

Reminded of my mom

February 1, 2021 | 117 upvotes | by PaPaKAPture

My brother was in the Army and was shipped overseas in 2002. While he was in Iraq, my mom sold all of his earthly possessions. And he had given her access to his bank account, of course she spent every dime out of it. I think she presumed that he would never be coming home.

By this time (10th grade) I had witnessed all the crazy shit she did, and moved in with my dad. Completely forgot she did this until a min ago reading another young lad's story about his mom taking his earnings. I haven't spoken to her in years.

Spent all of his money. That's what they're good at. Spending other people's money.

Hope your brother is doing alright now. If he's not, get him to the VA.

Damnit, a proof you cannot even put your arms down with your own family.

How's going with your brother pal?

he was fucked up for years after the war, but is getting his life back on track.

I have tried for years to get him to see what she did to him, all he says is "she needed the money more than me" Sad.

I think he refuses to see what your mom did, hope he gets better and my best wishes to you and family bro.

all he says is "she needed the money more than me" Sad.

"Okay, but why didn't she ask first?"

"....."

My father once tell me trust no one because the only way you know someone is on your side is when you are rock bottom are is of no use to them anymore never forget that and even if you hit rock bottom and they stay and help still don't trust them a 100%.

To some women kids are just a means of extending that free money train. First fleece the dad, then fleece the gov/tax payers...finally fleece your grown up kids by demanding they keep you.

When I told my mom I was suicidal she told me 3 separate times I should "just go ahead and do it" and yet I don't think even she would do something like this to me.
