Is it just me...or do a lot of the women in that subreddit sound like the kind of women no real man would ever be attracted to anyway. And I'm not saying that out of spite, but rather matter of factly.

As a woman who can't cook, hates cleaning and doesn't know how to act around kids, you sound like a dream come true to me.

Wat? Cooking is easy, nobody likes cleaning its just something you have to do, and how can someone with maternal instincts not like children. If a women ever said this to me it would be the biggest possible turnoff in existence.

Translation:

As a woman who doesn't enjoy taking responsibility, learning how to better myself or embracing my natural instincts because I'm insecure and may possible be bad at it, I would much rather have a man do everything for me. Then I can be free to explore the world as my empty head continuously bobs in and out of desk jobs until something feels right... Or I can finally land my big career as a famous actress or singer, even though I have no experience or natural talent to speak of.

Okay, I'm projecting a bit at this point... But, I still feel bad for any chump who goes in there for real advice.

You're closer to the truth than you think.

Do women find it attractive? Only to the extent that they find the novel attractive. That which was novel yesterday is humdrum today and will be stale tomorrow.

At the end of the day, women have one very good reason not to adopt the proposed lifestyle. Think of the consequences:

1. The man will develop an unquestionably closer relationship with the children, so he will probably get custody of them if there is a divorce.
2. The man will be out of the workforce for 5 years or more (depending on how many children there are and the timing of their birth).
3. Because of 1, the man will receive the matrimonial home, and probably the greater part of the marital property, if there is a divorce.
4. Because of 1, the man will receive child support from the woman if there is a divorce.
5. Because of 2, the man will probably receive alimony from the woman if there is a divorce.

I have trouble believing point 1, 3, 4 and 5. Equality before the law? What a quaint notion!
