

I came across as pushy + rude?

October 4, 2019 | 2 upvotes | by Meloxian

I was at my first job picking up my check, I'd just gotten off of my 2nd job the end of a seven hour shift - both retail positions. I came in and there was a line, so I went to talk to some other people. When I was coming back one of my co-workers asked me to put something in a return cart for her like five feet away. I told her no that I was clocked off and she didn't have any customers, she said that it was only five feet, I told her no and she called me a dick. I shrugged and cashed my check.

The girl who cashed my check teased me by telling me I wasn't allowed to cash my check there, so I went with the joke. She said she didn't like my hair down, then mentioned it was that I was weird and I wasn't being myself. She said wasn't the hair but it was my bad attitude, I pressed her on it and she said that I was coming across pushy and rude. How does one come across pushy and rude? Should I correct this behavior? If so, how?

Archived from theredarchive.com

Comments

SesameStreetPimp • 2 points • 4 October, 2019 01:29 AM

Don't. Some people think you need to do shit for them to be nice. If they're not adding anything to you then fuck em. For every one person that hates you there's one who admires you.