Of course one of the top rated comments is this:

"And trying to link this to divorce is absurd. The divorce rate went up because it's LEGAL TO GET ONE and women aren't doomed to a life of poverty and ostracism if they are being mistreated by their husbands. Try knowing something about anything.

You're also taking that quote to it's most extreme (weird, it's as if there's this theme of you seeing things in black and white or something). I agree that some people use it as an excuse for harmful, selfish, and cruel behavior, but there are also people who will drop friends and significant others over the smallest issues. Someone who loves another person loves the whole person despite their flaws, and a relationship with them is not contingent upon a person changing mere annoyances or occasional inconveniences. Often the wonderful conversation, sexual chemistry, shared interests, and mutual support MORE than makes up for those types of flaws. The problem with this phrase is when it's used to justify abusive, manipulative, and destructive behavior, NOT when it's used to describe loving your partner through the good times and the bad.

Often women are referred to as bs for being strong willed and honest, not placating male egos and "keeping in line." Again, if someone is using such phrases to justify intentionally harming others, that's where the line is drawn, but for some, the label of *b*h* is a badge of honor."

Naturally she looks like a horse in her photo...

I wonder what these people would say if asked when divorce became legal, or to cite the law that made it illegal.

It's not so much that divorce was illegal, it's just that once upon a time you needed a good reason to get one.

The horror

OddQuestionGirl • 1 point • 10 February, 2014 10:06 PM

Considering that, if a woman wanted a divorce for no particular reason, she had to fabricate a story of abuse or infidelity... Yeah, pretty horrific for the men.

Admittedly, I don't know how common that was.

It had to actually be proven with evidence.

I wish it was possible to punch a style of writing in the face.

The top post on /r/standupshots right now puts it much better.

Also from the comments there:

That quote can be summarized as, "If you put up with me being an asshole all the time, I'll occasionally not be an asshole. Don't miss out."

If you ever hear that shit from a female you've been shown the reddest of red flags. Use the thickest condom and take it outside with you when you are done. That bitch is worthless.

I tried to read the comments but I had to be rushed to the hospital for an aneurysm.

Oops. The practice of not using direct links makes it difficult to spot duplicates. That's why I usually prefer to link directly where it isn't against the rules.

[deleted] • 1 point • 7 February, 2014 09:02 PM

It's fine.

We're getting so many posts now with the uptick in subscribers that new posts get buried fast. If at least one person who saw the old one can link it we can keep the conversation going.

Holy Fuck that is pretty damn Red Pill for Huffpo stuff.

That said I like the compromise we had in our league when we were kids.

You had a 1st, 2nd and 3rd Place Team and everyone else got participant trophies. Sure everyone walks away with something at the end of the season but everyone still knows who the best teams are.

Cue the angry feminists.

A FB friend of mine posted this a while ago, and I rather enjoyed it, so I sought out other things this fellow had written; but after reading this article he wrote, I backed away slowly.

It doesn't discount from any veracity of this article. But I hate it when reasonableness comes from people who are otherwise so mad. I keep seeing this article popping up, and it bothers me that it perhaps gives credence to his less-reasonable views.

Yes, damn those human beings for being complicated and nuanced!

If only each person would just decide to be good or bad and then stick to that. It would make things so much easier.
