The explanation for alimony for women is that they gave up their career and need to be compensated for it.

How about a man who provided for his family by working a lot, didn't he give up his relationship with his children? Why is there no law to compensate him? Maybe he should get full custody (if he is able to) given how much he sacrificed?

But no - laws are always made to look symmetric but in fact, they protect from things that typically harm women and not from things that typically harm men.

1.) Because if he has to pay child support, he should be able to see his kids

2.) The father is just as important to the child's upbringing, so more men having access to their kids is just as important especially for boys

This is ten times better than what Michigan tried to do. The state attempted to make a law stating that if a woman took a man to court, accusing him of rape, the man would immediately be arrested without trial. The bill was immediately denied because it would interfere with the 6th and 7th amendments.
