The very fact that this term exists is proof that mainstream feminists know that their ideas cannot stand up to scrutiny so they use this cop out to try to accuse them of thinking women are stupid and are trying to talk to them like they are children.

Yep, mansplaining is just another way of calling a man sexist without actually calling him sexist.

If you include women you're accused of misogyny. If you avoid women you're accused of misogyny.

I've usually been accused of it during training new staff in stuff when we have a legal obligation to cover things like safety regulations, it's boring and mostly common sense but needs to be gone over and signed off.

I think either it's not a thing at all, the term is grossly misused and you're only going to hear it out the mouth of a sexist who's too arrogant to coherently respond on topic

Somebody has to mansplain to femtards or they'll never understand anything.

Its a term that women /feminists use against a man when they don't like what they are hearing him say /tell them. If your accused of mansplaining then you know you have hit a nerve.

I think it counts as hate speech.
