrace Of #MeToo Puts Us One Step Closer Towards The Enslavement Of Men

January 4, 2018 | by Christopher Leonid | Link | Original Link

The progenitors of the #MeToo meme have been elevated to that dubious plinth of social endorsement, the cover of Time magazine.

#Iwouldnt

These women did not “launch a movement.” However, the current wreaths-to-laurels victimhood craze does bear out the completion of an important cultural cycle.

Free Love Wasn’t Free

A core premise of our sexual dystopia is:

> ‘My body my choice.’

Within the bounds of legality, we are supposed to believe that neither sex is more damaged by their coital decisions than the other. The retro-active outrage now mounted by women at men on account of mutually consensual sexual intercourse (and calls for the bounds of legality to be shifted accordingly), reiterates that this is not actually the case.

The struggle of many a post-prime girl for exclusivity with a series of increasingly inferior suitors, must be a brutal way to discover that it is still impossible to raise a joyridden car back to its factory-new price.

Men are checking out of monogamous commitment, leaving two generations of women wandering a widening bimbo-limbo between settled life either as a housewife or denizen of the increasingly cash-strapped welfare state (the overwhelmingly administrative sector jobs provided to ‘career women’ being a manifestation of the latter).

As an institution, marriage is only debased further by social and legal efforts to enforce commitment from men to polygamous women who spent their bloom years in promiscuity. Although such an iniquitous contract could be excused by a myriad of exceptional circumstances, the unprecedented glut of women beneath the male investment threshold turn the exceptions into clichés.

The Gynocentric Interpretation

A defining characteristic of corporate and clickbait discourse is the effort to sublimate readers’ frustration into outrage while bypassing the question of accountability. Time and others are now under huge pressure to find mythologies to both explain the dissatisfaction of their female readership and serve as the basis for corrective political action. Someone must be to blame for their problems; anyone but themselves.

What Time has produced is a fairy tail without a prince. It begins:

> ‘Movie stars are more like you and me than we ever knew.’

We are then introduced to a wide range of women who were:

> ‘brought together by a common experience.’

They were actually brought together by Time, at great expense, to confirm the biased premise of their leading article. Time then chews over each of these women’s testimonies, droning on and on and on in a tantric, mantric, incuntation of its utterly banal and predictable conclusion:

'WHEN TRUMP WON THE ELECTION, I FELT A CRUSHING SENSE OF POWERLESSNESS. AND THEN I REALIZED THAT I HAD TO DO SOMETHING.

Time have revealed their straw man – and he's called Donald Trump.

I suspect that the feminist Trump-tantrum is not caused by Trump per se, but by the part of American society which voted him into office. It's an important distinction because it means that, as a political instrument, Trump is needed the most by the very people who like him least. Without Trump, the outrage would be revealed for what it truly is: a million personal vendettas against a million brash, powerful and wealthy American men who these women consentingly gave their bodies to.

Trump's appeal to the free market and private capital (as well as the string of hot women who have let him 'grab 'em by the poosy'), is more than just a refusal to push the envelope on welfare policies which enable sexual liberation—it is an exposition of the gulf between what is conventionally true and what is actually true about modern female sexual opportunism.

The self-deception may be genuine, but was revealed nonetheless when #metoo was triggered by the loss of societal contingency plans to ensure female sexual freedom (alpha fucks and beta bucks), by constraining that of men. The fat child screams not while it is happily eating itself to death but when the cookies are taken away.

Feminism's Finale

The premise of #metoo has now been twisted by various degrees to its own complete inversion. Nearly a year ago, I was told by a County Court in Britain that I owed money to a woman whose sexual advances I had gently rebuffed some years before. Neither I nor the court had any idea why I owed her money or what her claim was, but I still had to defend myself.

A case that would never have come to trial twenty years ago dragged out for months as she gradually patched together a claim (without evidence), which gradually escalated to an allegation of sexual abuse.

My trial was the direct result of her assumption that society would stand behind her in extracting resources from the man of her choosing. I was lucky that she had a legal history of ‘choosing’ other men before me, and the judge sent her howling from the courtroom.

But what if I had been her first shot? What if she’d gone to the Crown Prosecution Service?

I add, for the sake of completeness, that I am a strict adherent of pre-marital abstinence and, in the case of this particular woman, had never kissed, hit on, made a pass at, nor been in any form of romantic relationship with her. #Iwouldnt—and that is precisely what enraged her.

Let the irony of this case serve as an illustration of the extent to which feminine imperatives can now be exercised to strong-arm men into compliance. If you have earned a #metoo assertion like I did, you’re probably doing something right.

What for men in 2018?

The dregs of women will always preen their sexual worthiness in a sensational light by announcing that a man once made an unwanted pass at them, just as feminist Phrynes like Emma Watson will always lend a pretty face to their ugly cause (phoney outrage is her profession’s prerogative. I bear her no grudge).

The trial of Phryne – who was vindicated on account of her beauty

Our toxic tributary of sexual realism to the mainstream discussion sees the feminist victimbragging for what it really is: another attempt to circumvent rational analysis and keep society plugging the feminist narrative. Soon, #metoo will become as passé as ‘Trump Bedroom Backlash,’ but these phenomena are mere symptoms of a deeper social condition.

As private debt piles up and resources cease to flow, society will have to find new ways of demanding that men judiciously restrain their own behaviour on behalf of the unfettered dualistic sexual strategy of women—sexy badboys and stable providers stepping up and down as and when women demand it. The contradictory messages that this sends to men are now compounded by the constant possibility of being criminalised for making a faux pas.

Today, as trials move from the courtroom to the press and to Twitter and Facebook, the degree of kafkaesque reassurance that I had—the basic certainty that I was on trial—is starting to ebb away. A lot of men who don't grasp the underlying biomechanics behind the sexual victimhood phenomenon are doomed to be spirited on a windowless train of THOT thought from false premise to final solution: their enslavement to women, either directly or via the state.

The chaotic disconnect between the claim and the truth is not a means to an end but the end itself. This climate of fear is the West's way of forcing the marriage of mankind to womankind, joylessly mandating social responsibilities without providing any privilege. The carrot has gone from the sexual contract and only the stick remains.

It can still be a beautiful life for men who don't answer to society. Careful though, the beta version of this man is Smeagol Gollum.

The harder men try to opt out of commitment to women, the stronger the social effort will be to drive them back, until escape from women will turn into escape from society itself.

Don't Miss: The #MeToo Sexual Harassment Hysteria Is A Pretext For Women To Take Power And Money From Men

Christopher Leonid

Defining men's agency during the collapse of the Sexual Revolution.

How To Date Perfect 10’s

January 4, 2018 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following is a sponsored article by Charlie Morton and International Love Scout.

Every guy wants to walk in to the room with the most beautiful girl at the party. It is shallow and superficial, but all men are attracted to beautiful women. It is just the human nature, but, lucky for you, today it has never been easier to dating perfect 10s.

There is a simple formula to dating perfect 10s – super hot, model quality ladies – and I am going to explain it right here. I am not going to charge you $39.99 or even make you sign up for my incredibly entertaining and useful email list.

I am going to tell you how to do it, so you will visit my website and tell your friends about my website, International Love Scout. You might even decide to sign up for my email list, but you don’t have to.

And guess what? Today it is not that complicated to date stunning women. In fact, it is often easier to date one of the hottest women in the world than to date an average woman from your home town if you know the formula.

The Formula For Dating Perfect 10s

First, do not limit yourself because of where you live or the passport you carry. Come on, man! This is the twenty-first century. You don't have to marry the girl next door. The internet makes it easy to communicate with anyone, anywhere, and Boeing makes it possible to be almost anywhere on the planet in seventy-two hours.

Just as important is the development of the modern mail order bride industry in the last twenty-five years. There are scores of businesses which exist to help men from the United States, Canada, Australia, and Western Europe to meet, date, and develop relationships with the most beautiful women in the world.

You, sir, are lucky to be alive today! Casanova could never meet the number and quality of women that any decent man can meet today.

For Americans and Europeans meeting a beautiful woman from the far side of the world is incredibly cheap because the strength of the dollar and the Euro and plunging international airfares. If you use a little sense you can date an amazing woman that you are crazy about for about the same amount of money you would spend dating bland, demanding girls from back home.

Second, be picky. Seriously, in the United States or Europe a man is pretty much stuck with random chance of meeting women at work or the produce section. Your friends will set you up and you will end up on painful blind dates with women you are not attracted to.

But in international dating you can meet exactly the kind of woman you want to meet. You can meet and date your perfect 10! If you like blondes, you can meet incredible Russian women by the thousands. If Asian women are your thing you can meet more stunners than Kabila Khan ever dreamed possible.

Or maybe you would like to date a fitness model? You can, even if you are an overweight weekend warrior who mostly limits themselves to sixteen-ounce curls. I am living proof!

Yeah, it was a very nice date!

I would never have been able to date a smart, beautiful, super-fit twenty-six year old blond in the United States, and that is what makes international dating so incredible.

Third, educate yourself about the challenges and opportunities of international dating. You can really date women FAR out your league, but there are pitfalls.

Scams can still happen, but generally they are not international dating scams. They are dumb guy scams. If you give money to a woman – including your wife – you are doing so on faith that she will do what she said she would do with the money. So, don't give money to women and that will eliminate 90% of the scams.

A more serious problem for a lot of men is simply making a choice. There are so many beautiful women on international dating sites that deciding the two or three or four you would like to date can be overwhelming.

Often guys act like a hot dog eating champ at Golden Corral, and it is just not pretty. Show a little class, try not to be overwhelmed, and don't overload your plate. You can always go back for seconds, but you can never make another first impression.

A lot of men start off thinking they are going to be international playboys, but, in reality, the best thing that can happen to most men is to marry a significantly younger woman. Yep, there is scientific proof for that.

A related problem is that you need to be careful about how much you promise these beautiful foreign women. Marrying a foreign man is usually good for the man, but an incredible life changing experience for the woman. Most of the women on mail order bride sites understand this.

Today many of them have relatives living in the United States, Australia, or another developed country. They actually want to get married and have kids and the whole nine yards. That is true in Ukraine, Thailand, Colombia, and any other country. The vast majority of women, regardless of race, religion, or national origin want a stable, long term relationship – either marriage or something very close to it.

Yes, girls want to have fun too, and if that is what you are out for just be honest. You are a catch in Kiev or Bangkok if you are willing to spend a little money and there are a decent number of women who will be willing to have fun with you, but just give them a general idea of your plans.

If not, unless you are a complete psychopath you will feel awful if you go around raising the hopes of these women only to snuff them out on a whim. So, be careful how much you promise these women, because what might be a simple fling to you might break their heart forever.

So, live a little and find your perfect 10. It really is not hard. You have romantic opportunities that no Russian Czar, King of France, or Emperor of China could ever dream of. Live a little, take a few chances, and enjoy dating a woman you are excited about dating. Click here to visit International Love Scout.

Charlie Morton once lived in a supposedly haunted Civil War fort on an island in the Gulf of Mexico. Now, he wanders the world trying to help men and women find the happiness they deserve. If you have questions about love, life, or fantasy football you can reach him through his Facebook Page.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

My Top 10 Articles Of 2017

January 4, 2018 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here are my ten favorite articles of 2017, listed in chronological order:

The Decline In Testosterone Is Destroying The Basis Of Masculinity

> Testosterone levels in men are declining worldwide alongside sperm counts. The hormone that makes men men is disappearing from the human world. As a result, men are becoming more feminine and choosing the paths of weakness, homosexuality, and cuckoldry. While it's necessary to look at the ideological causes of leftism in men, the biological reasons must not be ignored, and that starts with an understanding of the testosterone crisis.

How To Save Western Civilization

> I've had a front-row seat in the culture war for over a decade, but I haven't made any big policy declarations like other movements. Men's rights activists their "family law reform" platform. The MGTOW group has "legalize prostitution and invent realistic sex bots." The alt right has "white ethno-state." The alt lite has "civic nationalism." When it comes to policy, I've been quiet, solely focusing on fostering truth and masculinity. Only now am I ready to make the commitment to a policy platform which nips the essential problem in the bud in a way that other movements do not. We must repeal women's suffrage, starting with the 19th Amendment in the United States. Once this is accomplished, no other planned or conscious action must be taken to solve nearly all our societal ills.

Women Who Don't Have Babies Go Crazy

> A girl recently told me that she hopes her female dog would breed. Otherwise, > the dog may have a false pregnancy where she pretends she is pregnant and shows increasingly unstable behavior. This was the first time I learned about the scientific condition in dogs called pseudopregnancy. I was immediately struck by how similar it is to the behavior of adult human women who don't have babies, especially ones who live in the affluent West. After studying this condition extensively, I speculate that women who don't fulfill their biological program of having children exhibit the disturbing signs of false pregnancy by becoming insane.

The Barbarians Will Solve Your Sterile Existence

> Why can't the Muslims, Africans, and Indians be more civilized like people in the West? Why do they insist on endless breeding when their children have no chance of attending an Ivy League university? Isn't there a way we can help them to see the light of civilization, rationale thinking, and clean hygiene? These are questions you may have asked at some point when looking down on the third-world barbarians, but from the perspective of nature, it's not them who are the problem. We are the problem. We are the defects of nature that will be eradicated.

What I've Learned About Women From My Long-Term Relationships

> I'd like to share some things I've learned about women from the relationships I've had. A lot of that experience comes from Eastern European girls, who are more feminine than American girls, but I believe the true nature of women is the same no matter where you go, lurking underneath regardless of outward presentation and behavior.

You Become What You Fight

> Once you declare an idea or person to be your enemy, you give them a room in your mind. Within that room you insert their history, strategies, tactics, strengths, and weaknesses. You dedicate more of your waking hours to understanding how to defeat them. As time passes, items from that room start to leak out into your being, until you look in the mirror and realize that you are not that different from your enemy.

A Face That I Could Love

> When I'm hunting, I view a girl who crosses my path from the bottom up. Her legs, after seeing so many thousand pairs, reveal to me her body's size and shape, even if she's wearing a long winter coat. I look away if the legs are misshapen or lumpy, not daring to risk accidental eye contact. Otherwise, my eyes move upward, excitedly, to see what kind of chest, face, and hair she has. I then make a snap judgement of her overall condition and if she's worth my effort.

The Hunt For A Moral Woman

> A lot of men I talk to think the best way to find a good girl is to visit a small town or village. The girls will be more pristine, they figure, and they're generally right about that, but there's just one big problem: those girls have not been tempted enough for us to know what their true character is.

Women Have Been Tricked Into Living Like Men

> The biggest travesty that has happened to women in the past 70 years is not misogyny or sexism, but being put on the same education and work timeline as men in spite of having a completely different biology. Millions of women suffer every day because they're living lives that were designed and optimized for men.

Dating Doesn't Work

> After absorbing the experiences of hundreds of men (and women), it has become clear to me that dating simply doesn't work for finding a life partner. No other tactic has a greater failure rate in creating stable marriages and families than Western-style dating, a method that only excels in finding short-term sexual partners.

If you want to see all articles I published last year, check out my archives.

Read Next: My Top 10 Articles Of 2016

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Fat Lesbians Rewarded With $135,000 Judgment Against Christian Bakers Who Wouldn't Bake Them A Cake

January 5, 2018 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> The Kleins were subjected to a homofascist mob that boycotted their business, threatened other wedding vendors and subjected their young children to death threats.
>
> — Fox News describing how Aaron and Melissa Klein were vilified, stalked, and intimidated with serious threats of violence after declining to make two lesbians a wedding cake.

Two Oregon-based lesbians have hit the jackpot, with a court ruling that they must receive $135,000 in damages because a Christian bakery would not make them a wedding cake. The triggered women, Rachel and Laurel Bowman-Cryer, previously said they were "mentally raped" by the experience. The couple in charge of the bakery, Aaron and Melissa Klein, lost the case in the Oregon Court of Appeals in December, with next to no chance that they can proceed further.

The Kleins have faced four years of hardship because they stuck to their Christian beliefs. As a result of their religious commitment, they are being slapped with an official penalty that resembles ones handed out in many of the worst negligence cases, where plaintiffs have lost limbs, been confined to wheelchairs, or been physically tortured and brutalized. In addition to the court sanctions, their business has been targeted, if not destroyed and they have spent tens of thousands of dollars on legal fees.

The Klein family will be bankrupted by this ordeal.

Whilst I am not normally one to advocate surrender, the ability of privileged minority groups to easily win paydays from you means that giving up early in these kinds of circumstances is probably the best thing you can do. Unless you want to be a martyr, that is.

Oregon, which we like to refer to at ROK as “colder California,” has a history of SJW-inspired legal overreach, including a successful attempt by the authorities there to bankrupt a bar owner over his beliefs about transsexuals. It joins both the Golden (Shower) State and Washington in a never-ending quest to out-SJW northeastern states like New York, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut.

$135,000 for not getting a cake, but only $500,000 when your leg gets ripped off

Yes, not getting a cake made is naturally comparable to losing your leg in an accident. And just as excruciating when it happens, surely!

Oregon is just one place where histrionic people, particularly women, benefit by being out of control, highly emotional whackos. The more ridiculously triggered and “traumatized” you appear to a court, the more money you will receive.

A man whose leg was torn from his body by a garbage truck in Oregon only got $500,000 for his pain and suffering. He may have been awarded nearly four times more than the lesbians denied a cake, yet he should have netted at least 1,000 times more, presuming that compensation for the lesbians was even warranted. $135,000 in damages for someone saying no to baking your cake makes an absolute mockery of the legal system.

Alas, this is the end result of post-modernist-style thinking infecting our society. Rachel and Laurel Bowman-Cryer listed nearly 100 emotional and psychological symptoms they said the Kleins inflicted upon them by not taking their business. Such a long, self-entitled list reads like the potentially legitimate ailments of an American soldier who might have served in World War II at Monte Cassino, Normandy, throughout the Battle of the Bulge, and when Iwo Jima was taken from the Japanese. Sadly, we’re actually talking about two fat lesbians getting incensed over a party dessert.

Doctors and others are next

First they came for the bakers and at present they're clawing at the medical professionals. For instance, a local doctor I know in Australia refuses to participate in either abortion procedures or prescribing abortion-related drugs due to his Christian faith. Perhaps the pro-leftist laws have tightened in Australia during my absence, but they certainly have already in places like Canada. Doctors in many a province there must refer patients to abortion-providing doctors or perform the abortion itself if other doctors are unable to do it. Worse still, "unable" is frequently defined in a very loose and amorphous way to increase the chances that the reluctant initial physician must take part.

Rachel and Laurel Bowman-Cryer could have simply gone to another bakery. Instead, they kicked up a fuss and saw dollar signs from the very beginning. Likewise, we can safely expect a raft of future cases involving doctors and others who will have to hand over small or large fortunes to opportunistic plaintiffs who are usually just unhappy with themselves or their lives, desperately searching for a scapegoat.

There is no such thing as (Christian) religious freedom in the modern United States or the West in general anymore. The next item on the SJW agenda may be criminalizing Catholics, Mormons, and evangelicals who refuse to marry gay couples. Watch this space.

Read More: Oregon State Government Bankrupts Bar Owner For Refusing To Serve Transsexuals

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

9 Easy Ways To Save A Ton Of Money

January 5, 2018 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

To take control over one's private economy is alpha and ~~not~~ omega in a person's life. There are multiple strategies to use in that regard. Some take larger risks in order to have greater savings in a later consecutive step, while some live from paycheck to paycheck. I am more careful and conservative, and mainly live on my mid-income salary, and have suggested a strategy which conforms to such a precautious mindset.

1. Think like a student

Many of us have been a student during some period of time, or at least lived under conditions that for some reason required some degree of financial austerity. Such circumstances are to be learned from. Even if you have much more disposable income in the future, internalize the same mentality although with greater flexibility. In practice this means to prioritize food, rent and bills before just about anything else.

2. Buy less important things in cheap stores or during sales periods

Some of the products and foodstuffs can be bought in local places at considerably lower costs. Just a little bit of research and extra efforts can reduce your expenses with 50%, which will make a substantial difference over time. Also look out for discounts and sales offers.

3. Buy a large share of your clothes in cheap stores or on large discounts

Like I have stressed multiple times before, style matters for me and it should for the majority of men as well. By combining cheap and more expensive items, I have managed to build a rather impressive and miscellaneous wardrobe over the years. As for the more costly garments, I often look out for sales periods during summer and Christmas. This act of patience has made me save about 50% and is definitely worth it when it comes to costumes, jackets, and shoes.

4. Make cost/benefit analyses

A crucial question that continuously should be asked is if this or that really is worth it. At ROK, we often use the term ROI (Return On Investment), as it tends to say something substantial about for instance nightclub game, women or luxurious toys.

More concretely, is it worth spending thousands of dollars in “classy” clubs to get laid with a 7? Is it wise to buy a leisure boat for 100,000 dollars, something that implies a rapid gradual decline in value, expensive fuel, and relatively few opportunities to actually use it?

Even when I spend considerable amounts on travel I often make cost/benefit analyses and almost make it into a sport of spending as little as possible, while simultanelously getting the most out of it in terms of fun.

5. Save about 1000 dollars every month

Generally it is about to find a proper balance between spending and saving, but to save about 1000 dollars every month is often reasonable for the mid-income man. Given that you don’t touch that money later on, you have more than $100,000 within ten years. Money that can be used for something truly valuable, or function as fuck you money.

6. Make a list of expensive things that you don’t need

Furthermore, to make a list of expensive things that you don't need is a means to save serious money throughout life. It could be an expensive apartment or house in a city or high-status suburb, or a car or leisure boat that would be nice to have but completely devastate your private economy once you bought them. Often the above-mentioned cost/benefit analysis will be of great service.

7. Prioritize several beneficial things that cost you no money

Earlier, I have given suggestions on beneficial things that cost you no money. Once you find that many of those have greater value than soon-to-be-forgotten status symbols within the consumerist matrix, you have solved a large share of the financial issue.

8. Ask your family and social circle for furniture and utensils instead of buying new items

Many make the mistake to visit IKEA, or even more expensive stores, as soon as they move from one place to another, in order to spend thousands of dollars on sofas, skillets and whatnot. This typical middle-class and upper class sickness is in fact quite stupid, since there tend to be numerous high-quality furniture and utensils for free within one's family, social circle, or even neighborhood. For example, recently a random neighbor gave away some really nice chairs when moving to another place.

Of course you should selectively buy new things every now and then, but think twice before you do it, and don't let a woman have too much of a say on the matter since she is likely less restrained than a man with good character.

9. Use your disposable savings and don't buy on credit

Lastly, whenever you buy things – like clothes, a trip, or a car – use your disposable income instead of taking a loan or buy on credit. I would only advice someone to take a loan when there is no other way, such as when you buy your own place after having paid 15-20% in down payment.

Conclusion

With the help from these approaches and strategies, I have managed to save a significant amount of money, travel the world, wear nice clothes, stay in shape, and still live in a decent rental apartment in a major European city. Although there are multiple approaches, I hope that these tips can be of some general value and applicability for fellow male readers.

Read More: How To Free Yourself From Debt

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Cracked’s Impotent Attack On The Manosphere Is A Sign Of Their Rapid Decline As A Humor Magazine

January 5, 2018 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

What happens when a once-great comedy website preaches a sermon against the Manosphere? It’s a disaster like Mark Hill’s “What We’re All Getting Wrong About Pickup Artists” featured on Cracked in 2016. It begins with intemperate insults about our site’s founder, with an ignorant take on the meetup brouhaha. Jabs against our audience (that’s you) soon follow.

> And the last thing I want to do is mansplain the appropriate reaction to a hate group that targets women.

You mad, bro? Humor tip: sometimes less is more. The article reads like a movie scene where a black-hatted villain twirls his waxed mustache and ties a damsel to train tracks—but playing it seriously.

No, we don’t hate women. They’re not the enemy, but modern feminism is. Yes, there’s a difference.

What’s the point?

Chi Onwurah thinks Roosh's penis is small. How would she know? Like he'd ever bang someone even less appealing than Bruce Jenner?

Following that is an inline image of three comments under a headline about "British" politician Chi Onwurah making a "tiny penis" remark. (Dude, is that the best dick joke you can do? What's this peculiar concern about other men's packages all about, anyway?) Then:

> Now, here are some responses to other stories about men's rights activists, pickup artists, and their ilk. Not people who make this their profession like Roosh, just the everyday dudes who follow him. The college student who's striking out at parties, the office IT guy not having much luck with online dating — I could find hundreds of these.

Following that is another image collage of other people's cherry-picked comments, a frequent shtick of his. He even admits it wasn't a representative sample.

This graphic is actually funny.

The first error is lumping together PUAs, MRAs, and MGTOWs. They're not identical and don't always agree. Although all are concerned about today's dysfunctional social environment, their responses are significantly different.

More importantly, there's nothing wrong with guys seeking information to improve their social lives. Really, our game articles are pretty similar to material marketed to women, and sometimes tamer. Nobody clutches their pearls over books like The Rules. Fainting spells don't happen at the supermarket checkout line over magazines promising a dozen ways to wrap him around your little finger, more sex positions for him to curl your toes better, etc. Game denialists are like crabs trying to pull their buddies back into the fisherman's bucket.

We're really unenlightened. (So?)

Our editorial staff (I'm holding the torch)

Then this:

> …I used to not be great with girls. I didn't react to my failings the way Roosh's followers have, by deciding that all women are slutty, stuck-up, manipulative bitches who need to get in line for my benefit. No, my ineptitude was internalized. I decided that most girls (and most guys) are perfectly lovely people and that there was just something fundamentally and uniquely wrong with me.

Shucks, tell us what you really think! Humor tip: do straw man arguments wittily. Actually, we're hairy-chested cavemen who consider Ivan the Terrible a bleeding-hearted liberal, we believe professional rasslin' is real, and our first order of bidness is that the dadgum food should be hot on the table by 4:30. (There, I fixed it.) Wit doesn't mean channeling the pure, elemental fury of a coffee snob whose venti mocha soy latté is too foamy.

More seriously, we recognize that the Sexual Revolution was a game-changer. The old rules stopped working. Further, although an average woman can hook up easily if she wants, the dating market is tougher than ever for average men. That's especially so for younger guys (looks like Mark had that experience himself). Therefore, men should do everything legitimately possible to help their dating prospects. Fortunately, there's a wealth of free information about self-improvement right here. If he'd done a little research—rather than compile other people's negative opinions—he'd know this.

> So, while I always thought MRAs and PUAs were awful people, I understood their frustration and loneliness, because we shared the same low ERA. And make no mistake, these people are frustrated and lonely — behind all their anger and bravado are guys who wake up every morning wondering why they don't have the partner their friends and family have.

Humor tip: exaggerate correctly. PUAs are lust-crazed Lotharios corrupting the morals of innocent, maidenly bar flies. (There, I fixed it.) Exaggeration above reality works, and so does irony, but not complete implausibility.

Really, PUAs get more pussy than cat shelters. Who's frustrated here? Merely learning decent game—knowing how the social environment's real rules work—increases one's odds greatly. Success isn't that difficult. I don't make a career of it, but I'm quite happy with my social life. I didn't lack for prospects after I was 20. However, my teenage years were awful, before I figured out what works. Some writers here authored game guides benefiting those undergoing dry spells. (Mine is longer than Moby Dick, and I'm selling the keys to the kingdom for the price of a cheeseburger combo.) What have Blue Pill game denialists done for the lonely and dispirited?

Years of involuntary celibacy are soul-crushing. Yes, it gets that bad. Loneliness is a common cause of depression, and certainly a contributing factor to the male suicide rate being four times higher than the female rate. (A few guys even go postal.) The Manosphere has been the most vocal of anyone about sexual marketplace imbalance, frivolous divorces, and radical feminism which helped enable these problems.

Besides drawing attention to that, we're the ones telling guys how the modern dating scene really works. Improving love lives saves actual lives. That's more constructive than sneering at those who are suffering.

Who writes that stuff, anyway?

Given all the gratuitous insults, it's hardly unfair to make some observations about its author. The insufferably smug anti-American barbs in some of his writings are understandable. It's as commonplace among Canadians of certain political persuasions as Toronto's frosty weather, and frostier women.

That by itself is unremarkable, but some of his articles are really out in left field. A few examples I read:

- "I Went To North Korea: What You've Heard Vs. What I Saw" — It's not exactly a Walter Duranty style whitewashing, but neither is it a penetrating analysis. Much of it justified the Potemkin Village experience and snarked at the other tourists.
- "Things I Learned Attending A Furry Convention" — Whiskey Tango Foxtrot?
- "5 Ways Society Trains Men To Expect Sex From Women" — Where do I even begin?
- "Your Anti-Trump Efforts Are Working" — He doesn't like Trump, nor do his Twitter friends. So?

He can rag on The Donald as much as he wants, but remember, people like him elected Justin Bieber Trudeau.

As for their executive editor, Jason Pargin (writing under the byline David Wong), he seems cut from similar cloth. Their change in direction is very odd. Cracked is a humor site, but lost its sparkle years ago. The above-mentioned items are prime examples. I figured I'd get a chuckle out of the furry convention writeup at least, but even that was dry. It's not jokes falling flat; they're not even there. The closest thing to comedy in the PUA article is bitter hyperbole. That's not how to skewer targets.

Leftists lost their sense of humor

Even commies once had a funnybone.

Older Cracked pieces actually were funny. They didn't resemble op-eds from HuffPo or Daily Kos. This seems emblematic of a larger problem. I remember when liberal comedians really had wit. Their movies were better too; there's no way in hell Blazing Saddles could be made today. Going further afield, Krokodil—the Soviet journal of satire—was pretty popular and relatable to the public. If the Cracked staffers want to go lefty, that's what they should be doing.

Read More: 5 Uncomfortable Truths About Cracked Magazine

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

China Will Eat The West

January 6, 2018 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

The Current Year in the West is unbalanced and self-destructive. Native Westerners' demography is in free-fall, families are rare or fragile, the mainstream culture is treacherous and toxic, the power and money have been taken away and given to violent organized anti-male, anti-white groups. Most women and effete blue pills try to ignore or trivialize the situation when they're not straightly SJWish.

I recently witnessed a leftist soyboy talking for hours to a female "friend" he never fucked and will likely never fuck to pressure her into remaining inside the leftist creed. "Doesn't matter to be a friendzoned beta wimp, I will pretend I'm someone by acting as a leftist watchdog!" Many whites behave like that. They direct their need for identity and belonging to some version of the blue pill, thus only gaining some semblance of being by contributing to the ignominious fall of their own civilization.

Some women admire us. At another time I saw a self-claimed female "love coach" whose eyes sparkled when I told her I was writing at Return of Kings. "God, at least someone who's neither left-wing nor an egregious MGTOW!" These kindred feelings, though, tend to remain discrete. Women are natural born conformists and fear getting singled out if they express beyond the "normal" degeneracy cesspool.

Drawing up an exhaustive list of the problems in Current Year West looks like pouring water into the Danaides' sieve. Parasites who pose as regular people or poor unprivileged abound. White guilt, female narcissism, male conformism—the Current Year is a clusterfuck of problems fostering endless divisions and confusions.

Sometimes you just want to turn the media off

And then there's China.

In 1816, Napoléon Bonaparte is supposed to have said "let China sleep, for when it will wake up, the world will tremble." A century later, Lothrop Stoddard wrote in the Rising Tide of Color about China's cheap labour combined with enormous reserves of iron and coal, then the basis of industry. Later again the French politician Alain Peyrefitte wrote a two-volumes book on China's potential, followed by a sequel, China has woken up. These men were right.

In Peyrefitte's words, China has been an "immobile empire" for centuries. It was forced into mobility by English cannons, debilitated by the opium trade, taken over by Communists who killed between 30 and 50 million people in the name of progress, and even then, the Middle Kingdom did come back. In a very short time, this purportedly undeveloped nation managed to become an industrial powerhouse and flood the world with its products.

Sure, many Chinese are working their asses off 14 hours a day in sweatshops. But deep down, they can do so because they are motivated to do so. They aren't isolated atoms—they still follow traditions that keep female hypergamy in check, and they are part of a mighty empire, like cells who can fully identify to a magnificent higher organism. They do not suffer from the disease that became normal across the West. The Chinese tend to be realistic about leftism, powerful communities, to care about their family and traditions, and they are extremely optimistic about the future of their country.

When we, red-pilled Westerners, tend to struggle individually to get our lives in order and, in the better case, start a family, the numerous Chinese tend to form a homogeneous block who has been expanding in all directions. Since whitey has been leaving Africa, China has steadily taken his place. On the other side of the pond, as Brazil keeps paddling into a typical Latin-American corruption scandal, the Confucian dragon invested more than $30 billion there so that the vast Brazilian fields will keep growing food for the Han instead of feeding their own industry.

China is also heavily involved into the research race. In September, a Beijing lab has held the world's first quantum intercontinental video call on what is said to be a breakthrough in secure communications. Before that, China had already build a complete quantum communications network between Beijing and Shanghai. Disgruntled CIA and NSA spies will have to shift to another target—for example, their own young commenting the news on Facebook.

China has also embarked on a space race and may take the lead there, in spite of decades of American accumulated advances.

Also, last but not least, China was never hostile to eugenics. Just like their Singaporean cousins, the Chinese constantly tried to improve their stock since they have become aware of it:

> A Eugenic Law of 1994 made it compulsory for pregnant women to undergo prenatal diagnosis for the presence of genetic and congenital disorders in the fetus and to have abortions where these disorders have been diagnosed. Chinese physicians and geneticists are much more sympathetic to eugenics than are those in Western democracies. For instance, in a survey of attitudes to eugenic practices carried out from 1994 to 1996, 82 percent of Chinese physicians and > geneticists supported the mandatory sterilization of, for example, a single blind woman on public welfare who has already had three blind children by three different men (all absent from the household), as compared with around 5 percent of physicians and geneticists in the Western democracies. (Richard Lynn, Eugenics: a Reassessment, p.41)

The Chinese prove that a high IQ, ethnocultural homogeneity and a strong work ethic can achieve much. Intelligence can be used to succeed in almost any field. No leftism at all is needed to build a flourishing civilization. Leftism looks more like a cancer, feasting on an old man's barely alive body. China has no real leftism inside, and China wants its place under the sun. Who's going to prevent it from taking the first place?

Even if we could, I'm not sure we would do so. No one's motivated to defend the Western world when the West is not Western anymore. Instead, one could drift towards favoring a meritorious people over the degenerate white normies. In Richard Lynn's words: "I am profoundly thankful for the existence of the Chinese, Japanese, and Koreans. The torch of civilization will pass to them."

Will the West witness the rise of tradition again, with patriarchal nationalism, identity and a vivid spiritual breath blending into a rejuvenating fountain of youth? Could China's system crumble due to its own failures? Or will we become "a bemused footnote in the Chinese Encyclopedia of World History", as Jared Taylor once wrote?

On the other hand, no one is forcing us to buy cheap crap all the time or to die with countries we cannot identify with anymore. The Chinese haven't been investing in Bitcoin as they were too busy making our clothes. And definitely, we can live on our own, travel, tinker, and build the tribes we need.

Read Next: Why I Don't Believe In Chinese Greatness

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

The Type Of Man That Korean Girls Desire

January 7, 2018 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Korean culture is essentially a hybrid culture: a mix between traditional values from Confucianism, Buddhism and Christianity, and Western consumerism and liberal democracy. What is also different, besides the much lower levels of obesity, is that Koreans—like other East Asian populations—are less politically correct, and although prone to polite discourse rather freely speak their minds, both in public and private.

Unlike Western women who tend to have a huge discrepancy between what they say and do. They often stress that they like humor and a pleasant personality, but we know that social status, specific looks, behavior, and money beat both.

Recently, an article on the Korean news site Koreaboo conveyed messages from 26 girls about which three things that they prefer in guys. Since they are anonymous, the claims are even more honest and substantial. Here are some of the quotes, and what we can learn from them.

"Someone funny
even if they're average in looks. I really like it if they smell nice.
I think attractiveness, smell, and personality are the most important."

"Tall, good-looking, and courteous."

"Visuals, characteristics, money."

"If he's clean. I don't need a handsome face. His skin, the way he dresses and his cleanliness is most important. His build. Someone bigger than me. Hands, feet, height, shoulder, everything. His personality is important too, but his behavior is more important."

"Someone who everyone agrees looks good!! He needs to look good on the outside, but the way he acts and his personality is important too. My ideal type is someone who's just great."

"To be honest... face, personality and body type."

Visuals and personality/manners are generally the most important things based on these accounts. Less of the cocky confidence and more of the well-groomed nice guy, compared to the West. Since South Korean women are on average 160.4 centimers, albeit somewhat taller in the younger ago cohorts, and often thin, most guys are naturally bigger and taller. You don't have to be really big, just taller and bigger. I had a pretty Korean girlfriend who was 5.5 and 110 lbs, whereas I am 5.6 and 160 lbs.

Loading...

But Korean girls love low body fat and nice clothes, so don't miss out on that if you are interested in dating a better-than-average-looking Korean girl. While South Korean men are associated with the thin and androgyne K-pop look, and the bulk of guys having weak game, fitness is spreading at an astonishing rate. Thus expect more females to have silicone implants and guys to be cut and jacked. If you have Instagram you'll notice.

[image]

I see that as a constructive response to smartphone-using spoiled females and somewhat unfavorable sex ratios. Korean guys have to look and act more like the K-pop celebrities, the popular fitness enthusiasts, or somewhere in between. Otherwise they end up as incels or are left with the ugliest girls.

The traits that Korean girls desire could easily transcend the national borders of South Korea, especially if one realizes that these phenomena emerged in the West in the first place. I think that what these young women are asking for are pretty much the same things as all females do.

For sure, there are palpable cultural differences in some regards, and Western women in general neither wish for, nor deserve good manners until proven worthy of such behaviors. Nevertheless looks, manners, personality and at least decent levels of money are a good start. If you're not well-educated, make sure to have at least solid common knowledge acquired through self-education (autodidacticism). It can mean everything from knowing the basics of politics and economy, to carry heavy things for a petite girl.

The local and the global are becoming intertwined, at least in the first world, as a consequence of homogenization. It is the same ideals and corresponding approaches that men and women are asking for and are committed to. Men in South Korea are not much different from American, Canadian, British, French, Australian or Swedish men, and women in other countries want essentially the same things, although with slight variations between nations and cities, and of course, individuals.

The members of the fairer sex want a guy who dresses well, has good hygiene, is fit, can conversate, and look at least like he tries his very best in regards to behavior and career goals. Some of these things can be drastically altered or improved, so don't miss out on those before you blame your genes, go MGTOW, and give up.

For more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read More: What Modern South Korea Is like

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

It’s A Mistake To Always Play Defense

January 7, 2018 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

At some point in your life, once you’ve accomplished goals centered around the pursuit of power, status, money, or women, you move from playing offense to defense. Energetic ambitions that led to action now become anxious plans of self-preservation. Once a flowing river, your life becomes a stagnant pond as you debate every little movement that you once did with little hesitation.

Defense can be a sound short-term strategy when you’re facing an acute problem that appears out of nowhere. For example, if you lost your job, it would make sense to greatly reduce your expenses until you find another one, but if no new job is forthcoming, you may be tempted to permanently alter your mentality from earning money to saving money, decreasing the odds that you’ll make a bold strike with a new investment or business.

As you may have noticed in the past couple of years, I’ve moved to a defensive posture. I have a goal to not get attacked severely, which has led me to pull a lot of punches. Articles I would have published without delay are now scrapped because I fear a worldwide response. Instead of trying to score viral hits on ROK, I became content publishing long-winded philosophical articles that readers didn't care for. Instead of trying to increase my income, I've taken decreased book earnings on the chin, without actively finding alternative sources of revenue. Instead of fighting to hold more live events, I've not attempted to hold a single one, even when I was recently back in DC and could have easily done a happy hour. Instead of saying what I want on Twitter or YouTube, I filter myself constantly to not get banned. My entire mentality has shifted from one of freedom and fun to merely hanging on, as if I'm waiting for the culture to magically heal itself so I can do what I like without having to suffer major consequences.

I see nothing wrong in lacking material goals or not wanting to hit numerical metrics, but a defensive posture operates from a foundation of fear and anxiety. You feel like you're being attacked even when you're not as your ego moves from goals of conquest to self-protection. Consider when a man breaks up with his girlfriend of many years. It's natural for him to be sad when the relationship ends, and mourn for a period of months, but if he's still crying over her for more than a year without trying to find a replacement, his need for self-protection merely ensures a lonely outcome. Adopting defense as a long-term strategy may preserve some of the money, feelings, and reputation that you're protecting, but in the long run you can't avoid suffering a slow and steady decline, all while living in greater anxiety. Smelly, sulfuric algae blooms in still water, not raging rivers.

I'm getting rather tired of playing defense. It's not that I want to anger millions of more people, or even make more money, but I want to do what I want to do without acting in fear that I may lose everything simply because I want to exercise my speech or hold a legal event. If I'm going to be a writer or publisher, I should write and publish, without a filter. Otherwise I'm just a slave, no different than a man who watches what he says in his corporate job for fear of getting fired by a Human Resources lady. The whole point of striking out on my own was to avoid that pathetic fate.

If I don't want to write or publish anymore, I should shut it all down and start a new life. Either I go all the way, taking my anchor with me, or I pass the torch to men who are more vigorous, who are eager to do what I'm too scared to do. But I still possess confidence that I have superior ability when it comes to what I'm good at, and I don't think I can accept playing defense for the rest of my days. I may have to fight the way I want, and accept whatever result the universe gives me, even if I wind up in a dungeon somewhere, somehow, wondering why I couldn't simply keep my mouth shut.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: 8 Traits That Every Successful Man Has

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Things I Learned From The Father Of The Modern Bank Robbery

January 7, 2018 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

We all want to be more efficient in our daily lives, don't we? Some people are undoubtedly better at managing their time then others, but unless you are in fact The Clock King, you could probably make yourself at least somewhat more efficient. This article will discuss methods of time management, but before we get to that, we have to discuss the interesting story of a guy who used military precision to commit crimes—a sterling example of "rogue learning," lessons learned from bad people.

A Brief Bio of Herman Lamm

As I like to say, you can learn just as much from a bad person as you can from a good person, in one way or another. And Herman Lamm (the man in the above image) certainly proves that to be the case.

Originally a Prussian military officer, Lamm immigrated to the USA in the early 20th century, and quickly established himself as a bank robber—and an exemplary one—by using his military training to develop contingency plans for if the plan went wrong, and all in all "taking the guesswork" out of crime. Developing techniques such as casing out the bank, timing the operation (always pulling out within 5 minutes, regardless of the amount of money looted), and designating roles for each member of the gang, Lamm is to this day known as the father of modern robbery.

Although I have no interest in crime, I can see how military efficiency and "Deutscheprezision" can be useful for a man on the right side of the law in addition to the wrong one.

So if you feel that you don't have time for anything other than eating, sleeping, and fapping, perhaps you ought to take a long look at your life and see if it can't be made more efficient, and thus apply the "Lamm" technique to your own life.

And with that, I feel we can devise some general tips on efficiency. Some of them may seem obvious to you, or may already be something you use, but I've always felt that there are no things so obvious that at least one dumbass out there didn’t get it the first time.

1. Realize that most of what you do in the day is unimportant.

Without any exaggeration I can say that most of what you think is important…is not. So if you want to be more efficient, cut out the hours of Twitter or Netflix or anything else. If you MUST have some sort of background noise, put on a podcast and move on. Simple!

2. Prioritize!

People occasionally ask me how I could possibly write two articles, make a video, and work a day job each and every week, in addition to the various long term projects I do. There's a few factors, but the first one is that I have learned how to prioritize what has to be done immediately. Those tasks are always the ones I complete first. Think about what has to be done today, or within the week, and get that stuff done first.

It works best if, at the start of your week, you think and objectively write down what tasks are the most important to be done, and which can be put off until after the priorities are done. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," and all that.

3. Timers

So you've written out a daily schedule. Good for you! Any musician will tell you that the easiest way to learn a song is to subdivide it into easily digestible chunks, and you can do that by timing your daily tasks to avoid wasting dead time and thus stay as efficient as possible.

An example of this: I do timed shadow boxing as a cardio workout, in five minute intervals, but when the bell goes off for each interval, I will of course be tired and occasionally I'll waste time by recuperating, changing my music/podcast, etc.

But I figured out a way to maximize my time: I do timed rest intervals with productive non-strenuous activity in between. In other words, after each round of shadowboxing, I will do a timed two minute interval of body hardening, sandblasting, or stretching. Thus I get a complete martial arts workout in less than one hour.

4. "Work While At Work"

And now, my dirty little secret for maximizing profitability—I make the pointless make-work of modern life productive by doing other labors during the 9-5. While as a personal trainer my day to day job is probably more productive than your average cubicle jockey, the majority of my time is not, in fact, training people.

As I explain in this article, the majority of the time a personal trainer is engaged in long periods of being a glorified janitor, a glorified file clerk, or doing nothing at all (yeah yeah, it's supposed to be "mingling with the attendees", but like hell I want to talk about sportsball with some normie with a dadbod).

Thus, I find myself packing a little pocket notebook in my back pocket to jot down ideas for articles. Depending on your situation and interests, you can bring a sketchpad, or a blueprint for some project, or a paperback. Or, even if you've just got your phone, download the Kindle App and read a book instead of blowing 10 minutes on Facebook.

When you get productive things done at work, that leaves you more time to relax at home. Just make sure that your boss doesn't see you, which is why I recommend something that fits in your pocket.

While my life on paper doesn't seem much like that of Herr Lamm, in meticulously planning things out, I find that, like him, I can become more efficient at what I endeavor.

Read More: Why Your Father Is Helpless At Teaching You How To Succeed In The Modern World

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

American Girl Accused Four Men Of Rape Because She Wanted To Get Out Of Drunk Driving Charge

January 8, 2018 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Four members of Polish metal band Decapitated have had charges of kidnapping and rape against them dropped in Washington State. From September to December, they served time in jail, first in California and then in Washington when they were extradited. Two women had made sexual allegations after a concert in Spokane in late August.

> The victim's friend was pulled over later that night and cited with a DUI. While in the back of the patrol car, she told the officer her friend was being assaulted, but without a specific location the officer was unable to help.

This is just one part of the ridiculous series of events surrounding two women's allegations of rape against members of the Polish band Decapitated. Why didn't she call 911 for her friend before the DUI (driving under the influence)?

The primary accuser, who insisted all four band members gang raped her, has previously admitted lying to police about a domestic dispute with her boyfriend. Another woman first reported the allegations to an officer "while in the back of the patrol car" upon being caught driving drunk. Why this secondary accuser only told the authorities of her pal's "kidnapping" and "rape" following her own arrest for breaking the law is beyond comprehension. What happened to calling 911 to try and save your friend?

Though the main rape accuser cited bruises as "evidence" of her claims, witnesses from the concert countered that the woman had been in the mosh pit, where wild but typical metal music dancing and jostling regularly takes place. One Australian musician, from another band touring with Decapitated, said “she was violently dancing” at the event.

Who’s going to compensate these men?

Who’s going to reimburse these men for their jail time, without them even facing a trial? Well, no one.

Almost certainly no one. Yet, notwithstanding prosecutors’ refusal to commence the trial, the innocent band members, Waclaw Kieltyka, Michal Lysejko, Rafal Piotrowski, and Hubert Wiecek, have all served more jail time than many unrepentant, proven criminals. They have undoubtedly spent many thousands of dollars on lawyers, lost income from their time in prison, and had their reputations trashed. Oh, and surprise, surprise: the accusers have not been named in the media.

The “journalist” in the most recent article concerning the matter, Jonathan Glover, continues to inexcusably refer to the accuser as “the victim.” We can tell that the band members will always be regarded by the media and others as guilty felons.

When prosecutors turn Orwellian

And putting men in jail for “rape” without a trial or evidence is “justice”…

Spokane County Deputy Prosecutor Kelly Fitzgerald mentioned a number of bizarre but sadly common “reasons” for dropping the charges. “The well being of the victim” and “in the interest of justice” are just cop-outs, unless by “justice” she means the right of the Poles not to go on trial based on virtually non-existent evidence.

Even if we assumed that both girls were not lying, prosecutors knew from the start that the charges involved “a multiple defender case.” It supposedly required four months for them to realize that prosecuting four men at the same time would be additionally “traumatizing” for the woman. How convenient.

Fitzgerald, despite her job to organize cases based on evidence, is all about feelz and not facts:

> We’ve discussed with her [the accuser] and her advocates and feel at this time it’s best for her to heal.

If the evidence is “sufficient” (a term already set at a dangerously low bar in the current “he said, she said” climate), prosecutors proceed with the trial. When the evidence is much more than insufficient, however, prosecutors declare that they are dropping charges to ensure “the well being of the victim.” It is simply all a smokescreen to cover the frequently flimsy cases “supporting” allegations of rape.

What happens when accusers don’t screw up or aren’t caught lying?

It now works for DUI arrests, too.

I have lost track of the number of times when I have said that what undoes most of these publicized rape cases is a history of lying from the accuser or "smoking gun" revelations that definitively prove any sex was consensual or didn't happen at all. For Liam Allan in the UK, 40,000 messages helped save his skin, for example.

The members of Decapitated have been incredibly hard done by, but they are also incredibly lucky. If these two groupie women had not had all this baggage, like the prior lying to police and only reporting the "rape" after being arrested for driving drunk, the standard criminal procedure of "he said, she said," trial, and conviction without any substantial evidence whatsoever would have very likely occurred.

There is presently a whole lot more evidence to suggest that the women are lying, but we can be sure that these accusers will never face prosecution, let alone jail time for falsely reporting rape and kidnapping.

Read More: Jail For Sending A Girl's Naked Photos, No Jail For Fracturing A Man's Skull

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Is The US Government Planning A Fake Alien Invasion?

January 8, 2018 | by Ted Deveer | Link | Original Link

As utterly insane as it sounds, it seems possible that the US Government is preparing to try to convince the world that there is an alien invasion about to happen, in the largest "false flag" since 9/11.

You're probably bursting out laughing now and asking yourself, "Why would Roosh allow such a crackpot to write an article?" and I'd like to preemptively respond by (a) asking you to give me the benefit of the doubt for the course of these 1,000 words, (b) noting that this is just a hypothesis that we will see proven or disproven over the next months, and (c) making clear: I don't believe in UFOs or alien lifeforms but I do believe that the media puts on large-scale coordinated shows in conjunction with the government.

Here are five reasons why I think the show—which I'll call the "Aliens (Bio)attack!" Show—is likely to happen over the next months.

1. The US government is suddenly talking about UFOs

First, in December, the NY Times had an expose which argued that (a) the Department of Defense has videos taken by Air Force pilots of what it believes are UFOs (the video is included in the article at that link); (b) the DoD has some of the materials collected from these UFOs secretly that they are studying; (c) the DoD has a secret department dedicated to tracking UFOs; and (d) many high-level people within the DoD, who have access to classified intelligence that we don't have access to, believe in UFOs.

This leads me to one of only two conclusions: either aliens exist or the US Government wants us to think that aliens exist. I'm going to make an assumption—that may or may not be true but it's just a belief I have—that either aliens don't exist or if they do they're not in contact with the US government.

I'm a bit too scientific, not to mention too skeptical of what the government tells us, to believe in extraterrestrial intelligence. If you believe the US government is in contact with aliens, then click away—the rest of this article isn't for you. This leaves me with only one conclusion: for some reason, the DoD wants us to think aliens exist. Why would they want to do that?

2. The media is excited to spread UFO theories

Second, this article is part of a deluge from the mass media of alien articles over the last months. And we know that the US federal government has deep ties to the press. Just days before the NY Times expose, Newsweek published "Alien Life: Europa Plate Tectonics could be Feeding Life on Icy Jupiter Moon" (Dec 5th 2017) and "Do Aliens Exist?" (Dec 8th 2017), presciently predicting the trend of the month. Google Trends shows how it's suddenly being spoken about online non-stop out of the blue.

Incredibly, the CIA's official Twitter account is now tweeting with instructions on how to take photos of UFOs. In October, NASA claimed that a cylindrical asteroid-like object that they can't identify is flying 100,000 mph in our solar system, but it is from another solar system, the first time ever an object is in our solar system that originated in a different one. It has apparently been named Oumuamua, which doubly-presciently means "messenger" in Hawaiian.

Loading...
All the articles before the expose and the official CIA tweets about it make it harder to argue that it's just a cool topic for the media to talk about since the expose; it must be deeper than that.

3. Aliens make for a great external threat that can get citizens to rally behind the government

Third, it makes sense for the government to do this, from their eyes. It's a way to unite the entire country (or world) against a common enemy, while also an excuse for a power grab. And an easy way to steal more money—oh, we need vaccines against alien viruses, my friend's company happens to make them and it will cost $10 billion—but we need it!

Plus, if the deep state is in a war against the President, as seems to be the case, then the deep state probably needs to activate some pretty extreme contingency backup plans it had been planning for a long time. Break glass in case of emergency.

4. Alien-obsessed Blink 182 singer is deeply connected to the CIA/NSA apparatus

Fourth, there's a weird connection with Tom DeLonge, the singer of Blink 182. He just created a UFO-seeking company whose board and advisors are all the first rate CIA/NSA operatives. And he goes on Joe Rogan's podcast and has a bizarre interview in which he seems to know nothing about UFOs or his new company.

The best synthesis of DeLonge's weird behavior—creating this UFO company, somehow getting all these top CIA/NSA operatives as his advisors, yet knowing nothing about any of it—is that he's a front man, trying to use his huge following to bring more widespread acceptance to his "belief" in aliens.

5. The “aliens attack” plan was long ago revealed through code name Project Blue Beam

Fifth, there have been conspiracy theories in which people have been whispering about this for decades. Just Google “Project Blue Beam” or “Serge Monast” and many articles, from decades ago, will discuss these multi-decade plans. A good starting point is a speech Monast gave summarizing Project Blue Beam 20 years ago, shortly before his mysterious death.

Another good starting point is RationalWiki’s page about it, which—although it argues this is a fake conspiracy theory and doesn’t exist—is an excellent summary of the idea. Plus reading and considering both sides of any debate with an open mind is essential to intellectual honesty.

How will it play out? I have no idea. But I’m willing to put forth a testable hypothesis: over 2018, we’re going to see more and more media about aliens, including more top scientists (“Stephen Hawking”—name in quotes on purpose) and Hollywood celebrities believing in UFOs and that they’re coming. This is testable using Google Trends to track what’s being discussed online. All this chatter led by the Mainstream Media will build up to some sort of attack, likely a bioattack, that may or may not happen in 2018.

Lets see how this plays out, but regardless of whether it happens or not… we live in interesting times.

Much more about conspiracy theories and protecting your privacy.

Read More: How the Deep State Operates

Ted Deveer
I'm Ted, I read old books, and my interest in Stanley Kubrick has nothing, absolutely nothing, to do with my interest in conspiracy theories, not at all, no way. And I like my privacy.

How To Meet Girls Who Work In Retail

January 8, 2018 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Approaching retail assistants working in stores is a subset of day game that is not discussed as frequently as it should be. Department stores are filled with attractive young women who are frequently very bored and receptive to game. If you become proficient at this type of game then it opens up a whole world of opportunities hot girls every time you visit the mall.

That’s not to say that retail assistant game is without its pitfalls. Because the other side of the coin is that such girls are fully aware of their sexual market value and are not unused to getting hit on by hapless customers. As a result, rather like we see with night game, their hauteur is turned up to the max and they will gladly rebuff any half-hearted advance swiftly and brutally.

So what are the key things that you need to know if you’re keen to try retail assistant game? The first is that you must choose the right stores to target. This will obviously depend entirely on your location and what is on offer in your town or city, but for my money large department stores work really well.

In London we are fortunate enough to have several of these, including the world-famous Harrods and Selfridges. Both of these are huge expanses of platinum-level retail experience aimed squarely at rich Russian, Chinese, Middle-Eastern and Nigerian customers (as well as a few English aristocrats and hordes of tourists).

In both there is a predominance of hugely attractive, well turned-out young women recruited especially to serve these discerning customers.

You need to find the equivalent in your locale. And if you live in the country then unfortunately as with most types of game this is really weighted towards urban areas, so if you want to reap the rewards you should either consider travelling or relocating entirely.

Once you have chosen your target store, there are several other factors you must bear in mind if you want to be successful.

The first is your presentation—that is, the way you look and the way you are dressed. Bottom line, it has to be good. Very good. Remember that you will be approaching girls who are working in an extremely superficial environment where appearance is everything. And on top of that, if it’s an expensive place they will be used to serving well-off guys who are extremely well-groomed.

As such, before you go out for a retail assistant game session you should spend as much time getting ready as you would if you were going out at night. Make sure your hair is well-cut and styled. Wear well-fitting clothes: they don’t need to be expensive but they do need to accentuate your figure.

Furthermore, if it’s cold and you are wearing a coat ensure you choose one that looks good and makes you stand out. I recently had sex with a Serbian store assistant. Afterwards I asked her what is was about me that had impressed her. ‘Your confidence and your Putin-style coat’, she told me. My coat, from the UK men’s store Reiss, is a dark green military number with black furry collars. It is flamboyant enough to differentiate me, and it certainly appealed to this former fashion student and seamstress.

Mention of confidence brings me on to the next point. You have to be confident to properly execute this form of game. Why? Because you are subverting the standard transactional relationship that exists between store assistant and customer. You are effectively saying ‘no, I refuse to allow you to treat me as a customer. I am a man, you are a woman and that is the basis on which we will interact.’ Which is fine, but you need balls to do it well.

How to ensure you have the requisite balls? I have recently had three successes from retail assistant game—the above-mentioned Serbian girl, a Lithuanian girl who came back to my apartment with on the first date and a Polish girl who I am currently dating. I acquired two of those three phone numbers on the same day, a day during which I walked around Harrods chatting to various sales assistants.

Loading...

Clearly, for whatever reason my vibe was particularly ‘on’ that day, presumably as a result of all the cold-approaching I’d been doing throughout the last quarter of 2017. And that is important to keep in mind. Perhaps more than with any other kind of game you need to be on top form to make retail assistant game really sing. If not then you just won’t have the necessary extra juice to cut through the bitch shield crap and stand out.

In view of this, my practice—and the one I would recommend—is that you get at least two or three approaches under your belt before you hit the store. That way you’ll be warmed up and have momentum to carry you through your interactions.

Be The Lover, Not The Provider

Another thing to bear in mind is that you should aim to come across as a lover rather than a provider. Retail assistants get hit on all the time by rich, older men who are often married. In London alone it is incredible how many trips to Dubai, Paris and the Caribbean are offered to girls in their twenties by out-of-shape men in their fifties keen to bang them.

With some girls under some circumstances this clearly works, but that is not what we are interested in here. In order to differentiate yourself from such guys you should make it clear in the way you walk up and speak to her that you are not a sugar daddy, but a normal man who wants to get to know her better.

Which leads me on to the age-old question of what you should say. Just recently I've been keeping it really simple and really direct with good results. Simply walking up to the girl giving out perfume samples and telling her you couldn't help but notice that she looks really pretty should be quite sufficient to get a conversation going.

After that I would normally tell her something that I have noticed about her and bust her balls on it. You don't need to be an expert cold reader to do this. Just tell her that she looks bored, like a naughty kid about to run off as soon as the bell goes, or something silly like that.

If and when she hooks—that is, makes it clear that she's interested in talking to you—you need to transition into normal conversation. Chit chat about her day will normally be sufficient. Just be natural and drop the over 'gameiness'.

Finally, you need to bring the conversation to an end and get her phone number. I normally say this:

"So listen, I know you're at work and you're extremely busy right now, but another time I'd love to take you for a wine. Let's exchange details."

If she's amenable then she should then indicate to you what contact details she would prefer to give you and how. In some stores it is against the rules for staff to give out their telephone numbers to customers. However,if she tells you her full name then you can add her on Facebook. This is how I got in touch with the Lithuanian girl after our first meeting.

Other girls will be happy to write their phone numbers down for you on a receipt: the important thing is just to play it cool, go with whatever is easiest for her, and above all show discretion. After all, this is her place of work.

Fed up with loneliness and an empty dating life? Need clear, actionable advice that actually works and doesn't promise the moon like other useless PUA bull you've read? Then click the link to order your copy of Troy's game book The 7 Laws of Seduction.

Read More: Airport Game Is The Best Form Of Game For The International Traveller

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How To Cook Damn Good Rice, Risotto, And Pilaf

January 8, 2018 | by Bruno Buscaroli | Link | Original Link

Rice has been a vital part of diets throughout the world (particularly in Asia) for thousands of years. Today, it's the second most grown grain after corn. Considering most corn grown today is used to feed cattle (expand later), rice is actually the most widely consumed grain worldwide. That being said, it's amazing how many people (especially in the West) can't cook rice without a rice cooker. But should civilization fall, there'll be no electricity to power rice cookers. So I'll share a few recipes I use to make some damn good rice.

Normal Rice

First up is your no-nonsense cup of plain rice. It’s the easiest to make and my go-to for when I just need some rice to go with meat or chicken. The simplest way to make it is to simply measure the rice, put it in a saucepan and cover with twice as much water. So if you’re making one cup of rice, use two cups of water.

For extra flavor, you could fry a bit of garlic or onions on the saucepan before adding the rice. Bring the water to a boil, add salt to taste, and wait for the water level to drop a little. Once it’s almost down to the level of the rice, lower the heat of the stove to minimum, cover the saucepan and let it cook for twenty minutes. Then remove from the fire, remove the lid and stir the rice a little. You should be left with some nice and fluffy rice with no excess moisture.

Risotto

Now we're getting to some fancier stuff. Risotto is Italy's signature rice dish, known for it's creamy texture and rich flavor. Making it is more time consuming than normal rice, but it's still relatively simple. Serve it on special occasions or when you want to impress. First, you'll need to cut some onions into chunks, make them a bit bigger than your thumbnail. Then melt a bit of butter on a deep pan and throw the onions in (about 1/2 an onion per cup of rice should work nicely).

Pan should be similar to this one

Cook the onions on medium heat until they're translucent and then add risotto rice. This is the most important detail. The rice you use must be risotto rice, otherwise the texture won't be the same. Even supermarkets sell risotto rice nowadays, so it shouldn't be hard to find.

Stir the rice together with the onions, splash in a bit of wine if you have some handy, and then start adding liquid until it just about covers the rice (broth works best, but in a pinch water can work). For the next 20-30 minutes you're gonna have to keep stirring the rice and adding liquid as it starts to dry up. It should be ready once the grains of rice feel a bit soft (but not too much).

Remove the pan from the fire and cover it with a clean piece of cloth for 5-10 minutes. Add some cheese (preferably parmesan) or extra taste and enjoy.

Pilaf

For my final recipe, we're going with pilaf. It's a staple dish in India and parts of the Middle East. In terms of preparation, it's easier to make than risotto, but harder than standard rice. So if you're feeling up for it, it's a nice way to improve your meal.

In order to make it, you'll have to cut some onions into chunks about twice as big as your thumbnail. Heat up some oil or butter in a pan and add the onions (as with risotto, 1/2 an onion per cup of rice works best). The oil you choose will, in this case, affect the flavor so choose one you like. Personally, I like to use either butter or sesame oil.

Cook the onions on medium heat until they're halfway transparent, then add the uncooked rice. Add a bit more oil and toast the uncooked rice together with the onions for a few minutes. Once it's toasted a bit, add about 1 3/4 cups of water or broth per cup of rice to the pan, bring to a boil, set on low heat and cover. Let it cook for some 15-16 minutes, then remove the pan from the stove and leave it covered for some 5-6 more minutes before serving. The resulting rice goes well mixed with meat or vegetables.

A deeper look into rice is beyond the scope of this article, but I hope this was a good starting point. Any man benefits greatly from being able to cook. Rice, being such a common foodstuff, should be no exception. Even if civilization doesn't fall, being able to make good rice is valuable in of itself.

Read More: How To Cook Four Delicious Entrées

Bruno Buscaroli

Bruno is a young man who used to dismiss red pillers as alarmists. Then he spent a semester in a college campus and became one himself. Now he educates himself through the internet and a library card.

Straight Men Will Soon Be Called Homophobic For Not Sleeping With Gays And Trannies

January 9, 2018 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In 2017, straight men who refuse to date biological males dressed like women were shamed on a number of occasions for being "transphobic." We should expect that at some stage, very possibly in 2018 or 2019, heterosexual males will also begin to be attacked en masse for not wanting to have sex with men.

Obsessions over "gender fluidity" and the rise of SJW brainwashing amongst kids, including those in elementary school, mean that expressing a perfectly normal and healthy heterosexual preference is becoming increasingly hard. In Australia, one notorious transgender Marxist, Roz Ward, went so far as to make up "statistics" saying that half of all teenagers are sexually attracted to their own sex. What will the claimed figure be in 2018 or 2019 and how will that impact on guys who know they are only attracted to women?

You don't have a right not to date transgenders

Soon your lack of a right not to date a transgender “woman” will be extended to gays.

After straight men understandably began to report transgenders messaging them on Tinder, outlets such as The Huffington Post came to the rescue, decrying the rampant “transphobia” in the dating market. In another instance of typical SJW hysteria, a contestant on The Bachelorette got into hot water for verbalizing a common enough concern of men, namely that heavily dolled-up transgender “women” regularly try to pass themselves off as biological women. With this sort of putrid political climate, it is very easy to imagine a time when not being sexually attracted to Barry or Steve will be equated with anti-gay “bigotry” as well.

Indicating the warped social totem pole that is regularly putting transgenders above women, straight females are also being shamed, albeit to a lesser extent than heterosexual men. CNN, for example, just couldn’t figure out why the majority of women weren’t open to dating this transgender “man,” as if genitalia were a completely irrelevant part of sexuality. Who would have known!

The stage is set

GQ used to be geared towards men who wanted to dress well but were still straight. Not anymore.

SJWs do not want tolerance. They want a kind of uniformity, where the groups we are meant to accept and praise actually end up dictating what someone else can or cannot do sexually. The failure of most men (or women) to want to date a transgender is a setback, for sure, but this will not stop SJWs from continuing their agenda in the same and other ways.

Even "men's" magazines are now part of the fray, joining a series of outlets celebrating supposedly straight males who screw gay guys. GQ continued its abysmal fall in 2017 by publishing "The straight men dating men and the gay men who fall in love with them." Salon, however, is a very unsurprising offender for its long-term pushing of straight men's "malleable" sexualities. All we are missing at the moment are widespread calls for men to stop being "homophobic" and give themselves to other men fully.

Just wait and see

An 8-year-old boy from Montreal who is forced to sexualize himself for LGBT audiences.

As a result of the negative reception most folks gave to the idea of dating a transgender, some might say that this article is alarmist. Well, I would counter that since we have already seen the sexualization of children according to SJW ideology, it is perfectly foreseeable that straight adult males will be encouraged or shamed into wanting sex with men. If this article is proven wrong, it will be either due to blind luck or because we see positive, long-awaited developments in the West.

Remember, probably well over 50% of discussions about sexuality nowadays concern lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender experiences, despite people of these orientations comprising perhaps 4% of the population. If this is not a sign that your heterosexuality is considered abnormal or not fully acceptable by SJWs and their enablers, I don't know what is.

Read More: Studies Prove Lesbians Batter Their Partners More Than Straight Men

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Our Degenerate Obsession With Porn Began With The 1972 Film Deep Throat

January 9, 2018 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Deep Throat (1972) was the first "blue movie" to become a major blockbuster. This film—and Supreme Court decisions tinkering with the legal definition of obscenity—became a game changer for the porn industry. Because of its considerable cultural significance, the story deserves (if you'll pardon the expression) a deep dive.

Get thee to a nunnery

Not quite in the cards

Linda Boreman (stage name Lovelace) grew up in NYC, moving to Florida with her family at sixteen. Per the Daily Mail:

> At high school they called her ‘Miss Holy Holy’ because she wanted to become a nun and always kept the boys at arm’s length.

However, her path didn’t exactly lead to a convent. She had a baby out of wedlock, who was put up for adoption. Her parents were pretty strict. The 2013 Lovelace film biography showed her mother slapping her for returning very late after a hot date.

Becoming the first big porn star might be considered the ultimate “Fuck you, Dad” moment. However, the reason wasn’t more rebellion, but rather her future husband, Chuck Traynor. Although Lovelace depicts her parents as “squares”, ultimately they were right about this topless bar owner, among other things.

A hell of a way to become famous

The happy couple in 1970. No, that’s not Charles Manson.

Under Traynor’s influence—what form that took is hotly disputed—she began acting in porn. Beginning in 1969, she starred in four known 8mm loops. The material is a little too exotic even for today’s mainstream porn (such as it is). She denied making them until the proof came to light. Besides that, the less said about these early productions, the better.

The big breakout was 1972’s Deep Throat. Unlike the typical porn of the time, this one actually had a plot. The premise is that her clitoris was in her throat—pretty silly, but it worked. The June 5 issue of Screw described it:

> Lovelace, wrote Mr. Goldstein, “is almost a Ripley’s Believe-It-Or-Not as she takes the whole joint down her gullet. No, it’s not a small-potato penis but a roustabout rod of ten inches that plummets into the deepest recesses of our lady’s oral cavity. It seems a miracle. […] I was never so moved by any theatrical > performance since stuttering through my own bar mitzvah.”

Apparently the movie itself doesn’t suck.

What’s truly remarkable is that it brought porn to new heights of respectability, for lack of better words. This one was shown not in little arcades with a slot for quarters and a hole in the wall, but on big screens. Millions saw it—even prominent celebrities—not just dudes in long raincoats haunting Times Square. It became the subject of late night comedy shows, and even was the codename for the Watergate informer.

After that, Confessions of Linda Lovelace appeared in 1973. Deep Throat 2 was released in 1974, but she refused a sex role as she began having second thoughts. Traynor forcing her into prostitution likely spurred along this decision. She had become the first major porn star, but certainly not the last one chewed up and spat out by the experience.

After Traynor

Soon they separated. Eventually she turned on Traynor and the pornographic industry with Ordeal (1980) and Out Of Bondage (1986), contrasting with two 1974 pro-porn memoirs. (Writing two more autobiographies than Obama is no mean feat.) The particulars have been disputed.

I’ll admit that I’ve never seen Deep Throat. However, accounts from the crew on that film (and other ones) indicate that the narrative in Ordeal was somewhat true, somewhat exaggerated. They note that there were bruises on her leg, and describe big fights off the set. Traynor himself admitted beating her, and this worm considered himself justified.

Even so, on the set, they say she seemed happy and under no duress. If there were a gun to her head (as she alleged), likely the degree of method-acting to maintain composure would’ve been impossible. Hugh Hefner himself met her and later said she seemed pretty enthusiastic. (I’ll leave out the specifics.)

Is it plausible that she became enthralled with a wretched knucklehead hooked on cocaine, controlling and insanely jealous even while pimping her out? Absolutely! Greasy charm alternating with smacky-face is an extremely effective Push-Pull strategy, though I certainly don't recommend it. The sad truth is that many women—particularly with low self-esteem and family troubles—just eat up that bullshit like candy. Witnessing loser appeal is quite infuriating for any decent guy who works productively, treats women like proper ladies, and doesn't commit crimes. For many guys who've done everything right according to society, that's their first Red Pill, and the bitterest.

Loading…

According to Linda's later accounts, she wanted to leave for years. This seems implausible. Stockholm Syndrome cases can't get enough of it, until one too many black eyes finally clues them into the utter irrationality. Apparently it's all fun and games until things get real. Likely her own drug use was a contributing factor too. I'll give her credit for wising up; everyone makes mistakes. Still, repentance is best when it includes fully acknowledging one's role.

The 2013 biopic ends with Linda reconciling with her parents, together with her new husband and their children. She finally found happiness as a proper wife and mother. Things were surely orders of magnitude better than before, but didn't go perfectly—they divorced in 1996.

The feminist connection

Andrea Dworkin, feminist and cheeseburger addict

After being the Sexual Revolution's poster child, later she championed the 1980s anti-pornography cause. This brought her into the orbit of Gloria Steinem and other feminists. However, she became disenchanted. Per The Other Hollywood:

> Between Andrea Dworkin and Kitty MacKinnon, they've written so many books, and they mention my name and all that, but financially they've never helped me out. When I showed up with them for speaking engagements, I'd always get five hundred dollars or so. But I know they made a few bucks off me, just like > everybody else.

Even so, although I really hate to agree with feminists about anything, they're partially right. The "adult entertainment" industry was—and remains—pretty grubby. For this reason, I turned down a job supporting porn sites, although I desperately needed the money then. The business associate (shall we say) of one of my former girlfriends—it's a long story—hit me up. However, I told this lady that it led to nowhere for the performers, and I couldn't participate. That hurt her feelings, though it wasn't my intention.

The aftermath of Deep Throat

This low-budget effort, a week-long shoot costing $22.5K, had the best return-on-investment ratio of any movie. Gross revenue was perhaps $100 million, though six times higher by another estimate. That was much more back then, thanks to politicians repeatedly swiping the unlimited Federal Reserve credit card. The lower figure is half a billion today, after adjusting for the inflation tax.

The New York Mafia, which financed and distributed it, screwed the actual producer out of his third of the profits. (Did I mention that the porn industry is grubby?) Linda herself earned merely $1250 for the acting role. However, this measly sum probably went straight up Chuck's nose.

This film launched the so-called "Golden Age of porn", starting an avalanche. The grainy 8mm loops in "24 hour news stands" became unfashionable. Soon, big-screen X-rated theaters littered bad neighborhoods everywhere. During the 1980s, VHS tapes became available for rental. However, the Internet enabled pornography's critical mass, with millions of zombies fapping for hours over weird crap. It's been a long race to the bottom since the 1970s. Today, skin flicks with plots that featured normal looking people doing fairly ordinary bedroom stuff probably wouldn't sell.

Ultimately, Deep Throat—and the Burger Court's decisions—paved the way for one enriching facet of the New, Improved America. Pornographers became "champions of the First Amendment", in the way that Mafiosos are champions of the Fifth Amendment. Beyond what the feminists described, there are many other reasons why that was a wrong turn, but all that's another story.

Read More: Is This Pornstar A True Friend Of Feminism?

Beau Albrecht
My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

The “Free Market” Is A Myth

January 9, 2018 | by Jared Trueheart | Link | Original Link

> Practical men, who believe themselves to be quite exempt from any intellectual influences, are usually the slaves of some defunct economist.
> —John Maynard Keynes

The dumbest thing that otherwise smart people glorify is the free market. It’s the central ideology of libertarians, the party of people who pride themselves on sounding much smarter than they actually are. That alone should make you question free market rhetoric.

Ben Shapiro is a smart guy, but when he preaches the free market myth, his intellectual faced fades just enough to expose the personal greed in his heart. Adam Carolla is an insightful guy with an interesting rags-to-riches story, but when he starts talking about a free market economy powered by competition, it only shows how out of touch he is with his roots as a construction worker.

In the video below Ben Shapiro interviews Ann Coulter about her book on immigration. She argues that its America’s biggest problem very well. While Ann says that it hurts American workers when companies hire Indian immigrants using H1-B visas, Ben argues that by not allowing that it could hurt free market choice. Ann replies by saying that doesn’t really matter unless it works for Americans.

Ann is patriot and cares about American workers. Ben is greedy and cares about his stocks.

The Lie We Want To Believe

The best book exposing the free market fallacy is The Transformation of American Capitalism by John R. Munkirs. It’s hard to find and can sell for hundreds but if you’re lucky you can find a cheap copy like I did.

In chapter two of the book, Munkirs gives a chronology of this myth starting at the 1860s. After our nation was founded we had a period of expansion. Industries were being established. Urban populations rose. Infrastructure was in perpetual development. Westward expansion lead to what might be the only true free market in any industrialized state—The Wild West.

Once businesses and industries were established, monopolies formed under the name trusts. A trust is an umbrella corporation that controls all the stocks and holdings of the businesses in the trust. In effect, trusts and later holding companies (same thing, different name) acted as monopolies. They were able to use their resources to easily establish dominance over businesses not in the trust.

The free market economy driven by consumer choice quickly became an irrational ideology. The government still believed in it though. In his book The Folklore of Capitalism, Assistant Attorney General of the U.S. during the 1930s Thurman Arnold writes, “…the anti-trust laws enabled men to look at a highly organized and centralized industrial organization and still believe that it was composed of individuals engaged in buying and selling in a free market.”

Here is a picture I took from my copy of the book. It shows how much of an industry was controlled by just a few trusts/holding companies and which families dominated those trusts. Notice that Rockefeller comes up frequently.

Table 1

Selected Industrial Trusts and/or Holding Companies Formed at the Turn of the Century

Trust/holding company	Approximate percentage of domestic production accounted for	Approximate number of original companies absorbed*	Dominant family(ies)
1. Petroleum
Standard Oil Alliance, 1887
Standard Oil Trust, 1892
Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, 1899 (New Jersey)	84	240	Rockefeller
2. Smelting
American Smelting & Refining Co. (New Jersey)	85	121	Guggenheim Rockefeller
3. Sugar
American Sugar Refining Company, 1891 (New Jersey)	85	55	Havemeyer
4. Copper
Amalgamated Copper Company, 1901 (New Jersey)	35	11	Rockefeller Stillman
5. Tobacco
Consolidated Tobacco Company, 1901 (New Jersey)	90	150	Ryan, Duke Rockefeller
6. Steel
United States Steel Corporation, 1901 (New Jersey)	70	785	Morgan Rockefeller
7. Atlantic shipping
International Mercantile Marine Company, 1902 (New Jersey)	40	6	Morgan

Source: John Moody, The Truth About the Trusts, reprinted in (New York: Greenwood Press Publishers, 1968), pp. 452, 454. First published by John Moody, 1904.

Note: See Endnote on page 19 for a discussion of the relationship between trusts and holding companies.

*J. P. Morgan created the United States Steel Corporation in 1901 after initially purchasing the Carnegie Company of New Jersey for $480,000,000 from Andrew Carnegie. This particular consolidation involved only 11 companies in addition to the Carnegie Company, the Federal Steel Company, the American Steel and Wire Company, the National Tube Company, the National Steel Company, the American Tin and Plate Company, the American Steel Hoop Company, the American Sheet Steel Company, the American Bridge Company, the Lake Superior Consolidated Iron Mines, the Bessemer Steamship Company, and the Shelby Steel Tube Company. But these 11 companies had themselves been created by combining some 785 companies. Thus, these holding companies were the end result of numerous combinations that had occurred over a period of several decades.

The free market at work

The Dog and Pony Show

Eventually there was enough outcry from citizens that the government had to do something. That's when TrustBuster Teddy Roosevelt stepped in. Long story short, Congress passed a few bills in to law but they were poorly worded, poorly supported, and poorly enforced. Naturally, they were ineffectual.

This cycle of increasing monopolization, public outcry, and ineffectual legislation repeated itself a few times up to the 1970s (the book was published in 1985).

Various economists justified the system in a few ways. They said countervailing powers like unions kept the adverse effects of the market in check. (How strong are our unions today?) They said the government should only intervene to keep unemployment low and wages high. (How well did the government do at the only two things it should do according to idealized economist John Keynes? Yet somehow the government successfully bailed out banks and the automotive industry).

The government at work

2008-2016 Really shows you something

Do We Even Want A Free Market?

Our economy is better described as being dominated by oligopolies (which act more like monopolies than free market competitors). The rest of Munkirs' book describes how companies in the same industry share many of the same board members (that would make competition pretty hard I imagine). It goes in to great detail describing how the guys who sit on so many of these boards are able to manipulate the market and an industry at their whim.

There are downsides to this type of economy: low wages, long hours, high unemployment, etc., but these are also the only organizations that can give consumers what they want—mass produced goods widely distributed for cheap and the technology to achieve this. How outraged are people about their low wages when they can still walk out of Wal-Mart with bags of cheap crap?

Modern technology has only emphasized how easily subdued we are. How many people should have been outraged by the big bank bail out but were scrolling through Facebook instead?

Like it or not, concentration of wealth in the hands of the few makes social mobility increasingly impossible. The economy we have in America enables this and has been getting better at doing so for 150 years. Cheap goods trick people into believing the free market myth. Social media sedates people in to not caring. Smart phones ensure people never have to look up and see the truth behind the free market myth. And if that wasn't enough, intellectual fools like Ben Shapiro confirm what blue pill economists want to believe.

Read More: Why Free Market Economics Isn't Working As Advertised

Jared Trueheart

Jared is a middle-aged guy full of old-man wisdom. He's best described as a gentlemen scholar and a man among men. You can read his writing at his site: Legends of Men

The Incredible Health Benefits Of Turmeric

January 9, 2018 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

After struggling for five years, Dieneke Ferguson is now cured of cancer and living a normal life all thanks to turmeric. Her cancer continued to spread after several rounds of chemotherapy and stem cell transplants, and so she turned to took 8g of turmeric per day. Now she's cured, and it is the first recorded case of its kind.

What a great way to start the new year with an event like this that exposes the fallacy of drugs and unnecessary surgery which the FDA labels as "safe and effective" without substantial proof of it being so.

Ferguson is walking fine, but the legs of Big Pharma are shaking. Now that this is out, it's going to raise a lot of questions in people's minds. People are going conclude, "Hey, if turmeric can cure cancer, I wonder what else is out there that we don't know about…"

A Time Tested Cure

Turmeric is known very well throughout the Eastern world. Ayurveda praises its medicinal powers for healing ailments. In addition to the anti-cancer effects Ferguson experienced, turmeric also has anti-inflammatory, and immune boosting properties. If you have a problem with drinking milk, adding turmeric powder can aid in digestion enabling those to consume diary who otherwise wouldn't be able to.

It also slows and reverses the effects of aging as it contains curcumin, a powerful compound that has been found to slow telomere shortening while expanding its length naturally.

Turmeric is also one of the most powerful anti-oxidants as shown in the USDA's ORAC list.

Sprinkle Black Pepper For Maximum Absorption

When I was doing research during grad school, I developed a nutraceutical that included turmeric. One of the common concerns I got heard from others was that turmeric has a low bio-availability. That's why I added black pepper, a trick from Ayurveda.

Adding a pinch yields a whopping 2000% increase in the curcumin found in turmeric as proven in a study done in India. What a coincidence that this combination is regularly practiced in India. The doctors must have already known this combination from their roots, and merely proved it in a lab.

Loading...

Other Eastern cultures use herbal combinations as the ancients discovered their effects thousands of years ago. If you eat curry dishes in India or the Middle East, you see them cooking with herbs like cinnamon, cayenne pepper, and sumac. China and Japan also eat meals that contain herbs indigenous to their lands.

Doctors Are Dumbfounded

Doctors don't know how to respond while they shuffle through pages in their books of allopathy. A plethora of data confirms that turmeric and other natural herbs and botanical plants have powerful medicinal applications. The problem is the greedy scum in the drug industry can't patent them, so they can't monopolize like they do with every other sinister wonder pill they develop. Chaos found in nature disturbs globalists. It's just not part of their who they are.

The medical establishment forbids anything other than drugging people up and surgery which has not done well for curing diseases. "Modern medicine" is primarily about profit, and the only thing medical science seems to be doing these days is simply proving what ancient medicine has been saying for thousands of years. In the past, if you used herbs you were called a hippie or a witchcraft practitioner by fanatics, but now the truth is becoming clearer.

The drug industry has been silencing these natural remedies for decades for fear of profit loss, even though there are several natural alternative remedies for virtually every disease known to man. These are purposely suppressed, because the $400 billion dollar pharmaceutical industry would go bankrupt and the corrupt heads of these companies don't want that. They'd rather see you suffer and die than allow you to be healed by anything other than a pill.

Drugs and surgery have their place in emergency situations, but they haven't done well in promoting longevity and well being.

A New Year in Medicine

This is a big slap to the corrupt medical establishment. Let them try, but this story can't be buried. The rise of natural remedies will flourish. Thomas Jefferson did say that the future doctor will educate people on prevention rather than supplying endless prescriptions, and so perhaps this is a step in making such natural alternatives more mainstream.

The rabbit hole goes much farther than this, so if you want to know more, brace yourself before continuing, because you'll discover a dark entity called Big Pharma, who wants to drug every life form on planet Earth.

Read More: 7 Resons Why Extra Virgin Olive Oil Is The Original Superfood For Men

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info about him visit, GSL Creations

The Vatican Has Disgraced True Catholic Values

January 10, 2018 | by John Augustine | Link | Original Link

I have noticed that many people have been falsely conflating what comes out of the Vatican as Catholic. Thus it is my duty to present to the esteemed readers of this fine site the true teachings of the Church which stand, ever more so today, in stark opposition to the rot of cultural Marxism and the effeminacy of the Papal pretenders in Rome.

Vicar of Christ?

Church authorities are not legitimate

It is a dogma of the Catholic faith that the Church cannot substantially change. This means that the church cannot contradict nor change her teaching from what has always been universally taught or has been solemnly defined. Any one who claims to be Catholic and knowingly professes a faith which contradicts a teaching of the Church is considered to be a heretic and is considered to have a removed himself from the Church.

As St. Thomas states: "[one] who disbelieves [even] one article of faith does not have faith, either formed or unformed." This is known as the unity of faith which means that all Catholics profess the same faith. Likewise it means that heretics cannot hold a clerical office in the Church. Thus if a heretic were to be elected even to the Papacy they could not be considered a legitimate Pontiff because a heretic has separated himself from the Church (source).

Would a real Pope bow to a religion declared false by the Church?

Simply put, you have to be Catholic to be Pope, and the absurdity of a heretic claiming the See of Peter is where we find ourselves today. For just as the institutions in the West have been infiltrated and seized by the enemy, likewise have the institutions of the Church been usurped by apostate forces. The hierarchy currently residing in the Vatican are not legitimate authorities and do not represent the perennial teaching of the Church. Therefore I have listed for your benefit the actual Church's positions on some current areas of contention.

The only time Francis has ever smiled at a Crucifix

On Communism

The Catholic Church is vehemently opposed to communism. Without Pius XII valiant efforts, communism would have prevailed over postwar France and Italy. The Pope went so far as to issue the Decree against Communism in 1949 which excommunicated any Christian who professed communist doctrine.

Catholicism is the enemy of Marxism as it teaches that there can be no separation of Church and state, and an atheist government is immoral. Catholicism believes private property is a natural right going so far to say that depriving workers of their wages is a sin which cries to heaven for vengeance (compare that to our socialist tax code!).

On Migration and Culture

The current Muslim invasion of Europe would be met with the utmost resistance. It has always been the Church which has sought to safeguard Catholic Culture and in ages past has gone so far as to issue a call to arms against non-Catholics who have sought to destroy it.

Pope Urban II issued the Crusades and Pope Leo the great even went so far as to personally travel into the heart of the Hun army—to Attila himself—to deliver Rome from the sack that was to come. In 1571, St. Pope Pius V formed the Holy League that would go on to defeat the great Muslim Turkish Armada that was plaguing the Mediterranean.

"Then I pointed like so and told them where to take their cultural enrichment"

The tradition of the Church has been to unite the West against external non-christian threats in order to preserve Western Christian culture.

> "The natural law enjoins us to love devotedly and to defend the country in which we were born, and in which we were brought up, so that every good citizen hesitates not to face death for his native land…. We are bound, then, to love dearly the country whence we have received the means of engagement this mortal life affords." – Sapientia Christiana Encyclical Pope Leo XIII

On Abortion and Contraception

So what is the real teaching of the Church in regards to abortion and contraception? The teaching is any member who has an abortion or supports abortion is automatically excommunicated from the Church. That's right: every single Democrat who claims to be Catholic is actually excommunicated, including Nancy Pelosi who likes to sanctimoniously drone how she is a good Catholic grandmother.

Contraception is also considered a mortal sin because it is an unnatural stoppage of life.

> "Hence, after the sin of homicide whereby a human life already in existence is destroyed, this type of sin appears to take next place, for by it the generation of human nature is impeded." -St. Thomas Aquinas.

I know this is unpopular with the readers, but the teaching is that those who engage in contraception have already committed murder in their heart. Contraception is what allows people to engage in recreational sex, because the natural end of sex has been set aside so too then has the institution of marriage, whose end is children.

Likewise, because we have committed murder in our hearts, we have become a petulant, immature, vain, and a sterile people similar to any other people who have taken the risk from reward or the consequences from pleasure. This is the most difficult pill to swallow.

On Feminism

The Church condemns feminism in the strongest terms. There cannot exist feminism without birth control.

> "…any use whatsoever of matrimony exercised in such a way that the act is deliberately frustrated in its natural power to generate life is an offense against the law of God and of nature, and those who indulge in such are branded with the guilt of a grave sin." -Pius XI Casti Cannubi

The Church asserts that Man is the head of the household and that a woman finds her vocation from being a good mother and housewife:

> "This … does not deny or take away the liberty which fully belongs to the woman both in view of her dignity as a human person, and in view of her most noble office as wife and mother and companion; nor does it bid her obey her husband's > every request if not in harmony with right reason or with the dignity due to wife; … For if the man is the head, the woman is the heart, and as he occupies the chief place in ruling, so she may and ought to claim for herself the chief place in love." -Ibid

The Pope has even gone so far as to condemn women's suffrage:

> "Woman can never be man's equal and cannot therefore enjoy equal rights. Few women would ever desire to legislate, and those who did would only be classed as eccentrics." -St. Pius X

The Virgin Mary, a perfect woman. She is the antithesis to the feminists of our day.

On Pacifism

The Catholic Church is not simply just a religion of love and mercy. Christianity is not a weak religion, for our God is a God of Battles. Catholic Tradition encourages us to live our lives in the manner of our Lord Jesus who spoke of the struggle that his Church would have to endure.

> "Do not think that I am come to send peace upon earth: I came not to send peace, but the sword."-Mathew 10:34

Christians are not meant to sit idly as bystanders to the great struggle of good and evil in this world.

> "For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood: but against principalities and power, against the rulers of the world of this darkness: against the spirits of wickedness in the high places." -Ephesians 6:12

Conclusion

My dearest readers: do not look to the impostors in Rome as legitimate authorities of the Church. Cling to tradition instead!

If we know what the faith is then conversely we can also know what it isn't and by keeping the faith we may also keep the virtues of hope and charity. God Bless!

Read More: Is Pope Francis Destroying The Catholic Church?

John Augustine
Catholic, Monarchist, Reactionary. When not writing I enjoy the finer things in life such as lifting weights, martial arts, shooting guns, and drinking whiskey.

Dave Chappelle’s New Special Is Surprisingly Blue Pill

January 10, 2018 | by Steele Levenue | Link | Original Link

Netflix has recently released Dave Chappelle’s latest duet of stand up comedy: “Equanimity” and “The Bird Revelation,” featuring the extremely talented, diverse, and crossover comedian himself, Dave Chappelle. While the oxymoron of black comedians crossing over and appealing to mostly non-whites hurling the “n-word” is not a new phenomenon, Chappelle offers erroneous (but undeniably humorous) political analysis of the 2016 election.

The record high stock exchange, unprecedented amounts of blacks that voted Republican, decrease in illegal immigration, 2018 tax reform bill, and acknowledgement of Israel’s capitol all fly in the face of Chappelle’s characterization of Donald Trump’s first year in office as having a “terrible go of it.”

Also accomplished in the first year of the Trump administration, whether you agree or disagree, is that the U.S. will withdraw from the Paris Agreement (climate change) while U.S. funding to the UN by has been cut by more than a quarter of a billion dollars.

The most red pill moment of Chappelle’s life

Chappelle is an extremely crafted master storyteller (this was a trait I recently realized while watching this latest release of stand up) and I have to agree with him that he is damn good at what he does as a comedian. Chappelle seemingly took the red pill when he walked away from his lucrative TV show "The Dave Chappelle Show" around 2005, partially because of how "sick" Hollywood is.

He reportedly left a lucrative contract promising him a reported $50 million. Chappelle is on record as saying that he was "stressed" and needed more family time. My recollection of the event at the time was that Chappelle realized his value at many times more than what the network would offer him and he subsequently left when the studio balked that he be payed what he was worth.

Blue pill thinking

It takes a lot of chutzpah for any man to double down and walk away from a boatload of money when he has only his gut telling him he is worth more. Despite the realization of being pimped and taking the "red pill" risk to walk away on his own terms, according to his recent Netflix release, Dave Chappelle also seems to be inexplicably blinded by blue pill preconceptions (Republicans are for the rich whites only) and the faux news media (Hillary would win by a landslide).

The recently passed tax plan was not just for the rich like Dave Chappelle. The child tax credit is almost doubled. People in Chappelle's tax bracket will not really be impacted by this. The capping of state and local income tax at $10,000 will definitely hit Chappelle in Ohio where there is a state income and property tax.

Loading...

Coal smeared faces at the polls

Chappelle says he saw "dusty white" people in line voting for Donald Trump. Chappelle claims he foreknew the results of the 2016 election because of the amounts of "pickup trucks and tractors" in the parking lots at the polls.

If what Chappelle saw is not hyperbole, wouldn't the mainstream media of paid journalists have observed this phenomenon also? If Chappelle's "pickups in the parking lot" observation was true, how did he interpret the mainstream media's smug inauguration of Hillary Clinton before the polls closed?

Chappelle: let them eat cake?

Chappelle is a millionaire possibly 100 or more times over. He admittedly did not come from the "streets" or the "hood". Sounds like he had a stable nuclear family though not as upper middle class as his white peers while growing up, so when and where did Chappelle have the opportunity to put his finger on the pulse of the black community in America?

Currently, blacks approach 80% out of wedlock child birth (over 50% abortion rates), have low education levels, and have the highest unemployment rate of men between the ages of 18-45. Chappelle proclaims that if there were only blacks at this one stand-up event that had an attendance of thousands, he would walk away with a mere $1800. Does he really speak for unemployed black America or America in general when he goes into a rant about "we don't want those jobs anyway" towards the thousands of jobs Trump is bringing back to America?

One red pill act does not make a man red pill

How could such an observant comedic genius miss so much and be so uninformed and off the mark? The entertainment industry is mostly left leaning. Both the left and the right have a tendency to listen and hear only their respective side. However, the leftist media and entire entertainment industry have taken this to another level.

I believe there are mostly folks that defect from the left to the right and not the other way around. Once that happens, you look back and see yes, you were passionate about what you believed, but also very closed-minded to facts, ideas, and other people who did not believe the same. A Gen-Xer can look back and clearly see the propaganda fed to you from the cartoons and sitcoms to the public schools and even the church.

Is the red pill right leaning? I would say somewhat, but the red pill also provides you with the tools to filter even the things that make you laugh and call “bullshit” when needed. For those that have begun the red pill journey, we must balance where we receive our inputs and feedback. Because of heavy influence in the media and entertainment industry, a lot of leftist propaganda will be impossible to avoid. Even after a bold red pill move, we still must know our opponent, know their tactics, keep our swords sharp, and stay wary.

Read Next: How Influential French Author Alain Soral Become Red Pilled

Steele Levenue
Divorcing middle aged manager reporting from behind enemy lines in "Corporate America". I am a Red Pill late bloomer and I have personally made it my mission to wake as many others as I can before it is too late.

Google’s 2017 Highlights Commercial Declares War On Conservative America

January 10, 2018 | by Jason Todd | Link | Original Link

By the third quarter of the 2018 Sugar Bowl featuring the Clemson Tigers vs. the Alabama Crimson Tide, one team had emerged as the clear victor. But while the action on the field was leading to an inevitable conclusion, one commercial snapped me back from calling it an early night. Google’s Year in Search 2017 ad wasn’t just a 2-minute long fluffing of the liberal establishment in entertainment and politics—the spot ultimately served as a declaration of war on Conservative America.

I’ve highlighted key moments in the commercial, as there are a multitude of images and innuendos that are meant to glorify the ~~degenerate~~ Liberal side of America while ignoring Conservative America altogether.

Let’s get started:

0:10: How far can north korean missiles go

Only 10 seconds in we get our first not-so-subtle jab at President Trump. While Trump’s Twitter fingers have put some on edge, many have forgotten that former President Obama also threatened North Korea in 2016. No matter who was in office, Kim Jong-Un would have continued to flex at the United States.

0:12: How much will the wall cost

Two seconds later Google goes right at Trump and Conservatives. Notice the question, “How much will the wall cost?” Google attempts to portray the wall, which symbolizes an immigration policy that most Americans are in favor of, in as negative a light as possible. Meanwhile the benefits of the wall would mean stemming illegal immigration, a little more cultural cohesiveness and a few less stories like Kathryn Steinle.

0:16: How many refugees in the world

We've heard that Starbucks is hiring…

By slapping this question here so early, they make it seem like Americans are concerned about the well-being of refugees. In truth, Americans are far more anxious about the impact of unfettered immigration on our country.

0:29: How to help refugees

Google tries to shoehorn the idea that Americans are highly concerned about helping refugees. I, for one, have no problem with the idea of sending monetary support to help refugees. I have a serious problem with the idea of flinging our borders open wide to refugees and people from other countries. Especially those who do not care about properly assimilating into our culture.

0:42: How to make a protest sign

Take a look at this cross-section of liberal humanity, a sad and angry clituation, if you will. The crowd is filled with Mad Pussyhatters who took a collective punch to their dusty ovaries when the Whitewater Wench lost in November. One sign in rainbow lettering reads "Women's Rights Are Human Rights." Another reads "More Than Just A" with the word "pussy" blotted out, undoubtedly scribbled by some bitter, vulgar, Hillary apologist.

At 0:44, they feature a lady with a "Ninety, Nasty and Not giving up!" protest sign. A closer look shows this nasty nonagenarian is rather well-dressed and sporting what appears to be a pricey Hermes purse. Senile status whore? Elderly elitist? You be the judge.

At 0:45 we see a man raising a fist and holding a sign that says "Respect Women of Color." His back is turned and the sign is facing backward, in clear view of the camera, indicating that this was not an organic moment but an orchestrated one. Displaying the raised fist is no mistake, and it is a powerful and antagonistic image meant to piss off Conservative Americans.

0:49: Here are two fierce/brave/empowered young ladies, one rocking her pussy hat, while her friend rocks some dingy yellow teeth. These pussy paraders are a stark visual reminder that Nasty Women that Lib chicks tend to be hideous inside and out.

0:53: How to run for office

President Donald Trump is featured at this time, waving to a crowd. In a vacuum, seeing Trump after this query would connote that he was a success story, as he was an outsider to Washington. However, in the anti-Conservative context of this commercial, placing him in the ad at this point seems to have been meant to inspire others to become politically active against him.

Loading...

0:59: French President Emmanuel Macron is featured shortly after Trump. While President Trump's wife Melania is 24 years younger than him, President Macron defied the normal male biological dynamic and married Brigitte, 24 years his elder. I wouldn't trust a guy like that parking my car, much less making political decisions for a G7 country.

1:00: Someone says "We made history tonight." I still am unsure if this is a masculine female or a feminine guy. Thanks, Obama!

1:13 : You knew this was coming… kneeling football players! Few things irk Conservatives more than their beloved game being turned into a degenerate circus for social justice whiners. What are they protesting exactly, this time? "Racial inequality?" "Donald Trump?" Some new "cause du jour?" Doesn't matter. With attendance and ratings dropping precipitously, the NFL is reeling. High schools and universities may be the last refuge for football in a few short years.

1:16: How to be a strong woman

It's no secret that much of America, mostly Conservatives and men are sick of empowered/queen bee/fierce women. Of course they immediately reference the #MeToo movement, which has created an environment where women's feelings can be weaponized against men's livelihood. The concept of due process is not considered for a moment in the court of public opinion. We are fast approaching the point where merely working with women is a risk toward a man's career and financial well-being.

1:27: How to be a superhero

No surprise that Google would feature Wonder Woman here. They certainly had their choice of a bumper crop of feminist-inspired heroes that were shoved down the throats of moviegoers in the past year in films like Ghostbusters, Atomic Blonde, The Mummy, Ghost in the Shell, or Mad Max. Moviegoers weren't buying it, as theater sales have slumped miserably.

1:34: How to be fearless

Google's version of what "fearless" is

When I think of "fearless," usually a U.S. Navy Seal, combat medic or firefighter comes to mind. Not a 10-year old transgender. While images like this won't fool everyone, they are part of the active campaign by the left to change the way that we perceive "bravery" and "fearlessness." In the process they devalue those who actually are fearless; those who put their lives on the line to protect our country and keep our citizens safe.

The placement of this commercial was also telling. The ad ran during the highly anticipated Sugar Bowl. With millions of Conservative Americans shutting off the NFL this year, Google invaded one of the rapidly vanishing safe havens for men who do not want left-wing political nonsense intertwined with their entertainment. College sports have yet to be seriously compromised. With the airing of this commercial, Google is actively infringing upon men's space and declaring war against Conservative America.

So what can we do to hit back at Google? The brand is omnipresent and thoroughly entrenched throughout the internet. It is damn near impossible to find anyone who doesn't use some combination of YouTube, Google Chrome, Maps, Drive, etc. Millions use a Gmail, even I still do.

However, since they derive 90% of their revenue from advertising, the easiest and most effective method to hit them back is to simply remove Google as your primary search engine. Bing, Yahoo! Search, and even AOL are still viable alternatives. My personal choice is DuckDuckGo, which doesn't track you or collect any personal information. As Conservative Americans, we need to stop financially supporting corporations that actively campaign against us and have declared war on our values.

Read More: Today's Conservative Has Become Yesterday's Liberal

Jason Todd

Jason thoroughly enjoys taking shots at the Politically Correct establishment and making incendiary memes. His work can be found at War Against The White Male.

Modern Movies Suck: A Tale Of The Two Total Recalls

January 10, 2018 | by Jared Trueheart | Link | Original Link

Everyone knows modern movies generally suck. Everything is a remake, and a bad one at that. It seems that movie producers today don't ask, "How can we make a great movie for a great price?" That's what they asked in better movie eras such as the early 90s.

Movie producers in that era asked that question with the assumption that great movies would draw crowds. Keeping the movies relatively cheap would further increase the profits. Now however, movie producers seem to ask, "What films are proven to bring in crowds?" If they repeat those films, presumably the producers would repeat the earlier film's successes. The logic sounds fine on paper but when you realize how modern films are being made you can easily see why they fail.

To illustrate how these films fail we'll compare the 90s classic Total Recall with its modern crap shoot.

Special Effects

The first thing you notice when revisiting the Arnold Total Recall is the lack of CGI. There are some cool special effects to demonstrate they are in an advanced society such as this famous scene in which Arnold removes his old-lady mask;

A classic Arnold moment

But otherwise there aren't many other special effects. Now contrast that with the horrible 2012 Total Recall where just about everything is computer generated;

The whole movie looks like this

The 90s classic used special effects sparingly. The 2012 remake relies heavily on them. The entire setting is computer generated. The fight scenes are computer generated. And the plot is so horrible it too is probably computer generated.

The Plot

The plots of the two movies are generally similar but differ in important ways. Both films consist of the protagonist going to a recall facility where he tries to have the memories of being a secret agent implanted in his brain. It turns out he already has those memories.

In the 90s film, Mars is inhabited by normal people and mutants. The antagonist controls the air supply of the living facility. The film involves the protagonist's efforts as an agent of both sides as they wrestle for control over the oxygen supply on Mars.

The 2012 film has no Mars and no mutants. It involves a worker class that uses an elevator that passes through the earth to go from Australia to the British Isle. There they build the robots that help oppress them. What happened to the rest of the world? Something stupid is the short answer.

Colin Farrell then goes on to aid the rebels with some secret knowledge of a kill code for the robots the haves use in the British Isle to oppress the have-nots of Australia. Couldn't that be fixed with software thereby eliminating the whole conflict? You'd be saying that a lot if you sat through it.

One of the most iconic moments of the 90s classic is the the scene where the mutant with three boobs shows them off. Despite being on earth, without mutants, the 2012 disaster also tries to show off a three booby mutant. It makes no sense. I like thrice-nippled women as much as the next guy but if that's what the film makers wanted to show they should have written a plot where that makes sense (like the 90s Total Recall did).

The prosthetic guy did great job

The Rating

There is a scene in the 90s Total Recall where Arnold wrestles a suitcase away from an old lady. The old lady yells at Arnold as he walks away, "Fuck you, Asshole!" There is a later scene where one of the central characters is seen fondling the breasts of the three-booby girl. Think the producers cared about having a PG-13 movie when they decided to make the film?

Loading...

The 2012 film, on the other hand, is tame. The PG-13 rating suits it. If the characters were changed from adults to 16 year old kids, nothing would need to be changed. They behave and are written like teenagers (though with a bit less angst). Think the producers cared about making a great action movie or a mediocre movie with a PG-13 rating?

Proportion

There is a scene in the Arnold film where he has to beat up three guys including someone he thought was his friend after going to the recall facility. Arnold takes some punches but ultimately beats and kills all three before making his escape. It's reasonably believable though clearly meant to be extraordinary.

The parallel scene in the 2012 film involves Colin Farell at the recall facility surrounded by a dozen armed men with guns pointed directly at him. Colin single-handedly beats all of the armed men and makes his get away. This is not believable in any sci-fi universe. They just don't even try in this film. It not only takes you out of the film to see something ridiculous but when you have the 90s film to show how it should be done you have to ask, "What were they thinking?"

Believe it or not Colin fights his way out of this

One last point about proportion. Look at Arnold and look at Colin Farell. Which looks like he could beat-up armed soldiers and which looks he spent more time in the bathroom than the gym? The protagonists are a perfect representation of how the films were made. Arnold represents his cast and crew in a way that says everyone decided to work their butts off putting effort and man-power in to making a great film. Colin represents his film by showing that the cast and crew threw their hands up and said, "They'll make it look good with CGI."

Arnold looks like he whoops dude's asses

Sure he looks strong, but I also highly suspect that make-up painted some ab definition on him

The flaws in the 2012 Total Recall are indicative of so many films being produced today. The only good thing they do is remind us of our former glory. Our society used to be filled with artisans, experts, work horses, and talent. Films today represent how much of that we have lost. In its place we have computer nerds directed to do the bidding of Hollywood billionaires.

As a society, and as consumers, we have to identify more with Arnold than Colin. Maybe then we can regain some of our former glory.

Read More: The Quality Of Modern Movies Signals Our Cultural Decline

Jared Trueheart
Jared is a middle-aged guy full of old-man wisdom. He's best described as a gentlemen scholar and a man among men. You can read his writing at his site: Legends of Men

17 Причин, Почему Украинки Переоценены

January 11, 2018 | by Mike Metzer | Link | Original Link

Эта статья была написана на английском языке Майком Метцером (Mike Metzer).

Мне все еще доводится слышать, что украинки – лучшие из лучших по красоте, женственности, семейной ментальности и традиционному воспитанию, ну или о том, что улицы Украины переполнены супермоделями, единственное желание которых – завести семью в 20 лет со старым некрасивым жирдяем, который просто к ним хорошо относится и хороший человек.

Разумеется, в стране с населением более 40 млн. чел будут встречаться девушки, обладающие вышеуказанными качествами, но в большинстве своем украинки весьма переоценены по разным причинам. Это может привести мужчин к значительному разочарованию, когда они познакомятся с Украиной ближе и получат облом от реальности. Почему они переоценены? Приступим.

1. Их красота недолговечна

Безусловно, фото внизу – преувеличение, однако даже самые красивые украинские девушки – весьма «скоропортящийся» тип. Пик их красоты – примерно 23 года от роду. 24-26-летние девушки могут быть все еще привлекательными, но с этого момента начинается закат. Например, даже некоторые 30-летние украинки могут хорошо выглядеть просто будучи еще в форме, с длинными волосами и в уместной одежде, но все равно существует отчетливое различие между горячей 23-леткой и еще более горячей 30-леткой.

2. У них нет форм

Многие украинки стройные с очень небольшими прелестями или вообще фигурами без изюминок. Очень редко, когда можно встретить девушки с хорошими сиськами и попкой. Время от времени я сталкиваюсь с девушками, у которых обалденные попки, но я не всегда уверен, что это не импланты, потому что у таких девушек и губы, и сиськи накачаны. Лично я хоть и люблю стройный тип девушек, но он со временем мне поднадоел, что вынуждает меня искать более пышных девиц в соседних странах.

3. У них плохие зубы и кожа

Большую часть времени их зубы переливаются оттенками от серого до желтого, а иногда можно встретить заметные дырки в зубах или пятна. Лучшие зубы я встречал у успешного ортодонта, но даже ее зубы не были полноценно белыми.

Нехорошая кожа у них может быть в разных ипостасях – от прыщей до разных шрамов. К их чести, они обычно тщательно их маскируют под макияжем, но в том году я встречал немало девчонок без макияжа, что было удивительно, если сравнить с годом ранее.

У некоторых девушек могут встречаться всякие шрамы, происхождение которых невозможно установить, если вы вздумали поиграть в игру «угадай, что случилось». Резнули ножом? Укусило животное со страшной пастью? Упала с крыши, продравшись сквозь ветки, чтобы в итоге приземлиться на гору камней? Я всегда ошибался со своими догадками. Обычно это были рубцы от несчастного случая или неаккуратной хирургии.

Примечание: постарайтесь не попадать к врачам в Украине. Серьезно.

4. Многие из них выглядит как “невесты из брачного агенства”

Лично мне это все равно, но если тебя волнует, что думают вокруг о тебе и твоей девушке, и ты планируешь забрать ее из Украины в западную страну (об этом – далее), имей в виду, что многие из них имеют вид невесты из брачного агенства. Что-то из этого можно исправить, изменив гардероб для соответствия новым условиям, но они наверняка сохранят это холодное советское выражение лица, которым склонны обладать многие украинки.

5. У них нет индивидуальности

Некоторые украинки, на самом деле, могут быть веселыми, теплыми и интересными, однако обычно лишь со временем они раскрывают весь свой характер. По большей части, они тихие, мало вовлечены в беседы, не способны понять многие шутки или даже простых дразнилок, что вынуждает тратить много времени на изучение их, когда встречаешься с ними.

Если у тебя веселая и игривая натура, которая может принести результат на Западе, то тебе не понравится общение с украинками. Некоторым мужикам пофиг и они предпочтут таких, некоторым общение покажется нудным и незахватывающим, а некоторые могут сильно расстроиться из-за неотклика бОльшую часть времени.

6. Они не женственны, если посвящают себя карьере

Я встречался с разными деловыми женщинами в Украине – от врачей до юристов и бизнесвумен. Когда я только приехал в страну, я думал, что женщины с карьерой все равно сохраняют свою женственность просто потому, что это – Украина. Нет.

Они продемонстрировали минимум женственности в своем поведении в отличие от женщин, которые либо вообще не работают, либо работают на более простых работах вроде кассиров или операторов колл-центра. Они в этом плане не так плохи, как женщины на Западе, но мне интересно, как скоро ситуация ухудшится.

Женщины не созданы для карьеризма по своей природе. Неудивительно, что даже в Украине они начинают терять свою женскую составляющую, выбрав этот путь. Даже у тех, кто носит одежду, подчеркивающую женственность, и у кого длинные волосы, манеры были заметно менее женственными по сравнению с женщинами-некарьеристами.

7. Они всё менее следят за своим внешним видом.

Поражало то, что ненормальное число девушек носило обувь без каблуков в центре столицы даже в теплые солнечные дни на выходных. Я спрашивал некоторых из них, зачем они носят плоскую обувь вместо каблуков, и все они отвечали примерно одинаково – «так удобнее». Это всё были одинокие девушки, которые хотели парня в своей жизни, однако они больше переживали о комфорте. Я даже видел девушек на Крещатике в шлёпках, но слава Богу, это было редкое зрелище.

Помимо отсутствия каблуков, избытка коротких сексуальных платьев тоже не было. И много раз, когда видел девушек в привлекательном женском платье, она сочетала его с неприглядной обувью на плоской подошве. Я полагаю, что эта тенденция сохранится, но надеюсь, что она не ухудшится быстро.

8. Они – невероятные самолюбовальщицы

Подозреваемые в строю: Tinder, Instagram, Facebook и т. д. Многие используют даже Whatsapp и Viber лишь для набора подписчиков и последователей, вместо того, чтобы просто ходить на свидания. Нет нужды углубляться в это, когда отрицательное воздействие на них из-за растущего увлечения всем этим очевидно.

9. Они делают все больше татуировок

Мода на татуировки была на подъеме год назад. Молодые девушки охотно их делали, начиная от крошечных татуировок на пальцах до огромных развернутых тату на торсе. Чаще всего эти тату не были даже креативными. Казалось, что девушки просто копируют чушь, которую видели на «моделях» из Инстаграма. Они говорят, что тату – это круто, и многие их друзья себе делают. Нехороший знак.

10. Они все более склонны к принятию дегенеративного образа жизни

Не поймите меня неправильно: Украина все еще в своей массе не приемлет гомосексуальность. Это не так, чтобы там полуголые геи танцевали на улицах в платьях размахивая надувными фаллосами, однако принимая во внимание некоторые недавние события вроде провозглашения Арки дружбы народов «Аркой многообразия» ("Arch of diversity" – прим. перев.) и раскраски ее в цвета радуги вкупе с гей-парадами типа парада в этом году (2017 г.– прим. перев.), тренд ясен.

Иногда на своих свиданиях я видел геев на свиданиях. Парни всегда были в свободном телесном контакте и, вроде, не сильно заморачивались над тем, как они выглядят на публике. Девушки рядом со мной говорили, что счастливы за них, и что каждый должен жить в гармонии. Если я говорил, что мне это не нравится, девушки расстраивались и пытались растолковать мне, насколько я должен быть открытым и принимать такую красивую вещь, как влюбленные геи. Несколько раз они меня оскорбляли, обзывая гомофобом и говоря, что со мной что-то не так. Это вот прямо такие традиционные нормы воспитания.

11. Они не прекратят проверять вас

Украинские девицы проверяют тебя на вшивость постоянно, чтобы увидеть, крепкий ли ты мужик или простофиля, которым они могут управлять. Среди всех женщин во всех странах, которых я встречал, украинки были худшими (и россиянки не отстают).

Обычно, я не против проверок, так как проходить их прикольно при правильном подходе, но иногда такие девушки могут реально доставать. Один украинец мне однажды сказал: «Украинкам подчас нужна хорошая пощечина, чтобы они не выходили за рамки». Поскольку я не преемлю рукоприкладство к девушкам, этот пример показывает, что даже украинские парни, которые привыкли быть сильными рядом с девушками, до сих считают, что со многими из них нужны крайние меры.

Другой местный сказал, что украинки подобны пружине. «Пока ты их держишь сжатыми – все в порядке. Если ослабишь сжатие, пружина произвольно выскакивает и причиняет много вреда».

12. Они – расчетливые манипуляторы

Всё – сделки в их голове. Даже самые милые девушки могут резко измениться, если появляется возможность получить финансовую выгоду. С этим можно управиться, если у тебя четкая система, если ты не устраиваешь дешевых свиданий, не тратишь на них много и не действуешь как кормилец или спонсор, однако это приедается и довольно скоро начинает раздражать.

В своей предыдущей статье я перечислил несколько конкретных афер, которых надо остерегаться, но такая расчетливая манера поведения превосходит отдельные обманные трюки. Это способ мышления, который есть у них всех в разных масштабах и в итоге поднимет свою уродливую голову.

13. Они видят в иностранцах ходячие кошельки

Даже милые девушки, которым ты вправду нравишься, видят в тебе стереотипного богатого иностранца. Если ты такого склада характера, что хотел бы женщину, которая любила бы тебя как ты есть и не парилась вообще о деньгах, Украина – не то место. Это справедливо для всех возрастных категорий.

Я сейчас не говорю о том, что они все золотоискатели. В Украине есть девушки, которые хотят любви. Но ты – иностранец. Она может влюбиться в тебя за то, кто ты есть внутри, но улучшение ее финансового положения в виде побега из «ада под названием “Украина”» всегда будет у нее в голове, когда она смотрит на тебя. Некоторые мужчины могут использовать эту вещь как часть своей стратегии соблазнения, чтобы распологать финансовым преимуществом, но гораздо лучше этого не показывать и вести себя просто, чем по-богатому.

14. У них малая окупаемость инвестиций

Расстроен? Раздражен? И то, и то!

Одно свидание. Второе. Третье. Четвертое… стоп, что? Разве в книге «Bang Ukraine» не сказано, что девушки понимают, что третье свидание означает секс? Да, девушки совершенно точно знают, что начиная с третьего свидания идет секс, но это не означает, что он непременно состоится просто потому, что она идет на третье и четвертое свидание.

В реальности, знание о том, что эти свидания означают секс, позволяет ей даже лучше подготовиться к тому, чтобы НЕ иметь секс раньше времени, успешно борясь со сценарием «так просто случилось», который ты подготовил (или мог подготовить) для свидания.

Они могут быть довольно изобретательными в том, чтобы избегать секса, чтобы попробовать получить с тебя больше. Иногда они даже говорят нечто вроде «Я не готова в этот раз, но в следующей раз секс будет», когда знают, что подвели тебя к пределу своих возможностей кучей свиданий и отказами в последний момент. Как только они это говорят и уходят, «следующий раз» вряд ли будет.

Некоторые приемы были настолько общими, что будто всё смахивало на то, что есть книга «Don’t Bang Ukraine», которую написала украинка как инструкцию, чтобы максимизировать поток ресурсов от иностранцев и давать им в результате каплю или вообще ничего.

Эта малая окупаемость инвестиций вполне реальна. Некоторые из вас, кто не знаком с этими девушками, мог бы сказать: «Они девушки с традиционным воспитанием, а значит, ждать секса дольше должно быть в норме», но, как я говорил, проблема в том, что нет гарантии, что они переспят с вами, если вы продолжите с ними встречаться дальше и тратить свое время и деньги. Даже алкоголь не является надежной гарантией. Многие украинки будто владеют нечеловечески сильным контролем своей головы и вагины даже когда естественно сильно возбуждены.

15. Горячим украинкам вы не нужны

Оные обычно предпочитают «дорогого» украинца или «спонсора», а лучше – и того, и другого одновременно. Такие девушки не дуры. Они знают себе цену. Теоретически, вполне возможно переспать с 9-балльной или 10-балльной (по 10-балльной шкале) девушкой, но если ты думаешь ехать в Украину, чтобы прокрутить свою идею и баловаться с 10-балльными, подумай хорошенько.

Когда я впервые приехал в Киев, я переспал с 9-балльной на втором свидании. А до этого, во Львове, я переспал с другой 9-балльной менее, чем за два часа с момента встречи. В то время, когда стратегия и ресурсы были устойчивыми, я думал, что смогу повторять такое бесконечно. Я думал, что Украина – раздолье и тут всегда будет так просто. Оглядываясь назад, вспоминаю, что они обе были сочетанием способа соблазнения, времени и удачи.

После того, как я провел в Украине больше времени, я понял, что сойтись с 9-ками и 10-ками трудно до истощения, особенно с теми, кто не был мажоркой. Даже 9-ти и 10-балльные мажорки могут быть трудны, потому что они много тусуются с иностранцами, которые усугубляют ситуацию, осыпая их подарками и вниманием. Я не говорю, что этого нельзя сделать, но такое может быть немного утомительным. С восьмибалльными также становится все более сложно, что требует больше усилий и большего терпения к булшиту, чтобы переспать с ними.

16. Их нельзя вывозить в западную страну

Для начала, немного жестоких приятностей: Бог в помощь, если ты туп настолько, что хочешь жениться на одной из них и забрать их в западную страну вроде США. Эти женщины тебя уничтожат. Мне безразлично, насколько серьезны твои намерения. Ты ненормальный. Если бы ты был нормальным, ты не тусовался бы на сайтах вроде этого. Ты бы не пытался ввязаться в это дело. Украинки естественные от природы. И у них много-много лет практики, которая довела их игру до уровня большего, чем просто естественный.

Если ты заберешь ее из Украины, она сокрушит тебя. Это может случиться не в первый месяц, не в первый год или даже пару лет, но часики начнут тикать со дня, когда ты ее завезешь в западный мир. Украинки, живущие в США, которых я знаю, вообще хвастаются тем, как они полностью довели человека, который вывез ее из жопы и дал ей новую жизнь.

Они не просто гордились тем, что взяли от него всё и оставили от него блеклую тень прежнего его, а и рассказывали это с проблеском удовольствия. Ты можешь возразить, что все женщины таковы, но вот эти могут перенести это на другой уровень. И чтобы подавить их моду заговаривать зубы иностранцам словами, что они любят Украину, просто не верь им. Они всего лишь пытаются показать, что они не такие, как другие здесь. Поверьте, они все хотят свалить из Украины, особенно в

США. Если ты найдешь достойную женитьбы украинку и уверен, что справишься с ней, лучшим вариантом будет жить в Украине и, желательно, в том же городе, где и ее родители.

17. Украина – не самая приятная страна для жизни

Одна из основных причин, почему украинки переоценены, – это потому что они из Украины. Украина не такая замечательная страна. Бардак, лишения, коррупция и обман были составляющей страны в течение очень долгого времени. Я не буду вдаваться в политические или психологические рассуждения, почему так, однако это все означает не лучшее психологическое состояние девушек в перспективе.

Эта статья написана не для того, чтобы обосрать страну и ее девушек, а, скорее, для прояснения мифов и заблуждений вокруг них, чтобы лучше подготовить мужчин к тому, с чем они могут столкнуться, поехав туда. Хоть Украина явно не райское место для траха, и у девушек много недостатков, там много красивых женщин, с которыми стоит провести ночь; многие из них достойны недолгих отношений, а некоторые – и для женитьбы (с учетом предосторожностей выше). Только не ждите вальса с красавицами-супермоделями из сказки, подлизывающимися к тебе только потому, что ты такой бабник.

Читайте также: 10 Scams Ukrainian Girls Try To Pull On Foreign Men

Mike Metzer
Mike travels the world, seeks to know the unknown, has a strong desire to expand his mind, and can be reached at

3 Reasons Men Need A Dog

January 11, 2018 | by Geoffrey von Helfenstein | Link | Original Link

The manosphere has ruthlessly dedicated itself to bettering the well-being of men, grounding them in civilizational roots, and landing worthy women for dating, mating, and marriage. One of the easiest and simplest boosts to those objectives has been sitting under our nose: a dog.

Mark Twain famously wrote, “If you pick up a starving dog and make him prosperous, he will not bite you. This is the principal difference between a dog and a man.” This famous quote would have been even more portentous for the Current Year if he had substituted “woman” for “man.”

It turns out that caring for a dog can improve a man’s physical health, mental health, and boost relationships. Not to mention that any self-respecting king would have had a hound or two lounging about his throne room.

An exercise buddy who is never hung over.

Dogs Make You Healthier

Multiple studies have found that owning a dog improves your cardiovascular health. Whether you're finding it difficult to get the exercise you need or you balk at gym fees, just taking a dog outside to walk gives you a boost in the moderate walking paces that researchers say is equivalent to jogging.

While power-lifting and intense workouts have their place, general moderate mobility burns plenty of calories. This is one reason European women tend to be more slender than their American counterparts—they walk more. Even if you are doing intense workouts in the gym, additional exercise will bring additional benefits—pet owners make less excuses for weather they might normally stay indoors for.

I've not found bench-pressing to be a good day game topic, but walking your dog after the gym gets you out in the field with a built in conversation starter. Studies have found that men who sleep better have higher testosterone and, lo and behold, according to the Mayo Clinic, a dog sleeping on the floor of your bedroom will improve sleep quality.

Who wouldn’t want to be this guy right now?

Dogs Make You Happier

Part of the red pill life is a ZFG (zero fucks given) attitude and recognizing that occasional female rejection builds a stronger, smarter man, but sometimes it hurts, or it’s lonely, or you’re in a post-break-up phase, and ZFG in every walk of life tends to lead to dental decay, head lice, and hermitude.

Men need their psychological batteries recharged too, but often we go about it the wrong way—rebounding, putting on the Capt’n Save-A-Hoe cape, or calculating that MGTOW brings less pain over the long haul. What if you went home, had someone there to greet you, tell you how wonderful you were, how much they needed you and then licked your face?

People who own dogs report a better quality of life, and one study found that not only does owning a dog boost self-esteem, but it prevents the formation of fearful attachments—those dreaded rebounds. All of this psychological research is predicated on the owner actively taking part in the dog’s life—keepers of junkyard guard dogs showed no statistically significant boosts.

Be this dude. He knows how to make a woman compete for his affections.

Dogs will make you more attractive

There is a reason that the Instagram account "hotdudeswithdogs" is approaching half a million subscribers: chicks dig a guy with a dog. My fellow ROK'ers will rightly dispute the "hotness" of many of the men pictured there, but what makes them a "hot dude" in women's minds is the fact that they have a dog at their side. As said above, a friendly dog makes you more approachable and more seem open without having to step out of frame.

Research has shown that men with dogs favorably raise a women's appraisal of a man, and also make her more likely to invite him to bed. It should also serve to note, especially for men who are vetting a potential spouse, that a dog works as a barometer both ways—she will see you as a "provider" without you having to actually provide for her, and within a relationship you can gauge her level of caring and mother potential in how she treats the dog.

Suffice it to say, my belief is that any woman who asks a man to choose between a dog and her needs to be shown the door, posthaste. And, except in the case of visible hives or choking anaphylaxis, "allergies" are just an excuse.

So easy, a girl could do it…

Dogs are easy to get and natural to care for Humans, men in particular, have an almost symbiotic relationship with the dog. It was the first animal domesticated. They have been with us a long time and even a guy who has never had a dog before shouldn't be intimidated.

Your humble author does recommend, however, a dog that is both grown and a family-friendly breed. Puppies are great, but they do take some experience to train and a much larger commitment of time. If you feel ready to take care of a human baby, get a puppy. If you're looking for a companion, get a friendly adult dog.

There are three good places to get dogs:

The local animal shelter

Fees are nominal, and there's a never-ending, immediate source of doggage. Because backgrounds are not always known, I recommend introducing the dog to several different people, if possible, before adopting to discern phobias or neuroses the adoptee might have.

(Insert specific breed) rescue center

Fees are moderate, but the dog is a known quantity as far as behavior and at least partial history. This will allow you to select a dog based on a breed that matches your life conditions and temperament—an important consideration. The dog will also have been cared for by knowledgeable folk for some time.

Retired show dogs from a reputable hobbyist

This is the best kept secret in dog-dom. There are a limited number (a thousand or so) dogs retiring from the show circuit a year and most owners scramble to find a place for them when they are bred out or have reached the end of their competition days. These dogs are typically between 5 and 8 years old, are impeccably trained, and, by virtue of age, mellow.

The fees may range from free to thousands of dollars (these owners have invested plenty, carting the dog around the country, premium food and training, etc.) but once you have researched a breed you might reach out to several breeders asking if they need an extra hand from a fan of the breed. They're much more likely to gift a beloved champion to a friend than a stranger and, in the meantime, you know your new dog well.

No dynastic struggle should be undertaken without a loyal hunting dog.

All this is to say…

It is said, wisely, that clothes make the man. The idea is a dual one: we are the image that we project and also that exterior accouterments tend to change who we are inside. At the risk of sounding like I'm reducing a companion animal to a mere accessory, owning a dog changes the perception of people around us instantaneously and the daily tasks we undertake in the care of that dog change us slowly on the inside.

Men are, at least evolutionary, providers and now have something besides the fickle woman to provide for. This helps keep perspective on who the provider is—who is the king of the castle. A companion dog is one of the most natural leverages for proper frame yet devised.

Read More: Never Date A Girl Who Has Rescued A Dog

Geoffrey von Helfenstein

GvH is a hardy North American of frontier stock and a constitutional expatriate. A member of the Oregon Trail Generation and a survivor of divorce rape, he is an ascetic seeker of Red Pill Truths and wishes to succeed in passing on those truths where the prior generation failed.

Oprah May Run For President Of The United States

January 11, 2018 | by G.S. Luthra | Link | Original Link

Oprah Winfrey's recent speech at the Goblin Globe Awards sparked a new controversy that she might run as a candidate during the next presidential election against Donald Trump. Her speech compared Hollywood actresses with past rape victims and made a strong statement that women are going to rise up. The program wasn't anything different compared to previous years. However, there was one surprisingly good result: Gary Oldman won the best actor award for playing Winston Churchill, a white man.

A Common Tactic

Her speech was focused on empowering women and rising above the apparent male enslavement society. One example she gave was Recy Taylor, an African woman, being raped by six armed white men on her way home from church, and how justice was never delivered. Taylor recently died, and the men got away.

Building off of that, she said that women for too long have been kept quiet due to being afraid to speak up against brutally powerful men, and went on to say that "their time is up" three times while the puppet Hollywood audience rose to their feet and applauded, even men who played tough guy roles.

Of course Winfrey brought up the Jim Crow narrative and played the victim of living under oppressive men even though she's a billionaire who used the American system to become what she is today. She declared "that a new day is on the horizon," and that it will be due to magnificent women and some pretty phenomenal men who will take us to the “time when nobody has to say ‘Me Too‘ again.” She even praised the press for the job they do for delivering the truth even though 2017 was filled with leaks of the media making up fake news like the Trump/Russian connection.

Oprah brought up race and rape, but she failed to mention that she was best friends with Harvey Weinstein. It’s hard to believe that she didn’t know about his sexual antics.

“It’s okay honey, the sex with him will be very quick.”

The spokesperson for protecting women was friends with one of the biggest abusers of women.

Oprah Said Racists Have to Die

In a BBC interview in 2013, Oprah revealed her true colors, saying that there are some people who are racists, and that “they have to die.”

The establishment may want to use someone like her, because she can play the race card while extrapolating the lie that women have been suppressed by men, therefore pushing the idea that a female president is needed. However, in the past, some of the most powerful men in history were all controlled by women behind the curtains.

Her Dark Secrets

Oprah was not exactly the poor oppressed woman she pretended to be as she made a lot of money through her show. Although she brought up race, she frequently hung out at yachts with people like Diane Sawyer, and lives a lavish life that counters the character she was playing on stage. She likes to say she grew up impoverished, but her cousin said she was a “spoiled” little girl.

“Where Oprah got that nonsense about growing up in filth and roaches I have no idea,” said relative, Katherine Carr Esters. “I’ve confronted her and asked, ‘Why do you tell such lies?’ Oprah told me, ‘That’s what people want to hear. The truth is boring.’ ”

Biographer Kitty Kelly revealed more skeletons from Oprah’s past like bringing men home for sex while her mom was at work, and that Oprah described herself in an unreleased autobiography, as a teen “prostitute”, using her body to earn extra money. There are other shady things like paying $50,000 to her ex-boyfriend to keep quiet of her lesbian affairs and gay brother, and modifying her life story to prop up her success. She is also buddies with Michelle Obama and Ellen Degeneres.

Very few in this world has a pure past and everyone has to do what they must to get ahead, but Oprah's position seems to be in line with the feminist's agenda to attack masculinity in America, rather then the quest for justice she displayed at the awards.

Oprah Winfrey Will Never Beat Donald Trump, Ever

Trump has improved the economy, destroyed most of ISIS along with Russian forces and Eastern allies, reduced illegal immigration, and he is steadily get of rid of corruption. Yes, there are neocons within his administration who are trying to lead him astray, and yes some of his actions are questionable, but he is still the best shot America has against the globalists.

Oprah is likely another desperate attempt to steal the next election by the globalists who are so scared of Trump, that they're trying anything to protect their power. I have no doubt that she will lose in the next election if she decides to run.

Read More: Kiss Talks About Groupies On Oprah

G.S. Luthra
Mr. Luthra writes about news, culture, fitness, and anything else that meets his interests. He is the author of Donald Trump vs The Globalists, and Muscle Mass Without A Gym For more info about him visit, GSL Creations

How I Date Girls From The Internet

January 11, 2018 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

In the spring of 2016, I felt absolutely great. I was preparing for a fitness show a few weeks later and my body fat was around 9%. That whole spring period had been predominantly good in terms of how I felt on the inside and how I expressed my feelings and behaviors on the outside, and single dating went very well.

I mainly worked with online game as a starting point, but since I hate to spend too much time on those local websites I used my five absolute best photos from traveling, fitness modeling, and casual settings, and a brief but interesting profile text so that I could actually get girls around 6-8 to meet me not too far after. Here is how I operate when going on a first date via the internet.

Phase one: showing value and making her feel comfortable

Once you have set up a date it's important to show value and make her feel comfortable. That is why a nice cafe is a great place to start with. You cannot expect to have sex on the first date anyway so have a more platonic, friendly, and non-sexual introduction. Therefore I chose one such in the Old Town of Stockholm. Initially you just show that you are perfectly normal and talk about yours and hers life.

Moreover, you should look as good as on your pictures. Don't put up fitness photos if you are clearly "off-season" and have a semi-chubby face. Be on point, that's one of the prices we have to pay to get the more attractive girls. Secondly, you should probably dress better than her, especially if you have a disadvantage like being short. There are several levels of this, of course, but I wore dress shoes, dress pants, and a navy blue coat which were not exaggerated but gave the signals that I have higher value. Thirdly, I have a better job.

All of this make her feel that you are interesting and a potential relationship or at least sex partner. It could be that she has equal or higher value than you in terms of dress style and career, but then you just hope that some other factor can be to your advantage.

Fortunately, many girls, like this one, dress rather casually and work with semi-skilled or unskilled professions. If you have seen much of the world, while she hasn't, that's another icing on the cake. If she says that she wants to go to Venice some time in her life, then tease her about it and say that if she is nice you might consider bringing her with you. You plant a seed in her mind, but are not too serious about it.

Phase two: escalating by going to a "romantic" place

Secondly, you should probably already on the first date move to some location that likewise are public and make her feel comfortable, but has more of a romantic vibe and enables to kiss her if you make it that far. It could either be selected spontaneously or be pre-planned.

I took her to an area near the water where lots of people walk and sit. Continue with the conversation, don't sit too close, but gradually try to find ways to make her feel more interested in terms of subject of discussion, paired with a less friendly and more sensual vibe. Obviously this is mutual and you cannot force attraction, but the strategy is important. Don't be stuck in the platonic vibe and topics for too long, especially if she seems rather modern and liberal. Within about six hours she wants some fun.

What I did in this case was that when she talked about that she had been stalked by two guys (she was 28 and in the slutty dating phase after a four-year relationship that had ended a couple of months earlier), I stressed that it had happened to me as well not so long ago. This made her feel that my value was high, since girls are literally chasing me, and we also had something in common. I didn’t lie but if you want to do so I can recommend using this as a means to appear more interesting. It’s like a gender reversal of #metoo.

Maybe one or two hours later we were kissing, and before we left each other we had sat up a second preliminary date.

Phase three: meet at her or your place and seal the deal

Once you have moved passed these two initial phases, it should be relatively easy to seal the deal. This usually happens on the second or third date in promiscuous countries like USA, Canada, or Sweden. You have already shown that you are interesting and look good. Now you can just talk for 30 minutes and watch Netflix.

Before even half of the movie is finished you are embracing her and not long after you should have sealed the deal, smirking and feeling good about yourself for a while.

That is a feeling that you never can get from jerking off to porn or buying a prostitute. Dating requires effort and transcends the joy one gets from the intercourse. It's not something that you want to do always and forever, but it's something that you likely have to do if you want to avoid being an incel. And this is one solid way of doing it.

Regardless of you have online game as a starting point or not, show real value, make her feel comfortable, and escalate with gradual shifts from platonic to romantic locations and interactions.

For more of William Adams' material, check out his website Syncretic Politics.

Read Next: 6 Steps To Dating A Girl With Borderline Personality Disorder

William Adams
William Adams is a European explorer and straightforward writer. Rooted in the West, he temporarily leaves home for more exotic excursions. Mainly focuses on Western and East Asian history and culture, game, travel, self-improvement, politics and economics.

Stop Going To Corporate Gyms And Do A Bodyweight Circuit Training Program Instead

January 11, 2018 | by John Young | Link | Original Link

A few years ago, in the wake of a break-up that left me terribly depressed, I decided to set a tough goal for myself and work toward it as a way to lift my spirits. I was previously an experienced martial artist and for a while had even run my own school, but in my role as an engineer over the ensuing years, I had allowed my conditioning to lapse severely.

My goal was simple: to successfully compete in sport karate sparring at a black belt level. I ultimately achieved my goal, and this article is meant to help guys who, like myself, want to go from zero to hero while living a demanding life.

Commercial gym? Not an option

My plan was complicated by a highly demanding job that has me on-call 24x7x365, the demands of a teen daughter, and a 2.5 hour commute each way. I most certainly did not want to spend an hour a day driving to and from the gym, plus another hour at the gym. And that planned hour always seems to turn into much longer, when the flow of your workout is interrupted by someone indefinitely monopolizing a machine you were planning to use.

I had also, at one point, contracted a MRSA (methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus) infection from improperly wiped-down gym gear, which put me into life-threatening shock when the boil broke inside me. Another detractor from the gym was my previous experience with contracts. I discovered when trying to sign up for one gym that somehow they owned a “debt” I allegedly owed to some other gym. Good luck straightening that mess out!

The bodyweight solution

I found the solution to the problems of time, expense, risk and annoyance in bodyweight exercise (calisthenics). Not only is bodyweight exercise something I can do at home, it works so well that even though I am a middle-aged man in a sedentary job, I have since garnered trophies and medals in karate sparring.

Bodyweight exercises are ideal for men like me with a lot of demands on their time. My average workout takes between 25 and 40 minutes, plus zero drive time and zero MRSA from the weight machines that weren’t properly wiped.

Can bodyweight exercise be effective? It depends on your goal. If you are looking for bodybuilder-like hypertrophy and single-muscle isolation, you’ll need a gym, but if you are looking to lose fat, gain functional strength and flexibility, and maintain solid endurance, it will work just fine. America’s military trains for the rigors of combat using bodyweight exercise, and it will work for you too.

The same principles and ideas that are applied in the gym are also applied to bodyweight exercise. The only difference is that you are using your own body as resistance, and you vary the resistance by changing your point of leverage. For example, a push up done against a wall might be about 20 pounds, while a push up at 45 degrees would be 50 pounds and a push up with your feet elevated on a chair would be 100 pounds.

The same can be applied to leg exercises: a bodyweight squat only puts half of your bodyweight on each leg, but a Bulgarian split squat puts about 90% of your bodyweight on each leg—and it is the rare individual who can do a one-leg squat. So you can get plenty of resistance to build strength with just your body. The only piece of gear I’d add is a suspension trainer. You don’t need a fancy one.

In addition to progressive resistance, which is used to develop strength, you can also shorten rest periods to create HIIT (High Intensity Interval Training) workouts, or even Tabatas with practically any exercise. These have been proven to increase endurance better than endless cardio on the lines of machines at the gym.

Start with bodyweight circuit training

For people first starting out, I recommend circuit training as a way of improving overall health in minimal time. Choose five exercises: one push, one pull, one core, one legs, and one cardio. Proceed directly from one exercise to the next without rest. Then, wait a period of time, and repeat. Start off with three circuits, and three minutes of rest between each circuit. Do a variation of each exercise that will let you complete ten reps without it being either too easy or pushing you near failure.

Here is an example: do 10 push ups, 10 inverted rows, 10 crunches, 10 air squats, and 10 jumping jacks without taking a rest. Then rest three minutes and repeat for a total of three cycles. If you can’t do ten push ups, just elevate your hands onto a chair. If a full inverted row is too hard, then move your heels back toward your body until you can do it. Do this same workout on Monday, Wednesday and Friday. It will only take twenty minutes.

Inverted row

The next week, repeat the same workout, except allowing only 2:30 rest between cycles. The third week, drop it to 2:00 between cycles. On the fourth week, increase the rest back to 2:30, but add a fourth cycle. The fifth week, decrease the rest to 2:00. The sixth week, decrease the rest to 1:30. The seventh week, increase the rest to 2:00 and add a fifth cycle. On week eight, cut the rest to 1:30 and on week nine, cut the rest to 1:00.

It is normal for beginners to see large apparent leaps in strength. This is caused by improvements in neurological recruitment. That is, your nerves become more adept at activating muscle fibers. When this happens, just slightly increase the difficulty of each exercise so that it becomes more challenging.

At the end of nine weeks, you'll be doing 50 reps of each exercise in less than 30 minutes, which is a respectable workout, and you'll be ready for the next stage of training.

After the circuit training prep-phase

For the next stage, I recommend the book You Are Your Own Gym by Mark Lauren. There is also a smart phone application by the same author that works well. Start with the "Basic" guided program.

This is a program that changes every two weeks to create a total 10-week cycle that will see you constantly improving. And, again, every workout will take less than forty minutes at home.

To be ready for competitive karate, I first did nine weeks of circuit training, and then worked through the ten week "basic" program and the ten week "intermediate" program. So it took about half a year. But that's half a year to go from "winded walking up the stairs” to “kicking other in-shape men in the head.” You might not need to go that far.

Fixing problems from a sedentary job

Along the way, I hit some snags caused by too much time sitting at a desk. To work through these, I used the exercises provided by Sean Schniederjan’s Cure Tight Hips Anywhere, Posterior Chain Linked, Anterior Chain Linked, and Quadratus Lumborum: Fixed Depending on how badly your muscles are imbalanced, you may not need these. But I used them to great affect and recommend them.

What started as self-therapy for a break-up has made me healthier, happier and more confident. Not long after achieving my first milestone, there were plenty of other candidates to replace the girl left behind.

Read More: How To Get An Intense Cardio Workout In Only 20 Minutes

John Young
John Young is a martial artist, composer, scientist and engineer. He is a board member of European Americans United, an ethics-based organization devoted to beauty, discipline and honor. John loves gardening and science experiments with his daughter.

5 Reasons Haiti Is Indeed A Shithole Country

January 12, 2018 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Haiti is a disaster zone. It's the poorest country in the Western hemisphere, and the epitome of a 'failed state'. It's a country founded upon the wholesale slaughter of 3,000-5,000 mostly innocent white French men, women and children following a 1804 massacre, and there is almost nothing attached to its name that could be considered an accomplishment other than being the 'world's first black Republic'.

In any case, Haiti has made it big in the news recently, due to President Trump deriding it and other African nations as "shithole countries". He especially considers them poor sources of new immigrants to the United States, and that the country should be more open to countries like Norway, a nation which once sent 1/3rd of its population to the U.S. in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

This article will present five reasons why President Trump is not racist in regards to his opinion on Haiti being a shithole country (facts are racist!), and will end with a strong argument that countries like Norway would indeed be far more preferencial sources of immigration to ensure U.S. prosperity. That is of course, if they even bothered to come. Norway by many measures is considered to be the most prosperous country in the world.

1. Dirt Cookies Are A Component Of National Cuisine

> (0:22 – 0:42) "These patties are a grim reminder of just how poor this Caribbean nation is. They aren't sweet, they're hard to swallow, and add almost nothing in terms of nutrition. Because the cookies are actually made of dirt."

> (1:42 – 1:50) “This is literally dirt being prepared for humans to eat, on top of other dirt….and filth.”

Haiti is a country so wretchedly poor and lacking in any widespread agricultural competency that patties made out of dirt must be consumed by a substantial percentage of it’s population. Friggin’… dirt.

These nutritionally bankrupt “cookies” known as ‘Bon Bon Te’ often contain parasites and various other toxins, but many pregnant Haitian women astoundingly believe it has minerals that would be good for their baby.

2. “F” Grade Cleanliness And Personal Hygiene

Pigs rummaging through garbage in a section of Port-au-Prince (Port-a-Potty)

It’s hard to pigeonhole all of the developing world into one classification of substandard cleanliness and hygiene. For instance, while not quite up to western or Japanese standards, the streets and alleyways of much of Malaysia, Vietnam, Thailand, Colombia, etc. tend to be adequately cleaned and maintained. Personal hygiene standards are also quite good in these countries despite being less-than-developed.

Places like Cambodia? Not quite so much, but they are getting better by the year.

Urban Haiti however, is a living monument to genuine I-don’t-give-a-fuckdom. You will see pigs rummaging through gigantic piles of refuse, people wading through trash covered waters, and the smells invading your nostrils will be repugnant and utterly offensive. To not call it a shithole, you would only be lying to yourself.

In fact, Haiti has such a bad reputation for filth and putrid hygiene standards that the capital of Port-au-Prince is jeeringly referred to as ‘Port-a-Potty’ by many visitors.

3. High Rates Of Crime And Civil Unrest

The U.S. State Department Is As “Racist” As Trump!

If you look at the top 20 countries of the global human development index, you will notice that a common characteristic they possess (beyond a majority population of Germanic Europeans and Northeast Asians) is that they have very low rates of capital crimes such as murder, in addition to being very politically stable.

You would be foolish to try and argue against high rates of crime and instability as major contributing factors to defining a country as a Trumpian shithole. Ask any educated person from some high crime and not-so-top 20 countries such as South Africa, Brazil, or Honduras why they might want to emigrate, and I guarantee you that wanting to raise a family or live in a much lower crime environment is high on their agenda.

The Haitian capital of Port-Au-Prince had a murder rate of 60.9 in 2012, which is incredibly high even by most third world standards. By comparison, the murder rate in Norway was just 0.56 in 2014. Now which of these two countries would you prefer as a source of immigration?

4. Widespread Environmental Rape Culture

An aerial view of the border between Haiti and the Dominican Republic, showing how badly that Haitians have raped their environment.

What's the difference between campus "rape culture" in the United States and environmental rape culture in Haiti? The answer is that the problem actually exists in Haiti.

Once a section of the island of Hispaniola with astounding natural beauty and lush greenery, Haiti has gone through such rampant deforestation and environmental degradation that you can actually see the results from space. It is also entirely the result of human action from Haitians themselves, yet SJW's will always insist that 'white racism' and/or the 'legacy of colonialism' has something to do with this travesty.

You can see from the NASA photograph that the substantially less shitholey neighbor of Haiti, the Dominican Republic, does a much better job of looking after it's environment.

5. There Is Almost No Economic Mobility

> (1:26 – 1:38) Desperate illegal immigrants from Haiti getting their first taste of racist white people in the USA.

If you weren't born into substantial Haitian wealth, your chances of rising above their abject poverty are tied with much of sub-Saharan Africa for being among the worst in the world. Let's just say that 99.5% of the locals probably don't have much spare change to invest in cryptocurrency.

Haiti has a massive trade deficit, remittances are the primary source of foreign exchange, and any sort of skilled labor is a rare commodity in this "proud Republic" lying less than 1,500 kilometers away from Florida. There is not even really the chance of becoming a well-paid soccer star like a lot of poverty stricken youths in Brazil, Peru, Mexico, etc. could otherwise aspire to in their countries.

Haiti is a shithole, and that's why so many people there are desperate to leave if they have either a chance or the resources. 'White Supremacies' like the USA, Canada, or France are dream destinations, while even the neighboring Dominican Republic offers a substantial leg up in living standards.

Conclusion

Hear that? SJW Senator Kamala Harris thinks that ESPECIALLY people from Haiti helped build the USA!

Haiti is a bottom drawer source of migrants not just for the United States, but pretty much any other country in the Western hemisphere. The people have no skills to offer, they have low levels of English (or even Spanish) competency, they have high rates of crime, their cities look and smell horrible, and they hail from the country with the highest prevalence of HIV/AIDS outside of Africa.

Much in the same way that low-crime, clean, and orderly Northeast Asian countries are wise for not having much of an immigration policy at all, it would be completely anti-humanist for the well being of citizens of the United States to tolerate the idea of Haiti being a "strength" building source of diversity.

Norwegians on the other hand, are the most common ethnic background of people in the U.S. state of North Dakota. It has one of the lowest crime rates in the nation, the people are incredibly friendly, they possess a strong protestant work ethic, and North Dakota, where many Americans with Norwegian ancestry reside, is the most fiscally responsible state.

President Trump is 100% correct on the Norway-versus-Haiti debacle. New immigrants from the former would help maintain 1st world living standards, while the latter would inevitably turn Tampa into 'Tampon'.

Read Next: 5 Best Countries Where It's Great To Be A Criminal

John Carver
John Carver is a four year ROK veteran with over fifty articles of SJW-triggering truth bombs on archive. You can follow him on Twitter if you are so inclined.

It’s A Lie That Women Have Higher Pain Tolerance Than Men

January 12, 2018 | by Joshua Rennenkampf | Link | Original Link

Women are superior to men in every possible way. We know this from watching TV. Sitcoms, for instance, teach us that women are far, far more intelligent than men. Suspense thrillers show us that men are wife-beaters, rapists and murderers while women are either their victims or the intellectually and morally superior saviors who foil our villainy. Dramas demonstrate that women are more honest and faithful than us fickle, cheating men. And watch any action-adventure made within the last few decades, and you’ll see that women are physically stronger, tougher, and better fighters than men are.

This last bit of collective cultural programming has not only convinced Americans of every political stripe that women belong in the Armed Forces, but especially in the combat arms and elite units. This programming isn’t just reinforced on your High Definition Gynovision Set, either. Every female and white knight (which is about 75-90% of the male population in the West) will readily inform you that women are tougher than men. Because childbirth.

The childbirth subject functions as a trump card or smart bomb which ends any debate regarding pain tolerance relative to the sexes. Men have no answer for this smart bomb, because we don't get pregnant. However, it's for that very reason I reject the argument. So far as empirical science goes, if you want to test and compare reactions in different test subjects, all subjects must be exposed to the same exact stimulus. Since men don't get pregnant, childbirth is a ridiculous metric—it makes it impossible to compare apples with apples.

My experiences were what caused me to question this sacred cow; and I'm sure many men have anecdotal evidence to do the same. No doubt many of you have noticed that women generally can't handle cold temperatures as well as we can. They bruise easier; sprain easier; fatigue easier. Once both I and a female counterpart suffered burns from the same heat source. My burn was deeper and wider, and hurt like a blind mother, yet it was her who couldn't shut up about all the pain she was suffering for the next two weeks.

Before the Feminist Cancer had worked its way completely through the American military, the only time I encountered uniformed females was when my unit was assigned to train ROTC cadets. These kickass Womyn Warriors only had to carry from ½ to 2/3rds of what their male counterparts carried (thanks to white knights redistributing the load in the name of "equality"), yet couldn't keep up with their units on short marches, and bellyached the entire way. (The breakdown in noise discipline and discipline, period, would never have been tolerated from men back in those days.)

None of this should be surprising. According to a 2012 Stanford University study, women tend to rate pain input as more acute by a point higher than men on a 1-10 scale. A 2009 University of Florida study found that women show greater sensitivity to most forms of pain; take more pain killers; visit the doctor more for pain; whereas men showed a higher tolerance for physical discomfort of most kinds. Of course, scientific studies are not ironclad proof of anything, since pain is so subjective. So don't let anyone get away with claiming that the pain tolerance argument is "settled science."

The GrrrlPower Gang will likely purport that men can handle certain types of pain better simply because the human male body was designed in such a way as to better withstand extreme temperatures, physical blows, heavier burdens, etc. Fair enough—I concur. But I'll add that the female body was likewise designed to carry and give birth to children. (Gee…it's almost like men and women are designed, physiologically, to fulfill different roles.)

The blue pill world is convinced that childbirth is the pinnacle of physical suffering—mostly because women have been complaining about it, and telling us that it is, for thousands of years. Again, pain is too subjective to ever devise a universal measuring rod. But if there was some way to objectively quantify the pain of childbirth, then subject the average man to the same exact dose, I suspect he wouldn't complain nearly as loud or persistently. If he did, you and I would probably tell him to shut up, suck it up and drive on. Frankly, even those of us who aren't white knights don't like to see females suffer; so we would never react to a woman giving birth with such enforcement of equality.

Here’s what most of you reading this article already know about women: all but maybe the very best of them are Drama Machines and Attention Whores. They want to receive the highest accolades that men can earn but without earning it themselves. One tactic they believe will help steer them toward their rightful place on our pedestals is to convince us that they can endure suffering beyond what a mere man can possibly imagine. The culture at large (and most individual women in the West) have assigned themselves the daunting task of presenting women as superior to men, yet simultaneously oppressed victims of us. This narrative necessitates cognitive gymnastics, hyper-selective reporting, and creative rhetoric to maintain.

Women are not the masters at pain tolerance. What they are masters of (Western women, at least) is talking shit. There’s likely no benefit to wasting logical arguments to dispute their Womyn Warrior Narrative and its Childbirth Cornerstone. But next time a woman bitches about a bruise, scrape, chapped lips, or some other horrendous boo-boo, just remind her of her superhuman pain tolerance and follow up with a remark like, “I thought you were supposed to be tough.” The results might be fun.

Read Next: How To Grow In Times Of Pain

Joshua Rennenkampf
Joshua is a veteran of the Airborne Infantry and an author of books for and about red-blooded heterosexual males. He also blogs about books, movies, US culture, and politics from an unapologetic red pill, masculinist perspective. He is not a conservative (having rejected the terms "conservative" and "liberal" long ago), but an American patriot. "The Right-Wing Boogeyman that network news warned you about." You can read more from him at Virtualpulp.net.

5 Powerful Game Lessons from Robert Greene's 33 Strategies Of War

January 12, 2018 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Robert Greene is famous for his books on seduction. The Art of Seduction is a self-descriptive title and The 48 Laws of Power often deals with the subject as well, since power and seduction go hand-in-hand, but it's another book of his, The 33 Strategies Of War, that arguably provides the best game advice of all his works.

This isn't only because of the classical application of strategy which is detailed in the book, but because an entire section of it deals with something he calls "self-directed warfare." This is an application of strategy to conquering yourself—your insecurities, weaknesses, desires that could lead you astray, and turning your thoughts into focus and action, all of which are crucial in any game setting. In the arts of seduction and warfare, the first thing you must do is conquer your own weaknesses, and The 33 Strategies of War will help with that.

The book is a long one, but well worth the read, and the following strategies will help to improve your game.

