RooshV

ARCHIVE

compiled by /u/dream-hunter

www.TheRedArchive.com

■ ■ ■

Every single post from the blog RooshV in a single PDF file.

Disclaimer:

I am not the creator of the posts; all I did is compile the entire blog into a single PDF file. Every single post is credited by its author below the title of the post, along with a link directly to the post.

Please redistribute the PDF file to as many people as possible, as the information contained is priceless and future generations should have access to it. If at any time the PDF file is lost, it can be officially downloaded from TheRedArchive.com.

Enjoy, and if you are a fan of red pill, don’t forget to check my website TheRedArchive.com for an archive of content related to The Red Pill community including many subreddits and blogs.

Best Regards,

/u/dream-hunter

July 26, 2026

■ ■ ■

Womanly Advice

November 5, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you take a look back at the history of man, you will not find one instance where an average woman's advice about dating or relationships was better than an average man's.

When you ask a woman for advice, she doesn't tell you what works in a world based on reality; instead, she tells you what would work in a perfect, harmonius world where attention is free and plentiful, where no one hurts each other and no one plays any games. She tells you what would work if no one got punished for expressing feelings and interest. She tells you advice that always seems to work in television and movies where the beta always gets the beautiful girl. (Not suprisingly, most mainstream movies are written by beta white guys.)

Want to talk to a girl? "Go tell her how beautiful she is. Her heart will melt."

Girl not putting out in a timely manner? "Be patient and get to know her better. She will reward you with intense passion."

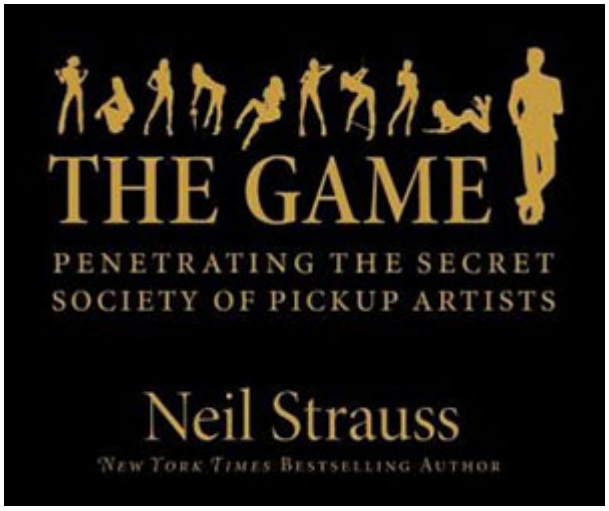
Marriage getting a little loveless? "Send her on a week-long spa vacation. She will come back home ready to cook and clean with gusto once again."

Girlfriend spending your money at expensive dinners? "Spoil her and treat her like the princess she is. The monetary investment will come back ten-fold with eternal love."

In love with a girl who has a alpha-male jerk boyfriend? "Spend quality time with her and remind her how much better you will treat her. Eventually she will dump the alpha for you, an emotional sack of love who loves going down on women."

Listening to advice from woman is like asking a car dealer what's the best way to deal with other car dealers. They are not going to sell out their kind.

At risk of sounding like a Seinfeld episode, I think every man should do the opposite of what a woman says. A woman's advice is pretty typical anyways: they either tell you to give more attention (i.e. try harder) or be patient. When you hear these, it usually means you are probably putting in too much work and need to withhold attention while being more firm with your needs. Your best bet is always to get advice from a man who actually, you know, fucks women.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

New Domain

November 5, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

DC Bachelor was started on impulse. One day I came up with the idea and three days later I was a local blogger. I didn't think it would last as long as it has, or else I would have put more thought into the name.

I'm changing it for a few reasons:

1. I hate DC. There is nothing about the city of DC I like more than other cities I've been to.

2. I don't live in DC. I have never lived there and I don't ever want to live there. When foreigners ask me where I'm from, I say Maryland, not DC. Technically, I've been faking all this time.

3. I don't use the word 'bachelor' in real life. Being single is a lifestyle that changes with time, not a single defining word.

So I decided on a domain that is boring but timeless, that will still work no matter where I end up. (The 'V' stands for the first letter of my last name and not the Roman numeral five, though I don't mind being called Roosh the Fifth.)

The content and layout will remain the same. DC Bachelor will stay open as a permanent archive. If you haven't already done so, point your RSS reader to feeds.feedburner.com/dcb, which should still work.

Ten Times

November 6, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Let's make a brave assumption that 10% of all women in this world between the ages of 18-34 are physically desirable, meaning they are at least a 7 on the 1-10 rating scale. We all know that some cultures are more attractive than others, but for now lets assume they are all the same.

I date Latin, European, and fair-skinned girls. I don't date Asian, Indian, black, or Eskimo. There is nothing wrong with these girls, but I just don't feel it (yes, I know Asian women have tight vaginas). Now say I go visit Columbia. For every 100 girls I see there that are close to my age, I'll want to have intimacy with 10 of them (10%). Since Colombia is mostly homogenous, probably the entire sample size of 100 will indeed be Latin, my target audience.

I run into a problem in the United States because of its diversity. Out of 100 girls I see here, off the bat about half will be girls from ethnic groups I can't work with. So with the remaining 50, 5 will be desirable if we continue using the 10% assumption. That means I will have to meet about twice the amount of girls here than in Columbia to find someone I find attractive.

Now lets drop our earlier assumption and recognize that women from some countries are better looking than others. If we bump up countries like Colombia, Czech, and Spain to 20% (which may be a conservative increase), and bump this morbidly obese country down to 5% (which may be a conservative decrease), the situation for me becomes much more unfortunate.

For every 100 girls I see in the U.S., 2.5 will be attractive (50 x 5%), compared to 20 in a desirable country (100 x 20%). Throw in the fact that D.C. is the ugliest American city and it easily becomes at least ten times harder to meet an attractive girl here. This means I have to run into 1,000 girls in D.C. to find the same amount of quality I'd find in 100 girls elsewhere.

There are only three solutions to this problem:

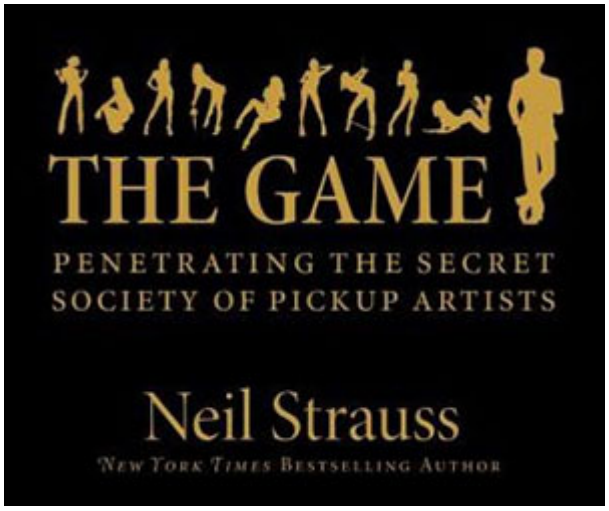
1. Move.

2. Play the numbers game and work hard to sift through tons of undesirable trash.

3. Turn gay.

I'm been doing option two for years. It's more energy intensive but I have dated some quality girls in this area. But then I have to ask myself a couple questions: How much more quality would I have met elsewhere? How much better would my experiences have been? Luckily for my sanity, I will never know the real answer.

The sad thing with all these numbers and assumptions presented to you is that I have only considered physical appearance, not personality.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Ted Haggard

November 7, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've known about Pastor Ted Haggard for a couple years now so I've been closely following the recent revelation of his drug-fueld tryst with a gay man.

For those of you who only read my blog and nothing else, he started his New Life church in the basement of his home with only one church member. He then built it up over many years to a 14,000 follower behemoth that holds services in a stadium. (New Life also has affiliates in other countries.) He led the National Association of Evangelicals which represents 30 million Americans. He had policy discussions with President Bush. He was an extremely powerful man. His decisions not only affected his followers, but Americans not under his leadership. Short of becoming President himself, there are not many ways he could have increased his power here in the United States. This is why his downfall is so amazing. How can a man so close to God have so little self-control?

A lot of people like reading stories of how people succeed. But I like stories of how people fall. And it's not because I'm a sadist, but because the success that everyone loves to praise and masturbate to is often built on weak character that cannot survive the test of time. The success is a fluke, an aberration. In a couple years Pastor Ted will be that crazy guy on a university campus trying to get the attention of passerby's. The next hypocrite who replaces him will lead people who memorize thousands year old scripture as fact, but can't seem to remember how many religious leaders have fooled them in the past twenty years.

The Daily Shower

November 7, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I stopped taking showers every day. I have stopped the religious scrubbing of my masculine body scent with the artificial chemical you call soap. Since then, my success with women has increased 400%. My intoxicating pheremones now fill the air around me, attracting women who long for a rugged, natural man.

It all happened by accident. I found out that I can gain an extra 15 minutes of sleep by skipping the morning shower. It's not so much that I need an extra 15 minutes of sleep, but now instead of getting up at 8:45am I can get up at 9am, a number that pleases me psychologically. There is one major downside: in the morning it looks like there are small animals living in my hair. But by lunchtime it settles down once the grease starts kicking in. Many girls ask me what product I put in my hair when they are really just staring at scalp grease. (It really builds up in the middle, but that's probably because I only use conditioner. Shampoo is for the devil).

I'm sure there was a time when humans accumulated dirt on their skin and hair, requiring a weekly bath in the village river that also doubled as the village sewage treatment plant. But these days I don't even think many of you know what dirt looks like. Unless you're talking summer heat wave, a daily shower is excessive.

What's It Worth?

November 9, 2006 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

When Hedonistic, in a recent thread, asked why guys who only want to pump and dump don't just hire call girls for $400 per hour, it got me wondering just what kind of girl a guy could actually get for $400/hr (No, I don't need any call girl services, I got a girl who treats me right). I thought I would do a little research and look at some escort sites. I originally planned to make make a quick clever response in that thread, but what I found deserves a thread of its own. I would like to present some of the results of my research.

[First, before some large men dressed in black hunt me down, every girl selling herself on the web states very clearly that she is only selling her time and companionship, and that no sexual services are implied in the rate charged. Any intimate contact is based on the agreement of two consenting adults and is in no way to be expected.]

Having said that, let us review the market for feminine "charm."

The Data

To spend time with this 23 year old Spanish hottie, Camilla, you must book a two hour appointment for $2,400 and after that initial visit, you may see her for one hour at the rate of $1,200.

To enjoy the companionship of this sultry Russian babe, Anastasia, one hour will cost $350.

If you prefer an all-American cutie like Cindy, her time will cost $250 per hour.

Have yellow fever and seek an exotic Asian like Saki? That will also be $250 per hour.

If you like your women “thick”, then Dani will offer you a special rate of $200 before 2:00 PM, but it’s back up to $250 after 2:00 PM. (Hey, her time is precious).

(no, I am not kidding, I found her out there at those rates).

No discussion of this would be complete without a mention of the high end of the market, for you discriminating gentlemen who seek the finer things in life. Ever want to meet that porn star you found on the internet? Well, one enterprising porn star actually offers men a chance to meet her. She is based in LA but does tours of major cities (she was in DC in early October) and will fly anywhere if travel is covered. Her name is Sarah Blake, she is innocent looking in a “is she really a porn star??” way, and an hour of her time will cost you $1,000 (discounts for multiple hours available).

And finally, there are the New York/Miami/LA models. This one New York agency does not even list their rates online, but says that the cost of an “introduction fee” to meet a real model “has a comma in the figures”. This is Angelina. You can’t see all of her face, but I have a feeling it looks pretty good.

The Questions

The pics and rates above forced me to ask myself some questions.

1. There are some really hot women selling themselves. Like “why the fuck aren’t you married to a millionaire?” hot. Why do women who can have any man sell their companionship to many men? Is the money that easy for some women?

2. None of these women look like “the type” to be selling whatever they are selling. It makes me think any decent looking woman, and some not so decent cough Dani cough, could be doing this. So how many are actually doing this? Were my cute college classmates paying their way through school like this? Are those hotties in the A-crowd clubs blowing off guys who approach because they have four men booked the following day?

3. What is with the pricing for these services?? Dani charges $250 an hour, same as hotties liks Saki and Cindy, but shouldn’t she be paying us? And what’s with Camillia and her $2,400 initial appointment? Yeah, she is cute for sure, but one sees girls of her level out all the time. Maybe she is engaging in luxury pricing – making something seem more valuable by charging an inflated price for it.

4. How many men will look at the pics above and never approach a regular girl again? How many girls will look at the hourly rates above and quit their day jobs tomorrow? How many wives who have “lost their passion” will see the hot young girls available to their husbands and rediscover their libido instantly?

Finally, here’s some math for us guys in relationships. In order to get as much “companionship” from girl at Cindy or Saki’s rates to match what a guy gets from his girlfriend in one year (say 3 per week x 50 weeks = 150 per year), he would need to spend $37,500 over 12 months. At Anastasia’s rates, $52,500. And at Camilla’s, $180,000. Having a girlfriend is more economical.

My Best Regards

November 11, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

"I got married."

Let's have a ten minute silence for all the players out there.

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....
.....
.....

Help Her

November 12, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There are two types of women: ones that exit cars in the middle of the highway and ones that don't. My mom was the former. If my parents started a fight in the car, there was a good chance it would end with my mom demanding to be let out. I would see her a few hours later, tired, sweaty, and mad as hell. Even though walking home punished no one but herself, my mom did this because she wanted to show my dad that she didn't need him. You can say she was a proud woman.

Surprisingly, my parents divorced. After that, because I depended on my mom for food, shelter and toilet, I had to take her shit when she felt like giving it. By my late teen years I decided that it was best not to depend on a woman for anything, even your mother, so that you are free to walk away if you so choose.

After I set out on my own, I would meet women who loved overplaying their hand, whether I was having sex with them or not. Because I didn't depend on them for things necessary for survival, I had no problem cutting them loose. I believe there is no reason to accept verbal abuse from any human being, especially women.

The reason women think they have more power over you than they actually do is because the guys before you never called them out on it. These girls live a life where guys fold over like dominoes to their unreasonable demands and moody behavior. They get away with it because they can, not because they deserve to. They think you like them more than you do or think you need them more than you do. But after one too many tantrums, after you cut off contact, they sit there by the phone, wondering why you don't want them in your life anymore.

Girls are not very good at realizing their value is different with each man they deal with. They don't know their place with you until it's too late. They end up pushing the limit with the wrong man, thinking you will appease her like all the others. I say call her bluff. I say let her out of the car. I say let her cry like a baby. These girls need help to learn how to act. They won't understand it, but you're giving them help.

Look At My Striped Shirt!

November 13, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

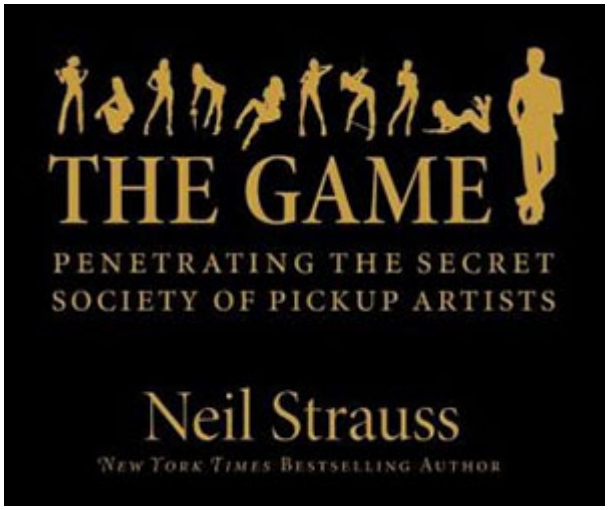
Every white guy who graduates from college must read this and print it out:

> Look at my button down striped shirt! Fucking look at it! This shirt means one thing! I'm coming home with some pussy tonight! That's right! It's been a long week at the office and it's time to blow off a little steam! I am a Junior Vice President! I have business cards that say "Junior Vice President" on them! They're glossy and magnificent! Here! Have one! Take it!
>
> My boys are coming out with me tonight! They all have striped shirts too!
>
> I figure we'll kick off the night with some Golden Tee! I am going to smack the shit out of that little white ball! It's going to be so fucking loud! I'll bet I can drive that pretend golf ball 600 fucking yards tonight! I'm that fucking pumped!

Read the whole thing here.

If you are a white male I want you to say the following: "I am a unique individual. I do not have to dress like other white boys. Blue is not the only color in the rainbow."

Good job.



Masterpiece

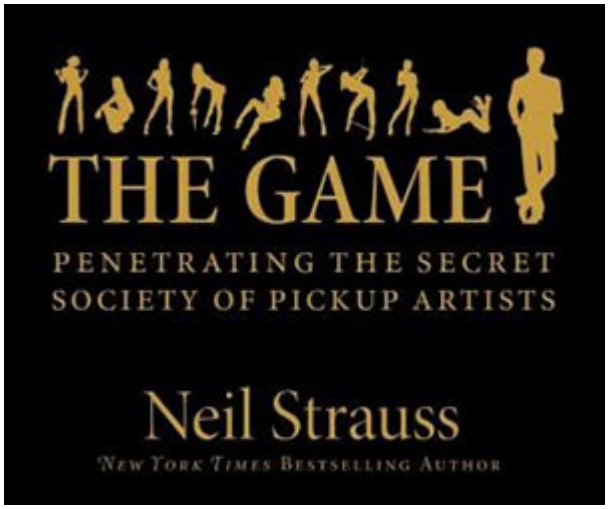
November 13, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I'm not the only person who writes here, so check the author name under the post title. A lot of people think I wrote the masterpiece on Friday, but it was really written by Chaco. If it's a Friday post, chances are it is not by me.

> So I cave in, I absolutely love reading Roosh V's (formerly known as DC Bachelor) blog! I should be offended by what he writes but instead I'm very intrigued. The majority of his entries have been the most thought provoking thing I've read on the net in a long time. Maybe that's a bit of an exaggeration…but oh well.

From Cheap Appearances. She has a nice body.



Nuclear War

November 13, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

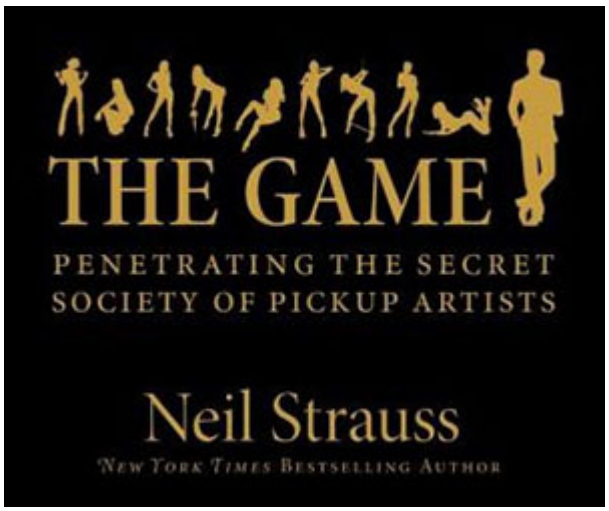
---

No-knead bread:

Banana bread:

Do never buy silicon

I bake food from the most basic elements of life: water, salt, flour, sugar, bananas, vanilla extract, walnuts. If there is nuclear war, I will be able to survive with just a couple things (clean running water, electric oven, grocery store), while many of you will starve because you were too busy eating Chipotle burritos instead of learning how to bake at home.



Player Or Poseur?

November 14, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Player. If you see an Indian guy with decent looking white girls, he probably has airtight game. This man's exotic Rorschach inkblot shirt seals the deal (no seriously, I think the shirt suits him well). Though the girl in the middle does seem to be recoiling from him a little.

The Best Commercial I Have Ever Seen In My Life

November 15, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

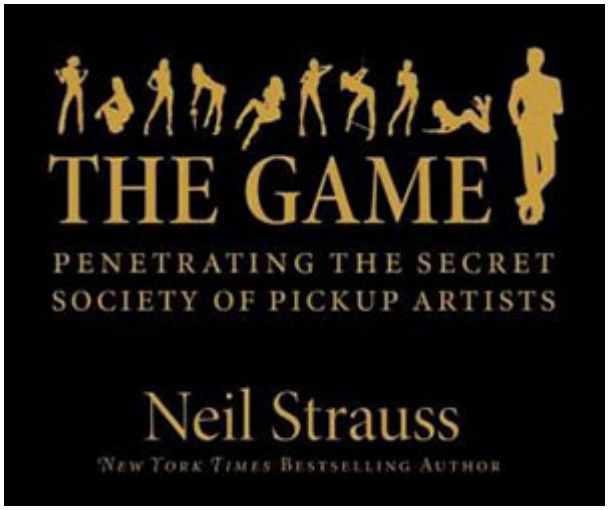
Work safe:

The reason this ad works is because it hits the American woman versus European woman stereotype (among others). The girl on the right, other than being sexy as fuck, is definitely European. The woman — or beast, rather — on the left represents a standard-issue American hog you will have no trouble finding in any mall food court. It appears that she even shops at the Gap like most young American women.

The most offensive thing about the American beast is not her grotesque appearance but her rough, grating, sense-of-entitlement attitude. The sad thing is many American girls act this way even though they are slim and cute, spoiling fine genetics with a bad upbringing. These girls are perfect for guys that like women who try to act hard instead of sexy. “But I have a law degree, I don’t need need to act sexy!”

I’m in love with the Wii girl. I don’t care that she has a petite ass — I want her. If you can find out her name, please share.

Life Insurance Quotes free quotes



The Book

November 15, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I secretly started writing the book this summer. I thought it would come together on its own so I didn't bother with an outline or plan. Big mistake. After about ten pages, I gave up what turned out to be a fruitless exercise in freewriting, printed out what I wrote, and burned it with my childhood baseball card collection.

Four months later I decided to try again, but in a smarter way. I spent about six weeks working on a detailed outline which was completed last month. I've narrowed it down to these chapters:

- Introduction – typical "how I got here" spiel
- ~~Pre-game~~
- Internal game – I replace your beta beliefs with alpha ones and erase your bullshit cultural programming
- Early game – approach, early closes
- Mid game – phone game, dating
- Late game – sex, maintenance
- Specific game – dealing with special situations
- End game – transcendence

My goal is to keep the organization as simple as possible.

–Begin whining–

This shit is hard. The more I write the more I remember to add more topics. So really each time I write I'm getting farther from the end. It's impossible to make a dent. To get one hour of solid writing done I need to block out about three hours of time because of my short attention span problems. I'm never going to be able to finish. THIS IS SUCKING THE LIFE BLOOD OUT OF ME.

–End whining–

Hopefully I will be finished with an edited draft by Spring. I've moved to the boonies (Gaithersburg) where I'm far from human contact and I have given up pretty much everything — including showers — to make time for writing. It's ironic that to finish this book I need to give up a life that was needed to write it in the first place.

I don't care if this book sells well or not. I feel a new chapter on my life coming up so I need to close this one out with something written. I want something more to show for the last five years other than a huge collection of porn.

Skinny Models? Don’t Blame Me

November 16, 2006 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

Every woman, gay man, and metro straight guy knows that there has been yet another scandal over models that are too skinny. I say “yet another” because when Kate Moss hit big in 1993, she started a “waif look” that moved fashion away from the curvy glamor girl era of Cindy Crawford, Claudia Schiffer and Linda Evangelista, toward young skinny girls who ultimately got so thin that people started calling their look “heroin chic.”

The latest episode arose when the city of Madrid banned models that were under a certain weight. How skinny are models these days? Well here are some pictures I found showing back-stage shots at New York’s Fashion Week. Based on these pics, I’d say they are pretty fucking skinny.

Dig these girls: I think the one on the left has ribs that stick out further than her boobs.

I’d be scared to bang the girls below. I think my manhood would be cut up by their boney insides.

Oh look, the girl below is eating her one weekly meal!

So who is to blame for this sorry situation? Within the fashion industry itself, it seems there is much blaming of others, but no one who will accept responsibility. Time states:

> Modeling agencies, the motherly folks who inform the models that they can eat or work but not both, say it's because photographers demand subjects with skin, bones and preferably nothing else. The photographers say it's the designers who set the limits. Giorgio Armani, one such designer, last week blamed the stylists, > the people who put together the looks for the photo shoots at the magazines. The magazines say it's Hollywood or it's advertisers or it's both. And the advertisers say people find their products more desirable when on, next to, or usually just barely covering slender body types.

Let us analyze the above to see if we can figure out just who is guilty. Who are the people in these various categories of the fashion world? Women and gay men, that's who. Straight male stylists? I don't think so. In other words, the people promoting the super skinny aesthetic are those who have no sexual interest in women. Oh sure, there may be the occasional lesbian or the brilliant straight guy who gets in to fashion to meet girls and later commits suicide because the girls in fashion don't eat and the real woman outside of fashion won't bang him because they think he is gay.

But one thing is for sure: straight guys are not to blame. I apologize to the feminist conspiracy theorists who think that straight men have plotted to create eating disorders in young girls everywhere by promoting unrealistic images of women in the media. Sorry, ladies, you are going to have to find another target for your hate other than straight white men. Those boys like women with curves. It's your own female sisters and your fabulous gay friends who promote those terrible images, not us.

The evidence? FHM and Esquire magazines both recently named Scarlett Johannson "The Sexiest Woman Alive." Ever seen Scarlett? This woman eats.

Now that's a woman. 100% natural, too. Oh wait, what about her ass you say?

Photo by Sheryl Nields

Ok there, now believe me? Past winners include Jessica Biel and Angelina Jolie, so more curves on those girls too. There is no way girls who starved themselves to Dolce & Gabbana emaciation would ever win this contest. If I could have my personal pick, Jessica Alba, toned yet curvy, would be the sexiest woman alive.

You girls with with eating disorders can stop paying attention to the beauty aesthetic of gay men and other women. You can stop picking at your salad on dates. You can even order dessert. You want to land a real man? We real men want real women.

Lip Biter Awareness Month

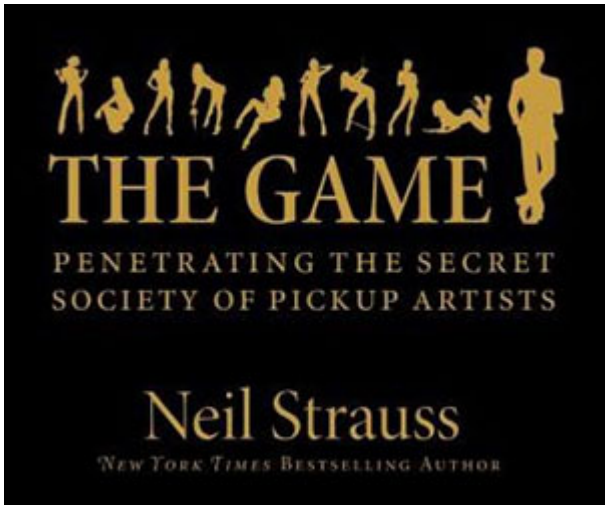
November 19, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Never take a girl who bites her lip seriously. Very quickly within meeting you, they will, either obviously or not, bite and massage their lower lip while staring right at you with eyes wide open. Lip biters are usually very pretty girls who get a kick out of their power over men; their goal is to arouse you to action where they can then frustrate you. The fun for them lies in the frustration, not the arousal.

Dealing with these types of girls are easy enough: simply remain unaffected and let them wonder why their usual game isn't working. Then they try even harder. In the process they will devote more and more time and attention into you, and next thing they know, they are into you and can't quite explain why. But even then, it takes forever to get these girls in bed because of the hoops they make you jump through. If you do get the lay — and odds are you won't — it's definitely not worth your time to stick with them afterwards. You will never "win" with them and never crack through their game-playing exterior to find the real girl inside (if there even is one). Whether they are playing unconsciously or not, let some other chump try to figure them out.

Either you will get played hard or will not get what you want, which I hope is a normal girl who cares about your needs. I did not meet my first lip-biter until I was 22 years old. She gave me incredible pleasure, but in the end she destroyed me.



Russian Girls

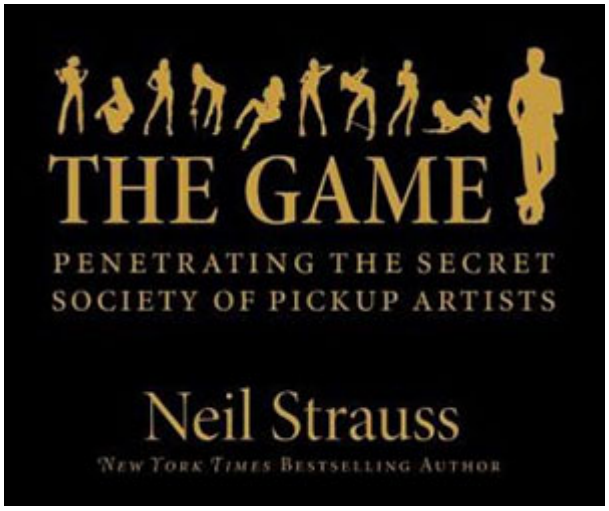
November 20, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I can not pull a Russian girl to save my life. I have been to at least seven Russian parties in the past year and I've pulled nothing except American. When I try to talk to them, they stick with monosyllabic speech that leads to nowhere, instead of engaging me in conversation that helps me gain access to their vagina.

My Russian roommate, an expert on matters such as this, says the cold attitude of these non-Americanized Russians is not so much snobbiness as it is insecurity, "They are intimidated by Americans and don't feel confident when having to talk in English." It has to be cultural because I've spoken to many other girls where there was a language barrier and I didn't get this feeling that hacking away at permafrost in Siberia would be more interesting.

Let's not forget the good: Russian girls are hot and thin. Sure when they get older they look like a can of Coke, but I'm sure it would be easy upgrade before that happens. To all the men banging Russian girls: God bless you; you are like glorious iron fist of strength and power.



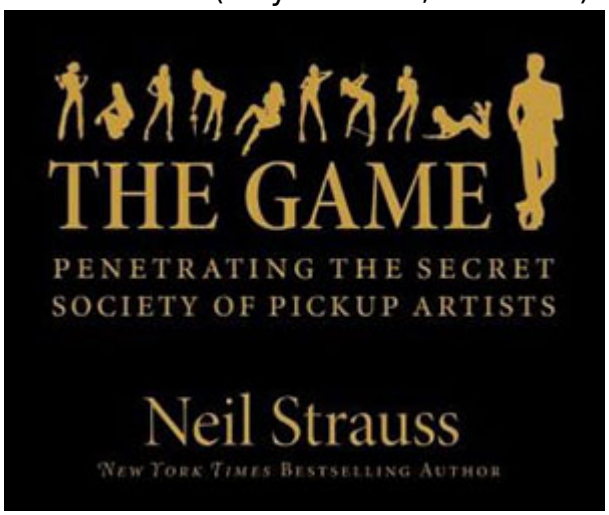
THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Player Or Poseur?

November 21, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Babe Ruth Jr.

Poseur. A real player would never point at a camera; it's akin to posing with a bottle of Grey Goose above your head as you party. You tell the world, "Hey look how lame I can be when someone has a camera in their hands!" A real player would take a picture opportunity like this one to wrap his arm around the girl near the ass area, or at least look down her shirt. Instead, this guy stares off into space, wondering why some other guy is wearing the same Old Navy shirt at him. And I know it's from Old Navy because I have the black version (only for work, of course).



Lover Happy Hour II

November 21, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Hosts: Me, Circle V

When: Thursday, November 30 @ 8PM

Where: Chi-Cha Lounge

My date for the happy hour

Hopefully by the happy hour, V will be fully recovered from her unfortunate beat down in the hands of Las Vegas prostitutes.

Happy Thanksgiving

November 22, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I give you video entertainment to last the long weekend.

Smashing a Playstation 3 in front of nerds waiting to buy one.

Amazing 'David Blaine' street magic.

"Either the general population will take control of its own destiny… or alternatively, there will be no destiny for anyone to control."

Idiot breaks into liquor store, can't get out.

"If Cookie Monster calls, tell him I'm not talking to him until he comes out of rehab."

"I, locust… FUCK TO YOU."

Latin America's answer to Eddie Murphy's Party all the Time (now a club monster).

Guy at my gym who always tries to show off to the girls gets OWNED.

Japanese guy gets pranked with ride of his life.

Stop complaining at work because it could be worse.

The world series of dice.

George Carlin: owners of this country (i.e. not you) and religion.

Calvin and Hobbes: The Untold Story.

Demetri Martin is a funny dude.

May you eat until you are ill and spend until you are broke.

Gambling = Lame

November 26, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

This weekend I was in an Atlantic City casino where my views were polluted with ugly and low-class people. It felt like I was at the DMV for two days.

I dominated low-limit poker, not by playing tight-aggressive and using actual skill, but by using mind-games that overworked my opponents' pacemakers. Here is my TOWER OF STRENGTH & POWER:

Nothing intimidates your opponents more than making a bet from a phallic metaphor.

After passing by the blackjack tables where mouth-breathers were hooting and hollering after winning $5 bets, I went to watch at a roulette table, which I'm convinced is the unofficial gathering place for people with the lowest IQs in society. These people are betting their hard-earned money on a plastic ball spinning around a wooden bowl. I have more respect for state lottery players. The best part of the game is at the end of a spin when the casino employee literally flushes a mountain of chips down a drain built into the table.

As the tower suggests, I did win overall (+2 BB/hour), but until casinos are full of hot-bodied 21-year-old South American women instead of smelly senior citizens, I'll leave gambling for the dreamers.

Blue Dress

November 27, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

What happened to the dress on a first date? The last time a girl impressed me with one was years ago. It doesn't matter much if she was pretty or not (she was), but she wore something which completely maximized her look. There is this art — I forget what it's called — where you get into a person's mind and detach them from reality. You create a powerful image in their head which makes them forget about reason and logical thought. Time becomes distorted and this person is ready to drop everything just for ten more minutes with you. But you're not practicing this when you roll up in pantsuits or an unflattering pair of jeans.

When a girl looks standard issue on a first date, she just lost an opportunity for me to increase her value and decide to put in an unreasonable amount of work and time to get her naked on my bed. Girls analyze their failed dates with men and look for that one magic reason why he didn't call again. But it's never just one thing — it's a dozen things. A girl has never completely lost me because I didn't like her style, but getting that right means she can screw up on other things, like not having lips as soft as butter left out at room temperature for one hour.

Not That Important

November 28, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

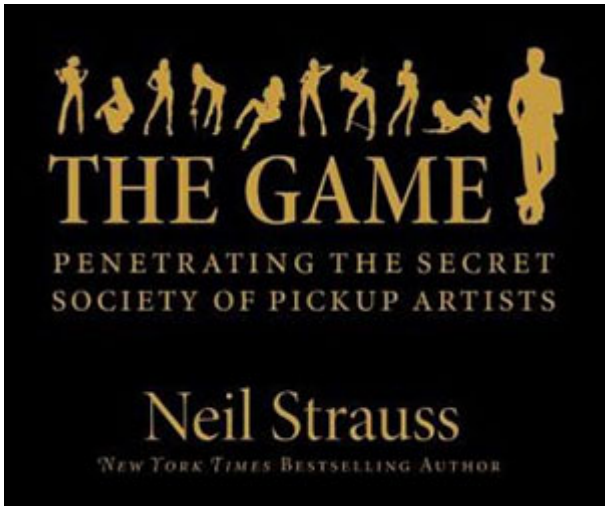
One of the first things I learned after I bought my motorcycle was to always watch my rear when stopped at a traffic light. I would keep the bike in gear and look in my mirrors to make sure the car behind me was slowing down to a stop. If not, I would be ready to maneuver out of the way. Getting rear ended on a motorcycle is so dangerous for the rider that it's a simple precaution you take to stay safe. But I never do that in my car, and I don't know anyone who does.

Three years ago I met Jen through a friend of mine. We developed a rapport where I would give her advice, especially on how to get this one guy she really liked. She was always very kind to me. Eventually I lost touch with her and she pursued a graduate degree to become a therapist.

On Thursday night she was sitting in her car at a red light. Her passenger was a guy she just started dating. A drunk driver did not see the traffic light and plowed into her car, killing both her and her date.

It's inevitable that a lot of people will tell her family that she is "in a better place now." Unfortunately she is not. Everything that you are, that makes you you, and gives you this state of consciousness to know that you are a different being from everything else on the planet, resides in your brain. Once you die and the cells in your brain die, it's game over. The only good part about dying, I guess, is that you will never know you are dead. It will be just like before you were born. If you don't make the history books or leave a collection of written works, you will live on in the memories of those who were close to you until they die themselves. And even if you do leave a legacy, you will never know the impact you made. No matter how happy or fulfilling of a life you live, or how rich or poor you become, it will end the same for all of us. We should all be grateful of consciousness, but cursed by it as well. I have never known real suffering, but knowing your existence will end can't be far from it.

The more I become a student of life, the harder it is to come to the conclusion that a supreme being is guiding the course of man with a meaningful grand plan. Our lives are governed more by random events, by statistical probabilities, than something that leads to a final purpose. In the cosmic scale of things, our lives are not even a blink of the eye. If life was a chess match, not only would we not be the pieces, but we would barely be the speck of dust on the chess board itself. While our lives have no real meaning, this consciousness makes us believe that we are special, enough to keep us alive and continue life for the next generation. That's all life is. Jen had 24 years of life and I'm sure she gave it the best she could, but I know she didn't expect to go so soon. If she was in one lane over, she would be alive right now. If such a trivial decision decides whether two human beings continue their existence or not, life definitely cannot be that important.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Player Or Poseur?

November 29, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Virginia Senator Jim Webb and his wife

If you saw this man on the street you would probably be revolted by his gigantic forehead and oompa-loompa appearance. It would be safe to say that any woman with him, especially Asian, is a mail-order bride. But Jim has served in the military where he has killed men with his own bare hands. (Women love men who are not scared of other men.) He's also served in powerful positions, displaying a level of ambition that women over 30 get completely wet over. But most importantly, he has misogynistic tendencies. No matter what a woman says, she loves a man — at least subconsciously — who is ready to put her in her place. This man is definitely a player.

LHH II Reminder

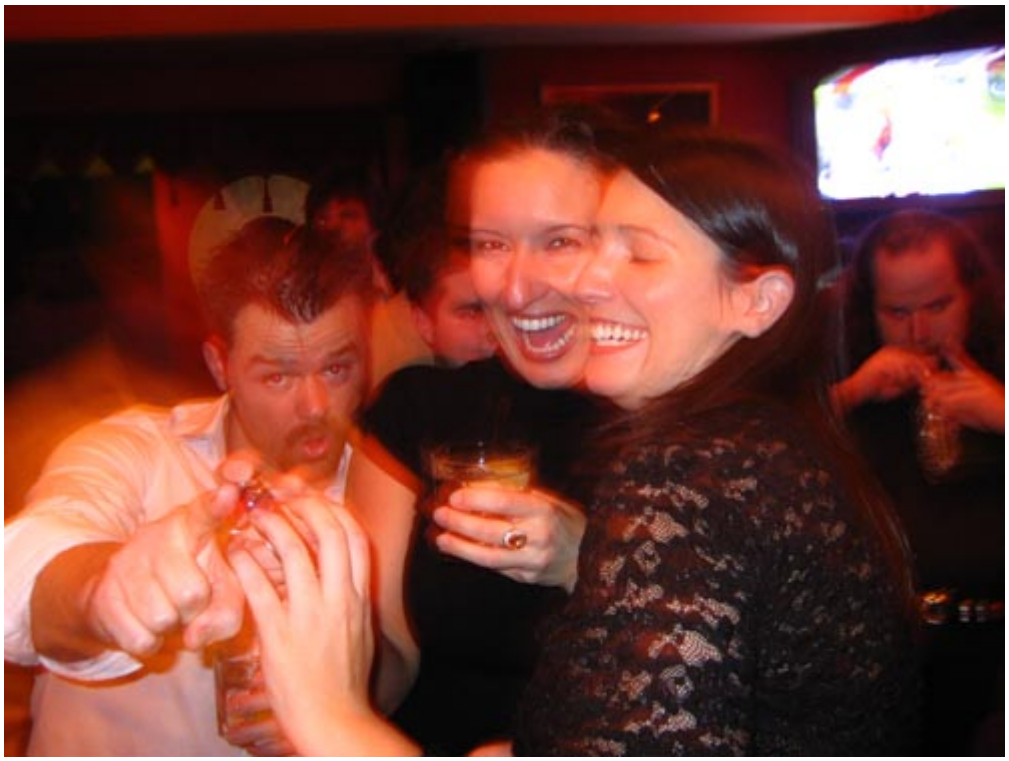
November 29, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The happy hour is tonight. Look for us by the main bar. Here is a picture of when I brought Judy (tonight's date) home to meet Mom:

Pictures Of Cookie, And Others

November 30, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link



Respect

November 30, 2006 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

A friend was recently telling me a story about a wingman of his. It seems this guy has good game and a lot of balls. He is the type of player who will approach any girl at any time, even if she is with her boyfriend. One time his wingman walked right up to a girl in a bar who was with her boyfriend and totally captivated the girl to the point the wing had his arm around the girl and the girl was totally ignoring her boyfriend. The boyfriend kept trying to get his girlfriend's attention but she blew him off to keep talking to the player. Finally, in desperation, the boyfriend grabbed his girlfriend and started kissing her in order to ward off the player.

This story got me thinking. It's pretty obvious the girl above had no respect for her boyfriend. Who knows what her motivation may have been, maybe she was pissed at him for something he did and was getting him back, maybe things were good but she wanted to make him jealous, or maybe she just really dug the payer dude and got lost in a trance with him. But whatever the issue, she massively disrespected her boyfriend.

I could call the girl out for acting like a bitch, which she was doing, but I am more tempted to call the boyfriend out. Bro, how could you let your relationship get to the point where your girlfriend would disrespect you like that? Your girl flirted with another player right in front of your face while she was holding the drink you bought her?? When your girl thinks she can get away with that, that tells me you're doing something very wrong. My philosophy is that men should take responsibility for their relationships. If your girl isn't treating you right, fix things or get a new girl, but it's up to YOU to manage your shit.

I really think it would be impossible for my girl to do this to me. I have very clear lines about what I consider disrespectful and if I feel I have been disrespected, my girl finds out very quickly. I think it's important for guys to have firm rules for how they expect to be treated and they should not be afraid to enforce them. No, I am not talking about 'pimp slappin your bitch.' I am talking about being willing to have a direct and firm conversation and not backing down if she argues back. If your girl won't agree to your lines in the sand, enforce your views by downgrading how well you treat her. If the problems continue, downgrade her from girlfriend to casual sex partner (or from girlfriend to dumped).

I may be coming off like some macho ass, but that is really not my intent. I am usually a big mush ball around my girl. I am extremely affectionate with her, both physically and verbally. In fact, if some of my old wingmen could see me snuggling with her, they would probably grow queasy, shake their heads sadly, and say I will soon be a broken man, sexless and cheated on.

I beg to differ. I can spoil my girl like a princess because when she crosses a line, she gets instant negative feedback. She knows that if there were repeated infractions it would have a serious negative effect on our relationship. I will not be in a relationship that emasculates me. Period. The end result? The number of infractions has decreased to nearly zero and 99% of the time she and I are warm and affectionate with each other. She does her best to please me and I do my best to make her feel loved and cared for. It’s the happiest and most beautiful relationship I have ever been in.

It’s all about respecting yourself and demanding that same respect from your girl. When you have those things in place, you can be as soft as you want and she will never tell her friends you are “too nice.”

R.I.P. FirstDateDC.com

December 1, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Kathryn and I pulled the plug on our baby after 11 months. Here is what I had to say:

> There are only so many ways I can tell a girl that a guy isn't into them. When starting this blog I never thought 85% of the questions would come from women. Because my main skill is in helping men, I know that my typical "move on" advice to women was probably not all that helpful to them. When the goal of a woman is to find one man to nest with, they don't want to hear it when you tell them to find another guy. In that respect, I failed.
>
> From working with Kathryn, I clearly see how tough dating is for people our age. Because of this there is an industry composed of dating books, seminars and workshops, and as long as men and women need to physically mate to continue the species, there will always be a demand for dating advice. While we can't confirm if our advice helped bring two people together, I think we helped the human race more than not.
>
> My final advice is for everyone still working on that one crush. I know it is fun to have a project, to work on that one guy or girl you really like. But it never fails that the more you really like them, the less chance you will get with them. Liking a person a lot before intimacy occurs is a good sign that they their value is considerably higher than yours. In other words, they can do better. It is not until I stopped valuing women that things fell into place for me.
>
> Perhaps if we only answered one question a week could we keep it going and stay fresh, but the daily nature of the blog doomed us from the start.

December Book Update

December 2, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

“So how’s your player book going?”

It’s going well, thanks, girl I used to date.

I never realized how appealing cleaning or peeking into an empty refrigerator is until I started this project. And I’m learning that it’s impossible to write without setting up some sort of reward system. I would start a porn download and not let myself watch it unless I write a certain amount. But then I’d take an early “break” and watch the porn anyway, and make my roommate watch it too. And then we’d play the drums and get some ice cream. After all that I’d get kind of sleepy and head to bed, but not before surfing the internet for a couple hours. Blog writing is so easy because not only are the posts short but you have immediate gratification. I can come up with a good idea tonight and by tomorrow I’d have Roissy and Hedonistic in the comments section fighting with each other, trying to hide the fact that they long for each other’s sex.

On my six page outline, I’m done with the first page. My goal is to be halfway done by the end of the December.

Word count: ~13,000

No New Years Club

December 3, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's that time of year where you start asking your friends, "So what are you doing for New Years?" Panic strikes as Christmas approaches and you still have no idea what lame party you are going to. Well I'll tell you what I'm doing for New Years: I am cooking myself a meal from my Betty Crocker cookbook, drinking a bottle of wine (probably a Riesling), turning off my phone, watching a movie, masturbating, and then going to bed. Total cost: $20. For me there will be no party, no countdown, no overpriced entry fee, no mass text messages, no cheap Champagne, and no party amateurs celebrating another year of life they wasted. Why bother? The people who love New Years Eve are the same who love making a big deal on their birthday. Well there is an age where you stop making a big deal of both — that age is 9.

Now I will not judge you if you spend $100 to pretend that you are fun. It is your money and you can do whatever you want with it, but let's be honest: I am superior to you. I know that fun can not be bought. I know that very little good can can come out of packed crowds. I know that bar and club owners are diluting their vodka as we speak. Everyone tries so hard on New Years ("Oh my God I need to buy a new dress!") that all you end up with is a bunch of losers acting unnatural, praying that they will find someone with a heartbeat to make out with. I will have my own party — a hand party — and I guarantee you it will be fun.

I Have Reached The Pinnacle Of My Game

December 4, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Years of trolling Craigslist daily has finally paid off: I was recently a missed connection. Behold the glory that is an anonymous female seeking me out:

> Barnes & Noble? – w4m – 20
> Date: 2006-11-19, 1:23AM EST
>
> Today. Yesterday, rather. You stayed till closing.

I confirmed it was me after an email exchange. She's an L.A. implant hipster. The first thing she noticed about me, like most girls, was my hair.

> When I grew my hair out, I noticed that I would attract a different type of girl. The quantity didn't change, but now I was spending time with art snobs, hippies, international girls, and emotional crazies.
> October 25, 2006

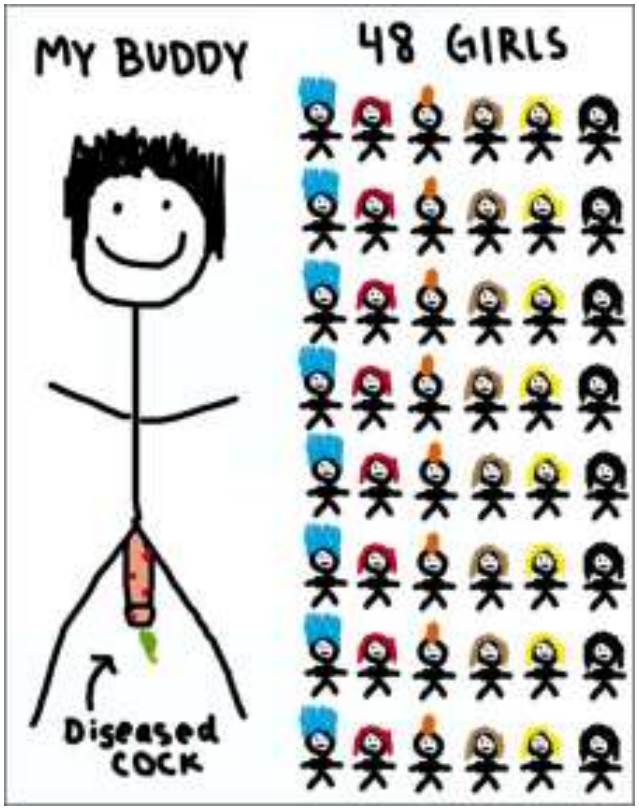
I guess all I have left to accomplish is some sort of massive orgy.

Road To 50

December 5, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have a player friend who has 48 notches. No girl who meets him thinks he is a player, and it's this under-the-radar feel about him which is the probable cause of his success. Girls think he is just a nice guy until he bangs them and never calls again.

This graphic gives you an idea of his accomplishment thus far:



He wants to get to 50 where he can then take a step back and look for a quality girl. And he would like to do this before January 1st, which means he has under a month to bang two girls. The Road to 50 series will detail his journey to finally becoming a real man.

Postscript: Before I can even post this, I get a text message Monday night that he got to 49. I knew I should have started earlier.

Postscript 2: Damn it, last night he got number 50. He got 3 new notches in 4 days. Oh well that was fun.

Thinking

December 6, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you ask one-hundred people what they like to do in their spare time, not one will say “to think.” Why would they — humans think all the time. In fact, they had to think just to answer your question. Right? But are they simply reacting to information or are they breaking it apart to create new ideas and theories? Do they just nod or frown at the news or do they take time out of their day to understand the big picture?

Unfortunately, people do not think, they consume. Sure, you read news and commentary, look up topics in Wikipedia, watch educational programs or documentaries, but do you put it together? Do you add to the conversation or do you just spit out the same statements you have always been saying? There really is no point anyway: humans are so resistant to change and forming new opinions that they will simply seek out information that validates their existing view. Growth rarely occurs. Real thinking is so rare that there is a term — ‘intellectual’ — for the class of people who actually do it.

The reason people do not think is because it is boring. Oh the torture of having to sit alone, without entertainment and without concern of what else you could be doing to only be occupied by your thoughts. Instead of being bored with the company of their mind, people seek out television or celebrity photos to consume some more. They don’t realize that they are bored with themselves. Look around and you will find people who fill their time with enough activities, distractions, and obligations so they are never forced to be alone with their own mind; so they always can say they’re “busy.” They are like the little baby who gets tired of one toy and reaches for something else, just passing the time, just playing on the surface.

Bitch Slappin' The Boys

December 7, 2006 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

Like every other guy, there are times when the ways of women mystify me. But at other times, I must admit, my own gender makes me shake my head in confused wonderment. I am not just talking about the alien force that compels some men to sit in the hot sun watching stock cars drive around an utterly plane oval track for hours on end, hoping someone crashes horrifically to end the boredom. I am talking about the world of romance and dating. Let's picture two typical dating scenarios:

Scenario #1

You're in a bar and you notice a girl smiling at you. You smile back, which prompts her to walk over to you and introduce herself. She works hard at keeping the conversation going. She laughs at all your jokes, touches you playfully, and fixes her hair a lot. At closing time she asks you to escort her home. At her door she invites you in to offer you a drink. On the couch at her place, she jumps you and you have wild sex. In response, you notch your belt, tell your friends she is too easy, and never call her again.

Scenario #2

You chat up a cute girl in a coffee shop. You get her number and go out for drinks. Nice conversation follows, she seems cool and interesting. You offer to walk her home, she says there is no need, but you insist, and after some back and forth, she reluctantly agrees. At her front door she stops to say goodnight and you tell her you have to use the bathroom, so she lets you in. After you have pretended to use the bathroom, you sit with her on the couch and bust a move. While making out, she tells you repeatedly that she can't be up late and needs to work in the morning. She moves your hand away from whatever private part you are attempting to grope. She struggles to keep various pieces of clothing on as you attempt to remove them. Finally, either through exhaustion from fighting off your attempts, eagerness to please this cool new guy she is on a date with, or simply the natural horniness that comes from long sessions of making out and being groped, she relents and sleeps with you. In response, you notch your belt, tell your friends she is too easy, and never call her again.

What's odd about this is that if both girls above had put up more resistance and denied their men the ultimate prize, the guys might have called again. Guys, does this make any sense? If a girl bangs on the night you met her or on the first date, she is likely to bang the next time you see her, so what exactly is the problem is here?

I'll never understand this. To me, this kind of bait and switch thing is what we "logical" guys like to blame "emotional" girls for. We guys constantly complain how girls demand we treat them to expensive dinners and flowers, only to decide, after we dutifully comply, that we are "too nice." They tell us they "have a lot going on right now" and are "too busy to date anyone," but a few weeks later we see those same girls grinding on some frat boys wearing cowboy hats in Heaven & Hell.

As far I was concerned, I had no problem with a girl who was ready to get busy real quick. When that happened, I just patted myself on the back for having pimp tight game. I mean, hey, I can't really blame a girl for having sound judgment in men, can I? Once I was done giving myself props, I started making plans to get the good stuff from her again.

When I was playing the game, I wasn't playing for the love of opening lines, phone numbers, or first dates. I wasn't spending weekend nights trolling in trashy Adams Morgan bars until 3:00AM for the joy of communing with sweaty, drunken humanity. I wanted the ultimate prize. When I got it, I sure didn't want to throw it back so fast. I wanted a healthy rate of return on my investment.

Think of how many guys make promises to Satan himself that they will never be nice to a woman again because they got burned by the dinner & flowers trick all through college. Now ask yourself how many girls swear they will make guys wait at least 5 dates before sex because they got burned for giving it up "too soon." Fellas, does it ever occur to you that if you reward "good behavior," you're likely to see a lot more of it?

Cream Pie

December 7, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Good news for people who have sex: Plan B is now on the shelves.

> Major pharmacy chains such as CVS Corp., Rite-Aid Corp. and Walgreen Co. not only offer the pill throughout their networks, but also pledge to ensure that customers can buy Plan B onsite even if a given employee declines to provide service for reasons of conscience.

AP

Calling 1-888-NOT-2-LATE was easy enough, but you had to wait by the phone so a counselor can call back and ask your girl questions about her vagina.

Counseling fee: $20
Morning after pill: $50
Busting inside a girl because you were too drunk to notice the condom broke: PRICELESS…

…from what other guys have told me.

–

Looooooong time reader Eric has started a magazine in Austin with some friends called The Other Paper. He has a column that riffs on the seduction "gurus" you may have read about in The Game, with their acronyms and ridiculous war analogies.

Austin is the only American city I need to visit.

–

I think I will stop reading comments from now on. Several of you have interesting things to add, but every now and then I have to punch myself in the stomach. It's almost like some of you are reading another blog and then commenting here.

I Am A Rapist

December 10, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Some items off the rapist checklist:

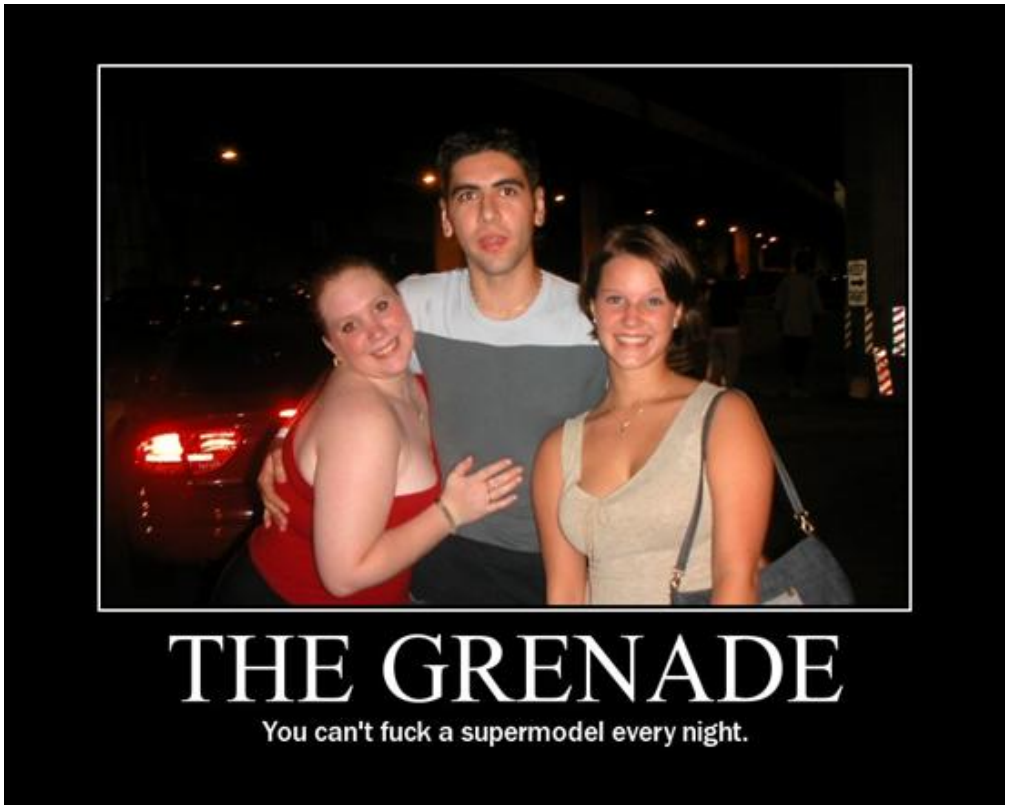
> 1. You are a rapist if you get a girl drunk and have sex with her.
>
> 3. You are a rapist if you get yourself drunk and have sex with her. Your drunkeness is no excuse.
>
> 13. You are a rapist if you 'nag' her for sex. Because you manage to ply an eventual 'yes' from a weary victim doesn't mean it's not rape. You are a rapist.
>
> 14. You are a rapist if you try to circumvent her "No" by talking her into it. She's not playing hard to get, and, even if she IS it's not YOUR responsibility to 'get' her. You're still a rapist.
>
> 17. You are a rapist if you don't immediately get your hands off of her when she says 'no'. You are a rapist if you take your hands off of her and then put them back ON her after 10 minutes and she eventually 'gives in' to this tactic.
>
> 18. You are a rapist if you won't let her sleep peacefully without waking her every 15 minutes asking her for sex. Sleep depravation is a form of torture and YOU are a rapist.
>
> 21. If she said "Yes" to sex with a condom and that condom breaks and you proceed anyway then you're a rapist.
>
> 27. If you had sex with her the night before but she doesn't want morning sex and you pressure her for it anyway then you're a rapist.

During sex, all the power belongs to the male because he controls the speed, tempo, force, and rhythm (unless he chooses to give it up). Even with consent, he is penetrating and he is violating. The author of this list tries desperately to equal the imbalance by making only one sexual interaction acceptable: when the man grovels and asks for explicit permission. To her this is acceptable because the man emasculates himself and transfers power and control — and his manhood — to her side. She doesn't care about equality, or protecting women from men like me; she just deeply resents the fact that sex is where men completely dominate. Unless a woman tells me 'no' once I'm inside her (it has never happened), I'm going to get mine the way I want to get mine. And so is every other real man that has sex. No ridiculous list will change that.

-Den of the Bitter Beaver

Motivational Posters

December 11, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link



-Motivator creator

Soy Latte

December 12, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

After 27 years of life, I have stopped drinking another mammal's excretion. I have come to the conclusion that cow's milk is better suited for baby calves and not adult humans. The only reason we drink milk from a cow is because it's cheap to produce; if the dairy industry could find a more economical way to produce milk from a camel, we'd all be drinking camel milk within a generation, after "new research" shows that camel milk offers more "health benefits."

I was talking to a friend about my recent decision to wean myself off the cow teat and he told me I was crazy, that milk is good for me and I'm sure to die a horrible bone-shattering death down a flight of stairs at the age of 50.

"How do you know milk is good for you?" I asked.

"What do you mean, it's common sense. Studies show it's good for you."

Another victory for public relations! Now I'm not writing this to convince you that milk is bad for you, but the last person I'm going to trust when it comes to what I put in my body is an industry motivated by profit. Whenever you are wondering if you should believe someone or not, ask yourself how much that person would lose if the opposite were to be true. If it's measurable in large dollar sums, as in billions of dollars, it may be prudent of you to be a little bit more skeptical. Money is all too powerful and corrupting of an incentive.

I bought a soy latte recently and was pleased with the taste. I'm becoming such a lame hippie cliche, with my long, non-showered greasy hair and beard, carrying books around and consuming soy products. I won't be surprised if I go vegetarian. On an unrelated note, I'm currently in the market for an acoustic guitar.

Smith Point

December 13, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I have been in this area since legal drinking age and have visited over 100 bars and clubs around DC, but I have never been to Smith Point. I don't know anyone who goes there but apparently it's a popular bar. Can someone help me "get it"?

Late Night Shots, the promotional arm of Smith Point, has a message board I read when I want to feel better about myself. On the surface it doesn't look like these are the type of people I want to associate with, but I've been wrong before (once, actually). The bar seems like a place the CPMC guys went to before they discovered the existence of the cigar.

If being a part of this white crowd means I can pre-party at J. Crew, I want in immediately.

Postscript: "There's enough fodder for mockery in there to keep 100 monkeys blogging non-stop for a year." – Rock Creek Rambler

Why Are There Still Fat People?

December 14, 2006 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

I have been noticing there are a lot of fat people in this country. Sure, I knew this before intellectually, but it's caught my attention lately because it seems like I am always squeezing myself into a Metro seat next to some really fat person, which I have to do carefully to avoid sitting on the part of them that oozes onto the seat I want to sit in. Having to do this so often got me wondering just how many fat people there are in this country, so I did some internet research and found government statistics on the subject.

The answer: a whole fucking lot.

According to the Centers for Disease Control, 66.5% of adult Americans are overweight. Even worse, half of those are classified as "obese." If you do the math, that means 1 in 3 of my fellow Americans are obese.

How fat is "obese"? Well, it seems "obese" has some official clinical definition that means "not just fat, but really big ass fat." According to a Body Mass Index (BMI) table, a girl who is 5'4 (my girl's height) would have a "healthy weight" if she were between 110 and 140 pounds. She would be considered "overweight" if she were between 146 and 179 pounds. And this little 5'4 girl would be considered "obese" if she were between 175 and 197 pounds.

That's pretty damn big. I'm not talking about a few extra pounds here. I am not picking on people who stay in shape but are not fitness model perfect. And yes, before The National Association to Advance Fat Acceptance hunts me down, I understand that there are people who suffer from medical conditions they can't control that make them gain weight. And yes, there are people who have genetics that hardwire them to be fat no matter what they do. My true sympathy goes out to these people.

But what about all of these obese people who could do something about it if they wanted to? It's not like people don't know what makes them fat or don't understand how to be thin. Who living in the midst of the Information Age still doesn't know that a diet consisting of hot dogs and Ben & Jerrys will make them fat? Ok, maybe there are a few moonshine-selling hillbilly families living in Appalachia who never got the message, but I am convinced that everyone else knows that a sensible diet and exercise are the answer.

If everyone knows how to be thin, why isn't everyone thin already? After all, we live in a vain, image-conscious society. We Americans spend countless billions every year on clothing, make up and accessories to make us look more attractive (if I were not feeling lazy I would look up even more statistics on consumer spending in these areas). We literally worship the most beautiful people in our society – movie actors, TV stars, fashion models, and turn them into modern day royalty. Our culture is obsessed with physical appearance, so why isn't the crappy feeling obese people get when they look in a mirror enough motivation for them?

Moreover, it's well established that we humans select our mates based upon physical characteristics which speak to one’s fitness for producing healthy offspring. In plain English: slender people get laid. I don’t think you would be shocked if I told you the best looking men prefer to date women who are slender. We also know the best looking women usually date men who are somewhere between yoga toned and bodybuilder massive. If the desire for the sex explains a great deal of human behavior, why isn’t the basic need to have sex with hotties enough motivation for people to stay in shape?

So who can explain this to me? Obese people already know everything they need to know to be thin. When obese people look in the mirror, they receive the instant feedback of disliking what they see. If obese people want to mate with a member of the opposite sex, they live a life with fewer, less attractive mating partners at their disposal. So WHY are they still so fat??

Do You Know Where Your Cocaine Comes From?

December 15, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Here's an educational video that shows how cocaine is made. Unfortunately there were no bare-breasted women cutting up the coke like in the movie New Jack City.

I've never tried cocaine before and after watching this I don't think I ever will, especially when recycled gasoline is a main ingredient. Ammonia and sulphuric acid is also used. The filter of choice is a dirty rag.

The impurities and chemical residues will get you before the drug does.

Source: ThrowAwayYourTV.com

Balls

December 16, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Casey Serin For Dummies

December 16, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I've been fascinated by the story of Casey Serin, a 24-year-old who dived into real estate investing as the market turned sour. He bought the bulk of his properties in 2005 with "liar loans," which lets borrowers state their own income to get into more house that they could afford. And with interest-only payments, for at least a few years you can afford your dream house. This housing boom has created new rules that prevent housing from ever going down; by the time you balloon payment begins, you can refinance and cash out a little to get marble countertops or a new car. Unfortunately for many people reading from a DC condo right now, we know this recent housing boom was no different from previous ones.

Casey bought houses at their peak prices, sometimes without even looking at them in person, and found himself unable to get buyers interested. Since he quit his web designer job to be a RE investor, there was no income coming in. He started a blog about his problems, which was immediately successful though it put him on the hook legally since he admits to lying on his loans. The USA Today did a profile on him called 10 mistakes that made flipping a flop.

> In one year, the 24-year-old website-designer-turned-real estate-flipper bought eight homes in four states — and in every case but one, he put no money down. At his peak, in April, Serin had $93,000 he'd taken out of the homes as he bought them. By July, he was broke, desperate for one last deal.
>
> Now? Serin has $140,000 in credit card and credit-line debt and five houses in foreclosure. Last month, he started iamfacingforeclosure.com, a blog that's drawn both notes of condolence and expletive-laced condemnation.

He is sitting on $2.2 million in debt. Only in America will banks lend such a large amount of money to a web designer. But to his credit, if he simply dived in four years earlier, he would be a very wealthy man right now.

I'm not a RE investor but I'm fascinated by this story because I completely missed the boat. I did not buy any properties and got to sit on the sidelines watching other people's wealth increase. I am a bitter renter. But the fact that my rent payment is less than what many of you Whole Food shoppers pay for food a month does ease the pain.

The fun part of all this, and why I'm writing about Casey, is his brilliant blog. He is a soap opera writer, stirring up the pot and getting everyone in a froth over his idiotic moves and statements. Examples:

- Continual search for "creative" and "sweet" deals even though he has to borrow thousands of dollars a month from friends and family.
- Selling a reliable car and buying a used Jetta with a subwoofer that is in dire condition.
- Following the advice of "gurus" and attending real estate seminars. He recently attended a one-week RE seminar and posted about how the book Getting Things Done might turn things around for him.

- Postings of his discretionary spending which includes visits to Macaroni Grill and Jamba Juice (West Coast equivalent of Smoothie King). The Jamba Juice mentions guarantee at least 100 comments.
- Complete unwillingness to file for bankruptcy (until yesterday).

For the past couple months I know he's been trolling, but I just can't look away. I really want to see where this ends up: if his wife will divorce him, if he will go to jail, or if he will land a sweet deal to get him out of the mess. And it's educational too because I have learned more about RE investing from the hilarious comments section than anywhere else.

I look forward to a housing crash, which would only affect speculators like Casey or buyers who bought more than they could afford. Unless the dollar falls, which is a real possibility for 2007, a housing free-fall would be a most pleasant development to someone like me who is sitting on cash.

- IAmFacingForeclosure.com

Thankful

December 17, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I feel sorry for women because all guys want to do is fuck them. I think my interactions with the human race would be more negative if I was viewed as genital organ with a life support system built around it. It would bother me as a girl that I'm constantly fed bullshit and lies. "But not all guys are like that!" Yeah and those happen to be the ones girls usually don't want to fuck.

While I'm no different from most men, I like to think I leave girls better than I found them. I gave her this pleasure (emotional, physical, and spiritual) that stays with her for at least a month, sometimes longer. I help raised the bar for future men she dates. I gave her hope and experience. She doesn't realize it at the time, especially when she runs into me when I'm with some other broad, but I made her tougher and stronger. The next time she meets a guy like me, she'll be better prepared to play him and get more of what she wants. Smashing and dashing really is win-win for everyone involved.

Clueless

December 18, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I have no clue when a girl orgasms or not. Unless she tells me, your guess is as good as mine. I know there are some signs like a sudden change in vocalization (e.g. “I’m coming”) or a request for a one-minute break, but it’s impossible to be certain unless I ask. And while I’m curious how many multiple orgasms I did or did not give in a 30-minute period, I don’t ask.

If I ask, I’ll start focusing on her pleasure instead of doing my own thing, which — if I hear from her again — is good enough. The moment I try to please her is the moment I’ll end up pleasing both of us less.

P.S. I have not gone down on a woman since 2003.

Player Or Poseur?

December 19, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This man appears to be relaxed and comfortable. He has put in a little work to his appearance with the facial pubes and the hand jewelry, but it doesn't look like he is trying too hard. He is not making any weird facial expressions or camera-pointing gestures. His hands are comfortably wrapped around the girl's body.

Other than an awkward claw position for her left arm, the girl attempts to get as close as possible to him, as if she wants everyone on the internet to know they are an item. The thing that seals the fact that this man is a player is that her crotch is almost against his crotch, something that is uncommon when posing for pictures with lady friends. I would guess that his game is at an advanced level for being able to pull a pretty girl from the majority race.

Are You Serious?

December 20, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. No good deed goes unpunished. Yesterday I posted a picture of a seemingly happy couple, complimenting the guy on his game and the girl on her looks. Turns out the guy is gay (he fooled me) and his friends are getting uppity, all because I complimented his pussy-getting ability. Whatever. They are obviously new to the internet with their "you have no life" arguments. Next thing they will tell me that are "it" people in DC or something. Sorry my life is isn't going to Fly every fucking weekend to party with the same fucking people. Please teach me how to be cool.

2. A girl who I refused to go down on publicly reacted to my post on Tuesday by basically saying I have mommy issues. I wrote something spiked with venom that was ready to crush her but I decided to put it aside. I have no choice but to defend my honor if she continues the psychobabble.

3. Both Kathryn and V shut down their blogs today. The DC blog community as I know it is over, and I fear the brain drain has just begun.

Not Wanting What You Wanted

December 21, 2006 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

I never have done drugs, so there are a lot of things about drug use that confuse me. But what confuses me most are how people do coke/ecstasy/meth/whatever to get high but don't think about the crash into depression that comes after. The crash is as much a part of the experience as the high, but nobody ever says "I am going to get high and then get depressed." People just talk about the high part.

Actually, drugs are not the point of this post. I bring them up because I have noticed a similar phenomenon when it comes to relationships. There is a lot of wanting to get high but ignoring what comes after. More specifically, I have been noticing lately that people desire mates with certain qualities, but never think that there may be a downside to those very same desired qualities.

There are quite a few examples of this. My favorite example of late is when women seek a professionally successful (and therefore wealthy) man for a husband and then express great frustration when he is too busy to spend quality time with the family. Did you read the recent news articles about Goldman Sachs year-end bonuses? Those guys don't get anywhere in an I-Bank like Goldman by leaving at 5:00PM every night to be home for the family dinner. Want a man with a chance to make partner in a top law firm? Those guys don't make partner by insisting on time off for PTA meetings. The vast majority of jobs that pay big money also expect you to bust your ass in exchange for all that wealth. Why doesn't it occur to women that the hot shot MBA who is going to buy them that fabulous Georgetown townhouse isn't going to have extra time for his son's little league games?

Men have their own issues with not wanting what they thought they wanted. We know men tend to be attracted to youthful women. I think if you took a survey of men and asked what the ideal age for a wife would be (and you promised you would never reveal their answers any women), I am sure most would say age 18 is perfect. That is, as long as she turned 18 within the last month. But what's funny is that men who successfully land a young hottie then become driven to near madness from her immaturity. I have been guilty of this myself. In the past few years I have dated some women in their early 20′s and then complained to friends about xyz ridiculous! stupid! childish! thing they did. The usual response from guys is usually something like, "Put that bitch in her place yo!". The usual response from women is usually something like, "What did you expect, you idiot??" With hindsight, the ladies have a point. Guys, if you like 'em young, go for it, but don't expect a college girl to show sound and prudent judgment in dealing with you. Expect an impulsive kid raised in an age of instant gratification who was spoiled rotten by excessively indulgent parents.

I could go on and on. Ladies, you want an assertive alpha male with a strong backbone, right? Funny how that alpha male transforms into a macho jerk when he disagrees with you and stubbornly refuses to back down. Fellas, you want that club hottie who wears fashionable sexy clothes? Funny how she transforms into an untrustworthy slut when she flirts with all the club players who hit on her. Ladies, do you like metrosexuals? Funny how they don't seem so endearing when they insist on different choice of dinner flatware. Ok, instead you want a man's man who knows how to change a tire just like your dad could? Funny how he think spending all weekend watching football games on TV is a way to spend quality time at home (wearing tapered leg jeans with white sneakers, no less).

I think people would be a lot happier in their relationships if they learned to accept that with every desired quality comes a downside to the very same quality. I am not saying those downsides are a party, but nobody should be surprised when they appear.

Very Cool Wine Holder

December 23, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This one is cool too.

Gifts

December 25, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

For everyone: TED talks. Short and long lectures from a bunch of really smart people. Check out the ones by Malcolm Gladwell, Dan Gilbert, and Barry Schwartz.

For the ladies: a picture of me beating my meat.

For myself: a 3.5 pound laptop. My desktop and I had a good six year run.

Ghost Wars

December 27, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

It only took me about three months but I have finally finished the 600-page book Ghost Wars, about events in Afghanistan and Pakistan leading up to 9/11. My favorite paragraph:

> The [CIA] sent out a team of mechanics knowledgeable about Russian helicopters to try to resolve the [helicopter mechanical issue]. Massoud's men took them to their Dushanbe airfield and opened up one of the Mi-17s. The CIA mechanics were stunned: Massoud had managed to patch an engine originally made for a Hind attack helicopter into the bay of the Mi-17 transport. It was a mis-matched, gum-and-baling-wire machine, a flying miracle. The CIA mechanics were so appalled that they did not even want Massoud's pilots to fire up the helicopter's rotors. They were afraid the whole thing would come apart and send shrapnel flying.

The freedom fighter leadership would fly in these helicopters.

I still find it amazing that one man who traveled in SUV caravans in third-world countries continues to stymie the most power empire in the history of the world. The book, which I highly recommend, lays the groundwork for how this all came to be. Reading it has been the biggest commitment I made all year.

New Year’s Musings

December 28, 2006 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

I am sitting here at 10:16PM and I haven’t written anything for my now regular Friday spot. I usually try to find inspiration around mid-week but this week I got caught up in the holiday spirit and never got around to it. My usual routine is to sit down at my computer on Tuesday and think of the something that has been interesting me lately and that fits into the general spirit of Roosh’s blog (male-female dynamics, social commentary, sex, etc). Right now I have nothing and I am just writing stream of consciousness style until I get an idea. By the way, Roosh has never once told what I should or should not write: he gives me complete ‘artistic freedom’ (if you can associate any of this with “art”).

Since this is the last post of 2006, I suppose I could offer some New Year’s thoughts. I have been thinking about New Year’s resolutions lately. I never used to make any, but I think I will this year. I used to think they were lame because I felt personal improvement is something people should do year-round. It shouldn’t be some special once-a-year deal that you forget about by mid-February.

But I have been taking stock of things lately and I decided there are some good habits I would like to develop, and some bad habits I would like to get rid of. So this year, I will make some resolutions. I figure if personal improvement is a year-round thing, there is no reason not to start on January 1, 2007. So here is my list of things I would like to do more of, and things I would like to do less of.

1. Do something for my health every day. It can be lifting weights, yoga, Tai Chi, whatever, just something for my body each day. As my girl said recently, our bodies are the one thing that goes with us no matter where we are, so we should make taking care of them #1.

2. Do something for my mind every day. It can be reading a book, solving a sudoku puzzle, playing chess, anything that makes me think or adds to my understanding of the world. Reading Rooshv.com does not count.

3. Do some relaxation work every day. Deep breathing, meditation, progressive relaxation. Everyone is too tense, including me. ‘Nuff said.

4. Do not do amusing but mindless things like read blogs or look at porn until after I have done the three things above. Nothing against you bloggers (or porn stars) out there, but it’s time to set some priorities.

That’s it. I think if I accomplish those things, even in a small way each day, I’ll be a better person by Januray 1, 2008. I wish everyone luck with their personal goals for 2007, whatever they may be.

My Top 10 Favorite Posts of 2006

December 30, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

10. The Game

> It's humiliating to go out, attempt to dance, put on this "I'm a cool guy! really!" show, and essentially act like a monkey to get into a girls pants — to lower yourself for someone you don't care about just to get that physical pleasure.

I wrote this because I felt weak to my physical desires.

9. Ten Times

> How much more quality would I have met elsewhere? How much better would my experiences have been? Luckily for my sanity, I will never know the real answer.

In Spain I realized that the DC area really is ugly. A calculator was used during writing of this post.

8. Two and Out

> I refuse to invest in someone of unproven value.

The only time date threes occur is if one of the first two dates were shorter than normal and when she makes it pretty obvious that sex is going to happen.

7. Coffeeshop Couple

> I'm staring at this couple, who are oblivious to everyone around them, and realize that their lives are harder than mine will probably ever get. Their day-to-day struggle for normalcy is much more difficult than it is for anyone I know.

I wrote this on a piece of paper after they left.

6. My Girlfriend Judy

> Finally, I found a woman who doesn't talk back and lets me do whatever I want to her in bed.

I took down the pictures because of some work problems but they are not back up with a new bonus picture.

5. Spain: Lessons

> I liked this girl a lot, but I liked the other girls a lot too. These are the times I feel pity for guys who have crushes and obsess over just one girl for months or even years. There is just too much quality out there in the world to have an obsession.

This post didn't get too much attention but I threw in a lot of game observations.

4. Status

> As a club veteran, I see the types of girls that give second looks to sharply dressed men in VIP booths. If you walk down the ghetto while waving hundred dollar bills in your hand, I doubt you will be surprised when someone robs you of it. Money attracts people who like money.

The idea that personality is more effective than money defines my interactions with women.

3. Not That Important

> It's inevitable that a lot of people will tell her family that she is "in a better place now." Unfortunately she is not. Everything that you are, that makes you you, and gives you this state of consciousness to know that you are a different being from everything else on the planet, resides in your brain. Once you die and the cells in your brain die, it's game over.

I wasn't going to write about her death but all the comments on her MySpace page from people who didn't have a clue changed my mind.

2. My Rules Of Life

> There is nothing wrong with making a mistake, but you make things worse by staying blind to your own error. Don't bother trying to fix a situation you should have avoided in the first place.

I had to develop this post for a month before I could even start it, and then it took me another couple weeks to write it.

1. Glengarry Glen Ross (Remix)

> You see my bedpost. You see it? My bedpost has more notches than you will have in your entire life. You see, pal, that's who I am. And you're nothing. Nice guy? I don't give a shit. Good father? Fuck you — go home and play with your kids! You wanna play this game? Close!!

This was easy to adapt from the original because high-pressure sales and getting laid are similar. The scene is from one of my favorites in movie history.

–

Here's to another year of consistent blog output.

January Book Update

December 31, 2006 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I'm halfway done with the outline, which is becoming more and more useless as I go on. The hardest part is finding a place for all the material, much of which doesn't fit neatly into categories. Right now my goal is to get it in somewhere for now and worry about editing later.

I'm making progress, but the end seems so far away that I'm just taking it one hour at a time.

Animals Are Tasty

January 1, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have no problem eating animals. They taste good and the protein in their flesh helps sustain my gym workout routine and muscular development. I go to the store, buy meat that looks nothing like the animal it came from (definitely no hair or feathers or soft skin or anything gross like that) and then I go home and cook them up in a hearty meal that may or may not give me digestive issues one hour later. This is a meat-eating world and those who don't jump on board are pansy-ass liberals who think they are smarter than everyone else.

But what would happen if meat-eaters had to kill the meat they wanted to eat? How about if you had to kill the cow, cut up its body, and filet its flesh. I don't even know how they kill cows — machete, maybe? If you want leather shoes or handbags, you have to condition it yourself. I think you have to leave it out in the sun for a certain period of time. If you wanted to eat chicken breast for dinner you had to take the chicken, hold it on a board and slice off its head with a large knife, being careful not to let all that blood splash on you. Then you get rid of all the feathers, open it up, and gut its internal organs with some type of scooping instrument. Of course you would preheat the oven before the slaughter to save time.

I could not make myself kill any animal for food when I know I could survive without it. Big agri-business does me a service through their immigrant-powered factories in the Midwest: they allow me to eat meat by placing a big enough distance between what happens to the animal and what I see on grocery shelves. (As I write this I'm eating a huge cow cheeseburger with cheese, mushrooms, and grilled onions. Mustard and ketchup is falling all over the keyboard which I have no idea how I'm going to clean up. My fingers are covered in greasy goodness and I'm using the sleeve of my shirt to wipe my mouth because I don't plan on going out later.)

In the old days of rural societies, people had no problem killing their food because that's how they were raised. But in modern, capitalist society, all of us are groomed to be end-users who consume without question. So what if this chicken meat come from a couple thousand miles away. It's still chicken right? So what if this DVD player was made in a dangerous Chinese factory by 16-year-old girls. It's on sale right? If we had to kill our meat, at least half of the country would turn vegetarian overnight.

Exclusively Bad

January 2, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Every weekend, the same scene is played out in thousands of nightclubs in hundreds of cities worldwide: young, upwardly mobile people are doing their best to get past the velvet rope.

If you went to Best Buy to purchase an electronic gadget, and the staff made you wait in a non-moving line, and expressed doubt about wanting your money, and then, depending on the cashier, an extra, random amount was tacked on to the price, would you go back again? It's a strange thing to wait in a line for a nightclub that is not full, where your patience is just a plea for acceptance in dark rooms that have alcohol, loud music, and the possibility of sexual attention. But you don't wait in lines do you? Well, there are other ways people pay for this VIP access, from money to fake friendship to flirting, where the possibility of sex is never outright denied.

It's hard to find something to belong to that defines you as a person. Not everyone is going to be marathoners, artists, athletes, politicians, or imported car enthusiasts. Not everyone will easily find their niche. While there is nothing wrong with the vast majority of people, they fit right in the middle of the bell curve: they are normal, maybe successful, but without a specific group they can call their own. If this normal person is social and in possession of discretionary income, that leaves not many options for hobbies except alcohol and partying. Alcohol makes you feel good so it would make sense that a lot of people go this route. After going out three nights a week to the same places for an extended period of time, they can now say they are in a special group that exchanges pictures and party stories. Now they belong.

These people, when they are in a nightclub of their peers that gives an air of exclusivity, no matter how manufactured, undergo a transformation. First is appearance. Just like in any social club, a uniform must be purchased which lets others know you belong. This is the cornerstone of the fashion industry and ensures that everyone buys the same styles at the same time. Recently when I saw a girl with a belt around her stomach, I thought she was just being creative, but then when I saw a dozen other girls with the stomach belts in a matter of weeks, I knew the memo had gone out, replacing the tassel belt fashion that seemed to be popular a few years ago. Imitation triumphs over individual style.

Second is attitude. In a sort of mind meld, individuals wishing to join the social club must adopt the attitude and beliefs of the leaders, who are the owners and to a lesser extend, the staff of bouncers, promoters, and bartenders, who know more about projecting attitude than intellect. While owners are the local leaders of this club, party celebrities such as Paris Hilton play their role in determining what is cool and what is not. It is not surprising that Paris Hilton is part-owner to successful nightclubs that bear her name.

Being cool means having a serious look on your face, recognizing someone's worth based on their appearance and who they know, and limiting contact with those who are obviously commoners. If you are a single man without friends trying to break into a city's VIP circle, all you need is the willingness to pay for other people's alcohol long enough until they consider you a friend. But of course this friendship is only limited in venues that serve alcohol — sobriety would tear the fragile bonds apart. The reason you go inside a nightclub and no one puts out their hand to meet you like they might at a house party is because you could have terribly low social value that taints the reputation they have spent so many months building.

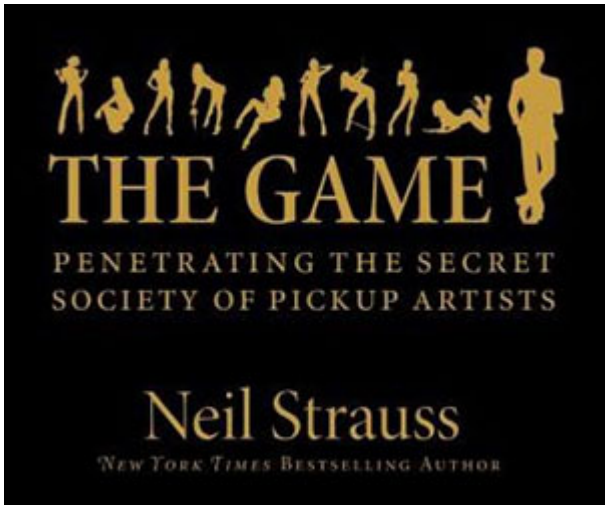
When someone works hard to belong to some group, the value of that group automatically goes up in their mind. This person look downs on non-members and makes sure that others are limited access to preserve his or her membership value. It's not very exclusive if there are too many members. Exaggerated behavior replaces normal behavior, and the harder it is to get into a group the more exaggerated the members will act. Don't work too hard at getting into something that is exclusive. There will be other people who have also bought into that exclusivity, and all the mental rot that goes along with it.



Evolution Of White Trash

January 3, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

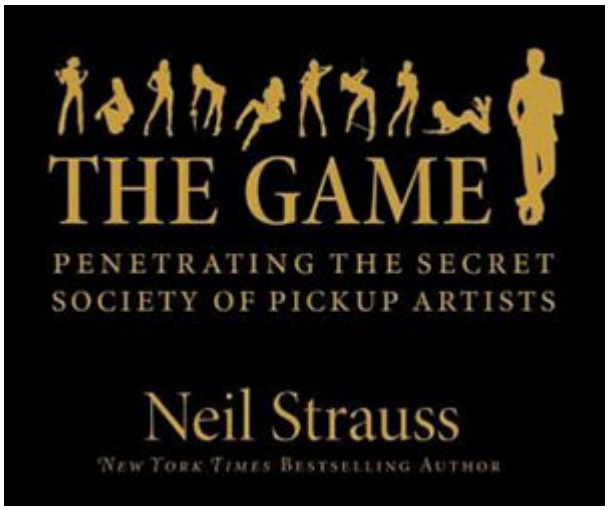
I was sitting in Starbucks when two older white women sat down with three girls. Two of the girls were about 10 years old and the third one was around 18. The 18 year old was complaining about the aloof behavior of a gentleman who owned a pick-up truck. Everyone in the store became very familiar with this young man in a short amount of time.

Later, she started singing Akon's single I Wanna Fuck You (she did use "love" instead of "fuck"). Then the two older women started singing along and encouraged the two young girls — who were probably their daughters — to sing along as well. The little girls sang the chorus.

I see you windin n grindin up on that pole,
I know u see me lookin' at you and you already kno
I wanna love you, you already know

After the little girls were done, the teenager and the two mothers gave them a round of applause.

I can barely tolerate the suburban mom on her cell phone chatting away with a Louis Vuitton diaper bag draped over her shoulder, extolling the benefits of "me-time" while reminding everyone within earshot how little Madison is smarter than her playmates — but I much rather deal with that then have to watch adult women train little girls how to be dirty whores. If my parents pushed me to sing songs about fucking strippers when I was little, I guarantee you I would be feeding mouths instead of blogging, wondering when the fire sensation in my crotch area will go away. Remember: all you need to create life is a functioning genital organ.

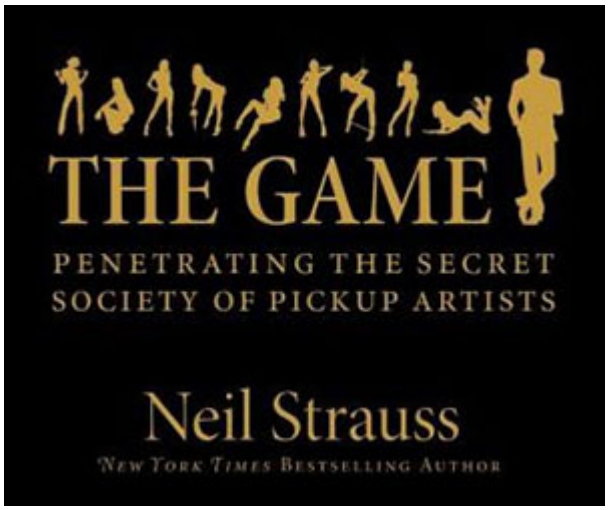


Tired Of Not Getting Attention

January 3, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When a girl wants to leave early from a club or bar, it's because she's not getting attention from guys. Many times I've seen a girl who is "tired" or has to wake up "early" start her exit, finally get approached by some guy, and then ends up staying longer than me. The question is if they believe their own reasoning.

When a guy wants to leave early, it's because there are too many guys.



Cosmo

January 4, 2007 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

I love Cosmopolitan magazine. For about a year I have been buying Cosmo every month and reading through it with my girlfriend. It's great fun: articles about sex, pictures of hot girls, lots of lingerie ads. Hell, it's better than a lot of men's magazines.

On the late, great, FDDC I used to tell shy guys who couldn't bust a move on chicks to check out Cosmo for living proof that women love sex and want plenty of it. Case in point, let's review the cover of this month's edition:

SEX Uncensored: Your 10 Most Private Questions Answered.
(one of the questions in the article is, "What is the right way to get into 69?")

BEDSIDE ASTROLOGER 2007: Find Out What's in Store…in Life, Love, and Lust
(on the 15th my girlfriend's "inner badgirl is unleashed" by the "brazen Moon")

Your SEXIEST Haircut Ever
(for inspiration, the article has pictures of movie stars with the "sexiest hair cuts of all time". Mia Farrow, 1967 anyone?)

Chick Behavior that Baffles the Hell out of Guys
(the list includes why women have 3x as many clothes in their closets as men, but always complain they "have nothing to wear")

Carmen Electra: Bouncing Back From Heartache
(I didn't care enough to read that one)

HOT NEW SEX TRICK: This Mind Blowing, Box-Spring Breaking Technique Will Intensify Everything He Feels (tells girls to slow down and tease a lot before letting their man finish)

How to Decode Your Body's Signs That Something's Wrong
(this is the token health tip. I couldn't be bothered to read it).

PLUS: Make Your Legs Look a Mile Long
(includes fashion tips like "avoid in-between lengths" for jeans and skirts)

What is interesting about Cosmo is the reaction it provokes from women when you mention it to them. Most women SWEAR they don't read it, but somehow they always seem to know what a recent article said. I knew one women in grad school who swore she hated Cosmo, but when I visited her room discovered several copies of it laying on her dresser. My wonderful girlfriend isn't immune to the strange love-hate relationship women have with Cosmo. When we are in a store together and I suggest buying the latest edition, she will always say, "Oh no, I don't want to buy something trashy like that." But when I buy it myself and bring it home as a present, she will say "Oooh, cool!" and we will soon sit down to our monthly ritual of reading it together. It's like Cosmo is a guilty, socially inappropriate pleasure, to be indulged in secret but condemned in public.

As far as I am concerned Cosmo serves the highly useful purpose of teaching girls how to look better and be kinkier in bed. As such, I hope women learn to publicly embrace their now clandestine love of Cosmo. Wanting to look hotter and please better can only make the world a better place.

La Tomatina Video

January 6, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here are two short video clips that should have gone in my La Tomatina post a couple months ago.

The first is a clip of the mayhem surrounding the grease-covered ham pole that brave men tried to climb. I used my hand to shield the camera from the rainstorm of grease. While the Asian guy is wiping grease up top, the girl down below got her shorts pulled off. Her pale, white ass was seen by thousands. It was alright.

And this short clip was shot immediately after the ham pole was brought down.

How To Get Your Finances In Order

January 7, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Humans have not evolved to handle modern currency for two reasons:

1. The paper that currency is based on has zero inherent value. When you are gambling at a casino you tend to make bets you would not have made with paper money because you don't have a strong attachment to decorative pieces of clay. But as we get older, the attachment we have to paper money lessens and we get desensitized to its value. Spending money becomes easier. Price tags would have more meaning if it listed how many hours of labor it would take you to buy it. That iPod now costs 13 hours of labor the HDTV is 2 weeks of labor. That $7 slice of cheesecake took you 15 minutes of labor. You may buy these things anyway but its real value is clear because you know exactly how much of your time and energy it takes to obtain it.

2. There are too many streams of income and expenditures to keep track off. We are not designed to make daily purchases, pay bills, deal with emergencies, spoil ourselves, and then be able to have a balanced budget each month. If you were to ask people how much they spend on food, a necessity, each month, they can only give you an estimate which I guarantee is a lot less than they actually spend. Humans need extra help to keep track of multiple streams of data.

I'm sure you know someone whose life is consumed by huge credit card debt. It's even possible that they are much bigger debt than you even though your living situations aren't that different. Why are some people just bad with money and others are not? The answer lies in a person's belief system. Some people believe in things that make going into serious debt an inevitability.

"I know I'm spending more than I make now, but I will be making more money soon." This is counting your chickens before they hatch. Unfortunately, there is absolutely no guarantee that you will be making more money in a year or two. There is no way to predict if you will even have a job. In case you do make more money a year from now, this belief ensures you keep increasing your spending anyway, preventing you from having the extra cash you planned on using to pay off debt obligations. Spending money you don't yet have is an assumption that keeps you in perpetual debt.

"I know I'm in credit card debt, but these are things I need and they are making me happy." There is not a documented case of human fulfillment coming from items manufactured in China. Fact is, other than a quick rush when purchasing something new, your mind quickly gets accustomed to the new possession and your happiness level remains constant. And now you have this consumer good that you need to maintain until you throw it in storage. The ability to increase the amount of happiness you can generate only comes with committed changes on how you view the world and yourself.

I know many girls who own very expensive handbags, and when I ask them why they bought these bags they usually make a reference to the quality and not the image the brand represents. But those expensive handbags are not handmade and come off the same factory lines as those that cost significantly less. And then I have the friends who insists on buying luxury automobiles because living without soothing German engineering would be uncomfortable. Now I don't know if they are telling me the truth and they are really buying these things for the status, but I do know that the idea of turning these needs into wants is a basic marketing principle that drives the sale of these products. If you can afford these items without going into debt then great, but otherwise you should resort to the free alternative of fantasizing about the objects instead.

"I want other people to know that I am very successful." This stems from insecurity. You are concerned that you are less worthy as a person because someone else is displaying material possessions — probably bought on credit — that is worth much more than yours. So you catch up so this person by going into debt. Problem with this strategy is not that there is no end — there will always be someone who has more than you. So your life is a pattern of trying to keep up, going into more debt, but never really getting there. You sit at home, with all your stuff, still upset and wondering if you can pay more than the minimum payment on your credit card statements. Most advertising put out by marketing agencies aim to make you feel insecure and inadequate, and this is financial death for those that are already insecure. Unless you are on top of the latest rotating style, it's assumed, you are a loser and the girl with the latest pair of boots will show her disgust with dirty looks.

I once read a question on some Dear Abby column by someone who asked how she can get her girlfriends to stop picking expensive restaurants for girls night out without having to tell them she is broke. But your friends should have no problem knowing you can't afford something and if they do maybe it's time to get friends who don't judge you or make as much as you do. (I'm not saying to go hang out in the ghetto but having friends that are poor will save you an incredible amount of money.) By not caring what other people think, you immediately start living a more simple life that allows you to focus on things that make you happy instead of things that other people approve of. There is nothing wrong with not having enough money.

Having correct beliefs makes it very easy stay on top of your finances because you do the right things without having to consciously think about it, in a way that fits your own unique situation. I don't read finance sites or lists of 1,000 ways to save money, but I'm able to put save a large percentage of my income each month because I have internalized the right beliefs.

One of my most important beliefs is knowing that demand increases to fill supply. If a friend buys you a chocolate chip cookie, you are going to eat it even though you may have not been craving for a chocolate chip cookie. If your coworker brings a cake to the office, that cake will be gone even though no one was really hungry. If you just get a bonus at work, you will spend it on things you wouldn't have bought otherwise. If you buy an extra large bottle of cologne, you will use it more often than if you bought a small bottle. If you have $100 in your pocket, two days later you will wonder where it went. If you happen upon a stash of hot porn, you will masturbate more than usual, maybe into the early dawn hours if you got a lot of sleep the night before. If your mind knows that something is there, it will find a reason to use or consume it. When people complain to me about their inability to lose weight, I simply tell them not to buy food. You can't eat what you don't buy, and a midnight snack craving loses its punch when you know you have to get in the car to find some Doritos instead of reaching your meaty paws in the cupboard.

Places like Costco and Sam's Club exist because people think they are saving money when they buy things in bulk. They see the cost-per-unit price and then toss the extra large jar of mayonnaise into the cart. Without even thinking about it, they will now consume more mayonnaise because their mind knows there is a lot of it. If you look around your house right now, you have a lot of consumables that are just sitting there, inching towards their expiration dates. What this really represents is cash not earning interest. That cash is in the hands of the companies instead. There is little reason to buy more than one week's worth of food or goods unless there is a natural disaster coming. I only buy what I need, don't tie up my cash in things that just sit there, and don't let anything go to waste. This ends up saving me much more money in the long run.

We are tricked into believing that buying the largest size possible makes economic sense. Flyers will advertise how much you are saving by purchasing the warehouse sized packaging of hypoallergenic ass wipes. But are they selling thousands of ass wipes because they are trying to help you save money, or because it benefits them? Companies don't want you to save money — they want you to spend and contribute to their profits. Sizes are getting larger because it benefits corporations. If they didn't make more money on quantity, the larger sizes would not exist. At the grocery store there is now a gigantic jar of spaghetti sauce that is so big it has a built-in ergodynamic handle. You will buy these and consume more or throw away a large amount, and then go back and buy more again because you think you're saving money.

How about if I buy in bulk something that I use a set amount of every week? For me this applies to my Tuna Helper habit. I consume two boxes a week, no more or less, so you think I'd load up on this "food" during 2-for-1 specials. I don't. The point of a sale should be for you to spend less. But what happens is you load up on the sale item so your weekly spending never goes down. In the short-run it may cost me a couple bucks, but in the long-run I save because I strengthen the belief to only buying what I need, cutting spending in almost everything else. Don't turn your house into a warehouse.

The opposite of this principle also holds true: if you constrict supply, demand will lower. If at the beginning of the month you commit to saving a large amount of money and enter it into the budget, and you can see how little you have left to spend on everything else, you have no choice but to constrain your spending for that month. But if you wait until the end of month to save what is left over, you will find there is nothing left over to save.

A tool that reinforces all these correct beliefs is having a monthly budget where you monitor every dollar you spend. I believe that if people simply knew where their money was going, they would be a lot more careful with it. It's just too hard to understand how much you are spending with credit cards and check cards until you have to manually enter your spending into a spreadsheet and see your monthly balance go down. This act tells your brain that this money you earned no longer exists.

I recently gave my budget spreadsheet to a friend. Like me he set up a line for going out, and estimated that he spends maybe $400 a month in bars and restaurant. Three weeks into December, he was already at $500. Then when he went out to the club, he spent half of the amount that he normally spends because that $500 expenditure was something he couldn't ignore. He saved $30 that night only because he knows how much he spends when he goes out. Every dollar counts. In the long run it adds up to amounts you would leap at if you saw laying on the street.

When you use a budget, your finances become an obsession because they are in your face almost every day. Every transaction, from ATM withdrawals to buying a coffee at 7-11 with your check card, gets logged.

Budget.xls spreadsheet (Right click > Save as)

How To Maintain The Budget Spreadsheet

Step 1: Put in your paycheck income and other guaranteed income. If you are a freelancer, you may want to add lines to account from different sources of spending and income. Or you can create a new worksheet in the same spreadsheet and link those values to the main budget.

Step 2: Enter all known bill payment expenses (rent, gym fees, car payment, etc.). For other expenditures like going out and food, make an estimate. You will be changing that number as the months go on.

Step 3: Play with you expenditure numbers until you balance goes to zero. If this seems impossible to you, then you are not living within your means, and having a budget will probably help you most. Hint: cut back on leisure spending.

Step 4: Take note of how much money will always be in your checking account (your cushion). On the first of every month when all bills are paid, that is the value you should have in your account. My cushion is a low $200 because I don't like tying up too much cash. But when my first paycheck doesn't come until the second week of the month, I temporary bring in money from my savings account to cover those early expenses. The more you monitor your account activity online, the less you can leave your cushion since you are always aware of your balance and catch surprises before they overdraft your account.

Step 5: Keep track of every dollar that moves in and out of your main account (usually your checking account). If you mostly use your check card for transactions, save all receipts and pile them on one side of your desk. After you enter them every few days, move them to the other side. I don't recommend forgoing receipts and using online banking to log spending because you will forget whether you entered items or not. Make sure you don't miss transactions that have no receipt, like buying something from the internet or getting a lap dance at the strip club. If you mostly take out ATM withdrawals, I recommend categorizing what you can and then putting the rest in Leisure > Stuff. For instance say you take out $100 one day then spend $40 on groceries and $50 on going out. When you go home, put -$40 for groceries, -$50 for going out, and -$10 for Stuff. Or just put the whole $100 into Stuff and not worry about categorizing. Using mostly cash makes it a pain to itemize your spending unless you always get receipts.

Important: You are only keeping track of money that moves into and out of your main account. If you charge something on your credit card, it does not get reflected in the budget until you pay that bill. For instance if you charge something in late January but don't pay the bill until February, you enter the expense in February. If you purchase an electronic gadget with a rebate, you have to enter the full cost of the item in your budget and enter the rebate separately when it comes months later.

I like to itemize my credit card bills by putting the individual items into their own category. For instance if I get a $20 credit card bill with $10 from internet hosting and $10 from Netflix, I enter two separate $10 charges in my budget and send out a $20 check. My budget does not record the fact that I just sent out a check to a credit card company. If you have a credit card balance you are paying and it is from old spending, I would just use a separate Credit Card line.

Savings is negative in the budget because it is coming out of your main account. Bringing savings money into your main account will be reflected as a positive amount. If at the end of the month you are running a deficit, you need to draw money in from somewhere. If you are running a surplus, put it into a savings account. Since you are not the federal government, you need to maintain a balanced budget every month. If you run a deficit from high spending, and you don't have savings money to make up for it, you need an immediate reality check. Your way of living is unsustainable and will catch up to you sooner than later. It will just take one accident or layoff to send you into deep financial crisis. Plus the recent change in bankruptcy laws make it harder to wipe away unsecured debt.

The nice thing about the monthly budget if you receive a paycheck is the two months a year when you get three paychecks. Since you will not account for this third paycheck when setting up your budget, these checks are like the bonuses you wish your company would give out. Put it directly into your savings account or credit card debt, or do something fun for yourself. These two extra paychecks have gone to my travel fund for the past two years.

I first started using the budget spreadsheet after I spent $320 at French Connection in winter 2002. I felt incredibly guilty because I didn't have that money to spare. After sacrificing on clothing and Starbucks, I started making $200 monthly payments to my debt. Then I squeezed myself even more each month until I was able to make consistent payments in the $400 range. Fourteen months later I made my final payment and was debt free. My income since then has doubled but my costs of living have actually decreased, so all that extra money is gravy. I consider credit card debt to be a form of mental slavery, and even though I have much less possessions than my peers (I don’t even own a bed), I depend on myself to generate my happiness instead of products made by companies that view me as nothing more than a FICO score. I still have the French Connection clothing that sent me over the edge, including the $120 pair of corduroy pants that I have worn about six times.

Monthly Newsletter

January 8, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you look over at the top right, you'll see a form for my new monthly newsletter. I plan on sending the first one in the next week. It will be about getting numbers.

Player Or Poseur?

January 9, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you missed it, the last edition of Player or Poseur was the best yet. Reader Mad1 knew the people in the photo so within only a couple of hours there were half a dozen members of the DC clubbing elite taking a break from whatever they do when they are not clubbing to come here and comment. I would say the drama jumped the shark when someone came in with legal threats (gleaned from a Google search, no doubt).

Poseur to the nth degree. It seems like the photographer did him a favor because the girls don't even want him in the picture. Big beta move with the chin rest on the girl's shoulder. All he's missing is a pair of sunglasses.

Here is a bonus picture of Tara Reid with her entourage:

CLUBCHAIR.COM © 2006
CLUBCHAIR.COM

The Female Date Blog… What's Hot In '07

January 10, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Written by Virgle Kent.

Hey are you a single lonely woman in Washington DC and between the ages of 29 and 70? Are you successful in your career but have a pathetic dating resume of seeming to attract twatwaffles and all-around jerks? Are your dating exploits so funny and whimsical that they always entertain your friends? Have you seen every episode of Sex and the City and relate to at least one of the characters if not all of them? Do you own a pet that was probably the last living thing to see you naked and or orgasm? Did you ever own a diary as a prepubescent little girl? Then wipe the peanut butter of your left nipple and labials and stop feeding your pets because I have just the thing for you! You should totally start a DC Dating Blog! NO seriously a new DC dating blog is what's going to be fetch in 07!

But how do you go about starting and writing a typical cliche DC date blog or TCDCDB? Easy! Catch up on every episode of Sex in the City because this will be your cliche Bible. Now set up a blogger account. Ok now the real fun starts. First link to all the "cool" DC blogs, Wonkette, DCB, Kathrynon, DC Cookie, KassyK, RCR, and anyone else that has more than 20 readers. Second go through a flashback faze to catch all your new readers up and let them know a little about you. Introduce important characters and people in your life. In the flashback phase also talk about horrible dates you've been on and bad relationships you've been in. This of course is what will make you a TCDCDB expert on men, because you've dated so many bad ones that you can give advice on the good ones. But you should also have a Mr. X to reference — a long term relationship or two with a guy from the past that you were in love with but it didn't work out, hence the reason you're on your hopeless dating cycle. The third stage is the most important phase: "comment whore." That's right, you heard me, you've got to comment whore like nobodies business. Get yourself out there! I'm talking no less than two comments on a blog and you must hit EVERY blog on the DC blog's blog roll. Who cares what you say. In this stage you DO NOT DARE disagree with any blogger or you'll get stomped out like Michael Richards at an NAACP meeting. Most importantly though comment whore on other TCDCDB sites. Ok now you've got people's attention.

Here's where the real cliches come in. Start going out on dates and blogging about them. Juggle three or four at a time then when none of them works out blog about it. Most of us and Steve Wonder could see it wasn't going to work out from the start but you had to go through it so you can get to your Carrie Bradshaw routine post. It's the part where you show us you're just a typical girl trying to find love in the big city of DC and how hard it is for you. The part where at the end of your post you ask redundant questions that none of us have ever heard before on date blogs. "What's wrong with men, when does hanging out as friends become a date, why aren't more guys chivalrous, what signs should you look for if he's really into you". Basically any dating question you can find in the advice column of Seventeen Magazine. But you've got to also be able to connect with your audience and pull them in. When you don't hear back from a guy or you feel sorry for yourself and need advice on anything, ask your readers because they'll know for sure. You gave a guy a blowjob on the second date and he didn't call you back? Well you'd be surprised how many of your readers and fellow TCDCDBers have given blowjobs on the second date and not gotten a call back. You're almost in the club just a little longer.

Pretty soon from all your comment whoring TCDCDBers will pay attention to you and start to sense you're one of their own, and one of them will invite you out to a Blog Happy Hour. Of course you've been blogging "anonymously" so no one knows what you look like. The TCDCDB group will be happy once they realize you look like a cross between Roseanne Bar, Andy Dick, and Smeagol. How is that any guy would not want to date you my precious? You're not in yet but you've moved up to the next level known as the depression sewing circle sisterhood (DSCS).

The way DSCS works is one TCDCBer writes some self-deprecating post because she just got played by some guy so other members and regular people who comment throw her a pity party. Since it is a cliche blog they all give cliche advice like, "cheer up girl he wasn't good enough for you, the sun will come out tomorrow, you'll find love when you least expect it. No man is worth you tears and the one that is wont make you cry. Ok, I think I got that last one of a fortune cookie and by the way your lucky numbers are 2, 18, 7, 45, 11, 69. So after all these comments of vast wisdom TWO DAYS LATER another girl in the DSCS will write a similar post (changing up the guy of course) with the same results and it'll be her turn to have a pity party and leave the EXACT same comments on her blog that we just left on the first TCDCDBers blog two days ago. Once this "Folie a` deux" has spread through the whole circle next month we'll move onto a different dating problem and repeat the whole cycle again.

Soon people will lose interest and expect you to go deeper as a writer. Fuck them this is your blog! You're writing for you (not a cliche) so in response to this you fall back on the old TCDCB crutch, the "Too Much Information Post" (TMI). This is the post where you start talking about how much you love sex. You'll post about your addiction to sex toys and every time you "slut out" it will be posted about with really no point to the story except to point out the fact you had sex. Hold up, you have a pulse and a libido, great welcome to the human race! You're kind of like Samantha from Sex in The City except half her age but twice as fat. It wouldn't be that bad if something funny happen. Like the other week when Pretty Ricky was hooking up with this chick and her cat came up and clawed his balls, so he kicked the cat off the bed but the girl freaked out on him and accused him of "attacking" her cat so she kicked him out of her house. It was the first time ever he left a girl with not only blue but also red balls. See how easy that was?

Once your audience gets tired of your sex story you'll move on to some other awkward story that no one really wanted to know about. Like that one time you got raped by nine Mexicans behind 7/11 and contracted EHV-1 (Equine Herpes). Or how during your senior year in high school you had to have five abortions. Basically something you should only share with your psychiatrist, priest, or family. Congratulations you've sold your soul to have a popular TCDCDB blog! You've made it now kiss the ring and take the third seat on the right?

Sometimes I feel like TCDCDBers are capable of being in normal lasting relationships but choose not to be. I mean if they put in half as much energy into the actual relationships as they did into blogging about the relationship they might have better luck. But then what would happen if they actually got into a happy relationship is no one would have a reason to read their blog. I mean their whole blog identity has been built on the pursuit of failed relationships and once one works what will they have to write about? NO ONE wants to read a relationship blog where someone posts about how happy they are 24/7.

Ever since Kathrynon and CircleV went down it's as if the female DC blog scene is experiencing a dark age in creativity, spontaneity, and pure humor. I swear if it wasn't for the intellectual stimulation mixed with incredible cynicism of Brunch Bird or the layered poetic movements of Speak Easy a.k.a. The Blog Prodigy, I would have blown my brains out all over my year end financial reports from boredom. I know there are PLENTY of talented female bloggers out there but I swear to god if I read one more post about the DC ban on smoking or how fucking awesome 2007 is going to be I will lose my shit.

Before you hit Post stop and ask yourself the following questions.

1. Have I seen this talked about on Sex in the City?
2. Did something like this happen to another female blogger on her date blog?
3. I'm I blogging about this because I'm upset or angry at the moment?
4. In the grand scheme of things will anyone care?
5. If I died alone in my apartment how long would it take for someone to find my body?
6. Would I want to read this and would I find it the least entertaining?
7. If I were going to blog about sex, would anyone REALLY want to see or think about me naked?

You can read VK's other guest appearances here and here. I have a feeling he will return soon, but that's just my gut talking. I do not have any real information that would warrant such a statement.

Guns

January 11, 2007 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

I recently signed up for my first NRA gun training class. I will soon be taking the NRA Basic Steps Pistol class. People who have known me for a while would probably be surprised by that. I didn't grow up around guns and I have not touched a gun in years.

My only experience with guns was back in college. I took a rifle class for P.E. credit. I used to lift weights on my own and I didn't want to waste P.E. credits on some athletics class, so I figured I would try something different. The rifles in that class were long barrel .22's meant for target competition. Somehow those rifles didn't feel like real guns because a .22 is such a small bullet that when fired from a long gun like that, there was no noise at all. It was just a light pull of the trigger and then "click". I never thought a gun would go "click". Guns were supposed to go "BOOM!".

Now that I am in a serious relationship and getting past my college years, it's looking like I could be a husband and father within 5 years. That realization has caused some powerful "Defend My Family" DNA programing to kick in. I am obsessed with the need to defend my future family from harm. If a bad guy broke into my home and hurt my future wife or children, I would feel like a complete failure as a man.

I know what every anti-gun person is thinking right now. "But guns are dangerous!"…"You could have an accident and shoot yourself!"…"The criminal could steal the gun and use it against you!" Whatever. I could get into a car accident too, but we don't think of cars as dangerous nor ever suggest a family shouldn't own one because 40,000 people a year die in car accidents.

The gun control advocates crack me up. Oh sure, let's ban guns in a nation full of guns. That logic worked pretty well during Prohibition and the War On Drugs, didn't it? Ban guns and all those guns just disappear like all that marijuana did. And, of course, a gun ban makes all those criminals suddenly stop breaking the law and agree to commit crimes with without them. Great thinking, man.

I suspect this post will piss everyone off because so many people think guns are pure evil. To some, saying one is pro-gun is like saying one is pro-child abuse. I don't care. I do not intend to throw myself at the mercy of a criminal who invades my home and intends to hurt my family. If I take on the responsibility starting a family, I also accept the responsibility of protecting my family through every legal means at my disposal.

Comments FAQ

January 13, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I posted a comment but it didn't show up. The page just reloaded.

The blog software thinks your comment is spam. Either you posted from an open proxy, used a common spam word, or added several links in your comment. Every evening I go through and approve any comments that got tagged as spam when they shouldn't have, so if you post in the morning it may take some time for it to finally show up. Email me if it's a regular problem.

My comment got sent to the moderation queue. What's the deal?

You probably used a word the software didn't like, or you are posting from a proxy. When I approve your comment, I'll change the time so your comment doesn't get lost in the middle of the thread.

What's up with the dunce cap image?

I add this to comments that come from people who have a history of acting like a dick. You have to really try hard to earn the dunce cap. I find this solution amuses me more than an outright ban.

Cost Per Notch

January 14, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In late 2005 I wondered how much each notch was costing me. Is my game saving me money over escort services? I decided to add a new line on my monthly budget called “Dating” and keep track of money I spent on dates. I added a separate line called “Nightlife” to account for drinking when I wasn’t in the company of a specific girl. This may hide the true cost of a notch since money spent meeting girls at venues such as bars add up, but my intent when I go out isn’t always to get laid (surprisingly).

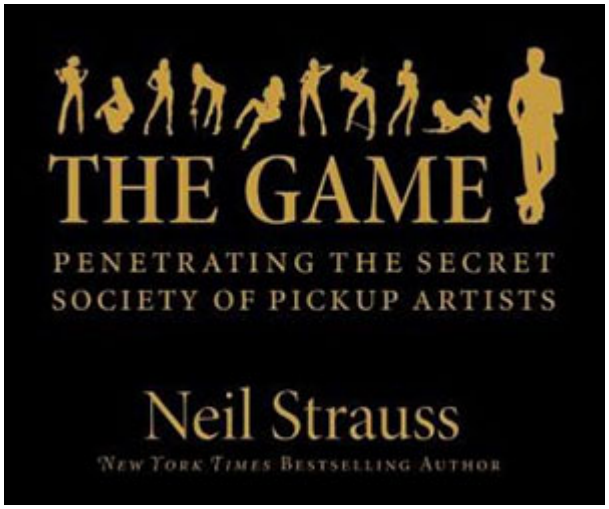
My goal was to keep the CPN under $200. More than that and I’m heading into the hourly charge of escorts.

Because I had constant feedback on how much sex was costing me, I was able to always adjust in order to lower expenses. Midway through the year, to lower my CPN, I started doing more coffee dates and dinner dates where I would cook a meal from my Betty Crocker cookbook. Taking dates up to Baltimore also saved money. After all the sex was done and all expenses tabulated, my CPN for 2006 ended up to be $187. This number also accounts for those girls I went out on a date with but not did not eventually have sex with.

I have no idea if this number is too high or not because there are no benchmarks to compare it too, but the fact that I’m cheap as hell and try to get the bang as quickly as possible means it’s probably on the very low end for most guys my age in this area, especially when a significant percentage of guys seem to enjoy subsidizing a woman’s fine dining habit. I did not do a restaurant dinner date in 2006.

I strongly believe that sex with quality women can be had without spending money, so I am aiming for a 2007 CPN of $50. There is no reason that I should pay more for sex with a twenty-something woman past her physical prime when young guys in college are fucking tight-bodied coeds for practically nothing.

Why don't you get my number?
After doing some cost-benefit analysis...
$187



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Promoters Are Scum

January 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Several years ago a friend and I decided to start throwing parties so we could get laid more. We didn't have an original idea or even the willingness to make it succeed, but we had strong sexual desire. There had to be an easier way than approaching a lot of girls.

Our first party was at Topaz Bar around Christmas time. To draw in the females we decided to make it a Toys For Tots charity event, even though the last thing poor kids need is cheap toys made in China. The party itself was a success: about forty or so people showed up, which for the size of Topaz made it a lively event. A total of three people brought toys (including me and the co-host) so I guess that part of the party was a failure. A girl I met a couple nights prior came to the party so the promotion endeavor seemed to be working already.

Early in the evening we had two Marines show up in full uniform including the beret-like hat. Apparently there was a misunderstanding and I accidentally requested the presence of soldiers at the party. They had a couple drinks and impressed us with their awesome posture before they carted off our pathetic collection of charity. The bigger surprise guest of the evening was a 65 year-old man who arrived with a copy of the Washington Post. He requested my presence and talked to no one else, explaining how he's trying to get his social life back in order. I'm not sure if this was code for homosexual sex or not but I blacklisted him from future events just in case.

During all the parties I had to be the good host and make sure everyone was happy while the girls I liked were hit on by a stream of my own male guests. I was cockblocking myself. If I look at how many girls I got from nights I hosted and how many girls I probably would have gotten on those same nights without being a host, the difference would have been zero. Looking back on the whole experience, my time would have been better spent working on my game instead of working on a gimmick. But some good did come from the experiment: two people I introduced at that first party are going to get married soon. Their lives are forever changed, all because I wanted to get laid.

DJ Equipment For Sale

January 16, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In case anyone is trying to be a DJ, I'm selling my CD decks and mixer on eBay:

-Pioneer CDJ-100s (2)
-Behringer DJX400 Mixer

100% positive feedback — bid with confidence!

Idiocracy

January 16, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

You may have never heard of the movie Idiocracy because Fox has done all it can to not promote it when it was released last year.

The movie is about an average man and prostitute who hibernate for 500 years in a military pod experiment. When they wake up, the president-elect is a former porn star and the most popular television program is called Ouch My Balls, about a guy who keeps getting hit in the balls. The hibernators have become the two smartest humans on the planet now that the average IQ has dipped to around 50 points. Intelligent yuppies failed to procreate.

I suppose Fox didn't want to publicize this movie because they would be making fun of the less-than-intellectual audience they entertain with such fine programming as Fox News and American Idol, but you can get the movie on DVD or download it using BitTorrent. It's very funny, created by the same guy who made Office Space. Don't read too many reviews because they give away a lot of the good jokes.

I like to argue that the dumbening of human beings has long ago begun. For ample evidence, go into any Walmart or highway rest stop.

Virgle Kent’s New Blog

January 16, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

VK’s Empire Of Dirt. And with that comes the first blog war of 2007.

Threeway

January 17, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There is a threeway winding down between Virgle Kent, Ashburnite, and Velvet. I don't have issues with the girls involved but I just wanted to put things in perspective.

A lot of people commenting are readers who have never been to the happy hours to see how these three interact in person. Just be reading body language — who stares at whom and who initiates conversation — it becomes obvious who is telling a story that best reflects the truth. When VK is talking to me about a girl who is on him hard, and that girl is currently staring at him, it doesn't take a dating consultant to know what's going on. It seems like the spinster jockeys who are commenting in these threads will believe anything they read as long as it's written by a woman.

Smokers Deserve Our Sympathy

January 17, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This past weekend I got to experience DC's new no smoking ban. It was incredible. My lungs, hair, and clothes are so thankful that I have decided to send little gifts of appreciation to all members of the DC Council. I no longer have to air out my expensive club outfits after a night out.

The weather on Saturday night was rainy, so smokers were tightly packed under dry spots and conversed among themselves like they would in high school and college, rejects of society. While I usually look down on smokers, this is the first time I felt bad for them. Some may argue that drinking is not that different from smoking, but I have never stood out in the rain on a wet street to kill my screwdriver beverage. Smokers, addicted to a drug where hits are needed in fixed increments, don't really have a choice, and must brave adverse environments to maintain normal physiological function. It must suck to depend on a smelly drug made by huge corporations just to live a normal life.

Me, inside the club breathing clean air:

Smoker, outside in the rain:

You

January 18, 2007 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

This post is about you, the Roosh blog reader. After a couple of months at this, I have noticed some things that amuse me greatly. So I got the idea to turn the tables and comment on you and your writing. Below is a list my observations about you. I look forward to reading your comments about yourselves.

1. You think it's all about you. You demand New Yorker quality writing 5 days a week for 52 weeks of the year. As soon as one post appears that seems to fall short of a Hemingway, you launch into hate. If Roosh is the writer, you tell him he is slipping. If I am the writer, you say I am ruining Roosh's blog. It's like you think Roosh and I work for you. My boss is easier going on me than you guys are, and he pays me.

2. You only comment when provoked. If Roosh makes an observation about women that seems less than flattering, all kinds of thoughtful comments and interesting discussion takes place. If there is a mellow post that doesn't ruffle feathers, then there isn't much response. If I write something that seems pro-relationship (God forbid), women don't comment and men say I am a boring married guy who is ruining Roosh's blog.

3. You get pissed off for being provoked. This is my favorite. You don't participate unless provoked, but then some of you send hate for provoking you. Make up your minds! Since it's obvious you guys enjoy being angry and indignant, shouldn't you thank us for giving you a reason to get pissed off?

4. You love arguing with each other. In fact, some of you seem to get far more joy debating, attacking, and scolding each other than you get from actually commenting on the post itself. I have a feeling I could write a two line post that if controversial enough, could generate 50 comments from all the attacks and counter attacks you would launch against each other.

Roosh has already posted about how this blog came to be. The bottom line is: he does it for own interest and amusement. I do it once per week to help Roosh get a day off and because I thought it would be fun. Being opinionated guys, we like sharing our views. Some of our posts are serious, some are no-so-serious, and some are just silly. But in the end, it is always about posting whatever is on our minds in a way that interests and amuses us.

Washington DC Salsa Dancing

January 19, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I need to learn how to salsa as quickly as possible, somewhere in DC or Maryland. Money is no object. Any recommendations?

Me = Server Hog

January 20, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

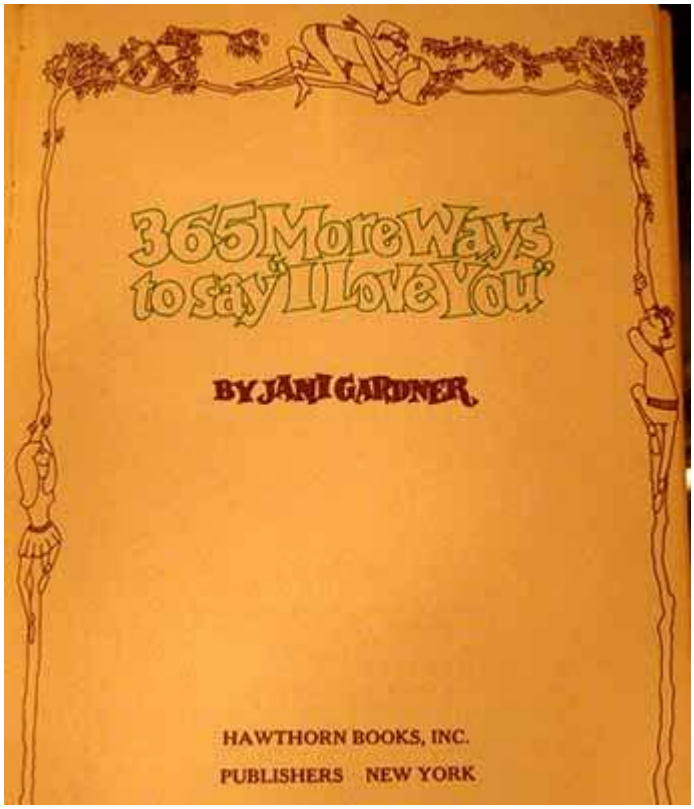
On each individual post there are now previous and next post links at the top so you don't have to click back to the main page to browse through new comments.

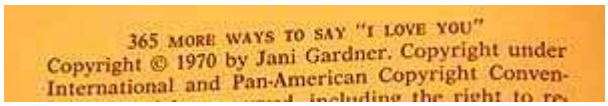
I'm starting to outgrow my shared web hosting plan so it's just a matter of time until you come here and get a "This site has been suspended" message. In the meantime I make regular backups so your precious comments are not lost. I'm looking into other hosting options ($$$).

365 Ways To Say I Love You

January 22, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A colleague of mine handed me a book written in 1970 called 365 More Ways To Say I Love You, a sequel to what I'm guessing was a successful book. It's intended for women to better please their husbands.





Because this book is no longer in print, allow me to share some of its advice.

> Be available. If you're cooking dinner, reading a mystery, balancing a checkbook — forget it. Burned roasts, unsolved murders, and bounced checks are as nothing when it comes to keeping your man happy.

This is what I'm talking about. While I don't look to women for happiness, I'm more likely to spend time with one who understands that my needs are just as important as hers.

> Get some of that sexy new breast make-up and experiment. Beauty doesn't stop at the neck, remember.

I'm not sure about this one. I think I'd be freaked out if I got a mouthful of rouge instead of teet.

> When you're all alone with him, don't be shy or (heaven forbid!) inhibited. Be free to say and do anything you think might give him pleasure.

Unfortunately women have trouble understanding that if a man is pleased in bed, he will go out of his way to give that pleasure back. There should be no reason for girls to ask for pleasure before giving it first.

> Try doing without the assistance of a bra — at least at home. Very sexy, this.

As long as your breasts don't sandbag to your waists, I see nothing wrong with this piece of advice.

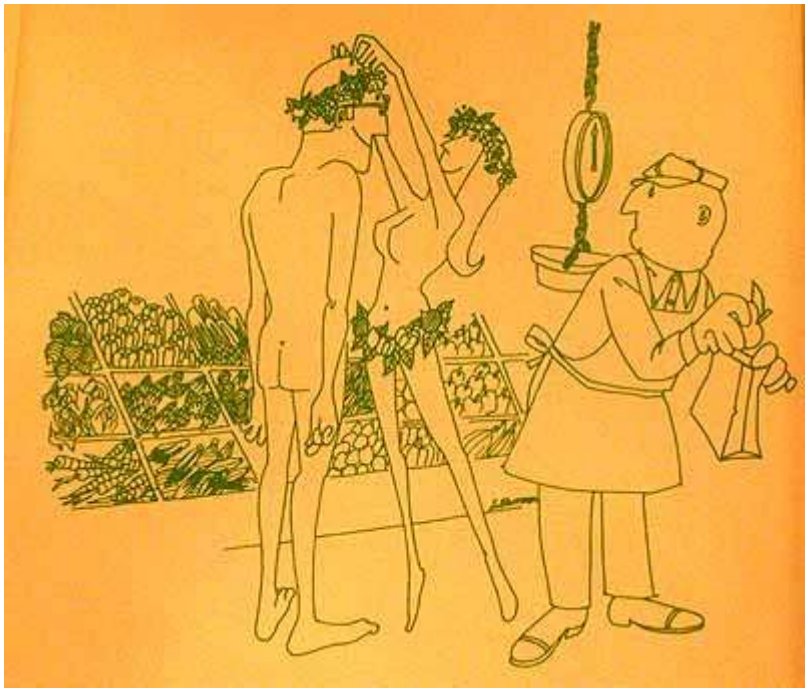
> Make home movies for your strictly private viewing.

It's amazing that something written in 1970 could so accurately describe what most men still want today. Too bad modern girls have so many trust issues that it takes either months of commitment or borderline alcohol poisoning to get sex with her on tape.

Ways To Say 'I Love You' That I 100% Agree With

> Take belly-dance classes or learn to strip like Gypsy or brush up on your tap dancing. Do whatever turns him on. There are kinds and kinds of adult ed.
>
> Hide in the closet naked when you know he's going to hang up his tie.
>
> On Bastille Day, devote yourself to thinking up new ways to storm his defenses.
>
> Use his swim trunks for the flag on a sand castle you two build on the beach. Better make it a very private beach!
>
> Forget how to say "What did you say?" Always try to listen hard the first time he says something. That business about him feeling ten-feet tall has to do with your making him think his every word is a gem.
>
> Renew his subscription to Playboy.
>
> Bring him some banana bread at midnight. (It's in your cookbook under 'B.')

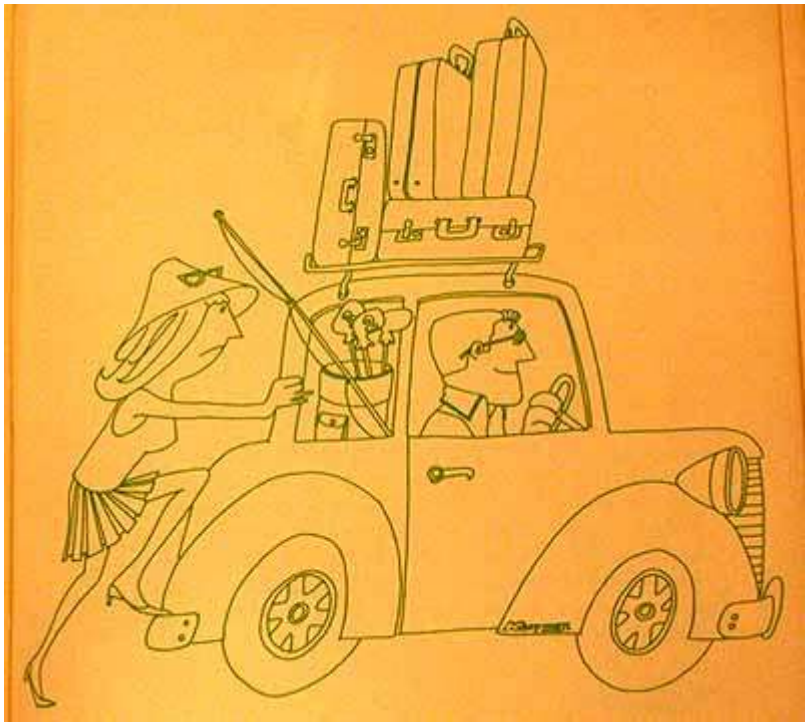
I love banana bread!



Ways To Say 'I Love You' That I Don't Really Care For

> Sneak out at midnight and get him three king-sized cheeseburgers at McDonald’s to celebrate the Feast of the Three Kings.
>
> Call Pan Am and reserve seats for the easiest convenient moon flight. Might be a fun way to celebrate your fiftieth anniversary.
>
> Suggest he grow a beard or moustache in honor of the bearded President Lincoln’s birthday.
>
> Invite him to take you to a hamburger stand. They’re not crowded in February, and besides, they’re cheap and fun. Men love to take us out, but they hate to spend money.
>
> Write to the head of the Institute of Linguistics at the Center for Advanced Study in Behavioral Sciences in Stanford, California, if you want to find out how to say “I love you” in Usarufa, White Tai, Terena, Amuesha, or Mazatec. Show the letter to your man. He’ll think you’re awfully inquisitive. But cute.
>
> Put a note in his shorts saying that the pleasures of a temporary affair are nothing like the pleasures of living with him.
>
> Trace his front teeth with your finger.
>
> Offer to lick the envelope enclosing the income tax.
>
> Tell him you’ll wear your hair in an Afro if he finds it aphro.
>
> Put a special note inside one of his hub caps. The day he finds it, he’ll love you all over the map.
>
> Send him a postcard saying, I’m glad you’re here a couple days before you leave for your vacation. Address it to your chosen vacation spot.
>
> Have his best character traits set in type at the local print shop. With his name at the top and a handsome frame, he’ll love it.
>
> On Armistice Day, patch up the slightest quarrel you might have had with a Western Union I-Didn’t-Mean-It-Gram.

Thirty-seven years later and we’re in a different time where treating men well and catering to their needs is seen as old-fashioned and archaic — but I know that the current system of pumping and dumping (by both sexes) into your 30’s and 40’s to hold out for a perfect mate is one that will lead to the destruction of our species. Unless you want to make pumping and dumping the end and not just a means, like me, you’re probably better off just marrying the first person who accepts you and your many flaws.



Tuck this little note as a bookmark in the book he's currently reading:

You are my poem then, for in my heart
Lovelier than a sonnet, you made rhyme
And I had memorized you unaware.

If he asks, it was written by Sir Thomas Browne. If he doesn't, who needs to tell?

Write up a menu for dinner. In the dessert section, put your name. You might call yourself Flaming So-and-So. He'll get the message.

Paint his name in the multicolored sections of the family beach ball.

Tell him that your Theory of Relativity is that relatives aren't so bad—really—in small doses and, yes, it would be fun to have his over for a cookout.

Comb his hair and scratch the back of his neck while singing his favorite lullaby.

Get a set of Boule balls from Abercrombie & Fitch and learn how.

Cat Lady Early Detection Quiz

January 23, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The NY Times ran a story about how for the first time ever, 51% of women are not living with a spouse. But take a look at the first picture.

A lonely woman with a cat!

Cat ladies typically start with one cat until they add “just one more” enough times to have dozens and dozens of cats who sleep in sinks and defecate in bathtubs filled with gravel and sand. I predict a cat lady epidemic of catastrophic proportions in the next thirty years because of the strange phenomenon whereby American women look for a husband after their physical prime. I love cats, but I fear how they will be treated by spinsters that even human beings don’t want to deal with. There will be government animal units that specialize exclusively with removal of cats and the cat lady overlord still glued to her feces infested rocking chair.

Many of you reading are destined to be cat ladies, but now with my Cat Lady Early Detection Quiz, you can get help before it’s too late.

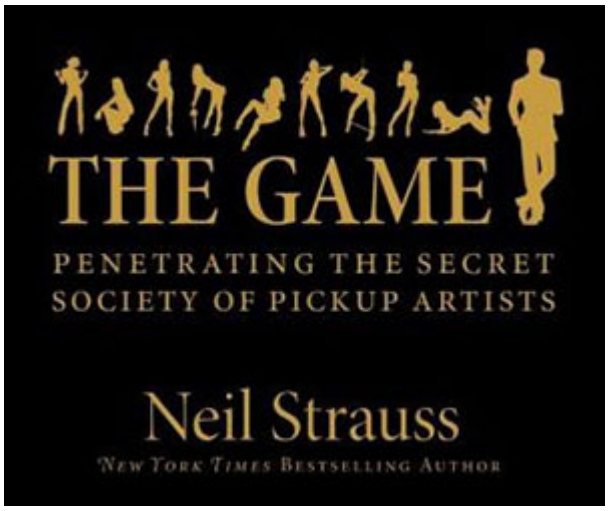
Cat Lady Early Detection Quiz

1. Do you think a cat is a suitable emotional substitution for a man?
2. Have friends or relatives given up asking you when you are going to get married?
3. Are you so scared you will not have kids in time that you have casually looked into adoption web sites?
4. Do you like rubbing your hands through luxuriously soft and furry materials?
5. Do you hug your pillow and cry yourself to bed, wishing a man with a heartbeat was next to you?
6. Have you ever broke off a serious relationship because you wanted to party all the time?
7. To land a man, do you feel like you may need to “trick” him?
8. Do you look forward to marriage so you can finally eat entire pints of Ben & Jerry’s ice cream in one sitting without guilt?

If you answer yes to any of these questions, I have some bad news: you will end up being a cat lady. Mainstream medicine and psychotherapy has not just caught on to the cat lady problem, but I have personally developed a program which will save you in just one session. Simply email me with your photo and I will suggest a local bar near your place where we can begin your treatment. Dress sexy.

- Cat Lady action figure
- Slate: “The typical person who gets caught with more pets than she can handle is a woman over the age of 60 who lives alone.”

Russian ladies



I Bought A New Desk

January 24, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For the past year I have been looking for a desk that serves my unique needs:

1. Multi-purpose functioning that uses innovative technology.
2. Saves valuable space in my child-sized townhouse bedroom.
3. Allows me to masturbate on my bed without squinting at the far-away porn action on my computer monitor.

My needs have been met with the Ergopod 500 Workstation, which I have just purchased.

Simulated photo of me in my new Ergopod

Please pray for me that the cloth strap doesn't break and send my 19-inch CRT monitor crashing on my testicles.

- Via aboutcolonblank.

The Love Equation

January 25, 2007 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

I know everyone thinks of love as an emotion, but I have never been the romantic type. To me, love is very logical. No, I don't mean people behave logically when they are in love. I mean what makes people fall in and out of love is very logical. Allow me to explain.

Although many people aspire to be more unconditionally loving toward their fellow man, let's be honest, there are people we like, people we don't like, people we love, and people we hate. As we meet people throughout our lives, only an extremely small percentage ever win our love. Why is this?

Actually, it's very simple. We each have our individual needs and desires. When we meet people who fulfill our needs and desires, we like them. If they do a damn good job at it, we fall in love with them. This may make love sound very selfish. Well, there is a good reason for that: love is selfish. If we get what we want, big time, we fall in love (as long as we don't mind giving back what they want). If we don't get what we want, or don't want to give what they want in return, love doesn't happen.

It's all very logical. In fact, it can even be expressed as a mathematical formula.

Let's say a man like Roosh has the following wants in a woman:

1. Nice ass
2. Beautiful face
3. Does not waste his time playing games
4. Does not demand he spend his hard earned money on her
5. Makes interesting conversation
6. Stops making interesting conversation and leaves after sex is over

Then his love formula is:

Nice ass+ Beautiful face+ No games+ Good convo+ No snuggling = Love.

Since this woman doesn't exist, he hasn't fallen in love lately.

Let's say a man like Chaco has the following wants in a woman:

1. Nice ass (hey, great minds think alike)
2. Cute face
3. Highly intelligent
4. Shares mutual interests and outlook on life
5. Gentle disposition devoid of drama
6. Is respectful of Chaco's need to be The Decider

Then Chaco's formula, like Roosh's, is all those things added together = love. Since Chaco has met a woman just like this, he is in love.

Therefore, love is not some random event that strikes us when we least expect it. It's actually quite predictable according to the formula above. When two people meet who match each other's formula's, a deep bond will form.

Understanding this formula is critical for keeping relationships strong. So many couples that fall in love end up falling out of it. Half of all couples who get married and take vows to love each other forever not only end up falling out of love, they often become bitter enemies.

The love equation explains this perfectly. When people start out dating, they usually try their best to win the other's affection. Men are generous with their money, dress their best, shower women with compliments, and try hard to please sexually. Women wear their best outfits, spend extra time on their makeup, laugh at all of his dumb jokes, try to seem impressed with his 'power job', and also try hard to please sexually.

After the relationship has been going on for a while, or worse, after marriage, it's a different story. Now the partners stop trying in the same way they used to. They get lazy and think that their prior feelings or solemn vows will sustain their relationship. This is a fatal mistake.

Once you recognize that love is based on a very logical formula, it should not surprise you that if you stop trying, the person who used to love you won't any more. If someone fell in love with you because you matched an equation that looked like:

Cute+ In shape+ Fashionable clothes+ Sweet personality+ Hot sex = Love…

But now you are now like:

Plain+ Out of shape+ Frumpy clothes+ Annoying nag+ No sex = Pain in the ass…

Then I assure you it's 100% predictable that your relationship will deteriorate and the love will be lost.

Men, you don't get cut any slack here. If you once matched a formula like:

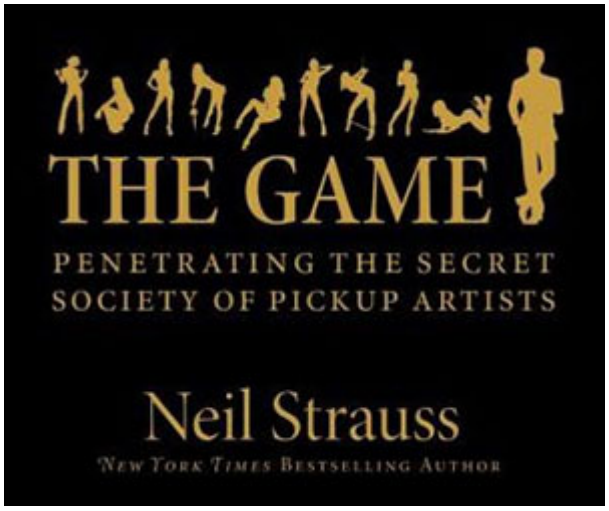
Handsome+ Buff+ Sharp dresser+ Generous+ Confident leader+ Dominant sex = Love…

But now you are like:

Soft+ Sloppy dresser+ Cheap bastard+ Pussy-whipped beta+ Lame sex = Loser…

Then it's certain you will be divorced and financing your ex-wife's trips to Paris with her new lover.

So let's take the mystery out of love. No more being astounded when the love of your life loses its passion. No more demanding to be loved when you no longer provide what your partner wants. Love is not something you are owed, it is something you earn. If you are in a relationship and want to keep it strong, figure out what your partner values in you and never stop providing it. As long as you match your partner's love formula, keeping their love is natural and automatic.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Another Move

January 26, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

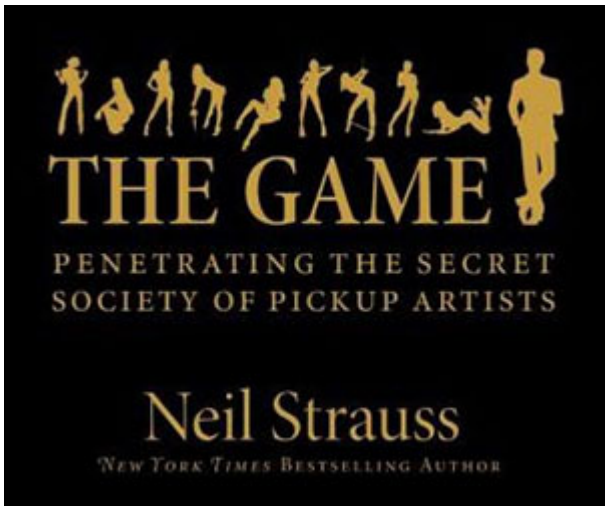
1. If you are reading this, you are on the new server.

2. I added a Top Commenters list at the bottom of the right column. Roissy is current king.

3. I added a contact form link under my email.

4. Now when you make a comment on any post, you have the option at the bottom of being emailed when a new comment comes up. Probably best on older topics or if you don't visit all the time.

Email example:



Why Men Shouldn’t Go On Coffee Dates

January 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

One reason I hate MySpace is because it makes it too easy for a girl to get a maximum amount of attention while putting in no effort. The distance between herself and you, a potential suitor, is so great that screening you out is her default move. One reason I don’t get email addresses is because it’s too easy for the girl to reply when she feels like it. She receives attention from guys and takes her time writing back even if she checks her email every 10 minutes (I guarantee you she does). One reason I don’t like coffee dates is because she doesn’t come to the date ready to perform or please. Instead, she wants to relax and let you make her feel warm and fuzzy inside over a non-alcoholic beverage.

A female blogger writes:

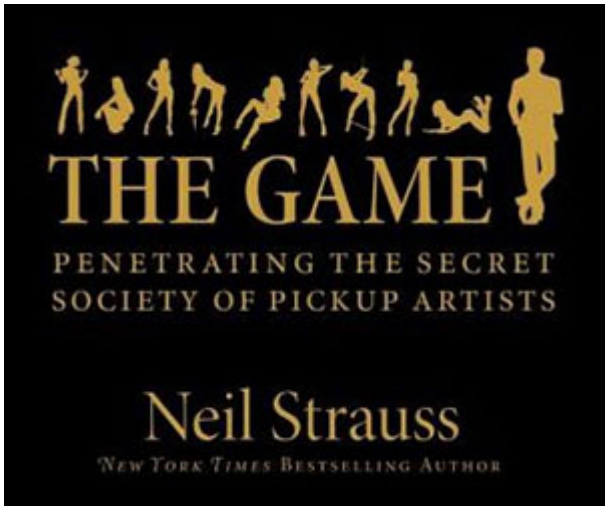
> I LOVE coffee dates. They are totally casual and can be either long or short, depending on your shatter mode.

Exactly. Let me ask you this: have you ever first made out with someone on a coffee date? You haven’t — in fact, no one has. I don’t even see lovers making out in coffee shops. It just does not happen. When a girl wants to go on a coffee date, she is basically saying either she is not trying to hook up with you or does not want you to escalate your game. Safe and comfortable for her means late night masturbation for you. She gets to practice dating and feeling wanted on your clock.

If you don’t make out with a girl when you first meet her, you failed. If you don’t make out with her by the first date, you are a complete sucker. What are you waiting for? Be a man, get her in a bar, make her laugh over a couple drinks, and step up. If you are under 21, get a smoothie, go for a walk, sit on a bench in front of some pond with ducks, put your arm around her, and make it happen. If you are not making out with girls by the first date, you need to seriously work on your game. It doesn’t matter how old you are. If you think making out with girls by the first date is “too fast,” then you are a hopeless beta who probably doesn’t go on dates anyway.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

How You Start The New Year

January 29, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

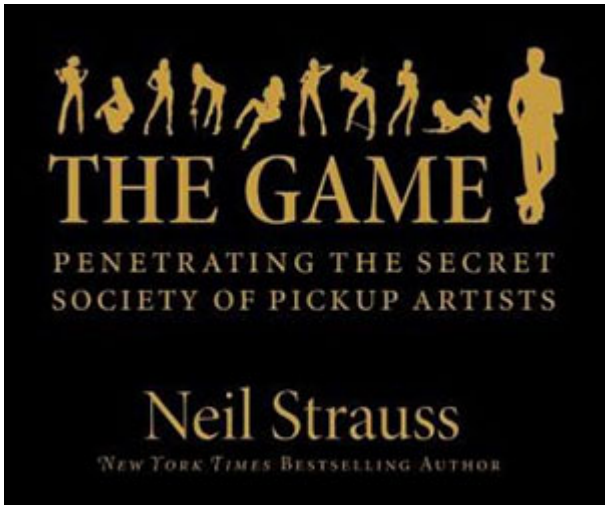
My mother taught me that the way you spend New Year's Eve says a lot about how that year will go. Even something as simple as standing up when the clock strikes midnight will do more to ensure a year of good fortune and success than sitting down. I used to think that she brought this odd belief from Turkey, but my roommate, a high-paid professional who is not Turkish, believes it too, along with other people I know who I generally respect.

It'd be awesome if a few hours could predict the subsequent 365 days. I would go all out and spend a few thousand dollars throwing a party where there would be cocaine for everyone. I'd make many new friends and I'd bang the hottest coke whore in town. I had time to think about this because I was bedridden at home this New Year's Even coughing up mucus and blood. Since there is no TV in my house, I watched the countdown on my computer, unsure of its accuracy.

It doesn't matter if my mother's belief is really true or not; it just matters if she believes it to be true. If her New Year starts in a horrible way, I predict she will indeed have a bad year. Because of her belief she will pay close attention to the bad things that happen to her while ignoring or downplaying or quickly forgetting the good things.

The problem with beliefs which attempt to predict the future is that they constrict how you see the world. The filters we call senses are already limiting enough, but now you add this additional rule which gives up any notion of an objective reality. You also throw away the concept of free will, if you believe in that claptrap anyway, and end up living a life where a few small actions can accurately predict the major currents of your life. "Oh no! A dark colored feline animal existing in my visual field! I'm fucked!" If you are that type of person, my Mom will be more than happy to do your Turkish coffee-cup fortune or analyze your dreams with a 20-year-old book she keeps in a Ziploc bag (to prevent further page disintegration).

Here's my belief: It's best to start the New Year in a horrible way, with illness or grave misfortune. Because as long as you don't die, it will only get better.



Rubber Ducks

January 30, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I used to play this carnival game as a kid. With a magnetic fishing pole I would try to catch one of dozens of rubber ducks moving in water around a circular track. Each duck had a special marker on the bottom to signify a prize, but otherwise they were identical, floating through this pre-determined track, bunched up together.

Are humans any different?

We also go in circles, with no real purpose, letting life's current shape us instead of the other way around. The track is one week of time. Days stand out, but weeks never do. This week will be just like last week. Fifty-two weeks a year for you, and they will all be the same. The details may change but the way you live your life and the path you are on will never change. Tell me who you are today and what you believe and I'll tell you what you will be doing ten years from now. Maybe a new car or a new house or a new lover or a new kid, but nothing the next person you see won't experience. We are the ducks.

I wonder what it feels like to be a rubber duck getting plucked off the track, away from the safe but predictable current. It seems like it'd be scary, flying in the air like that, away from what you know, with little hint of what's going to happen next. But I don't know of a better way for a duck to live.

Grocery Store Fraud

January 31, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Have we ever been told a good reason why there are produce sprinklers at the grocery store? I'm not a farmer but I know that dead vegetables don't need to be bathed in tap water to stay fresh. Judging by the red-orange mold growing in my bathtub, I would assume that extra moisture hastens spoilage.

The real reason is because all that water adds to the final weight at checkout. Notice how they only sprinkle the green leafy vegetables that can hold water in their crevices. You will never see them spraying tomatoes or oranges. My calculations show that this extra water pads the industry's profit by millions of dollars a year, which is why I shake the shit out of my broccoli crowns before I bag it up.

DC Nightlife Reviews

January 31, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've started rewriting my old Sorso Club nightlife review list as haikus. I'll drop one or two each weekend.

Newsletter no. 2 is going out this weekend.

February book update: (screenshot)

The Glow

February 1, 2007 | by Chaco | Link | Original Link

A few weeks ago my girl and I rented “A Streetcar Named Desire.” For you non-movie buffs, one of the most famous moments in movie history occurs in that film: when Marlon Brando lets out an unforgettable mating call to his wife Stella from the bottom of his animal heart (“Stellllaaaaa!!”). She responds to his passionate, lusty cry and he literally carries her over his shoulder in their bedroom. The next morning, Stella’s sister Blanche (played by Vivian Leigh, Gone with the Wind’s Scarlett O’Hara) is asking how Stella could be with such a brute like Brando, but Stella is just glowing and purrs about how he was “as gentle as a lamb.”

What got my attention was the glow on Stella’s face. Her look of sexual satisfaction was unmistakable. Her face clearly said, “I got it good last night!” It was actually pretty surprising to see that so obviously portrayed in a 1951 film, back when I thought women weren’t supposed to know what good sex was, you know, before the sexual revolution and all. But clearly they knew damn well and it seems the rest of the world knew too.

The scene got me thinking about the women I have dated. If I say so myself, I have noticed that women I have dated definitely glow brightly when things are hot and heavy. And I don’t mean right after, I mean all the time. One woman, after a few weeks into our relationship, actually started getting asked by her female friends, “What are you doing for your skin?? You are glowing!”

I started to wonder just how universal a phenomenon this glow is? Can one look at a woman and tell if she is getting it good or not just from the presence or absence of a glowing look on her face? So decided to I performed a little informal experiment. For one week, every morning I carefully observed the women I saw on the way to work, both in the street and on the Metro. I would look for women who have The Glow. I figured morning was the best time, because it would be ‘the morning after’, whereas later in the day her mood and face could be more heavily affected by the stress of her job. What I found surprised me:

Number of Women Observed: Hundreds
Number of Women who Glow: 19
Average Number Per Day: 3.8
Number of Women over 30 who Glow: 0
Number of Women who Look Dull, Tense, and Gray: Too many to Count

I’m serious. And people, we’re talking crowded morning commute on the Red Line here, we’re not talking about a stroll down a country lane. What does this data mean?

Hypothesis 1: It could mean the women of Washington, with rare exceptions, are not getting it on the regular, at least on weeknights.

Hypothesis 2: It could mean that the women of Washington are getting it, but the getting ain’t no good.

Hypothesis 3: It could mean the theory that there is a relationship between sexual satisfaction and a glowing look is bullshit. But I like the theory, so I reject this hypothesis.

Assuming there is indeed a relationship between sexual satisfaction and the glow on a woman's face, does this imply the women of Washington are sexually repressed? Does this imply the men of Washington are lame in bed and can't satisfy a woman to save their lives? And what's with women over 30? Not one women who looked to be over 30 appeared anything other than dull and lifeless. Are these married women who long since lost the passion? Or are these spinsters who wait in vain for that perfect man?

Whatever is going on, the women of DC do not look like happy people. I don't know whether to prescribe these women a good therapist, a good anti-depressant, or a good stud lover. But some type of mass intervention is clearly needed for the benefit of all.

Play Lounge Review

February 2, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Sure, the girls are hot, but guys are treated like scum
Staff has no respect

Rating: 2/5

Map • Official site

1219 Connecticut Ave N.W.
Washington, DC 20036

R.I.P. DC Cookie

February 2, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I’m disappointed, but not surprised.

In Case You Thought I Was Joking

February 3, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

> ...my Mom will be more than happy to do your Turkish coffee-cup fortune or analyze your dreams with a 20-year-old book she keeps in a Ziploc bag (to prevent further page disintegration).

How You Start The New Year

The Dream Book

Cloud Review

February 3, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Sound system hurts ears
Middle Eastern men love it
Where is the exit?

Rating: 1/5

Map • Official site

1 Dupont Circle, N.W.
Washington, DC 20036

The Golden Goose Is Dead

February 4, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For the past two months I have been stealing wireless internet from my friendly neighbor. Along with my roommate, I have downloaded terabytes of illegal music, video, software and the dirtiest of porn, including ass-to-mouth and midget double anal. We have voluntarily throttled our download speeds so we don't raise alarm or fry their router. But recently the free wifi has been silenced. Now all we get is some weak-ass one bar network that only works in the dining room.

I am writing this from Panera. They offer free internet (hot tea is $1.25 and refills are free), but no open ports for illegal downloading. What am I going to do once I get desensitized to the porn I already have? They close at 9PM which means when I go home I am forced to be productive instead of reading message boards until 3AM.

Next to me is a group of seven young men, led by a man my age. By his tonality and speech, I guessed he was with Amway trying to sell these guys into some sort of multi-level marketing scam. He was going on with simple anecdotes and wordy explanations to motivate and inspire. Just like with cold readers ("psychics"), the more vague you are, like this guy was, the higher chance you will hit everyone in the group. Specifics only exclude. Turns out it's a bible study group.

I observed the participants of this group, aged 18-23, and determined they were all beta males. The most beta of the beta, and I wouldn't be surprised if they were all virgins. They deferred to this group leader like he was their mentor, even though to me he came across as an amateur salesman.

He repeatedly said to these young men, "God has a special plan for each and every one of you." Apparently his plan is for them to meet in a franchise bakery every week and follow orders from someone who puts stickers on a Mac laptop. If God really did have a plan for these young men, why does it matter if they went to the study group or not since the plan is already set and unchangeable? Wouldn't meeting in bible study groups and church disrupt the plan that God has? Instead of fulfilling their destiny, these young men are mentally masturbating about how a plan exists. It's kind of like motivational seminars: instead of bucking up and doing what you know you must do, you are spending thousands of dollars and a lot of time to discuss why it's important you do it.

The real reason for this bible study group is to help commit these beta males to eventually contributing significant portions of their income to religious leaders who may or may not practice what they preach. I think they'd be better off telling their human religious leaders to fuck off and donate the 10% tithe directly to charities instead.

Still, Panera is better than the public library. The tables there are sticky and everyone is all up in MySpace. In the meantime I'm praying for the return of the golden goose. If God does exist, I know his plan is to provide me with fresh, DVD quality porn. When I switch to full screen mode, I don't want to see degradation in quality.

The Beard Experiment

February 5, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After my experience as Jesus, I thought it'd be a good idea to grow a long beard, since there is no good reason not to. I let my face grow for almost three months.

I've never in my life received so many complaints about my appearance. Even my family ragged on me, calling me Taliban, Ayatollah, and mullah. Every week my mom said, "Why would you want to make yourself ugly?" Among natives of this country, Jesus and Geico caveman guy were most popular. I got called Jesus about half-a-dozen times a week, mostly by strangers who thought they were too clever for their own good. Unabomber was common and I heard Rasputin once.

The fun part was the stares. People would gawk at me and break their neck to do double takes. Adults would tug on their friends and point at me. I was a rock star. This made going out at night easier because girls approached me more. They came for the beard and stayed for my personality. But those same girls would say, "Why would you want to make yourself ugly?" They found it impossible to comprehend why I wouldn't look in a way to attract them best, since that's all I should be living for. But overall the intimate attention I got from girls remained the same. I looked like a homeless bum but girls still wanted to fuck me.

In the end I had to end the experiment because I felt like I was wearing an itchy mask. When I shaved it off I had trouble recognizing the reflection staring back at me. So this is how other people see me. While I'm lucky to be blessed with the genetics to make a monster beard, I don't think I'll do it again.

How To Cancel Verizon Wireless Without An Early Termination Fee

February 6, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

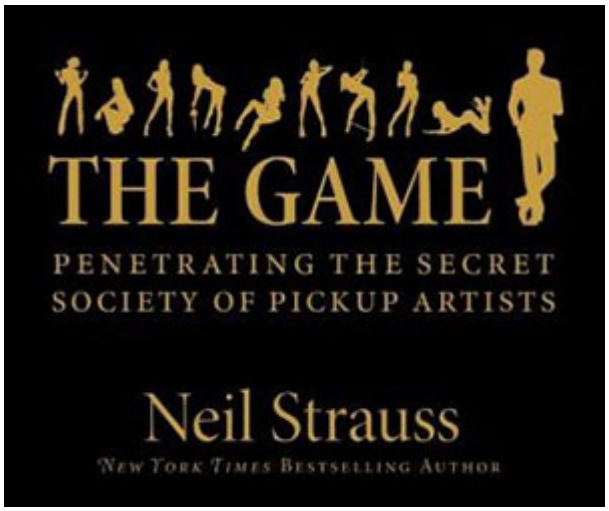
About a month ago I read a post on Consumerist about Verizon raising their text messaging rates by 50% and how you can use that to get out of your contract. (Starting March 1 it will cost you 15 cents to send and receive instead of 10 cents.) I sorted through that post and other posts and comments to construct a cancellation script I could use during the call. They use scripts on us so why shouldn't we have one too? Then I reported back to Consumerist.

> We've laid out these steps before, but we enjoy Roosh's confrontational style. He created the script based on previous Consumerist posts and comments. He talked to three different reps in thirty minutes. Within an hour after hanging up, his phone was off.

A blog saved me $175.

You can view the script here. It's helping quite a few people cancel without a fee. Even if you don't want to cancel your contract with them, you should still use it to get a credit on text messaging for the remaining life of your contract. Do it before March 1. Thirty minutes of your time can save you over fifty bucks.

Until my new phone comes in, I'm enjoying the silence.



Player Or Poseur?

February 7, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

1. His hand is basically on her breast.

2. Her eyes are closed and she seems comfortable. She's mentally preparing for sex.

3. His hairy complexion would be better balanced out with some facial hair, but I'm a little biased.

He is a player. Don't believe me? Check out this picture taken a little later:

It’s obvious they had drunk sex in the bathroom. I can smell the sex juices from here (and I can see it on his shirt).

Her body does look pretty nice though.

New Emoticons

February 7, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've added some new emoticons because sometimes I can't find words to describe the complex emotions I'm feeling.

The smilie legend link is above the comment box.

Chaco The Cowboy

February 8, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Chaco and his fiance have eloped to Las Vegas and are getting married tomorrow. They have decided on a cowboy and cowgirl theme, which is a little bit surprising to me since I don’t think they have ever been south of Virginia. Anyway, he’s going to be busy now pleasing his wife with marathon sessions in the bedroom after day-trips to home improvement stores. Contributing here is no longer the number three priority in his life.

Dragonfly Review

February 9, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A tad pretentious, but no mouth-breathers around
Pretty girls I've met

Rating: 4/5

Map • Official site

1215 Connecticut Ave, N.W.
Washington, DC 20036

Gazuza Review

February 10, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I want to get laid
But these girls are sitting down
Hand party at home

Rating: 2/5

Map • Official site

1629 Connecticut Ave, N.W.
Washington, DC 20009

Respecting Women

February 11, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

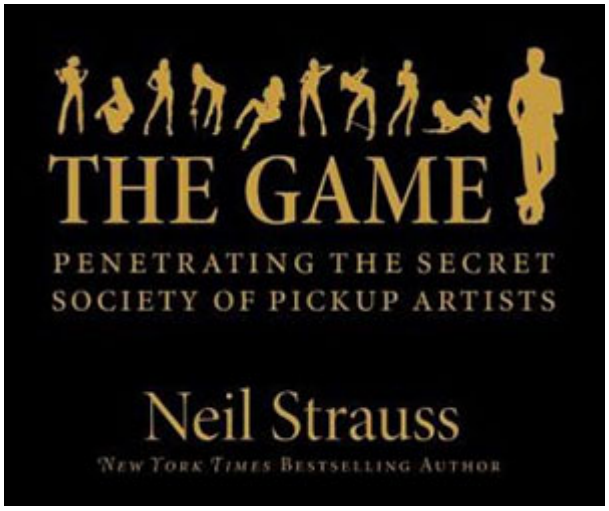
The more a man respects a woman, the less notches he will have. While notches don't yield happiness, if you want to have sex with a lot of women then you should not hold them in high regard.

Are women princesses that must be worshiped, or are they are pieces of meat that should be treated like objects? It really doesn't matter. You can get into a very fancy discussion about the modern woman that uses historical references and very nice metaphors, but in the end your conclusion must be based on reality. And the reality is that women reward men who have little respect for them. Ask any successful player a series of questions about his behavior to women and it will be very apparent that he sees her as something that is more expendable than magical.

I had a friend who was a good guy, but he would treat women very well and care for them and sacrifice for them. He would put his friends before girls he hadn't even slept with (girls he would never end up sleeping with). It got so bad that me and a player friend had to run an intervention: "STOP RESPECTING WOMEN. DON'T DO ANY FAVORS FOR A WOMAN WHO HASN'T PLEASED YOU SEXUALLY." It didn't get through and he's still the permafriend. This is a pattern that is repeated with beta males everywhere. I lost count how many times I was in the company of a beta and a girlfriend that gave him shit in front of me. When I ask the beta if he is going to let her treat him like that, he replies with "She's drunk" or "She's in a bad mood."

Emotional, weak, flakey, fickle, petty, jealous, gossipy, spiteful, insecure, shallow. I'm going to automatically respect that? Disrespect the entire gender, but do respect the girl who earns it. A woman you meet does not deserve the benefit of the doubt until she proves herself.

Russian Women



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Monogamy

February 12, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There is no one perfect girl that has all the qualities I want. Instead there are many girls who can please me in a lot different ways. This girl pleases me physically while this other girl has an exotic vibe that I like while this other girl is funny and that girl over there is sharp and witty. I like them all. And because I don't currently want children, why pick one?

Regular sex, you're thinking. Well if you can only get regular sex by committing to one other person, then maybe monogamy is best for you.

Free Wireless Internet In DC

February 12, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Can anyone recommend a coffee shop in DC that has free internet? I found this list but there are no user reviews. Somewhere in the Dupont or Adams Morgan area would be nice.

I've been a regular of Busboys and Poets, whose yuppified hippie vibe I really enjoy, but their internet on the weekends is slower than dial-up. Plus they are expensive: a soy latte costs $5.25 if you include the $1 tip.

Movies I Recommend

February 13, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Life Is Beautiful – An incredible film about perspective, reality, and imagination. The message: life is beautiful, but only if you choose it to be. I cried like a little bitch.

Y Tu Mama Tambien – A movie about two horny teenage boys. The “Oh shit!” ending is a natural result of what happens when you let sexual desire dominate.

City of God – Brazilian movie about life in the favela, order in anarchy. Death, drugs, and sex surround great characters and storytelling.

None of these movies are in English. Lately I’m finding that only foreign films are capable of telling me a story with characters I care about.

Google Maps Upgrade

February 13, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Google Maps now displays Metro stop locations and building outlines.

All this time I've been secretly using DCist's Map to find closest Metro stops.

Fantasies Tend To Remain Fantasies

February 14, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There once was a time when I would go to bed fantasizing about this one girl. If I could get her then I would be so much happier and everything in life would fall into place. As the years went on that girl would change, but there would always be at least one. No matter who I was currently seeing, I'd think of buying her creative Valentine's Day gifts or taking her on romantic walks on the beach. This occurred during a time I barely got any ass. Maybe there is a girl out there who has all the qualities I want, but it's a waste of time waiting for her to land on my lap, if she so happens to exist within driving distance of me.

It's fun to have this one ideal crush who you think will make you happy and bring you fulfillment while sitting at home eating microwave popcorn, but that's just not how it works. Because meeting girls I connect with is the result of unglamorous, persistent work. There is nothing lucky or fateful about it. I go out and talk to cute girls I like. I put in the effort to get to know them. I stay open-minded about the ones who don't fit my perfect ideal until I at least have sex with them. I listen to my gut and experience instead of friends or Sex and the City. What do you do? If you think something great is going to be served to you just because you think about it when you close your eyes at night, you deserve to be alone.

Mmm Burnt Taste

February 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Consumer Reports has deemed McDonalds coffee better than Starbucks.

> The magazine reportedly says McDonald's Premium Roast Coffee has "no flaws," labeling it "decent and moderately strong." The java from Starbucks, meanwhile, was determined to be "strong, but burnt and bitter enough to make your eyes water instead of open."

Starbucks is good for espresso and pretending you have a life outside the house. 7-11 has the best coffee.

Vasectomized Man Serves Up Gigantic Ownage To American Woman

February 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A man dates some broad. A few months into the relationship she announces that she's pregnant and informs him that he is the father. But he was vasectomized. This story, if true, has two morals:

1. Never trust a woman, especially an American woman.
2. Never blast inside a woman even if she is supposedly on the pill. Girls are human too and they forget to take it every day.

The only pleasure in life I deprive myself of is not letting my creamy delicious sperm come into contact with vaginal tissue. But I dream about it every day. It's unfortunate that the only way I'll be able to continue my unprotected stroke to the very end is by sleeping with an old woman who has been through menopause.

> Vasectomy: $400. Speechless look on her face: priceless.
>
> I'll try to sum up a funny story that happened a few years ago:
>
> I got a vasectomy.
>
> I met a girl soon afterwards. She was nice and attractive but with a selfish streak that raised a big red flag. She was 32 at the time and I could practically HEAR her biological clock ticking. Regardless, she was a good lay, easy on the eyes, and reasonably good company.
>
> I did NOT tell her about my vasectomy and I always used a condom with her to protect against STDs. She assumed, obviously, that the condom was only used for birth control. Silly girl.
>
> We date for a few months. I never made any move towards commitment but she brought it up ocassionally. For me, this was a casual but pleasant relationship. For her – as I was to find out – it was part of life-changing series of events that she was planning very carefully.
>
> Four months into dating, I get the "I'm pregnant" talk. She's going on and on about how the condom must have broke and now we really need to think about getting married "for the baby". She's positively giddy. She has a baby in her and she thinks she's gonna have a good meal ticket (me) to go along with her new 7lb annuity.
>
> At this point, I'm just as giddy. I get to pull the reverse "oops" on her. I figured that she slept with some bad boy and got knocked up. Good thing I was using condoms! Better still that I have a serious mistrust of women who can't think beyond their own uteri.
>
> So I wait a couple of days to "think about all this." I meet her again. I say I don't want kids and that she should have an abortion. I know where this is going and sure enough it goes there. She goes completely batshit insane on me. There were the usual insults about my manhood. There were threats of legal action. It was all very ugly and I was loving every minute of it.

Well, I let her stew for a few days. She leaves me nasty messages on my phone. She sends awful emails. I'm laughing hysterically.

It was time to drop the hammer. While she was stewing I was busy. First I get a notarized copy from the urologist who performed the vasectomy. Next I get a notarized copy of the TWO test results indicating a "negative test result for sperm" to show I'm sterile and shooting blanks. Finally, I get a letter from a shark attorney stating he has seen the other documents and is prepared to litigate against this woman if she continues to communicate with me in such an unpleasant manner. Also, the letter states that we will insist on DNA testing to show that the baby is not mine. I'm ready.

I meet with this woman at her place. I bring flowers and a small bit of jewelry to show I am willing to reconcile and assume my responsibilities as a new father. I also have stuck in my pocket the documents I have prepared.

She's all giddy again. Her plan is going perfectly – or so she thinks. We talk about our future. We have some pretty good sex. Then, as I am about to walk out the door, I ask her the $64,000 question. "Are you sure that this baby is mine?"

Well, she goes batshit insane again. Hell, she ought to. Her plan could completely unravel if there is ANY question about my paternity. Oh, she's really screaming now. How dare I question her morals. Do I think she's a slut. I'm just trying to weasel out of my responsibilities… blah, blah, blah, yadda, yadda, yadda.

I'm not really mad. I'm kind of embarrassed for her. But since she won't shut up and the neighbors can hear all of this, I ask her to step back inside and sit down. She sits on the sofa and calms down a bit. She is glaring at me with all the moral self-righteousness that only a woman can muster up. She thinks she has me trapped. She is 100% convinced her plan has worked. Oh, the tangled web of lies and deceit she has wrought around herself and I am about to hack through them with a few pieces of paper.

I reach into my pocket slowly. I extract the three pieces of paper and unfold them slowly and deliberately.

I tell her simply, "You're screwed".

Her look doesn't change. There is no way she can fathom what I have prepared.

I continue. "I am sterile"

Her look changes just a bit. Something is beginning to sink in. Naturally, she reverts to women's logic. "You're full of shit. You're trapped and you know it."

I hold up the letter and the test results. "Three months before we met, I had a vasectomy. Here is a notarized letter from him stating what I had done. Here are two test results showing that I tested negative for the presence of sperm. Blanks. I am shooting blanks. That baby inside you is simply not mine."

This woman is not to be swayed by logic and clear documentation. "Bullshit, those are fakes."

I was ready for that. "No, they are real. This last piece of paper is from my attorney. It's a simple letter to you that states if you pursue any kind of legal action against me for child support that I will insist on a DNA test to prove paternity, that is, to prove that your baby is not mine."

I give the woman all the documents. She reads them slowly, deliberately. With each passing second she can feel in her soul that she has made a very bad mistake. With denial swept away, she started to cry. It's a small cry at first. Then it becomes deeper and more painful. By the time she gets to the letter from the lawyer she is sobbing.

I had no sympathy for her. I turned and walked out the door. Even after I closed the door I could still hear her sobbing.

Epilogue -

I never heard directly from this woman again. I did hear through my friends that she did indeed have the baby. I also heard that the real father was some guy in a band she had met. I assumed that after 30, women stopped going after musicians, bikers, criminals, and thugs. Silly me for thinking the best of American women.

The Moral of the Story -

Get a vasectomy but keep it a secret.

Carlos Mencia & Joe Rogan

February 16, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've been following the Carlos Mencia–Joe Rogan drama. Rogan has been accusing Mencia of stealing other comedians' jokes, and recently went on stage during a Mencia performance to call him out. He made a video of the confrontation which makes a pretty good case that Mencia is indeed a joke stealer. It's 10-minutes long but worth it (look for the Amazing Racist cameo):

So The Comedy Club in L.A. banned him and his agent let him go. But not Mencia—Rogan. Because Mencia has large audiences willing to pay to see him, Rogan has pissed off the people that Mencia is helping enrich. It doesn't matter how noble or honest your cause is—if you get in the way of the green, you will be stopped by those who have power. Lesson in this is to always have a savings account, just in case your character gets you in trouble.

—Joe Rogan's blog

Angry Blogger

February 17, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

White Dade makes a good point:

> As soon as a good, Angry Young Man blogger finds himself a girl, that nasty edge he had goes down the drain faster than a used condom on a Sunday Night. I guess it reasons, though. All the great writers are either depressed or suicidal when they do their best work, so when something comes along that brightens your outlook on life, your work suffers. How fucking selfish.

My potent, productive rage comes from not having what I want. The day I get into a happy committed relationship is the day my writing looks like Chaco's (an awesome friend and writer!).

My Nightlife Haiku Reviews Are Shit

February 17, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Alright the haiku reviews are a bust. I just don’t find them to be useful. I will regroup.

Malaise

February 18, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I hate my job. And it's all because I went to Italy.

Two years ago a friend of mine was studying in Rome and invited me to visit. I was comfortable with my routine here, working 40 hours a week to make someone else rich so I can spend two days of freedom on the weekend sleeping in and trying to get laid. But over there I really enjoyed the idea of exploring this different world without having to work. Why does it only have to be two days of freedom every week? Then I went to Venezuela and it was even better. I was taken out of my comfort zone where fun wasn't served on some tour package platter. The simplest things like eating a meal or catching a cab turned into adventures. And the girls—so hot.

I started to dislike my job after Venezuela, until I read a couple job interview books (in the bookstore, of course) and found a new gig that paid a lot more. But the extra money only kept me happy for a couple months. Maybe it's not the companies I don't like, but the idea of working for a company. I don't like following orders from a boss I wouldn't spend my free time with—someone I don't respect. And I definitely don't like spending a third of my waking life in an office building.

Spain made it worse. I was sure I didn't want to commit my best years working to save enough money when I'm too old to enjoy it. I don't want to play golf or bingo, ever.

Most of us are on the capitalist path: to go to school, get educated, become a good worker peon, spend money on consumer products, and die. My immigrant parents thought this would be best for me, so I can't fault them for pushing me into getting a college degree to have a life that is easier than 99.5% of all human beings in the world. But I just don't think it's for me.

Not work

Support The Troops

February 19, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I'm tired of seeing and hearing the phrase "Support the troops." It's meaningless unless you explain what type of support you are talking about. You can want to support the troops but have two completely different outcomes in mind.

Do you mean support the troops in fighting the war? In this case you want to pump more money into weapons and send more troops to back up the ones already there.

Or do you mean support the troops in increasing the likelihood they will survive in the next year? In this case you want to remove them from the bullets and bombs in Iraq and send them back home to comfortable suburbia where they are more likely to die falling down in the shower than getting hit with an IED.

I'm not sure how "Support the troops" has come more to mean "Support the war" instead of "Support life."

Blackberry

February 19, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I don't like people who have a Blackberry. It shows they are uncreative slaves who volunteer to be leashed like dogs. If you really are talented enough to get the big office and the slave device, what's stopping you from being top dog and starting your own business? It's cause you are not top dog, you are a slave. Management is just trying to make you feel special with a $100 radiation device so you won't complain about coming in on the weekends. Is it a coincidence that lawyers, the most loathsome people on Earth, are number one fans of this gadget?

As for girls who have a blackberry, I would never date them.

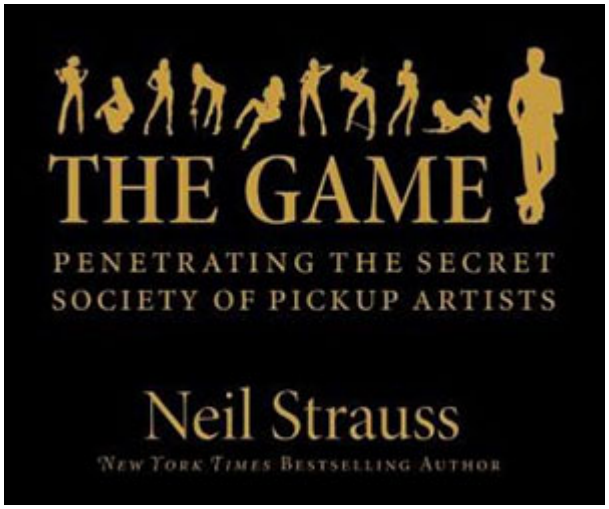
Blackberry -> Email -> Internet -> Computers -> Virgins males -> Parent's basement -> Real-life Dungeons and Dragons role playing

Therefore a girl with a Blackberry is just like a virgin male who plays Dungeons and Dragons. She is doing well in the male-created and dominated corporate environment because she is more masculine than me, and I have hair on my ass. Do you think she is going to stay home to cook and clean and take care of little Dakota? The number to Speedy Maids is going to be permanently attached to your refrigerator.

"Honey, is it okay if we order out again? I'm so exhausted from all that sitting down at work."

\

If the United States President doesn't have a Blackberry then you don't need a Blackberry.



Players Happy Hour

February 20, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Photo Credit

Who: Arjewtino, KassyK, Virgle Kent, me

When: Thursday, March 1 @ 7PM

Where: Front Page in Dupont Circle (main bar)

Bucket of 6 Coronas for 10 bucks.

Love Cafe / Cake Love

February 21, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

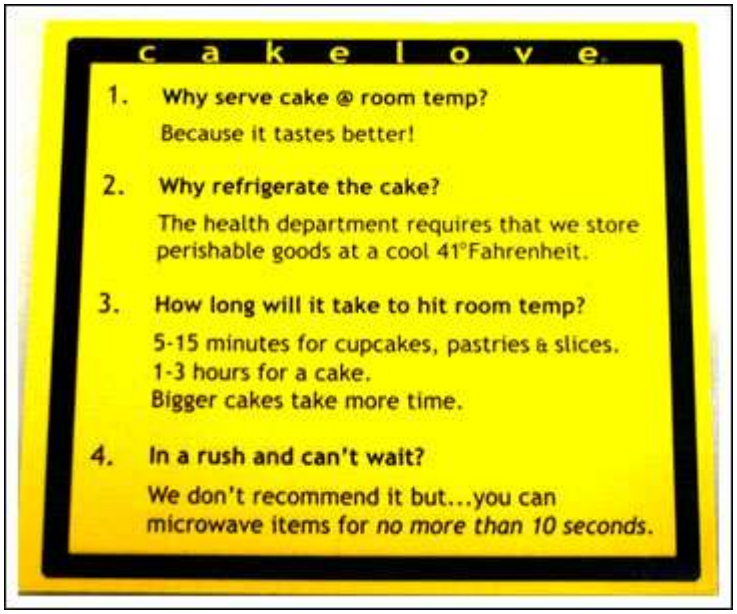
---

I tried out Love Cafe after a reader recommended it. It's about the size of your average coffee shop with a little nest towards the back that you can hide out in for 8 hours or so without having to buy too much.

The coffee was good—the baristas did a little foam swirl which was a nice touch, but the reason people come here is for the cake. A single slice costs up to $7. They can get 10 slices out of one cake so I can only imagine the profit margin out of something that probably costs two bucks to make. And people were lining up to pay for this luxury cake. They were in their twenties and dressed and acted like me and my friends.

I'm convinced you can take any product, triple the price, and sell it to yuppies who feel special for spending their money. They already do it with tap water, ice cream, coffee, and smoothies. I'm going to do it to steak and cheese sandwiches. I'm going to charge you $20 for one sandwich that has locally raised produce and meat. And you are going to fucking love it and come back for more because it makes you feel nouveau rich. I will have free wireless internet too.

At Love Cafe cake temperature is so important that they have laminated informational cards to tell you when you can eat your cake. If you don't wait 15 minutes until your cake warms up, an employee takes your slice away and asks you to leave. My slice of New German Chocolate cake was very nice and I'll be back because I fit the targeted audience for luxury cake and espresso beverages.



c a k e l o v e
1. Why serve cake @ room temp?
Because it tastes better!
2. Why refrigerate the cake?
The health department requires that we store perishable goods at a cool 41°Fahrenheit.
3. How long will it take to hit room temp?
5-15 minutes for cupcakes, pastries & slices.
1-3 hours for a cake.
Bigger cakes take more time.
4. In a rush and can't wait?
We don't recommend it but...you can microwave items for no more than 10 seconds.

Date Rape Druggings Are A Myth

February 22, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Almost every girl I know has told me a “Some guy at the bar put something in my drink” story. And I never believe them.

The purpose of date rape drugs is to render a girl unconscious. But to isolate the girl where he can rape her, a guy has to pick her up on his own and leave the bar or club with her. If he is already able to leave the club with a girl, he doesn’t need drugs to have sex with her because she’ll have sex with him anyway. Do girls honestly think a random dude they never met is drugging their drinks so she will pass out randomly on the dance floor, making a discreet rape impossible?

A few months ago I was with three other friends at a bar when one of them was accused by a white girl—who he didn’t exchange a word with—of putting a roofie in her drink. Even though no pill was found, the bouncer kicked him out because their policy states that the accusation alone is enough. But this only applies to men because I reverse accused the same girl of putting a roofie in my drink and she got to stay. There was a policeman there and I told him that if my friend really did that then why doesn’t he investigate and arrest someone. His response: “Get out of my face or I will arrest you.” Girls don’t hesitate to make up false accusations because they always get the benefit of the doubt (they are honest angels) and there is no punishment if they are caught lying.

“I think I was drugged” is just a convenient excuse for girls to binge drink and lose self-control. The girls you see stumbling in the bar and vomiting on the street are victims, not morons. Well now we have a study which proves these girls are not getting drugged:

> Women who claim to be victims of ‘date-rape’ drugs such as Rohypnol have in fact been rendered helpless by binge-drinking, says a study by doctors.
>
> They found no evidence that any woman seeking help from emergency doctors because their drinks were allegedly spiked had actually been given these drugs.
>
> Around one in five tested positive for recreational drugs while two-thirds had been drinking heavily.

Next time a girl tells you she thinks she was drugged because she passed out or can’t remember anything, remind her that those are side effects of alcohol. Then watch as her face fills with contempt because you don’t agree that deep inside every man is a rapist. Women want to be seen as equals but they are not willing to shake the “I’m a helpless victim” mentality.

Postscript: Full text of “A study of patients presenting to an emergency department having had a spiked drink” published in the peer reviewed Emergency Medicine Journal. Number of girls who are going to read it: zero.

Long Live Comments

February 24, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Alright let’s try again.

The signal to noise ratio on comments is getting out of hand. There are trolls trolling trolls and the ban list is almost at 100 IP addresses. I decided to eliminate commenting completely but after looking back on older posts I noticed there are a lot of productive discussions that expand on the topics I write about.

So I want to backstep and try registration first. In order to comment you have to registered. You can change your password that is sent to you and add a web site to your profile that is automatically linked when you comment. (The cool thing about being logged in is you can see the titles and times of upcoming posts.)

Let’s check back in a month and see how it worked out.

Upon Closer Inspection

February 25, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I was out writing when a guy and girl sat near me. The girl was a Brazilian bombshell, maybe 18 years old with a curvy thin body and wavy hair. With her was a black guy, maybe as young as 16, who had a generic urban style topped off with a skullcap.

Her personality was fun—she was laughing at him and teasing and cursing. I like girls full of life with a little bit of drama and she had all the exaggerated looks and movements. I made the assumption that he was banging her after she started touching his hands and calling him baby.

Most average guys would immediately hate on the guy—or attribute his ability to get her on things other than his game—but other than those very obvious cases where the girl is after some guy for money or status, the answer is game when she's hot and he's not.

So I observed them. He had an iPod headphone in one ear and was listening to her with the other. He would space out and look elsewhere when she was talking to him where she would have to say "Over here!" She was initiating all the conversation and doing more than 70% of the talking. He was sitting back, relaxing, and letting her do all the work. She complained to him about many things, such as his "disgusting" smoking habit and his attention span problems. At the end they got in a mini fight and she made a dramatic body turn away from him. Then he just pushed her head with his hand and said, "Come on let's go." And off they went.

I'm sure guys treat this girl like a princess, but here you have an average guy who treats her average and she is all over him. Guys only hurt themselves when they hate on another guy because there is always one thing he does which you don't do, or don't do enough of. Observe and watch before you go negative. This particular gentleman had access to her, took advantage of an opportunity, and served the right game that works well. And that I respect.

Bon Ass Experiment

February 26, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

One of my life's pleasures is observing ass—high school ass, college ass, twenty-something ass, spinster ass, and old but pre-menopausal ass. Every female who is menstruating is worth a peek.

After I went through puberty and my balls doubled in size, I created a null hypothesis that all asses are the same. Every age group has the same ass qualities that include firmness, roundness, and gripability. (Because I could not test all three qualities with every ass I saw, I used my imagination to guess how hand-to-ass contact would feel.) After compiling several massive volumes of ass data, I'm confident that we can reject the null hypothesis. I conclude that time alone is a devastating factor in the deterioration of a woman's ass.

When I'm checking out the asses of a gaggle of 16 year olds, I can't help but notice how universally plump and round they are. Even the flattest of the group is still able to embarrass most women 10 years her senior. It is not until her twenties does this ass meat migrate to other parts of her body, like her ankles or the area above her vagina. This is similar in concept to how an aging man's hair flows from his head to his ears, toes, and anus hole.

After 35 years, it's all over. The ass meat loses its cohesive ability and starts to degenerate into a veiny blob of tissue. Even the grip factor declines as well: instead of squeezing an ass that feels like a ripe tomato, your hands squeeze through cookie dough—the grocery store kind that is bought in those plastic tubes. This didn't use to be a big problem for women because they would already be married when their ass peaked, but now with the advent of equality and club guestlists, the modern woman does not get serious about marriage until the ass decline is in full effect. The same society that gives women cosmopolitans, voting rights, and Coach bags is the same that robs them of attention from quality assmen like myself at the time she most needs it. Unless our culture regresses back to the time when dual housing incomes were unnecessary, it will just be easier for me to find a juicy wife through the reputable mail-order bride industry.

Boom!

February 26, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Couple reader blogs to check out…

Ask Jimmy Suede – Dating column for men.

The Art of the Possible – Liberal-slanted blog without the screeching.

Tin Heart – Blog of my Craigslist missed connection. I think I am an inspiration to her.

Players Happy Hour Reminder

February 27, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I previewed my happy hour post to Virgle Kent a couple weeks ago and I think the term he used to describe it was “weak.” I challenged him to do better and he did. He took a thoughtful approach where he analyzed the personalities of his co-hosts:

> RooshV- What many people may not know about my Mexican friend is that he’s a really good listener. Unlike me he doesn’t cut you off during debate on any subject rather takes in everything you have to say, processes it and gives back a thought full response on the topic at hand. He’s humor is extremely dry yet witty on the British tip. He is a man who is on a path of his own. Obvious strong points of convo are politics, economy, religion, and game theory. Player? The guy looks like freaking Jesus! What girl doesn’t want to let Jesus inside her? Player 4 sho

Not sure about the Mexican, but thank you for the kind words.

Arjewtino took a different approach, using hate from haters to aid in party promotions. I’d quote the hate but they are in image form. Go here to read.

And then there is KassyK. We broke up last week but then made up for the sake of the happy hour. Our friendship is too strong to let something like my opinion on date rape get in the way.

> Who: Arjewtino, KassyK, Virgle Kent, me
>
> When: Thursday, March 1 @ 7PM

> Where: Front Page in Dupont Circle (main bar)

I’m Not Sleeping With A Brazilian Prostitute

February 27, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

So I met this Brazilian guy in the bathroom of a club through this belligerent Belgian guy who I met in the same bathroom about an hour before. Above is a picture of both of them that I took while we were all hanging out in that bathroom.

Since I want my next trip to be in South America, I thought it would be a good idea to pick the Brazilian’s brain. I started by telling him I don’t want to sleep with prostitutes.

“Oh well that’s a problem then. Even I’m Brazilian and it’s not that easy for me.”

“But I’m cool with lots of conversation and what not,” I said. “I don’t mind putting in the time.”

“No, that doesn’t matter. The problem is you are going to be seen as just another tourist. You have to stay there for a while to really understand them. And also a lot of these girls are just looking for a greencard.”

“How long do I have to stay down if I don’t want to sleep with prostitutes?”

“A few months.”

So to sleep with a hot Brazilian girl who is not a prostitute and doesn’t want me for my greencard, I need to live there. I don’t buy it. He did add that there are tons of South American women already here. That’s true, but the quality South Americans here are ambitious and have big egos because they know their competition is trash. I would only consider FOB’s with bad English. But if that’s going to be my standard I might as well go to the country to get the authentic experience. At least there I’ll be the exotic one.

It’s time to start thinking about an extended trip.

If You Don’t Look Like Jesus, Why Are You Still Alive?

February 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I wrote some big words in the past:

> While I’m lucky to be blessed with the genetics to make a monster beard, I don’t think I’ll do it again.
>
> February 6, 2007

I RENOUNCE THOSE WORDS. Without a beard I am not a real man—I just don’t look right without long coarse hair covering half of my face. And honestly, the beard was a pussy magnet. There were those off-nights I could just hug the wall and take care of cute girls who come up to me with “You look like Jesus, hehe.” It was like a tractor beam.

No girl will admit it, but they all have a fantasy of being fucked by Jesus. I am the luckiest man on Earth if after just a couple months I can look like the most popular man in the history of the world. Wherever I go, no matter what country, I will be instantly recognized as the savior of the human race. Knowing what I know now, I would kill myself if I didn’t have the ability to look like Jesus.

So thick and beautiful

Newsletter No. 3

February 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Coming up this weekend. If you haven’t already, sign up on the right. It’s going to be about buying girls drinks.

I Got Recaps

March 1, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There were a lot of soldiers last night, drinking, dancing, and crossbreeding for up to 7 hours. Writing about the things that happened would damage lives. My life.

Recaps:

Rock Creek Rambler
Suburbanite
MM
Brunch Bird
KassyK
Bad at life
Designs On You
Grateful Dating
VK
Arjewtino
Tex Pundit
Across The River

People who are writing their recap:

V
Jo
LMNTal
KOB
Heather
Freckled K

And at least a dozen others who must have talked to me towards the end of the night.

I never talked about date rape so much in one night.

Comment Edit Plugin

March 2, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For about four minutes after you post a comment, you will see an “edit” link next to your comment’s time stamp. Helpful if you catch a mistake or want to add something.

Minimize Your STD Risk

March 4, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

> More than one-third of American women are infected with human papillomavirus (HPV), which in rare cases can lead to cervical cancer, by the time they are 24 years old, according to a study being published today.
>
> Washington Post

This means that 33% of girls you have sex with are carrying HPV. The percentage that will tell you they have it: 0%. I have learned that women will get irregular pap smears or sores but stay silent and give you hard questioning instead in what I think is a ploy to take attention away from themselves. I'm convinced the more a girl questions me about where my dick has been, the more likely she is the one who has something. But I'm not mad at women for withholding information because there is only one person responsible for my well-being: me. It is no one's fault but my own if I have sex without protection and get something.

While some people are in the unreasonable "I'll never get anything!" camp, I focus on minimizing risk as much as possible without robbing myself of the man experience.

1. I avoid drunk attention whores. They are high risk and are a pain in the ass to deal with anyway.

2. I study the girl's bedroom behavior. If a girl is ready to have sex without a condom, I imagine she has raw-dogged dozens of guys before me. So I go in with an industrial strength condom. If a girl won't even take off her panties unless I have a condom on, I figure she is probably clean. I bust out with the thin stuff that has a 50% chance of breaking during my rough sexing.

3. I don't plan for risky behavior. The odds I will just want to "see how it feels" increases exponentially if I haven't hand-sexed myself in a while. Add a couple drinks to a loaded cannon and you soon may find yourself asking around for a good dermatologist. I don't recommend hand-sex on the day of a date because you do want to go in with an aggressive edge, but if your balls are always sore and heavy then you need to re-evaluate your jerking habits.

Don't count on women to tell you the truth because they are not good at telling it. Don't give her your disease-free snake and then whine later that she "gave" you something. Assume the worst with every girl, wrap it up, have your fun, then call her if you want. This is an amazing time for men everywhere—don't fuck it up for yourself by being sloppy and weak.

Sloppy and weak since 1979,

Roosh

Club Rain & The Band Theory

March 5, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Virgle Kent invited me to join him and his buddies at Fairfax's newest club called Rain, run by a group of guys who used to promote at Love. If are wondering why I would haul my ass all the way to the Virginian version of my middle-of-nowhere suburban location, it's because I was told the ass quality is above average.

The club itself is one gigantic room playing loud hip-hop and one smaller room that is set-up like a restaurant. The crowd is 90% white. While Baltimore white girls treat me well, the white girls of Bethesda and Georgetown usually don't, and since this crowd felt most like Bethesda I lowered my expectations. But I did do pretty well. Therefore I introduce to you The Band Theory:

> If you are not a white girl's usual type (Abercrombie all-American), she will be on your ball sack if she thinks you are in a band.

Long hair, check.
Beard, check.
Funny t-shirt that shows you don't care, check.
Massive natural holes in jeans, check.
Weird but sexy personality, check.

Two of the whitest white girls I rubbed my erection on asked me with hopeful eyes if I was in a band. They were so white and blonde I couldn't see their eyebrows in the dark. I wouldn't be surprised if they didn't even have eyebrows. The reason non-white guys fail with white girls, according to my theory, is because they try to act white instead of looking like they are in a band. If your hair is short now, it will only take one year to get it to band-length. Just let your hygiene and physical appearance go and white girls will be all over you in a very short amount of time.

I think my failures in Georgetown and Bethesda occurred because I started to look like I'm in a band only after I stopped going there. I've been going to Baltimore recently, while looking like I'm in a band, and there I enjoy a level of success similar to the international areas of DC.

If you like hip-hop and white people who all look the same, Rain is your place. Cover charge is $10 and Absolut vodka drinks are $6. Get there around 10pm because they close at 1:30am. Don't forget to look like you're in a band.

Rain Lounge and Ballroom
10418 Main St.
Fairfax, VA 22030

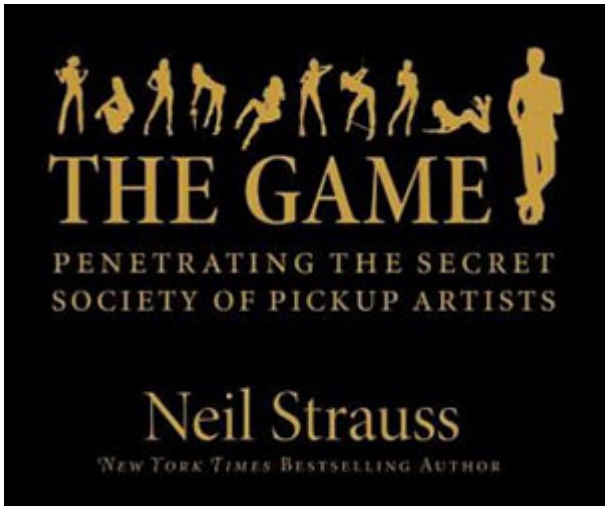
Update (April 26, 2007):

I got an email from the Rain people about their new dress code.

> Effective Immediately: RAIN will strictly be enforcing a new dress code.

> The new dress code is as follows:
>
> “DRESS TO IMPRESS”
> Which means:
> - No Boots/Timberlands
> - No Sneakers
> - No Hats
> - No Ripped/Holey/Torn Jeans
> - No Excessively Baggy Clothes (Jeans/Shirts)
> - No Athletic Gear

I guess I will have to take my holey jeans elsewhere.



Blogging And Sex

March 6, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After two years I have finally figured out how my blog affects my notch count. If you are a guy who blogs about sex, dating, or how women are inferior to men, pay close attention.

If a girl meets me through my blog, my notch count is not affected. She likes what I write for whatever reason and is more likely to think my writing is coming from a character or persona. I can proceed with normal game:

If a girl meets me through other means, but then finds out about my blog before sex, my notch count is negatively affected. She usually finds out through Google, my chatty friends, or because she was snooping around on my computer. Except for one isolated case, every girl who found out about the blog has freaked out in spectacular ways. They use words like horrible, sexist, and awful. Most sentences start with “I don’t believe you would…”

So when I meet a girl at a bar, I do not tell her what I do in my spare time. She can call me shady all she wants but she’s not finding out unless she Google-stalks me. Telling a mainstream girl about my blog is like trying to pull someone out of the Matrix who is not ready. Because of a lifetime of feminist programming, she just can’t handle the truth. The girls who dig what I write are vastly advanced in this respect, and that’s why I rather touch a girl who already knows.

No Headphones

March 6, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Get a pair of earbud headphones and attach it to your computer or iPod. Jam the buds deep in your ear. Then put on a song you really like, something high energy where both channels are the same. Turn the volume up so you can't hear anything else but the music. Now listen for a minute.

Where in your head is the sound coming from? If you are like me it's being "simulated" somewhere in the middle of your head behind your eyeballs. When you hear something out of one ear it is not because you hear it just at that ear, it is because your brain is telling you that it is probably being heard in that ear. (It can be tricked, like with firetruck sirens in a city corridor.) Your ears just contain vibrating organs—the sound is processed in your brain and then made to feel like its coming from your ears. But when you put on headphones, you can bypass this locater function so it's almost like the sound is coming from the same place as your thoughts, which have no choice but to take a break. And that is the reason why I don't wear headphones. It blocks the world around me, limiting my observations and thinking. I will never understand why many owners of mp3 players choose to kill their thoughts at every opportunity they can. Assuming, of course, there is something to kill.

Teahouse of Horrors

March 7, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Photo Credit

Over a year ago I sat down with an old friend at Ching Ching Cha Teahouse in Georgetown. This teahouse was recommended by someone who told me I had to try their artisan tea which blooms like a flower inside your cup. My flower was bright pink in color. It reminded me of those novelty pills that expand to form dinosaur shaped sponges when you drop them in water.

Our table did not have sugar so I asked the waitress if she can bring some. She said, “The owner thinks the teas taste best without sugar, so we do not have any.” Oh really?

Many of you are reading this through my RSS feed. It puts out full text of my posts so you can read at sites like Bloglines and Google Reader, or in an aggregator blog that mashes my feed with a bunch of others. If I operated this site like I did the owners of the teahouse, I would not serve an RSS feed—I would force you to come here and read my writing on my own terms.

This is like how, until recently, the music companies only wanted you to listen to music through shiny plastic discs. Their sales numbers show that control doesn’t work. Treating people like children and limiting their options without good reason doesn’t work. People want to choose how ideas or services are delivered to them, or they will vote with their legs and go elsewhere. Not only have I never been back to that teahouse, I have not recommended it to anyone.

When Close Friends Don’t Accept Your Cats

March 7, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Check out the second letter on today’s Dear Prudence:

> I’m a 46-year-old unmarried Caucasian woman. I live alone with my three cats, whom I love dearly. My friends always pick on me because I love cats but haven’t managed to find a man who shares this love with me. Sometimes I feel very alone, although I have my cats. I feel like my friends are talking about me behind my back all the time! I’m very content with my current lack of love, but I sometimes worry that my friends aren’t. They are all happily married with children. I feel as though I’m left out of everything since I haven’t gotten married and had kids. Because of this, I’m thinking of adopting an African baby. Although I feel that I would love this child as much as I love my cats, sometimes I wonder if the only reason I’m considering adopting is to fit in with my friends. What should I do?
>
> —Alone and Unsure

Alright which one of you guys sent that in?

> If you feel so out of sync with your married friends, instead of embarking on an ill-conceived adoption quest, seek out friendships with other middle-aged cat ladies.

Credit to Ribald for the find.

Spinsters In The Wild

March 8, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Ari is a 34-year-old woman living in New York. She likes quality men but quality men do not like her, not lately anyway. Let's take a closer look at this fascinating specimen.

> I'm having one of those days where I feel I lost everything I wanted before I even mounted a battle for them. I'm not going to be a young mother. I'm not going to marry my college sweetheart. I'm not going to be a teen sensation.
>
> Today, I feel like I'm too old to do anything I wanted or hoped to do. I can't find a job I like. I can't find a boy to kiss.

Women feel sorry for themselves in order to get sympathy and validation from other women who know what it's like to feel sorry for themselves. Their goal is to get a superficial injection of happy feelings that stops the tears long enough to leave the house and purchase brand-name clothing products.

> I never thought I'd be 34, unmarried, unemployed and childless. Not having a warm body to lie next to in September is nothing to think about. In December it's reason enough to cry. I never thought, I never considered that I'd still have to be looking. I blithely assumed that my snatch would be snatched up! I mean really. I switched high schools at the start of my sophomore year. I nabbed myself a boyfriend the first damn day. We were together for three years and then intermittently throughout college. In college there were others, I never lacked for a date. Cute, eligible guys were never hard to come by until I actually wanted one. And yes, I know, you'll never find anyone while you're looking but I'm 34, I really can't play coy anymore.

Who would have thought the attention she received when she was 18 would decrease to nothing almost two decades later? There has to be a high school course for teenage girls that brings out spinster speakers (with their beautiful cats) to scare them from trying to be players like men. If they can show pictures of diseased cocks and vaginas in school I see no reason why they can't offer this reality as well.

> And so, as my mom would say; I'm in a mood today. I have a date tomorrow night and I'm not all that moody by nature though so this feeling, it's got to be fleeting, right?

Of course she's still dating, since it has worked so well for her in the past. Because even at her age she deserves no less than a quality man who is over six feet tall, charming, a good listener, witty, in excellent shape, fashionable but not too metrosexual, not a game player, well-mannered, chivalrous, making six figures, funny but not a clown, a passionate lover, emotionally secure, drug-free, ambitious, nice but not too nice, not self-absorbed, athletic, and friendly to defenseless little animals.

Ten bucks this woman dies alone.

I Am Not In Today's NY Times

March 9, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Remember when I wrote about a script for getting out of your Verizon cell phone contract? A NY Times reporter interviewed me on the phone for a story he was doing on the topic, but I did not make the final cut. 😉

> Liza Tremblay, a 26-year-old owner of Bay Burger in Sag Harbor, N.Y., gave it a shot to get out of her contract with Verizon and avoid paying $175. (She wanted to use Cingular because colleagues told her the reception was better.) She followed a script she found on Consumerist.com. "I used a lot of big words, and I think I got across the idea that I meant business," she said.

—Getting Out of a 2-Year Cellphone Contract Alive

Girls Are So Naive

March 11, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I was at some late-night restaurant shithole with a girl. We were at a booth but I was sitting next to her, hinting to the masses that we are probably not brother and sister.

Our food came (I got falafel) and I started eating when a random guy I've never seen before came up to our table. I tilted my head up to see what the fuck this guy could possibly want. He looked at me with a gigantic smile and said, "Where are you from?" There is an unspoken rule that you do not disturb a man and his bitch when food is on the table.

I said, "You see we're eating right?"

He is still smiling. "Yeah but your face. I, uh, was just curious."

"We're busy."

He walks away and I continue my falafel meal. My casual lady partner gives me a typical chick response: "Oh my God you are such a jerk, he was just being nice."

"He wanted to fuck you," I said.

"What?!! No you are so wrong, blah blah blah blah blah blah."

This guy then does the same thing to the next table where there was one girl and three guys. Fifteen minutes later, he is having a one-on-one conversation with the girl in a different language while the guys sit there in silence, twiddling their thumbs.

The waitress drops our check and I ask her who the guy is. "Oh him, he's the busboy."

bus·boy noun
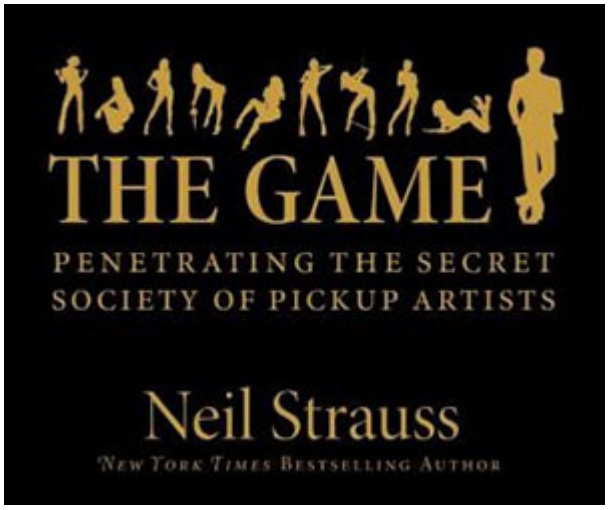
Minimum-wage restaurant helper whose job rounds out the bottom of a capitalist economy's totem pole

A busboy with stains on his shirt bitched out three yuppie betas whose clothing is worth more than his monthly salary. This is the most incredible moment of game that I have ever witnessed in my life. If you can not neutralize a busboy (granted, the ballsiest busboy in the world), a person whose job is to pick up after you, why are you still alive?



In The Company Of Men

March 12, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I saw In The Company of Men, a movie recommended by Roissy. The plot is about an alpha male who convinces his beta male coworker to help him emotionally destroy a woman. The reason is to “restore dignity” in their lives. The plan is for both of them to date her, take her out, buy her flowers, treat her nice, and then dump her at the same time. What ends up happening is the beta falls in love with her while the girl falls in love with the alpha.

At the end of the movie the girl, who is deaf, confronts the alpha about the game. He laughs in her face and says, “How does it feel?” He leaves her on the bed, crying, proud of his handiwork.

This movie has made me realize that I am a nice, stand-up guy. I don’t lie to women. I don’t manipulate them. I’m convinced I leave them better than how I found them, with short but intense memories of my bedroom. (Clarification: the memories are short due to the nature of the relationship, not because of the actual activity that… ah fuck it).

If you ask a girl about guys who like to sleep around, her blood will boil and she will say they are all jerks with mommy issues. But then if you ask her about the last player she fucked, her tone will soften. It’s because the player, with his experience and fuck style, made her feel good. You can’t stay in business for long if you are the type of guy who seeks destruction instead of pleasure. Most girls can pick up on the psychopaths that Hollywood loves to portray as smooth-talking pick-up artists. These guys end up in the corner office, not in the pants of quality women.

Affection

March 13, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I think it really picked up with those Rules books, when girls decided that giving affection or showing genuine interest is bad game. Successful players have many tools in their toolbox, but girls took “play hard to get” to such an extreme that they became cardboard cutouts, an outline of something that looks human from a distance but doesn’t feel like one up close. The more a girl consumed mainstream entertainment sources where these ideas were prone to be discussed or taught, the more likely she lobotomized the natural feminine instinct that men are naturally drawn into. “I must not let this guy know what I’m thinking or feeling. I must not let him know I care. He will like me then and I will be happy.”

Idiots!

Idiots for digesting and absorbing the absurd musings of Carrie Bradshaw, for incorporating a dysfunctional neurotic character into real life to infect new relationships like toxic mold instead of doing just a little soul searching to find meaning and substance. Idiots for purchasing books and DVDs produced by multinational corporations who care as much about them as a two-year-old cares about green vegetables. And idiots for trying to become careful, in control, and shrewd—for becoming like my dad.

A month ago I was winding down a long night in a club. As I sat down on a chair against the wall, I noticed a guy and cute girl sitting a few feet away from me. Two minutes later she slid a little towards me away from her guy friend. If a girl is going to make it that easy for me then I don’t care if I just vomited all over myself, but opening my mouth and creating speech is reflex.

Ten minutes later my arm is around her and I’m getting ready to go octopus on her. Her short dress and petite frame turned on the sleaze machine inside me.

“I was checking you out all night,” she said.

Whoa. I don’t hear that often enough, and it felt good.

“And I love your hair,” she added.

“Thanks!”

And then she started touching it (my hair!). I’m sitting next to a cute girl who is giving me physical and verbal affection as my hand is on her bare thigh and I’m fantasizing about all the ways I’m going to violate her. I can’t ask for much more than that—I was a happy man. She wouldn’t let me take her home that night but I got her number and moved her to the front of the queue. She motivated me because she showed me that she was motivated. This is how intense, fun relationships start, when you quickly feel comfortable with someone and don’t need to ration out attention like it’s a finite resource buried deep in the ground.

But why is this encounter the exception rather than the rule? Why is it so rare to find girls who put out a natural warmth and openness where you can cut through the manufactured bullshit and start to connect like two normal human beings? It’s because these girls worship celebrity idols who wear ridiculous sunglasses. It’s because they were raised by cable TV instead of their parents. It’s because they don’t trust their natural instinct and it’s because they are a product of an disconnected culture that sees warmth and openness as weakness, where the concept of community is limited to uploading staged photos on the internet for anti-social rejects to masturbate to.

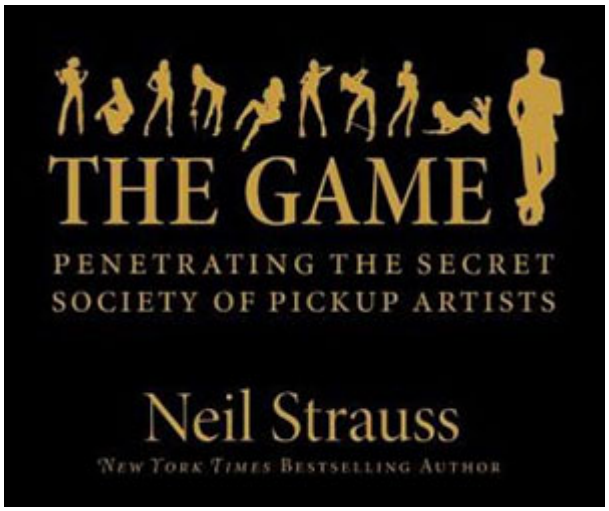
My advice to the American girl: if you are curious about a guy who is curious about you, just be nice. Give him one compliment and make him feel good for talking to you. A grounded, real man will be more than happy to take you seriously, more than just a one-time fuck to blow off some steam. Imagine that.



Craigslist Slut

March 14, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A reader requested I write about this Craigslist posting, about a woman who dated 34 men she met off Craigslist in one year.

The posting is written in a universal font size, but when I came across "I'm young, very thick, cute, tall, and blonde," my brain read it like this:

> I'm young, very thick, cute, tall, and blonde.

Her profile sounds reasonable. If it wasn't for the very thick part I can imagine myself hanging out with her and her progressive personality, if of course what she said reflected reality. By now I've learned that girls describe themselves with how they wish they were, not how they are. I wouldn't be surprised if she was more annoying than that random dog that pissed on my leg last year.

> I am promiscuous. (Wikipedia has a great definition of the word if you're interested). I like sex. A lot. Actually, I love sex. I haven't been in a real relationship in a very long time, and I miss regular sex (among other things). I'm multi-orgasmic, and while I'm not going to get too into it, I'm wierd when I'm not getting a sufficient dose of coitus. Now granted, while I am on the ADVENTUROUS side, I am no slut. I think the right guy is out there for me somewhere, but I don't know where the hell he is, or why I haven't found him yet.

Nothing wrong with being horny and fucking a lot of guys. As long as a girl doesn't infect me with her tropical strain of the clap, I don't care too much about how many dicks she has had inside her. Okay, maybe I do care, but the fact that I will never ask her about her sexual history means the issue probably won't come up, unless she can't help but tell me about the gangbang she was involved with in college where she was the only female (true story).

> I've gotten over 3500 responses in the past 6 months

I believe it. Trying to get laid on the internet makes you an excellent copy/paste monkey and really takes "playing the percentages" to a level the idea of courtship has never seen in the history of man. No matter how monstrous the girl is, the internet is an attention generating machine that makes her think her value is higher than a girl who weighs under 200 pounds.

Even though our BBW is "not shallow or close-minded," she proceeds to destroy most of the shlubs who dated her.

> Little did I know that you would turn out to weigh about 100 LBS and look like a cancer patient > Seriously. You sent me pics, and I saw Calvin Klein Ads. You brought yourself, and I saw Kramer from Seinfeld. What the FUCK??

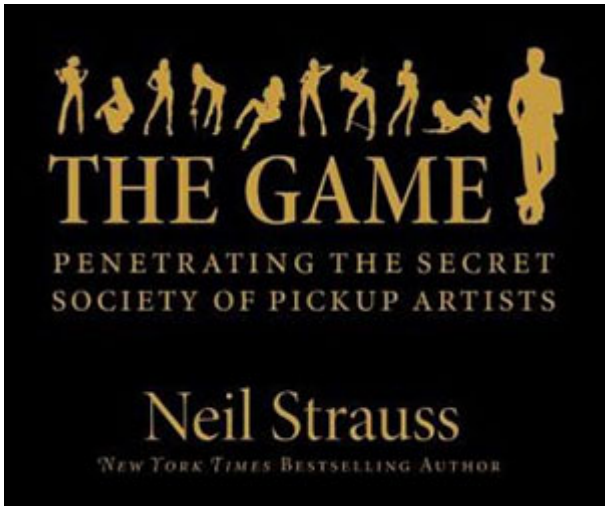
>
> The minute you put the condom and slid inside me once, you came. PEACE OUT!
>
> MY GOD YOU WERE THE FREAKIEST MAN IN THE WORLD.
>
> Seriously, I know I give good head, but leave a girl alone man, it's creepy.
>
> CLEAN YOURSELF UP BEFORE YOU TAKE A GIRL OUT, DEUCHBAG.
>
> You had white fizz at the corners of your mouth, and made me want to vomit.
>
> YOU WERE THE WORST I'VE EVER HAD. Poor guy, you don't watch enough porn.
>
> You kinda had this strange constipated look on your face all the time.
>
> …little did I know you would turn into a depressed, ADD, and OCD FREAK. When I touched your dick, you came in my hand.
>
> I wanted to laugh just listening to you and your ridiculous little gay laugh

…and so on. We are now living in a society where a very thick girl can judge other men who, unlike her, have the willpower to stop shoveling double-meat cheesesteaks in their mouth.

She did have nice things to say about me though. I make an appearance at number 18 under my fake name Pat. Yeah I fucked a fatty off Craigslist. So what, who are you to judge? I was going through a cold streak and needed to build some momentum to resume fucking the supermodels that I usually get with.

> 18) ~~PAT~~ ROOSH : Wow you had a big dick. You were the greatest fuck buddy ever, because we weren't attached, and didn't know much about each other either. You sure did show me a good time more than once!! You were pretty cocky though, I mean.. you were hot, and you knew it. But come on, you still weren't no Don Juan. You went and found yourself a girlfriend :(

Emphasis mine. The girlfriend excuse was a line, of course.



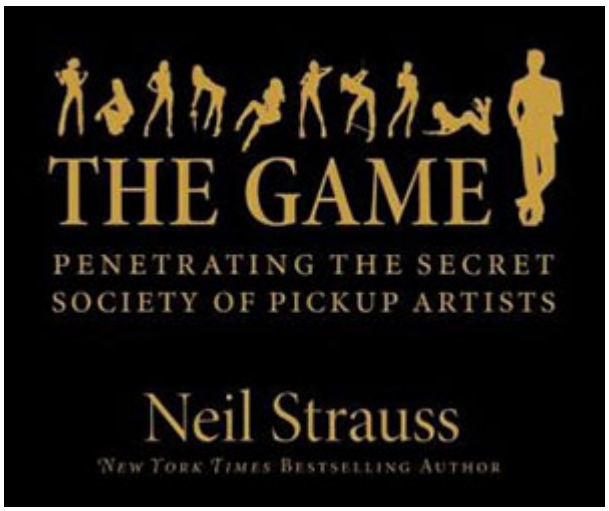
Teenage Girls Are Better

March 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After a couple recent posts talking about girls and young age, I recommend you go read Irinia's Teenagers are hotter than me.

> The most attention I'd ever gotten from men was when I was a teenager. Especially from older men. I used to think they were creepy, but now I realize that they were just over 25. Even with some acne, and a then boyish body, men still honked their horns at me. And now, even if I look good, fewer are going to pay attention because I think the youth has been sucked out of me. I look at these girls on the subway or bus and I'm constantly amazed at how they've all got it going on. On their worst day, these girls, with their youthful glow and childish attitude is far more attractive than me.

I guess this is one of her more depressing posts (if you are a female) but it is accurate and brutally honest. I'm proud to be a reader of her underrated blog. I found her first!



I Dated A Girl Who Was In A Gangbang

March 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Yesterday I mentioned how a girl I dated told me she was in a gangbang. Let me share with you how that came about.

Several years ago I was seeing a brunette who put out a girl-next-door vibe but was a piranha in bed. She was perfect for me. Since she was a keeper, I showed her my appreciation by hanging out with her in public instead of just my bedroom.

One afternoon we were at Barnes and Noble reading magazines. She was into the female health magazines like Shape and I was into Maxim and Stuff (give me a break, I was just out of college). I was still dreaming of a threesome, and this girl, due to her unbridled sexual energy, was my best shot at it to date.

“Have you ever been in a threesome?” I asked, quietly.

“Yes.”

“Cooooool! How was the girl like?”

“Umm. There was no girl.”

“Wait. How is a threesome possible without another girl?”

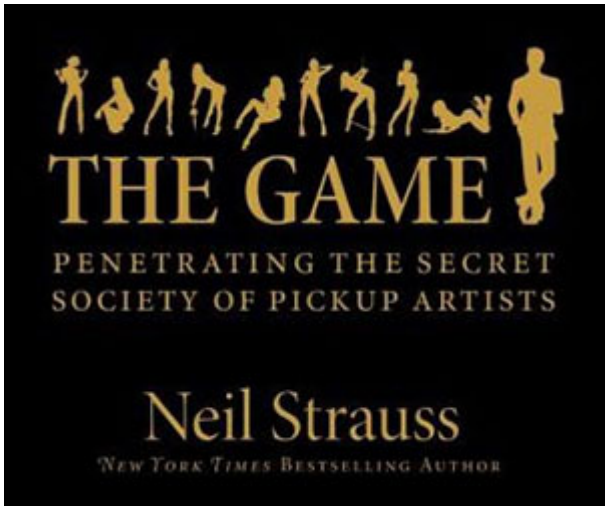
“It was with two guys.”

“Oh, no.”

At that moment, she was dead to me. Alright maybe not dead, but the freak in the sheets and lady on the streets image I built her up to be imploded like an old Vegas casino. She proceeded to give me details as my face turned from ease and contentment to looking like I was dumping a log in the toilet. I listened to her every word as she told me how guys pounded her multiple holes during one drunken night in college. I had to stop her from telling me more. It was my fault for not recognizing the warning signs: her ambivalence towards condoms, her penchant for public sex, and her love of record-setting gangbang events where a random guy off the street has to put in just a couple strokes to make it count. I should have known.

I continued having condomless sex with her but it just wasn’t the same: I kept imagining my best friends tag-teaming her along with me, asking me if I’m “having a good time” and if she is “always this freaky.” A few more months of that, after these kinky bedroom thoughts progressed into a heterosexual gray area, I decided to end the relationship.

In relationships since then I’ve had to stop girls from opening their big mouth and telling me their past sexual history, lest the image I have of them in my head be disturbed. Unless the girl is a virgin. I’d like to know that ahead of time so I can find some black tape to cover the red record light on my Dad’s camcorder.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

The Last Book Update

March 17, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I finished the 1st draft last month. It came in at a morbidly obese 75,000 words. Double-spaced with size 12 font that comes out to 210 pages. So far I've edited 50 of those pages, spending at least three hours a day to do so. Each page takes me 20-25 minutes to edit.

The blog may suffer during this editing process. Posts may arrive at stranger times.

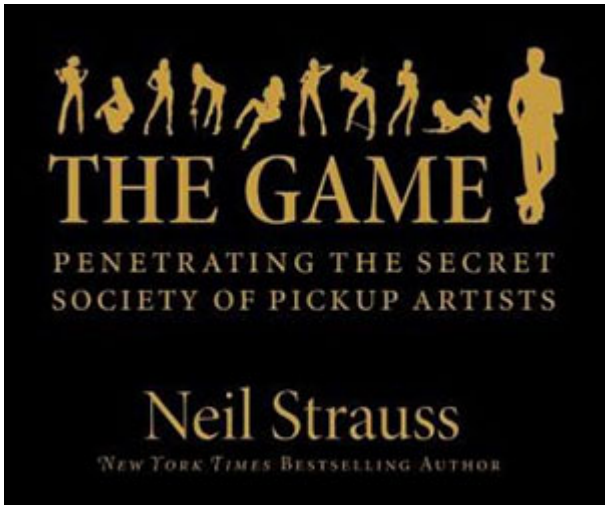
Timeline:

April: Finish the 2nd draft. Send to hand-picked editors. Do my taxes.

May: Decide on a book title (with your help) and create cover. Complete the book.

June: Self-publish. Complete blood vow to never write a book again.

This project has ruined my life, so I will be pleased when it's over.



6 Qualities Of A Good Rape Scene

March 18, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I just saw the movie 300, which had an awful rape scene—it didn't arouse me at all. Real-life rape is brutal, horrible, and something I don't believe in, but I dig it in movies and porn where the fake rape is a symbol of male domination. Here is what makes a good rape scene:

1. Not too much physical violence. There should be no blood and hitting of the girl with a closed fist, though hair pulling is acceptable. The girl can beat the guy on his chest as much as she wants, and she has to say "no" and "please don't" several times. But not too much.

2. Lots of eye contact. This makes the rape more intimate.

3. Some facial grimacing. It should hurt a little initially, but not during the full strokes. Definitely no tears.

4. No protection. I accidentally stumbled on a French porn clip of four masked men "raping" two French girls. Not only did the guys put condoms on, but the girls helped them do it. I was so disgusted that I stopped watching.

5. Change in opinion. The key to a good rape scene is seeing the girl change from hating it to loving it. She has to want to be raped again.

6. After-sex joking or cuddling. She should learn to love her rapist. None of that crying on the floor naked while in a fetal position stuff.

Both genders have rape fantasies and that's normal, but there is a definitive test to see if you really love rape or not: watch the movie Irreversible. The nine minute rape scene in that movie is so violent that it disfigures the victim (Monica Belucci) and puts her in a coma. I did not get aroused during that scene, like I normally do when watching rape, so that means I can joke about rape because I'm not really a rapist (sort of like how black comedians can make fun of black people). That movie turned me off from cinematic rape for several months.

My Doug

March 19, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Dear Doug,

I've been seeing you for two years now without complaint. I came to you after I ended my three year relationship with Anthony and his inconsistent ways. He was much cheaper but you know me—I need complete satisfaction. You were so green when I first started seeing you, with your wide availability and barely-visible corner space, but you kept introducing new techniques that made me feel good about coming back for more.

This past weekend I noticed you had three stations, an entire row. They are not going to give you all that space and not raise your price, so I mentally lubed up my ass for the pounding it was about to receive. Sure enough, the price came to $50. With $12 tip on top of that, you now cost the same amount as a weekend date that ends in sex. I went out that night and girls made fun of me, telling me their haircuts cost less than mine. It's not your fault, but I've lost all my alpha male credibility. I felt so beta the next day that I bought a couple Armani Exchange shirts and some steroids from the internet. Therefore I don't think I can see you again—professionally, anyway. You've always liked my hair long so I think I will try your advice and be a ponytail guy like Choco from Domino. Don't worry, I'll let a couple strands hang on my face like you said. I'll stop by soon because you know I like checking out all your coworkers.

With big love,

Roosh

Free Dunkin’ Donuts Coffee

March 20, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Photo Credit

Dunkin’ Donuts has free iced coffee all day today. While I find donuts to be repulsive, I will hit multiple Dunkin’ Donuts to get as much free coffee as my little heart desires. If I smell like donut grease in the process, so be it.

Full Disclosure: Dunkin’ Donuts has paid me $10,000 for this post.

Wearing The Engagment Ring After The Wedding

March 20, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

As a teenager I learned that engagement rings are only worn during a couple's engagement period. But times have changed. Because women make such a big deal about wanting an engagement ring that costs at least 15% of her fiance's yearly salary (Zales said so), they've become reluctant to hide such precious jewelry just because a couple vows were exchanged. Everywhere you look women have now settled on the retarded trend of wearing both the engagement ring and unglamorous wedding band at the same time, on the same finger. They do this because they want to continue advertising their life partner's salary. How else will her peer group judge her worth as a woman? It takes way too much work to judge a person's character and personality—but that shiny diamond is like a billboard that everyone can understand. "She married a guy with money and fulfilled her purpose in life! I'm so jealous and depressed—where's the chocolate?!"

I would love to see a man try to reason with his long-term girlfriend that an expensive engagement ring is a waste of money, that it's better well spent towards a house or interesting vacations. I'd get the popcorn ready as she rails on him for being unromantic, selfish, and "out of touch," because nothing says romance and generosity like a rock whose supply is artificially controlled by multinational entities.

A woman who wants such a ring is going to be trouble down the road. Next thing you know the car is old because it needed two repairs in one year, a storage facility needs to be rented to house all that shit that went out of style, the McMansion needs an upgrade because the kitchen doesn't have enough space for a restaurant-sized refrigerator to store carry-out, and a hot Polish au pair must be brought into the house to watch the kids while cool mommy is in Pilates class.

It is up to us to put the engagement back into engagement ring. If a woman finds it socially unacceptable to wear an engagement ring after the wedding, she will not push for something so costly to only wear for a year or less. Next time you see a double-ring wearer, all you have to do is ask the shallow woman why she wears both rings. Peel at the scab to get to her true shameful intentions. Since women are hyper-sensitive to mainstream opinion, once millions of people catch on to the idea I have written about today, the expensive diamond ring will be history.

Worst Starbucks Barista In The Universe

March 21, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I ordered a tall Americano and a water at the cash register. I waited a couple minutes by the bar but the water never came. No big deal, I'll just ask again.

"Can I get a cup of water?"

The Asian lady barista said, "Sure I'll get it for you this time but next time can you get back in line and ask for it?" Suck deez.

That barista is actually a manager, and I've seen her give attitude to others and reprimand her subordinates in front of customers. After I got my water I briefly considered using my Pulitzer-worthy writing skills to write a letter to corporate headquarters, but that would take too much effort.

A large black man next to the bar sees I'm waiting for my coffee drink. "My drink is taking forever too," he said.

We small talk for 30 seconds. I looked at the Asian barista and said to him, "You see that woman? I really hate her."

"That's my wife."

"Haha yeah right."

"No really, she is my wife."

Self-owned!!!

"Uhhhhhhhh yeah I'm saying that because I tried to get a water but she was not very nice." It only took five seconds for me to regress into a beta male.

"Oh she can seem tough but this store is very busy."

Phew, he's cool with me hating his wife. I chat a little to alleviate my guilty feelings as my intoxicating charm wins him over: he ends up introducing me to her as his "homeboy." He told her to look out for me in the future, so talking shit to a man's wife may actually get me free coffee. I didn't learn a lesson from this.

She’s Like A Doorknob, Everybody Gets A Turn!

March 22, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Michelle is a cute 27-year-old whore. It says so right on her tattoos:

“I Swallow Cum”
“Fuck My Whore Ass”
“Cum Slutt” [sic]
“For Deposit Only”

Let’s find out how this came about.

> I started the tattoo process during the time I was initially trying not to act out on my addiction. Since I was trying hard not to actually have sex with everyone I spoke to during a day, my sexual addiction came out in other ways. My mind could not, would not, and could not stop focusing on sex 24/7 — I was wet and turned on all day, every day. My pussy ached so bad for attention that I could barely function.

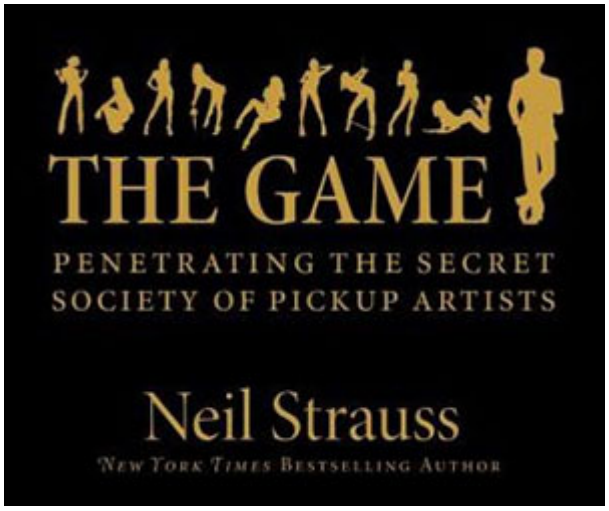
> My last job was an $80,000 a year position as a supervisor for RTD in Denver — I was fired for having sex with the people I supervised. I found out I was known as the “pass around girl” by the bus drivers. It was not a term of endearment, I assure you. The term just sort of stuck, and that is often how I am referred to, and I often refer to myself as such.

Good for her for embracing her sexuality. A lot of you girls reading right now could take a lesson or two from Michelle, who I guarantee you knows how to please a man in bed (or in a Wendy’s bathroom, janitor’s closet, dark alley next to the dumpster, etc.). I wouldn’t worry about going overboard with the tattoos like her though, just one that says “Fuck My Whore Ass” should be enough.

Some body modification magazine interviewed her and published nude body shots, including a close-up of her vagina. It will leave you speechless.

NOT SAFE FOR WORK: Michelle, The Pass Around Girl

Hell yeah I’d hit that.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Girls Getting Back With Ex-Boyfriends

March 25, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Many times a girl has dated me after ending a serious relationship and then dived back into the arms of the ex-boyfriend when I put on the brakes. I have nothing to worry about as long as these girls don't turn gay, but I think I know what this could mean.

1. They can't cut it in the dating scene. It's brutal out there. Telephone calls that aren't being returned, lonely men sitting at the bar waiting for a date that will never show up, statements being wildly misinterpreted, and testicles exploding from too much internal pressure. This scene is like an underground drug den with dirty needles on the ground and zombies walking around with infected veins (emotions) that will never heal. The death blow is that last rejection that prompts the sad but inevitable "Is there something wrong with me" pity party. The fragile human ego has not evolved to handle the volume of rejection and disappointment seen in modern dating.

2. They don't like being ultra-dominated in bed. I think a little bit of pain mixes quite well with pleasure because it makes that pleasure even better. I'm talking about contact with the cervix, bright-red hand imprints on asses, and neck-jerking hair pulling. Every girl is born to like this, but some take a few extra years to break away from feminist programming to fully enjoy being handled like a real woman. And it works both ways: when a girl is on top of me and doing that around-the-world move where it feels something is about to snap off, you don't hear me whining like a little bitch. I can take the pain, just please don't lean too far back.

The getting-back-with-the-ex phenomenon is common American behavior. A break-up is not the break-up but which break-up—just one of several that drags on a relationship past its shelf date. I look at it like this: if Don Johnson and Melanie Griffith couldn't make it work a second time, then no one can. Unless something intrinsic about the environment or the personalities involved changes, the second and third and fourth break-ups will be low-budget sequels destined for the bottom shelf at the video store. You shake your head at the cover of Police Academy VIII and wonder, "Why did they bother?"

Experiment

March 26, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

What would happen if I came up with a phrase and sent it to five alpha males in sequence to add or edit in any way they wish? The answer: a masculine essay that represents the strong realities of real men. I sprinkled some Roosh dust on the final result to bring it all together.

The magic phrase that was sent to the first alpha male: American culture.

The essay comes out to 1,000 words so I know I'm flirting with the edge of your attention span, but it is possibly the best collaborative effort the internet has ever seen.

Read it here.

Affection Follow-Up

March 26, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Well that was quick.

> Why is it so rare to find girls who put out a natural warmth and openness where you can cut through the manufactured bullshit and start to connect like two normal human beings?
>
> March 14, 2007

I met a girl in a club one week after I wrote that. Even though her parents weren't from the U.S., she put out a very strong American vibe since she was raised here since puberty (pink Coach bag, Asian-straight hair, fake tan, etc.). American girls are not my number one preference but as long as she is cute and not a complete moron, I'm going for sex. We talked for about 30 minutes with light petting involved. She had to leave because her girlfriend's boyfriend got into a fight or something, so it was time to wrap it up.

"I think we should hang out for a drink," I said.

You know her answer is going to be good or else I wouldn't write about this.

"That can be arranged."

It gets me so hot when girls treat me like a coworker. Going forward, can we add value in Meeting Room 2? I want to leverage your best-of-breed interface so bad…

I guess I'm asking for too much to want replies like "I'd love to" or even "I'd like that" because then she would be showing too much interest and I would stop considering her as a life partner. I got her number anyway because I was horny at the time, but why bother calling when you know at the very least you will be subjected to phone tag and "Let me check my schedule"? It's time to hold girls to a higher standard where wanting to go out with me is not enough: I want you to show more enthusiasm than someone in one of those in-and-out comas.

American Culture

March 27, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following is a collaboration by five alpha males. I edited. Click here for more info.

American Culture is a powerful force in the world today. It is like a conquering army that either overthrows existing cultures and values or incites strong rebellions that seek to repel its influence. The majority of the world is trying to adopt our way-of-life while at the same time harboring resentment and blaming us for the loss of their own culture.

Resentment stems from the fact that the worst aspects of our culture are the ones most likely to be spread. In Egypt you can eat at Kentucky Fried Chicken or Pizza Hut while sitting directly across from the Great Pyramids of Giza. You can walk into a clothing store in Lebanon and watch MTV on the television while shopping for American jeans. Baywatch enjoyed a long run as the most popular TV show in Europe until, much to the dismay of Deutsche Hasselhoff fanatics, it was displaced by Jerry Springer. The American sprawl of identical houses and mega-malls is well-entrenched in Canada, and McDonalds is constantly full of young people just outside Notre Dame in Paris.

The world media, quick to criticize and quicker to demand, plays its hand shaping world opinion by painting a negative picture of the U.S. For example, once the 2004 Asian Tsunami hit, the BBC and many other media outlets not only criticized the U.S. for not contributing more aid, but also for not donating the amount pledged fast enough. Even when (at the time) the U.S. had given more money than all other countries combined, the world media still berated them for not giving enough, finding fault by comparing donation amounts to GDP numbers.

These poor perceptions of American actions both at home and abroad can be traced to jealousy. More specifically, a jealous fear of being left out of what C.S. Lewis referred to as the “inner ring.” This is a fictitious ring where we place all the people and ideas whose acceptance we want most in our lives. It’s the cool kids table, with its own set of rules and mores that is exclusive by definition. If you’re out, it’s disaster beyond belief. It’s only natural then for non-Americans to scorn our immorality, our heartlessness, our selfishness, our shallowness, our ambivalence. They hate our money, our power, and our lifestyle like a kid rolling home from school in an aged Tercel resents the preppy jock driving a Land Rover with three hot blondes laughing hard at even his lamest jokes.

Yet in the end, material wealth and loose sexual mores are not the issue. The issue is freedom. The high school dork doesn’t despise the jocks because that particular table has a marvelous view of the hallwayâ€”he despises the fact that the cool kids can sit at any table they want, including that one, or the one he’s at, or any other. When a Frenchman despises your SUV, he doesn’t really hate your choice of automobileâ€”he resents the fact that you can get a job that pays well without funneling more than half of that money straight to the government. You can afford pompous means of motivation and he canâ€™t. He resents the fact that you got to choose your college, even one you couldn’t afford, while he is shunted to a government-run trade school. He resents the fact that your car can hit ludicrous speeds on public highways without someone three countries over declaring it immoral and thus illegal. He resents the fact that his society is too rigid and unchanging to ever allow such freedom of individual expression.

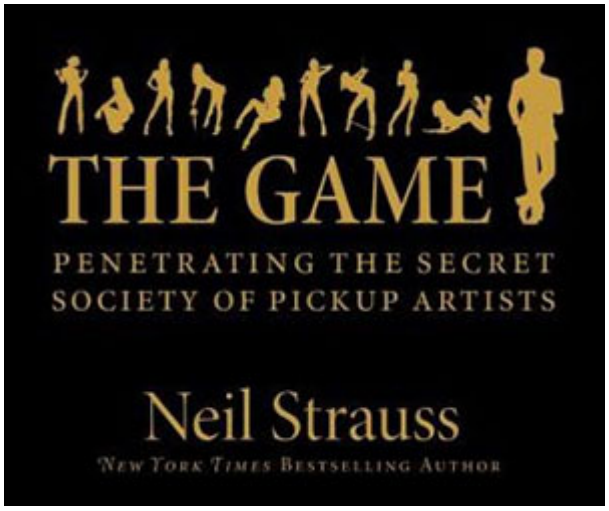
That freedom of flexibility is what gives us our strength. Try to find good tacos in Denmark. Youâ€™ll end up having wet dreams of Taco Bell instead. You can get great tacos in every state of the Union here because it's not Danish to eat tacosâ€"it actively clashes with their culture. Yet can you imagine someone proposing that taco-eating is un-American? What about pizza? Or sesame chicken with extra broccoli? What makes a McDonald's in Paris sacrilege while a Thai restaurant across from the Washington Monument unremarkable?

Therein lies the true beauty of American culture: it absorbs, it subsumes, it digests all which is great in every other culture it comes in contact with while politely leaving all the cruft and baggage behind. If something doesn't work, it doesn't last. We try on parts of other cultures, and if we like it, it goes in our wardrobe with everything else. And if an idea is too stuffy and uncomfortable we trash it, or snip and tailor it to something better. Nothing is sacred except the freedom that allows us to live like this, the freedom to foist crap like Baywatch on an unsuspecting world, the freedom to idealize high-powered litigation lawyers, half-naked slut starlets and high-school dropout billionaires with the same aplomb.

But drawbacks to our dog-eat-dog world of material wealth and consumption is obvious through travel. In Europe you'll marvel at how elegant, playful, sexy, and approachable their women are. You'll be confused that a mixed group of guys and girls at a club will openly welcome you to join them in partying festivities instead of interrogating you about who you work for or what your political affiliation is. You'll be delighted by the awesome, historical architecture; mesmerized by wandering alleys with cool, hidden retail and commercial corners; smitten with the laid-back attitude and sexually cavalier lifestyle. You finally ask yourself: "Why the fuck do I live in America when I can have all this?!?" Tacos and Thai, or hot Danish girls that make all your sexual dreams come true?

Then all of a sudden it's not just France and the contemptuous Frenchman. You need to find a working ATM? Oh shitâ€"the nearest one is in Buda, and you're across the Danube in Pest. You're craving mac and cheese? Too badâ€"every restaurant in Prague has only one item on its menu: slop. You need a toothbrush, rubbers, and detergent at 4AM? Fuck youâ€"there is no 24-hour CVS in Barcelona. Want a quick meal and drink under $10? Eat shitâ€"literally, in London for $25. And there, in London, you realize how great this country is. Except for the Danish girls, it just doesnâ€™t get any better.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

I Got The Hives

March 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The goal of this post is to make you feel better about your life.

My doctor prescribed me the antibiotic cefdinir because I was having sinus issues. On the eighth day of a ten day treatment, my body got itchy in multiple places at the same time. I wrote it off as crabs (the sexual kind), but the next day it got much worse. Globs of raised red skin with the itching power of a million mosquitoes moved through my body like plucky terrorist fighters. When they attack my face, I look like a burn victim. Then they go hide in their sophisticated cave system, regroup, and come out later to attack again in different places… twenty-four hours a day, for the past nine fucking days. From a skin perspective, these have been the worst of my life—and I've had some bad pizza-face breakouts in my day. The first couple of days were so bad that I had a scratch queue where I had to prioritize which area got attention first (balls). Anti-histamines and cortisone creams have done little. Here's how my back looked on day two:

You're probably wondering what that patch of hair is. Sometimes I think it's the result of a secret government experiment (my bet is on the fluorine), though I can't say for sure. But I do know that it is growing in size and thickness.

Anyway, my doctor said my hives would go away in 2-10 days. The welts aren't as bad this week but the quality of my life just isn't what it used to be—to play with myself I have to carefully time it between hive episodes. I did some googling and turns out that for some people hives stay with them for over 20 years. Since this is day nine for me, I'm happy they will suddenly disappear tomorrow, just in time for the weekend!

Fresh Meat

March 29, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I noticed three new DC blogs that linked to me. Figuring they must have an awesome sense of humor for doing so, I checked them out for a couple weeks.

Just Going With It

> One-night stand no. 5 or 6: We were fooling around, clothes were coming off, so I naturally assumed that sex was pending. “Let’s save that,” he said. Whoa. A gentlemanly one-night stand. Unheard of. I was disappointed, but kind of flattered. Maybe this guy isn’t for the use ‘em and lose ‘em category. So we went to bed spooning. I was the little spoon. The little spoon with my bare ass against his big spoon. I felt a poke. Oh, I guess we’re not “waiting.” Wait a second … Is he … “Um, I don’t really feel comfortable doing that,” I said. His response: “OK, let’s just do it normal.”

That’s What She Said

> i’m starting to get a little bit distressed about my tendency to black out every friday and saturday night. not only do i lose things (like my gov’t issued blackberry which i am going to have to PAY for) but i have absolutely no recollection of large chunks of time where i interact with people, go places, do things, etc.

The two girl bloggers above are friends and seem to black out often. I wouldn’t classify them as trainwrecks yet but the potential is there.

Something Catchier

> Have you ever drank Aquafina water? If you haven’t you should. And then tell me if you think they carbonate their water. They advertise their water as “uncarbonated water.” It does not appear to have any bubbles or carbonation when you buy it or even when it is unopened, but as soon as you open the bottle, chug a few sips, and put the cap back on. Surprise, surprise! BUBBLES!

This girl seems more balanced. When I read her I don’t think, “Oh man she is so getting date raped.”

With these three girls the DC blog scene will once again see its heyday of early 2006.

Goodbye Corporate Grind

March 29, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

By the time you are reading this, I have submitted my resignation letter to my master at work. I probably did it at around 10:45am, the time I usually stumble in. Two weeks of coasting and I'm out.

I'm moving in with my Dad tomorrow. I'm going to be there for about three months to wrap up my book and prepare for something I've been thinking about for almost two years now.

I do not have another job lined up nor am I looking for another job.

New Blog

March 31, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Now that I'm all big and stuff, I can take more risk and push projects that would have otherwise ruined my reputation. No one has ever attempted what I'm about to attempt—it's just so different and cutting-edge. Without further delay:

Puppy Dogs & Ice Cream

RooshV.com will only be updated once a week so that my creative energies ensure the inevitable success of Puppy Dogs & Ice Cream. For media inquiries, please email me.

April Fools!

April 1, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I thought PD&I.com would be an obvious April Fools Joke, but judging by the amount of "Are you serious?" emails I received, I guess not!

The phrase 'puppy dogs and ice cream' is from the movie Swingers.

> You take yourself out of the game, you start talking about puppy dogs and ice cream and of course it's going to end up on the friendship tip.

So true.

Solutions

April 2, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have been told that I don't bring any solutions to the modern dating problem, that I just bitch and complain. The reason is because I'm pessimistic the course we're on can be reversed within our lifetimes. But I do think about it.

Before I present my solutions to the problems of modern dating, we need to imagine a world where these problems don't exist.

Roosh's Dating Utopia: I want to be able to go to a leisure venue and be a man (approach) until I find a girl that I connect with. This girl will be open, affectionate, and willing to put in 50% of the effort. She will possess a healthy personality that places more value on life and pleasure than appearances and material gain. She will not have insecurities that make connecting with her on a deep level to be an impossible, teeth-pulling task. She will be sexually secure, emotionally secure, self-aware, and have a willingness to enter relationships without concern or fear for how they will end. She will live in the moment based on feeling and state instead of social norms and preconceived notions. She will not only hit my physical buttons but my emotional buttons as well, providing with me a state of mind that I cannot achieve on my own.

The American way-of-life makes the dating utopia an impossible achievement. Women fail to learn how to treat a stable and secure man, resigning him to a life of sport fucking without the strong pair-bonding that previous generations have enjoyed. That last sentence is critical: the reason I do not get into relationships is because—other than sex—relationships with the girls I meet do not give me anything I can't get through on-and-off, low-commitment dating. It's not the sex that leads to an end of these three-date relationships, it's the girl's inability to provide the man with anything more.

I believe that women should get most of the blame because they are the gatekeepers—they determine the rules of engagement and construct the dynamic that men respond to. They are the ones who have created the modern man through a basic system of reward (sex) and punishment (no sex). A man's game and behavior is in response to women he interacts with. I do a certain move or behavior not because I was born with it, but because I learned it through experience as an adult. Since we are products of our environment, to solve the dating problem we need to re-engineer the woman by changing her environment, one that she has accepted without protest.

Solution No. 1: Regress to a society based on satisfying needs instead of consuming wants. Capitalism has created a disposable mindset that women have adopted into their relationships. "I'm just going to test this one out to see if it is perfect for me. I'm not going to get attached because maybe I'll want to try something else." Are we talking about shoes or men? Unless they become gluttons for disappointment, men have no choice but to return the treatment in kind, icing the dynamic for both sexes.

Solution No. 2: Other than giving women the right to vote and protecting them from abuse, stop teaching feminism, an ideology that will soon join communism in the history books as a nostalgic failure. Women were tricked by their man-hating, eternally single idols that in order to be treated better by men, they had to treat them worse. The strong man and submissive woman role that has worked for hundreds of thousands of years (the proof is your very existence) has been reassigned in a continuing experiment that goes against genetic roles and behaviors. Feminism is great for empowering women to spend most of their lives working in office buildings, but terrible at training them how to be good wives and mothers.

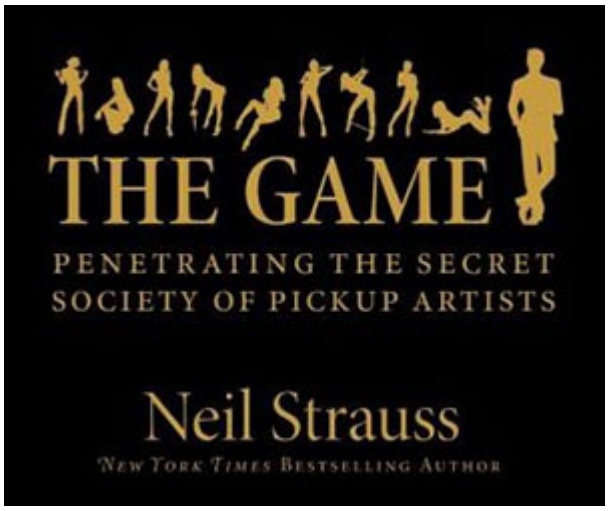
Solution No. 3: Stop destroying the middle class. The government's complicit destruction of America's manufacturing sector and drive towards globalization (i.e. imperial profit) has made it impossible for a man to raise a family on one income—to take on a role that creates stable households and balanced women who do not starve for attention and validation. The necessity for women to enter the workforce creates a lack of adult supervision in a home where two-hundred channels creates generation after generation of ADD-saddled zombie American girls who believe pleasure can only be derived from drug substances, merchandise, and wealth, not commitment, work, sacrifice, and effort. These young girls grow up with beliefs that poison male-female relations. It doesn't help that the continuing shift of power from people to corporations and the government-led drive to foster voter apathy through secrecy and hypocrisy has created a neurotic, debt-burdened middle class that only looks forward to consuming products and obsessing over trainwreck celebrities. Girls grow up part valley-girl and part entitled princess, with a bunch of other stuff filled in with whatever's hot in the glossy magazines

That's how you do it. That's how you create women who are capable of making a man happy, who will in turn makes her happy. That's how you reverse the climbing age of marriage. That's how you make human beings who are capable of being in an intense, fulfilling relationship for longer than three ~~years~~ ~~months~~ weeks. But no one wants to hear it because the solution doesn't come packaged in a pill or magic diet where you can still eat all the desert you want. And no woman wants to stay home and fix buttons when she can spend money pretending to be like the one-dimensional soulless hacks she sees on television. We all reap the costs of her lifestyle.

Not all hope is lost for the American man. There are still countries in the world where the above conditions I propose still hold, where a women still values a man and understands how to serve his needs like she should. It's our job, our duty, to get that first-hand experience to see and feel how different things can really be. No flashing cash and no flashing passports: if you worked to build yourself up to the man that you should be, all you have to do is show up. In the end there are going to be two types of men in this country. The first settles for a typical American woman who complains about his hair on the soap bar even though she resembles her mother—twenty years early. The second is the eternal bachelor, love and companion-starved, lamenting that his genes will not be passed on.

Both lose.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Big Daddy's Sports Club

April 3, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I got the call from Virgle Kent on Saturday afternoon.

"Hey I'm thinking of calling an audible today. My boy is having a big party in Richmond."

"Richmond? You mean that place past Kings Dominion?" I said. "That's far as hell."

"Yeah but there are going to be a lot of sluts."

"I've always wanted to go to Richmond. This would be a good opportunity."

A two-and-a-half hour drive later and we are in some guy's house with sorority girls who are diggin' the vibe that my 100% Huggable Care Bear shirt was putting out. Except for the token fatty who pretended she was hot, the girls were thin, friendly, and cute. I was going to find love that night, but then VK had to tell me all about how his fraternity brothers ravaged their every hole back in the day. Once a mental picture is planted, like for instance me telling all the girls reading this to imagine me hitting it raw from the back in 1-3 minutes of the most intense pleasure you could ever imagine, it's really hard to get it out of your head.

We end up at Big Daddy's Sports Club, which I was told is the only good club in Richmond. Considering it is a cheesy Tequila Beach clone, I started to understand why VK suggested I hype up my DC background, a nightlife paradise compared to the dive bar dreck Richmond has to offer.

Big Daddy's is the whitest place I've ever been to in my life. Other than one staff member, VK was the only black guy there. Let's just say that if you want to ensure a homogeneous crowd, enforce a "collared shirts only" dresscode for men. The only reason me and Tenderheart Bear got in is because ~~of my social engineering skills~~ I wasn't black. If you don't account for fake tans, I was the second darkest person there. If you don't account for the sheep dog that made a brief appearance, I was the hairiest living organism present.

I don't like American girls, but if they are like the girls in that Richmond club, I can get used to them fast. There were two Sienna Miller clones, one Kim Smith clone, and several blondes that registered in the 8 and 9 range. With so much competition, you notice the difference in attitude. For example, if I'm stationary in a bar and there is a moving target, I usually yell "Hey" and then go into my opener. In DC I have to be halfway through it before the girl actually stops (if she does), but in Richmond they usually stopped on the "Hey"—and these girls were hotter. Is it easier to get laid there? I don't know. But I did feel more comfortable being treated nicely.

I like to say that if you can game in DC, you can game anywhere. I know I haven't stayed in cities long enough to be certain about their girl population, but other than New York, I haven't been to a city that gave me a deja-vu feeling. All these techniques I learned to deal with unapproachable or frigid girls are totally unnecessary when I go elsewhere. Some players will live and die never needing the things I and others here had to learn.

The club closed a little early at 2AM. With just a little bit more time I'm sure I would have landed that motel room venue change with the two married chicks, but alas, I ended up throwing hail mary's on the street while my wingman was engaged in expected drama with the college ex.

I was bullshiting with a couple random girls when I heard some guy yellling close to me. I turned around towards the source of the noise, and there was a guy looking at me and all I could make out was "…fucking knock you out!" I've never seen him before in life.

"Well that's not real friendly," was the first thing to come out of my mouth.

Then this neckless, swollen man pushes my chest and next thing I know there are five meatheads encircling me ready to give me an unforgettable beating. Back where I come from, you usually get warnings before a situation escalates into physical violence. If you are hitting on some guy's girl, maybe he will put his arm around her or physically block access to her. Or he'll say, "Bro, she's with me." Or he'll just pull her away. There are a lot of things that happen before the "I'm going to knock you out" comes out. These Richmond guys weren't playing by the rules, damn it. I got pulled out of there by one of our crew members and decided to call it a night before I ended up hurting someone.

I'm not sure if the people at Big Daddy's are representative of Richmond or the South, but even if it's as much as 20% worse, the vibe, attitude, and quality of the girls at this one club blows away anywhere else in DC. And most of these girls were in sororities, a subpopulation that is composed the shallowest and snobbiest women in the world. I don't know if I'll make it to Richmond anytime soon, but it does get me curious about what else the South has to offer.

Part II: Richmond pictures

Newsletter No. 4

April 3, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This month’s edition will be about the most brutal and effective cockblock a girl has ever served to me, and how it can be repackaged for our own use. If you are not already on the list, sign up is on the top right. It will be sent this weekend.

Richmond Pictures

April 4, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Continued from Big Daddy's Sports Club.

This first picture was taken from the second level of Big Daddy's. All the way up towards the roof are two planks where bouncers help hired club girls on and off from the swings. They get lowered down and swing back and forth in random patterns while everyone on the main floor stops what they are doing to watch (to make sure they don't get landed on, perhaps). In terms of skill, if walking and chewing gum is a 0 and making the space shuttle disappear is a 10, their performance would rate a 1. (One point has been added for their attractive appearance).

Check out the Sienna Miller clone second-to-left. I was talking to this group when Sienna Miller blurted, "Someone take a picture of me!" Yes, m'aam! I told her about the resemblance in an indirect way because I didn't want to blow her head up even further. "You kinda look like that girl in Alfie," I said. Like most people, she didn't see the movie. She may live her entire life not knowing she looks like Sienna Miller. It was talking this group that almost got me beat up.

If you haven't figured it out yet, I have a thing for Sienna Miller. Even though I would cream my pants if she touched me with intimate intent, I'm confident I have the skill to still run tight game on her if I so happened to run into her at Dragonfly. But even though Sienna Miller was in the house, I was more interested in another girl who looked nothing the ones in my masturbation fantasies.

These two girls were the married chicks. The white girl on the right is natural-born-cockblocker with a grating personality and aggressive attitude. She is the type that goes around asking random guys to buy her drinks. I liked her exotic friend instead (no, she's not Indian). She had many piercings and tattoos but was just so nice and sweet—the dichotomy made me lust for her. I won over the white witch eventually but it all proved to be for naught when the husbands rolled by to pick them up.

Back at the house, I entertained myself by throwing an American football up and down and gripping it really hard-like. On the hidden couch to the left was a passed-out girl who for some reason drank more than she can handle.

When the party ends and you look around and don't see any prospects who are conscious, your goal becomes about sobering up and figuring out how you are going to get home. This wasn't the case for VK because the girl on his left was not only conscious but unlikely to puke. In this house lived a couple heterosexual guys in their early-twenties, but I still can't figure out why there is a sexy picture of a man posted on the refrigerator. An inside joke, I hope.

Deal Breakers

April 5, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The NY Times has an article about deal breakers, qualities a potential mate has that would disqualify him or her from future consideration.

First, take a look at the picture of the really awkward looking man holding the stuffed seal. Do you want to know what he does for a living? He writes dating advice. And you wonder why we're having problems.

The article gives several examples of deal breakers, mostly of women dumping men. In this female deal breaker rundown, I'm only counting things the article mentioned as a confirmed deal breaker and not something that is simply disliked.

> 1. "I take her to my apartment, go into the bedroom, and fling back the sheets, and she said, 'My husband had these sheets and he was a mean-hearted son of a bitch and you must be like him and I'm leaving.'"
>
> 2. "He didn't even seem sorry that he lived in a 12-year-old boy's room, this was like normal behavior. It said to me, this person is not grown up yet. It was frightening. He's lived his whole life in the attic."
>
> 3. "He was very cute, but then I realized he was totally unsuccessful."
>
> 4. "I can't sit in a room with overhead lighting...It makes me feel like I'm in a police interrogation room. I believe in lamps that are casting warm glows, and anyone that doesn't understand that, I can't be in their house, men or women."

The only deal breaker anyone should have is HIV. That's it. Even if a girl tells me she has HPV or herpes, I would do a detailed cost-benefit analysis before making a decision. The deal breaker is a concept most likely to be held by picky, neurotic women who are single and over 25 years old. I've never heard a man use this term before. Having automatic responses to small behaviors or situations ("His toilet was kinda dirty!") is a sign that you are not ready for adult relationships.

The irony in all this is that a woman's propensity to have deal breakers is correlated to her increasing infertility. The older she gets, the more likely things like ear hair make the list (I got plenty of ear hair—my loss I guess!). Her inability to connect the dots will ensure her genes are weeded out, which means the deal breaker term will disappear in one generation.

Comment Registration

April 7, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Requiring registration to comment is working well so I'm keeping it (background).

When you register, the software sends you a random password. I recommend the first thing you do when you log in is to change it. To do that, click on your username above the comment box:

Type in your new password on the bottom right. If you have a blog, enter the URL in the Website field. If you get tired of your display name, you can save a new nickname and then select it in the drop-down box.

Click for big

The other fields are pretty useless since they are only visible to me. I don't think it needs to be said but your email address will not be sold or distributed.

Blogger Love

April 8, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I gotta give a shout-out to I Now Pronounce You. After Saturday night, all I can say is that he is a white man you need to party with. At the next happy hour, look for the really tall dude.

God Knows Where My Taxes Should Go

April 8, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I visited my old job recently. My former coworkers welcomed me back and asked what I was up to. I told them I'm in the process of quitting my current job, the one I left them for.

A girl I didn't like working with said, "Wait what are you going to do about health insurance?" She works in the science field but doesn't believe in evolution because it conflicts with her evangelical beliefs.

"Well I'm not going to have health insurance," I said.

"Oh great, now if you get injured my taxes are going to pay for you."

God I hate that bitch.

I've met a couple smart conservatives, but I've never met a smart religious conservative. They are like kids who repeat what they hear from their authority figures. Yes, God is really pissed that 0.05% of your taxes are going to someone who broke their leg and can't afford to fix it. He's enraged that an illegal immigrant is using the emergency room to treat Lupe and her 103 degree fever. He's going to send a lighting bolt down to the mother getting welfare because she just can't seem to stop making babies. That's because the real God is one that feels capitalism's idea of individualism is far superior to a concept of society where we have to pay for people who are just too ignorant to go to a four-year university and get a "real" job. God wants you off the government's teet.

I know where God wants my taxes to go: he wants it to go into my protection. He wants it to go to law enforcement to continue the war on drugs (a war we are about to win). He wants more cops on the street to stop crime for good. He also believes in speed traps and parking tickets because they save lives. But he wants most of my tax money going to the Pentagon to protect me from Muslim terrorists who are jealous of my way of life. They wish they had Uggs, traffic, monster thickburgers, tanning salons, and Botox. The Muslim extremists who we used to call freedom fighters are terrorizing us because they want to be us. We can't let them take away our iPods! And I know this is what God wants because everyone else who believes in God never complains about law enforcement or military spending.

I used to browse through motorcycle forums back when I had one, where a common topic was helmet laws. The pro-helmet law people used an argument that went something like this: "If you get into an accident without a helmet, your health care bills will be more expensive and my insurance will be higher." You want to guess how much motorcycle insurance went down once states implemented a helmet law? Hint: it's the same amount that your credit card fees and interest rates went down after the new bankruptcy law was signed. People who have a master-servant mentality, like most bible thumpers, hate it when others are not doing what they think is best, since they themselves cannot live without rules, structure, and guidance. Tell me how to live and tell me want to think so then I can tell other people how to live and what to think.

As for my former coworker, I didn’t bother to argue with her because she is having trouble finding a husband. There is no punishment greater for a woman than a life alone—so I win!

My SAT Score

April 9, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Photo Credit

Back in my day, the most you could get on the SAT was a 1600 (it's 2400 now), and something like 1300 was considered to be a really good score where I came from. I knew I was going to the University of Maryland and only needed an 1100, so I bought a book that had ten sample exams, took three of them, and deemed myself ready. I got an 1140—mission accomplished! I believe I would have done better had there not been harsh overhead lighting. The breakdown:

Math: 670
Verbal: 470 (national average is 500)

I'm glad I didn't get something like a 1480 because I would always question whether I'm living up to my SAT potential. When you get a verbal score like mine, just being able to finish a book and understand the big words means you're doing pretty incredible. I have made big success in life!

Same Thing

April 10, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I don't get why a girl would go out knowing she will have on the same clothing or accessories as other girls her age. I freak out when I'm wearing the same t-shirt as another guy, but if you go into any club you'll see at least ten girls with the same purse. And they don't seem to mind one bit.

A few months ago I went to Atlantic City and brought along this cheap Old Navy thermal with an eagle design on the front (it seemed so stylish when I bought it). I was wearing it in the Trump Taj Mahal when I saw him: a short, ugly 60-year-old Asian man wearing the exact same shirt. Fuck! I'm not one to get embarrassed easily, but it was the most embarrassing moment of my life. I pretended I was scratching my chest to cover up the design until the Asian man went back to play Pai Gow. For the rest of the trip, I was confused about my identity.

Same clothing sightings bring up the loser question: if he's a loser and paid money for the same shirt that I'm wearing, what does that say about me? Replace shirts with women and you get the same problem, like this one girl I dated for a while who I've seen with nothing but losers. Sure I'm the exception, but seriously, the Senator? With so many clothing options out there in the world, you are a failure as a individual if you are wearing the same things that most other people have. I'm not saying you need to stand out, but can you girls stop sucking Coach/DD/LV's dick for one minute? Can you white people stop giving North Face 100% market saturation for their cheaply made vests?

I can't do anything about my ex's, but I have solved the same-shirt problem: I only shop at Lord & Taylor. None of my peers would dare step into that store. Problem solved!

Maybe Date Rape Does Happen

April 11, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A man takes a Russian girl named Tatiana out on a bar date. She's having "a really great time" with "good body language." All signs point towards him getting laid, to hearing loud cries of "Da" as petite Tatiana reaches sexual climax. Then she goes to the bathroom. To empty her bladder? Maybe—but most likely to fix herself up for the guy she's about to have intimacy with. While she's gone, guess what he does.

He slips a drug in her drink.

The bartenders see it, take back the drink, and catch up with her outside while she's having a smoke. While they are telling her about what happened, another bartender sees the guy do it again. I don't know if I'm more mad at him for trying to drug his date or for just being so sloppy.

This is how I would do it: I would be sitting next to her, talking, and then tell her to "look over there." She'd look and then I would drop the pill in her drink while making a "BOOP" sound effect. Then when she turns back, I would stare at the ceiling like I saw a bird, and urge her to drink quickly before all the ice melts. I predict a 100% success rate.

> Last Tuesday, Judge Bouliane sentenced [Tatiana's date], who had no prior criminal history, to one year in jail but suspended six months of that. Szlamnik entered jail voluntarily in January after agreeing to plead guilty to transporting and furnishing a narcotic rather than to a crime directly related to a planned sexual assault. He is due to be released in May.
>
> Date in jail for drugging beer

If the energy this guy spent obtaining pills and figuring how to deliver them was put into teasing, telling stories, and making a good effort to venue change to his place, sex would have probably happened. Now instead of pounding a hot Russian girl, he's in jail getting pounded on by large black men. Game, not drugs.

Previously: Date Rape Druggings Are A Myth

Present Factoids That Counter Thesis

April 12, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I know I told you I'm not going to give you another book update, but I lied.

I have edited 142 of 193 pages. Once this is in book format, I'm guessing it will be around 125 pages. Here is how the chapters are looking:

> Introduction 1
> Pre-game 5
> Internal Game 7
> Early Game 19
> Middle Game 104
> Late Game 142
> End Game 168
> Appendix 171

If you are wondering why early game is so big, I'm going to guess you are a girl. Early game is, by far, the hardest part of game. The next two weeks may be slow as I wrap up the editing process.

Today is my last day of work (for a long time, I hope). In the next week or so I'm going to talk about what I will be doing for the next year or two, why I'm doing it, and what I had to do to get here.

Some site news: I'm rolling in advertisements, similar to what you see on DCB (example page). I'll try not to make them too annoying. There are also text link ads on the right which have been up for a month now.

I leave you with this graphic. It shows the life cycle of comments to a typical blog post.

> Comment no. 5: Devolve into irrelevant threads
> Comment no. 9: Impugn character of thesis author

I always find it interesting how just one comment can hijack a thread and take it down a strange path.

Before Sex, After Sex

April 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On the surface, it looks like sex ruins things—the dynamic changes, the energy dissipates, and the tension disappears. Sometimes the relationship lasts, but most of the time, it doesn't.

Before sex, it's all about showing up on time and smelling nice. The sexual tension does the rest. It helps you idealize your partner to keep you motivated and on task. I can't be the only guy to think I'm falling in love with a girl only to lose all interest after I catch my breath. While this tension will never be as high as the moment before that first penetration, it can be maintained at a healthy level with spontaneity, unpredictability, and creativity—qualities that only come as a result of effort.

Effort. I think this culture used to be about putting in effort and hard-work back when our parents were coming up, but it's been replaced with expectation. All of us are trained to expect things. We expect to afford a nice car and house for going to college. We expect to be entertained every day . We expect the dead person to be scraped off the road in a timely manner so that we can make yoga class. The problem with expectation is that it leads to entitlement, and entitlement leads to a lack of effort. If both of you are not putting in more effort after sex, things will fade out.

The big issue with out generation is not with getting laid (we're in a golden era for that), but with what we believe a relationship should be. He believes beauty queens should fall from the sky if he is earning six figures and she believes Prince Charming and Funny and Ambitious should sweep her into a McMansion because she is well-read and has pretty nails. "I put in this work to get where I am, so I am entitled to an amazing partner for life. I shouldn't have to do more." It doesn't work like that. Guys: you are going to have to bring more to the table than flashing your extra glossy business card and offering to take girls to expensive dinners. Girls: it's going to take more than just looking pretty and sending text messages.

People want the best without putting in work, without sacrificing, without caring. We expect to get more than we are putting in, but ask anyone in a happy marriage how it's really done and they will tell you it's all about the effort. You have to care and you have to try, every single day. Good luck finding someone here under the age of 30 who understands that concept. Instead of working towards real change to increase their value, most twenty-somethings instead whine about how life isn't fair and how bad their luck is, as if there is a concerted effort by the overlords of our universe to keep them single and unhappy. You are responsible for your romantic happiness, and no one else. If there is a problem then get off your ass and do something about it, no matter how many years it takes to solve.

But even if you are willing to put in that effort, there is no guarantee you will get back it in return. The expectation mindset is so perverse and widespread in this country that you will quickly get frustrated at the inability of your romantic interests to put in an amount of work you think is necessary for something to last. It looks like we've gotten to the point where modern dating is about experiencing a lot of disappointment until you finally run into someone who gives a damn and shows it.

Rehab Happy Hour

April 16, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Photo credit

Who: Arjewtino, KassyK, Virgle Kent, me

When: Friday, April 20 @ 7PM

Where: Mezza Luna (two doors down from Science Club)

Technically, I'm not a host this time. I tried to suggest Front Page again but I was pushed aside by the other members of the hosting committee. "We'll let you know what we decide and then you can post about it on your blog there," they said. Little do they know that I control the entire DC metropolitan blog scene.

La Dolce Vita

April 17, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

> Don’t think that safety is being locked up in one’s home. Don’t do what I did. I’m too serious to be an amateur, but not enough to be a professional. A more miserable life is better, believe me, than an existence protected by an organized society where everything is calculated, everything is perfect.
>
> Steiner (Alain Cuny)

La Dolce Vita is a movie that follows Marcello, a gossip rag writer who lives a fast-paced life off Via Venito in Rome. He has a pretty girlfriend, interesting friends, access to beautiful women, a decent job, and a dream of being a respected writer. “Now that’s the lifestyle I wouldn’t mind living,” I thought, halfway through the movie.

But things weren’t so great beneath the surface. His relationship with his smothering girlfriend was draining him, most of his friends were vapid parasites, the beautiful women had nothing to offer him but their beauty, and his job was wholly unfulfilling. And when his most respected friend—the only person who was in the position to help him—committed suicide, Marcello simply gave up and became the type of upper-class garbage that he wrote about, defeated by bitterness and cynicism.

This movie does not tie things up for you in a neat little package. It does not tell you what the sweet life is, what is right or wrong, and who is good or bad, but it does make you think about your own life. Am I living the life that I want? Is chasing my dream going to be worth it? Does it even matter if I reach success, whatever that is? Like life, the movie does not provide you with clear answers.

What did it mean when Steiner, the most successful character in the movie, kills himself and his children? Then I read that quote up top again. While the movie had many themes,

I think the main one is entrapment. The main characters are trapped in some way by their desires or their lot, unable or unwilling to get out. So the sweet life is about being free? That's part of it, but sweetness for me will not be sweetness for you. It's the freedom to go for long-term meaning instead of short-term thrills, of not letting yourself to be held back, and of avoiding comfort. It's the opposite of how most of us are living now, and this movie was made nearly fifty years ago. I suppose that makes sense because the human condition does not change.

Marcello thought being a respected writer would make his life better, but it's really the attempt, trying to be something, that would have made the difference in his life. He was looking at the end result, comparing himself to other people, when he missed out on the journey to becoming one, the most important sort of travel that a human can make.

Virginia Tech Killings

April 17, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When something like this happens you want to get on your soapbox and talk about guns, war, culture, and violence. But don’t use these victims to push your politics.

Back in November an acquaintance of mine died in a car accident when she got rear-ended. This is what I wrote.

VK today had some thoughts about death. Brunch Bird gives her respects. And so does RCR, mm, and Jo.

Keep Getting Phone Numbers

April 18, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In the first newsletter I sent out, I wrote about getting phone numbers from girls. An excerpt:

> When it's time to say goodbye and you've exhausted your options to take the conversation somewhere else, you want to give the girl an opportunity to show interest and offer her number before you have to do it. You do this by ending the conversation with "It was really nice meeting you" and shutting up. If she does like you, she will squirm and get anxious, and probably make a move. If she doesn't offer the number outright she may compliment you to encourage you to get it. And even if she doesn't make any move, you can still get the number if you want. Your options remain open.

The rest of what I wrote was pretty down on getting numbers. I painted it as a consolation prize for not fucking her. You came, you tried, here is a sequence of ten numerals for your troubles that odds are will not result in anything. But even though numbers are not strong, you still must get them every time. I don't care if you've only been talking to a girl for one minute when her friend starts dragging her away—get the number. As long as you want to fuck her, get the number, no exceptions.

Say you are an average player and have a great month where you get ten numbers. Out of those ten, about four will return your first call (if you are really good, you may hit eight callbacks.) Out of those four, you may get two or three girls out on a first date. Out of those two or three first dates you will probably get one notch if your middle and late game is good. So if you are average, it takes you ten numbers to one notch. And when I say average I mean to say that you actually have game and some alpha qualities. Do you now see why it's important to get numbers? Behind every number is a chance for a notch. In my scenario there is a 10% chance, but even if you have zero game and there is a 1% chance that the number will lead to sex, it's still worth it.

If you are still not convinced…

1. Calling girls takes very little time. You call her up, leave a message, and if she calls back, you spend 5-10 minutes talking to her. There is also a low opportunity cost because there are not many ways talking to a girl for five minutes on an off night could be better spent. But if you are at a club for three hours on a typical Saturday night, and you talk to a girl for one hour who turns out to be married, you just cost yourself 33% of very valuable approach time.

2. It tightens your phone game. Ask any girl about some of the things guys have done when it comes to the phone and you will see why it is a skill you must master. Go out there, collect dozens of phone numbers over the course of six months, and just get your phone game up to a respectable level. There is an optimal way to work the phone and unless you start using your experience now to improve with girls you have average interest in, you will cost yourself some more important notches down the road. You don't want to be calling your dream girl without any clue of what to do or say.

Even now, when I'm out there I still get phone numbers of girls I'm not crazy about. I'm playing the game, not trying to get married. Plus unless you keep your game in practice, it will atrophy. Ask any guy who's in a relationship if you don't believe me. If she doesn't call me back then that's fine, no loss, but if she does then I'm going to get her out somewhere and take one of my Durex Extra Sensitive condoms along for the ride. At long as this girl is cute doesn't and fuck up my CPN, I'm down. And who knows, maybe I'll find out she's a special little snowflake.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

Pick-Up Lines For Girls

April 19, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm hesitant to advise girls to approach men. I think it's a man job and while not always the case, if a girl approaches a man chances are he can do better. This is especially true if she's approaching you solely based on your looks. There are other prettier girls you could manage to get if you just did a little bit more work. That said, if a cute girl approaches me and I'm feeling too cool for school, I will be more than happy to entertain her interest by trying to get into her pants the same night.

Check out 10 Friendly Pickup Lines For Girls. It is written by a "dating coach." As a man that has been desired by at least one woman, I feel like I am qualified to analyze these openers.

Openers That Simply Won't Work

"Don't you think Batman's cooler than Superman because he doesn't have super-powers to fall back on?" Creative but lame. It seems like she is trying too hard. The best type of opener is one that starts a conversation but is so simple that it seems like you just thought of it.

"You've got an iPod. Should I get the Nano or the 30 gig?" How about neither? If you are going to pander then why don't you just ask him who won last night's basketball game instead.

"This new Snickers bar is fabulous. You've got to try it." This is an insult. Do I look like a person who eats Snickers bars? Besides, the peanuts will flare up the hives that have been with me for exactly four weeks and three days, even though I'm not allergic to peanuts.

Openers That May Work

"Hi." Hi.

"Do you think that couple over there is on their first date, or what?" This is a good question/routine for when you are already in conversation, but as an opener it seems weird. It would be better if you frame it as a bet: "Me and my girlfriend have a bet about whether that couple is…"

"That's a cool pocket-watch. Where'd you get it?" Well my dad fought this war, right. During the war he stored this watch in his ass so that he wouldn't lose it. It has a lot of sentimental value. Hey, where are you goi…

"So, what are you doing here?" This isn't a bad opener because a guy can answer in a lot of different ways depending on his mood. From the "Drinking away my unhappiness" to the "What are YOU doing here?" to the "Trying to get laid, duh." But it's a bit too open-ended and a girl will end up getting "not much" as a typical answer.

Openers That Work

"Can you close my bracelet for me? Can you help with this crossword puzzle answer?"

Openers asking for help are very good. Everyone wants to be a hero. My street game opening strategy is also asking for help because that's the best way to get a girl to stop walking.

"Can I sit with you so I won't get hit on?" She's asking you if she can use your man power to protect her from other horny losers. Men like taking on the role as protector.

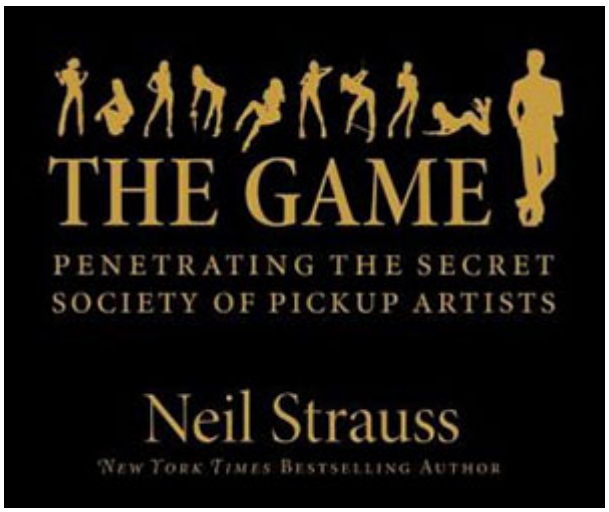
"I never do this, but I think you're cute and I got tired of waiting for you to talk to me." This is a bold approach and only confident girls can pull this off. It's very good because it calls out the guy for being a beta, and he's forced to scramble and explain why he's sitting on his hands. He will overcompensate by showing that he is a strong man capable of pursuing, which is what you wanted him to do all along.

A common girl line that wasn't mentioned in this article is, "Do I know you from somewhere?" It's cliche but very effective because by the time you realize that you don't really know each other, you are already in a conversation and have identified a couple things you have in common.

After you approach a guy, make sure he takes over and leads the interaction. If he remains passive and you have to hold his hand to keep the conversation going, he is a man who will disappoint you sooner than later.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.



I’m Done, For Now

April 19, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s amazing how productive you can be without having a job, even if you like waking up at 11. Yesterday I finished the second draft and copies will be bound and shipped to my editors after I wake up (is it 11 yet?). It has taken six months to get to this point, more than 200 hours of work. Just to give you an idea of the hardcore-ness…

I will be drinking heavily tonight to celebrate this milestone, and open to being taken advantage of.

Three Words Recap

April 22, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Arjewtino – stop touching me
Average Jane – loves the commenters
Boztopia – hair getting shorter
Brunch Bird – heard another rumor
Candy Sandwich – little bit Italian
Circle V – hurry up already Dagny T – i'm still taller et cetera – i hear laughing
Genevieve – new lip ring
Heather B – new york state?
I Now Pronounce You – soco and lime
Irina – past life girlfriend
Jay Gatsy – old people's starbucks
Jewcano – real motorcycle jacket
Jo – sweet sweet voice
Just Going With It – definitely not russian KassyK – such graceful posture
Kayla – not a stripper
LMNTal – will be back
Mandy – i can tell
MM – most sober one
Pat – reasonable and pragmatic
Roissy – the hottest sideburns
Tex Pundit – The Persian Rug
That's What She Said – with some dude
Virgle Kent – sister is hizzot
Work in Blogress – exchanged three sentences

…and assorted friends, coworkers, and commenters. Turnout was much bigger than last time for some reason.

Alpha Male Of The Month

April 22, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I need to get more emails like this:

> I was flirting with this real cute girl last night. Everything's going great, so i say, "you seem like the kind of girl who's a lot of fun… blah blah… you want to grab a drink sometime?" Her response? no bullshit—"that can be arranged." I immediately thought about your recent post on this issue, and gave her a quick 2 minute verbal lashing asking her why she's treating me like a fucking business transaction, and why it would have been so goddam difficult for her to say simply, "yes, i'd love to." Dude i was seething inside, i rarely get pissed when i'm running game and know better than to pick fights or scold girls, but this one just had it coming. Told her to beat it, popped a pill and continued hanging with my boys, who were a thousand times more entertaining than the remaining fat girls within eyesight.

I don't care what the frigid women apologists say, but this girl's behavior is neither normal nor acceptable. Men with options don't have to put up with it.

So I’m Leaving

April 23, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Margarita Island, Venezuela

> The cowardly belief that a person must stay in one place is too reminiscent of the unquestioning resignation of animals, beasts of burden stupefied by servitude and yet always willing to accept the slipping on of the harness. There are limits to every domain, and laws to govern every organized power. But the vagrant owns the whole vast earth that ends only at the non-existent horizon, and her empire is an intangible one, for her domination and enjoyment of it are things of the spirit.
>
> Isabelle Eberhardt

For most of the past six years, my job has been fermentation process development. I did experiments with cells (bacterial, yeast, and mammalian) in reactors up to 400 liters in size to maximize the production of biological agents that were engineered into those cells. I’ve worked on drugs aimed to treat anthrax, cancer, HIV, lupus, chlamydia, and arthritis, of which most are still toddling along in clinical trials. The work was interesting but not exciting—it was highly technical in nature and just not something that I wanted to do for the rest of my life. Plus I never felt motivated enough to be a corporate go-getter. The highlights of my day were lunch and checking my email after lunch.

I’m about to buy a one-way ticket to South America, a place where I can travel while saving money at the same time. I want to start in Ecuador, go through Peru, Bolivia, Chile, Paraguay, Uruguay, and then settle in Argentina for a while before I visit Brazil, Venezuela, and Colombia. I want to get there in July and stay for at least six months. Don't worry, the blog will continue.

When I come back to the U.S., I want to try to live somewhere else, maybe Austin or Miami. It's time to move on from this area. Much of the next couple of months will be spent with my family, playing with my little brothers, having serious discussions with my Dad, listening to my Mom complain about my stepmom, and joking around with my 20-year-old sister. It's going to hurt that they will no longer be a stone's throw away from me.

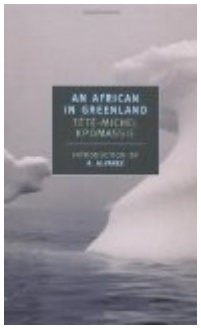
My only goal is that when my time has come, when I know that I don't have much longer to live, I have done everything I could to have a meaningful and purposeful life, one lived to the fullest potential given to me. There is no one goal, one experience, or one accomplishment that can make this happen, but a way of life that enjoys it with rich experiences instead of things and cubicles and kitsch and money. I don't believe in waiting until I'm 65 to do this. My health is good, my sexual drive is good, my savings is good, my mind is good—the time is now.

After I bought my first pocket digital camera, I would take it with me every time I went out with friends. But after about four years, I noticed I was taking pictures that were just slight variations of ones I already took. There are only so many different ways you can capture the same cast on the same stage with the same backdrop. Same as life. It has become too comfortable, too familiar. It'd be nice to experience something new and challenging.

Top 10 Most Important Books

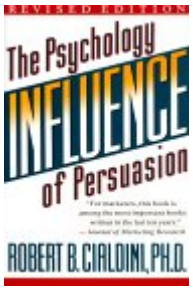
April 24, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

These are the books that have made me think the most and changed the way I see the world.



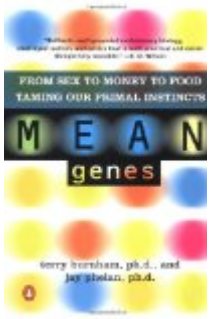
An African In Greenland

The author reads a book about Greenland and decides to leave his home country at a young age to visit. It takes him almost ten years until he finally steps foot on Greenland. Encouraging book if you are thinking about making a big change.



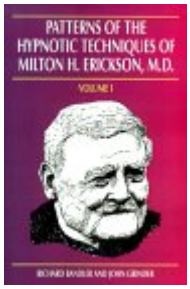
Influence

Required reading. Breaks influence and persuasion down to a science.



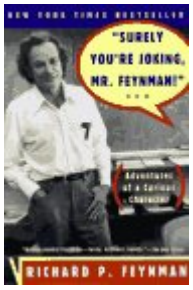
Mean Genes

Fun read that ties together evolution and the way modern humans behave. Men will find the parts on taking “social risk” to be most helpful.



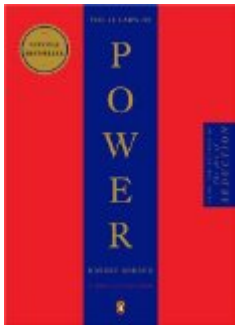
Patterns Of The Hypnotic Techniques Of Milton H. Erickson, M.D. Vol 1

This book taught me how subtle differences in word choice can drastically change the meaning of what you communicate. It has influenced my game and writing.



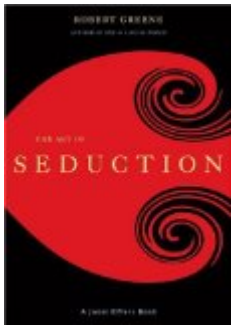
Surely You're Joking, Mr. Feynman!

My role model—a character who is smart, interesting, charismatic, and funny. This book chronicles Feynman through a variety of journeys, from his scientific achievements to his experience picking up women in bars.



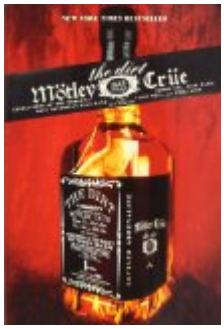
The 48 Laws Of Power

Required reading and future classic. If you haven't read this book yet, why are you still alive?



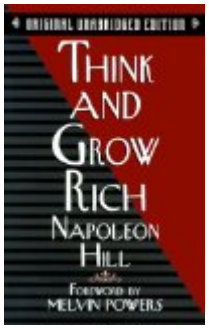
The Art Of Seduction

This book makes the list not so much because of its real-world applications but because it forces you to carefully think about the way you interact with the opposite sex, and how they interact with you.



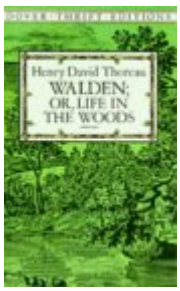
The Dirt

The most entertaining book I've ever read. It made me realize how much of an utter square I've become, due to complacency and laziness.



Think And Grow Rich

Every self-help book is just derivative of this great work, which teaches you how important thinking is when it comes to getting what you want. You can replace money with whatever goal you are working on.

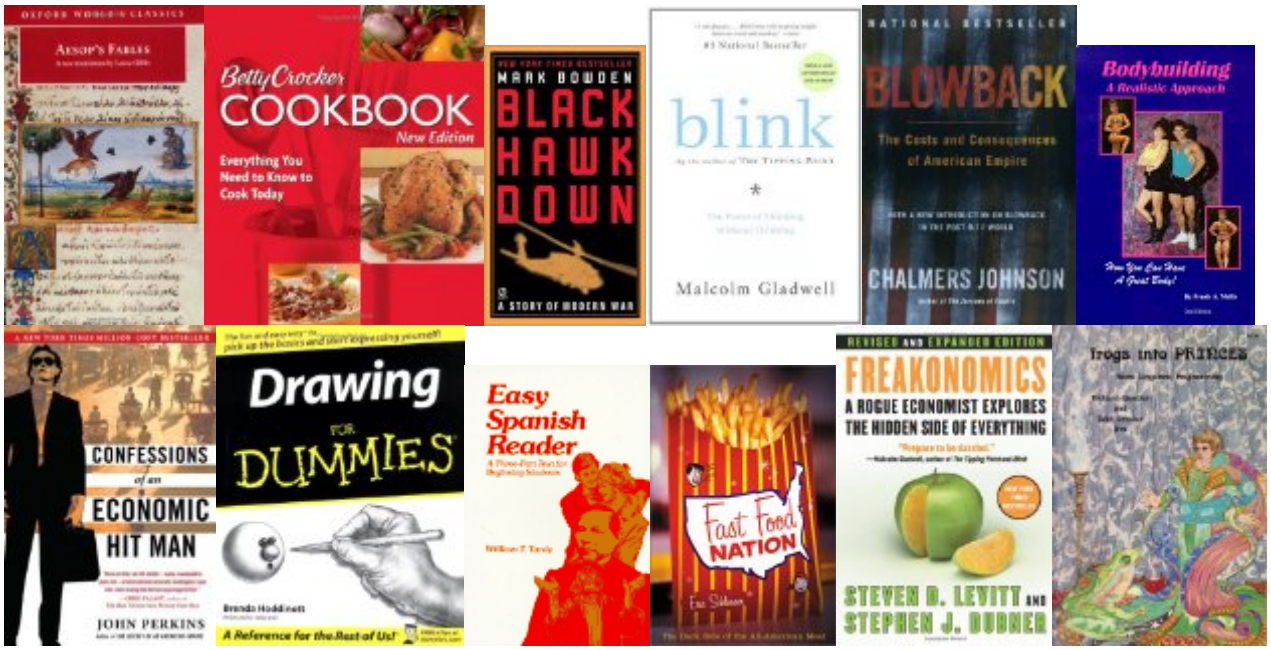


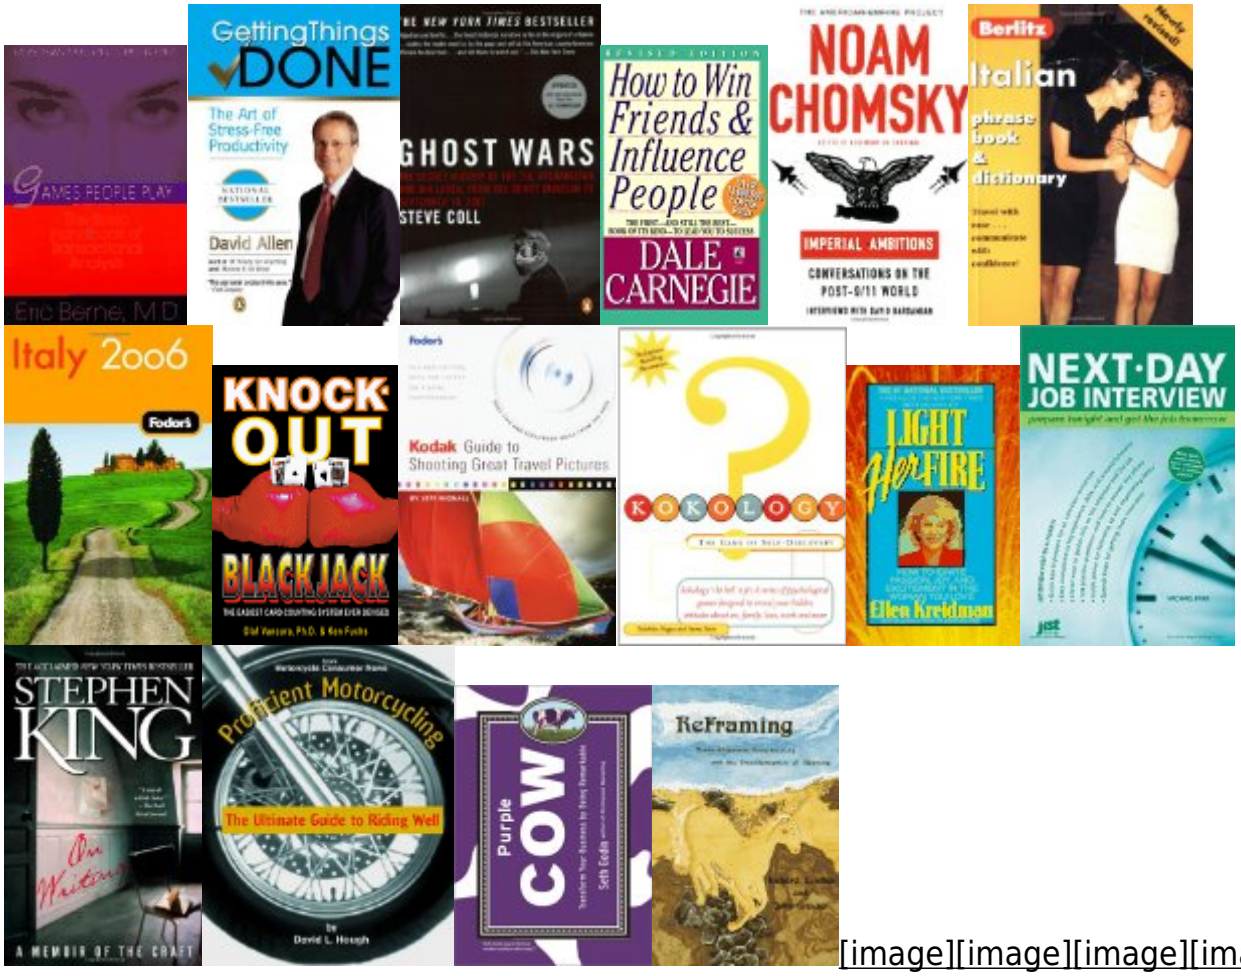
Walden

People have been sold into living a complicated life at a cost of their own happiness and well-being. Even if you read this in high school, you need to revisit it once more as an adult.

The sequel to this post can be found here.

Below are some other books I've liked since college. Hold your mouse over a cover for a text box with my thoughts.





[image][image][image][

Funemployment

April 25, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I remember not too long ago I would count the days until the weekend arrived. But now every day is the weekend! I present to you my average weekday:

11:30: Roll out of bed, shower. Do a 30 minute Spanish audio lesson. Eat breakfast/lunch. Check local blogs, Washington Post, Huffington Post.

2:00: Walk to Starbucks at nearby strip mall. The baristas welcome me and my "shift," which averages between 4-6 hours, spent writing or editing on my laptop, reading books, and staring off into space. Total cost is $4 (tall americano and warmed lemon iced cake). Sometimes I study Spanish or run various chores (e.g. getting my car ready for sale.) If it's Monday or Thursday, I go for a 3-4 mile run (8 minute miles).

7:00: Go home and eat like a king (my stepmom cooks Persian food every weeknight). Spend quality family time.

After dinner, sometimes I drive to the late-night Barnes & Noble in Rockville, drink with friends, or try to make intimacy with some broad. But if I stay home…

9:00: Tinker with blog. Put finishing touches on the next day's blog post, making sure there are no errors since I will be sleeping when it goes live. Reply to emails. Read Slate, Digg, Reddit, TPM, NY Times, and various message boards. Browse internet videos. Chat on AIM. Download music and porn torrents.

12:30am: Eat third meal of the day. Do another 30 minute Spanish audio lesson. Read some more. Watch a Netflix movie.

2:30: Productivity rapidly declines. I start to check sites I already checked, hoping for something new. Contacts getting dry.

3:00-4:00: Sleep.

*all times are approximate

I'm productive for about 6-8 hours a day, where I do more than just eating, shitting, and masturbating (i.e. existing), as opposed to 2-3 hours a day when I had a job. Most of what I'm doing right now will not have a monetary payoff, but I'm enjoying myself and it feels like my awesomeness is increasing at a more rapid pace. This isn't for everyone though: the average person needs a lot of entertainment to get through the day without experiencing boredom. Movies and books will not be enough. If you don't have an interest that take up several hours a day at minimal cost, being funemployed may not be as great for you as it is for me.

Not only is shit getting done, but life is slowing down in the process. I don't know what the date is and clock time has become a rigid abstraction. From now on I will be needing at least a one hour arrival window for appointment and dates.

Feminism Destroys Men?

April 26, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm going to assume that the author of How Feminism Destroyed Real Men has not been destroyed by feminism since his pictured wife is not a feminist (her hair is really long).

> One day [women will] realise how dull and unfulfilling it is to have a man who doesn't answer back, who offers no challenge or danger – but by then she'll be over the hill and stuck with him for fear of being left on the shelf. Sadly, this is the state of many marriages today.
>
> Back in the Nineties, emboldened by the successes of feminism, women sought to slay the dragon of patriarchy by turning men into ridiculous cissies who would cry with them through chick-flicks and then cook up a decent lasagne.

Sorry Nirpal, but I disagree with you here. The fault of being a beta male rests solely on the beta male. It is impossible to grow up and not observe the differences between alpha and beta male behavior, and how the lifestyle of one is clearly better than the other. It would be great if every man was born an alpha, but it really isn't that hard to dump beta qualities like a bad habit and tack on the correct alpha ones. It just takes time and commitment. Blaming women for being beta is the same as a mother blaming her four-year-old for being spoiled when she is the one spoiling it. If you have the control to change things but don't take the necessary steps to do so, you deserve nothing.

Nirpal gets it right in other places, but the fact that he's married at what seems to be a young age makes me wonder if he's had enough spinster experience to be an authority on this matter. His message boils down to "Be a dick" and "Don't listen to what a woman says."

> But having ticked off the various items on their life checklist, women are left with a nagging sense of dissatisfaction. Where was the drama? Where was the passion? Where was the stimulation and growth?
>
> It was all forsaken for an anodyne, materialistic shopping spree that is a Good Thing, ultimately a poor substitute for a real life. These women consider themselves to be alpha-females, but they are nothing but a pathetic sham.

The best part:

> Last Christmas, my wife threw me out after discovering I'd been cheating on her. On the night we got back together, I made strong, passionate love to her. Unfaithful as I'd been, I was not going to let her have me over a barrel for the rest of our marriage. I needed to keep a sense of self and not allow her to mire me in guilt and a desperate quest of forgiveness.
>
> I needed to let her know what she would be missing if we broke up for ever. I gave her a manful bravura performance that night, and at the height of her > passion, I asked her: 'Who's the boss?'

I'm tempted to call out bullshit but I really want this story to be true. I can picture what he said to his wife when she caught him: "But I'm doing this for you! For us! This drama gives our marriage stimulation and growth!" And note the "I'd been," which implies continuous and ongoing cheating instead of a one-time slip. He's not alpha for cheating, but he is alpha for publishing that fact in a major publication that includes his wife's full name and picture. She is so seduced by his alphaness that she doesn't mind the world knowing he likes to fuck around. For that he is Alpha Male Of The Month runner-up.

Start A Blog Already

April 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I think everyone should have their own blog, for these reasons:

1. It's a cheap hobby. Other than an internet connection and computer, it costs you nothing.

2. You are a very creative snowflake. When I sit down in front of a blank screen, interesting ideas just pop in my head. Most people have routines (sitting in front of the TV) or environments (eight hours a day of beige cubicle walls) that make it hard for creative ideas to bubble on the surface.

3. You connect the dots. If I didn't have to blog, I would probably buy an iPod and listen to music instead of piecing together the events of my life to create quality stuff.

4. Exposure to new ideas. When you have a blog you start reading more blogs, exposing yourself to interesting ideas, theories, and writing. And if you are in a scene where other bloggers meet, you get to expose yourself to these bloggers, literally, before having sex with them.

5. It improves your writing. Even without taking a writing class, the act of writing will make your writing better through no conscious work on your part.

6.

Head on over to Wordpress.com, pick a blog name (I recommend something generic so you don't have to change it when your life changes), pick a template, mess around with the software, and start writing. Email the blog to your friends, link to blogs you like that are related to you, and comment on them too. Just don't be a kiss ass. Post 2-4 times a week and send me an email after one year telling me how much you wish you started blogging sooner.

Grand Opening, Grand Closing

April 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Brunch Bird has closed up shop: “I started this blog a year ago and it’s been a thoroughly lovely experiment.” She will be missed.

Prolific commenter Roissy has started his own blog. Now he’s a fine writer and all, but so far my favorite post of his is the one will all the cats. If you like this blog, you’ll probably like his too.

Rising Sun

April 29, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

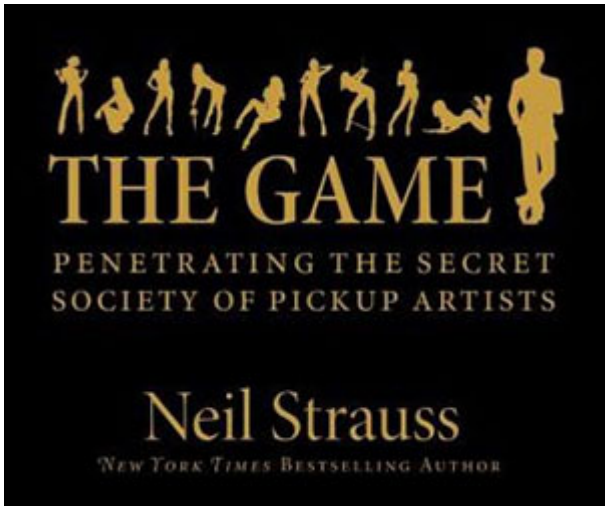
After sex, the power shifts to me. Vagina strength is highest before sex and declines to almost zero afterwards, assuming the girl is with a man who has options. I relax my game after sex not only because the power shift enables me to, but because if we are going to continue seeing each other the relationship has to be built on a foundation where we act natural and closer to our real selves. I know that a relationship built on two people playing hard to get will not last for more than a few dates, so I put less focus on planning alcohol dates with sex being the end goal and try for dates where we have to talk more under sober conditions (e.g. ice cream, bookstore)—more of just hanging out with each other's company. But this is where it starts to fall apart because a lot of girls don't know how to act when the main chase ends. They know their power has decreased so they overcompensate to keep your attention when they already had it in the first place.

I called a girl two days after I had first-time sex with her and she answered the phone. We talked for several minutes and then I suggested we do something in a few days. Her response: "Maybe."

That's in line with "That can be arranged," an unnatural and tried answer, especially to a man whose hand you brought up to your neck for semi-aggressive choking. If you don't want to hang out with me then fine, but don't pick up the phone and try some move you just read in a book by a "relationship expert." Don't tell me the bookstore is boring. Don't respond to my voicemail with a text message. Don't suggest a specific restaurant unless you are treating. Don't start talking about your past relationship failures. Don't be surprised when I decide to move on.

Assuming you are cute (which is why I talked to you) and good in bed (which is why I called you again), you don't have to put on a front to keep me interested. After sex, a girl's game should transition from communication and logistical games to teasing and seduction games, where she tries to heighten a man's physical arousal during the time they are together. She should send him to his buddy saying, "Dude, this girl drives me crazy. For some reason I can't stop thinking about her."

Girls need to increase sexual tension not by withholding attention (an okay strategy before sex) but by giving good attention that takes time and work to master. A lot of girls, unfortunately, have no desire to improve their game beyond techniques they learned in high school. To them, attention withholding is game. But once a man penetrates vagina, chances are he won't be turned on by the extra time it takes you to return a telephone call.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

So You’re Looking For A Travel Partner

April 30, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Bologna, Italy

Choose a bad travel partner and you will find yourself traveling in an exotic environment with someone who nags and complains; whose negative vibe brings you down as the clock continues to tick for return to the life-sucking routine back at home. Your friend is not trying to bring you down, but he has his own issues to deal and is too wrapped up in his world to worry about your enjoyment. Don’t take it personal. But you need a good way to tell if someone is good to travel with or not. Do that by asking your potential travel partner the following question:

“Do you like to cook?”

I’m talking about real meals, not warming up chicken nuggets.

Unlike what the famous cookbook says, there is no joy in cooking. Slicing, grating, mixing, chopping, simmering, waiting, washing, and fucking up are basic labors, but I do it anyway. I do it because I like the idea of slowing things down to create food using my own ability. Now it’s not like I’m using ingredients I’ve grown myself in a patch of land out back, but cooking still takes more labor and time than ordering from a menu.

Depending on your cooking style and how much you save, it’s possible that the energy you put into cooking is not much more than the benefits you get out of it. But it still says something positive about you. You focus on the process and the current state instead of the end product. You are patient, without needing instant gratification. You can enter situations without knowing the outcome. You are not looking for a sure thing. You “go with it’ and adapt when things go wrong, because they will. These are the qualities you want when traveling with someone in a foreign land.

Easy things you do at home take much longer abroad, such as finding and ordering food, asking for help, and getting from point A to B. Much of your time isn't spent on "fun" things, but actually getting to the fun things in one piece without being taken advantage of. To the non-cook, the best kind of travel is the tourist package to a Disneyland-type city where English is spoken in a ten square block city center and there are many wonderful structures that have seen the camera lens billions of times before. At least he won't be "bored." But the patient traveler, the cook, ventures out and accepts that the inevitable frustrations are the same as doing a sink of dirty dishes; it goes with the territory. When you cook something edible, eating it only takes ten minutes—it's the process you spend most of your time on.

All that said, there is absolutely nothing like traveling alone, to have the freedom to do what you want and to face challenges with no support by your side. The only requirement is being able to handle your own company.

I Would Make An Excellent Father

May 1, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My 3-year-old brother thinks he's slick. Every time he comes into my room he brings a toy but doesn't take it out when he leaves. My room now has Spongebob Squarepants, colorful trains from Thomas the Tank Engine and Friends, Laa-Laa, and a very naked Ken doll. As long as it looks like he's not about to break anything expensive, I let him do whatever he wants. The idea of applying discipline is not compatible with someone who has a problem with authority; I think a better model is rewarding positive behaviors and ignoring negative ones. Of course raising kids is a lot more complicated than that, but it's a ideal start.

Once a week I make a large batch of tuna salad to feed me for lunch. My 10-year-old brother was watching me and remarked how disgusting tuna is. "Have you ever had tuna salad before?" I asked.

"No," he said, "but it looks gross."

I made him taste it through threat of big brother violence. I told him if he doesn't like it then he never has to eat it again, but he needs to try things before he makes up his mind. He tasted it and said it was "Okay," but a couple days later I noticed a large can of tuna on the kitchen counter. Turns out he liked the tuna salad so much that he asked my dad to make some. I decided to keep it real so I took him to eat sushi with me at Tono Sushi in Woodley Park. I told him that, yes, technically sushi is raw fish, but it doesn't taste like fish at all. "It tastes less like fish than tuna, which you already tried." He was down.

I wish I took a picture the moment that first piece of tuna and avocado roll went into his mouth. It looked like someone nailed him in the stomach; pain, fear, and confusion was painted on his face right after the first chew. He wanted to bring it back out, but I encouraged him like only an older brother knows how: "Chew! Eat it! Close your mouth! You better finish that!" He ate only a few more pieces but I was very proud of him, like a parent would be after watching a child's first step. After all, I didn't try sushi until I was 21, and let him know that he is far ahead of me in becoming a real man. I stressed real man one more time, adding that you need to try new things even if you fear it. How else will you find out about things you could like?

My dad spends hours a day with the boys, teaching, talking, and playing, but there are so many parents who drop the ball at being a positive influence on a child's life. And you wonder why so many adults are messed up. From what I see, the key to raising a decent human being is to treat them with respect and give them attention and affection. Sound familiar? Don't dumb things down and don't push away their concerns or questions. Don't let the television compete with them for your attention. Don't tell them "Because I said so." The only reason I would make a good dad is because I'd copy what my parents did to me, which, except for my mother's occasional broom beating, seemed to work out pretty well. The last thing I will do is buy a parenting book from a writer/expert/businessman who has no investment in me or my family.

“So what do you think of sushi?” I asked.

“It didn’t have a lot of taste. But it was really cool!”

Yes, little brother, it is cool. Now when you turn 20 or so, there is this book I want you to read…

Newsletter No. 5

May 1, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s newsletter time. The edition I’m sending this weekend will describe a coffee shop game experience I had with some girl from North Carolina. I talk about how you know if a girl is interested or not. Sign-up to the right, or go here. If you just signed up and want to take a look at the newsletters you’ve missed, send me an email.

5 Washington DC Bars For Men

May 2, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you are a man who doesn't need top 40 hip hop, I have five places that are worth your time. This list is a result of six years of drinking and banging.

Busboys & Poets map

An artsy/yuppie cafe that has food, drink, and coffee. Prices aren't cheap but there is free wireless internet if you like nerding it up in public. This is more of a date spot than a pick-up place, but there are usually sets of cute girls hanging out by the bar after 8PM. Several of the waitresses are also cute. If you are looking to meet someone educated and well-read in their mid-20's to early-30's, this would be a good option. Start a conversation about something existential.

Dragonfly map

This is a house club with an international crowd. The white girls here are more open to dating hairy men than the white girls at, say, an Irish pub or NASCAR race. You'll also run into a lot of Russian and South American girls. Downstairs is a little more quiet while upstairs is crowded with uptempo music. The people here can be pretentious (you will see girls dancing on tables), but it's nowhere near as bad at places like Spank, Indebleu, Fly, Blue Gin, K-Street Lounge, and Play. Come here if you want to meet someone who has used their passport. Their sushi is decent (get the Dragon roll). Update: Dragonfly has closed. Go to Grand Central in Adams Morgan instead, which has less international girls but a better girl to guy ratio before midnight.

Front Page map

Out of all the lame white-people bars I've been to, this one has the highest amount of cute American girls. While they are harder to pick up for me than at a place like Dragonfly, their sheer numbers means I'll have opportunities throughout the night. This is a good place if you are broke and on a budget (their Thursday night happy hour is very competitive). Come here if you want to meet stupid, easy American sluts under the age of 30.

Rouge map

Rouge is a pretty bar in the Rouge hotel. This has been my date bar for several years running becuase it is deadly effective at panty wetting, making the outrageous drink prices worth it during a time when I cared about getting laid. If you are a man who has a job and doesn't buy the bullshit idea of dinner dates, take your date here and thank me later. Some nights are crowded and suitable for picking up older women or business travelers, but it can be hit or miss. Similar to Rouge is Topaz, which has a blue design instead of red.

Science Club map

This is like a more expensive Front Page for people who think they are too cool for Front Page. It's a cross between Busboys & Poets and Dragonfly, with house music but little dancing. Don’t immediately leave if you show up and it sucks: since this venue is more of a launching point than a final destination, you will find that the crowd can change in your favor if you stick around. Science Club also makes a good date bar.

You can run your first 3 or 4 dates from these venues. For example, you meet a girl at Science Club and take her to Rouge for a first date, where you make-out with her and do some groping. Then you do a Dragonfly date two on a weekend night where you seal the deal. Then do a chill date three at Busboys & Poets. The possibilities are infinite!—especially since you can meet girls at any one of these venues.

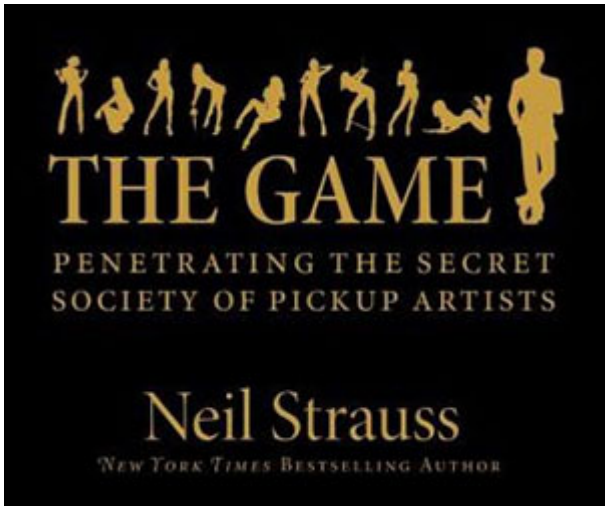
You’ll notice that these venues are not too mainstream. There is no Dream, Fur, Ultrabar, Tony & Joes, Local 16, Tom Toms, and Platinum. I believe that if you go to a mainstream bar, you will meet a mainstream girl, and if you are not mainstream and cookie-cutter yourself then it’s going to be a waste of your time.

Honorable Mentions

- 18th Street Lounge – If it wasn’t for their $10 cover charge, I would go here more often. It’s like a more chill Dragonfly. (map)
- Lima – A more Middle Eastern Dragonfly. Very good house music on Saturday nights. Drinks are weak though and you need to be with a girl to get in. (map)
- Gazuza – Has a lot of potential, but most of the girls are sitting down. Similar vibe to Science Club. (map)
- Reef – Similar to Front Page. Wide selection of beers. (map)

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

American Stereotypes Are So Hurtful

May 3, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A German David Hasselhoff lover recently wrote 10 Common German Prejudices About The USA. I am deeply offended as an American and would like to take some time to clear the air.

"What's with all the fast food?"

We are BUSY people. Have you looked at our GDP lately? It's the highest in the world. You think we got there by taking the to time to cook boring meals at home? Give me animal fat and give it to me NOW. Maybe you'd be rich too if you spent your time working instead of making thick sausage or whatever it is you eat over there.

"Americans are war mongers"

The recent military operations in Iraq (both of them), Afghanistan, Panama, Kosovo, Somalia, and Grenada were all ACCIDENTS of history. We do not have imperial notions on this great Earth, and if you give honest examination to the periods between 1891 and 1897, you will see that we are a very peaceful people.

"Americans are extremely superficial…celebrity culture"

Wrong. We follow celebrities because they have achieved a level of enlightenment that commoners like you and I can only dream about. I'm talking about sex, clubbing, drugs, tell-all books, gotcha photography featuring nipples and shaved vaginas, and most importantly, FASHION. Quick: name a German-born celebrity. I thought so. If you had celebrities then you would be obsessing over their god-like status as well.

"Americans don't give a shit about their poor people"

Now you've went too far. Look in any American city and you will see an area of very fine buildings that we have built EXCLUSIVELY for the poor. We give them schooling, food, and police protection, and make sure that they live far far away from the middle and upper classes, who may interfere with their admirable way of life. Poverty in the United States will be relegated to the history books as soon as we win the war on terror.

"Everything needs to be XXL (houses, cars, refrigerators, Burgers, breast implants,…)"

How's that 300 square feet of living space in Germany doing for you? Other than the breast implants, which can be explained by evolution, we need large because our founding fathers, God rest their souls, want us to settle in a vast frontier of rich, bountiful land. Ever heard of the Homestead Act? Otherwise this land would just go to waste, and what's the point of that? As for automobiles, I'd like to see you drive one of your fuel-efficient scooter smart cars on a real highway and see how long you survive as SUV monsters of American pride block your puny visual field.

As an American citizen, I just can't stand by and watch as foreigners trash the country I've grown up in. Instead of acting out in a pointless jealous rage, I think this German should get a J-O-B so he can afford to buy one of our state-of-the-art plasma televisions. Just don’t forget to budget for the necessary Monster cables.

Language

May 6, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For the last month, I've been asked the same question at least a dozen times.

> Are you going to South America for the girls?

No, I'm not. And I'll tell you why.

There are two types of connection: physical and emotional. Physical connection is good enough for the first couple of dates until you get in bed with someone, but to continue after that, there has to be some type of emotional connection. Getting with girls abroad is not that difficult; alcohol and physical attraction without many words are enough to fuel a good time that lasts several days or so, until the novelty of staring at each other in near silence and drawing funny pictures wears off. It is very difficult to establish an emotional connection without language.

In college I knew this kid who would play and sing the latest rock ballads on his guitar. Girls would sometimes cry during his performances. I'd think, "Give me a break," while mentally calculating how many hours of practice it would take me to get to his skill level. I did not learn how to play the guitar, but I did look at communication in a different way.

The importance of language, specifically words, did not hit me until I met this one Eastern European girl. She was the same age as me, with short blonde hair, and a type of nonstop laugh that makes you think you have a really good sense of humor. She was fluent in English. She wanted to hear a story, so I told her a story, a personal "love" story that did not have a happy ending. A story for another day.

Telling her this story caused me to relive it once more; relive not so much pain but a disappointed sadness, and I looked in this girl's eyes, who I met three hours prior, and saw tears. She must have experienced something similar, I thought. I looked away as she wiped the tears away to give her a private moment, so she can feel what she wants to feel without someone maybe judging her.

At the time I didn't remember doing that before, making a girl cry from a story; and it's not power I felt, but a sort of humanity where we our experiences, what makes us who we are, is able to affect other people, whether happy or sad, positive or negative. Music is one way of doing this, language the other. Out of all the tricks I know to increase a girl's physical arousal, none can touch the power that mere words have, that a story has.

Will I take advantage of sexual opportunities in South America? Yes. Will I be on the lookout for a serious relationship, for a girl I can import into the United States? No. If you can't make it work with your own people, the idea of romantic love in a faraway land is more fantasy than reality. Unless, of course, you are trying to become fluent in the place you are going to.

I Left My Wallet At Home

May 7, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I didn't used to mind paying for the 1-3 dates it took to get sex. Spending money on dating is part of the game and getting laid, kind of like how the sky is blue. It just is. But lately I've had serious doubts about this model, in part because I have been short-changing my value. It's a lot higher than I think.

This is how I see it: I give a girl much more than she gives me; my stories, my vibe, my game, my sex. Their stories tend to be of the complaint nature and their humor cannot come close to competing with a man's. It's nice that she has a lubricated hole that brings me pleasure, but I have observed that these girls seem to enjoy getting fucked more than I enjoy fucking them. And this is not an insult to the girls—it's just a fact that I value sex less than they value it with me.

Now I know how this is coming off, and I know what you are thinking, but I think my value as a man is at a point where a woman should be paying for my company. When a girl meets me, I honestly believe she is lucky to have done so; and I hope that most of you guys reading this believe that too when you meet a girl. Because I'm giving more pleasure and enjoyment than I'm receiving, it doesn't make a lot of sense that I should have to pull my wallet out when the bill comes.

I understand that I live in a society with deeply entrenched dating norms—one that I do not have the power to change—so I will make a compromise to ease a girl's introduction into my world. I'll pay for the first date. I don't mind too much, especially since the first date venue is my choice. After that though, it's all her.

It's still very early but my cost per notch so far this year is $77, not much more than the cost of a first date. I'm all about putting my ideas and beliefs into practice. In fact, my beliefs do become reality.

Solutions For Girls

May 8, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's very easy for me to give advice to a guy: work on your game, have many experiences, and commit to a quality woman on your terms, not hers. Once a guy has game, he will have options into his late 30's and probably beyond. His biggest enemy is himself. His fear, complacency, and insecurities all work to prevent him from getting what he is capable of getting.

It's different for a woman. All the game in the world won't matter when she is passed her physical peak and less attractive than younger counterparts. A woman's biggest enemy is time. The clock is ticking right after college and doubles pace after year 30 is crossed. While many single women at 40 are cultured, intelligent, and make for excellent company, they have missed the marriage boat and will be reduced to competing for the attention of rich players who don't mind flying these overly experienced mind-fuckers out to some exotic locale for a "romantic" dinner, assuming these women have the means and motivation to keep up their looks. They will die not next to loved ones, but to a pile of money that was her only remaining purpose to strive.

When a woman graduates from college at the age of 22, she thinks she has all the time in the world. She builds up her social circle to prepare for years of drinking and partying. She gets some twangs of doubt after 25, but the partying continues, now at more expensive clubs where more money needs to be spent on the clothing and accessories that go with the lifestyle. Some even go the extra mile by purchasing Mercedes Benz automobiles, an act that used to belong to the exclusive domain of men.

Then 28 and 29 passes and all she has to show for the previous near-decade is a cell phone filled with numbers of guys she "dated." She hits day spas, gets botox, and then cruises the internet and clubs with a renewed vigor. But it doesn't work, and 35 is here before you know it. You see her out and it appears she is having a fun time but the developing wrinkles and glassy eyes shows her abject failure at reproduction. She finds new meaning through her career and the massive amounts of subsequent disposable income that allows her to enjoy the finer things in life like luxury condominiums and designer shoes the celebrities wear. But every time she sees a child in a stroller, she wonders what happened.

Women have less time than they think. How long does it take to find a quality man? How long does it take to weed out incompatible men and enter a relationship with one that is worthy? How many relationships fail before the one-year mark? How long does a relationship have to last to make engagement possible? How long is the average engagement? How many engagements fail before the altar is reached? Every now and then you hear a story of someone meeting and then getting married after a few months, but this is the exception. A woman needs to give herself at least five years from that moment she concludes she wants to get married. This means a girl needs to start finding a husband immediately after graduating from college. You've arrived way too late in the game if you don't even think about marriage until you've approached 30, when your reproductive peak has passed and your appearance is not what it used to be.

I have three pieces of advice for women who don't want to end up as a spinster. First, use high school and college as a period to work on your game and fuck around. Find out what men like and improve yourself to be the type of woman that men like. Whether this includes getting rid of your neediness and drama or growing out your hair, figure it out before you start your career. If you are not sure where to start, copy the girls who seem to get all the guys.

One thing you should focus on is being sexy, exuding a certain je ne sais pas that guys find themselves inexplicably drawn into. Go tell a girl raised on Real World to show you what sexy is and she will put on pricey clothing and accessories and search for the nearest watering hole to down enough drinks until she feels comfortable in her own skin. Sexy is body language, tone, subtle movements and details —the way she does things, the way she is. This cannot be purchased at Nordstrom, but only learned with time and through effort.

Second, as soon as you graduate from college, have in your mind the notion that you want to get married soon. Be open to it and think about it daily. Reward men who put time and energy into you instead of the players who just want to fuck you. Fuck all the players you want in college, but after that buy a vibrator and don't waste your time with them because they will not marry you. Sacrifice wild sex and roller coaster emotions for something more stable that results in a family (which is what you want, right?).

Hold off on putting out as long as possible. If I have sex with a girl on the second date and it was just okay, I'll be more likely to drop her since I have invested very little in her. But if sex happens on date ten, the psychology of previous investment says I will most likely continue, at least for one more date. Understand: your vagina is the most powerful thing you have. To potential suitors, it should be like the El Dorado, a magical land they will die trying to gain access to. But when you partake in casual sex like one-night stands, your vagina becomes more like the 24-hour convenience store.

Lastly, don't go to bars and clubs often. Once a week is enough. These are horrible places to meet a quality man who wants to commit, and the drinking and smoke will age you more rapidly. Focus on doing more community driven events that don't have the immediate one-night payoff that a bar has. Maybe it's volunteering, jogging clubs, spinning class, or book clubs. You'll have to get creative. I'm not an expert with regard to meeting men, but even at a coffee shop I get to meet and know girls on a different, more intelligent, more meaningful level than I do with girls at bars. A good rule-of-thumb is that the reason you meet has to be something other than the result of drinking alcohol.

It's easy to make fun of the current generation of spinsters, but I do feel bad for them because there was no way for them to know that their lifestyle would prove to be so detrimental to forming a family. But we've observed and studied them and they've been written about in the mainstream media enough to the point where there are no excuses for not avoiding their fate. If you are a girl under the age of 25, I will have no sympathy for you in the next decade when you whine to me that you've always wanted a family but for whatever reason couldn't find a man. It starts now.

The Problem

May 9, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I read through the comments on Solutions For Girls and I'm just pretty surprised that a lot of girls are denying that there's even a problem, that their lifestyle does not need changing. I first talked about this two years ago (Brooke Shields Is Jealous) and the female shrieking then and now hasn't really changed. Same comments but a different crowd.

I'm still confident that my advice to women is sound and will help them if they want to be helped. It's advice I give to my sister, someone whose happiness and future I deeply care about. There's a reason the title wasn't "Solutions For Roosh." In the end if you don't think a problem exists, then you are probably part of the problem.

Re: Overly Experienced Mind-fuckers

May 9, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

From a reader...

> Don't forget one huge important point — fucking misery loves company. I can't tell you how many times I've seen some stupid washed-up broad do everything in her power to destroy her girlfriends' otherwise happy relationships with their boyfriends. I've seen this pattern over and over, particularly in this DC shit-hole of a city: dumb bird in her mid/late 30′s is queen bee/mentor to girls in their 20′s; one girl in her 20′s has minor tiff with boyfriend, who she otherwise loves, but talks to queen bee about it all for help; queen bee offers staggeringly intelligent feedback, usually something along the lines of "Fuck him, you don't need him, dump his ass, stick with me sister"; girl in 20′s takes this brilliant advice and dumps boyfriend impulsively; now queen bee and girl in 20′s are happy to troll U Street and talk about their shoes, their periods, Grey's Anatomy, and how much they hate men and don't need them.
>
> This really is a big problem — I am convinced that uppity professional women, once they realize that their facile head-game ways have doomed them to a life of being used sexually, wake up one day and start destroying everything happy around them for sport.
>
> When I'm in the initial stages of getting to know a girl now, I do everything i can to stay away from her friends and remain a mystery to her social circle. If i ever decide to have a serious relationship, you can bet that I'm going to be the Snuffleupagus of boyfriends, appearing to her friends purely through her stories about me, until i determine that i have cemented enough of a place in her life that she'll look past queen bee's horse-shit arm-chair psychology and pathology.

Very good observation, and excellent use of Snuffleupagus.

Hung Up On The Opener

May 10, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Guys always ask me the same question when I return from approaching a girl.

> What did you say?

Specifically, they want to know what my opening line was. I ask the same question to other guys too actually, and it's because the nature of the game dictates that the opener is the hardest part. You always want to know how this guy started an interaction with a cute girl.

This isn't a bad question to ask because it can give you ideas, but understand that what you say is less important than if you actually say it. When it comes to approaching, doing is far more important than doing right. And I know this because my off-the-cuff openers are usually pretty retarded. The last opener in a coffee shop that resulted in at least a number was, "You look like you are having a hard time studying," and at night it was, "You should have given him your number" (referring to some random dude who walked away). These aren't even worthy of being copied because they are just average, but the fact that these casual lines got me in meant that the better parts of my game could now take over. The lack of an award-winning opener should never prevent you from talking to a girl you like.

After sharing an opener with a guy that resulted in some type of number or fluid exchange, you'd think he would want to immediately try it out. But he doesn't—he just stands there, wondering how that could have possibly "worked" as cute girls walk by. Guys hung on words are waiting for the perfect line to deliver on the hottest girl. That's not game—that's playing the lottery, waiting for the one in a million jackpot to bring you riches. Approaching is more like the poker grind, where you lose a majority of your hands dealt but can still go home a big winner.

P.S. If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is my Game Tips Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. To subscribe put your first name and email address below and click the button.

A Run

May 13, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

You decide to go for five mile run. No mp3 player or pedometer or stop watch, just your shoes and your clothes.

An 8 minute mile pace is not fast but not slow either. That's a 24 minute 5K, a time your doctor would appreciate. Five miles is a warm-up to a marathon runner, but to 99% of the population it's difficult. Forty minutes of legs moving.

The first mile is easy. Your breathing doesn't fall into a cadence yet and you just enjoy the breeze. It's surprising, though, that there aren't scores of other people running outside like you. It's a nice day and these suburbs are dense. Maybe they have treadmills at home or are at the gym.

Your breathing starts to sync up to your steps. Blood flow is being diverted to your muscles. You're tired now after two miles and would prefer to stop. This needless work is using up precious resources, your body says. You notice your first cramp.

You're halfway through and this hill is really getting you. Your legs burn like bee stings and your breathing becomes more rapid. Stopping seems so nice, but you can't stop—you will collapse before you stop. But you need to slow down. You're doing a 10 minute mile now, but at least your legs are still moving. There's a lamp post over there, just reach that and you can think about stopping. No, you can keep going; try for that bus stop.

Your body is weak, it wants you to stop. But your mind is strong. Trick your body with your mind. Your body must not know you will finish, or it will punish you with more cramps and more pain.

It's just you out here. The cars fly by as you smell that plain suburban air. The sidewalk is covered with blades of cut grass and sticks and twigs from past storms. Does anyone actually walk on these things anymore? This landscape is sad, isolated; you can't see any human beings outside, just people in moving pods, in a hurry to go somewhere, nowhere. This is better than the landscape at a gym at least, better than running next to someone who just put on floral perfume.

You feel like you can run a 10 minute mile all day. What a difference those two minutes are, from body breakdown to breath catching. Back to the 8 minute mile. You're at mile four now, just one more to go. There is no one holding you hand. There are no words of encouragement or support. You are your encouragement and you are your support. No one else can do for your what you can't do for yourself.

Nevermind. Another half mile and you're back on the 10 minute mile. It's just too hard and it hurts too much. Your arms are barely moving now, gimp-like, they just hang there. Your hands flop around, to conserve energy maybe. You see the end though, a yield sign you started at over thirty minutes ago. You can see the end of pain. Your body can see it too.

Your legs start moving much faster now, faster than it's moved all day. Your body wants to end this. Your body, that son of a bitch, could have moved like this earlier, since maybe that lamp post. It lied to you.

You don’t feel right, but here’s the end. Welcome to yield. A few large stomps to slow down. There’s your heartbeat, in your head and in your neck, pounding. Walk it off and breathe, it’s over. You did it, on your own, and no one held your hand. Because no one will ever hold your hand, not even you.

Beta Husband

May 14, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It was impossible for me to resist an article titled Why I Left My Beta Husband. It's about a woman who got fed up with her stay-at-home life partner.

> I stayed home with our daughter for six months after she was born while Mark continued, yes, looking for a job. In 18 months, he got just two calls. Meanwhile, I was being pursued by headhunters. Eventually, I took an editing job at a health magazine.

A man's role changes with time. When you're just dating it's about satisfying a woman sexually and providing her with nice company that keeps the good bedroom times rolling. In a relationship it moves to protection and comfort and then in a marriage with children it's about being an able provider. Having an interesting and witty personality will not cut it when your kids are hungry and need new clothes, which is why you don't have kids unless you are prepared to work until death.

> The truth is, I wasn't attracted to [Mark] anymore. It wasn't that he'd changed—he still had the same floppy brown hair, bright green eyes, and long freckled limbs that had literally made me quiver when I first met him. But in my head, I'd neutralized him as a sexual being. I wanted to be overwhelmed by the sheer power of his masculinity in the bedroom, but I wasn't. Because I felt like the man in our relationship.

So she wised up, dumped Mark, and found her alpha stud, right? Of course not. You can never listen to a woman's words because women have no idea what they want. This one simply went and found a Mark-clone who also likes poetry.

> So nobody was more surprised than I was when I went ahead and fell for another stay-at-home dad.
>
> Here's the difference, though: Jason knows what he wants—and it's not a corner office. He wants to have his afternoons free to hit the park with my daughter or paint or translate the writings of Pablo Neruda. There's nothing thwarted or self-pitying about him. When we're cooking dinner together on Friday nights in a kitchen fragrant with curry, or trying to drink coffee in bed on Sunday mornings while my daughter dances around us, I'm so attracted to him that it's all I can do not to rip his clothes off then and there.

So Jason is much better because he knows he wants to be a bum. Hey I guess that gives me hope.

You Better Be Sorry

May 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I noticed there is a special breed of girls out there who when they return your call, say, “I’m sorry I missed your call.” This isn’t a line or move; they truly feel apologetic for not being able to pick up the phone when you called.

When I’m going through numbers in my phone, thinking about which girl I want to give attention to, I hesitate on the ones that I know won’t pick up their phone or call back promptly. Unlike postal mail, the telephone is an instant medium, so unless you are in a movie theater there is no reason I should wait for more than 30 minutes. Once that cursor comes across a nice girl who has historically been good to me with the phone, I go ahead and hit send and find out what she’s up to. Just to chat, or maybe more.

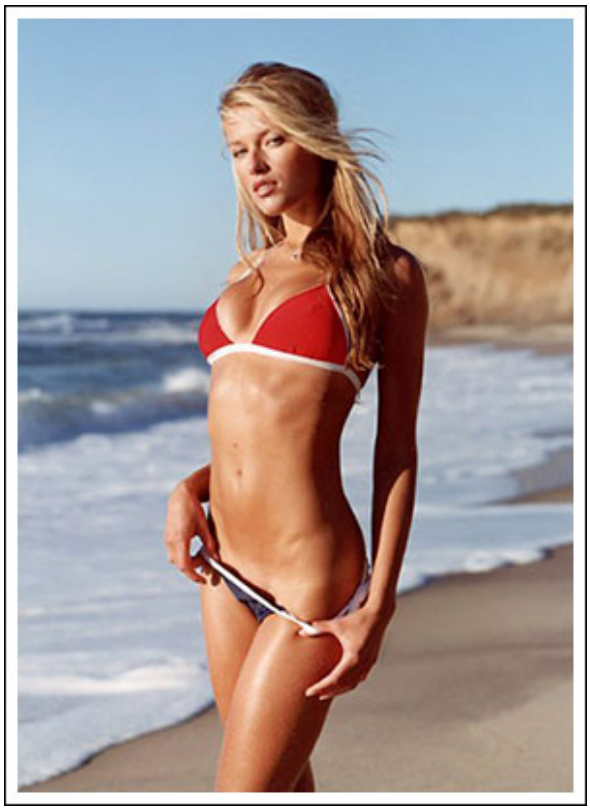
The girls who put up less access barriers, all things being equal, will be contacted first. I’m confident that the guys who do reward girls that put up barriers eventually come around as they age and realize that they aren’t worth the effort.

The Fattest People In The World

May 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Joe sent me a cartoon graphic that displays the fattest people in the world by population percentage. We are number one.

It's surprising that a few Eastern European countries made it in the top ten. When I think Czech Republic (15%), I think of this:



Not this:

…though that may be a Brazilian flag her ass is swallowing.

Avoid English speaking countries and Mexico and you'll do alright. The exception is Canada, which I'm guessing has thin people because it's a barren arctic land that does not grow enough food for its predominantly Inuit population.

The Notch Metric

May 16, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Notch count is a powerful metric. It drives men like GDP drives capitalist economies. But the problem with having only one metric is that it can easily be gamed. If you all you care about is notches then just sleep with a bunch of ugly girls. If all you care about is GDP then just allow easy credit and massive government spending.

You'll notice that the most used metrics are ones that are measurable, objective, and easily tracked over time, even if they have serious downsides. The Dow Jones Index measures stock price but not consumer satisfaction. Unemployment data does not measure the quality of work or the level of underemployment. GPA may judge memorization and test-taking ability instead of innate intelligence. Notches do not measure a girl's look, charm, personality, wit, or sense of humor—only the presence of a hole.

Because notch count is not standardized to the man's appearance or to the quality of the notches, it's a number that has a weak to moderate correlation to actual game. It's more valuable when used as a means of encouragement—to push a man out in the field where he can rack up experiences essential for developing tight game. The intense competition among friends that a notch count introduces also serves as motivation.

Another benefit of the notch count is that a man who values them pursues girls he is not truly interested in, which has the end-result of building up his bedroom skill. This is something that his future serious lover will appreciate, just like how every man appreciates a woman's ability to give an excellent blowjob. (As long you don't ask him how he thinks she got so good at giving excellent blowjobs.)

The metric must remain a metric, a guide to progress, and not the end result. For GDP you need to measure quality of life and happiness and for notches you need to establish quality standards. Take the notch count too seriously and you will reach a point where you are banging without improving your skill.

A better metric: Flags

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

The Flag Metric

May 17, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We need a new metric in addition to the notch count that correlates more strongly to game, but one that, as I mentioned yesterday to be useful, is “measurable, objective, and easily tracked over time.” The reason why guys ask other guys “Bang any new girls lately?” as opposed to “So how is your female happiness going?” is because the latter is too subjective and dependent on individual factors.

Your flag count is the number of countries you have slept with. If you sleep with a girl who was born in another country, that’s a flag. If you sleep with two girls from the same country, that’s still one flag. It’s not good enough if her ancestors are from another country because in that case an American flag might as well also be German, Irish, British, or Dutch.

For example, if I have sex with a girl born in Greece, two girls born in Poland, one from Colombia, and a ton from the United States, I have four flags. Most American guys have flags in the low single digits while some of my multilingual friends are in the high single digits. I have only met two men who are in the double digits, including the Italian traveler of average stature who introduced me to this concept in a Spanish hostel. While prolonged travel is not a prerequisite for a high flag count, it seems to help (maybe unfairly so to the point where this metric is gamed).

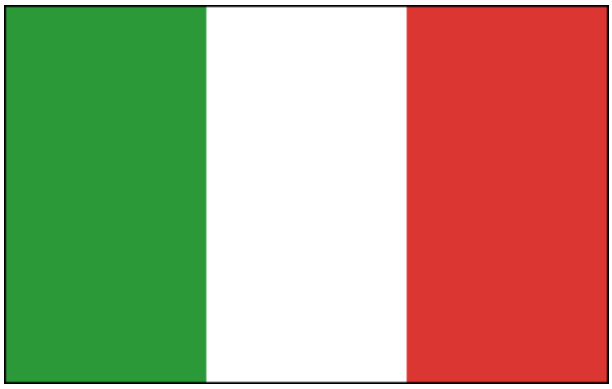
Flags are more telling of your game skill because you are having sex with girls that have different and usually more conservative cultural beliefs and norms. Being desirable to women from several countries signifies more game than being desirable to the same type of girl from the same locale. Abercrombie & Fitch guys who abuse pomade have a lock on the American blondes, but unless they are especially good-looking their game has trouble adapting and conforming to girls from other countries. And an American flag is the least valuable because American girls, from my experience, are the easiest in the world. European guys drool on American girls overseas not necessarily because they are exotic but because tales of their promiscuity have arrived long before they flew in.

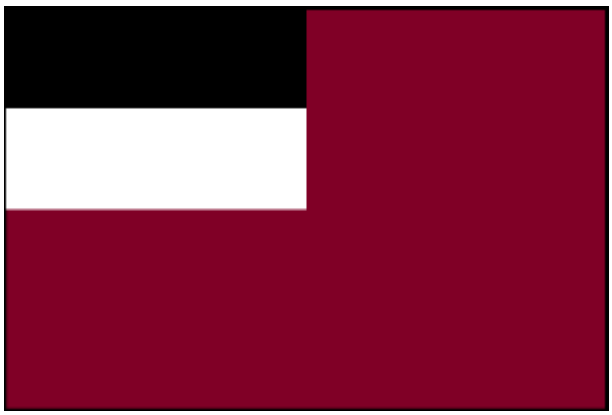
If a guy tells you he has 30 notches but 2 flags, chances are he found a niche for which he is exploiting. It is possible he is a one trick pony. There is no crime in that at all, but his specific niche may not be able to teach you anything. His advice could be like Leonardo DiCaprio telling you that to get laid all you have to do is be yourself and wear nice clothes. But if a guy tells me he has 15 notches but 6 flags, I’ll make the safe assumption that his diverse banging is probably not the result of a golden goose.

Keep in mind the only way to really identify a guy’s game is to observe him in action over a prolonged period of time, which means that unless he is a close acquaintance you will have to always be skeptical and see if his game advice and stories at least somewhat correlates with your own experience. Without experience though, you will have very little ability to separate truth from fiction.

Everything that is worth exploring has been explored, but flags can serve as a modern man's way of tapping into the exotic unknown and pushing himself when notches no longer can. If there are two girls in front of me who are mostly equal, I gotta go with the one who gives me the flag.

Most Desired Flags:





If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

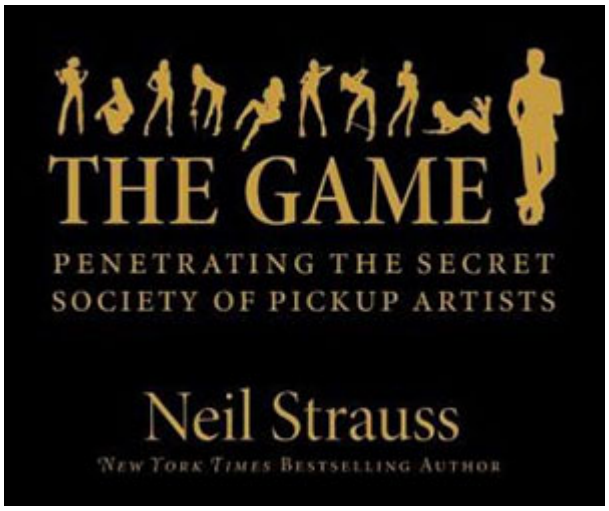
Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.



More Flags

May 20, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Had a couple interesting questions about the flag metric that I wanted to discuss. But first, what is a notch? The most objective answer would be when the plane of the vagina is broken. This means any depth of insertion. Everything else is subjective. If a guy told me his latest notch was when he put it in one inch, I'd roll my eyes but I would not dispute his notch.

I remember a friend telling me his girlfriend had the belief that sex with a man doesn't count until he ejaculates. Every woman seems to have a different definition that would make the notch count mostly meaningless. The standard definition isn't perfect, but at least you know, at the minimum, what happened.

Onto flag questions:

"How about if she moves to America at 10 years old from her birth country and is basically American?"

If we go by our objective definition, we'd count that flag. This is one of the downsides of the flag metric that will boost every guys's count by a couple flags. But notch count has its own problem where even those hogs you've banged have equal footing with your more respectable encounters.

It's impossible to draw the line and figure out how old is old enough to be flag worthy. How about if she moved here when she was one-day old? Well just like with the one-inch penetrator I'd roll my eyes, but I would not dispute it.

"How about if a girl was born in Madagascar to American parents, and then moved back to this country at a young age?"

This is where I tell you to stop thinking about situations that are going to be uncommon for 95% of men. Again, if you want to count that as a Madagascar flag then fine but you are beginning to shit on the spirit of this concept.

So we've got the notch, cost per notch, and flags as objective, though flawed, indicators of game tightness. In addition, hanging out with the guy for several nights and viewing a sampling of photos of the girls he has banged would paint a much clearer picture of his game.

I've also thought of cost per bang (CPB), which is your total dating expenditures divided by total sex encounters. I haven't touched this one because betas in serious relationships would probably compete very well with even the most supreme of players. If you do test it out though, I recommend you count a series of bangs in a continuous encounter (for instance a nighttime date that turns into a next afternoon exit) as one "bang."

John Rambo

May 20, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This first video shows how much information our brain processes without us consciously knowing it. Some filmmaker sets up two marketing guys with a challenge to come up with a campaign for a taxidermy chain. The end result is creepy.

The Rambo sequel is coming out in 2008 but there is a 3-minute trailer floating around…

Holy shit I gotta see that.

I really dig the one-man army movies because there is a part of me that longs to be that bad ass than can kill everyone without being seriously injured. Take note of the brutal but necessary ways that Rambo disposes of the Burmese scum, including the bare hand neck claw move. And you know he's going to bang that chick. Every now and I need to watch a movie that regresses me into my true primal state.

No Escape

May 21, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For the past two months I've been trying really hard to slow things down and not view women as pieces of meat, to just enjoy their company and not always try to bang them quickly. But no matter how hard I try, just knowing I have the ability to make something happen is enough for me to make it happen.

I met a girl at a bar and talked to her for maybe five minutes before I had to leave to catch the Metro. I have been telling myself I was done with numbers but she was cute and Venezuelan so I got it. Besides, I'm going to South America and it will be useful to pick her brain.

On the phone I found out that she is going back home in four days for several months. By the time she returns I will most likely be gone. A girl doesn't give you her number with one week left if she's not trying to bang, but I'm done with this casual banging, I said to myself. "How about ice cream?" Just for one hour, to talk.

Man, that night was chilly for ice cream. "Do you want to get a drink instead?" I said. Of course she wanted to. Once we started drinking that sangria I was put into situation that I'm all too familiar with. The auto-pilot switch went on. It starts with touching first, her hands, her arm, barely brushing her legs with mine, then a couple of stories (true stories of course) that indirectly display qualities that she probably wants in a man. Hours pass.

The more time she spends with me, the more my tentacles have a hold on her and the weaker she will get. Yeah, initially she was sitting there in a bar, mostly sober, thinking logically about how she's not a slut and won't fuck some guy she just met, but things change.

When I walked her home, I remember she told me earlier in the night that her rooftop has a good view of the Washington Monument and Capitol. Whether she said that purposefully or by accident, I'd be stupid not to use it. "How about you show me that view you were talking about? I can't stay for very long though." The time-constraint line came out without conscious thought on my part, just like how you can throw a ball in the air and calculate its mathematical trajectory without thinking of numbers or equations.

Girls can be so full of shit. She's telling me before how she is going to be busy before she leaves, but then after rooftop moves all of a sudden she's pretty free the next three days. You can't go wrong if you ignore everything a woman says and just follow her body language and actions and do what you had in mind.

The way I interact with women has more or less turned into a program. If this, then do that. With any situation that comes up I access a prior experience that helps me determine the best next move, like the Deep Blue chess program would do. It sounds technical and robotic but when you are doing this in the flesh it's more like art: the girl is digging you and you got this goal you are trying to fulfill and you have no idea how it's going to turn out. No two girls talk, kiss, or touch the same, and the pathway to bang ends up differently. The guys who are successful with the game are the least robotic because they can quickly adapt to different environments and girls. They have many different ways of getting to the same thing. I understand how the phrase “art of seduction” came about.

So I’m not going to mess with my before sex game. I’m not going to try to get to know girls better and see them as amazing creatures if there is strong physical attraction. As I found out over sangria, my brain won’t allow myself to make an evolutionary backwards step by artificially lengthening the time it takes to get girls into bed. If she’s trying to get banged, she will get banged. We’ll go with the flow (more like rapids) and have at least one memorable night.

Roosh Pregnancy Test

May 22, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm inventing a new home pregnancy test because I'm not satisfied with the ones on the market. Right now all the pregnancy tests are 99% accurate, which is way too accurate. I want there to be serious doubt if the test comes back positive to buy me some extra time to search for cheap one-way fares to a different country. The defining moment of my life should not come to me in a plastic tube brought from CVS pharmacy.

Introducing the Roosh Pregnancy Test ™, with an 80% accuracy rating.

With the Roosh Test, if it comes back positive there is a whopping 20% chance that your life is not ruined. That's a pretty good chance! Therefore there is no reason to stress out if there is a positive result. Until you do find out the true result, make a couple simple life changes to represent your renewed outlook on life, like moving and changing your phone number and birth name.

But how about false positives, you may ask, when the test comes back negative but the girl is actually pregnant? Let's take a closer look at the numbers. If the test comes back negative, there is a huge 80% chance that it's correct and she is really not pregnant. If you went to a casino and I could guarantee an 80% winning chance on a roll of a die, would you take the bet? Of course you would. There is only a 20% chance it is wrong and you are in fact screwed, which is pretty damn small, but not so small that if it came back positive you need to start calling abortion clinics.

A man's psychology is such that he needs to be eased into life-changing events. And that's what my inaccurate pregnancy test does, coating his brain with wonderful doubt and inoculating him against the big revelation that would put a halt to his correct lifestyle.

Happiness

May 23, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My Dad has a special dining room chair that only he can sit in. The regular chairs are plain, old, and without ass cushioning, but my Dad has a fancy chair with a large cushion and a carved design on the back. It's a few inches higher than all the other dining room chairs. His wife (my stepmom) bought it for his birthday.

When my Dad comes home from work around 5PM or so, the house is clean and a pot of tea is ready for him. He drinks his tea and plays with the kids or reads the paper while my stepmom cooks dinner. She cooks dinner at least five nights a week, and during those nights my Dad doesn't enter the kitchen except to get a glass of water. He doesn't do any cleaning either, and even if he wanted to there is nothing to do by the time he gets home. Everything she does is to make his life as comfortable and relaxing as possible, setting up a pleasant environment for him to continue providing for her and the kids.

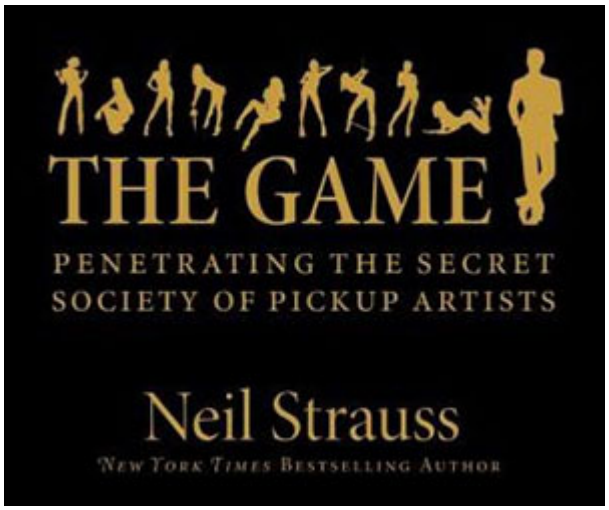
The concept of "me time" is foreign to her; it's family time twenty-four hours a day. It's hard even for me to imagine her asking my Dad to watch the kids while she goes out with friends. It doesn't happen and I don't think it ever will. If she wants to go out, the kids are going with her.

When I cook my own meals, my stepmom likes to clean up after me as I'm still cooking. I've had to fight with her many times to not do my dishes, but she does it anyway. And even if I clean up my own dishes, she thanks me. "Back in Iran, the man doesn't do any cleaning," she says to me. She was taught this from a young age. American public schools have taught me to clean up after myself so it feels weird that someone else wants to clean up my mess instead. Well it did feel weird but I'm quickly getting used to the Iranian way of doing things.

I know what you are wondering. "Is she is happy?" I can tell you with very high confidence that she is extremely happy. For a woman who grew up in a small Iranian town, coming to America, marrying a stable provider, and having two healthy children is like hitting the jackpot. I'm sure that there are women here who hit the American jackpot of marrying filthy rich that are much more unsatisfied than my stepmom. Living in a townhouse and driving a four-year-old Toyota to Ikea is the pinnacle of life to her. Imagine that.

In this country there are 17-year-olds whose parents have given them more material wealth than some of us will ever get to see. They have a "family" credit card and live in an upper middle-class McMansion that they travel from in a new car they received for their sweet sixteen birthday. When you have more than 99.5% of what other human beings have before you even start work, your view of life becomes distorted. In creeps entitlement and poor work ethic that affects your consumer habits (nothing is truly valued), how you view fun and pleasure (it can be bought), and how you approach human relationships (people are disposable).

My Dad has been hinting that he wants to return to Iran, but my stepmom keeps telling me how she doesn't want to go back because she loves life here. Happiness is relative, based on perspective and expectation—thinking too much is detrimental to happiness. Besides, you'll just hurt your head (existential depression is considered a medical condition). I doubt my stepmom wonders about those bigger questions of life. Are the kids fed? Is the house clean? Is the spouse happy? Is there food and shelter? Then life is great. But for a lot of my peers and countrymen, that simply is nowhere close to being enough.



Dragonfly Is Closing

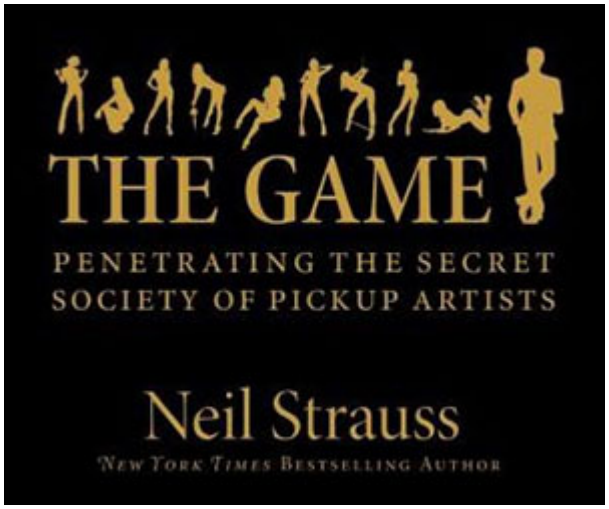
May 24, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Rumor has it that Dragonfly, my favorite lounge/club/whatever, is closing on Sunday or Wednesday. My 5 Washington DC Bars For Men post is already obsolete.

I'm surprised because judging by the Saturday night crowds it didn't seem like they were hurting for business. Someone told Virgle Kent said they are turning it into a boat shop.

Postscript: I went there Saturday night and they will indeed be closed after Sunday (May 27). The management of Fly lounge is taking over and is turning it into a water-themed venue that will be called Current or Wave. Just what we need: another "exclusive hotspot" that only cares about table service.

Postscript 2: Another source claims management will be from Play, and that the new club will open early fall.



Only In America

May 24, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Sunny Lane is a porn actress, which means she gets paid to have sex with random men on camera. Her career is managed by her parents, who are very pleased that their daughter is famous and making money.

XXX Family Values (work safe)

> For them, Sunny's co-stars are her "dates," and they say they'd rather her have sex on a porn set than with a "civilian" who might eventually break her heart.

I agree. It's much better for a girl to get fucked by hundreds of large cocks than to try for the kind of relationship that resulted in her existence. This type of thing only happens in cultures where money and fame is believed to be more important than qualities like self-respect and humility. My brothers in Afghanistan would agree that this would never happen over there.

I'm not mentioning this story because it's shocking or surprising, but to show that certain outcomes follow naturally from their corresponding beliefs. Next thing you know they'll have porn movies with mothers and daughters sharing the same guy.

Basic Travel Tips & Links

May 27, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've received a few emails from people my age asking for some travel advice. I'm posting this one because it has some helpful links for everyone.

> To plan trips I used to go to the bookstore and grab the travel books and sit there and read them. I don't know if you have tried this but it's pretty useless in trying to find places you think are good. There really is no travel guide written for the single young guy. I tried the internet too but it's mostly just advertisements and general info that the travel books have.
>
> So that leaves two real sources of decent info:
>
> 1. People you know, who know you and what you would like.
>
> 2. Message boards, with opinions that are more honest and current.
>
> Some sites I use…
>
> BootsnAll Travel Forum
> Road Junky – i read this regularly
> Hostel reviews
> FlyerTalk Forum
> Couch Surfing – myspace for travelers
> WikiTravel Guides – dry but free
>
> You may be reduced to picking a major city you like and just winging it. Once you get there it will be much easier to find things to do because you only have to ask the locals.
>
> As for travel tips, my main one is to keep your schedule as free as possible. Don't reserve more than your first couple nights of rooms and don't buy any bus/train tickets in advance. Once you get to the location, you will find out about things you can do and you want to be as free as possible to change your schedule.
>
> Roosh

In other travel news, it took me about six hours but I was finally able to get a custom map installed that keeps track of my whereabouts. When I post from down there, all I have to do is attach my longitude and latitude coordinates and a marker automatically shows up here. Then you can click on a post from that location. 😎

The Encounter

May 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Enough time has passed where I feel comfortable sharing something that happened to me in Venezuela. The emotional wounds have healed.

It was my fifth night there and I was on Margarita Island. That night I met a couple waitresses at a restaurant who took me to a club two blocks away. I thought I was going to hook up with one of the them but that didn't happen so I was on my own for the second half of the night.

Going through the back of the club put you directly on the beach. I dodged couples making out to sit on a sand ledge facing the ocean. The wind was strong that night, my friends. I closed my eyes and placed my hands on the sand behind me. This is the type of moment that is enhanced with a girl, I thought. Not two minutes later, a random girl I never met before did show up. She sat right next to me.

She was alright looking. Maybe a 6.5 out of 10. Cute but not hot. In bad English she asked me where I was from. I told her and then she said she was from Brazil. Then she gave me this lazy look and glanced at my lips. If you're a guy, you know what I'm talking about. It took less than 30 seconds for us to start making out on this sand ledge. I guess all those things they say about Brazilian girls are true.

We went back inside and I bought a round of Polar Ice beers (a dollar each). This girl is dancing in front of me as I'm sitting down enjoying my beer. Then she asks me where I'm staying. I had a $50 a night apartment with its own bedroom and kitchen, luxurious by Venezuelan standards. She asked me if I wanted to go back to my place.

Now this concerned me. I've had girls move fast on me before but this is exceptionally fast. And she is from Brazil, a land known for its casual prostitution. I told her that I wanted to hang out at the bar a little longer because I like the music. If she saw me as a potential client, I wanted her to get discouraged and move onto easier fish. But if she wasn't a prostitute, she wouldn't mind hanging out for a bit longer. I got a second beer and we hung out for another 30 minutes.

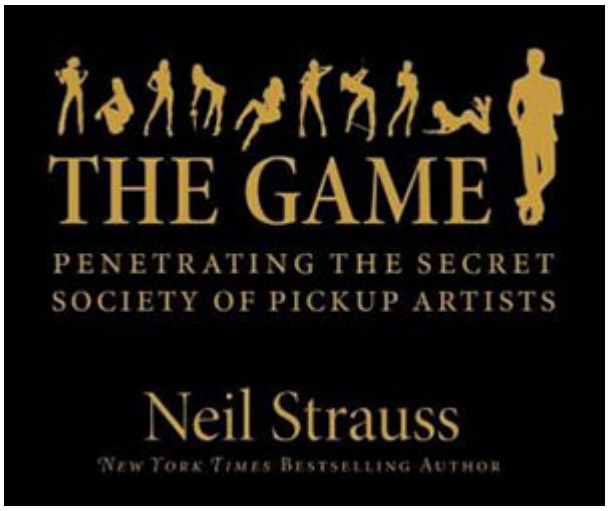
Once I knew her for an hour, I concluded that she definitely was not a prostitute. I was ready. "Why don't we go back to my place?" I said. She agreed, and we walked there. Inside I gave her a tour of the apartment that ended in my bedroom. I went to the kitchen to get some water and to put my cash in the refrigerators butter compartment—just in case she tried to rob me after I went to sleep.

Things progressed quickly in the bedroom. Within 10 minutes we were both completely naked. My condom use can best be described as a hair short of full safety compliance, but with this girl there was no fucking way I'm getting near her without one. She didn't look that clean anyway.

I put on a condom and got ready to make big penetration. Then she said something which has been permanently etched into my brain, Brazilian accent and all.

“Pay me.”

Part 2: Live and Learn



Live And Learn

May 29, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Continued from The Encounter.

I rolled off her onto the other side of the bed. In Spanish I said, “No me dijiste eso. No pago para el sexo” which I was hoping translated to “You did not tell me that. I don’t pay for sex.” I got on my back and stared at the ceiling. She said everything is okay and snuggled up next to me. I got the impression that she would bang anyway, but I was no longer in the mood.

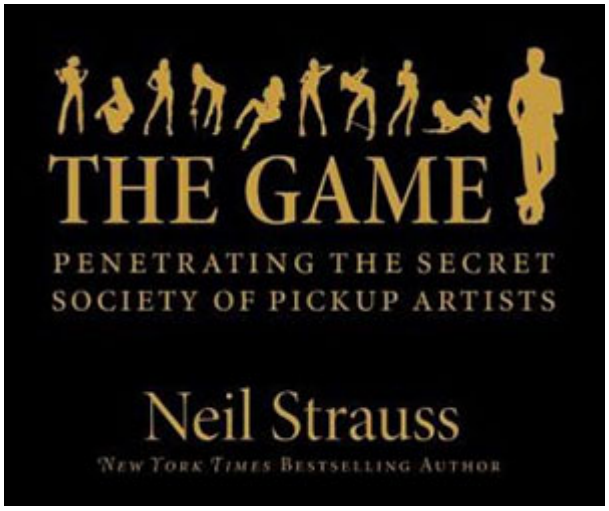
I laid there motionless and quiet, stunned, reliving the past five minutes of my life, still naked with a condom on my junk. There’s the prostitute, laying next to me. She’s probably thinking about how much money she lost on me. I felt dirty, stupid. She got up from the bed and put on her clothes. I put on my boxers and walked her out to make sure she didn’t decide to grab a snack from the refrigerator and discover my money stash in the butter compartment. No more words were exchanged between us. I went to the bathroom after she left and rinsed my mouth with Listerine and brushed my teeth, a mostly symbolic cleansing for I’m sure I already have everything that could be transmitted from mouth to mouth contact.

It’s tempting to say that I should have known, but I disagree. I’ve had some experiences with American girls which come close to the Brazilian, and when you have been bombarded with messages that Brazilians are hyper-sexual beings you figure it’s just their normal way of doing things. Plus I had too many Polar Ices.

I know what I will do next time: I will make a casual reference to being short of cash. Maybe I’ll ask her if the bar accepts credit cards or I’ll say that I’m only having one more beer because I spent all my money and can’t find an ATM. If she is a prostitute, she’ll probably ditch me immediately. Short of asking her if she is a prostitute, which may kill my chances if she isn’t one, any insinuation of being broke should do. Basically what I do now with American girls.

I had a grin on my face the next morning. What a fucked up but crazy experience to have. And all it cost me was a whole lot of sand she left behind on my bed. I’m smarter and have better prostitutite-dar than before, but I’ll be surprised if I don’t cross paths with another secret prostitute again. I’m just glad I didn’t touch her vagina with anything but my fingers.

Conclusion: Sleeping With Prostitutes



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Newsletter No. 6

May 30, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This weekend I'm sending out a newsletter about taking advantage of approach opportunities, and when you should beat yourself up for not doing anything. Sign-up in top right, or go here.

Some of the free email services act weird with the mailings, so I recommend you add roosh@rooshv.com to your address book. If you missed any of the previous newsletters, or come Monday you don't get this one, just send me an email.

Sleeping With Prostitutes

May 30, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

About half a dozen guys I've met since college have told me their story of sleeping with a prostitute. There was one thing in common with each guy: none of them actually paid for the prostitute, a relative or friend did. All of them made sure to stress that fact, which tells me that the shame isn't in sleeping with prostitutes, it's paying for it.

I'm not a fan of the "Well you are paying for sex anyway through dating" argument. Sure you spend money on food or drink with the intent of sleeping with a girl, but sex is never a sure-thing and in the end she sleeps with you because she wants to, not because she thinks she'll get something immediately after the sex act is done. I agree that there are golddiggers who put out to keep the good times rolling, but I doubt they actually count how many more dinners they will get from one additional instance of sex.

If I'm able to sleep with attractive girls on my own, I can't imagine a reason or situation where I would pay for one, even if I was about to jam it in. But how about if there is a girl who is incredibly hot and on a level way beyond anything I've experienced? If the price was right and she "looked" clean, I would give it consideration until the disease issue would most likely force me to back out. Morally and intellectually, though, I can handle it.

My Monthly Nut

May 31, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Since late last year I've cut everything I can from my monthly budget. I've reduced all recurring expenses to only three items:

Student Loans: $177
Cell Phone: $38
Blog Hosting: $15

Total: $230

If you don't count the cell phone, which I'm getting rid of when I leave, that means I only need $200 to cover my ass every month. I'm not counting car insurance because I just sold my car two days ago.

Now let's include optional spending on things like coffee, transportation, books, and entertainment. The reason I'm calling all these expenditures optional is because technically I can stay in my Dad's house all day and eat his food and surf his internet without spending a dollar. These figures are from May, which I'd say was a typical month.

Coffeeshop: $72
Dating: $24
Nightlife: $186
Outside food & 7-11: $43
Used books: $35
Public transportation and gas: $103
Gifts & favors: $4
Netflix: $16
Grocery store: $48
Target: $36

Total: $567

Therefore I need about $800 in income a month to maintain the status quo of drinking, reading, writing, and banging. But since living with my Dad is only a short-term arrangement, I'll really need about $1500 a month in income a month to account for shelter and electricity. That's $375 a week, which I can get by bartending again for 3-4 nights a week. If I lived in a developing country I'd need about half that.

A lot of people search for higher paying jobs (or even a second job) to pay for an expensive lifestyle, but my strategy is to go the other way. If you need less things then you can work less as well, giving you more leisure time to do the things you really want to do. While money issues will surface eventually, the only thing I worry about right now in life is missing the last Metro train home.

Summer Love Happy Hour

June 4, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Image Credit: Kathryn

When: Friday, June 15 @ 8PM

Where: Grand Central in Adams Morgan

Who: Arjewtino, I Now Pronounce You, KassyK, Virgle Kent, me

We have recruited a new member to the happy hour team: INPY, who displayed his hosting talent at a successful event two weeks ago.

This happy hour will take place at Grand Central, a new bar that I'm really liking even though there is usually a lot of white people. It's like a cleaner Front Page with better music and more attractive people.

Postscript: For a post that promotes this happy hour better than I just did, go here. The others: KassyK, Virgle Kent, and Arjewtino.

Rock Bottom

June 5, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The first time I went into Grand Central with my wingman, this girl gave me a smile. She wanted me to approach but her appearance was disagreeable. Thirty minutes later she gave me another smile but I still didn't bite. Finally she decided to take matters into her own hands when she slid up next to me at the bar. I was more intoxicated by then and open to talking to her, but no way I was having sex with her.

She gave up after a while because I kept giving one-word answers to her questions. She went to sit down next to her cuter friend, who VK took a liking too. Thirty minutes later he told me he wanted to get the friends number real quick and then we could leave. I tagged along and sat at the table.

The girl who liked me was half German and half Japanese, but unfortunately she was born in the United States so there was no flag consideration. Her face was all sorts of bad—she didn't really have a chin and I couldn't hold eye contact for more than three seconds. This would be like a negative notch.

I was being a good wingman until my beast said to me, "God you're so hot I just want to kiss you." Fellas, if a girl tells you that you're hot, you are way out of her league. Only "cute" is acceptable. I knew this but earlier in the day I checked my budget spreadsheet and saw that my cost per notch was just above my $50 goal for the year. If I bang this beast tonight, mission accomplished. So I banged her. I put a Turkish flag on her face and did her for my Mom's country.

After the deed was done, I looked at the clock and it was 1:30. My ride, the Metro, closed at midnight (it was a weekday) so I was stuck until the morning. I got up at 7am, looked at her face, and felt like dog shit. And I'm not being dramatic—I had to think of all the pretty girls I've dated to make myself feel better.

I stopped by McDonalds for a post-celebratory bang treat of a Sausage, Egg, and Cheese McGriddle. It was tasty and took my mind off the beast bang (the maple syrup is built right into the pancake buns), but I remembered why I stopped going to McDonalds during each of the three times I visited the toilet that day. I deserved loose stools after what I did. At home I couldn't even look my little brothers in the face.

I stooped low just to say I accomplished a goal that was experimental in the first place. The only thing a low CPN proves is that you are dirty and can get one night stands. But I already knew that about myself in the first place. Getting laid on the cheap is nice, but where's the emotional connection? Where's the passion? Where's the game growth? Where's the self-respect?

My CPN for 2007 will stand for eternity at $45. Its neon yellow box has been deleted from my spreadsheet.

It’s Time

June 6, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Reader mail:

> I need to know where you found that can of Stolichnaya vodka. I’ve been looking all over for it, but I can’t find it anywhere.

Ah yes, the can…

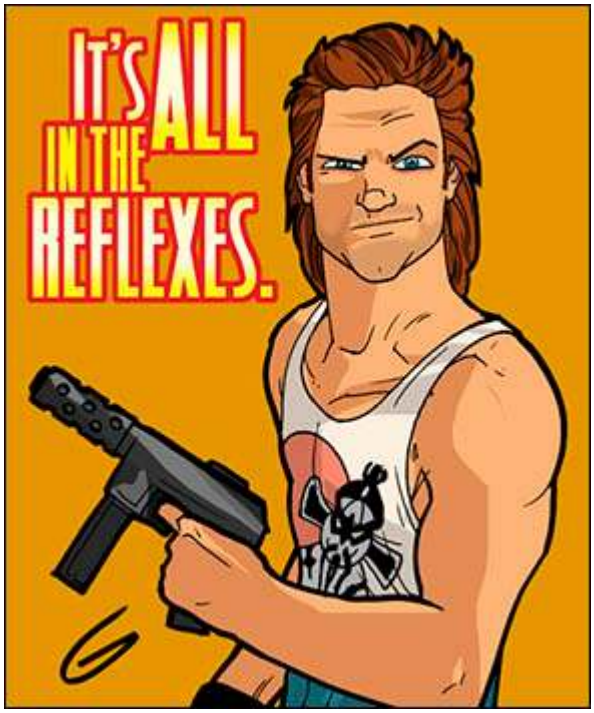
I bought it almost 18 months ago at a Venezuelan liquor store for about $4. The can is 12 ounces, meaning it will produce 8 standard shots.

I’m going to eat a gigantic meal, take the can to a party, and finish it without any chasers. I will be a superstar at the party. As long as I pace myself and munch on snacks, I see no problems with this plan.

Postscript: Well that was disappointing. I killed two-thirds of the can at a party on Saturday and barely got buzzed. The vodka had a semi-sweet taste so maybe the alcohol deactivated or something. Also, I was not the party’s superstar like I thought I would be.

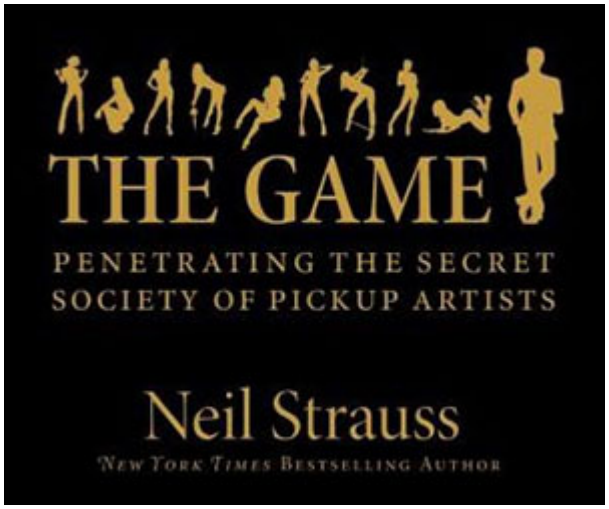
Roosh Update

June 9, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link



I've been working on the book. It's the only thing holding me back from leaving because I refuse to buy my ticket until the final copy is complete. I'll be done by the first week of July.

Also, Flag Day is coming up.



Most Retarded Question You Can Ask Someone

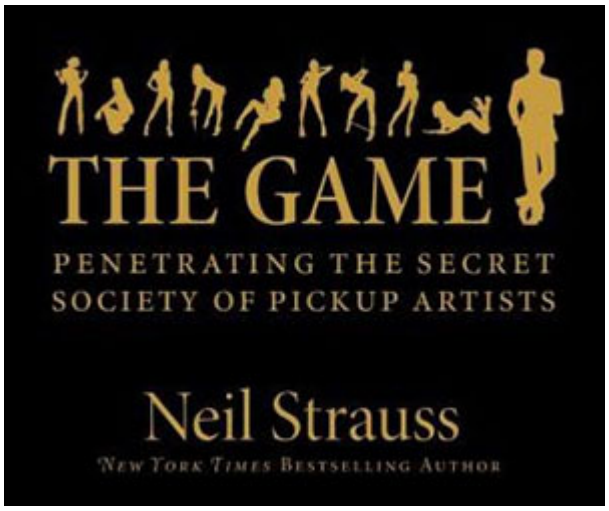
June 10, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When you meet someone new, there is one question you should never ask:

“What’s your story?”

Every girl who has asked me that has turned out to have no social intelligence. If you have any understanding on how to maintain a good conversation, you wouldn’t ask a question so open-ended that paralyzes more than inspires. Asking this question also shows you are lazy for not tailoring the conversation to the person’s unique background. It’s ten times worse than a guy asking “Do you come here often?”

There are two additional questions that seem similar but are not: “What’s your deal?” and “Who are you?” If a girl asks this with a smirk then she is pleasantly surprised by your personality and is beginning to consider having intimacy with you. These two questions are rhetorical in nature and let you know that your game is working.



Playful Vibe

June 11, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There is a fun date routine I do when I remember it. Usually this is done after you make out with her and there is a mutual interest. It's a play on when guys divulge their feelings for a girl. She thinks you are going to say something mushy and emotional, but then you go the opposite way. It takes some acting to pull off if you don't want her to catch on to the joke.

You need to say it slow and dramatically. Look down a couple times and purse your lips.

"There is something I have to tell you. I've been thinking about it a lot lately. It's not easy for me to tell you this, but it's something that must be said even though we don't know each other that well. This is what, date one? Still, it just won't feel right if I hold it in."

Look her in the eyes and hold her hand for effect. Now say something innocent you like that has no sexual connotation.

"I really like chocolate chip cookie dough ice cream. I'm addicted. I can't stop thinking about it."

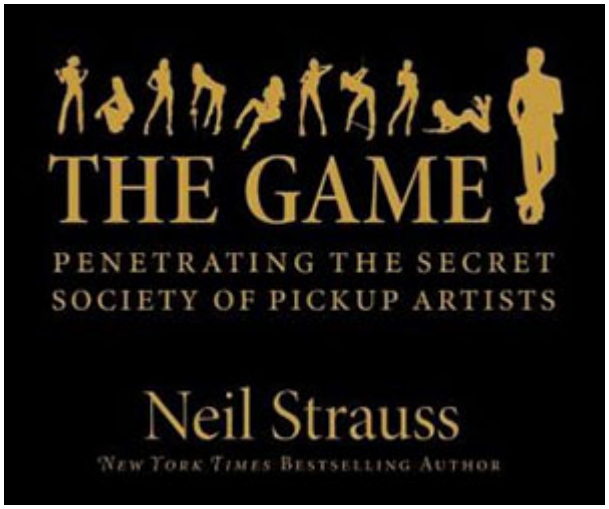
She will either roll her eyes or hit you.

There is a lite version you can do on the same night you meet her when it's clear she is interested in you. Look her in the eyes, with your hands on her hips, and say, "Do you have any idea what I'm thinking about right now?"

You're saying it in a tone where she thinks the answer is sex. Squint your eyes a little so it's all sexy like.

"This chocolate chip peanut butter cookie that they sell at Barnes & Noble. It's so good I could really eat one right now. I ask them to microwave it because the heat energy makes it taste so much better."

It gets a similar response. Fun girls appreciate a playful vibe.



Bet You Didn’t Know This

June 12, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In America, the word we have to describe when one person cradles inside another is “spoon.” You can even use it as a verb, as in, “I like spooning.” This term does not exist in other countries, such as Brazil.

In Brazil, they compare the cradling to oysters. If you want to tell a Brazilian person you want to spoon, say, “I want to lay like oysters.” No joke.

Happy Flag Day

June 13, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Today is Flag Day, a very important holiday that is also my birthday.

I am 28.

While last year I was concerned about my direction in life, this year I'm concerned about which South America travel guide I should buy (Lonely Planet or Footprint). I've been researching for two weeks but still can't decide.

And the Happy Hour is tomorrow!! What an amazing coincidence!!! (No really, it's a coincidence.) Since it's only one day away from my actual birthday, I think it would be acceptable for guests to buy me a drink.

My other co-hosts have have been promoting a Bring A Blogger theme. My theme is Bring Fresh Meat. I prefer meeting non-bloggers because they are usually more impressed meeting me than fellow bloggers. Surprisingly, I've discovered that people are meeting and doing stuff from these happy hours. In fact, two individuals who met at a happy hour I co-hosted are about to get married.

Grand Central is busy enough that you can spy first before making an introduction. If you are a ~~groupie~~ female fan then you need to hurry up and introduce yourself because I won't be here for much longer.

Blue Balls

June 14, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I don't think women understand that getting "blue balled" causes actual physical pain. It's not just something we say to joke around. Here's how it works:

When a man gets aroused, his testicles pump cream towards the end of the pipe in anticipation of sex. The cream has millions of little guys who want to get out, like a crowd of people trying to exit a burning building. If time passes and they're still stuck in the pipe, they get backed up and trample all over each other. This creates pressure, which is felt as pain by the man.

Getting blue balled feels like a 5-year-old punched you in the balls. It's not enough to bring you to your knees but the pain comes up to your abdomen and feels very uncomfortable. There is only one way to relive the pain, and that's to open the pipe so the little guys come out. This can either be done either with the aid of a female or alone in your parents basement.

The arousal has to be intense and sustained for there to be blue ball pain. Watching porn for an hour will not cause blue balls, but being physical with a girl for an hour where you play with her boobs will. I imagine each guy has a certain blue ball threshold.

Opening the valve on a high-pressure pipe causes a more forceful ejection. Cover your eyes.

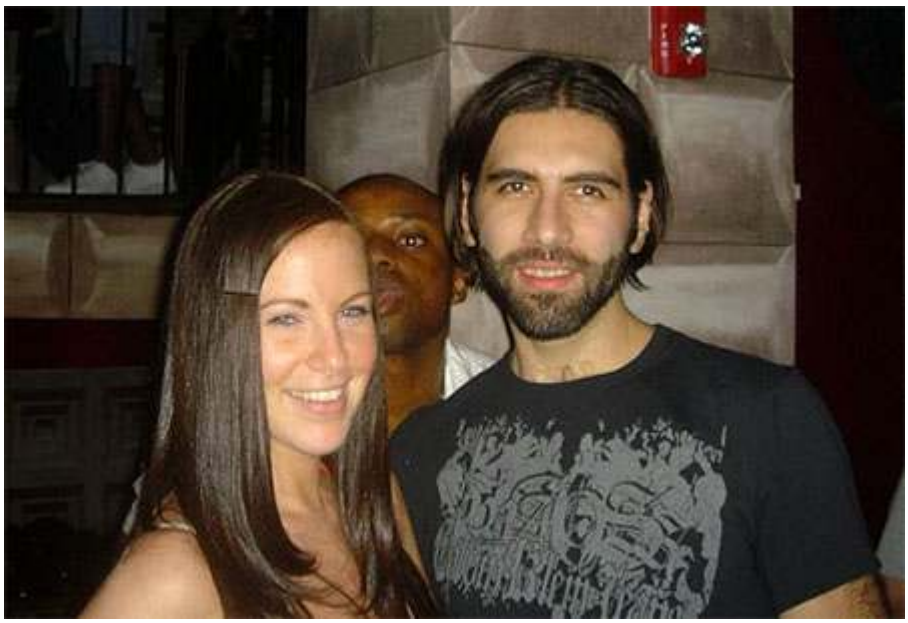
Friday Night

June 16, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Thanks for the shots.

Postscript: Excuse me for the weakest Happy Hour recap ever. It's one of those "What happens at happy hour, stays at happy hour" things. Arjewtino, KassyK, INPY, and Virgle Kent had better ones.

A picture:



I Have A Midland Accent

June 18, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm fascinated by accents. I can't get over how the way people speak is completely determined by their environment. If you were just born a few states down, your speech pace and pronunciation would be different. And you have no say in it: your parents chose for you when they picked where to raise you.

Americans forget that other foreigners see our accent as exotic as we see theirs. I've run into some foreign girls who have admitted that my accent is indeed hot. That did not include any British chicks though. The British see the American accent as a mangled, less proper version of their own. Fuck the British, I say. If you want to make a British person upset, ask them if they are Australian. (It's kind of like how we get pissed if someone thinks we are Canadian.)

Anyway, I always tell foreigners that they should learn English from me since I have the generic accent that you'd hear on TV. This pronunciation quiz proves I wasn't bullshiting:

> [You have] the default, lowest-common-denominator American accent that newscasters try to imitate. Since it's a neutral accent, just because you have a Midland accent doesn't mean you're from the Midland.

While I don't care for the French culture, I have to say their accent arouses me the most, man or woman.

Gay Pictures

June 19, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've been inspired by Arjewtino's gay picture to post two of my own.

Out of hundreds of photos that have been taken of me and my friends, these two were taken at the exact right moment to maximize homotron-ness. I'm not proud of them, but their stories must be told.

This was taken at Dragonfly almost two years ago. My appearance would be seen as normal had it not been for my friends Lindsey Lohan pose.

[image]

The second photo was taken at a happy hour last year. I really don't know what I was thinking, cradling my friends head like that. I'm not sure what he was thinking either. You can tell he's really snuggled up in my arm because his face is all squished. That's Sally the intern in the background.

And that's all I want to say about that.

Withholding Sex

June 20, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previously, I said:

> If I was a girl, I wouldn't sleep with guys so soon. This advice cockblocks me, but the best defense—to a man whose main goal is to sleep with girls as fast as possible—is to wait, especially since most guys are only willing to have sex with you once and never again. You don't want to put out until a guy shows time investment.

I believe this advice to be sound, but there is a downside in sex withholding: he may see you as asexual.

Say I go on five dates with a low maintenance but conservative girl who rejects all my sexual advances, and on all those dates I do not have an orgasm. What happens is I get used to this and see her as a girl less likely to give me sexual pleasure. As a result, I voluntarily put my junk in a lockbox. After a dog is used to being on a leash, he loses the will to escape. If you attempt to tame your new man's desire, you sap his sexual energy—what makes him a man.

Sexuality is needed to create sexual tension. If you keep your sexuality under wraps, there is no sexual tension. If there is no sexual tension, the man will not be sexually interested (unless he's a beta), and will be less willing to invest time into you. If you are going to postpone sex, get on your knees by date two, grab his dick on the dance floor, and whisper nasty things in his ear to let him know you are a sexual freak worth waiting for. Otherwise you may be perceived as frigid woman who can be better used as a lady friend to pick up other girls who would make more suitable lovers.

Your game has to be tight if you want to postpone sex. If you don't have tight game, your best bet is to have sex with him soon because that may be your best way to keep his attention. If you are not sure whether your game is tight, and by game I mean an vibe and attitude that regularly draws and hooks men, then it's not.

Age & Young Girls

June 21, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I got an email from a young guy:

> Ever since I turned 23, I have started to encounter occasional girls who ask my age upfront when I am asking them out. Both times the girl was 17 (so I understand a little) and since I have gone on to date some very hot girls that were 18. What have you seen as changes in the way younger women act towards you as you get 5 or 6 years older than them?

As I get older it keeps getting easier for me with girls of all ages, especially young girls. Only a minority of young girls will give you a problem about your older age. It's best to beat them to the punch and give them crap about their age first.

Several years ago, my 24-year-old friend took out an 18-year-old on a first date. The whole date he was ragging on her for being so young and inexperienced, that he just isn't "sure" about her. Her instinct was to prove him wrong with a blow job on the car ride home. He banged her once the ride ended.

If I'm much older than her, I'm concerned that she may not have enough experience to please me sexually and mentally. Her lack of experience is obvious when I talk about mine and she has nothing to respond with except her latest mall adventure. Your attitude will indirectly ask her, "What do you have to offer an older, mature man such as myself?" There is no reason you should let a younger girl qualify you because of your age. It is her youth that is a negative, and you must make it clear from the beginning when you respond with a semi-disappointed "Oh, really" when she tells you her age.

I Got Girls For You

June 24, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It took me five months but I finally enrolled in a salsa class. There are 12 girls in my class and most of them brought their life partner so nothing exciting to write about, but there are other classes…

Imagine this: 20 girls and only two guys. The girls, most of them young, wearing tight gym clothes and moving their hips in provocative motions, while the two guys try to keep up with shit-eating grins on their faces. This is the hip hop class that goes before my salsa class. If you're a dude, lose your ego and take a hip hop class. While odds are you won't bang a girl in your class, the skills will help in the club, especially if you weren't born with natural rhythm (i.e. you're white). Thank me later.

My Country

June 25, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My anti-Americanism has peaked. Like most Americans, I don't care anymore. Give me the serenity for what I cannot control, etc.

Things about this country I like:

1. Life opportunity. If you are willing to educate yourself, network, and move your ass, you will be rewarded with a salary above the national average, and a lifestyle better than 98% of the world's population. Money will not be a problem as long as you live within your means.

2. I'm fluent in the native language. One thing slowing me down from making an equivalent salary in another country is language, but a lot of immigrants here prove it is a hurdle that can be overcome.

3. Fast sex opportunity. There will always be strong demand for men who know how to turn on women using words and touch instead of money and status. The market is saturated with guys who don't have a clue.

4. The Bill Of Rights. Even with the erosions to our rights since 9/11, there are not many countries where I can tell a police officer that he can't enter my home or search me or my car, or one I can say that our current president sucks horse cock without going to jail. While police agencies are revenue corrupt (parking tickets, red-light cameras), I feel confident that most of my interactions with law enforcement will not end with a beating or drug plant.

5. Target (and it's little cousin, CVS). From sex lubricant to cutlery, gardening supplies to crazy pills, I love how I can walk in a building near my house and buy everything I could possibly need. Compare this to a European pharmacy where your two choices of bar soap are hidden in cabinets and you need to find a clerk to buy chapstick.

Things I don't like:

1. Consumerism. The masses devote their life working to buy luxury crap and Ikea furniture, asking what thing can be bought to bring happiness instead of what can be experienced. The result: a superficial culture that turns something like a stupid party slut going to jail into a national obsession.

2. Aggressive government. With over ~~600~~ 700 military bases worldwide, we're in everyone's business to preserve the power and interests of the white man elite. People's lives, American or not, are meaningless.

3. Corporate power. Industries that form trade groups to spread propaganda and buy politicians have the power to write public policy to maximize profits at our expense.

4. The suburbs. A soulless experiment of strip malls and asphalt that waste the world's most precious energy resource with automobile dependency while isolating individuals to cars, cubicles, and assembly-line houses.

5. Female obesity. If you lower the obesity rate here to a country like France, and reduce the shallowness that stems from individualism and consumerism, American women would compete well with foreign women. Finding a thin American who is not messed up in the head and girlfriend worthy is so hard here that I wonder if going to another country would completely solve the problem.

Even with the negatives, this country is a comfortable, safe, and decent place to live, one that I intend on growing old in unless I find something better. While I don't have American pride, I back all of you up whenever a Aussie or British traveler tries to talk trash with their "Americans are so fat/stupid/materialistic" talking points. I can make fun of Americans because I am one, but I'll be damned if I let someone who eats Vegemite (yeast waste) trash my fellow countrymen.

Laundry List

June 26, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Everyone has a laundry list of qualities they want in the opposite sex. This is especially true for women, whose ideal type often crosses into the fantasy realm. If you break down these lists down into component parts, almost everything can fit into three categories: personality, appearance, and sexuality.

Personality is connection and rapport. Can you spend time with her outside the bedroom? Do you not wish she would stop talking?

With appearance, is she easy on the eyes? Can I take her out in public without constantly thinking I can do better?

Sexuality is chemistry, both inside the bedroom and out. Can I not keep my hands off her? Can she take what I have to give her? Does she seem conscious when I am giving it to her?

Two of these categories need to be satisfied to casually date someone. Usually it's appearance and something else, because these days we are meeting people in bars and clubs instead of being set up on blind dates by our parents. If brighter lighting or sober eyes take away the appearance, the something else won't be good enough to continue seeing the person ever again. Relationships where two categories are met usually last a few dates until things stall out.

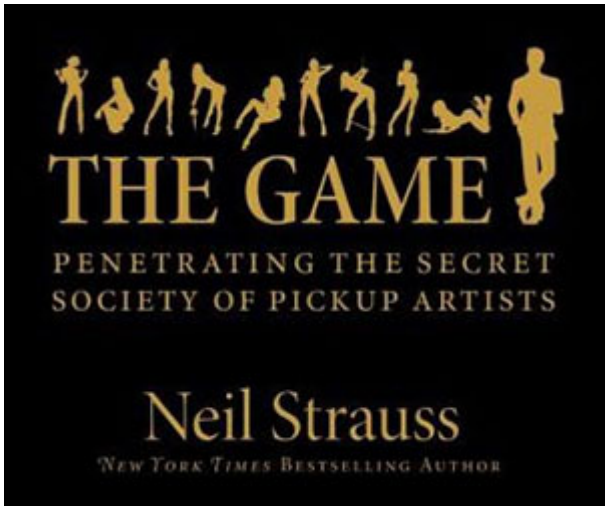
If the third category is satisfied, she is officially compatible with you. The usual result is you will still be in touch with her one year down the road, whether you are dating or not. A common reason a relationship wouldn't work in this case is bad timing.

You need to prioritize your desired qualities. This is my ranking:

1. Appearance
2. Personality
3. Sexuality

Sexuality is third because most of the time I'm spending with a girl will be talking to her and not banging.

What I see with girls is they write off men who don't possess all the qualities they want, and keep in mind their lists are twenty times as long as a guy's. Instead of having a prioritized list, everything for them is weighted equally, which produces the spinster phenomenon we are all too familiar with. As long as a girl is very strong in your two most important categories, it may be worth it if you can work on the third. I'm not saying to settle, but I am saying be realistic and open to someone who is satisfying your most important needs. Because you will not find someone who completely satisfies them all.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Peanut Butter & Jelly

June 27, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Two years ago I got trashed on my 26th birthday. After my friends drove me home, I stripped down to my boxers and made peanut butter and jelly sandwiches, my favorite food. This video is them making fun of me while I eat my sandwich. It's pretty embarrassing but enough time has passed that I don't mind sharing.

Speaking of trashed, me and this guy are heading to the beach today and staying until Sunday. I'm taking my camera.

Kwik-E-Mart

June 30, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Several 7-11's have turned into Kwik-E-Marts to promote the upcoming Simpsons movie.

Here are pictures (my favorite)

One of the stores is in Bladensburg, Maryland. Its address should be updated here. I want to buy a Squishee.

Postscript: Picture from the Bladensburg store…

Virginia Beach Sucks

July 1, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm never going back again. Ocean City, Maryland is superior is many ways:

-The Drunk Bus, for a last ditch attempt to get laid after the bars close
-More high school girls
-Crowded boardwalk for people watching
-Better bar venues without tattooed meathead military guys and fading cougars (though Ocean City has more white trash)
-No supersonic jets flying over you every five minutes

That jet noise, which is much louder than commercial aircraft, is due to the nearby naval base that operates 7 days a week. You had to pause your conversation every time a jet flew overhead. Now I understand how the Japanese feel.

The actual beach was alright, with ample opportunities for beach game, one of the hardest forms of game. Success at beach game, where you talk to girls on the actual beach, has eluded me even though it's similar is concept to a form I am competent in, street game. Well this weekend I found out what beach game is:

The first thing you notice on the beach is other people's bodies, so it would make sense that a slightly muscular body helps. If you go up to girls with a body like that, they will be very open to talking to you. A little too open. While girls were busy checking him out, I was wondering if my increasingly furry coat would make it harder for me to get a tan.

The highlight of the trip was the first night there when The Body introduced me to the drinking game Power Hour, where you drink a shot of beer every minute for an hour. It sounded easy but after 40 minutes the burping and bloating combined with some gagging made it a challenge to complete. We went to a bar afterwards where I found a chair in the corner and sat down. Three hours later, the bar closed and I got up. We didn't play that game again.

My only regret from the trip is that we didn't get an intimate scopes picture to cherish this beach memory forever.

Girls Have Normal Sense Of Time

July 2, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Three years ago a girl told me after sex that the last time she did it was a “really really long” time ago. Because I’m curious to a fault, I asked her how long was it. For me, really really long is six months, the longest I’ve gone without sex since losing my virginity. Her answer: “almost two months.” Since then, I’ve noticed that “long time” is getting shorter. It’s just a matter of time until I get “last week.” Keep in mind that I don’t dig for this information. It usually finds itself thrown out there in the bedroom ether.

Because women start feeling very uncomfortable in just a few weeks of no sex, I’m forced to conclude that men are the sexual camel of the species. We can wait so long because we are used to waiting, unlike a girl who can be banging in 2 minutes from the time she makes the decision to bang. Therefore, men are more patient than women, more likely to control their sexual desires (not necessarily by choice), and less likely to need instant gratification. That goes against the fact that many men have banged monsters, but I’m confident those were isolated incidents, in rare moments of weakness.

Finally

July 4, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After nearly 9 months of work, my book is completely finished. It will be ready for you on Tuesday.

I declare the nondescript cover design a success. During the final read in Starbucks over the course of three days, not a single person gave it a double take, unlike when I read this book.

Joseph Epstein:

> Before I had first done so, writing a book seemed a fine, even grand thing. And so it still seems — except, truth to tell, it is a lot better to have written a book than to actually be writing one. Without attempting to overdo the drama of the difficulty of writing, to be in the middle of composing a book is almost always to feel oneself in a state of confusion, doubt and mental imprisonment, with an accompanying intense wish that one worked instead at bricklaying.

The first thing I did when I finished the book was eat a bowl of ice cream. The second thing I did was buy an air ticket to Quito, Ecuador. I leave August 7.

Flags Gold Standard

July 5, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In person I have been getting a lot of comments about the flags metric, which even girls are telling me is "fun."

A while back I wrote about my 50 notch friend. I asked him to email me a list of his flags, thinking he would probably be around the 10 flag mark. He's at 16, the most out of any man I know. Since he has many international flag repeats, this means that more than 1 in 3 girls he has banged was born in a different country, an incredible feat. His flags:

Armenia
Belarus
Bolivia
Colombia
Brazil
Bulgaria
El Salvador (least valuable flag)
France
Greece
Iran
Mexico
Peru
Russia
Turkey
Ukraine
United States

His conquest of Eastern Europe is strong, and brave exploration of the Americas have been noted. From this list we must conclude that he does not get along with Africans and Southeast Asians. I liken him to the Pizarro of our generation.

Lolcats

July 8, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I used to be all over Cute Overload and Stuff On My Cat, but I'm moved on to the lolcats.

> A lolcat is an image macro featuring a photograph of a cat with a humorous and idiosyncratic caption. The name "lolcat" is a compound of lol and cat.

Visit Slate for a good historical background. The clearinghouse for lolcat imagery is icanhascheezburger.com.

This is my favorite one, only to be appreciated to those who, like me, have a firm understanding of the Italian language:

The next logical variation is lolgame:

lolgame.com is taken, unfortunately.

Bang FAQ and Newsletter No. 7

July 10, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The comments yesterday inspired me to make a FAQ about the book. It includes information about delivery, signed copies, and how much I get per sale.

This weekend I'm sending out newsletter no. 7 about what to do when a girl tries to cancel a date on you. The newsletter is a good bet if you on the fence about buying the book since it discusses similar topics with a similar writing style. Sign-up on the right.

Let me know if you don't get anything by Monday, or if you want to check out the newsletter archive. I'm sending it with a new service that should fix the delivery problems.

Girl Notches

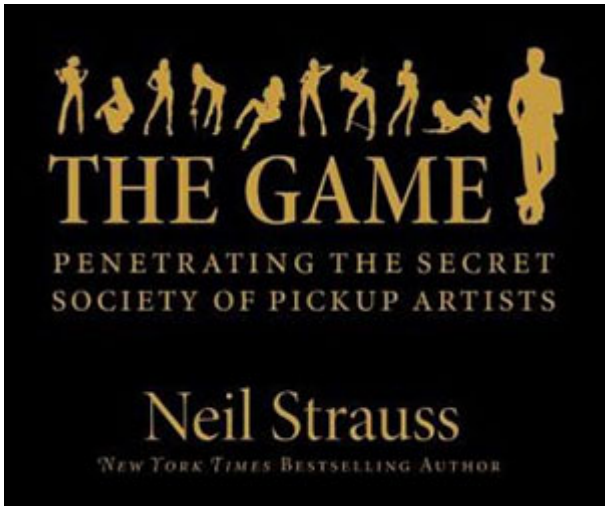
July 11, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I never ask girls how many guys they've been with. I rather not know so my virgin princess image of her is not disturbed, but unfortunately it's not that hard to put together an estimate based on what I already know about her. For example:

Did she have a long-term relationship longer than 2 years? –10 notches
Is she an engineer or computer programmer? –5 notches
Does she own a Coach bag? +5 notches
Does she have a tattoo? +5 notches for each one
Does she know what she's doing in bed? +6 notches
Is she a teacher or feminist? +7 notches
Does she drink more than three nights a week? +8 notches
Was she in a sorority? +8 notches
Does she flirt well and know how to play the game? +15 notches
Has she been in a threesome? +20 notches
Did she take one year off to travel through Europe? +25 notches
Has she ever been a stripper, or at least considered it? +50 notches
Did you have sex with her within one hour of meeting her? +100 notches

The Daily Mail has an article about female notch count, including a picture of five British girls and their respective counts. Check out the cutest girl on the right, who I think most men would give at least a 7. Her appearance is not atypical of the girls me and my friends have dated. Of course she has to have the most notches, at 180.

If a girl I've been with told me I was number 181, I'd take a deep breath and consider the facts. If having sex with her wasn't like throwing a hot dog through a garage door and she doesn't have any STD's, caring is just an emotional response. It is at this moment that my mental strength and logical thinking would be tested against cultural programming. Even though four football teams of men have had their way with her and I comprise a pathetic 0.55% of all the men she has been with, I would continue the relationship if she was fulfilling my needs. But since she is probably bored of vanilla sex with all that experience, one different thing I'd do is introduce some Rocco-inspired bedroom technique to fulfill my darkest, nastiest desires.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Grimiest Bar In DC

July 12, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It took over six years but thanks to these two I can say with confidence that I've been to the grimiest bar in all of DC: Dan's Cafe.

The main seating consists of a long cafeteria style table in the middle of the room. Against the wall are old wooden booths that appear to be collapsing, along with a jukebox, pool table, and half-a-dozen fake ferns hanging from the ceiling. The only light comes from various beer novelty signs, making everyone—including the scary looking bartenders—extremely attractive.

At Dan's Cafe instead of ordering a drink, you pick a mini bottle of liquor hanging on a shelf towards the back. The "bartender" then opens the bottle and pours it into a glass. He gives you a bucket of ice, a mixer of your choice, an empty glass, and then tells you to sit your ass down and not cause any trouble. The only thing missing is a bulletproof shield around the cashier.

Since you are not paying for ambiance, the alcohol is priced with value in mind. My mini bottle of Absolut Citron cost $15. From that you can make 4 drinks, which at a yuppie bar would cost $32. Some of the cheaper bottles go for $10. I was severely inebriated within an hour.

I think it would be a good idea to take a first date here. Tell her you want to start the night in a cozy bar with character, then act like it's the most natural thing in the world to be drinking from mini-bottles while trying to identify which bathroom the ultra-concentrated smell of urine is coming from (mens). This would be an excellent way to test her shallowness and girlfriend worthiness. Chill there for an hour then take her to a normal bar like the Reef nearby, which will seem like the Delano in comparison. My time is up here so I'll need a brave male reader to do this and then report back for our entertainment. Obviously it has to be a player who dates often and doesn't give a shit if he bombs on a first date, which he almost certainly will here unless the girl is under 24.

City Paper & Late Night Shots

July 13, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The City Paper dealt some hilarious ownage to Late Night Shots on Thursday. The reporter's encounter with three LNS members:

> Then the bearded one in the middle busts out with this: "Do you like anal sex?" I squint. I'm confused. "Do you do anal?" he repeats, head bobbing with excitement. The litany continues. Do I want to take it in the ass? Have I ever taken it in the ass? My silence is taken as an affirmative and he announces that this interview will go no further unless he receives a hand job.

I bet you these guys thought it was the funniest thing in the world to ask a reporter for anal, high-fiving each other and laughing it up for being such badasses—until she published names. Now members mentioned in the article are crying libel in the comments like little bitches.

> Code words like "turbo" and "turbette" help posters maintain the site's exclusivity. The lingo ranges from abstruse to obvious. In addition to "takedowns" and "going to poundtown" or "PT" (getting laid), there's "big timing" (snubbing someone, often a member of the opposite sex, at a bar), "smoke" (an attractive LNS member), and "RBV" (a Red Bull with vodka, the preferred drink of many LNSers).

I guess they have to come up with new code words now that everyone knows what the cryptic "poundtown" means. Another LNS member showcases his superior game:

> He says he knows people talk behind his back, but he doesn't care. He's rich, and that's all that matters. "My brother and I, we do all right," he says. "Guys with money can do whatever they want." He grabs me again and says, "You're kind of cute."

He failed. Overall I found the article to be fair and balanced.

A part of me feels sorry for LNSers, especially the guys. They are just going through college withdrawal and want to be a part of a community where they can get laid with look-at-my-business-card game. As long as they keep their stripped collars and funny boat shoes in the tourist hell that is Georgetown, let them think they are special and high-brow, where nothing says class like a Red Bull and vodka.

Average Late Night Shot member → ← City Paper reporter

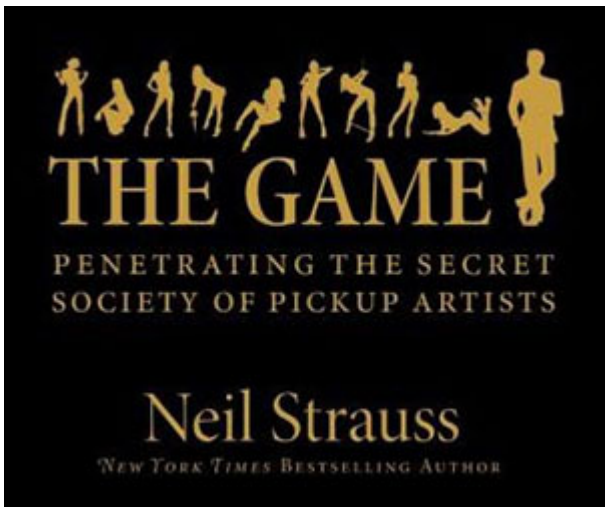
First Bang Review

July 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm so used to instant feedback on the blog that it's a little nerve racking having to wait for opinions on the book. Here's the first review, posted on Lulu.

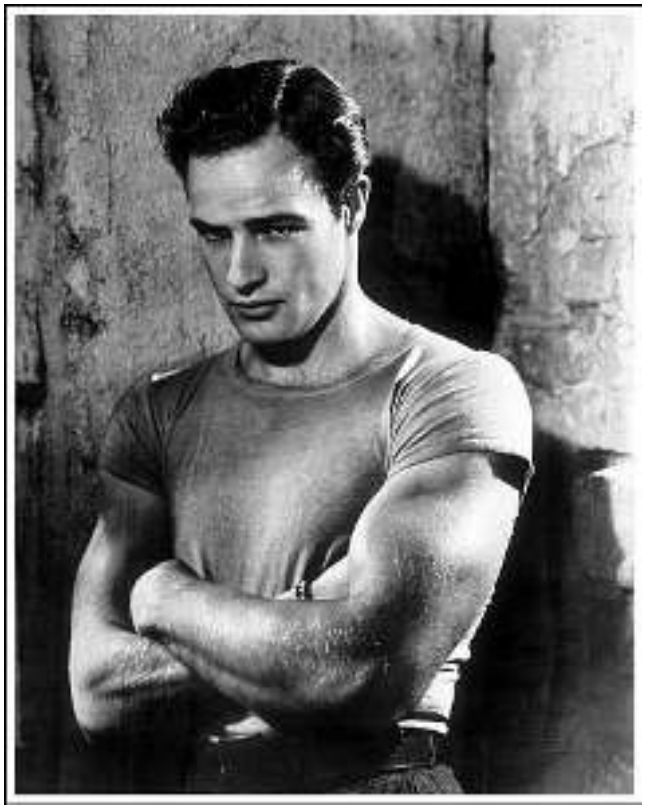
> If you have never read any book on the subject this book is a highly recommend because it sequentially covers all aspects of attracting a girl. It talks about; confidence, approaching, cock blocks, phone game, logistics, conversation, dates, first kisses, removing clothing, relationships, and breaking up.
>
> For people who have read other material, such as me, it's still an enjoyable read largely due to he unique perspective of the author who lets you inside his head.
>
> Some things that stood out for me…The phone game description is some of the best I've seen. Taking clothes off is something most authors skip, this author walks through it. The part of dumping a girl to maximize your chances of banging her later is great. Certain dating rules….
>
> My only complain is that it was too short. It's 140 pages, I read it in one day. The book has no fluff which is probably why I was able to read it non stop.
>
> The intended readers are people who are not getting the results they want with their current methods or people who enjoys reading different perspectives on "game". If you have never read anything on "game", buy it immediately, there is logic to the madness.

66 copies sold in the first five days.



A Streetcar Named Desire

July 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link



I finally saw A Streetcar Named Desire after getting tired of not understanding its references in film and television. The movie is about Blanche DuBois, a woman with serious issues who stays with her sister Stella and brother-in-law Stanley, a violent alpha male who is so hot that you can't help but forgive the first time he slaps his wife around. (From the movie one must conclude that she liked it.)

In one scene Blanche discusses her beta boyfriend Mitch along with truths that are as relevant today as they were 60 years ago.

> I guess I'm a little nervous about our relations. He hasn't gotten anything more than a good-night kiss. That's all I've given him because I want his respect. And men don't want anything they get too easy. On the other hand, men lose interest quickly, especially when a girl is over 30. When I mentioned marriage, they even forgot where I lived.

Poor Mitch didn't know at the time that Blanche was the go-to whore back in her home town. She was deceiving Mitch about her previous past, lying that she is chaste and inexperienced when in fact she had many "meetings with strangers."

I meet Blanche DuBois every time I go out. They are past their peak, desperate, and damaged, but they still want to get the attention that dating offers while waiting for a millionaire Shep Huntleigh to sweep them off their feet. They believe 40 is the new 20. Hopefully unlike Blanche they don't get raped and end up in a mental institution, but the common fate of winding up a cougar with too much disposable income does not seem like a happy alternative. The only difference between now and then is that back then at least the girls hid the fact they were playing the field. Serial dating has become such a badge of honor now that girls will discuss their experiences with anyone who’ll listen over a martini at happy hour, even their date.

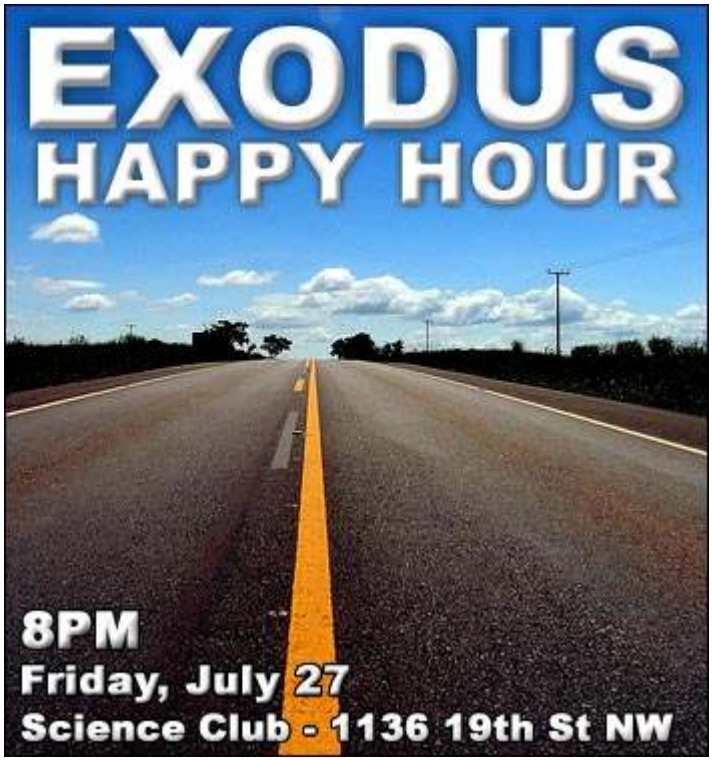
Exodus Happy Hour

July 16, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link



I'm very satisfied with how this image turned out.

Who: Arjewtino, I Now Pronounce You, KassyK, Virgle Kent, me

When: Friday, June 27 @ 8PM

Where: Science Club

A lot of people are getting ready for summer travel along with myself so why not have a leaving into the unknown theme. As with the previous happy hour, we are continuing our Bring Fresh Meat concept, where it was nice to see fresh meat having stimulating conversation with old meat. I'm going to bring a Sharpie and a few copies of the book (my "Roosh" signature has been perfected after 20 minutes of practice).

Even though this will be my last happy hour for quite some time, I don't want any tears from the ladies at the happy hour. I'll be posting plenty of pictures throughout the trip that you can set as your desktop background to maintain the closeness. As for the guys, drink buying and the Persian double cheek kiss and hug combo greeting is acceptable, but nothing gay.

Salsa Class

July 17, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I just finished taking my 5-hour beginner salsa class. If you are unfamiliar with salsa, it is a dancing style where the man always leads. This means my partner cannot do anything unless signaled by me, her God on the dance floor.

That leads to the main problem with salsa: I have to lead. When you are dancing with a girl to house or hip hop, you are doing your own thing and she is doing hers, with no real coordination besides keeping the beat. You grab her hips every now and then and rub your boner up and down on her and that's it. But with salsa you have to think about what you are going to do next and if it's a good move. Should I turn her now or do the cross body move? On what count do I do that intimate over-the-head caress / waterfall move? There are zero opportunities to rub your crotch on her and you can't drink while dancing because both hands must be devoted to maintaining God status.

A friend of mine said I'd be an idiot not to learn how to salsa before going to South America. I have a feeling though that my five hours of experience will not get the panties wet. How was I supposed to know that being good in salsa takes months of work? Well, my backup plan is ready—"Hola, soy gringo."

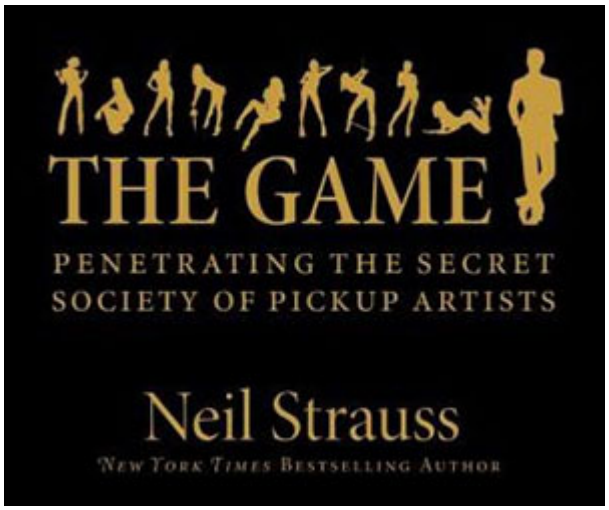
Until You Try To Bang A Girl

July 18, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A lot of girls act skeptical when I tell them stories about the dating behavior of their kind. With a tone that insinuates I'm exaggerating or even lying, I get responses like, "I don't know where you are meeting these girls" or "I don't know any girl that does that." There is no possible way that girls are as bad as I make them up to be, they say, and I must be only going after the really fucked-up ones.

The thing is, until you try to bang a girl, you will never know her true nature. Your college girlfriend who you've shared millions of tears with? You two are actually strangers. That girlfriend you've known since grade school? You might as well have just met on the street.

You do not know a female unless you push the emotional buttons that come with trying to enter her vagina. Her true nature is not talking about fashion or having pillow fights in silk pajamas—it's how she acts when she is being romantically pursued by a real man. If you have not tried to have sex with her then you're only experiencing the tail end of the coin. This is why so many girls think their kind is reasonable and normal, when in fact they are capable of the evilest of evil the world has ever seen.



Beef

July 19, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Several months ago during the early stages of writing Bang, I met a beta male who caused me to change the book. He was awkward and had poor conversational skills, and while I did not ask him about his sexual history, I would not be surprised if he was and still is a virgin. Based on the direction the book was going, would him and his buddies be covered? At the time I could not say yes. I thought about him for a few days and ended up adding more beef to the conversation and bedroom portions of the book. He is not aware of his contribution, and I don't think he wants to be.

One of the hardest parts of writing the book wasn't the actual writing, which was already in my head in the form of various memories, beliefs, and truths, but striking a balance where both the virgin and intermediate player would be taken to the next level, however distantly parallel those levels would be.

A section the inexperienced man will like is in the Late Game chapter where—in excruciating detail—I go over how to take off a girl's clothes, including the ideal order of removal. When you are reading this part, imagine me thinking back to all the girls I had sex, trying to crack the most seamless pattern.

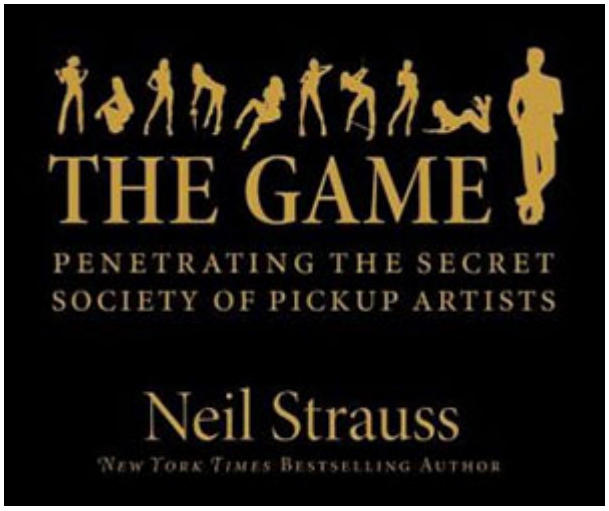
> Next up are socks. First take off hers, then followed by yours. It's very rare a girl will resist you taking off her socks. But if she does, simply skip this step and move on to the next one. Unlike most previous steps, taking off her socks is not necessary to continue because you can always try again later when more clothing is gone. Still, I imagine it would be awkward if you were having sex with a girl and her socks were on.

I hope to get at least one email from a guy who is devirginized because of my work. This is my contribution to the world.

Back

July 23, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

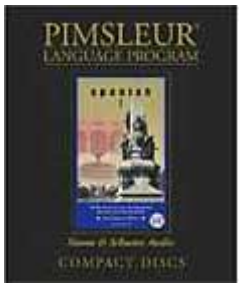
Bang is back after being unavailable on Lulu for about 36 hours starting on Sunday night. If you were waiting to buy it, grab it here.



How To Teach Yourself Spanish

July 23, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

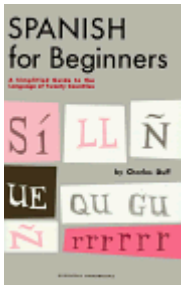
I've been studying Spanish on and off since December 2005 and often get asked what materials I use. While I'm far from being an expert in Spanish, I think I'm stumbled on a formula that makes studying easy and relatively inexpensive. This method is for individuals who want to study at their own leisurely pace without taking classes.



Pimsleur audio courses. Pimsleur is a language instruction brand that teaches you through 30-minute call and response audio lessons. For Spanish and other popular languages, there are three units, each with thirty 30-minute lessons. At thirty minutes of practice a day, it took me about nine months to knock out all three units (some lessons need to be repeated several times). If you finish one or two units and study a Spanish phrasebook that has the most common tourist sayings, you will be comfortable getting around in a Spanish-speaking country. The downside of Pimsleur is that your comprehension of native speakers is low—they often talk much faster than the speakers in the course.

You can buy the courses from about $152 a unit (Google around).

Reading materials. After you finish Unit 1 of the audio course, it would be a good idea to know how the language looks. The Spanish For Beginners textbook fills in gaps from the audio course, and if you study one chapter a week by three months you will be able to read and write in Spanish. Everyone, especially Spanish speakers, will make fun of you for having a book written in 1958, but it's the best Spanish textbook I've found and you can find it used on Amazon for under a dollar. I think the author is dead.



Spanish For Beginners

The Bertlitz phrase book's travel chapter is most helpful, with phrases like No me siento seguro aquí and ¡Eso es un escándalo!

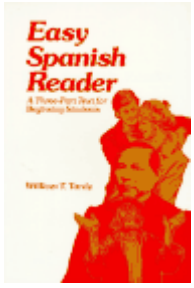
Berlitz Spanish Phrase Book

Throw in an idiom phrase book and a common word book to expand your vocabulary.

1001 Most Useful Spanish Words

Guide To Spanish Idioms

Another helpful book is a reader.



Easy Spanish Reader

This reader defines new words in each new passage and builds off previous lessons until you are reading semi-difficult works in Spanish.

Finally, something handy to have around is a verb conjugation book. It’s optional because you can always look up conjugations online.

The Big Red Book Of Spanish Verbs

Make a notecard for every word you don't know in the textbook or reading materials. It's important to make a notecard of a word regardless if you think you'll use it in conversation or not because you can't predict when you'll hear the word in speech. Maintain a "living" stack of notecards, where you regularly add new words and take away ones that you've memorized.

Words I know

It's helpful to use a mnemonic to memorize words. For example, the word for crab is cangrejo. That's hard to remember until you tell yourself that crabs come in cans that are grey. Eventually the word sticks in your brain and you no longer need to use the mnemonic. Once you know the words, the next challenge is to use them in a conversation with someone. Example: Creo que tengo cangrejos (I think I have crabs).

Spanish media. To get used to the tongue, rent movies in Spanish and listen to salsa or reggaeton. This helps your brain get used to hearing the language, and perhaps you'll pick up on a few words through osmosis.

Recommended Movies

- Y Tu Mama Tambien
- The Sea Inside
- The Motorcycle Diaries
- El Bola
- Secuestro Express
- Amores Perros
- Volver
- All About My Mother
- Talk To Her

Music

- Anything by Juanes or Wisin y Yandel

There is no secret to studying a language other than spending time to memorize and practice the material. After a few months of a few hours a week of study, you can travel through a South American country and not feel lost and confused trying to get around. With one year of study, you'll be able to read menus, understand directions, and have conversations with the locals. When I went to Venezuela I had completed Unit 1 of the Pimsleur course and studied the phrasebook and got around without too much difficulty. Between my bad Spanish, their bad English and hand signals, the gist of things were understood.

If you want to put in the least amount of work to learn the language, only get the Pimsleur audio course. You can convert the audio files into MP3's and do them while you are stuck in traffic. Once you are ready to be tested, go to South America where there are much fewer English speakers than in Spain. You will feel insecure about speaking for the first couple days, but you get comfortable fast once you realize that other people understand what you are saying. Buena suerte! (Good luck!)

The 1-10 Scale

July 24, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm familiar with two ways to rate a girl's appearance: the binary scale and the 1-10 scale. The binary scale tells only says if a girl is bangable or not, but doesn't describe the degree of bangability like the 1-10 scale, which my circle of man friends prefer using.

We calibrate the 1-10 scale by starting with 7, a rating that describes girl-next-door cuteness. She has no major flaws and is girlfriend material for 90% of guys. The problem with 7's is one of relativity: while out with one you run into a handful of girls who are better looking than her. In most men this stirs thoughts of "Can I do better?"

7

An 8 is very cute. The relativity problem disappears but one of personality emerges instead. The hotter a girl is, the less she has had to work on her personality to be liked by others. Because her looks have been enough to get her what she's wanted throughout her entire life, she does not have the training or desire to go the extra mile to please and engage you.

8

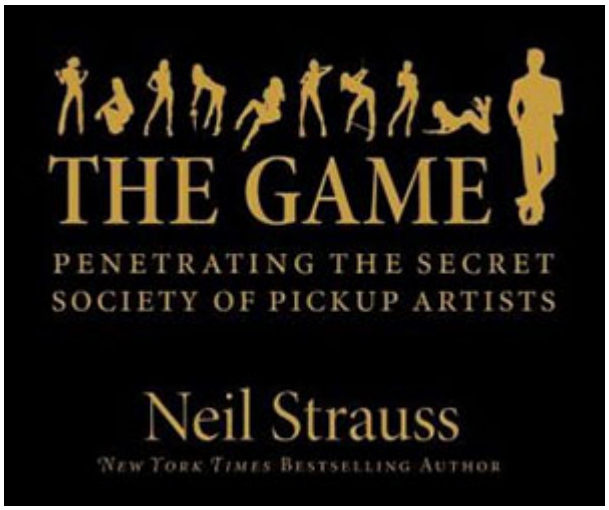
A 9 is what most men would describe as "hot." Getting a 9 seems to be more luck and timing than skill because—besides celebrities—there is no man who consistently gets them. The personality problem you had with an 8 is multiplied with a 9 in logarithmic fashion.

9

The only difference between a 9 and 10 is makeup, clothing, lighting, or photoshop, so therefore 10's do not exist naturally in the wild. Describing a girl as a 10, or dime piece, is unreasonable since you are admitting that the girl is perfect, something that no human is.

A 6 is a girl who is cute when she works at it, but her flaws are easier to notice. Still, it's a respectable rating. Anything under a 6 means you need to drink alcohol to get aroused for sex, especially when you get into the "monster" range of 3 and below. Every man has banged a monster in his life, because men are unable to resist free, no investment sex.

Except me, of course.



First Impressions

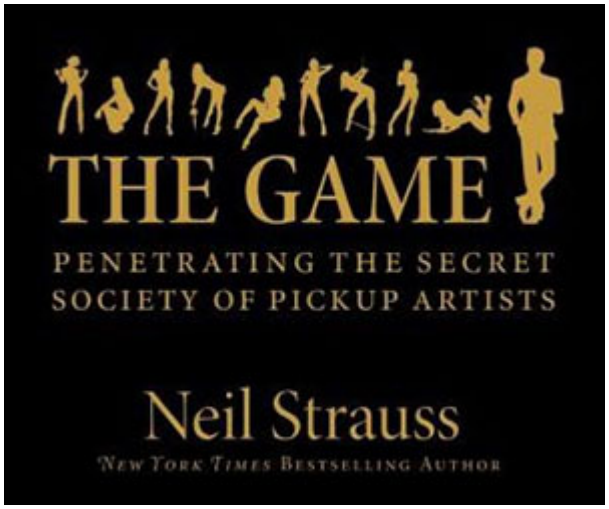
July 25, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I used to come across an older Russian woman in the hallways of my former job. I would often make eye contact and offer up a small smile but she never reciprocated. I remember even saying hi to her one time only to get silence in return. After that I avoided eye contact and never tried to be nice to her again.

Years later, after half a dozen corporate restructurings, I found myself in the same team as her. Great, I thought. We ended up having lunch in the same break room next to our cubicle / lab farm. She turned out to be the friendliest person on my team, someone I could talk about things besides work. She even agreed with me on my thoughts about American women and spinsters, which would have never been shared unless we had strong rapport.

On my last day of work, I had my exit interview right after lunch. It was time to say goodbye to my lunch bunch. I gave the Russian a hug and she said, "Who would have thought that someone who seemed so mean would be such a nice guy!" Somehow two friendly people came across as total jerks to each other.

First impressions are useful because it serves as a shortcut to help us decide who to associate with and how to treat them. The only problem is when that impression is wrong, when someone is not aware of a rough vibe they are putting out. It's a question of whether you should give people the benefit of the doubt or not when they don't immediately respond to you in a positive way. How much perceived slight should you take when getting to know someone? I don't know, but I will speak louder when saying hi.



What I’m Doing Today

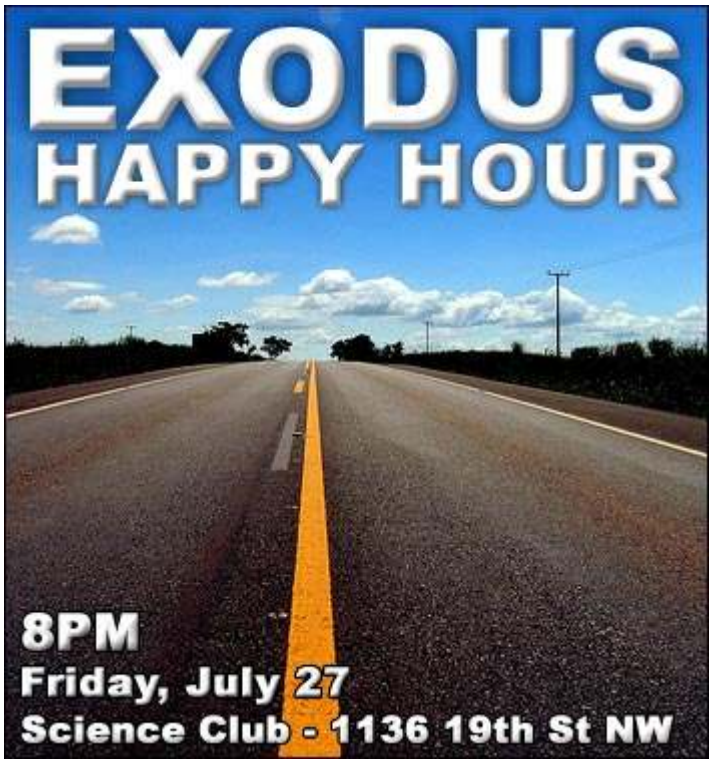
July 26, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. The pool. Going to swim some laps and then demolish the little neighborhood kids at sharks & minnows. I strongly enforce a no drains and no human chain rule. I will also be maintaining my recent beach tan with SPF 4 sunblock.

2. The Starbucks. I’ll get a tall iced tea ($1.58) and then go through a stack of Spanish notecards. I’m taking a step back to study alphabet pronunciation.

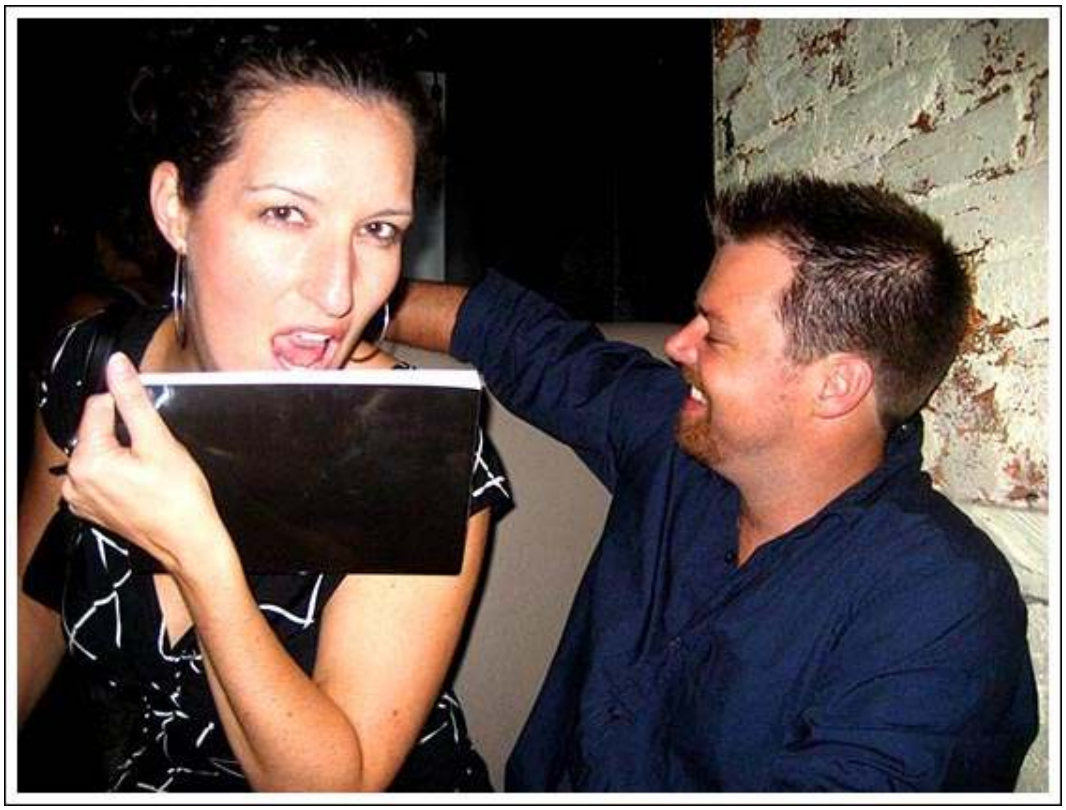
3. The Happy Hour. My last one for hopefully a long time. I’m bringing copies of the book in a Zappos.com box (I just bought these).



Recap

July 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s not a good recap unless there is a picture of Cookie / Jessica:



Thanks to my co-hosts and everyone else who showed up. I’ll miss a lot of you guys.

Also thanks to the Steve, the owner of Science Club, who treated me well and bought a copy of Bang. And the bartender—she knows who she is.

Postscript: Picture of me and my two former interns, laughing at one of my awesome jokes…

I don’t remember who unbuttoned my shirt.

Nerd Glasses

July 30, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The countdown at the top of the page is now in the scary single digits. I feel like I'm going into a theater of a movie I know nothing about, and other than knowing the name of my arrival city and the first hostel I'm staying at, I don't know what I'm doing or where I'm headed next. When I was young my mom would have this saying whenever I asked her where we're going. Wherever the wind takes us. I think it's her way of saying go with the flow, to not be concerned with the final destination.

But she's concerned about this.

The other night she tried to convince me to stay. You're stupid to throw away a comfortable life at your age. To her, my happiness needs to measurable and concrete, like having my own place, a j-o-b, a nice car, money in the bank that is growing instead of evaporating. The only way I could stop the tears in her eyes from falling was to tell I would be back soon, resume my unfullfilling career, and never do something like this again. Certainly taking a trip of this nature will sap the will and desire to take another one and push me to settle down in the suburbs where I can motor around from work to gym to bar to home. I'll just get it out of my system now before I get old. She smiled.

My dad doesn't think I'll last longer than two months, and he's been more supportive than some of my friends. While I would like to travel for at least six months, it is totally possible I'll not like things down there and quickly return to the safety of my dad's damp basement, ant infestation and all. I kept this in mind when declining to have a Farewell Roosh party with my friends. I imagine it would be a little lame if I threw this big party and returned before DC's first snow. The only reason I have a feeling I'll be away for a while is because I know that once I return I'll have to resume working. I rather cross the Atlantic and let the Euro finish off my savings.

The other Friday night I went to the late-night Starbucks / Barnes & Noble. I found it strange that the parking lot was filled and a cop car was parked in front of the building. Inside, I noticed half the people I saw had witches hats or round nerd glasses. Little girls in capes encircled my table in the geographic middle of the cafe and every thirty minutes a cute teenage girl would roll by in her skimpy goth-inspired clothing, probably unaware of how that may trigger the sleazy men around her, like myself. I stood out, without a thunderbolt marking on my neck or any other Harry Potter paraphernalia.

Well it's nice that these people are exciting about something, I thought. Something they can look forward to. I wish I could get excited over something here so I don't have to escape from a soulless but nice paying job—a very nice paying job—for something that has no plan, no goal, and mostly involves spending lots of money. I've worked so hard and come so far to this moment that I could be wrapped up in self-delusion, but I think the far greater risk is not doing what I'm doing. I could be gambling with my career, my life, but the dealer is showing a low card, I got 10, and even if I don't have the bankroll a gambling expert says is necessary to ride the ups and down of a typical swing, I'm doubling down. Regardless of whether I win or lose, or what that next card is, it’s the right move. There will be no regrets.

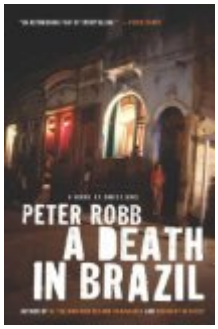
More Books

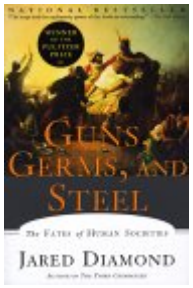
July 31, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here are a few books I've read since writing Top 10 Most Important Books. My favorites come first.



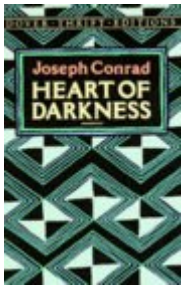
A Death In Brazil

Part travel book and part history book, A Death In Brazil traces back to when the Portuguese landed to the current day leadership of Lula, teaching you about the Brazilian psyche and culture. The author's floral style and use of imagery is engaging and makes this book hard to put down. It competes with An African In Greenland as the best travel book I've read.



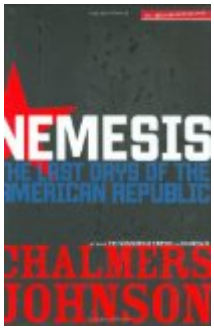
Guns, Germs, and Steel

Excellent book on the history of humans before 1500 AD. It theorizes that differences in human population are not due to genetics or race but to different environments that affected adoption rates of plant and animal domestication, and technology. It attempts to answer why Europeans dominated the globe instead of more "primitive" societies like the Incas or Australian Aborigines.



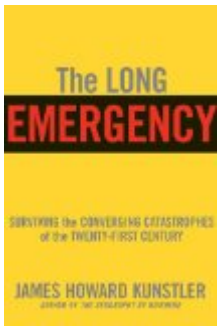
The Heart Of Darkness

The horror! The horror! Short but very beautifully written.



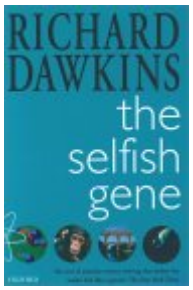
Nemesis

Nemesis is the final book in Chalmers Johnson trilogy about American imperialism (the previous books are Blowback and The Sorrows Of Empire). If you only read one of the three books, it should be this one, which makes the case that militarization will lead to more American aggression; there will be further attacks on America through blowback of our foreign policy; the executive branch will seek increasing power to erode the Constitution; and bankruptcy will be an end result in what the author argues will be good for democracy.



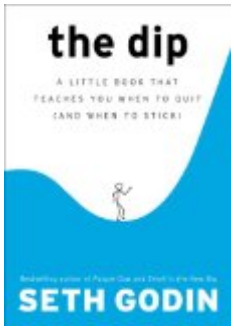
The Long Emergency

Kunstler paints a vivid picture of what will happen as the cheap fossil fuel era comes to an end. While it is alarmist in nature with geopolitical commentary on the Middle East I think is off the mark, this book does make you think about it the future and how a magic wave of free-markets and technology won't save us. Basically, we're fucked. For a preview of the topics in this book, I highly recommend you read Kunstler's blog.



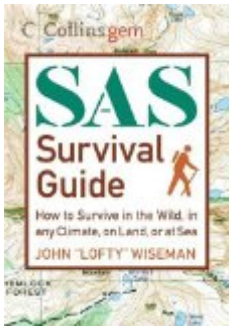
The Selfish Gene

Richard Dawkins makes a convincing argument that evolution selects for genes, not individuals, and that we are all simply robots for gene propagation. A couple of the middle chapters were tough to get through but this book offered a fresh but hopeless view on human life. This is where the concept of memes is first introduced.



The Dip

A book by marketing guru Seth Godin, you can kill it in one hour at the bookstore. It had some helpful tips but nothing spectacular.



Special Air Service (SAS) Survival Guide

Small pocket guide that I would like to have with me if I find myself away from ATM machines and McDonalds.

Sex, Money, and Kiss

This book should be called Money, Money, and Kiss because there is no sex. Gene Simmons will teach you that money is the most important thing in the world (seriously) and how you need to be thinking about it at all times. He details how he monetized the Kiss brand in every way he could think of, like how he tried to make Kiss toilet paper. This book is not very good, but it did have a few gems, such as, “If you are not starving, you are still in the game,” and, “A man is called a catch because he’s trying to get away.” You can probably read this in one sitting at the bookstore.

The Places In Between

This is a travel book about a man who makes a foolhardy trip on foot across Afghanistan a couple months after 9/11. I don’t like his writing style and it seemed like he was more concerned about the accomplishment of finishing the trip than doing it for the stated reason of retracing the steps of some ancient Afghan ruler. The highlight of the book is when he witnesses an Afghani wipe his ass with gravel after taking a shit. Not recommended unless you have an interest in the Middle East.

Committed To Safe Sex

August 1, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I figure it would be prudent to pack a few condoms in case I get laid in South America. While I'm not expecting to have sex with greater frequency than here, I want to be prepared with my preferred condom brand in case girls start throwing themselves at me. So I bought 100 condoms.

Trustex Brand

They occupy more space than I had anticipated.

The Starbucks Barista

August 2, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I walk to the Starbucks near my Dad's house at least six days a week. I've gotten to know most of the baristas there and they've gotten to know me as the laptop guy who wakes up really late. One of the baristas is a 19-year-old college student who is like the somewhat legal drinking age brother I'll never have. He's chatty, outgoing, and likes having casual sex with girls, so I figure he'd like Bang. I gave him a copy because I want to turn him into an unstoppable player force. He emailed me the other day:

> ROOSH, can i just first and foremost say, I started reading ur book and it is fucking AMAZING. Seriously its as helpful as it is HILARIOUS. Its so good that I have been reading it to all my friends and family as they come into the room. I carry it around everywhere in my backpack when i go out and its still in it's original bag… i value it so much lol. I've been jumping around the book because i cannot control my excited little self as i read the book, my eyes cannot help but wonder to other pages. I was thinking to myself, "Shit, i am going to read this book slowly and savor this work of art masterpiece so it will last longer. i am going to be disappointed when i stop reading."

See the positive effect I have on today's youth?

A second review comes from Mike Forster. He adds a professional touch by using my last name.

> [Roosh] attacks the female psyche like a scientist, using the scientific method to try hundreds of possible moves on his way to developing his plan for success for even the most acne-clad Dungeons and Dragons fans out there. He has clearly spent his entire adult life honing his "game," and the reader is the beneficiary with this excellent book. He uses metaphors and relatable analogies to make all his points crystal clear, outlining what should be the obvious, but for many helpless guys passes as new material. His frank talk about sex is refreshing and well-needed in a society in which openness about any sort of sexual activity or desires is censored from the public discourse. The book is also funny at times, with my particular favorite moment being his analogy that if a girl resists one of your moves in the bedroom, act like your character just died in a video game and simply hit the "restart" button.

Thanks Mike!

A little later he complained that the book could have been longer. I've heard this from a couple people and I think it could be because the page count doesn't account for the large page size and small text. Or maybe it's a fast read because my writing is just so buttery smooth.

Alan Watts

August 4, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is the best Youtube video I've seen all year. The South Park guys animated a recording of Alan Watts.

There are five others.

Here Goes

August 6, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I started the travel map with its first marker. Here's a very rough guess of how I imagine the trip could look like if I don't get homesick.

Newsletter No. 8

August 7, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This weekend I'm sending out my version of the cube game, which you may have first read about in The Game. It's very hard to learn but girls like it because it's similar in concept to their horoscopes and Cosmo polls. Sign-up on the right. Grab a drink before you open this one because it's long.

Right now I'm taking it very easy in Old Town Quito, just observing the people, doing the tourist thing, and reading / studying over non-bitter coffee. I'll start writing about the trip after I leave Quito next week. I still would like to stick to the usual topics here, hopefully two updates a week.

I’m Trying To Get Laid Clothes

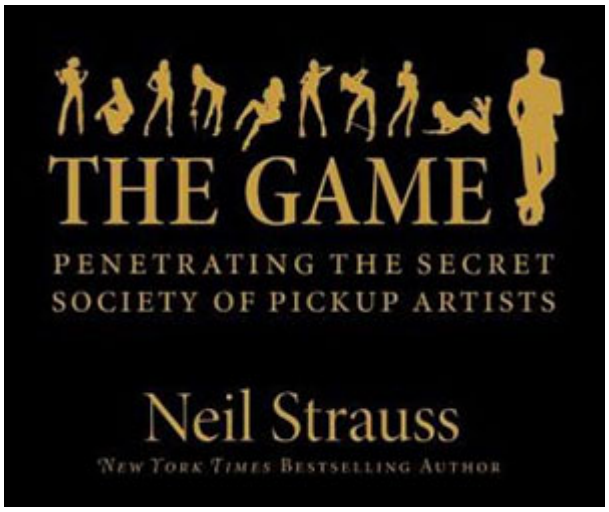
August 8, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

You see a man with a striped shirt, dark pants, and leather shoes from Aldo. He’s not wearing that to feel comfortable, he’s wearing that to get laid. I used to wear this uniform but with diagonal striped shirts because they were in style back in the day. Some of you are too young to remember.

After getting some with i’m trying to get laid clothes, I didn’t like how the next morning’s subway ride home advertises my sexual business. It’s like I’m holding a big sign:

> “HEY LOOK AT ME! I JUST GOT LAID LAST NIGHT!!! MY BREATH SMELLS REALLY BAD BECAUSE I DIDN’T TAKE A TOOTHBRUSH WITH ME WHEN I WENT OUT TO THE CLUB BECAUSE I DIDN’T THINK I WAS GOING TO GET LAID! BUT I DID GET LAID THOUGH!!!!”

The best thing about being a t-shirt guy and jeans guy is that your uniform is discrete and universal. From the club to brunch with the family, I can easily blend into any environment except a funeral. I can have conversations with strangers on the ride home after a night of sex and not a single soul suspects I just let a girl play with my ~~anus~~ balls.



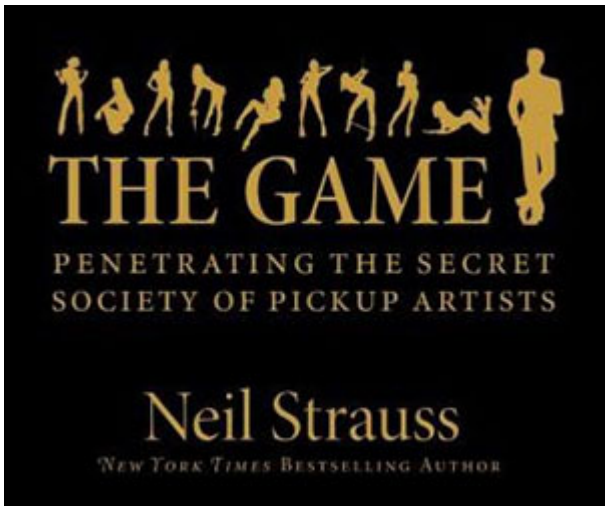
Bang Giveaway

August 10, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A Grandiose Blog is giving away a signed copy of the book. Read about it here.

> Bang is Roosh V's debut hilarious, intelligent and very blunt manual/book/how-to/self-bio/guide on the art of getting laid. A scientist by day and a ~~playboy~~ Alpha male at night, Bang is the culmination of the personal dating experiences of Roosh and you won't be able to put it down once you start.

Excellent.



Ben & Jerry's Free Cone Day In Quito

August 12, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Many will leave disappointed.

Alternate caption: Picture I took five minutes before I got robbed.

For more on Ecuador, check out my Ecuador travel guide.

I Got Robbed

August 13, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On my third day.

August 10 is Quito's Independence Day, but the celebration started the night before. I was observing a staged reenactment in Plaza Grande until I got bored and decided to walk back to my hostel. One particular street crossing was very crowded and there was a lot of unnecessary pushing and shoving by teenagers. Two thoughts went through my head:

1. This feels like a mosh pit.
2. This is how people get their pockets picked.

I went back to the hostel and noticed my wallet was not in my front pocket. I went through three minutes of panic looking for it everywhere, even in places I knew it couldn't be at—but it was gone. I always thought I'd feel a pick pocket, but I guess their business is making sure you don't.

The damage was $80 and two expired credit cards I was using as mugger bait to distract the respectable stash hidden in a pouch next to my crotch. My innocence as a traveler has been lost for all eternity.

For more on Ecuador, check out my Ecuador travel guide.

Touching

August 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I get a lot of feedback from girls about things guys do that they don't like. It's usually something awkward, needy, or weird, or some sort of combination.

A common complaint is touching. Either guys don't do it or they skip a lot of steps that make the touch a big deal and something way too noticeable. The best way to touch a girl is same way you'd boil a frog—do it gradually so she doesn't even notice. Your hands are playing with her breasts and she doesn't know or care how it got to that point. The mistake is touching aggressively before you laid the groundwork. Toss the frog in boiling water and it will immediately jump out.

So how did I figure that out? From girls of course. When a girl likes you she will usually touch your arm, shoulder, or top of your hand when you say something funny or interesting. As time goes on, she will touch you more frequently and for slightly longer, up to a second—a second!—or so in length. It's hard to realize what she's doing unless you really pay attention, and that's how it should be—things flows naturally as you get to know each other. You can begin this natural progression by touching very soon when first meeting a girl. If you touch too late after you've had several opportunities, it will feel "weird" to her and I will hear about it.

Ladies Night For Real

August 16, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We all know that ladies night promotions are a scam by club owners to attract more men into a bar. The reason, of course, is because men drink a lot more than women. I've never been to a ladies night that wasn't a sausage fest, but there is ladies night here in Quito which is true to its name.

On Wednesdays from 7-10PM at a club in New Town, ladies get in free and drink for free. Yeah, a three hour open bar. Men are not allowed in the bar until 10PM after paying a $3 cover. The line of dudes by 10PM goes around the block. So if you're a guy the plan is to stand in line by 9PM, be the first to get in, and enjoy about one hour of quality time with a bunch of drunk, horny girls. So you want to know what it's like?

I do too.

I got a nasty cold on Tuesday and haven't been out since.

For more on Ecuador, check out my Ecuador travel guide.

7 Things You Can Do To Improve Your Game Right Now

August 19, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. Stop leaning in. This is the number one problem I see guys do, especially in the first 30 minutes of talking to a girl. They don't realize that by bending over they are saying, "God I'm so happy to be talking to you right now." Or in a bar they talk right next to the girl's ear when it isn't even loud. The last thing you want a girl to know is that you are excited to be talking to her because it sends the signal you are inexperienced, don't have success with girls, and ultimately, have low value. Lean back instead and let her be the one to come into you, and if you create the least bit of interest she will.

2. Stop asking for permission. Can we dance? Can I have your number? Can I kiss you? Because guys don't know what it's like when someone asks for permission to escalate intimacy, they don't realize how lame it is for them to do so. Asking for permission introduces an awkward moment where the girl's brain floods with reasons not to do what you are asking to. Plus you make it seem like you are scared of getting rejected, a quality not attractive to most women. Instead of asking, just do it and see what happens.

3. Memorize one excellent, breezy story. When you first start talking to a girl, she has no idea who you are. If you talked to her because she is cute, chances are she gets talked to by a lot of guys. Separate yourself from the pack early on by telling her a story that hits on many of your positive qualities, such as your confidence, athleticism, sense of adventure, intelligence, humor, wit, story-telling ability, and so on. Because girls read between the lines, the story will not just be a story—it will be a representation of you that does not come across as bragging.

To pull this off, when you are in conversation and it is clear you have her attention, say, "That reminds me of when…." and then begin your story. I like going into stories about travel now, but before that was gym stories, where for instance I would tell girls the very true account of how one particularly gay guy stalked me in the gym and grabbed my hand while I was naked in the shower. If you are not confident of your story-telling abilities, understand that the best way to be good at telling stories is to expose yourself to good stories.

4. Stop using the word “hot” to describe women. Have you noticed how easy it seems to attract girls who you are not that attracted to? Since you think of hot girls as so much more valuable than mediocre ones, you are more likely to behave in a way that makes it clear to her that she is indeed too valuable for you, without even realizing what you’re doing. This is the phenomenon where bad, needy game “leaks” out as a result of your thoughts, without conscious effort on your part. If you want to get physical with hot girls, you need to master your thinking of them first. From here on out, no girl is hot, and there are no tens. She’s either “cute” or “alright.” Don’t be that guy who falls captive to every girl he sees. Instead, trick your mind into lowering her value so that your game towards her is tighter.

5. Get rejected immediately. Go up to a cute girl you don’t know in the next day and start a conversation with what you already know as a man. Make up an opener or just ask how she’s doing. Chances are she will end the conversation in a polite manner, typical of the “rejections” you will face. It may sting that this girl made it clear she doesn’t want to have nothing to do with you, but realize that the only way to perfect your game is to interact like this with a couple hundred girls. There is no other way. This means you will have to branch out from your school, work, or social circle comfort zones. Accept that 99% of girls on this Earth do not ever want to have sex with you, get over it, and keep going until you find the ones that do.

6. Take your hands of your pockets. If you are at a bar looking like you are bored, resigning yourself to standing around and staring at the TV, don’t expect to get a positive response if you approach a girl. She notices what you do before you walk up to her, and if you seem like a buzzkill, she will be less likely to talk to you. While you don’t have to jump off the wall and be that annoying guy who talks loud and high-fives everyone, don’t stand around looking like someone just stood you up. Interact with your friends or the bartender. Not only will staying in an active, talkative state help you when you finally do approach, it makes it much more likely that you even will.

7. Stop giving direct answers. Evade her questions with humor or counter-questions instead, withholding for as long as reasonably possible the answers to her questions. Not only does this show you aren’t trying to impress her, but it also makes her think you are hiding something. This shady vibe will keep the conversation going and make her curious about what is hiding behind the box. You immediately stand out because most men try to appease a girl by immediately answering questions in the hopes she will like him. By doing the opposite, she sticks around to figure out who the hell you are (or think you are), but by then it will be too late—your fish hook is in her and you can run deeper material with her full attention.

Some of these things I learned from my own experiences and others from guys who taught me everything they knew about game. During an intense six year period starting in 2001 I was going out four nights a week throwing everything I had at the girls I wanted to sleep with. I did things like ask them why they were so drunk and even approached with stick figure drawings on napkins to make them laugh.

My learning curve was a bit long though and not until the second year did a reliable system start to become clear. For the next four years after that I perfected and refined it into something that made my life a lot easier when it came to getting laid. I finally wrote my system down in a book called Bang.

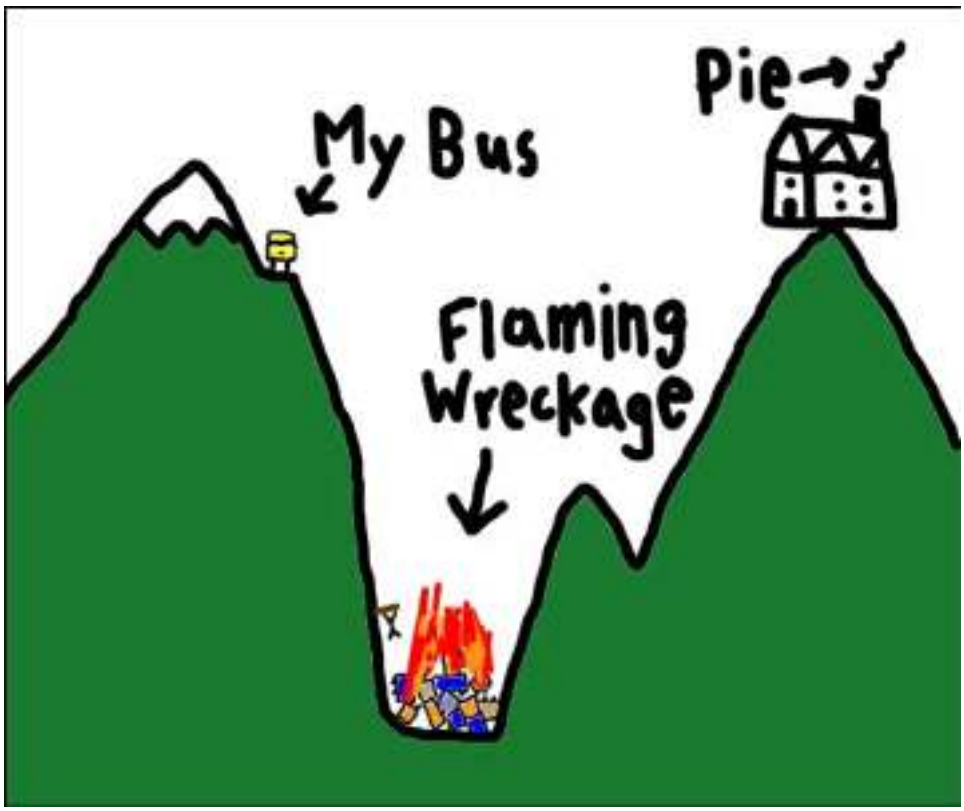
There's no fluff in this book. Instead you'll find 60,000 words in a densely packed textbook teaching you everything from the mindset you need to be successful with girls to step-by-step instructions on how to escalate intimacy with the girls you want to have sex with. My goal was to create a guide that was all you need to get laid.

Because I don't want you to spend your hard-earned money on something mysterious, I have uploaded several sample pages from my book. I also included my Condom Line, the line I say when I need to get the condom in a smooth way without ruining the moment. Look for it in the blue box partway down the Bang homepage.

Is It Safe?

August 21, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Side view, no joke:



Most of the ride was on pavement, but I could have done without the one hour long skidding on mud at the edge of a cliff thing.

For more on Ecuador, check out my Ecuador travel guide.

The Two Prostitutes Of Tena

August 22, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Tena is the whitewater capital of Ecuador. Before I bent over some Class IV rapids on the Jondachi River with my monstrous rowing stroke, I studied the townspeople by watching them from a park bench in the central square.

Within half an hour, two random girls sat on my bench even though all the others were empty. The alpha of the pair sat next to me and kept "accidentally" touching my leg and whipping her hair back and forth in dramatic motions. The giveaway was that it was 1PM and they were dressed like they were going to the club.

A bourgeoisie Frenchman I met told me he doesn't get involved with locals from countries that are not equal to his own (i.e. Westernized); otherwise the girls are just seeing dollar signs and there is a good chance of getting drugged and / or robbed. I do agree with him, and it's not a big deal in Ecuador because the girls here are extremely ugly, but it would be a shame if you travel through Brazil or Argentina and resign yourself to only sleeping with other tourists.

Roosh Travel Sex Rule: Do not pursue a girl who approaches you first. It's okay if she gives you eye contact and a small smile to encourage you, but if she walks up to you and starts flirting immediately, things are not what they seem. It's a rule I follow at home too because if a girl is really into me from the start then chances are I can do a lot better.

Even though 98% of the girls in Ecuador are unattractive by Western standards, I am getting a kick out of the attention, mostly in the form of very extended eye contact and "Where you from?" line of questioning. I think it's my beard and height because Ecuadorian men are unable to grow lush facial hair and I'm taller than all of them, past, present, and future.

In an unrelated request, can someone please order me 1,000 extra wide and extra long condoms and ship them to me via express airmail? I've been constructing my own condoms using cow intestines from the butcher shop, which is actually the living room of someone's house.

Actually, I'm lying—my initial stock is still… uh… plentiful.

For more on Ecuador, check out my Ecuador travel guide.

Longest Bang Review Yet

August 23, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Identifying / personal information removed.

> Hi Roosh-
>
> I've finished it and I think it's incredible. I really wish I would have had this book twenty years ago.
>
> I did purchase Stephen Nash's ebook and it basically sucked. It was good material, don't get me wrong. It should have been titled "how to get a life", but I don't guess he would have sold very many copies. Doing what he says won't necessarily get you a GF, I'm living proof of that. Oh and you're book was 1/2 the price of Nash's and 5 times longer. Figure that one out?
>
> None of the other material that I've read or have come across went into what to do once you get in the bedroom. Every guru so far (unless it is a sex only book like the sex god method) has skipped over this. Something tells me that's because they weren't too good at it or didn't want to give away their secrets for fear that some other guy would get better than them. But not you, you're not concerned. Awesome! That's the way a teacher should be.
>
> I like the straightforward manner with which you lay out how to progress. It's something that I've needed to read. I'm the type that always needs a roadmap. Once I've gone down the road, I can invent new ways to do it. Ha ha. I like that you put away with the notion that one has to be very well dressed to accomplish anything. This is probably true in a trendy LA nightclub, but not here in [...]. Clothes or shoes don't do crap. I should know, I've spent lots of dollars on my wardrobe and I don't notice any difference in my game or a woman's level of interest (more or less or more or less women interested).
>
> I guess the best praise I can come up with is that this book should be required reading for every 17 year old guy!!
>
> I don't have many gripes about the book. The length was OK. Sure I'd like to have a seduction book that was a combo of your book, Green's art of seduction, the mystery method, sex god method, selfish gene, etc…something near the length of atlas shrugged. But really, who wants to write that? ha ha. So, the length was fine, there is plenty of supplimental information on the web and if one uses what you teach, one can learn on the fly. I would have liked to see you expand on how to approach in different venues or how to approach married women (direct vs. indirect). I know, what I'm asking can be learned in the field, but it's always fun reading about this. I also wouldn't have minded reading field reports or some of your best lines/ deliveries/ responses and why they were so good. […]
>
> One thing I do want to disagree with you on is the gym. It's the hardest place ever to meet/ attract attractive women. Wow, a courtroom isn't even this tough > and I have tried :) [...]

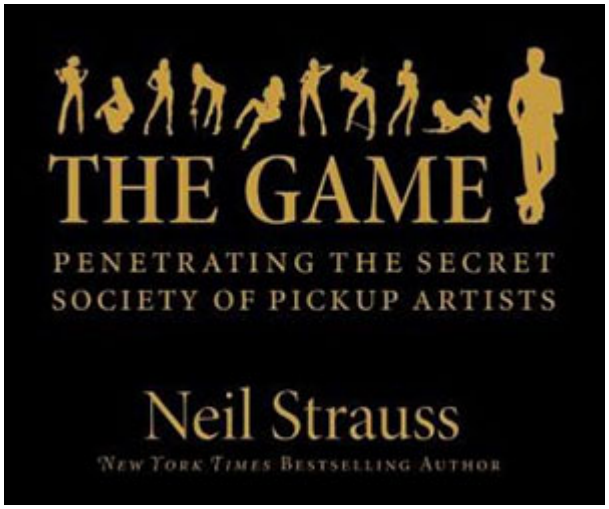
Thanks!



Ecuador Means Equator In Spanish

August 26, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Joe T, prolific commenter and traveler, is starting his own travel site called Volette. Right now the blog is up, of which you will find my first contribution about Quito:

> Mitad del Mundo is the built-for-tourists attraction about an hour and a half bus ride from the center of Quito. Even though the equator goes through several countries of the world, it goes through just one country whose name in the Spanish language is “equator.” Plus it’s also the only place where you can take your picture next to an old sign held in place by concrete blocks that proves to all your friends and family that you touched both the North and South hemispheres at the same time.

The whole thing, with pictures, can be read here.

For more on Ecuador, check out my Ecuador travel guide.

The Boob Of Baños

August 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

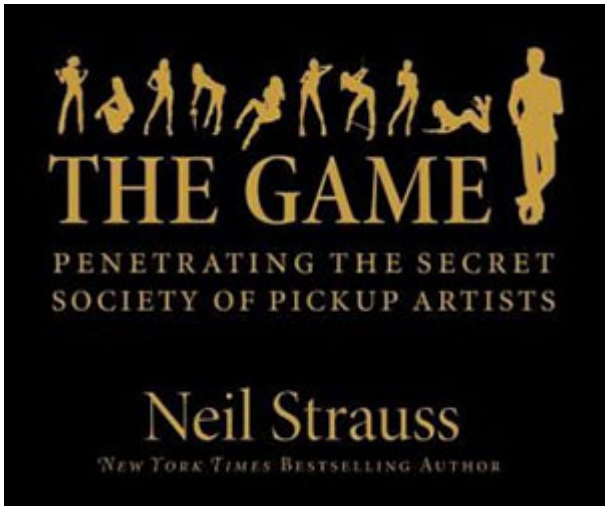
I've been getting requests for pictures of girls, so I did you one better and got you some partial nudity of a full-figured woman.

I took this one day before my camera fell and broke in an ill-fated hand off.

What I liked about Baños is that all the bars are within two blocks of each other. I was at one of them on Saturday night when I found myself talking to a skinny 22-year-old Canadian girl. My mouth was a bit dry after a couple beers, I think, because I sprayed it instead of saying it—right on her face. I could see a bubble of my saliva resting on her left cheek. I wanted to pretend nothing happened and let evaporation do its work, but the bubble was mocking me.

My brain calculated the best mode of action out of millions of possible outcomes. Ten seconds later, I wiped the bubble with my thumb without saying anything. Maybe she thought it was an eyelash.

For more on Ecuador, check out my Ecuador travel guide.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Gym Game

August 29, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A reader weighs in on girls at the gym:

> The majority of the girls in the gym are only there because they are insecure and are looking for guys in the first place. (Of course there is the occasional athlete-female, but those are easy to spot and they have their own Gold's Gym to go to in the first place.) Most of them are begging for guys to hit on them, isn't that why women workout in the first place? To attract men?
>
> Girls in a gym full of testosterone driven men are just asking for us to stick it in their butt. They know what they are getting themselves into. Men in the gym are like a pack of starved lions and the women are the buffet line of meat that we all fight over to get the best piece of prime-rib. Might as well hand it over to me on a silver platter…and then i will decide if i want to eat it, or, whether u should dispose of that shit and bring me some sufficient food.

Colorful metaphors + rage = player.

Luxury Car = Dry Panties

September 2, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

For a man there are two ways to approach getting laid: logic or emotion. With logic, men work on obtaining cars, money, clothes, or anything that is expensive. They focus on the shallower, more superficial things that they themselves use to rate women. For instance, no guy has turned down a hot girl because he didn't like her sense of humor. Sometimes it works but usually it doesn't because they are trying to attract women with items that a lot of other guys have.

Approaching the problem with emotion—jealousy, drama, unbridled rage—will do more to get a girl's attention than Italian shoes. Even women don't realize this. If you ask one what she likes in a man, she is ten times more likely to say nice shoes than "a guy who I see enjoying a conversation with a girl more attractive than myself." But every time a girl I like does see me engaged in conversation with a beautiful girl, it is a certainty that she will be much more receptive to me afterwards. Now I'm not saying follow the girl you like to a club and talk to every cute girl but her, but it would be a better and cheaper strategy than buying a BMW.

When it comes to things like business or engineering, a man's gut instinct is usually the correct one. But with women, it's always wrong. Men need to develop a second instinct that hits a woman's illogical and primitive buttons. A lucky few learned this somewhere along the line, leading to a lopsidedness where 20% of the guys are banging 80% of the girls. The others simply don't care to learn.

Fatality

September 4, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There is a British girl who I keep running into (Lonely Planet = seeing the same people again and again and again). She's very cute but I concluded early on that she is not serious about sex; she never has more than one drink, she always goes home early, she has low social intelligence, and she only leaves her hand on my crotch for two seconds.

I went to a disappointing ladies night at Cafe Eucalyptus last Wednesday night in Cuenca and of course she was there, with her two latest suitors. Salsa music was playing and one of the suitors, a 21-year-old German bearded fellow, asked her to dance. Denied. He was persistent and immediately tried once more. Denied again.

He then stands in the corner, alone, dancing with his arms out holding an imaginary partner, practicing his moves. Then he starts stretching his back, swinging left and right to get each vertebrae. It was hard to watch.

For one hour he analyzes, stews, and deconstructs about giving it one final attempt. Even though most guys would have gotten the hint a long time ago, you can see on his face he has come up with a blockbuster that is sure to work.

He comes up to her, grabs her hand, and says, "I just want to try something!"

She shrieks "No!" then turns to me and says, "He's creeping me out!" Denied three times.

It gets worse. You see, earlier in the night the German was getting on my case for being "quiet," that something is "wrong." I just didn't want to talk to him. But because he annoyed me I decided to finish him off. He was a horse who broke his leg on the race track, and a ruthless killer was needed—one without mercy.

"You should give him a chance," I told the British girl, like he's a charity case in need of a lucky break.

"Well good job, you ruined his night," I added, like his happiness is something she owns.

Go to sleep young man, it's time for bed.

For more on Ecuador, check out my Ecuador travel guide.

I Am Very Courageous

September 6, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Two emails about Bang...

> I was very impressed by how funny Bang was while still reading like a practical–even technical–pick up guide.
>
> I especially liked your courage when speaking to the more shady parts of the game. The [getting inside her place] section featured one of your best lines: [...] I also liked your STD argument: [...] You could have copped out in the Double Your Dating "you can be a nice guy and still a player" way but instead you gave it to the reader straight.

I've gotten a couple positive comments about the deadpan joke on page 109. And...

> Roosh, just wanted to let you know I got the book a couple of days ago. I'm currently reading it and I'm halfway through. I'm certainly no slouch when it comes to the ladies, but if I had come across a book like this back when I was in college...
>
> A lot of the things in there took me many years to learn. I'm saving this one for my kid and handing it to him the first time he gets his heart broken.

In other news, tonight there is a happy hour. Based on the venue, looks like it will be nice and sloppy.

I Proposed

September 9, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Her name is Gabrielle and I found her on Marry Our Daughter, which offers youngish girls for marriage. It was a little informal but I gave it a go, putting extra time and care into my central Asia-inspired proposal email.

> Hello,
>
> My name is Roosh. I will make fine husband for your daughter. I will give her lead operation on plow machine and feed her bread, tea, and when harvest is good, acceptable meat from animal.
>
> We will have our own house in farm countryside of Frederick, MD. It is fine community with school for education, McDonalds, and next year our number one Starbucks will open. I would like to pay 10% extra premium so no other man get her. One very important: she must be virgin.
>
> Roosh

I have not received a response so I guess the site a hoax or a pedophile sting operation by the FBI. If you clicked the link then you will be getting a knock on your cubicle siding in 15 minutes. I'm immune due to Peru's complicated extradition process.

Postscript: It's a hoax (thanks Brian).

One Month Update

September 10, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

If you look at the counter at the bottom of this page, you'll see I've been down here for over a month. Some thoughts:

1. The game is a little different. Height and light skin color plays big while style and dancing ability doesn't, but things are not as linear and predictable as a pick-up stateside. It's happened to every guy that he dances with a native for an hour or so, thinks he's making progress, and then she thanks him for the dance and disappears. Cute girls are much more fearless and will approach you to grab your hand and dance.

2. A large percentage of girls staying in hostels are butch-like in appearance with short hair and boyish builds. The cuter ones have their boyfriend in tow. None of them pack clubbing clothes to look good at night—instead they wear trekking pants, hiking boots, and North Face fleece jackets.

3. The living-out-of-a-bag lifestyle is more glamorous when you think about it from home. After a couple weeks my instinct is to find a place of comfort with hot showers and wireless internet and stay still, but I've gotten used to the routine of long bus ride, taxi, disappointment, long bus ride, taxi, upset stomach, long bus ride, taxi, nothing to do, and so on.

4. I keep fucking up. I got my pocket picked going into a crowd, I dropped my digital camera, I lost a disposable camera with two dozen photos (including one of a male turtle raping a female turtle), I lost a credit card, and I ate a ground beef and hard-boiled egg empanada when my stomach was upset. That last mistake led to full-blown ass eruptions and a diet of bread and bananas for five days. It smelled like a homeless man died in my stomach.

5. A condom here is called a preservativo.

Even on days when things don't turn out great, like when I spend most of it on the toilet and have to throw liquid shit coated toilet paper in a little wastebasket, or when I can't sleep since the girl in the bed next to me has a cough that sounds like she is dying from tuberculosis, I am extremely grateful for being able to do this.

I Broke

September 11, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I got a Facebook account. 😕

Girl Vs Guy Travel

September 13, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I talked to a girl who showed me a stack of napkins with notes written in Spanish by Ecuadorian men, mostly waiters. She couldn't understand them so I translated. They were all along these lines:

> It was nice to meet you. You are very pretty. I hope I can see you again.
>
> juan@lovesgringas.com
> Juan

My napkins have no words of affection, just email addresses, mostly of European men. Girls who travel don't realize their experience is very different than a guy's. Unless the girl is busted, which unfortunately happens, she is getting ten times more attention than me. I know some of that is bad attention, but you only see a smile on a gringa's face when she's being spun around on the salsa dancefloor. And disappointment on the native's face when she doesn't want to make out.

(Side note: girls who don't get much love back in the States are treated like queens by South American man. It's very common to see an American 5 walking arm-in-arm with a decent looking guy. Many of these girls end up staying for much longer than they had planned.)

When crossing Ecuador's border into Peru, I was a little confused on where to get my Peru entry stamp. I walked towards an Ecuadorian border agent to ask him, but before I could open my mouth he shooed me down the road with a hand-sweep motion. When I returned with my stamp an American girl was having the same problem. This time the same guy waited for her to come to him, let her ask her question in bad Spanish, and then very politely talked to her, smiled, and pointed down the road. Multiple this by a dozen interactions a day and I imagine the overall experience would be quite different.

Expectedly, girls here refuse to admit that they are getting different treatment than me. (They remind me of the girls back home who think they will physically peak past 30.) Next time a girl asks me why I don't think South Americans are "wonderful" and the nicest people in the world, I'm going to point to her vagina.

For more on Peru, check out my Peru travel guide.

New Blog

September 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Jewcano opened up shop at The Cannon And The Cutlass.

Like Firecrackers

September 16, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Last Tuesday night I went to Bartini, an unfortunate name for what is an okay house club in the very wealthy Miraflores area of Lima.

At around 2AM I was leaning against the bar near the front of the club, keeping my eye on a drunk bodybuilder who earlier fell on his ass and tried to blame me for it, when I heard pop pop. My body jumped and I turned to the front door—the sound came from right outside the club. No one seemed to care so I wrote it off as nothing serious but then five seconds later two burly bouncers braced themselves against the door. A third guy came up behind them and pulled out a gun with his right hand and cocked the barrel back with his left. The bouncers let him out and he disappeared. I was about 10 feet away.

There is no "Is this really happening?" hesitation when you see a gun. Right away I got down against the bar and a lot of other people did the same. I was scared but not pants urinating scared. There was a circle of people around me so I selfishly thought I'd be fine if gun shots came inside. Everyone was calm and quiet, and the DJ kept spinning. No one jumped out the windows.

After three minutes the coast seemed clear and I walked towards the back of the club. I stood there and watched as people resumed drinking, smoking, and laughing, like this happens all the time (it actually doesn't in this area of Lima). I looked to the girl next to me and asked, "¿Que paso?"

She made the universal gun sign with her hand, grinned, and said, "Bong bong." I left a few minutes later in case the shooter returned to finish the job.

For more on Peru, check out my Peru travel guide.

Lima Peru Nightlife

September 18, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I was only going to stay in Lima for a couple nights but the nightlife sucked me in and I ended up staying for a week.

Tuesday. There is a mall built into a beach cliff called LarcoMar that has several clubs, including Bartini, a house venue that is most similar to Spank back in D.C. The girls were unfriendly and no one danced until after 1AM, maybe because the DJ's refused to spin any Ministry of Sound-like anthems. My buzz was killed due to gunfire outside the club. $3 cover includes a free beer. 1.5 vodka shots out of 5.

Wednesday. A $5 cover gets you into El Dragon with a free Pisco Sour. A much nicer crowd danced to popular house, rock, and some 80's and 90's, the best mix I heard in Lima. A bit of a sausage fest but the girls were cute and wanted to be talked to. I got a kick out of partying until 4:30AM on a Wednesday night. 3.5 vodka shots out of 5.

Thursday. Sargento Pimienta (Sargent Pepper) is a warehouse with speakers where all the young, very white Peruvians go to party. The old school music is the type that would clear most American dance floors (Celebrate, Getting Jiggy With It, etc), and there was a horrible one hour set by a wannabe Eminem rapper who has only mastered saying "Uh" and "Wooooh!" in the microphone. A breakdancer got on stage and shouted "Fuck Bush," but gave props to Los Angeles. Cover is $5. 1.5 vodka shots out of 5.

The night ended at Eka, a lounge bar that serves more as a date venue than a pick-up spot. Downstairs is the "Factoria" where Death Speed Trance was being played at an insanely fast 148 beats per minute. The four people who were on the dancefloor looked like they were having seizures. I'm pretty confident the DJ killed small furry animals as a child. 0 methamphetamine hits out of 5.

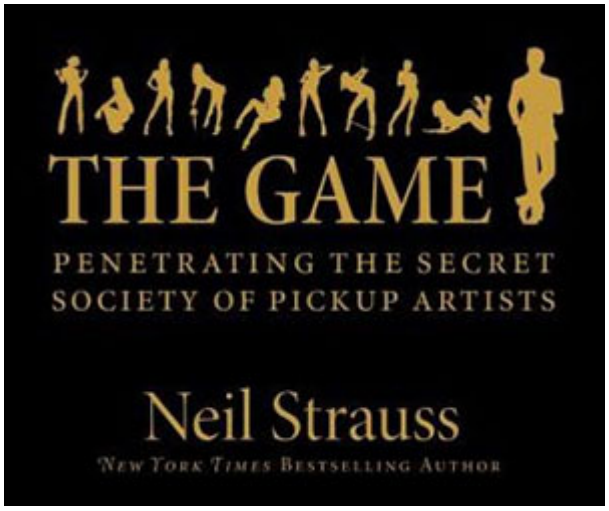
Friday. Gotica is a mega-club in Larcomar, with an astronomical $16 cover (by Peruvian standards) that keeps out the gringo riff-raff who rather drink cheaply and talk sports in the hostel bar.

It's not easy to work the club solo due to its impersonal size, but it had the most beautiful girls I've ever seen in my life. Some were friendly, some weren't, but it's quite a feeling to be standing with your manly beer and looking down at this sea of fine exotic women. Believe me when I say I savored the moment, and I would have taken a picture for you with my second disposable camera had it not been stolen while I danced. An Israeli who introduced me to the club summed it up nicely: "It's hard not to hook up with a girl there. The only problem is you'll have a girl early but you'll be thinking if you can get something hotter." 5 vodka shots out of 5.

Saturday. Gotica.

Everyone has bad things to say about Lima, starting with the depressing fog that permanently blankets the city during winter, but it's been the highlight of my trip so far.

For more on Peru, check out my Peru travel guide.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

I Got the Giardia

September 19, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I have parasites attached to the wall of my small intestine, sucking away my nutrients and causing unspeakable bathroom adventures. I saw a doctor and she prescribed me something to defeat the flagellated monsters that are dampening my already mediocre South American experience. The only side effect is urine that has a neon yellow appearance. It's like I'm radioactive!

There are a couples ways to get giardia, but this is how I think I got it:

1. Some guy took a monster dump and wiped his ass. He did not wash his hands, which now contained fecal matter.
2. He cooked up a meal, poking and prodding said meal with his feces soaked paw.
3. He served that meal to me.
4. I ingested his feces.

What's good about South America is that when something good happens, like you find an internet connection faster than dial-up or a clean toilet bowl not dirtied by someone with the same condition as you, it brings you that much more happiness. Still, I'm going to need a little more than being able to watch a YouTube video.

For more on South America, check out my South America travel guides.

Peru Bus Comfort

September 24, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I hopped on a local bus back to Cusco after a visit to the Incan ruins of Pisac. The bus was packed so I had to stand in the aisle, and was faced with the serious decision of whether I should give ass or crotch to the gentleman sitting down next to me. I had to go with crotch because it was the best way I could hold on. Well, after about ten minutes, he fell asleep on my package. I could feel his head on my head. This being one of the top five highlights of my trip so far, I took a picture with my replacement camera (same one as before).

At one point he got up, lifted his head, stared off into space for five seconds and then went right back to my crotch. (They always come back for more.) I wanted to put my hand on his head for the photo but I estimated a high probability of conflict.

For more on Peru, check out my Peru travel guide.

Machu Picchu

September 25, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I was going to pass on Machu Picchu but the peer pressure was too great. It was an expensive notch:

$75 train ride to the town nearest Machu Picchu
$12 round-trip bus ride to Machu Picchu
$40 entrance fee
$7 rip-off mini pizza in town

That's fine as I can say I took this picture:

The views were beautiful and I'm glad I went, but the magic of Machu Picchu is less when you've already visited Pompeii in Italy. I would have been more impressed if I was a ruin virgin, but as you know I get around. I'm at the point in life where I'm more excited by a nightclub's interesting bathroom than an ancient stone structure.

Intestinal parasite survivor

It’s time for Bolivia. Please say a prayer for my stomach.

For more on Peru, check out my Peru travel guide.

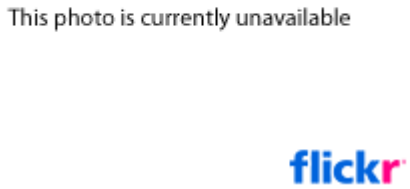
Newsletter No. 9

September 26, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I didn’t forget about September. This one is a discussion about girls who flake. It will be sent this weekend.

I thought that I’d be able to easily continue writing about game/guy/girl topics while traveling, but my writing is a product of my thoughts and those topics are simply not on my mind much. My sex drive has dropped by unacceptable levels.



Floating Islands of Lake Titicaca

10 Quotes

September 27, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Here are ten quotes that have caught my eye in the past few months.

1. "What a gifted child is, in many ways, is a gifted learner. And what a gifted adult is, is a gifted doer. And those are quite separate domains of achievement."
-Malcolm Gladwell

2. "No, I don't like work. I had rather laze about and think of all the fine things that can be done. I don't like work — no man does — but I like what is in the work, the chance to find yourself. Your own reality — for yourself, not for others — what no other man can ever know. They can only see the mere show, and never tell what it really means."
-Joseph Conrad in The Heart Of Darkness

3. "…if you report an atrocity carried out by guerrillas, all you need is one hearsay witness. You talk about torture carried out by an American military officer, you're going to need videotapes."
-Noam Chomsky

4. "It's only bribery if it's not enough."
-Unknown

5. "Just because you dress [provocatively] does not make you a whore — but you are wearing a whore's uniform."
-Dave Chappelle

6. "The mark of greatness is when everything before you is obsolete, and everything after you bears your mark."
-Dave Chappelle

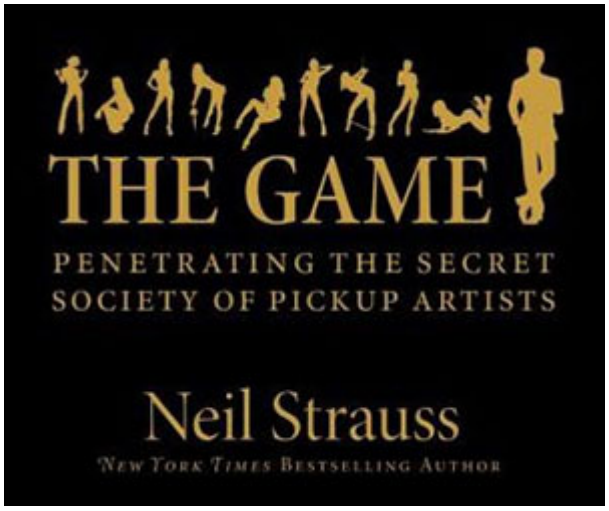
7. "Sometimes it takes a while for a man to find himself."
-Chinatown

8. "Men are like cats—they are always on the prowl and just come in for food."
-8 1/2

9. "I had started on a voyage of discovery, only to find that it was I who was being discovered."
-Tete-Michel Kpomassie in An African In Greenland

10. "A man receiving charity practically always hates his benefactor."
-George Orwell in Down and Out in Paris and London

Jagad Guru and his books and videos on identity.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

I Had To Ask Twice

September 30, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Updated: Answer below.

Anyone want to guess how much this hotel room in Copacabana, Bolivia costs per night?

Glad I brought the ~~porn machine~~ laptop

View from balcony

Hints:

1. It has a standard bathroom with a sometimes warm water shower.
2. It’s one block away from the lake in a pretty prime spot.
3. Towels or soap are not provided.
4. There is no TV.

Answer: $3.95 / night

For more on Bolivia, check out my Bolivia travel guide.

Tomorrow Night

October 2, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s Friday night and you’re out somewhere in DC drinking. The next night is your friend’s big birthday bash so you decide to take it a little easy. Taking it easy is more common with girls but even a guy would make sure he doesn’t wind up passed out in a gutter.

It’s Friday night and you’re in some South American town. The party is barely decent but you heard amazing things about a club on Saturday night. You rather wait for that, but you order two shots of vodka anyway to go along with your second caipirinha—there is a high chance you will be cut down and not be able to go out the next night. For all you know the smoothie you had a few hours ago had a more than a dash of the town water and the little bugs are busy moving into their new home.

Random headaches, altitude sickness, mysterious cramps, parasites, salmonella—something is going to get you soon (I’ve had all). There’s no use saving yourself for the future like you do at home. When the going’s good you gotta do it to death.

How To Take A Cold Shower

October 3, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s impossible to backpack through South America without having to take a cold shower, even if you only go to hotels that advertise hot showers like I do. Sometimes there is no regulator, or the morning shower rush simply overwhelms the puny heater and you don’t want to wait another two hours, or they simply lie.

1. You can’t just dive into the cold. You have to mentally prepare yourself for at least 10 minutes. Flex your muscles to pump yourself up and say things like, “I am like block of fire,” and “This will make me a real man.” Nod your head as you think these thoughts and purse your lips a couple times to convince your brain that you mean business. (I really do this.)

2. Turn on the water. Stare at it as it flows and give it the evil eye.

3. Point the shower head away and step in. Be concerned at how cold the mist is. Take a deep breath, close your eyes, and move the nozzle over you head. Howl loud enough so the Incans can hear you.

4. Keep your muscles flexed as you soak yourself with water that feels like it comes from melting ice blocks. Point the nozzle away and clean yourself with soap products. Within two minutes you no longer need to flex your muscles because you are shivering nice and good.

5. Rinse your body. The water doesn’t feel as cold now because violent body tremors are warming you up somewhat.

It takes about 30 minutes for your body to warm up to normal, your hands and feet being last. Congratulate yourself for making a big deal about something that most locals do their entire lives. Pussy.

Girls Don’t Care About Their Vagina

October 4, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I’ve never had a girl worry about where my hands have been when I’m manually arousing her before the main penetration event. Girls who have intimacy with me are safe since I’m relatively clean, but how does she know that I didn’t just shake hands with a homeless man I met on the way to service her?

When a girl is stroking my abnormally large manhood with her hand, I could care less if her hands are a little dirty because I’m encased in a layer of skin—abrasions that would allow for infectious disease entry would come later during unprotected sex. But girls have warm, moist cavities, and what goes in may not easily come out. After all it is an incubator.

Two Month Update

October 8, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Now that my major health problems have passed, the trip has become “okay” with fun highlights combined with many hours in internet cafes.

1. I’m having really bad nightmares. They are usually about me getting physically hurt or maimed in some way.

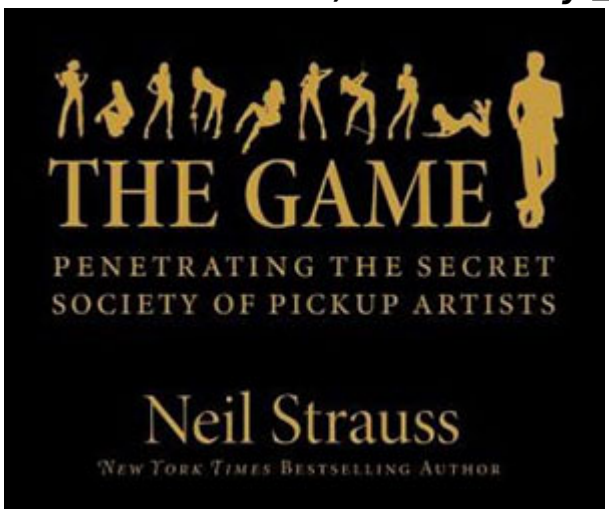
2. Bolivia, the poorest country in South America, is the limit of where I can travel. The hygienic practices of the people are the worst I’ve ever seen, and it trickles down into the restaurants and those cooking the food. The main ingredient in every Bolivian dish is oil (most likely recycled) and I haven’t gone more than a couple meals without finding a bunch of little hairs in the food.

3. My stomach will never be the same: it has been in a permanent state of discomfort (cramps, gas) for weeks. No one makes it through Bolivia with their stomach unscathed, not even travelers from other South American countries. I’ve been living on a diet of pizza and candy bars to minimize symptoms.

4. It was either the the best or worst idea to start in the Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia. I made it but there was a moment when I didn’t think I could continue. That would be when I was in the hospital with an IV in my forearm (salmonella).

The next month will find me in Salta, Argentina for a stop to view the girl mummy and then on to Chile for a couple weeks. I think the worst is over.

For more on Bolivia, check out my Bolivia travel guide.



The Incan Ruins Of Cuzco, Peru

October 10, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My second contribution to the Volette travel blog is up. It guides you through the most interesting ruins of Cuzco, Peru (with pictures). You can read it here.

I found that I liked Machu Picchu a bit more after writing and thinking about it.

For more on Peru, check out my Peru travel guide.

Commenting Change

October 11, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I’m bringing back anonymous comments somewhat. If you are already registered you can continue logging in.

A couple of my friends that I know well in real life stopped commenting because of registration. It may be too restrictive and cumbersome. But it sure did keep out the haters!

Maybe I miss the haters.

Going Out Alone

October 14, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Approaching girls here is less automatic and fun than it is at home. Regardless of how much alcohol is in me, it just doesn't feel the same. It's almost like a chore.

Like any other complicated skill, approaching is very mood based. The better mood you are in, the more social you feel, the more likely you will not only approach but approach well. This is why in Bang I wrote to get yourself in a room with girls if your state is especially great. For most guys feeling confident and looking good increases the chance of the approach, but I'm learning there are other factors as well. Two big ones:

1. Wingman. The best nights I've had on this trip was when I went out with a cool guy. He doesn't have to be good looking but he has to be funny, smiley, reasonably dressed, and most importantly, a flirt. Most of the guys here have zero game so with their hiking boots they feel like mannequins for a generic hiking company. Plus, wingmen actually serve as emotional support so you can laugh off the rejections and keep pushing without getting frustrated or upset ("Damn what's her problem—hey check out that girl over there!").

2. Music. Music is great at putting you in a good mood, but if you don't like it then it has the opposite effect. I can't tell you how much I hate salsa music and the salsa / house hybrid that goes along with it. I just stand there, waiting for it to change, but even a a good 15-minute set of music I like does not do much for me in a 4-hour night. I like reggaeton though (I think I'm the only white person who does).

The reason I go out alone is because I refuse to go to bed early just to avoid feeling uncomfortable. My nighttime options shouldn't be determined by anyone but myself. If you find yourself having to go out alone, the best thing you can do is to make friends with a group as soon as you get in. They will serve as your comfortable home base. If not then you will enter anti-social mode and the alcohol you drink will just make it worse.

I'm in some mediocre club alone holding a can of warm Quilmes beer. It's a tough crowd and the salsa will not end. I'm leaning against the bar, not having talked to anyone except the bartender for 45 minutes. But I see a few cute girls. I just have to ask myself one question: do I want to get some or not? If not I'll leave and stop wasting my time, my liver. Otherwise I go to that group of five girls, with one very nice brunette, yell "Hola" loud enough to cut through the shit that is playing and ask if they speak English. Either I suck it up and work with what I got or go jerk off on the hostel toilet.

This is going to be so easy once I get back home.

Going Out Alone

October 14, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Approaching girls here is less automatic and fun than it is at home. Regardless of how much alcohol is in me, it just doesn't feel the same. It's almost like a chore.

Like any other complicated skill, approaching is very mood based. The better mood you are in, the more social you feel, the more likely you will not only approach but approach well. This is why in Bang I wrote to get yourself in a room with girls if your state is especially great. For most guys feeling confident and looking good increases the chance of the approach, but I'm learning there are other factors as well. Two big ones:

1. Wingman. The best nights I've had on this trip was when I went out with a cool guy. He doesn't have to be good looking but he has to be funny, smiley, reasonably dressed, and most importantly, a flirt. Most of the guys here have zero game so with their hiking boots they feel like mannequins for a generic hiking company. Plus, wingmen actually serve as emotional support so you can laugh off the rejections and keep pushing without getting frustrated or upset ("Damn what's her problem—hey check out that girl over there!").

2. Music. Music is great at putting you in a good mood, but if you don't like it then it has the opposite effect. I can't tell you how much I hate salsa music and the salsa / house hybrid that goes along with it. I just stand there, waiting for it to change, but even a a good 15-minute set of music I like does not do much for me in a 4-hour night. I like reggaeton though (I think I'm the only white person who does).

The reason I go out alone is because I refuse to go to bed early just to avoid feeling uncomfortable. My nighttime options shouldn't be determined by anyone but myself. If you find yourself having to go out alone, the best thing you can do is to make friends with a group as soon as you get in. They will serve as your comfortable home base. If not then you will enter anti-social mode and the alcohol you drink will just make it worse.

I'm in some mediocre club alone holding a can of warm Quilmes beer. It's a tough crowd and the salsa will not end. I'm leaning against the bar, not having talked to anyone except the bartender for 45 minutes. But I see a few cute girls. I just have to ask myself one question: do I want to get some or not? If not I'll leave and stop wasting my time, my liver. Otherwise I go to that group of five girls, with one very nice brunette, yell "Hola" loud enough to cut through the shit that is playing and ask if they speak English. Either I suck it up and work with what I got or go jerk off on the hostel toilet.

This is going to be so easy once I get back home.

Beefy Gas

October 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

An American, Australian, and Englishgirl walk into a hotel made of salt.

It started in a Toyota Land Cruiser with a driver, a cook, and a few gringos, including myself. We paid for a 4-day tour through the southwest of Bolivia, a place where paved roads, gas stations—and what you might recognize as modern civilization—do not exist.

We stayed in a salt hotel on the third night, a building literally constructed from the salt of the huge Uyuni Salt Plain, the highlight of our tour. We bought some bottles of Chilean red wine, got some candles for when the power went out, and started drinking after dinner. There was nothing else to do.

I've written about cockblocks before but the one that happened here stands out for being both brutal and embarrassing. While our lovely cook Sonya tried her best with the meals, there is only so much she can do without running water. Very quickly into the tour I was producing a large amount of digestive gas that everyone in the SUV knew about. It tended to smell like the previous night's dinner, and since we had paper-thin steak the first night, my nickname became "beefy gas."

The salt hotel had a hostel vibe to it with communal tables. Gringos from other tours joined us with their bottles of wine and we all shared pictures from the exact same places. A 40-year-old Swiss lady to my left practiced her English on me and a Brazilian man to the left of her bragged how Rio is the best place in the universe. Next to me was a very cute German girl. Bolivia is not blessed with attractive females so she was the best I've seen in two weeks. We started talking.

The Australian guy and Englishgirl had been traveling together for a month. I assumed they were banging every night, with hair pulling and all that, but in fact she was teasing the guy and using him as a travel bodyguard / buddy, more or less. He was spending the bulk of his two month trip in South America trying to have sex with a girl who openly talked of banging other guys.

Discussion of my beefy gas disappeared by this point, so boy was I surprised when the Englishgirl said, with the utmost concern, "So how's your beefy gas doing?" Everyone heard. Less damage would have been done if she accused me of giving her genital herpes. My comeback was silence.

What a sad story if it all collapsed because of my beefy gas, but the German had a boyfriend, one that she has found was "much harder to leave" than she thought. I was just flirting, having fun, and I can't say I was making much progress. But still, this cockblock got to me. I was steaming, sitting there on three hard blocks of salt. I had to say something.

"Did you bring up my beefy gas because you just weren't thinking or you wanted to make me look bad? This is the first time you see me talking to a girl and then say something that any normal person would agree is pretty embarrassing." The Australian looked uncomfortable.

Blah blah blah, “I just wasn’t thinking,” she said. I pushed a little bit more because I wanted her to at least feel as uncomfortable as I felt. Then, the truth came out in what may be the first time in human history that a girl has told the truth behind her cockblock.

“Maybe I was a little bit jealous.”

The things I’ve done to get into a girl’s pants—the guys I have cockblocked. I can’t get on her for worrying I might bang some other girl besides her. We were now friends, because honesty is a big part of what friendship is. I mean, when was the last time you told someone you took an extra hour to call because you wanted them to think you were busy?

An American, Australian, and Englishgirl walk into a hotel made of salt. They left nine bottles of empty wine bottles on their table before going to sleep. They next morning they saw the damage: underneath the salt was now red. It looked like a murder scene.

Uyuni Salt Flat

For more on Bolivia, check out my Bolivia travel guide.

Salta Argentina Nightlife

October 17, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Salta is the farthest up you can go into Argentina without seeing any inbreeding with the less attractive Bolivian race. With the eye of a sociologist and a liver of an alcoholic, I studied Salta's nightlife for almost one week.

Wednesday. I was lucky enough to meet Keith, an Irish guy committed to going out more than me. We go to Salon VIP where they played reggaeton, salsa, and cumbia, apparently like most other clubs in town (two or three American hip hop songs are thrown in, always including the American classic "Yeah" by Usher). Coming from Bolivia this club was paradise, with cute girls averaging 17-24 years in age. A group of four Argentine English teachers approached us and kept us busy until the club closed at 5am. Similar to a problem I had in Lima, we debated if we could do better, but when you roll in at 3:30am you don't have much time to work the crowd. $4 cover with free gigantic beer.

Thursday. I tagged along with a few French twenty-somethings to Line Out, a club way out in the suburbs of Tres Cerritos. This was the first night that I got to witness the horrible game of Argentine guys, who seem to be more concerned with proving to their guy friends they are macho than actually getting girls. An opener I saw a few times is pulling a girl's hair (big surprise—it never worked!). Argentine girls, especially the young ones, are not familiar with indirect game, which means there is nothing stopping me from cleaning up in Argentina if I run into ones that know English and don't mind my hairiness. $3 cover.

Friday. Two Dutch girls and I started in a club called Mao Mao, a place where 40-something Argentines come to get laid (on Friday night anyway). "Everybody Dance Now" played alongside Madonna as I stood in shock watching the Argentine version of my parents grinding with each other on the dancefloor. We stayed there for 45 minutes, mostly to wait for our next destination to get good since it was only 2AM (things get started late in this country). $4 cover with free drink.

We end up in Metropoli, a club packed with young people dancing to reggaeton and cumbia. It's here I learn that it's efficient to go after gigantic groups of girls because there is always one bound to speak English, though it's usually not the cutest one. On this night I couldn't drink because I started a course of cipro to kill remaining stomach issues that started in Bolivia, but it didn't matter much because the girls themselves don't drink like they do in the States; they have their free drink then just dance the rest of the night. Being sober in an Argentine club is easier and more acceptable than at home. $5 cover with free drink.

Saturday. We have a winner! Club XXI (Veinte Uno) is on Balcarce, the Adams Morgan-like strip where all the gringos and young Argentines go. There were three girls for every two guys, most of them in their early 20's. Excellent house and reggaeton set the mood. It doesn't get much better than this, and while the girls were of average friendliness, a little effort goes a long way into finding one that is both nice and cute. With another Irish clubbing partner, I'm finding that they are the only people who like going out (maybe because they all have drinking problems). A dozen or so people in my hostel didn't go out on Saturday night because they were "tired." $5 cover with free drink.

Sunday. Back to Salon VIP for their pre-Columbus day bash. Not liking the block long line, me and my Dutch wingman decided to bribe the bouncer with a 50 peso bill (about $16 US). Hilarity… uhhh.. ensued, but we did get in with high fives. Quality took a massive hit from the night before and there was some discomfort when I ran into those English teachers from my first night out, but this was the most lively night yet. The girls here were the least friendly of all the nights even though they were the ugliest, but I'm starting to think it's a response to the aggressiveness of the guys. It was so packed that the only way to get through is to hold up your full beer like a torch to clear a path. For the first time ever I saw music video mixing (perhaps with these).

A strange policy of Salta's clubs is that you must keep the same glass for the entire night or pay $0.75 for another one. You must also pay if you try to leave the club without a glass. What this means is that you have a bunch of guys walking around with empty cocktail glasses in their jean pockets. As a relatively wealthy gringo I am unaffected by the puny fine so I just pay the charge repeatedly throughout the night.

While Lima had more head-turners, Salta has very good foundation of cute girls in the 7 and 8 range with few fatties. I could live here for the girls, so I can only imagine how much better it will get as I move closer to Buenos Aires. Also, when someone needs a light, they don't ask if you have a lighter, they ask if you have fire. It reminds me of The Fifth Element.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my travel memoir A Dead Bat In Paraguay, about when I quit my job and sold my stuff to try and bang my way across South America. It contains my experiences with South American women and the struggles that crushed me both mentally and physically. Called "refreshing." "honest," and "inspiring," A Dead Bat In Paraguay is available in both eBook and paperback. Check out the homepage to watch the introductory video, read exerpts, or learn more about what's inside.

Toilet Travel Rules

October 21, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I remember when taking a dump used to be something that needed very little thought, but in South America you'll need a sound and effective toilet strategy. Here's mine.

1. Flush before you sit. Not only to clean smears left by your dorm mates but to make sure the toilet isn't clogged. Sometimes you know it's clogged but you have to go so bad that you decide to deal with the repercussions later (actually you let the cleaning lady deal with the repercussions). I took a memorable dump in Bolivia in a broken toilet bowl that was still there one day later.

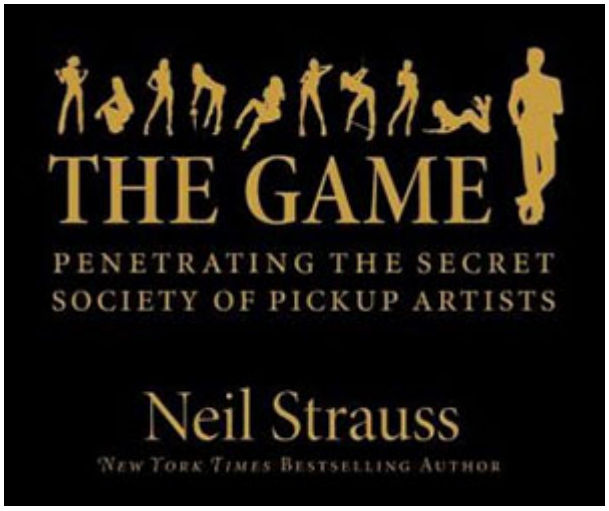
2. Flush often. Your log will not make it down. I repeat, your gigantic shit log will not make it down a South American toilet. I'm not saying chop it up with a stick but if you know a log is coming then access the toilet in a more discrete manner so no one knows you fucked everything up. Otherwise just keep flushing until it goes down. I clog toilets about 25% of the time, which makes every shit the possible highlight (or downside) of my day.

3. If you're a guy, protect your penis head. Don't let it touch the toilet bowl because god knows what will infect your hole. Either cradle your package with your hand or lay a little toilet paper curtain in front of it. The method I select depends on my mood and how long I estimate the shit will last.

4. Pay attention to the toilet paper. While most hostels give you toilet paper that has the consistency of elementary school construction paper, often times one side will be softer. Use this soft side to avoid the abraded anus (no big deal since it heals in a day or two). If you start seeing blood on the toilet paper then it's probably time to buy your own toilet paper.

5. Time your dumps to the maid cleaning schedule. They usually clean the bathrooms in the afternoon (1-2PM) while the gringos are doing whatever the Lonely Planet tells them to do. There is nothing like being the first to take a massive shit in a sparkling clean bowl. If you travel to South America as an evening shitter like me then just hold it overnight one day to put yourself on an afternoon shit schedule.

The dirtier the toilet bowls, the dirtier the stomachs, the dirtier the country. Peru and Bolivia are big winners here, with bathrooms that look like it was play time for kids with diarrhea water balloons.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Moths… Flame

October 22, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I sat next to a Brazilian guy on the 23 hour bus ride to Santiago, where we stayed at a hostel that had a guitar laying around. He didn't bring this up on the bus but apparently he studied music theory, has been playing guitar for 13 years, and knows most popular American rock songs, including lyrics.

While he played I sat quietly with my hands on my lap. To the girls my physical presence was disturbing his acoustic treatments.

For more on Chile, check out my Chile travel guide.

I Miss DC

October 23, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

> About 60,000 people responded to the online survey — at www.travelandleisure.com — which ranked 25 cities in categories including shopping, food, culture, and cityscape, said Amy Farley, senior editor at the magazine.
>
> For unattractiveness, Philadelphia just beat out Washington DC and Dallas/Fort Worth for the bottom spot.

Link.

The picture is coming together. For years men have been told to that DC has a excess of single women and now we know why. Let us never speak of DC having a great singles scene (#10) again.

> Democrats and Republicans alike debate (and flirt) over drinks everywhere from intimate lounges to rowdy sports bars, while the capital's monuments and museums make for romantic backdrops when lit up at night. With a tantalizing mix of transplants from all over the U.S. and abroad, you're sure to make some interesting—and hopefully high-powered—connections.

Oh Is That How It Happened?

October 24, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The last place I want a cute Irish girl into me is in a club in Argentina. It was a weekend night and we were the only two from our hostel that went out. Since she was a drinker, hooking up would be as certain as a Chilean from Santiago eating a hot dog piled disgustingly high with mayonnaise and a mix of other condiments that even an American wouldn't touch.

I didn't want to pull the trigger too soon because the girls in the club were nicer. Do you go for the sure thing or roll the dice and risk a silent jerk in the bottom bunk underneath some guy from New Zealand? I couldn't decide so I did the lean against the wall thing where she danced in front of me. I don't know if you have seen an Irish girl dance to house or reggaeton, but it was quite embarrassing—for me! I kept my options open.

About one hour in, she asked if I could hold her coat while she goes on the main dance floor. I said no and placed it on the floor. She said, "If you want to find me, you'll find me," and did a little head flick and off she went. I laughed at this attempt at game and started talking to the three Argentine girls next to me. They were extremely nice since they saw me with the Irish girl, who came back in four minutes, maybe three. She made it seem like she'd be gone for such a long time that reuniting with her would be on par with winning a rigged carnival game.

It's around now she makes a very strong effort on this here, but I wasn't surprised because she earlier admitted she likes "Persian guys." I find it amusing how there's a significant number of white girls with no body hair or pigment who have a type that can be best described as "hairy beast." Something about diversifying the gene pool I guess.

This isn't about what happened that night, but what happened a day later. The Irish girl makes friends with a Scottish bird and they tried to get me to come out. I declined because I was leaving the next morning. The Irish girl said, "Oh come on it'll be fun." She looked at the Scottish girl and continued, "We went out to this club last night and I gave him my coat and got lost and danced all night long." That would be like me saying, "I fucked two supermodels in the bathroom and it was grand. They didn't want me to use a condom so I didn't and I don't regret it one bit."

She wasn't lying, just viewing the night through the mess of her female brain. If a girl is not being chased or in control, minor alternations to reality will be made to make it so.

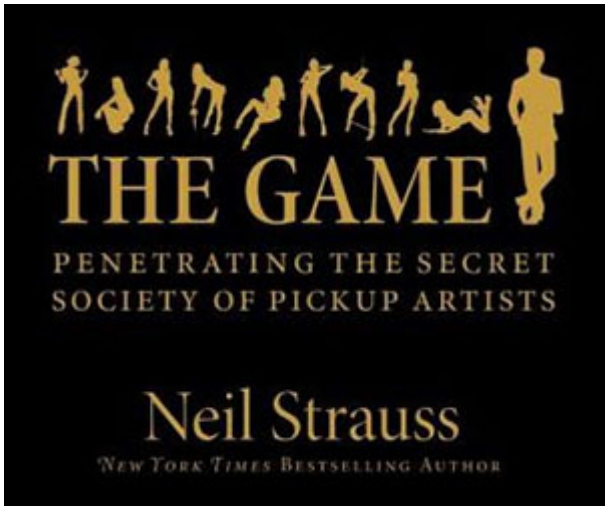
..

..

..

I jerked off. It's a long story.

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

10 Common Travel Scams

October 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I thought I had advanced street smarts when coming to South America, but then I got pick pocketed on my third day. Here's a list of popular scams I've learned about.

1. The pick pocket. This is usually an organized team effort. You are first marked as a tourist and a pocket is identified for picking. Success depends on you being distracted away from the pocket being picked, and this is usually done by a physical bump or shove. Or you do all the work distracting yourself by walking into a crowd at an outdoor celebration. Sometimes you are discreetly marked with chalk beforehand as a signal to nearby pick pocket accomplices.

Defense: Reach for your pockets when you get bumped. Don't walk into crowds and at the minimum don't put anything valuable in your back pockets.

2. The bag lift. Either sitting in a park or outdoor cafe, you notice keys or change on the ground. As you pick it up, the backpack you left a couple feet behind has disapeared.

Defense: Don't take your eyes off your bag. Everyone who had their bag snatched says they only looked away "for a second."

3. The bag slash. Usually on a crowded bus, someone slashes the outside of your backpack while you are distracted with some random commotion. Once slashed, someone sticks their hand in hoping to find something valuable. You don't realize your bag has been slashed. Variation: Instead of slashing they just open the zipper and reach inside.

Defense: Put your bag in front of you when taking public transport.

4. The mustard spray. Someone sprays a condiment around your waist as you are walking outside. A very polite accomplice with toilet paper then offers to help clean up the mess but to get it out all you need to do is take off your backpack. You never see it again.

Defense: Walk with the mustard until you get to a safehouse.

5. The fake police. This is a particularly dangerous scam operated by organized gangs that involves an English speaking confederate who befriends you in a public space like a bus station. A "policeman" arrives to do a random check and finds out your new friend has contraband, and demands you come with him to the fake police station where you tied up and relived of your credit cards and their PINs. Sometimes you are held for days as the robbers withdraw the daily maximum amount from your accounts. Variation: You are in a cab and someone wants to share the ride with you. Almost immediately, a fake policeman pulls the cab over and discovers contraband on the new passenger. The key to this type of scam working is you making the decision to voluntarily follow the fake policeman.

Defense: Ignore a lone officer by pretending you don't understand him. Don't follow any policeman unless multiple vehicle backup arrives and it's obvious they are real. Two Austrian tourists were victims of this scam in Bolivia and were killed.

6. The bus overhead grab. Once you fall asleep on the bus someone either sifts through your bag in the overhead or grabs it and gets off at the next stop. Nearly 100% chance of happening on overnight buses in countries like Ecuador and Bolivia. A variation is grabbing things from your jacket / fleece pockets as you sleep (while you are wearing it).

Defense: Keep your bag on your lap or check everything in underneath the bus, where it will be safer. Putting your bag on the floor is a poor defense if the robber gets in the seat behind you.

7. The taxi runaround. If you are coming out of a bar or club at night piss drunk, a crooked cab driver will disorient you by driving around. Then he pulls into an alley where an accomplice with a weapon relieves you of your money and clothes. This is an opportunistic crime because the cab driver selects people who he thinks wouldn't notice being driven in the wrong direction.

Defense: Don't get so trashed that you don't know the route home. Speak up if you think something is off to let the cab driver know you won't be an easy victim. If you are certain he's driving you into a trap, get behind his seat and go apeshit. Sitting next to a cab driver is a poor defense because accomplices can get in the backseat.

8. The bar tab. An English speaker befriends you and tells you about this really great bar down the street. You get there and see two girls at the table next to you raise their glasses in salud after opening an expensive bottle of wine. Your tab comes and turns out you bought that bottle of wine and several more for the many mediocre ladies in the bar. Burly bouncers won't let you leave until you charge an exorbitant sum to your credit card. Primitive variation: You are led into a "bar" (abandoned building) where you are immediately relieved of your goods.

Defense: Don't follow someone you just met on the street into a bar or club unless it's a really hot girl.

9. The found money. You are walking down the street and a man walking next to you finds a large roll of cash on the floor. He offers to split it with you. Out of nowhere an accomplice enters and claims it was his money and there is a significant amount missing. The man who found the money pays up and urges you to do the same to avoid serious trouble.

Defense: If it's too good to be true…

10. The switcharoo. A guy on the street is hawking cheap cameras that seem legit. Vendor is long gone by the time you realize you bought a box of rocks. Sometimes even stores will give you a box that is already opened.

Defense: Examine the goods.

Even if you know every travel scam, you will still be defenseless against a mugger with a knife or gun, or someone who randomly karate kicks you in the head. This usually happens at night where you are not carrying things like passport, jewelry, credit cards, or your Canon digital SLR camera. It’s best to give up the goods when attacked unless you have a weapon of your own and want to battle.

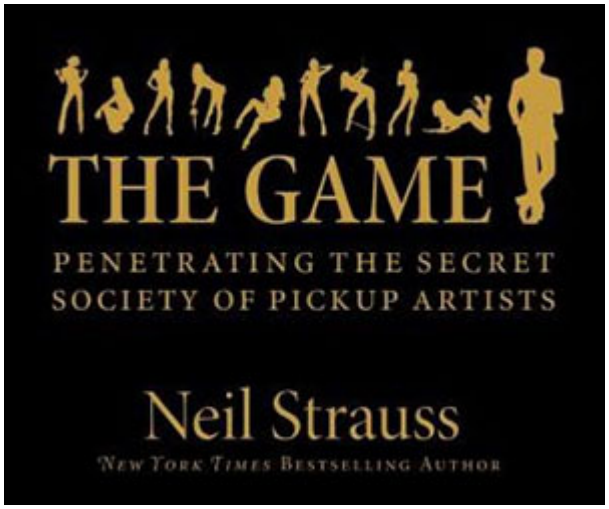
Bottom line: Be skeptical of people and use your brain but don’t but don’t let paranoia rob you of what could be a sexual experience with a local. Not everyone is trying to rob you.

If you liked this post then check out my travel guides, where I give brief reviews on thirty South American cities.



Poor Fucking Dog

October 29, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I saw about 400 feral dogs a day in Chile but this is the only one worth a picture.

Towards the end of the movie Ghostbusters 2, a lady's fur coat touches Vigo's slime and becomes a monster or whatever and scampers down the street. That's almost like how this carpet freak looks like when walking around. I imagine when it lays down to sleep you can't tell which side is its head and which its ass.

Postscript: Since writing this I've met a beer drinking dog who was also picture worthy.

For more on Chile, check out my Chile travel guide.

Re: Poor Fucking Dog

October 30, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here's the beer drinking dog working on the last drop of Cristal beer.

Me and two other German gringos clamored for a photo as locals in the line of a club watched on, disturbed by the behavior of individuals from the Western world.

I was the only one who got a clean shot!

For more on Chile, check out my Chile travel guide.

Santiago Chile Nightlife

October 31, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's difficult to explore nightlife is cities that are both prosperous and large because everything is so segmented. There's the weird house clubs, and there's the expensive lounges, and there's the area where the grunge kids go. Therefore I don't know how representative my two nights in Santiago were.

Friday. A horrible misunderstanding sent me and a few gringos into The Circuit, a gay house club in Bellavista. The gringos followed my stupid ass in even though there were warning signs like guys wearing shirts two sizes too small and a complete absence of females in line, all because I didn't want to "walk all night to find a club." Once inside it was too late. It was fun for a half an hour until I ran out of gay jokes (e.g. "Hey look it's so crowded that those two men are forced to hug tightly). Several men were wearing Abercrombie & Fitch shirts, which should tell you all you need to know about that brand, but disappointingly no gay guy approached me beyond some deep stares. I don't know what makes a large gay scene but I imagine Santiago has it because this club was packed. The house music was actually very decent. $10 ass rape cover.

We then went into a heterosexual house club called La Feria nearby but I think it had only four more girls than the gay club. The rule so far in South America is that the clubs have hotter girls than what you see on the streets (somewhat opposite of the States), but that turned out to be not true in Santiago. Quality sucked and the DJ played music that had a lot of beeps. $8 regretful cover.

This was my most expensive night out in South America ($30), and probably the worst.

Saturday. We take a 20 minute cab ride to Plaza Ñuñoa, a hard to pronounce hot spot that only had sit-down bars. Another 20 minutes walking landed us in Kmasu, a decent club playing popular music, including a lengthy hip hop set featuring Dr Dre and Sean Paul. Halfway through the night I conclude that Chilean girls are unattractive; homely faces with pale skin and a culture of obesity that rivals that of the States means the few lookers know they are lookers. The homely girls are quite friendly though. We all got trashed at the reasonably priced drinks and stayed until 6am. The girl I ended up talking to wasn't a drinker so I had to act sober like I just got pulled over by the cops. On the other hand, the American girl with us got so drunk she passed out and needed to be carried back to the hostel. USA! USA! $8 cover.

Santiago doesn't have Salta's weird all-night glass policy, but it does have an interesting way of buying a drink. You have to wait in an orderly line at the register, pay, and then take your receipt to the bartender who makes your drink. It's actually a very nice first-come first-serve system instead of having to wait next to a mob of people snapping their fingers and waving paper money to get the bartenders attention.

Overall, Santiago was a bust.

La Feria

For more on Chile, check out my Chile travel guide.

Ten Years

November 4, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In medium sized hostels I have been called the “party guy.” Because I am not party anything that gives you an idea of the kind of hippie who travels to South America. They think someone who who goes out on Friday and Saturday night and sleeps off the hangovers until 3PM is a novel character.

Once word gets out that I like to leave the hostel after the sun sets, I get asked if I’m “going out tonight” about every fifteen minutes. And then there is the “Did you meet any girls?” No I stayed out for six hours watching futbal. Even though most gringos are younger than me, they come across like they “did” the going out thing (everyone here tries to brag about how they started going to pubs at 13), and are now more enlightened because they rather stay in to drink cheap red wine in the kitchen with an obese monster and some creepy 45-year-old creepy Danish guy who you know is a pedophile.

This is how I look at it: What can I do now that I can’t do in 10 years? Get trashed at some shitty club hitting on 21-year-old girls. Shit I don’t think I can even do this in 2 years.

Postscript: Thankfully as I get closer to Buenos Aires my partying nature is revealed for what is really is: tame and weak.

It’s Going To Be Hard To Leave (Part 1)

November 6, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you Google “Argentina models” (or just “models”), you will see nothing better than what I see every day and night. It’s a parade of beautiful girls. As one guy told me, “It’s like they’ve discovered how to engineer hot girls here.” I’ve become so desensitized to it that the only girls I notice are the ones who really stand out—the ugly ones. It’s so brutal to be unattractive here that moving to Chile or the United States would be your only option.

Having a round, proportional ass is such a given that there is no need for me to check them out anymore. But I look anyway to see how nice it is. You know those cheesy beer commercials with the party of very pretty girls? It’s better than that. Very few girls are overweight and all of them—even the tomboys—have long long hair. The only women that have hair shorter than me are the rocker wannabes or women over 40, but even that is rare because apparently older women here believe is still looking like a woman. Maybe I’m overhyping things but it really is that much better than back home. When you ask someone how long they’ve been in town, the answer is usually three days. Here in Cordoba, Argentina I’ve gotten several answers approaching two months, and chances are you’ve never heard of Cordoba. Es increible.

Still, many have complained about how “tough” Argentine girls are, but I wonder if that is just beta-speak for, “They don’t approach me like the girls in Peru.” The girls here will not encourage you, will never approach, will not make any sort of eye contact, and will do everything in their power to make it seem like they don’t want to know you. It’s so bad that I’m confident the word unapproachable came from Argentina. But it’s just a front. Once you crack it, and it’s really not that difficult, you are home sweet home.

In Chile I was advised by a native in a club bathroom (not in a stall) to dump my bad Spanish and just open in English to be even more different and exotic. I go up to a group and say something in English or just, “You guys speak English, yes?” It opens better than anything else I’ve tried. In Argentina, depending on the club, it takes only a few approaches to get “in” with a group. It’s the same amount of work you’d have to put in a U.S. megaclub, but unlike the U.S. there are no morbidly obese or warpigs in the group. They’re all good. I tell the gameless gringos I meet here that that’s all they gotta do is speak English but even while drunk they are too scared to approach. They just stand there, getting drunk alone while bobbing their head to house music I know they don’t like, whining about how they can’t wait to get to Brazil. I often have to ditch them in the club because they just fuck things up.

On Saturday night I went to a club called Dorian Gray that surprisingly wasn’t gay. I started talking to three 8’s. Two of them were fraternal twins, with hair almost touching their ass, and all had bodies that would break my buddies necks back at home. I wished I brought my camera. It is very difficult for any reasonable man to choose between the three. While the problem is other countries is “Can I do better?”; the problem here is

“Which one do I pick?”

Girls usually go out in large packs so the biggest problem is indeed the picking. When all of them are giving you an equal vibe and they are all on the same level, it’s hard to make a wise decision. If you pick poorly then it will be all for nothing because not only will the girl who liked you go cold because you didn’t pick her, but her friend will too since she knows her friend liked you. Argentine girls are too proud to be second best. So right now I’ve adopted a mediocre, passive strategy of not picking. I make progress on the group and just wait until one of them gives me a green light. Sometimes the green light comes late, but it always comes. With four girls iin Salta I didn’t know what was going on until one of them asked me to sit with her in the front of the cab at the end of the night. It’s so ambiguous that I’ve seriously contemplated just asking “So which one of you likes me the most?”

The club closed at 6AM so we hopped in a cab to the after-hours club called “The Poor Devil.” They wouldn’t let me pay the cab fare. Finally, after almost three hours, the green light comes: one of them grabs my hand and walks me to the bar. BOOYAKASHA! She buys me a drink and refuses to let me pay for it. And I do mean refuse—I picked up her to physically move her away from the bar but she still insisted. She’s a 22-year-old student. That sort of thing never happens to me at home. Maybe this is how Argentine girls are tough?

They walked me back to my hostel a few blocks away, but then the two other girls started hovering like helicopters. Isolate or die, or as a buddy of mine used to say, divide and conquer. Now the other sister is on me talking to me about hanging out. Are they just being friendly? But I’ve never held hands with a lady friend before. And why did she keep asking me how long I was staying in town? The sun is out now and I’m so exhausted I can’t think. Green light still looks good in the light. It’s 7AM but on the streets instead of seeing professionals in suits or storekeepers tending shop you got dozens of drunk guys singing and running on the streets playfully hitting on the girls milling around. It was bizarre.

CONTINUED…

It’s Going To Be Hard To Leave (Conclusion)

November 7, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

CONTINUED FROM PART 1…

Guys get laid by either mostly luck or mostly skill. It’s luck if you switch yourself with another random guy and sex would still occur. That means you got the girl at the right moment. There is nothing wrong with that but you will you be unable to consciously duplicate your effort. Otherwise, you did something that created attraction and sexual desire and it was only you she wanted. And then you try again the next night, with a better than average chance of succeeding.

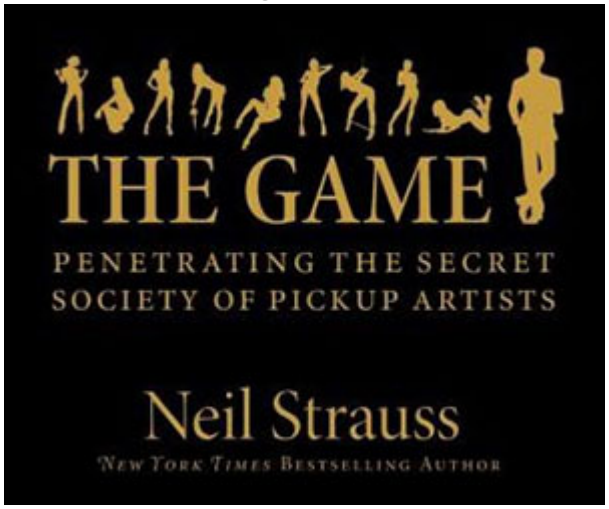
The gringos I’ve met that have a sex story got it by luck, plain and simple. Only one Israeli guy has been the exception. I wish not so I could learn some new things but the typical story is a gringo goes to a bar, a horny 5 or 6 approaches him, and he goes with it and gets some if her bedroom is far enough from her parents room or if he finds a hotel that doesn’t mind a couple without luggage. Only here have I heard “…and then she just kissed me.” If you are so oblivious to a girl’s attraction to you that she has to make the big move then I know you’re struggling for girls back at home and that’s the reason why you enjoy traveling through third world countries so much.

Standing with the three very pretty Argentine girls next to my hostel door, I knew I couldn’t get any further. After nearly four hours with them, I accepted defeat and settled for green light’s phone number. Then, to validate the confusion and ambiguity I’ve been trying to explain to you, the sister asks me for my cell phone number. Whatever, this old man needed sleep. How do these people have so much energy? The next day I seek out the Argentines working at the hostel to explain to me what the deal is, but they are as confused as I was. With two more months here I’ll have time to figure things out on my own.

Two days later she responds to my text message a typical twenty minutes after I sent it. I hate text messaging more than anyone but the definition of awkward would be me talking in Spanish on the telephone. She! used! a! lot! of! exclamation! points!!! but I loved it. I like chasing girls and putting in work from start to finish, much more than a random club make-out that ends once the cab drives away. I’m sweating bullets trying to translate my game into Spanish but with the hostel chef’s help the messages are going and coming. If it’s not difficult and doesn’t have an awesome payoff, it wouldn’t even be worth thinking about.

I was hanging outside on the sidewalk with a Canadian who was digging into some watermelon. Right by us walks a girl in gym clothes, as close to Western perfection as you can get, more attractive than any female I’d see back at home in half a year. But there are no hoots and hollers, no obvious stares. She is very beautiful, but she’s not rare here, and at night the club will be full of girls like her. Yeah, it’ll be hard to leave, but harder not to come back.

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.



Three Months Update

November 11, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

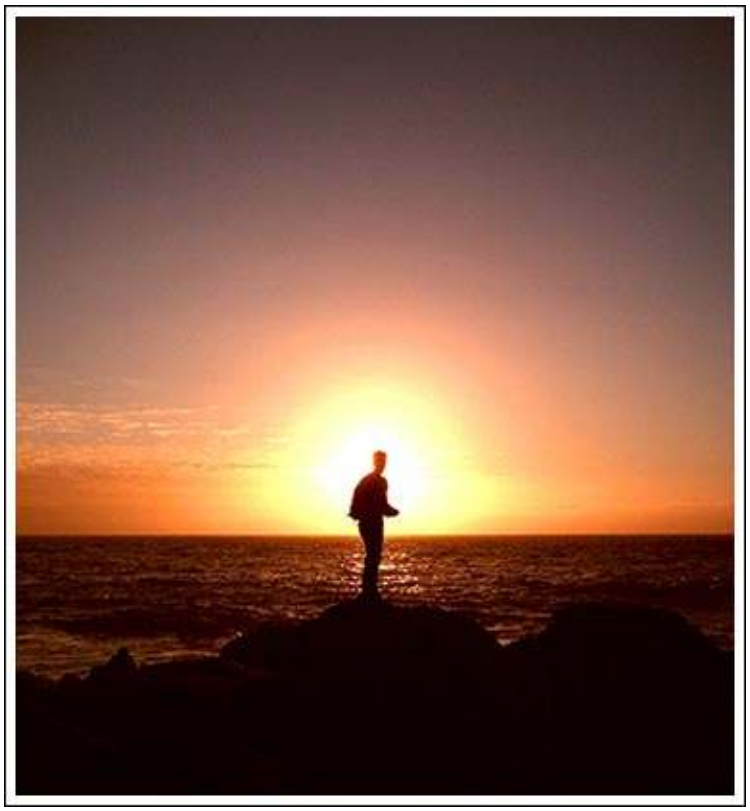
---

The trip is getting better as designed but an unexpected cost is that I lost a lot of energy and health traveling through the dregs of South America. Peru and Bolivia fucked me up the most. To combat a softening body I started hitting the gym ($3.50 for a day pass) and eating more protein.

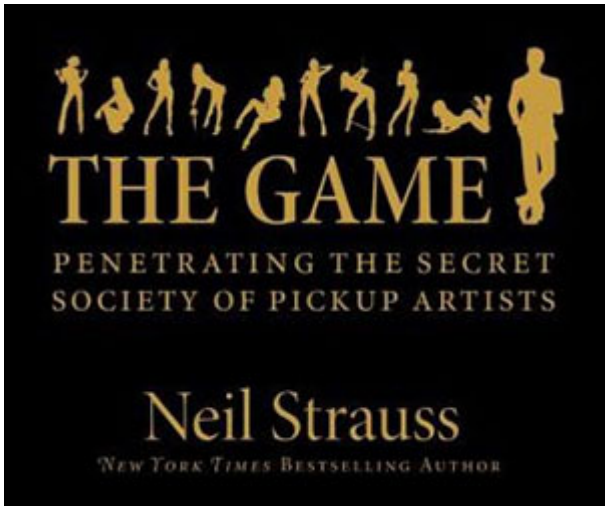
Speaking of the gym, I've gotten to know a Canadian 'roid monster who claimed he shagged 20 girls in 30 days in Rio. He told me to keep my beard trimmed to look more European and prepare to do very little work to get laid like a rock star. Sounds a little too good to be true if you ask me but he's not the first guy to tell me such things.

My stomach is getting better but it still growls like a bear on most days. In fact I've named it Bear. Eating yogurt helps but I think I have entered the chronic stage of whatever I got from Bolivia. On the days I go out I avoid complicated foods so it doesn't end up cockblocking me. At least it's not getting worse?

The big question of the trip is if I should visit those three small countries in South American that no one ever visits (Suriname, French Guinea, Guyana). There's nothing there that I specifically want to see but it'd be cool to say I've been to every country in South America just for bragging purposes. Guyana is a little rough though.



Chile + beach + big rock + sun



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Valparaiso, Chile

November 13, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

My third contribution to the Volette travel blog is up.

> Class is not a word I'd use to describe Valparaiso's nightlife. I had the unfortunate experience of walking into a club called Cosmonova where the owner at some point came up with the idea to combine aspects of a nightclub with a strip club. It took the appearance of a naked Chilean woman for me to understand why there were 60 men forming a semi-circle in a dark room next to the bar. Nearby was a room of ladies being entertained by what I imagine to be a hairless man, stripping Chippendales-style for their pleasure. Once the show was over and the salivating hounds were released on the much smaller female population, I fought my way to the exit. Talk about warming up the crowd.

At risk of tooting my own horn, I think I captured the city with competence.

For more on Chile, check out my Chile travel guide.

My Travel Buddies

November 14, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For two weeks I've been travelling with two moai statues. The first head I've named Little Steve.

After a day he complained about being lonely so I returned to the market and bought him a friend.

Meet Big Steve. He is made of stone and is a bit inconvenient to travel with. Last week I rested him on the ledge of the top bunk to be funny but he fell when the maid was making my bed and nearly killed her. Good thing she has a sense of humor! Since then I put him on my pillow and she never fails to tuck him in.

Signs that you are _____ while travelling...

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.

Another Bang Review

November 15, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Via The Boston Bachelor:

> Bang is a dense but informative read, full of advice even the most weathered Casanovas and "pick-up artists" can appreciate. The book wastes no time in breaking things down bit-by-bit from the approach to the date to the bedroom. For those of you who are more familiar with the whole "pick-up community," Bang strikes a good balance between the structured, sequential "Mystery Method" and the more free-flowing "Charisma Arts."
>
> If there's one chapter that stands out more than others, it's the one titled "Late Game," which breaks down the step-by-step (or article of clothing-by-article of clothing) journey from the end of the date to the end of the orgasm. The chapter titled "Internal Game" is another highlight, as it discusses the most powerful sexual magnet of all–the human mind. The odds-and-ends Appendix also serves up a great variety of tidbits, from approaching girls in cars to dealing with girls who suck (in a bad way) in the sack. I do wish that more specifics on body language and its importance were presented in the book–a minor complaint, all in all.

You can read the whole thing here.

School Of Argentine Girls

November 20, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Average group of girls on an average night (with Aussie wingman)*

When I arrived in Cordoba, I was still trying to figure out the best way to pick up Argentine girls. Two weeks later, after going out most nights with a pack of almost a dozen gringos as motivated as I am, one of the last conversations we had was the smoothest way to take a girl to a love hotel.

It's amazing how fast you learn with other guys. It's similar to how you work out harder when you have a buddy standing over you on the bench calling you a pussy for not being able to push the bar up. Every night we'd talk about our experiences, share our revelations, and then use all that knowledge the following night. We all got pretty good pretty fast. As a couple of them have told me, "I've never in my life hit on girls like I have here." I have! But it's been a while.

Lesson 1: Get a cell phone. While one night stands happen, they are much less common than in the U.S. And how many of those have you gotten recently? A nice phone on a prepaid plan will cost you $50, and a $10 fill-up will last you forever since you will be mostly sending text messages.

Lesson 2: Know where at least one love hotel is located. "So do you know of a hotel around here?" is something you should never ask your chick. Take her out to a bar nearby the hotel to set up the "random" discovery. Going rate for a mostly decent room is $7-$14 for a two hour go.

Lesson 3: You need to average at least five approaches a day, and not just at night. Girls are everywhere: the park, the university, the gym. It'd be silly to wait until 2AM to start talking to girls. Remember that Argentine girls will never approach you. If you are a shy guy and have no intention of approaching, don't come to Argentina.

Turns out it is very easy to talk to Argentine girls, but hard to escalate. Every guy has a story that starts with "She was loving me" and ends with "Fuck I don't what happened." We're pretty sure that the novelty of talking to a gringo (there aren't many here) makes them excited to talk to us for the first 20 minutes or so, giving us the impression that they are into us. Once the novelty wears off and the language barrier becomes more obvious and painful, things fade out. So you need to talk to enough girls to catch one whose attraction for you is enough to overcome the language problem. It helps if she hasn't been laid in a while.

Lesson 4: You have significantly better odds getting laid when you meet a girl in a bar than in a loud club. Go to the house club only after trying your luck at the bars. Only problem is that the bars here are packed with tables and everyone is sitting down, making for tougher approaches. While the clubs have tons and tons and tons of girls, the young ones there are more concerned with dancing than hooking up. It really seems like most of them don't want to get laid.

Lesson 5: Forget everything you have ever learned about eye contact. Don't look for it, don't expect it, and don't wait for it. It is a very poor indicator of interest in Argentina.

Lesson 6: Young Argentine girls are more flakey and have less focus than American girls. If you can't bang an American college girl, it will be very difficult for you to pick up an Argentine college girl, though 90% of girls you meet at night in Cordoba are in college. They also value attention more than American girls, stringing you along just for validation until they get their fix and move on.

The older girls in Cordoba have it tough. The competition is so great that they will make it extremely easy for you if you happen to meet them (I can count on one hand how many girls I have met over 25). Proof of how hard it is for girls out here is that I get much more love from the girl travellers in the hostel than when I was in ugly countries like Bolivia or Ecuador. But I don't bother because, relatively speaking, even the cute gringas seem ugly. On the flip side, even the ugly Argentine girls are cute.

Lesson 7: It takes time. The quality ones are projects that take at least a week to crack if you even got a shot. You need to buckle down, play the text messaging game, hang out with her friends, and keep pushing things into love hotel where you just to "talk" and "hacer cucharita." Do all this while working on other girls. If you stay here for only a weekend, you'll need lots of luck.

Lesson 8: Dick game works better here. Girls respond better to jerk + funny than interesting + funny. For example when the girl tells you she doesn't speak much English, say, "Why not? English is a very common language." When she asks you what you think of Argentina say, "It's alright. The girls are very weird." Don't insult, but make a lot of jokes that you are not impressed with the country or girls. Point out things like cultural flaws instead of mentioning how her country has the hottest girls you've ever seen in your life.

Lesson 9: Get ready for the head turn when you go in for the kiss. Every girl does it. Something that never happens in the U.S. may be traumatizing for an American guy, but keep in mind it's a cultural thing and isn't that bad because she sticks around after your attempt. Stay composed like it didn't affect you and retry every 10 minutes or so until you get there. Resist the temptation to force it. If you don't kiss her the first night you meet, forget about it.

The kiss here is a big deal. It's the most frustrating part of dealing with Argentine girls. They make you put in a ridiculous amount of work for something that is so minor back home. But once you kiss them it's like a light switch goes off: they instantly get more affectionate and warm. The amount of affection an Argentine girl gives you after the kiss is similar to what an American girl would give you on the second or third date. When an Argentine girl tries to convince me her behavior is the same as girls from other parts of the world, I ask her how many girls they have tried to bang that are not from Argentina.

Lesson 10: Leave your ego, pride, shame, and humiliation at home. It's hard, and while I'm not completely sure if it's worth it or not, you will not get anything if you are used to playing it cool and letting girls do the work. As I like to tell the guys, "If I put this much energy into getting girls at home, I'd get laid every single night."

Follow these rules and it's a 100% guarantee you will get action here, either from the suddenly insecure female travellers, the Argentine girls working at the hostel, the young ones at the club, or the older cougars who know their place. It's up to you how much you get.

When my ass was exploding in Bolivia, I drew a strict travel plan on a cocktail napkin, including which cities I'd visit and how many days I'd spend there. I wrote down two rules: Do not visit a city unless there is something you want to see or experience, and only stay longer than planned if you are having the time of you life. I originally planned to stay in Cordoba for four nights, but I've been here for three weeks, and the only reason I'm leaving soon is because a buddy of mine is flying into Buenos Aires. My first night going out back in DC is going to be spent fighting back tears. I know it.

Continued… Re: School of Argentine Girls

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

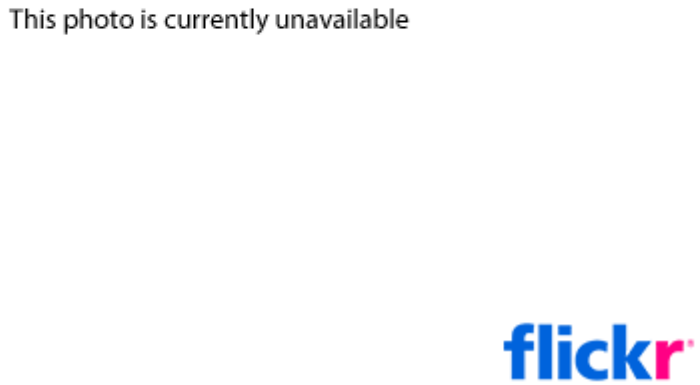
Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

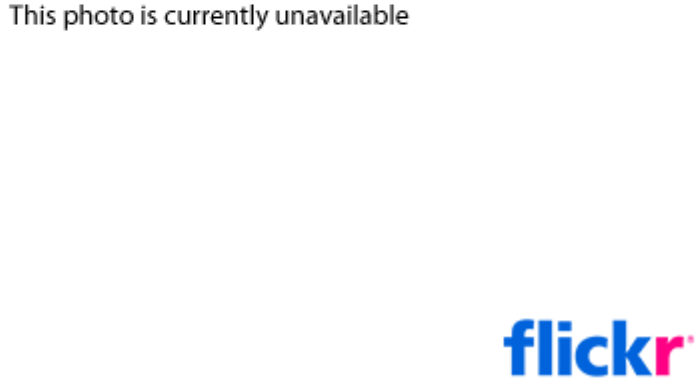
Goodbye Cordoba

November 25, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Most fun out of the twenty or so cities I've visited so far.

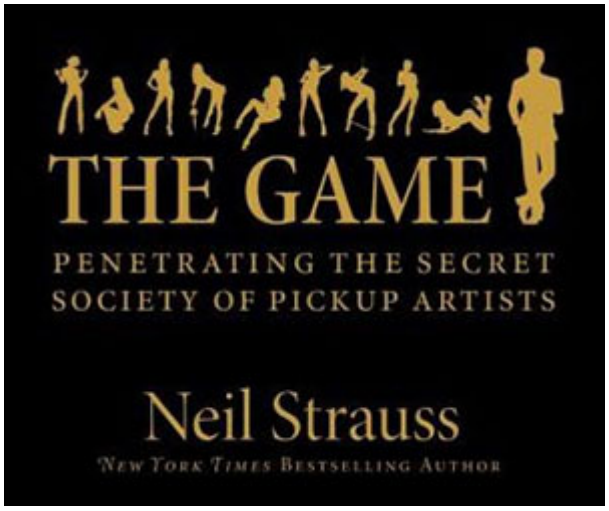




This photo is currently unavailable

This photo is currently unavailable

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Shamefully Sloppy

November 27, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

My game is usually clean but I got sloppy and I think it cost me. It's pretty pointless looking back and trying to figure out where things went wrong with a girl because you can never be sure about what it really was, but I'm pretty sure on this one.

I met up with a project I've been working on for ages and her friends at a bar. We're drinking and having a laugh (Spanish only) when the girl asks me if I brought my camera to take some pictures.

Flashback: She wanted to hang out two nights before on Saturday but I told her I'm staying in when I actually went out. Going out was good and I took many pictures.

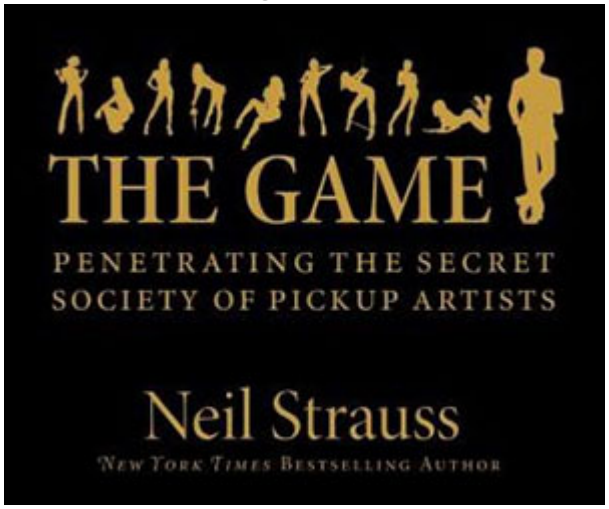
I told her not to look back at the photos thinking she would listen to me but some time later I wasn't paying attention and saw her with my camera stuck on this rather innocent photo. There were others with the same girl, suggesting more than just a random photo op but less than a hookup. The sequence of photos made it obvious they happened recently, as in Saturday.

She called me a liar but with a slight smile, making me think I was fine. I mean if she was from the U.S. then it's likely she wouldn't care too much and maybe be even more into me because of the jealousy factor, but the girls here have a lot more pride.

We planned to meet a couple days later. Didn't happen. Taking forever to reply to my text messages, if at all. Suddenly busy. Completely dead.

If you lie to a chick, don't bring evidence of your lie with you when you see her.

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.



Re: School Of Argentine Girls

November 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There were a few questions to the School Of Argentine Girls post. Here are the answers.

1. When I left the States I weighed 175 pounds. Right now I weigh 178 pounds. The extra three pounds is due to glazed croissants, the only available breakfast food in Argentina, and dulce de leche. Longer hair makes me look skinnier?

2. It's very difficult to meet Argentine girls aged between 25-30, possibly because they are engaged or married. To meet girls over 30 you need to go to the old people's clubs, which I still need to hit for research purposes. I have not noticed the "old guy in the club" phenomenon here, though when I tell girls I'm too old for them I often get something like, "No you're not my last boyfriend was 28!"

3. It's happened to me at least half-a-dozen times that I'm talking to a cute girl and find out she is 16. Usually they look older because of the dim lighting. One of the hottest girls I've talked to in Argentina was 17. Average age is more like 20.

4. In previous countries approaching was harder because I was doing it in Spanish, but I found out that by just doing my thing in English, regardless of whether they understand or not, approaching is far easier, especially after you've racked up a number of successful international approaches that build up your international game confidence. It snowballs until you start doing it in the daytime as well. I worry about the language problem after the approach, but the "problem" is actually my greatest asset.

5. As a commenter pointed out, saying "Quiero hacer cucharita" means "I want to spoon." Girls love that shit.

6. Eye contact in the U.S. is usually an indicator that the girl likes you and wants to talk to you. It makes things a lot easier when you go to a bar or club and don't feel like working too hard. But in Argentina the girls don't make eye contact before you approach, so you're going into each one not knowing how the girl will react. It's actually better this way because you approach based on what you want and not necessarily what the girl wants.

7. My aussie wing is not holding the cigarette.

I'm currently taking a short break from the girls and visiting glacier land (Patagonia).

Continued… Argentine Girls Final Thoughts

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

The Giants

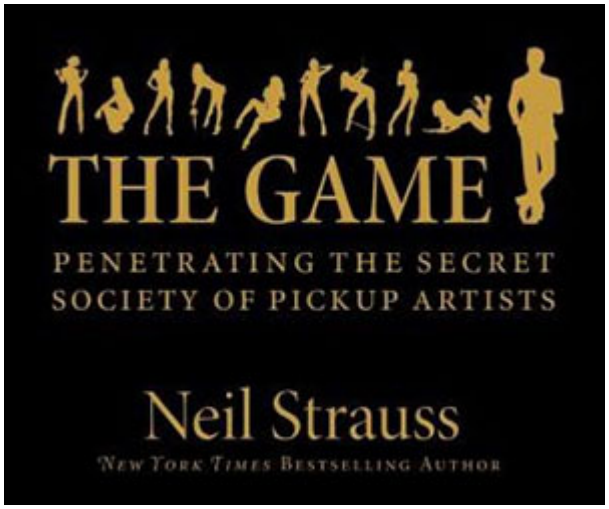
November 29, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Bobby Rio from The Seduction Bible asked me to recount a memorable pick up story. You can read it here.

> My giant's car was at my place so pulling up I used the reliable "How about I make you a peanut butter jelly sandwich?" She came in.

It was a pre-blog pickup, before my pretty face was recognizable on the streets of D.C. I got recognized about four or five times the month before I left. In South America I have been recognized zero times.



Cordoba and Rosario Argentina Nightlife

December 2, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Argentine nightlife is much different than in the U.S. You go out here at the time clubs back at home close, making for an interesting cat-like sleep schedule. After 6AM you can party until the next afternoon by going to a series of afterhour clubs. (Some clubs only serve the purpose of being the after after club.) The longest I could go was until 8AM. There is a point you just look at the people still dancing and say, "This is stupid I'm not even horny anymore," and hail a cab with the sun in your face. The endurance champion is this Argentine guy named Flaco. Once I remember him and his crew stayed out until 9AM and then went straight to the pool until 2PM. They all collapsed when they came back, reeking of beer and chlorine.

They funny thing is that most people have regular jobs. Many times I'm talking to someone in a club and they inform me they have to be at work in two hours.

Cordoba

Mitre. If you don't want to meet any girls over 22 then come here. Music is top notch with a good mix of just about everything except salsa. This is the easiest place to find 16-year-olds, if you are into that sort of thing (that would be a birth date in the 90's). Go starting on Thursday. $4 cover with beer.

Pobre Diablo. The after hours club that reminds me of Club 5 in DC. Don't go here unless you already have a chick because there are packs of really drunk guys giving one last ditch effort to get laid. At least the average Argentine guy is more friendly and less belligerent than the average American guy. (I've been in Argentina for over a month and have yet to see a club fistfight.) $3 cover for guys.

Dorian Gray. Relatively new club that is popular on Saturday nights. Main floor plays house and a smaller room plays retro and even some hip hop. A little weird with the transsexuals walking around but I've had the most luck with Cordoba girls here. $5 cover with beer.

Club F. Way out in the boonies but worth it. I still have more traveling to do but this is the hottest collection of girls I've seen anywhere (sorry Gotica). Because no gringos make it out here your status will get you farther than back in town. Downside is that catching a cab back is so difficult that you may have to find a bus (people get so desperate that they throw themselves in front of cabs). Still, it doesn't get better than this. Go on Saturday. $5 cover with beer.

Rondeau Street Bars. Several blocks of just bars and clubs. The clubs are smaller than the ones above but they have friendlier girls. Don't be scared to approach large groups of girls sitting down. There is also a few bars around where Fuctuoso Rivera turns into Larranaga. It's dead here from Sunday until Tuesday.

Rosario Nightlife

Listen! Yeah there is an exclamation point in the name. Pretty decent bar that is just what I've been looking for: a club/bar combo. Plus there are no other gringos. The girls here are much friendlier than what you'd find in a nearby megaclub such as…

MDM (pronounced Madame). Me and three other gringos skipped the one block line when I said I was doing a review for the Washington Post. I don't believe that worked, especially since I was wearing a cowboy hat. I have a feeling this club used to be a factory judging by the huge chimney stack in the back. It's now a pussy factory, with more hot girls in one place than entire U.S. cities. Unfortunately there are more guys to match them and the girls here have an attitude problem, especially after 3:30AM or so. In fact, one of my wingmen got violently slapped. It was kind of my fault when I accidentally pushed his hand on a girl's ass, but still, he didn't have to squeeze. We should have stayed at Listen! $3 cover with beer.

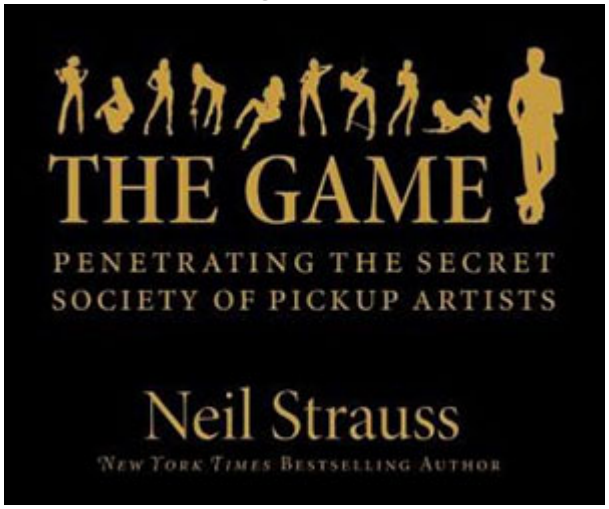
One thing I really like about Argentine clubs is that there isn't the obsession on making a buck with table service, though I'm sure it's just a matter of time until that changes. Missing are those guys who want you to look at them because they are able to pay a 700% premium on a bottle of "French" vodka that a French person has never heard of.

Now I go to Buenos Aires.

Mitre

MDM

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.



Please Stop

December 4, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This post is for everyone, including me. We need to stop saying “like.” Now. We’re the only English-speaking country that uses like as a filler word and it makes us sound retarded. I cringe when I meet an American, usually a West-coaster, who uses it in every sentence. I want to shake the shit out of them and say “PLEASE STOP YOU SOUND LIKE AN IDIOT!!!” It’s distracting and serves no other purpose than to dumb down your speech. I’m all for slang though, especially English slang (to make out = snog, to like = to be keen, bang = shag, she wants cock = she’s out for it, etc.).

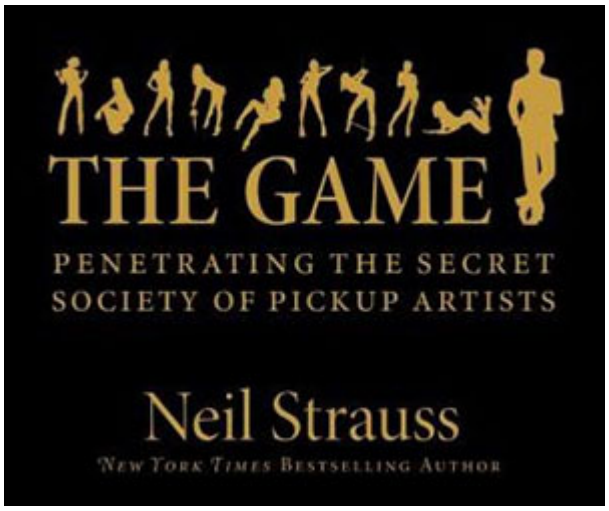
While I’m on this topic I have two other suggestions specifically for American girls.

1. Volume control. Why do you have to talk so loud? I’ve never had to ask an American girl to repeat herself.

2. Stop talking about yourself. No one cares about your very minor personal stories. Out of all the stories you love telling only 2% are worthy. Save the rest for amusing yourself on the bus when your IPOD runs out of batteries. After your story barrage is done and you leave the room, everyone makes fun of you.

The only potential problem American guys have is they all have the same haircut, but that doesn’t bother me.

Oh dude you left your pomade in the bathroom.



Four Months Update

December 9, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I feel like I'm seeing too much for one man. My brain is so constantly stimulated with newness that I'm nervous back home I'll go through withdrawal and just curl up in my dad's basement. Unfortunately it flooded after I left so I may have to deal with some mold smell.

I've realized that my ambition, as judged by an American woman lawyer, is zero. Which means I will never experience amazing sex with a lawyer. I thought after some time I'd get an itch for the lifestyle back home but I still have no interest in having a "real" job, and the only itch I get is from bed bug bites. If I can live comfortably out of a 45-pound backpack for four months, only buying things that need replacing like socks and toothpaste, then there is no other possession I need in life. Things are so simple now—I just worry about my health, people I care about, and how I'm going to challenge and entertain myself. Until the money runs out, anyway.

There is an American I met here that stayed for only two weeks and everyone was shocked his trip was so short. "Typical American vacation," I thought, "I had to do that." We're the greatest empire in the world, albeit a struggling one, but from my sample size we travel less than every other Western European country except Italy. We are looked upon by others as working too much and not getting out of the country, and it's true because our idea of a vacation is usually the beach for the weekend. For the population we have in the U.S., there should be twenty times more of you down here travelling with me, but money and status are so ingrained in our culture that taking time off from making money to travel with few possessions in basic accommodations and challenging environments just doesn't make sense. Plus that gap in your resume would ruin your carefully planned career path.

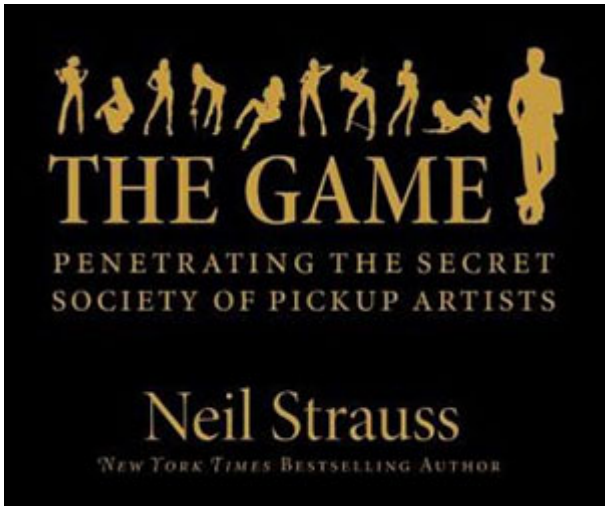
It looks like I will have more money leftover than I thought so when I return home I can continue the bum / slacker / coffeeshop lifestyle I left behind. It was the best time of my life, without a job, without a car, having deep conversations with my dad, eating Persian food everyday, watching my little brothers grow up, getting more action than I've ever gotten, waking up at 11am, thinking writing reading, swimming laps in the neighborhood pool. I can't tell you how this compares until I'm done, until the parasites or whatever in my stomach passes through my system, and even then I'm not sure if you can compare a life that was stable with one that is constantly changing and over-stimulating with roller-coaster ups and down like a manic depressive. One day I'm in the gutter fantasizing about my airplane landing in Dulles, the next I'm researching how much apartments here cost.

On Christmas I will be around Montevideo (pronounced mon-tay-vi-DAY-oh) and then Punta del Este for New Years. I'm tired but there is still a lot left to see.

This photo is currently unavailable

flickr

Gym and chicken



It’s That Bad

December 10, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I was sitting in a cafe when I locked eye contact with a girl for two seconds. The first thought to my head was, “Not from Argentina.” I walked by her table of friends and they were speaking Hebrew.

Seven girls check into the hostel. Three of them lock eye contact with me. Definitely not from Argentina. I see a Brazilian flag on one of their bags.

Even though I have accepted it, I’m in disbelief that an entire country of girls can not perform such a minor, innocent move. Imagine when you want more than just eye contact. Imagine when you want an Argentine girl to put some real investment into you. I figured out a few things that make it easier, but damn I still can’t figure out the game that is consistent on Argentine girls. I think what I’ve gotten has been right time / right place, and I’ve tried about everything. I won’t figure it out on this trip.

Anyway I gotta go—those Brazilian girls just sat next to me.

Continued… Seven Brazilian Girls Walk Into A Hostel

Seven Brazilian Girls Walk Into A Hostel

December 11, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Sort of continued from yesterday.

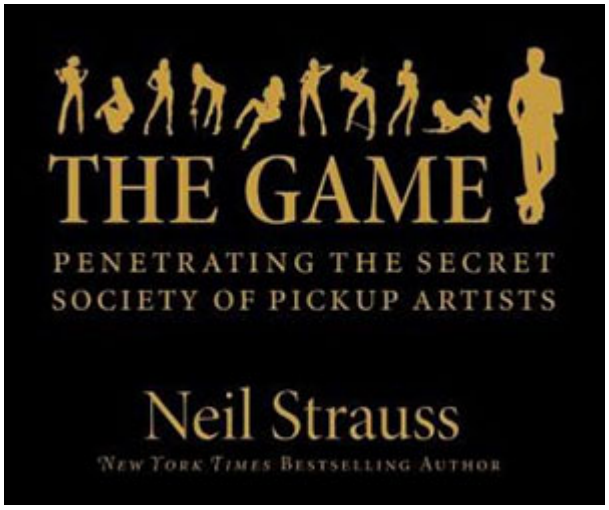
The Brazilians were talking nonstop so I had to dive in without waiting for a pause in their conversation. I said, “I think I know where you guys are from.” South Americans don’t pick up on this type of set-up so two of them immediately said Brazil. Fast forward some fun conversation later and one is teaching me Portuguese, writing some common words in my notebook, while another is drawing a map explaining all the places I need to visit in Brazil. Another is putting her arm around me while all of them are interrupting each other to talk to me. When there is a pause in the conversation I just sit back because they all work to come up with questions to keep it going. Their hyper-warmth makes me feel cold, Argentine.

All the while other gringos in the hostel bar are staring at me, as if saying, “Bro-man invite me in there’s only one of you and seven of them!” Fuck you do your own approaches! One amateur tries to get in by offering us pepperoni pizza. Get that greasy shit out of here. The day I get outgamed by a slice of pizza…

These girls made me feel good, something that only two Argentine girls in five weeks have done. I firmly believe that Argentine girls are capable of this, but only after a very long period of bullshit and games. When a Brazilian girl likes you, you know it. When an Argentine girl likes you, she acts aloof and stupid. Keep in mind these Brazilians are of the wealthy variety with Prada bags.

Later they offered me their caipirinha’s and asked what I’m doing later in the night, but of course I was sick with yet another cold (story of this trip). That’s okay because Brazil is coming. I can’t wait.

For more on Brazil, check out my Brazil travel guide.



Perfect

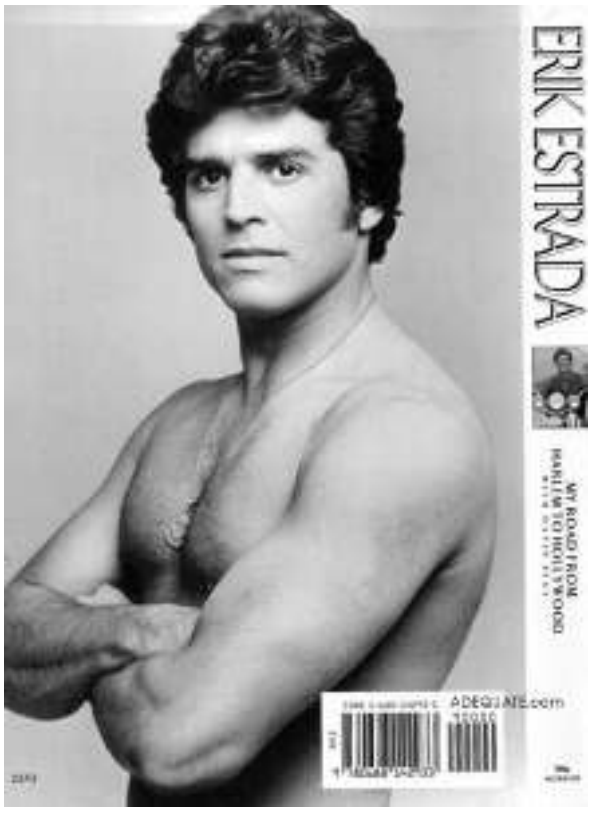
December 12, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

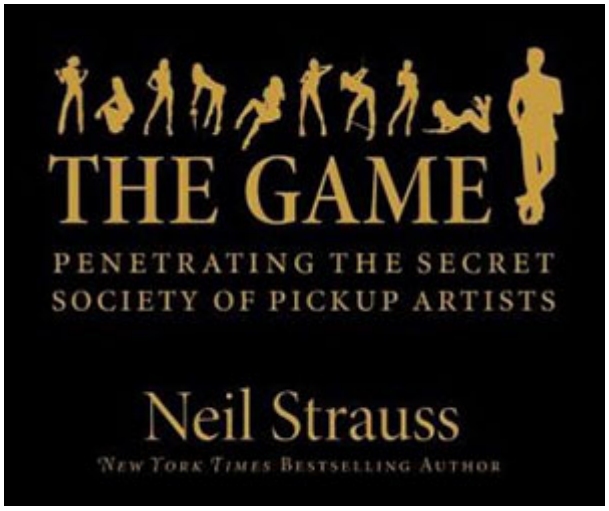
There is an Argentine man that I cannot forget about. I never got his name but he pops in my head whenever I eat in a restaurant. I remember his smile more than anything.

I was in a nice restaurant in Salta, getting ready to order after reviewing the menu. The waiter came to me. He looked like Erik Estrada but with thicker hair. I told him I wanted a particular chicken dish and he looked at me, smiled, and with great energy said, "Perfecto señor." Holy shit I ordered the best thing on the menu! I don't remember the last time I dined at a restaurant like Panera and the pimply faced teenager said my sandwich choice was perfect. Erik Estrada approved of my selection, and because of that approval we had a bond that transcended between two very different cultures. The way he held the smile as he spoke and said "Perfecto señor" will forever burn his face into my brain, more so than the actual dish. This is starting to sound gay so I'll stop but good luck getting that kind of treatment at Applebees.

Postscript: It seems like saying "perfect" is a common thing waiters do in Argentina, but Erik's perfect was real. He knew me from my vibe.



For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

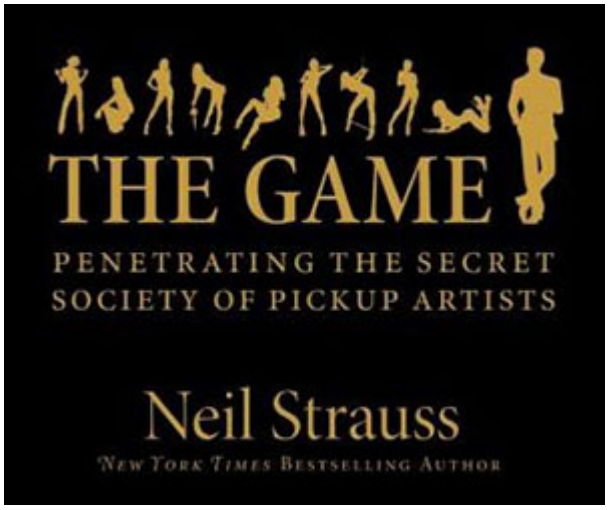
Israeli Girls

December 13, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

All Israelis are required to serve in the army. Guys go for three years and girls for two. After that they scrounge up some money and travel the world to catch up on some lost time. They tend to like hiking so they cluster around Andean regions, especially Huaraz in Peru and Patagonia. But it's only in Patagonia that I've run into a large number of Israeli girls, and damn they are good looking. Combine the best features of Eastern European girls (nice face with full lips, thin bodies), add in a little bit of Middle Eastern spice (dark hair, tan complexion), and you got some stunners. They are usually decked out in hiking gear without makeup but when they want to look good they blow out Argentine girls, and even with army training they can be very feminine. Their asses though tend to be a little on the flatter side but nothing as bad as Ecuadorian women.

It can be a little weird talking to them because they have had training in how to kill people, specifically men such as myself (technically I'm half Muslim), so watch your jokes in the vicinity of steak knives. They are more sarcastic and cynical than normal so if your game is indirect with teasing, get into a game of yaniv and your magic will be noticed. You don't mind chain smoking right?



Thoughts

December 16, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The faster you realize will not change the world the sooner you will stop doing things for everyone else and start doing it for yourself.

Do you know how advertising works? Through repetition. You're infected without being aware. When the opportunity arises you will buy the product your brain is already familiar with. Those who think they are immune to advertising are most affected because they make no attempts to block it.

TV is to program you. That's why it's called programming. Turn that shit off.

You'll be dead before your dead. Your spouse will die and your adult children will visit you once a month. You'll be scolded by a minimum wage immigrant whenever you soil your pants. Life is long, but there is a window you need to take advantage of.

No one will complete you. People can only increase or decrease your happiness level. No more.

"Most of the luxuries, and many of the so-called comforts of life, are not only not indispensable, but positive hindrances to the elevation of mankind. With respect to luxuries and comforts, the wisest have ever lived a more simple and meager life than the poor."

Get a medium sized box and put all the possessions you need in life inside. If you can't say goodbye to all that other shit, well that shit owns you. In one year get a smaller box and do the same thing.

Buy nothing day? How about buy nothing month. You've been trained like a monkey to buy since you were two years old.

There is no God. You will die and that will be the end of your existence. All that you are will disappear forever. Remember that every time you stall, hesitate, and fear.

Enjoy it while it lasts because it's going to end. I guarantee you it will. Take a deep breath because the pain will pass or you will adapt. I guarantee that too.

Do you think you'll be playing golf in Florida at 65? You'll be lucky if you can hold a golf club. Don't believe the lies, don't believe the 40-year work plan, don't believe in retirement. Right now is your retirement. Don't believe your real estate broker, don't believe your investment adviser, don't believe your boss. They are using you for your money, time, labor. Use them instead and get the hell out.

That so-called legacy you want to leave? In just a few generations your descendants will be as genetically related to you as a random stranger off the street. Do it for the right reason.

What's the one thing you can do to put your life on a more fulfilling track? Don't ask others for advice, don't put it through committee—just do it now. But you're lazy.

Remember it's the journey, not the end result. No end result has changed any man.

A poor Argentine man I met travels by juggling at intersections and asking restaurants for leftover food. What was your excuse?

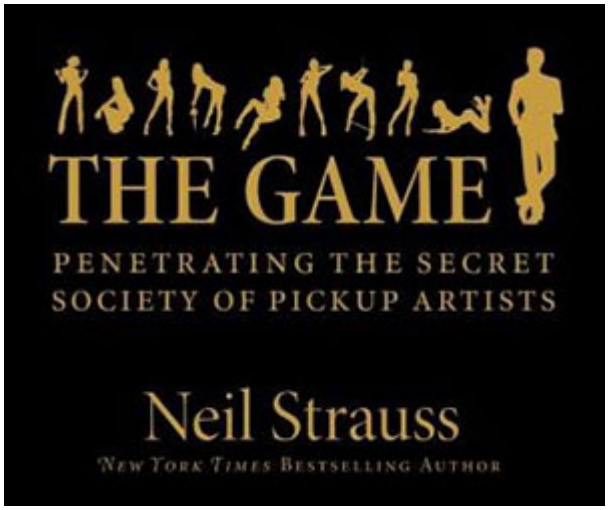
Do not work a day more than you have to. Are you sure that 401k is going to be worth it to you some day? You're betting the prime of your life that it will.

If you want to be unhappy, all you have to do is try to impress other people. If you want to be happy, don't do things which you are told makes you happy.

If you're spending more than your income, you will work until you die. How many years of college and work have you put in so far? If you quit right now, how many years would you last without having to work? Do you see what the problem is? But you're rich all right because you can go out to the new restaurant serving fusion dog shit and down $15 cocktails at the club with people carrying business cards.

"The mass of men lead lives of quiet desperation. What is called resignation is confirmed desperation. From the desperate city you go into the desperate country, and have to console yourself with the bravery of minks and muskrats. A stereotyped but unconscious despair is concealed even under what are called the games and amusements of mankind."

Tell me you are not sleepwalking through life.



I Felt Ashamed

December 18, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

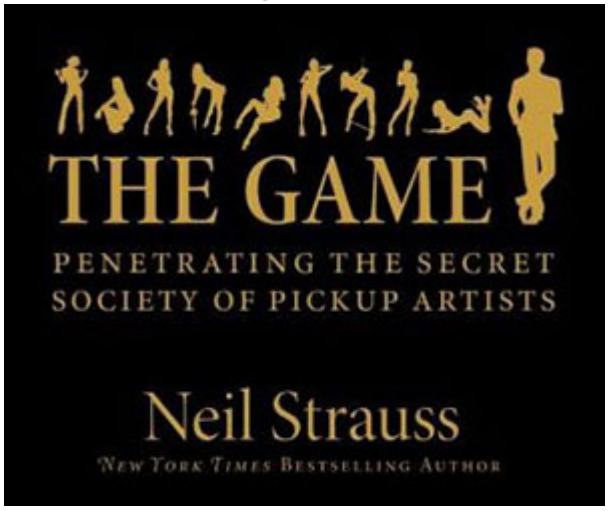
My first night in Buenos Aires I went to a restaurant with two Australians I knew from Cordoba. After our meal a 40's-something woman with a stack of newspapers came inside the restaurant and walked to our table. Before she had a chance to open her mouth I told her we don't speak Spanish. She said that's fine because she speaks English, that she is homeless and selling newspapers for about 75 cents US. I ignored her, brushed her aside like she was nobody. You have people coming at you with some pitch so many times a day that it's hard not to develop a shield to it.

Twelve days later I got a large cheese pizza for takeout and ate it at the hostel. The pizza was so good that the only thing to do the cheese grease justice was to wash it down with a coke. I went to the kiosco across the street and was second in line behind a woman. She paid and through the cage I asked for my coke. Trying to explain I wanted the mas pequeña size, my horrible Spanish accent got her attention and she looked at me. I recognized her as the woman trying to sell the newspapers.

I don't remember who spoke first, but she asked me where I was from and said I looked Argentine. I joked how no Argentine guy has as much hair as me. We talked for about five minutes, about left and right brain differences and how she likes art and how my scientist gig didn't do it for me and how her engineer friend has social issues. We were two strangers having an interesting conversation.

She had a large bag on her shoulder which had the newspapers. I was waiting for her to ask me to buy me one, which I was happily going to do. But she never asked.

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.



Patagonia

December 19, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

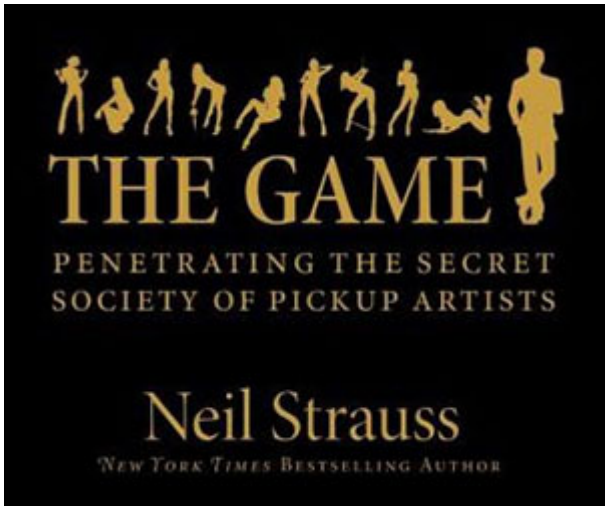
I was getting used to the travel writing thing until I sat down to write the article on Patagonia. I realized that it's so much easier writing about people and events than frozen water, so I had to do massive growth as a writer. Read it here. It has the best pictures I've taken in South America.

> I set out on the clearest of days towards Lake Capri to get views of the main attraction, Fitz Roy, a sharp mountain named by our man Francisco Moreno. I found out why so many hikers I passed on the trail were decked out in serious hiking gear when the wind picked up, the clouds covered the sky, and snow flurries starting blowing in my face. I was in jeans, running shoes, and a sweater, and this is where the regret I was talking about kicked in.

In case you missed the previous articles:

The Middle Of The World (Quito, Ecuador)
The Incan Ruins of Cuzco Peru
The Jewel Of The Pacific (Valparaiso, Chile)

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

How To Get A Paraguay Visa In 9 Easy Steps

December 22, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. Show up at the Paraguay Consulate in Buenos Aires at 5pm. Notice they closed three hours ago.

2. Come back at 12PM the next day. Get told to fill out two forms and return with a passport photo the next day at 8am.

3. Find a photo place after 30 minutes of asking random people. Tell the photo guy you need 2×2 photos. Wonder why the photos he gives you are so tiny. Ohhh I mean inches not centimeters. My ruler doesn't have inches.

4. Show up the next day at 8am to at least two-hundred Paraguayans waiting outside. Bypass that mess and be first in the visa (gringo) line. That'll be $65 US. Argentine pesos not accepted. The money exchange place opens at 10am. Seriously consider if you want to go to Paraguay.

5. Mill around until 10am, get the money, pay the man. It'll be ready Wednesday. But it's Friday and you're going to Uruguay the next day. Okay come back in three hours. Awesome.

6. Find something to do for three hours.

7. Come back at 1PM. Still no other gringos in sight. I guess there is a reason you have met only one or two people who have been to Paraguay. Paraguayans are giving you dirty looks. It'll be ready in one hour. Wait here. Start losing hope as you wait past closing with a group of Paraguayans ready to explode in violence.

8. At 3PM, get called to the desk. Can I see your receipt? You didn't get a receipt. Sir we need to see your receipt. You didn't give me one! Okay let me see. Five minutes later… Okay no problem. Sign here and here and write a sentence saying you received the visa. Mil gracias!

9. Walk away with a huge grin on your face, staring at your seven year visa. At least it's nothing like getting a U.S. visa. Plus now you have a safehouse if things get too hot in the States.

For more on Paraguay, check out my Paraguay travel guide.

Listen To Me, Not The NY Times

December 25, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

With great interest I checked out the Times 53 Places To Go In 2008. Cool there is Buenos Aires, which is fun but not the best city in Argentina. There is Easter Island which I lie about going to with the help of my travel buddies. Oh look there's Quito.... Quito?!

While Quito has a couple interesting sights, it's a polluted, dangerous shithole. The most robbery stories coming out of South America are from Quito and Rio. The NY Times wants to get you robbed.

> Quito, the colonial capital perched 9,200 feet up in the Andes, is no longer just a whistle stop. The city's crumbling historic center, one of Latin America's least altered, has been reborn after a seven-year, $200 million renovation. And a crop of upscale hotels has arrived, including a JW Marriott, making Quito a glorious new center in the so-called Middle of the World.

"glorious"

JW Marriott or not, go there if you want to see abject poverty with 5-year-olds covered in soot asking to shine your shoes.

For more on Ecuador, check out my Ecuador travel guide.

Christmas In Punta del Diablo (Uruguay)

December 28, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I figure if you are going to spend Christmas alone, might as well do it from a quiet beach. Without cars, internet, malls, christmas trees and music, turkeys and hams, tinsel and static electricity, it wasn't too bad.

View from my canbaña…

For more on Uruguay, check out my Uruguay travel guide.

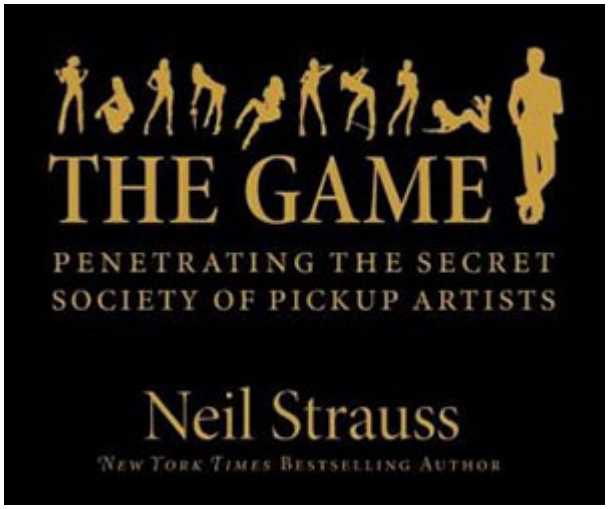
Salsa Revisited

December 31, 2007 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I've concluded that salsa is the most humiliating dancing style for men. You've trained so long and so hard to dance with a girl for a few songs who then pats you on the back before moving on to the next beta. And this is just from what I've seen. I imagine my opinion would be more negative if I was actually victim to this.

The only acceptable dance style is if your crotch eventually ends up rubbing on her ass. Since that doesn't happen in salsa, it's unacceptable for men to become accomplished salsa dancers. It's the only dance that even if you get a hard-on, your girl wont know since you're three feet away from her spinning her like a ballroom princess.



Beach Hair

January 1, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I guess this is for the ladies (or the surfers). How do I get beach hair without going to the beach?

By beach hair I mean when your hair gets greasy and shiny with untameable thickness and stringyness. If I don’t wash my hair for a week outside the beach, it just gets greasy on the top and looks dirty instead of wild. If I don’t figure it out I’m considering bottling ocean water and taking it with me to the city to simulate beach conditions.

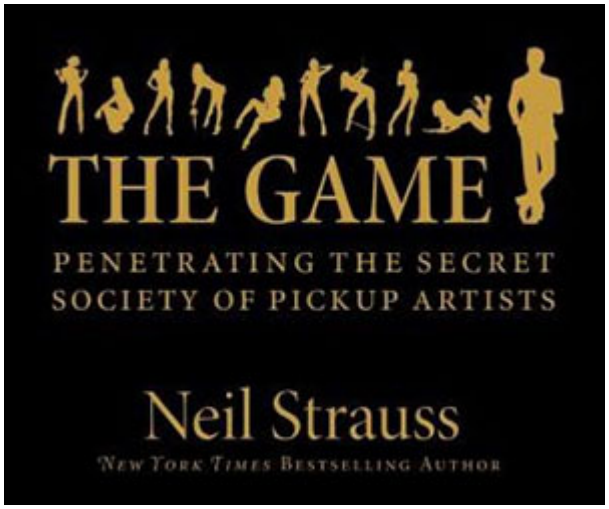
Beach Games

January 2, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I noticed that we play completely different games at the beach. In the U.S. the popular beach games are frisbee, volleyball, and throwing the football. In South America it's paddle ball, some weird horseshoe game I can't figure out, and kicking the soccer ball. I don't think it is possible to buy a frisbee in South America.

Also…

We tend to be early risers when going to the beach to catch the noon sun, but here the beach doesn't peak until 5PM. If you go out around noon there will only be old people. From a skin cancer and just general comfort perspective, it really doesn't make much sense to go out on the beach when the sun's UV rays are strongest. 5PM sun will get you plenty crisped with that SPF-0 oil I see American girls use.

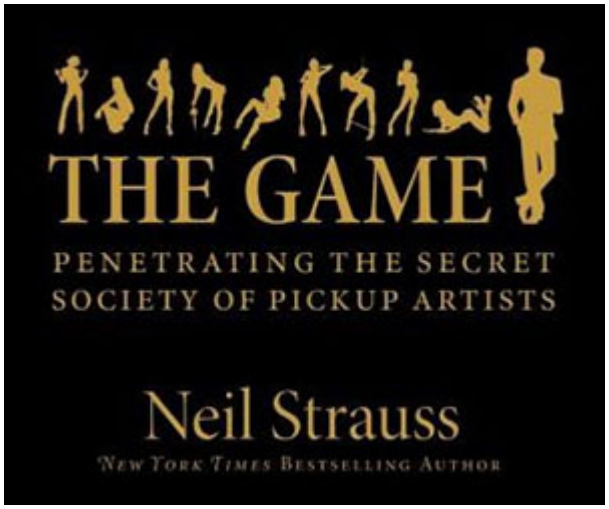


Why She’s Leaving

January 3, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When a girl wants to leave early from a club or bar, it’s because she’s not getting attention from guys. Recently I saw a couple random hostel girls I wasn’t hitting on start their exit after claiming they were “tired” and have to wake up “early.” But then they got approached on their way out and ended up staying longer than me. Fatigue or some type of work obligation is never enough to stop someone from spending time to get to know someone new they like.

When a guy wants to leave early, it’s because there are too many guys.



Argentine Girls Final Thoughts

January 6, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY: School Of Argentine Girls

1. Argentine girls love disappearing. You think they are loving you hours after you first approached, and then they just ditch you. This may be a reason why Argentine guys are dicks: Why put in the work and be nice and spend all that time if she's going to ditch?

2. Escalation is different. When an American girl starts touching you a lot and holding your arm, you're money and can ramp up. When an Argentine girl does it, it's bait and you should not escalate quite yet. If you bite too early, you "lose" and that's that. You need to wait longer than normal for when the vibe of the interaction changes; she'll start staring at you differently and smiling when there is nothing to smile about. Only then do you escalate. I'm still not too clear about this.

3. Dancing is crucial in almost all pick-ups. Since there is no such thing as grinding here, that means you dance for hours a foot away from her touching now and then, waiting and waiting like a puppy dog until you get the green light explained above. If you are the kind of guy like me who prefers leaning against the bar all night with a drink in your hand, you will get significantly less than your twin who hits the dance floor. While dancing offers no certainty you'll get anything, it's the only way to have her attention for long periods of time.

4. There is no cockblocking here from the girlfriends. I'm convinced cockblocking is a cultural phenomenon.

5. If I could try one thing differently, I would go serious push game. Constant challenging. Make it seem like every answer they give is wrong and she has absolutely zero chance with you. Saying things like "I wish you were…" While smiling of course. The only way to find out how far you can go is to make a few girls genuinely mad at you.

6. There is a "you're not worth anything if you're easy" meme floating in Argentina, which means an Argentine girl will never make it easy for you. It's always a headache.

7. Argentine girls like sex, but on the surface the culture is not very sexually liberalized. For example I've never seen such conservative dress before; the girls never show cleavage and they think sexy is showing off their skinny arms. At the end of the night in a U.S. club, a significant number of people are making out. In Argentina it's very few couples. You'll find fast girls but on average they are slower than Americans.

8. In two months I've never seen an Argentine girl buzzed, tipsy, alegre, whatever. They just dance or talk all night. Plus there is no shooter culture like in the U.S. The nightspots don't even have shot glasses.

9. Because Argentina does not have an easy pick-up environment, social circle is very important. Gringos who have done well with Argentine girls are ones that have enrolled in school for an extended period of time and built up a social circle. The advice that an American would give a friend to find a wife is the same an Argentine gives to get laid. The average notch count here has to be lower for both sexes.

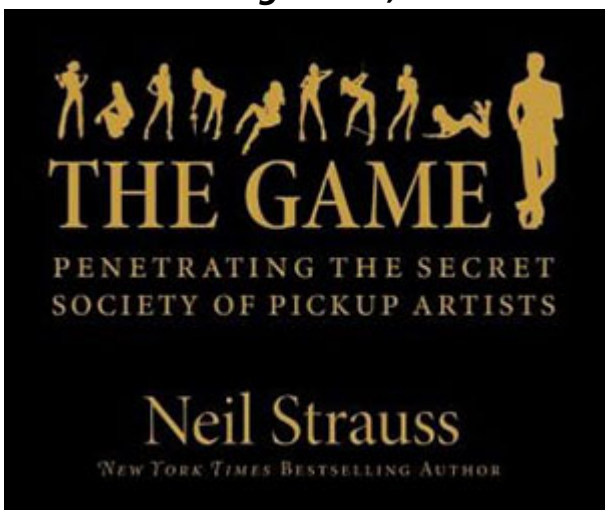
10. In most cultures, when someone is staring at you, you look to see who it is. But the girls here will definitely not look at you if they know you are staring. If I'm walking on the sidewalk and notice a cute girl walking towards me, I avert eye contact and pretend I'm not paying attention until I feel her looking at me. Then I look at her eyes. She'll panic and look away immediately. You are not supposed to know she is looking at you because that may mean she is interested. That's how Argentine girls are.

In conclusion, the girls are a pain in the ass, but every system can be cracked—it's just a matter of how long it takes. But why bother when Brazil is right next door?

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.



The Odds

January 7, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I just got this message:

> A French canadian guy came across a guestbook entry at a certain hostel in valpo. He was astounded that the entry happened to be yours, as he had bumped into you in cusco and el chantel.
>
> He then proceeded to tell us about your numerous bodily complications.. followed by the statement.. yeah Roosh is a funny guy.
>
> We werent really listening to him up until the word Roosh was shouted across the hostel breakfast table. Turns out youre quite the backpacker celebrity! Luckily we were able to experience cosmonova without actually going there through your detailed recount.

Backstory:

I met a few Australian girls in Buenos Aires.

I met a guy in Cusco, Peru who is French Canadian. Two months later, I randomly bump into him again in Patagonia, about a thousand miles away.

In Valparaiso, after Peru but before Argentina, I stayed at a hostel that had a guestbook. After a horrible night out I put in a lot of care writing a warning to fellow travellers about a certain club. I signed it with just "Roosh."

Both the girls and the guy went to Valparaiso at the same hostel at the same time and discovered that they both knew me through this guestbook entry, which I paste for you here (I drafted it on my laptop):

> My opinion of Valparaiso will be shaped by what happened to me on Wednesday, October 24, 2007. I went to the club strip off the water and landed in a club called Cosmonova. The main bar only had a dozen people, so I explored and found a room guarded by a stocky bouncer. Inside was a semi-circle of guys sitting quietly in chairs, waiting for something. I thought this was the gay part of the club but there was another room nearby that only had girls. I asked the bartender what was going on but with her Chilean spanish she might as well have been talking in Portuguese.
>
> A local overheard my confusion and escorted me back into the room of men. In the middle of the semi-circle was an overweight chilean woman, wearing only sunglasses. And I mean only sunglasses. Men hooted and hollered as they filmed her with their cell phone cameras. "Very sexy?" the local asked me, in a tone like he was trying to convince me how great his country is for having this spectacle. I nodded yes but it was as sexy as watching a hot dog eating competition. I went back to the bar.

> The show ended 15 minutes later. I know this because an avalanche of men frantically searching for a meal poured into the bar. Many went hungry as there was only one girl for every three of them. I use the word “girl” loosely: many were over 30, the type who gets a kick out of watching a shaved, eyebrow plucked man wave his manhood while wearing nothing but a pair of sneakers.
>
> I think it’s time to go back to Argentina.

South America is a big continent. Even with Lonely Planet, the odds of this happening is incredibly small. It made my day.

For more on South America, check out my South America travel guides.

Five Months Update

January 8, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm excited to be done with Argentina. I spent a little over two months there, and while I loved Argentina, I have mixed feelings about the people. I always thought that Americans were cold, but compared to Argentina we are not so bad. Uruguay was an easy-going country that reminded me of Venezuela with the light-skinned, attractive, and friendly people. Only in Uruguay have shopkeepers insisted I carry a balance instead of worrying about finding change.

I think I may have what is called post-infectious IBS. It happens after something like a parasite alters the lining of your gut (sometimes permanently), leading to symptoms like bloating, pain, and gas for an indefinite amount of time. From my internet research it seems to be somewhat common after travel to third-world countries. Or maybe it is small bowel bacterial overgrowth syndrome. I haven't had a cup of coffee in two months and tomato sauce and many raw vegetables are off limits. If it's a parasite then it's a big parasite because sometimes it feels and sounds like something in moving around in there.

I've had ongoing stomach problems for three and a half months now, and while I think I'm getting better, it's something I need to plan around and think about. At least it's not affecting my face! This experience reminds me of when I had hives, which took over two months to resolve. One day at a time…

Next stop is Rio de Janeiro until Carnival. I decided to visit those three small countries after Brazil and make a go for every country in South America. Why not? If I can get to Veneuzuela then I'm confident I can make it.

I feel like I'm at the midpoint of my trip.

Punta del Este

Iguazu Falls

January 9, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When you think of South America, the first thing that comes to you is Machu Picchu (or favelas), but as I get deeper into my trip I'm convinced that Machu Picchu is popular for only one reason: it's entire essence can be captured in one easily digestible photograph. It's popular because of marketing. Pompeii is a far more interesting ruin but it's a complex site that doesn't have that money photograph.

You've probably never heard of Iguazu Falls, but it's the Niagra Falls of South America. Waterfalls are waterfalls, but this beats stone ruins any day.

I uploaded a bunch of other photos this month.

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.

Thought

January 10, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Paraguay and Bolivia are the two poorest countries in South America and the only two that are landlocked. Coincidence?

I had to escape from Asunción yesterday due to what happened to me at 4:15am Thursday morning. No, it didn't involve a transsexual, or any other person for that matter. Story coming.

I'm starting to seriously consider my travel luck.

For more on Bolivia, check out my Bolivia travel guide.

Hotel Miami

January 13, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My second night at Hotel Miami in Asunción, I went to my bathroom and saw this:

It was big and not afraid of me. I couldn't find anything to kill it with except my room's soft-cover bible, but if I failed to kill it I was scared it get mad and try to kill me, so I just closed the bathroom door hoping the problem would resolve itself. It did because I never saw the lizard again.

I was hyper-aware after that and a few minutes later I noticed a gigantic bug on the pillow of the twin bed next to my full size bed. I grabbed the bible and killed it without mercy. I felt sorry for the poor sap who was going to use that pillow thinking it was clean (like it was clean before). The six inch lizard was a sign I should have searched for another hotel, but I pride myself on adapting to tough conditions.

Pride never did me anything good.

I went to bed on Wednesday at midnight. I woke up around 4:15am with my hand touching something on my bed. I pushed it aside and settled into a new sleeping position. About four seconds later it hit me that THERE IS SOMETHING FURRY ON MY BED. I jumped up and turned on the light. It was a dead rat.

I freaked out like I've never freaked out before, flailing my arms and making whimpering noises as I run to the bathroom to wash my hands. I examined my body in the mirror to check for signs of rat excrement or bites. I'm cringing, shuddering, gagging as I think about where this rat touched me.

I covered the dead rat with sheets so I didn't have to see it. The placement of the rat seemed too perfect, almost like it was a prank, but the door was still locked.

I wanted to leave the hotel immediately, but it wasn't the best time to go walking around Asunción searching for a hotel. I consider staying awake until the sun comes up but there is that twin bed. I turn over the pillow and lay down. Two hours later I fell asleep.

I get up around 8:30am and start packing. Less traumatized, I uncover the rat to get a closer look. Turns out it's not a rat—it's a bat.

It was hanging from the ceiling and just dropped dead next to me. I'm not a superstitious man and I don't believe in omens, but when dead bats start falling from the sky onto your bed, it's time to get as far away as possible. I packed up and went to the bus station and booked a ticket to Ciudad del Este, a city I can cross over from into Brazil. I had two hours to kill so I went to an internet cafe at the end of the bus station.

My scientific knowledge kicks in as I'm checking my email and I remembered bats carry rabies. So I'm in this internet cafe multiplying the odds this bat has rabies with the odds it bit or scratched me while I slept. I'm sure I would have definitely felt it bite me and a check of my body in the mirror found nothing suspicious. I hit Google. The internet is either saving my life or giving me OCD, I'm not sure, but I found things like this:

> Of the 25 cases since 1981 in which people contracted rabies in [the U.S.], 22 involved strains that could have come only from bats, and 16 had the silver-haired bat strain found in the Virginia man. Everyone in those cases died, including several children. But only one patient was aware of having been bitten. In the rest of the bat cases, the exposure was described as "unknown," though in many cases family members or patients themselves recalled that a bat had got into the house or workplace.
>
> But that means one can be bitten by a bat without knowing it, something > most people would find hard to imagine.

Now I’m scared. The thing with rabies is that when you find out you have it, you’re going to die. It’s also bad news that this bat was hanging out with a human. With the window closed it had to work to get inside instead of choosing to drop dead in it’s natural habitat. I hop in a cab to the private hospital and get the first of five injections. The consultation with a doctor and the first shot was $35. Getting the rabies vaccine has been the easiest decision of my trip.

> Rabies prophylaxis is 100 per cent effective if given before symptoms appear.
> Link

I still can’t relax.

I arrived in Brazil later that night, and stayed at a nice hostel that didn’t have more wildlife than a national park. It’s nice that traveling gives you such interesting and crazy stories, but I wish I did without this one.

For more on Paraguay, check out my Paraguay travel guide.

I Hate Roosh

January 15, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A girl blogger has this to say about me:

> If you spend some time reading his blog you'll find that he is a true misogynist. He never says he hates women, but it is between the lines in every entry. He has been spurned by women and now has chosen to subjugate them in lieu of therapy. Women are no longer people in his blog, we're dehumanized, gutted, and decapitated for his pleasure/sadism. We are broken down into color, ethnicity, age, number of sexual partners while the bloggers own color, ethnicity, age, profession, number of sexual partners are inconsequential. I think he should do women a favor and visit a whorehouse with a diverse cornucopia of employees. Maybe if they simulate a bar-like setting and slip him their number, it will have the same effect and he'll be removed from the effective man-pool. Because college, post-college, and young professional men are of the same mindset I think most of them are a waste of time. To be fair, Roosh says as much in the above entry. I hate him and yet were it not for the blatant honesty of his blog I think I would still be wasting my time on male attention.

I feel somewhat responsible that I sent this girl down some rabbit hole of man hatred, but sounds like that was the direction she was heading.

Speaking of DC blogs, a new one I've been reading is Jack Goes Forth.

Postscript:

Strong comment left on her post…

> I wouldn't call Roosh's writing misogynistic, I'd call them observant.
>
> He writes about his experiences trolling for snatch at bars and clubs.
>
> The women he writes about go out to bars and clubs. They let Roosh game them and then go home with him. They make it easy.
>
> You want to be valued for your mind? You want to be respected for "who you are"? Do you imagine that your career impresses people?
>
> Don't go to bars and clubs and let the Roosh's of the world game you.
>
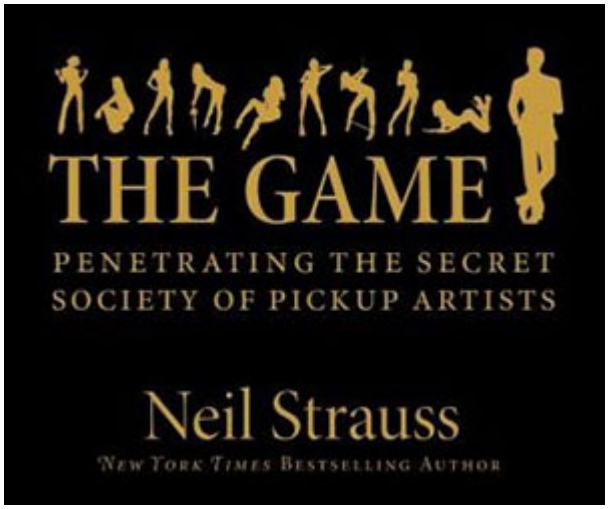
> If anything, you're the misogynist – you hate the girls who let him get exactly what he wants for only minimal effort. You hate these girls for letting men treat them as orifices to masturbate into. You hate them because large numbers of men will never waste time on girls who demand to be treated "like a human being" – a category to which I presume you belong – when there are so many girls who go out every night and spend hundreds of dollars a year for the privilege of being pumped and dumped by alpha males. I won't even begin to mention the blatant misandry exhibited by this post. But then again you're a > woman so you don’t have a problem with double standards, right?

>
> Look, every single person in this world is looking out for themselves. Roosh wants pussy. You want to be valued. Although you have a pussy I don’t think you and Roosh would make a good match. You will end up with a beta and Roosh will end up with herpes. In the end, your desire for men who treat women as princesses is no better or worse than Roosh’s desire for women who just want a one-night stand with a rugged ambiguously darkish guy.
>
> In the end, you can’t blame Roosh for telling it how it is. As you admit yourself, his blog is brutally honest. Read more of it. You will learn how men really have always felt about women and will probably always feel about women no matter how many times the Vagina Monologues are performed at college campuses and no matter how many women leave the house every day in power suits.
>
> Could it be that everything about women’s liberation is one giant experiment that couldn’t ever have possibly worked? Strange that 40 years later Roosh speaks for all men, isn’t it?



Rio de Janeiro

January 16, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

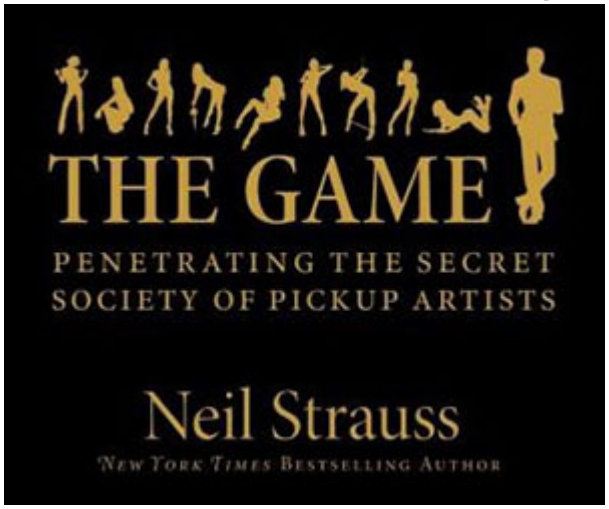
I got a cell phone, signed up at a gym, and started taking Portuguese lessons. I have a feeling I will be here a while.

I need two weekends before I can share my initial thoughts. No snap judgments!

I'm dropping $100/day. Trying to hit $60. 😟

Did you know Prada makes a cell phone?

For more on Brazil, check out my Brazil travel guide.



Guiding Principle Of Male-Female Relations

January 20, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is going to be unpleasant.

I've been writing this blog for almost three years, and turns out I have failed to get across the guiding principle of male-female relations to women of the United States.

The guiding principle of male-famale relations:

GUYS ARE LOOKS ORIENTED
GUYS ARE LOOKS ORIENTED
GUYS ARE LOOKS ORIENTED

If you are a woman over 30 who is single and unhappy, it is because you are overweight, have short hair, or have standards far higher than your attractiveness.

In Argentina the girls are fucking nutcases, but it is impossible to find a 26+ year old skinny Argentine girl with hair touching the top of her ass. Impossible.

In Brazil the girls are chubbier and less attractive but they have what is called sex appeal. Men are very attracted to this trait. Since you are American and have as much sex appeal as a woman from Afghanistan, your only hope is getting your looks together.

I know losing weight is tough with so many delicious flavors of Haagen Daz ice cream and Starbucks frappuccinos, but listen: calories in must be less than calories out. You can decrease calories in by eating less food, or you can increase calories out through exercise. Doing both will give you faster results. Also, lifting weights or doing toning exercises will give your body a pleasing appearance. This is something you have to do for the rest of your life. I know it will be brutal to miss your favorite television programs to get your body looking good, but this is the tremendous price you must pay.

Bonus tip: I have never met a fine bodied girl who washes down a night of beer or wine drinking with cheese or meat. Please research the calorie content of your favorite alcoholic beverages and the common late-night snacks you consume afterwards.

I know having long hair is a pain in the ass when it's hot and I know it takes forever to dry, but you are not helping your cause with that "cute" bob cut. Men are not attracted to cute. If we did we'd all own puppies.

I'm sorry you have an unattractive face. Life is not fair. But you will have to significantly lower your standards if you want children or a husband. Not everyone is going to have an attractive mate. I have back and ear hair and various other deformities but since you are not as looks oriented as I am all I have to do is have personality, be interesting / confident, make jokes, etc. (i.e. have game) in order to get with women more attractive than I am handsome. These game traits help you so much less than me that it would be a waste of your time to work on them in place of body slimming or hair growing.

Also, have you have experimented with ways to maximize your looks potential?

You cannot compensate for fat, short hair, or an ugly face with education, an impressive job, or fancy purses.

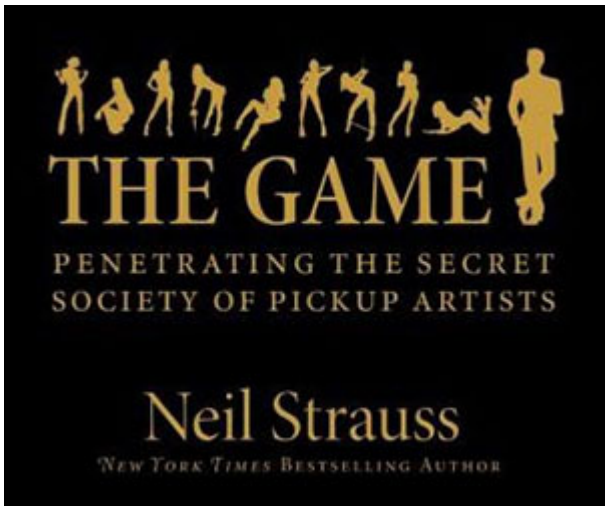
“But Roosh I am thin and attractive with long hair but am over 30, single, and unhappy.”

Then you do not really want a husband or children.

I know every girl is going to write this off as too simplistic, mean, and unfair. It’s too easy for a girl to blame socioeconomic forces, a lack of “good men,” bad luck, or the media for her inability to hook one decent guy. So what I’m going to do is write a very complicated book called “Bang For Girls” that will be a glorious resource for how to look at guys, how to talk to them, how to date them, and so on. Let’s work on everything but your looks, which make the greatest impact on the men you get, so that you can say you are at least trying to make changes.

“But I don’t want a guy who just appreciates my looks. I’m intelligent, independent, witty, funny, blah blah.”

Reread the guiding principles of male-female relations again. Accept it or stay single.



Twenty-Four Hours In Buenos Aires

January 23, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I think it's a safe bet that most of you will visit Buenos Aires at some point, though maybe a few people less after my killjoy discussions on Argentine women.

> During severe rainstorms the sewage system overflows and floods the poorly constructed shacks, giving the air a permanent, foul smell. Every home protects their lone television set with a metal gate, and narrow passages between streets turn into forbidden zones at night. If I came here after the sun set, I was warned, I would walk out naked as the day I was born.

Read the whole thing here. Of course it includes nightlife discussion.

Washington Monument?

Previous articles:

The Middle Of The World (Quito, Ecuador)
The Incan Ruins of Cuzco Peru
The Jewel Of The Pacific (Valparaiso, Chile)
Patagonia (Argentina)

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.

I Don’t Even Care Anymore

January 24, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I had a good run without any health problems or scares for about five days.

On Sunday my hands started erupting into an itchy rash. By Tuesday I was covered with at least a hundred red dots throughout my body with debilitating itching. I did some internet self-diagnosis (I chose scabies) before going to an English-speaking dermatologist the next day. He diagnosed me with papular urticaria, an allergic reaction to insect bites such as bed bugs, which the hostel room I just left had tons of. He said it will take about a week to clear. The spots may remain for some time.

Off the top of my head…

-Parasite
-Salmonella
-Current unresolved stomach issue
-Many many colds
-Mysterious viral infection (body aches)
-Rabies vaccine side effects (dizziness)

I’ve stepped foot in two doctors offices and four hospitals. There was also that house call where the doctor’s assistant injected a dose of cipro into my ass. I think he hit a nerve because I couldn’t put weight on one leg for half an hour.

I guess my body is not made for travel.

Any Guesses?

January 27, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

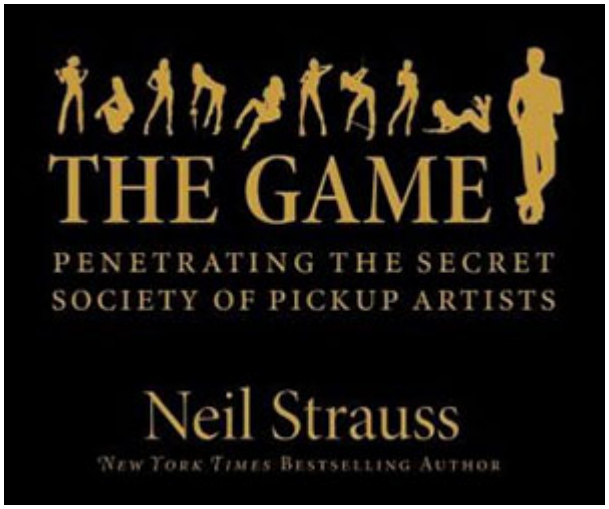
For more on Brazil, check out my Brazil travel guide.

Older Women

January 28, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After interacting with dozens of young girls on this trip from many countries, I've come to the realization that I'm not as into them as I thought. The motivation to pursue is very low because they are either annoying / boring or have no clue how to turn on a man, especially girls around the 18-year-old range. Maybe they are great if you want to be a teacher, who knows, but it seems like a girl doesn't start being sexually aware and interesting until she approaches her mid 20's. You need to catch them at the sweet spot where she looks good and knows how to please you but is not yet corrupted by many relationship failures. That sweet spot is a window of varying length depending on what country the girl is from (American girls do not have the biggest window).

My beliefs are being challenged here. I have met very cool women in their late 20's and early 30's who have taken such good care of themselves (or are blessed with good genetics) that you can't really say their looks have peaked. What applies to women in the United States does not apply to women in the rest of the world.



Introduction To Brazilian Girls

January 29, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The way some guys talked up Rio it seemed like I'd be getting head within 30 minutes of stepping off the bus. It's ridiculous that I have to state this, because there was a second or two where I was hoping it was true, but not all Brazilian girls are easy and ready to fuck you within a few minutes.

On one side you have the poor favela chicks. As a carioca (Rio native) put it: "For them it is a dream to go out with a gringo to a dinner that costs more than they make in a month. The sex is not important—they've been doing that since they were 14." Poor favela chicks are very easy, but quality is a serious problem. It's not uncommon to see a decent looking gringo getting with a girl he should not be touching. It would be a shame if you came to Rio to bang favela chicks.

On the other side is the rich and very beautiful girls that are out of reach to the gringo due to time or social status / circle issues.

Then you have the large middle where the girls are educated and have regular jobs. Some are very pretty with fantastical asses and some are frumpy and average. Some are easy but others are surprisingly conservative. But in general the girls are prettier and easier than American girls—at least 50% easier. They are more friendly, they makeout super quick, and give less resistance to the bedroom. While there is zero guarantee you will get action when you go out, you're a huge idiot if you go out at night without cheap motel money and a condom or three.

Two things are important:

1. You must know where to go. If you go to the rich and snobby clubs then it may actually be harder. Go to the smaller venues not known for posing. Because it takes time to find good places, a gringo visiting for a short stay may miss out on the "friendlier" girls.

2. Game plays big. Lots of girls speak English so if you have decent game you will see a gigantic jump in the quality you get compared to the gringos who simply have drunk game. I shouldn't have to say it but approaching is still the number one thing you do to help yourself out here. Just like anywhere else, the girls who approach you outright will be ones you don't want.

Now it's my turn to add to the hype. Until Brazil I've never in my life had a very pretty girl ask me to spend the night with her a couple hours after meeting. If you are American then you are trained to think that only desperate chicks would do such a thing, but it's quite common for Brazilian girls to show affection very fast and do much (or all) of the work to take things to the bedroom. Desperate or not, it's very welcomed. I'm not saying you don't have to stay on point to make things happen, but you can relax a little. Again, you will have to work just like you would at home, and you will be rejected and flaked on like you would at home, but you are rewarded faster, more often, and with better quality.

This leads to the number one rule of Rio:

Do not date the first girl you have sex with, even if she is just as good or better then what you get at home.

Keep her on the side and go out even more. You'll understand what I mean when you get down here.

I love Rio, and it will be the my longest stay out of all the cities I've visited, but I wish I came before South America beat the shit out of me. It takes a lot of energy to enjoy everything it has to offer. And if you come here with a competent wingman, you can do tremendous damage in a short amount of time.

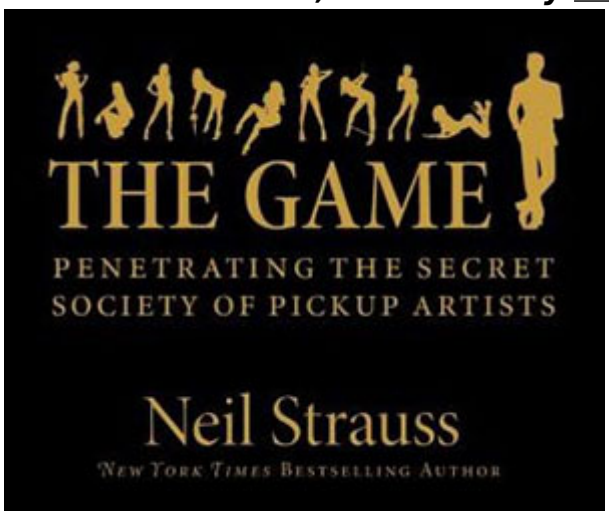
While not every guy gets laid in Rio, it's very hard not to if you put in some effort.

Continued… Brazilian Girls

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

For more on Brazil, check out my Brazil travel guide.



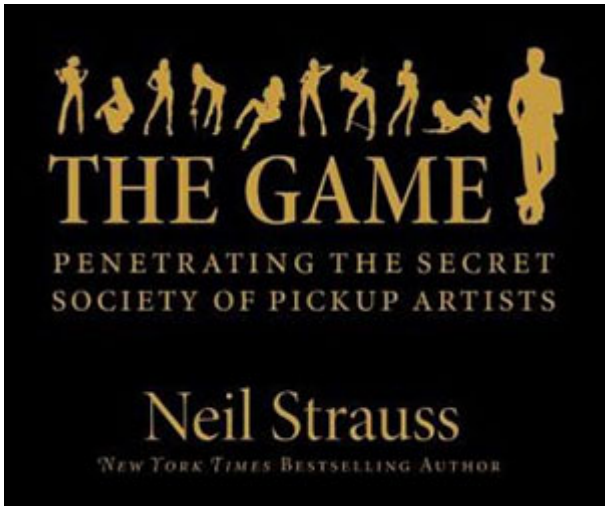
Stale

January 31, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We are such a pussyfied culture. Here you can drink a can of beer on the street without getting arrested. You can buy a stick of sausage from someone who put their BBQ grill on wheels. Clubs serve alcohol until 5am or later. Pot is smoked openly on the beach and in clubs. Fireworks are legal, even in stadiums (just watch your head.) People can sell hats or electric fly swatters on the street without needing a permit. At night you can urinate against any free wall or fence. The subway doors close with only a beep, not a complicated directive. Sixteen year olds have a drink in the bar and it's not a big deal. You can talk your way in without ID. You can pay your way out of getting arrested. There is no speed traps or sobriety checkpoints. If you step out of line the cops will give you a beating, not execution by taser.

Culture is the United States is stale and governed by too much authority. We are all treated like little children so we act like little children, needing constant entertainment and distractions. By the time we get into a bar we get drunk because it's now such a big deal.

There is pleasure in a mix of chaos and freedom, where not everything is predictable and safe.



Can’t Have It Both Ways

February 3, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

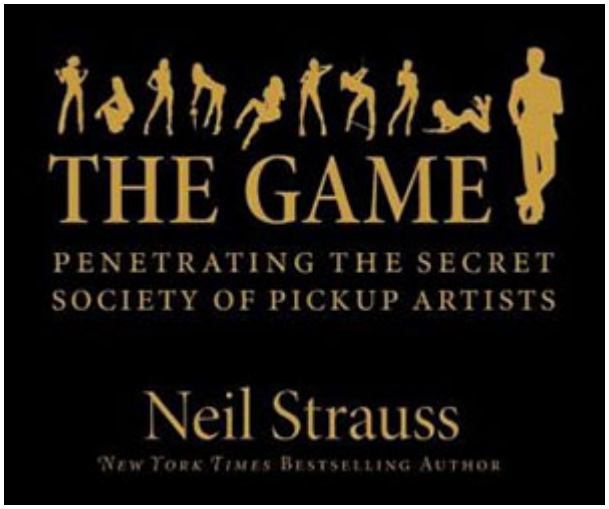
Let’s take a lawyer who makes six figures. His lifestyle matches his income so he has a nice condo, a nice car, and expensive tastes. The monthly upkeep is hefty. He has a 401k but is overworked and gets at most one month of vacation a year that he takes in one week increments. Since he is tired, he’ll probably pick a nice beach resort or comfortable European city. His girlfriends are also successful and they expect him to stay successful. Taking random several month breaks to travel or relax is unacceptable; you don’t go to law school and work hard to move up in the firm to save money for a few years and then quit.

Let’s take a bartender or some sort of freelancer. He has low upkeep because he has few wants. His main expense is rent. When he’s tired of his job or his city, he takes off for a month or two at a time, picking up work when he can. He’s free and sees more of the world but money is always a problem and he always has to hustle. He hates his shitty apartment, his disrespectful roommates, and public transportation. And there’s always that nagging feeling in the back of his head that he should have higher status or be more successful. When his girlfriends get mad, they tell him he’s a loser bum.

Where’s the middle ground? How about a 30 hour work-week that doesn’t involve working for a restaurant or bar that pays well and lets you comfortably take two months off a year. Why can’t that be the American dream of owning a McShack, drowning in debt, and spending hours commuting to and from a mediocre job you’d quit if you can?

Even for the people who love their jobs, they are still spending a third of their waking life in an office building trading their labor for an income less than it’s making someone else. I’m sure a lot of those hours can be better spent doing something else.

Either be wage monkey defined by your valuable crap or watch every cent and pray you don’t get sick. Some dream.



Six Months Update

February 4, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

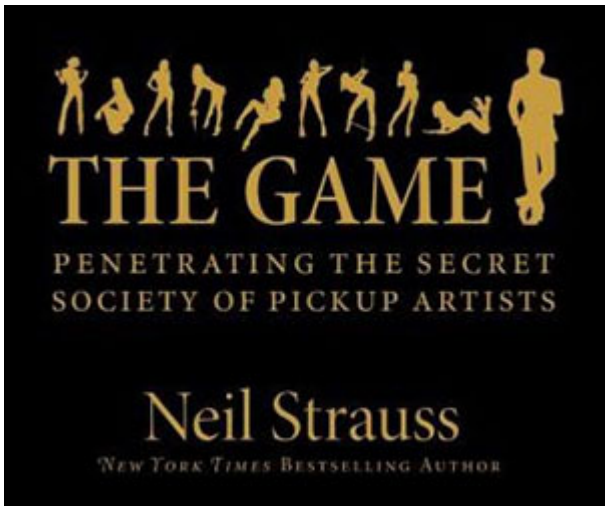
When I was learning how to surf in Uruguay, I met a lot of surfers and they told me that it takes many years to get good, implying that I will suck for quite some time. I didn't mind because the process of learning how to surf is very fun. I could always stay a beginner and I'd be fine with that, but I'm no longer enjoying the "process" of traveling through South America. As bad as I want to go to Sao Paulo, Salvador, Jericoacoara, and on to Venezuela to Merida, and to Colombia, especially Cartegena and Cali, I simply have no motivation or desire to continue.

At first I thought I was physically beaten. My body has been through a lot, but I've been visiting gyms since Argentina and go often here in Rio. Besides my stomach, which is better than two months ago, I'm in the best shape of my life. I think I'm just mentally beaten, homesick and in need of a stable, productive routine. I want to hit the pause button and process the past six months of my life.

Here's what's going to happen: I'm going to come home and for one month it's going to be great. I'm going to see my family, hang out with my friends, catch up with my favorite music, go to the bookstore and read once again, relax in coffee shops that don't mind me sitting around for three hours, and get back to 100% health. Then reality of the boring, stiff, and beachless DC scene will hit and I will ask myself why the fuck did I come back, especially since I love Rio. Even though I know that is what's going to happen, I still want to come back, and that is how I know I'm ready to come back. I'm disappointed I failed to fulfill my random dream of visiting every country in South American in one go, but I'm not losing sleep over it.

So the adventure ends. I'll be home soon.

Sugar Loaf



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Brazilian, Argentine, & American Girls

February 6, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previously:

- Introduction To Brazilian Girls
- How To Pick Up Argentine Girls

Brazilian: "Where are you from?"
Argentine: Crickets
American: "What do you do?"

Brazilian: Open toe slippers with some design
Argentine: Closed toe
American: Target brand flip flops

Brazilian: Hair length depends on current life stage
Argentine: Has either Argentine Girl Haircut #1 (long, with bangs) or Argentine Girl Haircut #2 (long, without bangs)
American: Short because long hair was "boring" or "too much work"

Brazilian: Makeout within 30 minutes
Argentine: Makeout if you played the game right, if the moon is aligned with Jupiter, and if her friends and little cousins like you
American: Makeout within 90 minutes

Brazilian: Takes off your jeans and boxers
Argentine: Takes off her big earrings
American: Takes off her shoes

Brazilian: She feels comfortable after sex
Argentine: She feels like she just carried out an important life decision after sex
American: She feels like a slut after sex

Brazilian: Clingy
Argentine: Distant
American: Low self-esteem

Brazilian: Gives you head

Argentine: Does not give you head
American: Gives you head if you imply / ask, but secretly hates it

Brazilian: Anal region exploration strongly encouraged
Argentine: Anal regions forbidden
American: Depends on level of intoxication

Brazilian: Has two or three caiprinha's
Argentine: Has only one drink, the free one that came with her cover charge
American: Stops drinking when she can no longer feel her friends judging her

Brazilian: Knows how to shake and jiggle her entire body
Argentine: Knows how to dance to house music without showing any sexuality
American: Knows how to rub her ass on a man's erection

Brazilian: Five second marathon eye contact
Argentine: No eye contact
American: Multiple one second eye contacts

Brazilian: Treats you so well you wonder why she likes you that much
Argentine: Treats you like you are that guy on the corner selling hot dogs
American: Treats you like her favorite coworker

Brazilian: Asks you if you are on Orkut
Argentine: Asks you if you are on MSN chat
American: Google's you the second she finds out your last name. Uses results to judge your long-term relationship potential.

Brazilian: Licks your face
Argentine: Kisses like her parents are watching
American: Sucks your neck

Brazilian: "Dance With Me" by 112
Argentine: "Enjoy The Silence" by Depeche Mode
American: "Back That Ass Up" by Juvenile

Brazilian: Most extra fat winds up in ass
Argentine: Borderline anorexic
American: Rolls of meat around waist

Brazilian: "I like you"
Argentine: Pretends she doesn't like you when she really does American: "You're nice"

Brazilian: Likes social drinking with friends
Argentine: Likes people watching with friends
American: Likes watching TV alone at home with tub of ice cream

Brazilian: Ugly tattoos
Argentine: Ugly piercings and ugly sunglasses
American: Ugly sunglasses

Brazilian: "I need to bang that."

Argentine: “Wow she is really pretty.”
American: “She looks easy.”

Brazilian: Always answers the phone
Argentine: Always responds to text messages
American: Would miss the call from the President of France if he happened to call

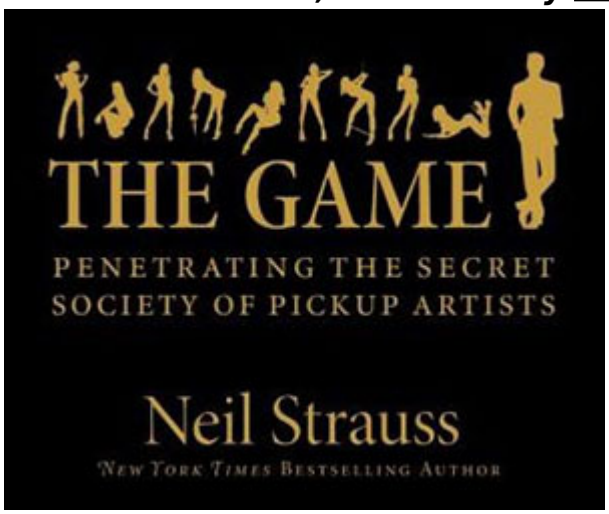
Brazilian: If you like emotional girls who want to please you
Argentine: If you like frigid girls who chain smoke and act stupid
American: If you like frigid girls who act stupid

It is possible that my experience with Brazilian girls have been extraordinary, but then I wouldn’t be the only one. Second place is hard to place; if the Argentine girl and American girl are equally attractive, I don’t think it makes a large enough difference, but since Argentines are much cuter, it will depend on how much you value a pretty face.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

For more on Brazil, check out my Brazil travel guide.



The Worst Hostel In South America

February 10, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I stayed in the worst hostel in South America for ten nights. If you are wondering why I didn't leave, it's because I was trapped after pre-paying for Carnival. Constructing this photo montage helped me cope.

Let's start with my bunk bed.

I had the top bunk, which turned out to be the best bed in my fourteen bed pen. I used the locker behind me as a nightstand. Still sleeping is an Englishman who would sing a song called "Do your balls hang low" when drunk.

Here's my repaired foam pillow:

I didn’t mind the foam so much but it was not very clean (think traveler drool sponge), and many times I’d wake up with my skin touching it.

Here’s a typical mattress, with diarrhea or urine stain, probably both. It was made of the same foam material as the pillows and compressed to the thickness of a slice of Chicago style pizza when layed upon.

I got lucky with my bunk, and by lucky I mean a robber took everything I owned except my shoes so I could walk home naked, but the others were less fortunate.

Note the six inch space between the bunks. It was almost like they were sleeping in the same bed with each other. This room was still better than the one next door that had a large water leak no one could source, or the room nicknamed “the shed” which was damp and moldy.

There were two bathrooms I could use: one in my pen and one in the hallway which twenty other people shared. Here’s a picture of my bathroom:

As you can see, the sink needs to be repaired. About halfway through my stay, another Englishman decided to wash his feet in the sink after coming home from a night out. As he came crashing down to the floor with the sink at 6 o’clock in the morning, I bet he was both suprised and dissapointed that it was held up by what appears to be bookshelf brackets.

A sign put up my management after the incident was promptly defaced.

The sink was not repaired by the time I left. Here's the other sink:

This sink had a drainage problem that management never fixed so for several days I used a shower stall as a sink. I could only use it while wearing flip-flops because of the splash-back. After each use I dried my shins along with my hands.

Here is the floor of the shared bathroom:

You see that black “water”? My flip flop would get just stuck enough in it that when the sole released the sewage mix splashed on my ankles. For this hostel I aggressively rearranged my number two schedule until after the maid cleaned up, but I was reluctant to urinate as well. The toilets would not flush properly so many times I was greeted in the bathroom with someone else’s feces in the bowl. There will not be a picture of that.

Here’s the security camera. Notice something wrong?

Speaking of security, there was a little favela within closer walking distance than the beach.

The accomodations were so bad that it was the main source of bonding with the other travelers. Many of us maintained countdowns to check out. If you find yourself in Rio de Janeiro, whatever you do, do not stay at Che Lagarto Budget hostel in Copacabana.

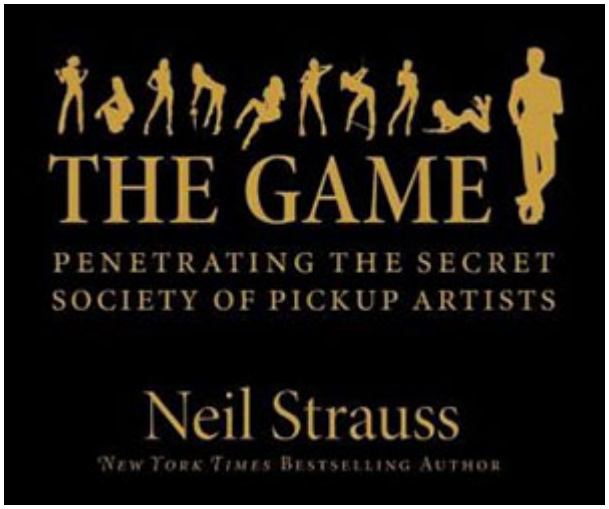
For more on Brazil, check out my Brazil travel guide.

I’m Back

February 11, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Did I miss anything?



Brazilian Girls

February 13, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Previously:

- Introduction To Brazilian Girls
- Brazilian, Argentine, and American Girls

Most Brazilian girls look like half-Middle Eastern and half-Western European, darker than Argentine girls but lighter than girls from other South American countries. Since Brazil is similar to the United States with its large immigrant influence, it's harder to pin down their physical features as easily as the Argentine girl.

If the average girl in a US club ranks a 5, and in an Argentina club she ranks a 7, in Brazil she'd be somewhere between a 6 and 7. This means the average Brazilian girl is bangable, but what separates Brazilian girls from the others is their vibe. If you are a guy and you look at a Brazilian girl, your mind jumps to sexual thoughts much faster than usual. Since it is not because she is more attractive, I think it's a combination of body and body language. Having a larger than average ass helps. Argentine girls are beautiful dolls you want to show off on your arm, but Brazilian girls you want to get to the bedroom. American girls are a mixture, excelling at neither.

Most Brazilian girls in Rio speak English, and it's not hard to see why with an English school on every other block. Your approach will be the same as on American girls, and their initial response will be the same as well (sometimes a little aloof), but what's different in that if the Brazilian girl is feeling your game, things ramp up quickly and within two minutes it will be obvious if things will progress. She will ask you a bunch of questions, ask you to dance, or ask you to come hang out with her friends. You will get the "kiss me" vibe much faster than other girls as well, and the head turn you see in Argentine girls simply doesn't exist here. Brazilian girls can be extremely aggressive if they like you, which means grabbing you or kissing you outright. To me that is novel and fun, but to some Brazilian guys it is annoying.

Argentina is the biggest conformist culture I've seen, more so than the United States. Argentine girls have the exact same hair, shoes, jeans, and even cut-off shirts. And they all smoke. One reason it's so hard to select an Argentine girl out of a group you approached is being they are carbon copies of each other, but Brazil's culture is more individualistic where creativity is rewarded (wait until you see pictures from the Carnival parade). Girls in the same group are very different so it will be rare you are debating between two of them.

Some problems that exist in the United States exist in Brazil as well. If you move up the socioeconomic ladder to the Brazilians who are wealthy and hold Western culture as their idol, their attitude will be just as bad or as worse than the yuppie lawyers you may hit on in DC. But there is less of a problem that a girl who ranks a 7 in Brazil will pretend she is an 8 or higher, as is common in some U.S. cities.

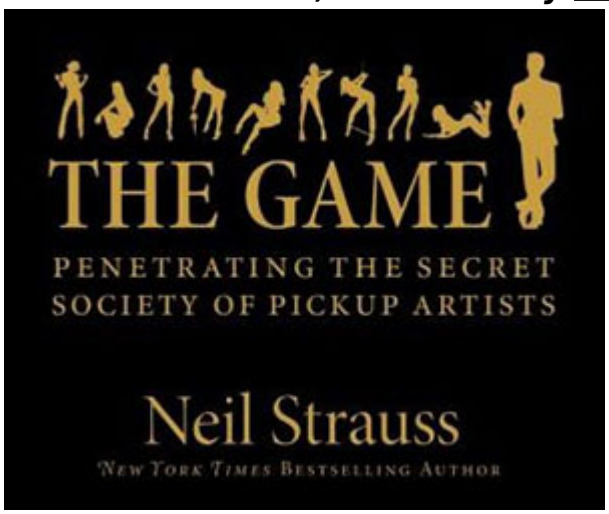
The best thing about Brazilian girls is they play far fewer games. I think it's because they simply don't know how. Many times I'm dealing with a Brazilian girl and think, "Doesn't she know she is making it so obvious she likes me?" They show affection fast and often. On the other hand, American girls are professionals at playing games that slow down the interaction. If you show genuine affection to an American girl you are casually dating, you will be punished in some way. The interaction always has to be breezy so no one is showing "too much" interest, whatever too much is. (A person cannot handle affection if they don't know how to give it.) The Brazilian girl is so unbreezy that you don't have to think about regulating or keeping track of the affecting you give—in fact you won't even be able to keep up with her. The way I view and interact with women would be completely different if I was raised dating Brazilian girls; I would put so much less mental energy into girls this blog probably wouldn't exist.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

For more on Brazil, check out my Brazil travel guide.

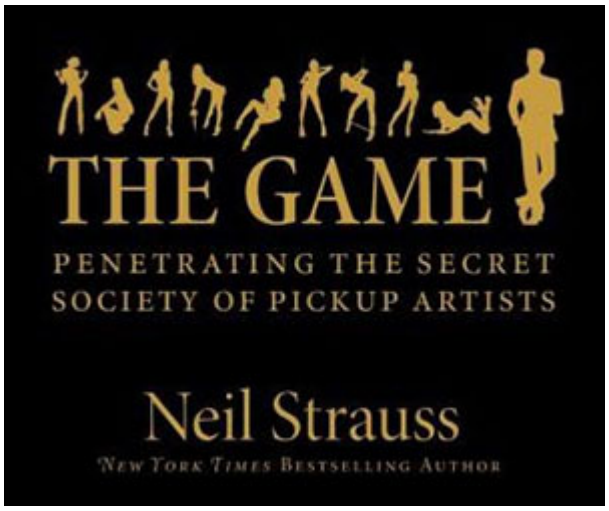


I Wasn’t Kidding

February 14, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

In my six month update post I told you guys that I’ve been regularly working out at the gym. That’s noticeable in this video I made upon my return. I was just messing around with my new webcam.



How Much The Trip Cost

February 17, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A question I'm being asked is how much the trip ended up costing me. I'll let you guess first. Person closest to the actual amount wins a autographed copy of Bang.

Hints

1. The total amount does not include airfare to and from South America (~$1500).

2. It includes purchases I made that will be used back at home, like a replacement camera, flash cards, and t-shirts.

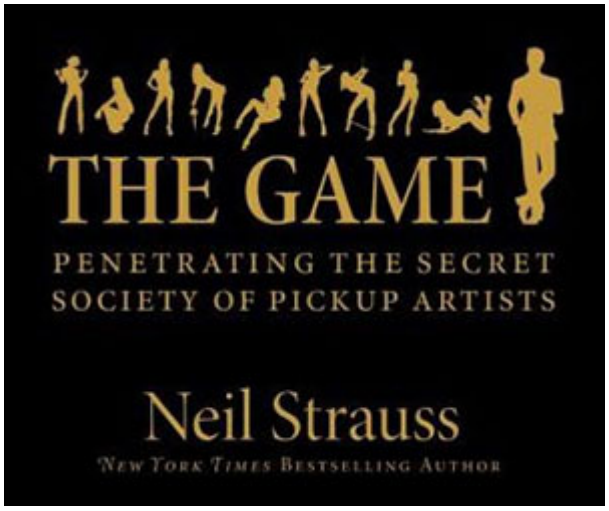
3. It includes small gifts I bought for about a dozen or so people.

4. Even though I did stay in hostels, I don't think I roughed it compared to others. I ate out 90% of the time and never camped.

5. I had only one flight within South America.

Contest ends Thursday at noon. Winner and the answer will be revealed on Friday. You can comment with an anonymous name but leave an email address in case you win.

Good luck!



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

South America By The Numbers

February 18, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

...days there: 188

...countries I visited: 9

...cities I spent at least one night in: 30

...days my stomach has not been right: 130+ and counting

...times I washed my only pair of pants (jeans): 4

...items the laundry places lost: 2

...times I used a laundry place: around 20

...bridges I jumped off: 1

...times I hand-washed clothing: 0

...months until I had to take a shit in a bus station restroom: 5

...months until turned into a "beer guy": 3

...posts I wrote for this blog: 89

...words I wrote in my travel journal: 76,000

...nights spent camping: 0

...haircuts: 0

...times I got robbed: 1

...total number of hours on the bus: 253 (10.5 days)

…average length of a bus ride: 8 hours
…percent of my time in South America spent on the bus: 5.6%
…longest continuous bus ride: 24 hours
…longest continuous journey without a bed: 45 hours (4 buses)
…pairs of ear plugs I went through: 8
…different gyms I used: 5
…percentage of hostels that I'm sure had bed bugs: 15%
…beaches I swam in: 3
…hospitals I've stepped foot in: 4
…drug or vaccine injections: 8
…times I was awaken by dorm-mates having sex: 2
…girls I met that I'd consider dating long term: 1
…Irish people who broke the "Irish people drink a lot" stereotype: 0
…pairs of contact lenses I went through: 5
…times I took language instruction: 3
…new porn video clips I downloaded: 0
…books I read: 0
…times I was bodily searched outside an airport: 1
…glaciers I saw: 5
…postcards I sent: 67
…times I thought I may not make it out of South America alive: 2
…South American countries I have not stepped foot in: 4
…hotel room in a small Bolivian city: $3
…large smoothie with protein in Rio de Janeiro: $3
…Red Bull in a Rio de Janeiro gas station: $4
…night at the Copacabana Palace hotel: $520
…money I spent not including airfare: **???
…cost to Quito, Ecuador by air: $475
…one-way ticket home from Rio: $1025
…price of round-trip ticket from Rio: $1025
…regrets: 0

My First Night Out In DC

February 19, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I was judged.

I went to Marvin (2007 14th St NW), a U-street hipster joint, with VK, Roissy, and fan favorite Insomnia. It's a tough decision of whether I rather be alone in a mega-club filled with future models that don't speak my language or with friends in a bar where I can count the ~~hot~~ cute girls on one hand. It was most interesting that most of the male patrons there had style that was better than a stylish Argentine or Brazilian girl—but they weren't gay (consciously, anyway).

Two young girls walked passed us and I said, "My friends like cats." It worked of course because of my supreme alpha body language. Three of us rotate between the two girls, just feeling out the vibe. I had a short conversation with one of them, a 21-year-old American college student at George Washington University. She was attractive without major physical defects, but just four days out of Rio I wasn't inspired.

It took about six minutes for her to ask me what I "do." I told her I don't do anything, just some things here and there. She asked me what I used to do and how I can survive without a job. "I have some money saved up," was my response. Then she said, "You are so idealistic."

A couple years ago I met a girl who was aggressive in exchanging numbers. We did a coffee shop first date and talked for an hour. It was obvious to me there was no match but I was still nice. At the end of the date, unprompted, she said to me, "I think I know what your problem is…" and then proceeded to tell me what she thought was wrong with me. She was American as well.

Does every girl think she is a psychologist because she took a couple Cosmo personality quizzes?

I didn't call the 21-year-old out for being a baby who doesn't know anything besides drinking, homework, and sucking the occasional dick. We already know what her response would have been: "But I'm so experienced for my age!" (Why is it the only people who tell me that are young, white, and privileged?) I politely let the conversation fade and went back to enjoying my Stella beer. I know my revenge will come one day, when about five years down the road she's in a situation where she questions her path and will regret not asking a couple open-minded questions to a mature man who questioned his as well.

I downloaded some new porn when I got home—I've been watching the same shit for six months.

Top 10 Signs A Girl Is Open To Having Sex While Abroad

February 20, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

This guest post is written by Craig Heimburger of Travelvice.com. He has been traveling for three years.

I've been watching travelers for a while now, and started noticing long ago what types of female backpackers had slept in their beds the night prior, and which didn't.

On their own, none of the items on the list below mean much in the way of forecasting if a girl is likely to hookup on any given night, but start combining these traits, and you've got a better than average indicator that she's open to some lovin' abroad.

1. She's traveling with a guy she isn't romantically involved with

2. She's been traveling for a few weeks without any romantic encounters

3. She's got a week or less of her trip left

4. She isn't traveling with another girl

5. She's sleeping in a shared (dormitory) room

6. She gets showered and made up before going out, but not overly dressed up

7. She's been drinking

8. She's smoking a cigarette

9. She doesn't mention a boyfriend (real or fictitious) as a defensive mechanism

10. She's not from the USA, Israel, Sweden, or the Netherlands

How Much The Trip Actually Cost

February 21, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Most people guessed way too low. Six months in South American cost me $12,471.28. Let's take off the $3,000 I spent in Rio (one-sixth of that went to the worst hostel in South America for their six day Carnival package). That leaves $9500 for five months, or $63 a day. Out of that I'd estimate $30-40 was spent on lodging, food, local taxis, and going out. But it was the miscellaneous costs that rammed me: new camera ($300), hospitalization ($550), visas ($200), bus transportation, doctor visit ($150 for a dermatologist in Rio), clothing replacement ($100), new 220-volt shaver ($50), Machu Picchu ($120), etc. Plus I took Spanish and Portuguese lessons ($200). It was very hard to keep costs down.

If you want to take a long trip but don't want to spend this amount of money, here's my advice:

1. Don't get sick, or take out a travel health insurance policy with the lowest possible deductible. Taking out a high $500 deductible like I did is retarded unless you plan on your appendix rupturing.

2. Stay longer in less cities. Not only do you minimize transportation costs but by knowing the city you can eat and get around more cheaply. I can live a comfortable middle-class lifestyle in a nice city like Cordoba, Argentina for around $1000 a month.

3. Don't eat out more than twice a week. It saves you money and minimizes your chances of getting sick. Make big meals and save leftovers for the next day's lunch and dinner.

4. Try to make friends on sites like Couch Surfing to lodge for free. I never did this but if I'm in a money crunch it'd make sense. Plus you'll have a more locals experience. Or you can get an older girlfriend who has her own place. I can tell you right now that you will get tired of both hostels and gringos after a month.

5. If you really want to save money and get your costs down to $10 a day, bring your tent, wash your clothes, and never use internet cafes. Or sleep in hammocks.

On to the contest winner. First here is my favorite guess:

> $0. I think you spent the whole time in your dad's basement avoiding homosexual thoughts.

Wrong! In close second place with a guess of $12,000 was Rajia. She gets no prize. The first place winner, and champion of this contest, is Brian with a guess of $12,885. Here's what he had to say about winning the book.

> Man I really don't believe it! I mean I've always wanted the book but I just don't want to pay actual money for it. I've been hoping for some type of sweet contest so when you announced this one on Monday I almost shit my pants at the opportunity.

Just kidding I made that up, but I imagine that's what he would say. Thanks for playing!

Postscript: What he really had to say…

> Some of those guesses were downright retarded. How anyone could guess like $3000 or $4000 is beyond me.

Layout Changes

February 22, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I made some changes to the blog.

- Widened the right column to fit in sponsor buttons.

- Moved site search form to top right.

- Added link to get posts via email.

- Added “Recent Comments” section.

- Added “Top 10 Most Popular” section, which is calculated according to views and comment counts.

- Added a “Share This” button at the bottom of every post.

- Fixed up the related posts section at the bottom of every post.

- Added a post rating system. Rate a post without leaving the page.

- Made “Editor Favorites” current. It used to be called “Still Hot.”

One of my goals was to make the blog more revenue friendly to search engine visitors without annoying regular readers (you). There are no ads in the main text of recent posts.

Culture Shock?

February 24, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

This list you are about to read are things I've always noticed about living in the States but which are especially obvious after being away for six months.

- People come in extremely large sizes. It's amazing how much weight the human body can handle. Also…

- There is no fat stigma or shame, perhaps because we are taught to accept ourselves just the way we are. So you see gigantic beverage and food portions consumed by gigantic people in public. Unlike in some Asian countries, it is not acceptable to tell people you barely know they are overweight.

- People wear corporate logos like North Face, Under Armor or Armani Exchange with pride. They seem to identify with these logos.

- There is a mind-boggling variety of food sold in warehouse-like buildings (supermarkets), but healthy, non-processed, and somewhat natural food such as organic fruits and vegetables are far more expensive than typical food most likely derived from corn or soy.

- On the Metro, everyone has a book with them, with titles such as Making Globalization Work (no lie). You have to be doing something while waiting for something else.

- Americans are pretty funny. If they say their favorite show includes Seinfeld, The Simpsons, or Friends, they are guaranteed to make a good joke at some point in the conversation.

- Most of the middle-class population seems to have a computer phone. At bars half the crowd is typing away on their cute little keyboards.

- It's okay to put toilet paper in the toilet bowl. But where all that flushed toilet paper go???

- There is a heavy display of wealth. People are showing off that they (may) have a lot of money as a judge of their self-worth. This is a bad idea in many other parts of the world.

In Chile I met a young Dutch guy who was telling me about his girlfriend. She went to India for a month and was so taken in by the culture that when she came back she had “serious culture shock,” moreso than when she arrived in India. He told me that in India there is less display of affection between men and women, so when he picked her up from the airport she only give him a distant hug while in new ethnic garb. At the time I thought, “That girl is full of shit,” and I can confirm it now; I’ve been gone for six months and there is no culture shock. It doesn’t even feel like I’ve been gone.

Brazilian Gym Culture

February 25, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

A different side of Brazil most gringos don't see is the gym. I don't consider myself a meathead but with the metaphorical anal pounding my body took I was turning a little soft and figured Rio would be a good place to work on my musculature.

First thing is the cost: gyms in Brazil are expensive. The first gym I looked at cost $150 US a month, and it was almost $200 if I wanted to use the pool. While it was the most beautiful gym I've seen in my life, with brand new equipment in spacious rooms and even computers with free internet, I opted for the budget $100/month gym. The only major difference it had from a regular gym like Golds or Sport & Health was the LCD screens with satellite television attached to every treadmill.

Just like in the States most gym-goers are guys, but in Brazil the guys are universally huge. 90% of them were gloriously large and ripped, even the one's in their 40's. So many carioca guys are in shape that showing off your muscular body on Ipanema beach for example will get you about as much attention as cruising South Beach with a BMW 3 series. I saw only one or two guys during my dozen or so gym visits that were smaller than me. My gut instinct is to think they are on steroids but then again Rio has hundreds of juice bars that have caloric shakes which can be supplemented with protein. It's also common to see GNC-like shops throughout the city. Creatine for all!

Most importantly let's talk about the girls. In the States you see a lot of young girls in the gym because of the popularity of female high school and college athletics, but in my Brazilian gym the average female was slightly over 30. But these were the hottest 30 and over women I've ever seen in my life, even if a fifth of them had fake breasts. Not only do they have the means and motivation to look good, but they are working off the foundation of Brazilian genes which gives them that legendary ass. If they had it, they definitely showed it.

The best part is that many women wore skin-tight lycra ensembles where you can make out the shape of their vaginas. Do you know the machine that works out the hamstrings, where you have to lay on your stomach and curl up your legs? Imagine the views that machine could offer a gringo pervert who looked at Brazilian women with epic asses wearing one-piece outfits that revealed everything. The calf machine offered very good views of those using the vagina machine. Right now my calves are the biggest they've ever been in my life.

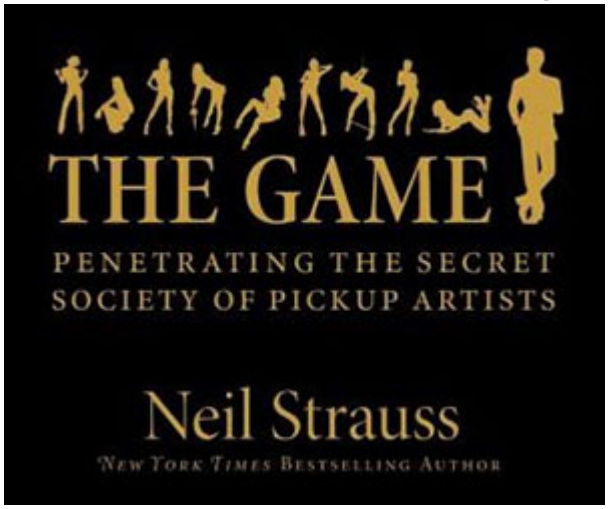
There is more of a pick-up vibe in American gyms, where you see guys and girls chatting with each other for extended periods of time without working out. In my gym this was rare but I did try to feel out the vibe by fishing for looks and engaging in light bilingual conversation. It would happen where a girl asked me in Portuguese how many sets I have left or if she could work in (you could tell which by her body language). I would respond in English with something like, "You can work in with me," but almost every time she'd scatter off after smiling. In other cases I would ask a girl in English how many sets she has left. Instead of offering to let me work in, she would usually say she's almost done. Even though she'd maybe check me out later, I never got that invitation to conversate, and no girl took the easy bait of asking "Where you from?" that was super common in the clubs. It could be the language barrier but my guess is there is less picking up in Brazilian gyms than American ones.

In conclusion, American gyms are good for being social and listening to T-Pain on your iPod. Argentine gyms are good for spying on the aerobics room were 95% of girls are hot. Brazilian gyms are good for looking at vaginas attached to showroom asses. Brazil wins.

For more on Brazil, check out my Brazil travel guide.



Carnival in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

February 26, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

If you read only one of my Volette travel articles, it should be this one. I wrote about my Carnival experience, how it's like, and some tips in case you plan on visiting.

> There are two parts to Carnival in Rio de Janeiro: the street block parties called blocos and the elaborate samba parade at the Sambodromo stadium. Both are required for the full Carnival experience…
>
> I'll admit that the Carnival marketing got me. I saw the pictures of half-naked women on floats and thought Carnival had to be just about sex. It's more about…

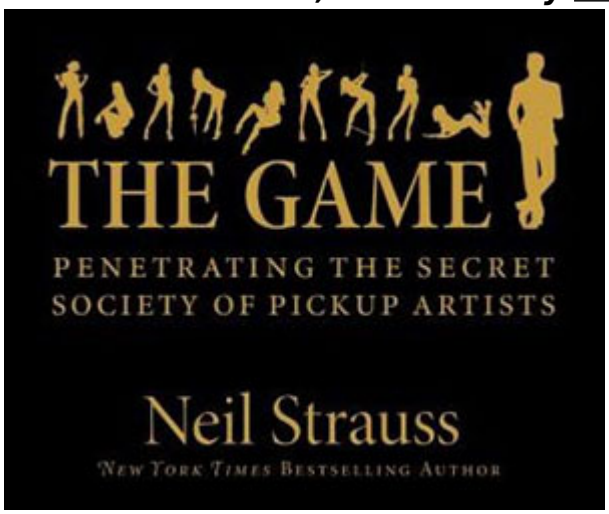
Read it here

I included a dozen photos in the article. Here's a couple:

My previous Volette articles:

- Twenty Four Hours In Buenos Aires
- The Middle Of The World (Quito, Ecuador)
- The Incan Ruins of Cuzco Peru
- The Jewel Of The Pacific (Valparaiso, Chile)
- Patagonia (Argentina)

For more on Brazil, check out my Brazil travel guide.



Love At First Sight

February 27, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

One of my carioca lady friends was relaying a story to me and and three other girls. It was about a guy who saw a girl on the subway in New York and fell in love. But instead of saying something to the girl, he went home, drew a picture of her, then made an internet site with the picture and forwarded it to his friends. The site got around and they found the girl, who happened to be Australian. The media got involved and made a big deal about it and reunited them with tears of joy all around. They "dated for a while," which means once the thrill died down she dumped him.

The other girls were touched by this story and went silent as they looked at their drinks, perhaps wishing they could meet a man who obsesses over them like that. Thing is I'm sure they have, but since there was no media coverage they just put those guys in the friends zone.

At risk of being banished from the group I raised my hand to speak and said I thought the guy was a loser who has trouble with women. My comment was not well-received.

"Don't you believe in love at first sight?"

"No," I said.

"You're not romantic at all." They shook their head, regretting they ever made friends with a gringo.

I dropped the issue because I wanted to make it from the table alive, but there seems to be a very fine line between being romantic and being a pathetic beta male. Or perhaps there is no line.

Postscript: Apparently the story is true, but "dated for a while" actually means "went out for coffee." Here is the original site he made and here is more information than you'll ever need to know about these two people.

Leaving Girls Voicemail

February 28, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

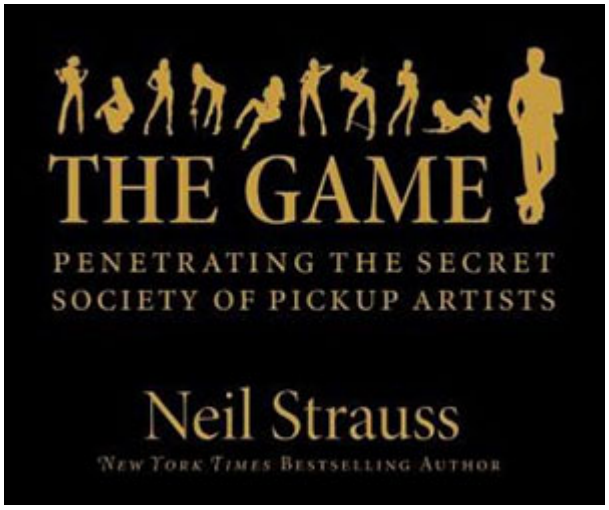
---

The following exerpt is from my book Bang.

> A girl has made up her mind on whether she is going to call you back before you even pick up the phone. There is no message in the world that will make the girl call you back when she already decided not to, but there are messages you can leave which can change her mind and stop her from calling you back. In the case of voice messages, boring is better. Our simple voice message avoids the pitfalls of a typical bad message, like the previously mentioned joke or story drop and also self-descriptions that insinuate you are forgettable. Bad message example: "Hey it's Steve, from Friday night at the bar, with the striped shirt, just calling to say…." If she gave you her number she is already interested to you (or was at the moment she gave it). Until you see her again in person you can only do more to harm than help.
>
>
>
> [image]photo credit: Voxphoto
>
> Once you leave a message, put your phone down and go occupy your mind with something else. You're expecting a call, not waiting for one. Get on with your life and don't worry about if your phone has a strong enough signal or if your ringer is loud enough for you to hear it. If you are doing things that you wouldn't do if you were expecting a buddy of yours to return a call, then you need to take a step back by turning off your ringer and hiding your phone until the next morning. You give too much power to the girl if you eagerly await her call.

Phone game is important, but it's one of the only areas of the game where simply being capable is enough. The phone is just a bridge to continuing the interaction, not intensifying it. If you keep that frame in mind you will talk to girls like you would talk to a friend: relaxed, fun, and brief. There is a band-aid to bad phone game in the form of text messaging (it used to be e-mail), but you'll have to get her on the phone eventually so you might as well get it straightened out starting now. Bang has several pages on how to work the phone. You can learn more about what's inside the book here.

I’m going to resume sending out newsletters. The next one goes out on Monday. If you are not already subscribed, sign up here or at the form on the bottom right column.



Men Need To Be Inspired

March 2, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

To be inspired by a girl means you will push until your fate is sealed, not by being desperate but by using the best game you know and have trained for.

Several years ago it didn't take much to chase a girl: if I was horny and she was alright looking then I'd go for it. But once that insecurity of not having banged enough girls fades after banging enough girls, it takes more than her just having a working vagina. This is true for most men. I'd engage in sexual intercourse with a typical cute girl I meet, but something she lacks prevents me from putting in an honest effort. Maybe it's a bad vibe or the way she carries herself (or doesn't). If she made it obvious she wanted to have sex with me I would, but I would never ask her out.

Then you have girls who have the looks and the vibe. There is "something about her" and I'm inspired to put forth everything I know about girls and game to get her into bed. I will not give up until I get her or get rejected. Most of the time I won't get the girl, but sometimes I do.

Inspiration breeds desire, persistence, and effort. Why is this important? Because those are the things you need to get the best women. And when you are inspired there is a genuineness that comes out that wouldn't if you were just faking it long enough to get your dick wet.

In Cordoba my digestive system was at its worst. Looking back I don't know how I dealt with those symptoms and still managed to go out three times a week, pound Quilmes, and hit on as many girls as I did. I was so motivated because I really wanted those girls. There was so much inspiration in an average club that I squeezed my ass cheeks, blamed any gas on my wingman, and dealt with it. It was rough going until the end but I learned more about beautiful girls in that one month than I did in the previous year.

The biggest problem with the Washington DC area is there is little inspiration. There is always something very wrong with the girls; maybe she is fun but frumpy, hot but status and attention-driven, or cute but so witty it feels like you are talking to a cool dude. I go through the motions just to keep my game in shape, like a body-builder would during winter months. Here I'm lazy, in Argentina I stepped up. I went to clubs alone there, something I would never do here.

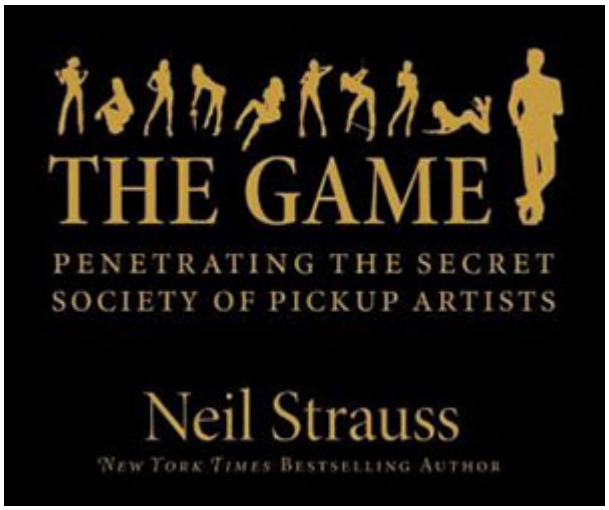
So that’s the problem with DC, and probably most American cities. The reason so many girls are complaining about guys barely putting in effort and playing the field, about texting instead of calling and not wanting to take them out, is because the guys are simply not inspired. Inspire a man and you will get the best of him. Otherwise he won’t give a shit.



40-Year-Old Spinster Is Expert On Marriage

March 3, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There is a sad article called Marry Him which has been floating around. I've beaten the topic to death here but there are a few sections I wanted to comment on.

> And despite growing up in an era when the centuries-old mantra to get married young was finally (and, it seemed, refreshingly) replaced by encouragement to postpone that milestone in pursuit of high ideals (education! career! but also true love!), every woman I know—no matter how successful and ambitious, how financially and emotionally secure—feels panic, occasionally coupled with desperation, if she hits 30 and finds herself unmarried.

Part of the problem is that when she does hit the panic stage she blames everyone but herself. It's hopeless because these women will never make the changes necessary to get a husband. They don't adapt.

> My advice is this: Settle! That's right. Don't worry about passion or intense connection. Don't nix a guy based on his annoying habit of yelling "Bravo!" in movie theaters. Overlook his halitosis or abysmal sense of aesthetics. Because if you want to have the infrastructure in place to have a family, settling is the way to go. Based on my observations, in fact, settling will probably make you happier in the long run, since many of those who marry with great expectations become more disillusioned with each passing year.

All girls have to do is be reasonable. They need to ask themselves if what they want deep in their hearts exists in the real world. If it does then is she bringing enough to the table?

> It sounds obvious now, but I didn't fully appreciate back then that what makes for a good marriage isn't necessarily what makes for a good romantic relationship. Once you're married, it's not about whom you want to go on vacation with; it's about whom you want to run a household with. Marriage isn't a passion-fest; it's more like a partnership formed to run a very small, mundane, and often boring nonprofit business.

This is obvious to most guys. We have this expression called “marriage material” to describe girls who take care of us and would run a good household. We would not consider marrying the girl who allows us to videotape sex so we can show all our friends.

> So if you rarely see your husband—but he’s a decent guy who takes out the trash and sets up the baby gear, and he provides a second income that allows you to spend time with your child instead of working 60 hours a week to support a family on your own—how much does it matter whether the guy you marry is The One?

Notice the extreme selfishness: who cares about the child having a good daddy as long as you can be with it? With all we know about the disadvantages of growing up in a single family household, I’m surprised more people are not calling these single mothers for the harm they are doing on kids who I’m sure would prefer to have a father.

> What I and many women who hold out for true love forget is that we won’t always have the same appeal that we may have had in our 20s and early 30s. Having turned 40, I now have wrinkles, bags under my eyes, and hair in places I didn’t know hair could grow on women.

Gross, but don’t forget the kid from an anonymous man.

This article got me thinking to why is there demand for dating or marriage advice. Why does this article (and this blog) even need to be written? I think part of the answer is that there is no tradition or culture to fall back on in meeting people. In this country our parents did not give us sound advice on how to meet the opposite sex and how to find a long-term mate, so a Mystery comes along or The Rules girls write a book (”breathe slowly”!!!) and everyone jumps on because no one knows what the fuck they are doing. Something retarded like speed dating or “lock and key” parties arrive in e-mail boxes and everyone tries it because they have no idea how to meet someone. And a 40-year-old woman who was inseminated with sperm and who failed in finding just one decent man is writing an article in a major publication on how to get married. That would be like me writing about how to keep your long-term girlfriend happy.

If knowledge was passed from generation to generation then you’d have a lot of people growing up with sound beliefs on how to deal with the opposite sex, but that’s not what we have here anymore. Instead we’re hypersexualized and clueless.

A Disenchanted Playroom

March 4, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A photographer named Wolfram Hahn created a photo series of children watching television.

> The children depicted in this series are between three and twelve. Their regards are sad, with facial expressions rather to be associated with adults, unusual for children this age. They regard a spot below the camera; focusing on something in that space not revealed to the viewer. As such they seem lifeless like dolls, or bodies bereft of their spirits.

You can see the photos at his web site. An article was written about it in Art In America.

The photos hit me because I have a four-year-old brother who watches at least three hours of television a day. It's usually educational programs on PBS or Noggin, but regardless of their value they still co-opt his imagination and train him to take cues from marketers. When he enters a supermarket, he asks for specific brands that are advertised on television and knows exactly where to get them.

A lot of us in our late 20′s are caught up in this multi-task / short-attention span culture, but at least we were spared the most harmful effects of television growing up. All I had to look forward as a kid was Saturday morning cartoons, but these days there are several channels that offer video crack to kids using the latest advances in psychology and brainwashing. I'm afraid that my brother's brain will be wired differently than mine, and since I'm not his parent there is not much I can do about it.

Surprisingly Good Sex Tips

March 5, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I planned this post for a Thursday because the weekend is coming and a small minority of you are going to have sex.

Every man needs to read the beautifully written Just Fucking Fuck me, Already. A girl is frustrated about how passive and timid men are when it comes to the bedroom.

> But please, please just fuck me already. Honestly, I appreciate your thoughtfulness. I like that you want to take things slow. I can totally get behind the idea of emotional connection, but dearjesusinheaven, FUCK ME. We've done dinner and drinks. We've gone dancing. We've cuddled and watched a movie. I'm wearing a low cut shirt and you've been staring at my breasts all night. Goodgodalmighty, get to it and fuck me.
>
> When we get hot and heavy, please take charge. Please, please fuck me. Trust me, I'm not going to just lie still – I'll get involved. But don't make me force your hand into my panties. That makes me feel like a rapist. We've been kissing for a half hour and your hand keeps grazing my ass. That's nice, but it's time to move forward. Get on top of me. Don't make me get on top right out of the gate and start bobbing up and down on your cock like I'm practicing some crazy new aerobic yoga because YOU won't go down on me. Roll on top and start dry humping like a good boy should. Don't gently suck my nipples and then pull back when I moan with pleasure. You being coy is totally not what I want. It's not what WE want.

She goes on…

> We really like it when you come. It's called a money shot for a reason. Watching semen shoot out of you is one of the most gratifying things EVER. However, do not assume that she wants you to jack it off onto her face. She might, but don't assume. Seeing and/or feeling you come is rewarding for us, so there's no need to deprive us of it, but please do consult us before unleashing. "I think I'm going to come – how do you like it?" is a fair question that shouldn't rob you of your testicles.

This is a woman who likes men and sex. Notice how she doesn't nit-pick about the little things and is trying to educate men on the overall experience. I got an erection after reading it.

On the other side, every woman needs to read Blowjob Tutorial.

> If you simply wanted to get a guy off as quickly as possible, all you need to do is lock your lips at the base of his cock and suction them up and down the bottom ¾ of his shaft at a quick, steady pace while pressing your flattened tongue > against the underside of his dick. Make sure you are applying pressure with both your lips AND tongue. Keeping your tongue engaged at all times is key. I try to keep mine moving at all times. This is how you get 90% of guys off.

>
> …at least once during the beej, I usually pop his dick out of my mouth and slap it against my tongue or face, then look at him while I rub his cock against my cheeks and lips. Guys are visual, this is just a little something dirty for him to look at.

Not only are most girls clueless the proper technique, they only reluctantly give head when a man asks or insinuates. What happened to doing it because you love it? Asking for head is kind of like explaining the punch line of a joke—it takes away from the climax. I got an erection after reading her post as well, and will be forwarding it to future girls I meet as a “fun article.”

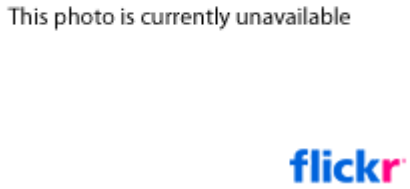
The Fast Kiss

March 6, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

From Bang:

> You'll notice I gave a way to start the date without accounting for whether you kissed her or not in your previous encounter. That's because even if you did kiss her beforehand, you can't just greet her with your tongue—you have to "start over" again and rebuild the energy from the last time you saw her. It's like re-priming a pump. When it comes to the first date, the only difference that prior kissing makes is towards the end of the date, when you are most likely to get farther.

How important is it to kiss a girl when you first meet her? There are a couple ways of looking at it. The first: Does kissing a girl increase the likelihood of her returning my first call? From my experience and that of my friends, it seems to make no difference. That's because kissing is really not a big deal in this culture, where girls will kiss a guy just because she is intoxicated and her friend is already hooked up with another guy. (But in Argentina, for example, the kiss is a big deal and probably would increase chances of a return call).



[image] photo credit: guinavere

The fast kiss actually does two things: (1) it keeps you on task and (2) it makes the first date a lot more exciting. When you're talking to a girl and your goal is something vague like "build attraction," what happens is you may overdo things like humor for the sake of being interesting and miss an opportunity. Instead of thinking of how ready she is to receive your mouth, you are wondering what your next awesome conversational piece will be. But if your goal is to kiss her, you will do just enough humor or teasing or conversation until you get those subtle signs to progress things by touching and glancing at her lips instead of talking. You should be getting the kiss under the two hour mark, but 45-60 minutes is more ideal. (If your mind is saying "That's crazy!" then you need to work either on your game or venue selection.)

If you don't kiss her when you first meet, the most you will probably get on the first date is a makeout. Since it's difficult to get the makeout out of the way early in the date, you have to wait until the end, and by then she will most likely not be prepared for doing much more. But if you did kiss her when you first meet, she is far more open to going past that. She is going on a date with a guy she already kissed because she wants to do more. I don't think I had sex with any girl on the first date that I didn't kiss beforehand.

PS. I'm calling in to Bobby and Mike's radio show tonight around 7PM. Listen online or tune in to 90.3 FM if you're in north Jersey. I'm going to talk about Brazilian girls and Bang.

Next Big Project

March 8, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. I want to thank my newest sponsor, The Seduction Chronicles. You'll probably like posts such as Top 20 Date Idea "Templates" for Men, Favorite Cocky & Funny Lines, and Interview With Neil Strauss.

2. The radio show on Friday was fun. Listen to the podcast on The Seduction Bible.

3. I'm almost done with my next big project. I should be done with it in about two weeks.

4. On a sadder note, Just Going With It is finished. Some local new-to-me blogs I've been reading lately are Bridal Bird, DC Bar Wench, Listen To Leon, DC Hero, and I never know when to shut up

Postscript: Post ratings are back.

The 3 Best Movies In The History Of The World

March 9, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Number 1: Gladiator

Favorite quote: “My name is Gladiator.”

This is the best movie ever made. Whenever a girl asks me what my favorite movie is and I tell her Gladiator, she rolls her eyes and tells me my stock has decreased, perhaps hoping that I would be “above” such a film and instead mention some indie flick that changed the world. As intelligent and cultured as I am, Gladiator contains everything a real man could possibly want in a movie: brutal violence, sword-play, strength, honor, offscreen rape, incest. I identified so much with the hero Maximus due to our similar life arcs that I cried when he died at the end, and I’m proud to admit that.

Number 2: The Fifth Element

Favorite quote: “Ecto gammat!” (Never again without my permission)

This is one of those movies that you find more and more brilliant each time you watch, sort of like Big Trouble In Little China. There is just so much going on: mongoloids, supreme being, Deebo as the President, robot bartender, Chris Tucker, Zorg, Aziz’s light, and so on. The only reason this is not the best movie ever made is because I did not cry. My entire sense of humor can be contributed to this film, and it’s not even a comedy.

Gimme the cassssshhhh…

Number 3: Heat

Favorite quote (more like important life lesson): “You want to be making moves on the street? Have no attachments. Allow nothing to be in your life that you cannot walk out on in thirty seconds flat if you spot the heat around the corner.”

There is an underrated movie that doesn’t get a lot of buzz. People go in thinking it’s going to be this huge action movie and are disappointed when it turns out to be a three hour character movie centered around Al Pacino and Robert DeNiro. It’s the last good movie that Robert DeNiro starred in before he started appearing in dreck like The Adventures of Rocky & Bullwinkle, Analyze That, and Meet The Fockers. I find the bank robber story to be just a device to let the actors work their magic. Like me, I think that you will reevaluate your life after watching.

Notable runners-up: Fight Club, True Lies, Eternal Sunshine Of The Spotless Mind, Coming To America, Dawn Of The Dead (remake), and Coneheads

My Unsafe Sex Rationalization List

March 10, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My safe sex practices were recently questioned by a girl and I offered the following explanation:

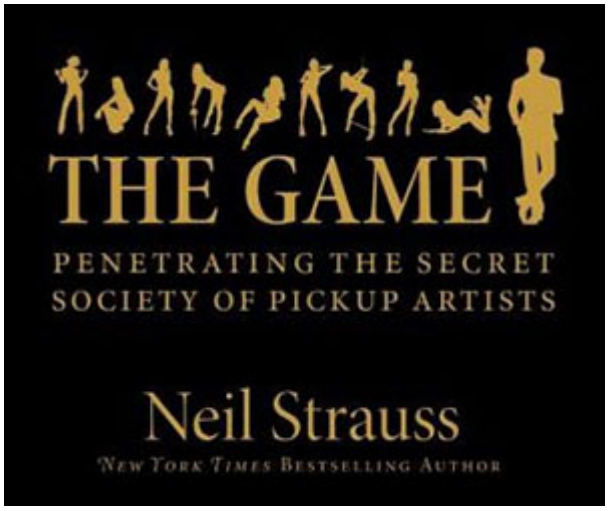
> When I'm in bed with a girl and I get signs that tells me she is probably clean, I take that as a green light to take more risk. So I may do something like putting it in without a condom. Just because I did that with you doesn't mean I do that with every girl.

Surprisingly this made the situation worse, but that got me thinking about signs I've used in the past:

- She has condoms in her nightstand (intent to be safe)
- She asks you to use a condom (safe)
- She is upper middle class (more health conscious)
- She is on the pill (no risk of being a daddy)
- She does not seem promiscuous
- She has a clean appearance or smell
- She didn't let me hit on the same night I met her (not easy)
- She was married or got out of a really long-term relationship (more likely to be monogamous, less sexual partners)
- She doesn't identify with Samantha on Sex and the City
- She gets frequent gynecological exams (awareness of all 70 strains of HPV)
- She doesn't have tattoos (low hepatitis C risk)

My list is definitely not scientific, but the more things she has on the list the more comfortable I feel having natural sex. It doesn't help that as I get older I'm getting the feeling of invincibility that I've probably been exposed to STDs but am immune to all of them. I brush aside comments by girls who say I'm "most likely" a HPV carrier.

I think of safe sex as a scale from 1-10. A 1 has never bought condoms and only uses them when the herpes is flaring up while a 10 needs signed laboratory tests from her partner before going raw. I'm a solid 6.5, much higher than guys I know who are in the 3 range. If women understand that the vagina has evolved for millions of years to be the most intense pleasure a man can experience, they wouldn't freak out when we just want to put it in to experience this ecstasy.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Urban Dictionary

March 10, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I did a Google search on "roosh" to see how bad the damage is, and noticed the fourth result is something from Urban Dictionary:

> A poseur who thinks he's a playa. Someone who is clueless about how unskilled he is at picking up girls.
>
> So Michelle was at the bar and this roosh comes up to her and says "hey baby, what's your sign?"

It has 83 up votes.

I’m 28-Years-Old And Not Jaded Or Bitter

March 11, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

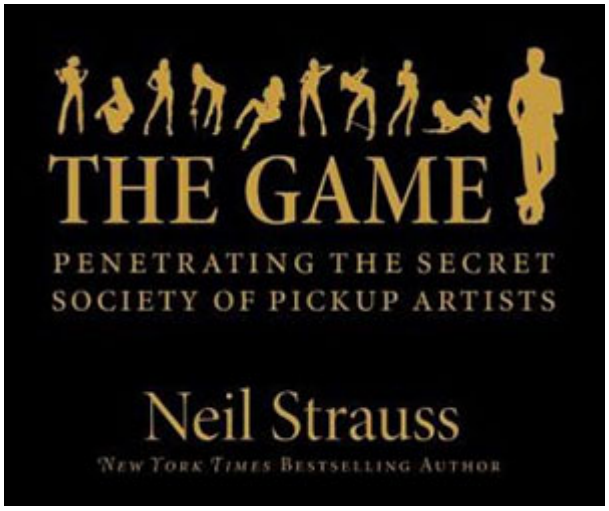
I was at a bar talking to a girl who kept bragging that she was a bitch, and quite literally: she repeated “I’m a bitch” several times when I questioned her abrasive attitude. It made me think back to this girl I met in Brazil, who was feminine and gentle and would be embarrassed to say something like that about herself. But this is America.

I don’t mind a challenge under the influence so I wanted to see if I could crack her candy-coated shell to get to the gooey lubricated center (I know, I’m reinforcing the behavior). Whenever you meet someone who has a shell, 99% of the time it’s because they have been hurt badly in the past, but since everyone has been hurt, why is it some people get colder as go through the human condition and others get more.. human? Well I think it’s because one group has a belief that pain is bad and you must do everything to avoid it, while the other sees value in all experiences, good and bad.

After I built rapport with this girl, I asked her why she’s so rough. I told her how much attractive she’d be if she’d be more like a gentle flower instead of a box of razors. Eventually it comes out that she has been hurt. Her eyes well up and I felt a moment. Most girls I meet are intolerable and I wouldn’t want to spend time with them outside the bedroom, but you get these moments from them where they are so vulnerable and sweet. Her shield collapsed and I felt like this was the real girl and I wanted to get to know her. There was a short kiss and I got her number.

I bump into her one hour later. It was obvious the moment was gone and I’d have to work to get it back, but it wasn’t worth it. She’s capable of being the type of girl I want, but I shouldn’t have to constantly dig to find the real person inside. Any girl in her 20’s should come pre-fabricated to livable specifications. I’m not a dog trainer. So I never called her.

Exactly one week later I met another girl, also young. She wasn’t a bitch but she had a shield up as well and referred to being jaded from “crash and burns,” which I took to mean “pumps and dumps.” “Twenty-two and jaded already?” I worked it like other girl and had a nice moment with the “real” or natural girl. Her sister, who was a bitch, became alarmed and dragged her away per the tired American female cockblocking ritual. One hour later I saw her, but the moment passed, and I didn’t bother.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Marvin Review

March 12, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Marvin is a bar that just opened in October 2007. It is located in the "up-and-coming" area of U St near Busboys & Poets.

Ambiance: Your grandmother's house.

People: Semi-hipsters. The late 20's / early 30's people here are "new" hipsters who have just taken up the cause, instead of being the hardcore type with skinny jeans who only goes to Black Cat and drink beer from a can (a low-class way to drink beer in my opinion).

Being a hipster used to be a way to get away from the mainstream, so I find it ironic that hipsterdom has been co-opted by the mainstream.

Girls: Uninspiring for the most part, but posing spot selection makes a big difference. Instead of hanging inside where you'll just meet frumpy girls who can't dance, head to the patio where there is more girl traffic ensuring for a better selection. Some undesirable, older women have given me very strong indicators of interest here.

Chance Of Hooking Up Rating: 2 out of 5. You'll get a number but that's it unless you are very aggressive with tight game.

The Verdict: Go if you want a tolerable place where people are not obviously lame, but if you want to meet girls who are easy then head deeper into the dregs of Adams Morgan where Grand Central is still a winner.

THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Learning During Cold Streaks

March 13, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Excerpt from Bang:

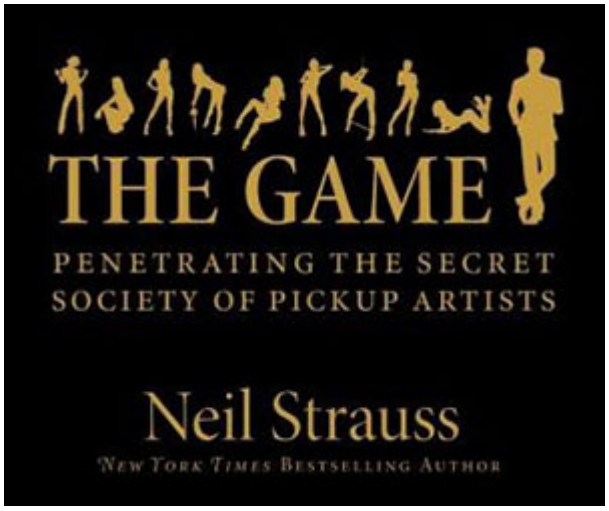
> Some productivity experts recommend you attach a deadline to your goal. For example: “I am going to sleep with a mother and daughter team within six months.” I don’t advise doing this because the game is so unpredictable and quirky that time goals can be discouraging during the inevitable cold streak. As you gain skill, there will be periods where you sleep with multiple girls in a short amount of time, followed by nothing for several months.

When I was a full-time student of the game, I went to great lengths to get out of a cold streak. I would pull out a piece of paper, write a short-term goal, and make a bulleted list of all the things I should do and try to get out of it. The goal was usually set a month from when I started to write down this list. The sad part: I never achieved the goal within the deadline, and stopped making lists.

It took myself years later to realize what happened. During the goal month I experimented a lot with a shotgun strategy, trying to hit something that can get me out of the cold streak. I was learning instead of succeeding. Once the month was over and I was disappointed with the results, I put my list away and then unconsciously only did things that worked well. Then I hit.

At least once a month I go out and spit the craziest and weirdest shit I can think of. I remember one time I got out a scrap piece of paper and pretended I was reading simple lines like “Hi. How are you. What is your name?” Then the girl would peek at the paper and see a stick-figure drawing of me and a cat. And she would give me this look like “Who are you?” I don’t do this to get laid but to learn how girls respond to things and where the limits are. Learning and success go hand in hand, but they don’t always happen at the same time.

Girls and monogamy-included men really hate the methodical approach to game where you set goals in the form of vaginas and write down notes or ideas to accomplish them. I’ll admit it is a little weird, and it’s not something I’d tell to people who aren’t doing what I’m doing, but it works.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Comments Of The Week

March 14, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

First, DoIsRight offers a very detailed unsafe sex point system.

> I do a point system, like I am counting cards. I assign points to every risk factor. the higher the points the higher the risk. No particular order:
>
> 1) Where she lives/ Where she hangs out/ Where you are banging – If she lives in vermont, frequents chelsea, and you are banging her in long island. Vermont has only like 450 cases of hiv, while chelsea is infected by bi men, and if she is willing to go to long island with you to bang she probably has been banged previously by a guido. She has a higher chance of being infected. 3 points.
> 2) Casual questions about drug use. Alcohol frequency, weed, Coc, K, Meth. For coc, k, and meth girls are willing to get fucked in the ass to get high = Infected. Any sign of intravenous drugs – DO NOT BANG. 10 points for coc, k, meth. Alcohol to black out 5 points. Alcohol to loosen up 2 points. Weed a lot 1 point.
> 3) Race – not being racist but it is a huge factor facts wise when it comes to STDs. 1 point.
> 4) Economic status – poor people dont go to the Doctor. Lets hope a democrat gets elected so we have less STDs. 2 point.
> 5) Age – the younger the better. obviously. post 35 – 3 points – post 28 – 2 points – post 22 – 1 point. pre 22 – 0 points.
> 6) If she doesnt ask you to put on a condom, doesnt bring up condoms, just straight to insert. 4 points.
> 7) How many times you have to play just the tip and she does the hip squirm before inserting. No squirming 2 points. Medium 1 point. A lot of squirming 0 points.
> 8) While you are banging if you can stick your thumb in her ass without much effort, that is a bad sign. 2 point.
> 9) If she voluntarily tells you to cum inside of me [sic]. 7 points.
> 10) If you ask where should I cum, and she says inside of me. 5 points > 11) If you ask, can I come inside of you and she says yes.3 points. If she says hell no. 0 points.
> 12) If she she asks you to put it in her ass. 15 points – almost like being gay

Second, Nomadz is insulted by people who whine about getting dumped.

> The problem is we live in a society where pain, any kind of pain or suffering, is considered un-natural, and to be avoided at all cost. No one actually accepts anymore that pain, being hurt, suffering, are normal components of a human life and cannot always be avoided. Because a girl (or guy) gets hurt once, she or he takes shelter in a “i don’t want to suffer so i’d better never fall in love again” attitude, which is plain ridiculous.

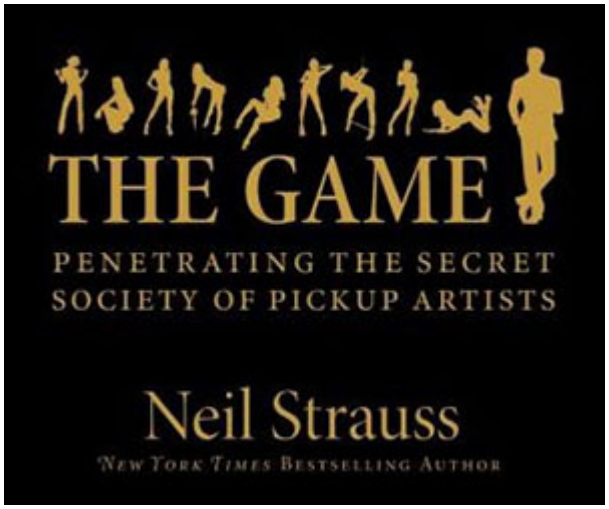
What ? Say again ? You have been dumped ? you've had your heart broken ? BIG DEAL ! Get a life. Everybody has. Every human being suffers. Gets rejected. Gets his/her heart broken. THIS IS FUCKING LIFE, and if you can't accept such a small amount of pain, well, just shoot yourself, or become a Buddhist so you can extinguish your worldly desires. This is not pain. This is nothing. Maybe if you were born in a war-torn african country and had your whole family raped in front of you just before you were enlisted as a child-soldier at the age of 8, well, maybe I'll feel compassion, and understand that you need to build a defensive armour around your soul and mind so as not to become completely crazy. But don't fracking tell me you need to be a cold-hearted, cocky bitch for the rest of your life because you prom date actually just wanted to fuck you and you felt disappointed.



South America Travel Guide

March 16, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have finished my South America Travel Guide. I give overviews of each country and city along with a "Chance Of Hooking Up" rating. It's geared for guys.

> 1 out of 5: You have an extremely low chance of hooking up. Don't visit for the girls.
> 2 out of 5: You'll need quite a bit of magical luck.
> 3 out of 5: There are girls around, but it's not necessarily easy.
> 4 out of 5: You have a very good chance of hooking up if you put in an honest effort.
> 5 out of 5: Hooking up is guaran-fucking-teed as long as you aren't disfigured.

I provide a handy list of all the cities I visited sorted according to their rating. Only one city gets a five (you'll be surprised). I came up with the rating because almost all the guys I know are using women as considering for travel, but popular guides like Lonely Planet and Frommers don't offer help in that department. In each country's overview, I give a general description of the girls. Here's what I say about Ecuadorian girls:

> Ecuadorian girls look very indigenous with straight black hair, high cheekbones, thin eyebrows, and small eyes. …most of them look like pictures of Native Americans in your high school history textbook. In smaller cities, the white man is looked on with an extra dose of curiosity, and his gringo status will attract an occasional prostitute working pseudo-undercover.

My best guide is on Rio de Janeiro, most likely because I stayed there for a month. I think Argentina will also be popular.

This project gave me a glimpse into travel book writing. Turns out it's a pretty boring and tedious gig. My guides are basic but they took a ridiculous amount of time to put together.

Monday Morning Reading

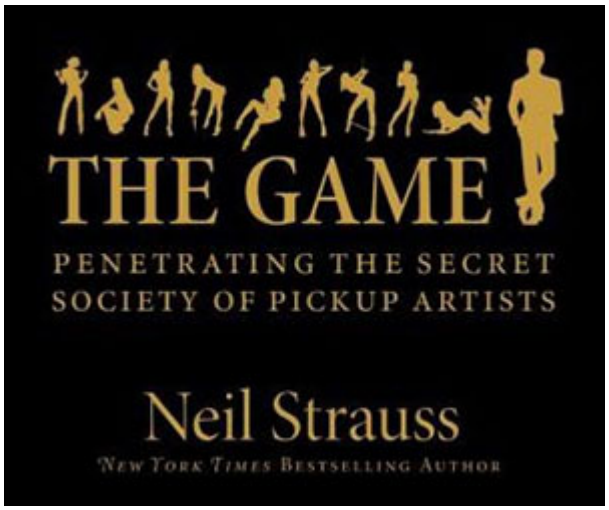
March 16, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

http://stockmarketcrash.atspace.com/

> Many began to realize that the magic of leverage could also lead to their ultimate ruin.

I don't know if you read Kunstler but his doom and gloom predictions seem to be coming true.



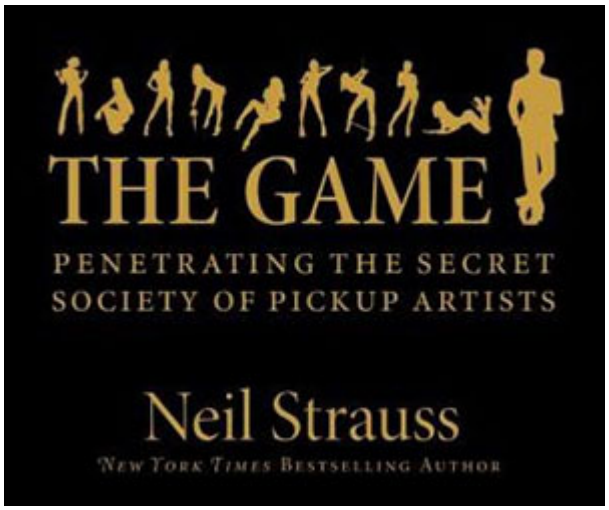
Ironic Hipster Happy Hour

March 16, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Me and Roissy (and possibly Arjewtino) are throwing a happy hour this Friday at Marvin.

Stop by and do the opposite of what this guy sings about…

Finger Eleven – Paralyzer



Getting Approached By Girls

March 17, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

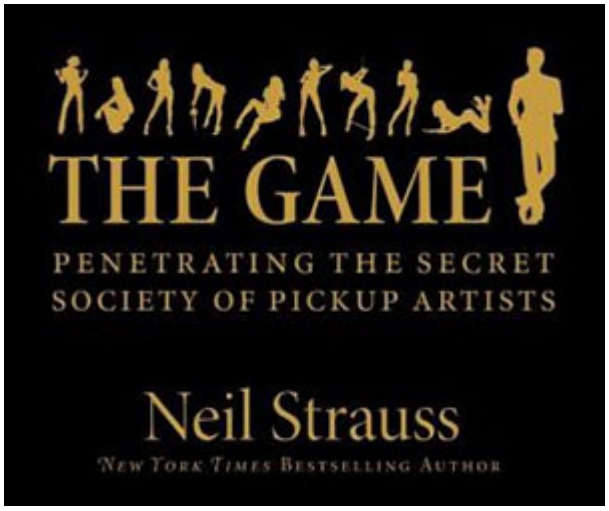
Something interesting has been happening since I returned home: I'm getting approached in bars a lot more, generally by cuter girls who are more direct in their affections.

Before I left, I'd get approached maybe once every couple months by a 5 or 6. I'd talk to her just to be friendly. But each week I've been back, girls are either gawking at me or just approaching me outright. The other night a pretty Greek girl said, "I saw you from across the bar and I told myself that you're hot and I have to talk to you." I don't think I'm ugly but I don't have stereotypical good looks valued by this culture. If the first time you are called hot is when you are 28 then you know something else is going on besides looks. What has changed in six months?

A friend of mine suggested that times are changing and girls are approaching more. I do believe this. I think the seduction industry has filtered down to girls and they are taking their sex / love lives in their own hands instead of waiting passively to be swept off their feet. But is six months too short for a cultural shift to occur?

My theory is impossible to prove and has to do with body language. I've always believed that a person's experience, confidence, and attitude is somehow transmutated into their body language. Whatever I experienced in the past six months is being told, like a story, with the way I carry myself. This body language is hitting some unconscious button on a couple girls, and they act with the justification that I'm physically attractive. But looks without the context of body language or vibe is pretty useless unless you are a guy still oogling the pages of Playboy.

So what am I doing differently? Nothing… that I'm aware of.

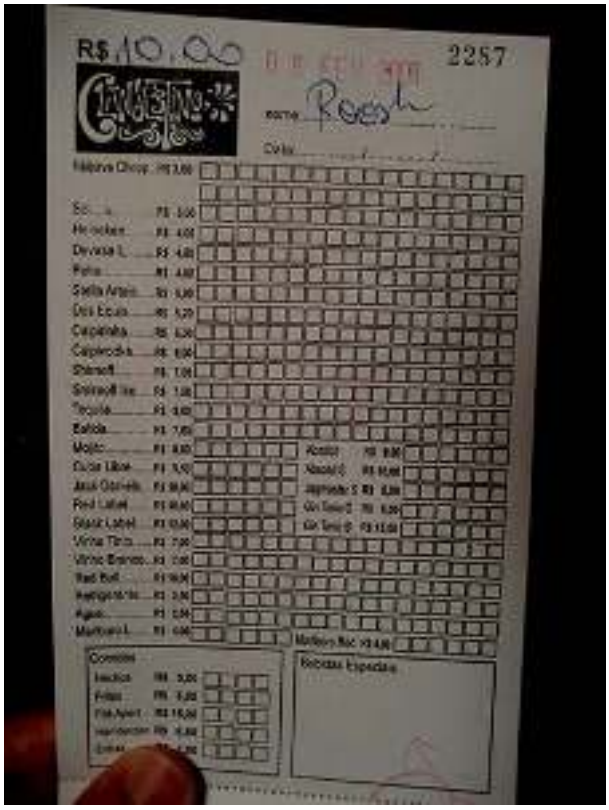


THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

The Brazilian Consumption Card

March 18, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The bars and clubs in Brazil have a weird system. In the U.S. you simply order a drink and then pay for it when it's served to you, but in Brazil you have to give them your consumption card when you order. Here's an example of a consumption card:



They put a hash mark in the box next to your drink and then they seve you. At the end of the night, you give your card to a cashier, pay the total, and get a stamp needed to exit. It sounds efficient but there are three problems:

1. You will lose your card. A lost card is an automatic 200 reals ($120—and increasing) charge. A lot of gringos waxed about drinking more than 200 reals worth of booze and losing their card on purpose to scam the system, but I did not meet anyone who attempted this. (I found it amusing that whenever a guy shared this idea he thought he was a genius for coming up with it.) A vodka drink is around 8 reals so you'd have to get consume 25 mixed drinks to get there. A beer is usually under 5 reals.

2. Long lines. When you want to leave after 2am or so, the line can be painfully long. It's like you're trapped. If you only ordered two drinks, you will usually wait much longer than the time it took to order and pay for two drinks.

3. Rip-off friendly. The amount I paid was almost always higher than what I added up. (One of the reasons the line moves so slow is because half the people are challenging the final amount.) Sometimes the cover charge goes towards your drinking but other times it doesn't. Transparency is lacking.

This system reminded me of Salta, Argentina, where you had to carry the same glass with you all night long. When you leave they ask you for your glass and if you don't have it you have to pay something like a 50 cent charge. It was common to see guys tearing it up on the dance floor with a cocktail glass in their back pocket.

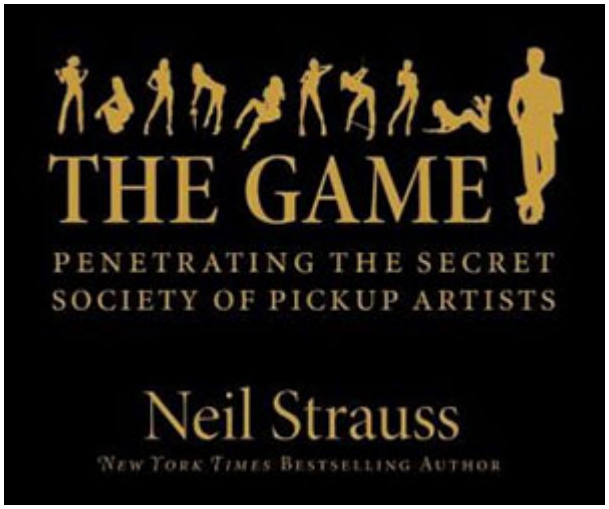
One more thing. Remember when I wrote that Brazilians refer to spooning as "lying like oysters?" I was close—it's actually to lie like seashells. With the Brazilian girls I met in Rio, I can confirm this as 100% fact.

For more on Brazil, check out my Brazil travel guide.



Player Or Poseur?

March 19, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This man looks like the chaperone to the young girl in the pink jacket, picking her up after what appears to be a very rough day at the office. Notice how he kind of just floats out there in the ether instead of being included in the photo—even the flash of the camera escapes him. Poseur. He also bears a striking resemblance to the president of Pakistan.

President Pervez Musharraf

This guy has a hot piece of ass on his crotch and he doesn't even give a damn. It's almost as if he’s being bothered by yet another attention whore who will do anything to gain his favor. Obvious player.

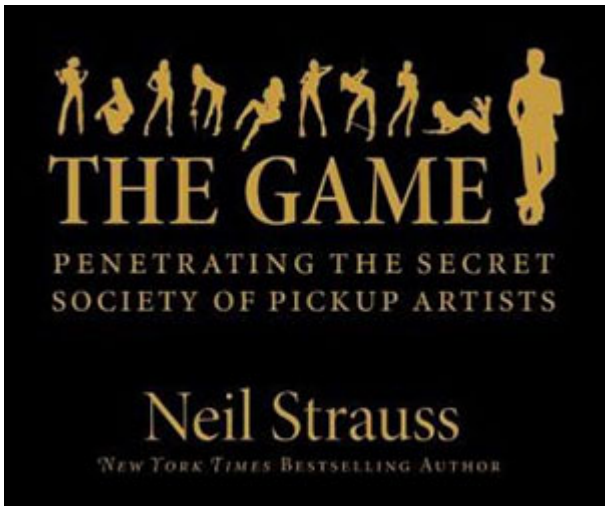
Bonus picture:

You see the ridiculously good looking girl on the left? That’s what Argentina has to offer—in the millions—every time you go out. But here she is a beauty queen and will get drooled on by at least a dozen guys a night. I can only imagine the size of her ego (shit, I would have a big head if I was relatively hotter than everyone else too).

If I was at the club that night and bombed with her, I could go home because there would be no other girls worthy at her level.



Happy Iranian New Year

March 20, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

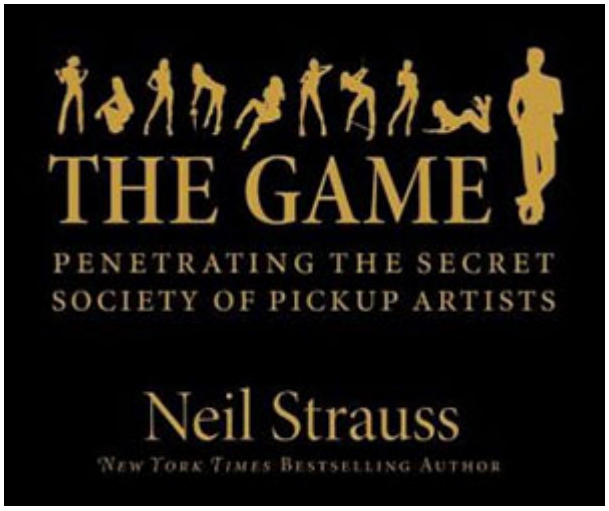
1. Tonight is the Happy Hour. Check upstairs of Marvin around 9pm for me and a tall white guy. We're expecting a surprise performance by Snow Patrol.

2. Couple new blogs to check out. The first is The Modern Savage, a pick-up blog, and the second is Bittersweet Amalgam, run by a one Angelo who lives in the DC area. His drawings are hilarious and over-the-top.

3. Yesterday was the first year of the Iranian calender. We celebrated by eating a gigantic stuffed fish. There is a set tradition where you have to lay out several items, each with their own meaning. You eat the goldfish alive when the festivities are over.

4. I leave you this Friday with a quote from an old book…

> The starting point of all achievement is DESIRE. Keep this constantly in mind. Weak desires bring weak results, just as a small amount of fire makes a small amount of heat. If you find yourself lacking in persistence, this weakness may be remedied by building a stronger fire under your desires.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

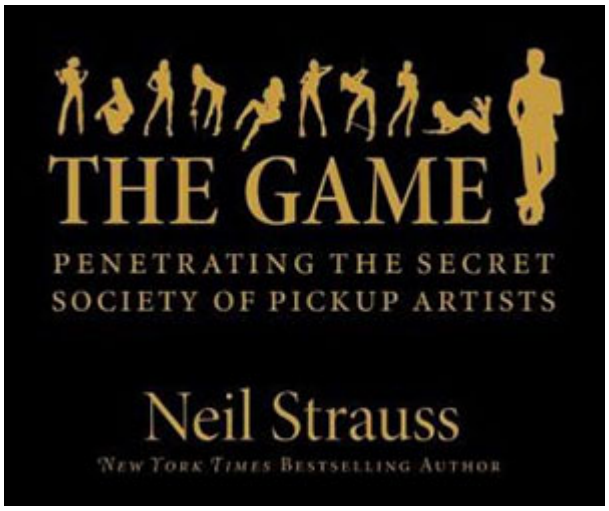
Taking Your Game International

March 21, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I wrote a guest post for The Seduction Chronicles called Taking Your Game International.

> 3. Approach in massive numbers. The big myth of traveling is that you will get more abroad than you do at home, but there are so many obstacles (no cell phone, no pad, no wingmen, language barrier, lack of venue knowledge, and so on), that the only way to make up for them is to approach a lot more than you normally do. With many girls closed off to having sex with a gringo who is only in town for a weekend, sometimes you need to keep going until you find a girl who doesn't mind and speaks your language. It takes a lot more energy than you are used to.

You can read it here.

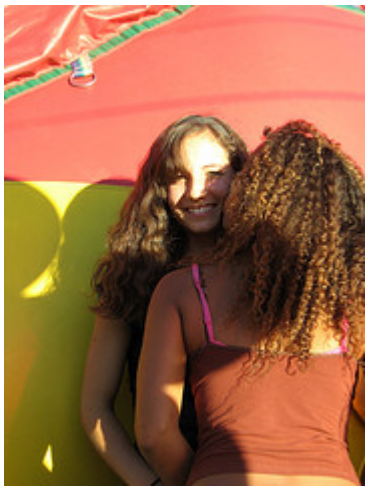


Introductions Between The Opposite Sex

March 23, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Since I've been back I noticed that every time I'm introduced to a girl the accepted move is to shake her hand. After cheek kissing a thousand girls in South America, I find our custom to be quite distant and unnatural. I wondered if this was only an American thing, so I contacted some people to see what the custom was for other countries.

Argentina: One cheek kiss
Brazil: One cheek kiss, but two in Rio de Janeiro
Chile: One cheek kiss
Czech: Handshake
England: Handshake
Greece: Two cheek kisses
India: You put your hands together and say "Namaste"
Iran: Absolutely no touching
Italy: Two cheek kisses
Netherlands: Handshake
Nigeria: Handshake
Russian: Confusing
Sweden: Handshake
Turkey: Two cheek kisses



[image] photo credit: ravenmaven

And then there is France. I'll let my French buddy Gregorie explain:

> It really depends on the region but it is basically a 2 to 4 cheeck kiss. Most common is two. Four in Paris suburbs or Britany (very stupid, it is a waste of time). Three in some areas but not very common. Bourgeois give only two, lower class three or four (Argentina Mendoza was one kiss…. that was kind of sexy.)
>
> Men usually shake hands, except for V. Good friends tend to cheek kiss but they have to be above 16 to do it. Family, cousins, and uncles kiss each other. When you are introduced to a girl if you are same age and under 30s you can kiss her > hello, after it is quite complex there is no rule at all.

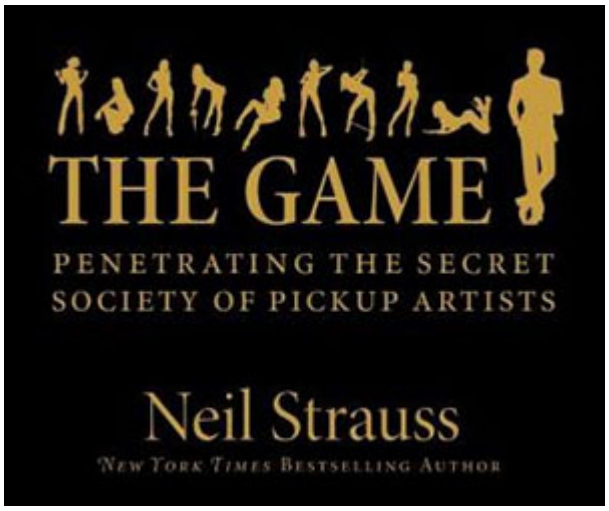
>
> It is science & the secret of french love.

I was more than ready to conclude with “Western countries are more distant in their introductions,” but I cannot make such a conclusion, though I do find it is ironic that this culture is perhaps the most germophobic in the world but we continue the practice of hand-germ exchange every chance we get. I’ve started to teach girls I meet about the Argentine introduction, which I find to be most agreeable, but I don’t think it’s catching on.



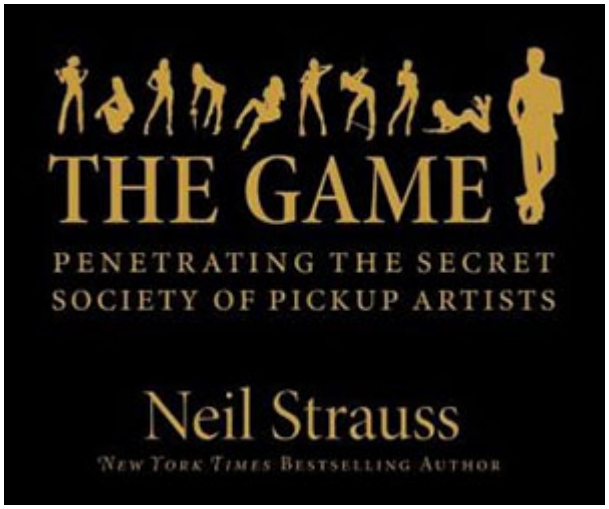
Black Guys Game

March 24, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There are two kinds of black guys: the urban / hip-hop kind that is heavy on the slang and mimics stylings they see in rap music videos, and college-educated black guys whose style is a mix of urban and suburban mall-strip culture. I'm not impressed with the game of the former.

Over 50% of the time, I notice their opener is "Hey slang identifier, you got a man?" If you are a single girl that has no information about this guy besides his appearance and common line, why would you say yes? He's giving you an out and the whole interaction that follows is usually him trying to convince the girl to put the man aside and give him a chance. Direct game does have its uses, but the boyfriend question puts you at a huge disadvantage as soon as you open your mouth. It would be like calling the cops and telling them which bank you are going to rob right before you rob it. Why make it harder for yourself?

I'm confident there is a whole generation of black men growing up that is used to the fact that 99% of all women have a boyfriend.



Getting Men To Commit

March 25, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A common question girls asks me is how to get a man they are dating to commit. When it comes to dating or relationships, this question is much harder than helping guys get laid. Casual sex is more like trying to find a funny t-shirt while commitment is shopping for a house. But I have two suggestions for girls:

1. Read The Art of Seduction. This is not a self-improvement book for those of you that freak out by that genre, but the stories and strategy in here is guaranteed to give you some ideas you can use. It shows you through historical examples how men (and women) have turned into mush with concepts that more or less still work today. Plus it's just a great book. For example, a chapter most girls I meet need to learn is Master The Art Of Insinuation:

> The way insinuation works is simple: disguised in a banal remark or encounter, a hint is dropped. It is about some emotional issue—a possible pleasure not yet attained, a lack of excitement in a person's life. The hint registers in the back of the target's mind, a subtle stab at his or her insecurities; its source is quickly forgotten. It is too subtle to be memorable at the time, and later, when it takes root and grows, it seems to have emerged naturally from the target's own mind, as if it was there all along. Insinuation lets you bypass people's natural resistance, for they seem to be listening only to what has originated in themselves. It is a language on its own, communicating directly with the unconscious. No seducer, no persuader, can hope to succeed without mastering the language and art of insinuation.

The only time girls insinuate these days is when they want to complain about something you aren't doing right.

2. Use jealousy. There is no emotion stronger than getting the feeling that a girl you like and have been breezy with is slipping through your grasp and about to be taken off the market. If that doesn't cause the man to act fast, at least temporarily, then it's time to accept that he will never be ready to commit with you.

Even though I know a girl is using jealousy, I can't just tell my brain to shut down the uncomfortable feelings that drive me to her even more. It's powerful, and deadly if used to your advantage. I've said this before but I'll say it again: if you are a guy with your eyes on a particular girl, letting her see you laugh with a girl prettier than her will do more to help your cause than any line or routine you can think of.

Player Or Poseur?

March 26, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If I was in Brazil at Club Help and saw these two on the dance floor I'd give him a wink and a nod for scoring a sexy prostitute at what I imagine would be a reasonable price, but this was taken in Washington DC.

The guy does not possess any obvious player qualities. In fact, he would be a good example of the anti-player: he's way out of shape, he has the sleeves of his stale stripped shirt rolled up to reveal what appears to be a calculator watch, and he makes zero attempt to enhance his look with something like creative facial hair. But there is something relaxing about his Chris Farley-like smirk.

The girl is obviously having fun. Judging by the way she is dressed and the care she put into her hair, she wants to continue that fun in the bedroom by engaging in sex. The question is with who. Does she seem like the type of girl that would let any overweight white guy put his meaty paw on her waist and his crotch on her ass? Ultimately, the answer lies with body language.

They're out on their third date. This man is a player.

THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Would You Bang This Behemoth Woman?

March 27, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Cassidy is a 6 feet 3 inch “model.”

And here’s a strangely erotic video of her arm wrestling a girl in her panties. She’s not as strong as I imagined. I’m sure she blamed her poor performance on having “too much leverage,” which is the reason I lose arm wrestling competitions to my shorter friends.

Several years ago I banged a 6 foot volleyball player. I had to give her clear instructions in bed because moving her was impossible. What a nightmare when one night she asked for a piggy-back ride. I prefer petite women because they are much easier to handle (and more importantly they make me look bigger), but I will have sex with just about any body type except morbidly obese.

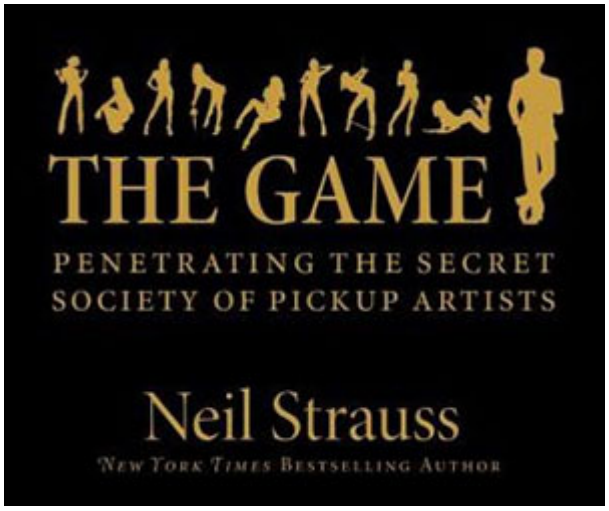
As for my answer, hell yeah I’d bang that. For the story alone.

Jane Goodall-Style Anthropology

March 29, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In response to Black Guys Game:

> Where to begin … Roosh kicks things off with the Jane Goodall-style anthropology of black men and approaches in the DC scene – there are two kinds of black men and over 50% of the time he observed one approach – "the Yo you got a man?" line. His experience and his blog. Let the fun begin.
>
> Roissy takes a shot at guessing about black women's preferences from years of experiences with them, their sociology and socialization in the black community and self esteem. He has gamed and fucked them so he must know them.
>
> John Smith at 9 hours 17 minutes cites a researcher linked to eugenics and the pioneer fund. I would say more but my genes and social community have not provided me with sufficient brain power to determine what Rushton means when he uses words and sentences. (Perhaps someone can summarize it for me)
>
> JP, VK and T bring the black man perspective and explain their game conquests and hash out the details to support their brother(s) in humanity and banging. They were born of black women and/or black men so they must know what they are talking about, right?
>
> I applaud the diversity of voices on the "game" here and confess that I like reading the social science that you guys put into your game. As an old married guy I can keep up with you crazy kids via the internets. Crazy what technology can do, in my day you had to wait for a letter by post or Life magazine article to get the story. But I digress.
>
> What was my point … oh yeah, I get a little nervous when generalizations turn to characteristics defined by race.
>
> There is a pattern to these blog posts that are informed by or characterize behavior by race. Invariably someone points to statistics to prove the causal connections (check), someone (their race is unimportant) makes general statements that label stigmatize and grossly generalize (check, check and check), someone gets called a racist (check) and someone blows up and starts it all over again while pointing out that someone of the particular ethnicity that is allegedly offended supports their reasoning/truth/experience and tells someone to fuck off. Wash. Rinse. Repeat. A time honored dance of racial misunderstandings. Every few cycles someone tries to set a new tone, but they are ignored.
>
> I am not saying that half-truths and generalizations can't be used in these discussion. I do it all the time myself. In this case, such statements are in service to points they cannot adequately support. In short, you can't get there from here.



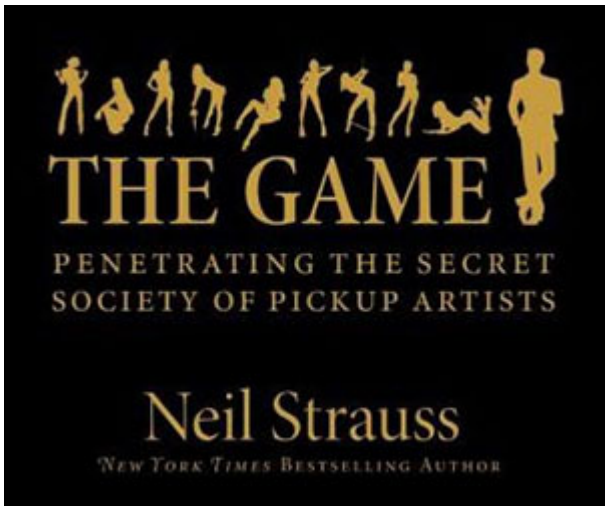
THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Putting Women On A Pedestal

March 30, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I remember when the act of getting laid used to be a big deal. I'd bang a girl and pat myself on the back like I just accomplished something special. My friends did the same thing. But then we got older and the more sex we got the less of a big deal it became. While I'm sure there are a lot of reasons why getting laid isn't a problem for us now, it's not a coincidence the more I put pussy on a pedestal, the less I got. Problem is it's hard to fake not caring about pussy. You still have to want it (you won't get something you don't want), but you must barely care if you don't get it.

I do think you have to go through that awkward stage where you care and try hard to get laid enough until it's not a big deal. Then, in a slow process, you start getting more with much less effort. So part of the secret is time, something you can't really teach or bypass. The rest is just hard work.



Why I Came Back Home From South America Earlier Than Planned

March 31, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Six weeks ago I wasn't completely honest when I gave reasons for why my trip to South America ran short. Something happened.

A couple months into the trip it became very obvious that I wasn't going to meet a "serious" girl. The language barrier and my one-city-every-four-days routine made it difficult to happen. There would often be physical attraction, but nothing that had enough substance to last. I thought that would change in Cordoba where the girls are extremely beautiful, but their attitude was quite different than what I have become accustomed to. Even there, nothing got past the physical.

By the time I got to Rio de Janeiro, I gave up any idea of meeting a girl that I would consider dating long-term. I hung out with some fun Australian guys I first met in Cordoba and we did our thing of going out and hitting on the locals. We'd drink and not really care besides getting some cheap thrills. But on my seventh day there, I met someone.

The only reason I approached her was because I swear she gave me a look. We talked and within just a few minutes she told me she liked me. Things moved fast—and not just physically. Next thing I know I'm checking out of my hostel to stay with her. We'd cook together, she'd show me around the city, and we'd come back into her studio apartment and have intimacy. During that time I wondered why it was so much harder to do this back home.

I had to do some serious thinking. If the end game is meeting a girl you consider a life partner—someone that you can maybe even love—then I made it. I'm there. Finally, after approaching a million girls, I'm satisfied. And I doubt it's a coincidence that she is one the most beautiful girls I've ever been with. She didn't want to come to the United States (I don't blame her), so I had to make a decision.

I'm a firm believer in taking risks and adapting to whatever situation you put yourself in. I do believe she is worth it, more than any other girl I met. So we decided to make a go of this. I came back to the States to tie up some loose ends and spend time with my family and friends, and I return back to Rio exactly one month from today. I'm tired of looking at just a photograph of her taped to my bedside. I'll be back to visit around Christmas.

The blog will continue of course, and maybe even get better as I can write more about how to have a fulfilling relationship. This just feels right.

Happy April Fools!

March 31, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Why I Came Back Home From South America Earlier Than Planned was an April Fools joke, obviously.

I also did a joke on Virgle Kent. On Sunday night a "cute brunette" made a post on Craigslist missed connections about our night out on Saturday:

> This was upstairs in the patio. I was watching you hoping you'd come talk to me.
>
> You=black man, very built, with beige jacket. You were hanging out with a very hairy man with long hair.
>
> Me=cute brunette with black dress. My friends were being anti-social. I'd love to touch those muscles!

I thought I'd have to enlist the help of a confederate to help spread the word but Roissy and Arjewtino both found it within a day and emailed him.

Part of VK's email to his missed connection:

> I'm betting that this is probably a hoax from one of my other friends or a group of spinsters I know that don't like me. I've got money riding on it being a set up. But yeah, I was the bald black guy with the hairy friend.

Kissing Makes Me Drowsy

April 1, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Not long ago I posted about getting approached by girls and gave an example of a girl who complimented me. A friend of mine wanted the whole story with juicy details so here it is.

One of my first night's out back in DC, I go out with three Russian guys to Tattoo, a "hip" bar that seems to be hit or miss depending on the night but definitely hit when it comes to your wallet. We were standing in a circle of power when a girl came up to us and asked if we were Greek. Eventually she started talking about my luxurious long hair and how I had Greek features.

I like meeting Greek girls because I'm half-Turkish, and the Greeks and Turks aren't the best of friends. I tell them that if my mom knew I was taking to them she'd kill me. Actually my mom has a lot of Greek friends and wouldn't care, but I like saying it.

The conversation was going very well for the first ten minutes, with some light touching. But then a guy in her group bought her and her friends a drink. She turned around to get the drink and didn't turn back. When a girl gives me the back, I don't wait for more than five seconds. I turned around and continued hanging out with my friends. We reformed the circle.

Twenty minutes later she came up to me and asked why I stopped talking to her. I said, "You turned around and you didn't look back, so I thought our conversation was over." We continued talking and I eventually "broke up" with her because of some random reason. Then she said, "Umm, I kinda have a boyfriend."

I asked her if she was happy and she said yes. Looking back that was a very stupid question to ask because if she was ready to say no then she wouldn't have even brought it up in the first place. But I was lazy and wanted to find out quickly if I should continue or not. Then I half-joked, "Yeah 'cause if I was a girl and happy with my guy I'd definitely talk to other guys that I'm attracted to." Eventually she went to the bathroom. It's at this time I noticed her friends watching me very very carefully, and I imagined how much farther I would be if her friends weren't around.

I re-approach her some time later. Her friends were spying and I didn't want to get cockblocked so I was more focused with being the fun, cool guy instead of trying to get somewhere, but she was really touchy-feely. I needed to isolate her. Half thinking out loud, I said, “How about you come with me to the dark corner over there?”

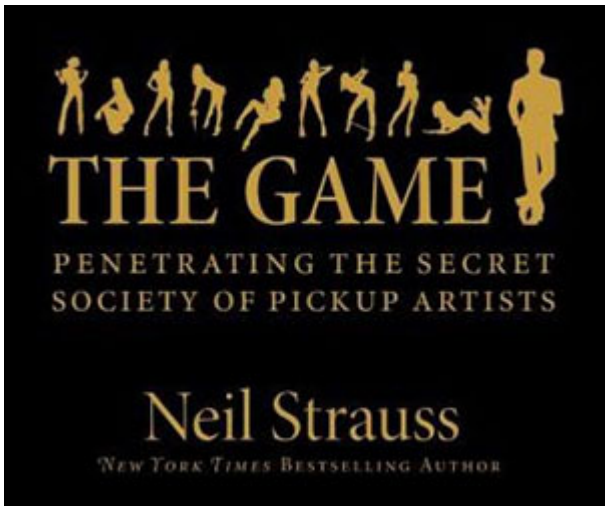
“Okay.”

Without hesitation, I grabbed her hand, led her to the bathroom hallway, and we started going at it. We were doing that for about five minutes, but then I noticed she stopped kissing me. You know how when you kiss for a while it puts you in that relaxed, drowsy state? My eyes were still closed and my lips were searching for hers. I open my eyes slowly and see her right next to one of her friends, who’s holding her arm. The friend looks at me and yells, “BUT SHE HAS A BOYFRIEND.” In no mental state for a good comeback, I smiled and said “Huh?” before wiping my mouth.

Her friends wouldn’t let her out of their sight after that, and I they actually snarled at me a couple times. I managed to get her phone number but with the boyfriend cloud, friends who I’m sure destroyed me, and the fact she was leaving town for a week, I knew my odds weren’t so good.

Most phone numbers go nowhere so it’s important to always push for the one night stand. It doesn’t matter how much she is into you, but if you don’t capitalize on that hot moment then it may pass forever. I didn’t have a chance with the cockblock A-team.

We’ve talked a few times but I haven’t been able to get her out since. It would have been a Greek flag.



The Three Best Cities In South America

April 2, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've been to 33 cities in every South American country except Colombia, Guyana, French Guinea, and Suriname. Even though I'm confident three of those four countries would never make the list, I may have to make an edit to this post some time in the future.

1. Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. The secret has been out for over fifty years. Yes, Rio has a very serious crime problem and the police won't go into many areas without armored vehicles and full SWAT protection, but if you're a guy looking for a sex vacation and you don't like Asian girls there is no other city in South America that touches your high odds of getting ass here. Pussy doesn't fall from the sky, as you might be thinking, but the native girls actually like gringos. Even the native guys like gringos. Go out every night, don't be a wallflower, and you will get to experience what I plan on experiencing again in the future.

If that hasn't sold you, how about the a gorgeous backdrop and beach weather nearly year round? Sure the water isn't sparkling blue, but you'll be busy on the Ipanema sand angling to get in with the girls in ridiculous bikinis laying next to you.

Low-End Budget: $100-120/day

2. Cordoba, Argentina. The Cordoba tourism agency is going to contact me any day now to thank me for single-handedly increasing tourism to this city by 1000%. I will never get tired of saying that Cordoba has the most beautiful girls in the world. And it's cheap. And the nightlife jumps. There are no fewer than 30 universities here so good luck meeting a girl over 22. The spinsters here don't even go out at night because the competition is beyond intense.

A downside of this place is the girls are pretty damn difficult—especially if you don't know Spanish—but I guarantee you will begging for them when you return home. Their beauty will spoil you until you die. I think I missed American girls for a quick minute until I snapped to my senses: I rather have difficult girls that are my type than easy girls I want to immediately dump after I have sex with them. This is the only place that I talked to 9's every time I went out, uninterrupted. There is no cockblock brigade in Argentina (or anywhere else in South America). I've been back to the States for two months and talked to a 9 once, and I had to compete with only FIFTEEN other guys who felt it was their do-or-die moment.

Low-End Budget: $50/day

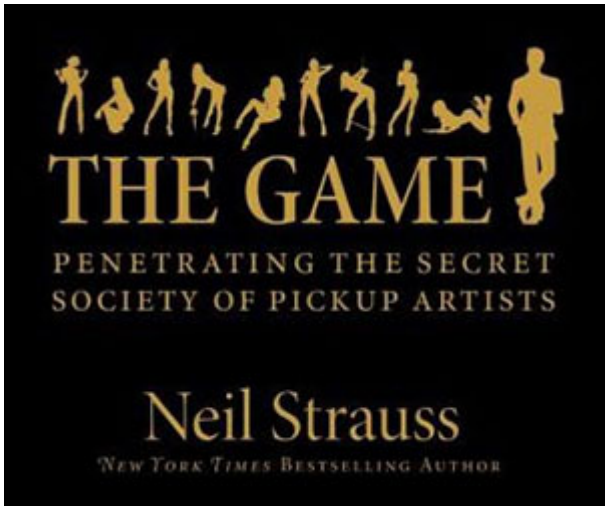
3. Merida, Venezuela. I traveled to Venezuela for a random 10 day vacation a couple years back, and Merida is still on my mind. This is like a Cordoba-lite with a large college population that loves to party. I still remember the bar El Hoya de Queque, perhaps the best bar in South America, where I got rejected by my first Venezuelan beauty (9+) who at the time was probably the most stunning girl I talked to. I remember how excited I was just because I had the chance to have a conversation with her.

The girls are not as hot as in Cordoba and there are less of them around (in Cordoba you walk outside and in two minutes you see more beautiful girls than a Thursday, Friday, and Saturday going out in Washington DC—no exaggeration), but Merida has a fantasy setting on the doorstep of the Andes mountains. There's a lot to do here like horseback riding, canyoning, nature tours, and riding up the tallest cable car in the world. Too bad for Merida that it's part of a country ruled by a dictator who is doing everything he can to kill the tourism industry. "Who needs gringos when we have this black stuff that is bound to run out some day!!"

Low-End Budget: $60/day

A few people have asked me about my future travel plans. Colombia is high on my list so I can claim to be a South America girl expert, but I've been eyeing Eastern Europe lately, and by eyeing I mean I'm asking guys how easy the girls are in Eastern Europe. Perhaps I'll visit Cordoba and Merida for a nostalgic return, but Rio is going to have to wait a bit until I get my money right, which is not going to happen as long as I stay addicted to Guitar Hero 3.

For more on South America, check out my South America travel guides.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Women Don’t Listen

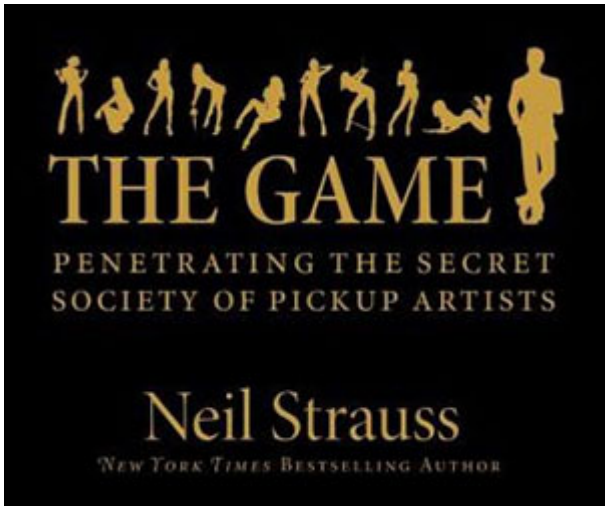
April 3, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My sister called me up with a game question. A guy she likes said he wanted to take her out on a certain night but did not set a time and place. The day came and she wanted to call him to see if they still were going out. First thing I told her was put down the phone.

> It’s his job to make plans so the worst thing you can do is encourage his breezy behavior by doing the work for him. Have a cut-off time, where if he calls you before you will agree to go out with him but if he calls him after you say you already make plans because you weren’t “sure” if you were still going out. This will let him know he has to be a little more firm in making plans.

She agreed with me and picked a reasonable cut-off time of 7PM. If she lets him call at any time then she is sending the message that she is a great backup plan. Note that this is a guy she likes and not just wants to have sex with, which in that case it wouldn’t matter.

He called after 7PM, and she agreed to go out with him anyway. It’s not a big deal but I think if you want a guy to take you more seriously it’s better to send the message that you are for a “limited time only” instead of “unlimited supplies!”



What To Do If She Has A Boyfriend

April 6, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Chasing a girl with a boyfriend used to be such an awesome challenge for me. I loved how I was penetrating something that I should not be able to. I pursued girls who had a boyfriend more than single ones, but I was young and immature then and don't really do that anymore. I have morals now.

There are girls with boyfriends you should chase, and those that you should not, such as girls who just got engaged or married. I don't even need to tell you this because chances are she won't even talk to you. She is still on cloud nine with commitment bliss and wouldn't consider cheating.

On the flip side are girls who are having trouble with their boyfriends. It's possible you won't need a strategy to deal with these girls because you may not even find out about the boyfriend until after you kissed, fingered, or banged her. With them all you need to do is stay aggressive and keep the sexual tension tight. The sex should happen unless something big changes in the relationship.

Then you have the murky middle, where she is not quite unhappy with the relationship but not happy either. Girls are different so one who is slightly unhappy might not cheat but one who is slightly happy might. How do you know if she is worth pursuing or not? Two key signs:

1. Length of time until the boyfriend drop. The longer amount of time until she mentions the boyfriend the better it is for you. If a girl is in a happy relationship, the boyfriend will be constantly popping in her mind like in a game of Duck Hunt. She will feel guilty talking with a charming, teaseful guy and will have to drop at some point that her boyfriend is an amazing guy who rocks her world. But if takes 15, 30, even 60 minutes for this to come up, consider her breakable. Bonus if she doesn't tell you at all and you learn through a third party.

2. Her level of engagement. It's possible she can have a boyfriend but still want to talk to other guys in the bar to keep things "exciting" at home. Maybe she wants to feel alive or still attractive. How can you separate her from a girl who is more open to cheating? The answer is how much she engages you, by doing things like keeping the conversation going, touching you (very very big), and seeking you out after a break in the conversation, either verbally or through eye contact. If you talk to her for ten minutes and she doesn't even ask you for your name and things feel like a one-sided interview, move on.

If it takes forever for the boyfriend drop to come and she's still sticking around you, then do what you normally do and at the minimum try for the kiss. Two things happen if you get your face close to her to feel for the kiss: either she turns away at the very last second or she says, "I can't… I have a boyfriend." You respond: "Oh that's fine with me." AGREE, AGREE, AGREE. Do not allow her to come up with objections in her mind. Then you try again in a few minutes.

Her: "I can't do anything." You: "We're not! I'm just hanging out." Keep going, keep pushing. If she doesn't walk away from you and get out of a situation where she might cheat, she wants to cheat. So you're just doing what she wants you to do… subconsciously anyway.

There's a myth going around that women are stronger than men, but I think they're just as weak as us. If she puts herself in a position to break, she will.

Every two weeks I send out Roosh's Game Tips Newsletter. If you liked this post then I think you will like the newsletters I send out. Sign up by putting your first name and email address in the form below.

First name:

Email:

Put Me On The List

Example Of A Real Alpha Male

April 7, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

First, watch this video. A girl decides to “prank” her boyfriend by smashing a metal baking pan on his head while he eats a crunchy cereal breakfast.

Cute Girlfriend Gives Good Head...ache

Now watch his revenge…

Guy Gets Revenge on Girlfriend for Headache

Eight years ago I’d watch that and think, “He went so overboard. Isn’t he scared of losing her?” That’s why I couldn’t get laid in a whorehouse back then, and why he has a girl that all men would get on.

A lot of guys have this fear of offending a girl or losing her, but not having that fear is what quality women are most attracted to. It’s hard for women to resist a man who doesn’t care as much as he should. Deep inside this girl is happy he got her back, and I guarantee you after her ass healed she fucked the hell out of him.

Now watch that first video again. Look what happens at the 27 second mark when he turns around to look at her. We didn’t even have to watch the second video to know he’s an alpha male.

Here’s a second bonus example of an alpha male:

Stop Cockblocking

April 8, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Me and VK were at the DC bar Marvin on a recent Friday night. If you're wondering why we go all the time when the average age is 30, I think it's because we're the only guys there who have game (besides Roissy). We do alright when talent shows up.

Three cute girls were checking us out and wouldn't stop. VK opened them and I joined in later to talk to the tallest one. Within a minute I felt something was wrong… it was like she had a rod shoved up her ass. Turns out she is going to law school. That was all I needed to know. I looked over her shoulder and saw nothing else, so it was this lawyer chick or nothing.

I'm working on her and it's going well. Five minutes into the conversation, in a pitiful attempt to compliment me which I'm sure took a lot of courage for her, she said, "You're not lame." She's touching me and playing with her hair. I was on track, and she's actually pretty good looking.

But then, out of nowhere, the third friend comes back from getting a drink. She looks at me, smiles, and just holds it. There it was. Instantly I think, "I want THIS one." I didn't care that I already put work into the lawyer chick because this other chick was just oozing warmth and I knew she was more my type. I take a break from the lawyer chick and started talking to the new girl. But we're not even talking, just looking at each other. It was on and I was very pleased.

After a minute the lawyer chick says "girl talk." The girls huddle up and start whispering to each other. I'm not worried—in fact I have to do guy talk often with my wingman to sort out situations. A minute later they are done and the lawyer chick says, "We're leaving." Then they walk away. 😡

In Brazil I got with a girl and two hours into it I find out that she actually came with a group of friends. The friends never interrupted once. But here you have girls running around treating their friends like little kids, babysitting them and making decisions about which guys guys they should get with. Unfortunately in this passive culture it's not common for one girl to stand up to her friend in the heat of the moment with other friends looking on. She passes on the desirable male to get approval so her already low self-esteem is not shattered.

I'm on board VK's Stop Blocking Movement and started an anti-cockblocking web site to assist the cause. From this point on every time I get blocked, I will go to the blocker and say, "I hope you get The Clap when you least expect it." I know no other way to solve this problem.

I saw the lawyer chick a week later at the same bar. I poked her, she looked, and then ignored me. She won.

Re: Stop Cockblocking

April 8, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Lawyerchick:

> Actually, here's what the "girl talk" sounded like:
>
> Me: "Are you ready to go someplace else? I don't see anyone that I'm all that interested in here, so I'm ready to move on. Unless you think you might like this guy?"
>
> My friend (girl 2): "Nah, he's OK, but I'm ready to go check out someplace else. Let's go!"
>
> So get over yourself.

You just proved every single point I made.. thanks.

You had your chance with me and blew it. Move aside with grace and dignity instead of denying your friend a chance.

The Perfect Woman

April 10, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is perfect woman week, brought to you by a guy who needs help identifying the girl with the huge breasts in this photo. Here's what four other fine bloggers before me wrote about this topic…

Roissy: The perfect woman does not treat love like a supplement to life.

VK: It's a warmth and tenderness that lets you know that no matter how strong you are, behind closed doors you're allowed to be weak in front of her and she won't hold it against you..

The Rawness: Instead of complementing the male gender, the female of the species now aims to duplicate the male gender, and she's lost a lot of what made her so special to begin with.

DC Hero: She'd have ageless beauty and the essence of youth. Lady in the street, freak in the sheets…

I can't top what these gentlemen wrote, but it got me thinking, and…

It kills me how random life is. A big chunk of me has nothing to do with me. It's just the environment I'm in, the events and people that cross my path. Wrong time, right place.

I was 23-years-old when I met a beautiful girl. I have no idea how I got her but I did, and I didn't have the "game" that I have now. She liked me for me, an eager guy out of college trying to relieve whatever inadequacy he thought he had.

She crushed me, but that was okay. But I did something that wasn't okay. I overcompensated, to the extreme. I had to get even better at the game so not only could I find a girl like that again, but I could keep her as well. You see there was an end goal of a happy relationship somewhere along the line, but it didn't work out like that. The game was the end itself. The perfect woman I thought I wanted slowly slipped away. She morphed into this monster of easy sex and unrealistic expectations. Sex on demand, no later than the third date, and if you're not exactly what I want then fuck off.

Part of me wishes I got swooped up by her. Maybe I would see women as more than just numbers and stories. Maybe I'd be in a happy relationship. Sure I'd be whipped and still working in some soulless job trying to pay a mortgage, but at least I'd have this woman who cared for me and loved me, and I would do the same to her. I think I was capable of that.

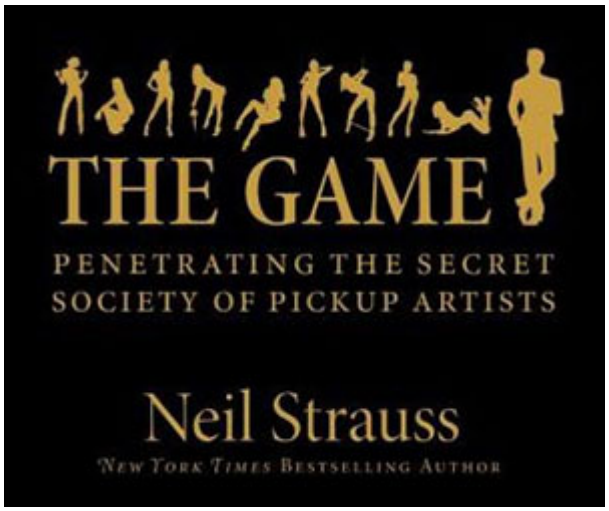
Instead I went down this rabbit hole… deeper and deeper… and darker. I see less than I used to. Too much experience, too used to easy attention and cheap thrills. You can't undo your experiences, especially when there is just too many of them, their naked bodies, their smell on your fingers as you drive home racking up another score… your fantasies of their moans and kisses as you smile yourself to sleep. The way they laugh at jokes you've said a hundred times before.

It gets worse every year, the happy relationship with my “perfect” girl just gets farther as I become more incapable, as I become “better” at getting sex that has meaning but really doesn’t. I don’t even notice differences in girls anymore. But I can’t stop. I notice most other guys can. Am I… a validation junkie? An attention whore? Like the girls I criticize?

When that girl dumped me I cried. I went to her place to get my stuff, hoping I could keep it going. But it was done. I left and parked in a gas station and sat there and cried like a little baby. If that happened today, I wouldn’t even give a shit, and I think that’s my problem. I’m a machine with flesh, no empathy or love… another night, another performance.

She wasn’t perfect, not even close. But she was. Anyone decent looking can be made perfect. You already know it takes very little effort. But I haven’t done it recently.

So… she’s gone. Experience killed the perfect woman. It means nothing to me.



City Paper Article On Me… Sort Of

April 13, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I was recently challenged by City Paper to a haiku contest against two semi-professionals. If you are wondering why, it's because I have attained rock star status on Yelp because of my nightclub reviews that are in haiku form.

> Contestant No. 3: Silver Spring sex and dating blogger Valizadeh, 28, writes haiku bar reviews under the name "Haiku review guy" on Yelp.com. Valizadeh has composed 23 haiku since he began posting on the user-generated site in 2006. His Tabard Inn haiku presents a paranoid vision of olde-tyme Washington—"Time warp into past/Presidents hanging on wall/checking out my date"—while his Local 16 review accesses the primitive jockeying of a modern U Street—"I am white person/Do you like my popped collar?/Damn, he has one, too."
>
> "I've been to lots of bars and clubs, but the bars that I'm going to now aren't striking me," says Valizadeh. "I have to be inspired to write a haiku. A place has to be really good or really bad." For now, he's found the bad: "I've popped into the Black Cat a couple times, and there are a lot of hipsters there, so I'm thinking about writing about that next."

Like the other contestants, I was given five topics to write haikus about. They were springtime, meat, cherry blossoms, Franklin Roosevelt, and haiku. Then, a haiku expert from some university judged the haikus. I bombed.

I won a single category but I think it was out of pity. In fact one of my haikus were called "childish" by the judge. I tried.

Read article: Sweet Seventeen: Local haikuists/syllabic gladiators/who will be victor?

The Lost Emails

April 13, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I noticed in the past two months I've been getting much less email than usual. Turns out that Yahoo is semi-blocking emails that originate from my host. I switched to using my Gmail account.

If you sent me in an email in the past two months and I didn't reply, it's because I didn't get it. Try resending.

Postscript: I took away the post ratings thing at the bottom of posts. It was mostly useless.

Treating Girls Like A Dick

April 14, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm disturbed and shocked that being such a dick still gets such a positive response in so many girls. Haven't they read The Game by now… and my blog?

I was talking to an tipsy 23-year-old and she was being stupid and getting on my nerves. I did not want to take the interaction further. I said, "Alright I'm done with you—you go now," and nudged her along. She let this gigantic smile, like I directly stimulated the part of her brain responsible for happiness, and she came back.

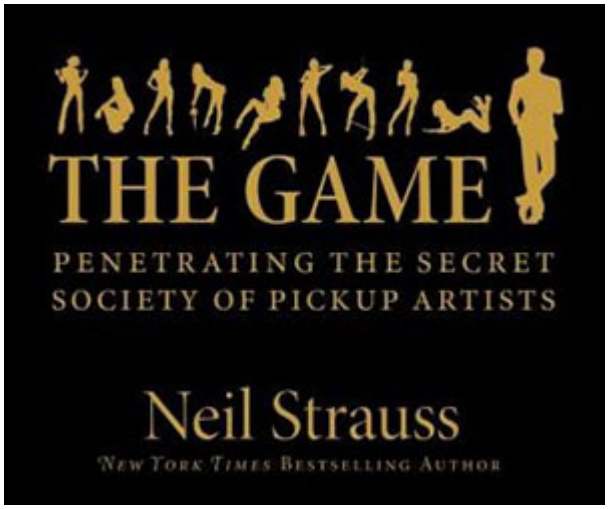
I treated her like a cheap hooker, added a bit of the Roosh charm every now and then, and she was stuck on me even though she lived with her boyfriend. I enjoyed telling her things like "What's wrong with you?" and "Why don't you give me a break and go flirt with some other guys?"

No, I didn't bang her, but I shouldn't have gotten as far as I did treating her the way I did when she had to go to Ikea the next day to buy a crappy living room set with her future husband.

If I were to estimate the percentage of girls who like it when a guy treats her poorly from time to time, it would be around 60%. But I like treating girls with respect. It is my hope that by treating girls like princesses, they will treat me like their prince.

…
…
…
…

Yeah right, whatever works, you cheap hooker.



Fallout From The Perfect Woman Post

April 15, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Ever since I made my post on The Perfect Woman, I've received almost a hundred emails from girls asking if I was serious about it and wrote from the heart.

I told them the truth, that yes, I did write that from the heart and that I'm trying to change. I asked them out on a date so they could be a part of the transformation.

As you can see from my public Google calendar, my schedule is pretty full for the next couple of weeks. I just tells girls to add themselves to the calendar to make my life easier. I'm hoping that the deep conversation I have with them over beers will continue me on the path of introspection and self-reevaluation.

Here's a couple of comments from that post…

Anonymous:

> The real question I have is – have we in our pursuit of 'game' added so much 'baggage' that even if we find the 'perfect woman' we won't know it or be in a position to take advantage of the situation.
>
> Do we have as much baggage as the 29 year old woman who is desperately trying to settle down and have a family?
>
> It's different – but it's baggage…

The only thing that makes me different from a spinster in the bar is my gender, and that it's more acceptable for me to be single much longer. Otherwise we are flip sides of the same coin, and probably deserve each other.

Winner of the most depressing comment goes to ovech:

> The lifestyle is no doubt fun but what have I really accomplished? Maybe guys like us are truly damaged goods and doomed to a life of notches and stories. Problem is time goes by pretty fast and tomorrow we might be old and alone with nothing but our notches to keep us company.

I don't see anything appealing about growing into old age alone.

Postscript: Click the names on the calendar to reveal a comment about that date.

How To Be A Master Blogger Like Me

April 16, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In the video below I give you an exclusive behind the scenes tutorial in how to construct an amazing blog post. It gets going around 30 seconds in. Even if you don’t blog, I think you will be blown away by my innovative approach. It turned out slightly not safe for work.

Jerking Off With Your Other Hand

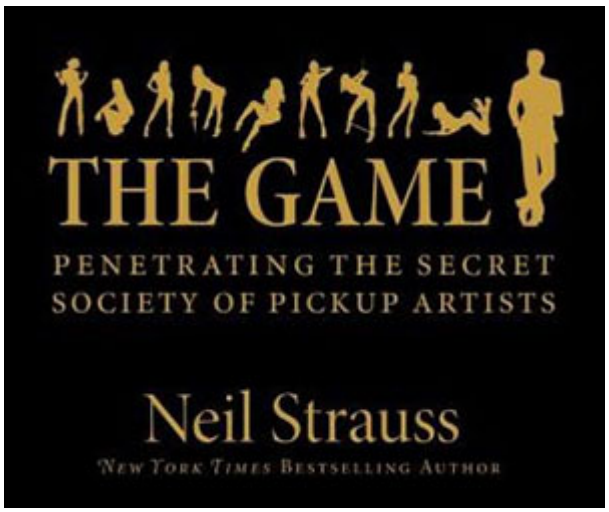
April 17, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previously: Video prelude to this post

Have you noticed that when you jerk off with your other hand, it feels like someone else is doing it?

When I was younger, I used to jerk off with my other hand so it would seem like an alien was abducting me. It was all fun and games until my mom caught me. I should not have told her the truth.

If women knew how to please me, I would not have to jerk off with my other hand.



Two Videos

April 19, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

First one: “A people’s history of American empire” narrated by a sad-sounding Viggo Mortensen. If you’re interested in this topic I’d take a look at books by Chalmers Johnson.

Second video, and one that strikes closer to home, is what happens when the internet goes out.

Going Forward… Into The Drain

April 20, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm bored with the blog. After three years and ~1,175 posts, I feel like I'm rehashing the same shit over and over again, and I don't want to do that thing where I would grab a news article and give my opinion about it. So I may blog a little bit less and try other things.

Also…

1. I think I want to go back to bartending part-time. I'm looking for a room to rent somewhere around Dupont / Adams Morgan / Columbia Heights. If you know anything in the $550-650/month range then please let me know. I don't care if it's a closet. The suburbs are sucking the life out of me.

2. I'm ready to start writing a book about my trip to South America. Maybe it will be something short and in the form of an e-book, but I definitely want to share what really happened down there (i.e. which flags I accumulated). And I don't want to take a year to do it, like I did with Bang. Speaking of Bang I came up with a genius slogan: More Lays In 60 Days. It rhymes.

3. I bought the Flip Ultra video camcorder. I'm going to play around it and see if I can do anything interesting with video besides amateur porn.

4. I'm going to move some of my straight-up "how to get laid" advice off the blog into my game newsletter, which I plan on sending more than once a month. Putting things I still use on a web page that is one Google click away is making my life more complicated and awkward than it needs to be.

Next month I'm off to Las Vegas for a week with midget porn lover Virgle Kent (below). Sure it's a cliche 20-something American vacation, but I have to see for myself what the fuss is about.

Here is the first post-South America Roosh photo. The anal beads I got from Brazil is making a strong impact to my style.

New Isn’t Always Better

April 21, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

What should the measure of success be for players? Number of notches? Quality of notches? Quantity / quality of sex?

The better my game, the less new notches I get. When you have sex with a growing number of girls, your rolodex gets large. Do I call the girl who is fun and knows how to do the anal move on me that I discovered in Brazil, or do I roll the dice in the field?

There is a large time / money / energy cost to new notches, and many times they are a total bust. I say build a pleasant stable and let that ride until the girls get tired of your shit. Or vice versa. Even lions don’t hunt all the time.

When Girls Say They Got Tested For STDs

April 23, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A line I've heard in bed more than any other is "I got tested." What every guy translates that to is "I'm 100% clean… put that shit in raw big boy." But let's re-evaluate this. The problem with "I got tested" is it leaves out three very important pieces of information:

1. When? When exactly did she get tested? I can say I got tested for HIV and technically that would be true, but that was over a year ago and the only reason I got tested was because girls kept saying I probably was infected and going to die soon and needed treatment. Girls get gynecological exams once a year at most, so it could have been many months since she was tested.

2. What? Specifically what STDs did she get tested for? Chances are it's just HPV (pap smear). The doctor will examine the cervix for signs of things like chlamydia (80% of girls with this have zero symptoms… long story on why I know this), but unless the girl is honest with the doctor by saying how many hundreds of partners she's had, there will be no specific tests. So "I got tested" could really mean "I got visually inspected." Speaking of inspection, it's interesting that guys will ask more questions about a cell phone they are about to buy than a girl they are about to have unprotected sex with.

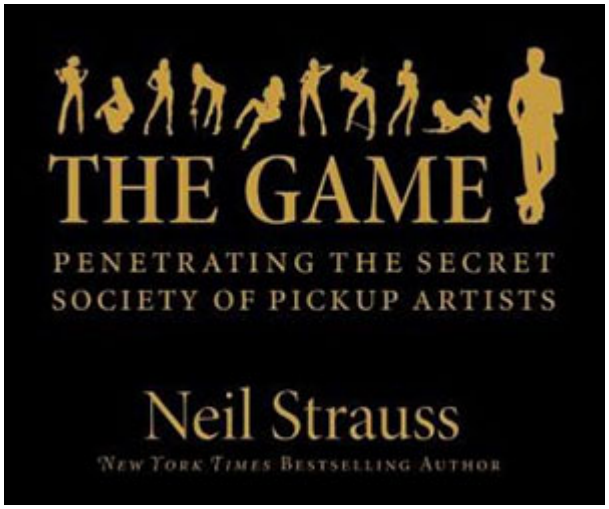
3. Who? Since getting "tested," how many sexual partners has she had? And out of those men, how many played "just the tip" while she was drunk and in no position to resist the raw snake? Having unprotected sex with another man after getting tested sort of nullifies the test, but a girl will never add this information. She shouldn't have to, and do you know why???

IT'S THE MAN'S RESPONSIBILITY WHERE HE PUTS HIS DICK IN. I don't buy that "she gave me" garbage. You gave it to yourself. You're an adult and you have very close to 100% control over what happens to you. Girl's omit information, but so do guys.

The next time a girl tells you she got tested, unless you are going to ask her these questions, which you won't unless you're seeing her for longer than four days, wrap your junk up. But if you have health insurance then dip your hot wick wherever you please! Unfortunately I don't have health insurance. 😕

P.S. I highly recommend Trustex brand condoms. Here's how they look like:

In case you can't see the text, it says EXTRA LARGE. I'm not saying I'm like a can of Pepsi, but these pleasantly thin condoms do provide a comfortable fit. It's time to order another month's supply (box of 100).



Man, Fuck DC

April 24, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Thursday night. Dead. Stupid, ugly, humorless, boring, frigid bitches everywhere. Not a single girl I like in four hours. I don't believe I'm still here. For five people. But because I didn't have a plan, because I didn't get my shit together, I'm stuck here for god knows how much longer. I don't know what's worse, being stuck in a job you hate or a place you're sick of. I'll be on a plane by November, December. I pray I don't come back.

Sweet Alizee

April 26, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I never get tired of Alizee compilations featuring her multicultural ass and flawless face. I think the song is about her wanting to be a producer, but who cares really.

I'd jerk off to this if porn didn't desensitize me to where I need to see penetration to get aroused.

Postscript: Here's Round 2, singing in English. Like the previous clip, click over to YouTube and hit "watch in high quality" for better.. sound.

Best Email I've Ever Received

April 27, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

From a girl in Canada..

> So I gotta say….since I first emailed you, I've been perusing your blog. If you are in person anything like what you make yourself out to be on your page, you have become somewhat mythical to me.
>
> I know no one in real life that actually has the attitude towards women and sex that you seem to. No one that actually lives and breathes as the seeming horndog Casanova that you come off as. To me, you are the movie character I watch but would never meet in my day to day. You are the mystery guy some whiny chick writes in to Cosmo to whine about. You are the rock star persona that every sad-ass frontman-wannabe loser on some ridiculous reality show wishes he was but will never, ever come close to.
>
> But I have to wonder – could you possibly be all that and still be real?

Flattery will get this girl everywhere even if it would be a one night sex adventure to remember, but this wouldn't work on girls. They are used to it to the tune of a million daily direct and indirect sex offerings, whether they are pretty or not.

I consider her email fun flirting and something I'd positively respond to, so why do American girls serve up this cocky banter bullshit to "flirt" with me and my friends? I don't know, but one thing I learned a long time ago is if you keep doing something that doesn't work, STOP DOING IT.

Here is another email I got from a girl.

> The last time I wrote to you I told you that I was crazy about this guy, I was super super super nice to him and in return he didn't treat me very well. I asked you what I should do and you said that I should leave him because he was just going to sleep with me once and then never talk to me again. Well, after 3 months of dating I did sleep with him (he was dating other women at the time, I wasn't). This all happened last summer.
>
> A few months later he fell in love with me and stopped dating other women, I was sooo happy. We're so great together, always laughing and joking around-I'm a really easy going gal and I worked really hard to make him feel cared for/loved. I worked even harder to earn his trust and to let him know know I'd never hurt him. Anyways, we were together for 11 months and then I asked him if he'd ever marry me. He told me he doesnt believe in marriage and didn't want it but that he did want me to move in with him.
>
> Well, I'm a traditional kind of gal…I don't believe in living with someone unless you're married (plus my family is very traditional as well). So, I told him that if he doesn't want what I want then we should go our seperate ways, because I do > want to get married. It’s frustrating!!! Anyways, we’ve gone our seperate ways, which is sad because we were so great together.

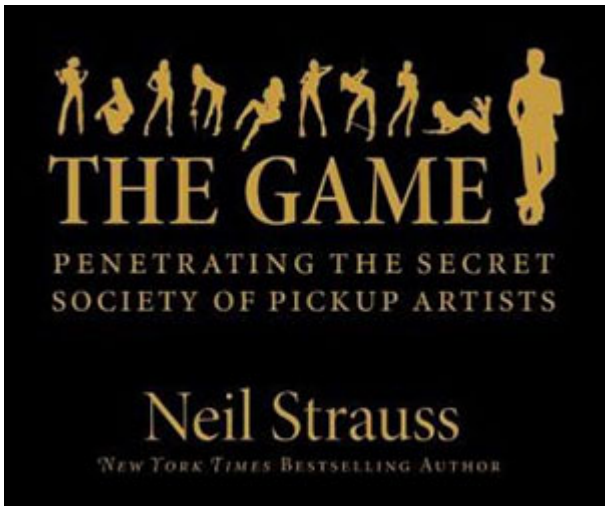
>
> But what’s a gal to do? I mean, I put in sooo much work just to keep him happy and in return I didn’t ask for much, but it didn’t work. I mean, shouldn’t he want to marry me just so he doesnt lose me? I told him that I’m going to start dating other men, I don’t care to date anyone else BUT I hoping that it gets a reaction out of him and if it doesnt then maybe I’ll meet a nice guy who does want to get married.
>
> A part of me thinks that I should give in and just move in with him because it feels right and he and I were so happy together. BUT another part of me is scared…I think he might leave me because he doesn’t want to marry me (sometimes I think that he doesn’t even know what he wants or has no clue what he has) and then I think I’ll have wasted precious years trying to find a guy that does want to get married.
>
> OK, that’s enough venting for now…
>
> So what do you think, is this guy ever going to marry me or should I move on? Is there anything I could do to make him want to marry me?

My first instinct is to say it doesn’t matter what you do, he will not marry you. But I don’t think that is the advice she wants to hear.



How To Pick Up Girls For Real

April 29, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I can't tell you how important not giving a shit is. I never met a successful player who cared. The only problem is it's hard to fake.

Never, ever covet another guy's girl. You have no idea what he had to go through to get or not get what he is getting.

If you don't have a method to screen girls, you're wasting your time.

They're always more interesting and beautiful before sex. Fantasizing about her before sex will do you no good.

Ice cream dates are cute and sometimes fun, but if you're going for speed, always get drinks. Just one drink increases the chance of getting laid by at least 50%. Alcohol is sex fuel, whether you like it or not.

Approaching is just one way to get laid, but the one where all you need is the clothes on your back. Always keep your eyes and ears open.

If you can't close, you're an entertainer.

You're not living up to your potential. If you are not approaching at least ten girls a week, you never will.

There's a girl you like in the bar. What's your line? If you don't have one then get one.

Don't go out if you're in a bad mood. You're wasting your time and the girl's.

You should never compliment a girl, until that time your brain tells you that complimenting her will you in her pants faster. It may take a while for that to happen.

The better you get, the less new notches you get. Your rolodex becomes huge. Sex on demand is all it's cracked up to be.

If you want average, plain girls, then fit in and go along with current hot trends.

You should be able to talk for hours without stopping. If a crowd wouldn't form, you're not interesting. There's ways to become interesting, but it's probably not by what you're doing now.

You don't need a car, a job, a place, or money to fuck above-average girls. I'm fascinated that some girls have a type that can be described as unemployed but interesting bum.

If there is a possibility you are meeting up with a chick, take two condoms. If not, take one. If you leave your house and forgot a condom, turn back.

There is something you need to fix if there is a girl you are very attracted to but your feet don't start moving in her direction.

There has to be a moment in the interaction where you think you might lose her, and vice versa. Not caring if things go wrong is attractive.

It's easier to peel a banana from the bottom than the top.

You have up to a week before you things will go stale. After that it’s probably done.

If you see a guy with a hot girl, it wouldn’t hurt to watch him for a couple seconds. You may notice something.

Be like the soap opera. Master the art of drama and girls will keep tuning in.

Anger is either a huge turn-off or strong aphrodisiac, depending on when and how you show it.

Some girls decide within 3 seconds if she wants to have sex with you. And it’s not only based on your looks. Your stories, experiences, and attitude are broadcasted (or not) as you move through the world.

You must have standards. They can be low but there has be situations where you say, “No I’m not doing it.” In the long run being selective rewards you with more.

You don’t have to dance if you don’t want to, but it sure makes things move a lot faster.

I generally don’t take pictures of girls I like before I get them. I think it sends the wrong message.

If every girl liked the type of guys seen in GQ and Details, the guys you are trying to emulate, I would never get laid.

Once a girl gives up hope that you will get into a relationship with her, she’ll let you fuck her without having to put in any effort.

You’re only as good as your last approach.

Some nights girls throw themselves at you, while other nights you can’t get a beast to give you eye contact. Not everything can be logically explained. Consistency is the hardest part of game.

It’s a pretty good sign when a girl asks you to take her number, but it doesn’t mean you’re guaranteed to get anything. There are no guarantees in pick-up, and you’ll be surprised at the girls who do come through.

Always let a girl ask you for your name first.

Your goal should always be at least a make-out, and never the number.

Being a risk-taker or adventurer seems to make up for lack of money or status.

If I’m lazy I like to wait for girls to give me eye contact before approaching. I usually go home empty handed when I’m lazy.

Her friends absolutely hate you, and will do everything in their power, during and after the pick up, to make sure you don’t get it. Having a cool wingman is the only thing that helps.

Girls say I have nice hair, but I wash it once a week… with conditioner. I don’t remember the last time I used shampoo. If a girl likes you and isn’t sure why, she’ll rationalize all sorts of amusing bullshit.

Your game will never stop changing. I remember when I used to grind on girls and dance more than I talked, when I used to pick up girls in clubs and fail miserably in bars. When your game changes, so should your venue selection, or your results will go down.

Don’t jerk off before you go out.

The best way to get her to stop is to gently grab her forearm.

The less educated she is, the more direct you can be. The more educated you are, the harder it is to believe that game works.

I don’t know if I give girls orgasms or not because I never ask. The more I care, the less likely there will be a repeat.

You should have a staple of quick one-liners that make most girls laugh. If you don’t have tested material then you’re just going by luck.

It’s easier to pick up when you are the exotic one. If you look around and all the guys look like you, you might want to try somewhere else.

Some women don’t know how to flirt, so when they insult you or give you advice they are trying to show affection. It’s up to you whether you find that acceptable.

Witty girls who like the back-and-forth banter get old really fast. Sexy and feminine girls never get old.

You’ll bounce back if you care enough.

You may naturally evolve to the point where the more interest you show in a girl, the more she likes you, even though before she’d run away.

Sometimes the best way to get into a girl’s place is to say nothing and just follow her in.

You should have a plan for the most frequent situations, whether it’s approaching, comebacks to common questions, asking girls on dates, getting into the bedroom, and so on. Already know what you’re going to do before you do it.

If you’re running out of things to say, either hang out with a player or read a book.

It’s a myth to think of a certain girl as “end game.” You just age, get tired, and pick one.

I regret I didn’t try harder to get more naked pictures and video. You won’t know unless you ask.

There will be some really bad days, where nothing seems to go right and you forget things you mastered before. It’s okay to beat yourself up about it every now and then.

No guy gets their dream girl, unfortunately. How can she be your dream if you can get her?

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

My Life Is A Joke

May 1, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

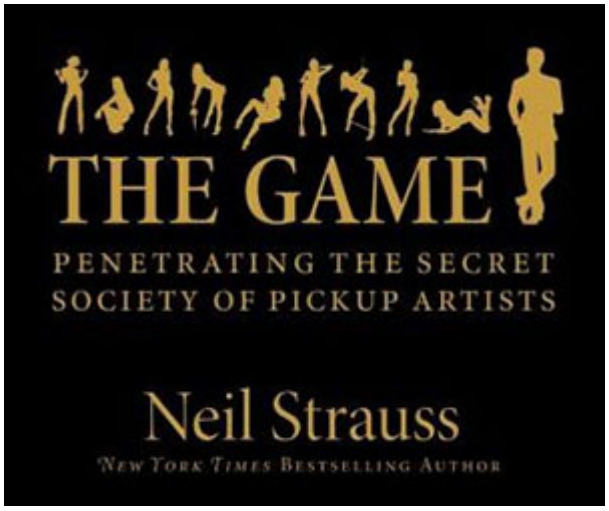
On the weekends the bus ends at 2:30am but I don't get to the metro (subway) station until 3:30. It's an expensive $11 cab ride home. So I hook up my bike on the front of the bus when I head out, lock it up at the metro station, go out and do my thing, then hop on the bike on the way back for the three mile ride home. Even though I stay on the sidewalk it's stupid dangerous and I get yelled at by drunk Mexicans from their cars who mock me and my late-night mode of transportation. I raise my fist and yell back, "Fuck you I used to be a scientist!!" By the time I get home at 4am I'm drenched in sweat and have to stand in front of a fan for 10 minutes before I can go to sleep.

I was out where this older woman was gawking at me. She makes her move while I was eating delicious strawberry cupcakes. The same night she takes me out to drinks and a light meal and I reach in my pocket and slide the lubricated condom around the wrapper getting ready for the only thing I'm really good at in life. Towards the end of the night when it's time to bang she says, "I really like you and I think we should wait to build something. We'll email each other every day until I come back in three weeks."

I got a number of a young, pretty Italian girl. I called her and for some reason she picked up. I don't remember the last time a girl picked up the phone when I first called. SHE WAS NOT SUPPOSED TO PICK UP. I completely blanked. The hamster in my brain just shrugged. One second, two seconds of silence. Three seconds!! Eternity! Out of anything in the world I could have said, it ended it being, "Oh girls don't usually pick up the phone so I was about to leave a message." My wall has a hole.

I had an interview of sorts for a slave labor freelance writing gig. I begged the guy for an afternoon appointment but he preferred 11am, which meant I had to wake up at 8:30 to eat and get ready for the 90 minute commute. The night before I couldn't go to sleep until 5am. I set two alarms but must have cut them both off while in a sleepwalking state because when I wake up the clock says 10am. I emailed the guy, "Sorry I didn't come through," then I went back to sleep and got up at my normal time of noon.

I wonder if I'll ever reminisce about these days when I'm filthy rich and hand feeding my perfect assed Brazilian bride chocolates wrapped in gold foil.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

100% Bangable

May 4, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have to clarify some things about me that have been going around in this paparazzi post. Especially this photo..

First the 100% Huggable Care Bear shirt. I don't believe that simply advertising myself as huggable (as opposed to, say, well-endowed or extremely wealthy) gets me an unlimited supply of poon. I will continue wearing it even though there is yellow stainage in the arm pit area.

Second, the floral pink umbrella. In Rio during Carnival I accidentally stole a girl's potted plant costume hat. Here's the hat…

The next day it was raining so I needed an umbrella. What's cool about most cities in South America is that if it starts raining all these umbrella salesmen come out of the woodwork to sell you umbrellas (duh) and trash bag ponchos. I bought one in Rio that matched both the hat and the festivities as well, and not because of anything potentially related to a deep deep latent homosexuality.

It's unfortunate that the Care Bear shirt matches ravishingly with my pink umbrella, but it's more unfortunate that this town is so starchy that people stared and made low volume disparaging comments. Yeah but they're too scared to say it to MY FACE… except for this one guy but he was pretty big so I pretended not to hear.

Postscript: Funny, when I grabbed the photo from pervert meathead's blog, the filename was gayhairy.jpg.

What Is Life Experience?

May 6, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Why do young Americans try to prove that they are more mature than they are? I'm talking about the type that will not hesitate to tell you situations they've been in that made them grow "faster" than their peers.

I had a coworker who would always say he's worked since 16. Or this girl would always tell me she's lived abroad and is "different" than girls her age, and another who kept bringing up the painful child divorce and how she had to go to school and work at the same time (the horror!). With all that experience I'm surprised they missed visits to countries where 10-year-olds work on the street for food while living in garbage bag tents next to the bus station. I think in that case they'd find their experience to be pretty damn timid.

I've done a couple interesting things but it's never crossed my mind to use that as proof of my value as a person. Your past doesn't speak for you—you speak for you. Speaking up your past is the fastest way to get labeled as a "douche" if you're a guy and a "nerd" or "drama queen" if you're a girl. It's like that guy who puts his BMW key chain on the bar in a lame attempt to get attention from females.

In the end there is no substitute for the number of days you've lived, whether you spent that "living" abroad in some other country during college or not. There's the claim of experience and maturity and then there's who you are. One you can lie about, the other you can't.

The Beaches Of Uruguay

May 7, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My newest exciting travel article is on the beach cities of Punta del Este and Punta del Diablo in Uruguay. I'll guess you've never heard of Uruguay so this is your chance to get to know mini-Argentina.

> The nightlife in Punta is extremely expensive and hard to deal with. Mobs of rich men and their model girlfriends (still with oversized glasses) swarm the entrances to famous clubs such as Crobar and Tequila in the "La Barra" club district a few miles away, accessible by taxi or all-night bus. You're not getting in unless you show up way early, know someone, or are willing to pay a painful cover/bribe. So it's not surprising that most people go to La Barra but not to club, and instead hang out next to their cars and drink on the streets. Either way this scene combines the worst of what you'd expect from a "hot" nightlife zone…

Punta del Diablo gets kinder words. You can read the whole thing here.

For more on Uruguay, check out my Uruguay travel guide.

When Your Jokes Are Unacceptable

May 8, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A few European embassies invited me and my friends for an open house on Saturday, and by invite I mean I saw a flyer somewhere. Our last embassy visit was Hungary and its 100-deep line of people waiting for a free ladle of goulash (it had meat). I waited patiently with my muscle freak sidekick, and the conversation got on dreadlocks. I made the comment that it's interesting to see blonde Europeans with dreadlocks, since it puts their fine hair in an unnatural state not achievable without wax. Then he says, "Eww, dreadlocks are grimy and just dirty." Right behind us was a woman with grimy dreadlocks down to her ass.

We kept running into the same people at different embassies. Early on I noticed an Asian woman whose upper body and face was the result of severe burns. You feel real sympathy for a few seconds and then you get on with your life. Me, muscle freak, and another guy was feasting on our goulash where, for a reason I forget, muscle freak shouts, "It's not like you are deformed or anything." At that very moment, the Asian woman walks behind us with her friends. She seemed like the type that already hated black men.

Outside waiting for the shuttle bus, muscle freak was joking about being handicapped. He then simulated a limp, one that was so good I accused him of practicing in his bedroom. As soon as he was done, a woman older than 75-years-old with a limp and a cane walked by.

As for what happened in these three situations, nothing. If you're big and black, you can pretty much do whatever you want. It's almost like a super power.

Mansformation

May 10, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The Seduction Bible is throwing a weekend retreat / seminar in the Dominican Republic this summer.

> Mike and I believe that too much focus has been placed on becoming a pickup artist, and not enough focus has been placed on becoming the kind of man who naturally attracts women. We know that changing your life has to happen from the inside out. The only way to truly be happy and successful is to be "your best self."

You can read about it here.

This is a nice change from the typical $1500 weekend "workshops" where you pay to watch some guy and his friends try to pick up girls in bars while they "push you into sets."

In Cordoba I was thinking of throwing a weekend nightlife tour where you'd pay me to take you to the most crowded (annoying) clubs to drink and get brutally rejected by beautiful Argentine girls. When I go back I'll see if there's any demand for that.

Also, I did a guest post this weekend at TSB… When A Girl Picks Up The Phone.

The Big Leagues

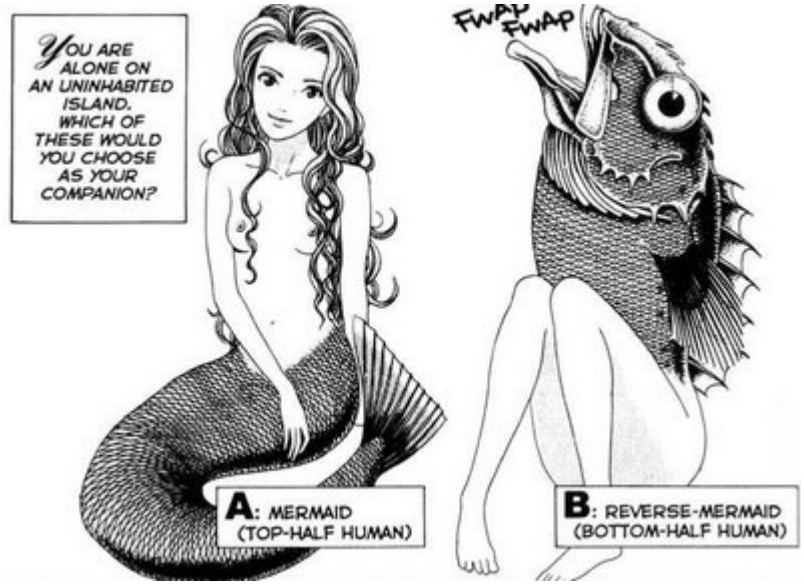
May 11, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here is a video I produced starring me, my little brother, and his school buddy. Safe for work…

Extreme Big League Competition from Roosh V on Vimeo.

Hmmm

May 12, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link



Postscript: It's time to bring some reason into the discussion..

Just because the mermaid has a mouth doesn't mean she is going to let you put something in it. Chance are though the seduction will be easy like in the tom hanks movie and you will get a blowjob here or there. But I don't think it will be blowjobs on demand like most men are imagining. How about if she doesn't have blowjob skill?

For the reverse mermaid, it is true that you have vagina and anus and since it's controlled by a fish brain you can have access to it all you want through rape or whatever. But keep in mind when you have sex you have to hold onto her scaly skin. And she probably will smell like fish. You wouldn't want to hit that everyday… though from the back maybe it's easier.

The key point no one mentioned is that you will get very lonely. Assuming the mermaid speaks your language, you can keep yourself busy with her and maybe even develop something serious.

I pick A.

Worst Email I've Ever Received

May 13, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previously: Best Email I've Ever Received.

I've been hanging out at Lucky Bar on Thursdays lately because of their budget $2 mixed drink happy hour. I thought it would be a good place to invite this girl who initially emailed me to say she thought my blog was funny. She didn't show up, but a few days after she sent me this email..

> hey new friend. so i just moved and have been sans internet for the past week and it looks like i missed out on a super sweet happy hour special, and an opportunity for you to make a sorry attempt at getting into my pants. well if you and your posse are down for a do-over, i'll see if i can make room for you this thursday.

I know she is just trying to be funny, but how can any self-respecting alpha reply to this email? Any type of reply would be admitting that yes, I indeed would have tried to make a sorry attempt to get into her pants. But that may not have been the case. A week before I got this email…

> were you at lucky bar tonight….? I thought i saw a greasy haired fellow who looked like you.

She was just trying to be funny too, but that kind of makes me wonder how this type of "game" gets out there. It would me like writing, "Hey I saw your fine slutty ass last night at the bar but didn't get a chance to get up on that booty heh."

I'm not saying these two girls want to bang me, but what good does this type of tone accomplish? Am I laughing?

(I am definitely not smiling or laughing.)

Now here are emails from two different girls in Brazil that made me smile.

> hahahahahaha.i loved the video!!!! i can see how busy you are! hehe and..

> Here the summer is over… which doesn't mean absolutely nothing!! It's still sunny and hot :-) Tomorrow I'll have an açai for you, ok?

Come on, it's not that hard.

Nightclub Bottle Service

May 15, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Steve sent me an excellent link called Bottle Service: America's Nightlife Nightmare

> In the 2000's we have seen a corporatization of nightclubs. Now when you go to a nighclub everyone is some kind of corporate jerkoff. Interesting people are no longer found in Nightclubs. The artists, writers, intellectuals, underground DJ's etc have been effectively priced out of the nightclub with bottle service. The only people that can afford it are the Investment bankers, real estate types, and Celebs (and of course, underworld figures). That is why when you walk into a club you see so many striped shirts that you think you are seeing some kind of 3-D optical illusion. The funny thing is that these are the type of guys who would have never gotten into a club in the old days (nights) when you were picked out because of how you looked, dressed, if you had connections, or by reputation. So today, clubs are full of people that normally would have been standing in line in nights gone by.

Go read the whole thing.

I was daydreaming the other week about what I would do if I pulled $20,000 a month. I fantasized about going to the hottest DC club of the moment and dropping a grand on two bottles of Grey Goose. I'd invite my friends and we'd drink and one of these glamorous DC girls would come by my table and flirt with me and I'd pour her a super strong one. Then maybe I'd get laid after taking her out to dinner and she may even return my calls for a second performance and a meaningful relationship. It would be all be so real and beautiful.

But you know what? I couldn't look at my face in the mirror if I had a cost per notch in the four digits. Shit, even three digits. My cost per notch this year is… I swear to God… under twenty bucks. When you know the real value of pussy it makes absolutely no sense to overpay. It's like taking your car to the dealership for repairs.

If I was rich the only different thing I'd do is step up from rail vodka to Absolut. Like anyone can tell the difference between expensive vodkas once they're mixed with juice anyway.

Argentine Girls Are Weird

May 17, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I just got a friend request on Facebook from a girl in Argentina I didn't recognize. It took me a couple minutes to figure out who it was.

In December I hit on this Argentine girl in a Buenos Aires club for a couple hours. We exchanged emails midway through but later on she disappeared on me when I went to get a drink. I didn't email her obviously. Turns out she added my email to her address book, never emailed me, but used the "friend friender" to beef up her new Facebook page. Whatever… accept.

After five months of reflection I'm ready for a round two with the Argentines.

Shoulda banged on that bed. I'm a disgrace.

For more on Argentina, check out my Argentina travel guide.

Bike Ride Home

May 18, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Many of you expressed interest a couple weeks ago in my 4AM bike rides home so I made a video about it. It's just an honest look into a grown man riding his bike after a night of drinking.

What Happens If I Don't Pick Up On A Friday Night from Roosh V on Vimeo.

Are You A Player?

May 19, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Introducing the Are You A Player Quiz, with 21 questions that rate your game. Each question has an answer worth two points and usually one with one point. I also put in an easter egg question to make sure you are paying attention.

Your results will put you in one of four categories. To achieve the top category, you have to get pretty much everything right. At the end of the quiz I explain the correct answers. About 200 guys have taken the quiz so far (I announced it on the newsletter) and only four of them have achieved the top player rating. Good luck…

I am a man and would like to find out if I'm a player by taking this internet quiz, since I don't already know.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

A Taxi Driver From El Salvador

May 22, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I went out to Fly recently for a birthday party, ironically on the day I criticized the idea of bottle service. If you don't live in DC, Fly is one of those generic new clubs that push Grey Goose and orange juice behind velvet ropes. But I have to give the owners credit: the lounge has a cool airplane theme with very attractive flight attendant wait staff. The DJ was taking the crowd through a journey of 90's hip hop and the bathroom was stocked with thick paper towels.

It's all nice and good until you get to the patrons. Three quarters guys giving way too much power to the few girls, most of him were average at best. The hottest ones were dancing on couches with their hands on the fuselage shaking their asses for the men and their fresh barber cuts in the economy section. I noticed everyone is still taking cues from US Weekly and MTV on how to dress, look, and act, and other than my wingman there was no one I wanted to talk to. There wasn't a single girl there who was worth my opener, something that takes motivation and follow through.

One woman pulled me aside and asked if I was a soccer player. I went along and we talked for a couple minutes, but even in the dim lightning I could tell she wasn't a day younger than 35. There was nothing wrong with her, but come on. I'm in my prime I shouldn't have to converse with that. She should just grab my hand and lead me to the bathroom and be done with it. During the day time when the advantage is out of her favor I wouldn't even notice her existence, but here she is getting plenty of attention.

I end up in Adams Morgan for a while until I decide to have a jumbo slice instead of the usual falafel. It's been a year… and I see why: it was shit. The cheese came from a crate rejected by Papa Johns and the sauce was a sprinkling of the pale colored juice you drain out from a cheap can of tomatoes. This is the worst pizza I've ever eaten in my life. Even worse than the pizza in Bolivia, a place which doesn't have a single Italian or whoever invented pizza to pass on critical pizza-making knowledge to a generation of pizza makers.

I'm alone and two girls share a table with me, savoring every bite of the worst pizza is the world. They kept saying how good it was. One of them has a look like she's about to puke on my face and the other has a blob of grease on her half covered breast. Grease breast chatted with me for a couple minutes and asked me how it's possible I'm single. Because I refuse to go out with girls like you. I felt like a jerk for even thinking it.

Everyone else is shoving dough in their mouth with eyes half closed and loving every minute of it. As I step outside I'm saved from stepping on a gigantic pool of red vomit, a waste of what I'm sure was a fine pasta meal. Twenty minutes later on the subway ride back home I hear a splash and turn around to see a man slumped over three seats away vomiting all over himself. A stupid slut I picked up in a club years back did the same thing but in my car. I remembered looking back and seeing a fountain of pink vomit eject from her mouth and land on her chest and then trickle it's way to my seat. Americans are fucking disgusting.

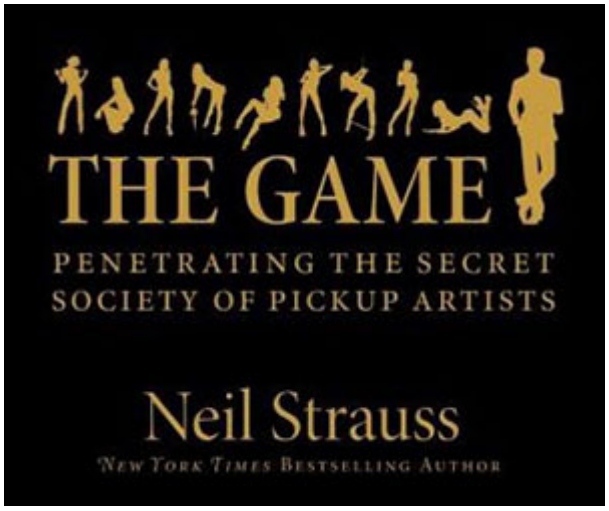
I had to take a cab the rest of the way home. This driver was a talker. He asked me about my night and I told him how it's getting harder to go out. You never think at 22 or 23 you'll get older and become that guy that rather sit at the bar on a weekday and stare at the wall. Drinking some gold cachaca in a shot glass, making my own personal music mix and maybe getting an hour or two worth of work done is starting to seem more appealing. He asked me if I was an artist.

We talked about girls and he put me on the spot. He asked me to give him one tip that would help him out. It's been two months since he's even talked to a girl, and he told me a typical story of a girl he liked that he bought gifts for eventually getting into a relationship with someone else. The pressure was on to help this guy out, and I thought about it for a minute before I answered.

There has to be a point where you're talking to a girl or interacting with her and you're about to do something or say something and think… 'I'm going to lose her.' But you do it anyway.

He thought about it for ten seconds and thanked me. I hoped I made a difference, but I don't know for sure. I doubt it.

I had conversations with maybe five girls during the course of the night. But the one with the taxi driver from El Salvador was by far the most interesting and the only one that put a smile on my face after it was done. I shook his hand and wished him luck.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Is The Age Of Calling Girls On The Phone Coming To An End?

May 26, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I think we're arriving to the point where girls, especially ones under the age of 25, are becoming reluctant and unable to pick up the phone to call a guy they feel positive but not crazy about. Even though text messaging costs more than sending data from the Hubble Telescope, our hyper-ADD and multi-task culture is becoming increasingly focused on meaningless bursts of communication focused around sentence fragments and abbreviations. This is especially jarring for guys like me approaching their 30's who didn't even send their first text message until two years ago.

It's not too hard getting first dates now without even calling. I first did this in Argentina because of the language barrier but since then I've done it here too. For college kids this is common perhaps but for me it's a revolutionary shift in game. It's just surprising that a girl will go out with you when you put less effort into contacting her, yet the young ones actually prefer you text. In fact I've met quite a few girls who tell me specifically that texting is the best way to contact him. Our parents generation will be the last to have written love letters to share in semi-tearful moments some thirty years later.

A good way to get someone to commit is to make someone invest time and energy into you. This is why you meet some girls and they start asking you for little favors. I think they do this unconsciously—perhaps it's genetic—but there is that escalating ladder of favors until next thing you're at Zales buying her diamond earrings. To their unfortunate detriment women are now making it easier for guys to fuck them without putting in this crucial investment. I'm shaking my head at how they continue to dig their own spinster grave (Sex and the City movie is coming out soon!), but this is great for guys like myself who just want hot sex. I can only smile when I blast the same message on Monday to multiple girls I just met and get responses trickling in for just ten seconds of work.

There is still a need to have phone skills, but possibly not as much in the past. The end goal for guys is to find the easiest yet most efficient way to get girls out. I need to experiment a little more, but my hypothesis is it will depend on the girl's age and the breeziness of your text message style.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

Texting Your Way To Love

May 27, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Funny on-topic video…

Texting your way to love (current.com)

Hooker Spotting In Las Vegas

May 28, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The guy who looked most like a bitch had the hottest bitch in the bar. He was a short aging rocker with eyeliner and long stringy hair and a lip piercing and was almost more feminine than his girl. From ten feet away I could not spot a flaw in her appearance.

There was a hooker with a going price of $500. If the first question out of their mouth is "Where are you staying?" then you know they are a hooker. Problem with spotting hookers is that every other non hooker-girl dresses like a hooker too. With the help of a can of hair spray, four inch heels, blonde dye, dim lighting, and a black cocktail dress that leaves nothing to the imagination, 6's were now 8's. A gallon of makeup can hide just about anything and any girl who wasn't morbidly obese could elevate herself into hot girl status. All for just a few hours of work.

The only purpose of Las Vegas is to part a man from his money. (Fyi I lost $300 at blackjack). Men literally lined up to part themselves from their money at the casino clubs, begging to grease the bouncer to enter in addition to paying a $30 or more cover charge. Even guys who are dropping hundreds or thousands on tables had to wait in line.

The first night I went to Body English club at Hard Rock with my partner in crime. The girls were friendly and opening was easier than back at home. The hottest girls I talked to since South America would maintain eye contact with me and smile as I talked. But conversations didn't last as long as I liked. Sometimes it was just a standard cockblock but other times the girls would excuse themselves to some guys table to get free drinks. More than half the club was dedicated to table service. It seemed like every guy was throwing alcohol their way and besides that the only game I saw here was tatted up body builders wearing Affliction t-shirts.

Second night we went to Blush lounge in the Wynn Hotel, a place some Wall Street trader told me was "the most superficial place in the world." He said I don't belong there and I agreed, but this was the special Vegas weekend and I had to party like a rockstar or something. When it comes to slowly losing my money at the $10 blackjack table or hanging out in a club with rich and beautiful idiots, the decision is hard.

I got a couple numbers from the friendlier club girls but I knew nothing would happen. Same night or bust. Plus girls had a "one for all, all for one" mentality (no soldier left behind). Hope of easy sex grew dim until we were led to the bar inside Hard Rock's casino. There was no line, no cover, no loud music, and an interesting mix of UFC wannabes, hookers, fake breasts, local girls, and out of towners. A fascinating place where every girl wore high heels instead of flip flops.

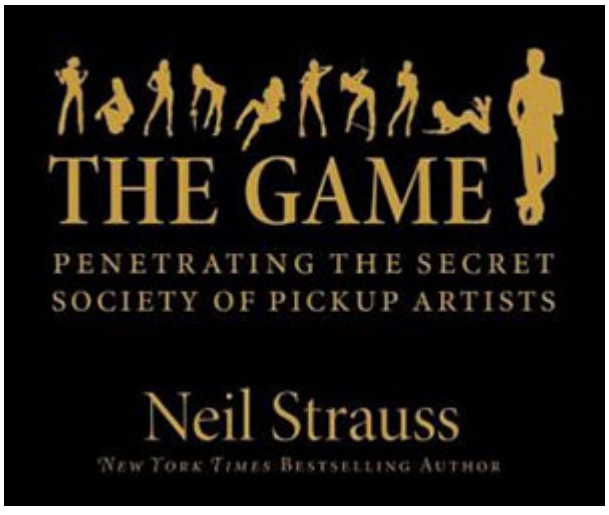
It was four of us now. The shots were big and by 4am one guy got kicked out and puked in front of the lobby and another was sleeping in the garage. A stunning and gentle 18-year-old named Kylie stuck by my side until her "cool" mom took her away, a 30-year-old woman blonde lawyer from LA who said I was "mainstream but trying not to be mainstream" found out about the Turkish kiss, and a 47-year-old attractive Italian woman wanted to bang me. Even at 4am there was still fresh girls rolling in from whatever shithole club they went to, probably the one that, believe it or not, had the slogan Status Is Everything.

By the the time the sun was coming up it was just me and a gutter slut with some sort of beret hat. She was talking her head off and I all I could do was nod and say "Yeah?" because I was trying to not vomit on her face. I don't know if I didn't get the urge to take my camera out of my jean pocket because she was a monster or because I didn't remember having a camera in my pocket, but she definitely was not one of those model chicks I saw on the arms of wealthy looking guys that zip right into the club and make me question the starving artist lifestyle. Either way thank god what happens in (…)

Climbing over fences, clenching wet napkins at the blackjack tables, escaping in the morning, lost walking through a Sam's Club parking lot, sharing a bed with another man, disappointment the adorable big-eyed girl is a hooker and not really into me, one and a half meals a day, stealing other people's drinks, not getting into the club, getting into the club, perma-hangover, and being reminded why I stopped playing poker, the most boring card game on earth. Seven days was too much.



When Too Many Girl Options Is Bad

June 1, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

About a month ago I went out like any other Friday night with one male friend. I dressed like how I normally dressed and barely drank. By the time the night was over I got four phone numbers. The unusual thing about this is I talked to six or seven girls during the entire night. 60% conversion rate from approaches is a superstar number and does not typically happen. One number or make-out from four or five approaches is more of what I experience.

The following Monday I had a total of six numbers to call (two were older) and with so many choices I didn't particularly care which ones I got out. So I called them one by one. Two answered and for the ones that didn't I left messages.

Fast forward one week later. The entire pool was whittled down to two girls I was still talking to. I thought about it a little more and concluded they weren't even that cute, so I stopped calling both of them. So nothing happened with any of those girls.

Two weeks after that brouhaha, I met a pretty Brazilian girl at a bar. This was around the time before the Las Vegas trip when I barely went out to save money. But we're still talking (and texting), and the initial connection I had with her was superficially less than most of the girls from the four number fest.

Looking back the previous couple years, nothing happened when I had a boatload of new numbers. I get laid by focusing on a girl and making it work, not blasting with a shotgun and hoping I hit something. That inefficient robot game doesn't work because you simply don't have the time or energy to work on the huge number of girls to get such paltry results. It's necessary for some guys starting out but in the long run you'll burn out and swear off the game forever.

Having options is good up to a point, but then with too many options you actually start getting less. You're like a kid in a candy store and you're too excited to make firm decisions. So you really have to do care about these girls, at least a little bit, or else you won't bother to take it to the next level. But then if you care a tad too much you'll get nothing either. The game is an unforgiving beast.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

The Rise And Fall

June 3, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

> The checkpoint in this video was nearly 50 miles north of the Mexican border, so it would have been utterly pointless in stopping illegal immigration.
>
> The real purpose of these checkpoints is to condition Americans to get used to the police state.

You can read the guy's blog here, which has other videos as well. Reading the comments though you get the feeling that he's fighting a cause that most Americans don't care about. Example:

> I just have to give cuddos to the work that is being done by our Men and Women of Law Enforcement and Homeland Security. Where would be without them protecting us. The problem that people fail to remember is that without these people, immigration/drug smuggling/terrorists would be running our beautiful country. As a Homeland Police Officer myself we deal with the things others don't want to and better yet, if some Hippie Scumbag has a problem with the work we do then move back to Mexico/Canada/or live on a deserted Island and get out of this Country that I love.

Whatever rights are being eroded, remember it can't be done unless normal Americans like the border agents above or the bureaucrats with a law degree go along with it for a paycheck and a feeling of importance and power.

"I was just doing my job."

The authority / spying business is now too big to be stopped. The next twenty years is pretty much already set, regardless if you're a Hillary or Obama fanboy (sorry Hillary fans).

If you're stopped by police, here's what to do. Note the article may be dated depending on whatever court decision or executive order is declared in upcoming weeks.

Did you know that if you leave the country with a laptop, border agents can randomly examine and search the contents of your hard drive and download files? If you resist then they can supposedly deny you entry back into the country. I don't know if I have the balls to find out if that's true or not. Courts ruled this legal on the defense that the data on your computer is the same as something you'd carry in your suitcase.

"Sir the girl in this Dirty But Innocent porn clip sure looks young. Can you verify she is 18 years of age?"

I took pictures of Rio's beaches and in one of the picture was a four-year-old boy laying on the sand. He had a speedo on like many of the adults. How about if an agent saw that picture, what would he think? I deleted the picture before I hopped on the plane home. I lose, terrorists win, etc.

Yeah I know what you're thinking. I'm being too "paranoid." Hey, it's not paranoia if they're scanning your emails and telephone calls. But who cares as long as we can fill up our cars with cheap g…

How come no one is talking of the staggering outflow of money leaving the country every month to finance a society built around the automobile? South American cities like Santiago and Rio de Janeiro put Washington DC's public transportation to shame. Sure in Rio your chances of being robbed on a bus at night is 100 times greater, but at least there is a bus at night. The Metro is a joke with buses that come ever 30 or 40 (!) minutes on main arteries with no Sunday service.

Spend the next ten minutes of your life reading this fascinating article, by the author of a book that just came out called Reinventing Collapse. It paints the case how the collapse of the USSR will be benign compared to the US collapse. And please no "The United States will never collapse" wishful thinking. Every empire collapses (a book I'm reading now is in fact called Collapse). It probably won't happen in our lifetimes but it will happen.

Or will it?

I have 30% of my net worth in foreign currencies, the Yen, Franc, and Krohn. The end game for every fiat currency is hyperinflation, but which currency will bust first? I'm betting it's not Japan (this is a little arguable), Switzerland, or Norway. Are you prepared if the dollar falls through the floor and your hard-earned savings is wiped out? Most people in Argentina weren't prepared.

> The Communist party offered just one bitter pill. The two Capitalist parties offer a choice of two placebos. The latest innovation is the photo finish election, where each party buys 50% of the vote, and the result is pulled out of statistical noise, like a rabbit out of a hat.

"If voting could change anything they'd make it illegal."

There is nothing on the horizon that gives me hope about where this country, or the world, is headed. I watch my back and believe nothing my government tells me.

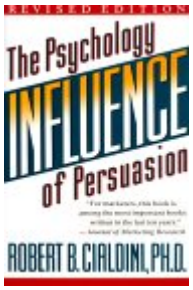
There Is A Pattern

June 5, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

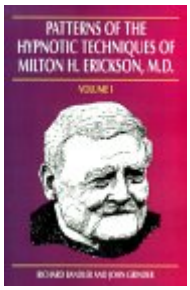
I saw a comment the other day asking me to update my reading list but I haven't touched an inspiring book in a while. I am almost done with Collapse right now (it's the environment, stupid!) after giving up on a couple travel books not worth mentioning. It's a good thing I consider many published travel books boring because it means I have a good chance with mine.

Anyway I went through my stats for the past three years to see the most popular books you guys click over from ones I mention. Here they are in order, and notice the common theme…

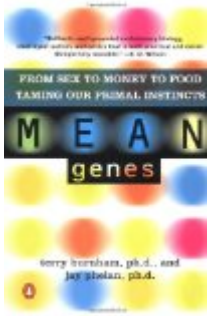
2. Influence (Persuasion)



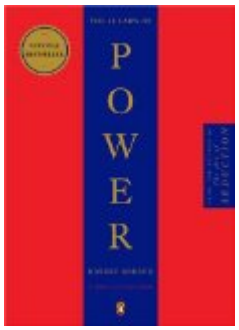
3. Patterns of the Hypnotic Techniques of Milton H. Erickson (Persuasion)



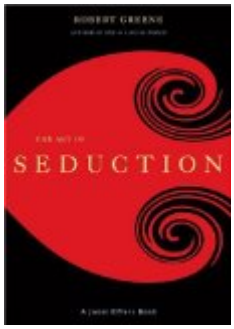
4. Mean Genes (Evolution of persuasion / alpha males)



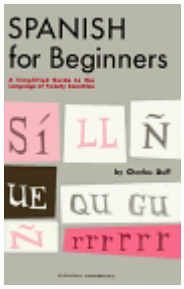
5. The 48 Laws Of Power (Persuasion)



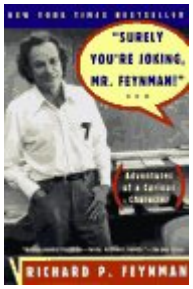
6. The Art Of Seduction (Persuasion)



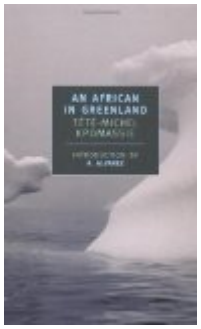
7. Spanish For Beginners (Persuasion in different language?)



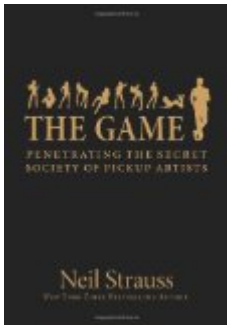
8. Surely You're Joking, Mr. Feynman! (Alpha male)



9. An African in Greenland (Alpha male)



10. The Game (Persuasion)



And the number one book is....

1. Bang (supreme alpha male, persuasion)

It just got plugged into Amazon. (Check out the “Customers Who Bought Items Like This Also Bought” for some eyebrow furrowing.)

> Amazon.com Sales Rank: #422,732 in Books

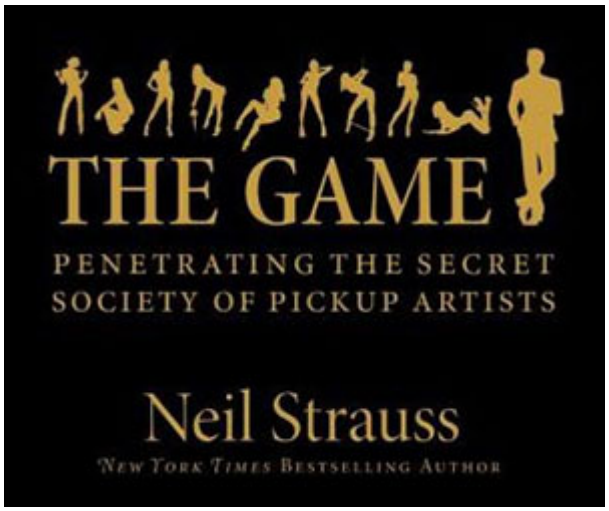
Awesome!

Blog Recommendations

June 6, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The first is See Mike Draw, a brilliant cartoonist who has a very disturbed sense of humor. I looked at his archive to highlight his best cartoons but they're all good. Start with this zombie inspired one.

Second is I Was In Korea, about a young (?) traveler currently in Dubai who likes picking up girls along the way.



Adjusting A Girl's Rating Based On Her Nationality

June 8, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Is a 7 actually a 7? It really depends on where she is from. Not all personalities are created equal and girls from different countries put out different vibes that sometimes adds to her physical rating and sometimes not.

For example imagine we have an American girl who rates a 7 on looks. Let's account for her brain to give her an overall rating. Chances are she obsessed with celebrity culture and fashion. She has expensive tastes and high standards. Her conversational ability revolves around television shows and who's fucking who. She needs attention like a dog who wasn't loved enough as a puppy. Therefore you must subtract 1.5 points to get her overall rating. An American girl who rates a 7 is looks is really a 5.5. In other words she's an undesirable.

How about other cultures?

Argentina. Minus 1 point. Hard to deal with until you get the kiss. Guaranteed chain smoker. Since you're dealing with 8's and 9's though the one point hit does not affect your motivations.

Australia. Minus 1.5 points. No real difference from American girls. In fact other than Vegemite and Outback Steakhouse the Australian culture seems to be a poor knockoff of American culture.

Brazil. Add 1.5 points. Warm, affection, kinky and horny as hell, likes anal play, fun all-around. This means a Brazilian 5.5 is on par with an American 8.5, which is hard to believe but any guy who has had a couple Brazilian girls will agree with me.

Czech and Poland. No change. Beautiful chicks who age well but period of communism have left them distant and skeptical of outsiders who don't speak their difficult language.

England. Minus 1 point. Boring conversationalists with a tired posh act and way too heavy on the drug use, especially cocaine.

German. Add 0.5 points. Submissive girls who aim to please and value strong men. This is how American girls should have turned out.

Ireland. Add 0.5 points. Cool chicks who wouldn't complain if you took them to a lyme disease infested wood for a first date. Heavy drinkers make them easy to shag if that's what you want, which you do.

India. Minus 0.5 points. Date her and you might as well be dating her mom.

Israel. No change. Naturally beautiful but rough and tumble vibe makes you wonder if she's secretly a man. A littler hairier than average but as long as it's not on her face who cares.

Italy. Minus 0.5 points. Beautiful faces but tough exterior and "please me" demeanor.

Iran. Minute 1 point. Very feminine but the hardest game players the world over due to. A shame, really.

Japan. Minus 1 point. Super duper weird chicks. It's like interacting with a child who has a giggling disorder.

Netherlands/Dutch/Holland. No change. These girls are naturally friendly and love exercising on bicycles, saving you money on dates and grocery.

Peru. No change. She will serve you until you die and make delicious stews but will eventually turn into a revolting beast.

Puerto Rico. Add 0.5 points. Absolute animals in bed. I've never had a girl tell me her vagina is, in fact, mine.

Russia. Minus 1 point. Very similar to Argentine girls in terms of initial coldness and nonstop smoking, but naturally low maintenance… until they get a taste of Western culture. After that all bets are off.

South Africa. Add 0.5 points. Wicked, hippie chicks. The kind you want to travel the world with. I'm talking about the white ones with dreadlocks because I've never met a black South African girl.

Sweden. Plus 0.75 points. Charming girls that surprisingly are not all blonde. Cute accent with cuter faces and down-to-earth vibe similar to Dutch and German girls. Probably the most progressive chicks you will meet.

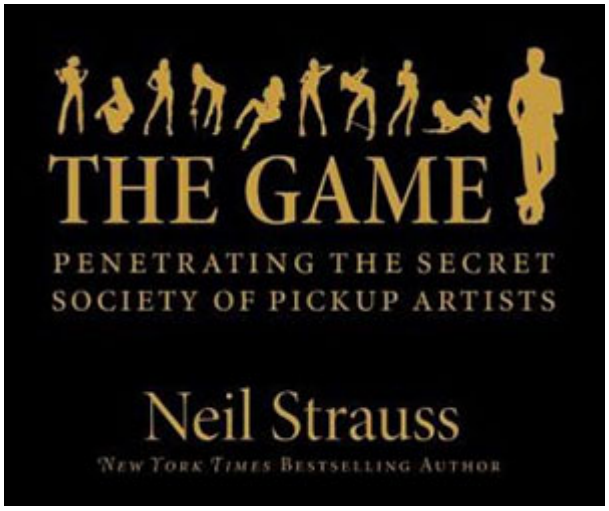
Venezuela. No change. Cool chicks overall whose asses continue to defy human nature well into their 30's.

I have yet to find chicks cooler than ones in Brazil. Do I give up my search for the coolest chick and just move there or do I head to the Philippines like one reader recommended and risk having sex with a lady boy? Would I be considered gay if I had sex with a clever lady boy who knew how to appear like a woman? Either way, I must admit this list is incomplete.

Mystery Bonus: Each girl in the pictures are from the same country…

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Gradually

June 9, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I go to the same Starbucks next to a retirement community so I recognize many of the old people that come in. Last month a man came in with a walker. He was leaning it on heavy and struggling to move just a half foot at the time. He almost fell down while bending over to sit.

A year ago I remember him coming in on his own, walking a little slow but still walking, and buying one of those pink frappuccino drinks. He dropped it and I watched him grab some napkins to help the barista clean up the spill. He was upbeat then and I used to exchange a few words with him, but now he just looks down on the ground as a younger woman helps him around and gets his drink. He sits closest to the door, silent, with no color on his skin, and within a few minute he falls asleep. He just started coming in a wheelchair, and judging by pain I see on his face he won't be coming in much more.

You think it's going to come gradually. That one day you have trouble getting out of bed and think to yourself that in a year or so you will need a cane. And then in a few years maybe a walker from time to time. But nature doesn't work on your clock. It comes when it wants to come. I know this man did not expect to decline as rapidly as he has, one year independent and walking around, the next year barely able to bring the cup to his mouth.

There's an elderly couple I see all the time. They have to be at least 80 years old, with a bond that gives me hope that maybe one day I'll find someone to live out my last days with. They'd come in, get their coffee, and read the newspaper for an hour before setting out. The woman always had trouble walking so the man would hold her arm, like you would see a young couple do at night. Then they started coming in less and less. I used to see them every day, but it's been a month since the last time. I think I know what happened.

Important Life Tips

June 11, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The caffeine content in Red Bull is much lower you think. Drinking a cup of coffee will give you more caffeine than a can of Red Bull. If you want a real boost in energy, stop drinking caffeine altogether.

Shaving cream is not necessary for razor shaving. Simply lather up a bar of soap and apply to your face. Then shave. A sharp razor is more important to a good shave than shaving cream.

If you want to increase your chances of getting laid in Rio de Janeiro, do not go during Carnival.

Your body produces weirder smells during travel. If your underarms are foul, trim the hair and dab rubbing alcohol daily before deodorant application. If your shoes and feet smell, apply rubbing alcohol to your feet after showering followed with a talc powder application. Also put talc powder in your shoes daily. Takes about three or four days to notice results in either case.

Wear ear plugs if you get up often during the night. It takes about a week to get used to them, but vastly improves the quality of your sleep… until the wax buildup in your ear becomes gross and unbearable.

Stomach illnesses or questionable food can give you messy solids. Wiping can make the situation worse and take more time than the actual dump. Use the dab / blot technique instead, like you were getting red wine out of a white carpet.

Your hair is oily because you wash it too much. Wash your hair only once a week and after a month you will notice your hair puts out considerably less oil and has more natural shine. This is because taking the oil out every day with shampoo tells your scalp to keep producing more oil. (Unfortunately during summer months you have to double washings to twice a week.)

If your taint is sore after bike riding, you're doing the type of damage that leads to impotence. You must get a better bike seat.

Don't use SmartCards for the Metro bus because it limits your transfer time to only two hours. Paper transfers give you longer transfer times through driver laziness and allow you to cheat the system in other ways much more easily.

If you want to travel more but keep wussing out, buy a cheap world map and put it on your bedroom wall. You'll have your first ticket booked within a couple months.

Latex condoms tend to dry out a girl after prolonged lovemaking. Don't be shy to spit on her vagina to keep things lubricated. She won't mind.

Flag Day Is Tomorrow

June 12, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Each year when it's time for my birthday I reflect back and see if it topped the year before. I'm pretty sure I'll get to a year that simply can't be topped, but I sit here right now feeling pretty good about the future even though on the surface it seems to be going backwards (with the living in dad's basement thing). I'm working on a plan that will get me out of here for hopefully a long time, but I don't see much happening before 2009.

I'll never know if I made the right choices since I can't turn back time and try something else, but I have no regrets about the choices I've made (so far). It has been 14 months since I've had a job and I forgot what's it's like to sit in front of a computer reading blogs trying not to glance at the clock because I know not much time has passed since the last time I looked at it. I just didn't fit with the corporate world and with my now useless degree the decision was easy to pursue a more mobile lifestyle of freelancing/writing/blogging. Sure it's not for most people, but for me it is and I'm enjoying it even though I have to count every dollar I spend.

So tomorrow I will be 29. Last week I noticed some grey hairs in my beard. :shudder:

:catlady:

Rock Band Audition & Possible Summer Internship

June 15, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Roissy and I have started a rock band called Heavy Sack. He plays bass while I rock out on guitar. We are looking for a female singer to take our band to the next level. Of course I'm talking about Rock Band the video game and not an actual rock band, though I'm sure with a couple months practice on a real guitar I would be qualified enough to start a decent band.

The audition will be Tuesday night at Reef around 9pm or so, which is their Rock Band night. You will sing along to rock classics and be graded by a computer that tells you how much higher you have to go to hit those high notes. We will select a singer not only based on singing ability but pleasing demeanor as well.

The Heavy Sack band name is not in reference to getting blue balled but from having too much testosterone. Our manager and image consultant is Virgle Kent, who will be watching from a distance taking notes in his head.

Also, I think I would like to add a female intern for the summer. You would follow in the footsteps of the wonderful Sally and Dasha, whom I still keep in touch with.

If you are interested and can write and hold a camera with a steady hand to document my adventures, you may be a good fit for this demanding position. The pay would be $0, but you would hang out with me and my friends who will probably buy you beers from time to time. Email me for more details.

11 Signs She’s A Keeper

June 16, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. You’d still hang out with her when she’s on her period and there is no chance of sex.

2. You don’t get the inexplicable urge to leave after you ejaculate inside her.

3. You don’t bother to notice if other girls are checking you out when you’re with her.

4. Because you actually enjoy chatting with her you have to make a conscious effort to not contact her too much so you don’t put out a beta male vibe.

5. You think about her when jerking off instead of the blonde bimbo on the screen taking two up the butt.

6. You don’t wonder if you could do better.

7. You want her to meet your friends, sure of their approval in your mate selection.

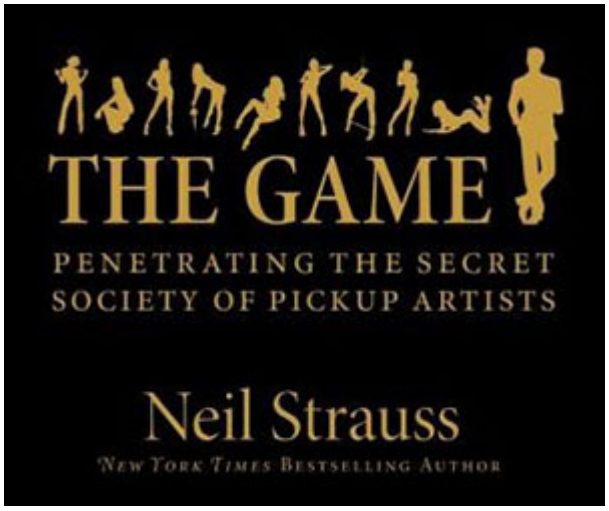
8. You feel more like a man when you’re with her because of her bursting femininity.

9. You think about how lucky you are to catch her at the right moment, right time.

10. She’s concerned, almost obsessed, with your needs and pleasure, especially in the bedroom.

11. You love displaying her on your arm, like a caveman would be when dragging home a mountain lion that almost killed him in intense battle.

This is more of a cumulative list… only a couple may pop up with any specific girl.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Not Dead Celebrities Of Las Vegas

June 18, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In addition to my Hooker Spotting In Las Vegas post a couple weeks ago, I also just finished a more travel-themed article for Volette called Not Dead Celebrities Of Las Vegas.

> The city itself is plopped right in the middle of a desert, originally as wayward transfer for railway shipping goods out of nearby mines. Then the mafia and Bugsy Siegel got its hands on developing the Flamingo hotel, the first "complete" casino resort that had the revolutionary idea of making visitors go through the gambling area to get to their rooms. Just like how modern sports stadiums follow the model of Rome's Colosseum, casinos still match the Flamingo of 1946, with no windows, no clocks, dim lighting, and jacked up air conditioning to prevent gamblers from dozing off.

Read the article here.

Living Room

June 19, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

These two can also be seen in my Big Leagues movie feature.

Mermaid Sex Revisted

June 21, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previously: "You are alone on an uninhabited island, which one of these would you choose as your companion."

Futurama's take on mermaid mating...

Thoughts On Ejaculating Inside A Girl

June 22, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here's what I wrote in Bang...

> ...make sure you never ejaculate inside her, even if she is on the pill. Not only is the pill not 100% effective, no girl is perfect with taking it every day. Because you don't want your player career to end prematurely with a newborn, don't ejaculate inside a girl unless you accept the chance of having a baby with her.

I wrote that when I had a good job and a girl wouldn't mind having my baby since I had the means to support it, but boy have times have changed. There is a new exception to my previous ejaculation rule...

The poorer you are compared to her, the safer it is to ejaculate inside her.

The reason is obvious: she does not want to have the baby from some deadbeat who can't even buy diapers. While I don't remember the last time I ejaculated inside a girl, if I got into a relationship with a lawyer you better believe that I'm busting inside her every night. "Cool keep the baby if you want. Hey can I borrow two bucks to take the bus back to my Dad's basement?"

But let's say she's a Polish au pair in America for a short amount of time. Absolutely no creampies for her even if her tubes are tied. While I'm poor by most standards, to a Polish au pair I'm middle class and having my baby would mean a potential green card if I marry her. The incentives for her are just too great to keep the baby and the last thing in life I need right now is a little Rooshy running around.

Ejaculation safe professions: Lawyer, engineer, publicist, human resources manager, government worker above GS-10, model/actress, doctor, urban planner

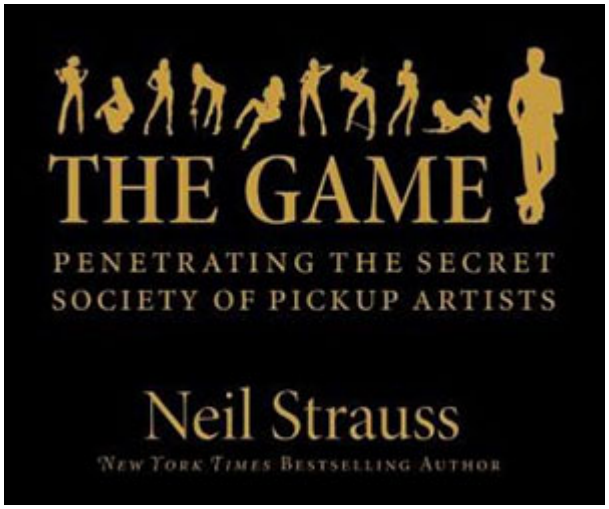
Ejaculation unsafe professions: Teacher, retail clerk, artist, writer, barista, bus driver, storekeeper, librarian, secretary, social worker

Sometimes you can tell just by looking at the girl...

Safe:

Unsafe:

It’s ironic that the more likely a woman can support a baby on her own the safer it is to spread your potent seed inside her. I think we can ~~blame~~ thank feminism for that.



Don’t Let Anyone Tell You That You Need Money To Get Laid

June 24, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When I first moved into my Dad’s house, I was a little nervous about my sex prospects. I’ve always talked a big game about getting laid with just game, but it’s easier to believe that when you have your own place and a good job.

For the first couple months I was hesitant to reveal my unemployment and basement dwelling status, but then I received encouragement from a player friend who had a home stint of his own and told me it doesn’t make a difference. Turns out he was right.

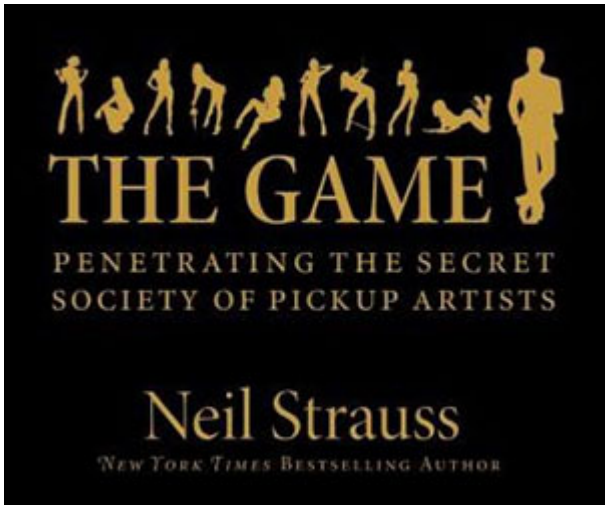
If the main way you get laid is through status or money, then living at home will shut off your poon supply, but if you get laid through game then you actually get more sex because you have more free time to hit on girls. It’s that simple.

And it gets even more interesting. I’d have these moments of self-doubt where I’d think, “Besides being this amazing man, I have nothing to offer girls. I can’t take them on vacations or nice dates. I won’t be able to get a quality girl like I would if I was more established.” But In the past year I’ve dated more amazing, intelligent, funny, passionate, and successful girls than I have in my entire life. I’ve dated girls who invested significantly more money into me than I have into them. I’ve dated girls who give me rides home because they don’t want me to take the bus. It’s not completely logical, but if you’re a guy you already know how flawed using logic is when it comes to women.

Bottom line: you will never miss out on notches by lacking a commodity like clothes, money, or auto that comes with very basic labor. As long as you offer something hard to gain and scarce (true game), then you will always be in demand, and don’t let the bonehead mass audience cause you to believe otherwise. For a short second even I believed it.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.



Does Anyone Speak Finnish?

June 25, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A couple Finnish bloggers have been linking to me and even though I don't know Finnish I have an idea what they're saying.

The first one linked to my player quiz. The word romeo is in quotes, his quiz results state he is a beta male, and he highlights the correct answer to the first question (girls should be viewed as dumb cheap hookers). Most likely to point out how awful the quiz is. A hater.

The second one linked to Chaco's old skinny girl post. There's a nice photo of Scarlet Johansen. A fan.

The third one linked to my ejaculation post and got more comments than my original post. Obviously a girl, obviously a fan. I haven't had sex with a girl from Finland but I would.

By the way if you haven't heard of the incredible story of how hopelessly outnumbered Finland fought off the Russians in 1939 then take time to read about the Winter War. More here, with videos.

> To slow down the 163rd in the north, Finnish ski troops made wide circling flanking movements of 20 to 30 miles under cover of the long night and caught the rear and middle parts of the column by surprise. They found Soviet soldiers huddled around fires in -40° weather easy prey to sub-machine gun fire and grenades. Almost any wound was fatal. As the 44th approached Suomussalmi down the Raate Road, they had to pass between Kuomasjärvi and Kuivasjärvi on a narrow isthmus. 350 Finns in hand-to-hand combat closed the isthmus. Trees were now felled across the road in front and behind with the 44th Division strung out along the road. The 163rd only six miles north engaged in desperate struggles to push the Finns west, but were stopped. Much of this fighting was hand to hand

Ecuador Death Road & We're Pretty Much Homeless

June 26, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm editing my next video production, which will be ready on Monday.

Here's two other very short videos you may have not seen. The first is called Ecuador Death Road. Captions throughout help guide you through the complex narrative.

Ecuador Death Road from Roosh V on Vimeo.

The second video is called We're Pretty Much Homeless. Here's the summary:

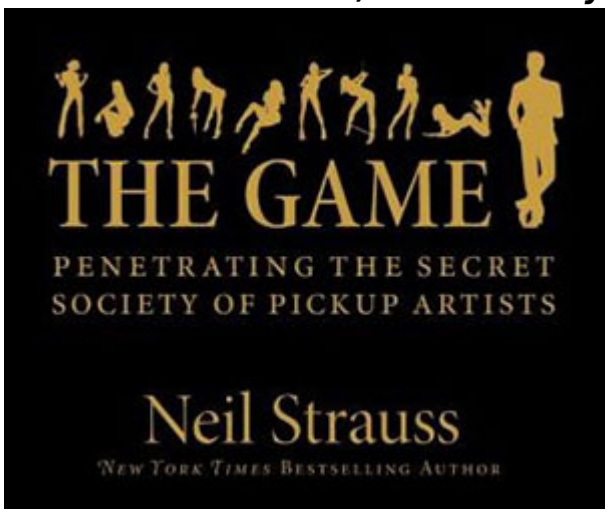
> Went out to MDM nightclub in Rosario, Argentina. We stayed until early morning and was ready to go back to the hostel but it was impossible to find a free cab. Many kilometers from the hostel, one Australian member of the party had a nervous breakdown which I was able to capture on film. Thirty minutes into our walk, a free cab was finally found.
>
> Another Australian who stayed at the club a bit longer ended up jogging back to the hostel, asking directions in poor Spanish along the way.

My Australian friend is very good looking.

We're Pretty Much Homeless from Roosh V on Vimeo.

For more on Ecuador, check out my Ecuador travel guide.



Review: Sony Mylo Personal Communicator COM-2

June 28, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you are wondering why I'm reviewing a gadget, it's because the Sony people sent me a unit. I'm guessing you guys are their target audience.

The Mylo is an "internet communication device," which means it's a tiny laptop. The prime feature is you can use it like a phone with Skype because it has built-in wireless internet (there is a microphone and ear speaker). Mostly you'll be using it to surf the internet but add a Sony memory stick (no SD cards unfortunately) and you can use it to open files and listen to MP3's.

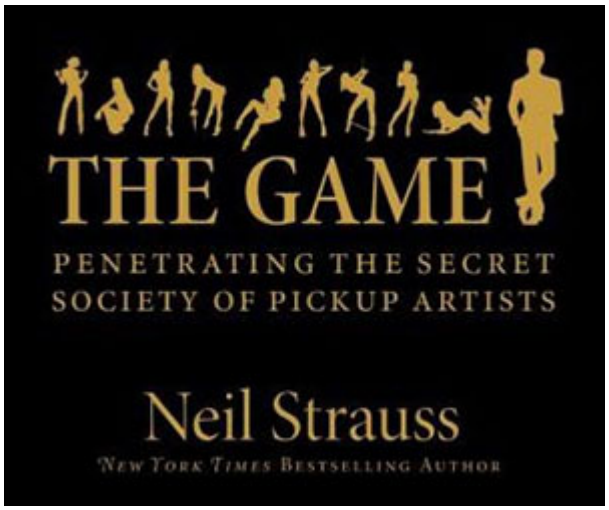
I'm going to rate it on two dimensions: looks and personality.

It gets a 7 out of 10 on looks. It's lightweight and pleasing on the eye and has neon-looking lights at the ends. You won't be embarrassed with it in your hand. The screen is bright and clear and the keyword is easy to use. The stylus at the end of the wrist strap is discreet. But it's not hot enough that you make someone else feel insecure about their electronic device. iPhone people will look at it and act all smug-like, going off about the superiority of their phone in a passive aggressive mumble.

The personality could use an upgrade. When it's dark you can't see the navigation buttons and sometimes the unit doesn't designed. For example, the zoom button on the browser doesn't always work and it gets schizophrenic with the wireless network. But when you're connected you can run AIM, YM, and Google Talk in addition to Skype, and also subscribe to RSS feeds. It takes pictures with the 1.3 megapixel camera, you can install flash games, and for offline use there is a text editor to take notes.

Since the Mylo will not replace your phone, the best use I can think of it is for travel if you don't own a laptop. Many hostels offer wireless internet now and you can log on to check your email and then make phone calls back home. But you'll have to pay for this privilege: Amazon is selling a new Mylo for $285. It's too expensive for a budget traveler.

I think it's a nice gadget, but with a cell phone and laptop I haven't found a regular use for it. I'm re-gifting it to my 12-year-old brother.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

6 Months In South America In 5 Minutes

June 29, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previous Videos:

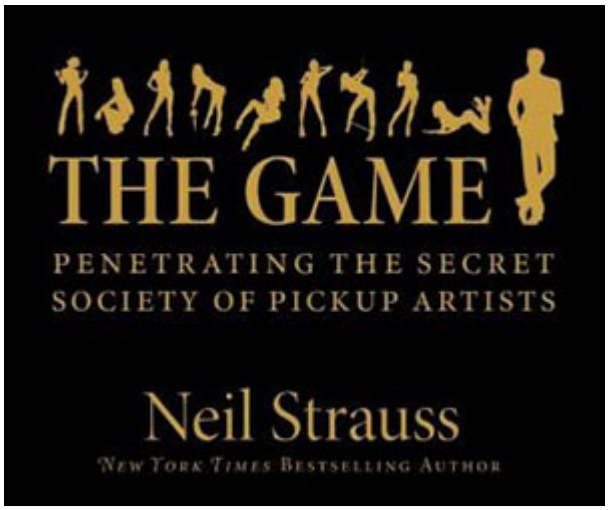
- How To Be A Master Blogger Like Me
- The Big Leagues
- Bike Ride Home
- Ecuador Death Road & We're Pretty Much Homeless

I put together my favorite photos from the trip, picked some mood music, and turned it into a video. Some photos you've seen, some you haven't. It's separated into three parts, mostly in chronological order.

I: Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Chile
II: Argentina (mostly Cordoba)
III: Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay (dead bat), Brazil (mostly Rio)

6 Months In South America In 5 Minutes from Roosh V on Vimeo.

I think it captured the true essence of the trip.



Sex With Full Sized Girls

June 30, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

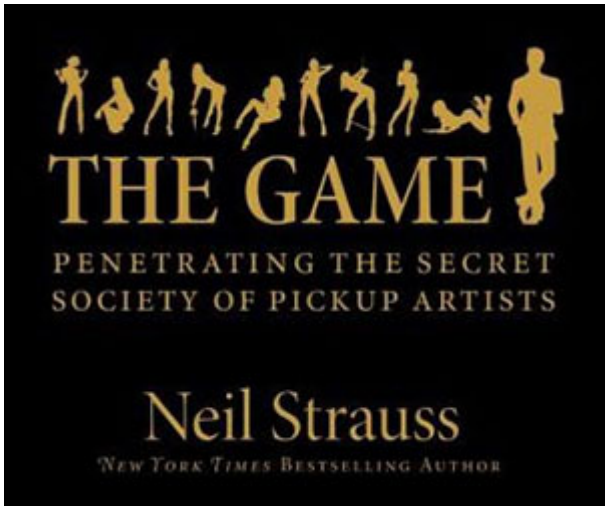
I used to prefer sex only with petite girls, but now I'm proud to say I enjoy sex with a wide variety of body types.

With a petite girl I like how her small size makes me look big and how she is easier to maneuver, but small girls mean small vaginas so I usually have to take it easy. I can't just pound away with impunity and many times I will get comments about going too deep or too fast. I dislike it when my stroke is disturbed but I understand it has to feel good for the girls too.

With a bigger girl, and I mean a more curvy and full figured woman and not BBW, man I can pound away and she'll still want it harder than I can provide. There is nothing more humbling than when a girl says "Fuck me harder" and I am fucking her as hard as I possibly can. Full figured women are also less inhibited than fragile petite girls (for reason I don't understand), so things do get nice and sloppy even if moving her around takes more verbal commanding. After sex with a petite girl the room smells like the candle she is burning. After sex with a bigger girl the room smells like her vaginal juices which got all over both of our bodies.

Another advantage of the bigger girl is their vaginas are looser. Having sex with a tighter than a vice Asian girl and my resulting three minute orgasm time has led me to believe that guys who want tight vaginas has not had unprotected sex before. Of course I don't want to be swimming in there but the longer it takes me to reach orgasm the better that orgasm is. Plus I'll be be perceived as a champion in the bedroom. If you gave me a choice between a tight vagina and a loose vagina, I'd pick the loose vagina every time.

Petite girls are like flowers and for girlfriend lovemaking this would be a sound choice, but there is nothing like the possibility of banging a girl with a gigantic meaty ass to get me excited about going out on a date. When I'm especially horny and masturbation is not working only this type of body type can satisfy my craving. Even fat girls I don't mind pleasuring once a year as long as she has a cute face. I mean I didn't spend all that time mastering my game just to have sex with one very specific type of girl. If you like sex, you like sex.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Interesting Tattoo

July 2, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

“I totally want to get a tattoo. I know it has become a trend but I designed one on my own and feel like it would make me unique and not just another face in the crowd and it would even motivate me to keep my body in shape because if I get fat then the tattoo would probably look different you know? I’m a sexual person, definitely spiritual, a lover of nature, and I even write poems. I mean like guys always listen carefully when I read my poems to them and they compliment me on how good they are written. So now I read them my poems on the first date so they can get to know me faster and we can skip all that lame dating bullshit and go right into knowing each other. God I made the best design ever. I can only imagine the faces of the guys who make love to me from behind when they see it, and I’m sure they will love it and realize that I’m a prize as a woman and not all those other boring girls who are even too scared of a needle and who just want to fit in with their boring sun dresses and flip flops. I’m not like them at all because I’m an individual.”

Video Of Girls Getting Brazilian Waxes

July 5, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Vaguely erotic..

Creepy Or Loving?

July 6, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I was sitting down on the subway car thinking of making a play on a Turkish girl to my left. I knew she was Turkish because she was speaking Turkish with her two friends before they cheek kissed her goodbye and made a loud exit like only Turks know how. But she had a Blackberry and a slight resemblance to my wonderful Turkish mother, so I decided to inspect my fingernails instead to see if they needed trimming.

At the next stop two guys and two girls came onto the train. They paired off as they sat and all seemed like just friends. I'm not an expert on body language but at 29 I think I know if two people are fucking or not. They held my attention, partly because I was done looking at my fingernails but also because of their exceptionally clear Spanish. Their minimal use of slang and clear enunciation told me they definitely were not from dirty Mexico or Central America. Maybe they were from Colombia, I thought.

This was the last midnight train, and they were tired. Judging by their backpacks it looked like they studied at some library followed with a trip to some Washington DC forest to blaze. The girls rested their heads on their respective guy. The first guy put his arm around his girl and just let it hang there. They both closed their eyes. Go to sleep.

The second girl had her eyes closed on the second guy's chest as well, but his eyes were opened. He was looking at the top of her head and stroking her hair, slowly and deliberately like she was a gentle flower with fine petals that easily come off. He would not take his eyes off her head. Just staring at her black hair covered skull. He did this for the next twenty minutes, stroking and touching and looking while she did not respond in any way. If I had to take a guess as to what he was thinking, it would be "If she ever leaves me I'm going to kill her and her family." It was one of the creepiest things I've ever seen in my life, second only to an internet video I was tricked into watching of a grown man having sex with a horse. Actually I wasn't tricked, I was curious, like any normal, well-balanced human being would be when presented with the opportunity to watch such an intriguing perversion of nature.

Physical affection is important in a healthy relationship, but it's not natural to pet an unconscious girl who isn't aware of your petting. The only exception is if the girl is in a coma and you are trying to bring her back to life. Creepy guys tend to be beta males, living absurd fantasies in their head because they can’t do it in real life until one day it comes out in a subway car and is noticed by an astute observer taking mental notes because he refuses to buy an iPod. It just didn’t add up to me that this beta male was in the position to stroke the head of a beautiful girl that I would personally get with in a heartbeat. It went against everything I have learned and experienced in the past seven years. I’ll get over it, I thought—this is just the exception and I shouldn’t change my world view just for this haunting display of affection.

Turns out that that won’t even be necessary.

When they all got up at their stop a surprise switch occurred. The girls held hands of the opposite guy as they walked off the train. Are they all just fuck buddies who swap partners like in an obese swingers farm or are they all just childhood friends? I don’t have to change shit. They’re just friends.

You’re Not A People Person

July 8, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I was talking to someone about public transportation and he made a comment about how he doesn’t like taking the bus because there is a lot of crazy people on it. Take note that he was a city dweller where bus patrons tend to be more educated with proper jobs that that make mom proud. Here in the suburbs you’re lucky if the person sitting next to you has a high school education and can speak English, though that is changing before my eyes as gas prices shoot through the roof. Call me a suburb bus pioneer, if you will.

Here’s the thing about your life right now. You get up in the morning, go in your car cocoon shell (or ride the subway with people like you who have jobs that took an interview longer than ten minutes to get), go to work with other smart people, go to the gym with health conscious people, shop at Trade Joes or Whole Foods where everyone knows what a trans fat is, and then go to the bar or club with more educated or smart people (though rarely beautiful since this is Washington DC we’re talking about). Well that’s not reality.

The humans you are interacting with on a daily basic or a tiny subset of the range of humans that exist. The majority of humans alive today are stupid, dirty, poor, or batshit insane. The only time you catch a glimpse of this is when a homeless person asks you for spare change but living in a wealthy city makes these encounters the anomaly instead of the rule. The human existence is miserable, desolate, brutish, and until recently, short. Remember: the United States is a rich country and most countries of the world are not rich, especially ones that are heavily populated. And let’s be honest, 99.9% of you have never been out of North America besides some Caribbean beach resort for Spring Break.

The point is that you like people less than you think you do, especially if you claim to be a “people person,” something I hear occasionally, usually from a woman who works in PR or human resources. Any “people person” would start getting very uncomfortable if the guy on the bus next to you starts hacking away his flem or reeking of body odor or having a loud, profanity-laden fight on the phone. Riding the subway with a rude group of kids causing a ruckus is an event that educated people must tell anyone that will listen.

You’re only similar to the 0.000001% of the human population that is clean and educated like you and who has the embarrassment filter that prevents any acting up in public or doing anything someone educated would deem weird or strange. Accept that you hate people and if a monster tsunami wiped out another 200,000 people in Southeast Asia you’d be annoyed that news coverage preempted your favorite television show, The Bachelor.

You disgust me.

Re: You're Not A People Person

July 9, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After yesterday's post a reader forwarded me an email from her friend that describes what I was talking about. To refresh your memory here is what I wrote:

> Any "people person" would start getting very uncomfortable if the guy on the bus next to you starts hacking away his flem or reeking of body odor or having a loud, profanity-laden fight on the phone. Riding the subway with a rude group of kids causing a ruckus is an event that educated people must tell anyone that will listen.

The email:

> I'm just getting settled in. Oh my god it was the ride from hell. First off, getting stopped by cops, put us off by a good 15 minutes. Then, I have a metal chunk of crap where my feet are to sit, and a morbidly obese man squirming not to touch me next to me. This means I get half my seat. He is generating a lot of body heat.
>
> Stopover. Smelly looking tree planters exchange notes on their equipment, some guy tries and fails to pick the hippie girls up. Everyone's standing outside to get the best seat, mosquitoes are going crazy, it's raining. There are tons of fat people wandering in from , mullets and bleached blond hair. I contemplate asking one of the skinny tree hugger girls to sit next to me.
>
> I chuck someone's water bottle down the aisle under the chairs, and take a window seat, only to discover two large native men peering at me. I've taken their seats, and chucked their water bottle. A skinny man that looks like a gold digger from the Klondike demands to know if I was on before, and how it is I forgot my seat. I take a new seat, slink down, and stare intently at my ticket.
>
> A girl sits beside me. Next to her, four African men reeking of cologne. They talk for the next 10 hours straight in a language that sounds like a swamp bubbling. Behind me, two native men reeking of booze and cigarettes. "With my luck, we'll hit a tanker truck." "With mine, we won't." Something starts banging under my chair, loud, at random. Then my seat starts to wobble. The natives suspect the wheel axis is coming off, and that the wheel is going to fly off the bus. They then FALL ASLEEP. I pop two codeines and eventually have to tell the driver something funny is going on. We stop in parry sound for tim's and he looks at it, for a second. I figure I've done all I can to prevent my death here.
>
> The african men get off at . Their luggage is not on the bus. They start bellowing and lunging at the driver, who yells back. Everyone is looking out the window, and it looks like we might have a fight on our hands after 10 hours in the bus. Driver gets on and closes the door.

> A man in the back coughs a deep cough from his lungs, then swallows his snot. Someone tells him to cover his mouth when he does that. TB TB TB. I run to the front of the bus near *, open my own coach luggage door and grab my luggage. I hurl myself into a cab before those slugs have even stirred from their slumber.

The email had complaints about body odor, flem, and fighting, among others. Eerie coincidence or validation that what I speak of is real absolute truth?

I'm positive the email came from a woman who is pro-environment, anti-war, hyper educated, a voracious reader, has donated to the Sally Struthers aid program, owns or considers owning a hybrid, and who considers herself a lover of people. Yet if a plumber in her home or a polite bus driver engaged her in conversation she wouldn't know what to say, and that's the issue with educated First World inhabitants who wrap themselves up in the cocoon and have no knowledge or experience of people not like them.

Next month… You're Not As Open Minded As You Think.

Women’s Magazines

July 10, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Via Scholarly Reading:

I’m pro-women’s magazines because it makes girls so insecure and wrapped up in their own world of perceived flaws and lacks that they never notice my flowing ear hair, which I let shed naturally.

Vicious Gang Beach Brawl

July 12, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

From a TV show called World’s Most Amazing Videos. Even the girlfriends get involved.

MONDAY MORNING CUBICLE CHALLENGE: Watch the entire video without laughing or smiling or giggling…

How To Pick Up Girls For Under $100 A Month

July 14, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When I had a job I'd spend over $500 a month to pick up girls in bars and clubs to take them out on dates. That $500 amount is now my entire budget for the month but my horniness has not ebbed. How do I continue getting laid while living in a suburban desert without opportunities for daytime game?

Here's how I do it…

1. Clubs are out. They're just too pricey, even if you get in for free. With a basic vodka drink at $8 you're looking at spending at least $40 just to get your ears blasted while repeating "What did you say?" all night long to chicks who wish they were Lindsey Lohan. It's a stupid waste of money, especially if you're game is talking instead of dancing. It's important to be a competent dancer but if you are the old guy in the club your supreme dancing skills will be seen as weird and creepy instead of attractive.

2. Weekend game is out. I can't deny that most girls I've laid are from ones I've met on the weekend, but is it because the girls who go out on the weekend are easier or because most of the nights I've gone out on happen to fall on the weekend? I'm not entirely sure, but let's face it: weekends are amateur nights, for people who do nothing during the week except work and watch TV. By Friday they are way too excited to go all-out and get sloshed with a group of friends to half-ass the mating dance. When midnight strikes all the girls will be less receptive they should be (based on their quality) because they have been hit on by too many guys in a short period of time.

At the end of a weekend night 98% of all participants fail in their goal to get laid or pair bond. The puffed up jockeying of the guys and the wannabe celebrity attitudes of the girls are replaced with the fascinating late-night feeding behavior, a relatively new phenomenon not seen in our parents time. The herd begins to eat pizza, cheeseburger, gyros, and sometimes falafel, to fill their empty tummies of loneliness and failure. Many will walk out of these eating establishment with grease running halfway down their face.

Weekdays have a more laid back crowd making it easier to meet someone, with fewer guys humping a girl's leg because of liquid courage and less girls who think they have more options than the zero options they actually have. I met a girl during the weekday at a bar and even though she was a regular she told me I was the first guy who ever approached her there. Maybe she was lying, maybe not, but my point remains.

A downside of weekday bar game is that there are fewer girls, but this is quickly compensated by approaches that are far more likely to result in a loooong conversation. You'll have to approach two girls to get something instead of five or more on a weekend. I found a Tuesday bar that has given me bountiful fruit from just a couple visits.

Also weekdays are cheaper if you take advantage of a happy hour's tail end. My average cost for a weeknight is $20, while for a weekend it's $40. All else being equal do the weekends produce double the results or fun? No, they don't. If you can find a nice bar on Monday through Wednesday then you are set, but take care on Thursday nights because those tend to be stupid college girl night.

3. Public or bicycle transportation. Cars are ridiculously expensive. You have the car payment, insurance, maintenance, upkeep (tires, battery, windshield wipers), car washes, parking tickets, DUI arrests, and gas. Even if I take taxis everywhere it's still cheaper than owning a car. But there are two problems with public transportation:

- During the weekday the subway stops early at midnight, so I'm stuck with a hefty cab ride if I decide to ride out the night until 2am closing. This means I have to start very bright and early at 8pm, a time when things are barely getting started. (Solution: Feel out the vibe when the clock hits 11:30am, when you should know if sweet fruit will be obtained or not. Always stay flexible, like a ballet dancer.)

- Pre-drinking is a no go. If the bus ride takes an hour, drinking at home and just sitting on the bus for an hour will destroy your buzz. It will not be as good when you eventually start drinking again at the bar. (Solution: Don't use alcohol as a crutch to talk to girls. This is something you should be working on long term.)

4. Start your dates at events, not bars. This happened by accident. In my quest to be a cultured man of the world I looked for events like the Greek Festival or European Embassy Open House. There is a lot of substance for fun conversation and you can cap it off with a couple drinks at a cheap neighborhood bar. She won't care you took her to a dump because you were so original with your date idea. Here you are looking at a $20 date instead of the automatic $60-80 date if you take her to nice lounges like Topaz or Chi-Cha Lounge. By the way, did you know there are still guys taking girls out to dinners? Haha morons.

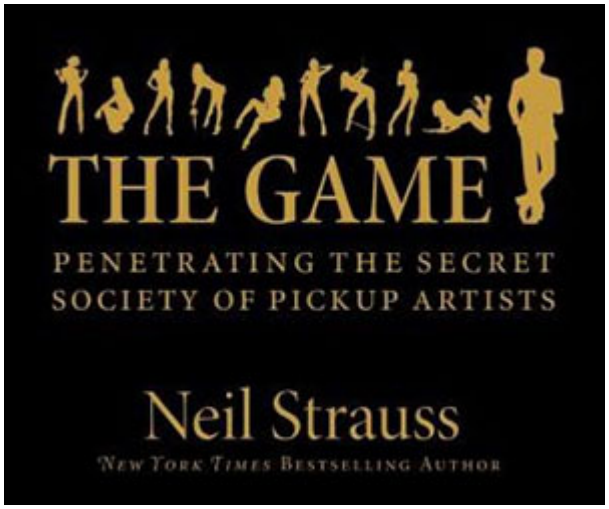
A good place to find events is the Events tab on Yelp which spoon feed you a wide variety of things to do. In effect you are outsourcing your date ideas, but the girl has no idea and your creativity score will shoot through the fucking roof.

The end result is I spend a third of what I used to spend but I go out less and get laid much more. The get laid more is due to factors besides the scope of this post (continually improving game, for example), so it's possible your mileage from only going out one weekday a week will hurt your results unless you're already at a certain level. Another downside is that it will take quite a bit of time investment to find a good weekday spot. You'll have to experiment.

Every time a buddy calls me on Saturday night to see if I'm staying in to write and drink beer alone there is that moment when I almost say yes, but then I remember the amateurs and ugly white girls who spend so much time to look good only to wear cheap flip flops. How about Tuesday night?

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.



Email Newsletter

July 16, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I just passed 1,000 subscribers to my game newsletter. I've diverted time away from the blog to work on the mailings so that's one reason I post less. New subscribers will get the old newsletters until they eventually get caught up with the new ones. You can sign up on the newsletter page.

Content on the blog is more mainstream / fun while the newsletter is just about pick up.

Linkfest

July 17, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Research your bank and make sure you are covered by FDIC. If you have over $100,000 in any bank you are crazy. Remember that small, seemingly safe local banks invested heavily in commercial real estate that is also collapsing. Spread your risk and follow the news. If I had money in WaMu or Wachovia right now I'd take it to another bank because I don't like waiting in lines.

Ten people you'll find at a bar, including "the sunglasses at night guy" and the guy who "got off work four hours ago, but is still in his suit and tie."

Jack Goes Forth is becoming a very pleasurable read as he finds his voice.

Meet Wayne Gerdes, a "hypermiler" who can get over 100 mpg fuel efficiency in an unmodified hybrid. He turns off the car while on the road and drafts tractor trailers, among other techniques.

"We've been getting a free ride on the global gravy train. Other countries are starting to reclaim their resources and goods, so as Americans are priced out of various markets, the rest of the world is going to enjoy the consumption of goods Americans had previously purchased. This is a natural consequence of this phony economy."

Blogger Jeff Simmeron started an internet war with a local coffee chain. If his name sounds familiar it's because he came to a couple blogger happy hours that Kathryn hosted, where he would pass out business cards with his blog on it. I thought it was a neat idea, but others disagreed. How much I miss Kathryn's events.

Chart of virginity rates among college students according to major. Mathematics and chemistry majors are the big losers. One word: Communications.

A Day At The Pool

July 20, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I don't like swimming pools. I know not everyone cleans their ass as well as I do. But swimming a few laps works my body more than running, and water offers less resistance than concrete pavement.

The kids always take up the swim lane so I wait until the 15-minute rest period to get in the water. Today there were two women still hanging around in my lane, and since it was quiet I could hear them talking. They were speaking Portuguese, and most likely from Brazil.

I watched while I waited. One had to be in her 40's, slowly wading through the lane getting just a bit of exercise, while the other, much younger, was still. She put her back against the concrete wall and placed her arms behind on the ledge, pushing her breasts out. I did want to see more, and I had the perfect excuse.

I moved slowly down the lane to where they were, slowly only because that's how it is when you walk in water. Looking at both I said, "Mind if I share the lane so I can swim a couple laps?" There was silence. Maybe they don't speak English, I thought, and I was ready to mime the act of swimming so they'd understand. But the older woman spoke. "Oh she doesn't speak English. Sure go ahead."

"Are you two from Brazil?"

"Yes we are."

I told them I recognized the language, said a couple words that any gringo who has been to Brazil would know, smiled, and then went back to the other side of the pool to start my swim.

The concept is so logical but yet so foreign to me: meeting people in the neighborhood. That's how most of the teenagers did it, anyway. I was always so focused on bars and clubs that god knows how many opportunities I missed right in front of my doorstep.

I did five brisk laps before I got tired and stopped at the other end of the pool, where the two Brazilians were already settled. I was right next to the older woman, and I don't remember who started talking first, but it started. About her country, my country, marriage, life, food, girls, guys. Our observations about American culture were similar and not so positive, but we agreed that it's easier to have a comfortable life here. You don't need to be rich to have a car, apartment, a million channels and the like. We talked for one hour, the sun baking me much more than her light brown skin.

She told me so many funny stories that my cheeks became sore from laughing. One was about the younger girl wading nearby, the daughter of a close friend, who came to the U.S. only a couple months ago. Fresh off the boat, uncorrupted, and shy to speak the little English she knows. Her first day in this family pool she wore a thong bikini, got in the water, and was too embarrassed to come back out after catching everyone's attention. "You know Brazilians, we don't like clothes," the woman said. Yes, I know.

The younger one had the Brazilian ass, of course—seemingly muscular, with a cute young face, long hair, and smooth olive skin. She's from Florianopolis, if you happen to know the south of Brazil. I'd be surprised if she was over 22 or so, but I never asked. While I was talking to the older woman the girl got in my field of view. She pinched her nose and then leaned backwards into the water. She came back up and slowly wiped the water from her hair with her hands. The sun was shining so strong I could only see the outline of her face. But It was beautiful nonetheless. She was beautiful. I tried to pretend I wasn't affected.

The older woman kept saying that I need to teach the girl English, and in exchange she will teach me Portuguese. I suggested that would be a fine idea, but was careful not to appear too eager. She could start teaching me numbers, I said, so I can understand when the clerk at the Brazilian store nearby tells me how much I owe. The woman even told me their address, telling me to stop by anytime.

If nothing comes of this it won't be for lack of effort. I already know how I'm going to do it. I'm going to buy a two liter bottle of Guarana from the Brazilian store and take it to their place. They will invite me in, minutes will turn into hours, and if there is some attraction the rest will be inevitable. That's how I imagine it anyway.

It seems cliche almost. Brazilian girls, sensual, sexual, open, different, warm. But my experiences do not lie. I know what is in store for me if I knock on that door. Some cultures build their women for men, and some do not.

Not Yet Titled

July 21, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

True I'm a slacker, but sometimes I get work done. I just finished the rough draft of book number two, which I've been working on since around March. Editing takes a while so I'm thinking it'll be done early 2009. Then I take a look at the world map on my wall and pick a place.

Bang is closing in on its 500th copy sold. It will probably happen sometime next month (it's already been a year). I've been considering going the published route with this second book, but the process to get published seems so long, drawn-out, and discouraging. Literary agents and publishing houses take 2-6 months to get in touch with your query letter and after that it's no shorter than a year by the time you see it on bookshelves. Plus most authors don't earn anything beyond their advance, which I speculate is $5,000 – $15,000 for a never-published author.

My bet is I'll stick with the indie route. It's serving me well so far.

It Doesn’t Matter If She Orgasms Or Not

July 23, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I used to try to last as long as possible in bed. I wanted to make sure the girl got hers before I got mine, and the reason I did that was because I thought she would be attracted to me more and want to see me again.

My former brand of condom made it very hard for me to ejaculate. I’d be pumping away for more than twenty minutes until she just got tired and then I would lay in bed with a heavy set of balls. Sometimes she’d finish me off with her mouth but sometimes not, and I remember times I had to go home and jerk off after having sex. It was humiliating.

Eventually I found out about thin condoms and blasting was no longer a problem, but I had to think of baseball or organic chemistry so I could at least hit the respectable 12 minute mark. I knew how to hold my orgasm by squeezing my pelvic muscles and would do that if I thought I didn’t go long enough, even though it would eventually result in a pitiful orgasm.

Gradually I just stopped caring, and soon everything I did in bed was for my pleasure only. The only reason I’d delay orgasm is to make mine better, and I pretended I don’t hear her the first time she told me to drill slower or not to go so deep. I did whatever I wanted because I came to value my orgasm as sacred, and her pleasure as second to mine.

Do you want to guess what happened?

Nothing. Nothing happened. Girls didn’t want to fuck me more, they didn’t want to fuck me less. Not caring about their sexual pleasure had no effect on repeat calls and repeat sex.

For guys all that matters is the end, but for girls it’s the process. As long as she gets into it and can say, “I’m getting fucked good and this feels great,” then you’ve done your job. Sure if you make her orgasm on demand you’ll definitely hear from her again, but it’s not necessary and just too complicated to worry about. Keep in mind some girls barely know how to make themselves orgasm!

Every now and then I get a feeling that I gave a girl an orgasm, but I can never be sure because I don’t ask.

The Dark Knight Is A Stupid Movie

July 27, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In pains me deeply to write this because friends and family I trust and respect loved The Dark Knight, but after watching the movie I believe it's because the hype machine sucked them in along with everyone else.

> But Roosh, The Dark Knight has a whopping 95%Tomatometer. What could you possibly have noticed that even professional critics could not see?

I shall explain. Allow me to bring you fanboys back into the realm of reality and reason.

Minor Problems

1. When did Gotham City become bright and lovely New York City? A place that I could live and possibly raise a family, with modern skyscrapers at 100% occupancy and busy streets full of new cars and smartly dressed people.

2. Bruce can simultaneously defeat fifty men at a time armed to the teeth, but is thwarted by a nylon net, a two inch blade, and an ill-tempered dog.

3. Holy shit is the Joker organized! He embarrasses the mob, Batman, and the police at the same time, one step ahead of everyone, planting bombs pretty much everywhere every day and able to infiltrate the deepest rungs of power to kill and maim. He drives no. 2 pencils through the skulls of man. He can take punches from martial arts master Bruce Wayne and can even kick his ass. But he can't aim a fucking bazooka!

4. Rachel's (Maggie Gyllenhaal) death was stupid and confusing. Batman said he was going to save Rachel but ended up saving Harvey. That forces me to believe that the Joker switched the addresses up on purpose. But then we're sort of kind urged to believe Rachel was a sacrifice and the police commissioner was in on it. No surprise this mess involved Maggie Gyllenhaal, a co-star in Donnie Darko, the most confusing film of all time.

5. When a movie has you rooting for the villain to win and kill the hero and his fake robot voice, it has failed. Especially when said villain's life kept getting saved by our confused hero, even if it caused him great injury.

6. Deebo the prisoner has a heart of steel but the general public are murderous, stupid animals who should be stripped of their right to vote. You are the general public.

Major Problems

1. Rachel. A homely, unlikable, somewhat masculine spinster was able to string along two of Gotham's most desirable bachelors? And I was supposed to be sad when she died? I was quite pleased! Both men could do better than the alpha bitch whose grating presence is a bad influence on young American girls. Playing the field leads to unhappiness for women, not marriage with a high-profile male.

2. Two-Face's Transformation. Forced, absurd, and not believable. One moment he's risking his life to save the city but the next he turns into a homicidal maniac because his bitchy girlfriend died? And it took a private one-on-one with the Joker, the man who killed her, to do it?! The relationship between Harvey and Rachel seemed like a stiff friendship, and it was impossible to jump to the conclusion that her death sent his mind to the fiery pits of hell. Plus with his brain basically exposed from the face fire he would surely get an infection and die within two days, yet he was fully functional and even able to speak without any impediment even though he looked like a mummy in The Mummy.

3. No resolution. In any good story something has to change. The hero has to transform and realize something or the end has to be different than the beginning. This is why Batman Begins is a good movie. But in The Dark Knight the only change occurred in Two Face, a secondary character, and it was dumb dumb dumb. Batman regressed into a Big Brother figure tapping everyone's phone and manipulating the press and the Joker will be sent to a jail that he'll surely escape from. The very end has Batman barely escaping from… wait for it… the police! Because a dead LAWYER gives hope to a city! The real reason there is no resolution is because they want money for a sequel, which millions will wait in line for hours to see and then praise.

I'm now convinced that any movie that debuts number one at the box office is just mindless trash, engineered by committee to be liked by as many people worldwide as possible, who lap it up like an obese cat drinking milk from a dirty bowl.

11 Types Of Roosh Hate

July 29, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I study my haters like a zoologist would study a population of caged primates unable to reproduce. Here are the types of Roosh hate I've noticed over the years…

1. Boring / lame. Here haters wonder if I was dropped on my head as a baby. Others ask if I'm ever going to write something that isn't so incredibly boring or lame, or both.

2. Sexist pig. Seen in the early days and coming from mostly single women (Chase, hedonistic_pleasureseeker), this style of hate equates me to a cold monster who should move to Afghanistan where I can get a mindless slave women since that is what I deeply want. Or a mail order bride. Many state that no accomplished American women will find me tolerable and I will definitely die alone.

3. Overcompensation. This hate insists that I'm a fake alpha who wishes to undue years of being beta, and that I will never succeed at being truly alpha.

4. Overanalytical. These haters claimed I look too much into things, trying to piece together pieces from the wrong puzzle. I should get a life and "go outside" to enjoy things instead of writing about it.

5. Appearance. I'm an ugly, hairy, smelly, dirty beast of a man. Last year for a couple months "hairy" hate was tremendously popular, but has since died down and replaced with comments about me being greasy.

6. Bad writer. My writing style and vocabulary leaves much to be desired and I shouldn't quit my day job.

I quit my day job and moved in with my Dad. There was an explosive surge in hate with all-new material.

7. Underachiever. Hate comments that say I am a worthless unemployed loser who still lives at home in Dad's basement. Shows up in seemingly unrelated topics, like cinema. Currently the most popular form of hate and found in pretty much every post.

8. Sellout. I'm a money-hungry hack for having advertisements and that I should get a real job.

9. Gay. Haters claim I'm secretly gay and obviously like very large cocks in my mouth or anus.

Some haters try to aim for the gut with hate that takes some thought and time to construct…

10. I know you. This was used by only two or three accomplished haters. It combines many of the above styles of hate into a well written message that is meant to shake me emotionally. Basic formula: "Roosh, I've been reading you for many years now and really want to see you succeed. I think you are a smart man with a lot of potential but now you're floundering. You're ruining your life and now you can't even get a job. I wish you the best of luck but you need to step up, move out of your dad's basement, and stop being a total loser. If you don't change things, you will be a homeless begger in a short time. Do something before it's too little, too late."

Interesting variant of "I know you" that I've seen: "Roosh I like your writing and I even bought Bang, but lately…_insert hate here_"

11. Lost customer. These haters say they were going to buy Bang, but after reading a certain post they have changed their mind and will no longer buy it. This type of hater wants me to feel financial pain instead of emotional pain.

Hater styles come and go. For example "Bad writer" was prevalent in the early days but then subsided. I published Bang and it came back on the radar. "Underachiever" was suspended for the six months I was in South America but returned when the trip was over. "Sexist pig" has not been seen for some time while "Overanalytical" pops up every now and then. And "Appearance" hate continually evolves as my look changes. My haters seem to adjust to me and my content so their hate has maximum strike force, and on some days—depending on the alignment of the moon—they all come out at the same time, unleashing their internet fury on me in wave upon wave of punishing attack.

Now allow me to construct the best Roosh hater comment possible…

> Roosh, we went to the same high school together, and we shared many interesting conversations. You were that shy guy and I was that awkward geek girl that developed nicely after high school. You probably remember me. Anyway I googled you and found your blog. I don't believe what I'm reading, and how sexist you've become with your fake alpha male persona. You were a good person back then, but from reading this I just don't know. Even your writing has suffered, and these advertisements lead me to believe you're just about the money. The reason I googled you is because I wanted to hang out with you again and maybe even romantically date you, but now I don't think so. You've turned into someone I no longer know or want to know. Whereas before I'd buy anything written by you, there is no way I'm going to buy your disgusting, overanalytical fuck guide, and I will tell everyone I know not to buy it as well. Do yourself a favor: get back on track, get out of your dad's basement, stop being a gay loser beta douche, and re-enter modern society with a nice paying job. You're capable of so much more.
>
> A girl who cares,
>
> -Anonymous

Here's some guesses for possible future styles of hate: long-term relationship ("Look how pussy-whipped you've become, beta boy"), moving to a another city / country ("You can't handle it in cut-throat DC, go back to the minor leagues fucktard"), and less frequent blogging ("You've run out of material… hang it up bro it was good while it lasted, and by the way I'm unsubscribing from your RSS feed").

I ban haters when they least expect it. It's fun to watch their hate gradually increase in intensity as they gain more and more confidence. I want them to taste power. Months go by and they think they can hate with impunity, then BAM—they are banned and get automatically forwarded to a certain YouTube video meant to inflict upon them great shame, and since they are my most regular visitors, emotional pain as well.

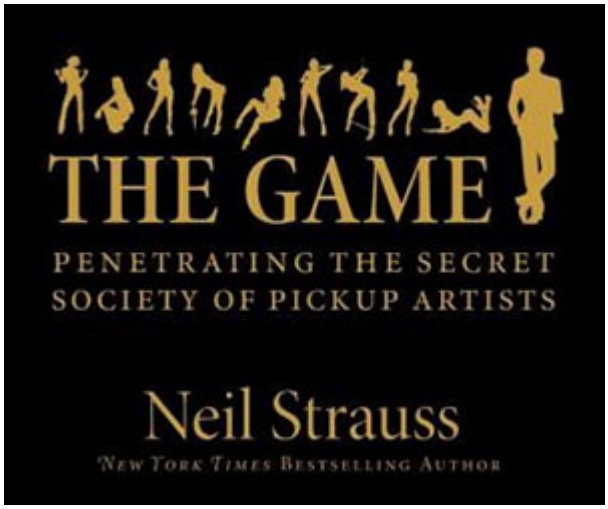
If I still had my old corporate job, which many haters desperately want me to return to for some reason, I'd assign points to each category of hate, store a flask of sweet rum in a drawer, and turn this into a drinking game…

"Greasy hair…" sip.
"Cockgobbler…" full shot.



The Easy Way Out

July 31, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This excerpt is from Bang...

> With any task you do, whether it be related to women or sports or any type of game, there are a certain number of times you must fail until you succeed. Each act of failure puts you one step closer to success. During an important presentation at work in front of thirty scientists, I interchanged the words lactose and lactate several times. This is akin to showing up at a meeting in the Oval Office without wearing pants. While I was embarrassed afterwards, it taught me simple but essential rules of how to plan and construct a presentation for educated professionals. With each presentation, I got better and better, until I was the preferred person to present data generated by our group. But without those initial mistakes, I wouldn't have been able to polish my skills. Not doing anything may prevent you from failure, but because you make no attempt, it prevents you from success as well. This principle is especially important when it comes to women because you need to rack up a boatload of rejections to understand how to be really good with them. I have been rejected more than most guys I know, but I have also been with more women than most guys I know. You try more, you get more—there is no secret to it.

A week ago I got an email from a guy. He said he's been reading my newsletters and he likes them, and is ready to put them into action with a girl he likes. He wanted specific advice for this situation so that he could succeed on his very first at-bat.

I don't think he liked the advice I gave him, which focused on the long-term instead of the short-term.

Improving your game is not meant for any one girl, it's meant for you. It's meant to give you a skill that you can use until you die. Studying the game or improving for one girl is supplication. You might as well impress her with a fancy car or put on magic pig pheromones.

A lot of guys don't understand that you have to fail a lot with the girls you want to get the girls you want. I keep tabs on the seduction community and there are a lot of products that promote instant, effortless change which appeal to the guys like the one who wrote me. They want to come across as supreme alpha stud to bang the girl in Psychology class. They want to get better NOW to get that gorgeous girl at work. He wants to fake it with a couple magic lines and live the rest of his days as a happy man with the dream girl that all other guys want. But it doesn't work like that.

If you're not ready to put in the work, to get rejected and allow girls to spit on your fragile ego, you will never be good. There is no shortcut.

It's Friday. There's no reason why you shouldn't do at least 10 approaches this weekend. You'll get rejected in most of them, I can promise you that, but come Monday you'll feel like a king. You'll be a bit closer.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

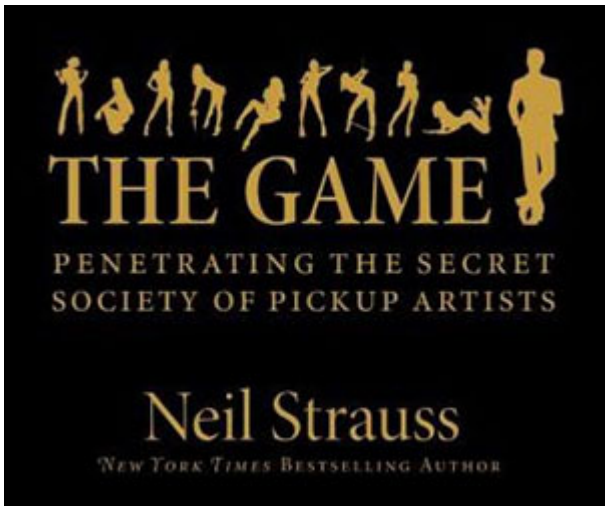
Real Man Travel Guides

August 2, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I didn't like that my South America travel guides were buried on this here blog, so I spun it off onto its own site. I'm pleased to announce Real Man Travel Guides.

I hope that doing this commits me to updating it after future travels. When I'm 40-years-old I envision a gigantic bible that many young men will use as their sole reference to plan travel. "Bro you shouldn't go there because the guide gave it a low rating." It's very likely that this could be the death nail in Lonely Planet, Fodors, Rough Guide, and Frommers, but only time will tell.

What I need from you now are reports on how the girls are like in countries I haven't been to. Only together can we conquer the world… sexually.



Not Hot Or Pretty

August 3, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Look at this picture…

Why do 99% of men go ga-ga for this shit? Fake hair, fake eyes, and probably fake breasts. The girl in front is 40-years-old judging by her neck and the other one has a man face without makeup. Yeah I'd fuck 'em, but so what? I wouldn't bother unless they made a strong attempt on my junk. Put any skinny white girl in blonde hair with thick goopy eyeliner and guys will act like stupid dogs. True beauty is lost on this culture.

This is beauty:

Shit wrong picture. Though notice every girl has long hair. Definitely not American. This is beauty:

THIS is beauty:

:tard:

My Philosophy On Life

August 4, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Easy come…

If you're experiencing a period of joy or pleasure, either with a situation or a person, cherish it because it will not last. Nothing lasts.

Gray

You're not only happy or only unhappy but happy about some things and unhappy about others. The worst question in the world is "Are you happy?" Happiness is more like a thermostat, and throughout your life it will be stubbornly constant, moving only if you change how you think about the events that happen to you. If everyone experiences the same things, heartbreak and illness, money problems and aging, the main thing that differs us is how we think.

Decisions

The difference between a good life and "bad luck" are the choices you make. Seemingly intelligent people make poor choices that eventually lead to disaster. Getting in that car after too much to drink, standing down when you should stand up, letting life idle by in front of a television set, abusing your body with poor health choices, not living within your means, having unprotected sex with a stranger. These are the things we do without daily conscious thought but nonetheless increase the risk for future disaster. "Why me?" I can tell you why.

Today

It doesn't matter what happened yesterday. It's done, finished, and no amount of reflection or regret will change unless you act. Constant, focused action on the present helps fix the past. It sets your future.

Rare

If you find someone with character, don't let that person go. The world is full people who will sell out their beliefs, their words, their country, and their fellow man for money or power. You have government agents spying on their neighbor because they want a steady job. You have doctors who put their name on research papers for a drug that's as bad as the disease. You have the pastor with the extra marital affairs, the environmentalist who owns a car, the family values conservative who flirts with little boys, the lawyer who suppreses free speech for his big money client, the libertarian who takes government assistance, the mayor who helps his friends before his voters. The only way I can sleep at night is if my words and my thoughts match how I live my life. Without character you're a fraud.

Empty

No one will complete you or make you better or happier than you can make yourself. This is true for many reasons, but the biggest is if someone else was much better or happier than you, they wouldn't waste their time on you. Everything that is needed to become fulfilled and self-actualized and so on is only found within you. The faster you realize that the sooner you'll stop waiting for someone else to do a job you can do for yourself.

Stages

There is comfort and then there is growth. You can't do both at the same time. If you are comfortable in life right now then you are not growing. I think I'll go for comfort when I run out of ideas. Or when I'm ready to die.

Extra credit

You need a project, something beyond your normal job or habits, that pushes you do and learn things you've never done before, something that has a journey with a concrete beginning and a not so concrete end. And when time comes for you to move on to something else, when you're sitting around for weeks or months with that empty feeling of accomplishing nothing beyond mere survival, a new project comes into your mind and off you go again. A meaningful life is a series of projects.

UFO's

If you haven't experienced it first hand then you don't know, regardless of the authority. It's just time killing entertainment. It's not true unless you see it, touch it, feel it, taste it, until it's confirmed beyond a reasonable doubt. There's theoretical knowledge and there's applied knowledge. But don't take my word for it.

Should, must, have

You don't have to do anything but die. There's no rules in life. Anyone who pushes rules onto you is suffocating by theirs. No one said you have to work for megacorp on the exact same days and same hours as everyone else. Think about this concept we have called "rush hour." Twice a day most of the population drags themselves to work and then back home again. Who said it had to be that way? Who said you have to have to own a house and car and barbecue grill to be a complete person? Who said you had to work hard most of your life to save money until you can barley bend over to tie your shoes? Who said you had to act and talk and look like everyone else? If you can't answer why you are doing everything you are doing then you're living by someone else's rules, not your own.

Late

The most important thing in life is time. Besides basic survival with food, shelter, and clothing, it's the only thing you should fear losing. While many people are lucky enough to live long lives, you may not. I'm not a gambling man—I'm not going to assume I will live to 76.3 years of age. Time is a savings account, and you're drawing on it with soulless endeavors and draining relationships. You will die before you are ready, and there is no praying or hoping or wishing that will get back the time you did not spend wisely.

Garbage in…

Everyone wants to get something for nothing. Quick cash with scratch tickets, quick weight loss with pills, a big house with a self-destruct loan, Hollywood style love, talentless fame. People want the sweet things without having to taste the bitter. I don't know if the things I do in life are right or not, but if it's really hard to do and I curse it every night before I go to bed wishing life was easier then it's safe bet I'll have a rich payoff. If it’s easy then it’s not worth doing.

Belonging To The Tribe

August 6, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I almost bought the hummus. I was on my way to a picnic to say goodbye to an awesome girl who was going to Africa to end poverty. But I did some thinking. She is white and educated, so it's a guarantee that her friends are also white and educated. That means it's a 100% certainty that someone else will bring hummus. I settled on the pumpkin butter, something that filled the picnic-goers with surprise and pleasure.

Most of the people in the picnic have traveled and done volunteer work. They were all hyper-educated and were vegan, vegetarian, or flex-vegetarian. The snacks they brought were natural, organic, free-range, low sodium, trans-fat free, and without preservatives. I'm pretty sure each one donated to the Obama campaign and owned several Apple computer products. One guy had a American Apparel drooping v-neck shirt on. They almost creamed themselves when they saw I had a cheap disposable camera I called my "art project."

Now there's nothing wrong with them and they were all very interesting people, but they belong to a group that can be easily—and comically—pegged. When you belong to a group, that group owns you. You will dictate your life based on keeping up with them. You will always evaluate your life based on what others in the group are doing. Yet people feel that if they don't belong to something they are nothing. They can't make decisions because they want to do what is perceived as acceptable or cool.

I find it more interesting to dip my wick in many groups, committed to no lifestyle but the one I make for myself, a mix and match that fits my hopefully unique personality. There is no style like the one I create on my own… until I step in a foreign hostel and notice all the other guys are long-haired bearded hippies who dabble in art or writing, distrusting authority and committed to living a frugal lifestyle. Pure coincidence.

Turns out two other people brought hummus.

14 Problems With Americans In One Picture

August 10, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

1. Lack of originality. Men who look as generic as possible with jeans and stripped shirt uniform. Women who stay on top of trends spoon fed to them through advertising.

2. Bad hair. Men who dip their heads in buckets of pomade wax. Women who don't let their hair grow out to proper feminine length (small of back).

3. Feminization of men. Men who are clean shaven in an attempt to have smooth skin like a girl instead of a rugged ugly face like a real man.

4. Bad time management. Men who waste time on girls who obviously are not going to bang them. Young man in the photo is sinking time into a girl who is about to get married. He'd have better luck trying to convert a lesbian. Single girls in picture are not making flirty eye contact with other men even though they are single, lonely, and most likely desperate.

5. No concept of respect or commitment. Bride-to-be allows a strange man to rub his erection on her ass a day or two before exchanging vows to another man. Leads to….

6. Perverse idea of marriage. Doing it just to do it, not because you want to spend the rest of your life with someone. This marriage will not cross the three year mark.

7. Attention whoring. Women who get off on attention, no matter how negative. Bride-to-be on a mission to specifically get drunk and arouse strange men because of bachelorette party "custom."

8. Insecure about place in society. Middle class individuals spending 15% of their take home pay on overpriced table service to feel special, cool, or exclusive (bottom left). Leads to…

9. Perennial debtors. Does not understand the concept of saving or living within one's means.

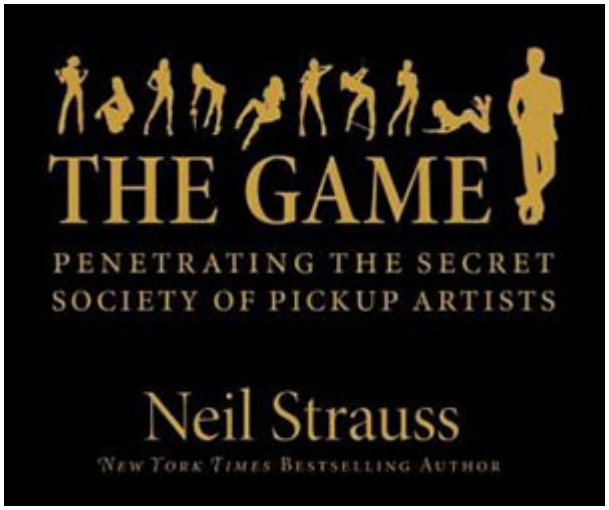
10. Lazy. Obsession with ugly, cheap Target flip flops that display an unwillingness to make sacrifices and go the full mile (girl in black dress).

11. Poor social skills. Use of alcohol as a crutch for social situations. Girls are stiff like soldiers unless numbed by a drug (double fisting girl on right). Conversations with both genders are often painful because of constant self-referencing and use of filler words such as "like" and "you know."

12. No rhythm or dancing skills. Look at the young man with his awkward lean move.

13. Nosy and interfering. Girl in black dress is getting a kick that her friend is getting grinded on but will soon "save" her. Even if future bride wasn't getting married, the cockblock has a 90% chance of occurring.

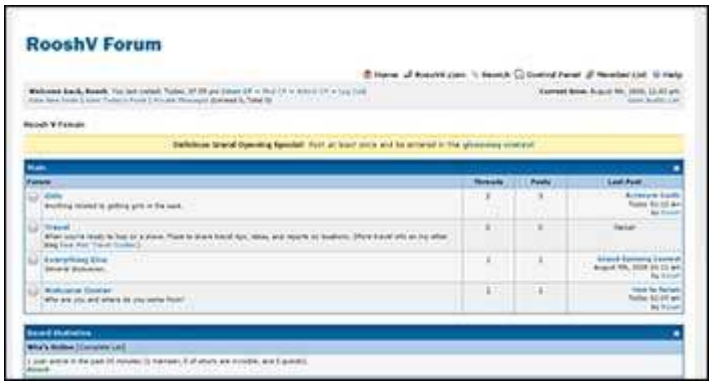
14. Approval seeking. Bride-to-be is looking at her friend to see if her behavior is deemed acceptable or not. She doesn't know how to act or think unless she gets cues from girls she knows, or celebrities she reads about in glossy magazines.



Introducing The Forum

August 11, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I tried to start a forum two years ago but shut it down after a couple months. I picked bad forum software, didn't promote the forum well, and had only one board category with no theme or direction. I learned from my mistakes. Yesterday I opened doors to the Roosh V Forum.



Staring a forum is pretty tough (less than 1% of my readers post comments), so to help things along I'm giving away two prizes. If you make at least one post in the forum in the next three weeks, you will be entered in a random drawing for a $25 gift certificate to Condom Depot or a $15 gift certificate to Amazon.com.

Two specific reasons I want a forum:

1. I want to birth a living beast that is independent of me, like an online version of Fight Club.

2. It's getting hard to keep up with all the emails and Facebook messages I get that ask me for advice. I feel bad when I get an email that starts with, "Roosh I need help this weekend I'm seeing a girl…" and then I don't get to it until a week after. With a forum people can ask questions and get advice besides just from me.

So check it out, register your moniker, and mess around with the control panel and the software's many excellent features. My signature quote is selected and ready to inspire.

I Am A Blogger Stud

August 12, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Four months ago I was in a haiku contest sponsored by the Washington City Paper. I lost the contest, surprisingly, and found it disappointing that my haikus were worthy of mention instead of my blog.

Well ladies and gentlemen, yesterday I finally got the recognition I deserve.

Presenting…. Blogger Stud Living in Dad's Basement, Writing Second Book on How to Get Laid

I talked to the writer on the phone last week and she was very interested in my basement living situation along with the fact that I don't have a job. I fully expected her to rip me to shreds but the post was mostly pro-Roosh. Even the hater comments that followed were very tame.

One section I wanted to elaborate on:

> Roosh V is following his bang-up book Bang (no subtitle by intention so that dudes can read it in coffee shops without everyone knowing they're losers looking for advice on how to get laid)…

That was a unnecessary low blow to any guy trying to improve his lot with the ladies and shows you where the mainstream media stands on pick up (I've never seen a MSM article on pick up that was favorable to men). If she directly quoted me it would have went like this: "I made the cover very plain so a guy could read it in coffee shops and no one else would know he's reading a book about getting laid." It seems like the writer has a grudge against guys who like to bed tons of women.

Let me put it this way: what would happen to the American female gender if more men were empowered with choice instead of settling with frigid women who have no problems withholding sex to increase their power? For starters they'd be forced to learn how to please men instead of devoting large amounts of time into fashion, celebrity culture, and eating. We may see this in our lifetimes as desirable American males look increasingly abroad for wives who cannot comprehend this concept called "me time."

An Intimate Tour

August 14, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previous Videos:

- How To Be A Master Blogger Like Me
- The Big Leagues
- Bike Ride Home
- Ecuador Death Road & We're Pretty Much Homeless
- 6 Months In South American In 5 Minutes

Here a video tour of my house a la MTV Cribs. The video starts in what was actually the middle, but I had to edit it down from the 12 minutes I had. The result is good enough for a Friday slot. Stick around for the end…

An Intimate Tour from Roosh V on Vimeo.

Will She Keep The Baby?

August 17, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previously: Thoughts On Ejaculating Inside A Girl

There are two questions I ask a girl when it's time to ditch the condom.

First Question: "Are you on the pill?"

What's the point of having a main squeeze if you can't have unprotected sex? If she wasn't on the pill and were to start it the next day, remember it takes at least a month for the infertility to kick in. Unfortunately the percent of casual dating relationships that reach the one month mark is something like 20%. (American "dating" has become such a joke.)

The second question is a little more involved, and I try to find a moment when she's likely to answer truthfully because my future well-being may depend on it.

Second Question: "If you got pregnant right now, what would you do?"

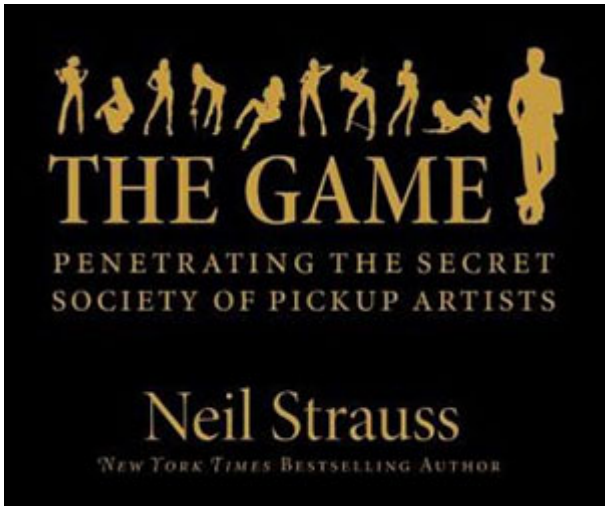
Note the phrasing of the question. I don't want to lead the witness with my desired answer. I'm searching for the truth here.

There's two components to her answer that you must take care to note: her actual words and the time it takes for her to answer. You probably guessed that the less important part of the answer are her words, which most of the time will be along the lines of "I'd take care of it." Sure, at that moment in space time when she's talking to you she wouldn't consider having the baby, but a real pregnancy can change a woman's mind. Flashbacks of teenage years spent babysitting, thoughts of baby showers and shopping for baby clothes, and ongoing nagging from mom have strong effects on a woman.

The least she could say is she'd take care of it. If a girl says she would "think about it" then she might as well be planning to have a baby with you. The best possible answer for me is when a girl describes how an unexpected little Rooshy would ruin her plans for a more successful career, future travel plans, better furniture, a larger condominium, and sexier shoes.

The time it takes for her to answer your question tells you if she has given serious thought about getting pregnant or not. If she answers quickly with something that feels like a prepared statement then you can place strong weight into her answer. But if she takes just a couple seconds to reply that means she is searching not for the real answer but probably the one you want to hear. Or it could be one of the girls that I recently dated, who said she's keep the baby and not tell me. She said it would be "none of your business." I kid you not.

Even if you never ejaculate inside a woman go ahead and ask her anyway because how about if your pre-jizz is so potent that it has enough sperm to create life? I think that's a myth, by the way, but I don't really have any scientific evidence to prove it (i.e. please don't take my word for it).



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Exit Strategy

August 20, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

“I had an nice apartment in Southwest DC. This was in the 70’s. The apartment had a great view and I lived a short walk away from a row of clubs. I’d get off work every day at three and by four I was drinking.

“In short time my place became the party spot. Girls would call other girls, who came with other guys and girls. There were always women, in and out. It was just one woman after the other I was taking to bed. Man, some of them were so beautiful.”

A big grin formed on his face as described one particular girl, using his hands to shape her body.

“But after nine months I had to get out of there. I moved to the suburbs, not far from here but before it was developed.”

“Why did you move?” I asked.

“I wasn’t respecting women. They meant nothing. They were great girls, very good girls, but after a few days I’d move on to the next one.”

“You’re a stronger man that me,” I said.

“No, look. There was one guy there who was a decade older than me, and I was already older than most people so he was that much older than everyone. I’d see him all the time at my favorite club and he was always surrounded by people. You can tell how happy he was when there was a crowd around him. In this club he was respected and known, but that’s all he had. That’s all he lived for. I looked at him and knew that’s not where I wanted to go.

“That type of lifestyle, it’s shallow. Very shallow.”

Forum Update

August 23, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The forum is going very well. Since I opened it two weeks ago there's been 480 posts in 59 threads from 103 users. Here's a couple of threads you may have missed:

- Best Places To Meet Women
- Good Game Philosophy
- Ethiopian Girls
- Traveling To Italy

Make a post by September 2 and you'll be entered into the grand opening contest.

Work

August 24, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

To understand work I first looked at the ants, who work so hard they are called worker ants, as if they exist in a permanent state of work. They are just like the bees, the worker bees, protecting the queen of their hive. Such short leisure time in such short, pitiful lives.

I looked at the rat. There is no worker rat so they must not work as hard, but they scurry at night, running from trash heap to trash heap. Perhaps they know leisure more than the ant knows leisure, but so much time they have to spend to forage for food—and so scared they are, trying to outwit man and his cruel traps.

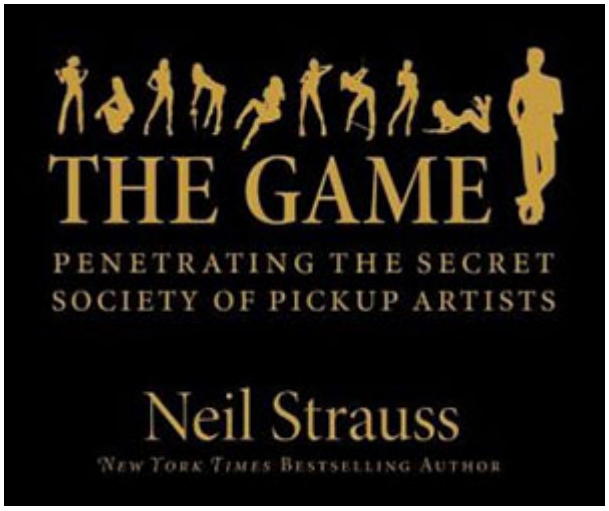
I looked at the lion. The lazy lion, lazy without a doubt, relaxing in the shade, sleeping, licking his paws, resting between meals. The little cubs who know nothing but play and the king lion who lets the women do all the work of the hunt. The lion, I'm assured, knows much less work than the ant, the bee, and the rat.

I looked at the elephant. Even lazier! Sucking in water by the pond, always bathing and snacking on greens from the trees. But alas, elephants and lions are not very smart animals. Smarter than the ant, the bee, and the rat, for sure, but not as smart as the others.

I looked at the gorilla. Man's little brother. But he's the laziest of them all! Fucking and eating all day, cleaning the fleas off his fur and scratching his ass in the jungle without a care in the world. How much time would I have to sit and wait to see him break a sweat!

I looked at my fellow man. With such large brains they must have figured out how to work even less. But wait—he is like the ants and the bees! One third of his waking life into his labor; labor for another—labor he hates! What a twist of fate, a horrible mistake—what an unhappy and busy lot! How lucky is the queen who see the fruits of his labor—what a life for her!

If only the gorilla could laugh, he would surely laugh at the human, who has decided to strain and bend his back lower than him. And laugh he does. The gorilla, you see, does not have to ask to take a vacation. But the human, the poor human—he must bow his head ever so slightly and speak with a soft, gentle voice, and he must ask permission, and hope that it is granted. He must always please his queen.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

In A World Crowded With Pick Up Artists

August 26, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My hostel in Cordoba, Argentina was full of guys who were cocky motherfuckers. It was harder to differentiate myself from the pack when our styles of game was so similar. If you liked a gringo girl there, which was rare since the natives are so much more beautiful than chubby English girls, you'd have to fight three other guys who were working on her as well. It became important that the quality of what we spit become important. Simply teasing wasn't good enough—you had to be an accomplished tease and bring out your best material.

At the Reef bar in D.C., pick up artist central for those training in semi-underground lairs, most of the guys use the exact same game since they are learning from each other. Being "cocky and funny" is one of the first things they learn so you have a dozen of them every weekend to the Reef desensitizing the girls there to the that type of approach.

This bar is the exception. In most other places you don't girls who have this intense shield to game, but in five or ten years I can see it becoming like this is most bars in large cities. Will game eventually become ineffective?

No, if case you were wondering. Game will always perform better than being a spineless beta male who can't even do his manly duty to approach a cute girl he likes. Though I believe the bar will be raised. There are two ways to hedge against this outcome:

1. Continuous Improvement. Begin with a good starting point of game that works and then gradually inject your own style into it until it's completely yours. If you're using material that no one guy is using, and that is optimized for your personality, then you won't get this shield that lair members are getting at the Reef (one must question why they flock there repeatedly in such large numbers).

2. Supreme Confidence. The only thing you can't fake is supreme confidence, gained only through massive amounts of experience, failure, and most importantly, success. In ten years if every guy has a cocky vibe then the girls will select the men who they believe has the confidence to back it. It's important to work on the words you are saying, but remember the point of those words are just to show you are a confident man. Once you get confidence, the words naturally come out of your mouth and match with the correct alpha body language. You'll be able to read from a phone book but it won't shake the attraction she has for you. I’m not exaggerating.

Things went back to normal after I left the hostel in Cordoba. Future hostels were full of beta males all too eager to please the girls and my D-grade lazy material would get girls staring and asking me what I was doing for dinner. The Earth realigned itself.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

Disappointed

August 28, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I stumbled on a web site which shows how you will look in 30 years if you submit a photo. I was a little bored so I submitted the following photo taken in January 2007 when I had short hair.

This is what it spit out as the future Roosh…

This Labor Day weekend I will be deeply contemplating my troubled future.

The Myth Of Getting With The Friend

September 1, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The first thing a guy asks when his buddy meets a new girl is:

“Does she have cute friends?”

I used to be that guy. I used to plead with my friends to hook me up with the friend before he even had a chance to bang his girl. But after many years of begging I must conclude getting with the friend simply doesn’t occur. I have never banged a girl that was the friend of a girl my buddy dated. I think I know why…

Her friends will not be cute. If 2% of all girls are cute then chances the friend will be cute might as well be zero.

Second, there is the compatibility issue. The odds that a random girl plucked from the city will match me at the slightest is very low, which is why approaching on any night takes a few attempts until I find a seed worth being watered (assuming the girls are interested, of course).

Third, I believe girls are hesitant to go full steam ahead with a guy who is close buddies with a guy her girlfriend started dating. Even though it may spur drama and jealousy, things girls are very much into, don’t underestimate a girls desire to have quick sex with someone not already plugged into her social circle.

There is a fourth reason that is the fault of men. When we know our boy’s girl has a friend, we figure we have an “in” and can throw away a lot of the early game that builds attraction. We think we just have to stick out our hand and her mere exposure to our company will be sufficient. Unless she is into our look, that doesn’t work.

In conclusion, counting on your friends for poon is a waste of energy.

Next Month: When you’re friend says his date has “a lot” of cute friends, it’s a 100% guarantee they will be the ugliest you have ever seen in your life.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

The Art Project

September 3, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

My art project is complete after two months of carrying around a cheap disposable camera. Here are the results:

(click to enlarge)

I got jealous of my Dad's garden so I bought a bag of "plantable basil" and put it in a pot, which I'm holding in the picture. I wanted to feel that gardener pride that comes with creating life. My Dad has since taken over the basil plant without my permission. The end game was supposed make a pizza but I lost interest.

Starbucks #07417 is where I get most of my writing done. There is a table that is alone by itself near the entrance and usually I sit there with my back to the door so I'm not tempted to look outside. This picture is taken from that table.

This man is the only college friend I regularly keep in touch with. The picture captures very well the dynamic of his relationship with the girl.

Picture of a famous retired blogger. This was the first time I saw her with the "Argentine haircut" and I was very excited.

Shot of a man hug combined with a little bit of ta-ta from the girl. Taken in the crappy bar Tattoo.

I took my Dad out for dinner one night and he greatly enjoyed the belly dancing entertainment. She rolled around on the floor with a tray of tea cups and pot on her head. Very impressive.

My Dad (left) and his friend at an airport bar.

Two Brazilian girls in heated Portuguese discussion.

Neighborhood kid walking Fluffy the dog. The young man made an appearance in one of my videos. This is my favorite picture from the project.

A night out at the former bar I used to work at.

Me sitting by a pool table. Taken by Arjewtino.

Hanging out at the Reef.

This was the picnic to see off a friend, pictured. I liked the picnic idea so much that I brought a date to the same location a few days later…

She was visiting from South Africa (note her t-shirt). They don’t really make them like that in America anymore.

I know sequels are always worse (except Terminator 2), but I’m thinking of continuing the art project with another disposable camera. Digital just can’t compete to the more natural feel of film.

Bad Writing

September 4, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I'm no Hemingway but I know bad writing when I see it. My 11-year-old brother brought his English course syllabus home and after reading it I'm confident his writing skills will not improve this year. Example:

> Each unit addresses an over-arching theme designed to serve as a lens through which students explore the human experience across time and distance in their own writing and published exposition, narration, poetry, and drama.

Ahh, the language of a self-important writer. All that mess says is "Each unit allows students to practice writing."

> ...students learn the dynamic relationships among literature and language as they study the significant role language plays in literature and in the craft of expressing oneself through the written and spoken word.

"Students learn about the relationship between literature and language and how it can improve both their writing and speaking."

He goes to a public school so I guess we're lucky he can even read.

Here's a new Starbucks in-store promotion:

> The morning begins and is already complete. A wholesome, nourishing breakfast inspires a whole you. Start with coffee. Full-bodied and spicy Starbucks Anniversary Blend. Hot oatmeal completes the meal with whole grains and protein. Whole fuel to make it through the whole morning.

But is it whole?

I don't even understand the first sentence.

The worst piece of writing I have ever seen comes from the internet and was authored by Steve Gillmor from TechCrunch.

> We handle nourishment requests from our loved ones by sharing, which is another way of saying dividing the materials to just above the point where each portion proves insufficient. Children come first since quieting their cries reduces the possibility of alerting outsiders while requiring relatively small amounts compared to peers. Then the spouse or friend is satisfied, setting up a social interaction around the breaking of bread. "Let's grab a bite and talk about the deal."

Both Starbucks and Steve use the root word "nourish." Coincidence?

How To Raise A Feminist Son

September 7, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There's a blog post called How To Raise A Feminist Son over at one my guilty pleasure readings, Feministing, that is too juicy to resist commenting on. (Side note: am I the only guy who sees the word 'Fisting' in 'Feministing'?)

> My son is beautiful, smart, and extremely capable. Obviously, this terrifies me. I have spent a lot of time asking myself this very, very important question: How do I teach my son to not abuse his privilege?
>
> To be sure, I recognize the privilege my son received by accident of birth. He was born to two white, middle-class parents. I have a college education, as does my current partner and my son's father. He is an only child, and has four grandparents in his life that absolutely dote on him. There is a never-ending supply of love, learning, and involvement. My son has opportunities that many children are not blessed with.

My Comment: Liberal guilt is crushing the mother. As a result this boy will see several third world countries before his 18th birthday, his nose shoved into the trash debris of slums and ghettos to make sure he can never appreciate any future success. Also I wouldn't consider having two mother's an "opportunity." Better than having one mother perhaps but not one mother and father, the most stable of family units.

> We recently purchased a house, and to make the transition easier for him, we allowed my son to pick whatever color he wanted to paint his room. He originally picked pink. (My son adores pink, and spent most of his toddlerhood wearing pink and purple pajamas.) I agonized over the choice. There was a part of me that was overjoyed…my son obviously is confident in what he likes, and doesn't feel the need to conform to what the world tells him about being a BOY. However, I flashed forward to the time when he would invite his male friends over, and they would tease him endlessly about having a "girly" room. The thought of my child being the subject of ridicule is horrifying, as I'm sure any parent can attest to. (Plus, who wants to repaint when he changes his mind in 6 months?!) Ultimately, he chose orange walls and pink trim. I still think about this incident, though, and ponder what it means to try to balance feminist parenting with living in the "real world" where kids can and do get hurt for being different.

My Comment: This boy is not going to have any male friends to invite over if he's wearing pink clothing. I can only imagine the bulging vein that would develop in my brow if my little brothers begged for a pink room. The slapdown would be so swift and vicious that they would never consider it again. No brother or son of mine will be a beta boy on my watch. But at the same time I encourage my little brothers to grow their hair to shaggy length as opposed to the military cuts my Dad prefers and to pursue writing or artistic endeavors.

I bought butterball bro markers, crayons, and a drawing pad and for a few days it seemed like he was going go to be a Picasso, but since then the pad has found itself underneath a pile of books with his preference going to flash games he plays on the internet. No problem. But if he took an interest in dolls, pink, purple, flowers, makeup, dresses, strawberry cupcakes, or spontaneous crying or feeling I would immediately ridicule and embarrass him, calling him a "baby" and "girl," asking him if he wants me to put on a big diaper and prepare a bottle of warm milk with honey for him to suckle on. They I will watch the hardened shell of alphaness develop, and nod my head up and down in satisfaction. I will not allow him to take on feminine pursuits that will set him up to be a sensitive wussbag who cries while watching movies like The Notebook. He will be a man, just like his big bro, and he will sleep with dozens of women and go through many STD scares until one day he gets so tired of banging that he settles down with a compliant girl who loves him unconditionally, cooks, and cleans. She will serve him while he has mistresses on the side.

> My son is very sensitive. He cries easily, gets his feelings hurt often, and is generally more attuned to what is going on with people's emotions around him. He has always been kind of my little empath, reacting to the world around him and showing every bit of what he's feeling to anyone who may be paying attention. This causes MANY of the people around him, especially older men, to be very troubled by his shows of emotion. He has been told more times than I can count to "toughen up", "act like a boy", and "don't act like such a baby, girl, (insert insulting feminine word here)." I get very frustrated trying to teach him that it is OK to be that way, no matter what the world is telling him he should act like. I am actually very surprised that more of the behavior hasn't been conditioned out of him yet. I hope that reflects my never-ending support in him and how he choses to display himself. I dread the day when all the conditioning he has received about how to "act like a man" starts to take hold, and I see my beautiful son start trying to hide his emotions.

My Comment: I had to look up "empath" because I didn't know what it meant. I figured it was related to the word empathy. Here's Wikipedia: "…empaths are also able to project their own emotions, or to affect the emotions of others. As a result, empath is a term coming into common usage to refer to a person with a feeling expanded sensitivity or clairsentience." In other words an empath is a woman. I'm sorry the donated sperm had a Y chromosome instead of X, but raising a boy to be a woman is child abuse, plain and simple.

> I am very careful to correct people (mostly people that I know, although I have done it to strangers) when they ask my son "Oh, do you have a girlfriend?" that I do not presume my son's sexuality, and he may very well end up with a boyfriend, or not want to have a partner at all. This is usually met with eyerolls or stern looks.

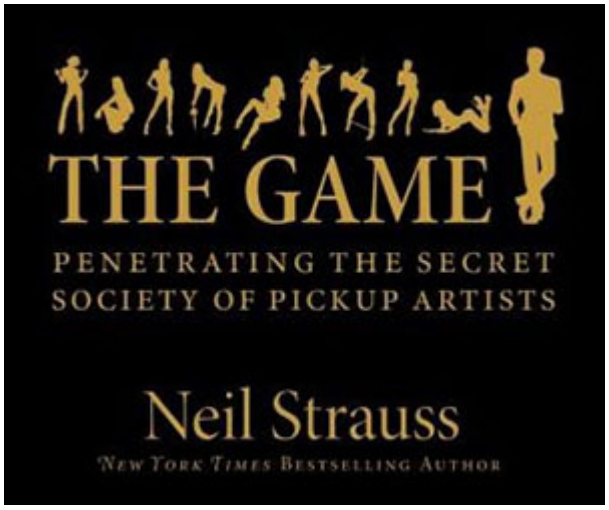
My Comment: We all know what sexuality she wants her son to be. Wink wink

> I am outreach worker for a family planning agency, so my son has spent most of his life being immersed in a very liberal, pro-choice, diverse community. I have many friends of different orientations, ethnicities, backgrounds, and beliefs. I find myself wondering if I selfishly seek out people to be acquaintances so I can provide a diverse group of people for my son to interact with. I'm not sure how to balance my desire for him to grow up surrounded by different perspectives with the knowledge that I cannot use people's lives to set examples for him. It's a difficult line to straddle.

My Comment: A vagina will spontaneously erupt from this poor boy's crotch.

Let's be real. The title of her post should be "How To Raise A Gay Son." That's her outcome and that's what she'll get. Poor kid doesn't even have a choice ("pro-choice," only when it suits her). And you know her little empath is definitely going to be a bottom, letting Rico and Gary tag team him during weekend benders. Look, if my either of my little brothers become gay then I would love them not an ounce less, but I'd be a fool to encourage it.

I remember the day I caught my 11-year-old brother searching for "lesbeens kising" on YouTube. I scolded him, for his bad spelling. He'll be alright.



Ruining Roosh

September 8, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I found a post that commented on my latest video. It's titled Ruining Roosh, which I fully expected it to be a hate-fest. Let's take a look. (If you haven't seen the video yet then you might want to watch it first.)

> The first thing I thought was, "Wow, his hair is even WORSE than it looks in stills!"
>
> The second thing was: even if I were an aspiring PUA, I'm not convinced this guy would have much useful to teach me. Sure, the techniques he recommends sound plausible and may, in fact, work for someone like himself. But what the videos, taken in neither a sexual nor even social context, indicate to me is that he is already building on a base of raw charisma that would be extraordinarily difficult to teach or fake. It's hard to articulate the source of the charisma. The tenor of his voice, at a minimum. The structure of his face. Maybe body language is involved, in that he didn't do anything obviously off-putting. The point is, the attraction for women is obvious. I can totally believe his tales of conquest; what I don't believe is his claim that the psychological manipulation he employs would be met with the same success when used by people without his natural advantages.

First, I appreciate the flattering comments, especially since many haters have arrived at opposite conclusion. I wanted to address the comment that I have "natural advantages."

You see my appearance in the video. I look like Teen Wolf spawn and except for my height everything the modern 20-something American woman finds attractive in a man is a quality I don't possess. Girls make fun of my hair almost every night I go out, but they still compliment me in the end, something that I noticed is increasingly. Don't get me wrong I feel very comfortable in my skin, but when I'm banging a girl I don't believe it was because of my look. I believe it's because I said the right things with the right attitude, with the right moves, and with the right body language.

I think a girl will rationalize a man as more attractive when there are subconscious forces at play (body language, tone, etc.). For example, if I had a blog called RooshVirgin.com and every day I told stories about how I never get laid and cry myself to bed most nights and then made a similar video, would the blogger have seen me in the same light? Neil Strauss, author of The Game, is an ugly man with an appearance that is best described a rat. If you've heard him speak he has a high-pitched, annoying voice. (I hear him talk and I truly feel bad.) But have you caught yourself looking at him, after knowledge of his success, thinking "Oh he isn't that bad"? He actually is that bad! He's hideous and I even found myself rationalizing his success by saying, "Well he's written a couple articles for the Rolling Stone before The Game. That's why models were banging him." Doubtful.

Last point I wanted to make: charisma is a learned quality. You don't know charm without hundreds of sexually charged interactions with the opposite sex. My early experiences with women were rough and awkward and I had trouble smoothly stringing together sentences that kept a girl's attention. But now I can do it without trying and it's not because I was born with it but because I've had so much practice.

Every year it's getting easier for me because every year I get better, even as the lines on my face get deeper with age and my physical appearance has long since peaked. I have a feeling my 30's will be the best, easiest years of my life when it comes to women.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

Roosh Portrait

September 10, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

When Roissy got his portrait done I was insanely jealous, especially since I knew who did it. Well after some whining on my part, I'm proud to present the Roosh Portrait:

(It's big at 18″ x 24″)

Thank you Tiff. You have given me a gift that has set an impossible bar for every other girl I will ever know.

My dear mother will be the lucky recipient of this masterpiece.

New Travel Posts

September 11, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

A couple posts you have missed on my other blog, Real Man Travel Guides.

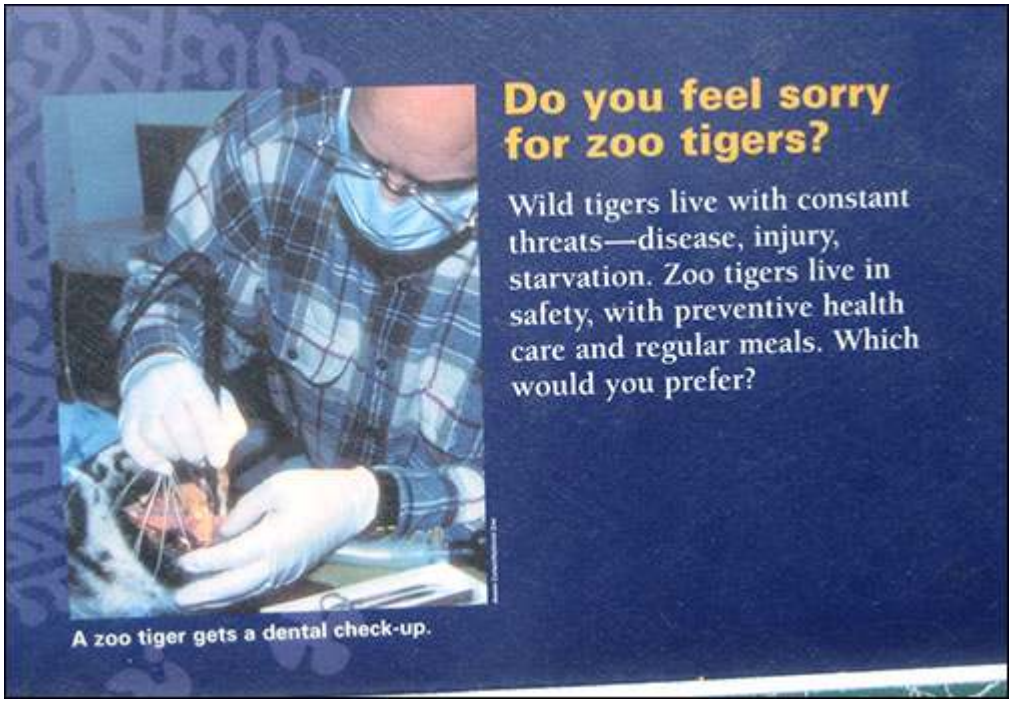
- How To Get Laid In Rio De Janeiro – I've met other gringos who left the city without banging so I felt this post was necessary
- How To Speak To Girls In Basic Spanish
- How To Increase Your Travel Motivation

Here's a short one minute clip with highlights from Buenos Aires, shot before I had the excellent video skills that I have now. The tall guy in the white cap was one of my gringo buddies I met in Cordoba. No girls in the clip, unfortunately…

Highlights Of Buenos Aires, Argentina from Roosh V on Vimeo.

The Zoo Makes An Argument For Prison State

September 14, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link



Do you feel sorry for imprisoned humans?

> Wild humans live with constant threats—disease, injury, starvation. Imprisoned humans live in safety, with preventive health care and regular meals. Which would you prefer?

I will never forget the saddened faces on the poor beasts I saw this weekend. No wonder they don't want to mate.

My Friend

September 15, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I see him at least six days a week. He walks into the door and makes a pit stop by my table for two minutes of small talk. He thinks I'm a hard worker because that's what it appears I'm doing whenever he comes in, but most of the time I'm staring at the screen thinking about what mediocre baked good snack I'm going to buy when I get hungry.

He gets the exact same thing every time. A cup of coffee and lemon pound cake. Sometimes twice a day. One time I joked that I just got the last piece of lemon pound cake and added how delicious it was. You should have seen the look on his face—it's like his heart stopped! I never joked about that again.

His legs are thin like my wrist, but he never uses a cane. He walks slowly, his arms halfway outstretched to maintain his balance. Those steep curbs get him. He needs to hold on to someone's forearm to lift his foot six inches off the ground. I told him I see men much younger than him using canes, and he smiled and said he doesn't need one. Once you hold a cane, you hold it until you die.

He still drives, he brags, and I've seen him drive. With my teeth clenched I could barely watch him reverse out of a parking space and almost jump over the curb. It's a miracle his car doesn't have a scratch. Next week he's going to Florida for a little vacation on his own. He will travel alone because he is alone. I told him that's the only way to travel.

I looked him in the eyes one day and said, "When I become old I hope I become you." And I meant it. And he laughed. I hope to be his age and independent, to be spared the brutal effects of aging that appear more cruel than death itself. To have every system of your body shut down unmercifully, to decompose before your last breath. I fear aging more than death, for in death there is no mirror to see how wholly unhuman I have become. I can only wait and see what nature has in store for me, but I hope that when my time is up, and I have lived my life to the best of my being and I'm nothing but an mere container, that I look at death right in the eyes, and beg it to take me. And it does.

My friend was born in 1917. He still has a long way to go.

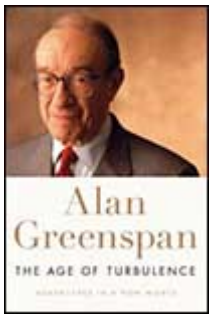
Bloodbath

September 17, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

If you are not scared of what's happening in Wall Street then you are either broke or have your head up your ass. I'm afraid. I long for the days when my mom gave me a nighttime chocolate chip cookie and warm milk and then tucked me in and I didn't have wealth that could be destroyed because of corrupt bankers and politicians.

All because of houses!



I have dollars in three banks insured by FDIC, which has a $53 billion fund to cover $6.84 trillion in bank deposits. Another way to put it: it has $0.053 trillion to cover $6.840 trillion in deposits. But when banks gives money to FDIC, it gets sent to the Treasury which spends that and then gives the FDIC an IOU. There is no FDIC fund. Now when banks go bust, guess where the money comes from? The taxpayer. We, along with our children and children's children, get the bill. In effect you will bail yourself out.

The Fed has blown through at least $900 billion this year, but I'm not sure if it includes "loans" swept under the rug like $138 billion to Lehman this week. Who knows how much will be paid back. If you assume like I do that mere human beings who make decisions are not aware of unintended consequences, there is no reason to have faith in Bernanke and Paulson and what they're doing. Like pro wrestling they are making it up as they go along. This is a simulation not unlike SimCity and no one can say with certainty that it will all work out in the end.

Your bank deposits are insured but all you have to do is look how other governments bought time to prevent a systemic banking crisis. They set up "bank holidays" where you are not allowed to withdraw more than a small amount for days, weeks, or longer. The announcement will sound something like this:

> "The bank holiday was declared to preserve the stability of markets… In the past few days, there has been a great deal of speculative activity and we wanted to calm the market down."

If it's a short holiday then who cares but if it's long then during that time the central bank prints prints prints and all you do is helplessly watch as the purchasing power of your savings diminish. If you're unlucky a new currency is introduced with depressing exchange rates and in effect you're tossed halfway down the mountain and told to start up again. Don't believe it will happen here? I wish I had your optimism. Even now if you want to withdraw more than a few thousand from a weak bank like WaMu or Wachovia, good luck.

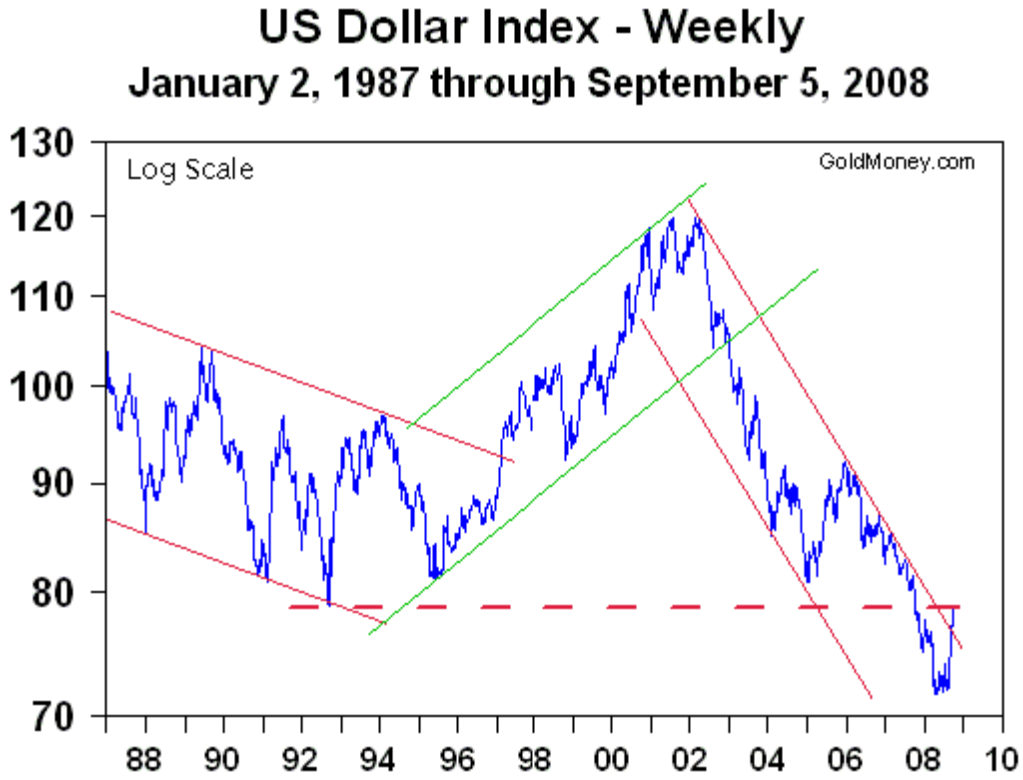
To get away from the upcoming FDIC boondoggle that doesn't involve your crusty mattress, an option is to plug your money directly into the US Treasury with their TreasuryDirect program. You won't earn any interest (unless you purchase a treasury) but at least you don't have to worry about dealing with banks. Your money is safe with the government!

Or is it? What happens if China or Petrol nations that are purchasing up dollars every day decides that they no longer what currency from a sick country? Either outright default or we'll get the United States of Zimbabwe. The reason China is purchasing dollars instead of investing on its own infrastructure is to limit the standard of living for their citizens (easier to control the populace, read 1984) and to control inflation. But if the American economy tanks and lawn chairs and plastic doohickeys stop selling at Walmart then there is little incentive for them return that money back here in the form or treasury purchases to sustain mind-boggling current account deficits for our wars and shopping. That's one thing I admire about the Chinese: while all we have to show the past five years is plasma televisions and sunglasses (consumption), they have factories (production). Assuming they can get their environmental problems under control, who do you think will see more economic growth in the next 20 years?

What the Fed doing is trying to preserve the system, and I'm sure they will at least partially succeed with printers running full steam, but mathematically something has to suffer from this. It will be the dollar, and it's already struggling.



Bank executives cried deregulation on the way up but now their hands are in our pockets to fix their frauds. Yet they will keep their house in the Hamptons and fancy cars (and even severance packages irregardless of the smoldering ruin they left behind), while you are I are rewarded with a worthless currency. You better believe that every struggling bank worth a damn is in private meetings right now trying to figure out the best way to present to the Fed that their failure will lead to the collapse of the world so they also get a bailout. Or they will merge with another bank so they are now “too big to fail.” Wages have been on the decline for years (but productivity is up!) and keep in mind that every time you read a rosy news article about bike ridership increasing or frugality being the new hot trend it’s just proof that our living standards are decreasing. Do you think bicycle ridership is increasing today in a place like Brazil or China?

For savers who have worked hard and been prudent, there are a couple options. Accumulate gold and silver from coin dealers (easier said that done), stick them in a bolted safe in your basement and leave them there. If the currency collapses you don’t have to line up at a soup kitchen, otherwise you can sell, possibly for a profit.

My solution has been foreign currencies. Slowly I’ve been moving my money into Swiss Francs, Japanese Yen, Norwegian Krohne, and Australian Dollar via an FDIC insured bank that does the exchange. With currencies it’s all relative so even if there will be a worldwide depression, which currency will do the worst? Unfortunately I think it’s my own. I did something because it’s no one’s responsibility but my own to protect my savings. (Currency trading has huge risks—do your own research.)

There’s a few commentators that I trust to lay it out there straight without any bullshit. Of course I read everything with my brain turned on.

Mish Shedlock

Noriel Roubini (register to view full posts—it’s worth it)

Karl Denninger

Charles Hugh Smith

Jim Sinclair

Ultimately we are at fault for this. During the housing boom no one wanted to stop and question the fraud of big business and even with these bailouts I don’t hear much concern among my peers. I’ve not protested, sent faxes, emails, letters, or organized in any way. I’ve been silent just like everyone else, and only when my savings is threatened do my ears perk up. Too little too late. Now it’s a salvage operation to cover my ass because of the colossal failure of the U.S. Government to protect its currency and financial system. I would no longer count on them to guard what you have earned. If you don’t take the steps yourself then you deserve what happens.

Postscript: You know what… I’ll step up to lead you all. Is a Sunday afternoon good?

How To Get A Protest Permit In Washington DC

Exercising Your Rights Of Political Protest In Washington DC

Deep Thoughts

September 18, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My beloved cat Furball loved to masturbate on my pillows, which I didn't like this since he would ejaculate a couple drops of semen on my pillow case. Every time I caught him jerking off I'd spray some water on him and he'd run away mid-jerk only to come back later and to attempt to finish himself off, whereby the process would repeat. For a stretch of time I must have given him the most horrible case of blue balls ever experienced by a feline. But then I thought about it. If I was masturbating, would I want someone throwing cold water on me? No. That would be cruel.

After that I let him jerk off whenever and wherever he pleased. Who am I to tell another animal how to live its life? He wasn't telling me how to live mine, and he didn't even ask to live with me. In fact he was taken from his mother as a baby and bought on the open market like a slave, and I expected him to serve me and make my life better. And I got mad when he wanted to blow a load off! I was the unevolved beast, not him.

I loved him.

Credit Default Swaps For Dummies

September 19, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

"If it doesn't pass, then heaven help us all."

Allow me to teach you what a credit default swap is and why it's so important to what is happening to the economy today.

Virgle Kent borrows $50 from me. I want to get insurance on his debt in case he goes broke. I go to Roissy and say, "Hey, Virgle Kent owes me $50. Can you insure that debt?"

"I'll insure it if you pay me $4 a year," Roissy says.

"Done!"

Roissy is betting that VK will pay me back, especially since he did his homework by looking at VK's credit rating and saw it was superb. Roissy wrote me a credit default swap, an unregulated derivative invented in 1995 by JP Morgan.

Unfortunately Roissy has some problems with his business, and he no longer even has $50 to pay me in case VK goes broke. The premiums I gave him are long gone. Credit agencies notice this and tell Roissy to find some cash or his credit rating goes down. Roissy is fucked because if his credit rating goes down then he won't be able to raise cash at good rates to keep his business open (today's large businesses need a constant flow of credit to maintain operations). Sure enough his rating gets killed and Roissy goes bankrupt.

Now I'm in trouble. The debt I had on my books that was insured is now uninsured. The agencies look at my books and see I have this exposed debt and they downgrade my ass. I have no choice but to enter bankruptcy as well. But I happened to be knee deep in the CDS game too. I wrote a ton of them for Arjewtino, insuring the debt owed to him by other parties. When I go down it puts pressure on him. Like dominoes we fall.

In the carnage it turned out that the ratings we used to judge each other's debt worthiness was bogus from the start. Essentially we all gambled like we would at a blackjack table, but we did it while drunk. And blind.

The insurance company AIG wrote $78 billion worth of swaps.

Ivy League MBA's turned the CDS into an even more insidious device. In ways that I will not begin to understand, swaps were used not just to insure against debt but to speculate if companies would fail or not. It turned out that while VK only owed me $50, there were swaps written worth $500 between parties that VK didn't even know about! The swaps became a means to make money instead of a simple insurance policy. This was enabled by a government run by politicians whose treasure chests were stocked full of kind donations from the big bankers. They did not hesitate to look the other way.

A lot of swaps were written by banks and businesses that are now very sick from making bad bets and possibly outright fraud in the housing boom. (Who would have thought that giving no money down / no-doc loans was a bad idea?)

Here’s the bad news:

> …there are $45 trillion of credit default swaps out there. A default on a mere 10% would cause an economic disaster. Unfortunately, it’s guaranteed to happen.

Actually that was the good news. Here’s the real bad news:

> The Bank for International Settlements recently reported that total derivatives trades exceeded one quadrillion dollars – that’s 1,000 trillion dollars. How is that figure even possible? The gross domestic product of all the countries in the world is only about 60 trillion dollars. The answer is that gamblers can bet as much as they want.

The quote up top was said by Henry Paulson.

Time To Act

September 20, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

"The new law of evolution in corporate America seems to be survival of the unfittest. Well, in my book you either do it right or you get eliminated."
-Wall Street

On Saturday night at 2:40am outside a bar I got to talking with a group and it somehow led to the financial mess (this being DC and all). I expressed my staunch opposal to any bailout of the bankers and one of the girls in the group said the following: "So you want the next Great Depression?"

Bailing out big banks will not avert anything. Not a single foreclosure will be avoided. Not a single, honest middle class job will be saved. Not a single home will go up in price. The only job created will be the bureaucrat in the treasury writing checks to Washington Mutual, Wachovia, Goldman Sachs, Merryl Lynch, and so on. This bailout will only prop up bank's paper mortgage security holdings so they can survive. They will be rewarded for speculation and fraud and you will be stuck with the bill. The dollar will fall and generations to come will be dealing with the mess. Don't believe what Comrade Bush, Paulson, and Bernanke are telling you.

The U.S. debt obligations ($10-12.7 trillion, depending on who you ask) will never be paid. The faster it goes up the sooner we face end game—default or hyperinflation, maybe in our lifetimes. Congress will soon vote for a bill on this latest bailout. They will approve it and slap those in the face who are prudent with their money, save, and follow the rules.

Earlier in the night I talked to a friend who works for a Congressman. I asked her, "Does it really matter if I write to my Congressman?"

She said, "Well if a lot of people do, yeah."

Take five minutes right now and write your representative, even if it's just a two sentence message stating your opposition. Tell them to filibuster the thing if they have to. And then do it again tomorrow. You either believe in free markets and capitalism or you don't.

For more on what you can do read the following by Mish:

Lies From Paulson Keep Stacking Up: What You Can Do About It

And here's a no bullshit interview with Ron Paul describing why this bailout is a horrible idea.

Hot Girl Game

September 21, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

It was a cool summer night. I wore a thin cashmere jumper my mom bought me for my birthday. At the bar I took steady sips of my caipirinha while talking to my two wingmen about our dimming prospects. And then I saw her. It's a cliche to be drawn into a girl any guy would rate as beautiful, but then again my tastes are not particularly refined.

"She's a 9.5," one of my friends said.

"No, she's a 9." I replied. I had to bring him back down to Earth.

The problem with Washington DC is that it's hard to get hot girl game practice. In a place like Argentina that's all you get. Besides the occasional 8, most of what we deal with are 6's and 7's. They're cute but with generic personalities they don't make you want to quit the game and settle. In a land of 6's I had to roll up with game. I had to be a dick.

She was with a group of eight other girls and I waited until she broke off from the main group. Before I went in I tapped the shoulder of one of my friends so he could witness the whole thing and praise my attempt if it warranted.

"Hey."

She turned around.

"Let me guess… you are from… Argentina," I said.

"Nope, guess again."

"Italy."

"Nope."

"Colombia."

"Nope."

"Spain."

"Nope."

"I give up."

"Bolivia."

"Really? Cool, well, you don't look bad, because Bolivia has the ugliest girls I've ever seen."

"What?! My family is from Bolivia!!!"

"I mean…"

"How can you say that!!!" If she was any uglier the conversation would have been over, but she wasn't. I fake backtracked.

"You must be from the east of Bolivia."

"Yeah, so?"

"Sucre?"

“Yeah.”

“Well I traveled through the west, which was definitely very ugly. The east it a little better, especially the parts closer to Brazil.”

“It doesn’t matter!!!” She taps her friend and tells her I said that Bolivia has ugly people. Her friend is just as outraged. But she’s still standing there in front of me.

“Look no other guy knows Bolivia like I do. I was there for three weeks. In fact I have the parasites to prove it.” I put my hand on my stomach. Actually I was there for only ten days.

“Where are you from?” she asked.

Soon she grabbed both of my hands and we danced. I forgot what exactly what I said but I joked that things weren’t going to work out between us. I think because I noted her hair was shorter than mine. Then she made a comment about some boyfriend and thirty seconds later her friend pulled her away. I shined for six minutes.

The problem is if I see a 9 here I have to be at your best because there will be no other 9’s for weeks. It’s quite silly actually and the odds of getting one from a cold approach in this manner in this town are about the same as winning the grand prize in a scratch ticket lottery game, but it’s important to try anyway. Until I get out of this city it’s impossible to live up to my game potential.

I ended up getting a number of a 7.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

Friendly Reminder

September 22, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I've been getting it for years. I branch out into other topics that I'm interested in and comments appear telling me to "go back to posting about game," like I'm getting paid to do this. I take this as a compliment since my writings on the matter are so good that people are demanding it, but…

I wrote a 60,000 word book about game.

I have an active newsletter about game.

I have a forum on game.

I have dozens and dozens of archived posts on my blog about game.

There is nothing I've yet to write that is not reason enough for you to step back from the computer and get laid right now. There is no missing piece of the puzzle I'm sitting on.

If there is something I write that you don't like then close your browser and come back the next day. Or don't come back at all. I guarantee you I won't notice.

Box Office Numbers Are Bullshit Propaganda

September 23, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The Dark Knight, the worst movie of the year, broke a record for the fastest to reach $500 million in film history. Here's why it means nothing…

1. Ticket prices go up every year. I don't believe I let my friend pay $11 for me to see The Dark Knight. In college a ticket at the newest theater with stadium seating cost me $7. That's an increase of 57% in 7 years. But…

2. Box office grosses are not inflation adjusted. Especially not when reported by the MPAA. That's why each sequel of Spiderman and sorry Star Wars kept breaking records. And even if they were inflation adjusted…

3. The U.S. Governments CPI which is used to provide inflation adjusted figures is pure fantasy. Since the 90's the CPI has been grossly under reporting inflation. It barely accounts for the things that are actually going up in price (food and gas) because they are too "unstable." No shit.

Why aren't box office numbers measured objectively with number of tickets sold? Because ticket sales are flat. No hype can be created in flat numbers and no records can be broken. The music industry uses objective numbers with album sales and look how far that has gotten them the past decade. (No music record involving physical CD's will be broken ever again from this point on.)

Box off records are propaganda to get you excited about seeing increasingly bad movies that cater more and more to teenagers, a reliably bored audience that swallows tripe like The Dark Knight.

The Return Of Sally

September 24, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I have an exciting announcement to make. My first ever intern, Sally, is returning to contribute on the blog. She's been in Europe for the past year and is now bursting with stories and observations. Starting tomorrow she will post on Friday's until she gets bored.

If you are not familiar with Sally, I recommend you study some of her previous posts:

- Text Messaging Is A Fickle Mistress
- Having Fun
- Paris Is Not That Fun
- What's Wrong With You – must read for women
- The Finicky Climax
- Notches For Girls

It’s Always Something

September 25, 2008 | by Sally | Link | Original Link

To me, living in Europe after having lived my entire life in the U.S. is like learning to drive a standard transmission car after only driving an automatic. At home, I knew exactly how everything worked, and it was fairly easy. But in western Europe I am constantly hamstrung by process, by language, or by rules… and it’s usually a matter of learning how to navigate all of these obstacles – clutch, shift, gas. Or whatever the order is.

For instance, I’ve learned to do all of my errands (dry cleaning, buy milk, buy printer paper) during the week or on Saturdays, because either there’s no place open to buy them on Sundays, or you’d have to hoof it across town to find the open store. I don’t have access to a car, because the car-sharing program here only has standard-transmission cars – which I can only drive with a gun pointed at my head – meaning that a trip to Ikea or the post-package depot (40 minute bus/metro ride) takes serious planning. The English-speaking customer service assistants are all on vacation in August, so better have my phrasebook handy if I’m going to deal with an internet outage, a missing electric bill, or the phone banking system. Hardly anything has a web site, or the pertinent information on that site; so whereas I might go to the DC DMV armed with the right papers to get a driver’s license, it took a couple of visits to figure out what I would have to do here. I won’t even get into the process to get a residence card other than to say it took 6 trips to the city hall and 3 months.

When I first moved here it just felt like life was a series of bad days. Any little thing that went wrong seemed worse because I was living in a foreign place without much of a support network, and there were a lot of times where I just crawled back into bed. But slowly, things got better. Now the idea of doing errands on Sundays seems a sacrilege when I could spend the day reading in the park or playing tennis. I’ve traveled nearly every weekend, I eat the freshest food, and I’ve learned to live on less money because I don’t feel the need to impress anyone here. The good days are outnumbering the bad.

It’s Just Sheer Loss Of Time

September 27, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

From Tropic Of Cancer…

> “The other night I took her on—out of pity—and what do you think the crazy bitch had done to herself? She had shaved it clean… not a spec of hair on it. Did you ever have a woman who shaved her twat? It’s repulsive, ain’t it? And it’s funny, too. Sort of mad like. It doesn’t look like a twat any more: it’s like a dead clam or something.” He describes to me how, his curiosity aroused, he got out of bed and searched for a flashlight. “I made her hold it open and I trained the flashlight on it. You should have seen me… it was comical. I got so worked up about it that I forgot all about her. I never in my life looked at a cunt so seriously. You’d imagine I’d never seen one before. And the more I looked at it the less interesting it became. It only goes to show you there’s nothing to it after all, especially when it’s shaved. It’s the hair that makes it mysterious. That’s why a statue leaves you cold. Only once I saw a real cunt on a statue—that was by Rodin. You ought to see it some time… she has her legs spread wide apart… I don’t think there was any head on it. Just a cunt you might say. Jesus, it looked ghastly. The thing is this—they all look alike. When you look at them with their clothes on you imagine all sorts of things; you give them an individuality like, which they haven’t got, of course. There’s just a crack there between the legs and you get all steamed up about it—you don’t even look at it half the time. You know it’s there and all you think about is getting your ramrod inside: it’s as though your penis did the thinking for you. It’s an illusion. You get all burned up about nothing… about a crack with hair on it, or without hair. It’s so absolutely meaningless that it fascinated me to look at it. I must have studied it for ten minutes or more. When you look at it that way, sort of detached like, you get funny notions in your head. All that mystery about sex and then you discover that it’s nothing—just a blank. Wouldn’t it be funny if you found a harmonica inside… or a calendar? But there’s nothing there… nothing at all. It’s disgusting. It almost drove me mad… Listen, do you know what I did afterwards? I gave her a quick lay and then I turned my back on her. Yeah, I picked up a book and I read. You can get something out of a book, even a bad book… but a cunt, it’s just sheer loss of time…”

But it feels so damn good.

Why I'm A Registered Independent

September 29, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Democratic: Yes (140) / No (95)
Republican: Yes (65) / No (133)

The Republicans saved the day.

My representative, Democrat Chris Van Hollen, voted for this bill. I warned him in several emails that I would vote against him if he did and I'm a man of my word: if a monkey is running against him I will vote for the monkey. I will also spread word at the coffee shop that our representative was so easily convinced by Bush and Paulson to give away our money.

Republicans saved the day? But the stock market tanked and lots of people have stocks in 401k's!

It will tank regardless. Let the correction take its course. The faster is happens the faster we can divert resources to productive sectors of the economy instead of banks that deserve to rot and die and cease to exist.

The Powers That Be never made a believable connection to how this bailout would save us. "If you save the banks, they'll start lending again for consumer car loans and credit cards!" Yes, consuming instead of producing will save us.

How Voter Fury Stopped The Bailout

> The proposal's defeat was also cheered on by a number of blogs that in recent days have posted links to lawmakers' telephone and fax numbers and urged citizens to oppose the plan. They included stopthehousingbailout.com, a Web site organized by a 37-year-old Los Angeles attorney named Morgan Ward Doran, and globaleconomicanalysis.blogspot.com, run by Mike Shedlock, an investment adviser at SitkaPacific Capital Management. Mr. Shedlock said in an interview Monday that his site had received 1.7 million page hits this month, which he said was half a million more than normal.
>
> On his Web site, Mr. Shedlock has derided the proposed rescue as "a rush to judgment" that would benefit "high-flying financiers who chased big profits through reckless investments," and as "a complete waste of $700 billion."
>
> "A number of people emailed me to say this was the first time that they've written, faxed or phoned their member of Congress," said Mr. Shedlock, a 55-year-old resident of Prairie Grove, Ill. "Were going to phone and fax every member of Congress who voted against this to thank them. … Everyone who voted to pass this bill, we're going to actively organize to oust them."

The cynic in me is convinced they'll come up with something similar and pass that instead.

Priorities

September 30, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I remember calculating my "Cost Per Notch" a while ago, trying to inject some business discipline into my sexual conquests. I knew how much I was spending on dating and from that it wasn't hard to figure out the time as well. Up to somewhat recently I was spending an extraordinary amount of it getting laid (surprise).

When I was a teenager my Mom would come home from a day at work, cook, do the dishes, clean the house, and take out the trash. She'd yell at me and my sister for not helping her out and sometimes beat us with a broom, but we were brats and rarely did help out. I don't remember ever doing the dishes. Almost weekly I'd hear "I hope you appreciate me one day!" I'd tell my friends that I had a crazy mother. After I left the house she would ask me to do things like help her move or look at her retirement paperwork. I'd groan each time until she stopped asking me for favors. I didn't want to be bothered.

In South America I was down on chasing stupid hostel girls I didn't care about, but those girls weren't that much different from the ones I chased at home. I realized how much time I put into them every week of my adult life for mostly unfulfilling, cheap thrills when I didn't bother putting 10% of that time into my own mother. She put two decades of her life into me and I was treating her like how a typical American treats their parents. That's not how things are done in the Middle East damn it.

I'm sure she has sensed the change. I call her more than once a week now and am a little too eager to help her out with her favors. Instead of short visits I stop by for hours and let her talk her head off about whatever is bugging her. If I sense she needs something I get it without her asking. If I can't make her life a little more comfortable then I've failed as a son—and thankfully I've come to that realization while she's still alive! Nothing makes her happier than when I start a sentence with "I don't know how you…" and then recite all she did to raise her son to the strapping underacheiving gentleman he has become. This weekend I'm escorting her to the Turkish festival. We will drink Turkish coffee, get our fortunes read, run into her chatty Turk friends, and bond.

My 22-year-old sister has an active social life. She goes out at least twice a week and messages her friends throughout the day on her unlimited text plan, but she'll go weeks without picking up the phone and calling my Dad or her little brothers, let alone visit though she lives twenty minutes away. I hope she doesn't take as long as I did.

Long Live The Streak!

October 1, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Recently I began exchanging my time and labor for money. Yes, I have a job, my first in seventeen months. (Seventeen months!)

Six weeks ago a friend of mine had a birthday party at the old bar I used to work at. It was three years since I stepped foot in there and I thought little about my six month stint as a bartender. It was just another job, and not a particularly skilled one at that. Towards the end of the night I get a tap on my shoulder. It was my old boss. He asked me if I was looking for work and I said not really but I'd consider something part-time. We kept in touch but nothing happened.

Last Wednesday after a couple drinks at the Reef I took the Metro home and who was in the same train car but my old boss. Serendipity. He asked me again if I was looking for a job and I told him the same answer. He gave me a start date and that was that.

The bar is patroned by a hyper-professional, sharp-looking clientele in their mid-30's and up who constantly thumb their Blackberries. Hipsters or college students do not know it exists, and I often overhear political discussion with names of specific Congressmen and Senators. The average tip is 20%, even for mediocre service during the happy hour rush. Customers are older and more conservative so there will be no grimy bar stories like you might see from other bartenders, but maybe I will find an elderly lady patron who would like to subsidize my travel and writing in exchange for sexual favors.

It took me only a short time to get back into the groove of making margaritas, dirty martinis ("extra dirty, please"), and whiskey sours. Honestly I'm not very fast at making drinks but when it comes to personality I'm unstoppable. Two nights ago a couple pleaded with me to cut my shift early and go drinking with them. Little do they know that years of picking up girls in bars and clubs have given me an uncanny ability to build rapport with complete strangers. Or maybe I'm just an all-around great guy.

In just a couple weeks the pads on my fingers will be rubbed raw and my hands will be sliced with little cuts, but nothing a little lotion and liquid band-aid can't fix. Every night I will take the stack of tips I earned and add that to my bum fund. I will not increase my standard of living one bit—if anything I will bust out the bike even more. Every six nights I work will mean another month I don’t have to. I think that’s a fair trade.

Differences Between European and American Bar Scene

October 2, 2008 | by Sally | Link | Original Link

-In general, Europeans do not binge-drink like Americans. I thought I drank pretty well, but Europeans have perfected the art of maintaining a buzz for an entire evening as opposed to pounding several drinks in the span of a few hours. Many Europeans do not get drunk while they are out.

-Going to a bar or club is not really a reason to dress up. People will go out in their work clothes (and I don't mean like "hey I'm an asshole who wears a suit to show you how important I am") to a fancy bar or they'll wear a basic jeans/top outfit. I once threatened to leave a cool rooftop bar if I saw any women there wearing dirty Converse sneakers. There is less concept of going-out clothes – the exception is people who live in party-heavy cities, like Barcelona or Paris.

-Eurotrash is a stereotype but it's also true. Have you ever seen adult Americans spraying each other with champagne at a bar?

-In Europe, you do not approach strangers who are unknown to your group. Europeans in general are somewhat distrustful of people unless they have been introduced to them by someone they already know. My girlfriends and I have never been approached while out, and a stranger would absolutely never try to dance with us.

-Because bars and clubs are not limited to people over the age of 21, it can be tricky to figure out which places are legit and which are a bunch of high-schoolers trying to act cool. For instance there is one particular club I can think of that is written up in every guidebook as "posh" and very much a scene, but it's full of 18-year-olds.

-No matter what city and what bar you go to, you will hear the song "Everyday People" by Arrested Development.

Girls Can Be Extremely Subtle

October 5, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In my coffee shop I sit next to a display case that sells a bunch of crap. Women get drawn into this case like a tractor beam and browse through it before ordering their drink. I've never seen a woman browse the case after getting her drink because then she would have to go to the cash register twice if she likes something. When walking in girls only see my back, but when walking out they see my Middle Eastern face. What does that mean?

Well when a girl wants me to talk to her, she checks out the case on the way out. She just stands there looking at the merchandise without really looking. If she's cute I have an opener for this very situation: "You know some of those cups are of excellent quality."

"Oh yeah?"

"No I'm kidding—they put me here and give me free drinks just to say that. "

It's very rare that a sober girl will give an obvious green light during the daytime (unless she is older and horny). Sometimes they don't even make eye contact with you. What a normal girl does instead is give you a very small opportunity to say something. When you are moving away from bars and clubs you need to pick up on cues like proximity or else you will go on thinking no girl wants to talk to you and return to poisoning your liver just to meet girls.

If I have a feeling a girl wants to talk to me, I will be right most of the time even though I'm not sure why. I think it's because my subconscious can pick up on things that I can't. Thank you evolution!

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

Jerk Off Management 101

October 7, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For a guy there is a question on if he should jerk off before either hitting on girls or going out on a date. Some argue that jerking off before going out takes off the nervous "edge" (a la There's Something About Mary) while others say it's that edge that women are attracted to.

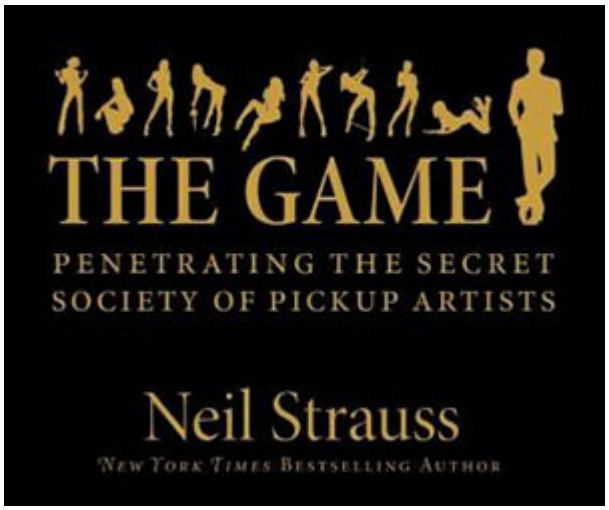
I say both camps are wrong.

What's most important is having high motivation to getting laid, a very sound predictor of future sex. The more you want to have sex, the more you will approach and the more likely you will get laid. Of course there is a line that if crossed puts you in the desperate category, but being horny and sexual alone won't hurt your chances. The nights I get the most prospects and lays are the nights I was especially horny. Knowing this, how should you manage the art of pick up with jerking off alone in front of your computer?

The first thing you need to find out is your recharge time. If you were to get a nice stash of porn tonight (in my case that would be some Kacey, Dirty Latina Maids, or amateur BBW) and jerk off two times, how long would it take you until you'd feel like jerking off again? For me that is 48 hours. Back in my younger days when I discovered masturbation it was more like two hours, but adjustments must be made to an aging libido.

You want to hit on girls when you are recharged and not depleted. This is when the act of picking up is congruent with your what both your mind and body want.

So based on a recharge time of two days, I should not jerk off the day before going out. If I know I have a date on Tuesday, I can jerk on Sunday but not Monday. If I'm hitting the bar on Friday night I can't jerk off on Thursday, no matter how much I want to. This system is simple and prevents me from going out with "golden cock syndrome," where the lower pleasure of a depleted ball orgasm makes me lazy to chase new pussy. If you jerk off right before you go out then you are wasting your time and money.



Excellent Financial News

October 8, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Take a look at this currency chart of the Brazilian Real versus the U.S. dollar. The Y-axis is how many reals you can get for $1:

It has lost almost 50% from its peak. If this holds then that means when I go to Brazil everything will be half off. Other Latin currencies are also struggling. As the Chinese would say: in every crisis there is opportunity. For American men everywhere this is incredible news. For the same budget you can double the amount of time you stay in Brazil.

Also, I hope you guys liquidated all stock holdings in your 401k's. Otherwise you're getting murdered. I wonder if one day we'll look back and consider it crazy to put retirement money into company stock.

Postscript: I need to step away from the internet.

Roubini:

> At this point the recession train has left the station; the financial and banking crisis train has left the station. The delusion that the US and advanced economies contraction would be short and shallow – a V-shaped six month recession – has been replaced by the certainty that this will be a long and protracted U-shaped recession that may last at least two years in the US and close to two years in most of the rest of the world. And given the rising risk of a global systemic financial meltdown the probability that the outcome could become a decade long L-shaped recession – like the one experienced by Japan after the bursting of its real estate and equity bubble – cannot be ruled out.
>
> And in a world where there is a glut and excess capacity of goods while aggregate demand is falling soon enough we will start to worry about deflation, > debt deflation, liquidity traps and what monetary policy makers should do to fight deflation when policy rates get dangerously close to zero.

>
> At this point the risk of an imminent stock market crack – like the one-day collapse of 20% plus in US stock prices in 1987 – cannot be ruled out as the financial system is breaking down, panic and lack of confidence in any counterparty is sharply rising and the investors have totally lost faith in the ability of policy authorities to control this meltdown.

Denniger:

> The selloff this afternoon is the "real deal." It was not caused by the stock market getting "mad", it was caused by the short-term credit market along with the Treasury market suddenly dislocating at a few minutes before the bond pit closed at 2:00 PM.
>
> Worse is also the fact that institutional lending has essentially disappeared – both between banks and now it is choking off commercial short-term credit across the board.
>
> It doesn't get any more serious than this. To repeat: short-term commercial credit is threatening to completely disappear from the American scene.
>
> Every action our government has taken thus far, including repealing mark-to-market requirements have made the situation worse by further destroying confidence.
>
> In the overnight market the futures are imploding once again; the Osaka exchange was closed in Japan after hitting its "lock limit" within minutes prior to the Nikkei opening; the Nikkei is now down ANOTHER 10%, for a total loss of nearly 20% in just two days, with Japanese banks trading "offer only" – that is, NO BID. There are rumors of government bond market fails in parts of Europe, and Iceland has essentially been cut off from the rest of the world Interbank marketplace.

Mish:

> The global economic dam has now cracked wide open. Water is pouring everywhere. The bursting of the dam is a fitting tribute to Paulson's and Bush's $700 billion boondoggle to add liquidity to banks.
>
> The public was overwhelmingly against the plan (and rightly so) as were close to 200 economists. Paulson, Bush, Trichet, and Brown all goaded Congress to waste $700 billion of taxpayer money on grounds there would be a global meltdown if the plan was not passed. Congress had it right the first time. The $700 billion bailout helped bust the dam.
>
> Neither the Bush administration nor the fools in Congress voting for the bailout bothered to figure out you cannot patch a failing dam by adding water.
>
> Liquidity measures cannot and will not work, when the disease is the Fed, > reckless Congressional spending, and fractional reserve lending carried to extreme.

Postscript 2: More Denniger

> Oil will collapse in price to $20/bbl. Unfortunately nobody will have any money to buy gasoline, or a car, so it won't matter. As in The Depression millions of automobiles will be scrapped after being abandoned by their owners for lack of insurance and registration fee money. Cheap scooters will become the dominant form of transportation for those with jobs, as they will be all most people can afford.
>
> As credit collapses distribution of food and other essentials will break down. Unable to access credit, trucking companies will be unable to get goods to market. The current distribution system for food requires travel of over 500 miles from production to consumption; this is untenable in a market where stable credit is unavailable. Food distribution will be severely impacted and in some areas may break down below critical levels.
>
> Unemployment will reach 25% within two years. Median income will fall by 30% nationally. Foreclosures will reach 20 million homes. The government will step in with HOLC-style remediation but it won't matter – the unemployed won't be able to pay irrespective of the price.
>
> House prices will fall to well under $100,000 nationally on a median basis but with lending all but non-existent you'll need 50% down. A few people will make out like bandits near the bottom, being able to buy up homes for $10,000 each in blocks of 10 at a time – for cash. 60% of America will be renters; nearly half of all homeowners will ultimately lose their homes to foreclosure.
>
> Civil unrest will break out in major cities when incomes fall but the cost of food and essential services fail to come down materially, leaving millions of Americans hungry, broke and homeless. Unlike in the 1930s America will not quietly stand in soup lines – instead they will riot, loot and burn. The National Guard will be called up but will find it impossible to exert meaningful control without shutting down all commerce in the affected areas. The decision will be made to cordon off the cities and deny entry to anyone who does not live in that specific neighborhood, essentially shutting down commercial activity. GDP will fall by 30%.

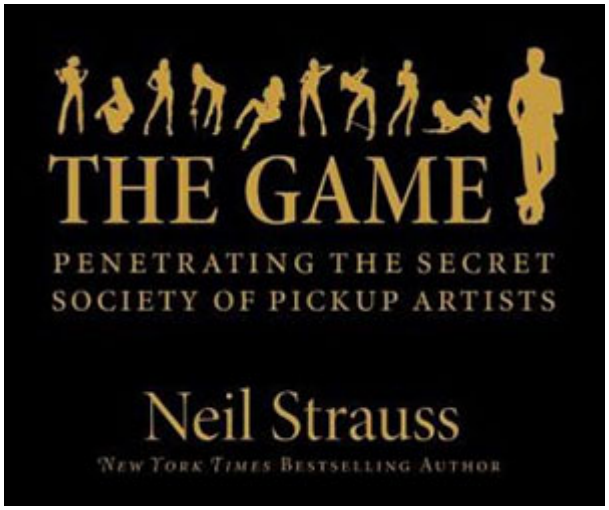
The Lost Roosh Sex Videos

October 8, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here is a video of me having sex with a girl doggy style. Note how I switch it up to oral without asking permission. Never ask for permission!

Sometimes I rather just be alone. Here is a video with my sex toy I call Mr. Frog.

I have nothing more for you today.



We Major

October 9, 2008 | by Sally | Link | Original Link

Continuing the theme of nasty sex talk week…

kidding! HI-O. Roosh is disgusting isn't he?

I used to be a real clotheshorse back in my college days. That's when I had disposable income – I decided I would start saving for retirement at 25 – and I liked to LOOK GOOD. I still LOOK SOOOO GOOD but now my primary expense is travel. Second is food and drink – mostly drink because I personally believe that drunks are good people, and non-drinkers are very, very bad (ask me about my empirical evidence) and third is books and maybe clothes. Well, maybe not last month, because I bought this rabbit-fur jacket, but that's only because it is beautiful and warm and it reminds me of the real bunny I had to give away last year. And if anyone from PETA says anything right now, I'm going to eat a double cheeseburger with extra bacon while wearing it, don't make me do it.

Anyway. Travel. This month I am all over Europe more than I'm at home, which is awesome. Because I don't hostel, I probably spend a little, okay a lot, more money traveling than some people might and by some people I mean six months in South America. What I am getting at is that recently I hosted a friend who was traveling to Europe for the first time. I love her a lot, but sometimes, she really set my teeth on edge. She's a picky eater (oh really? are we still 4 years old?), which is crazy-annoying to deal with in Europe because there are some weird foods – chicon anyone? It smells like garbage. It's also bewildering to watch someone who has expressed worry about the American financial crisis spend nearly 500 euros on a Louis Vuitton bag at the tacky flagship on the Champs-Elysées. Or how about being afraid of the airport, costing nearly 100 euros and 2 hours to take a cab there and back (public transportation strike). I mean, after a week I could not even deal. It's hard because I want to give visitors a great European Experience, but it's Expensive, and Exhausting.

Really I just wanted to whine about all that. But therein lies a warning: if you do not bring your game face to Europe, you're going to wind up doing what I want to do, which is eat steak tartare, drink champagne, go out to Versailles, and put your ass on a train to the airport with a quickness.

Warning Signs

October 12, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If I see these around a girl then I mentally prepare to be disappointed in some way…

Flip flops – "I don't need to put effort into my appearance."

Hybrid automobile – "I can pollute the environment with a clear conscious."

Eat, Pray, Love – "I will read what every other girl my age reads."

Dog – "I can only get unconditional love from an animal."

Condoms in nightstand – "I don't keep track of how many guys I fucked."

iPod – "I need to be constantly distracted."

Carryout styrofoam container – "Why cook when you can just go out and buy?"

Vitamin water or vitamins – "I will undo smoking, tanning and drinking with magic water and pills."

Ikea furniture – "I like overpaying for something that my friends have."

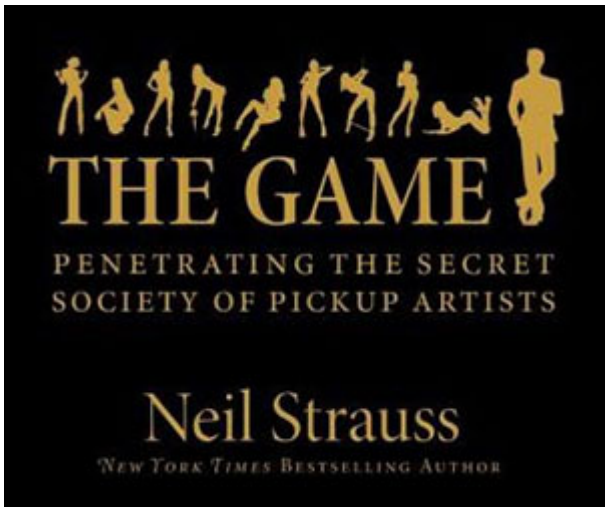
Keffiyeh scarf – "I need my individuality to be defined by others."

Blackberry – "My career is everything I have."

Pearl necklace – "My wedding will cost $50,000."

Cable television – "I am a passive receptacle of corporate marketing."

Last American girl I dated had eight of these warning signs. Last Brazilian girl? Zero.



The Economics Of Sex

October 13, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After a night at the theater, I posed a hypothetical scenario to Roissy…

“So the economy is going down the shitter,” I said. “Let’s say it’s worse than the Great Depression—absolute worst case scenario.”

“Alright,” he said.

“And retail dies, putting a lot of young girls out of work. And since there is no more credit student loans are history and a generation of girls are unable to go to college because they can’t find a job to pay for tuition. It’s just an ocean of poverty and joblessness. Okay, how much is the average first date?”

“$40 maybe.”

“Now because of the poverty you have millions of girls who would do anything for money. Imagine for only $20 very cute girls who are no more whores than the ones we sleep with would let you ravage them any way you see fit. Just a straight-up transaction. That $20 is less than a typical first date, which is no guarantee for sex. Would you?”

“Hmm, I don’t know,” he said. “How about getting that thrill from the chase? The sense of accomplishment?”

“For $20 who cares?! Overnight guys would stop paying $1500 workshops to get laid. $20 sex with a ‘normal’ girl would make game obsolete. My book sales would plummet.”

I predict that in the next two years meeting girls in the cities hardest hit by the economy will be even more difficult for the average guy. With less disposable income girls are going to stay home more instead of going out. Empty bars and clubs mean guys will be more reliant on meeting girls through friends, family, Myspace, and work. There will be less pump and dumps as guys will want to keep what they managed to get, as they themselves are strapped for cash and meeting girls does cost money. The only guys immune will be those in college, who will graduate to a barren landscape—in more ways than one. More than ever it’s important to have a developed niche where your supply of poon remains uninterrupted in the face of economic uncertainty.

Michael Phelps' Girlfriend

October 14, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Michael Phelps has a girlfriend, a former Miss California runner-up. Is she a ten? Let's take a look.

"I won a hundred gold medals and all I got was this 7."

Thank god for game.

Postscript: It has come to my attention that the second picture is not Michael Phelps' girlfriend. My bad.

Writing A Book

October 15, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I found an excellent description about what it's like to write a book from a comment on Jack's blog.

> Fact #4: Writing a book isn't fun.
>
> If it doesn't make a lot of sense to write a book for money, how about doing it for satisfaction? Many people imagine that they'd "fulfill themselves" (whatever that means) if they wrote a book; or that they'd get a deep pleasure out of the craft elements of the job. In fact, writing a book is a lot of work, and often work of a very tedious kind. It's heavy labor, more akin to building a house than puttering in your basement. (And no one builds a house purely for the pleasure of it.) It's certainly possible to write for pleasure and satisfaction, but seldom at that scale. Poetry, short stories, blogging — all of these can deliver fun, satisfaction, and the pleasures of craft. But writing a book isn't something that can be done in a week or a month. It weighs on you; it's a bear to wrestle into submission, and it's followed by the (generally) no-fun publishing process. And then you've got to endure the almost inevitable commercial disappointment. Imagine going to all the trouble of building your dream house (by hand, naturally) — and then people ignore it.
>
> So why do people do write books? I come up with these possible explanations:
>
> - Some hope to hit the jackpot despite the odds.
> - Some have a dream about being an author, or taking part in "literature."
> - Some are obsessed lunatics — ie., they feel they just gotta. < -- that's me
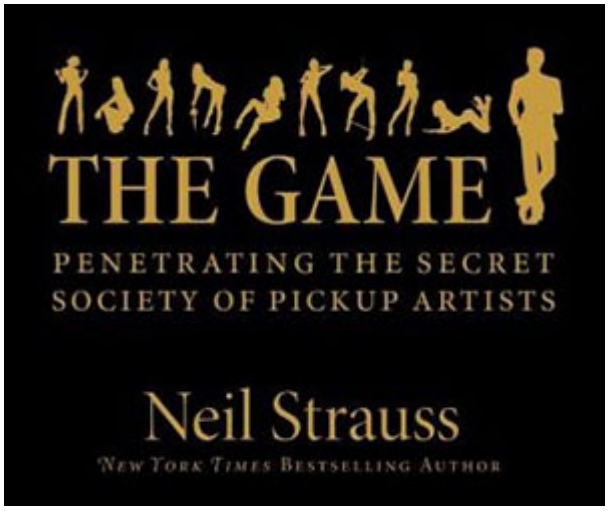
> - Some don't know better (these usually never write a second book)
> - Some have other ambitions, and writing a book is a step along the way.
> - A handful are determined to be trade-book authors as a career, and know what the game consists of, and have (or think they have) the tenacity, toughness, talent, luck and energy to succeed.

The book is chugging along nicely. It should be done Q1 2009. And it's true, I get zero satisfaction from working on it. But I gotta finish.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Mixed Groups

October 19, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I don't shy away from approaching groups of girls with the occasional guy, but looking back I can't say those attempts have been fruitful. Recent example: I was hanging out with Virgle Kent when a girl glanced at me not once, not twice, but thrice. She was with one guy and one girl. I went in something light but got absolutely no response. The girl looked away, and the guy she was with gave me an evil stare. It was unnecessarily awkward. Virgle Kent just shook his head and told me he doesn't bother approaching girls with guys in their groups. I was the devil's advocate and disagreed with him at the time but I could only nod my head while reading Your Guy Friend…

> I feel that single women who go out with mixed group of friends and then expect guys to approach and pick them up or hit on them are selfish. I don't think they deserve my game. Selfish because they're trying to play it safe by going out with males that will give them attention because they're their friends. Yet at the same time they want other guys to come over and give them attention also? It's a win win for the girl, no real risk involved, so why should I give them any reward? I feel if you go out with a group of people you should entertain and give them you're full attention. If you go out looking for dick (either that night or in the future) then go hard or go home. If you do come out with a guy friend then the onus is on YOU to make it obvious and clear that you want to talk to a different guy. That mean that YOU will either have to approach the guy or stare him down like a stalker / bunny boiler till he has no choice but to come talk to you. Step your game up.

I'm confident his belief hasn't cost him a single girl worth his time.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

Are You A Registered Democrat?

October 21, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There was a female canvasser for the Democratic National Committee hassling people outside the Woodley Park Metro stop yesterday afternoon. She easily reeled me in after I made eye contact with her.

“Excuse me are you a registered Democrat?”

“No I’m an independent,” I said, “but I usually vote Democrat.”

“Okay good. As you may know we’re very close to getting a filibuster proof majority in the Senate. If that happens and Obama wins next month the Democrats would have control to….”

I interrupted. “I don’t think the Democrats deserve a filibuster proof majority.”

“Why not?” she asked.

“Two years ago they took control of Congress and the Senate on the premise that they would end the war in Iraq. Yet they have done no such thing. They have rubber stamped every one of Bush’s defense spending bills, and the votes haven’t even been close. Republicans didn’t even have to filibuster. Pelosi and Reid have been steamrolled by the most unpopular President in history.”

“Okay, well, umm.”

“The Democrats even voted for FISA. They voted for the recent Wall Street bailout. They’re not as bad as the Republicans, I agree, but not much better. This year I will be voting against my Democratic Congressman because he voted for the bailout. Even Obama’s timeline to end the war in Iraq has been pushed back. What is it now, 2010?”

She was stuck. The poor thing. She’s just an eager eyed young girl with Obama fever trying to make a difference, but in the end she was a sorry spokesman for her party and should head up the street to Tryst where she can practice on a more sympathetic crowd. The conversation devolved into her explaining to me how if we pull out of Iraq now the situation would get worse. I could swear that was a Republican talking point at one point. Flip sides of the same coin, someone once said to me.

After all that she still asked me if I wanted to donate to the DNC. I declined.

Postscript: I want to think Kelly from Other Brand for sending me this t-shirt. I will wear it with a smug look on my face.

How Old Is Too Old

October 22, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

What is the ideal cutoff age for having a child? If you're a woman with at least a masters degree, you're probably thinking 40, but reality will deal with that notion soon enough.

Trust me when I say you don't want to be approaching 50-years-old with a hyperactive monster running around crying his eyes out because he wants another ice cream cone after the first got smashed into the screen of your new LCD television set (seen in a million times). You don't want to have a kid when you're on the decline and rob him or her of a parent who has energy to take it outside and play for hours instead of forced playtime once a week in the filthy McDonalds ball cage.

My father is my test case. He had me, his first (and favorite), when he was 26-years-old. He had my last brother at 50-years-old. I feel bad for the little one because his father, while the same as mine, isn't the same. My Dad used to take me and a soccer ball out for hours at a time, but my little brother gets 30 minutes of digging for worms while Pops watches from the steps tending to his garden.

"A healthy 50-year-old can't match the energy of even a tired 30-year-old," my dad said to me. I think by tired he meant lazy and by 30-year-old he meant me, but I understood his point. He's old and tired, and while he loves the little butterball he's at the age where he just wants to relax. The internet and television is raising my brother more than it did me.

I accept it: if I don't have a kid by my late 30's then it's not going to happen. It shouldn't—it wouldn't be fair to the kid. I don't think it's going to happen. I'm wholly incapable of giving decades of my life to another human being and making sure it comes out right in the world. While I am growing a very nice basil plant, I admit my failure as a member of this species and will have to find some other way to leave my legacy, if I care to do so. Bless my parents for doing what I cannot.

NYC Observations

October 26, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I went to New York City for a weekend recently, my first visit in several years. To put things into perspective, I stayed a month each in Cordoba and Rio, so the observations I'm about to share with you could be complete bullshit, but I don't think they are.

- No flip flops. Not one stinking pair. The women put in effort, and they looked good. Very common were sexy high-heel boots. My lady friend wore an extremely uncomfortable pair for a couple dozen blocks including a walk through the incredibly Eurotrash Meatpacking district. She didn't complain about her plight as a woman during the process, and neither did the men who approached her when I stepped away.

- Not as fat. Washington DC is the only place in the world where an average, plain-Jane woman with an okay body has her pick of the most desirable men. I've already beaten this point to death.

- A real coffee shop culture, and by real I mean cramped and snobby with passive aggressive notes about the environment strewn about, but no one in a stupid uniform asking "How are you doing?" when they really don't give a shit. I could see it happening in one of their cafes that I meet someone in the same starving / bum boat as myself.

- Too big for its own good. With thousands of possible nightlife choices, it may never happen that I find my most fruitful niche if I lived there. Even in comparatively tiny DC it took me a few years.

- Cheap and fast public transit. Taxicabs don't charge more for extra passengers. Taking one with a group is cheaper than the already cheap subway that blew me away with express lines that skip stops. (The subway fare is $2 for two hours.) Compare that to what I pay for a 25-minute ride from a Maryland suburb to downtown DC at 3:01pm ($4). The DC Metro system is beautiful to look at but poorly planned, and run. I've been on subway lines in South America that are more efficient than ours. Even the Caracas subway which appears to be modeled after DC's Metro runs better than the Metro.

- Cuter girls. I think if DC's girls would lose their twenty extra pounds then they'd compete somewhat well, but they won't, and even if they did their lack of individuality when it comes to appearance and less than shoulder-length hair would always keep them a step behind. For two nights I was more inspired than I have been in nine months.

There was nothing about my visit that told me I needed to move there instead of say the two South American cities I mentioned above, but I wouldn't mind another visit in a few months. There are plenty of dirty hostels though most seem to be located in Harlem or other undesirable neighborhoods.

I Have No Style

October 27, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

1 pair jeans
1 pair shorts
6 t-shirts, 6 pairs black socks, 6 pairs boxers
1 belt
1 long sleeves jumper
1 pair running shoes
1 pair casual Adidas shoes

That's all I had for six months. I had to do laundry each week but I was covered for hiking on mountains, walking on the beach and drinking at bars and clubs. Everything I had matched everything else and I didn't have to spend more than 10 seconds a day with my dress.

When a friend recently told me that all the pictures he has of me is in the same shirt, one my sister picked out for me in Macy's that cost $25, all I could do was shrug. I've worn it at least a dozen times and will literally wear it out until it disintegrates, just like what happened to my last pair of jeans. It doesn't bother me that a bartender at my favorite bar probably thinks I have no clothes. There's no reason it should.

Guys have to be a little careful about what they choose to showcase. If it's money then they will attract girls who like money. If it's style then they will attract girls who like style. If it's personality, then well, you get the idea. I can't say any girls I've gone out with recently have been high-maintenance, and that's just how I like it.

I think I will replace my old brown t-shirt next month. Let me gear up the budget for the $20 cost.

Kitchen’s Fault

October 28, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previously: Long Live The Streak!

It was a big group of six people. They all wanted to eat. I punched their food and drinks into the screen. The food runner delivered the food 15 minutes later and when everyone was half-finished eating I noticed one irate man missing his meal. I forgot to put in his order. I’ve done this before. I begged the kitchen to make his “on the fly.”

I walked back to the table.

“Sir, there was a mix up in the kitchen and they thought they made your order when in fact they did not. I apologize for this and I’m getting them to make it right now. It should be out in a couple minutes.”

I still got a 20% on that tab. Later I spilled a glass of red wine on two girls. I only got their legs but it was still messy. When I couldn’t think of a way to blame the kitchen I said, “Sorry guys I’m an idiot.”

20%.

I try to pick apart what gets higher tips or not and I’m finding it’s not necessarily good service because if the words “Sorry” or “I apologize” come out of my mouth I do pretty well. It’s good attitude. If they like me I will get a good tip, no matter how shitty my service was.

Two things:

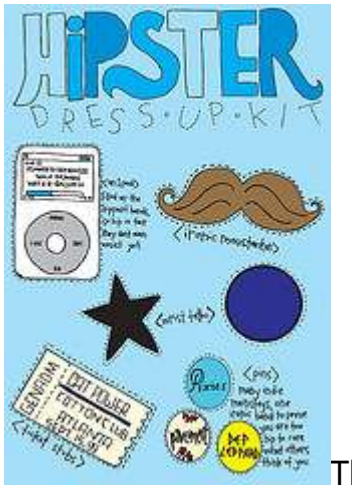
1. If you receive a free drink, it’s because the bartender wants you to give him the money you would have spent. If you get a $8 drink for free, tip at least $5 on that drink.

2. We look at tips on the total amount, not the amount without tax.

If you ever tip 10-14% to one of my coworkers, I will not hear the end of it. They whine about it, call you cheap, and then make fun of your physical appearance of mannerisms. So yes, a good way to punish a restaurant worker is to give a bad tip. It puts them in an instant bad mood. I, on the other hand, realize that tips are voluntary. I am grateful for every crumpled dollar you give me.

Social Incompetents

October 30, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link



The first time I saw it I did a double take. A man and a woman, who were obviously together, wore headphones on their individual iPods at the same time. I've also seen it with same sex friends, usually girls, who sit next to each other on the bus, both wearing headphones. Every now and then they remove one headphone to communicate a few words, and then put it right back.

Only an American can take music, something which if you look at the history is supposed to bring people together, and use it in a way to isolate themselves further from friends and lovers. It's no coincidence that none of my close friends own iPods. If someone cannot tolerate the company of their own mind for an hour then there is no reason why another human should.

Cupcakes? Cupcakes!

November 2, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

“Hey Javi, my buddy, life is good?” I asked.

He didn’t smile. “It’s a little rough lately. My mom can’t find a job. My parents are thinking of putting me to work shining shoes.”

“How old are you now?”

“Twelve.”

“Well that sucks. Someone was telling me the other day that your neighborhood is one of the poorest in Buenos Aires. You’re going to be a man a lot sooner than kids in my country.”

“I’m already a man!” He flexed his little bicep muscle.

“Very good. Well I know you’re interested in America and how life is like there. I wanted to tell you a cool part of our culture.”

“Okay.”

“Cupcakes.”

“Cupcakes?” He looked confused.

“Cupcakes! I’m surprised you don’t know. Cupcakes are huge in America. The largest cities have several shops that focus exclusively on selling handmade cupcakes.”

“You mean the little round pieces of cake with frosting on top?”

“That’s the one. But in America we make luxury cupcakes that are just incredible. The best cupcakes you’ve ever had. They only cost $2 or $3 each but if you buy them by the dozen you get a nice discount.”

“$2 can feed for me for the entire day.”

“Oh really, that’s pretty interesting.”

“I mean do they have meat in it? How big are they?”

“No meat, and they’re not very big. I can finish one in about four bites, three bites if it’s especially tasty, which they usually are.”

“Is this a joke?”

“Javi I’m not joking! In my city there is a store called Georgetown Cupcake and people my age line up around the block and wait twenty minutes to get a taste of their amazing designer cupcakes. Another shop opened up nearby and the competition is awesomely intense with people choosing sides over who has the best cupcakes in town. Friendships have been strained. The number one cupcake shop used to be this shop called Cakelove, but now everyone agrees their cupcakes are worse than the ones they sell at the Korean supermarket.”

“Line up for cupcakes? I line up for meals from the government when my parents run out of money. These cupcakes must have drugs in them then.”

“No, no drugs. Just the highest quality ingredients: sugar, butter, eggs, flour, and sprinkles. Delicious!”

“And this is popular in America?”

“So popular you wouldn’t believe. There are articles written about cupcake shops in newspapers. On the internet people furiously debate which shop has the best cupcakes. Talk shows do pieces on cupcakes. They are web sites about cupcakes with close-up shots of cupcakes. Soon there will be cupcake franchises across America like Starbucks and McDonalds. There are even bus tours that stop at culturally significant cupcake shops. It’s fun!”

He didn’t respond. I had trouble convincing Javi that I wasn’t bullshitting with him.

“Javi, remember these are the best cupcakes. I’m pretty sure you’d get caught up in the cupcake craze if you lived in America and weren’t so poor.”

“I miss eating chicken and steak,” he said.

“Um that’s nice.”

Stupid little kid. He just doesn’t get it.

Happy Election Day

November 3, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The bar was buzzing last night with election talk. Since I'm not paid to debate my customers (and I don't know the views of others in earshot), I always keep my comments neutral. But sometimes it's hard.

"There is no conceivable reason to own a gun. In Italy you can't buy a gun."

I pursed my lip and nodded. She was a feminist.

"Are you ready for change? Change is coming."

Oh, sure, I'm ready.

Besides some trivial matters, I don't think anything will change regardless of who wins. Unless McCain wins and then dies.

How It Feels Like To Be A Hot Girl

November 5, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I reprised my costume as Jesus for Halloween this year. With my hair 8-inches longer than last time and my beard bushier with almost a month of extra growth, the resemblance I had to Christ was eerie.

It started the second I stepped foot in the Metro.

“Holy shit, it’s Jesus!”

“Jesus Christ!!”

“Look, that nigga Jesus!!”

A Muslim-looking man wanted to have his picture taken with me. I gave a serious look, like Jesus would, and made sure my large-print bible was in the frame of the photo.

On the Metro car a girl dressed up as a devil asked to take a picture with me as well. All the way down the car a group of teenage girls yelled my name (Jesus) and then rushed up to take photos with their camera phones. A girl dressed up as a referee, blowing her whistle loudly every two minutes, was next to ask for a picture. She was rather petite and I wrapped my arm around her so we’d be nice and close for the photo. Sober guys next to me gave me their respect with nods of compliment.

On my walk to the bar I had about four or five cars honk their horns. Guys hung halfway out the window yelling Jesus. I’d raise my arm to recognize their efforts to get my attention. A group of white people partying on a patio gave me a round of applause, and I blessed them with a hand motion that I practiced earlier in front of the mirror.

About a dozen or so photos were taken of me in the bar. I believe at one point a line developed. A girl I didn’t know bought me a beer, but didn’t want to talk. She just went to the bar, got my drink, and then left back to her friends. Countless Jews walked up to me, apologizing. The only time I was upstaged was when this asshole showed up in a robot costume with yellow lights and 80’s music blaring from his box head. He did breakdance moves and a crowd formed around him. I cried foul.

The attention got old pretty quick. I was just a cheap gimmick judged by my appearance and nothing else. People lost interest in talking to me if I stepped out of character.

At the next bar I gave off forced smiles with each Jesus yell. A group who wanted my photo made a demand that I pose with a thumbs-up sign. I declined. They kept demanding and I kept saying no. They made negative remarks out of earshot. Eventually I barely looked when drunk people came up to me with “JESUS.” I was much more receptive with calmer approaches like “Hey man I really like your costume. Is your hair real?”

Approaches fell into two categories: those that increased the likelihood of a conversation developing and those that decreased it. The parallel to game here was obvious to me.

I hesitated going home because I knew I’d have to walk through a sea of drunk people.

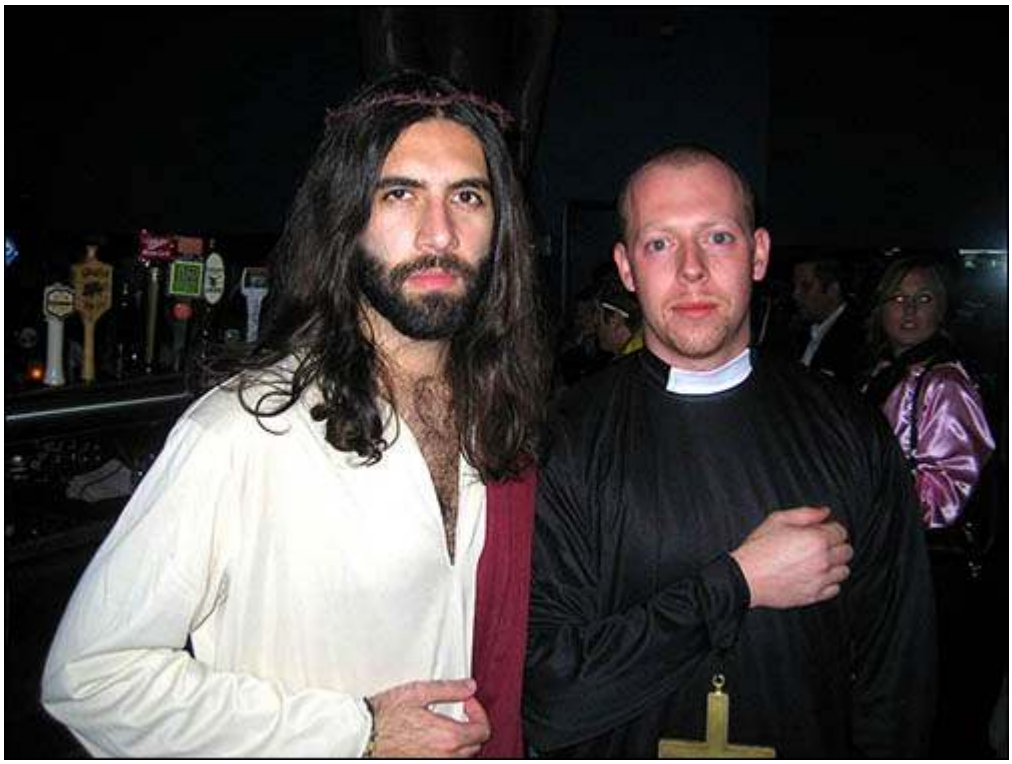
The gauntlet. The attention from cars and and walking drunks was relentless. I wished I could take the costume off, or that I at least brought a band to put my hair back and be less Jesus-like. I kept my head down and avoided eye contact so I wouldn't encourage anyone, but I still got a lot of "Hey Come here!" When I didn't do what people wanted they got annoyed. "Jesus is drunk," they'd say.

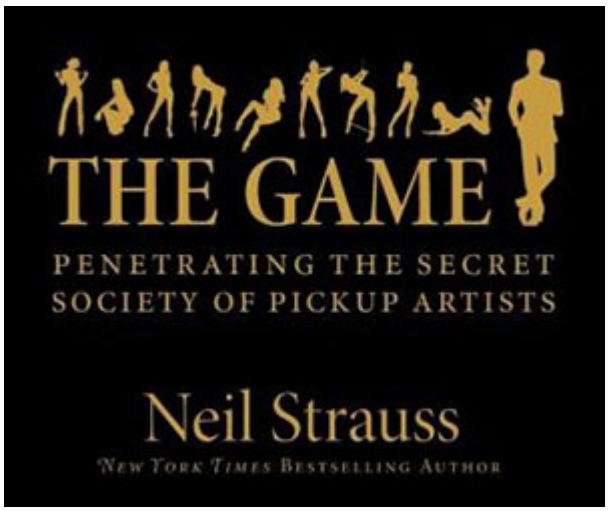
On the subway ride back I fell asleep, but people still tried to get my attention.

"Hey look it's Jesus. He's sleeping."

There is such a thing as too much attention, especially when the attention is identical. You get numb to it, and only respond to something original or different.

Postscript: Take a look at How It Feels To Be A Fat Chick by Virgle Kent, my wingman of the night.





I Don’t Remember Laughing So Hard

November 8, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Check out Got My Girlfriend To Model For My Car (PICS). Then read the comments for the first few pages. You’ll need tissue.

The girl put the photos up on her Myspace in an album called “Bikini Modeling.” She’s aware the internet is making fun of her right now.

> Hm…so I’ve recently been the topic of several internet message boards conversation. I have a few bikini photos on there from a friend of mine. I never said I looked great in a bikini and wasn’t going for high-quality photos. It was fun, purely for entertainment, and it was a beautiful day. Some people think I look great in the bikni, others (obviously) think the exact opposite…..

Obviously.

In case you’re hungry for more…

Bitter Jaded Man

November 9, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

"What is flirtation? One might say that it is behavior leading another to believe that sexual intimacy is possible, while preventing that possibility from becoming a certainty. In other words, flirting is a promise of sexual intercourse without a guarantee."
-The Unbearable Lightness Of Being

I'm on a curly hair kick right now. When a cute curly-haired girl looked at me and smiled I was over in a flash.

"Hi!!!!" I said.

She pretended she was a tough smart ass when I could tell she was much more vulnerable. I like girls who wear their emotions on their sleeve because it's only through emotions that real connections can be made.

As luck would have it, a tall blonde I talked to earlier wouldn't stop looking over at me. Curly hair noticed this and said that if I really wanted to go talk to her I could and she'd leave us alone. I laughed it off. There's game to tell a girl you are desirable and then there is another girl staring at your junk to tell a girl you are desirable. One is more powerful than the other.

About a half-hour into our courtship I made a comment along the lines of "I guess we're going to have to hang out sometime soon." She didn't object to that statement. I think I would date her if it came down to that, and if she was reading this now I doubt she'd deny there was something there besides alcohol and dim lighting. It's rare that I care about meeting a girl these days.

Her friends were leaving. She wasn't ready to be kissed. I asked her where she lives as I reached for my cell phone in my pocket.

"Richmond."

"Wait, where?" I asked.

"Richmond, Virginia."

"When are you going back?"

She looked at her watch. "In about 10 hours."

"That information could have been useful to me an hour ago!"

"Oh so you wouldn't have talked to me then?"

I glanced away, unwittingly giving her my answer.

It was a Friday night and the bar was about to close. There was nothing more to do. The night was done.

But I was cool. Only when you cross certain bridges can you allow a girl to make you feel emotions such as anger, frustration, or even regret. A kiss is the first bridge and sex would be the next. If you let girls affect you before you got what you wanted then I imagine you would turn into a very bitter, jaded man. Those are not attractive qualities.

Open Letter To A Friend

November 11, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Dear Retired Pimp,

What a difference a couple years make! I don't believe you're going to be a dad. While I'm not sure myself about getting married and having children, the fact that you married a foreign bride who from day one cooked, cleaned, and served your needs means I'm not too worried about your future. I don't see your marriage winding up like the typical, sad case where once a month you pump through your wife's hand as she reads gardening magazines.

I don't have any marriage or relationship advice for you. That's not my specialty. But you recently told me you're having a baby girl. This is where karma could potentially bite men like us in the ass. If you do a good job raising her then she won't end up the neighborhood bicycle like many of the girls we've smashed. Remember that one night we pulled this old broad to my place and almost tag teamed her? All three of us were half naked at one point. She was straddling on top of you and while you played with her breasts I gave her a shoulder rub. I think I was sitting on top of your thighs. I wonder if our friendship would have changed if she let…

Anyway.

Here are some parenting tips:

1. If you don't give her enough attention, she will be insecure and go after any smooth talker who calls her pretty. These men will eventually use and abuse her. She won't leave because she'll have no self-esteem. But if you spoil her rotten, she will gravitate towards the assholes who don't give her any attention. I'd err on the side of giving too much attention short of creating a princess.

2. Being a good parent is not hard, it just takes time. This is why most take the easy way out and stick the kid in front of the television. All that will do is train her to be an obedient consumer. Her brain is like a sponge and it's up to you on what she soaks up. My little brother's favorite foods happens to be processed shit made by Kraft and McDonalds. His attention span is shorter than a cat's. Coincidence?

3. Buy a gun. After she goes through puberty, there are going to be men knocking the door, especially because of her exotic background. Be strict about dating but not too strict because then she will just do it behind your back. (She'll rebel by screwing some dude she doesn't care for in the first place.) I see no harm in following her around town. By then it won't be necessary because they'll have GPS devices you can attach to her belongings.

4. Watch the show WifeSwap on ABC. It's not particularly good but it offers a fascinating look at how parenting styles shape children. How does that saying go… "Our lives are a continuation of our parents'." With everything you do to your daughter there will be an effect, sometimes unintended.

Oh on the show you'll also see that most parents are so retarded that it will be pretty much impossible for you to raise a complete screw-up.

5. If you tell her who not to date, it's a 100% guarantee she will bring that type of man home. Trying to fix things when she is already of age will be hopeless. Her mate selection will be determined by the way you raise her (see no. 1).

6. You will be completely gray in a few years. You don't strike me as a patient man but you will now learn. Either that or you go insane. The next five years until she starts school will be especially tough. If you need to take a break I can babysit her for $15 an hour including meals and unlimited pay-per-view entertainment. My resume includes babysitting my younger siblings. It's true: I didn't even flinch when my little brother did doo-doo in his pants three times in a span of four hours. I cleaned it with a big smile each time.

7. Consider private education. Have you been to a public school recently? I have and it's not pretty. I recently confused my 12-year-old brother's writing for the 5-year-old because his handwriting was so bad. I felt bad at first but now I regularly make fun of his chicken scratch to shame him into improving. I made a really good joke the other night which I'd like to share with you right now.

The 5-year-old is practicing his letters so his mom bought him this huge workbook where he writes and colors each letter of the alphabet. It's the size of a poster board. When both of the brothers were in the same room I flipped open the workbook and gave approving nods. Then deadpan I said: "[12-year-old], I'm looking at your recent work and I really like how your handwriting is improving." I flipped through another couple pages. "Your B's and E's are getting especially good. Keep it up brother I'm proud of you."

He's getting pissed and the little one, not yet able to pick up sarcasm, is yelling, "No, it's mine!!! It's mine!!! Those are my letters!!!! Not his!!! I did it!!!" It was beautiful. Now the little one thinks his handwriting is better than a 12-year-old's. Two birds with one stone I say.

Anyway, they didn't even teach the older one to write in cursive like we had to learn. He can barely read it. And this is Montgomery County we're talking about. It has gotten much worse since our days.

8. Delay as long as possible until she has her first alcoholic beverage. Studies show that the sooner a person tries alcohol, the more he or she will abuse it. You don't want her ending up like so many of the girls we've met who get sloppy, stumble over bar stools, and need to be carried out by friends. They wake up with sore vaginas and don't know why. If she is the type of girl that slams shots and then stumbles off the bar and it's not her birthday, I'm afraid you've failed.

The person she will become is almost entirely in your hands my friend. In a sense you are now a god.

Good luck,

Roosh

Blogger Happy Hour

November 13, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Next Friday I'm teaming up to throw a happy hour at Bourbon with Arjewtino, a hardcore player posing as a huggable beta for his predominantly female readership, and the lovely Lemmonex, an American woman who actually knows how to cook.

Bourbon is one of the only bars I know that has Stone Pale Ale, a beer that I highly recommend for its woodsy undertones.

> This is an ale for those who have learned to appreciate distinctive flavor.

That would be me.

Does Armpit Odor Make Me Irresistible To Women?

November 18, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I knew a guy who had atrocious armpit odor. Because of its signature scent I could walk into a crowded room and know if he was there or not. As a result he made me more uncomfortably aware of whatever funk I was putting out. I started trimming my pit hair and masking the area with Axe-like deodorants. The spray would work for twelve hours or so until my man odor would mix with the perfume, resulting in a smell that was worse than my odor alone.

I settled on an unscented anti-perspirant. This means my natural musk would be on full display at night many hours after I showered (if I showered at all).

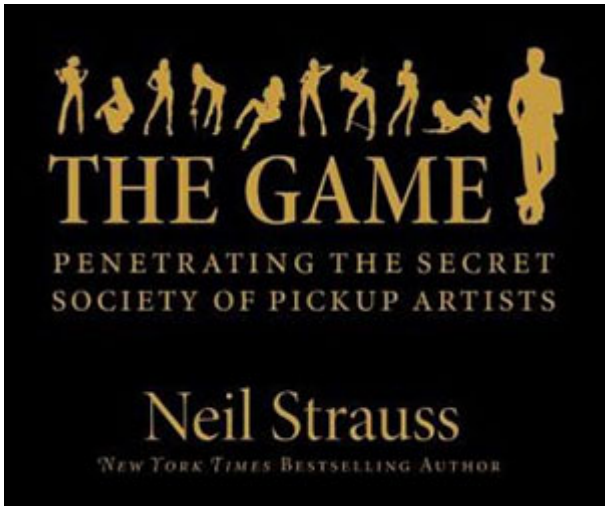
Since I don't wear tank tops on dates, there was no problem when I wore t-shirts because the odor wasn't strong enough to escape the sleeve cuffs. It's after I finished servicing the girl in bed and laid next to her, all sweaty from four minutes of serious thrusting, that the odor was on full display.

When a girl lays on me after sex, she settles her head right on my breast, mere inches away from my arm pit. I got ready for girls to relax in this position, catch a whiff, and then cringe away. But that never happened; they never moved. Were they hard of smelling?

Then there was this husky girl I had sex with who laid on me in a way that her nose was one inch away from my pit. She was right there. But she stayed there and fell asleep. If anything she got closer.

I am forced to conclude that women like a man who smells like a man instead of chemicals mixed in a factory. I was made to think that my musk is foul and must be hidden, but my experience shows it's probably a strong attractant. If there is something large corporations pushes you to "solve" with their products (perfumes, razors, dress shoes, vests, bar soap), there's a good chance that doing the opposite attracts more women. At the least it will attract a more natural woman who isn't a closet lesbian that hates the male body and all its glorious secretions.

As for that friend who had bad odor, I never said anything because he always had a pretty girl on his arm. We never figured out how he did it…



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Lifeblood

November 20, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I know I was lazy with the blog this week. I have a feeling I'll be lazy next week too. But the good news is the manuscript for Not Yet Titled will be done today, and by manuscript I mean something that's pretty close to the final product barring major edits by my editors. This book is sucking my lifeblood but I see the light at the end of the tunnel—I'm close to finishing because I've started fantasizing about what I'm going to do next.

Tonight will be the happy hour at Bourbon with my co-hosts Arjewtino and Lemmonex. Check the first floor first. Upstairs doesn't get going until after 10 or so.

Eavesdropping

November 23, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There are some guys out there who are still skeptical if a more indirect, aloof game really works. This is the type of guy that wants to walk up to girl, tell her she's cute, and be done with it. All he has to do to become a believer is eavesdrop on a group of girls talking about guys, specifically when one talks about guys she likes who is not contacting her or asking her out.

"We've been texting and then it just stopped."

"Should I text him again?"

"We had such a good conversation."

"I'm not sure what else I could have done."

"I really like him."

And so on. It's pretty fascinating how pathetic girls get when they like guy, but what you will never hear them say is, "I like this guy a lot because he texts me every ten minutes."

You will never hurt your chances if you lean towards the aloof end of the game by contacting her at a tortoise's pace, especially after your first date. Assuming she is remotely interested in you, there is little reason to worry about if you waited too long or are taking it too slow. While you will not automatically be punished if you go fast, scarcity equals value for the typical easy girls you will be trying to get into bed.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

Who Is This Slapdick?

November 25, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Another cute girl. She's going to get her drink and then walk out the door. This Starbucks sucks.

No it's good. You get a lot of work done because there aren't a lot of distractions.

But look at her body, her long hair.

It's hard to tell. Up close she could be a mess.

Wait, she's staying. She grabbed the paper. Interesting, she's sitting right next to me. This never happens.

Just stick to your work. There's time for work and there's time for play.

No this is an opportunity. She's reading the sports section. Weird, why is she reading the sports section?

To see how many touchdowns her favorite football player scored. She obviously likes athletics… look at her body. She's not interested in "writers."

Get fucked. Okay I have to say something. What to say, what to say. Like it really matters anyway.

She's not even looking up or making sighing noises. She doesn't want to be bothered. She's probably waiting for someone.

You shutup. She's reading the classified section now. She's bored. But yeah she's probably waiting for someone.

You don't even know how cute she is. You only saw her profile. She could be ugly.

So what? If I say something I don't have to marry her. If she's ugly then I'll let the conversation die out. Okay say something now, she's looking at the window.

"If you're bored with the newspaper I have a book you can borrow. It's very long though you may not get it done within the next fifteen minutes."

Good job stud, she laughed. You got the magic.

Did you see her face? She's 16!

She does look a little young. But she's developed. You like that cute laugh though…

Whoop-dee-doo. Now what are you gonna do?

Shit I'm not sure. She didn't ask me the name of the book. She could have at least asked. I would have asked. She's giving me no encouragement.

Correct, because she doesn't like you. Go back to work.

It's done, she's back in the newspaper, the classifieds. I won't continue this.

You should have come up with something better. Wait, who is this slapdick?

It's her friend. They didn't greet with a hug or kiss.

Whatever. They're talking about going to college. Congratulations you get snubbed by a high school girl. How do you feel?

The same. Look, if it wasn't for me you'd never get laid. I'm sure she was just unnerved by our rugged appearance. She's not used to talking to a real man.

Yeah, that's it.

Alright let's get back to work.

Giddy. Hey on the way home can we get a corn muffin from Giant? They're so delicious.

Done.

Game Won’t Always Work

November 30, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

You’re talking to a girl and for whatever reason you are in such a good state that she’s getting your absolute best game. You have to hold back from laughing at jokes you don’t believe are coming out of your mouth. In fact you’ve never spit game so good. She’s laughing and smiling and by all appearances she’s loving it. But then the conversation ends abruptly and she doesn’t even give you a chance to get her number. It turns out that she didn’t ask you a single question. She didn’t engage you or encourage you.

She wasn’t interested.

It’s temping to say she has a boyfriend, or that you are the complete opposite of her physical type. That could be the case but truth is the best game will not always work. In fact it will fail more often than not.

Game is not meant for those do-or-die moments where you must succeed. It’s not a 100-meter sprint where years of training go into that one Olympic prime-time race. It’s more like poker, trudging along one hand at a time for marathon sessions, where even the best players lose more than they win. Game is a skill that increase your chances of getting more and better in the long run at a cost of sustaining short-term “losses” that teach you what you need to know.

Not accounting for skill, the only correlation I’ve seen in game is that the guys who approach more get more. They have nerves of steel. And ego’s that left them a long time ago.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

The Thrill Is Gone

December 2, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

"Missions are stupid, Tereza. I have no mission. No one has. And it's a terrific relief to realize you're free, free of all missions."
-The Unbearable Lightness Of Being

There used to be no obstacles in my path to sex. I had the strong desire followed by unlimited will that allowed me to sleep with a lot of women, something that I felt was necessary to make me a real man. I put up with all sorts of attitude, bullshit, flakiness, and frustration to make it happen.

Now the path is obstructed with debris. She's not putting in enough effort. She's not from the right country. She's stupid. She lives too far. She's too old. She's not sensual or emotional. She has fat arms. She's a lawyer. Something is always in the way of putting in a full effort, whereas a couple years ago it never came up.

It wasn't long ago that I cherished the vagina (the organ, not the woman attached to it). I'd take almost any abuse for the chance to abuse it. I didn't mind doing whatever was necessary, whatever the cost. The pursuit was completely pure.

The problem came about when I realized that women are as much of a source of unhappiness as happiness. Most are simply not worth the time, squirting vagina or not, and the costs associated with laying 95% of them exceeds the sexual benefits gained. And the benefits go down with increasing age: what was exciting when I was 22 is an afterthought at 29. There is little thrill in sticking a new vagina.

I'm at the stage where there is nothing left to prove or accomplish. No additional notch will make me a better person or more of a man than I am now. I've hit the point of diminishing return. As a result I have this basal level of game effort determined by my physical needs alone. It's a lot lower than when I had something to prove. When I had a chip on my shoulder.

I was at a club with a friend and I told him how I'm barely motivated or inspired. He gave me a vigorous pep talk and told me I needed to stop being a lazy bitch. To get what was mine. I was pumped. That night I went to sleep ready to do what it takes to build a massive harem of girls. But the next day I woke up as apathetic as ever.

My mind refuses to allow me to work on something where it knows there is little gain. I'm afraid I've passed the peak of sexual conquest. Of quantity. Unless the girl is special or different in some way, or gives me a flag for better understanding of the world, then I can't just go through the motions.

It feels like I've lost my main purpose in life.

What Else Is There?

December 3, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previously: The Thrill Is Gone

"The moment a man questions the meaning and value of life, he is sick, since objectivity neither has any existence; by asking this question one is merely admitting to a store of unsatisfied libido to which something else must have happened, a kind of fermentation leading to sadness and depression."
-Freud

"[Men] are born for the solid earth, not for the water. And naturally they won't think. They are made for life, not for thought. Yes, and he who thinks, what's more, he who makes thought his business, he may go far in it, but he has bartered the solid earth for the water all the same, and one day he will drown."
-Steppenwolfe

I'm sitting on a pile of money.

I have three monthly expenses: cell phone, hosting for this site, and student loans, which are very low (public university). I can pay off those 4% interest loans now but I rather have the cash flow.

I live like I'm poor. I can afford to buy a car but I don't want one. I can get my own place but what's the point if I'm not staying long. I never liked dining out. I'm getting close to the level of cash I had before I went on my trip last year, and I barely do any work. At work my manager asked me if I wanted to add some more shifts, but I declined.

I sat on the kitchen table and looked at all the Black Friday advertisements. There's a lot of things I can buy right now: nicer winter coat, boots, fancy SLR camera, and better laptop. But I don't need them. I looked through the fliers for an hour and the only thing that got me out the door was K-Mart's sale of thermal sweaters for $3.97 each. My mom and sister asked me what I want for Christmas and I told them to get me a card. If you said to me I had a month to live I wouldn't buy or change anything.

What a weird place to be in with no dreams, no goal of conquer.

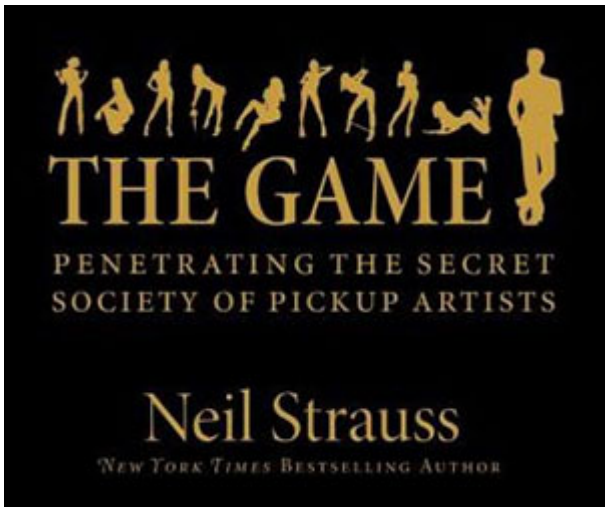
A few years ago someone told me, "Sometimes it's better to want something than to have it." I understand that now. Wanting puts you in an insecure state of mind that distracts you from the big questions which reveal the absurdity of most of what we do. It distracts us from our existence.

So I'll hit the road again. I'll have tons of interesting experiences—more than I'm having here, for sure. But without purpose it can be just as shallow to rack up countries like it is women. What's going to guide me to a glorious end? What will motivate me to get up when I fall? What will make me a better person?

Maybe having a kid would do it. I can go to Brazil, marry a beautiful girl, and try to crack it there. That'd keep me challenged for at least a few years. For the majority of human beings, having a kid solves the purpose problem. But no, I rather remain single.

Monogamy to me seems like early retirement from the best parts of life.

You know how when someone is sure to die they put them in a hospice so they are as comfortable as possible? I feel like I'm in life's hospice. Just fucking around to entertain myself, wishing the clock wasn't moving so fast. I'm not rich but this is how rich people must feel. It's a hollow feeling. Not unhappy or sad, just hollow.



Day Game Workshop

December 7, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Introducing the Day Game Workshop, a four hour course where I teach you how to pick up girls in the following places:

- Coffee shop
- Street
- Book store
- Subway →
- Grocery store
- Retail store

I know a lot of guys who are sick of DC bars and clubs and the same old nightly dickfest with mediocre girls whose egos don't warrant their stratospheric levels. Even if you do get past the initial approach you have to worry about cockblocking friends who will do everything in their power to interfere with your game. And if you get lucky hopefully you don't have to wake up the next day hungover with your ears ringing. Bars and clubs are fine if you're patient and trying to build a solid foundation of game, but you're wasting opportunities if you don't work other venues as well.

Imagine if you could approach girls in their normal friendly state, with zero competition, away from cockblockers, in relaxed, cheap places you go to anyway. I'm a believer that connecting with a sober girl who looks good in the light is a wonderful thing.

Understand: most men cannot bear to approach a girl outside of a bar. Hot girls get approached on the street more by homeless men and jokers yelling "Hey you got a man?" than quality men with game. It gives you a huge advantage if you can talk to girls in places that your peers cannot. Plus you'll have access to girls who don't bother going to bars and think it's more "romantic" to meet a guy in a coffee shop.

The only problem is that it's not easy to pick up girls in sober venues. There's no liquid courage to help and no wingman to get support from. You literally are the stranger on the street and it will take a sound strategy to go home from a typical afternoon in the book store with a number in your pocket. That's where I come in.

In this workshop you will…

- ...be taught simple but effective openers and follow-ups for six different environments (no complex, ridiculous routines)
- ...learn logistical nuances that you don't normally have to worry about for night game
- ...get hands-on approach training with me forcing you to approach girls, without the aid of alcohol
- ...watch by example
- ...learn how to shift the conversation when it's time to close
- ...practice getting digits

I will objectively measure your progress with a stopwatch by timing how long your conversations go. This is because time is a strong correlator to if a day game approach ends with at least a number or not. We will see progress as the workshop goes on.

Subjectively I will observe you and take notes on your body language, mannerisms, and conversational content. At the end of the workshop I will debrief you on things you did right and wrong, including areas I see the most room for improvement.

Workshop Itinerary

1:00-2:15: Instruction on how to pick up at each of the six venues.

2:15-3:15: Coffee shop game. We may have to hit a couple coffee shops to squeeze in at least one approach.

3:15-3:45: Street game. You'll do at least five approaches here because of the abundance of girls walking around. I will teach you the logistics of approaching a girl on the street, including how to get them to stop.

3:45-4:30: Book Store. We will find girls in the magazine section, bestsellers, gift book section, and then finally the cafe. There are two bookstores we can visit.

4:30-5:15: Subway. We are going to take the Metro to a different retail section of town. Here we will hop between train cars until we find girls that we can talk to with my subway opener.

5:15-5:45: Grocery Store. We will go to a yuppie grocery store, grab a basket, and start putting shit in it to make it seem like we're real shoppers. After we approach a couple girls we'll ditch our basket in the produce section.

5:45-6:30: Retail. We'll head inside stores and talk to girls shopping for the holidays.

6:30-7:00: Debrief. I'll give you a report card on how you did from notes I took of your approaches and style.

*Allotted times are approximate

Here's the date:

EMAIL FOR DATES

There are only two slots open. That means it's going to be me, you, and one other guy. I designed it this way for a couple reasons. First, there aren't enough cute girls hanging in a coffee shop or bookstore for a large wolfpack of men to approach. Second, I don't see how I can improve your skill in one session without giving a lot of one-on-one attention. I want this to be the most life-changing workshop you ever take. Lastly, it would be lame and gay if there were a dozen guys running around together hitting on girls.

During the workshop you will do more than you ever have in these venues before. If you came in with a bit of game I'm confident you'll get a number or two. If you don't have game then bring pen and paper so your head doesn't explode.

Cost: $175

It includes Roosh's Day Game Manual, a booklet written for the workshop. Here's the table of contents for the manual…

- The Reality
- Differences Between Day & Night Game
- Internalize This Now
- "Excuse Me…"
- Opener
- Fascinating Follow-Up
- Good Chat
- Gaming
- Coffee Shop
- Street
- Book Store
- Subway
- Grocery Store
- Retail
- Closing
- Turning Regular Thoughts Into Openers
- Tweaking
- Final Thoughts

The manual is brief (~2,500 words), but contains mostly tactics and examples. (For detailed explanations of female behavior and game theory you need to read Bang.) It's a cookbook that gives you step-by-step instructions on what to do and say, and should forever end any reason why you can't talk to a girl pretty much anywhere. Each environment has at least two openers with follow-ups, except for the grocery store which has one opener.

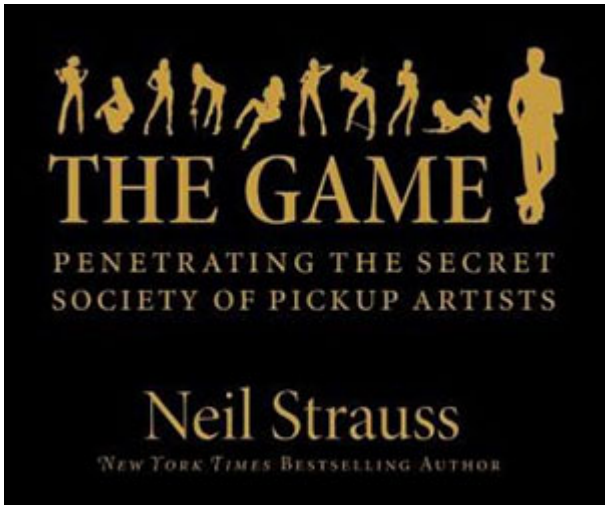
The manual focuses on the concept of baiting, where you toss out little pieces of conversation that pique a girl's curiosity. This strategy is important because day game is much more elegant and subtle than night game. As you know you can't just immediately jump into flirting, teasing, and touching, which is why you'll rarely find guys that excel in both night and day game. They try the other out without adjusting, fail, and then entrench themselves further in what they were already doing.

Not included…

- Bang. $15 extra, which is $5 off the normal price.
- Beverages and snacks
- Subway fare

The workshop takes place in Washington DC. I'm also open to doing it in NYC. To add yourself on the waiting list email roosh@rooshv.com with "workshop" in the subject. To read about workshops that have already taken place, check out the recaps page.



How To Pick Up An Ethiopian Girl

December 9, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I think Ethiopian girls are disproportionately beautiful, with their mahogany skin color, large eyes, high cheekbones, huge breasts and ass, and wild exotic hair. But unfortunately for non-Ethiopian men everywhere they keep to their own circle, judged by the fact that I have never seen a white guy with an Ethiopian girl. It's not fair but that's life.

My postings on game and girls is from experience, but I'm going to have to branch out here and share with you a plan on how I'm going to get my Ethiopian flag. As a Caucasian man limited by his non-Ethiopianness, the plan is based on… exaggerations.

Once I find an Ethiopian girl to approach (shouldn't be hard considering that Washington DC has more Ethiopians than any other city outside of Ethiopia), I will attack with this two-pronged strategy:

1. "My old roommate was Ethiopian." I'm going to talk about Girma and how he taught me a few curse words. Unfortunately I only remember the word "sharmuta," which means bitch / whore (apparently in many languages).

"The Ethiopian girls he dated would always cook for him and even come over and take care of him when he was sick. It was weird to see because American girls didn't do that. The American girls had many masculine traits, while the Ethiopian girls didn't."

This shows I am an insider and "get" the culture. I was so curious that…

2. "A few years ago I visited Ethiopia for fun."

"I had a week of extra vacation time to kill. I went to Addis Ababa, among other cities. I really enjoyed the market there—it was huge. I bought a large sugar cane stalk. I wish I could have stayed longer but I worked a corporate job at the time and I couldn't get off more than a week."

By now she will be exploding with curiosity, but I will be restrained in showing interest. Her being Ethiopian is not enough and she will have to prove that she isn't corrupted by the American culture. I'll go for the kill after a round of cocktails at an Ethiopian restaurant where she will communicate with the help in her language while I sit there and stare at the interesting decorations on the wall.

If all else fails I'll just say I'm a speechwriter for Obama.

If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.

Rooshisms

December 11, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I haven't shared any Bang reviews lately. Here's the first one:

> Hey Roosh,
>
> I just finished Bang. loved it. you are one funny motherfucker. there were certain parts that were absolutely laugh-out-loud; I read them aloud to my roommates. I started calling these "Rooshisms." some examples:
>
> "if the first girl whose number you get you want to impregnate, I guarantee you will bomb spectacularly."
>
> "…but you will really try to weasel your way inside once you get to her place."
>
> "get out of my face or I'm gonna knock you out." LOL!!
>
> "but after a couple times of this you can start to mold her into the slut you've always wanted."
>
> And my personal favorite: "Personally I wouldn't have sex with a girl who does IV drugs or gets banged in the butt by bisexual men." I nearly pissed myself on that one.
>
> You have a great writing style. you don't try to sound stuffy or pretentious or high-fallutin'. you're honest and unapologetic about your desires, which is why I think it's so funny when you talk about your ulterior motive being to weasel your way into the girl's apartment and stuff like that.
>
> I think the thing that makes Bang the best instructional guide to the aspiring player is that it is the best combination of "big picture theory" and examples of lines that actually work. I read The Game (which, in its defense, isn't really intended to teach you how to run game) and then another book which scientifically broke down all the stages of pick-up from approach to relationships, and I have to say Bang was by far the best use of time spent reading. IMHO, it will set you off and–successfully–running into the game faster than any other material out there.

Here's another review:

> Hey. I just started reading Bang and just wanted to let you know it's a great book. I don't cringe when I read it like I do with other books in the genre. Your approach is matter-of-fact and down to earth. Other books, frankly, often appear to be written by douchebags. With your approach one can have actual relationships that are sincere, even if they are just brief hookups or one night stands. You don't advocate lying, dressing up like a raver from 1992, and memorizing bullshit.

And one last one:

> I’ll be honest the book has bumped my notch count a bit, I’m more aggressive in approaching when I used to wait for the women to come to me. What I’ve learned from quizzing various women is that while they think I’m attractive or hot, I look too “nice”, like I am going to buy a woman flowers and kiss her on the cheek after dropping a c note over a bad dinner and not ram their head into the headboard as I’m doing my best fido impersonation.
>
> Props to you for a great book that is an honest approach as opposed to the other really terrible ”pick up artists” books. To be honest, I consider your book to by a psych text which is a good thing.

My second book is coming along. The manuscript is done and my secret editors are editing.

I’m very ready to leave. I will do everything in my power to get out of here by March/April, which means I may have to put finishing touches on the road, something I want to avoid doing since working while traveling is difficult. Without a book to work on there is very little for me to do.

Odds & Ends

December 14, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. Bobby Rio over at TSB Magazine is doing another wingman weekend in the Dominican Republic. It's a trip for those who want to tighten up their game and party with other like-minded guys. Judging by the second picture I take it the last one was a good time.

2. I'm going through Brazilian girl withdrawal. Here's a comment from a guy who knows what's going on.

> I know it seems too good to be true, but it isn't. The third day I was in Brazil, not in Rio, but an hour outside of Sao Paulo, me and my Brazilian friend were out and he goes, "Hey, my friend thinks you are cute, you should go for her." I go, "Alright, for sure, I will." I had literally just met the girl when he said this. So I started talking to her, thinking I would have to spit a little game. After 5 minutes, my friend goes, "Why haven't you kissed her yet?" I go, "Man, I just met her 5 minutes ago." My friend goes, "No, here in Brazil, if a girl likes you, you don't have to sit there and work on it, just go for the kiss." When I was in Rio, I was pretty drunk and definitely not on my A-game. This girl approached me, obviously attracted to me, and I started talking and talking, and she eventually got sick of me talking and went and hooked up with some other guy. I blew my chance because I was too slow. That was a bummer too because she would have been the cutest girl I banged in Brazil. Hooking up there is a lot faster because Brazilian men are very aggressive, so the girls are used to it. Plus, the Brazilian girls love gringos. The girls are easy, but still, they don't come off as slutty. It's really weird. Brazil is an amazing place for sure!

3. I'm all over Maria Rita, a Brazilian singer Her voice is like therapy. Start with Despedida, Novo Amor, and Samba Meu. Check out her mother:

Art Garfunkel did a cover of this song in English.

If you want the mp3 of something on YouTube, use vixy.net to convert it. I use the desktop version.

4. Check out my Rio nightlife guide.

5. I'm now on twitter.

6. The site should loan up nice and clean now from an iPhone / Blackberry.

The Best Way To Sell Eggnog

December 15, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

At the bar we often experiment with different types of drink and food. For the holiday season we have a few special drinks. It's not worth selling them since they're cheaper than an average glass of wine, but I like trying to see if I can push them onto customers anyway. I'm all about the challenge.

I learned that singing the praises of the drink is not that effective. Even if the ingredients are top notch, most people are not very adventurous, and it's hard to move them to buy something they don't know.

So this is what I do. I decide which drink I want to sell for a particular customer and then I say:

"This drink is selling very well. It's one of our most popular drinks."

The key word is "popular." It works most of the time. Without hesitation people will buy what other people are buying, because there's the assumption if it's popular then it has to be good. This is why books on the bestseller list tend to stay on the bestseller lists. And this is why girls will date guys they know have slept with a lot of women. To their friends they'll say something like, "Eww he probably has a lot of diseases," but they'll bang him anyway, probably without a condom.

My Hero

December 17, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I was on the subway when the girl sitting right next to me began loudly telling a story to someone on the phone. I am unable to reproduce her hip hop slang so this is a paraphrase:

“You know how I don’t let any guy try to get with me right? I get their number and then throw it away. So I was about to get on the Metro and this guy starts talking to me. He seemed okay. He asks me if I’m hungry and want to grab something to eat, his treat. I figure why not, so I said yes.

“We go to a Mexican place and eat dinner. I’m a little nervous because I would hate if Chris found out I’m hanging out with some other guy like this. I just wanted the meal. The check comes, and get this shit: his card was declined. He leaves to the ATM across the street and comes up apologizing, saying he can’t pay the bill. I’m sooooo angry at this point. So I pay the whole thing—$26 and $2 tip. He tells me he wants to take me out again to make up for not having money. I tell him no and to consider this an early Christmas gift. This sucks because I can’t afford anything right now. I’m so upset.”

I looked the other way and put my hand over my face until I was done laughing. It’s bad enough she had a boyfriend and went out on a date with a guy she wanted to use for tacos con carne (yes, she was obese, morbidly), but why insult the help with a pathetic 7.7% tip? Two more dollars wouldn’t have killed her at that point. Yet sitting on my comfortable orange seat I was extremely proud to be the same gender of the man who gave this girl what she deserved. You know she’ll be stewing for weeks, maybe months. He changed her for the better of all men everywhere.

I got to wondering if he ran “declined card” game on purpose. After the massive social faux-pas of showing up on a date with $0, he knows that any girl who makes it to date two wants to get banged and doesn’t care about his (in)ability to pay. His cost per notch must be admirable. I may have to steal this technique if I ever get in dire straits, but instead of a date two I’ll just try to drag the girl back to my refrigerator box.

ISO Girl Who Speaks Fluent Spanish

December 18, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I'm looking for a Spanish talking partner. I can read Spanish somewhat well but my speaking is weak because I don't practice it much.

I prefer a female speaker because when I travel again that's who I'll mostly be talking to (in bars, clubs, coffee shops, etc.). Any Latin background is fine except Chile (I don't understand Chilean Spanish).

I figure we can meet in a coffee shop somewhere in DC. In exchange I can buy you whatever drink and food you want. I can also lend a sympathetic ear and help you solve your problems in life, if you want.

If it works out I'd like to do it once every week or two. And no, this is not a scheme to get laid. I won't ask for a picture.

Bone Crushing Cockblock

December 21, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

This story happened a couple months ago but I just remembered it the other night while thinking about my life.

I was at a small lounge with a couple friends when I made small chat with this alright looking girl. It went nowhere but later I got much farther with her cuter friend. The deeper the conversation got the more the original girl interrupted, until she finally squeezed me out of the conversation by making her friend dance.

One hour later I'm leaning against the bar and who is dancing in front of me but an Americanized Brazilian girl (good enough). I hit her with my gringo Portuguese and she's curious, wondering why this gringo spent a month in her country. I mentioned a couple popular Brazilian foods for good measure, but I didn't overdo it or else it would come across as me trying to impress her. She asked me to dance.

Apparently half the girls at the bar knew each other, including all three girls I've mentioned so far. While I'm getting somewhere with the Brazilian, the original cockblocker comes up to her.

"Oh, you're talking to him. He hit on everyone tonight."

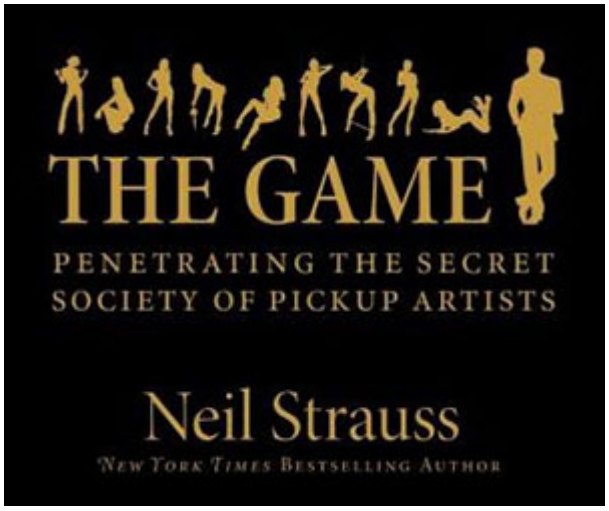
I was doing a dry run of the day game workshop with a friend. I told him in day game girls are polite and go out of their way to be helpful even if they think the approach is a pick-up attempt. But in bars if you get a couple girls together the behavior they exhibit is anti-social and downright psychotic. Show me a man who has tons of experience meeting girls in clubs and I'll show you a man who has generally negative views on women. Stupid. Sluts. Idiots. Worthless. Attention whores. Bitches. Mindless. Boring. Etc.

After the girl told the Brazilian that I hit on "everyone," I knew I was done. The Brazilian's face turned upside down and she backed away. Two people who were getting along had it cut short because of a girl who morphs into this beast whenever she walks into a bar. How unnatural.

It's time I share with you my plan to end the cockblocking phenomenon once and for all…

Continued… How To End Cockblocking As We Know It



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

How To End Cockblocking As We Know It

December 22, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The way to end cockblocking in the United States came to me in a dream. I woke up and immediately grabbed a pen so I wouldn't forget something that could change the lives of millions of men.

If you get cockblocked by a girl, you need to respond by shaking her core so hard that she hesitates doing it ever again, like a mouse who hits the wrong lever and gets the shit zapped out of him. No jokes and no wit—you gotta get dirty.

This is what you must say to the cockblocker. Say it with a stern tone, like a parent scolding a child.

"Did you really just do that? I'm being friendly and respectful to your friend and you rudely interrupt. Did your parents teach you to be anti-social like that?"

Then shake your head and turn your back on her. Don't engage her in a conversation or even act like you hear her response. She no longer exists.

This ruins her night, completely. Girls are emotional creatures and it takes them a very long time to get over getting called out like that. To top it off, girls absolutely hate it when you don't allow them to respond. They are so used to getting in the last word in their arguments with men (they are addicted to closure, remember), that she will be thinking of what happened for a long time to come.

I was talking to a girl and mid-sentence out of nowhere this bitch rolls up between us and starts yapping her mouth. I tap her on the shoulder and she turns around. With a straight face I said, "You see we're talking here, right?" She gave me a stunned look and immediately stormed off. Her friend gave chase to console her.

Do you think she interrupted another conversation that night? I don't think so. She probably went home to call her beta hanger-on for support.

If every guy calls out a cockblocker just once a month, I'm confident it will cease to exist in a year or two. I'm dead serious. Girls will continue to cockblock as long as there is no punishment for doing so, and since it's against the law to slap her upside the face, you have to use words. But it's important you don't use profanity or call her names because then she won't take you seriously. Be mostly respectful so she can't immediately write you off as an asshole. You're a good guy who is shocked and appalled by the rudeness you were just victim to. You don't believe what the world is coming to.

It's our fault that girls cockblock. We've been letting them get away with it for so long that girls know there is absolutely no cost for them to block. We stand there with dumbfounded looks on our face while she gets satisfaction that her friend is going home alone just like her. It's time to let them earn that cockblock.

Here are the keywords to remember: respectful, rude, interrupt, anti-social. I don't care if I get kicked out of bars but I'm going to ruin her night, and she's going to think twice about doing it again. Worthless bitch.

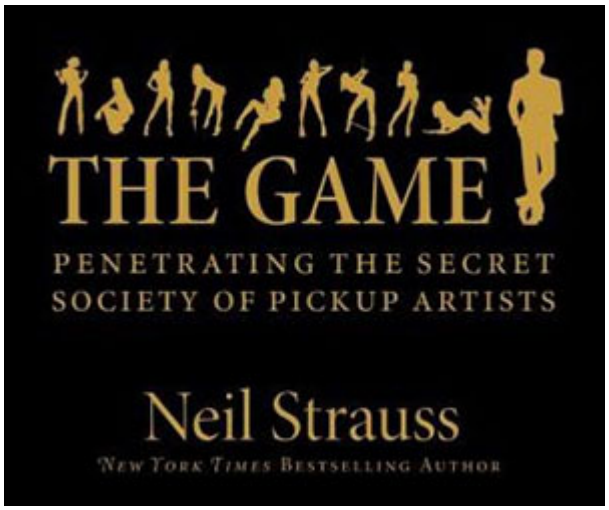
If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is Roosh's Game Tips Email Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. Put your first name and email address below and click the button.



Day Game Workshop Recap

December 28, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I have taught three day game workshops, including a dry run with Roissy. Let's start with his thoughts:

> Recently, I participated in a "dry run" day game workshop with Roosh to help him streamline operations. Since my day game is underdeveloped, I happily volunteered to be a guinea pig.
>
> We covered the major types of daytime approaches, including coffeeshop (my favorite), retail, book store, metro, grocery store, and the toughest, street game. Roosh was methodical and detail oriented in explaining how the approaches should go, so there was very little guesswork I had to do. I was pleased that his openers and followups were short, sweet and easy to deliver. A big problem with some pickup material is how cumbersome it sounds when you use it in real life. You want openers and comversational gambits that sound as cool and natural as possible, and only take a second or two to deliver.
>
> Roosh timed the interactions with a stopwatch, which had a surprisingly positive effect. As guys, we relish a challenge, and beating the clock (or, in this case, talking with the girl as long as possible) is a great motivator. Roosh broke a land speed record with a 1.47 second pickup attempt. As for the rest, I won't give away too much here, except to mention a couple things.
>
> Roosh emphasizes a "bait" concept which helps extend a conversation with a girl through the use of open-ended questions and hooks. I asked a girl for directions like a regular guy would do, and she answered, and then… the conversation died. When you bait a girl, you might ask where the metro goes, instead of directions to a specific location. Then you might drop a leading followup like "It's a shame. Public transportation isn't as convenient in this country."
>
> The other major concept discussed was day versus night game. If you think you can seamlessly bring your night game into the daytime, forget it. The two are separate animals. I ran my cocky night game on a girl walking down the > sidewalk, making fun of her oversized “homemade” ring, and it bombed. I was reprimanded for deviating from the day game script.

>
> On a final note, approaching a group of girls on the sidewalk is less likely to succeed than approaching one or two girls. It’s counterintuitive, because you’d think that a lone girl would be more suspicious of strange men coming up to her in a non-bar environment where approaches are expected, but in fact the opposite is true. The lone girls walking slowly were the most open to the pickup, while the big groups of girls quickly closed ranks and followed the alpha female’s lead like sheep.
>
> Day game is the new night game.

Roissy’s game was at an advanced level so we were able to breeze through the instructional portion of the workshop and dive straight into approaching with the openers and followups. Even though he was spitting completely fresh lines, his delivery was smooth and natural. His only problem, if you want to call it that, is being picky and not getting numbers when he could’ve. He still did very well and I’ll leave it up to him to share specific results.

After working out some logistical issues, I was ready for my four students, two on Saturday and two on Sunday. They came with very different abilities, and the challenge was teaching the basics to those who needed it while allowing the most experienced student to practice closing.

My advanced student had experience hitting on girls in bars. He was also very talkative, the hallmark trait of a successful pick up artist. I pushed him to approach a girl in coffee shop with an opener and follow-up related to what she was doing (typing on a laptop). Fourteen minutes later he got her number.

Two other students were in the beginner to intermediate range. For them I worked on their tonality, body language, and what I call “ramble,” the ability to keep talking while tossing out pieces of bait that allow the conversation to continue.

The last student was a young guy, only 22-years-old, with just about no pick up experience. It was like working with a clean canvas. I’ll never forget the look on his face after his first approach attempt on a very pretty girl in a coffee shop (2 minutes, 15 seconds), which for day game feels like quite a while. Afterwards he remarked how friendly she was. “Welcome to day game,” I said. I don’t think this young man will be spending a lot of time in bars anytime soon.

We didn’t talk to any ugly girls (range was 6-8, since 9’s don’t exist in DC), though I did make one student deliver the subway opener to an old man because we couldn’t find any girls around. I told them never to “practice” on ugly girls. From day one they will only go after girls they want to have sex with.

One flaw of the workshop is that it was hard to focus on what will be their day game bread and butter: coffee shops. Each student could only do one or two approaches there, even though it will be where they get most of their numbers. For example they did just as many approaches in the retail store as in the coffee shop even though they barely go shopping. I still think that that retail practice was useful because daygame approaches have the same framework and experience in one will no doubt help with other venues.

Here's a quick view of the workshop from a student…

> I thought the Daygame workshop was great. I don't think me or the other guy would have gotten nearly the kind of individual attention or the quality instruction from any other PUA company costing a ton more money.

And another…

> I've never done a workshop before, but I've read a couple books and websites. This was appealing because it wasn't going to break the bank, and neither will day game, really. Only two students was nice as well. I appreciate getting the day game packet, something to refer to and study. I don't have much else to say, because results will take more time afterwards. Personally it was helpful for me to declare to someone besides myself that this is something I need to work on. It got me in an approaching mood, and I hope I can build upon it. I think the workshop was planned well because it was during Christmas shopping season, but by chance there weren't as many people shopping/walking around as anticipated. What are you going to do… Roosh made the best of it.

And from the advanced student who got the number…

> I thought the day game workshop was a great workshop. I would divide the workshop into four sections: (1) A discussion of the philosophy of day game. (2) A walk-through of specific day game strategies and lines. (3) Day game practice. (4) Review of your performance.
>
> Here are my thoughts on the sections: #1 is a sound philosophy, and was explained well. #2 has clearly been honed over the years by Roosh. #3 was obviously the critical portion, and was great because Roosh provided on-the-fly guidance and motivation. #4 was helpful, especially because feedback was provided throughout. All in all, Roosh is a great teacher, and it's clear that his motivation with this workshop (just like with Bang) is to help others. There's no doubt that this workshop will help my (previously non-existent) day game to become a useful tool in my pick-up arsenal… and I already got a date out of it

I must say I don't think getting a date from the day of the workshop will be common since you'll be testing out all-new material, but it's nice he's already seeing results.

While I can't completely change a man's game in a few hours, I'm confident that if one of my students sees a girl they like in the coffee shop, street, grocery store, etc., they know what to say and how to say it, and how to get her number if the conversation goes well. They did enough approaches (average of 8 per guy) that they know it's not a big deal to talk to girls during the day.

My first four students got a good deal because the workshop is actually at least six hours, not four. (One went eight hours.) But keeping in mind the economy is in the shitter and I want guys walking away from this feeling like they got a great deal, I would like to do some more workshops in January for $165. The per hour cost of the workshop remains the same. For a run down of what the workshop is about, check here.

If you are interested then email roosh@rooshv.com with workshop in the subject and I'll put you on the waiting list, which I will start going through today. Also if you live in New York City and would consider taking the workshop then email me as well because I might come up in February for a short while.

I want to give a huge thanks for the four guys who trusted me and took a chance without knowing exactly what they were getting into. And also my guinea pig.

Happy New Year

December 30, 2008 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I have no insightful year-end thoughts. If I weren't lazy I would do some sort of "Best Of" list for amazing things I've written the past year, but I imagine that would take a lot of time. March will see the fourth year of this blog.

I'm taking off until Monday. Please use this time to reflect on your life.

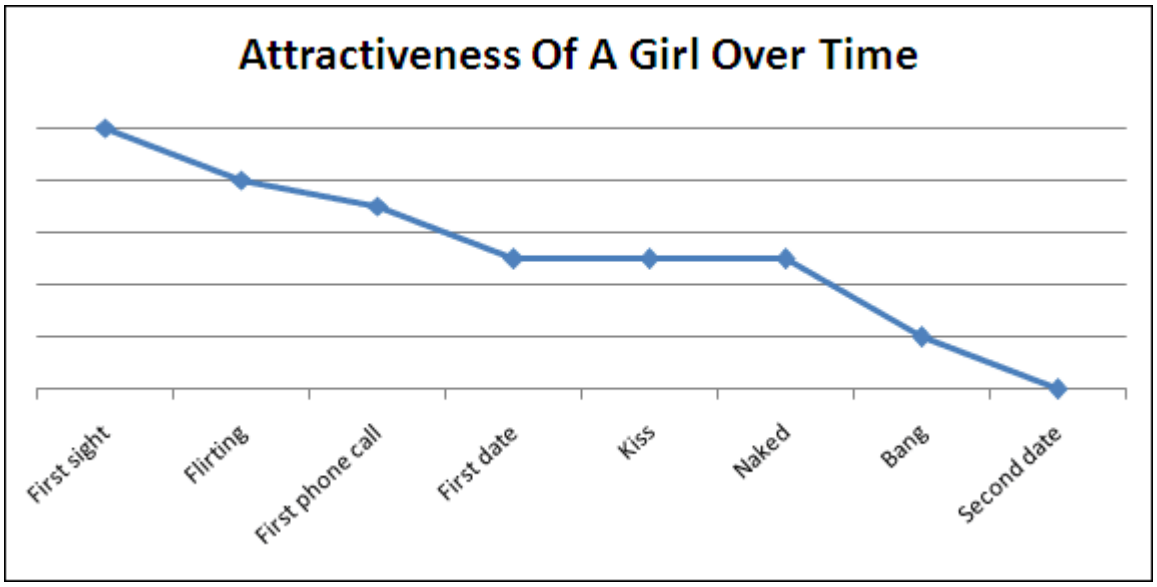
Why Is She Getting Uglier By The Minute?

January 4, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The beautiful lead female character makes an early appearance in the Brazilian movie The Man of the Year. When I first saw her, memories of my time in Brazil filled my head and blood rushed to my pelvic regions. I could feel my pulse in my crotchal area and would do anything at that moment to be in Brazil just to have a shot at girls like her.

As the movie continued and she hooked her claws into the main character, I felt my interest in her fade, until it finally turned to disgust when I saw her in a wedding dress. I moved on to the 16-year-old co-star who gently seduces the protagonist of the movie without the whining and nagging we see in the wife. The young girl is not inherently prettier, but because she has not yet banged anyone the attraction for her holds much longer.

How I felt towards the characters over 90 minutes was a snapshot to how I feel towards girls in real life. Here, I made a chart:

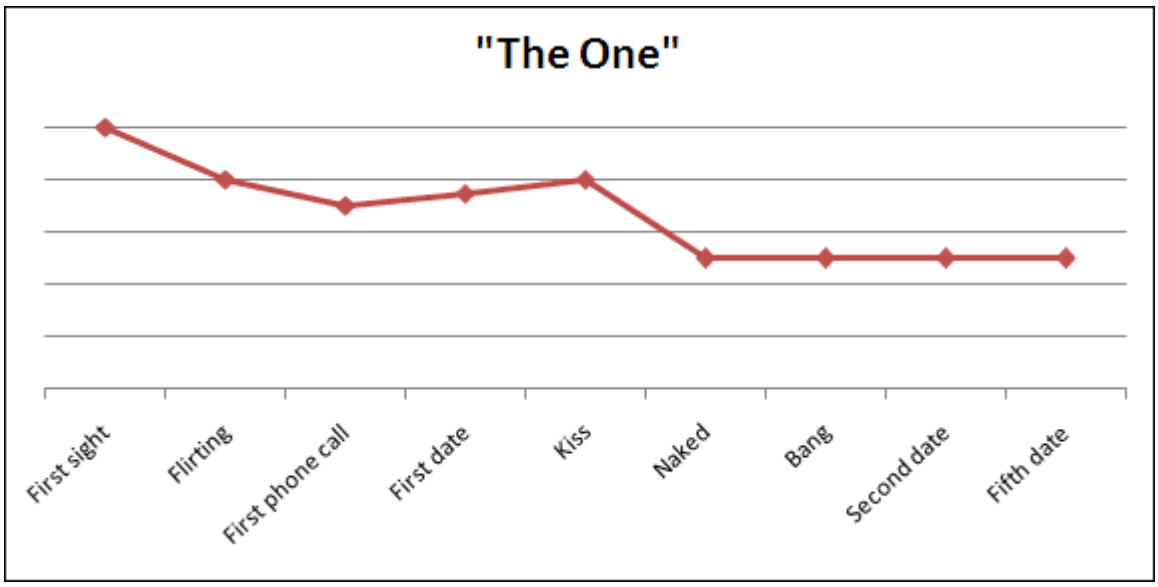


*Notice how the attraction for her is at absolute zero by the second date.

For physiological reasons I don't understand, a girl is never more attractive than first sight. Ever. But my dick always tricks my brain into finding a girl more attractive than she really is. This is obvious when I show up on first dates not exactly sure how the girl looks like, even though I was far from drunk when I met her. It takes two seconds of looking at her face to confirm that I did indeed spend an hour talking to this specimen three days prior.

Her attractiveness decreases rapidly through the predictable seduction until I bang her. By the second date, there is nothing left but the background desire of wanting to get off without having to use my sweaty paw.

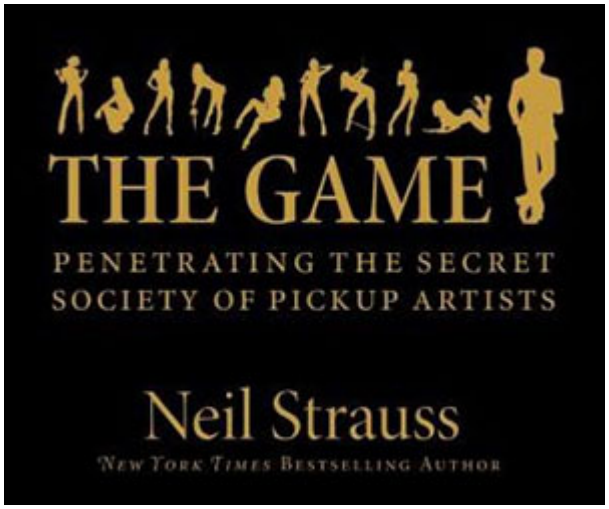
There are, of course, the exceptions…



*Technically this chart should be titled “The Ones.” Whatever.

50% attractiveness retainment by the fifth date is absolutely incredible if you think about it. You conquered and ravaged her body and you want to do it again? Wow.

A girl puts out various cues that is unconsciously processed by a man to create a running tally of her worth. This tally almost always adds to the value of zero, but it is only obvious after sex, when the dick has gotten what it wants and no longer puts in effort to confuse the brain it effortlessly controls.



I’m Ending Cockblocking As We Know It

January 5, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It took eleven days until I could put forth my contribution to ending cockblocking as we know it. In case you missed it, here are the words which I know will accomplish this goal:

> “Did you really just do that? I’m being friendly and respectful to your friend and you rudely interrupt. Did your parents teach you to be anti-social like that?”

My friend was basically castrated. I was doing something when I look over and he has this shell-shocked look on his face. He said, “I don’t believe how badly I just got cockblocked. Jesus Christ.” It’s like he saw a ghost.

“WHO? WHO DID IT?!” I yelled.

He glanced at a short blonde nearby. Next to her were two girls, including a brunette that I know from experience is probably the one he was going for.

I tapped the blonde on the shoulder and said, “Excuse me, my friend was being respectful and you rudely interrupted him.” She looked away from me, but I wasn’t done. “Did your mom and dad teach you to be anti-social like that?”

I gave a disgusted look and walked back to my friend. I kept an eye on her and the best way I can describe her facial expression was someone who felt like they were unjustly accused. If I could read her brain I would say she thought this: “What the fuck I always do that, why are you picking on me. I don’t understand.”

That’s what I expect. Girls are so used to cockblocking and never getting challenged on it that it doesn’t feel right when they are called out for being the psychopathic cunts that they really are.

A minute later and the cockblocker still looked extremely upset. I don’t think she cried but if I kept pushing that’s what would have happened. Making her cry though is not my goal, and notice how I didn’t use foul language or make fun of her appearance. She couldn’t write me off as a drunk asshole. I was 100% reasonable with my comments, which is why it bothered her.

I put my hand on my friend’s shoulder and said, “Bro, I ruined her night.” He thanked me and we laughed.

I wonder if any other guy out there has defended their honor against a cockblocker yet, but I don’t mind changing the world on my own if I have to. This coming weekend there is going to be one guy out there who doesn’t get cockblocked because of what I did. And I sincerely believe that.

Bitter Women

January 7, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On my site meter I can see how people visit my blog. Often times it's from Facebook but I can't always read what comments were written about it. One recent time I could. Here's how my blog was introduced:

> are you ready for this??? He's a legend in his own mind. His hairy hairy mind.

Typical Roosh hater right? But then I look at the name. It's a girl that I know. I don't use my blog to settle scores (anymore), but since her friends are swinging by here I thought they'd want to hear another side of the story. This is a public service for them.

Cracks knuckles

At the last happy hour a drunk girl comes up to me and says she loves my blog. She bought Bang, is writing about it for some academic paper, and is generally "fascinated" with me. She says that we met before a year ago at Dragonfly before it closed but I didn't remember. I have a witness to her affections: Lemmonex was looking and laughing at her because she was so drunk and obvious.

She says she's not leaving without me. Notch it up! Or not.

I'm all about sex, of course, but she is drunk to the point of swaying and I was on my first drink. If I took that girl home it would have been rape, and I consider myself above rape. It was just a matter of time until she puked. I got her number knowing full well it's likely I'll never see her again.

A few minutes later she gets kicked out of the bar because she started smoking inside. The bouncer came up to me explaining why he's kicking her out ("I couldn't let it go… smoking has been banned for a year now"), but I tell him that she is not my girl and I don't care what he does to her.

Ten minutes later I peek in front of the bar and there she is, waiting for me in the freezing cold. I go outside and tell her to go home but she says not leaving without me. I say no, but allow her to make out with me for five seconds. Then I go back to hosting the happy hour. I can only imagine how many guys tried to pick her off while she stumbled her ass home.

A couple days later we chat on the phone for a bit and agree to hang out. I put in the effort, if you want to call it that, because she was born in Saudi Arabia and I wouldn't mind getting such a difficult flag out of the way. On the day of the date I call to confirm a time but she doesn't return my call. So the drunk girl ended up flaking on me. I manage to find the strength to get over her.

I did want that Saudi flag but I wouldn't have changed what I did on the night we met. If you saw her wrecked state then you would understand.

Fast forward two months. I'm at a bar with friends. One friend ends up talking to this girl for quite a while and later tells me that I know her. I look at her closely and it's the blog groupie chick. I tell my friend the story, we have a laugh, and then I go on with my night talking to other girls. I don't say hi or make eye contact with her, even though she was never more than a few feet away from me.

I'm talking to a girl with an ugly beret hat when the blog groupie chick, trashed like before, comes up and plays the same game. Her crotch is rubbing against the side of my thigh while I'm seated on a stool and she's literally pawing at me. She goes on about Bang but is slurring her words, and it's at that moment I understood what type of girl she was: while drunk you can do whatever you want with her, including ass to mouth, but while sober she is a worthless flake and a colossal headache. Again, it would be nice to have that Saudi flag, but I pass. May Allah (ﷻ) be with the next guy who tries to ride that.

I tell her nicely to go back to her friends, but she doesn't want to leave. I ignore her to talk to the beret chick, whose hat I took off because I wanted to see how she really looked. She was pretty and I decided to stick with that, but the groupie is still rubbing up her bits on me.

"Did you two used to date?" the beret chick asked. She was becoming extremely curious.

"Nope," I said, and continued talking to her like there wasn't this drunk girl oddly placed in our conversation.

The groupie was proofing me so hard that I could have replaced my game with reading out of a television manual. Other girls in the bar were blatantly staring.

Eventually it got old and I had enough. "Can you just GO AWAY! I don't want to talk to you." Sometimes with these girls you have to be firm. Finally the groupie chick gets the hint and leaves. By the end of the night she can barely stand and her friends have to hold her hand to walk through the bar. I felt sorry for her.

The next day she goes on Facebook and says I'm hairy and a legend in my own mind. I think the only mind who I'm a legend in is hers. If she ever sends me an update about how her academic paper about me is coming along I'll let you guys know.

New Photo Album

January 8, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've been happily using Flickr for a while until they tried to extort money out of me. When I uploaded my 201th photo a message popped up saying that if I don't pay them $25/year then any photos after the newest 200 will be invisible to everyone, including me. That information would have been useful to me 200 photos ago, assholes.

I finally got around to setting up photos on my domain. Here's the link, which you can find in the top navigation bar:

http://www.rooshv.com/photos

There's quite a few that I haven't shown before, such as this sexy photo in the Argentina album. Look at those plump lips…

[image]

Beta Male Of The Decade Award

January 11, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I know we have a whole year left but I got an interesting email from a guy who has been reading me for ages, before blogs were known as blogs. He informs me that Shlonglor, one of the internet's first celebrity gamer geeks, knocked up a girl who is now destroying his life. In addition to his child, he's raising her 6-year-old from a previous relationship, calling the kid his own.

Let's take a closer look.

> So I give her $400 for groceries, next day she wants money. She was supposed to take some of the money up to her moms and use it for groceries this month so her mom wouldn't have to pay for everything. She spent $100 in one day here. She just took another $100 and she wants another $50. I bought airline tickets for $800, GPS/Camera (like $500). It never ends.
>
> See I'm buying a house and It's like $3,100 a month vs. $2,000 a month for my current rent. When I met her I was at $1,200 a month. She doesn't have a job so it's up to me. :(
>
> I'm going to have to pay like $800 to move, get a washer, dryer, fridge. I have to pay like $800 to get out of the apartment. I have $77/month college loan payment coming up, I have $3k on my credit card because of all these bullshit purchases, and I owe $1k on car insurance. She's getting us another loan to help stay alive that I have to pay back within a year.
>
> It's a horrible time for me to buy a house… I should say no but this is the only time I can probably get a decent place where I got it. She keeps saying that if you wait, you might never see interest rates like this. She might be right. We'll see.

She made him buy a house during the biggest housing bust since the Great Depression. Ouch.

> I got rid of cable, netflix, gametap. That's like $150.

She made him give up everything that kept his meek existence the least bit enjoyable.

> I will eventually in a year get like 10k back in taxes for the house but that's a long time to survive until then. I'm thinking of borrowing some money from my 401k despite it being down $40k.

What a shitty way to live.

He confesses in the comments that he complains about his girlfriend online so that she'll see it and hopefully get the hint. Fucking epitome of beta. A man who doesn't stand up for himself and instead cries on a blog with sad emoticons deserves nothing but total ruin. Get a spine man! Stop giving that bitch money! The only question is if she will be able to find a bigger beta to raise his kid once he’s reduced to living in his Honda.

If you’re wondering why a man would put up with this sort of thing, it’s the same reason why women stay with men who slap them across the face from time to time. Low self-esteem, low confidence. They think they can’t do better and that they’re lucky with whatever they got.

I believe he has reached the point of no return where no amount of advice or game will change the outcome. Helping him would be like trying to put toothpaste back in the tube.

Turf Wars

January 12, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Turf is power when it comes to approaching girls in bars. You want your first interaction with her to be in your house, not hers, because if she suspects she has the least bit of upper hand she will take advantage of that to feed her low self-esteem.

(Disclaimer: If you're new to the game then you should be approaching girls in every type of situation imaginable to get that experience, but when it comes to refinement you can choose approaches carefully to get the most amounts of sex with the least amount of work.)

Before I approach a girl, I ask myself who has to move or turn away if the approach doesn't go well. If the answer is me then most of the time I don't do the approach. I wait until positions change and she is the one who has to walk away if the conversation doesn't catch. If the girl knows she is the one who can stay put, like in situations where she is leaning against a wall or sitting down on a stool while I'm standing, she will be a bigger bitch than if it was her who had to do the walk. She, or more commonly her beastly friend, will abuse that positional power to make me feel weak. It's human nature to take advantage of perceived strength, and female bar-goers are no exception.

What I do is stake out a spot and stick there. Like a commercial fisherman I wait for girls to come into my net. If a girl is sitting with her large group of ugly friends, I take note and wait until she has to go to the bar or use the bathroom, then pull her into my circle and spit game until things go well or she has to walk away. This is the same strategy I use in a coffee shop, where I wait for a girl at a faraway table to cross my path instead of awkwardly walking up to her. If it doesn't go well I don't have to do anything.

The way I see it is why should I have to do the walk of shame in the likely chance there is no connection? I'm already taking 100% of the risk by doing the approach, the least she can do is fuck off if she's not feeling me.

Almost a month ago I started talking to a girl who stood a few feet away from me. I had to take only one-and-a-half steps to get within conversation range. I put the obligatory face time with the fat friend, who told me her mom was from Chile. Without thinking I said, "Yeah I've been to Chile. Man the people there are so fat." I forgot that she was fat, but I was respectful and tried to recover by quickly changing the subject.

Surprisingly she gets upset anyway and says, "It was nice talking to you," which is code for "Go away."

I said, "I'm going to stand right here. What, I'm going to walk away because you told me too?" Sure, I was probably in the wrong due to my inconsiderate observation, but that doesn't mean I have to obey her command. (Here's a thought for your noodle: if a man takes orders from a woman, is he still a man?)

She looks at me, realizes I'm not moving, and then storms off. Her friend stays and apologizes for her fat friend's behavior. Then I walked away, because I wasn't really interested in her anyway.

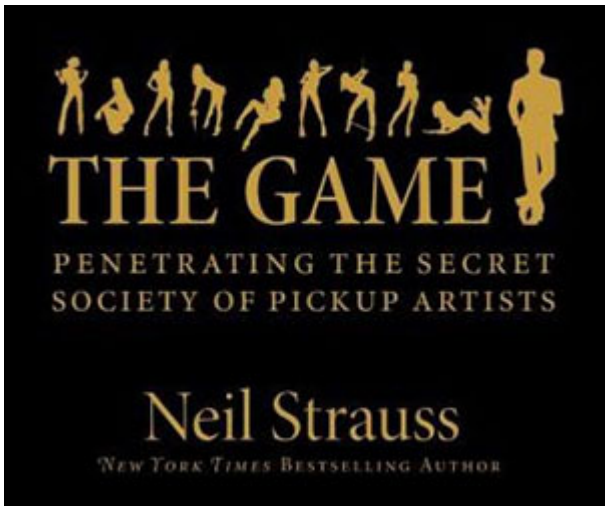
You're probably thinking if having to do the walk of shame really matters or not. Isn't it just pride? No, because whoever has to do the walk of shame has less hand. That fat girl who I wasn't even hitting on me tried to use her position to make me feel small, and in this case it backfired. If she was sitting down far from the crowd then I would definitely have to do the walk, and she would have gotten satisfaction from that and repeated it on guys such as yourself.

With turf in mind, even if I fuck up an approach pretty bad there are no repercussions. She walks away and it's over. I can have a laugh and continue as I was with my buddies. That's how it should be: the man shouldn't have to move his body because a girl didn't like him. Now of course I have walked up to girls and gotten numbers and gotten bangs, and that can work very well, but I prefer to have an edge before I open my mouth.

My entire game is becoming increasingly structured around the fact that a girl almost never has the upper hand when she's talking to me.



This Country Is Fucked

January 13, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've been working at the same bar for about four months now. One of my shifts is lunch and during that time I get the occasional person who comes in to fill out a job application. My record for most applications I gave out in a day was five.

Well I go in on Monday night and there is a stack of paper by the bar. Turns out the day bartender collected over 15 job applications for server and bartender positions during her shift, and gave out half-a-dozen more. She said she felt like an HR person, answering questions and giving out pens. At one point six people were simultaneously filling out applications at the bar. Quite a few papers were actual resumes, with years of professional experience but no restaurant experience. Many graduated from very expensive private colleges (Duke, UVA).

And this is Washington DC we're taking about, a city with supposedly the strongest job market in the country. It seemed like a giant factory closed down on Friday.

Pick-Up Expert

January 15, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I was recently quoted as the pick-up expert in The Great Inaugural After-Party (City Paper). My quote comes at the end. They asked me if I think the extended nightlife hours will help guys with their game.

Speaking of pick up, I caught VK's recent post describing his idea for a Plan B Commerical:

> If I made this commercial I would have kept it real and to the typical situation Plan B is called for. The woman wakes up in the morning and her bra and panties are still spinning from the ceiling fan. Her hair looks like a birds nest, her eyes are blood shot red because she left in her contacts, and her make up is ruined. She's clearly hung over as fuck. She's slightly startled when she realizes she's not alone. She looks over and THIS guy is in the bed with her…….

It was followed by a picture of me sleeping. A reference to Gizmo-like babies came shortly after.

His next post was No One Cares About Your Boyfriend.

> …have you ever noticed that the fatter, uglier, older more frumpy a woman is the quicker she is to announce to the world that she's in a relationship as soon as she's in a relationship. You can tell that she's not used to getting attention (or dick) and it's been forever since her last relationship.

So true.

The Stupidest Thing A Girl Has Ever Done To Me

January 20, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm almost reluctant to write this post because I've done a lot of stupid things in my life when talking to the opposite sex and it'd be hypocritical to make fun of others for doing the same. But then again as clueless as I used to be with women, I never did anything this dumb.

I was talking to a girl who had issues communicating. She was taking the the hot/cold, push/pull concept to a laughable extreme. One minute she'd say "Stop being so stupid" and then follow it up with "I think you're cute" and light petting. It was jarring, like listening to an old CD that keeps skipping. Going hot/cold is only effective when used with elegance and charm. If it's not subtle then it comes off as unnatural. When she was complimenting me it seemed almost forced, like she was just doing it so she could again be a bitch, her real natural state.

I got impatient with her attitude but gave her a chance to stop blowing it with me. I said, "Okay now I'm going to teach you the right way to act around a man." Then she did it.

She gave a big lick to her left palm followed by her right palm. Then she placed both hands on the top of my head, and rubbed down to the top of my face. She might as well have spat on my face.

I'm confident that at the time she did it she thought, "Okay now I'm going to be a bitch but it's going to be fun and he's going to think I'm this challenge! Hehe I'm so fun!!" Instead I told her to grow up and she stormed off. It's easy to make fun of pathetic beta males, but how about girls who simply don't know how to act around a man that they like?

If you are approaching 30-years-old like this girl and still haven't gotten a basic game worked out to attract men besides looks, then you are pretty much doomed to multiple cat ownership. I pitied her because she was unable to express herself in a fun, interesting way that didn't come across as mean-spirited or weird. I would have been more interested if she didn't speak at all and we just looked into each other's eyes in complete silence. In essence, she had anti-game.

Brazilian Girls In The United States

January 21, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I chatted up a Brazilian girl at a coffee shop recently. She was a solid 6 I'd say, but unfortunately her English was flawless. Not only did she have a firm grasp of English idioms but her accent was minimal. She was just as much Brazilian as American, and with her mediocre appearance it wasn't at all worth pursuing. She was going for a graduate degree in something like finance.

I have some bad news for guys trying to get their first Brazilian notch in the United States: Brazilian girls who live here are second-rate. They are more educated, more ambitious, less attractive, and less sensual. I'm starting to think that Brazilian girls who come to the U.S. do so because they can't physically compete in Brazil. They come to D.C. for school instead of being a model or actress because working in an office building is all they got left in life.

I've dated a couple Brazilian girls here and while they were nice, I would have gotten something five times better if I went directly to the source, with five times less effort. It's scary how consistently mediocre the Brazilian girls here really are, and anyone who has met the rare hot Brazilian girl already knows how much attention she gets from horny Americans gringos.

I'm telling you this because I don't want you to generalize Brazilian girls from the ugly ones you meet here. You must go to Brazil to see how it's really like. Boa sorte.

THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

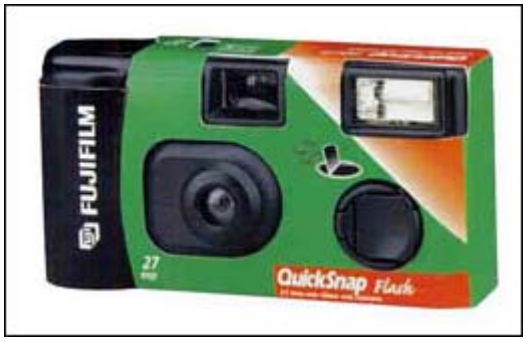
Huge Camera Fatigue

January 22, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Is the guy with the huge SLR camera now a cliche? Five years ago I'd see him in the wild and think, "Oh cool, a real photographer. I wonder how many of his pictures have been published in National Geographic." Now I think, "Look, another wannabe photographer."

They used to get automatic respect. Now they get none. That's what happens little niches become mainstream.

A true photographer is happy to use this…



While the amateur "needs" this…

The Fast Kiss II

January 25, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's very important to get the kiss out of the way as quickly as possible because it's rare you will bang a girl the same night you first kiss her. For example, let's say you first kiss a girl at the end of date one. Then it will be hard to also bang on that date. You may bang on date two or three. But if you kiss her when you first met, there is a much higher chance you will bang on date one. Get it?

I'm extremely reluctant to get a number from a girl who I don't at least come pretty close to kissing since I'd have to invest a minimum of two whole dates to get the bang. Honestly, what percentage of girls out there are actually bearable to hang out with for several hours of time that two dates entail? 2%? 4% tops? Don't be bamboozled into spending time with a worthless chick, which is safe to say every chick you will talk to this year except one, two if you're lucky.

This is why I go for the kiss even if I don't think I will get it. So the girl senses I'm about to make a move because I'm getting closer to her face and then gently pulls back—big deal. But now she knows what I'm about and if she goes out with me (and she will if she sticks around), it's as if she has signed a legal document accepting all the moves I may choose to do, including any attempt to weasel my way back into her place. I guarantee you she will show up on the first date with a clean, shaved vagina because of the aggression I displayed when we first met.

Speed is of the essence. On a long enough timeline enough variables will be introduced into her life that prevents you from pumping her. But once you already bang, who cares? You got want you wanted, and can begin the cycle of meaningless birth and death anew with another hole. Giddy up.

Previously: The Fast Kiss I.

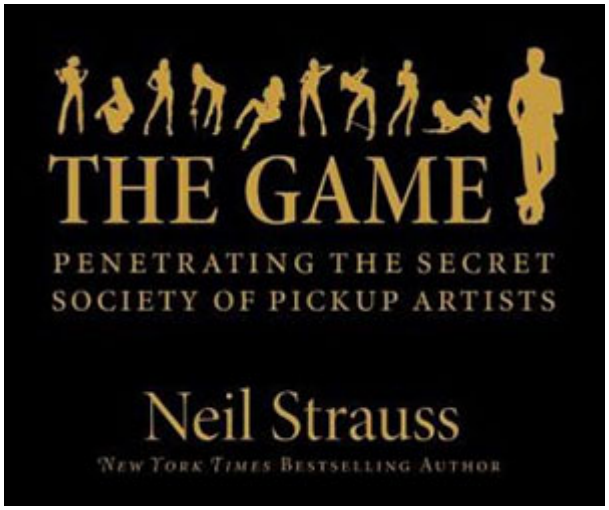
Picking Up Hipster Chicks?

January 26, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

One of my recent day game students was a hipster. I poked fun at the subculture a bit and he told me I should seriously consider hitting hipster spots. He said, “At Black Cat, 60% of people there are girls, and half the guys there are gay.” He added that they are also cuter than average because they are notoriously superficial and overly concerned with looks. The case he laid out was pretty solid.

I wonder what the average level of game is among hipster guys. I’m guessing the farther out you go from mainstream venues, the poorer game you’ll find. Guys at regular bars spend their spare time at the gym and hitting on drunk girls. Guys at Black Cat spend their time dressing themselves and finding new bands. He did know a lot about fashion and music so I’m guessing those are the angles you need to play when going into the hipster circles.

As for the student, he shattered both workshop records: longest approach (15:30) and most numbers (2). One was at the grocery store, and he didn’t even buy anything. I was extremely proud. But then within two weeks three other student tied him with two numbers each and another broke the time record (23:00). Three phone numbers remains stubbornly elusive, but it’s just a matter of time.



Return To Austerity

January 28, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I quit my bartending job. I lasted 4 months. This is after 17 months of not working. Towards the end I started buying clothes, taking taxis, eating out, and going out on dates to expensive lounges. I was trading my labor for things that were unnecessary and less important than my leisure time.

While I will stick to my Johnnie Walker Black habit (thanks Dad), everything else must go and I will stop getting phone numbers of girls who I know won't put out on the first date. I will endure bike rides in the cold. I will go back to counting every dollar that leaves my pocket. The world has righted itself, and I look forward to focusing more on important things like writing, reading books, watching mediocre foreign films, and squatting for six hours a time at my regular coffee shop.

I do not believe in the Western idea of continuous work. I work only has much as I need to, and not a day more. This will fuck me over pretty bad at some point in my life, I'm sure, but not today.

I Found Something Better Than The Female Wingman

January 29, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have accidentally discovered the logical progression to a female wingman. Remember the Saudi groupie chick who was pawing at me in a bar? It got the attention from a few girls, including one who kept bringing it up on our first date. “I have never seen anything like it,” she said.

Instead of a female friend, what you want is a female sponge who smothers you in public. Go to Craigslist and pay a cute woman to throw herself at you in a crowded bar. You only need her services for one hour (estimated cost: $20-40, lower is she’s unemployed). Act indifferent during her affections and let the numbers roll in after she leaves. It’s best if she’s not too hot, or else it won’t be believable, especially if you have no game and are a loser. I’m a special case so it’d be best for me to enlist the services of the hottest chick possible, since the sight of a dime piece throwing herself on me is very natural.

To save some money I have forwarded my entire nightlife itinerary to the Saudi chick.

Garden Variety Haters

February 1, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A blogger I've never heard of before, "Miss A," recently blasted me on her blog in All Is Fair In Love And War. Here's what she said:

> [Roosh] has no moral compass, and no conscience to speak of. Women are "holes". Sex with women is a notch, and if you happen to be international, you're a "flag". If you read his blog you will know what the lowest of the low are thinking, and then you'll be prepared for the worst and hopefully not fall victim to any of their tricks. The main thing you'll see is that most women are "worthless" not being worthy of taking out on real dates because they aren't hot and they are too annoying. Who does this guy think he is? Does he think he's hot? It's unbelievable. Bottomline, if a guy doesn't put forth the effort you deserve he's most likely not interested in you –he's after easy sex. Dating isn't easy, so prepare yourselves! Remember, all is fair in love and war!

Honestly, that made me smile. I'm not going to attack her because she added me on Facebook and Twitter (I think she has a guilt-ridden crush on me and this is her odd way of flirting), but I will state she is 37-years-old. On her blog she claims to be a "relationship expert" but she is single and childless. That's like me claiming to be a player but happily married with three kids from one mother. I wouldn't take her on a date but I'd probably hit same night since she was born in the Netherlands and I haven't had sex with a girl from that country yet.

I can't say I would hit this next hater: Suburban Sweethart. She wrote this:

> Unfortunately, a Google search for "dating in DC," done solely for the purposes of this blog post & not because I've turned to Google to play matchmaker for me, turns up such awesome single specimens as [Roosh], formerly the owner of a blog called "DC Bachelor," who Obamicon'd himself with the phrase "Pickup Expert." Yeah, sometimes I'm glad to be flyin' solo.

Voluntarily, I'm sure.

> Yeesh. Maybe I should get a couple of cats or something.

Bingo, your mind is on the right track. Better yet, go back to Ohio and take the rest of your pale, homely, and socially awkward statewomen with you. If you were raised on a farm or are from the the following states please don't interact with me in person, or even make eye contact: Ohio, Idaho, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Indiana, and Illinois (except Chicago). One large reason why DC is filled with ugly girls is because we have this constant influx from the ugliest, most genetically inferior states.

She did write a flattering comment about me on another blog though:

> Someone sent me an email when I first posted that blog entry, warning me that if

> I wrote about Roosh, I would garner unwanted attention. I think (s)he meant well & was trying to look out for me, but it weirded me out because how powerful/mean IS this Roosh dude? Bad enough that he's deluded & disgusting… better off single, eh, babe? ;)

Powerful…

I'm still waiting for some originality when it comes to Roosh hate. It seems like haters are going to my hater page and copying and pasting it around the internet. These two spinsters above performed Roosh hate style #2.

The Most Thrilling Workshop Ever

February 2, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It was the Sunday before Obama's inauguration. The weather was cold but nothing like the weekend before when my students and I had to endure temperatures in the low teens. I arrived at the meeting point, a special Starbucks that was inadvertently made for day game, not knowing anything about my two students besides their names.

They finally arrived and it became clear to me that they had game. I only need to hear a man speak for 30 seconds before I can put together a pretty accurate assessment of his ability. Generally the chattier he is—without making inappropriate jokes—the better he'll do. If there is one skill that is more important than any other when it comes to picking up women, it's being able to talk in long prose without continuous feedback.

The first student was Indian but he looked more Middle Eastern. He was thin with a shaggy haircut, a little shorter than my own. He wore a retro plaid shirt and a classic black overcoat with a pin on the left lapel. I'll call him Shaggy. The other student was a white man with a closely cropped haircut. He wore basic blue jeans and a blue crew sweater with a white undershirt. Army, who I'm calling him, would fit quite well in places where white people gather. Both took care of their appearance and seemed to be in good shape.

They told me they were hesitant about signing up for the workshop because they already get laid, but wanted to master day game. They mentioned the reasonable price. In my head I felt like my decision to charge lower than I can was validated since I'm able to teach guys who are not mere beginners. For some guys my workshop is Game 101, but others it's 330, a third year course.

Army struck first. On the way to deposit a paper cup in the trash can, he casually approached a young, innocent-looking girl who sat alone at a table reading the bible. She responded very enthusiastically to the opening material and a few minutes later he got her number. No girl is immune to game, a fact that I already knew.

Army: 1
Shaggy: 0

While Shaggy was conversing with a blonde girl nearby working on her laptop, two random girls came up to the table and asked if we're doing some "male-female psychology" program. I did catch them earlier trying to listen into the lecture material. I wasn't forthcoming about what we were doing and only gave them vague statements about "relationship dynamics." Then loudly one of the them said, "BECAUSE HE [Shaggy] IS RIGHT THERE TALKING TO THAT GIRL." My eyes opened wide, appalled at the lengths girls go to cockblock. I turned my face while simultaneously waving the girls away, not wanting to encourage them to speak any further in case they might do some real damage. Since they were standing and I was sitting, they had no choice but to obey and leave, slightly stunned at my rudeness.

Shaggy hesitated to close on the laptop girl. The problem with day game is you are never 100% sure you're getting the number, unlike night game where if you're talking to a girl for a certain amount of time (>20 minutes), the number is pretty much guaranteed unless you're an idiot with no game. He redeemed himself in Urban Outfitters. A tall blonde girl with hipster glasses was browsing through some sweaters on sale near the stairs when he approached her using material. It took about 8 minutes for the number to be exchanged. Shaggy was the first student to get a number in a clothing store (during the workshop).

Army: 1
Shaggy: 1

Both men were charged up. On the street Army approached a cute, young girl who looked mightily similar to the one in the coffee shop. Shaggy and I watched her show major interest ("Where do you live?") and used telepathy to tell Army to go for the number. He starts to close the deal when two things happen. First, her Dad calls her on the phone. Army stood there calmly but I imagine it was awkward for him, but as long as the girl stayed put there would be no reason for him to move away. Second, she said she was on her way to church. This caused Army to freeze. He stalled and she didn't wait, in a hurry to meet up with her father in a nearby place of worship. Army told us he suspected that she was a member of the same congregation as the girl from the coffee shop.

In the next clothing store, Shaggy chats up a gorgeous girl by the cosmetic jewelry section. There was no conceivable reason for him to be around beaded necklaces, hoop earrings, and sparkly head bands, but the opening material is natural enough that is lowers a girls' guard who would otherwise be suspicious about why a man is a full level away from the men's section. It was here that I noticed a flaw in his close technique: he tried to integrate himself into her future plans instead of just asking for the number outright. I take note of this in my notebook for later debriefing.

Only twenty feet away in the young intimates section, and almost within earshot of Shaggy, Army delivered. He approached two friends and talked for ten minutes, ending the interaction with both of their numbers. Even though he got two numbers, I'm only counting it as one since he can't go for both girls. Like I mentioned to them in lecture, it's very difficult to go for one girl in a pair. One student did it in the following week in the Barnes & Noble, but only because one of the girls was leaving town in a day. The out-of-towner faded into the background voluntarily.

Army: 2
Shaggy: 1

Though we're barely halfway through the workshop, I said, "It will come down to the grocery store." The grocery store is the last venue.

I hyped up the competition so they are motivated to close and set a new record: 3 numbers. While getting laid serves as plenty good motivation, it doesn't have that instant gratification as beating your fellow man. Both approached girls with no encouragement from me, but neither are able to convert on subsequent street or bookstore approaches.

We got on the subway.

The trains were uncomfortably packed, an ideal environment for subway game. Army came within striking distance of a girl on her way to an inaugural ball. She had on a conservative black dress and three-inch heels that squeezed her toes inward towards the middle. It seemed like her toes were tripping on top of each other. Army did admirably, talking to her for four minutes and blowing through awkward points in the conversation to get some semblance of rhythm going. Maybe if she wasn't getting off so soon there would have been a number, but… nothing.

In the middle of the car Shaggy talked at length to a fun, smiley girl. As luck would have it, she had to make the exact same transfer we did. Waiting on the next platform, he bailed on her without getting the number. Infuriated, I told him to go back and get the digits because she is obviously interested. He did.

Army: 2
Shaggy: 2

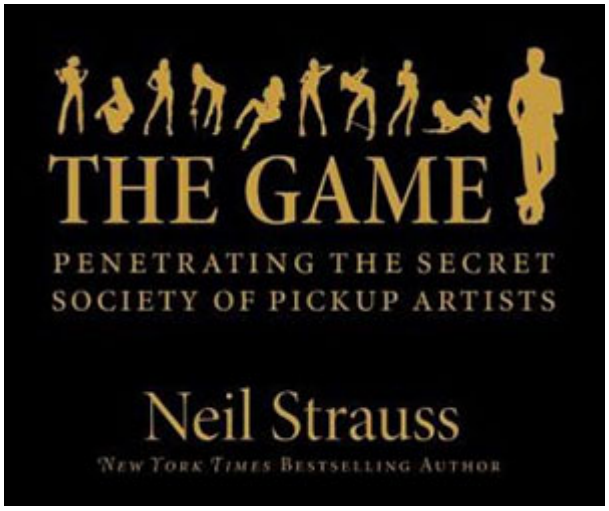
Like I predicted, it came down to the grocery store. I told them they both have tied one of my previous students who got two numbers on a workshop, and that if they want a more permanent place in the record books they must get 3 numbers. I added how it will be near impossible for anyone to get 4 numbers. They're pumped and ready, like bulls ready to be released onto the ring. They grabbed shopping baskets and I released them off into the wilderness that is the Whole Foods produce section.

The grocery store is the final exam. I let guys roam there on their own without me by their side. If they can't approach a girl completely alone by the end of the workshop, then I've failed them.

Now remember that it's a Sunday night, the slowest night of the week for grocery shopping according to the supermarket lobby (Food Marketing Institute). For this reason both Army and Shaggy were roaming the aisles, back and forth, waiting for prey. They stalked the same girl in the yellow shirt, waiting for a perfect moment that will never come. Eventually Army walked up to Shaggy and asked, "Did you approach her yet?" Shaggy said no, and Army replied, "Alright then I will." He casually strolls to the girl in the yellow shirt and spits his game, but she wasn't biting. Shaggy made an attempt of his own but there was nothing there as well. If it was a Saturday night I think the end result would have been different.

Army: 2
Shaggy: 2

The workshop soon came to an end. If God existed, I'm sure he would be proud of what I'm doing.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

The Tipping Habits Of Washingtonians

February 4, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Young people in large groups that come exclusively for happy hours tip poorly. At tables they drop out one at a time and always underestimate the cost and number of their drinks. They also forget about tax, which at 10% eats half a 20% tip. With them I automatically add gratuity. The last guy standing is usually screwed but that's life.

I don't automatically add gratuity to large groups of old people. They tip very well.

Gay people tip the best.

People give higher tips when paying by credit card than cash. I suppose because in the latter case they see their money physically leaving them.

No matter how expensive a drink is, most people will not tip more than a dollar a drink at the bar. But if you're serving them at a table, they will give you a tip at around 20%, even though it took no additional work than walking a few extra steps.

People don't understand that when a bartender gives them something for free they're supposed to give more than a dollar extra. The bartender is not stealing from the bar (because that's what it is) to save you save money. If a bartender gives you two $7 drinks for free, the tip on those drinks alone should be at least $10. You can't go wrong if the tip on a free drink is the cost of that drink. That ensures you'll be treated extremely well on all your visits. For this reason I very rarely hook up people I don't know, even if it's a group of girls that are flirting with me.

If the manager tells me to give a regular customer something like a free appetizer or drink, I don't say it's "on the house." Instead I say it's "on me." That ensures it's a higher tip because it makes it seem like I went out of my way, not that it was a business decision by a manger or cook.

The tip is always dismal when one person pays by cash and one by credit card. The guy paying cash puts his share along with the tip in the billfold on top of the credit card. They give it to me and say, "Put it on cash first, then the rest on the card." The guy with the credit card then adds a tip only for his portion, not remembering (or caring) that he just used the tip his friend gave me to pay a few dollars less. This problem would be solved if the guy paying cash would hold that tip until after I run his friend's card.

The percentage tip I get is strongly correlated to the amount of times I make the patron smile or laugh. I used routines on bar patrons, not unlike what I would use on girls in the club.

It's hard for people to give more than 20% tips no matter how amazing the service is. After a certain percentage it feels like throwing money away, because it is.

Why Fat People Don’t Mind Being Fat

February 5, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It took me a while to figure this one out.

Around my skinny, health-conscious friends, the topic has come up on how fat people can stand to be fat. “It’s not that hard to lose weight,” one would say. “I wouldn’t allow myself to get big,” another would add.

What we didn’t understand is that most fatties fatten up in adolescence. In high school and college, during the toughest stage of their life to be fat because of taunts, snickers, and a lack of sex during perhaps the horniest stage in their life (and don’t give me that feminist bullshit that a woman’s libido peaks in her 30’s), they are still unable to lose the weight. Then they become adults where being fat is far easier. There are fewer taunts, less people openly judging them, and they now have better access to millions of hours of hot porn. Whatever motivation to lose weight is diminished since in our politically correct society no one is going to get on them for being overweight, not even family members.

In conclusion, it is nearly painless to be fat as a adult in the United States.

Pins On A Map

February 8, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Whenever I get into a conversation about travel I mention how I have a map of the world on my wall that I like to stand in front of and stare at. A few times people have asked if I put pins on all the places I've been to. I have not.

The reason is because I can no longer decide what is pin-worthy or not. Is it stepping foot in the city boundaries? Staying overnight? Or maybe I have to live there to add a pin.

Calculating notches is easy because it's objective. If a guy crosses the plane of the vagina with his manhood, he has a notch. Case closed. He can add as many pins to that as he wants because he has both physically and mentally affected another animal through this guided and purposeful action, for all eternity.

But doing it with cities or countries isn't the same. It proves nothing except that your body existed in a certain geographical coordinate for a particular amount of time. It would be the same as chopping up the current city you live in into 1,000 square boxes and seeing how many boxes you can step into. Can a man who stepped into 800 boxes make a claim about knowing the city more than the man who stepped into 799? If not then what's the point of keeping count of such things as countries or cities visited?

Plus we're not accounting for the location of the Earth around the sun. When you step in a country it will be in a different spot in the universe than when I stepped in it. There's an infinite amount of ways to measure how we fill space. Therefore you cannot use mere presence at some point in space-time as a judge of experience or knowledge, something that people who have been to a lot of countries tend to do. I remember the time a guy wanted to play a game called "Let's name all the countries we've visited." Not surprisingly he had been to the most.

But vagina… that's different.

Black Jumper

February 9, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I need some help. In December 2007 my jumper (I think that's what it's called) was stolen from a hostel in El Calafate, Argentina. Here is the last known photo of me wearing it:

Let's take a closer look at the jumper:

Notice the quality, starting with the heavy-duty zipper. The bold racing stripes add a nice touch. And it's hard to tell from the photo but there are two zippered pockets on the side. The random chest graphic tastefully avoids advertising the brand (Buffalo). Finally, there is no hood, which I like.

I've looked for months to find a replacement but I got nothing. Once Spring hits it'll be hopeless. What specific store can I buy this in DC or New York? I’m willing to drop $100. My only requirements is it has to be black, hoodless, with pockets and a non-obnoxious design. I’m desperate. I’m ready to make guys on the street offers on the spot when I see something I like.

This would be fine if it didn’t have a hood:

The reason I say New York is because I’m going there today for about a week. There has to be a place on the East Coast that sells this.

So Played

February 11, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

This following meme is played. Please do not use it anymore in conversation.

“Really? No, really?”

And it’s closely related cousin…

“Seriously? I mean, seriously.”

In the past three months I’ve caught dozens of people from many different subcultures using it, meaning it has filtered into the mainstream. Even a recurring bit on SNL is titled “Really?”

It’s time to find another way to express your incredulity. Some possible alternatives:

“What an unexpected turn of events.”

“I’m very disappointed with that outcome.”

Blog Crush Happy Hour

February 12, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm doing another happy hour with Arjewtino and Lemmonex at Marvin next Friday. For more details on the concept visit their blogs now.

Sour Dick-Sucking Lips (Part 1)

February 15, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The entire story can be viewed in this PDF file.

I look up at the metal chandelier in the main room and notice it has twelve tiny bulbs in the shape of raindrops, set imperceptibly low. It's so low this place will go out of business before having to replace them. There is more light coming from candles placed on eight tables halfway encircling a small dance floor, where late 20-somethings move to deep house as if they were having a mild seizure. I feel like I'm in a dark cave and rabies infested bats are about to descend from the ceiling and inflict pin-sized bite wounds on the crowd. Those who didn't feel the bites in the commotion and seek treatment would eventually die after the virus hitches a ride on a nerve into the skull to feast on brain matter. I already have the rabies vaccine so I'd yell maniacally during the bat attack with my arms high in the air so everyone would think I'm the leader of the bats. I'd trip them going down the stairs and laugh at the hilarious heap at the bottom.

I return to reality and squint around the room, searching for pussy. It's impossible to make a correct decision when the most important feature of a woman, her face, is deliberately hidden from view. That must be why this bar is so popular. I remember the last two girls I got out, their faces a far model from perfection when hit with a halogen bulb, and I relax, ready to thank the owner of this shithole for doing me favor. I'm in a fantasy world, and the joke is on everyone here that the person they're talking to doesn't have a leathery face. I do an imaginary toast in front of my nose and finish the last of my Johnnie Walker Black, by now watered-down from the ice and tasting almost like flat cola.

I don't know where my friend is, but last I saw him he was talking to a blonde slut with big jugs on the patio. I walked away because there was nothing for me. Neither of them noticed. I lean against the DJ booth, currently occupied by a mop-headed guy from Eastern Europe with not an ounce of muscle on his skeletal frame. He bobs his hair to the music like a dufus, getting all into it, and a 300-pound man directly facing the booth gives him a thumbs-up sign. I notice I'm starting to sweat, but I don't want to take of my jacket because I hate the shirt I'm wearing underneath. The only reason I have it on is so my fashion-forward friend takes a break from making derogatory comments about my limited wardrobe. I wipe the sweat off my face and in a flash a girl, alone, enters my view.

My eyes must have adjusted to the darkness because I see her clearly. She has long black hair, a petite nose, enormous dick-sucking lips that seem out of place with her olive complexion, and small, expressionless eyes. She begins to turn away from me and in that quarter-second profile view all I can see besides her thick, shaggy hair were these two lips that protrude unnaturally from her face. By the time her back faces me my legs are moving and my right arm rises from its resting point besides my hip. I tap her three times on her left shoulder, and she turns around and looks at me.

"Let me guess," I say, pausing to build suspense, "you are from Argentina."

“Nope,” she says. Her lips curl up slightly, and that encourages me to continue. It’s obvious to me that my appearance meets her minimum requirements.

“Colombia?”

“Nope.”

“Italy.”

“No.”

“The world has over 180 countries, and I know them all. This could take a while. Give me a hint,” I say with a slight smile.

“I’m a mutt,” she says.

“I’m a mutt too. Go on…”

“Quarter Somalian, quarter Filipino, half-white.”

“Wow… I mean…” I try to regain my composure, “I would have probably never gotten that.”

“Probably not, where are you from?”

I go into the whole Persian / Turkish thing, telling her that explains my thick, luscious eyebrows and generally hairy complexion. She laughs and I realize I’m no longer leaning against anything, but standing near dancers who are bumping into me and not apologizing. It’s much easier to figure out where to put my hands if I’m leaning against something. I take two steps away from her towards the bar. At the moment I step back, I leave my right arm suspended randomly in the air as if it was a bridge, and ask her where her friends are at, an innocuous question that gives her an acceptable excuse to follow a strange man two steps towards the bar without admitting to herself that she is showing too much interest. She does not realize how much knowledge of human persuasion it took to pull that ridiculously simple feat, and at the time I don’t realize it either. At some point it became too laborious for my brain to process every little trick it learned from either books, movies, watching other men, or personal experience. My body is simply a vehicle for my brain to act, and in that way I’m a robot.

Much of my body weight rests on my right elbow, which is planted on the bar. My left hand casually drapes across my abdomen. My left leg is ramrod straight while my right leg has a kink at the knee. In college Art History class I learned that this type of body position, with one hip above the other, was a great step forward in art. There is a name for it that I don’t remember but being able to reproduce this stance in stone was impossible for most of human history.

I am so into my own bullshit that I have trouble paying attention to what a girl tells me in a loud bar. This girl is no exception and I drone on about myself for some time—about how I’m a free-thinking wanderer that takes risks, but indirectly so it doesn’t come across as bragging. I mention the countries I’ve visited and the scientist job I threw away, like I’m proud of being broke but with intimate knowledge of the bed bug life cycle. She digs it, of course, and I let her add her own plain thoughts every minute or two, but I interrupt often because if she talks too much she will take charge of the conversation and I will get off task. I want to get to know her as a person just a touch more than the DJ, whose sedate music is somehow whipping women in tall black boots into a frenzy. It's a disgusting sight but in the capital of the free world I can't find any other bar that I fit better in.

Out of thin air GQ appears and reminds me that we have to go to a party down the street. I put my index finger up and five minutes later ask her if she wants to have a drink with me at a later date. She looks down and lets out a little smile. She has yet to ask me my name so I'm forced to ask first. Rachel. It's cute that she is shy in an endearing way, that she is not a weathered professional working on her 100th cock. It won't be long now until girlfriend circles throw a party for this momentous occasion: "100th Cock Party," says the Evite with an cartoon image of martini glasses complete with olives and lemon twists. And condoms if they were allowed.

I text message Rachel in exactly two days, on a Monday night. I ask her if she wants to grab a drink on Wednesday. She replies that she is busy but if I rather hang out on Thursday. Her counter-offer was an extremely good sign, and it did calm the irritation that came from taking a full two days and a dozen back-and-forth text messages to get her out for a simple date. She took up to two hours to reply at times, and when I took twelve hours to punish her she simply took more (fourteen hours and twenty minutes).

I instruct her to meet me at an inexpensive bar that prides itself on not having bottled beer. She arrives a few minutes after me in a hipster outfit: red-checked flannel shirt, colorful wool gloves, and tight skinny jeans. I finally catch a glimpse of her round though short ass, and decide it's more than acceptable. Her lips are glossy, a dark pinkish color and her annoying bangs cover her right eye. Every five minutes she jerks her neck to the right so that she can see me with full vision.

We sit on back-less bar stools in front of a large wooden column. Intimacy is more easily achieved with a booth because I can sit next to the girl and casually wrap my arm around her lower back. Most girls don't even notice this. It's a little more tricky at the bar. I have to initiate innocent contact with my legs until an hour or two in I pretend my finger is an imaginary pen and doodle on the part of her leg below the meatiest part of her thigh. This touch is too non-sexual to be objected by the girl, but not fifteen minutes later my hand will rest on the top of her thigh. Like a frog bathing in a pot of slowly boiling water…

As the night goes on my hand moves up, while our legs become stuck in a permanent state of incidental contact. In a booth the kiss is usually simple because the sides of our bodies are already touching, but on bar stools there will always be at least a foot of space between us. Bridging this space can be accomplished through a variety of means, the easiest of which is pretending I didn't hear something she said and need to move closer to catch it the second time. For effect I squint my eyes. Then I just look at her lips and go for it, not knowing or caring what her reaction will be. I can't think of a recent time it has failed, but I know it has in the past.

Rachel sits dewy-eyed, drinking a chocolate-espresso stout, while I tell her my thoughts about life that come from hundreds of hours thinking and staring into space, alone. Her eyes tear up after I went on about South American poverty, predictably, like other girls have, and it's at that moment I know she's ready: she has entered that a vulnerable, emotional state that is ripe for taking a risk, and in this case that risk is getting fucked by a brand new, fresh cock. By this point I already doodled on her leg. In capital letters I wrote "I WILL FUCK YOU" but of course she doesn't realize this, and my hand has crept up to within five inches of her crotch. It's here I'm careful because any sudden movements when I'm so close to the hole can freak her out and null out hours of work. I remove my hand from her thigh and spin my bar stool to face her directly. Our legs interlock. My right hand rests on the left side of her hip at the spot where no matter how much weight a girl loses there is that mass of squeezable fat that makes it easy to hold onto her tightly when fucking from behind.

Sour Dick-Sucking Lips (Part 2)

February 16, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

PREVIOUSLY: PART 1

She says something about visiting Guatemala, or Nicaragua, or maybe it was Honduras. It's one of the countries that liberals filled with guilt visit they can take pictures of dirty children and return back home and brag to their other guilted friends about how much it affected them and changed their outlook on life. "But the children… they were so happy!" they say, as they chow down on free-range chicken and organic fruits bought at the Whole Foods in their up-and-coming neighborhood that still has a pesky crime problem from menacing black youths. Jerome, with a respectable three purse snatchings under his belt, nearly as poor Pepe in Tegucigalpa, is not deserving for help, unfortunately, and it would be better if rents keep going up so him and his family (five siblings in all), can be displaced somewhere in a distant suburb. Pepe, the rascally bastard (literally), has a stack of thirty-eight wallets neatly placed in the corner of a room he shares with his two older sisters, one of which turns tricks two blocks from the town square. She's 15-years-old. The funny thing is that even if Rachel found out that Pepe is a thief—about to graduate to armed robbery and then organized kidnappings—that fact wouldn't chill her heart to him any less, and she would rationalize by saying he was born disadvantaged and is forced to steal. Believe it or not, Pepe has an 8 gigabyte iPod Nano with the latest tracks from Fall Out Boy.

Rachel rambles on about how she found her soul in Honduras, I'm now sure it was, and my brain refuses to process her words in a way that I can provide a suitable response. The boat is ready to board and I can't concentrate on having to get into new conversational topics. Besides, after four beers I'm only capable of deep bedroom stares. I get closer and then look over her right shoulder when I recognize a bald, skinny man with glasses sitting in a booth with two other men. It's Stanley Clemens. Four years ago I worked with him in a biotech firm, and though we were in different departments we interacted quite a bit and shared a drink or two at company sponsored happy hours in the cafeteria. And by drink I mean Bartles & Jaymes wine coolers. Not me but him. I drank beer, like a man, but he would only drink the raspberry-pomegranate flavor and give off a faggy "Ahhh" after every third or fourth sip like someone was diddling his prostate. One of my coworkers told me that he once caught Stanley getting his dick sucked in his office by one of his hot-bodied subordinates, and looking at him within shouting range I simply don't believe that a man who drinks fucking wine coolers got his shit gobbled on by a girl ten years younger than him in his office. I count on him not recognizing me and decide not to say hello.

Slightly bothered, I stare back at Rachel who wraps up something about how the non-profit work she does in Maryland is related to her interests in Central America. I continuously nod up and down like a novelty drinking bird and she finishes. Before a long silence envelops us both I ask her to repeat what she just said as if I didn't hear, which technically I didn't. I stare at her dick-sucking lips, ready to kiss her after what has now been four hours of talking, and she speaks again, slowly, because she understands and accepts what I'm doing. I squint my eyes and stare at her lips, and her speech slows even more until she trails off and leaves an incomplete sentence hanging in the air, and I carefully move in closer, and my eyes are almost closed now, and I inhale loud enough so that Stanley can hear, and our lips touch.

"You're fresh," she says. But she didn't say it in English but Spanish, and I'm content that I understood what she said. Apparently she is fluent in Spanish but this means nothing to me and I close my eyes again and pull her towards me by using my hands, which are at her hips, and we kiss, very slowly, so that I can feel the softness of her dick-sucking lips, the actual tissue it is composed of and not just the outside texture.

Rather abruptly the song "Chasing Cars" by Snow Patrol comes on and I stop kissing for a second to look at the bartender, who knows me, I think—he should after all the girls I brought here—and he gives me this knowing stare as if telling me he did it on purpose. I shoot back a slight smirk by twitching my left cheek muscle and go back to kissing Rachel, whose lips are the softest I've ever experienced in my life. As a kid I used to make Toll House chocolate chip cookies from a recipe on the back of the chocolate chips package where each batch called for two sticks of softened butter. Sometimes I'd cheat and zap the sticks in the microwave for fifteen seconds or so but it would melt the surface and eventually give the cookies a flatter appearance. Well, Rachel's lips were like butter softened in the microwave. The mood is perfect, her lips are perfect, and my game is perfect. Not long after I close out my tab, $45, by paying in cash. We leave and I make sure not to make eye contact with Stanley.

I walk her home less than a mile away and sober up quickly as we make our way through her ghetto neighborhood. Short, ugly Hispanic men shuffle around like large rats and I put my hand in the same jacket pocket of my portable canister of pepper spray. I've tested it outside before and it shoots a forceful, jalapeño-red stream ten feet straight ahead. To make sure the spray was the real deal I wafted the mist from the practice spray onto my face and immediately began a sneezing fit that lasted four minutes. I want one of these Mexicans to say something, anything, and then get a full blast of sauce in their face and cry, "¡Aye aye pero porque! ¡No me gusta! ¡En serio?!"

"Officer, he attacked me and I feared for my life."

"I understand sir, I would have done the same thing. We're going to export him back to El Salvador where it will take him at least six months and twelve gallon jugs of water to make it back to our country again. Damn wetbacks are ruining America."

Finally we arrive at the lobby of her project and I take my hand out of my pocket. She stops by a wall of mailboxes, a quarter of which are broken and open.

"Can I use your bathroom?" I ask.

"My place is a hot mess."

Hot mess… where have I heard that before?

“That’s cool I won’t look. I just want to pee. I’m about to urinate on myself.”

“I can’t let you in.”

“No, seriously. It’s burning like fire. You can blindfold me.”

“I’m sorry I can’t.”

“Alright well can you point me to an alley where I can relieve myself,” I bluff.

“Yeah there is one right there,” and she points next to dumpster encased in a wooden fence. Black graffiti lettering covers the large wooden door.

“Fuck, are you serious?”

“I’m sorry, I can’t. I’ll clean my place and next time you can come in. I promise!”

I don’t remember that ever failing me. Actually, it never has. Even when the girl has hated my guts she still let me in to use the bathroom. Sure she kept the front door open and waited by it impatiently with her shoes on, but making me use the alley? What kind of cold heartless bitch lets a new guy she’s hooking up with use an alley in the middle of the ghetto?

No, Rachel is shy. She is shy in an endearing way, in a way that only a girl who hasn’t had almost 100 cocks knows how to act. It was okay. She’s naïve. I kiss her goodnight, then piss in the alley, one hand on my dick and one on my pepper spray, which is in the shape of a small dick, so it’s like I had my hands on two dicks, and then start home. Sometime during the night she sends me a text message saying she had a great time. That’s the least she could do, and I smile when I receive it, like an artist smiles when he’s done with a painting he just finished. But really I just started the painting.

Sour Dick-Sucking Lips (Part 3)

February 17, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

PREVIOUSLY: PART 2

I couldn't stop thinking about her.

I bought her a canister of pepper spray for late-night walks home. I took her to an upscale French brasserie downtown where she was impressed with my wine knowledge, and couldn't have been more pleased with the French cabernet I picked out for her. The manager on duty, a man I used to bartend with, gave me 50% off. I did not tell her that he did this. I sat with her in a bookstore café, sharing a chocolate bundt cake with a dollop of drinking chocolate in the center, her reading a 20th year anniversary edition of The Unbearable Lightness Of Being by Milan Kundera—because I gave it to her as a gift—and me reading The Sun Also Rises by Ernest Hemingway. Though she is only 23-years-old, and those under 25 cannot give a proper reading of The Unbearable Lightness Of Being because of their lack of life experience, especially in the area of love, she is stimulated by certain passages, such as the following: "When a society is rich, its people don't need to work with their hands; they can devote themselves to activities of the spirit. We have more and more universities and more and more students. If students are going to earn degrees, they've got to come up with dissertation topics. And since dissertations can be written about everything under the sun, the number of topics is infinite. Sheets of paper covered with words pile up in archives sadder than cemeteries, because no one ever visits them, not even on All Souls' Day. Culture is perishing in overproduction, in an avalanche of words, in the madness of quantity. That's why one banned book in your former country means infinitely more than the billions of words spewed out by our universities."

I took her for a weekend to New York City where we stayed at the affordable Pod hotel, and had sex at least a dozen times. We toured Williamsburg in Brooklyn and the Lower East Side and bought luxurious cupcakes and drank cafecitos in cozy cafes with old and broken furniture. On the third Thursday of the month I took her to a Brazilian party at a bar called Bossa where I watched her samba, because, I must have absent-mindedly forgotten to mention, she's a samba instructor. She knows how to vibrate her body in ways that most men will only be able to watch on a television screen every February when a blip about Carnival makes its way to the news, and I enjoyed that I ravaged her once we returned back to her apartment in the ghetto, both of us having carried pepper spray. I took her the National Portrait Gallery of Art, where I pretended to know what I was talking about, and afterwards we hit a family-owned Lebanese restaurant for falafel wraps topped with freshly-made hummus, which gave me gas almost immediately because of a synergistic combination of garbanzo beans and olive oil. She was a hollow vessel that I filled these realistic fantasies with. It could have been any girl with dick-sucking lips, but it was her, and beyond sex I wanted her to be my main Washington DC girl, to join my Cordoba girl, my Rio de Janeiro girl, and my New York girl—soon to be replaced by another, much younger girl that I met in a coffee shop next to a bus company's Chinatown DC-NY bus stop. She had a piercing one inch above the left edge of her lip, and lacked a certain grace that I've become accustomed to, but like all women—and all other mammals for that matter—she can easily be trained.

I quickly bore myself with the fantasies and hit the pornography hard, trying to find girls who look like Rachel to give my fantasies a little more… sustainability. So far they were based on nothing but her appearance. The dryness of her personality made it easy to mold her into any situation, but difficult to make them more personable and intimate.

Esquire calls me four days after our first date. He asks me how it went.

"It was… magical," I laugh. "Her lips are so soft."

"Mmmm she got them DSL's I saw."

"Does she ever. We were at the bar for five hours, talking. She wouldn't let me back into her place but I think there is… something… there. She is trying to cure world hunger, or poverty, and you know that that type of girl is made for me."

"Wait, something there?" he asks, confused.

"Yeah, like a connection."

"And you haven't fucked her, right?" I can hear him chewing something, probably two grilled chicken breasts cooked on his George Foreman grill. I'm pretty sure he went to the gym after work.

"No not yet, but I'll probably hit the next date," I lie, knowing full well I'm not getting her panties off until at least the fourth date, but most likely fifth.

"Remember Beth, the girl I dated a few months ago?" he asks.

"Yes I remember. What, did she call you?"

"No, but after we started fucking—I think it was our sixth date or so—I told you I was catching feelings and you got on me pretty hard about it. You said it was 'too soon.' And now you're telling me you feel a connection for a girl you only kissed—after one single date?"

My mouth was open ready to speak but no words came out, my throat frozen.

"Look, you know how these bar sluts are. The minute you," he pauses to search for a word, "value them as an equal, especially before you fuck them, is the minute you can punch yourself in the dick since you won't be using it anytime soon. I'm curious as to what type of spell she put on you, bro."

"No, no, you're right. Shit you're right. I guess I think that… that she is different. She's shy, you know? She's not… I mean… I don't think she's like the bar sluts we usually fuck."

"Did you meet her in a bar?"

"Yes."

"Was she with a big group of friends?"

"Yes."

“Was she drinking?”

“Yes.”

“Did she give you her number easily?”

“Yes.”

“Was she wearing tight clothes?”

“Yes.”

“Was her lips extra glossy on your date?’

“Yes. They were blinding.”

“How many drinks did she have on the date?”

“Three. Okay, okay I get your point. But I didn’t do anything wrong, yet, I think. It’s still on.”

“Dude just bang her first. If you’re dating for a month or two then you can think these things. I shouldn’t have to tell you that.”

“You’re right. Fuck, I’m such an idiot. Also I called her last night, three days after the date, and… she hasn’t called me back yet.”

“Because she’s a bar slut. She’s probably juggling three other cocks at the same time. You know how they are.”

“I know. I need to hit first.”

I need her to call first. It’s noon on the second day since I left a message. I just took a hot shower and now I stare in the bathroom mirror after wiping off the fog with a dirty pair of boxers with gray sharks on them that my mother bought for me three years ago as a Christmas gift. My beard is very thick now, about four weeks of growth, but it doesn’t make my face look fat and swollen because the hair on my head is bushy. To maintain it I have to shave my neck and the top of my cheeks every three or four days so the beard line neatly descends from the middle of my sideburns to the sides of my mustache and fills the entire space below it until the underside of my jaw. I have no empty patches in my beard, something that most white men and all Asian and black men cannot achieve, and I’m proud of this. The ten or so white hairs in my beard only adds to its power. Years ago girls would tell me they have never been on a date with a guy who had a beard before, but I no longer hear that which tells me that beards are back in style, and this is good for me since what I normally do is now considered hip among shallow girls who are into appearances and trends. The shallower a girl is, the worser her decision-making skills, the more likely she won’t think twice about sleeping with me way too soon. I decide I don’t need to shave today since I’m not going out, and study my reflection in the mirror. I accept that I’m upset that Rachel hasn’t called me back, that she would just throw it away for no reason. I think of text messages I can send her to revive my effort, and flirt with this: “Hey I don’t think you’re that cold. What’s up?” I don’t think I’d tell Details if I did this. I splash cold water on my face to shut the large pores I have around my nose and watch as the water slides down my face and disappears into my beard, then reappears at the bottom of my chin in drops that finally fall into the sink.

Sour Dick-Sucking Lips (Part 4)

February 18, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

PREVIOUSLY: PART 3

Four hours later my phone rings. It's her. The worst thing I can do is pick up the phone but that's exactly what I do because I'm deathly afraid that if I don't speak to her now I will have to play phone tag for several more days. That would kill the seduction for sure. She has the power and I'm still in a spell, but at least I'm aware I'm in the spell, which is one step away from snapping out of it. I call her out indirectly about taking so long to call by saying "Finally." She doesn't apologize or give me an excuse, which is worrying. During our short conversation we set up a date for the next night at a hotel bar that I suggested. After the call I get a thought: "She's not shy, you idiot, she's cold."

The next day she texts me a few hours before the date and asks to relocate to a bar closer to her neighborhood. I reply "Okay," but I'm livid. "She better have a damn good excuse," I say to myself, and pack up my things from the coffee shop where I was tunneling through Fathers and Sons by Ivan Turgenev. I begin to walk and take the long route so I can be late, and pass by pant-suited women wearing sneakers and bald men walking tiny dogs. A tall brunette with curly hair approaches on the left and gives me a half-second glance then looks down and to the right and in my head I'm thinking what I'm going to say to Rachel about changing plans, and if this really is a lost cause and I should just stand her up right there at the bar and at least make her feel like horseshit. The spell is weakening, and my anger is still high and my lower lip is pushing up on my upper lip into the early stage of a frown, and I walk into the bar 20 minutes late to find her drinking alone, almost done with a bubble glass of red wine. She is playing with her phone, either because she's bored or because doesn't want to appear like a total loser. I accept that I have zero power with her. I tell myself to do everything possible to fuck her tonight but deep inside I know that it's absolutely not going to happen.

She has her hair back into a complicated bun so that her eyes and forehead are visible. I like it because I knew it took some time to do. She has on a slight v-neck sweater that draws my eyes down to her small breasts and her lips are gleaming like usual. The sight of her appearance relaxes me slightly and I tell myself that the fact she is here, looking good for me, is a positive sign and she really does like me and I should just make the most of it.

I am slightly distant and out-of-sorts for the first hour of the date. I ramble on about insignificant matters, like the nude painting on the wall and the schizophrenic weather, waiting for the Johnnie Walker Black to kick in and for her to do something that allows me to say this is all worth it and I'm not wasting my time and lifeblood. As if she senses this she reaches into her large purse and pulls out The Rum Diary by Hunter S. Thomspon and hands it to me: "I think you'll like this." Pleased, I pull out my beaten copy of The Unbearable Lightness Of Being from my bag, since I always leave it in my bag to show girls I meet in coffee shops (so they think I'm deep), and hand it to her. I tell her that by noting passages I've marked in the book she will learn more about me than she can by mere casual conversation. She doesn't make a comment about this and I realize that I made a grave mistake and should not have given her the book because she won't get it. I tighten the muscles in my forehead and something is telling my mouth to open and my vocal chords to vibrate and without thinking I say, "Look, this is my only copy. If we don't happen to see each other again I'm going to ask you to mail it back to me." She laughs and then I look at her with wide open eyes and say, "I'm serious." She is still laughing, and I realize that I will never see her again.

Our legs have been touching for a while around the knee. I ask her why she is sitting so far away from me. She moves closer, my hands find homes around her thigh and hip and lower back and we kiss, but it wasn't nearly as good as the first time because the spell was much weaker. Still, it's good, because I love her lips.

A little bit after the kiss the topic gets on schooling and I ask her what her major in college was. I'm on my third drink, and so is she. The cocktailer brings us two complimentary Jameson shots because they were out of some frou-frou drink she tried to order earlier. They sit on the table, untouched.

"Woman's studies."

"What?!" I fake surprise. Only a chick as cold as her could be a card-carrying feminist.

"WO-MAN'S STU-DIES." She says it in a way that suggests other men have been just as disappointed as me.

"Well that explains everything." I say, smug-like.

"What do you mean?"

"It explains why you're cold like all the white chicks I've dated." Maybe I should have used the word "frigid" instead of "cold" but I think that would have ended the date immediately. I soften it all with a smirk but her face shows she doesn't care for the comment. I feel tricked because the only reason I approached her was because she looked South American. "False advertising," I mumble, but actually I'm happy to learn that none of this is my fault. There is a limit to what game can accomplish: unfortunately it can't undo four years of brainwashing that teaches impressionable young women that they are actually better than men.

I pour a third of her shot into mine. We both drink our shots, and now I'm feeling a glimmer of hope I may actually hit tonight, because she doesn't move her body away from me after I call her cold and she has nearly four servings of alcohol in her system. She's a small girl so I know she's feeling loose. Half-an-hour passes. I ask for the check. It's $55. She plops her Powerpuff Girls MasterCard on the check presenter but I slide it off. It's a bad habit that I only let girls pay after I fuck them, which generally isn't a problem when it happens by the end of the first date. Maybe I'm still spellbound, who knows. I tip $20 to show the cocktailer appreciation for the Jamesons.

We start the walk to her place. It's about seven blocks away and I briefly consider hailing a cab because it's cold but I don't want to spend any more money on her. Our arms are locked in the French style and there isn’t much conversation. There’s nothing specific I can think of that would warm her up to getting banged in moments time. I see both sides of this problem: on one hand if I keep talking I can distract her from what it is I want her to do, but on the other hand a silence can allow her to fantasize about having me deep inside her, assuming that’s where she’s at. Also, if I talk too much I may say something stupid at the absolute worse time to do such a thing. Tonight I pick silence, but after I bring up one thing…

Sour Dick-Sucking Lips (Part 5 of 5)

February 19, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

PREVIOUSLY: PART 4. The entire story can be viewed in this PDF file.

"So why didn't you want to meet me at the hotel bar?" I purposely save this up for the end of the date, after she has invested a whole night in me.

"I don't like going to bars I haven't been to before," she says. Immediately my lips tense and I'm in disbelief. I unhook my arms from hers and look at her face.

"That makes absolutely no sense," I yell, getting the attention of a man in a brown blazer passing us in the opposite direction. "If that was the case then you'd never step into any bar!" I want to add "idiot" but I hold back. I'm offended that she thinks so lowly of my intelligence that I'd swallow such tripe. I slowly resume walking again, looking straight ahead, and she grabs my arm, which I take as her way of apologizing, and says, "Oh come on, you know what I mean."

"Obviously I don't."

"Look I just didn't want to trek all the way to Dupont."

"It's only one stop away! It's an extra 10 minute walk!"

"But it's far!"

I think my face is turning red but I can't tell. I take a deep breath through my mouth. "It takes me 30 minutes to come out here to meet up with you. And you're telling me right now that you don't want to take one metro stop to meet me at a bar that I take effort into choosing? This is… stupid." By "this" I was referring to us, this relationship, but it doesn't seem like she catches that. She doesn't catch a lot of things.

"Calm down you're just being silly."

She is still holding on to my arm and I can feel my chest rising up and down whereas I didn't before my outburst. With her apartment complex in sight the words "hot mess" pop into my head and now I remember why it sounded so familiar the last time I was here: it's similar to The Killers debut album, Hot Fuss, a record that starts strong but quickly fades into mediocrity. In an unfortunate attempt to be taken more seriously, perhaps to mimic Coldplay's formulaic success, The Killers have gravitated away from pop-rock monster hits to a mellower sound that is neither inspiring nor affecting. Plus Brandon Flowers' lyrics have eroded into a realm of cheese that competes with trance anthems from the early 00's ("Castles In The Sky" by Ian Van Dahl, "Heaven" by DJ Sammy, anything by ATB, etc.). This is most apparent in their third album, Day In Age, where only two tracks are not cringe-worthy: "A Dustland Fairytale" and "I Can't Stay," though neither have given me a compulsive urge play dozens of times a day like I did "Mr. Brightside," and to a lesser extent, "Somebody Like Me." "Mr. Brightside" still moves me, probably because I anchored it to a beautiful bartender I tried to sleep with who loved the song as well. I'm not so sure why she did since it's about a man who quickly falls for a girl after just a kiss only to have his affections go unrequited. I think she's in Greece now.

I don't have to do or say anything to get into Rachel's studio apartment—it is assumed. I walk into what feels like an Ikea showroom, because she's in Ikea's market audience and doesn't know any better. I casually explore the space, use the bathroom, and then sit on her GRANKULLA futon. She joins me with her laptop and asks how I'm getting home. I say, "Don't worry about it," and watch her wrap up some work she needs to do for the next day. While on the futon she makes sure not to touch me. This has happened to me many times before; sometimes it takes a while for a girl to warm up to me when I'm in her place for the first time. I match her distance and take out my laptop from my bag. Left inside is my copy of Fathers and Sons, a tin of Altoid Peppermint mints, one condom (size extra large), Sennheiser ear bud headphones, a travel toothbrush, a travel contact lens case, and a ballpoint pen.

After she finishes her work I show her pictures from my time in Brazil. The first photo that pops up on the screen is of me in boxer shorts splayed out across a bed. I quickly hit the right arrow on my keyboard and say, "Uh that was taken by a… friend." It happened over a year ago anyway. She seems to take interest in the fifty or so other photos I show her.

"So how are you getting home?" she asks, again.

"What do you mean?"

"You're not staying here."

"Who said I wanted to stay here?!" I say. I show her more photos, from Argentina. Now I'm very sure there will be no sex on her MANDAL bed, next to the LEKSVIK nightstand, opposite the BILLY bookshelf. Ten minutes pass. Casually I say, "I think the Metro stopped running. Uhh mind if I crash on your futon?"

"This is only our second date! I told you you can't!" she yells as she gets up from the futon.

"Alright you want me to walk home? Take a $60 cab? Great, okay."

She says "I don't believe I'm doing this" and orders me to get off the futon so she can pull it out.

Once the futon is ready she says again, "I don't believe I'm letting you stay here." I wonder why my luck is so bad that I found the coldest feminist in the city. Usually they are extremely easy because they don't believe in "social constructs" like "whore," "slut," and "cum dumpster." I begin to wonder if Rachel was sexually abused as a child, because I've never seen anything like it. But while I'm here…

She's changing into her pajamas in the bathroom while I mill around the kitchen looking for a snack, something like a granola bar. I haven't eaten in eight hours. She comes out and I stop what I'm doing to lean against the frame of the kitchen entrance, like James Dean, I'm hoping. She walks up to me and I extend my arms and she grabs them and comes into me. I bend my head down and she cranes hers up and we kiss. My hands go lower until they cup her ass and this goes on for about three minutes and right when I'm about to push her onto the futon she pulls away from me and I'm left there drooling with my eyes closed, searching for her lips in the air with my own. It takes me ten seconds to snap out of it. She is already laying in her bed.

I go to the bathroom to brush my teeth and take off my contacts. Then I lay on the futon with all my clothes on, only ten feet away from her. It's hard for me to accept that I'm in a girl's place and not sharing her bed. In the darkness I tell her that when I was young my mom used to tuck me in and make me warm milk with honey. "You don't have to make me warm milk with honey," I say, "but I would like to be tucked in. And I want a goodnight kiss." She asks me if I'm kidding and I say that I'm most definitely not. She sighs loudly and then gets out of bed, walks over, and kneels over me to give me a short kiss. I tell her to lay down for a minute and she lets out this aggravated moan, but does it. We lay side by side, kissing, and I'm being very careful not to trigger the switch that will cause her to scamper back to the bed. My left hand returns to its rightful place on her body and she seems to be getting into it, but her breathing is light and shallow. A girl about to have sex breathes heavily and lets out deep, elongated breaths.

Her hand is near my stomach and I grab it gently to lower to my dick but it doesn't budge. Then I begin to roll on top of her and before I could complete the move she slithers like a snake away to her bed.

"How do you… how do you just stop like that?" I say. "It's like you're a machine." She doesn't reply. My erection goes limp and I fall asleep.

I take the same bus as her in the morning. Upon parting we make plans for a couple days later, a Saturday, and then she gives me a nice kiss goodbye. I didn't consider not making plans with her but I set it up in a way that I'd be with my friends and she'd tag along. If she acts weird I can ditch her with no detriment to my night. I swear to myself that I won't buy her anything. It doesn't happen. She cancels on Saturday and tries to reschedule for an off-night. I tell her I already have plans, even though I'm free. I'm being played. I tried and I failed. I'm sour as hell. I never contact her again, and she never contacts me again.

On the same Saturday we were supposed to hang out, I go with Robb Report to a hipster bar, our second of the night. While I wait at the bar to order a drink, a tall, half-Asian girl with incredible bangs make eye contact with me. When I catch her she turns around to her friend. I tap her on the shoulder three times and say, "Where I come from if you look at someone you have to talk to them. You have to ask them… what their favorite flavor ice cream is." I've never said that before, and am satisfied with the improvisation.

"What's your favorite flavor ice cream," she asks, smiling.

"Chocolate chip cookie dough, of course."

Three hours later I'm fucking her on her friend's uncomfortable leather couch. I try to fuck her a second time but my dick is half-soft from the scotch (and condom) and keeps bending like a cheap rubber hose. Her dryness doesn't help. "I think you're done," I say. She lives in New York and I think I want to see her again. She's affectionate and just as pretty as Rachel, and contacts me the next day just to say hi, but I still feel sour.

I did this to myself.

Travelvice I

February 24, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I wanted movement and not a calm course of existence. I wanted excitement and danger and the chance to sacrifice myself for my love. I felt in myself a superabundance of energy which found no outlet in our quiet life.
-Leo Tolstoy

When I got the travel bug I tried to find travel blogs that would help me with advice and knowledge for my own journey. It was much harder than I thought. A lot of blogs were by post-college graduates who didn't want to start work yet, and others were by people who wanted to feed starving children in towns without electricity. Eventually a chance discovery led me to Travelvice, written by Craig Heimburger, a man who I would say I share many personality traits with.

Craig has been traveling for three years, a year of which I've been following. During his journey he met a Peruvian woman and had a boy. I thought that would surely end his journey, but he takes them on the road with him. His boy, now almost one, has probably been to more countries than I have.

I follow up on a lot of his post with so many questions that I figured I might as well interview him. I wanted to pick his brain and find out why he's doing what he's doing, and also draw out the beliefs that drive him. So here's part one of the interview I had with Craig. My questions are in bold and his answers are in regular text.

You had an established career after graduating from college and you also got your MBA a couple years after that. It seems like there was a decision to move up the professional ranks but then you completely changed gears to where you are today. How and why did that happen?

During my first year of travel I'd sometimes lay out a description of my former standing in the U.S. similar to the one you've described in the question. I was working full-time in Phoenix and doing evening classes for my MBA (paid for by the same consulting company that I'd later leave just weeks after finishing my degree).

I was happy, getting plenty of lovin' and leisure in that lifestyle (despite the terribly full, yet routine schedule). The corporate brass wanted to promote me to a senior level that would've probably doubled my salary and expanded my ability to enact change within the organization. By most standards these dimensions of personal and professional success would've been enough to keep the lips of most any 25-year-old grinning from ear to ear, behind a glass of rum at least half his age.

But a seemingly innocuous visit to Thailand in the winter of 2004 (that mostly took place during/after the massive Boxing Day tsunami that rocked the region) set in motion a mindset that has since seen me living quite "comfortably" (warning: very subjective) out of a backpack for over three continuous years.

Years back, I'd had the notion that I'd seriously commit to learning German and become a knowledge worker of some sort in Germany. (I'd been rather captivated by the place on a high school exchange back in '96.) Pursuing my Master's put an end to that idea, but not the notion of living abroad. And when my 2004 holiday visit to Thailand came along, the overwhelming desire to escape from the uninspiring game of corporate chess (political posturing, elbow rubbing, etc) came crashing down on me like the nearby tsunami that could've very well claimed my life.

But deciding to up and abandon your stable life for one of pure travel is a vacation delusion that few actually follow through on. I reflected on several things during and shortly after this initial Thai experience:

– My mother passed away at a young age from cancer when I was only 17. This can age a young man considerably in his youth. This teaches you that life is fleeting. That life is short.
– There's more to a short life than working in an office building, sitting under the sterile blue-white light, chained to a computer monitor.
– That materialistic wants are far from the materialistic needs that I actually need to be happy, and that being in a corporation, surrounded by individuals perpetually looking to upgrade their lives by purchasing the next best house, car, phone, or television was not an environment that I wished to surround myself with any longer (especially since it's so tempting and easy to get wrapped up in the behavior yourself when all your peers are doing the same).
– That I should have to ask permission from someone for my time — to beg a boss for permission to please, pretty please, can I have a three-day weekend? I give my time to a company, not the other way around.
– That I couldn't allow the idea of living abroad to become an unrealized pipedream.
– And if not now, when?

It took nearly 11 months to finish up that degree, design and build a Web site that would best allow me to share my knowledge and experiences with others, prepare a successor at work, and shut down my life. Belongings were lovingly sold, tossed, or donated to charity, friends and family. I spent a lot of time researching not where to go, but what to take. And ultimately, my life was compressed down to that of a backpack small enough to fit in the overhead bin of most any commercial passenger plane. And that's the way it's been since December, 2005.

Did you get comments from people close to you that you were "throwing" away your career or not living up to your potential? Or were people inspiring you and pushing you to do it? How do you respond to people who question what you are doing?

Truly one of the best ways you can leave a company is to tell them you're doing it for travel. Not for another company, or for any other myriad reasons people give notice for, but to go and do the very thing that your peers are afraid to do themselves. And this, this response is even more motivating for the individual shedding themselves of their environment for reasons of wanderlust.

Still, years later, I get furrowed brows and letters of what amounts to dissatisfaction with the choices that I've made (and continued to make) with my lifestyle from my mother's side of the family. Perhaps more than a little xenophobic at my grandmother's level, down to the 'long vacations are what retirement's for' mindsets of her children and their families. They could just never really grasp what I would want with more than two weeks of vacation time per year and a stable, well-paying job. To toss it away to live an unscheduled life in the (comparatively) impoverished places of the world seemed certifiably nuts.

On some level I found that parts of Rolf Potts' book Vagabonding articulated a handful of the thoughts and feelings that I was having in 2005. And as I slowly expanded the circle of people around me whom I was revealing my intentions to throughout the year, I'd refer them to this book as some insight into my state of mind.

I've since discovered that many of my coworkers thought I'd be back after only six months. I had the undying support from my father and brother, but there wasn't a single person in my network of friends, colleagues or acquaintances I knew that could offer me any inspiration or advice on perpetual travel. Perhaps if I was from Australia it'd be a slightly different story, but such things are just not a part of the culture in the United States.

The plan was simple enough though: not to travel forever, but to live abroad for the rest of my days.

You've experimented traveling without a guide book and you don't seem to have a high opinion of other travelers who follow the Lonely Planet trail. How do you feel about the backpacking and hosteling culture? What do you think travel means for most of the travelers you meet?

The Lonely Planet trail is both a blessing and a curse, and certainly has its place in the lifestyle of even the most seasoned of travelers. For the tourist trail provides a level of predictability and comfort in unpredictable places.

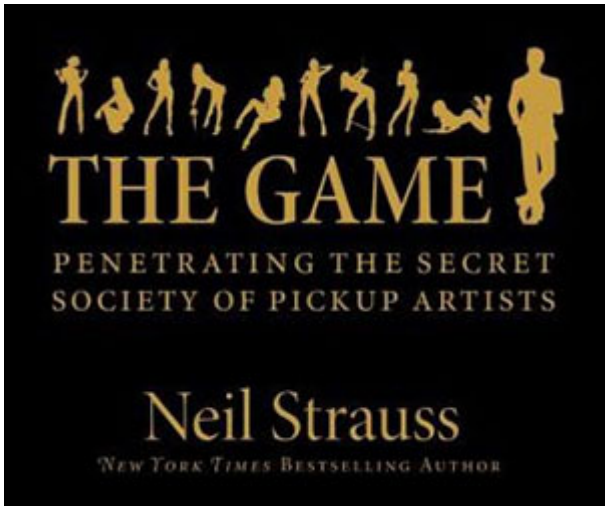
It's quite common for me to arrive at town in Latin America and dump my gear at a guidebook listed hostel or guesthouse for the first night (where applicable), using the remaining time that day and early the next morning to locate a better option. This isn't at all hard to do once you open yourself up to making it a part of your lifestyle.

The hard part often comes into play when you have to make decisions on socializing and the cost of your accommodations. I'm often left with the choice of a bunk bed at a guidebook hostel or a private room that's cheaper than a space in a 16-person dormitory, but with no one to talk with. In some cities you want to be alone, and in others you want to get laid easily. Hostels–especially the kitchens–are great places to meet potential lovers.

But really, guidebooks have their places, and I'm thankful they're around (even though I'm traveling without one at the moment). People that want to be sheep can be sheep, and people that want to mix it up can mix it up. It's a damn good safety net to have with you, but one person's safety net is always going to be another person's lifestyle. With time, the brave and bored emerge from the packs and trickle into the hills and villages.

Travel is what people make of it, and satisfying to one traveler is far from it to another. It's an overwhelmingly personal, selfish thing that sometimes doesn't extend beyond the bar, bed, museums, and monuments. But at the heart of it all is personal satisfaction—doing what makes you happy.

CONTINUED: Part 2



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Travelvice II

February 25, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

This is part two of an interview with Craig from Travelvice. You can read part one here.

Say I'm a 25-year-old educated guy and I think travel may be the answer to my quarter life crisis. And I like girls. Where should I go? And where should I not go?

Big regions of the world that I've explored and can speak with some modest authority on: the Caribbean, Latin America, SE Asia, and Eastern Europe (including Turkey).

In SE Asia you're in a better position to get laid than in other places in the world because the tourist girls aren't very interested in doin' dirt with the local men. So for the vast majority of opportunities this mindset eliminates a lot of competition. Add to the mix that you also probably want to sample some Asian fare, and you've got a large market of tasty possibilities.

The downside to SE Asia is that you've got a lot of stress placed on your physical characteristics. It's the tropics buddy, and if you're not looking okay topless in a swimsuit (or at least confident and fun loving with your approaches), you could be having problems (as the cut Aussie standing next to you with the 'cute, exotic' accent will certainly put you in check).

SE Asia is also full of couples and groups and almost zero hostels. This is a very challenging place to be without a friend, as you should be getting private rooms nearly 100% of the time and the bulk of the socializing is done at the bar. Traveling alone and don't drink socially? You're probably gonna be sleeping alone every time unless you want to pay to play.

You want a controlled dose of decaying Latin American structures, mixed with plenty of new foods and flavors of women to frolic with in the sheets? Peru is your spot my friend.

While places like Colombia, Costa Rica, Brazil and Ecuador hold a special little place in my heart for such things, Peru has the proper balance for a short-term vacation, and the geographic placement to explore the continent should you have the time or desire. One-way flights on SpiritAir from Fort Lauderdale to Lima are almost always less than $300.

My suggestion for Central America would have to be Guatemala. Pretty easy to get off the tourist trail if you'd like, lots of things to experience with opportunity for neighboring countries, and just a crap load of tourists from all over the world, many of whom are getting their feet wet for the first time in Latin America. (It's very, very easy to get laid in the popular backpacker city of Antigua.)

But I had a friend of Iranian descent that just slays women in the States because he's aggressive and has a different 'exotic' look about him, but he failed miserably in a place like Argentina, where black hair, 'exotic' features and aggressive men are the status quo. Avoid Argentina if you're looking to get laid, as the competition is high and the women are slow to lower their defenses and move past a certain point. It's a great place to admire some great looking females and enjoying some excellent wine and steak, though.

I'd certainly avoid the Caribbean if you're looking to get some lovin'. Unless you're on some sort of cruise ship thing where you can hammer away at your opportunities over the duration, you'll probably be out of luck. On many islands local girls have children by 15 or 16, and tourists tend to stick to their resorts or ships. Puerto Rico might be the exception, but then again, why limit yourself to just one island when you can have a continent of opportunities for a fraction of the price?

And finally, if you're into ugly beaches but tight Aussie and Kiwi bodies, Kuta Beach (on the island of Bali) in Indonesia is your spot. Shit, shit beaches and generally a shoulder-shrugging environment, but the place is truly hedonism at its finest. (Although Thailand is far more accessible a place, and just as ripe for debauchery.)

Ultimately, the wonderful thing is that the pretty girl you might never have had a chance with is sitting across the table from you in a foreign country, and you know you automatically have both travel in common. Use that and run with it—everyone does (exhaustingly so, sometimes).

Your ability to travel very cheap is well-known. What is your strategy when it comes to spending less but still getting a good experience? What are some common ways you see other travelers wasting their money?

The cost strategy totally varies by location, but it starts with something as simple as budget: I have none. I'm all the time looking for the angles to spend as little as possible for the greatest benefit. Saving money one day doesn't mean I splurge the next. You've got to purge that mentality from your mind. Spend when and where it's warranted, haggle, and always ask for a discount or what the weekly rate is for rooms even if you're not going to stay that long.

I'll tell you flat out right now that the biggest budget killer for travelers is alcohol. If you're drinking with any regularity, add $10-15/day to your shoestring budget. I'm typically in a situation when my private room costs the same price as a beer or two. I know that for every drink that I buy, that's money that I could've used to live in the city another night. Men, you need to learn to get laid without getting drunk.

The second big budget killer is restaurants and traveling too fast (transport costs money). Outside of Eastern Europe (where I'm cooking nearly 100% of my meals in a kitchen), I'm eating off the streets. Street vendors are your friends. They're an excellent source of information, and you can see exactly what the condition of their food is. I don't trust the mystery of a restaurant kitchen, where cockroaches and bacteria thrive. But if you have to eat at one, eat at a popular place with locals. The food is less likely to have been sitting there for hours or days before being served to you (which they will have no qualms doing).

And for the love of God, stop buying so much bottled water (another huge budget killer). If the locals are drinking it, so should you. I've got an infant son that's been drinking the tap water since he was born, in a dozen countries all over the world, and he's amazingly healthy. Just be sure to put a good amount of yogurt in your diet to help foster the good bacteria in your belly. The sooner you acclimate to the local bugs, the less loose stools you'll be having. Don't like the taste or you're just afraid? Put some of that sugar-free Tang stuff in there (available everywhere). Now you're drinking liquid mango–problem solved. Americans may want to watch this video: Bottled Water is Bullshit.

At the heart of any long-term penny-pinching traveler, you'll find a generally adaptable person. Someone that modifies their tactics according to the way the game is played in the country they're in.

Here in Europe, I've been spending only dollars a day in one of the most frighteningly expensive places on the planet. How have I done it? By adapting to the environment. Six months of continuous CouchSurfing has allowed me to have the all the perks of a home, without having to endure the $35/night rates for dorm beds in the same city. Instant cultural immersion, oddities explained, questions answered, access to local insights, and regular Internet access. It's been an amazing experience, and my total spending comes out to be something around $250 a month!

Good travelers are resourceful by nature.

With so many places to visit, how do you prioritize which cities and countries and step foot into? Do you have travel by schedule or plan or do you play it by ear? What advice do you have for someone who doesn't even know where to start when it comes to picking places to go?

The only plan is that there is no plan.

I learned a long time ago that planning much more than two weeks in advance is wasted energy. I've usually got a general direction that I'm always sort of headed in, but the specifics of the cities and how to get there are always a mystery until I'm ready to make the next jump. Back before I had the family in tow, I was a big fan of jumping on a bus and randomly getting off at an anonymous city that looked good. It's a little more complicated these days, but it's still pretty much unplanned.

You need not let your budget dictate where you want to go. If you're serious about doing it up at shoestring levels (< $10/day), then you'll find ways to do it. CouchSurfing in Europe only takes dollars a day.

My general advice would be to pick a place where you can relocate overland easily, into countries you're curious about. Figure out what you're after: beer, monuments, girls, local insights, archeology---whatever. Look for parts of the world that pique your interest, and book the cheap one-way flight to the biggest airport. Land yourself at a popular hostel or CouchSurfing host, and you'll absorb more stories and advice than you can handle. You'll be on your way in no time.

CONTINUED: Part 3

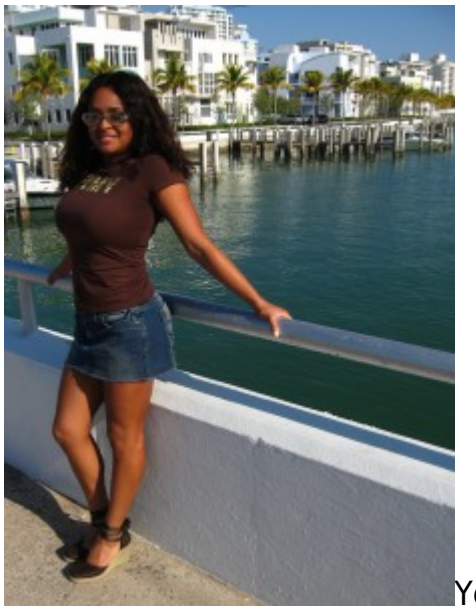
Travelvice III

February 26, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

This is part three of an interview with Craig from Travelvice. Read parts one and two.

You have mentioned your son, who was the result of a relationship that started in Lima, Peru. It does not seem like you will move to Peru full-time. How do you balance being a new father with your travel lifestyle and what role do you see in your son's life? Also, do you think that based on your son's exotic background he's going to do very well with Peruvian girls?



Yeah, Aidric's a stud. At 13 months he's got more stamps in his passport than most Americans, and gets more positive attention from females than the best looking guy at a bar. For him, this is only the beginning of a life sure to bring an excessive amount of ladies, love and travel into its fold.

Lord help me (and my mental state) if I move to the U.S. or Peru full-time. So long as I'm not physically crippled in some form that keeps me from running or crawling away, I won't be found in this situation. Even then, chances are good that I won't be found in either of these places for more than a few weeks at a time every few years.

So yes, this attitude always begs the question: Where will you raise your son? Where will he go to school? Where will you or he this or that?

These answers will come with time.

It's true. This isn't an easy lifestyle for individuals or families. And I truly don't know for how many months or years I'll continue to keep it up. Personally, I love it to death, but I've certainly got a tolerance for it that others don't.

The pace will continue to slow as time progresses… three months in a country or city here, six months there. Maybe one day I'll even find a place that captures me enough to keep me there longer than a handful of months—that's hard to envision now, but hey, so was being a father.

Aidric has been very fortunate that in his first year of life both his parents have been available or by his nearly every hour of every day. I'm a full-time traveler, but a full-time father first. Sometimes I need remind myself of such things when the distractions of travel and life start pulling your attention in different directions. This balance can be very, very difficult. You must adapt or risk everything (should you decide not to, or find yourself incapable).

Tatiana and I aren't together simply because of our son. She's told me as much, as have I her. And I hope to have Aidric by my side as often as possible as he grows. There will be times when he returns to the Americas with Tatiana and I don't. There will be times when I go into some deep part of Africa and won't allow him to tag along. I've an unquenchable thirst for life outside the U.S., and that will continue to be a part of my life for many years to come, just as Aidric and Tatiana will continue be a part of that life.

And as for Aidric's love life when he's of age? Oh man, heaven help those poor girls. A true international man of mystery that will speak many languages with perfect fluency (and carry at least as many passports to match—three at current count). He'll have the insights of his terribly-experienced parents, and that of years of exposure to different nationalities. They won't stand a chance, Peruvian, Swedish or otherwise.

Without a doubt, this will be one interesting fellow when he's older.

A problem of boredom often comes up with long-term travelers. Now that you are traveling with your son, has that problem been mostly eliminated? With him are there things you can't do now that you could before?

Here in Turkey, an elderly traveler told me a rather entertaining line the other day: "The only people that get bored traveling are boring people."

It's true, travelers need projects to work on while they travel, least they become unsatisfied with their ample free time. Each successful long-term traveler has their own style of projects, or what they even consider a project. But we all do them. We have to do them.

I think I would've gone nuts if I didn't have a travelogue as a creative and emotional outlet during my first two years of travel. But things are different now. Traveling with another person allows you to vent and explore oddities without the need of writing to get them out of your system.

Adding my son into the travel mix of adds a crazy amount of stress and repetition. I think boredom now comes in the form of having to adopt an undesirable routine (like making baby food by hand, waking up by his schedule not yours, changing diapers, lugging around supplies, etc). Every parent must endure the pains of repetition in this manner, but we get the burden of having to reengineer or make it work at a basic level all the time because every week (or more) we're in a new home. You'd think it'd add flavor, but it just adds stress.

Having an infant certainly limits you, but on some levels expands your opportunities. Do I think I would've successfully hitched onto a yacht in the Caribbean, lived in a banana plantation in the middle of nowhere, jumped off jungle waterfalls, snuck into Machu Picchu, or even participated in a Brazilian carnival the way I did if I had a child in tow? Hell no. Likewise, gone are the days of anonymous vaginas and risky sex in public places. How on earth am I gonna manage to do that now?

But having a child opens up doors to homes that might be otherwise closed. I'm less of a threat with a son and girlfriend with me—not that having a friendly smile didn't open doors previously—and I certainly get away with photographing locals more often when Aidric's strapped to my chest. I think in my upcoming travels to India, being a family man will alter my experience in the country dramatically compared with other solo travelers.

 So yeah, I miss out on some wacky adventures, but I guess I'll never know what paths I would've walked down that I'll be walking now. Maybe these are the better paths? Who knows.

Long ago I came to terms with the idea that you can't see and experience everything, but to appreciate what you do. This is just another extension of that philosophy.

You've mentioned you cook most of all of your meals, and I'm assuming it's not spaghetti and tomato sauce like I see all other gringos make. Can you share one of your favorite recipes that is easy to whip up in hostel kitchens?

In Latin America, probably three meals out of four were purchased and eaten on the street. In SE Asia, finding a kitchen is about a rare as finding an actual hostel. CouchSurfing here in Eastern Europe and Turkey, that's where the kitchen-time has been accruing at levels I haven't known since 2005.

For me, the biggest problem with cooking your own meals is that buying the little spices and niceties necessary to make a 'fuel meal' a 'good meal' cost. I've not only got to buy them, but then carry them if I don't use 'em up (least I lose that investment). So, why spend $5 on ingredients for a meal when I could just walk down the street and eat a skewer of something that looks like meat for a dollar? In SE Asia, it'd be silly to try and cook for yourself, given the abundant, diverse and inexpensive cuisine out there.

But, there are times when homemade meals make for good conversation and company. I loved cooking in groups in Latin America—especially for a group of women. Getting several people in on the deal makes it affordable, delicious and social.

CONTINUED: Travelvice Recipes

Travelvice Recipes

February 27, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

This is part four of an interview with Craig from Travelvice. Read parts one, two, and three. In this final installment Craig shares two recipes that he and Tatiana routinely make for their CouchSurfing hosts.

Papas Doradas (Golden Potatoes) ala Travelvice

This is a super-simple one for the sometimes absentminded chef.

You'll need:

- some potatoes
- a big pot and a frying pan (or two)
- cooking oil
- salt
- curry power (optional)
- cheese that melts easily (optional) and a cheese grater (also optional)

1. Purchase potatoes (of similar size), wash the dirt off 'em, then toss 'em in a pot of water (making sure you have a pot big enough to fill over the level of the potatoes). Bring the water to a boil and cook the potatoes until they're only partially done (maybe only 30% cooked).

2. Grab a frying pan and put a bunch of oil in there (don't just coat the pan, we're gonna be frying the potatoes in there, so there should be plenty–but don't go overboard). Put the heat on high.

3. Drain the water and bring out a knife. Now, slice the potatoes with their skin still on, making something like a thicker potato chip. Each potato will probably make around 8-12 slices, but it really depends on the size of the spud and your slices. They shouldn't be thin or too thin–think chunky chips.

4. Now, toss the potato slices into the heated oil and listen for the sweet sound of Latin America (…frying oil). Occasionally check the slices, waiting until they're golden brown, then flip onto the other side. Forgetting about them and overcooking takes a while, so no worries there.

5. When they're ready, take the cooked potato slices out of the oil and place them on a large plate. Immediately shake a liberal amount of salt onto them. In my style (which is damn tasty), I prefer to add a bunch of powered curry and grated cheese (sliced thin, if I don't have the tools) to the still-hot slices.

Making a bunch of these is necessary, as folks love 'em (and also make a great snack while drinking beer). But beware: it can take awhile to cook. It's best to have a second pan going to speed things up, and also be cooking something else in the meantime (like the main entrée if it's a part of lunch/dinner).

Arroz Árabe (Arabian Rice)

This dish really has nothing to do with anything Arabian, but Peruvians have named it as much anyway. Instead of making your unimpressive, boring white rice in the hostel, grab a couple people and have folks get in on this sweet, tasty variety.

You'll need these amounts to serve about six men and women:

- a pot with a lid
- cooking oil
- 100 grams of angel hair pasta
- 200 grams of rice
- 100 grams of raisins
- 1 tablespoon of curry
- 1/3 tablespoon of salt
- 3 cloves of garlic
- 1/4 liter of Coca-Cola
- chopped pecans or walnuts (optional)

1. Put the pot on the burner and coat the bottom with oil.

2. Break the raw angel hair pasta into pieces and fry on high heat until they get medium to dark brown.

3. Add the uncooked rice, powered curry, and ground garlic to the pot and continue to fry and stir it on high heat until it looks like the majority of the raw rice has been fried.

4. Add the raisins, salt and water (preferably heated or boiling) into the pot. The water level should be enough to cover the rice. Turn down the heat when it all starts to boil and put the lid on.

5. When the rice is almost done, pour the Coca-Cola in there, stir it up a bit, and turn off the heat. Put the lid back on.

6. Wait 5-10 minutes for the rice to finish cooking, then serve (optionally topping with chopped pecans or walnuts), and enjoy!

Thanks Craig for taking the time to answer my questions and share your recipes. Until we meet on the road… boa viagem.

State Of The Day Game Workshops

March 1, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have now taught ten day game workshops to nineteen men. April will most likely be the last month I do these. I'm going to be a little mum on my plans since they aren't finalized yet, but I plan on hitting the road by May.

Here's some workshop thoughts from a few students:

> I'd give the workshop an A+ grade. I liked how easy the system is, and thought Roosh was a great teacher. He explained everything in an easy to understand manner, and then closely watched the approaches, taking good notes so he could give lots of feedback. He uses a casual, "under the radar" style with openers that just sound like natural conversation. Because they are so easy and natural sounding, the openers take only a minimum amount of balls to deliver. Roosh gives you a 100% effort–worth every bit of your money.

The key to tight day game is indirect approaches. Direct game is not game at all, but a roll of the die based on what a girl thinks about your physical appearance.

> First of all, I really appreciate how you stayed beyond your planned time, and helped me get started with day game.
>
> I thought entire program was well thought-out and 'easy to follow', although actual execution of the routines were rough.
>
> I think the workshop could be improved with additional help beyond 'opener' and 'follow up'…(like when we kept on asking you for possible scenarios after back-and-forth follow up) but then again… I imagine anything beyond is mid-level game, and there would be too many scenarios and factors involved.
>
> The workshop was really worth the cost and time, especially with the idea that "SHE WANTS TO GIVE YOU THE NUMBER, NOT THAT YOU ARE SCHEMING TO GET THAT NUMBER". That statement and idea really opened my eyes and my attitude towards the game.

When you're using the material for the first time it will be choppy, though rarely disastrous since the approach is indirect. With practice it will get a lot smoother. Beyond the follow-up I teach the main idea of what you want to do (baiting, rambling), but it is not feasible to memorize conversation. That would be too robotic and unnatural.

> My overall experience with the Day Game Workshop was positive. The provided workbook that was extremely helpful and the in depth explanation of the concepts gave me a better understanding of the pick-up techniques that work. Not only did Roosh show me how to successfully approach women during the day, Roosh also made the workshop fun and gave me the motivation I needed to approach women. Of the 15 women I approached during the workshop, I came > away two numbers (one of which, I dated today). After the workshop, I even used Roosh's techniques on the subway to get an additional number from a pair of girls. I am quite satisfied with the the Day Game Workshop and would recommend it to anyone with a desire to learn how to attract women. THANKS ROOSH!

This was one of my most advanced students. His day game learning curve will be short because he was already decent with girls beforehand.

> The workshop was great, and more than worth it. It was transformational and helped build my confidence to go out and practice. I actually talked to a woman on the street and used FALNUC and said let's hang out. I didn't number close, but I did something I've never done before and it honestly made me proud. I've been on kind of a high since Sunday. I have been talking to girls and not getting scared to open because I'm so under the radar using some of the lines you taught me as well reframing it that my interest was just not sexual during the day. I'll write more later this week as I just got back from a date, and I do need your advice moving to the Bang. Your book will probably answer it for me, but I won't get a chance to read it until this weekend.

FALNUC is an mneumonic I made up for when it's time to get the number. Each letter stands for something. It's a bit involved but it increases rapport while reducing the liklihood of a flake.

> The workshop lasts about 8 hours, of which roughly the first several are spent going over the theory and the material, and the the remainder is spent in bookshops, grocery stores, clothing stores and other usual places people go to during the day.
>
> Although the material can be pretty dry, things pick up quickly when pickup attempts are made. Roosh has a pretty clear idea of what works and what doesn't and is an encyclopedia of experience. Perhaps my attention span is too short, but while I found it difficult to absorb the written material, once it was demonstrated in practice a structure was developed and then honed in on.
>
> Roosh does a good job of keeping things fun, humorous, and informative. Overall I would recommend this experience to anyone.
>
> Pros: Asking Roosh all sorts of questions about lots of aspects of the game.
>
> Cons: Sitting for a lecture for several hours is why I go to school.

The most common complaint I have is the initial 2-3 hours where students are listening to me talk. I'm aware of this but I don't want to put students in tough situations without preparing them beforehand. The material takes time to explain, and it should because it's not easy. Here's another comment about that:

> I didn't like the amount of time we spent at Starbucks. We were there for about three hours just looking over your packet. It reminded me of school, and so my > mind began to wander. I thought we should have been thrown into the fire immediately. If we had left earlier, we might have seen some hotter women.

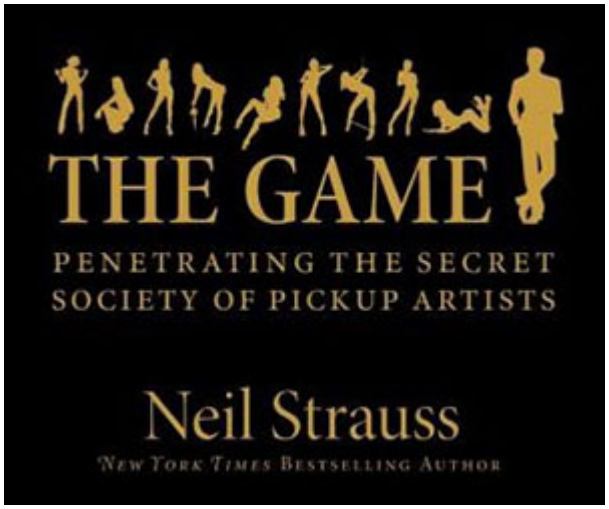
>
> As far as you analyzing our approaches, that was the best part of the workshop. The nuggets of information you fed me were very useful.
>
> Overall, it was an experience that has numbed me from the nervousness of approaching.

This student had the type of personality where he liked a challenge, but most guys would be traumatized if "thrown into the fire." In a perfect world I would give students personality quizzes before the workshop and pair them up with someone like them.

Here are the previous things I've written about the workshop:

- Day Game Workshop Overview
- Workshop Recaps
- The Most Thrilling Workshop Ever

I teach these on Saturday's now. If you're interested email me at roosh@rooshv.com with "workshop" in the subject.



The Sweet Spot

March 3, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

American girls fall into four age ranges. One of those is most ideal for dating. Note that this only applies to American girls.

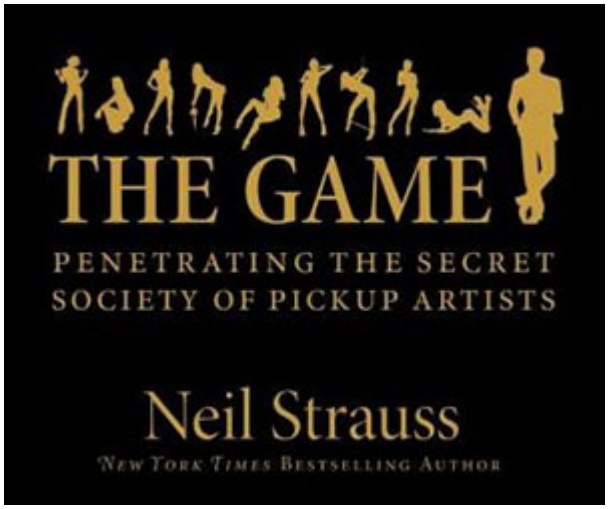
18-21: She is child-like and mostly intolerable. Her speech sounds like another language. She will only have sex when completely trashed, and has few redeeming qualities beyond her body. Says a lot of things that make you think you're wasting your time. Best game to use: jealousy.

22-24: By now she has had at least a dozen cocks of experience and knows how to handle yours expertly in bed (a good thing). Her game is developing but she still makes a lot of "mistakes" by being affectionate and showing interest. Says a lot of things which reveal her vulnerability. Best game to use: mysterious, aloof, emotionally unavailable.

25-28: Begins to take herself too seriously. She tries to emulate celebrities or characters in television or movies. Friends are settling down with boyfriends and she decides to step up her game by playing hard to get, which comes across as cold and stiff instead of coquettish. Says a lot of things that make you roll your eyes. Best game to use: asshole, dick.

29+: Refuses to be put out to pasture. Once realizing she will die alone, she clings to her paper-pushing career as the purpose she has been looking for all along. She is still hopeful she will meet her doctor stud, and refuses to lower her standards to real market value (think dilapidated foreclosure property). Says a lot of things that make you laugh (at her). Best game to use: why bother?

American girls really aren't so bad if you stick in the 22-24 age range. The exception is girls who are in law school or want to be lawyers. Those girls have the ambitious, goal-oriented, and calculating brains of men. Whatever trait that makes a woman unattractive, they got it.



Slumdog Millionaire Is A Stupid Movie

March 4, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Let's start with the good. The premise of using a game show to tell a story is excellent. In terms of device effectiveness it approaches "Rosebud" in Citizen Cane. It's the execution, in the form of a horrible script, that makes it a stupid movie.

Minor Problems

-Plays into every single poverty stereotype known to man. This is no surprise since the original story was written by an Indian expat who lived in Western countries.

-The game show questions chronologically match Jamil's life perfectly.

-Presence of M.I.A. Paris Hilton can sing better than her. The one reason I think she is popular is because of the catchy hook in "Paper Planes."

-How do slumdogs learn English on the streets? It would have been more authentic if the whole movie was in Hindi, which I think is a nice language. I don't really go for Indian girls though.

-Awkwardly placed subtitles. I shouldn't have to search for them.

-Too many scenes where I had to suspend disbelief. A blind boy recognized someone he had a fleeting encounter many years earlier? A first name is enough to find a girl in a city of 14 million people? An older brother who would do anything to protect his younger brother suddenly has a change of heart for a piece of ass? A little boy changed into an elaborate costume, pained himself blue, gathered religious props, and then wandered aimlessly in middle of sectarian violence? Police who wouldn't at least flinch that a man is burning right before them? A new millionaire who was watched by everyone in India sits sad and lonely in a train station? Brother pulls out three suitcases of bills from his back pocket? One boy vomits when he sees a kid get his eyes burned out, but another remains cheerful and happy when he's dipped in human feces? Etc etc.

Major Problems

-Calling people slumdogs. This is a made-up term made up by white people. It is not what poor Indians call other poor Indians. I don't know how they got away with this. I can't even call a girl "spinster" in real life without getting dirty looks.

-The older brother. After building himself up as a serious hood and reaping all the money rewards that come with that lifestyle, he abruptly decides to off himself. So he finds redemption while his pathetic brother gets the girl and the money, and because he prayed once on screen we're supposed to believe he really has a heart of gold. Come on, that role is usually played by a prostitute.

-Wholly unrealistic. The beautiful girl would never, ever go for the pathetic, obsessed chump with not a scrap of personality. The main character is just too unlikable. I never wanted him to win, and I never wanted him to get the girl. In real life she would have felt quite privileged to be married to an rich ogre who puts her up in a luxury mansion.

Instead she goes after the guy who looks more like a loser kid she's babysitting. There is not a single scene which explains her love for him.

I must state that I had a bit of a bias going in. Way too many white people were stroking this movie's dick, warning me it may be overhyped. The last time this amount of white people loved a movie was Crash, a steaming pile of contrived, patronizing dogshit.

In the end Slumdog Millionaire is a great movie for people who don't watch foreign movies but want to say they watched a foreign movie. If you want to see a good movie that gives a respectful portrait of the plight of India's poor, rent Salaam Bombay.

If you're a Bollywood director then I'm sorry, unless you Westernize your movies you will never see success in English-speaking countries.

Cougar Club

March 8, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Dear Dude,

I need to tell you what happened the other night at the club. I was standing in the middle of the bar, minding my own business, when your girl walked by and gave me a little smile. She stopped near me and then out of instinct I said something about her being in my dancing space (since I need a lot of space to "show off my moves"), and she laughed and asked me what my name was. Eventually she ran back to her friends and I went back to standing and staring. About an hour later, while I'm still at the bar watching my friend get sloppy with some Ohioan transplant, guess who walks up to me? She said, "I just wanted to say goodbye," but here's the thing: she wasn't leaving. That was just a line.

I noticed some rather deep wrinkles around her eyes. I looked at your girl and I said, "Be honest, how old are you?" She said 31, which as you know is a lie. How old is she really? 36? I don't call her out because the fact that she is lying means the aging process is already traumatic for her. I also noticed the huge rock you gave her, which sparkled when hit by club lights rotating on pods attached to the ceiling. It's so nice of you to buy her such a pretty ring. You must have a good job.

I wasn't in the mood to dance so I let her rub up next to me. I touched your girl on her shoulder, her back, her waist, the top of her ass. Not once did she pull back. Her body was a little soft but not too bad; I can tell she makes the effort to hit the gym about once a week (though remind her that to tone up that ass there is nothing better than the stairmaster). Her friends lingered around but they were extremely trashed and wouldn't have noticed if your girl did anything with me or any other guy in the bar. What a pathetic sight you missed!—five women rapidly approaching 40 stumbling around the bar like hungry dogs, doing anything to get their face licked by a younger guy. But you know what though? For being over 35 your girl doesn't look bad. She's bangable, at least.

It got a little interesting because while I was talking to your future wife this other old bitch starts gawking at me. She probably thought that since I was talking to one oldie I'd get with another, as if I was a member of the cougar club or something. They didn't know that I strongly prefer girls under 25. (There was that 32-year-old I fucked three weeks ago but her body was just so curvy yet petite that I couldn't resist. I never called her after we smashed though.)

I take a break from your girl to talk to the new cougar, and get this, she actually brags that she dates younger guys. Like that's going to make me want her cellulite ass even more! I get tired of her because she was trying to attract me by showing off her supreme confidence (as if I value that), and went back to your girl, whose attention I still had. The fact that I talked to another girl didn't hurt my cause. I looked at your girl and I said, "So are we making out or what?" If I really wanted to kiss her I would never reveal my cards in such a way—I just wanted to see how she would respond.

“No we’re not, but if I were to make out with a guy in this club tonight it’d be you.” How sweet, no? I looked at her and said, “Well, it’s obvious to me that you are breakable, but…”

And then something catches my eye. It’s a much younger girl standing six feet in front of me. Nice body, so-so face. She was with a friend who was dancing with some guy, meaning she was either lonely or bored and would be pretty open if I went up to her. It was an easy decision. I walk towards her before finishing my sentence, because your girl is not worth it. Not even for a sloppy make out. And you’re going to marry her. What a stupid fuck you are.

Sincerely,

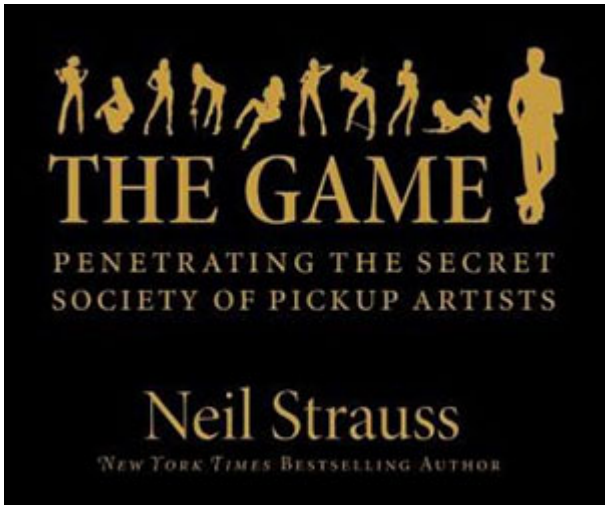
Roosh

Famous Betas In The Wild

March 10, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

“I used to feel so alone in the city. All those gazillions of people and then me, on the outside. Because how do you meet a new person? I was very stumped by this for many years. And then I realized, you just say “Hi.” They may ignore you. Or you may marry them. And that possibility is worth that one word.”
-Augusten Burroughs, author of Running With Scissors

It took him “many years” to get the courage to say hi to someone. What’s sadder is that he’s a best selling author, meaning people identify with him. The average person is a coward.



Roosh Reality Workshop

March 11, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

To make some extra money I'm now offering the Roosh Reality Workshop every Monday starting next week. For one day you can say goodbye to your boring cubicle life and live the excitement that is my life.

Tour Itinerary

12:00pm: You arrive at my Dad's house. My stepmother will let you in. Go straight downstairs and into my room. I'll be snuggled deep in my toasty bed, waiting for you (not like that).

12:15: Time for breakfast. We will dine on a peanut butter and jelly sandwich on whole wheat, my favorite food, and a crispy apple. Then we read the paper for half-an-hour, shaking our heads at government incompetence and abuse of power. This meal is included in the workshop.

1:00: We will lay out newspapers on the floor and sink of my bathroom and do what I call "hair management." Depending on growth, the following areas will be trimmed: underarm, beard, back of neck, sideburns, nose hair, ear hair, and pubes.

1:15: Shower, but body only. I have to be in the right mood to wash my hair.

1:30: Ride bikes to nearest Starbucks a half-mile away. If you didn't bring a bike then you can use my little brother's. It has a horn. At Starbucks we will get a drink and then sit down at my favorite table. You will watch me write and I will encourage you to do the same. If you don't have a laptop then I can give you pen and paper. Three hours in we will take a snack break. I recommend the multi-grain bagel which only costs a buck. Your Starbucks purchases are NOT included in the workshop.

7:00: Dinner time at the house. You will enjoy Persian homecooking and real hospitality. My brothers will annoy you but you will find them cute. All silence once Seinfeld comes on at 7:30.

8:00: Time to wind down with a book in the living room. We will sit and read for two hours.

10:00: Movie time. We will watch a foreign and/or independent movie. None of that Hollywood garbage. Even if the movie is in English I will still leave on the subtitles because I don't want to miss anything. I believe many people don't understand the movies that they watch because they miss intricacies present in the dialogue.

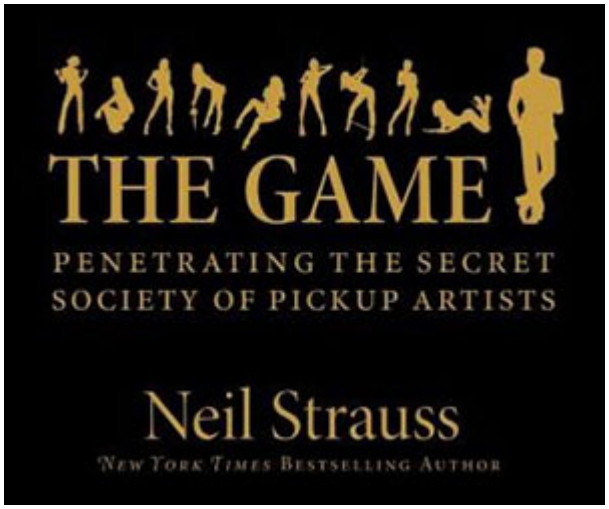
12:00am: Internet time. You get to watch me schedule a mediocre post for the future, and listen to me whine about how I've lost the passion to blog. I'll put on some Brazilian music and you'll feel worldly.

2:00: Jerk time. You watch me jerk off to porn. Right now I'm heavily into black on blondes but I'm feeling a transition soon to legal teens who look like minors. You can join me if you want, but none of that gay touching shit.

I'm pricing this tour at only $69, and that includes complete Roosh access to ask me whatever you want. I won't be in the basement forever, so email roosh@rooshv.com with "reality" in the subject line if you're interested. Add $10 if you want me to provide you with a fresh cum rag. This workshop is open to guys and girls.

POSTSCRIPT: Slots for the next six Mondays are fully booked. I'll post again when space opens up.

POSTSCRIPT 2: Jeez people this is a joke. Please stop emailing me if I have a spot open.



The Secret To Getting Laid

March 15, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Women are a fickle bunch. One minute they want to fuck you, the next minute they won't bother to return your calls. Placing your bets on one girl is a poor strategy because the conversion rate to sex is extremely low.

The temptation for some guys is to sit back and take occasional shots at the girls they especially want. So a guy has no prospects, gets one, fails with her, and then goes back to having no prospects. This strategy has two consequences: his game remains in a state of rustiness and he gets overly excited at the prospects that do come his way. With no harem to keep his cock golden and ego elevated, he devotes all his mental energy into one girl at a time. Bad, needy game leaks out as a result.

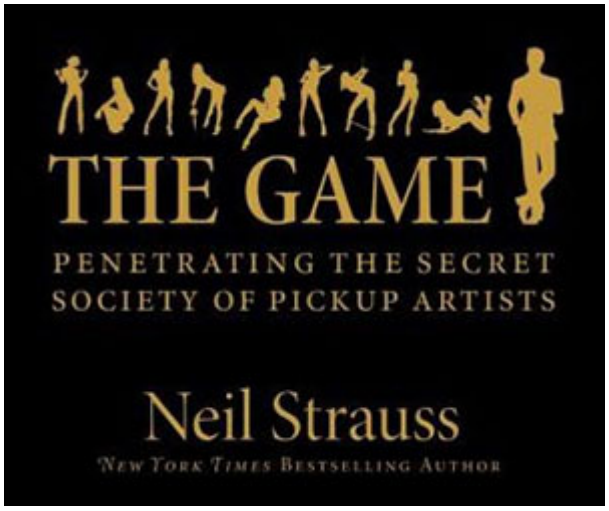
If you want to have sex with one girl, you must do X number of approaches, get Y numbers, go on Z dates, and so on, where Z is less than Y is less than X. A certain number of attempts equals one lay, and that number will always be greater than one, sometimes significantly so. Tell me how many fresh prospects are in your phone and where your game is at and I'll tell you how many notches you'll get in the next month.

One reason for this is because lays are the product of momentum, not one-shot deals. It's similar to surfing. A surfer waits for hours for that nice wave, resigned every now and then to catch the duds. But he definitely doesn't enter the water and catch a big one right away (unless Poseidon is smiling down on him). If he wants to catch ten good waves he allots several hours in the water. If you want to bang one quality girl, you must approach a ton of girls—about as many that fit in the back of a dump truck.

"But Roosh, what's the purpose of game if I have to deal with a lot of girls who are not my first choice?"

When you first get in the game your prospects will be mediocre or ghastly. Only the ghastly ones will come through. Then after some time a mediocre girl will open her legs for you. Your prospects gradually improve until some really cute girls enter your pool. Even hot girls if your game is tight. You bang a quality girl every now and then, one that you entered the game for, but your prospect pool will never consist entirely of hot girls. Years into the game you may still service the occasional biggie. I don't care how hot that guy's girl is, but it's a certainty he has banged trolls in his day, and may occasionally continue to do so to keep the beast tamed.

The secret to getting laid is old fashioned hard work. Get your ass out in the field, approach in large numbers, get that experience, build momentum, and it's almost impossible not to lay a variety of women. Reading blogs or books is fine to learn from the experience of other men, but unless you do the actual work yourself you will never be good. You'll be the business professor who can talk about theory all day but has never actually run a business in his life, while college dropouts are running billion-dollar companies.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Girls Who Write Poetry

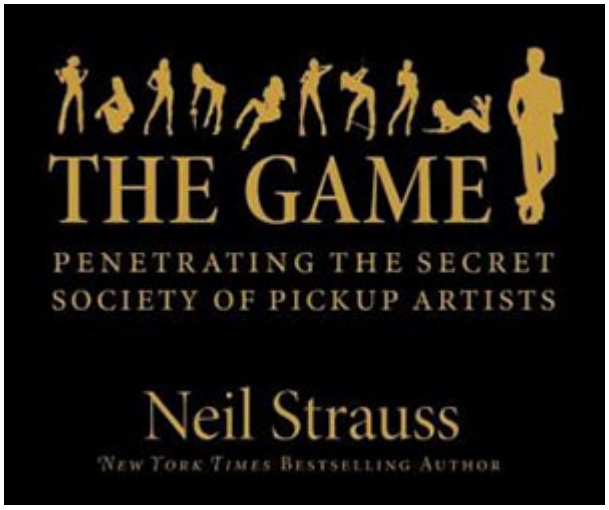
March 17, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm nobody! Who are you?
Are you nobody, too?
Then there's a pair of us—don't tell!
They'd banish us, you know.

How dreary to be somebody!
How public, like a frog
To tell your name the livelong day
To an admiring bog!

—The deranged Emily Dickinson

If a girl tells you she writes poetry, or God-forbid she actually tries to recite you some of her poetry, run. Run hard and run fast because she is dramatic and unstable. Poetry is a form of ambiguous, obtuse communication, and a girl who takes to creating it is one that will be especially unable to serve a man's principal need of easygoing, drama-free companionship. The most damaged and insane girls I've met have considered themselves budding poets. You were warned.



Facebook The Game Killer

March 22, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

At first I thought it was a neat idea that other people could upload photos of me and then tag them so everyone else could see. For some Facebook users, especially girls, this feature makes them feel like a famous celebrity, and their friends the paparazzi. Hey look, that girl I banged two years ago went to the beach with some dude, and that other girl went on some farm and milked a cow. Awesome. But then I began to wonder why I'd want people I haven't hung out with in a while to see what I'm doing.

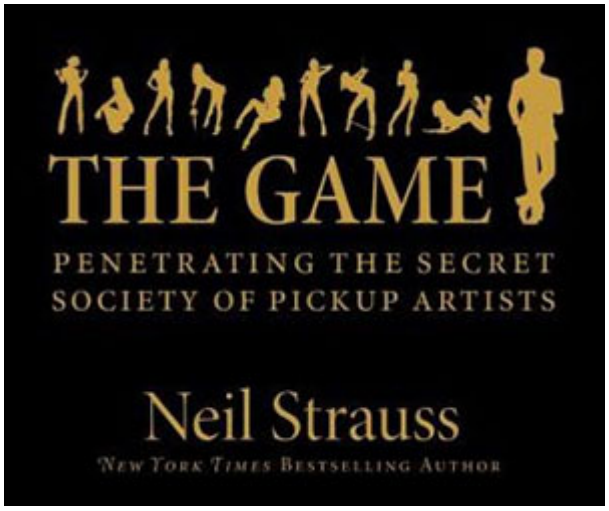
At first I thought it was a cool idea that I could see what one of my friends writes on another friend's wall. It would just pop up right there when I loaded the home page, that my buddy from Ireland is about to visit the guy from England who puked on my hostel bed in Uruguay. I could read when and where they are meeting up. But then I began to wonder why I'd want people I haven't hung out in a while know who I'm talking to.

At first I thought it was a fun idea to have status updates. I can see what my friends are thinking, what restaurant or club they're on their way to, and how they feel about a recent television program. Even if I haven't talked to them in months, I feel like I'm right there with them, like when we used to meet face-to-face. But then I began to wonder why I'd want people I haven't hung out with in a while to know the details of my life.

Even worse, why would I want a girl I'm trying to bang, who searched and found me on Facebook, know what I'm doing, who I'm talking to, and the details of my life? How can that possibly help me get into her pants? It doesn't, so I locked it down. I don't allow others to view tagged photos of me or write on my wall. My status updates are generic and lame, and give you no idea of the places I'm spending my time at.

It's too easy and comfortable for a girl to keep tabs on you without having to actually interact with you. Now if a girl goes through Roosh-withdrawal she'll have to put some effort into asking me via message or email, possibly giving me the opportunity to reel her in for a real encounter that results in sex. And she'll have no idea that a girl I banged the night before just tagged a shirtless photo of me taking a massive dump in her bathroom.

I like to be mysterious.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

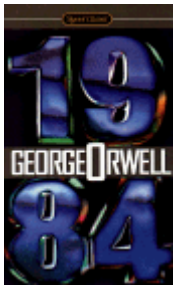
More Books 2

March 24, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY: Top 10 Most Important Books & More Books

“All I ask of life is a bunch of books, a bunch of dreams, and a bunch of cunt.”
—Tropic Of Cancer

Here are some quick thoughts on books I’ve read in the past year or so, from best to worst.

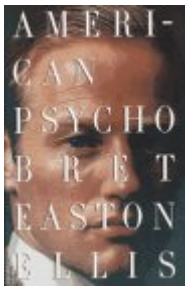


1984

George Orwell is my hero.

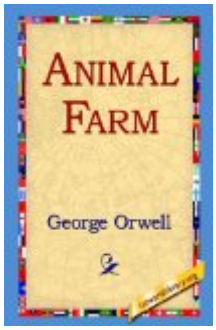
The Unbearable Lightness Of Being

A beautiful, philosophical novel about love, choice, and death.



American Psycho

Incredible writing, though extremely disturbing (hungry rat trapped inside a woman’s vagina that was filled with blue cheese, etc.). For a good laugh tell a feminist this is your favorite book of all time.

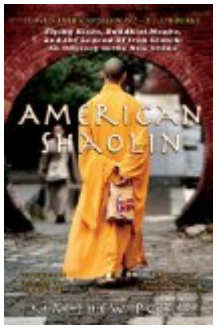


Animal Farm

Good stepping stone to 1984. Short book that you can read for free (along with 1984).

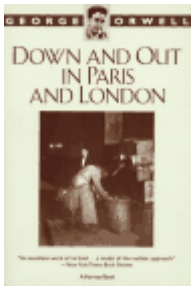
The Jungle

Page turner with the biggest underdog character in modern literature. Poor Jurgis.



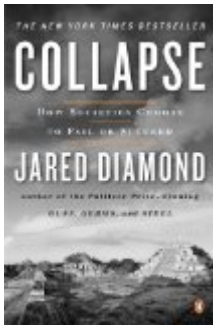
American Shaolin

Hilarious memoir of a plucky white guy who moves to China to train with shaolin masters.



Down And Out In London And Paris

Gritty story of a man surviving in Europe’s underworld. Semi-autobiographical.



Collapse

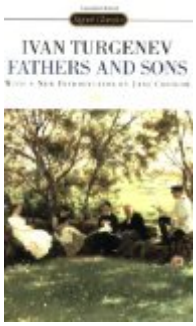
Attempts to answer why past civilizations failed. Author's evidence suggests it's almost always due to environmental problems. Long but enjoyable.

The Rum Diaries

Good read, especially if you like to drink.

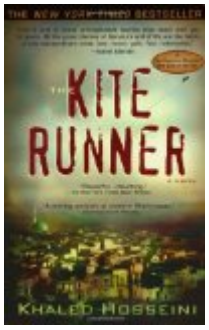
Into The Wild

Interesting story about a young man who gives up all his money and possessions for a long trip that ends with his death in the Alaska wilderness. Was he courageous or stupid?



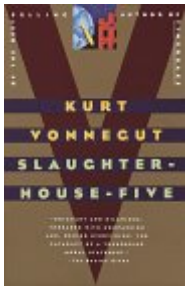
Fathers and Sons

19th century Russian novel about feudalism, youth, rebellion, and love. Decent.



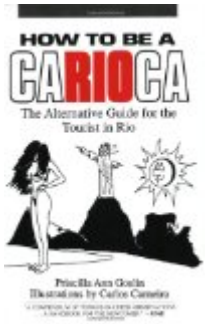
The Kite Runner

Starts off strong but fades into silliness.



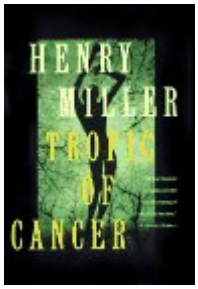
Slaughterhouse Five

War book whose most compelling passages were about alien abduction.



How To Be A Carioca

Slightly dated expose into the culture of Brazilians, particularly those who live in Rio do Janeiro. Contains handy phrases full of slang.

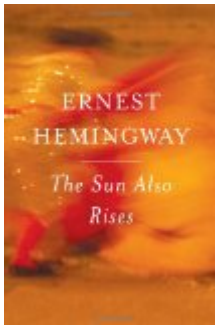


Tropic Of Cancer

A stream of consciousness diary of a man slumming it in Paris. Writing is incredible but if you need a plot then this book is definitely not for you.

Fight Club

The only book I have read where the movie was better. Skip.

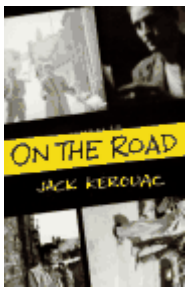


The Sun Also Rises

It had a couple moments, but mostly a snoozefest.

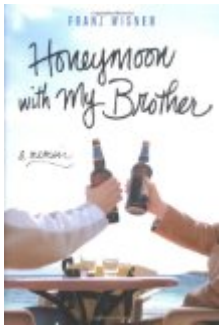
One Day In The Life Of Ivan Denisovich

What a slog. Hated it.



On The Road

The most tedious book I've ever read in my life. Cheesy dialogue and characters. I dare you to finish it.



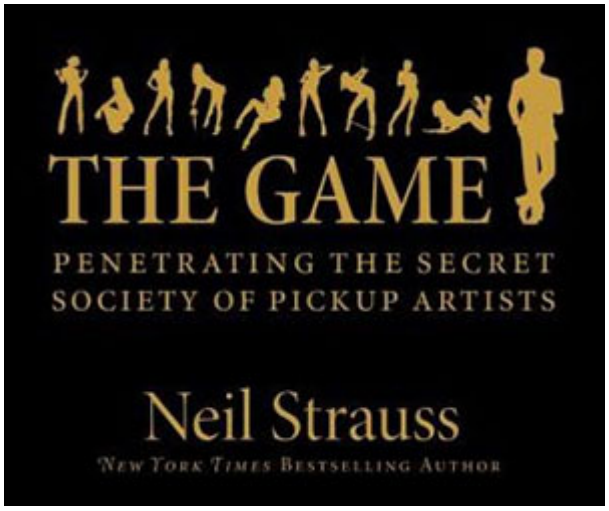
Honeymoon With My Brother

The main character couldn't stop whining about how his fiance dumped him. Get over it loser.

The Art Of Travel

If the art of travel can only be figured out by going to the Bahamas with your girlfriend then I'm doing it all wrong. Utter tripe.

Book recommendations are most welcome.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Bad Girl Game: Transparency

March 26, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It was a Sunday afternoon when I was leaving the house of a girl I met the previous night. We didn't have sex. On my way out I suggested that we grab a drink some time. She said, "Oh, I'm a very busy girl though."

"Mmhmm that's cool. When is the next night you are free then?" I asked.

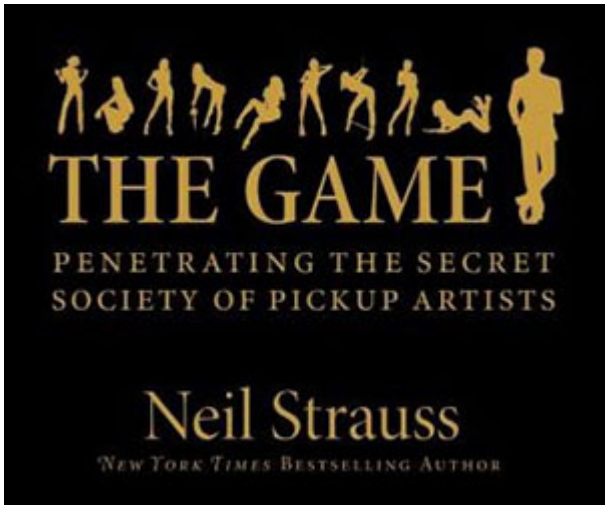
"Well I'm not doing anything later."

"Tonight? No I can't. It's family night… my dad cooks a feast every Sunday. How about Tuesday?"

"Umm Tuesday let me think. Yeah I guess I can do Tuesday," she said, in a tone that made it sound like she was doing me a favor.

On Monday night I sent her a text message asking if we were still good for Tuesday night. She said, "Sure, or Wednesday too if that's better for you."

So the self-described "busy" girl was free on three of four subsequent nights. If you're going to play the game, then play it right. Otherwise you look like an idiot.



The Dark Side

March 29, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Sleeping with a ton of women has some mental consequences that aren't ususally talked about. Here are four things that I have noticed:

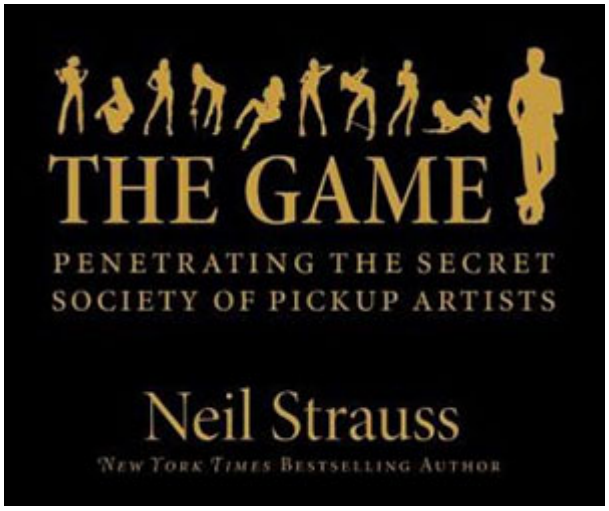
Inability to view women as equal human beings. My default opinion of any girl I meet is "worthless dirty whore until proven otherwise." When so many girls have opened their legs up for me so quickly and easily, it's hard for me to respect them (and their opinions or ideas) like I would a family member or close friend. I think this is leaking out into other areas of life as someone pointed out to me that I seem to read books written only by men.

Decreasing ability to sympathize and empathize with the female condition. Because I learned early on that talking to a girl about her problems or issues is the fastest way out of her pants, it's become habit for me to simply nod or say "That sucks" when a girl has a genuine problem, even one that I can help solve. I have no desire to help a girl out with her life, and I don't care if she falls flat on her face.

Decreasing patience to work things out. I don't give a girl more than one chance to act "right" because it's so easy to find a new whore at the bar. My ability to stay in a long-term relationship, putting up with its natural ups and downs, is evaporating as I adopt the mentality of a dictator, with my bitch the subservient who must attend to my needs without making any mistakes. Over the years my temper has greatly shortened.

Decreasing view of sex as a beautiful act of love. Sex is a mechanical means for me to relieve the pressure building up in my sack and nothing more, one small step above jerking off with my tight-gripped hand. I do not feel any closer to a girl when I pump her, and most of the time I respect her less because my opinion of her as a worthless dirty whore who probably likes being choked was proven correct.

The only way I see to reverse these consequences is to step out of the game completely and go through a massive cold streak that makes me value a woman again, to see her as something important that I need. Since I don't see this happening, the odds that I will meet a new girl who I genuinely care for and maybe even love will be about the same as me winning the grand prize of a scratch ticket lottery game. And I'm fine with that. For now.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Time For A New Trip

March 31, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Well I have failed to finish my second book in the year I gave myself. It's been 14 months and I have no book. For it to be Pulitzer Prize worthy I'm going to have to hack at it for several more months, maybe even a year.

There was a time I rationalized staying here because I was saving money, but I've saved all the money I need and it's time to move on. I gave my dad a month's notice and he jumped up and down pretending to celebrate, but I know deep down inside he's quite upset.

The obvious choice is to go to Colombia and finish the journey I started in 2007 before I pussied out. My Spanish is pretty decent and I can return to trying to get laid while having diarrhea, but you know what? Been there, done that.

I don't want it to sound like I'm getting soft, because I'm not, but I'm tired of not having any conceivable reason to wake up every afternoon. I've decided my existence would be less shallow if I do something that has meaning and positively contributes to society. I looked on my world map and picked a country where not only can I do a lot of good, but stand out enough to easily slay the local woman.

I'm going to Ethiopia. I fly to Addis Ababa for three months on Earth Day, April 22. (I picked this date on purpose for symbolic reasons.) I will be volunteering at an orphanage to take care of youngsters who've lost their parents. This is a logical move for me since I have two little brothers and am very experienced in applying discipline on kids who get out of line and talk back. I don't like to take out the belt but sometimes you got to or else the little bastards run all over you.

No I'm kidding, I'm not going to beat the kids, but I will not hesitate to use an elevated vocal tone when the four-month-old I'm feeding is crying even after he's been burped, fed, and changed. Not only will I make a difference but I'll also get my Ethiopian flag out of the way, and then when I return back to DC all I have to do to get bang stupid white girls who work at non-profits is tell them I saved starving African kids. For my Facebook profile photo I'm going to have someone take a picture of me bottle feeding the most sickly kid in the orphanage, looking deep into his big sad eyes with a look of both hope and despair. Hopefully there will be a fly resting right on his eyeball, though if not I can photoshop it in later.

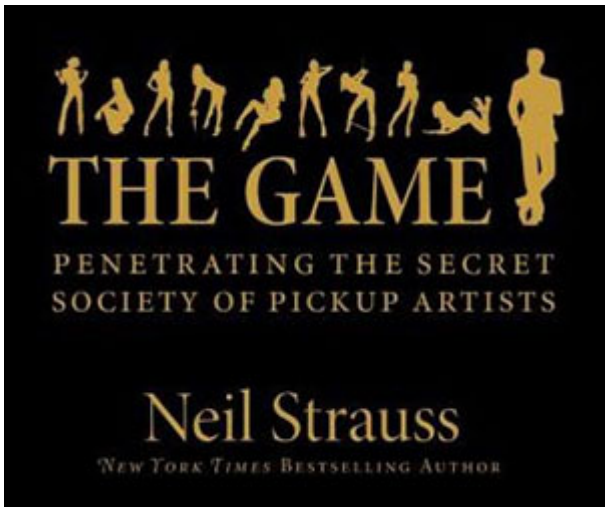
Take that haters. In one swoop my life now has ten times more meaning than your material existence working in cubicles. While you continue to destroy the environment with your first-class lifestyle, I'll be nurturing life into those who aren't as fortunate. Say shit to me now…



She Knows About The Blog

April 5, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's very unnerving when I'm out on a date with a random girl and she says something which strongly implies that she knows about my blog. In the past few months I feel like it's happening with every girl. The only response I have come up with is to twiddle my thumbs uncomfortably.

I had a first date where the girl said, "You must be able to save a lot of money since you live at home." Problem was I hadn't yet gotten to that part yet—I never told her my living situation. I asked her how she could have possibly known. She insisted I did tell her, but telling a girl that I live with my dad is such a "big deal" that I always know when, where, and how I brought it up.

On another first date I told the girl that I hang out a lot at coffee shops and she made a comment that I had a "brooding" coffee shop look. Then she said, "You must have good coffee shop game." I've never, ever heard a girl utter the phrase "coffee shop game" in my life. Plus this date took place soon after I first announced my day game workshop.

Another first date. I brought up my South America trip when the girl asked, "So while you were in South America, did you blog about it?" Not conclusive, you're probably thinking. Well, out of the dozens of times I talked about my trip before, getting asked if I blogged about it has never come up—not once. There's a million other questions to ask first, like what countries I visited, how long I stayed, what were the highlights, etc.

Another girl. The morning after we met she asked, "So do you live with your Mom?" I told her I didn't, since I don't, but then she asked again. I looked at her and said, "Is there something you want to tell me?" She said no. Then on a future date she slipped two more times. First, when I told her I had two younger brothers, she said something to the effect of, "Aww chubby brothers are cute."

"How do you know they are chubby?" I snapped. (One way to know is the photos that I have put up on the blog.)

Her answer was unsatisfactory: "Oh little boys are always chubby."

The charade continued, but first let me tell you what two of my groupies did recently. They hit me up on Facebook, properly stroked my ego, and then met up with me one night at a bar. One of the first things they asked me was for their rating on the 1-10 scale. (From time to time I get emails with pictures attached asking this as well). I refused, just because it's too weird, and that was that. Well my date, while laying in bed, asked me to rate her. She fished by saying, "I'm a 6, right?" A girl that doesn't know about my blog would never bring up her rating.

There were one more peculiar incident, in Brazil, of all places. I'm in a cab with my date (our second), when she randomly she asked, "Do you have a blog?" At least she was direct about it.

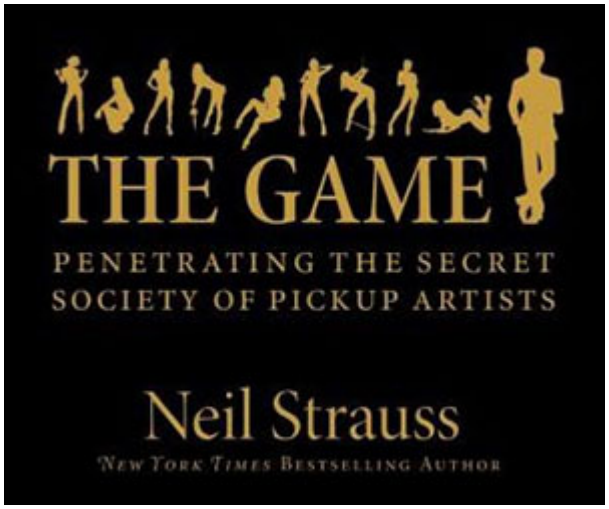
Here's something one of my students told me:

> In Entourage the actor Jeremy Piven plays Ari, and in a recent interview he said that girls he meets never admits that they know him from the show. But every now and then they accidentally call him Ari instead of Jeremy, and then quickly tries to play it off.

Not counting the Brazilian, three out of four girls I mentioned got my attention first. They either made strong eye contact or approached me outright. Based on what I know about the female gender, I'm forced to conclude one thing:

Besides generic compliments, girls are reluctant to do things which announce a man's value. By bringing up my blog, a girl is admitting that she is a fan or a follower (one stop short of a stalker), and this decreases her value relative to mine. It's not in their best game interests to reveal that they know me. So they don't.

What's irritating to me is that even after a girl slips badly, she still doesn't admit it. But I know how I'm going to deal with it from this point on. I'm going to ask her so what's your favorite post, and she's going to give this fake, confused look, and I'll fuck her anyway, because if it mattered she wouldn't be out with me in the first place. But it won't happen since in only sixteen days I'll be in Ethiopia.



Bad Girl Game: “I Like To Move Slow”

April 7, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previously: Transparency

I never tell a girl that my average bang happens on date 1.1. Instead I run normal game and break down the resistance like a merciless Israeli commando fighter. If I were to tell a girl on the first date “I like to move fast” then I’ve shown all my cards. Her pussy shield will increase and make my glorious sex goal that much more difficult.

So why do girls make verbal declarations of their desire to go slow? If I’m proceeding in a seduction and she is resisting, I don’t mind because it’s part of the game, but when she tells me she likes going slow on the first date I’m forced to do an immediate cost-benefit analysis to see if she’s worth investing one more minute of time into. On the other hand, if she went slow anyway without saying it then I would have no preconceptions and the psychology of previous investment would keep me chasing well after I had originally planned.

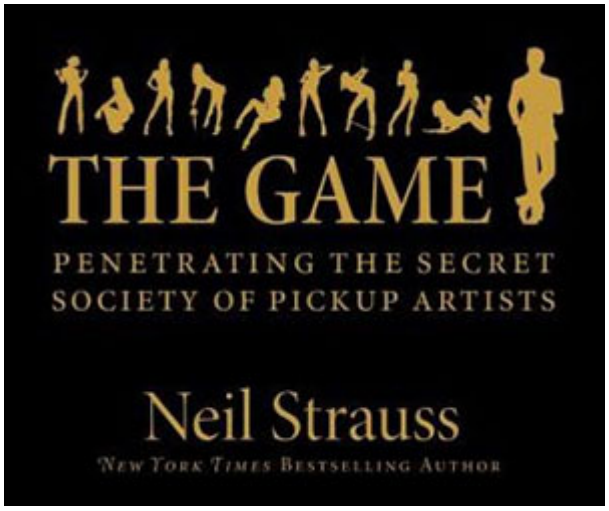
It happened the other week when this girl knew I was going to Ethiopia soon to volunteer at a crumbling orphanage. She told me she wanted to move slow and I just laughed it off but she meant it as I would soon find out and I wondered why she was out on a date with me if that was the case. It’s rude to lead on a man like that.

Since no value is conveyed when a girl says the line, I’m forced to believe that girls are too lazy to stop and think about game like a superior man would. Next time a girl criticizes a man’s lines, just remind them of theirs, like this one that I still hear: I don’t usually do this.

Yeah…

I don’t…

either.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

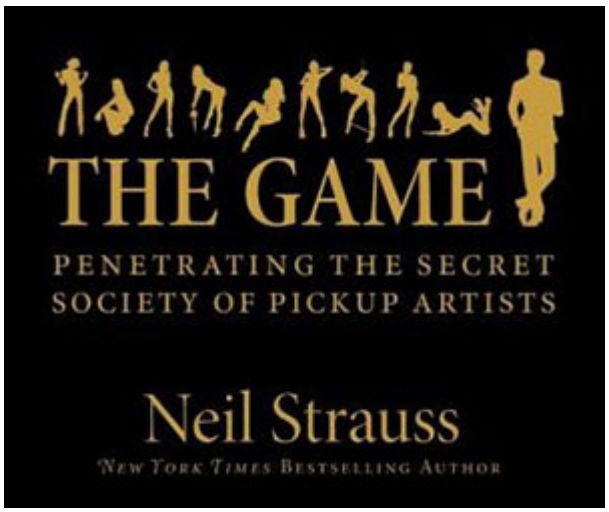
Roosh V Reader Survey (Of Fun)

April 9, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I made up a survey that includes a couple dozen questions about you and what you think of the blog, including what you want to see more of. I'm hoping this will help me decide what direction to take things. I have a feeling you guys want me to write more about economics and politics but I'm not completely sure so that's a reason I made the survey. Your identity remains anonymous as IP addresses aren't logged and I don't ask for your email address. To keep you awake I threw in colorful questions like number ten.

I will share aggregate data later, especially for the more fun questions. Take the Roosh V Survey (Of Fun).

Postscript: Survey is closed!



My Most Talented Student

April 12, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I congratulated Pete on the third number he received from a girl at the bookstore. I told him that it will be very hard for another student to get four numbers to break his record, but to be sure he should get one more so that his record remains in the history books for just about eternity. “No one is going to get five numbers,” I told him. He pulled his fourth number on the subway a little while later.

I can tell how good my students are by the end of the introductory conversations I have with them. If they give rich answers full of explanation and are generally chatty it’s a very good sign they will do well during the workshop. Two weeks after Pete’s performance I noticed that my new student, Tyler, had that natural chattiness skill, even going out of his way to build rapport with the other student in the workshop.

After the lecture portion was over, the three of us ventured from one venue to the next. The guys approached while I timed their conversations and took notes. Even though I sensed that Tyler had the innate talent, he did poorly in his first handful of approaches, running out of gas early in the conversation. I pulled him aside and said, “There is no reason why you shouldn’t have two numbers in your pocket right now instead of none. You’re fucking sleeping out there. How bad do you want it?” Some guys need fires lit under their asses because penetrating vagina can be too far down the road to serve as immediate motivation while out there on the field.

Through teaching workshops I have learned that being nice and encouraging like a grade school teacher does not translate into real world improvement. For an immediately jump in performance I bring out a healthy dose of disapproval, insult, abuse, and humiliation, which all act as a NOS nitrous boost for men.

My lashing worked because at our next venue, an H&M, he got two numbers, one upstairs and one downstairs. No guy has gotten two numbers in the same place before. He opened indirectly, stayed in the conversation, kept rambling on, built intrigue by tossing out bait, and then went for the number. Sometimes he stayed on script and sometimes he didn’t, but since he wasn’t appearing desperate I wasn’t getting on him too hard about strategy. He was so pumped that in subsequent approaches girls would tell him they had a serious boyfriend and he’d laugh it off and ask if the boyfriend would mind them hanging out. His desire was burning, like gonorrhea.

At the bookstore he got an email address and then a number. I told him I couldn't count the email address so he still had to get one more number to tie the record. The other student had a what the fuck look on his face and made a comment about Tyler's decent looks, but after doing fourteen of these workshops I knew his appearance was only part of the equation. His ramble and humor was among the best I've ever seen, and Tyler even commented to me that before he got into the game he "didn't get shit."

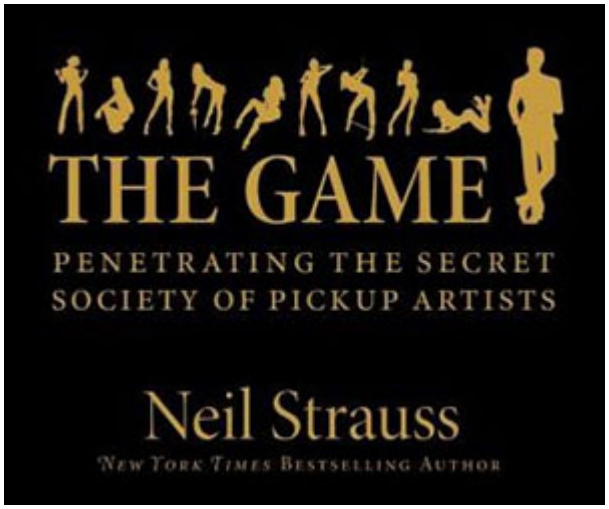
On the subway he got another number, tying the record.

Grocery store was the last venue. "Tyler, I don't mean to put any pressure on you, but if you get one more number you get the record. No one is going to get six numbers." There wouldn't be a post if he didn't get. Out of 17 approaches he got five numbers all from cute, bangable girls for a 29% close rate, and I'm not counting the email address.

What did he do right? He could talk. He could tell if a girl was getting bored with a topic he picked. He was funny. He was interesting because he had done interesting things. He worked out and took care of himself. And he wanted it bad. A hater can flip the equation say he rejected 12 times in a few hours, more times than most guys get rejected in a year, but by playing the numbers game and putting in his dues he's being rewarded for his hard work.

Five years ago I wouldn't have imagined having no prospects and then going out one Saturday afternoon and getting five of them without using money or status. And without having to get cockblocked. My own success and the success of my students has completely convinced me that day game is a sustainable way to meet girls and get laid. As soon as I'm done with my second book, which is inching towards the finish line, I'll start work on adapting my day game manual into a book. It's what the people want.

Tyler wrote about the workshop on his blog. I teach my last two students this Saturday. With these workshops I feel like I've made a positive impact to the world, and now it's time to do the same but in Ethiopia with starving kids instead of horny guys.



Girls Who Write Poetry Update

April 14, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

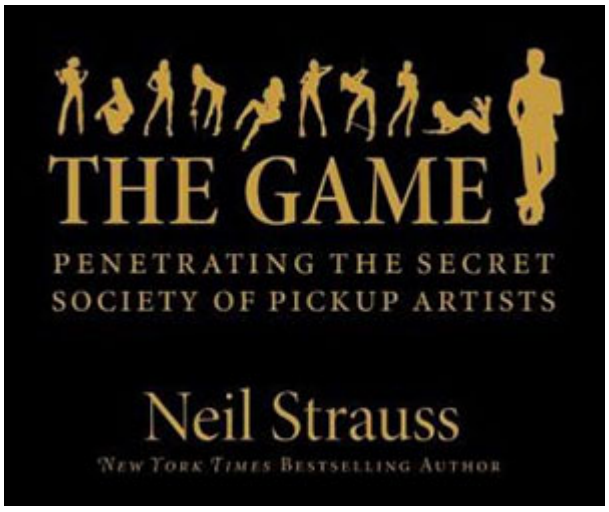
From my post Girls Who Read Poetry:

> The most damaged and insane girls I've met have considered themselves budding poets.

Eight days after I wrote that I went on a first date with a young girl who was half-Asian. As you know I don't have an Asian fetish (I've only been with two), but when I asked her what the Asian half was she got defensive and accused me of having the yellow fever. In her dreams. Anyway she told me that not only does she write poetry, but she organizes "slam recitals" as well. She also said she was going through a feminist stage, saying, "If you really think hard about it, every man has violated a woman not just by rape but by going too fast or too deep during sex." I wonder much longer it will take for feminists to say the act of consensual sex is actually brutal rape.

Immediately after the date she googled me and found out about the blog (a gigantic headache compared to a girl knowing about it beforehand). Surprisingly, she didn't take it well. She left a scathing speech on my voicemail where she sarcastically referred to Bang as a "bestseller" and in so many words telling me to have a nice life on my way to the fiery pits of hell. I saved her message and have since played it for a handful of my students during workshop downtime.

The blog giveth and the blog taketh away. She'll never find out that my fuck style is fast and deep (I learned that if I make a girl's vagina sore, it's a guarantee I'll get a callback for more of that pounding). On a side note, I keep meeting girls who actively write poetry which means I'm doing something to attract the drama queens. I don't know what it is but please someone make it stop.



Open Letter To Poetry Girl

April 15, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Dear Poetry Girl,

Reading your comments in yesterday's post pleased me. I'm happy to see that you still think about me, even in hateful terms, because it's a testament to the strong bond we had going until you found out about my blog.

Do you remember the night we met? You were wearing a yamaka and dancing wildly with your friends in order to get attention from horny men. I leaned against the bar with my drink and watched from a distance, unsure if I wanted to make my presence known. I'll be honest: I wasn't struck by your beauty initially—probably not as much as other men in the club—but there was something indescribable about your presence, your vibe, that piqued my interest.

When you eventually came to the bar I made a comment, not one that can be found in my book Bang, which teaches men how to have sex with piles of female bodies, but a spur of the moment insight that related to what was happening in that particular moment of space-time. We went off to the side away from the disapproving stares of your friends, and sparks flew. You touched my beard and I casually placed my hand on your hip, bringing you to within inches of my face. How my loins longed for you! Your silky as shit black hair and your endearing freckles. Your sweet-smelling supple skin that only a 22-year-old of half-white and half-Asian descent could have. I told you that I was leaving in a month and I could see the crack develop in your heart, but the smile returned to your face when I said I'd be back soon in time for those snuggly winter nights where we would curl up next to each other by my dad's fireplace to sip on fair-trade hot cocoa.

How many minutes passed until our lips first touched? It couldn't have been more than fifteen. The passion was too great, the lust too wild. You told me about 58 times that you don't make out with guys in bars, so imagine how special I felt to be slobbering all over your face, caressing your soft butterfly lips with mine. I wanted to pleasure you that night but alas it was not meant to be, for your friend couldn't drive twenty minutes to her home and instead had to spend the night with you.

I think you'll agree that our first date got off to a rough start when you dared challenge one of my views on life. I let it go as a glitch in the matrix, but you had the audacity to rebut me a second time within earshot of other human beings. I realized that you had a bit of trouble understanding how gender roles work. I poked and I prodded and out it comes that you have been utterly and hopelessly brainwashed by the feminist movement. What a waste of such a pretty little face! Do some research and you will find the only reason women get into feminism is because they can't find a real man to properly ramrod them. Think about it for just one minute. If a woman was getting the good dick every night, would she waste time with other women who bitch and moan about other men? Of course not.

Then you dropped the bomb that you spend a significant portion of your life writing poetry. That's when my heart cracked. I knew that even if I wasn't going to Ethiopia to feed skeletal-like African children, the odds we'd make it past five dates would be extremely low. The reason is simply because your views and drama would come to be about as pleasurable as visits to the tooth removal doctor. But we had the unbridled, wanton passion! Unbridled! Wanton! It would last us as long as it took for us to make sweet love.

Or so I thought.

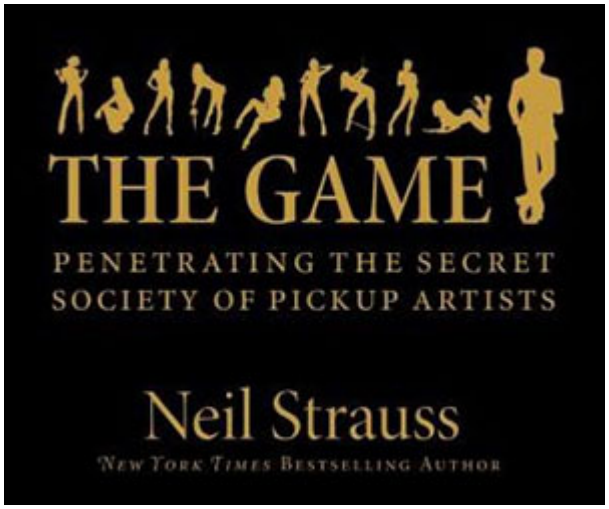
At the end of that first date I gently weaseled my way into your bedroom. I didn't have to twist your arm. You wanted my masculine, hairy body pressed against yours, and what was it you said at the bar? Don't be shy. You said I was irresistible. Yes, do you remember that? I was flattered and still am. In fact you made my ego so big that I have to walk into doorways sideways now.

You wouldn't let me hit that night on your bed. You wouldn't even stroke my dick through my boxers. You have little idea of its well-proportioned head to shaft ratio and the ridiculously strong bulging vein on the underside. I think it's because you're not a slut (snicker—just kidding!). I was ready to wait as long as it took to get to date three when I was certain to hit, but it never happened because you found out about my blog and jumped to conclusions. You hate Bang. I see that know, but the funny thing is, Poetry Girl, I didn't use any game on you. Read my book to prove this to yourself. I didn't have to. You gamed me and I just held on for the ride. Don't deny it.

Look at what you've done to me. It's Wednesday night and I'm typing out this hopelessly romantic missive! Oh Poetry Girl, I just don't want to give up on you. Give me one more chance. Let's go on a coffee shop date and reignite that spark. Then let me beat that pussy up.

Love,

Roosh



Argentine Girls Final Thoughts II

April 19, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY: Argentine Girls Final Thoughts

"Sex is mathematics."
—American Psycho by Bret Easton Ellis

One class of email I get are guys who need advice on how to deal with girls from Argentina. I'm posting parts of one recent email along with my answers.

> Hey, man. I'm from Washingon, DC. I saw your posts a few months ago about Argentinean girls in Córdoba especially, but I happen to be in Buenos Aires. I've been here since June and my game is pretty damn good, but I'd say I have trouble with actually sealing the deal.

I'm nodding my head up and down at this point. I have received dozens of emails with this exact problem.

> For example, tonight I met 32 girls, but I have trouble sealing the deal physically. I touch of course, but still I guess it's hard to get to the kiss. Aparte es dificil convince the chicks that you are the one for them. I'd say I can meet chicks really, really easily, but actually going for it and making sure that we hook up is another thing. And FYI it's not that I'm a pussy and don't escalate etc. For example I touch as mentioned, I mention sex, I suggest "us" in a subtle way, and I try to go for it, but usually end up with the girls as friends not fuck buddies.

There are three ways to fuck an Argentine girl. The first is to just go balls out and keeping approaching until you find the slutty one who likes gringos. It's not efficient but it can work for guys that don't have enough time to figure them out. Assuming you have decent indirect and aloof game, it should get you pretty close to success. But if your game is direct, generally speaking you will do poorly and risk going 0 for 32. I say "generally speaking" because I have seen one guy successfully work direct game on Argentine girls, but he's the exception at this point. Stick to indirect and approach a truckload of women and you should hit eventually.

The second way is to use sound strategy, of which I'm still developing. My working theory is this: if you go into a group of Argentine girls with the intent of making out with one of them, it's almost a certainty you won't. Instead you have to think, "I'm going to fuck with this girl's head and she's going to be so intrigued that she will be on my nutsack." You have to be the coquette. This passivity goes against everything I've learned with how to American girls, but I have accepted that Argentine girls are a different breed of animal. Touching them is mostly ineffective in building attraction. More studies need to be done and if I ever go back to Argentina, I may carry out the research needed to crack the code, as I have for American girls. It would just be a damn shame to have a culture of women that no one has consistently figured out how to fuck.

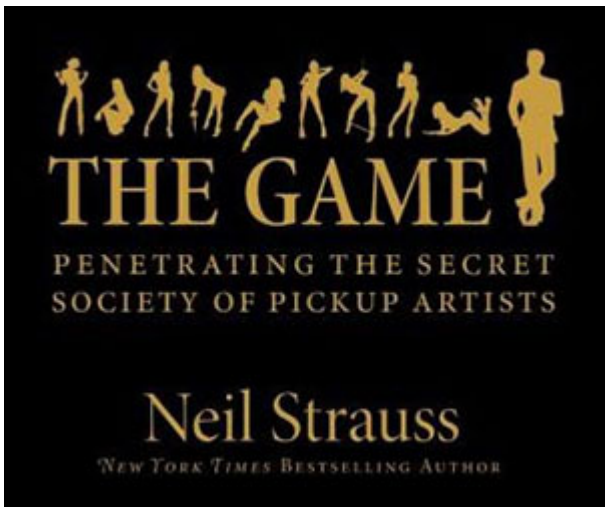
> …another thing; as you mentioned the girls are completely wacko here. It seems like I see a girl staring at me or talk to a girl and she likes me and then she goes coldish saying that she has a boyfriend (obviously and blatantly as if she wants me to know she's lying) lying) also just kind of moving away even though it's obvious she wants it. I also think it may have to do with lack of escalation or maybe escalation (kino for example) too fast. And also I think they play hard to get even when they actually like you just to bust your balls,; they is crazy, but obviously some of the cutest girls on this fucking planet.

If you keep doing something that doesn't work, you need to try something completely different that would never be needed in America. For example, say if often happens that a girl breaks her neck for you and then you walk up to her to say hi but she goes cold. Instead, how about you walk up to her and say, "Excuse me can you stop being rude and staring at me like that? Where I come from we don't do that." Have a blank expression so she doesn't know if you were serious or not.

If a girl shows you her "boyfriend" on her cellphone (something that will happen about 50% of the time), she wants you to think she is desired by another man. Instead how about you say, "Oh wow he's a good looking guy. Is he gay? I swear at the club I was at last night I saw a guy looking like him kissing another man." Her response will be to qualify him, putting her on the defensive. Continue the charade with a confused look on your face, as if you think it's a little strange she likes bisexual men.

I think you get the point. I'm not saying these moves will get you instantly in her pants, but if you constantly experiment you're bound to strike on something that gets the reaction you want. Bottom line: do something very different than what you are used to doing. Because Argentine girls are very different.

When it comes to Brazilian girls, use standard American game. No change is needed.

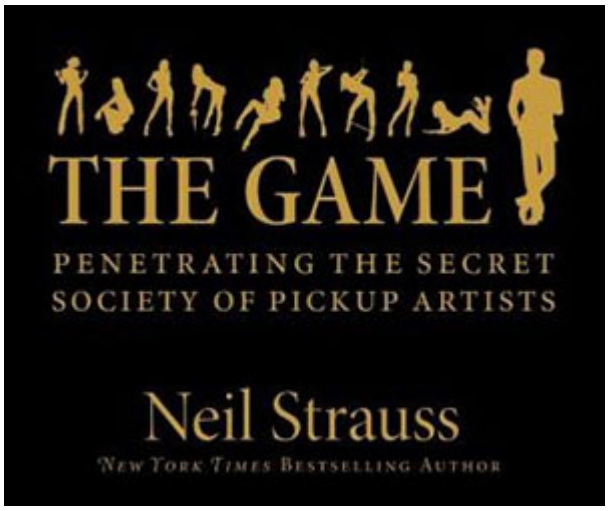


Re: Time For A Trip

April 21, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On April 1 I made a post about how I was heading to Ethiopia on April 22 to help kids in poverty. It was a reverse April Fools joke (i.e. the truth). As you read this I'm on a cramped flight headed to Addis Ababa and in just a day or so I will post photos of cityscapes and naked African kids to prove that I wasn't bullshitting.

I figure this trip will be similar in length to the previous one (six months), but most likely shorter as my plan is less ambitious. If you have any Ethiopian travel tips then please share, and yes, I already know about the HIV situation. I'll be okay since I bought some industrial strength condoms that are just one thickness grade lower than bicycle tires. I'm not going to feel anything and I'm definitely not going to blast but as long as I can brag about pounding Ethiopian girls I don't care. Depending on my mood and health status I may swing by Egypt and visit the pyramids via camel transport.



Welcome To Ethiopia!

April 23, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

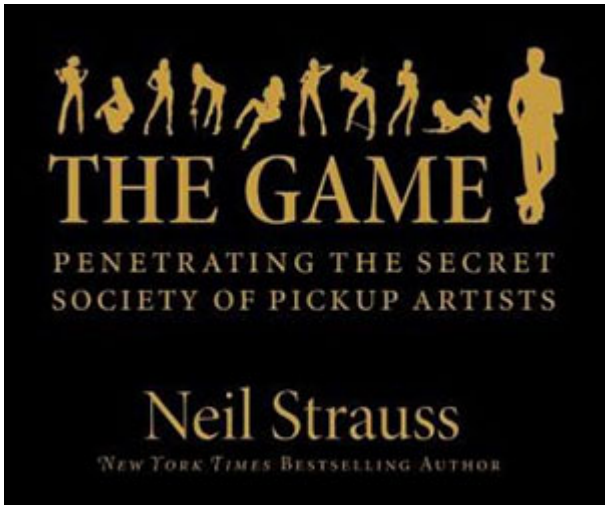
I've only been here for two days but I already feel deeply affected by the charming Ethiopian culture. It doesn't hurt that as white man I'm being treated like a rock star. In fact, I've banged two Ethiopian girls so far.

I have three pictures to share. This first one is of the farmers market. It's very similar to the ones in America, especially the one in Dupont Circle (DC).

This second picture is one of the girls I banged. Her name is Assefa. What initially attracted me to her was her titties, but it was her charm that really sealed the deal. We made sweet condomless love many times in her mud-brick home. She recently got tested, so it was okay. I trust her. Why would she lie?

I bought a souvenir t-shirt from the market (cheesy, I know), and then went hiking in a field of dirt. I found a nomadic tribe and asked if I could have my picture taken with them. They agreed. Here's your proof that I really am in Ethiopia:

I'm currently working on a detailed strategy guide on how to bang Ethiopian girls. Sneak peek: be white.



Welcome To Bogotá

April 26, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The going-to-Ethiopia thing was only supposed to be an April Fools joke, but idiots kept commenting about it days after so I decided to let it ride. The prank has brought me great amusement, thank you, and the only downside was I have betrayed your trust forever. According to my survey, half of you believed I was actually going to Ethiopia.

I'm in Bogotá, Colombia right now. My first night out I went to a bar in the "bohemian" (think dreadlocks) La Candelaria part of town with a fun Croatian guy. My Spanish sucks huge donkey balls apparently so I can't rely only on day game yet. I still need that loud club music to make take the awkwardness off the many silences where the hamster in my brain is trying to construct coherent sentences that are more interesting than "Creo que esa es el baño para hombres" (I think that is the men's room) and "Tu y tu amiga tienen pelo rojo" (You and your friend have red hair).

While the Croat was talking to a girl I decided to go for the hottest girl in the place. She was standing nearby with her two friends. I point to my friend and said, "That's my friend" in English. She looked at me for two seconds as I stood there patiently. Then she spun around so hard and fast that the end of her hair hit my shoulder. What the fuck. The last time I got rejected like that was in December 2007 in Buenos Aires.

Later I got up on my stool for five seconds to place my empty Corona on a table. When I returned there was a girl sitting on my chair. She was a friend of the girl who rejected me. The chair theft had to be planned. The girls were bullying me and I had to stand up for myself.

"Perdon, esta es mi asiento," I said. Excuse me, this is my seat.

"Si, pero estoy cansado," she replied. Yes, but I am tired.

"Si pero yo tambien. Quiero mi asiento." Yes but me too. I want my seat.

"No no por favor estoy muy cansado…" No no please I am very tired. She gave me a puppy dog look.

"Hablas ingles?" Do you speak English?

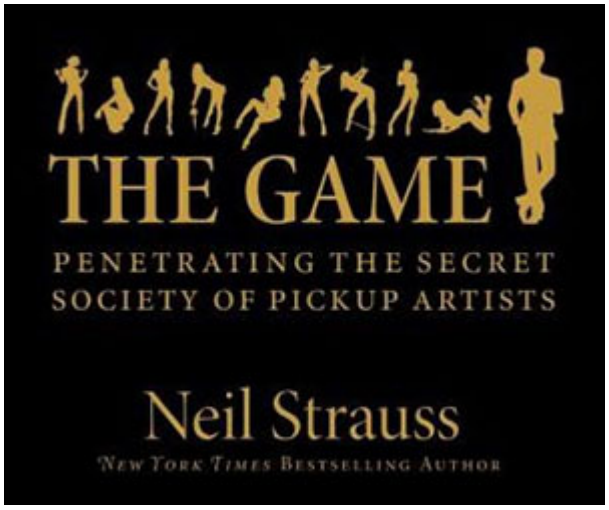
"Yes I speak English."

"Okay look girl you gotta get up. Come on let's go."

I put my hand on her back and gently pushed her off. I got evil looks for the rest of the night from her crew but it's okay—I got my revenge.

I shouldn't have told you this episode since it's the exception. Colombian girls are very nice and eerily similar with Brazilian girls in terms of personality. I think these girls were from Argentina because that's the shit I would expect there. In fact if everything goes well here I see no reason to ever return to Argentina unless I have to do a visa run.

Give me three more weeks to gather data and I will present to you my findings on Colombian women.



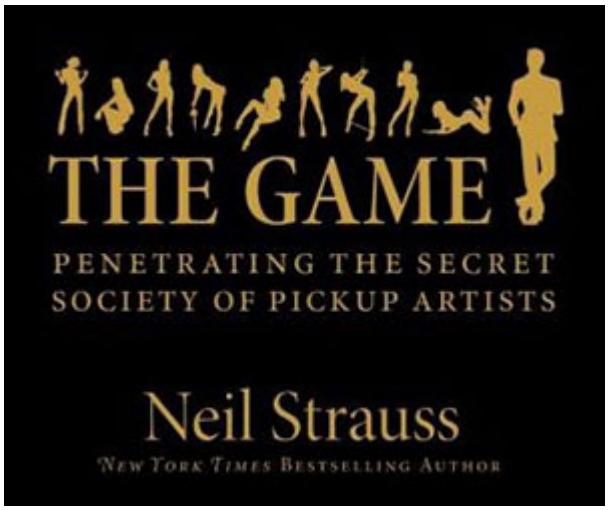
Loose Pussy

April 28, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Whenever I meet a guy who likes Asian girls, one of the things he says to me is, “Their pussies are so tight.”

How is that good? Unless you’re a porn star the speed of your orgasm time is probably on your mind. The vice pussy will make it impossible to hit that respectable two-minute mark (without a condom). While I don’t actively try to give a girl an orgasm, I want to at least put on a respectable show. When you go to the circus you expect a certain level of talent from the elephants, and when you don’t get that you complain to anyone who will listen, including those who may consider seeing the show in the future… if you know what I mean.

If I had the choice of twins, once with a tight pussy and one with a loose one, I’m going with the loose one every time. It will take me so long to blast that by the time I finally do, after fucking in at least five different positions, she will think I’m a sex god even though it was just her pussy. That leads to my theory: girls with loose pussies have better sex, which leads them to have much more sex, loosening their pussies even more. It’s a vicious cycle.



Thought Experiment

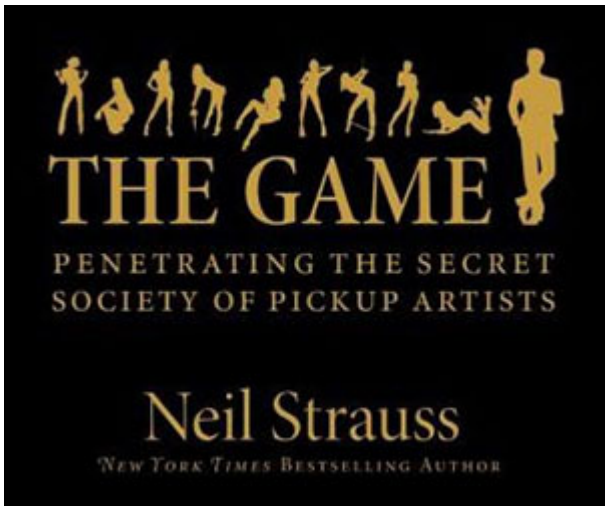
April 30, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

You go into a bar alone because you don't have any friends. You get your drink and stand near the girls bathroom, where there is a short line. A cute redhead makes eye contact with you then goes inside to use the facility. She comes out five minutes later and when she closes the door behind her your nose is hit with a wall of shit. She just took a nasty dump that you know from experience was probably sudden-onset diarrhea. You move away from the bathroom to a safer area.

Two hours later you are talking to a girl. She introduces you to her friend—the girl who took the dump. Thankfully she didn't extend her hand to shake. You talk with her for five minutes and notice she is looking deep into your eyes, asking questions about you and your background, and a lot cuter than you originally thought. She's a solid 8, but there is another problem—her breath smells like she just ate a canned tuna sandwich. What to do?

Think about it logically for a minute. My answer in a bit.

Best Answer: Get her number. Because of her high appearance rating it would be prudent to give her a second chance during a non-primetime slot (Sunday afternoon) for something like a smoothie. If her hygiene is then proper, insert her into the usual dating rotation. Sometimes a girl has a bad night. Many times I've forgotten to wash my sack before heading out to the club, and I can only hope I wasn't punished for it.



Survey Results (Part 1)

May 3, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm too lazy to graphically present the data so you'll have to make due with text. I also skipped a couple questions. 632 people completed the survey.

What is your age?

0.9% Under 18
8.7% 18-21
30.4% 22-25
42.6% 26-32
13.0% 33-40
4.3% 41 or older

I thought readership would be a little younger but I'm not surprised that the bulk of you are close to my age.

What is the highest education level you have completed?

32.3% of you have a masters degree or greater.

Do you live in the Washington DC metropolitan area?

25.5% said yes. This figure used to be around 75%.

How did you find out about my blog?

More than half of you found me through another web site.

How long have you known about my blog?

11.8% Pretty recently
22.3% 3-6 months
22.9% 7-12 months
26.5% 1-2 years
12.9% 3-4 years
3.6% Over 4 years

This result suggests a lot of churn-and-burn in readership. People stick around for a year or two, lose interest in the topic matter, and go onto new things. For many guys, picking up girls is a flash-in-the-pan sort of thing.

What topics do you want to see more of? Check all that apply.

60.9% Straight-up how to get laid advice
91.1% Male/female observations, analysis, and commentary
40.2% Travel
55.0% Travel mixed with girls
51.2% Philosophical ramblings about life and existence
26.5% Self-deprecation
20.8% Politics / economics
25.9% Pictures

12.7% Video

I'm pretty surprised that politics garnered so few votes, though I'm encouraged at the showing made by philosophical ramblings.

Are you subscribed to my email newsletter?

42.4% Yes

Have I inspired you to take action in some area of your life?

53.1% Yes
46.9% No

I change lives.

Do you eagerly await my blog postings like a newborn boy awaits milk from his mother's breast?

52.4% Yes
47.6% Yes

A whopping 100% of you said yes. This is incredible data right here.

Do you have an active blog (Wordpress, Blogger, Movable Type, Tumblr, etc.)?

21.2% of you said yes. Nerds.

Do you comment on my blog?

1.0% Yes, regularly
8.0% Occasionally
29.5% Sometimes or rarely
61.4% Never

This is a question I added after the first day. 90% of you don't regularly comment. This result has made it easier for me to pull commenting as an experiment.

Would you say your job is fulfilling?

43.8% of you said yes. Possible follow-up: If yes, are you on an anti-depressant?

You're at a coffee shop. Coffee or tea?

67.9% Coffee
32.1% Tea

Tea made a good showing probably thanks to international readers, who I accidentally threw under the bus with this America-centric survey.

Do you believe in God?

47.1% Yes
52.9% No

Godless heathens. 😈

What is your gender?

82.7% Male
17.3% Female

I don’t know what those women are doing here. If there was a way to ban only women I would.

FOR GIRLS. How many sexual partners have you had? Estimate if necessary.

4.8% 0
20.2% 1-3
37.5% 4-8
22.1% 9-15
8.7% 16-25
4.8% 26-50
1.0% 51-99
1.0% Over 100

I was sharing this result with Roissy and he reminded me about using a multiplier. We settled on two, so double these results to get the true numbers. For the one girl who admitted to banging over 100 guys, can you email me so I can anonymously interview you for the blog. I’m curious about how that number was racked up, and if some sort of gangbang was involved. I won’t judge you.

FOR GIRLS. Has my writing ever made you feel upset, sad, or depressed?

8.3% Yes, on many occasions
47.2% It has at least once
44.4% No not at all

I’ve failed as a man with that low 8.3% number.

FOR GIRLS. Why do you read my blog? Check all that apply.

22.4% I like you
53.3% To learn about guys
24.3% To learn about girls
41.1% Curious about this idea of game
32.7% Good writing
81.3% Entertaining and/or funny
42.1% Boredom

Almost half of girls read my blog to alleviate boredom. Guys I want you to keep that in mind whenever a girl tells you how her life is busy and great.

Three write-ins to share:

> Many, many times your perspective has resonated with me. I particularly enjoyed this past Halloween episode, in which you likened your Jesus experience to the Hot Girl experience.
>
> —
>
> I hate your view of women, but I’m impressed with your attention to the intricacies of interpersonal relations. And you’re funny. You make an occasional grammar mistake, but overall the writing is above average and entertaining. And > don’t take this the wrong way, but as a woman, I read your blog, kind of to keep my guard up, know-your-enemy kind of research. But still, you are very entertaining.

>
> —
>
> I’m a girl, but I find the whole idea of game interesting. It’s just a neat perspective into the interactions of men and women, who may or may not have different hopes surrounding outcomes.

FOR GIRLS. Have you given up hope finding your soulmate?

11.8% Yes
60.8% No
27.5% Already found him

Lots of girls got mad because they don’t believe in the idea of soulmates. Overall though the result shows females to be (unrealistically) optimistic. The 11.8% know what’s up.

FOR GIRLS. Are you a feminist?

22.6% Yes
53.8% No
23.6% Not sure

How can you not be sure?

FOR GIRLS. Do you own or have you owned a cat?

Let’s take a look at the result from two angles. First, from girls who said Yes to being a feminist:

37.5% Yes, owned or own a cat

Next, from girls who said No to the feminist question:

31.6% Yes, owned or own a cat

We’re seeing triangulation here with what we’d expect in the real world. In other words, if you are a feminist then you have a 15.7% increased chance of being a cat lady. The data doesn’t lie. Feel free to cite this figure in your academic papers.

FOR GIRLS. Would you have sex with Jesus if he were alive today, you were single, and he hit on you?

38.5% Yes
61.5% No

I look like Jesus, so….

FOR GIRLS. Have we banged, kissed, or went out on a date?

6.1% Yes
93.9% No

I know a lot of girls lied on this one. Should be 10%.

Now onto guys…

FOR GUYS. How many sexual partners have you had? Estimate if needed.

5.9% 0
17.6% 1-3
27.5% 4-8
20.8% 9-15
12.8% 16-25
7.6% 26-50
5.2% 51-99
2.7% Over 100

If you bang 26 girls, you're in 75th percentile of all men. Bang 51 girls and you're 92nd percentile. You know what to do.

FOR GUYS. How would you rate your game?

49.7% Beginner (occasional phone number or date)
42.4% Intermediate
7.9% Advanced (getting laid regularly with pretty girls)

FOR GUYS. Have you ever had a one night stand?

71.3% Yes
28.7% No

I posed this same question to the girls and the result was just about the same.

FOR GUYS. How would you describe your condom usage overall?

23.5% 100% compliance
38.4% Consistent
19.1% Sometimes
9.6% Rarely.. I'm a dirty boy
9.4% N/A – I don't have much sex

I wish I asked "Have you ever had an STD?" to triangulate with notch count and condom usage.

FOR GUYS. Do you refer to yourself as a "guy" or as a "man"?

45.3% Guy
54.7% Man

I'm a real man.

FOR GUYS. How often do you jerk?

6.2% Multiple times daily
24.3% Daily
34.8% Several times a week
22.2% A couple times a week
6.2% Several times a month
6.2% Not very often

I used to be daily.

FOR GUYS. What was the last time you made an adult woman cry (that you weren't related to) through the power of your words?

For this result I cross-tabulated the answers with number of sexual partners.

33.9% of guys who made a girl cry within the past month has banged over 15 girls
17% of guys who hasn't made a girl cry in the past year has banged over 15 girls

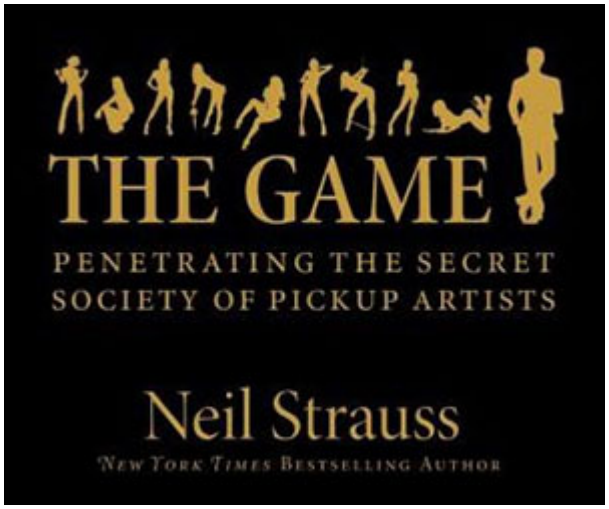
Approximately how many books have you read in the past year?

1.9% 0
16.9% 1-3
22.9% 4-6
18.0% 7-10
12.5% 11-15
7.7% 16-20
20.2% Over 20

Girls are voracious readers. 34.2% of them have read over 20 books in the past year, while 17.3% of men have.

Continued...



Survey Results (Part 2)

May 4, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Have you bought or read Bang?

30.4% Yes
69.6% No

I don't believe my blog is an untapped market for my book.

FOR THOSE WHO READ BANG. Do you think Bang was worth the money you spent on it?

92.2% Yes
7.8% No

FOR THOSE WHO READ BANG. Have you tried any techniques or lines from Bang?

77.0% Yes
23.0% No

FOR THOSE WHO READ BANG. In your mind, what do you think is holding you back from being more successful with women? Check all that apply.

15.1% My appearance
19.6% My personality
14.5% Another one of my personal attributes
12.3% Money
33.5% My current situation (e.g. where I live)
55.3% Fear or lack of confidence
70.4% Laziness
25.1% Free, high-quality porn

I'm pretty shocked by the laziness number, which I'm sure goes hand-in-hand with the high-quality porn option.

Some write-in comments:

> More material on day game is requested. my voice is relatively soft and less captivating, so I have much less presence than people with worse game, humor, etc. I also have a more witty cheeky type of humor, that may escape the grasp of some girls. Information on ditz game, or how to make one's humor better understood would be appreciated. sometimes it's a language barrier thing, sometimes it's not. eg when asked where I'm from, sometimes I'll say, "Los Angeles, I'm kind of shallow and superficial." btw, you have an excellent deadpan in your video.
>
> —
>
> Lack of quality women. Getting revved up about a simple bang just doesn't seem as big a deal when I generally get dissatisfied with the chic after a few dates > anyway.

>
> —
>
> I find most women to be tiresome, dull, and basically empty shells of what used to be a human being. After one realizes he can sleep with basically anyone he wants, he tends to find better shit to do. When I work a girl now it's because she has substance, and merits my attention. Otherwise it's alot of work for a pussy assisted jerk. Fuck that.
>
> —
>
> Living in Southern California and having not grown up here. DC is so the minor leagues. I get laid almost every time I visit my family. There is zero competition from lawyers, consultants, and programmers. SoCol has lots of competent naturals and a premuim is placed on physical attractiveness. In essence the competition starts at a much higher level. Similar to the shock you felt when you went to Argentina. At the end of the day you have to work twice as hard but if you go on some business trip to Cleveland you know you have the battle tested skills to bang 3 random in 10 hours.
>
> —
>
> Feelings of shame and inhibition from a Catholic upbringing.
>
> —
>
> I am one of your best friends inSOMnia

Thanks Insomnia.

FOR THOSE WHO READ BANG. Do you have any other comments about Bang?

A dozen comments about day game. I get it!

> Bang is dope. I like most the straightforward way you differentiate between alpha and beta males. And between confident and non-confident people. The line that resonates with me is the one that goes.. "confident people dive into situations that are critical to their goals, regardless of their perceived chance of failure". Nice work.
>
> —
>
> I loved how it made me feel like you were taking the journey from beta to alpha with the reader. You didn't come off as some pretentious douche.
>
> —
>
> Far too short.
>
> —
>
> I think it was a great book on the fundamentals on game. Just to give you background, I'm a beginner/intermediate player- I can get laid with moderate frequency, but still not on command with whom I want or with consistency every night I go out. I think the only way to improve ony our book would be to go in > depth on certain areas- as an Expat in Asia (I'm also Asian), I'd be interested to hear your stories and how you had to adjust your game while overseas, something I think you have a fair amount of experience in.

>
> —
>
> Great book. Lots of useful information. I always use the XXXXXX technique now to guarantee getting in.
>
> —
>
> I tried the strawberry story, it's good stuff. Unrelated to Bang, The cost per notch analysis is a great idea.
>
> —
>
> I bought your book for two reasons: – I saw in your blog that you give realsitic and straightforward advice – personally i think you are the only pickup expert that has a likable personality: the other seem to have a personal philosophy that blends the worst aspects of self-help and selfiness in a (from a european point of view) very yuppie-american way.
>
> —
>
> A story telling approach might have worked very well in a few places. Walk us through a few successes and failures from start to finish.
>
> —
>
> I thought it was useful and practical. In a very few cases, it could have been better edited, but overall an inspirational and solid guide.
>
> —
>
> The sections on The Vibe and Inner Game are some of the best self-improvement advice I've ever read – extends way beyond just trying to get laid. Thank you.
>
> —
>
> the structure needs to be improved and more openers/ routines would be nice. overall it was a good read and learned some stuff and it covered the majority of subjects but i felt like with some topics ,a bit more in depth information would have been nice.

FOR THOSE WHO DIDN'T READ BANG. Why haven't you bought Bang? Check all that apply.

18.8% I'm a girl
1.8% I'm gay
2.8% I hate you
5.9% I think you are a fraud and/or a phony
8.5% Too expensive
32.6% Unsure of its quality
18.3% I have no money (if you can't swing $20 then you got more to worry about than your game)

16.2% I don’t care for picking up girls
20.1% I’m in a happy relationship
35.7% I’m lazy
20.3% Not sure

Write-in comments:

> I don’t read books on how to pick up girls written by homo’s
>
> —
>
> Think over analyzing the going out experience would tarnish it for me. I always have a ton of fun when I go out.
>
> —
>
> I’m gay but I’m interested in a straight dick’s perception of a pussy. It’s weird. I don’t like you at all because you are sexist, homophobic, mcp etc, but who cares, its not like I have to sleep with you. To be clearer, I pity your personality, but what you write is generally informative – things that you don’t hear in person.
>
> —
>
> Live at home and don’t want my mom to see
>
> —
>
> you wouldn’t let me
>
> —
>
> Plenty of seduction material abound….maybe you could convince me more?
>
> —
>
> I used to buy into that stuff all the time. I quit caring about studying the dynamics of pickup about four years ago. Now I just spend all my money on booze and get laid being a loser drunk. It works for me. I like going out alone because I am a prowler.

Lots of guys said they have too much pick-up material and don’t see how an additional book will help.

How do you feel about my decision to visit Ethiopia to feed starving African children?

16.9% It’s great!
8.6% It’s forced / trite
19.4% Whatever, not exactly my cup of tea
46.5% I don’t think you are really going to Ethiopia
8.6% Other

Have you left the United States in the past two years for leisurely travel?

69.7% Yes
30.3% No

How long was your last international vacation?

9.4% 1-5 days
25.5% About a week
28.3% Two weeks
12.0% 3-4 weeks
24.8% Over a month

Surprised at the large number who escaped for over a month.

Did you get the diarrhea?

21.4% Yes
78.6% No

I voted Yes.

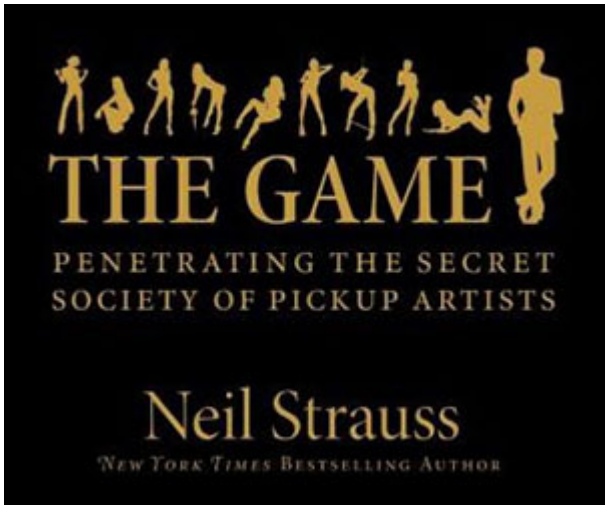
Have you picked (or will you pick) a travel location based mostly on the men or women?

33.0% Yes (39.5% guys answered yes while 8.7% of girls did)
67.0% No

Have you gotten laid in a foreign country with someone you didn't already know before you arrived?

46.2% Yes (47.5% guys said yes while 40.9% of girls did)
53.8% No

Continued…



Survey Results (Part 3)

May 5, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Why do you travel? Check all that apply

74.1% Learn new cultures
72.4% Sight-see
46.2% Meet exotic women or men
68.2% To de-compress, relax
80.2% To get away

Write-in responses:

> I like going to horrible places like war zones or places like Auschwitz or Jonestown. I just returned from Sudan a few hours ago, for example. I still haven't really come up with a good answer for when people ask me why.
>
> —
>
> conversations and friendship with other travellers
>
> —
>
> To find the meaning of life.
>
> —
>
> There's a quote by R.L. Stephenson, that sums up my travel philosophy perfectly: "For my part I travel not to go anywhere, but to go. The great affair is to move." (something like that)

What is the most important thing you've learned in your life so far?

There were 430 write-ins. If yours isn't here that doesn't mean I didn't like it. Don't be hurt.

> I think the realization that most of what we're told is rubbish. And by this I am referring to statements about things such as how things or people are in a certain place, what women want or value, what constitutes "responsible" behavior, what should make me happy (marriage, a mortgage, 2.5 kids, etc.), what sort of art we're supposed to value, etc. I have to throw this one in as well: If you're not happy with your life – change it. Fuck the critics that tell you that you're making a mistake by walking away from a good job or a nice girl or a nice city. They're not living your life and since I'm an atheist, I think you only get one. Do what makes you happy, not others happy. Be selfish.
>
> —
>
> it's possible to rewrite your life story.
>
> —
>
> Sometimes, just acting like you have authority is enough. People respond when you seem like you’re in charge, whether or not you actually are.

—

Where there is no desire there is no fear.

—

The stuff you think is so important as a teenager/young adult really doesn’t matter at all in the real world after age 25.

—

1) If you want it that bad you can probably get it, if you’re not trying then you don’t want it that bad. 2) You can make yourself sombody else if you’re willing to commit.

—

Personality goes a lot farther than skill or intelligence.

—

When you get pissed (drunk) in a New Country make sure you can make your way back to your bed, as sleeping in a hedge isn’t fun when it’s Cactus. also Camels & Arabs haven’t a much of a sense of humour

—

The goal in life is to figure out what makes you happiest (e.g. what releases the most pleasure inducing chemicals in your brain most consistently and most sustainably) and then doing that as much as possible. No one can tell you what this will be, and this will likely change over long periods of time.

—

The police will fuck you even if you have done nothing wrong… so hire a decent lawyer

—

If you don’t choose how to live your life, others will choose for you

—

Sex is easy. Especially since I am gay. Straight people have it so complicated, plus deal with the boobies. eww.

—

1) Be thankful of the opportunities you have been given. I could have easily have been born in another country where I wouldn’t have had access to education or survived passed twenty five. Make the best of what has been given to you and never feel like you’re entitled to it. 2) Not to judge a person you don’t know. Everybody has reasons for what they do, just because you don’t know them doesn’t give you the right to pass judgement. 3) Lately, and with a lot of influence from yours and Roissy’s blogs I’ve learned that most girls are pretty stupid. I’m not sure how I feel about that right now, it’s great to know but I wish I feel like a dumbass for putting them on such a pedestal until now.

—

Your life is yours alone, don’t spend it trying to make other people happy. If you’ve got a 9-5 occupation, that is considered making someone else happy.

—

People who say they’re trying to “find themselves” are dipshits. What makes your character is what is outside you, wrought by your hands and words not inside you with mincing thoughts and empty words, and anyone who surrenders to some such excuse such as “it was my upbringing” or “it’s in my genes” isn’t strong enough to shape the clay of their lives. Oh Roosh, you really, really really need to read Zorba the Greek. I don’t know why I didn’t post that on the book thread.

—

life is way too short, and people chase after the wrong things their whole life, i think your idea of not being married to a career and experiencing as many women as you can is the right track. on your death bed, you will probably only remember the women you have had, and who made your life better, not what you did at a cubicle for 45 years

—

Fuck content, it’s all about style

—

No woman will ever love me just for who I am or what I can do for her. I must be able to prove my value in a social context outside our relationship, preferably by making her jealous of my other options. In fact, each of the women I have loved has told me as she finally broke up with me that she would probably be attracted to me again if I would have an affair. But I don’t know how to have an affair, so I lost them.

—

Nobody gives a shit about your problems.

—

Never associate with people that have nothing going for them.

—

The taint is the male g-spot.

—

99.99% of people are sleep walking through life, and I don’t want to be one of them.

—

The problem with people who have no vices is that generally you can be pretty > sure they’re going to have some pretty annoying virtues.

>
> —
>
> That it’s important to have male friends, and you should not let go of them.
>
> —
>
> Contrary to what “society” said, doing well professionally isn’t the key to getting hot chicks
>
> —
>
> You will always lose money chasing women but you’ll never lose women chasing money.
>
> —
>
> Most of the little shit people get wound up about resolves itself if you give it time to do so.
>
> —
>
> inflammable really means flammable!

Do you have any additional comments about how to improve my blog?

> Not to improve the blog, but the question about soulmates was odd – why assume women believe in soulmates at all? I don’t, but am in a happy relationship, so I selected “already found him.” Would have been nice to have another option.
>
> —
>
> You admit to, and others accuse you of, being a hater of women, in the line of your “Dark side” post. You seem to regard it inevitable. If you could transcend ,and grow a heart back, your readership would triple.
>
> —
>
> Even though you are broke at the moment. More info on being successful and making money…
>
> —
>
> It seems like your style has gone from naturally inflammatory to purposefully inflammatory. I’d say keep giving advice you’d actually take and quit trying to go extreme just to incense the haters – though it is pretty fucking funny occasionally.
>
> —
>
> Your blog is drenched in ego and I think it makes for an entertaining read, plus it makes me not feel bad about occasionally hating you. The Roosh haters should just give up their cause because your blog wouldn’t be fun if you weren’t such a bastard.
>
> —

More pictures and videos that you take/make. Also really miss the great old MS Paint diagrams you used to make.

—

DO NOT, under any circumstances, write more about politics or economics. Game, women and more game please.

—

I think when you figure out what you're doing with your life next, it will get better. I think you're past the whole picking up chicks thing. You're getting too old for it.

—

Less endless rambling about pathetic beta men and how awesome alpha men are. It gets old after a while.

—

Yes, I think you banned me for awhile (linked me to some spanish youtube video) because I made a comment dissing your worldview. Stop being such a pussy and let the haters like myself make our stance heard. You don't need to read it or take it to heart, but show some balls and stop looking for all your comments to be that of adulation.

—

No. You've been doing this long enough that it can't be expected to get any better. Most blogs reach full potential quite early, and after that it's only a matter of whether the writer can be bothered to keep doing it. I would be satisfied to see you maintain your current standard.

—

Your writing is amazing. Self-deprecating, hilarious, and insightful. Your videos, generally, have not been as impressive. Your "how to blog" video is great, but I think it's because it's the only video you had that was semi-scripted beforehand. What the fuck is wrong with you? Based on your content and your ability to write, you should be in the thousands of RSS readers. You should have a huge following, but you don't. Are you just an awful marketer? Why don't you get word about your blog a bit more? Your writing should appeal to about 90% of all young males, but somehow, no one knows about you. Start marketing yourself.

—

i like the comparison of different cultures like the argentine vs brazilian girls…i started dating brazilian girls because of you, am learning portuguese, and plan on going to brazil in the next year. best advice i've ever gotten, thanks, roosh

—

Two approaches, go personal or go polemic/personal I hate polemics but as you can tell it has been good for Roissy's numbers. You have flirted with both of those extremes, personal stuff about you, your life and stuff and polemics about the male/female dynamics/politics/econ. But I imagine it must suck to have people think they know you from reading about you. Whatever you decide to do, I think that people respond not just to ideas but to the personal stuffbehind the idea. The best of the idiot box tv, radio, or writing has elements of the personal. The power of your ideas may capture people but they stay for the personality – the man underneath the idea. Whether you go travel and chicks or vision quest in Ethiopia for orphans and chicks or your libertarian strain and chicks, the story you are telling is of a guy making his way in the world, his way. I read you because although I disagree on econ and politics and probably many aspects of life, I think there is something interesting in your story. I like that you are working it out while we watch. And I get to relive my youth reading about your exploits so keep that stuff up too.

—

I feel like you hold back a lot of experiences that we could all learn from. And I would like to hear more of your opinions about current events, but your real opinions and not just BS as if your trying to get a rise out of people. But I'll read the blog either way, I'm a fan and I appreciate your work.

—

You seem to have a very negative and detrimental outlook on life. But its funny to read.

—

I've read your blog for a while now. I think the blog is beginning to bore you. Your posts are shorter and less frequent. I realize you're writing a book, the newsletter etc. This is an outsider opinion, so I could be totally off base, but I'd take a little time off. My favorite 'era' of this blog was around the time when you and BigHeadDC used to feud. Your victory was swift and complete. Something's different between then and now. It's still a go-to blog for me and I enjoy it very much. Lastly, I want to reiterate how much Bang has helped me. Thank you.

—

topics lately are boring, miss the DCbachelor days. More interested in travel and getting laid. Also looking forward to another book.

—

Please, I beg you – no more wikipedia based economic theories. As an economist, they are both obvious, and painful to get through.

—

Not only do I love your blog, I've recommended it to several friends, both male and female. My single female friends NEED your blog, so they can understand the alpha male mind. Conversely, many of my male friends are betas, and they are the ones who read you, yet despise you and disagree with you. They continue to > retain the false hope that there’s a woman out there who appreciates a sensitive guy. My man’s an alpha, btw. He’s you, 10 years ago.

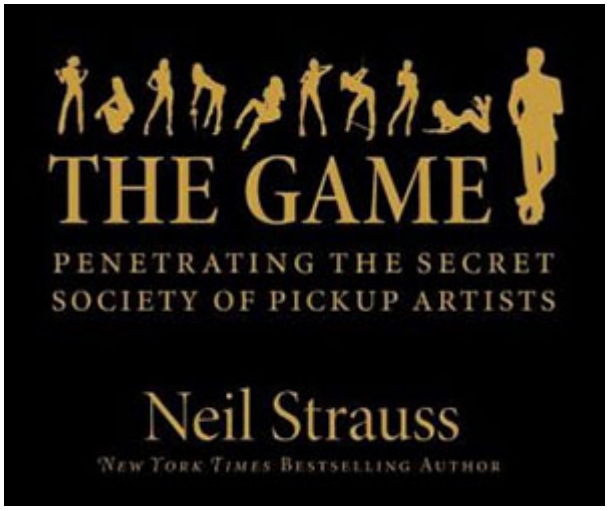
>
> —
>
> I’m really tired of all the women / bang posts. I think you should be beyond that as a person and a writer. It’s just a pussy, get over it. Of course I understand if that what 80 percent of your writers are interested in reading…but again, I think it’s a waste of you mental energy and creativity and time.
>
> —
>
> In every real man a child is hidden that wants to play (Nietzsche). I think there was a more personable aspect to your original blog dcbachelor that you’ve drifted away from. In a sense I got the impression you thought the end game was more feasable then, but at this stage, in this reality, and from what you have seen and experienced, you’re somewhat pessimistic in your view of women and finding an ideal partner in what has become a sea of filth. I agree with you on the instant gratification, the cynicism, the fickle mentality, the selfish and illogical behavior. All this energy invested for a fuck…and as you said…it’s just wasted time. At the same time one must move forward in life, that was then, this is now…you must evolve, not remain stagnant so take the blog in the direction you want. I guess at the least you should bring back the stick figure cartoons….those were classic and added some fun imagery to go with the content.
>
> —
>
> I know you’re getting tired of blogging, but I’d love to see more consistent posting again. Daily might be too much, but just regular, maybe set certain days of the week. Otherwise, keep doing what you’re doing – I very much appreciate it.
>
> —
>
> the best thing you could do to improve this blog is to not take any of your fucking retarded readers’ advice. if any of us had any good ideas for a blog, you would be reading our blog, not the other way around. keep it up

It was fun reading the suggestions from people who don’t normally comment on the blog. The only thing that I will probably change is to promote my book a little more. Only 30% of my readers buying my book seems pretty low.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Hostel Kitchen Line

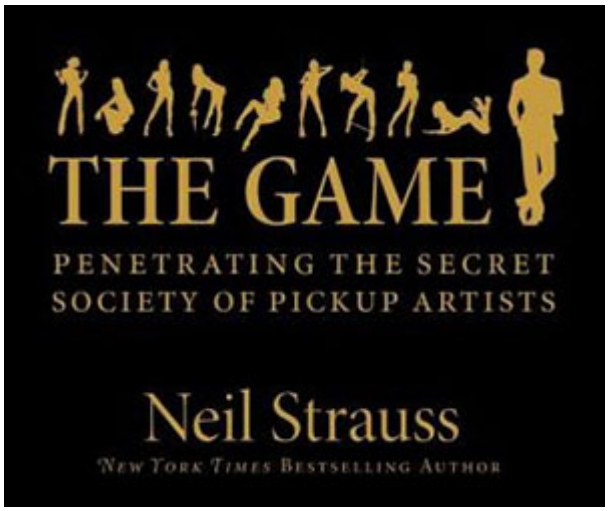
May 7, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you're in the hostel communal kitchen while a girl is beginning to cook dinner, say the following:

"What time is dinner going to be ready?"

The key to this line is to say it as deadpan as possible. When the girl (or girls) laugh, give them a weird look as if you find it strange they are laughing, as if gringas cook for you all the time. Follow up with, "Oh, please don't put a lot of salt. I don't like too much salt in my food."

The next thing out of their mouth will probably be "So where are you from?" or "What's your name?"



Anger

May 10, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

You arrive late to your house after a rough day, starving. You haven't eaten in twelve hours. Every carry-out shop seems to be closed. The last thing you want to do is cook but you have to eat so you decide to whip up a tomato and onion omelet. You slam a frying pan on the stove and take out a cutting board to chop up the vegetables. You're chopping the tomato as fast as you can but in your haste the blade slices your index finger and you scream in pain as blood sprays on the floor. You have to go to the hospital. You buy an Almond Joy from the vending machine in the waiting room.

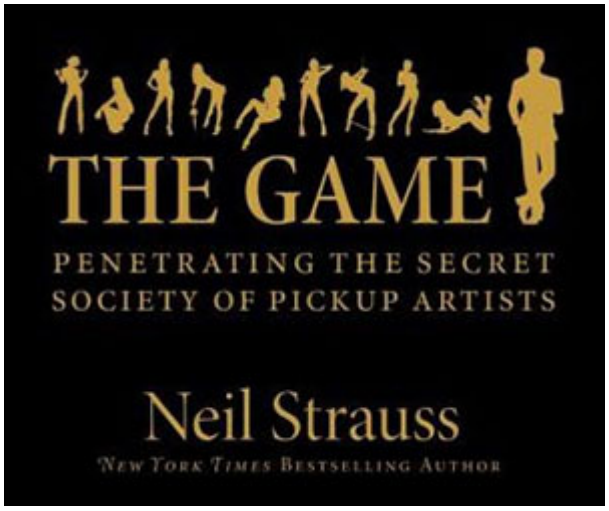
A few times over the past year I have resorted to using anger on girls who weren't responding in the way I desired. While superficially it seemed to get them back in line, I can now firmly conclude that it's an unfruitful path that leads to negativity and unhappiness.

Many times I've been out on a first date with a girl who turned out to be different than when I met her. Her sass has been replaced by biting remarks and her charm replaced by constant challenges and tests. She seems moody and distracted. Is there a way to respond that can salvage the interaction? Unfortunately no. Once a person makes a decision to use poison in a relationship the only antidote is complete withdrawal, not to respond with the same poison.

"Thanks for wasting my time tonight by acting like a bitch."

There are two different responses you will get to a statement like this. The first is the girl gets extremely offended and soon leaves. The second is the girl mocks offense but actually gets turned on. In the latter case you think calling her out "worked" and you'll soon be rewarded with the compassionate and loving girl you wanted all along. It doesn't happen. She will simply butter you up enough so that you decide to continue the date until she soon hits you with something else that provokes the anger again. It begins to define the relationship and now it's a game of emotions and one upmanship, not one of mutual sharing and enjoyment.

Anger begets anger. If you want any semblance of a positive relationship, understand that using anger will not accomplish this goal. Only positive qualities such as your intelligence, wit, humor, or warmth can elicit likewise in a woman. Like the expression goes, if you have to resort to anger, you've already lost. I'd like to modify that a bit. If you have to resort to anger, excuse yourself politely and feel sympathy for the next guy who takes her shit because he feels like he doesn't have a choice. You do have a choice . If her "as is" presence is not working for you, then walk before she sours you on the female gender as a whole.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Of Course You Can

May 11, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There is that festering question that pops up in the minds of men and the more desirable he is, the more frequently it comes.

"Can I do better?"

Think about how many billions of girls there are on the planet. Whatever girl you end up with, there will be millions of others you can get who are better—cuter, funnier, sexier, crazier in bed. You can chase better your entire life but you will die well before ever reaching the limit of your potential. If you want to be sane you're eventually going to have to destroy this question from your mind.

But, if you know for a fact that you can do a lot better…

Thoughts On Number Closing

May 14, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Recently day game student extraordinaire wrote this about getting numbers:

> I was putting too much emphasis on getting the phone number and not enough on the method. Numbers equal nothing if you can't act on them. Maybe I had the idea that I could build a little more rapport when I called. Or maybe our first date we could get to know each other a little more. I was missing the point that a girl won't go out with you if they don't feel comfortable, if they think they can do better, if they think you are just some run of the mill bar guy…
>
> I was at a bar in Boston. On the dance floor with a girl. We were making out, talking, nearly fucking. This girl didn't return my call or text. This was the last draw. Something needs to be done…And that is when I came up with this new experiment.
>
> I will no longer mutter the words "can I have your number?" First off, if you are getting numbers, you shouldn't be asking for them….you should be telling them. "I'll take your number and give you a call next week…" for example. Or just hand them your phone. This works too. But my experiment didn't incorporate any of this. Flat out, don't even ask or insinuate you want their number.

Roissy verified the technique:

> I have run similar number closing game on girls, and I can inform you this reverse psychology method is highly effective. It's a wonder I don't number close like this all the time, but sometimes you have to remind yourself of what works and what doesn't, or you fall back on old familiar habits. When she isn't immediately biting, Tyler's advice to prompt a girl to initiate some kind of exchange of numbers is crucial.

I agree with both of them. If you read Bang (or took my workshop) you'll notice my technique to get a number is not asking for the number but the date, because if you just ask for the number there is a good chance that's all you'll ever get from her.

But there is something more important than the way you get the number: the process. If all you have in your mind is the close then you will be too inwardly focused. You're be like an actor on a stage unable to see the audience. Instead you have to love every minute of interaction you have with the girl, the word-plays, the humor, and the stories you share with her, or else your incredible close technique won't matter. Tyler's number method is very good, but does it work because of the method itself or because he stays in conversation longer than usual when chances are the attraction will be stronger, because it is not the mere act of her asking that reduces the chance of a flake.

For example, say that I'm talking to a girl in a bar and it's going remarkably well. I know she's interested in me and it's just a matter of time until her number is in my phone. She is getting impatient though for me to make a move and has decided to do it herself. Right as she is about to open her mouth to say, “Let’s exchange numbers,” I unknowingly beat her to the punch by saying, “How about we hang out sometime?” Because I asked before she did, does that mean there is a higher chance of her flaking out on me? Of course not. Keep in mind that some girls will never ask a guy for her number no matter how interested, so there is a potential for missed opportunity if you wait for her.

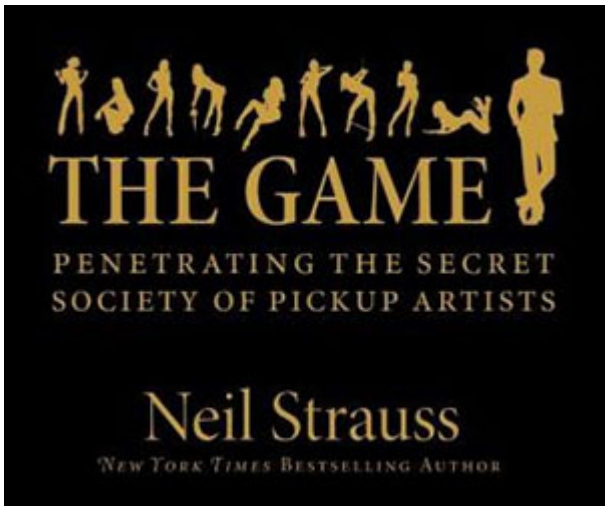
It’s impossible to prove that one method of technique “works” or not, so your best bet is to focus on the entire interaction and how you are making her feel. While there are many ways to fuck up getting a number, as long as you keep it breezy and ask for the date, I believe it doesn’t make a difference in the long run. You think you’ll get flaked on less because of a new move you started doing, but this isn’t a science experiment where all variables are controlled. Your game gradually improves in the time you run such experiments and you’re doing different things in addition to the new technique.



Game Failure

May 17, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you've been in the game for a while and are not seeing results, then I know why. You have one of these three problems.

Gross physical deformity. Nothing that hitting the gym, acne medicine, or hair/beard experimentation can't fix. You don't have to be good looking, but if there is something that really stands out and makes you look like a monster, either hide it or get it fixed. Also guys, if you're trying to bang lots of girls there is no reason to be obese. Sure you can still do it, but why make it harder on yourself with something that can be solved with some discipline and work?

Inability to socialize with other human beings. If no one wants to be your friend, then no girl will want to bang you. Getting into the game before you can have a normal conversation is like learning how to ride a bike before you can walk. There are many self-help books on how to have conversations and read people.

Awkward mannerisms like fidgeting and nervous ticks. These are things that make a girl think about what is wrong with you. You're going to have to study yourself in the mirror or videotape yourself to pick these out because no one will tell you (it's too awkward to bring up).

If you have these problems then you will not get much mileage out of game. First work each one of these out, and then learn game. Otherwise you're just wasting your time and will inevitably reach the conclusion that game doesn't work and all girls care about is money and model good looks.

Male/Female Observations, Analysis, And Commentary

May 18, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On the reader survey, a whopping 92% of readers want to see more “male/female observations, analysis, and commentary.” Now that’s a pretty broad category, including things like making fun of girls who wear flip flops, descriptions of where dating culture is headed, and what does it mean when a girl does a certain something retarded. I wanted to address those who like the “analysis” part.

Like many guys, I have an analytical mind. I don’t mind breaking things down into their component parts to understand them more fully. But just like how you don’t need to tear apart a radio in order to use it, you don’t need to understand women to fuck them. The more you understand them the harder it is to fuck them, and the reason is because they too complicated and variable.

Instead of thinking, “I want to learn more about them because I want to get good at fucking them,” try this instead: “I’m going to try a lot of different things until I find out what works to get good at fucking them.”

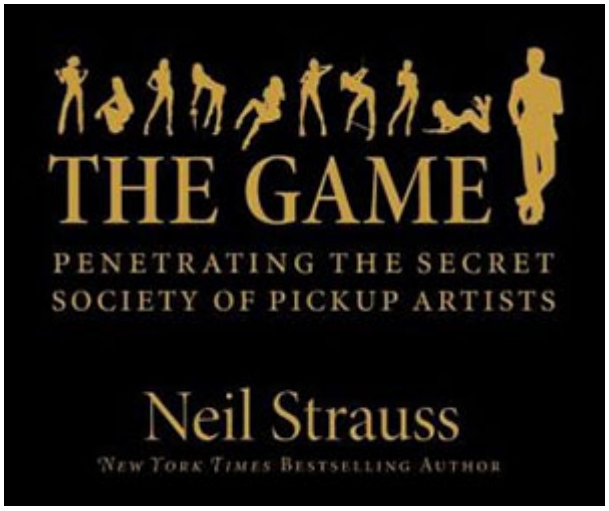
Do you see the difference? One is dependent on understanding them and the other in dependent on your effort. One leads to a road of mental masturbation and the other leads to a road of unprotected sex. I gauge a woman’s response to things, but I don’t make a conscious effort to determine the why of a woman’s actions of behavior. Who cares?

I said something wrong and I made the girl cry. I’m not sure why. But we ended up fucking anyway. Do I have to change anything? Nope. Everything is fine. Carry on.

I told a girl that I liked her on the first date, after she told me the same. We had rough sex that night. Did I do anything wrong? Nope. I got what I wanted. Grand.

I couldn’t care less about why a girl doesn’t like my opener or why she got offended when I said I wanted to cum on her face. But next time I will try a different opener or a different way of bringing up why I want to cum on her face. I will keep going, trying different strategies, until I have evidence from experience that something “works” or not. Besides looking at raw data from your attempts, trying to understand a woman takes you down a rabbit hole with little fruit and much dirt and mud. You may hate women after you’re through, and wonder why you put so much effort into them in the first place.

There are patterns that come up and I take note of them (mostly to share it for you guys), but that’s just for fun. You don’t need to understand women to get laid, but you do need to know what they like from a man of your personality, background, look, etc., which comes almost entirely from experience. In fact I think a girl likes it when you don’t care to understand them. You’re aloof and difficult, wrapped up in your own magical world of masculinity and pensiveness.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Colombia Analysis

May 19, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

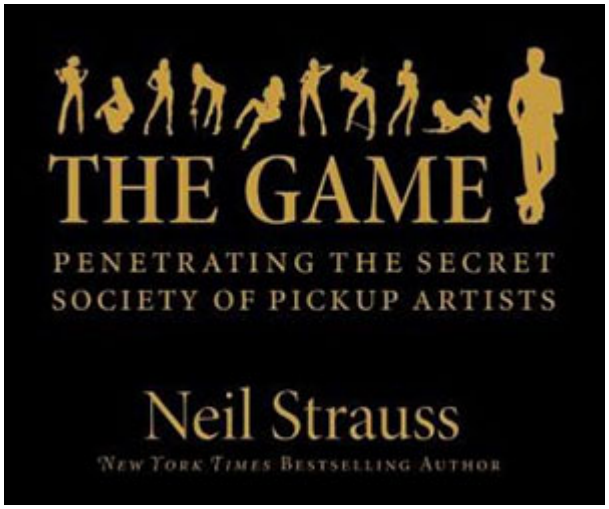
I'm getting a lot of questions about how Colombia is, especially the girls. I'm going to hold off until after I leave to give you the complete run-down because I want to make conclusions on the full experience, but there are a couple things I can say right now.

Argentine girls are hotter than Colombian girls, but also harder.

Brazilian girls are sexier, more interesting and probably hotter than Colombian girls, but also easier.

I saw probably because Brazil is a huge country and you get a lot of variance depending on where you go. Plus it will come down to personal taste (i.e. if you like fake tits then Colombia is for you, if you like big asses and a wider variety of color then Brazil).

It's becoming more obvious to me every day that Brazil is the big winner. The guys who are singing the praises of Colombia the hardest have not yet been to Brazil, and that's all you really need to know, though I am enjoying myself in Medellin right now and will remain until I finish my second book.



First Date Kiss

May 24, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Excerpt from my book Bang:

> I cannot stress how important it is to kiss her by the end of the first date. Except for one exception, a virgin, every girl I have ever had sex with was kissed by that time. If we are aiming for sex by date three, a very reasonable goal, we need to get the first kiss done quickly. Otherwise it will take much longer to get there and you will enter the very dangerous territory of committing to a girl who is probably getting what she wants (attention, validation) at your expense. Kissing a girl by the first date is such a huge and reliable predictor of upcoming sex that I don't bother calling girls who resist it. With so many girls out there who are comfortable with intimacy, it'd be a waste of your time to go down the rabbit hole of a relationship with a girl who is going to blue ball you. You need to know how a girl is in bed before you decide to make a real investment in her, and it would be a large waste of your resources to wait until date eight or so to find out that she is a dead fish. Don't buy the juice before you get a squeeze.

Almost two years after these words were first published, they still hold true: I've never had sex with a girl I didn't kiss by the first date. While most of the sex I get now starts with a one night stand, I find it impossible to imagine how sex could occur promptly if the kiss doesn't happen quickly. Actually I can try:

First date ($60): Awkward hug.
Second date ($35): Kiss on cheek, maybe peck on the lips.
Third date ($120): Kiss on lips, but no groping.
Fourth date ($8): Kiss on lips plus groping.
Fifth date ($45): Hooking up on bed or couch, but no clothes come off. Brief titty grab.
Sixth date ($20): Girl resists at bra removal stage (you fumbled with the hooks for too long).
Seventh date ($2): Sex.

Assuming you have 1-2 dates a week, this process takes a month and an estimated cost of $290. Yeah sure that's one way to do it. Here's another way to do it:

First hour ($0): Talking and then make out.
Second hour ($8): Hand firmly planted on her ass.
Third hour ($0): Transition to second club.
Fourth hour ($8): Sloppy hook up with other girls watching, giving me that sexy eye.
Fifth hour ($0): Drunken animal sex on her uncomfortable futon.

There is nothing like extremely fast, impersonal sex to brighten any night. As for the thrill of the chase, isn't five hours enough? How many hours did our ancestors spend hunting game on the savanna? One hour maximum. Men are built for short, intense bursts of activity, not prolonged courtship where all energy is drained and the power shifts to the object being chased.

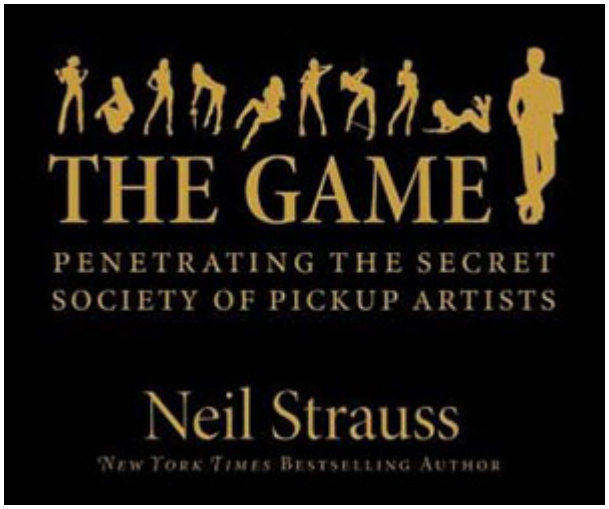
Bang details a game for a fast sex goal, not the idea of courtship you may be familiar with through Shakespeare and Hollywood movies in the romantic comedy genre.

Here's a new review:

> I have read Bang and I thought it was a beneficial read. I had recently ended a multi-year relationship and needed to update and refresh my game.
>
> Your book offers valuable insight into human interaction. Although the title of the book is Bang and the subject is mainly pleasure, I think many of the principles can be applied to business in order to help with networking, negotiating, selling, etc.
>
> My results from the book were great. I think the book provided me a way to get in the right mindset to begin approaching (and succeeding) after many years where it was not necessary to approach.
>
> I live a few blocks from the nightlife so I got to the point where I would go out just to run experiments. I found that I could wait until 90 minutes before the club closes and go out. I was having very successful results. I met a group of Brazilian girls one night, and I have been dating one since. I suppose I did not follow your advice when it came to how to prevent a relationship….

You can find out more about what's inside the book and read additional excerpts on the Bang homepage.



How To Walk Away From A Girl

May 26, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

"...in my opinion, it's better to split rocks on the road than to allow a woman to take possession of so much as the tip of your finger. It's all," Bazarov was about to use his favorite word, "romanticism," but restrained himself and said, "rubbish. You won't believe me now, but let me tell you, you and I fell into feminine society and found it pleasant, but brushing such society aside is just like dousing yourself with cold water on a hot day. Men don't have time for such nonsense."
—Fathers & Sons by Ivan Turgenev

When a girl says something rude or curt, whether it's making fun of your shirt or mocking your "line," there is only one way to respond to her:

"It was nice meeting you."

This is what girls say when they don't want to talk to you anymore so they know exactly what it means, and they'll feel rejected by it even if they weren't interested in you. It's a classy retort that prevents you from stooping to her level. You come out the better human being.

If you're a keyboard jockey I know what you're thinking: "But Roosh a girl calling you out on your line is only a Level III shit test! You have to respond in an alpha male manner with a witty DHVKOCK comeback and then swoop her caveman style while actively showing passive disinterest!" No, fuck that. If a girl doesn't know how to act and be respectful then she blew her chances with me. Only by coming after me and proving her worth after she makes a mistake is it appropriate to give her a second chance and the eventual privilege of riding my veiny cock.

Most Dangerous South American Countries

May 27, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My ranking is based on your chances of getting robbed by a pick pocket or mugger. I'm not counting murders or kidnapping. To construct this list I used personal experience and stories that came back to me from other travelers. It's by no means scientific, but should give you a good idea of what to expect.

From most dangerous to safest…

Brazil. Everyone seems to get robbed here. All my Brazilian friends have been robbed many many times and I think it was a miracle that I wasn't, especially during Carnival. This country is not for beginners.

Ecuador. Den of thieves. Problem here is pick pocketing and bag theft on buses. Everyone has either been robbed or almost robbed in Quito (I was pick pocketed).

Venezuela. I was there in 2005 but hear it's since gotten significantly worse. Caracas is the most dangerous city in South America.

Peru. I think there is so much crime here because you have a lot of beginner tourists wanting to see Machu Picchu. Mostly pick pockets and bus theft.

Paraguay. I haven't heard a lot of stories out of here, and I only spent a week in the capital. It's on par with Bolivia and Peru.

Bolivia. Outside of La Paz, the danger factor is average. In the medium sized cities I've walked around at night without problems.

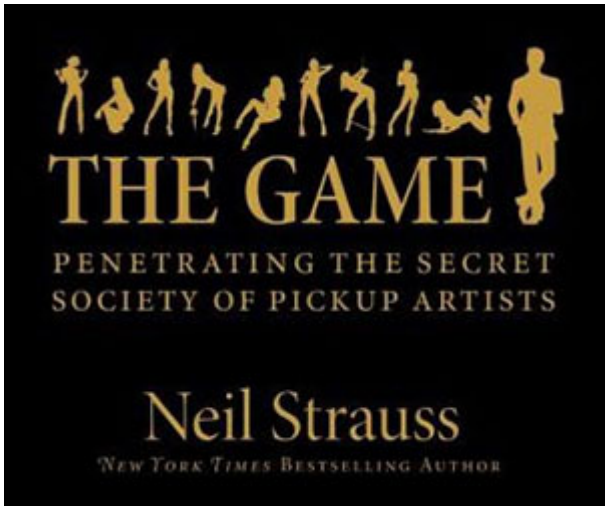
Colombia. Surprisingly safe if you take basic precautions in cities at night. There are lots of expats here and on average they've been mugged "only" once every year or two.

Argentina. Buenos Aires does get a few gringos, but as a whole the country is very safe and I've stumbled out of clubs in the middle of the night dozens of times without problems. I don't know anyone personally who has been robbed in Argentina and I spent almost three months there.

Uruguay. The beach towns are extremely safe. You can leave your belongings for a quick swim and be reasonably certain they'll be there when you come back. A good beginner trip would be Argentina and then Uruguay.

Chile. It's very similar to Argentina but I'm giving it the title of safest South American country because I took the Santiago subway with my 40-pound pack to the bus station. Valparaiso has sketchy areas at night but you can tone down the paranoia factor a bit here.

Even though Chile is the "safest" country in South America, keep in mind it's around two times more dangerous than Washington DC at night. You'll definitely feel it when the sun comes down. Wherever I am in South America, I fully expect to be robbed every time I walk out the door, so I only take what I need. Worst case I'm out 50 bucks and an old digital camera. My only fear is getting my entire bag robbed. That would be catastrophic.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Be That Guy

May 31, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I want to share with you an epiphany I had years ago. I was trying to bang this girl and she was being very flakey and taking forever to get back to me. I asked my friend what I should do about it and we proceeded to go over my options after I told him everything that had transpired so far.

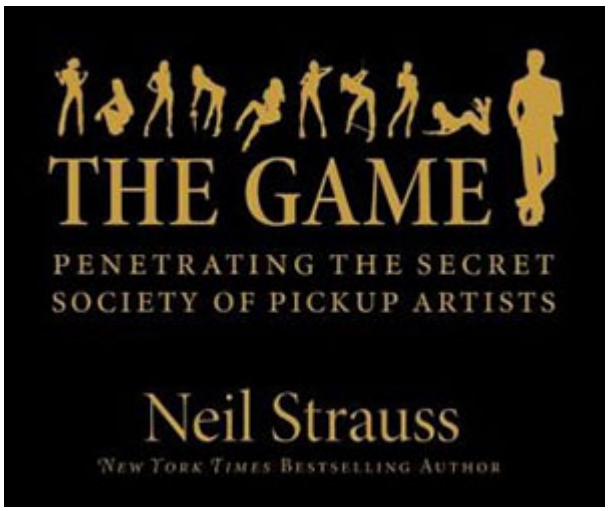
At the end I thought, “Is she doing this with her friends right now? Is she asking her friend how to get with me? Is she asking her friend how to get me to stop flaking?”

Of course not.

Even though she wasn’t treating me well, I was still chasing her. Even though she was barely encouraging me, I wanted her bad. It’s human nature.

If you eavesdrop on conversations with girls, you will hear them talk about guys that are flakes. Guys that don’t call. That put in the minimum amount of work. That don’t give much notice on dates and then cancel them at the last minute. That fuck the girl and then make an excuse to leave within minutes. You think that guy is stressing over the girl? You think he’s asking his friends for help? No, he’s too busy working on other girls. He doesn’t care about any of them. He has no attachments. With no attachments he doesn’t do the pathetic, desperate, needy shit that 95% of other guys do.

I realized then that I had to BE THAT GUY, and not the guy who plots and tries and talks about what to do next. Because the moment you have to try is the moment you care, and the moment you care is the moment she has you, and all you’ll have is your hand, waiting for the phone to ring.



Open Letter To Virgle Kent

June 1, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Dear Virgle Kent,

Since I brought some extra medium t-shirts with me to Colombia one of the first things I did when I arrived in Medellín was ask around for a gym. Sure I want to stay in shape but my goal is part vanity: I remember all the times that girls came up to you and started touching your body like it was a piece of meat and I wouldn't mind that happening to me. Plus your recent post on gym game got me motivated.

Medellín has a chain of excellent gyms called Body Tech but the membership price is outrageous, something like $120 a month. My meathead dreams dashed, I decided to stick to my normal routine of pushups, pullups, and then a brisk run. (There is a childrens playground two blocks from my place where I can do pullups.)

I went to the stadium for my first run. Each lap around it is 0.44 miles (I measured it using Google Maps), so 7 laps got me to about 3 miles. Afterwards I started walking to the subway station when a shirtless man inside a park off the sidewalk caught my eye. He was doing bench presses. Curious, I walked closer and there it was—a free outdoor gym.

There were two jungle gym apparatuses in the middle for doing pull ups and four concrete benches for chest, two flat and two incline. There were parallel bars for dips and other bars for doing abs. The weights were not weights that you are used to but concrete blocks permanently attached to the bars. Plastic buckets were used as molding and in most cases they're still attached to the concrete. There are no numbers on them so I have no idea how much they weigh (it's a matter of feeling them out to see if it's the proper weight). Most of the bars are long but a couple are shorter for doing bicep curls or chest flys.

I started working out immediately. Alongside me were five other guys who I wouldn't want to be caught with in a dark alley at night. They had menacing looks and wouldn't stop staring at my obvious gringo appearance, and I'm sure they wondered why I didn't go to a real gym since I'm probably rich. Little do they know I'm in the same boat as them.

I'm so used to proper machines that besides the most basic exercises I didn't know what to do. So I watched the guys, who were very creative with how to use the equipment. I didn't know there were so many different ways of doing pull ups. You would probably laugh at their technique though—actually they had no technique because they'd do one set of something, then they do something completely different, and then something different. They were mixing chest and back exercises. But they were cut as fuck. Not really huge like you but extremely ripped. I copied them.

This past Sunday was my fourth visit.

The ground is dirt and since May is the rainiest month in Medellín there is mud in certain spots. There is no water fountain obviously but an old guy comes every half-hour to sell small bags of water for a quarter. During sporting events at the stadium a third of the gym doubles as a parking lot. One time I worked on the incline about four feet from a Peugot while this guy's dog was rubbing up against my leg. Some of the lifting bars are bent and without soft padding I can see callouses develop in real time. It feels like working out in a prison gym. I'm out in the yard keeping my eye out for the the guy who wants shank me in the ribs. I haven't been shanked but I have had my water bottle stolen twice.

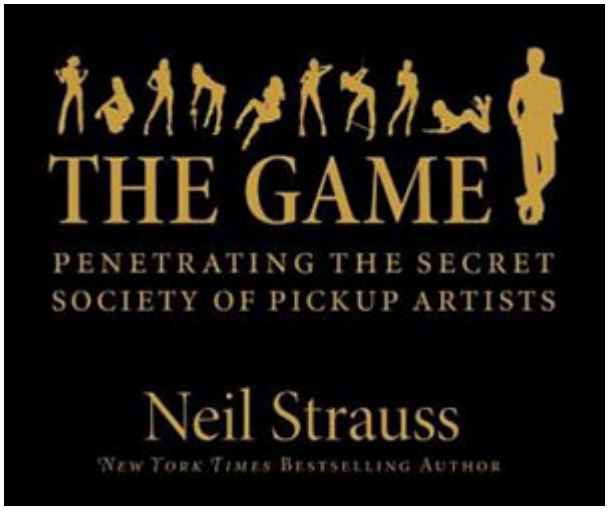
When I do chest flys I have to breathe through my nose because when I tap the bars at the top dirt falls right down on my mouth. Have you done bench presses on a concrete bench before? It fucks up your clavicles. I have two red spots on my back that don't seem to be going away. Nonetheless I feel like a man. I wish you were with me in this gym so you could feel more manlier than normal as well.

When I come back I'm going to be so strong that I will want to start fights in the bars with the nerds who accidentally bump into me. I'll only do it when you're right there though so you can get my back. Thanks bro.

Sincerely,

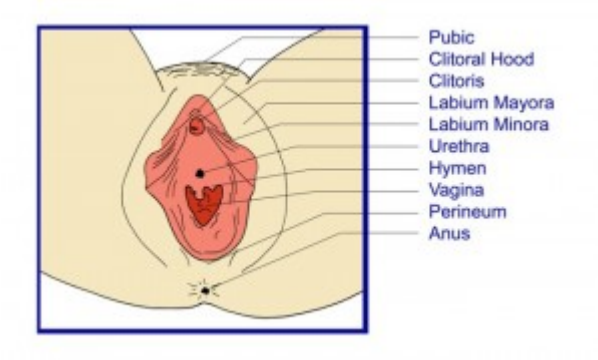
Roosh



Help, My Vagina Doesn’t Feel Anything!

June 3, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

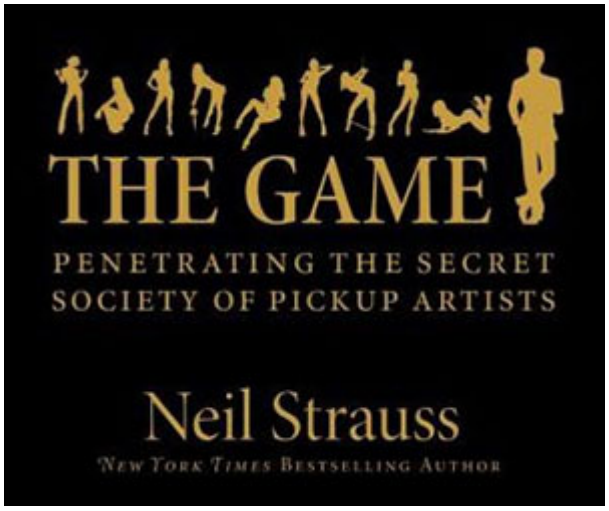
I woke up the other day with a boner and kept it going by thinking of sex without condoms. A thought that entered my mind is how most girls cannot feel the difference between a naked penis and one covered with a condom. Condoms have broken on me a couple hundred times and only a once has the girl noticed (of course each time I pretended the condom was still on and kept going like an animal just let out of a cage). Many girls have straight up told me that can’t tell the difference.



A condom is a smooth layer of latex, a totally different feel of real skin. How can a girl’s vagina not tell the difference between latex and skin? That must mean the inside guts of the vagina is not as sensitive as we think. Her fingers can definitely tell the difference when she’s directing the cock action, but her vagina cannot. Since men can tell the difference between sex with a condom and without, that tells me the penis is far more sensitive to touch than the vagina is. That also means a sound strategy for illegal raw dog sex is to introduce a hole in your condom that causes certain breakage.

So what gets a girl off then? For them sex is more about the entire act, across mind and body, and not just centered one one organ of their body. For men it’s all about the dick. Our entire body except for our dick can be lying in an isolation chamber but still get off (think glory hole).

If you can conquer a woman’s mind, she will enjoy the sex regardless of your performance, assuming you’re at least average. Trying to understand the vagina is like trying to understand the woman attached to it, an exercise in futility.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Kissing Technique

June 7, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Continuing on the kiss theme, here's an excerpt from Bang:

> Don't overdo the kiss. She may interpret your desire to constantly kiss her as neediness. You always want to leave her wanting more by stopping short right before you think she is get-ting satisfied. If on a first date I kiss a girl for say a total of five minutes, I'd rather do it in five one-minute bursts than one five-minute session. After you pull back from the first kiss of the date (it will always be you that pulls back from kisses first), wait a good 10 minutes before you go back in again to show her that kissing is not a big deal, and resume conversation like nothing major happened. Re-entry is best when another natural silence in the conversation takes place. Feel free to throw in a couple fake-outs where you get really close like she thinks you are going to kiss her again but you pull back and continue conversation. Be unpredictable about when you end kisses—sometimes you go in for a minute, sometimes two minutes, and sometimes only twenty seconds. Save the extended make-outs for when you get her in a bedroom. You want to tease her—blue-balling yourself in the short term—to turn her on so much that she doesn't resist when you escalate in the bedroom.

Here's all you need to know about kissing girls:

Less is more.

Less is more.

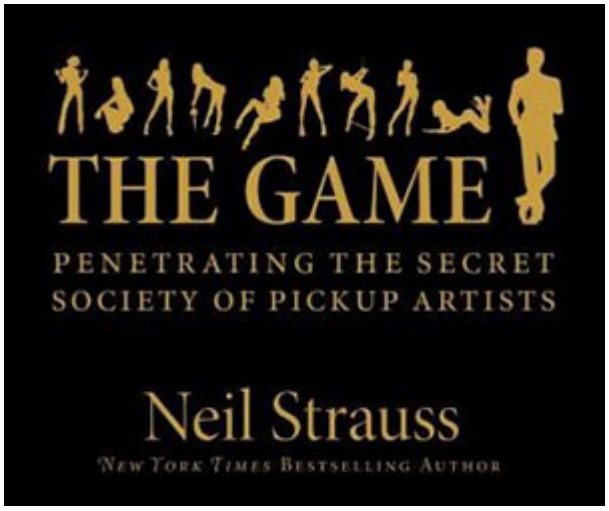
Less is more.

You're not in college anymore. There is no reason to open your mouth wide enough that a kittens head can fit into it and then go crazy. Unless the girl is drunk (or Brazilian), she will not enjoy it.

If you spy on dates you see two kinds of guys. The guys who don't give a fuck, where the girl keeps coming into him, and the guys who try to kiss the girl at every instant he gets, like he's scared she's going to walk out on him if he doesn't release his tentacle grasp upon her. Which guy is going to get his dick sucked hard by the end of the night?

For about the first two dates, you will be trying to kiss her more than she kisses you. But by date three, once her attraction for you is hopefully cemented, it should be the other way around. She should be on you like a wet rag, kissing you to claim her territory in front of other girls. But if you're trying to claim her as territory, then your hold on her is weak and she will soon get tired of you because you are needy and desperate. Also, you're leaving a trail of drool flowing down on her chin. Might want to get that with a napkin.

I recently updated the Bang homepage with 10 new sample pages that you probably haven't read before, including tips from approaching to sealing the deal.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

True Cost Per Notch

June 9, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previously I tried to calculate my cost per notch by dividing the amount of money I spent on dates and girl within a period of time by the number of girls I banged. It was fun to calculate and helped me realize that I could be a lot more frugal and still get laid a lot, but recently I thought about it a bit more.

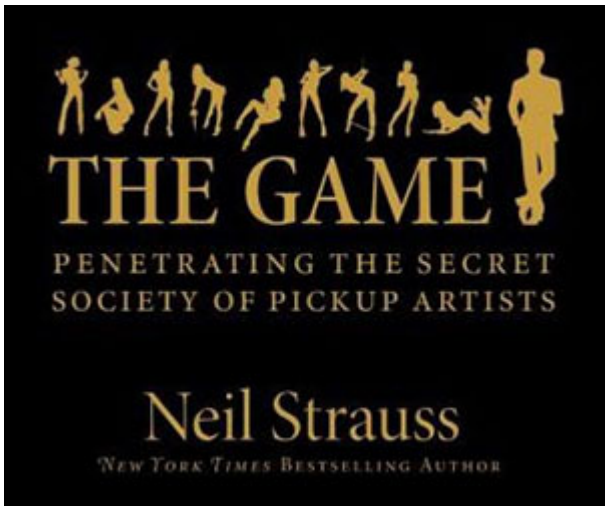
The reason I exist is to reproduce. In other words everything that I do in life, no matter how unrelated to the act of getting laid, is a cost against getting laid. Whether that is renting an apartment, shopping for a shirt, eating a post-dinner snack, taking a language class, or buying a book, it should all be counted towards my cost per notch. The apartment provides a space to bang my girl. The shirt is how I present myself to the girl. The snack provides sustenance to give me a pleasing appearance. The language class enables me to communicate. The book makes me a more cultured person able to have conversation with girls. And so on. The purpose for my entire being is for the act of sex, so everything that comes with being should be counted towards sex.

The true cost per notch is your total expenses for life divided by girls banged.

Because I have detailed spending budgets saved for many years in Excel, I can give you a rough number for my true cost per notch.

2006: $6,500
2008: $3,100.
First five months of 2009: $1,400

That's a 78% reduction in getting laid cost from 2006 to 2009. I attribute this entirely to game and niche finding. While I don't recommend you spend thousands of dollars on a dubious workshop, my data shows that you can save yourself many times that if you advance to a high level of game. It's too costly not to learn, as the guys with TCPN's in the high five digits can probably tell you.

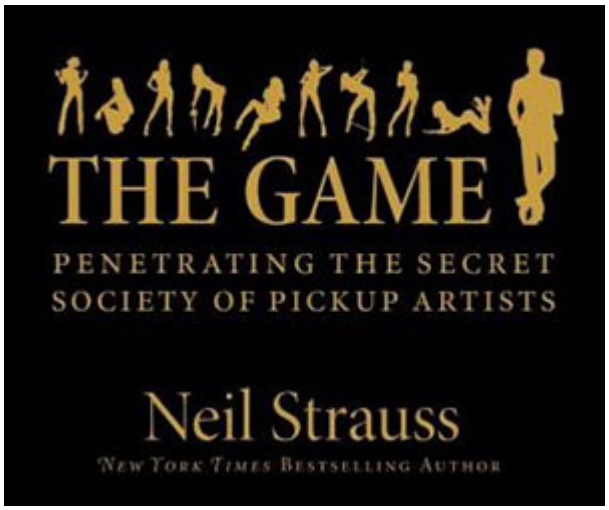


Thought Experiment

June 10, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

You're on a first date with a fine Colombian girl who knows just about the same English as you know Spanish. It's a toss up as to who speaks each other's language better. Should you speak in English or Spanish during the date? Think carefully through the reasoning.

Correct answer: Speak in English. When you speak a foreign language you're not fluent in there will be many moments of frustration where you can't express yourself properly. This leads to feelings of inadequacy, which you want her to experience instead of you. She will be looking inward to her own failure instead of your possible flaws. You are her teacher guiding her towards the light. You are the authority figure. As long as she understands your jokes, you're going to get some at the end of the date because she will be wondering if you still even like her after she was barely able to speak to you.



Happy Birthday

June 13, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I’m 30.

With this right mix of youth and experience I have a good feeling about the future.

Forum Plug

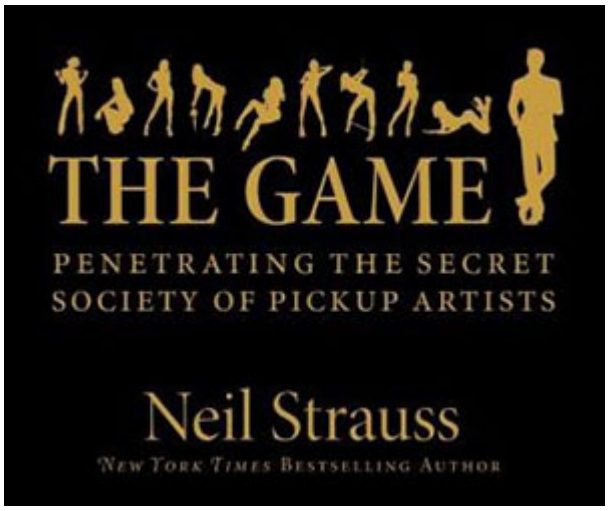
June 14, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've noticed a couple changes to my forum in the past couple months. Whereas before there was a dearth of expertise in the Girls forum, there has been a noticeable increase in guys who know what they're talking about, with less "How do I get this girl?" questions from guys who can't type complete sentences. The biggest surprise though has been Travel forum, which is becoming a resource where many guys use to plan their vacations (see this post on Iceland).

Thankfully, you won't find many acronyms or five page "field reports" of cringe-worthy lines.

Here are some interesting recent threads:

- Going to Brazil in June
- Chance of getting laid in India
- Just landed in Rio
- Prague
- Medellin
- Safety/Protection in South America
- Older guy wants younger girl
- The jaded girls
- Situation suggestions?
- Any other smokers out there?
- What's up with American girls?
- Cooking for women
- Better part of the Middle East



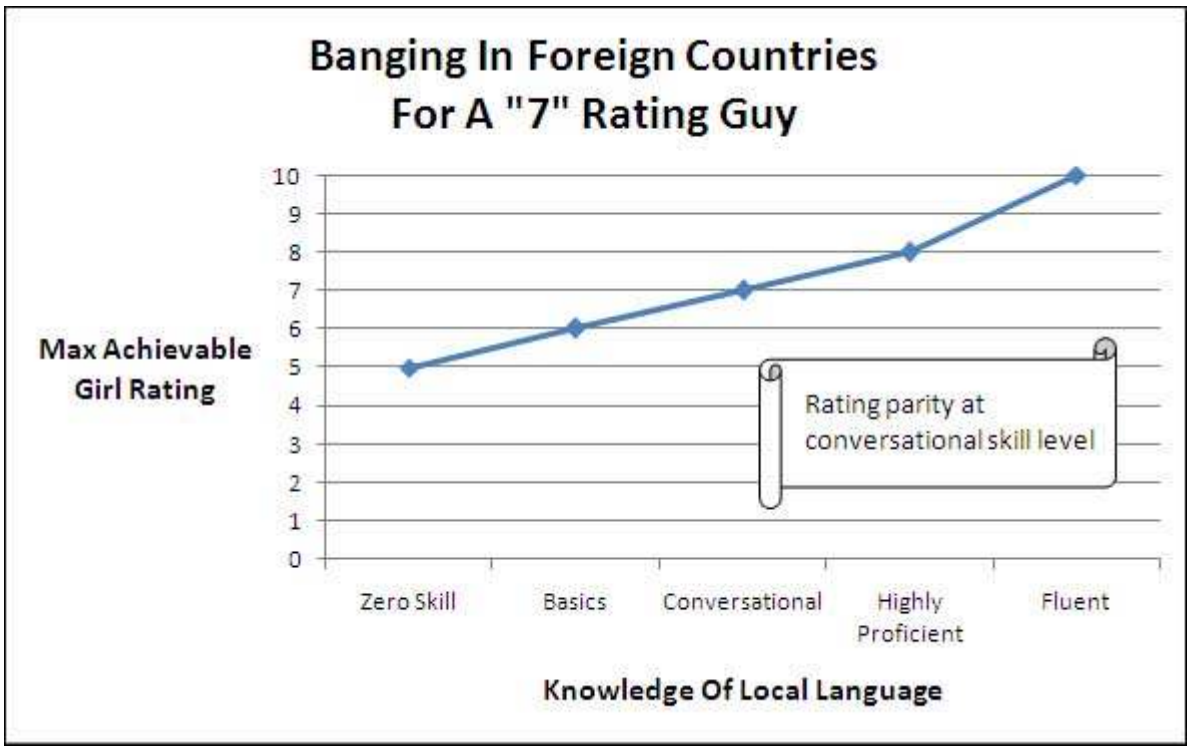
Banging Girls Who Don’t Speak Your Language

June 16, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Only one girl I’ve banged in South America didn’t speak any English (the other non-English speakers I could’ve banged were either ugly or fat, or both). It’s now clear to me that language is the most a man can do to increase his quality in a foreign country. If you can’t communicate properly then you’ll be circling around the dreg pool, where her attraction will be mostly based on your looks.

I’m made a couple graphs to demonstrate this fact. They assume two things: (1) You have competent game, and (2) The girl does not speak a word of your native tongue. Let’s keep this simple and assume things like status and money aren’t factors.

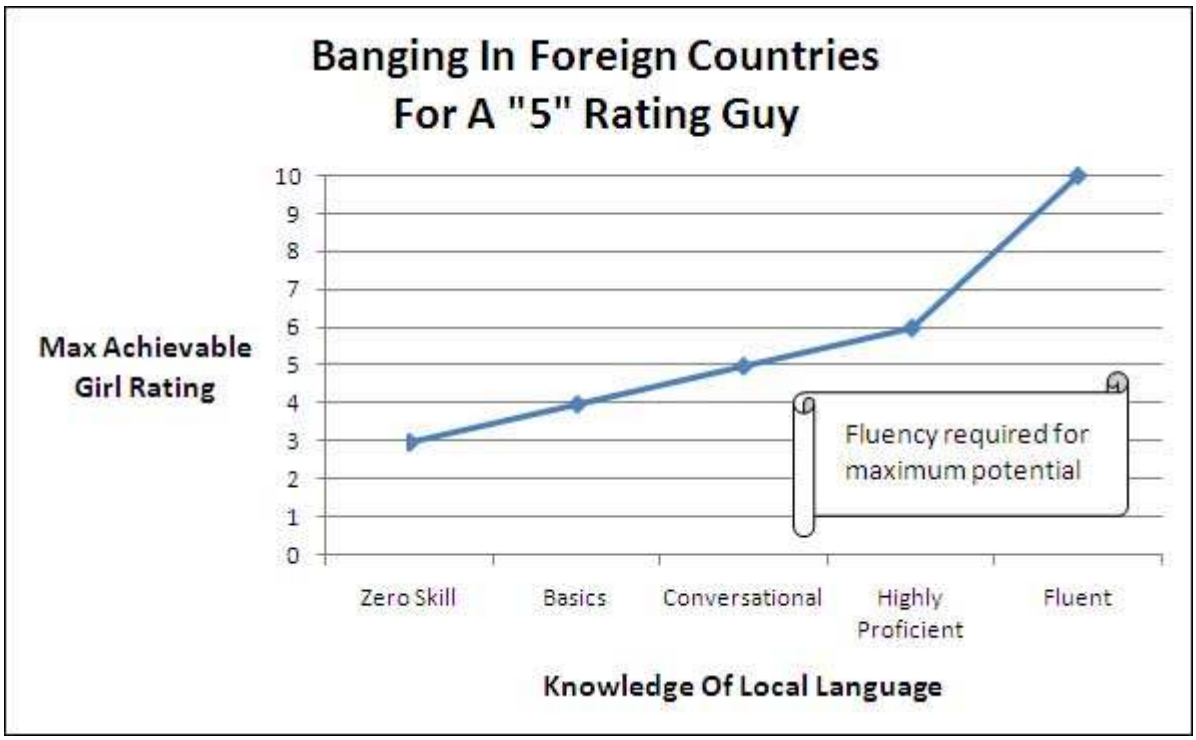
This first graph is based on a man whose looks are in the 7 range.



Notice how he cannot get better than his looks unless he is proficient at the language. This is my problem. I’m in the conversational skill range which means I can’t do a whole lot better than my looks.

In order for me to see a bump in quality I have to master the language, but to master the language I need hundreds of hours of speaking under my belt. So I’m dating girls I don’t really care for just to speak in Spanish. That sets up a nice win-win scenario because even if I don’t get laid on a date I’ll still get in a lot of practice at a cost that is less than a private language tutor.

Okay now let’s take a look at a guy who is in the 5 range.



Do you see what fluency does? Sky's the limit. When you see ugly guys with hot girls in the United States, I guarantee you they speak the same language (duh). This is only possible in a foreign country if there is a large exchange of cash or drugs.

You should consider your language knowledge factor if you want to fuck beautiful girls abroad, assuming you don't want to pay for it. The exception is if you're an exceptionally good looking guy, but even knowing the basics will bump up what you can get by a solid point. The lesson in this is to study the language before you go, and don't be like a lot of pathetic American gringos I've met who come to Colombia just to fuck prepagos (prostitutes).

Post-Gym Gaming

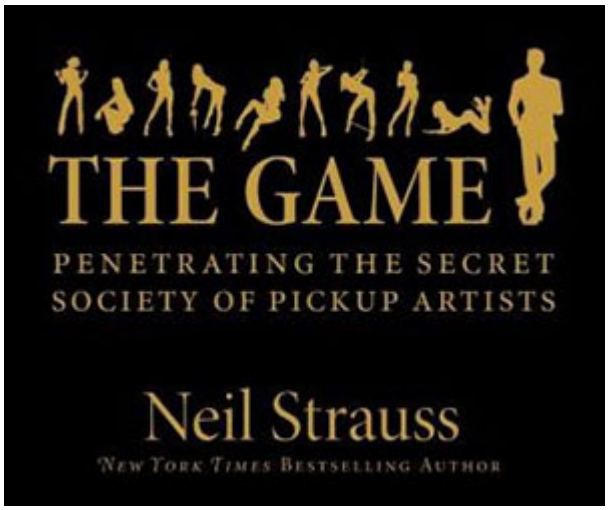
June 18, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There was a post on Roissy's blog about gaming when you're hungover. I like the points made by the reader, but the absolute last thing you want to do while hangover is talk to anyone, let alone try to get laid.

A similar state is soon after a very tough workout. I'm talking about at least an hour lifting weights followed by a brisk 2-3 mile run, not jog. If you feel like you're going to collapse by the end of it, then it was hard enough. You'll feel destroyed and your body will ache. Movements become very slow, as are your responses to stimuli. You walk like a wounded giant, deliberate with each step. Your eyes linger on insignificant objects. A gentle calm comes out when you speak, carefully enunciating each word, pausing after every several. Time slows.

Take a shower and then head to the bar. You'll be horny because of the testosterone pumping through your veins. Sit down and mull over your drink until a girl comes into your view. At this point your opener will not matter because your body says it all: supremely confident man without a care in the world. Little does the girl know that you're just exhausted, not really supremely confident.

If your primetime night is Saturday night, I expect you at the gym at around 5pm. We don't want too many hours of recovery before you go out.



The Diminishing Necessity Of Picture Taking

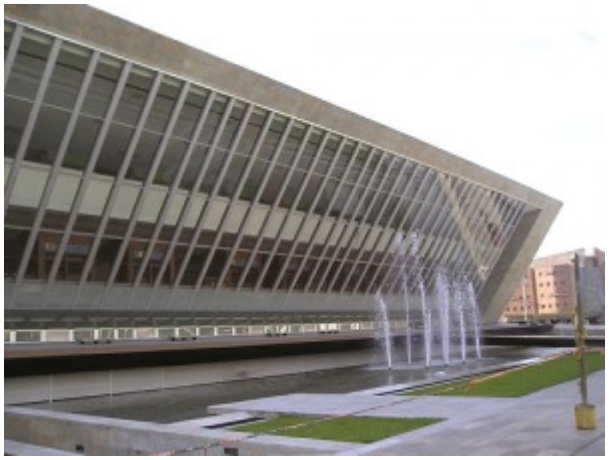
June 21, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It is no longer necessary for me to take a camera while traveling. We've arrived to the point where every possible monument, building, desert, plain, outhouse, storefront, plaza, cathedral, beach, and market has been captured by another human being and uploaded onto the internet. It's just wasted labor to take photos that not only have been taken by other people, but taken far better than I can.

I was in Bogota. Let's plug that into Flickr. Here's Bogota.

Does it matter that I didn't take the photo? No. I'm in Medellin. Here's the building where I take Spanish classes, found via Google.

Here's a nice library I've been to a few times, from Flickr.



I've seen this particular vantage point with my own eyes but I didn't take a photo. Doesn't make a difference. My experience in Bogota or at a school or library is not diminished by the fact that I didn't capture it with an electronic device.

So what's left? Pictures of people.

Does the world really need more photos of me in front of monuments and other places? If anything the picture is ruined if I'm in it.

I'll meet friends on the road no doubt. Surely I'll want photos of them, but I will likely add them on Facebook, where there will be hundreds of their photos at my disposal. That person does not need another photo taken of him or herself, I can assure you.

I'll get laid on the road, and want to take pictures of the girls I have sex with. Why? To show my friends that I can score? Doesn't matter anyway, because she'll be on Facebook too. Unless I'm taking naked photos there's no need to turn on my camera.

As long as everyone else takes their camera everywhere, you no longer have to.

Medellin Is Testing My Will & Strength

June 22, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you're a square then Medellin has nothing for you to worry about. But if you have some vices then you could get sucked in.

Hookers - A bang in a whorehouse is $13. You can get a threesome for $25. I heard of a whorehouse that had an anal special for May. It's no surprise that a lot of gringos come to Colombia just to frequent the whorehouses.

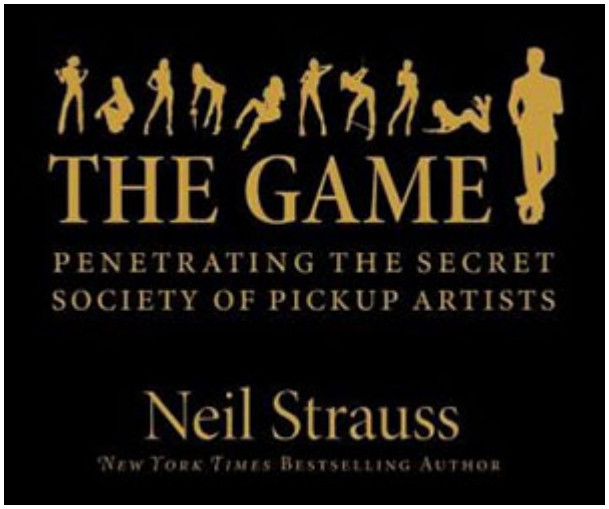
Drugs - A gram of cocaine is about $5, but if you got a guy then $2.50. A fifth of an ounce of marijuana is $5 (I'm guessing the weight but it's good for about 20 cigarette-sized joints). Pharmaceuticals are also cheap.

Casinos - There are a handful of clean casinos that have the usual games including hold 'em poker. The blackjack tables allow surrender which improves your odds somewhat. I have found $1 blackjack tables. People play like fucking idiots (I saw a guy split 6's against a dealer face) but it's fun if you have a friend.

Alcohol - Many clubs offer all-you-can-drink specials that start at $15. Domestic beer, rum, and aguaardiente are dirt cheap.

Silicone- More fake breasts than any city in the United States. Really adds to the overall ambiance.

Las Vegas got nothing on Medellin.

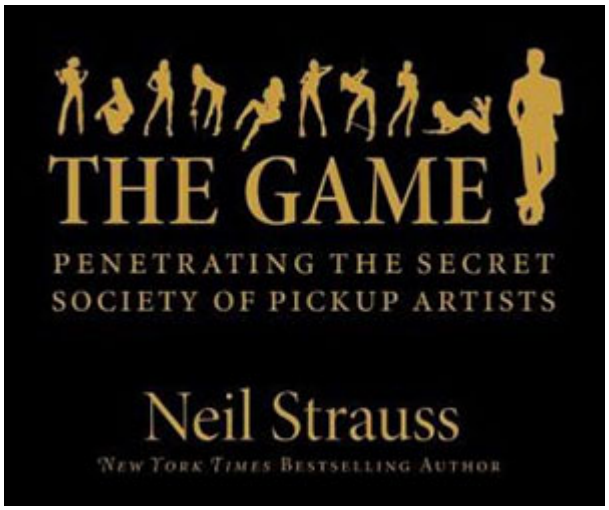


OWNED

June 23, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

American gringo comes to Colombia to fuck prostitutes every day. Gives them an extra ten dollars to fuck raw dog. Did it on several girls. One girl has an improperly implanted birth control device of some sort in her vagina. Nicks his dick on it while fucking and out comes the blood. With a Colombian prostitute.

I think the chance of getting HIV from a prostitute is low… unless you go raw and get your dick gashed up in the vagina. Idiot.



Thought Experiment

June 25, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

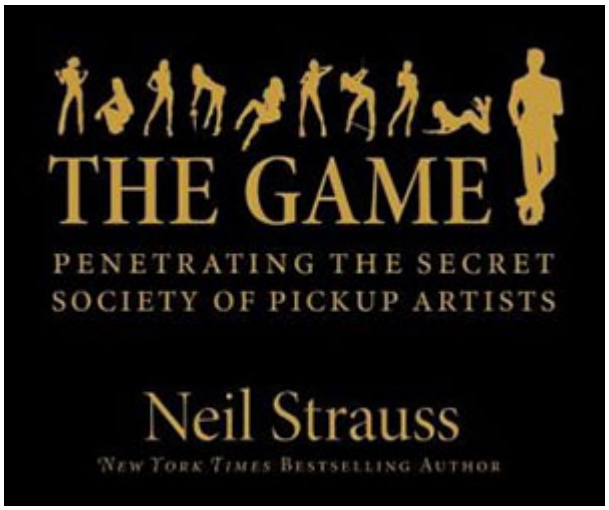
So it's likely I have unconsciously swiped Roissy's "Test Of Your Game" feature and repackaged it into a "Thought Experiment." I swear it seemed original when it popped in my head! Let's hope he doesn't mind.

You're in front of a Colombian club, waiting for your Swedish friend to finishing smoking his cigarette, when you see a girl wearing yellow Chuck Taylors giving you the eye. Cute face, extremely petite, unknown ass size. You walk up to her and say something in English. She doesn't understand so you translate it into Spanish and she laughs along with her friends. There's eight of them total, six girls and two guys. You go inside the club with your Swedish friend after chatting the group up a bit.

One hour later she tells you to join her in a corner section of the club. You don't care for dancing but you know dancing is very important for Colombian girls so you fake the salsa steps and move your hips a little to the reggaeton as you get closer and closer to the girl in the yellow shoes. She can dance, of course, like all other Colombian girls, and you get a raging boner that will force you to furiously masturbate later.

Two hours pass and you've since explored her ass (not huge but meaty) and it's obvious the girl is really into you, but you're tired of dancing. You sit down on the couch and next to you is one of her friends that you didn't notice earlier.

The new girl is a little more plump but has a more feminine appearance compared to her hipster friend. She's wearing tight clothes that reveal her curves and has hair that goes down to her ass. Her mascara is think and heavy but it contrasts well with her dark hair and tan skin. You chat her up and instantly it hits you that you settled on the wrong girl. You want the new girl instead. What do you do?



Re: Thought Experiment

June 28, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY: "You chat her up and instantly it hits you that you settled on the wrong girl. You want the new girl instead. What do you do?"

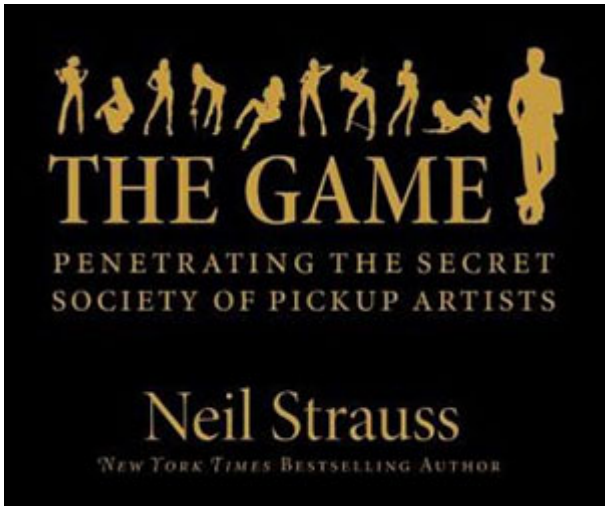
Unfortunately there is nothing you can do on the same night. The large amount of time spent on the girl in the yellow shoes has made it clear to her and everyone else that she is your pick for the night. Even if the new girl does like you, will she agree to see you at risk of damaging her close friendship? No. If you go for the new girl it's a 95% guarantee you will get neither girl. But!

If you know for a fact the girls aren't close friends, try for the switch right then and there. Otherwise…

The correct move is to stick to the girl in the yellow shoes and date her. Only after you seal the deal with her can you take a chance on the new girl, who you will surely see again in this case since Colombians like to hang out in huge groups. One possible move is to date the new girl for a while and eventually dump her, easing into a friendship where you give her the hope of getting back together. Since officially you're single, you can attempt to pass yourself to the new girl like the neighborhood bicycle.

You will need much more time with the new girl for her to risk the friendship than the 20 minute exposure she had to you in the club. If you bang one, you'll have a better chance at banging the other. It's still an incredible long shot, but the best shot you have.

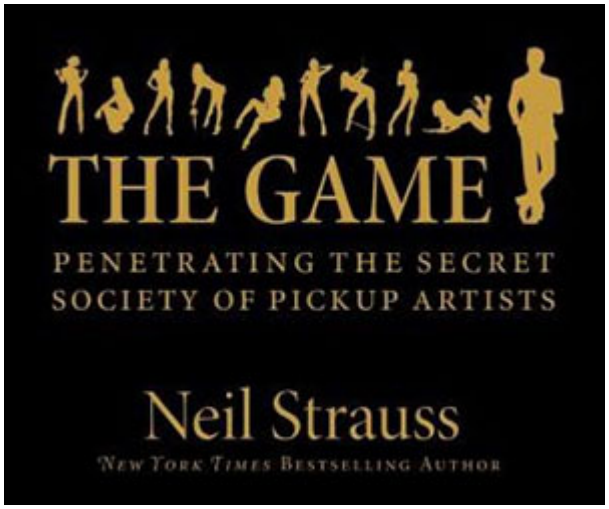
This is not a favorable situation under any circumstance and you'll be lucky if you can pull it off once in your lifetime. The lesson is to properly survey your surroundings and choose wisely from the get-go.



Roosh Interview

June 29, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There's a somewhat lengthy interview of me over at pick-up blog Latin Stylez. The 26-questions are roughly divided into two parts: pick-up and travel escapades. There is also a question on my future plans.



My Drinking Strategy

July 1, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

"This wine is too good for toast-drinking, my dear. You don't want to mix emotions up with a wine like that. You lose the taste."
—The Sun Also Rises by Ernest Hemingway

After a decade or so of drinking, I have settled on a strategy which lessens the negative effects of alcohol while maximizing the amount of pussy I get, and I'd like to share that with you right now.

First, let's take a night that I drink heavily on—at least five liquor beverages in a short amount of time. After the fourth drink in less than two hours, there comes a point where I feel absolutely invincible, like I can hit on any girl in the universe with the tightest of tight game. Unfortunately it's an illusion. I think my game is great but it's actually not proven by the results: I rarely pull when drunk. Just like how a drunk guy thinks the girl he's talking to is hotter than she really is, when heavily intoxicated I think my game is better than it is. Plus, that feeling of invincibility fades very quickly as the depressant side of alcohol takes effect and all I want to do is lean against the bar or sit down.

You're probably thinking, "Wait, I've gotten laid when drunk many times." If you go back to those nights, I believe what happens is you interest a girl while merely buzzed, and then continue drinking with her until you're both drunk. So the drunkenness comes after you already lock in your prospect, and is very rarely the direct cause of sex.

Second, research has shown that binge drinking messes with your dendrites (neural connectors). I like my dendrites and don't want to damage them.

Third, it takes a while for alcohol to work its way through your body. If you're feeling fucked up and then buy a sixth drink, you're going to feel really fucked in a couple hours since the fifth drink hasn't even taken effect yet. This is why police officers don't mind waiting an hour or two until testing your blood for alcohol at the station (the lowest you'll blow is when they pull you over). It's a waste of money to be done partying but still processing the last couple drinks you bought.

Keeping the above points in mind, while also wanting the favorable of alcohol's loosening effects, my strategy is as follows:

Consume no more than three scotch drinks or five light beers per night.

You get the buzzing effects of the alcohol while still retaining that pimp game ability. You avoid the effects of hangover. You kill very few brain cells. You don't hurt your wallet. You're disciplined and rely on your abilities instead of drink, since three drinks will not give you stupendous courage. It puts you on a similar level playing field as 80% of the girls who are drinking, and very rarely will you be drunker than her, which is death when it comes to pick up.

I get my scotch with two or three rocks and then sip sip for about hour, enjoying the effects as they take hold in a comfortable manner. My third scotch is done by 1am but I continue to feel a light buzz until 3am closing time. The next day I wake up refreshed, whether in my bed or in a girl's. Best of all I only spend a maximum of $35 a night of drinking the finest of spirits. I can be dirt poor but still do this.

Roosh’s Perfect Burger

July 2, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

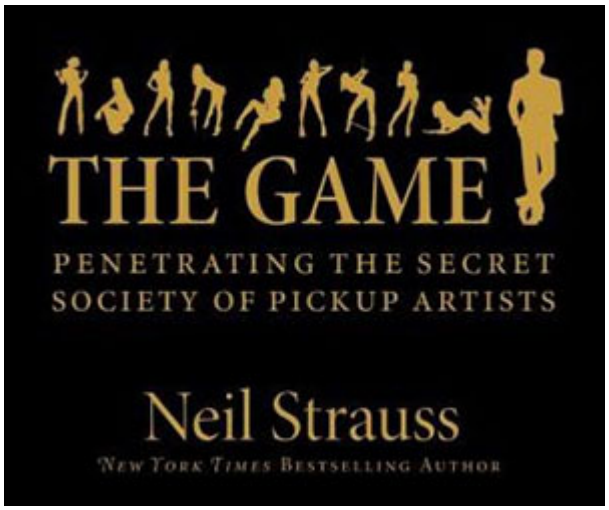
Before I share with you my blockbuster burger recipe, I must state that I don’t eat a lot of red meat (about one pound a month). It’s not that I have any objections to eating cow, but I think the way it’s produced today is disgusting. Still I can’t resist a good burger, which I have perfected and will now share with you. Feel free to make this for your Independence Day barbecue.

1: Get a third-pound hunk of ground beef and add the following spices: salt, pepper, and cumin, in a three, two, and one ratio, respectively. This means three parts salt for two parts pepper for one part cumin. In case you’re wondering, the cumin gives it a nice earthy flavor. Go a bit heavy on the salt—no point trying to be healthy when you’re eating the shredded scraps off the slaughterhouse floor.

2: Put the patty in a pan and circle it with sizable chunks of pineapple. Cover the pan and fry on medium-high heat. The grease will leak out of the patty and soak the pineapple in meaty goodness. Once that grease is almost evaporated, turn everything over. Slap on a slice of cheese and cook for about three or four minutes more, still covered. This should get you to at least medium-well. If you want it well-done then wait a couple minutes after turning it over before adding the cheese.

3: Toast thin bread. You want to taste the burger and toppings, not grain. Use cheap white bread, it doesn’t matter. Plop your meat on a slice of bread and top with cheese, tomato slices, pineapple (which will be just slightly charred—oh god, so good), avocado slices, honey mustard, ketchup, and lettuce. The ensuring burger will be a colossal mess, but pure heaven.

The secret to the burger is the cumin, avocado, and pineapple. Enjoy.



Poetry Girl Update

July 5, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A few months ago I introduced Poetry Girl, a girl who found out about my blog and flipped out because it clashed with her diehard feminist beliefs.

> She also said she was going through a feminist stage, saying, “If you really think hard about it, every man has violated a woman not just by rape but by going too fast or too deep during sex.” I wonder much longer it will take for feminists to say the act of consensual sex is actually brutal rape.

She posted some choice comments and I followed up with Open Letter To Poetry Girl

> How many minutes passed until our lips first touched? It couldn’t have been more than fifteen. The passion was too great, the lust too wild. You told me about 58 times that you don’t make out with guys in bars, so imagine how special I felt to be slobbering all over your face, caressing your soft butterfly lips with mine.

The very same night of that letter I ran into her at the same bar we met. I wrote a poem about what happened, and recite it in the video below. Following that is the full text of the poem and a closing thought.

I roll up to the bar with my crew, four deep
And who are those girls in the corner that I see?
You and your friends, partying like rock stars backstage
Sipping on long island iced teas

You made eye contact with me first
And it sent shivers down my spine
But look at these new girls in my path
The shorter one is mighty fine

My liver was aching for another drink
I move to my left and you’re right there
You stood stiff like a winter tree
But I’m on this new girl sooooo I didn’t care

I shoved my tongue down her throat right in front of your face
Her lips weren’t as full as yours
But she wasn’t annoying with all that feminist bullshit
I couldn’t wait to take off her drawers

Ooph that last stanza was rough
This medium of communication is so obtuse
Makes sense that you would like it
Along with your love of bitter grapefruit juice

Alright back to the story at hand

My tongue down the girl's throat
You watching like you wanted in
I had a boner like a rocky mountain goat

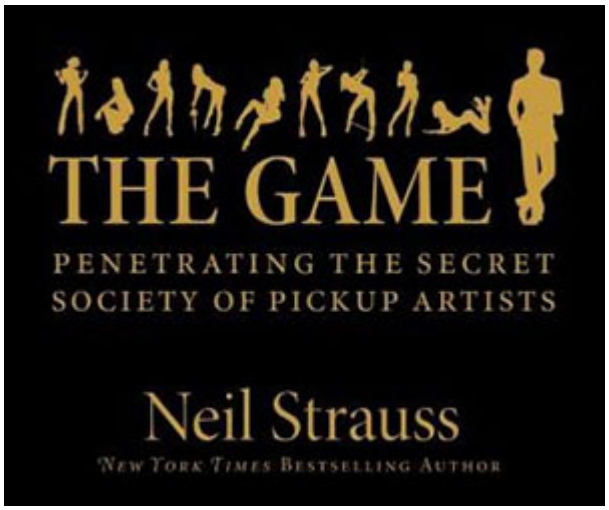
What's going on with my buddy over there?
Your friend is complimenting his cologne
And now she's touching his muscles
Now she's putting her number in his phone!

So I guess this night didn't turn out too well for you
You should've quit while you were ahead
Not try to give me longing looks of regret
I'll never bring you to my bed

There is a lesson to be learned in this. Girls are strong and can make all sorts of proclamations via phone or email, but once you get them face-to-face with a couple drinks they fold like cards and backtrack faster than you find another girl to hook up with.

Previous Videos:

- An Intimate Tour
- How To Be A Master Blogger Like Me
- The Big Leagues
- Bike Ride Home
- Ecuador Death Road & We're Pretty Much Homeless
- 6 Months In South America In 5 Minutes



Post-Sex Evidence Cleanup

July 7, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Life was easier when I was at my dad's. Girls knew they couldn't come over to "my place" so I did all the banging at theirs. They had to deal with cleaning up after my body hair, sperm, drool, mud streaks, etc. Even when I had my own place before I'd still do a lot of the banging on their bed, but in Colombia no girl lives alone so 100% of shags take place on my king size.

After each bang I do a clean sweep of the room to get ready for the next visitor. Colombian girls are more jealous and clingy than American girls so it's important they don't know you're fucking around or you're in for a visit from her machete-wielding little brother.

Post-Sex Checklist:

- Condom flushed down the toilet?
- Condom foil wrappers disposed of in kitchen trash, not bathroom trash?
- Girl's hair picked up and flushed down the toilet?
- Sex juice, lubricant, and blood blotted out from sheets with a dirty rag?
- "Forgotten" items like lipstick tucked away in secret location?
- Disposal of all my clothes that came into contact with girl into hamper, regardless of cleanliness?
- Hanging of bedsheets to air out any additional scents?
- Removal of all glassware with potential lipstick marks?

If I'm faithful to the checklist there are only two ways that I can get caught.

1. The girl gets a hold of my phone. I have text messages about meeting with girls though nothing blatant like, "The fuck you gave me last night was great." I am very careful about not leaving my phone around, especially since I forgot the password to lock it.

2. She sees me out with another girl. This is probably how I'm going to go down. I tend to hang out often in Medellín's Parque Lleras, a compact zone of bars and clubs, and visit the same few places. It's not because I like Parque Lleras, which is the cheesiest place in the city, but because I don't know of other places to go where my chance of being stabbed in between the ribs is acceptably low.

Physical evidence is the killer. You can always deny rumors or purported sightings by a friend, but a tiny piece of condom wrapper laying at the side of your bed and she'll never let it go. If she has no physical evidence on you, and did not you see with another girl, deny until you die. Be a sociopath and believe your denial. Tell her she's crazy. She knows you're a cheat and you know she knows you're a cheat but she has no proof so… not guilty.

Now I haven't made a verbal commitment to any girl, and they know I'm a pig, más o menos, but there is an expectation here that you be monogamous after a couple dates. Technically I don't and shouldn't have to make any effort to hide my activities, but it's worth the piece of mind. Plus I don't want girls to have a trump card to ever play on me. Don't ever give up that upper hand!

The Worst Thing You Can Do For Your Game Is Get Laid

July 8, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When not getting laid you're putting 95% of your brain power to making it happen, but once you have a regular bang it dips down to under 50%, a dangerous level for those wishing to improve. You don't brainstorm, try new things, or push yourself. Atrophy begins. Complacency is second only to laziness as a game killer.

The only time I really try, approaching both day and night, is when I'm not getting any ass. If I'm banging a pretty girl why would I put that energy into going out many times a week to find another? (Having a large harem of girls who live in your city is great if you have a lot of free time, but otherwise it's pretty exhausting.)

Assuming a girl I'm seeing keeps me sexually satisfied, I enjoy the little break where I don't have to try and scheme and plot for every cute girl I see. When I feel my game is slacking and I get bored with the girl, I simply dump her, making sure to burn the bridge, and start from zero again. Don't implement the fuck buddy maneuver if you want to keep your game sharp. The idea that you have a girl now and can transition to something better sounds good on paper, but I haven't seen this work out too well in the real world. You'll hear lots of people say, "Oh well you should never want it bad. You should have something on the side." WRONG! Only when a man is experiencing true hunger does he do what is necessary to feed himself.

The reason I got so involved into game, I suspect, is because in D.C. I rarely liked girls long enough to see them for more than a month or two. I was in a permanent state of hunt that always kept me involved. This is why you'll only find droves of "pick up artists" in places where the girl quality is shamefully low (per capita, I'm pretty certain that D.C. has the most PUAs in the United States). They need additional skills to pull the few gems out of the slimy cesspool.

Needy Girls Vs Confident Girls

July 12, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The most important quality that shapes your experience with a girl will be her self-esteem level. I want to focus on the two extremes, of girls who are very needy or very confident. Of course most girls are somewhere in the middle.

Needy girl: Emotional, "weak."
Confident girl: Aloof, hard to read, though she may slip while intoxicated.

Needy girl: Calls you when she shouldn't.
Confident girl: Pings you via email, sometimes text.

Needy girl: Has trouble playing the game. Finds it to be stifling, cold, unnatural.
Confident girl: More like a guy in how she approaches the game with her intense use of logic.

Needy girl: In a constant state of apprehension about how you feel or think about her.
Confident girl: Wondering if she could do better.

Needy girl: Tells you how she feels about you. Free-flowing with compliments.
Confident girl: Backhanded compliments, shows affections mostly with tepid gestures.

Needy girl: Busts out with the first "I love you" without thinking it through.
Confident girl: Does a cost-benefit analysis before saying it.

Needy girl: Must give her a lot of support, attention, and validation. May feel like her therapist at times.
Confident girl: She'll bitch and complain about things, but nothing where the tears flow.

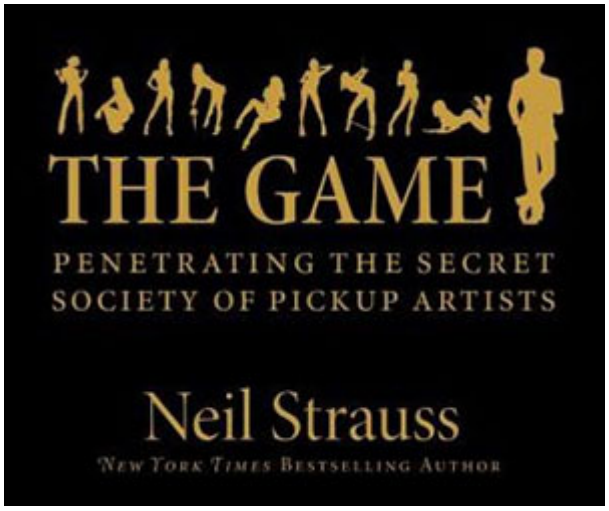
Needy girl: Easily hurt by criticism.
Confident girl: Easily angered by criticism.

Needy girl: Goes out of her way to please you.
Confident girl: Wants you to go out of her way to please her.

Be careful about confusing needy and desperate. A desperate girl is more like a stalker, a girl who calls you several times in a row when you don't answer or who says things like, "What, you don't like me anymore?" Or you go on one date with her and she wants to bring you home to meet the parents, already plotting out the future. Needy girls can remain single for a long time until they select a mate while desperate girls have trouble doing so. While all desperate girls are needy, not all needy girls are desperate, though the line can be fine at times.

When it comes to longer term relationships, you will be happier with needy girls. Carefully read my list again if you're still not sure why. Confident girls are great for a challenging score but not much more.

In the United States, it's hard to find beautiful girls that are needy, but this isn't the case in other cultures such as Brazil and Colombia, where besides for upper-class girls, you often have a pick between needy and desperate only.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Newsletter Update

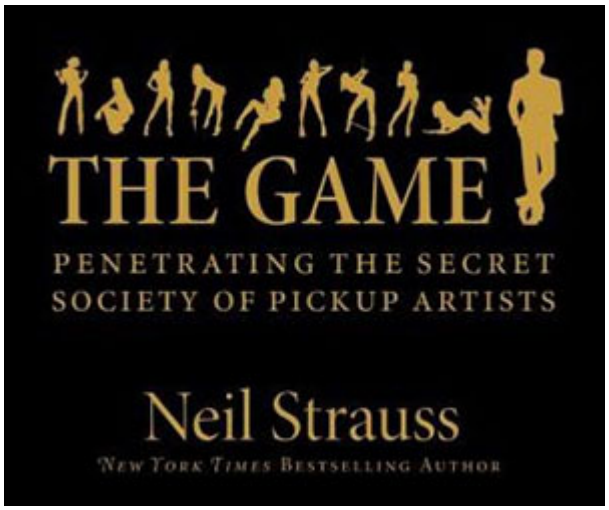
July 13, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I just passed 5,000 subscribers to my email newsletter. Here's a small sampling of the emails you'll receive if you sign up…

- Why isn't she calling you back?
- How to handle girls who turn out to be flakes
- Stressing out over missed opportunities
- How to pick up girls who have boyfriends
- A weird opener that stops girls dead in their tracks
- First date survival guide
- When it's your life or death duty to bang that
- What to do when a girl calls you a robot

I think it's interesting that a lot of people on my newsletter don't read my blog and a lot of people who read my blog are not on my newsletter. Anyway, on Thursday I'm emailing an update to everyone about some exciting things coming up soon.

I don't share your email address with anyone and you can unsubscribe at any time. Sign up on the newsletter page or right here…



Re: Needy Girls Vs. Confident Girls

July 14, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here's an email I got about my Needy Girls vs Confident Girls post

> You should have labeled this Emotional vs. Logical girl. Because really, that is the difference between the two types. Each woman is governed to varying degrees by these opposite traits.
>
> The confident girl is simply one who has enough logic to control her emotional impulses, unlike the needy girl. Really you should look at the scale as the purely emotional girl on one end and the Vulcan girl on the other. A girl either has enough logic to control her emotions or she doesn't. The resultant behavior is the difference in the ratio of logic to emotion.
>
> Needy girl: Emotional, "weak." Emotional is key term.
> Confident girl: Aloof, hard to read, though she may slip while intoxicated. When drunk, logic goes out the window
>
> Needy girl: Calls you when she shouldn't. No impulse control
> Confident girl: Pings you via email, sometimes text. Gives her more time to think, ya know.
>
> Needy girl: Has trouble playing the game. Finds it to be stifling, cold, unnatural.
> Confident girl: More like a guy in how she approaches the game with her intense use of logic. Yep
>
> Needy girl: In a constant state of apprehension about how you feel or think about her.
> Confident girl: Wondering if she could do better. Both the needy and the confident girl are in a constant state of apprehension about how you feel. One shows it, the other hides it. If the confident girl is not apprehensive, then she just isn't in to you.
>
> Needy girl: Busts out with the first "I love you" without thinking it through.
> Confident girl: Does a cost-benefit analysis before saying it. Waits for the guy to say it first
>
> Needy girl: Easily hurt by criticism. Will obsess over criticism > Confident girl: Easily angered by criticism. Wrong. Takes it in stride and uses it for self improvement.
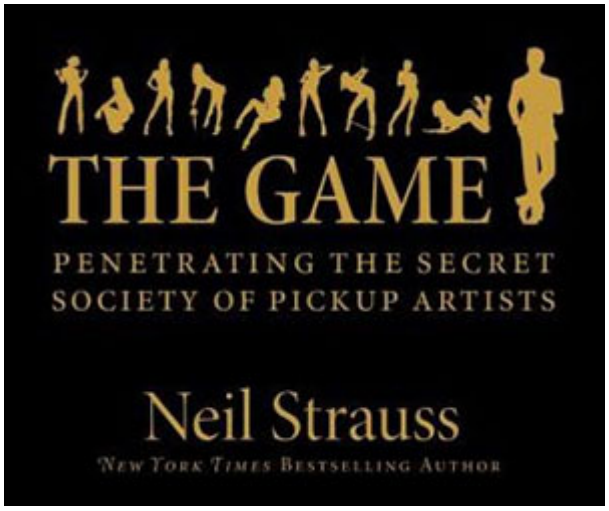
>
> Needy girl: Goes out of her way to please you.
> Confident girl: Wants you to go out of her way to please her Wrong. Waits for a sign of commitment first before she shows this level of emotional attachment. It's all about self preservation.

I think she makes some pretty good points. I make educated guesses on what girls think based on observable behavior, but of course that's not a perfect strategy.



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

The Correct Way To Catch A Metered Taxi In South America

July 16, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I told the taxi driver my destination. Next thing I looked at the window and was in a strange neighborhood, only to be reassured by the driver that we'll be there in a minute or two. When we finally arrived I noticed the fare was noticeably higher than I'd paid before.

I thought long and hard about all the taxi drivers that have ripped me off by taking the long route, and I realized they were almost always young. The old taxi drivers around my dad's age almost always took the direct route, probably because they don't have energy to hustle.

If you ask the young guys why they're taking the scenic route, they respond by saying it's quicker or the faster way has too much traffic. Very often they "forget" where principle roads are with an act worthy of a Golden Globe. They will take you to a closed road and feign surprise like an act of god was probably involved. I've had some of them go literally in circles. Late at night they inspect me in the rear view mirror to see if I'm drunk or not to take the really long way, but I always pretend I'm sober by sitting up straight and having my eyes wide open. The old guys just want to put in a day's work and go home to their families. To them it's not worth it.

When I need to hail a taxi, I now wait until I can get visual confirmation of the guy's age before raising my hand. If there is a taxi line and an old guy is second, I wait until someone takes the first cab so I can get in with the old guy. If you think this is a matter of money it's usually not, because the long way rarely costs more than a dollar extra, but as a man of honor I don't like paying more than someone else for the same service. Plus I don't want to give the hustlers the immense satisfaction that comes from hustling a gringo. The only way I'll hop in a cab of a young guy is if I can give him specific instructions (i.e. *Quiero ir a la casa de puta—el mas grande—por Oriental).

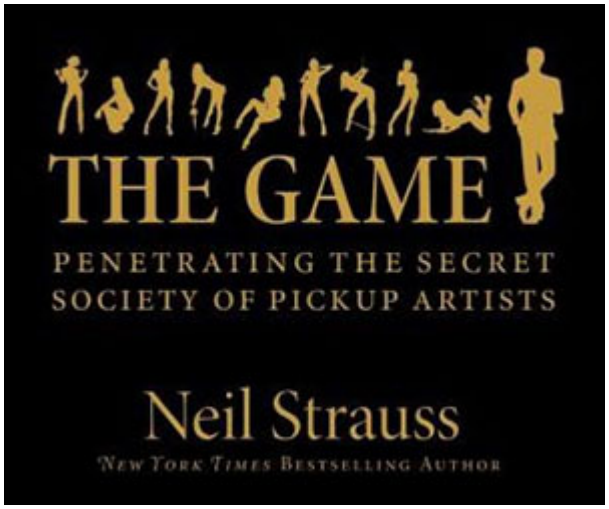
It's 100% safe if the old guy is sleeping inside the cab when you knock on his window. He will take the direct route.



Balancing Between Compliments & Insults

July 19, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following excerpt from Bang discusses the middle ground between compliments and insults…

> The opposite of a compliment is an insult, something you should also avoid. If you had a linear scale with a compliment on one end being a 1 and an insult on the other end being a 10, some of the material you've read so far reach into the 6 range. Their purpose is to let a girl know that you are not impressed with her, even if below the surface you really are. The more you show her you're impressed, the more likely she will perceive her value as being too high for you. Sex withholding follows as a result.
>
> While saying "You're too old for me" may seem like an insult on the surface, it is taken as a joke when you have already established a fun and playful vibe. Context here is important: if you were talking about something boring like politics all night and then all of a sudden you tell her she's too old for you, she will get offended. But if you were already joking around with her for a while, she'll know that it's just a part of your personality.
>
> Regardless, some girls will get insulted by your humor and think, "Who does this guy think he is?" While I don't apologize to any girl who takes my humor wrong, I definitely don't continue to push her buttons once she is already upset. To me her annoyance is either a sign of incompatibility or a bad line on my part. Did I accidentally say the wrong thing or did she get offended at a line that girls normally respond well to? I make a judgment call if this interaction can be saved or if there is another girl around that my time could be better spent with. Because trying to convince her that you were joking is a form of beta male supplication, it's best to move on if your material is poorly received. The goal of material in the middle of our compliment-insult scale is to make her aware of her own faults instead of yours. Once the focus is taken off you, she will be much more susceptible to game.

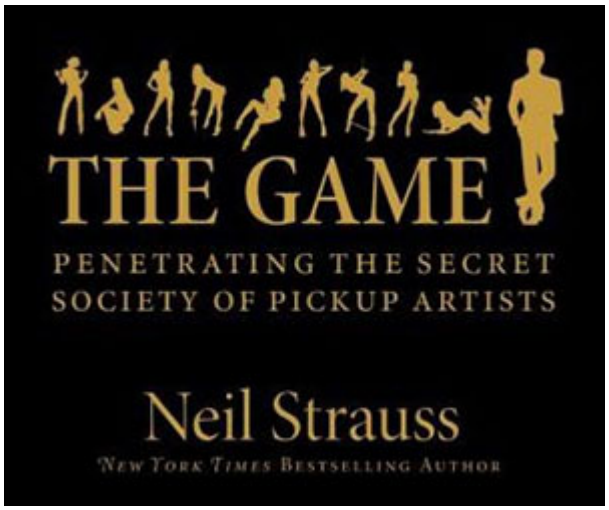
The last two sentences are very important. Solid game makes the girl look inward to her own faults or lacks. Your backhanded compliments and teasing takes the focus off your uneven chin, odd mannerisms, and balding scalp. If you have a rather large deformity then your game has to be that much more potent to compensate for the flaw.

Unfortunately you can't just go around insulting girls, which is what a lot of guys do after they read books like The Game, where the "neg" was heavily featured. You can study negs all day and night but you'll still fuck it up every time with the wrong tone or body language. It's better to avoid its use until you get to an advanced Matrix-like level of game, but by then you probably won't even need to use them. Focus on material on the "6 range" like I explain above. I give tons of examples in my book.

Speaking of my book, here's a recent email I received about it...

> How's it going man? I recently put together enough money to buy Bang and I have to say it was not only worth every penny, but more. I don't usually say shit like this (especially about things I have to pay for). I bought David DeAngelo's DoubleYourDating eBook a few years back and I have to say that Bang BLEW IT AWAY. You can use this as a testimonial if you want. Oh, I have also read Swingcatt's eBook and I not only had more laughs and a better time reading Bang, but I found it more useful and my game is doing so much better. I like your approach to the field, you put things simply in a way that I can understand. However, you use advanced tactics like DeAngelo and Swingcatt, but explain it on a step by step basis with examples to real life events and situations. I can't thank you enough.

If you haven't yet bought Bang, check out its homepage, read a couple sample pages, then buy it. Thanks.



Desperate Times

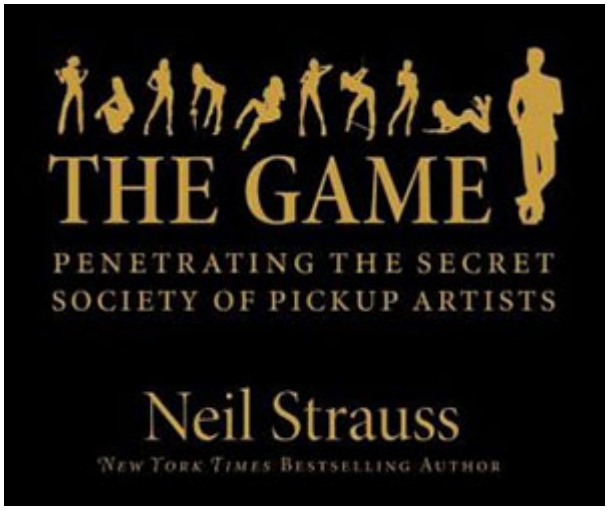
July 21, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The first time I did it I was in Las Vegas. I lost all my money on the blackjack table and didn't have enough cash for a drink. I was too proud to ask my friend for a loan until we got back to the room. I saw a bottle of Stella standing on the casino's bar all alone, completely full. I looked around, grabbed it, and took a sip. It tasted fine, not warm but not cold either. I finished it quickly and placed the empty bottle back on the bar. What a rush! Mostly from the thrill of the crime but also from drinking on another man's labor.

The following two months were especially rough. I had little money coming in. I wanted to go out but I couldn't afford it. I remembered what I did in Las Vegas, and reluctantly went with it, perfecting the skill. I stole microbrew pints and brightly colored cocktails. I stole screwdrivers and champagne with lipstick imprinted on the glass. I enjoyed it more than I should have. It was addictive—the plotting and planning, the positioning of my accomplices, the feeling of my heart beat race from the fear of getting caught and pounded upon, and finally the confident grab. It's all in the grab! Like an eagle swooping down on a defenseless squirrel, gone before you know what happened. The rush of stealing drinks was so great that one of my friends got addicted to it even though he was gainfully employed. Unfortunately he contracted a mysterious virus and had to stop.

I preferred the cocktail drinks with the skinny little straws. Not much backwash. I tossed the straws and drank from the glass. The more colorful the drink, the more it glows in the dark, the faster it went down my throat. Beer bottles are for amateurs. The rim is coated in another person's mouth, perhaps a girl who just got finished sucking a dick in the bathroom. If it's not full then forget it. The martinis are the real score. There is no fast getaway like that clear drink, only one-third consumed, its owner turned around trying to get into a beastly girl's pants. Thick green lime wedge. Another gin & tonic. Not my first choice but I'll take it. The liquid touches my tongue five feet away from the crime, and what a beautiful surprise—a gimlet! Perfect for the summer. Refreshing. I slam the empty glass on the bar and a satisfying burp erupts from my belly. The guy looks around for his drink.

I wanted to get good. I wanted to steal a drink in front of a man face and he will think it was mine all along. I wanted him to doubt himself, his being. I wanted him to be in disbelief that another man would perform such an act. But I already did it. It's gone. Replaced by an empty glass. Buy another drink old man, this time not something so sweet. Then I got a job (bartending, ironically). I couldn't live like that anymore. It was too dangerous, too shameful and pitiful. But sometimes I see a full drink, sitting unguarded, and my heart skips a beat, and I squint my eyes through the darkness, and I notice my friend's glass is almost empty, and I take a deep breath, and…



THE GAME
PENETRATING THE SECRET
SOCIETY OF PICKUP ARTISTS
Neil Strauss
New York Times Bestselling Author

Girls Who Love To Eat At Restaurants

July 23, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The first time I saw it I thought holy shit. A sous chef at a fine dining restaurant I worked at used a salt pourer, the same type you'd buy in the grocery store, to layer several grams of salt on a piece of organic hamburger meat. Now I understood why customers needed to order so many glasses of water after feeding on it.

I gradually learned that if you want to wow a bunch of foodies, you need only to keep five steps in mind.

1. Copy the trends, whether its fusion cuisine, charcuterie boards, fennel oil, or something gay.

2. Add as much salt and butter as you possibly can.

3. Put medium-sized portions on gigantic plates. If it would look ridiculous to a starving African kid then the presentation is 100% correct.

4. Drizzle colorful sauces on the fringes of the plates to remind the foodie of an ice cream sundae.

5. Charge at least $25 a plate. If it's cheap then it can't be that good.

Several years ago I took out this girl from Central America. She told me she was poor and later it came out that she ate out for dinner with her friends four times a week. Her laziness burned a whole in her pocket, gave her a crucial muffin top, and was clogging her arteries, all so she can pretend that she knows what good food is. She added that she was "too busy" to fuss around in her kitchen.

Now if a person is too busy to provide basic sustenance for themselves, that tells me their priorities in life are completely wrong, as proper nutrition and suitable shelter are the two most important things to survival. I met many other girls like her and things started coming together…

Girls who frequently eat in "fine dining" restaurants are horrible for casual dating. They are only suitable for one night stands.

If she puts low effort into herself, as cooking is indeed personal effort, she will put absolutely zero effort into you. You think she will ever cook for you? Hah! Bitch don't know how to cook. You think she'll take care of you when you're sick? Bitch doesn't care about her own body—why would she care about yours?! You think she will give you affection? Bitch hates herself, and thinks affection is giving you a shitty blow job once a month.

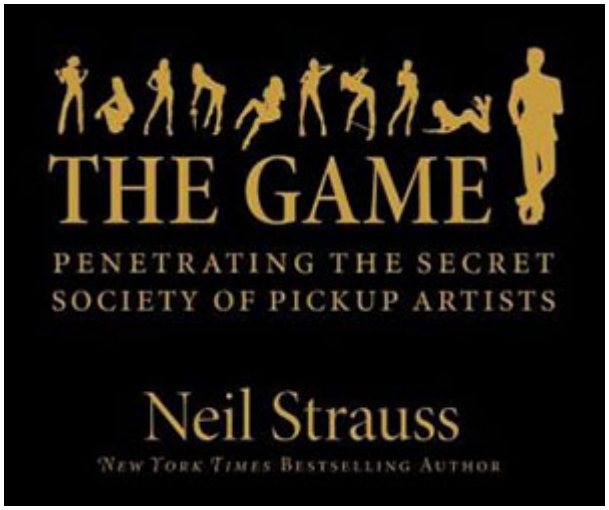
Most quality girls I have dated have either cooked for me or never suggested we “go out” to eat. Learn from my experience.

PREVIOUSLY: Girl Warning Signs and 11 Signs She’s A Keeper



Gal Costa Concert In Washington D.C.

July 25, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

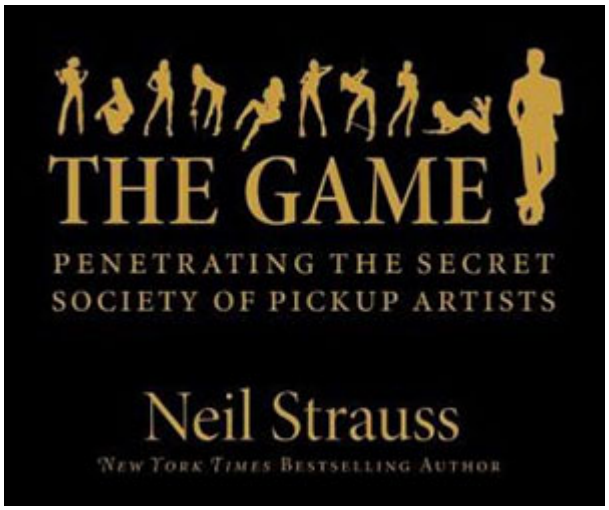
For those of you in DC who want to check out Brazilian girls, I got the event for you.

Gal Costa, a famous Brazilian singer, is playing at George Washington on November 1. Tickets prices seem reasonable, and I'd go if I was in D.C. The pre-sale code is BRAZIL.

Here is a sampling of her music…

Pretty loungey.

This is probably the worst type of event to meet girls, but for a few hours you can enjoy the beautiful language and pretend you're cultured. And hey, maybe you can get yourself invited to an after party.



Career & Life Question

July 27, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here's an email I received last month...

> Roosh,
>
> Happy 30th!
>
> Will you give me some insight/advice on career/life development. I believe we share similar ideals and interests. Hearing your perspective may help me set some goals and develop a plan.
>
> I am 24 y/old sales professional living in a downtown area of an east coast capital city. I've developed my game from reading and practice. I own and have read Bang. I've acquired a beautiful and amazing foreign girlfriend, she's well out of my normal league, but she'll never learn that.
>
> My problem lies in that I can not find any passion in my work. I am on my second job from college. Every day I come in and day dream of doing something else, along the lines of entrepreneurship and running my own show, ideally location independent. The problem is I do not have the resources to leave my current job.
>
> What I'd like to hear from you: Your advice or ideas of what you would be focusing on if you were 24 y/old and had the knowledge/experience you do now.

My strategy for living is very simple. I live so below my means so instead of working much I can spend time on other things I rather do, that while not extremely exciting (e.g. reading books, sitting in coffee shops all day, learning a new language, writing), is far better than working for someone else.

Depending on which part of the city you live and how often you go out, doing these things in Medellin, Colombia will cost you about $1,000 to $1,500 a month, an amount that is definitely not unattainable for a lot of people. Sure I'm not living like a king, but it's impossible to have my own place and go out regularly in the U.S. on $1,000 a month.

There is a common theme of other guys I meet abroad: they all have some sort of business that can be operated with a laptop computer (I've met a lot of affiliate marketers). This gives them the freedom to work wherever they wish. Having a business is great, but having a mobile business is even better. I have a great friend who owns a successful restaurant, but he hasn't taken a vacation in years because he's tied to his store. He's making money but he can't enjoy it besides buying toys, which only give short-term happiness. My friends at home have money and comfort but are stuck. I don't have a lot of money but I'm free. The dream is to have both.

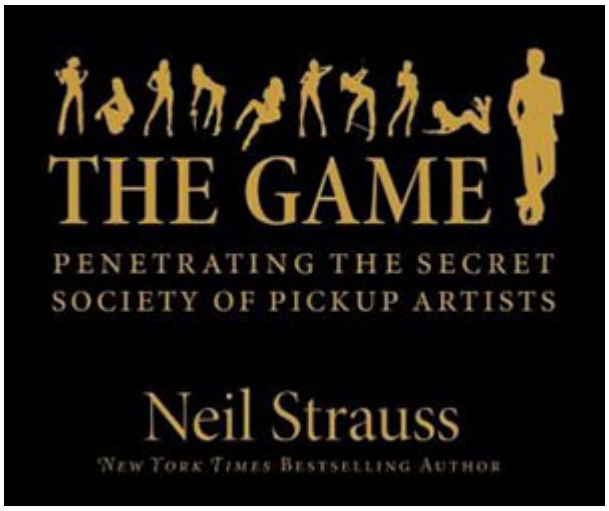
Knowing what I know now, if I was 24-years-old, I would change one thing: I would have used some money to buy internet sites that I further developed for advertising revenue, something semi-passive so I don't have to keep at it every day. But that's just me. I think you should have a regular job along with a side business while saving as much money as you can, because a pile of money is a pile of freedom. There's nothing worse in life than being in a job you hate with no money in the bank and no options besides getting another crappy job. Nothing will change unless you save money. This may mean making drastic changes to your lifestyle to reduce expenses.

One last thing: Be careful about asking for advice from others. If I listened to all the well-intentioned people who told me what to do, I'd never be living in Medellin right now, doing exactly what I want. Take a risk and carve your own path.



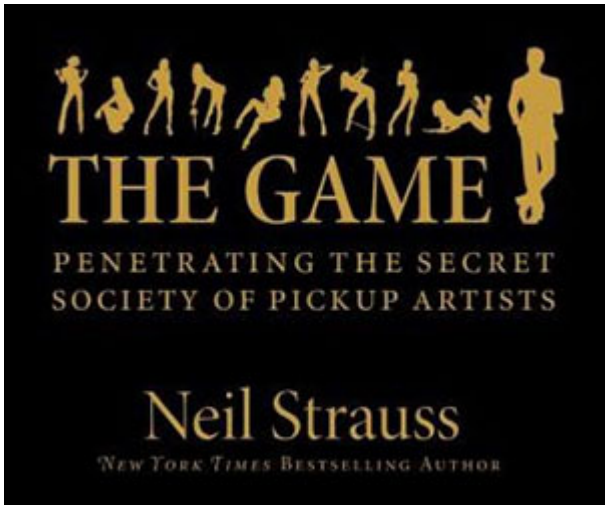
Book Number Two Is Coming

July 28, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

As people on my newsletter already know, my second book, the one I started in March of 2008, is 100% complete and will be ready for you in seven weeks. It will be simultaneously available in paperback, Kindle, and eBook PDF.

I have a few review copies available. If you have an active blog and would like one, email roosh@rooshv.com.

It feels great to be a free man, but I know it's just a matter of time until the mental sickness I have takes over and pushes me to start work on the next book.



Turning Potential Insults Into Game

July 29, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY*: Balancing Between Compliments & Insults

Insult: "You're really pale."
Game: "Did you just get a tan?"

Insult: "You're short and oompa-loopma like."
Game: "I think I grew since the last time i saw you."

Insult: "Your hair is thinning."
Game: "I think your hair would look really good with a volumizer."

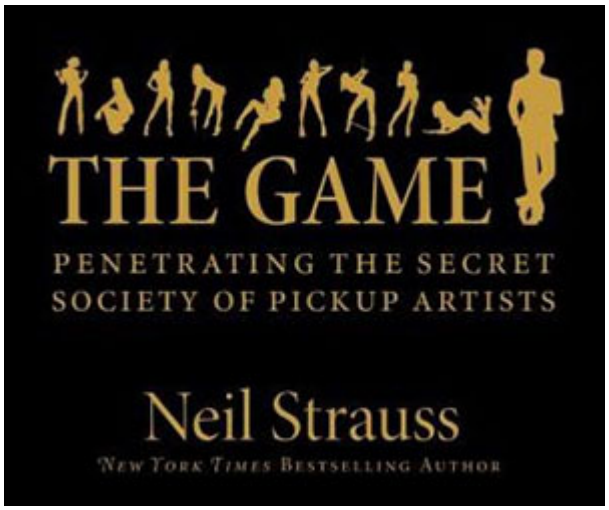
Insult: "Your breath reeks."
Beta Game:: "Mmmm this gum is so good! You want some?" And if she says no?
Alpha Game: "Did you eat a lot of onion for dinner?"

Insult: "This meal [you just made] is pretty horrible."
Game: "Interesting texture of this meat you cooked. You know my favorite cookbook is Betty Crocker. The recipes are laid out easily so that a monkey can cook them. In fact I read an article on the internet where monkeys cooked delicious meals from the Betty Crocker cookbook."

Insult: "You're frigid in the sack."
Game: "I hear the sex gets better once you become more comfortable with the other person. You'll want to explore more and make noises to show you're… still alive."

Insult: "Shut the fuck up bitch jeez."
Game: "Shh shh shh. Don't talk I heard something." You can keep her silently indefinitely… "No no, not yet.."

Insult: "Have you gained 20 pounds in the past couple weeks or is it just me?"
Beta Game: "Hey let's sign up to the gym together!" Why should you do work because of her lack of discipline?
Alpha Game: "Your body seems to be changing rapidly. Are you at that age or…"
Super Asshole Game: "Are you pregnant?"



The Buñuelo & Palo de Queso

August 2, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm not sure how Colombians make it past age 50 with most everything they eat fried in recycled grease. While Americans eat unhealthy food as well, for them it's not so much the quality of food but the fact that they eat too much. Colombians don't eat a lot, but they have grease with everything.

First let me introduce you to the buñuelo. It's a ball of deep-fried white dough. That's it. Fried in that recycled yellow grease. If you squeeze it in your hand all the grease comes rushing out and drips onto the ground. Of course it tastes delicious.

Then there is the palo de queso, which is slightly less popular and sold in bakeries. It's a simple rod of pastry loaded with cheese curd. But is there a way to make that more unhealthy? Yes, by deep frying the bitch in the yellow grease and sell it for a few cents more. The first time I had the extreme palo de queso I felt like I was drinking straight-up grease with all the oil that got stuck in the layer between the bread covering and the cheese filling.

There was another episode with the palo de queso. My Colombian friend took a first bite and, I swear to God, it ejaculated a stream of grease onto his forearm, scalding his skin. The guevon manning the counter gave him a napkin without skipping a beat, telling me that this was common, and my friend shrugged it off. I'm told that more Colombians are hospitalized every year due to hot grease burns than chest pains.

It's not uncommon for a Colombian to see my lunch (peanuts, avocado, banana, corn pancake), and remark how healthy I am. What they really mean is boring. They'd switch out the banana for a plantain, fry it, smother the pancake (arepa) with cheese and possibly sausage, and toss the avocado on top with dollops of Colombian red mayonnaise. If you come to Colombia to open a health-food store, you will only get business from annoying gringos who carry around handwoven "day bags" bought in either Ecuador, Peru, or Bolivia. Without a deep-fat fryer, your establishment will not win the bellies of the locals and you will have to close shop or turn it into a backpackers hostel.

But the big question is, does this unhealthy diet translate to fat Colombian women? I will share my thoughts on the matter next.

American Girls Vs Colombian Girls

August 4, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's no secret that Colombian girls are a chubby bunch thanks to the grease that finds its way in every meal. While it wouldn't hurt for them to lose between 5-10 pounds, most between the ages of 18-30 are bangable. Yes, I'm coming out to say that at least 51% of Colombian girls are sex worthy. A drink or two and you'll ram a lot of what you see on the streets.

Can I say the same with American girls? Hmmm…

The other day I was in the Medellin immigration office to renew my tourist visa along with a couple dozen other gringos. There were three American girls that I identified through their accent, and do you know what all three had in common? They were GIGANTIC. I forgot about bad it was in America until their unsightly masses reminded me.

Here's your average American woman:

I'm sure my foreign readers are wondering if I'm fucking around. I'm not. She is average if you account for the entire United States and not just metropolitan cities.

Here's your average Colombian woman:

Yeah she has the thunder thighs, and most likely a little roll above her vagina, but nothing that would rule her out from sex. You'd slam her, as would I.

"But Roosh not all American girls are fat."

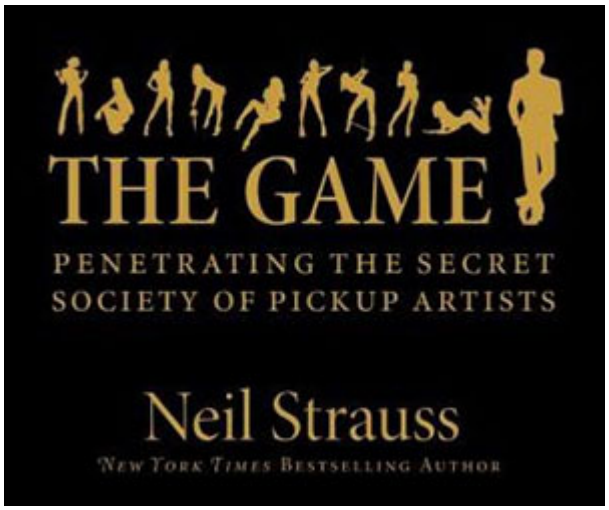
True but the small supply of skinny ones causes their market value to shoot through the roof, kind of like what happened to Beanie Babies and the Wii. The fatties end up polluting the entire poon supply.

With Colombian girls you think, "Chica needs to chill on them empanadas." With American girls you think, "Gorda needs to stop eating." There is also something else going on. The chubby Colombian girls will have a fun, feminine vibe that makes you still want to fuck them, but American girls don't have this—without looks you get a debater who wears flip-flops and reads supermarket magazines to learn how to please a man. I love getting into a conversation about American women with gringo men because of the nonstop brutality and laughs that ensue. No foreign man prefers American girls except loser Italian guys. They are the worst in the world, though British girls are pretty damn close.

For all of you stuck in the States gaming these girls, you have my sympathy, as I did it for many years. Sure Colombian girls can be smothering and overly affectionate (meloso), but that's a flaw I'm willing to accept. I think you would do too.



Cheddar Cheese Gay Boyfriend Destroyer

August 5, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here's an email I got in response to a newsletter email I sent about a failed pick-up attempt on the subway…

> Roosh,
>
> Sup brother. You know…there is nothing like picking up a girl in front of a vigilant crowd on an aluminum tin can shooting through the darkness of DC in an underground tunnel.
>
> You know…now that I think about it.
>
> Our ancestors, the ones whose idea of "game" was to bark at the boom, lead large groups of gorilla-like men into war against other sub-human tribes, killing something to eat every night. They would be fucking proud of your subway pick up.
>
> Their pick up line was to take out their muddy cock and bang the girl of their choice in some cave in northern Europe.
>
> To you my friend I say…
>
> "Let's kill us something to eat tonight."
>
> Not many have the balls to pull an approach to a girl in the subway.
>
> But the truth is we're all cavemen in suits. Not suggesting we whip out our muddy cocks but, fuck it….it takes a man to look at something in front of him and say "I don't give a shit…..I want THAT."
>
> You know what I mean?
>
> No clever movie lines.
>
> No cheddar cheese gay boyfriend destroyer.
>
> No thought.
>
> Just DESIRE.
>
> I think dating sites and all this bullshit that goes along with them is retarded. Every son on this planet deserves to know that his father met his mother somewhere and had the balls to pick her up.
>
> I mean, how gay is it to say I met someone on the Internet.
>
> "My mom and dad met on the Internet because she's a recluse and my father had no balls. Wow look at the time….time to make love to my hand."
>
> You know what I'm saying.
>
> Anyway…
>
> Thanks for the story man.

Something to read before your commute to work.

Older Women Refuse To Blame Themselves Or Face Reality

August 9, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Bartender-blogger-columnist Jack recently posted about a pair of ladies who criticized unmarried men over 30-years-old, a group I will be part of in under a year. The ladies have failed to realize that their snark could easily and brutally be spun back onto themselves. In fact, all they did was point out their own misgivings.

> Hi! Me Unmarried Man Over Thirty. Call me UMOT! You pretty lady! I act same way I did 15 years ago. I hang with buddies, drink beer, smoke pot, play video games. Maybe in band? Play music! UMOT no want to grow up! I want to bang on my drum all day!

If a man rather drink beer, smoke pot, and play video games rather than take you out on a date, what does that say about you? Human beings are animals that respond rather predictably to punishment and reward—if there is no reward in trying to fuck you then men will choose other activities. I don't think this is an insult to the man, but to the woman who has not worked on herself properly to be more interesting than Halo 3.

> Sometimes UMOT get sad. UMOT's friends get married and leave UMOT! This makes UMOT question fundamental lifestyle choices! Maybe UMOT should no have sold all personal belongings to follow Phish for three years/live in Costa Rican Jungle/hike the Appalachian Trail? UMOT do what UMOT want to do. That it! I no like do things I no like doing!

Are you sure the man is questioning his choices, rather than his friends? The risk of marrying an American wife is so great, as this modern institution is so decidedly anti-man, that the only acceptable option is to go with a foreign bride who is not well-cultured in materialism, entitlement, and celebrity personalities. I'm told there is a country called Thailand where slim yet slightly curvy women are physically resistant to aging. They trip over themselves to marry even beastly American men whose legendary sexless streaks coincide with lunar eclipse events. What do you bring to the table that motivates this beast man for your vagina?

Let me put it this way: if there was a Old Pussy stock traded on the NYSE (ticker: OPSY), it would have been kicked out of the exchange ages ago for consistently trading under a dollar. Take a look at this photo, of a man who purchased 10,000 shares of OPSY thinking it would rise up in price. How do you think he feels now?

If a man really wants to get married (not sure why when nothing can be gained through marriage that can be had by simply shacking up), a foreign bride is the way to go. American women are great for casual dating and easy sex, but make for horrible wives. A foreign bride will give you a good ten years before she becomes corrupt, and even then you'll at least get home cooked meals. You always have the option of buying another bride, maybe her younger sister, for something like three donkeys and a bag of potatoes.

> UMOT likes sexy with ladies but UMOT no want commitment. That why I date women who younger than me by 7 years minimum. They no make me feel immature. They no threaten poor decision making skills. I no commit to nothing besides beer, spliff!

I remain unconvinced that fucking young pussy is a "poor decision making skill." It costs less, comes with lighter baggage, and is not as demanding. If men are choosing younger women instead of you, it's time to find out what qualities that young woman has that you don't. Actually I'll tell you what it is: pristine youth, something you wasted and lost, for all eternity. The boat has sailed, and instead of buying a new ticket you are hoping for the captain to notice your high-pitched shrieking and turn the ship around. He won't. Why don't you do something productive like knit a sweater or write a romance novel? You gotta leave your mark on the world some way, because we all know you're not having children.

> I make baby in 10 to 15 years with pretty young lady who make baby easy! No lady my age need apply. You make UMOT uneasy with independence, intelligence. Scares UMOT. I no like lady my age! Go away lady my age! Go away!

Independence and intelligence are great qualities in men and women who want to excel in the corporate boardroom, but are horrible for those men who want a relaxed, easy life, where not every little thing is a life or death debate that can be traced back to something Gloria Steinem wrote 30 years ago. Women need to understand that men don't want independence and intelligence. Men want femininity, excellent sex, a hot body, homemaking skills, and compliance with minimal talk-back. Women need to stop deluding themselves that men what the same thing in a mate as themselves.

> Nice to talk to pretty lady! Maybe I text later? Maybe hang at my studio apartment? Make sexy? Okay, me tired now. Me drank PBR, tequila until early morning and must sleep now on second hand mattress. Night, night, pretty lady. UMOT go Dreamland. Me text later.

The reason I text you is because you are not worth my time. You are not worth the energy to pick up the phone and make sounds with my voicebox. You are boring and expendable, just another hole I want to fuck to pass the time. If you want me to pick up the phone and take you seriously, you can start by cooking me a meal from scratch and deep throating my veiny cock against the back of your throat. Until then, good luck finding a man who is willing to put up with your shit.

Logical Thinking Increases The Size Of Your Sack

August 11, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I treat this one so poorly. I don't take her out, I spend little money on her, I put little thought into our time together, I do nothing extra to please her, and I disappear every now and then when I don't feel like seeing her. When we are out it's impossible for her not to notice me checking out other girls. Sure I make her laugh and give it to her like no other man has, but a part of me is still in disbelief that she still calls me and jumps at the the chance to hang out when I suggest something like an ice cream cone.

But that's exactly why.

Imagine if I did the opposite. If I treated her like a princess, took her out twice a week to nice restaurants spending rolls of cash, came up with original and creative date ideas, and called her daily so she can sleep soundly knowing that I'm not fucking other girls. Do you think she would open her legs any time I wanted, especially on short notice?

Yet that's what most guys do, thinking—logically—that it helps them get and keep the pussy. But when it comes to girls, logical thinking gets you nothing but a heavy sack. This is why very intelligent, otherwise successful guys with their own luxury condominium can't get laid to save their life but I could when I lived in my dad's basement while stealing other people's drinks when I went out. This is why opposite George in Seinfeld was successful.

She told me she loves me a few times, but when it became apparent I wasn't going to say it back, she stopped. Eventually she's going to throw in the towel, but not before I get bored of her first and find another girl.

Is This What America Has Become?

August 13, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Nothing has given me the urge to burn my American passport more than the above photo. I truly wish you could see my face as I type this. It's hard to admit but I'm basically on the verge of tears, deeply concerned about the future of not only our cherished culture but human existence. In spite of decades of knowledge that science has brought forth about basic cause and effect of our actions, we are still using plastic bags? The actions of the American consumer here are absolutely abominable. This is the EARTH damn it. We only get one.

POSTSCRIPT: Not that it's relevant, but here is a description of the American consumer pictured…

> I was afraid that if she saw me taking pictures of her with my iphone, she'd attack me. Her belly hung down to mid thigh. Her chin rested on her chest. She had tattoos on her arms and her mouth. Every other word was an obscenity. Then she screeched at her mother (another fine specimen) to get down there and pack her own groceries because she wasn't going to do it for her. Of course, Mother was paying for all four carts of groceries.

The "Karma" tattoo on her lower back means she'd let you slam on the first date.

Travel Advice On Over 35 Countries And Counting

August 16, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The travel forum now has reader comments, ideas, and game tips on over 35 countries and countless more cities, becoming quite an impressive collection of knowledge. In the early days guys would mostly travel and then report back their thoughts, but in addition to that it's becoming a place where trips are planned in their early stages. I'm getting ready to go to Brazil again and my plans are definitely being influenced by things I read there.

Here I organized many of the threads into continents so you can browse by places you're interested in:

EUROPE

- Amsterdam & Paris
- Balkans
- Prague, Czech Republic
- London, England [2]
- Helsinki, Finland & Riga, Latvia
- Budapest, Hungary [2]
- Iceland [2]
- Dublin, Ireland
- Italy [2] [3]
- Italian / French Riviera
- Romania
- Valencia & Ibiza, Spain
- Stockholm, Sweden

NORTH AMERICA

- New York City [2]
- Montreal, Canada
- Toronto, Canada

LATIN AMERICA

- Central America [2]
- Bariloche, Argentina
- Buenos Aires, Argentina [2] [3]
- Belo Horizante, Brazil
- Curitiba, Brazil
- Minas Gerais, Brazil
- Rio de Janeiro, Brazil [2] [3] [4]
- Sau Paulo, Brazil [2] [3]

- Santiago, Chile
- Bogota, Colombia [2] [3]
- Cali, Colombia
- Medellin, Colombia [2] [3]
- Dominican Republic
- Quito, Ecuador
- Guam [2]
- Panama
- Panama City [2]
- Peru [2]
- Lima, Peru
- Mexico
- San Pancho, Mexico

AFRICA

- Ethiopia
- Lesotho [2]

ASIA & MIDDLE EAST

- India
- Tel Aviv, Israel
- Ulaan Baatar, Mongolia
- Philippines
- Philippines & Thailand
- Thailand
- South Korea
- Odessa, Ukraine
- Tashkent, Uzbekistan

Some days the travel forum is more active than the girls forum, which is the raison d'être that I created the thing in the first place.

If you have traveled to one of the above places, can you take a couple minutes to post your thoughts and recommendations? For the good of man.

The Extremely Bright Side Of American Women

August 17, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I know I've written some harsh things about American women, but if you look at my past and current behavior, of continuing to pursue and bang them, it's obvious that I value American women when it comes to sex.

The reason is because American women are extremely easy. You won't find another non-Western woman who is easier. In fact if you live in the United States, you should consider yourself lucky that you have a breed of woman that opens her legs at moment's notice. The word "freebie" is actually slang that exists only in America.

Sure I don't recommend dating them long-term, but as an American citizen you have an incredible opportunity to rack up notches that foreign men can only dream of. Though I complain about them and will continue to do so until I perish, there is no alternative for a super-quick and fun lay.

Go to Argentina and see if the girl will suck your dick. An American woman will suck the life out of it. Go to Peru or Ecuador and see how the girls maintain their hygiene. American girls are OCD about always smelling like artificial roses. Go to South Korea and see if you can have a normal conversation with a girl who doesn't giggle every five seconds at her cell phone. American girls appreciate humor and will get your sarcasm. Go to Russia and see how much money you have to drop to get a reasonable girl. American girls will bang a homeless man if he can make her laugh. Go to Colombia and try to get a one night stand. American girls are dripping after an hour or two of good chat.

I hear about guys who are "sick" of American women but have only banged one or two, making me wonder if they are simply betas who can't get laid anywhere. Newsflash: If American girls think you are a chump, the only girls who won't are the poorest of the poor in third world nations. (Make sure you bring extra money on your Asia trip because Min Pang's mother needs new cutlery.) Bang American girls rotten and then when you get bored of success, spread your wings a little to see what else is out there.

Again, I'm glad I'm not dealing with American girls on a weekly basis, but for short bursts they are laughably easy to game and enjoyable to bang.

A Magical Land Where Lemons Are Green And Limes Are Lemons

August 19, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've been learning idioms here in Colombia to seemlessly integrate myself with the locals. The challenge is using them properly in live conversation, and I'm happy to say that I did just that with one I've been dying to use for a while.

The English idiom "I need to sleep on it" translates to "Tengo que consultarlo con la almohada." If you translate that back to English it means, "I have to consult with the pillow." It's a great idiom.

I went to a street market to buy some lemons, which in Colombia are green like limes and share the same name. To clarify: both lemons and limes in Colombia are green, and they are both called lemons, but different types of lemons. Lemons are called limon and limes are called limon tahiti, suggesting that they are both members of the same family. If you ask a vendor for a lima, what most gringos think of as the Spanish word for lime, you won't be understood.

American lemons are larger than limes, but in Colombia the lemons are smaller and look almost exactly like American limes.

Yet there's more…

Oranges in Colombia are green, like American limes. Again, the oranges are green. They're still called naranja, which is Spanish for orange. What really fucks with your head is cutting open a Colombian lemon or orange to see bright yellow or orange pulp inside a green shell.

Back to the story. At the market the vendor knew I was gringo and quoted me $0.75 for two green lemons, an outrageous sum. In my plain clothing I don't understand how he pegged me for a very wealthy man.

I got him down to $0.50, then said, "Tengo que consultarlo con la almohada" and walked away. Score! The look on his face said, "Who the fuck is this interesting gringo?"

Down the street I found a place that sold me four lemons for $0.20. This short series of events worked out really great for me.

Or so I thought, because when I went home I actually bought limes. Now if I come across a recipe that calls for a lemon or lime, I look for another recipe.

Self-Loathing Attractive Feminists Cannot Wait To Be Unattractive

August 23, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I stumbled on a DC blog the other day called Holla Back DC. The female blogger receives submissions of girls who were hit on by guys on the street, deeming it SEXUAL HARASSMENT. She pins the episodes on a custom Google Map, which she hopes will serve as a public service for other women.

Let's take a closer look:

> I turned and the man started asking me if he could have my number to call me sometime. I politely explained that I am married and hoped that would be the end of it (it never is!). He then proceeded to ask me if I would go to happy hour with him and his friend. (Sounds like a really great, safe idea, right? Ugh.) Again, I politely told him that I would not jeopardize my marriage under any circumstances.

Another:

> The older man standing next to me leaned over and said, "You have two weapons on you, do you know that?" I ignore him. He says, "Your legs – those are your weapons." I look right at him and say, "I don't appreciate it when you make comments about my legs, you don't even know me." He shakes his head at me just as the light changes. As a walk down the escalator at the U Street metro I see him harass another woman.

Don't be fooled by the attention whoring of these women: they like getting cat called. If you read through the blog you will see many cases where the women encouraged the men by responding back and answering questions. They have an innate need of wanting to be desired by the opposite sex, but their logical brain has to account for the feminist brainwashing that is guiding their current life choices. The end result is a behavior of writing in to some retarded blog to chart "harassment," also known as human fucking nature.

Since it's rare to see hogs getting cat called, my guess is these feminists at least have a pretty face or body. Let's say the girls look something like this...

Not bad, but in short time she is going to look like this:

No amount of spray-on tanning, salon haircuts, or organic food will prevent this painful transition. Please prepare yourself for upper arms the size of papayas.

How many times do you think the girls will get cat calls in ten years? Zero. It simply will not happen. She will be invisible to the eyes of man, a non-entity, and that's when I guarantee you she will miss the days when stocky Latinos considered her a sexual creature.

The one thing that bothers me most is the amount of control these women hope to strangle life with. Now they want attention only when they give permission. It's not enough that men need consent to engage in hetero sexual relations, but today's feminist wants to play God in simply who gets to exchange words with them in public. If it's not in a way that she deems inappropriate, then it's an unlawful, arrestable defense. Feminists want to make bad pick-up lines punishable by jail time. Take a minute to imagine how it would be like to have a relationship with these types of women.

"Stop giving me those googly eyes. We're not having sex tonight!"

"Ouch stop pulling my hair. Treat me with the respect I deserve!"

"Don't peel the carrot so deeply. The skin is not that thick! You're wasting perfectly good carrot idiot!"

Holla Back girls, just be patient. Your "problem" will rectify itself, and soon enough absolutely no man will desire you except the sorry sap of a husband you've learned to dread having sex with.

Why Travel To A Country That Is Harder To Get Laid Than The U.S.?

August 25, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I got an excellent response to my American Girls Are Easy post:

> I always kind of got the impression that THE major benefit of going to places like Colombia was that they were stocked full of beautiful women (way more 8s, 9s, 10s per capita than the U.S., in other words) AND you could seriously do way better there quality-wise than you could in the states: i.e. if the best you could probably get in the U.S. (or whatever your native country is) is a 7.5-8 if you REALLY worked for it, then if you go to Colombia or Brazil or Eastern Europe, THEN the best you could get might be a 8.5-9, maybe even a 10. Do you agree?

Unfortunately no. Your quality dips when you go to countries like Colombia or Argentina. Even if you're fluent in Spanish, it will be rare you pull better than you did in the States without a lot of time and an enormous amount of effort. So why do it?

I was out with a guy from New York on Thursday at a Medellin club that has the best ladies night in the city. The first 60 girls get in free while everyone else has to pay $15 for an open bar. The point is to get there early to be greeted by tables of girls sitting alone without guys, a rare sight here as everyone goes out in mixed groups. I was talking to my friend at the main bar while warming up with the local drink (aguaardiente). Eventually I asked him why he's in Colombia when it's significantly harder to get laid, since as a man with game he didn't have problems back in the States. He looked at me and just shrugged his shoulders, but I understood him completely.

Sure if I think about it I can come up with valid reasons. I'm here because it's hard. Because it's different. Because if it was easy everyone else would be doing it. Because it challenges me. Because the world is a big place. Because I don't like comfort or stability. Because I'm young. Because the air tastes different. Because it's cheaper. Because I like taking risks. Because I like speaking a different language. Because I like variety. Because the alternative of living in an American city with an American girlfriend doesn't appeal to me. Because when I'm on my death bed and look back on my life, I want to see one that was well-lived full of rich experiences, not one of missed opportunity and regret.

I've been bitched incredibly hard in South America. I've never been so disrespected and so flaked on by women than I have in Colombia and Argentina. I'm talking about ego-shattering treatment that would lead to a hatred of women in weaker men. But I'm still here in Colombia, and I'm still going out and trying my hand, and all the reasons above are just things I came up with after the fact. It's a game, and I keep going until I get what I want. It's either in you or not.

If you're not willing to work harder than you ever have in your life, for returns that are far from guaranteed, then I advise you stay in the United States.

The Use Of Scripted Material (Routines)

August 27, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here's another excerpt from Bang:

> You may have an initial resistance to using scripted material, but chances are you're using them already. If you've ever told a story more than once, you are telling a routine, a conversational piece that you know your audience will positively respond to. If you've ever repeated an opinion of yours with the same backing evidence, you've told a routine. Openers and routines come together to form a conversation that girls enjoy. You are giving them what they want: fun vibes from an interesting guy.
>
> The only problem with repeating the same thing over and over again is that you tend to go from telling to reciting—you begin to talk faster and limit eye contact while you stare off in space and speak from memory. As long as you keep your speech pace at a normal rate and maintain eye contact at all times, there is a very low probability that she will ever think you are using lines on her. And even if she does, as long as she is enjoying your company, she won't care.

There's not much more to be said about using routines as it's something that men are usually comfortable implementing into their game. The only problem I see is that men tend to use too many routines, making them come across more like a social robot instead of a natural. It's better to use only two great routines in a pick-up instead of six mediocre ones. Right now I use only one (detailed in Bang), with the rest being off-the-cuff or basic one-liners. In the book I also explain how to construct your own custom routines.

Here's a new book review that was posted on the forum recently:

> This is the only book you need on pickup. And that's all that really needs to be said. But let me elaborate.
>
> There's lots of "useful" information on game out there. But I put "useful" in scare quotes, because it's all moot if you aren't making material progress toward your goal on a daily basis. Bang is different; it points you in the right direction, gives you a map, and shoves you — hard.
>
> The book is short and to the point, clocking in at under 150 pages. You can breeze through it in an afternoon. Upon completion, you will know, without a doubt, how to approach girls, move them into your bedroom, and fuck them. The section on "The Vibe" alone justifies the eminently reasonable cost of the book.
>
> Do you need anything else? No. And the beauty of the book is that it makes that fact abundantly clear.
>
> I also like the fact that it's designed as a starting point, and not a destination. By this I mean that every other program I encountered touts mastery of the espoused methodology as the target. Bang is explicitly different. It's a > foundation, upon which you're encouraged to build your own seductive edifice.

>
> In fact, Bang opens up by describing the concept of "gameless game," the state where you don't even realize what you're doing anymore — you're just being yourself, and that gets you laid. I can't think of a better end game; nor can I think of anything that will help you achieve that state faster than Bang. I have no greater praise than this.
>
> Downsides? Only this: I hope there's a second edition with better proof reading. There's nothing that obscures meaning, but there are enough unsightly errors of spelling and grammar to merit mention.
>
> Now if you'll excuse me, I have a lot of approaching to do.

Check out the Bang homepage to find out how to grab your copy.

On Vacation

August 31, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm going to the beach. I've assembled a collection of twenty posts for you to review and study while I'm gone…

1. How It Feels Like To Be A Hot Girl
2. The Movement To End Cockblocking As We Know It
3. An Argument For Only Approaching When You Have the Upper Hand
4. The Downside Of Hitting On Brazilian Girls In The U.S.
5. Gimmick To Pick Up Without Doing Any Work
6. A Short Story Of Getting Played By A Feminist
7. Ideal Age Range For Dating American Women
8. The Secret To Getting Laid
9. The Dark Side Of Game
10. Three Reasons Why Most Guys Don't See Game Progress
11. Why Understanding Women Will Hurt Your Chances At Getting Laid
12. The Do-Or-Die Importance Of Kissing A Girl On The First Date
13. The Best Way To Walk Away From A Bad Approach
14. How Talking About Her To A Guy Friend Reduces The Change You'll Bang
15. The 'Less Is More' Technique To Kissing Girls
16. Things To Know When Banging Girls Who Don't Speak Your Language
17. Differences Between Needy Girls And Confident Girls
18. The Fine Balance Between Compliment And Insults
19. How To Pick Up An Ethiopian Girl
20. The Fact That Game Won't Always Work

See you in a week.

A Closer Look At The Damaged Brains Of American Women

September 7, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There has to be something to explain why American women are so much more undatable compared to their foreign counterparts. As you may have heard, American women are great for meaningless sex, but horrible for long-term relationships. To live out your days with a woman who attends to your most primal of needs, it would be foolhardly to land an American girl.

American women get their unique behavior from culture. This includes televison, higher education, corporate wage slavery, and the trappings of consumerism. Our culture teaches women that they are equal to men and can achieve anything that men can achieve. I'm not going to argue whether this is true or not (it's not), but what must logically follow? That women become like men. Here is the consequence:

You will see that the American woman has aquired what I call the Essence Of Man. Her neverending quest for equality has indeed worked, for a part of a man's brain has sprouted inside their own. Understand: American women are hermaphroditic when it comes to their behavior, personality, and attitude. When you date an American woman, you are dating a part-man and not a true woman. For that you actually need to go abroad.

The American culture, unfortunately, is in the process of exporting (i.e. polluting) other nations. It's just a matter of time until the Brazilian girl, for example, is corrupted with similar thoughts of equality and masculinity. Already in some of their brains, especially upper class Brazilian girls, you may have an Essence Of Man speck—just a little area of degeneration that flares up every now and then like a stubborn cyst, but nothing that warrants emergency attention. The American woman is infected with an uncurable metastatic cancer. The doctor can only offer palliative care.

When a man leans over to the feminine side, as we saw with the somewhat recent metrosexual trend, his sexuality is rightfully questioned. But when a woman leans over the masculine side, she's praised as independent, ambitious, and strong—a go-getter who successfully “made” it. Every now you’ll find a man who wants those latter qualities in a woman, and it’s because something perverse has happened: the American culture has masculized the woman and feminized the man. It has caused the man to seek out qualities that for millenia were exclusively desired by females. Within his brain is the Essence Of Woman.

The Best Motivator That Gets You Approaching Girls

September 9, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

All self-improvement books or websites have one same tip that they try to pass on to you: “Visualize success! Visualize the positive outcome and one day it will happen!” Or something of the sort. When it comes to girls this is not an optimal strategy—in fact it is detrimental to motivation.

The biggest problem guys have with game is the approach. They simply don’t do enough of them to get good, quitting well before they’ve achieved any amount of competent skill. They pause and hesitate and wuss out, and getting some of them to do one approach while sober takes more energy than the actual act of sex that the approach would hopefully entail.

Instead, when you want to approach a girl, it’s better to visualize failure, embarrasment and pain. To imagine that everyone within earshot will laugh about you, take your picture, and go home on the internet to write about you on their crappy blogs. When you visualize the negative, not only do you accept the rejection (because odds are you will be rejected), but you face and accept your fears. Only by embracing suffering can you tame the fear. You go through the process of desensitization, which it what separates weekend pick-up warriors from the guys who can do this every day.

About 30 seconds into the approach, your heart rate will calm and you’ll forget why you were so scared in the first place. The hardest part is out of the way, and now you’ll do everything in your power to making that conversation last, to making her laugh, to showing your best qualities in a short amount of time.

The more I visualize failure, the more successful I am, because not only do I approach much more but I’m more relaxed, more calm, more accepting of whatever bad comes my way, especially in those tough situations with a large audience watching (e.g. day game).

The worst-case scenario, which will only happen to you a handful of times, is really not that bad at all. It will end as quickly as it begun, and life will continue, and no one will care.

P.S. If you liked this post then I think you will like my book Bang, a collection of simple but powerful techniques, moves, and lines that make it easier for the average 20-something man to be more successful with women. Topics in Bang include discussion of the alpha male, effective opening lines, conversation themes, getting phone numbers, detailed dating strategy, and much more.

Complimenting the book is my Game Tips Newsletter. It's free and your first newsletter will be about how to meet girls in coffee shops. Following that will be newsletters on dealing with flakes, handling cockblockers, and meeting girls in foreign countries, among others. Your email address will always remain private and you can unsubscribe at any time. To subscribe put your first name and email address below and click the button.

Next Week Is Launch Week

September 10, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

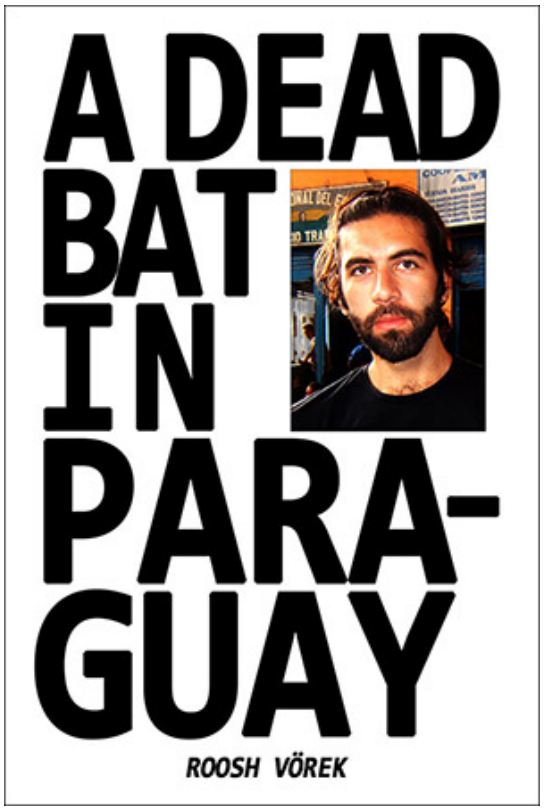
My second book will be released next week. I'm going to introduce you to the book and share excerpts, a couple reviews, and also some behind-the-scenes information on what it was like to write it. The fun starts on Monday.

Tomorrow

September 13, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Here's the cover. It goes on sale tomorrow morning.



You'll notice that I settled on a pen name that won't require a domain change. It's derived from the name of a flaky Turkish pastry that my mom makes. Originally it was an inside joke with my sister but it stuck, and a lot of people in Colombia know me as Roosh Vörek. It's just easier this way.

When addressing me in writing please don't forget the dots over the "o" (keyboard code ALT + 0246).

A Dead Bat In Paraguay

September 14, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Twenty-seven months after I published Bang, I present to you A Dead Bat In Paraguay, a 262-page memoir of my six-month adventure through South America. Here's the book's website:

http://www.adeadbatinparaguay.com

It has two sections. The first is a brief synopsis with an overview video, and the second offers full details of the book, including its contents and my motivations for taking the trip. I'll paste the first section here...

Two-Minute Video Overview

Synopsis

> A Dead Bat In Paraguay is the true story of when I decided that the best way to deal with my existential crisis was to sell my possessions, quit my professional career as a scientist, and hop on a one-way flight to Quito, Ecuador in order to visit every country in South America. I sincerely believed the trip would put me on a track towards a more fulfilling life of excitement, intrigue, and exotic women, away from my soulless corporate job in a Washington D.C. suburb.
> Instead, I humorously fall from one country to the next, striking out repeatedly with the local women, getting robbed, having dreams that became reality, self-diagnosing myself with a host of diseases, and suffering repeated bouts of stomach illness that made marathon bus rides superhuman feats of bodily strength.
> Along the journey I chronicle the friendships, the women, and the struggles, including one fateful night in Paraguay that I thought would lead to my end.

Click here if you're ready to order your copy, or visit the A Dead Bat In Paraguay website for more details about the book. If after reading the the book's website you're not sure if it's for you, hang tight this week for excerpts and reviews.

A Dead Bat In Paraguay: Sample Pages

September 15, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's a little tricky picking which excerpts to show you because I didn't want to pick a part that was especially good or gave away important plot details. In other words I didn't want to put the best jokes of the movie in the trailer.

I settled on three excerpts that I think represents the book pretty well.

The first details a tour I took in Potosi, Bolivia of a mine that the city depends on for its existence. I describe how the miners basically stuck to colonial techniques for extracting minerals in godawful conditions, shortening their life spans in the process. It gave me a different perspective on how reasonable my thoughts were when I quit my job a few months prior.

The second excerpt takes place in Salta, Argentina, a place that I made a big push to get with an Argentine girl. I describe a bit of my strategy on getting with a local woman and how it wasn't quite working. I was becoming increasingly frustrated, and it showed.

The third excerpt takes place in Asunción, Paraguay and highlights my deteriorating mental state. I had recurring fantasies of getting maimed and becoming seriously ill. I couldn't wait to leave for Brazil, but then something bad happened.

You can read all three excerpts here. Also if you go to the Amazon listing of the book, you can read the first few pages where I start the book off in the United States while working as a cubicle slave. Or you can click "Surprise Me!" and get a random page from the book.

A Dead Bat In Paraguay: Two Reviews

September 16, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here are the first two reviews. There's a queue of more reviews to share, and I will get to those in the upcoming weeks.

The first review is from Craig via email. He writes:

> Roosh,
>
> Just got finished with the book, and I've got to tell ya, I found myself laughing out loud at over a dozen times during the story. You did a great job summarizing your six-month (South American ordeal) with enough detail and conversational fragments to keep the pace moving along, but without the sensation of losing too much depth.
>
> Without a doubt, I've never read something that made me want to go and take a shit right then and there, just to nod in approval of its firmness.
>
> I'm very pleased to see this sentence in the book–so much so that I made a note to myself tell you as much: "If travelers are more independent than the average person then they must also be the least empathetic."
>
> Spot on.
>
> At some point I decided I liked that idea (remembering good lines, that is), and made a small collection of my favorites, most of which certainly made me chuckle out loud:
>
> Six spoiler quotes removed!
>
> It's wonderful to see a story that isn't all happy and rose-colored — certainly more realistic (and more in line with what people should actually be reading before traveling to keep their expectations in check).
>
> It's impressive that, despite all the anguish, you've managed to once again find yourself in South America. I'm assuming the investment in the language certainly played a part in that thought process. I certainly hope you're eating some natural yogurt this time around, to keep the good bacteria counts in your belly topped off (to keep the bad stuff at bay). A small, regular serving of sugarless yogurt is the cornerstone for good health abroad…
>
> Digestive advice

> Thanks again for the fun read.

In February I put up a three-part interview with Craig where he shared a lot of his travel tips.

The second review is from Alpha Dominance:

> In addition to the knowledge Roosh shares, the story itself is well written and entertaining. It highlights the experience of South American travel, from the hardships of food-born illness, the hardships and hazards of traveling thousands of miles by rickety bus to the camaraderie of hostel living and the difficulty of getting a genuine cultural experience off the beaten path of the lonely planet travel guide. It's an enthralling read but an accessible one, not requiring a doctorate in literature to enjoy.
>
> I recommend checking out "A Dead Bat in Paraguay," you won't be disappointed.

You can read his entire post here.

Visit the A Dead Bat In Paraguay homepage to get your copy.

A Dead Bat In Paraguay: Behind The Scenes

September 17, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Alright so this week I published my new book and shared sample pages and reviews. Let's close it all out with a behind-the-scenes breather…

- One thing I didn't want to do was take years to write this book. So I avoided real work and moved into my Dad's basement where I wouldn't have to worry about things like cleaning my bathroom and cooking. All I did was write, shit, and game.

- I couldn't write the book inside my Dad's home because he had internet (i.e. constant porn access), so most of it was written in the Starbucks next to a Leisure World, a place where old people get ready to die. I had my choice of many older ladies and I could have racked up a lot of notches, but I focused on the book instead. For you!

- I tried to keep track of how many hours it took me to write this. My estimate is a little over 500 hours. I shouldn't have told you this because if you don't like the book you'll think, "Haha he wasted 500 hours of his life on this!"

- What's great about books is that for a short amount of time you experience a sort of mind meld with the author. Reading about someone's experiences is like a shortcut to experiencing them yourself. And then there's experiences like mine which you may hope not to experience yourself.

- Sure I wrote this book to entertain and educate, but the real reason is for the fame. The irony about becoming world famous by writing about trying to get laid is that girls recognize me and I no longer have to try to get laid. Giddy!

- I've held proof copies of the book, but not the final copy since I'm still here in Colombia. You'll hold my book before I do. This has to be the first time in the history of the world that someone has sold copies of his book without caressing it first.

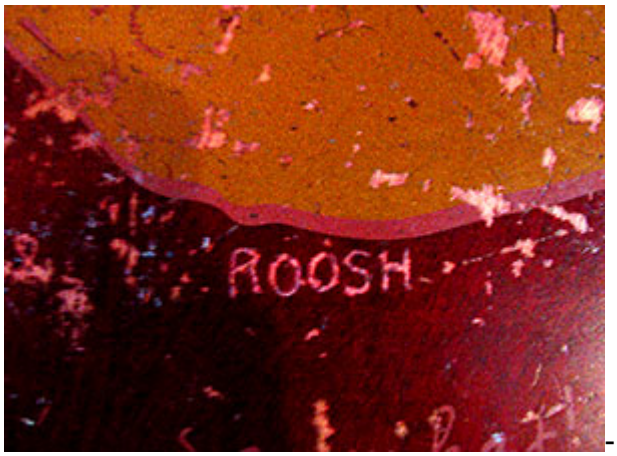
- The plan was to finish the book in my Dad's basement, but 14 months there I still had no book. I decided to move out before I turn the age of 30 so people don't start calling me a loser. It took 4 more months in Colombia to get it done. I was so scared of getting my laptop jacked in Colombia and being set back that I never took it outside my house until I was completely done.



- At the very end of the book's homepage you'll see an option to download the RTF format which is friendly to iPhones. So far I've sold more of those than Kindle copies. The iPhone is the future of ebooks?

- If you want an autographed copy then hang on for bit. I'll be back in D.C. some time in 2010. I'm returning to Brazil in five weeks for an indeterminable amount of time.

- One sneaky person snagged a copy of the book last week from Amazon. He or she is the first person to purchase the book. Someone else bought it on Sunday. It was actually available for sale on Amazon for about a month if you searched for "Roosh" or the book's title.

I want to thank everyone who bought my book so far. If it wasn't for your support with my first book Bang then there would be no A Dead Bat In Paraguay. If you haven't already, check out the book's website to learn more about it before grabbing your paperback or eBook copy.

Of course I'm going to plug this book like a mother the next few months, but starting Monday we're returning back to normal posts.

POSTSCRIPT: Before I forget I wanted to thank my design guy Dan for doing the book's homepage and also for modifying the main image at the top of this page. Check out his work.

The 9 Immutable Laws of Pick-Up

September 20, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. If you find yourself having to ask for advice on how to get a particular girl, you won't get her.

I mentioned this before in Be That Guy

> I was trying to bang this girl and she was being very flakey and taking forever to get back to me. I asked my friend what I should do about it and we proceeded to go over my options after I told him everything that had transpired so far.
>
> At the end I thought, "Is she doing this with her friends right now? Is she asking her friend how to get with me? Is she asking her friend how to get me to stop flaking?"
>
> Of course not.

I looked back even farther and noticed that with almost every girl I asked a friend advice for, I didn't eventually bang her. When you are prepared to ask advice on how to deal with a particular girl, what you're doing is valuing her, and that's the fastest way to not bang her. Some of the emails I get are mini-books where the guy painfully details the situation he's suffering through and then asks for help. I'll give it but I know the situation isn't going to turn out in his favor. The reason he's asking is because he already lost the upper hand by making a ton of mistakes.

To improve your game what you should do instead is ask for advice after the fact. Do the best you can then after you fail ask a buddy what he would have done differently. Learn from your mistakes once you've given your all, because if you find yourself needing to ask advice during the seduction, I'm sorry but you've already lost her. Take a big step back and go meet another girl instead.

Play the game with what you have learned from the past. Don't be a pussy and give blow-by-blow details to your buddy hoping it will somehow help you.

2. If a girl hasn't had sex in a month, she will be 10 times easier than if she had sex in the past week.

I don't want to kill myself when it comes to getting laid. I paid my dues when I was learning and now I just want to put the minimal amount of effort in getting quality girls.

It's rare that the hottest girl will be the most horny—she always has a steady supply of dick that she can access. Banging her depends just as much on luck and timing than actual game. Try your hand with her every now and then, but keep in mind that screening for horniness is just as important as personality and beauty. If the girl you're dealing with has gotten laid recently, there will be no sense of urgency and the iron will be too cool for you to get inside her pants quickly.

For example, say I met an 8 in a popular nightclub. She has suitors all around her and every ten minutes she glances at her cell phone to read a text message from one who is badly trying to fuck her. She just got laid two nights ago by one of her ex's. The next day I met a 7 in a coffee shop, a talkative girl who didn't break eye contact with me in the hour that we chatted. She showed more interest. Who should I put more energy into?

In reality you'll have energy for both girls so you'll call them up the same day, but what will happen is the 7 will accept and the 8 will say maybe. The point is you won't be doing your dick any favors by only chasing girls who have a lot of options and get laid regularly. Horniness is an important dimension to screen that gets your notch count up into stratospheric heights.

3. You're not going to be good unless you reach a point where you feel that pick-up is a job.

One night you have to be knee deep in another sausage fest surrounded by girls with attitude and think, "God, not this shit again." Like any other skill, pick-up has a wall that must be smashed through if you want to get to any level of consistency. Understand: There is nothing fun about getting rejecting by tons of women, but that's the only way to improve. Just suck it up and keep going.

4. The opener is the least impactful part of the pick up.

I've gotten laid with the most ridiculous openers known to man, ones that are grammatically incorrect and void of depth, meaning, or feeling. Most of my regular openers are downright boring and nothing that would bat an eyelash to a man who is learning how to get laid, but I understand that the opener doesn't get me laid—it only serves as an icebreaker. Human beings are electrons floating in their own orbits, and openers simply contain enough energy to cause a collision. You want to go from being a nobody in her world to someone who exists and has a presense.

That's great if you have a solid opener, but the last thing you should do is hesitate because of a lack of one. The real value lies in what you follow up with, which will begin to introduce her to your personality and vibe, two important things that get you in her pants.

5. The men you surround yourself with do more to predict your future results than your knowledge of game.

There are quotes I've read that go something like "Show me a man's friends and I'll show you his character," and "Show me a man's friends and I'll show you his future." Same goes for pick-up. For a variety of reasons (someone to talk to about game, someone who gets you in the right mood, someone whose success motivates you, etc.), having a man that is achieving or wants to achieve the same goals as you are will do more to help you than mere knowledge.

I have received tons of emails of guys who got into the game and complain that their friends are questioning their new lifestyle choices, that they hesitate to approach because their friend isn't into it. I tell them to go out alone. Game is already hard enough to master, but now you have to get judged by your "friend" as well? This prevents you from action and leads to a low notch count.

6. You will get flaked on until you die.

Expecting the girl to do anything—whether it's returning your call or showing up on a date—assures disappointment. Understand that girls are flake machines, and will continue to do so until the end of time. As long as human beings have the ability to change their mind about something, girls will change their mind on you. While there are things you can do to reduce this, you will never eliminate it completely.

One solution to to the flake problem can be found in The Secret To Getting Laid:

> If you want to have sex with one girl, you must do X number of approaches, get Y numbers, go on Z dates, and so on, where Z is less than Y is less than X. A certain number of attempts equals one lay, and that number will always be greater than one, sometimes significantly so. Tell me how many fresh prospects are in your phone and where your game is at and I'll tell you how many notches you'll get in the next month.

The guys who are doing it wrong only work on one girl at a time. Since odds are that girl will flake, they will have to "start over" after each attempt, never building that crucial momentum which is important in getting laid. When I'm ready for a new notch, I go into a sort of "on" mode, approaching like crazy, getting a handful of numbers, and then working on all of them at the same time.

If I get 10 numbers this month and only bang one, did I fail? I think not—twelve notches a year adds up pretty quickly. Now say I got one number, worked on it for a couple weeks, and then got another number, and worked on that for a couple weeks, and I did this ten times until I get that one lay. That's five months for the bang because I kept going all-in on each girl. Because of the flakey nature of girls, you must multi-task and have many pots simmering on the stove at once.

7. Pick-up difficulty is relative and depends on venue selection.

Ugly girls and hot girls are easy to pick up if there are other hotter girls around, but things get dramatically harder when those hotter girls disappear. And that's just from the perspective of the girls. If we account for your unique personality and look, thing continue to change. How come I can't get laid in Georgetown, but I go to U Street and pull regularly? Because the girls that go to those places are different, and different girls will perceive me differently.

I have discovered places within cities that my success rate is more than ten times higher. In the same city! If you don't know which places you do better in, then I guarantee you're seeing a lot less success than you could somewhere else with the exact same game. As much work should go into venue selection as actually learning how to game girls.

8. You will go home empty-handed if you pass on the sure thing.

If one night you have both a sure thing and a "maybe" with another girl, always go for the sure thing. It's never happened in the history of the world that a man got something after skipping on the sure thing, party because the mere act of skipping on the sure thing for some other girl means you're overvaluing the better girl. Bad game will leak out as a result.

Don’t worry, they’ll another be another opportunity to upgrade next time, but on this night, go ahead and get your dick wet. As a man who has lost count of how many times I skipped over the sure-thing and got nothing, trust me when I say that the other girl won’t put out. You’ll get a number at most. This partially goes against my philosophy that you should pick the girl and not let her pick you, but when guaranteed sex is at play it’s okay to put that aside.

9. The more you work, the more you’ll get.

Fuck all those people who say you shouldn’t work for it, that you should just sit back and be cool and let things happen. They’re just rationalizing their paltry results. If they were right then there wouldn’t be large readerships for blogs like mine and a market for dozens of pick-up books, CD’s, and seminars. Doing nothing except praying and wishing and feeling sorry for yourself doesn’t work. Getting a good job or condo or being intelligent is not enough.

Knowledge is power and applying that knowledge leads to real-world success. And when I mean work I don’t mean reading or studying but getting out in the field and interacting with other girls. If you don’t believe me, start a spreadsheet of how many girls you talk to each week and what you end up getting out of that. Do it for a while and you’ll see that the more girls you approach, the more intimacy you get.

Interview With Muscle & Game Master Virgle Kent

September 22, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I checked in with my buddy Virgle Kent the other week and asked him a few questions about working out and pick-up. Let's start…

So say I finally convinced a guy to sign up for a gym and he's going to go three times a week. How should he start?

> Well the first thing to do is decide on what exactly he's trying to do and what is his goal for his body. If he's fat and wants to lose weight and get toned, he'll probably want a program with lighter weights and more reps. If he's skinny and wants to gain muscle mass then the weight will be heavy but less reps. Lifting weights though is a personal science, so the more you know about your body and what it's capable of the faster you'll achieve your goals.

How about basic nutrition: what is an easy strategy that will help with muscle growth?

> Easy, for muscle growth you'll want protein plain and simple. You'll want it from your food and whey protein. Again if you know your body and what it can handle, you'll want to eat to grow. It gets complicated though when depending on the time of year and where you want your body to be in a certain time. For example, during the fall and especially in the winter I eat one way to gain mass and size. During the spring and summer I eat another way to cut up. But let's keep it simple: high protein.

I weightlifted for years in addition to intense cardio but never got big. Here in Colombia I weightlifted without cardio for two months and got bigger than I've ever been. How do you feel about cardio exercises with weightlifting?

> Cardio is a very tricky thing. If you're a big fat fatty naturally then you'll need to do a lot more of it and weight lift to get muscle definition and especially if you ever want to see your abs. But guys like you and I who are naturally skinny and have low body fat at our age, TOO MUCH cardio is the enemy. You start doing too much or running for long distances then that will hinder how much muscle you can build. I really never do cardio, never even ran and was huge. But honestly there's no way to escape doing cardio. I got away with not doing it in my early 20's but as I get closer to 30, I do it lightly. To get ready for Vegas I only jogged on the treadmill 2 to 3 times a week for 10 minutes. I also would change it up with running incline for 5 of those ten minutes. Cardio is needed.

What are some common mistakes you see guys making in the gym?

> Ha, doing some gay ass John Basedow work out they read in Men's Health, where they try to balance on one foot on a ball while dumbbell curling with one hand and doing an overhead tricep extension with the other. The exercise doesn't do anything but make the guy look stupid. But the more serious mistake is not asking for help on how to correctly do an exercise. Incorrect form on any exercise is a total waste of time of that exercise.

How do girls react to men with large muscles? How do you avoid being seen as a typical huge guy with muscles?

> For the most part I think the girls are cool with it but I also understand that the girls are typically already into guys with muscles. But I find it cute when they find a reason to touch me or feel me up. Sometimes they straight grope and don't even try to hide the fact. I don't think if a girl has a conversation with me they can peg me as a meathead. This is DC so as soon as I tell them about my nerdy job working with numbers and spreadsheets in finance it's kinda of hard to peg me as a meathead. Once I get into my love of Woody Allen movies its a wrap I'm not your typical meathead. I also joke around that I do a lot of Yoga and Pilates and move away from talk of the gym. Basically I try to play up my nerd side.

If a guy takes your advice and gets big, is there anything new he needs to keep in mind when gaming a girl than when he was weak and flaccid?

> Yeah, don't act like a meathead. Don't talk about your workouts and even going to the gym. Be polite and a little sensitive. It's easy and tempting to slip into cave man mode (I've done it from time to time) and get all "Me Tarzan, you Jane" on them. Over the years I've found that being big yet open, approachable and civilized works well with women. You want them to feel like you can protect and take care of them physically but you have a few things to offer them on the emotional side. Be as well rounded as you can be.

How would you describe your overall pick-up style? Does it change depending on city or environment?

> My overall pick up style is probably Humor and Comfort. I want the girl to make her laugh, make her feel comfortable as if we've known each other for years. I don't want it to feel like a pick up. I try my best to disarm and charm. A girl will more likely let you put your penis inside her if she feels comfortable about it (of course this isn't always 100% trust me).
>
> As far as city goes, we're in DC it's like marathon training in Colorado or when Goku trains on King Kai's small planet with 100x Earth's gravity. It's harder, the women are ice cold. This city will force you to develop your game mentally or sink. As much as I hate it, I owe my success with women to it because it has made me a better at game. When I go to other cities or environments my game stays the exact same but the response is ten times as strong.

You have the ability to come up with interesting on-the-fly openers that work. Care to share your strategy for doing so?

> It's simply based on environmental observation. I read somewhere that a real ninja can find 10 things in a room to kill you with. I think a guy should be quick and smart enough to find ten things in a room he can talk to a woman about. I think some people make openers way too complicated, just keep it simple and remember that an opener is a reason to have a conversation. When all else fails just make fun of another less attractive girls outfit (just make sure it's not her friend or sister).

We talked about mistakes that guys do in the gym. But how about in the bar? What do they do which kills their chances of getting with girls?

> Reading The Game or Pick Up Blogs and taking it to literally. Picking up is a state of mind it's not so much what you say but how you say it. Guys hear Peacocking and go out and buy huge gold male sign necklaces, shave a mohawk on their heads, get tear drop tattoos on their face then wonder why no girls in DC will talk to them. They could have simply put a pink pocket square in a blue blazer and gotten the result they were looking for. This is not something you can learn from a book, in a seminar or in one year.
>
> Another thing is how they carry themselves in a room or in the company of women. Mistakes like not making eye contact, hands in pockets, and standing at the back of a crowded bar or away from the dance floor, even when they're out to pick up girls.

How do you feel about mud turtles?

> God bless em. Some nights you're feeling lazy, you've had a long day and your really don't want to work for it, you just need a turtle. They know how to make a > man feel great because they really appreciate the smallest attention you give them. Just try not to go on a Turtle bender… no more than two turtles in a row, then cut yourself off and go for the regulars.

How much longer do you think you'll be doing this? Do you see an end game in the near future?

> Real talk Roosh, I want out so bad I can taste it. This life is all I've known since one year out of college. It scares me that each year I get a little bit better at it, this nomadic life, being selfish. You learn to become an actor to force a fake connection with a girl. But if you do this long enough it's becomes harder and harder to tell yourself or know when you're not faking it, so what happens when you meet a girl you really like how do you turn this off? If you're good at being a certain type of man how easy will it be to fail when you try to be a different man.
>
> There will be times when you go on hot streaks and hook up with so many women and feel good for a short while. In a couple of months you won't even remember their name or the hook up whatsoever. It makes you question what's the point. But this is a prison of our own creation. We all came in of our own free will. At some point each of us decided that we wanted to know how to be good with women. I wonder if we would have made that same choice if it we knew it meant the loss of emotional connection.
>
> To answer your question though I hope the game ends soon for me but the chances are very slim.

Thanks VK. Read more about his thoughts on game and life over at his blog VK's Empire Of Dirt.

“The Book Is Fearless”

September 23, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I got two more reviews of my new book A Dead Bat In Paraguay to share. The first is via email…

> First and foremost: The honesty of the book shines through very brightly. The book is fearless. Embarrassment, shame, humiliation, rejection, self-doubt (and not the cool, hip kind you’d see on TV, but the kind that’s like a thorn in your confidence): It’s all there, not gussied up in the slightest. I don’t think I’d have the courage to write this book.
>
> Because of that, the book is actually inspiring. Not stare-up-at-the-stars inspiring, or dramatic-comeback inspiring – those are just masturbation. Your acceptance of the kind of pains that can erode a person’s moxy until he is tiny and petty, and your persistence through that pain with an eh-fuck-it attitude, comes off as more genuinely masculine than anything I’ve seen or read in a very long time. It reminded me of Luke in “Cool Hand Luke.” I actually wanted to go get rejected all night at a bar after reading this, just to think afterwards, “I’m as tough as Roosh.”
>
> That’s mixed in with a lot of humorous and insightful commentary.
>
> If I had to complain, I would say the prose comes off as too simple sometimes, and the frankness of the book occasionally undercuts the storytelling. I know that contradicts what I said earlier, but I guess what I mean is this: In reality, sometimes the hero slips and falls in the shower and so the villlain wins, or vice versa. When you find out that’s what happens, you think, “Well, shit, that was anti-climactic,” but afterwards it will stay with you longer because it’s more relevant to your life than a shoot-out in an abandoned factory in bullet-time. That’s like your book.
>
> Also, the price was right.

The second review is from Brooklyn Boy…

> Admit it. You want to travel. See the world. See the sights. See everything you’ve never gotten the chance to. It will change you. That Eat, Pray, Love book has become a phenomenon … or so you hear. It worked for her, it can work for you. That’s how these things go.

> Except it isn’t. There are parasites and half-day bus rides and no part of your path that feels uninfluenced by Lonely Planet. The native girls challenge your once-bulletproof advances and the backpackers that don’t seem every bit as vapid as the stateside ones who bored you. You will get robbed. And you will return to a hometown that seems locked in step with six-month old footprints.

You can read his entire post here.

There were two reviews from last week and you can also check out a couple quick comments about the book on the forum. Order the book here or learn more about it.

Do Not Help A Girl Out With Her Problems If You Want To Fuck Her

September 24, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I witnessed a frightful scene recently. At the university cafeteria there was a gorgeous girl with tears in her eyes talking to her guy friend. She was apparently exasperated over something, repeating "Es complicado!" many times. In response to her problem, the guy gently rubbed on her back and shoulders with a smirk that said, "Yes I finally get to touch her!" He pulled her in close one moment and gave her a lingering kiss on the top of her head. His tender embraces nearly brought a tear to my eye.

Understand: The only time it's acceptable to talk to a girl who's crying is if you're the source of her tears.

Otherwise you're asking for permission to be removed from the pool of potential suitors who get to fuck her. I mentioned this previously in my dark side post, and my mind hasn't changed one bit. If you want to fuck a girl, do not help her out with any of her problems. I would even hesitate to give her trivial aid such as driving directions ("Have you heard of this thing called Google Maps?"). The only acceptable responses when a girl asks for help is "That sucks," or "I don't know… hey can you put this in the trash?"

If you do eventually have sex with a girl you helped then realize that you're getting the boring, provider sex while guys like me are beating that pussy up to its biological limit.

Flashback: Womanly Advice & Russian Girls

September 26, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I want to start a new "feature" where I reach around back into the archives and pull out posts that are both interesting or useful today. It's time to dust off some of the gold I've written in the past.

The first post is Womanly Advice. I offer reasons why you should never listen to a woman when it comes to getting laid.

> When you ask a woman for advice, she doesn't tell you what works in a world based on reality; instead, she tells you what would work in a perfect, harmonius world where attention is free and plentiful, where no one hurts each other and no one plays any games. She tells you what would work if no one got punished for expressing feelings and interest. She tells you advice that always seems to work in television and movies where the beta always gets the beautiful girl. (Not suprisingly, most mainstream movies are written by beta white guys.)

In the other post I lament about my failure to bed Russian Girls..

> My Russian roommate, an expert on matters such as this, says the cold attitude of these non-Americanized Russians is not so much snobbiness as it is insecurity, "They are intimidated by Americans and don't feel confident when having to talk in English." It has to be cultural because I've spoken to many other girls where there was a language barrier and I didn't get this feeling that hacking away at permafrost in Siberia would be more interesting.

Roissy was the most helpful with sharing tips in comments 23 and 32.

Brief Introduction To Buddhism

September 27, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

In Spring of 2009 I picked up What The Buddha Taught by Walpola Rahula and after reading each chapter I went on the internet for more explanation on concepts mentioned in the book. I took notes on everything so that I could consult with them later, as the beliefs espoused by Buddhism matched very closely to my own.

Here is a sampling of the topics I took notes on:

- The Four Noble Truths
- The Five Aggregates
- The Noble Eightfold Path
- Anatta (Concept of No Soul)
- Meditation
- Five Hindrances to Clear Understanding
- Seven Factors Of Enlightenment

Download my notes in a PDF file (the nested lists would take forever to format for the blog). I reread them myself every month.

The Two Things That Tight Game Comes Down To

September 28, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

A lot of the game advice you read on my blog or others encompass a wide range of actions and behaviors, including body language, tonality, humor, grooming, story telling, touching, attitude, teasing, and so on. There's dozens of topics and these days you can find pick-up blogs exclusively to something specific like style or cooking. That's because game is like sports—it can be discussed without end to infinity. The cat has definitely been let out of the bag and I'm confident that demand for game knowledge will be strong until the end of time.

That said, most things you learn about game are really teaching you just two things:

1. Being interesting

2. Being cool

That's tight game right there. (I can easily argue that other things compose tight game like persistance and the logistical know-how to get a girl inside a bedroom, but they are not absolutely essential.)

Being interesting is simply being able to arouse a woman's interest. This comes from telling good stories to negging, to dancing well or making her laugh. A year ago a man told me that all you needed to do to get laid was give a girl "good chat." The problem is most guys can't have interesting conversation. They can't show their positive traits in an intriguing way. They have no experiences to talk about. Their lifestyle is nothing to be emulated or desired.

Being cool is more about not doing awkward things. This begins with the elimination of weird mannerisms and body language problems and ends with having a presence that other people are simply drawn into it. This is a lot more difficult to teach. I can easily tell a guy to not lean in or have a feminine posture, but that's only half of it. The other half will magically come (I'm being serious) as his confidence goes up and he starts banging a lot of women. It simply falls into place.

If you are interesting and cool then you're a man who has a quality woman or fucks a lot of girls. If you're only interesting than you're the stereotypical shlub who lands a homely Peace Corp girl with that go-getter attitude ("Must get a graduate degree before we have Connor!"). If you're only cool then you'll get trashy skanks or club rats (not necessarily a bad thing).

If pretty girls are not regularly attracted to you then you're not interesting and/or cool. Maybe to your guy friends you are, but to the female race you are not and therefore you will not be rewarded by pussy. Learning game is nothing but an indirect but necessary means to being interesting and cool. When you read a new line or routine, you're just mimicing the act of being interesting or cool.

Should You Marry The Conservative Girl Or The Whore?

September 29, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I received a very interesting email from a man who has done both. Let's take a look:

> I wanted to write you a note because you posted a blog about being with a whore or being with a conservative woman.
>
> I know from experience with both that whores are the best. I was married to a conservative woman for four years. I was much like you. I went with a ton of whores who would sleep with me in the first hour of a date. Sometimes we would not even get out of the house for the date we had planned because I had her clothes off already.
>
> I thought to myself, this is not the type of girl to marry. I ended up marrying a very conservative girl. She would do most anything for me and was as sweet as can be. Trouble is I wanted sex all the time and that was something she needed all the planets aligned properly before she could have it. It was ridiculous! We started off having sex a few times a week and I thought, okay I can live with this. Then as we got into our daily routine she got very uptight.If I forgot to take the garbage out she would be saying "I am not in the mood. We need to clean the house. I need you to be more sensitive…" etc, etc, etc. Eventually we went from 3 or 4 times a week to once a week and then once a month and then we went as long as six months. Can you believe that? I cannot even imagine it. I wanted to see what would happen if I did not initiate it. I don't think she even noticed.
>
> Well, rest assured that relationship ended and sixteen years ago I decided to marry a whore. And, I might add I married one of the biggest whores I could find. My relationship with her is awesome. I swear to you I could call her and tell her to come to my office and blow me and she will without hesitation. We have sex six or seven times a week and often it is her initiating it. She will even and has on occasion been with other men at my request. Yes, this sounds bizarre but after years of begging for it and feeling like it was a reward for good deeds I went a bit crazy but I am glad I did. She literally does what I tell her to do and who I tell her to do.
>
> She would NEVER cheat on me if I preferred it that way but when I tell her to take care of a guy or two or three or actually up to four one time, she will do it without hesitation.
>
> I swear this is true and I can prove it to you. I actually look at my decision to marry her as the single best decision in my life. We have four kids ages 12 to 8 and she is an unbelievable mother. Our kids are very well adjusted. One is gifted and talented. Others are great at sports, dance, etc.

> That is it. I say go for the whore.

It could be that he's only had experience with two extremes, but he paints a picture of one extreme as being far better than the other.

I know what some of you thought when you read this line: "She would NEVER cheat on me." You thought, "Whatever, she's cheating on him."

Let me pose three scenarios and you take a pick of which you prefer.

1. You marry a conservative girl and within a couple years you get mediocre sex once every two weeks.

2. You marry a whore and she fucks the hell out of you whenever you want but she cheats on you behind your back. You never find out about it or even suspect anything.

3. You marry a whore and she fucks the hell out of you whenever you want but you know she cheats on you.

Which is the worst option? Option one of course. If you're an alpha who marries the whore, I have no doubt that neither two or three will come to fruition and she will be faithful to your cock as long as it can satisfy her.

I know if I ever get married it will be with a dirty girl (foreign of course). Assuming that sex goes down by at least 50% a couple years after marriage, I need to marry a girl who has a deviant sexual appetite. If you marry a girl who barely meets your sexual needs before marriage, guess what's going to happen after you marry her.

Four Places To Practice Your Spanish In Medellin

September 30, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I recently wrote a tongue-in-cheek guest post for Medellin Living, a blog run by a guy named Dave who I met here in Colombia. Here's an excerpt:

> 3. There's casas and there's casas. I'm talking about the places where older gentleman callers visit for 30 or 60 minute intervals. Many gringos I've spoken to, especially American gringos, have told me that frequenting these casas is great for their Spanish, and is much more economical and fun than paying for a 38-hour block of lessons from EAFIT. This is a great option if you don't mind that your language study to come with a slight risk of the clap.

EAFIT is a popular university where many gringos study Spanish. I like to think the post is funnier if you've been to Medellin.

Dave also wrote a review of my new book on his other blog, Go Backpacking.

> Ultimately, A Dead Bat In Paraguay is not your typical travel memoir, and that's exactly why I enjoyed it. Roosh's book should appeal to all backpackers, though I have a hunch young men will appreciate it more. For the lady travelers, if you're curious to gain some insight into the inner workings of the male backpacker's mind against the backdrop of discovering foreign lands, you'll want to check it out too.

Time is ticking for me here in Medellin as I have to leave the country by October 22. You can only stay in Colombia for six months a year on a tourist visa.

Flashback: Why Mediocre Women Desire Hot Men

October 3, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A while ago I wrote a post about the desire of average-looking girls to score a “hot” guy with disregard to his personality prowess, something that I believed was a newer phenomenon.

> Men have a shallow gene that has been passed on for generations, making looks far more important than any other quality a woman can possess. The best advice I can give a mediocre woman is to go to the gym and do some squats to plump up that ass, because personality is a guy’s number two trait at best. So when a guy says he wants a hot girl, that’s just evolution talking. But when a girl says she wants a hot guy, it is a guarantee that she is mediocre looking.

I also mention that hot girls generally don’t value looks as much as many probably think. It’s another reason why if your game is tight you should start your nights (or days) at the top instead of going for 6’s and 7’s.

Ode To The Game

October 4, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There is no bigger rush I can experience as a man than going up to a girl I don't know. I've done it for years, probably hundreds of times, and my heart still races and I still get that thrill.

Stand-up comedy is just a man and his mircophone, but in pickup not only do you not have a microphone, but you don't even have the attention of an audience that is willing to give you the benefit of the doubt. If you think getting heckled on an elevated stage is bad, you've never experienced the harsh demeanor of a single woman with disposable income.

There is nothing else I know that is more powerful than walking up to a stranger, without prior introduction or even eye-contact, and merely talking to her until she comes to decision that she wants to be penetrated by you, created from absolutely nothing but your willingness to take a social risk. There are two kinds of men in the world: those that approach women and those that don't, those whose desire motivates them to take action and those who wait and pray for miracles.

The art of pickup is the most purest art a man can study, and I'm increasingly finding it hard to respect men who don't pursue it.

Thoughts On Goal Setting

October 5, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The attainment of a large goal leads to a burst of happiness, followed by an unhappy void where you ask “What do I do next?” It’s the work, in the form of your creativity, energy, planning, meditation, and problem-solving that fulfills you and takes your focus off suffering. Avoid poisonous existentialist thoughts by keeping yourself busy with goals or projects, one after the other, until your time on Earth ends.

Unworthy goals strive for material attainment, which offer little in terms of lasting happiness or experiences worth remembering. Money is not a worthy goal unless some type of personal growth comes with it. Make just enough money to fulfill your worthy goals, and not a dollar more. While money can provide important things like health care and suitable shelter, it cannot fill your emptiness.

Worthy goals have consequences that lead to more happiness. For example, studying a language. I study Spanish two hours a day (and recently Portuguese as well) in a foreign country, meeting people of a different culture, exercising my brain, thinking and practicing with my senses while exploring a new land. New projects and rich experiences result from that. Worthy goals yield fulfilling lifestyles. Not everything you do should have a financial payoff.

Old aches will be replaced by new aches. You will always ache for something, but it’s important to ask yourself if it really is worth going for.

Why I (No Longer) Do Any Illegal Drugs In South America

October 6, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When you buy drugs here, you directly bankroll thugs with guns. You support the gangs in the favelas and barrios that kill each along with the occasional bystander who was in the wrong place at the wrong time. I doubt you like living near thugs with guns, but thanks to your business you help create that reality for the poor who are just trying to survive. The reality is that drugs are not grown and processed in some happy and peaceful hippy commune.

Many gringos care immensely about how their meat or vegetable produce is grown, but don't care about where their cocaine comes from. I don't have any moral objection to drugs, but because today it's a business that results in death and destruction for innocent people, I refuse to use.

It’s Time You Reconsider The Idea Of Retirement

October 8, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Unfortunately I don’t think you’re going to be able to stop working when you’re 60-years-old and then off the fat of the land until you die. Please consider the following questions:

Will the dollar be seriously devalued in our lifetimes?

Will Social Security and Medicare survive?

Will the cost of health care continue to go up?

Will wages keep up with inflation?

Will corporations continue to outsource middle-class service jobs to other nations?

Will the stock market provide suitable returns to your 401k?

Will the government increase taxes to make up for their haphazard spending?

And most importantly…

Will you survive to the age of retirement?

What are you going to do when (and not if), the social netting holding our parents hand into retirement falls apart? Hell, even they are going to have a harder time retiring.

That said, here is a reasonable retirement plan:

1. Save $10,000 a year.

2. Put into CD’s, gold, and a basket of foreign currencies, and nothing into the stock market casino. Forget about hefty returns and focus more on retaining what you have earned. People go to great lengths to shop around and get a good deal on a laptop or digital camera but don’t mind “investing” thousands of dollars into companies and funds they know little about

3. Get a reitirement visa at age 60 to a country that has low cost and reasonable health care, like Ecuador, Colombia, or Argentina. Countries in Southeast Asia would also be suitable.

4. Die.

If you save $10,000 a year for 30 years during your prime earning years (30-60 years old), you’ll have $300,000. Assuming it holds its value in today’s dollars (ha!) or you invested wisely, you can live comfortable in a place like Cuenca, Ecuador for 25 years at a cost of $1,000 a month. That money would last you until you’re 85, without having to depend on your incompetent government.

My Youngest Day Game Student Ever

October 12, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

One of my most interesting day game workshops took place this past weekend. My student was Jessica's kid Jack.

I was a little surprised when Jessica asked me to teach her kid day game. I told her I thought he was a little young, but she was insistent on giving him a head start and I'm not one to turn down money being thrown at me. She volunteered to pay my round-trip ticket from Colombia and also threw in a little bonus in case Jack went potty on himself during the workshop. He's almost a year old.

The workshop started in the coffee shop with three hours of lecture material. It's there that I felt that Jack wasn't really comprehending my teachings. He couldn't stay focused and sobbed loudly through much of the session, drawing dirty looks from many patrons who probably assumed I was his father. He definitely went potty on himself and with the help of Starbucks personnel I got him cleaned up and ready for the hands-on session where he would chat with girls.

I asked him multiple times if he was ready for the approaches, but he would just give me blank stares while smashing his Spongebob Squarepants toy on the table. I took that for a yes.

He wasn't exhibiting any approach anxiety (suggesting a possible natural ability), and opened an extremely attractive young 20-something girl next to our table. He completely blew the line I taught him, instead mouthing off gibberish that even I couldn't understand, but unbelievably it worked and she turned her body completely to face him with a giant smile. She complimented his appearance and touched him immediately and incessantly, something that has never happened to me in coffee shops. For taking absolutely no notes during the lecture portion (instead he gnawed on the pen I lent him), his first approach was proceeding quite splendidly.

The girl tried to lift him up for some reason and that's when we both noticed that he went potty on himself again. I figured the approach was over and we'd have to leave, but she cleaned him up with some moist toilettes left over from the last time he went potty and resumed playing with him. I was in total disbelief that his technique was working, and started furiously taking notes on what I was observing. The girl eventually gave me her number, telling me to call the next time Jack wanted to play. Weird thing is Jack never asked for her number, and it's here that I suspected Jack was using an inner game technique.

Jack and I then went to the Urban Outfitters. He started to wreck many of the display cases and the staff wasn't all too pleased with my sheepish apologies. I distanced myself and let him crawl amok while I pretended to shop for extra skinny jeans. Out the corner of my eye I saw three beautiful girls rush to his side from nowhere and say, "What are you doing little guy?!" There were encircling him, all on their knees, asking Jack questions like what's his name and how old he was. The girls definitely were interested but Jack was more into his beloved Spongebob, now heavy with drool. They gave up after trying hard for five minutes, possibly more. I started to doubt Jack was completely truthful earlier when he remained silent after I asked him if he had any prior pick up experience.

We left Urban Outfitters and went to McDonalds. He didn't eat much (half his French Fries ended up on the floor), but he killed his Coca-Cola. The sugar and caffeine energized him for our next venue, the street, which any guy knows is the hardest place to pick up.

Here's where it gets a little weird: Jack didn't have to do the approaches himself—the girls approached him outright. Not only that but they lavished him with compliments on his physical appearance, saying he was "cute," "adorable," and a "handsome little man." I was flabbergasted as neither myself or my previous students have ever been approached on the street like that. Even when he wasn't being approached, the amount of eye contact he got was more than I received in the past week. Jack didn't seem to be too interested in the girls though and declined to close any of the them. I started to feel a bit insecure that I was being somewhat upstaged by someone who supposedly had no prior field experience.

The effect of the carbonated beverage was wearing off so I figured we only had time for one more venue—the bookstore. Once inside he immediately went off to the children's section and grabbed Goodnight Moon. I advised him that it's better to put down the baby book and grab an interesting one that he can use as a prop for conversation, such as The Omnivore's Dilemma or Eat, Pray, Love. He yelled at the top of his lungs, which I took as a no, and rampaged through the store while crumpling the book's pages. I had to assure the staff that I'd purchase the now-destroyed book, which I would later bill to Jessica.

During the rampage we both took notice of a gorgeous Eastern European girl, presumably on vacation (she had a plastic bag from one of the Smithsonian museums—Air and Space if I remember correctly). I was ready to throw Jack under the bus to game her myself, but she slid up next to him before I could make a move and asked him, "What book do you got there?"

Jack showed her his work of destruction and the girl, who turns out was from Poland, was so enamored that she started reading from the ruined pages. Then suddenly I was hit with a most offensive wall of fecal odor. The Polish girl stopped reading (she was at the page where the cow crashes through the window), and said, “Someone went doo-doo in his pants!” Apparently Jack took a massive dump.

I’ll be honest: I felt a little pleased at his accident because I was tired of his nonstop success, but then without warning the Polish girl embraced him and then carried him to the bathroom to clean his bottom. They came back and were laughing hard, and I can swear they were making fun of me but exactly how I do not know. Then the Polish girl looked at me said, “Here’s my number. Call me if you need help with your handsome little man.”

“Oh I don’t think I’ll need help,” I said. “But if want to grab a drink tomorrow night we can….”

“Uhhh I don’t know. But if you have Jack around then I’ll come.”

Yeah that stung a bit.

The Polish girl left and I tried to give Jack closing remarks on a table in the cafe, but he just drooled all over the material while putting two pennies in his mouth that he found on the floor. I called Jessica and she came to pick him up not long after, thanking me for my service.

I sat alone in the bookstore coffee shop for a while staring at an Ernest Hemingway poster that was up on the wall, trying to piece together exactly what happened and why the past seven years of my life studying game was challenged in a few hours by someone who used nonsensical gibberish to communicate, soiled his pants repeatedly, and destroyed shit like a crazy maniac.

But then I thought about it more. Jack beats to his own drum. He shows disinterest. He has his own hobbies that he’s 100% commited too, like drooling and bashing things. He’s a straight-up alpha dog, and that’s why those girls threw themselves on him. There’s no other explanation, or else I’ll have to admit that my entire lifestyle is a sham.

There are many ways to skin a cat and Jack has shown me that a simple “Bahhhhagooboopsshhh” is just as effective and saying something like, “So what qualities do you have which make me want to get to know you better?” And here I thought I knew everything about game. Thank you Jack and Jessica, for teaching this old man some new tricks.

A Universal Problem With American Girls

October 13, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is a problem that the American girl has in far greater proportion to other cultures….

She doesn’t listen.

She is incapable of keeping her mouth shut. She can’t sit down and digest an involved oral story with multiple threads because the hampster in her head is spinning about a related personal experience that she just must share, even though it brings no absolutely no value into the world. You can see it on her face, her lips pursed ready to speak before you’re halfway finished, having since stopped listening because she’s in a tizzy of excitement over the lame shit that’s about to rape your ears.

You’re wrong if you think this is a problem with all girls. Colombian girls for example are on the other end of the extreme and frequently have little to talk about. Since they have less “interesting” life experiences, they don’t interject every thirty seconds with nonsense. I love it when I’m telling a story to a Colombian girl and she sits there enthralled with eyes wide open, as if I’m a master storyteller worthy of a Pulitzer. And this is while I’m speaking in mediocre Spanish.

American girls respond to stories not with interest or follow-up questions but with their own stories that technically aren’t stories at all but merely incomplete anecdotes. You can tell her you went to Africa to develop a system of building cost-effective mudbrick huts for the poor and she’ll respond with “Cool, yeah I traveled last year to Thailand and it was so awesome. I love travel!” What the fuck is that?

She lives as if everything exists as a mechanism to talk about herself. It’s a frustrating phenomenon that only comes in handy when you’re spending time with the American girl you want to hate fuck and not have to bother attempting a deep conversation (i.e. 95% of the time).

Girls Are Huge Fucking Liars

October 14, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I know I'm stating the obvious but only recently have I realized how much girls lie, and it's only because of how much I've been lying to them.

As my game has gotten better over the years I've been able to have more than one girl in the rotation. Chances are that one of the girls will especially want to spend time with me on Saturday night, but since it's physically impossible to be in multiple places at once, something has to give. In other words, I have to lie to at least one girl.

My go-to lie is, "Oh I already promised Chris that I'd hang out with him. Maybe we can meet up later in the night though." Of course she will not hear from me for the rest of the night. With one girl I so overused Chris that she asked me if he was my boyfriend.

Once I had to make up a very elaborate story excusing a cancelation about how a hot dog I ate caused a night of vomiting, with full details of the hot dog, the toppings, the precise location I bought it, and even the number of times I vomited (thrice). I'm a strong fan of illness excuses and recommend you use them for last-minute cancellations.

Sometimes I use the "I'm so tired from a long week in front of my laptop that I'm gonna just stay home tonight" excuse. This is a little dangerous because the girl can invite herself over, but if she's not needy then chances are she won't. Note that with just a few extra words you can turn this excuse into a night of minimal-effort sex: "I'm so tired from a long week in front of my laptop that I'm gonna just stay home tonight with a box of wine. Why don't you come over for a drink?"

I'm lying to this girl and that girl while banging that girl and this girl and life is good, and then one afternoon I try to set a date with a girl and she texts me saying, "My stomach is not feeling well I'm going to stay in tonight."

That's my lie bitch!!

And then weeks go on and I banged this girl and I'm going for round three so I call her on a Thursday night to find out what she's doing and she says, "I'm so tired from school I'm gonna stay in tonight."

You whore!!

And then another week goes by and I had tentative plans with a girl to go out on Saturday night and then the day comes and she tells me, "Oh I have to go to this lame birthday party with some coworkers but let's try to meet up later."

Slut stop playing!!

These weren't the first times I've heard such excuses but they were the first time I heard them as lies. And then I reminisced years back and realized that every girl I didn't have sex with has lied to me. And every girl I did have sex with has lied to me, regardless of how much they were into me, regardless if my game was super tight with them or not. Because here's the reality:

No matter how good you fuck her or how much you make her laugh or much she professes to "miss you" and "want to see" you, she will lie to you because you are not her best option every night of every week of every month of every year, just like you aren't hers.

She is lying to you unless one of the following two things comes out of her mouth:

1. "I don't feel like seeing you tonight."

2. "I have found something better than you tonight."

Because that's the truth. That's why we flake on girls and they flake on us. Welcome to a large world with an infinite number of options. This is why having multiple girls around is so important as it will be much harder to get stuck with your hand on a night you don't want to use it. Odds are that one of your sluts will be in the mood for a bang.

Since lying is a form of disrespect, respond by doing… nothing. Do not reply, do not indulge her lie. Do not wish her well, do not say "Okay sure maybe we can do something later." She has disrespected you and now must make the effort to regain your favor. If she likes you then she will, because no one flake will kill it entirely, but if she doesn't contact you again soon then the relationship is just about done. Any attempts on your part to chase her after an obvious lie will just weaken your hand further. She will start to see you as desperate.

You're probably thinking, "But Roosh if a girl lies to you and she is working other options shouldn't you do something to strengthen your hold on her and save it?"

This mindset comes from a model of scarcity, where you are hooked on the pussy and don't want to "lose" it. By not giving a shit or responding, you tell yourself that she just lost out big time. Any other conclusion is false. In my world, it's the girls who lose out when they decide not to spend time with me, even if in reality they got something better (impossible!). This thinking helps me get into the pants of the next girl, who recognizes my aloof, apathetic, and non-needy nature as something attractive and intriguing, and rewards me accordingly with yet another shallow but satisfying notch on my bedpost.

Go Down On Women And Get Oral Cancer

October 15, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Via the New York Times:

> Smoking and alcohol abuse are the major causes, but 25 percent of oral cancers appear in people who have never smoked or drunk to excess. The suspected cause of at least some of these cancers is human papillomavirus, or H.P.V., the same sexually transmitted virus that causes most cervical cancers, which can invade the mouth during oral sex. “Some are already hypothesizing that if kids are inoculated against H.P.V.,” Dr. Kahn said, “there will be a turnaround in the oral cancers caused by H.P.V., too.”

I think more research needs to be done in this area for the millions of men who, for whatever reason, go down on women voluntarily. They need to know if they’re putting their lives at risk by going out of their way to give a woman pleasure.

Luckily I have already been taking the proper precautions without even knowing it, and am pleased that not going down on girls will pay off with a potentially longer lifespan.

Flashback: A Case For Game

October 16, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Before I wrote Bang I put up a week of posts called "Tight Game Week," which had many concepts and ideas that eventually found it's way in the book. In Default Game I make a rational case for the use of game.

> Silences are deadly in the first 15 minutes of a pick-up. This is where you need two or three conversational threads, or routines, that you can pull out and use. You've memorized them, you know how a girl will react, and you know they will open up the conversation even further. If you've ever told a story more than once, you've used a routine. It is something that is reliable, effective, and refined.

For Bang I changed that "15 minutes" to 30.

Comments Are Coming Back Tomorrow

October 17, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's been six months since I've had comments on the blog. The main reason I took them off was because I felt that the signal to noise ratio was too low.

For the past month or so I allowed comments on my posts over in the forum. It hasn't been extremely active but there was some good discussion and only twice did things get somewhat a little out of hand, but even then it wasn't the hate-fest that regularly went on here (part of which I take blame for due to my sometimes passionate style of writing).

So I did some thinking and came up with a simple idea: have a clear rule that encourages good discussion. Here's what you'll see just above the comment button tomorrow:

> Criticism is fine, but be respectful. If you wouldn't read your comment outloud to its intended recipient in his or her home then don't post it. Comments that break this rule will be deleted. Thanks.

I came up with this when I remembered how very polite my blog haters were in real life when I met them, probably because it's very hard to hate on someone face-to-face who hasn't wronged you personally. Therefore if you wouldn't read your comment to me or whoever it's directed to in person, then a revision is in order.

I want to give it a trial run for a month or two. A part of me feels like not having comments enabled chokes off some good insights related to the topics I write about here, and I want to give it one more shot. Let's see how it goes.

Never Tell A Girl That You've Been In Love Before

October 18, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Remember the ending of Ghostbusters, where the woman demon Gozer asked the guys if they were a God?

> Gozer: Are you a God? [Ray looks at Peter, who nods.]
>
> Dr Ray Stantz: No.
>
> Gozer: Then… DIE!
>
> [They almost fall off the building.]
>
> Winston: Ray, when someone asks you if you're a god, you say "YES"!

Now say you're on a date and the conversation gets on relationships. Here's an important rule to keep in mind:

If a girl ever asks if you've been in love, say NO.

No exceptions. There are two reasons for this.

1. The little competitive creature inside her wants to be the first, popping your cherry, so to speak. You're officially a "challenge."

2. She wants to dig deeper to find out what's "wrong" with you, if you're a sociopath or just cold-hearted. During that process of discovery, she relaxes her guard and you can sink your tentacles deeper insider her, eventually including your big tentacle.

Not to mention that saying you've never been in love opens up a lot of interesting conversational threads. For example, if a girl asks my thoughts on why I haven't been in love, I simply reply, "I'm dark and disturbed. Some people aren't made for love. Other people are made for… cutting flesh." That line guarantees me at least a makeout.

I'm not sure now why I included the bit about Ghostbusters. Seemed fitting at the time.

The Truth About Medellin

October 19, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Time really flies when you stay in the same place and develop a routine. Six months in Colombia is done and gone as tomorrow I leave Medellin for Fortaleza, Brazil. From there begins a 1,700 mile journey back to Rio that I plan on tackling by bus (check the about page for map updates). I'm sure nothing bad at all will happen during that time.

Before leaving Medellin I wanted to do a sort of tribute video that shows how far the city has come from the Pablo Escobar days of the past. Using clips I've shot of the city over the past couple months, I've put together something poweful which I'm confident will increase Colombian tourism by a significant amount. In fact I'm expecting the Colombia Tourism Board to start sending me royalty checks or just hire me outright as a travel consultant.

The video has a subtle reference from A Dead Bat In Paraguay for those of you who read the book. Here it is...

Thank you Medellin, for making these past six months so wonderful.

“Men’s Rights” Has Become A Euphemism For “Sexual Loser”

October 20, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A random comment I made on the blog In Mala Fide has made the rounds a bit. It was in reference to the “Men’s Rights” blogs and forums that I notice popping up everywhere. Here’s the comment:

> I’m not against Men’s Rights, but a lot of these blogs are written by guys who have no game and can’t get laid, and serve as just an outlet for being a lifelong sexual loser. It’s like women who get around in their circles to complain about about how men aren’t sensitive or caring enough.
>
> These guys dedicate their time to complaining about feminists or marriage, yet they have zero experience with either! I suspect they are anti-social, bitter virgins who simply don’t have anything else to do with their bountiful free time, too fearful of putting their fragile ego on the line to be a man and actually get laid. They have draining corporate gigs and the only thing they have to look forward to are weekly visits to Chipotle Mexican Grill.
>
> In fact you will not go wrong in life by not listening to a man who can’t get laid. He can be very intelligent but his thoughts are not based on the “real world” where there are guys banging and traveling and starting businesses and having a good time with life. Thinking without doing is nothing but masturbation, something that I suspect these MR bloggers do a lot of.

Now I want you to brace yourself for what I’m about to tell you.

You braced?

A lot of guys in the Men’s Rights community do not believe that game works. Yeah I spit out my vitamin water on the monitor too.

Don’t believe me? Try wallowing through these threads:

Is the “PUA” approach to women valid?

Why the PUAs are winning

(This is a good opportunity to gripe about the misuse of the acronym PUA. It stands for pick-up artist, which is a man who uses the art of game to pick up women. If you say, “I don’t know if I believe in PUA,” you’re saying “I don’t know if I believe in pick-up artist.” That doesn’t make sense. Game is a philosophy (or lifestyle) that is mastered by guys who can be called pick-up artists or players or whatever. I prefer the player term, though it doesn’t seem to be popular among white males.)

Pretend you’re me for a second, and you’ve read comment after comment by guys who don’t believe in game, when you yourself have made a complete 180 because of it. What further proof can I offer than myself, a sexless wonder who started getting laid only after studying and practicing game?

Unfortunately no proof is enough for Men's Rights followers. I can film my pickups from start to end, using several lines that are word-for-word what you can find here or in Bang, film the resulting three-minute sex act and declarations of affection from the girl, and they'll still find some way to rationalize that I'm not using game at all. They'll say I'm a natural, when they don't understand I've been working on my game every week for going on nine years.

They'll say, "Roosh is naturally funny, or charming, or okay looking. I'm sure he would do well even without game." Wrong. I'm "funny" because I've practiced my jokes on hundreds of girls. I'm "charming" because I've measured the reactions of women to see what works and what doesn't, and kept only that which got the result I wanted. I'm "okay looking" because I work out, tried different styles, learned how to carry myself, and have rigorously experimented with different hair and beard configurations. I can tell you right now where a Jesus haircut would work well for me versus a hipster shag cut.

If you see me pick up today it does look very natural because I've integrated all these game component parts into something fluid that works a good percentage of the time, but there was absolutely nothing fluid about my initial attempts to overcome my inability to get laid.

I don't hide from you guys that I've been rejected a million times. Of course I still get rejected to this day, by girls who for some odd reason don't want to bang me. If you've read A Dead Bat In Paraguay you saw how bad it can get. But I'm very open to learning, and I continue to do so no matter how satisfied I've become with where I'm at. For example I used the lessons from those tough six months in South America to come to Colombia and do pretty well with the women. In fact I almost wish I had more troubles so that I would have a "problem" to base a sequel on. But there are none, and I know no one wants to read a memoir about a guy who is happy and getting what he wants.

Then the Men's Rights guys will say, "But he is SELLING books."

Yes because anyone who's passionate enough about a topic to spend months or years to compile their life experiences into works that teach others cannot be trusted. If someone has written a book or produced anything of value, do not listen to them! They're ruthless businessmen in disguise! I wouldn't even listen to someone who has a blog because they're obviously doing it for the fame of receiving many visitors or comments (and in the case of male bloggers, groupies). Or else they would simply maintain a diary that rests inside their nightstand. They blog mainly for their ego. Same for people who post on the same forums for years. They have an ulterior motive of wanting to feel special in knowing that other people respect their four-digit post count and are getting something out of their words.

In fact if you think about it, anyone who shares knowledge is suspect. Lately I only gain knowledge from homeless men who talk outloud to themselves because they're not doing it for money, fame, ego, attention or any type of satisfaction that comes from helping others. Approach anyone else's words with extreme hesitation.

Hyperbole aside, all men can learn and improve, whether it's in business, women, sports, or Chinese checkers. To think that getting laid is genetically determined and that you can't improve—what a horrible way to live! If I had to accept my lot I would probably be in some shitty job not getting laid and feeling miserable about how "unlucky" I am while complaining about how much women suck. I would be a Men's Rights follower. I would camp out on blogs and forums all day posting "intellectual" comments for other guys who are socially awkward because they are too scared to step away from the computer monitor for one minute and take some social risk by practicing conversation with attractive women.

But if you tell them, "Bro, you need to approach a girl and get some action," they'll say, "Stop using shaming language on me!" That's their comeback. It's like a little boy on the playground saying, "Don't make fun of me! I like eating my boogers!" For guys who supposedly love using logic, they are completely unable to properly defend their lack of action, and have insulated themselves in a protective internet bubble where they gang up on the slightest bit of dissent by saying it makes them feel ashamed. They can't get laid, they supposedly don't like women (especially Western women) and don't want to work to bang them, yet they whine and bitch about women all day long.

Now I've whined and bitched about women plenty on this blog, and I think it's especially fun to get on feminsts and American women, but at the end of the day I'm also banging feminists and American women, drinking with them, having a laugh with them, and cuddling with them until I get bored and need a break from their sense of entitlement and masculine attitudes. Variety is the spice of life and the reason you're reading me right now is because of the wide range of experiences I've had with many different types of women. While I wouldn't mind being a one-hit-wonder by wearing my plaid shirt every night and going to a hipster bar in D.C. to get laid with minimal effort, there wouldn't be much advice I can share for men of the world.

The bottom line is that a real man puts himself in new, challenging environments and pushes the limits of his ability and character to get what he truly desires. I greatly admire the 21-year-old who goes onto my forum and posts about a brutal rejection, but perserveres and weeks later shares a success story. I admire the three guys I met in Medellin who all rolled up with little Spanish but got their flags in less than two weeks after approaching like machines day and night. I admire the guy who I saw do his first ever bookstore approach and get a long-term girlfriend out of it. You think they give a shit about Men's Rights? No, because they use game to get laid with the women they want. They believe in action to accomplish their goals, not mental masturbation with a bunch of guys who have trouble telling you what a vagina feels like, yet can't stop obsessing over it.

There Should Be A Requirement For Getting Tattoos

October 22, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you want to get a tattoo you have answer yes to the following question:

Have you ever been into a fight as an adult?

Otherwise you should reconsider.

The popularity of tattoos is at the point where you see a lot of skinny, frail men getting them. Before I came to Colombia I remember witnessing the jarring sight of an emaciated man wearing a horizontal striped shirt with a rainbow colored sleeve tat (his sleeves were rolled up). My suspicion is that men like him are getting tats to appear tough.

“I’m not going to work on building my confidence, go to the gym, or even approach girls. I’m just going to get this here outrageous tat and graduate to being a bad ass right away! Where my groupies at!”

The only man I know who is qualified to have a tattoo is Virgle Kent, the most violent, ill-tempered man I know. Do you have a friend who considers getting a beer bottle smashed on his head the warm-up to a fight? Well I do (true story). He breaks heads up and down 18th Street with frightening regularity and that’s why he’s my buddy.

Today’s tattoo trend is reducing the value of his tattoos. The only way to rectify the problem is if guys like VK grab tatooed betas by the collar and demand they laser it off. He can pull a Fight Club and take their drivers license and say he’ll visit soon to check on them. Or he can use a piece of glass from the street to carve up their tat right then and there, leaving the wannabe tough guy in a pool of his own tears and blood.

In twenty years, when even your mom has a tattoo, I’m afraid it will not convey the bad ass qualities as before (for proof take a look at what happened to the mohawk). Instead, only those who know how to cave in faces will be seen as cool.

Flashback: Working For The Man

October 24, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When I had a job a couple years ago I was asked by my little cousins to give a speech at their career day:

> I talked to 3rd graders first and was very impressed with their zombie-like state. Even though they probably didn't care about what I was saying, they appeared to be paying close attention. They stared at the front of the class while remaining completely still. They obediently raised their hands when I asked for participation, and no one spoke unless I called on them. They read questions from a worksheet given out by the teacher.
>
> The environment was robbing them of creativity and spontaneous excitement. Whenever a kid got distracted and started doodling or going through things in his desk, the teacher interrupted me to snap at him. This happened even more in the 1st grade class because they were not fully "trained." I felt bad for them. They were being ordered around like soldiers.

I have overcome the brainwashing of public schooling and my mom's constant nagging to do what I'm doing today, which if you're reading this on Sunday afternoon is riding an eight-hour bus.

In the next post I share my tips for making it through a day at the office.

> Put your back to your cubicle entrance and practice falling asleep with one hand on the keyboard and the other on the mouse. (Make sure you have a work-related document open on the screen.) This is easy to do if you have a chair that has a high back. There are two things to watch out for: (1) Your screensaver may activate while you nap, and (2) Your hand may smash some keys, making people who pass by you wonder why you have a screen full of G's. When someone knocks on the frame of your cubicle entrance, waking you up, they will confuse your tired haze with deep and creative thought.

I respect people who are doing what they can to make a living, but that office shit was unbearable to me.

18 Reasons Why You Don’t Get Laid

October 25, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. You don’t know how to tell a story in a way that gets a girl’s imagination going.

You don’t know how to share interesting experiences that not only make her wish she was there with you but also make her want to be with you in future stories as well.

2. You’re too needy.

You contact a girl much more than she contacts you. You freak out if she doesn’t call back right away. You worry when there is nothing to worry about.

3. You don’t know how to build attraction.

You don’t know what a girl’s buttons are. You don’t know how to talk to her in a way that makes her more interested in you as time goes on.

4. You haven’t optimized your look.

Have you taken the time with different hair and beard configurations, or do you still look the same as five years ago, wearing that same shirt with the stain on the sleeve? You don’t need model good-looks to have sex with pretty girls.

5. You don’t drink.

Alcohol is a magical drug that makes getting laid significantly easier, and I’m not talking about getting girls drunk. Just one drink increases the chance you will get laid about 20%. Three drinks in her system is all you need.

6. You don’t work out.

You’re a fright to look at naked. You don’t have to be a meathead, but if you feel good about your body then you’ll feel good about yourself, and this comes across in a positive attitude with girls you talk to.

7. You’re a pussy.

You don’t want to get rejected. You don’t understand that guys who get the most women also get rejected the most.

8. You don’t know how to make a girl laugh.

I like to think that a childhood of watching Simpsons and Seinfeld is all you need to be funny, but there are humor how-to books you can learn from as well.

9. You have an extreme deformity that hopefully can be fixed with either hard work (obesity) or surgery (gigantic nose).

Modern science has come a long way.

10. You don’t have confidence.

You don’t like the man you see in the mirror. You don’t believe that you were meant to sleep with lots of girls. You’ve given up and sloth around playing video games or poker, praying and hoping that maybe one day you’ll get lucky instead of doing the work necessary to be an interesting, confident man that girls like.

11. You limit your prospect pool by only going after girls at work or in your meager social circle.

You think the only way to get a girl is to have some sort of prior introduction. You've never tried walking up to her cold in a bar, coffee shop, or bookstore.

12. You believe you need to be friends with a girl first.

You think that a girl has to see you as a buddy before she can see you as a lover. Unfortunately there is no animal lust in friendship. By being friends first, you almost guarantee that that's all you'll ever be.

13. You do dinner dates.

They greatly decrease your chances of getting action. Not only does all that food impede the absorption of the wine (see number five), but you're sitting far away from her, unable to touch. Do drink dates instead where you can sit right next to her as that alcohol takes hold.

14. You're not persistent.

You give up way too easily. You don't understand that you may need to get rejected a few dozen times before you come across a girl that likes you. Maybe more. Second to not even trying, giving up too early is the most common mistake guys make.

15. Your breath reeks.

It doesn't matter how fun or good-looking you are, but if your breath smells then you're not getting anything.

16. You have limited life experiences.

It's hard to hold a conversation with a women if all you know about is sports. You can fake it a bit if you're a voracious reader, but the best way to talk about interesting things is to do interesting things. Chances are that doesn't involve a computer or television.

17. You're cheap.

You need to pay to play. This means keeping up a presentable appearance and going to places where the women are. Even the cheapest drinks at happy hour bars are going to cost you money, and many of those dates will not result in sex. Unless you're in Thailand paying $10 a bang you're going to have to get used to the idea that it costs money to get laid. Just don't confuse this with showing off your money to women. If you're interesting and make a girl laugh, she won't care you're poor in order to have sex with you, though she may not see you as long-term potential.

18. You're not cool.

Do other people not want to hang out with you? Do they dislike your company? Do people make fun of you behind your back? Do you have trouble maintaining friendships? Do you look or dress like an idiot? While the definition of being cool depends on where you live, it does involve a degree of fitting into society, as the girls you will be trying to bang live in said society as well. If you're going to be uncool, then you will have to hang in places where uncool girls are and try to get with them (e.g. goth bar).

If you liked this post then check out 7 Things You Can Do To Improve His Game.

Idiot Model Gets Taught An Important Lesson

October 27, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I like teaching women lessons because I want to make the world a better place for men everywhere. If you got bitched by a girl but didn't bitch her back then you've fucked over another man. Now he is going to have to deal with that same shit in the future since you didn't take care of it.

Cockblocking is a good example. There are guys who don't do anything when they get disrespected by the rude girlfriends, only ensuring that the behavior continues. Because of how I've handled these situations, I'm confident that I've stopped many cockblocks for guys in D.C. who I don't even know.

Along this theme I want to commend Joe Francis, the owner of Girls Gone Wild, for teaching a lesson that has changed the life of a girl who made a grave mistake. If you aren't already familiar with Joe Francis he's known for being a dick. Check out this article from a couple years back.

> Francis told the cameraman to leave and pushed her back on the bed, undid his jeans and climbed on top of her. "I told him it hurt, and he kept doing it. And I keep telling him it hurts. I said, 'No' twice in the beginning, and during I started saying, 'Oh, my god, it hurts.' I kept telling him it hurt, but he kept going, and he said he was sorry but kissed me so I wouldn't keep talking."

Rape or just proper bedroom technique? Scientific surveys says that 90% of rape accusations are fake, used by women to get attention or to annul slutty behavior. You should be even more skeptical of rape claims against a notorious celebrity.

Actually has a male celebrity ever been successfully charged with rape? With fame-obsessed women throwing their vaginas on them the last thing they need to do is coerce themselves on a groupie. For example if I ever get accused of rape then you know it's bullshit.

Alright back to the lesson. Joe Francis was at a club recently talking to a random girl. That girl's friend was model Jayde Nicole, who for whatever reason didn't like what Joe said or did. Later while he was walking through the club alone, Jayde poured a shot on Joe's shoulder. He then turned around, grabbed a fistful of her hair, and pulled as hard as he could, dragging her on the floor. Click here to watch the video of this incident.

And here's a picture of the model:

Let’s do a little blow-by-blow:

0:07: Joe is walking through the club. Jayde sees him and outstretches her arm to get ready for the pour.

0:11: The shot is dumped on Joe’s shoulder.

0:13: Stunned, Joe looks around to see who grievously insulted him while Jayde retreats back to the bar trying to play off her involvement.

0:15: With a face full of fury, Joe grabs Jayde’s hair and pulls with all his might.

0:19: Joe gets jumped by men trying to defend the attacker’s honor.

0:30: Jayde stands stunned by the bar and needs to be consoled by friends. I have a feeling she didn’t expect his reaction.

1:02: Jayde is boo-hoo-hooing uncontrollably at the bar. Her friends are stroking her now-mangled coif.

Here’s what I think of the situation:

Bitch deserved it..

You can argue whether or not the punishment fit the crime, but as he did no permanent damage to her I think his response was more reasonable than not. It’s not like he pulled a Mark Wahlberg and blinded a man in an unprovoked racist attack.

If you don’t agree then I’m afraid you’re still drinking the feminist koolaid that teaches men that it’s always “wrong to hit a women.” Well it’s not always wrong to hit a woman. As a man who’s been pushed to the edge, I’m stunned at how deft women are at inciting violence, even when you’re warned them repeatedly to simmer down. I believe some women want you to hit them because they want to see you care, especially if you have an aloof, hard-to-read nature.

Do think Jayde would have attacked a man like that in a Middle Eastern country? Hell no because she knows she’d be murdered. I’m definitely not saying that’s what we need, but our culture has taught women that they can disrespect men without repercussion, and has taught men to accept that disrespect like little punks. Well there are men who haven’t bought that view and are making the world a better place by teaching women like Jayde that you can’t go around attacking men. I guarantee you she will never pour a shot on a man again in her life.

You Can Only Hit Your True Potential By Getting Rejected

October 28, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Today's Bang excerpt comes early on page 12:

> The second reason I'm a fan of rejection is because it maximizes your results. The most uncomfortable rejection I can think of is the head-turn when you go in for a kiss. This usually leads to a very awkward moment, more so than when a girl blows you off during an approach. But now I believe the head-turn isn't a bad rejection because it means you are not wasting kisses. If you never got rejected trying to kiss a girl, it means there are several girls you could have kissed but didn't, only because you didn't try. Rejection tells you that you are pushing to get all that you can. A man who doesn't get rejected is one that is not reaching his true potential.

In 2002 I was introduced to this hot-as-balls girl from California, a "part-time model" who visited D.C. for only a couple weeks. I remember at the time I had a leather-bound journal which contained random drawings I made, some of them not half bad. I often carried it around with me to bars as a prop to pickup women. It was a good conversational piece for a guy who at the time didn't have a lot to talk about besides Starcraft and microbiology.

The California girl was digging me and in the club we sat on a couch talking and touching. I was a little giddy that this game business was "working" on her (I was using borrowed routines from "Mystery's Lounge," long since closed) and decided to try out a line that some guy there said is gold when it comes to getting the kiss.

At the height of our sexual tension, instead of just going for it like I would today with the help of proximity cues, I said, "I want to whisper something to your lips." She laughed hard in my face and didn't stop for at least a full minute. I was bummed to say the least.

She stuck around though and we flirted some more, but I didn't get the kiss.

Two days later the phone rings, and it's her! She was going back to the California the next day and invited me to her aunt's house somewhere in bumfuck Virginia. I sprayed on some Drakkar Noir, put on my going-out jeans, and headed over to her house, getting lost along the way and having to consult some maps in a 7-11.

I made it to her house and got to meet her aunt, who was a nice woman, and the girl and I watched some TV and talked. She had a cold though and didn't want to grab a drink, but before she left I decided that I was going to try again anyway, since I didn't have anything to lose. At the door of the house I went for the kiss, and she rejected me again. She gave me a hug though and we kept in touch for a couple months until things faded away.

At the time I didn't know when a girl was "ready" to be kissed, so I just tried every single time as long as the girl didn't mind my company. That year every girl who wanted to kiss me got kissed by me because I tried on all of them. I didn't waste any kisses because I erased all preconceptions about when a girl wanted me to kiss her or not.

But now I'm experienced and what not and know when a girl is ready, so I don't bother when a girl doesn't want it, right?

Wrong!

Even when I know from vast personal experience that the girl doesn't want to kiss me, I try anyway, especially on the first date. I know that by the end of the first date if I don't get a kiss, I probably won't bang her, so I go for it all the time. Sometimes I go in thinking, "Oh boy this isn't going to work," and sure enough it doesn't. But I'm fine with that and because every girl who wants to get kissed by me will get kissed.

My kissing potential is at 100%, and who knows how many additional girls I've banged because I pushed when I wouldn't otherwise from reading the "signs." I'm pretty good at knowing the signs but I ignore them, or else I'd be playing it safe and cautious, something a man with burning desire rarely does. Get rejected as much as you can, in approaches and during closes, to achieve the most of what your current skill level can give you. If I'm not getting rejected, I know there's girls I could be messing around with but am not. Plus I'm always surprised at girls I got intimate with that I thought wouldn't be down for anything.

In Bang I talk more about getting over shyness and fear when it comes to doing approaches before sharing openers I recommend you use. Here's an excerpt from an in-depth review of Bang in The Spearhead (by Ferdinand Bardamu's):

> As a general rule, 90 to 95 percent of the pickup artist literature available today is garbage. Most of these clowns are snake oil salesmen hocking overpriced e-books and DVD box sets containing info you can just as easily find online for free. There are, however, a select few books on game that are worth buying, and Bang, Roosh's entry into this expanding field, is one of them. If The Mystery Method is the Bible of seduction literature, Bang is the Paradise Lost, and is a title that anyone interested in improving their success with women should buy, post-haste.
>
> …
>
> Merely from the standpoint of diction, Roosh's book is miles ahead of its competitors. Anyone acquainted with the seduction community knows that it's a swirling cauldron of nerdiness and weirdness, with its own vocabulary of "HB10s," "IOIs", and "neg hits." Hell, the obnoxiously pretentious term "pickup artist" was invented so these geeks could pretend to set themselves apart from the rest of us grinders. In contrast, Roosh writes like a normal human being instead of a social retard. You won't have to worry about coming across an undefined three-letter acronym every other page, necessitating a trip to the glossary and taking you out of the moment. He even refers to men who sleep with a lot of girls by the normal term: "player." Solely in this regard, Bang is a > much better read than almost all of the seduction literature on the market.

>
> But if style is queen, then content is king, and Bang more then delivers in this regard. Roosh's major innovation is the use of unscripted material in his game alongside standard canned material. For example, he introduces the concept of the "environmental opener," which is a way of opening a girl with a line based on what's happening in the surrounding environment. Additionally, he also writes on "conversational threads" as a way to hold a conversation with a girl that is both natural and holds her interest. The book is also rich with examples that allow you to contextualize the lessons. Given that scripted lines eventually become played out as dudes use them on chicks over and over, the ability to incorporate unscripted material into your game is a necessity if you want to stay on the circuit. If you're having trouble in this department, you'd do well to pick up Bang for that reason alone.

Click here to learn more about ordering your copy of Bang.

How Important Is The Attractiveness Of Your Wingman?

October 29, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When it comes to your pick-up success, should you go out with a guy better looking than you or worser looking? From the feedback I get, many guys want to go out with guys who are worser looking, but that's probably not in their best interests.

The initial response you get from a girl is partly (some will say mostly) dependent on your looks. If you are a great-looking guy then you will get a more positive, warm response than guys who aren't as good looking. It's the nature of the game that better looking guys don't have to work as hard.

Say you're at a bar and standing with your good-looking wingman. Girls constantly check out the scene and will discreetly notice both you and your friend. If you approach a group, they will be slightly warmer to you because they know that your hot friend will eventually join the conversation. His attractiveness "rubs off" on you to give you better responses. If you're wingman is unsightly they may respond more tepidly in the hopes that you don't bring him over.

The rule that all wingmen should have is that the guy who does the approach has dibs on the hottest girl in the group. If you do the approach and your studly friend comes to join, you still get a chance at the hot one. Assuming your game is tight there's a good chance you'll still get her. I've pulled the hotter girl in a group many times when I was hanging out with a better-looking friend. I mention this because if you view your wingman as potential competition then you're limiting not only your results but how hard you improve your own game.

The Ghost Technique

October 31, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm all about game innovation so I'm more than eager to share new tactics we can use. I got an email from a guy who is using what I call the Ghost Technique, and it offers a good mix of aloofness and scarcity to get the bang and then some. Here's his report:

> Hey I'm Ed I would like to share a little story of how I got out of the just friends zone. I met this chick at a pool hall. Let's just say her name is Meg. It turned out she was the sister of my brother's girlfriend. So it was easy to get a conversation going. The problem was Meg's boy friend owned the pool hall. I figured I would leaf it alone, but as they say forbidden fruit taste sweeter. I ended up going to her house and we talked all night. I did the gay thing. But I brushed her hair and rubbed her back even baked cookies I got myself as far into the friend zone as I could get.
>
> So then I disappeared for three months, left town went to Washington dc had fun there. In the meantime back home my brother told the sisters that I got into a crazy car crash and died. Note this was not my idea. Well after three months in dc I return home. The sisters came to my house to pickup my brother, that's when he told me that the girls think I'm dead. After a WTF moment I figured I would use this to my advantage. I had a little fun walking out of the woods as a ghost. They where so glad to see that I was alive, that in less than a week I slept with both the sisters and even the mother.

I've instructed my surrogates back home to inform everyone of my untimely yet thrilling death in a jet ski accident. This may be the biggest technological advance I've seen in game since the use of glow sticks in trance clubs.

Rationalizing Today's Mistakes Will Cause Tomorrow's Problems

November 1, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The other week I watched America's Next Top Model (I was being held hostage by the FARC and forced to watch). It was the first episode of the season and for one part of the show all thirteen or so girls had to get up at 6AM for their first photoshoot.

The morning came and the camera showed them all piled up in a van, ready to go. Then the girl who the night before volunteered to wake everyone up realized that someone was missing. She paused for half a second, said "Ah well" and jumped in the van, even though the missing girl offered her crucial wardrobe help before. The backstabber said, "Even though she helped me earlier, she needs to take responsibility. I'm not her mom."

Let's assume this was real and not staged, for we all know that women are capable of such an act.

Now imagine if guys operated like that. "Hey bro I know you had a job interview today and I promised to wake you up but I'm not your dad so whatever." Our culture pushes women as the more caring and sensitive of the human genders but not counting mass killings they do the evilest shit known to man, causing far more emotional damage than men ever could. The only way I know of seriously hurting a girl is by dumping her and fucking her mom raw dog, but women are more far more imaginative when it comes to backstabbery and all-around general wickedness.

But that's not the point of this post. The point is the rationalization offered by the backstabber. Consider this old quote: "Humans are not rational beings, they're rationalizing beings."

Rationalization deflects blame when you make a decision, not only preventing you from learning from your mistakes but also turning you into a delusional person. You drift away from living in reality where you can see things as they really are to make correct decisions in the future. It's a slope where not owning up to bad decisions causes future bad decisions. You don't learn, and you don't grow.

I'm always evaluating the decisions I've made in life, and there are many that I look back and think, "Hah, I really fucked up there." I think about having made the correct choice and can easily imagine how the outcome would have worked out better for me. I can't change the past and I'm not going to cry about it, but the thing about life it that it presents you with similar decicions and choices that while different, can be better approached with prior lessons learned. When you stop rationalizating, and admit you are often wrong, you make better decisions in the future that will make your life easier and hopefully more fulfilling.

The model in the opening example will continue to fuck over people, always finding some retarded rationalization, all while creating a pile of enemies that I guarantee you will get her back hard in the future. It's a sort of karma that really isn't karma, that exists in the physical world and easily controllable when you approach your past actions without ego or emotion. In the end when you rationalize, you only cheat yourself.

Travel Is No Excuse To Look Like Shit

November 2, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have little respect for English-speaking gringas. They go everywhere in braided bracelets, unwashed hair, loose-fitting drab clothes, and ugly sandals or flip-flops. I've trained many Colombian girls that the only way to definitely conclude if a girl is a gringa or not is by her cheap footwear.

Girls from Colombia (or Argentina or Brazil—take your pick) never wear flip flops to the bar unless they're on a beach because they have respect for themselves, whether or not they're on the hunt for a guy. Your relationship status should not be a determinant to how you present yourself to the world. In other words if you look like shit on purpose then you are shit.

I've met quite a few gringo guys in Colombia who came more or less for sexual adventures. Each one has put in more effort into their apperance than the average gringa. They bring button-down shirts, nice shoes that you can't run in, and in some cases tasteful jewelry accessories. Hell even I travel with two button-down shirts.

If the men are putting in more effort than than the women in looking good, you know the Western culture has really done a fucked-up number on society. The sad part is that even with the gringas looking like they just walked out of a handicraft market, there are still a long line of guys that hit on them. This ensures that nothing will change. Female laziness combined with male desperation will doom us all.

How To Pick Up Argentine Girls (From An Argentine Guy)

November 4, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Comment from the other day:

> You talk about how hard Argentina is but for me it was the biggest pick-up cakewalk I have ever had. The only one I have ever had. The women chased me aggressively.

The reason? Because he "groomed" himself. Yes, dude banged Argentine models because he shaved and put on a nice t-shirt. I called the troll out to lay out his strategy, a story, pictures, or anything that gives his boast some credibility, but of course "he" hasn't posted since. I use quotes because lately I'm noticing women trolling as men on my blog and others. "The women chased my aggressively" sounds like something a girl would say. (Here's another example of a girl trolling as a guy and my reasoning why).

There were also some other misguided comments about "looking good." All things being equal, looking sharper may help you get laid depending on the type of girl you're going for, but telling a guy to cut his hair in order to bang Argentine girls left and right tells me either you don't have game or haven't been to Argentina. In fact for some type of girls, looking sharp will hurt you (hipsters, artsy chicks, midgets, etc.)

Finally an Argentine guy rolls by and tells everyone to sit down and shut up. Here's some required reading for anyone going to Argentina:

> About middle class Argentine girls from an Argentine guy:
>
> 1. Our girls drink very little.
>
> 2. Our guys are really forward, confident and insistent. A-hole game or direct game will not set you apart, you will just blend in. Last minute resistance is actually Last few days resistance and we are trained to deal with that.
>
> The girls need to rationalize a story for you. You want to be: the guy I met at yoga classes, or the guy who works with my friend, the guy who's friends with X's boyfriend or the guy who plays rugby at the club where I play field hockey. Being the random guy I met at a bar is usually not enough. If you are a foreigner, you need a story that will make you be around for a longer period of time (I'm leaving tomorrow will usually backfire and usually so will I'm leaving next week). Girls will make out with guy they met at a bar, but this guy needs to create his story to take it further.
>
> Since most guys will lie, deceive and twist facts when talking to women (btw, "having game" is translated as "tener parla"), girls need to screen the guys.
>
> In terms of tactics:
>
> 1. Roll in a group for optimum results. If it is a beach town in the summer, you > want to be with the guys who have the motorcycles, jetskis, quads or who are into kite-surfing or beach volleyball. You also want to host house parties or be regulars at a club as part of a big mixed group.

>
> 2. The girl you may get will have seen you before. Your groups will join at one point, and that will provide the setting for her to lower her defenses. Because of this tactic, you need to have different groups of girls around, with a few potential targets in each group for each guy.
>
> 3. Pickups take time, same night action is rare. As an example, if I'm traveling to Argentina for only a week, I know I won't be getting much action. The 3-date structure is quite prevalent: you meet a girl at your friend's birthday party (on a Saturday) and get her phone. You take her out for drinks or dinner the following Wednesday and make out. You catch up with her on Saturday as part of a mixed group. You pick her up and drive her each time so you'll have the logistical upper hand. Come Saturday, she should put out. But all this relies on me meeting the girl on my first couple of days in town.
>
> Conclusion: the rules of game apply in Argentina, but pickups take much longer (days vs hours). To have multiple girls, you need to be creating your story with multiple girls along time. If you give up on each pickup the same day, your numbers will suffer. You need a big backlog of potential girls to keep your numbers up. A successful crew will have different groups of girls around them. They may throw a party and have them all around (along with other guy crews) or will juggle the groups for smaller outings. The girls will also have different crews to hang out. To differentiate yourself, you need to be part of the most interesting crew. If you don't have a crew, you need to be a regular at a specific club or bar. Meet a few girls one day, maybe make out with one and have follow up dates or just meet them again next time they go to that club. The 2nd time around, you are no longer a stranger.

Everything he says 100% confirms what I know about Argentine girls. As for the guys who say that Argentine girls are easy to pick up, ask them two questions:

1. How many did you bang?
2. Pics?

You'll find they either got lucky with one girl or banged a couple that you personally wouldn't. Not every Argentine girl is beautiful. Believe me that if a gringo banged a hot Argentine girl he has a dozen pictures of her on his computer.

Single Women Who Purposefully Have Children Are Commiting Crimes Against Humanity

November 8, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

These women are bringing a child into the world (because god knows we need more) with the knowledge that he or she will be more fucked up than the general population. Studies show that raising a child alone is the worst thing you can do to a human being, especially if that human is male. Is the woman going to teach her son how to stand up for himself? Is she going to teach him how to be attractive to women and then bang lots of them, like his genetics dictate? Is she going to give him the self-confidence to carve his own path in life? Is she going to teach him how to beat someone in the face? No, no, no, and no.

My parents divorced when I was 8, and for the next twelve years or so I visited my dad two nights a week. So when I got out of college, I was only 30% man. With much time, determination, and sex with different women, I have been able to become 99% man (yeah, I like myself a good snuggle from time to time), but it would have been a hell of a lot easier if I had a constant male influence in my life. Unfortunately many guys have been raised by their fathers but they might as well be fatherless—their dads didn't teach them shit, sometimes because they didn't quite know how to be a man themselves. This has happened because Western society has not demanded that men act like men.

I got to see a sad example of single motherdom in Pipa, Brazil, a small beach town in the Northern coast. There was an Italian mother and her 8-year-old boy traveling with the grandmother and aunt. Three women, zero men. They put a long rainbow-colored tassel in his almost shoulder-length hair and a piece of woven jewelry around his tiny ankle. They indulged his every whine without teaching him things like sports, play fighting, and smashing objects. He copied their feminine ways of speaking and the poolside sight of my hairy body nearly scared him to death—he literally trembled with fear like someone had dropped him into the lion sanctuary at the zoo. I'm absolutely certain this adorable little boy will be a huge fag when he gets older. Now how is that not child abuse?

While there's nothing wrong with being gay (except the doing it in each other's butts part), you must accept that homosexuality is on the deviant side of nature. The Italian mother was actually married when she had the future sausage jockey, but many Western women who have failed in love will be having kids using sperm donors. These self-absorbed women do not care that they are destroying a human life as long as they can attempt to relieve the immense emptiness in their lives, caused by chasing that cheddar in the corporate office instead of pleasing a real man who could fertilize her BPA-tainted eggs with a child. Thanks to their actions, society will be filled with a billion gays who wear tassels in their hair. And guys like myself will have the burden of having a lot of sex with the remaining women who are still wired to want a man who treats them like shit.

I guess this is all working out quite well for me then.

Don’t Go To South American Clubs With High Cover Charges

November 9, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I noticed that rich girls in South American clubs are harsher than rich girls in American clubs. One time I was in a “posh” Brazilian club with a cover band singing English songs, said something casual in English to some cute girls near by, and got flat-out dissed, even though they were singing along to the song. The bitchiness level of some well-to-do Colombian and Brazilian girls can be very surprising. I think part of it is that rich people in poor countries have a chip on their shoulder and want to prove they’re as big and bad as someone from the U.S. or Europe. They resent that they live in a developing country that many people still label “third-world.”

Easy solution: Do not step inside a club that has more than a $5 US cover. I’m rolling into clubs with $20 covers and wondering why I’m having challenging nights, but then I go into a casual bar and do great off the bat. The more expensive the South American club, the worser I do. If you balk at the cover charge then imagine what the average Brazilian or Colombian or whomever thinks about it. The only problem is that it’s tough finding those fun local bars, as guidebooks and internet sites usually spit out the expensive venues.

I think lower middle class bars and clubs are a good compromise between quality and easiness. It’s true those rich clubs have the hottest girls, but if you’re just passing by the city odds are that won’t be the source of a bang, especially without some sort of introduction or “in” to get the ball rolling. The girls there don’t give a shit you’re a gringo. Of course they’re always exceptions, but the one place your exotic gringo status is neutralized is a place where rich assholes hang out at. If the ratio of drunk guys wielding champagne bottles to hot girls exceeds 0.5, buckle down for a long night. And if you see someone with an iPhone, leave immediately.

Postscript: A Brazilian has informed me that a new iPhone costs around $1,200 in Brazil, based on today’s exchange rate.

Thoughts On The Balance Beween Caring For A Girl and Being Completely Apathetic

November 10, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

As much as I hate to admit it, my happiness is still tied to the responses I get from women. I have been unable to achieve a complete Buddhist-like state when it comes to game, and my states remain affected by them.

If I approach a cute new girl and get her number, say in a tough day-time approach, I am pleased and pat myself on the back, thinking of my little success for the next couple hours. If I then fuck her, I'm in positive spirits for at least a day. If a new girl I thought was a lock flakes on me at some point in the seduction I get annoyed and experience a bad or neutral mood for hours. If I don't get the bang when I've done everything in my power to do so, I'm frustrated.

It's happened where a girl didn't reply to my phone call, and I scratch my hand wondering why, only for her to finally respond and my mood to immediately lift. I want to get away from this completely, of reacting emotionally to responses a woman gives me, but I know that's asking myself to remove a part that makes me human. While I worry less about outcomes with specific women than the average man, there is obviously a part of me that cares, mostly for my own success and sense of accomplishment.

Garden-variety apathy is a common attribute of those men who rack up lots of bangs, but I want complete robot-like apathy when it comes to the initial stages of pick-up because I know that emotions such as the ones I experience only hinder my maximum potential. The time I'm feeling down will lead to missed opportunities because I won't be "in the mood." The times I'm feeling up does the same because of the "I just got laid—I don't need to try" mindset, also called Golden Cock Syndrome.

There is a negative to robot-like apathy, because to not care is to lack desire. Unfortunately at zero desire you'll be prevented from playing the game at all and attemping anything, as you can reason that women are not needed for your existence in the first place. This is a tough point to reconcile, and it's entirely possible that my current mindset, of caring a little, is actually most optimal.

Giving Up On The Game After Six Months

November 11, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

At risk of giving the Men's Rights virgins some ammunition, here's an email I received the other day, edited to remove any personal information:

> I lived in Brazil most of my life, read The Game 6 months ago, and since then I have consumed lots of material about pick up. I noticed some solid improvement, both dealing with women and in my social life in general, but after reading your last post I found out that my goal is impossible to achieve.
>
> I thought that by improving my game, I would be able to overcome the insane level of bitchiness of hot Brazilian girls on expensive clubs, which, as you said on your post, are the hottest here. But your post made me believe that pick up knowledge available does not have hot/rich Brazilian girls in mind. I know from personal experience (from before and after reading any material) that the same principles apply, but I am no longer confident that what is available is enough for Brazilian expensive clubs.
>
> [In the United States], I was amazed by how approachable American girls were, and in average they were hotter too! I could at least get a phone number from a reasonably good looking girl every night. I felt like fishing in barrel, compared to my life in Brazil.
>
> Anyway, I think I will officially retire from my pick up studies. I make very good living, and have good social skills. I am not very good looking (a 6 or 7 I'd say), but I have been on a long term relationship with a solid 9-10. She's a very nice girl, I just thought that it was bad timing, and that I had more of life to experience. I thought that studying pick up would have made a more mature man, helping dealing with anxiety, and evolve my social skills as a whole. I thought to myself: "when I am confident enough so that I feel am able to pick up any girl I want — yes, those on those clubs –, I will have experienced my feelings and will be mature enough to settle down". Anyway, I no longer believe that that goal is achievable.

My reply:

> So you've been studying game for six months, have not banged a silly hot Brazilian girl, and deem it "impossible" even after you've seen improvements? Do you know how ridiculous this sounds? You're writing this to a man who went to South America and was basically dying slowly but still went out there and chased hard until he [DBIP spoiler]. I'm sorry I can't respect this email at all because it screams quitter. If I was also a quitter then we can whine together about how hard life is and how hard it is to bang pretty girls but no, because I don't give up.

> Your solution is to man up, stop whining, and go do 200 approaches in the three months.

A noteworthy part of his email:

> I thought that studying pick up would have made a more mature man

In six months he expected to be a completely new man! Come on people: real, lasting change takes time. You can go out there with new lines or techniques and get laid in the next month, but changing who you are is a gradual process that you won't notice until way into the future when you accomplish some difficult task or goal using some seemingly inconsequential thing you learned from a prior experience. It won't be obvious.

I was reading the blog of this girl who traveled through South America. The post from when she returned home said something along the lines of, "I'm so disappointed that I'm back and feel like exactly the same person." Unfortunately people want to go out and do this big experience and feel an immediate payoff to justify it, a result of the Western culture sickness where everything is cost-benefit analyzed to death. But of course that's not how life works. The cumulation of many experiences will gradually change you, but nothing where you can draw a line from point A to B and say, "Yes climbing the Inca Trail has helped me… get this raise at work!"

Lastly, you can't go wrong if you do things you enjoy that keep you engaged in life. I sought out the game because it's what I wanted, not because I saw a bestselling book at Barnes & Noble that was targeted to my age and gender. If your heart isn't into something and you merely follow popular trends, you'll quit before accomplishing anything meaningful.

My Latest Big Project

November 15, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

"So Roosh, what have you been doing since you finished A Dead Bat In Paraguay?"

I'm glad you asked.

I have completely overhauled all my game tips newsletters. I gave them a new look, edited for clarity and typos, removed fluff, and added new moves and techniques. That may not sound like a big job but all my newsletters combined clock in at 47,000 words, only 13,000 words shy of Bang.

If you're already subscribed you've probably already seen the new design. Something new is that for each edition I throw in a different quote I like.

Here's a sampling of the emails you'll receive if you sign up:

- How to handle flakey girls
- How to pick up girls in coffee shops
- The one thing that makes girls see you as more confident
- An easy way to isolate a girl in a bar
- When is the best time to approach a girl?
- How to pick up girls on the street
- The reason why she isn't calling you back
- Simple move to defeat bedroom resistance

There are over 30 more editions with tips on day game, night game, approaching, venue selection, conversation tips, dating strategy, and sealing the deal. My newsletters are basically a free book on game that you get in snippets at regular intervals. I don't share your email address with anyone and you can unsubscribe at any time. Sign up on the forum below…

If you can't see the sign-up form above then you're probably running some type of adblocker. Simply send a blank email to roosh-game-tips@aweber.com to sign up.

My Dune Buggy Adventure In Pipa, Brazil

November 17, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Pipa is a resort beach town in between Natal and João Pessoa, up in the north of Brazil near it's shark-infested most eastern point. I planned to stay for only two nights but got sucked in because of the nice beaches, laid-back nightlife, and relatively cheap accommodations.

Before Pipa I was in Natal, a generic but safe city built around huge sand dunes. There I paid $35 to take a tour of some northern beaches in a dune buggy along with two other Italian tourists. During the tour we stopped every 15 minutes at some tourist station (it's a trap!) where we had the opportunity to overpay for food and souvenirs with dozens of other tourists, mostly Brazilians vacationing inside their country.

The most irritating stop was in the middle of an enormous dune that offered impressive views of sand and ocean. Even though it was an inhabitable piece of land, there were three guys waiting right there on top of the sand mountain. One was selling snacks and the other two were selling photo-ops with their exotic animals, a bright green iguana and some sort of marsupial from the Congo. Tourists from buggies already parked paid a buck or two to have the poor creatures placed on their necks while photos were taken, screeching at the animals' movements on their bodies.

I had a feeling the dune buggy drivers were getting commissions for stopping at every single tourist trap. This was later confirmed at lunch time when we were taken to a restaurant in a ghost town and asked to pay $20 for an all-you-can-eat buffet without any other options nearby. Turns out the drivers eat for free if they bring tourists to the restaurant, an ingenious business ploy by the owner.

I was unsatisfied with the tour. The fun seemed to be driving the buggy instead of riding in the passenger seat, so a week later in Pipa I jumped at the chance to rent one. It was a bit expensive at $110 for the day, but for several days prior I ate cheese and bread sandwiches for dinner, drank cheap Skol beer instead of caipirinhas with Sagatiba, and sold my body on the street, all to cushion the blow to my budget.

The hog (click this photo and others for bigger size)

My biggest fear was getting lost. The map from the agency was like one you'd get when entering an amusement part—definitely not drawn to scale. But turns out I didn’t even need the map. In my buggy I followed the water and it took me down well-worn paths of buggies before me, alternating between sand, rock, and dirt. I was getting the hang of driving the beast and ready to tackle more challenging terrain to see what it was made of.

Birds feasting on a dead hippo

I passed a kitesurfing area and flew down the beach going what I guess to be about 40 mph. There was not a soul around and I enjoyed the isolation from tourists, vendors, and crippled 10-year-olds begging me for money. But then the beach got narrower until finally I was wedged between rock and ocean with a shallow pool of water about eight inches high blocking my path. I had a feeling I could blow through it but high tide seemed to be rolling in and I didn't want to take a chance.

I backtracked a couple miles and found what seemed to be an alternate sand road going up a steep hill. The sand was thick and unruly so I backed up a good ways to get a running start. I slammed on the gas and flew up the path for the first thirty or so yards, but the buggy abruptly came to a stop with the engine still screaming. I tried to reverse but it wouldn't move. For five minutes I sat there going forward, backward, forward, backward, forward, backward. I stepped out of the buggy and noticed that I dug the rear tires a third way into the sand, with the muffler literally resting on top of it. I was hopelessly stuck, in the middle of nowhere.

To Be Continued…

My Dune Buggy Adventure In Pipa, Brazil (Part 2 of 2)

November 18, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

PREVIOUSLY: Part 1

The first thing I thought of was the $1,000 deposit that I authorized the agency to put on my credit card. I knew if I called them to say I fucked up and got the buggy stuck they'd want to charge me the whole thing or at least a big chunk of it.

I had a cell phone but the balance was $1.50, enough only for a three-minute conversation. Even if the agency wouldn't eat my whole deposit, I had no idea how to direct them to where I was. Yeah I'm by some beach, partway up some hill, near some birds feasting on a hippo carcass. It would take multiple phone calls of several minutes length.

You really feel alive when the stakes are raised. I'm thinking about the $1,000 while trying to figure out a solution at the same time. My instinct was to panic but I'm a sensible man so I decided to use my brain.

After two minutes I started to panic and tried to push the buggy out myself. I got in front of it, grabbed onto the oily railing, and started pushing as hard as I could. Of course it didn't move.

If only I could push and hit the gas at the same time! I got in the buggy, punched it in reverse, then placed a big bottle of water on the gas as I removed my foot. I stepped out and with my left hand pushing the bottle down on the gas, I used my right arm and shoulder to try and push the machine. It still didn't move.

I studied the buggy and figured that three or four guys could probably push it out. Then I came up with the idea to find the nearest town and hire a few idle teenagers to help me.

I got on the beach and started jogging. I was hoping there would soon be civilization with tow trucks, gas stations, and a McDonalds for a double cheeseburger snack. Finally after 30 minutes of running a small fishing village emerged in the distance.

I approached the town slowly, catching my breath, and noticed people on the beach staring at me like I was the Yeti emerging from a wintry forest. I saw a handful of guys lingering near the main square and started rehearsing what I would say to them in Portuguese… "My buggy is stuck… can you help me?… I can give you that paper money."

Before I had to say anything a buggy approached. It must've crossed the shallow water that I chickened out on earlier. I flagged him down and the first thing he said was, "Is that your buggy out there?" I nodded and he let out a chuckle. Then he told me to hop in, saying he'll help me get it out. For the rest of the day we'd communicate in Portuguese.

He introduced himself as Roberto. Turns out he drives around tourists like on the tour I took in Natal. We went into the village and stopped by his house first. There I met about eight or nine members of his extended family, and for most of them this was the first time they had ever met an American. Their house was spartan but comfortable, with multiple beds to a room and religious Jesus statues on every table. I answered their curious questions and they complimented my Portuguese, saying my accent is southern, from Rio or São Paulo. I assumed that the books I was learning from gave me the southern accent.

I told them I studied every day and they asked me why. Problem is I've never had a good answer to why I'm learning a language. I usually say, "I want to be a cultured person," but truth is I like the sense of accomplishment from having a conversation in a different tongue. Being able to communicate with people you're not "supposed" to communicate with is like having a superpower, and a good conversation motivates me to keep studying to better express myself for the next conversation.

The wife handed me a glass of cashew juice (about as tasty as it sounds) and I pretended it was the best juice I've ever had in my life. Even though I'm still deathly afraid of getting a digestive illness because of my last trip to South America, I didn't want to be ungrateful and ask if the juice was prepared in sanitary conditions.

Outside the house Roberto found two idle guys and the four of us hopped in his buggy. We took a backroad across some private farmland and twenty minutes later arrived at the sight of my mistake. While the three of them lifted the rear of each side, I pushed sand underneath the tires as fast as I could. Then Roberto took some air out of them, got inside the buggy, told us to push with all our might, and out it came. It didn't take more than five minutes.

To add insult to injury, Roberto then effortlessly drove up the same hill I got stuck in. I asked him why I couldn't do that and he said, "It takes practice." I felt like an idiot, and imagined Roberto later telling all his friends about the gringo who got a dune buggy stuck in sand.

We went back to town and walked around the center to buy fish caught minutes before. He paraded me to everyone he knew and I answered the same questions repeatedly like a parrot, getting fast enough that people thought I was near fluent in their language. This is where I mention that if you meet a Brazilian girl who has never met a gringo before, she will be very receptive.

Roberto's wife fed me lunch and introduced me to the Dona, or matriarch of the family. I didn't ask how old she was but she let's just say she has occasional dreams of the angel of death. She showed me her garden out back and how each plant treats a health condition. One plant was for heartburn, one was for impotence, and another was for eye problems. "You get the berry and then squeeze the juice right into your eye."

I said, "This is like a pharmacy!"

"Yes, a natural pharmacy." Then she gave me some random leaves to chew on which she said will help make me a more vigorous lover in bed. I snatched an extra handful when she wasn't looking.

The impotence plant

View from the Dona's house

I left not long after and got back without problems by taking the farmland route, remembering Roberto's advice to not let the tires spin too fast, among other tips. The things he told me was what you'd hear for driving in the snow.

Compared to the $35 tour in Natal, the costs for my buggy adventure was quite a bit more:

$110: Rental
$30: Gas
$15: Boat passages
$8: Farm passage
$18: Labor costs for the two men that helped
$18: Compensation for Roberto (I offered to pay his gas money)

That's $200, or about six times more than the tour.

The problem with tours is that nothing really good or really bad will happen. You get a controlled, pleasant experience where all you have to do is push the shutter button. If there's a problem then you simply sit and wait while your guide figures things out. Though I don't like judging whether an experience was "worth it" or not based on how much it cost, this was one of the most interesting days I've had in South America. I experienced a tough problem, had to work my way out, and in the meantime connected with locals who weren't already spoiled by gringos. There's not a whole lot more I could've asked for besides a buggy blowjob (by a girl, not Roberto).

Unless there is a chance of something going wrong, it's hard for me to get excited about doing it. I want to feel alive, and for that to happen there has to be some type of fear or anxiety in the back of my mind that things may not work out in my favor and that I may have to use everything I'm made of to succeed (or survive). This is why I'm not in the United States. It's true that everything is harder down here, but the payoffs are that much sweeter.

16 Different Types Of Game

November 22, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Asshole Game: This is where you fire off relentless volleys of jabs, teases, and light insults that act as foreplay and make her ask, “Who is this guy?” It’s important to get the one-night-stand when using asshole game because by the next day her vagina will have dried up.

Baller Game: Roll up to the club looking crispy with your crew. Throw paper in everyone’s face and wait for the girl who likes money to make her presence known.

Caveman Game (a.k.a. Brazilian Game): You grab a girl in the club, pull her close to you, and have a very basic conversation for one minute (if that) before you try to kiss her. Ignore her inevitable resistance by holding her body and head in place. Even if she keeps her lips completely closed while you kiss, try to open them with your tongue.

Cocaine Game: You’re at the club talking to a girl and drop a casual line about having coke back at your penthouse, which is really a shitty row house but she won’t care as long as she sees that pile of coke. I’ve never run this game but it’s a no-brainer if you use drugs. Just don’t lie and say you have coke when you don’t because hell hath no fury like a cokehead denied coke.

Celebrity Game: This is when the girl thinks you’re important for some reason. From my experience I can say that girls seem to dig the fact that you’re known, even if in one city, even if it’s for something like banging girls. I’m pretty sure that guys don’t start bands only for the music.

Cool Guy Game: You casually drop all the interesting things you do (or have done) while making the girl laugh every now and then. The key to this game is fun conversation that makes the girl feel lucky she met you. Essential for daytime approaches.

Hail Mary Game: Go to the club, take a deep breath, and approach 10-20 girls. Ignore the ones who try to make you feel like a loser. Used for when you go to a place where you have zero social proof or a look not desired by the natives.

Internet Game: Gather your best photos and then craft a cocky first message with the occasional undercapitalization so it doesn’t look like you’re trying too hard. Blast 300 girls on Myspace, Plenty Of Fish, or Mingle, try to get a date from the three that respond, then freak out at the “updated” look of the one who comes through. Try to bang her anyway.

Last Man Standing Game: You’re the only guy who didn’t dip, pass out, or puke. Her friends all went home leaving you two alone at 4am in the morning. You’re both drunk and horny so the only logical thing to do is fuck (or eat greasy food).

Owner’s Son Game: You go to a club where you happen know the entire staff. They let you get away with things that normal patrons cannot, like dancing on the bar with your shirt off while drinking straight from a bottle of Jack. Girl’s notice this and approach you because they figure you’re the owner’s son. The only guy I know who has run this game successfully is Virgle Kent.

Friend Of The Owner's Son Game: You get the residual, lesser-quality pussy from being the friend of the guy that all the girls think is the owner's son.

Pizza Game: Stand in front of a late night gyro or jumbo slice pizza spot and holla at girls walking by. Insult them when they don't respond positively to your comments about the sexual nature of their bodies.

Rape Game: Used for when a girl is acting either difficult or prudish. Drag her to your place and tell her you're going to have her way with her and there's nothing she can do about it. Throw her on the bad, rip off her clothing, and do what you promised while ignoring her fake protests. With some girls you need to simulate rape conditions to get the bang, but be careful because rape game correlates highly to unprotected sex. The last thing a girl cares about when getting fantasy raped is using a condom. Also, you might want to use a fake name and safe house when running rape game in a Western country.

Solo Dolo Game: You go alone to a decent bar or lounge looking sharp, drink fine spirits from a prime spot, and wait for a girl who doesn't mind anonymous sex to give you a subtle look that invites conversation. Casually drop the convenient location of your condo or hotel suite early in the conversation. Coined by G Manifesto.

Sleazy Game: You're always pining to get back into her place or yours, because once isolated in a bedroom you know that sex has a very good chance of occurring. In fact most of your game revolves around making this happen. For example, a couple times I purposefully missed the last subway train home to ask the girl to crash on her couch, knowing she wouldn't refuse. And then I bang. It pays to be sleazy.

Starving Artist Game: You casually drop that you are an artist of some sort trying to produce something remarkable while barely making ends meet. It helps if you have a weathered look with dark circles under your eyes so she can see how you're suffering for your art. Since she meets more lawyers, doctors, and cubicle slaves than artists, she will be curious about you all the way to her bedroom. You can't take her back to yours since you live in your dad's basement, a fact that legitimizes your artist status to her even further. (Note: Starving Artist game doesn't play as well in non-Western cultures where being a lawyer or doctor is far less common).

Game is multi-dimensional so it's rare you only use one type of game to bang a girl. For example my game is strongest when I start with Asshole Game and then end with Sleazy Game and a sprinkling of Rape Game. If I'm in a hipster bar I run Starving Artist Game and Cool Guy Game. In a foreign country though I'm forced to predominantly run Hail Mary Game and Last Man Standing Game, though I would like to move to Solo Dolo Game in a few years. In Washington D.C. sometimes I can get away with only running Celebrity Game or, if I'm out with Virgle Kent, Friend Of The Owner's Son Game. As you can see there are many ways to skin a cat.

“Just Text Me Your Address”

November 24, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Sometimes when setting dates I need an address or some extra information from the girl. For example we agree to start in two hours at her place, but I need an address. On the phone I’ll say, “Just text me your address.”

You’d think that the girl would right away get off the phone and send the text, but they never do this. They always wait a little bit so they don’t appear needy. I noticed that most girls will wait on average 10-15 minutes before texting information you need for the date. The longest I’ve experienced was 25 minutes. What’s funny to me is that this is a universal rule and every girl does this, as if it was written in a book somewhere that all girls have read.

Of course I do the same thing.

Don’t Even Bother Veryifying Her Phone Number

November 29, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There was a time when I’d get a number of a girl from the bar and a part of me would come alive. A potential new notch! If the girl was especially pretty, I’d value this number to such extent that when I got home I’d write it on a separate piece of paper, just in case my phone broke or got stolen. I didn’t want to lose an opportunity with a new girl.

Most other times I was very careful to enter her number correctly in my phone, lest I make a mistake and never am able to reach her again. How horrible that would be!

Do you see how much I valued the pussy? Before I had sex with her I was so pressed over it that I had fear I may never be able to contact her again. It’s possible that the girl never picked up on this neediness, but I bet I showed it in other ways during the pick-up where I demonstrated how I thought she was a valuable snowflake.

Flash forward to present day. If I lose her number, or don’t put it in correctly, who cares? I’ll just pick another girl up the next night. There is an unlimited supply of girls for me to get with, and even if the girl was cool, it won’t be much time until I meet another one that’s even better.

No pussy is golden. They’re a commodity, millions of them present in every city in every country of the world, waiting for me to put in my attempt. A failure or misstep with any one girl is not worth one bit of mental stress.

In fact, it should be the girl who is worried that the number is not entered correctly. It should be her that insists I call her phone so that she has her number, not the other way around.

Until the girl amazes you in some way besides looking pretty, she has low worth. Until she comes through with great sex or some nice affection (cooking, small gifts), she should not occupy more than a fleeting thought in your mind.

Re: Dilemma For Guys With Tight Game

December 2, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY: Dilemma For Guys With Tight Game

The answer I was looking for was “nothing,” explained nicely by Flashman:

> Nothing, other than getting across a vibe of total sexual satiation through facial expression and body language, which will not register with all girls, especially those you cold approach without them having checked you out.
>
> Game is broadcasting the maximum amount of attractive traits in as short a time frame as possible, but if the audition is cut off after 4 seconds, there’s not much you can do. In hindsight, a boderline harsh neg or bold statement (”you look like the kind of girl who would stalk me after we slept together”) might convey the information, but who cares. Unless a celebrity or heavily social-proofed, these rejections are inevitable and not worth a second thought or even slight bitterness.

It’s true there are some tricks you can use to possibly turn around the type of rejection I presented, and humor would be the way to do that as suggested by VK and Tyler, but I don’t believe there is a recovery that can consistently improve such an outcome.

The problem with approaching without social proof or a reputation that precedes you is that you can’t show your entire worth in an opening line. It doesn’t matter how good that line is or how alpha your body language is, but those things can’t simply can’t overcome a girl who is not open to chatting with a random guy who has no immediate value besides maybe an okay appearance. She must be open.

Game rarely ever convinces a girl to have sex. All it does is increase the probability of banging a girl that is thinking she may want to get banged soon. This is why you have to approach in numbers. Raw game is about working your ass off on many girls you want and waiting until one comes through. Then after you’re done with her you repeat the process. Until you build a reputation, social proof, or a valuable quality whereby girls initiate contact first, you will always be working.

So while that girl is laughing at you, maintain your composure and approach another girl later, and just keep going until you find one who is open to chatting with a guy. Then run that game that has proved deadly so many times before.

A Replacement For The 1-10 Scale

December 13, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

My attempts to teach others to objectively use the 1-10 scale to describe female attractivness has failed. For guys outside of my crew, the scale means absolutely nothing and doesn't do what it was supposed to do: standardize beauty. The problem is that guys give every girl a 7 or 8 when that's far from the case.

So it's time to come up with a more general scale that will work anywhere at a slight cost of precision. Let's put all women into the following five categories:

1. Beast. These are the girls that reduce your confidence after sex, not increase it. You wake up the next day and wonder, "What was I thinking?" This happened to me once a couple years ago when I experienced such morning shame that I had to escape from the girl's house after she hopped into the shower. I fenced a wall of her gated community and grabbed a bus because I couldn't afford a cab.

2. Okay. A girl you wouldn't introduce to your friends, but is bangable. She probably has about 10 extra pounds, some mild acne, and a sense of style that makes my lumberjerk shirts look awesome. You want to put girls like this is the fuck-buddy bin. Side note: It's strange that girls who are fat or ugly have bad style, even though style is something easily changeable that could drastically improve appearance. A fattie should never, ever step out of the house with anything less than three-inch heels.

3. Cute. This is your classic 7. A girl who is attractive and extremely bangagle, and your friends wouldn't hesitate to say "I'd hit." On some nights when she does creative shit with her makeup she can be extremely attractive. She will also look better during short vacations to Las Vegas or the Carribean because she starved herself the week prior to get ready.

4. Real Cute. Reaction from your player friends will be "Damn, she's cute" or "Oooh she's real nice." Most normal men though would call these girls hot. I would only get into a longish term relationship with a girl in this category or higher, because with a merely Cute girl I'd be disturbed with thoughts knowing I could definitely do better.

5. Hot as balls. To get a girl here you will need a little bit more than just game, perhaps status or fame with a healthy dose of luck. If a friend sees you with her his comments may enter the haterade realm of "How much are you paying to hang out with her?!" or "How the fuck did you get her?" The irony of the Hot As Balls girl is that you often see her with some overweight, balding, unkempt, or otherwise extremely hairy man. Life plays cruel jokes on us all.

Let's put this system in action with a couple examples…

"Yeah last night I woke up next to this beast and remembered that I didn't use a condom. Should I get tested?"

"I'm tired of banging okay girls. Should I bang prostitutes on the side to improve my approach game?"

“I approached this hot as balls girl and she told me that she wouldn’t have sex with me if I was the last guy on earth. Then she threw her drink on me. What’s a good line that I could have responded with?”

And so on.

So there you have it. The 1-10 scale, unfortunately, has failed. If Virgle Kent or Roissy tells me they went out with an 8 I’ll know exactly what we’re working with, but any other guy and the 8 will probably not be an 8. She’d just be okay.

If this scale falls then I have another one waiting in the wings. It’s called “Pic or shut the fuck up.”

A Replacement For The 1-10 Scale

December 13, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

My attempts to teach others to objectively use the 1-10 scale to describe female attractivness has failed. For guys outside of my crew, the scale means absolutely nothing and doesn't do what it was supposed to do: standardize beauty. The problem is that guys give every girl a 7 or 8 when that's far from the case.

So it's time to come up with a more general scale that will work anywhere at a slight cost of precision. Let's put all women into the following five categories:

1. Beast. These are the girls that reduce your confidence after sex, not increase it. You wake up the next day and wonder, "What was I thinking?" This happened to me once a couple years ago when I experienced such morning shame that I had to escape from the girl's house after she hopped into the shower. I fenced a wall of her gated community and grabbed a bus because I couldn't afford a cab.

2. Okay. A girl you wouldn't introduce to your friends, but is bangable. She probably has about 10 extra pounds, some mild acne, and a sense of style that makes my lumberjerk shirts look awesome. You want to put girls like this is the fuck-buddy bin. Side note: It's strange that girls who are fat or ugly have bad style, even though style is something easily changeable that could drastically improve appearance. A fattie should never, ever step out of the house with anything less than three-inch heels.

3. Cute. This is your classic 7. A girl who is attractive and extremely bangagle, and your friends wouldn't hesitate to say "I'd hit." On some nights when she does creative shit with her makeup she can be extremely attractive. She will also look better during short vacations to Las Vegas or the Carribean because she starved herself the week prior to get ready.

4. Real Cute. Reaction from your player friends will be "Damn, she's cute" or "Oooh she's real nice." Most normal men though would call these girls hot. I would only get into a longish term relationship with a girl in this category or higher, because with a merely Cute girl I'd be disturbed with thoughts knowing I could definitely do better.

5. Hot as balls. To get a girl here you will need a little bit more than just game, perhaps status or fame with a healthy dose of luck. If a friend sees you with her his comments may enter the haterade realm of "How much are you paying to hang out with her?!" or "How the fuck did you get her?" The irony of the Hot As Balls girl is that you often see her with some overweight, balding, unkempt, or otherwise extremely hairy man. Life plays cruel jokes on us all.

Let's put this system in action with a couple examples…

"Yeah last night I woke up next to this beast and remembered that I didn't use a condom. Should I get tested?"

"I'm tired of banging okay girls. Should I bang prostitutes on the side to improve my approach game?"

“I approached this hot as balls girl and she told me that she wouldn’t have sex with me if I was the last guy on earth. Then she threw her drink on me. What’s a good line that I could have responded with?”

And so on.

So there you have it. The 1-10 scale, unfortunately, has failed. If Virgle Kent or Roissy tells me they went out with an 8 I’ll know exactly what we’re working with, but any other guy and the 8 will probably not be an 8. She’d just be okay.

If this scale falls then I have another one waiting in the wings. It’s called “Pic or shut the fuck up.”

How To Tell A Girl What You Do

December 14, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Expanding on the why logic hurts guys theme, I want to give two examples of how to drop the same job: a world-class clay potter.

You're at a bar talking to some girl. The first question she asks you is "What do you do?" You reply, "I'm a world-class clay potter. I do exhibits here in D.C." The girl looks at her friend and rolls her eyes. "What a loser, bragging about clay pots," she thinks. The conversation dies down a couple minutes later.

You're at a bar talking to some girl. The first question she asks you is "What do you do?" You reply, "You mean for money?"

"Uh yeah for money."

"Well it's complicated."

"Complicated?"

"Yeah well I work with the Earth. I make things with mud and dirt. Then I sell my mud creations to discerning individuals."

"Are you serious?" she asks.

"Yeah I love mud. I just have this thing for mud. I mean, who doesn't?"

"I don't," she scoffs.

"Well that's a shame. Thanks to mud, I'm able to come to bars like this and buy this beer. Cause of MUD."

"You're weird."

Then she gives you a look, wondering if you're serious or not. Three hours later you're fucking her on your bed. On her way out, she notices a picture of you handing a clay pot to the mayor of some small Eastern European town, a piece you sold him years ago. You call her a few days later and she agrees to go out with you, and you fuck her again.

Logic dictates that you should directly state an accomplishment to a girl in hopes of bedding her, but as many guys know, this doesn't work. If logic worked, guys would be wearing t-shirts with their yearly income and/or dick size (the latter for me), yet in reality they would be labeled a douche and laughed out the bar.

Be shady and dance around the answer instead. Purposefully not impressing a girl is the best way to impress her, since it shows you don't care about her and that your value is higher than hers. Let her find out things eventually on her own by accident (after some insinuation on your part) where the effect will be much more potent. Let her think: "Why didn't he brag about this great accomplishment?" Because you don't give a shit. And that's a key piece of the puzzle to fucking a lot of girls.

What Are You Waiting For?

December 16, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

"The infinitesimal place I take up is so tiny compared to the rest of space where I'm not, and which has nothing to do with me; and the portion of time given me to live is so negligible next to the eternity in which I haven't existed and won't—while in this atom, this decimal point, the blood courses, the brain works, and wants something also... What an outrage! What nonsense!"
—-Fathers and Sons by Ivan Turgenev

Sometimes I wonder how it will feel like when my time is up. Will I be conscious of the last breath I take? Will there be a moment of awareness after my heart stops? When clinically dead, will I be able to feel or sense anything, suggesting that the electrical impulses in my head ramp down slowly, or will it be more like an on-off switch where things fade to black? I wonder how it will feel the second I know I'm going to die, assuming I don't get a bullet in the head or find myself in an exploding airplane. I like to think it will be a moment of blissful resignation, but I wouldn't rule out a combination of sheer terror and unfathomable fear.

I don't believe in an afterlife or a soul. When you die, you die, and everything that you are disappears from the earth, only to be remembered briefly by your ancestors or works. I can't think of anything more cruel—to be given life and the opportunity to grow and change and experience and love and have it all taken away from you, as if it was all for nothing, nothing but nature's joke on you. It won't matter how many women I've slept with. It won't matter how well-traveled I was, how many languages I was able to speak. It won't matter how many expensive things I was able to accumulate. And all those books I've read, those tasty dishes I learned to prepare—for nothing! All those experiences I learned from, some that helped me become a better person, all for naught.

But no matter how meaningless, insignificant and absurd human existence is, I feel very alive right now. I can feel pleasure and pain, happiness and disappointment. I can shape how I want to live the current moment and do just a bit of planning to help assure future moments feel great as well. Though I'm very skeptical of free will, as each of us are limited by and dependent on too many factors outside our control, I do have enough power to make marginal and sometimes significant improvements. There are things I can do to more often hit the pleasure centers in my brain, helping push aside those poisonous existential thoughts that inevitably lead to depression and melancholy.

The worst thing about life—death—is also the best thing, because I know that my time here is limited, and it's best spent pursuing what I want, and nothing less. I look at people who postpone, waiting to act, either for some type of miracle or maybe the arbitrary flip of the calendar year in the form of a "resolution," and I think to myself, "Don't these people know that one day they're going to die?" Maybe they forgot, and won't be reminded until someone close to them passes away, or when they themselves go through a serious health scare, but by then it may be many times harder to make any sort of meaningful change.

But I don’t forget. That’s why today I will wake up and do what I want to do, in the place that I want to be. It won’t be a perfect day as I am bounded by the human experience, but the parts that I can affect and mold are being affected and molded. And if you tell me I’m going to die tomorrow I’ll just shrug my shoulders at you, because before I take my last breath I know I’ve done everything I possibly could to live this meaningless, insignificant and absurd life to the absolute best of my ability.

How Culture Shapes Game (Using Colombia As An Example)

December 21, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The most optimal game depends on two things: the nature of the women and the culture they reside in. But since women are deeply affected by culture, we can say that it's really culture that determines the type of game you need to use.

Once you understand the culture, you can devise a game that works in that culture (and that culture alone). Some pieces of game can be shifted around, but not all. For example cocky game works great in the United States, but less so in Colombia. It is more effective in Argentina, but not as much in Brazil. Why is that?

Cocky game was made for confident girls. Since American girls are much more confident, we'd expect it to have a strong effect. On the other hand the girls of Colombia and Brazil are rather needy and insecure. Cocky game is too hard for them, and therefore should be used sparingly, if at all (anything past light teasing will decrease attraction instead of increasing it). The girls of Argentina think they're European, and with that comes an increase in confidence where you'd see more utility with the cocky vibe.

Instead of throwing yourself into the fire and trying a bunch of random things in a new country, it's wiser to understand facets of how that culture works and then work your way backwards. Let's do that with Colombia, which has two main cultural differences that greatly affect how you play the game.

1. Cell Phone Use. Charges are borne on those making the call, not receiving them, so everyone there answers their phone. No one wants to have to call the person back because making calls is very expensive (40 cents a minute). No one leaves a voicemail, and if you leave one it's a guarantee it won't be checked promptly. Text messaging is also comparatively expensive, and not frequently used by those who aren't Americanized. Service is not as reliable and messages can arrive hours late.

Most people never make calls with their cell phone. They go to independent minuto celular vendors located on most street corners to make calls at a cheap rate, usually because they have empty balances on their cell phone and can only receive calls. They are also very slow to recharge their balance. Every time someone calls you it will probably be from a new number, so therefore there is no call screening in Colombia. Girls answer their phone most of the time when you call.

Optimal Game: When you get a girl's phone number, do not text message her and do not leave voicemails. Call her in 2-4 days and if she doesn't answer then the correct play is to keep calling back once a day. Leaving a text message may not get a response if she has no money in her balance so setting dates via text is not advised. If she's not answering it's because she's genuinely busy, not because she is screening, since the strange number could be her cousin for all she knows.

Interesting Twist: Email game plays here. I've set dates with email relatively easily. MSN

Messenger is also popular, but it's a rather time-consuming way to set a date and I avoid it since you both have to catch each other online at the same time.

2. Family. Family is the most important part of Colombian life. Every girl lives at home with her parents, and they require details of her social life (including potential suitors). Even if she's in her 20's, she needs permission to go out. It'll be common for one of her parents to call her during your date. She also has a curfew which means she cannot stay out late. You usually don't have enough time to take her out and then return to your love dungeon for a lengthy bedroom seduction.

Optimal Game: The home dinner date. It's the most reliable way of getting a girl into your house and boozed up in a short amount of time. Be sure to cook a light meal without a lot of grease so the alcohol absorbs properly (I recommend a basic chicken stir-fry with rice). Since you don't have to move locations, you can bang her without going over her curfew. You generally can't do two dinner dates in a row so only use it when you're at least 50% certain she's ready to bang (preferably after you've made out with her). I've done more dinner dates in Colombia in six months than in the United States the previous five years.

Interesting Twist: If you have a poor girl on your hands, she may ask you for taxi money back home.

A third dimension which I'll just briefly mention is social circle. There is no nighttime pick-up culture in Colombia as girls hang out in huge mixed-set groups, so the optimal game will involve more daytime approaches at malls and universities.

I'm tempted to add Catholicism. Brainwashing from the church causes girls here to give robust resistance in the bedroom, but since the optimal game remains the same (persistence) there really is no need to describe it in-depth.

If you just understand the cell phone and family differences in Colombia, you'll be well ahead of other gringos in banging the girls there. There are others which I will discuss in the future, but these two are the most important.

When you want to bang abroad, you'll save yourself a lot of grief if you step back and see how the culture functions. How is the belief system different? What are some common things you see differently from your own country? What are the personalities and behaviors of guys who have the hot women? Then devise a few tactics that may be more suitable for your new environment and try them out.

But how about if you don't have enough time in your visit to study cultural nuances and just want to get your flag? Then throw efficiency out the window and approach like a machine with the game you know. And hope for best.

Female Wingmen Are Overrated

December 24, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Here's an Bang excerpt from page 56:

> You may want to turn an attractive lady friend into a wingman. The female wingman is supposed to let other females know that you are accepted on this Earth by at least one woman. But we use her differently than a male wingman. While your buddy is by your side to talk to the girlfriends and absorb distractions, the female wingman is there to increase your social standing. When you enter a venue, you want to talk to your lady friend long enough for other girls to see. Make the interaction ambiguous by talking close and encouraging her to touch you from time to time. Then, go approach girls on your own, who will now be much more receptive to your game.
>
> The purpose of the female wingman is just to increase the success rate of your approaches. While you can bring your lady friend along with you in the approach, I find that the girls tend to talk too much amongst themselves, severely limiting my ability to game. Don't let a girl do the approach for you—approaching a girl you want to sleep with is your job and no one else's.

I can't remember the last time I've seen a man properly use a female wingman. He thinks that because he has some social proof the girls will start coming up to him, or that the wingwoman will do all the work, but it rarely works out like that. What ends up happening is that he barely talks to other girls.

I will always recommend men use a male wingman before female ones, for two reasons. First, when you have a cute girl on your arm you get lazy and comfortable, probably because your hunger is tamed. Second, there's a subconscious desire not to get rejected in front of other women (especially ones you know), so you'll tend to only go for other girls who gave you a good signal like eye contact.

Unless your female wingman knows you play the numbers game to get sex, and that you do get rejected often, you'll be much more hesitant to approach than if you were hanging out with another guy. While I do value the social proof that comes with hanging out with beautiful women, the female wingman is too overrated for guys who already have game. The benefit is marginal unless you know exactly what you're doing.

In Bang I do give some additional tips on macking with a male wingman, including what to do in the unfortunate situation where you feel like your wingman is cockblocking you. Check out the Bang homepage to read more excerpts.

Oh, Merry Christmas.

1,295 Posts

December 28, 2009 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I'm taking off until next week. In the meantime here are some recent posts worthy of another look:

1. Do Not Help A Girl Out With Her Problems If You Want To Fuck Her
2. The Best Motivator That Gets You Approaching Girls
3. The 9 Immutable Laws Of Pick Up
4. Interview With Muscle And Game Master Virgle Kent
5. Brief Introduction To Buddhism
6. The Two Things That Tight Game Comes Down To
7. Never Tell A Girl That You've Been In Love Before
8. 18 Reasons Why You Don't Get Laid
9. Don't Go To South American Clubs With High Cover Charges
10. Thoughts On The Balance Beween Caring For A Girl and Being Completely Apathetic
11. Are You A Real Man?
12. 16 Different Types Of Game
13. How To Tell A Girl What You Do

Still bored? Check out the full archives from RooshV.com and DCBachelor.com, where you can browse by post title and month. As of today I've put up 1,295 posts. I also have a Twitter feed, in case you're into that.

6 Step Strategy For Living Abroad

January 3, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The only thing harder about moving to another country is deciding on where. You can read guidebooks and forums all day but you'll never be absolutely certain that recommended places fit you best. You need to go there to find out for yourself.

Let's start with the first two steps…

Step 1: Compile a long list of cities and countries that you want to visit. Categorize those by continent and see if it's obvious that you should visit one continent before all others. For me that was the case for South America, though Eastern Europe was a close second.

Step 2: Plan out a logical route for your first ambitious trip abroad. Fill the spaces in between with cities you are curious about and others that help chop up long trips. Consult guidebooks to see about train or bus times between cities along with ballpark lodging numbers that help you calculate a rough budget. Giving you a budget estimate is useless without knowledge of your travel style and tastes, so ask those who are similar to you for an idea. (You can also use sites like One World to plan around-the-world trips via airplane.)

For me travel has two modes: research and living, with some overlap in between. I generally like to visit a city first before committing an extended period of time there. My first trip to South America was mostly research, hopping around and taking notes on the cities I liked. Out of the 30 or so I visited, I discovered two that I wanted to return to: Cordoba and Rio. I did stay in both cities longer than I planned, but not long enough to where I felt like I was a resident instead of a tourist. Understand that to find a city you love, you may have to visit a lot of cities you dislike. It's a process that takes time.

My current trip is heavy on the living side. I stayed in Medellin for six months, with research side-trips to Bogota, Cali, and Santa Marta. I'm now in Rio de Janerio after researching the north of Brazil. If I like any of these research cities I'll stay up to a week and consider returning in the future for a longer time. For example Pipa is a beach town that I would definitely live for a summer, something that I would not have known unless I visited. While I value other people's opinions of places, I won't know for sure unless I go there and have a look.

I don't really see the point of doing only research, which is the Western way of travel, assuming the Westerner is not merely going to a Caribbean resort. There will most likely be foreign cities that make you happier than your own, and visiting them without having the option of staying longer to feel it out seems a bit torturous to me. If you'll never be able to move to a city that you love, I'm wondering if it's best not to travel in the first place, because you'll be stuck in your crappy city knowing for sure that there is something better.

Step 3: Figure out money and work logistics. This is where guys start with the excuses that they “can’t,” but to me that says they don’t want it bad enough. Fine, stay where you’re at it and live vicariously through others, but I get emails from guys all the time that are working their asses off just for a month away, and that’s usually how it starts: a decent-sized trip that a guy figures out how to lengthen in future years. My first trip away was only a week long.

Step 4: Enjoy your trip. I strongly urge you to integrate yourself into the cultures you visit by learning the language and avoiding other gringos. How will you know if a city is good or not for a medium or long-term stay if you don’t mix with the people who live there? If you’re coming to South America, learn Spanish or Portuguese. Don’t be lazy. With just a few hundred words you’ll be able to do so much more and be more motivated to talk to locals and begin to understand how they’re like. It’s okay to stay in hostels but every now and then spring for a roach motel to get away from English and general comfort. Push yourself a little more than you’re used to.

Step 5: Reflect after your trip is over. Is there a city you fell in love with? If you visited at least a dozen, chances are one of them will be worthy of a lengthy return. How can you make that happen? You’re probably going to have to figure out a different way of making money, perhaps your own internet or freelance business. Talk to other guys who have what you want and figure out how they did it. While it will be hard to duplicate someone else’s success, there will be lessons you can learn. I know it’s not easy to figure out a new way of making money, but I’ve met a ton of guys doing it. You can as well if you have slightly above-average intelligence, and if you’re reading this right now then chances are you do.

Step 6: Live abroad. Book a one way ticket with money in the bank and some passive income coming in on the side. Once there rent a room and spend a couple hours a day working, a couple hours a day learning the local language, and the rest on your own pet projects. Hang out at a local university, explore the nightlife, make friends, sleep with the local women, enjoy life, and eventually return home a better man. What more can you ask for?

And thankfully while living in a city your expenses will be significantly lower than when traveling through.

After my current trip in South America, I plan on coming back to D.C. to recharge for several months and then maybe do a tame trip through parts of Europe. That’s my master plan, research and living, research and living, until there’s not a whole lot of research left to do and I build roots in a place that I love.

How To Tell If A Girl Is Serious About Fucking

January 5, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I like to think there are two kinds of prospects: one where the girl is serious about fucking and one where she's not.

The girl who is serious about fucking either likes you a lot and/or hasn't gotten laid in a while. The latter reason, especially, will do more to ensure sex in a rapid matter. She likes sex, thinks of sex, masturbates almost nightly with her foot long black dildo, and sincerely wants to get laid. And it's not so much that's she naturally horny because in America if you haven't gotten laid in a month then you're a huge loser, so many girls try to relieve this friction by banging random men only a few hours after meeting them. (I wish this was the case in non-Western parts of the world.)

The second girl is more wishy-washy. Sure she wants to get laid, but as a sexual camel she can go a while without it. Sometimes flirtatious attention is good enough to hold her off for months. There is no urgency for her, which is a headache for the horny man.

The way to find out if she is serious about fucking or not is by the end of the first date.

If you try for the kiss, and you don't get it, she is not serious about fucking. I'm not saying you can't eventually fuck her, but you'll be chasing that pussy for many weeks.

If you try for the kiss, and you do get it, she is serious about fucking. She may not fuck you, but if you play your game right there is a coin-flip chance you will hit.

It's that simple. A sloppy make outs on the very same night you meet her is not a reliable indicator because maybe she just wanted to kiss a guy, but setting a date with a new guy and slobbering over his face at the end of that date is a pretty good indicator of how earnest she is.

In addition, if she flakes last minute on the first date, she is definitely not serious about fucking. This is highly disrespectful actually and worthy of phone number deletion. I've never been able to turn around a seduction where the girl flaked on the first date.

I had a first date with a Colombian girl a few months ago and didn't get the kiss at the end of a four hour date. My Colombian friend said, "Oh that's no problem, girls here rarely kiss on the first date." So it's a cultural phenomenon right? Wrong, because I've had other first dates in Colombia where the kiss happened (including a daytime date at a park). Sure enough I got her on the phone again and while she claimed to want to hang out, she wanted to wait a week when she wasn't busy with school. Not serious about fucking. Don't waste your time with these girls. This is a reason why your first dates should be reasonably-priced drinks, to screen out girls who are merely looking for attention and not veiny cock.

If you don't kiss by the first date, you won't hit sooner than date five. What pussy is worth that kind of investment?

Allow me to answer that… none

Travel Overview Of Northern Brazil (For Guys)

January 6, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Definitely Rio de Janeiro, maybe São Paulo and Florianopolis. If you come to Brazil chances are those are the cities you'll visit first. But how about after that? Besides Amazon jungle tours or a visit to Iguazu falls, it's not obvious where to go if you want to dig deeper into Brazil. So what I ended up doing was starting all the way up north in Fortaleza and in a month's time worked my way down to Rio (traveling around 1,700 miles by bus).

Here's where I went…

Fortaleza:

A large, plain city with several decent beaches to choose from. If you're on a budget then head to the sketchy Praia de Iracema beach, which has rooms starting at 55 R$ (divide numbers in Brazilian reals by the exchange rate, which as of this writing is around 1.72). Get off on Avenida Beira Mar facing the beach and bargain with the over dozen hotels clustered nearby. If you have more money to spend then head to upmarket Praia do Futuro a couple miles away.

The great thing about Fortaleza is that the nightlife is easy to find. Simply go to Dragão do Mar, an area of bars, nightclubs, and restaurants within walking distance of Iracema. From Thursday through Sunday you'll find something happening. Nearby Dragão do Mar is Mucuripe (Rua Travessa Maranguape, 108), a megaclub that has three different dance floors, including one that played decent house and American hip-hop when I went. The cover is 30 R$ and the girls have attitude, but it's not bad for a visit.

Speaking of the girls, I've never seen so many husky women as I have in Fortaleza. It's as if they're all spawn of football players, which is interesting because the men appeared normal. While the women tend to be overweight with hammy arms, it's their wide build which was most disturbing. This was the first city I visited after Rio, so the downgrade in attractiveness was shocking and took a bit away from the Brazilian woman mystique.

Natal:

Cleaner and smaller than Fortaleza, Natal has earned its spot in guidebooks as a city with tours around neighboring sand dunes and pretty beaches. The most common tour is the six-hour day trip up north to Genipabu Beach (60 R$). I hear trips to southern beaches are also nice but beware that all these excursions are extremely touristy, and if you can find an agency that rents buggies and has a decent map you may want to consider doing it yourself.

Praia Ponta Negra is the quaint tourist beach with clothing shops, modern restaurants, and a nightlife center. I stayed in Pousada Recanto das Flores for 50 R$ a night, a clean option located only one block away from the beach. I didn't get to experience the nightlife but it's around Rua Bezzera in Alto de Ponta Negra. The girls were cuter than in Fortaleza.

Praia de Pipa:

Further south you have Pipa, a beach village with laid-back hippie vibes. There are several nice beaches within walking distance of the center including Praia Madeiro, which is good for surfing (lessons and board rentals on the beach). On the main drag check out the restaurant with the big "Açai" sign for great sandwiches and… açai.

For nightlife there is usually something going on around Oz Music Bar starting late on Wednesday night, but on Thursday nights more people head to the beachfront in front of the reggae club. A block down from Oz (to the right towards the beach), there is a club with a hidden entrance that usually fills up on weekends. If you want to get laid here your best bet is to hit on the traveling gringas. They'll be obvious to spot and you can open them with something like, "I have a feeling you speak English."

The Brazilian girls that live in Pipa tend to be of the tattooed and dredlocked variety, but since this is a tourist destination you'll get lot of well-maintained rich girls from cities nearby, though they're usually traveling with family or significant others.

I stayed in the modern Pousada Rivas for 50 R$ a night. It came with a ceiling fan but if you pay a bit more you can get air conditioning. It was the best Pousada I've stayed at, with a nice pool, friendly family vibe, and a huge breakfast buffet that came with a great selection of juices, fruits, breads, cakes, meats, cheeses, and other goodies. I think the buffet is worth a stay here alone.

I greatly enjoyed my time in Pipa and definitely recommend a visit. It's safe, offers good value, and is a refreshing break from the bigger cities.

Recife:

Besides being known as one of the most dangerous cities in Brazil (and for that matter the Americas), it also has the most dangerous beach. Environmental damage over the past two decades has destroyed food and breeding grounds for bull sharks, and they've responded by coming closer to shore and attacking humans. The local government has pretty much given up on the problem and is trying to turn the state from a beach spot into a "cultural" destination. The only culture I saw in upmarket Boa Viagem was dozens of streetwalkers, especially on the weekend, though people tell me I should have gone to colonial Olinda where most dirty backpackers stay.

Your nightlife options are the expensive asshole clubs scattered around Boa Viagem like U.K., Audrey, and Nox, or the commoner clubs in old town like Downtown and Burburinho where the quality is poor. All leave much to be desired.

If you visit Recife, and I recommend against it, stay in Piratas Da Praia for a budget option (35 R$/night) or Bamboo, a comfortable hotel for old gringo guys (75 R$/night). The latter allows you to bring guests back at no extra charge, but beware of the bar—all the girls that hang out there are professionals.

Salvador:

What an overrated piece of shit city. It's literally one big favela that is not worth more than two hours of your time. Leave your bags at the bus station, visit the historic center, and then get the hell out of town to a place that's not so dirty or dangerous. Or just watch the movie Cidade Baixa.

It's the only city in Brazil where I didn't feel safe walking around during the day. To give you an idea of how bad it is, at the hostel the clerk gave me a map and marked half of it as areas that I shouldn't go to, leaving just a few square blocks that I could explore without surely getting robbed. If you insist on staying here for more than a minute, lodge in Barra instead.

I can't wait to meet hippie gringos who tell me with a smug look on their face that they're going to Salvador to experience "a more authentic Carnival." I'll respond by saying, "Let me guess, you've never actually been to Salvador." You'll like this city if you love to romanticize about poverty and note how starving little kids seem "so happy," a month before you go back to your first-world lifestyle. Asshole.

Ilhéus:

A rustic city seven hours south of Salvador by bus, Ilhéus is often used by travelers as a waypoint to the beaches of Itacaré 90 minutes away, but I was beached out by this point and just wanted to chop up my trip further South. Ilhéus does have a pleasant small-town feel and isn't bad for a couple days (reminds me of Tena, Ecuador a bit), but it won't offer you much in terms of beautiful women or sights. Ask for a seaside room at the Pousada Brisa do Mar (73 3231 2644 / Av 2 de Julho 136) for 50 R$ a night. It's within walking distance of the center.

Other Northern cities I'd visit if I had time and will:

Jericoacoara: Only two hours away from Fortaleza by bus and 4-wheel Jeep, Jeriocoacoara has a beautiful beach located in a fishing village, with good conditions for wind sports and surfing. It rivals Pipa in terms of hippie vibe.

João Pessoa: Along with a decent beach, I'm told this city has pumping nightlife on the weekends.

Maceio: Another choice for visiting nice beaches (see a pattern yet?). Nearby Praia do Gunga is supposedly the most beautiful beach in Brazil.

Here are some related topics on the travel forum:

- How To Prepare For Brazil
- Carnival In Salvador
- Beach Game Strategy
- Florianopolis Tips
- São Paulo Tips
- Good Country For Girls And Lifestyle?

In conclusion, the north of Brazil has some nice beaches and decent value, but it's rougher and doesn't have Brazil's most beautiful women. For that you have to start in Minas Gerais or Espirito Santo, the two states north of Rio, and work your way south (I'll have more about my visit to Espirito Santo in the future). Unless you got money and time to blow and want to learn about Brazilian culture, I'd skip the north.

How To Get Laid Without Approaching

January 10, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Not every man has to approach to get laid, for there are lifestyle choices you can make which allow the women to come to you. While it's rare to meet a man who has tight game but never approaches, taking on a lifestyle "gimmick" will make it easier for every guy. Here's some things you can do which eliminate the need to approach:

1. Bartender, bouncer, or promoter. This is where women have to interact with you. With game and personality it'll be very easy to take these normal interactions to the next level since your high value is already assumed. Even though bartending is manual labor and something that a monkey can do, girls are incredibly impressed by it. I left out DJ'ing on purpose because while women do approach you, it's not as common you think. You're unable to communicate with her and she gets bored and goes right back into the crowd to get grimey with another guy. Unless you're a world-class DJ, you'll get scraps.

2. Musician who performs in live shows. It doesn't even matter if you're in a good band or not. Simply perform and then have some drink afterwards with the commoners. Girls will compliment your show or ask you a question about a song that touched them deeply. It doesn't matter how many panties get wet with your music but you won't get anything unless you mingle after the show.

3. Surfing instructor. You're the expert not only in surfing (getting nice views of her body as you push her into waves), but also in the nightlife. Try to make tentative plans to meet up at night or merely make a strong recommendation for the spot you're going to. You'll run into her and once liquored up she'll be rather easy. Seen it a million times.

4. Tour guide. Again, your expert status conveys high value and as long as you show personality it won't be hard to get an after-tour drink.

5. Foreign language instructor. The key here is to teach hot rich girls who you normally wouldn't have access to. I've heard many stories of gringos teachers getting with very hot women that would be extremely laborious to pick up otherwise. To score you'll have better odds teaching for a large company with group classes than occasional 1-on-1 private tutoring.

6. CouchSurfing host. There's a Brazilian guy I met that has a CouchSurfing profile but only replies to requests by cute girls. He has accumulated quite a few flags this way because as you know girls traveling alone willing to stay with a random man is probably down for that random cock.

Others gimmicks worth mentioning: Studio photographer, pool lifeguard, and cable repairman.

Every now and then there is a weird gimmick that you wouldn't think helps a guy out. For example the guy who works as a waiter in the family-owned pizzeria for the summer at the beach gets laid like a champ. The main idea here is finding something where girls have to interact with you in a setting that shows your value, then turning on that charm.

You won’t have to do any cold approaches again until the goose dies.

Is It A Bad Idea To Ask For Phone Numbers?

January 11, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here's an email I received recently:

> I've recently realized it's usually a bad idea to ask a chick for her phone number.
>
> 1. If she's truly interested, she will ask you!
>
> 2. By asking her for her number, you are raising her status in the interaction between the two of you.
>
> 3. Getting her number gives her reassurance that she doesn't need to sleep with you that night because you are already into her enough to want her number.
>
> 4. If you know you will never ask a girl for her number unless she offers it, you will quit spending so much time overanalyzing your time with her, wondering how to manipulate the interaction to get the number.

1. Many girls do, but not all, including girls that you can get out and fuck on the first or second date. By keeping this rigid rule you cost yourself notches, plain and simple.

2. Not by as much as you think, especially when you preclude the number ask with "you seem cool." Understand that most women of the world like confident guys who make the first move. I'm convinced that my aggressiveness and persistence gets me laid more than my awesome jokes. Don't confuse those qualities with neediness or desperation.

3. I don't see why this is relevant when you only get the number after you've tried all you can to hit that first night. Many of the numbers you get should be on the steps of her house or in the narrow dark alley right next to it.

4. I agree with you for guys who only think in numbers. But if your interaction with a girl is cut short, it pays to ask.

Let me put it this way: say a very low 1 out of 50 numbers you get results in a bang. And the time it takes to get a number is 20 seconds. And the time to call or text that number is 60 seconds. (80 seconds x 50 numbers = 1 hour of time). Is it worth one hour of time spread out over weeks or months to bang an attractive girl?

Of course, especially when you consider that one hour is at least the amount of time you spend jerking off in a week. Fact is one hour is a drop in the bucket. Get numbers all the time after you've already pushed the interaction as far and long as you could. Don't hope to meet those confident girls that can ask. Not only is that as much luck as game, but those aggressive "in charge" girls have slept with tons more guys than the more timid ones. Every now and then I still like seeing the girl grimace upon initial penetration.

Vitória, Brazil Travel Guide For Guys

January 13, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

What a pleasant surprise this city was after waddling through the north of Brazil. A tip in the forum told me that it was a hotbed of Brazilian poon, so I decided to stop by for a night to check it out. I left ten days later.

The good: the female to male ratio here is extremely high and it was rare to be in a club with more guys than girls. The girls are beautiful and you can spend all night hitting on pretty ones without having to lower your standards (it's continued experiences like this which make it impossible for me to permanently live in an American city besides maybe New York or Miami). It reminded me more of Cordoba, Argentina than anywhere else. Since Vitória is not a tourist destination you'll likely be the only gringo in the club.

The bad: the girls are hard and snobby at the well-to-do clubs where attractiveness is highest. Out of six nights out I only got grimey on one, which for Brazil is not very good. The girls of Cordoba got far more excited at my gringo status than the girls here, and I'm nearly certain that Cordoba was in fact easier. Many girls here didn't give me a chance or indulge my bad Portuguese for more than a minute. It wasn't common to meet a girl who speaks English like I always do in Rio.

Another problem is there are no cheap accommodations—no pousadas or hostels. If you're stopping by for only a weekend than stay at the pricey Ibis Vitoria hotel (R$125-155 a night), which is within walking distance of clubs in the posh Triangulo district. After a couple weeks of lodging in cheap pousadas the Ibis felt like a luxury penthouse.

If that's too expensive for you then you have to head to sketchy centro a couple miles away, within walking distance of favelas. There your best option is the Cannes Palace, a clean hotel with wireless internet, air conditioning, and mini-fridge. It'll set you back R$69 a night. If that's still too much, then try the run-down Hotel Avenida two blocks away from the Cannes (Av. Presidente Florentino Avidos 347, tel. 27 3223 4317). It's R$55 a night for their best rooms but you don't get air conditioning or a fridge.

The key to not breaking the bank here is to go to clubs before 11 for their "happy" specials. Let me explain how it works. If you get to the club late you pay something like a R$40 or more cover and then drinks on top of that, but if you get there early then you pay

R$50 for consumação, or consumption. This means your entire R$50 contribution goes towards drinks, which equals about six caipirinhas or three Johnny Walker Blacks. It's almost like paying cover but drinking for free.

The most popular club in Triangulo is Casa ("Home"), which gets packed starting on Thursday night. Next door is Escritorio ("Office"), a bar owned by the same guy (start drinking at the office then continue at home—get it?). Most girls here are absolutely brutal but I won't say it's impossible. There are a handful of clubs nearby and they all seem similar. On weekends the streets pack and form a little bloco, making for fun street game attempts.

My top club recommendation is São Firmino, half a mile away from the Triangulo. It's packed with girls that are slightly nicer than the ones in Triangulo but just as beautiful. This is where I got a little lucky, partially thanks to there being more girls than guys early on.

An alternative to Vitória is Belo Horizonte, the state capital of neighboring Minas Gerais. I haven't been there yet but from what I read it seems like a larger version of Vitória but with nicer girls and a hostel. I also hear good things coming out of Porto Alegre and Brasilia, where being a gringo carries higher status than in Vitória and definitely Rio, which I believe is going through gringo fatigue.

I can't say Vitória is better than Cordoba or Rio because of the accommodation problem, but with clubs that consistently pack them in and an excess of beautiful (but difficult) women, it's worth your time if you don't mind spending a little bit of money, especially since it's only eight hours from Rio by bus. If you're conversational in Portuguese then this is a must-visit city, as you have a decent chance of pulling.

A Conversation About What's Wrong With America

January 17, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My roommate from Denmark was locked out of his room the other day and waited in the kitchen for the landlord to deliver a spare key. I cooked dinner in the meanwhile and we got to talking. At some point he asked me, "Why are you here?"

—

"Everyone keeps asking me that and I wish I had a quick, powerful answer, but it comes down to two things: wanting to explore, something I think most men want to do, and wanting to get away from the American way of life. I really can't say which one motivates me more to be here.

"In America you go to college, which you're told is supposed to be the most fun years of life, and then you get a job taking orders from some pencil dick in this grand mission to chase money and accumulate stuff. I don't need stuff—all I need in life is a laptop and good speakers. I'll be happy anywhere because it'll keep me busy. I can write, read, listen to music, stay in touch with friends and family… I don't need more than that. Now I date girls young enough who think that type of lifestyle is 'cool,' but if I ever want to have a family some day I'll probably have to make some changes.

"I don't want to work 40 hours a week doing the same thing to be insulted with a 3% raise and a pat on the head every year. I don't want to count down the days to the weekend where I punish my liver because my week was so lifeless. I don't want to wait until Saturday to take a book to a coffee shop and lose track of time. In college they should sit you down on your first day and say: 'Ladies and gentleman, your mission in life is to make the days of the week irrelevant.' What day is today? I don't know. Days of the week are bar and club names for me now, places I know are good. Sunday: Casa Rosa. Wednesday: Casa da Matriz. Thursday: Democratica. Saturday: Rio Scenarium. I feel like I've made it because I don't care what day it is.

"Americans are lazy but they're not. When it comes to money they'll work like fucking mules. You'll never see someone put in as many hours as an American, kiss ass like an American. They'll do anything to make that extra dollar to get that plasma television or dine in some frou-frou restaurant that got a good review by some idiot on the internet. They'll grin and take it in the ass when the boss asks them to stay in on Saturday morning a month before performance reviews are due. They will work and barely complain when you tell them they can't take a long vacation. Hell, even if you give them a lot of time off they wouldn't know what to do with it. They'll take a trip to the Caribbean or some pre-programmed cruise to be trapped with a bunch of whales, one handshake from projectile diarrhea.

"When it comes to anything else Americans don't want to lift a finger. I mean look at heath care. Americans think it's pills and MRIs. Why aren't many people connecting the dots between the American diet and health care? Americans eat like pigs, look like pigs, get sick with diabetes, heart disease, god knows what else, and then complain that health care is too expensive. Their lifestyle makes it expensive. Don't get me wrong I believe the government should provide free health care for its citizens, but exercising four times a week is my health care. Eating vegetables, cooking all my meals, avoiding junk food, drugs, stress—that's my health care. I probably spend more hours a week on my health than on making money. Americans don't cook or simply take care of themselves because they're too tired from making money. They want to pop pills with side effects to keep eating 'comfort' food and sit on their asses. After putting in a tough eight hours or more with the man that's all they have the energy to do.

"And the women… 'I don't need a man. I'm independent. I don't need a man, I got my own money, my own job. I don't need a man.' The result is that an American girl thinks it's weakness to show a man how much she needs him. I don't know if you had a corporate job in Denmark, but dating an American woman is like dealing with coworkers. They're very careful with what they say. Every laugh is meticulously orchestrated—she must've laugh too hard now or you may think she thinks you're funny. Every word's use was analyzed and judged—she mustn't show too much interest because that's weakness. 'Shit I just showed too much interest I have to be cold now—let me make fun of him about something.' I'm lucky I've spent enough time down here to know that that simply isn't real. That's not how women, as in women of the human race, really are. Those American girls are basically programmed to be more distant than their nature. And they wonder why they're so unhappy. Nature is a powerful thing, and you'll always lose when you go against it.

"The other night I went out with this Brazilian girl. Very cute girl, a few years younger than me. It was our second date and we went out to some gringo bar and after our first drink she looks at me and says, 'If you were leaving back to America right now, I'd come with you. I'd take a chance and do it.' Other Brazilian girls have done and said similar 'weak' things, and Colombian girls as well. And that's real, because the nature of a woman is she needs a man. These girls here understand that. They don't hide it, and I don't punish them for it. A girl that knows she needs a man, that that's the point of her existence, will treat men very well. She'll pleasure him, make him happy, hold onto him a little tighter at night. You think an American girl will ever say something like that?! If I tell an American girl some of the things that the girls down here have said to me, she'll be shocked, 'But but that goes against the book! They're showing too much interest! They're showing weakness!'

"You remember that American girl I brought back a couple weeks ago? Okay I know I'm in Brazil and fucking an American girl looks bad, but truth is American girls have become perfectly designed for easy, meaningless sex. It's like one step above jerking off… no emotions, just business—like getting with a prostitute. It takes just three hours to get them in bed, and you're fucking her for the first time and she says cunt this, cock that, like she's in a porno movie, because she watches that too. I just met the bitch and she's moaning that she likes how much I'm beating her pussy up! Look that's fun, like how jerking off with your left hand is fun, but it's not normal. A normal girl will be quiet the first time, will be self-conscious, will wonder if she's pleasing you properly or not.

"The Western culture has broken the women. A girl wakes up and she's 30 and has no man and no hope for a man, yet she already passed on several who didn't give her the tinglies or butterflies in her stomach or whatever the fuck term she uses. Because of course the culture gave them this sense of entitlement as well, to think that with mediocre looks and ten extra pounds they can get a hot stud like they see in the magazines in line at the grocery store. And then they get old and have to compete with younger and prettier girls. They can't win. They won't. So what do they do? They throw themselves on young guys who still value older women as 'experienced' and 'mature.' But those guys age and get a clue, and then you see the woman going on 40, working hard at the gym, desperately trying to fight the sag, bragging that she fucked this college guy. What a miserable existence.

"My parents aren't American but in the end I'm a product of that culture and it takes a lot of time and effort to fight the programming —to do what nature intended you to do. Unfortunately I think I'll always be tethered to America. My family is there and I can't even talk to my mom on the phone without her guilting me into coming back and taking care of her, even though she doesn't need taken care of. I don't know… I'm going to go back and the first month is going to be great with my family, and my friends, and then after that they'll be nothing for me. I don't fit in there, and I don't exactly fit in anywhere else either. What am I going to do in the States—get an American girlfriend? Get a 9-5? Fuck that. I don't know what I'm going to do."

Stop Being Needy

January 19, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

"Apparently, he was not totally ignorant of one of life's great secrets: women don't look for handsome men, they look for men with beautiful women. Having an ugly mistress is therefore a fatal error."
—The Book Of Laughter & Forgetting by Milan Kundera

Not being needy is important because it shows girls you're already getting what you, well, need. Girls want sex from men who are already getting sex. Despite every girl's protest to the contrary, the more partners you've had the better, because each vagina you've demolished acts as a seal of approval of your worthiness. What better way for a girl to screen out new dick by finding out many other girls lined up to take a ride on it?

The reason I know this is fact and not mere conjecture is the large number of girls I've banged who knew about my blog beforehand. If you ask these girls a straight-forward question about sleeping with a guy who has had many partners, 100% would say they hate it, it's gross, the AIDS, etc., but yet they have done it with me, and I'm certain I'm not the only "exception." Even girls who have found out about my blog after having sex end up returning for seconds. In fact it's a guarantee she'll come back, even flying internationally to do so, because now she experiences a self-esteem boost knowing that she's fucking a guy who is successful with women.

End conversations early. Cancel dates. Be late. Appear disinterested. Don't lean in. Stop trying to kiss her all the time. Don't tell her when you'll contact her. Don't say you've been in love. Don't talk longingly about your exes. Don't console her. Take days to call her back after first time sex. Don't ask for her opinions. Be insensitive.

All these behaviors show you're not needy, that you don't give a fuck. They convey to the girl that you can get away with doing these things because you're probably already banging and she better shape up if she wants her vagina to be demolished as well. There's no shortcut to this: you can't just tell a girl you've fucked a lot of girls and expect her to be turned on. Insinuate instead, and be rewarded handsomely.

When you're in a foreign country and unable to communicate perfectly with words, or cultural differences make it hard to show value or humor, not being needy will be the cornerstone of your game.

She Used To Be A Different Girl

January 21, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following is a guest post by my partner-in-crime Virgle Kent.

Man, on Monday I haven't seen that much heat on this blog since I told a hipster chick that the band Grizzly Bear was slightly overrated—that one didn't end well. Roosh wrote something about American women not showing enough interest when it comes to needing men and how the western culture has broken them, and I'm just paraphrasing there but for some reason this got me thinking on my normal chicken and the egg thought process of game and gaming. Now just follow me for a second.

Let's say you spit game to a pretty girl and she's very receptive, touching, laughing at all your jokes and at the end she gives you her number. You call in a couple of days and she picks up on the first couple of rings (yes this is DC, shut it). After quick conversation you set up the date and she shows up without flaking or even being "fake late" (yes, still in DC). The date ends with a make out and by date two she let's you hit (I'm sorry DC, "Beat the pussy up"). Now after that nothing really changes, she hits you right back when you text, picks up phone calls or calls back as soon as she's available, and sticks with plans. If you want a relationship she's down, but not too pushy about it. My question is if you had a girl who knew how to "act right" in public or when you're alone, and was generally a nice girl, would you still use as much game on her as you do with other girls?

By now if you've been hitting the DC streets you already know what's up, you know the truth is that game works best on bitter women who believe that game can't work on them. The jaded ones who've survived and been through oh so much are too wise to fall for silly alpha lines as they've developed anti-game to combat your game. These women are the ones who are serially pumped and dumped. Since women like this are too messed up to have relationships with once you're anti-game radar goes off, go for the notch and be out faster than Snooki's vagina when a Tiesto beat comes on (what is that beef jerky).

Although we could blame Western culture on the bitter girl who chose the pursuit of career, education and weight gain over not settling with a reasonable guy early, understand that the first girl who responded well to all your advances without putting up much of a front is the same girl at one who is ice cold and jaded—they are just at different times in their lives.

Guys get so used to running game all the time that it almost becomes a dating crutch. A script we follow down to the exact detail. If you overgame a girl who is open and already into you you're just making it harder for the next guy that comes along after you because now he's going to have to game her twice as hard. It compounds and builds and by the end she hates herself for liking guys like you. Gaming never really goes away but I do think there are certain times it's not needed as much as one thinks.

This does remind me of this one time last year back when Roosh was being stalked by this psycho poetry chick that wrote a Valerie Solanas type S.C.U.M Manifesto. At Brazilian night on a Thursday I met one of her girls—she had an Israeli vibe going on and a phatty you could see from the front. I got her phone number and the next night she invited me to stop by her coffee shop where she would be working. She brings up Roosh and goes on to start talking all this shit about him. "That guy is such an asshole, he's so pathetic, all that game shit doesn't work, no real girl would give him the time of day, what a loser, blah blah blah blah." By then she already knew about his blog from poetry girl.

I sat quietly and let her run her mouth for a minute or two enjoying my free food until I smiled and asked how long she's worked at this coffee shop. She said a couple of years. I asked if she was working here sometime back last Spring and she said yes. I told her I remembered her because Roosh and I used to come in on Saturdays and sit in her section to get some work done. The reason I remembered was because Roosh flirted with her and got her number using standard waitress game, with lines he had used many times before. Her face turned bright red as she had honestly forgot and she was so genuinely embarrassed she begged for me not to mention anything back to Roosh.

There's a lesson in that one somewhere.

Anti-Flake Defense Move For Flakey College Girls

January 24, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In Medellin I was the old guy on campus. Even when I wasn't taking classes I'd go there on certain afternoons to study Spanish and hit on girls. Some American women may say that's disgusting and pathetic, and who knows maybe it is (laugh), but I can assure you there is nothing disgusting or pathetic about slamming a college girl that looks 16-years-old.

I want to talk about how to deal with the intense, sometimes brutal flakiness that college girls put out when trying to get them out on a date. This post isn't about meeting them because it's just as easy as any other girl, perhaps easier because of their bubbly and free-spirited nature.

I've only dated a couple college girls in the States as an adult, and sure they were unreliable, but the flakiness exhibited by Colombian college girls (and Colombian girls in general) exceeded anything I've ever seen in my life. I became so accustomed to it that even if I had a date I proceeded as if I didn't. There was a 50% chance the girls would either cut off all contact on the day of the date or send a cancellation text message a few minutes before it was supposed to start—and that's if you're lucky (I've had guys tell me the girls didn't cancel until they were already waiting at the bar). Days go by after the cancellation until they tell you a laughable excuse on MSN Messenger.

I've tried to work many different angles. Being patient with the girl doesn't work. If you accept getting flaked she will just flake on you again (this one girl got me three fucking times). Being aggressive doesn't work. You look desperate and scare the girl off. Being angry doesn't work either, because why should a girl care if you, some guy she hasn't even made out with yet, gets mad at her flakiness? There is only one option left: fighting fire with fire. You must be flakey yourself.

You don't want to use the fire strategy on a college girl who isn't a flake, so it's best you get flaked on a lot to be able to identify the flake's unique characteristics. But let me get you started: generally speaking if the college girl is hot and has a large social circle then she's a flake. If she is a no greater than cute and has few friends, then she probably isn't.

Now set a date like you normally would by asking her for a drink a day or two in advance. If she agrees, tell her you will call her that afternoon to set a time but are thinking around 9pm, for example. Then when the day of the date rolls around, simply don't call or text her.

If she attempts to call or text you towards the evening that means she got anxious about going out with you and wants to ask if the date is still on for the night. Pick up the phone or text her back and set up the time as usual. (If she contacts you way early in the afternoon then it's to cancel—don't respond.)

If she doesn't call or text you, that means she didn't give a shit about you enough to see if the date was on or not. Bummer.

Only do this with flakes! This is a technique you don't want to introduce to a girl who is going along with the river's current, as it may fuck things up.

For flakes you need to put out a strong "I don't give a shit" vibe, and nothing does that more than simply not confirming a date when you said you would. It's by no means foolproof, and doesn't prevent a premeditated flake, but it's the best available tool I have come up with that hits her with the right aloof vibe while making her do at least some of the work.

The Guido With The Best Game On Jersey Shore

January 27, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Jersey Shore is a brilliant anthropological look at modern game because it puts together a bunch of shallow, horny people who love to go out and hook up. Compare this to the typical Real World snoozefest where you have more "balanced" characters like the emo doofus who couldn't pick up a girl if his life depended on it and the angry black man who is more interested in debating than getting laid.

I would like to rate the game of the four guys who are on the show, from worst to best.

4. Vinny

This guy added very little value. No one hated him, no one loved him, and he merely existed to make an occasional comment that got token laughter, feeding off the others instead of getting his own vibe pushed into the storyline. His energy wasn't bad and I actually didn't mind his fist pumps in the club but he never seemed to make a play on any decent girl. The first girl he hooked up with was his boss' girl and then he tried to go for his roommate's sister. This is what guys with no game do—shit where they eat. And then his Atlantic City bitch gets embarrassingly ganked by Mike, who shouldn't be faulted for it because he knew like I knew that Vinny had zero hope of sealing the deal. His main purpose is to fill up space.

Bottom Line: Vinny has no game. He needs to take a workshop or something, but then again he's only 21. I'm sure he'll be fine in a few years.

3. Ronnie

Ronnie was almost as boring as Vinny. He lacked Mike's charm and wit and was always logical, complaining about nonsense or calling out someone for trivial matters instead of playing the diplomat. His cackle laugh is obnoxious and fake but he does have the ability to crack a decent joke every now and then. The basic strategy of his game is to show up looking "fresh," do that crunk dance he learned from watching Rize, and then not open his mouth too much.

Most of the work in getting laid for him is indeed his muscles and hair. This was obvious when Sammi repeatedly said how "hot" he was, and initially with her it wasn't his personality that did the heavy lifting. His energy in the club is good with his dance moves and because he's laid back without showing too much interest I'm pretty sure he has banged a few girls in the past.

Unfortunately there is heavy degradation to his game once he gets into a relationship. He kept saying gag-on-a-spoon things stitched together from bad movies like, "I thought the shore was the best thing to happen to me….. but you are," and "I don't know what it is about you, but I could kiss you all day." But since these dumb lines come after sex, I wonder how much it really affects his pussy-getting ability.

Even though I'm sure Ronnie would demolish me in a fight, he came across as a needy little bitch, chasing around Sammi who's only somewhat decent after fixing herself up for three hours. She had the ham arms, a lackluster buddy, and the most annoying personality on the show.

Bottom Line: His game is only looks, and with that he can only get stupid girls who are less pretty than he is handsome.

2. Pauly D

Pauly has the elements of tight game simmering somewhere underneath. There is no reason he shouldn't pull every night but frankly he was unable to live up to his potential. He needs to look alive, lower his standards a bit, and approach more instead of waiting for Mike to get shit going. In fact for most of the show he basically rode Mike's coattails. Otherwise he's cool, aloof, knows how to dance, has interesting hobbies to bring up in conversation, and is cocky but not too cocky where it borders on caricature like Mike. These selected Pauly quotes reveal that his mind is in the right place:

"I'm just trying to roll with it."

"I have a game plan… I don't want to waste my time."

"My girl was fucking busted… I was just trying to go with the flow."

His constant talk about high standards is probably bullshit because he did put in a significant amount of time into the Israeli girl who was mediocre at best. I find that guys who constantly harp on standards usually use it as an excuse to not approach, as you always see them later with average girls. Mike has lower standards but with the sheer quantity of girls he's getting with it's a guarantee that a hot girl will slip into the rotation every now and then.

One important thing Pauly needs to do is be more persistent. He had J-Wow on his bed peeping at his cock but he didn't even try to get her shirt off or play with her boobs. I know she had a boyfriend at the time and probably wouldn't fuck them that night, but his chill vibe may be a little too chill, and he needs to give a damn when it's time to close the deal.

Bottom Line: Pauly has the right mindset and some good moves but he needs to step up in order to realize his true potential.

1. Mike "The Situation"

You gotta admit that Mike has personality and charm. Sure he's cheesy and over-the-top, but behind his outrageous cockiness there is a wink and a nod that it's a tough guy act and he's an alright cat behind that. Now while he is very good at building attraction, it's obvious that he has a tough time closing the deal. One of the reasons it that he was way too obsessed with that fucking jacuzzi. Bro you use the jacuzzi to get them to your house but once there say it's broken. Man has gotten laid well before the jacuzzi and will continue to do so if jacuzzis cease to exist. There was also the big late-game mistake he made when he ordered greasy pizza with the sluts he brought home, an amateur move usually played by guys who just graduated from college.

For some reason he counts his chickens before they hatch, having a "I'll fuck her when I want" mindset that obviously doesn't work. Still, I think he has the right attitude with girls that he just wants to sleep with as he even admitted many times that it's a numbers game. He probably did get rejected the most on the show (let's give him a pass on that embarrassing bitterness business with Sammi), but then again he kissed the most girls and had the most bangs. In the end it's the results that matter as there are no style points in fucking.

The fact that he banged that cute girl raw dog in the jacuzzi should leave no doubt that he's a true player. Gotta get that notch no matter what!

Bottom Line: Mike is charismatic, fun, and has the right game mindset, though he could tighten up his deal-sealing technique. Despite his gay stripper vibe he was the most consistent and therefore has the best game.

Note how the guys had a "whatever" attitude towards phone numbers. They're all about the same night and if you want to fuck a lot of girls then that's how it's done.

One of the reasons I enjoyed this show is because it reminded me of how Virgle Kent and I run game in D.C. While the background and people are different, the elements are the same: same-night pulls, grenade jumping, street game, muscles, random make-outs, alcohol-fueled drama, fights, stalking, cockblocking, and so on. I especially enjoyed the scenes where the guys extracted girls back to the house because it's there I could identify a lot of mistakes they were making when it came time to close, a couple of which I mentioned above.

In a bar you can have a dozen girls thinking about banging you but if you don't have a plan to ease just one away from the friends into a bedroom then you won't get a lot of bangs. The first part of learning game is about building attraction, but then you have to master logistics, of being persistent and cool in herding her to the bedroom. Otherwise you'll just have a stack of phone numbers.

For the most part the guys on the show have the attraction part nailed, but it's the logistics that cost them quite a few notches. Divide and conquer, isolate and bang. When building attraction becomes automatic for you, the game becomes one of timing and logistics.

Brazilian Women Understand How Attraction Works (Part 2 of 2)

February 4, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY: Part One

Fast forward three days later. The memory of the Mexican girl is fading and I'm in my top bunk trying to get over a bad cold when a Brazilian girl checks in.

I thoroughly checked her out while she was bending over to store her things and deemed her nothing special. The Mexican girl had a better overall face and body, but of course the Brazilian had a better ass.

I found out later that night she doesn't speak any English, so I took it as an opportunity to practice my Portuguese. She was nice and allowed me to mangle her language while correcting my horrible pronunciation, and since so few gringos speak Portuguese I earned 1,000 bonus points for being able to communicate in her native tongue. During our conversation I concluded that her appearance was homely but not ugly—she was simply a plain girl you'd see anywhere, not worth a second look if you caught sight of her on the street.

While we talked I noticed she had a peculiar stare. She'd squint her eyes ever so slightly and part her lips just a hair, a sensual look you'd expect during intimacy and not in a casual conversation. I like to think this was an unconscious gesture on her part and not something to "game" me, but then again at some point in her life she must've realized that it has an effect on real men.

She asked me if I was going out and I told her I was going to be a loser and stay in, as the next day I was meeting an old flame and wanted to be as vigorous as possible for the sex that would likely ensue. She then began to get ready, and like a caterpillar morphing into a butterfly, she literally transformed.

First she showered her body. Her hair stayed dry in it's already perfect state, long to the small of her back, soft and feathery like you'd see in a Pantene Pro-V shampoo commercial. After changing in a short black dress that came halfway up her thighs, she escaped to the bathroom with a brush and returned ten minutes later, suggesting that hair like hers is no trivial matter to maintain. I don't think she'll ever get an ugly bob cut like an American girl, who works forty hours a week pushing papers that contribute nothing to the progress of the world but is too lazy to spend a few extra minutes a day on her hair.

She then got out her compact and began applying makeup. She put on a dark rouge to stand out against her olive skin, glossy lipstick to match, and thick eyeliner which made her eyes look twice as big. You can imagine what that did to her stare and it's here I noticed that my breathing picked up in speed. She slipped into five-inch heels that highlighted her freshly painted toenails, a bold orange color that matched her fingernails, so fresh in appearance it had to have been done just a day or two prior. I really have no idea how she could walk in those heels but she made it look effortless, like she practiced often starting from a young age. If they killed her feet I doubt she would let a man know.

(Speaking of heels, not once have I seen a Brazilian girl take off her heels and then put on sneakers for the bus or subway ride home after work. It's because they don't do things that purposefully make them look like an idiot. If you can't wear attractive footwear because they hurt your feet or are hard to walk in, then maybe you should get a stay-at-home job instead of embarrassing yourself in public. Either do it right or don't do it at all.)

She walked in and out of the dorm room to the bathroom, and the girl I witnessed earlier in the day was gone, replaced by this sexual creature I'd do all that I could to bang. I'd happily spend hours in the club with her, dancing, touching, and drinking for a chance to violate her body. I believe any man would. While her genetic appearance was only average, she has figured out that by maximizing her look she can gain the attentions of men like myself who resist chasing average women. It's true that my interest may not carry over after sex, but at least she has a chance at hooking a man, for a woman who can't even get sexual attention is already dead in the water. Tight game for men is words and a cocky attitude, while for women it's looks and a playful attitude. I don't know why this is so hard for Westerners to understand.

The Brazilian girl didn't leave right away—she had to wait for a friend who was staying in the bunk above hers to return. She sat down on her bed and then very slowly and deliberately started putting lotion on her long legs. They did not have mosquito bites or mountain bike bruises and cuts like the gringas in the dorm next door. By now I've already run out of my good Portuguese and had nothing more to say, frustrating to a man who in English can talk to a wall for five hours nonstop without interruption.

She's stroking her legs and I'm catching this from the corner of my eye, rubbing my beard roughly at the torture I was witnessing. Then she does the inexplicable: she lays down on her bed while dangling her legs and feet (heels still on) over the bunk's wooden ledge. Her dress snaked down to the very top of her thigh where it meets with her body and only two more inches until her vagina would be in plain view. Her hair is splayed across the bed and she's inspecting her finger nails and it got too hot for me so I stopped out for a couple minutes to get some air. She left soon after.

The next day she looked average again but I saw her differently. Loose jeans covered her body but I didn't forget the ass in the black skirt that bent over to retrieve feminine hygiene products from the locker. She had a plain t-shirt on but I didn't forget the way her back curves into the meaty part of her hips. Her hair was up in a bun but I could still pick apart its thickness and length. My attraction for her didn't decrease because I knew in a couple hours time she'd transform back to what aroused me.

Here's a business idea for a Brazilian woman out there: write a book called "Why Brazilian Women Get All The Men," in the spirit of "French Women Don't Get Fat." Teach Western girls to look their best at all times, to know how to maintain eye contact with a man, how to move, how to properly laugh at a man's jokes, and how to exercise the ass. An entire chapter must be dedicated to ass exercises. Teach them to forget about being witty or snarky or funny or “intelligent,” as those things decrease attraction instead of increasing it. Teach them well so that when I go to an American bar I don’t see average girls with chipped nail polish, flip flops, masculine movements, and a generally sloppy appearance—I see a sexual creature that I want to get to know, possibly for more than one night.

When BOPE Invaded My Favela

February 7, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

View from my kitchen

I live on the edge of Favela Dona Marta, a "pacified" slum where police operations two years ago have removed all drug gangs. There is a police outpost inside the favela and also one right outside, and it's not uncommon to see them traveling to and from the posts with guns drawn. Once I saw a officer walking alone with a gun in each hand as if he's seen too many Hollywood action movies, but not once did I hear a single gunshot for the first six weeks I lived there.

One night I was trying to fall asleep around 3am when an explosion went off. It seemed similar to the fireworks that the teenage boys usually set off so I thought little of it and went to sleep.

Six hours later I woke up to the sound of a helicopter circling overhead. I've seen helicopters before but it was so close to the ground that it felt like something out of a Vietnam war movie. The blades made a very intimidating and ominous sound, suggesting that any attempt at escape would be impossible. I looked outside my window and saw a black helicopter with the word "Policia" written on the side. It climbed up the hill and then there was a quick burst of gunfire followed by small explosions that created big balls of smoke. Then silence.

On the other side of my window in front of the building there was a tank with the BOPE insignia and fifty officers mingling nearby with their M-16 rifles. BOPE is the elite special forces of Rio that is basically a war arm of the police. They get called for special protection missions and also to extract suspected gang members. They're so efficient at killing people, including innocents, that human rights organizations have complained about their "shoot first, ask questions later" policy and alleged use of torture during interrogations. Basically if BOPE gets called there will be loss of human life.

A plains-clothes man with shorts and a wife beater seemed to be directing the officers. He had a walkie-talkie in his hand. Maybe an informant? Then the helicopter began firing again. The soldiers started up the tank, made a terrifying war cry, and started running up the hill behind it. The helicopter continued to circle overhead. Here's the exciting footage I managed to catch before I hid in my closet and curled into a fetal position:

The guys came back down, regrouped, and then went in again an hour later. I didn't understand why they repeated the same procedure. Was it a training exercise or an enemy they simply could not take out? I got a little excited about living in the middle of an urban combat zone and imagined how many panties I'd make wet by the telling of this story if I somehow survived. Then my Brazilian roommate came home and I asked him what the fuck was going on. "Oh, they're filming a movie."

Damn.

I wasn't the only person who missed the memo as there was a big dustup about everyone thinking it was the real thing.

For the next day I heard the sound of helicopters everywhere. My ceiling fan was a helicopter. The running shower was a helicopter. The airplane flying overhead was a helicopter. And when I thought of the helicopter I thought of gunfire. I now have a better understanding now of how post-traumatic stress syndrome works. If I am exposed to the brutalities of war for an extended period of time I'm certain I would be permanently damaged. Someone slammed a car door… fire in the hole!

Turns out they were filming Tropa Elite 2, a follow-up to an excellent movie. "I saw the filming of Tropa de Elite 2 because it was right outside my place." I'll take it. At the end of the shoot they took a crew picture right in front of my gate. My humble shack is famous.

POSTSCRIPT: I got body searched by the regular cops two nights ago while walking home (second time it's happened to me in Brazil). It included a very rough crotch inspection. As much talk as there is about America being Big Brother, I've never been searched in the States. On the bright side, Brazilians don't have tazers—if you give them lip they merely beat you with batons.

Going For Sex Early

February 9, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here's an excerpt from Bang:

> It took me some time to get comfortable with venue changing to her place or mine. I used to think not enough trust was established and there was no way she'll let a strange guy she just met a couple hours ago take her somewhere alone, that I probably was going to murder or rape her. But this isn't the case—if the girl thinks you are a murderer or rapist she won't spend time talking to you. When a girl declines a venue change, it's either because of logistics or because she doesn't want to appear as a slut. The girls who do get turned off by your one night stand attempt are the ones who would take a long time to get into bed anyway. The attempt screens out those girls who aren't serious about sex. Plus, having a sexual intent by using physical touching and the desire to isolate makes it clear that friendship is not in the cards. She will just walk away from you before settling into a friendship, which you are not interested in. Going for sex early is win-win: if she submits to your moves then you get laid, and if not then you can move onto the next girl without wasting valuable time.

Some of you are thinking that by only going for easy girls I'm screening out "good" girls who are worth more investment. I'd believe you but I already tried that—I tried going slow on girls I thought were more valuable than the rest, but it rarely worked out in my favor. I was either putting way too much work in it for little back, the interaction would end before I got sex, or the girl wasn't as valuable as I initially thought.

I have much more patience with Colombian and Brazilian women because with them I'm rewarded for waiting a date or two longer. Our connection gets deeper, the intimacy is better, and generally I feel like the relationship is more healthy and not primarily based on sex. For some reason that type of patient mindset doesn't serve me well with American girls. It's better I just hit and quit with them, enjoying the quick casual relationship while fantasizing about a "real" relationship with a women who is more suitable for type of thing.

Of course there are exceptions and not every American girl is permanently damaged for all eternity, but it seems a lot harder to find relationship prospects in the States than in South America. The odds are simply not in my favor. Going for a relationship with a girl who has had a few dozen large cocks before me just doesn't make a lot of sense as I would be paying more for a product that has been at a heavy discount (or free) for so many years before. I could look for many years in America before finding something acceptable, whereby it would take a fraction of the time in a different country.

Bottom line is if she's a whore then treat her like one so you'll at least get yours instead of getting played in the process. And then the time will come where you meet a girl who is more needy with less cock experience. Sure she doesn't talk like a porn star in bed but she’ll genuinely care about you and want to make you happy while overlooking your many flaws. Then you can slow it down and get to know her as a human being. But until you meet that girl, it’s in the best interests of your cock to get sex as fast as possible.

In my book Bang I give advice on how to get the notch quickly, with discussion on venue changing to the bedroom along with specific steps to get past ball-busting resistance. View sample pages here.

How To Cheat On Your Girlfriend Without Getting Caught

February 14, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Over the past year I've been much more open to getting into a relationship with a girl I like, but unfortunately I can't tame the dog inside me that wants to fuck a new girl every other week. So my current game strategy is to get a girl-next-door type who isn't a club rat and treats me well and then return the favor by taking her out, pleasuring her, and caring for her when she has the sniffles. During that time I lie and creep on the side with random girls.

Obviously I don't think cheating on a girlfriend is morally wrong, but I do think it's wrong to bang your girl without a condom and then creep without because you're exposing her to diseases that could create an uncomfortable situation. But besides that I feel very little guilt when I cheat because my main girl will never know. I keep it locked down so tightly that it would take a lottery chance event to get me. The result is I get to fulfill my perverse needs while having something stable with a girl that I care for. That's win-win… unless she finds out. Here's what I do to make sure that doesn't happen:

1. Get started on the right foot. Do not get into that pattern where you must talk on the phone every day. To accomplish this you'll have to state that you need your "space" early in the relationship, that you don't want it to get into that friendly boring zone where you're talking about what time you woke up and what you had for lunch. She'll honor your request but slip and send frequent text messages, which is fine—it's easy to creep with another girl when all you gotta do is send texts.

Also, if you want to actually have the ability to cheat, you need time not only to meet other girls but to take them out on dates. This means you want to get into no more than a twice-a-week date pattern with your girl, one date on the weekday and one on the weekend. Resist her efforts to see you more by saying again you need space and are the loner type that feels smothered easily.

2. Don't give her access to your phone or computer. This is how 90% of guys get caught cheating. They left their phone laying around, unlocked, and the girl finds incriminating text messages. It's easy to brush off female numbers in your phone as old, but not a text message stamped yesterday where you confirmed fresh plans. Either delete the text messages manually before you see her or lock your keypad. Fail to do either and you will get busted eventually, guaranteed. Girls are savvy with cell phones and only need sixty seconds to sift through your messages or call history.

I've caught two girls messing around with my phone. Once I went to go wash my cock after sex and came back with my phone on the floor instead of the nightstand. I guess she panicked when she heard I was finished with washing my cock and threw it on the floor. The other time I spent the night at this Brazilian girl's house and woke up in the morning with all my clothes gone. I walked around her place dazed and naked, wondering if I just got got, and found her sitting on the bathroom toilet going through all my shit.

For your computer, log off your email account when you know she's coming over and then launch a different browser that you never use. While it would take time for her to sift through emails if you slip to the bathroom, girls go straight to the Sent folder to gather evidence. I'm certain that the female species plays dumb with gadgets and computers on purpose so that we leave our things laying around. Also lock down anything else that could get you in trouble like Skype (call history) and the secret pick-up blog you operate.

3. Don't create a lasting impression with her friends. While some guys will argue that a way to win a girl is through her friends, I only find that to be the case with very young girls around college age—once she's in her mid-20's she doesn't seek as much approval from her friends as before. If you're meeting her friends for the first time then show up in an outfit you never wear and also a slightly different hair or beard configuration. You don't need to wear a disguise but appear a little differently.

The reason is that her friends are spies and when you're creeping they may spot you and then immediately rat you out. By looking different and not making an impression, the goal here is they don't recognize you when you're creeping. It also offers a layer of plausible deniability because you can say that you were experimenting with a new look when you met them and they probably confused you for someone else. Furiously deny it was you that they witnessed making out with another girl. You have no other choice, not matter how obvious it was you. Be like the United States government where photo or video evidence is required to pursue torture charges.

4. Do not mix dating venues. You want to have two parallel sets of venues to minimize cross contamination. If you take your girlfriend to the same bar as your creep girls, a bartender or regular may accidentally out you, or tip her off while you're in the bathroom. We all know those don't-date-him girls who's life mission it is to warn other women of cheating men.

5. Don't frequent her regular spots. This doesn't need to be said but there is an exception: when one of her spots is a place you can get laid like a champ.

In Rio there is a club where, as of this writing, I have a 33% bang rate. This means every three times I've went, I banged a girl. There's no way I'm going to stop going to a place like that, but the success I had at this club could easily lead to my doom.

Here's how I have avoided problems: I'd go without telling my girl and for the first hour I'd be diligent about scanning the room for her or her friends. As the night went on, and the chances of her coming was reduced, I'd ramp up my game and start touching girls and going for kisses. If I know my girl likes going to the place at 1am and it's 2:30am and there's no sign of her, I can get sloppy without any fear. Of course I always scan, a pretty paranoid way to mack, but that's what it takes to not get caught cheating.

6. Pick a friend who will be your go-to excuse for why you can't hang out with her. It's best she has met the friend but I've invented guys as well. Be consistent and have him be the excuse whenever you didn't want to hang with her. Examples:

“Friday I’m hanging out with Steve but how about Saturday?”

“Steve wants to go to Sushi on Tuesday night to talk about some girl problems so let’s do movie night on Wednesday.”

“Sorry I didn’t answer I actually hung out with Steve in this lame club and didn’t hear the phone ring.”

Never allow her to join you with Steve, explaining that he doesn’t like being the third wheel. Add that you need guy time to do some male bonding, to talk trash and just be men.

What’s going to happen is she will develop a deep hatred for Steve because she thinks he’s keeping you away from her. That’s not a bad thing because Steve will be the channel for her hate. Feel free to milk this by making it seem like Steve has an influence over you since he’s “cool” and “fun.” Many of my friends in D.C. would use me as their Steve and I can tell you that a dozen girls still hate my guts because of it.

7. Be mindful of when you blow your load. If your girl expects a gallon of cum on her face when you bang, and then this one time have a trickle because you just got done banging another girl, warning signs are going to go off in her head. Therefore regulate your horniness and sperm quantity. If you know it takes two days to recharge after a lengthy sex episode, then allow that much time before banging a mistress and then your girl. This is why when it comes to the weekend I always try to put my girl on Friday. If I bang another girl on Friday then I will show up in her bedroom on Saturday already sated and she will pick up on it.

8. Try to bang your mistresses at their places. You don’t want her to leave something behind like a bobby pin, unique perfume scent, or blood. Also realize that a girl can tell the difference between a strand of her hair that is hers and one that is only 5% different. If you have to bang a mistress in your place then commit yourself to a CSI-like clean sweep afterwards. Do not get lazy at this step. View your room from many different angles, get on your knees, and go sniffing around everywhere. Flush used condoms down the toilet and put the wrappers deep in the kitchen trash can.

9. Construct and rehearse your alibi. Anticipate what questions your girl is going to ask and have simple, quick answers to them. For example say you went out on a Thursday night after telling your girl you’d stay in. You met a girl in the club who bit the hell out of your neck in the heat of passion. You brought her home and she turned out to be a flooder. The sheets were destroyed.

Let’s focus on each aspect of the situation. If she asks why you didn’t answer the phone or call her back, say you wanted to stay in but Steve called and begged you to go out because he’s trying to get this girl that has an ugly friend. So for most of the night you had to talk to a fatty, but you wished you were with her instead. The club was so loud that you didn’t see the call and by the time you noticed it was too late to call back.

Second, the scratch on the back of your neck happened when you were in the kitchen. You left a cabinet door open and when you reached down to pick something up off the floor, you come back up right under it and caught your neck. Of course you will wear a collared shirt to cover it up and prevent her discovery, but if you never wear collared shirts around her then she will be even more suspicious if she catches the scratch. If you have a sister and can borrow her makeup this may also be a good play, or just go to the nearest department store's cosmetic counter. I'm not joking.

Third, the sheets. In America you can do a wash and dry load quickly, but in countries without a dryer it has to hang for quite a while. If she insists on coming in during the late afternoon before it dries, say how mad you are at the maid for dicking around and always coming in on the wrong days.

You've closed the gaps. Otherwise it would be a very damaging situation. While subconsciously she will know something is going on and be moody and testy, consciously she will accept your airtight alibi and things can proceed as normal.

10. Don't let guilt change your routine. After a successful creep you'll probably feel guilty for cheating on such a nice girl. You'll then feel compelled to make a surprise phone call, be more affectionate or loving, or even buy her something small like a chocolate truffle or rose. Resist this urge and proceed with your normal routine because girls can sense when you're doing something out of the ordinary. She'll know that you are trying to relieve your guilt, and while she may not automatically assume it's from cheating, she'll know you did something wrong.

When you get good at cheating, you also get good at identifying cheating along with the precursors of cheating, like when she meets another guy that she's attracted to. In due time you'll be able to piece together storylines. For example let's take a look at this following hypothetical situation:

Friday: Your Brazilian girl texts you from a party, says there are "a lot of gringos." Stays there late.

Saturday: You send her a text at 6pm but she waits three hours before replying that she was "sleeping."

Following Friday: She says she'll be busy Saturday, but doesn't say with whom. Even though it's easier to say "I'm going out with Stevie," some girls have trouble lying.

Saturday night: She says she is free.

Likely Story: She met a gringo on the first Friday and he asked her to a coffee date or drink early Saturday evening. There he told her to keep the following Saturday free but eventually flaked on her. This means she's actively looking for better. Either you step up and offer more of her core needs (without being needy about it of course), or you can say fuck it, get a couple more bangs, and move onto another girl.

Besides concrete evidence like a text message, email, or hair clip, your girl will never have 100% solid proof against you. By being an accomplished liar, avoiding sloppy moves, and covering holes that develop, it becomes very close to impossible for her to catch you. All this so you can have your cake and eat it too. I think it's a good way for a man to live, but if your ass gets caught don't blame me.

Just Keep Going

February 16, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Nothing seems to go right. You've been out eight times the past month and have only gotten two numbers. Neither girl called you back. You don't remember the last time you kissed a girl, fucked a girl. It seems like none of them want to have anything to do with you, and you don't know what you're doing wrong. You're lonely and dying for any sort of female companionship. You think maybe it's not in you to be good with women. You're not good looking enough, funny enough, rich enough, witty enough. Every other guy is better than you, and you wonder if you're ever going to get laid again. You can't even look at couples holding hands in public anymore without feeling depressed. It's Friday night, and you don't even have a friend to go out with.

Take a shower, put on your clothes, hit the bar, and just keep going.

Months ago you started a new business, but it's not doing so well. It's bleeding cash and you're living with your parents, barely surviving. The business refuses to pop. You already sold your car and your main mode of transportation is the bike you had in college over ten years ago. In the rare chance you make it out at night you have no choice but to steal the occasional drink or two because you can't afford your own. You see other guys your age with fancy cars and clothes, and feel ashamed that you have to watch every dollar and cook ramen noodles five times a week. A friend hands you a beaten-up book on sales, one of your biggest business weaknesses.

Crack open the book, take notes, write out a plan, and just keep going.

For a year you planned out this grand voyage around the world, but you've been dealt hardship, illness, and stupid problems one after the other. It seems like you're bedridden half the time and the love you thought you had for experiencing exotic places has been replaced by constant thoughts of returning home. You're unable to communicate with the natives and are having trouble making friends. Cultural differences are greater then you had imagined and you're tired of being ripped off by everyone who sees you as nothing more than a wallet. Everyone back at home seems to be having a better time than you, and now you have doubts about your decision. But you know how lucky you are for being able to do what you're doing, and a fellow traveler told you about a city somewhat nearby that has the things you're looking for.

Pack your bags, go to the train station, and just keep going.

Until you think you're putting your life in danger, just keep going. Until you have proved to yourself that you are stronger than everyone else who has attempted what you're attempting, just keep going. Until your being is completely shattered and you're on the verge of an emotional breakdown, just keep going. Until you've reached your absolute physical, human limit, until you've squeezed every drop of value out of the fruit you're chasing, and until you are certain without a single doubt in the universe that absolutely nothing positive or worthy can come from what you're doing, just keep going.

Do not stop. Just keep going.

My System To Learning A Foreign Language

February 18, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

One thing I noticed with learning Spanish is that if I use a new word once or twice in a real conversation, it sticks in my head for months. Even simple words I've memorized like "church" or "bucket" fade from memory since I never use them.

So that got me thinking about the most effective way to learn a language, and I stumbled on something that has worked for me in Portuguese.

First, only learn words that you frequently use in your native language.

If you're studying a resource and it has a word that you haven't used in English during the past month, don't even bother writing it down. The most effortless way to learn a language is to only study words that you will use soon in conversation because that helps commit it to memory. If you're not exposing yourself to what you're studying then it will never stick.

With Portuguese I first started with 200 basic words that I wrote on notecards. With each notecard I wrote the English version on one side and the Portuguese on the other. I studied by looking at the English word and then guessing the Portuguese word. This is what I have been doing with Spanish since the beginning, but I did one little extra step with Portuguese that is making a big difference: I made up a sentence using that word.

Let's do an example with the Portuguese word for person, which is "pessoa."

What is a common sentence I use with that word? Well many times I've been in a bar or club that was slow, so I've said, "There aren't a lot of people here tonight."

I know how to say "there," "a lot" and "people," but let's pretend I don't know the word "tonight." I look that up and find out it's "esta noite." I write that down on its own card.

The next day I get to the "noite" card and then make another sentence I might use. How about: "Where is a good club to go out at night?" I don't know how to say "club" so I look that up and the next day make another sentence which leads to another new word and another new sentence. Do you see how this works? I'm learning the language in my own words. And since I'll soon use all these new words I can toss them from my notecard stack after a few days to continually add new ones.

When I'm talking in Portuguese and there is a word I wanted to say but couldn't, I write that word down right then and there and look it up later, because I know it's a word I'm going to use. One night months ago a Brazilian was complaining about how some gringos didn't want to pay a $3 bar cover and I was dying to say "Some of them are cheap" but I didn't know how to say "cheap." So I looked it up when I got home and it was etched in my brain ready to use the following night.

The system in a nutshell:

1. Grab basic language resources that teach you the structure of the language and initial words you must know. I recommend a verb book, dictionary, grammar book, and the Pimsleur audio course. Start with the audio course and only move to the books once you get the basic pronunciation down.

2. Make notecards that focus on words you use in your own language. Make up a new sentence on-the-fly for each word.

3. Carry pen and paper everywhere (or have a smartphone) and write down words you wanted to use. Consult a dictionary but also ask locals to nail the pronunciation. You must do this because in just an hour or two you will forget all the words you wanted to look up.

4. Commit for 90 minutes a day. It's a myth to think you'll "pick up" the language enough to be conversational in a reasonable amount of time. Unless you're 5-years-old it's not going to happen quickly without study.

Study the language in your own words, then go out every day to practice what you learned on the local women. In just a couple months you'll be able to have basic conversations and communicate a good portion of what you want to say, including your game translated from English.

After that you'll hit a wall when going from having conversational skill to being proficient, a place where I'm stuck in with both Spanish and Portuguese. Maybe I'll have some advice about that in the future.

The Super-Aggressive Game Of Brazilian Guys

February 21, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Brazilian game as told to me by a Brazilian guy:

> Alright all you have to do is walk up to her and say 'What's your name?' Then you give the two cheek kisses but make sure you do it nice and close. Then make her laugh a couple times and touch a lot and after that go for the kiss. Just go for it. It may take a couple tries.

You'll find a lot Brazilian guys who say, "Yeah Brazilian girls kiss so fast. It's very easy to kiss them." But it's not necessary because the girls are making fast moves, it's because Brazilian guys go for it incredibly quick (the ones who have game, anyway).

Now I do think Brazilian girls put out an early "kiss me" vibe, but the guys guys definitely don't waste any time. In other words if you're a guy who isn't aggressive with Brazilian girls, you may not automatically come to the conclusion they're fast kissers.

(Now compare that to gringos I see in the hostel talking to some hippie girl for four hours in the patio without even touching her when you know he wants to hit. It's like they're waiting for the girl to be a man and step up.)

The guy who told me his strategy (let's call him Renato) is from Recife, a city in the northeast. Along with three of his other friends, they were kissing a random girl in Pipa every night. One of them kissed a girl who couldn't have been older than 14.

I was floating through a crowd with Renato's friend and approached two Brazilian girls with something casual. It opened and we're each talking to the girls. Lucky for me one of them spoke fluent English, but unfortunately she lost her voice and I could barely understand her. I tried reading her lips but that didn't work so the best I could do was pick out a word here or there and pretend like I understood.

She didn't want to dance, instead preferring to stand right underneath the club speaker, and she also didn't want to move to the quiet, dark alley nearby. She was asking me questions that I couldn't hear so on the surface she seemed interested, but to me the situation seemed rather hopeless.

Eventually I just gave up and stopped talking to her. I deemed this an impossible case. (If she wanted to dance though it would have been relatively easy.) Then Renato moved in. Actually he tried to move in before I was done but I casually blocked him out.

I watched him to see if he would do anything differently. He had her hand on her side, same thing I did, and made her laugh with a couple jokes, which I did as well. But then the frustration on his face became apparent when she tried talking. He kept putting his hands up in the air as if saying, "I can't hear a single fucking thing that's coming out of your mouth!" She declined to dance with him as well. I knew he felt what I did and was about to bow out.

Ah but there would be no post if he did.

He changed tactics and instead of asking her questions and trying to maintain a conversation, he just kept talking nonstop as if reading from a monologue. The things he was saying must've been cocky because she kept playfully hitting him, a sure sign you're on the right track with a girl. Then he went for it. Only three minutes after I stepped aside, he tried to kiss her. She leaned way back to avoid his mouth and he gave a look that said, "Hey, what's wrong?" She strongly shook her head no.

Over the next 15 minutes, Renato went for it at least seven times. It was painful to watch him get rejected again and again, especially when I saw it coming each time. Her body position was permanently set in a way to get ready for the backwards lean and after every rejection he would just make her laugh some more and keep touching to get ready for the next rejection. She didn't walk away from him though, and kept playfully hitting him.

I walked around and when I came back I caught the instant where Renato went in for one more kiss. He grabbed her in a way which made it very difficult for her to move back, almost forcing her but not quite, and this time it worked. They went at it hard and sloppy.

I can't stress how strongly she did not want to kiss him. Her rejections were so brutal, again and again, and if Renato was a close friend of mine I'd tell him to give it up to preserve his dignity.

If you see this type of caveman game you think, "Hmm this seems to be where it's at. I just have to be super aggressive." This is what I thought at first, but I kept watching and hanging out with Brazilian guys on subsequent nights, and the dirty truth is this: Brazilian guys kiss a lot of girls, but they don't get a lot of bangs. Let me demonstrate why this is with an example from the world of book sales.

Say you wrote a book on knitting and was looking to advertise it on some knitting blog. You submit three different advertisements and run them all simultaneously. Here are the ads:

1. "Click here to check out an incredible new knitting book."

2. "Finally! A resource that helps you knit clothing for you and your friends. Click here to learn more."

3. "Click here for dozens of new knitting patterns."

The ads run for a week and each get displayed 100 times. Here are the results:

1. 4 clicks and 2 sales. 50% conversion rate

2. 12 clicks and 3 sales. 25% conversion rate

3. 20 clicks and 1 sale. 5% conversion rate

The problem with the first ad is that it oversells—you're telling people to just buy a book. Not many people will click the ad, but those that do will probably buy it. In the third ad you'll get a lot of clicks from people looking for free knitting patterns but then they'll get turned off when they find out you're selling something. The second ad has the best mix. By saying "resource" you imply this may not be free, so you get clicks from people who are curious about new knitting information and may want to pay for it.

Clicks are kisses and sales are bangs. Very roughly speaking, American guys use ad one and Brazilian guys use ad three.

American guys roll up to a girl and say okay here is my job and my Netflix queue, click here to have sex with me. Many girls say no, but if they eventually do get the kiss chances are they'll have an decent chance of banging.

Brazilian guys roll up to a girl and say "Hey what's up you look pretty tonight" and then bam try to kiss. I'm not exaggerating. Brazilian guys go around certain clubs basically assaulting girls until they find one that submits to relentless pressure. Many times I've seen a guy corner a Brazilian girl and just force her to kiss while she tries to squirm out of it. They get it a lot of time, but of course it doesn't result in a lot of "sales" because kissing alone isn't enough to make a girl want to have sex with you.

The problem with going for the kiss super fast is that is disturbs the bang progression. To get bangs you build attraction over time, punctuating her increasing interest with escalation in the form of personal questions, touching, heavy touching, and then kissing. You're building a storyline that shows your personality but also hints at passionate things to come. You form tension that is begging to be relieved in the bedroom.

Brazilian guys form no storyline, no tension. The whole interaction is about the kiss. And when they get it then the story comes to an early close. I've seen guys get the kiss and then two minutes later they're back with their group of friends. Plus the guys insist on slobbering over the girl's face, leaving very little imagination for increased pleasure that could come later.

But if you were to tell a Brazilian guy to delay the kiss, he'd call you crazy. I believe to them kissing is more important than banging, but to me banging is more important. I'm not going to kiss a girl unless she invests into the interaction by showing interest (asking me questions, reciprocating some touches), because that's what it takes to close the sale.

The ideal time to get the kiss is at the 1 or 2 hour mark, depending on the girl's culture. By then the girl will be invested enough, and the kiss will increase the interaction's energy so that you only need 2-4 more hours to get the bang, assuming she's that "type" of girl. So that's 3 hours or more for the one night stand. (If I haven't gotten the kiss by hour three, then it's unlikely I will get the one night stand.) A downside of this is that you do commit your Friday night or whenever to one girl, but if you're in the business of banging and not just kissing then this is how it's done.

My intention here is not to trash the game of Brazilian guys. Their aggressiveness is admirable and I have picked up a couple small things from them, but no matter how long I stay in Brazil I don't think I'll completely adopt their strategy because the sales data shows they are on the extreme end of the spectrum. Passive Western guys who don't try anything, like the hostel guy I mentioned in the beginning, are at the other end. It's working the middle that will see the most bangs, where you are aggressive but allow the girl to be aggressive as well. Only when she puts in a good bulk of the work will you seal the deal consistently.

Excessive Public Displays Of Affection

February 23, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Lately I've begun to notice how a man's essence is revealed by his public displays of affection. Low status and needy males will do the following to girls they are having sex with:

1. Ache to remain in some type of embrace for the majority of a dinner or bar date. He will not feel comfortable breaking any sort of physical contact, like how a child holds onto her favorite Spongebob Squarepants pillow while asleep.

2. Refuse to check out other women in his surroundings who are painfully more beautiful than his girl. He volunteers to give her his balls for the duration of the relationship and stops being a primal man that wants to fuck the world's women.

3. Goes for more than one kiss, regardless of date length. There is little reason to kiss girls more than once or twice at any public location, unless you haven't banged her yet and are trying to get her horny enough to bang. A needy male feels that if he doesn't constantly kiss his girl, she will lose interest.

4. Leans over the imaginary middle line between himself and his girl for more than 20% of the date. It's better not to hear the girl and simply nod than exhibit weak body language. Most things a girl says aren't important anyway.

5. Lay on a girl with eyes closed, as Roissy eloquently pointed out.

If I can tell you're needy without having to interact with you, then you're making many mistakes that will negatively affect your quality of life. A man will be happier in relationships where not only he has the upper hand but the girl is coming after him for attention and affections. The less you work, the more she will. Otherwise things will always be under her control and you will be in a perpetual state of chasing.

Because let's be real: no relationship is 50/50. Someone will always know in the back of their mind that they run the show. You have absolutely failed as a man if that's not you.

The Thirty-Five Maneuver

February 25, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

You got no girls, no prospects, and absolutely nothing on the horizon that would hint towards future sex. You'd kill for just a measly date to get the ball rolling again. In that case I recommend the Thirty-Five Maneuver, which I've had to pull out in foreign cities. It's an intense burst of activity that can help turn the tide.

The maneuver begins on a Thursday. After you wake up go on an internet dating site and message ten girls. If you're in Latin America then Badoo is a good place to try since it's free.

Then go out on Thursday and do five approaches, either day or night.

Go out on Friday and do ten approaches, either day or night.

Go out on Saturday and do ten approaches, either day or night.

The approaches only count if there is at least some interaction (if she ignores you or tells you to fuck off then it doesn't). I guarantee you that by Monday night you'll at the minimum have a couple phone numbers and a date planned. With fresh prospects you can now build some momentum going into the next weekend.

What I like about this maneuver is that it isn't sustained—give just give one incredible burst of pickup energy and then sit back for a while. It makes sure to take advantage of the weekend where more girls are going to be out, either shopping or drinking.

The downside is that finding girls could be difficult depending on where you are. You may have to dedicate a few hours each day just to hit your quota. Put other things on the back burner while you execute the maneuver because it must have utmost importance in your life at that time. Keep in mind that most men of the world don't even approach 25+ girls in their life, so what you're undertaking will take quite a bit of lifeblood.

I like to bust out the Thirty Five Maneuver when I'm in a new city and want to make something happen quickly. I don't always have time to take it cool and that's why I think this move will be well-suited for guys who are on the road. While I don't like to do the manuever becomes of its inelegance and labor intensity, it has not once failed me.

What Is Real End Game?

February 28, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

In the past I've referred to End Game as a game of no game, where you still play but are not mindful of specific routines or moves. You internalize the correct behavior and by merely existing you spit optimal game.

This explanation is not sufficient for many guys. They want to know when they can stop playing the game completely—when they can sit back, put up their legs, and enjoy the rewards of their game labor. In that case I can say that end game is when you meet a girl you want to have a deep relationship with and commit the rest of your life to.

But is that really end game?

How many guys out there used a bit of game to get a half-ideal bride then threw it all away once the papers were signed to get the cliche once-a-month sex (if they're lucky) from a nagging woman who gained a significant amount of weight? Most guys over 30 know someone in this situation as it's not merely internet lore discussed on message boards and blogs.

When you stop demanding respect and standards from your significant other, how can you possibly expect to get the best of what she can offer you? Once a dog is house trained do you just let it run wild whenever it wants, never punishing it for when you find your favorite socks all torn up? No, you keep your hand firm and demand the dog act in a way that pleases you the most. It's not an accident that dog training and proper wife management share many common elements.

The point of game is to get what you want from women. Therefore when you stop playing the game, and let the stars dictate how she acts towards you, you will stop getting what you want. A very tiny percentage of women in the world are programmed to please you if you're needy and don't have balls, which is unfortunately the case for men who don't use game in today's society, whether they're conscious of it or not. You must be scarce, you must be confident, you must be cocky, you must tease, you must have value, and you must demand respect.

If you think that you can stay in the game for a couple years to get a girlfriend and then be done with it, I'm afraid you're deluded because we've arrived at a point where game is absolutely necessary to deal with the modern woman, just like how today's cubicle dweller must exercise frequently to maintain an attractive weight. By not using game you get lower quality and less sex while the game guys clean up.

A cushy job is no longer enough. A fancy car won't do it. A McMansion won't help you either. The new reality is that you need game to compete with guys who are less attractive than you and who make less money than you. Not learning game is like showing up to a job interview in jeans and a t-shirt while the guy next to you is decked out in a custom suit. Nine times out of ten you won't get the job. Universities offer feminist theory classes—maybe in my time they'll have pickup theory classes as well, because that’s what is currently needed to even the playing ground. Men need the tools that game offers them to achieve their genetic potential in our feminist culture.

The truth is you should never stop playing the game. The moment you stop playing the game is the moment you stop getting what you want. Some years I will play more than others, but I will not throw away principles based on human nature and hacks into today’s woman which allow me to properly get and manage as many women as I can handle. If you want to be happy then you must embrace game. Game is happiness, and end game is death.

Is The Main Reason I'm In South America Because Of Girls?

March 4, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A tough question is when people ask me why I'm in South America. The answer I feel most comfortable with is a three page manifesto, but is it really that complicated?

While the South American way of life in different than in America, my way of life doesn't change much from country to country…

11am: Rise and shine
2pm: Coffee shop to sit in front of laptop for several hours
7pm: Gym, grocery store visit, or various chores
9pm: Cook dinner then jerk around on internet, watch movies, or go out

This is the routine that keeps me productive and happy no matter where I'm at. It's not glamorous but it fits me well, and only a couple parts of it will change in foreign countries. They are:

1. Language. Obviously there are communication issues but to me that's a fun challenge that exercises my brain. Neutral effect.

2. Money. I experience considerable cost savings by living in South America where I have to work much less for a lifestyle of leisure and chasing tail. Positive effect.

3. Family. Our lives are finite and every month I don't spend with them is another month that is basically gone forever, so that does bother me a bit. Negative effect.

4. Coffee shops. In South America you can't really spend four hours after only buying a cup of tea. So I look for corporate places like McCafe and Starbucks where the staff doesn't care. (In Rio the mall in Leblon has comfortable sofas with free internet.) Neutral effect.

5. Grocery stores. They do not have the incredible selection that American stores have. The grocery store nearest me doesn't have broccoli, cauliflower, lemons, and any kind of berry, for example. Negative effect, but honestly my life isn't too different if I can't eat broccoli and strawberries.

6. Going out. The point of going out is to bond with other guys, drink, and get laid. The guys I meet here are more like short-term buddies than the deeper friendships I have at home; the alcohol is more substandard (caipirinha with turpentine cachaça anyone?); and of course the girls are from a different planet.

Is my life different if I'm actively spending time with a South American girl that treats me like a king and is hyper-feminized? Yes, I believe so.

Recently I was at a bar with my Danish roommate and there were three Australian girls around us getting aggressively gamed by four Brazilian guys. During that time they kept looking over. I had a hunch that they wanted us to "save" them.

Next thing we know the girls moved right beside us to where one of them was brushing against my arm.

“Looks like you guys have a fan club,” I said, without any emotion.

“Oh my god these guys won’t leave us alone!”

“Well if you keep talking to them then they’re going to think you like them.” I found it hard to believe that they didn’t understand this simple concept.

“Can you help rid of them for us?”

“You seem like big girls I think you can do it.”

Then the other one looked at me and said, “Don’t be such a big jerk!”

This very brief exchange showed issues that I don’t experience with South American women. First, they’re attention whores that are stringing along other guys just for kicks. Fights between horny drunk guys usually start because of girls like these. Second, they’re testing me to see if I’ll save them within only 15 seconds of talking to them. And third, they’re displaying a snappy attitude that is more suited for debating than romance. Don’t test me or ask me for premature favors and then get an attitude when I don’t bend over backwards for you. These are things I don’t want to deal with.

I looked at the most aggressive of the Brazilian guys and said, “Ela gosta de você… MUITO” while pointing to the girl who told me to stop being a jerk. That roughly means, “She likes you… A LOT.” Sure enough his eyes opened wide and he pursued with renewed vigor that made me quite pleased.

When I get homesick all I have to do are two things.

The first is open my budget spreadsheet to see how much money I’m not spending. The second is talk to Western women. And I’m not kidding—when I get homesick I just hit on gringas at the bar. I zero in on their pasty, flawed skin, their masculine attitudes, their slovenly appearance, their self-entitlement, and I swear to god I’m energized for a month or two before homesick thoughts cross my mind again.

I dislike American women and I can’t live very comfortably Stateside working only 2-3 hours a day. Therefore I’m in South America because of money and women.

Introduction To Epicurean Philosophy

March 8, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY: INTRODUCTION TO BUDDHISM

For my second trip to South America I put 30 books in a duffel bag. One of them was The Essential Epicurus, a collection of works by the Greek philosopher. From Epicurus.net:

> Epicurus (341–270 B.C.) founded one of the major philosophies of ancient Greece, helping to lay the intellectual foundations for modern science and for secular individualism. Many aspects of his thought are still highly relevant some twenty-three centuries after they were first taught in his school in Athens, called "the Garden."
>
> Epicurus's philosophy combines a physics based on an atomistic materialism with a rational hedonistic ethics that emphasizes moderation of desires and cultivation of friendships. His world-view is an optimistic one that stresses that philosophy can liberate one from fears of death and the supernatural, and can teach us how to find happiness in almost any situation. His practical insights into human psychology, as well as his science-friendly world-view, gives Epicureanism great contemporary significance as well as a venerable role in the intellectual development of Western Civilization.

While reading the book I'll admit that I dozed off while going through his explanations on clouds…

> Clouds may be produced and take shape as the result of the compression of air by the forcing together of winds and as the result of the interlacing of atoms that grip one another and are suitable to bringing about this result…

earthquakes…

> Earthquakes may result both from the imprisonment of wind inside the earth, and from the earth's shifting in small masses and its constant movement, which produces the quaking.

and falling stars…

> What are called falling stars may be produced partly by the stars' rubbing against each other and by the falling out of their fragments where a blast of wind occurs…

But I stuck in there and was rewarded in the end was very nice quotes that do provide a blueprint for living. Here are my favorites:

> The man who alleges that he is not yet ready for philosophy or that the time for it has passed him by, is like the man who says that he is either too young or too old for happiness.

For there is nothing dreadful in life for the man who has truly comprehended that there is nothing terrible in not living.

Becoming accustomed, therefore, to simple and not luxurious fare is productive of health and makes humankind resolved to perform the necessary business of life.

[The wise man] thinks that it is preferable to remain prudent and suffer ill fortune than to enjoy good luck while acting foolishly.

No pleasure is evil in itself; but the means of obtaining some pleasures bring in theire wake troubles many times greater than the pleasures.

If every pleasure were [maximized] and existed for a long time throughout the entire organism of its most important parts, pleasures would never differ from one another.

Of all the things that wisdom provides for living one's entire life in happiness, the greatest by far is the possession of friendship.

We do not need the help of our friends so much as the confidence that our friends will help us.

Speaking frankly, I would prefer, when discoursing on nature, to utter useful things, like oracles, to humankind, even if no one should understand them, than to agree with popular opinion and enjoy the constant accolades offered by the crowd.

Some men spend their whole life furnishing for themselves the things proper to life without relaizing that at our birth each of us was poured a mortal brew to drink.

The voice of the flesh cries, "Keep me from hunger, thirst, and cold!" The man who has these sureties and who expects he always will would rival even Zeus for happiness.

The wise man who has accustomed himself to the bare necessities knows how to give rather than to receive. So great is the treasure house of self-sufficiency he has discovered.

There is also a limit to frugality. The man unable to consider this suffers a similar end as the man who indulges in excess.

You ought to do nothing in your life that will make you afraid if it becomes known to your neighbor.

The following method of inquiry must be applied to every desire: What will happen to me if what I long for is accomplished? What will happen if it is not accomplished?

If the gods listened to the prayer of men, all human-kind would quickly perish since they constantly pray for many evils to befall one another.

> No fool is satisfied with what he has, but instead grieves for what he does not possess.
>
> He who is not satisfied with a little, is satisfied with nothing.
>
> Know that what passes for good and evil among the throng if ephermeral, and that wisdom shares nothing in common with fortune.
>
> Many men who acquire wealth do not find deliverance from evils but an exchange of their present evils for greater ones.

My take on his philosophy: peace of mind and confidence can only come from knowledge based on facts, and it's the prudent application of knowledge that leads to a happy, social life where being poor but wise is preferable to being rich and lucky.

You can read his works for free at Epicurus.net.

The Superflag & Language Notch

March 10, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'd like to add two new objective metrics to the ones we already have, which are the notch, the cost per notch, the true cost per notch, and the flag. Let's quickly review those existing metrics.

The notch has existed since the dawn of time and is when a man keep tracks of how many vaginas he has penetrated. It's serves as a quick glance at your game.

The cost per notch (CPN) is when you divide your total dating expenses with the number of girls in that same time period. Here we don't count the cost of picking up like going to the bar and drinking with friends, but we do count dates with girls you took out but didn't eventually bang. You're running weak ass game if your CPN is over $300, and need to push for more one night stands. There was a stretch of six months living in my dad's basement when I got it down to $40.

If you make the assumption that a man's existence is solely to fuck and procreate, which I accept, then all of his expenses should count towards notch attainment. This is called the true cost per notch (tCPN). Take your earnings for the year, substract it by how much you saved, then divide the rest by your notches for that year. A stellar true cost per notch is under $2,500. For a man who takes home $35,000 a year after taxes, that's 14 notches. I have an very low tCPN because my income is also low. I'm on the calorie restriction diet of game.

Finally there's the flag, which is a notch from a girl born in a specific country. I argue that flags show more skill than the mere notch, but not all flags are created equal. A captured Peruvian flag counts less than a flag from Spain or Italy, for example. An American flag has no value because banging an American girl is too easy compared to girls from other countries.

Note that a guy can have a lot of notches, low cost per notch, and a lot of flags but still bang monsters. These don't account for quality, and are therefore used for shits and giggles, self motivation, and friendly competition among friends. In other words don't take these too seriously and always try to fuck hotter girls each year. That said I'd now like to introduce two new metrics:

The Superflag. This is a virgin flag, meaning you banged a virgin from a specific country. Most guys have a virgin flag from their own country, but getting it in another country is incredibly challenging, and nearly impossible while traveling (you need to live abroad to pull this insurmountable feat).

I came up with this metric after I made sweet love to a teenage Colombian virgin.

The Language Notch. This is banging a girl from macking in a foreign language. It's the hardest metric to attain because you need to learn a new language and then adapt your game to it.

Sometimes the hardest part of getting a language notch is finding a girl who doesn't speak English, as this was my problem in Rio until I get lucky and met a girl from the south. After getting the three easiest language notches (English, Portuguese, and Spanish), I'm wondering how the hell I'm going to get more. I'd like to have five before I die, so perhaps one more romance language like Italian and then something impossible like Russian where letters are replaced by alien-like symbols.

I'm going to take a hard stance on the language notch. I can't grant you one if you pick a poor girl from the slums and use mostly sign language to communicate and get the bang. It's yours only if you build attraction in her language, meaning complete sentences (e.g. making her laugh with an intelligent joke, warming her heart with a story, etc.). If you banged her with your laptop opened to Google Translate a few feet away, I'm sorry but I can't sign off on that.

One great thing about language notches is that it improves your skill all around because you master the non-verbal aspects of game like body language and tonality, and you're called upon to get more done while saying less. It's a very reliable indicator of your skill, so much so that if you have at least three langauge notches I ask that you get in touch with me so I can pick your brain a little.

A lot of haters criticize the shallow lifestyle of banging a lot of women, but mostly because of game I speak three languages, and a ton of other guys are learning languages as well to get with foreign women. It's ironic that many guys into game are ten times more cultured and worldly than their feminist cunt haters whose only skill is paper pushing.

Alright to review, here's our collection of objective metrics:

- Notch
- Cost Per Notch
- True Cost Per Notch
- Flag
- Superflag
- Language Notch

In the end the game should be fun, and that's what these metrics are.

Is There A Consistent Way To Build Attraction With Brazilian Girls?

March 14, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Usually if I find that something works I repeat it many times to see if it keeps working, and if it does then I can start developing an optimal game. With Western girls I find that cockiness mixed with humor and teasing will be the most consistent means to have sex with a large number of them. I can roll up into Anycity USA, make a couple witty sarcastic jokes, and have the girl asking me personal questions. I can meet an Australian girl in a hostel, ask what's wrong with her hair, and have her asking about my plans later in the night. I can make oogly eyes with a white South African girl in a bar, tell her I'm a farmer, and get a fun back-and-forth going. Unfortunately this type of game does not work on Brazilian girls.

By my estimates I've probably interacted with 100-150 Brazilian girls in both Brazil and the United States, and my hook up percentage with them is about a third of what I can get with American girls. I tried many angles, like being nice, being direct, being mean, being aggressive, being aloof, being a comedian, being dark and disturbed, etc. and absolutely nothing has worked with any type of consistency that I can share with you. Every time I bang a B girl I feel like luck played a large role.

A big difference is that in America girls will indulge you even if they don't like you off the bat. This is how you can turn the tide with strong game. But in Brazil the girls don't give you the chance if they're not into your look and vibe, which means less opportunity to use classic game to build attraction. If it's not there almost immediately you're pretty much done. On one hand you save time but on the other how can you use brainpower and skill to get what you want?

So then I worked backwards on the set of hooks ups I've already had. Like a statistician I poured over the data to see if anything stood out at me. I'm also in touch with a dozen or so guys who've banged Brazilians and have their experience in the back of my mind as well. From this analysis there was a very clear pattern of B girls who got banged by a gringo…

They already like Westerners. In particular they like the English language and Western culture. They watch American movies and listen to American music. They go to Starbucks and Irish pubs. They have either visited or lived in a Western country. They're at least 24-years-old.

Every Brazilian girl I've slept with has spoken at least passable English, and they enjoyed practicing.

Every Brazilian girl I've slept with has put out strong interest within two minutes of talking to them.

Every Brazilian girl I've slept with has mentioned in passing other gringo "friends," a German guy here, an English girl there. I'm never the first gringo they got to know. Two girls I used to see are currently dating a gringo.

Every Brazilian girl I've slept with has complained about Brazilian men to some degree. They are looking for something different.

Every Brazilian girl I've slept with has been at least 24-years-old. While I have kissed B girls as young as 18, they seem to be more about kissing than fucking. Pursuing a young B girl is generally a waste of time.

I know two guys who have banged a quality B girl who spoke no English and didn't fit the model above, but neither of them could sustain the relationship and make it to bang number three. I think these girls did it more for the novelty of it, not because they genuinely liked gringos.

During my six months in Colombia, I was the first gringo for most of the girls I slept with. For two of the girls I was the first gringo they had ever met, something that has never been the case with Brazilian girls. There I found that hanging out in a place with a lot of gringos generally wasn't a good idea as it killed my exotic status.

In Brazil (at least for Rio) that seems to be the opposite. I actually bomb when I'm in a place that has no gringos, because the girls probably don't care for them. Girls in Brazil know which bars and clubs have gringos, and if they like going there then guess what—they like gringos and it will be easier for you.

If you want to bang a Brazilian in Rio, go to the spots that have gringos first. Being the only gringo in the club is great if you like standing out, but it won't automatically be easier.

There is this one club I do well at. Until recently do you know what I would tell other guys when describing the place? "Yeah music is alright but it has a lot of gringos… sucks." It could be 20% gringos at times! I didn't realize that my complaint was helping me get consistent results there.

I've been to another club four times. There are maybe 2% gringos at the most. I've never hooked up there—not even gotten a measly number—even though it's in a poorer part of town. Here I get blown out most of the time. Girls simply don't give a shit.

There's a guy I knew in Rio who spoke very good Portuguese, something you'd think would increase his chances of banging a lot of Brazilians, but it hasn't done anything of the sort because his ability is merely driving him to girls who don't already like gringos. He has a ton of conversations in Portuguese that go absolutely nowhere. His language skill merely delays the inevitable rejection.

So I have no idea how to bang a Brazilian girl who doesn't speak English or who doesn't already come pre-programmed liking gringos. Your guess is as good as mine. But now when I approach a girl, I ditch after a minute if she's under 24 and she doesn't try to say a few words in English. Otherwise I simply run cool guy game, tell her my story, crack a couple jokes, tease her very gently, and sit back as she'll do most of the work for me. With Western girls I definitely work at building attraction and it may be several minutes in until I "hook" her, but with Brazilian girls if attraction isn't there almost immediately then nothing will happen.

Game in Brazil is more venue selection, persistence, and attractiveness than what you already think of as game. The best advice I can give you before coming to Rio is to hit the gym hard and look your best. Then once down here approach daily.

I really wish I could give you a complete strategy, and maybe I can some day, but until then don’t waste your time gaming Brazilians who are skeptical of gringos.

POSTSCRIPT: Since originally writing this I’ve banged a B girl using only Portuguese. She said I was her first gringo. I believe it was for the novelty because I couldn’t get to the third bang.

Approaching Large Groups Is A Waste Of Time

March 16, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm not a big fan of approaching large groups of four or more people, whether they're only girls or mixed with guys. I honestly can't think of a harder way to pick up a girl. When it comes to big groups I wait until the girl I like isolates herself before making a move.

Mystery invented "group theory" and it was the foundation of his game, but when you look at his appearance and pickup style it's obvious why he was such a fan of it: he looks like a wizard and even performs wizardry. Of course he's going to open the group, and now with his fame I'm sure it's even easier. But for an average guy like myself who doesn't know magic tricks and leaves the tarot cards at home, it's smarter and more efficient to wait.

Three weeks ago I was at the champagne bar with my Danish roommate. It was a Wednesday so there weren't many people, and the girls who showed up were older and on the thickie side.

We're drinking and I noticed a cute petite girl with five other people at a table (three guys and two girls). They were busy talking amongst themselves and having a good time, and to me it was obvious they were all friends. I could go up to them with some fun opener, but odds are I'd be there for three minutes and then they'd politely tell me to have a nice life. I calculated that the odds of extracting her from the group was 11.4%. So I waited instead because it was just a matter of time until she had to stop by the bar, use the bathroom, or go outside for a smoke.

She went outside for a smoke. I looked at my roommate and told him to give me his phone since I left mine at home. I went outside and pretended to make a call. With the phone to my ear I looked over to my right and noticed she was standing ten feet away smoking alone. I took the phone down from my ear, entered 0-6-1-4-1-9-7-9-#-CLR, and then took a few steps towards her.

"Excuse me do you know what time this bar closes?" I said in English. I followed up by asking what other places were good that night, an admittingly boring approach but it matched the sedate environment of the bar. She was helpful and I noticed her accent definitely wasn't Brazilian.

"Your accent is different—I don't think you're a B girl."

"No I'm from Argentina."

We talked for at least fifteen minutes outside, well after her cigarette was done. She really dug the fact that I traveled through her country and we went into the differences between various cultures. To introduce some tension into the interaction I joked that Argentines were snobs who think they're Italian. She responded by saying she was half-Italian. Eventually she invited me to sit at her table and I chatted with her friends, mostly ignoring her, until they dropped out one by one The night ended with me and my roommate walking her home where numbers were exchanged (I already tried to get her to another bar but she had to wake up early).

Now I'm not saying that you can't pull from large groups, but to do well at it you'll have to be a clown, at least initially. But no matter how great your jokes are or how accurate your handwriting analysis is, it's terribly unlikely that you'll be able to talk to your girl without having her ugly friends be all up in the conversation.

Approaching large groups is too much of a roundabout way to pulling one girl. It's a better strategy to wait until that girl isolates herself, which is what you would have do to anyway. Plus she'll be much more open to talking to you without her judgmental, obese, and cockblocking friends spying on the conversation. Plus as long as she stays in her group it's doubtful that other guys will make an attempt, so it keeps her safe from other cocks until you're ready.

If by the end of the night you're ready to go and she's still nestled in her group, then go ahead and make an attempt, but if you can wait, then wait.

When The Passion Diminishes

April 6, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

"He tells himself it's because he's getting old. Every time something is repeated, it loses a part of its meaning. Or rather, it gradually loses its vital force, that vital force which automatically, inherently, presupposes meaning."
—The Book Of Laughter And Forgetting by Milan Kundera

A couple readers dropped some serious wisdom in a post last week.

From Mike:

> After a certain age, around 30, if you've had good success with women they just no longer have the same ability to energize you and attract you. At first I struggled against this, but now I just accept it. It could be a physical libido thing, or a psychological thing (once you've been fairly successful at it and see what it's all about, it no longer seems like such a big deal. At first you're really curious about what a really pretty girl might be like, then you find out, repeatedly, and it's good but not that special, and you no longer have anything to prove to yourself), or a combination of both, but be aware, Roosh, that you might never get the same old frenetic interest in girls back. It might be gone forever.

From West LA:

> When one exhausts an old passion, the common tendency is to try to revive it, but this tends to be futile and wasteful. Better to move on to new passions, keeping the old one in your life in a reduced way, as an enrichment, an enhancement, but not the main thing. You want to avoid stalling into entropy. You want to keep progressing as a person, improving your place in the world and your capacity to get whatever you want (in this big world of diverse options).
>
> It seems the feeling we actually value most is way below the surface of the particulars of the endeavor at hand. Finding yourself becoming indifferent to an old passion (which used to run your life) can be liberating, which can be refreshing, even exhilerating, as you are free to focus on new stuff and get absorbed in it, unfettered by your old obsession.

When I first got into the game most of my pickups were from dance approaches (to hip hop or house music). As I learned talking game the number of dance approaches I did went down until finally I stopped doing them completely. Instead I'd wait for a girl to stop dancing before I engaged her because I could make a stronger connection that resulted in less flaking. Then one night I went out with an old friend who was still into dancefloor game and he pushed me to grind with a couple girls. I couldn't help but feel lame. I don't know why but something I did so many times before, and got so much enjoyment from, was impossible for me to do again. So I stopped.

In Rio I had a line that would open girls 90% of the time. Because it was so deadly I got lazy and didn't try to come up with new material. After a couple months I started to feel like a hack. Even my Danish roommate begged me to stop using the line, though it helped him on a couple occassions. The line worked, and was getting the desired result, but suddenly the process became important—how I succeeded became more important to me than if I succeeded. There had to be some art to it, because I've done it without art so many times that I'm merely duplicating past efforts. So I stopped using the line, experimented with several new ones for a month, and come up with something twice as fun that I packed with me to Argentina.

When you have sex enough times, the act itself loses importance. Sex doesn't have too much meaning for me now but the story behind it can do ten times more to motivate me to keep chasing women than merely sticking another bar slut. Was it unique, different, or extraordinary? If I'm not dying to call my friend afterwards to tell him what went down and how I conquered insurmountable difficulties, then I know I just went through the motions to get my dick wet, that I took one little step closer to being a hack. I don't know if there's something genuinely wrong with that, but it's inevitable that man will put in increasingly less effort into something that doesn't inspire him.

There's the often-used analogy that life is like a river, bending around obstacles, strengthening, weakening, always flowing yet eventually reaching a destination. When you try to repeat something you've done so many times before, you're attempting to reverse the flow of the river, a painful and ultimately futile act. Yes it's sad that something that gave you happiness no longer does so, but holding on will cause you to miss out on the next thing that could give you even greater happiness. Once you've squeezed all the juice from a fruit, it'd be foolish to eat the rind.

The Brazilian Movie Actress (Part 3 of 4)

April 13, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY: Part 2

We had been talking for an hour and a half. My Portuguese was losing potency, but by now she was doing most of the speaking. I passed that crucial point where she became comfortable just talking to me about whatever was on her mind. In the moments I blanked she resumed the conversation with questions, observations. I took her talking as an opportunity to just stare into her eyes and imagine things that would never come to pass—just for fun, just to give me a little hope that one day everything is going to perfectly come together with the girl I want in the city I'm living in.

"You told me you've been to New York before," I said.

"Yeah but only for a week. I really liked the city."

"I think New York is the best city in the U.S. though honestly I haven't been to a lot of American cities. I've been to more places in Brazil."

"Wow that's pretty strange."

"I guess. But there I just don't have the motivation. I know, say, Boston, is different than Washington D.C., but how much different? In the end I like doing things that are difficult, and going to another American city isn't. There's no struggle—it's just sightseeing and going drinking, meeting people who are similar to ones I've already met. I want to learn a new language, a new culture, learn different ways of living. Something about it has to be hard, and Portuguese is definitely very hard."

"Yes, it is. Did you take a class?"

"I had a tutor in Rio. I studied with her about 15 hours or so. But yeah one day you should come to D.C. We have very nice museums."

"What else? How is it like living there?"

"Well it's like Brasilia I guess. You have a lot of politicians and lawyers. It's a serious city, alright for three days but you'd have more fun living in New York. Besides the museums and a couple cupcake shops there's nothing else I can really recommend."

We had to hop on a bus to the boarding gate. I followed her in, finally getting a nice view of her body, and sat down next to her. She's talking and talking about all sorts of things, and unfortunately I was understanding less as she began speaking faster and using more slang. I would single out a word here or there for her to explain but I let a lot of it go because I didn't want to disturb the flow of the conversation. Instead I'd do my trick of matching her facial expression towards the end of what she saying so she believed I understood. "This wouldn't be a problem if we dated," I thought, "because at fours a day of Portuguese you'd get there in six weeks." Besides not living in her city, I'd admit to nothing else that would hinder a potential relationship.

I wanted to feel out her interest a bit more. She was talking to me, which was a good sign, but how interested was she? I can't yet say there were heavy flirtations.

On the bus I made sure not to touch her side while seated next to her. About two minutes in I felt her thigh slightly touching mine. With women there is no such thing as an accidental touch. To accentuate a later joke I touched the top of her knee with my hand for two or three seconds, just to do it. My feelings were mixed, a combination of the pleasure of spending time with her mixed with the emptiness of our inevitable separation, of going to a new country and starting all over again for the third time in a year.

At the time I felt that things were beginning for real, the bus came to a stop next to our airplane. We got out and waited in line on the stairs up to the door. It was a big plane so the odds we'd sit next to each other approached zero.

"What seat are you?" I asked.

"16E."

"I'm 16D!"

"Really?!"

I looked at her wide open eyes and felt bad for my joke. "No unfortunately not. I'm 6C." She didn't laugh, and I told myself I wasn't going to test her again.

CONTINUED: Part 4

The Only Way To Completely Eliminate Flaking

April 18, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Having to experience flakey chicks is probably the most frustrating aspect of game. You had chemistry with a girl, exchanged contact information, and perhaps did a little kissy action, but she simply wouldn't get back to you or agree to plans. And then you analyze every bit of the interaction to see what you did "wrong." I have a mountain of emails from guys listing the many affections a girl has done to them and then asked me, stunned, how she could have possibly flaked.

How can I reduce flaking? Is there a line I can say before getting the number? Etc.

Sure there are lines you can say, but are those flake-reducing or simply game-enhancing? I believe that specific things meant to reduce flakiness are just tightened game features that show qualities like confidence and scarcity, and should be done regardless.

Men are logical beings and when they set a plan or commit to something they carry it out most of the time. If you're a guy you probably feel a little bad or guilty for cancelling on someone, but women don't. They have a very powerful rationalization system that makes it all too easy for them to leave someone in the lurch. When it comes to setting plans, the commitment part of their brain is weak and "Yes" is an word that has significant overlap with "Maybe" and "No."

Just take a look at how much women flake on their own kind. The reason they don't care when they flake on you is because they've been doing it forever. Who the hell are you? You're some guy she talked to in the bar for an hour, big deal—she flakes regularly on the girlfriend she knows from grade school.

I'm sure you've reluctantly gone out on a date with a girl who you were no longer sure about. You didn't cancel beforehand because, like I mentioned above, you'd feel bad for cancelling. You're a man of your word. Have you ever heard the expression "She's a woman of her word"? She's a heartless beast who doesn't feel a scrap of guilt for cancelling and flaking, and she feels comfortable doing it because she does it all the time, with other guys, girlfriends, and even family (my sister flakes on me and my dad regularly). And this is all because of the advanced rationalization system that I already mentioned. We really need some scientists out there to do some MRI scans to pinpoint where it's located in the female brain. Maybe zap it with some x-rays.

My headline to this post was a bit sensational. You can't eliminate flaking completely, but you can reduce it to practically zero. You must build a wonderful connection. It's wonderful if after meeting you she's wondering how she managed to live life until that moment. If you did it right she will message or call you within a few hours of parting before you contact her first. It takes about 8-12 continuous hours to build a conection that has the chance at being wonderful. It's okay if there was sleep involved for a few of those hours.

I'm sure you're familiar with Mystery's seven hour figure, where he says that that's how long it takes to comfortably bang a girl. I do believe it's conservative as many of us have done it well before that, but note how it's easier to have a one night stand with a girl than build a wonderful connection. It's something so intense and so dependent on real chemistry, which game facilitates, that it resembles Hollywood more than real life. I've only done it maybe three times.

Therefore you must ask yourself how reasonable is aiming for zero flakiness? Is it easier to work on multiple girls and bang the ones that come through or should you go all-in on one girl who you'll probably get tired of after a bang or two anyway? Try to make a wonderful connection, definitely, but the faster you accept flaking, like how you accept the Earth revolves around the sun, the less frustrating your life will be and the less importance you will place on any one girl. You're able to sidestep the frustration that causes so many guys to quit the game before realizing their potential.

If you think you've met "the one" and know the wonderful connection is simmering underneath the surface, it's best to wait as long as reasonably possible before stuffing your meat inside her to heighten the tension and build a "storyline," something that is important more in relationships than one night stands. But would I personally wait before having sex with a girl because I may want to wife her up?

Nah, she may flake.

The Colonial Towns Of Minas Gerais (Brazil)

April 20, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previous Brazil Guides:

- Foz do Iguaçu
- Rio de Janeiro
- Northern Brazil
- Vitória

Minas Gerais is located in the nortwest of Rio de Janeiro State, and easily accessibly by bus. Known for its cheese, pork, and women, I decided to have a little look before leaving Brazil. I visisted four cities in two weeks.

TIRADENTES

Tiradentes is a tiny colonial town named after a famous dentist freedom fighter (the name translates to “Tooth Puller” in English). It’s located about five hours by bus from Rio.

The town has a big tourist side so you’ll find a lot of cutesy antique, chocolate, and artesanal shops. There is a peaceful little river that snakes by the main square and a tiny coffee shop with only two tables. Street signs cannot be found. The colonial arquitecture, peacefulness, and safety made it seem more like I was in Europe than Brazil, so it’s no surprise that on weekends couples pour in for romantic walks down its stone-lined streets. There are also nearby hiking trails if you’re into that sort of thing.

There is absolutely nothing here for the single man, though it’s a nice break from city life. Come between Sunday through Wednesday for maximum isolation.

If you insist on talking to girls, find a club in the nearby city of São João del Rey. It’s only 30 minutes away by bus, but you'll probably have to catch a cab back afterwards.

Where to stay? There are a couple dozen pousadas here and I can't really recommend the one I stayed at due to its horrible foam mattresses. Bargain during weekdays and be sure to make a reservation if you come during the weekend.

OURO PRETO

Four hours away from Tiradentes is Ouro Preto, another colonial town with more arquitectural goodness for your digital camera. There is a large university here so you have more options for girl watching, but I didn't see anything spectacular. Surprisingly there are tons of fat girls even though the city is incredibly hilly (it's possible that the fatties I witnessed were tourists).

The city reminds me a bit of Valparaiso, Chile, but smaller, prettier, and safer. On the downside it has very limited nightlife options and is extremely touristy. There is one club near the main square but it's full of college kids, and the bars are of the sit-down variety. Day trips can be made to other colonial towns nearby with Mariana being your best choice.

Where to stay? I stayed in the Pousada Sao Francisco de Paul, a hostel with rustic private rooms. It's not particularly good value but it's close to the bus station so you don't have to take a taxi.

DIAMANTINA

A ways off in the northern part of the state, Diamantina is another colonial town that receives far less tourists than the others in Minas (except for its Carnival, which is supposedly the best in Brazil). Within ten minutes of arriving I knew it was a special place, and told the taxi driver upon leaving four days later that I'd like to grow old here with my Brazilian wife. It's safe with a small-town vibe, but during the day streets feel alive with animated people going about their business.

There aren’t many girls but the ones that come out of hiding during the day can be very beautiful. Supposedly there is a university on top of some hill but I didn’t bother to check it out because of my short stay. It’s here that I realized how relative beauty is. Seeing a girl who’s a 6 on the streets got my complete attention, though in Rio I wouldn’t have noticed. That’s actually a problem in cities: you’re surrounded by so much beauty that you don’t want to settle down until you get a bonafide hottie, yet in Diamantina I’d wife up the first 7 that was down. (Is city life constructed to make you less happy when it comes to finding mates?) If I lived in Diamantina and built roots, I’m confident I’d get something very decent.

There is not a whole lot to do here, so come if you want to relax, read, or get some work done without other tourists around. The value here is very good, as food and lodging is the cheapest of the other colonial cities.

Where to stay? I highly recommend Pousada Dos Cristais. For only 70 R$ per night I stayed in a very large room with a balcony. The staff is very friendly and there are two cats.

These colonial towns are great to relax in when you want to get away from the dirty cities, but are horrible for talking to girls. Overall they’re definitely worth a visit.

CONTINUED: Belo Horizonte Nightlife Guide

Belo Horizonte (Brazil) Nightlife Guide For Guys

April 21, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Previous Brazil Guides:

- Foz do Iguaçu
- Rio de Janeiro
- Northern Brazil
- Vitória
- Colonial Towns of Minas Gerais

The colonial towns were nice and pleasant but after ten days I was dying to flirt. I went to Belo Horizonte, the state capital. Even though you've probably never heard of it before, it's a huge city with over 5 million people (the third largest in Brazil). While costs are cheaper than Rio, you'll be spending that much more on taxis to get around if you plan on going out a lot at night.

Thursday Night:

I went alone to Arcadium Bar in the popular Savassi area. They played forro, which is the Brazilian version of salsa with more of a country twist. I think the music is a bit annoying personally, but I didn't want to leave Brazil without trying it out once. (The New York Times recently wrote an article on forro.)

Turns out it's exactly like salsa. The girls go there to dance first and kiss second, so you see all these guys who are great forro dancers have their go with a girl until she thanks him and returns back to her friends. There was a lot less hooking up here than I would have expected for a Brazilian nightclub, but on the bright side guys rarely got turned down to dance. It's a safe place for men who are scared to approach.

I hung out with a group of three girls who taught me a few moves. One girl was into me but she was not very pretty. I talked to a couple others and while they were friendly, my reluctance to dance didn't help my cause. Overall the quality was not very good, just like you'd expect at a salsa club.

Friday Night:

I met a German guy who had both game and a sense of humor (a first), and we took a 20 minute cab ride to Chalezinho, a club that was recommended by a girl I met the night before (another good club option would have been Swingers Club). We arrived early to try and beat the crowd (11:15), but it was already mobbed. The line for guys was more like a blob. It seemed very hopeless but then I saw a hostess working the girls line with a clipboard.

I said, “Esta é a fila para gringos?” (Is this the line for gringos?)

She looked at me and smiled. “Where are you from?”

“United States!”

“I lived in Salt Lake City for a year.”

Her English was nice, her face even better, and after some small talk I asked her what my German friend and I should do to get in.

“Just hang on I’ll help you out.”

Five minutes later she signaled us to follow her and took us right to the front of the line, bypassing at least 100 guys (“Que isso!” they groaned). I thanked her and she said she’d be inside later, but unfortunately I never saw her again.

The girls were incredibly gorgeous (better than Vitoria, better than Rio, better than Colombia, and better than Córdoba). It was almost a dream to be in the same building with so many beautiful women, the best I’ve ever seen anywhere in South America. I swear you could smell vagina. I was giddy with excitement and did a warm up approach that went fine until the girl asked me how long I was staying.

I find that if a Brazilian girl asks that before you’ve kissed her, and your answer isn’t “I live here,” she will disappear within two minutes about 80% of the time, like this girl did. I did another approach and talked to a 9, which by my standards is close to a 10, but she asked me the same question. Four more times I talked to girls who were digging me, touching me, but would all ditch when they found out I didn’t live in Belo Horizonte. My blonde haired, blue eyed German friend didn’t fair any better (blonde haired wingman in Brazil are like a canary in a coal mine for me—if they can’t pull then I’ll definitely have difficulties).

By 4am I gave up. Perhaps there was a slut in the room that would bang me same night, but after nearly ten tries I didn’t find her. I sat down on a bench and looked over to my right to see an average looking guy kissing what I’d say is my ideal type of girl. Six months of living in Brazil coalesed into that moment and I realized that I too can have that girl. All I had to do was permanently move to Brazil and learn Portuguese.

I’m not getting outpulled by Brazilian guys because they have better game or style than me (definitely not better style)—I’m getting outplayed because I don’t live in Brazil. God knows how many girls I’ve “lost out” on because of that. These guys I see getting with pretty girls simply wouldn’t be able to compete with a gringo who has the permanency, the language ability, and the hyperawareness to make fast game adjustments. By passing through a city for short stints, even staying for a couple months, it’s guaranteed I will not get the most that I’m capable of. This is a downside of travel that gringos must accept. While you can get better quality than back at home, which I did in Rio, it will still be less than if you stayed permanently.

That said, a club like Chalezinho is where dreams are made. Get there before 10:30, take a couple hundred reals, get your Portuguese warmed up as English isn't too common, and have your brain rewired in a way that makes going to an American club something that sends you into terrible fits of depression. Even though I didn't get anything, it was one of my most memorable nights in Brazil.

Saturday Night

I went out this night a little pessimistic. Everything would go fine until they asked me that question, and then things would end. My only hope at getting laid was to find a slut, so in order to do that I would have to approach a lot.

The German and I went to the La Cancha sports bar first. Oddly enough almost all the girls wore high heels (I'm not complaining), but they were sitting down in groups. I ran Swingers game on a hostess and told her to meet us at a club downtown. She said she had no friends, but that she would get off of work in ten minutes. The German and I waited outside, agreeing that we'd let her pick which one she wanted to hook up with.

At the club she picked the German. She was cute but nothing to cry over so I went to work on the girls there and by my third approach I found something better: an 18-year-old from Juiz de Fora, another Minas city that I hear has very good night action during the weekend. It took about ten minutes to get some kissy action from her, and then I looked over her to see the German making out with the hostess. All good right? Well unfortunately for me my girl's brother was there, and he cockblocked me later as I was entering the groping stage of the seduction. I sort of understood.

We were at the club A Obra, which is the Belo Horizonte version of Casa da Matriz in Rio. There were a lot of tatooed freaks with stretched earlobes. I knew I was in the right place because girls were asking me if I was in a band and a fattie walked up to me and stroked my shaggy hair. I had a couple more bites after the cockblock, but ran into the "So how long are you staying here" wall that was beginning to drive me crazy.

It turns out that this was the last night in South America where I'd go all out to score. In Argentina I've been unable to conjure up the will that was always with me in Brazil.

Bottom Line:

They say the girls in Belo Horzonte are more traditional (i.e. harder), and while I can't confirm that because of my short stay, don't expect it to be easier than Rio. If you have several months to live in Brazil than I'd strongly consider staying here if you're not crazy about the beach, though understand the city is ugly with nothing special to do. Speaking Portuguese is important because many girls have no English ability. If I come back to Brazil, I plan on spending a lot of time either here, Vitoria, or Porto Alegre. God bless Rio, but I wouldn't be happiest there.

Belo Horizonte Nightlife Guides: NaBalada and Guia BH

Lodging: Chale Mineiro Hostel ($), Hotel Sao Bento ($$), Hotel Metropole ($$$), and Motel Papillon, an hourly motel for sex located at Rua Rio de Janeiro 639.

When A Girl Says She's On Her Period (And Other Excuses)

May 2, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There are cases where you're seeing a girl, contently banging away, then she throws you a curveball and says, "We can't have sex tonight because…"

1. "…I'm on my period."

I've had sex with quite a few girls while they were on their period, so I know they are more than willing to screw while leaking blood. On the other hand, some girls (heavy bleeders) are truly uncomfortable because it makes a gigantic mess. The key to dealing with this excuse is noting when she tells you.

If a girl truly likes you, she'll want to spend time with you and hide the fact she's on her period until the last possible moment, when you'll be "trapped" and can't really do anything about it but snuggle. She'll tell you in bed before the clothes are about to come off and then add a big "Sorry!" This is a great opportunity to be a man. Tell her, "It's okay baby," point to your dick and then say, "Well it's not going to suck itself."

If a girl tells you she's on her period at the date planning stage (via phone), she's lying. This is a big warning sign that she's not really in the mood to see you and is hoping that you'll cancel. But of course this is a trap, because even if you do what she wants and change plans, she'll attempt to give you shit for it.

If she tells you during the date but before you get to a bedroom, it could be a coin toss either way, though most of the time I believe she's being truthful and "warning" you out of consideration not to get too aroused and potentially blue balled. If you have several drinks at the bar, romantically hold hands, and then she tells you towards the end of the night, she's merely being thoughtful.

If a girl tells you she's on her period but adds, "But we can do other things," then she loves you.

2. "…I'm tired."

If she tells you this at any point it usually means you're not going to have sex. Realize that if a girl is really into you she'll pretend she's not tired so you don't think she's boring. It doesn't matter if it's true or not, but she should make an attempt to hide this.

For example, say you're out with a hot girl but you have diarrhea. Do you tell her, "I have the runs today"? Of course not—you'd probably hide that fact until your extreme discomfort prompts her to ask what's wrong with you. Then you'd play it down while disappearing to the bathroom for 10 minutes because "there was a long line."

3. "…I'm not in the mood."

You've lost her, or almost have. Withdraw for a bit and tighten up your game.

When in a casual relationship, here is the rule you want to follow: You must always lead the girl to believe that the main thing you want from her is sex, and that by not providing it on-demand you may walk. This keeps her in a state of apprenhension where she wonders if you actually like her or not, and encourages her to try extra hard to be an all-around good catch because she's scared you'll leave her if you get better sex. By treating her like a commodity (which she is), you encourage her to provide more value.

Therefore if a girl tells you on the phone that she is on her period, tired, or not in the mood, cancel on her. Say, "It's no problem because actually I was feeling tired today anyway, maybe some other time." Notice how we don't call her out. Instead we provide an excuse that waters the seed of you only wanting her for sex. Add more water by waiting four days before calling her again, after her imaginary period or fatigue spell is most likely complete.

It can be a tough judgment call if she gives you an excuse during the date. Unless she says, "We can do other things," you're taking a big chance with your game by sticking around and giving her your time with no future possibility of sex. Personally I would give an excuse to make it an early night, without showing any anger or annoyance. Again, water the seed of doubt.

If she says, "Oh, we can't have sex tonight," while walking to your house or hers at the end of the date, and is very insistent on you agreeing that you won't try to make a move, say, "What… do you want me to sign a contract?" She'll throw out all sorts of drama and then you can say, "Look, you're acting weird. Maybe it's better I leave." Ditch then wait for her to contact you again.

If she gives you an excuse at the last moment in bed, but does not give you head or let you do her in the butt, get up after relaxing for 15 minutes and tell her you can't sleep since you took an early nap and rather get some work done. Another option is to say you have to return some videos. If she does go the extra mile to make you orgasm with her other cavities then I see no reason why you can't give her some snuggly time.

The reason you should take a hard line towards sex excuses is because when you reward a girl for not having sex with you (by spending time with her), she loses respect for you. She begins to see you as another chump. Her game instincts turn on and she'll wonder how much she can get you to commit to her while providing less and less. Nip this in the bud early, and make her believe that the only thing you want from her is sex (through indirect means that she can't directly call you out on). She'll stick around for quite a while to prove to you that she's worth so much more than that.

The Mechanics Of A Hot Streak

May 9, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My first significant streak happened in America. I ended up in a girl's bed five consecutive times going out, with two of those ending up in vaginal sex. During the streak I was going out with two condoms, travel-size toothbrush, and contact lens case, and in the middle of it I considered buying a murse for my hygiene accessories.

My second big streak happened in Brazil at a certain club. Out of six consecutive times going there I kissed seven girls and banged three of them. Two of those girls were the hottest I've ever slept with. Then I went out a seventh time and well, let me start from the top…

The first two times I went to the club was in 2007. On my virgin visit I slept with an awesome girl, who I wrote about in A Dead Bat In Paraguay, and the second time was a meaningless make-out that didn't make the book. I went back to the United States and two years later returned to Brazil.

The third time I went with two Mexican girls and an American guy who recognized me in the hostel we were staying at. One of the Mexican girls wanted me, but I passed because she looked like a very handsome boy. She got upset, cried, and left. I kissed an 18-year-old girl after and then another girl that who I leveraged into splitting a taxi ride home, saving five whole dollars.

The fourth time I went solo on New Years Day. I stayed there for four hours and got absolutely nowhere, paid my tab, and then on my way out met a half-Lebanese girl who spoke English. We went to another bar and she took me home, but we didn't do the dirty until the second date.

The fifth time I went with my Danish roommate. We met two young girls and halfway through the seduction we did a switcheroo because the girl I was going for took to his somewhat hidden tattoos. That wasn't a problem because her friend was more my type, but she was young and flakey and nothing happened besides making out.

The sixth time I went alone. My third approach was on a soap opera actress who didn't speak English and had never been with a gringo before. I solved that little problem of hers a few hours later.

The seventh time I went alone again. I wanted to keep the streak alive until ten, only because it's a nice round number. To prepare I first went to the mall to check out girls, approaching two to warm up. That night I ate, showered, and rolled up to the club at a good time looking fresh. The amount of pressure on me was high. I remembered how I couldn't wait for the previous streak to end, but now I considered myself a professional—a game athlete, if you will. I must embrace the intensity and still perform. No excuses on how it was dead or how the girl's weren't good looking. I'd make it happen.

Guys, I spit the best game of my life that night. I wasn't too eager, I wasn't too passive, and had the right amount of energy. Every 15 minutes I did a solid approach from one of my two favorite spots in the club. The girls were biting and except for one case there was always a conversation where I was being touched and getting asked questions. But my head was swollen and half of the girl's weren't good enough. I kept thinking I could do better.

In other cases I kept running into pairs of girls. I couldn't isolate any of them and things kept fading out. Nothing was clicking besides fun conversation, and a phone number wouldn't be enough to preserve the streak. Girls I passed on earlier in the night were now making out with other guys. People were pairing up and I felt like the odd one out. I drank too much. At the same time, I had a booty call begging me to come over and service her. So after four hours I made the decision to end the streak and get laid instead.

I left the club and got in touch with my booty call. She denied me, saying it was too late.

I felt destroyed. Some of the anger was towards the booty call, but most of it was due to the broken streak. I should have hooked up with anything just to keep it going, in hindsight, because it was providing me with an incredible amount of confidence. So much confidence that not hooking up on one night put me into the depths of despair and pain. I was lost and confused. But within a week the itch returned and I was ready to go back to work.

Even though the end of my latest streak caused temporary hardship, I advise you to get a streak of your own going, for a few reasons:

1. It increases your confidence to stratospheric levels. It was like my muscle mass had tripled in size. The streak begins to define you, convincing you that you are the ultimate pimp.

2. You create a new normal. Gone are the days where you have "bad nights" or consecutive nights not getting anything. Gone are thinking that phone numbers means you scored. It becomes extremely weird and grievous if you don't suck face, and you become more determined to stay out longer while doing more approaches. You learn what it takes to get consistent and the word luck escapes your vocabulary.

3. You ride momentum. This is a big part of successful game, where you hook up with many girls in a short period of time followed by a cooling-off period where not much happens. A streak has the momentum already built in, and I swear my cheeks blushed a rosier red during both of them. It's like other girls knew I was in a streak and wanted to be a part of it. I fully recommend you hook up with a straggler to keep a streak going as long as possible.

I have one additional tip. When you're in the middle of a streak and you're starting to feel the pressure of keeping it alive, focus more on attempts than results. Go out and tell yourself, "Alright tonight I'm going to do ten solid approaches," instead of, "Tonight I gotta get laid!" Focus on attempts and then when you get a promising prospect the close will be automatic.

Two weeks later I returned to the Brazilian club. It was mostly empty and there wasn't even ten girls in the place. I order my Johnnie Walker Black with three ice cubes and waited in one of my spots, eventually doing my first approach. It hit, and within 20 minutes we're kissing and talking about what to name our babies. I've never had to approach only one girl in a South American club before. I like to think it was due to experience from the streak.

How To Bang Argentine Girls: The Final Chapter

May 16, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There are a few things I learned upon my return trip to Cordoba, Argentina.

1. A white Argentine girl is harder to bang than one with a little bit of brown in her. These brown girls are more similar to Colombians in the work it takes to get with them. And I must stress similar because there is a difference. In Colombia girls flake right before the date, but in Argentina they do stupid shit well before. For example, in Argentina a girl will throw her number at me and then when I get her on the phone to make plans she'll say, "Sorry but I have a boyfriend," or something equally retarded. They just wanted to see if I'd ask them out or not. If you're doing it by text then she simply won't respond after a couple back-and-forths, no matter how much affection she gave you previously, making asking girls out here a lose/lose dilemma which game theory doesn't have obvious answers to.

Many times it's happened where a girl responded very enthusiastically when I messaged her, with replies that included exclamation points, but then simply gave me radio silence after I tried to set plans. I wanted to get an insiders look at this phenomenon, so I went through the steps of making plans with one of my Spanish speaking partners with the intention to disappear on her when it was time to finalize the time, like Argentine girls did to me.

She texted me on a day I had mentioned I might be free, asking if I could meet up later in the evening. The plan was to simply not respond and leave her hanging, but I just couldn't do it. It's too mean to leave someone out there like that so I eventually replied (with an excuse, but at least she got a response). It's almost evil how disrespectful Argentine girls can be. While we do see issues like flakiness in Colombia and even Brazil, at least those girls have the consideration to let you down easy. It seems like in Argentina the girls have a goal to make you feel like shit, at multiple points in the seduction.

2. In the U.S. to upgrade from a 5 or 6 to a 7 takes a marginal amount of work. But in Argentina it's significantly harder. There are the very cute girls who take quite a bit of time (and luck), and then bangable girls who are similar to Colombians in terms of difficulty. For example, I get looks and approach invitations from 5's and 6's all day, but the 7's and up only look with their peripheral vision, if at all.

3. If the club you're going to has a web site or can be googled, you shouldn't go there. Alright that's an extreme rule, but you don't want to go to trendy places frequented only by "white" Argentines who think they're European. Experiment with trashy bars and clubs.

4. Because your first date with an Argentine girl will most likely be with her friends, the appearance of the girl you approach doesn't matter much because odds are she'll have at least one cute friend. Argentine girls younger than 30 don't like doing one-on-one dates right off the bat like in America. So what happens is she invites you out to a big group and then you can play the field and turn on the charm for the girl you really like. Stay on a friendly vibe with the initial girl you met in order to make a painless switch. In other words, don't lead her on because if she likes you too much then her friends will back off.

On my first day in Cordoba an ugly girl at the mall was eye fucking me. I wanted to practice my Spanish so I opened her, and within five minutes she had my number. She called me later that night and invited me to a birthday party that had many girls cuter than her. There was a sad moment when she realized I didn't like her, but I was able to meet prettier women that I wouldn't have otherwise. The girl you approach during the day, for instance, will be merely a gateway to more poon. It's best to do these day approaches on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, to get invited out later those nights while her feelings for you are still strong. Two downsides to this strategy: (1) You may not like her friends or they may have boyfriends, and (2) Who wants to regularly approach ugly girls?

5. Cordoba has a lot of beautiful girls because of the huge university population, but when you take that away, like I got to see on Easter weekend when the students went home, the locals are of equal beauty to other Argentine cities. What happens is pretty girls from small towns in surrounding states come to Cordoba to study, and then go back to where they came from or move to Buenos Aires afterwards. Cordoba has that wow factor when you go to a club, but most of those girls are under 23 and frankly, not yet ready for the type of easy sexual relationship you probably want. Even doing simple things with them will give you grey hair.

6. Like I described in A Dead Bat In Paraguay while observing my Italian friend Beppe, you can't escalate on an Argentine girl like you can with Western sluts. You have to be 50% more passive than usual (assuming you're as aggressive as I've taught you), and let the girl do a lot of work, either by messaging you first, inviting you out, or asking you to come to the bathroom to do drugs. The main idea here is for her to initiate the escalation move and then you finish it off.

Unfortunately many Argentine girls will not put in any work, so you'll get "rejected" when the girl simply does nothing. Pushing the interaction hard or going direct only works on desperate girls (i.e. ugly), and boy do those desperate girls skip out on game playing to get laid! Note this passive type of game is not optimal in Brazil or Colombia. In Argentina you're punished for being a man who goes about getting what he wants, which is probably why so many Argentine guys are weird and creepy, or have just given up on women completely to devote their lives to rock music and pot smoking. Your best option is to sit there, be cool as fuck, get her laughing, and just hope for the best. In America the game is like a mountain, difficult at times but with a visible goal that is attainable for those who train hard. In Argentina game is like a cloud, impossible to grasp.

I have to put some things in perspective. When I first visited Cordoba, I was coming from the dregs of South America (Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia). I was blown away by the appearance of the women without having the twelve months of experience that I later gained in Colombia and Brazil. While I still think Cordoba has some of the most beautiful women on the continent, they're pretty lame, insecure, and immature. And even when they get older, a Cordobesa in her late 20's has the maturity of a Brazilian or Colombian in her early 20's. Sure their appearance is splendidly feminine, but they are missing the sexy vibe of Brazilian and Colombian women, and definitely the dancing ability of the Brazilians. On the bright side they seem to pick up on sarcastic humor a lot better than other South American women because of their love of American television shows.

7. Many guys told me that once you get an Argentine girl out of her city and social circle, she'll be much more tolerable. I find this to be the case with two Argentine girls I've fooled around with outside of Argentina, one in the U.S. and the other in Brazil. They were very easy to make plans for, hardly flaked, and didn't play psychosexual games. Therefore it may be easier to get your Argentine flag outside of Argentina. I hear there are a lot of Argentine girls in American ski resorts.

8. Argentina is the only country where the quality I can get is lower than in the United States. I'm talking about a timeline of one or two months. Sure if I lived there forever I'd land some decent girls, but why bother when there's this big country that starts with a B right next door, where women have healthy attitudes towards sex and like wearing high heels instead of dirty Converse shoes or cheap boots.

9. I don't want to make it sound like you can't get laid there—I know tons of guys who have and even a few who got one night stands. But compared to other places, the amount of work you have to put in for something average is insanely high. I've never seen a gringo with an Argentine girl who was higher than a 6, which means I've never been jealous of something a gringo has pulled. But in Brazil it's happened a few times.

10. My Argentine lady friend says that once you have sex with an Argentine, the floodgates open, but that's how it is in Colombia and Brazil as well. Argentine girls think this compensates for their pre-sex craziness, but they obviously haven't banged girls from other countries. Argentine women are simply not vale la pena (worth the pain) that it takes to get them in bed. Stop by Buenos Aires to get your flag by visiting some lame Irish pubs, where the women are more progressive, older, and speak English, then get the hell out and head to Colombia or Brazil. Honestly even that may be too much of a waste. You miss out on nothing by not banging an Argentine girl. Nothing.

Argentina is a very nice country, but trying to crack their women is a waste of life. I don't plan on ever returning.

More Posts About Argentine Girls:

- School Of Argentine Girls
- How To Pick Up Argentine Girls (From An Argentine Guy)
- Brazilian Vs. Argentine Vs. American Girls
- Argentine Girls Final Thoughts
- Argentine Girls Final Thoughts (Part 2)

Why Approaching Should Be The Foundation Of Your Game

May 18, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

As your game improves you'll have to approach less girls for better quality, but you'll still be approaching quite a few girls. It comes down to basic demographics.

Let's say it's Saturday night and we're at a crowded bar where there are 10 cute women.

How many of them are in relationship that they're happy in? I'd guess 3.
How many of them have fuck buddies? 2.
How many of them are in a bad mood for whatever reason and don't feel like getting to know a new guy? 1.

That means if you approached all ten women, only four would be open to your attempt without bias. Now I'm not saying that the other girls can't be banged, but the odds are much lower. That means that every approach you do in that bar for the rest of the night has a higher chance of failure than success, and we're not even accounting for your game, appearance, or status. Before you open your mouth you're already climbing the mountain.

If your game is tight, on this night you'll have to do about three or four approaches before getting at least a number, which is a guarantee of nothing. If you're a beginner, it's likely you'll approach all ten and walk away empty handed, and either have to lower your standards and hit on uglier girls for the rest of the night or go to a different bar.

The point of game, I believe, is being a good option to girls who are open to having sex with someone new. But since so many girls are not open to a new guy (unless that new guy happens to be spectacular), you'll have to approach that much more just to find a willing audience member. This is one reason why when I go out solo I have a plan to approach ten girls, which ensures I will talk to at least a few girls who are open to a new guy. If I talk to ten and I get no bites at all, it means that I'm not even creating interest in girls who probably want to have sex somewhat soon. Either I have to change my game plan or find a new club with a different vibe.

I know that approaching can be a drag. If we compared it to work, it'd be like having to punch in a set amount of hours a week while some other guy is making passive income from his rental properties. Pussy rains from the sky for him, without much effort, while you work your ass off. But approaching works and it's one thing that every guy can do until he finds a niche or gimmick. I do it even when I don't have to in order to stay sharp, because of how quickly game can rust due to inactivity.

If you're in your 30's and you haven't approached 1,000 girls yet, then you're not even close to realizing your potential. I'm pretty sure I've done that many by now, and I have the results that justify it (in my mind, at least). I have a feeling I'll be approaching until I'm a very old man. And I'm fine with that.

Trash Can Desk

May 20, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

"It's hard to know, when you're in such a jam, which is worse—not having a place to sleep or not having a place to work. One can sleep almost anywhere, but one must have a place to work. Even if it's not a masterpiece you're doing. Even a bad novel requires a chair to sit on and a bit of privacy."
—Tropic of Cancer by Henry Miller

One of the hardest things about traveling is finding a decent place to work. A lot of countries don't have that lingering coffee shop culture that we have, with comfortable work spaces and a staff that leaves you alone. In South America it's too much to ask for wireless internet, electrical outlets, a bathroom that is less than a quarter mile away, and a large selection of artisanal teas.

Most of the time I had to work from home (or hostel), but unfortunately I wasn't nearly as productive. In the States I've had peak days of cranking out five hours of honest-to-goodness work, but I rarely got above two hours in South America. For my latest trip I took some pictures of my work spaces, which I believe you will find fascinating.

Bogota, Colombia

Finding a table and chair was sometimes challenging, so for my first city I used a trash can as my working platform. It's here that I put the finishing touches on A Dead Bat In Paraguay. On a trash can. When the maid came by I had to remove everything so she could empty it.

Medellin, Colombia

My first Medellin apartment had a pretty decent work area. I started the trip drinking water out of bottles but eventually drank straight from the tap. I never got sick from it. My stomach was actually healthiest in Colombia (it got worse in Brazil and then fell apart in Argentina where my “Days Without Diarrhea” counter never got into the double digits). I’m okay now, thanks.

The desk in my second apartment was considerably smaller, but I lived near a McCafe where I could hang for a couple hours at a time. Note the kitty calendar hanging on the wall (thanks sis).

Fortaleza, Brazil

I stayed in this hotel for a couple days and converted the nightstand into a desk. My Portuguese books are stored at the bottom.

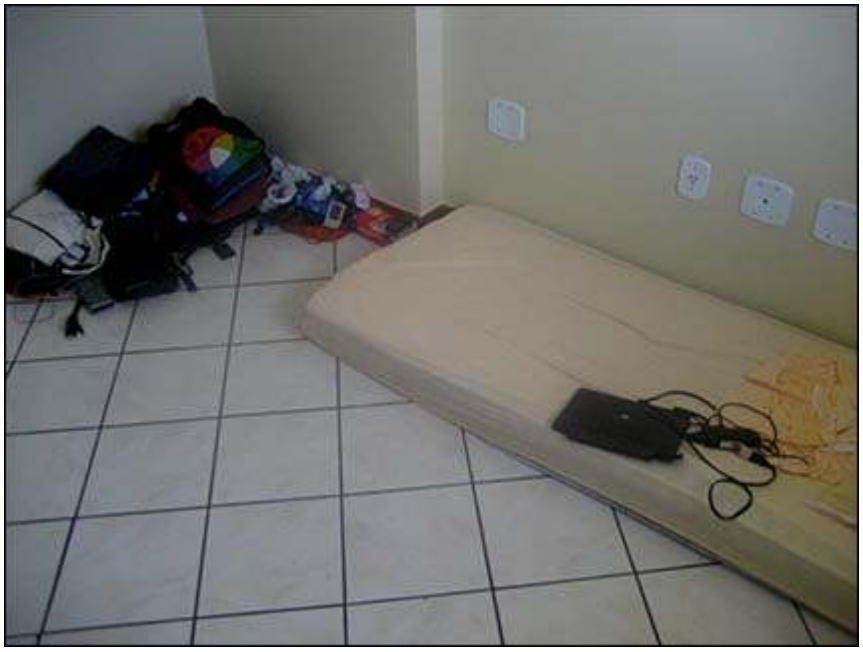
Pipa, Brazil

The desk was a little low so I'd have to hunch over to see the screen. There was a massive ant colony nearby that was drawn to the warmth of my laptop. Brazil has a lot of ants.

Vitoria, Brazil

This is the niciest and most expensive hotel I stayed in during the trip ($70/night). Ironically, it was the only place that charged extra for internet and breakfast.

Vila Velha, Brazil



I moved to an apartment in a neighboring city, owned by a guy who worked at the expensive hotel. He had no furniture here so I went to a mattress store and bought a $40 foam thing that barely held up for my week stay. I didn’t get any work done here.

Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

This was my home for the first two weeks in Rio until I found my favela shack. I had to revisit the trash can desk. I actually got a lot of work done here because the room was usually empty with my gringo dormmates sightseeing or visiting the beach. I'm sure they thought I was loser since I didn't do much during the day.

Cordoba, Argentina

For the first time in my life I lived alone. The apartment came furnished and set me back about $700 for the month (it was expensive because I was on a month-to-month contract). I dreamed of living alone for a long time, but it was surprisingly boring, probably because I didn't have anyone to talk to. I had a lot more fun living in my Rio shithole with my dreamy Danish roommate.

In Cordoba I finished my third book. It's about Colombia, and should be out in a month.

Is São Paulo (Brazil) Worth The Visit?

May 27, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I hesitated going to São Paulo for a while because of all the bad things I kept hearing. The traffic is horrible, it's dirty, it's too big, it's too hard to know where to go, it's expensive, etc., but I'm the kind of guy that needs to check things out for himself. Since I was close I had to stop by and visit the largest city in the Americas after Mexico City.

The size is quite impressive. A city like New York is separated by all those dirty rivers, but São Paulo is just one huge concrete salad. I still can't get over it, and that alone is almost worth a visit.

Someone in the forum took the trouble of breaking down the city so I won't do that, but you can't go wrong staying in the Vila Madalena area, which is reasonably close to a lot of popular clubs. The city is so big that cab rides at night can demolish your budget, so when it comes to lodging your main criteria should be how close you are to the nightlife (during the day you have the subway).

What I like about São Paulo over Rio is that you have your normal tribes, making it easy to fit in if you have a unique style. For example, there are many pseudo-rock clubs where I would do well at, but in Rio that was a lot harder to find because almost everywhere caters to the mainstream crowd. São Paulo has a ton of variety in types of clubs, bars, and restaurants for more specific tastes, while Rio is more of a one-size-fits-all type of place.

Unfortunately the girls are not as pretty as the ones in Rio. They're lazier with their appearance while lacking the carioca sexiness. In Rio girls refuse to go out without heels, but in São Paulo I saw more of that Argentine trend of going out with dirty Converse shoes. That's not to say that there aren't tons of beautiful girls in São Paulo, but per capita I saw a decrease in quality. Also for a big city, there's a surprising number of fatties walking around. I guess that puts a kink in the argument that people are skinnier in big cities because they have to walk so much.

A lot of Brazilians say that "São Paulo never sleeps," but that's not exactly true. In a city of almost 20 million people, there were two clubs listed on a popular nightlife guide for Monday. Tuesday wasn't that much better. Until Thursday, you don't have many options besides some sit-down bars. This is not Vegas, and it's not New York either. On the bright side, girls are more curious about your gringo status and a surprising percentage speaks English. For some guys it will be easier to pull here than Rio.

I recommend you come for a weekend, not necessarily for the girls but just for the travel enjoyment. São Paulo is arguably the most important city in South America and it'll definitely keep you busy and interested for a few days. My Danish roommate fell in love with the place and I understand why—it's more progressive than Rio and simply has more to see.

Fried Chicken Empire

June 1, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm in the dumps. It started during my final days in Rio around the time of my five year blog anniversary. My Danish roommate already left for São Paulo and I was going through some drama with a girl. My subsequent travels through the state of Minas Gerais were pleasant, especially the weekend in Belo Horizonte, but I started losing motivation to do things.

I went to Córdoba, planning to stay for at least two months, but it became apparent that I wasn't going to last. I made an honest effort on the girls for one whole week but then gave up completely, realizing that I really didn't like them. I didn't care for the challenge. Eventually I dated a Brazilian girl who I met through my young landlord. She tried to drag me to clubs but I resisted, saying I rather do quieter things.

My apartment didn't have internet so I sat and watched VH1 Classic and Style & Life for over three hours a day. I followed a four-year-old season of Project Runway and also saw a gay guy beat out all the girls on Paris Hilton's show. I didn't want to study Spanish, didn't want to write, didn't want to travel, didn't want to hit on girls, and I didn't want to read. I forced myself to take Spanish lessons just keep myself busy, so I could say I was doing something productive.

I came back to America and it's been fine so far. It's great catching up with Virgle Kent, Roissy, and The Rookie, and especially fun to watch The Rookie in action. He reminds me of my younger self when I approached not just to get laid but to experiment or have a laugh. Now I just approach to get laid. It's a job, putting in my time to get that notch.

My two books sell on their own. I've already put in the grunt work for a setup that is mostly passive. I'm not rolling in money, but I do make enough to live comfortably in developing countries. If I stopped being so fucking lazy I could make more, but with a good amount of cash saved up (enough for my future travel plans that I'm thinking of this winter), I can't get excited enough to work more than I am now.

With the blog I've been doing the bare minimum, three posts a week. You'd be annoyed if I did less. This isn't because I don't have ideas, but I'm simply too lazy to develop them. I have a file with ideas so old that I don't remember what angle I was going to take. So I delete them, a potential nugget of knowledge lost forever because I didn't want to work for a few minutes.

I think I'm feeling down because I've reached my loftiest goals. I've shared all that I've wanted to share. I've banged the girls I've wanted to bang. I've experienced what I've wanted to experience. And I have enough money in my pocket that I don't need to steal other people's drinks anymore, no trivial accomplishment if you've been there. It's true I could dig deeper, but I've hit the point of diminishing return in most things I've set out to do. You pass the peak of something and it becomes a grind, so it's easier to repeat the process with something new. But what new worthy goal should I set out to do? Try to write for a magazine? Get a book “professionally” published? Accumulate lots of money? Aim for fame? I wish I cared more about those things.

Lately I’m having some morbid thoughts. I do a lot of healthy things so that I can live a nice long life, but now I’m questioning that. People are running marathons twice a year so they can live until 85 instead of 70. But what are you going to do after 70? Go to Europe a couple times a year? Watch more television? Unless you’re lucky like Hugh Hefner, who’s looking pretty frail these days, old age is no joy ride, regardless of how healthy you can keep yourself. Would you trade shoes with your grandparents? Because that’s what you have to look forward to. I never believed it made much sense to plan to work your ass off now in order to make it to an age period where the grim reaper is on your doorstep, but I understand we need a lot of people to think that so society can function.

I think many people refuse to accept death. A deep fear of it then manifests itself in obsessions and compulsions with exercise and food (only grass fed and organic!), and sometimes environmental concerns (no plastic bags!). At least it keeps them busy. The reason I work out and eat right is now for mostly aesthetic reasons. I’d eat pizza and McGriddle sandwiches every day if it didn’t make me feel lousy and increase my body fat percentage. Why not otherwise? To preserve a couple years when the highlight of my day is waking up and realizing I’m not dead yet like many of my friends and relatives? I’ve read stories of the 80-year-old man lifting a piano over his head and another a few years younger building a fried chicken empire from scratch, but I’m realistic to know that those things probably won’t happen to me. And say I have children. Are they going to want to deal with an old man who can barely hear and do very little besides sit in a recliner and stare blankly off into space, reminiscing about the glory days where all his sexual perversions were satisfied? This isn’t Colombia where my kid is obligated to take care of me until I die but America where I’d be lucky if my nursing home is within 100 miles of my spawn.

I understand that while life is long, there is a window for the best years, starting in your early 20’s and ending somewhere in your late 40’s. I know I only have 30 good years at the most, and I have already used up a third of that. But right now I’m wasting my days, and I’m not sure how to get out of it.

Things I Love About America

June 3, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Amazon.com: Huge selection of anything I can possibly want, priced fairly with usually free shipping, and delivered right to my door. This is what I missed most about America.

Netflix: I get my choice of just about every movie ever made in the history of the world, also at a fair price. When I'm abroad I hit up Isohunt to download movies, but they are rarely enough seeds for the faggy foreign movies that I enjoy (I've seen just about everything from Pedro Almodovar).

Supermarkets: Huge warehouses stocked with a million items that allow me to make any type of recipe imaginable. In South America, it can be hard to find basic foods like broccoli, ginger, lemons, limes, salsa, spices, barbecue sauce, parmesan cheese, turkey or chicken breast, spinach, and decent bread. Standing in the produce section of an American supermarket now feels like I'm on a movie set. Fresh food here is expensive (cheeses, produce, meats), but all that processed garbage is very fairly priced.

Liquor Selection: Go to any bar and there are fifteen types of vodka, four types of bourbon, and six beers on tap. American night spots have great selection for whatever mood you happen to be in. In Brazil you're lucky if a bar has a palpable whisky. And besides for a couple exceptions, all South American beers taste exactly the same, along the lines of Budweiser.

Herbs/Remedies: Is your stomach growling and in need of some soothing peppermint? Need a specific vitamin supplement? Probiotics? Coenzyme Q10? Fish oil? Resveratol? These things can be hard to find and expensive in South America, but in the U.S. all you have to do is go to GNC or a site like iHerb.

Target/Walmart: One stop shopping for all your hygiene, home, clothing, and electronic needs, all at rock bottom prices. To be fair, there are Walmart-like stores in every South American country, but they tend to be out in the suburbs.

Customer Service: The customer is always right in the United States. Without having to raise your voice, businesses will do a decent job making sure your needs are met. In South America they just want your money and if there is a problem then too bad because they simply don't give a shit whether you are satisfied or not with their product. Even the staff is disrespectful: they will stop talking to you midway to look at a text message they've just received. American cable companies like Comcast look top-notch compared to the ones in South America (e.g. NET).

One afternoon in Rio may have had me going to two separate grocery stores, the pharmacy to buy shampoo, the "informatics" store in the mall to buy a USB stick, and then a hardware store to buy a plug extension. Three hours of my life, gone, when in the U.S. it would've taken an hour at most.

I'm sure you see the pattern. Most of the things I missed were based on our consumer culture: choice, convenience, and selection. Other than that, America has only one other benefit over foreign countries: health care.

Just kidding. There are no other benefits.

After Exactly One Month Back In The States…

June 10, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have some questions to ask you patriotic Americans about disturbing things I've noticed.

1. Why are the food creations so monstrous?

2. Why are people so big? How come big people don't have any shame?

3. Why are 50% of men either gay or dressing and acting gay? Is being gay cool now? Why is American culture losing knowledge on how to be a man?

4. Why do straight men in the bar line up to hit on the sloppiest girls wearing Target flip flops? Don't they know they're encouraging negative behavior?

5. Why do men well over 30-years-old, with wrinkles and gray hair, dress like hipsters with skinny jeans and Converse shoes?

6. Why can't people see the hypocrisy of caring about the environment while owning a car and flying in aeroplanes?

The girls are still easy at least.

The Three Components Of Female Beauty

June 15, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I used to think beauty was beauty, and a girl either had it or not. I was describing the genetic quality of a woman's beauty—her face, hair, and body type. Assuming a girl doesn't overdo it with the Haagen Dazs, she will score high on innate beauty if a psychologist measures her face for symmetry and proportion.

I spent a lot of time Argentina, a place where genetic beauty was very high, but wasn't too crazy about the women. One big reason was because they were lacking in two other components that make up true beauty, which are needed to predict how hard a man will chase for sex.

The first is femininity, and describes her appearance. Is she wearing high heels and makeup? Or is she wearing dirty Converse shoes and a cheap summer dress? Are her clothes snug, revealing her curves? Or does she look sloppy with baggy jeans? Is her hair long? Or did she cut it because she was too lazy to maintain it? While a girl can't change genetics, she has complete control over how feminine she appears.

Recently I went with my mother to visit her female doctor. Judging by the graduation date from the diploma hanging on her wall, the doctor was in her late 30's, but looked to be almost the same age as my mom. Her hair was completely gray (she doesn't dye it), she had no makeup on, and dressed like a menopausal woman. She moved like an old man. Someone who interacts with dozens of people a day was ugly in just about every way except for her intelligence, and has absolutely no pride in how she presents herself to the world. Unfortunately Western cultures are trending towards punishing women for appearing too feminine in the fear that they might be perceived as weak, dependent, and "girly." At the same time men are punished for being too masculine, resulting in an androgynous archetype that both sexes overlap with (in America it's common for some straight guys to be confused as gay, and some straight girls to be confused as dykes).

The final component is sexuality. It's all the behaviors a woman does, consciously or not, that announces to other men her fertility and ability in the bedroom. It's how she walks, how she looks at you, how she dances, and the minute changes she makes to her mouth while listening to you. It's the things that make a man bite his lip and vow to do anything to get her. It's the overall vibe that makes her a sexual animal and worth killing for (in prehistoric time, anyway). In my opinion this is the most important component of beauty because it takes the longest to get bored of. You can take for granted a girl's pretty face and painted toenails in a week or two, but the magic at which she gets your dick rock hard can last years.

To put things in perspective, let's compare the three components with four different cultures: America, Colombia, Argentina, and Brazil. Each has scores that range from 0 (lowest) to 10 (highest).

	America	Colombia	Argentina	Brazil

Genetic beauty	5	8	8	7
Femininity	2	6	5	8
Sexuality	2	6	3	9
Total Score	9	20	16	24

Even with my overly generous rating of Americans, they are still half the women of Colombians and Argentines, and a third of the Brazilians. While Brazilian women are on average not the prettiest in South America, they blow away their counterparts in the other categories. When American women look like men (I predict this will happen in 50 years), a sound option for American guys will be to move to Brazil working on some oil rig or as Amazonian logger.

Having a girl with high genetic beauty and femininity is nice because your conquest is constantly validated with others staring at her, but this gets old after a short while. If you're going for long-term happiness and pleasure then she needs to have that high sexuality score. If you're in a country where sexuality is punished, or the women simply don't have the knowledge or capacity to be sexual, then I think you already know what you have to do.

Drunk Girls Are Not The Easiest

June 20, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

South American girls don't drink nearly as much as American girls. When I was in clubs down there I'd imagine how much easier my job would be if they didn't nurse their drinks. How many more bangs I would have if they didn't average only two or three for the entire night!

When guys asked me what the deal was in getting with foreign girls, I complained about their slow drinking and how it was harder to get down to business. But was I really getting more in the States because the girls there drank more?

I don't like to make conclusions with looking at the data, so I reflected on circumstances surrounding the first times I had sex with American girls. First thing I immediately realized was that I never banged a girl who was trashed or shit-faced. This is probably because drunk girls are almost impossible to game. They can't maintain a conversation, can't stand straight, and are like retards in how they process stimuli. I believe guys perceive them as easy because they are nearly unconscious and will not be able to put up a strong fight on the way to a bedroom.

(If you want to look at how cockblocking evolved here, look no further than the drinking habits of American girls. If there wasn't a cockblocking mentality then there'd be a million rapes every weekend because so many of these girls are too immature and stupid to ensure their safety by not drinking to the point of blacking out. They need to babysit each other like little children up until at least their late 20's. But it's when girls unnecessarily cockblock, which they do out of habit, that provokes annoyance and sometimes anger from men like myself.)

For my study I chose a sample size of five American and five South American girls I most recently banged and rated them on their drunkenness at the time of initial penetration. Here's the scale I used:

1: Completely sober.
2: Two drinks. More outgoing and chatty.
3: Tipsy. More flirty with slower movements.
4: Very tipsy. Eyes closing, problems speaking.
5: On the verge of passing out or puking.

Let's start with the American girls first.

American Girl A: She was drunk enough that The Rookie almost got some right after me. Score: 4
American Girl B: Mostly sober. She kept saying "I don't usually do this." Score: 2
American Girl C: She had a few strong drinks. I noticed her speech ability decrease slightly. Score: 3
American Girl D: Sweated out much of the alcohol by dancing. No obvious sign of intoxication. Score: 2

American Girl E: Just a tad tipsy, but otherwise very coherent. Score: 2

Average American score: 2.6

Now for the South American girls.

S.A. Girl A: She was very tipsy when I met her, but the night I hit she only had two drinks. Score: 2
S.A. Girl B: She walked nearly half a mile to my place without any difficulty. Score: 2
S.A. Girl C: We had a glass of wine and then fell asleep. We woke up a couple hours later, completely sober, and did the dirty for the first time. Score: 1
S.A. Girl D: I bought a lot of booze in the hopes of getting her drunk, but she didn't even finish the first drink. Score: 1
S.A. Girl E: Did it the morning when we were completely sober. Score: 1

Average South American score: 1.4

My sample set says that, on average, American girls are twice as intoxicated as South American girls when I have sex with them. Since these aren't standardized for time, I cannot firmly conclude that girls who drink more are easier (though I think it's safe to accept), but I can conclude that American girls are more comfortable having sex under the influence. Alcohol is more of a sex lubricant to American girls while for South American girls it's dancing or simply nothing.

South America was the first place where I'd kiss or fuck girls who were completely sober. Developing game in the United States I had a belief that alcohol was essential to intimacy, but I understand now that it's a cultural phenomenon, albeit one that cannot be ignored. While you don't need to get American girls drunk to fuck, you should drink to connect with them at night. You can cover your sobriety by lying about how you're the designated driver or what have you, but truth is no girl wants to fuck the designated driver. In South America you can take a girl for a walk in the park and then hit for the first time. I'm not exaggerating.

Most Livable Country: Colombia, Brazil, or Argentina?

June 22, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My master plan was to live in Colombia, Brazil, and Argentina for six months each, and then evaluate which was best to live in for extended periods of time. Here are the total lengths of time I stayed in each country during my last trip:

Colombia: Six months
Brazil: Five and a half months
Argentina: One and a half months

I left Brazil a little early because of when my monthly lease in Rio ended (I didn't have the will to mill around in hostels for two weeks).

Argentina was a different story. You know those medical experiments that end early because one condition far outperformed another? If I remember correctly they did this with an HIV study in Africa where they tested if circumcision led to lower infection rates. It proved to be such a strong benefit that they ended the experiment early to tell the uncut guys to immediately get cut. Well that's why I left Argentina so soon—the little data I had in my hands told me that it wasn't a place that would have brought me more happiness than Colombia or Brazil.

That said, here is my evaluation of what it's like to live in all three countries, along with my declaration of the best.

LAW ENFORCEMENT

Colombia: While there is a police presence, you can go all day without seeing a single squad car. Sometimes you only see cops on dinky motorcycles that look like dirt bikes. There is no heavy hand of the law here.

Brazil: Maybe only a decade behind the U.S. in terms of the Big Brother factor. The police are heavily armed, well financed (from an equipment standpoint), and make frequent stops. There are speed cameras and sobriety checkpoints. You don't go long without seeing a cop car on the street. While the laws are more lax than in the U.S., Brazil is not a good place to openly fuck around. Even though Western media loves to portray favelas as lawless, police are generally on top of their shit outside of them.

Argentina: Police are positioned in street corners within rich areas of big cities. They don't seem particularly well-trained or competent, probably because the country has been spared from narco-wars. It's unlikely you'll be bothered here.

Advantage: Argentina

PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION

Colombia: Local buses are run by private companies. While cheap, the lines are confusing and the buses old and very uncomfortable. The routes are not always logical and transfers are commonly needed. Medellin's metro line though is clean, safe, and very reliable, but often crowded. The one good thing about the buses is that they come very frequently and you can flag them down anywhere along the route.

Brazil: Buses here are slow, lumbering beasts, the big versions you see in American cities. They come often and are reliable but you generally have to walk to a designated stop instead of being able to stick your hand out wherever you please. They aren't that cheap, starting at about 2.20 R$ for a single trip.

Argentina: They have big buses like in Brazil but are almost impossible to use without insider knowledge because of nondescript signage. In Argentina you'll only see something like "H7," while in the other countries they'll be a placard detailing a dozen or so stops.

Advantage: Colombia

SUPERMARKET FOOD

Colombia: It's hard to find lemons or lunch meats in the bird family. Most sell peanut butter at inflated rates. Boneless chicken breast is usually frozen.

Brazil: Doubly hard to find lemons, and even common vegetables like broccoli and zucchini can be MIA. Peanut butter is astronomically priced. Great selection of fruits, cheeses, and lunch meats. Boneless chicken breast is usually frozen.

Argentina: Lemons are everywhere! But limes are incredibly hard to find, as is peanut butter. Poor selection of cheese, lunch meat, and fruits, but excellent choice of wines. Boneless chicken breast is refrigerated and of good quality, though much more expensive than their famed red meat.

Advantage: Brazil

RESTAURANT FOOD

Colombia: Not much selection in local fare except for dirty diners, but you'll find many decent fusion restaurants in tourist centers, usually run by expats. I still don't know what typifies Colombian cuisine besides stews, arepas, and fried snacks.

Brazil: Beans, rice, and meat seem to be the Brazilian staple. Local restaurants have fixed plates that will serve bland but filling meals of rice, beans, potatoes, and meat. There is more of a food tradition with dishes like feijoada and moqueca, but convenience foods like pizza and fried bread snacks are beginning to fatten the population. Upmarket restaurants put interesting spins on typical foods.

Argentina: Great value for breakfast and lunch, especially the latter where for $5 or $6 you get a tasty three-course meal with beverage. While restaurant service here is the worst, you'll find far more creative fare with more European influence than in Brazil and Colombia. Argentina is also a better pick for the foodie who is impressed by plate presentation.

Advantage: Argentina

WOMEN

Colombia: The hardest part of getting laid in Colombia is dealing with the language barrier (you won't meet too many girls who speak English), but if you're conversational in Spanish and approach during the day you shouldn't have too many issues banging cute girls. Flakiness will be your main problem.

Brazil: Brazil has proven to be a country of streaks for me and my gringo friends. You'll bang three girls in a couple weeks then get nothing for a while. Otherwise the country is very gringo friendly and you'll find tons of girls who speak English. The okay girls are quite easy to get in bed, but the cuter ones take more work. Towards the end of my time in Brazil I was getting sick of all the mediocre girls throwing themselves on me and having to seemingly rely on luck and the numbers game to get anywhere with the quality ones.

Argentina: These girls have a reputation for being difficult and I find that to be the case. Not only will you work your ass off to get laid, it won't be with one of the hotties that you went there for in the first place. My second trip to Argentina I gave up on the women and found myself a Brazilian girl.

Advantage: Brazil

NIGHTLIFE

Colombia: Tables and chairs. People prefer to sit down everywhere, even in clubs, but on the plus side nightlife is concentrated in the cities so it's easy to stumble on a variety of places that have electronic, rock, pop, or local music. Bars are a total bust in meeting people. Clubs have decent value in terms of cover charges and drinks.

Brazil: Much more Western in that people mingle. While typical bars offer tables for socializing among friends, you can find bars where there is standing and movement. Some cities have nightlife centered in specific areas, but others like Rio can be quite spread out and hard to get around. Cover charges for the high-end clubs can be astronomical.

Argentina: It has the typical bars with tables, which people start going to around midnight, and then a progressive club scene with rotating DJs develops after 2am. The nightlife is agreeable for younger kids with energy to stay up all night and dance, but for older guys over 30 it can be quite annoying to go out so late to deal with girls who aren't even drinking anyway. A positive is that the value is very good, and you won't pay much for cover charges and drinks.

Advantage: Brazil

COFFEE SHOPS

Colombia: There is a cafe culture with the Juan Valdez shops where you can sit with your latte and laptop for an hour or two. Ironically one of the best cafes I've been to in Medellin was the McCafe.

Brazil: Brazilians love their cafezinho (espresso shot), but they don't linger. Since all coffee shops have waiters, they don't expect you to sit down and write the next greatest American novel. For that you need to go to the mall and find a Starbucks, which is prohibitively expensive (10 R$ for a caramel frapp).

Argentina: Hands down the best coffee shop scene. Big cities have tons of pleasant cafes with wireless internet and delicious sweets. There is a lingering culture here so feel free to camp out for a couple hours.

Advantage: Argentina

SAFETY

Colombia: Safer than I was led to believe. I never had issues walking around at night even in shady areas. It's a shame that the stereotype of the country being a warzone persists, but in a way this is good because it keeps out a lot of gringos who visit Costa Rica or Panama instead.

Brazil: Most dangerous of the three. While I've never been robbed in Brazil, I keep hearing stories that tell me my Brazilian-like appearance probably helped keep me safe (though don't think Brazilians don't get robbed). Brazil is very unforgiving for gringos who don't have a lot of travel experience, though the most common "robbery" is getting severely overcharged by a taxi driver. I have to dedicate more energy here to staying safe than I would like.

Argentina: I've never heard a gringo getting mugged here—only petty theft in bus stations. Many times in Cordoba it didn't feel like I was in South America at all.

Advantage: Argentina

FRIENDLINESS OF THE LOCALS

Colombia: Very friendly. They are much more intrigued that you're a gringo and will always ask about where you're from and why you're in their country. They're almost thankful that you're visiting Colombia.

Brazil: It depends. I've met some incredibly rude and cold Brazilians, and I've met some who welcomed me into their home without even wondering if I could be a ax murderer or not. I would say Brazilian people are friendlier than Americans, but their friendliness is overhyped by quite a bit. A better term to describe them is warm—within a short time you'll feel quite at ease, like you've known them forever.

Argentina: Outside of clubs Argentines are friendlier than Brazil, believe it or not. Even though Brazil has a more open culture to gringos, it seemed easier to make superficial friendships in Argentina with random people. I accumulated more phone numbers of both guys and girls one month in Argentina than six months in Brazil. A lot of guys though initially mistake the friendliness of Argentine women to be that they're easy. They learn eventually.

Advantage: Undecided

TAXIS

Colombia: Taxi drivers are usually honest, and are great to practice Spanish with. All I had to do is ask "How are you today/tonight?" and we'd get into a long conversation. Towards the end of my time here I had pretty tight taxicab game, rarely getting ripped off.

Brazil: Taxis here are the worst. It's very rare that a taxi driver, no matter how nice to me on the surface, will not try to scam me. I've had to argue with so many that I dreaded taking a Brazilian cab—I began taking buses everywhere instead, even late at night.

While getting ripped off rarely means more than a $5 difference, it was the principality of it.

Argentina: Mostly honest, though less friendly than the Colombians.

Advantage: Colombia

MUSIC

Colombia: You got three main choices here: salsa, reggaeton, and vallenato, all of which are danceable, in addition to your normal house clubs. Plus you got Juanes, Colombia's Michael Jackson, and Shakira, Colombia's Shania Twain. Rock is also popular.

Brazil: Brazil has a very rich musical culture. Each state has their own flavor of music and you can live here for years until you know them all. From traditional samba to pagode and forro (I need more triangle!) to the newfangled tecno brega, music is an important part of how Brazilians connect with each other and pass the time, but most of the music is hard to dance to for the average gringo. Expensive clubs usually have Western music (fun fact: the song "Forever Young" is huge in Brazil).

Argentina: Reggaeton is slowly making its way here in addition to mainstays like cuarteto, cumbia, rock, and house. Argentines are pretty crazy about house music, but unfortunately they have very little idea how to dance to it.

Advantage: Colombia

CELL PHONE SERVICE

Colombia: Expensive and mostly reliable, though some text messages remain in the ether for hours until delivered. You have a lot of options on the street to make cheap calls from minuto celular vendors.

Brazil: Crazy expensive at more than 50 cents a minute if calling another cell phone from your own. Your only other option is Skype as they don't have phone vendors on the street like in Colombia. Text messages sometimes get temporarily lost here too.

Argentina: About the same as Colombia, but no minuto celular vendors.

Advantage: Colombia

LANGUAGE CLASSES

Colombia: Group classes can be found at reasonable prices, from $5-10 an hour.

Brazil: Expensive as balls. Prices starts at $20 an hour for group classes if you include "enrollment" and "material" fees. I eventually found a private tutor for $35 an hour that I used for two hours a week, but I couldn't help but feel raped. Everyone I met reminded me that I was indeed getting raped. Unfortunately Portuguese is harder to learn on your own because of a dearth of self-study materials.

Argentina: The cheapest, which is why so many gringos come here to study Spanish. You can find freelance private tutors starting at $6 an hour.

Advantage: Argentina

VALUE

Colombia: Great value that is slowly diminishing as both the economy (and peso) get stronger.

Brazil: While I was in Brazil I felt like I was paying American prices. Besides grocery store food there is very little value to be found. It was rare that I felt like I was getting a good deal on something.

Argentina: Super great value that will only get better as the peso crashes and burns due to continued government incompetence. They say the Argentine government is so corrupt because their ancestors are Italian.

Advantage: Argentina

VIBE

Colombia: Colombia is full of good-natured, curious people who want to learn about foreigners while showing the best of what their culture has to offer. While Colombians don't go nuts like Brazilians, they're a sensual people who are fun to pass the time with. Edgy city life keeps you engaged and interested.

Brazil: Brazilians are constantly in celebratory moods, and it seems like there is always some type of street party or event that makes for a good excuse to start drinking early in the day. There are lots of nightlife choices and daytime activities, and the locals are always ready to party and meet others. The sexual atmosphere is very favorable to visitors of both sexes.

Argentina: You're not going to have much fun here unless you get into a social circle or have some sort of university class or job where you can make easy friends. Argentines are diehard conformists and always worried about what other people think of them, so there is not much in way of personal flair or spontaneous excitement. But once you get to know some cool people, you'll have a good time and maybe bang a cutie or two.

Advantage: Brazil

There is no debate in my mind that the overall winner is Brazil. While it doesn't outperform Colombia and Argentina in all categories, and is also frighteningly expensive, it's the one place in South America that I must return to. It's also the best option for the single man. While Colombia is a fine choice as well, I think it's worth saving up your money for a Brazilian adventure that I guarantee will be the first of many.

While I've tried my best to explain Brazil's charm in previous writings, it's something you have to experience yourself to understand why fans like me love it so much. I remember something a man told me many years ago: "There are two types of men—those who haven't been to Brazil, and those who are trying to go back." Not a week goes by that I don't fantasize about what my third visit to the country will be like.

New Book Tomorrow

June 27, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s my shortest at only 54 pages, but it has information that is pretty hard to find anywhere else. Here’s the availability breakdown:

Paperback: $12.47
Kindle: $0.99
eBook: Free download

I’m experimenting with a “pay what what you want” model for the eBook. If you like the book then you’ll be able to donate. Full details tomorrow.

Bang Colombia: Textbook On How To Pick Up Women In Colombia

June 28, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Four and a half years ago, after visiting Venezuela, I got the idea of doing a travel pickup guide. Hints of it were seen in my Real Man Travel Guides blog along with my book A Dead Bat In Paraguay, but I never commited myself to writing a complete guide for one country. In the past year I realized that my free time and background made me very qualified to work on such a project, and that it'd be fun to try. At the start of my fifth month in Colombia I buckled down and began work on Bang Colombia, finishing it about nine months later. Here's the synopsis:

> Bang Colombia is a strategy guide designed to help you sleep with Colombian women in Colombia without paying for it. It contains dozens of moves, lines, and tips learned after six months of research in Medellin, where I dedicated my existence to cracking the code of Colombian women, who are more challenging than their Western counterparts. In addition to teaching you the differences between Colombian and Western culture, it details the logistics of traveling through Colombia, tips on studying Spanish, a packing guide, and recommended nightlife for the country's three largest cities. You'll learn three effective methods of meeting Colombian women, how to combat their flakey nature, how to ask them out via email and phone, how to date them, how to seal the deal quickly using non-obvious shortcuts (even if you're staying at a hostel), and much more. With lines shared in both English and Spanish, Bang Colombia aims to be a must-read for every Western man visiting the country.

You can get your copy at BangColombia.com. It's available in paperback or Kindle editions from Amazon, and a "pay what you want" eBook in PDF format that is free to download with no strings attached. If you choose to donate, you'll get a little bonus as an extra thanks for supporting the book. On the website I also share notes of the mindset it took to write the book and specific details of exactly what's inside.

May every man who reads the guide get their Colombian flag.

Why Bang Colombia?

June 30, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

From a business standpoint, writing Bang Colombia was a big risk. How many of my readers have thoughts of visiting Colombia in the next year or two? I'll be surprised if it was more than 50. That means I spent many months writing a book for a few dozen people. Why didn't I work on my day game book first, which is much more likely to be a financial success?

A couple years ago I realized that you have to write a book because of some duty that calls within you, whether you think the result will be successful or not. I simply had to write Bang Colombia before anything else. I wrote a game book, wrote a travel memoir, lived abroad, dated a lot of South American women—it'd be a waste of experience for me not to.

Anyone who has wrote a book knows it has to be more than about the money. There has to be a calling that drives you to grind it out in front of a screen for hundreds of hours when a million other professions would pay you more for much less frustration. In the end you have to be proud of what you do regardless of what your bank statement says. Otherwise you're a sellout and a hack.

As for the future, my plans are finally falling into place after a rather aimless start back in the States. I'm horrendous at keeping schedules, but here's what I want to do in the next year:

July: Complete text messaging guide
August-October: Complete day game book rough draft
November: Complete epilogue to A Dead Bat In Paraguay
December-January: Complete 2nd draft to day game book
February: Prepare for next trip
March: Eastern Europe? Ethiopia and the Middle East? Brazil?
April-June: Finalize day game book while abroad

I've already written the outline to the day game book, so it's just a matter of hauling my ass to the coffee shop for dreaded marathon sessions that I haven't had to do since A Dead Bat In Paraguay. To hold you over until I'm done with it, check out the day game tips in my newsletter and also in Bang Colombia.

In Brazil I wrote a very rough draft to an unnamed game book which I was thinking of releasing next, but based on its subject matter it'd be more logical to get the day game book out first. So you'll see two more game books from me hopefully soon and then I think I'll take a hiatus for a little while. I'll go live in a quiet village for a couple months or something. Maybe I'll pick up with some fiction or more travel writing after that.

I'm not lifting a finger until after the holiday. Then it's going to be like I have a full time job. At least for a little while.

I Forgot How It's Like To Get Cockblocked

July 5, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I went to Cafe Citron with The Rookie on a recent Thursday night. It used to be one of the only Latin spots in the city, always packed with sweaty, aggressive Central American dudes, but so many new salsa spots have opened that it was barely half full this time.

There were three girls dancing in a tight circle near us, definitely the hottest ones there.

"I'm trying to think of my line," Rookie said.

"Doesn't matter, it's a suicide mission right now. One girl won't just stop dancing with her friends to talk to you." I thought about it for a second and added, "A dancing approach could work."

"I'll just wait until one goes to the bathroom."

"Or goes to the bar."

One went to the bar. She was closest to me so I made a move. I tap tapped her on the shoulder. She turned around. "Excuse me but your salsa dancing seems like it's from Colombia."

"Why do you think that?"

"Just the movements. That's how Colombian people dance to salsa." I was making this up of course.

"No actually I'm from Brazil."

Living in Brazil for six months has given me an automatic two minute conversation with B girls in the States, because they're mildly curious about the where and why of my time there. I told this girl a few sentences in Portuguese and she's smiling and asking me light questions, but I noticed her body was angled towards the bar, as if she wanted to walk away. To gauge her interest I said, "Sorry I didn't mean to stop you on your way to getting a drink." She was totally free to leave at that point without being rude. Instead she said, "No that's fine." I was getting ready to buckle down when her two friends simultaneously pulled her away from me in a coordinated attack.

I went back to my spot and was trying to understand the emotions I was feeling. It was a mixture of disappointment, annoyance, and confusion. Why would those girls do that? Didn't they see she was having a nice conversation with a non-creepy guy? It's not like I was trying to lead her to another part of the bar. I didn't even start touching her yet.

It's true I've been cockblocked in South America, but usually when doing throwaway approaches on the street or when talking to a girl who had a boyfriend I failed to spot. It has been about 14 months since getting assaulted with a cockblock of this caliber. Standing there with my warm Corona beer, I tried to remember back to when this used to be a common occurrence.

An hour later came closing time and the lights got brighter. I was walking out with the Rookie when he spotted the Brazilian leaving with her group. "I'll try again," I said.

I reapproached her in Portuguese. Before I could even finish my sentence, a new female friend wrapped her arm around her and led her away.

“Wow that was rude,” I said to the new cockblocker.

I don’t remember the exact words, but there were a couple tense back and forths where she told me to fuck off while I told her that her that she has no class.

We were out on the sidewalk so I expected a white knight to “save” her and get in my face, but I forgot that Latino men are not as pussified as American betas. One came up to me and said, “Stop talking to that bitch.” He probably got cockblocked by her earlier.

It’s been too long that I’ve gotten into an argument with a cockblocker, so my attack was not as strong as I would’ve liked (she definitely wasn’t about to cry and seemed to get a kick out of our little street battle). And then it hit me—I actually had a scripted counterattack to this problem.

> If you get cockblocked by a girl, you need to respond by shaking her core so hard that she hesitates doing it ever again, like a mouse who hits the wrong lever and gets the shit zapped out of him. No jokes and no wit—you gotta get dirty.
>
> This is what you must say to the cockblocker. Say it with a stern tone, like a parent scolding a child.
>
> “Did you really just do that? I’m being friendly and respectful to your friend and you rudely interrupt. Did your parents teach you to be anti-social like that?”
>
> Then shake your head and turn your back on her. Don’t engage her in a conversation or even act like you hear her response. She no longer exists.

It had to have been bad if I started an anti-cockblocking movement, and while from a sociological perspective it’s interesting how cockblocking is a cultural phenomenon, I’m ready to destroy the next ugly bitch that interrupts me while I’m talking to a girl that is obviously considering having this hairiness on top of her in the throes of passion.

What Happened To Baltimore?

July 7, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After college a couple guys introduced me to a Baltimore spot called Hammerjacks. Now closed, it was a huge warehouse-style club that had an open bar for $20 on "college" Thursday nights. It was there I started my game journey, first with dance floor crotch-on-ass game. The large size of the club meant I could approach a million girls if I wanted to, and the initial successes I had in Hammerjacks gave me the confidence to transition to talking game in D.C. bars.

One of the reasons I stopped going to Baltimore every week was because the logistics were horrible. I didn't have one-night stand game back then so it was pointless to drive an hour for a date to see a girl who most likely lived in a dorm. I still visited Baltimore monthly because the girls were definitely of higher quality than in D.C.

I can't say that anymore.

I went on a Friday a few weeks ago to both Canton and Fells Point for the first time in over a year and was stunned and how huge, sloppy, and ugly the girls were. The only approachable girl I saw was waiting in line of a pizza place. I actually wished to be back in D.C., and I hate D.C.

The reason Hammerjacks kept me interested for so long was because those girls I was grinding my junk on were babyfaced teenagers who weren't technically from Baltimore. While the area of Federal Hill may have some college cuties (I'm thinking of the bar Dirk McGerk), I completely understand why all the guys who email me from Baltimore say the scene is a wasteland. Without finding a niche I don't see how I could be happy there. The city is dead to me.

The Medellín Diaries (Part 1 of 5)

July 11, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Karl said it was the Americans who ruined it for all gringos. “In the past two years there have been boatloads of Americans coming to Colombia to have sex with prostitutes. You can go on the internet and see it—sites devoted just to fucking them like which brothel to go to and who will let you do it in their butt without a condom. The families here know what’s going on and now they’re very hesitant to let their daughters date a gringo, because they think we’re all like the Americans. Are American girls that hard to fuck?”

“No actually I think they’re pretty easy,” I said.

“So why are millions of American men fucking prostitutes here and pretty much anywhere that’s poor?”

“Well you need game to have sex with American girls. It’s like a special key, and once you have it it’s somewhat automatic. Lots of guys never learn it or they’re old and fat and don’t care anymore.”

I had been in Colombia for only two weeks. The first ten days was in Bogotá and now I moved into a sort of gringo boarding house in Medellín. Most of the residents were single guys who were in Colombia either for sex or drugs. There were a few older men in their 40′s who would tell me about the prostitutes they were banging with such excitement that I think they expected me to give them a high five or a pat on the back.

Karl, who was Swedish, was staying in the room next to me. He was approaching a year in Medellín, well past the date on his entry stamp. “I’ll just pay a stupid fine,” he told me. He had blonde hair and baby blue eyes, a deadly combination in South America that would get his foot in the door more often than not. It didn’t matter that he was short and had to balance on his tippy toes to reach the top cabinet in the kitchen—girls were drawn to something their country could not produce. Unfortunately my complexion is the perfect shade of brown that allows me to fit in just about anywhere on the American side of the world, and unless I open my mouth girls think I’m a local. I’ll only stand out in Africa, Asia, or Iceland. Even Sweden, Karl told me, is stocked full of Turkish immigrants who work in döner kebab restaurants and look just like me.

My fifth night in Medellín was a Sunday. I finally got over a case of laryngitis and was ready to go out and flirt. I didn’t get much action in Bogotá so the pressure was building to get my Colombian flag out of the way before it became a big deal.

I asked Karl if there was a good place to go out on Sunday night. Two hours later we were in a cab on our way to a small hip-hop club called Karma. Sunday was their busiest night.

“I don’t want to spend a lot of money tonight,” Karl said as we got in line.

“Yeah neither do I.”

“You want to go in on a bottle of rum? It’ll be cheaper that way.”

“How much is it?

“48 thousand.” $24 dollars.

“Yeah sure.” I figured my half of the bottle would last me the entire night. We went inside and made our way to the bar. The club was packed.

From the few nights that I went out in Bogotá, it was clear that girls hang out in big groups of guys, and according to Karl it’s because they can’t afford their own drinks. They need to go out with someone who can buy them liquor.

“A lot of these guys are drug dealers so you have to be careful,” Karl said.

“What does that mean?”

“Just don’t talk to any girls with guys who look mean.”

“But all the girls here are with mean-looking guys.”

“Yeah that’s a problem in this place.”

In Colombian clubs there’d be several girls who would stare at me, but when I’d walk up to say hi a random guy would pop in from nowhere to listen to the conversation or butt in. Isolation was difficult. The guys were very protective of the girls and the only option I saw was to approach the guys first. Maybe compliment their ubiquitous graphic t-shirt or something.

The rum was sweet and the hip-hop music made it go down my throat easier. Even when the ice cubes in my glass melted I drank the rum straight, warm. It didn’t take long to finish my half of the bottle. I lost Karl at some point and later found him outside smoking a cigarette while texting on his phone. “Bro the girls are hot, but it’s hard to pick up here,” I said.

“Yeah you don’t pick up in the clubs—you pick them up on the internet and then you invite them with you to the club. Buy a bottle and have a good time.”

“Plus the guys… I don’t think they like me.”

“Yeah because you’re making them jealous. When a guy looks at you twice it’s because he caught his girl checking you out.”

“What happens if he looks at you three times?”

“That could be serious. Be careful because I almost got killed one time.”

“Killed?”

“It was one night that I was so drunk.”

“Isn’t that every night?”

“No shutup.” He looked up from his phone and took a drag from his cigarette. “I talked to this girl who was with a big guy and even when he got in my face I kept talking to her. He wouldn’t go away and I said, ‘What are you going to do?’ He said he was going to take me outside and stab me in the neck. I said, ‘Let’s go bitch.’”

“Smart move.”

“I was really drunk.” He laughed and took another drag. “The bouncer saw what was going on though and pulled me out while the guy was yelling and pointing at me with his hand shaped like a gun. I waited outside 45 minutes for him to come out but he never did. I got into a cab and went home. What they do is call the sicarios—assassins—who live in the hills. They ride to the club in their cheap motorbikes and wait for you to get into a taxi. Then they follow you and when you stop at a red light they pull alongside the taxi and start shooting. And you're done. Sometimes they give money to the taxi driver to help pay for the damage."

Thing is Karl didn't learn his lesson. When we went back inside the club he kept trying to talk to guys who obviously didn't want to talk to him, and I had to keep pulling him away. The bouncer kept his eyes on us. I realized that Karl was the type of guy that could get me killed, without doing it on purpose of course.

I went to the bathroom and when I came back Karl had a fresh bottle of rum and was drinking straight from it. He could barely stand. The bouncer eventually had enough when he started talking shit to another guy and kicked us both out. Karl's bottle had disappeared by then and I think someone stole it, since he told me never to leave bottles of booze laying around in a club.

On the cab ride back to the house my head started to spin. Both of us ended up puking.

TO BE CONTINUED

The Medellín Diaries (Part 2 of 5)

July 12, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY: Part 1

Karl's room was small and only had a twin size bed. I had a table with chairs in mine, so I'd leave my door open as an invitation for him to stop by. He usually would, always with a bottle of beer in his hand. We had a cleaning service but because of his crushing hangovers he'd keep telling the maid "mañana." It wouldn't take long for the pizza boxes, dirty clothes, beer bottles, and trash bags with used condoms inside them to pile up next to his bed. His room smelled like anus.

Downstairs was a fridge of booze with a log sheet to mark each bottle we took. Karl's box was completely full of hash marks. Every other day he jokingly accused me of charging beers to his account. We did some backwards analysis and calculated that he drank about eight bottles a day, which was less than another gringo staying down the hall who killed a 12-pack every day of the cheapest beer that was sold in the supermarket.

"Did you see the American guy bring another girl?" I asked.

"No I didn't see her. How many girls is that now?"

"I think that's four in as many days. They're pretty beastly though—I mean I know you'd bang them but I got standards." I paused for a second to allow him to react to my insult, but he didn't. "I asked him how he was meeting them and he told me they were from a previous trip. I dug some more and he told me his strategy: meet girls during the day."

"At the mall?"

"No on the street. He says he simply goes up to girls and asks them if they want to have lunch with him. He said, 'None of these poor girls turn down a free meal. And it only costs you a few dollars. Then you bring them back to your place and they open their legs.' But he says the girls are so poor that he has to give them taxi fare back home."

"Oh yeah the barrio girls don't have any money. Most didn't finish secondary school and now they just walk around centro, or they get their nails done."

"Where did you meet your girlfriend?"

"On the internet. I'm shy I don't like walking up to girls."

"Your girl is cute though. Today I was on that site you told me about for an hour and only found five girls who weren't monsters."

"Yeah it takes time, but that's the same site I met her on. We've been going out for a year now. You know I was married to a Colombian before right?"

"No you didn't tell me."

"A few years ago I got married but it didn't work out. We married right here in Medellín but divorced in Sweden. It lasted two years."

"You think you're going to marry this girl?"

“Oh I don’t know. I want to start a business here with her. Or maybe take her back to Sweden. She’s a good girl.”

“What are you doing now for money?” I asked.

“Online gambling.”

“Poker?”

“No, robots.”

“Robots?”

“I have these robots which know how to beat the house long enough to get the sign-up bonus, so I find people to run the robots for me. I pay them a cut of the winnings. Business used to be good but it has slowed down.”

“How much were you making?”

“Oh back then when it was good—$300 a day.”

“Damn!” I did the mental calculation in my head—almost ten grand a month.

“Ooph it was crazy. Me and my partner would fly around to Mexico, Las Vegas, Barcelona, just blowing money. I had a penthouse here in Poblado on the top floor of a building. It was huge with a bar and a hot tub. I was paying 2.5 million pesos and month for it and then I was going out and spending another 200,000 pesos a night. I would buy bottles and pour it into people’s cups. Girls would notice and ask me to dance and we’d do pick-me-ups.”

“Pick-me-ups?”

“Cocaine. For the penthouse I bought a grocery bag of cocaine and dumped it on the bar. It was a huge mountain of coke.” He rested his hands on the table shoulder-width apart and moved them up to shape an imaginary pile. “It was like in the movie Scarface and I’d have people over and they’d put their nose in the pile and start sniffing. But I don’t have that kind of money now.”

“What happened to all the money?”

“I blew it all. I haven’t saved anything. Never in my life have I saved.”

“Sounds kind of romantic,” I said. “I’m too reasonable to do something like that.”

“Do you do coke?”

“No I’ve never done it.”

“Oh I got to get you to do it. It really picks you up.”

“Once in while I smoke weed.”

“Dude the weed here is so cheap. You can get a joint for maybe 9,000 pesos, the size of a thick cigar. It will last you for days and it’s the strong shit, but I don’t like weed it makes me sick. Next time I call my drug dealer I’ll get you one. I haven’t talked to him in a while.”

I asked him if he was trying to go out later and he said he’d think about it. A club called

Babylon was having ladies night. Girls get in free and guys pay 30,000 pesos for all they can drink. Another one of my gringo friends went the week before and picked up a cutie, saying when he walked in he was approached almost immediately and didn't have to do any work for the rest of the night.

A few hours later Karl came in my room dressed up in dark jeans, an ironed collared shirt and a fitted blue blazer. Every Scandinavian guy I've met has had style. We hopped in a cab soon after and on the way there he saw a Mercedes S-series ahead of us on the right.

"Rapido, rapido, quiero hablar con ese carro," he told the taxi driver.

In the car was a portly man with three girls. Karl said some things in Spanish that I couldn't understand.

"Who was that?" I asked.

"He owns the Poblado apartment I rented. He's the biggest player in Medellín. Always has half a dozen girlfriends."

"So he has money?"

"Of course dummy. Didn't you see his car? Girls are lining up to get fucked by him. His father is rich, owns land throughout the country. He was thinking of importing a Ferrari here, but thought that may make him a kidnapping target. He could afford it though. I remember one time he gave me his business card and sent me into the grocery store to give it to this beautiful barrio girl. You know those girls who give out samples in the stores? They make shit, maybe 10,000 pesos a day. Her parents wet their pants that the richest guy in Medellín wanted to take out their daughter. It's like winning the lottery."

"What happened?"

"He took her out on a date, but he said she had a scar on her chin that he didn't like. When she was little she had a cat that scratched her."

We got to the club and sat down on cheap wooden chairs next to the bar, which was so wide you had to yell at the top of your lungs for the bartender to hear you.

"I'm so tired I shouldn't have taken those sleeping pills earlier. I need a pick-me-up." He was drunk. He drank five beers before we left and a quarter of bottle of rum. The bartender had just handed us another bottle, the same brand that caused us to puke the other night.

After a drink I followed Karl outside to watch him smoke a cigarette. While he was on the phone trying to convince the guy with the Mercedes to come to Babylon, a guy approached me selling chicle (gum). There's a million guys selling chicle on the streets in Colombia because Colombians chew the most gum per capita in the world, or so I'm told. I declined and then he said, "Que tal cocaina?"

"No pero tal vez mi amigo quiera."

He wanted patiently for Karl to get off the phone and then started his pitch. Karl was interested. While leaning back against an old Datsun he bargained the chicle guy down to 15,000 pesos for a big hit.

“Where are you going to do it?” I asked.

“In the bathroom.”

“But the counter is dirty.”

“I’ll just use my keys.”

He went into the bathroom to do his drugs and when he didn’t come out ten minutes later I thought maybe he had passed out. I walked in to see if everything was okay and heard him talking on the phone in Spanish, probably to his girlfriend. He stayed in that stall for almost an hour.

I couldn’t do better than an ugly girl who approached me when we initially walked in. Girls wouldn’t even give me a chance to say my line. To get their attention I’d tap them on the shoulder as they were walking by, but they kept going. It turns out they’re not as easy as American girls to stop. I’d have to walk up to them. With Karl camping out in the bathroom it felt like I was at the club alone. There was another girl who liked me but she was morbidly obese, stuffing her mouth with birthday cake.

Karl eventually came out of the bathroom and I noticed the coke didn’t pick him up at all—he was worse off and his eyes were half closed. Then he did the thing where he started approaching guys. I told him I was leaving but he ignored me. I tried again ten minutes later with the same result. I left him there and took a cab back to the house.

The next afternoon I was worried that he didn’t make it home and that I’d be partially responsible for his death. I imagined having to make an official statement to the Embassy of Sweden, but he eventually strolled into my room with a beer in his hand. He asked me how much money I had spent the night before.

“30,000 pesos for the cover and 15,000 for taxis,” I said.

“So how the fuck did I spend 100,000 pesos?”

“I thought you only paid 15,000 pesos for the pick-me-up.”

“Ah it was the chicle guy! He tricked me and took my money!”

“That probably explains why he disappeared after you bought the coke.”

“That fucker tricked me. What happened later in the night?”

“Not much, but you started talking to guys at the end.”

He laughed. “Yeah that’s a bad habit of mine.”

TO BE CONTINUED

The Medellín Diaries (Part 3 of 5)

July 13, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY: Part 2

The following weekend we went to a party hosted by the rich guy with the Mercedes. All you can drink for 50,000 pesos. Supposedly all the hottest girls in Medellín were coming and only fat gringos would be the competition. One month in Colombia and still no sex, I was hoping the party might turn things around, but when Karl began hyping it to the moon I knew it was going to be bad. Turns out there were more fat gringos than girls, and only two were cute.

Karl was trashed and mostly incoherent by midnight. I ended up meeting an Australian guy named Dan who was going on six months in Medellín.

"Other gringos keep telling me how friendly the girls are here," I said, "but I'm not seeing that yet. I'm having some trouble."

"It's because the girls here are idiots, "he said. "They don't work or have education. Talking to them is a nightmare and after six months I can't even fake a conversation. Here you ask a girl what she's up to and she just says she's hanging out at home, or how she went to get her nails done, or how she went to the mall. You won't have anything in common with them, but since they're pretty they expect you to buy them dinners and shit. They're spoiled from all the drug guys they have dated who take them out and pay for everything. When they meet a gringo they expect the same."

"Have you been to Argentina or Brazil?" I asked.

"Yeah, both. Brazil is the best I think for girls."

"So why are you here?"

"I'm a teacher here."

"So your Spanish is fluent?"

"Yeah it's decent," he said.

"Is it helping you?"

"Of course but I'm at the point where I'm just tired of the girls. They're all the same, all boring and fake."

Could Argentina be better than this? I know the girls there are a lot crazier, but it was easier to talk to them in clubs. They don't hang in these massive groups of guys.

Another Aussie guy overheard me talking about Brazil. "Brazil is good for sluts?" he asked.

"I mean, better than here. It's easier to pick up in Brazil."

"Where do I go in Brazil for sluts then?"

"Do you mean prostitutes?"

"No, just sluts." He was getting impatient.

“Well I’ve only been to two cities in Brazil, but you can’t go wrong with Rio and points north. If you go south then it gets harder. But Argentina has the hottest girls I think.”

“But are they easier than Brazilian girls?”

“No, definitely not.”

“So for sluts I should go to Brazil?”

“Uh yeah, but Peru is easy too if you’re a gringo.”

“Just tell me where to go for the fucking sluts man, fuck.” He squeezed his lips tightly and leaned his body closer. For a second I thought he was going to punch me in the face.

I looked at Dan and said, “Your friend is creeping me out.”

“And the funny thing is he teaches English to little kids.”

“What the fuck, I just want sluts. What’s the big deal?”

“Okay then go to Cuzco, Peru. Definitely. You’ll love the girls there—they are surprisingly pretty. Not indigenous-looking at all like in other parts of Peru.” Truth is Cuzco had some of the ugliest girls I’ve ever seen in my life.

After trying our hand on a couple of girls with fake tits, we decided to head to Parque Lleras, the most popular nightlife zone in the city. Dan suggested we all go to Blue, a rock club.

“I hear there are a lot of gringos there,” I said.

“Yeah but there’s a reason for that—the girls there like gringos,” Dan replied.

“It’s the only place where you can pick up a slut in this town,” said the creepy Aussie.

Karl was talking to a part-time gringo prostitute that both Aussie guys had already fucked. Her going rate was 150,000 pesos but supposedly you can bargain her down to 70,000 towards the end of the night. We convinced Karl to meet us at Blue, but in his stupor I had doubts he would make it. It’s a miracle that he’s still alive with the way that he gets shitfaced every single time he goes out.

Blue was a dingy Colombian club with American rock music. The middle of the club was full of tables and there were two dance floors, a large one in the back and a smaller one in front. I saw a Colombian girl sitting at the bar watching her two friends dance. I slowly made my way over, leaned towards her ear a bit and said, “Let me guess… you’re from Colombia.” She laughed and asked me where I was from. She spoke English and even though she wasn’t particularly cute, I decided to stick around because there weren’t many other options. It appeared that every single hostel in Medellín had unloaded their predominately male clientele in the club, and though I didn’t count I’m pretty sure there were more gringos than Colombians.

The Aussie guys were talking to other girls until they disappeared, which was a shame because I wanted to exchange numbers with Dan. Then Karl arrived with his whore, who eased him into a chair at the bar because of the trouble he had standing up. He gave me a slight smile of recognition. I winked back at him.

I knew I was lowering my standards in order to get my Colombian flag. This awareness wasn't helping my cause so I kept ordering more drinks for myself, until my inner monologue quieted down. I sat on a stool next to the girl and we chatted on and off, in both English and Spanish, until almost an hour in when I asked her to come to the dance floor with me. I wanted to get the kiss out of the way. She shook her head no. Ten minutes later I asked her if she wanted to go right outside to get some fresh air. She shook her head no again. Frustrated, I went outside alone and sat on a stool meant for smokers. I didn't believe I wasn't getting anywhere with a girl that I didn't even like.

A random American gringo sat next to me and I told him the story of the girl. He said, "Well the club is closing in 15 minutes. You might as well just hang in there and see what happens." He had a good point. I went back inside and when the girl saw me her eyes lit up. She did a 180, grabbing me and bringing me close. I kissed her right then. It's like she wanted to give me enough love so that I wouldn't leave her again.

Karl asked me if I had any money. My guess is that he wanted to fuck the prostitute, who was looking pretty decent as the night went on. His decent fashion sense made it seem like he was rather wealthy, but I'd seen him go stretches of three or four days surviving on nothing but his beer tab, a bag of white rice, a cheap package of hot dogs that smelled like cat food, and assorted foodstuffs left over by guys who had checked out, until casino robot monies finally got wired into his account (in the meantime he'd stay home all day and flirt with girls on the internet). Then he'd blow it all on drugs, rum, and women, only to repeat the process a week later. I don't know if I loved hanging out with Karl because he was an interesting guy or because I wanted to be there at the exact moment his life imploded. He was the type of guy I thought only existed in Hunter S. Thompson novels.

I pretended I didn't hear him and then he got leaned in closer and asked for money again. I lied to him and said I only had 10,000 pesos for the cab ride home when I actually had close to ten times that. The prostitute left, angry at Karl for wasting her time on a weekend night. I'm sure I did Karl a favor because she would've robbed him of his money without putting out. My girl's friends eventually ditched, leaving her with me and Karl. I looked at her and said, "The roof at our mansion has a great view. Why don't you come for a little bit and then I'll take you home afterwards?" She agreed to come back with us.

It was pretty routine after that. I had to act like I was interested in her as a human being when I just wanted to stuff my dick inside her hole. I fucked her two times and then in the morning escorted her to the front of the house after telling her to write down her number on a piece of paper. On the way out she swiped a promotional flyer of the gringo mansion that contained its address and phone number. That worried me terribly so when I went back into the room I grabbed my used condoms from the trash can to make sure my sperm was still inside. Then I flushed them down the toilet so the maid wouldn't see. She thought I was a nice gringo unlike the other prostitute fuckers and I didn't want her to know that I was sexually active. I saw her as a motherly figure.

Karl came into my room with his hands on his head, complaining about his hangover. "So how was it?" he asked.

“Have you ever fucked a corpse before?” I said.

“No. Wait. Yeah no.”

“Yeah well I have. It was awful—she didn’t do anything. Just laid there and the only noise she made was grunts of pain, which actually kind of was a turn on, but the mere act of sex hurt her, in every position. It was the worst sex I’ve ever had.”

“Ooph. That sucks. Hey how much money did you spend last night?”

TO BE CONTINUED

The Medellín Diaries (Part 5 of 5)

July 15, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUSLY: Part 4

A few weeks went by when Karl booked a ticket back to Sweden. He wanted a good-paying job for a few months so that he could return and properly marry his girlfriend. He told me it would be "easy" for him to get a job on an oil rig in Norway, but I had my doubts since he had no oil rig experience. In fact he had no professional experience at all, unless you counted his internet scamming and operation of a bar that got shut down by the Greek authorities.

"Did you call Miguel for the weed?" I asked.

"Oh yeah I forgot. How many bags do you want?"

"Two. That should last me for the rest of my time here."

"You still have a shitload from the first bag. Are you sure you need two?"

"It's only $5 a bag. I might as well." It crossed my mind that I'd have a lot of excess to get rid by the time I was ready to leave the country.

"Hey have you been to a casino yet?"

"Not yet," I said.

"You know I forgot to tell you that casinos are pretty good for meeting girls. There was this American guy I knew that would only pick up girls in the casinos. I mean you go there and there's a dozen beautiful girls just standing around, and if you're a gringo who isn't disgusting you'll do well. All the other people who go there are deadbeats."

"I'm kind of off gambling though. I always lose."

"You really don't need to gamble. Just play some slots and drink and talk to them. He got a lot of girls from that, and you have to think about why those girls are hired—for their looks. Let's go now, you're not doing anything."

"Okay but I still have to cook dinner. That's going to take about an hour."

"Fuck you I'll get you an empanada. But first let me do a pick-me-up."

He was already pretty drunk from drinking beer and rum all day, but after he inhaled half a gram of coke he livened up real fast. He was swaying but surprisingly lucid.

We walked into the casino and there were a dozen girls in their tight outfits staring at us, looking bored out of their minds. There was more staff than gamblers.

We sat down at a $2.50 blackjack table with three other Colombians and cashed in $30 each. The blackjack action was far from world-class. A gentleman sitting next to Karl split everything, including 6′s when the dealer was showing a face card. The girl sitting next to him would stay on 12 when the dealer showed an ace. The third person would wait for the dealer to announce her count total before making a move. They kept losing and cashing in more money, at a rate of over $50 an hour. I wondered how people so stupid could have so much money to blow.

Karl and I were the only ones at the table who understood English. I was able to safely mouth off.

Let's see what this idiot is going to do now.

What the fuck he's messing up the deck!

Karl lost his $30 immediately, not winning a single hand. It was especially ironic since his job is to game online casinos. I hung in there and kept the drinks coming so he wouldn't leave. We had some laughs in between moments when I refused to take his advice on how much to increase my bets, even though in the end it would have won me more money. Sometimes Karl annoyed me with his constant inebriation and potential to get my killed, but he was an addicting guy to have around and I knew I was going to miss him when he left.

When it was time to go home (I broke even), he told me he wanted to do some more coke. "You won't be able to sleep if you do more," I said.

"Oh it's okay I have some Ambien."

The next night was his second-to-last in Colombia. He invited his girlfriend and her family to the gringo mansion for a goodbye dinner. I came back from an impulsive visit to the casino after losing $50 at both blackjack and poker, the latter of which was especially embarrassing since I played in a table tournament and busted out on the first hand dealt. Inside the house I saw balloons and streamers decorating the living room. I took a meek peek inside. A large, half-eaten chocolate cake was on the coffee table with dirty plates surrounding it, and Daddy Yankee was playing at low volume on the portable stereo. Everyone stopped talking to look at me. I introduced myself to Karl's girlfriend, her parents, her sister, her uncle, her two cousins, her sister's boyfriend, her sister's boyfriend's sister, and a little 2-year-old who was chasing a balloon on the floor. They were friendly but stiff, as if something was wrong. Karl was not in the room.

I walked towards the kitchen to put away some avocados I bought on the street and saw Karl slumping against the wall in the hallway with his head gyrating back and forth. A bottle of beer was in his hand and he was mumbling something I couldn't understand. True to form, Karl got completely trashed in front of his girlfriend's parents.

The mother approached me in the kitchen and in a soft voice asked that I take care of him, but there was really nothing I could do. When some guys get drunk they simply can't hear anything remotely connected to reason or logic, and Karl was way past that stage. The girlfriend's family gradually left, whispering things to each other with concerned looks on their faces, and no one but the little toddler wore a smile. I felt bad for Karl's girlfriend, who I doubt has ever been more ashamed in her life.

Every five minutes after that I heard a big crash when Karl fell on the floor in his bedroom. He'd howl my name and tell me to get dressed so we could go to a strip club. "Come on fucker I'll buy you an empanada," he repeatedly yelled. "I just need to do a pick-me-up and I'll be fine. I'm fucking calling Miguel right now." I closed my door and ignored him. It didn't take very long for everything to become quiet.

The next day he came into my room groaning in pain. He looked old and beaten.

"I think you have a drinking problem," I said. "The only time you should not get drunk is in front of your girlfriend's parents, but you got the drunkest I've ever seen you."

"No it's these new pills I'm taking. They make me drunk really fast. I'm not used to them."

"You're blaming one addiction on the other! It's just an excuse! Look I don't care, but your girl has to have a heart of fucking gold after what you did last night."

"Hah yeah she's great."

"Though honestly I'm getting used to your drug problems. Hey speaking of drugs did you call Miguel? I still would like those two bags of weed."

"Look at you, you drug addict!"

"Please, once or three times a week is not an addiction."

That night I was on my way out for a date with a cute girl I met at a local university. Karl walked me to the front door where his girlfriend was already waiting behind the gate. She was going to spend one last night with him before he left the country. It was only one day after the dinner party debacle and she was visibly angry, greeting him with the word borracho (drunkard).

"Well at least he's not drunk right now," I said, with a cheesy smile.

"Yes but he needs to change," she said.

"Well maybe a little, but who doesn't? He's a great man and I'm lucky to know him." I squeezed his shoulder like he was my best friend in the world (at that moment he was), and said goodbye. It was the last time I saw him.

The next day a 53-year-old American man with bad arthritis took Karl's room after the maid decontaminated it with potent chemicals. He immediately asked me how to score some weed and pussy.

The Medellín Diaries Postmortem

July 18, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I wrote about Karl because he is the human form of Medellín. It's interesting how some guys are Colombia guys, some are Brazil guys, and some are Argentina guys. Each attracts a distinct personality. I'm a Brazil guy, a place that isn't even on Karl's radar. Karl is Medellín, Medellín is Karl. The city is made for guys like him.

A few people commented that he is a "loser" or "pathetic," but I never thought that of him. Though he had his drug issues, I enjoyed his company and was truly saddened when he left. At risk of sounding gay, I looked forward to when he would come in my room to regale me with crazy stories from his past. Sometimes I even left my door halfway open to encourage him.

I can see how Karl could be considered a loser by most hyper-educated American office workers. He doesn't have a car, a condominium, disposable income for fancy restaurant dining, and he certainly doesn't have health insurance or a retirement savings. He's not well-read. He goes against everything us Westerners are trained to become, but if I had a choice between spending a night with Karl or with educated Chad, the dutiful government contractor with pleasant features, I'm going with Karl every time. One is interesting and exciting while the other is safe and boring. A night out with Karl was a trip into the unknown, with a level of uncertainty that I had trouble handling at times.

I'm not trying to justify Karl's lifestyle, but it works perfectly for him. He's with the beautiful girl he wants, back in Colombia in the apartment that they share, doing his booze and drugs, barely working, hatching his next scam. He's living his dream and I respect him for that. There's not a lot of people I can say that for. Fact is most do what they're told, not what they desire.

If I ever run out of things to write about, all I have to do is hit up Karl and tell him to start from the top. I think his life would be a very successful book. I'd definitely include his business plan on how to run a successful trans-Atlantic cocaine empire. It's all about having a GPS system worked out, he said. What you have to do is…

Game Hall Of Fame

July 22, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've written a handful of posts that would make for great reading right before you're about to run game. They will get your mind ready not only to approach but to use the correct technique as well. I made this list especially for noobs who need a little extra boost to get going in the right direction.

I advise you read one post from each category before leaving the house.

APPROACH PREPARATION:

- The Best Motivator That Gets You Approaching Girls
- Hung Up On The Opener
- The Secret To Getting Laid
- Why Getting Rejected Helps You Reach Your True Potential

MOTIVATION:

- Just Keep Going
- What Are You Waiting For?

MINDSET & TECHNIQUE:

- Acting Like A Dick
- How To Pick Up Girls For Real
- Be That Guy
- Stop Being Needy
- 7 Things A Guy Can Do To Improve His Game Right Now
- The Fast Kiss I & The Fast Kiss II

Another useful pre-game guide is the Bang Cheat Sheet, where I summarize the six main game points you need to always have marinating in your head. It comes with any donation for Bang Colombia, which I'm proud to say has passed 2,500 downloads as of last week.

Men Who Choose Homosexuality Over American Women

July 26, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A fellow American I met in my Belo Horizonte had an odd complaint about me: he said I talked "too much" about girls. I scratched my head because the only two safe topics that you can talk about with just about any guy in the world are sports and pussy. What else am I going to talk about? Art? Style? I wondered if he was homo. Did my gaydar fail yet again like it did really late at night with that Colombian guy?

Yes, yes it did.

He eventually told me, "Dude, I'm gay," as if he was annoyed I didn't figure it out on my own. It wasn't obvious anyway—I've met straighter guys who acted more gay than he did.

One morning we got to talking at the dining room table and I asked him when he realized he was a homersexual. He said, "I didn't know until really late. In college I tried to date girls but had trouble connecting with them. After college I couldn't even get dates. I thought something was wrong with me. Then I experimented with a guy and it felt more natural. It felt right. It's so much easier for me to meet men than women."

"Do you catch or pitch?" I asked, in the most empathetic tone possible. "You know it sucks when you're gay because only one guy is getting the pleasure."

"I like to receive, but you know what… it is very pleasurable. I love receiving. Mmmm very very good."

"Okay I'm going to watch some porn on my computer now."

Let's put his story through the Roosh Translator™:

"I was tired of being a virgin."

How many men are there in America whose failure with women made them "realize" they were a homosexual? Thousands, I'd estimate. These are guys too disillusioned with the American female to put the game work needed to penetrate their holes. Guys who concluded that these girls are not worth the effort, and that they rather get banged in the butt than deal with them or figure them out. I have a feeling these gay boys had gay tendencies before their conversion, but how many guys in Brazil converted to homosexuality because they couldn't get laid? Colombia? Russia? Italy? Significantly less, I imagine.

How many other guys have given up on dating and rely solely on prostitutes? And how many others put their cock in a lockbox until they can fly away to bang foreign pussy? These guys are withdrawing themselves from the dating market, making it even harder for the educated middle-class American woman to find a partner with the same socioeconomic background as her own. The problem that only exists for African-American women (finding a long-term mate within their race), will now become one for white women as well.

I know some American girls are cool, sexy, and attractive, but that small percentage is shrinking to where living in a city of a million people is no guarantee you'll find one. If you have then great job, but most guys are not as lucky, something that seems to be a growing factor these days. As a whole, American women are deficient in so many areas that men are choosing homosexuality instead. I wonder what this means for the future of the white American race.

Soccer Player Alphas

July 29, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Recent email I recieved...

> I could not help feeling curious about if you (given what you have written about Argentinian girls and alpha and beta males) have seen the video that many Spanish males are now commenting on, in which Spanish player Joan Capdevila turns down an Argentinian show hostess...

> Transcript
>
> ROMINA: Let's send a greeting to Flo!
> JOAN: A greeting to Flo? Haha...
> ROMINA: So, how was the world cup?
> JOAN: Well, as you can see, (it went) very well, (we are) champions!
> ROMINA: Who would you like to dedicate this victory to?
> JOAN: Well, to everyone, (SHE CUTS HIM HERE) to Spanish people, to my son...
> ROMINA: Hey, could we reproduce Sara and Iker's kiss [last video on this page], but on the cheek?
> JOAN: With whom?
> ROMINA: With me!
> JOAN: No... no, no, no.
> ROMINA: Hey, for real...
> JOAN: You're not my type
> ROMINA: (hesitates) Well... you're not my type either! Come on! Well, there you have them...
>
> This is the same man who gave Sara Carbonero (Iker Casillas' girlfriend) a perfectly serious but short interview wearing a bucket on his head...

> About 90% of men are saying he was great and she deserved to be put in her place. About 10% are saying that they would have given her the kiss and more, or that he must be gay. As a woman, my feelings are:
>
> 1. This is a man who respects himself and knows his worth, and will not take any slut that comes his way, just because she's there. I would prefer this man instead of a more handsome one who seems desperate for some action.
>
> 2. This woman did not show an ounce of self respect, intelligence or professionalism. She starts with a stupid question, to which Capdevila answers quite politely, then asks a second one, but she cuts him stupidly, and does not let him speak. If we're interested in a man, listening to him is the best way we have to know him better. Asking him to reproduce Sara and Iker's kiss was pathetic, as any intelligent person will not want to be the replica of anything. It may sound > mean, but I think she deserved to be turned down and put in her place. I already respected Capdevila a lot, but that respect increased after watching this.

>
> 3. Capdevila behaved quite differently with Romina that he did with Sara Carbonero. But Sara's attitude and attire was obviously intended to be more serious and professional. Each girl was treated the way they clearly stated, with their demeanor, that they wanted to be treated.
>
> 4. Many other men would have taken advantage of this girl's slutty behaviour and act disrespectfully in consequence.

It delights me when an Argentine girl is cut down. Besides American women, I can't think of a better species it could happen to.

I can only speculate whether Capdevila was born alpha or learned it through his soccer fame, but the fact he didn't hesitate for a microsecond to turn down that idiot suggests an inborn tendency. The irony in all this is that it's Casillas (the lowly goalie) who is banging the hottie. Watch this video and observe how she demolishes all parameters of the beauty scale:

So sexy.

Could the goalie pull this type of girl twenty year ago? Nope. The world has become so fame-starved that it doesn't matter what position or even sport you play anymore (even skateboarders have groupies). Hell, it doesn't matter if you're actually good at anything—as long as you're known then you're in the club. Get an ounce of fame to go along with solid game and you'll put up numbers that Casanova would be impressed by.

Broken English Movie Review

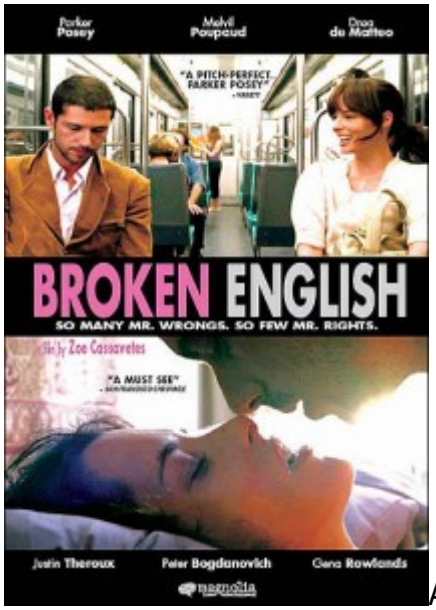
August 1, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I lose interest in a movie if a bumbling beta attracts a beautiful female (e.g. every Adam Sandler movie ever made). There has to be a chance that the relationship would happen in real life or else I'm watching a science-fiction flick that depicts a parallel universe where the immutable laws of attraction are suspended. This is why I like La Dolce Vita, Gloomy Sunday, When Harry Met Sally, movies by Pedro Almodovar (Broken Embraces, Talk To Her, Volver), and a couple by Woody Allen (Vicky Cristina Barcelona, Hannah & Her Sisters, and Annie Hall). A silly movie with cringe worthy dialogue like Before Sunset will get cut off after 10 minutes.

I recently saw Broken English, a movie centered around an American woman named Nora who is panicking because she's in her 30′s and has no hope of finding a man. Even though her best friend is extremely unhappy in her relationship, Nora becomes desperate to settle down. (Fittingly, she had a chance at her friend's man years ago but passed on him). Written by a woman, the movie nails a lot of the American female qualities which I have been beating here to death lately:

-plain clothing
-not sexy
-oversized sunglasses
-anxious
-overly logical
-not well-traveled
-slutty but unaffectionate
-neurotic and jittery
-snarky
-doped up on pharmaceuticals
-unable to control alcohol consumption
-distorted view of the relationship between sex and attraction

Nora reminds me of about 20 girls I've dated. She's played by Parker Posey, your stereotypical pretty American girl (before the obesity epidemic). She's reasonably cute, someone who you wouldn't be ashamed walking down the street with. Wrinkles are starting to show on her face, but most men would sleep with her if given the chance (I would). With the right hairstyle and outfit she could be classified as extremely attractive.



As she wonders “What happened?” to the past ten years of her life, so does the viewer. How many guys did she pass on while in her physical prime? How many “actors” did she date until she realized they were no good for her? Why didn’t she take her mother’s advice sooner, who was at least successful enough in love to bear her? The movie doesn’t explore her past, just her current dating mishaps of getting pumped and dumped and going out with a man who has serious baggage. She becomes bitter and jaded, closing off her mind to potential suitors.

Approaching the depths of loneliness, she reluctantly attends a party thrown by a coworker. There she meets an artistic Frenchman who has classic direct game more common with his Spanish and Italian counterparts. American women are taken off-guard by this game at first (Nora calls his approach “intense”), but commonly break down to the persistent charm and affections of these men. (Sorry, a European accent or some otherwise exotic quality is needed to run this particular style of game. Trevor with the striped shirt would be laughed out the bar if he went around telling girls he wanted to kiss them.)

The Frenchman’s direct game is world class, and it doesn’t take him long to dismantle her bitter shield and get right down to business. We would expect a pump and dump in this case, but no—he’s smitten and spontaneously asks her to return to France with him. She says that she can’t because of her oh-so-important event planner job, among other logistical reasons, but we know it’s because she’s deathly afraid of being disappointed yet again.

The film falls apart after that, which is probably why you’ve never heard of it before. It could have been the spinster manifesto up there with Sex and the City, but instead gets tossed into the indie yarn stack behind Chasing Amy. Nonetheless, if you like my blog, you’ll like the movie. The game performance by the Frenchman is alone worth a viewing (note his body language, his devastating use of silence, and his tonality). Completely ignore the fact that in real life a handsome Frenchman wouldn’t fall for an aging spinster who, frankly, was a bitch to him for most of their time together, and enjoy a pretty accurate take on American hook-up culture from a woman’s perspective. It makes me almost feel bad for them.

Guys Who Make A Lot Of Money But Still Don't Get Laid

August 3, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I spoke to an old friend the other day and we talked about a couple guys we went to college with. I remembered Steve, one of our classmates.

"Hey Steve took me off Facebook for some reason," I said to my friend.

"Strange, he didn't say anything to me about you."

"Well since he's a cardiologist now maybe he took down his profile because too many patients were trying to add him. I read about that problem in a newspaper article."

"Hold on let me check." Thirty seconds later: "Yeah he took me off too."

"He probably deleted his profile."

"You know he's making serious cash now right?"

"How much?" I asked.

"Like half a million a year."

In college Steve got more play than me, hooking up with the occasional girl from class (since I was getting zero play that wasn't particularly difficult). He had a pretty cocky personality around other guys and even though he became much gentler around women, it was enough to get some attraction going.

After college he went to medical school and I went to work in the private sector. He got a girlfriend not long after that. While I'd peg his looks at about a 7, she was only a 4—a definite downgrade. My friend and I would talk about why he was going out with her. "Maybe she has a really great personality," I'd say, followed by obnoxious snorting laughter. We didn't understand why he was selling himself short, but agreed he'd probably step up after he was officially a doctor and making the big bucks.

Well, they're about to get married. I highly doubt a prenup will be signed.

Talking about Steve made me do an evaluation of my life.

Cons: I have very few possessions. I don't make a lot of money (a friend of mine joked that I probably qualify for public assistance). I don't have health insurance. Every day I push concerns about the future into the back of my mind.

Pros: Freedom and mobility.

If I was a doctor making half a million a year, I'd sleep with fewer women than I am now. It's possible I would land one really beautiful bride, but I currently desire variety, not monotony (while the act of banging doesn't make me a happier person, the conquest does). I'd have more comfort and stability in life, but that's what I want when I'm 51, not 31. If I worked 60 hours a week or more it'd be impossible to bang the girls that I have, along with doing just about everything that I have accomplished in my adult life so far (cue laughter from the haters).

Too many guys overestimate the benefits of a high paying job. What percentage of doctors do you think are pulling quality pussy? Surprisingly low, but if you want to land an ambitious yet plain Jewish or Indian girl with overbearing parents then it's a great profession to get into. Do you really think doctors or lawyers have the ability and energy to creep on the side with the girls that you're able to bang with game and free time? Truth is I know a ton doctors and not a single one is outpulling me, in either quality or quantity. I see pictures of their girlfriends on Facebook and I'm not impressed, especially considering their true cost per notch is more than $100,000. Mine are in the low four digits.

If you're going to argue that a man's job is important, I'll agree with you if you're talking about fashion photographer, club owner, bartender, surfing instructor, and so on—the jobs that put him in contact with a large number of sexy women. But lawyer? Doctor? Investment banker? Corporate executive? Raise your hand if you know guys with those jobs that get zero pussy, or have to pay out the ass for a pseudo-hooker.

Okay now put your hand down.

Game is the great equalizer, the savior of man. You can have a job where you're stuck in front of a laptop all day and still pull more and hotter than a guy making half a million a year. If I was making that much money and pussy wasn't raining from the sky, I'd feel disappointed and tricked to say the least. A twenty dollar game book and some practice would've gotten me much more.

Reenactment Of An Actual Approach

August 5, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I played around with the site Xtranormal, which lets you make videos with cartoon actors, and made a reenactment of a throwaway approach I did at a bar recently (the girl wasn't very attractive).

I don't think I've ever had a one-night stand with a girl who crossed her arms while talking to me. I feel my penis soften when it happens.

I had planned to do a contest for you to reenact an actual approach, but the site is way too buggy.

The Totem Pole Of Race Attractiveness

August 8, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Before I started traveling I was reluctant to believe some races of men are more highly desired by women than others. Growing up in multi-cultural DC, I'd see white guys, black guys, and Latinos all getting with reasonable-looking girls in the clubs. I did notice that Asian guys only got with Asian girls, but otherwise I believed that for the most part all men are created equal.

I was a little naive.

After having lived abroad for more than 18 months, I see there is a very clear totem poll of male desirability. I used to think that my game was all that I needed to outperform any man, but unfortunately many foreign girls are so crazy about certain physical features that I have to work like a mule in some areas of the world.

Before you call me a racist for sharing these thoughts, keep in mind that this isn't what I think is desirable, but what I've observed others to find attractive.

Let's start with the ranking for men, from most desirable to least desirable. If you placed a handsome representative from each category in a lineup and let the world's women pick their favorite, here's who would get the most votes:

1. European men with darker, sultry features from countries like Spain, Italy, Portugal, and France
2. Northern European men with light features from countries like Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Netherlands, and Norway
3. Western men with medium features from countries like England, United States, Australia, Canada, and Ireland
4. Middle Eastern men with darker but slightly rougher features from countries like Turkey, Greece, Morocco, Iran, and Algeria
5. Latino men from countries like Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, and ones in Central America
6. Arab men from countries like Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan
7. African men
8. Southeast Asian men from countries like Thailand, Philippines, Indonesia
9. Indian men
10. Asian men from countries like Korea, China, Taiwan

Where do we place men that don't exactly fall within an category? In many cases there is some mixing and matching. Israeli men would probably fare better than your average Middle Eastern man. German and Russian men would go a notch above Western men. And Colombian, Argentine, and Brazilian men would hover around the Western and Middle Eastern categories. Personally I'd put myself mostly in category four (I have a big Turkish face and a Chewbacca complexion). I don't feel my background affecting my pussy-getting ability unless I'm hanging out with a guy in one of the first two categories.

An interesting group is African-American men. Their African ancestry suggests they would be viewed slightly unfavorably, but thanks to cultural forces that display then as cool, progressive, and dangerous, they do better than Latino men. They can thank MTV and Hollywood.

I cannot answer the why to this list. I don't know why Asian and Indian men are not highly desired the world over. It's true that those guys on the bottom of the list have to work much harder than guys at the top, but that's life. Count your blessings that you're a man, where appearance issues can be overcome with things like game, status, lifestyle, and gimmicks. One of my best friends is an Indian man with some status and he consistently dates cute white girls, so I know it's not a death sentence.

How about if we did the list for women? It'd be similar to the mens list but with a couple changes:

1. Northern European women (+1 movement)
2. European women (-1)
3. Western women (no change)
4. Latina women (+1)
5. Middle Eastern women (-1)
6. Southeast Asian women (+2)
7. Asian women (+3)
8. Arab women (-2)
9. Indian women (no change)
10. African women (-3)

Northern European women take the top spot (men are crazy for fair features). There was some shuffling in the bottom half of the list where Asian women got a healthy boost at the expense of Arab, Indian, and African women. Like with the men, Colombian, Argentine, and Brazilian women would be placed around categories three and four.

Why are Asian women viewed more favorably than their male counterparts? It's because they are seen as submissive and compliant, qualities that make for a good partner. Plus

Asian genetic features are more pleasing on the feminine form. And how about African-American women—do they see a boost like with African-American men? I don't see that. Media portrayals have not been kind to them—they are shown to be combative and promiscuous. There are some exceptions to their perception (Ethiopian women fare rather well in being desired by men), but unless the African girl has a shade like Halle Berry or Tyra Banks, she will have trouble competing with other women higher on the list.

A good yard stick is the mail order bride industry. What countries do men want to purchase women from? Asian countries, Slavic countries, and some Latin countries. You do not see mail order brides coming out of Egypt, India, or Africa. These women who are at the bottom of the list are at a severe disadvantage. They can pretty themselves to land a quality man in their category, but it will be very hard for them to upgrade unless they possess exceptional beauty or lower their standards (e.g. Indian girl dating a pasty white nerd). Again, life isn't fair.

You can use knowledge of the first list to find countries you'll be well-received in—simply visit a place where the local man is several rungs lower than yourself. Religion may be factor (no one gets laid in Arab countries unless they pay for it), but if you're in the middle of the list you may want to try Africa or Asia before you blow your wad in Spain or Italy. Call it pussy arbitrage.

One final note is to keep in mind that scarcity can increase your value. An Indian or Asian man in Denmark won't do as bad as you might think due to how exotic he would be. (Partly for this reason black guys have found themselves quite a niche in places like Sweden and Germany.) If I go to Finland or Iceland I know my darker features will help get my foot in the door with many curious women, but I'm not going to kid myself—I'll still need game to seal the deal.

Don’t Make Trip Suggestions Before She Does

August 10, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When you first meet a girl, it’s safe to suggest ideas for future dates based on things you have in common. But once you start dating her, you have to be very careful about throwing ideas for longer dates that could be considered trips, like a visit to Atlantic City, the beach, or some full-day excursion to a national park. This conveys heavy-duty interest and forces her to evaluate her power.

I’ve made this mistake twice. I thought things were going great, threw out a trip idea to the beach, and then watched the girl go cold on me. A somewhat recent example involved a very young girl who was on my large nutsack 24/7. She’d call or text me every day, sometimes asking if I missed her or telling me how much she was thinking about me. I relaxed my game and contacted her often too, slightly relieved that I didn’t have to play as hard as I normally do (but of course I didn’t get mushy on her).

Eventually I suggested a weekend trip to the beach. It’s not so much that I really wanted to go to the beach and that it’d be important for us, but it was a way to keep up with her and maintain the exciting momentum. She replied with “I don’t know,” and flaked on me the next date. The upper hand I did so well to maintain was lost in just a few words. I was disappointed with myself.

The proper move is to wait for her to suggest a trip first. Then when she does, say, “Maybe we can do that.” I already knew this, but there are times I get cocky and feel like I have enough experience to take a risk and break the rules. Sometimes it works out in my favor, but other times it doesn’t and I have to relearn something I already mastered. Experimentation is a double-edged sword best meant for girls you don’t care about keeping around for more than a couple bangs.

I don’t recommend you throw out trip (or even date) ideas after you already have sex with a girl. Whenever a girl suggests a trip to me, I think, “Cool she really likes me.” Don’t let her have that thought instead. Make her wonder if you see her as more than just a bang. Let her reveal her cards first in an attempt to get a look at yours. Being aloof and slightly cold pays off a lot more than showing you care.

Reenactment Of A Reapproach

August 12, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have recreated another awkward social situation with teddy bears. It happened in the same bar as the previous video.

Background: I approached a girl and we ended up talking for about five minutes. She was a medical school student but appeared slow and ditzy, only giving me one-word answers and blank stares. I figured she wasn't interested, so I ended the conversation with, "Well it seems like you want to head back to your friends, it was nice chatting." The night was young, no big deal.

But then fifteen minutes later she got right next to me. She was so close that her back was rubbing against my drink-holding hand. This is what followed:

As you can see I fell into her trap. She wanted me to keep trying, and I took the bait (albeit reluctantly). It's surprisingly common how often a girl gives you encouragement after a failed approach by coming closer or giving you more eye contact. Needless to say, it's a trap. She'll just reject you again. This is how women get their kicks, while for men it takes at least getting our dick sucked to achieve the same level of satisfaction.

Bang More Women By Rejecting Them

August 15, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In the past couple of years the quantity of girls I sleep with has crept up. This is due to many reasons I'm sure, but during that same time period I notice that I'm "rejecting" a lot more girls. By that I mean I walk away when I find out that she isn't close to what I want. I may be talking to her and the light from her cell phone screen reveals some acne. Or I realize she doesn't have a fun vibe. Or she's socially awkward. Or her black dress was hiding a pancake ass. Or she's way too witty (at the expense of being sexy). When one of these things happen, I politely end the conversation. No hard feelings.

There was a time I used to keep these interactions going because, ultimately, the girl was bangable—or else I wouldn't have approached her—and I was hungry for sex, since I didn't get it as often. But I rarely did bang those girls. It would stall at the number or makeout stage. Why is that I'm going full court press on far fewer girls today, but getting a lot more bangs in shorter amounts of time? Two reasons:

1. I free up more time for the girls I better connect with. Talking to a girl you're not crazy about means you won't spit your best game. And without your best game the odds you'll bang her, assuming she's not throwing herself on you, is extremely low. It's futile to force the attraction if you don't feel it around the 5-10 minute mark. In these cases you'll only get a number.

Time is crucial. I still run most of my game at night during the weekends and each night has, at most, four hours of prime game time. If I spend ninety minutes on these mediocre interactions, I've given up 38% of my night for nothing. Plus my energy will be lower for the better prospects I may encounter later. If you're a game newbie then grinding it out can be valuable to getting your social skills up to speed, but it's very possible that talking to the boring chick with the lame sense of humor will cost you for that entire night. It's too risky to exchange an extra word with a girl that I know deep down is someone who won't get me excited. That time is better spent maintaining your state with your boys instead.

2. It subconsciously increases your value. When you pass on enough girls, you start to believe you're the man. Of course with my experiences I think I'm a pimp, and that shines through with my body language and tone, without me having to think about it.

Girls pick up on things that you cannot see, hear, or feel (think of them as a mutant species that can sense more than three dimensions of space). Luckily for us, we don't have to consciously learn how to subcommunicate these positive traits—we pick up on them in time. This is how I can meet a guy and within about 15 seconds know if he's good with women or not (a side effect of my heavy involvement with the game has given me the female ability to screen men). Now imagine what type of vibe a guy who tries to bang anything he talks to puts out. You better believe that girls can pick up on that.

For me there has to be something in those first 10 minutes that tells me there's something special going on. There has to be humor and laughing, meaningful questions, flirty looks, and a magnetism simmering underneath the surface. My energy and time are the two most important things I have, and when I begin to value it yourself by passing on mediocre chicks, I get more. In the end it’s so much easier to bang a cool chick. Don’t waste your time on those who aren’t.

A Typical Night Out In D.C.

August 22, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Since I came back in May, I've been refreshing my Western-style game with VK and The Rookie. It was fun at first, but after just two months going out is no longer more satisfying for me than rolling solo in a large foreign club. To show you why, let me highlight a recent Friday night out.

GIRL #1:

I've gotten so used to running solo dolo game at night that a good wingman is like an added bonus. I love hanging out with my boys because of the laughs we share, not necessarily because they're gonna help me get laid. Out of habit, sometimes I wander in a one-man wolf pack looking for opportunities.

I approached a group of four girls alone, got in, and was talking to the one I preferred (21-year-old college student) while the other three walked away. One good skill to learn is to engage the group enough so they accept you, but not so much that they all want to keep talking to you at the same time. This is where I find that Mystery's strategy of ignoring the girl you want rarely works, because what happens is you build some rapport with a friend you don't like, and the best-looking one will let it proceed. By the two minute mark I must engage my first choice if I want to isolate her in a reasonable amount of time.

I have a rough framework for the first thirty minutes of conversation with topics that include music, dancing, age, clothing, bar ambiance, taste in mates, and people appearances. Within each topic I have my little lines and conversation threads (I share this in Bang). This framework makes it impossible not to get a decent conversation going if the girl is single and doesn't mind my look, allowing me to "fake" a connection with someone I have nothing in common with. If I get to the thirty minute mark, the kiss is usually mine for the taking as long as I don't get cockblocked, but after that a semi-real connection is needed to have a good shot at the one-night stand.

With this girl I lost motivation to continue. She had no personality, no sexy vibe. I didn't want to "work" anymore by talking to her because I had no interest in taking her to bed. So I said it was nice meeting her and walked away.

Her genetic beauty: 7
Her femininity: 5
Her sexuality: 1
Total interaction time: 10-15 minutes
Reason for no sex: I wasn't digging the girl

GIRL #2:

We went to a different bar. I approached a cute girl walking by me and it opened. Her girlfriend started talking to my friend.

My girl was very enthusiastic in the beginning, judging by her smiling and touching. She was a little too sassy, but there was some charm lurking underneath and I liked her provocative outfit (with heels). I felt like she was a good one-night stand candidate.

Suddenly she said, “I don’t think my girl is into your friend.”

“Hmmm well they seem to be getting along, but who knows,” I said.

“No, I know her. She’s not into him.”

So what the fuck do you want me to do? I changed the subject. The energy of the interaction changed. She was smiling less. I felt like I was losing her, unable to maintain the initial momentum. Then her friend pulled her away. This is another reason why flying solo can be easier—in pairs of girls you don’t have to worry about if the friend likes your friend, though I’m not certain that’s exactly why it ended in this case. Either way, bros before hoes. Her friend’s loss.

Her genetic beauty: 7.5
Her femininity: 7
Her sexuality: 6
Total interaction time: 5-10 minutes
Reason for no sex: The girls weren’t digging me and/or my friend

GIRL #3

There was a petite girl who appeared a little sloppy (untucked collared shirt), but I saw some potential. The Rookie said she looked like Ellen Page from the movie Juno, which I haven’t seen. I approached her and we’re talking, but I realized she was totally lame. Even my energetic Moroccan friend couldn’t get her to make a facial expression. I politely bowed out.

Her genetic beauty: 6
Her femininity: 2
Her sexuality: 0
Total interaction time: 5 minutes
Reason for no sex: I wasn’t digging the girl

GIRL #4:

This girl was definitely the hottest of the night. She was a 21-year-old half-Paraguayan blonde that lived in Peru for three years as a child. Her body and face were exceptional. Her Spanish was fluent. We talked for a while and she made several compliments, saying I was “interesting” with a “rugged” look. She made a comment that her ex was about the same age as me. While it’s hard to connect with young girls, if that young girl has traveled a bit, I’ll probably be very close to her ideal type (I have a brooding traveler look they tend to like).

One problem I had is that she didn’t give me a lot to work off of, due to having little life experience (she just got out of college). At some point in the conversation we talked about dating culture in the U.S. versus other countries. My intention was to insinuate how it can be tough to meet someone you connect with, even if you live in a large city, but I think she interpreted that to mean she would die a cat lady.

Speed bump aside, we kept going. I felt like this was a very solid prospect, the best of the night thus far. Then four of her college girlfriends joined the conversation. They didn't cockblock, thankfully, but the energy changed to where I completely lost her attention. Within a few minutes they all decided to check out another bar. I didn't get the invite to go with them, a very bad sign. They left.

My Moroccan friend said, "Dude why didn't you get her number?"

"Get a number off a 21 y/o that I didn't even kiss? Pointless." I still had a lot of groundwork to lay.

Her genetic beauty: 8.5
Her femininity: 6
Her sexuality: 3
Total interaction time: 30 minutes
Reason for no sex: Logistics, lack of solid connection

GIRL #5:

It was getting at that hour where you could see the desperation on a guy's face. Bitch shields were going up. Men with cigars were smoking at double speed in the hopes that a woman would notice them. Other men with fedoras were constantly fixing themselves. No time for mistakes.

I saw a curly-haired girl walking through the bar alone. I stopped her and we talked for a while, in a conversation that began very similarly as the other four of the night. She was a PhD student, unfortunately, but her body was exceptional. I wanted to keep going to see what would happen.

After 15 minutes her sister rushed up to her and took her away. I wasn't upset (am ominous sign). A short time later, she walked up to me to continue the conversation. This was a huge indicator of interest, and normally my one-night stand radar would go bonkers, but while we're talking I noticed she was careful about maintaining her distance from me. She had proper posture, not the sloppy slouching that I would be looking for at this time of night (she stopped drinking because she had to "get up early"). There was very little touching and the interaction had a coolness about it. The auto-shutoff mechanism on my one-night stand radar kicked in. She also had lazy eye, which was rather distracting (her right eye had a mind of her own when she got excited about something). I told Morocco not to leave me alone with her, because I didn't want to talk to her continuously.

The bar eventually closed and I walked to a pizza place with her, her friend, and some random guy. While they waited in line for their grease injection, I told them I was going to wait outside. I stepped out, realized that I only wanted to bang her if I didn't have to talk or kiss her, an impossibility, then ditched without saying goodbye. I went home alone and jerked off.

Her genetic beauty: 7
Her femininity: 4
Her sexuality: 2
Total interaction time: 45 minutes.

Reason for no sex: I wasn't into her.

Let's say it takes me around 30 solid approaches to get one lay in D.C., and by solid I mean that I have to be into the girl and willing to do whatever it takes to get laid. On this night I made only two solid attempts. If I go out twice a week, that's only 15 attempts a month (my day game opportunities are lacking right now). Unfortunately I back out in most of my approaches in D.C. because of not being interested in the girl, something that rarely happened in Brazil or Colombia. I put my heart into just about every approach I did down in those countries.

Since banging a new girl every two months in unacceptable (1-2 new notches a month is a rate that I prefer), there are two possible solutions for when I'm in America:

1. Go out more to increase the odds of finding girls that I like.

2. Lower my standards.

I've chosen option two. When I'm particularly horny I would drink more and go for the gold on girls number 1 and 5 above, in effect doubling my attempt rate. While I still consider them bangable, I know I'm reducing myself to specimens whose personalities and vibes I dislike. It slightly burns that I was pulling superior quality just a few months ago.

An interesting thing I've noticed since I've been back: my libido has decreased to such a level that I've considered going on supplements like horny goat weed. Ultimately I decided against it (I'm already numbing myself with more alcohol), but I do think it's amusing how a city's lackluster women can drive me to increased drug usage. My horny goat weed will continue to be stints abroad, not a pill, no matter how "natural" it is.

Believe it or not, I'm not upset about this at all. I've made peace with life in America because it's feeding the beast for richer experiences elsewhere. Only thing is I doubt that I could live in this area permanently. Why should I when I can live like a prince in cities with better women?

On the next night I went out, I had a one-night stand with a girl I started talking to a little before last call.

Her genetic beauty: 6
Her femininity: 6
Her sexuality: 2
Total interaction time: 75-90 minutes
Reason for sex: Game, alcohol, lowering my standards
Happiness level: Unchanged

More Cockblock Destroying Lines

August 24, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm a strong proponent of calling out cockblockers, but I noticed that two things have to be present for me to do it:

1. The cockblocker has to interrupt the conversation and stay in the vicinity, as if to rub it in my face. If she whisks the girl away I'm not going to chase them down because the energy to call out the cockblock has to be less than the actual cockblock.

2. The girl has to be high quality. Most cockblockers actually do me a favor, but if I was liking the girl then the cockblocker must pay, especially since in D.C. it will take another month until I meet another reasonable chick.

That said, here are some additional cockblocker responses to the one I already shared.

RESPONSE #1:

Approach the cockblocker and say, "Hi do you have a finance or husband?"

99% of the time the answer will be no. If she doesn't answer or tries to ignore you then glance at her left hand ring finger for confirmation.

"It looks like you don't. Well I think your time would be better spent trying to find a man instead of worrying about who your friend is talking to. Maybe that's the reason why you don't have a ring on your finger."

Babality!

Say it like you're trying to give her relationship advice. If she gets nasty on you then it just confirms how much you upset her.

If she's in a relationship say, "Well I think your time would be better spent pleasing your man at home instead of worrying about me. I feel sorry for him." You just called her out for being a shitty wife more concerned with cockblocking you then giving her spouse blowjobs. These are devastating comebacks. She'll cry, I promise you.

RESPONSE #2 (By Mike):

> YOU: "Wow, your life must really suck."
>
> HER: "What do you mean/WTF do you mean?"
>
> YOU: "You're life is so miserable and unhappy that you can't bear seeing anyone else have fun. That must suck."
>
> [Banshee screed.]
>
> YOU: "No, really, I am so sorry." Walk away

It's not important what you say, just that you say something penetrating enough that she'll cockblock at least 1% less in the future. All the guys who say "You can't change anything" are terribly wrong, and only showing their complete ignorance about human nature. People have changed for much less. One or two public verbal lashings will be all that it takes to temper the cockblocker for the rest of her life. Don’t do it for me—do it for your countrymen.

Reenactment Of Running Into A One-Night Stand

August 26, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

PREVIOUS REENACTMENTS:

- Arm Crossing Approach
- Do You Have To Stand Right Next To Me?
- Doughboy's Super Direct Game

The first half of this week's reenactment is depressing. Here's an insecure girl whose body I ravished, spilling her guts out to a man who only cares about himself. I tried to be extra nice so she wouldn't feel completely worthless.

After the initial pity party, I realized that she was looking much cuter than I remembered. Her hair was did and the outfit she wore highlighted her Latin curves. My crotch began to throb. I decided that I wanted to fuck her again, and you'll see how I tried to weasel my way back into the mix towards the end of the video.

I'm disappointed my Zack Morris "time out" technique failed because with a little bit more time I could have given better responses to this rather uncommon situation. No matter because shortly after the confrontation I met a petite Ethiopian girl with a gloriously thick accent. I lost interest in the one-night stand chick yet again. Welcome to life.

How To Deal With Crippling Approach Anxiety

August 29, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A couple months ago I had a debilitating hypochondria attack that lasted a week. I thought I was going to die of a rare disease. I wrote about a previous attack in A Dead Bat In Paraguay, where I described moments of terror in between obsessive checking of symptoms and health resources. In both cases I couldn't stop negative health thoughts from entering my head, even though I knew they were unreasonable. An above-average intelligence offered me no immunity and probably made me even more susceptible.

During this recent attack my sister said, "Why don't you read a book about it."

"A book?" I replied.

"Yeah you know—words and paper."

I went to Amazon and read reviews on several. I eventually settled on The Worry Cure by Robet Leahy. My attack subsided by the time it came to my door. It's definitely a self-help book and I felt hesitant to begin reading. I'm a highly experienced man of the world—how much more can I possibly learn? Several weeks passed before I cracked it open.

The book takes a cognitive approach at addressing the anxiety problem (cognitive therapy is the mainstream term for "NLP"). It says that the way you think is flawed, and the only way to get rid of phobias, anxiety, or other mental issues is to change your belief system. Replace the faulty beliefs with the correct ones, and voila, the desired change should result.

Here's a couple of things I learned from the book about my problem:

- Obsessive checking on the internet and seeking reassurance from family or friends that I wasn't going to die soon only had a temporary benefit, and kept the attack going. I wanted to be an expert on health to rule out possible problems.

- It's impossible to be 100% certain of your health status. No reasonable person is an expert on every little symptom and disease.

- During an attack, I was overestimating my risk of having something serious. I only read about the deadliest outcomes that were most improbable.

- Death can be delayed, never denied. One day you will get sick with something that millions of other people have been through. You will adapt and life will go on (hopefully). You must accept that you are mortal.

You may be able to see how these statements can be spun around on other sources of anxiety. Let's apply them to social anxiety for guys who are too scared to approach:

- Obsessive preparation and reading of pickup advice in an attempt to gain control of future approaches, which doesn't reduce the anxiety when it's actually time to approach.

- It's impossible to be 100% certain that a girl won't reject you. No man is everything to every girl.

- When you are about to approach a girl, you overestimate the chance of getting rejected outright. You imagine the worst possible outcome.

- Rejection can be delayed, never denied. Millions of men get rejected every day. You will get over it and life will go on. You must accept that most girls don't want to be with you.

One thing I liked about the book is that it doesn't only detail health anxiety, but other areas as well (work, relationships, money, and social interactions). Second to approach anxiety, relationship anxiety in the form of jealousy and a fear of getting dumped is a popular topic of guys who email me. They are unreasonably scared of losing their girl, doing things that, ironically, are more likely to push those girls away.

The book offers mental techniques to reduce anxiety. I'll share two:

- Practice your fear. For 20 minutes a day, repeat the feared thought in your head (i.e. "I probably have cancer" or "The next girl I talk to will reject me"). Make the thought intense, vivid and full of doom. What happens is you begin to accept the negative outcome and get bored of it. I know this works because it's a strategy I've shared to help guys approach girls, but something I didn't use when it came to health. (The funny thing about anxiety is that it can be crippling in one area but completely absent in another. A successful businessman can make important presentations in front of dozens of people but can't approach a girl if his life depended on it. We use different strategies for different things.)

- Test your predictions. Look back to when you had anxiety about something in the past. Did it turn out to be true? How correct were you? Obviously I've been wrong every time I had a hypochondria attack. I'm batting 0%, so there is no reason to believe any future attack unless a doctor properly diagnoses me. Even guys with approach anxiety have had prior interactions with girls. How did those go? Were rejections as awful as you thought? Or was the rejection rather benign?

Realize there is a difference between run-of-the-mill nervousness and genuine approach anxiety. It's very normal if you hesitate before approaches or notice your heart picking up in speed. It's okay if you chicken out every now and then because in the end you're not a robot. Even I get a little nervous if I haven't approached in a while or if I'm in a new environment. In these cases I don't think you need to read this book.

But if the thought of approaching fills you with dread and you've gone out several times without doing what you've intended to do, in spite of how much you've prepared yourself or how much encouragement your wingman was giving you, then I think this book will help. If you follow its solutions I think you'll notice a difference in about a month. I'd lend you my copy but my sister is reading it right now.

13 Quotes About Life & Women

August 31, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. “Your wife has got to understand that no matter how much you love her, you’re a hunter, and your hunting is no threat to her. But no wife will ever understand that. No, no woman will ever understand her man.”
—The Book Of Laughter & Forgetting by Milan Kundera

2. “Don’t you see that a man’s whole personality is bound up with his income? His personality is his income. How can you be attractive to a girl when you’ve got not money? You can’t wear decent clothes, you can’t take her out to dinner or to the theatre or away for weekends, you can’t carry a cheery, interesting atmosphere with you. And it’s rot to say that kind of thing doesn’t matter. It does.”
—Keep The Aspidistra Flying by George Orwell

3. “I am afriad that women appreciate cruelty, downright cruelty, more than anything else. They have wonderfully primitive instincts. We have emancipated them, but they remain slaves looking for their masters, all the same. They love being dominated.”
—The Picture Of Dorian Grey by Oscar Wilde

4. “The curious little talent that I happen to possess—the ability to hypnotize a woman with words—very seldom lets me down. It is not, of course, done only with words. The words themselves, the innocuous, superficial words, are spoken only by the mouth, whereas the real message, the improper and exciting promise, comes from all the limbs and organs of the body, and is transmitted through the eyes. More than that I cannot honestly tell you about how it is done. The point is that it works. It works like cantharides. I believe that I could sit down opposite the Pope’s wife, if he had one, and within fifteen minutes, were I to try hard enough, she would be leaning toward me over the table with her lips apart and her eyes glazed with desire. It is a minor talent, not a great one, but I am nonetheless thankful to have had it bestowed upon me, and I have done my best at all times to see that it has not been wasted.”
—The Visitor by Roald Dahl

5. “At the time, I often thought that if I had had to live in the trunk of a dead tree, with nothing to do but look up at the sky flowering overhead, little by little I would have gotten used to it. I would have waited for birds to fly by or clouds to mingle, just as here I waited to see my lawyer’s ties and just as, in another world, I used to wait patiently until Saturday to hold Marie’s body in my arms. Now, as I think back on it, I wasn’t in a hollow tree trunk. There were others worse off than me. Anyway, it is one of Maman’s ideas, and she often repeated it, that after a while you could get used to anything.”
—The Stranger by Albert Camus

6. “Words do not express thoughts very well. They always become a little different immediately after they are expressed, a little distorted, a little foolish. And yet it also pleases me and seems right that what is of value and wisdom to one man seems nonsense to another.”

—Siddhartha by Herman Hesse

7. “It happens quite easily that he only sees the thing that he is seeking; that he is unable to find anything, unable to absorb anything, because he is only thinking of the thing he is seeking, because he has a goal, because he is obsessed with his goal. Seeking means: to have a goal; but finding means: to be free, to be receptive, to have no goal.”
—Siddhartha by Herman Hesse

8. “I am, as you may have gathered, a fairly resilient fellow. I explode when provoked, but I never brood about it afterwards. I scrub it out. There’s always another day. What’s more, nothing stimulates my mind so much as a whopping disaster. In the aftermath, in that period of deadly calm and absolute silence that follows the tempest, my brain becomes exceedingly active. As I sat drinking my whiskey during that terrible evening amidst the ruins, I was already beginning to ponder and plan my future all over again.”
—My Uncle Oswald by Roald Dahl

9. “Men make their own history, but they do not make it as they please; they do not make it under self-selected circumstances, but under circumstances existing already, given and transmitted from the past. The tradition of all dead generations weighs like an Alp on the brains of the living.”
—Karl Marx

10. “The only way a woman can ever reform a man is by boring him so completely that he loses all possible interest in life.”
—The Picture Of Dorian Grey by Oscar Wilde

11. “And beneath his pessimism, his bleak conviction that all the machinery was rigged against him, at the bottom of his soul was a faith that he was going to outwit it, that by carefully watching the signs he was going to know when to dodge and be spared. It was fatalism with a loophole, and all you had to do to make it work was never miss a sign. Survival by coordination, as it were. The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, but to those who can see it coming and jump aside. Like a frog evading a shillelagh in a midnight marsh.”
—The Rum Diaries by Hunter S. Thompson

12. “Our job in this lifetime is not to shape ourselves into some ideal we imagine we ought to be, but to find out who we already are and become it.”
—The War of Art by Steven Pressfield

13. “Everyone must leave something behind when he dies, my grandfather said. A child or a book or a painting or a house or a wall built or a pair of shoes made. Or a garden planted. Something your hand touched some way so your soul has somewhere to go when you die, and when people look at that tree or that flower you planted, you’re there. It doesn’t matter what you do, he said, so long as you change something from the way it was before you touched it into something that’s like you after you take your hands away. The difference between the man who just cuts lawns and a real gardener is in the touching, he said. The lawn cutter might just as well not have been there at all; the gardener will be there a lifetime.”

—Fahrenheit 451 by Ray Bradbury

Video Reenactment Contest!

September 2, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Reenact an amusing or awkward conversation using the site Xtranormal.com and win a glorious prize! Once you've created the video, email the link to roosh@rooshv.com with the word "Contest" somewhere in the subject line (it's not necessary to port it to YouTube). The winner will be chosen by the peanut gallery.

Rules:

1. Video must be shorter than 3 minutes and 30 seconds. I want to see impact, not boring drivel.
2. It must be based on a real life situation. I have an advanced bullshit detector so don't try to trick me.
3. It must be received by noon Wednesday, September 15th.

Helpful Hints:

1. Use the basic characters of each environment so you don't have to pay anything.
2. Use pause insertions to create a realistic dialogue.
3. Click the Magic Camera button so you don't have to manually set the camera for each verbal exchange.
4. If you don't have any ideas, go out with a couple ballsy openers and see ~~which bar you get kicked out of~~ where it takes you. Write down the dialogue afterwards (or punch it in your phone) so you don't forget the good parts.

I will judge videos based on humor, social awareness, humor, likelihood of authenticity, and humor. It's okay to be rejected in your video, as that will score high on the humor and authenticity scales. The site also allows foreign languages, so if you want to do an international reenactment in Spanish or Portuguese, I will be happy to review it. In fact, if I get enough foreign reenactments, I'll create a runner-up prize.

The winner will receive… hold on to your seat… a paperback copy of my book A Dead In Paraguay!!!

I'll narrow the entries down to a handful and then open the floor for viewer feedback. Your video should be a Roosh-pleaser first, and then a crowd-pleaser second.

Let's go over two well-done reenactments. The first is from Roissy.

This video is very realistic, since Roissy wears blazers in real life (if I'm not mistaken he also has a t-shirt with a fish on it). The masculine woman depicted in the video is how the average D.C. lawyer acts. I felt like I was watching real life.

Our next video is from forum member klasik, who recently asked if he should raw dog his MILF girlfriend. He's in the hat…

I don't think I've heard the term "chubby chaser" before, but I like it.

If you're an anti-social creep who doesn't interact with human beings, I'll accept a soliloquy (I actually spelled that correctly on my first attempt). The following video is titled “Black men do well almost anywhere.” It’s adapted from a recent blog comment.

I leave you with one final tip: the best videos involve some degree of pain or awkwardness. If you have any questions, post it in the comments so everyone can see the answer. Good luck.

American Girls Don’t Use Condoms Anymore

September 6, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I’m shocked at the behavior of American women when it comes to condom use. Middle class white girls are, hands down, the dirtiest, filthiest type of girl I’ve been with. Most of them only care about using condoms for the first instance of sex, and a sizable percentage don’t even care if you use one at all for that first time, whether or not it’s a one-night stand where she has only known you for a couple hours.

Raise your hand if you’re scared of AIDS.

I don’t see many hands out there. The only people scared these days are OCD freaks who can’t get laid, because it’s just not on the radar anymore. It’s a way they can rationalize their miserable, sexless existence. I even sense that a lot of people have accepted they’ll contract HPV at some point in their lives. Girls have told me in sweet embrace that I probably have it, but are willing to bang without a condom anyway.

If I was as dirty as them, I could probably have raw dog sex with 95% of all white girls, regardless of socioeconomic background. I only have met one girl that was super serious about using condoms, but I eventually fucked her without a condom too, so actually I change that to 100%. I could bang every white girl who lives in the United States without a condom if I desired, within three dates. I’m not kidding. I could do most of them raw dog on the same night. Here’s how to do it…

1. For the first time appear really studious about using condoms.Tell her “I like to be safe” and “I’m very careful.”

2. Ask her if she’s been tested a few minutes after the first bang. Say, “I’m not trying to get anything.” This makes her think you’re extra cautious. She’ll ask if you’ve been tested. Say “Yes.” Don’t worry, she won’t ask when you were tested, how many girls you fucked raw since you were tested, and what you were actually tested for. Even if you’ve never been tested, you can say “Not recently, but I’m 99% sure I don’t have anything,” and that’ll be just fine for her.

3. When gearing up for the second act of sex, just diddle her vagina with your dick and stuff it in. If she objects, get a condom and try again next time. By the fourth of fifth time, you’ll be banging raw guaranteed.

I’ve had several girls try to insert my beautiful naked cock inside them while chanting a barely audible “Get a condom.” It’s like the pussy has a mind of her own, acting as a master for the miscellaneous matter attached to it.

At first I thought I was just sleeping with the sluttiest of sluts, but I looked at their middle class background (sometimes upper class), and their circle of seemingly normal friends, and realized that it wasn’t the type of girl but the culture that she was raised in. We’re simply not educating people on how to have safe sex anymore. It’s the 21st century and Americans are being taught abstinence (!!!) instead of how to put on condoms like in Brazil or most European countries. Even the act of distributing free condoms in high school is controversy enough to make the news, complete with obligatory interview with a fat-ankled woman screeching, “We shouldn’t be in the business of encouraging sex!”

I’ll tell you when I should’ve been scared straight. Years ago I was dating this girl for a while (“a while”—hah) and did it raw dog one time. She wasn’t on the pill so it was the exception, but in that moment of weakness I ravaged her with my snake and came all over her chest like a champion. I wasn’t too concerned with my slip.

On a later date she told me “I love sex.” She really stressed the love—I mean she bellowed it through the bar so that other people could hear. Girls who love sex can’t go long without it, so some prying on my part revealed that she fucks quite a bit. In order words, I was on the tail end of a cock bender so legendary that it’s a miracle her vagina offered any resistance at all upon penetration. Then the anxiety kicked in and I began daily examinations of my cock for any irregularities, which continued for a while (I pretty much memorized the topography of my cock with these inspections), but my anxiety didn’t subside. A couple weeks afterwards I asked her why she let me have sex with her without using a condom.

“I trust my instincts,” she said.

“What exactly does that mean?” I asked.

“Well, do you have anything?”

“No. Well, I’m 99% sure I don’t.”

“Okay then. So then my instinct was right.”

“Oh god.”

There are women whose “instinct” told them that having raw dog sex with me was safe! Me! A guy who basically fucks women for a living! I ended up having a mild panic attack, but eventually that went away and I continued to have the “occasional” slip.

Girls are supposedly the more intuitive of our species, but if so many feel right about fucking me without a condom, then I must conclude that they don’t know shit. They’re all dirty little whores who truly disgust me with their sex habits. I don’t care if she’s a lawyer, government worker, or environmentalist—if she lives in a metropolitan city and fucked you by the third date, she’s a bucket of disease and you’d be a moron not to bag it up. A man deserves the STDs he gets.

Favela Redux

September 8, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Remember when I posted a video clip thinking that my Rio favela was under attack? Like I mentioned, they were actually filming the movie Tropa de Elite 2 (from my shack's window I couldn't see the cameras or support staff). I recently stumbled on a behind-the-scenes clip of that day's filming:

My front gate shows up at 0:40. The green-tarped kiosk at 0:56 is like a mini 7-11, where I bought staples such as milk, Guarana soda, and snappers. Only once did I go around the corner deeper into the favela (I was curious), and while it wasn't dangerous, I didn't exactly blend in. I knew a gay Algerian guy who lived in the deepness and he didn't have any issues taking back his "crazy" B boys for nights of fun.

Here's a video of a couple gringos riding their mountain bikes down the same favela. They end in the place where the BOPE troops from the previous clip walk up to.

You can hear the encouraging crowd in the background. I find that even the thuggish favela dwellers are rather friendly and deferent, while in America a group of approaching urban youth can be intimidating, not yielding the path and maybe even making derogatory comments (especially towards women). In Brazil this never happened to me—they'd get out of the way before I even thought about it.

Here's a news clip talking about how the favela is the first to be hooked up with free internetche. It has some nice panoramic views of poverty:

While I don't miss living in a favela, I do miss bragging about it, and most of all I miss the location. Right in the middle of Botafogo, it was close to everything and within 10 minutes walking distance to my favorite club to pull one-night stands (Casa do Matriz). I hated the actual apartment (it was old, there were five other roommates sharing 1.5 baths, and the kitchen had thousands of cockroaches of at least three different breeds I'd never encountered before), but it suited my leisure needs more than any Washington D.C. suburb I've lived in. Toss in the danger factor that got many a panties wet, and I'd definitely live in a favela again.*

*As long as it had a 24-hour police protection and I was living on the edge of the favela, not inside it. It also must have high-speed internet, hot water, and reliable electricity, with nary a hint of raw sewage odor.

Day & Night Game Workshops

September 12, 2010 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Introduction

I'm again teaching workshops in Washington DC, which will run four hours in length and teach men how to approach and talk to women in both day and nighttime settings. Outcomes that will be taught include getting a phone number, kiss, venue change (i.e. instant date), same-night date, and one-night stand.

The daytime workshops, which will take place on Friday and Saturday afternoons, will focus on how to meet women in coffee shops, bookstores, on public transportation, in grocery stores, retail stores, and on the street. The night workshops, which will take place on Friday and Saturday nights, will teach you how to meet women in bars and clubs.

During both workshops, you will:

- receive a comprehensive manual containing more than two dozen effective openers and follow-ups that will allow you to approach women anywhere
- practice the material on approximately ten girls who meet your quality standards (no fatties)
- learn techniques to get numbers, dates, and one-night stands
- get detailed written and verbal feedback on your game, from your body language and mannerisms to your conversational content and closing technique, which will serve as a blueprint for your immediate improvement
- be able to tap the brain of a man who has slept with a boatload of women in locations around the world and has dedicated nearly a decade of his life to penetrating women as quickly as possible—with the least amount of effort

I urge you to read on even if you're familiar with my old workshops because I've revamped the program by adding new methods and technology.

Background

Nearly two years ago I began teaching eight-hour game workshops in DC, which included both lecture and fieldwork of approaching girls in coffee shops, retail stores, grocery stores, the subway, and on the street. Within the next few months I taught thirty-two men and provided feedback on 416 of their approaches during nearly 150 hours of workshop time. These men were white, black, Asian, Indian, Latino, and Persian, with ages ranging from 21 to 54. I received positive feedback from thirty of these men, and neutral feedback from two.

Though I considered the workshops a huge success, I discontinued them in South America (though I did conduct one in Medellin). I don't mean to sound like a wuss, but teaching them was the hardest job I've ever had in my life, more so than being a teenage janitor at a bagel shop, a DJ, a bartender, or a microbiologist. Each workshop involved several hours of nonstop talking, movement, and thinking. At the end of each one I was exhausted, but pleased at being able to provide a service that men valued. It's a job I can only perform during occasional bursts of inspiration and energy.

Improvements & Innovations

I've been back in America for four months, and during that time I've been thinking about how to improve the workshops based on my own observations and feedback I've received from students. I came up with seven improvements, including two innovations that aren't being used by any other game instructor.

Elimination Of Long-Form Lecture:

This was the biggest complaint from students. Many were bored having to sit in the same chair for hours as we worked our way through the workshop manual, and I couldn't blame them. Essentially, they were paying money to have me read to them. If you look at commercial "boot camps," you'll see that their structure includes more than a dozen hours of sitting in a classroom listening to a good-looking actor talk about game—with much less time spent on making actual approaches. Adult men can read the material on their own—they attend workshops to learn how to do it live and to be critiqued on their technique.

Expanded Workshop Manual:

In order to eliminate the lecture, I have beefed up the workshop manual so that it can stand alone. To do that, the word count has increased by some 300% and I've revised it to make it more clear and concise (even having it professionally copyedited). In essence, the manual is now an Early Game book, packed with openers, follow-ups, and details of the when, how, and where to use them. You'll receive the manual via email a few days before the workshop so you can read and study on your own. That way, you'll be able to come to the workshop with a fair understanding of the game you're going to run. Along with a brief introduction, we'll spend 10-15 minutes before each venue reviewing and rehearsing the lines before you go into action. We'll also do a couple fun social exercises to get you thinking in the right direction.

Addition Of Night Game Instruction:

