I don't think the descriptor you used adds to the message. I am sure you had no ill intent when using it, but it may still be considered offensive by people whom we want to feel welcome around here - including members of aforementioned groups who want to educate themselves on or engage with those who (at least from our pov) advocate for more egalitarian perspectives. I believe that neither the perjorative it was derived from nor the resulting insult properly represent our goals, views, and approach or will facilitate more neutral and open engagement with spaces like this, instead making those we criticize become more defensive or even feel validated in their opposition. Even misandrists should have no doubt that should they acknowledge their issues, we will be happy to support their efforts to change. I understand that exposure to misandry will cause strong emotional reactions, but we should strive to transform it into constructive advocacy for our views, neither of which (advocacy and our views) such insults are part of.

What is an npc to you? Like what qualifies someone as being an npc?

Ugh, one of those pick-me gays. How can you be gay and advocate for violence against men? What?

Slapping isn't as bad as cheating

Affectionate-Car-931 • 27 points • 22 October, 2022 06:11 PM

Cool, just remember that and say the same exact thing next time a man slaps a woman when she cheats on him.

K. Sounds like a good idea

TheLWMA • 15 points • 22 October, 2022 08:34 PM

Regardless, it's clear that this wouldn't be considered okay if the genders were reversed.

Pretty sure it would assuming "slap" means what I think it means

TheLWMA • 19 points • 22 October, 2022 08:49 PM

A man slapping a woman? Do you think people would be okay with that?

Even if people would have been ok with it (highly doubt it) , they still wouldn't have offered to give him an alibi, called him king (like the people in the image are calling the female singer “queen”)

(anyone who would do this would be called an incel, I think) etc
