Suffice to say he believes that psychological satisfaction and female validation is what separates sex from masturbation.

Those two things distinguish the chemical responses of sex from masturbation. If the goal of red pill is to remove the need for female validation and to maintain self-control, exactly how is his rhetoric not a giant contradiction?

| If the goal of red pill is to remove the need for female validation

I don't think the red pill has "goals". It's just information. Even if it did have a goal, it would be about accepting truth, not pretending men don't need sex.

I don't think the red pill is about removing the need for female validation. It's certainly about understanding it and learning to appease or placate it.

I wouldn't be too sure about that. There's a whole bunch of biochemical interactions that occur when humans simply touch each other. It would also be safe to assume that even more occur when you dip your pen into the chemical inkwell nestled between a woman's legs.

I would argue that purchasing the services of a prostitute has the same result as masturbation: it doesn't give the psychological satisfaction of validation. Quite the contrary in fact.

Furthermore, what happens when you no longer seek that validation?

1. You don't care for women and especially their emotions.
2. You protect yourself. Leading to no marriage and no live-in relationships and millions saved on diamond rings.
3. Family structures within the society fall apart.
4. Society as a whole starts crumbling.

But you are happier and live a better life.

All i need is the Emperor for he is my shield and protector.

Great article once again from Rollo.

The idea that some men think sex is not essential to a man's happiness and self-worth is very confusing to me. I can't relate to it at all. Never do I feel more energetic and happy than after sex with a beautiful woman.

Does it really matter why?

Whether it's nature's reward system for doing what we are all designed to do, or it's my own ego being validated after having achieved a desire. It doesn't matter.

I just know it's necessary for me to feel content and happy. I can't imagine it being different for other men.

I think this is kind of dumb. We all have sexual energy that has to be utilized, developed and released. But this doesn't necessarily involve coitus. I've always felt that the whole "I'm a man and I need sex," attitude is extremely blue pill because it is exactly that attitude that gives women power through sexual leverage. But then again, we are all wired differently. I've never experienced this "blue balls" feeling other dudes complain about.

"I'm a man and I need sex," attitude is extremely blue pill

What? Recognizing the fact that we're sexual creatures with biological imperatives isn't "blue pill."

MockingDead • 1 point • 2 July, 2013 02:20 AM

Need, I believe, is the operative blue pill word, I think.

redpillschool[S] • 4 points • 2 July, 2013 02:34 AM

Denying that sex is a necessity for the mental well being of sexual creatures is something that our culture has been trying to push over on us for far too long. I'm not ashamed to admit that sex is a necessity for my mental health, and recognizing it as a need is a crucial step if you ever decide you need to deal with it.

MockingDead • 1 point • 2 July, 2013 02:48 AM

I have been an Incel for a long time, even with a brief stint outside. I don't deny that we need sex, and having read the article, I agree with it.

I need sex. It's the getting that I am working on.

Disagree. They only have leverage if you need sex from them MORE than they need commitment from YOU. Since I have an abundance of women I can get sex from, but there is only one me, guess who has the leverage in my interactions?

I know what you will say, you will say well she can just go and get commitment from another guy just as easy. Yes, she can. But that's the thing about women. They don't want to settle for just any man, when they are strongly attracted, they want THAT man. This desire for commitment is what gives men the sexual leverage, but most bluepill men don't know how to exploit it because they've never experienced being the high value man who is chased.

There is nothing bluepill about needing sex. Owning your desires and not apologizing for it is as redpill as it gets.

Only sticking point is use of Freud. That nigga was high as shit and fucked up and sexualized his daughters and shit. Otherwise all good.
