the fulfillment of their desire to receive attention, and be involved in drama.
...this is the sole reason women are involved in these events at all.

A surprisingly big and peaceful march went right by my shop yesterday so I stopped working to people watch. Black people in general, and men of all races, seemed to treat it as a somber, serious, quiet event. The people making the most noise were nonblack women. There were a few leaning waaay out of cars cruising alongside the marchers, holding out bottles of water and snacks and getting exactly zero takers. Most signs had to do with Floyd or were about justice. Nonblack womens' signs often made it about themselves: "I support you 100%" There was a white woman marching topless with her sign held tightly to her boobs, as usual of the "Nudists you don't want to see naked" class.

At times I was reminded of those South American fishing videos where the boat is suddenly swarmed with flying fish jumping into the boat to overflowing. I can't remember ever seeing a crowd with so many panties ready to drop on mere eye contact that didn't involve an A-list celebrity there in the flesh.

White women be leading marches and directing the paths to get the most attention while people at the back are like "we just want to walk".

Attention is a game to Anglo women like money is a game to Anglo men. They have no actual values/beliefs so they just try to rack up the most points.

Lol their solipsism has no limits. It's astounding. It's a red pill in of itself, they don't have any solid beliefs/principles, they just take shape.

'#metoo' is literally 'pound me, too'

Poetry.

Think about how you can make jumping on your dick part of the political drama experience, and come up with a plan.

Metoo. Mewtwo. Floyd who. It's all drama if you spin it the right way.

Godspeed and good luck!

Recall that the appearance of victimhood is actually a position of power for women, because it leverages the male protective instinct to get resources, both tangible and intangible, flowing their way.

How is it possible to leverage this, play the "bad boy game"? Because it's not worthy to get into actual trouble just for a chick.

That last sentence.
