Interesting study out of the UK.

Seems that social exclusion (e.g. the premier method of interpersonal violence among girls age 3 and up) is worse for people's mental health than straight-up aggression (e.g. the way of men).

This is not surprising. I was just watching a video that was saying the highest stressor as measured by their cortisol output of all the different things were getting socially demoted or shamed. Apparently it goes back to biology where getting kicked out of the group=dead, which is why your body and mind place such importance on social inclusion and status.

Took me all of 30 seconds to find the study.

Does anyone put effort into things themselves or expect others to do the work for them?

Concern trolling. I don't think anyone here is concerned about upvotes, being that most people use alts on this subreddit.
