Depending on how you meet. If you met in person I would say go ahead. If it's on a dating website or app then calling is an awful idea. You will literally freak her out.

See if you meet in person you're real to her. Calling someone when you met online for a first meetup is typically weird. I tried it once with awful results. Though we did end up meeting, I felt it may have changed a dynamic. Basically the issue online is, it overplays your hand and makes you look super interested. If its a real person that you met in real life then you have balls and you stand out.

I don't do any online dating. All the calls I make are from day approaches.

Still wouldn't call tbh.

Yup. If you've already met before, calling is fine. Else, save the talking for when you meet in person.

YES. Chicks respond well because it's so out of the ordinary. Any pussy can text but it takes confidence to actually call plus it is way more personal than some pixels on a screen.

I've never had a chick not like it. I did sales through the phone for a summer, and ever since I'm extremely comfortable breaking ice over the phone. People hate on the knife thing, but it delivers some serious skills.

Depends on the age of the woman really, girls in their 20s would probably prefer to text just because it puts less pressure and investment on the interaction unless you know her really well from work or school.
