Except some cars start gaining value when they are older, which is entirely dependent upon what they are, what engine they had, and other attributes. A 1969 GTO is worth more than a 1969 Polara, and both are worth more than a 1985 Citation.

For new cars it fits perfectly, always depreciating unless its an exotic, and it loses a vast chunk of value by driving it off the dealers lot.

Edit. Wow either you guys don't know fuck all about vintage vehicles, or you misread what I said. Then again you might ride the bus or drive a Honda and think its big pimpin.

You're being downvoted for taking a clear and useful analogy and ruining it. The non-typical exceptions don't show the analogy to be incorrect. It doesn't add clarity. It doesn't further the conversation; it doesn't add anything. That's why you're being downvoted.

The car analogy works on the surface because there are economical similarities between mass-produced cars and women. The conditions that exist for exotic cars to increase in value (namely incredible scarcity) don't exist for women. Additionally, you can maintain a classic car in perpetuity; either through high-quality restoration or controlling the climate, uv radiation, limiting use, etc. Again, this exception doesn't exist on any level for women. Women are not scarce, cannot be maintained - begin deteriorating immediately upon purchase, and never increase in value. So, not to be a dick, but you basically just jibberjabbed on some irrelevant tangent that detracted from the conversation, and that is why you were downvoted.

wake up call: so is the value of people, guys just get a little more time. every single decision, every single culture is based around that fact in the bottom line.

you have a government voucher and you are to assemble an office of 10 people and have to train the ...houses... they might go up in value over 600 years if properly maintained. humans could too, but properly maintaining them to live that long isn't possible yet.

George Clooney is a great example of a man whose value just keeps going up.
